‡ Whitlocke gives a somewhat amusing account of the reduction of Hume Castle:—“February 3rd, 1650. Letters that Colonel Fenwick summoned Hume Castle to be surrendered to General Cromwell. The governor answered, ‘I know not Cromwell; and as for my castle, it is built on a rock.’ Whereupon Colonel Fenwick played upon him a little with the great guns. But the governor still would not yield; nay, sent a letter couched in these singular terms:—

‘I, William of the Wastle,
Am now in my castle;
And a’ the dogs in the town
Shanna gar me gang down.’

So that there remained nothing but opening the mortars upon this William of the Wastle, which did gar him gang down.” (Letters and Speeches, vol. iii. p. 132.)

* “Letters that the Scots in a village called Geddard (Jedburgh) rose and armed themselves, and set upon Captain Dawson as he returned from pursuing some moss-troopers; and killed his guide and trumpet; and took Dawson and eight of his party, and, after having given them quarter, killed them all in cold blood.”—Whitlocke, p. 464.

† Baillie, vol. iii. 127.

‡ 2 Kings, xi. 12, 17.

you; let it be laid to heart; requite not faithful men's kindness with persecution; yea, requite not the Lord so, who hath preserved you to this time, and is setting a crown upon your head; requite not the Lord with apostasy and defection from a Coronation sworn covenant." Charles then, on his bended knees, and with uplifted hands, solemnly declared in the presence of Almighty God his approbation of the national covenant, and of the solemn league and covenant, and promised to prosecute the ends thereof in his station and calling; to consent to all acts of parliament, enjoining the same, and establishing presbyterial government; to observe these in his own practice and family, and never to oppose them or endeavour any change thereof. He then subscribed the covenant and his oath, written upon a roll of parchment, as the charter by which he held his crown, and was entitled to his people's obedience. At a subsequent stage of the proceedings he took, with equal solemnity, the coronation oath presented by the parliament, to maintain the true religion of Christ now established within the realm; to abolish and gainstand all false religions; to govern according to the command of God and the laws and constitution of the realm; to preserve inviolate the rights and privileges of the crown; to repress all kinds of oppression and wrong; to do justice to all his subjects without respect of persons; and to root out all heretics and enemies to the true worship of God. The constable then girt his majesty with the sword, the earl-marshal put on his spurs, and the Marquis of Argyll placed the crown upon his head—a service which was afterwards recompensed with base and characteristic ingratitude. The oath of allegiance was taken by the nobles in succession; and the solemnities of the day were concluded by a plain and energetic address to the king, nobles, and people, in which they were severally admonished to fulfil the obligations they had that day entered into.

The authority of the king was now greatly augmented; the Act of Classes was repealed; most of the engagers, and even of the malignants, were permitted to resume their seats in parliament; and many royalist officers were received into the army. With his wonted dissimulation, Charles strove to conciliate Argyll, whom he secretly hated; and even made a proposal to marry that nobleman's daughter; but the wary chief was too wise to be imposed upon by such artifices. Meanwhile the raising of the new levies proceeded with great spirit, and the army was now equal in number to that which had been defeated at Dunbar. Charles himself assumed the chief command of the forces, with the Duke of Hamilton as his lieutenant, and Leslie as his major-general. Made wiser by experience, they now adhered resolutely to the defensive system, and took up a strong position in front of Stirling, their right resting upon the Torwood, and the river

Carron protecting their front, which was strongly intrenched, while the northern counties behind them were kept open for provisions and supplies. If they had been masters of a fleet to guard the Frith of Forth, or had been supported by another army in Fife, their position would have been impregnable. Cromwell, meanwhile, had occupied himself during the winter in subjugating the country south of the Forth, reducing the strongholds of the barons, and rooting out the moss-troopers. On the 4th of February his forces quitted their winter quarters, and marched towards Stirling, but encountered such a storm of hail, snow, wind, and rain, that after marching as far as Kilsyth, they were compelled to retrace their steps and return to Edinburgh. In this severe illness tempestuous expedition the lord- of Cromwell—general caught a dangerous illness, which hung about him till the month of June, and seriously alarmed his friends. "I thought I should have died of this fit of sickness," said he in a letter to the president of the council of state, "but the Lord seemeth to dispose otherwise."* It was not until the middle of April that operations were renewed. Having collected a flotilla of gunboats under Lambert, who was ordered to attack the small island of Inchgarvie, situated in the Frith, and the town of Burntisland, on the coast of Fife, Cromwell marched westward with a great —his second part of his army, for the purpose visit to Glasgow— of making another attempt upon the Scottish lines. On the 18th of April he reached Glasgow, where he remained till the 30th,† when

* Cromwelliana, p. 101; Letters of Cromwell, vol. iii. pp. 160, 161.

† The following interesting account of Cromwell's second visit to Glasgow is given by Baillie:—"Cromwell, having come to Hamilton on Friday late, and to Glasgow on Saturday, with a body of his armie, sooner than with safety we could weel have retired ourselves. On Sunday, before noone, he came unexpectedlie to the High Inner Church, where quietlie he heard Mr. Robert Ramsay preach a very good honest sermon, pertinent for his case. In the afternoon, he came also unexpectedlie to the High Outer Kirk, where he heard Mr. John Carstairs' lecture, and Mr. James Durhame preach, graciouslie and weel to the times as could have been desired. Generallie all who preached that day in the town gave a fair enough testimony against the sectaries. That night some of the armie was trying if the ministers would be pleased, of their own accord, to confer with their general. When none had shewed any willingness, on Monday, a gentleman from Cromwell came to the most of the brethren, severallie desyring, yea, requiring them, and the rest of the ministers in towne, to come and speak with their generall. All of us did meet to advyse; and after some debate, we were all content to goe and hear what would be said. When we came he spoke long and smoothlie, shewing the scandale himselfe and others had taken at the doctrine they had heard preached; especiallie that they were condemned, 1st, As unjust invaders: 2nd, As contemnners and trampers under foot of the ordinances: 3rd, As persecutors of the ministers of Ireland: That as they were unwilling to offend us by a publick contradicting of us in the Church, so they expected we would be willing to give them a reason when they craved it in private. We shew our willingness to give a reason either for these three, or what else was excepted against in any of our sermons. The time appointed for this was this day, at two o'clock, at Cromwell's lodging. We trust, by the grace of God, to speak nothing for the disadvantage of the truth and cause in hand." Baillie, unfortunately, gives no account of this interesting conference, but merely says, "We had no disadvantage in the thing. You will see he was hastily recalled to Edinburgh by a false alarm respecting some movements of the Scottish army.* At length, on the 25th of June, having completely recovered from his illness, after three successive relapses, the lord-general mustered his army in its old camp on the Pentland Hills; and, marching westward, once more endeavoured to force the enemy from his strong position at Stirling. Various skirmishes and cannonadings took place, in which the Scots seem in general to have had the advantage; and strongly intrenched at the Torwood, and protected by bogs and brooks, they baffled every attempt of the enemy to drive them from their advantageous positions, and Cromwell was compelled to return to his former quarters at Linlithgow. The attack of the gun-boats on Burntisland failed, but Colonel Overton, at the head of a detachment of fourteen hundred foot and some horse, surprised north Queensferry, which was feebly guarded. A strong body of troops, under Sir John Brown and Colonel Holburn, were immediately dispatched from Stirling to regain this important point, which commanded the passage of the Frith; but they were anticipated by Cromwell, who sent across two thousand men, under Lambert, to secure the advantage he had gained. A fierce encounter took place near the town of Inverkeithing, in which Holburn behaved basely, if not treacherously; the Scots were completely routed, with the loss of two the sum of it drawn by Mr. James Guthrie and Mr. Patrick Gillespie, the main speakers; and that this paper is now lost. (Baillie's Letters and Journals, vol. iii. pp. 165—168.) An account of this interview, probably written by one of Cromwell's officers, confirms the accuracy of Baillie's statements:—"We came hither [to Glasgow] on Saturday last, April 19th. The ministers and townsmen generally stayed at home, and did not quit their habitations as formerly. The ministers here have mostly deserted from the proceedings beyond the water [at Perth], yet they are equally dissatisfied with us. But though they preach against us in the pulpit to our faces, yet we permit them, without disturbance, as willing to gain them by love. My lord-general sent to them to give us a friendly Christian meeting, to discourse of those things which they rail against us for; that so, if possible, all misunderstandings between us might be taken away. Which accordingly they gave us on Wednesday last. There was no bitterness nor passion vented on either side, all was with moderation and tenderness. My lord-general and Major-general Lambert, for the most part, maintained the discourse; and, on their part, Mr. James Guthrie and Mr. Patrick Gillespie. We know not what satisfaction they have received. Sure I am there was no such weight in their arguments as might in the least discourage us from what we have undertaken; the chief thing on which they insisted being our invasion into Scotland."—Cromwelliana, p. 102.

—fails in his attempt upon the Scottish lines at Stirling.

Defeat of the Scots at Inverkeithing.

* On his return from Glasgow to Edinburgh, Cromwell passed along the uplands near the Kirk of Shotts, and called at Allertoun, a mansion-house belonging to Sir Walter Stewart. The following curious account of this visit has been recently published in the Coltness Collections. "There was a fifth son"—of Sir Walter Stewart, Laird of Allertoun—"James, who in his younger years was called the Captain of Allertoun, from this incident:—Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of the English sectarian army, after taking Edinburgh Castle, was making a progress through the west of Scotland, and came down towards the river Clyde, near Lanark, and was on his march back, against King Charles the Second's army, then with the king at Stirling. Being informed of a near way through thousand men, who fell on the field, and about five or six hundred were taken prisoners, among whom was Sir John Brown, who had displayed great bravery in the action, and a few days after died of grief. Inchgarvie and Burntisland, with a considerable number of cannon, were the immediate reward of this victory; and Cromwell himself soon after crossed the Frith at the head of fourteen thousand men, and marched to Perth, which was surrendered by Lord Duffus, the governor, on the same day on which it was invested.

The situation of the Scottish army now became somewhat critical, but by no means desperate. Their supplies from Fife and Perth were indeed cut off; but, on the other hand, the west and south were relieved from the pressure of the enemy; the Highlands were still open, though by a circuitous rout; and the clans, whose strength was entirely unbroken, were peculiarly fitted for desultory warfare. The summer was already far advanced, and Cromwell admits that he dreaded another winter campaign as likely to prove "the ruin of his soldiery, for whom the Scots are too hard in respect of enduring the winter difficulties of the country," besides "the endless expense of the treasure of England in prosecuting this war."

Critical situation of the Scottish army.

Charles, however, was tired of the fatigues of a protracted warfare; and, exaggerating both the difficulties of his situation and the strength and zeal of

Proposal to march into England—

Auchtermuir, he came with some general officers to reconnoitre, and had a guide along. Sir Walter, being a royalist and covenantar, had absconded. As he (Cromwell) passed, he called in at Allertoun for a further guide; but no men were to be found save one valetudinary gentleman, Sir Walter's son.

"He found the road not practicable for carriages; and upon his return he called in at Sir Walter's house. There was none to entertain him but the lady and Sir Walter's sickly son. The good woman was as much for the king and royal family as her husband; but she offered the general the civilities of her house; and a glass of canary was presented. The general observed the forms of these times (I have it from good authority), and he asked a blessing in a long, pathetic grace before the cup went round; he drank his good wishes for the family, and asked for Sir Walter; and was pleased to say his mother was a Stewart's daughter, and he had a relation to the name. All passed easy; and our James, being a lad of ten years, came so near as to handle the hilt of one of the swords; upon which Oliver stroked his head, saying, 'You are my little captain;' and this is all the commission our Captain of Allertoun ever had.

"The general called for some of his own wines for himself and other officers, and would have the lady try his wines; and was so humane when he saw the young gentleman so maigre and indisposed, he said changing the climate might do good, and the south of France, Montpellier, was the place.

"Amidst all this humanity and politeness he omitted not, in person, to return thanks to God in a pointed grace after his repast; and after this hastened on his return to join the army. The lady had been a strenuous royalist, and her son a captain in command at Dunbar; yet upon this interview with the general she abated much of her zeal. She said she was sure Cromwell was one who feared God, and had that fear in him, and the true interest of religion at heart. A story of this kind is no idle digression; it has some small connexion with the family concerns, and shews some little of the genius of these distracted times."—Coltness Collections, published by the Maitland Club, p. 9.

* Letter of Cromwell to the Speaker, 4th August, 1651; Letters and Speeches, vol. iii. p. 189.

his adherents in England, recommended that the army should immediately break up their camp and march to the south. If they remained in their present position, he alleged, they had no choice but to starve, or to fight under disadvantageous circumstances. The way to the capital was open; the enemy might be outstripped in the march; and, if opportunity were offered, all their royalist friends, as well as the presbyterians, who were dissatisfied with the present government, would flock to the royal standard. The greater part of

—is opposed the generals were persuaded to by Argyll— enter into these views, but the proposal was strenuously opposed by Argyll, who urged that it was ungenerous to abandon a people who had afforded the king an asylum in his extremity, and had suffered so much in his cause, to deprive them of their last army, and leave them an easy prey to their enemy; and that it was imprudent to desert a country where the king's authority was acknowledged, for a country where his title was prescribed and another form of government established; where no preparation had been made for his reception, and where the miserable wreck of the last expedition remained as a warning beacon that their hopes of assistance from England were altogether delusive. But the objections of this sagacious and prudent chief were overruled, and he was permitted to retire to his estate. The

—but adopted desperate expedient recommended by the army. by the king was adopted, and about the beginning of August the Scottish army, about fourteen thousand strong, suddenly broke up their camp, and by rapid marches advanced into England.

This movement of the royal army took Cromwell by surprise. He lost no time, measures of however, in providing against the danger to which the commonwealth was exposed by this sudden invasion of the enemy. He dispatched letters to the parliament, exhorting them not to be dismayed at the approach of the Scots; and reminding them that a much more considerable army, and "unfoiled," had invaded England "when it was much more unsteady than now," and they had but a weak force to resist it, and yet it was singularly overthrown; whereas "the present movement of an enemy, heart-smitten by God, was not out of choice on their part, but by some kind of necessity, and it was to be hoped would have a like issue.*" His measures were characterised by his usual vigilance and activity. Leaving a garrison in Perth, he sent General Monk with a force of seven thousand men to reduce Stirling; he ordered the militia to assemble and obstruct the progress of the enemy; dispatched Harrison and Rich to watch the motions of the enemy and intercept their recruits; commanded Lambert, with a body of cavalry, to hang upon their rear and retard their march; and hastened himself, at the head of the remaining horse and some regiments of foot, to follow them with all the expedition possible.

The Scottish army entered England by Carlisle on the 6th of August, and advanced into Lancashire; but they were entirely disappointed in their expectations of assistance from their English friends. The movement was totally unexpected, so that the most zealous partisans of the king, having received no warning of his approach, were not prepared to join him. The royalists were now completely crushed and dispirited, and were besides deterred from offering their services by a proclamation which the committee of ministers issued, that none should be allowed to join the army who would not subscribe the covenant; while the presbyterians, though favourable to the royal cause, were not disposed to hazard their lives and fortunes in such a desperate enterprise without some security that their principles would be maintained; and an intercepted letter from Charles to Massey, who commanded the advance guard, ordering him to suppress the declaration of the clergy, showed how little confidence could be placed in the king's sincerity. At Warrington Bridge their passage was disputed by Lambert and Harrison, who were, however, compelled to retire in disorder. In spite of this success, the sagacious Leslie, who had from the beginning perceived the desperate nature of the enterprise, presaged its disastrous termination. They summoned various towns as they proceeded but without effect; and now, reduced in numbers by fatigue and desertion, they abandoned in despair the march to the capital, and on the 22nd of August turned aside to Worcester, a loyal city, where —they are disappointed in their expectations of assistance——they intrench themselves in Worcester.

they proposed to halt and rest a little, while Massey proceeded to Gloucester, in the expectation of collecting his former adherents there. But Lambert, Harrison, and Fleetwood, at the head of eighteen thousand of the militia and other troops, were close at hand, and hemmed in the royalists, while Cromwell with the main army was steadily advancing behind. The Scots found time before the arrival of the general to repair and strengthen the fortifications of the city; but the only reinforcements they received was the Earl of Derby with thirty men, the remains of fourteen hundred, raised in Lancashire, but whom Lilburn had attacked and overthrown at Wigan. On the 28th of August, Cromwell came in sight, and now thirty thousand men surrounded the devoted city, and shut up every avenue of escape. A portion of the Scottish army was stationed at the suburb of St. John, on the western bank of the Severn, at some distance south-west from Worcester, and connected with the city by Severn Bridge. The city itself stands on the left or eastern bank of the river, and was defended on the south-east by an intrenchment of the Scots termed Fort Royal. It was resolved to make a simultaneous attack on both sides; and the third day of

—they are surrounded and attacked by Cromwell.

* Letters and Speeches, vol. iii. p. 190.

September, the anniversary of the battle of Dunbar, was appointed for the general assault. On the night of the second, a considerable body of the English forces, under Fleetwood, crossed to the western bank of the Severn some miles below Worcester, by Upton Bridge, which Massey had destroyed, but not sufficiently to prevent Lambert's men "straddling across by the parapet." Between Upton and the Scottish outposts at St. John's there runs the river Teme, a tributary of the Severn, into which it falls about a mile below the city. The bridge which crosses the Teme at Powick was in the possession of the Scots, but Fleetwood resolved to cross by a bridge of boats close by the spot where the river joins the Severn. At this point, also, a bridge of boats was laid across the Severn itself, so that both divisions of the army might readily communicate with each other in case of need. Early on the morning of the 3rd Fleetwood was in motion, but it was not till late in the afternoon that the bridges were ready. The Battle of the Scots had meanwhile lined the Worcester. hedges with which the ground in that quarter was intersected; and when the enemy at length crossed the river in great force, and began the attack, they met with so warm a reception that Cromwell himself was obliged to cross the Severn to their assistance with a considerable number of his best troops. The struggle was long and fierce. Every hedge and ditch was obstinately contested, but the Scots were at length compelled by overwhelming numbers to give way, and were driven into the town. Meanwhile Charles and his council of war were on the top of the cathedral anxiously watching the struggle, and they now resolved to sally out and attack the portion of the enemy's forces which had been left on the eastern bank of the river, in the hope of being able to overpower them before the others could come to their assistance. To meet this movement Cromwell hastily crossed the river by the bridge of boats, and the deadliest part of the struggle began. The Scots fought with desperate fury, drove back the English Life Guards, and for some time obtained possession of their artillery. But fresh reinforcements poured in and restored the battle. "My lord-general," says an eye-witness, "did exceedingly hazard himself, riding up and down in the midst of the fire, riding himself in person to the enemy's foot to offer them quarter, whereto they returned no answer but shot." The battle raged here with alternate success for three hours. It was "as stiff a contest," Cromwell says, "as he had ever seen." But at length the Scots were compelled to yield to overwhelming numbers. Fort Royal was stormed, their other works carried one by one, and their own guns turned against them. The conflict was renewed in the streets, which were strewn with the dead. About three

Total defeat of thousand were slain; six or seven the Scots. thousand were made prisoners in the town, besides those who were captured in the pursuit. The Duke of Hamilton was mortally wounded, and died on the fourth day. Eleven other noblemen and upwards of one hundred and fifty persons of distinction were taken. Among these was the Earl of Derby, who was severely wounded, and was afterwards executed at Bolton; and the Earls of Lauderdale, Cleveland, Rothes, and others, who were condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the Tower. The common soldiers who survived their wounds and the horrors of the overcrowded prisons were, with disgraceful barbarity, transported to the plantations and sold as slaves.*

The king himself, after witnessing the ruin of his cause, escaped from Worcester ^{Escape of the} in company with a few friends, ^{king.} and rode without halting to the borders of Staffordshire. Here he was compelled to separate from his attendants, and sought refuge with a farmer named Pendrell, to whom he had been recommended by the Earl of Derby. Clothed in the garb of a peasant, he was employed during the day in the woods cutting fagots. His nights were spent sometimes in a barn, at other times in wretched hovels. In one instance he took refuge in a large oak, where he concealed himself among the leaves and branches for twenty-four hours, and overheard several parties of soldiers who were in search of him express their earnest wishes for his capture. At another time he rode before a lady, Mrs. Lane, in the disguise of a servant. He found shelter in various houses of the Roman Catholic gentry, and was concealed in the recesses which had been constructed for the security of their priests. On one occasion he passed undiscovered with a female cousin of Colonel Lane's behind him through a body of parliamentary troops commanded by Desborough. On another he narrowly escaped detection through the sagacity of a smith, who remarked that his horse's shoes had been made in the north, and not in the west, as he pretended. At length, after a variety of romantic adventures, and the most imminent risk of discovery, he succeeded in embarking in a collier vessel at Shoreham, in Sussex; and forty-five days after his escape from Worcester was safely landed in France. No less than fifty persons had at different times been privy to his concealment; but neither the promise of a great reward, nor the threats of the severest punishment, could induce any of them to betray him.

This "crowning mercy," as Cromwell termed his victory at Worcester, placed Scot- Subjugation of land completely in his power. Scotland by Deprived of all its regular troops Monk. by the ill-judged and disastrous expedition, it could offer no effective resistance to the arms of the republicans. Stirling Castle was, indeed, well provided with everything requisite for its defence, but the Highlanders, who composed the garrison, terrified at the explosion of the shells, to which they were quite unaccustomed, mutinied against their officers, and forced them to capitulate. The records of the kingdom, which had been removed to this fortress on the surrender of Edinburgh Castle, fell a second time into the hands of the enemy, and were sent by Monk to the Tower of London.* His Cruel treatment of Dundee. arms were next turned against Dundee, a well-fortified seaport town, to which the Mint had been removed, and in which the rich furniture, plate, and money of the adjacent country had been deposited as in a place of safety. It was expected to make a vigorous resistance, but, owing to the intoxication of the soldiers and citizens, it was taken by storm on the 1st of September; the garrison were put to the sword; the town was set on fire and pillaged; the inhabitants, without distinction of sex or age, were given up to an indiscriminate massacre; and the gallant Sir R. Lumsden, the governor, after obtaining quarter, was basely put to death in cold blood by orders of Monk. The clergy of the town, although they had advised its surrender, were treated with the utmost insolence and rudeness by the brutal general, and Capture of the committee of Estates. sent prisoners to England.† Ten days before this a committee of Estates, consisting of the lord-chancellor, Alexander Leslie, the old Earl of Leven, Lords Ogilvy, Crawford, Lindsay, and other noblemen met at Alyth, in Angus, to concert measures for the relief of Dundee; but Colonel Alured, led by a traitor named William Buchan, general scout-master of the Scottish army, surprised and made them prisoners.‡ A few of them made their escape, and met afterwards at Inverury, in Aberdeenshire, where it was proposed to create Huntley captain-general; but on the approach of the enemy they took refuge in the Highlands, and Huntley and Balcarras submitted to the invaders. An attempt of the royalists at Dumfries, under Sir Philip Musgrave, was suppressed with equal ease. Montrose, Aberdeen, Inverness, St. Andrew's, and other towns, intimidated by the cruel treatment of Dundee, surrendered at discretion. Dunnottar Castle, in Kincardineshire, situated upon a high rock overhanging the ocean, held out till the 4th of June, 1652, and was the last stronghold in Scotland which surrendered to the enemy.§ Argyll's behaviour of Argyll. made a fruitless attempt to rouse the depressed spirits of his fellow nobles, and invited a convention of Estates to meet

* Cromwelliana, pp. 113, 114; Whitlocke, p. 482; Letters and Speeches, vol. iii. pp. 191—206.

* A number of the principal public registers were restored by Cromwell in 1657; the rest, amounting to eighty-five hogsheds full, after the Restoration, were lost in their passage to Scotland by sea.

† "Their ministers were very averse from holding out the toun, but wold had it rendered; notwithstanding the choleric, merciless commander wold not heire them speake one word in their own defence, bot, in a rage, commandit Mr. Jo. Robertson not to speake one word, which, if he presumed to doe, he would scoke his mouthe."—Balfour, vol. iv. p. 316.

‡ Gordon's General Hist., p. 560. Leslie, who along with the other members of the committee, was sent to the Tower, was afterwards released on the intercession of Queen Christina of Sweden. (Balfour, vol. iv. p. 316.)

§ The crown, sceptre, and sword of state were deposited in this strong fortress after the battle of Dunbar; but before the surrender of the castle these venerable symbols of Scotat Inverury, but no one attended the summons. He proceeded, however, to muster his clan, and to fortify some of his Highland strengths; and though two of the English commissioners held a conference with him, and endeavoured to persuade him to submit to the English commonwealth, he steadfastly refused to accept the terms offered by them. But a reluctant submission was at last extorted from him by Major-general Dean, who unexpectedly arrived at Inverury by sea, and surprised the marquis while confined to his castle by sickness. To him, however, belongs the honour of being the last man of rank or influence who submitted to the victorious arms of the English commonwealth.*

In spite of the depressed state of the country, both from internal distractions and Insurrection of the calamitous issue of two dis- Glencairn.

astrous campaigns, in which thirty thousand of the flower of the population had perished, the Scots were not yet disposed to remain quiescent under the yoke of the commonwealth; and when war broke out in 1653 between the English and tish sovereignty were conveyed out of it by Mrs. Granger, the wife of the minister of Kinneff. The crown was concealed in the lap of this intrepid matron, and the sword and sceptre wrapped up in bundles of flax placed upon the back of a female domestic. The regalia were thus transported to the manse of Kinneff, and were afterwards buried in the church by the Rev. James Granger. On the reduction of the fortress the disappointment of the English general was extreme upon finding that the regalia had been removed, and every effort was made, but in vain, to discover the place of their concealment. The Countess of Marischal diverted the suspicions of the enemy into a false channel by spreading a report that these national treasures had been carried abroad by Sir John Keith, a younger son of the Earl Marischal. When Dunnottar was finally surrendered for want of provisions, the Governor Ogilvy, of Barra, was rigorously dealt with, imprisoned, and, it is said, even tortured to make him discover where the regalia were concealed. His lady was subjected to similar severities, and her health sunk under the close confinement; but with her dying breath she exhorted her husband to preserve inviolable the secret entrusted to him. The minister of Kinneff and his courageous wife did not escape suspicion and harsh treatment; but nothing could be extorted from them respecting the treasure under their charge. After the Restoration, honours and rewards were distributed to those who had been concerned in saving the regalia, but, as Sir Walter Scott remarks, they were bestowed with more regard to rank and influence than to justice. Sir John Keith, who had no share in the transaction, except to give the use of his name as a blind, was created Earl of Kintore and Knight-marshal of Scotland, with a salary of four hundred pounds a year. Ogilvy, whose patrimonial estate had been impoverished by the fines and sequestration imposed by the English, received the merely honorary reward of a baronetcy, while Mrs. Granger was rewarded with the sum of two thousand marks Scotch.

The regalia, or "Honours of Scotland" as they are termed, are now deposited in the Castle of Edinburgh. The crown, which is very elegantly formed, is in all probability the diadem worn by Robert Bruce; but James V. added two concentric arches of gold, crossing and intersecting each other above the circles, and surmounted in the centre by a ball or globe, over which rises a cross patée adorned with pearls. The sceptre was made in the time of James V., most probably during the king's visit to Paris in 1536. But the large globular mass of rock crystal near the top seems of a much older date, and was probably part of the more ancient sceptre of the Scottish kings. The sword of state was presented to James IV. by the warlike Pope Julius II. in the year 1507, and being wrought in Italy shortly after the revival of the arts, is a most beautiful specimen of sculpture. (See Antiquities of Scotland by Sir Walter Scott, vol. i. pp. 1—49.)

* Whitlocke, pp. 486—491.

the Dutch, and Monk was recalled to take the command of the fleet, the Earls of Glencairn and Balcarras took up arms, and, in imitation of Montrose, repaired to the Highlands, in the expectation that the greater part of the clans would flock to their standard. Here they were joined by the Earl of Atholl; the Marquis of Montrose, son of the great marquis; Lord Lorn, son of the Marquis of Argyll; and Lord Kenmure; and by Lochiel, Gengarray, and other Highland chieftains. Two brilliant and successful skirmishes, one at Aberfoyle, the other at the celebrated pass of the Trosachs, contributed to augment the ranks of the insurgents, and they were joined by a considerable body of old disbanded soldiers, and of "desperate people sequestered, sequestrable, or much in debt."* Their numbers increased to five thousand men; but Glencairn, though possessed of personal courage, was deficient in military skill, as well as in the ability to preserve order and subordination among the motley band who were under his command. His authority Disensions among the insurgents. was openly disputed, and it was proposed by Lord Balcarras that the army should be governed by a committee composed exclusively of those who adhered to the solemn league and covenant. The production of a royal commission appointing Glencairn captain-general silenced, but did not satisfy, the mutinous nobles and chiefs, who contrived to make the king acquainted with their dissatisfaction.

Middleton assumes the command— In the hope of reconciling their feuds, General Middleton, who had escaped from the Tower, was sent over by Charles to take the command of the army; but the dissensions of the royalist leaders still continued. Glencairn himself quarrelled and fought a duel with Sir George Munro, Middleton's lieutenant-general. Another and more fatal encounter of the same kind took place between a Captain Livingstone and a gentleman named Lindsay, in which the former was killed, and the latter was tried by a court-martial, and shot at Dornoch, in spite of Glencairn's endeavours to save him. The earl in consequence left the army in disgust, and returned to the Lowlands, where, after one or two petty skirmishes, he accepted the terms offered by the English, which were more favourable than could have been expected. His example was followed by the greater part of the Lowland nobles. Middleton, though weakened by their defection, still endeavoured to prolong the struggle; but the termination of the war with Holland enabled the protector to dispatch Monk with additional forces —he is defeated, and escapes to the Continent. to suppress the Scottish insurrection; and a party of them under General Morgan surprised and defeated the royalists at Lochgarry, 26th of July, 1654. On the approach of night they dispersed among the hills, and Middleton himself retired to the Continent, so that the last embers of resistance to the protector's authority were completely trodden out.

In connection with this ill-concerted and worse managed attempt to throw off the English yoke, a romantic exploit, performed by a gallant young English cavalier named Wogan, deserves notice. Gallant exploit of Col. Wogan. He had been originally engaged in the service of the parliament, but had abandoned that party on the execution of Charles I. He joined the court of the exiled king, in France, and, having heard there of the insurrection of the Scottish royalists, he took leave of Charles II., passed over to London, assembled a body of about eighty cavaliers, whom he led with such dexterity and courage through England and the Lowlands of Scotland that, though the whole country was completely under the domination of Cromwell, he safely united his gallant troop with the body of Highlanders under Glencairn. He took an active part in the desultory warfare which was carried on for some months in the mountains, and gained the highest reputation for bravery and skill. But in an encounter near Drummond, in Athol, with a regiment of Cromwell's invincibles called "the Brazen Wall," whom he threw into disorder, he received a trifling wound, which, from the want of proper surgical assistance, proved fatal, and prematurely terminated his glorious career.*

All resistance to the arms of the commonwealth having now ceased, it was resolved by the parliament to effect an incorporating union between England and Scotland; and St. John, Sir Henry Vane, and six other commissioners, were appointed to make arrangements for this purpose. On their arrival in Scotland they found the country reduced to the lowest ebb, and torn by political and religious divisions; but the various parties, though agreeing in nothing else, were all hostile to a union with England and the surrender of their national independence. The counties and towns were ordered to choose delegates to meet with the commissioners to settle the affairs of the kingdom; but the tardiness which they displayed in the election of representatives, afforded conclusive proof that the measure contemplated was exceedingly unacceptable to the nation. The clergy protested against the union, because it would draw along with it the subordination of the Church to the State in spiritual matters. Only about one-third of the counties and towns to which writs had been issued could be induced, either by threats or promises, to elect delegates to meet with the English commissioners. The burghs and shires who declined to send representatives were disfranchised, and the delegates who refused to accede to the proposed union were excluded from the protection of the government.† A bill was brought into the English parliament for the union of Scotland with the English commonwealth, but the measure was frustrated by the forcible dissolution of that famous assembly.

* Appendix to Military Memoirs of the great Civil War, pp. 209—212. Kenmure marched through the country with a cask of agua vite, which was termed Kenmure's Drum.

* Clarendon, vol. vi. p. 507; see also "Waverley," chap. xxix.
† Whitlocke, pp. 487—499.

When Cromwell usurped the supreme authority, he at once proclaimed the incorporating union of the two kingdoms; and shortly after he issued an ordinance discharging the Scottish people from all allegiance to the house of Stewart; formally abolishing the monarchy of Scotland, and the authority of the Estates; and fixing at thirty the number of members for Scotland and the isles, who were to sit in the united parliament. The provisions of the ordinance by which the two nations were incorporated into the same commonwealth were extremely favourable to Scotland, and displayed wisdom and liberality rare in that age.

—their wisdom Though united under one sovereign and liberality. reign, the English parliament had hitherto treated the Scots as aliens and rivals, rather than as fellow-subjects. High, and even prohibitory, duties had been imposed on the products of Scottish industry; but now the most complete freedom of trade was established: all restrictions on the commerce of Scotland, all prohibitions or duties which impeded the transit of the commodities of one kingdom into the other, were removed. The system of feudal vassalage, with its whole train of personal services and confiscations, was abolished, and the hereditary jurisdiction of the chiefs suppressed. The civil administration

Council of State. of the country was committed to a council of state, composed of nine members: Lord Broghill was made president, and Lockhart and Swinton were the only Scotsmen who were admitted. Their powers were much more extensive than those of the old privy council. The disposal of the revenue; the appointment of all the officers of customs, excise, and sequestrations; and the nomination of inferior judges, sheriffs, commissaries, and justices of peace, were entrusted to their charge. Their sanction also was requisite to entitle the ministers to draw their stipends—an arrangement which was exceedingly obnoxious to the strict presbyterian party.

The administration of justice was committed to four English and three Scottish judges, who made regular circuits throughout the country. The Scottish courts of justice had long been notorious for their shameless partiality and corruption. Buchanan laments that in his time the property of the nation was subjected to the absolute will and disposal of fifteen men, whose authority was perpetual, whose powers were tyrannical, and whose arbitrary decrees —Venality of the Scottish judges. were the only laws.* Other writers speak in strong terms of the open venality of the judges, and declare that no man possessing a well-filled purse need fear an unfavourable decision. Money was avowedly received by lawyers from their clients for the express purpose of purchasing the votes of the bench. The subserviency of the judges to the crown had long been proverbially notorious, as well as their glaring partiality to their own families and faction; and it was not regarded as in any way improper to employ personal solicitation to obtain a favourable decision. This gross and scandalous perversion of justice was completely remedied during the protectorate. The judges appointed by Cromwell discharged the duties of their office with the strictest impartiality, and without fear or favour. Their decisions, it has been justly said, "are marked rather by sound sense than by the subtleties of legal discrimination, and were long remembered as the purest and most vigorous dispensation of justice which the nation had enjoyed."† Their ignorance of Scotch law, and the refusal of the principal advocates to plead at their bar, led to the use of voluminous and expensive written memorials, instead of oral pleadings—a custom which has unfortunately survived both the Restoration and the Revolution; although with the return of the royal family the shameless corruption and partiality of the Scottish courts of justice revived in all their pristine vigour.

With regard to the presbyterian church, it continued to be rent asunder by intestine feuds between the resolute State of the Church. tioners and the protesters. The former adhered to the resolutions of the commission of assembly held at Perth in 1650, which recommended that all who were capable of bearing arms should, under certain limitations, be enrolled for the defence of the country; the latter protested against this course, as involving a breach of the solemn league and covenant, as well as of the Act of Classes, which excluded all malignants and engagers from the national service. The General Assembly, which met at St. Andrew's in 1651, having confirmed the resolutions of the commission, the protesters, or remonstrants, refused to acknowledge the authority of the assembly, and protested against its proceedings. The debates between the Feuds of the parties were exceedingly violent resolutions and acrimonious, and the resolute and protesters.

tioners, who formed the majority, went so far as to depose three of the most active of their opponents—James Guthrie, minister of Stirling; Patrick Gillespie, of Glasgow; and James Simpson, of Airth.

Cromwell was well aware that though the protesters were prepared to yield obedience to the English commonwealth, the great majority of the Scottish clergy were firmly attached to the cause of monarchy, and were of opinion that the nation was still bound by the covenant to endeavour to procure the restoration of the king, and to promote religious uniformity; he therefore resolved, after the battle of Worcester, to prohibit the meetings of the General Assembly, and to place various other restrictions upon the freedom of the ministers.

* Johnston's Hist., p. 231.

† Laing, vol. iii. p. 463. According to a learned judge, in the beginning of the following century, the English judges deserved no thanks for their impartiality, for they were a pack of "kinless loons." "For my part," added his candid lordship, "I can never see a cousin or a friend in the wrong."

Dissolution of the assembly. Accordingly, when the assembly had convened at Edinburgh on the 20th of July, 1653, the church in which they met was surrounded by a troop of horse, under the command of an officer named Cottrel, who entered the assembly, and, standing upon a bench, demanded to know by whose authority they had met. The moderator, Mr. David Dickson, replied that they were a spiritual court of Christ, which meddled not with anything civil; that their authority was from God, and confirmed by the laws of the land, yet unrepealed. Cottrel then demanded a list of the members, which the moderator informed him he would get if he would wait till the roll was called; but the officer, in imitation of the example of his commander, declared that this would be too tedious an affair, and ordered them to depart. Upon this the moderator protested against this violent treatment, and was proceeding to dissolve the meeting with prayer, when Cottrel rudely interrupted him, and ordered him to the door. "He led us all through the whole street," says Baillie, "a mile out of the town, encompassing us with foot companions of musketeers and horsemen, all the people gazing and mourning as at the saddest spectacle they had ever seen. When he had led us a mile without the town, he then declared what further he had in commission:—That we should not dare to meet any more above three in number; and that against eight o'clock to-morrow we should depart the town, under pain of being guilty of breaking the public peace; and the day following we were commanded off the town, under the pain of present imprisonment. Thus," adds Baillie, "our General Assembly, the glory and strength of our Church upon earth, is by your soldiery crushed and trode under foot without the least provocation from us, at this time, in word or deed."*

Although the General Assembly was thus forcibly

Establishment dissolved, the synods and presbyteries of the Church were permitted to meet, but they were forbidden to impose any covenant or oath upon the people without the authority of the English parliament; and the magistrates were prohibited to enforce ecclesiastical censures by civil penalties. The ministers were required to cease praying in public for King Charles under penalty of deprivation of their salaries. The remonstrants readily complied with this injunction, and ultimately the resolutioners were constrained to follow their example; but only one minister, Mr. Patrick Gillespie, publicly prayed for the protector, though several were induced to make an acknowledgment of his authority, and that of the English commonwealth. In 1655 the protector issued a commission to about thirty persons belonging to the party of the remonstrants, empowering them "to endeavour the promoting of the preaching of the Gospel, and the power of true religion and holiness; and to take care that the usual maintenance here be received and enjoyed by such ministers as are of a holy and unblameable conversation, disposed to live peaceably under the present government, are able and fit to preach the Gospel, and shall be approved according to an ordinance of his highness of the 8th of August, 1654.* In the ordinance referred to, it is expressly provided that in the induction of ministers

Mode of inducing ministers—

"respect shall be had to the choice of the more sober and godly sort of the people, although the same should not prove to be the greater part"—a very convenient rule, which left the most ample discretion to those who were entrusted with the patronage of the Church, and was no doubt intended to secure the appointment of ministers favourable to the government of the protector.

A considerable party among the protesters, however, including Warriston and James Guthrie, were opposed to —riots occasioned by it.

this ordinance, and refused to avail themselves of the authority with which the commission invested them. But party-spirit ran high, especially in the western counties, where the extreme presbyterians were numerous and powerful; very unseemly contests took place at the settlement of various ministers, and not unfrequently the sacred services were desecrated by blows and wounds.† Even the pulpit was on many occasions converted into an arena of strife; and the unseemly spectacle was seen of ministers preaching, and even praying, against each other. In spite, however, of these discreditable contests, the presbyterian religion retained its predominancy in the country. The lay preachers, who occasionally entered into the pulpits of the clergy with swords at their sides and pistols in their hands, and publicly challenged the preachers to dispute with them in the doctrines which they held, though regarded as "weill giftit,"‡ yet produced no favourable impression on their Scottish hearers, who firmly refused to receive any of the numerous sects which at this period swarmed in England. There is the most indubitable evidence that genuine piety flourished in no ordinary degree, notwithstanding the divisions and contentions which unhappily abounded. "It is true," says Kirkton, "that they did not permit the General Assembly to sit (and in this I believe they did no bad office, for both the authority of that meeting was denied by the protesters, and the assembly seemed to be more set upon establishing themselves than promoting religion); also the division of the Church betwixt protesters and resolvers continued for six or seven years with far more heat than became them; and errors in some places infected some few; yet were all these losses inconsiderable in regard of the great success the Word had in sanctifying the people of the nation; and I verily believe there were more souls converted to Christ in that short period of time than in any Prosperous state of religion.

* Baillie's Letters, vol. ii. p. 369; M'Crie's Sketches, vol. ii. pp. 52, 53.

* Nicholl's Diary, pp. 163—166.

† Baillie, vol. ii. ‡ Nicholl's Diary, anno. 1651.

Engraved by T. Scriven.

CROMWELL.

From the Picture presented by Cromwell to Col.^e Rich, and bequeathed by his great grandson, Sir Rob.^t Rich, Bart.^e to the British Museum.

season since the Reformation, though of triple its duration. Nor was there ever greater purity and plenty of the means of grace. Ministers were painful, people were diligent. So, truly, religion was at this time in very good case, and the Lord present in Scotland, though in a cloud." Again he says, "At the king's return every parish had a minister; every village had a school; every family almost had a Bible; yea, in most of the country all the children of age could read the Scriptures, and were provided of Bibles either by their parents or ministers. Every minister was a very full professor of the reformed religion, according to the large Confession of Faith framed at Westminster. None of them might be scandalous in their conversation, or negligent in their office, so long as a presbyterie stood. I have lived many years in a parish where I never heard an oath; and you might have ridden many miles before you heard any. Also, you could not, for a great part of the country, have lodged in a family where the Lord was not worshipped by reading, singing, and public prayer. Nobody complained more of our church government than our taverners, whose ordinary lamentation was, their trade was broke—people were become so sober."*

The power of the nobles was in a great measure Depressed broken during the sway of the state of the protector; they were deprived of nobility. their right to call their vassals to arms, and compelled to lay aside for a time, at least, their fierce intestine feuds. Nearly all the most powerful of their number, indeed, had perished in the civil war, or were in exile or ruined. The premier peer, the Duke of Hamilton, had died of his wounds at Worcester, and his vast patrimonial possessions were forfeited. Montrose and Huntley had perished on the scaffold. The Earls of Crawford, Eglinton, Lauderdale, Leven, Marischal, and Rothes, were prisoners in England, and their estates sequestered. Loudoun, the chancellor, was now hiding in the Highlands. The Marquis of Argyll had retired to his estates, and was excluded from public life by the jealousy of Cromwell. Douglas, Lennox, Leven, and the other leading nobles, were living in obscurity at their country seats or castles, shorn of their power, and many of them overwhelmed with debt.† The tenantry and lower classes, however, protected from the grinding tyranny of the nobles, were permitted to cultivate their lands, and to reap the fruit of their toils in security; order and peace were maintained, and the country enjoyed a degree of prosperity to which it had long been a stranger.

The tranquillity and obedience of the kingdom were preserved by means of a standing army amounting to from nine to twelve thousand men, under the command of General Monk. A long line of forts and garrisons was maintained throughout the country to overawe the disaffected, but the principal forces were stationed in the citadels of Leith, Glasgow, Ayr, and Inverness. The presence of these troops served to repress the outrages of the Highland caterans and the Border moss-troopers, as well as to prevent any outbreak on the part of the royalists. The expense of the Financial state army in 1654 was upwards of half of the country. a million a year, but by the reduction of the number of soldiers, the cost of their maintenance was diminished to £250,000. To assist in defraying this expense, a land-tax of £120,000 was imposed upon Scotland, to be raised by monthly instalments of £10,000; but, owing to the depressed state of the country, this was felt to be an intolerable burden, and it was ultimately reduced to £6000 a month. The inland excise yielded about £13,200. The customs in 1636 amounted only to £4637,* and the excise to £34,313; but they increased in three years to £62,154. At Cromwell's death the public revenue of Scotland was £143,642; while the expenditure, civil and military, amounted to £286,458: the balance had to be paid out of the assessments of England.† The residence of the English forces, and the circulation of the money required for their support, had a beneficial effect upon the trade of the country; and its physical prosperity was greatly promoted by the complete freedom of commerce which Cromwell established; so that the rule of the protector, though galling to the pride of the Scottish people, was yet eminently conducive to their well-being, and presented a marked contrast to the wretched misgovernment of their native sovereigns, by which it was preceded and followed.

This brief period of comparative repose and prosperity was soon terminated by the Death of Cromwell—place on the 3rd of September, 1658, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. The character of this great man was long the subject of the most virulent invective and calumny; —his of late it has been the subject of character—panegyrics scarcely less extravagant. His enemies have been constrained to admit that he was possessed of signal military talents, invincible courage, and eminent dexterity and address; that his domestic administration was characterised by great ability, and his foreign enterprises by remarkable intrepidity and success. While his friends cannot deny that not a few of his actions were arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust; and that, when occasion served, he showed himself a master of dissimulation. His sagacity in reading the characters and discerning the designs of others, was equalled by his skill in disguising his own. Though his youth and the prime of his manhood were passed in a private station, he showed himself equal, on emergency, to the highest duties of a great general and a great prince. He was quick to discover, and forward to reward, excellence. "If there was a man in England who excelled in any faculty or science, the protector would find him out, and reward him according to his merits;" and he possessed the rare talent of employing the abilities of others in the way most profitable to himself, and to the State. His understanding was remarkably sound and vigorous, but he was defective in the power of expressing his thoughts clearly either in speaking or in writing. He showed great promptitude, both in the formation and execution of his plans; and perceived almost intuitively the bearing of events, and took advantage of them to promote the ends he had in view. He was quick in temper, but not vindictive; and though humanity never obstructed the execution of his designs, when his safety or interest was not concerned, his government was just and even lenient. "He left a fame behind him," says Mr. Hallam, "proportioned to his extraordinary fortunes and to the great qualities which sustained them; still more perhaps the admiration of strangers than of his country, because that sentiment was less alloyed by hatred which seeks to extenuate the glory that irritates it. The nation itself forgave much to one who had brought back the renown of her ancient story, the traditions of Elizabeth's age, after the ignominious reigns of her successors. This contrast with James and Charles in their foreign policy gave additional lustre to the era of the protectorate. There could not but be a sense of national pride to see an Englishman, but yesterday raised above the many, without one drop of blood in his veins which the princes of the earth could challenge as their own, receive the homage of those who acknowledged no right to power, and hardly any title to respect, except that of prescription. The sluggish pride of the court of Spain, the mean-spirited cunning of Mazarin, the irregular imagination of Christina, sought with emulous ardour the friendship of our usurper. He had the advantage of reaping the harvest which he had not sown, by an honourable treaty with Holland, the fruit of victories achieved under the parliament. But he still employed the great energies of Blake in the service for which he was so eminently fitted; and it is just to say that the maritime glory of England may first be traced from the era of the commonwealth in a track of continuous light. The oppressed Protestants in Catholic kingdoms, disgusted at the luke-warmness and half-apostacy of the Stewarts, looked up to him as their patron and mediator. Courted by the two rival monarchies of Europe, he seemed to threaten both with his hostility; and when he declared war against Spain, and attacked her West Indian possessions,—with little pretence, certainly, of justice, but not by any means, as I conceive, with that impolicy sometimes charged against him,—so auspicious was his star, that the very failure and disappointment of that expedition, obtained a more advantageous position for England than all the triumphs of her former kings."* His moral character was unimpeachable, and his behaviour as a son, a husband, a father, and a friend, was worthy of the highest commendation. Baxter, an unfriendly, but honest, witness, says, "that he had a zeal for religion, meant honestly, and was pious in the main course of his life, till prosperity corrupted him." "His body," says a contemporary, "was well built, compact, and strong; his stature under six feet (I believe about two inches); his head so shaped as you might see in it a storehouse and shop both, of vast treasury of natural parts; his temper exceedingly fiery, as I have known, but the flame of it kept down, for the most part, or soon allayed, with those moral endowments he had. He was naturally compassionate towards objects in distress, even to an effeminate measure; though God had made him a heart wherein was left little room for any fear but what was due to Himself, of which there was a large proportion, yet did he exceed in tenderness towards sufferers. A larger soul, I think, hath seldom dwelt in a house of clay than his was."*

* Of this sum Leith yielded £674; Glasgow, £381; Borrowstonness, £382; Dundee, £243; Aberdeen, £200; Inverness, £129; Burtisland, £125; Ayr, £90.

† Scott of Scotsstarvet's Staggering State of Scottish Statesmen from 1550 to 1650.

† Thurlow, vol. iv. p. 530; Parl. Hist. vol. xxi. pp. 328—335; Laing, vol. i. pp. 464, 465.

Oliver Cromwell was succeeded in his office of protector by his eldest son Richard, —peaceful a young man of moderate abilities, accession of his son Richard— of no experience, accustomed only to a retired life, and totally unfitted to carry on the government in the critical circumstances in which he was placed. During several months, however, his administration went on tranquilly and regularly; his title was recognised by the council, the city, the army, and the navy; upwards of ninety addresses were presented to him from the counties and most considerable corporations, expressing the strongest attachment to his person and government; foreign sovereigns vied with each other in their addresses of congratulation on his accession; the obedience of Ireland was secured by his brother Henry, and Scotland by Monk, who professed great attachment to the family of Cromwell; so that for some time the authority of the new protector seemed more firmly established than even that of his great father.

It was necessary, however, to summon a parliament to obtain supplies, as the —he summonses debts and engagements of the late a parliament. protector were pressing, the payment of the troops was in arrears, and the coffers of the State were almost empty. Either in the expectation of obtaining greater influence among the small boroughs, which Cromwell had disfranchised, or from a desire to return to the ancient constitution, writs were issued in the ordinary manner to all boroughs which had been accustomed to send members; and the reformed model of Cromwell was consequently abandoned. Thirty members were returned from Ireland, and an equal number was sent from Scotland, among whom was Argyll, who had hitherto been prevented by the jealousy of the ruling powers from obtaining a seat. Rather more than one half of the members of the new parliament

* Hallam's Constit. Hist. vol. i. p. 670; see also Macaulay's Critical and Historical Essays; and Carlyle's Letters and Speeches of Cromwell.

* Maidstone's Letter to Winthrop, Governor of Connecticut.

consisted of supporters of the government; the remainder was made up of presbyterians and republicans. The other house, as it was termed, was made up of Cromwell's peers. The parliament met on the 27th of January, 1659. After taking an oath of allegiance to the protector, they proceeded to consider a bill for the recognition of Richard as the undoubted lord-protector and chief magistrate of the commonwealth, which was carried with difficulty, and only after the epithet "undoubted" was thrown out. His mode of accession was severely scrutinised; his negative voice in passing bills objected to; and the sitting of the Scotch and Irish members opposed. Defeated on these questions, the opposition, who disputed everything, made a fierce attack upon the late administration, and threatened to impeach Thurloe, the secretary of state, and Butler, one of Oliver's major-generals.

But the government of the young protector was menaced with a more formidable danger from another quarter.

Richard had no authority over the army. All his tastes and habits were pacific; and the stern military enthusiasts, whom Oliver had so often led to victory, regarded with contempt the character and administration of his indolent, good-natured son. They soon began to cabal against him, and, led by Fleetwood, Richard's brother-in-law, and Desborough, his uncle, they formed a coalition with the republican minority of the house of commons. These military malecontents held frequent meetings at Wallingford House, the residence of Fleetwood. They proposed that the office of lord-general should be separated from that of protector, and together with the power over all commissions in the army conferred upon Fleetwood, who was a weak and fanatical, though honest, republican, and completely in their hands. The commons, on the other hand, alarmed at the caballing of the officers and the republican faction, passed a resolution to the effect that, during the sitting of parliament, no general council or meeting of the officers of the army should be held without leave of the protector and of both houses. This step brought about an immediate collision between the commons and the junto of Wallingford House, who, three days after (April 22nd), compelled Richard to dissolve the parliament.

—collision between them and the commons.

On the 6th of May a declaration was published by the council of officers, inviting the members of the Long Parliament, who had been expelled by Cromwell, on the 20th of April, 1653, to return to their seats. On the next day, Lenthall, the speaker, and a considerable number of the members of the Rump Parliament, as it was contemptuously termed, hastened to Westminster, and resumed their functions. Their first act was to pass a declaration touching their resolution to secure the property and liberty of the people, and that without any house of peers, or the supremacy of a single person, protector or king. Richard Cromwell, who had been virtually deposed when his parliament was dissolved at the dictation of the military junto, now formally signed his demission; and, abandoning without a struggle a position for which he had neither ability nor inclination, retired to enjoy the tranquillity of private life.

Resignation of Richard Cromwell.

A council of state was immediately nominated to carry on the government, and Fleetwood was appointed commander-in-chief during the pleasure of the army. The royalists, who deemed this a favourable opportunity for bringing about the restoration of the king, projected a simultaneous rising in various parts of the kingdom, and Charles, with his brother, the Duke of York, proceeded to Calais, to watch the progress of the insurrection. But the plot was betrayed by Sir Richard Willis, and the attempt was everywhere unsuccessful. Sir John Gore, and various other cavaliers, were arrested and committed to prison, on a charge of high-treason. Sir John Booth, a presbyterian, who took up arms at Chester, and declared for a free parliament, was defeated and made prisoner by Lambert. In various other quarters the insurgents fled before the forces of the parliament, and threw down their arms, and in the course of a few weeks the insurrection was completely suppressed.

Unsuccessful risings of the royalists.

The old quarrel, however, between the army and the parliament speedily revived.

The officers, elated by their recent successes, and conscious that the Rump existed only at their pleasure, demanded that Fleetwood should be declared commander-in-chief, without limitations to his authority; and that Lambert, who, with very inferior abilities and claims, was manifestly aiming to tread in the steps of Cromwell, should be appointed major-general, as a proper reward for his services. The Rump, however, led by Haselrig, a headstrong and intemperate man, "being jealous that the soldiers might break them," endeavoured to anticipate their movements by dismissing Lambert, Desborough, and other officers, and declaring it high-treason to levy money without the consent of parliament.* On this Lambert marched his troops to Westminster, and dispersed the assembly, now powerless, as well as degraded in public estimation.

Quarrel between the officers and the Rump.

A committee of safety, consisting of twenty-three persons, named by the officers, assumed the direction of public affairs; and thus the kingdom was once more subjected to a military despotism.

Dissolution of the parliament.

In this critical state of affairs all eyes were turned to General Monk, on whose decision the fate of the different parties seemed to hang. Monk had originally borne arms for the king, and had been taken prisoner by Fairfax, at the siege of Nantwich, and committed to the Tower; but on his release he accepted a commission from the parliament, and was employed in the reduction of Ireland. When the government was seized by Cromwell, Monk cordially supported the protectorate, and on the death of Oliver, he readily transferred his services to his son. He had quietly acquiesced, however, in the deposition of Richard, and the restoration of the Rump. But he seems to have taken offence at the second expulsion of the parliament, and the appointment of a provisional government by the officers at Westminster; and probably felt some apprehension that his own position was not secure from their attacks. He therefore refused to acknowledge the

Character and behaviour of Monk.

* Whitlocke, p. 683; Thurloe, vol. vii. p. 703.

—he declares for usurped authority of the committee of safety, declared at once for the parliament, and prepared for marching into England to vindicate their invaded privileges. With this view he new-modelled his army, and displaced the officers whose attachment he suspected; he drew together the various scattered regiments; he hastily summoned a meeting of the commissioners of the shires, and obtained from them an advance of money for the sustenance of his troops. Having communicated to the meeting his resolution of marching to London, he recommended the internal tranquillity of the country to their care; and leaving a division of the army to assist them, he set out at the head of seven thousand veteran troops.

On receiving notice of this movement the provisional government instantly appointed Lambert to command the forces in the north of England, and sent several ministers to Monk, “to persuade him to a right understanding of things, and to prevent the effusion of blood.” The wary general declared that his sole object was to free the parliament from the oppression of the soldiers, and made the most solemn protestations that he was, above all things, a friend to liberty and the commonwealth. On learning that Lambert was advancing at the head of a superior force, Monk, with the view of gaining time, sent three commissioners to the provisional government with great professions of his desire for peace, and with offers of an amicable arrangement. When the treaty was concluded, however, he refused to ratify it, complaining that the terms were unsatisfactory, and that his commissioners had exceeded their powers, but offered to enter into a new negotiation at Newcastle. While he thus amused the committee with these fallacious offers, the army of the unwary Lambert, which was reduced to great straits for want of money, and compelled to live at free quarters, melted away, and at length entirely dispersed.

Meanwhile, as soon as the tidings of Monk's proceedings reached London, the people everywhere manifested their dissatisfaction with the conduct of the military junta, and refused to pay taxes. A violent tumult broke out in the capital, and was not suppressed without bloodshed. The city apprentices assembled in great numbers, and demanded a free parliament. The fleet, under Admiral Lawson, sailed up the river, and denounced the usurpation of the military; and the governor and garrison of Portsmouth declared for the parliament. The soldiers themselves separated into factions, and several regiments, abandoning their officers, revolted to their opponents. In the midst of these commotions the members of the Rump once more ventured to resume their seats, from which they had twice before been ignominiously expelled; and, untaught by experience, proceeded at once to dismiss their rivals, Lambert and Desborough, and other officers, from their command, and ordered them to retire to their houses. Sir Henry Vane, and some other members who had adhered to the military council, were ordered into a similar confinement, and Lambert was arrested and committed to the Tower. Utterly blind to the signs of the times, they prepared a bill for renouncing anew the title of Charles Stewart and of all his line, and, unconscious of their danger, they passed a vote of thanks to Monk for his letter promising to them all obedience and faithfulness, and desired him to come up to London as soon as possible.

In the meantime, Monk had crossed the Tweed on the 2nd of January, 1660, and was advancing towards the capital. In all the counties through which he passed, the leading gentry flocked round him, expressing their earnest desire that he would employ his power in restoring the kingdom to peace and liberty. At York he was waited on by Fairfax, who urged him to declare for the king; but the General, taciturn, selfish, and wary, refused to disclose his intentions. He still continued to make loud professions of his duty and obedience to the parliament; but on reaching St. Alban's he sent a message demanding that the soldiers who were in and around the capital should be removed to make room for his own forces. The parliament, though greatly perplexed by this demand, were obliged to comply; but the soldiers mutinied, and were with great difficulty induced to yield their quarters to the northern army. On entering the city Monk still maintained an impenetrable reserve respecting his plans; it is by no means improbable, indeed, as has been conjectured, that he did not make up his mind till he had been some days in the capital, and had satisfied himself that the popular feeling was strongly in favour of a free parliament, which it was evident would instantly restore the exiled family.

His conduct at first, however, either from dissimulation or irresolution, was exceedingly uncertain, and kept the public mind in a state of painful suspense. Shortly after his arrival in London, the common council, dissatisfied both with the parliament and the army, refused to submit to an assessment imposed upon them, till it should be levied by a free and lawful parliament. The council of state resolved to inflict immediate chastisement upon the refractory citizens, ordered Monk to march into the city, to seize twelve of the most obnoxious of the common-councilmen, and to pull down the chains, gates, and portcullises. To the surprise and mortification of the citizens he promptly obeyed these orders; but two days after, he retraced his steps, and wrote a letter to the parliament, complaining of the odious service which they had forced upon him, reproached them with their cabals, and the encouragement they had given to turbulence and anarchy, and required them immediately to invite the secluded members of the Long Parliament to resume their seats, and to fix a time for their own dissolution, and the assembling of a new parliament. This declaration was welcomed with extravagant

Joy of the people. demonstrations of joy by the great body of the people. Bonfires blazed in every street; and "rumps," in derision of the parliament, were roasted in every quarter of the metropolis.

On the 21st of February the presbyterian members of the house of commons, who had been excluded by Pride's Purge before the trial of the king, in 1649, returned to their seats amid the acclamations of the multitudes who filled Westminster Hall and Palace Yard. The leaders of the Rump perceived that their power was gone, and abandoned the field without a struggle; all the proceedings of the parliament since the exclusion of the presbyterians were declared null and void; the solemn league and covenant was ordered to be read in the churches; Monk was appointed commander-in-chief of all the forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland; an assessment was fixed for the support of the army and navy; a committee of Estates was appointed to carry on the government; writs were issued for a general election; and then the famous Long Parliament, which during twenty years had exercised, both for good and evil, a vast influence on the destiny of the country, was finally dissolved.

The elections for the new house of commons went everywhere in favour of new parliament. candidates inclined to the royal family. When the parliament assembled on the 25th of April, the peers resumed their hereditary seats and functions. The two houses concurred in the same purpose of restoring the king; and it was evident that this could be secured in a peaceable manner only by the adoption of prompt and vigorous measures. The soldiers were deeply dissatisfied with the turn affairs had taken, and needed only a leader in whom they could confide to induce them to renew the struggle for the preservation of their power and privileges. The country, indeed, very narrowly escaped the perils of a bloody contest. On the day before the meeting of the new parliament, Lambert made his escape from the Tower, and began to assemble forces at Daventry. His former comrades hastened from all quarters to his standard; but the activity of Colonel Ingoldsby dispersed the discontented troops before they could assemble in sufficient numbers to become formidable; and Lambert himself was taken prisoner, and brought back to his former quarters in the Tower.

In this critical state of affairs it was of vast importance that the restoration of the exiled family should be carried into effect with the least possible delay. Any lengthened discussion of the terms on which the king should be recalled would, without doubt, have occasioned fierce disputes and quarrels between the presbyterians and royalists, and might possibly have ended in subjecting the nation to the permanent rule of a military despotism. Both the great parties, therefore, cordially agreed in the propriety of bringing the interregnum to a speedy termination. On the 1st of May Sir John Granville, who had been employed for some time in the negotiations between Charles and Monk, arrived from Breda with royal despatches, which the general, who continued to wear the mask to the last moment, refused to receive in private, and caused Granville to present to him in the midst of the council of state. Shortly after it was announced to the commons, that a servant of the king's was at the door with a message from his majesty. Granville was immediately called in with the loudest acclamations, and the letter of the king, containing the celebrated "Declaration of Breda" was read. It offered to grant a free pardon and indemnity to all persons whatsoever, without any other exceptions than should be made by parliament; it promised complete liberty of conscience; offered to leave all grants, purchases, and alienations of lands made during the civil war to be regulated by the parliament; and assured the soldiers that they should be satisfied with respect to their arrears, and that the pay which they then enjoyed should be secured to them for the future. A committee was at once appointed to prepare an answer to the king's letter, expressing the satisfaction of the house with his majesty's gracious offers; and it was agreed that the letter and declaration should immediately be published. The venerable Sir Matthew Hale ventured to recommend that some more definite settlement should be made before the king was restored; but Monk interposed, and informed the house that, if the treaty was delayed, he could not answer either for the peace of the nation, or the obedience of the army. All attempts, therefore, to impose conditions on the king were laid aside. On the 8th of May Charles was proclaimed with great solemnity in Palace Yard, at Whitehall, and at Temple Bar. A deputation from both houses was sent to Breda to invite him to return, and take possession of the throne. On the 25th of May, 1660, The king lands he landed at Dover, accompanied in England. by his two brothers, the Dukes of York and Gloucester; and on the 29th, which was also his birthday, he entered London amid the most extravagant demonstrations of joy, and took up his residence in the palace of his ancestors.

Resolution to restore the king.
Declaration of Breda.

CHAPTER LII.

CHARLES THE SECOND.

A.D. 1660–1685.

CHARLES II. was thirty years of age when he ascended the throne of his ancestors. His restoration was hailed with delight by nearly all classes of the community; and he possessed not a few qualities calculated to recommend him to popular favour. He had a good understanding, a lively wit, graceful and engaging manners, and an affable demeanour. But he was selfish in the extreme, utterly destitute of principle, honour, or gratitude, fond of debasing indulgences and of frivolous amusements, and insensible to shame or reproach. Few monarchs owed more to the spontaneous affection and generous indulgence of his people, and few have repaid them with such infamous ingratitude. The restoration of the royal authority was hailed with peculiar delight by the Scottish nation; for it was not merely the restoration of their ancient race of kings, but also, as they supposed, of their national independence. The presbyterians, Scottish nation, who composed nearly the entire nation, flattered themselves that they had special claims upon the royal gratitude. They had repeatedly taken arms for the monarchy, and had suffered severely in their unsuccessful attempts to maintain the Stewart dynasty upon the throne. The iron yoke of Cromwell had been regarded by them with bitter hatred; and no Scotsman of rank or influence had lent to the protectorate his active support. They had rallied round the young king at the moment when his affairs were nearly desperate, and had freely spent their blood and treasure in support of his claims. He had himself taken their covenant, and had solemnly sworn to defend their church; and his declaration from Breda promised complete liberty of conscience to all his subjects. On all these grounds they expected that kindness, or at least justice, would be shown to them by the restored monarch; and that they would be permitted, without molestation, to worship God according to the form so dear to their hearts. But Charles entertained an inveterate dislike to the strict observances of the Scottish Church: he was accustomed to say that the Presbyterian religion was quite unfit for a gentleman; and his vindictive recollection of the manner in which he was treated by the clergy during his brief residence in Scotland, combined with his secret attachment to the Romish faith, induced him readily, in spite of his solemn oaths and engagements, to sanction the proposal for the overthrow of presbytery, and the establishment of prelacy in its room. A similar attempt had led directly to the ruin of his father; but England was at that time strongly disaffected towards the royal government, and sympathized with the determined resistance made by the Scots to this arbitrary attack on their rights and liberties; whereas the English were now zealous alike for monarchy and prelacy, and regarded the Scottish Church with indifference, if not with aversion. The scheme, therefore, for the overthrow of the presbyterian religion, and the establishment of episcopacy, though in the highest degree obnoxious to the Scottish nation, and disapproved by the greater part even of the nobles, was attended with little risk to the throne, and was carried into effect, in spite of the remonstrances of Lauderdale and other courtiers, who well knew how distasteful it was both to the national and religious feelings of the people.

The Lord Chancellor Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, on whom the management of public affairs was devolved by the king, entertained a strong dislike to the Scottish nation, whose fanatical and rebellious spirit, he alleged, rendered them unworthy of confidence; and, not contented with procuring the overthrow of their national church, he recommended that the forts erected by Cromwell should be maintained, in order to repress the disloyal and mutinous spirit of the people; and the advice was supported by Monk, now created Duke of Albemarle, whose avarice made him desirous to retain the command of the English garrisons in Scotland. But Lauderdale, who possessed considerable influence with the king, pleaded the tried loyalty of the Scottish nation, and their strong attachment to their native sovereign; and hinted that, as republican principles still prevailed in England, the time

Demolition of the forts in Scotland.

would probably come when, instead of English garrisons in Scotland, his majesty might require Scottish garrisons in England, to repress the turbulence of his English subjects, and to defend the throne against their renewed attacks. These representations, together with the consideration of the expense which it would cost to maintain the garrisons, induced his majesty to disband or withdraw the forces in Scotland, and to demolish all the citadels and forts which had been erected there.

Immediately on the return of the king, great numbers of the nobility and principal gentry hurried to London to tender their services, and to prefer their claims to the chief offices of state. His majesty was greatly influenced in the distribution of his patronage by the advice of Clarendon; and that advice was in too many cases given without any reference to the merit of the applicant. Middleton,

Formation of the Scottish administration.

an unprincipled soldier of fortune, was elevated to the peerage, and made general of the forces, and royal commissioner to the parliament; Glencairn was appointed chancellor; Rothes, president of the council; Crawford, treasurer; Lauderdale, secretary; Marischal, lord privy seal; Sir Archibald Primrose, clerk-register; and Sir John Fletcher, lord-advocate.

At a meeting, held by the king's authority, of all the leading Scotchmen in London, it was agreed that the committee of Estates, nominated by the parliament of 1650, should undertake the management of public affairs until a new parliament assembled. The committee entered upon the duties of their office in a spirit which showed clearly what Scotland had to expect from her restored sovereign. Their first act was to commit to prison a number of the remonstrants who had assembled to frame an humble petition to the king. They then, with an obsequiousness not less base than useless, hastened to obliterate the inscriptions on the tombs of Alexander Henderson and George Gillespie, and ordered Rutherford's celebrated treatise, entitled "Lex Rex," to be burned by the hands of the common hangman.

CHARLES II.

From a Painting in Bridwell Hall by Sir Peter Lely.

The parliament assembled on the 1st of January, 1661, and was opened by Middleton with unusual magnificence. The Scottish Estates had rarely ventured to offer any serious opposition to the will of the sovereign; but the present parliament proved unusually obsequious. The candidates whose subserviency to the crown could not be relied on, had been either imprisoned, or summoned to appear as delinquents; and the members chosen, through the management of the chancellor, had been preferred chiefly on account of their readiness to comply with the wishes of the court. When the Estates proceeded to business, it soon became evident that it was its base intention to overturn the entire fabric of the civil and religious liberties of the country. The privilege which had been conceded to the parliament, of electing its own president, was taken away, and the office restored to the chancellor. The nomination of councillors, judges, and officers of state, was recognised as an inherent branch of the royal prerogative. The command of the militia, and the right to summon and dissolve parliaments and public assemblies, were declared to reside in the sovereign alone; and any attempt to hold any such meeting, without his authority, was converted into treason. An oath of allegiance was enacted, which acknowledged the royal supremacy over all persons, and in all matters civil and religious, and made the denial of it high-treason. The power of electing the lords of the articles, without whose consent no act could be introduced, was taken away from the parliament; and the old custom was revived, which left the nomination of this committee really, though not in form, in the hands of the crown.* The solemn league and covenant was annulled, and its renewal, without the sanction of the king, prohibited under the severest penalties. A last expiring effort was made by the ministers to stay the torrent which was sweeping away the whole work of reformation, but without effect. When they met in their provincial synods, for the purpose of framing an humble petition to the king, messengers from the parliament ordered them to disperse under pain of treason. The monthly assessments levied by Cromwell had long been felt as a grievous burden on the resources of the country; but the Estates, in the excess of their servile loyalty, conferred upon the king for life an annual subsidy to the same amount—forty thousand pounds sterling—for the purpose of preserving the public tranquillity by a military force.*

At length, tired of reversing particular statutes, the Scottish councillors proposed to annul all the proceedings of the various parliaments and conventions which had been held since 1633, as irregular and unconstitutional—on the absurd pretext that the late king had been constrained by violence to give them his sanction. No such allegation however could be made, even by the shameless and debauched nobles who now managed the affairs of Scotland, regarding the parliament of 1641, at which the king's father had himself presided, and the parliament of 1648, which was chosen and directed by his special instructions, for the purpose of confirming the engagement. But Middleton, with characteristic effrontery, maintained that the former had been held in the interval between two rebellions, when a real restraint had been imposed upon the king by the necessity of affairs, although no personal violence had been used; while the latter had attempted to conciliate the covenanters by such hypocritical terms as rendered its whole proceedings deserving of condemnation. In spite of the unexpected and strenuous opposition of Crawford, Cassillis, Loudoun, and other old covenanters, this act was passed by a large majority; and thus, at one sweep, all the barriers which had been raised to protect the civil and religious liberties of the nation—all the valuable privileges which had been wrested from the crown—were at once completely annulled, and a precedent was furnished destructive of all security of person or property, and of all confidence between the sovereign and his subjects. This infamous act, as Burnet remarks, "was only fit to be concluded after a drunken bout." It is well known, indeed, that it was proposed at a debauch, by the miserable and abandoned crew who now managed the affairs of the nation, and carried in the midst of drunken acclamations. "It was a maddening time," says Burnet, "when the men of affairs were perpetually drunk."† Middleton himself often took his place on the throne in such a state of intoxication that the house had to be adjourned.

When the king was restored to the throne, either through accident or design, the amnesty which was promised to his English subjects was withheld from Scotland. "It was deemed more political for him," says one of his apologists, "to hold over men's heads for some time the terror of punishment, till they should have made the requisite compli-ances with the new government." But there can be no doubt that this ungenerous course of policy was persevered in by the king and his advisers with the view of gratifying their revenge by the destruction of some of the most eminent of the parliamentary leaders. The Marquis of Argyll was the first victim selected. To seize this powerful noble in the midst of his devoted retainers, would have been a work of difficulty and danger; and Apprehension of the Marquis of Argyll— therefore he was encouraged to repair to London by an apparently friendly letter from the king. On reaching the capital, he hastened to Whitehall; but, while waiting in the privy chamber for permission to kiss his majesty's hand, he was suddenly arrested, and hurried to the Tower as a traitor and a regicide—it being asserted that he had secretly encouraged the republicans to put the late king to death. He was shortly after sent down to Scotland, to be tried by his bitterest enemies, who were eagerly expecting to be rewarded with the grant of his estates. His indictment consisted of fourteen different charges, extending over all the transactions in Scotland, from the rising of the covenanters in 1638 down to his sitting in Richard Cromwell's parliament in 1659. He was accused

* Acts of the Scottish Parliament, vol. vii.

† Burnet's History of his Own Times, vol. i. p. 174. Burnet says that Sir Archibald Primrose, "the subtlety of all Lord Middleton's creatures," first suggested, "half in jest," this notorious act, which was not resolved upon, however, till the junta "had drunk higher."

* Acts of the Scottish Parliament, vol. vii.

—he is brought to trial— as the author of all the opposition which had been made by the Scottish nation to the arbitrary proceedings of Charles I.; the calling of the convention of Estates in 1643; the formation of the solemn league and covenant with England; and the severities inflicted on the royalists during the civil wars; as an accessory to the surrender and execution of the late king; as the prime mover of the opposition made to the engagement, and of the conditions with which the invitation given to his present majesty was clogged; and, finally, he was charged with a criminal compliance with the late usurpation, in opposition to the supporters of the crown.

The defence of Argyll was unanswerable: he —his defence. pleaded that during the late unhappy commotions he had always acted by authority of parliament, and not on his individual responsibility; that all the public proceedings of the covenanters were covered by the act of oblivion passed by Charles I., in consequence of the treaty of Ripon, and by the indemnity granted by his present majesty in the parliament at Stirling; that the atrocities imputed to his clan were either fictitious or greatly exaggerated—that they had been provoked by the cruelties inflicted upon the district, which had been twice wasted by fire and sword, and that, whatever might be their nature or aggravation, they could not be imputed to him, as they were perpetrated during his absence in England; that as for his compliance with the late usurpation, the whole kingdom shared in it equally with himself—that it was necessary for his own preservation—that he did not submit till the whole nation had acquiesced in the rule of the commonwealth, and resistance was no longer practicable; that his submission to the existing government did not imply a recognition of its original title, much less a treasonable opposition to the rightful heir, while excluded from the throne. "And how could I suppose," he added, "that I was acting criminally, when a man so learned as his majesty's advocate took the same oath to the commonwealth with myself?" Here Sir John Fletcher, the lord-advocate, was so enraged at this appeal that he called him an impudent villain: Argyll meekly replied that he had learned in his afflictions to suffer reproach.

After he had concluded, his counsel protested that, as they pleaded for the marquis by order of parliament, they should not be held personally responsible for the arguments they might employ; but their protestation was at once repelled by the court, and they were informed that they must plead at their own hazard.* By their advice the marquis then petitioned to be tried before the justiciary court, on the ground that his indictment was so intricate, that it would require learned judges to decide upon the points of law involved in it. But the prosecutors not only rejected this petition, but were with great difficulty induced to pardon the counsel for advising their client to prefer a request which was construed into a declining of the authority of parliament. The counsel then prayed that they might be allowed to produce exculpatory proof, but this also was refused, and the defences were ordered to be given in writing.

Lord Lorn, the eldest son of Argyll, who had always opposed the government of Cromwell, obtained from the king a letter ordering the crown lawyers not to prosecute for any offences committed previous to the indemnity granted at Stirling in 1651, nor to pronounce any sentence till the whole process was submitted to his majesty. To counteract the influence of Lorn and of Lauderdale, whose niece he had married, Glencairn and Rothes were dispatched to London, and by representing to Clarendon and Monk that the delaying of the sentence till the proceedings were submitted to the king would "much discourage this loyal and affectionate parliament, and would look like a distrust of its justice," they succeeded in procuring the recall of that part of his majesty's letter, and the other portion of it Middleton was allowed virtually to disregard. Eager to procure Argyll's condemnation, as he expected to be enriched by the forfeiture of his estate, the greedy and unscrupulous commissioner undertook in person the management of the trial, which he conducted with a total contempt of justice and honour, and even of common decency. It was well known that when Cromwell was in Scotland, in 1648, he held various conferences with Argyll; and that immediately upon his return to London the treaty of Newport was broken off, and the king brought to trial. Hence Middleton affirmed that these proceedings had been concerted with Argyll; and urged with all the weight of his authority and personal influence that this conclusion, though founded on mere presumption and totally unsupported by evidence, was sufficient to warrant Argyll's condemnation. But Gilmour, the president

* Under the infamous statute of "leasing-making," if a man defended the rights of his country in parliament, or opposed the most flagrant attack upon the national liberties in the form of an act, he was liable to be tried for high-treason as attempting to render the lieges dissatisfied with their sovereign; and if an accused person attempted to defend himself on his trial, by proving that the servants of the crown had been guilty of the most wanton oppression, he was liable to the highest penalties of the law on the same ground. On the trial of Argyll his counsel were not allowed to bring forward exculpatory proof, but at the risk of rendering themselves liable to be tried on a similar charge. The counsel assigned to Argyll were Messrs. Sinclair and Cunningham, with Sir George Mackenzie, who was afterwards the "bloody Mackenzie," the persecutor of the covenanters.

Integrity of the court of session, had the President Gil- courage and honesty to denounce mour. this infamous attempt to pervert justice; and after a fierce debate, in which Middleton stormed and swore, but in vain, the parliament, by a majority of votes, exculpated Argyll from all participation in the execution of the king.

Nothing now remained but the charge of compliance with the usurpation. Even here the evidence was exceedingly defective; and, after it was concluded, and the Earl of Loudoun had addressed the house in an eloquent and well-reasoned speech, which produced a strong impression in favour of the prisoner, the court was proceeding to give judgment, when a violent knocking was heard at the door of the parliament-house, and a messenger who had come express from London entered, and presented a packet to the commissioner. On being opened, it was found to contain a number of private

Villany of letters, that Argyll had written to Monk. Monk during the commonwealth, expressing his attachment to the government of the protector, and which that treacherous villain—who had himself been the active agent of Cromwell, while Argyll had only passively acquiesced in his rule—had sent down with all haste, on learning from Middleton's envoys the scantiness of the proof.* On evidence thus basely obtained, and brought forward in the most illegal manner, after the case was closed, and which, as even Hume admits, could not by any equitable construction imply the crime of treason, the old nobleman was

Argyll is con- found guilty, and sentence of death demned— was immediately pronounced upon him. He was condemned to be beheaded in two days, and his head to be affixed to the Tolbooth, on the spot which had been occupied by the head of Montrose. Argyll begged for a respite of ten days, in order that his sentence might be communicated to the king; but, when this was refused, he understood the intention of the court, and exclaimed, "I placed the crown upon the king's head, and this is my reward! but he hastens me to a better crown than his own; nor can you deprive me of that eternal indemnity which you may require yourselves."*

* Burnet, vol. i. p. 178; Wodrow, vol. i. p. 54. This fact, mentioned by Burnet, has been denied by Rose in his remarks on Fox's History; but, to say nothing of the independent testimony of Wodrow, the incontrovertible evidence of Sir George Mackenzie, recently brought to light, establishes the truth of the statement beyond a doubt. "The Marquis of Argyll," he says, "was convicted of treason upon letters written by him to General Monk; these letters being only subscribed by him, and not autograph, and the subscription having been proved by a comparison of letters;" "a kind of proof open to very serious objections, "seeing," he adds, "it is but presumption, and men's hands are oftentimes easily imitated, and one man's write will differ from itself at several occasions."—See Laws and Customs of Scotland, p. 524.

On returning to the Tolbooth he found his lady waiting for him, to whom he said, —his calm as he entered, "They have given behaviour—me till Monday to be with you, my dear, therefore let us improve it." She embraced him, and weeping bitterly, exclaimed in her anguish, "The Lord will require it!—the Lord will require it!"—"Forbear, forbear," said the marquis to his weeping friends; "truly I pity them, they know not what they are doing. They may shut me in where they please, but they cannot shut out God from me. I am as content to be here as I was in the Tower; and as content there as I was when at liberty; and hope to be as content on the scaffold as any of them all."

He spent the Sabbath in religious exercises with several ministers who were permitted to attend him, and prepared for death with a calmness and courage not expected from his constitutional timidity. Referring to this, he desired those about him to observe that the Lord had heard his prayers, and delivered him from all his fears. At his own request his lady took leave of him on the Sabbath evening, after which he spent some hours in pleasant sleep. On the morning of Monday (May 27th), the day of his execution, he wrote a letter to the king asserting his innocence, and recommending his widow and family to his majesty's protection. He dined with his friends at noon; and, as he was leaving the jail to go to the scaffold, he said, "I could die like a Roman, but I choose rather to die like a Christian." He called in passing at Mr. Guthrie's room, to bid him farewell. That venerable clergyman came near the marquis, and when he took him by the hand he said, "My Lord, God has been with you. He is with you, and will be with you. And such is my love to your lordship, that were I not under sentence, I could die this day for you;" and "then they embraced one another," says Wodrow, "and parted, shortly to meet in a better place."† Accompanied by a number of his friends clad in mourning, he walked to the Cross, the place of execution, and ascended the scaffold with the greatest composure. He spoke at some length in vindication of his innocence; his conduct, he declared, had never been influenced by any motives of self-aggrandisement or disloyalty. He declared that he forgave all his enemies, and would condemn none. "God," said he, "hath laid engagements on

* Wodrow, ut supra. According to Sir George Mackenzie (Hist., p. 46) the marquis said he remembered that he had first put the crown upon the king's head, and added, he hoped God would bestow on his majesty a crown of glory, for he ever wished him well.

† Analecta, vol. ii. p. 138.

Scotland. We are tied by covenants to religion and reformation. Those who were then unborn are yet engaged, and it passeth the power of all the magistrates under heaven to absolve from the oath of God. These times are likely either to be very sinning or suffering times, and let Christians make their choice. There is a sad dilemma in the business—sin or suffer; and, surely, he that will choose the better part will choose to suffer; others that will choose to sin will not escape suffering; they shall suffer, but perhaps not as I do, but worse." After spending some time in devotion he distributed some tokens of remembrance to the friends who attended him. On approaching the maiden Mr. Hutchison said, "My lord, now hold your grip sicker"—meaning that he should hold fast his confidence in Christ. "Mr. Hutchison, you know what I said," was the calm reply of the marquis; "I am not afraid to be surprised by fear." After preparing for the block, by laying aside his doublet, he said to those near him, "Gentlemen, I desire you, and all that hear me, again to take notice and remember that now, when I am entering into eternity, and to appear before my Judge, as I desire salvation and expect eternal happiness from Him, I am free from any accession, by knowledge, contriving, counsel, or anyways, of his late majesty's death; and I pray the Lord to preserve the present king, and to pour out his best blessings upon his person and government, and the Lord give him good and faithful counsel——his lords. He then knelt down, and, execution. having given the signal by lifting up his hand, the descent of the maiden severed his head from his body.†

The illegality and injustice of Argyll's sentence excited deep indignation throughout the country, and awakened the sympathy even of those who had been most strongly opposed to him. His judicial murder was justly imputed to the bitter hatred of the king and court, and the insatiable rapacity of Middleton, who expected to obtain a grant of his extensive possessions—an expectation which was happily disappointed, for his patrimonial estates and a part of the titles were restored to Lorn, his son, through the intercession of Lauderdale, whose wife's niece he had married. The character of the marquis was not free from defects, but he was a true patriot, a staunch presbyterian, and a statesman of great sagacity, experience, and consummate address. His counsels mainly guided the presbyterian party in their resistance to the scheme of Charles I. and of Laud; and to his prudence and energy are in a great measure to be attributed the overthrow of episcopacy in Scotland, and the part which that country took in the great civil war. He steadily adhered to his principles, both religious and political, through good report, and through bad report; and in consequence rendered himself obnoxious to Cromwell and to Monk, and was excluded during the protectorate from all public employment or trust. His resistance to the republican party, and his services in the recall of Charles to Scotland, deserved a better return from that ungrateful and unprincipled monarch, and the wretched herd to whom he entrusted the government of the country. But Charles could not forgive the restrictions to which he was subjected during his residence in Scotland; and his rapacious commissioner had cast a greedy eye on Argyll's vast estates, and, therefore, persecuted to the death the great statesman, that he might obtain possession of his spoils. By his own clan and friends Argyll was almost adored, and his memory is still held in high veneration by the Scottish presbyterians, who believe with honest Howie of Lochgoin, that "he had piety for a Christian, sense for a councillor, courage for a martyr, and a soul for a king. If ever any was, he might be said to be a true Scotchman."*

The next victim was the Rev. James Guthrie, minister of Stirling. He was descended of an old and respectable family, and was one of the ablest and most courageous of the Scottish clergy. He had always been a constant and zealous supporter of monarchy, and an inflexible opponent of Cromwell; but he was one of the leaders of the remonstrants, and was especially obnoxious to the court party, in consequence of his having been selected, in 1650, to pronounce the sentence of excommunication against Middleton, now the royal commissioner. He was accused of framing or promoting the western remonstrance, of being the author of a pamphlet entitled, "The Causes of the Lord's Wrath," and of declining the authority of the king in ecclesiastical affairs. His defence was unanswerable, and clearly proved that none of the charges brought against him could by the law of the land be deemed treasonable or seditious. "I have founded my speeches, writings, and actions in these matters," said he, at the close of an eloquent and triumphant vindication, "on the Word of God, and on the doctrine, Confession of Faith, and laws of this church and kingdom, upon the national covenant of Scotland, and the solemn league and covenant betwixt the three kingdoms. If these foundations fall, I must fall with them; but if these sustain and stand in judgment, as I hope they will, I cannot acknowledge myself, neither, I hope, will his majesty's commissioner, and the honourable court of parliament, judge me guilty either of sedition or treason."

The trial lasted from the 20th of February till the 11th of April. At the close of the protracted proceedings the aged and infirm, but intrepid minister concluded his pleading by a powerful appeal, which produced a deep impression on the minds of not a few who withdrew from the court, declaring, in the language of Scripture, "We will have nothing to do with the blood of this just man." Addressing the chancellor, he said, "My lord, I shall, in the last place, humbly beg that, having

* Hold your grasp secure.

† Scott's Worthies; Wodrow, vol. i. pp. 51, 157; Burnet, vol. i. p. 179; Mc'Crie's Sketches, vol. ii. pp. 72—75.

* Scott's Worthies, Art.: Marquis of Argyll.

Engraved by T W Hunt.

ARCHIBALD, FIRST MARQUIS OF ARGYLL.

OBIT 1661.

From the Original in the Collection of the Duke of Argyll.

brought such pregnant and clear evidence from the Word of God, so much divine reason, human law, and so much of the common practice of the Kirk and kingdom in my own defence, and being already cast out of my ministry, driven from my dwelling, and deprived of my maintenance, myself and my family thrown upon the charity of others, and having now suffered eight months' imprisonment, that your lordship would put no further burden upon me. But, in the words of the prophet, 'Behold! I am in your hands, do to me what seemeth good to you.' I know for certain that the Lord hath commanded to speak all these things, and that if you put me to death you shall bring innocent blood upon yourself, and upon the inhabitants of this city."

He was condemned to be hanged at the Cross of —his Edinburgh, as a traitor, on the 1st execution. of June, 1661, his head to be placed on the Netherbow, his estate to be confiscated, and his children declared incapable in all time coming to enjoy any office, dignities, possessions, lands, or goods within the kingdom. This atrocious sentence he received with the utmost composure, merely saying, "My lord, never let this sentence affect you more than it does me, and let never my blood be required of the king's family." On his way to the scaffold he requested that the cords which pinioned his arms might be slackened so far as to allow him to support his tottering frame on a staff, while walking from the Tolbooth to the place of execution. On the scaffold "he spoke an hour," says Burnet, who saw him suffer, "with the composure of one who was delivering a sermon rather than his last words." Just before he was turned over, lifting the napkin from his face, he cried, "The covenant—the covenant shall yet be Scotland's reviving!" "His last words, which he uttered with a cheerful countenance and elevated voice, were those of the Prophet Habakkuk—'Art thou not from everlasting, O Lord, my God, my holy one? I shall not die, but live.' After he was taken down his head was severed from his body with an axe. It was observed that there was a vast effusion of blood that flowed from his body, which was presently put into a coffin and carried to the old kirk aisle, where it was dressed by a number of ladies of good quality. Some of them took their napkins and dipped them in the blood, and when Sir Archibald Primrose, the registrar, challenged one of them for so doing, saying, 'It was a piece of the superstition and idolatry of the Romish Church to preserve the relics of the saints.' It was answered, they intended not to abuse it into superstition and idolatry, but to hold up the bloody napkin to heaven in their addresses, that the Lord might remember the innocent blood that was spilt."*

* Wodrow, book i. sect 4; Analecta, vol. ii. p. 108; Burnet, vol. i. p. 181; McCrie's Sketches, vol. ii. pp. 75–78. Some of the modern defenders of Scottish episcopacy have attempted to justify the judicial murder of Guthrie, which even Sir George Mackenzie—the "bloody Mackenzie"—tacitly admits to be incapable of vindication. He mentions Guthrie's powerful talents with respect, and says, "Really, it was to be regretted that a more tractable and quiet person had not the keeping of his great parts and courage, for he

With Guthrie was hanged a Captain Govan, who had deserted to Cromwell while Charles was in Scotland. "The man," says Burnet, "was inconsiderable till they made him more considered by putting him to death, on such an account, at so great a distance of time."

Patrick Gillespie, principal of Glasgow College, the only minister in Scotland who had publicly prayed for the pro-^{Gillespie, Rutherford, and Warriston.} tector, was also marked out for destruction; but, through the interest of Lord Sinclair, he was only sequestered from his living. The famous Samuel Rutherford was saved by death, after a lingering illness, from the fate of Argyll and Guthrie. His enemies, with impotent malice, though he was known to be dying, summoned him to appear before the council on a charge of high-treason, and expelled him from his office of regent and professor of divinity in the University of St. Andrew's.* Archibald Johnston, Lord Warriston, who had escaped to the Continent, was attainted. Swinton, who had been a judge under Cromwell, having turned quaker and frankly condemned his own conduct, was pardoned, but deprived of his estate, which was bestowed on Lauderdale.

After the adjournment of the parliament the commissioner proceeded to London, where a council was held for the purpose of settling the ecclesiastical^{Council respecting the Scottish Church.} affairs of Scotland. Middleton, Glencairn, and Rothes, declared that the nation in general was disgusted with the intolerance and tyranny of the presbyterian clergy, and that the restoration of episcopacy would be universally acceptable to the people, and would greatly strengthen the monarchy. These views were strenuously supported by Clarendon, who entertained an inveterate dislike to the presbyterian system, and was apprehensive that if legally established in Scotland it would regain its ascendancy in England and Ireland. The restoration of prelacy was, therefore, resolved on, in spite of the solemn promise of the king to maintain the existing form of church government, and the warning which the fate of Charles I. held out against such an attempt to overturn the national faith. The presbyterians were now fully aware of their danger, and had deputed James Sharp, minister of Crail, to lay their case before the king, and to endeavour to secure the preservation and liberties of the presbyterian church. Sharp was a person of considerable ability and learning, of plausible manners, and of singular dexterity in the management of men. He had acquired the complete confidence of his party, and was regarded by them as "a very worthy, pious, was both the secretary and champion of his party." (Hist. p. 51.) Charles himself said, when he heard that Patrick Gillespie was pardoned, "If I had known you would have spared Mr. Gillespie, I would have spared Mr. Guthrie." Sharp accuses Gillespie of having offered, of his own accord, to go all lengths to effect the restoration of prelacy, in order to conciliate the king and procure his pardon.

* Walker's Remains, p. 171; Reid's Memoirs of the Divines of the Westminster Assembly.

wise, and diligent young man." His correspondence during his residence in London shows that for some time he zealously exerted himself to promote the views of his friends, and to support the presbyterian system, and even procured from the king a letter to the presbytery of Edinburgh, expressing in the strongest terms his majesty's determination to "preserve and protect the government of the Church of Scotland, as settled by law, without violation."* But after it became evident that the king and his councillors were determined to restore prelacy in Perfidy of Scotland, he was secretly gained James Sharp. over by some of the English high-church statesmen, and induced to concur in their schemes for the re-establishment of episcopacy, and to betray the church which had intrusted its cause to his advocacy. So artfully did he conceal his perfidy that, on his return to Scotland, his brethren of the Edinburgh presbytery unanimously presented him with a vote of thanks for his faithful and diligent discharge of the duties of his mission, and no suspicion was entertained of his designs till they were ripe for execution.

The treachery of Sharp is utterly indefensible; but there can be little doubt that no efforts he could have made would have altered the resolution of Charles and his courtiers to overrun the ecclesiastical polity of Scotland, and to establish the episcopal form on its ruins. The success of the design to destroy the liberties of the Church was greatly promoted by the unfortunate dissensions which still raged between the protesters and the resolutioners, and prevented them from uniting in any common measure for their protection. Most of the eminent men who had guided the councils of the Church through the troublesome times of the great civil war were now dead or in exile, or sinking under the weight of years and infirmities. Many, too, were terror-stricken by the execution of Argyll and Guthrie—many were worn out with the long-continued intestine strife and contention, and anxious for peace on almost any terms; while not a few, especially among the nobility, had become impatient of the strict superintendence exercised by the clergy, and were eager to throw off their yoke. Owing partly to these causes, partly to the stratagems of the court, and the terrors of imprisonment, confiscation, and death, with which the royal edicts were enforced, the presbyterian church was overthrown without a struggle, almost without remonstrance. In spite of his

Perjury of solemn oath to maintain the presbyterian system, the king, in August, 1661, sent a letter to the privy council, in which, after alluding to his promise that he would maintain the government of the Church settled by law, and pleading the miserable subterfuge that the parliament had now rescinded the acts respecting that government passed during the civil war, he says, "we therefore, from our respect to the glory of God, the good and interest of the protestant religion, from our pious care and princely zeal for the order, unity, peace, and stability of the Church, and its better harmony with the government of the churches of England, have, after mature deliberation, declared to those of our council here our firm resolution to interpose our royal authority for the restoring of that Church to its right government by bishops, as it was before the late troubles." The Earl of Tweeddale was the only member of council who hesitated to express his acquiescence in this despotic mandate, and ventured to hint the propriety of advising with the synods. To repress at once this spirit of resistance, Middleton procured an order for the imprisonment of Tweeddale, on the Tyrannical behaviour of Middleton. ground that he had opposed the execution of Guthrie, and had pleaded that death was too severe a punishment for the offences laid to his charge. This arbitrary act had the desired effect of securing unanimity in the council, and a ready compliance with the royal mandate. A proclamation was immediately issued announcing the restoration of the bishops, prelacy.

prohibiting meetings of synods and assemblies, and forbidding all discoursing or preaching against the change, on pain of imprisonment. A second followed, enjoining the burghs, under the severest penalties, to elect none as magistrates who held presbyterian, or liberal principles; and such was the universal servility, that this illegal and arbitrary interference with the freedom of election was submitted to without remonstrance.

As episcopacy was now the established religion of Scotland, it became necessary to appoint suffragan bishops to take charge of ecclesiastical affairs. As an appropriate reward for his services, Sharp was appointed primate and consecration of the new bishops. archbishop of St. Andrew's; * and Fairfoul, Hamilton, and Leighton, were nominated

* Sharp was authorised by the king to offer preferment to a number of the leading presbyterian ministers, and particularly to Mr. Robert Douglas, minister of Edinburgh, a person of remarkable wisdom and prudence, who had formerly been a chaplain in the army of Gustavus Adolphus. The author of a contemporary life of Sharp states that, in declining the offer, Douglas said, "I have dipt so far in oaths and the concerns of the late troubles, and now being turned aged, and infirm, I want strength to sustain the weight of the office, and the difficulties which I should be obliged to encounter. But, if you can comply who are young, and lay not under the same engagements, I neither can nor will blame you." (True and Impartial Account, &c., pp. 54, 55.) Kirkton, however (History, pp. 134, 135), gives another and very different version of this interview. According to this writer, Sharp affected to have no desire for the archbishopric, and pressed the acceptance of the office upon Mr. Douglas. He told the venerable minister that the king was determined to introduce episcopacy, that his majesty was very desirous that Mr. Douglas should accept the primacy, and that he had better comply with the offer, lest a worse should be appointed. Mr. Douglas answered he would have nothing to do with it. Sharp insisted and to the sees of Glasgow, Galloway, and Dunblane. Sydsersf, Bishop of Galloway, who was now promoted to the see of Orkney, was the only one of the old Scottish prelates who survived at the restoration; and as a single prelate was insufficient to confer ordination, the four ministers chosen for the prelatical office were required to repair to London, that they might receive consecration from the hands of the English bishops—episcopal ordination “being,” as Kirkton remarks, “a flower not to be found in a Scottish garden.” The prelates elect Presbyterian were compelled also to acknowledge the nullity of their presbyterian ordination, which two of them—Sharp and Leighton—had received, and to submit to the degradation of being ordained first deacons, and then presbyters, before being consecrated bishops. The other two, Fairfoul and Hamilton, were already in priest's orders, having been ordained before the extirpation of prelacy, in the preceding reign. As the validity of presbyterian orders was acknowledged by the English bishops in the case of Spottiswood and his associates, who were appointed to the prelatical office in 1610, Sharp objected at first to submit to this insult; but Sheldon, Bishop of London, peremptorily insisted that either they must renounce their presbyterian ordination, or go without their episcopal ordination. “So,” says Kirkton, “they were content rather to deny themselves to be presbyters, than not to be received bishops.” On which Sheldon observed that “it seemed to be the Scots fashion to scruple at everything, and to swallow everything.”* The ceremony of ordination was performed in Westminster Abbey on the 15th of December, 1661, with great splendour; and the newly consecrated bishops returned home in state, and entered the capital in a kind of triumphal procession, with crowds of the needy nobles in their train. They were received by the magistrates in their robes, entertained by the chief officers of state in a series of magnificent banquets, and treated with every mark of external respect, calculated to impress the people with a lofty notion of the dignity and power of the restored hierarchy.

* Some of the episcopalian defenders of the king allege that his conduct in re-establishing prelacy was not inconsistent with this pledge, because the parliaments by which presbytery had been established were not legal, and therefore episcopacy was at this time the religion "settled by law"—a contemptible subterfuge, every way worthy of the king and his apologists. (See Stephen's Life and Times of Archbishop Sharp, p. 135.)

The choice, however, of the king and his advisers was far from fortunate, and the characters of the new bishops, and the characters of the men who were thus unexpectedly elevated to the highest offices in the Church were by no means fitted to gain the confidence and esteem of the nation. The recent conduct of Sharp rendered him peculiarly obnoxious to the Scottish people, and the part which he speedily took in the persecution of the covenanters, deepened into bitter hatred the distrust and dislike with which he was urged him. Mr. Douglas repeated his refusal, on which Sharp arose and took his leave. Douglas accompanied him to the door; “James,” said he, “I perceive you are clear; I see you will engage—you will be bishop of St. Andrew's. Take it,” and, laying his hand on Sharp's shoulder, he added, “and the curse of God with it.” “The subject,” says Sir Walter Scott, “might suit a painter.”

* Kirkton's History, p. 137; Wodrow's Analecta, vol. i. p. 133.

originally regarded. Fairfoul, who was made Archbishop of Glasgow, was, according to Burnet, “a facetious man, insinuating and crafty; but he was a better physician than a divine. His life was scarce free from scandal, and he was eminent in nothing that belonged to his own function. He had not only sworn the covenant, but had persuaded others to do it. And when one objected to him, that it went against his conscience, he answered there were some very good medicines that could not be chewed, but were to be swallowed down.” Hamilton, who was made Bishop of Galloway, was originally episcopal minister of Cambusnethan. On the abolition of prelacy he retained his office, conformed to the presbyterian system, and distinguished himself by his zeal in the cause of the covenant. Leighton, who was appointed to the see of Dunblane, was remarkable for the sanctity of his character, the amiability of his disposition, and the moderation of his opinions. He had little sympathy with his associates, and on their triumphal entry into the capital, he quitted them in disgust before reaching the city, and entered it as privately as possible. He had great misgivings as to the course followed in the restoration of prelacy; and often said to Burnet, “That in the whole progress of that affair there appeared such cross characters of an angry Providence, that how fully soever he was satisfied in his own mind as to episcopacy itself, yet it seemed that God was against them, and that they were not likely to be the men to build up his Church; so that the struggling about it seemed to him like a fighting against God. He who had the greatest hand in it [Sharp] proceeded with so much dissimulation, and the rest of the order were so mean and selfish, and the Earl of Middleton, with the other secular men that conducted it, were so openly impious and vicious, that it did cast a reproach on everything relating to religion to see it managed by such instruments.”*

On the day after the arrival of the bishops, May 8th, 1662, the second session of Second session the parliament commenced; and of parliament.

an act was passed annulling the authority of presbyteries, and of provincial and general assemblies, and restoring the bishops to their ancient privileges and prerogatives, untrammelled by any restraint, except the advice of such of the clergy as they might choose to consult. The covenants were declared unlawful, null and void; and Ratification of episcopacy.

whatever might tend to excite dissatisfaction with his majesty's supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs, or with the episcopal government, was to be punished as seditious. An act was at the same time passed requiring every person who assumed an office of trust, to declare that he considered it unlawful for subjects, under any pretext whatever, to enter into covenants, or to take up arms against their sovereign; that he disowned, as seditious, all that had been done by petition or remonstrance during the late troubles; and that he regarded the oaths taken in connection with the covenants as unlawful oaths, which were not binding on any of the subjects of the realm. The right of patronage was restored. The ministers who had been appointed since its abolition were deprived of their benefices, unless they should procure, within four months, a presentation from the patrons, and collation from the bishop of the diocese.

* History of his Own Times, vol. i. p. 201.

The hierarchy thus forcibly thrust upon Scotland Character of the new church government introduced by system. James. Under the latter the bishops enjoyed pre-eminence, and a negative voice, but not a magisterial authority in the presbyteries and synods, and the constitution of the ecclesiastical courts was not annulled. But now the prelates were invested with absolute authority over their clergy, who had no voice whatever in the legislation of the Church; the presbyterian courts were closed, and the ministers were ordered to attend the diocesan meetings in the different districts assigned to the bishops, and thus to acknowledge their authority, on pain of being held contemnors of the royal will.*

The unsettled state of ecclesiastical affairs had Act of hitherto afforded a pretext for the amnesty. delay of the act of amnesty and oblivion in Scotland; but as that obstacle was now removed, this measure could no longer be postponed. Lauderdale urged that, as an unconditional amnesty had been granted to all in England, except the regicides, the Scottish nation, which had merited so well of the king, and had suffered so much in his cause, was entitled to the same indulgence and grace. But Middleton represented that the royalists who had been impoverished by their adherence to the crown, should be recompensed for their losses out of the estates of those who had taken part in the rebellion, or preserved their property by submitting to the usurper. Middleton's

Fines imposed as the price of indemnity. interested representations were very acceptable to the king and his unprincipled courtiers, and the proposal was at once adopted; but with the limitation that the fines imposed should not exceed one year's rent, and that no offences should be punished which had been committed previous to the former act of indemnity passed at Stirling. These restrictions, however, were entirely disregarded. The committee appointed to determine who should be fined, and the amount of their fines, were sworn to secrecy, and acted with a total disregard of truth and equity. An arbitrary list of offenders was made out, as malice or avarice dictated, without any evidence, or even inquiry, respecting their guilt. No proof of innocence was admitted. A bribe to the commissioner, or some of his favourites, was a surer protection than the most unblemished innocence or untainted loyalty. The most obnoxious offenders compounded in secret. A list of nine hundred persons was presented to parliament, whose fines amounted to eighty-five thousand pounds, some of whom were dead, some had been abroad during the civil wars, some were mere infants. It was to no purpose, however, that exceptions were taken to the list; the only reply was, that those who did not pay the sum demanded, would be excluded from the act of indemnity, and those who chose to renounce the benefit of this act, and to stand upon their innocence, might do so at their peril—an alternative which no one had the hardihood to embrace. The fall of Middleton, however, prevented him and his friends from obtaining that share of the fines which they had expected, and the sums extorted from Scotland by this shameful process were ultimately reserved for the crown.

The avarice and revenge of Middleton were alike insatiable, and were neither restrained by honour nor prudence. He had succeeded by the most nefarious practices in bringing the Marquis of Argyll to the scaffold; but, through the influence of Lauderdale, his estates had been wrested from the grasp of the commissioner, and conferred upon Lord Lorn, his son. He had a bond, however, for four hundred thousand marks on the estates of Huntley, which was disallowed by the parliament, and these estates were restored free. Lorn, irritated at this act of injustice and the continued persecution of his family, in a confidential letter to his friend, Lord Duffus, had complained of the calumnies which had been employed to prepossess the king against him; but he said that he had now discovered and defeated his enemies, and that he expected to gain the person (the Earl of Clarendon) on whom the chief of them depended. This letter was intercepted by Middleton, and produced before the parliament, at whose request Lorn was sent down to Scotland for trial upon the infamous law against leasing-making, which rendered it a capital crime to sow dissension between the king and his subjects. The parliament found him guilty, and pronounced sentence of death on him; but his life was saved by the king, who, in anticipation of the issue of the trial, had given stringent orders that no sentence should be executed without his express instructions.* An act, unexampled for its tyranny and cruelty, was immediately passed, to prohibit all intercession in behalf of the children of those who had been attainted by parliament, and thus to prevent their restoration to their hereditary titles and estates. No penalty was annexed to this act, as it was a maxim among the court lawyers that, to specify the punishment, imposed a limitation on the crown, whereas, if the penalty were omitted, the violation of the law might be visited, at the pleasure of the king, with any punishment less than death.† At the instigation of Middleton, an act was carried for rendering twelve persons incapable of all trust or office. The persons thus punished without accusation, or trial, were to be named by ballot; the lists to be scrutinised by a secret committee, and not divulged till they were sanctioned by the king. The commissioner, who expected in this way to get rid of his rivals, the Earls of Lauderdale and Crawford, procured the insertion of their names in the list of the persons presented. But in spite of the most vigilant precautions to prevent the discovery of this intrigue, Lord Lorn transmitted the intelligence by a private channel to Lauderdale, who represented the matter in such a light to the king, before the arrival of the commissioner from the parliament, that the report was laid aside, and Middleton's own position considerably endangered.

* Burnet, p. 149.

† Acts of Parliament of Scotland, vol. vii. p. 418; Wodrow, vol. i. pp. 235—238.

* Burnet, vol. i. p. 203.

The diocesan synods held throughout the kingdom were very ill-attended, except in the north.* In the other districts of the country, especially in the west, the clergy continued to occupy their pulpits, and to discharge the remaining duties of their office; but they had formed the resolution not to attend the diocesan meetings, nor to acknowledge, by any act of canonical obedience, the authority of the prelates. Middleton, however, by the advice of Clarendon, determined to enforce the laws recently enacted for the support of episcopacy, and for that purpose now made a tour through the western counties, accompanied by certain members of the privy council. The scenes of debauchery and profaneness which took place during this progress were of the most revolting kind, and excited intense disgust. At Glasgow, Fairfoul, the archbishop, complained to the commissioner that, notwithstanding the act of parliament, not one of the young ministers had acknowledged his authority, and suggested that measures should be adopted to enforce their submission.

An act of council was therefore framed, at a meeting where only two of the members were sober,† declaring that all those ministers who had been admitted since 1649, when patronage was abolished, and had not complied with the act of parliament enjoining them to obtain a presentation from the patron, and induction from the bishop of the diocese, should be deprived of their livings and expelled from their parishes, and, if necessary, that they should be displaced by military force: in other words, all presbyterian ministers who might scruple at once to turn episcopalians, were at one stroke to be ejected from their livings and reduced to beggary. Lockhart, of Lee, alone protested against this rash and impolitic step, as calculated to increase, rather than to allay, the unpopularity of the prelates. But Middleton and his associates, with the characteristic incredulity of men of their class, as to the existence in others of any higher motives than those by which they themselves are actuated, disregarded the warning, and treated with scorn the notion that any, except a few zealots, would sacrifice their livings for the sake of their principles. The archbishop maintained that there would not be two in all his diocese who would refuse to comply.

To the great surprise of the commissioner, and the unspeakable mortification of —they resign the bishops, nearly four hundred —their charges. ministers at once resigned their charges, rather than do violence to their consciences by yielding a sinful compliance with this tyrannical enactment; and thus the Church, to use the peculiar, but expressive language of the times, fled into the wilderness. The spectacle of more than a third of the churches simultaneously closed,—while the ministers were expelled from their homes in the depths of winter, deprived of the stipends due for the preceding year, and with their families left destitute of support,—excited the deepest indignation and grief in the minds of the people, and produced an insurmountable aversion to the ecclesiastical system, which this cruel and impolitic measure was intended to strengthen. "The honest people," says Kirkton, "encouraged their ministers to enter upon the course of suffering; and many in Scotland rejoiced to see their ministers give that proof of their sincerity—for there were some who affirmed that not twenty ministers in Scotland would lose their stipends for refusing to sit with a bishop."

The crafty policy of Sharp was to have expelled the presbyterian ministers in detail, and to have gradually filled their places with men after his own heart; but their simultaneous resignation of their charges deranged this scheme, and greatly embarrassed the council, who little expected such a result. In order to retrieve the consequences of their rashness and folly, they summoned the archbishops to the capital to assist them with their advice; and, on the 23rd of December, issued a proclamation confirming the Glasgow Act, but allowing the ministers who had resigned their livings to retain possession of them, provided that they obtained a presentation from the patron, and collation from the bishop, before the 1st of February, 1663. It was declared that those who refused to comply with the act should "thenceforth be esteemed and holden as persons disaffected to his majesty's government; and recusants were ordered to remove from the dioceses of Glasgow, Argyll and Galloway, and to transport themselves and their families to the district beyond the Tay."

As the ministers, however, firmly adhered to their resolution, to suffer the loss of all things rather than to sin, it became necessary to supply the vacant churches with pastors—a task which was by no means easily accomplished. New ministers

* The synod of Aberdeen alone of all the synods and presbyteries of Scotland, petitioned in favour of episcopacy.

† "Duke Hamilton told me," says Burnet, "they were all so drunk that day that they were not capable of considering anything that was laid before them, and would hear of nothing but executing the law, without any relenting or delay."—Vol. i. p. 223; Kirkton, p. 149.

were sought for all over the kingdom; and, as Hume is forced to admit, no one was so ignorant or vicious as to be rejected. The greater part of the new incumbents were brought from the northern counties, where submission to despotic measures, both in Church and State, has always been much more prompt and implicit than in the other districts of the country. These curates, as they were termed, were "a set of young lads," says Kirkton, "unstudied and unbred, who had all the properties of Jeroboam's priests, miserable in the world, and unable to subsist, which made them so much long for a stipend. So they went to their churches with the same intention as a shepherd contracts for herding a flock of sheep."* "They were the worst preachers I ever heard," says Bishop Burnet; "they were ignorant to a reproach, and many of them were openly vicious. They were a disgrace to their orders and the sacred function; and were indeed the dregs and refuse of the northern parts. Those of them who arose above contempt or scandal, were men of such ardent tempers that they were as much hated as the others were despised."† These were not the men to repair the breach that had been made in the walls of the Church, or to reconcile the people to the loss of their former teachers, who, on the admission of their enemies, were "men remarkable for the severity of their manners and their fervour in preaching."

Character of those appointed to the vacant churches—

—their reception by the people. The curates were everywhere regarded as intruders. "In some places," says Wodrow, "they were welcomed with tears in abundance, and entreaties to be gone; in others, with reasonings and arguments which confounded them; and some entertained them with threats, affronts and indignities, too many here to be repeated. The tongue of the kirk bell in some places was stolen away, that the parishioners might have an excuse for not coming to church. The doors of the church in other cases were barricaded, and they were made to enter by the window literally. The baser of the gentry easily engaged them to join in their drinking cabals, which, with all iniquity, did now fearfully abound, and sadly exposed them; and in some places the people, fretted with the dismal change, gathered together and violently opposed their settlement, and received them with showers of stones." So strong was the feeling against the intruders, that he adds, "profane fellows thought there was no surer way of atoning for the excesses of the last night, than by insulting a curate the next morning."‡ These annoyances, Kirkton tells us, were "ordinarily the actions of the profane and ignorant, not approved by the sober and judicious presbyterians."

The administration of Middleton had now become Downfall at once contemptible and odious; of Middleton. and the quarrel between him and Lauderdale had grown to such a height that it was impossible they could any longer co-operate in carrying on the government. On proceeding to London to answer the charges brought against him, the commissioner found powerful defenders in Clarendon, Sheldon, Bishop of London, and Monk; but the influence of Lauderdale, aided by his own indiscretion, completed his downfall, and he was deprived of all his offices and reduced to poverty. As some alleviation of his disgrace, he was sent out as governor of Tangier, where he soon after died, in consequence of an injury received by falling down a stair in a fit of intoxication. His downfall was hailed with the liveliest satisfaction; but the national joy was of short duration, for his successors proved worse than himself. Rothes, the president of the council, was appointed commissioner, and soon afterwards was also made treasurer, in the room of Lord Crawford, who was deprived of his office through a base plot of Sharp,* abetted by Lord Clarendon. The direction of Scottish affairs, however, was principally entrusted to Lauderdale, who continued Secretary of State. This nobleman, whose memory is still held in merited abhorrence

Lauderdale. Character of by the Scottish people, was originally a zealous covenantner, and one of the most active leaders on the popular side throughout the recent troubles. When the designs of the republican party became apparent, however, he went over to the king's side, and exerted himself strenuously to bring about an agreement between Charles I. and the presbyterians. He was one of the principal promoters of the engagement, and of the treaty with Charles II., which led to the ill-advised and disastrous restoration of that prince to the Scottish throne. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and confined in the Tower of London and other places for nine years. During his long confinement his mind had been carefully improved by study, and he acquired extensive learning, both theological and classical. He possessed a remarkable memory, great shrewdness and energy, and a copious, though unpolished, elocution. His personal appearance was extremely unprepossessing. "He was very big," says Burnet, "his hair red, hanging oddly about him. His tongue was too big for his mouth, which made him bedew all that he talked to, and his whole manner was rough and boisterous." He was furious and ungovernable in his passions, vindictive, cold-

* Sharp prevailed upon the king to ask Crawford, who was a staunch presbyterian, to renounce the covenant, and take the declaration enacted by the parliament in 1662. To the astonishment of Charles, the earl refused, saying that he had suffered nine years' imprisonment, forfeiture, and the ruin of his fortune in his majesty's service; but he could not, even to please his sovereign, do violence to his conscience. He was, in consequence, immediately deprived of his office. Lauderdale urged him to take the test and keep his place, alleging that he might "do meikle good to the unconformists, the presbyterians, by so doing." But Crawford peremptorily refused, declaring that he was taught not to do evil that good may come of it. "The envious and unthankful prelate," says Row, commenting on Sharp's conduct, "Crawford being the man that first preferred him—first giving him a presentation to be one of the regents of St. Leonard's College, thereafter a presentation to the Kirk of Crail."

* Kirkton's History, p. 160.

† History, vol. i. p. 229. ‡ Wodrow, vol. i. p. 332.

hearted, and selfish; mean and cringing to his superiors, haughty and tyrannical to his inferiors; obstinate in error, and irreclaimable by advice, which served only to confirm his determination to adhere to his own opinion. Although he was the chief instrument of Charles and his brother in forcing episcopacy on the Scottish nation, and in carrying out that design inflicted the most cruel tortures on the covenanters, his own sentiments continued unchanged, and he retained, to the day of his death, his preference for the presbyterian system. Such was the man to whom the chief management of Scottish affairs was now committed.

The parliament re-assembled on the 18th of June, and at the commencement of its proceedings surrendered the last remnant of the privileges which had been gained during the struggle with Charles I., and revived the former mode of appointing the lords of the articles. The prelates selected eight peers, who in turn appointed eight prelates; these sixteen then made choice of an equal number of barons and burgesses, to whom were added the officers of state. As no business of any kind could be brought before the Estates without the consent of these lords of articles, the independence of the parliament was completely destroyed. The most stringent measures were adopted against the presbyterian ministers and their adherents. All the ministers who refused to attend the diocesan meetings were to be ejected; and if they ventured to preach after their ejection, they were to be punished as seditious. A subsequent enactment, called "The Scots' Mile Act," commanded the ejected ministers and their families to remove from their parishes within twenty days, and not to reside within twenty miles of the same, nor within six miles of Edinburgh, or of any cathedral church, nor within three miles of any royal burgh. Every nobleman or heritor who should wilfully absent himself from his parish church was to forfeit a fourth part of his year's rent; tenants and burgesses, a fourth part of their movables, together with the freedom of their burghs, and were to be subjected to such corporal punishment as the privy council might think proper to inflict. The abjuration of the covenants was re-enacted under the same heavy penalties. It was likewise enacted that a general assembly, or national synod, should be constituted, consisting of the archbishops and bishops, deans, archdeacons, and perpetual moderators, with one minister from each presbytery and two from each of the universities. To crown the servility and debasement of this parliament, all the regulations respecting foreign trade and the imposition of duties and restraints were declared to be an inherent prerogative of the crown; and an offer was made to the king to raise twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse, to serve in any place in Scotland, England, or Ireland. And thus the religion, liberty, and commerce of the kingdom were basely subjected to the uncontrolled sway of the sovereign.*

An additional stigma was cast upon this meeting of the Estates by the execution of Sir Archibald Johnston, Lord Warriston, one of the principal leaders of the covenanters during the civil war, and a person of great sagacity and eloquence, who had incurred the vindictive hatred of the king by the freedom with which he had censured his profligacy during his residence in Scotland. His zeal in the cause of the covenant, and his acceptance of the office of clerk-register under Cromwell, who advanced him to the bench, and afterwards made him one of his peers, had rendered him peculiarly obnoxious to the royalists; and being well aware that nothing would satisfy them but his blood, he fled to the Continent, where he lived some time in concealment at Hamburgh. Having gone to Rouen, in Normandy, however, the vengeance of the English government tracked him out, and a worthless creature, usually called "Crooked Murray," discovered the old man at his prayers. Previous to this time he had been shamefully treated, during an illness at Hamburgh, by Dr. Bates, successively physician to Cromwell and to Charles II. This base person who, after the restoration, permitted his friends to boast that he had accelerated Cromwell's death by his prescriptions, "intending to kill Warriston, did prescribe unto him poison for physic, and then caused to draw from this melancholy patient sixty ounces of blood, whereby, he was brought near unto the gates of death, and made in a manner no man, having lost his memory, so that he could not remember what he had done or said a quarter of an hour before, in which condition he continued till his dying day."† On landing in Scotland, he was conducted on foot and bareheaded, from Leith to the Tolbooth of Edinburgh. When brought before the council, the old man, utterly broken down in body and mind, wept and implored mercy, "a scene which," says Sir George Mackenzie, "moved all the spectators with a deep melancholy; and the chancellor, reflecting upon the man's great parts, former esteem, and the great share he had in all the late revolutions, could not deny some tears to the frailty of silly mankind." But Sharp and some of the more inveterate of the party raised an inhuman laugh at the tears, and incoherent defence of the poor superannuated prisoner. Some of the members of council wished to delay the sentence; but Lauderdale, who was well aware of the king's feelings, interposed, and silenced the plea for mercy. On the morning of

* Acts of the Scottish Parliament, vol. vii. p. 461.

† Preface to the Apologetical Relation, published in 1665. Kirkton, who attended Warriston on the scaffold, confirms this statement. (History, p. 170; see also Lamont's Diary, p. 206.) Burnet says "he was so disordered in body and mind, that it was a reproach to a government to proceed against him." (History, i. p. 297.) The encouragement which the assassin, Riardo, received from the English court, in his attempts against the republican exiles of Berne, is well known. (Ludlow's Memoirs, p. 395.)

his execution, Warriston awoke calm and composed after a sound sleep; his recollection returned, and he delivered his last speech on the scaffold with great composure, using a paper to assist his —his shattered memory. On ascending execution— the ladder, assisted by some of his friends, he said with great fervour, "I beseech you all, who are the people of God, not to scare at sufferings for the sake of Christ, or stumble at anything of this kind falling out in these days, but be encouraged to suffer for Him; for I assure you, in the name of the Lord, he will bear your charges." When they were adjusting the rope around his neck, he added, "the Lord hath graciously comforted me;" with his hands uplifted to heaven, and the words "Pray, pray! praise, praise!" on his lips, he was turned over, and expired without a struggle.

With the exception of their great leader, Argyll,

—his none of the covenanters have been character. so grossly calumniated as Warriston, and even in the present day the eulogists of Sharp and Claverhouse have misrepresented his actions and motives, and scoffed at his sufferings with brutal ribaldry. But a writer who had no sympathy with the religious opinions and objects of the covenanters, after a sneer at Warriston's "lengthened devotions and zeal for the covenant," is yet constrained to admit that "he was a man of more than common understanding or genius; of an active, violent, and disinterested spirit; of a quick and vivid invention; of an extensive and tenacious memory; incapable of repose; indefatigable in application; ever fertile in expedients; endowed with a vehement, prompt, and impressive elocution; and at a time when the nobility themselves were statesmen, his political talents raised him from an obscure advocate to a level with the prime nobility in affairs of State."*

Meanwhile the great body of the people in the west and south, deprived of the instruction of their own pastors, refused to attend upon the ministrations of the curates, so that the parish churches were almost deserted. The ejected ministers, denied permission to enter their pulpits, opened their houses to those who chose to attend their family devotions; and the people were attracted to these services in such numbers that the houses were unable to contain them. It became necessary, therefore, to hold the service out of doors with those who were gathered around; and, as the crowds increased, they at length repaired to the fields, where great numbers assembled from the neighbouring parishes, eager to hear the Gospel from the lips of those faithful men who had willingly suffered the loss of all things for Christ. This

Origin of conventicles and field meetings. was the origin of those conventicles and field preachings, so famous in Scottish history. These meetings at first were peaceable; the people attended unarmed, and at the close of the services quietly dispersed, and returned to their homes. But matters did not long continue in this comparatively peaceful state. The bishops, provoked at this general desertion of the instructions of the curates, procured the "act for separation and disobedience to ecclesiastic authority," popularly called "The Bishop's Drag-net," inflicting the penalties of sedition on the ministers who ventured to preach without their sanction, and fines on those who absented themselves from their parish churches. The levying of their fines was Exactions and committed to the soldiers, troops quarterings of of whom were quartered in those the soldiers. districts where the nonconforming spirit was strongest. These "booted apostles," as they were termed, were entrusted with the task of compelling the people regularly to attend the parish church; and the course they adopted for this purpose was very simple and summary. A roll of their parishioners was usually kept by the curates, and called over after sermon; the names of those absent were marked and reported to the commanding officer of the nearest company, by whom the fine that had been incurred was levied. "The process was very short: no witnesses or proof were required. The soldier summarily pronounced and executed his own sentence, and that with the greater cheerfulness as the money generally speaking went into his own pocket. The military behaved just as if they had been in an enemy's country. If a tenant or head of a family was unwilling or unable to pay, the soldiers were quartered on him till they had destroyed ten times the value of the fine, and when poor families were no longer able to sustain them, their goods were distrained and sold for a trifle;" and thus whole families were reduced to beggary. A few of the old presbyterian clergy were not comprehended under the Glasgow Act, and were still allowed to preach in their own parishes; but their hearers did not escape the annoyances to which their brethren elsewhere were exposed. It became a common practice for parties of soldiers to carouse in some neighbouring ale-house till the service was concluded, and then to station themselves at the church-door as the congregation dispersed, and to question them one by one whether they belonged to that parish. All who were found to be strangers were robbed, by way of fine, of whatever money they had about them. If they had no money, the men's coats and the women's plaids were taken from them and carried off by the rapacious soldiers.

The measures hitherto employed by the reckless and unprincipled men who were at the head of affairs in Scotland, to extirpate the presbyterian faith, had completely failed. Their only result had been to drive into the ranks of the extreme covenanters many peace-loving moderate men, who were wearied of strife and dissension, and longed for an opportunity of quietly performing their pastoral duties. The High Court of Commission—bishops resolved to try the effect of more stringent measures in crushing the spirit of resistance to their despotic mandates. In 1664 a Court of High Commission was appointed by the king, at the solicitation of Sharp, consisting of nine prelates and thirty-five laymen, for the purpose of executing with increased severity the laws against nonconformists. This notorious tribunal, to which the civil and military officers were all subordinate, was invested with almost absolute powers. A bishop with four assistants composed a quorum, and neither time nor place was prescribed for their meetings. They were empowered to call before them at their pleasure "all popish traffickers, inter-communers with and resettlers of Jesuits and seminary priests; all who said and heard mass;* all obstinate contemners of the discipline of the Church; all keepers of conventicles; all the ejected ministers who continued to remain in their parishes, or to exercise the functions of their office; all who preached in private houses or elsewhere without licence from the bishop of the diocese; all who kept meetings or fasts without licence; all who preached, spoke, or wrote against the existing government of the Church or kingdom; all who neglected to attend divine worship in their respective parish churches;" all, in a word, who ventured in any way to show their dissatisfaction with the recent enactments against the presbyterian faith and the liberties of the people.† They were empowered to fine or imprison transgressors at their pleasure. All magistrates and soldiers were to execute their orders, and from their sentence there —its arbitrary was no appeal. The proceedings and illegal of this commission were of the proceedings. most summary character, and were conducted without accusation, evidence, or defence. Many persons of rank were heavily fined, or even imprisoned, for permitting or attending conventicles; ministers were imprisoned and banished; women were publicly whipped; boys were scourged and branded, and then sold as slaves to the plantations; and the giving of charity to any of the ejected ministers was punished as sedition. The churches remained empty, but the jails were crowded. Great numbers of the people, unable any longer to endure this grinding tyranny, sought refuge among their countrymen in the north of Ireland; and at length so infamous did this commission become that laymen could not be found willing to act on it, and at the end of two years Sufferings of it was dissolved. The people in the people. the south and western districts were reduced to the greatest misery by these outrages and exactions, but their sufferings served only to increase their hatred to episcopacy, and their determination not to countenance in any way the ministrations of the curates.

* Laing's History of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 36; Burnet, vol. i. pp. 37, 297.

The presbyterians had hitherto submitted patiently to the exactions of their military plunderers, but the oppression which maketh even wise men mad, now bore its natural fruit. One of the most active agents of the commission Cruelties of in harassing the presbyterians in Sir James the western districts was Sir James Turner.

Turner,* an English soldier of fortune, a man of a furious temper and dissolute life, who had at one time served in the army of the covenanters against the king, but had now become the unscrupulous and willing tool of the council in carrying out their odious and oppressive measures against his former associates. He had used his authority in the most merciless manner, and had reduced hundreds of families to beggary by his military quarterings and exactions of fines. In the course of three visits to Nithsdale and Galloway, he had plundered twenty-three parishes of nearly one hundred thousand pounds Scots' money—an enormous sum, considering the poverty of the people. His cruelties at length became so intolerable that the peasantry were goaded without premeditation into a partial and ill-advised insurrection, which was followed by the most disastrous consequences. In November, 1666, a party of the legalised Insurrection in banditti, commanded by Turner, Galloway.

seized on a poor old man in the village of Dalry, in Galloway, who could not pay his fine, and were threatening to strip him naked and roast him on a red-hot gridiron. Four fugitive covenanters, who were passing through the village at the time, interfered and entreated them to desist. This the brutal troopers contemptuously refused to do, and a scuffle ensued, in which one of the soldiers was wounded and their prisoner rescued. Dreading the consequences of this act, the covenanters resolved to continue in arms, and, with the assistance of some of the peasantry, they attacked and disarmed a small party of soldiers who were stationed in the neighbourhood, one of whom was killed in the attempt.

The feeling of the country was now roused, and the insurgents, having been joined by about fifty horse and two hundred foot, including the Lairds of Barscob and Corsack and a few other country gentlemen, marched to Dumfries, surprised Sir James Turner in his bed, and took him prisoner. A proposal was made to put him to death; but they spared his life on discovering that his orders were much more severe than his conduct had been. The privy council were panic-struck at the news of this rising, and immediately dispatched General Dalzell to the west, at the head of Behaviour of a body of troops, and issued a pro- the insurgents.
clamation enjoining the insurgents to lay down

* This denunciation of Roman Catholics was inserted merely as a blind, and was never enforced.

† Burnet, vol. i. pp. 306, 307; Wodrow, vol. i. pp. 192—197.

* "Sir James Turner," says Bishop Burnet, "was naturally fierce, but was mad when he was drunk, and that was very often. I knew him well afterwards when he came to himself, being out of employment. He was a learned man, but had been always in armies, and knew no other rule but to obey orders. He told me he had no regard to any laws, but acted as he was commanded in a military way." Sir James's "Memoirs of his own Life and Time" fully confirm the truth of this description. He gives a very curious and important, but disingenuous, account of his proceedings against the presbyterians, which, however, completely establishes the charges brought against him and his employees.

their arms and submit within twenty-four hours. But as no offer of indemnity was made the injunction was disregarded, and the covenanters advanced towards Lanark, their numbers augmenting as they proceeded, though very few men of influence joined them, as a considerable number of the gentry who were favourable to their cause had previously been committed to prison, under the pretext that this was necessary to preserve the peace of the country during the war with Holland. Their numbers had now increased to about three thousand horse and foot, but ill armed and undisciplined. The command was taken by Colonel Wallace of Auchens,* a brave and experienced officer, who had served with distinction in the parliamentary army during the civil war. At Lanark they renewed the covenant, and published a manifesto, in which they professed submission to the king, stated the causes of their taking up arms, and expressed their desire for the re-establishment of presbytery and the restoration of their former ministers. From Lanark the devoted band, deceived by the expectation that they would be joined by great numbers of the inhabitants of the Lothians, marched amidst a storm of wind and rain towards Edinburgh, with Dalzell following closely on their steps. On reaching Colinton, about three or four miles from the capital, they learned that the city was in arms against them, and turned aside to the Pentland Hills, with the view of returning to the west by the way of Biggar. They were now reduced to about nine hundred men, and, weary with their long marches, hungry, and wet, "they looked," says Kirkton, "rather like dying men than soldiers going to conquer." Their courage, however, was not abated, though they must have seen clearly that their case was hopeless. "They were not unwilling to die," they said, "for the cause of religion and liberty; yea, they would esteem a testimony for the Lord and their country a sufficient reward for all their labour and loss." They sent a letter to Dalzell containing a statement of their grievances, but no answer was returned; and on the 28th of November they took up a well-chosen position at a spot called Rullion Green, about six miles from Edinburgh. Here

Battle of they were attacked by the royal Rullion Green. troops in overwhelming numbers, and though they fought with desperate courage, and repelled three assaults of the enemy, they were at last totally routed. About fifty of their number were killed, including two eminent Irish ministers, John Crookshanks and Andrew M'Cormack, and a hundred and thirty were taken prisoners. The escape of the fugitives was favoured by the darkness of the night and the lenity of Dalzell's horsemen, most of whom were gentlemen, and pitied the sufferings of their fellow-countrymen. About thirty, however, were captured, and a number more were barbarously murdered by the neighbouring rustics.*

The hapless prisoners were treated with great cruelty by the prelates and council, Cruel treatment of the prisoners. who were determined to inflict summary vengeance on them for the alarm which their rising had occasioned. They pleaded in vain that they had surrendered upon promise of quarter: it was alleged that though pardoned as soldiers they were not acquitted as subjects; and they were, therefore, sent to trial and condemned to suffer the doom of traitors. About twenty were executed in Edinburgh, ten on one gibbet; seven at Ayr; and a number before their own doors in different parts of the country. Numbers more were banished to the plantations; and fifty persons who had escaped were outlawed, and their property confiscated. The heads of those who suffered in the capital were placed on the city gates, and their right arms were affixed to the prison at Lanark, where they had subscribed the covenant. They all with their dying breath disclaimed any rebellious purpose against the government, and declared that they had taken up arms solely against the insupportable tyranny of the prelates. They were offered their lives if they would subscribe a declaration acknowledging the bishops and renouncing the covenant; but in the hour of trial they all proved faithful to their principles, and bore with such fortitude the tortures inflicted on them as astonished their persecutors, and made them objects of universal sympathy and admiration.

All the prisoners declared, with one voice, that their insurrection originated not in any organised conspiracy, but solely from the oppressive proceedings of the commission and their military agents; but the privy council were anxious to extort from them a confession that there had been a wide-spread conspiracy for the overthrow of the government, and for this purpose a species of torture call the boots was employed. This instrument of cruelty consisted of an Torture of the boots. oblong square box, firmly hooped with iron, open at both ends, and having loose plates inside. When the leg of the unhappy wretch about to be examined was enclosed in this case, wedges were inserted between the loose plates and the solid frame of the box, and were driven down with a hammer, which caused intolerable pain, mangle the limb, and even forcing out the marrow from the bone. Two of Neilson of Corsack. the prisoners subjected to this diabolical torture were Neilson of Corsack, and Hugh M'Kail. The former was a country gentleman distinguished for his piety and the gentleness of his disposition, who had been goaded into rebellion by the most shameful ill-treatment. Solely for his refusal to conform to episcopacy, and to attend the ministry of a curate, contemptible alike for his

* Auchens is situated in Ayrshire, near Dundonald Castle. It is now the property of the Earl of Eglinton. It was at this place that Dr. Johnson met the celebrated Susanna, Dowager Countess of Eglinton, in 1773. (See Boswell's Johnson, vol. v. chap. iv.)

* Kirkton, p. 234, et seq.; Wodrow, vol. i., book ii., chap. i.; Burnet, vol. i. p. 341; Colonel Wallace's Narrative in M'Crie's Memoirs of Veitch and Bryson.

dissolute habits and mean abilities, he had been fined and imprisoned, expelled from his home, his wife and children driven out as houseless wanderers among the mountains, his stock of provisions consumed, his cattle carried off by the soldiers quartered on him by Sir James Turner, and his tenants plundered and ruined by these ruthless marauders. Yet it was he who saved the life of that persecutor when some of the insurgents who had suffered from his oppression wished to put him to death; and to the credit of Sir James it ought to be stated that he attempted, but without effect, to obtain mercy for his preserver. Corsack was so cruelly tortured by the boots that his shrieks were sufficient to move a heart of stone; but as he persisted in declaring that the rising was unpremeditated, and was caused solely by the barbarities of the soldiers, the unfeeling and brutal Rothes, who presided at the examination, frequently called out to the executioner, to "give him the other touch."*

The fate of M'Kail, who was subjected to the Trial and same diabolical torture, excited execution of peculiar sympathy. He had been Hugh M'Kail. licensed as a preacher in 1661, when he was only twenty years of age, and was remarkable for piety, learning, and eloquence. The Latin verses which he composed in prison show that he possessed a liking for letters, and a knowledge of classical literature. Having given mortal offence to the ruling powers by a sermon, in which he declared that "the Church of Scotland had been persecuted by a Pharaoh on the throne, a Haman in the State, and a Judas in the Church," he found it necessary to retire to the Continent on the passing of the Act of Conformity. Returning to Scotland in 1665, he lived for some time in obscurity; but, being in Galloway at the time of the rising, he joined the insurgents. He was not present, however, at the battle of Rullion Green, having been obliged by fatigue and ill health to quit the unfortunate band during their march to Edinburgh. Two days afterwards he was captured by some dragoons at a place called Braids Craigs. He was twice examined before the privy council respecting the cause of the insurrection, and having, like Neilson, declared that it arose entirely from the exactions and cruelties of the military, it was resolved to put him to the question. He bore it with great firmness, and after ten strokes of the mallet solemnly protested, in the sight of God, that he could say no more though all the joints in his body were in as great torture as his poor leg. At the eleventh stroke the bone was splintered, and the poor sufferer swooned under the torment.† His behaviour in the interval before his execution was not only composed but cheerful.

His appearance on the scaffold (December 22) "excited such a lamentation," says Kirkton, "as was never known in Scotland; not one dry cheek upon all the street, or in all the numberless windows in the market-place." He ascended the ladder telling his fellow-sufferers not to be afraid, for every step was a degree nearer heaven. "The napkin being put over his face, he prayed a little within himself, after which he put up the cloth, saying he had one more word to speak, in order to show them the comfort he had in his death. And thus he said, 'I hope you have perceived no alteration or discouragement in my countenance and carriage, and as it may be your wonder, so I profess it is a wonder to myself; but I will tell you the reason of it. Besides the justness of my cause, this is my comfort, what was said of Lazarus when he died, that the angels did carry his soul to Abraham's bosom; so that, as there is a great solemnity here, of a confluence of people, a scaffold, a gallows, and people looking out of windows, so there is a greater and more solemn preparation of angels to carry my soul to Christ's bosom.'" He then concluded with that noble burst of eloquence which has been so often admired and quoted. "And now I leave off to speak any more to creatures, and begin my intercourse with God, which shall never be broken off. Farewell, father and mother, friends and relations; farewell, the world and all its delights; farewell, meat and drink; farewell, sun, moon, and stars! Welcome, God and Father; welcome, sweet Jesus Christ, the mediator of the new covenant; welcome, blessed Spirit of Grace, the God of all consolation; welcome, glory; welcome, eternal life, and welcome, death!"* Such was the impression which this address produced on the multitude of spectators, that on subsequent occasions recourse was had to the device of causing the trumpets to be blown, and the drums to be beaten, in order to drown the last words of the sufferers.

The effect of these savage cruelties was so injurious to the government, that at length an order was sent by the king to the privy council commanding them to stay the executions, and to inflict on the prisoners banishment instead of death; and it is affirmed that his majesty's letter was withheld from the council by the two archbishops, Sharp and Burnet, until all who had been condemned were executed. The fact that such a letter was written has been pertinaciously denied by the apologists of Sharp, but is now clearly established by the records of the privy council, which expressly mention "his majesty's letter giving orders for sending such of the said prisoners as were guilty to the plantations."† This memorable document, however, is nowhere given in these records. During the six months in which the privy council were engaged in the investigation of the Pentland rising, there were no fewer than eleven letters written to them by the king, and fourteen royal proclamations issued. The † M'Kail was evidently the prototype of Macbriar, in "Old Mortality," and the torture scene is portrayed with great power in the 36th chapter of that work; but the author has very unfairly sought to lessen the horror and indignation of the reader, by representing Macbriar as deeply implicated in the proposal to murder Henry Morton.

* Kirkton, p. 252.

* Kirkton, p. 255; Wodrow, vol. i. p. 255.

† Privy Council Records of 11th July, 1667.

whole of these documents are inserted at full length, but the letter commanding the executions to be stayed is nowhere to be found. It is not easy, therefore, to evade the conclusion that the absence of this all-important document from the record can only be accounted for by a consciousness, on the part of the two prelates, that "its date would expose the abuse of trust, and outrage on humanity, of which they had been guilty."

As if public vengeance were not yet satiated, the horrors of martial law were now added to the atrocities of judicial punishment. A body of troops, under Generals Dalzell and Drummond, were sent to scour the shires of Ayr, Dumfries, and Galloway, and to complete the ruin of the presbyterian party. General Tom Dalzell, as he was usually termed, has earned an unenviable notoriety in the history of this period. He was a soldier of some reputation, but of ferocious character and eccentric habits. He had borne arms under the Czar of Muscovy, in whose service his natural brutality had been greatly aggravated, and he had become inured to torture, pillage, and blood. He had returned home after the Restoration, and was appointed commander-in-chief of the royal forces in Scotland. His beard, which he had never shaved since the execution of Charles I., hung down white and bushy almost to his girdle; and his whole appearance and dress were so singular that when he repaired to London, which he generally did once or twice every year, to kiss the king's hand, he was usually followed by a great crowd of boys.* He detested the covenanters "with a perfect hatred," and his innate severity, hardened by a long course of barbarous service, led him to inflict the most shocking cruelties on the defenceless peasantry without distinction of sex or age.† He fixed his head-quarters for some time at Kilmarnock, where he confined so many prisoners in a low, damp, narrow dungeon that they were unable either to sit or lie, and were not allowed even the most necessary accommodation to preserve cleanliness or decency. A countryman, who was accidentally at Lanark when the insurgents passed through that town, was brought before Dalzell, and because he would not, or rather could not, give information as to the persons he had seen there, he was condemned to be executed on the spot. The poor man earnestly begged one night's reprieve to prepare for eternity, but the brutal commander caused him to be instantly shot, stripped naked, and left lying on the ground. In a fit of intoxication, he caused a son to be hanged, because he refused to discover where his father was concealed. On another occasion he caused a woman, who was supposed to be accessory to the escape of a fugitive covenanter, to be cast into a hole filled with toads and reptiles, where she miserably died. His subordinates strove to rival the brutalities of their commander. One of them, Sir William Bannatyne, caused a woman, who was accessory to her husband's escape, to be tortured by fixing lighted matches between her fingers for several hours, till she lost one of her hands, and died in a few days from the effects of this barbarous treatment.*

The soldiers were permitted to indulge, without check, in every kind of military excess; rapes, robberies, and murders, were committed with impunity; fines were imposed with increased severity; and the needy and unprincipled gentry united with the soldiers in gathering the rich harvest of plunder.† So fierce did the persecution become that many of the covenanters in the western and southern districts abandoned their homes, and sought refuge in caves and coal-pits, while the more timid and temporising conformed to the episcopal system. "All the people," says Burnet, "were struck with such terror that they came regularly to church; and the clergy were so delighted with it that they used to speak of that time as the poets do of the golden age. They never interceded for any compassion to their people, nor did they take care to live more regularly, or to labour more carefully. They looked on the soldiery as their patrons; they were ever in their company, complying with them in their excesses, and (if they were not much wronged) they rather led them into them than checked them for them."‡

It was an old and sound maxim of the Scottish tribunals, adopted from the Roman law, that no person could be convicted and accused in his absence. So strictly was the letter of this law adhered to, that when persons were accused of treason after death, their bones were presented at the bar;§ and when decrees of forfeiture were pronounced in parliament against the absent, no sentence was passed till the accused had an oppor-

Condemnation of those accused in their absence.

* See Captain Creighton's Memoirs, by Swift.

† It is proper, however, to mention one instance, which shows that Dalzell, in spite of his savage brutality, was not altogether unsusceptible to humane impressions. Captain Paton of Meadowhead, who at Pentland had fought sword in hand with Dalzell, was taken prisoner after the battle of Bothwell Bridge, and carried to Edinburgh. A soldier having upbraided him with being a rebel, he mildly replied, "I have done more for the king than perhaps you have done," referring to the battle of Worcester, where he had fought for Charles. Dalzell, overhearing the conversation, said, "Yes, John, that is true," and, turning to the soldier, struck him with his cane, and told him he would teach him other manners than to abuse such a prisoner. He then expressed his sorrow for Paton's situation, and said he would have set him at liberty if he had met him on the way, and promised that he would yet write to the king for his life. Paton thanked him, but added, "You will not be heard." It is said that he obtained a reprieve for Paton, but he was not able to save his life. Fountainhall says Paton was willing to take the test, but a quorum of the privy council could not be then got to reprieve him. "No doubt," as the editor of Fountainhall remarks, "a quorum could have been easily collected for the purpose of hanging the prisoner." See Scott's Worthies, p. 567; and M'Crie's Miscellaneous Works, pp. 307, 308.

* Naphtali; Wodrow, vol. i. p. 264, et seq.

† Sir William Bannatyne, when asked on one occasion by a farmer for what he was fined, frankly replied, "Because you have gear [riches, property], and I must have a part of it."

‡ Burnet, vol. i. p. 349.

§ See supra.

tunity of being heard in their own defence.* It was now resolved, however, to alter this salutary rule, for the purpose of reaching the more opulent of the covenanters, who had withdrawn from the storm, and whose estates, therefore, could not be legally confiscated. The servile judges of the court of session, having been previously tampered with by the officers of state, gave the sanction of their authority to this flagrant violation of law and equity, and declared that the court of justiciary might pronounce sentence of death and forfeiture in the absence of the accused.† So feeble, it has been justly remarked, are the restraints of law, however positive the enactment, in the hands of a venal or corrupt bench. Accordingly, twenty-two gentlemen, accused of being connected with the Pentland rising, were arraigned in their absence, and condemned to be executed whenever apprehended; and their estates were conferred on Dalzell and Drummond, and the officers of state. The next parliament confirmed these infamous proceedings of the justiciary court, and enlarged its powers.

A change in the administration took place in 1667, and brought with it a temporary respite to the harassed covenanters. The dismissal of Clarendon, who had been the abettor of the worst measures that had disgraced the Scottish government, deprived the prelates of a staunch and powerful supporter; and an attempt which they made to strengthen their influence by continuing the standing army, and rigorously enforcing that act, hastened their downfall. Rothes, whose indolence and licentiousness fitted him, according to his own account, better than any nobleman in Scotland to be his majesty's representative, had for some time been declining in credit; and the appearance of a Dutch fleet in the Forth, while the army was in the west and the commissioner himself in the north, was dextrously laid hold of by Lauderdale to accelerate his dismissal. He was accordingly deprived of all his offices, except the chancellorship, which was continued to him for life. Sir Robert Murray, who was distinguished for his love of literature and science, as well as for his moderation and integrity, was appointed justice-clerk. The management of the treasury was also committed to him, along with two other commissioners, Tweeddale and Kincardine. The standing army was ordered to be reduced, greatly to the dissatisfaction of the prelates, and of the officers who had shared with the council the plunder of the unfortunate presbyterians.‡ Sharp was disgraced, and ordered to retire to his diocese. Turner and Bannatyne were brought to trial for their extortions and cruelties, and dismissed his majesty's service; and the latter was in addition fined two hundred pounds sterling, and banished the kingdom.* An indemnity also was offered to all concerned in the Pentland insurrection, except those who had been outlawed, on condition of their subscribing a bond to keep the peace; those who refused to do so were to be banished the realm. In spite of this favourable change of affairs, however, the presbyterians still continued to be harassed by numerous petty persecutions; and those who held or frequented conventicles were severely fined if discovered.

The apostasy and perfidy of Sharp had brought him into universal odium, and the severity of the measures which he had originated or recommended had excited the deepest hatred of the party whom he had persecuted with such vindictive malignity. It is not surprising that one of the sect, a fanatical preacher named James Mitchell, should have resolved to take personal vengeance on the prime mover of all their oppressions. Mitchell had been involved in the insurrection at Pentland, and, having been excepted from the indemnity, had taken refuge for some time in Flanders. He returned secretly to Scotland in the beginning of 1668, and being continually harassed by his fears of being taken, he adopted the desperate resolution to avenge his own wrongs, and those of the nation, on the head of the archbishop, whom he regarded as his personal enemy. He, therefore, with the greatest coolness and deliberation, one afternoon in July, 1668, discharged a pistol loaded with three balls at Sharp as he was sitting in his coach in the High Street of Edinburgh. He missed the archbishop, but one of the bullets severely wounded Honeyman, Bishop of Orkney, who was in the act of entering the carriage at the moment. A cry was raised that a man was killed; but when the populace were informed that it was only a bishop, the assassin was allowed to walk deliberately away without interruption;—a striking proof of the detestation in which Sharp and his brethren were held. Mitchell coolly walked to his lodgings, changed his dress, and, returning to the street, mingled with the crowd; and, in spite of the utmost exertions of the council, was not discovered till six years after. Burnet, who "thought it decent to go and congratulate" the archbishop on his narrow escape, says, "He was much touched with it, and put on a show of devotion upon it. He said, with a very serious look, 'My times are wholly in thy hands, O thou God of my life!' This," adds the bishop, "was the single expression savouring of piety that ever fell from him in all the conversation between him and me."†

This foolhardy and criminal attempt was entirely Mitchell's own act, and was undertaken without advice or concert with any other person; but it was

* "In all times coming the hail accusation, reasoning, writs, witnesses, and either probation and instruction whatsoever of the crime (of treason) shall be alleged, reasoned, and deduced to the assise in presence of the party accused in face of judgement, and na otherwise."—11th Parl. James vi. chap. xci.

† Sir George Mackenzie's Laws and Customs in Matters Criminal, p. 59; Wodrow, vol. i. p. 286.

‡ Burnet, vol. i. pp. 350—355; Wodrow, vol. i. p. 275.

* Kirkton, p. 270, et seq; Wodrow, vol. i. p. 287.

† Burnet, vol. i. p. 400.

at first followed by increased severities against the presbyterians, who, without the slightest evidence, were charged with having been privy to the design. It seems, however, to have convinced Sharp himself of the necessity of adopting milder measures; and from this time he offered less opposition to the proposal, which was adopted in the following year, to grant an indulgence to a certain number of the ejected ministers. On the 7th of

Restoration of some of the ejected ministers to their churches.

June, 1669, a royal letter was issued, through the influence of Tweeddale, authorising the council to permit those ousted ministers who had conducted themselves peaceably to return to their former charges, if vacant, and to preach and administer ordinances there as before; or if their old parishes were occupied, to allow patrons to present them to other vacant churches. Of such reinstated clergymen, all who should receive collation from the bishop, and attend the meetings of the church courts, were to be entitled to the full stipend; those who should refuse to acknowledge the bishop's authority were to be entitled only to the manse and glebe, with an allowance out of a fund made up of all the vacant stipends. But they were strictly enjoined not to allow any of the inhabitants of the neighbouring parishes to attend upon their ministry, without the consent of their own pastors. The rest of the indulged ministers, whose former parishes were not vacant, had small salaries of about twenty pounds a year allotted them, till they should otherwise be provided for.*

Only forty-three of the ejected ministers, not without hesitation, availed themselves of the indulgence; and their ministrations were attended by a considerable number of the wealthier presbyterians, who readily availed themselves of the permission thus granted them, to worship God according to the forms which they approved; but the great body of the people loudly denounced the indulgence as implying an acknowledgment of the royal supremacy, and of the Erastian powers claimed by the privy council over the Church, and as imposing unlawful restrictions on ministerial liberty. The clergy who accepted the indulgence were accused of time-serving and Erastianism, and received the appellation of "the king's curates," as the episcopal clergy were commonly denominated "the bishop's curates." The opponents of the indulgence were not only superior in numbers, but in energy of character, and in their hold upon the sympathies of the people; and resolutely preferred hardships and dangers, to comfort and ease purchased by what they regarded as a compromise of principle.

The royal letter which contained the indulgence declared, that as all pretexts for conventicles were now taken away, the laws against those who frequented these meetings would henceforth be enforced with all severity; and the acceptance of the indulgence by a portion of the ejected clergy subjected those who conscientiously refused the boon to still more severe persecutions than before. The penalties of fine and imprisonment were rigorously inflicted in numerous instances both against the recusant clergymen and people, but without effect: conventicles and field-meetings became more frequent and numerous than ever.

The indulgence was nearly as much disliked by the bishops as by the more decided —disliked also presbyterians. As it permitted by the bishops, presbyterian ministers to hold benefices in the Church without acknowledging episcopal authority, it was regarded by the prelates as an encroachment on their privileges, and fraught with danger to their power. Special alarm was felt by the episcopal clergy in the west, where the presbyterians were very numerous; and the synod of Glasgow drew up a strong remonstrance against it, on the ground of its illegality and the fatal effects which it was likely to produce in the Church. On hearing of this remonstrance the council became alarmed, and commanded Archbishop Burnet to give up the papers, which they condemned as illegal, unwarrantable, and dangerous. Burnet was called before the council, and enjoined to confine himself to Glasgow, and shortly after he was compelled to resign his office, which was conferred on Leighton.

The attempt to conciliate the presbyterians was not yet laid aside; and in 1670, 'The bishops' finding that in spite of all the evangelists, stringent measures they had adopted against non-conformity the parish churches were still deserted, the council, by the advice of Leighton, resolved to send a deputation of the ablest of the episcopal clergymen to itinerate in the western districts, and endeavour to persuade the people to return to the bosom of the Established Church. The chief member of the deputation, who were popularly termed the "Bishops' Evangelists," was the celebrated Gilbert Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury. "The poor of the country," he says, "came generally to hear us, though not in great crowds;" but he admits that this attempt to convert the presbyterians proved a complete failure. "We were indeed amazed," he adds, "to see a poor commonalty so capable to argue upon points of government, and on the bounds to be set to the power of princes in matters of religion: upon all these topics they had texts of Scripture at hand, and were ready with their answers to anything that was said to them. This measure of knowledge was spread even among the meanest of them, their cottagers, and their servants."*

The failure of this effort to conciliate the staunch covenanters of the west did not prevent the pious and amiable Leighton from making another attempt to reconcile the presbyterians to the episcopal system. Up to this period, no material innovation had been made in the rites and ceremonies of the Church. In some churches portions of the liturgy were read, but the prayers were still in most cases extempore; the sacraments were administered without kneeling or the sign of the cross; the surplice was not worn by the ministers; and the offensive customs introduced by James VI.

* Kirkton, pp. 288, 289.

* Hist. vol. i. p. 451.

Leighton's were not generally revived. The scheme of accommodation—main objection to the existing system was connected with the government of the Church; and Leighton proposed to obviate this by his famous "Accommodation," the object of which was to be allowed to declare at their first sitting that they submitted to the presidency of the bishop, for the sake of peace, with a reservation of their opinions respecting the lawfulness of such an arrangement. Once in three years provincial synods were to be held, in which complaints against the prelates might be received, and censure administered. This well-meant scheme of comprehension bore the impress of the character of its benevolent author, but it gave satisfaction to neither party. The presbyterians regarded it as a snare to entrap them into subjection to the prelates, and an acknowledgment of the main principles of episcopacy;* and they believed that the result of their acceding to the proposed accommodation would be, not the amalgamation of the two systems, but the total extinction of presbytery as soon as the present generation had passed away. The prelates, on the other hand, were quite as unwilling to throw open the doors of the Established Church as the presbyterians were to enter within its pale.

—its failure. The primate and his brethren regarded the scheme as a plot to subvert episcopacy, and to establish presbytery on an Erastian foundation. After several fruitless conferences, therefore, "the treaty was broken off, to the amazement of all sober and dispassionate people, and to the great joy of Sharp and the rest of the bishops."†

After a lapse of eight years a new parliament Meeting of parliament. was assembled at Edinburgh, October 16th, 1669, and Lauderdale was sent down as commissioner. The Estates displayed their usual servility, and passed without scruple two acts fraught with the most dangerous consequences to the civil and ecclesiastical liberties of the nation. By the first it was declared that the external government and regulation of the Church was an inherent right of the crown, and that whatever directions his majesty should send to his privy council respecting ecclesiastical matters, meetings, and persons, should have the force of law. The other act regarded the militia, which had already been embodied and armed by the council, in consequence of the offer of an army by the late parliament. The conduct of the council was approved of. It was ordered that twenty-two thousand men should be constantly armed and regularly disciplined, and that on receiving orders from the council they should march into any part of the king's dominions whenever the royal authority or honour might require them; and Lauderdale boasted, and not without reason, of the services he had rendered the king by procuring these enactments. His majesty's absolute supremacy over the Church was now established; and he might, by his royal edict, establish popery or any other system of religion he thought proper. A numerous and well-disciplined force, also, was ready at his call to march into England in support of his arbitrary designs against the ecclesiastical and civil liberties of his kingdom. These laws were highly agreeable to the king, and so greatly increased Lauderdale's credit at court, that he now became virtually sole minister for Scotland. On his return to London he was cordially welcomed by the king; his services were rewarded by his admission to a share in the English government; and he became a member of that infamous cabinet known by the name of the Cabal, which was at that time plotting the overthrow both of the independence and liberties of the kingdom.

An attempt was at this time made by Tweeddale to bring about a union of the two kingdoms. The project was utterly inconsistent with Lauderdale's policy, but, in order to serve his own selfish ends, he pretended to give it encouragement, and commissioners for a treaty of union were accordingly appointed by his majesty. Various conferences on the subject were held in London, but the English commissioners insisted that only a limited number of the Scottish members should be admitted into the united parliament, proportioned to the wealth and population of the country: while the Scottish commissioners refused to accede to a union unless the Scottish Estates were preserved entire, and the two parliaments incorporated into one. The project, therefore, fell to the ground.

Abortive proposal for the union of the two kingdoms.

During the recess of parliament the council issued a severe proclamation against conventicles, and instructed the military to disperse the meetings, and to apprehend the ministers and principal persons present. When the Estates reassembled (July 28th, 1670) several most oppressive and sanguinary acts were passed against all who refused to conform to the Established Church. Ruinous fines were imposed upon those who attended presbyterian meetings, even in houses; and husbands were rendered responsible for their wives, fathers for their children, masters for their servants, and magistrates for the burghs in which such meetings were held. Field conventicles subjected the minis-

Severe acts against conventicles.

Acts respecting the royal supremacy, and the militia.

* Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 177.

† Burnet, vol. i. p. 514.

ters to the penalty of death and confiscation of goods; the hearers to double fines, and the penalties of sedition; and house-meetings were to be regarded and punished as field conventicles, if any persons were assembled without at the doors or windows. A reward of five hundred marks Scotch was offered to those who should seize the offenders, or an indemnity for their slaughter. It was also enacted that whoever refused to give information on oath against delinquents should be punished by imprisonment, arbitrary fines, and banishment to the plantations; and the privy council was enjoined to enforce the act with the utmost rigour against all who declined to turn informers against their friends. The Roman Catholics were expressly exempted from the penalties inflicted upon protestants who dissented from the episcopalian church. The young Earl of Cassillis was the only member of this servile parliament who had the courage to vote against these infamous enactments. It is said that Charles himself was dissatisfied with the statute which denounced the penalty of death upon the preachers who frequented conventicles, but he took no steps to procure its repeal.

The sanguinary edicts of the parliament and council against conventicles entirely failed to suppress these meetings. The more they were forbidden and punished, the more they multiplied and grew; and they were now attended by many who, according to the customs of the times, bore arms for the purpose of repelling force by force in case they should be attacked. In course of time the communion also was celebrated in the open fields, and was attended by vast multitudes of sufferers, to whom such seasons were indeed "times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." The following

A covenanters' beautiful description of a communion. nanters' communion, held in 1677 at East Nisbet, in the Merse of Berwickshire, from the pen of the Rev. John Blackadder, who was present on the occasion, gives a very striking picture of the character and feelings of the men whom their enemies have delighted to portray as violent and vulgar fanatics:—

"It was rumoured that the Earl of Home intended to assault the meeting with his men and militia, and that parties of the regulars were coming to assist him. He had profanely threatened to make their horses drink the communion wine, and trample the sacred elements under foot. Most of the gentry there, and even the commonalty, were ill-set. Upon this we drew hastily together about seven or eight score of horse, on the Saturday, equipped with such furniture as they had. Pickets of twelve or sixteen men were appointed to reconnoitre and ride towards the suspected parts. Single horsemen were dispatched to greater distances, to view the country and give warning in case of attack. The remainder of the horse were drawn round to be a defence at such distance as they might hear sermon, and be ready to act if need be. Every means was taken to compose the multitude from needless alarm, and prevent, in a harmless defensive way, any affront that might be offered to so solemn and sacred a work. Though many, of their own accord, had provided for their safety—and this was the more necessary when they had to stay three days together, sojourning by 'the lions' dens and the mountains of leopards'—yet none had come armed with hostile intentions.

"We entered on the administration of the holy ordinance, committing it and ourselves to the invisible protection of the Lord of Hosts, in whose name we were met together. Our trust was in the arm of Jehovah, which was better than weapons of war, or the strength of hills. The place where we convened was every way commodious, and seemed to have been formed on purpose. It was a green and pleasant haugh, fast by the water-side [the Whitadder]. On either hand there was a spacious brae, in form of a half round, covered with delightful pasture and rising with a gentle slope to a goodly height. Above us was the clear blue sky, for it was a sweet and calm Sabbath morning, promising to be indeed one of the days of the Son of man. There was a solemnity in the place befitting the occasion, and elevating the whole soul to a pure and holy frame. The communion tables were spread on the green by the water, and around them the people had arranged themselves in decent order. But the far greater multitude sat on the brae face, which was crowded from top to bottom—full as pleasant a sight as ever was seen of that sort. Each day, at the congregation's dismissing, the ministers with their guards, and as many of the people as could, retired to their quarters in their several country towns, where they might be provided with necessities. The horsemen drew up in a body till the people left the place, and then marched in goodly array behind at a little distance, until all were safely lodged in their quarters. * * * * From Saturday morning, when the work began, until Monday afternoon we suffered not the least affront or molestation from enemies, which appeared wonderful. At first there was some apprehension, but the people sat undisturbed, and the whole was closed in as orderly a way as it had been in the time of Scotland's brightest noon. And truly the spectacle of so many grave, composed, and devout faces must have struck the adversaries with awe, and been more formidable than any outward ability of fierce looks and warlike array. We desired not the countenance of earthly kings; there was a spiritual and divine Majesty on the work, and sensible evidence that the great Master of assemblies was present in the midst. It was indeed the doing of the Lord, who covered us a table in the wilderness in presence of our foes; and reared a pillar of glory between us and the enemy, like the fiery cloud of old that separated between the camp of Israel and the Egyptians—encouraging to the one, but dark and terrible to the other. Though our vows were not offered within the courts of God's house, they wanted not sincerity of heart, which is better than the reverence of sanctuaries. Amidst the lonely mountains we remembered the words of our Lord, that true worship was not peculiar to Jerusalem or Samaria; that the beauty of holiness consisted not in consecrated buildings or material temples. We remembered the ark of the Israelites, which had sojourned for years in the desert, with no dwelling-place but the tabernacle of the plain. We thought of Abraham and the ancient patriarchs who laid their victims on the rocks for an altar, and burnt sweet incense under the shade of the green tree.

"The tables were served by some gentlemen and persons of the gravest deportment. None were admitted without tokens,* as usual, which were distributed on the Saturday, but only to such as were known to some of the ministers, or persons of trust, to be free of public scandals. All the regular forms were gone through. The communicants entered at one end, and retired at the other, a way being kept clear to take their seats again on the hill-side. Mr. Welsh preached the action sermon,† and served the first two tables, as he was ordinarily put to do on such occasions. The other four ministers, Mr. Blackadder, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Riddell, and Mr. Rae, exhorted the rest in their turn; the table service was closed by Mr. Welsh‡ with solemn thanksgiving; and solemn it was, and sweet, and edifying to see the gravity and composure of all present, as well as of all parts of the service. The communion was peaceably concluded, all the people heartily offering up their gratitude, and singing with a joyful voice to the Rock of their salvation. It was pleasant, as the night fell, to hear their melody swelling in full unison along the hill, the whole congregation joining with one accord, and praising God with the voice of psalms.

"There were two long tables, and one short across the head, with seats on each side. About a hundred sat at every table. There were sixteen tables in all, so that about three thousand two hundred communicated that day."§

The government of Lauderdale, though very acceptable to the court, was exceedingly distasteful, not only to the covenanters, but to many of the nobility and gentry who had no sympathy with the presbyterian faith. His character, indeed, had now undergone a marked change for the worse, partly no doubt from the deteriorating effect of the flagrant corruption and debauchery which prevailed at court, but partly also from the influence of Lady Dysart,* whom he afterwards married, only six weeks after the death of his wife. This notorious personage was a woman of great beauty, wit, spirit, and accomplishments; but extravagant in her expenditure, venal and rapacious, and possessed of a violent temper and a restless ambition. She soon acquired a complete ascendancy over Lauderdale; and by her combined violence and rapacity contributed greatly to degrade his character and government in public estimation. She insinuated into his dark and irritable mind suspicions of his colleagues; induced him to quarrel successively with his best friends; and thus removed every check upon his depraved and furious passions. To supply her profusion and satisfy her ravenous greed of money, the most important offices were put up for sale; and the privy council and the courts of justice were filled with her husband's creatures. He himself was high Monopoly of offices of state council, secretary of state, one of by Lauderdale's creatures— commissioner, president of the governor of the Castle of Edinburgh, agent at court for the royal burghs, and one of the four extraordinary lords of session. His brother, Lord Hatton, was treasurer-depute, master of the Mint, and one of the lords of session. Atholl was privy seal, justice-general, captain of the king's guard, and one of the extraordinary lords of session; so was Kincardine, who was also one of the commissioners of the treasury, and vice-admiral of Scotland. The revenues of the crown were engrossed by Lauderdale and his friends, and, though augmented by an assessment of seventy-two thousand pounds, were insufficient to support his profusion. His salary was sixteen thousand pounds sterling, and the donations which he received amounted to twenty-six thousand pounds. A most lucrative source of income was the penalties imposed upon those who were found guilty of attending conventicles. The fines exacted from the nonconformists within particular districts were frequently farmed out, or assigned to Lauderdale's dependents. Atholl, the justice-general, received for —their rapacity. his own share, in one week, the sum of nineteen hundred pounds sterling. Upwards of thirty thousand pounds sterling were extorted from ten gentlemen, in the county of Renfrew, in the course of three years. One of these, Sir George Maxwell, for three years' absence from the parish church, attendance at a conventicle during that time, and for three baptisms in his family, had incurred penalties amounting to nearly nine thousand pounds sterling. One gentleman whose wife had attended a field-meeting, and another, who was a youth from school, compounded for fifteen hundred pounds. The estates of those who withdrew from the country to escape persecution

* Small pieces of metal given to those who were judged fit to be admitted to the communion, in order to guard against the admission of improper persons.

† The sermon which precedes the communion.

‡ The ejected minister of Irongray, and great grandson of the illustrious reformer John Knox.

§ Crichton's Memoirs of Blackadder, pp. 197—206; McCrie's Sketches, vol. ii. pp. 142—147. It may be proper to state that the five ministers who officiated at this communion all belonged to the moderate party among the presbyterians, and yet four of the number were afterwards imprisoned on the Bass Rock merely for preaching at conventicles; and Mr. Blackadder, the writer of the above description, died there of a disease contracted in that damp and unwholesome prison.

* Lady Dysart was the eldest daughter of William Murray, who was page and whipping-boy to Charles I., and in that capacity had to bear the chastisement which his young master merited from his tutor.

were plundered and wasted, and not a few were completely ruined.

In every department of the government the most Corrupt of shameless corruption was openly practised. The judges were either ignorant or unprincipled. Merchants, country gentlemen, and collectors of revenues, were elevated to the bench; and bribery, favouritism, and partiality prevailed to an extent hitherto unequalled even in Scotland. In spite of repeated statutes forbidding the practice under heavy penalties, protections from arrestments for debt were openly sold for five pounds a-piece. The judiciary court was infected with the same abuses as the civil courts, and was, if possible, more subservient to the crown. The nobility, proud and needy, and most of them immersed in debt, had sunk into the condition of mean and obsequious dependents of Lauderdale; while the greater part of the gentry, in whom the spirit of piety and independence still lingered, were excluded by the obnoxious tests from all offices of trust or influence.

The trade and commerce of the country, too, Depressed state were in the same deplorable condition. The most oppressive monopolies were created for the benefit of Lauderdale and his creatures. A prohibitive duty was imposed on foreign salt; the monopoly of the home trade was conferred on Lord Kincardine, and this necessary article immediately rose to five times its original price, while the quality was deteriorated and the supply deficient. The importation of brandy was prohibited; and Lord Elphinston, the son-in-law of Hatton, obtained a large revenue by granting licenses to importers. The monopoly of tobacco was in the same way conferred on Sir John Nicholson. Sir Andrew Ramsay, the provost of Edinburgh, in consideration of a handsome present made to Lauderdale, received a gift of the duties on ale and wines consumed within the city. And others of the duke's relatives, dependents, and even servants, were enriched by similar donations. The silver coinage issued by the Mint, of which Hatton was governor, was both adulterated and reduced in weight; and a light and spurious copper coinage was sent forth by the same authority, to the great injury of trade.

Meanwhile the same arbitrary policy was pursued in England, though more covertly, under the auspices of the notorious Cabal ministry, of which Lauderdale was a member. By a secret treaty made with the French king, Charles, become the pensioner of France, bound himself to make public profession of the Roman Catholic religion, and to assist Louis in his designs against Holland, and in his claims to the Spanish monarchy; while Louis, on the other hand, promised to assist in suppressing any insurrection that might break out in England. The measures of Lauderdale, therefore, were peculiarly acceptable to the king and his ministers at this juncture. They fondly hoped that Scotland would be a convenient instrument in promoting their arbitrary and unpatriotic schemes, and that the army which the Scottish parliament had placed at the king's service would support his nefarious attacks upon the religion and liberty of England. This expectation was fortunately disappointed. The want of funds to carry on the war with Holland compelled the king to convoke the English parliament. The domestic and foreign policy of the Cabal was instantly assailed by the House of Commons, and the dismissal of Buckingham and Lauderdale from his majesty's councils was demanded with such vehemence, that Charles was compelled to yield. The Cabal was dissolved, and its policy abandoned for a time; but Lauderdale preserved his place in the royal favour, and still continued to be minister for Scotland, with which the English parliament could not interfere.*

On his return to Scotland, Lauderdale found, to his great surprise, that his arbitrary and rapacious conduct had excited a strong opposition even in the servile parliament of that country. As soon as the Estates assembled, the king's letter was read recommending great severity in the execution of the laws against the nonconformists, and requesting an additional subsidy for the prosecution of the Dutch war. It was proposed that a committee should be appointed to return an answer in the usual submissive form, when, to the astonishment and chagrin of the commissioner, the Duke of Hamilton † demanded that the grievances of the nation should first be inquired into. His proposal was instantly supported by a large number of members, who rose in succession and complained of the monopolies of brandy, salt, and tobacco; of the administration of justice, and the adulteration of the coin. A warm debate ensued, which Lauderdale endeavoured by haughty menaces to stop. But Sir Patrick Hume indignantly demanded whether or not this was a free parliament; and the ministerial supporters, daunted by this firm procedure adjourned for a week.

At the next meeting Lauderdale endeavoured to conciliate the opposition by abolishing the monopolies. Hamilton and his friends, however, declared they could not be satisfied with this concession unless the author of these odious measures and his minions were removed from office, and punished; and they insisted on the necessity of providing security against such abuses in future, of placing upright judges on the bench, and reforming the Mint; but, strange to say, they did not venture to mention the persecution of the presbyterians—the worst of the grievances under which the nation laboured. Lauderdale, finding that in the present temper of the Estates there was no hope of managing them, adjourned the parliament for two months. The malcontent nobles hastened to court to lay their grievances before the king. As the Duplicity of English parliament had renewed the king. their demand that the duke should be removed from all his offices, Charles was forced to use conciliatory language; and he dismissed Hamilton and his associates with the strongest assurances that the redress of their grievances should be left to the parliament. Relying on his majesty's word, they hastened down amidst a tremendous snow-storm, to concert with their friends in Scotland their mode of procedure for the coming session. On their arrival the parliament

* Scotland's Grievances under the Duke of Lauderdale; Wodrow, vol. i., Appendix; M'Kenzie, p. 242, et seq.; Burnet, vol. ii. p. 84.

† This nobleman was a younger son of the powerful family of Douglas, who had married the daughter of James, first Duke of Hamilton, beheaded for his adherence to Charles I., and obtained along with her the vast estates of the family, and was created Duke of Hamilton for life.

Dissolution of met, but was immediately ad- the parliament. journed by the king's command. It was shortly afterwards dissolved, and no other meeting of the Estates was ever called during Lauderdale's administration.

Indignant at this breach of faith, Hamilton and his friend again proceeded to court, but all their attempts to obtain redress were fruitless. They were insidiously required to state their complaints in writing, which would have rendered them liable to the penalties of leasing-making; and as they could not confide in the king's assurance that their memorial would not be brought against them as a crime, their grievances were communicated only by an anonymous letter, which was of course disregarded. Their complaints, however, were published in pamphlets, and led to a renewal of the demand on the part of the English parliament for Lauderdale's removal from office. A committee was also appointed to inquire into the act authorising the Scottish army to march where-soever the privy council of Scotland should appoint; and the design of the Cabal to call in the aid of the Scottish forces to support their nefarious designs against the Protestant religion, and the liberties of England was fully brought to light. But Lauderdale was a minister after the king's own heart, and this attack upon his policy served only to fix him more firmly in the confidence of his sovereign. He was confirmed in his offices, and all his opponents, except Hamilton, were expelled from the council.

A private lawsuit between two noblemen, the —his tampering Earls of Dunfermline and Callender with the courts of law—1674. of triumphing over the bar, as completely as he had done over the opposition of the nobles. Dunfermline, an uncle of Lauderdale, attempted, by an appeal to the courts of law, to strip Callender, who had married Hamilton's cousin, of half his estate. Lauderdale espoused the cause of his relative with his habitual violence, and determined before his departure for London to influence the decision of the court in his favour by his vote and presence on the occasion as an extraordinary lord of session. The case was hurried on and decided in spite of a recent statute which expressly provided that every cause should be heard according to the date of its enrolment. By advice of Callender's counsel, an appeal to parliament was immediately lodged. This attempt, though not without precedent, was keenly resented both by Lauderdale and the judges. The appellant's counsel, Lockhart and Cunningham, two of the most eminent lawyers of the day, were required to swear to the advice they had given, and on their refusal to comply with this arbitrary mandate, and to disavow the right of appeal, they were expelled from the bar along with fifty advocates who adhered to them, and were banished by the king's orders twelve miles from the capital. After a year's exile they were permitted to return on submitting themselves to the king's mercy, and making an evasive acknowledgment that the decisions of the court of session were not suspended by an appeal to parliament.*

During their exclusion from their professional duties, the refractory advocates took measures to secure their Interference with the rights of the burghs. interests with the burghs, that they might be chosen to represent them in parliament. But when the convention of burghs met in Edinburgh, they received a royal mandate enjoining them to revive an obsolete regulation against the return of commissioners not engaged in trade as their representatives. The reply of the convention respectfully adhering to the existing mode of election was condemned as seditious, and the provosts of Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Jedburgh, were imprisoned and fined. Twelve of the chief magistrates of the capital were declared incapable of all public office, though their only crime had been their want of subserviency to Ramsay, then provost, a bankrupt trader, and a creature of Lauderdale's, who for a bribe had appointed him a lord of session. Twelve noblemen or gentlemen, opponents of the commissioner, were ejected from their houses, which were converted into garrisons for the suppression of conventicles; and Sir Patrick Hume, for protesting again this illegal procedure, was imprisoned and declared incapable of any public trust. Lord Cardross was fined in a thousand pounds, because some peasants had rescued his chaplain from a troop of soldiers who had illegally seized him, and had broken into his lordship's house by night and insulted his lady. A still more shameful act of oppression was perpetrated by Sharp and the privy council, in the case of Baillie of Jerviswood. Carstairs, a spy of the primate's, had inveigled Kirkton, a clergyman, and the author of the "Church History," into his lodgings, and endeavoured, under pretext of a warrant from the council, to extort money for his release. When Baillie, Kirkton's brother-in-law, discovered his detention, he burst open the door of the house, and released him. To punish Baillie for his interference, Sharp antedated a warrant for Kirkton's arrest, and having obtained the signatures of nine councillors to it, delivered it to Carstairs. Supported by this forged document, this infamous person procured the conviction of Baillie for obstructing him in the discharge of his duty; and that gentleman was amerced in five hundred pounds and imprisoned for a year. The Duke of Hamilton, the Earls of Morton, Dumfries, Kincardine, Lords Cochrane and Primrose, were removed from the council for their opposition to this scandalous sentence.*

* Mackenzie, p. 217; Laing, vol. ii. p. 70.

During the attack upon Lauderdale's administration the persecution of the covenanters was somewhat relaxed, but as soon as all opposition was surmounted, the commissioner, stimulated by the loud complaints of the prelates, the jealousy of the sovereign, and his own savage temper, resumed his oppressive measures with greater severity than ever. Many of the attendants on intercommuning refused to appear before the privy council, knowing that they were certain to be imprisoned; recourse was, therefore, had to an obsolete mode of oppression termed "letters of intercommuning," by which the absent were outlawed, and all who held intercourse with them were rendered liable to the same punishment. Even their nearest relatives were forbidden to "furnish them with meat, drink, house, harbour, victuals, or any other thing useful or comfortable to them; or to have intelligence with them by word, writ, or message, or any other manner of way." At least seventeen thousand persons, of both sexes, including gentlemen, clergymen, and even ladies of rank, were by this iniquitous act deprived of the protection of the law, and excluded from the benefits of society. Multitudes were shut up in the fortress on the Bass Rock, and left there neglected and forgotten for years, to pine in want and wretchedness. Some were even sold as recruits for the French service.†

The primate was generally regarded as the author, or instigator, of the most cruel and oppressive measures against the covenanters; and an event which occurred at this time showed that (as a bitter enemy of the presbyterians is forced to admit) Lauderdale "was as much destitute of truth and honour as of lenity of justice," and the remark may with equal truth be applied to Sharp.

Arrest of James Mitchell—Six years after the attempt which Mitchell made upon his life in the High Street of Edinburgh, the primate happened to notice a man who was observing him narrowly, and dreading lest another attempt at assassination should be made, caused him to be arrested and examined. Two loaded pistols were found upon his person; and, as Sharp imagined he recognised the features of the assassin who had formerly attempted his life, Mitchell was concluded to have been the author of that attempt. There was no proof against him, however; and Sharp, anxious to ascertain the extent of his danger, offered to procure the prisoner's pardon if he should confess his guilt and make a full disclosure of his accomplices, and the extent of the conspiracy against the archbishop. Mitchell, however, knew with whom he had to deal, and refused to make any acknowledgment of guilt unless he had official assurance of pardon. He was produced before the council, but they failed to extract a confession from him. At length the lord-chancellor took him apart, and declared, "upon his great oath and reputation," that he would save Mitchell's life if he would confess the fact. The result of the negotiation is thus stated in the minutes of council dated 12th March, 1674. After —his confession mentioning Mitchell's refusal to sion on promise confess, it goes on to say, "But of pardon— all having retired, apart with one of the said committee, he did then confess, upon his knees, he was the person—upon assurance given him by one of the committee as to his life, who had warrant from the lord-commissioner and council to give the same—and did thereafter freely confess before all the lords that were on the said committee, that he shott the said pistoll at the said archbishop, and did subscribe his confession in presence of the said committee, which is also subscribed by them."* Mitchell's defence of his conduct affords a very instructive proof that the shocking misgovernment of the country had a powerful tendency to produce a complete disorganisation of society, and the subversion of all right notions respecting social and moral obligations. Sharp, he argued, was labouring with all his might to destroy the covenant, while he, on his part, was waging a war of extermination against prelacy; they were, therefore, declared enemies to each other; and, there being no capitulation between them, they were entitled, like hostile soldiers, to use every opportunity to slay each other. Sir William Sharp, the primate's brother, and his servants, had seized Mitchell without any warrant, and this illegal proceeding he regarded as a perfectly natural and justifiable act of hostility, and just the counterpart of his own attack upon the archbishop. Sir William, he says, "desired I would excuse him, seeing what he had done was on his brother's account, which excuse I easily admitted, seeing that he thought himself obliged to do what he did to me without law or order, in the behalf of his brother—much more," he adds, with the curious moral obliquity which his reasoning throughout displays, "was I obliged to do what I did, in the behalf of many brethren whose oppression was so great, and whose blood he caused to be shed with such abundance."

The council believed that there was a widely ramified conspiracy against the primate, and expected, through Mitchell's confession, to obtain a discovery

* Burnet, vol. ii. pp. 111, 118, 156.

† Ibid., vol. ii. p. 167; Wodrow, vol. i. pp. 427, 432, 441.

* Burnet, vol. i. p. 176; Burton's Criminal Trials, vol. ii. p. 226.

of the entire plot; when, therefore, they found that only one person, then dead, had been privy to the design, their rage and disappointment knew no bounds. They next produced the prisoner before the justiciary court, and required him to renew his confession, intending, it is said, to punish him by imprisonment, or mutilation of his right hand. But on being placed at the bar, one of the judges, who hated Sharp, in passing to the bench whispered to the prisoner, "Confess nothing unless you are sure of your limbs as well as of your life." Alarmed at this hint, Mitchell refused to repeat, or judicially subscribe, his confession, knowing that without this it could not be brought forward as legal evidence —promise of against him. The council, taking pardon offence at this refusal, declared revoked—that since Mitchell had retracted his confession they likewise recalled their promise of pardon—"the meaning of which," says Burnet, "was this, that if any other evidence was brought against him the promise should not cover him; but it was still understood that this promise secured him from any ill effect by his own confession."*

Whatever was the ultimate intention of the council, Mitchell was sent to prison, and remained there two years loaded with irons. In 1676 he was again brought before the council, under pretence that he had been concerned in the Pentland insurrection; but he still resolutely adhered to his refusal to become his own accuser. The president, pointing to the instruments of torture, said, "Ye —he is put to see what is on the table before ye.

the question. I shall see if that can cause ye do it." But Mitchell's resolution continued unshaken. The executioner was then called in, and having bound the prisoner in an arm-chair, asked which of his legs he should put in the boot. He was told that he might take his choice. "Since the judges have not determined," said the indomitable prisoner, stretching forth his right leg, "take the best of the two; I willingly bestow it in the cause for which I suffer." The executioner then enclosed the leg and knee within the boot, or case, and placing a wedge between the knee and the edge of the machine, took a mallet in his hand, and, at a signal from the president of the council, brought it down upon the wedge, and forcing it between the knee and the boot, occasioned the most exquisite pain. After every stroke the tortured wretch was asked if he had any more to say, but his unvarying reply was, "No more, my lord." At the ninth stroke he fainted through agony. "He is gone, he is gone!" exclaimed the executioner. On recovering from his swoon, the prisoner was carried off to prison in the chair in which he had suffered, and was afterwards sent to the Bass, where he lay two years longer in confinement.

To obtain from Mitchell any confession of a conspiracy having now become hopeless, he was at length brought to trial in January, 1678, at the instigation of Sharp, for the offence committed ten years previously. The only means of obtaining a conviction against him was by the production of his confession before the privy council; but as the promise of safety with which that confession was accompanied was inserted along with it in the minutes of the privy council, the original document could not be produced; and a garbled extract, attested by Rothes, the chancellor, and other members of the council, was brought forward and read. Rothes, Hatton, Lauderdale, and Sharp were then suc-
Perjury of Rothes, Hatton, Lauderdale,
and Sharp.

sively adduced as witnesses in support of the prosecution; and each on being cross-examined solemnly denied on oath that any assurance of safety had been given to the prisoner. Mitchell's counsel, George Lockhart, an eloquent and skilful lawyer, produced and read a copy of the act of council containing the promise of pardon, which had been given to him privately by the justice-general, Primrose; and urged that the original record should be laid before the court. But the demand was overruled at the instance of Lauderdale, who declared in his usual imperious strain, that the books of council contained the secrets of the king, which no court should be permitted to examine.* The prisoner was accordingly condemned to be executed, and sentence of death was pronounced upon him, by the very judge who had furnished his counsel with the copy of the act of council containing the promise of pardon.

As soon as the court rose, the four lords went into the council chamber, and examined the books of council where the evidence of their perjury was recorded. The fact could not be denied; but each, as is usual in cases of detected villany, endeavoured to shift the blame from himself. An attempt was made to screen the council at the expense of the clerk, who wrote the minutes; but he luckily discovered that the act of council was drawn up by Nesbit, the late lord-advocate,† from whom the council proposed to levy a heavy fine. But he in turn brought forward nine privy councillors, who offered to swear that an assurance of life had been confirmed to Mitchell by the council before it was engrossed in its records, and also produced a letter written by Hatton, in which the promise of life was distinctly mentioned.‡ In these circumstances Lauderdale

* Primrose had recently been removed from the office of clerk-register, a lucrative place, which was nominally given to another, but the profits were seized by the rapacious Duchess of Lauderdale. He was made justice-general to stop his mouth. Probably his dissatisfaction with this change induced him to send privately a copy of the act of council to Lockhart, though he wanted the honesty and courage to attest the fact in open court.

† Nesbit was removed from office because he was rich and had refused a sum of money to the Duchess of Lauderdale.

‡ After the downfall of Lauderdale, William Noble of Dunnottar, a member of the parliament which met in 1681,

* Burnet, vol. i. p. 177; M'Crie's Sketches, vol. ii. p. 152. Mitchell in his own account of his treatment describes "the lords justiciaries obscuring themselves by putting their hands upon their faces, and leaning upon their hands upon the table." "Surely," as Mr. Burton remarks, "anything more humiliating to the position of a bench of British judges than that they shrink from the eye of the accused, could scarcely be recorded."

was inclined to grant the prisoner a respite; but the unrelenting primate insisted upon the execution of the sentence as the only way of securing his own life against a repetition of similar attempts.

Mitchell's execution. "Then," said Lauderdale, with his usual coarseness and profanity, "let Mitchell glorify God in the Grass-market;" and he was executed accordingly.* This unhappy man was undoubtedly a dangerous fanatic, whose crime, if it had been legally proved against him, merited condign punishment; but his fault is almost lost sight of in the complicated perjury, cruelty, and treachery displayed by the members of the government who brought him to the scaffold, and which rendered them the objects of universal horror and execration.†

At this period Lauderdale was called up to London, and there is strong reason to believe that one object of his visit was to concert means for affording the king a pretext to keep on foot a powerful army to bring England into subjection; and the infamous expedient adopted was to excite a revolt among the Scottish presbyterians.‡ With this view, on Lauderdale's return to Scotland, the gentlemen throughout the gentry, out the western counties, where and refused.

Bonds demanded were required to enter into bonds that their families, domestics, tenants, and all persons residing on their estates should not withdraw from their parish churches, or attend conventicles, or succour brought a charge of perjury against Hatton before the lords of the articles, and produced Hatton's own letter in support of the charge. At the same time, Lord Bargeny accused him of suborning witnesses to give false evidence against his life. But both charges were suppressed by the Duke of York.

* Burnet, vol. ii. p. 80; Wodrow, vol. i. pp. 375–377, and 510–513; Burton's Criminal Trials, vol. ii. pp. 220–234; MS. Narrative of the Trial in the Library of the Writers to the Signet, Edinburgh. Sir George Mackenzie, the new lord-advocate, was Mitchell's counsel in the former trial, and, therefore, could not have been ignorant of the promise to preserve the prisoner's life; yet, in attempting to vindicate the conduct of the government, he has had the baseness to affirm that "the registers of council were produced, but nothing of a promise was made to appear by either." (Sir G. Mackenzie's Works, vol. ii. p. 343.) Whereas the records of the trial prove that the books of council were not produced; and these books, which are still in existence, do contain a promise of life to Mitchell, and furnish an incontestable proof of the perjury and treachery of the four members of the privy council, as well as of the unblushing profligacy of their apologist.

† Lord Fountainhall, whose leanings were strongly against the covenants, says, "The execution of Mitchell made a wonderful noise in the country, who generally believed the law was stretched to get his neck stretched; and satires and bitter verses immediately flew abroad like hornets, in great swarms, speaking much acrimony and an almost universal discontent. He was but a simple melancholy man, and owns the fact in the papers he left behind him as an impulse of the Spirit of God, and justifies it from Phinehas killing Cosbi and Zimri; and from that law in Deuteronomy commanding to kill false prophets that seduced the people from the true God. This is a dangerous principle, and asserted by no sober presbyterian. On the scaffold they beat drums when he began to touch the chancellor. The secret council would have given him an reprieve if the archbishop would have consented." — FOUNTAINHALL'S Historical Notices of Scottish Affairs.

‡ Wodrow, vol. i. p. 454; Dalrymple's Memoirs, vol. i. pp. 165, 182, 189.

field preachers, or persons intercommuned, under the same penalties which the delinquents themselves incurred. On the refusal of the greater part of the gentry to enter into bonds which they regarded as both illegal and impracticable, Lauderdale declared the western districts in a state of revolt; and by the express command of the king, English forces were directed to march to the Borders, a body of Irish troops to the opposite coast, and eight thousand wild Highlanders were brought down from the mountains to live at free quarters in the western counties, with full licence to plunder the defenceless inhabitants at their pleasure. These lawless savages, besides their usual weapons, were armed with spades, shovels, and mattocks, and with daggers made to fasten to the muzzles of their guns, iron fetters for binding their prisoners, and thumb-locks to compel them to answer any question proposed to them, and to discover their hidden money or goods. "The obnoxious counties," says an historian very friendly to the Stewarts, "were the most populous, and most industrious in Scotland. The Highlanders were the people the most disorderly, and the least civilised. It is easy to imagine the havock and destruction which ensued. A multitude not accustomed to discipline, averse to the restraint of laws, trained up in rapine and violence, were let loose amidst those whom they were taught to regard as enemies to their prince and to their religion. Nothing escaped their ravenous hands: by menaces, by violence, and sometimes by tortures, men were obliged to discover their concealed wealth. Neither age, nor sex, nor innocence afforded protection."* Their depredations extended even to pots, pans, gridirons, shoes, and every other portable article of household furniture or bodily clothing. Travellers were even stopped on the highway, and stripped of their clothes by these licensed banditti.† The labours of the field were suspended, as the farm horses were seized to transport their plunder to their highland fastnesses; and the most fertile districts in Scotland were converted into a wilderness. "Better, however," said Lauderdale, when he was informed of these ravages, "that the west bore nothing but windle-straws and sand laverocks,‡ than that it should bear rebels to the king."

Irruption of the Highland host.

A committee of the council accompanied the Highland host to enforce the bonds; but the gentry of the west still persisted in their refusal. The failure of his oppressive measures irritated the savage temper of Lauderdale almost to madness; and at a meeting of the council he bared his arms above the elbows, and swore by Jehovah that he would compel subscription to these bonds. Those who still refused were not only ignominiously deprived of their saddle-horses and arms, but were subjected to a novel mode of legal persecution.

Writs of law-burrows issued.

* Hume's History, chap. lxvi.

† Wodrow, vol. i. pp. 467–496.

‡ Dog's-grass and sand-larks.

THE GRASS MARKET.

Edinburgh

By the Scottish law any person who should make oath before a magistrate that he is apprehensive of violence from another, may obtain what is termed a writ of law-burrows, by which the individual from whom danger is apprehended is compelled to give security for his good behaviour. Lauderdale adopted the absurd expedient of causing his majesty to take out a general writ of law-burrows against his whole Scottish subjects, which at once betrayed the jealousy of the government, and rendered it ridiculous. Accordingly a bond of the peace was framed by which the subscribers became bound, under heavy penalties, neither to frequent conventicles themselves, nor to allow their families and tenants to be present at such unlawful assemblies, nor in any way to infringe the public peace. Thus an expedient of the law intended to protect the subject from personal danger was, by the most contemptible chicanery, converted into an engine of public oppression.* The landlords who subscribed the bonds were required to dismiss such tenants as they suspected of being favourable to conventicles, and no landlord was permitted to receive them on his estate, or to allow them an habitation, unless they brought a certificate of conformity from the parish minister. To prevent the unhappy sufferers from carrying their complaints to the foot of the throne, or escaping from a country in which the government had rendered existence all but intolerable, all noblemen and gentlemen were prohibited, under severe penalties, from leaving Scotland without express permission from the council.

The evident intention of these measures was to Detestable goad the people into insurrection; policy of the and on a false report that a rising government. had taken place, Lauderdale and his friends were unable to conceal their satisfaction. "On Valentine's day," says Burnet, "instead of drawing mistresses, they drew estates, and great joy appeared in their looks upon a false alarm that was brought them of an insurrection."† But the people seem to have been impressed with the opinion that the government had this object in view; and they bore with unexampled patience both the harassing enactments of the council, and the brutal excesses of the Highlanders, and suffered the spoiling of their goods, imprisonment, and torture without affording their oppressors any ground to accuse them of sedition or rebellion. In

Complaint spite of the stringent prohibition made to the of the council, fourteen peers and king— fifty gentlemen, including Atholl and Perth, two of the committee of council employed in the west, with the Duke of Hamilton at their head, repaired to London to lay their grievances before the king. They were refused an audience because they came without leave of the council; but, after a keen debate in the English House of Commons, they were ultimately heard in the presence of the cabinet. The proceedings of Lauderdale, however, were fully vindicated by Danby and the Duke of York; and at the close of the discussion Charles is reported to have said, "I perceive that Lauderdale has been —its reception. guilty of many bad things against the people of Scotland, but I cannot find that he has acted anything contrary to my interest"—a sentiment every way worthy of such a sovereign. Next day he wrote a letter to the privy council expressing his cordial approbation of all their measures.

Lauderdale took advantage of the absence of his opponents to summon a conven- Meeting of the tion of Estates at Edinburgh. The Estates— elections were managed by the government, and the nobles who remained at home were gained over by bribery,—thus the opposition so formidable in the former parliament was completely quelled in the present abject and servile assembly. In addition to the monthly assessments of six thousand pounds introduced by Cromwell, a sum of thirty thousand pounds a year was granted for five years to support additional troops for the suppression of conventicles; and a letter was sent to the king bestowing unqualified approbation upon Lauderdale's administration. The imposition —their of the assessment for the support servility. of the army excited great dissatisfaction among the presbyterians, not a few of whom refused to pay the tax—some because it was intended to enslave the country, others because it was levied for the purpose of suppressing the Gospel.

Meanwhile, so effectually had the Highland caterans performed their allotted task in ravaging and devastating the western shires, that their outrages had excited universal execration, and even their employers became at length alarmed at the consequences of their scheme. After enjoying three months' free quarters and Recall of the license, devouring the country Highland host. like a cloud of locusts, the mountaineers were, therefore, sent back to their native hills loaded with the spoils of the west.* But their place was supplied by a body of five thousand regular troops, who were distributed in garrisons over the obnoxious districts, and harassed them by their incessant exactions. This merciless and protracted system of oppression at length began to awaken a spirit of revenge among the peasantry, and a soldier who had been guilty of some more than usually brutal outrage was occasionally beaten, or even slain. But these few and isolated examples of retaliation were all thrown into the shade by the cruel vengeance inflicted upon the arch-persecutor Sharp. This un- General hatred happy man, one of the prime of Sharp. movers of the recent oppression and misgovernment of the country, and the merciless persecutor

* Wodrow, vol. i., Appendix, p. 182; Sir George Mackenzie's Works, vol. ii. p. 345.

† Burnet, vol. ii. p. 184.

* Kirkton, p. 390. Those who passed through Glasgow were stopped at the bridge, which was blockaded by the students of the University, and compelled to disgorge their prey before they were allowed to return to their native hills, as bare as they had come from them.

of his former associates, had long been the object of deep hatred on the part of the great body of the people. He was regarded not merely as a selfish, haughty, tyrannical prelate—a Judas—a treacherous and perjured apostate, but as a person of superhuman wickedness, an agent of the devil, who frequently appeared to him in a bodily shape.* A worthless fellow named Carmichael had been employed by the primate as one of his chief agents to prosecute the nonconformists in Fife, and by the cruel tortures which he had inflicted upon the wives, children, and servants of the intercommuned, that they might be compelled to reveal where their relations were concealed, had rendered himself so obnoxious to the covenanters that nine of their number, chiefly belonging to the class of small proprietors, resolved to inflict exemplary punishment upon him for his barbarities. Accordingly, on the 3rd of May, 1679, this exasperated band, headed by David Hackston, of Rathillet, and his brother-in-law, John Balfour of Burley, waylaid Carmichael near the town of Cupar; but, having been forewarned of his danger, he contrived to escape. Disappointed in their search for the instrument of so much suffering, they were about to separate, when a farmer's wife sent a boy to tell them that the archbishop himself was approaching, on his return from Edinburgh to St. Andrew's. In their excited and fanatical state of mind they instantly interpreted this incident as a divine call to "execute that justice which the law denied them," against the persecutor of God's people. "It was immediately suggested," says one of them, "that albeit we had missed the man we sought for, yet God had by a wonderful providence delivered the great and capital enemy of his Church into our hands, and that it was a visible call to us from heaven not to let him escape." They —his murder,

at Magus Moor—

accordingly pursued and overtook the primate upon Magus Moor, about three miles from St. Andrew's, and, having cut the traces, and disarmed and dismounted his attendants, they ordered him to come out of the coach. On his refusal they fired into the carriage, his daughter, who was seated by his side all the while, piteously imploring mercy. One of the assassins named Russell opened the coach-door, and ordered Sharp to come out. "I take God to witness," he added, "that it is not out of any hatred to your person, nor for any prejudice you have done or could have done me, that I intend now to take your life, but because you have been, and still continue to be, an avowed opposer of the Gospel and kingdom of Christ, and a murderer of his saints, whose blood you have shed like water."† At length, after being wounded by a sword thrust, the old man left the coach, and, creeping on his knees towards one of the band whom he recognised, said, "You are a gentleman—you will protect me!" But the person addressed turned away, saying, "I will not lay a hand upon you."* One of the assassins, probably Hackston, relenting, cried to the rest, "Spare those grey hairs!" Sharp himself poured out entreaties for life, promised them an indemnity, offered them money, and even engaged to lay down his office if they would but spare him. But he was in the hands of men who were steeled against his supplications by a passion stronger even than revenge. They reminded him of his promise to Mitchell, upbraided him as an enemy to God and his people, and then pierced him with innumerable wounds.† His daughter, who threw herself between her father and his murderers, and made the most frantic efforts to save his life, also received several wounds in the struggle. After rifling the coach of the arms and papers which it contained, the assassins rode off unmolested, leaving the lifeless and mangled body of their victim on the moor.

The perpetrators of this cruel and bloody deed were actuated solely by their own —disapproved fanaticism or revenge; but, of by the great might have been expected, their body of the act was nevertheless imputed to covenanters.
the whole presbyterian party, and was made the pretext for inflicting the most shocking cruelties on the covenanters. Some, indeed, of the more violent and desperate of the party exulted over the deed,

* Wodrow, vol. iii. p. 44. Russell states that it was to John Balfour, the primate said, "I will come to you, for I know you are a gentleman, and will save my life; but I am gone already, and what needs more!" Wodrow says Hackston was the person to whom these words were addressed. Hackston had refused to assume the office of leader, or to take part in the murder, on the ground that he had a private quarrel with the archbishop.

† Wodrow says that the archbishop could not be prevailed on to pray; but in the account of the murder published by the privy council, it is affirmed that the primate said, "I hope ye will give me some time to pour out my soul to God, and I shall pray for you;" and presently, falling on his knees, he said, "Lord, forgive them, for I do. Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." (Stephen's Life and Times of Archbishop Sharp, p. 600.) In the evidence given before the judiciary court there are furnished some graphic sketches of the murderers. Hackston is described as "a tall, slender man, black-haired and black-visaged, who had a brownish-grey horse, and a velvet cap; and for arms, a carbine, holster-pistol, and a broadsword." John Balfour of Burley was "a laigh [short], broad man, round ruddy face, dark brown hair." His relation, George Balfour of Gilston was "a broad, brownish, sett man; black, curling hair; lean faced, who had a white horse, and was armed with two side-pistols and a sword." Another of the party, Andrew Gillan, weaver in Balmerinoch, was described as "a little, broad, black man; broad, curling, bushy beard, who rode upon a white horse, and had three side-pistols on his right side, and a sword." The two "Henrysons," on the other hand, were "young, slender men—both young, fair men; the youngest, fairest and tallest, and the eldest slenderest." Sir Walter Scott has given a masterly portrait of Burley in "Old Mortality," but it is inaccurate in various important particulars. He imputes to Burley, as the prime motive of his actions, a deep spirit of religious fanaticism, whereas he was a blunt country gentleman and a resolute soldier, who made no pretensions to religion, and seems to have espoused the side of the covenanters on account of the civil, rather than the ecclesiastical, rights involved in the quarrel. "He was by some reckoned none of the most religious," says Howie of Lochgoin; and he was refused admission to the sacrament by the presbyterians in Holland. (See Review of the Tales of my Landlord, in Dr. Mc'Crie's Miscellaneous Writings, p. 326.)

* Wodrow's Analecta, vol. i. pp. 104, 105.

† See Russell's account of the murder of Archbishop Sharp, appended to Kirkton's History, p. 7; a very remarkable and instructive document.

William Alcock R.A.

H. Bourne

MURDER OF ARCHBISHOP SHARPE.

and regarded the assassins as the ministers of heaven appointed to execute vengeance on the enemy of God's people;* but by far the most numerous and respectable portion of the body unequivocally condemned the murder, although they might probably be at the same time of opinion that the relentless persecutor of the sect, whom he had deserted and betrayed, merited some such judgment as had overtaken him. We must not lose sight of the fact, however, that much of the guilt of this deed must be attributed to those statesmen whose atrocious policy had loosened the bands of society, and contributed not a little to confound in the minds of the great mass of the community the distinction between right and wrong.

A proclamation was immediately issued by the privy council denouncing the murder of Sharp as a deed, "which will spread horror and amazement in all the hearts of such as believe that there is a God or a Christian religion—a cruelty exceeding the barbarity of pagans and heathens;" and appointing special days and places at which all the inhabitants of the county of Fife are to assemble to be examined by the sheriff; and declaring that those who failed to appear "shall be reputed as accessory to the said crime." This was followed up by another and equally fruitless effort to discover and apprehend those who might be implicated in the deed. On a day appointed, all the males, of sixteen years old and upwards, were to be assembled in each presbytery; all the nonconformists were to be marked off by the clergy, who were to be present for the purpose, and each one of these was to be compelled to show how he was occupied on the day of the murder: "that such as cannot prove a good account of themselves be apprehended and their goods seized and secured till the issue of their trial: that such as shall be absent the said day be holden as probably guilty of the horrid act."† But such was the abhorrence in which both the government and the memory of Sharp were held, that, in spite of these stringent measures, though the murder was committed at mid-day, and was witnessed by several people; though the assassins were known, and there was a party of soldiers so near that they might have seen the horsemen pursuing the coach, or have heard the shots which they fired, yet only one of those engaged in the deed was ultimately seized, and he was merely a passive spectator. Their escape in such circumstances was, not unnaturally in that age, attributed to the special interposition of providence shielding those who had executed God's righteous judgment upon the oppressor of his Church.‡

The death of the primate furnished the privy council with a new test, which for some years proved a grievous source of annoyance to the covenanters.

It was not enough that a person suspected of nonconformity had no apparent or possible connection with the deed, or even that he should express his abhorrence of it, he was strictly interrogated regarding the principles in which it was supposed to originate, and pressed by question after question respecting abstract and complex doctrines, until it was scarcely possible for a man of any spirit to avoid saying something offensive. A refusal to answer was at once taken as an evidence of guilt, to be followed by imprisonment for trial, or, in many instances, by military execution on the spot. Measures were now taken for disarming the people. Attendance on a field conventicle was declared high-treason; and the officers in the west were invested with unlimited authority, and received strict orders to find out and disperse all such meetings at the point of the sword. On the other hand, the covenanters assembled in greater numbers, and in arms, for their own protection; and it became evident that a collision between them and the military was not far off.

Meanwhile Hackston and Balfour and their accomplices had escaped to the west, and secretly joined a body "of the chased and tossed men" in that part of the country. On the 29th of May, the anniversary of the Restoration, they assembled to the number of about eighty horse, entered the burgh of Rutherglen, near Glasgow, extinguished the bonfires kindled in honour of the day, publicly burned all the acts of the Scottish parliament in favour of prelacy, and affixed to the Cross a protest against all the proceedings of the government since the Restoration. The council took alarm at this bold and honest, but by no means prudent, step, and dispatched a body of troops to the west with full power to put to death all who were found in arms. The commander of these John Graham dragoons was the infamous John of Claverhouse. Graham of Claverhouse, a soldier of skill and courage, but cruel, rapacious, and profane, even beyond the cruel instruments hitherto employed by the privy council in the persecution of the hapless presbyterians. On his march to disperse a great field-meeting near Loudoun Hill, on the borders of Ayrshire, Claverhouse came suddenly upon the town of Hamilton, where he seized John King, chaplain to Lord Cardross, with fourteen others, bound them two and two, and drove them before him towards the scene of the conventicle.

Meanwhile the covenanters had assembled on Sabbath morning, the 1st of June, 1679, at a place called Drumclog, in the parish of Avondale, about a mile east from Loudoun Hill, and on learning the approach of Claverhouse and his dragoons, they resolved to await his attack. The country around is a dreary expanse of bare moorland, occasionally swelling into huge lumpish hills of dark heath, interspersed with quagmires and morasses, and intersected by deep gullies—the channels of mountain torrents, the wild craggy eminence called Loudoun Hill rising abruptly out of the immense waste. Such a tract afforded ample choice of excellent defensive positions; and when the royal troops, riding direct from Strathaven, crossed an eminence called Calder Hill, they found the covenanters posted to great advantage on a gently sloping declivity, covered in front by a morass and a deep ditch or natural gully. The foot, about two hundred in number, occupied the centre; and on each flank were drawn up about forty horsemen, consisting chiefly of petty landholders or farmers of the better class, with two or three old soldiers like Colonel Cleland at their head. They were untrained and but indifferently armed and mounted; but their courage and enthusiasm, and the strength of their position, supplied the want of arms and military discipline.

* See Hind let Loose, p. 153.

† State Trials, vol. x. p. 824.

‡ Burton's Criminal Trials, vol. ii. pp. 235–245.

The conflict was commenced by Claverhouse, who Battle of Drumlog. attempted to cross the marsh, and to come to close quarters with the covenanters, but was repulsed with considerable loss. The attempt was repeatedly renewed, but without success. Flanking parties were then detached to the right and left; but, after crossing the ditch, they were furiously assailed and cut to pieces by Balfour and Colonel Cleland. At this moment the covenanters were joined by the brave John Nisbet of Hardhill, whose house was in the vicinity of the battle-field, and perceiving that the crisis of the struggle had come, he cried out, "Jump the ditch and charge the enemy!" Balfour and he immediately crossed the morass with the cavalry, and Cleland with a portion of the infantry, and attacked the dragoons with such impetuosity that they were thrown into irretrievable confusion, and took to flight, leaving forty of their number dead on the field. Claverhouse himself had his horse shot under him, and narrowly escaped.* When the fugitives reached the village of Strathaven, the inhabitants attempted to cut off their retreat; but were repulsed with the loss of about a dozen killed and wounded. The victors have been accused of putting to death in cold blood the wounded and prisoners,† but the fact has been carefully concealed that the word given out by Claverhouse before the engagement was, "No quarter," and that he ordered the soldiers, who guarded King and his associates, to shoot them in the event of the troops being worsted. In the confusion of the flight, however, the prisoners fortunately made their escape. The dragoons who fell into the hands of the victors were dismissed unarmed, much to the displeasure of Hamilton, who acknowledges that he killed one with his own hand, and insisted that the other prisoners should be dealt with as they intended to have dealt with the covenanters.‡

* "With a pitchfork they made such an opening in my roan horse's belly that his guts hung out half an ell, and yet he carried me off a mile."—Letter of Claverhouse to the Earl of Linlithgow, in the Dundee Papers, published by the Bannatyne Club.

† See "Old Mortality," chap. xvii. Sir Walter has quoted at length the complaint of Robert Hamilton, that his men spared the lives of their prisoners contrary to his orders; but he makes no mention of the injunctions issued by Claverhouse, which his blood-thirsty troopers never failed to execute to the letter.

‡ See Howie's Faithful Contendings, p. 201; Wilson's

Claverhouse fled with all speed to Glasgow, and was pursued thither by the victorious covenanters, who made an Flight of Claverhouse to Edinburgh. attack upon the city; but were easily repulsed, leaving a number of wounded men in the streets, who were shamefully maltreated by the troopers. Claverhouse, however, soon after evacuated the city and withdrew his troops to Edinburgh, leaving the covenanters masters of the west country. Encouraged by their success, great numbers now flocked to their camp near Hamilton, and in a short time their ranks had swelled to upwards of six thousand men, among whom were eighteen of the intercommuned clergy and a number of the west country gentry. The command was assumed by Robert Hamilton of Preston,* a brave and zealous man, but narrow-minded, overbearing, and intolerant in the highest degree, and destitute both of the talents and military experience which such a position required. The forces under his command were chiefly raw and undisciplined countrymen; but their courage and enthusiasm rendered them formidable, and if they had been judiciously managed they might have offered a determined resistance to the royal army, and have obtained favourable terms for themselves and their friends. Unhappily, however, a spirit of dissension broke out among their leaders, and instead of combining against the common enemy they wasted their time in bitter disputes respecting the persons who should be admitted into their ranks. The bone of contention was the indulgence. None of the ministers present had accepted this boon, Discussions among the insurgents. they all regarded it as sinful; but the moderate party, including sixteen of the ministers, headed by Mr. Welsh of Irongray, who had been intercommuned for preaching in the fields for many years, resisted the proposal to condemn the conduct of those who had accepted the indulgence, and to exclude them from their ranks.

The extreme party, headed by two of the ministers, Messrs. Cargill and Douglas, Violence and folly of the extreme party. together with Hamilton and a considerable number of the lay leaders of the army, insisted that the acceptance of the indulgence should be expressly condemned in the proclamation they were about to issue, and that none should be admitted into their ranks who refused to join in this condemnation. In these insane disputes they wasted several precious weeks, which ought to have been spent in active preparations to meet the enemy. Mainly through the influence of Hamilton and his fellow officers the violent and extravagant views of the extreme party obtained the ascendancy, and in consequence a considerable number of the more moderate quitted their ranks in disgust.

True and Impartial Account of the Persecuted Presbyterians in Scotland, p. 8.

* He was brother of Sir William Hamilton of Preston, to whose title and estates he would have succeeded if he had not refused to acknowledge the right of William and Mary (uncovenanted sovereigns) to the throne.

Division of Chamberlain's Troops.

London Hill.

upon which the cavalry look their stand.

SCENE OF THE BATTLE OF DRUMCLOG.

The Morass in which the Cavalry stuck is now drained—it was below the White Cottage.

ROVER'S BRIDGE.

A. McIlroy

W. L. Lawrence

Meanwhile the intelligence of the rising had excited alarm in London, and the Duke of Monmouth, the king's natural son, was sent down to assume the command of the army in Scotland, and endeavour to restore order. At the head of a well-disciplined army of ten thousand men, with a complete train of field-artillery, and accompanied by Lords Livingston, Claverhouse, and Dalzell, he marched in quest of the insurgents, and on Saturday, the 21st of June, reached the village of Bothwell, on the banks of the Clyde, opposite their encampment. Early on the morning of the 22nd, a deputation, consisting of Ferguson of Caitloch, a gentleman of landed fortune, and David Hume, a clergyman, waited on Monmouth, and laid before him a "Remonstrance" and supplication, stating the grievances under which the covenanters laboured, and demanding the free exercise of their religion, a free General Assembly, and a free parliament. The duke received them with courtesy, but refused to treat unless they first laid down their arms, and submitted to the mercy of the king. He allowed them half an hour to decide on his offer. But the camp of the insurgents was still, even at this critical moment, the scene of vehement controversy. Some of them were engaged in a fierce dispute respecting the old theme—"the black indulgence;" others were clamorously insisting that the present officers should be dismissed, and new ones appointed in their room, who had not temporised in any way with the corruptions of the times, and the answer of Monmouth served only to aggravate the fierce-

The battle of Bothwell Bridge. The scene of confusion and clamour which the disorderly mass exhibited was at once humiliating and instructive, and portended but too clearly the ruin which was about to overtaken their cause. Still the position which they occupied was strong and well chosen, and might have been made good by a small body of resolute men against a very superior force. In front was a deep and rapid river, which at this spot was crossed by a high, steep, and narrow bridge, having, according to the old fashion, a gateway in the centre.* The left bank, on which the insurgents were posted, was lined with thickets of alder and hazel, and two or three houses, affording excellent cover for the defenders. A strong party, under Hackston and Hall of Haughead, was posted at the bridge, while Balfour and Captain Nisbet with their foot and horse defended the bank of the river. The assault was conducted by Lord Livingston at the head of the English foot-guards, who strove to force the gates of the bridge, which the covenanters had barricaded with stones and logs of timber. But Hackston maintained his post with courage and constancy, and column after column of the enemy was driven back with great loss by the well-sustained fire of the insurgents; while the troops under Burley and Nisbet repulsed and threw into disorder a detachment of the royal army which attempted to ford the river above the bridge. The defence was obstinate and protracted, and seemed not unlikely to be in the end successful. But at this critical moment the ammunition of the defenders of the bridge began to fail. Message after message imploring supplies and reinforcements was dispatched to the main body of the covenanters, who remained inactive on the open field in the rear, but not the slightest attention was paid, either to commands or entreaties, by the wrangling and disorderly mob, who, in the words of Bishop Burnet, seemed "to have neither the grace to submit, the courage to fight, nor the sense to run away." It is said that a solitary barrel at last arrived, which on being opened was found to be filled with raisins instead of powder. The English guards at length made good their footing on the bridge, burst open the portal gate, and threw the beams and stones by which it was barricaded into the river. Hackston and his resolute band of followers, their ammunition completely expended, and every support denied them, were overpowered by numbers, and compelled to abandon the important post which they had so nobly defended. The way being thus cleared, the royal army slowly, and with their cannon in front, defiled along the narrow bridge, and formed in line of battle on the southern bank. No attempt was made by the covenanters to interrupt this slow, as well as dangerous, movement; but at the very first discharge of the duke's cannon their untrained horse wheeled and rode off, breaking and trampling down the ranks of the infantry in their flight. Their whole army was instantly defeated.

Monmouth generously exerted himself to stop the effusion of blood; but Claverhouse, burning with revenge for his defeat at Drumclog, made great slaughter among the unresisting fugitives. About four hundred fell in the battle and the pursuit. About twelve hundred of the infantry who remained in a body a little apart from the rest threw down their arms, and surrendered at discretion. An attempt was made by Burley to rally the fugitives in the streets of Hamilton; but while urging them to stand to their weapons, his sword-arm was broken by a musket-ball, and fell powerless at his side. "May the hand be withered that shot that shot!" exclaimed the indomitable homicide; "I can fight no longer."† Not contented with killing the fugi-

* The gateway and gate have long been removed, as well as the house of the keeper; and in 1826 the bridge was widened, 22 feet being added to the original 12; the road was straightened and made level, and the appearance of the spot greatly changed.

* Dalzell, who soon superseded Monmouth as commander-in-chief, is said to have upbraided the duke publicly with his lenity, and to have wished that his commission had come before the battle; and then, as he expressed himself, "These rogues should never more have troubled the king or country." Charles himself is reported to have said to Monmouth that if he had been there, the government should not have been troubled with prisoners. (See Burnet, vol. ii. p. 269; Cunningham, vol. i. p. 44; Laing, vol. ii. p. 101.)

† Burley found a refuge in Holland, and died at sea on his voyage to Scotland shortly before the Revolution.

tives, the ruthless dragoons scattered themselves over the neighbourhood, and put to death in the fields and public roads all whom they suspected of being presbyterians, though many of them had never been near the field of battle.*

Upon his return to London, Monmouth succeeded in obtaining an act of indemnity for the insurgents; but as the framing of the act was committed to Lauderdale, he contrived to insert so many limitations that its object was in a great measure defeated. The two ministers, King and Kidd, whom the covenanters had rescued at Drumclog, were recaptured and brought to trial: and though they proved that they had taken no part in the rising, and were not present at Bothwell Bridge, that they had been forcibly detained among the insurgents, had refused to preach for them, and had urged them to lay down their arms and return Treatment of the prisoners. to their obedience,—they were, nevertheless, cruelly tortured with the boots, and then condemned and executed at Edinburgh.† Five of the common prisoners were put to death on Magus Moor, and their bodies hung in chains on the spot where the primate was killed, though none of them were implicated in his murder. The rest of the prisoners, amounting to about twelve hundred, were marched to Edinburgh tied two and two, and confined in the Greyfriars Church-yard. Here they remained closely watched by sentinels for five months, sleeping among the graves during the night, with no covering to shelter them from the weather, and often treated with great brutality by their guards. A few of them contrived to make their escape; some died in prison; a portion, on acknowledging the rising to be rebellion, and the archbishop's death murder, and signing a bond never again to take up arms against his majesty, were at last released; the remainder, amounting to two hundred and fifty-seven, were condemned to be banished, and sold as slaves in the island of Barbadoes. The ship in which they were embarked was wrecked on the coast of Orkney, and the captain, a papist named Patterson, who had treated them with great cruelty during the voyage, after securing his crew, ordered the hatches to be shut upon the unhappy prisoners, who but for this might easily have been saved. About two hundred of them were drowned, the remainder made their escape through a hole in the deck, which one of the sailors, in spite of the captain's orders, opened with an axe. But their sentence of banishment was mercilessly carried out, and they were sold as slaves to the plantations in Jamaica and New Jersey.

The persecution of the unhappy covenanters now

Increased persecution of the covenanters—waxed hotter than ever. No means of oppression were left untried by the vile crew to whose tender mercies the country was abandoned, and the most shocking cruelties were perpetrated often on innocent persons by the soldiers who scoured the country in search of the fugitives from Bothwell Bridge. Many of the wanderers were driven by the severity of this persecution to take refuge in remote wildernesses, on the summits of lonely mountains, in sunless glens and dark morasses, in “dens and caves of the earth, being destitute, afflicted, tormented, of whom the world was not worthy.” Men and women of unblemished character, and guilty of no offence but that of adherence to truth, and obedience to conscience, were hunted down like wild beasts. “They suffered,” says Defoe, “extremities that tongue cannot describe, and which heart can hardly conceive of, from the dismal circumstances of hunger, nakedness, and the severity of the climate; lying in damp caves, and in hollow clefts of the naked rocks, without shelter, covering, fire, or food; none durst harbour, entertain, relieve, or speak to them upon pain of death. Many for venturing to receive them were forced to fly to them, and several put to death for no other offence. Fathers were persecuted for supplying their children, and children for nourishing their parents; husbands for harbouring their wives, and wives for cherishing their own husbands. The ties and obligations of the laws of nature were no defence; but it was made death to perform natural duties, and many suffered death for acts of piety and charity, in cases where human nature could not bear the thoughts of suffering it. To such an extreme was the rage of these persecutors carried.”*

The systematic and cruel persecution to which they were subjected, and the scenes —effect of this on their minds and tempers—by which they were daily surrounded, excited in the minds of some the fiercest enthusiasm, and made them a prey to the darkest superstitions.† Others were so exasperated and maddened by the brutal treatment of the government and its emissaries, that they now made an open renunciation of their allegiance. The great majority of the suffering presbyterians were staunch supporters of monarchy, and had no sympathy with republican or democratic principles. They took up arms simply for the defence of the protestant religion and presby-

* Memoirs of the Church of Scotland.

† Many of these superstitions, as might have been expected, referred to their cruel persecutors and the visible judgments which they alleged to have overtaken them. Sharp was said to be a sorcerer, and to have had intercourse with the devil in a bodily shape; Claverhouse was believed to be proof against leaden bullets; of one of the persecutors it was reported that his bowels gushed out; the tongue of another swelled in his mouth so that he remained speechless till he died; the bodies of some rotted away piecemeal; the wine they were about to drink was turned into congealed blood, &c., &c. See “God's Judgment on Persecutors,” passim. Towards the close of the persecution a small sect of about thirty persons arose, named Gibbites from their leader, John Gibb, an insane sailor, of Bo'ness. They consisted chiefly of women, and adopted the most extravagant opinions and practices. They protested against all kind of toll, custom, and tribute, and undertook a pilgrimage to the Pentland Hills, where they remained for some days expecting to witness the total destruction of Edinburgh, which their leader had predicted. (See Walker's Biograph. Presbyter., vol. ii. pp. 16–21.)

* Wodrow, vol. ii., book iii., chaps. ii. iii.; Burnet, vol. ii. pp. 267–270; Cloud of Witnesses; Scottish Worthies. Bishop Skinner calls Monmouth the unnatural son of Charles, because he did not exterminate the insurgents.

† Naphtali, pp. 427–437.

terian government, and of their civil rights and liberties, and they did not resort to this extreme measure until every other mode of obtaining redress had been closed against them. But though they had suffered intolerable oppression, "contrary to all law and humanity," at the hand of an arbitrary and tyrannical government, they did not consider themselves warranted to renounce their —they were allegiance to it in civil matters. In not guilty of their "dying testimonies" they rebellion. solemnly protested their innocence of the crime of treason or rebellion. "We declare," said the Pentland sufferers, "in the presence of God, before whom we are now ready to appear, that we did not intend to rebel against the king and his just authority, whom we acknowledge for our lawful sovereign. But this is our rejoicing, the testimony of our conscience, that we suffer not as evil-doers, but for righteousness, for the Word of God and testimony of Jesus Christ, and particularly for our renewing the covenants, and in pursuance thereof defending and preserving ourselves by arms against the usurpation and insupportable tyranny of the prelates, and against the most unchristian and inhuman oppression that ever was enjoined and practised by unjust rulers upon free, innocent, and peaceable subjects."* It is impossible to condemn the conduct of the men who resisted such intolerable oppression without, at the same time, condemning the principles on which our present constitution rests, as well as the conduct of our ancestors, who expelled the Stewarts

Views of from the throne. Now, however, the extreme a portion of the more extreme pres- party. byterians, goaded almost to madness by the treatment they had received, boldly avowed maxims subversive of the existing government, and declared that Charles, by his perfidious violation of his coronation oath, and his persecution of the faithful adherents of the covenant, had forfeited all right to their allegiance. A party of these men, headed by the celebrated Richard Cameron and Donald Cargill, wandered for some time up and down the country holding armed meetings among the hills. On the 22nd of June, 1680, they affixed to the market cross of Sanquhar a declaration disowning Charles Stewart as their lawful sovereign for his perjury, breach of the covenant, and tyranny, and denying the Duke of York's right to the succession.† The government, provoked at this bold deed, immediately took vigorous measures to hunt down this little band of Cameronians, as they were called after their leader, and for several weeks they were chased through the wilds of Dumfries and Ayr. At length, in July, they were surprised at a lonely desert place, called Airdsmoss, near Muirkirk, Skirmish at Airdsmoss. by a body of dragoons commanded by a violent persecutor named Bruce of Earlsball. The wanderers, knowing that they had no mercy to expect, resolved to fight, although they were ill armed and greatly inferior in numbers. On the approach of the enemy, Richard Cameron offered up a prayer, in which he three times made use of the memorable words, "Lord, spare the green, and take the ripe." Then, turning to his brother Michael, he said, "Come, let us fight it to the last, for this is the day that I have longed for, and the death that I have prayed for—to die fighting against our Lord's avowed enemies, and this is the day we will get the crown." After a short, but desperate conflict, the Death of Richard Cameron. covenanters, overpowered by numbers, were all either killed or taken prisoners. Cameron and his brother died fighting with heroic courage, back to back; but Hackston of Rathillet, less fortunate, was severely wounded and taken prisoner. Richard Cameron's head and hands were cut off, and with shocking barbarity were presented to his father in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, with the taunting inquiry if he knew to whom they belonged; "O yes," said the poor old man, taking them and kissing them, "they are my son's—my own dear son's! Good is the will of the Lord, who cannot wrong me nor mine, but has made goodness and mercy to follow us all our days." The relics of the martyred youth were then fixed on the Netherbow Port, with the hands stretched out in the attitude of prayer. "There," said one of the persecutors, "there's the head and hands that lived praying and preaching, and died praying and fighting."*

Hackston, who was taken prisoner at Airdsmoss after a desperate resistance, was Barbarous treatment of Hackston— a gentleman and a scholar of great talents and accomplishments, and under happier auspices might have been the benefactor and ornament of his country. He was carried, faint and bleeding, before Dalzell, who threatened to roast him because he was not satisfied with his answers to some questions which he put; and with characteristic brutality refused to allow his wounds to be dressed, and ordered him to be put in irons and chained to the floor of his prison. In a day or two he was conveyed to Edinburgh, and made his entry by the foot of the Canongate sitting on a horse, with his face backward, accompanied by three of his friends on foot and bound to a goad of iron, with Richard Cameron's head carried on a halbert before him. One of the prisoners expired as he entered the city, the others were conveyed to the castle. Hackston had been present at the assassination of Sharp, though he took no part in the deed, and, it is said, even remonstrated against it; he had besides adopted the views of Cameron and Cargill, and the council gave orders that he should be treated with peculiar —his defence on severity. When brought to trial his trial— he declined the jurisdiction of the court, and disowned the authority of the king, in whose name it was held, because it had set itself in opposition to Jesus Christ. The council, he said, were all murderers, who had “not only tyrannised over the Church of God, but had also grinded the faces of the poor, so that oppression, perjury, and bloodshed were to be found in their skirts.” He resolutely persisted in his refusal to plead, but was of course found guilty and condemned to be executed. Although he was so enfeebled by wounds as to be unable to sustain the application of torture, the sentence was carried into effect with the most —horrible mode of his execution.

* Naphtali, pp. 306—311.

† An unprinted draught of a paper embodying similar views was found on the person of Henry Hall of Haughead, in Teviotdale, when he was apprehended at Queensferry by the governor of Blackness Castle, on information furnished by the curates of Carriden and Bo'ness. Hall was accompanied by Cargill, and was mortally wounded in generously aiding the escape of his friend. The Queensferry Paper, as it was called, was used by the government against all suspected of presbyterianism.

* Biograph. Presbyter., I. p. 205; Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 133—144; Walker's Life of Cameron, pp. 114—119; M'Crie's Sketches, vol. ii. p. 193.

horrible barbarity. First his arms were cut off; then he was drawn by a pulley to the top of the gallows, and suffered to fall down again three times with all his weight on the scaffold; while still alive, his heart was torn out of his body by the executioner, who stuck it on a knife, held it up to the crowd, exclaiming, “This is the heart of a traitor!” and then threw it into a fire prepared for the purpose. His body was then quartered, the head affixed to the Netherbow, and the other members exhibited at St. Andrew’s, Burntisland, Leith, and Glasgow. No friend was permitted to attend this unhappy gentleman in his last moments; but he endured with the most heroic courage these revolting cruelties, the bare recital of which makes the blood run cold.*

Donald Cargill, one of the most revered leaders of the extreme party, had hitherto escaped the eager search of the government, and still continued boldly to avail himself of every opportunity of Cargill excom-municates the king and his courtiers—

preaching. About the end of September, 1680, in a conventicle held at Torwood, Stirlingshire, famous as one of the retreats of Wallace, this indomitable minister, after sermon, pronounced with all solemnity the sentence of excommunication against the king, the Duke of York, the Dukes of Monmouth, Lauderdale, and Rothes, General Dalzell, the lord-advocate, and Sir George Mackenzie, enumerating in detail “their apostasies and perjuries,” together with the flagrant vices that disgraced their private lives.† This daring act produced a deep and general impression at the time; and both exasperated and alarmed the members of government. Several of the most obdurate and reckless of their number had their hours of revelry disturbed, and the horrors of their death-bed aggravated, by a superstitious dread of this solemn expulsion from the fellowship of the Church.

The pursuit after the hunted min- —his capture ister was renewed with increased and execution.
eagerness; and, after many hairbreadth escapes, he was at length captured by a party of soldiers, and sealed his testimony with his blood, July 27, 1681.*

Meanwhile the open avowal of the Duke of York that he had embraced the Romish The Duke of faith had excited great dissatisfac- York visits tion, and a vigorous effort was Scotland.

made to exclude him from the succession to the throne. So fierce did the opposition to his claims become, that it was necessary to keep him for some time out of sight; and, after a brief period of exile on the Continent, he was sent down to reside in Scotland. He was received with the highest honours by the base sycophants at the head of affairs, and was admitted to act as a privy councillor without being required to take the oath. During his first visit, which lasted only for three months, he interfered but little in public affairs, behaved with great civility towards the gentry and nobility, and by his courtesy and affability endeavoured to conciliate all classes to his interests.

He soon returned, however, and —he assumes assumed the direction of the go- the government.

vernment. The savage old persecutor, Lauderdale, was now incapacitated for business by infirmity and disease, and his office was conferred upon the Earl of Moray. But this change in the administration produced no alleviation of the sufferings of the presbyterians. Those who were suspected of a leaning to the covenant were now harassed by ensnaring questions put to them under torture by the boots, the thumbkins, or by lighted matches tied between the fingers, and were punished not for their actions only, but for their opinions. Was the rising at Bothwell Bridge rebellion? Was the killing of Archbishop Sharp murder? Is King Charles a rightful sovereign, or a tyrant whom it is lawful to dethrone? These and other similar interrogatories were put to innocent persons of both sexes and of all ages, and if they refused to answer they were at once condemned. Sir George Mackenzie, who is deservedly held Character and in abhorrence by the people of conduct of Scotland for his unscrupulous per- Mackenzie.

version of the law, and the base arts which he employed in the legal oppression and murder of the covenanters,† was in the habit of extorting a verdict of guilty from the juries by threatening to nounced at Torwood, September, 1680. By that faithful minister and martyr of Jesus Christ, Mr. Donald Cargill, 1741.

* State trials, vol. x. pp. 871—884; Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 180—189; Crookshank’s History of the Church of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 108.

† “Whose favourite art was lying with address;

Whose hollow promise helped the princely hand
To screw confession from the tortured lips.” [Base

* Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 141—143; Burnet, vol. ii. pp. 323—325; Cloud of Witnesses, pp. 28—57.

† The sentence pronounced upon the Duke of Lauderdale may be taken as a specimen of this extraordinary act of ecclesiastical authority. “I, being a minister of Jesus Christ, and having authority and power from Him, do, in his name, and in his spirit, excommunicate John Duke of Lauderdale for his dreadful blasphemy, especially that word to the Prelate of St. Andrew’s, ‘Sit thou at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool;’ his atheistical drolling on the Scriptures of God; scoffing at religion and religious persons; his apostasy from the covenant and Reformation; and his persecuting thereof after he had been a professor, pleader, and presser thereof; for his perjury in the business of Mr. James Mitchell, &c., &c. See Torwood Excommunication: being the Lecture and Discourse going before, and the Afternoon Sermon following after; with the Action of Excommunication itself pro-bring them to trial if they dared to decide contrary to his explanation of the law.

"A most flaming proof of the iniquity of the Execution of period," as Wodrow remarks, is furnished by the trial and condemnation of two poor young women, Isabel Alison, of Perth, and Marion Harvey, a maid-servant in Borrowstonness. When brought before the council, they were induced by insidious questions, and by threats and promises, to acknowledge that they had heard Mr. Cargill preach, and had conversed with intercommuned persons. Isabel also expressed her approval of the Sanquhar declaration. Her companion declared she knew nothing about it. They were then brought to trial before the justiciary court, the only evidence against them being their own admissions drawn from them by the council. "This," says Wodrow, "was the constant Disgraceful practice at this time,—the one day mode of trial. to bring such as fell into their hands before the council, and there engage them by captious questions into a confession of statutory crimes; and next day, to panel them before the justiciary, where, if they were silent, they were asked if they would quit the testimony given yesterday." On the trial of these two young women, one of the jury had the courage and honesty to declare that there was no fact proved, which so enraged Mackenzie that he broke out into furious threats, and ordered the jury to act according to law, otherwise he knew what to do. A verdict of guilty was accordingly brought in against both prisoners, and they were condemned to be hanged in the Grassmarket, along with five women who had been found guilty of child-murder. They endured their cruel sentence with the greatest composure, rejoicing that they suffered not as evil-doers. "I am not yet twenty," said Marion Harvey, just before being thrown over by the executioner, "and they can charge me with nothing but my judgment."*

At this period a determined effort was made by the English Whigs and Protestants to avert the danger to the civil and religious liberties of the country which would arise from the accession of a popish prince to the throne; and the House of Commons, in spite of the whole influence of the crown, passed a bill to exclude the Duke of York from the succession; but it was rejected by the House of Lords, and the parliament was soon after dissolved. A new parliament was summoned to meet at Oxford in March, 1681, which it was hoped would prove more tractable than its predecessor; but the bill of exclusion was immediately introduced again, and pushed forward with the greatest vigour; and the king, having in vain offered a compromise, once more dissolved the parliament, which was not permitted to meet again during the remainder of his reign.

Nine years had now elapsed since the Scottish Estates had been convoked. During that period the country had suffered under every kind of misgovernment, and was now reduced to a state of almost total subjection. As no one but an episcopalian was permitted to sit in parliament, or even to vote for a member, the supreme council of the nation had degenerated into the mere slavish tool of the dominant faction, and was convened for the single purpose of recording the decrees of the government. From a Scottish parliament, therefore, the king confidently expected complete submission to his orders; and he and his advisers were of opinion that if the duke's right of succession to the crown of Scotland should be recognised by the legislature of that kingdom, the supporters of his claims in England would be greatly strengthened, and his adversaries proportionately weakened. The Estates were, therefore, summoned to meet on the 28th of July, 1681, and the Duke of York was appointed commissioner to represent his majesty. It soon became evident that the base sycophants of whom this assembly was composed were ready to sacrifice at the mandate of the king all the rights and privileges for which their fathers had struggled. Their first step was to pass a short act ratifying all former laws for the security of the Protestant faith. This, however, was a mere blind to cover their real intentions. They next proceeded to assert the unalterable right of succession to the throne, and the divine right of kings; declared that the royal power was from God alone; that no difference of religion, no statute or law could alter or interrupt the lineal order of succession; and that it was high-treason to propose any alteration or limitation of the right of the presumptive heir to the crown. It is a remarkable proof of the enslaved state of the country at this period, and still more of the degraded condition of the nobles and higher gentry, that the supreme council of a nation which had long been distinguished for its abhorrence of popery and despotism, should venture thus to subvert the whole constitution of the kingdom, and to place its civil and religious liberties at the mercy of a cruel and perfidious bigot.* And it is very instructive to notice that in less than eight years the same assembly, composed of nearly the same men, should in the face of this act have declared that this "lineal heir," whose inalienable rights they thus recognised, had forfeited the crown, and have driven out him and his family to wander as fugitives and vagabonds on the face of the earth.

Meeting of parliament—
—its servility.

Act of succession passed.

The duke had informed the Estates at the commencement of their proceedings that he had been commanded by his majesty to assure them that

* It was this notorious parliament which deprived Scotland of its forty-shilling franchise, as the smaller freeholders were almost to a man presbyterians.

Base hypocrite! thy character portrayed
By modern history's too lenient touch;
Truth loves to blazon with her real tints;
To limn of new thy half-forgotten name;
Inscribe with infamy thy time-worn tomb;
And make the memory hated as the man."

GRAHAM'S Sabbath.

• Fountainhall. Cloud of Witnesses.

he would inviolably maintain the Protestant religion, together with the laws for the protection of the rights and properties of his subjects; and he had solemnly promised that if they passed the act of succession every security which they should require for the reformed faith would be granted.

Enactment of a test of passive obedience— This promise the duke fulfilled in a very characteristic way, by converting the security for the Protestant religion into a test of passive obedience, which all persons who held offices, civil, ecclesiastical, or military, all members of parliament, and all electors, were required to take under the penalty of confiscation. In this test the royal supremacy over all persons, and in all causes, civil or ecclesiastical, was asserted, the covenant renounced, and passive obedience broadly asserted. The person who took this test promised that he would constantly adhere to the Protestant religion, and disavowed all tenets hostile to it; declared that he held it unlawful to take up arms against the king, or to form associations for the redress of grievances; and bound himself never to consult or determine upon civil or ecclesiastical affairs without his majesty's permission, or to attempt any alteration of the constitution in Church or State. The proposal of such an oath, which no man could take unless he believed resistance, even to the most flagrant tyranny, to be a sin, excited fierce debates even in this slavish and pusillanimous assembly. Lord Belhaven was sent to prison merely for observing that the proposed test afforded no security to their religion against a popish successor. As it was difficult to define with accuracy what was the precise standard of the Protestant religion, which they were to swear they would maintain, Dalrymple, the lord-president, suggested (probably with the design of rendering the act abortive) that they should adopt as the rule of faith the Confession of Faith framed by Knox and the other early reformers, and ratified by the first parliament of James VI. This Confession, which had been superseded by the Westminster Confession, was known to very few; the prelates themselves, as it turned out, had never read it; but, as it was supposed to be favourable to prelacy, it was eagerly supported by the bishops, and adopted without inquiry; and the test thus hastily and heedlessly framed, was approved of by a majority of seven votes. It was found on examination to be a mass of contradictions and absurdities. The Confession distinctly asserts that it is the duty of all good subjects to repress the tyranny, and to resist the oppression, of the sovereign, while the other portion of the test broadly inculcates the duty of passive obedience. The person, therefore, who took the oath really swore that he would, and that he would not, take up arms against the king if he became a tyrant and an oppressor; that he would constantly adhere to the Protestant faith, and yet that he would conform to whatever religion the king might appoint; that he would maintain the presbyterian form of worship and discipline as established by Knox, and yet that he would attempt no innovation on the present episcopal system. No honest Protestant or Papist, Presbyterian or Episcopalian, could subscribe such a test. Several even of the courtiers scrupled to take it; a number of the clergy expressed their dissatisfaction with some of its propositions; and the Earl of Queensberry, the justice-general, refused to swear it unless he were allowed to add an explanation.

—its absurdity and contradictions—

It was supposed that an oath which contained propositions so contradictory, and, therefore, incapable of being performed, would not be enforced. But the duke, who was himself exempted from its operation, saw the advantages which the test would give him over the presbyterians; and, therefore, with his hereditary obstinacy and peculiar dulness of heart, he determined to enforce it, though at the expense of truth, honesty, and sincerity. In order to remove the scruples of the episcopal clergy, an explanation, suggested by the Bishop of Edinburgh, though totally inconsistent with the test itself, which was to be received in its literal acceptation, was adopted by the council and approved by the king. But this act, as might have been expected, failed to give satisfaction to any except the obsequious supporters of the court, and about eighty of the most respectable of the clergy refused to subscribe either to the literal sense, or to the explanation of the test, and were in consequence ejected from their livings. They removed to England, where, through the influence of Bishop Burnet, they were provided with benefices.* A few noblemen and gentlemen hesitated to comply, and were in consequence ejected from their offices; but the public men in Scotland at this time were in general utterly regardless of the sanctity of an oath, and an immense majority of those in official situations readily submitted to the test.

—general dissatisfaction caused by it—

The courtiers proposed that as a mark of respect all princes of the blood should be exempted from taking the oath. This exception, which was intended to save the Duke of York from swearing to maintain the Protestant religion, was zealously opposed by the Earl of Argyll, who observed that the great danger to be dreaded from the reformed faith must arise from the perversion of the royal family, and that the proposed exemption would be an encouragement for them to abandon the national Church. His words produced a deep impression upon the obdurate and unforgiving duke, though he was silent at the moment, and Argyll was soon made to feel the consequences of his displeasure. The earl himself was prepared to resign his office of privy councillor rather than subscribe the test; but at the duke's request he at length complied, subjoining an explanation which he had beforehand communicated to James, and which he believed had received his approbation. "I have considered the test," he said, "and am very desirous of giving obedience as far as I can. I am confident that the parliament never intended to propose contradictory oaths; therefore, I think no man can explain it but for himself. Accordingly, I take it as far as it is consistent with itself and the Protestant religion. And I do declare that I mean not to bind myself in my station, and, in a lawful way, from wishing and endeavouring any alteration which I think to the advantage of Church or State, and not repugnant to the Protestant religion and my loyalty; and this I understand as a part of my oath." This explanation was apparently received by the duke and the council with great satisfaction. No objection was offered, no offence taken by any one; and the earl was invited by James to resume his seat at the council board. Few or none of the Scottish nobles had less reason than Argyll to apprehend any danger from the court. He had from his youth been a zealous supporter of the royal family; had rendered important services to Charles during his residence in Scotland, and had adhered so faithfully to his cause when at its lowest ebb, that the protector had committed him to prison, where he lay till the Restoration. After the execution of his father, the family estates with the ancient earldom were restored to him by the king; for twenty years he had continued to give a moderate though steady support to the government; and though he had on one or two occasions opposed the vile junto which afflicted the country, his conduct, even in opposition, had always been exceedingly mild and temperate, and as he afterwards thought, and probably with truth, criminally moderate. His remarks, however, on the test showed the duke that the government could not rely on the entire support of Argyll in their flagitious designs against the religion and liberties of the country, and, therefore, since he would not go all lengths with the court it was resolved to destroy him. He was accordingly apprehended and brought to trial for treason, leasing-making, and perjury. Two of the judges, Collington and Harcarse, had the honesty and courage to oppose this attempt to perpetrate the grossest injustice under the forms of law. It was supported by other two, Newton and Forret, the infamous instruments of Lauderdale's tyranny, while Queensberry, who presided as justice-general, and had himself taken the oath with an exception, refused to vote. In this dilemma a superannuated judge named Nairn, who had long been laid aside from active duty, was roused from his bed at midnight and carried to the court, for the purpose of deciding the question against the earl. Next day a decision was pronounced by the court that the charge was legally relevant, and that the guilt of treason had been incurred by the prisoner. Argyll on this declined any longer to continue an unavailing defence. A jury of eleven peers and four commoners, seven of whom were privy councillors, with the Marquis of Montrose, the hereditary enemy of the Campbells, as foreman, acquitted him of perjury, but by a unanimous verdict found him guilty of treason and leasing-making; and when the result was made known to the king he sent instructions that the sentence should be pronounced, but the execution of it suspended till further orders. It was afterwards pretended by the Duke of York and his creatures that it was never meant to carry this sentence into effect, and that nothing more was intended by this perversion of justice than to wrest from the earl his extensive jurisdiction in the Highlands. There is every reason to believe that this statement is false; but even if it were true, the infamy with which James and the government covered themselves by this transaction would be very slightly diminished. It is certain that their whole conduct at the time seemed to show that the death or Argyll was firmly resolved on. The duke had twice refused him an audience; and some of the courtiers had been heard to say that it would be easier to satisfy the king when the deed was done than to obtain his previous consent. A strong body of horse and foot were marched into Edinburgh, and apartments were provided for him in the Tolbooth, to which noblemen were usually removed from the castle before execution. On hearing of these preparations, —his escape

—Argyll takes it with an explanation—

* Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 198—204; Burnet, vol. ii. pp. 333—335.

—his apprehension and shameful treatment—

—he is found guilty and sentenced to death—

Argyll felt that it would be imprudent to trust any longer to the justice or mercy of such enemies; and on the evening of the 20th of December he made his escape from the castle in the disguise of a page, holding up the train of his step-daughter, Lady Sophia Lindsay; and, in spite of a keen pursuit, was safely conducted by William Veitch, an ejected minister, through unfrequented roads to London.* King Charles, though he had not the honesty to annul the iniquitous proceedings of the court, had the generosity, it is said, not to inquire after the place of Argyll's retreat; and when a note was put into his hand intimating where the earl was to be found he tore it in pieces, saying, "Pooh, pooh! hurt a hunted partridge? Fie, for shame!"† After lurking for a short time in London, Argyll ultimately passed over into Friesland, where his father had bought a small estate as a place of refuge for the family in case of their expulsion from their hereditary possessions. Sentence of attainder was immediately pronounced against him; his estate was confiscated; his arms were reversed and torn; and a large reward was offered for his head.‡

This shameless prostitution of justice excited deep indignation among men of all parties, both in England and Scotland, and contributed not a little to strengthen the opposition of the English patriots to the duke's succession to the crown. "I know nothing of the Scotch law," said Lord Halifax

* M'Crie's Life of Veitch, pp. 131—144.

† Kippis' Biogr. Britann.

‡ State Trials, vol. x.; Burnet, vol. i. p. 521; Fountain-hall's Decision, vol. i. p. 167; Case of the Earl of Argyll, Law's Memorials, pp. 210—217; Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 204—217.

to the king, "but this I know, that we should not hang a dog here on the grounds on which my Lord Argyll has been sentenced." * In Scotland the

A number of Scottish patriots retire to the Continent.

consternation was universal among the presbyterians, and the Earl of Loudoun, Dalrymple, the late president of the court of session, and Fletcher of Saltoun, who had opposed the test, retired to the Continent; while the Duke of Hamilton, and others of the principal nobility, rather than subscribe the oath, suffered their hereditary jurisdictions to revert to the crown.

As the king had now completely triumphed over the patriotic party in England, and no longer dreaded their clamours, he permitted his brother to return to court. About the time of his leaving Scotland, a letter was addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury by seven of the Scottish prelates, applauding the measures of the duke, to which they ascribed the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom. They commended his repression of the "wicked fanatics;" attributed to his zeal the stability of their Church; and expressed in strong terms their sincere resolution to serve him. This base and sycophantish document, which they were at pains to publish and circulate, shows how well these prelates deserved the odium which has been heaped upon them, and how completely they disregarded honour, integrity, the conscientious scruples of their own brethren, and common humanity, provided they could promote their own selfish ends, and gain the favour of a mean and bigoted prince, who they well knew was the avowed enemy both of their Church and of the Protestant religion.†

Servile letter of the Scottish prelates.

In the following year (May, 1682) the duke paid a final visit to Scotland, in order to settle the government and carry his family to London. The Gloucester frigate, in which he took his passage, struck upon a sand-bank near Yarmouth, and was lost; but the duke escaped in the barge along with the Earls of Middleton and Perth. Churchill, Legge, and others of his favourites, and a number more were saved by the boats of the attending yacht. According to Bishop Burnet, James was chiefly solicitous to save his priests and dogs. But the duke himself states that the sailors on board the ship, though they felt themselves sinking, unmindful of their own danger, gave a loud shout when they saw him safely received on board the yacht.‡

On reaching Scotland James appointed Gordon

* Both Charles and his brother endeavoured afterwards to excuse their conduct in this infamous affair. The former issued a proclamation offering a reward for the apprehension of Argyll, "that if it missed his person it might convince the world at least he was satisfied with the duke's management." The latter pleaded as his reason for rejecting the intercession of Lauderdale in behalf of Argyll, "that he would not be diverted, to make friends for himself, from pursuing the king's interest." "What an affecting picture of brotherly love!" says Lord John Russell. (Life of Lord William Russell, vol. ii. p. 15.)

† Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 223—229, and Appendix No. 76.

‡ Life of King James VII., p. 710.

of Haddo chancellor, with the title of Earl of Aberdeen; Queensberry he made New ministry. treasurer; and Perth justice-general. Shortly after these changes, Lauderdale, broken down both in body and mind by intemperance and disease, died at Tunbridge. The close of his flagitious career was embittered by the loss of his influence, as well as by the domestic tyranny of his haughty and rapacious wife. "Discontent and age," says Fountainhall, "were the chief ingredients of his death, if his duchess and physicians were free of it; for she abused him most grossly, and had gotten * from him all she could expect, and was glad to be quit of him." The Duke of Rothes, another active persecutor of the covenanters, died about the same time in great agony of mind. Like some others of his unprincipled associates, he earnestly sought on his death-bed the services of the ministers whom he had persecuted during his lifetime, but their prayers were drowned in the groans wrung from him by remorse and terror. The Duke of Hamilton, on leaving the bedside of the poor dying wretch, said, with tears, "We banish these men from us, and yet when dying we call for them: this is melancholy work." Glencairn and Annandale manifested equal anxiety on their death-beds to obtain the assistance of presbyterian ministers, which led the Duke of York to observe that "he believed that Scotchmen, be they what they would in their lifetime, were all presbyterians at their death."†

The change in the administration brought no alleviation to the sufferings of the unhappy presbyterians. Every new ministry, indeed, seems to have laboured to recommend itself to the favour of the court by exceeding the violence and cruelty of its predecessors; and now, under the personal superintendence of the heir to the throne, the furnace was "heated one seven times more than it was wont to be heated." Statutes and proclamations fiercer than ever were fulminated against the nonconformists; ruinous fines were levied without abatement; executions became daily more frequent; new and more barbarous punishments were devised; and the rules of justice were more flagrantly perverted than ever. The harshness and Cruelty of the Duke of York's nature were conspicuously displayed during his Scottish administration. He seemed to take pleasure in witnessing scenes which filled even the servile and hard-hearted courtiers with horror; and when the other members of the privy council rushed from the chamber as soon as the apparatus of torture was produced, so that it was at length found necessary to issue an order that they should keep their seats, the duke surveyed the horrid spectacle, not only with calmness, but with deep interest, and watched the agonies of the tortured wretches with as much complacency as if he had been observing some scientific experiment.* This unfeeling conduct contributed greatly to increase his unpopularity, as well as to deepen the aversion of the people to the Romish faith. This feeling pervaded all classes of the community. The effigy of the pope was publicly burned at the Cross of Edinburgh by the students of the university, some of whom were imprisoned for the offence. In the midst of this excitement, the mansion of the lord-provost happened to be burned to the ground. This accident was ascribed to revenge for the imprisonment of the students, and, though no proof of this was ever discovered, the university was shut up, and the students were banished for a time from the city.†

* He disinherited his daughter, Lady Tweeddale; but the duchess had so impoverished his family estates that a mere remnant only descended with the title of earl to his brother Hatton.

† Wodrow, vol. i. p. 216. Rothes, though he readily went along with Lauderdale and the council in their oppression of the covenanters, was naturally by no means cruel or hard-hearted. His duchess, Lady Anne Lindsay, "a discreet, wise, virtuous, and good lady," was a zealous friend of the presbyterians, and frequently concealed their ministers in the neighbourhood of Leslie House. The duke, when he sent out his officers to apprehend any of them, frequently gave a significant hint of his intentions to the duchess in these words: "My hawks will be out to-night, my lady, so you had better take care of your blackbirds." Wodrow gives an interesting anecdote confirmatory of the statement made to him by "Mr. John Loudoun, who was sometimes in the family of Rothes, that the duke, though he put on a face of severity and persecution of the presbyterians partly to cover his keeping Bishop Sharp fast to him, and to keep the clergy at his devotion, yet he was no enemy to them in his heart, and showed them all the favour he could."—Analecta, vol. iv. p. 42.

On the downfall of the English patriots, the duke returned to London; but his confidential friends, on whom he had conferred the chief offices of the state, were careful to carry on the government in accordance with his instructions. Dalzell was enjoined to make a more strict inquiry after delinquents who had not compounded for their offences; to exact the penalties with greater severity; and to devise some more effectual means of enforcing attendance upon the ministrations of the curates. Those who heard of any meeting of the covenanters, and neglected to give immediate notice to the nearest officer or magistrate were to be held equally guilty with the prescribed offenders. The military were invested with full judiciary powers to examine, condemn, and execute, or otherwise punish, all suspected persons. Those who refused to declare their innocence upon oath were held guilty. The wife of Douglas of Cavers, a gentleman of an old and powerful family, was fined five hundred pounds, and confined upwards of two years in Stirling Castle, because she would not swear that she had not been present at any conventicle since 1679. Alexander Hume, whose only real offence consisted in his having attended conventicles, was accused of rebellion and found guilty without any evidence, because his "defence was repugnant to the indictment," or, in other words, because it was contrary to the charges brought against him. It is said that a remission of his sentence, which came down from London several days before his execution, was withheld by the Earl of Perth; and that when the wife of the prisoner, on the morning of his death, on her knees besought the intercession of Lady Perth for the sake of her five young and helpless children, she was repulsed in the most insulting manner.*

The case of Laurie of Blackwood was in some respects even more flagrantly un- Trial of Laurie just, and excited great clamour of Blackwood.

throughout the country. He had no connection whatever with the covenanters, but was prosecuted for holding intercourse with certain persons who had been at Bothwell Bridge, and allowing some of his tenants engaged in that rising to reside on his estate. It was in vain he pleaded that these persons had never been prosecuted or intercommunicated; that they had been included in the indemnity, and had remained unmolested for two years. The lord-advocate contended that a person who had been engaged in a rebellion must have incurred the suspicion of the whole neighbourhood, and if so, each individual in the neighbourhood must have heard of the grounds of suspicion, and was bound to make known his suspicions to the government. It was presumed, therefore, that Blackwood must have been aware that the persons with whom he conversed were rebels, although they had not been convicted, or even accused. On these grounds he was found guilty and condemned to death. With some difficulty a reprieve was obtained for him, and ultimately his sentence was commuted. But it was determined to make his attainder a precedent for a new offence, which would place more than half the property of the country at the mercy of the privy council.† A proclamation was issued against all who had ever harboured or conversed with rebels, even though "neither forfeited as traitors nor denounced at the time for rebellion;" all who were suspected of having conversed with the disaffected, even by accident, were to be summoned to answer for this new crime; and circuit judiciary courts for their trial were appointed to perambulate the south and west districts of the country, where, at least, twenty thousand persons were by this atrocious policy involved in the penalties of treason. Absolution, however, was granted to those who took the test, so that the people were reduced to the cruel alternative of either perjuring themselves by swearing a contradictory oath, or suffering the penalties of treason. A single case may serve to show the manner in which this atrocious proclamation was carried out. Robert Hamilton of Monkland, Case of Hamilton of Monkland.

was brought to trial on the charge of having held intercourse at Bothwell Bridge with the murderers of Archbishop Sharp, and of having received rent

* Burnet, vol. i. p. 583; Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 169.

† Fountainhall's Chron. Notes, p. 7.

* Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 268; Burnet, vol. ii. p. 340.

† Fountainhall's Decis., vol. i. p. 205; Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 273.

from a tenant who was engaged in that insurrection, though he afterwards received an indemnity. Hamilton pleaded that his conduct had always been loyal and peaceful; that he had regularly attended his parish church, paid cess, and avoided all connection with the disaffected; that when they assembled near his property he had left his residence to avoid them, but that his son, a child about seven years of age, having wandered after nightfall, and suspecting that some of his servants might have carried him to the vicinity of the rebel encampment, where a crowd of idle spectators had assembled, he had gone thither in search of the boy, and, having found him, left the place in half an hour without holding any intercourse with the rebels. The truth of this plain story was not questioned by Mackenzie, the lord-advocate; but he had the effrontery to declare that the act which Hamilton acknowledged was treasonable, and circumstances could never palliate or alter its nature, and he was not at all obliged to inquire with what intention the prisoner had gone among the rebels. As a matter of course, Hamilton was found guilty, forfeited, and condemned to death. His life was ultimately spared on his offering to take the test; but he was imprisoned for seventeen weeks, and amerced in eight years' rent of his estate, amounting to sixteen thousand pounds.*

Alarmed at these tyrannical proceedings, from which no man could deem himself safe, a considerable number of the leading presbyterians resolved to dispose of their estates, and to abandon a country from which civil and religious freedom seemed alike to be banished. About thirty-six noblemen and gentlemen entered into an association for the establishment of a colony in America, and their agents were sent to London in order to treat with the proprietors of Carolina for a settlement in that district. "Any condition," as Hume remarks, "seemed preferable to their living in their native country, which by the prevalence of persecution and violence was become as insecure to them as a den of robbers." At this

Rye-House juncture, however, the leaders of the plot—the whig party in England, unhappily for themselves and for the sacred cause of freedom and justice, began to revolve plans of rebellion against the government, and proposed that there should be simultaneous risings in various parts of the country; while at the same time some of the more fierce and desperate of the party formed a separate or under plot, commonly called the Rye-House plot, for the assassination of the king and his brother. The former opened communications with the Scottish malcontents, and requested their co-operation in their concerted scheme of resistance. Various meetings and negotiations were accordingly held, and a correspondence was entered into with Argyll and the Scottish exiles in Holland. It was proposed that Argyll should raise the standard of revolt in the west of Scotland, and that the Earl of Tarras, the brother-in-law of Mounmouth, should take arms with his friends and retainers on the Borders, as soon as the projected rising took place in England. But the Scottish malcontents, perceiving that there was a want of unanimity and vigour among their English confederates, and that the country was not prepared to rise in arms against the government, resolved unanimously to defer taking any steps till a more favourable season.

Unfortunately, at the moment when this resolution was adopted, both plots were discovered. The government artfully contrived to confound the two conspiracies together; and, as the tide of feeling in consequence ran strongly against the whigs, the king and his brother availed themselves of the opportunity to exact ample vengeance for their opposition to the measures of the court and the succession of the duke. Lord William Russell and Algernon Sidney, in defiance of law and justice, were beheaded. Sir Thomas Armstrong and various other members of the party shared their fate. Essex perished by his own hand in the Tower. A number were found guilty of conspiracy, misprision of treason and libel, and severely punished. Many fled the country, and the great patriotic party, which so lately bearded the court with impunity, and had nearly succeeded in altering the succession to the throne, seemed at length completely crushed.

A number of Scottish gentlemen who were suspected of complicity in the plot —arrest of the Scottish patriots sent down to Scotland for trial; implicated in it. but they had conducted their proceedings with so much prudence and caution that no direct evidence of their connection with the alleged conspiracy could be obtained. In the hope that some proof of their guilt might be discovered, Gordon of Earlston, who had been intercepted at Newcastle on his way to the Continent with credentials from the Cameronians to the Protestant churches abroad, was ordered to be put to the question after he had been condemned to death; but he either feigned madness, or the sight of the instruments of torture overwhelmed him with such horror that nothing of importance could be extracted from him.*

Sir Hugh Campbell of Cesnock, an aged and respectable gentleman, was first brought to trial. As there was no proof of his connection with the plot, he was accused of abetting the insurrection at Bothwell Bridge by conversing with some who had left the encampment, and declaring that "he liked not runaways, and that they should get help

* Some of the petty rural tyrants seem to have taken a diabolical pleasure in compelling the people to involve themselves in the guilt of perjury. One of the most notorious of these persecutors, Johnstone of Westerhall, commanded the heads of families in the parish of Moffat to meet next day in the church to take the test, observing, with an oath, "that before to-morrow night they should all be damned as well as he." (See Fountainhall, vol. i. p. 235.)

* Dalrymple's Mem., vol. i. p. 57; Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 311.

if they would bide by it." His plea that on the day specified he had not quitted his own house, was rejected on the ground that it was contrary to the indictment, and inferred perjury against the crown witnesses. He then offered to prove that these witnesses were suborned by the promise of reward, and that one of them was actuated by malice; but this offer also was rejected; Mackenzie, insisting that the subornation of the witnesses was no valid objection to their testimony, unless it could be proved that the prosecutors in the cause—his majesty or his advocate—were the suborners. The condemnation of the venerable prisoner now appeared inevitable. But when the first witness was produced in court, Cesnock, fixing his eyes upon him, solemnly adjured him, "Look full in my face, and by the perilous oath you have sworn take heed to what you say; for, as I shall answer to God and upon the peril of my own soul, I am here ready to declare I never saw you in the face before." Although previously well tutored, the self-convicted wretch was so struck with this impressive appeal, that he acknowledged he never heard the prisoner utter the words laid to his charge. A loud shout from the delighted spectators so enraged Mackenzie that, losing all self-restraint and sense of decency, he poured forth a torrent of abuse on Cesnock's friends, and on the presbyterian party. Perth, the justice-general, whose brother, Lord Melfort, had received a promise of the expected forfeiture, made repeated attempts to prompt and direct the witness; but the jury, with unwonted independence and courage, interposed and put a stop to this shameless proceeding. The other witness confessed

—his acquittal. that he had not seen the prisoner for a considerable time either before or after the battle of Bothwell Bridge; and after a violent altercation with the bench, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty. But so degraded had the administration of justice now become, that the witnesses were put in irons till they retracted their evidence; the jury were prosecuted for a riot in court, and only escaped punishment by making an apology; and Cesnock, though acquitted by their verdict, was sent a prisoner to the Bass and his estate forfeited.*

The acquittal of Cesnock so enraged the government that they had recourse to a new method of torture, and strained every nerve to obtain evidence respecting the plot. Some of Argyll's letters had been seized, but all attempts to decipher them had hitherto failed. Spence, the earl's secretary, however, who possessed the key, had been apprehended in England; but as the law of that country forbade the employment of torture, he was sent down a prisoner to Scotland, where no such just and humane regulation existed, and the privy council now resolved to put him to the question. He endured the torture of the boot without making any revelation, which so exasperated the council that they delivered him over to the tender mercies of General Dalzell, who caused him to be deprived of sleep for a week, but still without effect. He was then subjected to the thumbikins, a new instrument of torture for compressing the thumb and hand, which Dalzell and Drummond had brought from Russia. The suffering inflicted by this engine —their confessions. was so intolerable that Spence could hold out no longer; and, having learned from his friends that the government was already in possession of all the information that could be obtained from the letters, he agreed to decipher them on condition that his evidence should not be judicially employed. The Rev. William Carstairs, afterwards principal of the university of Edinburgh and confidential adviser of King William, was subjected to the same torture, which he bore for an hour and a half with the greatest fortitude. But on being threatened with a repetition of the question, he gave way, and accepted the terms which had been agreed to by Spence. He confessed, however, nothing more than the government already knew; and the council had no suspicion that he withheld from them secrets of vast importance, which had been intrusted to him by the pensionary Fagel, the discovery of which would have been attended with ruinous consequences to the cause of freedom.*

The correspondence of Argyll, however, implicated the Earl of Tarras, commissary Munro, and Murray of Philiphaugh, and evidence was in turn extorted from them which afforded the council a pretext to bring to trial Baillie of Jerviswood. This venerable patriot, who was as distinguished for his loyalty as for his abilities and learning,† his amiable disposition, and his fidelity to his religious principles, was now in the last stage of a mortal disease, brought on by the rigour of a long imprisonment. He had already been produced before the council on a charge of "intercommuning with rebels," in other words, of having conversed with fugitive presbyterians. No evidence, however, appeared against him; but because he refused to swear that he would answer all the questions which should be propounded to him, he was fined in six thousand pounds sterling. He was now dragged from his sick-bed, though so weak that he was unable to stand, and placed at the bar of the

* After the Revolution the instrument with which he had been tortured was presented to Principal Carstairs, and it is still in the possession of his descendants. It is said that King William, being curious to see and try the effect of the engine, inserted his fingers in the thumbikins, and requested Carstairs to give the screw a turn. The courtly principal complied with the request, but somewhat gently. "That is not so very painful," said his majesty; "but you are trifling with me; press more hardy." Carstairs, thus urged, and feeling that his credit for fortitude was at stake, gave the screw another turn, on which William exclaimed, "Hold! hold! Principal; another turn and I would confess anything."

† Burnet terms Baillie "a learned and worthy gentleman;" and the celebrated Dr. Owen said to a friend, "You have truly men of great spirits in Scotland; there is Mr. Baillie of Jerviswood, a person of the greatest abilities I ever almost met with."

* Fountainhall's Decis., vol. i. p. 286; Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 382.

justiciary court on a charge of high-treason. His objections to the indictment were unanswerable; but, as a matter of course, they were all overruled. Still the evidence against him was so defective that, in violation of the solemn promise of the council, as well as of law and justice, the confession extorted from Carstairs was produced in court by Mackenzie as an "adminicle of proof;" and the unprincipled advocate, in a virulent harangue, affirmed in the strongest terms that Baillie had been accessory to the "horrible plot" for assassinating the king and his brother. The venerable prisoner, who had to be supported during the trial by cordials to prevent him from sinking, then rose to address the court wrapped in his night-gown, and fixing his eyes on the lord-advocate, said, "I think it strange," my lord, "that you should accuse me of such abominable actings. Did you not own to me privately in prison that you were satisfied of my innocence? And are you now convinced in your conscience that I am more guilty than before?" The whole audience turned their eyes towards Mackenzie, who, in spite of his hardihood, was overwhelmed with confusion, and muttered out, "Jerviswood, I own what you say, but my thoughts there were as a private man; what I say here is by special direction of the privy council;" and, pointing to the clerk, he added, "He knows my orders."—"Well," said the prisoner on hearing this shameless avowal, "if your lordship have one conscience for yourself and another for the council, I pray God forgive you—I do." Then, turning to Perth, the justice-general, he said, "My lord, I trouble you no further."

The jury returned a verdict of guilty at nine o'clock in the morning; and the council, afraid that their malice would be anticipated by a natural death, ordered the prisoner to be executed on the same day at two in the afternoon; his head to be placed on the Netherbow port of Edinburgh, his body to be quartered, and the members to be sent to the towns of Glasgow, Lanark, Jedburgh, and Ayr. When this doom was pronounced, he said, with great calmness, "My lords, the time is short; the sentence is sharp; but I thank my God, who has made me as fit to die as ye are to live." When he had returned to the prison, being asked how he felt himself, he replied, "Never better; and in a few hours I'll be well beyond all conception." Shortly after, he added, "They are going to send me in pieces and quarters through the country. They may hack and hew my body as they please. I know assuredly nothing shall be lost, but all these my members shall be wonderfully gathered and made like Christ's glorious body." His behaviour on the scaffold exhibited "a mixture of Roman greatness and Christian resignation." His sister-in-law, a daughter of the celebrated Warriston, who had attended him in prison and stood beside him during his trial, supported him also in his last moments. He was unable to ascend the ladder without assistance, and, seating himself on one of the steps, he began to say, "My faint zeal for the Protestant religion has —and brought me to this end,"—when execution. the drums were ordered to beat and drown his words, and he submitted to his sentence, which was executed to the letter, with all its revolting barbarities. A short speech which he had prepared vindicating his character from the aspersions of his enemies was, however, printed and circulated, greatly to the annoyance of the council, who attempted in vain to procure its suppression.*

Baillie's friend, Sir Patrick Hume of Polwarth, who was involved in the same Sir Patrick charge, made his escape from prison. Hume. and found a place of refuge in the vault of his family burying-ground. Here he remained in concealment during a whole month, and his noble daughter Grisell,† after nightfall, brought a supply of food, and remained with him in this gloomy spot till daybreak. Sir Patrick ultimately escaped to the Continent, and joined the Earl of Argyll and the other Scottish exiles in Holland.

The period which intervened between the judicial murder of Baillie and the Revolution was usually termed "killing time." "Killing time." by the suffering presbyterians, to mark the peculiar severity of the persecutions to which they were subjected. The indulgent ministers, who had hitherto enjoyed a precarious liberty, were now silenced; and those who refused to grant bonds that they would abstain from preaching were imprisoned or banished. The peasantry were required to swear that they never had conversed with, or shown kindness to, any of the intercommuned wanderers, as they were termed, nor ever would.

All the heritors were summoned Increased severity of the and required to take the test, gibelts were erected in some places persecution. to terrify the people into compliance, and the recusants were at once thrown into prison and brought to trial on the charge of holding intercourse with rebels. Fathers were punished for venturing to receive or converse with their sons, and wives for harbouring their husbands. Ruinous fines were imposed for nonconformity, and now became a large and regular source of public revenue. To render these exactions more galling and oppressive, it was proposed that husbands should be held liable for the absence of their wives from church, as well as for their attendance on conventicles. This arbitrary proposal was resisted by the Earl of Aberdeen, the chancellor, as contrary to law as well as equity; but when the question was referred to the king, at the instigation of his brother, he decided in its favour, and Aberdeen was dismissed from his office, which was bestowed upon Perth. As the wives of the greater part of the presbyterian gentry had for years withdrawn from their parish churches, this iniquitous decision virtually placed their estates at the mercy of the government. Two gentlemen in Renfrewshire were on various pretexts amerced in sums which amounted altogether to six times the value of their entire estates. Sir William Scott of Harden was fined fifteen hundred pounds sterling on account of his lady's absence from church; and Mackenzie, the lord-advocate, who obtained a gift of the fine, exacted the whole sum with interest. The fines imposed, for the same offence, upon a few of the chief proprietors in the county of Roxburgh amounted to twenty-two thousand five hundred pounds. The penalties of every kind exacted within eleven shires amounted to an hundred and eighty thousand pounds sterling—an enormous sum in those days, especially in the depressed state of the country.*

* Fountainhall's, Decis., vol. i. p. 327; Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 398; Burnet, vol. ii. p. 427.

† She was afterwards married to the eldest son of Baillie, a mutual attachment having been formed in the prison, where they had been accustomed to meet while their fathers were in confinement. See Memoirs of George Baillie of Jerviswood, and of Lady Grisell Baillie, by their daughter, Lady Murray of Stanhope.

‡ Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 412—466.

The case of Porterfield of Duchal, which was by no means singular, affords an example of the infamous mode in which the laws were strained, and the courts of justice disgraced, in order to ruin the presbyterians, and enrich the worthless minions of the court, by their forfeiture. This gentleman had been solicited by Sir John Cochrane to contribute a small sum of money for the support of Argyll, and had refused; but he was brought to trial on the charge that he had not revealed the application to his majesty, or his officers. Perth, the chancellor, and the fifteen judges of the court of session, having been consulted respecting this new crime, gave it as their opinion, that as Argyll was a traitor, to contribute money or to solicit contributions for his support was also treason; and that to conceal the request for such a contribution was "downright veritable treason, and it affords no plea that the money was refused, for the concealment of the fact constitutes the essence of the crime." Porterfield was, therefore, forfeited and condemned to death as a traitor, and was obliged to compound for his estates with the chancellor's brother, the vile apostate Melfort, who sat as one of the judges on his trial.†

Oppressive as these proceedings were, the measures adopted against the Cameronians or Hill-men were much more severe. In dealing with them, murder went hand in hand with robbery. In the absence of all evidence, ensnaring questions were put to them respecting the royal supremacy, the murder of Sharp, the rising at Bothwell Bridge, and other similar matters, and their silence or their answers were alike taken as evidence of their guilt. The powers of the ordinary magistrates were now intrusted to the military, and the common soldiers were authorised to put to death any suspected persons they might meet with who should refuse to take the test, or to answer to their satisfaction the questions they might put to them. When expelled from their homes the wanderers were forced to hide in dens and caves, among morasses and woods, and to suffer every extremity of climate and the want of the common necessities of life, and to live cut off from all intercourse with their nearest relatives. The poor friendless fugitives were hunted by the soldiers like wild beasts. Spies and apostate renegades were instructed to gain their confidence and betray them.* On some occasions bloodhounds were employed to discover their retreats; and whenever they were apprehended they were at once put to death without indictment, or trial, or proof. The Duke of York had declared, with characteristic barbarity, that "there would never be peace in Scotland till the whole of the country south of the Forth was turned into a hunting-field," and now it appeared not at all unlikely that his words would be verified.

Driven to despair by these atrocious proceedings, the unhappy wanderers drew up ^{Their} an apologetical declaration, what is termed their "apologetical declaration," in which, after disavowing the royal authority, they expressed their abhorrence of murder committed from a difference of judgment or of religious persuasion; but solemnly warned all who chose "either with bloody Doeg to shed their blood, or with the flattering Ziphites† to inform persecutors where they were to be found," that the principle of self-preservation would constrain them not to allow such deeds to pass unpunished. They were careful to discriminate between their sanguinary persecutors, and the more sober and moderate or the public officials; and declared their determina-

* A royal commission was granted in 1684 "to employ spies and intelligencers to go in company with the said rebels and fugitives as if they were in their party, the better to discover where they haunt and are reset." Two of these miscreants on one occasion fell into their own trap, and met with a well-merited punishment. They belonged to a troop of soldiers stationed in Renfrewshire, and were sent by their commander to the house of Duchal to collect information respecting the proprietor, who, as we have just seen, was obnoxious to the government. They applied to the lady for quarters, pretending to be persecuted covenanters, and she directed them to go to the barn, and sent them a mess of porridge for their supper. They fell to eating the food without asking a blessing. The servant from this circumstance conceived suspicion that they were spies, and informed her mistress, who, in great alarm, laid her fears before her husband. Duchal brought the two soldiers to the front of his house, and, in the presence of all his domestics, inflicted a severe horsewhipping on the "rebellious whigs," as he pretended, on their confession, to consider them, and who had thus by a crafty device attempted to bring him into trouble. After the whipping, he bound them hand and foot, and threw them into the old vault of Duchal Castle till the commander came and relieved the pseudo-covenanters. (Wodrow, vol. iv. p. 160, note by the Editor.)

† 1 Sam. chap. xxii. and xxiii.

p. 422.

tion to retaliate as far as lay in their power on such privy councillors, lords of justiciary, officers and soldiers, and common informers, as should still continue to embroil their hands in the blood of the covenanters. "Call to your remembrance," they said, "all that is in peril is not lost, and all that is delayed is not forgiven."* This declaration was affixed in the night to many of the market crosses and the doors of the parish churches, and produced a strong impression on the country. The warning thus wrung from the wanderers by the severity of their sufferings, had the effect of terrifying for a time some of the more active spies and informers, but it exasperated the government, and led to the adoption of still more severe measures against the covenanters.† The privy council measures of the government. ordained "that whosoever owned, or refused to disown, the declaration on oath, should be put to death in the presence of two witnesses, though unarmed when taken." A form of abjuration was prescribed, which the soldiers were commanded to enforce under the penalty of death. Special commissions or courts of inquiry were appointed with justiciary powers. If any suspected persons failed to appear on being summoned, their goods were to be confiscated, their houses burned, and the children above twelve years of age of those who were condemned or executed were to be sold as slaves to the plantations. A royal warrant, signed by the king himself, directed that women who obstinately adhered to the principles of the covenanters should be drowned. These inhuman decrees were executed to the letter. In those districts in which the declaration of the Cameronians had appeared, all the inhabitants of both sexes were collected into one place, and surrounded by soldiers with drawn swords till they took the test. Proprietors were ordered to produce lists of the people resident upon their estates, so that none might escape observation. Every avenue to escape was closed; and captains of vessels were forbidden, under pain of confiscation, to leave the kingdom until they had presented lists of their passengers to officials appointed for the purpose. All who travelled within the realm were required, under the penalty of death, to carry with them a certificate that they disavowed the declaration, and had taken the test in the presence of a magistrate. Innkeepers were forbidden to receive any guest till he had produced this certificate, and were empowered to exact an oath from travellers that their certificates were genuine.

The work of death was carried on with horrid glee by the military executioners. Sanguinary The slightest pretext was regarded as a sufficient warrant for their excesses of the soldiers.

proceedings. The want of a certificate; the least scruple in swearing the test; an expression of sympathy for the sufferers, and of indignation at their cruel treatment; * even mere suspicion was in many cases followed by immediate execution. One or two specimens of these sanguinary proceedings may suffice. A poor man sleeping on a bank was surprised by a lieutenant and three soldiers. Their suspicions were excited by finding a Bible lying near him; and they awoke him, and asked if he would pray for the king; "With all my heart," was the prompt reply. But on being further interrogated whether he was willing to renounce the covenant, he answered firmly, "I'd as soon renounce my baptism." Upon this he was at once put to death on the spot.† On another occasion, a countryman lying in a field, engaged in reading, was observed by some soldiers, who called to him, and then fired, and shot him, because, being deaf, he did not make any reply. Five wanderers had taken refuge in a cave in the parish of Glencairn, their retreat was discovered and betrayed by a base informer, who had pretended to share in their sentiments, and to sympathise with their sufferings. The soldiers first fired into the cave, and then rushing in dragged the sufferers forth to execution, and put them to death without trial or examination, or even asking a single question. One man, being observed to be still alive, was thrust through the body by one of the murderers. The dying man raised himself up, and, weltering in his blood, exclaimed with his last breath, "Though every hair of my head was a

* Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 429; Appendix, No. 99; Hind let Loose, p. 177; Short Memorial, &c., pp. 18, 19.

† It would not have been surprising if men who were placed beyond the protection of law, and hunted like wild beasts, had with the courage of despair turned upon their ruthless persecutors, and taken deadly vengeance for the enormous wrongs they had suffered. But their threat of revenge was never executed. Two soldiers, indeed, who had been active in persecuting the people were put to death by persons who were never discovered, and a curate named Peirson lost his life in a scuffle; but the Cameronians have always disclaimed this murder. The only instance in which they ever attempted, after the battle of Bothwell Bridge, to repel force by force took place at Enterkin, a steep pass in Dumfriesshire, which winds along the side of a mountain with a tremendous precipice beneath. One misty morning a party of dragoons were proceeding along this dangerous pass, carrying with them to Edinburgh nine prisoners bound two and two on horses, when a voice was heard from the hill above. The commanding officer halted, and cried out, "What do you want? and who are ye?" In reply, twelve men stood forward on the side of the hill surmounting the pass, and one of them called to the officer, "Sir, will you deliver up our minister?" The officer, with an oath, refused; on which the countryman fired at once, and shot the officer through the head. He immediately fell to the ground, and his horse, frightened by the fall of its rider, reared back over the precipice, and was dashed to pieces. The officer next in command then desired a parley, and agreed to release the minister, saying to him, "Go, sir, you owe your life to this d—d mountain."—"Rather, sir," was the reply, "to the God who made the mountain." The release of the rest of the prisoners was next demanded and granted, and the crest-fallen soldiers were then permitted to proceed on their march. (Defoe's Memoirs of the Church of Scotland, part iii. pp. 189–195; Wodrow, who relates the same incident, says the soldiers fired first on the countrymen.)

* James Nicol, a burgess of Peebles, having been accidentally compelled to witness the execution of three covenanters in the Grass-market, Edinburgh, said, as he was leaving the spot, "These kine of Bashan have pushed these three good men to death at one push, contrary to their own base laws, in a most inhuman manner." For this offence he was immediately seized and committed to prison, and in a day or two brought to trial, condemned, and executed. (Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 377.)

† Defoe's Memoirs of the Church of Scotland.

Engraved by W. J. Edwards

JOHN GRAHAM OF CLAVERHOUSE, VISCOUNT DUNDEE.

From the Original by Sir Peter Lely.

man, I would die all those deaths for Christ and his cause."*

Torture was had recourse to upon the slightest Employment suspicion, and the boots, the thumb-knives, the application of lighted matches between the fingers till the flesh was consumed, and other devices of fiendish cruelty were employed to compel the poor sufferers to betray their friends, or to bear witness against themselves. Even children were beaten and kicked by the brutal troopers to intimidate them into revealing the lurking-places of their parents.

During this the hottest period of the persecution, Cruelties of Grierson, Johnstone, and Graham of Claverhouse. Grierson of Lagg, Johnstone of Westerhall, Captain Douglas, brother of the Marquis of Queensberry, Bruce of Earlsball, Urquhart of Meldrum,—names still mentioned with execration by the Scottish peasantry,—and, above all, Graham of Claverhouse, distinguished themselves by their savage cruelty and the wanton murders which they perpetrated. Claverhouse on one occasion having seized six unarmed fugitives, caused four of them instantly to be shot in his presence, and the remaining two were afterwards executed by his order. At another time, having captured one of the wanderers who endeavoured to save himself by flight, with diabolical cruelty he brought him back to his family, and put him to death in the presence of his wife.† The atrocities perpetrated by Grierson were, if possible, still more revolting. In this monster was displayed what has been justly termed the most odious vice that is incident to human nature—a delight in misery merely as misery. He was in the habit of mocking, in the coarsest terms, the victims whom he tortured and butchered, and the sight of their agonies produced in him a kind of fiendish exultation and glee. When implored to grant a few minutes to prepare for death, he would exclaim with oaths and curses—"What, have you not had time enough to prepare since Bothwell!" It is affirmed by Wodrow that Grierson and his associates used, in their drunken orgies, to play at the torments of hell, to personate devils, and to lash each other with whips, in jesting imitation of the tortures of the damned.

These horrible deeds received a momentary interruption by the death of the king, Charles II. who expired on the sixth of February, 1685, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and twenty-fifth of his reign.

* M'Crie's Sketches, vol. ii. pp. 211, 212.

† The following specimens of the brutality of Claverhouse may serve to show with what justice he has been held up as the mirror of chivalry. In the year 1683, when a band of Highlanders were searching for the wanderers, they rifled the house of a poor man near Hawick, and carried away his wife and infant child. The poor woman, burdened with her child, was unable to keep pace with them, and Claverhouse ordered the savages "to put a rope about her neck and trail [drag] her." On another occasion, when

In person Charles was tall and well-proportioned, with a swarthy complexion and harsh features. He was possessed of excellent natural parts, a good temper, a pleasant wit, and affable and polite manners. His character.

His early years had been passed in penury and danger; but adversity taught him neither self-denial nor industry, and he returned from exile indolent, selfish, unfeeling, faithless, ungrateful, and insensible to reproach or shame, with a settled distrust of mankind, and an entire disbelief in the existence of integrity among men, or of chastity among women. He was a profound and habitual dissembler, and made and broke promises with equal facility. The slave of his appetites, his life was spent in a round of degrading sensual indulgences and frivolous amusements; and his habitual and entire disregard of the rules of morality, contributed in no small degree to produce that deep-rooted and general corruption, and that licentiousness in morals which, throughout his reign, disgraced the nation. His detestation of business and of labour of every kind kept him in a state of the most disgraceful ignorance; and it was almost impossible to induce him to give the slightest attention to the most serious affairs, even when his misgovernment and neglect of duty had brought the country to the brink of ruin. He had imbibed the arbitrary maxims of his father and grandfather; and the whole tenor of his conduct, especially during the latter part of his reign, indicates his determination to subvert the liberties of his people, not from ambition, but merely for the unlimited gratification of his private tastes and appetites. So careless was he of the honour and interests of his kingdom, and even of his own reputation, that he stooped to become the hired lackey of the French king; and bartered the independence of his own crown, and the safety of Europe, for the means of satisfying the rapacity of his worthless courtiers and the profusion of his female favourites. It is scarcely possible to condemn in too strong terms the atrocities perpetrated in Scotland by his authority, and his oppression of that country has justly been compared with the tyranny of the worst of the Cæsars. With respect to religion, he appears to have had no fixed belief; but, before the Restoration, he made in secret a careless profession of the Romish faith, and he received absolution from Huddleston, a popish priest, a few hours before his death. In spite of all that his apologists have adduced in extenuation of his vices, the impartial verdict of history must pronounce him a profligate man and a bad sovereign.*

they were marching through Eskdale and Ettrick Forest, the Highlanders, having complained to Claverhouse that they could not get the women and children along, this gallant and chivalrous soldier commanded them to "bind the little ones to the meikle ones, and gar them harl [drag] them."

* Burnet's Hist., vol. ii. pp. 456—470; Wellwood's Memoirs, p. 140; Hume, chap. lxxix.; Macaulay's History of England, vol. i. pp. 167—171.

CHAPTER LIII.

JAMES THE SEVENTH.

A.D. 1685—1688.

CHARLES was succeeded by his brother, who assumed the title of James the Second of England and Seventh of Scotland. The new monarch had long been one of the most unpopular men in the kingdom. His dull and narrow understanding, obstinate temper, harsh and revengeful disposition, combined with his popish principles to render him obnoxious to the great body of the people, both in England and Scotland; and a strenuous effort had been made during the reign of his brother to exclude him from the throne. The patriotic party was now, however, completely crushed, and the suspicions of their opponents had not yet been aroused, so that not the slightest opposition was made to the accession of James. Conscious that he was regarded with no friendly feelings, the new king, at the first meeting of his privy council, endeavoured to remove the apprehensions of his subjects by a conciliatory speech, in which he declared his resolution to maintain the established government in Church and State, and to imitate the "singular lenity" which had distinguished his brother's reign. This declaration, which was certainly not sincere,* was received by the members of council with loud acclamations of gratitude and joy; and a vast number of addresses were presented from corporations and other public bodies, declaring, in the most servile terms, their delight at his accession, and their confidence in his promise.

Intelligence of the death of Charles reached Scotland on the 10th of February, and on the same day James was proclaimed king by lawful and undoubted succession and descent, and as sovereign over all persons and in all causes, holding his imperial crown from God alone, and therefore as entitled to claim unconditional obedience. He declined, however, to take the coronation oath for Scotland, as its obligations would have fettered him in his plans for the re-establishment of popery; and the obsequious council acquiesced in his refusal, although it was afterwards adduced to justify the sentence that he had forfeited the throne.†

The accession of James brought no relief to the persecuted covenanters, and the laws against those accused or suspected of adherence to the presbyterian faith were enforced with the same relentless severity. An indemnity was indeed published, but it proved as usual a merely nominal offer of mercy; for as pardon was extended only to those who were under the degree of "heritors, wadsetters,† life-renters, burgesses of royal burghs, and vagrant preachers," the leaders of the covenanters were excluded from the benefit of the indulgence, and none except mechanics and peasants could avail themselves of "the innate clemency of his majesty, a virtue which," it was gravely added, "hath shined in the whole line of his royal race."* The circuit courts in the south and west, by the special orders of the privy council, renewed their iniquitous proceedings with increased vigour. The murders in the fields continued without intermission; and the soldiers were permitted to plunder and maltreat the people at their pleasure. Multitudes were put to death by them, often without a trial, on mere suspicion, or on account of their refusal to take the test, or to betray the hiding-places of the wanderers. Women were not unfrequently burnt in the cheek, and the ears of the men lopt off; and great numbers, thus branded and mutilated, were transported to North America and the West Indies, and sold as slaves.

On one occasion, six persons were surprised at prayer in the parish of Minnigaff, in Galloway, by a troop of horse commanded by Captain Douglas, who, without inquiry, commanded them to be instantly shot—the exercise in which they were engaged being regarded as conclusive proof of their guilt. On another occasion six of the wanderers were seized in the parish of Urr, by Bruce of Earlsall; four of these unhappy fugitives were put to death by him on the spot; the remaining two were carried before Sir Robert Grierson of Lagg, and because they refused to take the oath of abjuration they were hanged upon the nearest tree. Five others, one of whom was a gentleman, named Mr. Bell, of Whiteside, stepson to Viscount Kenmure, were put to death by Grierson in the same summary manner, and the petition of the unfortunate youth for a few minutes to prepare for death was rejected with imprecations and fiendish mockery. Some time after the murder, Lord Kenmure, meeting Grierson in company with his associate Claverhouse, reproached him with his cruelty to his relation, and particularly for not allowing his dead body to be buried. The ferocious ruffian replied with an oath, "Take him if you will, and salt him in your beef barrel." The brutality of this reply so enraged Kenmure that he drew his sword, and, but for the interference of Claverhouse, would have run Grierson through on the spot.†

Brutal murders committed by Douglas, Bruce, and Grierson.

The proceedings of the commission courts were quite as ruthless as the doings of the military and the militia. Three women were apprehended at Wigton, and brought to trial for nonconformity. One was an aged widow, named Margaret MacLauchlan, remarkable for her piety

Two women drowned at Wigton for nonconformity.

* Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 473.

† Ibid. Grierson married the aunt of Queensberry. As a reward for his services in persecuting the covenanters, he was created a baronet 28th March, 1685, and received a pension of £200 a year.

* See James's own admission, Clark's Life, vol. ii. p. 3.

† Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 471.

‡ Holders of mortgages.

JAMES VII.

The Portraits of James VII. 1688

and prudence; the other two were the daughters of a respectable farmer, named Gilbert Wilson, who, along with his wife, had conformed to the episcopal system, though their children had steadfastly refused to attend the parish church, and for this cause had been driven for shelter to the hills and morasses. They were all condemned to death, because they refused to take the oath of abjuration, and to attend the episcopal worship. The life of the youngest daughter, a girl of thirteen, was purchased by her father for the sum of one hundred pounds sterling; but the other, named Margaret, who was eighteen years of age, was sentenced to be drowned along with her aged companion. They were carried to a spot near Wigton, which the Solway Frith overflows twice a day, and, in the presence of Grierson of Lagg, Major Winram, and an immense concourse of spectators, bound to stakes fixed in the sand within flood-mark, that they might endure all the horrors of a lingering death. The stake to which the elder victim was tied was placed near to the advancing tide, doubtless with the expectation that the sight of her death-struggles would shake the resolution of the younger sufferer. But her courage was supported by a principle which was proof even against the terrors of death. She calmly sang a portion of the twenty-fifth psalm,* and prayed till the waves covered her. But before life was extinct the soldiers unbound and drew her out of the water, and their commander, Major Winram, when she came to herself, asked if she would pray for the king. She replied that she wished for the salvation of all men, and the damnation of none. One of the spectators, deeply affected, implored her to yield—"Dear Margaret, say, God save the king!"† The poor girl answered calmly, but firmly, "God save him if He will, for it is his salvation I desire." Her friends eagerly cried out to the major, "Sir, she has said it! she has said it!"—"Will she take the abjuration oath, then?" demanded Winram—"I will not," was her firm reply. "I am one of Christ's children—let me go!" And she was immediately thrown into the sea, and the waves closed over her.‡

On the 5th of May two men, named Peter Gillies and John Bryce, belonging to Ayrshire, were condemned to death by a military tribunal, not for any act of rebellion, but, as their indictment

* "Let not the errors of my youth,
Nor sins, remembered be;
In mercy, for thy goodness' sake,
O Lord remember me!" &c.

† Sir George Mackenzie, in his apology for the atrocious proceedings of the government, in which he took a leading part, asserts that none suffered during the reign of Charles II. who would say, "God save the king!" This statement is false; for many suffered who were quite willing to say these words. But the unscrupulous tool of tyranny conceals the fact, of which he was quite well aware, that when the prisoners at the bar asked the meaning of the words referred to, they were told that they implied the acknowledgment not only of the civil but of the ecclesiastical supremacy of the king, and were therefore regarded by the persecutors, no less than by their victims, as a virtual renunciation of the presbyterian principles.

‡ Wodrow, vol. ii. chap. ix.

expressly bears, merely for holding the same doctrines which it was alleged had impelled others to rebel. They were immediately hanged, and their bodies buried at the foot of the gallows.*

Six days later, three poor labouring men, who had adopted the opinion that it was sinful to pray for those who had been predestined to perdition, were stopped in the neighbourhood of Glasgow by an officer, who asked whether they would pray for the king. They refused to do so unless he were one of the elect, and were instantly shot.†

But amidst all the atrocities perpetrated by the government and its instruments Murder of during these "troubled times," John Brown of the murder of John Brown, the Priesthill. "Christian carrier," by Claverhouse, has taken the deepest hold upon the minds of the Scottish people, and has contributed probably more than any other of his crimes to render his memory abhorred by them down to the present hour. The story is told by the chroniclers of the day with almost scriptural simplicity and pathos. Brown lived at a place called Priesthill, in the parish of Muirkirk. His cottage, which has since been demolished, stood on the brow of an eminence, surrounded by an extensive tract of heath, moss, and rocks. He was originally intended for the church;‡ but an impediment in his speech rendered him unfit for that profession, and he became a carrier, conveying on packhorses the produce of the farmers and shepherds of the district to the neighbouring towns. He was a man of amiable manners and great intelligence, and was respected by all who knew him for his singular piety and strict integrity. He had taken no part in the risings of these sad times, and the persecutors, like the envious courtiers of King Darius, "could find none occasion nor fault against him, except concerning the law of his God." His only offences were his absence from the ministrations of the curate of the parish, and his holding intercourse with the fugitive ministers of his own faith. He was married to Marion Weir, a woman of great excellence of character and strength of mind, of a lively and humorous disposition, and a cheerful temper. The marriage ceremony was performed at a conventicle, in 1682, by Alexander Peden, one of the most celebrated of the Cameronian ministers, who addressed the bride in the following singular terms:—"You have got a good husband, value him highly. Keep linen for a winding-sheet beside you, for in a day when you least expect he may be taken from you." This pious couple lived very happily together; and to this day "the domestic peace and comfort of Priesthill are talked of in the district in which they lived.* Many a little meeting for worship was held at their fireside; but as the persecution waxed hotter these meetings were broken up. Three of the little band who attended them were murdered in the months of February and March, 1685; and the "inoffensive Christian carrier" himself was often obliged to seek shelter amid the moors of Kyle and Lanarkshire. On the 30th of April, Peden, who had for some time found refuge in Ireland, but had now returned to Scotland, paid a visit to Priesthill.† The aged minister, worn out with his labours and wanderings, readily found the shelter which he sought. He stayed all night; and in the morning, when he bade the family farewell, as he turned from the door, he said twice to himself, "Poor woman! a fearful morning—a dark misty morning!"‡ After the departure of his guest, John Brown took a spade in his hand, and went to the hill to prepare some peat ground. It was about six o'clock, and the morning was dark and foggy, so that before he was aware, Claverhouse, who had spent the previous night at the village of Lesmahagow, came upon him with three troops of dragoons, and brought him down to the door of his own house. A brief examination ensued, in which John at once admitted that he did not attend the public worship of the episcopalians, and stated his reasons so clearly and tersely (though he usually stammered much upon addressing a stranger), that Claverhouse asked his guides if they had ever heard Brown preach. "No, no," was the reply; "he never was a preacher."—"If he has never preached," said Graham, "meikle § has he prayed in his time." Then turning to his prisoner, he said, "Go to your prayers, for you shall immediately die." The poor man obeyed; and kneeling down, began to pray with great power and fervour. Three times did the brutal persecutor interrupt him: once when, in allusion to the sufferings of the covenanters, he was pleading that the Lord would spare a remnant, and not make a full end in the day of his anger. "I gave you time, to pray," said Claverhouse, "and ye are begun to preach."—"Sir," said his meek and patient victim, turning round on his knees, "you know the nature neither of preaching nor praying, if you call this preaching." When his devotions were ended, Claverhouse said to him, "Take good night of your wife and children." Turning to his wife, who was standing by with his two children,

* Wodrow, vol. ii. chap. ix.

† Ibid.

‡ Brown's training for the office of the ministry, however, was not lost. "Every Monday evening he met with the young persons of the neighbourhood, and instructed them from the Bible and the Confession of Faith. In summer they assembled in a sheep-bught, and in winter they formed a circle around a large fire of peat and cannel-coal, that blazed in the middle of the spence-floor. The effects of the substantial instruction these rustics got is felt to this day in that neighbourhood."—Scot's Worthies, p. 576.

Brown calmly said, "Now, Marion, the day is come that I told you would come, when I spake first to you of marrying me."—"Indeed, John," she replied, "in this cause I am willing to part with you."—"Then," said he, "this is all I desire; I have no more to do but to die." He kissed his wife and children, and wished "purchased and promised blessings" to be multiplied to them, and his blessing. Claverhouse then ordered six soldiers to shoot him; but the fervent prayers of poor Brown, and the appearance of his wife, holding one child by the hand, carrying another in her arms, and evidently again about to become a mother, produced such an impression on the minds of the hard-hearted troopers, that they shrank from the fearful crime of murdering her husband before her face, till in the end Claverhouse was forced to become the executioner himself, and, in a fury, shot him dead with his own hand.* She had never before this tragic event (as she told Patrick Walker, sitting upon her husband's gravestone), been able to look at blood without being in danger to faint; yet she was helped to be a witness to all this without either fainting or confusion, except that when the shots went off her eyes dazzled. When the horrid deed was perpetrated, the murderer turned to the widow, and said, "What thinkest thou of thy husband now, woman?"—"I ever thought meikle of him," she replied, "and now more than ever."—"It were but justice," said he, "to lay thee beside him."—"If you were permitted," was the rejoinder, "I doubt not but your cruelty would go that length; but how will ye answer for this morning's work?"—"To man I can be answerable," said the bloodthirsty ruffian; "and as for God I will take him in my own hands." He then mounted his horse, and rode off, leaving the widow with the corpse of her husband lying there. After the departure of the dragoons, the heroic woman set her child on the ground, and gathered together her husband's brains, tied up his head, straightened his body, and covered it with her plaid; and these duties being discharged, she sat down beside the corpse, and wept bitterly.† The cold-blooded wickedness of

* Memoirs of John Brown of Priesthill, with Preface, by William M'Gavin, p. 21.

† Peden's reputation has suffered not a little from the exaggerations of his humble and uneducated admirers, who were in the habit of referring his predictions to inspiration. He was undoubtedly an enthusiast, though at the same time a man of great sagacity, and a keen judge of human motives. One half of the stories told of him are not true; and the book entitled "Peden's Prophecies" is not genuine.

‡ The psalm sung by them at family worship on this fatal morning was the xxvii., and the portion of Scripture read was the sixteenth chapter of the Gospel of St. John, which closes with the words, "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world."

§ Much.

* Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 503; Patrick Walker's Life of Peden, p. 74. Walker says the soldiers did fire; and "that the most part of the bullets came upon Brown's head, and scattered his brains upon the ground." Walker's account came from the wife of the murdered man; and as she "was in danger to faint, and her eyes were dazzled," it is a matter of no surprise if she could not tell distinctly from whom the shot came. See also "Scot's Worthies," p. 581; "Cloud of Witnesses," appendix, p. 382; and "A Short Memorial of the Sufferings and Grievances of the Presbyterians in Scotland," printed in the year 1690. The eulogists of Claverhouse have sought in various ways to extenuate the murder of Brown; and one of the most recent of their number has ventured, in the face of the clearest contemporary evidence, as well as of the reluctant admission of friends, to deny that this deed, which he characterises as "a dastardly and unprovoked murder," was perpetrated by Claverhouse at all. See Appendix L.

† John Brown was buried at the end of his house, with the following inscription on his gravestone:—

"In earth's cold bed the dusty part here lies
Of one who did the earth as dust despise;
Here, in this place, from earth he took departure—
Now he has got the garland of the martyr," &c.

this barbarous deed is of itself sufficient to stamp the character of Claverhouse with eternal infamy; and it is stated on good authority that even on his obdurate heart and seared conscience the prayers of John Brown produced an impression which was never altogether worn off.

A few days after the murder of the Priesthill

Atrocious conduct of Johnstone of Westerhall.

martyr another atrocious deed was perpetrated in Eskdale. One of the prescribed wanderers, labouring under a mortal disease, had found shelter under the roof of a respectable widow, named Hislop, and had died there. This offence came to the knowledge of Johnstone of Westerhall, the proprietor of the estate on which she lived,—an apostate from presbyterianism, who hated with peculiar bitterness the faith which he had abandoned, and laboured to gain the favour of the government by his vindictive persecution of the covenanters. This petty tyrant pulled down the house of the poor widow, drove out her and her younger children to wander in the fields, robbed her of her furniture, and dragged her son Andrew, who was a mere youth, before Claverhouse, that sentence of death might be passed upon him. Claverhouse, strange to say, expressed pity for the poor lad. Since the murder of Brown he had exhibited some marks of compunction, and now urged delay. But Westerhall, eager to signalise his loyalty, insisted that the sentence should be immediately executed, and Claverhouse yielded, saying, "The blood of this poor man be upon you: I am free of it." The captain of a Highland company, who was present with his men, was asked, but peremptorily refused to execute this iniquitous sentence, and Claverhouse ordered three of his own dragoons to do it. When they were ready to fire, the youth was told to pull his bonnet over his face. "No!" was his undaunted reply; "I can look my death-bringers in the face without fear—I have done nothing of which I need be ashamed." Then holding up his Bible, he charged them to answer for what they were about to do at the great day, when they should be judged by what is written in that Book. He received their fire without shrinking, and was buried in the moor.*

As the Scottish parliament was expected to be more obsequious than the English to the royal will, the meeting of the Estates at Edinburgh was hurried on, while the session of the English houses was postponed, for the express purpose, as James admitted, of affording the former an opportunity to exhibit an example of dutiful obedience to the king's commands. The meeting was opened on the 28th of April, by Queensberry, as commissioner. As every presbyterian was excluded by the test, this assembly was composed entirely of episcopalians, and showed itself even more base and obsequious than its predecessors in its readiness to sacrifice the rights and liberties of the nation on the shrine of arbitrary power. The Estates were plainly informed by his majesty in the letter, which was read to them at the opening, that he was determined to maintain his prerogative in its highest lustre; that compliance with his demands was necessary rather for their own security than for his aggrandisement; and that as nothing had been left unattempted by certain "fanatical murderers and assassins, wild and inhuman traitors," to overturn the public peace, he trusted that nothing would be wanting on the part of the parliament to inflict merited punishment on them for their crimes. The commissioner and the chancellor enlarged successively on the royal letter, and eagerly pressed the extirpation of the Cameronians, not merely as rebels to the king, but as inveterate enemies to mankind.

* Wodrow; Cloud of Witnesses.

The confidence of James in the servility of the Scottish parliament was not mis- —its baseness placed. They drew up a declara- and servility.

tion of duty, in which they expressed their abhorrence of every principle derogatory to the king's sacred, supreme, sovereign, absolute authority, and promised an unreserved obedience to his commands. The whole nation, between sixteen and sixty, was placed at his disposal. The duties which had been granted to the late king were annexed in perpetuity to the crown; and an additional income of two hundred and sixteen thousand pounds Scots, equivalent to eighteen thousand pounds sterling, was settled on James for life. The most iniquitous acts of the privy council and of the judiciary court were legalised by ex post facto enactments; and an ample indemnity was granted to all the officers of the crown, civil and military, for their illegal proceedings. The demand of the king for new and more stringent penal laws against the presbyterians was promptly and zealously obeyed. It was enacted, by a statute of peculiar atrocity, that whoever

Enactment of more stringent laws against the presbyterians.

should expound the Holy Scriptures in a house where five persons in addition to the members of the family were present, or should attend either as preacher or hearer a field-meeting, should be punished with death and confiscation of goods.* The refusal to give evidence against persons suspected of treason or nonconformity was converted into the same crimes of which they were accused. To administer or receive the covenant, to write in its defence, or to acknowledge its obligation, was declared treason. The test was extended to nearly all classes of the community, under the penalty of a fine, at the discretion of the council. The Earl of Loudoun, Lord Melville, Fletcher Attainder of Saltoun, Sir Patrick Hume, Sir of the exiles. James Dalrymple, Sir John Cochrane, and other exiles, were attainted, and their estates forfeited; and Campbell of Cesnock and his son, though acquitted by the verdict of a jury, to gratify the rapacity of Melfort, were deprived of their estates, and sent to the Bass. And, finally, this scene of wholesale murder and spoliation was closed by an act by which the estates of Argyll, Baillie of Jerviswood, Porterfield of Duchal, and about twenty others, were for ever annexed to the crown.

* Act. Par. Jam. c. vii., May 8th, 1685.

The insatiable greed of the king and the Origin of courtiers, and the numerous attaints. tainers which the parliament was required to sanction, excited great alarm among the nobility; and it has been conjectured, with much plausibility, that an act which was passed at this time to authorise the perpetual entail of lands, ostensibly for the purpose of preserving their estates from alienation or debts, was really intended to secure them from the rapacity of the crown. As it is a maxim in law that a person attainted can forfeit nothing more than he was entitled to alienate, the possession of an entailed estate would, in the event of an attainder, forfeit merely his own life-rent interest in the property. In this way the family would be preserved from ruin, and the iniquitous laws which now disgraced the statute-book would be at least partially evaded. It was owing to this cause that strict entails were introduced into Scotland at a period when other countries were freeing themselves from the trammels of the feudal system. But in adopting this measure to recover their property from the grasp of the crown, the Estates, with that disregard of honesty characteristic of the times, did not hesitate to set aside the just claims of their private creditors.

Meanwhile the Scottish and English exiles in The Scottish and English exiles in Holland, stimulated alike by private and public wrongs, were engaged in planning a double invasion for the deliverance of their respective countries. Monmouth, whose hopes of return to England were utterly extinguished by the death of his father, and the accession of his obstinate and implacable uncle, yielded to the importunity of his associates, and agreed to make a descent on the southern coast of England; while the Earl of Argyll undertook the invasion of Scotland. Associated with the great Highland chieftain were certain Scottish gentlemen, whom the iniquitous measures of the court had driven from their native land, and who were burning with impatience to effect its deliverance from arbitrary power. The chief of these exiles was Sir Patrick Hume of Polwarth, whose escape has already been mentioned. He has been justly described as "a man incapable alike of leading and of following; conceited, captious, and wrong-headed, an endless talker, a sluggard in action against the enemy, and active only against his own allies."* At the very outset the mutual jealousies and contentions of the exiles had nearly ruined the enterprise. At length their differences were compromised, and it was resolved that Argyll should attempt a descent on Scotland, and that Monmouth should, a few days after, land in the west of England, where it was expected that his personal popularity would attract the great body of the people to his standard. It was arranged that Monmouth should be accompanied by Fletcher of Saltoun, a staunch republican, who, though he disapproved of the attempt, yet would not shrink from sharing its dangers along with his friends; while Rumbold and Ayloffe, two of the English exiles, agreed to go with Argyll to Scotland. On the 2nd of May the Scottish expedition, consisting of three ships, set sail from Amsterdam, and after a prosperous voyage reached the Orkneys on the 6th, and anchored off Kirkwall. Argyll's secretary and physician, having very unwisely been allowed to go on shore, were arrested by Mackenzie, the bishop. After losing three days in a fruitless attempt to obtain their release, and in keen debates respecting the course they should pursue, the refugees proceeded to the coast of Argyllshire. —he lands in Scotland.

The government, however, had already been apprised by Mackenzie of the movements of the rebel squadron. Some time before this, indeed, accounts had reached Scotland of the preparations going forward in Holland, and measures had been taken to defeat the expected attempt. The country was put into a state of defence; the militia was ordered to be in readiness; the strongholds in Argyllshire were dismantled or garrisoned; the chiefs of the clan Campbell were summoned to Edinburgh and thrown into prison, while others were compelled to give security for their peaceable behaviour. As soon as the news of the sailing of the expedition arrived, troops were put in motion towards the west coast, and several ships of war were ordered to cruise near the Isle of Bute. On reaching his own country, therefore, Argyll found that effectual precautions had been taken against his attempt, and that even his own clan were disheartened and unable to afford him adequate assistance. From Dunstaffnage, where he first touched, he proceeded to Campbeltown, near the southern extremity of Kintyre. Here he published two manifestoes, one addressed to his clan, recapitulating the personal injuries he had received from the government; the other to the presbyterians, enumerating the sufferings inflicted upon the country by a popish tyrant, and calling upon all true patriots to take up arms for the vindication of the covenant and the overthrow of popery and prelacy. The fiery cross was also sent throughout the district, to summon all the Campbells, from sixteen to sixty, to rally round the banner of their chief. But only about eighteen hundred men obeyed this summons, not more than a third of the number that would have assembled, if the strength and spirit of the clan had been unbroken.

A difference of opinion now arose between the earl and his associates respecting the course they should follow. Argyll proposed that they should first of all expel the royal troops from his domains, and take possession of the Castle of Inverary. A secure base would thus be obtained for their offensive movements. The whole strength of his clan would be at liberty to muster under his banner, and such an accession of strength would enable them to make a descent into the low country with good hopes of success. But Sir Patrick Hume and Sir John Cochrane, who had throughout manifested the greatest jealousy of Argyll, and had pertinaciously thwarted his plans, insisted that they should at once proceed to Ayrshire, where the people were strongly attached to the cause of the covenant. After a long and fierce discussion Argyll gave way, and, against his better judgment, consented to make a compromise, and to allow Cochrane and Hume to advance into the Lowlands with a part of their little army.

* Laing's History, vol. ii. pp. 160, 161.

† Macaulay's History, vol. i. p. 536.

After a fruitless attempt to reach the coast of Ayrshire, which was watched by two English frigates, the insurgents sailed up the estuary of the Clyde as far as Greenock. Here another scene of dissension and wrangling ensued. Cochrane wished to land, for the purpose of obtaining provisions. Hume, of course, objected; and Elphinstone, a subordinate officer, whom Cochrane ordered to go on shore at the head of twenty men, refused to obey. Major Fullarton, another of the officers, then made the attempt with only twelve men, and, after a slight skirmish, drove back a body of militia, by whom the place was guarded, and obtained a supply of meal. They were completely disappointed, however, in their expectations of assistance from the Lowland covenanters. The more moderate of the party were crushed by oppression or overawed by the presence of the military, and regarded as hopeless the attempt to overthrow the government, hateful though it was to the great body of the people; while the Cameronians cherished a vindictive recollection of the ravages of the Highland host, and of the support which Argyll himself had given to the persecuting government, and refused to unite with him on the grounds set forth in his manifesto.

On the failure of their hopes of assistance from the presbyterians of Renfrew and Ayr, Cochrane and Hume rejoined Argyll, who had proceeded to the island of Bute. Difficulties now gathered thick around the devoted band, but still their dissensions were as violent as ever, and the two parties seemed even about to come to blows. They at length agreed to garrison a fort on the small island of Eillangheirrig, at the mouth of Loch Ridden, and there disembarked the military stores. Their ships were moored close to the walls of the fort, out of the reach, as was supposed, of the royal frigates, and some outworks were thrown up for their protection. Leaving a portion of his troops to protect the place, Argyll proceeded towards Inverary, but was obliged speedily to retrace his steps by the intelligence that the king's frigates were threatening Eillangheirrig. The earl proposed to attack the enemy with his ships, assisted by thirty large fishing-boats manned with Highlanders; but, as usual, the committee resolutely opposed the plan, and even excited a mutiny among the sailors.

The ill-fated enterprise was now rapidly hastening to ruin. The committee had reserved to themselves the superintendence of the stores, and these had been so mismanaged and wasted that provisions began to fail, and the Highlanders consequently deserted in great numbers. In these disheartening circumstances, Argyll at length yielded to the urgency of the committee, and agreed to make a descent into the Lowlands. The insurgents accordingly marched towards Dunbartonshire, but they had scarcely reached the eastern shore of Loch Long, which they crossed by night in boats, when news reached them that the royal frigates had forced a passage through the shallows and captured their ships, and that Elphinstone, who had most unwisely been left in command at Eillangheirrig, had, without a blow, abandoned the fort and all their stores to the enemy.

Argyll resolves to make a descent on the Lowlands—

Affairs were now all but desperate. The means of escape were cut off; provisions and ammunition were lost; while the Marquis of Atholl was advancing on one side, the Duke of Gordon on another, and the Earl of Dunbarton was preparing to oppose the little army of the exiles in front. In this extremity Argyll resolved boldly to march to Glasgow, and resolutely persevered, in spite of the opposition of Hume and his associates, who now abandoned the plan they had up to this time pertinaciously urged, and proposed that they should take up a strong position among the Highland fastnesses. On the 16th of June they crossed the river Leven, three miles above Dunbarton, and marched eastward to the village of Kilmaronock "weary and hungry enough." A strong body of regular troops and militia now appeared in front, and Argyll proposed to attack them; but his intention was overruled by Hume and the other officers, and it was resolved to give the enemy the slip by decamping during the night and hastening towards Glasgow. The guides, however, mistook the way, and led the troops into a morass, where the baggage and horses were lost. All order and subordination instantly ceased. Numbers lost their way, and were separated from the main body; hundreds deserted under cover of the darkness; and next morning only five hundred men, worn out with fatigue and hunger, assembled at Kilpatrick.

March to Glasgow resolved on.

The enterprise was now at an end. The little band of disheartened fugitives broke up and dispersed. Cochrane and Hume, with a small body of men, forced a passage over the Clyde, at Erskine House, repulsed a party of militia who opposed them, and fled into Ayrshire, where Cochrane was betrayed by his uncle's wife,* and sent up to London. Hume once more escaped to the Continent, to return in the train of the Prince of Orange. Argyll endeavoured, but without success, to obtain shelter in the house of one of his retainers who lived near Kilpatrick. He then crossed the Clyde in the disguise of a countryman, along with Major Fullarton, to whom he professed to act as guide. On reaching Inchinnan, near Paisley, they attempted to cross the river Cart by a ford, which was guarded by a party of militia. Something in Argyll's appearance excited their suspicions, and they attempted to seize him. He sprang into the stream, and kept five assailants at bay, for a short time, with —his capture at Inchinnan— his pistols; but the water had rendered his weapons useless, and he was struck to the ground with a broadsword, and secured, exclaiming as he fell, "Alas! unfortunate Argyll." His captors were moved with pity when they discovered the rank of their prisoner, but they dared not release him.† He was first of all conveyed to Renfrew, and thence to Edinburgh. Every kind of indignity was heaped upon him during his journey, but he bore it all with astonishing patience and equanimity. He was led up the Canongate and High Street like a common malefactor, with his hands bound behind his back and his head bare, preceded by the executioner bearing the axe. On reaching the castle he was put in irons, and informed that the privy council, by the command of the king, had determined not to bring him to a new trial for his rebellion, but to put him to death under his former iniquitous sentence.

He was required by the privy council to answer —he is certain questions upon oath, and threatened was threatened with the torture, with torture— by the positive orders of the king himself, to compel him to reveal the names of his supporters. "This atrocious threat, however, was not carried into effect, though it is certain that the earl resolutely declined to say anything that could injure his friends. "I have named none to their disadvantage," he wrote on the morning of his execution; "I thank God, he hath supported me —his firmness and composure in prison. wonderfully!" The night before his death he composed his own epitaph, a short poem written in a simple and forcible style, vindicating his character from the aspersions of his enemies—complaining that his fall was caused more by his friends than by his foes, though the latter had thrice sentenced him to death; and expressing his confident hope that though Providence had frowned on his attempt, God would at length vindicate the cause of his oppressed people, and by another hand rescue the faithful remnant, and bruise the serpent's head.

His wife and daughters had been apprehended by order of the privy council, as soon as the rumour of his invasion reached Scotland, and confined in the Castle of Edinburgh, so that he had the opportunity of spending a few hours in their society. To his sister, Lady Lothian, who was deeply affected in bidding him farewell, he said, "I am now loosed from you and all earthly satisfactions, and long to be with Christ, which is far better. It seems the Lord thought me not fit to be an instrument in his work; but I die in the faith of it, that it will advance, and that the Lord will appear for it. I hear they cannot agree about the manner of my death, but I am assured of my salvation; as for my body, I care not what they do with it. Sister," he added, while his heart filled at the thought of his afflicted wife, "be kind to my Jeanie." "We must not part like those not to meet again," were his farewell words to his step-daughter, Lady Sophia Lindsay, who had formerly saved his life by aiding his escape from prison.

Although the earl spoke strongly of the folly and perversity of his associates, he expressed no regret on account of the enterprise itself; but he professed deep penitence for his former unworthy compliance with the sinful measures of the government, and his conformity to the worship of the Established Church. But though he was not worthy, he said, to be the instrument of delivering the nation from the yoke of bondage, and the Church from her oppressors, and his attempt had failed, yet he felt assured that the good cause would ultimately triumph. "I do not," he added, "take on myself to be a prophet, but I have a strong impression on my spirit that deliverance will come very suddenly."

On the day of his execution he dined and conversed at table with great cheerfulness, and, having been accustomed to sleep after dinner, he lay down as he was wont and took a short slumber. At this time one of the officers of state came to visit him with a message from the privy council, and demanded admittance. He was told that the earl was asleep; but, thinking this a mere subterfuge, he insisted on entering. The door of the apartment was softly opened, and he was permitted to look in. The sight of the prisoner, to whose destruction he had contributed, sleeping placidly on his bed overwhelmed him with remorse and shame. He ran out of the castle in a state bordering on distraction, took refuge in the house of a female relative who lived hard by, and flung himself in agony on a couch. After reiterated inquiries respecting the cause of his terror and anguish, he at length exclaimed, "I have seen Argyll, within an hour of eternity, sleeping as pleasantly as a child. But as for me—"

On leaving his bed, the earl was brought down from the castle to the council-house, where he was to remain till the hour for his execution. During that brief interval he wrote the following farewell letter to his wife :—"Dear heart,—God is unchangeable; He hath always been good and gracious to me, and no place alters it. Forgive me all my faults; and now comfort thyself in Him in whom only true comfort is to be found. The Lord be with thee, bless and comfort thee, my dearest! Adieu." To his step-daughter and daughter-in-law, Lady Sophia,* for whom he entertained a peculiar regard, he wrote :—"My dear Lady Sophia,—What shall I say in this great day of the Lord, wherein, in the midst of a cloud, I find a fair sunshine? I can wish no more for you but that the Lord may comfort you and shine upon you as He doth upon me, and give you the same sense of his love in staying in the world, as I have in going out of it. Adieu." On the same day, before leaving the castle, he bade farewell to his second son :—"Dear John,—We parted suddenly, but I hope shall meet happily in heaven. I pray God bless you; and if you seek Him, He will be found of you. My wife will say all to you; pray love and respect her. I am your loving father, Argyll."†

* In revenge for the death of her brother, Captain Cleland, who fell in a skirmish between the fugitives and a troop of soldiers who sought to hinder their flight into Ayrshire.

† One of these militia men was named Riddell, and so hateful did the whole of the race of the Riddells in consequence become to the Campbells, that within the present century a horse-dealer bearing that name, on visiting Balloch fair, near Loch Lomond, found it necessary to assume the name of Ridet. The spot where the earl was taken is marked by a stone, which is termed by the country people "Argyll's stone."

After writing these letters, he proceeded to the place of execution at the Cross, accompanied by a number of his friends, and some episcopalian divines. On the scaffold his behaviour was remarkably composed, and even cheerful. He addressed the spectators in a speech which breathed the spirit of piety and resignation, and declared that he forgave his enemies as he hoped to be forgiven. One of the episcopalian clergymen who attended him said aloud, so as to be heard by all the people, "This nobleman dies a protestant."—"Yes," said the earl, stepping forward, "I die not only a protestant, but with a heart-hatred of popery, prelacy, and all superstition." He next took leave —his execution. of his friends, delivered to Lord Maitland some tokens of remembrance to his wife and children, and kneeling down, laid his head on the block, and prayed for a little space. He then uttered aloud three times the words, "Lord Jesus, receive me into glory!" and having given the signal to the executioner by raising his hand, the axe descended and severed his head from his body, and it was soon after fixed on the top of the Tol-booth.‡

Rumbold and Ayloffe, the two Englishmen who had accompanied Argyll in his unfortunate expedition, and who had displayed throughout a degree of sense and courage which presented a striking contrast to the folly and perversity of many of their coadjutors, lost their way during the night march from Loch Lomond to Kilpatrick, and were unable to rejoin the main body of their associates. Next day they were attacked by a party of militia, and after a desperate resistance, in which Rumbold was mortally wounded, they were captured and brought to Edinburgh. Rumbold had originally been an officer in the army of Cromwell; at the Restoration he became a maltster, and was the owner of the building from which the Rye-House Plot took its name. He was deeply implicated in that conspiracy, and was, therefore, peculiarly obnoxious to the government, who resolved to bring him immediately to trial, "that he might not prevent his public execution by his death."* He was accordingly tried, found guilty, Trial and execution of Rumbold and Ayloffe. and condemned to be executed within a few hours. He solemnly denied, as a dying man, that he had designed to assassinate the king; but frankly admitted his accession to Argyll's invasion, and the part which he had taken as an officer in the army of the insurgents. He vindicated his conduct by the sacred duty incumbent upon all freemen to resist oppression and tyranny; and declared that he never would believe that Providence had sent the greater part of mankind into the world with saddles on their backs and bridles in their mouths, and some few ready booted and spurred to ride them. "I desire," he added, "to bless and magnify God's holy name for this, that I stand here not for any wrong that I have done, but for adhering to his cause in an evil day. If every hair of my head were a life, in this quarrel I would venture them all." He was drawn to the place of execution on a hurdle; "for, laying aside the ignominy," says Fountainhall, "he was not able to walk by reason of his wounds. He carried himself discreetly enough, and heard the ministers, but took none of them to the scaffold with him." His courage and equanimity extorted the reluctant admiration even of his enemies. On the scaffold he began to pray on behalf of the "good old cause," which he had supported to the death; but the officers commanded the drums to beat lest the people should hear him. The sentence of the judiciary court was executed upon him to the letter, with all its revolting barbarities. His head was placed on the west port of Edinburgh, and his quarters were sent to Glasgow, Dumfries, New Galloway, and Jedburgh; but by order of the king they were afterwards carried up to London.†

Colonel Ayloffe, who had joined the expedition rather from political than religious motives, and was, indeed, suspected of infidelity or atheism, when brought as a prisoner to Glasgow, attempted to destroy himself with a penknife; but his wounds, though severe, were not mortal, and he was sent

* The earl was married to the widow of the first Earl of Balcarres. Her daughter, Lady Sophia, was the wife of Charles, one of the sons of Argyll. The earl also wrote a brief farewell letter to her sister, Lady Henrietta.

† Wodrow, vol. ii.; Lives of the Lindsays, vol. ii. p. 153.

‡ The cruel and vindictive character of James was displayed in his causing two medals to be struck to commemorate his triumph over an innocent nobleman, whom his own injustice had reduced to despair. On the one medal were the heads of Argyll and Monmouth placed on altars, the bleeding bodies beneath, with an inscription, Sic aras et sceptrâ tuetur (Thus we defend our altars and sceptres); on the other, their heads upon spikes, and the inscription, Ambitio maledicta ruit (Ill-advising ambition brings ruin). (Laing, vol. ii. p. 166.)

* Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 529–546; Burnet, vol. iii. pp. 17–23; Fox's History of James, vol. ii. pp. 163–164, 178–211; McCrie's Life of Bryson.

† Fountainhall's Decision; Fox's History; Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 548–576.

up to London, in the hope that some more ample information respecting the plot might be extracted from him. He was brought before the privy council, and examined by the king himself, but without effect. He firmly refused to save his own life by criminating his associates. "You had better be frank with me," said James, "you know it is in my power to pardon you."—"It may be in your power," was the cutting rejoinder, "but it is not in your nature." In spite of his connection by affinity with the late Chancellor Clarendon, the father-in-law of James, he was executed under his former outlawry, and died with great firmness and composure.*

Sir John Cochrane, who, as we have seen, had been betrayed by his uncle's wife, was condemned to be hanged at the Cross of Edinburgh; but he was ultimately sent up to London, and his pardon purchased by his father, who gave a bribe of five thousand pounds to James's priests.†

The unsuccessful attempt of Argyll to vindicate the liberties of his country was inflicted on the most disgraceful severities towards his defenceless retainers. Upwards of twenty of the most considerable gentlemen of his clan were put to death by the Marquis of Atholl, and many of his humbler followers were hanged without a trial. Argyll's son Charles, the husband of Lady Sophia Lindsay, fell into the hands of this titled savage while ill of a fever, and but for the interference of the privy council, at the intercession of some ladies, Atholl would have hanged him before his father's gate at Inverary. He laid waste the whole district with fire and sword, and with malignant cruelty burnt the houses, destroyed the nets and fishing-boats, cut down the fruit trees, and broke in pieces the millstones, in order to deprive the miserable inhabitants of their only means of subsistence. More than three hundred persons of both sexes were transported to the colonies and sold for slaves, and many of them were previously deprived of their ears by the hangman, and branded in the cheek with a hot iron.

During the alarm created by Argyll's invasion, the privy council ordered all the covenanters who were in prison to be sent to the Castle of Dunnottar, in the county of Kincardine, for their more safe custody. They performed this toilsome journey on foot, and were compelled to march with their hands tied behind their backs, as if they had been most dangerous criminals. Every kind of indignity and outrage was heaped upon them. At night they were thrust into crowded and unwholesome apartments in the jails, and one tempestuous night of wind and rain they spent without shelter, upon a bridge across the North Esk, in Forfarshire. When they reached the place of their destination they were, to the number of one hundred and sixty-seven persons, including several women and children, thrust into a dark subterranean vault full of mire, and with only one small window opening to the sea. Their guards treated them with the most shocking inhumanity, allowed them neither bedding nor provisions, excepting what they bought, and made them pay for every indulgence, and even for the water with which they were supplied. In a few days about forty of these unhappy prisoners were removed into a smaller vault, into which light entered only by a chink; and they were compelled to stretch themselves on the damp floor, in order to obtain the benefit of a current of fresh air which entered through a decayed part of the wall close to the ground. Many of them died in consequence of this horrid confinement, and the tortures to which they were subjected. At the intercession of the governor's wife, their sufferings were at length somewhat alleviated; by their removal to apartments better ventilated. Twenty-five of them succeeded in making their escape down the precipitous rock on which the castle was built, but fifteen of these were betrayed by the neighbouring peasantry and retaken. They suffered the most cruel tortures at the hands of the soldiery, and were bound down to the floor of their dungeon with fiery matches burning for several hours between their fingers. Several of them expired under this diabolical treatment, and the fingers of others were reduced to ashes. In consequence of a strong representation which was made to the council regarding these atrocities, orders were given that provisions and other necessities should be allowed to the prisoners on moderate terms, and that they should not be crowded together so closely in their dungeon. It was supposed that by this time their patience and fortitude would be exhausted by the dreadful sufferings they had undergone; and the Earls of Errol and Kintore were appointed to ascertain whether they would take the test, and promise to attend in future their parish churches. But they all stood faithful to their principles. —many of them sold for slaves.

About the end of July they were brought to Leith, and those who adhered to their resolution, and persisted in refusing the test, were transported to the plantations.*

Meanwhile Monmouth and his associates, according to their concerted plan, had undertaken the invasion of England, and six days before the capture of Argyll they landed at Lyme, in Dorsetshire. A considerable number of the yeomanry and peasantry flocked to the standard of the adventurer. But it soon became evident that he was totally disqualified to conduct such an enterprise; and on the 6th of July the insurgents were routed with great slaughter at Sedgemoor, near Bridgewater, in Somersetshire. Monmouth was taken and executed, and many hundreds of his followers shared his unhappy fate, or were sold into slavery; and the bloody "campaign," as

* Burnet, vol. i. p. 634.

† Ibid.

* Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 558—567; Walker's Vindication of Cameron, &c., p. 177; Introduction to "Old Mortality."

James himself had the barbarity to term it,* of the infamous Jeffreys spread carnage and mourning throughout the western counties of England.

The destruction of Argyll and Monmouth having strengthened the authority of the king, and freed him from all fear of opposition, he now began to throw off the mask, and to endeavour openly to establish popery and arbitrary power. His dis-

Arbitrary acts of James. pening at once, by his own authority, with all the penal laws affecting the Romanists; his annulling the test and the oath of supremacy; his re-establishment of the oppressive and vexatious court of high commission; and many other arbitrary acts of a similar kind, left the people no room for doubt that James intended to usurp despotic authority both over the bodies and consciences of his subjects, and to destroy alike their civil and religious liberties.

Proceedings of a similar kind were adopted in Scotland, but much more openly and boldly than the infatuated monarch at first ventured to do in the southern division of the island. Royal letters Encourage- were sent down to the privy council, authorising Roman Catholics to hold offices without taking the test.

Strict injunctions were issued to the clergy that they should not preach against popery, because to do so was "insulting to the king's religion;" the printers and booksellers of the capital were charged by the chancellor not to publish any work without his licence; and the shops of the booksellers were ransacked, and all publications on the errors of Romanism were seized and committed to the flames. A bookseller, named James Glen, more courageous than the rest, told the messengers of the court that he had in his shop one book which denounced popery more severely than all the other books in the world. They required him to produce it, and he showed them a copy of the Bible.† Crowds of popish priests flocked to Scotland from the Continent; a college of Jesuits was established in the palace for the gratuitous instruction of youth; images, crosses, and other similar articles, the importation of which was illegal, were now allowed to pass the Custom-house unchallenged; and a chapel was fitted up in the chancellor's house for the private celebration of mass. These proceed-

Riot in Edinburgh. ings excited great commotion in Edinburgh, and a riot ensued, in which several citizens lost their lives by the fire of the soldiers, who were called out to quell the mob, and to protect the mansion in which the obnoxious rites were celebrated. Several of the rioters were hanged, but the popular sympathy ran strongly in their favour, and the chancellor and his master were held in universal detestation.

Queensberry, the lord-treasurer, had for some years enjoyed the confidence of James, which, indeed, he had well merited by his Disgrace of Queensberry. combined servility and cruelty; but he was a zealous Protestant, and he had distinctly informed the king that he would be no party to any attack upon the Established Church. The chancellor and his Apostacy of Perth and Melfort. brother, Melfort, the bitter rivals of the treasurer, sought to supplant him in the royal favour by the unflinching expedient of apostatising from the Protestant religion; and they now embraced the Romish faith, declaring that their conversion was owing to the papers found in the strong-box of Charles II. The baseness of their conduct, which disgusted every honourable man, whether Protestant or Papist, proved a sure passport to the favour of James. The supreme power in the government was speedily intrusted to them. Queensberry, whom they accused of prompting the attack upon the popish chapel, was dismissed from the office of treasurer and reduced to the inferior position of president of the council; he was at the same time removed from the government of the Castle of Edinburgh, and that important post was conferred upon the Duke of Gordon, a staunch Romanist.

* "Lord Chancellor has almost done his campaign; he has already condemned several hundreds, some of whom are already executed; more are to be, and the others sent to the plantation."—James's Letters. (Dalrymple's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 63.)

† Fountainhall, vol. i. p. 398.

At this juncture his majesty wrote to the Scottish privy council explaining to them his plans. His object was king. to obtain for the members of his own Church exemption from civil pains and penalties on account of their religious belief, but to leave the covenanters still exposed to the vengeance of the law. The members of the council, however, Opposition of usually so obsequious to the royal the council. will, expressed great reluctance to comply with this monstrous demand; and James, who was exceedingly provoked at their refusal, ordered three of their number—the Duke of Hamilton, Sir George Lockhart, and General Drummond, brother of the chancellor, and of Melfort—to attend him at Westminster. Encouraged, however, by the strong dissatisfaction with the royal measures which they found prevailing at the English court, the three Scottish councillors refused to remove the Roman Catholic disabilities, unless a similar relief should be extended to the presbyterians, and the king should give a solemn promise not to attempt to destroy or injure the Protestant religion. James, however, positively refused to comply with these conditions, and the three nobles returned to Scotland in a frame of mind by no means favourable to the royal schemes.

The Scottish parliament assembled at Edinburgh on the 29th of April, 1686. Queens- Meeting of parliament. berry, who had formerly held the office of lord-high-commissioner, was now set aside, and this dignity was conferred on the Earl of Moray, as a reward for his recent apostacy from the faith of which his illustrious ancestor, the "good Regent," had been the zealous defender. A letter from the king was read, recommending the repeal of the penal laws against the Roman Catholics, and offering in return a free trade with England and an indemnity for state offences.* But even the servile courtiers and placemen, of whom this parliament was mainly composed, had become apprehensive of the king's designs. The popular abhorrence of popery had been deepened by the recent revocation of the edict of Nantes and the persecutions inflicted by the French king on his unoffending Protestant subjects, many thousands of whom had taken refuge in England; and the episcopalians, hitherto the willing tools of James, began now to dread that the same sufferings which they had inflicted on the covenanters were reserved for themselves. To the astonishment of the king, Evasive answer of the Estates.

James recommends the repeal of the Romish disabilities.

therefore, the Estates, instead of returning an answer, as formerly, echoing the royal sentiments, merely declared that "they would take his majesty's letter into their serious and dutiful consideration, and go as great lengths therein as their consciences would allow." And a large and respectable minority, including nearly all the representatives of the burghs, voted even against this answer as too courtly.†

An act for the removal of the penalties attached to the Romish worship was proposed to the lords of the articles, without whose consent no statute could be laid before the Estates for their consideration; but, though this committee was virtually nominated by the king, and was usually most submissive to his will, they proved refractory on this occasion. The greater part even of the bishops opposed the royal demand, and were warmly supported by the Duke of Hamilton, Sir George Lockhart, and General Drummond, who had just returned from their interview with James in London. The duke declared that, though a faithful and loyal subject, he could not obey his majesty in opposition to the dictates of his conscience. The chancellor said that conscience was a vague word, which might signify anything or nothing. On which Lockhart rejoined, "If conscience be a word without meaning, we will change it for another phrase, which I hope means something. For conscience let us put the fundamental laws of Scotland."‡

James was exceedingly provoked at this unexpected opposition from a quarter whence he had been accustomed to expect unhesitating support. Some of his refractory courtiers he warned and menaced, others he punished by the withdrawal of their pensions, or by dismissal from the privy council. Cairneross, Archbishop of Glasgow, and Bruce, Bishop of Dunkeld were both displaced. Lord Pitmedin, the only judge who opposed the repeal of the penal laws, was removed from the bench; and Sir George Mackenzie, the lord-advocate, in spite of all his claims on the gratitude of the king by his unscrupulous persecution of the covenanters, was deprived of his office, which was conferred on Sir John Dalrymple. These severe measures, however, failed to terrify the refractory lords of the articles into submission, encouraged as they were by the popular approbation, expressed through both the pulpit and the press. After a contest which lasted several weeks, and excited intense anxiety in England as well as in Scotland, they were induced to propose merely that the Romish form of worship should be tolerated in private families; and it was doubtful whether the Estates would consent to pass even this restricted measure of relief. Dissolution of The commissioner, in despair, adjourned the parliament, which was soon after dissolved by the king.*

Dismissal of Mackenzie and other privy councillors.

Any man capable of discerning the signs of the times must have clearly perceived the peril of the course which James was pursuing; but warnings and expostulations were alike thrown away upon the wrong-headed bigot, who seemed bent on alienating the firmest supporters of his throne. He now declared that since his gracious offer to accept the dutiful assent of the Scottish parliament to his demands had been spurned, he was resolved to dispense by his own authority with all the penal laws affecting Roman Catholics, and to visit with his severe displeasure those who had dared to thwart his schemes. Queensberry was deprived of all his employments, and left to feel the ingratitude of the master for whose sake he had sacrificed the liberties of his country and the rights of his fellow-subjects. To prepare the way for the exercise of the dispensing powers, eleven members of the privy council, including the Earls of Mar, Dumfries, and Glencairn, who had opposed the king's designs in parliament, were dismissed from office, and their places at the board were supplied by papists. As the representatives of the towns had strenuously resisted the proposals of the court, it was now resolved to remodel the burghs, and to deprive them of their privileges by the simple mandate of the sovereign. The annual elections of magistrates and councillors were, therefore, prohibited. The king assumed to himself the right of nominating the provosts, and they in turn appointed the magistrates and town-council; so that the election both of the municipal office-bearers and of their representatives in parliament was transferred to the crown. Having thus punished or intimidated the opponents of his plans, James announced to the remodelled council that the Roman Catholics should now be permitted the free exercise of their religion, and should be at liberty to accept all offices and benefices which he might think fit to bestow on them; that the judges and magis-

Dismissal of Queensberry and others.

The burghs deprived of their privileges.

* Wodrow, vol. ii. pp. 591, 592; Appendix, No. 115; Burnet, vol. iii. p. 87.

† Fountainhall, May 6th, 1686; Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 591, Appendix, 115.

‡ Citters, quoted by Macaulay, vol. ii. p. 120.

* Fountainhall, June 15th, 1686.

trates were forbidden to execute the laws against papists on pain of his high displeasure; and that a chapel should be fitted up in his palace of Holyrood, and provided with chaplains, for the public celebration of divine service according to the Exercise of the dispensing power.

Romish ritual. He, at the same time, dispensed with the test, and substituted a new oath, to be taken by all his subjects, by which they swore never to resist his authority upon any pretence or for any cause. And this he declares was done by his own absolute power. "We have thought fit," he says, "to grant, and by our sovereign authority, prerogative royal, and absolute power, which all our subjects are to obey without reserve, do hereby give and grant our royal toleration." The obsequious board expressed their assent in the most servile terms to the unconstitutional injunctions,* and declared that they were ready to hazard their lives and fortunes in maintaining the royal prerogative; and though a sullen discontent pervaded that class of the Scottish people, hitherto most conspicuous for their slavish loyalty, no one ventured as yet to disobey the royal commands.

In order to cover his real design, James, at the same time that he removed the disabilities of the Roman Catholics, granted a partial indulgence to the moderate presbyterians and to the quakers, but with a renewal of all the former severe enactments against conventicles. None of the presbyterians, however, would accept of the indulgence in this form; and as the king had now become exceedingly anxious to conciliate the nonconformists, he soon after (April, 1687) published his "Declaration for Liberty of Conscience," in which still farther concessions were made; and this was followed in July by a third proclamation, abolishing all laws imposing penalties and disabilities on account of nonconformity, and all restrictions except the prohibition of field-meetings.†

Some of the more moderate of the presbyterian party, worn out by their long-continued persecution, and overlooking the danger which lurked in this unconstitutional exercise of power, availed themselves of the indulgence thus granted, and resumed the exercise of their ministerial functions, and a few even went so far as to thank the king for the insidious boon, as "a gracious and surprising favour." The Cameronians, however, true to their own principles, would accept no favour from a despotic sovereign, whose allegiance they had renounced, and sternly refused to avail themselves of an indulgence which was obtained by the sacrifice of the fundamental laws of the kingdom. They boldly declared that the proposed boon was intended merely to facilitate the extension of popery; denounced the illegal and unconstitutional exercise of the royal prerogative in which it originated; refused to give security for their loyalty; and continued to meet for divine worship in conventicles, in defiance of the renewed denunciations of vengeance against all who preached in the fields. James Renwick, one of their most zealous and intrepid preachers, persevered with undaunted courage in acting on these principles, and condemned with great keenness the conduct of those who had accepted the royal indulgence and toleration. He became in consequence exceedingly obnoxious to the government, and after several hair-breadth escapes he was at last apprehended in the beginning of February, 1688. When examined by the privy council, he resolutely disowned the royal authority, and acknowledged that he had taught his people that it was unlawful to pay cess for the maintenance of tyranny and the suppression of the Gospel, and that it was lawful to come in arms to the field meetings to defend themselves against their assailants. In consequence probably of the altered policy of the king, the council made various attempts to induce him to retract these sentiments, but in vain. He was, of course, found guilty and condemned to death, and was executed at the Cross of Edinburgh, February, 11th, 1688, in the twenty-sixth year of his age.*

Renwick was the last Protestant martyr that suffered in Scotland. The persecution of the Stewarts lasted twenty-eight years, in the course of which it is computed that no fewer than eighteen thousand persons suffered death, or some other form of penal infliction, on account of their religion. Nearly two thousand were banished to the plantations, of whom several hundreds perished on the voyage by shipwreck or cruel treatment; nearly three thousand suffered all the horrors of imprisonment in the most loathsome dungeons, and many were subjected to tortures shocking to humanity; about seven thousand went into voluntary exile; six hundred and eighty were killed in the encounters with the soldiers; five hundred were put to death in cold blood; and nearly four hundred were murdered under the forms of law. Besides all these, great numbers were reduced to abject misery; and multitudes perished through cold, hunger, and fatigue while wandering on the mountains and moors, or hiding in dens and caves of the earth. "But," as Defoe has beautifully remarked, "it would be endless to enumerate the names of the sufferers, and it has not been possible to come at the certain number of those ministers or others who died in prison and banishment, there being no record preserved of their persecution in any court of justice. Nor could any roll of their names be preserved in those times of confusion any where, but under the altar, and about the throne of the Lamb, where their heads are crowned, and who suffered during the persecution.

Numbers

* The Duke of Hamilton and the Earls of Dundonald and Panmure refused to subscribe the answer of the board, but all the other privy councillors, including the two archbishops, attached their signatures their white robes seen, and where an exact account of their number will at last be found." *

† Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 417; Burnet, vol. iii. p. 138.

* Scot's Worthies, p. 612—626; Wodrow, and Biog. Presby. vol. ii.

But the downfall of this horrible system of ecclesiastical tyranny and civil despotism was rapidly approaching. James's affairs. James had now filled up the measure of his iniquity, and the hour of retribution at length arrived. His pertinacious exercise of the dispensing power and admission of crowds of papists to offices of authority and trust; his attempts to compel the clergy to read from their pulpits a second declaration of indulgence, dispensing with the test and penal laws; his imprisonment and trial of the seven bishops for their refusal to comply with his illegal and unconstitutional demands; and the birth of the Prince of Wales, who was at the time regarded by the great body of the people as a spurious child imposed upon them as the heir of the monarchy, brought matters to a crisis, and induced the nation to throw off the hateful yoke under which they had so long groaned.

The patriotic and public-spirited part of the community had for some time turned their eyes to William Prince of Orange, who had married Mary, the eldest daughter of James, and was regarded as the bulwark of the Protestant faith against the aggressions of the French king. That prince had long watched anxiously the course of affairs in Britain, and had seen with alarm the arbitrary measures which his father-in-law was adopting for the purpose of destroying the constitution and the established religion of the kingdom. He had for some time carried on an intimate, though cautious, correspondence with the leaders of the Whig and Protestant party in Invitation given to the Prince of Orange.

England, and pressing invitations were now addressed to him by the most influential persons in the kingdom, desiring his aid in maintaining the liberties of the country, and in rescuing it from a degrading subservience to the designs of France. After long and careful deliberation, William determined to comply with their urgent solicitations.

He sets sail, and is driven back by a tempest.

Accordingly, on the 19th of October, he put to sea with a fair wind; but after the fleet was about midway between the Dutch and English coasts the wind changed, a violent tempest arose, aggravated by the darkness of the night, and the terrors of a lee shore. The ships were scattered in all directions, but in the end they all save one regained the coast of Holland in safety; and in the course of a few days the armament was reassembled, the damage it had sustained repaired, and the expedition was again ready to set sail.

An exaggerated account of this disaster was soon conveyed to Britain, and raised the hopes of the popish party, while it produced a corresponding depression in the minds of the great body of the people. When the intelligence reached Scotland, the supporters of the government flattered themselves that the projected invasion was completely defeated, and the prelates of the Scotch Episcopal Church (with the exception of the Bishops of Argyll and Caithness), with their characteristic servility, availed themselves of this favourable opportunity to make a flaming profession of loyalty to James, and to express their warmest gratitude to heaven "that he had been so often miraculously prospered with glory and honour in defence of the rights of his august brother, and of these kingdoms; and that through the divine goodness, the ragings of the sea, and the madness of unreasonable men, he, whom they styled the darling of heaven, had been peaceably seated on the throne of his ancestors. They then declared how thankful they were for his repeated assurances of his royal protection to their national Church and religion; congratulated him upon the birth of the Prince of Wales; alluded with amazement to the invasion from Holland, praying, that those who invaded his majesty's just rights might be disappointed; and pledging themselves not only to be guided by the most fervent loyalty, but to promote, in all his subjects, a steadfast allegiance to his majesty, which they conceived to be an essential part of religion." * When we consider that this slavish document was addressed to a sovereign who had openly and systematically violated the constitution of the kingdom, both civil and ecclesiastical, and had perpetrated the most savage cruelties on those who had sought to maintain the rights and liberties of their country, and that it denounced in the strongest terms the enterprise of a prince who, as the inscription on his banner testified, came to "maintain the liberties of England and the Protestant religion," it throws very instructive light on the principles of the Scotch Episcopal Church, and goes far to account for the detestation in which the prelatic form of government has always been held by the people of Scotland.

Meanwhile, William had put to sea the second time, on the evening of the 1st of November, with a fleet of upwards of six hundred vessels and an army of fourteen thousand men, and, after a prosperous voyage, landed at Torbay on the 5th of November, 1688, the anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot. The peasantry of Devonshire flocked in considerable numbers to welcome the prince, but, to his great mortification, for some time no man of note or influence repaired to his quarters. At length, after the lapse of a week, several gentlemen of the county gave in their adherence to his cause. They were speedily followed by Lords Colchester, Wharton, Russell, Abingdon, and other influential noblemen from different parts of the country, who set out to meet William as soon as they received notice of his arrival; and in a short time risings in his favour took place in all parts of the country, and multitudes of all ranks and political parties flocked

Landing of William at Torbay.

* Memoirs of the Church of Scotland, p. 158; McCrie's Sketches, vol. ii. p. 240; Short Memorial of the Sufferings and Grievances of the Presbyterians, 1690.

* Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 646, and Appendix, No. 147.

to his standard. Every day brought some new proof of that universal hostility which the nation entertained against the measures of the king. The defection of the army soon followed.

Several noblemen and officers of rank, including among others Lord Churchill, afterwards the celebrated Duke of Marlborough, deserted the royal camp, and carried over to the prince's army a portion of their soldiers. Prince George of Denmark, the king's son-in-law, followed. To add to the Miserable condition of James—distress of the unhappy king, the Princess Anne, James's favourite daughter, was gained over by her friend, Churchill's wife, and fled from Whitehall during the night, and took refuge with the insurgents at Nottingham. At the tidings of this event, the wretched monarch was stung with the most bitter anguish; "God help me," said he, "my own children desert me!"

James now became alarmed for the safety of his queen and infant son, and resolved to send them off to France. With a view, however, to gain time for this purpose, and to conceal his real designs, he promised to call a meeting of parliament, and made various other concessions to the popular demands. With some difficulty the queen escaped from London in disguise in a dark and tempestuous night, carrying with her the Prince of Wales, and embarked at Gravesend on board a yacht, which carried them in safety to France. James himself then resolved to leave the kingdom, in the vain hope that his flight would plunge everything into confusion, and that his interest would be promoted by the anarchy and discord which he expected to ensue. Accordingly, he disappeared on the night of the 10th of December, accompanied only by Sir Edward Hales and another friend. On the morning of the 12th they reached the Isle of Sheppy, where the hoy in which they were to sail lay. But while they were waiting for the tide to set sail, the vessel was boarded by a party of fishermen and smugglers, who mistook James for a Jesuit in disguise, and mobbed and plundered the unhappy monarch and brought him on shore a prisoner. He was speedily rescued out of their hands and conveyed back to London, where he arrived on the 16th. But the news of his return gave little satisfaction to the Prince of Orange, whose aim from the beginning was to induce his father-in-law to relinquish the throne and flee from the kingdom. He, therefore, conducted himself towards the king with such coldness and severity as alarmed him for his personal safety, and caused him to resume his purpose of flight. With this view, James desired permission to retire to Rochester, which was readily granted. He remained there three nights in the midst of a few faithful friends, who earnestly entreated him to remain in England, but in vain. On the evening of the 22nd he embarked on board a smack which was in readiness to receive him, and on the 25th he was safely landed at Ambletuse, in France.

After the flight of the king, the Prince of Orange summoned a convention at Westminster. At their first meeting thanks were voted to the prince for the deliverance which he had achieved for the nation. They then proceeded, by a great majority, to vote that King James, having endeavoured to subvert the constitution, and having withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, had abdicated the government, and that the throne was thereby vacant.

The king being thus set aside, the convention proceeded to take into consideration the appointment of a successor. Proposals were made by some for electing a regent; others were for investing the Princess of Orange with regal power in her father's room. On learning these proposals, William summoned a small council of leading persons, and stated that he thought it necessary to inform them that if they chose a regent, he would not accept that office. Neither was he disposed to take the government of the kingdom under the princess his wife. If either of these schemes were adopted, he informed them that he could give them no assistance in the settlement of the nation, but would return home to his own country. Upon this it was agreed, after a long debate, that the Prince and Princess of Orange should reign jointly as King and Queen of England, while the administration of the government

Prince and Princess of Orange called to the throne.

should be placed in the hands of the prince only. Accordingly, on the 13th of February, 1689, William and Mary were proclaimed King and Queen of England.

The Revolution, which had so suddenly changed the dynasty in England, found The Revolution every element necessary to its in Scotland. development already in existence in the northern kingdom. Twenty-eight years of perfidy and oppression had lost for ever to the house of Stewart the confidence and affection of the presbyterians. The episcopalians, alarmed lest the new order of things should subvert their power, unintentionally, by their public declamations, fanned the flame of national discontent; while certain arbitrary and most impolitic measures that had been adopted by the court, though afterwards recalled, had shaken the allegiance of the army, and disgusted nearly all the civil officers of the kingdom. Notwithstanding the party animosities by which the country had so long been distracted, it now seemed evident to moderate and reflecting men, including many of the episcopalians themselves, that the time had arrived for some combined movement to arrest the encroachments of popery, as well as of civil despotism; and all eyes were turned towards the Prince of Orange as the only centre around which they could rally with any hope of success.

Meanwhile, the administration, struck with a moral paralysis, were incapable Weakness of alike of decision and of action. the government. Their overthrow was hastened by disunion, and each member began to provide for his own personal safety and the preservation of his estates. In their terror, they attempted to obliterate the traces of their evil deeds. The victims of their tyranny, who were in prison for their refusal to renounce the covenant, were now set at liberty; and the heads of the martyrs, which for a quarter of a century had remained bleaching on the gates of the capital, were taken down and buried, lest these monuments of their cruelty "might occasion the question to be moved by whom and for what they were set up there."*

James had not lost all reliance on the presbyterian party. Gratitude for the indulgence they then enjoyed he fondly hoped would at this crisis attach them to his cause. He was mistaken: they regarded his pretended favours as insidious attempts for the subversion of the Protestant Church, and, on their ministers being sounded by Sir Patrick Murray as to the line of policy they intended to adopt, they declined to answer individually; but at a general meeting summoned on the occasion, they boldly declared that they had no confidence in a government whose chief offices were filled by papists, and that "they would behave in the juncture as God should direct."†

At this critical moment James accelerated the ruin of his cause in Scotland by sending orders for the army to march to the south, for the purpose of assisting him to repel the Dutch invaders, and this order was peremptorily repeated, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the secret committee. The place of the soldiers in the capital was supplied by the militia, on whose loyalty no dependence could be placed, and who were commanded by an officer of unprincipled and temporising policy. From that instant the small remnant of power which the government had still possessed was extinguished; and the dread of absolute anarchy compelled the friends of civil and religious liberty to concert measures for their own safety, and that of the Church and nation. Their leaders included many noblemen and gentlemen of the highest rank, among whom were the Earls of Glencairn, Crawford, Dundonald, and Tarras, and they were joined by Lord Ross and several of the opposite party, who were probably influenced rather by personal than public motives. Meanwhile, the revolutionary party intercepted all communications between the king and the privy council, who were thus for some weeks ignorant of each other's movements and intentions, while the whole was patent to their opponents. Still the presbyterians do not appear to have adopted any definite plan of procedure, until the landing of the prince in England; and the publishing of his manifesto confirmed their determination to strike for liberty at all hazards, afforded them a common rallying point, and gave form and coherence to their design.

William's declaration was publicly announced in Glasgow, Irvine, and Ayr, and was speedily made known throughout the kingdom, in open defiance of a proclamation issued by the privy council. The secret committee, finding the authority of council treated with contempt, and having now no power to enforce it, dispatched messengers to James professing their continued devotion to his service, and requesting instructions. It was now, however, too late. His cause was found to be hopeless, and, shortly afterwards, the greater number declared for the prince, and the committee was dissolved.

Scarcely had the army been withdrawn when the whole country was in commotion. Multitudes of presbyterians rose in arms for the Prince of Orange, and a number of the more impetuous spirits flocked to the capital, and carrying with them vague and alarming reports filled the inhabitants with consternation. To complete the discomfiture of the government, the chancellor, timidly yielding to the urgent solicitations of some of the revolutionary leaders, consented to disband the militia; and shortly after, in terror of his life from the infuriated mob, he retired from the council, and was escorted by a strong guard to his country seat in Perthshire.

A tumultuous assemblage, consisting at first chiefly of college youths and city apprentices, now attempted to gain possession of the chapel-royal, with its popish images and other paraphernalia, which had been left under the protection of a Captain Wallace and a small guard. The attempt was unsuccessful, and in the encounter which ensued several persons were killed on both sides. The whole city was immediately in a ferment, and multitudes of the citizens, under the conduct of some gentleman of rank and influence,* assembled in arms, and attended by the magistrates in their robes, the trainbands, city officers, and heralds, marched to the palace, within which Wallace and his men had sought shelter, and summoned him in his majesty's name to surrender. Wallace refused, but a party gaining access by a back entry that had been incautiously left unguarded, the chapel and palace were speedily in the hands of the assailants. The work of destruction was at once commenced. The ornaments of the chapel, which had been lately fitted up for the Order of the Thistle, were demolished, the crucifixes, pictures, and images were dragged from their places of concealment, paraded in mock procession through the city, and then committed to the flames in the Abbey Close. The Jesuits' college was sacked and burned, its printing-press and library were destroyed, and many of the private dwellings of the Roman Catholics shared the same fate. During these outrages the government remained inactive, probably more through terror than from any want of will to punish the rioters. At length, however, the council issued a proclamation for the protection of the persons and property of the Roman Catholics; and after the mob had performed the ceremony, common at the period, of a mock trial and execution of the pope,* the ferment was for the time allayed.

* Sufferings and Grievances of Presbyterians in Scotland, &c., p. 28.

† Balcarres; Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 644, et seq.; Faithful Contendings, 369; Minutes of the Society, 1688.

* Balcarres' Mem., p. 25.

The tidings of this outbreak were speedily conveyed to Castle Drummond, where Perth had taken refuge, and filled the mind of the cowardly renegade with overwhelming alarm. He had tried in vain to find support in the rites of his new faith or in the consolations of his priests, to whom, with eager importunity, he appealed for comfort, acknowledging with craven terror that "the terrors Flight of of death were upon him." Afraid Perth—to trust himself longer even among his own servants and retainers, he left his residence in disguise, and travelling by an unfrequented route over the Ochil Mountains, then covered with snow, he succeeded in reaching Burntisland, on the northern shore of the Frith of Forth, and embarked on board a ship which lay off that port. But, in spite of all his precautions, he was recognised and pursued. The vessel in which he was making his escape was overtaken, boarded and searched. The cowardly wretch was discovered in the hold dressed in women's clothes. He was immediately —his capture seized, and, after having been and treatment. stripped and plundered, was dragged on shore and committed to the jail of Kirkcaldy. His late associates in the council, with characteristic baseness, hastened to disown their colleague in his hour of need, and ordered him to be removed to Stirling Castle. Like his companion in office and in guilt, the infamous Chancellor Jeffries, Perth was conveyed to his place of confinement under a strong guard, amid the mingled execrations and threats of a vast multitude, who had assembled to exult over the downfall of the despicable tool of oppression and cruelty.

Some unfounded reports that ten thousand Irish papists had landed in Galloway, and Reported in- burned the town of Kirkeudbright, vasion of Irish papists. having alarmed the Cameronians, Society men the whole Society people of Niths-rise in arms. dale and Galloway rose in arms, and, being joined by many of the presbyterians of the west, prepared for the defence of the country. The alarm, however, proved groundless, but they did not disperse until they had rifled the houses of the papists of their images and relics, and reduced them to ashes. Though these proceedings cannot be defended, they can excite no surprise, and it deserves to be remarked that they were characterised by a degree of moderation quite unusual in such circumstances, and were throughout unaccompanied by violence or bloodshed.

* Balcarres, p. 25, et seq.; King James's Mem., vol. ii. p. 338; Wodrow, vol. ii. p. 650, et seq.; Arnot's Hist. of Edin.

The declaration of the Prince of Orange, which had now been diffused everywhere throughout the country, raised the hopes of the friends of liberty, who laying aside their party differences, unanimously resolved to rally round his standard. The declaration was temperate in its tone, and had an air of straightforward frankness, which carried a conviction of the prince's sincerity. He referred to the sufferings of the people under the two preceding reigns, asserted his right and that of his consort to the crown of Scotland, and their consequent duty to free the country from the tyranny to which it had been so long subjected. He demanded the concurrence of the people in his just design for the good of the nation, and declared that the freeing of the kingdom from all hazard of popery and arbitrary power for the future, and the settling it by parliament on a solid basis, were the true reasons of his undertaking. Finally, he called upon all good men to implore the blessing of Almighty God on his endeavours, that so they may tend to the glory of God, "to the establishment of the reformed Churches, and to the peace and happiness of the kingdom."

The declaration of the Prince of Orange.

Owing to the presence of the bishops, who were allowed to attend the meeting of the privy council, and who were dissatisfied because the declaration contained no assurance that their ascendancy would be maintained, no cordial address of thanks was voted to the prince, but only a brief and formal congratulation, which he received without exhibiting any emotion.

But though the council adopted this cautious policy, the arrival of William produced great excitement among the Scottish people. A scramble for place and power began among men of all ranks, and nearly all parties. Noblemen, gentlemen, and burgesses, all who were ambitious of preferment, and could afford the leisure and the expense of a visit to London, flocked thither, so that for a period of three months, Scotland, and especially the capital, was deserted by nearly every public leader, and left almost without a government; yet, to the honour of the people, who had been so long and so cruelly oppressed, this tempting opportunity of inflicting signal vengeance on their persecutors was not embraced.

Resort of noblemen and gentlemen to London.

William had the discretion to avoid committing himself to the views and directions of any one party. He assembled the leading Scotsmen then congregated in London, consisting of thirty peers and about eighty gentlemen, and informed them that the imminent danger with which the liberties of the country and the Protestant religion were threatened, had been his only inducement to engage in his present undertaking, and that he had called them together that he might have their advice. They repaired to the council-chamber to deliberate, and after a discussion, which lasted three days, they resolved, on the suggestion of the Duke of Hamilton, that it was necessary in the present distracted state of the kingdom "that executive power should be lodged somewhere until a convention of Estates should be called, and that that could be no where better or safer than with the prince." An address to this effect was accordingly voted unanimously, and William was requested to appoint the 14th of March for the meeting of the convention, and to annul the act which excluded presbyterians from the privilege of voting or being returned as members. The prince —their advice. received this address graciously, and signified his unqualified concurrence in the resolutions of the meeting.* Notwithstanding the apparent unanimity of their proceedings, however, a number of James's adherents were present, who now saw no other way of promoting his cause than by endeavouring to gain an ascendancy in the forthcoming convention; and both parties hastened home to prepare for the contest.

William assembles some of the leading Scotsmen in London—

In this struggle, the presbyterians, as might State have been expected, strenuously of parties. supported the cause of William, while the episcopalians still persevered in their attachment to their native sovereign. There were some conspicuous examples, however, on both sides, of men who cared little for the principles which they professed to maintain, and were quite ready to sacrifice these to their own personal aggrandisement.

After the flight of James was known in Scotland State of the country was virtually in a anarchy in state of anarchy. "There was Scotland. no king in Israel, and every man did that which was right in his own eyes." There was no attempt, however, to retaliate on the instruments of tyranny the cruelties they had inflicted upon the nation, during the reigns of the fugitive monarch and his brother: no lives were sacrificed, nor were there any violent outrages on person or property. There was, indeed, one class who were peculiarly obnoxious to the common people, and were soon made to feel the effect of the change that had taken place. The curates were the representatives of the hateful system which had by force and fraud replaced the Church of their fathers; they had been thrust into their livings under the law of patronage against the wishes of the parishioners; they had acted the part of spies and informers to the privy council; and had assisted Claverhouse and Dalzell in their bloody persecutions, furnishing them with lists of the persons who absented themselves from their ministry; and not a few had brought discredit on their office by their profligate lives. It was natural, therefore, that they should be regarded with peculiar aversion by the people, and that no time should be lost in ejecting these hirelings and intruders, as they were termed, from the places which had once been filled by those faithful ministers who had been driven into the wilderness, or had laid down their lives for the "crown rights of the Redeemer." But though the episcopal clergy were made to feel the effects of the popular indignation, perhaps in no other country would reprisals have been so moderate. On Christmas, 1688, armed bands of the Cameronians, or Hillmen, assembled in various parts of the western counties, and proceeded with great deliberation to eject the curates from their churches and manses. The obnoxious incumbent was carried in mock procession to the church-yard, the cross, or some other public place. He was there reproached for his past conduct; his gown, which was regarded as a badge of prelacy, was torn over his head; he was then conducted to the boundary of the parish, and dismissed with an emphatic warning never to officiate there again.*

The mode in which these proceedings were conducted seems to have excited the disapprobation of the leading covenanters; and a general meeting of ministers and elders was held, for the purpose of concerting measures for the ejection of the episcopal clergy in a more formal and orderly manner. A form of notice was drawn up and Ejection of the served on all the curates in the curates. western districts who had not been rabbled, requiring them to remove from their parishes peaceably, on pain of violent expulsion if they neglected the warning. In this way about three hundred in all

* It was alleged that in some instances the mob plundered the cellar and larder of the obnoxious incumbents, greatly to the scandal of the more sober Cameronians. "A whiggish mob," says Baron Bradwardine, "destroyed the meeting-house of Mr. Rubric, tore his surplice, and plundered his dwelling-house of four silver spoons, intruding also with his mart and his meal-ark, and with two barrels, one of single and one of double ale, besides three bottles of brandy." (Waverley, chap. x.) The spirit by which some at least of the actors in these scenes were moved may be learned from the manner in which the eccentric pedler, Patrick Walker, who wrote the lives of Cameron, Peden, &c., speaks of the share that he took in these rabblings. "The time of their fall was now come," he says, "which many longed for, even for long twenty-eight years. Faintness was entered into their hearts, inasmuch that the greater part of them could not speak sense, but stood trembling and sweating, though we spoke with all calmness to them. I inquired of them what made them to tremble, they that had been teachers and defenders of the prelatical principles, and active and instrumental in many of our national mischiefs. How would they tremble and sweat if they were in the Grassmarket going up the ladder, with the rope before them, and the lad with the pyoted [party-coloured] coat at their tail [the hangman]! But they were speechless objects of pity." Full details of these rabblings are given in "The Case of the Present Afflicted Episcopal Clergy in Scotland truly represented," drawn up by themselves, and collected by Dr. Munro, who was at this time expelled from the University of Edinburgh. One of them, Mr. Bullo, of Stobo, declares that the mob threatened to shoot him through the head, and "laid many strokes on him with the broad side of their drawn swords." Another, Mr. John Little, complained grievously of the treatment which he received from a regiment of fifty women armed with cudgels, who, he says, "after tearing his coat off, compassed him about, four at each arm, others of them beating his head and shoulders with their fists, others of them scratching and nipping his back." To appease these viragoes, Mr. Little said, "if they would let him into the kirk he would preach a sermon to them,"—an offer which, coming from such a quarter, was more likely to inflame than to appease their wrath. (See Remarkable Passages in the Life of Richard Cameron, &c., Apud. Biograph. Presbyteriana; Case of the Afflicted Clergy, &c., pp. 5, 56, 59; M'Crie's Sketches, vol. ii. pp. 262, 265.)

* Burnet, vol. i. p. 805.

of the clergy were ejected between Christmas, 1688, and April, 1689. These "rabblings" of the curates, as might be expected, caused a great outcry among the episcopalians and Jacobites, and a highly coloured report of their treatment by the rabble was drawn up by the clergy and transmitted to London. William immediately issued a proclamation directing that the episcopal ministers should be suffered to retain their benefices without molestation, till the constitution and government of the Church should be settled by the convention. But as he had no troops in Scotland, and, consequently, no means of enforcing his commands, his attempt to protect the curates from ejection and insult was wholly ineffective.

Meanwhile, the elections were proceeding for Relative members to serve in the convention, and it soon appeared that the strength of the two parties. Whigs had the superiority in almost all the shires and burghs; but the adherents of James relied for support on the bishops and the majority of the nobles. The great body of the lawyers also ranged themselves on the side of the fallen monarch, and the Castle of Edinburgh was still held for him by the Duke of Gordon. At this juncture, the Earl of Balcarres and Claverhouse, recently created Viscount Dundee, came down from London to direct the counsels of James's adherents.

The former, a man of amiable disposition and great accomplishments, had in his youth espoused the popular cause, but had subsequently been gained over by the court, and was strongly attached to the king from personal friendship. In company with Dundee, he waited upon James after his return to London from Feversham, and assured him of their continued devotion to his interests. As they walked with him up and down the Mall, the king asked them how they came to be with him when all the world had forsaken him for the Prince of Orange? Balcarres replied that their fidelity to so good a master would ever be the same; they had nothing to do with the Prince of Orange. Dundee also made the strongest professions of fidelity. "Will you two, as gentlemen," inquired James, "say you have still attachment to me?"—"Sir, we do," was their reply.—"Will you give me your hands upon it as men of honour?" They did so. "Well," rejoined the unhappy prince, "I see you are the men I always took you to be; you shall know all my intentions. I can no longer remain here but as a cipher, or be a prisoner to the Prince of Orange,—and you know there is but a small distance between the prisons and the graves of kings." He had, therefore, resolved, he said, to seek a temporary refuge in France. "When I am there," he added, "you shall receive my instructions. You, Lord Balcarres, shall have a commission to manage my civil affairs; and you, Lord Dundee, to command my troops."*

On the following day James fled a second time from his palace, never to return, and the Prince of Orange entered London. Balcarres had repeated audiences of William, to whom he was well known, and whose cousin he had married. He expressed "the utmost respect for his highness, but said that he could have no hand in turning out his king, who had been a kind master to him in many things. The prince, perhaps, valued him the more for this, and twice thereafter spoke to him upon the same subject, but said at parting, 'Take care, my lord, that you keep within the law, for if you break it you must expect to be left to it.'"

The eulogists of Dundee assert that he was solicited by William to enter his service, that he refused without ceremony, on the ground that he had taken an oath of fidelity to King James, which he did not conceive himself at liberty to violate,† and that William acknowledged the validity of the excuse. But the truth is, he acted a part by no means so frank and honest as the course adopted by his friend Balcarres. He employed Burnet to mediate for him with the new sovereign, declared his willingness to acquiesce in the settlement of the crown upon William and Mary, and obtained in return a promise of protection, and was permitted to travel down to Scotland under the escort of a troop of cavalry. "Without such an escort," says Macaulay, "the man of blood, whose name was never mentioned but with a shudder at the hearth of any presbyterian family, would at that conjuncture have had but a perilous journey through Berwickshire and the Lothians."‡

It was nearly the end of February when Dundee and Balcarres reached Edinburgh.

They lost no time in taking active measures to revive the drooping spirits of their party, to confirm the waverers, and to preserve union among the adherents of the fugitive monarch. They waited upon the Duke of Gordon, who was preparing to surrender the castle, and though they found him in the act of removing his furniture, they prevailed upon him to hold out till he saw what course the convention should adopt.§ In conjunction with the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, they had received a commission from James to adjourn the convention to Stirling; and they informed the duke of their resolution to use their powers if the majority should prove hostile to the rights of their royal master.

At length the day (March 14) appointed for the meeting of the Estates arrived, Meeting of the convention. and they assembled rather in the circumstances of a Polish diet than of a Scottish parliament. The English convention met in quietness and security, and conducted their proceedings in the most orderly manner, and with the strictest regard to form and precedent. But the Scottish patriots had to assemble under the guns of a hostile fortress, and to mingle even in their place of meeting with unscrupulous enemies, while their safety —measures adopted by them in Edinburgh.

* Lives of the Lindsays, vol. ii. p. 162.

† Chambers's Rebellions in Scotland, 1689—1715, p. 50.

‡ History of England, vol. iii. p. 270.

§ Memoirs of Balcarres, p. 24.

was farther imperilled by the presence of a troop of Claverhouse's ruthless dragoons. In these critical circumstances they were obliged to call to their protection a body of the western covenanters, who, nothing loth, flocked to the capital, carrying under their grey plaids the swords and pistols which they had wielded in the cause of the covenant at Drumclog and Bothwell Bridge.

The first question which tested the strength of the hostile parties in the convention was the choice of a president. The presbyterians supported the Duke of Hamilton, a moderate Whig of respectable abilities and fair character, but whose political course had by no means been either straightforward or decided. The choice of the Jacobites fell upon the Marquis of Atholl, a treacherous, cruel, and cowardly time-server, of mean abilities and disreputable character, who had lent himself to the court, to execute its most flagitious schemes, during the dark period of the persecutions. On the flight of James he had sought with abject servility to gain the favour of the Prince of Orange; but, finding his overtures coldly received, he had once more joined the adherents of the fallen monarch. Parties were so nearly balanced that Hamilton was elected by a majority of only fifteen; but the victory was regarded as decisive, and about twenty of the defeated party, with the laxity of principle which characterised the statesmen of the period, immediately joined the winning side. A committee of elections was then appointed to scrutinise the disputed returns, and it is alleged by the Jacobites that the majority of the members showed gross partiality in their decisions. The convention next proceeded to make provision for their own security. The parliament-house was commanded by the guns of the castle, which was still held for James by the Duke of Gordon, a papist, and, therefore, disqualified by law to hold the command. The Earls

Duke of Gordon summoned to surrender the castle—

of Lothian and Tweeddale were sent to require the duke, in the name of the convention, to evacuate the fortress within twenty-four hours. He at first seemed inclined to comply with the demand, and asked a night for consideration. The exhortations of Balcarres and Dundee, however, confirmed his wavering mind; and next morning, when the deputies returned to receive the surrender of the castle, he put them off with an evasive answer, professing great respect for the convention, and offering to give security for his peaceable behaviour to the amount of twenty thousand pounds sterling, but refusing to give up the castle until he should receive a communication from the government now established in England.

—refuses, and is proclaimed a traitor.

His answer was deemed unsatisfactory. He was proclaimed a traitor to the Estates, and guards were posted to intercept all communication between the garrison and the city.*

* Acts of Scot. Parl., March 14th and 15th, 1689; Balcarres' Memoirs.

On the following day, March 15th, a messenger arrived from France with a sealed Letter from letter from King James to the Estates. The leaders of the Jacobites, though ignorant of the contents of the letter, and mortified by the neglect of their master to furnish them with this information, hoped that James would have offered terms calculated to conciliate his opponents, and, though not without misgivings, resolved to lay the letter before the convention.

Accordingly, next day, while the Estates were engaged in deliberation, it was announced that James's messenger was at the door. He was called in, and the document which he brought was laid on the table. A motion was then made that the letter should be read, but the president reminded the Estates that they had been convoked by the authority of the Prince of Orange, who had also sent them a letter, and that his communication was entitled to the precedence. This proposal was agreed to without opposition, and Letter from the letter of William, which had William read. been entrusted to the Earl of Leven, was produced and read. It reminded the Estates of the responsible position in which they were placed; urged them to lay aside all animosities and factions, and to establish the affairs of the kingdom on a solid basis; and professed warm attachment to the Protestant religion, though it carefully avoided giving an opinion respecting the points of difference between the presbyterians and episcopalians. Some of the Scottish nobility and gentry with whom William had conferred in London had recommended a union of the two kingdoms, and he now expressed his cordial approbation of that project, and promised to do all in his power to promote a measure which, in his opinion, would greatly conduce to the happiness of both nations.

Apprehensions were entertained that the letter of James might possibly contain an order for the dissolution of the convention; before the seal was broken, therefore, it was proposed, and unanimously agreed to, that nothing contained in the letter should annul or impede the deliberations of the Estates, and that they should continue to sit until they should have completed the work of securing the Protestant religion, the constitution, laws, and government of the country. This vote was subscribed not only by the Whigs, but by seven out of nine bishops, and by Dundee, Balcarres, and the other Jacobites present, who, in the hope that the letter would contain some conciliatory offers, were thus guilty of a flagrant violation of their own principles, and an act of rebellion against their master's authority. The important document, from which so much was expected, was then read. It showed that the character of James Unfavourable remained unchanged, and that it effect of James's letter. was vain to expect either prudence or moderation from the intractable, hard-hearted tyrant. He required of them to support his interests as became loyal and faithful subjects, and thus to avoid the danger and infamy of rebels in this world, and their condemnation in the world to come. He graciously promised a pardon to those who should return to their allegiance before the last day of the month, and threatened condign punishment against all who should continue in rebellion against his lawful authority.* This letter, which was written and countersigned by the apostate Melfort, who was legally incapable of holding office under the crown, excited loud and vehement expressions of indignation from the Whigs, and rendered it impossible for the Jacobites any longer to continue the struggle in the convention.

Meanwhile the capital was in a state of great excitement. A considerable body of the western covenanters had flocked to the city for the purpose of protecting the convention. It was expected that these stern and dauntless presbyterians, burning with the recollection of their grievous wrongs, would not be slow to take vengeance on their abhorred persecutors, especially on Dundee and his associate, the "bloody Mackenzie," the late king's advocate. It was reported to the threatened convention on the 16th of March, the day on which James's letter was read, that two men had been heard inquiring for the lodgings of Dundee, vowing at the same time that "they would use the dogs as they had been used by them."† Mackenzie, with great earnestness and force of language, claimed the protection of the Estates, and Dundee demanded that the house in which the intended assassins were said to lurk should be searched, and that all strangers should be removed from the town. But this was at once refused, as it would have placed the convention at the mercy of the Duke of Gordon, and of Dundee and his troops.

On the afternoon of the same day (Saturday) the Proposal to hold a counter convention. Jacobite leaders held a consultation, and as it was now evident that the great majority of the convention was hostile to James, they resolved that the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, Dundee, and Balcarres, should use the powers entrusted to them, and hold a counter convention of their adherents at Stirling. Monday was appointed for carrying this project into effect. But when the day arrived Atholl, who had promised to bring down a body of Highlanders from his estates to protect their deliberations, with his usual pusillanimity and vacillation, requested a delay of twenty-four hours, and proposed that, in the meantime, to prevent suspicion, they should repair once more to the parliament-house. Balcarres and the other members of the party yielded to his request; Dundee alone, haunted by the terrors of an evil conscience and the dread

Flight of Dundee. of assassination, refused to wait longer, and, in spite of the remonstrances of Balcarres, who saw clearly that the flight of his associate would break up their whole plan, he determined immediately to set out for the north. At the head of about fifty of his old troopers, he quitted the city by Leith Wynd, one of its eastern avenues, and, turning to the west, proceeded with his men along the bank of the loch which defended the city on the north side—a road which now forms the site of Princes Street. Passing close under the huge rock on which the castle is built, he alighted from his horse, scrambled up the western face of the crag, and held a conference at a postern with the Duke of Gordon, the governor of the fortress. It is reported that Dundee urged the duke to leave the castle under the charge of his lieutenant and accompany him to the Highlands, with the view of raising his vassals there in behalf of King James. The duke, however, excused himself on the plea that a soldier cannot in honour quit the post that is assigned to him; and Dundee was obliged to content himself with entreating that the duke would at least hold out the castle till he should be relieved.

During this singular conference, great excitement prevailed in the city, and a crowd had collected at the foot of the precipice. The news soon reached the convention, which was then sitting, together with a report that their dreaded and abhorred adversary was mustering his forces to attack them. A terrible uproar ensued. The Duke of Hamilton the convention.

ordered the doors of the parliament-house to be locked, and the keys to be laid on the table, exclaiming with great fierceness, "It is high time we should look to ourselves, since the enemies of our religion, and of our civil freedom, are mustering all around us, and there is danger within as well as without doors. Let those be detained who are not well-wishers to their country, that they may serve as hostages for the good behaviour of their accomplices." The Earl of Leven was then ordered to go forth into the city, to cause drums to be beat and trumpets sounded, to collect their trusty adherents for the protection of the convention. All this was promptly executed. The covenanters from the west country, on hearing the signal, started from their hiding-places in garrets and cellars, and appeared in the street with arms in their hands. It was speedily discovered that no danger was to be apprehended from Dundee, who had in the meantime scrambled down the castle rock, and, along with his troopers, pursued his journey towards Linlithgow. And after a period of dreadful suspense the Submission of doors of the parliament-house were the Jacobites.

opened, and the humbled and dispirited Jacobites were permitted to depart, amid the threats and railings of the crowd which filled the High Street. The project of a counter convention was at once and finally abandoned. Some of the adherents of James fled to their country seats, others joined the ranks of the Whigs; the Earl of Mar was arrested as he was leaving the city, and the remainder were glad to purchase their safety by remaining quiet.*

* Acts of Parl., March 16th; Balcarres's Memoirs; Life of James, vol. ii. p. 342.

† Minutes of Convention, MS. Ad. Lib.

* Balcarres's Memoirs.

Next day the convention proceeded to take prompt measures for the defence of the kingdom. The militia was ordered to be levied, and all Protestants, from sixteen to sixty, were enjoined to hold themselves in readiness to assemble in arms at the first summons. So energetically were these orders carried out that a regiment of eight hundred covenanters was raised within two hours; and the Earl of Argyll, who had been permitted to take his seat in the convention, though the attainder of his family was still unrepealed, assembled three hundred of his clan for the protection of the Estates. Shortly after, the public peace was secured by the arrival of the three Scotch regiments in the Dutch service, which had accompanied William to England, under the command of General Mackay, a veteran officer of distinguished courage and piety. He was immediately appointed, by the convention, general of their forces.

Arrival of the Scotch regiments under General Mackay.

Protected by Mackay's troops, and relieved from the presence of the more courageous Jacobite leaders, the Estates became more confident in their strength than before. They sent a letter of thanks to William, cordially approving of the step he had taken in assuming the temporary administration of affairs, and proceeded resolutely to carry out their plan for the settlement of the government. This important business was entrusted to a committee of twenty-four, composed in equal proportions of peers, and of the representatives of counties and of the towns. The exclusion of the bishops from this committee was ominous of the fate that awaited their order.

The spirit of the Jacobites was now completely broken. As a last resource, some of the more eager of their number had urged the Duke of Gordon to fire on the city, in the hope that the convention would be compelled to adjourn to Glasgow, and that time might thus be gained for the reorganisation of their party.* But the duke prudently refused to lend himself to this desperate policy. A project for the union of the two kingdoms had long been entertained by some eminent Scottish statesmen; and the Dalrymples, father and son, with Lord Tarbet, recommended that the union and the settlement of the crown should go hand in hand. Various other parties, actuated by widely different motives, united in supporting the proposal that the throne should be kept vacant until the treaty of union should be settled. And the Jacobites even gave their countenance to this project, in the hope that they might thereby postpone for a few months, at least, the settlement of the government. But the zealous presbyterians were apprehensive that such a measure might interfere with their ecclesiastical arrangements, as well as excite dissensions in their own ranks; the proposal was, therefore, prudently abandoned.

Proposal for the union of the two kingdoms.

* Balcarres' Memoirs.

The committee to which the plan for the settlement of the government had been referred, submitted to the convention a series of resolutions declaring that James, by his misconduct and crimes, had forfeited the crown. The offences which justified this doom were recapitulated in fifteen articles:—his efforts to establish popery, and to convert the limited monarchy of Scotland into an arbitrary despotism; his imposition of illegal oaths and tests; his levying of taxes without consent of parliament; his unconstitutional conduct in raising and maintaining an irresponsible and oppressive standing army, and in conferring upon the soldiers the power to inflict the highest penalties without legal trial; his illegal use of judicial torture; his imposition of fines and forfeitures without trial; his suppression of the privileges of the municipal corporations; his interference with the independence of the judges, and dictating their decisions. For all these outrages against the rights and liberties of the people of Scotland, "the Estates of the kingdom find and declare that ^{Vote of} King James VII., being a pro- forfeiture. fessed papist, did assume the regal power, and acted as king without taking the oath required by law; and hath, by the advice of evil and wicked councillors, invaded the fundamental constitution of this kingdom, and altered it from a legal limited monarchy to an arbitrary despotic power, and hath exercised the same to the subversion of the Protestant religion, and the violation of the laws and liberties of the nation, inverting all the ends of government, whereby he hath FOREFAULTED the right to the crown, and the throne is become VACANT."

A feeble opposition to the vote of forfeiture was made by Patterson, Archbishop of Glasgow, and Sir George Mackenzie, who maintained that James was an absolute and irresponsible monarch, entitled to the unconditional obedience of his subjects, and that every illegal act of his government had been vindicated by the decisions of the late parliament. The arguments of these disheartened supporters of the doctrine of divine right were ably refuted by Sir John Dalrymple, the late lord-advocate, and Sir James Montgomery, who showed that absolute and irresponsible power was irreconcilable with the rights of the people, and could neither be lawfully granted by the parliament nor acquired by the king. When the question was put, Atholl, Queensberry, and other influential Tories withdrew from the house, and only five members of their party voted against the resolution which declared that James had forfeited the crown.

On the 11th of April the Estates resolved that the crown should be settled on William and Mary as joint sovereigns, and failing the issue of Mary, on the Princess Anne and her heirs. The new sovereigns were then proclaimed at the city Cross with sound of trumpet, and on the same day the parochial clergy were enjoined, on pain of deprivation, to read this proclamation from their pulpits, and to pray for King William and Queen Mary.

Plan for the settlement of the government.

Feeble opposition of the Jacobites.

Crown settled on William and Mary.

Before, however, proceeding to make a formal Claim of tender of the crown to the new Right. sovereigns, the convention adopted a "Claim of Right," drawn up by the committee that had prepared the vote of forfeiture.* This memorable document, which purported to be a declaration of the law as it stood, included some things not specifically contained in the vote of forfeiture, and extended to almost all the illegal acts of the two preceding reigns:—the suspension or alteration of the laws by regal proclamations; the measures employed to establish popery; the imposition of bonds and oaths, and the exaction of money without the authority of parliament; the investing of officers of the army with judicial powers; the infliction of the punishment of death without trial, jury, or record; the exaction of exorbitant fines or bail; the imprisonment of accused persons without a specific statement of the cause, or the delay of their trial; the forfeiture of persons upon old and obsolete laws, and upon frivolous pretexts or defective evidence; the nomination by the crown of the magistrates and councillors of burghs; the interference with the proceedings of the courts of justice; the employment of torture without evidence in ordinary crimes; the compelling persons accused to give evidence against themselves; the garrisoning of private houses, and the introduction of a hostile army into the country to live at free quarters in the time of peace. The Claim of Right also condemned as illegal the two notorious decisions of the judges—that it was treason to conceal the demand of money to assist traitors, and for any persons to refuse to declare their private sentiments respecting the treasonable opinions or actions of others. It was declared that no papist could occupy the throne, or even hold any public office; and that no heir to the crown could exercise regal authority before taking the coronation oath. The right of appeal to parliament and of petition to the sovereign was asserted; and it was demanded that for the redress of grievances, and the amending and strengthening the laws, parliaments ought to be frequently held, and freedom of speech secured to the members; and all these articles were claimed by the Estates as their undoubted right, against which no declaration or precedent should operate to the prejudice of the people.* A place was given in the Claim of Right to the ecclesiastical grievances under which the Scottish people had so long groaned; and, though it could not be denied that episcopacy had been established by law, and could not, therefore, be justly termed an illegal infringement of the rights of the people, the Estates, who were anxious that this important question should not be left open to future discussion, declared that prelacy and the superiority of any office in the Church was a great and insupportable burden to the kingdom, and odious to the people, and that it ought to be abolished.

On the 13th of April the convention prepared a supplementary paper, called a Declaration of Grievances, which could be remedied only by new laws. In this document, the committee of articles, the royal supremacy over the Church, the manner and extent of the popular representation, the trial and punishment of juries for finding verdicts against the crown, the marriage of the sovereign with a papist, and various other grievances, were denounced, and their redress demanded.

Having settled the Claim of Right, and revised the coronation oath, the convention appointed three commissioners to repair to London with the offer of the crown. The Earl of Argyll was chosen to represent the nobles; Sir James Montgomery, the commissioners of shires; and Sir John Dalrymple, the burgesses. On the 11th of May, the three commissioners, attended by almost all the Scotchmen of rank and influence who were then in London, were admitted to the presence of William and Mary in the Banqueting House, at Whitehall. The new sovereigns were seated under a canopy, and surrounded by the great nobles and statesmen of England. The coronation oath was taken after the Scottish form. The royal pair, standing and holding up their right hands, repeated the oath, clause by clause, after Argyll; but on coming to the last clause, which declared "We shall be careful to root out all heretics and enemies to the true worship of God," William paused, and stated that he would not lay himself under any obligation to be a persecutor. "Neither the words of this oath, nor the laws of Scotland," replied one of the commissioners, "lay any such obligation on your majesty."—"Then," said William, "I take the oath in that sense only; and I desire you all, my lords and gentlemen, to witness that I do so."† Thus happily terminated that contest which the house of Stewart had obstinately maintained against the liberties and religion of Scotland; and that hapless race, whom no misfortunes or experience could teach moderation, were a second time driven forth fugitives and vagabonds on the face of the earth.

* Laing, vol. ii. p. 192.

* According to the legal import of the vote the whole issue of James were excluded from the crown, but in a MS. copy of the minutes of the Convention in the Advocate's Library, it is said to have been unanimously agreed to that the word "forefault" in the resolution should be limited to the persons and the future children of King James, and of "the pretended prince," his son. This was for the purpose of keeping unquestioned the claims of Mary. (Burton, vol. i. p. 4, note.)

† History of the Affairs of Scotland from the Restoration, &c.; London Gazette, May, 16, 1689.

CHAPTER LIV.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

A.D. 1688—1712.

THE prelatich Church established in Scotland at the Restoration had now existed for twenty-eight years; and, though the most sanguinary measures had been employed for its support, and the most shocking barbarities inflicted on those who refused to worship within its pale, yet, strange to say, during all this time no attempt had been made to introduce the English ritual. The liturgy, the surplice, the altar, and the use of the cross in baptism, were all unknown to the greater part of the Scottish episcopal clergy. They had no Confession of Faith or standard of doctrine and discipline. Prayers were, however, usually read, though the selection appears to have been left to the clergy. The Apostles' Creed was in general recited when baptism was administered, and the doxology was sung at the close of public worship. The bishops had no fixed rule to guide their practice in the government of the Church; but they were completely subject to the will of the king, who, as supreme head of the Church, superseded the prelates and deposed the clergy at his pleasure, and even issued instructions regulating both the matter and the manner of their preaching.* The revolution, however, was followed by a speedy and

Effect of the Revolution upon the Church.

radical change in the position of ecclesiastical affairs. The episcopal hierarchy, under whose tyrannical oppression the presbyterians had so long groaned, was set aside; and there was substituted in its room that form of church government which was most in accordance with the views of the Scottish people, and which has continued in force down to the present day.† William's own sentiments, indeed, would have disposed him to retain the forms of episcopacy; not that he considered them superior in themselves or more scriptural, but because he conceived that it would conduce to the peace and concord of the two kingdoms, if similar ecclesiastical institutions were established in both. Now, as there was no ground at all for hoping that presbytery could be introduced into England, where the Episcopal Church occupied an impregnable position, the only way left to realise his views seemed to be to maintain the bishops in Scotland. William, however, had an adviser with regard to the settlement of Scottish ecclesiastical affairs, whose weighty reasons completely changed his mind. This was the celebrated Carstairs, a presbyterian minister, whose ability, and integrity, and discretion had secured for him a high place in the king's regard. In early life he had taken refuge in Holland, that he might escape the miseries and distractions of his own country, and having been introduced to the Prince of Orange, he had at once gained his confidence. Returning to Scotland, he had suffered imprisonment and been subjected to torture, on account of the part which he had taken in Shaftesbury's plot against the late government. He had then gone back to Holland, where he was admitted into the prince's family and appointed one of his chaplains. His extensive acquaintance with the state of affairs in Britain, and with the views of the different parties, rendered him a valuable counsellor to William; and his advice was so much followed that, though a simple presbyterian, he came to be known by the designation of Cardinal Carstairs.* His representations soon convinced the king that neither justice nor policy sanctioned the continuance of the Scottish hierarchy. The episcopalians in the northern kingdom were universally opposed to his government, and ready to concur in any measures for the restoration of the exiled monarch, while the presbyterians were the devoted friends of the new order of things; and, therefore, it behoved his majesty to consider whether he could with any propriety heap favours upon his enemies, while he excluded from office and power the warm supporters of his throne. Besides, episcopacy was identified in Scotland with all the abuses of the late government, and its adherents had uniformly supported the obnoxious doctrines of passive obedience and unlimited royal supremacy, which it was the very purpose of the late Revolution to discountenance and explode. Another argument employed by Carstairs to influence William was grounded upon the circumstances and views of the non-conformists in England, who were most zealous in their attachment to the new sovereign, and who naturally expected that after all the sufferings which they had endured, something would now be done to mitigate the hardships of their position. But his majesty could not venture to give them all the countenance which he was persuaded they merited, lest he should excite the jealousy of the Church of England. Let him, however, sanction the establishment of a presbyterian Church in Scotland, and this would convince them that if he did not extend to them all the relief which they desired and needed, it was not because he entertained any prejudice against their views, but in consequence of the difficult circumstances in which he found himself placed.†

Before any measures were taken by government for effecting, in a legal manner, a change in the ecclesiastical affairs of the kingdom, the long-suppressed resentment of the presbyterians broke out in open violence against the prelatich system, from which they had suffered so much. We have already alluded to the "rabblings," as they were termed, to which the episcopal parish

Popular resentment against the episcopalians.

* M'Crie's Sketches, vol. iv. p. 236.

† Cook's History of the Church of Scotland, vol. iii. p. 440.

* Carstairs' State Papers, pp. 8—38; Burton's History, vol. i. p. 29.

† Carstairs' Life, pp. 39—43; Cook's History, vol. iii. p. 441.

priests or curates were in many quarters, particularly in the west, subjected. Bands of people, in a state of high excitement, marched to the manse and churches in their neighbourhood, expelled the incumbents and drove them beyond the bounds of their respective parishes, forbidding them ever again to resume possession of their manse, or to officiate in their churches. In other cases notices were served upon the curates, commanding them to remove peaceably, and threatening them, in case of refusal, with violent expulsion. It is impossible to justify these proceedings. They are inconsistent with everything like a due regard to law and order; yet they are not to be wondered at. The parties who acted in this manner had been exposed for years to the fiercest persecution. They had been driven from their dwellings, and obliged to seek refuge in solitary haunts, where they were destitute of all the comforts of life. They had often seen their friends and relatives shot before their eyes for refusing to renounce their religious principles, and to conform to episcopacy. The minister had been cruelly butchered while threading his weary way to some expectant congregation. The husband had been put to death before the eyes of his loving wife. Defenceless women had been fastened to stakes within the water mark, and left to perish amid the slowly-rising waves. There were few places, particularly in the west and south of Scotland, which had not been signalised by some such atrocious deed. If these things are kept in mind, it will probably appear to the unprejudiced reader that there is more reason to admire the moderation of the covenanters than to blame their violence. Their retaliation embraced nothing similar to what they themselves had suffered. It was no part of their scheme in these rabbling excursions to inflict personal injury upon their victims, or to plunder them of their goods. If here and there an individual appropriated what was not his own, he was considered as disgracing the good cause, and was exposed to the censure of his brethren.*

A convention of Estates was held at Edinburgh, with the concurrence of William, held at in March, 1689. After declaring Edinburgh. that James, by his tyranny and violation of all constitutional principles, had forfeited his right to the crown, and that the throne was become vacant, they drew up what has been designated a claim or declaration of right, the object of which was to set bounds to the royal prerogative, and to guard against the recurrence of those terrible calamities with which the country had been so long afflicted. In this important document, where principles are brought into view which, although ignored under the late government, had been long before enunciated by the reformers, the affairs of the Church find a prominent place, and it is declared that "prelacy, and the superiority of any offices in the Church above presbyters, is and hath been a great and insupportable grievance and trouble to this nation, contrary to the inclinations of the generality of the people, and therefore ought to be abolished."*

This portion of the declaration was opposed by a considerable number, and it seems to have been the only clause upon which a division took place; but still the current of feeling ran very decidedly against the bishops. Many of them were present in the convention, but they were not allowed to vote as a separate estate. Deprived of royal support, episcopacy could no longer maintain its ground. Its adherents, although numerous, were a minority in the country. In the northern counties, it is true, they greatly outnumbered their opponents; but in the south and west, which were the great seats of population, the friends of the presbyterian system vastly preponderated; and what was of far more importance than the mere element of number, the presbyterians were thoroughly instructed in scriptural truth, and were characterised by remarkable intelligence and zeal. They were devotedly attached to their scheme of ecclesiastical government, while the great body of the episcopalian laity merely acquiesced in the polity of their leaders and superiors. Nor was it an unimportant circumstance that the convention was assembled in one of the strongholds of presbyterianism. It has been alleged, too, that many of its members were swayed by private interest in their opposition to the bishops, conceiving that their title to estates, which, although now in their possession, had at one time been church property, would be rendered more secure by the abolition of the order of bishops, and placed beyond all reach of dispute; and it is not unlikely that this motive might influence many. So long as the affairs of religion are allowed to come in any shape under the cognizance of parliaments and political conventions, it is vain to expect that they will be settled purely on their own merits.

After the accession of William and Mary, a regular parliament was held in June, consisting of the same members who had formerly been returned to the convention; and at this meeting prelacy was formally abolished. The principles affirmed in the claim of rights were sanctioned, and it was enacted that prelacy and all superiority of office in the Church was an intolerable burden. Nothing definite, however, was settled as to what should be established in the room of prelacy. Presbytery was not mentioned, but it was simply declared that their majesties, with consent of the Estates of parliament, would establish by law that form of church government in the kingdom, which was most agreeable to the inclinations of the people.†

The appeal thus made, both in the Claim of Right and in the act of parliament, to the inclinations of the people as the reason for adopting a certain form of church government was highly displeas-

* Cook's History, vol. iii. p. 445; Burton, vol. i. pp. 9, 186; Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 220.

† Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 246; Cook's History, vol. iii. p. 446.

* Macaulay, vol. iii. p. 251; Hetherington, p. 173.

ing, not only to the covenanters, but to the whole body of the presbyterians; but it perfectly harmonised with the sentiments of William, and agreed with the instructions which he had sent down to his representative in Scotland. The king was willing that the presbyterian scheme of government should be established by law; but he, naturally enough, desired that the grounds of the preference accorded to it should be so exhibited as not to give offence to his subjects in England. As the head of an episcopal communion in one part of the empire, he could not with consistency acknowledge the divine right of presbytery in another. It might be allowed to be lawful, but it could not be described as the only polity warranted in Scripture. Besides, William was desirous that the episcopalian clergy in Scotland might feel at liberty to retain their benefices in connection with the new establishment; and it was obvious that they could have far less ground for scruple on this head, if presbytery were established on account of its agreeableness to the views of the people, than if it were declared to be the only scheme sanctioned by the Word of God. But the argument and the conclusion, the means and end, were alike distasteful to the presbyterians. They not only wished their own policy established, but they conceived that it should be established on the ground of divine right. They neither desired that the episcopalians should be included within the pale of their church, nor did they conceive it right that any form of religion should be established merely because it happened to receive the suffrages of a majority; and, certainly, it was not at all surprising that they should be quite averse to the admission of their old enemies to the privileges of their newly-founded church. Not only had the episcopalians refused to allow them to retain their presbyterian principles in connection with the Established Church during the reigns of Charles II. and James VII., they had not even granted them permission to retire quietly from the communion of the dominant Church, and to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience in a state of separation, but had enforced conformity with the sword and the gibbet, by thumb-screws and iron boots, and for twenty-eight long years they had filled the country with "lamentation, and mourning, and woe." It would have been marvellous, indeed, if in those circumstances the presbyterians had manifested any disposition to make sacrifices for the sake of admitting amongst them men from whom they had suffered so much.

It was the wish of the Duke of Hamilton, lord high-commissioner, that parliament, having abolished episcopacy, should immediately proceed to set up a new ecclesiastical establishment; and he brought forward a proposal, which had been sent down to him from London by Carstairs, that the presbyterian system should be restored, and church affairs regulated agreeably to the principles of the settlement of 1592.* His overture also aimed at preventing church courts from meddling with the affairs of state, and, with the view of securing this object, their majesties were to be allowed, if they thought proper, to send commissioners, not only to assemblies, but also to synods and presbyteries. The rights of patrons, too, were to be secured to them.† Another scheme was proposed by Lord Cardross, which abolished patronage, and was also in other respects agreeable to the views of the presbyterians. Many were extremely dissatisfied that the inclinations of the people should be described as the ground for preferring the presbyterian government, and they insisted that the phraseology of Knox should be employed, which declared the presbyterian scheme to be grounded upon the infallible truth of God's Word. But from these amendments the Duke of Hamilton felt constrained to withhold his consent, as quite beyond what his instructions warranted. Besides, there were other causes of disunion in the house; a strong party having been formed against the government under the leadership of Sir James Montgomery, who were bent upon securing certain political and personal objects before proceeding to settle the affairs of the Church.‡ The consequence was that parliament was dissolved before any ecclesiastical settlement was made at all. The old fabric was thrown down, but nothing was erected upon the ground thus left vacant.§

Matters remained in this posture till the subsequent meeting of parliament in April, 1690, when the question of the new ecclesiastical establishment was taken up in much more favourable circumstances, and brought perhaps to the best settlement which the views and relative positions of the different parties admitted. The Earl of Melville appeared as the representative of his majesty in the assembly of the Estates. It had been the king's purpose to reappoint the Duke of Hamilton to this office, and proposals had been made to him to induce him to co-operate heartily in advancing the royal views, but the negotiations failed of success. One of the first measures adopted by parliament was the repeal of the act of supremacy, which, investing the sovereign with the power of judging in all causes ecclesiastical as well as civil, had been the copious source of sorrow, perplexity, and suffering to the presbyterians for more than a quarter of a century. It is alleged by Burnet that his majesty had not authorised Melville to give his sanction to the abrogation of this act,|| being afraid that his influence over the Church might be too much circumscribed, and that his authority even in civil matters might suffer some damage;¶ but the opposition of the house to the existing law was so strongly expressed that the commissioner felt constrained to yield to it,

* Carstairs' Life, pp. 47, 794; Burton, vol. i. p. 192.

† Burnet, vol. iv. p. 36. ‡ Macaulay, vol. iii. p. 348.

§ Cook's History, vol. iii. p. 449.

|| Burnet, vol. iv. p. 89.

¶ Willison's Impartial Testimony, vol. iv. p. 301.

Offence taken at the ground indicated for the new establishment.

Proceedings of parliament with regard to the Church.

Measures proposed by the Duke of Hamilton.

and the act of abrogation was touched with the royal sceptre. So far as the act of supremacy related to civil matters its propriety had never been questioned, but its bearing upon ecclesiastical affairs was utterly inconsistent with the smallest degree of spiritual independence.*

Shortly after the Restoration, nearly four hundred of the presbyterian ministers had been compelled to leave their parishes, where they were much beloved and were labouring with great efficiency, because they refused to disown the validity of their own orders, and to apply to the prelates for collation and admission to office. The harshness and iniquity of the treatment which had been given at that time to so large and honoured a body of men, were now acknowledged by parliament; and an act was passed restoring to their parishes as many of the ejected ministers as might still be alive. Yet the interests of those who were displaced to make room for them were not altogether overlooked, for it was arranged that a portion of the current half-year's stipend should be assigned to them for their support, until they obtained some other situation. No such consideration had been shown to the ejected presbyterians in their day of trial. And, after all, it was not many removals that were needed to make room for the restoration of those who had suffered so long; for the lapse of twenty-seven years had reduced the number of these venerable men to sixty. The vast majority of them had ended their days in tribulation and poverty; and not a few of them had met a violent death for the sake of their principles.†

The next point which parliament proceeded to the Confession of consider was the nature of the Faith ratified. new ecclesiastical system to be established in the room of episcopacy now abolished as unsuitable to Scotland. No difficulty was felt with regard to the creed which should be recognised as the national one. The Confession of Faith was read over at full length, received the approbation of parliament, and was ordered to be engrossed in the records of the house. The zealous adherents of the presbyterian scheme were desirous that the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, also, as well as the Directory of public worship, and presbyterial church government and discipline, should be read and sanctioned in the same manner, but the patience of the legislators was quite exhausted.‡ The Duke of Hamilton exclaimed that they had done all that was essential, and it was so ruled by acclamation. Three hours had been spent in reading the Confession, and the other documents referred to being at least twice as voluminous, the members were quite indisposed to encounter the task of passing judgment upon them. They did not, therefore, receive the same parliamentary sanction as the Confession itself.§

The question regarding the forms of ecclesiastical government, by which the new establishment should be conducted, was attended with more difficulty; and several points, in this region so fertile of controversy, were very keenly contested. The general principles, indeed, of the presbyterian system, as embracing sessions, presbyteries, synods, and an assembly, were sanctioned without hesitation; and the famous settlement of 1592, already fully described in this work,* was followed as a model, although the adherents of the covenant and all the more zealous presbyterians would have preferred the revival of the laws enacted at the time of the second Reformation in 1638. One point, which gave rise to long and serious debate, was the question whether the General Assembly should be intrusted with the sole power of appointing and dissolving its own meetings, or whether this power should be vested in the crown. Neither party was disposed to yield to the other, and the strife terminated without any decisive settlement of the question. The evil consequences of this ambiguity became apparent at the closing of the very first General Assembly which was held after the Revolution, when considerable tact and management were requisite in order to prevent a rupture between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities.

The task of setting the ecclesiastical machinery in motion was confided to the sixty restored ministers, who had so long braved the storms of persecution. They were made the nucleus, around which the new Church was to gather. They were authorised, along with such individuals as they might judge it suitable to associate with themselves, to visit parishes, to summon the incumbents before them, and to dismiss those who were shown to be either unsound, or immoral, or deficient in ability. The powers thus intrusted to the remnant of the ancient presbyterian Church were greatly complained of as too extensive and despotic. They were styled, in derision, the sixty bishops, and certainly they did possess for a time something like episcopal jurisdiction. It belonged to them to revive the presbyteries, which were to consist of such ministers as they either admitted anew, or allowed to remain in the parishes where they found them labouring. What should be done in the case of the episcopal incumbents, who had been expelled by popular violence, might have proved a very perplexing question to the sixty while labouring to reconstruct the Church. With the view of smoothing the way for them, it was decreed by parliament that all parishes which had been forsaken by their ministers should be considered vacant. No part of the new enactments with regard to the Church was assailed with more determined opposition than this, and certainly it was one which, however urgent might be the necessity for it, was least susceptible of public defence. Why should men who had been driven out of their parishes by a lawless rabble be held to

* Cook, vol. iii. p. 450.

† Hetherington, p. 130; Burnet, vol. iv. p. 92.

‡ Burton, vol. i. p. 195.

§ Macaulay, vol. iii. p. 690; Burton, vol. i. p. 198.

* Supra, vol. ii. pp. 442, 443.

have demitted their charge? Yet the attempt to repon them would have embroiled the whole kingdom. It would have alienated the covenanters from the government, and would thus have augmented the power of the party who were labouring to effect a counter-revolution. Besides, the ejected episcopal incumbents had themselves been intruded upon the presbyterian congregations, amid scenes of atrocious cruelty, and in violation of existing laws, and on this account they had for years been the objects of extreme dislike through all the western shires. As individuals they might deserve sympathy, but their restoration to the churches, from which the parishioners had expelled them, would have been utterly inconsistent with all the purposes for which a church exists. The blame of their sufferings rests upon the outrageous tyranny of the preceding twenty-eight years, which had fallen with peculiar severity upon the covenanters of the west, and had thus maddened them into fury.*

The question of patronage was brought under the notice of parliament at a later period of the session. The presbyterian Church had always clung to the idea that the pastoral relation could only be formed between minister and people by common consent. Both the first book of discipline and the second had exhibited this great principle, although with different degrees of prominence, and it had been considered one of the principal defects of the act of 1592, that it recognised and established the rights of patrons, and altogether excluded the popular element.† Congregations were debarred from having any voice in a matter, in which they had a far deeper interest than any other party could plead, and the sole check upon the abuse of patronage was the right vested in the presbytery of testing the qualifications of the presentee. The deep feeling always cherished against patronage received full vent during the triumph of the covenant, and this odious infringement of congregational rights was successfully assailed in 1649; but once more the Restoration in 1661 elevated the patrons to be "lords over God's heritage;" and down to the time of the Revolution the views of the people were altogether disregarded in the settlement of ministers. But now again the ancient feeling, although it had been long trampled in the mire, sprung up fresh and vigorous, and the great mass of the people were urgent that patronage should be entirely and for ever abolished. This, however, was a measure which the patrons strenuously opposed, as involving a violation of their rights; and William also, on the ground of political considerations, was quite averse to so sweeping a change. It has been disputed whether he authorised Melville to consent in any circumstances to the abolition of patronage. Burnet affirms that the representative of majesty in the Scottish parliament went beyond his commission, and that the king was much displeased with him for surrendering the safeguards of the crown.* Certainly, the remarks which were dictated by William to Carstairs upon the act for settling church government in Scotland, and which were sent down to Scotland for the guidance of Melville, imply that the rights of patrons were to remain intact;† but there is reason to believe that secret instructions were given to Melville authorising him, if he found himself sorely pressed, to accede to the desires of the Scottish people,—and he did accordingly, when he saw what offence the continuance of patronage would give to the presbyterian party to which he himself belonged, consider himself at liberty to sanction a measure in accordance with their views.

But the act abolishing patronage did not by any means concede to the community the right of freely choosing their own pastors. Nature of the act abolishing patronage.

The privileges which it conferred fell below even what the second book of discipline had contemplated, and they would be considered in our day degrading bondage by those churches which, disconnected from the state, take the entire management of their own affairs, and conduct them in general with so much propriety and decorum. In country parishes the heritors, and in boroughs the municipal corporations were empowered, in conjunction with the elders, not to present,‡ for that word was studiously shunned, but to propose a duly licensed individual to the congregation; and the congregation had the privilege of expressing their approbation of the proposal, or of declaring themselves dissatisfied.§ If they were not pleased, then they were obliged to state their reasons to the presbytery; and it remained with the presbytery alone to decide whether the reasons which they assigned were valid, and whether the settlement should be completed without regard to the views of the people.||

One of William's objections to the abolition of patronage was, that the right of presenting to churches seemed to him a species of property. This view, of course, naturally suggested the idea of obviating the difficulty by making compensation to the parties deprived of their ancient rights; and accordingly the act did make provision for the payment of a certain amount of purchase money to the patrons. This proposal, too, of pecuniary compensation was the more readily acceded to by

* Burnet, vol. iv. p. 89; Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 288.

† Carstairs' State Papers, p. 51.

‡ This change of terms has always been considered by the friends of the Church of Scotland as one of vital importance. And, certainly, it does seem as if the power of proposing a minister to a congregation were somewhat less than the power of presenting one. But the real question is, whether the communicants had any greater means of resisting the proposal of the ministers and elders than of resisting the presentation of the patrons. Now, the truth seems to be that there was hardly any difference. In both cases the people were at liberty to state their objections as fully as they pleased; but in both cases it remained with the presbytery to decide with regard to their validity.

§ Wodrow's Correspondence, vol. i. pp. 15, 16.

|| Cook's History, vol. iii. p. 452.

* Macaulay, vol. iii. p. 691.

† Supra, vol. ii. pp. 442, 443.

many, who might have been disposed to deny that patronage at all partook of the nature of property, on the ground that, assuming it to be property, the most effectual method of preventing the possibility of its restoration was to purchase it at a valuation. For both these reasons it was readily agreed to in parliament that the sum of six hundred marks, amounting to about twenty-five pounds sterling should be paid by each parish in return for the right of patronage renounced by the patron. Yet the portion of the act relating to compensation is so drawn up as hardly to seem consistent with what goes before; for after patronage had been declared in the outset to be "abolished, discharged, annulled, and made void," it surely might have sufficed to decree that compensation should be made for the rights thus taken away. But, instead of this, the act requires that the patron, on receiving the specified six hundred marks, should execute a deed of renunciation, and that until he did so the money should not be paid to him, but remain deposited in the hands of some responsible person. It seems thus to be left to the patron to decide whether he would renounce a right abolished by parliament, and yet whether he did so or not, the heritors and sessions were empowered to proceed according to the new law. These incongruities afford a plausible ground for the view which has been taken by many, that the famous act of 1690 was really not an act for abolishing patronage, but rather one for facilitating the extinction of it by purchase; and it is a fact that the provisions of this act really did pave the way for the restoration of patronage at a subsequent period; for as the parishes obtained the benefit of the new law at once, they hardly in any case thought of completing the arrangement by presenting payment and demanding the patron's renunciation; and the patrons, on the other hand, although empowered to sue for their six hundred marks, in no case had recourse to this step, because they hoped that their rights might be restored to them at no distant period. And thus it happened that only four parishes, viz., Cadder, Old and New Monkland, and Strathblane, obtained renunciations from their patrons; and in the case of the last mentioned parish, the deed was afterwards set aside, as not having been executed by the right person.*

That the legislative enactments thus made in favour of presbyterian principles might be carried into effect, and the machinery of the new Church be actually set in motion, it was appointed that a meeting of the General Assembly should take place at Edinburgh on the 16th day of October. It was with great reluctance that William gave his consent to the resumption of the meetings of a court which had so often, in former days, been able to control the policy of government, and which might now furnish an arena where the elements of strife, so rife in Scotland, might meet in conflict; but as a General Assembly belonged to the very essence of the presbyterian system, he found that he could not on any plausible ground withhold his sanction from the meeting. And accordingly, after an interval of nearly forty years, the supreme ecclesiastical tribunal of Scotland was again summoned together.* The zealous presbyterians were desirous that the Earl of Crawford, who was noted for his attachment to presbyterian principles, should be appointed royal commissioner; but the very ardour of character and warmth of religious feeling, which recommended him to them, were considered as disqualifications at court. Accordingly his majesty, while he took pains to soothe the feelings of Crawford and to secure his co-operation, named Lord Carmichael, who was noted for his calmness, prudence, and firmness, as his representative in the Scottish ecclesiastical court. At the opening of the assembly the commissioner presented a letter from his majesty, in which it was strongly urged that a moderate and temperate course should be pursued in dealing with those who had held office under the former establishment; and the assembly declared in reply that "it was not their judgment to depose any incumbent simply for his judgment anent the government of the Church, or to urge reordination, nor to ratify any sentences against ministers, but such as were either ignorant, insufficient, scandalous, or erroneous."†

There were many elements of discord at work in the new establishment, which, without the utmost care and prudence, might involve it in difficulties and issue in its destruction. It had always been a favourite and cherished principle among the presbyterians that the Christian Church should not be under the control of the civil power, but should be left by statesmen to pursue her own independent course. The taint of Erastianism was the object of peculiar abhorrence. It was, therefore, conceived by the General Assembly that they possessed the inherent right of appointing their own meetings, and of adjourning their proceedings to such times as they might judge proper; but his majesty's commissioner felt that he could not concur in these views without sacrificing the rights of the crown, and, therefore, he refused to allow even the daily adjournments to take place without his sanction.‡ The disagreement, however, was veiled from public view, and a compromise was devised, which has been followed substantially down to the present day. The commissioner and the moderator consulted together, and the moderator, having obtained the commissioner's sanction, intimated the period when the court was to resume its business. But at the close of the assembly the commissioner himself announced the dissolution and the time of the next Delicate position of the assembly with respect to the government.

* Willison's Testimony, vol. iv. p. 300; Hetherington, p. 181.

† Burton, vol. i. pp. 208, 209.

‡ Melville Papers, p. 549.

* Burton, vol. i. p. 221; Macaulay, vol. iii. p. 694.

annual meeting; and when the minute was read, drawn up in terms which conveyed the idea that the assembly had dissolved itself, he objected to the structure of it. A dangerous crisis might have arisen, but, in order to ward it off, an ambiguous expression was employed, and the record was thrown into a form which simply mentioned the dissolution, without describing the authority from which it proceeded, the words employed being these—"this assembly being dissolved."*

Besides the differences between the views of William and the members of the assembly, there were differences also among the members themselves, which tended to paralyse the vigour of their proceedings, and to prevent the adoption of any decisive measures. Some of the ministers had formerly complied to a greater or less extent with prelacy, and had accepted the indulgences granted by the preceding government; but others of them had boldly denounced the defections of the times, sternly censured their more submissive brethren, and exposed themselves to many dangers and sufferings on account of their principles. The appointment of a national fast brought the differences between these men into active operation, and a warm and protracted discussion ensued, with reference to the statement of grounds for the public humiliation. What the one party would have exhibited as the sins to be repented of, the other would have felt to be a censure upon their whole past career. It was, therefore, found necessary to the peace and well-being of the Church, that no minute specification of sins or of offending parties should be made, but that general expressions should be employed to set forth the offences which rendered a national fast necessary.†

There were large numbers of the presbyterians who continued to hold the permanent obligations of the Covenant sworn at the period of the second Reformation. Those who took this view were grievously offended that the late parliament had not ratified the Covenant along with the Confession of Faith; and they maintained that all who acquiesced in this procedure entailed upon themselves the guilt of perjury. Many on this account refused to join the new establishment; and they continued to maintain themselves as a separate religious community, to which the names of Hill-men, Society people, and Cameronians have been given. Their special function was to bear testimony in favour of the Covenant, and to aim at restoring it to its former might and mastery. They considered that William, having refused to take upon himself the obligations of this solemn deed, and to enforce them throughout his dominions, had no valid title to the throne, and that his government ought not to be acknowledged by the acceptance of any office under him, or by the payment of taxes, or by the signing of any document which recognised him as king. These men, although undoubtedly far wrong in the views which they entertained of government and of the Covenant, were yet men of ardent piety, whose sincerity was demonstrated by the sufferings and trials which they so resolutely encountered for the sake of their principles. That they should attach exaggerated importance to the oaths sworn by their ancestors against prelacy was a not unnatural consequence of the bloody persecutions which they had endured during the two preceding reigns; and if they contracted some stern and repulsive features of character, and used a phraseology somewhat singular in its stamp, their long-continued sufferings and isolation, and the heroism which they displayed on many occasions, might suffice to shield them from the shafts of ridicule. Their descendants still subsist among us, under the designation of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, a very respectable body of men, with a ministry thoroughly trained and disciplined, who although they may not have formally renounced the peculiarities of their predecessors, yet certainly do not now bring them into the same prominent view as in bygone times. They are to be found, not merely in "a few obscure farm-houses," but in all the largest towns of Scotland.*

But while the Society people as a body refused to join the Church of the Revolution, their three leading religious teachers, Thomas Linning, William Boyd, and Alexander Shields, determined to apply for admission

Three leading Cameronian ministers admitted into the Church.

within her pale; not because they were disposed to abandon their principles, but in the hope that they might be able, as members of the Church, to promote her reformation. They presented two papers to the assembly, in the one of which they simply craved admission into the Church, and promised to submit to her judicatories; but in the other, which was designed as an exoneration of their consciences, they gave an extended exposition of their views, pointed out the enormities and backslidings chargeable upon the nation, and called upon the assembly to adopt measures for rectifying these clamant evils.† These papers were submitted to the consideration of the committee of overtures, who reported with regard to the larger document, "that though there were several good things in it, yet the same did also contain several peremptory and gross mistakes, unreasonable and impracticable proposals, and uncharitable and injurious reflections, tending rather to kindle contentions than to compose divisions,"‡

* Macaulay, vol. iii. pp. 705—707. The eloquent historian of England, whose works have recently excited so great a sensation, has fallen into a mistake regarding the descendants of the Society people, or men of the Covenant. He seems to imagine that they do not now exist as a corporate body at all, but are only to be found as isolated individuals, in a few dwellings far from the haunts of men.

† Brown's Compendious History, vol. ii. p. 282.

‡ Linning, in his preface to Shields on "Church Communion," maintains that these words were not in the original minute, but must afterwards have been fraudulently inserted by the clerks. They stand, however, in the printed record.

* Burton, vol. i. p. 212.

† Hetherington, p. 182.

and, therefore, it was agreed that it should not be read in open court.* The smaller paper, however, was read, and the three brethren were admitted on the ground of the petition and promise which it embodied. These proceedings, like those of parliament, demonstrate to how great an extent the ecclesiastical settlement at the Revolution partook of the nature of a compromise. We naturally wonder how the assembly, when the document presented by the three covenanting ministers was so offensive that it could not bear to be read in public, could at once proceed to admit them to the position of ministers in the Church without asking from them apology or retraction. But we have only to remember that the covenanters were a numerous body, and that their military prowess, which was equal to that of Cromwell's Ironsides, was one of the main defences of the government against the efforts of the exiled royal family. On the other hand, if the three brethren believed the half of what they said in their longer document, it is equally surprising that they could for a moment entertain the idea of entering a Church which was so full of blemishes, and which not only refused to rectify them, but was even so blind as not to perceive their existence. Doubtless they were conscientious men; and we can only suppose that they really believed they should be able to effect such a reformation of the Church, as would bring her into conformity with the Church of the second Reformation, which was considered the standard of perfection. Their conduct, however, in joining the establishment, when their paper of grievances and complaints was so unceremoniously set aside, gave extreme offence to the great body of their followers, who regarded them as renegades and traitors, and determined to choose for themselves other teachers, and to maintain their separate existence.†

Parliament had granted to the sixty brethren, whom they commissioned to constitute themselves the nucleus of the Church and to bring together a general assembly, power to purge out all "insufficient, negligent, scandalous, and erroneous ministers by due course of ecclesiastical process and censures." With the view of carrying into effect the powers thus vested in them, the assembly appointed visitors to proceed to all parts of the country for the purpose of investigating the state of matters, and taking measures for the rectification of abuses. One commission received charge of the regions lying north of the Tay, another of those lying south of that river. These commissioners were not empowered to depose any incumbents simply for opinions which they might hold regarding church government, provided they were sound in their views of doctrine and free from gross immorality. Their labours were prosecuted for a considerable time, and they deposed many of the episcopalian clergy on the ground of drunkenness and debauchery.‡ As might be expected, it was alleged that they treated these with more severity than any others, and it is not unlikely that even with the desire of acting fairly they might in some instances be biassed by prejudice. Their proceedings in the southern and western parts of the country, which were the strongholds of presbyterianism and the covenant, were exceedingly popular, and the only fault which was laid to their charge was that of undue lenity. But very different was the case in the north, where episcopalian principles prevailed. There the commissioners were viewed as the agents of despotism and tyranny. When they visited Aberdeen in March, 1691, their proceedings were resisted by force, the inhabitants having leagued together in defence of their ministers; and they were under the necessity of retreating with some precipitation, to avoid the disgrace and danger of being stoned out of the town.*

Thus was the Presbyterian Church once more recognised by the Estates of the realm as the national Church of the country; and, although episcopals were admitted within her pale, not only as members, but even as office-bearers, yet no forms of procedure were introduced inconsistent with the principles of presbytery. The settlement of ecclesiastical affairs at the Revolution has been made the subject of keen criticism, and men have pronounced judgments of the most opposite kind regarding it. Some have stigmatised it for one reason, and some for another; and what has been considered in one quarter as deserving the most unmitigated censure, has been viewed in another as possessing a claim to the highest praise; so that perhaps it really was as equitable and just a settlement as was practicable in the circumstances of the times.

There are two lights in which the ecclesiastical arrangement of 1690 may be contemplated, and according as we look at it in the one or the other of these, we shall form very different opinions of it. If we consider the institution modelled by parliamentary and royal power simply as a Christian Church, and bring its principles to the test of Scripture, we can hardly fail to descry in it numerous and deep-seated blemishes. The new Church was not sufficiently independent; she had not the power of acting upon her own convictions of duty. The single fact that the General Assembly could not appoint its own meetings, nor adjourn without the sanction of the royal commissioner, is sufficient to refute the allegation that the Church was possessed of complete spiritual independence. No one can deny that her power of spontaneous action was very much trammelled. It cannot be doubted that if the restraints imposed by William had been all removed, the sixty, and those whom they summoned to their counsels, would have come to very different conclusions on a variety of points. The probability is that it was the merest fraction of the assembly that were

Views taken of the revolution settlement—

—reflections on its character.

* Acts of Assembly, 1690. † Hetherington, p. 181.

‡ Brown's Compendious History, vol. ii. p. 384.

* Burton, vol. i. p. 214.

entirely satisfied with the moderate policy which William considered it his duty to follow. The elements, too, which this policy ultimately introduced into the Church were of the most heterogeneous kind, and such as would never have spontaneously coalesced. How could those who believed that a covenant, whose leading object was the extirpation of prelacy, was obligatory upon the nation with all the sanction of an oath, cordially co-operate with men who viewed episcopacy as the only form of government sanctioned in Scripture? Parties thus disposed to wage an internecine war with one another, would have acted a more Christian part in remaining asunder. Such extremes meeting within the same communion tend to obliterate all distinction between right and wrong. The best solution of the difficulty would have been to refrain from setting up an established Church at all, and then the different parties would have been left to incorporate themselves with one another, just in so far as they could agree. But this method, although recommended by the equal justice which it extends to all, and by its perfect accordance with the New Testament, which does not contain a single hint that the Gospel was to look for support to the powers of this world, was quite impracticable at the time, for the simple reason that the conviction of the necessity of a national Church supported by the state was universal throughout the country. All proceeded upon the principle that there must, of course, be an established Church, and hence arose the necessity for sundry compromises, in order to make the Church rest upon as broad a basis as possible. It is easy for those who still approve of the solemn league and covenant, to say that parliament and the General Assembly should have made those documents the basis of their legislation; but although all the praise that was so profusely bestowed upon them in certain quarters had been entirely merited, the revival of them was no longer practicable as a national measure, for they were far from having an effective majority in their favour. It was not now felt that there was the same need of a national covenant as, without a doubt, there had formerly been, when an oppressed community were mustering their forces for conflict with a powerful despotism. Besides, Scotland had accepted the deliverance which William brought to this country when he assumed the reins of government, and the position of the new sovereign in the southern part of the island rendered a renewal of the covenant in the northern kingdom utterly impracticable. With what consistency could the head of the episcopal Church of England have sworn to extirpate prelacy in Scotland? Again, it is easy for those who are rigidly presbyterian in their principles, to say that the General Assembly should have excluded all the episcopalian clergy from the new establishment; but this would have been a very hazardous measure, for the so-called curates were a numerous class, and there were parts of the country where they were respected and honoured, as much as the presbyterians were in the south and west. For several years, indeed, no measures were taken by the assembly for their admission; but it was not long till it became apparent, that they could not be shut out without endangering the stability of the whole ecclesiastical system. In fact, their continued exclusion by the General Assembly would either have embroiled the country in endless strife, or would probably have necessitated the erection of two ecclesiastical establishments, one north of the Tay and the other south. At that time as conclusive an argument could have been constructed for setting up two religious establishments in Scotland, as for having different churches in England and Scotland. Again, it is easy for those who look upon episcopal ordination as essential to the validity of holy orders, to say that parliament should have disregarded the inclinations of the people, and maintained the Church which existed before the Revolution, in all its rights and privileges; but this would have been a more visionary and hopeless scheme than any of the rest, for deliverance from the oppression of the Episcopal Church was considered in the greater part of Scotland as the main blessing of the Revolution. Amid the opposing views and principles by which different parties in the country, and different districts, were agitated, it was not possible that any system could have been established, such as would meet perfectly the views of any one party, and yet be such as the rest of the community could at all tolerate. Compromise was indispensable. A national Church cannot be set up with any degree of fairness, nor with any prospect of permanency or peace, excepting on the principle of embodying as large a proportion of the inhabitants as possible; and those who will establish churches of this kind must make sacrifices to attain this end. Many blame William for the principle which he avowed of instituting a Church in Scotland, such as would best fall in with the inclinations or views of the bulk of the people. It was the only sound or rational principle that could be followed in such a case. What would have been thought of his procedure, if he had avowed the opposite principle, and, declaring that he would establish nothing but what he considered in his own conscience to be scriptural, had proceeded to set up a system, right in his own views, but utterly wrong according to the convictions of the whole Scottish people? The settlement of the Church at the Revolution, seeing that the country was not at all prepared to dispense with an establishment, was perhaps the best which, amid the conflicting views and interests of the different parties, it was possible at the time to effect. It is true that no small amount of evil sprang from it afterwards. But it does not, therefore, follow that it was not the best practicable arrangement at the time. The rigid exclusion of the episcopalian ministers from the pale of the Established Church might very likely have prevented the growth of that moderatism which so long shed its blighting influence upon the religious interests of Scotland, but the excluded element would not, therefore, have ceased to exist or to operate. It would probably have been sufficiently vigorous at the time to secure the establishment of an episcopal Church in the northern parts of the kingdom, and its concentrated virus might there have operated with tenfold energy. With a purer Church south of the Tay, we might have had one greatly more corrupt in possession of all the region beyond.

The commission appointed by the assembly to purge out scandalous and immoral ministers does not appear upon the whole to have been actuated by a disposition to undue severity. The task, indeed, confided to them was one of a very delicate kind, and it was not possible for them to enter upon it at all without exposing themselves to odium. With the very best intentions, they might sometimes be so swayed by their prejudices as to exclude some individuals on insufficient grounds; and even where exclusion was merited, the consequences to individuals and families might often involve extreme hardship.* Nor were the episcopal clergy slow to proclaim their sufferings to the world. They raised a furious outcry against the proceedings of the new establishment, and branded the presbyterians as cruel and relentless persecutors. The recollection of the atrocious cruelties which they themselves had inflicted upon these same presbyterians during a long course of years, not by simple deprivation of office, but by imprisonment, and torture, and death, should have led them to remain silent under the comparatively trifling reprisals which were now made upon them, and which did not touch a hair of their heads. But there are some parties who seem to think it right that they should be allowed to chastise their opponents with scorpions, while if they are in turn scourged with whips it is denounced as a scandalous outrage. It was in this spirit that the episcopal clergy regarded the proceedings of the assembly's commission; their complaints filled the land;† they resounded from the pulpit; they were made the subject of many a pamphlet from the press; and they were carried, both orally and by letter, into England.‡ William's great desire with regard to the settlement of ecclesiastical affairs in Scotland had all along been that neither party should be allowed to enjoy an exclusive triumph, but that as many as possible of both parties should be comprehended within the new establishment; and, therefore, when the complaints of the episcopalians excited the fear that his policy might be defeated, he became extremely irritated against the presbyterians, and charged them with applying too rigid a test to their opponents. A General Assembly had been appointed to take place in November, 1691, but it was adjourned by the king till January, 1692. One ground of this delay might be that his majesty wished to manifest his displeasure against the presbyterians by interrupting the operations of a court to which they attached so much importance, and making them sensible to what extent they were in his power; but probably the main reason for the adjournment was that he was so much engrossed with political affairs, continental as well as domestic, that he could not give that attention to the proceedings of the assembly, which he considered indispensable. Matters were in a critical position in Scotland, and he could not trust to the discretion and forbearance of an ecclesiastical meeting, unless he had ample opportunity of considering every question himself, and preparing detailed instructions for the guidance of his commissioner. Some of the numerous interruptions of the assembly's meetings which took place during several years subsequent to the Revolution, were undoubtedly designed as manifestations of the royal displeasure; while others of them were occasioned by the determination of his majesty to allow nothing to be done, unless he were so circumstanced as to have ample opportunity for watching and controlling the proceedings.

At length the time named by the king for holding a General Assembly arrived, and the ministers gathered with gladness to attend a court Meeting of the General Assembly. which was always considered indispensable to the completeness of their Church's organisation, and the interruption of whose meetings, from any cause, filled them with so much sorrow. The list of members present, being arranged according to presbyteries, exhibits at a glance how small the influence of presbyterianism was in the northern parts of the kingdom, many of the presbyteries in that quarter being altogether unrepresented.* The Earl of Lothian appeared as royal commissioner, and he produced a letter from the king, in which the ministers were blamed for continuing to exclude the episcopalians from all share in the rule of the Church; and it was declared to be his majesty's pleasure that they should admit to a seat in their presbyteries, synods, and assembly, those of that body who should sign the Confession of Faith, and promise to submit to the authority of cases, but the things are so different in kind, that they ought not to be weighed against one another. (Burnet, vol. iv. p. 93.)

* Burton, vol. i. p. 226.

* Burnet's Own Times, vol. iv. pp. 92, 93; Cook's History, vol. iii. p. 453.

† Carstairs' State Papers, p. 51.

‡ Burnet, adverting to the proceedings of the presbyterians against the episcopalians at this time, makes a remark which, with a great appearance of candour, does not really meet the case at all. "So apt," says he, "are all parties in their turns of power to fall into those very excesses, of which they did formerly make such tragical complaints." But the fact is, that the presbyterians did not commit "those very excesses" against the episcopalians of which they themselves had been the victims. What were the grounds of the complaints formerly made by the presbyterians? That for twenty-eight years they had been driven out, ministers and people, from their homes, apprehended, and cast into prison, hanged, and drowned, and shot. What was it the episcopalians had now to complain of? That some of their ministers were tried on charges of immorality, and suspended from their functions. No doubt there might be undue severity in some the Church judicatories. Nor was this all; it was proposed by his majesty that any commissions which might be appointed by the assembly, for the trial of individuals, applying to be admitted into the Church, who were charged either with unsoundness or immorality, should be composed one half of the old presbyterian ministers, and the other half of ministers who had formerly conformed to episcopacy.*

After his majesty's letter was read, the commissioner addressed the assembly, with the view of persuading them to comply with the advice from the throne. He acknowledged that the presbyterians had met with hard usage from their opponents in days gone by, but he urged the propriety of forgetting old jealousies; and he argued that men "who were already in the exercise of the more essentials," that is, who were permitted to retain their parishes, and to preach and dispense ordinances, should be admitted also to a share in the government of the Church.† But the ministers were not at all disposed to accede to these views. It was true, they had already agreed that those of the curates or episcopal clergy, who were found to be sound in doctrine and blameless in life, should be permitted to retain their benefices; and many of them, accordingly, having been declared fit and suitable by the commission, were preaching in their parishes without molestation, and enjoying their full emoluments. But these very facts were viewed by the assembly as proving that they had already made sufficient concessions to their opponents; nor is it surprising that they felt an extreme aversion to place upon a level with themselves, in guiding the counsels of the Church, men who had never for a moment dreamed during their day of power of lowering the pretensions of episcopacy in order to accommodate them. Their scruples, too, and fears were greatly strengthened by the conduct of the curates at this very time. The spirit which they manifested was by no means conciliatory. They appeared at the bar of the assembly to urge their claims by petition, alleging that they had his majesty's authority for taking this step; and when asked to produce this authority they refused to present it to the assembly, though they expressed their willingness to lay it before the commissioner. Indeed, Bishop Burnet acknowledges that "the episcopal party carried it high."‡ They were persuaded that the king was disgusted with the presbyterians, and had now come round entirely to their views; and they anticipated that by gaining admission into the assembly they should soon be able to acquire the ascendancy, and have the opportunity of regulating all matters according to their own opinions. It was not a share of the government of the Church which they wanted, but the whole direction of its affairs. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the assembly remained deaf to all the arguments of the commissioner, and all the appeals of the curates themselves.* They busied themselves with a multitude of details relating to particular parishes; but they studiously shunned all serious consideration of the great business for which the king had summoned them together. At length, after a month had been spent in transacting what seemed to the commissioner business of no moment, his patience was quite exhausted; and, reproaching the assembly for their disregard of the king's wishes and refusal to be reconciled to their brethren, he dissolved the meeting with great displeasure, and named no day for another. The moderator at once drew attention to this omission, but the commissioner replied that his majesty would appoint a day in due season, of which timely notice should be given. This was not satisfactory to the moderator, who was proceeding to remonstrate, when the commissioner assured him, that he could only speak now as a private person, and was no longer competent to take any steps as moderator. He did speak, complaining that no day had been named for the next meeting of the General Assembly, and craving that the dissolution which had just taken place should not be to the prejudice of those yearly meetings which custom and the laws of the kingdom sanctioned; and, being urged by the members present to name some day himself, he announced the third Wednesday of August, 1693, as the time when they should again meet for the transaction of business, and then concluded with the usual religious services.†

This abrupt dissolution of the General Assembly by the commissioner, without any provision being made for holding another meeting, occasioned extreme dissatisfaction to the whole presbyterian body in Scotland.‡ For although the right of convening ecclesiastical courts without the concurrence of the civil power had never been conceded to the Presbyterian Church, still it had been the practice in former days when one meeting was dissolved to name the time and place for the one that was to follow; but now the continuity of the series of assemblies was destroyed, the chain designed to secure their regular succession was broken, and no man knew when another meeting might be summoned by royal authority. The ecclesiastical court, so much prized by the presbyterians, was thus threatened with extinction.§ It seems to have been the determination for some time of the zealous adherents of the Kirk, to hold a meeting of the General Assembly at the time which the moderator had ventured to announce; while, on the other hand, it was the purpose of his majesty, neither to summon a meeting himself, nor to sanction the one which they proposed to hold; and thus there was every appearance of a conflict between the Church and the State, the consequences of which might have greatly and permanently

Dissatisfaction of the adher-ents of the Kirk.

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 305.

† Burton, vol. i. p. 228.

‡ Burnet's Own Times, vol. iv. p. 127.

* Brown's Compendious History, vol. ii. p. 388.

† Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 306; Willison's Impartial Testimony, p. 303.

‡ Hetherington, p. 184.

§ Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 329.

altered the position of affairs in Scotland. The dreaded collision, however, was prevented. A parliament was held in the year 1693, and secretary Johnston, son of the celebrated Warriston, who was entrusted with the chief management of affairs by William, exerted all his influence to prevail upon the ministers to forego their purpose of holding an assembly on the day named by their moderator. The position which he occupied in parliament, coupled with the respect paid by the presbyterians to the family to which he belonged, gave weight to his advice; * and the plan which he proposed of procuring from the Estates a petition to his majesty, to summon a meeting of assembly for the settlement of the question which the last assembly had left unfinished, both saved the honour of the crown, and afforded sufficient apology to the ministers for delay.†

At this parliament two measures were adopted,

Oath of assurance appointed by parliament.	which had an intimate bearing upon the state of the Church, and were attended with important consequences both immediate and remote.
--	--

mote. An oath of allegiance had already been enacted, which many were in the habit of swearing in an evasive manner, and, therefore, an oath of assurance was conjoined with it, the object of which was to exclude from office all who did not acknowledge the lawfulness of William and Mary's authority.‡ The Jacobites still cherished strong hopes of a restoration of the exiled family, and for them they reserved their allegiance. It was only an outward submission which they rendered to the government of the Revolution; its legality they denied, and they were watching for an opportunity to subvert it.§ But the oath of assurance was so constructed as to embody the acknowledgment, both technically expressed in Latin and translated into English, that William and Mary were sovereigns "as well de jure, that is, of right king and queen, as de facto, that is, in the possession and exercise of the government;" and thus it could not be taken without perjury by those who were still disposed to plot for the restoration of James. || It was also ordained that the oaths of allegiance and assurance should be sworn, not only by all lords and their eldest sons, by magistrates and burgesses, by collectors of taxes, keepers of prisons, and masters of ships, but also by all ministers and preachers, under pain of being degraded from office and forfeiting their emoluments. This enactment was most offensive to the episcopalians, who still ardently longed for the restoration of James; and it was nearly as much disliked by the presbyterians, but on very different grounds. Although they were warm supporters of the present government, yet many of them considered it an Erastian encroachment upon their liberty to make the tenure of ministerial office, and the right of sitting in church courts, dependent upon the taking of an oath prescribed by parliament; and others of them complained not only that the oath involved the settlement of many difficult political questions, about which jurists were still divided,—such as the right of a people to depose their king,—but also that it was obscure, as it did not define whether the right of sovereignty claimed for William was the right of inheritance, or of election, or of conquest. Thus all parties considered the new oath as a heavy grievance, and instead of answering its ostensible purpose of strengthening the government, it seemed more calculated to strengthen the discontent of the nation, and to stir up strife and sedition.*

The other act, to which reference has been made, was described as one "for settling the quiet and peace of the Church;" and the immediate object of it was Act for the peace and quiet of the Church.

to promote the success of the scheme, which the king had so much at heart, of including the episcopalian clergy within the pale of the Established Church, and investing them with all the rights and privileges which government could confer.† The act ordained that no person should be admitted as a member of the Church till he should first take the oaths of allegiance and assurance, subscribe the Confession of Faith, and conform to the worship and discipline established by law; and then it embodied an humble address to his majesty requesting him to call an assembly for the general business of the Church, and also for admitting to a share in its government all ministers having churches who were disposed to conform. It was possible, however, that the assembly when actually convened might pursue the same course which they had done in 1692, and thus defeat the views of parliament and of his majesty. This contingency, though not by any means prominently brought into view, is still effectually provided for; and it is declared that "if any of the said ministers who have not been hitherto received into the government of the Church shall offer to qualify themselves, and to apply in manner aforesaid, they shall have their majesties full protection, aye, and until they shall be admitted in manner foresaid."‡ The assembly might refuse to admit the curates on the terms pointed out by parliament, but in this case they could not deprive them of their churches, and benefices, and mansees. They were to be protected in the possession of these by the arm of government, and they were to be viewed as in all respects legally entitled to discharge the duties of the ministerial office in their several parishes. Thus a constraining influence of a very powerful kind was brought to bear upon the assembly. Parliament did not command them to admit the episcopalians—this would have been too outrageous a violation of all the most cherished principles of spiritual independence; but parliament threw

* Carstairs' State Papers, p. 160.

† Burton, vol. i. p. 231.

‡ Brown's Compensatory History, vol. ii. p. 389.

§ Carstairs' State Papers, p. 171.

|| Burnet's Own Times, vol. iv. p. 175; Carstairs' State Papers, p. 178.

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 332.

† Brown's Compensatory History, vol. ii. p. 389.

‡ Carstairs' State Papers, p. 201.

its shield over the curates in such a manner that the effect of the assembly's refusal to admit them would have been the curtailment of the boundaries of the Established Church, certainly for the whole of that generation, perhaps permanently; for the same parliament which maintained the existing generation of episcopalian ministers in their parishes might have authorised them to appoint their successors,—and the probability is that they would have done so, as episcopacy was not scattered over the country, but had its stronghold in one definite region—the country north of the Tay. In consequence of these measures, the presbyterians felt themselves under the necessity of opening the doors of their Church to the episcopalians; and, although at first the hope of a counter revolution prevented many of that body from applying, still from time to time they did present themselves for admission; and thus an element was introduced into the Church which proved the source of discord in subsequent times. There is reason to believe that the moderatism, which for so many years obtained the supremacy in the General Assembly, and which not only strove to crush all popular rights, but also infused a leaven of unsound doctrine, owed its parentage to the episcopal curates incorporated with the establishment after the Revolution.

In compliance with the request of parliament, William appointed that a meeting of the General Assembly should be held in 1693. His absence upon the Continent, however, and the important affairs which at the time engaged his whole attention, led him to adjourn the meeting, as he wished nothing to be done unless he himself could superintend its progress, and mould it into a shape suitable to his views. No assembly, therefore, was held till March, 1694. Meanwhile, the time for taking the oaths of allegiance and assurance, which had been postponed to the 10th of July, 1693, passed away; and the ministers, the more they reflected upon the substance of these oaths, conceived the greater aversion for them, and became the more reluctant to follow the course prescribed by law. When the period, therefore, approached for the meeting of the General Assembly, they made application to the privy council requesting them to dispense with administering the oaths, more particularly as they had not been enforced upon the episcopalians, whose loyalty to the reigning sovereign could not bear comparison with theirs; but the council, disregarding this most reasonable application, and overlooking the serious difficulties which they were needlessly throwing in the way of the king's administration, determined that no individual should be allowed to sit in the assembly without first taking the oaths. On the other hand, the ministers, provoked by the ill-timed obstinacy of the council, became equally resolute, and they also determined that, as they could neither see it to be consistent with their principles to take the oaths, nor safe for the interests of the Church to delay holding an assembly any longer, they would set the decision of the council at defiance, and meet at all hazards.* Thus a collision between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities seemed inevitable; and there is reason to believe that there were some men connected with the council who rather wished such a conflict, that they might profit by the confusion to which it must necessarily lead.† At least, it is strange that oaths whose sole use was to strengthen the existing government, should be dispensed with in the case of persons whose attachment to the exiled king was notorious, and yet enforced in the case of others who were the ardent friends of the new sovereign, and whose interests and privileges were all dependent upon the continuance of his sway. The idea that the presbyterians would strive to undermine the government of William, and combine to bring back James, which was the only alternative, was so monstrous that no sane mind could for a moment entertain it; and, therefore, if the oaths might be dispensed with in the case of any, if the episcopalians were actually exempted from the necessity of taking them, with far more safety might the same privilege have been conceded to their opponents. The conduct of the council manifested the same want of wisdom and consideration, as if they had instructed the officers of justice to leave highwaymen and robbers to themselves, but to watch with careful eye the proceedings of the honest part of the people.

When Lord Carmichael, the king's commissioner, arrived in Edinburgh with the view of attending the General Assembly, he at once perceived the critical posture of affairs, and, dreading the dangers which might ensue from a conflict between the civil and ecclesiastical courts, he dispatched a messenger to London to communicate his apprehensions to the king, and to obtain additional instructions adapted to the new and more threatening aspect of affairs.‡ At the same time, too, the ministers sent intelligence of their perplexities and difficulties to Carstairs, and besought him to strain to the very uttermost the great influence which he was known to possess with the king, that the evils might be warded off, which could not fail to spring from the enforcement of the council's demands. Unfortunately it happened that when the commissioner's express reached the king, craving immediate instructions, Carstairs was absent from court; and his majesty, having consulted with Lord Stair and Lord Tarbet, was advised by them not to abate in the slightest degree the rigour of the demands which the council in Scotland had made. Accordingly instructions to this effect were prepared for the commissioner, and duly signed by his majesty, and actually put into the hands of the messenger, that he might carry them back with all speed to Scotland. Meanwhile, Carstairs returned,

* Burton, vol. i. p. 233. † Hetherington, p. 186.

‡ Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 332

and having ascertained the nature of the instructions which had been prepared for the guidance of Lord Carmichael, he took the bold resolution of intercepting the messenger, and demanding from him, in the king's name, the packet with which he was entrusted.* Every moment was precious; and, although it was now a late hour, he hurried to the king's apartment, and, having obtained admission on the plea that he came on a matter of vital importance, which brooked no delay, he threw himself on his knees before his majesty, who was in bed, and awoke him. "I come," he answered in reply to a demand for explanation, "I come to beg my life."—"And is it possible that you can be guilty of a crime which deserves death?" The intercepted packet was produced as the answer, at sight of which William manifested great displeasure, and exclaimed, "Have you indeed presumed to countermand my orders?" Carstairs craved permission to say a few words in explanation of what he had done; and entering upon an exposition of the state of affairs in Scotland, and of the views and feelings by which the different parties were actuated, he convinced the king that, as the presbyterians were the only body in the country who were heartily attached to his person and government, true policy dictated that some concession should be made to them in the present emergency. There could be no wisdom in demanding, what it was obvious they were not prepared to yield, and what was not at all requisite in order to secure their allegiance. The certain consequence of enforcing the measures proposed would be to alienate their affections, and not one single counterbalancing advantage would be gained. They might be too scrupulous about the oaths; and, without any good grounds, they might be regarding them as inconsistent with their principles; but their scruples rested on no disaffection to his majesty's government; and as the sole use of the oaths was to protect and fortify his authority, it was obvious that the end in this particular case would be far more effectually attained by dispensing with them. Concession at the present moment would be hailed by the whole presbyterian body in Scotland as the greatest possible favour, and would indissolubly knit to his majesty their hearts, already loyal and true; whereas the enforcement of the oaths would certainly lead, without the slightest necessity, to a conflict between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, which might be attended with very grave results.†

The representations of Carstairs, of whose devotion to his interests the king was Succession to his interests the king was fully persuaded, and of whose wisdom and integrity he had witnessed many decisive proofs in trying circumstances, convinced his majesty that the course suggested by Stair and Tarbet was by no means the wisest in the present emergency. Returning the packet of instructions, therefore, to his midnight visitor, he told him to cast it into the fire, and then authorised the presbyterian minister to draw up new instructions—such as might appear to him suitable to the present posture of affairs, to which he would affix the royal signature, and which should be immediately transmitted to the commissioner in Edinburgh. The new instructions, which were prepared in these singular circumstances, were to the effect that it was his majesty's pleasure to allow the General Assembly to meet, without insisting that the members should take the oaths prescribed by law. The delay occasioned by the steps requisite to secure this change of counsels, prevented the messenger from reaching Edinburgh so soon as the royal commissioner expected. He did not arrive till the very morning of the day when the assembly was to meet. Meanwhile, intense anxiety was experienced by the friends of the Presbyterian Church, and by all to whom the peace and well-being of the community were dear. It was known that the ministers were determined neither to take the oaths, nor yet to desist from holding an assembly; and it was equally known that the commissioner considered himself bound to prohibit any meeting unless the oaths were taken. These conflicting elements, which might have been productive of most disastrous consequences, were happily prevented from coming into actual collision by the arrival, at the very last moment, of the messenger from London with the new instructions. The dreaded storm passed away, and the sky became once more serene and peaceful.

The graceful manner in which the king receded from the rigid demands which had excited so much dissatisfaction among the ministers and their friends, exerted a most favourable Beneficial influence of the king's concession.

influence upon the members of the General Assembly, and when they met the disposition was manifested on all hands to make every sacrifice with the view of gratifying his majesty. They proceeded without delay to the consideration of the question which had originated all the strife, and they consented to admit to the enjoyment of all the privileges of the national Church those of the episcopalian clergy who would subscribe the Confession of Faith, acknowledge the presbyterian government of the Church in Scotland, and engage to submit to it.* This was the very measure which William had been so desirous of seeing adopted as a scheme of comprehension that would greatly extend the basis of the Established Church, but which the General Assembly two years before had considered it to be their duty to reject, as inconsistent with the principles of presbyterianism. The pressure of circumstances now constrained the ministers to recede from their former hostile attitude. The king's views and wishes were well known: parliament had given a very clear and explicit expression of opinion upon the subject; and, indeed, the main ground on which the legislature had,

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. pp. 333, 334; Burton, vol. i. p. 244.

† Carstairs' Life, pp. 53, 59.

* Brown's Compendious History, vol. ii. p. 391.

with united voice, requested the king to summon a General Assembly, was that this question might be discussed anew, and that an opportunity might be afforded to the Church for coming to a different decision. And the cause which above all others operated to smooth down every difficulty, was the sudden change of feeling which the king's well-timed concession with regard to the oaths had produced.* The measure, however, did not lead to such a rapid amalgamation of the episcopalian clergy with the establishment as William had anticipated. They were restrained from seeking admission amongst the presbyterians, now the leading party in the country, by the hope which they cherished of seeing the exiled James restored to the throne, and their own church exalted to its former ascendancy. This was particularly the case in the north, where they were the decided majority, and where the singular spectacle was exhibited of parish churches occupied by individuals who disowned the established religion, and of established ministers preaching not in parish churches, but wherever they could find accommodation.† From time to time, however, some of the prelatis complied with the prescribed conditions, and were admitted as members of the church courts; and Sir James Ogilvie mentions, in a letter to Carstairs, dated October, 1695, that one hundred and sixteen had qualified themselves during the years 1694 and 1695.‡ The admission of these men might be necessary as the means of warding off what might perhaps have proved a greater evil; but, with the views which they cherished, it was not possible that they could exert any other than a disastrous influence upon the fortunes of the Presbyterian Church.

The act of assembly sanctioning the admission of those episcopalian ministers who might be willing to conform, gave extreme dissatisfaction to multitudes throughout the country, particularly to the covenanters, who scrupled not to charge the Church with a total dereliction of principle. The assembly, therefore, instructed its commissioner to use means for bringing those who so aspersed their proceedings to a different state of mind; but it does not appear that much success attended their efforts. The Society people continued to maintain their hostile attitude with unabated zeal. Other measures were adopted by the assembly for strengthening the ramparts of the Church in those districts where they were known to be weakest. It was agreed, with the view of supplying the deficiency of religious ordinances in the north, that the southern synods should appoint a few of their number to proceed for short periods to those quarters, and the ministers who undertook such missions were to follow one another in successive companies, preaching the Gospel, and performing all ministerial duties for periods of three months at a time. This expedient was found productive of so many advantages that it was adopted during a number of years, and was only discontinued when the augmented supply of ministers rendered it no longer necessary.* Throughout the whole Church, however, the number of individuals qualified to take the charge of congregations was still small in comparison with the extent of the field; and hence it often happened that vacant parishes attempted to secure the services of faithful ministers settled in neighbouring parishes. In particular, not a little competition took place for the services of those who had been expelled from their churches at the commencement of the prelatical persecutions in Charles's time, and who had maintained their fidelity during long years of persecution. It was, therefore, considered requisite at this time to pass an act, which, although it did not forbid the practice of translation, yet attempted so to regulate it that it might not create dissensions, but promote more effectually the general good of the Church. Not a few of the episcopal clergy, who had been ejected by the privy council in 1689, had afterwards returned and resumed possession of their churches, and manse, and revenues; and, being supported by the nobility and gentry in the north, they set the law at defiance, and expelled the presbyterian ministers appointed to succeed them. To remedy this great evil, an act was passed "anent intrusion upon kirks," and parliament concurred with the assembly in giving effect to its provisions.†

Measures employed by the Church for strengthening her position.

The Presbyterian Church had now reached a position of comparative security. She was strong in the good-will of the bulk of the people, as well as in the enjoyment of the royal favour. Her assemblies, which had hitherto been so frequently interrupted and dissolved, and adjourned without any regard to her own views and feelings, were permitted from this time to meet with greater regularity, and no attempt was made to exert the same direct and open influence over them as formerly. Thus the opportunity was afforded to her of turning her attention, without distraction, to the spiritual well-being of the country: and the measures already adverted to for the christianisation of the Highlands and the northern parts of the kingdom were prosecuted with augmented zeal. Forty-four ministers were appointed in 1695 to proceed on a missionary tour beyond the Grampians, and it was ordained that one half of them, if congregations desired their services, might, on account of the existing scarcity of ministers, be removed from their present charges, and settled permanently in the north. At the same time parliament took into consideration the great deficiency of religious ordinances beyond the Forth, and enacted that "the first end of the stipends of vacant parishes in those quarters" should be set apart for the support of preachers, and missionaries

* Burton, vol. i. 235.
† Acts of Assembly, 1694, p. 11; Memoirs of the Church of Scotland, p. 321.

‡ Carstairs' State Papers, p. 263.

* Brown's Compendious History, vol. ii. p. 393.
† Hetherington, p. 187.

appointed, whether by presbyteries in the north, or by presbyteries and synods in any part of the kingdom, to supply the vacant churches of the north.*

Another measure adopted by parliament in 1695 tended considerably to modify the hostility cherished against the Established Church by the episcopalian clergy. There were still several hundreds adherents of the prelatical Church who had neither conformed to the new establishment, nor taken the oaths of allegiance and assurance prescribed by government in 1693.† They might now have been deprived of their benefices, but another opportunity was afforded to them of taking the presented oaths; and it was provided that, if they did so, they should be allowed to retain their official position and emoluments, whether they conformed to the Established Church or not. If they chose to conform, and if the church courts were pleased to admit them, then they would become constituent parts of the new establishment, and all distinction between them and others would vanish; but if they could not overcome their scruples against conforming, they were to be allowed nevertheless, on taking the oaths to government and maintaining a suitable Christian deportment, to retain possession of their kirks and benefices, and were assured of his majesty's protection:‡ only in this case they were to be debarred from exercising any of the functions of a corporate body. They were neither to license nor ordain ministers, nor to meet in assemblies, synods, or presbyteries, but were merely to discharge the duties of the pastorate within their respective parishes.§

The effect of this measure was to introduce division among the episcopalian clergy. Some of them had already conformed, and more did so now, and were thus amalgamated with the presbyterians.|| Others, availing themselves of the permission granted by parliament, continued in separation from the Established Church, but took the oaths of submission to government, and thus, in return for his majesty's promised protection, bound themselves not to disturb the existing order of things either in Church or State. But there were others who would neither apply for admission to the Presbyterian Church, nor swear allegiance to the sovereign, and who thus exposed themselves to the charge of treason. These men were influenced by political rather than religious considerations; they were zealous adherents of the exiled royal family; and they were living in hope of a time when they should be able to displace the presbyterians, and regain all their honours and power under their ancient sovereign. Their conduct exposed them to the denunciations of the privy council, but in the majority of cases they were permitted, unless guilty of some very flagrant misconduct, to maintain their position. They were clustered together in the northern parts of the kingdom, and, being supported by the public feeling of their neighbourhood and the countenance of powerful individuals, they defied every effort of the council to remove them. Their adherents did not scruple to take up arms in their defence; and when any of them died, years often elapsed before it was found practicable to effect the settlement of a presbyterian successor. So late as the year 1710 there were still one hundred and thirteen of the episcopalian clergy enjoying benefices north of the Tay. Gradually, however, their number declined, and slowly, but surely, the new establishment spread itself over the length and breadth of the land.*

During the remainder of William's reign, the Presbyterian Church was not exposed to any serious dangers or encroachments. The chief business which engaged the attention of successive assemblies was the means of strengthening the religious institutions of the country, and rendering them more efficacious for the great ends which they contemplated. The attention of ministers was drawn to the necessity of catechising their people, and preaching so as to make their instructions level to the capacities of all; and they were admonished to resist to the utmost of their ability the spread of deistical views and of every other opinion inconsistent with the principles of the Gospel, as exhibited in the Confession of Faith. The revolutionary excitement through which the country had passed had shaken the convictions of many minds. The long period, too, of discord and wretchedness which had preceded the Revolution seems to have operated unfavourably upon the national intellect, for there were now no men in the ministerial office possessed of such commanding talents and varied learning as Knox and Melville had displayed in former times; and thus the Church was deficient in the means of exerting a salutary and restraining influence upon minds that were disposed to break loose from old ideas. Many students were becoming infected with crude, undigested notions. An example is furnished in the case of Thomas Aikenhead, who said that the doctrine of an incarnate God was as great a contradiction as the idea of a goat-stag, or a round square. For such heretical opinions, very offensively and publicly expressed, he might with the utmost propriety have been brought to account by the presbytery to which he belonged; but the high court of justiciary, not yet prepared to act upon the principles of toleration, summoned him to its bar on a charge of blasphemy, for which he was condemned and executed.† This was a foul blot upon the civil administration of Scotland; and although the Church took no part in the proceedings, yet something of the disgrace attaches to her,

* Acts of Parliament, 1695, chapters xv. and xxvii. p. 490.

† Carstairs' State Papers, p. 255.

‡ Burnet's Own Times, vol. iv. p. 229; Acts of Parliament, 1695, ch. xxvii.

§ Burton, vol. i. p. 244; Acts of Parliament, 1695, ch. xxvii.

|| Burnet's History of His Own Times, vol. iv. p. 229.

* Burton's History, vol. i. p. 248.

† State Trials, vol. xiii. p. 917; see Appendix M.

for many of her ministers approved of the sentence, and none of them made any effort to stay its execution. A more efficient and Christian method of checking the growth of loose and erroneous views, was that adopted by the assembly when they admonished presbyteries to proceed with the utmost caution in ordaining ministers, and granting licence to students to preach the Gospel. Thorough inquiry was to be made in regard to the abilities, the piety, and the general good conduct of all who applied for office. It was considered indispensable that they should be acquainted with the original languages of Scripture, and desirable that they should know something of Syriac and Chaldee; and they were to be subjected to a searching examination on the leading controversies regarding doctrine, worship, discipline, and government.* Preachers, too, not settled in churches were to be under the care of presbyteries; and ministers were to exercise great caution with regard to the recommendations they gave to individuals applying for office. The elders and deacons of the Church also engaged the attention of the assembly. If they neglected to worship God daily in their families, they were to be seriously admonished; and if they persisted in the neglect, they were to be excluded from office. The act relating to this subject was to be read from all the pulpits of the Church on the first Sabbath of May every year. Another act of assembly was passed against swearing, Sabbath-breaking, profanity, drunkenness, and other abominable vices, which was to be read from every pulpit at the half-yearly terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas. Presbyteries, too, were admonished to proceed with extreme caution in either censuring the episcopalian clergy, who continued in a state of separation, or in admitting them to the privileges of the Established Church. The assembly was manifestly afraid, alike of their hostility, and of their friendship. She could neither venture to provoke them by pressing her claims to all the extent which the law warranted, nor was she greatly desirous of receiving them into close union. Hence so many clergymen retained possession of benefices legally belonging to the establishment, who had neither conformed to the Church, nor taken the oath of allegiance to government.

It was with very different feelings that the General Assembly contemplated the continued separation of the Covenanters, or Society people, from the Established Church. With the view of smoothing down their hostility, and securing their accession to the great body of their presbyterian brethren, the commission of the assembly, in 1698, published a document designated "a Seasonable Admonition," in which they affirmed the doctrine of Christ's sole headship over the Church; and, referring to the language employed by parliament, with his majesty's sanction, at the time of the ecclesiastical change in Scotland, which had given extreame offence to all the more zealous presbyterians, they expressed the conviction that they had a better foundation for their church polity than the inclinations of the people or the laws of men.* Here there was no inconsistency. A regard to the inclinations and views of the people, considered as a whole, might be the very best reason which government could have for resolving to establish a particular scheme of church polity; and yet these inclinations and views might, in the estimation of those who constituted the Established Church, be grounded upon the solid basis of God's Word. The adherents of presbytery believed its divine right, and therefore claimed its establishment; but the government established it simply because it was agreeable to the nation. The sovereign of the British Isles could not have subscribed to the dogma of the exclusive scriptural authority of presbytery without placing himself in direct collision with the church of the more numerous or powerful portion of his subjects. The "seasonable admonition," however, of the assembly's commission was not felt to be either seasonable or satisfactory by those to whom it was addressed, and was attended with very little effect. The Cameronians were proof against its logic. They persisted in maintaining that the divine right of presbytery should have been acknowledged by the king as the sole ground of the legal support given to it; and, therefore, instead of following the advice of the commission, they flourished their pens in reply to them, which many of them could handle with as masterly skill as they did their swords.†

The same year which witnessed the publication of the "Seasonable Admonition," Act of parliament against commonly known under the designation of the "Rabbling Act," which, as it was afterwards frequently appealed to in proof of the necessity of restoring patronage, it may be proper here to describe. Reference has already been made to the difficulties experienced by the Church in settling presbyterian ministers in the northern parts of the kingdom, when the episcopalian incumbents were either removed by death, or when, having refused the government oaths, they rendered themselves liable to deprivation. Armed resistance was frequently offered to the church courts, and to ministers and preachers acting under their authority. Riotous mobs were collected together by the episcopal clergy and their friends, composed in many cases not so much of the people of the parish, as of idle vagrants gathered from the surrounding country. Churches were found locked when presbyterian ministers made their appearance, and the keys which parliament had authorised presbyteries to claim were concealed, so that they could not be found when needed. And thus the church courts were excluded from many churches which legally belonged to them; the individuals whom they sent to preach could not obtain a hearing, and settle-

* Willison's Testimony, vol. iv. p. 304; Brown's Compendious History, vol. ii. pp. 395, 396.

* Brown's Compendious History, vol. ii. p. 397.

† Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 410.

ments which it was their purpose to effect were obstructed. Now the object of the act of parliament already referred to was to check these illegal and violent proceedings, and to secure the Presbyterian Church in the peaceable enjoyment of those rights which had already been conceded to her by the states of the realm. The act denounces punishment against all who offer factious opposition to presbyteries in any of the ways specified; and where churches have been locked up, it enjoins the nearest magistrate, or any justice of the peace, when applied to by a presbytery, to force open the doors, to put new locks upon them, and to deliver up the keys to the recognised ecclesiastical authorities.* Such an act was not rendered necessary by any thing which had occurred in those parts of the country where the presbyterian system was in full operation. It was neither designed nor needed as a protection of the church courts against the proceedings of congregations which owned their sway: it was meant to protect them from the illegal opposition of the episcopalians, who retained the national pulpits after parliament had ratified the presbyterian scheme of ecclesiastical government. Yet some years afterwards, when new views and principles rose into the ascendancy, this act was appealed to, as furnishing decisive evidence that patronage was indispensable as a means of preventing the confusions, heats, and contentions which every approach to popular election was said inevitably to produce. As well might the measures requisite for defending a country against a foreign enemy, be adduced to prove that the inhabitants themselves were of a rebellious disposition, and needed some peculiar restraints.

Another case of heretical departure from the standards of the Church occurred about this time, which was dealt with in a much more satisfactory manner than had been followed in the case of Aikenhead. The views of Antonia Bourignon, a French lady—who denied God's foreknowledge of future events, ascribed two human natures to Christ, conceived that our Lord had a will in rebellion against God's will, maintained that all men had a good and an evil spirit in them before their birth, argued that man had something of infinity in him by which he was rendered susceptible of union to God, and taught that natural generation would continue to take place in heaven as a means of augmenting the inhabitants—had been espoused by Dr. George Garden, one of the ministers of Aberdeen, who published a book in defence of them. Garden was brought to trial before the church courts on a charge of heresy, and when the case came under the consideration of the General Assembly, they condemned his opinions as altogether inconsistent with the doctrines of the Gospel. Wedded to his own views, however, he defended the book which he had published, and maintained that none of its positions were opposed to the Christian religion.* Nay, he even declared that he considered it an "honour to be singled out for owning the principles of Mademoiselle Bourignon, which had such a tendency to promote love and charity." As he thus persisted in defending opinions subversive of the fundamental principles of the Church, no alternative was left to the assembly but to depose him.† And it is satisfactory to know that exclusion from the privileges of the Church was the only punishment inflicted upon him—a conclusive proof that, however violently some parties might continue to declaim against toleration, sound views of religious liberty were making progress in the country. The circumstance, too, that without any civil pains and penalties the reveries defended by Garden soon died away after his deposition, must have strengthened the convictions of those who repudiated force as a means of suppressing error. The likelihood is that, if the champion of the visionary French lady had been imprisoned or executed, the sympathies excited in favour of his person might have been extended to his views. It is as impolitic as it is unjust, to persecute men for mere opinions.

When the assembly met, on the 6th of March, his majesty was suffering under illness, occasioned by a fall from his horse, which within two days was to terminate his career. The Earl of Marchmont was royal commissioner. This nobleman had faithfully adhered to the presbyterian cause during the dark days of persecution, and had narrowly escaped with his life. On one occasion he had been obliged to conceal himself in a box sunk under the floor of his bedroom, of size sufficient to receive his person along with bed-clothes, and pierced with holes for the admission of air. This hiding-place he was compelled to exchange for a burial vault at Polwarth Church, where he lay concealed for a month supplied with food by his daughter, who carried it to the burying-ground at midnight. And at length he had been obliged, in order to save himself from destruction, to leave his native land.‡ By these sufferings he had been greatly endeared to the whole presbyterian body, and it gave the assembly the highest gratification when he was appointed commissioner by the king. Their feelings of satisfaction they expressed in the answer which they returned to the royal letter read to them at the commencement of their proceedings. This letter contained renewed assurances of his majesty's determination to uphold the Presbyterian Church in Scotland, and recommended that all their proceedings should be conducted with calmness and harmony. The assembly's answer expressed the warmest gratitude for the benefits conferred by his majesty upon the Church, and promised a dutiful and cordial submission to his authority as the rightful sovereign of the country. But, during the transaction of these preliminary matters, intelligence of the king's extreme danger reached the Meeting of assembly at the time of the king's death.

* Acts of Scottish Parliament, vol. x. p. 148; Hetherington, p. 188.

* Wodrow's Correspondence, vol. i. p. 169.

† Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 410.

‡ Lady Murray's Memoirs, pp. 35—43; supra, p. 724.

commissioner. He at once communicated the melancholy tidings to the assembly, and admonished them to transact with all possible speed the most urgent and necessary business that claimed their attention, as it was not unlikely that their meeting might soon be brought to an abrupt termination. He also advised them, in consideration of the dangers to which any change in the political circumstances of the country might expose the cause so dear to their hearts, to appoint a commission for the special purpose of watching over the interests of the Church. The advice was a sound one. It was well known that the episcopalians were expecting a great revolution in their favour, when the crown should be placed upon another head, and there was reason to dread that the education, and prejudices, and bigotry of Anne might lead her to sacrifice the peace of the country to the gratification of those who agreed with her in religious sentiments. The assembly accordingly appointed a commission for the purpose indicated by the Earl of Marchmont. They nominated, in the first place, all the aged ministers who still survived from the period of the abolition of presbytery at the Restoration, and who had manifested their faithfulness and integrity by enduring all sorts of persecution for many long years. These were men in whose experience, and fidelity, and judgment, the utmost confidence could be placed. Along with them a number of others of acknowledged ability and trustworthy character were named from the several presbyteries; and the assembly broke up, after having thus stationed watchful sentinels to give warning of the approach of danger, and appointed counsellors to devise measures of defence.*

Although many fears were entertained with regard to the security of the Presbyterian Church, on account of the religious views and narrow bigotry of Anne, yet her first letter to parliament after her accession contained an express declaration that it was her purpose to act upon the principles of the late king, and in particular to maintain the Church as at present constituted in all its rights and privileges. This was very satisfactory to parliament, and they likewise passed an act in support of the existing government of the Church. Her majesty's letter contained also a recommendation to the Estates to consider the question, which had been the object of so much interest to William, of a union between the two kingdoms.† The royal commissioner, Queensberry, spoke warmly of the advantages which could not fail to accrue from a closer connection between England and Scotland, and parliament received the proposals most favourably. Accordingly, an act was passed expressing the conviction of the Estates, that a union between the two kingdoms would be advantageous to the interests of the Protestant religion, and conducive to the prosperity, peace, and happiness of both countries; and her majesty was empowered to appoint commissioners to treat with commissioners in England with regard to this important question. Still there were not a few who apprehended that the queen's strong prepossessions in favour of episcopacy, and the superior power and wealth of England, might, if the kingdoms were united under one parliament, prove highly dangerous to the Presbyterian Church in Scotland. It was, therefore, desired by some that a clause should be inserted in the act, prohibiting those commissioners who might be appointed by her majesty, from allowing the question of the restoration of prelacy in any shape or form to enter into their deliberations at all. But the house, although quite sincere in their desire to maintain the presbyterian cause, were more deeply concerned at present about sharing the commercial advantages enjoyed by England, and obtaining redress for the injuries sustained in connection with the Darien Company; and, therefore, instead of embodying any such restriction in the act, they conceived it sufficient to transmit to her majesty, along with the act, a letter explanatory of their views. This letter expressed the conviction that the Presbyterian Church, as now constituted, was indispensable to the peace and prosperity of Scotland. It reminded her majesty that the form of government existing in this Church was founded upon the Claim of Right, and could not now be disturbed without a violation of justice. It also drew attention to the fact that, when commissioners were formerly named in the days of William to consider the question of union,* it had been expressly stipulated that the Scottish Church should not be affected in any shape by any measure which might be adopted. The confident expectation was, therefore, expressed that, during the whole course of the proceedings now to be entered upon, nothing would be done inconsistent with these fundamental principles, and with the act in favour of the Established Church, which her majesty had been graciously pleased to ratify this very session.†

The discussions carried on regarding the union during the year 1702 terminated without leading to any practical results. Not a few of the most influential presbyterians rejoiced at the failure of the scheme, because they were afraid that the interests of their Church might be compromised by its success. Probably their efforts were employed to defeat the measure, for they lost favour with her majesty, and their friends were no longer allowed to retain the chief place in the administration of affairs. When the next assembly met, not the Earl of Marchmont, but Lord Seafield appeared as royal commissioner; and, although he brought assurances of the queen's unchanged determination to protect the Presbyterian Church, yet the description which her letter gave of the Scottish establishment, "as that which Apprehension of danger to the Presbyterian Church from a union.

Meeting of assembly—

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. pp. 413, 419.

† Lockhart's Memoirs, p. 49.

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 421.

† Burton, vol. i. p. 341.

she found most acceptable to the inclinations of the people and the laws of the kingdom," occasioned much uneasiness. The phraseology was conceived as designedly selected with the view of insinuating that the position of ecclesiastical affairs in Scotland was not at all agreeable to her mind, but was only tolerated as an evil of which she would gladly rid herself, if there were any prospect of doing so with safety. The assembly, therefore, while thanking her majesty for her gracious promise to protect their religious institutions, took occasion, with allusion to the words of her letter, to describe the Presbyterian Church of Scotland as an establishment "agreeable to the Word of God." Nay, there was a disposition manifested by many in the assembly to go a step farther, and to copy the example of some synods, which, dissatisfied with the restrictions imposed upon the Church, had claimed for her the power to regulate her own times of meeting, as invested with authority from Christ, her only head; but her majesty's commissioner was determined to put an end to such troublesome discussions, and, therefore, he abruptly —abruptly rose and dissolved the meeting by dissolved. virtue of the queen's authority.

Protestations against this dissolution were poured in from all parts of the house, but Mr. Meldrum, the moderator, either thrown into confusion by the sudden announcement, or afraid to expose himself to the resentment of the queen, paid no regard to them, but hastily closed the meeting with prayer. A similar scene had been exhibited at the close of one of the early assemblies in William's reign, though in that case the moderator had ventured to name a day for the next meeting. Nothing of the kind has occurred since. By means of a compromise the two authorities are prevented from coming into collision. The time of dissolution is fixed by usage to a particular day; and on that day the moderator dissolves the meeting in the name of Christ, and the commissioner dissolves it in the name of the sovereign. The business may not indeed be finished when the time for closing arrives; but an effort is made to have the most material part of it concluded, and whatever remains unfinished is handed over to a commission.*

The views and inclinations of the queen, somewhat obscurely indicated in the letter which she had sent to the assembly, were more fully exhibited in a communication to the privy council, in which she declared it to be her pleasure that protection should be extended to those who were living in separation from the Established Church.† It was well enough understood that it was not the covenanters, nor any other separatists, to whom her majesty referred, but the episcopalians. Now, as a compromise had already been made with the episcopal incumbents, and protection had been granted to them on one or other of two conditions, it was at once concluded that the words of the queen were designed to suggest some additional privilege which she was desirous of granting them. On the one hand, therefore, much alarm was excited among the presbyterians, who dreaded that their old persecutors were about to be restored to power; and on the other, the hopes of the episcopalians were so much elevated, that they began to anticipate the recovery of their former sway, and actually seized some of the vacant pulpits already in the hands of the Established Church. In pursuance of the same views, a motion was made in parliament, by the Earl of Strathmore, for a free toleration of all Protestants; but this motion was vehemently opposed by the great body of the friends of the establishment.* Opposition to such a proposal assumes, in our view, the aspect of outrageous bigotry, and doubtless the ideas of religious liberty then prevalent were exceedingly defective. It was a common notion that to tolerate the existence of erroneous doctrines involved a participation of their guilt. Still it must be remembered that the question of toleration, as it shaped itself in the view of our ancestors, was altogether different from what it is now. It was not what we call toleration that the episcopalians wanted. They had no idea of being satisfied with the permission to build churches for themselves, and to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. Their seizure of the vacant churches belonging to the establishment, on the slight encouragement of the kindly words contained in the queen's letter, shows that they aimed at supplanting the presbyterians, and regaining their old predominance, which had been the source of such woes to the country. Toleration was a mere outwork, which they did not value for itself, but which they sought to gain as the means of enabling them to take possession of the citadel; and this was the true ground of the opposition which was given to Strathmore's motion. This is obvious from the representation presented to parliament by the commission of the General Assembly, which contains these remarkable words:—"that to enact a toleration for these of that way, considering the present case and circumstances of the Church and nation, would be to establish iniquity by a law." The motion was not pressed by its friends, and it fell to the ground.†

While the hopes of the episcopalians were thus meeting with disappointment in parliament, the presbyterians, on the other hand, were strong in the house, and their cause, apparently exposed to danger from the inclinations of the queen, emerged from the conflict which ensued with an accession of security. Measures were introduced by the Duke of Argyll and the Earl of Marchmont for the protection of the Presbyterian Church. One act which was passed, ratified and Measures for strengthening the presbyterian interest.

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 425.

† Burton, vol. i. pp. 353, 356.

* Struthers' History of Scotland, vol. i. p. 149.

† Lockhart's Memoirs of Scotland, p. 51; Burnet's Own Times, vol. v. p. 160.

confirmed all laws and statutes made against popery and papists, and also confirmed presbyterian church government and discipline by kirk sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and assemblies. Another act declared it to be high-treason to question the authority of the convention, which had altered the succession by calling William to the throne, or to attempt making any change upon the Claim of Right which was the groundwork of the existing ecclesiastical arrangements.* This was a strong measure, which partook too much of the character of trying to bind the hands of posterity. It was understood by its friends to mean that any person would be guilty of treason who should declare that he considered the presbyterian establishment wrong, and that episcopacy ought to be restored. A similar measure had often been proposed to the late king, but he had uniformly refused to sanction its being passed into a law, declaring that as he himself had accepted the crown on the principles of the Claim of Right, he would never allow them to be violated, but that he would not attempt to bind his successors by making it treason even to consider the propriety of effecting any change.† Legislation of this extreme character attempts what is impossible, for let laws against innovation be made ever so stringent, they become mere gossamer so soon as changes in society have altered the distribution of effective influence; and they are not needed in support of institutions which really have a foundation in the affections and judgments of the people. The only apology for the friends of the Presbyterian Church, on this occasion, in trying to make security doubly sure, is that they had a subtle foe to contend with, who was watching every opportunity for their overthrow, and whose previous conduct showed that he would scruple at nothing to gain his ends. It is not very wonderful that in these circumstances they should have declared it to be treason to propose any change of the principles embodied in the Claim of Right. It was noticed, however, by the Jacobites, that when this question was just in the act of being decided, an extraordinary rain fell, which made so much noise upon the roof of the parliament-house that no voice could be heard, and the clerks were obliged to desist, which was interpreted as a declaration of Heaven against the proceedings.‡

Meanwhile, there arose an important question, of Origin and nature of the Act of Security.

which England and Scotland took different views, and which consequently was every day assuming a more portentous aspect. After the death of the Duke of Gloucester, Anne's last child, the southern legislature, passing over the descendants of Charles I., who were all popish, had carried an act settling the crown upon the Princess Sophia, of Germany, a Protestant, and granddaughter of James I.; but the parliament of Scotland refused either to concur in this arrangement, or to nominate any successor at all in the meantime. A very general feeling prevailed throughout the country that, ever since the union of the two crowns, after the death of Elizabeth, Scotland had greatly declined in prosperity. Governed by an absent sovereign, who was armed with the power and the wealth of a much greater kingdom, she had found her parliaments unable to resist encroachments upon her liberties. Their privilege of withholding supplies availed nothing against princes who derived but a trifling portion of their revenues from Scotland: indeed, the very attempt to use this constitutional weapon only provoked greater aggressions; and, prior to the Revolution, the royal prerogative had been pushed to an extent much more destructive of liberty than in England. Now, therefore, it was felt was the time, when the reigning sovereign had no heir, and when those who stood next in succession were acknowledged by England to be objectionable on account of their religion, to make a stand for the liberties of their country by separating the two crowns. The Scottish Estates refused, therefore, to concur in settling the succession as England had done. An act was passed for the security of the kingdom, which named no successor, but prescribed the course parliament was to pursue on the demise of the queen without issue.* The Estates were to assemble on the twentieth day after that event, and they were to select a successor to the throne from amongst the Protestant descendants of the royal family of Scotland. They were debarred, however, from choosing the same sovereign as England had done, unless, previously to her majesty's death, there should be such conditions of government settled and enacted as might secure the honour and sovereignty of the crown and kingdom of Scotland, the freedom, frequency, and power of parliaments, and the religion, freedom, and trade of the nation; and, to guard against any foreign opposition which might be given to the execution of this act, it was also decreed that the whole able-bodied Protestant population of the kingdom should immediately be armed and trained.

These measures presented no agreeable prospect to the government in London. Question of the union again taken up. They pointed either to a separation of the two crowns, or, if this should be opposed, to a war of deadly animosity, such as had baffled all the power of England in the days of Edward. The difficulties of the case, while they led the English rulers to put their country into a posture of defence, at the same time suggested that an entire union of the two kingdoms was the only effectual remedy; and thus this question, which had been a favourite measure with William, and which had received ample discussion during the first year of Anne's reign, was again brought upon the field, and more seriously considered than before.† England was now deeply in earnest, and for several

* Lockhart's Memoirs of Scotland, p. 53; Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. p. 431.

† Burton's Own Times, vol. v. p. 160.

‡ Lockhart's Memoirs of Scotland, p. 54.

* Burton, vol. i. pp. 358, 359.

† Ker of Kersland's Memoirs, pp. 16—19.

years the question of the union took precedence of all others.

While this question had a bearing upon all the interests of the country, and was considered in its relation to civil liberty, commercial pursuits, and material prosperity, its religious aspects were by no means overlooked. It might have been expected that the episcopalians would appear as the warm friends of the measure, in the hope that the episcopacy of England, predominating in a united parliament, would secure and extend their privileges—nay, perhaps raise them to their old supremacy; but they conceived that they had more to hope for from the exiled family, and all their thoughts being turned to a restoration, they opposed the union as ruinous to this darling project.* The Cameronians, in like manner, who, although comparatively few in number, were men of much spirit and enterprise, and had vindicated their importance at the time of the Revolution, appeared upon the same platform with the episcopalians, and thus presented a singular conjunction of extremes. Their reasons, however, were altogether different from those by which the episcopalians were influenced. They abhorred episcopacy; they hated the moderate presbytery of the Revolution; they took their stand upon the presbyterianism of the solemn league and covenant; and they opposed a union with prelatie England, on the ground that it was inconsistent with the oaths sworn by their forefathers, and still obligatory upon their descendants.† The Established Church, again, were by no means warmly favourable to this measure, nor yet were they violently opposed to it. On the one hand, they could not but be sensible that, if Scotland were eventually separated from England, they might have a hard battle to fight with the Jacobites. The exiled house might be restored. Their restoration, indeed, was not the object of all who supported the Act of Security; but it certainly was the object of many. In the case of a vacant throne and a disputed succession, it was impossible to say what numbers might rally round their standard; and one thing was certain, that if the exiled family were restored, the Presbyterian Church would speedily be overthrown, and episcopacy, perhaps even popery, would be established in its room. On the other hand, however, they were naturally afraid, and not without considerable appearance of reason, that a union with England, which was so much larger and wealthier a kingdom, might be the source of danger to their religious institutions. She must have a predominance in the united parliament, and thus a way might be prepared for the introduction of episcopacy. Against the former danger no precautions or conditional arrangements could prove of any avail: the inevitable consequence would be a return of the days of persecution which had preceded the expulsion of James. But, against the dangers to be apprehended from the predominating influence of English episcopacy, it might be possible to guard by making the continuance of the Scottish establishment a fundamental article of the treaty of union.* Upon the whole, therefore, it appeared to the more cool and moderate of the presbyterians that a union with England, if fenced with sufficient safeguards, might rather turn out for the advantage and security of their Church.

As a body, however, the ministers of the establishment were far from being zealous for the union. Not a few of them were violently opposed to it, and the majority were averse to it. Feelings of the Church with regard to the union.

But the counsels of the more moderate so far prevailed that no united action was taken against it.† The apprehensions which naturally enough suggested themselves on either view of the subject made the Church take up something of a passive position, and thus the question was left mainly to turn upon the material interests of the country. The idea of a fast having been suggested in parliament, by some who hoped that in this way the religious zeal of the country might be awakened against the union, the house refused to make any such appointment, leaving it to the Church judicatories to proceed in the matter as they should judge expedient.‡ Presbyterial fasts accordingly were appointed, but they were observed with the same quietness and decorum as the ordinary services of the Sabbath-day, and there was but little reference to political matters in any pulpit. The only topic handled in addition to the common elements of religious instruction was the dangers of popery; and the prayers that were offered up were to the effect that the deliberations of parliament might be so directed as to conduce to the glory of God, the prosperity of religion, and the well-being of the Church of Scotland. The commission of the General Assembly narrowly watched the progress of the negotiations, and made some suggestions. One provision in regard to the proposed treaty of union was “that the commissioners should not treat of or concerning any alteration of the worship, discipline, or government of the Church of this kingdom, as now by law established.”§ The assembly’s commission, while so far satisfied, yet recommended that the interests of the Presbyterian Church should not be left to depend upon a mere negative provision like this, but that some positive enactment should be embodied in the treaty of union, providing for the permanency and security of the Church of Scotland. This suggestion was not forgotten when the articles of the union were finally sanctioned. Before the act ratifying the treaty of union was passed, a separate act was adopted, providing that the presbyterian church government, with its confession of faith, discipline, and ecclesiastical judicatories, should be the only government of the Church within the

* Burton, vol. i. p. 445.

† Lockhart’s Memoirs, pp. 217, 240; Burnet’s Own Times, vol. v. pp. 319—322.

‡ Aikman’s Buchanan, vol. v. pp. 474, 475.

§ Burton, vol. i. p. 392.

* Burton, vol. i. p. 432.

† Ker’s Memoirs, p. 21.

kingdom of Scotland; and it was stipulated that this act should be embodied in whatever act might sanction the treaty of union, whether in Scotland or in England.* The commission having also, in a second address, represented the danger to which they might be exposed of having oaths imposed upon them inconsistent with their principles,† it was decreed that “none of the subjects of the kingdom should be subjected, within the bounds of Scotland, to any oath, test, or subscription contrary to or inconsistent with the Protestant religion and presbyterian church government, worship, and discipline, as above established.” Another complaint of the commission, that Scotland, in the event of the union being consummated, would be subject to a parliament composed in part of prelates, while it was the belief of the country that no churchman should be invested with civil office, was passed over in silence, for it raised a question which admitted of no satisfactory settlement. It was hardly to be expected that England would modify her institutions to so great an extent as these views of her Scottish associates would have required. The sacramental test also was left in force,‡ to the great and just dissatisfaction of all who had any proper sense of the sanctity of one of the most solemn ordinances of the Gospel.§

Parliament having thus made all necessary arrangements to secure the permanency of the presbyterian institutions of Scotland, agreed that England should be left to regulate her own ecclesiastical establishments according to her own views. Not a few of the ministers were violently opposed to this as inconsistent with the solemn league and covenant; and the commission of the assembly, although greatly divided in opinion, presented a remonstrance against this decision, on the ground that a formal agreement of the Scottish parliament to the existence of prelacy in England, would involve the whole country in the guilt of upholding an unscriptural system. This was a frivolous objection, and one that came with a bad grace from men who were obliging England to stipulate that she would not interfere with the existence of presbytery in Scotland. If it had really been sinful in Scotland to agree to the existence of prelacy in England, because she disapproved of it, it must have been equally sinful in England to tolerate presbytery in Scotland, which was as much derelicted south of the Tweed. But the truth is, neither nation became responsible for the religious procedure of the other. They only bound themselves not to interfere with one another's convictions in religious matters. The objection of the commission was at once overruled by parliament; and it is obvious that if there had been any weight in it, the parties who urged it were bound to offer uncompromising hostility to the whole project of the union. Union was impossible, unless the two nations agreed to allow each other to maintain their own religious institutions.* The same objection was started in the English parliament against acceding to the continued existence of presbytery in Scotland. “If those reverend prelates,” said an English peer, “do not believe the religion of the Church of England to be the purest and most agreeable to the Scriptures, and her constitution and government most conformable to the primitive church,—if they have changed their opinions, let them tell me so,—let them undeceive me.” The Bishop of Oxford's reply was quite conclusive: “It is true the Scotch, for the security of the Kirk, which is to be an essential condition of any union between the two kingdoms, have called their presbyterian religion the true Protestant religion; but do I acknowledge their religion to be such by acceding to this bill? What is it that I, or any lord should consent to, by saying, Content, when the question for this bill shall be put? Why, that the bill shall pass into a law. And what passes into a law but what the bill enacts? Does the bill enact that their religion is the true Protestant religion? No such thing. I would suppose we were treating upon articles with the French king; those who should act for him would be sure to give him the style of the most Christian king; but would it follow that, if we were to ratify the treaty agreed on in some part whereof he was to be so styled, that we consented to this proposition, that Louis XIV. is most Christian?”†

Thus was the great measure of the union brought to a satisfactory conclusion in the face of formidable obstacles. The leading danger to which Scotland as the inferior country was exposed, of having an ecclesiastical system which she abhorred imposed upon her at some future time by the parliament of the United Kingdom, was effectually guarded against; and her Church was secured against danger from the quarter whence it was mainly to be apprehended. It would have been a serious calamity, if it had been left in the power of the united parliament to modify the religious institutions of Scotland, as they pleased. In all probability the attempt would soon have been made to introduce episcopacy; and, as resistance would certainly have been offered, the dark and gloomy days of Claverhouse might have again returned to desolate the country. These frightful evils have been avoided by the simple expedient of securing the permanency of presbyterian institutions; and the articles of the union with regard to this matter are still in force. The parliament of Great Britain has no power to introduce fundamental changes into the ecclesiastical affairs of Scotland. They are prohibited by express stipulations. They are debarred with regard to Scotland, in a way in which they are not debarred with regard to England; because England was by no means exposed to the same danger from Scot-

* Burton, vol. i. pp. 466—468.

† Lockhart's Memoirs, p. 240.

‡ Lockhart's Memoirs, p. 243; Brown's Compendious History, vol. ii. p. 401.

§ Aikman's Buchanan, vol. v. pp. 487, 572.

* Carstairs' State Papers, p. 750.

† Burton, vol. i. pp. 504, 505.

land, as Scotland, with her small number of representatives, might encounter from England; and therefore there was not felt to be the same need of stringently excluding the legislation of the imperial parliament. Yet very wrong views are sometimes taken of the obligations connected with the treaty of union. These obligations are frequently represented, in discussions relating to ecclesiastical affairs, as if the permanency of the religious institutions of Scotland were so guaranteed that they could not be changed, even although Scotland herself were demanding an alteration. This is a transparent absurdity. The safeguards thrown around the Presbyterian Church were designed to protect Scotland from the encroachments of England; but they were not designed to prevent Scotland from changing her own views, if further consideration should lead her to the conclusion that in some respects she had been wrong. If Scotland were now convinced that civil establishments of religion were really injurious to the well-being of the church of Christ, there is nothing in the articles of the union that would oblige her to maintain the existing establishment. So long as she wishes to preserve this institution, the imperial parliament cannot deprive her of it, but the union does not bind her to maintain it contrary to her own convictions. The articles of the union are a valid argument against all changes sought to be enforced from without, but they are no argument at all against the propriety of changes when demanded by the Scottish nation itself. So with regard to the principles embodied in the Claim of Right at the Revolution, William had no power to alter them; but it was a measure that could not be defended on constitutional principles, when the Scottish parliament declared it to be treason for any one of its own members even to propose a change.*

The union undoubtedly has proved a copious source of benefits to both countries, and certainly not less to Scotland than to England. The British islands never could have acquired the influence which they now wield under the designation of the British Empire, if separate legislatures had continued to meet in London and Edinburgh. Nor could Scotland by her own energies alone ever have risen to the position which she occupies among the nations of the earth. Yet the immediate consequences of the union were such as to spread alarm and bitter disappointment through the country; and the Scottish nation were made to feel that they had come under the influence of a nation which had little sympathy with them, and which was disposed to encroach upon their most valued privileges. If the union was unpopular before its consummation, it became, during many years afterwards, the object of deep abhorrence, and it was the custom to ascribe to it all the calamities and distresses of the nation. Doubtless there were some real grounds of complaint, but there were others which had no solid foundation. The departed glory of a separate existence assumed the dimensions of an incalculable loss, and advantage of undoubted and permanent value obtained instead, appeared small in the comparison. Besides, there were not a few of the blessings of the union of which the seeds were only sown at the time, and the enjoyment of the ripened fruit was reserved for subsequent generations.

The Presbyterian Church had offered no united opposition to the union, but had rather assumed a position which helped it forward. Yet very soon after its consummation, she began to feel that she was in hands disposed to treat her as an alien institution. Her peculiarities were not understood by English statesmen, and, although her permanency was guaranteed by the most solemn sanctions, yet there were many who desired her overthrow, and who would not have scrupled to go any lengths against her, if they could have hoped for success. The Jacobites entertained high hopes, either that they might be able immediately to restore the exiled royal family by force of arms, or that, at least, they might see the pretender recognised by parliament as the successor of her majesty. The queen herself was understood now to look with disfavour upon the principles of the Revolution, though to them she owed her throne; and there is some ground for believing that she was not indisposed to the scheme of acknowledging her brother as heir to the crown. It is certain that she received letters from him, in which the advantages of this arrangement were urged upon her attention; and it is known that his friends in England were instructed at this time to support her administration with all their power.* That the success of these measures would have involved the destruction of the Church of Scotland does not admit of any doubt. For several successive years, indeed, after the union, the usual assurances of royal support were conveyed to the assembly by her majesty's commissioner, and acknowledgments of her majesty's gracious kindness were made by the assembly, though with trembling and doubtful hearts. But at length sundry indications began to appear of approaching danger, and the Church was made to feel how helpless she was.

It had long been the practice of the General Assembly to appoint days of fasting and humiliation, as the circumstances of the country seemed to require, and there had never been much difficulty in obtaining the sanction of the civil courts for these solemnities.† But now, when the Scottish privy council no longer existed, and the seat of government was transferred to London, great inconvenience attended the application for a sanction, and the likelihood of meeting with a refusal on the part of the civil authorities was much increased. It was suggested that some local functionary in Edinburgh might be empowered to grant the requisite autho-

Immediate effects of the union painful to the Church.

Sundry threatenings of danger.

Difficulties connected with a fast.

* Burnet's Own Times, vol. vi. pp. 47, 48; Struthers' History of Scotland, vol. i. p. 144.

† Burnet's Own Times, vol. vi. p. 39.

* Supra, vol. ii. p.

city; but although this plan was not positively rejected, yet no serious intention was ever entertained of really carrying it into effect. During the time of the great agitation connected with Sacheverell, the General Assembly took upon them to appoint a day of fasting and humiliation on account of national sins,* and the moderator was instructed to apply for the sanction of government in the customary form. This sanction was granted, though with very great reluctance. Much displeasure was expressed with the conduct of those who had proposed such a measure, at a time when it could only tend to increase the existing ferment; and it was insinuated that its most zealous supporters were probably actuated by very different views from those which they professed. At the same time it was intimated that the assembly must not rashly do the like again, otherwise they would probably find themselves in the painful position of having their deed disallowed; and they were counselled to abstain from all unnecessary assertion of their privileges and authority, as this might bring upon them the very evils which they had apprehended as likely to result from the union.† Thus was the Presbyterian Church made to feel that she occupied a very different position from that which had formerly belonged to her. Her liberty of action was trammelled to a far greater extent than formerly.

Another source of annoyance to the presbyterian establishment was the countenance Extension of episcopal forms in Scotland. now given to episcopalian forms of worship. After the union, some English families came to reside in Scotland, on account of offices which they held under government, and for other reasons. They were naturally desirous of observing the religious forms to which they had been accustomed at home, and conceived that, as the two countries were now under one legislature, ministers episcopally ordained in England had a right to exercise all the functions of their office in Scotland.‡ They were encouraged in these views by the Scottish Jacobites, whose object was not the simple establishment of religious liberty, but the overthrow of the Presbyterian Church; and in forming a judgment of the events that followed, we must beware of looking merely to abstract principles, and leaving out of view the struggle for superiority which was the real marrow of the question at that time. The forms of worship observed by the episcopalians from England were most offensive to the presbyterians, both because they came from England, which was regarded with an eye of jealousy, and because they embodied several elements that were abhorred by the mass of the Scottish people. From the days of Laud, when a liturgy, conceived to wear a peculiarly popish aspect, had been forced upon the nation, everything in this shape had been the object of increasing detestation. That episcopacy should be maintained in England was conceived by many to be bad enough, but that it should be permitted to raise its hated front in Scotland was considered a positive breach of the articles of the union, which had provided that only one form of church government should be there recognised. New elements of dissatisfaction also were speedily developed, when the question, first brought under the cognizance of the Scottish courts, was carried by appeal from them to the house of lords in England.

An English clergyman named Greenshields ministered to a small congregation in Edinburgh, where the liturgy was used. First the Dean of Guild interfered on the ground that a private house was used without authority as a place of worship, and then the presbytery prohibited Greenshields from continuing his ministerial functions; and when the decision thus pronounced against Greenshields was brought under the review of the Court of Session, it was confirmed. Here, it was imagined by the presbyterians, the case must necessarily terminate. But the episcopalians saw that by transferring the consideration of the question to London, they were likely to obtain a different decision; and, therefore, they appealed to the house of lords as the highest judicial tribunal in the kingdom. The case encountered some delay on account of the proceedings against Sacheverell, and the extraordinary ferment which convulsed England at this time; but at length, in March, 1711, after the Tories had obtained possession of the reins of government, the decision of the Court of Session was overturned.*

This judgment of the house of lords was calculated to give a severe shock to the prejudices of the presbyterians in Scotland. It imparted a public sanction to the observance of episcopal forms of worship, with all their most offensive peculiarities; and this, taken in connection with the recent change of administration, and the principles hostile to the Revolution, which were so openly proclaimed, excited fears for the stability of the Scottish Church. There was another circumstance which alarmed and offended many, who would have been quite prepared to concede freedom of worship to the episcopalians, and that was the jurisdiction exercised by the house of lords, as a judicial court, over the highest tribunal in Scotland. At the time of the union nothing had been said regarding any such judicial authority.† It was contrary to the practice which had prevailed in Scotland, where no appeal lay to the peers of the realm as such; and it was therefore conceived that the Scottish courts of law were not placed under the judicial control of the British house of peers, acting as a court of review. And more especially the idea that questions relating to the religion of Scotland should be carried by appeal to a tribunal where English prelates occupied a place, seemed to put the liberties of the Presbyterian Church in constant jeopardy. How, it was asked,

* Carstairs' State Papers, p. 786.

† Sunderland's Letter.

‡ Burton, vol. ii. p. 30; Struthers' History of Scotland, vol. i. p. 12.

* Struthers' History of Scotland, vol. i. p. 129.

† Burton, vol. ii. p. 36.

would the English Church relish to have decisions regarding her affairs brought under the review of an assembly where Scottish peers predominated, and where presbyterian ministers were entitled to vote?

Very soon afterwards, and quite in conformity with the decision in Greenshields' case, an act was passed for the toleration of episcopal churches in Scotland.

There was a deputation from the presbyterians at the time in London, consisting of Carstairs, Blackwell, and Baillie, who had been sent up with reference to the question of fasts and other matters pertaining to the privileges of the Church. They were filled with astonishment when they heard of the blow which was meditated against their ecclesiastical system, and they put forth every effort in their power to ward it off. They urged upon the consideration of her majesty's government the argument, that the contemplated measure was a breach of the act of security, which was embodied in the treaty of union, and which declared that presbyterianism was the only government of Christ's church within this kingdom of Scotland. They therefore denied the right of the British legislature to sanction the establishment of any other forms of worship there. But their efforts were unavailing. The Jacobites of Scotland, combined with the episcopalians of England, were too powerful for them, and the act in favour of toleration was passed. Episcopals, whether belonging to the Church of England or to the episcopacy of native growth in Scotland, were equally protected by the new law; and they were exempted from all claim of jurisdiction on the part of the Established Church, whose power of inflicting ecclesiastical censures was described as confined to those of her own communion.*

The new law excited great dismay in Scotland.

It was viewed by the General Assembly as not only threatening the overthrow of their Church, but as giving "a large licence to all errors and blasphemies, and throwing up all godly discipline to the dishonour of God, and the scandal and ruin of the true Christian religion." These fears now appear to us altogether visionary; and we have no sympathy with the narrow views which would suppress all forms of worship but one; but we are apt to forget that many of the generation were still living, to whom episcopacy had only been known as the most desolating scourge which had ever distressed a suffering country. Besides, it was not an enlightened regard to the rights of conscience which prompted the measure of toleration; but it was urged on by men who were labouring to prepare the way for a return of the exiled royal family, and whose bygone history made it plain that, if they succeeded in their purpose, they would have no regard at all to the religious scruples of others. It is no wonder that the remembrance of the bloody days of Claverhouse, and the unceasing efforts made by the Jacobites to bring back the house of Stewart, excited the strenuous opposition of our forefathers to the toleration of episcopal worship. The ulterior objects, however, of the episcopalians were defeated, and the toleration, surviving by itself, has proved a blessing to the country. Out of the evil conflicts of human passions divine Providence frequently brings real and permanent good, though the words of Scripture may be applied to such cases, that the parties "meant not so, neither did their heart think so."

Coupled with the toleration of episcopacy, there was an oath of abjuration prescribed by parliament, which was enacted.

designed to protect the country against the machinations of the pretender's friends.* The Jacobites would have preferred that no such appendage had been connected with the boon offered to them; but when they found that they could not obtain it alone, they were constrained to submit to the disagreeable condition. However, they took revenge upon their opponents by proposing and securing the enactment, that the same oath should be extended to the presbyterians. Now it so happened that, although the presbyterians were devoted friends of the Protestant succession, and therefore most cordially approved of the object of the oath, yet it was thrown into such a shape that it was doubtful whether it could be taken, consistently with his principles, by any member of the Church of Scotland. The oath exacted approbation of the English Act of Settlement, which required that the sovereign should be a member of the Church of England, and it was argued, both that the imposition of such an oath upon presbyterians was an insult to them, and also that it was a violation of the articles of the union, which provided that no oaths should be imposed in Scotland inconsistent with the principles of the Presbyterian Church. Was it not enough that the members of this Church swore allegiance to the reigning prince? Why oblige them to declare with all the solemnity of an oath, that they considered it requisite he should be an episcopalian? The change of one little word in the oath, viz., of as into which, which was suggested by Carstairs, would have obviated the scruples of many; but, although this alteration was agreed to in the house of peers, the original term was restored when the bill came back to the house of commons. The "logical lie," as the clause was designated by the presbyterian nonjurors, was perpetuated, and thus a fertile source of discord and dissension, which might have been effectually closed by one trifling monosyllable, was left open. The oath gave rise to fierce contentions in Scotland. It nearly rent the Presbyterian Church asunder; and after all, it was not enforced upon the episcopalians, for whom it had been mainly designed, and from whom alone the abjuration of the pretender was at all required. Only one of the episcopalian clergy ever took the oath, although they all availed themselves of the toleration, of which it was conceived to be a necessary safeguard.†

* Struthers' History of Scotland, vol. i. pp. 148, 149; Burton, vol. ii. p. 48.

* Burton, vol. ii. pp. 47—49.

† Struthers' History of Scotland, vol. i. p. 149.

But there was another measure adopted against Restoration of the Church of Scotland, which, patronage, although not exciting so much opposition at the time, has been far more frequently referred to since, and has been attended with consequences of a permanent and wide-spread character. This was the restoration of patronage, or the repeal of the act of 1691, which has already come under our notice.* This act, we have seen, was far from being of a satisfactory character.† It made no distinct recognition of the rights of the members or communicants of the Church. It did not even invest the heads of families with the election of ministers. It merely transferred the rights of patrons to the heritors and kirk sessions of parishes, though the word propose was substituted in the room of the word present; and it fixed a compensation to which patrons should be entitled, and for which they might sue at law. These different provisions, however, were so intermingled as to exhibit something of a contradictory character; and while some have described the measure as designed for the abolition of patronage, others have viewed it as simply authorising the transfer of the right from one quarter to another. Whether in consequence of these features of the act, or of some other cause, it so happened that but few of the parishes had paid to their patrons the amount prescribed by parliament; and few of the patrons had made any demand for the price due to them. These facts were now adduced as an argument in favour of the repeal of the measure, and the restoration of the old law. The heats and divisions, also, which were alleged to have taken place at the appointment of ministers were appealed to as rendering a change indispensable. In vain the deputation of the assembly, who had immediately returned to London, which they had newly left, petitioned government to leave the existing arrangement undisturbed. They argued, that as the present mode of appointing ministers had existed from a period prior to the union, it must necessarily be viewed as one of those rights and privileges of the Presbyterian Church which the British legislature had bound itself to leave untouched. There was great force in this argument, and Lockhart of Carnwath avows that he thought so; but he mentions that he strained every nerve to help on the change, just that the presbyterians might feel of how little value the stipulations of the union were, to which they trusted so much. "I pressed the toleration and patronage acts more earnestly," he says "that I thought the presbyterian clergy would be from thence convinced that the establishment of their Kirk would in time be overturned, as it was obvious that the security thereof was not so thoroughly established by the union as they imagined."‡ And, in spite of all the efforts which the friends of the Presbyterian Church could make, the measure restoring patronage was passed with astonishing celerity. The Church of Scotland was deprived of the scanty amount of liberty which she had enjoyed for about twenty years. The ostensible reasons for the change were a regard to the peace and quiet of society, and justice to the patrons, who had never yet received their stipulated compensation; but the real ground, undoubtedly, of the measure was a desire to secure as much control as possible over the proceedings of the Established Church, and thus to mould it into an institution which might prove subservient to the designs of government.

It is common to ascribe all the divisions which have rent the Church of Scotland, ^{Effects of the} with regard to patronage, to the act of 1712. act of 1712. This is not altogether just. It admits of question whether even the law of 1691, which vested in heritors and kirk sessions the right of appointing ministers, would have permanently satisfied the people of Scotland. There was manifestly the same room for difference of opinion between the people of a parish and the heritors and session, as between the people and an individual patron; and if the General Assembly had afterwards enforced the dictate of the heritors and session against the people, as they did so unscrupulously that of the patron, there would certainly have arisen the same occasion for dissenting from the Established Church. The immediate cause of the separations which actually took place was the rigid enforcement of patronage in opposition to the wish of the parishioners; and it seems probable that the same spirit would have led to the equally rigid enforcement of the choice or proposal of the heritors and elders where the people were disposed to resist. It may be alleged, indeed, that the heritors, or at least the session, as being more identified with the people, would probably have better represented their views, and, consequently, that there would have been less likelihood of collision. Perhaps this might have been the case; and yet it is possible that their being nearer to the people, both in station and in residence, might have led to greater disagreements between them, where they happened to take different views of the qualifications of candidates.

The mode of appointing ministers is a point of the highest moment with reference to the well-being of a church. It seems as if this question admitted of a satisfactory adjustment only in those churches which, dissociated from the State, maintain and regulate their own religious institutions. In them there is no pretence for any other method than that of vesting the election in those who are recognised as members; and experience has amply shown that, although no scheme administered by human beings is secure against mismanagement, yet this method, while it certainly secures the liberties and privileges of the church, seldom issues in any other than happy results.

* Willison's Impartial Statement, vol. iv. p. 195.

† Supra, vol. ii. p. 754. ‡ Lockhart, vol. i. p. 418.

CHAPTER LV.

WILLIAM AND MARY.

A.D. 1688—1694.

THE difficulties with which the new sovereign had to contend in settling the affairs of Scotland were numerous and formidable, and the most embarrassing of these arose not out of the pertinacious opposition of his enemies, but from the selfish ambition and unreasonable expectations of his professed friends. The claimants for office were so numerous and insatiable, and their demands became so troublesome, that it was found necessary to forbid the resort of members of the convention to London; and permission to repair to the court was granted reluctantly, and only as matter of special favour. It was, of course, impossible to satisfy the claims of one tenth of those needy and greedy politicians, who so eagerly obtruded their services and claims on the attention of the king; but William seems to have done his best to avoid giving needless offence, and to have selected his —his selection of his ministers. councillors with a due regard both to their own qualifications, and the security of his throne. The Duke of Hamilton, who had been elected president of the convention, was naturally appointed lord High Commissioner when the convention was turned into a parliament. Lord Melville, a man of moderate abilities, but good character, who had been persecuted by James for his adherence to the presbyterian party, was appointed Secretary of State and chief official adviser of the king; Lord Crawford, a stern presbyterian, was made President of the parliament; Sir James Dalrymple, the celebrated jurist, was created Viscount Stair and restored to the presidency of the Court of Session, an office which the assassination of President Lockhart by Chiesly of Dalry had rendered vacant.* Sir John Dalrymple, his son, was reappointed lord advocate; and Sir William Lockhart, an able lawyer, became solicitor general. The treasury and the seals were put into commission. The real character of Carstairs. prime minister of Scotland, however, and confidential adviser of the king was the celebrated William Carstairs, afterward sprinclipal of the University of Edinburgh. Cardinal Carstairs, as he was significantly named, from his vast influence, was one of the most remarkable Scotchmen of that age, and exhibited the rare combination of great learning and piety with the shrewdness, knowledge of the world, and practical talent of a sagacious statesman. He had given singular proofs of courage and fidelity in his resolute endurance of imprisonment and torture, rather than betray the secrets entrusted to him by Pensionary Fagel respecting the policy of the Prince of Orange. Though a staunch presbyterian, he was distinguished for his benevolence and liberality towards the members of other religious bodies, and contributed greatly by his advice to the establishment of the presbyterian polity on a moderate basis. Amid all the intrigues and treacheries of that period, the integrity of Carstairs was unquestioned, and his simplicity of character remained uninjured either by the possession of great power or the courtly adulation that was paid to him. He was much about the person of William, and enjoyed a larger share of his confidence and esteem than any other Scotchman, or indeed than any other of his councillors except Bentinck.*

* Lockhart had pronounced a decree in a suit between Chiesly and his wife, and had assigned to the latter about £93 a year, a larger provision than her husband deemed just or necessary. Chiesly, a man of furious passions, threatened vengeance, and, having dogged the president home from Greyfriars Church, where he heard divine service, shot him dead as he turned into the President's Close, in which his house stood. Chiesly, after undergoing the torture, by a special act of the Estates, was tried and executed for this barbarous and cold-blooded murder. His body was hung in chains, but it was stolen from the gibbet and buried beneath the hearthstone of Dalry House, near Edinburgh, where the skeleton was discovered only a few years ago.

The disappointed aspirants after office, of course, bitterly resented their exclusion, and imagining that they were the authors of a revolution in which they had been only casual and subordinate actors, they considered themselves powerful enough to overthrow the government, and to dictate to the throne. Foremost among these malcontents was Sir James Montgomery, who had taken a leading part in the debates concerning the forfeiture of James, and had been one of the three commissioners appointed to tender the crown to William and Mary. He thought himself entitled to the office of secretary, and keenly resented the preference given to Sir John Dalrymple. Under the guidance of this able but unprincipled leader, a large number of discontented and factious politicians formed themselves into a society called "the Club," and met twice a day at a tavern to concert their measures.† With these men were associated such perverse pragmatistical busybodies as Sir Patrick Hume; oligarchical republicans, like Fletcher of Saltoun; Jacobites, who sought by embroiling still more the public affairs to bring about the restoration of the banished king; "waiters on providence," who embraced what they considered the strongest side; and "Malignants," who hoped by paying court to the extreme presbyterians among the chiefs of the Club, to escape merited punishment for their base subserviency to James.‡

When the Estates reassembled on the 5th of June, the convention was turned into a parliament, and an act was passed recognising William and Mary as sovereigns of Scotland. The premeditated conflict between the government and the Club

* See Life and Correspondence of Principal Carstairs, 4to. 1774.

† Leven and Melville Papers, p. 83.

‡ "All the Malignants, for fear, are come into the club, and they all vote alike."—Leven and Melville Papers, p. 83, Sir John Dalrymple to Lord Melville, 25th June, 1689 immediately began, and it soon became evident that the latter had secured the support of a great majority of the Estates. The first ground of quarrel arose out of the constitution of the Committee of Articles, which the parliament denounced as "a great grievance to the realm." Though nominally elective, it was really nominated by the crown, and had gradually usurped nearly all the rights and privileges of the legislature. The

Dispute about the Committee of Articles, Estates had in fact, under the Stewart, been virtually deprived of their functions as a legislative body, and had been reduced to the condition of mere registrars of the acts prepared and recommended by the Lords of Articles.* It was not to be expected that this arbitrary and offensive system would be allowed to remain unchanged after the expulsion of the late dynasty, and accordingly it was placed at the head of the list of grievances which imperatively demanded redress. William, however, was reluctant to surrender any of the royal prerogatives; and, therefore, desired to modify and reform the existing system rather than wholly to abrogate it. His sagacious adviser, Sir John Dalrymple, was of opinion that as the three Estates of Scotland, unlike the English parliament, sat in one assembly, and there was no second house to revise their proceedings, or to act as a check upon rash legislation, the existence of a permanent committee with defined powers was requisite to moderate their action, and to prevent collision between the crown and the parliament. The government could in this way most safely exert its influence on the legislature, and the necessity of a final veto on its proceedings would be superseded. William, therefore, sent instructions to his commissioner that he should intimate to the parliament that it was his royal pleasure that in future the members of the Committee of Articles should be freely elected by their respective Estates; and that, as a remedy against their absolute veto on any proposals, whatever measures they rejected might be revived by a motion in full parliament. The draft of an act in accordance with these instructions was brought in next day. But the opposition would be satisfied with nothing less than the entire abolition of the obnoxious committee; and a counter motion was immediately put and carried, that "there ought to be no committees of parliament, but such as are freely chosen by the Estates to prepare motions and overtures that are first made in the house." Another and still more liberal plan proposed by the government, offering to enlarge the committee and to allow the members to be chosen monthly, or even at shorter intervals, shared the same fate; and the opposition, flushed with victory, proceeded to vote that the officers of state who had hitherto been members of the Committee of Articles by right of office should be excluded from the committee unless they were elected by the Estates. The commissioner, however, intimated to the house, to their great dissatisfaction, that he could not give the royal assent to their proposal without communicating with the king.

The breach between the government and the opposition daily widened. The chiefs of the Club, finding themselves at the head of a compact and powerful majority, soon made it evident that they were determined to strip the crown of its most valuable prerogatives, and to leave the sovereign little more than the shadow of authority. While they refused to the officers of the crown the usual means of concerting and arranging their measures, they held daily meetings for the purpose of discussing their own plans, and settling by a regular vote the course they should adopt. One of their most cherished projects was to exclude permanently from office all who had taken any part in the illegal and arbitrary proceedings of the two preceding reigns, and a law prohibiting the sovereign from employing these unpopular persons in any public office was brought into the house, and passed by a large majority; but William, in accordance with his usual moderate and prudent policy, refused to give it his sanction.

It was well known that this blow was aimed at Lord President Stair and his son, Sir John, who were on various grounds peculiarly obnoxious to the leaders of the opposition. The elder Dalrymple, the undisputed head of the Scottish law, had long held a conspicuous place among the statesmen of that age. In his youth he had been an officer in the covenanting army; he had then been a professor of philosophy in the University of Glasgow; he had finally adopted the legal profession, and had attained to unrivalled pre-eminence, both in the knowledge and application of its principles. During the Protectorate he had been appointed a judge by Cromwell. At the Restoration he was allowed to retain his place, though he refused to take the oath against resistance and the declaration condemning the Covenant. In 1676 he was appointed Lord President of the Court of Session, and discharged the duties of that office with transcendent ability and success. As a member of the privy council he was indirectly implicated in the wretched administration of Lauderdale; but he cautiously avoided taking any active part in the flagrant misdeeds that disgraced the reign of Charles II. and his brother. His moderation gave offence to James, and he was deprived of his office and compelled to take refuge in Holland. He was privy to the unfortunate attempt of Argyll, which had nearly involved him in utter ruin; and, in spite of his habitual caution, he unhesitatingly perilled his fortune on the success of William's enterprise. This circumstance, together with his great sagacity and profound erudition, gained him the esteem and confidence of the prince, who loaded him with honours and listened with respectful attention to his advice.* His son John, during the President's exile, had accepted the office of Lord Advocate under James VII., and by his services in persecuting the covenanters and supporting the dispensing power of the king, had, it was believed, obtained a remission of the forfeiture which his father had incurred by his accession to the enterprise of Argyll. Though not equal to his father, John was a very able man and a skilful lawyer, and was possessed of remarkable powers of eloquence. His memory has been loaded with infamy in consequence of his connection with the massacre of Glencoe; but even before that shocking affair, immediately on the opening of the parliament, he was the object of deep and universal hatred. The President shared to a certain extent in the unpopularity of his son. Both were bitterly envied by that numerous class who can forgive anything but success; they were despised as upstarts by the proud and needy aristocracy, and abhorred by the stern presbyterians, who regarded them as instruments of the bloody and idolatrous Stewarts in persecuting and murdering the saints. Against these obnoxious advisers of the crown, therefore, the whole energies of the Church and the Club were directed. The commissioner endeavoured, but in vain, to divert them from their purpose by recommending that the parliament should proceed to the settlement of the Church, which was virtually in a state of anarchy, as episcopacy had been abolished without any other system being established in its room. But this inducement, though coupled with the tempting proposal that all the forfeitures which had been made since the year 1665 should be restored, utterly failed in drawing aside the opposition from their vindictive policy. As Sir John Dalrymple bitterly remarked, they preferred the destruction of the State to the settlement of the Church.† Not contented with passing the Act of Incapacitation by a majority of three to one, the Estates resumed an inquiry, which they had previously begun and dropped, into the conduct of the commissioners sent to offer the crown, and who, it was alleged, had betrayed their country, and given the king advice which had led him to resist the desires of the parliament. It was resolved that each of the three commissioners should be interrogated apart and alone; and a list of searching questions was drawn up, to which they were enjoined to give a direct reply.* As Sir James Montgomery, the commissioner chosen to represent the counties, was the founder and mainspring of the Club, and the Earl of Argyll, the representative of the nobles, begged earnestly that the house would examine into the manner in which the commissioners had discharged their duty, there can be no doubt that this blow also was levelled at the younger Dalrymple, the remaining commissioner. The investigation, however, was broken off by adjournment of the house, and never resumed.

* The following is all that is recorded in the minutes of the whole proceedings before the house, in one of the most memorable enactments of Charles II.: "13th August, 1670. An act brought in from the Articles against conventicles twice read, approved, and touched with the sceptre."—Minutes of Estates. (Burton, vol. i. p. 68.)

Various other attempts were made by the government to induce the Estates to forward the public business, and to vote the necessary supplies, but the chiefs of the Club resolutely refused either to accept the compromises offered by the king, or to turn to other objects. In pursuance of their factious policy, the parliament next laid claim to a large share in the appointment of the judges, for the purpose of excluding Lord Stair from the office of President. They admitted that in the case of ordinary vacancies the right of nomination rested with the crown, but now that the whole court required to be reconstructed, as well as the entire machinery of government, they affirmed that the authority of parliament was requisite to give validity to the settlement.† The sovereign, it was alleged, never possessed the absolute right to appoint a judge, as the existing members of the court had authority to examine the person nominated, and to reject him if they were dissatisfied with his qualifications. But since the court required to be entirely reconstructed, and there was no existing bench to examine the nominees, it was right and proper that a veto upon the appointments should be entrusted to the Estates. They accordingly passed an act declaring that the judges nominated by the crown should be examined, approved, or rejected by the parliament; and, to show their determination to carry their point, they ordered the signet to be shut, as it was technically termed—in other words, they suspended the whole administration of justice till their claim should be allowed. The commissioner, however, refused to touch this act with the sceptre in token of the royal assent; and, a few months later, after the

The Estates claim the appointment of the judges.

* Sir George Mackenzie, though a political opponent of Lord Stair, has borne valuable testimony to his great qualities. He says, "Really, Stair was a gentleman of excellent parts, of an equal wit, and of unusual learning, but most considerable for being so free from passions, that most men thought this equality of spirit a mere hypocrisy in him. This meekness fitted him extremely to be a president, for he thereby received calmly all men's informations, and by it he was capable to hear without disorder or confusion what the advocates represented. But that which I admire most in him was that in ten years' intimacy I never heard him speak unkindly of those who had injured him."—Memoirs, pp. 214—215. In the family of Lord Stair occurred the tragic incident commemorated in "The Bride of Lamermoor." See Appendix N.

† Leven and Melville Papers, p. 181.

* Leven and Melville Papers, pp. 167, 168. The following may be taken as a specimen of the interrogations addressed to the commissioners:—"Did you, or did any person for you, put any gloss or interpretation upon any article or point of the Claim of Right or of the Grievances, not leaving them to the plain and literal sense?—Did you offer any advice to his majesty upon the first grievance concerning the committee called the Articles, or concerning choosing committees of parliament, or concerning the officers of state—their being supernumeraries: if you did, what was your advice?—Did you advise or draw the instruction to the commissioner relative to the grievance against the Articles?"—Minutes of Estates. (Burton, vol. i. p. 69).

† Leven and Melville Papers, p. 179.

parliament had adjourned, the king re-opened the signet, and appointed new judges without opposition.

In consequence of the refusal of the commissioner ^{Factionous} to assent to the various measures ^{conduct of the} insisted on by the Estates, they ^{Estates.} obstinately refused to grant any supply, and the troops had to be maintained on the English establishment, with the assistance of occasional loans from corporations or private persons. But, as the English parliament continued to vote without hesitation the sums of money necessary for the public service, the refusal of supplies by the Scottish Estates was a matter of very little importance to William. At length, finding the opposition utterly intractable, and that, as Sir John Dalrymple expressed it, each day the parliament was kept together, it was at the expense to the king of a prerogative,* Hamilton abruptly adjourned the parliament on the 2nd of August, leaving no fewer than six important acts which had passed the Estates, but had not been touched by the sceptre.† The king took the unprecedented step of publishing his private instructions to the commissioner, in order to show his anxiety to co-operate with the parliament in promoting the public welfare; while, on the other hand, the leaders of the opposition presented a "humble representation" to the king, complaining bitterly of the policy adopted by his Scottish advisers, and of the refusal of the commissioner to give the royal assent to the various acts which had been passed by the Estates.‡

While this conflict of rival factions was raging ^{Proceedings of} in the parliament-house, a civil war ^{Dundee—} had broken out in the Highlands.

The hopes of James and his adherents were now fixed upon Dundee, who, after his flight from Edinburgh, had retired to his country-seat of Dudhope, near Dundee. He professed his intention to live in quiet, and to offer no opposition to the new government, but he was in truth busily corresponding both with King James and with the Highland chiefs, and waited only the arrival of a promised reinforcement from Ireland to take the field. On the 18th of March, the convention summoned him to appear in his place in parliament, and, a few days after, a herald was sent to require him to lay down his arms under the penalty of being denounced and treated as a traitor. He refused to obey these instructions, alleging that the hostility of his enemies made it unsafe for him to return to Edinburgh, but that he was willing to give security to keep the peace. At this juncture, however, one Brady, an emissary of the exiled king, crossed over ^{—letters to} from Ireland to Scotland with ^{him from James} letters addressed to Dundee and ^{intercepted.} Balcarres. The object of his mission transpired, and he was arrested, and through an associate who accompanied him the letters were discovered. Some of them were found to have been written by Secretary Melfort, and expressed in strong terms the confident hopes of success entertained by James, and his determination to inflict condign punishment upon his enemies. "We dealt too leniently with them," he said, "when we were in power, and possessed means of crushing them: but now, when they shall be once more conquered by us, and subjected once more to our authority, we will reduce them to hewers of wood and drawers of water.*"

These vindictive threats excited deep indignation among the leading members of the ^{Attempt to} parliament. The Earl of Leven ^{arrest Dundee.} was immediately dispatched with a force of two hundred men to apprehend Balcarres and Dundee. The former was seized at his country-seat and confined in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, but Dundee, who was protected by a strong body-guard of his old soldiers, received timely notice that a warrant was out against him, and retired to a small remote house in Glen Ogilvie. On the approach of a body of dragoons, he abandoned this retreat, and, crossing the Dee with his followers, took refuge in the Duke of Gordon's country, and made arrangements with his Highland supporters about his intended rising.

It is impossible to say at what time the project of embodying the clans in favour of ^{State of the} King James first occurred to the ^{Highlands.} mind of Dundee; but it is evident that he had entertained some notion of such scheme before any attempt was made to arrest him. The state of the Highlands at this juncture was peculiarly favourable to the project of a coalition of clans in support of the exiled dynasty. As far as abstract political opinions were concerned, indeed, the Highland chiefs took little or no interest in the contest. It mattered nothing to them whether the principle of the divine right of kings or the constitutional rights of subjects prevailed; but their personal objects and interests were hostile to those of the industrious and comparatively civilised and peaceful inhabitants of the Lowlands, and therefore naturally led them to take the opposite side in this civil broil. They hated and feared a strong and settled government, because it was certain to prove ruinous both to their power and to their marauding pursuits, and were therefore forward to lend their aid to overturn the revolution settlement, which they instinctively perceived boded them no good. Above all, the chief of the great whig clan Campbell, which had suffered such shameful injustice and oppression at the hands of the Stewarts, had adopted the cause of King William, and been restored to the honours and estates of his ancestors—the Macdonalds, Camerons, Macleans, Stewarts, and other hereditary enemies of his house, therefore, at once ranged themselves on the opposite side. Some of them had been enriched by the forfeiture of the Argyll estates, and, if the revolution settlement held good, not only would they be compelled to disgorge their plunder, but to pay up the heavy arrears of rent and tribute which

* Burton, vol. ii. p. 95.

† Leven and Melville Papers, p. 181.

‡ State Tracts, vol. iii. p. 469.

* Balcarres' Memoirs.

they owed him as their feudal superior, to say nothing of the vengeance the restored earl would doubtless exact for all the injuries inflicted on his family in the day of their calamity. The fact, too, must not be lost sight of that the Jacobite chiefs were to a man Roman Catholics or Episcopalians, and had readily lent themselves to the expelled government as tools to oppress and plunder the covenanters of the western shires. They had reason, therefore, to dread that triumphant presbyterianism would exact severe retribution for the barbarities of the Highland host if the new government should hold its ground.

The administration seem, unfortunately, to have ^{Errors of the} entirely misunderstood the position ^{government.} and prejudices of the clans at this crisis, although they were quite well aware that the peace of the country was exposed to serious danger from the existence in the Highlands of such combustible materials. One statesman, indeed, the Viscount Tarbet, pointed out both to Melville and to General Mackay the source of this danger, and the mode by which it might be averted. The Highlanders, he alleged, cared little either for James or for William, but they were jealous of Argyll, and apprehensive of his claims on their estates; and he recommended that the government should advance the money required to discharge the arrears which they owed to the earl as their feudal superior, and that a separate offer should be made to the chief of the Macleans to confirm an arrangement which had been partly made between him and the late earl for adjusting their differences. The sum of five thousand pounds, he believed, would be sufficient to buy up all the dreaded claims of Argyll, and to quiet the fears of his neighbours. The government approved of the plan recommended by this experienced politician, but it was unfortunately marred in the execution. The agent chosen to open negotiations with the disaffected clans was Campbell of Cawdor, who was not only a scion of the house of Argyll, but, it is said, also personally obnoxious to the chiefs. Offers of assistance coming from such a quarter were naturally regarded as a delusion and a snare. The attempt to conciliate the disaffected clans proved an entire failure. Mackay attempted to open a correspondence with Lochiel on the subject, but that wary and politic chief took no notice of the communication; and Glengarry, to whom he also wrote, advised him in return to imitate the example of Monk, by employing his army to restore King James.*

Dundee, after spending a short time in the Highlands, returned to his place of refuge in Glen Ogilvie, and remained there until the approach of a considerable body of troops under Sir Thomas Livingston compelled him once more to betake himself to the mountains. Proceeding northward through Strathdon and Strathbogie, accompanied by a small band of his old troopers, he crossed the Spey, and arrived on the first of May at Inverness.

* Mackay's Memoirs; Burton, vol. i. chap. 3; Macaulay, vol. iii. chap. 13.

He there found Colin Macdonald of Keppoch, one of his Highland allies, blockading ^{Macdonald of Keppoch threatens Inverness.} the town, and threatening to plunder and destroy it. This fiery chief, usually called Coll of the Cows from his great skill in tracing stolen or strayed cattle, had a long-breathed feud with Mackintosh of Moy, the chief of the famous clan Chattan; and a few weeks before the Revolution he had encountered, and had worsted, after an obstinate struggle, the retainers of Moy, though supported by a body of royal troops commanded by Captain Mackenzie of Suddie, who was killed in the fight. Keppoch was immediately proclaimed a rebel; letters of fire and sword were issued against him; his estates were laid waste; he was himself, for a time, obliged to fly; and ultimately one of his kinsmen had to purchase his peace by the payment of a heavy fine.

The cupidity of the Macdonalds had long been excited by the wealth of the town of Inverness, though at that period comparatively very small; and they had at different times fastened a quarrel on the townsmen, and sought a pretext to plunder them during the confusion which followed the expulsion of the Stewart dynasty. Keppoch availed himself of the favourable opportunity to renew hostilities with his old enemies, the Mackintoshes and their allies, and, after spoiling the lands of Moy, he marched to Inverness, and threatened to sack the town, on the plea that the inhabitants had taken part with Mackintosh against his clan. The citizens, however, were accustomed to such visits, and they immediately mustered an army, and, showing a bold front, kept the plunderers at bay. At this critical moment Dundee ^{Dundee acts as} appeared, and undertook to act as a mediator between the townsmen and their marauding assailants. They agreed to buy off the hostility of Keppoch by the payment of two thousand dollars, as compensation for the losses and injuries which that chief alleged he had suffered from the attacks of the Mackintoshes. One half the sum was immediately collected by subscription among the inhabitants, and paid over to the freebooters, and Dundee is said to have pledged his word for the payment of the remainder. Encouraged by the result of this attempt at pacification, the enterprising Jacobite leader next tried to reconcile the Mackintoshes and Macdonalds, with the view of enlisting both clans under his banner, but without success. Mackintosh declined even to attend the friendly meeting which the viscount solicited, and, to punish him for his refusal, his cattle were driven away by Keppoch, at the instigation of Dundee.*

Leaving Inverness, Dundee ^{Dundee proposes to raise the clans.} marched through Badenoch on his way to Athol, using every effort to induce the Highland chieftains to take up arms in behalf of King James. Having fixed upon Lochaber as the most central and convenient trysting place, he caused the fiery cross to be sent throughout the whole territories of the friendly clans, summoning them to take the field on the 18th of May. Moving southward through Athol, he learned that the lairds of Blair and Pollock were lying in Perth with a troop of horse, which they had raised for the government. He immediately pounced upon the city, and seized the sum of nine thousand marks, which he found in the office of the collector, alleging that it was fair to take the king's money for the king's service; and, dispersing the royal troops, carried off their commanding officers prisoners to the mountains. The luckless lairds were dragged about for some time with Dundee's forces in their hurried marches, and ultimately sent for security to the Isle of Mull.

* Dundee's Memoirs.

After this exploit, Dundee marched through Perthshire and Angus, for the purpose of recruiting his small body of cavalry. He lingered for a day or two in the neighbourhood of the seaport town from which he derived his title, but finding it well garrisoned by two troops of dragoons under Sir Thomas Livingston, he relinquished the intention of attacking the place, and marched back to the Highlands

The muster in to meet his associates. On reaching Lochaber, ing the place of rendezvous, near the residence of Lochiel, he found a strong body already assembled, whom the dislike to a settled and powerful government, or the fear and hatred of the Campbells, had induced to rise in arms. The Macdonalds of Sleat, Glengarry, Clanranald, and Keppoch, the Camerons under their chief, the renowned Lochiel, the Macleans of Duart and Lochbuy, and other popish and Jacobite clans, mustered in great numbers. Dundee, however, seemed reluctant to rely exclusively on his Celtic allies, and resolved to delay the commencement of active measures until the arrival of the reinforcements which James had promised to send him from Ireland.

Meanwhile, Mackay, on learning that Dundee Mackay's had taken refuge in the Highlands, proceedings. and was endeavouring to form a coalition of the clans against the government, resolved to march northward and crush the projected insurrection in the bud. He established his head-quarters at Dundee, and leaving there a considerable garrison under Sir Thomas Livingston, he set out with a body of dragoons, amounting to about four hundred and fifty men, in search of the Jacobite leader. But his followers were ill-fitted to cope in speed with the fleet and unencumbered Highlanders. For several weeks Mackay marched and countermarched among the mountains, following the traces of his nimble adversary, and occasionally skirmishing with him; but was ultimately compelled to retreat with all haste, when Dundee, having collected an overwhelming force, turned upon his pursuer, and had nearly succeeded in crushing him before he was aware of his danger. Both men and horses were completely worn out in this harassing, yet ineffective mode of warfare. Mackay endeavoured, but with little success, to obtain assistance from the influential northern clans which were friendly to the government.

The chief of the Grants, indeed, who had been a sufferer from the tyranny of the Indecisive exiled dynasty, joined the whig campaign in general at the head of his retainers, the Highlands.

and two hundred Mackays came from the wilds of Sutherland to the aid of their kinsman; but he complains that he found even the Mackenzies, Frasers, Munros, and other whig and Protestant clans, very lukewarm and indifferent, and that they were, with few exceptions, endowed with no "true sense of the deliverance which God had sent them." * Finding it hopeless without the aid of a strong body of Highlanders to overtake his active adversaries, or to bring them to bay, Mackay dispatched an express to the Duke of Hamilton, urging upon him the necessity of placing "a formidable garrison" in Inverness, and smaller ones in other fortresses in the north, for the purpose of overawing the hostile clans. Without the adoption of this measure he declared that it would be utterly impossible to subdue the Highlanders, or to keep them in check. A fortnight's provisions for an invading army could not be found among these barren heaths, and on the approach of an enemy the active mountaineers could easily retire to difficult passes and broken morasses inaccessible to regular troops.†

While engaged in this harassing and unsatisfactory warfare, Mackay narrowly escaped destruction from a conspiracy among his own troops. He had occupied, and partially fortified, Inverness after it was abandoned by Dundee; and learning that a body of six hundred men, under Colonel Ramsay, were on their way to join him, he started with a portion of his little army to meet these auxiliaries at Ruthven, in Badenoch. Dundee, however, by means of an intercepted despatch, discovered this movement, and resolved to take advantage of it to destroy his enemies in detail before their junction. When Mackay had advanced about half way to the appointed rendezvous, he learned that his active opponent, with upwards of two thousand men, had posted himself within a few miles of Ruthven, and that Ramsay, having discovered his danger, had fallen back to Perth. Mackay felt himself in a very perilous position, as the force under his command amounted to only six hundred men, and he was in the midst of a warlike and hostile population; but with great promptitude he turned eastward towards Strathspey, the country of his allies, the Grants, marching all night, closely followed by Dundee, and took up a strong position on a haugh or plain formed by the windings of the river Spey, which protected his rear, while his front was covered by some marshes and a wood. The place was favourable to the operations of his cavalry, of which the Highlanders stood in great awe; and it was probably owing to his consciousness of this fact that Dundee, in spite of his great superiority in arms, did not venture to attack the royal forces. While lying in this position, Mackay received the alarm-Conspiracy among the royal troops discovered.

* Mackay's Memoirs.

† Leven and Melville Papers.

ing information, that there were traitors in his camp. A regiment of dragoons now serving under him, had formerly been commanded by Dundee. Both officers and men were willing to take service again under their old leader, and were in secret communication with him. They had for some time past regularly betrayed the plans and movements of the royal general to his opponent, and were evidently only waiting for a favourable opportunity to desert in a body. While engaged in the investigation of this conspiracy, Mackay received intelligence that two of his dragoons had been seen in the vicinity of Dundee's camp, in circumstances which left no doubt that they had been sent by their fellow-conspirators to communicate with the enemy; and, shortly after, the scouts brought notice that the Highlanders were on their march towards Mackay's position. To have waited the attack of the enemy with treason thus at work in his own camp would have been perilous in the extreme. Mackay, therefore, lost not a minute in making preparations for a retreat. Cautiously concealing his knowledge of the plot, he placed the most disaffected portion of the dragoons in the van, and, therefore, farthest from the enemy, with his trusty Dutch infantry immediately behind them. He began his march at nightfall, when Dundee was within three miles of his camp; and, hurrying across the ranges of mountains on the north-east, he succeeded in reaching the plains of Aberdeenshire, his troops almost worn out by the rapidity of his march and the want of provisions. Here he was joined by two regiments of dragoons under Barclay and Leslie, and resolved immediately to turn the chase upon Dundee before he should be aware of the arrival of these reinforcements. But this project was frustrated by the treachery of the disaffected officers in Livingston's regiment, who sent notice to the viscount of their commander's movement. The Jacobite leader, whose force had become greatly diminished by the dispersion of the Highlanders in search of plunder, found it necessary to make a rapid retreat into the wilds of Lochaber. As it was impossible to keep the mountaineers together in a state of inaction with no store of provisions for their support, he dismissed them to their homes, with an injunction to reassemble as soon as he should send them notice that he was ready again to take the field. Mackay, on the other hand, was now satisfied that it was in vain to attempt the reduction of the Highlands by the mode of warfare he had hitherto pursued; and leaving one half of his army under Livingston to occupy Inverness, he returned with the remainder to Edinburgh about the beginning of July, for the purpose of urging the government to lose no time in carrying out the project he had recommended to bridle the mountaineers, by the establishment of a chain of fortresses in the most important avenues of the country.

Mackay's prompt proceedings.

Suspension of the war.

The general found that the government, harassed by the factious opposition of the Club, had taken no steps for carrying his design into execution, or for putting the country into a posture of defence. A body of infantry, indeed, had been raised, not without difficulty, among the Cameronians. The majority of these stern presbyterians, in spite of their bitter hatred of Dundee, and of the cause which he espoused, stood aloof from the struggle; and at a great meeting held on the 30th of April, in the parish church of Douglas, had declared that to take military service along with malignants and latitudinarians, and under a commander "whom they knew not, nor what he was for nor against," would be a sinful association.* A large minority, however, were of opinion that they might lawfully enlist in defence of the king and country at a time when war was raging in the land, and an invasion of a savage horde from Ireland was expected; but they stipulated for certain very unusual terms as the condition of their taking military service under the government. First of all they insisted that all their officers of every grade should be such as they could in conscience obey—such as had not served the enemy, nor persecuted the good cause, nor taken the test, nor any other sinful oath binding them to oppose the covenant—but such as had given proof of their fidelity, integrity, and affection to the cause of the Reformation, and were willing to sign the covenant; and secondly, they demanded that if a sufficient number of officers thus qualified could not be obtained, and it should be found necessary to employ any officer guilty of sinful compliances with the orders of the forfeited dynasty, he should make a public confession of his sins at the head of his regiment, and engage to submit to the censures of the Church. They farther stipulated that the great object of their taking up arms should be the furtherance of the covenant and the overthrow of popery, prelacy, and other systems of error; that they and their officers should co-operate in purifying the army from all sinful practices; and that until this end were accomplished every precaution should be taken to keep the covenanting regiment from the contamination of ungodly associates, "and to this effect that our officers endeavour to provide and procure that we go not out in promiscuous detachments with them, nor be mixed in encampments with the foresaid criminals."† By another stipulation, still more at variance with the usual military discipline, they demanded the choice of their officers, or at least a veto upon their appointment, as well as upon the admission of the new recruits who were to fill up any vacancies in their ranks. They were also to have the right to elect their own minister, as well as an elder, from each company, who were to form a "session," or ecclesiastical court, for the administration of their spiritual affairs. By the dextrous management of Cameronian regiment raised.

* Faithful Contendings, p. 393.

† Ibid., p. 395; Burton, vol. i. p. 48.

Sir Patrick Hume, the Cameronians were induced to substitute for these specific stipulations a general declaration that the object for which they engaged in the military service was "to resist popery, prelacy, and arbitrary power, and to recover and establish the work of reformation in Scotland in all the branches and steps thereof, till the government in Church and State be brought to that lustre and integrity which it had in the best times."

In this way was formed the celebrated Cameronian, or 26th Regiment, whose exploits have rendered the name famous in every quarter of the globe. Their first colonel was the young Earl of Angus, who fell fighting bravely at their head, at the bloody battle of Steinkirk, in 1692, where they fought with a desperate courage and stubbornness which nearly turned the fortunes of that fatal day. Their lieutenant-colonel and actual commander was the gallant William Cleland, who was killed in their first exploit—the successful defence of Dunkeld, which virtually extinguished the Jacobite rebellion. Their enlistment in the service of the government was from the outset mourned over by the majority of their body as "a sinful and scandalous association in war with the enemies of Christ both at home and abroad;" and it is probable that they soon ceased to receive any recruits from the stern presbyterians, whose name they bore. Their brethren, however, continued for a considerable period to hold correspondence with them; and from their letters it appears that, in spite of their zealous precautions, the example of military profligacy which they were compelled to witness began in the course of time to exercise its influence even upon this select regiment, and that some of their number lapsed into card-playing, dice, and other similar practices, to the great grief and perplexity of their chaplain, Alexander Shields a famous hill preacher.

Meanwhile, the Castle of Edinburgh surrendered on the 14th of June. That this fortress had held out so long was owing much less to the strength of the place than to the unskilfulness of the besiegers. Some batteries were, indeed, raised and trenches opened, but the Cameronians, who invested the castle, were entirely unacquainted with the method of attacking fortified places, and made little or no progress in the siege. On the other hand, it was the object of the Duke of Gordon, with his small garrison and ill-supplied magazine, merely to maintain his position until the issue of the Highland insurrection should be determined; he therefore contented himself with returning the fire of the attacking batteries, and carefully avoided doing any injury to the persons or property of the citizens. In the end the siege was turned into a mere blockade. For some time the Jacobites in the city contrived to convey occasional supplies to their friends within the citadel, but in the end the provisions of the garrison were completely exhausted, and they were compelled to surrender.

They readily received an indemnity for themselves and their friends who had aided them, and were allowed to march out with their arms and baggage.*

Dundee had now for some time been engaged in maturing his plans and making preparations for another campaign. About the middle of June he had begun to reassemble the clans, having fixed his head-quarters at Moy, the seat of the Mackintoshes, on the eastern border of Inverness. He had just received his commission of lieutenant-general from James, accompanied by a letter promising a liberal reward for his services out of the forfeited estates of King William's supporters. He was now anxiously expecting large reinforcements from Ireland; and intelligence was brought to him about this time that a body of Irish troops, under an officer named Cannon, had reached Mull. Dundee lost no time in proceeding to Inverlochy to make arrangements for their landing. To his great annoyance, he found that instead of an efficient force of five or six thousand men, as he had been led to expect, the succours which had been sent consisted only of about three hundred infantry, insufficiently armed and clothed, and badly disciplined. The arrival of this contemptible reinforcement, according to Balcarres, "did more harm than good;" and Mackay seems to have been of the same opinion. To add to the bitterness of Dundee's disappointment, the ships which conveyed the stores of this half-naked rabble lingered so long at Mull, that they had all been captured by some English cruisers.

While Dundee was thus busily engaged in mustering his forces, his opponent, Mackay, was occupied in filling up his three Dutch regiments, and in carefully training his recruits, to prepare them for the impending struggle. His departure from the capital was hastened by intelligence which at this juncture reached him from the estates of the Marquis of Athol. That fickle and treacherous nobleman was in a great strait as to the course he should follow. He had repeatedly joined and deserted both parties, and now, at this crisis of the civil war, on which the fate of his country depended, with characteristic pusillanimity and selfishness, he quitted Scotland, and under the pretence of ill-health took up his residence at Bath. His eldest son, Lord Murray, who was married to a daughter of the Duke of Hamilton, and was on bad terms with his father,† had declared for King William; but his earnestness in the cause was evidently doubted by Mackay, and not without reason. The retainers of Athol, perplexed by the doubtful character of their chief, were at a loss what course to follow. On the one hand, Stewart of Ballechin,

* Siege of the Castle of Edinburgh, printed for the Bannatyne Club in 1817.

† Mackay gives as his reason for originally trusting Lord James—"That for some years he had not lived on good understanding with the marquis, his father, of whom, at this time, the general had no favourable opinion."—Memoirs, p. 48.

the manager of the Athol estates, and the representative of the marquis, called upon them to declare for King James; while on the other, the eldest son of their chief demanded their allegiance in behalf of King William. The bewildered clans knew not which authority to obey. Their inclinations were generally on the Jacobite side; and Lord Murray frankly acknowledged to Mackay that he had no hope of inducing them to unite with the royal forces against Dundee; but he offered to proceed immediately to Athol for the purpose of taking possession of the Castle of Blair before the arrival of the viscount, and of collecting his father's vassals, so as to prevent them from joining the enemy. To this proposal Mackay gave a ready assent, and his lordship immediately set out for Athol, where he arrived about the beginning of July. He lost no time in summoning his father's retainers to arms, and about twelve hundred of them readily obeyed the call, though it soon became evident that their fidelity to the cause of the government could not be relied on. Lord Murray then demanded admission into the Castle of Blair, but met with a decided refusal from Stewart of Ballechin, who, both as the representative of the marquis, and by virtue of a commission from Dundee, held that important fortalice for King James.*

When Dundee returned from Inverlochry, about the middle of July, he received intelligence of Lord Murray's proceedings; and similar information reached Mackay about the same time. Both parties at once felt the importance of securing possession of Blair Castle, which, from its position, commanded in front the vale of the Garry, with the pass of Killiecrankie, through which alone the royal army could march into the district of Athol; while on the north it covered the narrow passes leading to the Spey and the Dee. Dundee immediately sent the fiery cross in all haste to summon his Highland allies to rejoin his standard, and, with a force of about three thousand men, began his march in the direction of Athol. Mackay hastened with equal promptitude toward the scene of conflict. His forces were somewhat superior in number to the Highland army,† but they consisted largely of fresh levies, who were peculiarly unfitted for the kind of warfare in which they were about to engage. On the 23rd of July he reached Perth, and there learned that Dundee was already marching through Badenoch, and that if the royal forces did not reach Athol before him, it would be impossible for Lord Murray to maintain his position, or even to prevent his retainers from joining the enemy. These tidings induced Mackay to hasten his march northward with all speed, although four troops of his dragoons and two of cavalry had not yet arrived. He states, as the grounds of this resolution, that if he had remained at Perth the Athol men, fifteen hundred in number, "as reputed men for arms as any in the kingdom," would have immediately joined Dundee; that the enemy would have had time to get up his expected reinforcements from the isles, to collect forces in Badenoch, Menteith, and Mar, and to obtain reinforcements of cavalry among the Jacobite gentry of Angus and the adjacent Lowlands; that he had advanced too far to retrace his steps with honour; and that, as his forces were superior in number to those of Dundee, if he had shown any backwardness to meet the enemy, "the ill-affected of the nation" would have been emboldened, and the loyal and peaceable discouraged. For these reasons, which undoubtedly had considerable weight, Mackay resolved to adhere to his original plan. He left Perth on the 26th of July, and on reaching Dunkeld that night he received an express from Lord Murray announcing that the object of his march northward was already frustrated; that Dundee had entered Athol; that Murray had judged it prudent to raise the blockade of Blair Castle, and retire to the southern extremity of the defile of Killiecrankie, with the three or four hundred men who still adhered to him. On the approach of the Jacobite clans his lordship's followers had exhibited unequivocal indications that they could not be relied on to fight in the cause of King William against their fellow mountaineers. Some of them had returned home under the plea that they must secure their cattle, and other valuable things, from the depredations of the enemy; while others, in spite of his remonstrances, had openly deserted in a body, having previously filled their bonnets with water from the brook of Banovy, near Blair, and drank a health to King James.*

Blair Castle. the middle of July, he received intelligence of Lord Murray's proceedings; and similar information reached Mackay about the same time. Both parties at once felt the importance of securing possession of Blair Castle, which, from its position, commanded in front the vale of the Garry, with the pass of Killiecrankie, through which alone the royal army could march into the district of Athol; while on the north it covered the narrow passes leading to the Spey and the Dee. Dundee immediately sent the fiery cross in all haste to summon his Highland allies to rejoin his standard, and, with a force of about three thousand men, began his march in the direction of Athol. Mackay hastened with equal promptitude toward the scene of conflict. His forces were somewhat superior in number to the Highland army,† but they consisted largely of fresh levies, who were peculiarly unfitted for the kind of warfare in which they were about to engage. On the 23rd of July he reached Perth, and there learned that Dundee was already marching through Badenoch, and that if the royal forces did not reach

* Dundee had previously written successive letters to Lord Murray, calling upon him to hold his paternal mansion for "the king," in a tone which implied that he had reason to believe that the command would be obeyed, but his lordship sent these letters to Lord Melville. After Dundee had issued his commission to Stewart to hold the castle, he wrote to Lord Murray claiming credit for the step he had taken in thus relieving his lordship from the painful dilemma of either refusing to give up the castle or appearing to side with the "rebels,"—meaning the government. † They seem to have amounted to a little above three thousand men, while Dundee's army numbered two thousand five hundred.

Notwithstanding this discouraging intelligence, Mackay still determined to persevere in his march; and putting his army in motion next morning (27th) at daybreak, he proceeded in the direction of Killiecrankie. On approaching the pass he met his ally, Lord James Murray, with the remnant of his retainers, and was assured by him that he had left a sufficient force to occupy and secure the defile. But when Mackay's advanced guard reached the pass they could find no traces of these Athol men, who, it afterwards appeared, had concealed themselves among the neighbouring rocks and thickets, in the hope of obtaining a rich booty by plundering the fugitives and the slain in the impending battle.

The character of the ground over which the royal forces now marched exercised an important influence both on the nature of the conflict, and on its results. At this spot the rapid river Killiecrankie. Garry forces its way through the range of mountains in front by a narrow and rugged defile, which forms the only passage from the low country to the mountainous district above. The only road was a steep and narrow path, which barely afforded room for two men to walk abreast. It was much lower than the present broad and smooth highway, and ran along by the base of the rocks, having on the one hand a succession of steep precipices, with here and there scrubby patches of oak and birch; and on the other, the furious river raging along its deep and rocky bed, and tumbling over huge stones into deep pools of inky blackness, so overhung with natural wood as to be almost invisible. Along this perilous path the royal forces moved slowly, and with difficulty, for the baggage horses had to be led up one by one, and even the infantry could mount only by twos and threes at a time. On emerging from the pass they found a haugh or small alluvial plain, on which they formed and rested, while their general proceeded to survey the ground. Directly in front of the narrow strip of meadow, on which the royal army now lay, was an abrupt knoll covered with shrubs and trees, of which a few still remain. Mackay perceived at a glance that if the enemy were to occupy this ascent they would easily force his troops, as he expressed it, "with confusion over the river." He, therefore, at once "made every battalion form by a 'quart de conversion' to the right upon the ground where they stood,"* and then marched them in succession straight up the woody eminence. On the north of this new position there lay a piece of level ground, which gradually ascended to the height of about six or eight hundred feet immediately above the house of Urrard—a small mansion surrounded by a garden. Along the summit of this eminence, which was less than a mile distant from Mackay's position, the Highlanders were already ranging themselves. As soon as the general perceived their approach, he proceeded to arrange his men on the plain which intervened between them and the enemy. He drew them up in one line three deep, without any reserve, dividing each battalion into two parts, and leaving a small distance between each division. In the centre, between the two wings, there was a considerable interval, caused by a piece of marshy ground, behind which Mackay placed the two troops of horse, in order that they might not be exposed to the charge of Dundee's veteran cavalry, which these raw levies would not be able to resist, and that they might attack the Highlanders in flank after the fire of the line had been spent. On the right he placed Leven's regiment, which had been lately raised on the Borders, and is still styled the King's Own Borderers; and on the left, the Scotch Fusiliers, now the twenty-first regiment of the line. The left wing was committed to the charge of Brigadier Balfour. Mackay's artillery consisted of only three small leathern guns, which proved of very little use.

Let us now turn to the operations of his opponent. When Dundee reached the Castle of Blair, on the morning of Saturday, the 27th of July, he learned that the royal forces had reached the pass of Killiecrankie. A council of war was immediately held. The regular officers strongly recommended that the enemy should not be allowed to pass the defile, and that a battle should be avoided until the arrival of the reinforcements which were expected to come up in the course of two or three days. The Highland chiefs, on the other hand, were clamorous for an immediate engagement. Lochiel, especially, urged that victory was certain if an attack were made while the mountaineers were eager for the conflict and confident of success, while, if they were kept on the defensive, they would speedily disperse and return to their homes.† Dundee at once resolved to adopt the advice of his sagacious ally, and he pointed out to the council that by allowing Mackay to advance through the pass without hindrance, they would gain the advantage of fighting him on open ground before he was joined by his English cavalry, of whom the Highlanders stood in great dread.‡ Besides, if, as he confidently expected, the enemy should sustain a defeat in this position, his army would be destroyed, as his retreat would be completely cut off. These cogent reasons silenced opposition, and the council broke up with the unanimous resolution to fight.

Having made himself acquainted with the nature of the ground in the neighbourhood of Killiecrankie, Dundee resolved to make a détour round the hill on which the Castle of Lude stands, and to attack the royal forces as soon as they emerged from the defile. Advancing rapidly from Blair Castle along the present line of road till he reached the Tilt, he turned off to the east round the back of the hill, and crossing that river near its confluence with a rivulet called Ald-Chluan, he took up his position on the slope of the hill which overlooked the plain occupied by Mackay's army. He immediately drew up his men in battle array. Each clan, large or small, formed a separate battalion. On the right were the clansmen of Sir John Maclean; on the left were another body of Macleans, with the retainers of Macdonald of Sleat. In the centre were stationed the Irish regiment under Cannon, the Macdonalds of Glengarry and Clanranald, the Camerons, and a small body of cavalry, commanded by a gentleman named Sir William Wallace, who had that morning, to the great displeasure of the other officers, produced a commission from James superseding their former commander, the Earl of Dunfermline. The object of Dundee in making this arrangement was, by a

* Memoirs of Sir Ewen Cameron.

† Balcanquhall, p. 69.

‡ Dalrymple's Mem., vol. i. part ii. p. 56.

* Mackay's Memoirs, p. 61.

THE PASS OF KILLIECRANKIE.

Looking down.

THE FIELD OF KILLIECRANKIE.

W. B. B. 1842

W. B. B. 1842

furious charge of the Highlanders in columns, to cut through in several places at once the extended line of the royal forces, and thus to throw them into irremediable confusion. Mackay, though an experienced officer, and a cool and brave man, had misgivings as to the result of the impending conflict. The mountaineers had the advantage of the ground, and could attack or retire at pleasure, and had a secure refuge in the mountains in the event of a defeat;* while he, on the other hand, could not without the utmost peril either attack them on the hill, or quit his own position. To have attempted a retreat through the pass in the presence of an enemy on the surrounding heights would have been certain destruction; while to have crossed the river, as he at first thought of doing, would have not only exposed him to an attack in flank while engaged in the movement, but, even if it had been safely accomplished, his position would not have been improved, as the Highlanders, who moved with much greater celerity than his heavy-armed troops, would have crossed the river higher up, and have taken up a new position on the heights above him. He resolved, therefore, at all hazards to remain in his present position, "though with impatience," as he remarks, till the enemy should either attack him or retire.

The hostile armies had now faced each other for more than two hours. It was within half-an hour of sunset when the Highlanders were ordered to prepare for action. In spite of the prudent remonstrance of Lochiel, Dundee resolved to lead the charge in person, in order, as he alleged, to gain the confidence of his men by exhibiting a conspicuous example of courage. He took the precaution, however, to exchange the scarlet cassock and bright cuirass which he had worn during the day for a dark-coloured buff-coat, in order to render his person less distinguishable. The signal to charge was now given. The Highlanders raised a great shout, which resounded far and loud from the hills around, while the royal forces, discouraged by the position in which they were placed, and probably exhausted by fatigue, returned a dull and spiritless cheer—a circumstance which did not escape the notice of Lochiel, who immediately interpreted it as an omen of victory. The mountaineers stripped themselves to their shirts and doublets, and advanced down the hill firing their pieces. The right wing of the royal army returned the fire briskly, and did considerable execution, especially among the MacDonalds of Glengarry. Continuing to advance, however, till they were close upon the hostile ranks, the clansmen suddenly threw down their guns, drew their broadswords, and, with a dreadful yell, rushed upon the enemy before they had time to screw on their bayonets to the end of their muskets.* The charge was like a torrent—fierce, rapid, and irresistible. The weight of the columns and the fury of the onset at once broke through the ranks of their royal army. opponents, who had no means of defence against the tremendous strokes of the double-edged Highland broadswords. A general panic seized the royal troops, who, according to their own general, "behaved, with the exception of Hasting's and Leven's regiments, like the vilest cowards in nature," and fled down the valley in irretrievable disorder.

At the commencement of the battle, Dundee put himself at the head of his small troop of cavalry, and rode towards the enemy. Owing to some misapprehension, however, the men did not advance, and Dundee, on looking back, perceived their hesitation, and, rising in his stirrups, waved his hat to invite them to follow him. As he raised his arm a musket-ball struck him under the Death armpit on the right side, and in of Dundee. inflicted a mortal wound. A soldier named Johnston caught him as he fell from his horse. The dying man asked how the day went. "Well for the king," was the answer, "but I am sorry for your lordship."—"Since the day goes well for my master," replied Dundee, "it is less matter for me." These were his last words. A short time after some of his friends, on reaching the spot, found him just breathing his last, and endeavoured to remove him, but were driven off by the fire of Leven's regiment, which still remained on the field. His body was subsequently stripped by some of his own followers, and left naked on the spot where he fell. In this state it was found after the battle was over, and, wrapped in two plaids, was carried to the Castle of Blair.† A short time afterwards, it was buried in the church of Blair Athol; but no monument marks the spot where his ashes rest, and the church itself has long ago disappeared. A certain class of writers have mourned Dundee as "the last of the Scots, the last of the Grahams, and the last of all that was great in his native country," and have sought to emblazon his character with the colourings of poetry and romance, but the memory of this cruel and rapacious tool of tyranny, in spite of his courage and ability as a soldier, will continue to be held in merited abhorrence by the people of Scotland to the latest generation.

* The process of fixing the bayonet was at this time tedious and awkward. In consequence of his defeat at Killiecrankie, Mackay invented the present plan, which renders the musket available as a pike—one of the greatest improvements in modern warfare. He says, "All our officers and soldiers were strangers to the Highlanders' way of fighting, which mainly occasioned the consternation they were in. Having taken notice on this occasion that the Highlanders are of such a quick motion that if a battalion keep up firing till they be near, to make sure of them they rush upon it before one man can come to their second defence, which is with the bayonet, the general, to remedy this for the future, invented the way to fasten the bayonet to the muzzle on the outside by two rings, that the soldiers might safely keep up their fire till they pour it into the enemy's hearts, and then have no other motion to make but to push it, as with a pike."

† Balcarres' Memoirs, p. 108; MS. note on do., in Library of Christchurch, Oxford; Memoirs of Sir Ewen Cameron; Acts of Parl., 1690; Appendix, pp. 56—58. McPherson printed a speech of Dundee to his troops before the battle, and a letter from him to James, dated the day after. Both documents are spurious. Balcarres states that on the spot where Dundee was stripped there was found next day a bundle of papers, among which was a letter from Melfort, explaining "that notwithstanding what was promised in his majesty's declaration, indemnity and indulgence, yet he had couched his words so that the king could elude them where he pleased, nor would think himself obliged to stand to them."

* "Dundee had his back to a very high hill, which is the ordinary maxim of Highlanders, who never fight against regular forces upon anything of equal terms without a sure retreat at their back, particularly if their enemies are provided with horse."—Mackay's Memoirs, p. 51.

The victory of the Highlanders was most complete. The baggage, cannon, and stores of the defeated army fell into their hands. About two thousand of the royal forces were slain or taken prisoners. Among those who fell was Mackay's own brother, who was killed by a stroke from a claymore while gallantly exerting himself to rally his broken troops, and Brigadier Balfour, who, according to tradition, was cut down by a Roman Catholic priest named Stewart, brother of the governor of Blair Castle. It is stated in the Jacobite accounts of the battle, that the most terrific blows were struck by the Highland broadswords: heads were cleft down to the throat, skulls were cut off just above the ears; both the bodies and the cross-belts of some of the slain were found to have been cut through at one blow, and pikes and small swords were severed like willows.* The victors lost about nine hundred men, including the brother and son of Glengarry, Haliburton of Pitcur, and various other chiefs and gentlemen of note.

It is probable that but for the coolness and intrepidity of Mackay scarcely a man of the royal army would have escaped. As soon as he perceived Dundee's method of attack, he hastened to charge the Highlanders in flank with the cavalry, in the hope that the day might still be retrieved; and he himself led Belhaven's troop round his left wing to assail the enemy on their right flank, while he ordered Annandale's troop to attack them on the left. But the horse were panic-stricken by the sudden rout of the infantry, and, after some confused firing, took to flight, and rushed wildly down the pass. Accompanied by one faithful servant, whose horse was shot under him, Mackay spurred through the thickest of the enemy, but not a single horseman attempted to follow their general. On turning round to observe the state of matters, Mackay found, to his great surprise, that both armies had disappeared. "In the twinkling of an eye," he says, "our men, as well as the enemy, were out of sight, having gone down pell-mell to the river, where the baggage stood." A part of the Earl of Leven's regiment, however, still kept its ground, together with Hasting's infantry, who had repulsed the enemy immediately opposed to them. Putting himself at the head of these men, and accompanied by his nephew,—who, though he had received eight wounds, was still able to ride his horse,—and by Lords Leven, Belhaven, and a few other officers, Mackay marched deliberately down the hill, and crossed the Garry without molestation from the enemy, who were too busily engaged in plundering the baggage of the defeated army to waste a thought on completing their victory.* The situation of the unfortunate general was embarrassing in the extreme. He had with him only about four hundred men, the wreck of a beaten and disorganised army; a victorious enemy had already secured his direct line of retreat; he was ignorant of the country, surrounded by a hostile population, and must have been well aware that if an immediate attack had been made upon his handful of bewildered and disheartened followers, they would have been cut off to a man. But Mackay's courage was sustained by fervent piety —his coolness and a strong sense of duty, and in and presence the midst of his humiliating defeat of mind—and domestic sufferings, he "bated not a jot of heart or hope," but set himself with the greatest coolness and deliberation to extricate his men from their perilous position. His officers recommended a retreat through the pass of Killiecrankie; but rejecting this advice, which would have led to inevitable destruction, the general resolved to strike across the hills towards Strath Tay, and thence to Stirling. He is said to have expressed his conviction that Dundee must have fallen, otherwise he would not have been allowed to leave the field unmolested. Proceeding westward along the bank of the Garry, about two miles from the field of battle, Mackay overtook a party of about a hundred and fifty unarmed fugitives, belonging to Ramsay's regiment. He then continued his march along the edge of a rivulet which falls into the Garry, till he reached a Highland hut. Here he obtained some information from the inmates respecting the country, and by the help of a pocket map was able to find his route over the mountains which separate the Garry and Tummel from the Tay. When daylight broke, it became evident that the news of his defeat had everywhere preceded him. The inhabitants all along the route were in a state of great excitement, and were preparing to join the victorious army. The people of Strath Tay, on the approach of the fugitives, hastily gathered together and set up a loud shout, which so terrified Ramsay's men that a number of them, imagining that their dreaded adversaries were at hand, fled to the hills, where they were killed and stripped by the country people. The remainder of these terror-stricken runaways would have followed their example, but for the promptitude of Mackay and his officers, who, presenting their pistols, threatened to blow out the brains of any man who should attempt to desert.†

Early in the morning the weary fugitives reached Weems Castle, the seat of the —his retreat chief of clan Menzies, whose son to Stirling. had fought on the royal side at Killiecrankie, at the head of a company of his retainers. Here Mackay and his men obtained some refreshment, of which they stood greatly in need, having since the preceding morning marched forty miles through a broken and desolate country. After a brief interval of repose they resumed their march, and late at night arrived at Castle Drummond, which was held for the government by a small garrison. Next day (July 29th) they reached Stirling in safety.*

* In a conversation between General Wade and an old Highlander who had fought at Killiecrankie, the latter called Mackay a great fool because he did not put his baggage in front of his army. If this had been done, said the old man, Mackay would have gained the battle, as the Highlanders would first have attacked the baggage, and would thus have fallen an easy prey to their enemies.

† Mackay's Memoirs, p. 61.

The tidings of the defeat of the royal forces at Killiecrankie reached Edinburgh the day after the battle, and excited the greatest consternation among the adherents of the government. In the absence of official details or authentic information, the disaster was greatly exaggerated. It was reported that Mackay had been killed, and his whole army destroyed; that Dundee was already master of the entire country beyond the Forth, and was advancing by rapid marches to take possession of the capital. A meeting of the privy-council was immediately held, at which orders were issued to raise all the fencible men in the west, and to concentrate all the troops in Scotland at Stirling for the purpose of defending the passage of the Forth. Some of the members of parliament were so much alarmed that they proposed to transfer the seat of government to Glasgow, or to retire for safety into England. Some recommended that the state prisoners should be set at liberty, others advised that they should be sent on board a man-of-war which lay off Leith. Balcanes says that he and his friends, who were confined in the castle and the Tolbooth, received numerous visits from their enemies, making excuses for their past conduct, and protesting they had always wished them well. An express was sent to urge Lanier's regiment, which lay at Alnwick and Morpeth, to hasten down to Scotland; and earnest entreaties were addressed to the king that every soldier who could be spared should instantly be dispatched to the seat of war. During two days this ferment continued, but on the third intelligence was received of the death of Dundee, which was hailed with the greatest joy by the friends of the government, and seems to have been regarded both in Edinburgh and London as a complete set-off against the defeat of the royal army, and as an irreparable blow to the cause of the exiled monarch.

At first, indeed, it seemed as if the blow was little felt. The Highland army rapidly increased in number. The Increase of the Highland army. Stewarts of Appin, the Macphersons, Farquharsons, and Frasers, attracted by the love of war or of plunder, flocked to the rebel camp at Blair. The Athol men, who, though they had no part in the honour of the victory at Killiecrankie, had obtained a large share of the booty, now hastened to join the stronger side; and ere long Cannon, who, as the officer next in rank, had succeeded to the command, found himself at the head of an army nearly double in number to that which had been commanded by Dundee. But it speedily became apparent to all that the new general was utterly unfit for his difficult position. He was a stranger to the character and the manners of the Highlanders, as well as to their peculiar mode of warfare, and destitute both of the abilities and the military experience indispensably necessary to secure their respect and obedience: by his timidity and indecision he allowed time to the government to recover from their panic, and to adopt measures which speedily neutralised the victory gained by his predecessor.

The ministers of the crown, in their consternation at the defeat of the royal army, had at first proposed to abandon all the country north of the Forth to the victorious mountaineers. But this injudicious and pusillanimous step met with the strong disapprobation of Mackay, and was given up in consequence of his remonstrances.

Collecting with the utmost celerity all the forces that were at hand, together with the remains of his routed army, he determined to take the field at once, and to prevent the descent of the enemy into the low country. He quitted Stirling on Wednesday, the 31st of July, only four days after his defeat, at the head of a body of dragoons, and advanced towards Perth, where he intended to place a garrison. On approaching the town, he learned that Cannon had dispatched a body of his men for the purpose of carrying off some provisions which the council had sent to Perth for the use of the royal troops, and resolved instantly to attack them. The Highlanders, who had no idea that there was any enemy nearer than Stirling, were completely taken by surprise, and fled in the utmost confusion. A hundred and twenty of them were killed, and thirty taken prisoners, while Mackay lost only a single soldier.

This casual rencounter had an astonishing effect in reviving the courage and expectations of the supporters of the government, while it proportionally damped the hopes of the Jacobites.

Dissensions soon broke out in the camp of the Highlanders, which their general was utterly unable to repress. He seems to have been quite at a loss what course to pursue; and after lingering some days at Dunkeld, he raised his camp and marched northward, apparently with no distinct object, along the slopes of the Grampians to Braemar, closely followed by Mackay, who moved on in a parallel line on the plain. He then proceeded towards Strathbogie, and at the Castle of Auchindown he called a council of war to consider the expediency of giving battle to the enemy, who was only six miles distant. But before the council could proceed to business, a preliminary question was raised as to the right of the Lowland and Irish officers to give an opinion or a vote on this matter. The Highland chiefs contended that as these Inefficiency of Cannon, the new commander.

Prompt and judicious conduct of Mackay—

—he defeats a body of Highlanders.

Dissensions among the Highlanders.

* Mackay's Memoirs; Memoirs of Lochiel; Melville Papers, p. 203, et seq.; McPherson Papers, vol. i.

officers, though holding King James's commission, had no troops under their command, and were wholly unacquainted with the discipline and habits of the Highlanders, of whom the army was almost exclusively composed, they were incompetent to form a correct opinion on the question which the council was called upon to discuss, and were not entitled to be consulted on the subject. But Cannon, by the advice of the Earl of Dunfermline, overruled the objections of the chiefs, to their great displeasure, and decided that the votes of the Lowland officers should be received.

The council then proceeded to consider whether a battle should be hazarded. The chieftains were eager for fighting, and urged that unless this course were adapted the clans would speedily disperse to their homes. But their advice was disregarded, and the majority of the council resolved to return to Athol. This decision excited great dissatisfaction among the Highlanders. Lochiel quitted the camp in disgust, and retired to Lochaber; and Macdonald of Sleat, the most powerful of the confederate chiefs, followed his example, and returned to Skye.

The march of the Highland army towards Athol was caused by a most injudicious step on the part of the Scottish privy-council, who had in various ways interfered with and thwarted Mackay's plans. For some reason or other, which does not appear, they had thought fit to order the Cameronian regiment to garrison Dunkeld, in spite of the remonstrances of Mackay, who in vain pointed out the danger of stationing in an open town, commanded on all sides by hills, and in the midst of a hostile population, at a distance from all aid, a body of men so "generally hated and feared in the northern counties." No sooner had the Cameronians taken up the position assigned them, than, as Mackay had foretold, a plan was formed to cut them off. Notice was immediately sent to Cannon by some of the Atholmen, and he was urged to lose no time in striking a decisive blow at the obnoxious covenanters. On receiving this intelligence, the Highlanders broke up their camp in Strathbogie, and marched southward with all haste.

On the morning after the arrival of the Cameronians at Dunkeld (August 18), —their perilous position— small parties of country people appeared on the neighbouring hills, and the regiment, about twelve hundred strong, apprehensive of an attack, began to intrench themselves in the enclosures around the Marquis of Athol's house at Dunkeld, and took possession of the massive old cathedral tower. In the course of the afternoon, a body of about three hundred men drew up on a hill to the north of the town, and sent the following message to Colonel Cleland, who commanded the Cameronian regiment: "We, the gentlemen assembled, being informed that ye intend to burn the town, desire to know whether ye come for peace or war, and do certify you, that if ye burn any house we will destroy you." To this communication Cleland immediately replied, "We are faithful subjects to King William and Queen Mary, and enemies to their enemies; and if you who send these threats shall make any hostile appearance, we will burn all that belongs to you, and otherwise destroy you as you deserve." On Monday two troops of horse and three of dragoons under Lord Cardross, were sent up from Perth to the assistance of the garrison; but on the evening of Tuesday, the 20th of August, they were recalled by Colonel Ramsay, from an absurd notion that they could be of little use in defending the position occupied by the Cameronians. The latter imagining, not unnaturally, that they were betrayed and perfidiously abandoned to destruction, remonstrated with their gallant commander, and hinted that their officers, who were provided with horses, might easily save themselves by flight, while the common soldiers had no means of escape. Cleland declared his resolution, and that of his officers, to stand by his men to the last, and instantly ordered all the horses to be brought out and shot. This declaration produced an immediate reaction in the minds of the soldiers. They refused to allow the horses to be destroyed, and assured their intrepid leader that they would defend themselves to the last extremity.

Next morning (August 21) the Highland army, amounting to between four and five thousand men, appeared in battle array on the hills around Dunkeld. They rushed furiously down upon the Cameronians, drove in their outposts, and entered the town at four different points at once. The defenders, however, resolutely maintained their ground within the church-yard and the old cathedral, and behind a wall which surrounded the Marquis of Athol's house. The assailants took possession of the neighbouring houses, from which they kept up a galling fire upon the Cameronians. Within an hour after the engagement commenced, the gallant Cleland, while encouraging his men to stand firm, fell mortally wounded by two bullets, which pierced one his head, and the other his liver, at the same moment.* Henderson, the major of the regiment, immediately after shared the same fate; but the place of these officers was well supplied by Captain Munro, on whom the command now devolved, and the battle continued to rage for three hours with undiminished fury. A party of the Cameronians, annoyed by the fire from the houses, sallied out for the purpose of dislodging the assailants, which they accomplished in a manner as daring as it was effective, by setting fire to the buildings by means of blazing fagots affixed to the points of their pikes. In a short time the whole town was in a blaze. The Cameronians had locked the doors of some of the houses in which the Highlanders were posted, and the piercing shrieks of the unfortunate sufferers who were perishing in the flames added new horror to the scene. No less than sixteen of the assailants were burned to death in one dwelling, and, with the exception of three houses held by the Cameronians, the whole town was consumed.

* Cleland, though a zealous Cameronian, was possessed of respectable literary and scientific attainments. He is the author of a number of hymns and satires, and other poems, which display considerable vigour of mind. He fought at Bothwell Bridge when he was only sixteen years of age, and was in his twenty-sixth year at the time of his death.

This desperate conflict, which began at seven o'clock, had now lasted till eleven. The bullets of the Cameronians had some time before been all expended, and they had been reduced to the necessity of stripping the lead from the roof of the marquis's house and forming it into slugs. Their powder now began to fail, and they were revolving the desperate project of retiring into Dunkeld House, and defending it with sword and pike to the last extremity, and burning it over their heads rather than yield. At this critical moment the fury of the attack began to slacken. The ammunition of the assailants also was all spent.* In spite of their immense superiority in numbers, they had failed to make any impression upon their indomitable adversaries, whose courage was sustained by a principle of which the Highlanders knew nothing.

Repulse of the Highlanders. The latter could no longer maintain themselves among the smoking ruins of the town, and believing the struggle to be hopeless they began to retire to the hills, and in spite of the urgent remonstrances of their general, were soon in full retreat towards Blair, leaving three hundred of their fellow clansmen dead on the spot. They were ready, they declared to Cannon, to fight with men, but they would not again encounter devils.† The victorious Cameronians threw their caps into the air with a loud shout; and to show their gratitude to God for "so miraculous a victory," they spent a considerable part of the afternoon in singing psalms of thanksgiving and triumph.‡

The mortifying repulse which the Highlanders

The Highland army break up. measure of their dissatisfaction with their incompetent commander. Victory and defeat were alike fatal to their long continuance in the field; and, according to their custom, they now deserted by hundreds. On reaching Blair, the chiefs signed a bond of association, promising to support the cause of King James, and to meet again on a future day.§ They then dispersed, and returned each to his own home, leaving the Irish and Lowland officers to shift for themselves. Cannon retired to the Isle of Mull, and took up his residence with the chief of the Macleans. Thus, in spite of the brilliant victory gained by his adherents at the commencement of the campaign, its results were most unfavourable to the cause of James. In no part of the country were his supporters able to keep the field. The Castle of Blair fell into the hands of the government without a blow. Finlarig Castle, at the head of Loch Tay, also received a royal garrison; and Mackay was at length enabled to carry into execution his long-cherished project, of establishing a chain of military posts to keep the Highlanders in check.

After the defeat at Dunkeld, the Highland chiefs represented to the exiled monarch the precarious state of his affairs in Scotland, and earnestly solicited from him a supply of money and arms to enable them to continue the war. Very little attention, however, was paid to their demands; but in the spring of 1690 a vessel was sent from Ireland with a small supply of provisions, ammunition, and money, accompanied by Major-general Buchan, who bore a commission appointing him commander-in-chief of all the Jacobite forces in Scotland. Cannon was nominated second in command. The new general, however, proved as inefficient, and as ignorant of Highland tactics, as his predecessor. On his arrival, a meeting of the chiefs was held at Keppoch, to deliberate upon the course they should pursue. Many of them were exceedingly averse to the renewal of hostilities, and but for the influence of Lochiel the cause of James would have been abandoned in despair. He had adhered, he said, to the cause of Charles II. at a time when it was more hopeless than that of his royal brother now was, and for his own part he would neither listen to terms from the government, nor lay down his arms, without an express order from King James. In consequence of the urgent remonstrance of this brave and powerful adviser, the assembled chieftains resolved that before the end of summer they would muster their clans and renew the war. In the meantime, a body of about twelve hundred men were placed at the disposal of Buchan, in order that he might employ the interval in beating up the enemy's quarters along the borders of the Lowlands, and keeping them in a state of constant alarm.

With this view the Jacobite general marched down Strathspey, and, with singular want of judgment and caution, encamped, on the 30th of April, on a haugh or level plain, called Cromdale, on the right bank of the river, a short distance below Grantown, a spot where troops like the Highlanders are most open to attack, and least capable of making a successful resistance. Information of Buchan's having taken the field had been sent by Mackay to Sir Thomas Livingston, an able and experienced officer, whom he had stationed at Inverness with his regiment, to watch the proceedings of the Highlanders. At the head of a select body of twelve hundred men, including about four hundred Highlanders, chiefly of the clan Grant, and several troops of cavalry and dragoons, Livingston immediately marched in search of the enemy; and Arrival of General Buchan.

The chiefs resolve to renew the war.

Incompetency of Buchan—

* Balcarres' Memoirs.

† Life and Diary of Colonel Blackadder.

‡ Ibid.; Exact Narrative of the Conflict at Dunkeld between the Earl of Angus's regiment and the rebels, &c.

§ Records of parliament.

on arriving within eight miles of Strathspey, he received notice from the captain of Castle Grant of the position they had taken up. He resolved at once to avail himself of the favourable opportunity to attack them, while they were reposing in fancied security, "just," says Mackay, "as if they had been led thither by the hand as an ox to the slaughter." Under cover of night, and guided by a gentleman of the name of Grant, Livingston's forces marched down a defile called Auchinarrow to the bank of the river. Here he found a ford guarded by a small body of Highlanders, and leaving a detachment of his men to distract their attention, he crossed the river, about daybreak, with the remaining body by another ford, which was unprotected. The slumbering mountaineers started from sleep in great confusion on finding the dragoons galloping through their encampment, and with the instinct of their race instantly —his total fled for refuge to the hills. A defeat. number of them, on finding their retreat cut off by the cavalry, turned on their pursuers, and defended themselves with great bravery, but with little effect. Buchan ran away bareheaded, and without his coat and sword. Cannon escaped in his shirt. The royalists, according to Mackay, did not lose one man, while three hundred of the Jacobites were killed and a hundred taken. The remainder escaped under cover of a thick mist, which, as frequently happens in the Highlands at dawn, covered the summits of the mountains, while all was clear below.*

This ignominious defeat, together with the dis-

Dispersion of astrous result of the Irish campaign, satisfied the Jacobite chiefs that it was impossible any longer to continue the war in the Highlands, and a number of them hastened to make terms with the government. Buchan and a few of his officers took refuge with Glengarry, while Cannon with the remainder retired to the western isles. Mackay was at length enabled to carry into effect his sagacious plan for the pacification of the Highlands, by the erection of a fortress in a central district of the country. The spot selected was Inverlochy, where a fort had been erected by Cromwell, which commanded both the passage along the chain of lakes that now form the Caledonian Canal, and the communication by sea with the western isles and with Ireland. Accordingly, on the 15th of May, some ships were sent thither from Greenock, under Major Ferguson, while on the 18th of June Mackay himself quitted Perth at the head of about three thousand men, and marched into Lochaber without meeting

Erection of any resistance. The work commenced on the 5th of July, and in a few days the erection of the fort was completed. It was protected by palisades and a fosse, and armed with some demi-culverins from one of the ships of war, and received the name of Fort William in honour of the king. Mackay then took his departure for the south on the 18th, leaving a garrison of a thousand men in the new stronghold, under the command of an officer named Hill.

We must now return to the proceedings of Montgomery and the other unprincipled Proceedings of and factious leaders of the Club. the Club.

The public morality of the Scottish statesmen at this period was of the lowest kind, and the situation of the country in the midst of these base and selfish contests was calculated to inspire the gravest apprehensions. The conduct of both parties was regarded by the honest and upright Mackay with profound disgust. He saw parliament and the council divided into hostile factions, utterly neglecting the public welfare in their selfish struggles for office and power; the nobility discontented; the people oppressed; the army unpaid, disorderly, and mutinous; the "Church divided into two more irreconcilable factions, though both calling themselves Protestants, than Rome and Geneva;" matters which the first reformers regarded as of the most trivial character preferred by the "religious zealots" among the extreme presbyterians to the wellbeing of the Protestant faith; and the episcopal ministers preaching "King James more than Christ, as they had been accustomed to take passive obedience more than the gospel for their text." No wonder that a man of an honourable yet conciliating disposition, like Mackay, should in these circumstances come to "look upon Scotsmen of those times in general as void of zeal for their religion, and of natural affection, seeing all men hunt after their particular advantages, and none minding sincerely and self-deniedly the common good."*

It is well known that William himself shared largely in these sentiments. On one occasion, when disgusted by the factious proceedings of the Club, and the perfidy and shameless greed of the commissioner, he was provoked into exclaiming, "I wish to heaven that Scotland were a thousand miles off, and that the Duke of Hamilton were king of it; then I should be rid of them both!"

Some weeks after the close of the session of parliament, the dominant party Remonstrance prepared a "humble representation" to the king, complaining presented to the king. bitterly of the course followed by the government; and accusing William himself of evading the Claim of Right, and of selecting his ministers from among the former oppressors of the country. Montgomery, with his two principal associates, Lords Ross and Annandale, went to London in opposition to his majesty's injunctions, and on the 15th of October presented this remonstrance to the king in person. The marked displeasure with which they were received convinced them that they had no hope of regaining the royal confidence or favour. Irritated by disappointed ambition and poverty, Montgomery resolved to transfer his services to the king whom he had helped to banish; and in conjunction with Ferguson, the notorious plotter, and Neville Payne, a well-known Jacobite agent, he entered into a plot for the overthrow of the government, and the restoration of the exiled monarch.* His two associates, Annandale and Ross, who were actuated by the same base and selfish motives, readily entered into the conspiracy. They did not conceal that the objects they had in view were purely mercenary. As Annandale afterwards confessed, Montgomery came and "proposed to him that since there was no hope of doing anything with the king, we ought to apply ourselves to King James, who was our lawful prince, and who no doubt would give us what preferments and employments we pleased."† Negotiations were immediately entered into with the Jacobites, and arrangements were made for a combined attack upon the government. A correspondence was opened with James, who as we shall see readily accepted the offers of the conspirators, and conceded the whole of their demands; and Montgomery received from the Jacobites in London a considerable sum of money, which James's queen had transmitted to England to assist in carrying out the plot.‡

* Balcarres, pp. 89, 93; Livingston's Report, May 1. This defeat is commemorated by "The Haughs of Cromdale," one of the few beautiful Scotch airs associated with the victories of the whigs.

* Mackay's Memoirs, p. 77.

On reaching Edinburgh, Montgomery, along with his two noble accomplices, proceeded to form a coalition with the leaders of the Jacobite party, and to concert measures for the overthrow of the government. The plan they agreed upon was to propose to the Estates the adoption of certain extreme measures, with which they felt assured that William would never comply, and to refuse to grant any supplies until their demands were satisfied. They expected that in the end the king would dissolve the parliament in disgust, while in the meantime the army would necessarily be disbanded, owing to the want of money. The government would thus be left to the mercy of their enemies, and the exiled monarch might without difficulty be reinstated by an insurrection of the Highland clans, aided by a descent from Ireland. In order to secure this, however, it was necessary for the conspirators to strengthen their majority in parliament; and for this purpose the Jacobites were urged to return to their seats, and to take the oaths of allegiance to William and Mary. A few of them felt some scruples about swearing fidelity to a sovereign whom they were conspiring to dethrone, and others who had no such scruples about the matter were afraid that they might give offence to James by pledging their faith to William. Balcarras Perjury of the admits "that to take an oath of Jacobites.

allegiance to an usurper, to join with their mortal enemies, and to comply with them in things which had always been against their own principles, were so hard to get over, that some had great difficulty to overcome them, nor ever could any have done it, but for the great desire they had to be instruments in the restoration of James and the ruin of his enemies."* It was alleged by those who were supposed to be in the confidence of the exiled monarch, that he wished his friends to take the oath of allegiance; and, accordingly, when the parliament opened, nearly the whole of the Jacobite leaders covered themselves with infamy by vowing fealty to the sovereign for the express purpose of betraying him. The Duke of Hamilton, who had deservedly forfeited the confidence of William, was superseded as commissioner by Lord Melville. The king had determined to open Meeting of the Scottish parliament in person, parliament.

but the urgency of affairs in Ireland compelled him to lay aside his intentions, and to proceed at once to that country. Melville came down to Scotland armed with the most ample authority, and opened the parliament on the 15th of April, 1690, but the dispatch of business did not commence till the 25th. During the first days of the session the commissioner was so diffident of his strength, and so afraid of the issue, that he had almost determined to dissolve the parliament, but it soon appeared that his apprehensions were unfounded. Montgomery had greatly overrated his influence in supposing that he could prevail upon his followers of the Club to coalesce with the Jacobites. The staunch presbyterians, who were kept profoundly ignorant of the motives and plans of Montgomery and his accomplices, could not be induced to unite with men who had been the abettors of the cruel and tyrannical proceedings of the banished king, and abandoned in disgust the policy of their factious and unprincipled leaders. The commissioner had been empowered to gain over the opponents of government by the distribution of office, and even, if necessary, by direct pecuniary bribes;† and it appears that several

* Memoirs. The Earls of Home and Lauderdale, Lords Oxford and Stormont refused to follow their party in this perfidious and disgraceful policy.

† "You are allowed to deal with leading men in the parliament, that they may concur for redressing of the grievances, without reflecting upon some votes of parliament much insisted on last session, which upon weighty considerations we thought not fit to pass into laws; and what employment or other gratification you think fit to promise them in our name we shall fulfil the same."

"You are to deal with all other persons as you shall have occasion, whom you judge most capable to be serviceable unto us, that they may be employed as instruments of taking off these leading men, or for getting intelligence, or for influencing shires or royal boroughs, that they may instruct their commissioners cordially to comply with our instructions for redressing of the grievances; and what money or other gratifications you shall promise them shall be made good."—Melville Papers, p. 417.

* Melville Correspondence, p. 506.

† Balcarras sarcastically remarks, "Now, were there ever two better matched than Mr. Payne and Sir James Montgomery! for Mr. Payne made him believe that he could dispose both of titles of honour, employments, and money, as he pleased; and the other, in turn, made him believe he was able to twirl the whole nation round his thumb with a speed."—Memoirs.

‡ Balcarras states that Montgomery received from Mr. Ashton eleven hundred guineas to advance the interests of James, and that he entrusted the money to the Marquis of Athol to carry down to Scotland, and he seems to have kept it. (Memoirs, p. 82.)

members of the Club had been induced by such discreditable means to change sides. The first trial of strength took place on a contested election for a borough. The government carried their point by a majority of six, and their superiority once decided, their ranks were immediately swelled by crowds of the venal and timid, who, with the low morality which characterised the Scottish statesmen of that day, hastened at once to join the stronger side.

Montgomery and his associates were bitterly mortified at this unexpected turn of affairs, but though they now despaired of carrying their object, they determined to remain at their post, and to exert all their influence to embarrass the government, and to obstruct its measures. With this view they made an effort to revive the disputes of the preceding session, but without effect. The commissioner had been instructed to make various concessions, which were highly popular with the great majority of the Estates. The royal assent was given at the outset to two important laws—one for repealing the obnoxious Act of Supremacy, which invested the sovereign with authority over all causes ecclesiastical as well as civil; the other for the restoration of those presbyterian divines who had been ejected since 1661, for refusing to acknowledge episcopal authority.* These acts had passed through parliament during the preceding session; but Hamilton, irritated by the factious conduct of the Club, had refused to touch them with the sceptre. The Committee of Articles, which had excited so much opposition, was prudently given up, and the right of parliament to appoint committees at pleasure was fully recognised. An attempt was made to renew the bill excluding the officers of the crown from the lords of articles, but a compromise offered by the government was agreed to, allowing them to sit and deliberate upon the measures laid before them, but not to vote. Gratified by these concessions, the Estates granted a supply, which, though small in the estimation of English statesmen, was liberal for the means of the country.

The sum of a hundred and sixty-two thousand pounds sterling was voted to be raised in the course of four years, and the sixth penny of money derived from interest or annuities was granted for a year, but converted afterwards into a tax on hearths.† An important change was made in the representation of the counties, and twenty-six commissioners were added to the estate of the barons—measures which contributed to strengthen the crown and to counterbalance the recent increase of the peerage. The iniquitous forfeitures of the last reigns were reversed. Special acts were passed for the restoration to their honours and estates of such distinguished persons as Argyll, Melville, Fletcher of Saltoun, Baillie of Jerviswood, and Carstairs; but by one general act the forfeitures and fines incurred since the insurrection at Pentland, in 1665, were repealed, and upwards of four hundred attainted persons, many of them belonging to the humblest classes, were restored by name. Measures were at the same time taken to rescue their estates out of the hands of the grasping sycophants on whom they had been conferred, and recourse at common law was allowed against those who had received fines or compositions, for the recovery of the money.

The good understanding which now existed between the government and the great majority of the Estates was deeply galling to the Jacobites, who found when too late that they had to no purpose incurred the guilt and infamy of perjury. Montgomery, in his mortification and rage, lost all self-command, and “scolded like a waterman.” “Rogue, villain, and liar,” were the epithets which he interchanged with Sir John Dalrymple, his triumphant rival. Seeing his party daily diminishing, the baffled plotter resolved to make one desperate effort to divide the presbyterians and embarrass the ministry. The delicate question of church government had not yet been introduced into the house. It was known that the king was favourable to a moderate episcopacy, and that he was most unwilling to consent to the abolition of patronage. Montgomery, therefore, believed that the instructions of the commissioner did not authorise him to accede to the wishes of the presbyterians, and endeavoured to incite the more zealous members of the party to demand what he was persuaded the government would not grant. “He knew,” he said, “that there were instructions for settling religion; and he thought it was a disgrace to the meeting that it was not yet done, but the reasons were very clear. Some, to flatter the court at the expense of their own principles, had delayed it, and others were divided in their opinion about it. One party were for setting up a certain kind of Erastian presbytery like that of Holland, and another for supporting civil patronage in the Kirk; but he protested against all compromise. Scotland would not tolerate any form of church government except the presbyterian, as it was settled in the memorable year 1648. That system was not only most accordant to the Word of God, but the best fitted to curb the excesses of wicked kings and arbitrary governments, under which they had so long groaned.” His Jacobite associates heard this speech with surprise and disgust; but to his unspeakable mortification his proposal was approved of by the house, and a committee composed of the leading presbyterians was appointed to consider the subject. The ecclesiastical constitution of the realm was settled in accordance with the wishes of the great body of the people; the presbyterian form of government was re-established; the Westminster Confession of Faith was sanctioned; and by a supplementary act every office-bearer in every university of Scotland was required to sign this confession, and to promise that he would conform to the doctrine and discipline of the Presbyterian Church.* Finally the law of patronage was abolished, but it was enacted that the sum of six hundred marks, equivalent to about thirty-five pounds sterling should be given to every patron as a compensation for his rights.† The nomination of ministers to vacant charges was entrusted to the Protestant heritors and elders.‡ By these well-timed and judicious concessions, the great body of the people of Scotland were conciliated; the parliament, in the words of Melville, “was dismissed with as little discontent as might be, and the presbyterians were gratified in the business of patronage in the way that was least offensive;”§ and the session which had commenced with great apprehensions on the part of the commissioner, and with factious and turbulent opposition on the part of the Estates, was closed with mutual expressions of satisfaction.

* See supra, p. 753.

† Acts Parl., June 7, 1690.

While these proceedings were taking place in parliament, Simpson, the messenger, whom the three arch-conspirators had dispatched to St. Germain, arrived in Edinburgh, bringing with him an answer to their offers of service, and various other important documents, from the exiled monarch and his consort. James seems to have given implicit confidence to the vain boastings and promises of the chiefs of the Club, and with the characteristic ingratitude of his family, completely overlooked his old supporters in his eagerness to reward his new friends. Their names were not even mentioned in the despatches; the confidence of the foolish and cold-hearted exile was reserved for his former enemies, whose unprincipled apostasy had so completely gained his favour, that he left the management of his affairs entirely in their hands. Montgomery was to be Earl of Ayr and secretary of state for Scotland; Annandale was to be created a marquis, and was appointed governor of Edinburgh Castle, and commissioner to the parliament; Ross was to be an earl, and the commander of the guards. There was, among other

* This obnoxious act continued in force down to 1853, when it was happily repealed, mainly through the exertions of Lord Advocate Moncrieff, to whom Scotland owes a deep debt of gratitude for his unwearied efforts to improve and extend her educational institutions.

† Burnet affirms that Melville exceeded his instructions in consenting to the abolition of patronage, and thereby lost all his credit with the king. But this is a gross mistake, for William in his private instructions to Lord Melville, dated 25th February, 1690, expressly says, “You are to pass an act for abolishing patronages, if the parliament shall desire the same.” See also “His Majesty’s Remarques upon the Act for Settling Church Government in Scotland.” Appendix to the present work, O. Lord Melville himself affirms that “his instructions amply warranted what he did,” and he adds that Scotland would probably have been lost if he had not made the concession (Preface to the Leven and Melville Papers, p. xxiv.).

‡ See supra, p. 754.

§ Melville and Leven Papers, Preface, p. xxiv.

documents, a commission to a council of five, which all loyal subjects were enjoined to obey. This council was composed of Annandale, Ross, Montgomery, and Arran, eldest son of the Duke of Hamilton; and it was conjectured that the duke’s own name was to fill one of the places which was left blank. A general indemnity was granted, with only six exceptions: Lord Melville, and his son, Lord Leven, Generals Mackay and Douglas, Bishop Burnet, and Sir John Dalrymple. Five thousand pounds were at the same time remitted to Montgomery’s order by the exiled queen, and he was informed that a further sum of equal amount would speedily follow.* Montgomery seems to have been afraid to exhibit to his Jacobite associates the commission to the council of five, and the patents for the new honours bestowed on the whig conspirators; and, if credit is to be placed in the confession of Annandale, he withdrew these, and other important documents, from the letter-bag in the presence of the latter; and then, resealing it, invited the other plotters, Queensberry, Athol, Balcarres, Breadalbane, and Livingston, to meet in Athol’s lodging to examine despatches which he had just received from King James.† The suspicions of Balcarres, however, had been excited, and on examining the seals and cording of the packet, he declared that they had been tampered with. Montgomery made the most solemn protestation that this charge was unfounded, but no credit was given to his denial. Mutual recriminations followed. The coalition the unprincipled coalition was broken up.

forthwith dissolved, and its members separated in disgust. Two days after, the whole papers were burned in Breadalbane’s lodgings by Montgomery and his two associates, to prevent discovery.

The three original conspirators, distrustful of each other, and mutually apprehensive of treachery, hastened to purchase their own safety by betraying their associates. Ross led the way in this race of infamy. He sent for a presbyterian clergyman named Dunlop, and, with many tears and expressions of remorse, made a partial confession of the plot. He then procured a pass from Lord Melville, and, proceeding to London, repeated his story to the queen, declaring that he had been seduced into the conspiracy, which he always disliked, by Montgomery and Ferguson, but he refused to be a witness in open court against his accomplices. The moment was critical, for William was absent in Ireland; the battle of the Boyne had not been fought; the humiliating defeat of the British fleet at Beachy Head, through the incompetency and gross misconduct of Admiral Torrington, had just taken place; the French were masters of the sea; and the allied powers had been repulsed at Fleurus. Mary, however, displayed great courage and prudence. She carefully took notes of Ross’s revelations, and demanded from him categorical answers to a series of searching questions. Meanwhile, Montgomery, having heard of Ross's confession and departure for court, determined to secure his own safety, and told his story also to Melville, promising at the same time to put into his hands the letters of the exiled king. He too obtained a pass for England, having received from Melville the assurance of an indemnity, on condition that he should make a full and ingenuous confession to the queen of all he knew of the plot. He accordingly waited upon her majesty, revealed the names of his accomplices, and stated, though cautiously, the nature and object of their conspiracy. He pleaded in extenuation his reduced circumstances, made many protestations of his anxiety to devote himself to the cause of the queen, and implored her to accept of his services. Mary seems to have been so much moved by the entreaties and adroit flatteries of this accomplished but unprincipled plotter, that she was willing to have acceded to his terms. But William refused to do more than bestow upon him a pardon on condition that he should give evidence against his accomplices. In the end, Montgomery, after lying hid for some months in London, fled to France to escape a warrant which was issued for his apprehension. The Fate of short remainder of his life was Montgomery. spent for the most part abroad, in constant but abortive plots against the government. He died in exile, mainly it is believed of vexation and grief. Such was the miserable end of this able, but versatile politician, who wanted nothing but honesty to have rendered him one of the most influential Scottish statesmen of his age.

* Leven and Melville Papers, pp. 483, 484.

† Ibid., p. 610.

Annandale, the remaining member of this infamous triumvirate, on learning that Ross had turned informer, first of all retired to Bath, but hearing that a warrant was out against him, he fled to London, and was secreted for several weeks in the house of Ferguson, his fellow plotter. At length, tired of concealment, he sent for Lockhart, the Scottish solicitor-general, and on receiving a promise of indemnity, and assurance that his evidence was not to be used against the persons implicated by it, he made a full confession of his share in the plot. Like Ross, he pretended to have been seduced into treason by Montgomery, "the worst and most restless man alive," who had so arranged matters that his accomplices "had little more to do but say Amen" to his plans.

Among the persons compromised by the revelation of Annandale was Neville Payne—Neville Payne, who does not seem to have been named as an accomplice either by Ross or Montgomery. A warrant having been issued against him on a charge of high-treason, he fled to Scotland in the disguise of a merchant, and took refuge in Annandale, in the house of one of the earl's servants. There is some reason to suspect that he was frightened into taking this imprudent step, in order that he might be subjected to torture, which the law of England did not permit. This cruel expedient for the purpose of forcing a prisoner to give evidence against himself, though denounced by the Claim of Right, was still permitted by the Scottish law in special and important cases; and, as there was no legal evidence of Payne's accession to the conspiracy of Montgomery and his associates, it was resolved to put him to the question. Lockhart, one of the Scottish law officers, wrote from London to Lord Melville, stating that Payne knew secrets that would "hang a thousand," but that he would reveal nothing except under the torture. "Pray you," he adds, "put him in such hands as will have no pity on him, for in the opinion of all men he is a desperately cowardly fellow." To the —he is put to disgrace of the government, this the question—cruel advice was adopted, and on the 6th of August, as the privy-council records show, Payne was subjected to torture on suspicion of a "treasonable and hellish plot." But the courage and constancy of the unhappy prisoner disappointed the expectations of his tormentors, and put to shame his selfish and craven accomplices. He obstinately refused to say a word which would either implicate others or criminate himself. In the hope, doubtless, that his fortitude would at length give way, instructions, signed by the king and countersigned by Lord Melville, were issued to the privy-council on the 10th of December, directing them "that in case he prove obstinate and disingenuous, they should proceed against him to torture with all the rigour that the law allows." But the —his refusal firmness of Payne bade defiance to confess. alike to the thumb-screws and the boots, and "in a boasting manner," says one of the spectators, "he bade them do with his body what they pleased."

The following description, which Lord Crawford, president of the council, gives of this disgraceful scene, may serve to show the low standard of morality among the statesmen of that day:—

"Yesterday, in the afternoon, Neville Payne (after near an hour's discourse I had with him in the name of the council, and in their presence, though at several times by turning him out, and then calling him in again) was questioned upon some things that were not of the deepest concern, and had but gentle torture given him, being resolved to repeat it this day;—and which, accordingly, about six this evening we inflicted on both thumbs and one of his legs. with all the severity that was consistent with humanity, even unto that pitch that we could not preserve life and have gone further,—but without the least success; for his answers to our whole interrogatories that were of any import were negatives. Yet he was so manly and resolute under his suffering, that such of the council as were not acquainted with all the evidences were brangled, and began to give him charity that he might be innocent. It was surprising to me and others, that flesh and blood could without fainting, and in contradiction to the grounds we had insinuate of our knowledge of his accession in matters, endure the heavy penance he was in for two hours; nor can I suggest any other reason than this, that by his religion and its dictates he did conceive he was acting a thing not only generous towards his friends, but likewise so meritorious, that he would thereby save his soul, and be canonised among their saints. My stomach is truly so far out of tune by being a witness to an act so far cross to my natural temper, that I am fitter for rest than anything else. Nor could any less than the danger from such conspirators to the person of our incomparable king, and the safety of his government, prevailed over me to have, in the council's name, been the prompter of the executioner to increase the torture to so high a pitch. I leave it to other hands to acquaint your lordship, how several of our number were shy to consent to the torture, and left the board, when by a vote they were overruled in this. I shall not deny them any charity that this was an effect of the gentleness of their nature; though some others, of a more jealous temper than I am, put only another construction on it.*

Crawford's description of the torture scene.

Such was the general indignation which these Payne's illegal infamous proceedings excited, that detention. Payne was the last person put to the torture in Scotland. But though no legal evidence of his guilt could be obtained, the unhappy conspirator was not set at liberty. After enduring the utmost agony that his frame could sustain, he was kept a close prisoner in the Castle of Edinburgh, neglected or forgotten by his political associates. His nephew, however, on the 6th of January, 1691, presented a petition to the privy-council, representing that in the present shattered condition of his uncle's health close confinement would prove fatal to him. The council had the courage and honesty to remonstrate with his majesty on the illegal detention of Payne, and to represent that in the Claim of Right it was declared to be contrary to law to detain accused persons long in confinement without bringing them to trial; and they urged that either the lord-advocate should be instructed to prosecute Payne, or that he should be removed to England. This remonstrance, however, seems to have been wholly ineffective, for to the scandal alike of the government, and of the courts of law, Payne was detained ten years in confinement without being brought to trial.†

The agitation connected with the expulsion of the Stewart dynasty, and the remodelling of the constitution, had now in a great measure subsided in the Lowlands of Scotland, but the civil war still continued to smoulder in the mountainous State of the districts of the country. The state Highlands. of the Highlands caused considerable anxiety to the English government; and it was now at length resolved to try the expedient recommended two years before by Lord Tarbet, and to lay out a sum of money, which has been variously stated at from twelve to twenty thousand pounds, in conciliating the Jacobite chieftains. The agent entrusted with the dis- Character of tribution of this money was John the Earl of Breadalbane, the head of a Breadalbane—powerful branch of the great clan Campbell. This nobleman, who has obtained an infamous notoriety in connection with this affair, was one of the most unprincipled Scottish statesmen of that day. He had been by turns a supporter of absolute monarchy, and a friend of the Revolution settlement; had sworn allegiance to the new sovereigns, and had joined in the recent conspiracy against them. He was at once cruel, treacherous, and venal, and is described by a contemporary as being "grave as a Spaniard, as cunning as a fox, wise as a serpent, but as slippery as an eel. No government," he adds, "can trust him, but where his own private interest is in view."* The choice of such an agent for the management of this important and delicate affair was every way unfortunate. Breadalbane was obnoxious to the Jacobite —his negotia- chiefs, both on account of his per- tions with the sonal character, and his connection chiefs— with their hereditary enemies, the Campbells. As might have been expected, therefore, the negotiations proceeded slowly. A number of the leading chiefs were seen at different times crossing the range of lofty mountains on the north-west of Loch Awe to Kilchurn, Breadalbane's Castle, situated on that inland lake; and on the 30th of June a conference was held between the earl and the assembled body of Jacobite leaders, at a place called Achallader, in Glenorchy; but no satisfactory arrangement could be made. The chiefs were indeed quite willing to come to terms, and to accept the proffered money; and their exiled sovereign, on learning from themselves the hopelessness of further resistance in existing circumstances, had given them permission to make their peace with the government, on condition that they should be ready to take up arms again in his cause whenever a favourable opportunity should arise. But in spite of this sanction very little —their distrust progress was made. The chiefs of him.

were well aware of Breadalbane's duplicity and selfishness, and, suspecting that under one pretext or other he would contrive to appropriate the greater part of the money to his own use, they refused to put any trust in his promises.† They even charged him with playing a double game, and alleged that he advised them to give in their adherence to the government for the present, but to hold themselves in readiness to take up arms again for King James when he should call upon them to do so. This accusation had, without doubt, been made known to King William's advisers, who entertained well-founded suspicions of Breadalbane's fidelity; and various letters were written to him

* Memoirs of the Secret Services of John Mackay, p. 199.

† When afterwards asked by Lord Nottingham to account for the money, he answered, "The Highlands are quiet, the money is spent, and that is the best way of accounting among friends."

* Melville Papers, p. 682.

† Ibid., pp. 520, 521; Burnet, vol. ii. p. 62; Burton, vol. i. p. 86.

by the Master of Stair and the Earl of Linlithgow, which were evidently meant to impress him with the conviction that his proceedings were narrowly watched, and that the best evidence he could give of his sincerity was to bring the matter quickly to a successful issue.* Stimulated by the urgent representations of the government, as well as by his own interest, Breadalbane exerted himself to the utmost to induce the Highlanders to submit to the government, but without effect. The authority to Breadalbane to conduct the negotiations was dated 24th April, 1690; and at the close of the autumn of 1691 the chiefs had not come to terms.

The Scottish advisers of the king, therefore, resolved to try the effect of threats, as well as of bribes; and, on the 27th of August, they issued a proclamation promising an indemnity to every rebel who should swear the oath of allegiance, in the presence of a civil magistrate, before the 1st of January, 1692, and threatening with the penalties of treason and military execution—letters of fire and sword, as they were termed—those who should hold out after that day.

This proclamation was drawn up by the advice of Secretary Stair; and it appears vindictive policy of the Master of Stair. Breadalbane, that he cherished the hope that a number of the chiefs would refuse to take the oath, and would thus afford the government a plea for inflicting on them the punishment of traitors. "God knows," says he in a letter to the earl, dated September, 1691, "whether the twelve thousand pounds had not been better employed to settle the Highlands or to ravage them; but since we will make them desperate, I think we should root them out before they can get that help they depend upon. Their doing after they got King James's allowance is worse than their obstinacy, for those who lay down arms at his command will take them up by his warrant."

Again, in a letter dated October 27th, he says, "You have done very generously, being a Campbell, to have favoured so much for Macdonalds, who are the inveterate enemies of your clan; and both Glengarry and Keppoch are papists, and that's the only papist clan in the Highlands. Who knows but by God's providence they are permitted to fall into

* In a letter dated September, 1691, Secretary Dalrymple tells Breadalbane that he has been accused of arranging the cards for James. "Nobody," he says, "believes your lordship so base, or that you could believe that there could be any secrets in your treaties where there were so many ill eyes upon your proceedings; but the truth will always hold fast. . . . I have heard there are endeavours using to make the Highlanders either own their base terms, as promised by your lordship, or else to declare their peacefulness did not proceed on your account, or for your negotiation, but because of the endeavours of others." Again, in a letter dated the 3rd of December, the secretary says, "Menzies, Glengarry, and all of them have written letters, and taken pains to make it believed, that all you did was for the interest of King James." (Dalrymple's Memoirs.) It has been seen above that Breadalbane was deeply compromised by the revelations of Montgomery and his accomplices, at the very time this negotiation with the Highland chiefs was pending.

this delusion that they may only be extirpate, which will vindicate their majesties' justice, and reduce the Highlands without further severity to the rest." Four days later, the Earl of Linlithgow, one of the lords commissioners of the Treasury, recommends Breadalbane to "push the clans to do one thing or other, for such as will stand it out must not expect any more offers, and in that case those who have been their friends must act with the greatest vigour against them, and delay to the last cannot be considered as frank dealing." "The last standers out," he adds, "must pay for all; and, besides, I know the king does not care that some do it, that he may make examples of them." On the 3rd of November, Stair says, "I wrote to you formerly that if the rest were willing to concur, as the crows do, to pull down Glengarry's nest this winter, so as the king be not hindered to draw four regiments from Scotland, in that case the destroying him and his clan, and garrisoning his house as a middle for communication between Inverlochy and Inverness, will be full as acceptable as if he had come in. This answers all ends, and satisfies those who complain of the king's too great gentleness." Again, in a letter dated the 3rd of December, he says, "By the next I expect to hear either these people are come to your hand, or else your scheme for mauling them, for it will not delay." Then after mentioning the warlike preparations which were making to carry the threatenings of the proclamation into effect, he adds, "I am not changed as to the expediency of doing these things by the easiest means, and at leisure; but the madness of these people, and their ungratefulness to you, makes me plainly see there is no reckoning on them, but delenda est Carthago. . . Look on, and you shall be satisfied of your revenge." . . . Because I breathe nothing but destruction to Glengarry, Tarbet thinks that Keppoch will be a more proper example of severity; but he hath not a house so proper for a garrison, and he hath not been so forward to ruin himself and all the rest. But I confess both's best to be ruined." It is evident from these letters that the main object of King William and his advisers was to effect such a settlement of the Highlands as should set at liberty the troops which were stationed in that district of the country; that they were willing in the first instance to accomplish this by the offers of an indemnity, and of a sum of money to the chiefs, but that when this means had proved unsuccessful they were desirous of an opportunity to inflict summary vengeance on some of the leading offenders.

It is alleged that the chiefs received information of these hostile intentions of the government, and resolved to avert the threatened danger by giving the pledge which was demanded of them. Whatever may have been the cause, it is evident that they had taken the alarm, for towards the end of the year they flocked, with a unanimity as suspicious as it was remarkable, to take the oath of allegiance. Strange to say, Breadalbane himself, and some other professed friends of the Revolution settlement, deemed it prudent to take the oath, no doubt for the sake of the proffered indemnity.

The chiefs take the oath of allegiance.

* Dalrymple's Memoirs.

When the 31st of December arrived, it was found that, to the great mortification of Secretary Stair, Lochiel, Glengarry, Clanranald, Keppoch, and all the other chiefs, except one, had complied with the terms of the proclamation, and had thus baffled his project of vengeance. The McIan delays his submission. solitary recusant, who thus ventured to trifle with his fate, and fell into the toils spread for Glengarry and Keppoch, was Macdonald of Glencoe, the chief of a branch of the great clan Donald. McIan of Glencoe, as this chief was termed in the Highlands,* inhabited a narrow valley watered by the Coe, a stream which falls into Lochleven near the head of Loch Etive, on the western coast of Scotland. The scenery of this valley is remarkable for its wild and gloomy character. On either side rise up a range of lofty mountains, those on the north forming a series of naked, sharp-edged, and serrated precipices, while on the south, though rounder, they are loftier and bolder, and project unequally into the glen. Rapid torrents pour Glencoe. down the sides of these huge inaccessible precipices, carrying along with them vast quantities of loose stones, which frequently render the road almost impassable. The whole scene, even at the present day, is barren and desolate in the extreme. A farm-house or two, and a few shepherds' huts are the only habitations which it contains. In the days of King William the population of this dreary wilderness consisted of about two hundred persons, who inhabited two or three small hamlets in the lower part of the glen. They lived almost entirely by plunder; and, confident in the strength of their mountain fastnesses, were remarkable for their daring and their predatory excesses. They were near neighbours to the Breadalbane Campbells, whose possessions suffered severely from their depredations, and who hated them "as Macdonalds, thieves, and papists."

McIan, the aged chief of this tribe of indomitable freebooters, was a man of a venerable and majestic aspect, and was held in great respect for his courage and sagacity. He had taken a prominent part both in the campaign of Dundee, and of his successor, General Buchan, and is frequently mentioned in the evidence taken in the process of forfeiture against the Jacobites who fought at Kil-liecrankie. McIan had long been at bitter feud with Breadalbane, who hated him both because his vassals had often been plundered by the Macdonalds, and because the chief himself had employed all his influence to thwart the negotiation with the clans, from which the earl had hoped to gain credit with the government. At the conference in Glenorchy, high words arose between them. McIan, it is said, charged Breadalbane with the intention of appropriating to his own use a part of the money entrusted to him for the pacification of the Highlands; while the earl retorted with vehement reproaches, and demanded compensation for the robberies committed by McIan's followers. They parted in great anger, the earl threatening the chief with his vengeance, while the latter, both from the promptings of interest and of revenge, endeavoured to dissuade the other chiefs from accepting the terms which Breadalbane was instructed to offer. McIan was, therefore, quite well aware that he had rendered himself peculiarly obnoxious to his powerful and unscrupulous neighbour, and he was repeatedly heard to say, that he dreaded mischief from no man so much as from the Earl of Breadalbane. But his pride seems to have led him to brave this danger, and to postpone to the last moment his submission to the government.

At length, on the 31st day of December,—the last day allowed by the proclamation, —McIan went with his principal followers to Fort William to take the prescribed oath; but Colonel

—he offers to submit after the day prescribed—

Hill, the commander of the fort, was not a magistrate, and, therefore, had no power to receive it. The nearest civil officer who could administer the oath was the sheriff of Argyleshire, who lived at Inverary, eighty miles distant; and Colonel Hill, sympathising with the distress of the aged chief, advised McIan instantly to proceed to Inverary, and gave him a personal protection under his hand, together with an urgent letter to Sir Colin Campbell, the sheriff, entreating him to receive Glencoe, though out of season, as "a lost sheep," and to administer the oath to him. McIan, now thoroughly aware of his danger, set off instantly on his journey across the wild mountain tract which lies between Fort William and Inverary; and so great was his anxiety to reach his destination as speedily as possible, that, if the statement of his son may be believed, though he passed within half a mile of his own house, he did not turn aside to see his family. His progress, however, over such a country, in the depth of winter, and obstructed by a snow-storm, was necessarily slow. In spite of all his efforts, he could not reach Inverary till after the prescribed day was past, and he had to wait three days for the arrival of the sheriff, who was absent, so that it was not till the 6th of January that he was able to tender the oath of allegiance. The sheriff at first hesitated to receive it, as the time allowed by the proclamation had expired; but, over—his oath received by sheriff.

* McIan means the son of John. This name was derived, according to the Highland custom, from the founder of the Glencoe tribe, whose name was John, surnamed Fraoch. He was the natural son of Angus Og, of Isla, and brother of John, first Lord of the Isles. See Gregory's History of the Western Highlands, pp. 66, 67.

come by the entreaties and tears of the old chief, and the urgent request of Colonel Hill, Sir Colin at length yielded, and administered the oath to Glencoe and his attendants. A certificate was immediately transmitted by him to the privy-council, attesting that McIan had taken the oath, together with an explanation of the peculiar circumstances which had delayed his submission until after the expiry of the appointed period. At the same time Sir Colin wrote to Colonel Hill, acquainting him with what he had done, and requested him to protect Glencoe and his clan from the annoyance of any military parties until the council should decide whether or not the oath should be received. McLan, therefore, returned to his mountain fastness, and continued to reside there in perfect reliance on the protection of the government, to which he had now sworn allegiance.

Meanwhile, the Master of Stair was preparing Cruel policy to inflict signal chastisement on of Stair. the clans which should neglect to avail themselves of the proffered indemnity. He evidently expected that the various branches of the Macdonalds would stand out, and on the 7th of January he issued peremptory orders for military execution against all who should not have made their submission within the time appointed. "You know, in general," he says to Sir Thomas Livingston, "that these troops posted at Inverness and Inverlochy will be ordered to take in the house of Invergarry, and to destroy entirely the country of Lochaber, Locheil's lands, Keppoch's, Glengarry's, and Glencoe's;" and he adds, "I assure you your power shall be full enough; and I hope the soldiers will not trouble the government with prisoners." Holding these views, the secretary could not conceal his vexation when he saw the chiefs, whom he had hoped to destroy at one blow, crowding in to take the oath of allegiance, which he well knew they would laugh to scorn whenever a favourable opportunity for a rising occurred.

Crooked proceed- Great, therefore, was his satisfaction when he learned that his projected scheme for the destruction of the Jacobite clans would not be altogether a failure, and that Macdonald of Glencoe had not taken the oath within the prescribed time. In a letter dated 11th of January, he says, "My Lord Argyll tells me that Glencoe hath not taken the oath, at which I rejoice. It is a great work of charity to be exact in rooting out that damnable sect, the worst of the Highlands." His coadjutors, Breadalbane and Argyll, fully sympathised with these feelings. It is clear that the secretary could have no personal enmity to a small body of mountaineers like the men of Glencoe, but they were obnoxious to him as papists, rebels, murderers,* and irreclaimable banditti, who had been employed by the expelled dynasty to oppress and rob the covenanters, and whose turbulent and marauding habits contributed to keep the Highlands in a state of chronic insurrection. The chiefs of the Campbells, on the other hand, hated them as a band of robbers who plundered their estates, and as a sept of the great clan Donald, with whom they were at deadly feud, and who had taken a prominent part in the defeat of their ancestor at Inverlochy. They, therefore, entered cordially into the views of Stair, and promised to assist him in the execution of his atrocious plan for the destruction of the Glencoe men.

Meanwhile, the roll containing, with the other oaths given in for the county of Argyle, the certificate of McLan's submission had been presented to Sir Gilbert Elliot, the clerk of the privy-council, but he refused to receive it, as irregular. It was then privately submitted to several privy councillors, among whom was Lord-president Stair, the father of the secretary, all of whom, it is said, were of opinion that the certificate was irregular, and could not be received without a warrant from the king. In the end, the evidence of McLan's submission was suppressed, and the roll was returned to the clerk of the council with the certificate that Glencoe had taken the oath obliterated; but it was never ascertained by whose hand this was done, though there can be no doubt that the proceeding was directed by the Master of Stair.

On the 11th of January, instructions signed and countersigned by the king, were sent down by the secretary to Sir Thomas Livingston, ordering him "to march his troops against the rebels who had not taken the benefit of the indemnity, and to destroy them by fire and sword." But lest these severities should drive them to desperation, it was provided that he should have the power of granting mercy to those who should still take the oath of allegiance, and deliver up their arms and submit to the government. The men of Glencoe were not mentioned by name in this royal warrant; and as they had already come in and tendered their submission, the severities threatened against obstinate rebels could not legally be inflicted on them. A second set of instructions were, therefore, issued on the 16th of January, also superscribed and subscribed by the king,* ordering Livingston to extirpate the whole clan. Indulgence was still to be shown, it was hypocritically said, to other clans who should submit themselves at the very last hour. The secretary well knew that these had all taken the oath of allegiance already, but "as for McLan of Glencoe and that tribe," it was

* Dalrymple, in his "Memoirs," says Stair was particularly shocked by the story of a murder recently committed by the Glencoe men on one of their own sept, who had given information against his accomplices in some act of robbery. The unhappy wretch was tied to a tree, and deliberately murdered in cold blood by his clansmen, the old chief himself being the first to plunge his dirk into the body of his retainer.

* It has been argued that William may not have read this warrant before signing it, or if he did read it, that he may have attached an innocent meaning to the phrases employed respecting the Macdonalds. (See Macaulay's History of England, vol. iv. chap. xviii.) But the letters already quoted show that the king was cognizant throughout both of the negotiations with the clans through the agency of Breadalbane, and of the severities that were threatened in order to bring them to terms. There is no reason, however, to believe that William had any knowledge of the base treachery and breach of hospitality by which the atrocious crime of the slaughter of the Glencoe men was aggravated. (See Appendix P.) added, "if they can be well distinguished from the rest of the Highlanders, it will be proper for the vindication of public justice to extirpate that set —plan for their of thieves." Every precaution was extirpation. taken by the Master of Stair to secure the complete extermination of this unhappy clan. His base accomplices, Argyll and Breadalbane,* promised to lend their cordial assistance. The blow was to be secret, sudden, and overwhelming. If any of the doomed race should escape the first stroke, and attempt to find refuge in the territories of the surrounding clans, Breadalbane promised to intercept the fugitives on the one side, Argyll on the other; the passes to Rannoch were to be secured; and the Laird of Weems was to be informed by his powerful neighbour in Strath Tay of the risk he would run if he were to "reset" the hunted outlaws. The proper season, it was agreed, in which to maul them was in the long, dark nights of winter, the only time at which the Highlanders could not elude their pursuers, or carry their wives and children to the mountains. At such a season it was impossible for them to escape, for no human constitution could then long endure exposure to the open air.

The instruments selected for the execution of Letters of this diabolical plan seem to have Stair. been every way worthy of its author, and well fitted for the task. Livingston, on receiving the instructions of the secretary, immediately wrote to his second in command, Lieutenant-colonel Hamilton, to whom their execution was intrusted, expressing his satisfaction that Glencoe was at the mercy of the government, enjoining Hamilton not to spare any of the rebels, as his orders were imperative, and "not to trouble the government with prisoners," and hinting that he had now "a fair occasion" of recommending himself to the favour of his superiors. On the 30th of January the Master of Stair wrote another letter to Livingston, in which he says, "I am glad Glencoe did not come in within the time prefixed: I hope what is done there may be in earnest, since the rest are not in a condition to draw together help. I think to harry their cattle and burn their houses is but to render them desperate lawless men to rob their neighbours; but I believe you will be satisfied it were a great advantage to the nation that thieving tribe were rooted out and cut off. It must be quietly done, otherwise they will make shift for both their men and their cattle." And in a letter of the same date, to Hill, the governor of Fort William, he says, "Pray when the thing concerning Glencoe is resolved, let it be secret and sudden, otherwise the men will shift you; and better not meddle with them than not to do it to purpose, to cut off that nest of robbers who have fallen in the mercy of the law."

Hill, who seems to have been an honourable and humane man, was greatly surprised and distressed when he learned that the government were determined to extirpate the Macdonalds, and manifested such reluctance to act upon his instructions, that the execution of the dastardly and perfidious design was intrusted to Hamilton, who was troubled with no such relents. A detachment of a hundred and twenty men belonging to a clan regiment lately levied by Argyll were selected to be the actual perpetrators of the massacre, no doubt with the expectation that the bitter hereditary feud between them and the Macdonalds would steel their hearts against all considerations of justice and humanity. On the Campbell of 1st of February they marched to Glenlyon.

Glencoe, under the command of Captain Campbell of Glenlyon, a cold-blooded, perfidious villain, every way fitted for such a service. His niece, the sister of Rob Roy, was married to Alexander, the second son of McIan, a connection which was no doubt taken into account as likely to lull the suspicions of the Glencoe men, and to render them an easy prey. The Macdonalds, who had been living for a month past in quiet and security, were alarmed at the appearance of the soldiers; and John, the eldest son of the chief, accompanied by twenty followers, went to the mouth of the pass, and inquired the reason of this unexpected visit. He was assured that the strangers had come with friendly intentions; that they merely wanted quarters for a short time to relieve the overcrowded garrison of Fort William. They were immediately welcomed with kindness, and treated with the profuse hospitality for which the Highlanders were remarkable. Glenlyon took up his abode in the small hamlet of Inverriggen; Lindsay, the lieutenant of the regiment, was quartered near the house of McIan; and a party commanded by Sergeant Barbour were accommodated at Auchnaich, the residence of one of the minor chiefs of the clan, named Auchintriater. During twelve days the soldiers lived at free quarters in the glen, on terms of the utmost familiarity and friendship with the people. The officers spent a great part of their time with the old chief and his family; and Glenlyon every day took his morning draught at the house of his niece and her husband.

Matters had continued in this state for nearly a fortnight, when on the 12th of February orders were issued by Hamilton to his subordinate officer, Major Duncanson,* fixing five o'clock in the morning of the next day for the slaughter of the Macdonalds, and enjoining the various detachments of his men to be at their posts by that hour, to secure the various passes of the

* Breadalbane's character has already been described. Of Argyll Macaulay says justly, that he was "in personal qualities one of the most insignificant of the long line of nobles who have borne that great name. . . . He was unworthy both of his ancestry, and of his progeny. He had even been guilty of the crime common enough among Scottish politicians, but in him singularly disgraceful, of tampering with the agents of James while professing loyalty to William."—History of England, vol. iv.

* Duncanson, though he did not bear the name, was a member of the clan Campbell, and appears to have been, at the period of the massacre, procurator fiscal of the judiciary of Argyll. (Burton, vol. i. p. 165, note.)

glen, so that not one of the doomed race might escape. None were to be spared, he said, and the government was not to be troubled with prisoners. Duncanson, in his turn, issued corresponding orders to Glenlyon, with a degree of cordiality and zeal which shows how well he was fitted for this villainous service. He tells him, with savage glee, that by the king's special command the miscreants of Glencoe were to be cut off root and branch; that all under seventy years of age were to be put to the sword; that he was to secure all the avenues, and to take special care that the old fox and his cubs should on no account escape; and Glenlyon, who needed no such stimulus to the bloody work, was enjoined to execute these orders without fear or favour, under the penalty of being treated as a traitor to the king and government, and as unfit to carry a commission in the king's service.

With these sanguinary orders in his pocket, Glenlyon, on the evening of the 12th, supped and played at cards in his own quarters with his intended victims, John and Alexander, the two sons of McIan; and he and Lieutenant Lindsay accepted an invitation to dine with the old chief himself next day. Five o'clock in the morning was the hour fixed for the deed. By that hour Hamilton expected that he should secure the eastern passes of the glen, so as to intercept any fugitives who might escape the first assault; but at five precisely, whether his superior officer had arrived or not, Glenlyon was to begin the work of death.

McIan and his sons had retired to rest at their usual hour; but various circumstances had excited the suspicions of John, the eldest son. The sentinels had been doubled on that evening, and the guard strengthened. Some of the soldiers had been overheard muttering their dislike to the service in which they were engaged. They were willing enough, they said, to encounter the Glencoe men in an open fight, but not to take part in such a work as this. One of their comrades reminded them that they must obey orders, and that their officers were responsible if there was anything wrong.* Young Macdonald was so much alarmed by what he had seen and heard, that soon after midnight he went to Glenlyon's quarters, where he found that officer and his men preparing their arms for active service. John anxiously asked the meaning of these suspicious preparations, and was informed by Glenlyon that the soldiers were about to march against some of Glengarry's men, who were harrying the country. The treacherous villain added with a perfidy and hardihood almost incredible—"If any thing evil had been intended, would I not have told your brother Alaster and my niece." Satisfied with the apparent frankness of this reply, John returned home, and retired to rest.

The hour appointed for the massacre arrived, but Hamilton and his troops, detained by a storm of snow, did not appear; Glenlyon's —their orders, however, were imperative, execution. And he proceeded to put them into execution. Between four and five o'clock, Lieutenant Lindsay, with a party of soldiers, went in a friendly manner to the house of McIan, and was instantly admitted. The venerable chief, while in the act of dressing himself and giving orders for refreshments to be brought for his visitors, was shot dead at his own bedside. Two of his retainers were put to death at the same time, and a third left for dead. His aged wife, who had risen, and was already dressed, was stripped naked by the murderers of her husband, and one of the ruffians tore the rings from her fingers with his teeth. She expired next day with terror and grief. At Glenlyon's own quarters, his landlord and nine other men were seized in their beds, bound hand and foot, and shot one after another. A boy of twelve years of age clung to the commander's knees, and begged for mercy with the most piteous entreaties and cries. Even Glenlyon was moved, but an officer named Drummond stabbed the poor child with his dirk.

At Auchnaion a party under Sergeant Barbour fired a volley at a group of nine Horrors of men, who were setting round the the massacre. fire, and laid prostrate eight of them, including the petty chief Auchintriatri, his host, who had a protection from General Hill in his pocket at the time. His brother, who was the only survivor, entreated that he might be put to death in the open air. "I will grant your request," said Barbour, "for your bread which I have eaten." But on reaching the door, Macdonald, who was a bold and active man, suddenly threw his loose plaid over the faces of the soldiers who were presenting their pieces to shoot him, rushed through the midst of them, and, favoured by the darkness and confusion, succeeded in making his escape.

The discharge of musketry from three different places at once gave the alarm to those who had not been attacked, and in a moment the miserable inhabitants were seen flying half naked from their huts in all directions. John Macdonald, on hearing the shots of the assassins, comprehended in a moment the treacherous snare that had been laid for him, and fled instantly to the mountains, just in time to escape a party of soldiers who were at the door of his house with fixed bayonets. His brother Alexander owed his life to a faithful retainer, who called on him to fly, exclaiming, "Is it time for you to be sleeping when they are murdering your brother at the door!"

Thirty-eight persons in all, including one or two women and a little boy,* were put to death by the assassins; but it Fearful sufferings of the fugitives. is probable that not a few of the half-naked fugitives, including aged men and women, and mothers with their helpless babes in their arms, perished by fatigue, and hunger, and cold, in that savage wilderness before they could

* The hand only of this child was found.

* Letter from "a gentleman in Scotland to his friend in London."—BROWNE'S History of the Highlands, vol. iii. p. 218 reach a place of refuge. The snow-storm, however, which must have proved fatal to many of them, was the means of saving the remainder from destruction. Hamilton, with his reinforcement of four hundred men, did not reach the scene of slaughter until six hours after the time appointed. The eastern passes of the glen were in consequence left open, and long before his arrival, the fugitives were beyond the reach of pursuit. The only Macdonald, whom he found alive in Glencoe was an infirm man of eighty, and though, from his age, he was not included in the orders issued for the massacre, Hamilton wantonly ordered him to be murdered in cold blood. The deserted hovels were then reduced to ashes, and the soldiers, having destroyed whatever could not be removed, collected the property of their victims, consisting of nine hundred cattle and two hundred ponies, besides sheep and goats, and drove them to Fort William, where they were divided among the officers of the garrison.*

Stair, in his letter to Colonel Hill, had declared that "it would be better not to meddle with the Glencoe men than not do it to purpose,"—and never was prediction better fulfilled. The scheme for the extirpation of the unhappy clan had indeed been ably planned, but owing to the gross mismanagement of the subordinate agents it had proved a failure. Three-fourths of the Macdonalds, including the sons of the chief, made their escape, and carried to their northern clansmen, among whom they found refuge, the tidings of the massacre.† The government reaped nothing from the deed of blood, except infamy and abhorrence. A considerable time elapsed, however, before the facts of the case were thoroughly known to the public, even in Scotland. It was not till a year after the massacre that full and authentic details of this great crime were published to the world. The story was at first received with incredulity, and regarded as either a monstrous exaggeration, or as a mere fable; but it was at length fully authenticated in all its details, and everywhere produced an extraordinary sensation. Among all classes in Scotland the perfidious and bloody act excited deep and universal detestation; in England it made people hold their breath with wonder and horror; while in France it was hailed with delight, as a proof of the cruel and treacherous character of the reigning monarch, and was blazoned abroad with every aggravation by royal authority. The friends and supporters of the government were covered with shame, and endeavoured to apologise for the king with bated breath. Even the perpetrators of the atrocious crime showed signs of uneasiness; and Breadalbane sent his steward to the sons of the murdered Melan, and endeavoured to prevail on them by large promises to sign a paper declaring that they held the earl innocent of the massacre. But amidst the universal horror and indignation which the deed excited, Secretary Stair remained unmoved; his only feeling seemed to be astonishment that a meritorious service to the state should be denounced in such terms. He was satisfied, as he said, that "it were a great advantage to the nation that thieving tribe were rooted out and cut off." "Do right and fear nobody. Can there be a more sacred duty than to rid the country of thieving. The only thing that I regret is that any got away." And when the orders for the massacre were published in the Paris Gazette, he merely remarked, that all that could be said of the matter was, that the execution was neither so full nor so fair as it might have been.*

At this juncture the safety of the country, and the stability of the government were seriously perilled by foreign invasion, combined with domestic treason. Louis XIV. had made extensive preparations for a vigorous attempt to reinstate James on the throne of Britain by force of arms. For this purpose a magnificent fleet was equipped and sent to sea, while an army of twenty thousand men, upwards of one half of whom were Irish, was assembled on the coast of Normandy, under Sarsfield, to be ready for embarkation. While this formidable armament was threatening the shores of Britain, a number of leading men in both divisions of the island, including the Duke of Marlborough, Admiral Russell, and various other influential friends of the Revolution settlement, had entered into negotiations with James, and declared their willingness to betray their sovereign. The position of the country was most critical, but the danger was providentially averted, and the schemes of the traitors were completely defeated. The queen, to whom, in the absence of William on the continent, the administration was entrusted, acted with great firmness and prudence; and at length the brilliant naval victory of La Hogue completely destroyed the hopes of James, and confounded the expectations of his traitorous supporters.

After an interval of two years and a half, the Scottish Estates were again called together; but Melville was no longer commissioner. He had given offence to the king by his concessions to the presbyterian interest, and especially by his failure to obtain from the parliament an act of toleration in behalf of the Scottish episcopalians; he had, therefore, been superseded as prime-minister for Scotland by Sir John Dalrymple, who was nominated joint secretary of state;† and now the * Report of the Glencoe Commission, 1695; Papers on the Condition of the Highlands, printed by the Maitland Club.

† It is a most significant fact, and speaks volumes as to the system under which they lived, that the Macdonalds, so far from expecting reparation for their grievous wrongs, humbly petitioned the government for permission to return to Glencoe, on finding security that they would live peaceably and honestly.

* Report of 1695.

† In a few months Melville resigned his secretaryship and accepted the comparatively insignificant office of keeper of Duke of Hamilton was appointed in his room lord high commissioner. Secretary Stair was on the Continent with the king, and his colleague Johnston, a younger son of the celebrated Warriston, was sent down to assist Hamilton in the management of the meeting.

As an estrangement had lately taken place—character of between the government and the its proceedings. Church, it was expected that the parliament, which had always shown a strong leaning towards the presbyterian interest, would prove refractory, and resume its former obstructive policy; but, to the surprise of everybody, the session passed over in unbroken tranquillity. The sum of a hundred and fourteen thousand pounds sterling was voted to raise and maintain four regiments of foot and two of dragons, and an additional land-tax, excise, and poll-tax, were granted for this purpose. Severe laws were enacted against the adherents of James, and all correspondence with France was declared to be treasonable. An act was passed for the more effectual suppression of robberies and disturbances in the Highlands. The oath of allegiance and assurance was extended to all nobles, and their eldest sons, to prevent "hedging politics;" to all ministers and preachers; to every office-bearer in Church and State, and to all who were entitled to vote in their election. But the course which the Estates pursued in regard to this matter, as well as to ecclesiastical affairs, was much more agreeable to the king than to the nation, and had nearly brought about a dangerous collision between the government and the Church.*

The profligacy and political subserviency of the Profligacy of Scottish bench during the reign of the judges. Charles and his brother had grown to an intolerable evil, and but little had as yet been done to provide a remedy. The private solicitation of the judges, the acceptance of bribes, the employment of official influence in behalf of a favourite suitor, and even the falsification of the judgments pronounced by the court, were all matters of every-day occurrence. These clamant evils at length attracted the attention of parliament, and a vigorous effort was now made to purify Remedies the fountain of justice. The remedies attempted. dies which were provided by statute show how deep-seated the disease must have been. To prevent the judges from going out of their proper order to hear and determine an action in favour of a friend, it was enacted that each judge should sit in the outer house in a certain regular rotation, under the penalty of being deprived of their salary for the session; and, as an additional check on such partial and improper interference, it was provided that if any judge should attend in the inner house out of his course, either party the Privy Seal; and in 1695 he was made president of the council; he held this post till the king's death in 1702. He was inferior to several of his contemporaries in ability, but he was one of the very few honest Scottish statesmen of that day.

* See supra, pp. 761—768; Act. Parl. Scot. June 12th, 1693.

might decline his authority. Tarbet, the clerk-register, was so flagrantly guilty of falsifying the minutes of parliament, in its decisions upon private causes in which he was interested, that he made no attempt to defend himself against the charge, and offered his office for sale. To prevent such dishonest practices for the future, it was ordered that after the judgment of the court was pronounced, it should be written out by the clerk in the presence of the judges, and immediately authenticated by the signature of the presiding judge. Both in civil and in criminal cases, the court had been latterly in the habit of carrying on its proceedings with closed doors, and its judgments had been concocted in private after the parties were withdrawn. This iniquitous system was now abolished; the courts of justice were again ordered to be thrown open, and the judges were brought under the wholesome influence of public opinion. But such statutory remedies served rather to palliate than to cure the deep-rooted profligacy of the bench; and a century elapsed before the evil was completely eradicated.*

Strange to say, no member of the Estates demanded an investigation into the massacre of Glencoe; nor does it appear that the slightest notice was taken in parliament of that atrocious crime. It was not until 1695, three years after the deed was committed, that the demand for inquiry became so loud and general, that it could no longer be resisted. A commission was indeed issued in 1693, appointing the Duke of Hamilton, and several other men of rank, to examine into the affair, but they took no steps whatever to perform the duty entrusted to them; and as the king neglected to urge them, it seems highly probable that their appointment was intended to prevent, rather than to carry out, an investigation.

After a recess of nearly two years, the Scottish parliament met 9th May, 1695. The Duke of Hamilton having died the previous year, the Marquis of Tweeddale, a veteran statesman of respectable character and great experience, was appointed lord high commissioner. It was foreseen by the king's advisers that the horror and indignation excited by the massacre of Glencoe had reached such a height that it would be impossible any longer to evade inquiry, and a commission was accordingly sent down from London authorising the commissioner, the lord-chancellor, and several other privy councillors, to examine into the affair. The Estates had scarcely assembled when notice was given of a motion for an inquiry; but on the announcement of Tweeddale that the king had anticipated the wishes of the house by the appointment of a commission, the parliament unanimously passed a vote of thanks to their sovereign, though, at the same time, they made it manifest that they were determined that the investigation should now be honest and complete. About the middle of June the Estates became so clamorous for the report of the commissioners, that the government were compelled to expedite the inquiry, and ultimately to lay the document before the house, without waiting, as they originally intended, till the king's pleasure respecting it should be made known.*

* Act. Parl. Scot. 1693, c. 18, 19, 21, 26, 27; Carstairs' Papers, p. 184.

The report seems, on the whole, to have been drawn up with fairness and candour, though an anxious desire was shown to palliate the conduct of the king in signing the fatal order for the extirpation of the Macdonalds. The commissioners gave it as their opinion that there was nothing in the king's instructions to warrant the slaughter itself, much less the perfidious manner in which it was executed, and that the letters of Secretary Stair appear to have been "the only warrant and cause of this barbarous murder."

They did not find it proved that Breadalbane. Breadalbane was implicated in the slaughter, but they ascertained that the earl had laid himself open to a charge of high-treason by the manner in which he acted in his negotiations with the clans; that he had professed to be a zealous partizan of James, and had recommended the chiefs to accept the money offered them by the government; but, at the same time, to be on the watch for an opportunity of taking up arms in favour of the exiled monarch. The parliament immediately committed Breadalbane a prisoner to the Castle of Edinburgh, but he was speedily liberated by the government, on the plea that the treacherous villain had, as he alleged, professed himself Jacobite merely in order that he might discover and betray the plans of the Jacobite chiefs.†

The report of the commissioners was laid before the Estates on the 24th of June, and was carefully discussed section by section. They resolved unanimously that the order signed by the king did not authorise the murder of the Glencoe men. They next resolved that the letters of Stair exceeded the royal instructions, and excluded the Macdonalds from the mercy which it was his majesty's intention to offer to all who would submit to his authority.‡ But though the parliament thus imputed the guilt of the murder to Stair, they impeached his conduct in terms which had been studiously framed to serve the end that many of the members lay in view, rather than to vindicate public justice by the punishment of a great criminal. There is too much reason to believe that the judgment pronounced upon the slaughter of the Glencoe men was dictated quite as much by hatred of the secretary, as by humanity and justice; and a considerable portion of the Estates desired nothing more than to drive the powerful and envied minister from office, and not to bring him to trial and punishment for the atrocious crime which he had committed. With regard to the direct agents in the massacre, they declared that Hamilton, who had absconded, was not free from the blood of the Glencoe men; they pronounced Glenlyon, Captain Drummond, Lieutenant Lindsay, Ensign Lundie, and Sergeant Barbour, who were then serving in Flanders, guilty of murder, and petitioned his majesty to send them home for trial. The king, however, did not comply with this Unsatisfactory request of the parliament. None result. of the persons thus branded as murderers were brought to trial, or punished for their crime. They were allowed to remain in the royal service, and some of them even received promotion. The Master of Stair, indeed, was dismissed from office, though it is alleged that even this most inadequate punishment was inflicted quite as much on account of the part the secretary took in the Darien affair, as from the displeasure of the king at the barbarous murder of the ill-fated Macdonalds. It is admitted even by William's warmest admirers, that his conduct in regard to this atrocious crime has left a deep stain on his memory.

The last faint embers of the civil war in Scotland had now expired, and in April, 1694, The Bass Rock held for James. The Bass Rock, the last fortified place which held out for King James, surrendered. This remarkable and almost inaccessible rock was then occupied by a strong castle, which, during the reigns of Charles II. and his brother, had been used as a state prison, in which many of the victims of their tyranny were immured. After the Revolution it held out for more than a year, until the garrison were starved into submission; but it was shortly after (15th June, 1689) recovered for King James by four young Jacobite officers, who had been taken prisoners in the skirmish of Cromdale, and were confined in this castle. By an adroit stratagem they contrived to shut the gates on the small garrison, who, in the absence of the governor, were engaged in helping to unload a vessel at the landing-place, without the walls of the fort, and compelled them to leave the rock and proceed to the shore. As soon as the success of this daring attempt became known, the officers were joined by several companions, including Crawford younger, of Ardmillan, and Charles Maitland, who had been deputy-governor of the castle under the Stewarts. They obtained a supply of provisions and ammunition from the French government, and two large boats, which enabled them to make marauding incursions on the coasts of Fife and East Lothian, and even to seize and plunder several trading vessels in their voyage up the Frith. The government were both indignant and perplexed by these proceedings, and in the spring of 1692 sent two vessels to bombard the fort; but the art of besieging fortified places, especially by sea, was at that time so little understood in Scotland, that after firing five hundred balls, which the garrison carefully collected, and added to their military stores, the besiegers were compelled to relinquish the attempt. Various other fruitless schemes were successively formed for the reduction of the island fortress; but at length the supplies of the garrison were cut off by a rigorous blockade, and the intrepid defenders were reduced to such extremities by the want of provisions that they were compelled to surrender on the terms offered by the privy-council—absolute indemnity for life and fortune, with liberty either to remain in security at home, or to depart for France.*

* Act Parl., June 14, 1695.

† Burnet, vol. ii. p. 167; Act Parl., June 10, 1695.

‡ Ibid., June 26.

A considerable number of their brother officers, who had taken part in the Highland campaign, had previously been admitted to the same honourable terms, and had been conveyed to the Continent at the expense of the government. They received for some time from the French monarch pay and subsistence, in proportion to the rank which they had held in the service of James. But after the cause of the exiled sovereign became desperate, and misfortunes began to gather thick around the French monarchy, they felt unwilling to be any longer a burden on the government, and petitioned to be received into the service of Louis as private soldiers. Their generous proposal was reluctantly acceded to by James, who was deeply affected in taking leave of the unfortunate gentlemen before they set out to join the French army. He wrote down their names in his pocket-book, and “assured them he should ever retain a deep sense of their devotion to his person, and, if Providence should ever restore him to his throne, their rank in his army should not be inferior to their deserts.” Having been formed into an independent company under their own officers, they set out on their march to the frontiers of Spain, a distance of nine hundred miles, which they performed on foot. Their pay as common soldiers amounted to only three pence a day, with a pound and a half of bread, so that to obtain the bare necessities of life they were obliged to part with their watches, rings, and trinkets, which had been cherished by them as the tokens of love or of friendship, and even with a portion of their clothes. The post both of danger and of toil was constantly allotted them, and at the siege of Rosas, in Catalonia, under Marshal Noailles, and in a subsequent campaign in Alsace, their desperate valour excited the admiration of the whole army. But the numbers of this little band rapidly diminished—not a few of them fell by the sword, others perished by fatigue, privation, and sickness; so that, when five years afterwards the company was disbanded at Silistad, on the banks of the Rhine, only sixteen of the original number of a hundred and fifty remained alive, and of these only five returned to their native country.*

At the close of the year 1694 a sad calamity fell upon the king and country. On the 28th of December Queen Mary died of smallpox, in the thirty-third year of her age. She was an exemplary wife, and a judicious and kind-hearted sovereign, and her sudden and unexpected loss almost broke the heart of her husband, who, on all other occasions, was remarkable for his coolness and fortitude. The amiable disposition of Mary, her winning manners and unostentatious piety, together with her courage, ability, and personal beauty, endeared her to her subjects, and her untimely death caused deep and general sorrow. The Scottish people, though she was personally a stranger to them, honoured her for her virtues, and mourned her death the more deeply, remembering that she was a descendant of their ancient royal race.

The friends of the exiled king, both in Britain and on the Continent, confidently predicted that the death of Mary would exercise a most injurious influence on the Revolution settlement, and that William, deprived of her powerful aid and wise counsel, would find it impossible much longer to maintain his position on the throne. But their expectations were doomed to be disappointed, and the remainder of William's reign was much more tranquil than its commencement.

* Siege of the Bass, reprinted in “Miscellanea Scotica,” Memoirs of the Rev. John Blackadder, by Dr. Crichton, Appendix, pp. 382—386; Minutes of the Privy Council.

* Memoirs of Dundee, with an account of Dundee's officers after they went to France; Carstairs' State Papers, pp. 137—139.

CHAPTER LVI.

WILLIAM.

A.D. 1694—1702.

AFTER the massacre of Glencoe, by which the public mind had been greatly irritated against the king and the government, the commissioner was authorised, with a view to allay the prevailing discontent, to agree to the passing of acts for the encouragement and extension of trade and manufactures, so far as such acts might not interfere with the trade of England. The renewal of the charter of the English East India Company, and the opposition offered to the exclusive privileges conferred by it, aroused a spirit of commercial enterprise in Scotland, whose trade had been long in a languishing and depressed condition beyond that of almost any nation in Europe. Much of this depression was clearly traceable to the selfish and monopolising policy of England, particularly to the passing of the Navigation Act of 1660, by which Scotland had been deprived of trading privileges which she formerly enjoyed, and in the possession of which she had been rapidly rising into wealth and importance. Numerous expedients had, from time to time, occupied the thoughts of enlightened and patriotic men for giving a fresh impulse to manufacturing and commercial industry in Scotland, and elevating her to that position which she seemed fitted to occupy in the scale of nations. Among these was William Paterson, the originator, it is said, of the Bank of England,* as well as of the first public bank that had been established in his native country.† He is represented as being—and indeed, by the wisdom evinced in his ill-fated plans, appears to have been—a man of liberal and comprehensive mind, profound sagacity, and original genius, but, unfortunately for himself and his country, far in advance of his age. Of his early history little is known, and that little abounds in apparent contradictions. At one time he is spoken of as a missionary, at another as a buccaneer. However this may be, it is certain that he was a man of education, and that, either from a desire to extend his knowledge, or from some other motive, he crossed the Atlantic, and spent some time in different parts of the American continent. After a time, his attention was particularly directed to the isthmus connecting North and South America. Situated between the two great oceans of the globe, it appeared to his sagacious mind as by nature adapted to become the site of the commercial capital of the world. He was particularly struck with the advantages it seemed to offer for opening to his native country a participation in the trade of the East Indies, by which England was becoming enriched, and which the merchants of that country had hitherto monopolised. Full of this idea he laboured to gain a thorough knowledge of the geography of that remarkable neck of land, its climate, soil, and productions, mineral and vegetable, its native tribes, and their relation to the Spanish colony that had planted itself on the western shore. On his return to Britain, he had matured a scheme by which he hoped to render Scotland a great emporium of trade and commerce. He communicated his views to Fletcher of Saltoun, whom he met in London, and who entered so warmly into the scheme that he accompanied Paterson to Scotland, where he introduced him to the Marquis of Tweeddale and other ministers of state, to whom he explained the great project he had formed. The site he had selected as an emporium for the trade of the eastern and western hemispheres was the Isthmus of Darien. His project was in a high degree liberal and enlightened, and its advantages, as pointed out by himself, show that he was no idle dreamer, but had calmly and laboriously pondered the whole subject, as compared with other great commercial enterprises, both of ancient and modern times. "The time and expense," he says, "of navigation to China, Japan, the Spice Islands, and the far greatest part of the East Indies will be lessened more than half, and the consumption of European commodities more than doubled, trade will increase, and money will increase money, and the trading world shall no more need to want work for their hands, but will rather want hands for their work. Thus the door of the seas and the key of the universe, with anything of a reasonable management, will of course enable its proprietors to give laws to both oceans, and to become arbitrators of the commercial world, without being liable to the fatigues, expenses, and dangers, or contracting the guilt and blood of Alexander and Cæsar. In all our empires that have been anything universal, the conquerors have been obliged to seek out and court their conquests from afar, but the universal force and influence of this attractive magnet is such as can much more effectually bring empire home to its proprietor's doors. * * * * The nature of these discoveries is such as not to be engrossed by any one nation or people, with exclusion to others, nor can it be thus attempted without evident hazard and ruin, as we see in the case of Spain and Portugal, who, by their prohibiting any other people to trade, or so much as to go to or dwell in the Indies, had not only lost that trade they were not able to maintain, but have depopulated and ruined those countries therewith, so that the Indies have rather conquered Spain and Portugal than they have conquered the Indies. People and their industry are the true riches of a prince or nation, and, in respect to them, all other things are but imaginary. This was well understood by the people of Rome, who, contrary to the maxims of Sparta and Spain, by general naturalisations, liberty of conscience, and immunity of government, far more effectually and advantageously conquered and kept the world, than ever they did or possibly could have done by the sword."

* Burnet, vol. iv. p. 230; Ralph, vol. ii. pp. 478—481.

† The Bank of Scotland, established 17th of July, 1695.

Whether Tweeddale and the other ministers had—its reception by the ministry. the sagacity to perceive the advantages of this splendid scheme, and were inclined to adopt them through motives of pure patriotism, is of comparatively little importance. They had other motives sufficiently strong to induce them to enter warmly into Paterson's views. In consequence of the massacre of Glencoe, both the king, and Secretary Stair, who had been implicated in that transaction, had become exceedingly unpopular; and it was supposed that Paterson's project would not only divert the attention of the people from that horrible tragedy, but, if supported by the king and the government, would have the effect of effacing the recollection of it, and restoring them to public favour. Accordingly, Stair in particular threw his whole influence into the scale, and was eloquent in his laudation of a scheme from which he laboured to demonstrate that Scotland would reap advantages beyond calculation. Nor was the project less acceptable, though probably from other and purer motives, to the nation at large.

Almost all other topics of public interest were, Reception of the project by the people. for a time, comparatively forgotten, and, to add to the excitement which had seized on all classes of the community, the press teemed with pamphlets which flattered the most extravagant hopes of national wealth and power. Many of these expatiated upon the incalculable riches hid in the gold and silver mines with which the isthmus was supposed to abound; but it is only justice to Paterson to say that in his scheme he gives no encouragement to the delusive expectations thus excited.

Nothing now remained but to obtain the sanction of the legislature for carrying out this magnificent enterprise; and as the parliament participated in the national excitement, which apparently extended even to the king and the government, there was no obstacle to this desirable consummation. An act Act for establishing a company. was drawn up under the direction of Paterson himself, in which it was provided that there should be established "A company trading to Africa and the Indies, with power to plant colonies and build cities, towns, or forts, in places not in the possession of any other European power, with the consent of the natives." The principal details were that one half of the proprietors at least should be natives of Scotland, that the lowest share should be one hundred pounds, and that the highest should not exceed three thousand pounds. That no part of the capital, or any of the property, of the company, should be liable to restraint or forfeiture on any pretence whatever. That the proprietors, by a plurality of voices, should be empowered to frame their own constitutions, civil and military, to be binding on all persons belonging to the company, and that they should be authorised to administer the oath de fidei, and all other oaths necessary to their management. That they should, for the space of ten years, be empowered to fit out or freight their own or foreign vessels, notwithstanding the navigation laws; to plant colonies and build cities and forts in places not already inhabited, or in any other places, on obtaining the consent of the natives or other inhabitants; to defend themselves, and to take reparation for damage done them by sea or land; and to conclude treaties of peace and commerce with the sovereigns or proprietors of any lands in Asia, Africa, or America, or with any potentate at the time at peace with their own sovereign. That for the space of twenty years all the vessels, merchandise, and other effects of the company, with the exception of sugar and tobacco not the growth of their own plantations, should be free from all duties of every description. That if, contrary to the rights and exemptions of the company, any of their vessels were stopped or detained by foreign powers, his majesty promised to interpose his authority to obtain restitution, reparation, and satisfaction, at the public expense, for the damage so done. That the company's vessels should be bound to proceed from their settlements direct to Scotland, and not, except in cases of necessity, to break bulk elsewhere, and that none of the lieges be permitted to trade to the company's possessions for the period of thirty years without their license. Finally, that all the members, officials, and servants of the company should be declared free from impressment or personal service, and from taxation or excise for twenty years, and that all foreigners who shall become members of the company be declared denizens of Scotland, and entitled to all the privileges of native members.

The act for establishing the company was passed by parliament on the 26th of June, and the king was induced to grant a charter in terms of the act. From the great privileges conferred on the company the projectors naturally expected a large influx of English shareholders, many of the English capitalists being deeply dissatisfied at being debarred from all participation in the lucrative commerce of the East, by the exclusive privileges conferred on the East India Company. The capital of the company was £600,000; and ten of the directors empowered to receive subscriptions were resident in London. Here the subscription books were first opened, in the month of October, and in nine days £300,000, or one half of the capital, was subscribed, and one fourth of it actually paid down.

In February, 1696, the books were opened in Edinburgh and Glasgow, and at first the utmost eagerness to subscribe was manifested by persons of all ranks and conditions, yet it was not until the month of August that the whole subscriptions were filled up.

Meantime the East India Company had taken the alarm—an alarm which soon rose almost to frenzy, and spread to both houses of the English Passing of the Act 26 June.

Subscription books opened in London——and in Edinburgh and Glasgow.

parliament. They had recourse to the unusual measure of holding a conference, and in their united capacity presented an address to the crown against the Scottish company. "By reason," they said, "of the great advantages granted to the Address to the king from both Houses of Parliament.

Scots' East India Company, and the duties and difficulties that lay in that trade in England, a great part of the stock and shipping of this nation would be carried thither, and by this reason Scotland might be made a free port for all East India commodities; and consequently those several places in Europe which were supplied from England would be furnished from Scotland much cheaper than could be done by the English, and, therefore, this nation would lose the benefit of supplying foreign parts with those commodities which had always been a great article in the balance of their foreign trade. Moreover, that the said commodities would unavoidably be brought by the Scots into England by stealth, both by sea and land, to the great prejudice of the English trade and navigation, and to the great detriment of his majesty in his customs. And that, when that nation should have settled themselves, by plantations in America, the English commerce in tobacco, sugar, cotton, wool, skins, masts, &c., would be utterly lost, because the privileges of that nation, granted to them by this act, were such that that kingdom must be the magazine of all commodities, and the English plantations and the traffic there lost to this nation, and the exportation of their own manufactures yearly decreased."*

The answer of the king to this address naturally alarmed the promoters of the company more than the address itself. He is reported to have said: "That he had been ill served in Scotland, but he hoped that some remedies might be found to prevent the inconveniences that might arise from this act."† To show that his majesty was in earnest, the Marquis of Tweeddale and the two secretaries, Dalrymple and Johnston, were immediately dismissed from office.

The House of Commons, not content with their share in the narrow-minded and foolish address to the king, had the arrogance to institute an inquiry into the means by which the act had been obtained in the Scottish parliament. They seized on the company's books and papers in London, and passed a resolution that the directors of the company were guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour. They even went so far as to impeach Lord Belhaven and other distinguished Scottish gentlemen whose names were mentioned in the act as directors of the company,† for administering in England the oath de fidei to a foreign association. Though these proceedings—the manifestations of impotent rage, and practically inoperative—were sufficiently ridiculous, they nevertheless had the effect of alarming the English shareholders, many of whom dropped their connection with the company by failing to pay up their instalments. Their shares thus became forfeited, so that the sum of £100,000 was added to the stock to be subscribed in Scotland; but two days before the time appointed for closing the books, the whole capital, including this addition, was subscribed.

As the directors still found themselves without sufficient capital for carrying on their great undertaking, they determined to extend their applications for subscriptions to friendly trading —effect of this opposition on the English shareholders.

communities on the Continent. The opposition of the king and the English parliament had so intimidated the English shareholders, that in a short time, after deducting the £100,000 added to the stock, there still remained double the amount of English stock unallotted. This the directors now resolved, if practicable, to transfer to foreigners; and, with this view, a deputation was dispatched to Holland and Hamburg to open the subscription books. But the commercial jealousy that had driven them from England pursued them to the Continent. The king, under the influence of the Dutch, as well as of his English advisers, had sent instructions to Sir Paul Rycart, the English resident at Hamburg, to offer the most strenuous opposition to the proceedings of the deputation. He accordingly presented a memorial to the senate or council of burghmasters, informing them that the commissioners then in treaty with their state had no authority from the king, and threatening them with his majesty's displeasure if they should give any countenance to the Scottish company. The senate, justly indignant at this insolent and haughty message, returned the following spirited answer: "We look upon it as a very strange thing, that the king of Britain should offer to hinder us from entering into engagements with his own subjects in Scotland, to whom he has lately given such large privileges by so solemn an act of parliament." By this time nearly the whole £200,000 had been subscribed; but this official disclaimer on the part of Rycart so alarmed the merchants, that the greater part withdrew their subscriptions, and the Scots were thus left almost entirely to their own resources for carrying out their vast undertaking.

Subscriptions opened at Hamburg. Opposition of the English resident.

The indignation and disgust of the people of Scotland were universal and extreme. Numerous memorials were presented to the king from the company and its office-bearers, together with remonstrances to the Scottish officers of state. For a time all seemed in vain. At last, however, on the 2nd of August, 1697, a short answer was returned, assuring the company, that on the king's return to England their complaints would be taken into consideration; and that, in the meantime, instructions had been given to the English

Memorials addressed to the king.

* Parl. Hist., No. 975—976.

† Ibid.

‡ Commons' Journals, 21st January, 1696.

representatives in foreign countries not to employ his majesty's name in obstructing the operations of the company. This turned out to be utterly fallacious, for on application being made to the foreign residents, they declared that they had received no such instructions.

Notwithstanding these multiplied discouragements, the Scots resolved to persist in their scheme, the opposition to which on the part of the English was held to be a testimony in its favour. Six vessels, carrying from thirty to sixty guns, were purchased, or ordered to be built for the company at Hamburg. These were freighted with a cargo of merchandise, military stores, and provisions; and twelve hundred men, three hundred of whom belonged to families of distinction, volunteered to accompany the expedition, ambitious to become the founders of a new state in the western hemisphere—a state bidding fair to rival in magnificence and wealth all the great commercial communities either of ancient or modern times.

Sailing of the expedition. The national enthusiasm excited by this great enterprise extended downwards to the humblest ranks of the community; and, on the 26th of July, the day appointed for the sailing of the expedition, "the whole city of Edinburgh," it is said, "poured down upon Leith to see the colony depart, amid the tears, and prayers, and praises of relations and friends. Many seamen and soldiers, whose services had been refused because more had offered themselves than were needed, were found hid in the ships, and when ordered ashore clung to the ropes and timbers, imploring to go without reward with their companions."

The squadron reached the Gulf of Darien about the end of October, and on the 3rd of November the voyagers disembarked at Acta, a secure and spacious harbour at an equal distance between Portobello and Carthage. The harbour was enclosed by a peninsula stretching southward, and united on the north to the mainland by a narrow neck of land, where they built a fortress, which they named Fort St. Andrew. With the consent of all the native tribes in the neighbourhood, they took possession of the unappropriated territory, which they styled New Caledonia, where they founded New Edinburgh, the intended capital. They established amicable relations with the native chiefs, and made friendly advances to the Spanish authorities at Panama and Carthage. The colony being thus constituted, their council issued a proclamation declaring New Edinburgh to be a free port to all nations, and guaranteeing to all persons who should choose to trade with them, or settle amongst them, an equal participation with themselves in all the rights, privileges, and immunities which had been granted to them.

Intelligence of the founding of the colony reached Edinburgh on the 25th of March, 1699, and was received with a paroxysm of delight, which, though lamentably premature, as was afterwards found, evinced the deep interest taken in the project by the whole nation. "It was celebrated,"

Rejoicings,
&c., in Edinburgh.

we are told, "with the most extravagant rejoicings. Thanks were publicly offered up to God in all the churches of the city. At a public graduation of students, which the magistrates attended in their robes, the professor of philosophy pronounced a harangue in favour of the settlement, the legality of which was maintained in the printed theses of the students. It seems even to have been a common subject of declamation from the pulpit."*

The colonists had arrived in the beginning of winter, to Europeans the most healthful and agreeable period of the colony.

the year in a tropical country; but on the return of summer, the sickly influence of the climate became alarmingly perceptible. Diseases unknown in the temperate climate of Britain began to thin the ranks of the unfortunate settlers, and to paralyse the industry of those who survived. The gentlemen had been unaccustomed to manual labour, and the peasants, inured to the cold regions of the north and sufficiently hardy on their native soil, sunk under the fervour of a tropical sun. The ground in consequence remained uncleared, and the number of huts they had been able to construct were not sufficient for their protection from the rains with which the country is deluged during two-thirds of the year. Provisions in the winter began to fall short; and, as they had not yet been able to raise their subsistence in the colony itself, they had no other resource than their native country, or the British settlements in North America. A vessel with provisions had been dispatched from the Clyde in the month of February, but she never reached her destination, and is supposed to have been burnt at sea; and the colonists, distressed at the want of intelligence from home, sent one of their council to Scotland with an urgent request to the directors of the company, that they would not delay sending them the necessary supplies, and also with an address to the king complaining of the treatment to which they had been subjected, and earnestly soliciting his protection. Before any answer could arrive, Attack by the Spaniards.

however, the infant settlement was attacked by the Spaniards. They were boldly met and defeated by Captain James Montgomery; but the colonists, naturally apprehensive of being harassed by hostilities, which they might not always be able successfully to resist, sunk deeper and deeper into despondency, and were on the point of breaking out into open mutiny. Misfortunes continued to thicken around them. One of their vessels named the Dolphin, on a voyage to Barbadoes, happening to be stranded on the coast of Carthage, the cargo was confiscated, and the commander, Captain Pinkerton, and the whole crew were made prisoners and sent to Spain, to be tried as pirates. In this distressing situation, the unfortunate settlers never had entertained any doubt of being furnished with supplies from the colonies of the west. Here they were again doomed to disappointment. They found, to their horror and consternation, that the king had sent orders to the governors of the British colonies in Jamaica, Barbadoes, New York, and other places, to issue proclamations in his name prohibiting all the settlers, under their respective jurisdictions, from holding any intercourse with the Scottish colony at Darien, or giving them any supplies of provisions, ammunition, or arms. This proved the decisive blow. After struggling on for a short time, during which they were indebted for supplies to the charity of the native Indians, the colony, notwithstanding the earnest remonstrances of Paterson, was broken up, having subsisted only about eight months. In the meantime, a vessel containing three hundred recruits and a quantity of provisions and military stores had sailed from Leith, but on their arrival they found the settlement deserted, and proceeded to Jamaica.

* Arnot's History of Edinburgh.

In the month of November, a third expedition consisting of four vessels, carrying one thousand three hundred men, sailed from the Clyde, notwithstanding indistinct rumours of the fate of the colony had reached the directors. Arriving at their destination, the voyagers were astonished to find the settlement deserted, the huts burned, and the fortifications dismantled, and were with difficulty prevented from re-embarking and returning home. They landed, however, and but for the disunion and misconduct of their leaders, they might have succeeded in restoring the settlement, notwithstanding the manifold and heavy discouragements under which they laboured. Shortly after their arrival, they learned that the Spaniards were again preparing for an attack. Captain Drummond, one of the original council, who had returned from New York, whither he had proceeded after the abandonment of the settlement, proposed to anticipate this movement on the part of the Spaniards by attacking them before they had time to complete their preparations; but this bold and politic scheme was frustrated by the jealousy and pusillanimity of the council, to whom the conduct of the expedition had been entrusted. At this juncture, Captain Campbell of Fanab, an intrepid officer, who had served in the Earl of Argyll's regiment in Flanders, arrived in the settlement, and prepared, with only two hundred men, to take the field against the invaders. Meantime the Spanish land forces, amounting, it is alleged, to fifteen hundred men, accompanied by a large body of Indians, were advancing from Panama and Santa Maria, through the forest. Campbell met them, and, after a short conflict, defeated and dispersed them.

But this victory, though decisive, was of no permanent benefit. The Spanish fleet, consisting of eleven ships under the command of Don Juan Pimianta, blockaded the harbour, and landed a body of troops, by whom the fort was immediately invested beyond hope of relief, and on the 18th of March the colony capitulated on honourable terms. The settlers, carrying their goods along with them, embarked for Jamaica, but misfortune still pursued them. One of their vessels was wrecked on the western coast of Cuba, and another was lost on the bar of Carolina with its whole passengers and crew, sixteen excepted. Campbell, in the meantime, seeking the vengeance of the Spaniards, had escaped to New York, from which he embarked for Scotland. The remainder of the colonists were so weakened by disease and famine that they were unable, without the assistance of the Spaniards, even to weigh the anchors of the vessels in which they had embarked. Their voyage was to the last degree disastrous. They were forced to take refuge in English ports, where some of them voluntarily remained; and in Spanish ports, where others were detained as prisoners; and it was not until after the lapse of many months that a remnant of the unfortunate colonists, numbering only about thirty persons, reached their native shores.

Many causes, no doubt, concurred in bringing about the ruin of this splendid scheme, but the chief of these unquestionably were the selfishness and narrow-minded jealousy of the English merchants, and the unworthy compliance, and most unjustifiable policy of the king.

The indignation and despair of the people of Scotland at the destruction of their favourite project, were manifested by undisguised hatred against the government, and public commotions amounting almost to rebellion. Such was the exasperation of the public mind against the king, who was regarded as the chief author of the disaster, that a feeling in favour of the exiled house of Stewart began to revive. Not only had the reasonable hopes of the people been bitterly disappointed, but individuals and families innumerable had been ruined; and the large sums of money sunk and lost in the project were more than a country so poor as Scotland then was could lose without the risk of national bankruptcy. To all these substantial causes of discontent must be added a sense of wounded national pride. Scotland felt that her commercial interests as an ancient and independent kingdom were entirely subordinated to those of her ancient rival, to whom she was now attached like a conquered province. The memory of former independence aggravated the sense of present degradation, and the origin of every social calamity was referred to the union of the two crowns, and the pernicious influence of English councils on the affairs of Scotland.

It is no apology for the injustice and cruelty with which Scotland was treated at this period to say that good has ultimately been evolved out of evil. The opposition manifested towards the Darien scheme, and the consequent failure of that great project, though it partly retarded, contributed in the end most materially to bring about that incorporating union by which Scotland has gained far more than she had lost; and both nations, as a united kingdom, have risen to a height of national greatness, wealth, and power, and assumed a higher rank among the nations of the world than either separately could ever have attained.

Indignation and despair of the people of Scotland.

Ultimate effect of the loss of Darien.

Justice to the memory of William Paterson demands one closing remark. Like most men in advance of their age, as he undoubtedly was, he died in poverty and neglect; but posterity must ever regard him as a man of profound practical sagacity, enlarged and liberal views, and disinterested patriotism. The failure of the great scheme of which he was the projector is no argument against the scheme itself, and is sufficiently accounted for by an opposition which he could not have anticipated, and which the nation itself had not the power to resist.

The loss of Darien rankled long in the minds of the Scottish people, and alienated their affections from the government of William. While the fate of the colony was still pending, the council-general of the company resolved to make a personal appeal to the king against the treatment which they had received from his officers; but Lord Basil Hamilton, a young and popular nobleman, to whom their address was entrusted, was refused an audience, with an expression of displeasure that their case should have been committed to one who had given no proof of his affection for his majesty's government.* A general national address was then presented to the king by the Marquis of Tweeddale, requesting him to submit the affairs of the company to a parliament, but it was received with contemptuous indifference. When the Estates met in May, 1700, in spite of the urgent entreaties of Queensberry, the commissioner, and Marchmont, the chancellor, they proceeded to take up a resolution to maintain the colony of Caledonia, in Darien, as a legal and rightful settlement. The commissioner, finding that the resolution would certainly be carried, adjourned the parliament amid general expressions of deep discontent.

In this excited state of the public mind, news arrived of the defeat of the Spaniards at Tubacante. An illumination was immediately ordered in the capital, and the populace seized the opportunity of venting their displeasure upon the members of the government by smashing the windows of their houses. They next proceeded to the house of the lord-advocate, and demanded the liberation of two prisoners confined for circulating hand-bills on the Darien question. Their demand not having been complied with so promptly as they wished, they broke open the Tolbooth, and set at liberty their friends, along with all the other prisoners, the musical bells of St. Giles's all the while playing "Wilfu' Willie."

* Dalrymple mentions that Lord Basil, determined that the address should reach the royal hands, watched his majesty's exit from the Saloon of Audience, and thrust the address into his hands. "That young man is too bold," said William; and then, admiring his spirit, he added, "if a man can be too bold in the cause of his country."

The government seem to have been either unable or afraid to take vigorous steps to punish the rioters. Four only of their number were, after much delay, brought to trial, one of whom was condemned to be scourged, and three to be pilloried; but their sentence partook more of the character of a triumph than of a punishment—"The mob," says Carstairs, "huzzaing them all along, and throwing flowers and roses on the iron for their honour, and wine going about like water."*

The public mind continued in a state of great exasperation. A new national address was prepared of the most inflammatory kind; and when the parliament assembled on the 29th of October, the table was loaded with angry addresses and petitions from every part of the country, and the votes and proceedings of the English parliament respecting the Darien Company, the memorial to the Senate of Hamburg, and the proclamations issued by the governors of the English colonies, were condemned in the strongest terms by the Estates; and it was agreed to transmit to the king a resolution asserting the legality of the settlement at Darien. There is reason to believe that William sympathised with the misfortunes of his Scottish subjects, and felt the justice of their demands; but it was beyond his power to grant them redress, and he was compelled to sacrifice the interests of Scotland to the zealous and selfish policy of the English parliament and people.

The remainder of William's reign in Scotland passed on without any event worthy of notice. He died on the 8th of William, and March, 1702, in the fifty-second accession of Anne. year of his age, and thirteenth of his reign, having survived his consort, Queen Mary, upwards of six years, his father-in-law, James, only four months. William left behind him the character of a great politician, and an able general; and, notwithstanding the wrongs inflicted on the Scottish nation in the massacre of Glencoe, and the affair of Darien, it must be acknowledged that his reign was greatly conducive to the establishment of constitutional liberty. He was succeeded by the Princess Anne, wife of George Prince of Denmark, and the eldest surviving daughter of James II.

* Carstairs' Papers, p. 615.

CHAPTER LVII.

ANNE.

A.D. 1702—1707.

THE union of the two crowns in the person of James the Sixth of Scotland and Long-cherished project of a union.

First of England naturally suggested the idea of such a union between the two kingdoms that both, losing their separate identity, should be merged into one monarchy. Amongst the first to embrace, and the most ardent in cherishing, this idea was James himself; but his scheme was far too comprehensive to be practicable, and embracing, as it did, a complete identification of both nations, not only in civil laws, but especially in religion, naturally failed of success. During the three succeeding reigns, as well as the intervening Protectorate of Cromwell, the project, though beset with difficulties, was never wholly abandoned. The project of James continued to be entertained by his successors, and their attempts to realise it contributed to the extinction of the dynasty of the House of Stewart. Still, however, patriotic and thoughtful men of both countries, though they could not clearly see their way to the result, had discernment enough to perceive that an incorporating union of the two kingdoms, if accomplished without doing violence to the rights of either, must ultimately be productive of many solid advantages to both. The people of Scotland, and especially those of the capital, at first paid dearly for the distinction of having given a sovereign to their ancient rival. The withdrawal of the court to the distant capital of another kingdom, and the consequent resort thither of great numbers of the nobility and wealthy landed proprietors, inflicted a serious injury on trade, which was not balanced by any compensating participation in the more lucrative commerce of the sister kingdom.

Obstacles to a union.

On the contrary, the English were jealous to the last degree of any interference on the part of the Scots with their commercial enterprises; and questions naturally arising out of the claims of the latter, and the selfish and pertinacious resistance of the former, contributed, perhaps more than any other cause, to retard that union between the two kingdoms which all wise and good men had so long desired to see, and which, during the century and a half that have elapsed since its happy accomplishment, has been found a source of incalculable blessings to both sections of the island.

During the whole of his reign, this important measure had been approved by the Message by William to the commons recommending a union.

sound judgment, and cherished by the disinterested patriotism, of William; but the exasperation of the Scottish people at the depression of their trade, and particularly at the failure of the Darien scheme, coupled with the invincible repugnance of the English to the admission of the Scots to equal trading privileges, effectually prevented the execution of this great design. William, however, cherished it to the very close of life, and, when labouring under his last illness, on the 28th of February, 1702, he sent a message to the commons reminding them of his former appeals on this subject, and concluding with these words—"His majesty is fully satisfied that nothing can more contribute to the present and future peace, security, and happiness of England and Scotland than a firm and entire union between them; and he cannot but hope that, upon a due consideration of our present circumstances, there will be found a general disposition to this union. His majesty would esteem it a peculiar felicity if, during his reign, some happy expedient for making both kingdoms one might take place, and is therefore extremely desirous that a treaty for that purpose might be set on foot, and does, in the most earnest manner, recommend this affair to the consideration of the house."* His approaching dissolution, however, forbade the hope of his surviving to witness the fulfilment of this wish, which lay so near to his heart; and shortly after his death, all the elements of discord by which the measure had been so long retarded, broke out with redoubled fury.

The accession of the Princess Anne, the eldest surviving and only Protestant daughter of James, was agreeable, though for very different reasons, to all the great parties into which the nation was divided. It was acceptable to the Whigs, or constitutional party, because it was according to the Revolution Settlement; to the Tories, who were delighted to see a Stewart again occupying the throne; and to the Jacobites, because they entertained the expectation that her natural affection would lead her, in the event of her decease, to secure the succession to her brother, whom they regarded as the rightful heir to the crown.

Accession of the Princess Anne. State of parties.

The Convention parliament, which had subsisted during the whole of the preceding reign, had now lost much of its original popularity. From its unusually protracted duration, the ministry had found and embraced opportunities of acquiring an undue influence over a majority of the members, and, as the loss of Darien was universally ascribed to the pernicious influence of English councils, a powerful opposition party was now formed in parliament. With this party the Jacobites, who now began to assume the name of Cavaliers, formed a junction, and the Duke of Hamilton became its ostensible leader, instigated, probably, by ambition to supplant the Duke of Queensberry in the administration, rather than by any promptings of patriotic feeling, either for the commercial interests or the national independence of Scotland.

By an act passed in the preceding reign, for the security of the kingdom, in the event of the demise of the crown, it had been provided that, after the death of the king, the Estates should assemble within twenty days, and continue their sittings for a period not exceeding six months.

* Journal of Lords and Commons, 10th February to 6th March, 1700.

Act for the continuance of parliament
after the death of the sovereign.

Their legislative power, however, was restricted to the passing of such acts as were necessary for the public safety, and the security of the Protestant succession—all innovation on the constitution or the established laws of the kingdom being expressly prohibited.*

Hamilton and his party did their utmost to secure

Meeting of parliament.
Dissent and retirement of Hamilton and his adherents—

an immediate dissolution of this long-protracted parliament. Accompanied by the Marquis of Tweeddale, and the Earls Marischal and Rothes, he made an unavailing personal application to the queen for this purpose; but her majesty issued a proclamation for the assembling of parliament on the 9th of June, in terms of the statute, and appointed Queensberry to act as her commissioner. Before his commission was read, however, Hamilton rose to address the house, and persisted in doing so, in spite of the remonstrances of Queensberry, who urged him to wait until the house was constituted. He began by congratulating the house on the happy accession of her majesty, as being lineally descended from their ancient line of kings, and as being endowed with many personal qualities, which furnished ground to hope for numerous national blessings under her rule; and, after many professions of devoted loyalty, he added, "But, at the same time that we acknowledge our submission to her majesty's authority, we think ourselves bound in duty, by virtue of the obedience we owe to the standing laws of the nation, and because of the regard we ought to have for the rights and liberties of our fellow-subjects, to declare our opinion as to the legality of this meeting, viz., that we do not think ourselves warranted by law to sit and act any longer as a parliament; and that, by so doing, we shall incur the hazard of losing our lives and fortunes if our proceedings shall come to be questioned by future parliaments." At the conclusion of this address, which took the court party completely by surprise, he proceeded, in name of all who should adhere to him, as well as in his own, to read the following reasons of dissent:—"Forasmuch as, by the fundamental laws and constitution of the kingdom, all parliaments do dissolve by the death of the king or queen, except in so far as innovated by the seventeenth act, sixth session of King William's parliament last, in being at his decease to meet and act what should be needful for the defence of the true Protestant religion, as now by law established, and maintaining the succession to the crown as settled by the Claim of Right, and for preserving and securing the peace and safety of the kingdom: and seeing that the said ends are fully satisfied by her majesty's succession to the throne, whereby the religion and peace of the country are secured, we conceive ourselves not now warranted by law to meet, sit, or act, and therefore do dissent from anything that shall be done or acted."

* Parl. 1696, c. 17.

Having finished the reading of this document, he withdrew, followed by nearly eighty of the members; and, on issuing from the house, they were received with loud acclamations by the multitude assembled in the Parliament Square. They afterwards dispatched Lord Blantyre to court with an address justifying their procedure to the queen, who, however, would not permit it to be read in her presence. She returned a gracious reply to the address of the remaining members, —the queen refuses to hear their justification.

in which she strongly censured the presumption of Hamilton and his adherents. In the meantime the Dean and Faculty of Advocates, who had subscribed an address approving of the conduct of the dissentients, were called to the bar of the house to answer for their temerity, but no farther proceedings were taken against them. A charge was afterwards brought forward against the seceding members by her majesty's advocate, which was remitted to the privy-council. The remaining members, known by the name of "the Rump," proceeded, notwithstanding this formidable secession, to the dispatch of business, and during the brief period of their sitting, they passed resolutions in support of the Darien scheme, and of their claims to free trade, and made arrangements for concerting measures with the English parliament for bringing about a union of the two kingdoms. An act was also passed declaring it high-treason to disown or impugn the authority either of the queen or the parliament. A supply of ten months, to be raised in two years, was voted unanimously, and a farther act was passed, authorising her majesty to "appoint commissioners to treat for a union, the Estates of parliament being fully satisfied that such a union is needful, and would be very advantageous for the defence of the true Protestant religion, and for the better preserving and establishing the peace, safety, and happiness of both kingdoms,"—a similar bill having, a few weeks before, been passed by the parliament of England.

Before the rising of the house, an unexpected division took place among the presbyterian party, occasioned by the zeal of the Earl of Marchmont, the chancellor, who introduced a bill for the abjuring the queen's brother, the pretended Prince of Wales. Some considered that an act of this kind was necessary in order to secure the Protestant succession, as well as to exclude disaffected persons from the next parliament, while others were averse to the settlement of the crown until redress of grievances should be obtained from England. The commissioner, unwilling to allow this grave question, on which the ministers had received no instructions, to go to a division, abruptly adjourned the parliament until the 18th of August.

The commissioners appointed to treat of a union, on the part of both kingdoms, assembled at Westminster on the 10th of November. They had

Division among the presbyterian party.

They had scarcely commenced their deliberations when it

Meeting of the commissioners— became obvious that the great obstacle to a union was the claim, on the part of the Scots, to an equal participation in the privileges of English commerce. To this the English commissioners were most unwilling to accede; nevertheless they agreed, though with some difficulty, to open up the plantation trade to Scottish enterprise; and they could not help admitting the reasonableness of the claim to a mutual participation in commercial advantages, as well as its necessity, in order to a complete and permanent union. The Scots, on the other hand, reluctantly agreed to submit to the same imposts on home consumption as the English, but they absolutely refused to bear any share in the liquidation of the English national debt, or to give up their Darien Company. The English commissioners considered the existence of that company incompatible with that of the East India Company, which they were equally unwilling to relinquish; and the difficulties thus arising led to an adjournment of the treaty without arriving at any definite conclusion on these important points. On other matters, which were in reality much more important, there was more unanimity; and the conference, though apparently unproductive of solid results, contributed not a little towards facilitating that happy union, through which Great Britain has arrived at its present height of wealth and power. Before their adjournment, which took place on the 3rd of February,* they unanimously agreed to the two fundamental articles, that the two kingdoms should be incorporated into one monarchy, according to the Act of Settlement, and that the people should be represented by one —result of their deliberations. and the same parliament. The result of their deliberations was embodied in the following general conclusions:—"Agreed by the lords commissioners for both kingdoms, that neither kingdom shall be burdened with the debts of the other contracted before the union; and that no duty on home consumption or taxes to be levied from Scotland shall be applied to the payment of English debts; and that some time is to be allowed to Scotland to reap the benefit of the communication of trade, and to enable them the better to pay duties on home consumption equal to England, but that it is most proper to be determined in the respective parliaments of both kingdoms." In anticipation, however, of the renewal of the conferences, the Scottish commissioners, with characteristic national caution, left on record, "that if the existing companies for carrying on the same traffic should appear to the English destructive of trade, they did not expect that their lordships would insist that the privileges of the Scots' company should be abandoned without offering, at the same time, to purchase their right at the public expense."†

* De Foë's Hist. of the Union, App. 14; Tindal's Continuation of Rapin, III. 558.

† Proceedings of the Commissioners appointed to treat for a Union, 1702, App. to Scot. Acts, vol. xi.

It will be recollected that the parliament now sitting was, in fact, the Convention of Estates that had carried the Revolution Settlement. Its authority as a parliament, into which it had been converted during the preceding reign, had been originally matter of dispute, but its continued existence during the present reign, in defiance of the principle of the Scottish constitution, that the representatives of the people shall be elected annually, was considered absolutely illegal, and produced great and general discontent. The country party especially, since their secession, began to dispute the authority of the Rump, and even to refuse payment of the taxes which it imposed. In these circumstances, and more especially now that the great question of the Union was agitating the public mind, it was found that the demand for a new parliament could no longer be resisted. All parties were now on the alert to secure, if possible, a majority at the impending election. The state of political parties was, at this time, quite anomalous. The administration itself, in consequence of recent changes, was divided into two parties, each jealous of the other. The country party, opposed to both, were also split into two sections—the rigid presbyterians, and the independent gentlemen to whom presbytery and episcopacy were matters of indifference. Of the latter, Hamilton and Tweeddale were the principal leaders. The Jacobites or Cavaliers formed a third party, not sufficiently numerous for effective independent action, but weighty enough to give a preponderance to any of the other parties, to which they might think it expedient to attach themselves.* Lord Seafield, the chancellor, artfully courted this party, and, by flattering them with assurances of the queen's secret attachment, succeeded in winning them over to the government. With a view to increase their numbers, an indemnity was granted for all their political offences since the Revolution, and such of them as had been driven into exile were thus at liberty to return home unmolested.

During the first session of the new parliament, though the great question which agitated the national mind was scarcely even named, there can be no doubt that the discussions which then arose, and which were carried on with a vehemence and acrimony to which the Scottish legislature had hitherto been a stranger, indirectly paved the way to a union between the two kingdoms. The loss of Darien still continued to rankle in the public mind, and all the misfortunes that had befallen the nation since the union of the crowns, particularly the depressed state of trade, and the constant defeat of every attempt to improve or extend the commercial relations of the country, were all ascribed, directly or indirectly, to the predominating influence of the English cabinet,

* Cunningham, vol. i. pp. 324, 325; Redpath, pp. 20, 31; Lockhart, p. 35.

Public discontent at the duration of parliament.

Exertions of parties to secure a majority in the new parliament.

State of the public mind.

an influence, which it was ultimately found that no expedient short of an incorporating union could effectually neutralise.

In June, 1700, the English parliament passed an Act of Succession, settling the crown, on the failure of Queen Anne and her issue, upon the Princess Sophia, Electress-dowager of Hanover, and her descendants. It became a matter of the greatest importance to the peace of the two countries that the legislature of Scotland should settle the crown of that kingdom in a similar manner. But the Scottish people were by no means inclined to concur in the proposed Act of Succession. Instead of complying with the wishes of the English ministry, the parliament of Scotland passed a measure called the Act of Security, by which it was provided that, in case of Queen Anne's death without children, the Scottish Estates should choose a successor of the royal line and Protestant religion; but it was expressly stipulated that the same person should be incapable of holding the crowns of both kingdoms, unless the honour and independence of the Scottish nation should be secured, and the Scottish people admitted to share with the English the full benefits of navigation and trade. It was provided

Alarm in England. by the same statute that the nation should be placed in a state of defence; and with that view the whole able-bodied population were ordered to muster under their respective heritors or borough magistrates. It soon became evident that a perilous crisis was approaching, and rumours of warlike preparations going on in Scotland, of the training of soldiers, and the importation of arms and military accoutrements, at length excited great alarm in England, and engaged the serious attention of the Discussion in the English parliament. English parliament. In a discussion on the Act of Security, Lord Haversham remarked, "There are two matters of all troubles, much discontent and great poverty; and whoever will now look into Scotland will find them both in that kingdom. It is certain the nobility and gentry of Scotland are as learned and as brave as any nation can boast of; and these are generally discontented. And as to the common people, they are very numerous, and very stout, but very poor. And who is the man that can answer what such a multitude, so armed, so disciplined, with such leaders, may do—especially since opportunities do so much alter men from themselves?"* An address was presented to the queen entreating her to order fortifications to be erected at Newcastle and Tynemouth, and the works at Carlisle and Hull to be repaired. She was further requested to embody the militia of the four northern counties, and to dispatch regular

Bill passed by the lords for the union of the two kingdoms—troops to the Border. The great remedy, however, was seen to be in a union, which these alarms thus contributed to hasten. On the 20th of December, 1704, their lordships read a third time, and sent down to the commons,

* Parl. Hist. v. i. p. 370.

a bill for the entire union of the two kingdoms. The consideration of the bill was for a time postponed. The commons, perceiving in this critical and alarming juncture an opportunity of asserting and strengthening their assumed privilege of originating all supplies, affected to treat the pecuniary penalties mentioned in the bill as matters of supply, and accordingly, leaving their lordships' bill to lie on the table, brought in one of their own. On the 1st of February it was passed and sent to the lords, who immediately agreed to it without discussion. By this statute (3 and 4 Anne, c. vii.) provision was made for a —superseded by one originating in the lower house. treaty of union, and her majesty was authorised to appoint commissioners to meet with such commissioners as might be appointed by authority of the Scottish parliament, and to submit the result of their deliberations to the sovereign and the legislature of each kingdom. But the measure thus passed, though a great step in advance, was still tarnished by a display of that commercial jealousy, which more than any other cause retarded the settlement of this important question. It was provided, that, after the 25th Restriction clauses. of December, 1705, until the succession to the crown of Scotland should be determined in the same line as that of England, no native of Scotland, except those already settled in the English dominion, or attached to the military or naval service, should acquire the privileges of a national born Englishman; that, in the meantime, under heavy penalties, no horses, arms, or ammunition should be conveyed from England or Ireland into Scotland; and that ultimately no coals, cattle, sheep, or native linen should be imported from Scotland. By a final clause, it was enacted that the commissioners should not be empowered to treat for "any alteration of the liturgy; rites, ceremonies, discipline, or government of the Church, as by law established."

The restrictive clauses of this bill, which seemed to savour of intimidation, offended the national pride of the Scots, and tended to alienate the minds of many from the proposed union. Unfortunate incident. Fate of Captain Green.

Unfortunately, at this juncture, an incident occurred which served to exasperate the mutual jealousies and animosities of both kingdoms. The Darien Company, notwithstanding the ruin that had befallen their colony, had not entirely abandoned their commercial enterprises; and at this time one of their vessels, called the Annandale, which they intended to charter for the East India trade, was confiscated in the Thames by the East India Company, and the owners in vain petitioned for restitution or payment. Shortly afterwards a vessel named the Worcester, employed in the East India traffic, put into Burntisland, a harbour on the Frith of Forth, for repairs. This unexpected coincidence suggested the idea that she ought to be seized by way of reprisal for the capture of the Annandale; and the Darien Company, proceeding on a clause in their act of parliament, authorising them to make reprisal for damage done by sea and land, issued a warrant for the seizure of the vessel. The government officials declined taking any part in the proceeding, but the secretary of the company managed, partly by stratagem, partly by force, to get possession of the ship. Meanwhile, the crew of the Worcester, having been indulging too freely in liquor, some of them happened to let fall certain unguarded expressions, which led to a suspicion that they had captured a vessel sent by the Darien Company to the East Indies, and had murdered the captain and the whole of the crew. This suspicion was strengthened by the circumstance that a vessel called the Speedy Return had been absent unusually long, and that rumours regarding her fate, very much akin to the confessions of the crew of the Worcester, had for some time been afloat. A report of these circumstances having reached the privy-council, an investigation was instituted, which resulted in Green, the captain of the vessel, and thirteen of his crew being apprehended and sent to trial on a charge of piracy and murder. The evidence produced against them, so far as we are in possession of it, would not be held sufficient by a jury of the present day to warrant a conviction; but the matter was regarded from a political, rather than a legal point of view, both by the court and the jury; and the accused were accordingly found guilty and condemned to death. This judgment gave serious uneasiness to a large party, who foresaw in the effect it was likely to produce on the minds of the English an obstacle to the union. They held the evidence against the accused to be defective, while those who were adverse to this measure professed to consider it as

Indecisive conduct of the privy-council.

quite conclusive. The privy-council were extremely reluctant to permit the sentence to be put in execution. They first resisted, and would certainly have pardoned the unfortunate men, but a loud cry for vengeance arose from the populace, which the council had not sufficient firmness to resist. On the day appointed for the execution, the populace, apprehensive of being disappointed of their victims, assembled in vast numbers at the Cross and in Parliament Square, threatened to break open the doors of the prison, menaced the privy-council, surrounded the coach of the lord-chancellor, forced him to alight, and put his life in imminent jeopardy. The authorities yielded to the storm. Green and two of his crew were conducted to Leith amidst the shouts and execrations

Execution of Green and two of his crew.

of the infuriated mob, and there hanged upon a gibbet erected within high-water mark. This took place on the 11th of April, and the rest of the crew, after being detained in prison until autumn, were unconditionally set at liberty by the privy-council, who considered the evidence on which they were convicted defective. Indeed, there was afterwards good reason to believe that Captain Drummond, the man whom they had been accused of murdering, was still alive in India, after the fate of Green and his two unfortunate comrades was sealed.*

When these events became known in England, the indignation of the populace was raised to the highest pitch; the English. Indignation of and numerous handbills, tracts, and pamphlets, many of which are still preserved, helped to fan the flame of national resentment. Every enlightened patriot in both kingdoms deplored these animosities, which they regarded as but too probably a prelude to international hostilities; and government, warned by the presages of the coming storm, now began to look upon an incorporating union as the only haven of safety for the vessel of the state.

With a view to accomplish this desirable object, some changes were made in the Scottish administration. Tweeddale was again nominally placed at its head; but the Duke of Argyll, a young nobleman of great promise, was appointed commissioner to open the next session of parliament, with instructions to labour for the establishment of the same Protestant succession as in England, or, failing in that attempt, to endeavour to procure an act for a treaty of union.

When parliament assembled on the 28th of June, it was found that the members were divided into three parties,—the government party, consisting of the adherents of Queensberry; the Jacobites and a portion of the country party; and the adherents of Tweeddale, comprising a section of the presbyterians and the late courtiers. These last, pretending to be guided entirely by the love of country, did not adhere permanently to any party, but were ready to shift sides according to circumstances, and thus to hold as it were the balance of power in their own hands. The Jacobites, mortified and indignant at the influence thus exercised by this party, bestowed on them the nickname of the “Squadron Volanté.”

Meeting of parliament.
State of parties.

In the queen's message the attention of the house was earnestly invited to the settlement of the succession, and a hope was expressed that the Estates would follow the example of the English parliament, and appoint a commission to treat for a legislative union. After considerable discussion, in which not a little acrimonious feeling was manifested, an answer to the message was drawn up and submitted to the house, when an amendment was proposed and carried, that before taking up the queen's message they should proceed to the consideration of the state of the coin, and of the export and import trade of the country. In the course of their deliberations, however, on these subjects, the questions regarding the succession and the union between the two kingdoms underwent a good deal of incidental discussion.

The queen's message.

Before the great question of the union came fairly before the house, there was considerable discussion concerning the limitation projects that had been suggested during the previous session. The object of these plainly was to free the government from English influence, a consummation which many would have thought cheaply purchased by the sacrifice even of the monarchy itself.

* Burton's Narratives of Criminal Trials in Scotland.

At last, on the 25th of August, on the motion of Act for a the Earl of Mar, the House resumed consideration of the treaty of union. treaty of union. for a union with England, and the first draft of an act for that purpose was submitted to the house. It empowered commissioners to meet and treat with the English commissioners, but expressly withheld authority to treat of any alteration in the government, worship, or discipline of the Church, as by law established; and provided that nothing treated of, or agreed to, by the commissioners should have any strength or effect whatever until confirmed by the

Proceedings
of parliament regarding the treaty for a union.

authority of the Scottish parliament. With a secret view to obstruct the progress of the measure, which he durst not openly oppose, it was moved by the Duke of Hamilton, "that the union should in no wise derogate from any fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, rights, liberties, or dignities of the nation." By this insidious motion the ministers were placed in a dilemma. They were unwilling to agree to it, considering it too general and comprehensive, and yet afraid to oppose it on the ground of its being inconsistent with a union. They, however, resisted it ostensibly on the grounds that it implied a distrust of her majesty, and did not correspond with the ample powers conferred on her commissioners by the parliament of England. Hamilton and his adherents, on the other hand, concealing their real motives, which were, in fact, to obstruct the progress of the measure, contended that the preservation of the national independence was a sine quâ non, which could not be made the subject of a treaty, and to maintain which at the present juncture was indispensably necessary, as the influence of English councils was fast reducing the country to the condition of a dependent province. They maintained that the queen could not reasonably be offended with such a clause, as her residence at a distance precluded an intimate acquaintance with Scottish affairs, and as little could the English parliament, who in their instructions to their commissioners had expressly reserved all power to treat regarding the government of the Church. On a division of the house, the motion was lost by a majority of two votes. Another clause was proposed by Athol to the effect that the commissioners should neither leave the kingdom nor enter on the treaty until the act of the English parliament declaring the Scots to be aliens, and their trade illicit, should be repealed by the English parliament. Fletcher of Saltoun, one of the most ardent lovers of liberty, and one of the most disinterested patriots of his own, or any other age, moved that a loyal and dutiful address should be presented to her majesty:—"That the act lately passed by the parliament of England, containing a proposal for a treaty of union of the two kingdoms, is made in such injurious terms to the honour and interest of this nation, that we, who represent this kingdom in parliament, can no ways comply with it, which we the more regret because it has this session been recommended by the royal letter. But out of the great sense of duty we owe her majesty, we declare we will be always ready to comply with any proposal from the parliament of England, whenever it shall be made in liberal terms, neither dishonourable nor disadvantageous to the nation." The firm yet temperate tone of this address could not but recommend it to the favourable consideration of the house. A majority, however, were unwilling that the progress of the treaty should be interrupted by any display of acrimonious feeling, and the house accordingly proceeded with the consideration of the bill. On the 30th of August some of its details, after mature deliberation, were finally adjusted for appointing and passed; and, on the 1st of commissioners.

September, a general resolution was agreed to, "that commissioners for treating of a union should not meet those authorised on the part of England until the act of the English parliament, so offensive to Scotland, were repealed."* But the question now came to be whether this resolution should form part of the act, or be made the subject of an address to her majesty; and after a discussion of extraordinary warmth, the latter was carried by a majority of only two votes.†

The act for appointing commissioners was now carried, but a question of vital importance still remained undecided—who should have the appointment of the commissioners—the parliament or the queen? If the former, the commissioners would obviously have it in their power either indefinitely to retard, or wholly to frustrate the treaty; if the latter, the nomination would virtually be vested in the English ministry, and the independence, as well as the commercial interests of the country, might thus be sacrificed. The country party and the Jacobites had been looking to a parliamentary appointment, as affording them their last chance of frustrating the measure by prolonging the discussion, and wearying and disgusting their opponents by continued obstructions; and the English parliament had been so keenly alive to the importance of the question that, even if the Scots should accede to a union, they were to be held as aliens, unless the queen were invested with the appointment of the Scottish commissioners.

The debate had been protracted to a late hour and the members of the opposition, exhausted by the heats and discussions of the day, and thinking no more business would be transacted at that sitting, had begun to retire, when, to the astonishment and consternation of those who still remained in the house, Hamilton, who had been gained over betrays his party.

Hamilton

* Jerviswood Correspondence, p. 118.

† Lockhart Papers, i. 130.

to the ministry by a promise that he should be on the commission, unexpectedly stood up, and, addressing himself to the chancellor, moved that the appointment of the commissioners should be with the queen. An exciting scene followed this proposal. A few of the party that remained were frantic in their opposition, and bitterly reproached Hamilton with surrendering their country to the English cabinet; while the rest, instead of remaining to endeavour to counteract the mischief, rushed out of the house in rage and despair, exclaiming that they had been deceived and betrayed. The court party, on the other hand, did not trouble themselves much with argument, but called loudly

The queen empowered to appoint the commissioners.

for the vote. On a division, it was found that Hamilton's motion was carried by a majority of not more than eight—a number so inconsiderable that, had the deserters remained, they were sufficiently numerous to have turned the scale against their opponents. Athol, however, entered an unavailing protest, which was signed by twenty-one noblemen, thirty-three barons, and eight commissioners of boroughs.

After voting the supply, and passing some comparatively unimportant acts, parliament was prorogued on the 21st September, and Argyll returned to court in triumph.

A clause was inserted into the act, providing that the conditions of the treaty, as settled by the commissioners, should be committed to three separate writings, one for her majesty, and one for each parliament. The principal members of the administration accompanied or followed Argyll to London, to assist in the negotiations for this important treaty.

The majority of the nation were desirous rather of a federal than an incorporating union, considering the latter as implying a surrender, not merely of their legislature, but of their national independence; while the English looked to the advantages of additional population and power, internal tranquillity, and external strength which an entire union of the two kingdoms could alone secure. At the same time, many sagacious and patriotic men of both nations regarded such a union as a safeguard to public liberty, inasmuch as it would for ever put an end to the exercise of that abominable policy to which the house of Stewart had been no strangers—of employing the one nation to enslave the other. To the queen herself, it was recommended by the glory of ruling over a large and undivided empire, and as having achieved what the greatest of her predecessors had ardently desired, but had attempted in vain.

In the month of March, thirty-one commissioners for each kingdom were appointed by the queen to meet in London. Among these Hamilton, notwithstanding the promise that had been made to him, was not included, and Argyll, who had been a party to that promise, being offended at the omission of Hamilton's name, withdrew his own. One individual alone, George Lockhart, of Carnwath, was selected from the Jacobite party, in order to give a semblance of impartiality in the choice of commissioners. In vindicating his acceptance of the appointment, Lockhart himself said that he took no part in the discussions, but merely went to the meetings as a privileged spy.*

At length, on the 16th of April, 1706, the commissioners assembled in the old council-chamber of the cockpit at Whitehall. The first meeting was occupied with an interchange of addresses, which seem to have been more matters of courtesy and compliment than of any practical bearing on the important business that had brought them together. On the part of Scotland, the address was presented by the Earl of Seafield, the chancellor; on that of England, by the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. An adjournment of six days followed, and on the 22nd the commissioners met for the dispatch of business. They began by arranging their plan of procedure. It was agreed that the commissioners for each country should separately offer, for the adoption of the whole body, such propositions as they deemed proper to form the basis of the union; that thereafter each party should separately deliberate on the propositions thus offered, and report to the whole body their approval or rejection. They further agreed that each proposal should be made in writing, and each article agreed on put on record, but that nothing should be considered as conclusively settled until the entire treaty should be drawn up and ready to be submitted to both parliaments. A few of the commissioners on each side were appointed as a committee to watch over and note the proceedings, in order to obviate any dispute that might otherwise occur as to what had been agreed on, and a resolution was passed that "all the proceedings of the commissioners of both kingdoms during the treaty be kept secret!"

These preliminary arrangements having been agreed on, the first proposal made on the part of England—
First proposal made on the part of England.
"That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland be for ever united into one kingdom by the name of Great Britain. That the united kingdom of Great Britain be represented by one and the same parliament, and that the succession to the monarchy of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, in case of failure of heirs of her majesty's body, be according to the limitations mentioned in an act of parliament made in England in the twelfth and thirteenth year of the late King William, intituled, 'An act for the further limitation of the crown, and the better securing the rights and liberties of the subject.'"

The Scottish commissioners were inclined to acquiesce in this proposal, but well knowing that the great body of their countrymen were not prepared to go farther than a federal union, they were unwilling, without the appearance at least of hesitation, to run counter to public opinion. They therefore requested a short delay, and an adjournment of two days took place accordingly. On their again meeting the Scottish commissioners, instead of giving a direct answer to the proposal of the Proposals on English, submitted certain proposals of their own. These were, in substance, that the succession to the crown should be the same as that in England ; that the subjects of both kingdoms should enjoy the same rights and privileges, and that there should be a mutual free trade between the two nations and the plantations. Afraid, however, lest an appearance of inflexible adherence to these proposals should lead to an interruption of the treaty, they desired their lord-chancellor to intimate that by making these proposals, they did not wish to be understood as rejecting an entire union. The English commissioners had the penetration to see that these proposals were neither expected nor intended to be seriously entertained, and accordingly they did not waste time in discussing them. Indeed, they appear, from the manner in which they replied to their Scottish brethren, to have all along looked to an entire and incorporating union as the principal, if not the only object of their labours. They therefore firmly, yet courteously, demanded an answer to their own proposal as a condition without which they should decline proceeding farther—"The lords commissioners of England," they say,

* Lockhart Papers, vol. i.

Answer of the English commissioners.

"are so fully convinced that nothing but an entire union of the two kingdoms will settle perfect and lasting friendship between them, that they therefore think fit to decline entering into any further consideration of the proposal now made by the lords commissioners for Scotland, as not tending to that end, and desire that the lords commissioners for Scotland would be pleased to give in their answer to the proposal delivered on Monday, the 22nd instant, by the lords commissioners for England, in order to an entire union of both kingdoms."

In the private consultations of the Scottish commissioners, it was proposed that, in order to their vindication in the eyes of their countrymen, they should reiterate their former demand, so that if, as they hoped and believed, they should fail of success, they might seem to yield only to necessity. This subterfuge, however, was ultimately abandoned, lest it should offer any interruption to the progress of the treaty, and, next day, the Scottish commissioners signified their acceptance of the English proposal, accompanied, however, with a demand that there should be a reciprocal communication of the rights of citizens, and equal trading privileges. To this condition the English commissioners at once assented as "a necessary consequence" of an incorporating union, so that nothing now remained but to adjust the details—a matter by no means easy, seeing so many important and conflicting interests had to be brought to harmonise, and so many deep-rooted national prejudices had to be overcome.

An entire union agreed on.

The first question that presented itself was the difficult one of taxation. How Taxation.

were the public burdens to be apportioned between a wealthy nation loaded with debt, and a nation comparatively poor, though without that incumbrance,—the one a great commercial people, the other with a small and declining trade? This was the problem to be solved, and it is impossible not to admire the prudence and sagacity of the eminent statesmen by whom the task was accomplished. The national debt of England at this period amounted to twenty millions; its annual revenue to about one-fourth of that sum. Scotland, as we have seen, was free from the burden of debt, while its annual revenue amounted to no more than from £120,000 to £130,000. England had a great and increasing trade, with a heavy taxation; while the trade of Scotland was small and languishing, and the revenue raised from customs and excise quite insignificant: but, as the public revenue of England was partly applied to the liquidation of the national debt, with which Scotland had no concern, it was manifest that a system of equal taxation over the United Kingdom would be fraught with manifest injustice, as Scotland would thus be compelled to contribute towards the extinction of a debt which it had not incurred. Scotland, indeed, from the poverty of its inhabitants and the smallness of its trade was totally unable to bear the burden of an equality of taxation with the sister kingdom, while, on the other hand, equality of trading privileges seemed to demand equality in customs and excise. Any alleviation or exemption in favour of Scotland would obviously have a tendency to transfer to that country the trade of England. The subject was thus one of great difficulty as well as importance.

The English commissioners considered equality of taxation as a necessary condition of an entire and permanent union. They were of opinion that without this, friendly relations between the two states, if possible at all, could not long subsist. This, then, was held to be a vitally important element in the treaty, and, accordingly, their first proposal was—"That there be the same customs, excises, and all other taxes, and the same prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations of trade throughout the united kingdom of Great Britain." Sensible, however, that this uniform system of finance would necessarily be productive of pecuniary hardship to Scotland, they at once anticipated all objection on the part of the Scottish commissioners by offering compensation in money for any pecuniary sacrifices which this arrangement might demand. The general principle was thus assented to, but, at the request of the Scottish commissioners, it was agreed to discuss the matter in detail. The discussion was amicable. Almost every important point was conceded by the Scots; but they could not help suggesting that some limit should be fixed beyond which the amount of taxation imposed on Scotland should not extend. To this the English commissioners made reply—"The lords commissioners for England are of opinion that it cannot be supposed the parliament of Great Britain will ever lay any sort of burthens upon the United Kingdom but what they shall find of necessity at the time for the preservation and good of the whole, and with due regard to the circumstances and abilities of every part of the United Kingdom; and to allow of any supposition to the contrary would be to form and set up an unanswerable argument against the union itself." All further objection on the part of Scotland now ceased, and the system of equalisation was completed, and the principle of free trade in some measure established by the important concession made by the Scottish commissioners—"That all parts of the united kingdom of Great Britain be under the same regulations, prohibitions, and restrictions, and liable to equal impositions and duties for export and import."

Considerable difficulty was experienced in equalising the customs and excise, which the Scottish commissioners contended were beyond the ability of the people to pay. Even though an equivalent were allowed to balance the public financial account, it was evident that this would neither afford relief to particular trades, nor enable the consumer to pay the additional price that would necessarily be laid on the articles. The English commissioners, however, clung to the general principle, which is certainly true in theory, that, without an entire equalisation, the country in which the articles could be more cheaply produced would naturally undersell the other, and gain exclusive possession of the market. An equality of excise on liquors was ultimately conceded, although the Scots struggled hard for an exemption from the excise on ale. It was further urged on the part of the Scots, that before the people could bear so heavy a weight of taxation as in England, it would be necessary that they should, for a time, reap the benefit of the free trade and other advantages expected to be derived from the union. The comparative poverty of Scotland was, indeed, too palpable to be denied, and it was accordingly agreed to afford an exemption from the duties on stamps, coals, windows, births, marriages, and burials. The salt duty, though an insignificant item, occasioned more trouble than all the rest. It was finally arranged that Scotland should be exempted from it for seven years, but a stringent clause was added for the protection of the English manufacturer.

The adjustment of the land tax was a work of considerable difficulty. The last Land tax valuation of the rents in both countries had been made during the protectorate of Cromwell, but since that time the rents in England had risen, while those in Scotland had declined. The land tax of England was at the time of the treaty four shillings per pound on the rent, or little more, in most cases, than a twentieth part, while if the same tax was levied in Scotland it would amount to about one-fifth of the rent. It was plain, therefore, that to have proceeded in this instance on the principle of equalisation would have been a practical injustice to the latter country. A proportional equality was, therefore, adopted. The land tax in England amounted to £2,000,000; and it was agreed that Scotland should pay £12,000 for each one shilling per pound levied in England, thus making the entire land tax of Scotland amount to £48,000. This arrangement was out of all proportion in favour of Scotland, which thus contributed only £50 for each £2000 contributed by England.

It was wisely resolved that no alteration should be attempted in the forms of law, Courts of law. or in the constitution of the courts of justice in either country. Accordingly, the courts of session and justiciary, as well as all the inferior courts of Scotland, were left unchanged either in their jurisdiction or modes of procedure, though subject, of course, to such regulations as might, from time to time, be made by the parliament of the United Kingdom. It was provided, however, that a court of exchequer should be established with the same powers as that already existing in England, for deciding questions concerning the revenues of customs and excise. Heritable offices and hereditary jurisdictions were treated as private property, and accordingly reserved; and the privileges of royal boroughs were secured. The privy-council of Scotland was, in the meantime, to remain until altered or abolished by the British parliament.

One of the most important and delicate points, that of the parliamentary representation, had yet to be considered. Representation.

The number of commoners in the Scottish parliament was one hundred and sixty; the nobles amounted to one hundred and forty-five; while the English House of Commons numbered five hundred and thirteen, and the House of Peers, one hundred and eighty-five. To have conjoined the two parliaments as they stood would have given to Scotland more than her due influence in the upper house, while the lower house might have been then considered as inconveniently large for a deliberative body. To diminish, therefore, the number of Scottish parliamentary peers in an equitable ratio was a necessary, though a somewhat difficult and delicate measure. With respect to the commons, the diminution, if necessary at all, should have been exclusively on the part of England. In their own parliament every Scottish shire and burgh was represented, and common justice, as well as national honour and dignity, demanded that this arrangement should have remained undisturbed. The English commissioners were resolved that the reduction should be entirely on the side of Scotland, and proposed as a full and adequate representation that Scotland should send thirty-eight members to the united parliament. Their minute was as follows:—"The lords commissioners for England, being extremely desirous to come to a speedy conclusion of the present treaty for an union of the two kingdoms, and it having been agreed that the United Kingdom be represented by one and the same parliament, their lordships have turned their thoughts to consider what may be a proper and reasonable number for the representatives of Scotland in the united parliament,—do propose to the lords commissioners for Scotland, that thirty-eight persons be the number by which that part of the United Kingdom now called Scotland shall be represented in the House of Commons, whenever a parliament shall be called in Great Britain.” We are told that a loud burst of surprise and indignation followed this proposal, but it must be remembered that the whole proceedings were kept profoundly secret, and the Scottish commissioners had throughout manifested such a humiliating subserviency to those of England, as to give some probability to the surmise of Lockhart, who was one of the commissioners, though not in the confidence of either party, that they had “a mutual understanding with each other.”

The Scottish commissioners did not insist on any specific number, but stated generally in their minute that they found themselves “under an absolute necessity for bringing to a happy conclusion the union of the two kingdoms, to insist that a greater number than that of thirty-eight be agreed to.” After four days spent in private consultation, the Scots demanded a free conference. The treaty had hitherto been conducted in writing, in order to prevent free discussion, and the English, afraid of any ebullitions that might tend to interrupt the progress of the treaty, were most unwilling to accede to a conference, which, however, they felt it impossible to decline. They argued that the number of the Scottish representatives ought to be in proportion to the amount contributed by Scotland to the public burdens of the state; but that, nevertheless, they were willing to concede to the Scots a thirteenth part of the representation, although they were to contribute only a fourth part of the land tax. To this it was answered, that the true basis of representation was population, not wealth; that the contributions from Scotland might reasonably be expected to increase; * that the inhabitants formed a sixth part of the population of the island; and that more respect ought to be paid to the dignity of an ancient and independent kingdom than to offer it a share in the united legislature less than that of an English county. The Scots’ commissioners would have been contented with sixty, but even this very inadequate number they durst not, from the fear of decided refusal, venture to propose. They, however, feebly held out for fifty, and the English at last agreed to forty-five. This was a twelfth part of the English representation; and the same proportion was proposed for the lords, viz., sixteen peers of parliament to represent the nobility of Scotland. Their minute containing this proposal runs thus:—“The lords commissioners for England, being assured by the lords commissioners for Scotland, that there will be insuperable difficulties in reducing the representation of Scotland, in the house of the United Kingdom, to thirty-eight members, the number formerly proposed by the lords commissioners for England,—do, to show their inclinations to remove everything that would of necessity be an obstruction to perfecting the union of the two kingdoms, propose to the lords commissioners for Scotland, that forty-five members, and no more, be the number of the representatives for that part of the United Kingdom now called Scotland, in the House of Commons for the United Kingdom after the intended union.”

After three days spent in consultation, a private intimation was given to the Scottish commissioners, that farther deliberation was useless, and that it would be necessary either to interrupt the treaty, perhaps put an end to it for ever, or to submit implicitly to the conditions proposed. This peremptory message had the desired effect, and the Scots were constrained to yield. As some compensation, however, for the loss of their direct legislative rights, the Scottish peers obtained the privilege of peerage enjoyed by the English nobility, which afforded them, for the first time, an entire and perpetual exemption, in case of debt, from arrest—a boon which, it is alleged, was much needed, and, therefore, highly prized by the nobles of Scotland at that period.

It is difficult to refrain from ascribing to some sordid personal motives this tame acquiescence in an act of flagrant injustice to their native country; but it must not be forgotten that the Scottish commissioners were appointed by the queen, with the advice of the English government, and were for the most part court parasites or expectants of office.*

While these grave deliberations were in progress, other matters of less importance, though still very “Equivalent.” The “Equivalent” for that portion of the customs and excise of Scotland which would be applicable to the liquidation of the English debt had been calculated and found to amount to £398,085 10s.† A uniform coinage Coinage. was proposed to be established for both kingdoms, compensation being made for any

* So great has been the expansion of the commerce, and consequently of the taxation, of Scotland, that she now raises six of the fifty-three millions of revenue contributed by the United Kingdom. She thus pays more than a ninth of the revenue, though she has even yet only a twelfth of the representation.

* Lockhart says, “It consisted with my certain knowledge that the English did design from the beginning to give the Scots forty-five commoners and a proportionable number of peers; but had the Scots stood their ground, I have good reason to affirm that the English would have allowed a much greater number of representatives and abatement of taxes, for the English saw too plainly the advantages that would accrue to England from any union of the two kingdoms upon this scheme, and would never have stuck at any terms to obtain it.”—Lockhart Papers, vol. i. p. 156.

† The debts of England at this time amounted in round losses occasioned by change of denomination. It was agreed that the additional taxes levied on Scotland in accordance with the terms of this treaty should, for seven years, be applied to the encouragement of manufactures, the establishment of fisheries, and other useful national objects. The

Weights and same weights and measures were measures. to be adopted in every part of the United Kingdom. With regard to matters of ceremony, which are often trifling in themselves, though important in a national point of view, the dignity of Scotland was distinctly recognised and National flag. provided for. In the flag of the United Kingdom the crosses of St.

George and St. Andrew were to be conjoined; and the coat-armorial was to be quartered according to National the rules of heraldry, so that when arms. employed for Scottish national purposes the arms of Scotland should occupy the dexter side. Lastly, a new great seal was appointed to be constructed for the United Kingdom, for the authentication of public acts affecting both nations.

The question of the Darien Company was the Darien subject of a separate, though brief Company. deliberation. It was brought forward on the 15th July by the Earl of Mar, when it was demanded on the part of Scotland either that the company should retain their privileges, or that the stock should be purchased from the holders at an equitable valuation. That the company should be abolished the English commissioners held to be an indispensable condition, from which they had resolved on no account to depart. The only other alternative was accordingly embraced. This they signified in the following minute—"The lords commissioners for England, in answer, say they are of opinion that the continuance of that company is inconsistent with the good of trade in the United Kingdom, and consequently against the interest of Great Britain, and therefore they insist that it ought to be determined. But the lords commissioners for England being sensible that the misfortunes of that company have been the occasion of misunderstandings and unkindnesses between the two kingdoms, and thinking it above all things desirable that upon the union of the two kingdoms the subjects of both may be entirely united in affection, do therefore wish that regard may be had to the expenses and losses of the particular members of the said company," &c.

The whole conditions of the treaty being now agreed on, they were digested into twenty-nine articles, and copies were prepared to be submitted to the queen and the two parliaments, and, on the 23rd July, the commissioners terminated their labours, having sat for two months and one week. On the same day, they presented to her majesty a copy numbers to eighteen millions. It was calculated that of every £1000 a year of additional customs-duty levied in Scotland, £792 would go to pay the debt which England was burdened; and of every additional £1000 which the Scots raised in excise-duties, about £625 would go in payment of the debt of England. The "Equivalent" was intended as compensation to Scotland for submitting to this burden.

signed and sealed, which she graciously received, professing that it would give her peculiar pleasure should her reign be identified with the passing of that great and important measure, and earnestly desiring that the ministers for Scotland should, with all fitting expedition, lay the treaty before the parliament of that kingdom.

The secrecy in which the solemn deliberations now closed had been involved, held State of the the public mind in a state of silent, public mind.

though anxious suspense; yet that very secrecy naturally excited suspicions that there must be something wrong in the conditions of a treaty which its authors were ashamed or afraid to publish. It had been decided that it should be submitted first to the parliament of Scotland, as it was there likely to meet with the severest criticism and the greatest opposition; and, as the time fixed for the assembling of that body drew near, the public anxiety was manifested by a vast influx into the capital of visitors from every quarter of the country. This, the last parliament of Scotland, commenced its final session on the Meeting of the last Scottish parliament, 3rd of October, 1706.

3rd of October, 1706. by reading a letter from the queen, in which she urged the advantages of an entire union between the two kingdoms. "It will secure," she said, "your religion, liberty, and property, remove the animosities amongst yourselves, and the jealousies and differences betwixt our two kingdoms. It must increase your strength, riches, and trade; and by this union, the whole island being joined in affection, and free from all apprehension of different interests, will be enabled to resist all its enemies, support the Protestant interest everywhere, and maintain the liberties of Europe."

The royal message was enforced by a speech from the commissioner, who was followed by Seafield, the chancellor. The treaty itself was then produced and read, and, together with the minutes of the commissioners, was ordered to be printed, after which the house adjourned for a few days.

The people had been led to expect a federal union, and were disposed to wel- Alarm at come it as offering a solution of the union.

their commercial difficulties, and involving the establishment of the highly-prized privilege of free trade; but no sooner were the provisions of the treaty known, than a simultaneous and universal burst of indignation and disappointment was excited in the capital, and spread rapidly through the kingdom. An incorporating union was openly and loudly denounced as nothing less than an entire surrender, not merely of the dignity and independence, but the very nationality of Scotland. Pamphlets, placards, warnings, satires, and other productions, indescribable and innumerable, issued from the press; but these, though they contributed to fan the flame, were rather an effect than a cause of the popular excitement. Each section of the community looked at the treaty from its own particular point of view, but all were unanimous in its condemnation. The presbyterians were under the most alarming apprehensions of danger to their national church from the influence of the prelates who were of course to have seats in the united parliament. The episcopalians, on the other hand, saw in the confirmation of the Presbyterian Church the utter extinction of all hope of restoring their own. The poor were alarmed with apprehensions of an excise on those native productions which they had been accustomed to regard as necessities of life; and the merchants were terrified by rumours of imposts on foreign commerce. The partizans of the house of Stewart, of all classes and denominations, were in despair, and made the most frantic exertions to extend their faction by drawing over men from all other parties to unite with them in opposing the detested union, which threatened for ever to extinguish all their political hopes and aspirations.

Such was the ferment throughout the kingdom, but more particularly in Edinburgh, when parliament again assembled, on the 12th of October,

The treaty and began to consider the Articles again read. of the union. According to the usual mode of procedure, before proceeding to consider the details of the treaty, a desultory discussion took place on the whole measure. The minutes of the sederunt bear that certain articles were read, together with the relative proceedings of the commissioners, "and were all reasoned and discoursed upon" without any division of the house taking place. A short delay was proposed by the opposition, that they might have time to consult their constituents, without whose concurrence, they argued, parliament had no authority to innovate on the constitution, which it was an important part of their functions to preserve. It was argued, on the other hand, that the representatives of the people in parliament were appointed to act for the public welfare, and that, as they had been summoned on this occasion to deliberate on the basis of a union, they were fully authorised to enter into all the details of the treaty, and to approve or reject it as they might consider best for the general good. To this it was replied that when the present parliament was elected, the subject of a union was not so much as thought of, and that it would be more honourable to themselves to decide such a grave matter in a new parliament, invested with special powers for that purpose, than in an old one, whose members might lie under the imputation of having been corrupted by court influence. But whatever force there might be in this reasoning, it failed of its intended effect. After a warm discussion, it was decided by a majority of sixty-four to proceed without delay to the consideration of the treaty, but it was resolved not to come to a decision on any one article until the whole had been separately discussed.

Meantime, the excitement out of doors had begun to assume a more formidable aspect. Since the first day of meeting, the house had been surrounded by an eager crowd, anxious to obtain the earliest information of what was going on within. The vote on the first article Popular excitement.

having been deferred, the multitude, by a natural mistake, imagined that the article had been rejected, and immediately gave way to the most extravagant demonstrations of joy. But, as the minutes were regularly printed, this exultation was soon at an end. The mob then insulted and threatened the commissioner on his way from the house to the palace, and followed with abuse and execration all the members whom they knew to be favourable to the union. On the other hand, they loudly cheered the opposition members, and escorted them nightly to their homes in triumph. Amongst these was the Duke of Hamilton, whose opposition to the measure had rendered him extremely popular. He had taken up his residence in the abbey, but, one evening, instead of returning thither, he went to pay a visit to the Duke of Athol, who then occupied a lodging in the Lawn Market. Having seen him in safety to his destination, the crowd turned aside to the house of Sir Patrick Johnston,

Attack on the ex-provost's house.

their late provost, which was in the neighbourhood, and, as this gentleman had been one of the commissioners for the treaty, they began to testify their disapprobation of his supposed treachery by attacking his house. Fortunately, however, it was situated in an upper floor in one of those gigantic tenements for which Edinburgh was then, as now, famous, and it was found that the missiles projected by the most expert throwers could not reach the windows. An attack on the door was therefore resolved on, but as the common stair leading to it was narrow and long, but few of the assailants could mount at a time, and these could have been easily repelled had there been one or two sturdy defenders within. Johnston, however, was not at home, and the only inmates were his wife and female domestics. While the assault on the door was going on, the lady went to one of the windows, and called for assistance. A message was immediately dispatched to the town-guard, who at that time and for many years afterwards were the only police of the city. In a few minutes thirty of their number were on the spot, who soon succeeded in dispersing the rioters, besides making prisoners of six of the most adventurous, whom they found still engaged in their assault on the door. The commotion, however, soon spread to other parts of the city. The excited rabble collected from all quarters, and for some time held undisputed possession of the principal streets, and saluted in no very agreeable manner the obnoxious legislators, as they retired homewards. Some stones, it is said, were thrown,* but no instance of personal injury is recorded. It is probable, however, that had a skilful and determined leader at that moment presented himself, both the parliament and the union would have been in considerable danger. As the multitude, however, continued to parade the streets, beating drums and alarming the peaceable inhabitants, and as the town-guard were not sufficiently strong to put down the disturbance, the commissioner, with the consent of the provost, marched a battalion of guards into the city, who speedily dispersed the rioters and restored quiet, though not contentment. In vain did the country party protest against the introduction of the troops, by whose presence they complained that parliament was overawed.* The military were suffered to remain, for the protection of the public peace, during the whole subsequent progress of the discussions.

* De Foe's History of the Union, p. 238.

The unpopularity of the union throughout the kingdom, and the disturbed condition of the capital, so far intimidated the commissioner and the chancellor that they were inclined to adjourn the parliament—a measure which would, in all probability, have proved fatal to the union. But Godolphin urged them to persevere, and encouraged them with the assurance of military assistance, if necessary, from England, Ireland, or even Flanders. Meanwhile numerous petitions against a union poured in from all quarters of the kingdom; but parliament had resolved to persevere, and the petitions were disregarded. As had been agreed on, the whole articles had been gone through and discussed seriatim; but when the House proceeded to determine on the first four articles, embracing the fundamental proposition that the two kingdoms should be united into one, with the same privileges, and under the same legislature and line of succession, the comparative calm that had hitherto prevailed gave place to the most fierce and violent altercations. Day by day, petitions against the union continued to accumulate on the table of the House, and so numerous were the signatures that it appeared as if they had been subscribed by almost every man in the kingdom capable of writing his name. A form of petition, framed in Edinburgh, was very generally adopted in the country towns and parishes. It was in these terms:—“To his grace her majesty’s high commissioner, and the right honourable the Estates of Parliament—humbly sheweth that we, under subscribing, have seen the articles of the union agreed upon by the commissioners nominated in behalf of England, in which they have agreed that Scotland and England shall be united in one kingdom, and that the United Kingdom shall be represented in the same parliament; and seeing it does evidently appear to us that such an incorporating union as contained in these articles is contrary to the honour, fundamental laws, and constitutions of the kingdom, Claim of Right, and rights and privileges of the barons, and freeholders, and boroughs of this kingdom and church, as by laws established, and that the same is destructive to the true interests of the nation; therefore we humbly beseech your grace and honourable Estates, and do confidently expect that you will not allow of any such incorporating union, but that you will support and preserve entire the sovereignty and independence of this crown and kingdom, and the rights and privileges of parliament, which have been so resolutely maintained by our heroic ancestors for the space of above two thousand years, that the same may be transmitted to succeeding generations as they have been conveyed to us: and we will heartily concur with you for supporting and maintaining our sovereignty, and independency, and church government, with our lives and fortunes, conformably to the established laws of the nation.”

Notwithstanding the moderate tone of these petitions, they narrowly escaped being thrown over the table as seditious, and were only entertained through the fear that their subscribers would make personal application at the door of the house. That the all but universal feeling of the nation was hostile to the union is indisputable, for while petitions without number were presented against it, not one was presented in its favour.

After a month spent in preliminary discussions, the real contest commenced on the 4th of November, when it was agreed to take the sense of the house on the first article of the treaty, with this understanding, “that if the other articles of the union be not adjusted by the parliament, then the agreeing to and approving of the first shall be of no effect.” The debate was commenced by Seton of Pitmedden, who, in a dispassionate and statesman-like address, pointed out the advantages, both political and commercial, of an incorporating over a federal union. “If separation,” he said, “would bring little good, and if federal compacts possess insuperable difficulties, if victory itself would be ruin, what remains? Either a debasing connection, such as we have been cursed with for these hundred years past, where under one sovereign we have had our independence eclipsed, our nobility increased, our commons oppressed, our parliament influenced, our laws neglected, our peace destroyed by faction, and our poverty insulted by luxury; or a cordial agreement, where we shall participate in the glory, and share in the riches of an illustrious and wealthy nation, who invites and entreats us to an incorporating union.”

The most marked feature of the debate, however, was the famous speech delivered by Lord Belhaven, a young and enthusiastic nobleman of great ability and unimpeachable integrity, who had throughout shown the most violent hostility to the union, and who now denounced the measure in the most eloquent and impassioned terms. He depicted, in vivid language, the ruin which the proposed union would bring upon all classes of the Scottish people, and held it up to public reprobation as a total surrender of the national independence, as dangerous to the national church, as degrading to the nobility and the army, as destructive of trade, as ruinous to the industrial classes, and as certain to involve the landed gentry in inextricable difficulties. “Above all,” he said,

* Sir J. Clark’s Hist., MS.

"I see our ancient mother Caledonia, like Cæsar, sitting in the midst of our senate, ruefully looking around, covering herself with her royal garment, awaiting the fatal blow, and breathing out her last with an 'et tu quoque, mi fili,' (and thou too, my son)." His appeal to the estates to lay aside their dissensions, and to unite in saving their country's honour and independence could scarcely have been heard without some emotion even by the selfish and factious politicians of the day, recommended as it was by the well-known honesty and patriotism of the speaker. "What hinders us, my lord," he said, "to lay aside our divisions, to unite cordially and heartily together in our present circumstances, when our all is at stake? The enemy is already at our gates. Hannibal is come the length of this table; he is at the foot of this throne; he will demolish this throne if we take not notice; he will seize upon these regalia; he will take them as our spolia opima, and whip us out of this house, never to return again. For the love of God, then—for the safety and welfare of our ancient kingdom, whose sad circumstances I hope we shall yet convert into prosperity and happiness! we want no means if we unite. God blesseth the peacemakers. We want neither men nor sufficiency of all manner of things to make a nation happy."

The speech of the youthful nobleman seems to have been intended more for the people out of doors than for the parliament. It was heard without any manifestation of feeling, and does not appear to have had any influence on the vote that followed. After the orator had finished, Lord Marchmont stood up, and jocularly remarked that they had heard a long speech, and a very terrible one, but he thought a short answer would suffice, which might be given in these words—"Behold, he dreamed! but, lo! when he awoke, behold, it was a dream."

Majority in favour of the union. First article carried. On a division being called for, it was found that there were one hundred and sixteen in favour of the article, and eighty-three against it. The majority was chiefly on the part of the peers, and the same peculiarity was observable in all the subsequent divisions. The votes of the barons, or county representatives, were not far from an equality, being thirty-seven to thirty-three, while those of the representatives of boroughs were thirty-three to twenty-nine. There was thus a clear majority in each of the Estates taken separately. Ten days elapsed before a division took place on the second article—that relating to the succession, but after some attempts on the part of the opposition to procure delay, it

Succeeding articles approved. was carried almost without a discussion. The debate on the incorporation of the two parliaments was somewhat more protracted, but the article was ultimately carried by a large majority. Thus, before the end of November, the great fundamental articles of the treaty—the incorporating union and the succession to the crown—had, despite of all opposition, received the sanction of the legislature.

The articles relating to trade, taxation, jurisdiction, and laws, gave rise to little discussion, and, with a few alterations, then deemed very important, but which have long since lost their interest, were all carried without any display of that acrimony that had been so prevalent during the previous debates.

While these deliberations on matters of fiscal and commercial detail were in progress, Popular the popular ferment, so far from tumults, subsiding, rose to an alarming height, and seemed to threaten the nation with the horrors of civil war. Rumours were in circulation of a conspiracy to assassinate the commissioner as he retired from the house, and detailed information was furnished to that high functionary that twenty-four desperate young men had bound themselves by an oath written in blood to put him to death. Popular tumults again broke out in Edinburgh, and obnoxious members of the house were exposed, notwithstanding the presence of the military, to most imminent danger from stones and other missiles, which were showered on them by the enraged multitude. In the west and south these popular demonstrations assumed an aspect still more alarming. In Glasgow, application had been made to Disturbances the magistrates to present an address in Glasgow.

dress from the city against the union. Jacobites, papists, presbyterians, and covenanters, had united in this application. This strange conjunction of parties seems to have intimidated the magistrates, who consequently refused to concur in the address. This refusal incensed the populace to the highest degree, and, as the provost was an object of special resentment, they attacked and gutted his house, and had he not fortunately, in anticipation of the coming storm, previously retired to a place of safety, would certainly have attempted to force him into compliance with their wishes, by laying violent hands on his person. In his absence, however, the address was prepared and signed by the deacons, in name of the incorporated tradesmen of the town. A temporary calm succeeded, but some trifling disturbance having occurred about the committal to prison of an ordinary criminal, the inflammable passions of the populace were once more kindled into a blaze. The mob paraded the streets in search of some object on which to wreak their vengeance, and for some days were actually in undisputed possession of the city. Meantime, the unfortunate provost, thinking, on the first lull, that the danger was over, had returned home; but he was soon made aware of his mistake, and, being taken by surprise, could find no more secure retreat than a private house, in which he was fain to hide himself in a manner not quite in accordance with his civic dignity. His enemies were soon upon his track, and ransacked the whole house from top to bottom, including even the apartment in which he was, without discovering the object of their search.* He was concealed in a bed which folded up against the wall, and which consequently they had thought it unnecessary to examine. A party of horse, amounting to two hundred, was at length dispatched to put an end to these disturbances. A detachment of twenty-five having been ordered to enter the town, soon succeeded in overawing the rioters and restoring tranquillity. A few of the ringleaders were apprehended and conveyed to Edinburgh, and the insurrection, if such it may be called, was, so far as respected Glasgow, at an end.

* Defoe's History of the Union, p. 272.

This outbreak was probably more alarming than dangerous, and though it resulted in some wanton destruction of property, was not attended with bloodshed, or even serious bodily injury. But there were other quarters from which real danger was to be apprehended. The Cameronians of the west, whose military ardour was combined with religious enthusiasm, seized this opportunity of strengthening their organisation, which had long been sufficiently formidable. They held frequent nocturnal meetings, at which, under the guidance of able and experienced leaders, they concerted their plans with secrecy and dispatch. The condition of this remarkable body, at this period, as described by their leader, John Ker of Kersland, is too important to be altogether omitted. "The Cameronians," he says, "are strictly religious, and ever act upon that principle, making the war a part of their religion, and converting state policy into points of conscience. They fight as they pray, and pray as they fight, making every battle a new exercise of their faith, and believe that in such a case they are, as it were, under the banner of Christ. If they fall in battle, they die in their calling, as martyrs to the good cause, and believe that in thus shedding their blood they finish the work of their salvation. From such maxims and articles of faith the Cameronians may be slain, never conquered. Great numbers of them have lost their lives, but few or none ever yielded. On the contrary, whenever they believe their duty or religion calls them to it, they are always unanimous and ready, with undaunted spirits and great vivacity of mind, to encounter hardships, attempt great enterprises, despise danger, and bravely rush on to death or victory. * * * They are governed by a general quarterly meeting, composed of two commissioners deputed by each town where they live; and whatever is concluded at this meeting is a general rule to the whole. They are closer in their deliberations than the other parties are, for whatever comes before them is disputed and concluded without the least danger of being exposed; and whatever is so resolved is accordingly executed with the profoundest secrecy and expedition. For the Cameronians are always ready, under their proper officers, well appointed, and, when it is found at their general meeting to be their duty, can assemble upon the least notice given them; so that though they be the fewest in number, yet they are in effect the most considerable of the three, for the commonality of the presbyterians, who have a wonderful opinion of their piety and virtue, always readily join with them in anything that concerns the public, which the Cameronians encourage and allow, but do not permit them to be members of their society, or to bear any part in the conduct of their affairs."*

It does not detract from the historical value of this testimony, that Ker, though the avowed and acknowledged leader of the Cameronians, was in reality a government spy.

Such were the men whose combined action the government had now to dread; Progress of and if we take into account that disaffection. multitudes in all quarters of the country, including Jacobites of every grade, presbyterians, and nearly all unfriendly to the union, were ready to make common cause with them, it must be admitted that the combination was not such as any government could safely despise. Under authority of a clause in the Act of Security, the opponents of the union in different counties now began to raise and train men for military purposes, their avowed object being to dissolve by force a parliament that had sold themselves, as was alleged, and were now about to sell their country. They established correspondence with their friends, and dispatched emissaries to the north and east to stimulate the people in these districts to take up arms. A body of horsemen from the surrounding country suddenly entered the town of Dumfries on the 20th of November, and making their way to the market-place, they kindled a fire, in which they publicly burned the treaty and the names of the commissioners; then they affixed a declaration to the market cross, in which they maintained that they were not bound by the acts either of the commissioners or the parliament; but, on the contrary, were under solemn obligations to set aside their betrayers, and uphold the ancient national independence. They disclaimed, nevertheless, all intention of interfering with the proceedings of the parliament, yet they formally protested, "that if the subscribers to the Protest against the foresaid treaty of union, with the union. their associates in parliament, should presume to carry on the said union by a supreme power over the generality of the nation, then, and in that case, as we judge that the consent of the generality of the same can only divest them of their sacred and civil liberties purchased and maintained by our ancestors with their blood, so we protest that whatever ratification of the foresaid union may pass in parliament, contrary to our fundamental laws, liberties, and privileges in Church and State, may not be binding upon the nation, now or at any time to come."

This bold manifesto, though generally ascribed to the Cameronians, has not been traced with certainty to that body. The horsemen engaged in the enterprise probably did not exceed in number two or three hundred, though they were magnified by common report into an army of several thousand men.

* Memoirs of John Ker, vol. i. pp. 12—15. Ker had married the heiress of the Crawfords of Kersland, a family which for two generations had occupied a prominent place among the Hill-men.

A plan was now formed for bringing the Highlanders to act in concert with the Cameronians, and the projectors soon found a fit leader in Cunningham of Ecket, an old and experienced officer, who had at one time held the command of a regiment, but who now entertained a heavy grudge against the government for having disbanded his corps, and left considerable arrears of pay undischarged. It was arranged that he should assemble the armed Hill-men at Sanguhar, while the Duke of Athol was to collect the Jacobite Highlanders above the passes. The two armies were then to effect a junction at some intermediate point, and march eastward in a united body to Edinburgh, and disperse the parliament. There was more than one traitor, however, in the Cameronian camp; and Hepburn, their clerical leader, while he counselled and encouraged them in the prosecution of this daring enterprise, had secretly betrayed all their proceedings to the government. Cunningham, who had completely gained the confidence of the leaders in the west, now traversed the country in all directions, stirring up all to action within the sphere of his influence, and making arrangements for co-operation. Having prevailed with the Duke of Athol to secure the pass of Stirling, and to keep open a communication with the north, he at length returned to his Jacobite accomplices, and informed them that all was now ready, and that, at a preconcerted signal, the opponents of the union were ready to concentrate their forces and march upon the capital. At this critical moment, however, Cunningham suddenly deserted the cause, and betrayed the whole design to Queensberry. It is impossible now to determine whether he had been all along acting as a spy in the pay of the government, or had been induced at this juncture partly through fear of the consequences and partly by the offer of a reward to make this discovery, and to frustrate the enterprise which he had been among the first to propose, and apparently one of the most zealous to promote. Instructed by Queensberry, he returned to the west and south with a view to amuse his confederates and dissuade them from the undertaking. He represented to them that there was neither courage nor fidelity among their associates in Edinburgh, and that they had refused to furnish the least assistance. He, therefore, exhorted them to consider well before committing themselves to such a hazardous attempt.

Treachery of Hamilton, whose inconsistent conduct is somewhat difficult of explanation, now seems to have formed an alliance with Queensberry, his ancient rival, and under his direction, or at his instigation, he sent private expresses through the country recommending the people to desist for a time from their attempts; and thus discouraged, instead of seven thousand, who had joined the confederacy, not above five hundred assembled, and these Cunningham, without difficulty, prevailed on to disperse, muttering imprecations, however, against those by whom they had been betrayed.

The government having thus suppressed this alarming insurrection, lost no time in suspending the Act of Security, thereby effectually preventing any further attempt, for the present, to muster the people and train them to arms.

Fletcher of Saltoun now proposed that the freeholders of the opposition should be invited to repair to Edinburgh for the purpose of presenting a united appeal to the commissioner, Suspension of the Act of Security.

Concourse of country gentlemen to Edinburgh.

entreating him either to desist from pressing the union, or at least to agree to a short delay until the mind of the nation should be fully ascertained with respect to that important measure. In anticipation of his refusal, a national address to the queen was prepared, which was then to be circulated throughout the kingdom, and subscribed by men of all ranks, requesting her to summon a new parliament and assembly. Five hundred gentlemen, mostly Jacobites, in consequence repaired to Artful policy of Hamilton.

Edinburgh, but Hamilton artfully contrived to sow dissension among them, and thus frustrated their design. He proposed, with a view to furnish the Tories in the English parliament with a pretext for opposing the union, that a clause should be inserted in the national address expressing their desire to entail the crown on the house of Hanover. To this, as was expected, the Jacobites refused to consent, and the presentation was consequently delayed. A proclamation was then issued by the government prohibiting all illegal convocations, and the country gentlemen, disgusted with the treachery of their leaders, which was now apparent, and impatient of fruitless delay, gave up the struggle and returned to their homes.

At the instigation of Hamilton, the Jacobites resolved to make a determined stand against the article relating to the representation of Scotland in the united parliament, and, on their failure, to enter a solemn protestation, and secede from the house, in imitation of the policy by which Hamilton had in some degree destroyed the credit of the former parliament. Had this plan been carried out, it is probable that the commissioner would have adjourned the parliament, and abandoned all further attempts to carry through the union, in opposition to the national will. A spirited protest was drawn up, and the day was fixed for its presentation, but Hamilton, on whom the party depended as their leader, again failed them. On the morning of the day agreed upon, the opposition mustered in great force, and proceeded to the house, escorted by a numerous body of their most ardent supporters. Their expected leader, however, did not appear, and on inquiry, they were informed that his grace was so much troubled with toothache that he could not attend the house. His friends immediately proceeded to his lodgings, and remonstrated with him so earnestly, that he was compelled to yield. On entering the house, he asked the opposition, with apparent simplicity, whom they had selected to present their protest. They replied that they had reckoned on his grace as their leader, and the person of the highest rank among them, carrying out the proposal which he had himself made. This, however, he positively refused to do, though he offered to second any one else who might be appointed to table the protest.* The opponents of the union were struck powerless by this unexpected defection. The article respecting the representation was carried. The opportunity of making a secession was thus lost, and the country party, burning with indignation at the perfidy or cowardice of their leader, ceased to act any longer in concert, and after an abortive attempt to procure an enactment that the parliament of Great Britain should meet every third year in Scotland, they withdrew from the contest in despair.

Fickleness or treachery of Hamilton.

During the subsequent stages of the bill, the people manifested no farther disposition to obstruct its progress by any insurrectionary movement. A kind of gloomy tranquillity prevailed, relieved in some small degree by the forlorn hope that the measure would be rejected by the parliament of England. The remaining articles were quickly disposed of. An occasional debate took place, but in the divisions government usually maintained its original majority. On the 7th of December, the fifteenth article, adjusting the "Equivalent" and providing for the abolition of the Darien Company with compensation, came on for discussion. Two eminent mathematical professors had been employed to calculate the "Equivalent," which on their report was held to be correct. The liberality shown by the English in making this offer of compensation tended greatly to disarm opposition, and the remaining articles were carried almost without a division. The Ratification of the Treaty of Union. final ratification of this important measure, on which the house had been occupied since the 12th of October, did not take place until the 16th of January, 1707, when the passing of an act ratifying and approving the Treaty of Union was put to the vote, and carried by 110 to 69. The act was then touched with the sceptre by the commissioner, and the labours of the last Scottish parliament were now nearly at an end.†

* According to report at the time, the commissioner had frightened Hamilton by informing him privately, that if by the project referred to he should break off the union, he should be made to suffer for it in his English property. But throughout the entire proceedings, Hamilton seems to have exhibited great timidity and infirmity of purpose.

† The Earl of Stair, the author of the Glencoe massacre, who took a leading part in framing and passing the Act of Union, died suddenly; it is believed from the effects of anxiety and over exertion, just as the twenty-second article was carried. It is stated by Lockhart of Carnwarth that Seafield, the chancellor, on the passing of the act, said, "There's an end o' an auld sang." This brutal levity, on an

No sooner had the act passed than the commissioner dispatched it by express to London, where the English parliament was then sitting. Her majesty communicated to them in person the important intelligence. She expressed the lively satisfaction she felt at the near prospect of witnessing the completion of this great measure, which she trusted would prove a permanent blessing to the whole island, a source of increased wealth and power, and a security for the maintenance of the Protestant religion.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the articles of union, the English parliament, on the 3rd of February, passed "An act for securing the Church of England, as by law established," to be inserted like a similar act that had been passed by the parliament of Scotland for the security of the Presbyterian Church, in the parliamentary adoption of the union by both kingdoms. On the following day the commons, in a committee of the whole house, proceeded to the consideration of the articles of union, and the act of ratification by the Scottish parliament. Their deliberations commenced on the 4th of February, and the report of the committee in favour of the articles was presented and approved of by the house on the 8th of the same month. Very slight opposition was manifested, as the parties who were unfavourable to the measure expected to have a subsequent opportunity of discussing the articles in detail, like the clauses of a bill. In this, however, as we shall see, they were disappointed. The measure was pressed forward with such rapidity, that its opponents testified their dissatisfaction by crying out "post-haste! post-haste!" To this it was answered by Sir Thomas Lyttleton, "They do not ride post-haste, but a good easy trot; and, for his part, as long as the weather was fair, the roads good, and the horses in heart, he was of opinion they ought to jog on, and not take up till it was night."*

The debate in the House of Lords commenced on the 15th February, in a committee of the whole house, and in presence of the queen. On Bishop Burnet, descended from an obscure but respectable Scottish family, was conferred the distinction of presiding on this great occasion. Lord Haversham was the principal opponent of the measure. He objected to an incorporating union, on the ground that it was opposed by the almost unanimous voice of the people of Scotland. He was in favour of a most close and intimate federal union, but held that two independent nations differing in laws, customs, and ecclesiastical government, though they might cleave together, could never incorporate. He regarded an accession of sixty-one Scottish members, lords and commons, as much too large in proportion to the share of taxes to be borne by Scotland, and, at occasion which every Scotchman ought to have considered one of peculiar solemnity, excited great and general indignation.

* Parl. Hist., vol. vi. p. 561.

the same time, dangerous to the constitution and Church of England. He dwelt on the danger of innovation, in an argument addressed rather to the fears than the reason of his auditory. He expressed apprehension that a measure depriving of their seats in parliament one hundred Scottish peers, and the like number of commoners, might be drawn into a precedent destructive of their own constitutional rights and privileges. These reasonings failed either to convince or alarm the house. A few divisions took place, but the result proved that opposition was hopeless, the largest minority, in any one instance, being twenty-three against a majority of seventy.

The house sat as a committee from the 15th to the 24th of February, and three days afterwards Bishop Burnet reported the resolutions to the house, "which were agreed to by a great majority," but no record has been left of the numbers on either side.

It now only remained to make into a law that which they had just approved of as a treaty. The opposition expected that on the bringing up of the bill, all the clauses would again be subjected to discussion. But these expectations were disappointed, through the ingenuity of Harcourt, the attorney-general, who artfully inserted the articles of union in a narrative form in the preamble of the bill, along with the acts of the two parliaments for the security of the two churches. The enacting clause with which the bill concluded was founded upon the narrative of these actual transactions, which, as a matter not of opinion, but of fact, admitted of no dispute. The measure was thus concentrated into Passing of a single point, to be decided by a the bill. simple negative or affirmative, and the government obtained an easy victory. A rider was proposed by Lord North in these terms—"Provided always that nothing in this ratification contained shall be construed to extend to an approbation or acknowledgment of the truth of the presbyterian way of worship, or allowing the religion of the Church of Scotland to be what it is styled, the true Protestant religion." But this was rejected by a majority of fifty-five to nineteen. When the bill was passed in the upper house, the Earl of Nottingham and seven other peers entered their protest against it, without assigning any reason; and the Duke of Buckingham and five lords protested, because they considered that "the excellent constitution of England would be endangered by the alterations made by this union."

This important act received its final ratification—Royal assent. on the 6th of March, when the Queen's speech. queen proceeded in person to the house to give it the royal assent. On that momentous and interesting occasion her majesty addressed the parliament in the following words:—"My lords and gentlemen, it is with the greatest satisfaction I have given my assent to a bill for uniting England and Scotland into one kingdom. I consider this union as a matter of the greatest importance to the wealth, strength, and safety of the whole island, and, at the same time, as a work of so much difficulty and nicety in its own nature that, till now, all attempts which have been made towards it in the course of above a hundred years have proved ineffectual; and, therefore, I make no doubt but it will be remembered and spoken of hereafter to the honour of those who have been instrumental in bringing it to such a happy conclusion. I desire and expect from all my subjects of both nations that from henceforth they act with all possible respect and kindness to one another, that so it may appear to all the world they have hearts disposed to become one people. This will be a great pleasure to me, and make us all quickly sensible of the good effects of this union; and I cannot but look upon it as a peculiar happiness that in my reign so full provision is made for the peace and quiet of my people, and for the security of our religion by so firm an establishment of the Protestant succession throughout Great Britain."

After receiving the royal assent, the articles of the union were engrossed and enrolled, and the original record was lodged for preservation in the Tower. An exemplification of the whole, under the great seal of England, was then transmitted to Scotland, the union, according to the treaty, being appointed to commence on the 1st of May, 1707.

Thus was finally consummated an incorporating union between two countries which, for upwards of four centuries, had been separated by hostile interests and mutual jealousies and antipathies. It is deeply to be regretted that a measure so essential to the peace and prosperity of both kingdoms should have been carried through in a manner which excited bitter opposition on the part of the great body of the Scottish nation, and made the union, for a time, productive of alienation and strife rather than of amity. But the ungenerous conduct both of the English government and people in conducting the negotiations for a union—the contemptuous terms in which Scotland was spoken of by several leading members of both houses of the English parliament—the neglect with which the interests of the Scottish nation were treated, and the unfairness of some of the conditions imposed upon it—the mode in which the court party carried through their measures, and the bribery by which it was generally believed not a few of the members of the Scottish parliament were induced to sacrifice the independence of their country,*—long rankled in the minds of the people of Scotland, and exercised a most injurious influence on the welfare of the United Kingdom.

* See Appendix Q.

CHAPTER LVIII.

ANNE.

A.D. 1707—1714.

THE union of Scotland with England was unpopularly summated in the face of an opposition of the union. tion which was overpowered rather than vanquished, and which was not likely to pass into a mere sentiment of regret. Not only was it offensive to the pride and prejudices of the great body of the Scottish people, and obnoxious to various formidable factions, but a party more enlightened and disinterested than either felt alarm lest the working of the compact should deprive Scotland of far more than she had resigned in the treaty, and doom her to be the slave, instead of the ally, of England. It was unfortunate that the union was proposed and effected after the attempts of several centuries, on the part of England, forcibly to annex the smaller kingdom. It was feared that the standing and rights of the two countries, as equals, recognised in the treaty, would soon be practically repudiated, and the native institutions, both ecclesiastical and legal, of the north assimilated to those of the south. Immediately after the union, several incidents occurred to irritate the Scots, and to confirm their suspicions that England meant to make her authority and interests paramount. A delay in sending the "Equivalent" guaranteed, was interpreted into a refusal of the obligation; and even when the money did come, dissatisfaction and anger were freely expressed because two-thirds of it were in exchequer bills, and only one-third in bullion. It may, however, be conjectured that the general population would not have been pleased no matter how punctually, or in what way, the sum had been remitted. They regarded it as the price of Scottish independence; and, as it passed, in twelve waggons guarded by Scotch dragoons, through the streets up to the Castle of Edinburgh, they vented their indignation and reproaches bitterly upon all who took part in the escort, and upon the very horses that drew the treasure.*

But this was a trifling source of dissatisfaction compared with what was found of customs' in other contemporary arrangements. With the leading men of Scotland, the main inducement to the union had been the advantage of a full share in English trade; and several capitalists devised a stratagem for availing themselves, during the short interval between the passing of the act and its coming into operation, of the difference of duties upon imported commodities in a way, and to an extent which, if not unfair, could not but irritate the mercantile men of England, who, happening at the time to be in an unusual state of depression from various commercial misfortunes which affected the whole kingdom, were prone to take offence at doubtful proceedings in trade, and to exaggerate injuries.

* Defoe.

Immense foreign cargoes were brought into Scotland, under the low duties, in order that after the 1st of May (1707) they might cross the Border duty free. It is true that, on the other hand, the English had tobacco, on the exportation of which there was a bounty, conveyed into Scotland before the same date, in order that after receiving the bounty, it might be returned for sale in England. It was impossible, however, that the latter trick should either be so general or so profitable as the former. Accordingly, after the 1st of May, large fleets of vessels carrying foreign goods, which, as Scottish merchandise, claimed exemption from duty, entered the Thames. One fleet consisted of forty vessels laden with French wine and brandy,* and the English merchants were infuriated at this crafty attempt to evade the high customs' duty on these imported articles. The Board of Customs sympathised with the malcontents, and ordered the cargoes, along with the vessels, to be seized as foreign commodities smuggled into England through an artful perversion of the treaty of union. The seizure was conducted stringently, if not harshly, the officers of the ships being apprehended and treated as criminals. Scotland was fiercely indignant at these proceedings, as indicating the purpose of the sister country to violate any term of the treaty which tended to the promotion of Scottish prosperity, and to withhold a fair participation in her own commerce; and the enemies of the union and of the Revolution settlement laboured to feed and fan the popular rage. The matter came before the British parliament at the opening of this, its first session, and though English commercial interests were strictly watched over in the House of Commons, the impolicy and positive danger of sanctioning the seizure, and of exacting the usual penalties, were there appreciated, whilst for the great loss to the revenue, and the gross injustice to English trade, there was this consolation, that the trick could not at any future time be repeated. The commons decided upon remitting the duties on the so-called Scottish cargoes, and upon submitting to the loss.

But still more deeply and permanently offensive was the mode of managing the Harsh mode taxation of the country. Almost of levying taxes. all the new commissioners of excise and customs, as well as their subordinates, were Englishmen; and they carried out rigorously the method of raising the revenue in which they had been trained. The strictness of these officials, coming after the indulgent laxity of the old lessees of taxes, who moreover had never been so forbearing as they were on the eve of their occupation ceasing, appeared to be wanton oppression. The taxes themselves were now much heavier, and they were exacted in a summary and unconciliatory manner. The officials incurred the odium of the whole community, as did the system which they administered, unless when a Scotchman's keen sense of the ludicrous overpowered his indignation against this or that peculiarity, as in the case of the arrival from England of an extensive supply of birch fagots, curiously notched, to serve as tallies, for marking the receipt of monies paid into the exchequer.*

* Defoe, p. 572.

A leading result of the system of taxation now introduced into Scotland was the rise and growth of smuggling as a national evil. Almost as soon as the duties on imports began to be levied, a fleet of Dutch vessels, carrying contraband goods, visited the Scottish coast, and ever after regularly prosecuted this illegal traffic,—amongst the baneful consequences of which the fostering of unsteady habits, and of reckless and law-breaking dispositions in a large section of the population was not the least to be deplored.

The revenue system led to several English innovations, which, however wise in themselves, were ill-timed on account of the suspicions cherished towards everything of English origin and initiation. The native jurisdictions were not adapted for enforcing the collection of the revenue, and the establishment of local courts was considered necessary. Before the union, the Scottish parliament had in vain attempted to organise justice-of-peace courts, resembling those which had in England been eminently satisfactory to all parties; and the project, not less unwelcome, but far more indispensable than before, was now revived and resolutely put into operation, the Scottish privy council issuing a commission of the peace. It deviated, however, considerably from the English model, and every point of difference was highly objectionable to the English surveyors and collectors, who were bent upon an entire assimilation of practice, and did not scruple to bend the Scottish institutions to their English habits, though such national bigotry led to serious injustice and general complaints. Disgusted soon with this constant process of bending, and taught also that there were not a few cases in which it was wholly impracticable, the revenue officials insisted on the abolition of all differences between Scottish and English justices-of-peace, so that the latter should be exact models for the former. Parliament hastened to comply, and directed the lord-chancellor to issue at once a commission under the great seal. The Scots indignantly viewed this as the commencement of a deliberate and open aggression upon their native institutions, the sacredness and perpetuity of which had been guaranteed by the recent treaty, and they were specially irritated on finding at the head of the list of the new justices-of-peace for each county "the most reverend father in Christ, and our faithful counsellor, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, and metropolitan thereof,"—as if detested prelacy had been granted a lodgment in the secular economy of Scotland, in order that it should soon step into the ecclesiastical, and as if the terrible days of Archbishop Sharpe were again at hand.

The sweeping away, at the same time, of the privy (or, as called in the north, Secret council the secret) council of Scotland, ^{abolished.} further awakened the jealousy of the people, though that despotic tribunal had a hateful history, and had been in existence far too long. It had proved itself the engine of bloody persecution throughout the closing period of the Stewart dynasty, and at any time its irresponsible character was enough to condemn it; yet its summary abolition by the British parliament was ascribed to the overbearing and insolent spirit of England, and was held to indicate that no limit could be set to her encroachments. The act had been carried by a majority in the legislature, in spite of the opposition of ministers, who were not unwilling to keep up the council as a convenient, though arbitrary, instrument of authority in this remote portion of the empire; and the Scots regarded the abolition as more alarming since it came from the English nation, and not from the government.

Thus inauspiciously opened the joint career of the two nations, to the great satisfaction of Colonel Hooke's faction, however, of the exiled Jacobites, their sovereign, and the French government, that had, a few years before, on the death of his father, undertaken to maintain his rights to the British throne. An invasion from France had already been projected, and the intense dissatisfaction throughout Scotland, which was excited by the act of incorporation, and by the early legislation of the British parliament, seemed to promise it a complete success. To prepare the way, and secure the co-operation of all parties disaffected to the existing order of things, Colonel Hooke, as ambassador from the French court, had reached Slaines Castle (Aberdeenshire), the Earl of Errol's seat, only a few days after the act of union received the royal sanction. This officer, a zealous Jacobite, was empowered to consult and negotiate with all who might be friendly to the restoration of the Stewarts and the repeal of the union. He met with much that was encouraging—many glowing representations from the Jacobites of the alacrity with which the whole country would rise in favour of the descent; and he appears to have blinded himself to the fact that the number and martial resources of those chiefs who were pledged to cast in their lot with the enterprise were very inconsiderable, and did not warrant any sanguine anticipations of the issue. In reporting to the French government the result of his various interviews and observations, he alluded to the defenceless condition of England as highly favourable to the invasion. At that period the strength of the English army had been drafted to the Continent, leaving at home nothing but a small reserve to operate in an emergency. In Scotland itself there was a still more scanty force available to the British government—consisting, indeed, of only a few skeleton regiments. Such a palpable deficiency in the means of resistance, along with the fact that any reinforcements would have to come by a tedious and circuitous route, and that their concentration might easily be impeded, if not prevented, promised well to the invading enterprise. Colonel Hooke was assured that the landing of ten or even of five thousand French troops, accompanied by the exiled monarch, would amply suffice. This demand of foreign soldiers to start the project could not be thought extravagant, but money and arms were needed in greater abundance than men from France. The native Jacobites calculated confidently on raising an army of 25,000 foot and 5000 horse, to swell the ranks of the invaders as soon as the Chevalier arrived with the stipulated supplies of men, money, and arms, whilst they had no doubt of receiving troops from Ireland, and of being joined, in their crowning march upon London, by many thousands of their English friends, whose attachment to the Stewart cause, though as yet prudently masked, was ardent and steady. They persuaded the French ambassador that all classes in Scotland, the Cameronians, and the general body of the presbyterians, as well as the entire force of the Roman Catholic and episcopalian Jacobites, would forget their mutual differences, and rush forth from the Highlands and the Lowlands to achieve the overthrow of the union, and of the Revolution settlement.

* These fagots continued to be used in England down to 1834, when the ceremonious destruction of them led to the burring down of the Houses of Parliament.

Such were the Jacobite professions made to Doubtful Colonel Hooke, and reported by support. him to the French court, and they afforded a bright prospect of success to the invasion, though the cause wore some sinister aspects, which passed altogether unnoticed by the sanguine commissioner. Not a few chiefs, who had the largest following, and who could have raised armies from their own clans, declined to take any initiative step in the enterprise, or dextrously managed not to commit themselves. Some feigned bodily illness as an excuse for refusing the colonel an interview, and his mission their consideration; and others, who were expected to pledge themselves heartily and unconditionally, delayed their decision until they should learn the final intentions of this and that neighbour, who almost invariably showed the same cautious hesitation. The Highland chiefs, who, though they had taken no part in the old Scottish parliaments, and never had their names associated with the proceedings of the Estates, were men of whom the highest account should have been made (since they had warlike hordes in their train), do not appear to have been consulted by Hooke, or to have had any deference paid them with a view of securing their support. The emissary was foolish enough to expend his time and persuasive powers upon the Lowland gentry, whose co-operation, even if hearty and entire, was, in every respect, of far inferior consequence. There had been no proper attempt made to gain over the great majority of the Celtic chiefs and their populous tribes to a struggle in which they would have needed but little inducement to involve themselves. The colonel's list of supporters, beginning with such powerful nobles as the Duke of Gordon, Lords Errol, Saltoun, and Panmure, and ending with a long string of obscure and unimportant names, showed such important omissions as, had he properly known the country, ought to have convinced him that he had egregiously failed in his mission. With all the keen popular and party animosity in Scotland towards the union and the reigning dynasty, he yet did not manage to draw forth and rally around the invading standard of James better and more numerous supporters than by mere intrigue he might have gathered in a calm and contented era. A student of the period and the crisis may be led to fancy what a formidable array of Highland rebels, to co-operate with the French invaders, might easily have been conjured up by the energy of an ardent and skilful Scottish emissary from the court of France, who could then, unchecked by the imperial government, prosecute his career of agitation for as many months as the swift arrest of modern law now allows hours to a political or civil incendiary. But, unfortunately for the cause of the exiled dynasty, Jacobitism never possessed such an agent—certainly, not in the person of Colonel Hooke, who, as judged by his own report, forwarded to the French government, of his proceedings in Scotland (when that report is looked into beneath its sanguine complexion and its boasting expression), signally failed in attaching to his cause its ablest and most natural champions, and even, as we shall soon find, in getting the less competent supporters, whose names he had secured, to stir themselves and stand forth in the day of trial, when the French forces arrived on the Scottish coasts, and waited the appearance of their allies as a signal for disembarking. He Hooke stupidly allowed himself to be deceived by the duped in reference to the aims of Cameronians. the Cameronians, and the side which they would take in the struggle. In this he was “the biter bitten,” for he had endeavoured to delude these rigid sectarians into the belief that his master, in spite of his intense bigotry, was open to conviction regarding the errors of popery, and was ready “cheerfully to give ear to Protestant divines, and if they could convince him of an error from the word of God, he would be glad to embrace the religion of his people.” * This was by far the most artful representation made by Hooke, for the Cameronians, though not so simple as to give the stubborn prince any credit for candour or accessibility to argument, had yet an overweening idea of their own theological rhetoric and ability to overcome all opponents in debate. Hooke was sanguine enough to expect that, out of abhorrence for that prelaey with which the union had already brought Scotland into close alliance, and which that union would probably soon thrust upon the Scots, they would take up arms with the popish faction. He had entered into negotiations with Ker of Kers-

* Ker's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 46.

land, not in the least suspecting the double-dealing of that leader, who kept the Duke of Queensberry duly apprised of what was going forward, and who had been encouraged by his grace to enter into the plot. Hooke believed Kers's representations that not fewer than five thousand Cameronians and eight thousand presbyterians were prepared to join the expected force from France. The Cameronians, it was said, would only need powder, as they were already amply furnished with arms. Ker was let into the important secret of the cypher used in all communications between the Scottish Jacobites and France, and he at once revealed it to the British government. To mark the confidence which the Jacobites placed in their Cameronian associate, they

Plan to surprise Edinburgh Castle.

disclosed to him a plot for the capture of the Castle of Edinburgh, the possession of which was at that time very desirable, not only as the stronghold and arsenal of the capital, but also as the depository of the "Equivalent" that was to be paid to Scotland in terms of the treaty of union. The money had just been put under the protection of the slender garrison there, and a bold attempt might succeed in appropriating it to the Pretender's exchequer. A few conspirators, it was arranged, were, on a certain day, to mix with the citizens who regularly crowded the esplanade, and one of the band was to seek admission to the castle under the pretext of a visit to some officer. On the lowering of the drawbridge, he was to shoot the sentry at the gate, and this was to be a signal, not only to his companions in the neighbouring throng, but also to a hundred armed men concealed in a house at the head of the High Street, who were to rush forth and seize the castle. Ker hastened in person to London, and communicated this design to the Duke of Queensberry, though, lest his journey south and its object should be suspected by his new friends among the Jacobites, he returned to Edinburgh with still greater expedition. This new ally of theirs, pledged to the support of the French invasion, had yet engaged before the duke in London that the Cameronians in full force should aid the British government in repelling the foreigners and defeating their designs.

There had thus, in several respects, been a considerable failure in the execution of Colonel Hooke's mission, though he represented the results in such glowing colours that the French government were sanguine of success, anticipating all but unanimous co-operation from the Scottish Jacobites, of whom, however, only a comparatively small and influential number had been pledged, and enthusiastic help from the Cameronians, whose whole strength was in reality to be forthcoming on the opposite side. Colonel Hooke's assurance that the invaders and their Scottish auxiliaries would, in their progress towards London, be largely reinforced by accessions both from England and from Ireland, was plausible to his French employers, who were deceived as to the extent of support to be given in Scotland to the invaders on their landing. If the whole or the greater part of Scotland were to welcome these and rise on their side, succours from England and Ireland would not be wanting; but when the scanty amount of Scottish co-operation actually secured by the colonel was considered, no friendly movement either in Ireland or in England ought to have been looked for.

The ill-timed character of the enterprise should have also lent its weight of discouragement to the actual results of Hooke's embassy. It came either too late or too early. The invaders should have landed either when the obnoxious union was under violent discussion, or when the union had lasted long enough to alarm, irritate, and offend, more seriously than it had as yet done, almost all classes in Scotland, but not long enough to develop its greatly preponderating advantages of prosperity, peace, and amity.

Louis XIV., flushed with the victories of the Duke of Berwick in Spain, resolved to delay the expedition to Britain no longer, but to act at once in accordance with Hooke's suggestions, and to attempt that easy conquest of England which had been predicted. At Dunkirk, a naval force, and transports for the troops to be embarked, were prepared, and placed under the command of Admiral Fourbin. The Scottish Jacobites had fondly trusted that the famous Duke of Berwick, only inferior as a military leader to his relative and antagonist, the Duke of Marlborough, would have been put at the head of the land forces, and they must have been greatly disappointed that such a post was to be filled by one who, though of far higher rank and holding a much larger share in the fortunes of the enterprise, was of untried qualifications for command—viz., the youthful Pretender himself, whose right to the British throne Louis XIV., when beside the death-bed of the prince's father, had promised to assert and maintain. The imbecility and stubborn wilfulness of the young man's character had not yet had time to appear, but neither had there been any indication of ability to fight his own battles, and be the leading champion of his own cause. The absence of a tried commander for the invading army which accompanied the fleet tended to dispirit both, and the expedition was prevented for a while from starting by the illness of the young prince, who at this critical juncture was seized with measles. The armament consisted of five men-of-war, the transports, and twenty-five frigates, and on board were five thousand soldiers; but this land force was reduced by a thousand men, who were in some of the frigates that, shortly after putting to sea, had been separated from the fleet and driven back to port.

Meanwhile, the British government had kept a strict watch upon every stage of the French preparations, and before these could be completed Sir George Byng, at the head of sixteen men-of-war, was cruising about to intercept the armament. The French vessels left Dunkirk without being seen, but at Newport Pitts, where they lay wind-bound, they were descried from the steeples of Ostend, and their position immediately reported to the English admiral. The wind, however, kept him stationary at Gravelin Pitts, a point so far to the south that the French, on resuming their course northwards, would have a start of eight hours. The tide happened also to be in their favour, enabling them to stand out to sea, and to make straight for the Frith of Forth, whilst their pursuers, ignorant as to what point of the British coast might be threatened, and anxious to be at hand when their aid should be required, kept close to the shore, thus unwittingly putting a much greater distance between them and the French, and allowing the invaders to approach the Scottish coast apparently alone. The latter had, indeed, in their haste sailed too far north; as, on nearing land, they found themselves at Montrose instead of Leith. Turning southwards, they made for the Frith of Forth; but, losing the tide, were brought to anchor near the Isle of May, where they were when the English fleet was descried approaching. The French admiral hastened to escape northwards towards the open sea, which he reached in safety, though one vessel, which had been taken from the English, was recaptured in the Frith of Forth by Admiral Byng, who remained there until he learned that the invading expedition had returned to Dunkirk.

During the time that the French hovered on the coast of Scotland, not a friendly signal was made by any of the powerful nobles who were reported by Hooke to have recently identified themselves with the enterprise. The troops on board had not even the faintest encouragement to land, for the Jacobites kept aloof, though not a few of that party in Edinburgh are described as putting on such airs as implied their hope of a speedy ascendancy. Admiral Fourbin prudently declined to disembark the French force, when there was no appearance of support for, or co-operation with, it on shore. He was urged by Scotch and French officers accompanying the expedition—and the Chevalier de St. George,* as the prince was termed, acquiesced in the proposal—to attempt a landing at Inverness. But though the admiral, in spite of the proximity of the English fleet, could have disembarked the troops at any of the ports on the north-east coast, he refused to comply with the demand, since none of the reputed friends of the cause in Scotland were ready to come to his aid. He had started from Dunkirk in the full belief that almost the whole nation would rally around the prince to achieve their deliverance from the union and Revolution settlement; but not a single supporter offered to join him, and everywhere he saw that his only welcome would be armed and desperate resistance from the forces and friends of the British government. As a proof of the utter absence of active co-operation on the part of any faction in Scotland with the invaders, it may be stated that the criminal records of the period contain accounts of nothing more serious, in reference to a rebellion, than the prosecution of two or three Lowland lairds for assembling in arms and drinking the Chevalier's health at convivial gatherings. But the evidence was so defective that the jury refused to convict them of high-treason, and returned a verdict of "not proven."

Had the Jacobite strength of the country been, indeed, drawn out to join the expedition, it would be difficult to exaggerate the alarming character of the crisis in relation both to the union and to the Revolution settlement; nor could we calculate the issue from what happened in 1715 and 1745, since the Jacobite rebels at these two dates wanted the strong French force of 1708. Nay, had Admiral Fourbin landed the French troops, trusting to meet with assistance from parties in Scotland after the campaign was fairly commenced, the enterprise was far from hopeless. Lord Leven, commander of the forces in Scotland, anticipated nothing less than that, if the French landed, he would be obliged to flee with his small and wretchedly-provided army into England. Writing to the secretary of state, he said, "I leave it to your lordship to consider my circumstances. Here I am, not one farthing of money to provide provisions, or for contingencies or intelligence, none of the commissioners yet sent down, few troops, and these almost naked. It vexes me sadly to think that I must retire beyond Berwick if the French land on this side of the Forth."* If the French troops had held Scotland for a month, they would have been able in that interval to assemble a large Highland army; and then they would have been in circumstances either to have maintained their position in Scotland against the British government, or to have marched into England to unite with their partizans in that country. Undoubtedly, there was sufficient reason for parliament presenting a congratulatory address to Queen Anne on the providential escape of the United Kingdom from the perilous crisis; nor need we wonder at the regret of the Jacobites, which ought, however, to have been mingled with self-reproach, that so promising an enterprise had miscarried, and that a French force, headed by their sovereign in person, had come and gone without ever striking a blow.

In the course of its congratulations, parliament, with the view of bringing down royal and popular suspicion upon the new Tory faction, which, without being committed either to popish or Jacobite principles, strongly favoured the pretensions of the exiled Stewarts, pointedly declared that the invasion would never have been meditated or attempted but for encouragement at home, given, too, by persons who were not excluded from the British court. Her majesty was now called upon no longer to permit these secret sympathisers with the foes of her throne to harbour near or have access to her person. The reply of the queen was highly gratifying to all who shared in the sentiments boldly expressed by the legislature, since she more than once used, very significantly, the term "Revolution," as descriptive of the national deed of 1688.—a term which hitherto she had scrupulously avoided, not less from personal dislike than from the traditions and associations of her education. The royal language was felt to be a blow against any interference with the Hanoverian succession.

* A conventional name, intended neither to acknowledge nor deny his royal pretensions.

Both the process and the results of the trial of the few Lowland lairds, who had publicly drunk the Pretender's health, were far from satisfactory to the British government; and the Scottish law against treason and other state offences appeared to English statesmen and judges so unsound as to demand immediate amendment, in order that the general peace and safety of the empire might not be compromised. Apparently oblivious of Scottish jealousy regarding innovations from England, they passed Alteration in an act, transferring, in cases of treason, the authority of the Court of Justiciary to a commission of Oyer and Terminer, directed to proceed exactly as in English trials. This assimilation had encountered strenuous resistance from almost all the Scottish members of the legislature; but they did not succeed even in weeding out from the statute certain English technicalities, the application of which to Scotland was perplexing and preposterous. One important amendment, however, upon the attainder clauses was extorted, rendering heirs of entail exempt from their penal operation, and providing that, on and after the death of the Pretender, any forfeiture for treason should not extend beyond the life-interest of the convicted traitor. Another concession wrung from the British government by the resolute opposition was, the adoption of some of the regulations hitherto observed in Scotland for apprising the accused person of the nature and amount of the evidence to be adduced against him at his trial. Still the measure, and the hasty and high-handed way in which it was carried through parliament, excited a deep resentment throughout Scotland; and it was fortunate for the union that it was enacted after, and not before, the French descent. The Scottish representatives, whose national peculiarities were frequently the object of English wit and sarcasm, shared largely in the sentiments of their countrymen. They also felt that they were personally treated in the legislature as inferiors, on whom mockery and ridicule might be vented, as if their connexion with Scotland degraded them beneath the imperial level. In addition to the mortification which they suffered when doomed to an overwhelming defeat in their opposition to anti-Scottish measures, they had often also to endure the galling raillery of the ablest English debaters, who delighted to see the proud and surly band from the north writhe and rage under their polished wit and invective. The amendments, however, which their pertinacity had forced upon the Treason Act, taught the Scottish members what zeal, along with cordial union and thorough co-operation, on the part of a very weak minority, might achieve, and prompted them to form a compact and resolute phalanx for the promotion of Scottish interests on all occasions, and by every means within their power. In the House of Commons, instead of yielding themselves up to sullen inactivity, or attempting a coarse yet impotent retaliation, they incessantly watched and laboured for the honour and prosperity of Scotland; and, on the whole, so managed that their country received no detriment,—at least, of a commercial kind,—but several considerable advantages from British legislation. Their banding together soon became the principal characteristic against which the English directed their sneers and taunts. They were accused of sordid ambition, in always seeking to make the union productive of trading and pecuniary benefit to the various classes of their countrymen; and they submitted to the charge as, in truth, a high compliment upon their patriotic services.

Meanwhile, the ecclesiastical affairs of Scotland were in a very unsatisfactory position, and seriously menaced the peace of the kingdom. The episcopal clergy, who had been in the ascendant before the Revolution, subsequently disappeared, being succeeded by a much smaller body of clergymen, who, however, were far more formidable, through their intense Jacobitism, not only to the presbyterian cause, but also to the union and the Revolution settlement. On the accession of Queen Anne, who was often suspected of sympathising with the exiled members of her family, and even of favouring their restoration to the throne on the termination of her own reign, they appear to have been kept quiet by their hopes of ultimate triumph; but the union, and its well-guarded provisions for the perpetuity of the presbyterian as Trials of the national church, incensed and Jacobite clergy, alarmed them. They were somehow apprised of the designs of the exiled court before the invading expedition was got ready at Dunkirk. About the period of the French descent, a considerable number of clergymen were tried at Edinburgh, for officiating whilst they had not taken the oaths prescribed, and for neglecting to include the queen and the Princess Sophia in their public petitions; but the prosecution had been entered upon by the crown on political grounds, and as a warning rather than a punishment. Not, however, of such a nominal kind were the trials instituted at the instance of presbyteries of the Church of Scotland, or of town councils, though these bodies received no encouragement from the queen. Alongside of the Scottish episcopalians, but still more obnoxious to presbyteries and the people at large, were the English episcopalians who had been brought by the union to reside in Scotland. Many Englishmen, as we have already seen, were put into offices connected with the customs or the excise; and, on removing from the southern to the

Combination of Scottish members of parliament.

Introduction of English episcopalian
clergy.

northern division of the island, they, along with their families, wished to worship after the forms to which they had been accustomed, instead of seeking fellowship with the presbyterians, or even with the episcopalians of Scotland. As if to provide these individuals with what they desired, several clergymen, ordained by the Church of England, came about the same time into Scotland, and there claimed, not the right of seizing upon the charges and stipends of the Scottish establishment, but the simple privilege of giving their clerical services to such of their countrymen as might prefer them. They and their hearers were careful to have their identification with the Church of England distinctly marked, though it might not save them from the position of dissenters in Scotland; and they kept themselves strictly separate from the Scottish episcopalians. They also in their public worship adhered to the English liturgy, a feature in their church service which was utterly odious to the mass of the people, and had been altogether dispensed with by Scottish episcopalians, who long continued to have no set forms of prayer. The introduction of the English service book invested the new sect with many obnoxious and irritating associations; so that not only both the moderate and the bigoted among the presbyterians, but also a large party that took a purely political view of the matter, opposed the toleration of English episcopacy as a deliberate sanction of that English supremacy which had never yet been conceded by the Scots, and had been expressly repudiated in the union treaty. The Church of Scotland denounced this toleration as virtually the overthrow of presbytery. Prosecutions of clergymen for "illegally" converting private houses into places where episcopal service was publicly conducted after the English mode, were instituted before the local magistracy; and, on a conviction being obtained and sentence of imprisonment passed, appeal was made to the lords of session, who sustained the decision. Thus all the grades of Scottish jurisdiction unanimously resisted the introduction of English episcopacy. The clergymen, however, along with their adherents, had friends in high quarters; and the judgment of the House of Lords was asked and obtained in reversal of the finding of the Supreme Court in Scotland.

Strangely enough, the question of the appellate Appeals to the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, over Scottish decisions, had never once, during all the negotiations and proceedings about the union, been mentioned; and, to a certainty, the union would have been more vehemently opposed if it had been imagined that it would compromise the paramount and final authority of Scottish law in Scottish cases, and render the Court of Session subordinate to the House of Lords. The opponents of the compact must never have had this contingency suggested to their minds, otherwise, along with many of their countrymen who were zealous for the union, they would certainly have demanded guarantees,—which, probably, the English parliament would have been led to concede,—against the possibility of appeal from the Supreme Court of Scotland to any tribunal in London. Up to the time when the House of Lords actually reversed the decision of the Court of Session in the case of the English episcopal clergymen, every judgment of the latter court was believed in Scotland to be like the "law of the Medes and Persians:" and intense was the mortification throughout all classes there when it was found that the decisions of its highest judges might be summarily overturned in England, and that the protection which the Scottish law afforded to the rights of presbytery, was to be rendered weak and worthless by the usurped prerogative of a body of men, consisting chiefly of English episcopalians, and including even the bench of bishops. The impression that both the law and the religion of Scotland were on the eve of being violently supplanted by those of the sister country, was still further confirmed when parliament shortly afterwards (in the spring of 1711) passed the Toleration Act for the protection of episcopalian worship. Toleration Act passed.

The queen had now a government of Tories, who were believed, like her majesty, to wish well to the Jacobite cause. Peace with France had been concluded at a moment when Marlborough was in the full career of victory, and before any of the great advantages, for which so much blood and treasure had been spent, could be secured; and the duke was not only withdrawn from the field, but also dismissed from the cabinet. This strange movement was regarded as preliminary to a cordial reconciliation with France, and a full agreement in the views of the French court concerning the succession to the British throne. English and prelatic encroachments upon the rights and privileges of the Church of Scotland advanced rapidly, and without any attempt at disguise. The General Assembly had, previous to the union, possessed and exercised the prerogative of decreeing occasional fast days, which were invariably enforced by the civil authority; and after the abolition of the Scottish privy-council the government was asked to invest certain officials in Edinburgh with the requisite power for promptly giving the sanction of the state to any ecclesiastical appointment of days of humiliation and fasting. The Whigs had contrived to evade, without positively refusing, this application; but, on the Tories coming into office, the presbyterians had reason to apprehend far more serious inroads upon their spiritual independence. Scarcely had the Toleration Act, with its offensive, yet wholly superfluous, abjuration oath for the presbyterian clergy, been passed, when another, and a still more deadly attack upon the guaranteed constitution of the Church of Scotland, was made. Church patronage restored by law. This act, however, though directly leading at remote periods to several perilous convulsions within, and secessions from the established church, did not, at the time of its passing, incur such deep and general odium as was cherished towards the abjuration oath just referred to: nor did it at first involve the clergy in a tithe of the momentous difficulties which they felt when dealing with that most unnecessary oath. Government found it advisable to explain away the aggressive and innovating character of such legislation, and in the annual letter laid before the General Assembly, at its first meeting after the enactment of the abjuration oath and the patronage law, her majesty took the opportunity of declaring that—"Lest any late occurrence should have possessed any of you with fears and jealousies, we take this solemn occasion to assure you it is our firm purpose to maintain the Church of Scotland as established by law: and whatever ease is given to those who differ from you in points that are not essential, we will, however, employ our utmost care to protect you from all insults, and redress your just complaints."* A large majority of the clergy, though now holding very moderate views and shrinking timidly from a conflict with parliament, could not disguise their sense of the Church's insecurity, or refrain from an expression of their desire that the recent legislation should be reversed; and in the formal reply to the royal letter their own jealousy and alarm, as well as the general uneasiness of the people, were acknowledged, and their hopes that what they complained of might "come in due time and manner to be redressed,"† were prominently set forth. The tameness and the subserviency of the assembly, however, could not prevent the realisation of difficulties and dangers for the Church, when the time arrived for taking the

The oath of abjuration oath. The clergy were split into three divisions: one, numbering an overwhelming majority, submitted to take the oath; another, numerically inconsiderable, stoutly refused, and denounced all who, either themselves complied or tolerated the compliance of others; and a third, or middle party, consisting of those who wished the oath to be a matter of forbearance so far as the Church was concerned, and who recommended that it should be left entirely between the government and individual clergymen, each minister, whether taking or refusing the oath, being liable to no ecclesiastical censure, not even to any oburgations from his brethren, who ought to look upon him and upon themselves as amenable to the state alone. The dispute within the Church was carried on with the utmost acrimony, especially by individuals belonging to the second or non-juring party (then commonly known as "Nons"), several of whom subsequently seceded from the establishment, and formed themselves into a separate body, which exists in the present day under the name of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. The majority of Scottish episcopalians, as might have been expected from such zealous Jacobites, refused to take the oath, and thus proved their ingratitude for the great advantages secured to them by the Toleration Act. The chief clause in the form of abjuration ran as follows:—"I do solemnly and sincerely declare that I do believe in my conscience the person pretended to be Prince of Wales, during the life of the late King James, and since his decease pretending to be, and taking upon himself the style and title of King of England, by the names of James III., or of Scotland by the name of James VIII., or the style and title of King of Great Britain, hath not any right or title whatsoever to the crown of this realm." The majority of Scottish episcopalians could not subscribe this declaration without either abandoning, at a singularly auspicious juncture, their Jacobite aims, or committing the most flagitious perjury. They could, however, be non-jurors, and yet, at the same time, escape punishment, since their Jacobite opinions were shared by the Tories in power, who, it is probable, had been coerced by their Whig opponents into the institution of a Hanoverian test, and were disposed to enforce it upon their partizans in Scotland with but little zeal or sincerity. In the case of the Scottish episcopalians, it had both a meaning and a propriety, and ought to have been rigorously exacted from them: whereas it might have been safely and decorously dispensed with in the case of the presbyterians, who reprobated the Pretender as heartily as they did the pope and the devil, and who with all their energy would maintain the cause to which the oath was designed to bind them negatively, but who had strong conscientious scruples against some of the terms in which that oath was couched, and against certain English and prelatical associations and assumptions with which they did not wish to identify themselves in its general construction. From those, however, to whom it was utterly superfluous and useless, as well as offensive, and who would of their own accord have zealously fulfilled all that they were required in its objectionable form to promise, the test was exacted; whilst the very men who specially needed its restraint to preserve their loyalty to the Revolution settlement, and to whom the prescribed form of the abjuration could be in no respect offensive, were allowed to evade it without being subjected to the pains and penalties which disobedience would have entailed upon more deserving and less dangerous parties.

Thus, in Scotland, all the parties, known as the strenuous supporters of the Revolution settlement and the union, had, ever since the latter event, been irritated, insulted, and overborne by British legislation, which faithfully represented the haughty domination of English views and interests. Alarmed and indignant at the character and extent of English encroachments, and utterly perplexed as to the means effectual resistance, they began bitterly to repent the part they had taken in promoting and consolidating a union, the advantages of which England seemed bent on monopolising. Dissatisfaction and despondency, alienation and resentment, everywhere prevailed, except amongst the Jacobites, who rejoiced over the unfair and unpropitious working of the union, and were hopeful of the speedy triumph of their cause. They were pleased, just because everybody else in Scotland was dissatisfied, and because the deep and general discontent was auspicious to the return of the exiled Stewarts. Besides, there were a few special circumstances which concurred to cheer the spirits of the Jacobites. The members, or at least the leaders, of the government, were on good grounds supposed to be on their side; and the secret had partially transpired that Bolingbroke himself was pledged to the Pretender. A small incident was laid hold of by the great body of sensitive and anxious Scots, as indicating the confident and daring mood of the Jacobites at this time. The Duchess of Gordon's medal. Duchess of Gordon, whose sympathies with the dethroned family had never been disguised, presented to the Faculty of Advocates in Edinburgh a silver medal, bearing on one side the effigy of James, with the significant inscription "Cujus est,"* and on the other a miniature map of Great Britain, with the words "Reddite."† It was said at the time that her grace's gift was most cordially welcomed by the members of the Scottish bar, the Dean of Faculty denouncing the celebrated Duncan Forbes, and others who opposed the receiving of the medal, as "pitiful scoundrel vermin, and mushrooms;" and expatiating, in terms equally violent and unequivocal, upon the "rights" of the Pretender, and the delight of Queen Anne to see her unfortunate brother appreciated, and at her own death restored to his inheritance. The dean was indicted for "leasing-making,"‡ but the prosecution was dropped before any definite result was obtained. The various contemporary versions of the whole affair are so contradictory as to leave the modern reader in perplexity about almost all the points. On the one hand, we have journals and pamphlets of the day chronicling and discussing minutely the speeches ascribed to Dean Dundas, and other members of the Faculty, on the occasion of the medal being produced before the Faculty, and also reporting the substance of the reply of thanks made by those who had been deputed to wait upon the duchess to express their gratitude for "all your favours, and particularly for the honour you did us in presenting us with a medal of our sovereign the king,"§ and to assure her grace how proud they were "of any occasion to testify our loyalty to his majesty, and the respect and honour we have for your grace." The speeches are, indeed, distinguished by such a frankness and daring in the avowal of Jacobite treason as are all but incredible, when said to come from astute and cautious lawyers; nor will the profession like to bear the scandal of the coarse language which it is proved by the records of the trial that the dean employed on the reception of the medal. On the other hand, the dean gave the lie direct to the "Flying Post," which issued the particular version that seems to have been adopted by all contemporary historians and censors; and he also threatened to indict the editor, who, however, persisted in upholding the accuracy of his account. But, on the supposition that the incident really took place, and that the dean and other lawyers were implicated in the transaction, as represented in the public journals of the day, it is curious that the records of the Faculty of Advocates contain, at least, so far as has yet been discovered, no evidence for the leading circumstances which produced such a strong sensation throughout the country. Reference is made to a servant of the Faculty, whom some members blamed for having received a "medal," especially "that particular medal;" whilst others were "for admitting any medal of whatever kind." That this was a Jacobite medal is rendered highly probable by the fact recorded, that the Faculty not only decided on handing the token over to the crown lawyers, but issued a loyal address, at the close of which they, "for vindication of their duty, and loyalty to her majesty's person and government, and the Protestant succession, as by law established in the illustrious house of Hanover, do declare their utter detestation of all practices that directly or indirectly may contain the least insinuation to the contrary, or any encouragement to the Pretender or his abettors."* Unless we are to suppose that Dundas and his brethren of the Scottish bar were either afraid or ashamed of the treasonable act into which they had been allured by the gift of the duchess, and, therefore, anxious to leave as little trace as possible of their proceedings about the medal, it may be presumed that the contemporary representation of the incident was grossly overcharged. Whether accurate or exaggerated, however, it equally serves to bring out the common opinion entertained of the audacity of the Jacobite party at that period, and their confident expectations of ultimate triumph.

* Wodrow's Analecta, vol. ii. p. 38.

† Ibid., vol. ii. p. 39.

Danger still more serious was to be apprehended from other quarters than from the Highland incorporated society of lawyers. gatherings.

In the Highlands there began to take place immense gatherings of chiefs and their retainers, in a complete warlike array, which had no ostensible or legitimate aim. The funeral of a man of local influence was now invariably an armed demonstration, at which many clans mustered, as if to show their strength and state of preparation for taking the field in defence of the Pretender's claims. Money, too, in considerable sums, was known to pass from the "secret-service" department of the government to those chiefs; and for this the unsatisfactory apology was advanced, that it was but

* "Whom does it represent?"

† "Restore."

‡ State Trials, vol. xv. p. 122.

§ Boyer's Annals, p. 205.

* Burton's History of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 74. This author personally searched the records of the Faculty of Advocates, and found no other notices or traces of the incident than those given above.

a continuance of the practice of the late King William, who, surely, could not encourage any conspiracy against the Revolution settlement through which he gained and kept the crown.

The government did not fail still, and more abundantly than before, to supply the Jacobites with Scottish grievances to be urged as arguments against the union, the force of which Scotchmen of all parties and classes would feel. To offend the presbyterians, the "Yule vacance" was restored by parliament; and, as if at the same time to insult their nationality and that of all their countrymen, the English name of the holiday ("Christmas vacation,") was substituted for the original Scottish. The Schism Act, passed about this time, though applying directly to England, and subjecting dissenters there to extensive civil disabilities as well as decreeing pains and penalties to those conformists and qualified persons who might yet be found in dissenting places of worship, had also a hostile and offensive reference to Scotland; since it disqualified any presbyterian for civil office in England, whilst English episcopalians had been allowed to occupy similar situations in Scotland. The legislature, too, showed alacrity in humbling and irritating Scotland, whenever the government chose to spare her. Hence, when the Tory ministry conferred a British peerage on the Duke of Hamilton, the House of Lords offered a violent resistance; and thus sorely galled not only the aristocracy, but all classes in the north. The sneers and sarcasm employed by some of the English peers in support of this attempt to interfere with the prerogatives of the crown, inflicted a deep wound on the pride of a high-spirited and sensitive nation. When the haughty barons of England professed a fastidiousness, which would not allow them to acknowledge as brethren or equals a horde of hungry and sordid nobles from Scotland, who were described as only "a sort of titled yeomen" in their own country, the rage of the Scottish people was unbounded; and all ranks of the community resented the insult offered to those chivalrous lords who, for many centuries, had stood up against the most illustrious of the English peerage in innumerable "well-fought" fields, and had not been esteemed as unequal or unworthy foes by the ancestors of those "silken barons," who now superciliously reckoned themselves too noble for the company of Scottish barons in days of peace, and under a united empire.*

* "It was said no Scottish noble could sit in that house by any other title than as one of the sixteen peers, to which number the peerage of that kingdom had been restricted; and the opposition pretended to see great danger in opening any other way to their getting into the upper house, even through the grant of the sovereign, than the election of their own number. The fallacy of this reasoning is obvious, seeing it was allowed on all hands that the queen could have made any Scotsman a British peer, providing he was not a peer in his own country. Thus the Scottish peerage were likely to be placed in a very awkward situation. They were peers already as far as the question of all personal privileges went, but because they were such it was agreed that they were not capable of holding the additional Thus, English statesmen, instead of following a policy calculated to abate the opposition of the Scottish people to the union, and to quiet their fears of English domination, introduced and passed a long series of measures which could not but wound their pride, shock their sense of independence, and arouse their suspicions and jealousies. Their legislation exasperated, when it ought to have conciliated; and yet they seemed reckless about its natural results, as if the smaller kingdom must submit to English ascendancy and dictation, as to overruling and inevitable fate. Had their object been to offend and alienate Scotland, and to drive her to a violent rupture of the union—at least, to provoke some powerful parties into rebellion—they could not have adopted a more likely method. All their deeds and words were characterised by an air of arrogant superiority and mastery, and by a total disregard of the cherished feelings and conscientious views, if not also of the vital interests, of Scotland, sure to gall a nation which was never remarkable either for a servile or self-depreciating disposition. Scotland was in consequence now in a state of such clamorous discontent, that any new grievance, though comparatively trivial, was almost sure to bring about a crisis.

That grievance was soon presented in the shape of a tax on malt of sixpence per bushel. This impost was denounced not only as unduly severe, and as involving several fiscal arrangements obnoxious to the community, but also as violating the union-treaty, one of the clauses of which expressly exempted Scotland from the malt tax during the continuance of the great continental war. The opposition was so menacing, that for once the government, laying aside the haughty demeanour and the arbitrary and summary proceedings which had been maintained for the last seven years, and had proved so exasperating, condescended to resort to conciliation, and attempted to reconcile the Scots to the tax, by secretly assuring them that, though leviable, it would not be enforced in the north. In parliament, however, the Scotch members continued to give it the most strenuous resistance, and witnessed with keen anger the overwhelming majority which rallied around the bill in its last, as in its first stage. Nor were the nobles of Scotland less indignant; but after various meetings for consultation, it was agreed that their representatives in the House of Lords should deliver privilege of sitting as legislators, which it was admitted the queen could confer, with all other immunities, upon any Scottish commoner. Their case was like the bat in the fable, who was rejected both by birds and mice because she had some alliance with each of them. A Scottish peer not being one of the elected sixteen could not be a legislator in his own country, for the Scottish parliament was abolished, and, according to this doctrine, he had become, for no reason that can be conjectured, incapable of being called to the British House of Peers, to which the king could summon by his will any one, save himself and his co-peers of Scotland. Nevertheless, the House of Peers, after a long debate, and by a narrow majority, decided that no Scottish peer, being created a peer of Great Britain since the union, had a right to sit in that house."—Sir Walter Scott. The resolution referred to was afterwards altered.

their opinion in a way calculated to impress and alarm the government. The bill, being one of supply, it could not be formally discussed in the upper house; but another bill was introduced by Lord Findlater, and energetically supported by the Duke of Argyll, and his grace's brother, Lord Ilay, summarily proposing to repeal the union, on the grounds that the treaty had been broken, and many insolent and injurious encroachments perpetrated upon the institutions of Scotland, and upon the rights and privileges of her people. The irritating character of recent legislation towards Scotland was strikingly attested by the fact that those Scottish nobles, who had been most conspicuous in their advocacy of the union, and who still believed that the measure might and should largely conduce to Scotland's peace and prosperity, now came forward prominently to urge the immediate separation of the two countries, as altogether preferable to the maintenance of the inequality and injustice with which the compact was carried out. They had taken this extreme step with the view of warning the government against persisting in its anti-Scottish policy. They did not favour repeal for its own sake, but advocated the measure for the purpose of obtaining relief from the haughty and selfish policy of England, and with the expectation that the menace would serve to open the eyes of English statesmen to the consequences of their ungenerous treatment of the sister kingdom. The motion, however, was discussed and settled in a thin house, and was only lost by a majority of three on the proxies, the peers present being equally divided.*

The Jacobites, though they generally held that a repeal of the union must precede the restoration of the Stewart dynasty, could not be said to be discouraged by this decision, since they were not given to expect either the one or the other consummation as the result of a peaceful parliamentary vote. They had greater hopes from the natural effect of continued offensive legislation upon the minds of their sensitive countrymen, who, if driven to extremity by aggravated insults and injuries, might suddenly rise up and rend the ties which bound them to the sister-country; and, as for the other object which they sought to attain—the restoration of the Pretender, they had now more reason than ever to be sanguine. They believed that the Tory government, and the queen herself, were strongly in favour of their cause; and they expected important results from the appointment of the Duke of Hamilton as British ambassador at the French court. His grace's character was marked, as had been proved at many a crisis in the fortunes of Jacobitism, by the most contemptible vacillation, but that was scarcely to be dreaded, when he was directed and supported in his negotiations both by the British and the French governments, and acted as their organ and agent, rather than a leader and champion. His death, however, in a duel, originating in a quarrel with Lord Mohun, an odious villain already stained with several murders, blasted these expectations; and such was the disappointment of the Jacobites, that they did not scruple to affirm that Lord Mohun had been instigated to send the challenge by some zealous members of the Whig party, and that the unfortunate nobleman was killed, not by his antagonist, but by General Macartney, Lord Mohun's second. Some colour was given to this accusation by Macartney's flight from the country; but this was not incompatible with the idea of his innocence, as he might reasonably have been afraid, amidst the fierce excitement that prevailed, of the consequences of surrendering himself to public justice, inflamed by party and personal revenge.

The death of Queen Anne herself, on the 1st of August, 1714, was a still more grievous blow to the expectations of the Jacobite party. Natural feeling, and the instinctive charities of blood, had prompted her to cherish strong sympathy with the outcast Stewarts; but, after her demise, came the Hanoverian succession, and henceforth there was no close tie between the occupant of the British throne and the banished prince. From a de facto sovereign belonging to the house of Hanover, the Jacobites could look for no encouragement to the "divine right" of the exiled prince; nor could they expect that the former would keep a ministry suspected of any predilections for the latter. In the high quarter where their cause had of late been secretly fostered, they must now prepare to encounter utter hostility. They knew that the British court could no longer tolerate or wink at their treasonable schemes, and this change was, in itself, seriously discouraging. Besides, to oppose and overthrow the Hanoverian dynasty, as a state of things actually realised, was far more difficult and dangerous than to conspire against it as a contingency, whether distant or near at hand. Hence the accession of George, the Elector of Hanover, paralysed the energies and hopes of those who had for years resolved that the throne of Britain should be occupied not by a "wee German lairdie," but by the exiled prince who inherited the blood and birthright of a long line of Scottish kings.

* Parl. Hist., vol. vi. pp. 1213—1221.

CHAPTER LIX.

GEORGE THE FIRST.

A.D. 1714.

IN Scotland at large, where the national history
 Accession of had rendered the people familiar George I. with the premature and violent deaths of not a few favourite sovereigns, the quiet departure of Queen Anne, whose name had never been popular in the country, but stood associated with English ascendancy and episcopal encroachments, occasioned a grief far from intense, though there was a general tinge of pensiveness from the thought that in her tomb was buried the royalty of the Stewarts, whose long sway over Scotland, after extending itself to the sister kingdom, now passed into the hands of a petty foreign potentate. Yet a knowledge of the principles and aims—stubbornly despotic—of the Pretender, the immediate heir of that ancient Stewart race, would suffice to mitigate any regret on account of the change, and reconcile the nation to the supremacy of the Hanoverian family.

The commencement, not only of a new reign, but of a new dynasty, was regarded by the Scots far more hopefully than sadly, and promised to bring them relief from their crying grievances. The presbyterians, and other parties, wished to believe that the wise and just policy of the house of Hanover would henceforth turn away the popular mind from brooding on such an extreme alternative as the repeal of the union, and secure for the nation a speedy deliverance from the haughty supremacy of England.

The Princess Sophia had recently died, and her son, who succeeded her in the electorate of Hanover, was now called to ascend the British throne, under the title of George I. The order for his

George I. proclamation in Scotland reached proclaimed at Edinburgh on the 4th of August Edinburgh. (1714), about midnight; and the Earl of Ilay, Lord Justice-general, to whom it was addressed, took care that the ceremony should be imposing, and of a kind fitted to stimulate, as well as to indicate, the loyalty and joy of the people. On the following day, the proclamation took place at the market-cross, in presence of the most brilliant assemblage which the ancient city had ever seen, as if to show that Scotland, though incorporated with England, had still a prominent position on great state occasions, as well as impressively to attest her hearty acquiescence in the choice of a sovereign. The union had not yet led to the desertion of Edinburgh by the Scottish peerage; and the Whig nobles, amongst whom were the Duke of Montrose, the Marquis of Tweeddale, the Earls of Rothes, Morton, Buchan, Lauderdale, Haddington, Leven, Hyndford, Hopetoun, and Roseberry, and Lords Belhaven, Elibank, Torphichen, Polwarth, and Balgonie, now attended to give dignity to the occasion, followed by long trains of dependents in splendid liveries. The humbler classes of the community came forth in holiday garb and spirit, and formed such imposing processions as threw into the background of the joyous scene the parading of the troops. In concert with the peals of the city bells, and the booming of the castle guns, were the enthusiastic shouts and acclamations from the densely-crowded streets. The loyal demonstration was privileged with the finest weather, the day being one of the brightest in that month (August) which Scotland knows as generally the most genial portion of the whole year; and when the sunshine faded away, large bonfires began to blaze in various localities, and threw their ruddy illumination far and near, until the city and its bulwark of hills seemed set in one of those conflagrations with which the armies of England—victorious for the moment—had repeatedly, centuries before, reduced the northern metropolis to ashes. Both day and night appeared too short for the rejoicing multitudes, and the presence of the new king himself could scarcely have heightened or intensified the raptures of Scottish loyalty. The acclamation of “God save the king” had a peculiar fervour and emphasis, as coming from the manly breasts of thousands of presbyterians, who remembered the horrors of the “killing time,” and the crushing tyranny of the Stewarts; and crowds of such persons as usually kept away from public scenes of this kind, and contemned their “vanity,” eagerly took part in the demonstration. The Jacobites felt for the moment how insignificant and Depressed condition of the impotent they were as a party; and Jacobites.

 they held aloof from the display in a chagrin which partook of despondency, until their spirits were revived by reports of the formidable gatherings of Highland chiefs in various districts. The Pretender’s partizans in the city and neighbourhood had neither strength nor boldness to oppose the proclamation. They were overawed by the loyal masses that spontaneously appeared, and also by the concentration of troops which had been judiciously pre-arranged, for the suppression of any tumult. A strong force of volunteers, under General Wightman and experienced officers, were ready at call to put down every attempt at insurrection; whilst the defences of the castle had been repaired and strengthened against the chances of a surprise and assault. Armed interference, however, was not provoked; and the only disturbances which took place in Edinburgh were ludicrously trivial ones, got up by a few groups of drunken Jacobites, who, when primed by a succession of their favourite toasts, sallied into the street to make such an uproar as jollity, without politics, attempts every night in large towns. The civic authorities had no need of military aid to deal with the bacchanalians; and the magistracy, or the lords of justice, proceeded, without hindrance or resistance, to try and sentence them as if they had been obscure brawlers. In one instance, several young men were fined fifty pounds each, for having conveyed to the High Street a stoup of liquor, to be served out to all the passers-by who would join them in drinking the Pretender's health, and in singing and dancing to his honour. For weeks together at this time such youthful and light-brained adherents delighted to venture out into the streets at midnight, and get up a little revelry, in the midst of which they would proclaim King James VIII., much to the annoyance of sober citizens interrupted in their slumbers.

The proclamation of George I. in Glasgow, though less brilliant than in the metropolis, was attended Destruction of an episcopal chapel.

by a notable incident. An episcopal chapel, within which the English liturgy had of late been read, was pulled down as a public nuisance by a portion of the crowd; and, ere the authorities could interfere, the authors of this outrage had fled, and in spite of every effort of the lords of regency and the lord-advocate to discover them, they succeeded in making their escape. The Jacobites were pleased to construe the affair as a specimen of the unconstitutional and intolerant policy which might be expected from the Hanoverian party; and, indeed, they referred to it so frequently, and attempted to make so much of it, that suspicions began to be entertained that the destruction of the chapel was a purely Jacobite trick, for the purpose not only of associating a bad omen, or a bitter memory, with the proclamation-day, but also of loading the government, if not the new king, with odium. In confirmation of such suspicions was the rather singular fact, that Mr. Cockburn, the clergyman of the chapel, had conveniently left Glasgow with his family and movable property, and gone to Edinburgh on the day before the outrage—a precaution which seemed to indicate an exact foreknowledge of a definite arrangement, rather than a vague fear of some mischief which might be committed by the populace.

Throughout the country a general tranquillity prevailed, for the drunken escapades (similar to those in Edinburgh which we have mentioned) of the Jacobite gentry in a few of the rural districts did not produce any serious commotion. Government, however, kept a close watch over the principal land-owners, and other influential persons known to have sympathy with the exiled court, or to be disaffected towards the new sovereign; and, in several instances, adopted the precaution either of arresting them, or of requiring them to confine themselves to a certain locality, where all their proceedings would be under the official eye. The Duke of Gordon was ordered to keep his residence in Edinburgh, and Lord Seaforth to remain in his own castle.* Macdonald of Sleat, and a few Highland chiefs, accused of treasonable correspondence, were imprisoned; but Lord Drummond succeeded in baffling an attempt to seize him, and made his escape. Lockhart of Carnwath was apprehended, but bail was accepted, along with profuse promises on his part that he would implicitly follow all the directions of government, not only as to his residence, but also as to his occupations. The Earl of Breadalbane, anticipating coercive measures, had retired to an impregnable fastness in his own mountainous territory, where he could not be taken; and government directed guards to be placed at all the neighbouring passes, to prevent him from breaking out where their forces could not break in. As might have been expected, there was an immediate stoppage of the large sums of money which the Highland clans had annually received, first from William's ministers for conciliatory purposes, but of late from Queen Anne's Tory government for objects more equivocal. The chiefs, who had no objection to English gold supplied either for their own advantage or for that of the Jacobite cause, were enraged at this shutting up of the national exchequer, and brooded over it as a grievance not the less keenly to be felt and resented because they could not decently denounce it before the rest of their countrymen.

Meanwhile, the movement which had been begun towards the close of Queen Anne's reign, for a repeal of the union, was vigorously prosecuted everywhere by the Jacobites, who hoped for a continuance of aid from the Whigs and presbyterians. The latter did, indeed, for a short time mark their indignation at the anti-Scottish legislation of the last eight years, by joining in the agitation for repeal; but they soon began to suspect and dislike their Jacobite associates, and to be convinced that that agitation was mischievously employed as the stalking-horse for inveterate opposition to the revolution settlement, the Protestant succession, and also to the union, whether fairly or unjustly carried out by England. Accordingly, the Whigs and presbyterians resolved on withdrawing their co-operation from the repeal cause, until Jacobitism should be extinct, or, at least, altogether impotent; and they directly discountenanced the addresses which were being got up against the union, and the engagements which were being entered into to vote only for repeal members of parliament.* The result of this wise abandonment of the movement, when seen to be mainly a Jacobite one for the separation of Scotland from England, was, that the Scottish elections for the new parliament (which met on the 17th of March, 1715) sent a very large majority unpledged on the repeal question, but stout adherents of the Hanoverian succession; whilst the sixteen peers elected by the Scottish nobility to sit in the House of Lords, all represented the same patriotic cause, and were indeed the very lords whose names stood on the list brought down from London by the Duke of Argyll as the choice of the government.

The clergy of the Church of Scotland showed a similar zeal for the Hanoverian dynasty, and refrained from embarrassing or endangering the new reign by any encouragement to the agitation for repeal. The General Assembly, at its first meeting

* Rae's Narrative, p. 77.

* Tindal, vol. ii. p. 412.

after the accession of George I., confirmed the deposition of two clergymen in the north for failing to observe the day of thanksgiving appointed by the Church for the new reign, and for neglecting to pray for his majesty.* The spirit of the Scottish nation was thus proved to be unequivocally loyal, and promised small hopes of success to any enterprise of the Jacobites, who, as a party, had been reduced to thorough inaction. There were fewer symptoms of convulsion and danger than in any of the years which had elapsed since the union; and yet, before the year closed, Scotland was to be divided into two hostile camps, and the inheritance of the British crown was to be put to the arbitrament of civil war, in a campaign which should range over the Highlands and Lowlands, and over the northern counties of England itself.

We have now to detail the rise and progress of this outbreak and assault upon the Hanoverian dynasty, commonly spoken of as the "Scottish rebellion of 1715," or "Mar's rising."

Immediately after Queen Anne's demise, the Dukes of Marlborough and Argyll, along with other influential courtiers, received a manifesto signed and sent by the Pretender, setting forth "the sacred and fundamental constitution of hereditary right, which has still prevailed against all usurpations, how successful and how long time however continued." The writer protested pompously against being "answerable, before God and man, for the pernicious consequences which this usurpation of our crown may draw on our subjects and all Christendom." The document contained an allusion to the deceased queen, "of whose good intentions," adds the prince, "towards us we could not for some time past well doubt; and this was the reason we then sat still, expecting the good effects thereof, which were unfortunately prevented by her deplorable death." But now that a stranger and an enemy occupied the throne, which by divine and unalienable right belonged to James, as heir of the Stewarts, it was hoped that all true subjects would forthwith rally around the one, and displace the other as a usurper. This appeal, however, produced no effect within the circle of statesmen; and it was by other influences that the Earl of Mar was precipitated into rebellion. This ambitious but unprincipled nobleman hoped that his services, as secretary of state for Scotland, would be required by the new king, even though there should be a general dismissal of Queen Anne's ministry; and he lost not a moment in conveying to George I. profuse assurances of ardent loyalty and devotedness. The king, before leaving Holland for the great empire now conferred upon him,

Mar's letter to George I.—received from the earl a letter containing the following, amongst other explicit pledges and fervent wishes: "Your majesty shall ever find me as faithful and dutiful a subject and servant as ever any of my family have been to the crown, or as I have been to my late mistress, the queen. . . . As your accession to the crown hath been quiet and peaceable, may your majesty's reign be long and prosperous; and that your people may soon have the happiness and satisfaction of your presence among them, is the earnest and fervent wish of him who is, with the humblest duty and respect, your majesty's most faithful, most dutiful, and most obedient subject."*

To render his support of the Hanoverian dynasty highly important, and worthy of being courted even by royalty, Mar had managed to obtain a large following of Highland chiefs. He had drawn from —his influence in the Highlands.

them a document, in which they deputed him, as their trusty adviser, to lay their allegiance and duty at their new sovereign's feet, and to make known their willingness to transfer their fidelity from the Stewart family to that of the Guelphs. Their phraseology was dextrously framed to leave the impression designed by that wily politician, that it lay entirely with him whether such a large and influential body of Highland chiefs should declare for or against the Hanoverian succession; and it is not improbable that he dictated the words in which they describe themselves as passive in his hands, and implicitly waiting his guidance. "We must beg leave," said they in their letter to Mar, "to address your lordship, and entreat you to assure the government in our names, and that of the rest of the clans who, by distance of place, could not be present at the signing of this letter, of our loyalty to his sacred majesty King George; and we do hereby declare to your lordship that, as we were always ready to follow your directions in serving Queen Anne, so we will be now equally forward to concur with your lordship in faithfully serving King George. And we entreat your lordship would advise us how we may best offer our duty to his majesty upon his coming over to Britain; and on all occasions we will beg to receive your counsel and direction how we may be most useful to his royal government."† It is also reported, but with what accuracy cannot now be determined, that Mar's brother, Erskine of Grange, had prepared a letter, expressing for himself, and also for a large group of chiefs who looked up to his counsel, sentiments similarly loyal towards the new king; but that George declined to receive a document which, he was led to believe, had been concocted at the Pretender's court, and for sinister purposes. The earl calculated on his proffered loyalty being at once gratefully appreciated and rewarded; and he imagined that he had rendered it a matter of urgent policy that the royal favour should be conspicuously extended to him.

It so happened that all the Tory leaders were specially unfortunate in their endeavours to ingratiate themselves with the new king, or even to inspire

* Annals of King George, p. 22, where we are informed that the king himself directed the publication of the letter, as "so contrary to Mar's subsequent proceedings."

† Ibid. p. 57.

* Unprinted Acts of Assembly referred to in Burton's History.

him with confidence. The Tory ministers of the late queen, as still holding office, were entitled to take precedence in the ceremony of receiving the sovereign on his landing in England; and they did not mean to waive this right, for they had arranged that, surrounded by their parliamentary supporters, they should attend, to give him the first British welcome with a heartiness which might disarm him of his whig-instilled prejudices. But, as they waited at Greenwich for the royal barge, it was notified to them that the king would land in a few minutes, and that, as the banks and roads were already densely thronged, it was impossible for them in a body to force their way into the royal presence, otherwise than separately and individually. They were grievously disappointed at being prevented from parading the alacrity of their loyalty in an imposing manner; and they seem also to have been individually frustrated in their attempts to get near the king's person, and to obtain a passing notice from his majesty in his procession from the vessel to the palace. George I. was too blunt, if not too surly, to delight in protracted ceremonies of salutation, and soon declared himself wearied by the presentations and the hand-kissing. He had sought privacy for the evening before almost any of the Tory statesmen had been introduced to him. Next morning, the Duke of Ormond was informed that his services as captain-general were no longer required by the king,* and the dismissal of the Tory ministry was equally prompt and unceremonious. On the 24th of September (1714) the Earl of Mar found himself no longer secretary of state for Scotland, the Duke of Montrose having been appointed to the post. It cannot be denied that George I. began his reign in a style not more injudicious and unconciliatory than unconstitutional and arbitrary, contrasting strongly with that exhibited by another stranger, William of Orange, whose self-determined and inflexible will pursued its own path, without suspending the liberties or offending the pride of the nation. The late ministers were obnoxious to the people as well as to the king, and their sweeping expulsion from office might have been effected otherwise than by the exercise of a despotical prerogative. He had good reason to suspect that their sympathies were with the Stewart race, and to resolve upon being served exclusively by the Whigs; still he could have had his views and aims fully gratified by keeping to a constitutional course of procedure, and without giving mortal offence to the men who were to be discarded. The king's policy was calculated to multiply the Jacobites in high quarters, and to send over irrevocably to the Pretender's side a whole cabinet, that might have been detached by a little kindness, and turned into zealous Hanoverians. Nor could the Whigs, called so summarily to supplant their Tory opponents, view the royal method of overthrowing an old, and forming a new government, with much complacency. The nation at large, too, though glad at the dismissal of men who, for a year or two, had been suspected of deadly hatred and crafty intrigue against the Protestant succession, might have been dissatisfied with the arbitrary character of the royal procedure. It is plain that George I. ignored the advantages, and violated the rights, of a "constitutional opposition party" in parliament.

* Rae's Narrative, p. 90.

As might have been expected, this unceremonious dismissal of the Tories was accepted by them as a proclamation of war. The Duke of Ormond and Lord Bolingbroke—the latter of whom had been treated with special indignity by the king and the leading Whigs, and threatened with an impeachment, which was afterwards successfully "driven on," as he himself expressed it—repaired to France and tendered their allegiance to the Pretender; while Mar tarried for nearly a year in London only to ascertain if syco- phancy and guile might not avail to obtain a reconciliation with the king, and the recovery of place and power. He would only be a rebel after proving that a profession of loyalty could not promote his selfish ambition; he would go over to James Stewart, not from any delusion about "divine rights," much less from any patriotic impulse, but simply from a well-grounded conviction that from George I. he was not to receive any special favours, or to be restored to office and influence in the state. He might imagine that his close alliance by marriage with a leading Whig family (for in the present year he had married Lady Frances Pierrepont, second daughter to the Duke of Kingston, and sister to the celebrated Lady Mary Wortley Montague) would go far to recommend him with the king and the Whig government, especially if, when out of office, he appeared to keep aloof from all Tory and Jacobite associations and intrigues. The very meanness of his motives for remaining near the court so long might pass for rare magnanimity; and the unprincipled place-hunter, with all his base self-seeking, might come to be regarded as a disinterested and conscientious supporter of the Hanoverian dynasty, and a faithful friend to his sovereign in spite of personal discouragements and insults which had provoked others into schemes of vengeance. Mar patiently experimented for about a year, to discover if he was to be allowed to serve the king in order that he might serve himself; but he could find no symptom that he had made a favourable impression upon the royal mind. He had played and lost the game; he must now, therefore, change his hand, and transfer his allegiance and service to the Pretender.

It is mentioned in contemporary accounts that Mar went to a court levee on the 1st of August, 1715. Yet it was on the morning either of this or the following day that he set out for Scotland to raise the standard of rebellion against the king to whom he had just been paying loyal homage, and to stir up the flames of civil war. Attended by two servants, and in the company of Major-general Hamilton and Colonel Hay, the earl, disguised as an artizan, set sail from London in a Newcastle coal-barge about to make its return passage. On reaching Newcastle, he engaged a vessel to convey him thence to the coast of Fife; and he was set ashore at Elie, where he expected to be forthwith surrounded by a powerful host of friends. Nor was he disappointed: and the celerity with which the leading Jacobites of the north obeyed the orders which he now began to issue to them far and near, proves that the rising had been previously concerted in detail with the utmost care and precision; and that, when apparently clinging to the skirts of the court in London, with eager expectation of a royal smile, he was secretly carrying on an extensive correspondence of a treasonable character with the north. Lord Bolingbroke relates how a messenger from this country had gone over to France in the beginning of July, 1715, a month before the Earl of Mar set out from London to commence the insurrection, and informed his lordship that Scotland was not only ready to take up arms, but under some sort of disaffection at being withheld from the beginning; that in England the people were exasperated against the government to such a degree that, far from wanting to be encouraged, they could not be restrained from insulting it on every occasion; that the whole Tory party was become avowedly Jacobite; that many of the officers of the army and the majority of the soldiers were well affected to the cause; that the city of London was ready to rise, and that the enterprises for seizing several places were ripe for execution; that most of the principal Tories were in concert with the Duke of Ormond; and that the others were so disposed that there remained no doubt of their joining as soon as the first blow should be struck.* He also expressed the extreme astonishment and vexation of the Jacobites that Bolingbroke should remain neutral in such a juncture of affairs, when every other friend was zealously engaged heart and hand. "He represented to me," says Bolingbroke, "the danger I ran of being prevented by people of all sides from having the merit of engaging early in this enterprise, and how unaccountable it would be for a man, impeached and attainted under the present government, to take no share in bringing about a revolution so near at hand and so certain."† That unfortunate politician mentions a still more significant circumstance: that after he had accepted the post of secretary of state under the Pretender, and on the receipt of a message from Scotland, urging "the Chevalier to hasten their rising," he dispatched a messenger to London to the Earl of Mar, to tell him that the concurrence of England in the insurrection was ardently wished and expected; "but instead of that nobleman's waiting for instructions, he had already gone into the Highlands, and had actually put himself at the head of his clans."‡ It is thus plain that the Earl of Mar, though to all appearance standing aloof from every intrigue carried on in the spring and summer of 1715, against the Guelphic court, and humbly waiting a call to serve George I., had really been for several months back the associate of the English, and the leader of the Scottish Jacobites; and that he had prepared the latter for an instantaneous co-operation with him when he should enter Scotland to commence the insurrection.

On the 17th of August he left Fife, and with forty horse crossed the Tay. In his march to the north he sent to his numerous partizans among the Highland chiefs invitations to join him at a grand hunting match in Braemar Forest, on the 26th of that month; whilst those of the party whose residences lay near the route he was taking, were visited by him personally, and their presence at the great meeting of the clans secured. The gathering place for the gathering was most at Braemar.

sagaciously chosen, Braemar being not only accessible to, but convenient for, almost all the leading clans, as well as secluded from official observation, and guarded against the approach of government troops; whilst the pretended object, if not likely to throw further concealment around the treasonable enterprise which they met to inaugurate, was at least so legitimate as not to leave government any excuse for prohibiting the assemblage. On the day appointed, the chiefs, with many of their retainers, presented themselves at the appointed rendezvous. It is not known whether they attended for a little to the ostensible design of the gathering, for all the contemporary chronicles begin with the general council, political and military, into which the seeming sportsmen formed themselves within Braemar Castle on the first day of their meeting, their men proceeding to erect tents in front of that building for their own accommodation. The chiefs and their vassals present numbered eight hundred;* but Mar knew well, from the feudal rights and influence of many of the chiefs who attended, that these had as yet brought only a handful of their retainers, and that he might calculate on thousands, instead of hundreds, if their leaders did not shrink from resorting to arms. An immense extent of Highland territory, occupied by a large warlike population, was represented by a few of the chiefs then before him,—such as the Marquis of Tullibardine (the Duke of Athol's eldest son), the Marquis of Huntley (son of the Duke of Gordon), Lords Seaforth, Southesk, Stormont, Drummond, and Ogilvie, Glengarry, and Campbell of Glenderule, who was deputed by the Earl of Breadalbane. The military strength of these chiefs was very formidable, and they had far more numerous bodies of retainers, though, perhaps, much smaller rent-rolls, than the following noblemen, who were also in attendance at Braemar,—Lords Nithsdale, Traquair, Marischal, Errol, Carnwath, Linlithgow, Kilsyth, Kenmure, Kingston, Rollo, Duffus, Strathallan and Nairn. Even this muster-roll did not exhaust an array of nobles and chiefs committed to the sup-

* Goldsmith's Life of Henry Lord Bolingbroke, p. 209.

† Life of Bolingbroke, p. 209.

‡ Ibid., p. 213.

• Keith's Autobiography, p. 11.

3. Campion.

R. Wallis.

MR. A. M. M. M. C. A. B. T. L. R.

Aberdeenshire

port of the Pretender's cause, for a contemporary annalist, in giving the foregoing list of the principal Jacobites present at Braemar, adds, "there were also twenty-six gentlemen of interest in the Highlands whose names we have not had opportunity to get a list of." * According to the same authority, corroborated by other annalists of the time, Mar, in addressing the general council, regret-

Mar's address to the chieftains. ted deeply the part he had taken in promoting the union, and denounced that measure as a surrender of the liberties of their countrymen into the hands of the English, "whose power to enslave them further was too great, and their design to do it daily visible." No deliverance, he proceeded to argue, was possible except through the restoration of their rightful sovereign, James VIII. As for himself, he had formed an inflexible resolution to raise the standard of the exiled prince, and uphold it to the last, freely perilling his life and all that he had. Yet, though he was nerved for disaster and defeat, he expected no such result from the loyal enterprise, but could reasonably cheer himself, and all who might follow him, with prospects of speedy and brilliant success. He went on to expatiate upon the grounds of his confidence, the unanimous response which England would make to the movement, and the extensive assistance forthcoming from France. He announced to the astonished council that he had a military chest of £100,000, a sum the largeness of which the minds of the Highlanders could in that age hardly grasp. He stated, in conclusion, that he had been appointed by their exiled sovereign to the post of commander-in-chief of all the forces that would take the field, though he did not show his commission, nor, in fact, does he seem to have possessed any such warrant until a month later. Probably he nominated himself to this office, and trusted that James would sanction the arrangement, and confirm him in that post, which, in existing circumstances, few might be disposed to court.

The intelligence of the death of Louis XIV. (which Death of had taken place on the 22nd of August. Louis XIV. gust) reached the chiefs in council, but did not paralyse their resolution, though it must have imparted additional seriousness and anxiety to their deliberations. The deceased French king had been at heart a friend of the Jacobites, and a champion of their master: self-interest leading him to sympathise with a cause which might intimidate and weaken, if it could not overthrow, the hostile strength of England; and his devotion to popery and to its permanent predominance throughout Europe, strongly inclining him to oppose, by intrigue, if not by open warfare, the continuance of the Revolution settlement and of the Protestant succession, and to aid the Stewarts, who shared his religious and despotic principles and practices, and who had always been ready to submit tamely to his ascendancy in European politics, though to the sacrifice of their own country's well-being, and even of her honour as well as their own. Yet, by the treaty of Utrecht, Louis had been disabled from all co-operation with the Jacobites. His successor was equally bound to be neutral in their cause; but the regent (for the heir to the French throne was then an infant) might so far partake of the genius both of his nation and of its princes as to prefer the excitement of war to peace with his neighbours, and "glory" to integrity; and thus, careless of the obligations of a treaty, might intermeddle in the domestic affairs of Britain, and lend powerful assistance to the Jacobite insurrection. Mar and the members of the rebel council attempted to derive encouragement from that event in France, which might have made them pause in their enterprise. They were deliberating within sight of their armed retainers, who, with those that had been left at home, were numerous enough to compose a formidable host; and the daring character of their resolutions would never, we may conjecture, be allowed to droop, so long as Braemar Castle could furnish the materials of riotous festivity, and its hospitable lord could blend diets of council with liberal feasts.

On the 3rd of September, a more secret, if not also smaller, meeting of council, was held by the chiefs at Moyne, a mansion belonging to the Gordons, distant from Council at Moyne. Braemar about twenty miles. This meeting, it has been conjectured, consisted of those who had already become mutually pledged to take up arms, and who might wish greater seclusion for arranging the early movements of the campaign. In Mar's manifesto, as commander of the forces, he furnishes a list of the chiefs and nobles assembled at Moyne,* and from this it is obvious that a considerable number of the chiefs present at Braemar were absent from the consultation at Moyne. At the more select gathering the proceedings must have been greatly more energetic and decisive, for there it was at once determined that on the third day from that of their meeting they should raise the standard of King James, and commit themselves irrevocably to the terrible chances of a rebellion. Raising the standard of the Stewarts. Accordingly, on the 6th of September that standard was unfurled on a bold and romantic height, at Braemar, with impressive ceremonies and amidst enthusiastic acclamations, though the falling of the gilded ball from the top of the flag-staff was regarded by the superstitious Highlanders as an unlucky omen. Mar had, however, so early as the close of August sent a letter to "the king's forces in Argyleshire," calling upon them to embody themselves on the 1st of September; and again, on that day, he had instructed those forces to attempt the capture of Inverary Castle, the Duke of Argyll's fortified mansion,—an exploit, which, if successfully performed, could not but be of immense consequence at the opening of the enterprise, and altogether worthy of being the first blow struck on the Stewart side. But Mar's instructions were far more promptly issued than they were executed, since we find him again, on the 4th of October, urging the seizure of the castle, for which he gives an additional motive,—that his friends might obtain possession of the arms which the duke had just deposited there. Still, they were strictly enjoined to refrain, in carrying out the attack, from burning and sacking the place, or displaying any of the savage destructiveness to which the Highlanders, as he well knew, were addicted. At this stage of the insurrection he would sanction no harsher expedients than blockade and surprise, as if prudently afraid of the odium which a report of Highland excesses would excite in the Lowlands, and especially in England, to the serious disadvantage of the Pretender's cause. "I will not," were Mar's words, "begin with burning houses, so I hope you will have no occasion of doing that with the house of Inverary; and though you may threaten it, you must not put it in execution till you acquaint me, and have my return."*

* "The Lord Huntley, the Lord Tullibardine, the Earl Marischal, the Earl of Southesk, Glengarry from two clans, Glanderule from the Earl of Breadalbane and gentlemen of Argyleshire, Mr. Patrick Lyon of Auchterhouse, the Laird of Aulbar, Lieutenant-general George Hamilton, Major Gordon."—Collection of Original Letters, quoted in Burton's History.

* Annals, p. 25.

The chiefs to whom these lessons of moderation were given, and who had been entrusted with the enterprise of wresting Inverary Castle out of the hands of the Duke of Argyll, and securing it as a stronghold for the Pretender, were Drummond of Bahaldie, and the notorious Rob Roy. The latter, however, did not stand in need of Mar's interdicts against assaulting the castle with fire and sword, for secretly he, at the head of the Macgregor clan, was a hireling and ally of the duke, and kept his grace apprised of every Jacobite movement and design. He was, therefore, as likely to frustrate any attempt, by blockade or crafty surprise, upon the castle, as to acquiesce implicitly in Mar's instructions.

The mildness and magnanimity conspicuous in Mar's order concerning the capture of this castle have perplexed many historians, who seem to think that extreme rigour towards Argyll—who had been a political rival, and who now was the commander of the royal forces collected for the suppression of the insurrection—would have been at once more natural and more judicious. They forget Mar's incapacity for the military post into which he had thrust himself, and the uncertainty, vacillation, and confusion of his ideas as to the "judicious" character of any manœuvre; whilst they wholly overlook the tendency of his late protracted residence in London, and of his political engagements and associations there, to mitigate, if not to eradicate, the savage disposition of a Highland chief. "Perhaps," Mr. Burton justly remarks, "to the polished courtier there was something, even when he had resumed his character of a Highland chief, repulsive in the idea of burning and sacking the dwelling-house of a man with whom he often adjusted details in council or at committee, walked in the Mall, or drank at Will's coffee-house."*

To his tenants and followers, however, the earl showed no generosity or forbearance, but was exacting and intolerant in the extreme, for such of them as refused to rise in his aid. Mar's tenantry reluctant to James's standard were subjected to the worst species of intimidation. He indignantly complains—"It is a pretty thing when all the Highlands of Scotland are now rising upon their king and country's account, as I have accounts from them since they were with me, and the gentlemen in most of our neighbouring Lowlands expecting us down to join them, that my men should be only refractory;" and he threatens them, should they continue obstinate, with the pillage or burning of their property, and the treatment of themselves as enemies. It was not so strange as it would appear on a superficial view, that Mar's own tenantry were peculiarly reluctant to take part in the insurrection of which he was the leader. His territory, like much of the land lying on the eastern slope of the Grampians, was occupied chiefly by families of Lowland origin; and these not only wanted the patriarchal instincts which secured the devotion of each Highland clan to the will of its chief, but had hitherto seen little of his lordship to foster an attachment, he having almost always lived at a distance, "unknown and unknown." They had, it is probable, heard of his ostentatious loyalty to King George, and, imagining that his present partiality for the exiled James would be equally short-lived, might shrink from allowing his caprice to involve them in all the consequences of open rebellion.

The fiery cross was sent far and near through the Highlands, summoning to the camp of Mar every man capable of bearing arms. In the meantime, the Pretender was proclaimed as James VIII. by the Earl Marischal at Aberdeen, by Graham of Duntroon at Dundee, by the Earl of Southesk at Montrose, by Colonel Balfour at Perth, by the Marquis of Huntley at Castle Gordon, and by Lord Panmure at Brechin. The last-named nobleman, in joining the rebel forces, brought with him a powerful body of retainers, and was hailed as a most important accession to the cause. The proclamation of the Chevalier at Inverness was made by Brigadier Mackintosh of Borlum, who, while attending to this idle form, had the sagacity to take possession of the castle which, though from its site commanding both the town and the passage of the Ness, he found unoccupied. He placed in it a garrison of five hundred men, who could thus intercept all communication between the Ross and the Sutherland Highlands, except such as might be wished by the rebel army, and who could also render valuable service in checking the formidable hostility of the Earl of Sutherland. So easily did

* Original Letters, p. 49.

* History, vol. ii. p. 106.

one of the most important strongholds and passes of the north fall into the hands of the rebels, who, however, were destined to lose it almost as easily, as we shall have subsequently to relate.

Meanwhile, the government and the friends of the house of Hanover were not idle spectators of the rising. Preparations, in the shape of several important acts of parliament, had been made long before Mar arrived in Scotland to take the field. The very first statute to which King George put his name, related to the payment of £100,000 as a reward to any one who should seize the Pretender, in the event of his coming to Britain to assert his claims. The sum offered by the Tory ministers of Queen Anne for the same service had been only £5000, as was recited in the act of George I., obviously with the view of suggesting the greatly increased loyalty of the new sovereign's government and parliament. On the 16th of July (1715) the Commons, in an address to the crown, represented the necessity of forthwith stringently enforcing the laws against all who should be implicated in "tumultuous riots and disorders," of removing magistrates who were suspected of Jacobitism, and of compensating innocent citizens whose property might be destroyed in occasional outbreaks. Not only did the royal answer sympathise fully with those views and aims, but on the 20th of the same month, the king made a speech from the throne, in which he directed parliament to take immediate steps "so as not to leave the nation, under a rebellion actually begun at home, and threatened with an invasion from abroad, in a defenceless condition." On the same day he gave his assent to the Riot Act, containing a form of proclamation for the dispersal of gatherings, held by twelve or more persons, for illegal purposes; and providing immunity for such public officers as employed necessary force in effecting their dispersal. One very important clause of this act related to the wanton destruction of dissenting churches and manse by a mob, and rendered the community liable for the damage, unless the places of worship had failed to meet the requirements of the law of toleration; for the protection was offered only to those churches which were "tolerated by law, and where his majesty King George, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and their issue, were prayed for in express words." The non-jurors among the episcopal clergy derived no benefit from this clause, and could claim no compensation for any injury to their property inflicted in the course of popular outrages.

On the 26th of July, a resolution, pledging the Commons to prepare for the imminent danger, and to put the united kingdom into an adequate state of defence, was moved by Walpole (who was just beginning to take a high place among Whig politicians), and carried without a division. The government, assured that the supplies of money from the House would be forthcoming, set about the increase of the forces, and proceeded to raise thirteen regiments of cavalry, and eight of infantry—seven thousand men in all. A smaller addition could not be wisely made to the existing army at home, where all the troops of every kind did not number more than eight thousand men, a force utterly insufficient for dealing with a rebellion or an invasion, not to speak of a crisis in which both might simultaneously occur. The new regiments, as soon as they were formed, were distributed over the east coast of England, where a descent from France was apprehended; but no change was made in the military strength of Scotland, where, it soon appeared, the chief, if not the only, danger lay.

At the same time, parliament suspended for six months the operation of those laws by which the subject, when arrested or imprisoned on accusation, can guard himself against an unjust or lengthened detention by hastening on his trial; and it was decreed, that no person who might, on and after the 23rd of July, be arrested by order of the privy-council on suspicion of treason, should possess the right of being bailed, or of bringing on his trial until the 23rd of January, 1716. Many formidable persons, against whom, however, no overt acts of conspiracy could have been proved, were thus restrained from mischief. A still more important measure was passed on the 30th of August, calculated to alienate land-owners from Jacobitism, and to render loyalty incalculably more profitable than before to persons even of different ranks.* By the law of subinfeudation, the barons or great vassals, while holding their estates from the crown, were the superiors over other vassals, who held their property from them by a similar feudal tenure; and often the sub-vassals had their inferiors also, whose possessions were similarly dependent upon them. The act took a skilful advantage of this division of interests in the soil, and decreed that when a crown-vassal was guilty of treason, then his tenant, the sub-vassal, became entitled to take his place, and enter into his right, as holding directly from the crown, being released from all obligations to his late superiors; whilst, in the event of the crown-vassal remaining loyal, and the sub-vassal becoming a traitor, the share of the latter in the land reverted to the former, who thus easily regained the property which he or his ancestors had formerly sold. Treason was thus invested with new terrors, and loyalty with new attractions; and a powerful motive was furnished, not only for landlords and tenants remaining loyal, but also for each class closely watching and prying into the conduct of the other. In Highland districts, however, where chieftainship was intertwined with the very elements of society, and where there was a great gulf fixed between the chief and his dependent, so that the one could not be empowered by law to enter upon the rights or occupy the position of the other, the Vassals' Act was a dead letter; but in the Lowlands it could not but be widely influential.

Habeas-corpus Act suspended.

Independency of Vassals' Act.

* "An act for encouraging all superiors, vassals, landlords, and tenants in Scotland, who do and shall continue in their duty and loyalty to his majesty King George; and for discouraging all superiors, &c., &c., there, who have been or shall be guilty of rebellious practices against his said majesty; and for making void all fraudulent entails, bailies, and conveyances made there, for barring or excluding the effect of forfeitures that may have been or shall be incurred there on any such account; as also for calling any suspected person or persons, whose estates or principal residence are in Scotland, to appear at Edinburgh, or where it shall be judged expedient, to find bail for their good behaviour; and for the better disarming disaffected persons in Scotland."

One of the clauses of this act was directed against the transference of property by persons on the verge of involving themselves in treasonable practices. Hitherto, in prospect of treason or rebellion, the intending traitor made over his property to another member of the family, who was either to keep aloof from the disloyal movement, or to stand forth conspicuously in opposition to it; so that many an estate, which would otherwise have been forfeited, remained safe in the family of the traitor. It was now determined that "no entails, family settlements, or gratuitous transferences of property," made after the 1st of August, 1714, by individuals subsequently convicted of high-treason, should be sustained as legal. In this comprehensive act it was also provided that the lord-lieutenants of counties should have the right to search for arms in the possession of doubtful persons, and to appropriate all that were found to the public service. Further, it empowered the lawyers of the crown, "at any time between the 1st of September, 1715, and the 23rd of January, 1716," to order the attendance of any individuals "who have their estates or ordinary residence within Scotland," at Edinburgh or elsewhere, where they must produce sufficient guarantees for their loyalty. This clause of the act was rigorously enforced, so far at least as summoning was concerned, for no less than sixty-two persons, amongst whom were several nobles and large proprietors, and indeed nearly all the chiefs who had assembled at Braemar, were cited to appear.* It is a curious fact, that out of this number only two, Sir Alexander Erskine, the Lord-Lyon king-at-arms, and Sir Patrick Murray of Auchtertyre,† complied; and it may be judged that the summary and stern summons induced not a few, who might be hesitating between loyalty and treason to cast in their lot with the insurgents.

The Earl of Breadalbane was amongst the number that declined to comply with the summons, though, Breadalbane's with characteristic craft, he attempted to convince the government that there was no disloyalty in his failure to appear at Edinburgh. He sent a lugubrious description of himself, duly attested by a physician and the parish minister, as "an infirm man of fourscore years of age, much troubled with cough, rheums, defluctions, and other maladies and infirmities which usually attend old age," and, therefore, as wholly incapacitated for travelling to the metropolis. Yet, the next day after forwarding this excuse, he made his appearance at Mar's camp.*

The Jacobites had all along calculated on zealous co-operation from the Cameronians and ultra-presbyterians; but these at once showed that they were determined to support the Loyalty of the Revolution settlement and the ultra-presbyterians. Protestant succession as invaluable safeguards against the civil tyranny and ecclesiastical persecution which, in the reign of the last Stewarts, had so cruelly afflicted Scotland. The Whigs and presbyterians forthwith adopted vigorous measures against the Pretender's cause, and formed themselves into associations at Edinburgh, pledged "to do their utmost to defend and maintain our excellent constitution in church and state," and to repel and crush "the invasion of a pretender to the crown, who has been educated in all the maxims of popish bigotry and French tyranny, and now comes against us with an army of Irish cut-throats, assisted by the grand enemy to the reformed interest in Europe, who hath imbrued his hands so much in Protestant blood." Large supplies of men and money flowed in upon these warlike associations, and fitly responded to the resolute and fervent appeals which were made to all who valued civil and religious liberty. A formidable army of volunteers would soon have been raised in Scotland alone, to be also maintained by free contributions; but the government looked with some jealousy on the prospect of a powerful body of armed men, especially of armed presbyterians, self-organized and self-supported; and the ardent addresses to the crown issuing from the volunteers were answered by an assurance that his majesty himself had taken measures amply sufficient for the crisis, and was anxious "to save his loving subjects from incurring further trouble and expense." The fervour of the Whigs and presbyterians, however, was not altogether damped by the cold reception given in the highest quarters to their proposals for the defence of the nation. They prepared a new bond of association, in which, without alluding to the raising of troops and money (the points that government regarded with special suspicion), they renewed their pledge to stand fast by and support each other in the maintenance of the Hanoverian dynasty. They also embodied themselves in armed companies officered by men of their own choice, and went through a regular course of military training, as "The Associate Volunteers of Edinburgh." The inhabitants of Glasgow, from their vicinity to the wild Highlanders, felt that they stood in special danger, and, in addition to other measures of self-defence, raised a powerful guard of burghers. The young men of Dumfries formed themselves into a "Company of Loyal Bachelors," and, for the purpose of repressing any jealousies, preferred being officered by married men. Into every Lowland district this enthusiastic spirit of preparation for danger spread; and all the towns had their sturdy bands of armed and drilled volunteers, whose cheerfulness and alacrity detracted nothing from the desperate energy with which, if necessary, they were prepared to fight for the liberties and protestantism of their country.

* Annals, p. 35.

† Rae, p. 211.

* Collection of Letters, pp. 20, 21.

The various skeleton regiments composing the army in Scotland amounted in all to a force about two thousand strong; and, at the head of that force,

Royal army posted at Stirling.

General Wightman posted himself at Stirling, where he could watch the rebels of the north, and prevent them from joining the rebels of the south.

The river Forth was only fordable by a bridge, in the vicinity of that town, which he could easily guard; whilst the old castle, standing on its lofty rock, was impregnable to the military science of that day. Yet, though by this wise disposition the most was made of such a handful of troops, and though the chief anxiety of government was unwisely directed towards England instead of Scotland, as the scene of the coming struggle, it was judged necessary to reinforce this small army by six additional regiments. A contingent of 6000 men from Holland, which that country had engaged to supply in the event of an invasion of Britain, or a serious rebellion there, was now ordered with the

Duke of Argyll appointed commander.

view of operating in Scotland. The Duke of Argyll, one of the ablest generals in the kingdom, a great statesman also, and, unquestionably, the most powerful of all the Highland chiefs, was entrusted with the supreme command of the army gathered and yet gathering to crush the rebellion. He had previously, on a memorable occasion, when he made his appearance before Bolingbroke and his Tory colleagues as the champion of the house of Hanover, displayed a rare promptitude and cordiality of attachment to that dynasty; and now his grace lost no time in entering upon his military duties. He waited upon the king, on the 8th of September, for his final instructions; and on the following day set out for Scotland, attended by a great number of the Scotch members of both Houses of Parliament, who expected to be of more use by going to their own country to stimulate and direct the loyal energies of all over whom they had influence, than by remaining in London to take part in the business of the legislature. The duke arrived on the 14th at Edinburgh, where he minutely examined the castle, its means and strength of resistance, gave instructions for its additional safety, and forwarded to Glasgow and Stirling all the arms and ammunition that could be dispensed with in the metropolis. On the 17th he reached Stirling, and reviewed the army there. His first care was to reinforce it; not by immediately summoning his own numerous dependents, on whose fidelity he could implicitly rely, but by inviting volunteers from the western Lowlands. Glasgow, already flourishing in commerce, and holding political and religious views in harmony with his own and those of his ancestors (between whom and the city there had ever been a good understanding), would, he expected, place a numerous band at his disposal; and, indeed, he had already dispatched from Edinburgh a letter to the provost of Glasgow, in cordial praise of the loyalty of the western capital, which possessed, as he was led to believe, "a considerable number of well armed men ready to serve his majesty." He forthwith requested that five or six hundred of these volunteers should be sent to Stirling under officers chosen by the municipal authorities. At once his desire was more than granted, and, on the 19th of the same month (September), he received between six and seven hundred men, formed into ten companies, under skilful officers. As a token of the city's cordiality, the provost was at the head of this force, though he delegated his purely military functions, as leader, to Colonel Blackadder, an officer of tried merit. The Glasgow volunteers, during their ten weeks' military service at Stirling, either bore their own expenses, or were supported from municipal contributions.

Acting on a hint from Argyll, the authorities of Glasgow dispatched letters over the west, requesting the small towns, villages, and agricultural districts, to forward their "fencible men" to be embodied in that city. The response was prompt and satisfactory. Paisley, at that time a village, was the first to send a gallant band; and Kilmarnock followed with a contingent of two hundred and twenty men; whilst the Earl of Kilmarnock led one hundred and thirty of his tenantry. Occupation was found for detachments of those volunteers, in garrisoning three stations for the defence of the Lowlands against the plundering incursions of Rob Roy's clan. Greenock, and the villages on the Renfrew coast of the Clyde, were occupied by bands, with the view of preventing any attempt on the part of the rebels to cross that river from the Macgregor territory. The forces thus posted, along with two well-furnished companies drafted to Stirling, had been raised by the heroic exertions of Lady Schaw of Greenock, who, in the absence of her husband, displayed the most active loyalty, and, aided by the parish minister, inspired the population with kindred zeal. She had urged all that could bear arms to rise for "the protection of the Protestant religion, with their laws, liberties, lives, and all that was dear to them as men and as Christians;" but she was also supposed to be actuated by a keen feud between her husband and one of the Jacobite leaders, the Master of Sinclair, who had slain two of Sir John Schaw's brothers, in circumstances more resembling a murder than an honourable combat. A detachment from the two companies she had sent to the camp at Stirling was employed to garrison the house of Touch, an ancient tower standing on the northern slope of the Gargunnock hills, which commanded not only the Forth but the Grampian range, and was admirably situated for the prevention, by a very small force, of any attempt at crossing the river.

Volunteer companies embodied.

The season of the year chosen for the insurrection showed far greater sagacity than can be

Mar profited ascribed to the Earl of Mar, and by the harvest was highly favourable to the rebels. season.

It was the busy time of harvest, when the entire rural population of the Lowlands must attend to the crops, if all their labours during the bygone portion of the year were not to be lost, and if their whole stock and means of subsistence for the next year were not to be sacrificed. It might have been expected, therefore, that in the agricultural districts loyalty would find but few volunteers. On the other hand, the Highlanders, of whom the great bulk of Mar's army was composed, were accustomed to live by plunder, rather than by industry; and for them it was neither a disadvantage nor a grief to quit their barren hills, and commence a campaign through fertile, civilised, and wealthy districts, where they could plunder on a large scale. They were ready to fight at all seasons of the year, in expectation of a booty far more valuable than any agricultural crop which they could honestly reap. The mere circumstance, then, of the particular season selected for Mar's rising, might have operated in keeping back almost every volunteer from the Hanoverian cause, without leading a single man, out of the many thousands disposed or pledged to join the Pretender's banner, to hold aloof or to waver in the least. Still, from all quarters of the Lowlands forces came pouring in at the summons of the loyal Duke of Argyll—so serious was the view taken of the crisis, and so cordial the appreciation of the blessings secured by the Revolution settlement and the Protestant succession. A formidable body of volunteers in Dumfries was ready to march to Stirling, had not their presence at home been imperatively required to act against the Earl of Nithsdale, who had declared for the Stewarts. Four hundred men were raised by Lord Polwarth in Berwickshire, a considerable proportion of whom joined Argyll, and were subsequently stationed at Linlithgow. In Clydesdale the Duke of Douglas enlisted three hundred men, all of whom would have been forwarded to the camp at Stirling had not the commissariat supplies there been scanty. The Argyll Highlanders had not yet been summoned by their chief to join the army at Stirling, since their presence was needed at Inverary to prevent the castle from falling into the hands of Mar, who, as we have seen, was eager for its capture as an important first blow. Master of Inverary, he would have had open passage for the rebels both through the Breadalbane and the Macgregor territories to the western Lowlands.

A still more desperate attempt had been projected Unsuccessful during the first days of the insurrection upon the Castle of Edinburgh. Lord Drummond, son of the titular Duke of Perth, was at the head of the enterprise, but its execution was entrusted to a Highland gentleman named Drummond of Bohaldie, with whom were associated a body of Highlanders from Lord Drummond's estates, and a few Jacobites of the city, who are supposed to have been principally students and young lawyers. Even to hair-brained youth it would have seemed an impracticable undertaking, had not the connivance of a sergeant and some privates in the garrison been secured by an ensign named Arthur. The assault was to be made on a part of the castle which rises from a craggy steep on the north-west, near the sally-port. The soldier whose turn it was to keep guard there had agreed to drop from the wall a rope, to which the conspirators were to fasten a scaling-ladder, to be drawn up by the sentinel, and properly fixed for the quick and safe ascent of his accomplices. After making themselves masters of the fortress, they were to fire three salutes from the castle guns; and these, aided by a succession of beacons conspicuously placed through Fife and Angus, were to convey the news of their success to Mar, who was then to hasten forward with his forces, and take possession of the capital. The deputy-governor, Lieutenant-colonel Stewart, was, according to general estimation, of equivocal loyalty; at least the Jacobites did not calculate upon any prevention or counteraction of their plot by his vigilance or zeal. The attempt was to be made on the 8th of September. Ensign Arthur had told the secret to a brother of his own, a medical man in Edinburgh; and the uneasiness expressed in the countenance and manner of the latter excited the concern of his wife, who succeeded in inducing him, only a few hours before the attempt was to be made, to reveal the cause of his anxiety. She was a warm friend to the house of Hanover, and, without losing a moment, she sent an anonymous letter, disclosing the plot to Sir Adam Cockburn, the lord-justice clerk, and he as quickly communicated the intelligence to the deputy-governor of the castle, though his letter was only just in time to be received before the gates were closed for the night. Stewart, however, either disbelieving the information, or secretly favourable to the undertaking, contented himself with ordering his officers to double their guards, and to make their rounds with special care, after which he went to bed. Meanwhile, the conspirators were engaged drinking in a tavern, and at length set out upon their enterprise two hours after the time appointed. Their place of rendezvous was in St. Cuthbert's church-yard, near the foot of the castle rock. They had with them a part of the scaling rope-ladder, but the associate who carried the remainder did not arrive at the time appointed. Angry and impatient, they scrambled up the rock to the foot of the wall, and directed the sentinel to pull up and fasten that portion of the scaling-ladder which they themselves had brought. He did so, but it proved, as they expected, far too short. At this critical moment the steps of the patrol who were to relieve the sentinels were heard approaching the spot where the conspirators stood. Their accomplice immediately threw down the ladder, calling to them that their plot was ruined, and fired his piece with the view of covering his treason. The conspirators instantly dispersed, and made their escape under cover of the darkness along the north bank of the North Loch; but a band of the city guard, who had been directed by the lord-justice clerk to patrol round the outside of the castle, apprehended three of the youths and a captain McLean, an old Jacobite officer, who was seriously hurt by a fall from the rock. The deputy-governor of the castle was deprived of his office, and the sergeant who had betrayed his trust was hanged, but the other persons engaged in the enterprise seem to have escaped punishment.

It is now time to note the movements of the Jacobite leader, and the progress of the insurrection. Mar, and the forces accompanying him from Braemar, advanced upon Dunkeld, where they were joined by the Athol and Breadalbane Highlanders, who swelled the number of the rebels to five thousand. By slow marches they reached Perth, which a small detachment had been sent forward to occupy, as headquarters for the whole army, the possession of that town being as important to Mar in cutting off all communication between the government troops and the Hanoverians of the north, as the occupation of Stirling was to the Duke of Argyll in isolating Mar's army from the Jacobites of the south. Mar, while master of that city, was sure of abundant provisions for his troops from the rich Carse of Gowrie, and the fertile districts of Strathern and Strathmore.

On his arrival at Perth, a packet from the exiled court was conveyed to the Earl by Message from the Pretender. James Murray, elder brother of William Murray, afterwards the famous Earl of Mansfield. The despatches brought ought to have been both important and urgent, to justify the imminent danger to which Murray was exposed in travelling through England, where every arrival from France, if likely to be followed by a departure for Scotland, was subjected to the most searching scrutiny. The contents of the packet, however, have not been reported on good authority. It was said that they included the earl's commission as commander-in-chief of the army about to act for the Pretender, but there is reason for believing that this warrant was sent at a later date. The patent of dukedom was also said to have reached him at this time. Murray, who was reported to have been made secretary-of-state, brought oral messages of much greater interest to the Jacobite cause, and to the general body of its supporters; for he announced that vigorous assistance was forthcoming from France, and that James himself would speedily appear in Scotland, to assert his rights in person.*

No money, however, had come from France, and this Mar felt to be an immediate necessity, for the military chest, which he had boastingly spoken of at Braemar, was now empty. On the 3rd of October, he issued at Perth a circular to such persons as he thought could be induced to supply funds. He pressed them in rather an authoritative style to contribute, saying, "Several have very cheerfully lent their money towards so good a cause, and it is expected you will follow their good example." He then proceeded to mention the sum which he would expect to receive from each, and thus concluded—"Since a great many substantial and worthy men have, at this time, ventured their all in this cause, it hath been advised to use harsh means with such as withdraw from assisting in so good a cause; but the good opinion I have of your cheerful compliance in this matter, engages me to address you in this manner."* On the following day he set about issuing instructions for collecting the land-tax, which, for "land-ward" or rural property, he fixed at twenty shillings sterling on £100 Scots of rent, a rate so high as thirty per cent.; whilst all landowners who should have failed to join King James's standard before the 12th of October, were to pay sixty per cent. The land-tax fell very lightly upon burghs; but, on seeing the comparatively small produce of that tax in important towns, Mar did not hesitate to exact (or desire, as he mildly phrased it) from the principal citizens the payment of a much larger sum in the shape of "a benevolence for the good cause." With the proceeds of taxes, forced gifts, and forced loans, he was able to give each soldier a regular allowance of "three-pence a day and three loaves, or that quantity of meal in place of the bread," an allowance which, he remarks in a letter, was "fully as good as that of the soldiers at Stirling." A printing-press was at the service of both the hostile armies, and a war of proclamations was regularly waged. "In this warfare," says Rival proclamations.

Mr. Burton felicitously, "the words of the men of King James were stronger than the words of the men of King George;" and, certainly, it would have been undignified in a statesman and general like the Duke of Argyll, who was, moreover, the champion of the Revolution settlement, to imitate the coarseness of Lord Mar. The duke had begun his address for the raising of forces with the following words: "Whereas our gracious sovereign King George has been pleased, for the better suppressing the present rebellion, to order and appoint two companies to be added to each regiment of foot;" and Mar thus commences his rejoinder: "Whereas, by the laws of God, the right of blood, and the ancient constitution of these kingdoms, our sovereign lord James VIII., by the grace of God, of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, has the undoubted right to the crown of these realms;" and he goes on to comment upon what had been "published by the commander-in-chief of the pretended king's forces in this kingdom," and to warn all of the "sin and danger" of obeying the "rebellious order."

Mar's inactivity at Perth proved his utter incapacity for the post he occupied at the head of the rebels. He spent many weeks in simply receiving recruits, and collecting taxes and loans. By the middle of October, he had a force amounting to twelve thousand men, ready for some considerable exploits; yet the only achievement of the Jacobite army worthy of notice, was performed by a small detachment of cavalry led by the gallant Master of

* Annals, p. 42.

* Original Letters, p. 47.

Seizure of arms by the rebels. Sinclair. This was the capture of a vessel conveying a store of arms from Edinburgh Castle to the north, where the Earl of Sutherland stood in need of them for his retainers. The vessel had been compelled by contrary winds to seek anchorage near the harbour of Burntisland; and her position and the value of her cargo having been reported to the rebels at Perth, Sinclair set off with four hundred horsemen, each trooper having a foot soldier mounted behind his saddle. The party travelled so rapidly that they reached Burntisland about midnight; and then, whilst the cavalry posted themselves so as to prevent any warning or aid being conveyed from the town to the vessel, the foot soldiers seized upon several boats lying in the harbour, and rowed at once to their destined prize, of which they took possession almost without resistance. This nocturnal exploit supplied Mar's army with four hundred and twenty stand of arms. These were very much wanted, since the earl had been grievously

Failure of the French supplies. disappointed at not receiving the promised stores from France, and which, probably, had been intercepted through the energetic representations made by the British ambassador to the French government. From a careful inventory of the arms which were on the eve of being shipped from France for the use of the rebels, it appears that they would have equipped four thousand cavalry and twelve thousand infantry; whilst for bands of the undisciplined Highlanders there was a large provision of pikes and swords. Forty iron and twelve brass field-pieces were among the stores destined for the camp at Perth; but the interdict of the French authorities, who were constrained, for decency's sake, to interfere, and the vigilance of Admiral Byng's squadron of observation, prevented their exportation; and only a few small supplies of arms were smuggled out of France and carried safely to Perth. The foreign troops that were to have accompanied the munitions never left the French coast; hence, Murray's assurances proved deceitful. Mar. pressed by a want of artillery, even for the fortification of Perth, procured some cannon from Dunnottar (sixty miles distant) and from Dundee.

Whilst Mar and his army remained in a state of inactivity, the lawless Highlanders followed their freebooting practices with the utmost energy and with rare success, improving their many opportunities of finding plunder across the border of the west-

Plundering habits of the Macgregors. ern Lowlands. Rob Roy and the Macgregors were the principal marauders, their territory being conveniently near the richest fields of spoil. Their numerous incursions were strictly on their own account; and the plunder was conveyed to their own strongholds, and not to the Jacobite camp at

Perth, though they professed to be under Mar's banner. Early in October, the Macgregors had, by a lucky venture, seized upon the ferry-boats and other vessels on Loch Lomond, and taken them to Rowardennan, within their own country. They had thus obtained the means of following their plundering vocation by water as well as by land. Large flocks of sheep and cattle were taken on board the new marauding fleet, and conveyed quickly and safely to the Macgregor territory. The sturdy Whigs and presbyterians of the immediately adjoining Lowland district combined to redress their grievances, to storm Reprisals of the Whigs. "the piratical stronghold," and, if possible, to recapture the Loch Lomond boats. For this expedition Paisley sent a hundred and twenty volunteers; and the other neighbouring towns contributed an aggregate force of about four hundred. The leaders had the sagacity, also, to procure the services of a "hundred well-hearted and well-armed" seamen from a war vessel lying at that time in the Clyde. The whole party manned two men-of-war's boats, and three other boats, on all of which heavy guns were placed, and these were towed from the Firth of Clyde into the river Leven, the outlet of Loch Lomond, to make their way up the lake, along the shore of which a detachment, who could not be accommodated in the boats, marched, ready to co-operate. These were joined by upwards of forty of the Grant Highlanders, whose costume and arms are thus described by a contemporary historian, who was an eye-witness, if not a follower, of the expedition: "They wore short hose and belted plaids, and were armed each of them with a well-fixed gun on his shoulder, a strong handsome target, with a sharp-pointed steel of about half an ell in length screwed into the navel of it, on his left arm, a sturdy claymore by his side, and a pistol or two, with a dirk and knife, in his belt." The enthusiasm of the whole party broke out in acclamations and salutes from the artillery, though this noisy style of approach was exceedingly injudicious, if they really wished to come to blows with the freebooters, for the Macgregors thus received warning of the approach of their assailants, and had time to take refuge in inaccessible hiding places. When the fleet of boats reached Rowardennan, there was neither any sight nor sound to indicate the neighbourhood of the marauders. The men in the boats fired their large guns, and a party of the volunteers climbed up the precipitous and lofty banks of the loch, and for an hour kept beating their drums; but no Macgregor appeared. As they were returning, after making this display, to their companions on the loch, they were so fortunate as to come upon the boats which the Macgregors had concealed among the thick brushwood on the banks of the lake. The Lowlanders returned in triumph, having destroyed or carried off the boats, the seizure of which was the object of the expedition. The Macgregors were thus compelled to return to their predatory habits by land. They scattered themselves over Fife, as well as the cultivated portions of Perthshire, and seized upon cattle, grain, and money, which, they falsely alleged, were for the army at Perth. In their petty depredations, they had a special fancy for shoes, and did not scruple to strip the feet of civic and clerical functionaries whom they chanced to meet with, and whom they consoled with the assurance that his gracious majesty James VIII. would be happy to afford them full compensation.

On the 6th of October, Ogilvie of Boin arrived from France, bringing at length Mar's commission to lead the forces, which his lordship ingeniously terms a "new commission," though he had never produced any old one. The messenger bore also Arrogant orders from the Pretender. written instructions from the Pretender, and letters from Lord Bolingbroke. The former might have proceeded from a despot in the possession of undisputed as well as unlimited sovereignty, and must have been highly offensive to all whose sense of personal and national independence was not crazed by the "divine right" inherent in the Stewart blood. For a prince in James's position, and with his prospects, to issue orders in a style which asserted that everything in Britain was only and always his, and that it could not be withheld from him, though he might do with it as he pleased, was insanely indiscreet, and showed that he was the worthy heir of his tyrannical and foolish father. After authorising Mar, at the head of a council, to "assemble all our forces by sea and land, raise the militia, issue out orders for all suspected persons, and seize all forts and castles and put garrisons in them," he empowers the commander and his associates "to take up in any part of our dominions what money, horses, arms, and ammunition and provisions you will think necessary for arming, mounting, and subsisting the said forces under your command, and to give receipts for the same, which we hereby promise to pay." Bolingbroke's letters announced that James would ere long land in the north of Scotland, to encourage and direct the momentous enterprise.

Meanwhile the Jacobites in the north of England and the south-west of Scotland had also taken up Rising of the Northumbrian Jacobites. arms in the cause of their exiled prince. A treasonable correspondence had for some time been carried on by the Roman Catholic gentry of Northumberland with their friends in London, and preparations were made to take the field on the first favourable opportunity. The government having received intelligence of this design, took measures to prevent the expected insurrection, seized the horses, arms, and ammunition which had been collected for this purpose, and hastened to apprehend a number of the Jacobite leaders. The Habeas Corpus Act was at the same time suspended.

Among the noblemen and gentlemen who were ordered to be taken into custody were Thomas Forster of Bamborough, member of parliament for the county of Northumberland, and the Earl of Derwentwater, the son of one of Charles the Second's illegitimate daughters, and a devoted adherent of the Jacobite cause. Having received warning of their intended arrest, these two individuals absconded, and remained for some time in concealment among their friends in Northumberland; but after consultation with some of the principal northern Jacobites at the house of Mr. Fenwick of Bywell, they resolved that rather than run the risk of imprisonment and trial, they would encounter what seemed the lesser peril of open rebellion.* In adopting this course they no doubt trusted to the general understanding, if not express promise, that hundreds of their political associates would at once join them in their hazardous enterprise. But in this expectation, as events proved, they were doomed to disappointment. Lord Derwentwater was known to be hearty in the cause, but the authority which he possessed over the tenantry of his extensive estates, and the workmen in the large mines which belonged to him at Alston Moor, had either been exerted very feebly, or had been counteracted by some opposing influence, for the entire force which he was able to muster, including his domestic servants, amounted to only forty persons. His horses had been for some time in the custody of a neighbouring justice of the peace, according to the order of council; but when his lordship wanted them they were returned. It is hinted by a historian of the period that a considerable bribe paid to the justice was the ready means of unlocking the doors of the stables in which his lordship's horses were confined.

Attended by his small body of retainers, the earl met Mr. Forster and his friends, according to appointment, on the 6th of October, at a place called Greenrigg, on the top of a hill in Northumberland. Their united force amounted to only sixty horsemen, who were chiefly gentlemen and their servants. What was wanting in numbers was not compensated by military skill or heroism: Forster was a weak, vacillating, spiritless creature, while Derwentwater, though an amiable man, was destitute of the talent and military experience necessary for such an enterprise.

The party of insurgents, having consulted as to their future movements, marched first to a place called Plainfield, on the river Coquet, where they were joined by a number of friends, and then to Rothbury, a small market town, where they quartered for the night. Next morning they proceeded to Warkworth, where they were joined by Lord

* Lady Derwentwater was bigotedly attached to the Stewart cause, and it is said that when the earl visited his house secretly during the time he was in hiding, she reproached him with great asperity, declaring "it was not fitting that the Earl of Derwentwater should continue to hide his head in hovels from the light of day when the gentry were up in arms for the cause of their rightful sovereign. It is also said that she at the same time threw down her fan, indignantly exclaiming—"Take that, and give your sword to me!" These stinging reproaches are alleged to have had a great effect in inducing the unfortunate nobleman to take up arms against his better judgment.

First movements of the insurgents.

Widdrington, great grandson of the famous peer of that name, "one of the most goodly persons of that age," who had been killed fighting for Charles II.,

Forster appointed commander-in-chief—in 1651. Forster was now chosen commander-in-chief, not on account of his superior influence and station, or from any supposed abilities or military knowledge; but merely because he was a Protestant, it being judged unwise to excite popular prejudice against their cause by placing a Roman Catholic at their head. On Sunday morning Mr. Forster sent Mr. Buxton, the chaplain of the insurgents, to the parson of the parish, with orders that he should pray for King James by name; and that in the Litany he should introduce the names of Mary, the queen-mother, and all the dutiful branches of the royal family, but omit the names of King George and his family. But the parson prudently declined compliance, and, quitting the place altogether, took refuge in Newcastle; on which Mr. Buxton took possession of the church, and performed divine service. On the following day Mr. Forster, in disguise, proclaimed James III. with sound of trumpet, and all other formalities which the circumstances of the place would admit. From Warkworth the rebels marched to Alnwick, where they renewed their proclamation, and received some friends. Proceeding next to Morpeth, they were joined at Felton Bridge by seventy horse from the Scottish border, so that they now amounted to three hundred, the highest number which they ever attained. Some of their adherents remained undecided till the last fatal moment. Patten mentions that one of their number, John Hall, of Otterburn, attended a meeting of the Quarter Sessions, which was held at Alnwick for the purpose of taking measures for quelling the rebellion, but left it to join the insurgents, with such precipitation that he forgot his hat upon the bench. The insurgents received many offers of assistance from the country people, but were obliged to decline them, as they had neither arms to equip nor money to pay them. They therefore deemed it advisable to accept none but such as came mounted and armed.

—he proclaims James III.

At this period Forster received information of a dextrous exploit performed by one of their friends, a Newcastle skipper of the name of Lancelot Errington. The small fort of Holy Island was then guarded by a few soldiers, who were exchanged once a week from the garrison of Berwick. It seems to have occurred to the Jacobites that this fort might be of considerable service to them, as affording a station for making signals to the French ships, which they expected to land on that coast with reinforcements of troops and supplies of arms. Accordingly Errington, accompanied by a few Jacobite friends, sailed on the 10th of October to make an attempt upon it, and as he was in the habit of supplying the garrison with provisions, his appearance excited no suspicion. He was admitted as usual into the port near the castle, and subsequently, while part of the garrison were visiting his ship, he entered the castle itself, and made himself master of it without experiencing the least resistance. As soon as this was accomplished, Errington attempted to apprise his friends at Warkworth of the exploit which he had performed, in order that immediate assistance might be sent to him. Unluckily his signals were not perceived by them; while the Governor of Berwick, having received intelligence of the capture of the fort, resolved to make an effort for its recovery before Errington could receive the necessary supplies of men and provisions. The next day he dispatched a party of thirty soldiers, and about fifty volunteers, who, crossing the sands at low water, attacked the little fort, and instantly overpowered the handful of defenders. Errington was wounded and taken prisoner, but subsequently contrived to escape.

Holy Island captured by the Jacobites—

The main body of the insurgents had in the meantime experienced a severe disappointment in the failure of their attempt to obtain possession of the important town of Newcastle. As they had many friends in the place, and Sir William Blackett, Unsuccessful attempt upon Newcastle.

one of its representatives in parliament, and a great coal proprietor, and therefore possessed of extensive influence among the keelmen, was understood to be warmly inclined towards their cause, they expected an easy capture of the town, intending to make it a grand stronghold for their party. But the great body of the inhabitants, like those of all the thriving towns in the country, were zealous for the reigning family, and prepared to defend the place with the greatest alacrity. Newcastle, though not regularly fortified, had strong walls and gates, which were well secured and defended by seven hundred volunteers, while as many more could very soon have been raised among the keelmen or bargemen employed on the Tyne. The Earl of Scarborough, Lord-lieutenant of Northumberland, and a number of the neighbouring gentry, supported the well-affected portion of the citizens in their resolution; and, in the course of a few days, the arrival of a body of regular troops put this important post out of danger. Frustrated in their designs on Newcastle, the insurgents turned aside to Hexham, from which they were led, few of them knowing whither, to a large heath or moor near Dilston, and where they halted, waiting for an opportunity to surprise Newcastle. But hearing of the arrival of General Carpenter with part of those forces with which he afterwards attacked the insurgents, they again retired to Hexham, where they proclaimed King James, nailing the proclamation to the market-cross, where it was allowed to remain several days after they had left the town. They had, a few days before, sent a message to the Earl of Mar, informing him of their proceedings, and entreating him to send them a reinforcement of foot soldiers, of which they stood greatly in need.

The insurgents turn aside to Hexham.

While the Northumbrian insurgents were thus employed, the Jacobites in the south-west of Scotland had also taken up arms, and placing Viscount Kenmure, a Protestant nobleman of high character, at their head, proposed by a sudden effort to possess themselves of the town of Dumfries. The citizens, however, prepared for a resolute defence, and being vigorously supported by the Marquis of Annandale, the lord-lieutenant of the county, and by many of the Whig gentlemen of the neighbourhood, they succeeded in baffling the enterprise, which, if successful, must have been attended with credit to the arms of the insurgents. Lord Kenmure, finding that he could not, with a handful of cavalry, propose to storm a town the citizens of which were determined on resistance, resolved to unite his forces with the Northumberland gentlemen who were in arms in the same cause; and for that object proceeded through Hawick and Jedburgh, over the Border to Rothbury, where, on the 19th, the junction was effected.

"The two bodies," says Sir Walter Scott, "inspected each other's military state and equipments with the anxiety of mingled hope and apprehension. The general character of the troops was the same, but the Scots seemed the best prepared for action, being mounted on strong hardy horses fit for the charge, and though but poorly disciplined, were well armed with the basket-hilted broadsword, then common throughout Scotland. The English gentlemen, on the other hand, were mounted on fleet blood horses, better adapted for the race-course and hunting-field than for action. There was among them a great want of war-saddles, curb-bridles, and, above all, of swords and pistols; so that the Scots were inclined to doubt whether men so well equipped for flight, and so imperfectly prepared for combat, might not, in case of an encounter, take the safer course, and leave them in the lurch. They were unpleasantly reminded of their want of swords on entering Wooler. Their commanding officer having given the order, 'Gentlemen, you that have swords, draw them.' 'And what shall they do who have none?' inquired a fellow among the crowd, with some drollery.

"Out of the four troops commanded by Forster, the two raised by Lord Derwentwater and Lord Widdrington were, like those of the Scots, composed of gentlemen, and their relations and dependents. But the third and fourth troops differed considerably in their composition. The one was commanded by John Hunter, who united the character of a Border farmer with that of a contraband trader; the other by a person named Douglas, who was remarkable for his dexterity and success in searching for arms and horses—a trade which he is said not to have limited to the time of the rebellion. Into the troops of these last-named officers many persons of slender reputation were introduced, who had either lived by smuggling, or by the ancient Border practice of horse-lifting, as it was called. These light and suspicious characters, however, fought with determined courage at the barricades of Preston."*

Meanwhile, intelligence of this rising in the south of Scotland and in the north of England, having reached Mar, he was urged to quit Perth, and to cross the Forth, for the purpose of effecting a junction with the forces in the south. He, however, pleaded the intelligence of the prince's intention to arrive almost immediately in the north, Mar declines to leave Perth.

as an excuse for remaining where he was, and for declining to break through the Duke of Argyll's army, and the cordon of English men-of-war which were cruising in the Firth. If he were to march south with his men, James, he argued, on landing in the north, would find himself without an adequate force, unless he brought with him a foreign army; and all the government troops under Argyll would be stationed between the prince and his faithful adherents who had taken up arms in his cause. Such a representation was plausible enough; but though his movements had neither been arrested nor hampered by expectations of the Chevalier's speedy arrival, Mar would have shrunk from the difficulty of leading his men to the south through the formidable guard and defences of Argyll; nor would he have ventured to force a passage for his troops across the Firth of Forth, where a strong English fleet had gathered to block up this, the shortest route between the rebels of the north and their southern friends. It was essential, however, to the success of the insurrection, that considerable detachments from Mar's army should be sent to strengthen the cause in the south; and it was arranged that two thousand five hundred men, under Brigadier Mackintosh, of Borlum, a bold and skilful veteran, should attempt the exploit of eluding the English squadron of observation in the Firth, and marching southwards. The difficulties sent across the Firth.

surmounted with great adroitness. The rebels were masters of the whole Fife coast, and considerable bodies of them, engaged in collecting the land-tax, or in recruiting, or in exacting allegiance from the population, had frequently been observed by the English squadron, so that such a party as meant to cross the Firth might appear on the shore without exciting any suspicion in the English naval officers. The brigadier's men took possession of all the boats that belonged to the numerous villages on the coast. As the gathering together of so many boats, and the bustle connected with provisioning those

* "Tales of a Grandfather," 3rd series, vol. i. p. 261. It is supposed that not a few of these Borderers joined the insurgents purely for the more convenient exercise of their calling. When it was reported that Hunter had quartered his troop near Carpenter's camp, a gentleman who knew his character well, exclaimed—"Then we shall hear no more of Carpenter's dragoons; let Hunter but get near them, and he will not leave them a horse to mount on."

in which the troops were about to be transported, were sure to reveal the plot to the men-of-war cruising in the Firth, a clever trick was adopted to put the watchers on a false scent. All the boats not needed for the embarkation of the troops were sent to the neighbourhood of Burntisland, as if the rebels were only waiting for an opportunity to cross at that part of the coast. The English vessels, deceived by this manœuvre, left their anchorage, sailed close to the shore, and began to fire upon the fort and the craft in the harbour. While this was going on, the rebel troops destined for the south were preparing to cross at Elie, Pittenweem, Crail, and other small ports twenty miles eastward, and out of sight of the ships. They divided themselves into two companies, one to cross on the night of the 12th of October, and the other on the following night. The first detachment had made the passage safely before the English squadron saw through the artful arrangement; and the second was far on its way when they were descried by the men-of-war, who immediately weighed their anchors and gave chase. But as wind and tide were both against them, they only succeeded in capturing a single boat. A few other boats, with two or three hundred men on board, were driven upon the Isle of May; but the remainder, amounting to upwards of sixteen hundred men, reached the southern shore in safety. They quickly gathered together (for they had landed at various points) at Haddington, where the way was open to the south-western border, which was held by their friends under Lord Kenmure. Brigadier Mackintosh, however, resolved upon another and very Marches upon different enterprise. Edinburgh

Edinburgh. was only seventeen miles distant, and the road thither easy; the citizens, as he learned, were in a state of great consternation, and it seemed quite practicable to attack and take the capital, if not the castle, long before the Duke of Argyll could arrive with succour from Stirling Castle. The enterprise suited the daring leader and his troops, elated with the passage of the Firth, and eager for the rich spoils to be found in Edinburgh; and, having rested only for a single day in Haddington, they pushed rapidly towards Edinburgh. But the provost and burgesses of the city had already heard of the passage of a large rebel force across the Firth, and, apprehending an attack, had sent immediate notice to the Duke of Argyll, and had called out and placed at the most vulnerable points the city guard, the trained bands, and the volunteers. The messenger dispatched to solicit the assistance of the royal general, reached the camp at Stirling before midday, (October 14th), and at ten o'clock that night, the duke, at the head of a picked force of three hundred dragoons, and two hundred foot soldiers mounted upon farm horses, rode into Edinburgh, through the West Port, just as the Highlanders, sorely fatigued with the day's march, had reached Jock's Lodge, within a mile of the eastern gate of the city.

On hearing of the duke's arrival, the insurgents turned aside to Leith, and breaking open the prison, they released the men who had been taken prisoners in the boat captured by the man-of-war. They then took possession of the ^{Takes possession of} citadel, a strong fort which had been constructed upwards of sixty years before by Oliver Cromwell, and nothing but the gates, along with a few trifling outworks, had been either destroyed or injured in the course of the stormy years which had passed by since its erection. The main fortifications were intact, and they now enclosed some commodious dwellings, which had not formed any part of the original structure, but had been used as bathing quarters by some of the citizens of Edinburgh. How the government had neglected to take possession of a stronghold which, if not valuable to them on account of its proximity to Edinburgh Castle, might become of immense consequence to the rebels, cannot now be conjectured. Old Borlum, as he was called, and his followers lost no time in preparing to repel the expected attack of the enemy. On the ramparts they planted cannon, which they had removed from the ships in the harbour; and with large beams of wood, and planks, barrels, and other lumber, they strengthened every weak point of the defences, and carefully barricaded the entrance. They had obtained a supply of victuals and brandy from the Custom House, which they rifled in passing, and were therefore quite prepared for a desperate resistance.

Early on the following day (15th October) the Duke of Argyll, taking six hundred of the city troops in addition to his own men, summoned the Leith citadel to surrender. He ^{Argyll threatened an assault and battery} threatened an assault and battery ^{ens Leith fort.} by heavy artillery, if his demand was not complied with: and he further intimated that, in the event of a single soldier under him being killed in the course of the siege, he would give no quarter to the rebel garrison. A scornful defiance was returned: "As to surrendering, they laughed at it; and as to bringing cannon and assaulting them, they were ready for him; they would neither take nor give any quarter; and if he thought he was able to force them, he might try his hand." The duke, after attentively reconnoitering the fort, and calculating that any attack of his would be effectively met in the flank, resolved, with the concurrence of his officers, to delay the assault, and led back his troops to the city. The rebels, anticipating his speedy reappearance with more adequate means of attack, resolved to abandon the place before the next day, ^{Mackintosh} and resume their march south- ^{abandons the} wards, as Mar had expressly en- ^{fort.} joined. When he had formed this resolution, Borlum sent a boat across the Firth with an express to acquaint Mar with his movements. By causing a shot to be fired at the boat as it left the shore, he deceived the men-of-war cruising in the Forth, and induced them to allow it to pass, in the belief that it belonged to their friends.* At nine o'clock they quitted the citadel, taking advantage of a cloudy sky, and keeping along the beach towards the east, round the head of the pier. Yet the darkness, which favoured them with its concealment, occasioned one or two tragic occurrences. A Highland soldier saw a horseman approaching, and challenged him in Gaelic. The language in which the challenge was given was totally new and unintelligible to the stranger, who hesitated for a reply, and was forthwith shot dead. The body was recognised as that of a Mr. Malloch, of Mutrie-Shields, a Lowland laird, who had joined the insurgents on that day. When the troops had got beyond Musselburgh, some false alarm arose, and led to a random firing, which had a fatal result for a Highland sergeant and soldier.

Early on the morning of the 10th, the troops arrived at Seton House, the strongly fortified mansion of their friend the Earl of Winton, which was protected by a high wall. Here they were in the midst of agricultural plenty, and their foraging parties experienced no difficulty in procuring provisions. A detachment of troops from Edinburgh, reinforced by the Whig landlords of the district, appeared before Seton on the first day of its being garrisoned by the rebels, but retired without risking a contest. On the following day, Lord Rothes, at the head of five hundred men, made a similar demonstration, but did not venture to attack the insurgents. But on the 19th, Mackintosh, having received fresh instructions to resume his march from the Earl of Mar, who had manœuvred so as to draw the Duke of Argyll back to Stirling, departed with the Highlanders from Seton House, and marched towards the Borders to meet Forster and the southern insurgents. General Wightman immediately took possession of Seton as a government stronghold.

Mackintosh now received fresh orders from Mar to carry out his original instructions, and to proceed without further delay towards the Borders, for the purpose of forming a junction with the cavalry, under Lord Kenmure and Mr. Forster.† He accordingly directed his march through the lonely wilds of Lammermoor, and reached the village of Longformacus on the evening of the 19th of October. He continued his march next day to Dunse, where he proclaimed the Chevalier. On the 22nd he proceeded to Kelso, which had been appointed as the place of junction with the southern insurgents. On the approach of the brigadier, a body of militia and volunteers, who had assembled for the defence of the place, under Sir William Bennet of Grubbet, hurriedly evacuated the town, and retired to Edinburgh.

The southern insurgents reached Kelso on the afternoon of Saturday the 22nd, and, learning that the Highlanders were still a few miles distant, the Scottish part of the cavalry marched through Kelso, without halting, to meet their northern allies at Ednam Bridge, and conducted them in triumph into the town, with the bagpipes playing. Their combined forces, when mustered, were found to amount to about six hundred horse, and one thousand four hundred foot. The day after their arrival was entirely spent in appropriate religious exercises. Orders were given by Viscount Kenmure, who commanded when in Scotland, that the troops should attend divine service in the magnificent Abbey founded by David I., then occupied as a presbyterian place of worship. Mr. Buxton, who has been already mentioned, read prayers, after which, Mr. Patten, chaplain to Mr. Forster, and the historian of the rebellion, preached a sermon on hereditary right, from Deut. 21st and 17th—"The right of the first-born is his." In the afternoon, Mr. Irvine, an old Scottish episcopalian clergyman, delivered a discourse full of earnest exhortation to his hearers to be zealous and steady in the cause in which they had embarked, which discourse, by his own information to Mr. Patten, he had preached nearly thirty years before in the Highlands, to Lord Dundee and his army, a little before the battle of Killiecrankie. "It was very agreeable," says Patten, "to see how decently and reverently the very common Highlanders behaved, and answered the responses according to the rubric, to the shame of many that pretend to more polite breeding."

Next day, October 24th, the whole army marched to the market-cross, with drums beating and colours flying; and a circle having been formed, with the chiefs and officers in the centre, King James was proclaimed by Mr. Seton of Barnes, claimant of the vacant Earldom of Dunfermline. The manifesto of the Earl of Mar was next read, at the end of which the people shouted, "No union! no malt-tax! no salt-tax!" such being the popular grievances of the period. Here, as at other places, the rebels appropriated the public revenues to their own use. They also instituted a search for arms, and seized several pieces of cannon brought by Sir William Bennet from the ancient fortress of Hume Castle, where they had in former times been employed for the

* In a letter of the 13th Oct., Lord Mar says: "I wish, with all my heart, that they may have gone towards Haddington, and so on south, to meet our friends who are in a mis there. In my last orders to them before they embarked, I recommended this most to them, and I am now in some pain in case they should not follow it, but march straight to Leith or Edinburgh; for, by the accounts I have, I am persuaded D. [Duke of] Argyll will immediately either march to Edinburgh himself, or send a considerable part of his army there; but if our people march immediately south, they will be got out of his reach before he can come up with them."—Mar Papers, quoted in Burton's History.

† In his march through East Lothian the brigadier was with difficulty prevented from burning Hermandston, the seat of Dr. Sinclair, in revenge for the death of the youngest son of Mr. Hepburn, of Keith, who was killed on the 8th of October, in resisting an attempt made by Dr. Sinclair and Mr. Hepburn, of Humbie, to arrest Keith, in his own house, just as he was setting out to join the troop of Jacobites under the command of the Earl of Winton. Hermandston, however, was plundered by Lord Nairne's Highlanders of everything of the least value.

purpose of annoying the English in their incursions into Scotland. They likewise plundered the mansions of several gentlemen in the neighbourhood, and destroyed all the corn they could find upon their estates.*

The insurgents remained in Kelso from the 22nd to the 27th of October, and hearing that General Carpenter had advanced as far as Wooler, for the purpose of attacking them, they held a council of war to deliberate on the course which they should pursue.

Disputes between the English and Scottish insurgents—

One plan of operations was advocated by the Scots, another by the English. The former proposed to follow out the design with which Mar had sent the Highlanders across the Forth, by moving westward along the Border, reducing in their way the towns of Dumfries, Ayr, and Glasgow, and then, uniting with the insurgent clans of the West Highlanders, operate upon the rear of Argyll's army, while the Earl of Mar should attack him in front. In this way they contended, there was every chance of their being able to drive the Duke of Argyll entirely out of Scotland. The English portion of the insurgents, on the other hand, insisted that they should march southwards, and attack General Carpenter, who was coming towards them at the head of about nine hundred newly levied troops, who were not only very raw soldiers, but much fatigued with forced marches. Their great superiority of numbers would have made them almost certain of victory, which would have cast no small lustre on their arms, and have drawn many accessions to their force. Either of these plans, if decidedly pursued, seemed to promise success; but, unfortunately, the irreconcilable difference of opinion as to their comparative merits between the two portions of the army, rendered it impossible to adopt either course. The Highlanders positively refused to enter England, and the English were determined to advance no further into Scotland. In the end a half-measure was agreed upon. They —unwise course adopted by them. resolved to march neither against Carpenter nor Argyll, but to move westward along the Border—a course which might advance them equally on their road, whether they should finally determine to march to the west of Scotland or into Lancashire. Like all half-measures, this foolish scheme was signally unsuccessful; for General Carpenter and his dragoons falling into their track, and following in their rear, gave to their march the appearance of a flight. On the horse arriving at Jedburgh, an alarm was given that Lord Lumley, who had lately raised a body of light horse in Northumberland, had attacked their foot, who were considerably in the rear. This intelligence produced no little consternation, and Charles Radcliffe, mounting his horse, called on "all those who had any courage" to mount and follow him. Some of those who stood beside the general tore off the white cockades from their hats, to make themselves appear guiltless in the eyes of those by whom they expected to be immediately taken. Others sought places of concealment throughout the town. The greater part eventually mounted their horses, and marched out to meet the foot, but the alarm proved false; so they returned, says Patten, "worse frightened than hurt." After remaining for two days at Jedburgh, the insurgents resolved to cross the hills into North Tynedale, and, accordingly, Captain Hunter, who was well acquainted with the country, was dispatched thither to provide quarters for the army. But the Highlanders having still resolutely refused to cross the Border, they were eventually obliged to alter their intention, and to march towards Hawick. Here Lord Derwentwater, his brother, Mr. Charles Radcliffe, and the other leaders, were hospitably entertained at a house belonging to the Duchess of Buccleuch.

While lying at Hawick, the disputes between the Highlanders and the English respecting their final course came almost to an open rupture, and the former separated themselves from the horse, and, drawing up on a Renewed disputes between the English and the Highlanders.

moor above the town, declared that they would on no consideration go into England to be kidnapped and made slaves of, as their ancestors were in Cromwell's time. And when the horse, exasperated at their obstinacy, threatened to surround them and force them to march, they cocked their pieces, and calmly observed that if they must needs be made a sacrifice, they were determined at least that it should be in their own country. While this humour lasted they would allow no one to speak to them but the Earl of Winton, who earnestly advocated the plan of marching northward, and falling upon Argyll's rear. The English forces adhered with equal obstinacy to their own scheme of marching into England; Lord Derwentwater and his brother alone took part with the Highlanders, being of opinion that they would be better able to serve the cause in which they were embarked by joining the army in Scotland than by continuing their route to England, where it was uncertain what assistance they might obtain, many of their friends there being men of fortune, and having too large an interest at stake to embark in the affair without strong assurance of success. Lord Derwentwater conceived it the wiser policy to strike a bold stroke in Scotland, and endeavour to complete the conquest of that country, which would enable them to raise a powerful army, and march upon England with an overwhelming force, possessing at the same time resources for supplies, and a place of retreat in case of any disaster. Whereas, in England, should they be defeated, the cause would be ruined, as they had no means of retrieving the misfortune. The leaders having refused to listen to this prudent counsel, Charles Radcliffe begged for only one hundred horse, that with them he might take his fortune along with the Highlanders. This also was refused, lest it should weaken their forces. At length, after several hours' debate, the Highlanders consented to continue with the army so long as it should remain in Scotland, but on no account to enter England.

* Appendix to Patten's History of the Rebellion of 1715.

On Sunday, October 30th, they entered Langholm. Here they were informed by a gentleman, who had that morning seen Carpenter's troops enter Jedburgh, that they were so completely worn out by fatigue, as to seem almost incapable of resistance. But although this information was laid before a council of war, it was found impossible to come to any resolution to take advantage of it, and

They threaten the utmost that the Scots could Dumfries. get their associates to consent to was, to join in an attack upon the town of Dumfries. The citizens of this town, however, who thus saw themselves a second time threatened by the insurgent forces, again assumed an attitude of resistance, and marched out to occupy a position in front of the place, on which they threw up some hasty fortifications. At the same time they received intelligence from General Carpenter that if they could but defend themselves for six hours, he would within that time attack the rear of the enemy. On the morning of the 31st of October the insurgents left Langholm for the purpose of attacking Dumfries, and an advanced party of four hundred horse had proceeded as far as Blacket-ridge, when they were met by an express from their friends in Dumfries, informing them of the preparations which the citizens of that town had made for its defence. Immediately on the arrival of this message, the dispute was renewed between the Scots and English; the former insisting on their original plan of forming a junction with the Earl of Mar, while Mr. Forster and his friends obstinately adhered to their proposal of entering England, affirming that they had received letters which assured them of the general co-operation of the numerous Roman Catholic gentry, and that upon appearing there they would be joined by twenty thousand men. Lord Derwentwater continued strongly to protest against the proposed measure, as certain to end in their ruin, but his remonstrances were not heeded. The rest of the English leaders urged the advantages of their plan with such vehemence as to bear down

They resolve all opposition. After a long alter- to march cation they finally resolved upon into England. the invasion of Lancashire, provided they could obtain the consent of the Earl of Winton and Brigadier Mackintosh, who were not present at the consultation, and who had all along strenuously opposed the measure. Mackintosh's opinion, however, had undergone a change on the subject. He is loudly accused of being determined by a love of plunder, which would have better become a lower rank in the army; and it is alleged that on this occasion he had been gained over by the prospects of personal advantage held out to him by the English gentlemen. The messenger dispatched by the council to ascertain if the brigadier would agree to their project, found him in the middle of the river Esk, in the act of stopping about three hundred of his men, who, already aware of the design of taking them into England, had commenced a retreat towards the Highlands. On the message being delivered to him he immediately decided in favour of the proposal to march into England, where there were "both meat, men, and money," and accordingly exerted himself to prevail upon his men to obey the orders of the council. He succeeded with the greater part, but a detachment of about five hundred resisted all his arguments, and, disregarding his orders, broke away entirely from their companions, with the purpose of returning home through the western districts and by the heads of the Forth. The difficulty of finding provisions, however, compelled them to separate into small parties, and the greater part of them were, consequently, captured by the peasantry about the upper part of Clydesdale, and committed to prison. The Earl of Winton was also so strongly dissatisfied with the resolution adopted by the general body that he left the army with a considerable part of his troops, and proceeded some distance towards the north, as if he had renounced the enterprise entirely. Being overtaken, however, by a messenger from the council, and entreated to accede to their wishes, he stood for some time pensive and silent, apparently pondering the various chances of the two courses presented to his choice. At length he broke out with an exclamation, which was certainly characteristic of his romantic and somewhat extravagant mind—"It shall never be said in history to after generations that the Earl of Winton deserted King James's interest and his country's good." Then taking himself by the two ears he added—"You or any man shall have liberty to cut these out of my head, if we do not all repent it!" But though this unfortunate young nobleman again joined the insurgent forces, it was remarked that he ceased to take any interest in the debates or deliberations of his party. Patten, indeed, states that "he was never afterwards called to any council of war, and was slighted in various ways, having often no quarters provided for him, and at other times very bad ones, not fit for a nobleman and his family; yet, being in for it, he resolved to go forwards, and diverted himself with any company, telling many pleasant stories of his travels, and his living unknown and obscurely with a blacksmith in France, whom he served some years as a bellows-blower and under-servant, till he was acquainted with the death of his father, and that his tutor had given out that he was dead, upon which he resolved to return home; and when there, met with a cold reception." The main body of the insurgents, weakened by the desertion of the five hundred Highlanders, entered England on the 1st of November, and took up their quarters for that night at Brampton, a small market town in Cumberland, near Carlisle, where, as usual, they seized the money collected for the excise on malt and ale. Here Mr. Forster opened a commission which he had received during the march from Lord Mar, authorising him to act as general in England. It is by no means improbable that the desire to obtain the supreme command of the army might have made this gentleman the more anxious for having the march directed on his native country; and a slight success which he met with at this period seemed to afford some justification of his scheme.

A portion of the Highlanders refuse to join them.

The Earl of Winton.

Flight of the English militia. The horse militia of Westmoreland and of the northern parts of Lancashire had been drawn out to oppose the insurgents, and at Penrith they were joined by the posse comitatus of Cumberland, amounting to twelve thousand men, headed by Lord Lonsdale and the Bishop of Carlisle. But this enormous host was composed of ignorant and undisciplined rustics, ill armed and worse arrayed, who had formed to themselves such a dreadful idea of the fierceness and irresistible valour of the rebel army, that they were no sooner made aware of the approach of an advanced party of these than they were seized with a panic, and took to flight in all directions. The insurgents collected a considerable quantity of arms which the fugitives had thrown away in their flight, and took a great number prisoners, who, being of little value to their captors, were immediately set at liberty—a kindness which they repaid by shouting “God save King James, and prosper his merciful army!”* Lord Lonsdale, deserted by all save about twenty of his own servants, found shelter in the old castle of Appleby.

In Penrith they collected the money belonging to the revenue, and seized what arms they could find, but did no injury to the town, the principal inhabitants of which treated them from the first with all manner of civility. Patten mentions that some individuals requested permission from Mr. Forster to pull down or burn a presbyterian meeting-house, but he at once rejected the request, observing, “That he intended to gain by clemency, and not by cruelty.”† From Penrith the insurgents marched next day to Appleby, where they halted two days to refresh themselves, the Highlanders being very much fatigued by the forced marches which they had for some time made, although the horse had carried their arms most of the way.

From Appleby they proceeded to Kendal, and from Indifference of Kendal to Kirby Lonsdale, every- the English where proclaiming King James, people. and levying the public money. Hitherto they had seen nothing of that enthusiasm in their cause which the English leaders had taught their associates to expect. Most of the leading Roman Catholics, indeed, in Cumberland and Westmoreland—such as Mr. Howard of Corby, and Mr. Curwen of Workington—had been previously secured by the government in Carlisle Castle. Instead of increasing, the number of insurgents rather diminished; for at Penrith seventeen Teviotdale gentlemen abandoned their cause, thinking it hopeless. At Kirby Lonsdale, however, a number of the Roman Catholic gentry of Lancashire, with whom Forster had been corresponding, came up and enrolled themselves.

An individual of the name of Gwyn, who accompanied the insurgents, is stated to have taken a curious mode of exhibiting his zeal for their cause during the march. At every church which they passed he carefully erased King George's name from the prayer-books, substituting that of King James, in a nice hand, resembling print, so that the alteration could scarcely be perceived.

Their next remove was to Lancaster; and during the march they learned from Mr. Charles Widdrington, brother to Lord Widdrington, who had been sent forward to warn their friends in Lancashire of their approach, James pro- claimed at Manchester. that King James had been pro- claimed at Manchester, the inhabitants of which seemed disposed to embark in the insurrection, and form a company for that purpose; and that the gentry of the country in that direction had declared their intention to join them. This cheering intelligence raised the spirits of the Highlanders, who had loudly complained that all the specious promises held out to them respecting the vast reinforcements by which they were to be joined had proved a delusion; and with the confident expectation of success, they continued their march to Lancaster. The notorious Colonel Charteris, who then occupied the town, wished to defend the place by blowing up the bridge over the Lune, in order to prevent the enemy's passage; but this being opposed by the inhabitants, he retired, and the insurgents entered the town without hindrance. They had here the satisfaction to release several of their friends imprisoned in the county jails; especially one Thomas Syddal, who had headed a mob at Manchester in pulling down a dissenting chapel. They remained at Lancaster two days, and then pushed for- The insurgents ward to Preston, a town equally reach Preston. Jacobitish and Catholic, from which Stanhope's regiment of dragoons, and a body of militia, thought it prudent to retire on their approach.

At Preston the insurgents were joined by nearly all the Roman Catholic gentry of They receive a the district, with their servants large rein- and tenantry, to the number of forcement. about twelve hundred. But this large accession of force might in various respects be considered an incumbrance rather than a help, the greater number of the new recruits being very imperfectly armed, and none of them having any notion of discipline. Forster, who was en- Incompetency tirely ignorant of war, began now of their leader. to assume the airs of a conqueror, thinking that the forces of the government would never be able to face him. But the veteran brigadier, who knew the value of such an undisciplined rabble, entertained a very different opinion. “Are these the fellows that ye intend to fight Willis with?” he said in derision to Forster, as he pointed through a window to a pack of louts who passed along the street. “Gude faith, man, an ye had ten thousand of them, I would engage to beat the whole with a squadron of Willis's dragoons.*

* Letter about the Occurrences on the way to and at Preston. By an Eye-witness.

† Patten's History of the Rebellion of 1715.

The design of the rebels was now to possess themselves of Warrington Bridge, with a view to securing Liverpool. But while they were planning an attack on this celebrated seaport, which the citizens were making active preparations to defend, the government forces were advancing towards them from several quarters, and taking measures for crushing the insurrection altogether. Of this, however, strange to say, the insurgents had no knowledge. And though a very large body of the gentry of the country, and a considerable portion of the populace, were friendly to them, so thoroughly had the spirit of delusion possessed the whole party, and pervaded all their proceedings, that they suffered themselves to be completely surprised. The Jacobites in the west of England had, during the past year, raised so many riots and disorders, that the government had been obliged to send more troops to that quarter than to any other district of the country—a circumstance very unfortunate for the rebels. These troops were now quartered in the neighbouring towns of Manchester, Chester, Birmingham, Stafford, and Wolverhampton, and they received orders from General Willis, who commanded in Cheshire for the government, appointing them to rendezvous at Warrington Bridge, on the 10th of November, intending to place himself at their head, and dispute with the insurgents their approach to Manchester. In the meantime, General Carpenter, on learning that the rebels were in full march into England, had also crossed the Border, and hastened, by forced marches, to Durham, where an express reached him from General Willis to quicken and direct his march. On the 11th, just as the insurgents had taken possession of Preston, Willis left Manchester for Wigan, with four regiments of cavalry and one of foot —

 the royal for the most part newly raised, forces. but commanded by experienced officers. At Wigan he was joined by Pitt's regiment of dragoons, which had been quartered there, and also by Stanhope's, which had retired from Preston on the approach of the insurgents. Having there learned that General Carpenter was advancing from the opposite quarter, and would be ready to take the rebel forces in flank, he determined to march straight upon Preston next day.

These tidings came like a thunderbolt on the rebel army. It was not till the evening of the 11th that Forster was made aware of Willis's approach, by a letter which one of their friends had sent to the Earl of Derwentwater. The intelligence seems to have completely disheartened and confounded him, and the result showed how incapable was this boastful man of commanding such a bold enterprise. Instead of summoning a council to deliberate on the emergency, or issuing any orders for defence, he sent the let-Plans of defence. ter to Lord Kenmure, and went to bed. It was not till he was roused by Lord Kenmure and other officers from his unseasonable slumbers, that he directed any measures to be taken for defence. A hurried council was now held, and it was determined to send out an advanced party of horse towards Wigan, to plant strong guards at Derrin and Ribble Bridges, and to get the whole army in readiness to fight at the shortest notice.*

There were two plans of defence open to the choice of the insurgent general—either to march out and dispute with the royal forces the passage of the river Ribble, by which Preston is covered; or to remain within the town, and defend it by the assistance of such temporary fortifications and barricades as could be hastily constructed before the enemy's approach. The first of these courses had many obvious advantages. The bridge across the Ribble was long and narrow, and might have been easily defended by a handful of men against a numerous army. It seems to be generally admitted, that if Forster had contested the passage of the bridge with General Willis, while at the same time he rendered two adjacent fords impassable, which might easily have been done, he might have made an effectual resistance—even, perhaps, have destroyed the royal army.

Between the bridge and the town there extended a long and deep lane, bordered with steep banks surmounted by strong hedges. The lane was in some places so narrow that two men could not ride abreast. This, it seems, was the place where, in 1648, Cromwell experienced such a determined resistance from the royalists, who are said to have rolled down large stones from the heights upon him and his men, one of these stones coming so near him that he could only escape by making his horse leap into a quicksand. But Forster made no attempt to avail himself of this advantageous pass. River, bridge, and road were all left open to the assailants. Pos-
 Folly of Forster. sessed with the idea that "the body of the town was the security of the army," the rebel general abandoned all exterior defences, and commanded the guard of one hundred chosen Highlanders, which the council had placed at the bridge, under Farquharson of Invercauld, to retire into the town. He, at the same time, withdrew another detachment of fifty Highlanders, who had taken up a most advantageous post in Sir Henry Haughton's house, near the extremity of the town corresponding with the bridge.

Within the town, however, the insurgents had taken judicious measures for their defence, and pursued them with zeal and spirit. Four barricades were thrown up across the principal streets; not, however, at their extremities towards the fields, but a good way Erection of barricades. up, near the centre of the town. The danger was thus avoided of the enemy coming through the numerous lanes at the termination of the streets, and attacking the insurgents in the rear of their defences. The Jacobite leaders seem at this juncture to have acted with great courage. The Earl of Derwentwater, in particular, stripping to the waistcoat, encouraged the men to labour, both by presents of money and by animating exhortations, and the works were speedily completed.

* Letter about the Occurrences on the way to and at Preston. By an Eye-witness.

* Annals of King George II., p. 136.

One of the four barricades was situated a little below the church. The defence of it was committed to Brigadier Mackintosh, who was supported by the gentlemen volunteers posted in the church-yard, under the command of Lords Kenmure, Nithsdale, Winton, and Derwentwater. The second was formed at the end of a lane, which was defended by a party of Highlanders, under Lord Charles Murray, third son of the Duke of Athol. The Laird of Mackintosh, with his clan, was posted at the windmill barricade, on the road to Lancaster. The fourth barrier was drawn across the street leading towards Liverpool, and was manned by Hunter, the Northumbrian freebooter, with his moss-troopers, and the gentlemen of Teviotdale and Berwickshire, with part of the Earl of Strathmore's regiment, under the command of Major Millar and Mr. Douglas. Each barricade was protected by two pieces of cannon, and troops were also posted in the houses near the barricades, and especially in all the houses which, from their forming the corners of lanes, presented two sides towards the expected assailants.

General Willis, on reaching the bridge over the Ribble, was surprised to find it undefended; and supposing that the insurgents intended to assail him men by an ambuscade from behind the hedges, he proceeded with the greatest caution. On finding that the hedges were also unoccupied, he came to the conclusion that the insurgents had evacuated the town altogether, and were endeavouring by forced marches to return to Scotland.* As he approached the town, however, he saw the barricades which Forster had thrown up, and learned the real state of the case. Having taken a survey of the defences, he prepared for an immediate onset; and to make the assault with more effect, he determined to attack only two of the barricades at once. His troops were accordingly divided into two parties, one under Brigadier Honeyman, the other under Brigadier Dormer. The former, at the head of five different companies of dismounted dragoons, one

General Willis attacks the rebels— from each of five regiments, made a furious attack on the barrier below the church, defended by Brigadier Mackintosh. But their intrepid assault was met with equal courage; and so destructive a fire was poured upon them, not only from the barricades, but from the adjacent houses, that they were beaten off with considerable loss. The Cameronian regiment, however, led by their lieutenant-colonel, Lord Forrester, who displayed singular bravery and coolness during the action, succeeded in effecting a lodgment near the barricade, and took possession of a tall house, from which they annoyed the defenders, though they were unable to carry the post.

During this hot attack, the Earl of Derwentwater and his brother displayed great bravery, animating their men, by words and example, to maintain their ground with undaunted resolution. His lordship not only kept his post, but was able to send fifty men to assist Lord Charles Murray, with which timely aid the Highlanders were enabled to maintain their difficult position. At all points Willis was beaten back, and he —and is repulsed. — was finally obliged to withdraw his forces, having suffered considerable loss.

When the government forces retired from the various points of attack, they set fire to the houses betwixt them and the barricades; and had not the weather been uncommonly serene, the whole town must have been burned to the ground. During the evening of Saturday, and all the subsequent night, the royalists kept up an almost incessant firing at the posts of the besieged, but with very little effect, as they were in general secure under cover from the shot.

Early next morning, November 12th, the same day on which the Earl of Mar fought the indecisive battle of Sheriff Muir, Arrival of General Carpenter arrived with a Gen. Carpenter part of his cavalry, accompanied by the Earl of Carlisle, Lord Lumley, and a considerable number of the gentry of the country. His arrival of course greatly brightened the prospects of the government troops, and left the besieged no hope of escape or relief.

Willis immediately proceeded to explain his dispositions to Carpenter; and then, as the inferior in rank, offered to resign the chief command to his superior officer. But General Carpenter generously refused to take the charge of the siege, observing, that as Willis had begun the affair so auspiciously, he deserved the honour of finishing it. Various alterations were now made in the disposition of the forces; the town was completely invested on all sides; and preparations were made Renewal of the assault. for a renewed assault. The situation of the insurgents had now become desperate. They had, it is true, succeeded in repulsing their assailants in the previous attack, but it was evident that, cut off from all assistance, and cooped up in the streets of a burning town, where they had few men to maintain an extended circle of defence, their fate was inevitable. Every avenue of flight was now closely guarded; and of those who made a desperate attempt to sally, the greater part were cut in pieces, and only a very few escaped by hewing their way through the enemy. "The scene of unavoidable destruction," says Sir Walter Scott, "had different effects upon the different characters of the unfortunate insurgents in Preston; in like manner as the approach of imminent peril has upon domesticated and savage animals when they are brought to extremity—the former are cowed into submission, while the latter, brought to bay, become more desperately ferocious in their resistance.

* Patten's History, p. 103.

The English gentlemen began to think upon the possibility of saving their lives, and entertained the hope of returning once more to the domestic enjoyments of their homes and their estates; while the Highlanders, and most of the Scottish insurgents, even of the higher classes, declared for sallying out, and dying like men of honour, with swords in hand, rather than holding their lives on the base tenure of submission."

The only one of the English leaders who seems to have joined the Scots in this opinion was Charles Radeliffe, who, with his usual intrepidity, declared "he would rather die, sword in hand, like a man of honour, than yield to be dragged like a felon to the gallows, there to be hanged like a dog." Forster, however, was completely disheartened; and at the instigation of Lord Widdrington, and a few others, Colonel Oxburgh, who was an Irish Catholic, and

The rebels had been Forster's principal adviser offer to treat. in military matters, went out to ask terms of surrender. This step, it must be observed, was taken without the advice, and even without the knowledge, of the leading men in the army. And the common soldiers were so exceedingly adverse to the idea of a surrender, that, according to the report of an eye-witness, they would unquestionably have shot Colonel Oxburgh before he had gone out of the barrier, if they had been aware of the message with which he was charged.

Oxburgh's mission was coldly received by the English general, who, irritated by the loss he had sustained on the preceding evening, seemed at first disposed to reject the proposition altogether, and declared that "he would not treat with the rebels who had killed several of the king's subjects, and must expect to undergo the same fate." Oxburgh employed many arguments to soften the general, and entreated him, as "a man of honour and an officer, to show mercy to people who were willing to submit." Willis, at last, relented so far as to say, "that if the rebels would lay down their arms, and surrender at discretion, he would protect them from being cut to pieces by the soldiers until further orders from government." An hour was allowed them for the consideration of this proposal.

When Oxburgh returned, and reported the result of his mission, Captain Dalzell, brother of the Earl of Carnwath, went out, in the name of the Scots, to ascertain what conditions would be granted to them; but Willis refused to give any other terms than those which he had already offered through Colonel Oxburgh. Dalzell then requested time to take the proposal into consideration, which was granted by Willis, on condition that the insurgents should give him hostages that they would not throw up new intrenchments, or make any attempt to escape. Colonel Cotton accompanied Dalzell back to Preston, for the purpose of bringing out the hostages. He speedily returned to the general's tent, bringing with him the Earl of Derwentwater and Colonel Mackintosh, who had been selected for this service, and having received the parole of the other leaders of the rebel forces, that they should observe the proposed conditions.

The news of the intended surrender filled the great body of the common soldiers with the deepest indignation. The Highlanders, especially, were terribly enraged, declaring they would die sword in hand, and insisted on making an attempt to cut their way through the royal forces. "Had Mr. Forster," says an eye-witness, "appeared in the streets he would have been slain, though he had had a hundred lives." As it was, he narrowly escaped being killed in his own room. A Scottish gentleman, named Murray, who had waited upon him to remonstrate against the surrender, was so enraged as to fire a pistol at him; and but for the interposition of Mr. Patten, the Jacobite chaplain, who struck up Murray's arm at the moment of the discharge, the ball would certainly have pierced Forster's body.

Next morning, at seven o'clock, Mr. Forster sent a message to General Willis, informing him that the insurgents were willing to surrender on the terms proposed. Colonel Mackintosh, who was present when the message was delivered, could not help expressing his conviction that the Scotch would not submit on such conditions. They were a people, he said, of desperate fortunes; and he, who had been a soldier himself, knew what it was to be a prisoner at discretion. "Then go back to your people again," exclaimed Willis, "and I will attack the town, and not spare one man of you." Mackintosh accordingly proceeded to Preston, but immediately came back with the assurance that Lord Kenmure, and the rest of the Scottish leaders, were willing to surrender on the same terms with the English. The royal troops then entered Preston in two detach- Their uncon-ments, and meeting in the market- ditional sur-place, where the whole of the insurgents were drawn render.
up, they disarmed, and formally made them prisoners.

Among the captives taken at Preston, were Lords Derwentwater, Widdrington, Nithsdale, Winton, Carnwath, Kenmure, Nairne, and Charles Murray, and members of the ancient northern families of Ord, Beaumont, Thornton, Clavering, Patten, Gascoigne, Standish, and Swinburne. The number of prisoners taken, of all kinds, was only fourteen hundred, among whom there were about two hundred domestic servants, followers of the gentlemen who had assumed arms, and upwards of two hundred gentlemen volunteers, the rest consisting of the Highlanders, under the command of Brigadier Mackintosh. It is evident, therefore, that the greater part of the Lancashire peasants, who had joined them at Preston, had either got out of the town during the blockade, or escaped recognition at the surrender. Of the insurgents, only seventeen had been killed in the defence, while between sixty and seventy of the royalists were slain, and as many more wounded.

On laying down their arms, the unhappy garrison were confined in one of the churches, and treated with considerable rigour, being stripped and ill used by the soldiery. In consequence of these outrages many of the prisoners were so much in want of decent clothing that they were obliged to strip the pews of their baize linings to protect themselves from the severity of the weather. No distinction was made of rank and condition, or of degrees in guilt; and the private men, who had merely followed what was, in their eyes, the paramount duty of yielding obedience to their chiefs, were treated with all the severity due to wilful rebellion. About five hundred of the inferior prisoners were sent to Chester jail, and many others to Liverpool and various prisons near the place where they were taken; but those of most note were conveyed to London, where they arrived on the 9th of December. They were introduced into the city in a kind of triumphal procession, which was much less dishonourable to the unfortunate sufferers than to the mean minds who pandered to the passions of the mob by planning such an ignoble triumph. When the prisoners reached Barnet, they were all pinioned with cords, like the vilest criminals. At Highgate they were met by a strong detachment of horse grenadiers and foot-guards; halters were put upon their horses, and each man's horse was led by a private soldier, and their ears were stunned by the drums of their escort beating a triumphal march and by the shouts of the populace, who loaded them with every kind of scurrilous abuse and insult. In this manner they were led through the streets of the city, and divided among the four principal prisons, the noblemen being secured in the Tower.*

In the north the Pretender's cause was not meeting with such success as could compensate for the disasters and final ruin of the Jacobites who had marched into England. Inverness, with all the castles and forts in the neighbourhood, fell once more into the hands of the government, in consequence of the Fraser clan having changed sides in the contest. Simon Fraser—better known

The Clan Fraser abandons the cause of the rebels. by his subsequent name, Lord Lovat—had appeared in his own district, and found that, whilst the main body of his clan had followed its legal head, Mr. MacKenzie of Fraserdale, to the rebel camp, no fewer than three hundred men had disobeyed the Jacobite call, and remained at home. Simon felt that now, by an energetic maintenance of the Hanoverian cause, he who was the natural, might again become the legal, chief of the clan; and he forthwith resolved on a course of loyalty, as, at present, most conducive to his own interest. Accordingly, he summoned the three hundred clansmen to place themselves under his command, and sent a message to those of their brethren who had joined the rebels, requiring their immediate return from Lord Mar's camp, and threatening them, should they refuse or delay compliance, with the extreme penalties which a Highland chieftain could, in those days of feudal despotism, award. A better illustration could not be selected, of the different respect paid in the Highlands to the natural and to the merely legal head of a clan, than is afforded by the conduct of the Frasers. Though they were under the eye not only of their legal chief, but also of Lord Mar and his Highland army, and had with apparent cordiality rallied around the standard of the exiled Stewart, yet, on receiving Simon Fraser's orders, they acted as if they had no alternative except to obey, and they at once abandoned the rebel camp, in spite of their attachment to the cause, and their expectations of a large booty from the plunder of the enemy. Meanwhile, Duncan Forbes, afterwards lord-president, held possession of the ancient fortalice of Culloden in the government interest, whilst his father-in-law, Hugh Rose, occupied the adjoining fortress of Kilravock, and, with a small but intrepid garrison, protected a considerable district from the incursions of the Jacobite forces. The territory north of Loch Ness was in the keeping of the loyal Earl of Sutherland. In the event of the recapture of Inverness by the friends of the government, the pass from the north Highlands to the south of Scotland would be in their hands. Lovat, at the head of the Fraser clan, joined Forbes and Rose for the achievement of this important result. Their combined forces, along with a small party from the clan of the Grants, numbered about thirteen hundred men. Before, however, they had completed their plans for the siege of Inverness, the terrified garrison took to flight, and, on the night of the 13th of November, secretly dropped down the river in boats, and escaped to the northern coast of the Moray Firth.

* The Last Earl of Derwentwater, p. 20; Patten, p. 97, et seq.

From the first, Mar had shown his utter incapacity for the enterprise which he had undertaken. He had, indeed, succeeded in collecting a large body of troops; but he was destitute of the experience, military skill, and daring, which were necessary to guide them to victory. Nor was his incapacity long concealed from the Highland officers, who, chafing under the delay of meeting the enemy, and loathing the novel drudgery to which Mar had set them of fortifying the camp, exaggerated the opportunities of successful attack which he neglected. The chieftains, therefore, began to murmur loudly against his timidity, which they were far from regarding as wise caution; and they bitterly felt how ruinous, as well as ridiculous, was protracted inaction in the circumstances in which they were placed. They well knew that the inactive duties of a camp were peculiarly disliked by their men, and that if the procrastinating system were much longer pursued many of them would desert the standard altogether.* Discontent pervaded the whole of the

Discontent of Highland chiefs.

and they bitterly felt how ruinous, as well as ridiculous, was protracted inaction in the circumstances in which they were placed. They well knew that the inactive duties of a camp were peculiarly disliked by their men, and that if the procrastinating system were much longer pursued many of them would desert the standard altogether.* Discontent pervaded the whole of the

* One of their leaders said he was afraid the Highlanders would desert their colours in three cases:—first, if they were long without being brought to action they would tire, and go home; secondly, if they fought and were victorious they would plunder, and go home; thirdly, if they fought and were beaten, they would run away and go home. (Master of Sinclair's MS.; Browne's "History of the Highlands," vol. ii. p. 317.)

Jacobite army, and showed itself in such various forms, as convinced Mar of the necessity of raising his camp and marching southwards without further delay.

On the 10th of November the earl broke up the encampment at Perth, and marched to Auchterarder. On the 12th he directed the main body of the northern and the western clans, along with the squadron from Fife, and other two squadrons of Mar marches horse, to advance upon Dunblane, to Dunblane. whilst he himself brought up another division more leisurely, intending to rest with it near the old Roman camp of Ardoch.* Intelligence, however, was sent by the wife of the laird of Kippendavie, to the first division of the army as it approached Dunblane, that the Duke of Argyll had already appeared there at the head of the government forces, on his way to meet the rebels. The clans and the squadrons of cavalry composing the van of the Jacobite army at once halted; and the rear, commanded by Mar, was quickly brought up, the whole army occupying an eminence north of the Sheriffmuir, where they spent the night of Saturday, 12th November, under arms. The Duke of Argyll, who had received exact intelligence of the movements of the rebels, quitted Stirling on the morning of the 12th, and marched forward to Dunblane. He took possession of the town; but, from fear of a surprise, he led out his troops, and caused them to bivouac about two miles to the north-east, above the house of Kippenross. Though the night was bitterly cold, the duke issued peremptory orders that no tent should be pitched, either by officer or private soldier. He himself repaired to a sheepeeote at the foot of a hill to the right, where he passed the night, sitting on a bundle of straw. Shortly after midnight he caused six rounds of ammunition to be served out to each man, in addition to twenty-four which had been previously distributed. The hostile armies were now separated by an elevated and uneven waste, called Sheriffmuir, from its having formerly been the rendezvous for the militia of the sheriffdom of Monteith. Owing to its gentle elevation and extent, it afforded a full view of the surrounding country, whilst its own surface came as completely within the vision of the whole neighbourhood. Yet, though neither of the armies could take up a position on the muir without all its movements becoming visible to the other, such was the peculiarity of the ground, that when it was occupied at the same time by both the armies, they might, on certain spots, be screened from each other's observation.

Next morning both armies were early under arms. The insurgents were drawn up on the east of the road to Dunblane, having the Sheriffmuir in front. They were formed in two lines, the first consisting of ten battalions of foot under General Gordon, with Clanranald, Glengarry, Sir John McLean, and other Highland chieftains. The second line consisted of the Mackenzies and Gordons, with the battalions of Panmure, Tullibardine, Strathallan, Drummond of Logie-Almond, and Robertson of Struan. Both lines were protected on the flanks by some squadrons of horse. The Highland army numbered altogether nearly nine thousand men. At an early hour Mar observed the Duke of Argyll, with a number of his officers, upon an eminence above Dunblane, reconnoitring the position of the rebels. Rightly judging that the duke meant to offer him battle, he called a council of war in front of his cavalry, and addressed the assembled officers and chiefs in an animating speech, depicting the wrongs of their prince and country, and congratulating them that they had now an opportunity of revenging their wrongs in open battle. He then asked them if they were ready to engage. The Marquis of Huntly was the only officer who openly objected to fight, but some few were heard in an under tone to recommend a return to Perth till the spring; but the chiefs and other officers were eager to encounter the enemy, and the voices of the dissentients were drowned by loud shouts of "fight! fight!" The Jacobite officers immediately galloped off to their posts, and as soon as this resolution was made known to their troops, it was welcomed with loud cheers and the tossing up of hats and bonnets.

* At Ardoch the Procestrium of the Roman camp is still plainly traced.

While the rebel army was thus engaged, the Duke of Argyll, after consulting with his officers, resolved not to wait the attack of the enemy on the grounds occupied by his troops, but to lead up the hill, and to encounter the insurgents on the elevated part of the moor. His army was drawn up in two lines. The first was composed of six battalions, numbering about eighteen hundred men, and having three squadrons of dragoons on each flank. The second line consisted of only two battalions of foot, with a squadron of dragoons to protect each extremity. On the right the duke commanded in person, whilst General Witham had charge of the left wing, and General Wightman brought up the centre. The entire army did not number more than four thousand men, for the Glasgow volunteers had been left behind, though their officer, Colonel Blackadder, had pronounced them as fit as they were willing to take the field and share in any service imposed on the duke's ablest veterans. But the marked inferiority of the royal army in numbers was well compensated by their valour, hardihood, and discipline. To a man, they were animated, not only by admiration for the many estimable and heroic qualities, personal and ancestral, of their leader, but also by intense yet intelligent zeal for the great cause of the civil and religious freedom of their country imperilled in the struggle, and the maintenance of which was, they keenly felt, entrusted to their swords. A unity, resolution, and fervour of patriotic spirit gave the best impulse to this compact and well-disciplined host, which was thus far from being so unequally matched as a comparison of numbers might indicate, against the Jacobite army, which they were about to encounter. The latter was nearly nine thousand strong, and doubtless included some of the most martial of all the Highland clans; but it also consisted of a large proportion of untrained serfs and worthless camp-followers, who could only confuse and encumber any military movements; whilst it was further weakened by the absence of any close bond of union between its Highland and its Lowland divisions, and by the timidity and incapacity of the commander-in-chief. Still, the headlong charge of the clansmen might, in a moment, with whirlwind fury sweep down and rout such a small army as that led by Argyll, and render the duke's skill, and the steady bravery of his men, of no avail; for frequently had a disciplined force, deploying strictly according to rule, and handled by a general who was carrying out an elaborate plan of battle, been broken, cut up, and dispersed by the sudden assault of an irregular body of Highlanders sweeping down with resistless onset the opposing ranks.

The Jacobite general now put his troops in motion, and advanced towards the Sheriffmuir. The enemy, having divided his two lines into four columns, with the cavalry on the flanks. The royal forces at the same moment were advancing up the hill from the opposite side; but, owing to the peculiarity of the ground, the hostile armies did not see each other until they were almost hand to hand. When they met on the summit of the moor it was found that both had diverged considerably to the right, so that the opposing lines did not fairly confront each other, and the left wing of both was outflanked. The right wing of the royalists was fully formed; but a portion of the centre and left had not yet reached their proper position. As soon as the Earl of Mar perceived the disadvantageous situation of Argyll's army, he resolved instantly to begin the attack before their arrangements were completed, and, having sent orders to the other parts of his line immediately to fall on, he put himself at the head of the clans, pulled off and waved his hat, and, with a huzza, led forward his men against the left wing of the enemy which was in the act of forming. The chief of the Macleans, placing himself in front of his clan, exclaimed with a loud voice,—“Gentlemen, this is a day we have long wished to see. Yonder stands MacCallummoir for King George, and here stands MacLean for King James. God bless MacLean and King James! Charge, gentlemen!”

The Highlanders now stripped off their plaids, fired and then threw away their muskets, and, drawing their swords, rushed with loud yells upon the enemy. Their fire was instantly returned by the royalists, and, to the dismay of the Jacobites, the gallant young captain of Clanranald fell mortally wounded. His clansmen gathered around him, and, in spite of his spirited encouragement to them to fight courageously, they stood absorbed in grief. But Glengarry, observing their dejection, sprang forward, and throwing his bonnet into the air, cried aloud, in his native language,—“Revenge, revenge; revenge, to-day! and mourning to-morrow!” Roused by this appeal, the Highlanders instantly resumed their headlong assault, broke through the line of the enemy, and drove them from the field with great slaughter. The Earl of Mar pursued the fugitives for half-an-hour, and took a number of prisoners; but intelligence having reached him that a disaster had befallen his left wing, he retraced his steps, and took up a position on the stony hill of Kippendavie.

The left wing of the rebel forces was the first to begin the attack, and poured two volleys upon the corps commanded by the duke, with a precision and effect which the most experienced officers in the royal army declared they had never seen surpassed by the best disciplined troops. The royalists, however, kept their ground, and the battle continued to rage for some time without any decisive result. Argyll, perceiving that his small body of men could not make any impression upon the dense masses of the enemy in front, and afraid that they might outflank him, ordered Colonel Cathcart to lead a strong body of cavalry across a morass, which the frost had rendered passable, and attack the Highlanders on the flank. This movement was executed with great promptitude and skill, and was attended with complete success. The insurgent cavalry, borne down by the superior weight of the English dragoons, after a stubborn resistance, were compelled to give way. The clansmen were, at the same time, attacked and driven back by Argyll's foot. The first line of Mar's left wing was thus mingled indiscriminately with the second, and a general rout ensued. The insurgents, however, though broken, made a desperate effort to retrieve the fortunes of the day. In the course of their retreat, the cavalier horse, chiefly composed of Perthshire and Angus gentry, made no fewer than ten attempts, at different places, to rally and charge their pursuers. But their small country horses were unable to resist the weight of the royal cavalry, and at length, after three hours' hard fighting, Mar's left wing was driven across the river Allan, a distance of about three miles from the field of battle. The insurgents suffered severely in their retreat, in spite of the praiseworthy humanity of the duke, who called upon the dragoons to “spare the poor blue bonnets.” The young Earl of Strathmore, who showed great gallantry in rallying his Angus regiment, was killed by a dragoon after quarter had been given to him, and the Earl of Panmure was wounded and made prisoner, but was rescued by his brother, Harry Maule.

At this period the duke received information of the defeat of his left wing, on which he relinquished the pursuit of the enemy, and returned to the field of battle.* He had now with him

* On his march some one having remarked to his Grace that he feared the victory was not complete, the duke

SHERIFFMUIR.

The slope & ridge with trees is the site of the Battle scarcely a thousand men, who were much exhausted, while the victorious right wing of the rebels, drawn up on the hill of Kippendavie, amounted to four times that number. In these circumstances he judged it prudent to act on the defensive, and having posted his men behind some enclosures near the bottom of the hill, with two pieces of cannon on his right and left, he waited the expected attack of the enemy. But Mar, in spite of his vastly superior numbers and advantageous position, showed no inclination to renew the fight. "Oh, for an hour of Dundee!" exclaimed an old chief, enraged at the incapacity and inactivity of his general. On the approach of night the Highlanders began to retire from the hill towards their rear, and the duke, on hearing the receding sound of their bagpipes, and seeing the ranks in front gradually disappearing, filed off his men to the right towards Dunblane. He spent the night with his troops under arms, on the fields which lay betwixt the town and Sheriffmuir, while his opponent retired to the Roman camp at Ardoch, where he bivouaced for the night.*

Early next morning Argyll visited the field of battle, and took possession of six pieces of cannon and other trophies, including seven waggons and a great quantity of muskets, broadswords, and plaids, which the Highlanders had thrown away when about to charge. Thirteen pairs of colours and three standards, including the royal one called "The Restoration," also fell into the hands of the royal general. The insurgents are believed to have lost about seven or eight hundred men, while, according to the official account, the royal army replied in the words of an old song, called the "Bob o' Dunblane:"—

"If it was na weel bobbit, weel bobbit, weel bobbit;
If it was na weel bobbit, we'll bob it again."

* The author of the fine old satirical ballad on the battle of Sheriffmuir justly says of this confused and indecisive struggle, "There is nothing certain, except that there was actually a battle, which he witnessed."

"There's some say that we wan;
Some say that they wan;
Some say that nane wan at a', man;
But ae thing I'm sure,
That at Sheriffmuir
A battle there was, which I saw, man;
And we ran, and they ran,
And they ran, and we ran,
And we ran, and they ran awa, man.

* * * * *
So there such a race was
As ne'er in that place was;
And as little chase was at a', man,
Frae ither they ran Without touk o' drum;
They did not make use o' a paw, man.

* * * * *
Rob Roy he stood watch
On a hill for to catch
The booty, for aught that I saw, man;
For he ne'er advanc'd
From the place he was stand'd,
Till nae fair was to do there at a' man," &c.

This noted freebooter drew down upon himself the unspurring lash of the satirist by his refusal to take any part in the battle, alleging that if his friends, the Jacobites, could not do it without him, they could not do it with him.

had two hundred and ninety killed, a hundred and eighty-seven wounded, and a hundred and thirty-three taken prisoners, making a total of six hundred and ten.* The Earl of Forfar, a scion of the famous house of Douglas, and a brave and experienced officer, received no fewer than sixteen wounds, besides a pistol-shot in the knee, of which he died at Stirling three weeks after the battle. The Duke of Argyll took a considerable number of prisoners; but, in the confusion of the fight, the greater part made their escape. The remainder, including the Lord Strathallan and his brother, Murray of Auchtertyre, Drummond of Logie Drummond, Walkinshaw of Barrowfield, and about eighty other gentlemen, were carried to Stirling.

Both generals claimed the victory; but all the advantages of the contest remained with the government. The duke maintained his position, and completely frustrated the attempt of the rebels to descend into the Lowlands; while Mar, abandoning his project of marching across the Forth, retreated, first to Auchterarder, and then to his former quarters at Perth. According to their usual custom after a battle, whether victorious or defeated, the clansmen deserted in great numbers. The Camerons, Mackenzies, and Gordons retired in a body, while the other clans melted away insensibly; so that the Jacobite leader soon found his army reduced nearly one half. Many of those who remained were disheartened by their failure, and the obvious incapacity of their general. The Highland chiefs, indeed, who still rallied round the Jacobite standard, were eager for another battle, and urged Mar to take the field at once, while the royalists were exhausted by the late contest. "If we have not yet gained a victory," said General Hamilton at a council of war held immediately after the battle, "we ought to fight Argyll once a week till we make it one."†

Fruits of the victory reaped by the government.

But many of the Jacobite officers were now convinced that the cause was hopeless, and the news of the capture of Inverness by Simon Fraser, which took place on the 12th of November, the day before the battle of Sheriffmuir, greatly deepened this disheartening impression. The Lowland portion of the rebel army in particular began to be seriously alarmed at the consequences of an unsuccessful rebellion, not only to their liberties and estates, but also to their very lives, which they felt had been wantonly staked. There could not be a doubt that the enterprise, if not forthwith self-abandoned, would be speedily and summarily crushed, and that, in either case, they and all its abettors would be at the mercy of a sovereign reputed to be stern and ungenerous, if not sullenly implacable; and who might, moreover, be strongly impressed with the necessity of making the punishment of the present insurrection a terrible warning against its repetition. A considerable number, therefore,

* Patten's History, p. 98.

† "True Account of the Proceedings at Perth." By a Rebel. Chambers' History of the Rebellion in Scotland, p. 286.

The Lowlanders desire to negotiate. of the Lowland gentlemen were anxious to open negotiations with the Duke of Argyll, and to lay down their arms, if he could assure them of an amnesty. When the news of the reduction of Preston reached the rebel army, "some, who had been caballing privately before began to speak openly of capitulating with the enemy, and found others more easily to join with them."* It is curious to find that these views and wishes were branded as indications of cowardice by the Highlanders, although they were in the habit of quitting the camp whenever they thought proper, and many of their fellow clansmen had already returned to their homes. They had often eluded the vengeance of the government by betaking themselves to the inviolable sanctuary found in their inaccessible mountain-fastnesses; and they no doubt expected, by adopting the same expedient in the present emergency, to effect their escape from amidst the ruins of an unfortunate insurrection, and from the penalties of the vindictive law of treason. It was not till the close of the rebellion of 1745 that these turbulent chiefs were at length made to feel that a triumphant government could send its ministers of vengeance into the most remote and pathless districts of the country, to smite the rebel in his secure stronghold, and to prove that Highlanders and Lowlanders were equally amenable to British law.

At the head of those who were favourable to negotiation was the Master of Sinclair, who was severely blamed by the Jacobites for his inactivity during the battle of Sheriffmuir, and who had followed Huntley to Strathbogie, to persuade that fugitive lord to make separate terms for themselves. He alleged, in justification of his departure from Mar's camp, that his life was in imminent peril, as there was a plot on the part of several Highlanders to murder him. It is curious to find the proposals for the amicable termination of the struggle, and the surrender of the insurgents, brought under the attention of the Duke of Argyll—favoured by the Earl of Mar. by no other person than Lord Mar himself. The Jacobite leader's apology for this strange step is that he was fully apprised of the intrigues carried on by the master of Sinclair and others, and that he judged it wise and fair by a general, to prevent a merely partial, surrender; since the latter would involve as thorough an abandonment of the Jacobite enterprise, whilst it would secure the royal pardon for only a few of the insurgents, and leave the great body, along with the most honest leaders of the party, exposed to the worst severities which the law could inflict.† It was through the Countess of Moray, aunt to Argyll, that Mar inquired if the duke had been entrusted with the power to negotiate with the insurgents. Argyll was not only a supporter of the house of Hanover, but a genuine patriot, who was warmly interested in the well-being of the Scottish people of all ranks. Hence this great statesman and warrior was deeply solicitous, on the ruin of the Jacobite enterprise, that those of his countrymen in the north, who had foolishly committed themselves to it, should be allowed to return quietly to their loyalty, instead of being rendered desperate by implacable rigour. It is understood that the duke highly approved of the proposal made to him on the part of his rebellious countrymen, and was desirous that government should readily accept their offered submission; but he had to reply to Mar, that it was not in his commission to treat with those who had taken up arms against King George,—that in the meantime he could only accept their unconditional surrender, but that he would immediately request the government to invest him with powers for negotiating. In consideration of what Argyll had done in Scotland during the last few months, when his small and indifferently-equipped army had furnished the only obstacle which the powerful forces of the rebels had encountered, as well as his steadfast adherence to the Hanoverian dynasty, his recommendation of a forgiving policy towards the Scottish rebels might well have been favourably attended to by government. His commission, however, was not extended so as to embrace the powers of negotiating for which he applied; and his old commission, which he had sent to London for renewal, was not even returned to him. Thus early was indicated the implacable policy of the Hanoverian kings, whose rigour in enforcing the severest penalties of the law rendered desperate the discontented and the misguided, whom a lenient treatment would have served to reclaim.

Meanwhile, the troops of Mar were rapidly decreasing, whilst the duke's army was receiving important reinforcements from England, and was in daily expectation of three thousand Dutch soldiers. In this altered posture of affairs, it is probable that the Jacobites would have cast themselves completely upon the mercy of their opponents, and surrendered unconditionally to Argyll, but for the solitary hopes which the expected presence of their exiled prince excited. Never, however, was a forlorn hope more cruelly disappointed, for James appeared at length in the camp of the rebels only to witness the ruin of the insurrection. When the tidings first reached him that his friends had taken up arms in his behalf, he had gone from Lorraine to St. Maloes, where he spent some time in shipping off supplies for Scotland. He lingered so long at this place that he was ultimately prevented from sailing by some British men-of-war which lay before the harbour. He then traversed the country in the disguise of a mariner, and with only six attendants disguised as French naval officers embarked

* Journal of Mar's Proceedings, published at Paris.

† Ibid.

H. Bourne

CHEVALIER DE ST GEORGE.

SON OF JAMES VII.

at Dunkirk about the middle of December, on board a small vessel of eight guns, which consented, whilst professing to be bound for Norway, to convey him and his few followers to the north-east coast of Scotland.

The rest of his domestics were directed to follow him in two small vessels, bringing with them some stores for the use of the army at Perth. On the 22nd of December the Chevalier landed at Peterhead, whence Lieutenant Allan Cameron, of Lochiel, one of his attendants, was immediately sent off to Perth with the news of his arrival. Next day he set out for the head-quarters of the army, and on the 24th reached Fetteresso, the principal seat of the Earl-Marischal. Here, on the 27th, he was waited on by the Earl of Mar and about thirty other gentlemen, who had set out from Perth to meet the prince as soon as they received intelligence of his landing. He was detained at Fetteresso by two successive attacks of ague, and spent the time in receiving addresses from the "Episcopal clergy of the diocese of Aberdeen," and from the magistrates and town-council of that city. The address of the clergy, after expressing thanks to God for the Chevalier's "safe and happy arrival" in Scotland, referred, in somewhat fulsome terms, to his "princely virtues," which, "are such," they say, "that in the opinion of the best judges, you are worthy to wear a crown though you had not been born to it."

Before leaving Fetteresso, the prince exercised some of the prerogatives of royalty by conferring titles on several of his adherents. The Earl of Mar was elevated to a dukedom, and it is reported that the honour of knighthood was conferred upon the Jacobite provost of Aberdeen. Resuming his journey southward on the 2nd of January (1716), the Chevalier passed successively through Brechin, Glamis, and Dundee, to the royal palace of Scône, which he reached on the 6th, and next day made his public entry into Perth.

His arrival was a source of great disappointment to his adherents, who had expected that he would bring with him a supply both of men and stores; while he, on his side, was deeply mortified to find that so many of the insurgents had already abandoned his standard, and that the cause was on the brink of ruin. Having expressed a desire to see "those little kings (the chiefs) with their armies," of whom he had heard so much, a select body of the clansmen was turned out for his inspection. Their appearance and mode of handling their arms gave him great satisfaction, but when he ascertained how small was the number of Highlanders in the camp, he gave visible tokens of his surprise and chagrin. On the other hand, the warlike mountaineers were equally disappointed with the appearance and demeanour of the prince, which differed widely from the exaggerated description of his personal qualities given by Mar. An eye-witness, supposed to be the Master of Sinclair, thus describes the person and behaviour of the Chevalier, and the effect which they produced on the minds of his followers:—"His person was tall and thin, seeming to incline to be lean rather than to fill as he grows in years. His countenance was pale, but perhaps looked more so than usual, by reason he had three fits of ague, which took him two days after his coming on shore. Yet he seems to be sanguine in his constitution; and there is something of a vivacity in his eye that perhaps would have been more visible if he had not been under dejected circumstances, and surrounded with discouragement; which it must be acknowledged were sufficient to alter the complexion even of his soul, as well as of his body. His speech was grave and not very clearly expressive of his thoughts, nor overmuch to the purpose; but his words were few, and his behaviour and temper seemed always composed. What he was in his diversions we know not; here was no room for such things. It was no time for mirth. Neither can I say I ever saw him smile. Those who speak so positively of his being like King James VII. must excuse me for saying, that it seems to say they either never saw this person, or never saw King James VII.; and yet I must not conceal, that when we saw the person whom they called our king, we found ourselves not at all animated by his presence; and if he was disappointed in us we were tenfold more so in him. We saw nothing in him that looked like spirit: he never appeared with cheerfulness and vigour to animate us. Our men began to despise him. Some asked if he could speak. His countenance looked extremely heavy. He cared not to come abroad among us soldiers, or to see us handle our arms or do our exercise. Some said the circumstances he found us in dejected him. I am sure the figure he made dejected us; and had he sent us but five thousand men of good troops, and never come among us, we had done other things than we have now done."* The friends of the house of Hanover, aware of the very unfavourable impression made on his followers and soldiers by the Chevalier, sought to deepen it by unsparing ridicule upon his physical characteristics. In a clever pamphlet, professing to be "a hue and cry after the Pretender," the following description occurs, which must have greatly annoyed the Jacobites, and would have stunned the Highland clansmen, had they been able to read it, into a frenzy of wrath:—"Whereas one James Stewart, alias Oglethorpe, alias Chevalier, alias Pretender, alias King, alias no King—neither Cæsar nor Nullus: neither a man nor a mouse: neither a man's man nor a woman's man, nor a statesman, nor a little man, nor a great man: neither Englishman nor Frenchman, but a mongrelion between both: neither wise nor otherwise: neither soldier, nor sailor, nor cardinal without father or mother, without friend or foe, without foresight or aftersight, without brains or bravery, without house or home, made in the figure of a man, but just alive, and that's all; hath clandestinely lately eloped from his friends through a back door, and has not been seen or heard of since; and, whereas, the said alias pretended to come here, to watch and fight, to bring men and money with him, to train an army and march at the head of them, to fight battles and besiege towns, but in reality did none of these, but skulked, and whined, and speeched, and cried, stole to his head-quarters by night, went away before morning, and having smelled gunpowder, and dreamed of an enemy, burnt the country, and ran away by the light of it."*

* "A true Account of the Proceedings at Perth," &c., written by a rebel.

But, in spite of the depressed state of his The Chevalier's affairs, the Chevalier had lofty notions of his rank, position, and affectation of royalty. claims; nor was there a reigning monarch in Europe who played the part of king with more minute care, and with a nicer regard to etiquette, or exacted more elaborate homage from any of his subjects. Unconscious of moving about in a wretched travesty of royalty, he never laid aside the manners proper to a levee at St. James's Palace. With apparently as strong a faith in the universal efficacy of royalty as could be cherished by any of the simple and deluded individuals who approached him, the Chevalier spent a certain portion of each day in touching for the "king's evil." He issued six proclamations; the first appointing a national thanksgiving for his safe arrival in his own dominions; the second, enjoining the clergy to pray for him; the third, legalising the circulation of foreign coin; the fourth, summoning the Estates of the kingdom to assemble for deliberation; the fifth, commanding all able-bodied males, from the age of sixteen to sixty, to rally around his standard; and the last, appointing the ceremony of his coronation to take place on the 23rd of January (1716). Before this date arrived, however, the unfortunate prince was painfully intent on the ways and means of escape and personal safety, to the neglect of due preparations for the pomp of his coronation, though, for a few days after the appearance of the proclamation, enthusiastic Jacobite ladies employed themselves in collecting jewellery to adorn his crown.

The comparative numerical strength of the two Prospects of the rival armies. contending armies was, indeed, calculated to depress, if not to extinguish, all the Pretender's expectations of success for the insurrection. Desertions from the Jacobite camp had been put a stop to for a little by the presence of James, but they soon recommenced on a larger scale than ever, giving him reason to apprehend that ere long he would be left in Scotland without even a body-guard. The government forces were also preparing to come to close quarters with them, and finish the struggle. Argyll had been joined by Cadogan at the head of the long-expected Dutch troops, and of several English regiments. These reinforcements, amounting to six thousand men, reached the duke's camp towards the end of December (1715). It is difficult, with our scanty information on the point, to understand why this important assistance was withheld from Argyll during many weeks when it was so much needed, and was not granted until it might have been dispensed with altogether, and when the duke's own men, without foreign or English auxiliaries, could easily annihilate the fast collapsing rebellion. It is not an improbable conjecture, though English Policy of the government. it would cover the government with infamy, that, at head-quarters, whilst, of course, the defeat and destruction of the Jacobite enterprise were earnestly desired, there was no wish that Argyll and the Scotch troops should have the glory of victory. It may even be that, as the contest was confined to Scotland, the government was not unwilling that it should go on for a while in that dissatisfied and troublesome country, and that in its progress the leading men on both sides should destroy each other, and thus rid England of the constant annoyance and the stubborn opposition which she had encountered from various factions in Scotland since the period of the union. A civil war in Scotland, raging for several months, might not only finally dispose of many obnoxious persons of influence, but also render the general population more inclined to peace and obedience. If all this could be effected without endangering the Hanoverian cause, or giving the Pretender any important advantage; if the two contending Scotch armies could go on damaging and destroying each other without yielding a clear superiority to the Jacobites; if, in short, the campaign were made up of exterminating fights, which yet were only drawn battles, and if then adequate reinforcements were sent from England to decide at once the dynastic struggle and crush the Jacobite rebellion, immense advantage would result to the English government at the same time that the insurrection was suppressed. Unquestionably, the Duke of Argyll was both hated and feared, if not by the house of Hanover and King George individually, yet by the ministerial champions of the Hanoverian cause; and it is not less certain that the support and encouragement afforded him by the government were far from being cordial or timely, as if they had been desirous of failure and ruin for the Scotch resistance against the Jacobite enterprise, and anxious to demonstrate the necessity of English intervention for its final suppression.

The insurgents began to fear that if they remained longer at Perth they would be forthwith surrounded and attacked by Argyll's army, whilst they were in no condition to meet the onset. The leaders in the camp deliberated on the measures to be taken for preventing, if possible, the march of the royal forces northwards. They had reason to believe that the duke would not be hindered by the season, unless they could continue to subject him and his troops to its severest inclemencies, by removing every shelter, as well as fuel and provisions, from the districts through which he must march. They did not scruple to adopt this extreme step, which was sure to involve in manifold miseries all the unoffending inhabitants of those districts, old and young, women and children.

* A pamphlet in the Advocate's Library, quoted in "Burton's History."

Destructive tactics of Mar's army.

Warrants were accordingly issued for desolating all the country which lay between them and the duke, and for "burning and destroying" every village, "with the houses, cows, and forage." The inhabitants, from the new-born babe to the aged and infirm, were to be driven out by fire from under every roof which had sheltered them, to the merciless storms of a winter's sky. All the food that could be found was also to be destroyed; and these terrible sufferings of famine and cold were to be inflicted on the entire population, in order that Argyll's soldiers might be prevented from approaching or pursuing the insurgents, by the want of all shelter and food. This severe measure was carried into effect, and the villages which lay between "the slopes of the Ochils and the Grampians," along with Crieff, Muthill, and Auchterarder, were completely destroyed by fire, and the inhabitants driven forth to experience all the severity of cold and hunger. The scenes of outrage and suffering were worthy of the savages employed in the work; and the Chevalier, whose natural disposition was by no means cruel, seems to have repented of lending his sanction to the barbarous proceeding. He endeavoured to throw off the blame not only from himself, but also from his followers and troops, and to fasten the entire responsibility upon the supporters of the Hanoverian dynasty. "It was, indeed," he says in a letter to the Duke of Argyll, "forced upon me by the violence with which my rebellious subjects acted against me, and what they as the authors of it must be answerable for, not I."

The Prince promises compensation. he promised the unhappy sufferers was more creditable to his head and heart than such an apology. He issued a warrant, dated 26th January, calling upon all who had suffered from the burning to send in estimates of their losses, and assuring them that these should be fully made up; but Mar, who countersigned the document, did nothing to carry it into effect, and the Prince's promises of redress appears to have remained unfulfilled. Mar himself had, indeed, professed to burn the villages and their provisions with the greatest reluctance and grief; but, as has been well remarked, "it was not in ruined villages or starving wanderers to touch a heart so hardened with selfish ambition." Before quitting the country, however, the Chevalier left a sum of money in the hands of General Gordon, with injunctions that whatever was not needed for the subsistence of the troops should be given to the relief of the inhabitants of the burned villages; but there is no evidence that any portion of this money ever reached the persons for whom it was intended.

Argyll, on being reinforced, proceeded to set about his final operations for crushing the insurrection. He sent detachments to clear Burntis-land, and other towns on the Fife coast, of the rebels, who offered a stubborn resistance until the attacks upon them by land were seconded by an overpowering fire from the government vessels of war in the Forth. After the arrival of artillery from Berwick, the duke, on the 21st of January, made his first movement towards the north, Argyll advanced northward.

General Guest, at the head of a battalion of dragoons, marching in advance, to ascertain whether or not an army could force its way through districts where the snow lay several feet in depth. Assistance was obtained from the country people in the difficult task of clearing the roads for the march of the main body. It was only on the 29th that the whole army set out. The progress was slow, and the night of the 30th was spent in the roofless village of Auchterarder. On the 28th, the Jacobites in the camp at Perth had been apprised by their scouts of Argyll's approach; and a council was summoned, which sat day and night deliberating, or rather divided councils in the rebel camp.

wrangling in hopeless variance, about the steps to be taken. The Highlanders eagerly desired to wait for Argyll's approach and give him battle. Their chiefs argued that, weak as the defences of Perth were, yet the frost and snow would contribute greatly to strengthen them, since it was impossible for Argyll to throw up the necessary field-works during the rigour of the season. The defenders, it was maintained, would fight under cover, whereas the besiegers must carry on their operations without any shelter. Mar, however, as might have been expected, saw clearly that the attempt to maintain their position against the overwhelming force of the royalists, was certain to involve the whole army in ruin. He called a council of war on the evening of the 29th, and represented to his officers the impossibility of holding out the town against the expected assault of the enemy. The failure of the projected invasion of England by the Duke of Ormond, the powerful reinforcements which the Duke of Argyll had received from the continent, together with the great diminution of their own forces, rendered it necessary that they should abandon the enterprise. The truth of these statements could not be gainsaid, and the council accordingly resolved to retreat to some point farther north, where they could more advantageously make a stand, or take refuge among the hills, if this should be deemed expedient. The resolution to retreat excited great indignation among the common soldiers. Some of them loaded the principal officers with abuse, and even proposed that they should take the prince out of the hands of his present advisers, and, with him at their head, renew the struggle for the crown. "What would you have your officers to do?" inquired one of them in perplexity. "Do?" was the indignant reply; "what did you call us to take arms for? was it to run away? What did the king come hither for? was it to see his people butchered by hangmen, and not strike a stroke for their lives?"

Let us die like men, and not like dogs!" These angry protests, however, were of no avail, and many of the Highlanders, on seeing that there was to be no fighting, resolved that they would retreat according to their own fashion; and desertions now took place daily by hundreds. On the 30th of January—which by a curious coincidence was the anniversary of the martyrdom of the Pretender's grandfather, Charles I.—the insurgents began their retreat. Crossing the river Tay, which was now so thickly covered with ice as to bear both horse and man, they marched along the Carse of Gowrie to Dundee, and then to Montrose, which they reached on the 3rd of February. On the evening of the 4th, the unfortunate Prince, in compliance with the urgent recommendations of his officers, reluctantly consented to take refuge on the Continent; and without bidding farewell

James and Mar retire to France.

to his army, or giving them any hint of his departure, he walked by a private lane to the shore, where, in company with Mar, he entered a boat which quietly and quickly conveyed him to a French vessel in the harbour. He embarked in this ship, along with some of the principal persons of his suite, and, immediately setting sail, they landed safely seven days after near Gravelines. It is alleged that Mar expressed a strong desire to remain behind, and share the fortunes of the army; but he was overruled by the Chevalier, who was of opinion that his deserted forces would, in his absence, more easily make terms with the government.

As soon as the insurgents were made aware of the flight of the prince and their general, many of them immediately quitted the army, and sought refuge among the Grampian Hills. The remainder, amounting to little more than a thousand men, were conducted by General Gordon to Aberdeen, which they reached on the 6th of February. Here he opened the sealed paper of instructions, which he had received from the Chevalier before his departure, and found that he was requested to inform his followers that the disappointments the prince had met with had obliged him reluctantly to leave the country; that he thanked him for their faithful services, assured them that he would continue to watch over their welfare, and recommended them to keep together in a body until General Gordon should order them to disperse. After reading this document, Gordon informed them that after that day their pay would cease.

Final dispersion of the insurgents.

They quitted Aberdeen on the 7th; and next day the Duke of Argyll, who had followed close on their footsteps, entered the town at the head of four hundred dragoons. The main body of the insurgents marched westwards through Morayshire and up Strathspey into the wilds of Badenoch, where they quietly dispersed. But a party of about a hundred gentlemen took the route to Peterhead, where they found some vessels which conveyed them to France. Another party of about a hundred and sixty officers and gentlemen volunteers, including Lord Duffus, Sir George Sinclair, Sir David Thriepland, and General Ecline, subsequently quitted the hills where they had taken refuge, and, passing through the low country of Moray, took boat at Burghead, and crossed the Moray Frith to Caithness. This gallant band afterwards proceeded to the Orkney Islands, where they found a French vessel, which conveyed them to Gottenburgh. Here they received a cordial welcome from the Swedish king, and most of them entered into his service. Thus ended the rebellion of 1715.*

For some time before the final suppression of Mar's enterprise, the question was often anxiously considered throughout the country, what punishment would be inflicted upon those who had been implicated in its rise or progress? and what was to be done with the many hundreds of rebels who had been taken prisoners at Preston and Sheriffmuir, and were now in confinement waiting their trial? It was feared by those who were acquainted with the policy of the Hanoverian government, and with the personal character of the monarch, that terrible severities would precede a general amnesty, and that the extreme vengeance of the law would be allowed an ample range ere the royal mercy would intervene. It was not likely, nor perhaps was it proper, that the insurgents, on laying down their arms, should be treated as mere prisoners of war—for there is a wide difference between a foreign war and a rebellion at home. In the former case, when the sword has been sheathed, common magnanimity requires from the conqueror as unconditional a release of prisoners as can be made by the vanquished. But when an armed insurrection has been overthrown and crushed, its leaders and followers are, and should be, in the eyes of government something more than defeated antagonists, who, on submitting themselves, may be forgiven and received into friendly relations. They have been guilty of treason and rebellion; and a due regard to the future stability of the government, and the peace of the country, demand that their crimes should not go unpunished. If traitors and rebels were to be treated as unfortunate, rather than as criminal, national institutions and interests would be continually endangered by insurrections; and there would be no end to the schemes of wild ambition, turbulence, and discontent. Still, the Jacobite enterprise of 1715 had not a few peculiarities calculated to obtain for several of its leaders, and for the main body of their followers, an exemption from the vengeful operation of the law against high-treason; whilst such an intervention of royal mercy would have been conducive to the stability, or at least to the tranquillity, of Hanoverian rule. Not that the weak and unprincipled leader of the insurrection, who ought to have had his eyes open to all the miseries which it would entail upon his countrymen at large, as well as upon his own followers, was entitled to any relaxation of that punishment which the law awarded to his crime. Had Mar fallen into the hands of government, it might have been difficult even for such a humane Scotchman as Duncan Forbes, to show reasons for the exemption of the Jacobite leader from the extreme penalty of treason. Widely different, however, was the position of many of his companions in the enterprise, including all the ignorant clansmen who formed the rank and file of the insurgent forces. The Highlanders followed their chiefs, according to their use and wont, without hesitation. The conduct of their leaders, too, is capable of palliation. The Revolution settlement was but recent, and the Hanoverian dynasty still more so; and as the expulsion of the Stewarts was carried professedly by the voice of the nation, a new struggle, in which the question of sovereignty should be tried and tested again, was resolved upon by the party that had formerly been defeated. The ungenerous, if not positively unfair treatment which Scotland was experiencing at the hands of the British government, seemed to justify an attempt to overturn the existing order of things which, though but of yesterday, and without any deep root in the affections of the people, had inflicted upon the nation extensive injury and disgrace. In Scotland, moreover, the Hanoverian dynasty appeared weak and unprotected, and wanting in those formidable resources and displays which are calculated to overawe incipient insurrection. Hence a rebellion promised to command speedy and entire success; and success, it is known, turns a rebellion into a guiltless and patriotic revolution. But, apart from these peculiar circumstances, which form a strong apology for the rising of 1715, sound policy required the government, after the suppression of the rebellion, to be merciful rather than severe towards the rebels. This view was strenuously urged by the ablest and most sincere friends of the Hanoverian cause to be found in Scotland. The foremost of these was the celebrated Duncan Forbes, who earnestly remonstrated against the infliction of excessive severities on the rebels as mischievous and suicidal. He predicted that extensive executions and forfeitures of titles and estates would alienate his countrymen of all classes from the new dynasty, and lay the foundation of another rebellion. But the government disregarded such representations and appeals, and proceeded to put the law against treason into immediate operation. As the rebels punished were for the most part exclusively Scottish, the king and his ministers, in carrying out their vindictive proceedings, appeared to be animated by hostility to Scotland, rather than by the love of justice.

* Patten's Hist. of the Rebellion of 1715; Rae's Hist.; The Last Earl of Derwentwater, in Chambers's Miscellany, by the Editor; Letters about the Occurrences on the way to and at Preston; Collection of Original Letters and Authentic Papers relating to the Rebellion; Lancashire Memorials.

The Preston prisoners were the first to suffer. Lord Charles Murray, Captain Dalzell, brother to the Earl of Carnwath, Captain Philip Lockhart, Major Nairne, Ensign Erskine, and Captain Shaftoe, an Englishman, were tried by court-martial, and, having been proved to have been officers in the service of the government, were condemned to be shot. Captain Dalzell pleaded that not only had he resigned his commission, but the vacancy had been filled up; and Lord Charles Murray, in addition to a similar defence, proved that he had received no pay whilst in the Jacobite service. The lives of both were spared; but the others suffered on the 2nd of December, 1715. The rank and file who had been captured at Preston were brought to trial in Liverpool, a city specially distinguished for its attachment to the Hanoverian dynasty. Sentence of death was passed upon a large number, of whom twenty-two were executed at Manchester and Preston. A considerable portion of those who thus endured the extreme penalty of the law, must have belonged to the humblest class, as they have the description of "labourer" affixed to their names. The execution of such men, in the circumstances of the case, was equally impolitic and cruel. The remainder of the prisoners taken at Preston, amounting to upwards of seven hundred, and consisting for the most part of Highlanders, submitted to the king's mercy, and were sold as slaves to some West India merchants, and transported to the plantations.

On the day of the opening of parliament (January 9, 1716) Mr. Lechmore, an influential member of the House of Commons, after a long and vehement speech, in which he descanted upon the guilt of the insurgents and the "many miraculous providences" which had baffled their designs, moved to impeach Lords Derwentwater, Widdrington, Nithsdale, Winton, Carnwath, Kenmure, and Nairne, of high-treason. No opposition was offered, and the impeachment was carried up to the lords on the same day. On the next day the accused were brought to the bar of the house, to hear the articles of impeachment read. On the 19th they were again placed at the bar, when they all pleaded guilty except the Earl of Winton, who had further time allowed him to prepare his answers. On the 9th of February the impeached lords once more appeared in Westminster Hall, and were condemned to suffer death as traitors, according to the ancient and barbarous form of the law, but the sentence was afterwards mitigated, and orders were issued that they should be merely beheaded.

Great interest was made with the court and both houses of parliament in behalf of the condemned noblemen. The royal clemency was repeatedly implored by their wives; but the king turned away from them with contemptuous indifference. Appeals were made to the cupidity, as well as to the compassion, of his majesty's ministers; and Sir Robert Walpole declared in the House of Commons that £60,000 had been offered to him if he would obtain the pardon of the Earl of Derwentwater. Several of the staunchest Whigs in the house, among others, Sir Richard Steele, were inclined to mercy; but Walpole, though usually distinguished by personal lenity and forbearance, took the lead in urging measures of severity, and moved the adjournment of the house till the 1st of March, it being understood that the condemned noblemen would be executed in the interval, but he carried his motion only by a majority of seven.

In the upper house, however, a still more effectual stand was made on the side of mercy. A petition craving the intercession of the lords was presented from the condemned noblemen, and was supported by the Earl of Nottingham, president of the council. This unexpected defection from the ministerial ranks made the resistance of the government unavailing, and an address to the king, praying that he would relieve such of the condemned lords as should deserve his mercy, was carried by a majority of five. This result surprised and alarmed the ministers, who met in council the same evening, and drew up the king's answer to the address, stating that "on this and all other occasions he would do what he thought most convenient with the dignity of his crown and the safety of his people." The Earl of Nottingham, together with his brother, Lord Aylesford, and Lord Finch, his son, was removed from —three of office. It was resolved, however, them relieved. to comply with the feeling and opinion of the House of Lords, so far as to respite the Earl of Carnwath and Lords Widdrington and Nairne, but, to prevent any further interference, the three remaining peers were ordered for execution Escape of Lord next morning. The same evening, however, Lord Nithsdale escaped out of the Tower in female disguise, through the agency of his heroic wife. The king, on being told next morning of his escape, observed, "It was the best thing a man in his condition could have done."*

The number of noble victims was thus finally reduced to two, the English Lord Derwentwater and the Scottish Lord Kenmure, and at an early hour on the morning of the 24th of February they were brought to the scaffold on Tower Hill. Lord Derwentwater was first conducted to the fatal spot. He was observed to turn very pale as he ascended the steps, but his voice was firm and his demeanour steady and composed. He passed some time in prayer, and then requested permission to read a paper he had drawn up, which was readily granted to him. In this paper he declared that he now repented of having pleaded guilty at his trial; that he never owned any other but King James III. for his rightful and lawful sovereign, whom he had an inclination to serve from his infancy; and that he hoped his death might contribute to the service of his king and country, and the re-establishment of the ancient fundamental constitution of these kingdoms. After reading this paper he turned to the block, and viewed it closely, and finding a rough place in it that might hurt his neck, he desired the executioner to chip it off; he then knelt down and prayed fervently, then rising up, he pulled off his coat and waistcoat, and, fitting his head to the block, told the executioner that upon his repeating for the third time the sentence "Lord Jesus receive my spirit!" he was to perform his office. At these words, accordingly, the executioner raised his axe, and severed the earl's head from his body at one blow. This unfortunate nobleman was only in his twenty-eighth year at the time of his death.

In a few minutes after Lord Kenmure mounted the scaffold, and suffered the penalty of the law with heroic resolution. He made no speech and delivered no paper, but merely expressed his regret, like Lord Derwentwater, for pleading guilty to the charge of high-treason, and prayed for "King James." Shortly after his death a letter, which he had written to the Chevalier, was published, in which he maintained the title of "the person called the Pretender, whom he believed to be the true son of James II.," and declared that he died for his faithful services to him.*

The trial of the Earl of Winton was postponed till the 16th of March. Through- The Earl of Winton's escape. two days, this eccentric nobleman preserved a manly and dignified bearing. He repudiated the charge of being a traitor, though he admitted that he had joined the Jacobite army; but he stoutly maintained that he had been driven to take this step by the treatment which, without any provocation, he had received from royalist officers. "To his great misfortune," he pleaded, "he could not be quiet or safe in his closest retirement; for many persons, both officers and others, of the militia of the shire of Lothian, under the specious pretence of serving the government, but in reality actuated by private pique and revenge, several times, contrary to law, forcibly entered by night into his dwelling-house, called Seton Palace, rifled it, turned his servants out of doors, and carried away the provisions of his family. The most sacred places did not escape their fury and resentment. They broke into his chapel, defaced the monuments of his ancestors, took up the stones of their sepulchres, thrust irons through their bodies, and treated them in a most barbarous, inhuman, and unchristian-like manner."† As might have been expected, the earl was found guilty and condemned to death, but availing himself of his mechanical skill, he sawed through with great ingenuity the bars of the window of his prison, and made his escape. He ended his chequered life at Rome in 1749, and with him terminated the main branch of the long and illustrious line of the Seton family.

* State Trials, vol. xv.

† State Trials, vol. xv. p. 824. "The edifice," says Mr. Burton, "here alluded to, still a beautiful fragment of early pointed Gothic, stands as the last relic of the magnificence of Seton Palace."

* State Trials, vol. xv.

In the beginning of April a commission for trying the other rebels met in the Court of Common Pleas, when bills of high-treason were found against Mr. Forster, Brigadier Mackintosh, Colonel Oxburgh, Mr. Menzies of Culdares, and eighteen of their associates. Forster escaped from Newgate on the 10th of April by means of false keys, and reached Calais in safety. The trials of the other prisoners were fixed for the 4th of May, but about eleven o'clock the preceding night Brigadier Mackintosh, with fifteen of his companions, broke out of Newgate, after knocking down the keeper and turnkey, and disarming the sentinels. Eight were retaken, not knowing how to thread their way through the complicated streets, or where to find refuge; but old Borlum, and seven others, made their escape. The government proceeded with the trial of those who remained. A considerable number were found guilty, and Colonel Oxburgh and Mr. Paul, a nonjuring clergyman, with three others, were hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn. By virtue of an act of grace passed in 1717, the Earl of Carnwath, and Lords Widdrington and Nairne, were released from the Tower; the other prisoners confined in Newgate, and in the castles of Lancaster, Carlisle, Edinburgh, and Stirling, including Lords Strathallan and Rollo, were set at liberty at the same time.

Before this act was passed, however, the government had incurred great and deserved odium by appointing a commission of Oyer and Terminer to sit at Carlisle about the close of 1716, for the trial of the Scottish prisoners confined in the castles of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Blackness. This proceeding drew forth the indignant reprobation of all Scotchmen, including even those who were the firm supporters of the Hanoverian dynasty, as well as cordial advocates of the union. Those prisoners, eighty-nine in number, were removed from the fortresses in which they had been originally confined, and were lodged in Edinburgh Castle to await their trial. Their transference to England, when the offences charged against them had been committed in their own land, was bitterly condemned throughout Scotland as illegal in character and vindictive in aim. A subscription, to which many ardent Hanoverians, including even government officials, contributed, was at once raised in the north, to provide the ablest counsel for the prisoners, who had been hurried away by a troop of soldiers from the independent jurisdiction of their own country. Some distinguished members of the Scottish bar attended the Carlisle assizes, to watch the proceedings against their countrymen, and to volunteer assistance to their English counsel. To the allegation that the treaty of union had been violated by the removal of the prisoners from Scottish jurisdiction, it was replied for government, that an act of parliament empowered them to try the rebels wherever it was most convenient. This act, however, had been framed with an exclusive reference to England, and for the purpose of relieving Lancashire from the extraordinary number of untried prisoners who crowded its dungeons; and the knowledge of this circumstance only increased the indignation felt throughout Scotland, since it showed that trials could not be transferred even from one county to another in England without a special act of parliament to legalise this step, while a large body of prisoners had been removed from Scotland and its independent jurisdiction to undergo trial at Carlisle, altogether in the face of the treaty of union between the two kingdoms, and without the shadow of a sanction from the British legislature. The English lawyers, it is believed, were led—whether or not from the representations of their Scottish brethren—to hesitate about the propriety, if not the safety, of subjecting to capital punishment prisoners brought into England in such a manner. Thirty-six were discharged without a trial, on the ground of want of evidence. Twenty-five pleaded guilty, and had sentence of death pronounced upon them, but not one was ever brought to execution. Several appear, however, to have been transported to the plantations.

The grace of the Act of Indemnity seems to have been considerably marred, either by the number of exceptions specified, or by the difficulties placed in the way of taking advantage of the security which it provided; for we find that a year after the passing of the act, prosecutions were instituted in Scotland against several who had been concerned in the "rising" of 1715. A commission of Oyer and Terminer was sent to the north, accompanied by lawyers and officials from England, to explain and superintend the operation of the English law of treason, which had been but recently extended to Scotland, and was there a novelty far from welcome. The court was opened at Perth on the 17th of September, 1718, but the bills presented there against "Fullarton of that ilk," and one Fairbairn, who had been printer in the service of the Jacobite army, were ignored. At Dundee the commission was equally unsuccessful. At Cupar true bills are said to have been found against Lord George Murray, Sir James Sharpe (the representative of the notorious archbishop of that name), Sir David Thriepand of Fingask, and the son of More of Stonywood; but for some reason or other they were dropped at this stage. At Kelso all the bills presented were ignored. Government soon saw how hopeless it was to reach the rebels in Scotland by means of the new treason law imported from England.*

* Burton, vol. ii. pp. 218, 219.

CHAPTER LX.

GEORGE THE FIRST AND SECOND.

A.D. 1716—1736.

SCOTLAND had scarcely become tranquil when the Aggressive de- government, in some way which sign of the has never yet been explained, ob- King of Sweden. tained intelligence of the hostile designs of the King of Sweden, who had threatened to deal with the British monarch as he had successfully done with Augustus of Poland. The restless and daring Swede—many of whose past enterprises would have been deemed mad had they not, contrary to all expectation but his own, been successful—conceived a project more audacious than any that he had yet undertaken; and with insane rashness he vowed to drive George I. and the Hanoverian race from the throne of Britain, and to bring back the exiled Stewarts in the plenitude of their ancient rights and prerogatives. Certain information about this aggressive undertaking, and about the intrigues of the Swedish ambassador in London to secure the assistance of the Jacobites, had reached the British cabinet; and the ministers resolved upon prompt measures. The conduct of Count Gyllenberg, as ambassador from Sweden at the English court, was a flagrant violation of international law; and the government did not scruple to resort to such proceedings against him as nothing but the enormity of his offence could have justified. On the night of the 29th of January (1716) the count's residence in London was unexpectedly surrounded by a military force under General Wade, who proceeded to carry out his secret instructions. Entering the house, and desiring to be at once conducted to the count, he found the ambassador busy among his papers. These the general forthwith seized upon, and summoned in a detachment of his soldiers to secure the person of the count, and to assist in the search for further documents. Madame Gyllenberg refused to unlock a cabinet, which had attracted the general's suspicions, though she assured him that it only held a quantity of linen and plate; but on his breaking it open, he discovered papers which, beyond all doubt, demonstrated the complicity of the Swedish ambassador and his royal master in a treacherous movement against the Hanoverian dynasty, and completely justified the unceremonious and violent proceedings instituted by the government. Amongst the documents was a correspondence between the count and Baron Gortz regarding "a design to raise a rebellion in his majesty's dominions, to be supported by a force from Sweden."* The principal papers were published by order of the British government, both as a vindication of the very unusual step taken against a foreign ambassador, and as a note of warning to the nation to hold itself prepared for rebellion at home combined with aggression from abroad. Not that there was much to be dreaded from Charles of Sweden, who, in a contest with his old enemies, was now experiencing such a series of disasters as might well deter him from adding to the list of his mortal foes the powerful government of Britain. He was besides without resources for the invasion he had projected, and to this fact his wily agent, Baron Gortz, could not shut his eyes. The baron says in one of his letters, "The only thing I see wanting for our purpose are men-of-war and transports"—a rather serious want in the prospect of conducting an invasion!* But such considerations might not have deterred the daring and indomitable Swede from an enterprise on which his heart was set, especially when he anticipated an alliance with Peter the Great, who could easily supply what was wanted. The Earl of Mar had a near relative belonging to the czar's household, and standing high in the imperial favour—a physician of the name of Erskine—who was to use all his influence in promoting a league between the Swedish and Russian monarchs for the overthrow of King George of England, and the restoration of the Stewarts. A cannon-ball, however, put an end to the ambitious and wild career of Charles of Sweden, and to the projected invasion of Britain; and thus was left, "to point a moral and adorn a tale," the name at which our country was disquieted, and "the world grew pale."

A foreign priest took, however, the place of the slain monarch in furnishing grounds of uneasiness, if not of apprehension, to the Hanoverian government, and to their supporters throughout the country; but the designs of Alberoni, who had conspired to overthrow the regency of the Duke of Orleans, with a view to promote the union of France and Spain, were detected in time to be effectually frustrated. The regent was naturally led to regard Britain as the more eligible ally, to discountenance the pretensions of the Stewart race, and to join the quadruple league against Spain. To this country the Jacobites as naturally began to turn for friendship and help. The Duke of Ormond had been summoned from France by the cardinal to attend a conference at Madrid, and he went, accompanied by two young Scotchmen, the Earl-Marischal and his brother, subsequently known as Marshal Keith. France and Spain being at war, the three travellers were compelled to exercise the greatest caution and care in disguising their movements and motives. They appear, however, to have taken no part in arranging the project, to the accomplishment of which they were to devote themselves; it was committed to them in a matured shape by its

* Gortz, when explaining how the invasion was to be carried on, says—"We were to carry with us a sufficient train of artillery, arms for ten or twelve thousand men more, with requisite stores of ammunition. We were to land at the places whither we should be directed, so that we should have carried with us all that is necessary for acting except horses, which we expected to find in the country."
—Letters, p. 62.

author, the cardinal. The Duke of Ormond was to land in England with such military forces and supplies as the Spanish treasury, then in an exhausted condition, could provide. The Keiths were anxious to procure from Spain four thousand stand of arms and ten thousand pistols, but had to be satisfied with only a half of that complement. Six companies of foot-soldiers were to be included in the expedition to cover the landing. The younger Keith was appointed to the difficult and dangerous duty of conveying secret intelligence of the enterprise to all the exiled Jacobites scattered over the French dominions, and of obtaining their energetic co-operation. He consulted with Seaforth, Tullibardine, Campbell of Glanderule, and other leading men among the refugees of Scotland; and at length, with these associates, he set sail for Havre, on the 19th of March, 1719, in a vessel of only twenty-five tons, which, after very narrowly escaping capture by the English men-of-war that were waiting for the appearance of the larger force under the Duke of Ormond, safely reached Stornaway, where the Earl-Marischal, with his friends and forces from Spain, had already arrived. Unpleasant differences prevailed in the company to which the earl was attached. Alberoni had always intended to entrust his lordship with the command of the expedition, but Tullibardine showed a commission in his favour, signed by the Chevalier himself, at a time when the invasion by Charles of Sweden was confidently expected. Tullibardine took the chief command of the men; but Marischal refused to relinquish that charge over the vessels which he had received from Alberoni.

It had been settled that the invading forces were to effect a landing on the west coast, the invaders— and afterwards march upon Inverness, which, being occupied by an insufficient garrison, could offer little resistance, and which, moreover, would be a natural centre for the rallying of the various clans that had taken part in the late rebellion. Their dissensions and mutual animosities, however, had occasioned a ruinous delay; and King George's ministers were both apprised of their design in all its details, and prepared summarily to crush it. In the middle of May, a period long after the time that had been fixed upon, the landing took place on the shore of the lonely Loch Alsh. When the men had disembarked with the stores, the vessels returned to Spain. The invaders began operations by fortifying a position for themselves near one of the inner windings of the loch, and by taking possession of the fortalice of the Mackenzies, Island Donald Castle, a stronghold which they hoped would be as impregnable as it had been for centuries of Highland warfare. It was not proof, however, against modern artillery, and the fire of three government vessels, which had entered the loch, quickly demolished it. The invading force already landed, including Spaniards and Scotchmen, amounted to fifteen hundred men, who encamped in Glenshiel. On hearing that the main expedition had been overtaken and scattered by a storm, and on seeing the small probability of the clans rallying again around the standard of the Pretender, they appear to have lost all spirit and energy. General Wightman, at the head of sixteen hundred men, alongside of whom also were detachments from those clans that were on the government side, such as the Frasers, Munroes, and Sutherlands, advanced westward from Inverness in the beginning of June. On the 11th he came within sight of the Jacobite position in Glenshiel, and found it of such a formidable character, that, as he confesses in his despatches, he hesitated about giving the invaders battle on ground so very advantageous to them. He determined, however, to come to an immediate issue with them, and had the sagacity to order a detachment of his troops farther up the mountain, to harass the enemy from above during the main attack, which commenced at five o'clock. The fight continued for upwards of three hours, the enemy struggling to keep their ground with an obstinacy quite unusual in Highland forces when failing of victory in the first onset and collision. Neither side at the close could claim a clear superiority; but in the Jacobite camp it was resolved on the following day that the Spaniards should surrender as prisoners of war, whilst the Highlanders should quietly take themselves off and disperse to their homes, as they easily could do across the mountains, where pursuit by the government troops was quite impracticable. Lords Seaforth and Tullibardine, though wounded, were assisted by friends to make their escape. The loss in Wightman's force consisted of twenty-one men slain, and twelve wounded—a very inconsiderable drawback from the satisfaction of conducting to Edinburgh two hundred and seventy-four Spanish prisoners.

It would be uninteresting to follow the Scottish refugees and their master throughout their petty intrigues, wranglings, jealousies, and ambitious aims on the continent, though the mock court of the Pretender was characterised by the peculiar vices, passions, and follies which at that time invariably haunted the circle within which a de facto sovereign luxuriously and tyrannically spent his days. Lord Stair, the British ambassador in France, had prevailed upon the Regent Orleans, not only to withdraw all encouragement from James's pretensions, but also to order the Pretender to leave France, and to reside elsewhere, so that he and his party might have fewer opportunities of harassing the Hanoverian government. It was the regent's policy to be on good terms with that government, though he was also desirous of having a claimant for the British throne at hand, with whom, in the event of a rupture between the French and English governments, he might menace the latter. Lord Stair succeeded in extorting a stipulation that the Pretender should henceforth reside beyond the Alps, and never in any circumstances whatever be allowed to set his foot on the French soil. Accordingly, the Jacobite court was established in Italy, the classic province of Albano having been chosen by James as the place of his retreat.

The Stewart court transferred to Italy.

Amongst the refugees who constituted the court of the exiled family, there were some who were guilty not only of desertion, but of treachery. The Earl of Mar was the chief culprit, as his previous character and conduct might have led us to expect. His associate, Lockhart, accuses him of having embezzled £2000—a sum which had, with the greatest difficulty, been raised by the Jacobites for the promotion of their common cause. He seems also to have held communications with Sunderland, the British minister, and to have proposed a strange plan for enlarging the continental dominions of the Elector of Hanover, provided the restoration of Great Britain to the Stewarts were conceded. The details of Mar's interviews with Lord Stair during the period of the latter's embassy in France, have not fully transpired; but they suffice to prove that the Jacobite leader was a traitor to the cause he had sworn to maintain, and that self-aggrandisement was his only principle. So important were his services to the Hanoverian dynasty that the government paid him an allowance which, along with the jointure to his wife from his forfeited estates, realised more than £3000 of annual income. It is not improbable that he would also have received a pardon, if that could have been effected without an act of parliament; still, in many respects, he stood almost as well as if his loyalty to the reigning monarch had been untainted. It is not surprising that the other Jacobite exiles regarded the special favours bestowed upon Mar by the British government as unequivocal proofs that he had basely gone over to the winning side, and betrayed as well as deserted his former associates. He endeavoured to remove such suspicions by the assurance that the Hanoverian favours were granted to secure nothing more than his neutrality in the contest between the two rival dynasties; and he had the effrontery to represent to the Jacobite court his perfect willingness to evade the easy conditions imposed on him by the government, and to cheat King George by continuing to serve King James with undiminished, though well-disguised activity and zeal. The most decisive proof of his treachery

“The Memorial,” was to be found in a state-paper which he laid before the French regent. This document, entitled “the Memorial,” professed to set forth a scheme for the entire and permanent subjugation of Britain by France; but the Jacobites indignantly saw in it an ingenious artifice for rendering the Stewart family hateful to the British people, and for effectually alienating from them and their cause all British sympathy. The project, framed towards the close of 1723, ostensibly aimed at the reduction and humiliation of the power of England by dismembering both Ireland and Scotland, and restoring these as independent kingdoms. Irish and Scottish parliaments, it was urged in the paper, would invariably support France against the English government and legislature, and repeal all old treaties which had become obnoxious across the channel. The whole scheme was to be carried into effect by a powerful French army co-operating with the Jacobite forces. The invaders, it was arranged, were, after their conquest of Britain, not to quit the country until the new constitution of each of the three separate kingdoms had been established in all its details, and put into regular and easy operation. The Jacobites at once believed that Mar's design, in devising this project of securing French predominance and British subserviency, and in attempting to gain for it the Chevalier's sanction, was to render the latter intensely unpopular in Britain, where the idea of coming under the French yoke would not for a moment be tolerated. James, however, not only withheld his approbation from the proposal, but did not even acknowledge the receipt of “the Memorial.”

Mar was subsequently superseded, as leading adviser in the Jacobite court, by Colonel Hay, brother of Lord Kinnoull, who received from the Chevalier the title of Earl of Inverness. This new minister's influence and honours were traced, by court gossip, to the charms and easy virtue of his wife. What-ever truth there may have been in this report, and in the picture of the Chevalier's court, which it furnishes of the immorality of the circle of friends and agents around the exiled prince, it must be remembered that the unfavourable impressions of Jacobite morals originated with, and were propagated by, the members of the Jacobite court. The Chevalier's best friends in Scotland were grievously annoyed by such rumours, and on the prince's marriage with the Princess Clementina Sobieski they hoped that he would be rescued from the snares of the dissolute of either sex, and become the head of a household too pure to encourage the vicious practices of his court. James, however, proved himself a genuine Stewart in morals, as in despotic principles; and his wife, after giving birth to two sons, was glad to escape from daily outrages of which she had unavailingly complained, and to take refuge in a nunnery. It was natural that the Jacobites in Britain should be strongly dissatisfied with the conduct of their master and his advisers, as creating such formidable obstacles in the way of his restoration to the throne of his ancestors. Lockhart proposed the appointment of an executive in Scotland to represent the exiled monarch, and named the individuals whom he deemed worthy of the responsibility. James, however, returned an equivocal answer, and expressed his desire that his Scottish supporters should, without receiving a regular commission, continue to act for, and to watch over, his interests. Lockhart was pleased

Executive commission for Scotland.

T. W. Hunt.

JOHN DUKE OF ARGYLL & GREENWICH.

1678 — 1743.

From the Original by Kneller, in the Collection of the Hon. G. A. Ellis.

to accept this wish as equivalent to a commission for the men whom he had recommended, and proceeded to set them to work as authorised officials. They were at a loss what to do about the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, which the government of George I. had resolved to exact strictly; and definite instructions were solicited from the court in Italy; but James, knowing that it would be madness to command them, in existing circumstances, to resist the government, yet, unwilling to recommend them formally to abjure all his rights of sovereignty, and acknowledge those of the usurper, refrained from sending any reply, or giving the least sanction from himself to the advice which his courtiers forwarded to Scotland.

It is time to revert to the Duke of Argyll, Ingratitude of through whose instrumentality the government the rebellion had been crushed, and to Argyll. who had done more both for the Protestant and the Hanoverian settlement, as accepted throughout Scotland, than any other statesman or general. The unworthy recompence of his invaluable exertions in the council and the field was—deprivation of all the offices he held under government. This unceremonious and unjust dismissal of the duke provoked and alarmed his countrymen, who took every constitutional method of showing that they entertained a very different opinion regarding Argyll's merits and claims. They came forward with votes of fervent thanks to the dishonoured patriot, as the man who had annihilated the Jacobite enterprise, and saved the country from the horrors of restored tyranny and popery. His fall was generally ascribed to the humanity which he had exhibited in the hour of victory, and to the moderation of his councils. The Jacobites at once imagined that the great Jacobite proposals. statesman would be ready to revenge the flagrant injustice with which he had been treated by the government and the House of Hanover. They believed that a man of the duke's ability and influence would not hesitate to exchange the obscurity to which he had been ungratefully doomed, for some high post in the Stewart service, which would give him an opportunity of repaying Hanoverian scorn. But they knew not the patriotism and integrity of the degraded chief, who, though deeply exasperated, refused to accede to any proposals for his espousal of the cause against which he had lately fought. According to Lockhart's account, a Colonel Hutcheson was deputed to open, on the Pretender's behalf, negotiations with Argyll, the annalist himself having assured the exiled court that the duke would accept an offer, "provided it was handsomely introduced, and dexterously managed." The diplomatist, if we may believe Lockhart, at first reported favourably of the progress he was making; but ere long the suit proved an utter failure, and the duke's conversion to Jacobitism was acknowledged to be hopeless. Lockhart, indeed, does more than insinuate that Mar contrived to meddle with and spoil the negotiations by intercepting a special communication that contained concessions from the duke, which ought to have been immediately welcomed by James. The latter, however, being kept in ignorance of Argyll's views, could not respond; and this silence provoked the yielding statesman to put an end to the correspondence, and to all the hopes of the Jacobites that the most formidable foe of their cause was about to withdraw his allegiance from the House of Hanover, and join their ranks. But the story, so far, at least, as it reports any leaning on the part of the duke to Jacobitism, or any encouragement given by him to the attempt to seduce him from his loyalty, not only requires confirmation, but is incredible. It is not improbable that serious endeavours were made by the representatives of the exiled court to tamper with the dismissed minister, though the Chevalier himself subsequently repudiated all knowledge of the design.

The Duke of Argyll, however, was, not only from his sagacity and general talents for statesmanship, but also from his paramount influence over the great body of his countrymen in the Lowlands as well as in the Highlands, too important an ally and supporter to be long neglected and kept in the shade by the Hanoverian government; and we soon find him reinstated in the favour of George I., and his court. In 1719 he became lord-steward of the household, and received a British dukedom, and these honours were but the precursors of more substantial distinctions, for in a short time, Walpole entrusted him with the government of Scotland, and made him, in reality, though not in name, viceroy of that kingdom. Whenever that celebrated statesman was dissatisfied with the duke, he bestowed his favours upon the duke's brother, Lord Ilay; hence, for some years, the Argyll family monopolised the administration of affairs in Scotland. In 1723, however, great changes took place in the management of Scottish business. Dispute about the forfeited estates. The forfeiture of the estates of the Scottish nobility and gentry who had taken part in Mar's rebellion, had, on the suppression of the enterprise, become a leading public question. A very large extent of territory in Scotland awaited the disposal of government; and how to distribute it for the public benefit involved more difficulty than would appear on a superficial consideration. The plan actually adopted inflicted many wounds on Scottish pride, and showed that the insurrection had had no salutary effect, as a warning, on the recklessly offensive character of English legislation. Parliament had passed an act entrusting the management of the affairs to a large commission, consisting of gentlemen who had the greatest parliamentary influence. The terms and purpose of the act seemed to have aimed at special popularity, for the confiscations were to be carefully regulated so as not in the least to enrich the crown, but all their produce was to go at once into the public exchequer, and from first to last to be placed beyond the reach of royal appropriation or misapplication. Yet, alongside of those provisions, there were several features in the statute which could not but displease and mortify the Scottish nation. The estates were to be disposed of as summarily as if they had been smuggled articles in the possession of officers of the revenue; whereas, according to the long-established system of land registration in Scotland, and many other definite rules for holding and transferring property, the enforcement of such a prompt procedure was utterly impracticable. There was a host of

Contest between the court of session and the commission.

creditors and others who had claims on the forfeited estates, and who applied to the Scottish officials, with whom it was usual, and,

according to the Scotch law, constitutional to lodge any such claims. A body of "receivers" had been appointed by the parliamentary commission; but they had no place or functions in the eye of the law, and the commission could invest them with none. The court of session, on the application of the claimants, granted sequestration of the estates; but the commissioners neither knew what this meant, nor had the power to revise it. Complaining that they were interfered with and utterly thwarted in the discharge of their duties by a body which called itself the court of session, and possessed an authority sufficient to nullify all their orders and decisions, the commissioners demanded from government increased powers for meeting the difficulties, and the opposition which assailed them at every step. A bill was immediately brought in to enable the commission to overcome the resistance raised in Scotland. The judges of the court of session, however, boldly came forward to vindicate and maintain in its integrity the Scottish law, of which they had the administration. They argued that, according to the treaty of union, the laws regarding property, liberty, and life in Scotland, were, along with the independence and freedom of the Scottish courts, to be preserved inviolable. The appointment of another tribunal, which, though neither recognising nor being bound by the regulations of Scottish law, should be empowered to deal authoritatively with a very large portion of the property of the country, was not, they contended, one of the alterations which the imperial parliament might from time to time legitimately and beneficially introduce. It was entirely unconstitutional, as well as in direct violation of the terms of the union. The judges also mentioned that they had never been consulted in the framing of a bill which so vitally affected law and justice in Scotland, but had only heard of its existence and character by accident, otherwise they would have been too late in appearing to Act passed by the British parliament.

protest against it. This weighty and unanswerable remonstrance did not, indeed, arrest the passing of the bill, which, though strenuously opposed by the Duke of Argyll and his brother in the House of Lords, was carried by a small majority. The act invested the commissioners with power at once to sell the estates, and meet the claims of creditors in the way followed under the bankrupt law. It annulled all the sequestrations of the court of session, and directed that those persons who "held under them" should be proceeded against in exchequer. Some concession was made, however, in allowing appeals from the proceedings of the commission to a court of delegates, which included the lords of session.

Most of the confiscated property was purchased by the York Buildings Company, with the commendable design of introducing a spirit of agricultural and commercial enterprise into districts which had been kept in a

Forfeited estates purchased by the York Buildings
Company.

neglected and semi-barbarous condition by the long reign of feudalism. This corporation, however, being English, was thwarted in its philanthropic intentions, and got involved in endless litigation. Nor did the sale of the estates contribute a large aggregate sum to the public exchequer, since from an apparent combination on the part of the Scottish gentry, the property, when exposed to sale, realised comparatively little money, especially after the burdens had been deducted. The Scottish lawyers witnessed this palpable failure with satisfaction. They had already found an excellent opportunity for exhibiting their disapprobation of the liberty which the government had taken with the venerable institutions of their country. Mr. Patrick Haldane, a Scottish country gentleman, was rewarded for his services on the forfeited estates com- Court of session resist a nominee of the crown.

mission by an appointment as a judge of the court of session in 1722; and the faculty of advocates, headed by Duncan Forbes, vehemently opposed him as a disqualified person. The objections urged against him were based on ludicrously small grounds, but they sufficed to obtain from the court of session a decision that Haldane's appointment was invalid. Angry communications were forthwith exchanged between the court and the government. The usually calm character of the Scottish bench was broken up, for on the announcement in the court of session that the House of Lords had, on the 4th of February (1723), reversed their decision; the judges were in a fury, and raged indecorously against the nominee and all his supporters. Various new charges were brought against Haldane affecting his "good fame and character;" but a class of dignitaries called the extraordinary lords of session, who had not taken their seats on the bench since the Revolution, came suddenly forward, and, by a small majority, carried a decision in Haldane's favour. The ministry, however, had the sagacity to see that an appointment carried through in the face of such an opposition would be deeply injurious to the administration of law in Scotland, and voluntarily cancelled it. They, at the same time, passed an act decreeing that the court of session should in future have no power to interfere with the nomination of a judge, except simply to examine him as to his professional qualifications, and that with the crown should rest the absolute right of appointment to a seat on the bench. This act (1723) also abolished the class of extraordinary lords of session as a relic of an obsolete system.

The measures taken by government for disarming the Highlanders shortly after the rebellion of 1715 were now declared by General Wade, who had made a tour through the north, to have been very ineffectually carried out. He reported that nothing but old and useless arms had been delivered up by the clans, and that really serviceable weapons were still possessed in great abundance by the Highlanders, who kept them concealed. In 1725 a better method was adopted to effect the disarming of the clans by summoning all to meet at a certain place, and surrender all the weapons they had in reserve, General Wade himself being present to superintend the delivery. The clans complied with great apparent cordiality: one clan alone, the Mackenzies, yielded up nearly eight hundred stand of arms; and the general described his mission as thoroughly successful, though it was subsequently proved that he had been greatly deceived by the profuse professions of loyalty which he received from the insurgent chiefs, and by their assurances that no arms were kept back. The Chevalier himself, in a letter to Lord Seaforth and other Highland chiefs, had confessed his inability to assist any movement which his friends might then project, and recommended them to make the submission required by the Hanoverian government, and to hope for better days, when they should recall an allegiance which was now extorted from them by the pressure of adverse circumstances.

A new rising projected— Bishop Atterbury, however, who was dispatched from the exiled court with this message, took it upon himself to keep it back, and set about the organization of a new enterprise to relieve the Highlanders from the Hanoverian yoke. He obtained from a source now unknown the large sum of 180,000 livres, to be expended in brandy, biscuits, and ammunition for the Jacobite forces in Scotland. Still more encouraging than this donation was the rumour that the Czar of all the Russias meant to co-operate cordially with the invaders. The bishop easily induced James to lend his sanction to the attempt, and to give the warlike churchman full power to command the Jacobites in France, and to place himself at the head of the proposed expedition to Scotland. This commission was granted on the 15th of June, 1725, and was to be in force for half a year. Cameron of Lochiel, his son, and Sir Hector McLean, had previously been apprised of what was going on; and now, on the 17th of June, Allan Cameron, the brother of Lochiel, left Rome with royal instructions for “the noblemen and gentlemen chiefs of the clans of the Highlands of Scotland.” He was deputed to summon them to resist the government orders for disarming, and to assure them that their sovereign would send over, in good time, a skilful commander, with officers, arms, ammunition, and provisions. But the messenger found, —its failure.

on reaching Morven on the 14th of August, that all his instructions were worthless, and the enterprise too late. It turned out that the first orders of James, urging submission to the government, had, in spite of Atterbury's suppression of them, been made known to the various clans, and had been also very promptly obeyed. Lord Seaforth, as soon as he heard of his exiled sovereign's wish, called upon all his inferiors and serfs to give up their arms. He was so bitterly denounced by certain influential Jacobites for having taken this course, that in a spirit of disgust, aggravated by the marked ingratitude with which his great services and sacrifices had ever been regarded by James, he abandoned the Stewart cause.

General Wade originated a much more effectual measure for the prevention of hostilities against the government in the Highlands than the partial disarming of the clans. He intersected these remote regions by military roads, and opened, through districts hitherto inaccessible, a path way for troops and heavy pieces of artillery; thus giving the central government new and, comparatively, ample means of communication with the north. He also placed an armed galley on Loch Ness, and built several forts in important localities.

Whilst these works were being carried on in the Highlands, the government attempted to adjust national taxation to disturb the tranquillity of Scotland. In 1724 it had been resolved to raise £20,000 in Scotland by a tax on malt. This tax, it will be remembered, had been imposed by parliament shortly after the union, but never collected. Government now determined to raise at least a portion of the sixpence per bushel, which had hitherto been only a nominal impost in Scotland. Lockhart accuses government of intending to levy sixpence a barrel on ale in Scotland, and to deprive that country of the export bounty on grain, though England was still to retain the latter privilege. The projected tax excited a storm of indignation, which the Jacobites sought to direct. Various bodies of the country gentlemen sent up angry addresses to parliament; and there was a design amongst not a few of the constituencies to mark those members from Scotland who should support the odious measure, and to declare that they were no longer their representatives. Some even talked of electing other representatives, to meet in Scotland and form an independent parliament for native legislation, should the obnoxious tax be persisted in. The measure, however, as originally brought forward, was abandoned; but a malt duty was substituted and carried. It amounted only to threepence on each bushel, yet, according to the intentions of the government, it was to raise in Scotland no less a sum annually than £20,000 sterling; and, in the event of a short-coming, there was to be a surcharge on maltsters to make up the deficiency. The Scottish representatives offered no opposition to the tax as thus modified, and imagined that their constituents would submit to it with as little reluctance as they could be expected to display under any fiscal novelty. The Scottish people, however, were not so easily pacified, and their hostility against the new measure speedily became as fierce as against its unfortunate predecessor. The method, too, of raising the malt-tax was odious on account of its inquisitorial character.

The brewers in the principal towns of Scotland assembled at Edinburgh, and resolved to offer a determined resistance, which they knew would be seconded by popular clamour. The latter did, indeed, precede the action of the former; and before the brewers could commence their hostile operations, a formidable demonstration on the part of the infuriated multitude took place. This, though at first directed against a single individual, was an indication of the popular wrath against the new tax and all its supporters; and the affair assumed both a comprehensive and a serious aspect before it was ended. Daniel Campbell, of Shawfield, member of parliament for Glasgow, was suspected of having communicated to government not only the information which was necessary for the laying on the obnoxious malt-tax, but also with specific intelligence regarding the evasion of tobacco duties, which was systematically practised in Scotland. He was himself a wealthy and enterprising merchant, and was regarded with peculiar dislike by the mob both as a traitor to his country, and as a member of that new commercial class which had hitherto monopolised all the advantages of the union. Some ominous indications of popular feeling excited his fears for the safety of the splendid mansion which he had recently erected, and having communicated his apprehensions to General Wade, the commander-in-chief of the government forces in Scotland, a detachment of one hundred and ten men was sent from Edinburgh to prevent

Malt-tax riot disturbance. The 23rd of June, in Glasgow. (1724) was the day on which the obnoxious malt-tax was to come into operation; and fears were generally entertained lest it would be made the occasion of a riot. It passed off, however, without any positive disturbance, though an "extreme restlessness" was exhibited by the populace. On the following day it was generally known that a body of English troops had been sent from Edinburgh at the request of the unpopular member. The presence of the military was at once interpreted by the masses as the evidence of a design to enslave their country; and the exciting cry was raised that Campbell had brought the soldiers, that he might establish military law, and butcher all his fellow-citizens who were patriotic enough to offer resistance. About midnight, the crowd, that had been dispersed all day into anxious groups here and there in the streets, gathered together, and were reinforced by thousands whom wild reports had brought out of their houses. The excited multitude, headed by a man disguised in a woman's dress, attacked Campbell's mansion, which they speedily demolished and laid in ruins.* Campbell himself was at the moment supping with the magistrates, who were congratulating each other that the danger was past. In the midst of their rejoicings, news came of the sudden rising of the mob, and the fate of the member's house. The troops had been quartered over the town; and on their commander, Captain Bushell, asking the provost if he should beat to arms, and assemble his men to operate against the mob, the chief magistrate was either unable or unwilling to return a definite answer. The rioters could therefore take their own time in dispersing from the scene of outrage. Next day, the troops were removed to the guard-house, which forthwith became the principal object of the mob's hostility. The sentinels were loaded with abuse and pelted with stones, until at length their patience was exhausted, and they were compelled in self-defence to fire upon their assailants. Eight persons in the crowd were killed, and a considerable number were wounded. Immediately a cry arose in the city that the English soldiers were wantonly slaughtering the inhabitants, and the citizens rushed to an old magazine of arms and provided themselves with the means of self-defence and of vengeance. The soldiers were in imminent danger of being torn to pieces by the infuriated mob; but at the urgent entreaty of the provost, they quitted the city, and retreated to Dumbarton, insulted and pursued by the populace a considerable part of the way.

When the tidings of this formidable riot reached Edinburgh, the celebrated Duncan Forbes, of Culloden, who had been recently appointed lord-advocate, immediately set out for Glasgow with a powerful force, consisting of seven troops of dragoons, a regiment of foot, an independent Highland company, and a field-piece. An immediate investigation was instituted into the origin of the outbreak, and the conduct of the provost and bailies, who were severely censured for their neglect of duty. The result of this inquiry was, that several persons, along with the magistrates, were apprehended and conveyed to Edinburgh, to await their trial. The lord-advocate having refused to admit them to bail, they petitioned the court of justiciary on this point; and as the members of that court were far from being reconciled to the government, they ordered the petitioners to be released on bail. The refractory bailies returned to their own city amid popular demonstrations of triumph; nor did they undergo any subsequent prosecution, though not a few of the Glasgow rioters were severely punished. The outcry against Captain Bushell for ordering his men to fire upon the mob without magisterial authority, made it necessary that he should be put upon his trial. He was found guilty, but received a royal pardon.

* Campbell received from the city the sum of £9000 as compensation for the loss occasioned by the riot. With this sum he purchased the Island of Islay from Campbell of Calder, a cadet of the Argyll family, and ancestor to the Earl of Cawdor, to whom this island, along with Jura, had been granted on the forfeiture of the Macdonalds. It may be mentioned as a striking proof of the rise in the value of land in Scotland, that Islay was lately sold to Mr. Morrison of London for £452,000.

The opposition to the malt-tax was carried on in Edinburgh in a different way, yet with greater pertinacity. The court of session had issued very minute regulations regarding the price of ale, as if lawyers were better fitted to decide upon this question of trade than either brewers or purchasers. The brewers, having provided a large surplus stock of liquor, met and agreed to stop brewing, rather than comply with the regulations. Duncan Forbes was equally resolute that the brewing should go on, and threatened to commit the recusants to prison on a charge of conspiracy. In the end, the brewers were compelled to yield, finding the combined influence of the court of session and Lord Ilay too powerful to be resisted.*

The various annoyances to government, which were of such frequent occurrence in Scotland, seemed to indicate that some of the government officials of that country were either incompetent for, or remiss in the discharge of, their duties; and, as a warning, the Duke of Roxburgh, the Scottish secretary-of-state, was dismissed, and the office was abolished.†

The malt-tax was only the commencement of fiscal troubles in the north. Scotland was as yet too poor to be placed on the same level as regarded taxation with the rich sister country; and the burdens imposed on the scanty and poverty-stricken population of the former were intolerable, though they had long been patiently borne by the prosperous inhabitants of the latter. Hence arose in Scotland

Prevalence of strong temptations to smuggling, for which great facilities existed in the extensive sea-board of that country. The trade in contraband goods became all but universal, all classes giving it either an active or a passive support, and looking upon the bold smuggler as both a patriot and a hero. The revenue officials were utterly unable to repress or even to check the illegal traffic, since the whole community, instead of lending them assistance, did everything to thwart their operations. Those officials, who were either Englishmen, or Scotchmen chosen, as was alleged, on account of their treachery to Scottish interests, received but little support even from local authorities. If, in their occasional collisions with smugglers, they shed blood, they were at once prosecuted; and an outcry was raised that

The Porteous mob. Englishmen should not be allowed to slaughter Scotchmen with impunity. At length these revenue quarrels led to a well-known tragic incident, familiarly termed "the Porteous mob," for which Sir Walter Scott has obtained an imperishable place in the literature and history of Scotland. The little seaport towns with which the coast of Fife is thickly studded, were at this time much frequented by bands of daring smugglers, who had been pirates and buccaneers in their youth, and were constantly at war with the revenue officers. One of these contraband traders, named Wilson, had, in revenge for several seizures and fines, determined to rob the collector of the customs in Pittenweem, and by the assistance of a youth, named Robertson, and two other accomplices, he succeeded in his design. The depredators, however, were apprehended and tried; Wilson and Robertson were condemned to death, and, as the government had been greatly exasperated, no hope was entertained of a pardon. While the criminals were lying in the Edinburgh Tolbooth, they succeeded, by the help of two horse-stealers who were confined in a cell immediately over theirs, in cutting the iron bars of one of the prison windows, some of the party singing psalms to drown the noise, while the others were filing the stanchions. One of the horse-stealers succeeded in passing through the aperture, and the others might have made their escape in the same way but for the obstinacy of Wilson, who doggedly insisted on making the next attempt. Unfortunately, being a stout and bulky man, he stuck so fast between the bars, that he was unable either to get through or to draw back. The jailer was therefore necessarily made aware of his position, and took effectual precautions to prevent any repetition of such attempts.

Some noble qualities must have been mixed up with baser ones in the character of Wilson, for he now began to grieve more for his companion than for himself, and to feel bitter regret for the obstinacy which had destroyed Robertson's chance of escape. Secretly brooding over these thoughts, he formed the resolution to save his comrade's life at all hazards, without the least regard to his own. On the Sabbath before the execution, the criminals, according to the usual custom of the time, were taken to the Tolbooth church, adjacent to the prison, under the custody of four soldiers of the city guard, to listen to a sermon preached for their special benefit. On the dismissal of the general congregation, Wilson, who was a very powerful man, seized two of the soldiers, one with each hand, and a third with his teeth, and called out to Robertson to run. The latter, after a moment's hesitation, knocked down the remaining keeper, and effected his escape, none of the departing worshippers attempting to arrest the fugitive. The success of this daring achievement, though it rendered his own fate more certain, removed a heavy load from Wilson's mind, and excited so much sympathy in his behalf that it was generally rumoured there would be an attempt, either on the part of his old comrades or of the mob, to rescue him at the place of execution.

* Coxe's Walpole, vol. ii. p. 466; Culloden Papers.

† It was restored in 1731, but was finally abolished at the close of the '45.

When the appointed day arrived for carrying the sentence into effect (14th April, 1736), it was found that the magistrates had taken due precautions to maintain the public peace, and to enable the law to take its course. A strong party of the city guard surrounded the scaffold, and a detachment of the Welsh Fusiliers stood under arms in the principal street of the city. Immense crowds had assembled, but their behaviour was orderly until the sentence had been executed and the lifeless body of Wilson had hung for some time, when suddenly the mob became excited, broke through all restraint, assailed the city guard with missiles, and made a rush to the scaffold. The boldest of the rioters cut down the body of Wilson, and began to carry it off. The city guard was under the command of Captain Porteous, an active officer, but a man of harsh and profligate manners, who had rendered himself odious to the populace by the severity with which he repressed their excesses, while it was alleged that he showed the utmost leniency to the rich and powerful. Porteous is said to have resented the escape of Robertson as an insult to the corps which he commanded, and also to have felt aggrieved by the introduction of the military detachment into the city, as if the regular town guard were unable to preserve the public peace. He was therefore disposed to vent his ill-humour upon Wilson, whom he regarded as the cause of these affronts, as well as on the mob, who favoured the unfortunate criminal. It appears that he was in a peculiarly surly and brutal mood on the morning of the execution, and it seemed to those who saw him, as if he were agitated by some evil demon. According to report, he treated Wilson with diabolical cruelty before leaving the prison; and when the riot began after the execution, several eye-witnesses swore that he not only ordered the city guards to fire upon the people, but seized a musket from one of his men, and shot one of the rioters dead on the spot. An Edinburgh crowd was never easily intimidated, and though six or seven persons were killed and wounded, by the first volley, the populace pursued the soldiers with furious execrations, and pelted them with stones. A second time the city guard turned and fired upon the people with fatal effect. Several of those who were killed or wounded belonged to the better class of citizens, who were viewing the scene from their own windows, and had taken no part in the tumult. The public indignation against Captain Porteous was therefore extreme, and he was brought to trial for murder before the high court of judicatory. He was found guilty, and sentenced to be executed in the usual manner on the 8th of September, 1736.

King George II. was at this time on the continent, and Queen Caroline, who as regent governed the kingdom during his absence, took a less unfavourable view of Porteous's conduct than had been taken by the Edinburgh jury, and a reprieve for six weeks was sent down from the secretary-of-state, preparatory, no doubt, to the granting a pardon. The tidings that a respite had been obtained by Porteous created great indignation among the citizens of the capital; they regarded the royal intervention in his behalf as a proof that the English government were disposed to treat the slaughter of Scotsmen by a military officer as a very venial offence; and a resolution was formed that Porteous should not escape the punishment which his crime deserved. On the night of the 7th of September, a small body of persons, apparently belonging to the lower class of citizens, suddenly appeared in a suburb of the city called Portsburgh, and began to beat a drum. A crowd speedily assembled and seized the West Port gate, which they nailed and barricaded. Then marching rapidly along the Cowgate, their numbers increasing at every step, they gained the High Street by ascending the various narrow lanes which lead up to it from the Cowgate. Their first step on reaching the principal street of the city was to secure the Netherbow Port, which led to the Canongate, where the Welsh Fusiliers were then quartered. Leaving a strong party to watch this important post, the mob next broke open the guard-house, disarmed the small corps on duty, and armed themselves with the guns, halberts, and Lochaber axes which they found in the guard-house. The greater part of the rioters then rushed to the Tolbooth, and with loud shouts commenced an attack upon the outer gate, while a strong body was posted on the east across the street, and another on the west, to prevent interruption. The magistrates made an attempt to disperse the mob, but having no adequate force at their disposal, were easily beaten back by showers of missiles, and compelled to retreat, leaving the rioters to work their will. The vigilance of the sentinels whom they had stationed in the upper part of the High Street effectually barred all access to the castle; no one would attempt the perilous task of carrying a written order from the magistrates to Colonel Moyle, who commanded the regiment stationed in the Canongate, and that officer prudently declined to act upon the verbal message conveyed to him by Mr. Lindsay, the member for the city.

Meanwhile the mob were fruitlessly striving with sledge-hammers and iron crows to break open the outer door of the Tolbooth, but its remarkable strength resisted all their efforts. A voice in the crowd at length cried out, "Try it with fire." Tar-barrels and other combustibles were immediately brought, and the door was speedily reduced to ashes. The keys of the various cells were produced by the jailer. The apartment in which Porteous was confined was searched, and the unhappy victim of the popular fury was found concealed in the chimney. He was immediately dragged from his lurking-place, and told to prepare for that death which justice had awarded him. In the midst of all their fury, the rioters conducted their violent proceedings with the utmost deliberation. The wretched man was allowed to entrust his money and papers to the care of a person who had been confined in the jail for debt, and one of the rioters offered him the last consolations of religion. He was then carried from the Tolbooth to the Grass-market, the usual place of execution, in the midst of the rioters, who walked with deliberate steps in a sort of procession, illuminated with blazing links and torches. So coolly and deliberately did they proceed, that when one of Porteous's slippers dropped from his foot, they halted till it was picked up and replaced. As they descended the Bow, they broke open the shop of a dealer in cordage, selected a coil of rope to serve as a halter, and left a guinea on the counter as payment. On reaching the common place of execution they were at a loss for a gibbet, as the gallows was kept in a distant part of the town. They found a dyer's pole, however, in the immediate vicinity of the spot where the gibbet was usually erected, and, selecting this as a fit instrument for their deadly purpose, they tied the rope round the neck of their victim, and slinging it over the cross-beam of the pole, speedily put an end to his sufferings and his life. As soon as they had satiated their vengeance, the rioters threw away their weapons, and quietly dispersed. When morning dawned, the dead body of Porteous suspended from the pole, the muskets and Lochaber axes scattered about the streets, were the only visible evidences of the tragedy which had been enacted.

The magistrates now resumed the government of the city, but they seem to have been so completely paralysed by the daring outbreak of the mob, that for a time they did not venture to take any steps to bring the rioters to justice. At length, on the arrival of the lord-advocate, Duncan Forbes, from Culloden, a reward of two hundred pounds was offered for the apprehension of any person concerned in the slaughter of Porteous; and the efforts to discover the rioters.

Fruitless

law officers of the crown exerted themselves to the utmost in tracing every perceptible clue that seemed likely to lead to the discovery of the culprits, but without success. Not one of the originators or principal actors in this audacious scheme of popular vengeance was ever detected. Two men were indeed brought to trial for their alleged accession to the riot—William McLauchlan, footman to the Countess of Wemyss, and Thomas Linnen; but McLauchlan, who was a person of weak intellect, proved that he was in a state of unconscious intoxication when he was laid hold of by the rabble, who forced a Lochaber axe into his hand in a sort of freak, and compelled him to accompany them to the place of execution: he was therefore acquitted. A similar verdict was returned in the case of Linnen, who was not brought to trial till two years after the riot. To this day the Porteous riot is still enveloped in mystery, and the daring and deliberate manner in which this deed of violence was executed, and the secrecy preserved respecting the actors in it, have always been regarded as peculiarly characteristic of the Scottish people.

The tidings of the outrage of which the Scottish capital had been the scene excited great indignation in the council of regency, and especially in the mind of the queen, who regarded the riot as a gross insult to her own authority.*

A bill was brought into parliament for the purpose of taking Penal measures against Edinburgh.

vengeance on the magistrates and citizens of Edinburgh, as if they had been accessories to the crime; and proposing, in a spirit of vindictive retaliation equally unjust and impolitic, to exact a pecuniary penalty from the city, demolish the Netherbow Port, take away the city guard, and disqualify the chief magistrate from holding any public office. This foolish measure was fiercely resisted by the Duke of Argyll, and the other independent Scottish members of both houses of parliament, and even met with the opposition of the crown lawyers of Scotland. In its progress through parliament the bill was gradually stripped of its most obnoxious clauses; and when it at length passed into a law, it merely levied a fine of two thousand pounds on the city of Edinburgh for the benefit of Porteous's widow, and declared the provost incapable of holding any office of trust throughout the empire. Unfortunately for the peace of the country, a clause was added, enacting that every minister of the Scottish Church should, on the first Sabbath of each Obnoxious clause in the Porteous bill.

month for a year, read from the pulpit a proclamation, mentioning the reward which the government offered to those who should give information respecting any persons engaged in the Porteous riot, denouncing punishment against all who should conceal their knowledge of the crime, and calling upon the congregation to do everything in their power to discover and bring the murderers of Porteous to justice. This enactment, which was the result of entire ignorance, on the part of the legislature, of the peculiar ecclesiastical principles of the Scottish people, excited a prodigious ferment in Scotland. A large portion of the clergy resented it as an unwarrantable interference with the rights and privileges of the Church, as well as an acknowledgment of the episcopal hierarchy, and a few positively refused to obey the injunction. A fierce controversy in consequence broke out between those ministers who did, and those who did not, read the proclamation, which contributed not a little to embitter the dissensions connected with the schism which had recently taken place in the Established Church of Scotland.

* "On this occasion it is still recorded in tradition," says Sir Walter Scott, "that her majesty, in the height of her displeasure, told the celebrated John, Duke of Argyll, that sooner than submit to such an insult she would make Scotland a hunting-field. 'In that case, Madam,' answered that high-spirited nobleman, with a profound bow, 'I will take leave of your majesty, and go down to my own country to get my hounds ready.' The import of the reply had more than met the ear."

CHAPTER LXI.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

A.D. 1712–1820.

THE causes which led to the first secession from the Church of Scotland had long existed, and been

Review of causes of secession.	gathering in strength.* The people knew what the Reformation had conferred on their fathers, and at a later period they had suffered and bled from their attachment to a church which had grown out of the heroism of Knox, and been moulded by the wisdom of Melville. They were aware of the rights which such charters as the Books of Discipline had intended for them, and they relished that preaching which gave uniform prominence to the doctrines and phraseology of the Westminster Confession. Thirty years had been vainly spent by the Stewarts in attempting to beat down the national feeling which, in its wilder ardour, had fought at Drumclog, and in its serener bravery had sung psalms in the dungeons of the Bass, and won its crown on the scaffolds of the Grass-market. The ecclesiastical settlement effected at the Revolution did not secure what many had hoped for. It was dictated by policy. It did not restore the platform of 1638, but adopted the ratification of 1592. Its object was to restore peace and order, to put an end to agitation, and by the aspect of moderation to curb extremes, to take away all pretext for violence, and induce all classes of the people to exhibit a loyal spirit to the new occupants of the British throne. King William wished for universal toleration, though he had no liking to any form of ecclesiastical independence. He was willing to accede to the wishes of the people, not because they were either just or scriptural, but because they were deeply cherished and had been openly expressed. If Scotland should will the abolition of prelacy, he would not thwart the desire; and if it had coveted a modified form of episcopal jurisdiction, he would as gladly have sanctioned the measure. Such views were right in themselves, and were especially so in a statesman who knew that coercion was folly, and whose path to the crown of the three kingdoms had been opened by the stupid intolerance of his predecessor. Besides, the king was afraid to excite the anger of the English episcopalians by the appearance of any hard or cruel measures towards their brethren in the north. Nor did he believe in the divine right of any form of church government; he was himself a presbyterian at the Hague, and an episcopalian at Whitehall, and was willing that any form of spiritual jurisdiction which the people preferred should be secured to them, provided it yielded to the royal superintendence and control.
--------------------------------------	---

But the means employed to bring about these effects of the king's policy. The ends were somewhat suspicious to the Scottish presbyterians. If the Episcopal Church in Scotland could have been transmutated into a presbyterian community at once, and without either effort, examination, or commotion, the men at the head of affairs in Edinburgh and London would have rejoiced. Though the change could not be so easily and universally effected, for conscience and principle were deeply involved, and commanded respect, the method actually employed was not dissimilar in spirit and process. The first parliament which met after the Revolution declared that prelacy was "a great and insupportable grievance to this nation, and contrary to the inclination of the generality of the people ever since the Reformation." Only in a general sense was this avowal correct. Presbyterianism as against episcopacy could certainly reckon on a decided majority; yet the form of presbytery which many desired would have been exceedingly unsatisfactory to the three western counties, where the covenants were upheld with fervid and uncompromising zeal. But a census, were there no descent into explanations or details, would have shown a preponderance for presbytery; and for this plain reason prelacy was declared to be abolished, and the intolerable yoke was promptly broken.

In the second session of the same parliament presbytery was established, and the ministers who	Reception of episcopalian ministers.
--	--

had been ejected at the Restoration, and still survived, were restored to their position and authority. But how shall this second decree be carried out? Shall there be an ejection, as had happened already? Shall presbytery in power retaliate on episcopacy dislodged and powerless? There is no doubt that many would have wished this, and rejoiced in it, too, as an act of righteous retribution. For in many parts of the west the masses took the laws into their own hands, and "rabbed" the curates. Zealots were ready to inflict judgment in imitation of the old heroes who had broken the altars of Baal, and to reckon those who hung back from the fray as lukewarm Laodiceans, or men of Meroz, on whom of yore the warlike prophetess invoked her heaviest curse. Nearly two hundred incumbents were expelled by this illegal and summary process. But though a ruthless extreme is wrong, it is only equitable that none hold office in a church who cannot acquiesce in its creed and discipline. At the same time the episcopalian conscience ought neither to have been bribed nor snared by any vague subscription or equivocal declaration. On the first convention of the estates they inserted in their Claim of Right the abolition of episcopacy. The privy-council had also ordered every minister to pray for William and Mary, on pain of deprivation; and in the eastern parts of Scotland, south of the Forth, many had been ejected for non-compliance. Parliament had also authorised the sixty presbyterian ministers who survived, "to try and purge out all insufficient, negligent, scandalous and erroneous ministers by due course of ecclesiastical process and censures."* These veterans found certainly abundance of work, though they lay claim to great impartiality in the performance of it. The General Assembly, which had not met for thirty years, was convened on the 16th of October, 1690; and when these sixty ministers, who had been ejected at the period of the Restoration, took their seats, they showed not only no desire to retaliate, but rather facilitated the admission of their episcopalian antagonists. The record of their proceeding bears—"that it was not the mind of the assembly to depose any incumbent simply for his judgment anent the government of the church, or to urge reordination on any incumbent whatsoever." This declaration seems to reserve the right of judgment in matters of doctrine and character. That the latter element was before their mind is plain from another portion of their minutes, which warns the Commission to be "very cautious of receiving accusations against the late conformists, and that they proceed in the matter of censure very deliberately, so as none may have just cause to complain of their rigidity." Such examinations into the lives of many of the "late conformists" was all the more necessary, if, as Burnet asserts, many of them were openly vicious, "a disgrace to their order and the sacred functions, and indeed the dregs and refuse of the northern parts."

* See Chap. LIV. supra.

* Burton's History of Scotland, vol. i. p. 212.

The ministers who formed the Assembly, now that presbytery was re-established, were anxious that its restoration should, in unison with the wishes of the government, be accompanied with as little noise and hardship as possible. Accordingly, at subsequent assemblies, as in 1694, they enjoined the Commission "to receive into ministerial communion such of the late conformist ministers as, having qualified themselves according to law, shall have subscribed the formula,"—that formula being simply a declaration of fact, "that the church government, as now settled by law, is the only government of this church." This rather latitudinarian measure was productive of fatal consequences; and it was inconsistent in a church which regarded presbytery as a divine institution, and had suffered so grievously for such a belief, so to tamper with its own convictions and creed. If the presbyterian form of government was not worth upholding after the Revolution, it was not worth fighting and dying for after the Restoration. If so many ministers, to preserve a pure conscience, had suffered the loss of all things,—been exiled and hunted, scourged and imprisoned, at so recent a period as the reign of the second Charles,—why should they not have maintained their convictions now? why cast disrespect on their fathers by declaring presbytery to be only a matter of fact, and of political enactment—a thing done, and which no man might undo, under civil pains and penalties—an organization into which any one might be taken who was so supple as to bow to present arrangement without regard to the principles which it implied, or the measures by which it was secured? Surely some other method, that partook less of worldly expediency, might have been devised. But, in fact, the whole initiatory movement of the church was Erastian.

It submitted to the dictation of the political powers, and had no independent action: nor, indeed, would such action have been willingly allowed it. William's whole purpose was to keep it in check. The privy-council had inflicted ecclesiastical punishment on the recusant curates, and the parliament summoned the presbyterian remnant into official existence, and not only prescribed its work, but told it in what spirit the task was to be pursued. Such servile conduct on the part of the Church leads us to infer that the spirit of Rutherford, Henderson, and Gillespie had departed from its councils. The restored establishment might have been conservative without being intolerant, and might have guarded its own purity without disturbing the peace of the realm. Under the measure to which we have referred, the majority of curates admitted must have been those who could bring little honour or service to the Church; while those whose enrolment would have been an acquisition, preferred exclusion to compromise, and deprivation to position in a church whose constitution they had regarded as being so erroneous that it merited extirpation by fire and fagot, and at the same time so novel as to be only an importation of recent years from Geneva. So that the persons admitted were, in too many instances, the class described by Burnet "as generally very mean and despicable in all respects, and the worst preachers which he had ever heard." The number of such admissions was great, for the Assembly holds this boastful language to Queen Anne in 1712:—"We cannot but lay before your majesty this pregnant instance of our moderation, that since our late happy establishment there have been taken in and continued hundreds of dissenting ministers on the easiest terms." There began in this way, at an early period, a gradual deterioration in the pulpits and courts of the Church of Scotland, and a gradual separation of her ministers into two parties. The facile remnant of the old episcopacy, so easily and opportunely converted into presbyterian pastors, only exchanged their surplice for a Genevan gown, and read homilies instead of prayers. No wonder that the accession of so many aliens was viewed with suspicion by the pious portion of the country, for it was soon found to be exercising a deleterious influence over the preaching and the polity of that church for whose freedom and rights the best blood of Scotland had been so profusely shed. The church of the Revolution settlement was thus founded in compromise; and, while it was openly branded as lax and perfidious by the covenanters without, its pliancy was painful to not a few within its own pale.

In the reign of Anne other causes of dissatisfaction arose. The oath of abjuration proved a great stumbling-block.* To make the swearing of it a qualification to sit in church courts was specially objectionable to many, for it really created a new test or ministerial qualification, having not a religious but a political basis. In that oath, too, the succession to the crown was limited to the communion of the Church of England, and many good men did not comprehend how they could, at the same time, maintain the oath of the covenants and the oath of abjuration—or how they could swear to uphold presbytery the one day and prelatey the next. They were entangled in a contradiction from which they could not escape. It was a hard dilemma to affirm on oath that presbytery alone was agreeable to the word of God, and then to stultify themselves with another asseveration, also on oath, that none but an anti-presbyterian, pledged to support the “black prelate” of England, could sit on the throne of the realm. The imposition of such an oath was a piece of impolicy. It was not needed. The presbyterian clergy were decidedly loyal, and to them the oath was unnecessary; for the Jacobite episcopalians, who clung to the house of Stewart, refused to take the oath, and though it had been specially prepared for them, it was not enforced. Superfluous legislation is about as bad as no legislation, and the consequence was that the jurants and non-jurants were separated,—that the people respected and venerated the latter as of a nobler type than their opponents, and that two parties, that of the court and that of the people, became more distinctly marked in the assemblies of the Church of Scotland.

* M'Kerrow's History of the Secession, pp. 6, 7.

The first and second books of Discipline had provided for the people the right of choosing ministers. The first book declares, “No man should enter in the ministry without a lawful vocation. The lawful vocation standeth in the election of the people, examination of the ministry, and admission by them both. No minister shall be obtruded on any particular kirk without their consent. It appertaineth to the people and every several congregation to elect their own ministers. It is altogether to be avoided that any man be violently intruded or thrust in upon a congregation; but this liberty with all care must be reserved, for every several church to have their votes and suffrages in the election of their ministers.”* The second book of Discipline does not warrant so free and full a franchise. But it distinctly enacts as follows:—“In the order of election it is to be eschewed that any person be intruded in any offices of the kirk, contrary to the will of the congregation to which they are appointed, or without the voice of the eldership. Election to any office that vakes is declared to be by the judgment of the eldership, and consent of the congregation.”† The direct choice, or initiative, lay with the elders, but it took no effect unless sanctioned by the will of the people. In 1649 patronage had been abolished as an evil and a bondage, contrary to the word of God—originating in popish ignorance, and opposed to the second book of Discipline. But this act was rescinded by the parliament of 1661, and all persons who had entered on benefices by the popular choice, were required either to accept a presentation or to quit their parishes. It is needless to say that many suffered ejection. At the Revolution, and after the abolition of episcopacy, the question of patronage came up naturally for discussion. William was not a little perplexed about the settlement of it. He was very unwilling to consent to its abolition, “Such an abolition,” said he, “is the taking of men’s property.”* It was agreed, however, that patronage should be abolished, and that patrons should receive pecuniary compensation. A sum amounting to about forty pounds was to be awarded to each patron, and the power of election was lodged in the heritors and session, the privilege of approval or dissent being still given to the congregation. So long as this law continued in existence, it seems to have wrought harmoniously, and to have given general satisfaction.†

But the statesmen of Queen Anne could not tolerate this manifestation of popular right, and resolved to abolish patronage. Accordingly, in 1712, it was enacted that patronage should be restored, one alleged ground being that popular elections, as exercised under the Revolution settlement, had proved inconvenient, and had occasioned great heats and divisions. The General Assembly remonstrated, and sent a deputation to London charged with a petition. But that petition, which was addressed “To the most Honourable the Peers of Great Britain,” could not be received in its first form, for it ignored the prelates. In spite of every remonstrance the act passed—five bishops, however, voting against it. The great landowners now became parochial dictators, and often without any scruple thrust upon unwilling churches their own creatures and nominees. It is true that at first many ministers refused to be inducted over recusant or even indifferent congregations; but this “laudable squeamishness,” as Dr. M’Kerrow calls it, was soon conquered. Presbyteries, too, refused for a season to ordain presentees if there was resolute opposition to them; but this fidelity gradually disappeared. Some patrons waived their right, and the presbyteries filled up the vacancies, or by the action of the jus devolutum exercised their undoubted privilege. But in a few years violent settlements became frequent throughout the country, and the military were summoned into several parishes to preserve the peace during the ordination of an obnoxious presentee.‡ Appeals on the part of the insulted

* Macaulay’s History, vol. iii. p. 694.

† Supra, chap. liv.

‡ The following scene took place at the serving of an edict:—“These and such like things were done to terrify the people; and yet, for all that, these gentlemen and the two ministers that were to serve the edict, being conscious to themselves of the badness of their cause, and what an evil part they were acting, thought not fit to do it until they got a troop of dragoons to be a guard to them; and, accordingly, November 17, 1717, being the Sabbath-day, they came to Bathgate, and when approaching the town they caused beat their drum, and draw their swords, and in this posture came through the town, guarding the ministers into the church, riding and striking, with their naked swords, at the women and others standing gazing upon the wayside, which was a melancholy Sabbath in Bathgate, the Sabbath-day being much profaned, not only by the people parish against such oppression were a common resort, but they generally failed in obtaining redress from the General Assembly. The assembly that had at length yielded to the law of patronage, had no alternative but to carry it out. Having stooped to the yoke of civil authority, they could not but wear it. The power which had been allowed to modify patronage was surely competent to restore it. A remonstrant party existed which would not succumb, and would take no part in intruding a minister upon a people arrayed against him. To guard against such a form of protest, to secure that a presentee should be ordained whether the neighbouring clergy concurred or not, the assembly in 1729, in violation of its constitutional forms, introduced a new machinery, and appointed committees of unbounded power, to superintend and execute their tyrannical acts of intrusion. So smartly and summarily did those "riding committees" execute their task, that in 1730 no less than twelve appeals by reclaiming congregations, including such parishes as Renfrew, Dunblane, Kinross, and Balfour, came before the Assembly. Calls had been sustained without even the formality of a moderation, and even without consulting the presbytery, in whose bounds the moderation was to take place. The sentences of synods were occasionally reversed by the same dictators. Nay, when the presbytery of Chirnside was enjoined to attend a violent settlement in the parish of Hutton, and when they had refused, and wished their dissent against such an imperious order to be marked, the assembly ruled that their request be refused, and further resolved "that no reasons of dissent against the determinations of church judicatories should be in time to come entered on record." The very privilege of complaint was thus taken away, and the injured were shut up to a dumb resignation. Constitutional freedom was at an end; the last trace of right had gone; and the General Assembly, in its tyrannous majorities, had become a mere creature of parliament. The statesmen in London wished to have a subservient church in Scotland, and their artful measures had triumphed. The cries and remonstrances of the people, and of the popular party among the clergy, were either unheard or contemned. The usual result happened. While the one party rose in its pride, the other became more defiant in its opposition.

At length the last vestiges of protection were swept away. If a patron did not present a parish within the first six months of its vacancy, then by law, and by a process technically called jure devoluto, the presbytery stepped in and proceeded to induct a minister. This transferred right had been exercised according to the spirit and temper of the respective presbyteries. Some courts had handed over the election to the people, and others had nominated presentees. But now, under the pretence of securing uniformity, the assembly was overtured to pass a law, that in all cases of jus devolutum, the choice should not be left to the people, but that the minister should be chosen by a majority of the heritors and elders, if Protestant. The object was plainly to discourage such stray cases of popular election as did occasionally happen when the patron neglected or declined to exercise his right. The people soon learned that the "Protestant heritors," on whom the right of choice now devolved, might not be resident in the parish, that they might be either Jacobites or infidels, or that they might outnumber the elders; and they came to the conclusion that the Assembly cared as little for their franchise as did the parliament. But the Barrier Act* necessitated the sending down of such an overture for the consideration of presbyteries, and future action could be taken only according to the reports sent up from them. When the Assembly met in 1732, it was found that eighteen presbyteries sent no reports, that only six approved of the overture, while twelve gave it a conditional sanction, and no less than thirty-one presbyteries rejected it. But in spite of this difference of opinion among the presbyteries, the Assembly, as if it had consulted Escobar, pursued a peculiar calculation, and boldly passed the overture into a law. Mr. Erskine, of Stirling, and some other ministers, who usually acted with him, protested against this decision as being unconstitutional; but the assembly refused either to receive or record their protest. In such circumstances forty-two ministers addressed a paper of grievances to the Assembly, but the document was not allowed to be read; and a similar manifesto, signed by seventeen hundred elders and laymen, was also rejected with deep contempt. Tyranny so gross and wanton created a powerful hostility to itself in the national mind. The alarm and excitement on the part of many became prodigious. All that they had looked upon as precious in the church of their fathers had been gradually destroyed; the "carved work" was broken down, and the heritage was desolate. A crisis had come, and on the 10th day of October, of the same year, Ebenezer Erskine, as moderator of the synod of Stirling and Perth, delivered that discourse which led to the first secession.

The exercise of patronage had thus for many years had an injurious influence upon the pulpit. Neither talent nor piety could of itself insure a speedy settlement to a young licentiate. If he could not ingratiate himself with the patrons—those "lords over God's heritage"—or find some one to recommend him to

* The Barrier Act—the ninth act of the General Assembly, 1697—requires, "That before any General Assembly of this church shall pass any acts which are to be standing rules and constitutions to the church, they be remitted as overtures to the consideration of the several presbyteries, and their opinion and consent be reported by their commissioners to the next assembly, that they may pass the same into acts if the more general opinion of the Church agree hereto."

of the place, but by many coming from other parishes to see a new way of propagating the gospel by red-coats, booted apostles officiating as elders."—Letter to a Minister concerning the Parish of Bathgate, 1720, p. 18.

them, all spheres of usefulness were closed against him. The people felt it to be an insolent oppression when the lord of the manor nominated their spiritual teacher, and expected them to bow without a murmur to his dictation, even when a presentee, without talent, character, or piety, was about to be thrust upon them.

But parallel to all this usurpation, there was another and melancholy cause of controversy about doctrine. discontent. The Church had not only been rapidly secularised in the way we have endeavoured to describe, but doctrinal laxity had kept pace with obsequiousness to court and parliament. Christ's crown, to use the language of the times, was not only bartered away, but the cross on which he had won it with His blood was also dishonoured. The great end of the spiritual constitution of the Church must have been sadly undervalued by the dominant party in the Assembly; and such a defection must have been, to some extent, accompanied by indifference to evangelical truth. The Secession had its origin as much in a prolonged struggle for purity of doctrine as for freedom of administration. What was regarded on the one hand as error had not been put down; and what on the other hand was cherished as the most precious truth, had been discountenanced by the General Assembly. By truth we mean not merely what is thought to be sanctioned by the word of God, but what is clearly taught in the Westminster books—the authorised creed of the Church. For the men who had subscribed those documents ought surely to have believed them; and he who subscribes what he does not believe, only writes himself a liar. And if at any subsequent time the subscriber's mind should change, his plain course is, if he cannot bring the church over to his view, to withdraw and resign his position and emoluments. To subscribe a creed and yet to oppose and undermine its doctrines, must not only be branded as heresy by the orthodox, but will be stigmatised as treachery by the world. It was not to be expected that the hundreds of curates so easily admitted could be the staunch defenders of Calvinism, for the Arminianism of Laud had been imported into Scotland along with the episcopal ceremonial. A spirit of lethargy had crept over the Church, and its political security had proved to it a spiritual snare. As a struggling church it had been honest and zealous,—as a protected church it had become supine and dead. The truth was highly prized when it suffered for it, but attachment to it weakened as it enjoyed repose.

In the year 1714, Mr. Webster, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, brought under the notice of the Process Assembly some reports as to the teaching of Mr. Simson, professor of divinity in the College of Glasgow. The Assembly declined to enter on such business, but allowed Mr. Webster, if he chose, to libel the professor at the bar of presbytery of Glasgow. Mr. Webster did libel the authorised teacher of theology, and he in his replies gave utterance to several erroneous statements. The case came before the Assembly the following year, but was not disposed of, nor was it finished till 1717. The professor was dismissed from the bar with an injunction to be more cautious in time to come. Yet among the tenets taught by Professor Simson was the following Pelagian error:—"That it is inconsistent with the justice and goodness of God to create a soul without any original righteousness, or any disposition to do good; and that the souls of infants since the fall, as they come from the hands of their Creator, are as pure and holy as the souls of infants would have been created supposing man had not fallen; and that they are created as pure and holy as Adam was, except as to those qualifications and habits which he received as being created in an adult state." The language of this paragraph, on being strictly analysed, will be found to be very ambiguous, and an ingenious man could easily fence round its statement. If the youth in training for the Scottish pulpit were to imbibe such teaching, fatal results might be well predicted; and the Assembly, while regarding his instructions as erroneous, yet so far sympathised with the instructor as not to visit him with any ecclesiastical censure.

It was also ominous that the same assembly stoutly condemned evangelical truth. The presbytery of Auchterarder, in its zeal against Arminianism, had introduced a new test into the trials it presented for the licence of candidates. This innovation was unconstitutional; but it was not judged of by this easier test,—it was tried upon its merits. One of the propositions to which each candidate for licence was expected to assent ran in these terms:—"I believe that it is not sound and orthodox to teach that we must forsake sin in order to our coming to Christ and instating us in covenant with God." The proposition is not very happily worded, but its purport cannot well be mistaken. The Assembly heartily condemned the Auchterarder creed as "unsound" and "detestable," and, therefore, were supposed to give countenance to the delusion that men must save themselves as their qualification for coming to the Saviour,—must heal themselves before they resort to the physician. It is nevertheless true, on the other hand, that if a man persist in sin, he evinces no sincerity of desire to receive salvation.

The columns of this history are not the fitting place to enter into any lengthened account of the theological discussions which occupied the Church for many successive years. The controversy to which we refer was keen and protracted, and the very fact of its existence shows that the Church had lost to some extent its old polemical acuteness, and its zeal for Calvinistic truth. The "Marrow of Modern Divinity" was the work of Edward Fisher, of Brazenose College, Oxford. It had been recommended by several divines of the Westminster assembly, and had gone through many editions, though it was now reprobated by Scottish divines who had subscribed the Westminster symbols. A copy had been brought into Scotland by a puritan soldier, and Boston, then minister of Simprin, found it accidentally in a farm-house, in the course of his pastoral visitations. Some years afterwards Boston recommended the "Marrow" to his clerical friends, during the discussions about the Auchterarder test, and it was reprinted in 1718, under the editorial care of Mr. Hog, the minister of Carnock. The treatise, consisting of quaint and stirring dialogues, throws into bold relief the peculiar doctrines of grace, occasionally puts them into the form of a startling proposition, and is gemmed with quotations from eminent Protestant divines. The publication of the "Marrow" threw the clergy into commotion, and by many of them it was violently censured. But not a few of the evangelical pastors gave it a cordial welcome, and among multitudes of the people it became a favourite book, next in veneration to the Bible and the Shorter Catechism. In 1719, its editor, Mr. Hog, wrote an explanation of some of its passages; but in the same year, Principal Haddow, of St. Andrew's, opened the synod of Fife with a sermon directed against it. The synod requested the publication of the discourse, and this step was the signal for a warfare of four years' duration. The Assembly of that year, acting in the same spirit with the synod of Fife, instructed its Commission to look after books and pamphlets promoting such opinions as are found in the "Marrow," though they do not name the book, and to summon before them the authors and recommenders of such publications. The Commission, so instructed and armed, appointed a committee, of which Principal Haddow was the soul; and before this committee, named the "Committee for Purity of Doctrine," four ministers were immediately summoned. The same committee gave in a report at next assembly of 1720, in the shape of an overture, classifying the doctrines of the "Marrow," and solemnly condemning them. The paper was prepared with a malignant dexterity. It selected several passages which were paradoxically expressed, while it severed others from the context, and held them up as contrary to Scripture and to the Confession of Faith. The passages marked for reprobation were arranged under distinct heads,—such as the nature of faith, the atonement, holiness, obedience and its motive, and the position of a believer in reference to the law. The committee named them as errors, thus:—universal atonement and pardon; assurance of the very essence of faith; holiness not necessary to salvation; and the believer not under the law as a rule of life. Had the "Marrow" inculcated such tenets it would have been objectionable indeed. The report was discussed, and the result was a stern condemnation of the "Marrow;" and "the General Assembly do hereby strictly prohibit and discharge all the ministers of this church, either by preaching, writing, or printing, to recommend the said book, or in discourse to say anything in favour of it; but on the contrary, they are hereby enjoined and required to warn and exhort those people in whose hands the said book is or may come, not to read or use the same." That book, which had been so highly lauded by many of the southern divines—such as Caryl and Burroughes—by the men who had framed the very creed of the Scottish Church, and who were universally acknowledged to be as able as most men to know truth and detect error—was thus put into a presbyterian Index expurgatorius. Nobody can justify the extreme statements of the "Marrow," but their bearing and connection plainly free them from an Antinomian tendency. In fact, some of the so-called Antinomian statements condemned by the Assembly, are in the very words of inspiration. But the rigid decision of the Assembly only added fuel to the controversy which it was intended to allay, and the forbidden book became more and more an object of intense anxiety and prevalent study. The popular party in the Church at once concerted measures to have that act repealed. Consultations were repeatedly held by a section of the evangelical clergy, and at length it was agreed to hand in a Representation to the court, complaining of the obnoxious decision, and of the injury which had been done by it to precious truth. This Representation was signed by twelve ministers,* and it briefly called the Assembly's attention to the fact that it had condemned propositions which are in accordance at once with the Bible and the symbolical books.

The Representation was not discussed by the Assembly, which was dissolved. Condemnation of by the sudden indisposition of the the "Marrow." Earl of Rothes, the royal commissioner, but was handed over to the Commission. After no little debating, a series of queries was put into the hands of the representers, to which answers were prepared by Ebenezer Erskine and Mr. Wilson of Maxton, and given to the Commission in March, 1722. The same business had a prominent place in the following assembly, and an act was passed intended to explain, and also modify the previous finding regarding the "Marrow." The Assembly, at the same time, issued a long declaration, and "strictly prohibit and discharge all the ministers of this church, to use by writing, printing, preaching, catechising, or otherwise teaching, either publicly or privately, the positions condemned, under pain of the censures of the Church, conformed to the merit of their offence; and do ordain the several presbyteries, synod, and commissions of the General Assembly of the Church to take particular care that the premises be punctually observed by all ministers and members of this church, and more especially the presbyteries and synods within whose bounds any of the brethren reside who signed the Representation; and because of the injurious reflections contained in these representations, the Assembly do appoint their moderator, in their name, to rebuke and admonish them, and though their offence deserves a much higher censure, yet the Assembly forbears it, in hopes that the great lenity used towards them shall engage them to a more dutiful behaviour in time coming."

* The names of the twelve were—Messrs. James Hog, Carnock; Thomas Boston, Etterick; John Bonar, Torphichen; John Williamson, Inveresk; James Kidd, Queensferry; Gabriel Wilson, Maxton; Ebenezer Erskine, Portmoak; Ralph Erskine and James Wardlaw, Dunfermline; Henry Davidson, Galashiels; James Bathgate, Orwell; and William Hunter, Lilliesleaf.

How could the men who had contended for what they deemed to be the truth, bear with such a decision against it? They might submit to the rebuke as a matter of order, and they did so: but how could they be silent about the truths which they deemed of such value—truths which they had sworn, at their ordination, to avow and defend? How could they shut their lips regarding the command of the Assembly? Could their conscience be fettered by an ecclesiastical act? They therefore laid upon the table of the protest against the act of supreme court a protest, which assembly. had the Assembly dealt with in the spirit it afterwards displayed, would have turned the Marrow-men into seceders. Its bold and unmeasured terms, couched in barbarous and technical phraseology, were these:—"We do protest that we look on the said fifth act of assembly, 1720, as contrary to the word of God and to the aforesaid standards of doctrine and covenants, and of which we have complained in the aforesaid eighth act, as of dangerous consequence thereto, and that, therefore, we dare not in any manner of way, no, nor by silence, consent unto or approve of them, nor the acts of assembly relative thereunto; and that it shall be lawful to us, agreeable to the word of God and the standard of doctrine aforesaid in this church, to profess, preach, and still bear testimony unto the truths condemned or otherwise injured by the said acts of assembly, notwithstanding of the said acts, and whatsoever shall follow thereupon; upon all which we take instruments and crave extracts."

It is somewhat amazing that the Assembly did not take instant steps to maintain its authority and punish this open insubordination. But the royal letter had contained in it some hints and warnings as to the maintenance of peace at all hazards; and to this caution the reverend court loyally submitted. The friends of the Marrow doctrine were, however, exposed to annoyances in various parts of the country, and had need of patience under severe and repeated provocations. They held clear views of divine truth, though many of their opponents erred not from enmity to it, but from want of just conceptions. The connexion between the law and the gospel was one of the points in principal dispute, and the views entertained by the Marrow-men are now generally held by all evangelical churches, and may be seen reasoned out with deep and luminous arguments in the works of Riccalton, and the published theology of the late Dr. Chalmers.

In four years from this date, Professor Simson again attracted further notice. The reports concerning his teaching were so notorious that the presbytery of Glasgow moved for an inquiry. A committee was appointed to meet with him; but he declined an interview, and sent a letter to the presbytery stating what were his views of the Trinity.* This document not being deemed satisfactory, a committee was appointed to report upon it. Meanwhile the Assembly met in 1726, and enjoined the presbytery of Glasgow to proceed with all speed. Charges of no ordinary nature were at length made against the professor. He was accused, indeed, of disobeying the injunction of 1717; but, as if emboldened by the previous lenity shown him, he had also taught a species of Arianism from the chair of divinity. It was found that he had instructed his students "that the necessary existence of the Son is a thing that we know not; that the phrase 'necessary existence' was impertinent, and not to be used when speaking of the Trinity; that the three persons of the adorable Trinity are not said to be numerically one in substance or essence; and that the terms necessary existence, supreme deity, and the title of the only true God may be taken, and are taken by some authors, in a sense that includes the personal property of the Father, and so not belonging to the Son." Two libels were served upon him, and no little pains taken to prove them by the testimony of students and other sources of evidence. But Professor Simson was often more than a match for his antagonists. He was given to subtle refinements, and was far superior in acuteness to many of the rural clergy by whom the process was conducted. He was, as Wodrow says, "no way dashed or sunk," and the historian naively adds—"Whether this proceeds from his reckoning upon the worst, or his consciousness how far he was superior to us, or on his thinking so, or from what other reason, I do not know." It is true that when the questions became more pointed, Professor Simson avowed his belief in the doctrines of the Westminster Confession—a statement out of all harmony with what had been proved against him. He was one of those men who unsettle their minds by metaphysical speculations—who learn to doubt, and argue, and hesitate—who pride themselves on their superiority to vulgar belief, and only perplex themselves by their extreme minuteness in defining the terms which such inquiries involve.

The evangelical and popular party thought that such errors as those of Professor Simson warranted deposition, and unfitted the person who held them from occupying either a chair or a pulpit in the Church of Scotland. But the professor had a powerful party of friends, who did not wish to see the triumph of their antagonists, and had resolved to discourage every kind of earnestness, either in doctrine or practice. A committee was appointed to issue the business. Professor Simson was induced to write a modification of some of his statements, and it was carried, at length, that he be suspended from preaching and teaching, and the case sent down to the inferior courts, for the purpose of being reported on at next Assembly. The majority of presbyteries reported that he should be deposed, but the assembly, when it met, was the scene of keen and protracted debate, and the sentence of the prior year was, after some manœuvring, confirmed. Professor Simson was not allowed to teach, but was continued in fellowship with the Church, and in enjoyment of all his official emoluments. Such was the lenient sentence pronounced against the man whose errors and clever defences had kept the Church in a ferment for four years. The Marrow-men had met with no such clemency as he did, who was poisoning truth at one of its fountains. Against this final decision, Boston, author of the "Fourfold State," stood out as a solitary protester.

* In reading Pictet's theology with his students, he told them that when Christ is called summus Deus, the expression is to be taken cum grano salis.

To show the prevailing spirit of the General Assembly,—how, in its anxiety for peace and hatred of all disturbance, its moderation deepened into indifference,—we might refer here to the case of Professor Campbell of St. Andrew's—a case that occurred between the suspension and deposition of the seceding ministers. His logic and theology were both eccentric and extraordinary, flimsy in substance and arrogant in spirit, the product of an ill-balanced mind, which deemed originality to consist in extreme opinions. In his "Inquiry into the Original of Moral Virtue," he resolved all virtue and piety into self-love, as if generosity and sympathy were fallacious disguises, having no place in man's nature, and none in the example of Christ or the precepts of Scripture. In his Oratio de Vanitate Luminis Naturæ, he had, by the excess of a juvenile logic, so exaggerated his theme as to affirm that the light of nature cannot enable men to discover the existence of God—a statement in utter opposition to the apostle's argument in the first chapter of the epistle to the Romans, where he affirms that the Gentile world, though it has no revelation, is without excuse in refusing to recognise and worship the one supreme Creator. Yet Campbell held, on the other hand, that natural religion is in itself a sufficient guide to happiness and virtue, thus denying the necessity of a divine revelation. Again, in another publication, where he attempted to prove that "the apostles were no enthusiasts," he carried his vindication to the absurd length of maintaining that they were so ignorant of their Master's character and claims between his death and resurrection as to deem him an impostor; and, therefore, in maintaining that they were not visionaries, he thought it necessary to make them sceptics and fools. He missed the mark by the boyish feat of overleaping it. The Assembly dealt very leniently with such teaching, or, as they named it, these "supposed errors," accepted the professor's strained explanations, and simply issued an order enjoining caution on ministers and teachers of divinity, and urging them "not to use doubtful expressions or propositions which may be construed in an erroneous sense, or lead the readers or hearers into error, however sound such words or propositions may be in themselves."

When we reflect on the terrible explosion caused by "the Marrow," and compare the prompt asperity of the dominant faction against its distinctive tenets, with the tardy and indulgent processes against Professors Simson and Campbell, we cannot but feel the depth and rapidity of that degeneracy which had fallen on the church of the second Reformation. The power of the pulpit was gone, to a great extent; the preaching of a free and unrestricted gospel was frowned upon; the sermon which was wont to be full "of doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness" had degenerated in too many parishes into a brief and pithless essay, disguised from Seneca, or diluted from Epictetus;—without unction or spirituality of tone, and bringing no comfort or refreshment to a weary audience. It neither moved the careless nor edified the godly. The people in multitudes of parishes asked bread, and they received a stone. At the same time their rights had been torn from them, and their petitions for redress were either scorned, as the ravings of a weak fanaticism, or scowled upon as the proof of political disaffection. The General Assembly upheld patronage, and condemned "the Marrow" with the same sturdy vehemence. While it was taking away their privileges it was bidding its constituents feed on a theology meagre as husks. The people, while they were tantalized with a negative gospel, were fettered with parliamentary restrictions. The ruling party in the Assembly were as hostile to popular rights as they were to evangelical truth, while the minority were opposed to them in both particulars. Moderatism was in the ascendant, and it seemed to be waiting an opportunity of punishing and weakening its assailants. It could not bear to be spoken against, and was especially indignant at faithful remonstrance. It had taken away the privilege of complaint and protest against one class of its decisions. It was jealous of the freedom which the pulpit yet enjoyed, and it was an attempt to put down "liberty of prophesying," which was the proximate origin of the Secession. The synod-sermon of Ebenezer Erskine was selected for the experiment. Such an attempt presupposes that fatal declension in creed and discipline which we have attempted to sketch.

Ebenezer Erskine was of the Erskines of Shielhill in Berwickshire, a branch of the ancient and noble house of Mar. His father, Henry Erskine, on being ejected from his church at Cornhill by the Act of Uniformity, resided for many years at Dryburgh. He was heavily fined by the Scottish Council, and imprisoned in the Tolbooth, on account of his refusal to refrain altogether from preaching. Narrowly escaping incarceration in Review of the assembly's conduct.

Process against Professor Campbell.

Sketch of Ebenezer Erskine.

the Bass, he was, under the Act of Indulgence, allowed to officiate at Whitsome, and after the Revolution he became minister of the parish of Chirnside. Ebenezer was born in 1680, and was ordained at Portmoak, near Kinross, in 1703. His ministry in this rural spot was peaceful and active, and after his own soul had been fully and experimentally opened to the power of evangelical truth, his labours were crowned with signal success. He was one of the many who refused to take the oath of abjuration, and earnestly condemned the restored law of patronage. From the first he took a lively and prominent interest in the Marrow controversy, and his coadjutors gave him their entire confidence. After labouring twenty-eight years in Portmoak, and refusing calls to other parishes, he was translated to Stirling in 1731. In the following year, as a member of assembly, when he protested against the act which made patronage more firm, he addressed the court in these strains:—"Moderator, I find, by the reading of the minutes, that the dissent which was entered yesterday by some members of the assembly, is not marked, and I crave that it may be marked, it being a privilege common in every free country. The reason why I insist that it may be marked is, that I consider the act of assembly to be without warrant from the word of God, and inconsistent with the acts and constitution of this church since our reformation, particularly in our books of Discipline. As I said before in the assembly—viz. in the case of Kinross—so, Moderator, I now say it again: I know of no ecclesiastical authority under heaven but what is derived from Christ, the exalted King of Zion. It is in his name and authority that we are met and constituted in a national assembly. He is the alone foundation that God hath laid in Zion. His righteousness is the foundation of our justification and acceptance before God, and his authority as a king is the alone foundation of all government, and discipline, laws, and acts that are to be imposed upon his church. And in regard I do not see upon what part of the word this act is founded; I therefore conclude that it wants the authority of Christ, and that the assembly, in this particular, has gone off from the true foundation of government. We are charged with the custody and feeding of his sheep, his lambs, his little ones. It is not the world's great ones, or rich ones, we are entrusted with; and yet by this act, the privileges of his little ones are conferred upon heritors and the great ones of the world. I am so far from thinking this act, conferring the power upon heritors beyond other men, to come and choose ministers of the gospel, to be founded on the word, that I consider it diametrically contrary to it. What difference does a piece of land make between man and man in the affairs of Christ's kingdom, which "is not of this world?" Are not we commanded in the word to do nothing by partiality? whereas here is the most manifest partiality in the world.

We are told that God hath chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith. It is not said, he hath chosen the heritors of this world, as we have done; but he hath chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom. And if they be heirs of the kingdom, I wish to know by what warrant they are stript of the privileges of the kingdom? Moderator, I consider that by this act the assembly have sunk one of the principal branches of our reformation asserted in our books of Discipline,—I mean the right of the church and members thereof to choose their own pastors, a privilege with the custody of which we are entrusted. Our worthy forefathers handed down this, among other branches of the reformation, at the expense of their blood and treasure. And that I may not be accessory to the betrayal of a trust which we are obliged to hand down to our posterity and the generation following, I insist that my dissent may be marked in the records of this assembly."

Mr. Erskine, was, therefore, a man of note in his party. Already had he been ^{Synod of} singled out and dealt with as an ^{Stirling and} upholder of "the Marrow." His ^{Perth.} intrepidity was unquestioned, and his suavity was matter of general eulogy. His figure was ample and his carriage noble. Peculiar gravity enriched his eloquence, and his voice possessed no little sweetness and power. His mental powers were excellent, but in no sense commanding. He was distinguished more for moral prowess than for intellectual splendour. Sobriety and candour characterised him. He took a plain and practical view of matters, and could state his mind easily, lucidly, and boldly. His utterance was that of a man felt to be speaking his sincere convictions. He loved the Church, and mourned for her; but he was not of that numerous class who think it fidelity to exaggerate defects.

A few sentences as to Mr. Erskine's coadjutors may not be inappropriate. William ^{Sketches of} Wilson, minister of Perth, who laboured and suffered with Ebenezer ^{the four} Erskine, was related through his ^{brethren—} mother to the martyred Guthrie, of Stirling. His father having fled to Holland in the days of persecution, came back in the train of the Prince of Orange. A student of no ordinary promise and diligence, Wilson became a preacher of popularity and power. He was ordained as third minister of Perth on the 1st November, 1716. "The whole people of Perth," he records in his diary, "cleave to me with the utmost affection." His theology was a living thing, and his preaching never had the languor and formality of a dead orthodoxy. Already in his youth had he been a witness against Professor Simson, and he joined the evangelical party in 1721, for he had from the commencement of his ministry felt a deep sympathy with all reforming movements in the Church. When Mr. Erskine's sermon was attacked in the synod of Perth, he took a prominent part in the preacher's defence. His mind could not as yet forecast what was to be the result, but he boldly trod what he believed to be the path of duty. He was held in such esteem by his associates that they chose him as their first professor of theology. His learning and judgment were matured. His mind, more than that of any of his colleagues, was adapted and trained to academic labour. He had a vigorous intellect, with extensive stores of theological knowledge, and his mental greatness lay in the balance and harmony of his powers. He possessed also, in a high degree, the gift of extemporaneous eloquence, and was named the "tongue" of the Associate presbytery. Wilson did not long survive the Secession, and his fame has been somewhat overshadowed by the merited eminence of the Erskines. He was a younger man than either of them, but the one of them outlived him eleven, and the other thirteen, years. He had not the commanding oratory of Ebenezer Erskine, nor the rich fancy and glowing eloquence of Ralph; but he had intellectual power equal to either, and an influence in the counsels of the brethren superior to both. He became the literary champion of the Secession, and he wrote in good temper and with excellent argument.

The third of the seceding fathers was Alexander Moncrieff, minister of Abernethy. Moncrieff. His grandfather, the minister of Seoonie, had suffered not a little at the hands of the Stewarts, and was condemned to choose an abode twenty miles away from the seat of a bishop, and seven from a royal burgh. His grandson, though possessed of the fine estate of Culfargie, resolved to give himself to the ministry, and studied first at St. Andrew's, and afterwards at Leyden. Ordained as minister of the parish in which his estate lay, and married to the daughter of Sir John Clerk, of Pennicuik, he did not yield to any of those seductions which his fortune or his connections presented to him. The laird grew a faithful and laborious minister, burning with a zeal, which, when kindled up on great occasions, sometimes outran his discretion. He stood by Mr. Erskine in the synod of Perth, and nobly maintained what he reckoned the cause of truth. After the deposition of the four protesters, Culfargie contributed mainly to the building of a new place of worship; gave from his own estate, in perpetuity to the congregation, some excellent acres of glebe-land; and declined all pecuniary emolument for his pastoral services, which were greatly multiplied after he left the establishment. Activity, energy, intrepidity, and disinterestedness, more than talent and eloquence, characterised Alexander Moncrieff.

The fourth and youngest of the associate brethren was James Fisher, first, minister of Barr, in Ayrshire, and then of Kinclaven, in Perthshire. From his first entrance into the ministry he was an advocate of popular rights. His ministrations were very acceptable to his parish, and he was scrupulously diligent in discharging all the functions of the pastoral office. He took part in all the movements which led to the Secession, though, from a feeling of delicacy, he did not vote or dissent in the synod, when the sermon of his father-in-law, Mr. Erskine, was the object of discussion and censure. Some time after the separation from the establishment he removed to Glasgow, as minister of what is now Greyfriars congregation. Mr. Fisher's principal literary work was the catechetical exposition of the Shorter Catechism,—a production in which he bore the principal share, and which, like its text-book, has long been a standard work among the pious people of Scotland. It deserves its popularity as a clear, concise, simple, and full compend of revealed truth.

A few sentences about Ralph Erskine, of Dunfermline, who joined the seceders prior to their final departure from Ralph Erskine. the Church, will not be out of place. His fame as a preacher was great and wide. His style was flowing and pictorial, with no little elevation and power. His mind had more acuteness and grandeur than that of his brother Ebenezer, and had also more of a philosophical cast. While he could reason with precision, he could describe in fascinating colours, so that a great Sabbath audience in the open air would listen to him for hours together. His "Gospel Sonnets" were long prodigious favourites among the pious Scottish peasantry; their quaint conceits and rugged rhymes, while they gave edge to their theology, fitted them for easy recollection and savoury repetition. His "Faith no Fancy" exhibits variety and discrimination, and touches on several points, the fuller elucidation of which afterwards distinguished the school of Scottish metaphysics.

The four "associate brethren" were not characterised by intellectual brilliancy or the highest order of mental endowment. Neither had they those powers which sway vast multitudes and win them to their purpose; nor did they labour to gain an immense following by popular agitation. They were not demagogues, or ambitious men soured into resentment. Their might lay in the goodness of their cause and the consistency of their character; and their success had its origin in their known probity, courage, and self-denying labours. Their adherents were not among the noble and mighty, and they were not borne on by the admiration of crowds. They were frowned upon and maligned, censured for their folly, and laughed to scorn for their obstinacy. Nor were they hasty in their procedure,—every step they took was one of sorrow. The idea of founding a new denomination never entered into their original plans, and they only entertained it when expelled from the Church, and forced to adopt some method for preserving an official and corporate existence. In a word, they were the dupes of no sudden conviction, but had for years advocated the theology which the Assembly had seen meet to condemn, and asserted the popular rights which the same court had all but obliterated.

But to return. Mr. Erskine felt that if the Assembly refused to record his protest against its decisions the pulpit was still open to him; and on a public occasion he resolved, in presence of his brethren, to exonerate his conscience. The synod of Stirling and Perth met at Perth on the 18th of October, 1732, and, as retiring moderator, Mr. Erskine preached at the opening of the court. His text was Ps. cxviii. 22, "The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner." The sermon which produced such results is worth a moment's attention. The first portion of it consists of appropriate illustrations of his text, —its masonic figure of the church as an edifice, and Christ as its one foundation. When he spoke of the builders, he could not but admit that they were liable to err, and could not but confess in sorrow that they had egregiously erred. Under this head we find the following warm and effective argument urged against patronage:—"It is the natural privilege of every house or society of men to have the choice of their own servants or officers; so is it the privilege of the house of God in a particular manner. What a miserable bondage would it be reckoned for any family to have stewards or servants imposed on them by strangers, who might give the children a stone for bread, or a scorpion instead of fish, or poison instead of medicine! And shall we suppose that God ever granted to any set of men,—patrons, heritors, or whatever they may be,—a power to impose servants on His family without their consent, they being the freest society in the world?" Towards the close of his discourse he became more pointed and energetic, and plainly remonstrated against such a recent evil as the act of the last assembly—"Only allow me to say, that whatever church authority may be in that act, yet it wants the authority of the Son of God. All authority is derived from Him, and, therefore, any act that wants His authority, has no authority at all. And, seeing the reverend synod has put me in this place, where I am in Christ's stead, I must be allowed to say of this act what I apprehend Christ himself would say of it were he personally present where I am,—and that is, that by this act the corner-stone is receded from; He is rejected in his poor members, and the rich of this world put in their room. By this act Christ is rejected from his authority, because I can find no warrant in the word of God to confer the spiritual privilege of His house upon the rich beyond the poor; whereas, by this act, the man with the gold ring and gay clothing is preferred unto the man with the vile raiment and poor attire." The synod was shocked by the preacher's fidelity, and some members immediately complained. Their complaints were classified by a committee, and fortified by extracts from the sermon. Three days were spent in keen debate, and, by a majority of six, the synod doomed the preacher to a formal censure. Mr. Erskine and not a few of his friends protested. But the attempt of the synod failed, the preacher declaring that his accusers "had never yet made it appear that he had in the least receded from the word of God and our approved standards of doctrine, worship, discipline, or government." The case was carried to the General Assembly of 1733, and Erskine stood forth, surrounded by his three friends,—Wilson of Perth, Moncrieff of Abernethy, and Fisher of Kinclaven. The principal culprit alone was heard; his fellow protesters were bluntly refused. His dignified self-vindication only enraged the court, which now "refused to be ashamed," and he was again sentenced to be "rebuked and admonished at their own bar, in order to terminate the process." The conclusion of the process was certainly very different from the assembly's anticipations. The rebuke, however, was administered. St. Giles of Edinburgh mimicked the Vatican with innocuous thunder. The reformer protested, but his protest was refused, and contemptuously thrown upon a pile of documents. The paper was disregarded for some hours, but happening to fall over the table, it was accidentally picked up by the minister of Dalmeny, "a fiery man in the corrupt measures of that time." He read it with indignation, and at once, and with pompous solemnity informed the Assembly of the awful discovery. Such was their haste on hearing its contents, that at eleven o'clock that night the four protesters received a peremptory citation to appear at the bar next day. They were summarily dealt with, and handed over to the tender mercies of the Commission which was to meet in August. The Commission counselled them to retract, but they steadily refused. Then, to bring them to a penitent state of mind, a committee was appointed to converse with them. That committee had several great names in it—the principals of three universities, the lord-advocate and solicitor-general, Lords Grange and Dunmore, with Boswell of Auchinleck; but it signally failed either to overawe or convince the recusants. The Commission therefore suspended them "from the exercise of their ministerial functions and all the parts thereof." Some synods and several presbyteries soon sent up petitions in their favour, but the Commission at its next meeting, in November, formally severed them from their respective charges, and declared "them to be no longer ministers of this church." The Assembly also ordered "notice of this sentence to be sent to the magistrates of Perth and Stirling, to the sheriff-principal of Perth, and the bailie of the regality of Abernethy." Against such a sentence the "four brethren" protested in the following magnanimous terms:—

"Edinburgh, Nov. 16th, 1733—We do heartily adhere to the protestations formerly entered before this court, both at their last meeting in August and when we appeared first before this meeting. And further, we do protest in our name, and in the name of all and every one in our congregations adhering to us, that notwithstanding of this sentence passed against us, our pastoral relation shall be held and reputed firm and valid. And, likewise, we do protest, that notwithstanding of our being cast out of ministerial communion with the Church of Scotland, we still hold communion with all and every one who desires with us to adhere to the principles of the true presbyterian covenanting Church of Scotland in her doctrine, worship, government, and discipline; and particularly with every one who is groaning under the evils, and who are afflicted with the grievances we have been complaining of, and who are in their several spheres wrestling against the same. But in regard to the prevailing party in the Established Church, who have now cast us out from ministerial communion with them, are carrying on a course of defection from our reformed and covenanted principles, and particularly are suppressing ministerial freedom and faithfulness in testifying against the prevailing backslidings of the Church, and inflicting censure on ministers for witnessing by protestation and otherwise against the same: therefore, do we for these and many other weighty reasons, to be laid open in due time, protest that we are obliged to MAKE A SECESSION from them, and that we can have no ministerial communion with them till they see their sins and mistakes, and amend them. And in like manner we do protest that it shall be lawful and warrantable for us to exercise the keys of doctrine, discipline, and government according to the Word of God and Confession of Faith, and the principles and constitution of the Church of Scotland, as if no such censure had been passed upon us. Upon all which we take instruments; and we hereby appeal unto the first free, faithful, and reforming General Assembly of the Church of Scotland."

The Secession was thus originated—the reformers were cast out. For these weighty reasons—the sufferance of theological errors without adequate censure; the infliction of the law of patronage; the neglect of discipline; and the restraint of ministerial freedom in testifying against mal-administration—the four ministers felt themselves compelled "to make a secession" from the prevailing party in the church by law established. A few weeks afterwards, they met at Gairney-bridge, a small hamlet in the neighbourhood of Kinross, and the associate presbytery was formally constituted. It was a crisis that required no common courage. To be flung out of a church which they had long loved and served; to be so rudely severed from the chosen sphere of their labours; to be suddenly denied the ordinary means of maintenance for themselves, without prospect of any new source of support; to be laid under the ban of the Assembly at a period when ecclesiastical censures had scarcely been divested of their popish terrors, and when dissent was an unknown and a perilous novelty, was indeed a trial so great and formidable, that nothing could have sustained them but faith and a good conscience, with the assured hope of acceptance with Him in whose cause such labours had been undertaken, and such hazards incurred. The seceders prepared a "Testimony," or vindication, of their conduct, in which they boldly justified their procedure, and adduced, as they believed, an overwhelming mass of evidence in their favour.

The parishes in which the seceders had laboured were deeply agitated, and refused to listen to any other pastors. When the minister of Killin went to intimate the sentence of the commission in Wilson's church at Perth, a multitude met him on the road, and would on no account permit him to enter the city. When Professor Campbell of St. Andrew's was ordered to do the same duty at Abernethy, he applied to the sheriff-substitute of the county for protection, and, on being refused, he discreetly stayed at home.

When the Assembly met in 1734, it seemed to have regretted the bold steps which it had taken, and to have been scared at the agitation which it had excited. Several intolerant decisions were modified or rescinded. The act that forbade the recording of reasons of dissent, and the one in reference to the filling of vacant churches, were declared to be no longer "binding rules of this church." The settlement of an obnoxious minister in Auchtermuchty was annulled. It was admitted that an unscriptural style of preaching had become prevalent, and a committee was named to take charge of this matter. Nay, the Assembly followed up these proceedings by an act authorising the Synod of Stirling and Perth to take off the sentence of censure from Mr. Erskine and his associates, "without further inquiring into the occasions or steps of proceeding, either on the part of the said brethren, or by the several judicatories under whose consideration their case hath been, which may have produced that unhappy separation, but resolving that all questions on these heads shall for hereafter be comfortably removed." This policy could not be satisfactory. It left one of the questions unsettled, and would only have opened a door to further disputations. It was in vain to enjoin silence after the waters of strife had been unsluiced; and, to use the current language of those times, this measure of the assembly was only healing the hurt of the daughter of Zion slightly; or, to adopt another favourite figure, it was but daubing a broken wall with untempered mortar. This synod, so instructed, met at Stirling, July 2, 1734, as the Assembly commanded, and restored the brethren "as fully and freely as if there never had been act, sentence, obstacle, or impediment whatsoever in the way thereof in time past."

Many who sympathised with the seceders began to hope that they might be induced to return now to the national church. One of their own number cherished a similar anticipation. Hope against hope lingered in Mr. Wilson's heart. After the synod had passed the act of restoration, the presbytery of Stirling went so far as, in Mr. Erskine's absence, to elect him to the moderator's chair. But the seceders took time to deliberate. There had been in various parishes.

Excitement

Alarm on the part of the Assembly.

Refusal of seceders to return—

no intimation that the sentence pronounced against them was deemed to be unfounded. It was rescinded simply on account of the consequences that might ensue from their separation, and not because it was in itself either unjust or precipitate. Nothing was said of the condemnation of the "Marrow." The leniency of the assembly was, therefore regarded as a mere stratagem, and the seceders would not be decoyed into conformity. They refused to appear as respited or pardoned transgressors; nor would they tamely belie the mighty interests which, in their honest belief, and to the best of their power, they represented.

It has been sometimes alleged that the seceders—vindication ought at this period to have gone of their refusal. back to the Church. The conditions proposed by the Assembly have been even recently described as "honourable terms."* Such a view of the matter is naturally entertained by those who think that there was no tenable ground for any secession at all. The conditions proposed to the seceders were such as no honourable mind could have listened to. Their conduct was still condemned, for it was professedly forgiven. The affair was simply to be hushed up, and no discussion was to be permitted. Some decisions respecting freedom of administration were altered, but not a word was uttered in favour of evangelical truth, and no modification of the sentence against the Marrow had ever been so much as hinted at. If the seceders, after the measures which they had so decidedly adopted, had re-entered the Church in such circumstances, they would have sadly stultified themselves; and their subsequent advocacy of sound doctrine must have been feeble and spiritless. An open departure and a public protest like theirs were needed in the juncture; for the friends of truth and liberty who remained in the Church seemed to have made no effort to obtain the repeal of its Arminian acts and decisions; and to this day they stand uncanceled on the records of the General Assembly. That the proposals of return were made to the seceders "under evangelical influence,"† is another statement very much to be doubted. The Assembly does not allege such a motive for itself, and we have no evidence that it existed. It was rather the fear of schism that induced the dominant party to try to win back Erskine and his colleagues. Where was this powerful "evangelical influence" in subsequent years, when the seceders were scorned by the Assembly as wretched and turbulent demagogues, and no voice was uplifted on their behalf; when the people who waited on their ministry were alleged "to come with other views than to promote religion;" and when the Venerable Court of 1741 sanctioned a grant of sixty pounds to Mr. Currie for his virulent and unscrupulous assault on the men and motives of the secession?‡ The secession was a calm and deliberate act, and they who seceded were not to be easily cajoled. Neither wounded pride nor intemperate haste could be ascribed to them. Love of pre-eminence, or fondness for popular applause, had no place in their hearts. They were actuated not by the lust of innovation, but by the desire to abide by the "old paths." Had they been immoral, they might have been screened; had they been indolent, they would never have been troubled; and had they been heretical, indulgence might have been shown them; but because they dared to speak against those acts of assembly which they regarded as unconstitutional, and as prejudicial to the purity, the rights, and the creed of the Church, they were held to be guilty of a flagrant and aggravated crime, to which justice must be meted out without mitigation or respite. These sentences are written, indeed, from the seceders' standpoint; but the lapse of a century has shown that their judgment was in the main correct: and after making every allowance for such passion and frailty as mix themselves up with every human contest, it may be affirmed that the first secession from the Church of Scotland was as disinterested and noble an act as any one of a similar nature which ecclesiastical history has narrated. Had the seceders not been so "haughty," as Burton terms them,* had they gone back to the Church on the terms proposed, how long could they have remained? In spite of the acts of that assembly which decreed their restoration, violent settlements were again resorted to. The parishes of Perth, Duffus, Monikie, and Muckhart were the scene of intrusions; and, as the presbytery of Stirling had refused to ordain a rejected presentee at Denny, the synod of Perth was enjoined to take up the matter, under the express instruction that they were debarred from considering the question whether they should obey or not. What would have been the anomalous position of the seceders in such a church? They would have been driven to repeat their former procedure, and a second protest and separation would have lost all the weight and solemnity of the first secession. It is, however, plain, on the other hand, that the seceders by degrees drew off from many in the Church who sympathised with them, under the natural impression that those who felt with them should have acted with them, and joined at length the new denomination.

Two other assemblies passed away, and no notice was taken of the seceders. But Subsequent they were not idle; they published procedure. a "Judicial Testimony," and churches were formed by them in various parts of the country. Mr. Wilson, of Perth, was chosen professor of theology, and the number of their students annually increased. The whole business of the class was conducted in the Latin language, and John Marck's "Medulla" was the text-book. In 1741, Ralph Erskine, who had joined the secession in 1737, wrote to George Whitefield, "our professor of divinity has more candidates for the ministry under his charge than most of the public colleges, except Edinburgh."

* "The Ten Years' Conflict," by Robert Buchanan, D.D., vol. i. p. 182.

† Ibid.

‡ Wilson; "Defence" and "Continuation," passim.

* History of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 330.

Young men were licensed to preach, and the Secession rapidly became a popular and organised community. Not fewer than seventy applications for supply of sermon were made in the two years 1737 and 1738.

In the meantime, the Porteous riot had occurred. The Porteous riot. in Edinburgh, and led to the adoption of some rash and vindictive measures on the part of the legislature. Every minister in the Church of Scotland was commanded to read a proclamation against the rioters from the pulpit, during public worship, on the first Sabbath of each month during a whole year. If any minister refused, he was for the first offence to be declared incapable of sitting and voting in any church court, and for the second, he was pronounced incapable of "taking, holding, or enjoying any ecclesiastical benefice in Scotland." The majority of the ministers bowed to this edict, some used ludicrous shifts to evade it, and only a few pointedly refused. The act was felt by many to be a wanton infringement on the rights of the Church—a dictation to which none but an Erastian community could submit. The parliament had assumed the power of declaring what ministers should do, and of inflicting discipline if they should refuse. Compliance with the enactment raised commotion in many parishes, and aided the spread of the secession. The seceders were accused of disloyalty, because they unanimously, and without hesitation, refused to read the edict; and the Duke of Argyll, in his place in the House of Peers, more than insinuated that the riots at Edinburgh arose "from a few fanatical preachers lately started up, who, by their sermons and other ways, instilled into the minds of the vulgar and ignorant such enthusiastic notions as are inconsistent with all government, by making sedition and rebellion a principle of their religion." His grace could not understand the principle on which the Secession was founded, and he identified resistance to spiritual despotism with civil insubordination and revolution. The loyalty of the seceders was unimpeachable, and a few years afterwards, in '45, it was evinced so strikingly as to command the high approbation of the ruling powers. The Duke of Argyll seems to have thought that the seceders might resemble the covenanters, who had been accustomed to waver in their allegiance, and who could neither find it in their hearts to obey an uncovenanted latitudinarian Dutch king, nor submit without murmuring to the last of the Stewarts. The covenanters confounded citizenship and saintship, and dreamed of something like a theocracy. But the seceders uniformly yielded obedience to the civil government in its own domain. They held it to be wholly distinct from ecclesiastical administration, and cheerfully paid tribute as subjects of the realm. They were willing to fight for Cæsar on the field, though they opposed his intrusion into the synod. The things which were his they cheerfully rendered, while they solemnly dedicated to God the things which were God's, and would admit of no compromise.

But the "disorderly practices of certain seceding ministers" at length attracted the attention of the ecclesiastical authorities, and complaints against them were made before the assembly of 1738. The case was referred to the commission, by whom a libel, or formal indictment charging for "high crimes," was framed against each of the seceding brethren, and they were cited to appear at next assembly. These ministers, now amounting to eight, appeared before the Assembly as a constituted presbytery, and their moderator read a "declinature" to the moderator of the General Assembly. The Assembly was startled by this "unparalleled boldness," and sentence was ultimately passed on the 15th of May, 1740. Our readers may have some curiosity to read the document which inflicted, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, the highest censure on men who were guilty of no crime but that of serving the Lord Jesus Christ, not only according to their consciences, but according to the ancient and genuine constitution of the Scottish Church. Thus ran the decree:—

"And, therefore, the General Assembly, in respect of the articles found relevant and proven against the persons therein and hereafter named by the last and this assembly, as aforesaid, did, and hereby do, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, the sole King and head of the Church, and by virtue of the power and authority committed by Him to them, actually depose Messrs. Ebenezer Erskine at Stirling, William Wilson at Perth, Alexander Moncrieff at Abernethy, James Fisher at Kinclaven, Ralph Erskine at Dunfermline, Thomas Mair at Orwell, Thomas Nairn at Abbotshall, and James Thomson at Burntisland, ministers, from the office of the holy ministry, prohibiting and discharging them, and every one of them, to exercise the same, or any part thereof, within this Church in all times coming; and the Assembly did, and hereby do declare, all the parishes or charges of the persons above named, vacant, from and after the day and date of this sentence, and ordains copies hereof to be sent to the several presbyteries of Stirling, Perth, Dunkeld, Dunfermline, and Kirkaldy; and the said respective presbyteries are hereby ordered to send copies thereof to the kirk sessions of Perth and Dunfermline, and session clerks of the other respective parishes hereby declared vacant, to be communicated to the elders. And the Assembly appoints that letters be wrote by their moderator to the magistrates of the respective burghs concerned with copies of this sentence; and the Assembly recommends to the presbyteries, within whose bounds the parishes or charges declared vacant do lie, to be careful in using their best endeavours for supplying the same during the vacancy, and for promoting the speedy and comfortable settlement thereof."

Up till this time the new church thought itself in some sense connected with the Establishment. They could not deem themselves finally cast off. Their doctrine

Final measures against the seceders.

Results.

was that they had seceded not from the Church of Scotland, but from a party in that church who were carrying on a "course of defection and backsliding." But by this last sentence the majority of the deposed ministers were ejected from their places of worship. Two of them, by the kindness of the heritors, retained their churches till new ones were built for them. Moncrieff preached during the whole winter in the open air; Mr. Nairn of Abbotshall occupied his church till October, when the heritors, "at their own hands," locked the doors and nailed iron plates on the keyholes. The magistrates of Stirling, on receiving the decision, barred the church and church-yard against Mr. Erskine, and forbade the bells to be rung. The multitude, on the Sabbath morning, was immense, and in a state of deep exasperation. The venerable patriarch entered the crowd, and on being refused admission, lifted thrice his great pulpit Bible, which he carried with him, and solemnly protested, in front of the closed sanctuary, that he was obeying the dictates of his conscience, and that his oppressors were responsible at the judgment-seat of God. The people and he then retired to the slope of the hill north of the ancient castle, and divine worship was peacefully conducted on that spot associated with many interesting events in the history of the country.

The scene at Perth was yet more impressive. The civic authorities at Perth were very obsequious to the Kirk—they received the edict on the Sabbath morning, and that very day they resolved to enforce it. Their anxious haste proved that they were afraid of reflection. Mr. Wilson had been made aware of this movement, and fortified himself by prayer. An unusual thoughtfulness was that morning visible on his countenance. The church in which he had laboured for four-and-twenty years was now to be shut against him. The domestic meal was postponed to an unwonted season, if not altogether neglected. His household servants gathered that something strange was about to fall upon them, and whispered to one another their ominous forebodings. From his closet, nerved and resolved, Mr. Wilson went to the church. Its doors were shut, and the civic magnates proudly guarded them with mace and halberets. An immense assemblage, astonished and perplexed at the scene, crowded the streets, musing in their minds what might be the issue. Mr. Wilson passed through the throng, who made way for him with profound obeisance, went up to the principal entrance of the church, and confronting the municipal authorities, boldly requested admission into the house of God—"In the name of my Divine Master, I ask admission into his temple." Once—a second time—a third time, he repeated the solemn demand, and was met with a curt and firm denial. The expectant multitude were surprised and irritated. A low murmur ran along them,—"Mr. Wilson's kept out o' the kirk!" The aged wept, the younger heaved with indignation. There was a movement—a muttered menace, then a yell—"Stone them—stone them!" The storm was rising—a minute more, and it would have burst. But the popular fury was suddenly hushed. Wilson turned to the vast assemblage, heaving in wrathful commotion around him, and his serene countenance and tranquil attitude commanded their attention. "No violence," he exclaimed, in tones of earnest and impressive calmness, "no violence, my friends: the Master whom I serve is the Prince of Peace." Their rage was stayed. The man of God triumphed, and the victory was sealed—when shrill and clear these words of power rang again over the wedged masses, and were heard to their outmost verge,—"No violence, my friends, I implore you; the Master whom I serve is the Prince of Peace." During the lull, the deacon of the Glovers' Corporation interfered, and spontaneously offered to Mr. Wilson the glovers' yard as a place of temporary meeting. The proposal was immediately accepted, and the vast concourse at once adjourned. The yard was immediately filled. The services commenced with Mr. Wilson's solemn reading of a few verses of the fifty-fifth Psalm. His vast audience felt how appropriate were the words which the minister slowly recited:—

"He was no foe that me reproach'd,
Then that endure I could;
Nor hater that did 'gainst me boast,
From him me hide I would:
"But thou, man, who mine equal, guide,
And mine acquaintance wast:
We join'd sweet counsels, to God's house
In company we pass'd."

Hundreds who sung these words were thrilled by the truth of them—felt how bitter was the pang of exile from the dominant Church—and how that Church, in ejecting them, had renounced its own principles, and violated all its sacred professions. It was not the world, but the Church that "reproached" them. It was not a "foe" that afflicted them, but an "equal," "guide," and "acquaintance," often revered in the ties of Christian fellowship. Wilson's text was one also of singular adaptation to the scene and circumstances, Heb. xiii. 13—"Let us go forth, therefore, unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach." The deep solemnity in which the words were uttered, and the immediate sensation which they awakened among the people, were, perhaps, the most vivid commentary which the text ever received. The Glovers' yard was a living illustration of the duty which the apostle inculcated, and the sermon had its echo in the experience of the auditors. The meeting at length quietly dispersed, carrying with them those impressions which ripened into decided attachment to the Secession and its interests. Round many a hearth was the scene described to wondering listeners, while the text was repeated times without number. Old men delighted to tell to their children's children, how Mr. Wilson looked and spoke in the Glovers' yard, and how at the very reading of the text each one held his breath, and a spell so deep and awful lay upon them, that not a stir or rustle was heard in all the great congregation. Two anecdotes, handed down by family tradition, in connection with these events, are recorded by Dr. Ferrier in his life of Wilson. Mr. Wilson's father had lain hid for a season in the Mearn's Moor, in the days of former persecution, and a young girl carried his food to his place of retreat. She seems to have become an inmate of the family, and she was treated with peculiar and tender deference in Mr. Wilson's household at Perth. On the morning of this trying Sabbath, the aged domestic was somewhat apprehensive and uneasy. Her busy memory brought back the scenes of her youth, when she glided away stealthily, morning and evening, to the wild and gloomy morass where her master was concealed. The privations of the father made her anxious for the welfare of the son. And as the tide of these sad recollections filled her heart, she could not help looking wistfully in her master's face, as he was leaving his home on his way to the church, and saying to him, "Tak' tent, Mr. William, tak' tent what ye're doing, for I fear, if things gang on this way, I'll get ye're meat to carry to the moor, as I did ye're guid father's afore ye." When Mr. Wilson returned from the service of the day, he retired at once to his chamber. Many thoughts must have pressed upon him, and he sought quiet and uninterrupted meditation. His eldest daughter, a girl about twelve years of age, had witnessed with natural curiosity the strange proceedings, had seen her father seek admission to his own church, and had heard the gruff refusal which the magistrates gave him. She had been also in the Glovers' yard, and had beheld thousands of faces looking up to her sire with intense excitement. But she was sorely puzzled to understand these novelties. Her natural wish was to hear them explained by her father. The matter appeared to her young mind so solemn that she was afraid to ask what she coveted. But with restless anxiety she "hung about" the door of the study, anxious to obtain at least a glimpse of his countenance. Her father at last observed her, and reading her wishes in her features, called her to him, and patting her kindly on the head, said to her, "Bell, this has indeed been a day of trial, but we have reason—great reason, to be thankful that it has not been a day of shame. If anybody asks you, Bell, why your papa lost his kirk, you may just say, as good Mr. Guthrie before his execution bade my mother say of him, if any one asked her why he lost his head,—IT WAS IN A GOOD CAUSE."

The Secession, on thus becoming a separate Church, met in many quarters with violent opposition. Sites for chapels were refused, and occasionally at an open-air meeting the surrounding heath or furze was set on fire to annoy the worshippers. Sometimes, on pretence of being engaged in the chase, their enemies kept up an incessant fire of musketry in their vicinity. Their character was maligned, their motives were aspersed, and they were held up to popular odium as fools and demagogues. One of their former admirers wrote a noted book against them, which called forth Mr. Wilson's unanswerable "Defence."

The Secession had other trials at its commencement. Difference of opinion on Differences of some minor points existed among opinion. its members, and the fault of the period was to attach an exaggerated importance to subordinate matters, and to insist on uniformity as essential to ecclesiastical unity. Men who had followed their conscience at all hazards, were apt to regard every conviction as of equal and paramount authority, and to insist on a rigorous acquiescence in all their views. They held it necessary to be as much "of one mind" about the "mint, anise, and cummin," as about "the weightier matters of the law." Misunderstanding and strife were the necessary result, and that in a variety of shapes and instances. A fast had been appointed by royal authority for the first day of February, 1740. The Associate Presbytery deemed it becoming that they should take advantage of a day which would be generally set apart for public worship. Some of the people were greatly offended at such a compliance, and thought that it was an unworthy surrender of ecclesiastical independence. The presbytery nearly came to an open rupture on the subject, its members could not act in harmony, and could not agree to any course that might have secured co-operation.

The famous revivalist and preacher, George Whitefield, arrived in Scotland on Whitefield's the 30th of July, 1741. There first visit to Scotland. had been previous communications between him and the Erskines, and he had expressed deep sympathy with their movements. When the Scottish covenants had been described to him, he replied to the brothers that "he was, perhaps, more to their mind, as to many things, than they were aware of." Ralph Erskine had intimated to him that he would be expected to co-operate chiefly with the Associate Presbytery, and act "under their counsel, direction, or advice." To this restriction Whitefield at once demurred, and intimated that he designed on coming to the north simply to preach the gospel, without respect of denomination or party. In reply, the seceders disclaimed all sectarian motives, but hinted that it would strengthen their hands if he could only see it to be his duty "to company with them." On Whitefield's arrival, a conference was held at Dunfermline, and the subject of church government was discussed at the first meeting, the object being to convince the English stranger that presbyterianism was right, and episcopacy unscriptural. Nobody will wonder that the attempt failed, that other similar interviews were profitless, and that mutual estrangement was the result. Whitefield's mission was preaching, and not organization. He alleged that the seceders were building up a Babel, soon to fall about their ears; and they regarded him in turn as a lax and fanatical innovator. He could not submit to be trammelled, nor could he concur with the Scottish predilection for presbytery and the covenants; and the seceders had not yet learned to act on the truth that the mere form of the altar may neither damp the fire nor pollute the sacrifice. Whitefield's sermons created prodigious commotion in many places, especially at Cambuslang, during his second visit; and, in spite of much that was objectionable, great permanent spiritual good seems to have been effected. The vehemence of his oratory, and the power of his appeals, threw his audiences often into convulsions. Some fainted and others shrieked, some tossed their arms wildly about them, and others shouted in vociferous prayer. The confusion was indescribable: visions were seen, and revelations received, while the language employed was that of the wildest frenzy. Looking too much at the strangeness of such proceedings, the seceders condemned the entire revival, or "Cambuslang work;" as it was called; held it up to scorn, as an infernal delusion; and appointed a fast, that they might mourn over it, so that the plague might be stayed. A bitter contest ensued. Some ministers of the Establishment taunted the seceders with their separation, and told them that such a divine visitation betokened that the Church of Scotland was still owned of God as a true church, and that, therefore, it was schism to leave her pale. The seceders might have admitted that Whitefield's preaching was signally successful, though there might be no little delusion and mere nervous excitement mixed up with the effect it produced; and they might have been thankful for an exhibition of evangelical power in the church they had left, while they felt that the causes of secession were not, on that account, either diminished in number or weakened in strength.*

In spite of these drawbacks, and though their Progress of the terms of communion embodied far Secession. too much of mere denominational tenets, the cause of the seceders grew and multiplied. Funds were collected to enable pious young men to enter on studies preparatory to the ministry, and a teacher of philosophy was appointed. Missionaries were sent over to Ireland, the Secession was introduced into London, and from America there came requests for a supply of preachers. In five years the presbytery expanded into a synod, consisting of thirty settled congregations and thirteen vacant ones, and held its first meeting at Stirling, in the memorable year '45,—immediately after the defeat of the royal troops by Prince Charles Stewart at Preston-pans.

During the rebellion the loyalty of the seceders Loyalty of the was both signal and effective: seceders. corps of volunteers were formed in several congregations; three hundred of them were embodied in Edinburgh; troops of them were drilled and disciplined in Glasgow; and six hundred of them at Stirling were furnished with arms from the castle. The Marquis of Lothian offered his son, Lord Robert Kerr, to be colonel of a secession regiment, and the Duke of Cumberland sent a letter of thanks to Ebenezer Erskine. The synod took into consideration the principles on which regiments of their people should be organised, but the battle of Culloden rendered a final decision unnecessary. The seceders naturally hated a popish Pretender; they remembered the boots and thumbkins, the scaffolds and troopers of the Stewarts in former days; and their loyalty was liable to no suspicion, for they had received no favours from the court, and had none either to ask or expect. The ardour of the days of the covenant was renewed for a season, and such was their uniform loyalty, that after a careful scrutiny in their various congregations, only three individuals could be found who had compromised themselves to any extent with the rebels, and they were at once subjected to ecclesiastical censure. The conduct of the seceders, so noble and patriotic, at this crisis must have silenced those who had calumniated them as factious and disloyal. It was the best reply that could be given to the defamatory attack which the Duke of Argyll had made upon them in the House of Peers.

But the horizon was suddenly darkened, and the synod became a "house di- The burgess oath. vided against itself." An unhappy controversy was introduced about the propriety of what was termed "the burgess oath," an oath imposed on burgesses in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Perth. Its religious clause was thus worded,— "Here I protest, before God and your lordships, that I profess and allow with my heart the true religion presently professed within this realm and authorised by the law thereof; and shall abide thereat, and defend the same to my life's end, renouncing the Roman religion, called papistry." Some held that the swearing of such an oath was a virtual approval of the Established Church, with all its corruptions, for to the men who framed the oath "the religion presently professed" was the religion by law established; while others as strenuously maintained that the oath referred only to the true religion as professed, but did not imply any approval as to the mode of its settlement. The oath was bad in every sense, as it made a civil right depend upon a religious profession, and would not suffer a man to sell beef or butter, shoes or broadcloth, till he had avowed himself a zealous and energetic Christian and Protestant. Probably the oath was framed to exclude papists from citizenship, and in that simple light many would have justified it, and thought it no persecution. Again and again, with increasing ardour, was the debate resumed in the synod. Several wise overtures for peace were not listened to, nor could those obtain a hearing who wished the oath to be made a subject of mutual forbearance, as being one of those things "which was never made matter of testimony in the Church of Scotland." After prolonged and unhallowed wrangling, and no little ecclesiastical thunder, the sharp contention ended in a separation in 1747. The party who were against the oath at once formed themselves into a synod, or rather declared that they were the synod, that the lawful authority and power of that court devolved on them, "and that they were obliged in duty to the Lord and his heritage to exercise the same." Nay more, in the spirit of the time, they resolved to exercise discipline upon their opponents, provided they did not confess and return. The next week after the separation they waxed mightier in their wrath, and passed an act in which they find that their opponents "are highly censurable, and have themselves, by this mal-administration, fallen from all right and title to any present actual exercise of the keys of the kingdom of heaven." This sentence was tantamount to one of deposition, and Ebenezer Erskine, Ralph Erskine, and Mr. Fisher were included in the sweeping censure,—Mr. Wilson being dead, and Mr. Moncreiff being the principal leader on the opposition side, or General Associate Synod, vulgarly called that of the Anti-burghers.

* For a view of the hard opinions entertained of the seceders by some good men who had sympathised with them, but did not leave the Church along with them, see Willison's "Fair and Impartial Testimony."

The Associate, or burgher synod, met at Stir-burghers and ling in June, and were still anti-burghers. anxious for a reconciliation. Ebenezer Erskine wrote, in the name of the brethren, an excellent letter, containing a conciliatory proposal, to which a reply was sent in haughty style,* with the intimation—"you have increased your fault by constituting yourselves unwarrantably into a pretended synod." In self-defence the burgher synod passed an act declaring the nullity of the pretended synod that "first met in Mr. Gib's house in Bristo, near Edinburgh," and they assign no less than twelve reasons for their decision. At their meeting next year in Falkirk they made another attempt at a compromise, and in their letter they accused the anti-burghers of "following divisive and disorderly practices." The party so challenged framed a libel against their antagonists, and actually deposed them from the office of the holy ministry, appointing intimation of the sentence to be made to their respective congregations, and declaring those congregations vacant. A war of pamphlets and bitter recrimination followed, sessions and churches were divided, lawsuits about ecclesiastical property were originated, partisanship was mistaken for conscience, and the two seceding factions soon said far worse things of one another than any of them had ever said of the church from which they had been expelled. The dispute shows the character of that age, when tolerance in minor matters could not be allowed, and when the censures of the Church were profusely scattered about. It was wrong to differ about the oath. The two interpretations might have been allowed in the meanwhile, and a vigorous effort made to have the oath abolished; or if the seceding church could walk no longer in concord, they needed not, on parting, to have hurled defiance and excommunication at one another. Granting that the Anti-burgher party were right in their view of the oath, and that it stultified a seceder to take it, it is too plain that they carried their measures with a high hand, and pushed them with intolerable rigour. What an unseemly spectacle the schism must have presented—men who had been but a few years ago deposed themselves, so soon and so furiously deposing one another! The moral influence of the Secession must have been greatly weakened for a season, and its enemies must have rejoiced over its intractable spirit, and predicted speedy ruin as the result of its fierce disunion.

* McKerrow's History, vol. i. p. 297.

But though the rival synods frowned apart on each other, they still pursued the Progress of work of evangelization with fide- both parties. lity and power. Both sent many ministers to Nova Scotia and the American states, and both contributed to the support of missions in various forms, and arranged a theological curriculum for their students. We do not detail their separate history farther. Suffice it to say, that the number of their adherents steadily increased; the cause had taken deep root in the land; and every ten years witnessed the rise of above a score of congregations. From 1790 to 1799 no less than twenty were formed. Both branches of the Secession were troubled with questions about the magistrates' power in religious affairs; and from both, half a century after the "breach," seceded small parties,* holding the right of the civil power in matters of religion, as it is thought to be defined in the "Confession of Faith." At this period the Anti-burgher synod emitted a testimony against the interference of the state in the regulation of the Church, declaring that the power of the Church is wholly spiritual, that the end of civil government is the public and temporal good of civil society, that neither of these kingdoms has power over the other,—that the Church has no civil authority and the magistrate no spiritual jurisdiction. The Burgher synod, in their preamble to their formula of ordination, were no less explicit in their views. So that what has been recently called Voluntarism is not a novelty in Scotland,—or at least, in its fuller and more defined form, it is but the development of principles which were long ago laid down and enforced.

It was scarcely to be expected that the Established Church should come round Origin of the to the views of the seceders after Relief. they had quitted her pale: nay, as in consequence of their division they soon ceased to be so formidable, the General Assembly fell back upon its old measures. Towards the year 1750, some of the patrons, on being opposed or questioned, carried their right before the court of session, and it was enacted that if presbyteries should refuse to ordain a presentee against whom there was no legal objection, and admit another in his room, the patron might retain the stipend as in case of a vacancy. In several cases this law was enforced. The General Assembly was also, at this period, turning its attention to the augmentation of stipend; * but the aristocracy, holding the unexhausted tiends, were hostile to the movement, and attempted to influence parliament against it by holding up the insubordination of many presbyteries to the law of patronage. The clergy naturally became anxious to remove this objection, and the Assembly, therefore, took steps to compel the obedience of the inferior courts. The Rev. Andrew Richardson, minister of Broughton, received, in 1749, a presentation to Inverkeithing; but only a few non-resident heritors signed the call, so that in consequence of the paucity of signatures, the presbytery of Dunfermline refused to induct him. The case was debated in the synod of Fife and before the higher courts; and it was thought at one time to have been finally settled by a compromise, the synod of Fife being appointed as a committee to proceed with the settlement. Dr. Robertson, the rising leader of the "moderate party," protested against such procedure. The case of Inverkeithing came regularly before the Assembly on Monday, the 18th of May, 1752. The presbytery of Dunfermline were ordered to proceed with the induction at Inverkeithing "on Thursday next," five of them to be a quorum; and they were enjoined to appear at the bar of the house on Friday to give an account of their procedure. This peremptory decree was carried by one hundred and two to fifty-six votes. A snare was laid by this decision for the opponents of the settlement. Three ministers usually formed a quorum, and there were three ready to induct Mr. Richardson; but in that case the refractory members would not have been reached. These three willing members of presbytery were present at Inverkeithing, but the Assembly having enjoined a larger quorum, no induction took place. The presbytery appeared on Friday before the Assembly. Six of them refused to have any hand in such work, and professed themselves "willing to forego every secular advantage for conscience' sake." To have deposed all these recusants would have been too sweeping a vengeance, and it was, therefore, resolved that punishment should fall on one, the selection of the victim being deferred till the following day. Then, while three appeared to yield somewhat, and two remained firm, Mr. Gillespie, the minister of Carnock, came forward with a second vindication of his conduct, and read it before the court. This calm and honest appeal at once decided the Assembly to depose him, and then and there, prayer being offered up, he was without either libel or process deposed from the office of the Christian ministry, and summarily ejected from his living. "Moderator," said the good man, on hearing the sentence, "I desire to receive this sentence of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, pronounced against me with real concern and awful impressions of the Divine conduct in it; but I rejoice that to me it is given on behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake." The Assembly proceeded to record that "by the deposition of Mr. Thomas Gillespie, at Carnock, they not only have asserted the authority of the supreme court, but have inflicted on him a censure adequate to repeated acts of disobedience adhered to tenaciously when at the bar." The ministers who stood along with him in refusal were deprived of the power of sitting in all church courts save their own sessions, and they remained under this censure thirteen years. As a fitting sequel, the moderator, in his closing address, congratulated the Assembly on those deeds as maintaining the authority of the Church, and especially as following out the earnest recommendation of his majesty's commissioner, the Earl of Leven.

* Vulgarly called "Old Light."

Mr. Gillespie, against whom this tyrannous sentence was pronounced, was born Sketch of Gillespie. at Closeburn, in the parish of Dud-dingstone, in 1708. At a very early period in life, he received deep religious impressions under the famous Boston of Etterick. He entered the University of Edinburgh, and had all but finished his theological curriculum, when, in compliance with the wishes of his widowed mother, who had joined the seceders, he went over to the secession divinity hall at Perth, under Mr. Wilson. He remained, however, but a short time there, and the reasons of his departure are not very well known, nor do they seem to have been fully stated by himself. He was dissatisfied "with their plan of principles," but he might have known what they were before seeking admission. He then went to Northampton, studied for some time under Philip Doddridge, and was in 1741 ordained to the sacred office by a number of dissenting ministers. In the same year he returned to Scotland, joined the Established Church, and accepted a presentation to the parish of Carnock. At his induction he made exception to that portion of the Confession which treats of the magistrate's power in religion. It was certainly unconstitutional in any presbytery to allow this deviation from law; but probably they thought it excusable to strain a point so as to admit into the national Church one who had manifested some early leaning towards dissent. In his parish he laboured assiduously, and was distinguished for his purity of life, and his experimental preaching. He was a good man and true, meek and unpretending, with more graces than gifts, but full of devotion to his Master and his Master's work. After his deposition by the Assembly he hastened over to Dunfermline. As he entered the gate leading to his house, he was met by his wife, to whom his first words were, "I am no longer minister of Carnock;" but her chivalrous welcome to the abrupt salutation was, "Well, if we must beg, I will carry the meal-pock." He had laboured twelve years in Carnock when the Assembly cast him out. With all his modesty, he wanted not a calm intrepidity, and accordingly he preached next Lord's-day in the open air. After the lapse of a few months, he removed to the neighbouring town of Dunfermline, where a chapel was built for him. At his first sacrament, he announced, "I hold communion with all that visibly hold the Head, and with such only,"—a principle which has always honourably distinguished the church which he founded. After ministering some years, he was joined by Thomas Boston of Jedburgh, who had renounced his connexion with the Establishment, on account of a violent act of patronage exercised against himself. The first Relief presbytery was constituted in 1761, at the induction of Mr. Collier into Colinsburgh, in Fife, and it was formed to act for the RELIEF of oppressed Christians. A synod was convened in 1773, and a divinity hall established in 1823. There was no little contest in various parts of the country about the nature of Relief principles, and there was a war of pamphlets. It was the honour of the Rev. Patrick Hutchison of St. Ninian's, and latterly of Paisley, to give a clear, powerful, and complete view of the creed and practice of the church, of which he was a pillar and an ornament.

* Struthers' Sketch, p. 195.

The existence and spread of the Relief Church formed another argument for the continued secession. Indeed, both the General Associate and the Associate synod found, as they reckoned, abundant causes to justify their separation. Several of these are enumerated in the "Act and Testimony" of the United Secession Church. The deposition of Gillespie inaugurated the rule of Principal Robertson, and during his era oppression was at its height. Violent settlements became quite common through the country, and the military were occasionally called in to put down rebellion in the parish. Sometimes the members of presbytery were waylaid by the angry parishioners, and not allowed to reach the church at all. Such, at length, was the downward progress made by a party of his followers, that Principal Robertson became alarmed, and in 1781 retired from the Assembly, for some of the "moderates" had formed the idea of getting rid of the Confession of Faith altogether. Many publications containing doctrines at variance with the Confession Case of Dr. Macgill of Ayr. met with no rebuke. The Rev. Dr. Macgill, one of the ministers of Ayr, published "A Practical Essay on the Death of Jesus Christ." The treatise is marked by no great ability, but it abounds in statements of doctrine quite opposed to the standards of the national Church. He denied, in no very ambiguous terms, those doctrines which the Confession teaches with unmistakable precision. His scheme was a mixture of Socinian and Pelagian errors on the person of the Redeemer, the nature and purpose of his death, and the basis of man's reconciliation with his Maker. Nigh three years elapsed before any notice was taken of his book, and attention to it was at length challenged by the author himself in his bold assault on the propriety of any human creeds. The proceedings against him were very languid in the church courts, and after no small manœuvring he was induced to frame an apology. This meagre and unsatisfactory document contained no recantation, or even tolerable explanation of his views, but it led to his acquittal. The secession churches were deeply grieved, though such procedure brought them numerous accessions of adherents. In a warning published by the burgher synod, it is affirmed that the only effectual way of curing those evils, is to let the public fund which supports the national Church be applied to other purposes, and "let each one pay his own minister as he does his lawyer or physician." Even under Dr. Hill's ascendancy no reforms were tolerated: and in 1796, during a debate on missions, the Rev. Mr. Hamilton of Gladsmuir affirmed, "that the propagation of the gospel was highly preposterous, in as far as it anticipates, nay, reverses the order of nature." Nay, Dr. Hill* himself said, "that missionary societies were highly dangerous in their tendency to the good order of society at large;" while Mr. Boyle, one of the elders, and afterwards lord-president of the court of session, thought that the Assembly should give the overtures recommending such associations "their most serious disapprobation, and their immediate and most decisive opposition." Even later still, the General Assembly of 1830 homologated the famous Act of 1720 against the Marrow; and in saying that the doctrines of Mr. Campbell of Row had been condemned by that old decision, they seemed to have identified his errors with those tenets, the defence of which was one chief means of originating the Secession. About the beginning of the present century, evangelical doctrine began to revive in the Church of Scotland. Its revival was also accompanied with a desire for more ecclesiastical freedom. A struggle commenced, the civil courts interfered, and the issue was another and greater secession—the disruption of 1843.

Both branches of the Secession continued to adhere to the same platform of doctrine and government, took a deep interest in all that pertained to the good of their country and the welfare of the world, and were especially zealous in the support of those Bible and missionary societies, which hallowed the commencement of the present century. The ministers and people of both synods were frequently brought into contact in pursuit of a common object; the animosities of the olden time gradually subsided, and mutual sympathy sprang up. The stumbling-block of the oath was taken out of the way, and there had been no difference save on this minor point. By-and-by joint prayer-meetings were held, and the desire for union spread with amazing celerity, so that at the spring meeting of both synods in 1819 their tables were covered with petitions praying that the "breach" might be healed. Preliminary arrangements occupied some time, a basis of union was ultimately agreed on, and the union was at length consummated in September, 1820. Seventy-three years had passed away since the unhappy separation, and in the chapel where it had occurred, the breach was healed, though a few ministers of the General Associate Synod stood aloof from the measure, and, protesting against it, began a separate fellowship. Thus was formed the United Secession Church. In twenty years from this period, one hundred new congregations were added to the body, which at the union had comprised two hundred and sixty-two.

* Principal of the Divinity College of St. Mary, St. Andrew's.

Rule of the moderate party in the Assembly.

While the seceders of the last century had clear Characters of views of theology, and clung tenaciously to their convictions, and while their own position gave them some glimpses of those great principles of religious liberty, which are now so well recognised, still they had not attained to perfect light. They uniformly upheld the government of the country, and at a very early point of their history one of their ministers was deposed "for impugning or denying the present civil authority over these nations." Nay, they even allowed their members in England and Ireland to make certain "church payments, in compliance with the common order of society." They could not, however, support universal toleration, but reckoned it a sinful laxity. They steadfastly maintained that popery was an abomination, to be put down by the strong arm of law, and, at one time, they lamented that witches could no longer be exposed to the flames. They protested against the public sanction given to holidays, when parliament had authorised the Christmas vacation of the Court of Session. They dreaded pelacy, and not without good reason, for their fathers had suffered and bled under its tyranny. In no shape or aspect could they connive at its existence or spread in Scotland, and they ejected from their fellowship a builder in Glasgow, who had contracted to erect an episcopal place of worship. One of the two synods was at length forced to learn that there were some things of smaller moment which might be left as open questions. The minister of Kilmaurs, in 1782, insisted on perfect uniformity in the administration of the most solemn ordinance of Christianity. He held that every clergyman should lift the bread and the cup before he presented prayer, and gave the sacred symbols to the communicants. At its meeting the synod declared that the question among such as differed, ought to be one of mutual forbearance, and that it was unjustifiable to impose their opinions on one another. The originator of the dispute refused such a deliverance, and left the connection. Many of the people popularly called "lifters" sympathised with him, accusing the synod of a dangerous laxity; and the court was obliged to confess that its resolution of mutual forbearance has been "most grievously and groundlessly calumniated." Had, however, such a spirit been shown by it on former occasions, some lamentable results might have been prevented. But light was slowly breaking in, though the Church was loathe to admit any principle which acknowledged a distinction of essentials and non-essentials in ecclesiastical opinions and arrangements. In several of the points referred to, the opinions of the seceders were not different from those held by many in the Establishment. But, with all their faults, the seceders were of great benefit to the country, as, indeed, many churchmen have honestly confessed. They bore aloft the standard of evangelical truth and freedom, when it was in some danger of being dropped by other hands. Their history proved that a non-endowed body could subsist and extend itself, and that its dependence on the voluntary offerings of the people was no bar to its fidelity either in preaching or in discipline.

It may naturally be a subject of wonder that the two Churches of the Relief and Secession and Union of Relief, so much alike in origin, constitution, and working, should have remained apart for any length of time. It need not be denied that there were in matters of minor detail and practice mutual prejudices and misconceptions. But these gradually disappeared. The common pursuit of public objects of Christian benevolence, and the agitation of the Voluntary Controversy, brought the two bodies into closer and more constant co-operation. Friendships sprang up, and the obligations of Christian union began to be more and more felt and acknowledged. Negotiations were commenced in 1835, and, though retarded for a season, were never finally broken off. A scheme of union was agreed on in 1840, and the union was solemnised on the 13th of May, 1847,—the place of meeting being Tanfield Hall, Edinburgh, the famed scene, four years previously, of the first Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland.

CHAPTER LXII.

GEORGE THE SECOND.

A.D. 1741—1746.

NOTWITHSTANDING the disasters that had befallen the house of Stewart, and the apparent tranquillity of the kingdom under the new dynasty, there was still, both in England and Scotland, a numerous party that fondly cherished the hope of the restoration of the exiled family to the throne, and that were quietly waiting for some favourable opportunity of throwing off their allegiance to the house of Hanover. There were many circumstances which, at this period, seemed to authorise the expectation that such an opportunity was about to arise. There was deep and ill-concealed discontent throughout the country. The public burdens were heavy, and constantly on the increase, while much of the money withdrawn from the channels of manufacturing and commercial enterprise was spent in expensive, and not always successful foreign wars, in which the people felt little or no interest. These grievances weighed with peculiar weight on the people of Scotland. The hopes of the Jacobite party, which included nearly the whole of the Roman Catholic population, were again revived. The government was unpopular at home; the country was involved in costly and fruitless hostilities abroad; and it was confidently expected, that, in the event of a rising in favour of the legitimate sovereign, both France and Spain would lend their assistance.

But notwithstanding these favourable circumstances, the attempt to reinstate the Stewarts on the throne of Britain was made at least forty years too late. Since their expulsion a great improvement had taken place in the condition of the Lowlands of Scotland, and every change had tended to strengthen the reigning dynasty, and to deepen the aversion which the Scottish people felt towards the banished descendants of their ancient sovereigns. The wide-spread misery which resulted from the misgovernment of Charles II. and James VII. was at an end; the violent dissensions by which the country had been convulsed under their sway were now healed; the disorders produced by their religious persecutions had subsided; and the extreme destitution to which multitudes of the Scottish people were reduced had now disappeared. Education was generally diffused throughout the community. There was now perfect security for life and property. The industry and physical well-being, the food, the dress, and the houses of the people were all steadily improving. Trade and commerce, though carried on to a very limited extent compared with the present day, had yet increased to a degree previously unknown in Scotland. The Union with England, which had at first excited such bitter discontent in the minds of the great body of the people, was now at least endured on account of the substantial advantages that had flowed from this important measure, which had opened the West Indian trade to the Scottish nation, and was gradually extending to them a share of the commercial prosperity of their southern neighbours. Above all, Scotland had now enjoyed for nearly sixty years the blessings of religious freedom. The people had been allowed to restore their beloved national church, and to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences, without hindrance or molestation. Their favourite ministers had been reinstated in their pulpits, and in the possession of their great influence, still, as of old, wielded with unsparing rigour against "popery and black prelacy," which, as embodied in the persons of Charles II. and his brother, had turned the sequestered valleys and pastoral solitudes of Scotland into a shambles, had crowded the prisons with pious and peaceable citizens, had hunted them down like wild beasts, sold them for slaves, inflicted on them the most shocking tortures, put them to death with every circumstance of merciless barbarity, and nearly converted some of the most fertile districts of the country into a desert, as the last king of the Stewart family had threatened to do. Among the favourite books in every Scottish peasant's library were to be found "The Scots' Worthies," "The Cloud of Witnesses," and other similar records of the sufferings of those indomitable Presbyterian heroes who, during the fierce storm of persecution, had been driven from their homes, and compelled to flee to the caves and dens of the mountains, and had in many instances sealed their testimony with their blood. The characters of these old champions of the Covenant were regarded with unbounded veneration, and the traditionary narratives of their struggles for the truth, and their persecutions, were handed down from father to son with devout admiration, and exercised a most important influence upon the opinions and conduct of their countrymen. Thus, a regard both to their religious liberties and their physical well-being, induced the Lowland Scotch to give at least a passive support to a dynasty which in itself deserved neither respect nor affection, and to a government every way contemptible, and made them hostile to a cause which both their present interests and their historical recollections taught them to oppose. Hence, as might have been foreseen, with the exception of a few old Jacobite lairds and penniless adventurers, Prince Charles obtained few recruits in the Lowland districts of the country.

It was far otherwise with the Highlanders. In language, dress, manners, and customs, and to a certain extent in religion, they presented a striking contrast to the Lowland population. Civilization, it is true, had not been altogether without influence even on these rude mountaineers, but they still remained to a great extent in their primitive poverty and discomfort, and the essential features of the patriarchal form of government still continued among them almost entire. As the power of their chieftains, at a time when "might made right," necessarily depended on the number of their adherents, it was their constant object by every possible means to swell the ranks of their retainers, and to keep alive among them the use of arms long after the rest of their countrymen had converted "their swords into ploughshares." "I can raise five hundred men," was the laconic reply of Macdonald of Keppoch to an English guest, who had inquired the amount of his income. Hence, the population of these mountain districts was continually increasing beyond the means of subsistence, and the estates, or "countries," as they were called, of the lairds were overrun by an idle, haughty, and turbulent race, who despised all peaceful modes of support, and acknowledged no law except the commands of their chiefs.

Feelings of the Lowland population towards the Stewarts.

State of the Highlands.

Long before the memorable "forty-five," the numbers of many of the clans had greatly exceeded the means of subsistence afforded by the territories they occupied. Trade they had none, except the occasional exportation of a few droves of black cattle: they had no manufactures, and therefore no shipping, because they had nothing by which to create or employ it. Their agriculture was on the most limited scale, and its operations were carried on in the rudest and simplest manner. Tilling, reaping, and all other kinds of field labour, were mainly performed by the women, while the men spent their time in idleness, or in the pursuits of war and the chase. Owing to the continual pressure of the population upon the means of subsistence, the Highlanders were often reduced to great privations; and it was no uncommon thing for them, in the winter season, to be driven to support life by bleeding their black cattle, mixing the blood with a little barley or oatmeal, and frying the whole into a sort of cake.

The author of an able pamphlet, written the year after the rebellion, and entitled, "An Inquiry into the causes which facilitate the rise and progress of Rebellions and Insurrections in Scotland," calculates that there was not at that period employment for more than one half the number of people in the Highlands. Of the remainder, he says, "many are supported by the bounty of their acquaintances and relations, others get their living by levying black-mail, and the rest gain their subsistence by stealing or robbery, and committing depredations."

The sagacious and patriotic President Forbes

Scheme of President
Forbes for settling the Highlands.

clearly perceived the danger to which the peace of the country, and the stability of the government, were exposed by the unsatisfactory state of the Highlands;

and, as early as the year 1738, he laid before Lord Milton a plan for employing the clansmen, disengaging them from the desperate cause of the Stewarts, and securing their services in behalf of the government. "Let four or five regiments," he said, "of Highlanders be raised; let the commanding officer of each be an Englishman, and the subordinate officers Highlanders carefully selected; send them abroad to fight our battles against France and Spain, which they will do with heart and zeal. They will not only be the sworn allies of government themselves, but hostages for their relations at home; and it will be impossible to raise another rebellion in the Highlands." This well-considered plan was brought under the notice of Sir Robert Walpole, who laid it before a cabinet council, and warmly recommended its immediate adoption; but his colleagues were anxious to preserve the favour of the king, in order that they might keep their places; and his majesty wished to employ Hanoverians and Hessians, and to subsidize his neighbours, the petty princes of Germany. The plan was, therefore, rejected. The Highlanders were left in their poverty and disaffection, in spite of the emphatic warning that "so long as the Highlands continue in their present state, so long will there be insurrections, thefts, and depredations; and so long will the people be in poverty and ignorance, and tools not only to every foreign power at war with Great Britain, but to every discontented subject who hath the interest and address to play them to answer to his designs."

It is to this condition of the Highlanders, not less than to their peculiar habits and dispositions, that we are to look for an explanation of the readiness and zeal with which the Causes of the Jacobitism of the Highlanders.

cause of the exiled family was embraced by the chiefs and their followers. The former, who were on many grounds strongly attached to the cause of the Stewarts, looked forward with sanguine expectations to the honours and substantial rewards which they were certain to receive, if through their exertions the ancient dynasty should again be restored to the throne of their ancestors. The ideas of government entertained by the clansmen disposed them to look upon these unfortunate princes as the general fathers or chiefs of the nation, whose natural and unquestionable power had been rebelliously disputed by their children or retainers. Their sympathies were strongly awakened by the romantic and hazardous nature of the enterprise in which Charles was engaged, as well as by the generous confidence with which he threw himself among them for support; while their devoted attachment to their chiefs made them at all times ready to fight in any quarrel which they might adopt. Thus honour, "loyalty unlearned," sympathy, and even what was, in their estimation, patriotism, all combined with various meaner motives to induce this brave and high-spirited race to embrace with the most enthusiastic devotion the cause of the heir of their ancient kings.

Various schemes had long been revolved for the restoration of the exiled family, all of which proved abortive. As early as 1741 a secret association had been formed at Edinburgh, consisting of Drummond, nominal Duke of Perth; his uncle, Lord John Drummond; Lord Traquair, and his brother; Sir James Campbell of Auchinbreck, and Cameron younger of Association in favour of the Pretender.

Lochiel, who bound themselves to each other by a written engagement to peril their lives and fortunes in the cause of the Stewarts, and to take up arms as soon as they should receive assurance of assistance from France. This document, together with a list of all persons of note who were considered to be favourable to the enterprise, was entrusted to Drummond of Bohaldy, to be by him delivered to the Pretender, who was then residing at Rome, under the title of the Chevalier St. George. These papers the Chevalier lost no time in forwarding to the French court, between which and the Jacobite leaders an active correspondence was henceforward maintained.* Jacobitism, however, was at this period at a low ebb in Scotland, compared with what it had been some thirty years before, though it appeared to discerning men who had favourable opportunities of judging, that, in the event of a war with France, it would probably assume as formidable an aspect as ever. Among these was the Lord-President, who distinctly foresaw that in such a case the Highlands would become the focus of rebellion. The government were blind to the true condition of this part of the kingdom, and had not the remotest apprehension of danger from the semi-barbarous inhabitants of this outlandish region. Accordingly, with a view to strengthen the army on the continent, from whose deeds of valour they expected his majesty to reap unfading renown, they resolved on removing the Highland regiment to Flanders. The President lost no time in warning them of the danger, and expostulating with them on the extreme impolicy of such a step; and in the course of his long and forcible appeal, he took occasion to put a variety of hypothetical cases, almost all of which were destined in a few short months to become alarming and perplexing realities. The sagacious counsels of this wise and patriotic statesman were unheeded by the government. It was enough that he had been long attached to the Duke of Argyll, with whose political opinions his own were consequently supposed to be identified, and the duke was then in opposition. The government

Treachery of the government towards the Highland regiment.

not only persevered in their determination, but had recourse to fraud, in order to entrap into foreign service the Highlanders who had originally been enlisted for service at home. For this purpose they were ordered to march to London; but, after a short residence there, circumstances occurred by which their suspicions were aroused, and a considerable body of them assembled, during the night, on a common near Highgate, and commenced their retreat towards their native mountains. They were pursued, however, by Captain Ball with a squadron of horse, and overtaken in Northamptonshire. Being forced to surrender, they were marched back to London, and confined in the Tower. Three of them were tried by a court-martial and put to death. The remainder, about two hundred in number, were distributed throughout the West Indies and the British stations in the Mediterranean, and the rest of the regiment were ordered to the continent.

The withdrawal of these troops was the signal for the lawless Highlanders to commence their ancient system of depredation. They traversed the adjoining territory in armed

Renewal of depredations by the Highlanders.

bands, alarming and plundering the peaceful inhabitants wherever they came. The President once more wrote to the government, representing, in strong language, the unprotected condition of those districts, and the spoliation to which the people were exposed; and, at the same time, hinted his suspicion that emissaries from the continent were already among the clansmen labouring to corrupt their minds.* This, in fact, turned out to be the case. Fleury, who had formerly promised assistance from the French court, was eager to embrace the present favourable opportunity, and accordingly sent Drummond back to Edinburgh with encouraging assurances to the conspirators, whose numbers had by this time considerably increased, and who were now forming an association, under the name of "The concert of gentlemen for managing the king's affairs in Scotland." Their plan was to procure, if possible, a similar organization, under a similar bond, among the Jacobites of England, in which case, it had been arranged, that an army of at least thirteen thousand men should forthwith be sent over from France. Of these, fifteen hundred were to land near Lochiel, Fort William; a like number were to disembark at Inverness, near the clan Fraser; and the remaining ten thousand men, under the command of Marshal Saxe, were to land near London. This arrangement met the entire approbation of the French minister, to whom it was reported by Drummond on his return to Paris; but the whole scheme was frustrated by the caution of the English legitimists, who refused to affix their names to the bond—a preliminary without which Fleury would not stir.

In the meantime, the gentlemen of the "Concert," becoming impatient, dispatched Murray of Broughton to Paris, to know what was intended to be done. Fleury had died before his arrival, and had been succeeded in office by Cardinal Tencin, who was, however, as much attached as his predecessor to the cause of the Pretender. Murray was, on his arrival, introduced to M. Amelot, Secretary for foreign affairs, who had been put in possession of all the documents relative to the project of the conspirators. Though this gentleman at first expressed reluctance to proceed without any pledge of adherence from the English Jacobites,

* Lovat's Trial, pp. 12, 74, 80.

* Culloden Papers.

bites, he finally gave way, and informed Murray that the king was well acquainted with the object of his mission, and promised that as soon as an opportunity should occur the plan of the "Concert" should be carried into effect.

Tencin soon after wrote to the Pretender, who was now considered too old to take part in the intended expedition, urging him to send his eldest son, Prince Charles Edward, to France without delay, in order to take the command of the armament, so soon as that should be in readiness to proceed. James, however, suggested that it would be better for his son to defer his journey until the preparations were completed, as, in the probable event of the British government becoming aware of his movements, they would immediately adopt measures by which the whole scheme might be disconcerted.

The French cabinet at last proceeded to redeem their promise. Fifteen thousand veteran troops, to be commanded by Marshal Saxe, were assembled at Dunkirk, a vast number of transports were collected in the Channel, and a fleet of eighteen sail of the line was in readiness, as a convoy, to sail from the harbours of Rochefort and Brest. A messenger was dispatched to Rome to inform James that the preparations were now completed, and to urge the departure of the young prince. Before setting out, Charles was furnished by his father with two important documents—a proclamation to the British people in the name of James VIII., as their legitimate sovereign, and a commission declaring Prince Charles, his son, regent in his absence. At length, on the night of the 9th of January, 1744, Charles privately left Rome, under pretence of going on a hunting expedition. He assumed the disguise of a Spanish courier, and was attended by only one servant, who appeared as his secretary. Riding post day and night, he soon reached Genoa, where he embarked on board a small vessel, which, passing unnoticed through the British fleet, reached Antibes in safety. Here he again mounted horse, and, riding at his utmost speed, reached Paris on the 20th of the same month.

Notwithstanding all the precautions that had been taken to keep his movements secret, the British government had been fully apprised of them, and sent instructions to their resident to demand that, in terms of a treaty between the two kingdoms, Charles should be ordered to quit the French territory. M. Amelot, in answer to this demand, replied, that so soon as the King of Great Britain should direct satisfaction to be made for the infraction, by his own orders, of the same treaty, his majesty the King of France would give explanations regarding the demand of the British resident.*

* Correspondence between the Duke of Newcastle and M. Amelot. Lond. Mag., 1743.

The French ministry now gave up all attempts at concealment; and the fleet, consisting of twenty-three sail, under the command of M. Roquefeuille, was ordered to leave Brest and proceed up the English Channel.

News of this movement speedily reached Plymouth by a cruiser, and a superior British fleet, under Sir John Norris, soon made its appearance in the Downs. The French admiral, disconcerted and alarmed by this unexpected opposition, held a council-of-war, when it was determined to put back under cover of the night, and, being favoured by a strong gale, they soon reached Brest without molestation. In the meantime, Charles had proceeded to Dunkirk, where the transports were stationed to cover the embarkation of the troops. Seven thousand had already embarked, and an equal number were in readiness, awaiting orders; twenty thousand stand of arms had been shipped, together with artillery, and a large quantity of ammunition, and other military stores. Thirty-three transports had left the harbour, when a violent storm, which blew directly on Dunkirk, and lasted for several days, drove many of the vessels from their moorings. Some of the largest of them were lost with all their crews, others were wrecked on the coast, and the remainder, in a shattered condition, put back to the harbour. The French troops were diminished by this disaster, and, as the British were now thoroughly alive to their danger, a renewal of the attempt seemed for the present hopeless. The French ministry, under these multiplied discouragements, abandoned the enterprise; the troops were ordered back to their cantonments, and Marshal Saxe was appointed to the command of the army in Flanders.

Though the danger was now over, yet the British government were, not without reason, in a state of great alarm. The island was almost wholly unprotected. The troops were absent on foreign service, the best vessels of war occupied various distant stations, the ships on home service were too much scattered to form an effective combination, the ministry was highly unpopular, and the people were restless and discontented.

Great exertions were now made to secure both the internal and external tranquillity of the kingdom. The Habeas Corpus Act was suspended by the parliament which was then sitting, the militia were embodied, Earl Stair was nominated commander-in-chief, auxiliaries were solicited from the Dutch government, and a portion of the troops on the continent received orders to return home. The fears that had been expressed by the President of a descent being made on the Scottish shores, were now participated in by the government. The enemy's vessels had been observed sailing in a northerly direction; and the Marquis of Tweeddale, who was now Secretary, sent expresses to the Lord-Justice-clerk, the Lord-President, and the general of the forces, intimating apprehensions that the expedition was intended for Scotland. The President, while he pledged himself to do his best to procure accurate intelligence of the enemy's movements, could not help referring to his former letter, anticipating the very danger which was now so much dreaded; and he put it to the good sense and candour of the minister, whether a military force, such as he had recommended, should not now be stationed in the Highlands. The crisis, however, in the meantime, passed away, and with it the fears and the vigilance of the government; and instead of taking instant and decided measures to protect that part of the kingdom where the partizans of the Pretender were the most numerous and devoted, they busied themselves in procuring the passing of an act rendering it treason to correspond with any of the sons of the Pretender.*

Alarm of the British government.

Alarm of the British government.

Charles, deeply disappointed and discouraged by the sudden arrest laid on his great enterprise, sent a message to the Earl-Marischal to meet him at Gravelines, and proposed that they should hire a small vessel and proceed together to Scotland, where he had no doubt that his friends would flock in thousands to his standard as soon as it was raised. It was with the utmost difficulty that the venerable earl prevailed on the rash and headstrong youth to abandon all thoughts of an enterprise, which, while utterly hopeless in itself, would be sure to lead to strife and bloodshed throughout the nation, and to endanger the lives and fortunes of the most attached friends to his cause. Absorbed in the selfish ambition to aggrandise himself and his family, Charles, like most other political adventurers, was utterly regardless of the misery and ruin to which his followers might be exposed, and he at last yielded to the representations of the earl, not from the convictions of reason or the promptings of humanity, but from necessity.

Thus again disappointed, Charles returned to Paris, and, in the beginning of the year 1745, laboured hard, both by his own personal solicitations and those of his emissaries, to induce the French government to resume the enterprise. His efforts, however, were unavailing. Some of the Protestant powers in alliance with France had remonstrated against affording aid to Charles, as tending directly to strengthen the hands of the Roman Catholics, particularly in Britain, and urged that their united efforts should be directed towards the seat of war in Flanders.† The French court were unwilling to run the risk of offending their continental allies; and Charles found himself treated with coldness and neglect. He could not, even after the most importunate solicitation, obtain an interview with the king; nor was he ever admitted into his presence until his return from Scotland, after the entire failure of his daring project for retrieving the fallen fortunes of his family.

All communications between him and his partizans in Scotland had for some time been intercepted; but, at length, Murray was again dispatched to Paris to procure intelligence. Here he was introduced to Charles, and having learned that, for the present, there was no hope of assistance from France, he represented to the young prince that, without efficient foreign aid, his enterprise was utterly desperate,—that the whole of his friends in Scotland likely to embark in his cause did not amount to more than four or five thousand men, and that any movement in his favour would be destructive to the peace and prosperity of the country, and ruinous to his adherents. The heart of Charles was steeled against all such considerations. He replied, that he had no doubt the King of France intended to make, in the ensuing spring, a renewed attempt to invade Britain, but that in any event he himself had determined to proceed to Scotland, and trust his cause to the affectionate loyalty of the people.

Murray, on his return to Scotland, communicated this intelligence to several members of the "Concert," who all, with the exception of the Duke of Perth, expressed the strongest disapprobation of the young prince's resolution of repairing to Scotland under present circumstances. Under their direction, a letter was addressed to Charles strongly dissuading him from such a rash adventure; but this letter, which was sent by a private hand in the month of January, 1745, never reached its destination; and in the month of June following a communication was received from Charles, intimating that he hoped by the end of that month to make his appearance in the west of Scotland, and appointing signals to be employed to announce his arrival. His friends were deeply grieved at this intelligence. Lovat, one of the most devoted adherents of the Stewarts, denounced the undertaking as rash and foolish; and the chiefs of all the clans, concurring in this opinion, resolved that none of their men should join him, and that he should not even be permitted to land.

Charles, on the other hand, considered this the most favourable opportunity that was ever likely to occur. He flattered himself with the belief that he could reckon on the support of almost the whole population of Scotland; that he had but to raise his standard and the tide of loyalty would return, and bear him onwards to sovereign power. In addition to these self-delusions, he was unfortunately misled by reports then current in Paris, that the allied armies had suffered a ruinous defeat, and that, consequently, no troops could be spared to protect Scotland from invasion. Elated by Murray dispatched to Paris. Charles intimates his resolution to proceed to Scotland.

The Highland chiefs disapprove of his resolution, and determine to prevent his landing.

* Culloden Papers, Add. 365; Parliament Regist., Lond. Mag., 1744; Scot's Mag., ibid.

† Mémoires de Noailles, vol. vi. p. 22.

these false hopes, and impatient of longer delay, he resolved immediately to proceed to Scotland, and prosecute his undertaking at all hazards; but of this intention he gave no intimation whatever to the French government, lest he should be forcibly detained.*

For the necessary aid denied him by the government, Charles was indebted to the liberality of private individuals. A banker in Paris, named Waters, lent him 60,000 livres, and a brother of the same gentleman advanced him a loan of 120,000 livres. With these sums he discharged certain debts, which he had contracted during the previous winter, and purchased fifteen hundred fuses, eighteen hundred French broadswords, twenty small field-pieces, and a quantity of gunpowder, and other warlike stores. The difficulty which might have appeared the most formidable of all, that of providing means of conveyance, was got over in a way somewhat remarkable. Charles had gained the confidence of two gentlemen, Messrs. Rutledge and Walsh, merchants at Nantes, French subjects, but sons of Irish refugees, the first of whom had obtained a man-of-war from the French court to cruise on the coast of Scotland. In this vessel, which was named the Elizabeth, and carried sixty-eight guns and seven hundred men, Charles was allowed to deposit his stores, while he and his attendants were to be conveyed in a brig of eighteen guns, named the Doutelle, which had been fitted up by Walsh to cruise against the British trade, and to which the Elizabeth was to act as convoy, without the knowledge of the French government.†

The Doutelle lay at the mouth of the Loire, but it was arranged that Charles and his retinue should meet at Nantes.

—his retinue— To prevent suspicion, they travelled to this place of rendezvous separately and by different routes; and, during their stay there, they took no notice of each other when they happened to meet in public, if any one was near enough to observe them.‡ The retinue of Charles, consisted of seven persons, afterwards designated as the "Seven Men of Moidart," viz., the Marquis of Tullibardine, who having been attainted for his share in the rebellion of 1715, had forfeited his right to succeed to the title and estates of his father, the Duke of Atholl, which were now enjoyed by his next younger brother; Sir Thomas Sheridan, who had been the prince's tutor; Sir John Macdonald, an officer in the Spanish service; Kelly, an episcopal clergyman, who had been implicated in Bishop Atterbury's plot; Æneas Macdonald, a banker in Paris, brother of Macdonald of Kinlochmoidart; an English gentleman, named Francis Strickland; and Buchanan, the messenger formerly sent by Cardinal Tencin to Rome to summon the Chevalier to Paris.

On the 22nd of June (old style) Charles and his companions embarked on board the Doutelle at St. Nazaire, at the mouth of the Loire, and proceeded to the island of Belleisle, where they remained until the 13th of July waiting for the Elizabeth.

—he embarks for Scotland, 22nd June, 1745. Encounter with a British man-of-war.

On her arrival the expedition put to sea, but had not proceeded far when a British man-of-war hove in sight. It proved to be a sixty-gun ship, named the Lion, commanded by Captain Brett, the same officer who had stormed Paita in Anson's expedition. The commander of the Elizabeth, Captain D'Eau, came on board the Doutelle, and requested Walsh to join him in attacking the British vessel; but Walsh, influenced by solicitude for the safety of the prince's person, declined. The Elizabeth, in consequence, commenced the attack alone, and after five hours' hard fighting, and considerable loss on both sides, both ships were so disabled that they found it necessary to return, the one to England, and the other to France. The Doutelle, notwithstanding the loss of her prince's military stores, proceeded on her voyage. Another large vessel, two days afterwards, gave chase to the little frigate, which, however, escaped by her superior sailing, and in a few days found shelter among the Hebrides. Charles, habited in the dress of an Irish priest, landed with his attendants on the island of Eriska, where they were hospitably entertained for the night by the tacksman. Here the prince had the gratification to learn that the cluster of islands of which Eriska is one, belonged to Macdonald of Clanranald, a young chieftain, on whose loyalty he placed entire dependence. Young Clanranald was then at Moidart, on the mainland, but the elder Clanranald was then living with his brother and principal adviser, Macdonald of Boisdale, on the adjacent island of South Uist. On learning this, Charles immediately dispatched a messenger for Boisdale, who was understood to have great influence with the young chief, his nephew, as well as with his father. Boisdale immediately obeyed the summons, and next morning went on board the Doutelle, to which Charles had, in the meantime, returned. The chieftain, though Boisdale well affected to the cause, did not refuse to join Charles.

Arrival in the Hebrides.

conceal from Charles that he regarded his enterprise, under present circumstances, as altogether desperate, and strongly remonstrated with him against the rashness of the attempt. He informed him of the resolution of the Highlanders, advised him to take his departure without delay, and plainly told him that he would counsel his young nephew to take no part in such a ruinous undertaking. Charles, though greatly disappointed and chagrined, showed no symptoms of discouragement. He felt it impossible now to return without incurring disgrace and ridicule, and resolved at all hazards to proceed. He accordingly set sail for the mainland, and cast anchor

* Stewart Papers, Letter of Charles to his father, June, 1745.

† Letter of Charles to Mr. Edgar, 12th June, 1745.

‡ Jacobite Memoirs of 1745, p. 2.

in the bay of Lochnanuagh, Invernesshire, one of those deep sea-lochs which cut the western coast of Invernesshire, and partly divides the districts of Moidart, and Arisaig. As they approached the rocky shore, an eagle was observed hovering over the ship. "Here is the king of birds come to welcome your royal highness to old Scotland," said Lord Tullibardine. "I hope this is an excellent omen, and promises good things to us." Charles immediately sent notice of his arrival to young Clanranald. Next morning the young chief came on board, accompanied by his kinsmen, the Macdonalds of Glenaladale, and Dalily, and another gentleman of the same clan, whose journal, containing an interesting account of many of the events of this period, is now before the public.* They found a large tent erected for their reception, on the deck, and plentifully supplied with wine, spirits, and other refreshments. Tullibardine, styled by his companions Duke of Atholl, did the honours of the table. While the rest of the party were carousing in the tent, the young Clanranald and Macdonald of Kinlochmoidart were engaged in earnest conversation with Charles in another part of the vessel. He addressed them in pathetic terms, and conjured them to assist their prince in this, the hour of his utmost need. Like Boisdale, however, they represented to him the hopelessness of engaging in such a formidable contest without previous organization or concert; without foreign assistance, and even without arms and ammunition; and feelingly depicted the certain destruction in which such a rash proceeding would involve themselves, their friends, and their cause. Charles turned a deaf ear to all these expostulations, and adhered to his determination to hazard the lives and fortunes of his adherents in his desperate attempt, and to involve the whole nation in the miseries of a civil war. His two friends, however, remained unconvinced by his arguments, and unmoved by all his entreaties; but as the party, in a state of high excitement, walked backwards and forwards upon the deck, a younger brother of Kinlochmoidart stood by eagerly listening to the conversation. When he heard his brother refusing to take up arms in behalf of the prince, his colour went and came, his eyes sparkled; he shifted his place, and grasped his sword. Charles observing from his demeanour the deep interest he was taking in the discussion, stopped short, and, turning to the youth, said, "Will you not assist me?"—"I will, I will!" exclaimed Ronald, "though not another in the Highlands should draw a sword, I am ready to die for you!" Charles was moved even to tears by this expression of attachment, and said he only wished all the Highlanders were like him. The two Macdonalds were carried away by the enthusiasm of the young clansman, and immediately declared that they should no longer oppose the wishes of their prince.* Charles, who at this time passed for an English clergyman, is described by an eyewitness as "a tall youth, of a most agreeable aspect, in a plain black coat, with a plain shirt not very clean, and a cambric stock fixed with a plain silver buckle, a fair round ring out of the buckle, a plain hat with a canvas string, having one end fixed to one of his coat buttons; he had black stockings and brass buckles in his shoes. At the first appearance of this pleasing youth," says this enthusiastic Highlander, "I felt my heart swell to my throat."†

—they consent to embark in the enterprise.

After two days spent in consultation on the plans to be adopted, and particularly in devising measures for securing the co-operation of such of the clans as were supposed to be well affected to the cause, Clanranald, accompanied by Allan Macdonald, a younger brother of Kinlochmoidart, was dispatched on an embassy to Sir Alexander Macdonald of Sleat, in the Island of Skye, and to the laird of M'Leod, with a view to induce them to engage in the enterprise. During the absence of these messengers, Charles, on the 25th July (old style), first set foot on the Scottish mainland. He landed on the southern shore of Lochnanuagh, and took up his residence at Bordale, in a farm-house belonging to young Clanranald. He was attended on this occasion by the gentlemen who had accompanied him from France, and in this secluded spot impatiently awaited the return of his emissaries. On their arrival, he had the mortification of finding that their mission had failed of its object. The chiefs, on whose support he had confidently reckoned, wisely refused to engage in an enterprise at once so hazardous and hopeless. His prospects of success were thus once more overclouded, and to a mind less sanguine than that of Charles, the whole project might well have been deemed on the point of failure.

However much to be condemned and deplored, it is impossible not to admire the undaunted and tenacious perseverance of Charles in pursuit of his great object. He now sent letters to such of the Highland chieftains as he thought most likely to join him, among whom were Cameron of Lochiel, Sir Alexander Macdonald, and M'Leod. Lochiel, the grandson of the famous old chief who fought at Killiecrankie, was the first to make his appearance, although his mind had been previously made up to stand aloof from an enterprise which he considered rash and hazardous in the extreme. For a long time he remained unmoved by either argument or entreaty, but Charles, at last, had the tact to find a way to his heart, if not to his head. "I am resolved," he said "to put all to the hazard. In a few days I will erect the royal standard, and proclaim to the people of Britain that Charles Stewart is come over to claim the crown of his ancestors, or perish in the attempt. Lochiel, who, my father has often told me, was our firmest friend, may stay at home and learn from the newspapers the fate of his prince." The proud, yet warm-hearted Highlander was completely overcome

Charles proceeds to the mainland.

* Home's Works, vol. ii. p. 427.

† Journal and Memoirs, Lockhart Papers, vol. ii. p. 480.

Lochiel joins Charles. by this appeal, and, in opposition to the dictates of his better judgment, surrendered at discretion. "Not so!" he exclaimed, "I will share the fate of my prince, whatever it be, and so shall every man over whom nature or fortune has given me any power." This was the turning-point of the enterprise. Had Lochiel stood firm it could not have proceeded another step, for without his concurrence, as was generally admitted by the Highlanders of that period, not a single chief would have joined the standard of the Prince. Lochiel lost no time in returning home to raise his clan; and, on the 6th of August, Charles issued orders for all chiefs favourable to his cause to meet him, on the 19th of the same month, at Glenfinnan, where he had resolved to hoist the royal standard.

Clanranald, as already mentioned, had, in the meantime, returned from the Isle of Skye, but the report he brought with him of the result of his mission was far from encouraging. Sir Alexander Macdonald and M'Leod fully coincided in the unfavourable opinion of the enterprise at first so strongly expressed by every chief whose aid had hitherto been invoked. The temerity of Charles in making such an attempt without foreign assistance, or even any assurance of support at home, seemed to them little less than insanity. They positively refused their co-operation, and ventured to tender their advice that he should immediately return to France. They were by no means unfriendly to the cause, but had, on the contrary, previously pledged themselves to support it. That promise, however, they now alleged, and no doubt with truth, was contingent on the prince's bringing along with him the necessary supplies, as well as a sufficient number of troops from the continent. So cautious, indeed, were they not to commit themselves, or even incur any imputation or suspicion of disaffection to the reigning sovereign, that they wrote to the government apprising them of the arrival of Charles, though not until nine days after his landing.*

The exciting intelligence of the landing of the prince and the mustering of the clans speedily penetrated the most sequestered glens of that mountainous region, and everywhere kindled a flame of enthusiasm among the half-civilised inhabitants; but it was some time before any but the most vague and uncertain rumours reached the military stations of the government. No great importance was at first attached to these

A party sent to reinforce the garrison of Fort William—almost incredible reports; nevertheless, the governor of Fort Augustus took the precaution of dispatching two companies of the Royals, under the command of Captain, afterwards

General Scott, to reinforce the garrison of Fort William. They took the military road, which in that quarter wound through a mountain pass twenty miles in length, flanked on the one side by a range of mountains, while the other skirted the shores of Loch Oich and Loch Lochy. They had proceeded as far as the bridge thrown across the Spean, when they were alarmed by the sound of a bagpipe and the appearance of a party of Highlanders with drawn swords, which they brandished in a furious and menacing manner. Scott, knowing neither the strength nor the object of this warlike array, thought it prudent to call a halt, while he sent forward a sergeant and his own servant to inquire what were their intentions. The two messengers were instantly made prisoners and hurried across the bridge. Here another party of the Highlanders was stationed, whose numbers Scott had no means of ascertaining, and, as his own party consisted chiefly of raw recruits, he was unwilling to risk an encounter against what might prove overwhelming odds. Accordingly, leaving the two prisoners to their fate, he commenced a retreat, which he was suffered to continue for some time without molestation. The crafty Highlanders, who, after all,

—are attacked by the Highlanders and made prisoners. were only about a dozen in number, took a short cut across the hills, and, concealing themselves behind some trees that overhung the narrowest part of the road, commenced firing on Scott and his party as soon as they made their appearance. The report of the firearms quickly brought reinforcements to the attacking party, while Captain Scott and his little band, so situated as to be unable to make any resistance, could only continue their route with accelerated speed. Having reached the east end of Loch Lochy, they marched across the narrow isthmus by which it is separated from Loch Oich, with the intention of taking possession of the castle of Invergarry, the seat of the chief of Glengarry; but they had not proceeded far before they found the clan drawn out to oppose them. By this time the party by whom they had been at first attacked, now joined by Macdonald of Keppoch, hung upon their rear, while a third party of Highlanders made their appearance on an adjoining hill. To spare the effusion of blood, Keppoch, advancing alone, offered favourable terms to the distressed soldiers if they would surrender, but assured them they would be cut to pieces if they ventured to resist. Scott, seeing no means of escape, and suffering from a wound which he had received in the defile, wisely accepted the terms offered. The party were made prisoners and consigned to the custody of Lochiel, who treated them with great kindness. In this affair the Highlanders escaped without loss, but two of the royalists were killed*—the first victims of this ill-fated rebellion.

On the 11th of August Charles removed from Borodale to Kinlochmoidart, a mansion about seven miles off, belonging to the chief of that name. Here

* M'Leod's letter in the Culloden Papers, p. 203.

• Home's History of the Rebellion, 4to. p. 46, et seq.

he remained until the 18th, when he proceeded to Glenaladale, and next day, with twenty-five attendants, sailed to Glenfinnan, the appointed place of rendezvous for the clans, where his standard was to be raised. Glenfinnan is a narrow vale, through which the river Finnan flows between high and rocky mountains; it is about fifteen miles from Fort William, and an equal distance from Borodale. On his arrival about noon, Charles found this sequestered glen in its usual silent and solitary condition. No gathering of the clans was there to welcome their prince, and to witness the important ceremony he had come to perform. Entering a little hovel, he waited for two hours, with the utmost impatience, the arrival of his friends. At length the welcome sound of the bagpipe on the opposite hill announced their approach, and a band of the Camerons, seven or eight hundred in number, headed by Lochiel, were seen marching down the declivity. They moved in two columns of three abreast, between which were the royalist prisoners they had so recently captured. A little knoll about the middle of the glen was selected as the spot on which to set up the standard;* and Tullibardine, then bending under the weight of years, was on account of his rank held entitled to the distinction of performing the ceremony. The banner was of red silk, having in the centre a white space, on which was afterwards inscribed the motto, "TANDEM TRIUMPHANS;" and Tullibardine, having taken his station on the knoll, with the assistance of two attendants, unrolled the banner, and flung its fatal folds upon the mountain breeze amidst shouts that made all the mountains ring again, and the tossing up of bonnets, which, in the words of an eye-witness, darkened the air like a cloud. When silence had been restored, Tullibardine read aloud the commission of the Pretender, constituting his son, Charles, sole regent of the kingdom; and also his manifesto setting forth the grievances of Scotland in being reduced by the union to the condition of a province, burdened with oppressive taxes, deprived of her trade, and placed under the rule of a military government; and promising pardon to all who had deserted their duty, on condition of their now returning to their allegiance. Both documents bore the signature of James as King of Great Britain, and were dated at Rome, 23rd of December, 1743. The ceremony was concluded with a brief address by Charles himself, in which he intimated that he had come to claim the kingdom on behalf of his father, to whom it of right belonged; that his great object was to promote the happiness of the people; and that he had selected this part of the kingdom as the most fitting place in which first to unfurl the royal standard, because he knew that he could there count on the support of many brave men, who were ready, like himself, to conquer or perish in the attempt.* In about two hours afterwards, Keppoch arrived with a band of three hundred of his retainers, and these were joined before nightfall by a considerable party of the M'Leods, who spoke with great indignation of the defection of their chief, and declared their determination to return to Skye, and raise as many men as they could in support of the cause. The Highland army, which now amounted Number of the to upwards of a thousand men, insurgent army. encamped for the night at Glenfinnan, and Sullivan was appointed adjutant and quarter-master-general. Next morning they commenced their march, and were soon joined by Macdonald of Glencoe with one hundred and fifty men, by the Stewarts of Appin, under Ardsheal, with two hundred, and by Glengarry the younger with about the same number, so that the Jacobite force now amounted to about sixteen hundred men.

* The spot is now marked by a monument with a Latin inscription.

Wild and extravagant as the project was, there was at this time a remarkable conjunction of circumstances in its favour. Those who had joined the expedition still kept possession of their arms, notwithstanding the order for the disarming of the clans: the government were not yet alive to their danger, and even if they had been, they were, in consequence of the absence of the flower of the army on the continent, and the almost total want of arms, ammunition, and money on the part of their servants in Scotland, not in a condition to offer prompt and effectual resistance. The Scottish nobility and gentry who hung about the court, were in general so much absorbed in the pursuit of their own personal and family aggrandisement, that the well-being of their country, and particularly that of the Highlands, had been completely neglected. Some of the most influential chieftains, otherwise well affected to the government, had been soured and disgusted by neglect and disappointment; the party favourable to the Protestant succession were divided among themselves, and many of them had lapsed into a state bordering on indifference; the Hanoverian sovereigns were personally unpopular, while a natural sympathy was felt by all classes for the misfortunes of the ancient house of Stewart.

King George was at this time in Hanover, and the government was entrusted during his absence to a regency composed of his principal ministers. Among these, the Marquis of Tweeddale, under the official title of Secretary-of-state for Scotland, had the principal management of public affairs in that country. It appears, however, that, notwithstanding his responsible position, he knew nothing of the designs of Charles until he received information through the vigilance and patriotic zeal of the Lord-president Forbes. That distinguished statesman, to whom his country owed so deep a debt of gratitude, but whose repeated warnings and sagacious counsels had been treated with neglect by the government, did not on that account relax his efforts for his country's good. It was mainly through his instrumentality that the chieftains of Skye, Sir Alexander Macdonald and the Laird of M'Leod, were prevented from joining the insurgents, and kept firm in their allegiance to the house of Hanover. As early as July the President learned from M'Leod the intention of Charles to make his appearance in Scotland; and, although he entertained some doubt as to the reality of that intention, he considered it his duty to communicate an account of what he had heard to Sir John Cope, then commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland.

* Earl Stanhope's History of Great Britain, vol. iii. p. 213.

Cope's correspondence with the government.

Sir John immediately transmitted the intelligence to the regency, and while he expressed his doubts as to the truth of the report, he urged them without delay to send arms to the forts in Scotland, for the use of such of the clans as should remain loyal, and to take all possible measures to meet the exigency, if it should arise. He was answered on the 9th of July by Tweeddale, who by no means viewed the matter in a serious light, and merely directed Cope to keep a watchful eye upon the north, but informed him that the lords of the regency could not consent to send arms, for fear of alarming the country. On the 3rd of August, however, Cope received another letter from Tweeddale, intimating that Charles had actually left France for the purpose of invading Scotland, commanding the general to have his troops in readiness to act on a moment's notice, and promising to send immediately the arms which he had previously requested in vain. On the 8th he received a letter from the Lord-Justice-Clerk, enclosing one that had been sent to the sheriff of Argyle, reporting that Charles had landed. In the meantime, M'Leod had communicated to the President authentic intelligence of Charles's arrival, and of Clanranald's mission to the Isle of Skye. This letter was shown by Forbes to Cope on the 9th, and was then transmitted to London, along with the other papers, in order to rouse the government into action. At the same time, the President, the Lord-Advocate, and the Solicitor-General, concurred in representing to Cope "that the most effectual way of putting a stop to wavering people joining with the disaffected, so as to make a formidable body, was immediately to march and stop their progress," as there is always on such occasions a great number ready to join with what they consider to be the stronger party. On the same day the President set out for the Highlands, and Cope, after communicating his plans to Tweeddale, prepared to follow. The lords of the regency were in no degree alarmed by all this startling intelligence.* They imagined that the mere presence of the royal forces would be sufficient to quell the insurrection, if it should actually take place, and contented themselves with sending injunctions to the general to prosecute the plan he had proposed, to march direct to Fort Augustus, and to attack and disperse the rebels wherever he could find them.

Meanwhile, their lordships had, on the 6th of August, issued a proclamation in the London Gazette, offering a reward of £30,000 to any one who should seize and secure the person of the pretended Prince of Wales. Charles was no sooner apprised of this circumstance than he issued a counter proclamation, dated from "our camp at Kinlochiel," denouncing the proclamation of the government as an "insolent attempt," and offering a similar reward for the capture of the Elector of Hanover, and for preventing his landing on any part of the British coast.

Price set on the head of Charles—his retort.

On the 19th of August, the same day on which Charles raised his standard at Glenfinnan, Cope commenced his march from Edinburgh. This luck-

Departure of Cope for the Highlands.

less general was a man of undoubted fidelity and courage, but a mere disciplinarian, dull, stupid, and totally ignorant of the character of the enemy he had to contend with. Instead of endeavouring, like the Duke of Argyll in 1715, to coop up the insurgents within their own barren domains, or taking up a position which would enable him to protect the capital, he adopted the plan of marching to attack them in their inaccessible mountain fastnesses. His army was much too small for the service allotted to it, and was, besides, poorly appointed, and unaccustomed to active service. When assembled at Stirling, it was found to consist of twenty-five companies of foot, amounting in all to about

Amount and condition of Cope's forces.

fourteen hundred men, exclusive of two regiments of dragoons, which, however, from a belief that a force of this description was unadapted for service in a mountainous country, he left behind. The force at his disposal consisted of men belonging to the youngest regiments in the service. They were consequently inexperienced, and, however well disciplined, had yet to learn practically the art of war. He carried with him a large quantity of baggage, a drove of black cattle to be slain for food as occasion might require, and about a thousand stand of arms, to be distributed among such volunteers as might range themselves under his standard. He soon found, however, that he had little aid of this kind to expect. The Duke of Argyll was doubtful how far it would be legal for him to arm his people, who had already been disarmed by act of parliament, without express authority from the legislature; the Duke of Atholl sent him a reinforcement of not more than fifteen men; while from Lord Glenorchy he obtained only a promise of five hundred, provided he would wait at Crieff, where he then was, for three days. Finding his hopes of assistance thus disappointed, he meditated an immediate return to the capital, and was only restrained from taking this step by the peremptory nature of his instructions from the government. He, however, sent back as a useless encumbrance seven hundred of the stand of arms

* Culloden Papers, p. 385; Marquis of Tweeddale's Letters, printed in the Appendix to the Report of General Officers: London, 1749.

with which he had furnished himself. At the bridge of Tay he was joined by about fifty men of Lord Loudon's regiment, but these, with the exception of about fifteen, in a few days deserted him, and, going over to the rebels, carried with them information of his movements. When he arrived at Dalnacardoch, he received the disheartening intelligence, that the army of the rebels, superior to his in number, and in adaptation to the exigencies of a Highland campaign, were already in possession of the strongest positions in the country. He continued his march, notwithstanding, to Dalwhinnie, where, finding this information fully confirmed, he was reduced to a state of great perplexity. His instructions were to Cope. proceed direct to Fort Augustus.

To do so, however, it would be necessary to cross over the summit of Corriearrack, a lofty and almost perpendicular mountain, at not fewer than seventeen different traverses of which his army would be exposed to the fire of the enemy; while the descent, even if they should be so fortunate as to reach the summit, would be equally dangerous. Two modes of extrication, each with its attendant difficulties and disadvantages, presented themselves to his choice. The first and more obvious was to return; but this course, besides being contrary to the orders of government, would expose his men to be harassed during their retreat by the active and hardy mountaineers, who, being better acquainted with the country, and unencumbered with baggage, might cross the mountains in different directions, cut off his supplies, or even compel him, at the greatest disadvantage, to fight his way. The second was to proceed to Inverness by Ruthven. This step would, no doubt, leave the south open to the enemy without obstruction, but the general calculated on receiving assistance from the loyal clans in the north, and hoped that by threatening the lands of the rebels, they would be compelled either to remain, or to return for the protection of their property. In this dilemma, Sir John called a council of war, to whom he submitted these proposals for the conduct of the army. A solitary voice recommended that they should take up a strong position on the frontier of the Highlands, and there wait the attack of the rebels; but this judicious counsel was disregarded, and at last it was unanimously agreed to adopt the preposterous expedient of marching to Inverness, where there was no enemy to encounter, thus leaving the low country entirely unprotected.

In the meantime, Charles, who had begun his march about the same time as Cope, had proceeded as far as Moy, in Lochaber, where he received intelligence, by an express from Gordon of Glenbucket, that the royal army was approaching Dalwhinnie, on their way to Fort Augustus. He instantly formed the resolution of pushing forward by forced marches, to gain possession of the important pass of Corriearrack, and to expedite his march, gave orders to burn and otherwise destroy everything that might prove an encumbrance. Even his own personal baggage was sacrificed to this object. Having reached Aberchaloder, he was joined by the Macdonalds of Glengarry, and the Grants of Glenmorriston; and when his army halted on the summit of Corriearrack, he found it had increased to eighteen hundred men. Here he fully expected to see the royal army toiling up the ascent, and involving themselves in those dangerous traverses, in which they could easily have been overwhelmed. To his great disappointment, however, not a man was to be seen. During the suspense which ensued, a small party of Highlanders made their appearance at a distance. They were at first supposed to be a party of the vanguard of the royalists; but they turned out to be deserters, bringing the astounding intelligence that the royal general had to Inverness.

Cope retreats

changed his course, and was now marching to Inverness. This news was received by the Highlanders with a shout of exultation, and the greater number were eager to descend in pursuit of the fugitives. Apparently with this view, they proceeded as far as Garriemore, where Charles summoned a council of war. The result was that the pursuit of the enemy was abandoned, and it was resolved to march directly on the capital. The prudence of this measure, in a military

Charles resolves to march on the capital—

point of view, may perhaps be questioned, but it was, at least, calculated by its boldness to encourage their friends, and to intimidate their adversaries. In forming this determination the council were no doubt influenced partly by the necessity of procuring supplies, and partly by the representations of Mr. Murray of Broughton, who now acted as secretary to Charles, and who assured them, that through the influence of the Jacobites it would be an easy matter to get possession of the capital, where these were numerous and powerful.

In two days the insurgent army made their way through the mountains of Badenoch, and entered the vale of Atholl. As they descended into the low country they received, like a mountain torrent, accessions of strength from every glen which they passed. The titular Duke of Perth, Lord George Murray, Lords Nairn, and Strathallan, Oliphant of Gask, and Mercer of Aldie, were the most important of the new recruits, not a few of whom were like those who repaired to David in the cave of Adullum—every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented. The Earl of Kilmarnock, who subsequently joined the rebels, was so miserably poor that he was often obliged to depend on the charity of his friends for a dinner; and brave, sturdy, plain-spoken old Balmerino, when accused of treason, said, "Treason!—the fact is, I was starving; and if the Grand Turk had set up his standard, I would have been compelled to join it." When the Highlanders reached Blair, the seat of the Duke of Atholl, who had fled at their approach, his brother, Tulibardine, took temporary possession of the ducal palace, of which, but for his attachment to the cause of the Pretender, he would have been the acknowledged and rightful owner. Here he gave a magnificent banquet to Charles, who remained two days in the enjoyment of this singular species of hospitality. In the meantime, Lochiel and Nairn were dispatched to Dunkeld and Perth, to —he makes his public entry into Perth.

proclaim James VIII. They were followed by the insurgent army, the vanguard of which arrived at Perth on the 3rd of September; and next day Charles, attended by the main body, made his public entry into the town amidst the acclamations of the people. Here he remained a week to collect supplies, of which he stood much in need, as out of four thousand louis-d'ors which he had when he left France, only one now remained in his possession. He obtained £500 from the town of Perth; several sums were voluntarily transmitted to him by his partizans at Edinburgh; and Clanranald and Keppoch were dispatched with a party of Macdonalds to Dundee, where they levied public contributions, and seized two vessels in the harbour laden with arms and ammunition, which they immediately forwarded to Perth, for the use of the army.

Having replenished his exchequer as well as recruited his forces, Charles quitted Perth on the 11th of September, and resumed his adventurous march to the south. The direct road to the

March of the Highlanders from Perth to Edinburgh.

capital led across the Firth of Forth, by the Queen's Ferry; but all the boats on the north side having been removed, he had no means of conveying his troops across the estuary; and as Stirling Bridge was commanded by the guns of the castle, he was obliged to take a circuitous route, and to cross the Forth above Stirling. The various localities which the prince passed over in this march were associated with the most memorable and spirit-stirring events in Scottish history. At Scone his great ancestor, Robert Bruce, was solemnly crowned on taking up arms against the oppressor of his country, as were his predecessors on the throne from the days of Malcolm Canmore downwards. Near Dunblane, where Charles spent the first night, is Sherifmuir, where was fought the doubtful battle which arrested the progress of Mar's rebellion. Crossing the Forth—the Rubicon of his enterprise, which used to bridle the wild Highlandmen—at the fords of Frew, about eight miles above Stirling, and keeping to the south, in order to avoid the guns of the castle, Charles saw at a distance the battlements of that celebrated fortress, the birthplace of James II. and James V., and long the favourite abode of the Scottish monarchs. He then traversed, on the 14th, the field of Bannockburn—the Marathon of Scotland—where Robert Bruce, against fearful odds, gained that great victory which established, on a secure basis, the liberty and independence of his country. The Highland army passed the night on the neighbouring field of Sauchie, where King James, the third of his ill-fated race who bore that name, was defeated and slain by his rebel subjects, headed by his own son. Then came the Torwood and Falkirk, associated with the memory of the patriot-hero Wallace, and destined soon to be the scene of the last fruitless victory won by the prince's own army. On the 16th he reached Linlithgow, long a seat of Scottish royalty, the birthplace of the beautiful and unfortunate Queen Mary, and the scene of the murder of the great regent Moray. Traversing scenes such as these, which could not have been surveyed without emotion by the heir of the ancient royal race of Scotland,—himself engaged in an enterprise which in daring is worthy to be associated with the most memorable deeds of his ancestors,—the prince, on the 17th, reached the village of Corstorphine, only four miles distant from the capital. To avoid the exposure of his troops to the fire of the castle guns, he turned aside in a southerly direction toward the little village of Slateford, and fixed his head-quarters at Gray's Mill, about two miles from the city.

Meanwhile, the citizens of Edinburgh were in a state of great excitement and per- Excitement in turbation. The castle, situated on the capital—an inaccessible rock, and held by a sufficient garrison, was quite secure; but the city was protected on the south and east only by an old wall, hastily erected after the battle of Flodden; by a shallow lake, called the Nor' Loch, on the northern side; and by some slight fortifications recently thrown up under the direction of the celebrated Professor M'Laurin. The wall was from ten to twenty feet in height, and was embattled, but the parapet was too narrow for mounting cannon, and was in various places overlooked by lines of lofty houses, only a few feet distant, so that, in reality, it afforded very little protection to the city. The Lord Provost, Archibald Stewart, was a well-known Jacobite, and was afterwards brought to trial for alleged neglect of duty in this emergency. He certainly was not hearty in taking or countenancing measures for the defence of the capital, and his reluctance to assist in the preparations which were made to resist the attacks of the Highlanders is said to have been increased by his desire to thwart his burghal rivals, who, under the leadership of ex-provost Drummond, were zealous in their efforts to defend the town; but the means at the disposal of the authorities were utterly inadequate for that purpose. The only trustworthy force in the city, in addition to two regiments of dragoons, consisted of the veteran and worn-out soldiers called the Town Guard, about a hundred and twenty in number. There was, indeed, a numerous —measures body of militia, called the Trained adopted for its Bands, divided into sixteen defence. companies, and amounting to upwards of a thousand men, but they were entirely undisciplined, and not a few of them were known to be disaffected towards the Hanoverian cause. Towards the end of August, the more zealous citizens had proposed to raise a regiment of a thousand men for the defence of the town, to be paid by voluntary subscription; and the professors of the university and the clergy, who were warmly attached to the government, made liberal offers of money for that purpose. But the royal permission was not obtained till the 9th of September, and up to the time of Prince Charles's arrival in the vicinity of the capital only two hundred men had been embodied, and these were for the most part persons of dissolute character, who were tempted to enlist merely by the promise of pay. In about four hundred of the inhabitants formed themselves into a separate band or association, and were supplied with arms from the castle. They were divided into six companies, officers were appointed to command them, and they were regularly drilled twice a day. Several old pieces of cannon were placed on the walls, chiefly obtained from the shipping at Leith, and the various gates of the city were strongly barricaded. "Many of the volunteers were, doubtless, gallant young men, students from the university, and so forth; but by far the greater part were citizens, at an age unfit to take up arms, without previous habit and experience. Many of them were, moreover, Oneyers and Moneyers, as Faustaff says—men whose word upon 'Change would go much farther than their blows in battle. Most had ships to be plundered, houses to be burned, children to be brained with Lochaber axes, and wives and daughters to be treated according to the rules of war.*" They had, therefore, no great stomach, even from the first, for the dangers of an encounter with stalwart Highland savages, and on the near approach of the insurgent army, their show of valour and zeal very speedily disappeared.

The Edinburgh Regiment and volunteers. In addition to this force, which was designated the Edinburgh Regiment,

When intelligence was received that the van of the rebel army had reached the village of Kirkliston, a few miles to the west of the city, it was proposed by General Guest, governor of the castle, that the two regiments of dragoons, supported by the town guard, the Edinburgh regiment, and the volunteers, should march out and give battle to the enemy. This proposal was agreed to by the provost, who placed ninety of the town guard at the disposal of General Guest, and about two hundred and fifty of the volunteers pledged themselves to join in the movement, and to march out with the dragoons. The appointed signal for their assembling was the ringing of the fire-bell, and its ominous sound was heard on the forenoon of Sabbath the 15th, during divine service; but, "instead of rousing the hearts of the volunteers like the sound of a trumpet, it rather reminded them of a passing knell." The churches were immediately emptied, and the inhabitants in a state of great excitement poured out into the High Street, where they found the volunteers drawn up in the Lawn-market, preparatory to marching against the insurgents. Immediately after, Hamilton's dragoons, who had been summoned from Leith, rode up the street on their way to Corstorphine, and were welcomed with loud huzzas. At sight of the volunteers they in turn shouted, and clashed their swords against each other. The volunteers now prepared to march, but their mothers, wives, and other female relatives and friends, clinging to them, implored them with tears and cries not to risk their lives in an encounter with savage Highlandmen. At the word of command, however, they Pusillanimity began their march up the Lawn- of the market, led by their captain, Ex- volunteers. provost Drummond, but the scene they had just witnessed had not tended to animate their drooping courage. Some lagged behind, some stood still in the street, some slipped aside into closes or courts, some bolted into houses whose doors stood temptingly open. In descending the famous West Bow, they disappeared by scores under doorways or down wynds, until when their commander halted at the West Port and looked behind him, he found, to his surprise and mortification, that nearly the whole of his valiant followers had disappeared, and that only a few of his personal friends remained. The author of a contemporary pamphlet—alleged to be David Hume—afterwards compared their march to the course of the Rhine, which at one place is a majestic river rolling its waves through fertile fields, but, being continually drawn off by little canals, at last dwindles into a small rivulet, and is almost lost in the sands before reaching the ocean.*

Lieutenant Lindsay returned to the Lawn-market, where he found a considerable body of the volunteers still standing in the street, and succeeded in persuading one hundred and forty-one to accompany him to the Grass-market, where they joined Drummond's small party. But as they were standing near the West Port before setting out, Dr. Wishart, Principal of the University, came down with several other clergymen, and entreated the volunteers to remain within the city. This prudent advice was adopted after a slight show of reluctance. The preposterous movement was abandoned; the raw levies were led back to the college yard, and dismissed for the evening. The town guard, however, and the men of the Edinburgh regiment marched out by order of the provost, and joined the dragoons at Corstorphine. As there was no appearance of the enemy, Colonel Gardiner retired at sunset with the two regiments of dragoons to a field betwixt Edinburgh and Leith, leaving a small party of his men to watch the motions of the Highlanders; and the civic troops returned at the same time to the city. During the night the walls of the city were guarded by six or seven hundred men, consisting of the trained bands, volunteers, and some auxiliaries from Musselburgh and Dalkeith. The same night Brigadier Fowkes arrived from London, and next morning superseded Colonel Gardiner in the command of the dragoons, whom he led out to a field near Coltbridge, about two miles west from the city. The Highlanders, on approaching Corstor-

* Sir Walter Scott; Quarterly Review, vol. xxxvi.
VOL. II.

* Quarterly Review, vol. xxxvi. p. 173.

phine, perceived the reconnoitering party left there on the preceding evening, and a few mounted gentlemen were sent forward to ascertain their number. As they rode up towards the regulars, they fired their pistols at them, according to the Panic of the usual custom of skirmishers. An dragoons. unaccountable panic immediately seized the dragoons. They wheeled about, and, in spite of the efforts of their officers, galloped off towards the main body at Coltbridge, to whom they communicated their fears. Brigadier Fowkes found it necessary to order a retreat, which was speedily converted into a flight; and between three and four o'clock the citizens of Edinburgh witnessed the alarming spectacle of the dragoons galloping in the greatest confusion and terror along the ground now occupied by Prince's Street. They halted for a few minutes at Leith, but on a cry being raised that the Highlanders were at hand, they resumed their flight as far as Prestonpans. In the course of the night, terrified by a cry for assistance from one of their comrades who had fallen into a disused coalpit full of water, the craven dragoons once more took to their heels, and never drew bridle till they reached North Berwick, twenty miles to the east of Edinburgh. Colonel Gardiner had taken up his quarters for the night in his own house, which was close by the field chosen by the dragoons for their bivouac. When he rose in the morning, he found all his men gone, and was obliged to follow, with a heavy heart, in the direction they had taken. The road along which they had fled was strewed with swords, pistols, and firelocks, which the terror-stricken dragoons had thrown away to expedite their flight. The gallant veteran, deeply depressed by the shameful conduct of his men, caused these weapons to be collected and carried in covered carts to Dunbar,* whither the dragoons had preceded him.

Throughout the whole of Monday the capital Agitation of was in a state of great agitation.
 the citizens Early in the day a message from of Edinburgh. the prince was delivered to the citizens, by a person named Alves, requiring them to submit, and threatening them with military execution if they ventured to resist. After the flight of the dragoons, crowds of the inhabitants collected in the streets, and clamoured loudly for the surrender of the city. At four o'clock in the afternoon the provost called a meeting of the magistrates to consider what should be done. The officers of the crown were invited to attend, and give their advice; but it was found that they had prudently withdrawn from the city. A large number of unauthorised persons crowded into the chamber where the provost and magistrates were assembled, so that it was found necessary to adjourn to the New Church aisle, where the ques-

Negotiations tion "Defend or not defend the for a town" was put. The meeting was surrender. exceedingly noisy and tumultuous, and whilst the excitement was at its height, and the great majority were clamorous for surrender, a letter was handed in from the prince demanding that the city should be given up, under a promise that the property of the citizens should be protected, and their rights and liberties preserved. The perusal of this letter finally decided the meeting in favour of a capitulation, and deputies were immediately appointed to wait on the prince at Gray's Mill, with instructions to solicit time for deliberation.

Meanwhile, the volunteers were drawn up in the street in readiness to obey any orders that might be given them, when a gentleman, whose person was not recognised, rode up the West Bow on a grey horse, and passing rapidly along the front of their line, cried out that he had just seen the Highlanders, and that they were sixteen thousand strong.* This announcement completed the dismay of the disheartened volunteers, who immediately marched to the castle and delivered up their arms to General Guest. The other bodies of militia that had received their arms from the castle magazine speedily followed their example, so that all hope of resistance was now virtually laid aside, although the trained bands still continued to man the walls.

The deputies had scarcely left the city to wait upon the prince, when intelligence was received by the provost and magistrates that the transports with General Cope's forces on board were in sight of Dunbar. The prospect of speedy assistance from the royal army somewhat revived the drooping spirits of the citizens; and various projects for the defence of the capital were discussed by General Guest and the magistrates. The deputation returned about ten o'clock at night, bringing back another letter from the prince, reiterating his demand to be received peaceably into the city, and appealing to his own manifesto and his father's declaration as sufficient security for the safety of the inhabitants, and demanding a positive answer before two o'clock in the morning. The magistrates were in great perplexity, and, after a lengthened discussion, sent out a second deputation about that hour, with a renewed request for a little longer time, under the pretext of a wish to consult the citizens; but the prince refused to admit them to his presence, and they were obliged to return without accomplishing their object.

Charles was fully aware of the necessity of prompt measures, and, apprehensive of the speedy arrival of Cope, he resolved that an immediate attempt should be made to take the city by surprise. A detachment of nine hundred men, under Lochiel, Keppoch, Ardshiel, and O'Sullivan, was sent towards the city, carrying with them a barrel of gunpowder to blow up one of the gates, if necessary. Marching across the Boroughmoor by moonlight, they reached the south-eastern extremity of the city, and stationed themselves in ambush near the Netherbow Port. They tried by a stratagem to induce the guard to open the gate, but without effect, and were hesitating what course they should adopt, when an accidental occurrence relieved them from their perplexity, and saved the city.

* Home's Works, vol. iii.

* Home's Works, vol. iii. p. 60.

PALACE OF HOLYROOD.

Capture of the an assault. About five in the morning the gate was opened to let out the hackney coach which had conveyed the second deputation to Gray's Mill, the coachman wishing to return to his stables in the Canongate, where all the hackney coaches of Edinburgh were at that time kept. As soon as the portals were thrown open, the Highlanders rushed in, overpowered and disarmed the guard, and secured the guard-house and gate. O'Sullivan immediately sent round detachments to the other gates of the city, and to the stations upon the walls, and took possession of these also without noise or bloodshed, as quietly, says a contemporary, as one guard would relieve another in the ordinary routine of duty.* To the surprise of the assailants, not a single armed man was to be seen in the streets, and the inhabitants seemed all buried in slumber, except a few who, roused from sleep by the screaming of the bagpipes, and the shouts of the Highlanders, were seen in their night-dresses timidly peeping out of the windows at the appalling spectacle of a body of fierce-looking savages rushing up the street.

At daybreak the Camerons were marched up to the Cross, and remained posted in the Parliament Close till eleven in the forenoon, without a man quitting the ranks, or offering the slightest injury to the persons or property of the inhabitants. A strong guard was also stationed at the head of the West Bow, for the purpose of intercepting all communication between the city and the castle.

Charles, meanwhile, had passed an anxious night. He had slept only two hours, and that without taking off his clothes. At an early hour he received the gratifying intelligence of the capture of the city, and immediately prepared to take possession of the palace of his ancestors. Making a detour to the south, to avoid the fire of the castle, till he reached Braidsburn, he turned towards the city as far as the Buck Stone, a mass of granite on the side of the turnpike road near Morning-side, on which his ancestor, James IV., is said to have planted the royal standard when he mustered the array of his kingdom on the Boroughmoor, before the campaign which terminated in the fatal battle of Flodden. He then turned off to the east by a beech-shaded cross-road which leads by the interesting old mansion of Grange† to Causeway-side and Newington. Entering the queen's park near Priestfield by a breach which had been made in the wall, Charles traversed the Hunter's Bog, whose recesses had often echoed to the bugle horn of his ancestors. He left his troops there about noon, and rode forward towards Holyrood, attended by the Duke of Perth and Lord Elcho, and followed by a train of gentlemen. On reaching the eminence below the famous St. Anthony's Chapel and Well, where for the first time he came within sight of the old palace, he alighted from his horse, and paused for a brief space to survey the beautiful scene. Then descending to the Duke's Walk (so named because it had been the favourite resort of his grandfather, to whose flagrant misgovernment he owed his exile), he halted for a few minutes to show himself to the people, who now flocked around him in great numbers with mingled feelings of curiosity and admiration. Loud huzzas came from the crowd, and many of the enthusiastic Jacobites knelt down and kissed his hand. He then mounted his horse,—a fine bay gelding which had been presented to him by the Duke of Perth,—and rode slowly towards the palace. On arriving in front of Holyrood House, he alighted, and was about to enter the royal dwelling, when a cannon-ball fired from the castle struck the front of James V.'s tower, and brought down a quantity of rubbish into the courtyard. No injury was done, however, by this gratuitous act of annoyance, and the prince, passing in at the outer gate, and proceeding along the piazza within the quadrangle, was about to enter the porch of what are called the Duke of Hamilton's apartments, when James Hepburn of Keith, a staunch Jacobite who had taken part in the rebellion of 1715, and "a model of ancient simplicity, manliness, and honour," stepped from the crowd, bent his knee in token of homage, and then drawing his sword raised it aloft, and marshalled the way before Charles up stairs.

While Charles was thus taking possession of his ancestral palace, his adherents James VIII. were proclaiming his father at the proclaimed. Cross. At one o'clock a body of clansmen were drawn up around this venerable pile, and the heralds and pursuivants in their official dresses, and the magistrates in their robes, were compelled to assist at the ceremony. A Jacobite teacher of Edinburgh, named David Beatt, proclaimed James VIII. in the usual form, and read the commission of Regency with the declaration issued by James in 1743, and a manifesto in the name of the prince, dated at Paris, May 16th, 1745. A great multitude of sympathising spectators were present at the ceremony, and testified their satisfaction by cordial cheers. In the evening the long-deserted apartments of Holyrood were enlivened with a ball, at which the Jacobite ladies were charmed with the elegant manners and vivacity of the youthful aspirant to the throne.

The personal appearance of the prince was exceedingly prepossessing, and contributed not a little to increase the popularity of his cause. He was tall and handsome, of a fair complexion, with large blue eyes, well-formed and regular features, and a lofty brow. His mien was dignified, and his manners easy and graceful. "The Jacobites," says Home, "were charmed with his appearance; they compared him to Robert Bruce,

Personal appearance and dress of the prince.

* Home, vol. iii. p. 67.

† The seat of the late Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, author of the Account of the Moray Floods, and other well-known works. Principal Robertson spent the last years of his life in this mansion.

whom he resembled, they said, in his figure as in his fortune. The Whigs looked upon him with other eyes; they acknowledged that he was a goodly person, but they observed that even in that triumphant hour when he was about to enter the palace of his fathers, the air of his countenance was languid and melancholy; that he looked like a gentleman and a man of fashion, but not like a hero or a conqueror.* On his entry into the capital Charles wore a short tartan coat, with the star of the national order of St. Andrew, a blue velvet bonnet with a white satin cockade, a blue sash over his shoulder, small clothes of red velvet, and a pair of military boots. His appearance was greeted with loud acclamations by the country people, who crowded around him whenever he went abroad, and eagerly sought to kiss his hands and touch his clothes. But it was observed that very few of them could be induced to take up arms in his service. A considerable number of recruits, however, came in from other quarters. On the day after the occupation of Edinburgh, Lord Nairne came up from the north with a strong reinforcement of Highlanders from Athol. The Earl of Kellie,† Lord Elcho, eldest son of the aged Earl of Wemyss, Lord Balmerino, Sir David Murray, Sir Robert Thriepand, Lockhart younger of Carnwath, Graham younger of Airth, Rollo younger of Powburn, Hamilton, of Bangour, the poet, and various other gentlemen of distinction, also joined the standard of the prince at this time. The Grants, of Glenmoriston, two hundred and fifty in number, came up on the morning of the 20th.

While the Jacobite army was taking possession of Edinburgh, General Cope was ^{Return of} landing his troops at Dunbar. ^{Cope from the north.} The disembarkation was completed on the 17th; and having been reinforced by the two regiments of dragoons who had retreated with such haste from Coltbridge, and by the Earl of ^{He marches to meet the insurgents.} Home,‡ with a few other volunteers, Cope set out on his march to rescue the capital from the rebels. His army amounted altogether to about two thousand two hundred men, with six pieces of artillery, and formed a well-appointed and disciplined force, apparently far more than a match for the ill-armed and worse equipped Highlanders. On Thursday, the 19th September, Sir John advanced as far as Haddington, sixteen miles from Edinburgh, where he spent the night. Next day he resumed his march by the ordinary post road which leads to the capital, but on reaching a spot called Huntingdon, he turned off to the right and took the road which traverses the level country near the sea, apparently from a conviction that the enclosures near the other line would, in case of an attack, be unfavourable to the movements of his cavalry. His intention was to encamp for the night in the vicinity of Musselburgh, but on approaching the village of Preston, he received information that the Jacobite army was in full march to give him battle. He immediately halted, and drew up his troops on the level plain between Seton House and Preston, fronting the west, with his right extending to the sea, and his left towards the village of Tranent. He had scarcely taken up his ground when, to his great surprise, the Highlanders came in sight; not as he expected, from the west, but on the high ground to the south of his position.

It was on Thursday the 19th, the day on which Cope left Dunbar, that Prince Charles received intelligence of ^{They resolve to give him battle,} the movements of the royal army. He immediately proceeded to Duddingston, where his army was encamped, and calling a council of war proposed to march eastward next morning and encounter the royalists on their march. This courageous proposal was cordially approved of by the chiefs, and orders were at once issued to withdraw from the city the troops employed in mounting guard, that the whole army might be ready to march against the enemy. At daybreak next morning they prepared to set forward. They formed in one narrow column three deep, with the Prince at their head, who, drawing his sword, said, "My friends, I have thrown away the scabbard." He was answered by loud acclamations, and the march commenced. The insurgents were all on foot, with the exception of a few gentlemen and their retainers, amounting to about fifty. They possessed a single piece of artillery—an old iron gun drawn by a string of Highland poneyes. It was useless for any military purpose, and was only employed for firing signals, but it accompanied the march in deference to the superstitious prejudices of the Highlanders, who were little accustomed to artillery, and attached great importance to the possession of this field-piece. Passing along by the little village of Easter Duddingston, the insurgents joined the post road near Portobello, and proceeding towards Musselburgh, crossed the Esk by the old bridge, a structure supposed to be of Roman origin, and "over which all of noble or kingly that had approached Edinburgh for at least a thousand years, must have passed—which has borne processions of monks and marches

* Home's Works, vol. iii. p. 71.

† In not a few instances father and son embraced opposite sides in this contest, so that in whatever way it might terminate the estate should be preserved to the family. On Mr. Beatoun, of Kilconquhar, expostulating with the Earl of Kellie about the absurdity of his joining the Chevalier, seeing that he had no followers, his Lordship replied, "Hout man, although I get a bullet through my wame, is there no Pittenweem (his eldest son) aye to the fore?" So far was this prudent policy carried, that the wife of the chief of the Macintoshes raised the clan in behalf of Charles, while the chief himself was an officer in a regiment of militia raised in support of the government.

‡ Lord Home joined the royal army, attended by only two servants. Even so late as 1633, one of Home's ancestors met King Charles I. as he crossed the Border, on his visit to Scotland, at the head of six hundred well-mounted gentlemen, his kinsmen and retainers. So great was the change that had taken place in the state of the Lowlands. The Earl of Kellie tried to raise a regiment for the prince's service upon his estates in Fife, but could only muster an old Fife laird, who was to be his lieutenant-colonel, and a single serving man, to represent all the rest of the troop.

of armies, and trains of kings." Passing Pinkie Cleuch, the scene of one of the most disastrous defeats ever suffered by the Scots, the Highlanders went up Edgebuckling Brae, and ascended Falside hill, near Carberry, famous as the spot where the beautiful and unfortunate Queen Mary surrendered to her insurgent nobles. Then, turning to the left and still keeping the high ground, they marched eastward, till, within half a mile of Tranent, they came a little after noon in sight of the royal army in the plain below. The Highlanders immediately halted, and formed in order of battle along the brow of the hill.

Sir John Cope, as we have seen, had at first drawn up his troops with their front to the west, but when he saw the enemy suddenly appear on the southern eminence, he immediately changed his front and faced the south, having his right covered by the park wall of Colonel Gardiner's mansion and the village of Preston, and his left by Seton House, with its trees and enclosures. He placed his foot in the centre, with a regiment of dragoons and three pieces of artillery on each flank. The two armies were about a mile asunder, and the sloping eminence occupied by the Highlanders, was separated from the level fields on which the royal army was drawn up, by a long strip of marshy ground intersected by several enclosures, and traversed throughout its whole length by a broad and deep ditch. Both parties seemed eager for the conflict. When the Highlanders first came in sight, the regulars uttered a loud shout and fired one or two of their cannon upon an advanced post of the enemy, who returned the defiance with a tremendous yell, which was re-echoed by the heights behind them. The prince was eager for an immediate attack, but he was assured by the country people that it was impracticable to pass the marsh in front of Cope's position. Their statements were confirmed by Mr. Ker, of Graden, an officer of experience, who, mounted on a little white pony, coolly and deliberately examined the ground, unmoved by the shots which were fired at him while he was performing this service. Charles then moved a portion of his troops to the west, and threatened Cope's right flank—a movement which led to a corresponding change of position on the part of the royal army. Finding the new front of the enemy strongly protected by the park walls in this quarter, the prince once more returned to the station which he had occupied near Tranent, and the regulars wheeled round at the same time, and again faced the south. The whole of the afternoon was consumed by these manœuvres, which left both armies in their original positions.*

* Late in the afternoon, Prince Charles, attended by the Duke of Perth and another officer, went to dine in the little inn of Tranent. The landlady could not provide any better entertainment for her distinguished guests than some Scotch kail, or broth, and the meat from which it had been made. As she had previously concealed her service of pewter for fear of the Highlanders, she could

The courage of the royal army was greatly damped by the timid, irresolute conduct of their general, in re- policy of Cope. maining on the defensive, while his opponents manifested such eagerness for a battle. Colonel Gardiner, and other officers, in vain urged upon Cope the necessity of bolder measures, and earnestly recommended him to attack the enemy, so long as his soldiers were in good spirits for the encounter. Sir John seemed to imagine that he had done enough in maintaining the strong position he had assumed. The only offensive movement he could be prevailed on to undertake, was to fire a few cannot-shot at a party of Highlanders stationed in the churchyard of Tranent. The prince and his men, on the other hand, were so apprehensive that the royal forces would escape them, as they had done at Corricarrack, that he detached Lord Nairne with five hundred men to the westward of Preston, above Colonel Gardiner's park, in order to intercept the enemy, should they attempt to steal off towards Edinburgh during the night. The Highlanders then moved to the east of Tranent, and wrapping themselves in their plaids, lay down to sleep upon a stubble field.

The royal army also bivouaced upon the ground, and as the night (20th Sept.) proved cold and dark, their general the royal lighted great fires around his army. position to warm his men. He also placed pickets along the edge of the morass, to secure his army from surprise during the night, and sent his baggage and military chest down to Cockenzie under a strong guard. His forces were drawn up on the south side of the morass, in the following order: the foot formed one line facing the south, having in the centre eight companies of Lascelles' regiment, and two of Guise's; on the right, five companies of Lee's regiment; and on the left, the regiment of Sir John Murray, with some recruits. The right flank was protected by two regiments of Gardiner's, and the left by a similar number of Hamilton's dragoons. The artillery, consisting of six pieces, was stationed on the right of the army, near the waggon road from Tranent to Cockenzie, under the orders of Lieutenant-colonel Whiteford, and guarded by a company of Lee's regiment, commanded by Captain Cochrane. Strange to say, no proper artillerymen had been provided to work the guns, and Cope was obliged to rest satisfied with the services of the only gunner in Scotland, an old man who had belonged to the Scots' train of artillery before the Union, and three old invalid soldiers, assisted by a few sailors. Besides the regular troops, a small body of volunteers, consisting principally of the neighbouring tenants, with their respective landlords, had placed themselves under the royal standard.

General Cope's army amounted altogether to two thousand one hundred men, and was rather inferior purely no more than her wooden spoons for her three guests, and one butcher's knife to cut the meat, which they then ate with their fingers.—(Chambers's Hist., vol. i. p. 143.)

in numbers to that of Prince Charles. Many of the Highlanders, however, were badly armed, and some of them had no other weapon than the blade of a scythe fastened to a long pole. As soon as it became dark, and the rebel forces had taken up their position for the night, a council of war was held, at which it was resolved, on the proposal of Lord George Murray, to attack the enemy at break of day, by crossing the morass near its eastern extremity, where it seemed least impassable. This resolution having been unanimously adopted, Charles, surrounded by his principal officers, lay down to rest in a field of pease made up into ricks, having a sheaf for his pillow. No fires were allowed to be lighted, and a strict silence was enjoined on their followers, for the purpose of concealing their position from the English general.

The Highlanders resolve to attack the regulars.

There was in the army of Prince Charles a young country gentleman, named Anderson,* of Whitburgh, in East Lothian, who was present at the council of war, but took no part in their deliberations. He was intimately acquainted with the ground in the vicinity, and after the council broke up, told Hepburn of Keith, that he knew a path by which the Highlanders could, without difficulty, pass the morass "without being seen by the enemy, and form, without being exposed to their fire." By Hepburn's advice he communicated this information to Lord George Murray, who regarded it as so important that he immediately went with him to impart it to the prince. Charles, who was lying asleep on a bunch of pease-straw, roused himself at once, and listened attentively to Mr. Anderson's proposal. He then sent for Lochiel and some other chiefs, and finding that they cordially approved of the plan, he prepared to put it into immediate execution. An aide-de-camp was dispatched to recall Lord Nairne's detachment from its position near Preston, and the whole army got under arms and began its advance about three o'clock in the morning (Saturday, 21st Sept.) They marched as usual in two columns of three men abreast, preserving the strictest silence. Mr. Anderson led the way, followed by Macdonald of Glenaladale, major of the Clanranald regiment, with a chosen party of sixty men, whose appointed duty it was to seize the enemy's baggage. They proceeded in an easterly direction till near the farm of Ringanhead, when they turned to the north down a hollow or valley, which winds through the farm. It was fortunate for them that the path across the morass, either from ignorance of its existence or from oversight, was left entirely unguarded, for it was so narrow that the column could scarcely find room to advance, and the ground was so soft that many of the Highlanders sunk knee-deep in mud. At this point the ditch which traversed the morass from west to east became a mill dam, and was crossed by a narrow wooden bridge, which the clansmen passed without interruption. Charles, who was at the head of the second column, attempted to leap across the dam, but stumbled, and fell upon his knees on the other side. Having cleared this impediment, the leading column continued its course towards the sea, till the whole army had passed the morass and gained the eastern extremity of the plain, at the west end of which the royal army was stationed. Then, wheeling about, the clans formed in battle array on the level ground. At this moment some of the dragoons, who were stationed as pickets in this quarter, for the first time perceived the approach of the enemy, and firing their pieces, rode off to give the alarm. The cry of "Cannons, cannons! get ready the cannons, cannoneers!" was immediately heard throughout Cope's left wing, and the general hastened to make a new disposition of his troops to meet the impending attack. His right now rested upon the morass, and his left extended towards the sea. The infantry stood in the centre, and the dragoons, as formerly, occupied each flank. The artillery was placed on the right, in front of Gardiner's dragoons, in opposition to the advice of their commander, and behind them were the high walls, enclosing the pleasure grounds of the Grange and of Bankton, Colonel Gardiner's mansion. The space between the two armies was a level field of considerable extent, which had just been cleared of its crop of corn. As the expanse was unbroken by tree, or bush, or fence, it was peculiarly favourable for the operations of cavalry.

Plan of attack.

The Highlanders had now completed their preparations for the attack. They were drawn up in two lines: the Macdonalds, under the Duke of Perth, formed the right wing, an honour which they claimed as their hereditary right, because Robert Bruce had assigned that position to their clan at the battle of Bannockburn; the Duke of Perth's regiment and the Macgregors occupied the centre; while the left wing, commanded by Lord George Murray, was composed of the Camerons, under Lochiel, and the Stewarts of Appin, led by Stewart of Ardsheel. The second line, which was intended to act as a reserve, was drawn up at the distance of fifty yards behind the other, and consisted of the Athol men, the Robertsons of Strowan, and the M'Lauchlans. The command of this body was entrusted to Lord Nairne. The front line was speedily broken up into small groups or masses, each composed of an individual clan, having the best armed men in front, who were to a considerable extent protected by their targets from the enemy's fire. Each chief fought in the centre of his clan, and surrounded by his principal relations and officers. Their inferior and worse-armed followers closed the rear, and by their physical pressure gave impetus to the charge of the front ranks.

When all arrangements had been completed, Charles addressed his men in these words: "Follow me, gentlemen, and by the blessing of God, I will this day make you a free and happy people." He

* The father of this gentleman, who was still living, had been engaged in the rebellion of 1715.

BATTLE FIELD OF TUBBIN HILL.

Engraved from a drawing by

E. B. B. B.

W. H. Barker.

had expressed his wish to lead the charge, but in compliance with the urgent request of the chiefs, he consented to take a position between the two lines, in midst of a small guard.

The morn had now fully dawned, and the beams of the rising sun were beginning to illuminate the waters of the estuary on their right; but the mist was still rolling in huge masses over the morass on the left, and the cornfields in front, so as to hide the two armies from each other. Everything

The battle of being now in readiness, the order Preston. to advance was given. A brief and solemn pause ensued, during which the clansmen took off their bonnets, raised their faces to heaven, and uttered a short prayer. Then, pulling their bonnets over their brows, and throwing aside their plaids, they began their charge. They advanced in silence, at first slowly, but as they proceeded they quickened their pace, and moved with such rapidity that they had to halt once or twice to recover their broken ranks, before closing with the enemy. The left wing, composed of the Camerons and Stewarts, had the start of the other divisions, and moved somewhat obliquely, in order that it might keep close to the morass, and prevent the dragoons from turning its flank. An interval was thus left in the centre of the line, through which a watchful enemy might have penetrated. At this moment the mist rose like a curtain and showed the royal troops the dark masses of the clans rushing on to the attack. With a tremendous yell the Camerons threw themselves, with irresistible impetuosity, upon the glittering ranks of their enemies. The artillerymen instantly fled, and though Colonel Whiteford, with his own hand, discharged five of the six cannon upon the advancing foe, they recoiled only for an instant, and immediately resumed their charge. The artillery guard next fired a volley, but without effect. The first squadron of dragoons, under Lieutenant-colonel Whitney, was then ordered to attack them; but on receiving an irregular fire from their fuses, these dastards, who had not recovered from the canter of Coltbridge, were seized with a dis-

Total defeat of the royal army. gracefull panic, and wheeling about rode over the artillery guard, and galloped from the field. The second squadron, under Colonel Gardiner, was then led forward to the attack by the gallant veteran himself, who encouraged them to stand firm; but they had not advanced many paces, when they too wavered, halted, and followed their companions in their flight.

Hamilton's dragoons, who were stationed on the left of the royal army, behaved even worse than Gardiner's, for no sooner did they perceive the flight of their companions on the right, than they turned and galloped off the field in confusion, without striking a blow, before the enemy could close with them. The royal infantry, however, though their flanks were left uncovered by the dastardly flight of the dragoons, stood their ground for a brief space, and poured a well-directed volley upon the centre of the insurgents, which prostrated a number of their best men. But their extended files were soon pierced and broken by the furious onset of the Highlanders, who, dropping their pieces when they had fired, drew their broadswords, and threw themselves upon the opposing ranks with an impetuosity which swept everything before it. The royal infantry, attacked at once in front and on their flanks, were irretrievably routed, and throwing down their arms fled from the field. The park walls in their rear, however, so impeded their flight, that nearly the whole of them were either killed or taken prisoners. In five or six minutes the battle was decided; and so rapidly did the Highlanders drive the regulars off the field, that though their second line was only forty paces behind the first, it is stated by Chevalier Johnstone, who stood behind the prince in front of this line, that he could see no other enemy but the killed and wounded lying on the ground.*

A desperate effort was made by Cope himself, assisted by the Earls of Home and Loudon, Colonel Whitney, and other officers, to rally the dragoons after they had cleared the enclosures around Preston; and by dint of threats and entreaties, and by presenting pistols at the men's heads, they succeeded in turning about four hundred and fifty of the fugitives off the high-road into a field, and endeavoured to lead them back to the charge. But their terror was too deep-rooted to be thus easily dispelled. The accidental firing of a pistol renewed their panic, and in spite of all the efforts of their luckless general, they went off at full gallop towards the south, ducking their heads along their horses' necks to avoid the balls, which a few Highlanders fired after them. Sir John had no alternative but to follow his panic-stricken troops. He reached Coldstream on the Tweed that night, and next day retired to Berwick, everywhere bringing the first tidings of his own defeat. A few dragoons fled to Edinburgh, and galloping up the High Street with great confusion and uproar, sought admission into the castle. But old General Preston, who had again assumed the command of the fortress,† ordered them to be gone, or he would open his guns upon them as cowards and deserters. Terrified by this threat the runaways turned their horses down the Castle Wynd, and pursued their flight to Stirling.

Of the royal infantry only one hundred and seventy escaped, all the rest being killed or taken prisoners. The number of the slain was estimated at four hundred, among whom were six officers, including Colonel Gardiner. The death of that gallant and pious veteran—a model of a Christian soldier—was greatly lamented. At the beginning of the onset he was wounded in the breast by a musket-ball; but, disdaining to follow his dragoons in their flight, he put himself at the head of a small body of foot,

* Memoirs, p. 37.

† General Guest, it is said, regarded the place as indefensible, and recommended its surrender. This proposal was strenuously opposed by General Preston, who at once agreed to take upon himself the responsibility of conducting the defence. (See Chambers's History, vol. i.)

who, though without a leader, were bravely standing their ground, and encouraged them to fight on, exclaiming, "Fire on, my lads, and fear nothing." But in a few moments he was cut down by a Highlander armed with a scythe, dragged from his horse, and mortally wounded within a few yards of his own mansion. He was carried almost lifeless to the manse of Tranent, where he expired a few hours afterwards.*

The number of prisoners was between sixteen and seventeen hundred, including about seventy officers. The whole baggage, artillery, and military stores of the royal army, together with the military chest, containing £2500, fell into the hands of the victors. Many ludicrous mistakes were made by the rude mountaineers respecting the nature and value of their booty. One of them who had got a watch, which had once belonged to some unfortunate English officer, sold it soon afterwards for a trifle, observing with great satisfaction, "he was glad to be quit of the creature, for she lived no time after he caught her,"—the machine having in reality stopped for want of winding up. Another exchanged a horse for a horse-pistol. A quantity of chocolate found among the baggage, was afterwards cried in the streets of Perth under the name of "Johnnie Cope's salve." Several were seen carrying each a large military saddle upon their backs, apparently under the impression that they had secured an article of great value. A large number, in accordance with their usual practice, immediately quitted the army and returned home with their spoils.†

The loss sustained by the victors in this battle was only four officers and thirty privates killed, and seventy men and six officers wounded. Among the latter was Captain James Macgregor, son of the celebrated Rob Roy, who fell at the commencement of the action, wounded with no fewer than five balls, two of which went through his body. He immediately raised himself upon his elbow, and called to the Macgregors, whom he commanded, to advance bravely, swearing that he would see if any of them failed to do their duty. He recovered of his wounds, and, after the suppression of the rebellion, retired to France.

After the battle was concluded Charles spent several hours in providing for the relief of the wounded of both armies, preserving, says a Whig historian, "from temper or from judgment, every appearance of moderation and humanity." His followers were fierce and barbarous in some respects, though they were not slow to follow his example;‡ and tradition has preserved numerous instances of their eagerness to administer such relief as was in their power to their wounded prisoners. "Whatever notion," says a Jacobite officer, "our Low country people may entertain of the Highlanders, I can attest they gave many proofs this day of their humanity and mercy. Not only did I often hear our common clansmen ask the soldiers if they wanted quarter, and not only did we, the officers, exert our utmost pains to save those who were stubborn, but I saw some of our private men, after the battle, run to Port Seton for ale and other liquors to support the wounded. As one proof for all, of my own particular observation, I saw a Highlander carefully, and with patient kindness, support a poor wounded soldier by the arms, and afterwards carry him on his back into a house, where he left him with sixpence to pay his charges. In all this" adds the writer, "we followed, not only the dictates of humanity, but also the orders of our prince, who acted in everything as the true father of his country."*

Prince Charles passed the night after the battle of Preston at Pinkie House, near Musselburgh, and the next evening returned to Holyrood, amid the shouts of the populace. The Camerons had entered Edinburgh only a few hours after the battle, playing their pipes and displaying in triumph the colours they had taken from the dragoons. But the main body of the victorious army delayed their entrance into the capital till next day, when they marched in triumph through all the principal streets of the city, displaying the prisoners, the spoil, and the standards they had taken, amid the joyous acclamations of the multitude, while the pibrochs played the old Jacobite tune, "The King shall enjoy his own again." Amid the tumultuous licence of the moment, the exulting Highlanders repeatedly fired their pieces into the air, and one of them having been accidentally loaded with ball, it grazed the forehead of Miss Nairne, a young Jacobite lady, who was waving her handkerchief from a balcony overlooking the High Street. "Thank God," exclaimed the fair enthusiast, as soon as she was able to speak, "that the accident has happened to me, whose principles are known. Had it befallen a Whig, they would have said it was done on purpose."†

Charles, who did not accompany this triumphal procession, behaved with great moderation under his victory. He prohibited any outward demon-

* In a letter to his father, written the night after the battle, Charles says the reflection that his victory had been obtained over Englishmen, had thrown a damp upon it that he little imagined; and he adds, "I am in great difficulties how I shall dispose of my wounded prisoners. If I make a hospital of the church it will be looked upon as a great profanation. * * Come what will, I am resolved not to let the poor wounded men lie in the streets, and if I can do no better, I will make a hospital of the palace, and leave it to them." The greater part of the wounded of both armies were, in the first instance, taken into Colonel Gardiner's house; such of them as could be removed were afterwards conveyed to Edinburgh, and placed in the Royal Infirmary. One of the officers having broken his parole by escaping into the castle, the others were sent to Perth. The private soldiers were removed to Logierait in Athol. The wounded were released as soon as they recovered, on taking an oath not to serve against the prince for a twelve-month—an engagement which it is alleged many of them violated.—(Jacobite Memoirs, p. 42.)

† Waverley, note to chap. li.

* Some remarkable passages in the Life of Colonel Gardiner, by Doddridge, p. 187.

† Chambers, vol. i. p. 171.

‡ Hume's Works, vol. iii.

strations of public joy, "on the ground that those Moderation of who had fallen in the battle, though the prince.

in arms against his father, might have become his friends and dutiful subjects when they had got their eyes opened to see the true interest of their country." The banking companies having taken refuge in the castle, to the great inconvenience of the citizens, the prince issued a proclamation inviting them to return and resume their business, but none of them complied with the request. He also sent a message to the clergy of Edinburgh desiring them to continue the exercise of their religious functions, and assuring them of his protection. But they seem not to have placed any confidence in the guarantee offered, for they absented themselves from the city during the whole time it was occupied by the Highlanders. The two clergymen of the neighbouring parish of St. Cuthbert's, Messrs. Macvicar and Pitcairn, continued, however, to officiate as usual; and, though a number of Highland officers were present, the former not only prayed for King George, and that "the crown might sit long easy on his head," but even added the following petition in behalf of the prince: "As for the young man that is come among us to seek an earthly crown, we beseech Thee in mercy to take him to thyself, and give him a crown of glory." Charles is said to have laughed heartily at the concern for his spiritual welfare expressed by the worthy clergyman, and to have refused to interfere with him.*

The battle of Preston, which annihilated the only regular army in the kingdom, made Charles master of the whole of Scotland, with the exception of the castles of Edinburgh and Stirling, and a few insignificant Highland forts. The Scottish state officers sought refuge either in England, or in remote districts of their own country. The Chevalier de St. George was proclaimed as King James VIII. in all the large towns, and the public money was everywhere seized for his service. The news of the victory produced a strong feeling in the prince's favour, and excited unbounded enthusiasm among his supporters. Many concealed friends of his cause now openly avowed their sentiments, and united with the old Jacobites in drinking deep potations to the health of a prince who, in their own language, "could eat a dry crust, and sleep on pease straw; take his dinner in four minutes, and win a battle in five."† The ladies especially displayed an enthusiastic attachment to his person and cause, and contributed not a little to produce a reaction in his

State of public feeling. President Forbes, in describing the state of public feeling at this juncture, says, "All Jacobites, how prudent soever, became mad; all doubtful people became Jacobites; and all bankrupts became heroes, and talked of nothing but hereditary rights and victory. And what was more grievous to men of gallantry,—and if you will believe me, much more mischievous to the public,—all the fine ladies, if you will except one or two, became passionately fond of the young adventurer, and used all their arts and industry for him in the most intemperate manner."*

It now became a serious question with the prince and his advisers in what manner the victory at Preston was to be followed up. Charles himself was eager to march immediately into England; and on the very next morning he dispatched an agent named Hickson into Northumberland, with instructions to notify his success to his friends in that quarter, and to urge them to do all in their power to support him in his enterprise. There can be no doubt that the state of England at this period rendered it by no means improbable that such a vigorous measure as Charles proposed, might have been attended with temporary success. The British army was still in Flanders; the government and legislature were distracted by factions, feuds, and jealousies, while the great body of the people regarded the issue of the struggle with apathy and indifference. The tidings of the destruction of the royal army at Preston had created a general panic, and caused a run upon the Bank of England, and the supporters of the government seemed everywhere paralysed by terror. There was no fortified place on the coast between the two capitals, except Newcastle; and even there, as we learn from John Wesley, many of the inhabitants had so little confidence in the strength of their ramparts, that they removed their goods from the town; "and," he adds, "most of the best houses in our street are left without either furniture or inhabitants."† If Charles, therefore, had been able to march at once into England, at the head of three or four thousand men, it is highly probable that in the midst of the prevailing apathy of one party, and the terror of another, he would have succeeded in obtaining temporary possession of the capital.

The great majority of the prince's counsellors, however, were strongly opposed—but is overruled to the projected march into Eng- by his council. land. They urged that the army was daily diminishing in number by the return of the Highlanders to their native mountains, according to custom, for the purpose of securing their plunder; that by delaying his expedition, time would be allowed for the arrival of the expected supplies from France, which could reach him only by means of Montrose, Dundee, and other ports on the north-east coast of Scotland; and that, in the meantime, powerful reinforcements would be obtained by the accession of various clans, whom the tidings of victory and the hope of spoil would attract to the Jacobite standard. Charles was, therefore, reluctantly obliged to forego his resolution, and to prolong his stay in the capital.‡

* Culloden Papers, p. 250.

† Wesley's Journal, Sept. 23, 1745.

‡ Kirkconnel MS., quoted in Browne's Hist. of the Highlands, vol. iii. p. 93.

* Ray's History of the Rebellion, p. 45.

† Caledonian Mercury, quoted in Chambers's Hist. vol. i. p. 175.

Vigorous measures were immediately adopted to reinforce the Highland army. Measures taken to recruit the army.

Two confidential agents, Mr. Kelly and Sir James Stewart, were dispatched to the French court to entreat a liberal supply of arms and money; letters were sent to various parts of the Highlands containing news of the victory, and urging immediate aid from friendly or wavering clans; and inducements were held out to the prisoners taken at Preston to join the ranks of their captors, and not without success, though the greater part of the recruits obtained from this source deserted their new allies before the march into England. Peculiar anxiety was felt by the prince to secure the assistance of Lord Lovat, Macleod of Macleod, and Sir Alexander Macdonald of Sleat, three powerful chiefs, whose accession to the enterprise would at once have doubled the strength of the Jacobite army. Alexander Macleod of Muiravonside, a gentleman of the Scottish bar, was, therefore, dispatched to the Isle of Skye, only three days after the battle of Preston, with instructions to assure Sir Alexander Macdonald, and the chief of Macleod, that the prince did not impute their inactivity in his cause to any disaffection or want of loyalty or zeal; that he was still ready to receive them with the utmost affection and favour; and that he required them to repair with all possible speed, at the head of their retainers, to Edinburgh, where they should be furnished with arms. A correspondence was also opened with Lovat, and every possible means was employed to stimulate the ambition of that crafty and selfish chief, and to induce him to raise his clan and declare for the prince.

These intrigues were zealously counteracted by the exertions of President Forbes, who employed all his influence to confirm the wavering chiefs in their allegiance to the government. Though, to use his own words, "almost alone, without troops, without arms, without money or credit, provided with no means to prevent extreme folly, except pen and ink, a tongue, and some reputation, and, if you will except Macleod, supported by nobody of common sense or courage,"* he yet succeeded, by his sagacious measures and indomitable energy, in neutralising to a great extent the efforts of the emissaries of Charles to induce the doubtful clans to join the ranks of the insurgents.

Meanwhile, Charles, seated in the palace of his ancestors, was discharging the functions of royalty, and exerting himself to the utmost to secure the popular favour. He ordered troops of horse guards to be levied for the defence of his person, held a daily levée in Holyrood Palace, and appointed a council to meet him every morning at ten o'clock, consisting of the Duke of Perth, Lord George Murray, Quarter-master O'Sullivan, Lord Pittligo, Lord Elcho, Sir Thomas Sheridan, Secretary Murray, and all the Highland chiefs.

* Culloden Papers, p. 250.

According to Elcho, the business of the council was conducted in the following manner:—"The prince used always first to declare what he himself was for, and then he asked everybody's opinion in their turn. There was one-third of the council whose principles were that kings and princes can never either act or think wrong; so, in consequence, they always confirmed whatever the prince said. The other two-thirds thought that kings and princes thought sometimes like other men, and were not altogether infallible, and that this prince was no more so than others, and therefore begged leave to differ from him when they could give sufficient reasons for their difference of opinion. This very often was no hard matter to do, for as the prince and his old governor, Sir Thomas Sheridan, were altogether ignorant of the ways and customs of Great Britain, and both much for the doctrine of absolute monarchy, they would very often, had they not been prevented, have fallen into blunders which might have hurt the cause. The prince could not bear to hear anybody differ in sentiment from him, and took a dislike to everybody that did; for he had a notion of commanding this army as any general does a body of mercenaries, and so let them know only what he pleased, and expected them to obey without inquiring further about the matter. This might have done better had his favourites been people of the country, but as they were Irish, and had nothing to risk, the people of fashion that had their all at stake, and consequently ought to be supposed prepared to give the best advice of which they were capable, thought they had a title to know, and be consulted in what was for the good of the cause in which they had so much concern; and if it had not been for their insisting strongly upon it, the prince, when he found that his sentiments were not always approved of, would have abolished this council long ere he did."

Charles appeared to greater advantage in the ball-room of Holyrood House than Charles's daily routine at the council-board, where he exhibited too much of the arbitrary self-will which had proved so fatal to his family. When the council rose he generally dined in public with his officers, and then rode out attended by his guards. In the evening he frequently gave balls to the ladies who favoured his cause, and exerted himself to the utmost to render his entertainments attractive. "He talked, he danced, and he flattered," says one of his eulogists. He called alternately for Highland and Lowland tunes, and sometimes wore a tartan dress, at other times a court suit with the ensigns of the Garter. He went so far in his desire to gain popularity as on one occasion to touch a child for the king's evil.* He issued several proclamations, for the purpose of conciliating his enemies —his proclamations, and encouraging his wavering friends to declare themselves openly in his behalf. He offered an indemnity to all his father's subjects for their treason during the exile of his family, on condition that they should promise henceforth to submit to his authority; but, at the same time, he demanded the surrender of all the arms and ammunition in Edinburgh and the surrounding country; and his necessities compelled him to exact large contributions from the various public bodies of the kingdom. He com-

* Chambers, vol. i. p. 183.

Forced loans and contributions.

pelled the city of Edinburgh to furnish his troops with a thousand tents, two thousand targets, six thousand pair of shoes, and a large quantity of other articles to the value of upwards of £15,000. On the city of Glasgow he imposed the payment of £5500. He sent letters to all the chief magistrates of the various burghs throughout Scotland, ordering them, under the pain of rebellion, to contribute certain sums for his service; and he enjoined, also, under similar penalties, the collectors of the land-tax, the collectors and comptrollers of the customs and excise, and the factors upon the estates forfeited in 1715, to repair immediately to Holyrood with the money which was at that time in their hands. Not content with these exactions, he seized all the smuggled goods in the custom-houses at Leith and other ports, and converted them into money by selling them to the smugglers from whom they had been taken. Several of the nobility and gentry in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh were compelled to supply the army with considerable quantities of hay and oats; and a large number of horses, together with all the arms that could be found, were carried off by parties of Highlanders from the seats of the Dukes of Hamilton and Douglas, and the Earl of Hopetoun.*

For a few days after the battle of Preston, the communication between the castle and the city continued open; but the garrison having annoyed the Highland guards stationed at the

Attempted blockade of Edinburgh
Castle.

Weigh House with cohorts and cannon, orders were issued on the 29th of September, that no person should be allowed to pass. The governor immediately sent a letter to the Lord Provost, intimating that unless the blockade was removed, he would fire upon the stations occupied by the Highland guards. This threat excited great consternation among the inhabitants, who, though they had no power to open the communication between the fortress and the city, would have been the only sufferers in the event of a bombardment. With some difficulty they obtained a respite for one night, in order to lay the matter before the prince. Charles immediately returned an answer in writing, in which he expressed his surprise at the barbarity of the governor in threatening to inflict serious injury on the inhabitants for not doing what it was out of their power to do. He might, he said, with equal reason, be required by the same threat to quit the city at once, and to abandon all the advantages of his victory. He assured the citizens that if any injury should be inflicted on the city he would take care to indemnify them for their losses; and that if the threatened barbarity should be carried into effect, he would make reprisals not only upon the estates of the officers in the castle,* but also "upon all who were known to be open abettors of the German government." This answer was laid before the governor, and, after some altercation, he agreed to suspend hostilities until the return of an express which he sent to London for orders, provided that in the meantime no attempt should be made upon the castle. On the following day, however, the Highlanders, owing to a misunderstanding respecting the conditions, fired at some people who were carrying provisions up the castle hill. Upon this the governor considered himself justified in firing upon the insurgents stationed at the Weigh House. Charles retaliated by closely blockading the fortress, and prohibiting, under the severest penalties, all communication between the citizens and the garrison. In revenge for this step the garrison fired at all the Highlanders they could see. On the 4th of October The governor a cannonade was opened upon the city, and was kept up till the evening.

When it grew dark a sally was made by the garrison for the purpose of destroying some deserted houses near the castle. They then dug a deep and broad trench across the castle hill, where they planted several pieces of artillery, which discharged cartridge shot down the street, and killed and wounded a number of the citizens, as well as of the rebels. The bombardment was renewed next day, and caused the utmost confusion and dismay among the inhabitants, who were to be seen hurrying out of the city in the most dreadful alarm, carrying their most valuable effects, along with their children and aged infirm relatives. Another and more urgent appeal was now made to the prince, who, either from Removal of the policy, or pity for the distress of blockade. the citizens, yielded to their solicitations, and issued a proclamation on the evening of the 5th of October, removing the blockade. The cannonade then ceased on the part of the garrison, and supplies were henceforth allowed freely to pass into the fortress.

The bombardment was not the only injury which the citizens of Edinburgh received Depredations from the presence of the rebel of thieves and army. Under the pretence of robbers. searching for arms, the Highlanders were guilty of various acts of outrage and depredation. The greater part, however, of the felonies that were committed at this time were traced to the thieves and robbers who, during this period, when the courts of law were suspended and the authority of the magistrates in abeyance, perambulated the country in bands, wearing white cockades and the Highland dress, and exacting large sums of money from the people.* The rebels were, however, indirectly to blame for these misdeeds, for they everywhere opened the public jails and released the prisoners. Against these miscreants Charles issued several severe proclamations, and made every exertion to procure the restoration of the stolen property.

* It is said that the prince intimated to General Preston that the house of his elder brother at Valleyfield, on the northern shores of the Forth, should be destroyed if he ventured to fire on the city, and that the stout veteran received the threat with scorn, declaring that if Valleyfield were injured, the English vessels of war should, in revenge, burn down Wemyss Castle, the property of the Earl of Wemyss, whose eldest son, Lord Elcho, was in the Jacobite camp.

* Marchant's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 113.

Charles proposed at one time to summon a Scottish parliament at Edinburgh, but Spirited manifesto of the prince. ultimately relinquished the design, in consequence of the difficulties that lay in the way. He issued a proclamation, however, on the 3rd of October, denouncing "the pretended parliament of the Elector of Hanover," summoned at Westminster for the 17th, and declaring it treason for the Scotch to attend. Next day he issued a second, and very spirited, manifesto, explaining the course of policy he intended to follow. He was well aware how obnoxious the Act of Union was to a large portion of the Scottish people. In this proclamation, therefore, he explicitly announced that his father would never ratify this "pretended union," which was brought about by "the grossest corruption," and had for its principal object "the exclusion of the royal family from their undoubted right to the crown;" but "with respect to every law or act of parliament since the Revolution, so far as in a free and legal parliament they shall be approved, he will confirm them." He then proceeds to entreat the people to lay aside their prejudices, and to listen impartially to the statement of his claims. "Let me now," he says, "expostulate this weighty matter with you, my father's subjects. . . . Do not the pulpits and congregations of the clergy, as well as your weekly papers, ring with the dreadful threats of popery, slavery, tyranny, and arbitrary power, which are now ready to be imposed upon you by the formidable powers of France and Spain? Is not my royal father represented as a blood-thirsty tyrant, breathing out nothing but destruction to all those who will not immediately embrace an odious religion? Or have I myself been better used? But listen only to the naked truth. I, with my own money, hired a small vessel; ill provided with money, arms, or friends, I arrived in Scotland attended by seven persons; I published the king my father's declarations, and proclaimed his title, with pardon in one hand, and in the other liberty of conscience, and the most solemn promises to grant whatever a free parliament shall propose for the happiness of the people. I have, I confess, the greatest reason to adore the goodness of Almighty God, who has in so remarkable a manner protected me and my small army through the many dangers to which we were at first exposed, and who has led me in the way to victory, and to the capital of this ancient kingdom, amidst the acclamations of the king my father's subjects. Why, then, is so much pains taken to spirit up the minds of the people against this my undertaking? The reason is obvious; it is, lest the real sense of the nation's present sufferings should blot out the remembrance of past misfortunes, and of the outrages formerly raised against the royal family. Whatever miscarriages might have given occasion to them, they have been more than atoned for since; and the nation has now an opportunity of being secured against the like for the future. That my family has suffered exile during these fifty-seven years, everybody knows. Has the nation, during that period of time, been the more happy and flourishing for it? Have you found reason to love and cherish your governors as the fathers of the people of Great Britain and Ireland? Has a family upon whom a faction unlawfully bestowed the diadem of a rightful prince retained a due sense of so great a trust and favour? Have you found more humanity and condescension in those who were not born to a crown, than in my royal forefathers? Have their ears been open to the cries of the people? Have they, or do they, consider only the interest of these nations? Have you reaped any other benefit from them than an immense load of debts? If I am answered in the affirmative, why has their government been so often railed at in all your public assemblies? Why has the nation been so long crying out in vain for redress against the abuse of parliaments upon account of their long duration, the multitudes of place-men which occasion their venality, the introduction of penal laws, and, in general, against the miserable situation of the kingdom at home and abroad? All these, and many more inconveniences, must now be removed, unless the people of Great Britain be already so far corrupted, that they will not accept of freedom when offered to them; seeing the king, on his restoration, will refuse nothing that a free parliament can ask, for the security of the religion, laws, and liberty of his people. The fears of the nation from the powers of France and Spain appear still more vain and groundless; my expedition was undertaken unsupported by either. But, indeed, when I see a foreign force brought by my enemies against me, and when I hear of Dutch, Danes, Hessians, and Swiss, the Elector of Hanover's allies, being called over to protect his government against the king's subjects, is it not high time for the king my father to accept also of the assistance of those who are able, and who have engaged to support him? But will the world, or any one man of sense in it, infer from thence that he inclines to be a tributary prince rather than an independent monarch? Who has the better chance to be independent on foreign powers? He who, with the aid of his own subjects, can wrest the government out of the hands of an intruder, or he who cannot without assistance from abroad support his own government, though established by all the civil power, and secured by a strong military force against the un-disciplined part of those he has ruled over so many years? Let him, if he pleases try the experiment; let him send off his foreign hirelings, and put the whole upon the issue of a battle. I will trust only to the king my father's subjects, who were, or shall be, engaged in mine or their country's cause. But, notwithstanding all the opposition he can make, I still trust in the justice of my cause, the valour of my troops, and the assistance of the Almighty, to bring my enterprise to a glorious issue."

* A notorious villain named James or Daddie Ratcliff, who occupies a prominent part in Sir Walter Scott's "Heart of Midlothian," was a ringleader in these depredations.

Meanwhile the insurgent army was receiving almost daily reinforcements from the northern districts of the country, where the strength of the Jacobite cause lay. On the 3rd of October Lord Ogilvie, eldest son of the Earl of Airlie, joined the standard with a regiment of six hundred men from Strathmore and the Mearns. Old Gordon of Glenbucket arrived next day with a body of four hundred men from the upper part of Aberdeenshire. On the 9th the venerable Lord Pitsligo, a nobleman of great respectability and influence, joined the army at the head of a squadron of north-country gentlemen, attended by their servants, well armed and mounted, forming an excellent corps of cavalry a hundred and fifty in number. He also brought with him a small body of foot. Macpherson of Cluny, who had been carried to Perth as a prisoner by the insurgents, and was released on condition that he would raise his clan for the prince, returned at this juncture with a reinforcement of three hundred men. The only force, however, raised south of the Tay was a regiment of four hundred and fifty men, many of them of no very reputable character, which Colonel Roy Stewart levied in the capital, while it was in the possession of the Highlanders. The great body of the Lowland population of Scotland regarded the cause of the prince with hostility or indifference, and could not be induced either by entreaties, persuasions, or threats, to join his standard. The Lowland nobles and landed gentry who espoused the Jacobite cause, repaired to the camp attended only by their body servants. The ill-fated Earl of Kilmarnock, who, when a youth, fought along with his father for the Hanoverian dynasty in 1715, had on that occasion, without the slightest difficulty, raised a large regiment among his tenants and retainers for the defence of the government; but now that he had changed sides, all his territorial and hereditary influence could not raise one man for the cause of the Stewarts out of the thriving town which bore his name and stood at the gates of his castle. Baffled in his attempts to obtain recruits for the insurgent army among the Kilmarnock weavers, he ultimately limited his demands to their arms, which had been heirlooms in their families since the days of Drumclog. But this too was sternly refused; and one of these stout-hearted Presbyterians had the courage to tell his lordship, that "if they presented him with their guns, it would be with the muzzle till him.* The clever but eccentric Earl of Kellie was equally unsuccessful in his efforts to raise his tenants in Fife. Even in those districts where the old covenanting spirit, with its hatred of popery and despotism, had greatly declined, the people were in no way disposed to risk their lives and fortunes in asserting the claims of a stranger and a foreigner. "For my part," said a cautious rustic on being asked what side he was going to take in the contest, "I'm clear for being on the same side as the hangman. I'll stay till I see what side he's to take, and then I'll decide."†

The reinforcements, therefore, received by the insurgents were mainly drawn from the districts in which the Defection of Macleod and Macdonald of Sleat. Episcopalians and Roman Catholics abounded, and even of these the prudent policy and indefatigable efforts of President Forbes induced not a few either to espouse the cause of the government, or to remain neutral. The most prominent of the chiefs who were persuaded to raise their vassals in behalf of the reigning sovereign were Sir Alexander Macdonald of Sleat, and Macleod of Macleod, who had long wavered as to the side they should take in this contest, but at length decided for the government, and accepted some of those commissions of companies which had been judiciously placed at the disposal of the President. Their example was followed by the Earl of Sutherland, Lords Seaforth and Reay, Sir Robert Munro of Foulis, the Master of Ross, and the Laird of Grant. The President was less successful with Lord Intrigues and base policy of Lovat. Lovat. That cunning and selfish intriguer had formed a plan of collecting an army at Corriearrack, consisting of his own powerful clan, together with the men of Skye, the Macphersons, the Mackintoshes, and Farquharsons, which might at first occupy a neutral position, and ultimately join the stronger side. Sir Alexander Macdonald and Macleod, however, refused to be parties to a scheme so obviously selfish and base, and Lovat was compelled, therefore, to act on his own responsibility. He remained long in a state of perplexity and irresolution, but the victory of Preston at length decided his course. On receiving the news of that contest, he at once formed his resolution, and descending to the courtyard of his castle, in the presence of his vassals, he flung his hat on the ground, and drank "Success to the White Rose, and confusion to the White Horse and all its adherents." But with characteristic duplicity and selfishness, though casting his influence into the scale of the insurrection, he sought to provide for his own safety, whatever might be the issue of the contest, and still endeavoured to keep on the mask which he had so long worn. He therefore placed his clan under the charge of his son, who was only eighteen years of age, and in spite of the indignant protest of that noble and gallant youth against this crooked and dishonourable procedure, his unnatural parent, by arguments and threats, compelled him to take the field on behalf of the insurgents. He then wrote to President Forbes, throwing all the blame of this step upon his son, whom he represented as the most headstrong and disobedient of children.* The cunning and dastardly expedient, however, of this hoary-headed villain to provide for his own safety by risking the life of his son, did not impose upon the President, who knew Lovat too well to give the slightest credit to his assertions. His fine-spun policy, while it ultimately brought destruction upon himself, did little good to the cause which he had espoused; for he delayed the march of his clan so long, that the prince had left Edinburgh for the south before the Frasers reached Perth, and was thus deprived of their powerful aid in his invasion of England.

* Towards him. (Chambers, vol. i. p. 199.)

† Ibid, p. 200.

‡ The badge of the house of Stewart, in imitation of that of Lancaster. The White Horse forms a conspicuous figure in the armorial bearings of the Brunswick family.

The desertion of Macdonald and Macleod, and the delay of Lovat, were a severe blow to the Jacobite cause, as these three great chiefs could have brought an accession of at least four thousand men to the ranks of the insurgents. But, notwithstanding these defections, within six weeks after the battle of Preston the reinforcements they received from time to time swelled the rebel army to nearly six thousand men. Their greatest deficiency was in money. In spite of forced loans, and the seizure of the public revenues, the rebel treasury was very scantily supplied. Voluntary Arrival of supplies from France. contributions were, in some instances, sent by ladies or by partisans too old or too timid to take the field in person, and four vessels opportunely arrived at this period from France, bringing about £6000, with five thousand stand of arms, and a train of six fieldpieces. With these welcome supplies came over several French and Irish officers, along with M. de Boyer, called the Marquis d'Eguilles, who brought a letter of congratulation to the prince from Louis XV. Charles, affecting to regard the marquis as the accredited ambassador from the King of France, termed him "Monseigneur de Boyer," and treated him with studied ceremony. He also gave out that he had received the promise that his brother Henry, titular Duke of York, was to be dispatched immediately to his assistance, at the head of a French army, an assurance which contributed greatly to raise the spirits of his adherents.

Having now spent nearly six weeks in Edinburgh, it became necessary for Charles to decide as to his future movements. He had never for a moment relinquished his intention to march into England, but the members of his council were much divided in opinion respecting the propriety of this step. Some of them thought, not without reason, that their present force was wholly insufficient for such an enterprise. Their long stay in Edinburgh had enabled the government to concentrate at Newcastle an army of nearly ten thousand men, under General Wade. The Duke of Cumberland was busy forming another army in the midland counties; considerable reinforcements were expected from the continent; the militia had been called out in many districts; thirteen regiments of infantry and two regiments of cavalry were about to be raised by the Duke of Bedford and other influential nobleman; liberal supplies of money had been voted by the House of Commons, and every effort had been made to rouse the nation from its lethargy to a due sense of the danger which threatened its religion and liberties. In these circumstances the invasion of England appeared to some of the chiefs —opposed by the prince's counsellors as hazardous in the extreme, if not desperate, and they recommended that it should, at least, be delayed until the arrival of the promised succours from France; while others were of opinion that the march into England should be altogether laid aside, and that the prince should content himself with the possession of his ancestral kingdom of Scotland. Charles, however, was not to be diverted from his purpose. He asserted that the French auxiliaries would be landed before his army could reach the border; that his father's subjects in England were ready to welcome him with open arms, and that his appearance among them would be the signal for an immediate and general rising in his favour. The question was discussed in three several councils without any conclusion being come to. At length, the prince, finding that his arguments had produced no effect upon the minds of his officers, declared in a peremptory manner, "I see, gentlemen, you are determined to stay in Scotland and defend your country, but I am not less resolved to try my fate in England, though I should go alone."

Finding that the prince's determination was not to be shaken, the chiefs —their ultimate reluctantly yielded, but, instead acquiescence. of marching upon Newcastle to fight General Wade, as Charles had proposed, it was unanimously resolved, on the suggestion of Lord George Murray, to enter England by the western border. It was seen that by adopting this route they would avoid an immediate collision with the royal forces, and thus give time both for the rising of their English friends and the arrival of the French auxiliaries; while Marshal Wade would be compelled, if he wished to give them battle, to undertake a fatiguing march of sixty miles over a mountainous country, as disadvantageous for the movements of his own troops as it was favourable to the Highlanders.

The prince finally quitted Edinburgh on the evening of October 31. He slept that night at Pinkie House, and next day his army, divided into two columns, commenced its march. Charles joined them at Dal-

Charles sets out for the south—

* Culloden Papers, pp. 231—254.

Keith the same day; and Macpherson of Cluny, Menzies of Shien, and some other Highland chiefs, arrived with a reinforcement of nearly one thousand men. Notwithstanding this accession, the last the prince received in Scotland, his force was still quite inadequate to the object he had in view.

State of his army. It amounted to only between five and six thousand men, five hundred of whom were cavalry. They were, however, well equipped, and carried with them provisions for four days, besides a considerable quantity of baggage, for the transport of which they were provided with horses and waggons. Thirteen regiments, numbering in all between three and four thousand men, consisted of Highlanders dressed in their native garb. Five regiments were made up of Lowlanders; and of the cavalry two troops were guards, under the command of Lord Elcho and Lord Balmerino, while one troop under the Earl of Kilmarnock consisted of light horse, for scouring the country and procuring intelligence. Carlisle had been selected as the first place of attack, but, in order to mislead Marshal Wade as to the route they intended to follow, Charles sent forward a party to order quarters for his army at all the towns on the road to Berwick. He now also appointed his principal officers. The Duke of Perth was named general; Lord George Murray, lieutenant-general; Lord Elcho, colonel of the Life Guards; the Earl of Kilmarnock, colonel of the Hussars; and Lord Pittsligo, colonel of the Angus Horse.

The arrangements being completed, a considerable body, under the command of Tullibardine, set out from Dalkeith, on the evening of the 1st of November, for Peebles, intending to proceed by Moffat to Carlisle. A second division, commanded by the prince in person, set forward on the 3rd, taking a route more to the south, as if for the purpose of fighting Marshal Wade at Newcastle. Their real destination was all along kept profoundly secret even from the army itself, as the march into England was from the first far from popular among the common soldiers, particularly among the Highlanders, who deserted in considerable numbers by the way. On the evening of the first day's march, Charles reached Lauder with his division; but a false rumour that a strong body of dragoons was advancing to meet him, induced him next day to fall back on the village of Channellkirk, in order

His arrival at Kelso— to bring up his rear. On the following day he proceeded to Kelso, while a third division took the road by Galashiels, Selkirk, Hawick, and Moss-paul.

Charles remained at Kelso for three days, and, —he enters with a view still to keep up the Cumberland. deception practised on the English force at Newcastle, he sent orders to Wooler, which lies on the direct road to that town, to have quarters in readiness for the reception of his whole army. He then suddenly gave orders to march to the westward, and proceeding down Liddesdale, the insurgents entered Cumberland on the evening of the 8th of November. Next day the three divisions of the army, hitherto kept in ignorance of one another's movements, met on a heath at a short distance from Carlisle.

This ancient city, the capital of Cumberland, had formerly been a place of considerable strength, and for ages had protected the western border against the incursions of the Scots. Since the union of the two kingdoms, however, its fortifications had been allowed to fall into decay, and presented no very formidable obstacle to an invading army. The city was surrounded by an old crumbling wall, manned by a few volunteer citizens and a body of the Cumberland and Westmoreland militia, while the castle was feebly garrisoned by a company of invalids.

On the 10th of November, the insurgents having crossed the Eden by several fords, Investment of Carlisle. invested the city, and Charles sent a message to the mayor, commanding him to surrender. To this summons no answer was returned, but the mayor issued a proclamation to the citizens, intimating his intention to hold out to the last extremity.

In the meantime, intelligence reached the prince that Wade was on his march from Newcastle, and was rapidly pushing forward to the relief of Carlisle. Nothing intimidated, Charles immediately advanced with the greater part of his army to Brampton, in order to engage the English general, with the advantage of the hilly ground in that direction. He remained at Brampton for several days, but having satisfied himself that he had been imposed on by false intelligence, he sent back the Duke of Perth, with a considerable body both of foot and horse, to prosecute the siege of Carlisle. On the afternoon of the 13th, the Highlanders once more appeared before that place. They instantly commenced raising a battery on the east side of the town, and, in order to encourage the troops, both Perth and Tullibardine took part in the work, and wrought, with their coats off, in the trenches. During these operations the garrison were not idle, but kept up an incessant firing on the besiegers, which, however, was not very destructive: indeed, so unskillfully were the guns wrought that the Highlanders turned the whole affair into ridicule, and waved their bonnets in derision. Next day the courage of the besieged began to give way, and at the moment when the assault was about to be commenced, a white flag was seen waving from the walls, and the mayor intimated a wish to come to terms for the surrender of the city. A cessation of hostilities was agreed on, and, —its surrender. in the meantime, an express was forwarded to the prince to know his pleasure. Charles wisely refused to grant any terms to the city, unless the castle also was given up, and, accordingly, both were surrendered, on condition that the garrison and militia should retire unmolested on delivering up their arms and horses, and engaging on oath not to bear arms against the prince for the space of twelve months. The insurgents, of course, obtained possession of all the military stores in the castle, among which were one thousand stand of arms, together with much valuable property, that had been deposited for safety in the castle, by the inhabitants of the surrounding country. The capture of Carlisle cost the rebel army only one man killed, Triumphal and one wounded. On the 17th entry of Charles made his triumphal entry Charles. into the place, but though he received the submission of the inhabitants, few or none of them manifested any interest in his cause.

On the day after the surrender of Carlisle, Mar-

Wade Marshal Wade commenced his march marches for that city. He had proceeded Carlisle. as far as Hexham when intelligence of that event reached him, and finding the mountain roads almost impassable in consequence of a heavy fall of snow, and probably entertaining an exaggerated opinion of the strength of the insurgent army, he immediately faced about and returned to Newcastle.

The success which had hitherto attended the Dissensions in Jacobite enterprise was soon to the insurgent be superseded by difficulty and army. disaster; and already there were many unfavourable symptoms calculated to throw a damp over the triumphant enthusiasm of the prince and his associates. Among these was a misunderstanding which had sprung up between the Duke of Perth and Lord George Murray, originating, it would seem, in the jealousy of the latter, because he had not been consulted on some matter of importance, on which Perth had thought proper privately to communicate with the prince. Murray, in consequence, wrote to Charles resigning his commission, but at the same time offering to serve as a volunteer. The army, too, were dissatisfied that a papist should be entrusted with the chief command—a circumstance which they considered likely to injure their cause among the English. On this occasion Perth evinced his disinterested zeal for the service, by resigning his appointment, and retiring to the command of his own regiment. Lord George then became commander-in-chief, a post for which he was in all respects better qualified than his rival, and apparent amity was thus for a time restored.

On leaving Scotland, Charles had appointed Lord

State of the Strathallan as commander-in-chief Jacobite's cause in that country, with instructions in Scotland—to employ his utmost diligence collecting reinforcements. He had been partially successful, and by detachments which had arrived under the Master of Lovat, the Earl of Cromarty, Macgregor of Glengyle, and other chieftains, he could now muster between two and three thousand men. On the other hand, however, great efforts were being made by the friends of the government, under the Earl of Loudon and President Forbes, who had collected a considerable force at Inverness. The capital had recovered from its panic; the crown officers had returned and entered the city in solemn procession; and Wade had sent two regiments of cavalry to their support. Other considerable towns, particularly Glasgow, Paisley, and Dumfries, were raising militia for the support of the government, while at Perth and Dundee the birthday of King George had been celebrated with public rejoicings.

Affairs in England wore a still more threatening aspect. The insurgent army was —and in greatly reduced by desertion, and England.
the people had as yet manifested no disposition to join the rebellion.

The government were now thoroughly roused to a sense of their danger, and Measures strong measures were in progress adopted by the
for the suppression of the rebellion. government.

The greater part of the British troops had been recalled from Flanders, and an army consisting of ten thousand of these experienced veterans was already stationed in Staffordshire to oppose the progress of the rebel army towards the capital. Besides the forces under General Wade at Newcastle, and the troops assembled in the midland counties, General Ligonier was advancing with another army towards Lancaster, and a third to be headed by the king in person, with the Earl of Stair as his lieutenant, was forming on Finchley Common for the protection of London. The cordial reception too which the king had met with on his return from the continent, and the assurances of support which he received from parliament, together with the loyal addresses which poured in from every part of the country, all showed that the great body of the people were firm in their allegiance to the House of Hanover.

All these circumstances were well known to Charles, who, nevertheless, remained unshaken in his resolution to force his way to the capital. He seems to have imagined that the valour of his troops, aided by the justice of his cause, would be sufficient to overcome all opposition. He hoped, too, that as he advanced into the heart of the country many of the English people would be induced to join his standard. These Charles expectations, however, were not holds a council shared by the majority of the officers, of war.
of the soldiers; and at a council of war which he found it necessary to call, very conflicting opinions were entertained. Some proposed to march to Newcastle, and offer battle to General Wade; others to advance directly towards London, even though they should have to fight their way through the army under Ligonier; while a third party proposed to return at once to Scotland. Charles warmly urged the advance Resolution on London, in accordance with to march the plan he had formed before to London.
leaving Edinburgh, and Lord George Murray having at some length advocated the same view, the rest of the council acquiesced.*

* Home's Works, vol. iii. p. 120; Jacobite Memoirs, p. 40.

On the 20th of November, having garrisoned Carlisle with two hundred men, the army commenced its perilous march. The whole force, when mustered, amounted to no more than about four thousand five hundred men, above a thousand having deserted on the road from Edinburgh. They were separated into two divisions, which kept about half a day's march asunder. Of these the first was commanded by Lord George Murray, the second by Charles himself. They proceeded through Shap, Kendal, and Lancaster, and on the 27th were reunited at Preston. This place, associated in history with the defeat of the Duke of Hamilton in the civil wars, and the surrender of Brigadier Mackintosh in 1715, was regarded by the Highlanders with superstitious dread, as a barrier which no Scottish army could ever pass; but Murray, who was aware of this feeling, on reaching the town, without halting, marched the vanguard at once across the Ribble, and quartered a large detachment on the opposite side of the stream.

Though this portion of England was believed to be in general well affected to the cause of the Stewarts, Charles had the mortification to find that neither on the march, nor during his stay at Preston, did a single recruit join his standard; while the proclamation of his father, which was duly made at all the market towns on their route, was listened to with apparent indifference. Only at Preston his arrival was hailed with acclamations and the ringing of bells. He continued, however, to encourage his followers with the hope of being joined by a large body of friends on their arrival at Manchester, where a considerable number of the Lancashire gentry, chiefly Roman Catholics, still had their town residences.

From Preston the army marched on the 28th to Wigan, and thence, next day, to Manchester. Crowds from the surrounding country, attracted, probably, by the novelty of the spectacle, thronged around the insurgents on their march, cheered the young prince as he passed, and expressed a wish for his success; but when invited to join in the expedition, all declined on the plea of ignorance of the art of fighting. As the army approached Manchester, the symptoms of popular favour continued to increase, and when they entered the town, the bells rung out a joyous peal, white cockades were mounted, the air was rent with the acclamations of the multitude, great numbers pressed forward to kiss the prince's hand, and to offer their services; and, in the evening, the houses of the inhabitants were splendidly illuminated.

The troops halted at Manchester one day, during which they obtained a subsidy of £3000, and were joined by about two hundred recruits, who were embodied under the name of the Manchester regiment, and placed under the command of Mr. Francis Townley, a Roman Catholic gentleman belonging to an old Lancashire family, and one of the few persons of note who had joined the army on their march.

The situation of the insurgents was now critical in the extreme; surrounded by enemies on all sides, in the midst of a population for the most part hostile to their cause, the hope of reinforcements and supplies from France, which their leader had so often held out for their encouragement, now entirely cut off by the English cruisers, under Admiral Vernon, in the Channel, and those under Admiral Byng, then hovering on the east coast of Scotland, while large bodies of militia were being raised in various districts of the surrounding country, it seemed nothing less than insanity any longer to persevere in an enterprise so hopeless. But Charles, who had "set his life upon a cast," and was evidently resolved to "stand the hazard of the die," insisted on marching onward, assuring his dispirited followers that he was certain of obtaining more and more support as he proceeded. In the meantime, however, his principal officers, in just alarm, remonstrated with Lord George Murray against being led onward to certain destruction. His lordship recommended them to wait until their arrival at Derby, where he expected they would be joined by large numbers of English Jacobites, but promised that should this hope be disappointed, he would employ his utmost influence with the prince to induce him to retreat.*

On the not improbable supposition that the Highland army intended to march —they proceeded to Derby. The Mersey, in that direction, had been broken down by order of the Duke of Cumberland. Charles, however, who had resolved on proceeding to Derby, on the 1st of December, resumed his march at the head of one division of his army, and forded the Mersey near Stockport, with the water up to his middle. The other divisions, with the artillery and baggage, crossed somewhat lower down the stream at Cheadle, where a kind of temporary bridge was formed of the trunks of poplar trees. The two divisions reunited at Macclesfield the same evening. Here they received intelligence that the royal army, of which the Duke of Cumberland had now assumed the command, was quartered at Lichfield, Coventry, Stafford, and Newcastle-under-Line, and it became necessary to mislead the duke as to their intentions. This was dextrously accomplished by Lord George Murray, who marched with a detachment of the army towards Congleton, which lies on the road to Lichfield, and drove back an advanced party of the English horse, under the Duke of Kingston, towards Newcastle. The Duke of Cumberland immediately concluded that the insurgents were on their march either to give him battle, or to join their friends in Wales, and hastily pushed on to Stone, in order to intercept them, leaving the road to Derby open. Lord George, having thus gained his object, after passing the night at Congleton, turned off early next morning to the left, passed through Leek, and gained Ashbourne in the evening. Charles, in the meantime, after halting a day at Macclesfield, had taken the direct road by Gawsworth, and came up with the other division of his troops at Ashbourne on the 3rd of December.

* Kirkconnel, MS.

The insurgent army reached Derby on the following day. The prince took up his quarters in the house of the Earl of Exeter, and the usual proclamations were by his order made in the market-place. Charles now found himself within one hundred and twenty-seven miles of the capital, and was already, in imagination, enjoying his triumphal entry into London, and the complete realization of his long and ardently-cherished hopes. At supper that evening, with his principal officers, his heart was full to overflowing, and he even discussed the question whether he should make his entry into the capital in a Highland or an English dress. Next morning, however, all these splendid anticipations melted away like a dream. At an early hour he was waited upon by Lord George Murray with the whole of his chief officers, who submitted to him their unanimous opinion, that they ought instantly to commence their retreat into Scotland.

A council of war. They represented to him that every expectation by which they had been induced to proceed thus far had been disappointed. No succours had arrived, or could now arrive, from France; there had appeared no symptoms of a rising in their favour among the people of England; they were opposed by three armies, each superior in number to their own, which only amounted to about five thousand men, while the combined forces of the enemy were probably not less than thirty thousand. In such circumstances, even present victory could not avert ultimate ruin. On the most favourable supposition, that they should be able to elude the Duke of Cumberland's army, and reach the capital without fighting a battle or losing a man, they must then encounter the force assembled on Finchley Common, and, even though they should prove victorious in the fight, their numbers, diminished as they must be by the contest, were utterly inadequate to gather any fruits of victory, or to keep possession of a populous city like London; and if, on the other hand, they were defeated, not a single man of their army would escape, and the prince himself, if not killed in the action, would inevitably fall into the hands of his enemies. They would have a much better chance of success, Lord George added, if they were to return into Scotland, especially as they had learned by despatches which had just arrived, that Lord Strathallan was ready to join them from Perth with an army of at least three or four thousand men.*

All these weighty arguments were thrown away upon Charles, who listened to them with the utmost impatience. He replied that he placed a firm reliance on the justice of his cause, and the protection of Providence. He admitted that there was some danger in advancing, but argued that, in addition to the disgrace, there was equal danger in attempting a retreat; and he still expressed a confident expectation that his friends would join him as he proceeded, and that the French would effect a landing on the coast of Kent or Sussex. As these arguments made no impression, he had recourse to entreaties, which proved equally unavailing, and, finding that the council were immovable in their resolution not to advance farther into England, as a last resource he proposed that they should march into Wales, and give his friends there an opportunity of joining his standard. The rejection of this final proposal closed this painful conference, which, after lasting for several hours, was broken up without having come to any decision. The army halted at Derby for the remainder of the day, during great part of which Charles was employed in A retreat to Scotland resolved on. expostulating with his officers individually. All, however, remained inflexible, and at another council, which was held in the evening, he reluctantly consented to a retreat, moodily remarking, "That he would call no more councils, since he was accountable to nobody for his actions, excepting to God and his father, and would, therefore, no longer either ask or accept their advice."

It has been affirmed of late that the chiefs committed a great mistake in pressing a retreat, and that if they had followed the urgent advice of the prince, they would, in all probability, have overturned the Hanoverian dynasty, and restored the Stewarts to the throne.* It is argued that the consternation which pervaded the capital when the arrival of the Highlanders at Derby was made known, showed that no effectual resistance could have been offered by the citizens;† and that, if Charles had succeeded in beating the Duke of Cumberland, the army on Finchley Common would have dispersed of its own accord. Many of the inhabitants had fled to the country, carrying with them their most valuable effects; all the shops were shut, there was a great run upon the Bank, which only escaped bankruptcy by paying in sixpences to gain time. The Duke of Newcastle, it is affirmed, was at his wits' end, and shut himself up for one whole day in his house, deliberating whether he should not declare for the prince; and it is even said that the king himself caused his most precious effects to be put on board his yachts, and ordered these to remain at the Tower stairs in readiness to sail at a moment's warning.‡ Most of these statements, however, are greatly exaggerated or altogether groundless. It is true that the news of the approach of the insurgents excited great alarm in the capital. Fielding, who was in London at the time, states that "when the Highlanders, by a most incredible march, got between the duke's army and the metropolis, they struck a terror into it scarcely to be credited." But though the citizens, excited by

* See Earl Stanhope's Hist. of England, vol. iii. p. 295; and Browne's Hist. of the Highlands, vol. iii. p. 147.

† The day on which the news arrived was long remembered under the name of BLACK FRIDAY.

‡ Chevalier Johnstone's Memoirs, p. 77.

* Jacobite Memoirs, p. 54.

exaggerated rumours respecting the habits of the clansmen, entertained a very natural apprehension of a visit to their shops and dwelling houses on the part of these savage warriors, it by no means follows that there was any imminent danger of a revolution. It is, indeed, preposterous to imagine that five or six thousand ignorant and undisciplined Highlanders, without any experienced general or statesman to guide their movements, even though they had succeeded in evading or defeating the three armies opposed to them, could have retained possession of the capital for a week. It had become evident to all that the great body of the people, both in Scotland and England, were hostile to the pretensions of the exiled family, and would neither support nor submit to their restoration to the throne. The march of the rebel army through the Lowlands of Scotland and the most disaffected districts of England, had afforded a favourable opportunity for their friends to join them, yet even the old Cavalier gentry had almost to a man held aloof. Whatever discontent existed towards the government, it had not strengthened the Stewart cause, or augmented the number of the insurgents. The farther they proceeded from their base, their condition became the more perilous. With three armies hovering around them, each double the size of their own, a way of escape could not long remain open. No wonder then, that when the chiefs carefully considered the position of affairs, they became unanimously convinced of the absolute necessity of a retreat.

They commenced their retrograde movement on the 6th of December, the infelicitous commencement of their retreat. The rebels and their officers and common soldiers believing they were on their march to attack the Duke of Cumberland. They had set out before dawn, and were in high spirits, elated with the hope of victory. As soon as the returning light of day enabled them to discover that they were retracing their steps to the north, their ranks resounded with outcries of rage and indignation. They could have submitted to be beaten in a fair field by a superior foe, but to turn their backs on the enemy, without striking a blow, was felt to be a disgrace beyond endurance. Charles was greatly dispirited, and seemed to follow rather than to lead his soldiers. He seldom conversed with any one, but rode most frequently behind the troops in silence and dejection.

Cumberland, on learning that the rebel army was at Derby, hastily withdrew his troops to Meriden Moor, near Coventry, and with so much secrecy had the movement of the insurgents been conducted, that he was two days there before the intelligence of their retreat reached him. No sooner, however, was he assured of the fact than he commenced a vigorous pursuit, at the head of his cavalry and of a thousand foot soldiers, mounted on horseback for the occasion. On reaching Macclesfield, he found that the enemy were two days' march in advance of him. The van of the insurgent army, headed by Charles, reached Penrith on the 17th; but Lord George, who had charge of the rear, was detained by some accident at Shap until the morning of the 18th, when they set forward to overtake their comrades. On reaching the village of Clifton, about three miles from Penrith, they found several parties of volunteer cavalry drawn up to intercept them. These, however, were quickly put to flight by a single charge from Glengarry's men, and several were made prisoners. Among these was a footman of the Duke of Cumberland, who informed them that his master was close upon their rear at the head of four thousand men. Murray immediately sent a messenger to the prince to inform him of this circumstance, and to request directions, as well as a reinforcement of a thousand men. Charles, however, sent back the messenger with orders to Lord George to abstain from offensive operations against the duke, and to hasten forward to Penrith. But it was now too late to avoid an encounter, and Murray accordingly drew up his troops on a moor on the right of the road, while those of the duke, coming up just as the sun was setting, formed within the opposite enclosure, the public highway with its two hedges alone intervening between the two armies. It was now nearly dark, but by the light of the moon, which fitfully shone out between broken clouds, Lord George could discern a body of soldiers coming stealthily forward as if to surprise him. He immediately gave the war-shout of "Claymore!" and rushing forward, followed by the Macphersons and Stewarts, after a fierce but brief contest, completely repulsed the English, and drove them back to their main body. Skirmish at Clifton. with the loss of a hundred men in killed and wounded.

Colonel Honeywood, who commanded the party, was severely wounded and left on the field. The Scots, who had lost only twelve men, were eager for pursuit; but Murray, in obedience to the prince's orders, withdrew his troops to Penrith.

Early on the 19th of December, the insurgents reached Carlisle, where they rested until the following day. Here it was thought expedient to leave a garrison, though for what purpose does not very plainly appear, as it could not have been reasonably supposed, that a place which they had captured with so much ease on their march to the south, would be capable of resisting the combined forces of the Duke of Cumberland and Marshal Wade. The number of the garrison has been variously estimated, but according to the most reliable accounts, could not be less than from three to four hundred men. These consisted of the Manchester regiment, some detachments from the Lowland regiments, and a small number of French and Irish. A few of these, particularly the Scots, had voluntarily consented to be left behind, but the English wished to follow Charles into Scotland and share his fortunes, and were only induced to remain through the misrepresentations of Townley, their colonel, who informed them that such was the prince's pleasure.* The result might easily have been anticipated. No sooner had the insurgent army withdrawn than the place was invested by Cumberland. Having procured from Whitehaven some battering artillery, he soon silenced the fire of the unfortunate garrison, who had at first manifested a disposition to hold out to the last extremity. The cannonade commenced on the 29th, and on the morning of the 30th a white flag was displayed from the walls, and a message was sent by the governor to the duke, expressing a wish to capitulate, and requesting to know what terms he would be pleased to grant. His answer was that the only terms he would or could grant, were, "that they should not be put to the sword, but Surrender of reserved for his majesty's pleasure." On such ominous terms the Carlisle to the Duke of the garrison were constrained to surrender, and to await, with what Cumberland. patience they might, the declaration of their fate.

* MS. Memoirs of Captain Daniel.

On the morning of the 20th, which was Charles's birthday, he left Carlisle with his army, and proceeded to re-enter Scotland by fording the Esk, which there "divides the sister kingdoms." This, under ordinary circumstances, would be an achievement neither difficult nor dangerous; but, on this occasion, the river having been swollen by an incessant rain of several days' duration, was fully four feet in depth. It was necessary, however, to make the attempt without delay, as the heavy rain still continued to fall, and the stream becoming deeper every hour would have soon grown quite unfordable. The arrangement made for crossing, according to the description given of it by the Chevalier de Johnstone, who was one of the party, was somewhat ingenious. "Our cavalry," he says, "formed in the river to break the force of the current, about twenty-five paces above that part of the ford where our infantry were to pass; and the Highlanders formed themselves into ranks of ten or twelve abreast, with their arms locked in such a manner as to support one another against the rapidity of the river, leaving sufficient intervals between their ranks for the passage of the water. Cavalry were likewise stationed in the river, below the ford, to pick up and save those who might be carried away by the violence of the current. The interval between the cavalry appeared like a paved street through the river, the heads of the Highlanders being generally all that was seen above the water. By means of this contrivance our army passed the Esk in an hour's time, without losing a single man; and a few girls, determined to share the fortune of their lovers, were the only persons who were carried away by the rapidity of the stream."* When they reached the opposite bank, fires were kindled to restore warmth to their benumbed bodies and to dry their clothes, and such was their delight at finding themselves once more on their native soil, that, forgetful of all their fatigues, privations, and dangers, and even of their mortification at their retreat, they began to dance for very joy.

Charles now divided his army into two columns, one of which took the road by Advance of the Ecclefechan and Moffat, and the insurgents to other, conducted by Charles himself, proceeded directly to Annan, where they halted for the night. Lord Elcho, with a body of about five hundred cavalry, advanced to take possession of Dumfries, and thither the column under Charles followed next day. The inhabitants of this town had been always distinguished by their strong attachment to the Protestant faith and the Hanoverian dynasty; they had manifested their determined hostility to the cause of Charles by seizing on the baggage waggons of the insurgent army at Lockerby; and at this very time, on hearing a report of some disaster having befallen the rebels, they had given expression to their loyalty by public rejoicings and a general illumination. When the Highlanders entered they found the candles still burning in the windows, and the bonfires still burning in the streets. The consternation of the people was naturally very great. They expected nothing less than that their town should be plundered and laid in ashes. Charles, however, contented himself with ordering a contribution of £2000 and one thousand pairs of shoes for the use of his army. Even this was no slight punishment. It was found impossible to raise more than £1100, and the provost and another magistrate were carried off as a guarantee for payment of the remainder.

A rumour that the Duke of Cumberland was advancing with his troops to Dum- Their departure fries, induced Charles precipitately for Glasgow. to evacuate the town, and the army separating into several divisions proceeded by different routes towards Glasgow, levying contributions very freely on the country people by the way. Charles himself proceeded by way of Hamilton, where he halted with his troops for one day, lodging in the ducal palace, and enjoying his favourite pastime of hunting in the spacious deer parks surrounding the mansion.

The first body of the insurgents entered Glasgow on Christmas-day, and on the next day Charles followed with the rest of the army. Their necessities were at this time greater than they had ever yet been since the commencement of their disastrous enterprise. Their scanty clothing hung around them in rags, and many of Wretched condition of the them were not only bare-legged, insurgent army. according to the approved Highland fashion of the time, but also bare-footed. Glasgow had no reason to expect any favour at the hands of Charles. It had from the first distinguished itself by the warmth of its attachment to the new dynasty, and had recently, in the exuberance of its loyalty, raised an army of twelve hundred men to aid the government in suppressing the rebellion. It was already a very wealthy city, while its utter defencelessness rendered it at once a tempting and an easy prey. Charles was not loath to avail himself of the resources which he had the power to command. He immediately set about refitting his army at the expense of the citizens. Besides exactions in money amounting to about

* Memoirs of the Rebellion of 1745 and 1746, by the Chevalier de Johnstone, aide-de-camp to Lord George Murray.

Heavy contri- £10,000, he ordered the magistrates levied to provide 12,000 shirts, in Glasgow. 6000 cloth coats, 6000 pairs of stockings, and 6000 pairs of shoes. He further imposed a fine of £500 upon the provost, because he refused to furnish a list of the parties who had subscribed for raising troops to assist the government. He also extorted a contribution of £500 from the town of Paisley, besides smaller sums from Renfrew and other places in the neighbourhood.

As the Highlanders approached their own country they began to desert in considerable numbers; and by the time they reached Glasgow the whole of the insurgent army amounted to no more than three thousand six hundred foot and five hundred horse. Charles prolonged his stay in the west for an entire week, but so unpopular was his cause among the citizens, that he was unable to add more than sixty recruits to his army.

On the 3rd of January, Charles took his departure from Glasgow, his army being divided into two columns, one of which was ordered to take the direction of Kilsyth, and the other that of Cumbernauld. In the meantime the cavalry under Lord Elcho, had advanced to Falkirk, so that it appeared to be the intention of the insurgents to pay a second visit to the capital. The citizens of Edinburgh took the alarm, and began to make vigorous preparations for a defence, which, fortunately, circumstances rendered unnecessary. The column which had been dispatched to Kilsyth, after spending the night there, quitted next morning the road to Edinburgh, and proceeded——and marches— to Stirling. the other division in the evening at the village of Bannockburn. The object of this movement was to attempt the reduction of Stirling Castle, the importance of which, as commanding the principal avenue to the Highlands, was too obvious to escape the notice of the prince and his advisers. According to orders previously sent, he was joined at Stirling by the troops under Lord John Drummond and Lord Strathallan, the former having three thousand men under his command, and being well provided with artillery and military stores which he had brought from France. By these accessions, together with Lord Lewis Gordon's detachment, the total force of the insurgent army now amounted to nine thousand men, being the largest number that ever mustered under the banner of Charles.

Stirling Castle, which was at that time a fortress of considerable strength, was held by a strong garrison, under the command of General Blakeney, a brave and experienced officer. The town itself, which then contained about five thousand inhabitants, was quite untenable, being only partially defended by a low wall, incapable of resisting for an hour the assault of artillery. Nevertheless, by the instigation of General Blakeney, an attempt was made to defend it. A small body of militia was raised among the townsmen, and provided with arms and ammunition from the castle, and the governor encouraged this feeble and inexperienced force to make a vigorous resistance by assuring them that, in case of necessity, they should find refuge in the castle, which he had resolved to defend to the last extremity.

In the meantime, the English forces under Marshal Wade had reached the capital, where they were reinforced by the Duke of Cumberland's cavalry; but the duke himself having been sent with a detachment of infantry to protect the southern coast, in case of a French invasion, General Hawley was, by his recommendation, appointed to the command of the army in Scotland in the room of Marshal Wade, who was now incapacitated by age for active service. The force under Hawley, augmented by small bodies of volunteers from Yorkshire and Glasgow, and by some recruits from Argyleshire under Colonel Campbell, was nearly equal in numbers to the insurgent army. The arrival of such a force for the protection of the capital was hailed by the loyal portion of the citizens with lively satisfaction. An association was formed for providing the troops with blankets, and a general illumination took place in token of the popular enthusiasm. The new general "had not a better head, and certainly a much worse heart than Sir John Cope, who was a humane, good tempered man."* Hawley's whole genius lay, as the son of Lord President Forbes remarked, in the management of a squadron, or in prosecuting with vigour any mortal to the gallows. He was a scoffing infidel,† and though personally brave, he was hated by his own soldiers for his cruel and brutal temper. Their nickname for him was "the Lord Chief Justice." "Frequent and sudden executions," says Horace Walpole, "are Hawley's passion. One of the surgeons of the army begged the body of a soldier, who was hanged for desertion, to dissect. 'Well,' said Hawley, 'but then you shall give me the skeleton to hang up in the guard-room.'"‡ On his arrival in Edinburgh he caused two gibbets to be erected, to show the treatment he meant to give the rebels who might fall into his hands.§ He was present at the battle of Sheriffmuir, and, in consequence of the success of the Duke of Argyll's right wing, had formed a very low opinion of the prowess of the Highlanders. He spoke contemptuously of the courage and capacity of his predecessor, General Cope, and imputed the success of the insurgents at Preston

* Sir Walter Scott.

† His will, dated March 29, 1749, contains this instruction about his burial:—"My carcase may be put anywhere. The priest, I conclude, will have his fee; let the puppy have it."

‡ Letter to Sir H. Mann, Jan. 17, 1746.

§ Clodden Papers, p. 270.

entirely to the misconduct of that officer. Confident of success, and eager to win the laurels which he fancied to be within his reach, he quitted the capital on the 13th of January, and marched towards Stirling, for the purpose, as he boasted, of driving the rebels before him.

Charles, meanwhile, was pressing the siege of Stirling. On the 4th of January, he ordered a part of his army to occupy a position within cannon-shot of the town, on the south, and as the stone bridge on the north had been broken down when General Cope was there with his army, the town was thus completely invested. Next day a message was sent requiring the surrender of the place, but the armed civilians, by whom it was defended, being ignorant of the usages of war, fired upon the messenger, who narrowly escaped with his life. A battery was then raised within musket-shot of the wall, and, on the 6th, a more peremptory summons to surrender having been sent, the courage of the besieged began to give way, and the magistrates sent a message requesting a truce until next day at ten o'clock. This was readily granted, but the whole day having been spent in deliberation, the besiegers became impatient, and in the evening began again to fire upon the town. Next morning, the terms of surrender were arranged. It was agreed that the town should be delivered up, on condition that the lives and property of the inhabitants should be protected, and that the arms with which they had been provided should be returned to the castle. In the afternoon of the same day (January 8th), the insurgents entered the town. On the 10th the castle was summoned to surrender, but General Blakeney, the governor, returned for answer: "That his royal highness would assuredly have a very bad opinion of him, were he capable of surrendering the castle in such a cowardly manner."* The siege of the fortress was therefore formally commenced, and a battery was raised between the church and a large house at the head of the town, called "Marr's Work." Very little progress was made in the undertaking, for the fire of the castle speedily demolished the battery and dismounted the cannon. Hawley was now on his march to relieve the place, and his approach compelled the insurgents to suspend their operations.

Leaving a few hundred men under Gordon of Glenbucket to continue the blockade of the castle, Charles, on the 16th, marched to meet the enemy, and, drawing up his men upon the Plean

Moor, to the east of Bannockburn, Charles resolves to attack the spot, as he remarked, of happy royal army. omen to his cause, he awaited an attack. The English, however, remained inactive in their camp about seven miles distant. Finding that they did not move, Charles resolved to assume the offensive; and on the 17th, having again drawn up his army, he called a council of war about mid-day, and announced his intention to march against the enemy. His plan was formed with considerable skill. The remains of the Torwood, once a forest of great extent, which repeatedly afforded a place of retreat to the patriot Wallace, lay between the two armies. The high road from Stirling and Bannockburn to Falkirk passes through the middle of this wood, and to the south of it lies a wild upland called Falkirk Moor, which it was the object of Charles to gain unperceived, so as to give his troops the advantage of the wind, as well as of the high ground for their operations. With this view he led the main body of his army along the west side of the Torwood, where they could not be seen from He out-ma-

Hawley's camp, while Lord John nœuvres
Hawley. Drummond with his own regiment, the Irish picquets, and all the cavalry of the insurgents, carrying the royal standard and other colours, was ordered to advance upon the direct road leading from Bannockburn towards Falkirk, and to make a display in front of the Torwood for the purpose of persuading the royal army that the whole rebel forces were advancing by that route. The stratagem proved completely successful. General Hawley entertained such contempt for the "Highland rabble," as he termed them, and was so fully persuaded that they would never venture to attack the royal forces, that, with unpardonable carelessness, he had neglected even the common precaution of sending out patrols. Such was his continued security, that at this critical juncture he allowed himself to be detained at Callender House, where he was enjoying the hospitality of the Countess of Kilmarnock, wife of one of the insurgent leaders, and was so much fascinated by her wit and gaiety, that he spent the whole forenoon in her company. General Huske, his second in command, though a good and experienced officer, was completely deceived by the manœuvres of Lord John Drummond's division, and remained in total ignorance of the movements of the main body of the rebels until they had crossed the river Carron near Dunnipace, and were only about two miles distant from the royal camp. About one o'clock an alarm was given by a countryman that the Highlanders were approaching, and the report was confirmed by two of the officers, who climbed a tree, and with the aid of a telescope discovered the mass of the insurgents in full march towards Falkirk Moor. The intelligence was immediately transmitted to Hawley, who received it with the utmost indifference, merely ordering that the men should put on their accoutrements, but without getting under arms. This order was obeyed, and the troops then sat down to dinner. Between one and two o'clock, some gentlemen volunteers rode in full gallop, bringing decisive intelligence of the approach of the enemy. The drum instantly beat to arms, and an urgent message was dispatched for Hawley, who still lingered at Callender House. His negligence caused bitter complaints among the officers, who were heard saying to one another, "Where is the general? What shall be done? We have no orders." General Huske saw the danger, and the importance of immediate steps to meet it, but in the absence of his superior officer he had no authority to undertake any movement against the enemy, and was therefore forced to content himself with forming the troops in line of battle upon the ground in front of the camp.

* The Chevalier de Johnstone, p. 116.

FALKIRK.

Hawley at length caught the alarm, and now came galloping up to the camp in a state of great excitement and without his hat. Placing himself at the head of the three regiments of dragoons, he ordered them to march full speed to the top of the moor, and the infantry to follow with their bayonets fixed. He seems to have been apprehensive that the Highlanders, in making for the high ground above his position, intended to repeat the manœuvre which they had practised so successfully against Cope at Preston, and this rash and inconsiderate step, to which his defeat is mainly to be attributed, was undertaken for the purpose of anticipating their movement.

The dragoons immediately began their march, and proceeding along the eastern wall of Bantaskine Park, ascended the hill at a rapid pace, followed by the foot. At this moment the sky, which had hitherto been serene, became suddenly overcast, and a violent storm of wind and rain from the south-west beat full in the faces of the troops, and retarded their progress. The Highlanders were meanwhile ascending the moor on the other side in two parallel columns, and for some time there was a kind of race between the dragoons and the clans, which of them should first attain the summit of the high ground. The fleet mountaineers, however, outstripped the English horse, and took possession of the eminence, so that the dragoons were compelled to take up somewhat lower ground.

The moor on which the hostile armies stood face to face, was exceedingly unsuitable for the operations of regular troops. It is now covered with Battle of Falkirk. thriving farms and plantations, and intersected by a railway and a canal, and commands a magnificent view of fertile and highly cultivated fields, and woods, and mansions, with the broad waters of the Forth in the distance.* But in 1746 it was a rugged and broken upland, interspersed with morasses and covered with shaggy heath. The Highlanders occupied the most elevated part of the moor, facing the east. The regulars stood a little lower, with their backs towards the town of Falkirk. There was a narrow ravine, which began about the centre of the position between the two armies, and gradually widened as it extended in a northerly direction down the declivity of the hill, till it reached the plain on the right of the royal army.

The insurgents were drawn up in two lines. The first consisted of the three Macdonald clans, Keppoch, Clanranald and Glengarry, with the Macgregors on the right; of the Mackenzies and Mackintoshes, with a battalion of the Farquharsons, who occupied the centre; and of the Stewarts of Appin, the Camerons, the Frasers, and the Macphersons, who formed the left. The second line, which included the Lowland levies, comprised the Atholl brigade, Lord Ogilvie's regiment, the Gordons, McLauchlans, and Lord John Drummond's regiment. Charles took his station behind the second line, on an eminence still known by the name of Charlie's Hill. The horse guards, under Lords Elcho and Balmerino, were on his right, behind the Atholl men. The troops of Lord Pittligo and the Earl of Kilmarnock, were stationed on the extreme left. The right wing was commanded by Lord George Murray, and the left by Lord John Drummond, who had marched after the main body of the army as soon as he perceived that the enemy had taken the alarm, and had quitted their camp. The royal infantry were also drawn up in two lines, with the three regiments of dragoons in front, and the Glasgow regiment and the Argyll militia forming a reserve in the rear. The right of the royal army was commanded by Major-general Huske, the centre by Hawley himself, and the left by Brigadier Cholmondeley. The cavalry were under the immediate charge of Lieutenant-colonel Ligonier, who, on the death of Colonel Gardiner, had succeeded to the command of his regiment. The two armies were nearly equal in numbers, amounting to about eight thousand each. There was no artillery on either side, for the Highlanders, in their rapid march, had left their guns behind; and the royal artillery, in crossing the moor, had stuck fast in a morass, and could not be extricated.

As soon as his arrangements were completed, Hawley sent orders to Colonel Defeat of the royal army. Ligonier to commence the battle by attacking with his cavalry the enemy's right. The Macgregors and Macdonalds, who were stationed on that wing, advanced slowly to meet their assailants, and reserving their fire till the dragoons were within pistol-shot, at a signal given by Lord George Murray they poured in a volley so close and well aimed that the cavalry were completely broken, and many of them were killed or wounded. The two regiments which behaved so disgracefully at Preston instantly wheeled about and galloped down the hill, disordering and trampling upon some of their own foot. Cobham's regiment, however, stood its ground for some time, but after a fierce, though short struggle, they too were compelled to give way, and, wheeling to the right, galloped off between the two armies, receiving in their flight a murderous volley from the centre of the Highland line. In spite of the efforts of Lord George Murray to keep the Macdonalds in their ranks, and prevent a disorderly pursuit, the victorious clansmen rushed down the hill, and, throwing away their muskets, fell sword in hand upon the flank of the infantry stationed upon the left of the royal line, which were at the same time assailed in front by the centre of the insurgents. Hawley, whose sole virtue was courage, kept his ground, conspicuous by his white uncovered head, and encouraged his men to stand firm. But, nearly blinded by the wind and rain, which beat full in their faces, with their firelocks so wetted that hardly one in five went off, and discouraged by the flight of the dragoons, they were speedily thrown into confusion and driven down the hill. About three-fourths of the royal army were thus completely routed in the course of twenty minutes.

* Bruce, the celebrated Abyssinian traveller, whose property lay in this neighbourhood, declared that the view from the battle-field in extent, variety, and beauty, was not surpassed by any he had seen in the course of his travels.

On the extreme right of the line, however, the ^{Good conduct of the right wing.} fortune of the day was very different. The ravine which lay between the two armies at this part of the field prevented the Camerons and Stewarts, who formed the left wing of the insurgents, from charging sword in hand, according to their favourite mode of fighting. The three royal regiments of foot, Price's, Ligonier's, and Burrell's, stationed at this point, stood firm, and by their steady and well-directed fire, compelled the enemy to fall back in some disorder from the opposite edge of the ravine. Supported by Cobham's dragoons, who had rallied in their rear, these three gallant regiments not only repulsed their immediate opponents, but checked the pursuit of the Macdonalds on their left, and obliged a number of them to retire in disorder up the hill. "At this moment," says Home, "the field of battle presented a spectacle seldom seen in war. Part of the king's army—much the greater part—was flying to the eastward, and part of the rebel army was flying to the westward. Not one regiment of the second line of the rebels remained in its place, for the Atholl brigade, being left almost alone on the right, marched up to the first line and joined Lord George Murray, where he stood with the Macdonalds of Keppoch. Between this body of men on the right of the first line, and the Camerons and Stewarts on the left (who had retreated a little from the fire of the troops across the ravine), there was a considerable space altogether void and empty, those men excepted who had returned from the chase and were straggling about in great disorder and confusion." Lord George Murray, however, succeeded in bringing six or seven hundred of these scattered clansmen into order; while Charles, seeing from the eminence on which he had taken his station, the check which his left wing had received, put himself at the head of the reserve, and led them to the brow of the hill. This movement arrested the progress of Cobham's dragoons, and of the three regiments acting with them, and they commenced their retreat, in good order however, with drums beating and colours flying. General Huske, who had acted throughout with judgment and courage, brought up the rear.

It was now about five o'clock of a winter evening, and the early darkness was increased by the violent storm, which still continued. The victorious right wing of the insurgents, therefore, did not venture to continue their pursuit farther than the foot of the hill. They were, indeed, ignorant of the extent of their victory, for the Highlanders were scattered in every direction over the moor, and the different clans were mingled together in the utmost confusion. It was not till several hours after the close of the battle that a considerable portion of the rebel army received information of the result. At length two of the officers entered Falkirk in disguise, and returned with the intelligence that Hawley, after issuing orders to set fire to his tents, had abandoned the town, and was retreating on Linlithgow. Lord George Murray immediately advanced and took possession of the town. Later in the evening the prince, amid torrents of rain, made his entry into Falkirk, and was conducted by torch-light to a lodging which had been prepared for him. The Highlanders were so eagerly occupied in securing the spoil of the English camp, that it was with difficulty a sufficient number could be got together to form a guard for the town and the prince's person during the night.

Hawley did not stop that night till he reached Linlithgow, whither some of his Hawley's flight recreant dragoons had preceded to Edinburgh. him in their flight. Next day he retreated to Edinburgh, but some of his dastardly followers, who had been quartered in the old palace of Linlithgow, before their departure deliberately set it on fire, by raking the live embers from the hearths into the straw on which they had lain, and thus reduced the venerable and interesting pile to a blackened ruin.* Hawley left behind him on the battle field between three and four hundred men killed and wounded, including sixteen officers, among whom were Colonel Sir Robert Munro of Foulis and his brother, three lieutenant-colonels, and nine captains. There were also about one hundred prisoners taken by the insurgents.† Seven pieces of cannon, several standards, a large quantity of military stores, with all the baggage of the royal army, fell into the hands of the victors. The loss on the side of the Highlanders was estimated at about forty men, with near double that number wounded; but this return must have been considerably underrated.

The news of the battle of Falkirk caused great dismay throughout the country, ^{Effect of the as the retreat of the Highlanders} ^{battle of} from Derby had produced a very ^{Falkirk.} general impression that the rebellion was virtually at an end, and the confident boastings of Hawley had led the supporters of the government to count upon the total overthrow of the rebel army as certain. Hence the unexpected defeat of the veteran troops, who had fought at Dettingen and Fontenoy, by a body of undisciplined mountaineers, whom they had been taught to despise, excited general consternation. Hawley himself was exceedingly mortified and depressed by his misfortune, and endeavoured to console himself for his disasters by insulting and brow-beating the civil authorities, and hanging several of his recreant soldiers upon the gibbets which he had erected for the punishment of the rebels. Old General Wightman, who had fought in the rebellion of 1715, says, in a letter to President Forbes, written a few days after the battle, "Hawley seems to be sensible of his misconduct, for when I was with him on Saturday morning, at Linlithgow, he looked most wretchedly, even more so than Cope did a few hours after his scuffle, when I saw him at Fala. This is an odd state of things, and altogether an unexpected occurrence, and will doubtless shock the king and the ministry, as well as the whole English nation, more than the Preston affair did."* But when the tidings of this disaster reached the court on the day of a drawing-room, though the countenances of most of the company betrayed doubt and apprehension, his majesty exhibited the most perfect composure. The Earl of Stair, too, was unmoved, while Sir John Cope was radiant with joy at the discomfiture of Hawley, who was in the habit of ridiculing severely the conduct of his predecessor.†

* Sir Walter Scott's Provincial Antiquities, vol. ii. p. 178.

† John Home, the author of "Douglas," was one of those taken prisoner. He and a considerable number of his companions were sent to Doune Castle, whence they succeeded in making their escape in a somewhat romantic manner.

The victory at Falkirk was productive of very little advantage to the insurgents. Dissensions among the insurgents. Violent dissensions broke out among their leaders, who blamed each other for the incompleteness of the victory, and the escape of the enemy. There was no unity of command among them, and therefore no steadiness of purpose and no discipline. A great number of the Highlanders, according to their invariable practice, immediately quitted the camp and returned to their mountain homes, for the purpose of securing their plunder. An unfortunate accident, too, which occurred the day after the battle, contributed still further to diminish their ranks. One of Keppoch's men was examining a loaded musket, which he had picked up upon the battle field, when the piece went off, and unluckily killed Colonel Æneas Macdonald, second son of Glengarry, who was passing at the time. The young officer, fully satisfied of the innocence of the man, entreated, with his dying breath, that he might not suffer, and Charles himself, to soothe the feelings of the clan, and to show his respect for the memory of their brave and estimable leader, attended his funeral as chief mourner. All was unavailing. "Nothing," says an eye-witness, "could restrain the grief and fury of the clansmen."‡ The unhappy owner of the musket was given up to their vengeance, and immediately led out and shot. This savage act of retribution did not after all pacify the enraged tribe, and great numbers of them quitted the army, and returned to their mountains.

On the 19th the prince returned to Bannockburn, and there, by means of a Siege of Stirling printing press, which he had resumed. brought from Glasgow, he issued an account of the battle of Falkirk, the last of his proclamations or gazettes. He then resumed the siege of Stirling Castle, which he had neither the means nor the skill to reduce. The operations of the siege were placed under the care of M. Mirabelle, a French engineer, who was very imperfectly acquainted with his profession. He constructed, with great labour and difficulty, a battery on the Gowlan Hill, to the north of the castle, and another on the Ladies' Rock, on the south-east, and opened a brisk fire from them on the morning of the 29th February. But these positions were so ill chosen that the garrison could see the French artillerymen down to their shoe buckles, and though they allowed the batteries to be erected without serious molestation, for the purpose, it is alleged, of detaining the besiegers before the fortress till the royal army should be in a condition again to take the field, as soon as the guns were unmasked, they poured down upon them a destructive fire, which speedily silenced the batteries that had been constructed with so much labour, and compelled the besiegers to retire with considerable loss.

While the insurgents were wasting their time in these ill-judged and fruitless operations, the government had sent down the young Duke of Cumberland to take the command of the army, and to retrieve the disasters brought upon it by the incapacity of Hawley. His royal highness quitted London on the 25th of January, 1746, and by travelling night and day, reached Holyrood Palace on the 30th. He took up his lodgings in the same apartments, and slept in the same bed, which had lately been occupied by Charles. His unexpected arrival revived the drooping spirits of the soldiers, with whom he was a favourite, and put a stop to the cruel punishments inflicted by his savage predecessor. The duke was a person of remarkable courage and respectable military talent, with great energy and steadiness of purpose. He was truthful, open, and upright in his dealings; but his manners were boisterous and brutal, his temper hasty, harsh, and often tyrannical, and his passions violent and ungovernable. He was held in detestation even by the people of England, who believed him capable of any atrocity. His deeds of blood in Scotland gained him, from his contemporaries, the name of "The Butcher," and have stamped his memory with indelible infamy.

The Duke of Cumberland sent to Scotland

On the day after his arrival the duke put himself at the head of the royal army, and set forward to give battle to the insurgents. The force under his command consisted of fourteen

Marches against the rebels—

* Culloden Papers, p. 267.

† Sir Walter Scott. An abstracted Scottish peer, at this drawing-room, addressed Sir John by the title of General Hawley, to the no small amusement of the company.—Quarterly Review, No. lxxi., p. 180.

‡ Kirkconnell's Journal, in Lockhart's Papers, vol. ii.

battalions of infantry, and twelve squadrons of horse, amounting in all to about fourteen thousand men, who were eager to be led against the enemy, in order that they might retrieve the reputation they had lost at Falkirk. Hawley, instead of the punishment which his negligence and incapacity deserved, was appointed to act as one of the duke's lieutenant-generals, the other was the Earl of Albemarle. On approaching Falkirk, the duke was informed that the Highlanders were in full retreat, and two loud reports, which were presently heard, like the blowing up of powder magazines, seemed to confirm the intelligence.

A retreat indeed had now become a matter of —they resolve necessity on the part of the insurgents. The prince, with his usual dogged adherence to his own plans, had persisted in carrying on the siege of Stirling Castle after the hopelessness of the undertaking had become apparent to every one else. He called no councils of war, but consulted only with Secretary Murray, Sir Thomas Sheridan, and O'Sullivan, the quartermaster-general, who flattered his prejudices and re-echoed his opinions. Lord George Murray, Lochiel, Keppoch, and the other chiefs, however, held a consultation of their own, and drew up a memorial pointing out the imminent danger of remaining longer in their present position, and urging the necessity of an immediate retreat into the Highlands, in order to save the army from destruction. It is stated by John Hay, who occasionally acted as secretary to the prince at this juncture, that this memorial overwhelmed Charles with astonishment and grief; that he had previously announced to Lord George Murray his intention to advance and attack the Duke of Cumberland as soon as he reached Falkirk; that Lord George had shown him only the day before a plan which he had drawn for the proposed battle, with which Charles had expressed himself much pleased, and that when he read this paper recommending a course so different, he exclaimed, "Good God! have I lived to see this!" and dashed his head with such violence against the wall that he staggered. He then sent Sir Thomas Sheridan to Falkirk to persuade the chiefs to alter their resolution, but without effect. He had, therefore, no alternative but to submit.*

The insurgents commenced their retreat on the 1st of February, having first spiked the rebels. their heavy cannon, and blown up their powder magazine at St. Ninian's, about a mile from Stirling. But so carelessly or unskillfully was this last operation performed, that the explosion destroyed the church, and killed several of the villagers as well as of the Highlanders. The whole movement, indeed, was mismanaged; no proper precautions were taken to cover the retreat; there was no rear-guard; Lord Elcho's troop of horse, which was stationed at the bridge of Carron, was forgotten and nearly left behind, and the whole army was thrown into confusion, and obliged to abandon a considerable portion of their baggage. The blame of this disorder is attributed to the prince, who was sullen and reckless, in consequence of having been thwarted in his designs, and either neglected to give the proper orders, or by countermanding orders previously given, threw the whole army into confusion, so that their retreat in some degree resembled a disorderly flight. Their ultimate destination was Inverness; but in the first instance they directed their march towards Crieff, which they reached next day, taking their English prisoners along with them. They had lost a considerable part of their baggage by the way; there was a great deal of wrangling and altercation among the officers; and their ranks were found to have been largely thinned by desertion. Meanwhile, the Duke of Cumberland, who had formed the resolution of pursuing the rebels, was detained for two days waiting the repair of a bridge at Stirling, and even after he had surmounted this obstacle, such was the state of the roads, that he could not advance more than ten or twelve miles a day. Having reached Perth, he fixed his head-quarters there, and sent out detachments in all directions to suppress the insurrectionary movements in the surrounding country.

At Crieff, the rebel army separated into two divisions, which, for the sake of more easily procuring supplies of provisions, took different roads to Inverness. This town, which had been slenderly fortified with a ditch and pallisade, was occupied by Lord Loudon with an army of two thousand men; and Charles, on reaching Moy castle, where he arrived on the 16th of February, thought it prudent to halt until the rest of his forces should come up. Here he narrowly escaped being surprised and taken prisoner by Lord Loudon, who, at the head of fifteen hundred men, made a sudden night march to Moy, for the purpose of seizing the prince's person while off his guard. The scheme, of which Charles had not more than an hour's notice, was disconcerted by five or six of the Rout of Moy. Mackintoshes, who, having been ordered by Lady Mackintosh to watch the road from Inverness, fired upon the advancing troops from a wood which flanked the highway, and by imitating the well known war-cries of Lochiel, Keppoch, and other clans, produced an impression that the whole Highland army was close at hand. The vanguard, seized with a sudden panic, fled with precipitation, and threw the rear into irretrievable confusion. In the hurry of their flight many were thrown down and trodden upon by their comrades, and so great was their consternation, that they continued their flight till they reached Inverness. This disorderly retreat has ever since been known by the name of the Rout of Moy.

Next morning, the 17th of February, Charles mustered his men, and set out on the 18th for Inverness, to repay Lord Loudon his unfriendly visit. His lordship, however, deemed it prudent to evacuate the town, and embarking with his army, in boats, accompanied by the Lord President, he crossed the Moray Firth, by the Kessoch Ferry. But the Earl of Cromarty, at the head of some regiments of Highlanders, marched round the head of the ferry and drove him into Sutherland, where, being still threatened by Cromarty, he disbanded his army.

* Appendix to Home's Works, vol. iii. p. 335.

The Highland army entered Inverness without the insurgents' opposition, and Charles immediately set about the reduction of the citadel, which, although it contained a considerable garrison well supplied with provisions and ammunition, surrendered in a few days. Sixteen pieces of cannon and a hundred barrels of beef thus fell into the hands of the insurgents. Charles ordered the works to be destroyed, to the great gratification of his followers, who had naturally a strong dislike to these strongholds. Fort Augustus, which was next attacked by a detachment of the insurgent force, shared the same fate; but they failed in their attempt to reduce Fort William, as they could not cut off the communication with the garrison by sea.

Early in February a detachment from the Duke of Cumberland's army, under Colonel Sir Andrew Agnew, was sent to garrison Blair Castle, in the Atholl country, while another division, under Colonel Leighton, occupied Castle Menzies, in Strath Tay. These garrisons were intended to cut off the supplies of the insurgents, and to put a stop to the recruiting which Lord George Murray and his elder brother, the Marquis of Tullibardine, were carrying on in this district among their clan, by means of the fiery cross, and other similar influences. Lord George resolved, in conjunction with Cluny Macpherson, to expel these intruders from his native district, and lost no time in attempting to carry his intentions into effect. About the middle of March, having collected a force of seven hundred men, he pushed rapidly through the passes which lead from Badenoch into Atholl, and at midnight of the 16th reached a place called Dalspiddel, where he made his final dispositions, and having divided his men into a number of small parties, explained to them that his object was to surprise and cut off all the military posts in Atholl held by the royal troops. So skilfully had his plans been laid, and so well were they executed, that the whole of these posts were carried in the course of the night, and upwards of three hundred prisoners taken, without the loss of a single man. They were not equally successful, however, in their attempt to reduce the castle of Blair, which was resolutely defended by Sir Andrew Agnew, a sturdy veteran of the old military school. After a close blockade, which lasted till the end of March, and the garrison were reduced to the last extremity, the Highlanders precipitately abandoned the siege on the approach of a body of Hessians from Perth, under the Earl of Crawford.

Meanwhile, the rebel army at Inverness were suffering severely from the failure both of money and of provisions. The surrounding country could not afford them the means of subsistence; no supplies could now reach them from the Lowlands, and those sent from France were mostly intercepted by British cruisers, or were driven back into French ports. One of these vessels, bringing a small reinforcement and about £10,000 in gold, ran ashore on the coast of Sutherland, where the Mackays took possession of the treasure and made prisoners of the crew. Charles, who had now not more than five hundred louis-d'ors in his exchequer, was reduced to the expedient of paying his troops in meal, of which the supply was so scanty that they were often pinched with hunger. These privations, which the officers shared equally with the men, produced much discontent, and led to frequent breaches of discipline, which it was found impossible either to prevent or punish.

On the other hand, the army of the Duke of Cumberland, who had by this time fixed his headquarters at Aberdeen, was abundantly supplied with provisions, and had, besides, received a reinforcement of five thousand auxiliaries, who had landed at Leith, under the command of Prince Frederick of Hesse Cassel, the duke's brother-in-law. Collecting his forces, which now amounted to about eight thousand foot and nine hundred horse, the duke set out from Aberdeen on the 8th of April, and marched for Inverness. His route lay along the coast, and at a short distance from the shore a fleet of victualling ships kept pace with the march of the army, and supplied them with provisions. The duke reached Banff on the 10th, where he caused two spies to be hanged. One of them was caught while in the act of notching upon a stick the number of the royal forces. Next day the army approached the Spey, a deep and rapid river, where the insurgents, at first, resolved to resist the further progress of the enemy, and had accordingly made an attempt to fortify the left bank of the river. But finding it impossible to keep the fords against the heavy artillery and overwhelming numbers of the enemy, especially as the river was at this time low, owing to a recent drought, Lord John Drummond, who commanded the insurgent troops stationed at this point, retired on the approach of the royal forces, and allowed them to cross unmolested. On the 14th the royalists reached Nairn, which was only sixteen miles distant from the position occupied by the main body of the insurgents. As they entered the town they came up with the party of the rebels, who had retired before them as they forded the Spey. Some shots were interchanged, and a serious encounter would probably have taken place, had not Charles unexpectedly come up with a reinforcement, on seeing which, the English thought it prudent to retire. Charles and his principal officers took possession of Culloden House, where they lodged for the night; while their hardy followers, although the weather was extremely cold, lay upon the open moor, the heath, as one of them remarked, serving both for bed and fuel. Next morning, in expectation of an immediate attack, they were drawn out in battle array, but as the duke did not make his appearance, a small party under the conduct of Lord Elcho, was sent forward to reconnoitre. They soon returned with the report that the royal army had halted at Nairn, where they were celebrating the birthday of their leader with much festivity and rejoicing. By this time the insurgents were reduced to the last extremity for want of provisions, a small piece of extremely coarse bread served out to each man, constituting their whole rations for the day. In this dismal plight many of them quitted their ranks and returned to Inverness, or wandered about in search of food, while they had the mortification of seeing the victualling ships of the enemy entering the creek with an abundant supply. To add to these distressing circumstances—so unfavourable for a general engagement, which now appeared imminent—their numbers were greatly diminished. Several of their best regiments, in spite of their utmost exertions, had not yet been able to join them, among which were those under Cluny, Lord Cromarty, and the Master of Lovat, so that not more than about five thousand men remained.

Straitened condition of the insurgents.

The duke marches towards Inverness.

The royalists cross the Spey, and halt at Nairn.

Charles now summoned a council of war, at which it was resolved, on the proposal of Lord George Murray, to make a night attack upon the enemy's camp at Nairn, distant about twelve miles. Charles ordered the heath to be set on fire in order that the light might deceive the enemy into the belief that the insurgents still remained in the same position. Injunctions were issued immediately to recall the stragglers from Inverness and other places, whither they had gone in search of food; but these orders, after much waste of time, were but partially and reluctantly obeyed, many of the men declaring to the officers who were sent after them, that they would rather be shot for disobedience than brought back to die of hunger. Before the muster was completed it was eight o'clock in the evening, and two o'clock in the morning was the time appointed for the attack. The troops were divided into two columns, which were to proceed at some distance from each other. Of these, one placed under the command of Lord George Murray moved forward first, and the other followed commanded by Charles in person. Avoiding the public highways lest their movements should be prematurely discovered, they proceeded across the country through rough, and often marshy ground, by which their progress was greatly impeded, and many of their men, already exhausted with privation, sunk down or fell behind, so that the first column had only reached Kilravock House, four miles from the English camp, when the hour which had been appointed for the attack arrived. Lord George now called a halt, and represented to his officers that it would be impossible to reach their destination before dawn, and that he considered it worse than useless to proceed farther, as their purpose was already frustrated. Some discussion ensued, during which a messenger arrived from Charles, intimating that he was still ready to attempt the attack, but leaving it to Lord George to judge whether it could now be done in time or not. Lord George, on this, instantly gave the order to retreat, and, after a toilsome retrograde march, the dispirited and exhausted troops once more mustered on Culloden Moor.

The morning of the 16th of April found the Highland army in a condition but ill suited for a general engagement. Worn out by their fatiguing march and countermarch over a rugged and pathless moorland, the greater part had lain down on the open heath to snatch, if possible, a little repose; while others wandered in all directions in quest of provisions, of which, for many days, they had been able to obtain scarcely enough to support life, and that of the coarsest and most unpalatable description. Nor were Charles and his officers much better provided than the troops. On this dismal morning the aspirant to the throne of Britain could find no better refreshment than a morsel of bread and a little whisky. The royal army, on the other hand, had all along been amply provisioned, and, at this very time, a number of vessels, freighted with supplies for their use, lay in the bay within sight of the insurgents.

In these discouraging circumstances, Lord George Murray, and some other experienced officers, wisely advised to avoid an action for the present, or at least to remove from the open moor, which was peculiarly fitted for the movements of regular troops, and take up a position beyond the river Nairn, where the ground was diversified with bogs and elevations, and consequently inaccessible either to the cannon or cavalry of the enemy. Here, it was conceived, that the Highlanders could fight to the best advantage, while their enemies would have difficulties, almost insurmountable, to encounter at every step. This opinion has been fully confirmed by that of military men of the highest eminence, who have subsequently visited the spot, including the celebrated Marshal MacDonald, Duke of Tarentum.

Charles, however, with an overweening confidence in the prowess of his troops, would not listen to the prudent counsel of his best officers. "His royal highness," says Lord George Murray, "had so much confidence in the bravery of his army, that he was rather too hazardous, and was for fighting the enemy on all occasions."* It appears, also, that, as usual, Charles was confirmed in his rashness and obstinacy by the approbation of his favourite counsellors. According to an officer who was present "when proposals were made to retire over the river Nairn, which might have been done with great facility, Sir Thomas Sheridan and others from France, having lost all patience, and hoping no doubt for a miracle, in which light most of them had considered both the victory at Preston and that at Falkirk, insisted upon a battle, and prevailed, without reflecting that many were then absent, and those on the spot, spent and discouraged by a forced march during a long, dark night, whereas upon the other two occasions the men were in full vigour and spirits."*

* Jacobite Memoirs, p. 122.

Some of the foraging parties at length returned with a considerable supply of provisions, but, before these could be cooked, the enemy were descried in the distance, steadily advancing over the plain. Not a moment was lost in marshalling the insurgent army. Charles immediately gave orders for recalling the stragglers, and cannon were fired as a signal for their instant return. The whole force, when assembled, amounted to not more than five thousand men, who, worn out by fatigue and weakened by hunger, now prepared to encounter an army nearly double their number, in the best physical condition, and greatly superior both in horse and artillery. A last attempt was now made to persuade Charles either to defer the action, or to remove to a more advantageous position. But he was deaf alike to argument and entreaty, and insisted on committing all to the hazard of an immediate engagement.

The insurgents were drawn up in two lines: on the right were the Atholl men, the Camerons, the Stewarts of Appin, the Frasers, Mackintoshes, and some other clans under Lord George Murray; the three Macdonald regiments formed the left, commanded by Lord John Drummond. The right was slightly protected by some park walls, and the left by a morass. In the centre, and at each extremity of the front line, were placed four pieces of cannon. The second line, consisting of the Gordons, the Lowland regiments, and the French auxiliaries, was commanded by General Stapleton, while Charles, surrounded by a small body of guards, posted himself on a rising ground in the rear.

The English army was arranged in three lines, with a body of cavalry on each wing, and two pieces of artillery between every two regiments in the front line. Notwithstanding their great superiority over the insurgents, the duke manifested extraordinary anxiety as to the result of the pending engagement. The battles of Preston and Falkirk were still fresh in his recollection. The dreadful havoc made by the Highland broadsword on these memorable occasions, had proved incontestably its superiority over the bayonet; and it became, therefore, a question of no ordinary difficulty and importance, in what way this advantage on the part of the insurgents was to be neutralized. The plan recommended by the duke was simple and ingenious. He had observed that the Highland soldier received the bayonet on his target, and then, dextrously turning it aside, employed his broadsword in cutting down his opponent, who was thus rendered defenceless. To obviate this the duke ordered that each soldier should direct his thrust not against the man directly opposite to him, but against the opponent of his own right-hand comrade. By this unexpected manœuvre, the target would be rendered useless, and its bearer would be wounded in his right side before he had time to adapt his movements to this new mode of fighting.

Before engaging, the duke addressed his soldiers in a short speech, exhorting them to consider that the liberties of their country, as well as the rights of their sovereign, depended on the issue of the contest. He counselled them to dismiss from their thoughts all recollections of past disasters, and represented to them, that situated as they were in a hostile country, abounding in marshy and difficult ground, to yield would be to court destruction, and that their only chance of safety lay in victory. He concluded by saying that if any, from whatever cause, felt disinclined to fight, "He begged them, in the name of God, to return, as he would rather face the Highlanders with one thousand determined men at his back, than have ten thousand with a tithe who were lukewarm." It was now nearly one o'clock, the usual dinner hour of the army, and it was suggested to the duke that the men should partake of that meal before engaging. "No," was his reply, "they will fight more actively with empty bellies, and besides, it would be a bad omen. You remember what a dessert they got to their dinner at Falkirk."*

All was now ready for action, when a circumstance occurred which not a little disconcerted the Highland army, and probably contributed to bring about the disaster now impending over them. The day which had hitherto been fine, was suddenly overcast, and a dense shower of sleet began to fall, and was driven full in their faces by a strong gale which sprung up from the north-east. Charles, who could not fail to perceive this disadvantage, endeavoured to avoid it by shifting his position, but the duke observed and counteracted every movement, and the two armies, after spending some time in fruitless manœuvres, at length resumed their original position.

The action was commenced by a cannonade on the part of the insurgents, which was so unskillfully managed, that the shot went over the heads of the enemy, and inflicted little or no damage. The English were consequently in no haste to return the attack; but, at length, opening their batteries, under the direction of Colonel Belford, they poured in such a steady and well-directed fire, that spacious gaps soon began to appear in the Scottish lines.

* Appendix to Home's Hist., p. 332.

* Chambers's Hist., vol. ii. p. 103.

Charles, who before taking his position in the rear of his army, was riding along the ranks encouraging his men, narrowly escaped falling a victim to his temerity. A well-aimed shot ploughed up the ground at his feet, covered him with dust, and killed an attendant, who held a led horse by his side. He exhibited no symptom of alarm, however, but continued and finished his inspection, and then stationed himself on the little eminence before mentioned.

The cannonade was kept up for nearly half an hour, during which both armies steadily maintained their respective positions; but such was the havoc committed among the Highland ranks, that the men became impatient to mingle with their enemies in that closer and more active combat, in which they had always hitherto had the advantage. Perceiving this, Lord George Murray sent Colonel Ker of Gradon to solicit permission from Charles to commence the onslaught. This request being granted, after a little delay, the right wing and centre rushed forward, sword in hand, with a loud shout, in the face of a perfect storm of musketry and grape-shot, and, coming up with the first line, broke furiously through Munro's and Burrel's regiments, and captured two pieces of cannon. But the duke, anticipating this result, had drawn up his second line in three ranks; the first, kneeling, the second, bending forward, the third standing erect. Reserving their fire until the fugitives from Burrel's and Munro's regiments had escaped to the rear, and the Highlanders were only a few yards distant, this second line poured in a fire so steady and destructive as to throw the assailants into irretrievable disorder; whilst Wolfe's regiment, drawn up perpendicular to the front, opened, at the same time, a flanking fire. Blinded by the smoke, the Highlanders could see neither friend nor foe. A few of the bravest who survived rushed on, and perished in a desperate conflict with the English bayonets. Most of the chiefs who commanded in this part of the battle, and almost every man in the front rank, were killed. The survivors were driven in confusion from the field, leaving it covered with heaps of slain. While the right wing of the Highlanders was making this gallant, though fatal charge, the Macdonalds, who had always fought on the right wing since the battle of Bannockburn, and now resented as an indignity the post assigned them on the left, stood sullen and motionless, and seemed uncertain whether to attack or not. The Duke of Perth, who commanded the Glengarry regiment, called out "Claymore," and told the discontented clansmen, that if they behaved with their usual valour they would convert the left into the right, and that he would in future call himself Macdonald. The appeal was listened to in sullen silence. The gallant Keppoch, hoping to stimulate them by his example, charged with a few of his kinsmen, while his clan (an event unheard of in Highland warfare) remained stationary. They beheld unmoved the fall of their chief, pierced by several musket balls, and heard his agonising exclamation, "My God! have the children of my tribe forsaken me!" without making a movement to avenge his fate. They contented themselves with discharging their muskets in answer to the fire of the regiments opposite to them, and observing the total rout of their right and centre, they turned their backs and retreated in good order, without striking a blow. The second line of the prince's army was still unbroken, and, reinforced by a part of the first line, showed some intention of standing its ground; but the day was irretrievably lost. In front stood the victorious royalists preparing for a new attack, while three regiments of Argyleshire Highlanders, supported by a body of cavalry, having broken down the park walls on the right, menaced the flank and rear of the insurgents. The case was evidently desperate, and in a few minutes the whole of the beaten army was seen in full retreat.

Charles, from the small eminence on which he stood, beheld with astonishment and dismay the ruin of his army and the frustration of all his ambitious hopes. Lord Elcho alleges that at this juncture he rode up to the prince, and urged him to put himself at the head of the left wing, which was still entire, and to make a last effort to retrieve the fortune of the day, and that, on receiving a doubtful or hesitating answer, he turned from him with a bitter execration, swearing he would never see his face again. Several other officers of the insurgent army, however, have declared that the prince was endeavouring to rally his broken forces, and to lead them back to the charge, when Sir Thomas Sheridan and O'Sullivan seized his horse by the bridle, and forced him from the field.

After the battle the victorious army behaved with the most shocking inhumanity. The soldiers, under the direction of their officers, wandered over the field, and, in savage merriment

Shocking inhumanity of the victors.

extinguished in various ways—some of them of the most merciless and revolting description—the last remains of life that still lingered in many of the mangled bodies with which it was strewed. On quitting the battle-field the fugitives separated into two divisions. Of these the larger crossed the water of Nairn, and proceeded with some degree of order towards Badenoch. The other, consisting of Lord John Drummond's regiment and the French auxiliaries, together with the Frasers, took the road to Inverness, pursued by the English cavalry, who, with a cruelty equal to their cowardice at Preston and Falkirk, showed no mercy to those that fell into their hands. The duke now marched forward and took possession of the town, but, though he gave quarter to the French and Irish regiments that had there taken shelter, the Scottish insurgents, were diligently hunted out and massacred in cold blood. Next day, a report having reached the duke that some of the wounded rebels were still alive on the field of battle, he dispatched thither a party of soldiers, not to have them removed and tended, as common humanity would have dictated, but to terminate their sufferings by military execution. Not fewer than seventy were gleaned from the fatal field, and having been propped up and ranged in a row, were despatched by platoon firing. A few, who even after this fusilade still exhibited signs of life, had their brains dashed out by the soldiers with the but-ends of their muskets. These cold-blooded cruelties were intermingled with scenes which give us even a more degrading idea of the character of the duke and his officers. For the amusement of his soldiers at Fort Augustus, his royal highness instituted horse and foot races, and induced the women of the camp to take part in those races naked, and mounted on the bare-backed ponies of the country. General Hawley, who, as might have been expected, was foremost in every cruelty, also took a prominent part in these disgusting amusements.* On the following day a strict search was made for the wounded rebels who had, in the interval, managed to crawl to the shelter of any of the thickets or huts in the neighbourhood of the field. All that could be found were murdered without mercy; and a number of the unhappy fugitives having concealed themselves in a miserable cabin, their place of refuge was surrounded with a guard to prevent any from making their escape, and set on fire. Not fewer than thirty-two blackened corpses were afterwards found among the ruins. There can be no doubt that these and other similar atrocities perpetrated on this occasion were expressly ordered by the Duke of Cumberland, who seems to have been willingly obeyed by his ruthless followers. To palliate these shocking cruelties, it was pretended by the victors, that an order in the handwriting of Lord George Murray had been found, enjoining the Highlanders to give no quarter in the event of their being victorious. No such order, however, has ever been produced, and as such inhumanity would have been at utter variance with the conduct of the rebel army at other battles in which the royal troops had been defeated, it is fair to infer that it never had an existence.

The numbers, on both sides, slain on the field of Culloden, have never been ascertained with any approach to precision. According to the reckoning of the victors, their loss in killed and wounded amounted to no more than 310 men, while that of the rebels was 1000, being about a fifth part of their entire army. All the cannon and baggage of the rebels, together with 2300 muskets, 190 broadswords, thirty-seven barrels of powder, and fourteen stand of colours, fell into the hands of the royalists.

Though as a general rule no quarter was given to the unhappy fugitives, yet a considerable number, including several men of rank, were made prisoners. These, according to the accounts afterwards given by eye-witnesses, and some of the prisoners themselves,* were treated with a degree of cruelty at which humanity shudders. Some were consigned to the tolbooth of Inverness, while others, who could not be accommodated there, were confined in the church. No care or attention was given, or even permitted to be given, to the wounded. Many were stripped of their clothing, and allowed to remain for a considerable time in a state of almost complete nudity; while the only food they received was a small supply of oatmeal, not more than half of what was necessary to support life. After being detained for some time in this wretched condition, they were put on board transports to be conveyed to London; but their sufferings during that voyage may fitly be compared with those of the slaves on the middle passage. They were thrust in their semi-naked condition into the holds of the vessels, where their only bed was the cold and damp stones and shingle, which had been thrown in for ballast, and their only food about half a pound of oatmeal and a bottle of water to each man daily. The sailors used to amuse themselves by hoisting the prisoners up to the yard-arm and dropping them into the sea, and by fixing them to the mast and flogging them. Under such circumstances, it is not surprising that many of them fell sick and died. In one vessel, which was kept at sea for the extraordinary period of eight months, out of one hundred and fifty-seven originally consigned to its wretched hold, only forty-nine were alive at the end of the voyage.†

The day before the battle of Culloden, Lord Cromarty, who as we have seen had pursued Lord Loudon into Sutherland, was surprised and taken prisoner with his son and other officers, and a hundred and fifty of his men, at Dunrobin Castle, by a party of the county militia. They were put on board the "Hound," a British sloop-of-war, and conveyed to Inverness, where they were landed two days after the battle which had destroyed their cause.

On the 23rd of May the Duke of Cumberland left Inverness, which had been the focus of the rebellion, and fixed his head-quarters at Fort Augustus, the centre of the disaffected districts. From this place he sent out detachments of his troops in all directions, which devastated the country with fire and sword, and committed atrocities unparalleled in the history of Scotland. The cattle were everywhere seized and driven away;‡ the means of subsistence completely destroyed; the mansions of the chiefs and the huts of their retainers were equally given to the flames; such of the men as could be found were shot without trial or investigation of any description; and the women and children, driven from their

* Printed in the Jacobite Memoirs.

† Ibid.; Chambers's History of the Rebellion.

‡ Some idea of the immense number of cattle carried off by the soldiers may be formed from the fact that there were sometimes two thousand in one drove. See Scots' Mag., vol. viii. p. 257.

* Letter from Fort Augustus, June 27, 1746.

Inhuman treatment of the prisoners and wounded.

homes, and exposed to the grossest indignities from the brutal soldiery, wandered about without food or shelter, until many of them perished miserably of hunger and cold,* while others were driven by starvation to follow their ruthless plunderers and humbly implore them, but in vain, for the blood and offal of their own cattle. According to the testimony of a volunteer who served in the expedition, neither house, cottage, man, nor beast, was to be seen within the compass of fifty miles: all was ruin, silence, and desolation.

That noble-minded patriot, President Forbes, whose disinterested and ill-requited exertions had contributed so much to the suppression of the rebellion, was deeply grieved by the cruelties perpetrated on his simple and misguided countrymen, most of whom had been led to take part in the rebellion solely from a sense of duty to their chiefs. It is alleged that on mentioning to the duke that the laws of the country should be observed even by an enemy, he was repulsed with the reply, accompanied by an oath, "The laws of the country! —I'll make a brigade give laws." His royal highness had indeed declared in a letter to the Duke of Newcastle, before Culloden, "All in this country are almost to a man Jacobites, and mild measures will not do. You will find that the whole of the laws of this ancient kingdom must be new modelled." And, again, writing from Fort Augustus, "I am sorry to leave this country in the condition it is in; for all the good we have done is a little blood-letting, which has only weakened the madness, but not at all cured it."†

This state of matters continued until the month of July, when the duke took his departure for Edinburgh, where he was welcomed and honoured as a public benefactor. Thence he proceeded to London, where he received the thanks of parliament and a pension of £25,000 a year to himself and his heirs.

Notwithstanding the most diligent search and the greatest vigilance, not a few of the insurgent chiefs, after undergoing almost incredible hardships and privations, and being exposed for weeks to the most imminent dangers, succeeded in effecting their escape to the continent. Lord George Murray found means to retire to Holland, where, under the assumed name of De Valignie, he continued for the most part to reside, until his death in 1760. The Duke of Perth, Lord John Drummond, Lords Elcho and Nairn, Sir Thomas Sheridan, and Mr. O'Sullivan, and others, embarked on board a French vessel at Lochnanaugh; but the duke, who had long been in bad health, died on the voyage: the others reached the Continent in safety. Another party of twelve or thirteen persons, including Lord Ogilvie, and the venerable Lord Pittsligo, after remaining for some time in hiding in Buchan, procured a ship which conveyed them to Bergen in Norway. Several, however, of the chiefs of the insurrection, together with a great number of their followers, fell into the hands of their pursuers. Among these were the Marquis of Tullibardine, the Earl of Kilmarnock, Lords Balmerino, Strathallan, Lovat, and Secretary Murray. Tullibardine died in the Tower, of a disease under which he had been labouring during the whole progress of the rebellion; and Strathallan of a wound which he had received at Culloden.

We turn now to follow the fortunes of the unhappy leader of this disastrous Adventures of enterprise. After leaving the field Charles, of battle, Charles, accompanied by Sheridan, O'Sullivan, Captain O'Neil, and a few other persons, fled along the south-east bank of Loch Ness to Gortuleg, near the Fall of Foyers, where Lord Lovat was then residing. It was the first and last time the hoary intriguer saw the prince, whose sacred countenance he professed to have yearned to behold. In the bitterness of his disappointment he is said to have heaped angry reproaches on the poor adventurer, whose appearance too surely proclaimed the downfall of his own fortunes. On recovering his self-possession, he entered into conversation with Charles respecting his future proceedings, and recommended that a body of three thousand men should be collected to defend the Highlands until the government should be induced to grant them reasonable terms. But this judicious advice passed unheeded. Leaving Gortuleg at ten o'clock the same evening, the prince and his attendants set out for Invergarry, the seat of Glengarry, which they reached about four o'clock next morning, so utterly worn out with fatigue that they slept upon the floor in their clothes. They had nothing to eat until one of the servants caught two salmon in the river Garry, on which they dined.

From Invergarry the fugitive prince penetrated into the West Highlands, and on the 20th reached a small village called Glenboisdale, very near the place where he first landed. Here he was joined by Clanranald, Lockhart, younger, of Carnwath, Æneas Macdonald, the banker, and several other adherents.

About twelve hundred of the fugitives from Culloden had meanwhile assembled at Ruthven, in obedience to the prince's order; and Lord George Murray, who remained with them, was of opinion that they should still continue the contest. But, disheartened as they were, by their recent defeat, destitute of supplies of every kind, many of their best leaders killed or wounded, it was impossible that they could long keep together, or offer an effectual resistance to the far superior forces of the enemy. On receiving, therefore, a message from Charles, two or three days after the battle, thanking them for their fidelity and gallant conduct, and recommending them to look after their own safety, as he was compelled by circumstances to retire in the meantime to France, they "took a melancholy leave of each other," and dispersed.

Charles remained a few days at Glenboisdale, till

* Jacobite Memoirs, p. 236, et seq.

† Cox's Pelham, and Letters. April 4, and July 17, 1746.

a report that Lord Loudon was about to come over to Arisaig, induced him to quit the mainland, with the view of seeking shelter in that group of isles called the Long Island, on the coast of which he hoped to find a French vessel to convey him to the Continent. On the evening of the 26th of April he embarked in an eight-oared boat in the Bay of Lochnanuagh, accompanied by O'Sullivan, O'Neil, Allan Macdonald, a Roman Catholic priest, and Edward Burke, servant to Alexander Macleod. After encountering a violent storm, which exposed them to great danger and suffering, they next day effected a landing on the wild island of Benbecula. Charles passed two days on this remote spot, and then set sail for Lewis, where he attempted, but without success, to hire a vessel to carry him to France, and with difficulty he escaped from the island. After enduring great hardships from exposure to the weather, and want of provisions, and narrowly escaping capture by a man-of-war, the unfortunate adventurer returned to the solitudes of Benbecula, where he passed several days in a miserable hovel, the door of which was so low that he could enter only by creeping in on his hands and knees. He then removed to South Uist, where he was visited by Clanranald, who brought him a supply of provisions, some wine and brandy, and a few articles of clothing.

Charles spent some weeks in this retreat, but at length, a report of his place of concealment having reached the government officials, a body of militia and regular troops, amounting in all to about two thousand men, were landed on the island, and while these were dispersed in search of him in all directions, the shores were encircled with vessels of war

Flora to prevent his escape. In these Macdonald. circumstances his speedy capture seemed almost inevitable, when he was saved by the generous heroism of Miss Flora Macdonald, whose memory will ever be held in esteem for the noble and disinterested part she acted on this occasion. This amiable and courageous young lady was the step-daughter of Hugh Macdonald, of Armadale, one of the captains of the government militia then eagerly searching for the hapless adventurer. Having obtained from her step-father, who probably had no suspicion of her purpose, a passport to the Isle of Skye for herself, a man-servant, and a female attendant, she, with the assistance of Lady Clanranald, got Charles arrayed in female attire, in which disguise he was to personate her maid-servant under the name of Betty Burke. Accompanied by a trusty man-servant named Neil McEachen, the prince and Flora on the 25th of June embarked in an open boat, which soon carried them beyond the reach of their enemies. Next day brought them within sight of Skye; but, as they approached the shore at Watnish, they were compelled hastily to retire by a volley of musketry from a party of military stationed there. They were not, however, pursued, and in a few hours they were enabled to land unopposed near the northern extremity of the island, in the vicinity of Mugstat, the seat of Sir Alexander Macdonald. This powerful chief had at first hesitated which side to take in the contest, but had at last espoused the cause of the government, and was at this very time in attendance on the Duke of Cumberland at Fort Augustus. Fortunately his lady, a daughter of the Earl of Eglington, was on terms of friendship with Flora Macdonald, and was secretly attached to the cause of Charles. To her Flora communicated her secret, and although she was at that moment entertaining a large party of the hostile militia in her house, she did not shrink from entering into the scheme for the escape of the fugitive prince, and committed him to the care of Macdonald of Kingsburgh, the kinsman and factor of her husband. It was necessary, however, for his safety that he should tarry no longer where he was, and it was accordingly arranged that he should be conveyed to Raasay, a little island on the east of Skye; but, as it would have been dangerous to sail along the coast, it was thought better that he should proceed by land to Portree, where a boat might be procured to convey him across Raasay Sound. The distance to Portree is about fourteen miles, which Charles accomplished on foot in his female disguise, attended by Flora and Kingsburgh. His awkwardness in the management of his female apparel, as well as his singular appearance, attracted notice and excited suspicion on more than one occasion. "Your enemies," said Kingsburgh, "call you a pretender, but if you be, I can tell you, you are the worst of your trade I ever saw!" Before entering Portree, Charles retired into a wood, where he changed his clothes, putting on a suit of male attire of the Highland fashion, consisting of a coat and waistcoat, a philabeg, short hose, a plaid, and a bonnet, and personated a man-servant, under the assumed name of Lewis Caw. At Portree, he took an affectionate farewell of his generous preserver, remarking, "For all that has happened, I hope, madam, we shall meet in St. James's yet."*

Charles bids farewell to Flora Macdonald—

On the arrival of Charles and his attendants at Raasay, he found the utmost difficulty in procuring any accommodation, almost all the houses on the island having been burned by the soldiery. They spent the night in a rude and miserable hut, which scarcely afforded them shelter from the weather. Here Charles for once complained of the grievous hardships to which he had been so long subjected. He expressed surprise at his having —he lands on the island of Raasay—

* Shortly after parting with the prince, both Kingsburgh and Flora Macdonald were arrested. The former was conveyed to London, the latter to Edinburgh; and it was not until after a year's confinement that Flora was set at liberty. A subscription for her behoof was set on foot among the Jacobite ladies of London, and nearly £1500 were thus collected. On regaining her liberty Flora returned to Skye, where she married Kingsburgh's son, with whom, some time afterwards, she emigrated to North Carolina. On the breaking out of the contest between the colonists and the mother country, they returned to their native country, and fixed their residence once more in Skye, where Flora died in 1790, at the age of seventy years.

been able to bear so much fatigue and privation, and remarked, "Since the battle of Culloden, I have endured more than would kill hundred; sure, Providence does not design this for nothing: I am thus certainly yet reserved for some good."

After a variety of adventures, much suffering, —proceeds to and many narrow escapes, Charles the main- once more made his way to the land— mainland. Early in the morning of the 5th July, he landed at a place called Little Malleck, on the south side of Loch Nevis, in Moidart, about thirty miles from the spot where he first reared his standard. The whole district was now in the hands of the king's soldiers, and was watched with such untiring vigilance that for three days and three nights the hapless party durst not stir, but lay concealed among the heather, under the open sky. From this wretched retreat, they at last contrived to effect their escape by creeping during the darkness of night down a rugged ravine, the bed of a mountain torrent, which divided the posts of two sentinels. For several weeks their migrations could be effected with safety only during the night, while by day they were compelled to crouch, like beasts of prey, in any place of concealment which they might chance to discover. Their food during these miserable wanderings was necessarily precarious, and generally scanty, uncooked, and of the coarsest description.

About the end of July, the prince and a small —takes refuge remnant of his friends reached the among a band neighbourhood of Glenmorrison, of outlaws. where they found refuge among a band of outlaws, consisting, as they discovered, of seven men who had served in the rebel army, and now subsisted by plunder. With these men Charles and his companions enjoyed a welcome, though anxious, repose of nearly three weeks, during which the generous freebooters carefully watched over the prince's safety and supplied his wants. Their fidelity was unshaken either by the reward of £30,000 offered for the prince's apprehension, or by the danger which they incurred by affording him shelter. Their only place of refuge was a cave in a lonely mountain side; and here the greater part of them kept guard day and night, while small detachments were sent out in disguise in search of provisions. They sometimes ventured to Fort Augustus, and on one occasion procured and brought to Charles with great joy a pennyworth of ginger-bread, which they esteemed the greatest dainty they had ever been privileged to taste.

Charles, at last, became extremely anxious to leave this retreat, and, if possible, to form a junction with his tried friends Cluny and Lochiel, who, he had learned, were then living in a somewhat more agreeable place of concealment; but his kind entertainers, who better knew his danger, would not permit him to depart until they had made sure of his being able to do so with safety. In a few days, intelligence was brought by spies from Fort Augustus that the troops had returned to their camp, and Charles was then permitted to set out accompanied by a party of his kind and faithful entertainers. At last, after many Charles joins Lochiel and Cluny— singular perils and hair-breadth escapes, he succeeded in joining Lochiel and Cluny. These faithful adherents, or the arrival of the prince, were not satisfied with the precautions which they had employed for their own safety, but deemed it prudent to change their quarters, and to station watchmen on the neighbouring hills, to give notice of the approach of any party of the military, or suspected —his retreat on Mount Benalder— strangers. At first, they took up their residence in a wretched shieling, where they remained for three days, when they removed to a romantic retreat called the Cage, which had been constructed by Cluny at a great elevation on the face of a craggy, precipitous rock, forming a part of Mount Benalder. This singular habitation, which was capable of accommodating six persons, was concealed by a thicket, and being supported by a large tree firmly rooted in the crevices of the rock, was to some extent suspended in the air like a bird's cage. In this singular retreat Charles enjoyed rest and comparative comfort, with a plentiful supply of food, to which he had long been a stranger. "Now, gentlemen, I live like a prince!" he exclaimed, on partaking of the first comfortable meal he had enjoyed for months.*

In the meantime, two French vessels, named L'Heureux and La Princesse de Conti, had been fitted out and dispatched for the conveyance of the way-worn wanderer from the shores of Scotland. About the end of August, they set —his embark- sail from St. Maloes, under the ation and arrival in direction of Colonel Warren, of France. Dillon's regiment, and on the 6th of September arrived at Lochuanuagh, the spot where the prince had landed fourteen months before. The cheering intelligence of this event reached Charles in his aerial hiding-place. He instantly began to make preparations for his departure, so that when the messengers arrived from Cluny, to bring him the good news and accompany him to the vessels, they found him ready to start at a moment's warning. Surmounting many formidable obstacles, escaping many dangers, and travelling only by night, Charles reached Borodale on the 19th of September, and next day embarked on board L'Heureux, accompanied by Lochiel, Colonel Roy Stuart, young Clanranald, Sullivan, Sheridan, and about one hundred other friends, who had heard of the arrival of the ships, and were glad to seek for safety on a foreign shore. Concealed by a fog, the vessels passed safely through the midst of the English fleet, and, on the 29th of September,

* A romantic story has been frequently told of an incident alleged to have happened at this time, which had the effect of causing the search after the prince to be very much relaxed. It is said that an insurgent officer named Mackenzie, having fallen into the hands of the soldiers, was shot by them, and when dying, exclaimed, "You have slain your prince!" with the view of aiding Charles's escape. But the story, as Earl Stanhope remarks, is not supported by any credible testimony.

arrived at the port of Roscoff, near Morlaix, in Brittany.

Thus terminated a series of adventures which has few parallels in history. For upwards of five months did the hapless aspirant to a throne wander from place to place in daily and hourly danger of his life—chased from island to island, and from mountain to mountain—subjected to almost incredible fatigues and privations—exposed to every vicissitude of the weather—suffering from hunger and thirst—often barefooted, and with clothes worn to tatters, compelled to pass the night on a bleak hill-top, or among the heather on its sides, under the open sky. In the course of his wanderings he had occasion to trust his life to the fidelity of hundreds of individuals, many of whom belonged to the humblest classes of society, and yet not one of them could be prevailed on, even by so great a reward as that which was offered, to betray him. Such fidelity and disinterestedness are worthy of the highest commendation, and must ever reflect honour on the Highland clans.

"'Tis wonderful

That an invisible instinct should frame them
To loyalty unlearned, honour untaught,
Civility not seen from others; valour
That wildly grows in them, but yields a crop
As if it had been sowed." *

Charles never again revisited the Scottish shores, but for many long years his memory was fondly cherished by his devoted followers. His youth, manly beauty, and personal accomplishments—his romantic adventures and singular misfortunes, captivated the imaginations even of many who were unfriendly to his claims, and rendered him the object of almost idolatrous veneration among the adherents of his family, especially among the primitive and warm-hearted race who had suffered so much in the chivalrous effort to restore him to his ancestral throne. The finest of Scotland's sweet and simple airs have been allied with plaintive songs commemorating the heroism and exploits of "Bonnie Prince Charlie"—commiserating his sufferings when roaming a lonely "stranger o'er hills that were by right his ain"—declaring with the Jacobite matron that if she had ten sons she "would give them a' to Charlie," or with the Jacobite maiden that if she were a man, like her brothers, she "would follow him too"—bemoaning the loss of the best and bravest on "Culloden's fatal heath," or swelling into a triumphal prophecy that for all that was past a glorious day was about to dawn upon Scotland, when "the king should come o'er the water," and the "auld Stewarts should enjoy their ain again."

It would have been well for the reputation of Prince Charles if he had perished at Culloden. The faults of his character gathered strength with advancing years, and, sad to relate, humiliating habits of intoxication, and family discords, arising out of an unhappy union with a German princess, Louisa of Stolberg, darkened the close of his unhappy career, which terminated at Rome, 31st January, 1788, in his sixty-eighth year. His brother Henry, a cardinal and titular Duke of York, the last direct male heir of the line of Stewart, survived till 1807.

The government having completely succeeded in suppressing this formidable rebellion, had now leisure to turn their attention to the punishment of such of its authors and promoters as had fallen into their hands. Nor were they loth to proceed to the performance of a task which, even when demanded by justice, ought not to be executed in a spirit of revenge. Instigated, however, by the remembrance of their recent terror, by the merciless counsels of the Duke of Cumberland, and by the clamours of the people for vengeance on the disturbers of the national tranquillity, they manifested a degree of severity, alike impolitic and cruel, and which it is painful to contemplate or to record.

Among the first sufferers were the officers and privates of the Manchester regiment, who had been left by Charles to garrison the Castle of Carlisle. Trials of the prisoners: the garrison of Carlisle;

Eighteen of these were brought to trial at Southwark on the 13th of July, and, with one exception, all were condemned to suffer death. Eight were reprieved for a short period, but the rest, including Colonel Townley, were executed on Kennington Common on the 30th of the same month. Immense numbers assembled to witness the fatal ceremony, which was attended with all the circumstances of shocking barbarity prescribed by the ancient law of England in cases of treason, and which had disgraced the statute book ever since the days of Edward III. The unfortunate criminals were suspended by the neck for not more than three minutes—a period not sufficiently long to produce death, or probably altogether to extinguish consciousness. They were then cut down, their bodies ripped open, and the entrails, and yet palpitating hearts, consumed by fire. Revolting as this spectacle was, it elicited from the assembled multitude shouts of exultation. The sufferers exhibited in their last moments a degree of calmness and fortitude that might have excited admiration even in the enemies of the cause for which they had laid down their lives, and to which they persisted to the last in avowing their steadfast and conscientious adherence.

On the 28th of July the Earls of Cromarty and Kilmarnock, and Lord Balmerino, Kilmarnock, were placed on their trial at the Cromarty, and bar of the House of Peers, in Westminster Hall. Balmerino.

The two earls pleaded guilty, and endeavoured to propitiate their judges by expressing deep contrition for their crime. Balmerino, who had no counsel, after making a technical objection, which was overruled, to the relevancy of his indictment, pleaded not guilty, and the trial forthwith commenced. After the case against the prisoner had been stated by the counsel for the crown, a few witnesses were examined, by whose evidence it was fully proved that on a particular day Balmerino had entered Carlisle in a hostile manner at the head of a body of cavalry. It was found, however, that the day had not been correctly specified in the indictment, and the prisoner in his defence took objection to that error as vitiating the whole proceedings. After a brief sitting their lordships withdrew to their own House, for the purpose of consulting the judges respecting the legal effect of this mistake. But these authorities were unanimously of opinion that, as the overt act had been distinctly proved, the error in the indictment was of no importance. On the return of the peers to the hall the Lord Chancellor, Hardwicke, who acted as Lord High Steward, proceeded to take the opinion of the court as to the guilt of the accused, when a verdict of guilty was unanimously returned. The three unfortunate noblemen were then placed at the bar, and having been informed of the verdict, were ordered back into confinement.

* Shakespeare.

The three noblemen convicted and condemned to death—

On the 30th the court again met, and the prisoners having been placed once more at the bar, were asked if they had anything to say why sentence of death should not pass against them. Kilmarnock and Cromarty acknowledged their crime with many professions of regret and contrition, and implored the court to intercede with his majesty in their behalf. The former pleaded in extenuation his early withdrawal from the ranks of the insurgents, his voluntary surrender to the royal army when he could without difficulty have made his escape, and the active loyalty of his heir, who had fought at Culloden in defence of the House of Hanover; while Cromarty sought to mollify his judges by representing, in eloquent and pathetic terms, the misery and ruin which his death by the hands of public justice would bring upon his wife and children. Balmerino on the other hand, without expressing any regret for his error, had recourse again to a technical objection. He submitted that it was incompetent to try and condemn him in the county of Surrey for an offence committed in Carlisle, and desired to have the benefit of counsel. After some discussion this was allowed, and the court adjourned for two days.

On the 1st of August the court again met; but Balmerino having in the meantime been assured by his counsel that his objection was untenable, declined their aid, and the Lord High Steward, after a pathetic address, pronounced sentence of death on the intrepid old peer, with his two noble associates. Cromarty was pardoned out of compassion for his numerous family and his wife, who was then far advanced in pregnancy. Kilmarnock and —their execution.

Balmerino were ordered for execution on Tower Hill, on the 18th of August. The former died acknowledging the justice of his sentence, and when the deputy lieutenant of the Tower, according to an ancient usage, said, "God save King George!" he answered "Amen!" Balmerino, on the contrary, emphatically exclaimed, "God save King James!" and, as he laid his neck on the block, he said firmly, "If I had a thousand lives I would lay them all down here in the same cause."

In the meantime great numbers of inferior rank were brought to trial, and many of them were condemned and executed in different parts of the country. Donald Macdonald, James Nicholson, and Walter Ogilvie, three of the Scottish officers taken at Carlisle, were hanged and embowelled on Kennington Common on the 22nd of August. Out of twenty-two persons, who had been convicted and condemned at different times, five were executed on the 28th of November. Among these were Sir John Hamilton, who had been the governor of Carlisle; Sir John Wedderburn, the treasurer of the insurgent forces, and James Bradshaw, a wealthy merchant of Manchester, who had already sacrificed his entire fortune in that ill-fated cause. They all, in their last moments, gave impressive testimony of their conscientious, though mistaken, loyalty to the House of Stewart by praying for King James openly on the scaffold. Numerous executions also took place at York and Carlisle. Not fewer than three hundred and eighty prisoners were driven like cattle into the latter town, where they were promiscuously huddled together in prison to await their trial. Government, however, through motives of policy rather than from the promptings of compassionate feeling, were induced to pause for a moment in their career of vengeance. It was feared that the capital punishment of such a great number of persons would defeat its own end, by enlisting the popular sympathy in favour of the sufferers, and exciting odium against the government. It was therefore resolved that the officers and a few of those most deeply implicated should be put upon their trial, while of the others, one in twenty, to be determined by lot, should be tried, and the remainder transported. Many of them, however, declined to avail themselves of this chance of saving their lives, and preferred abiding the issue of a trial.

After a preliminary investigation, bills of indictment were found against one hundred and thirty-three of the prisoners. These were immediately brought to trial at Carlisle, when eighty of them were found guilty and condemned to death. The entire number imprisoned under sentence at Carlisle amounted to ninety-one, thirty of whom were ordered for execution in the month of October, ten at Carlisle on the 18th, ten at Brampton on the 21st, and ten at Penrith on the 28th. Of the first ten, one was reprieved, of the second, four, and of the third, three. The remainder were executed in the barbarous manner dictated by the existing law of treason. Similar proceedings were, in the meantime, going on at York. Bills of indictment were here found by the grand jury against seventy-five persons, of whom seventy were convicted and sentenced, and twenty-two suffered the last penalty of the law. Amongst all these sufferers, the fate of Charles Radcliffe, brother to the Earl of Derwentwater, executed in 1716, excited the deepest sympathy. He had been condemned for treason along with his brother, but had avoided a like fate by escaping from Newgate. He had recently been captured on board a French ship of war loaded with arms and stores for the insurgents. Satisfactory evidence of his identity having been adduced, he was put to death upon his former sentence.

The last person who suffered for this rebellion was Lord Lovat. His complicity in the treason no one doubted; but as he had cunningly kept in the background, and had not only abstained from any overt act, but had even affected zeal for the royal cause, he would most probably have escaped the punishment he so justly merited, had not Secretary Murray* consulted his own safety by becoming king's evidence. The letters of Lovat to Charles, produced by Murray on the trial, and the corroborative evidence of some of his own clansmen, fully established the guilt of the accused, and he was condemned after a trial which lasted from the 9th to the 19th of March. When sentence was pronounced upon him, he said, "Farewell, my lords, we shall not all meet again in the same place—I am sure of that." During the brief interval between his conviction and his execution he displayed the utmost insensibility to his position, conversed in the most sprightly manner with his friends, and made his approaching death the subject of frequent jests. He met his fate with great composure, and, though in the eightieth year of his age, and so infirm that he had to obtain the assistance of two persons in mounting the scaffold, his spirits never flagged. Looking round upon the multitude, he said, with a sneer, "God save us! Why should there be such a bustle about taking off an old grey head from a man who cannot get up three steps without two assistants!" He professed to die in the Romish faith, and having spent a short time in devotion, he repeated the celebrated line of Horace—singularly inappropriate to his character and fate—and, laying his head upon the block, received the fatal blow with unabated courage, leaving, as Sir Walter Scott remarks, a strong example of the truth of the observation, that it is easier to die well than to live well.

"Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori;"

Immediately after the suppression of the rebellion, and the punishment of the rebels, the legislature, in 1747, passed several measures for the purpose of preventing any future insurrection in behalf of the exiled family. The Highlanders had up till this present period continued to wear the peculiar dress of their ancestors, and never went without arms; but an act was now passed, not only disarming them, but forbidding, under severe penalties, the use of the Highland garb. In order completely to destroy the spirit of clanship, the hereditary jurisdictions which the chiefs and great proprietors exercised over their vassals were also abolished; and all tenures by wardholding, according to which tenants held lands by performance of military services to their landlords, were declared unlawful. The power of the chiefs was thus completely destroyed, and the essential features of the patriarchal and feudal systems were for ever abrogated.

* John Murray of Broughton, secretary to Charles.

CHAPTER LXIII.

MANNERS AND MORALS OF THE PERIOD.

A GREAT change for the better had taken place in Improvement in manners and morals. the manners and morals of the Scottish people since the commencement of the seventeenth century.

Violent outrages on person and property were now much less frequent, and had lost something of their former ferocity. Family feuds, if not extinct, at least did not lead to such sanguinary results as in the preceding century. Such deeds of blood as the murder of "The Bonnie Earl of Moray" by the Marquis of Huntly—or the assassination of Campbell of Calder, by a ruffian suborned by three chiefs of the clan Campbell, acting in concert with the Lord Chancellor Maitland and Huntly—or the slaughter of Sir Walter Scott and Lord Torthorald publicly in the streets of Edinburgh—or the burning of Towie Castle, with its mistress, and her children and servants, by the brother of Huntly, now rarely occurred, and were no longer suffered to pass unpunished. The law was now strong enough to vindicate its supremacy; great criminals were no longer escorted to the bar by such an armed force of kinsmen and retainers as rendered their trial a mockery. The execution of Lord Maxwell, and some other culprits of high station, showed that rank and powerful friends could no longer avail to shield a criminal from the punishment which his crimes deserved. The judgment-seat was not yet completely purified from corruption, but judges and juries were not now coerced by threats or by actual violence to pervert justice, by condemning the innocent, or allowing the guilty to escape. The people were probably as intolerant as ever in their opinions respecting theological or ecclesiastical questions, but they now performed with greater care the practical duties of religion. The open profanation of the Lord's-day, by selling and buying, or by pastimes and games, was no longer tolerated. Licentiousness, though still widely prevalent among certain classes of the community, was no longer openly and unblushingly avowed; the domestic relations were purified and elevated; and the grossness of manners which formerly characterised all ranks, the highest as well as the lowest, was considerably modified.

Many of the superstitions which existed before the Reformation were still widely prevalent, and the most vigorous efforts of the Church failed completely to uproot such practices as the using of charms for the removal of sickness and the cure of sores and wounds, pilgrimages to holy wells, the kindling of fires at Midsummer and on St. Peter's eve, the reserving a field for the devil, the wearing of amulets, and the employment of sorcery. The belief in witchcraft was universal. Great numbers of wretched ignorant creatures, of both sexes and of various conditions (though usually belonging to the lower classes of society), were accused of this imaginary crime, and put to death, in many cases with the most cruel tortures. It is impossible to say at what time sorcery was first treated as a crime in Scotland, but so early as the reign of James III. the Earl of Mar, his brother, was convicted of consulting with witches and sorcerers how to shorten the king's days, and put to death. Twelve women of obscure rank and three or four wizards were burnt at Edinburgh, as the accomplices of the unhappy nobleman. No trial for witchcraft proper, however, appears on the records of the Justiciary Court until the reign of Queen Mary. In her ninth parliament an act was passed declaring that witches, or consultants with witches, should be punished with death. This law was not allowed long to remain inoperative. Charges of witchcraft, indeed, soon became the engrossing topic of the day, and were resorted to by all classes whenever it was the object of one individual to ruin another, or to blacken his character. Persons of the highest rank did not escape these imputations. The Countesses of Atholl, Huntly, Angus, and Lothian, the wife of the Chancellor Arran, Lady Buccleuch of Branksome,* and other noble ladies, were openly charged with protecting witches and dealing in charms. It was alleged that Sir Lewis Bellenden (Lord Justice Clerk), dealt with "a notour and knawn necromancer" called Richard Graham, to raise the devil, and that Graham having raised him in Sir Lewis's own yard, in the Canongate, "he (Sir Lewis) was thereby so terrified that he took sickness, and thereof died."† Nay, to such a height had the belief in witchcraft grown, that the highest dignitaries of the Church, as well as of the court and of the justice seat, were deeply implicated in these forbidden practices; for we find the well known Patrick Adamson, Archbishop of St. Andrew's, in spite of the pains and penalties of the law, applying to an ignorant country-woman for a charm to cure him of his sickness. Even the great reformer, John Knox himself, did not escape the accusation of witchcraft. He was charged with having attempted to raise "some sanctes" in the churchyard of St. Andrew's, but while engaged in his magical incantations he raised the devil himself, with a huge pair of horns on his head—a sight so terrible that Knox's secretary lost his senses with terror, and shortly after died.

The first entry in the Justiciary Record of a trial for witchcraft occurs in 1572, when Case of Janet Bowman, of whose case no particulars are given, was "convict and brynt." No fewer than thirty-five trials for this imaginary crime took place between this date and the close of James's reign in 1625. The details of some of these cases are peculiarly interesting and instructive. Bessie Dunlop, of Dalry, Ayrshire, who was tried November 8th, 1576, and convicted on her own confession, when asked by what art she could discover lost goods, or foretell the result of illness, replied that of herself she had no knowledge of such matters, but that she received information from one Thomas Reid, who died at the battle of Pinkie (September 10th, 1547). This familiar she described as "an honest weel elderlie man, grey beardit, and wearing ane grey coat, with Lombard sleeves of the auld fashion, ane pair of grey breeks and white stockings, gartered above the knee; a black bonnet on his head, and a white wand in his hand,"—probably an accurate description of the dress of a respectable man of Ayrshire at that period. Their first meeting, she alleged, took place as she was driving her cows to the pasture, "greetande (weeping) very fast for her cow that was dead, and her husband and child that were lying sick of the land-ill (some epidemic of the time), and she new risen out of gissane (child-bed)." Thomas saluted her courteously, reproved her for her distrust in Providence, and told her that her child should die before she reached home; that her two sheep should also die, but that her husband should recover. At their next "forgathering" he showed his true character, offering her plenty of everything if she would but "deny her Christendom, and the faith she took at the font-stone." The poor woman answered that, "though she should be riven at horse-tails she would never do that," but promised that she should obey him in all things else. He then left her in some displeasure.

* See supra, p. 322.

† Staggering State of Scots Statesmen.

His third appearance took place in her own house, in the presence of her husband and three tailors, who, however, were not sensible of his presence. He took her by the apron, and led her out to the end of the house, near the kiln, where she saw eight women and four men sitting, the former busked in their plaids, and "very seemly to see." They saluted her, and said, "Welcome, Bessie; wilt thou go with us?" But she returned no answer, and after some conversation among themselves, which she did not understand, they disappeared with "a hideous ugly sough of wiud." Thomas Reid then informed her that these "were the gude wights that wonned in the court of Elfane," and that she should have gone with them. "Seest thou not me," he said, "both meatworth, clothesworth, and well enough in person," and promised she should be better off than ever she was. But Bessie declared she would not leave her husband and children, which caused the phantom to reply in ill humour, that if these were her sentiments she would get little good of him.

Although she thus refused to follow the advice of her familiar, Bessie Dunlop affirmed that he paid her frequent visits, and assisted her with his counsel in the cure of diseases, and the recovery of stolen goods. The remedies which she applied were, according to her own account, prescribed by him; and he taught her how to watch the operation of her charms, and to presage whether her patients were to recover or to die. Bessie received frequent visits from the fairies. On one occasion the Queen of Elfland in person called upon her, asked a drink of her, and predicted the death of her child and the recovery of her husband. On another occasion, as she went to tether her horse by the side of Restalrig Loch, near Edinburgh, she heard a tremendous sound of a body of riders sweeping past her, and seeming to rush into the lake with a hideous rumbling noise. She saw nothing, but her familiar informed her that the sound was occasioned by a procession of the fairy host. The case of this poor woman was evidently one of mental hallucination, but though her alleged sorcery was practised for beneficial purposes, she was, as usual, convicted and burnt.

The spells which Bessie Dunlop is charged with using seem all to have been employed to cure, and not to kill; but in many other cases the alleged sorcerers are accused of laying on diseases, both on men and cattle, of attempting to take away life by means of magical devices, of destroying crops, raising tempests to drown sailors, committing house-breaking and theft by means of charms, of raising unbaptized children from their graves, and dismembering dead bodies for the purpose of enchantments. One of the most remarkable of the cases in which magical devices were employed for the perpetration of crime was that of Trial of Lady Foulis, who was tried for Lady Foulis, and witchcraft and poisoning in 1590. of Hector Munro, her stepson. This lady was a daughter of Ross of Balnagowan, and the second wife of the fifteenth Baron of Foulis, chief of the warlike clan of Munro. Her object was to cut off Robert Munro, her eldest stepson, in order that his widow might marry her brother, George Ross of Balnagowan. She was accused of having at the same time compassed the death of several other persons who stood in the way of her schemes, particularly of her sister-in-law, Lady Balnagowan. For the accomplishment of these wicked schemes Lady Foulis called in the assistance of several persons of infamous character, commonly reputed witches. Their first step was to make her pictures or models of clay representing the intended victims, which were hung up on the north end of the apartment, and the lady, with one of the assistant hags named Lonkie Loscart, shot several arrows shod with elf-arrow-heads* at them, but without effect. Lady Foulis then gave orders that new figures should be modeled, in order to renew the attempt, but apparently distrusting this mode of enchantment, she resorted to more deadly measures, and secured the assistance of two accomplices of a different sort, viz., her brother George, and Catherine Ross, daughter of Sir David Ross, a lady evidently of resolute temper and acute intellect. A stoupful of poisoned ale was forthwith prepared for her victims, but the greater part ran out. A page, however, tasted the small quantity that remained, which was so strong that he immediately fell sick. Lady Foulis then gave orders to brew "a pig (jar) of ranker poison that would kill shortly," and this she sent by her own nurse to the young laird. But the messenger having stumbled in the dark broke the jar, and the nurse tasting of the liquor which had been spilled paid the penalty with her life. So powerful was the potion that sheep and cattle refused to touch the rank grass which grew on the spot where it fell. These repeated failures seem only to have had the effect of rendering Lady Foulis more resolute in carrying out her diabolical schemes. She next proceeded to try the effect of "ratton poyson" (ratsbane), which she administered to her stepson "in eggs browis or kail" (Scotch broth), but without effect, probably because his constitution proved too strong for the doses. She was more successful, however, in her attempts to destroy her sister-in-law, the young Lady Balnagowan, regarding whom she is represented as saying that "she would do by all kinds of wherever it might be had of God in heaven or the devil in hell, for the destruction and down-putting of Margery Campbell." By the aid of the cook, whom she bribed with "two ells of gray claith and ane sark, with thirteen shillings and fivepence," Scots money, Lady Foulis contrived to get the "rattan poyson" mixed in a dish of kidneys, on which Lady Balnagowan and her company supped, and its effects were so violent that even the witch who provided it "scunnerit (revolted) with it sae meikle, that she said it was the sairest and maist cruel sight that ever she saw." At the date of the trial the unfortunate lady was still alive, though she had contracted what was alleged to be an incurable illness.

* Points of flint used for arming arrows in ancient times, but regarded by the superstitious as weapons with which the fairies used to destroy both man and beast.

Not long after these events, two of the subordinate actors, Christian Ross and Thomas McKean, were apprehended, brought to trial, found guilty, and burnt November, 1577. But the instigator of these diabolical proceedings was allowed to remain at large till 1589, when, her husband being dead, the young Laird, Robert Munro, made an attempt to bring her to justice. She found means, however, to procure a suspension of the proceedings, and in the same year Robert Munro died. Next year his brother Hector, his successor, became the nominal prosecutor of his wicked stepmother; and she was at length brought to trial July 22, 1590. But though the evidence was clear and satisfactory, and her accomplices, who had expiated their crimes at the stake, had made an ample confession of the whole plot, Lady Foulis was "pronounced to be innocent, and quit of the hail points of the dittay." Her acquittal can easily be accounted for by the fact that the jury was a packed one, and consisted principally of the dependents of the Foulis family.

Immediately on the conclusion of Lady Foulis's trial, her stepson and nominal prosecutor, Hector Munro, was placed at the bar charged with similar crimes. He evidently wanted both the energy and the wickedness of his stepmother, and appears to have been completely under the control of the hags whose aid he had invoked. He had, in August, 1580, consulted three notorious witches with the view of curing his elder brother Robert, by whose death he would have succeeded to the family estates. The charms they employed for this purpose were unsuccessful, and they told him he had been too late in sending for them. But in the ensuing January he was himself seized with a lingering illness, and consulted a celebrated witch named Marion M'Ingarroch for the recovery of his health. She informed him that he must die, unless the principal man of his blood should suffer death in his stead. Under the strong instinct of self-preservation, he seems at once to have acquiesced in the plan proposed, and having agreed that the substitute referred to must be his half-brother, George Munro, son of the Lady Foulis already mentioned, Hector sent at least seven messages for the young man before he was prevailed upon to come. On his arrival, Hector, by the advice of his familiar, received the youth coldly, and gave his left hand into George's right hand, taking care at the same time not to speak till his brother broke silence, and asked how he did. Shortly after midnight, Marion M'Ingarroch, with several accomplices, left the house in which Hector was lying sick at the time, and passed to a piece of ground near the sea-shore, and forming the boundary between the estates of two proprietors. Here they dug a grave as nearly as possible the size of their patient. They then returned to the house and arranged their respective parts, and agreed that in order to prevent suspicion, the death of their intended victim should be lingering and gradual. Hector Munro was then carried forth in a pair of blankets,—the bearers all the time keeping strict silence,—and laid in the grave, the turf being laid over him and secured with staves. Marion M'Ingarroch then sat down by the grave, while Christian Neil Dalzell, the foster-mother of the young laird, ran the breadth of about nine riggs, leading a boy in her hand, and returning to the grave demanded of the chief witch "which was her choice." She answered that "Mr. Hector was her choice to live, and his brother George to die for him." This ceremony was three times repeated, and then the patient was removed from the grave and carried back to his bed, all remaining silent as before. In spite of this exposure on a January night, the invalid recovered. His brother took ill in April, 1590,—fifteen months after the performance of these magical incantations,—and lingered till the beginning of June, when he died. His mortal illness was of course attributed to witchcraft, and a prosecution was immediately commenced by his mother against Hector, now laird. But the trial had the same issue with the other, doubtless from the same cause.*

The following year the public mind was astounded by the discovery of a series of most extraordinary enchantments practised against the life of the king. The first hint of these incantations was obtained from the confessions of a servant-maid, named Geilie Duncan. Her master, Daniel Seaton, bailiff of Tranent, having had his suspicions excited by some sudden

Trial of witches for a conspiracy against
King James II.

* Piteairn's Criminal Trials, vol. i. pp. 191—204.

cures performed by this girl, subjected her to the torture of the pilniewinks (a kind of thumb-screw), and "wrenched her head with a cord or rope, which is a most cruel torment," and thereby extorted from her both an acknowledgment that the devil had given herself the power of a witch, and disclosures which implicated a number of associates in the same guilt. Thirty or forty persons, some of whom were "as civil, honest women as anie that dwelled within the city of Edinburgh," and one, at least, if not more, belonged to the upper class of society, were apprehended upon this girl's confession. The credulous mind of James was put into a "wonderful admiration" by this discovery, and "in respect of the strangeness of these matters he took great delight to be present at the examinations" of these reputed sorcerers; and the investigation of their malpractices afforded the privy council and him occupation for the greater part of the winter. The persons chiefly implicated in the alleged attempts against the king's life, were John Cunningham, a schoolmaster near Tranent, usually called Dr. Fian; Agnes Sampson, termed the "Wise Wife of Keith," who is described by Archbishop Spottiswoode as "a woman not of the base and ignorant sort of witches, but matron-like, grave, and settled in her answers, which were all to some purpose;" Barbara Napier, wife of Archibald Douglas, brother to the Laird of Carshoggill; and Euphemia Macalzean, wife of Patrick Moscrop, advocate, and daughter of Lord Cliftonhall, one of the senators of the College of Justice. Fian

Dr. Fian. was first brought to trial. He seems to have been a person of dissolute character, but of astonishing strength of mind and firmness of nerve. It was evidently taken for granted that no sorcerer would ever tell the truth except under compulsion, and therefore Fian was first examined by torture, but without effect; and then "was persuaded by fair means to confess his folly." As that "prevailed as little, he was put to the most cruel and severe pain in the world, called the boots; who, after he had received three strokes, being inquired if he would confess his damnable acts and wicked life, his tongue would not serve him to speak." A supposed charm was then removed from his person, and the miserable wretch, on being released from the instrument of torture,—doubtless under the influence of the agony produced by it,—made and subscribed a confession of the incantations employed against the king, as well as of a variety of charms used on other occasions.*

Fian was then remanded to prison, where, for a day or two, he "continued very solitarie, and seemed to have a care of his own soul, and would call upon God and show himself penitent for his wicked life." He contrived, however, to make his escape from prison, but was retaken, and brought back; and, to the great annoyance of James, denied the whole of his former confession; "whereupon the king's majestie, perceiving his stubborn wilfulness," expressed his belief that Fian "had entered into a new league with the devil, his master," and ordered him to be tortured in the most horrible manner. "His nayles upon his fingers were riven, and pulled with an instrument called in Scotch a turkas.* And under every naile there was thrusten two needles over even up to the heads. At all which torments, notwithstanding, the doctor never shrunke anie whit, neither woulde he then confess it the sooner for all the tortures inflicted upon him. Then was he, with all convenient speede, by commandment conveyed againe to the torment of the boot, where he continued a long time, and did abide so many blows on them, that his legs were crusht and beaten together as small as might be, and the bones and flesh so bruised that the blood and marrow spured forth in great abundance, whereby they were made unserviceable for ever. And notwithstanding all these grievous pains and cruel torments, he would not confess anything: so deeply had the devil entered into his heart, that he utterly denied all that which he had before avouched, and would say nothing thereunto but this,—that what he had done and sayde before, was only done and sayde for fear of paynes which he had endured."†

The trials of the women, accused as accomplices of Fian, took place in 1591. Agnes Sampson, after being tortured for an hour by the twisting of a cord round her head, emitted a confession which bears a striking resemblance to that of Fian respecting the attempts against the king's life, and a great witch meeting which they had attended at North Berwick. Satan, it seems, had confidentially informed one of the witches that James was the greatest enemy he had in the world. On another occasion the archfiend stated in France, that he had no power over the king, for he was a man of God. James naturally became peculiarly obnoxious to Satan's emissaries. His visit to Norway to bring over his queen, of which he was not a little vain, afforded the devil and his agents a favourable opportunity to carry into effect their designs against his life. Accordingly Fian, who acted as the devil's secretary or registrar, summoned a meeting of wizards and witches for the purpose of concocting, with their master, a scheme for the destruction of the king. On Allhallow-mass eve, the infernal emissaries, to the number of about two hundred, embarked "each in a riddle, or sieve," with much mirth and jollity, and after cruising about somewhere on the ocean with Satan, who rolled himself before them on the waves, dimly seen, and resembling a huge haystack in size and appearance, he delivered to one of the company, named Robert Grierson, a cat which had previously been drawn nine times through a cruik, giving the word "to cast the same into the sea. Hola!" This charm was intended to raise such a tempest as would infallibly destroy the king, then on his voyage home from Denmark; and (if we may credit the declaration of James, who greedily swallowed the story) was not without effect, for the ship in which the king was conveyed had to contend with a contrary wind, while all the other vessels of the fleet had a fair one.

* News from Scotland declaring the damnable life of Dr. Fian. Pitcairn, vol. i. p. 219.

* A smith's pincers, from torquere.

† News from Scotland, &c. Pitcairn, vol. i. p. 223.

After concluding their incantations on the water, the infernal party landed and enjoyed themselves with wine, which they drank out of the sieves in which they had previously sailed. They then moved on in procession to the kirk of North Berwick, the appointed place of rendezvous with Satan, preceded by Geilie Duncan, playing upon the "trump" or Jews'-harp; and the rest of the company, only six of whom were men, dancing and singing in one voice—

"Cummer go ye before; cummer go ye; Gif ye will not go before, cummer let me." *

When the procession left the kirk, Fian, who acted as leader, "blew up the doors and blew in the lights, whilk were like meikle black candles sticking round about the pulpit," while another of the party, Grey Meill, termed by Sir James Melville "ane auld silly ploughman," acted as a door-keeper. Suddenly, the Arch Fiend started up in the pulpit attired in a black gown and hat, "like ane meikle black man." Sir James Melville, who has given a minute account of this singular transaction, says—"The devil's body was hard lyk yrn, as they thoct that handled him; his faice was terrible, his nose lyk the bek of an egle, great bournying een (eyes); his handis and legis were herry with clawis upon his handes and feit, lyk the griffin, and spak with a how (hollow) voice." He first called the roll of the congregation, and "every one answerit, 'Here, Master!' Robert Grierson being namit, they all ran hirdy-girdy and were angry, for it was promisit that he should be callet Robert the Comp-troller, alias Rob the Rower." Satan then demanded whether they had been good servants; what they had done since the last time they had convened, and what had been the success of the charm of a figure made of wax, and of other devices which they had employed against the king. Grey Meill replied that "naething ailet the king yet, God be thankit;" for which unlucky remark he was rewarded by a great blow. On the command of their master the assembly then "openit up the graves, twa within and ane without the kirk, and took off the joints of their fingers, taes, and knees, and partit them amang them; and Agnes Sampson gat for her part ane winding-sheet and twa joints. The devil commandit them to keep the joints upon them till they were dry, and then to mak ane powder of them to do evil withal. Then he commandit them to keep his commandments, whilk were to do all the evil they could." On his leaving the pulpit the whole congregation did homage to him, in a manner equally humiliating and indecorous, which does not admit of description.

* James sent for Geilie Duncan, and caused her to play before him the same tune to which the witches danced on this occasion.

It is impossible to say whether the wretched creatures brought to trial on these charges—and which either voluntarily or by constraint they confessed to be true—were under a mere hallucination, or had really attempted to do the evil laid to their charge. The remarkable coincidence of their confessions would seem to indicate that there must have been some foundation, in fact, for the alleged meeting at North Berwick. Whether innocent or guilty, however, their fate in that age of credulity and superstition could not be for a moment doubtful. Fian and Sampson were strangled and burnt; Barbara Napier, who was acquitted of being at the North Berwick convention, was found guilty of a few of the less important charges, and condemned to death: execution was delayed, however, on account of her pregnancy, and she was ultimately set at liberty.*

The fate of Dame Euphemia Macalzean, Lord Cliftonhall's daughter, was the severest of all. This lady, who Trial of Macalzean. seems to have been a person of powerful intellect and licentious passions, was not only accused, like Agnes Sampson, of many acts of sorcery of a common kind, but was also charged with complicity in the framing of the waxen figure of the king; and in conspiring to raise a storm for drowning the queen on her homeward voyage from Denmark. A great number of poisonings and attempts at poisonings were also included in her indictment. Though the jury acquitted her of several of these, they found her guilty of destroying by witchcraft her husband's nephew, Douglas of Pumfraston, and of attempting to destroy her father-in-law, as well as of participation in the practices against the king's life. This unfortunate lady was an adherent of the Romish faith, and a friend of the turbulent Earl of Bothwell, who is alleged to have been implicated in the framing of the waxen figure, and other similar devices against the king. Her punishment was the severest the court could pronounce. She was condemned to be "bound to ane stake, and burnt in assis, quick (alive) to the death," and all her estates and property were forfeited to the crown. She endured this horrible fate with the greatest firmness, on the Castle-hill of Edinburgh, June 25th, 1591.
Euphemia

These trials produced a deep and permanent impression on the credulous and superstitious mind of the "British Solomon," and they appear to have led to the composition of his noted work,—the "Dæmonologie."

Numerous other trials for witchcraft took place during the reign of James, all terminating in the same result. The unhappy victims of ignorance and credulity, were usually charged with removing or laying diseases on men or cattle; with destroying crops, sinking ships, and drowning mariners, holding meetings with the devil, raising and dismembering dead bodies for the purpose of obtaining charms, and other offences of a similar kind. After the death of James, the epidemic seems to have abated somewhat in virulence; for from 1623 to 1640, there are only eight trials for witchcraft, entered on the records of the Justiciary Court; and, strange to say, in one case the alleged criminal was acquitted. The counsel for the accused, too, now at length ventured to impeach the credibility of the confessions made by the reputed witches, on the ground that "all lawyers agree that they are not really transported, but only in their fancies while asleep, in which they sometimes dream they see others 'at their orgies.'" * During the great civil war, however, and the Commonwealth, the crime of witchcraft seems to have been greatly on the increase, although the judges appointed by Cromwell discountenanced proceedings against reputed witches. Between 1640 and the Restoration, no less than thirty trials appear on the record, while an immensely larger number were handed over to commissioners composed of "understanding gentlemen," and ministers, appointed by the privy council, to examine and try those accused of witchcraft in their respective localities. No fewer than fourteen of these commissions were granted in one day (November 7, 1661), and there cannot be a doubt that many hundreds of persons, principally aged females, were put to death about this period for this imaginary crime.

* The king was so incensed at this partial acquittal, that he caused the jury to be brought to trial for wilful error. They contrived to avert his wrath by throwing themselves on his mercy. It was perilous in those times for a jury to follow the dictates of justice and humanity, in opposition to the royal will. No wonder that the acquittals from a charge of witchcraft were so few.

Increase of cases of witchcraft at the Restoration. The calendar became even more bloody for some time after the Restoration, when the restrictions imposed by the republican Justiciaries were removed; and during the year 1661, no fewer than twenty persons were condemned for witchcraft by the Justiciary Court.

In 1662 occurred the famous case of the Auldearn witches, whose confessions are unrivalled in interest in this department of sorcery. One of these bel-dames, named Isabel Gowdie, who must have been crazed, gave a most minute and quite unique account of the proceedings of the "coven" of witches to which she belonged. She was examined at four different times, between the 13th of April and 27th of May, 1662, before a tribunal composed of the sheriff of the county, the parish minister, seven country gentlemen, and two of the townsmen; and though her conceptions are almost inconceivably absurd and monstrous, her narrative is quite consistent throughout. She was devoted to the service of the devil in the kirk of Auldearn, where she renounced her Christian baptism, and was baptized by the devil in his own name, with blood which he sucked from her shoulder and sprinkled on her head. The witch coven, or company, to which she belonged consisted of the usual number of thirteen females; one of whom, called the Maiden of the Coven, was always placed close beside Satan, and was treated with peculiar attention, as he had a preference for young women, which greatly provoked the spite of the old hags. Each of the coven had a nickname, as Pickle-nearest-the-wind, Through-the-cornyard, Able-and-stout, Over-the-dike-with-it, &c., and had an attendant spirit, distinguished by such names as the Red Reiver, the Roaring Lion, Thief of Hell, and so forth. These imps were clothed some "in saddun, some in grass green, some in sea-green, some in yellow, some in black." Satan himself had several spirits to wait upon him. He is described as "a very mickle, black, rough man." Sometimes he had boots and sometimes shoes upon his feet, but still his feet are forked and cloven.

A great meeting of the covins took place quarterly, where a ball was given. At these feasts the devil took the head of the table, and all the coven sat around. One said a grace as follows:—

"We eat this meat in the devil's name,
With sorrow and sich (sighs) and mickle shame,
We shall destroy house and hald,
Both sheep and nolt until the fauld,
Little good shall come to the fore
Of all the rest of the little store."

And when the meal was ended, the company looked steadfastly at their president, and bowing to him said, "We thank thee, our Lord, for this."

The witches, it appears, sometimes took considerable liberties with their master's character, and called him "Black John, and the like;" and he would say, "I ken weel eneuch what ye are saying of me;" and then he would beat and buffet them very sore. They were beaten, too, if they were absent from the meetings, or neglected any of their master's injunctions. He found the wizards, however, much more easily intimidated than his emissaries of the other sex. "Alexander Elder," says Isabel Gowdie, "was soft and could never defend himself in the least, but would greet and cry, when Satan would be scourging him. But Margaret Wilson would defend herself fiercely, and cast up her hands to keep (ward) the strokes off her; and Bessie Wilson would speak crusty, and be belling again to him stoutly. He would be beating and scourging us all up and down with cords, and other sharp scourges, like naked ghaists; and we would still be crying, 'Pity, pity; mercy, mercy; our Lord.' But he would have neither pity nor mercy."

When the married witches went out to their nocturnal conventions, they left behind them in bed a besom, or three-legged stool, which assumed their shape till their return, and prevented their husbands from missing them. When they wished to ride, a corn-straw put between their legs served them as a horse, and on their crying, "Horse and haddock, in the devil's name," or pronouncing thrice the following charm—

"Horse and haddock, horse and go, Horse and pellat, ho! ho!"

they are borne through the air to the place of

* Defence of Catherine Oswald, February 4, 1629.

their destination, "even as straws would fly upon a highway." If any see these straws in motion and "do not sanctify themselves," the witches may shoot them dead. On one of their nocturnal excursions, the party feasted in Darnaway Castle, the seat of the Earl of Moray. On another occasion they went to the Downy Hills, when the hill opened, and they went into a well-lighted room, where they were entertained by the Queen of the Fairies.

The covin frequently assumed the shapes of crows, hares, cats, and other animals, by the use of some such charm as the following :—

"I sall go intill a hare,
With sorrow, sich, and mickle care,
And I sall go in the devil's name,
Aye, till I come hame again."

In this shape Isabel herself had an adventure. She was going one morning about daybreak to Auldearn in that disguise, but had the misfortune to meet Peter Papley of Killhill's servants going to work, having his hounds with them. The dogs immediately gave chase. "I," says Isabel, "ran very long, but was forced, being weary at last, to take my own house. The door being left open, I ran in behind a chest, and the hounds followed in; but they went to the other side of the chest, and I was forced to run forth again, and wan into another house, and there took leisure to say—

'Hare, hare, God send thee care;
I am in a hare's likeness now,
But I sall be a woman even now!
Hare, hare, God send thee care.'

And so I returned to my own shape again. The dogs," she added, "will sometimes get bits of us, but will not get us killed. When we turn to our own shape, we will have the bits and rives and scarts on our bodies."

Various charms were described by Isabel, which she and her companions employed for the purpose of inflicting injury upon their neighbours. They sometimes disinterred dead bodies, and used their joints and members in the composition of magic unguents and salves. When they desired to rob some neighbour of the fruits of his fields, they made a show of ploughing his lands with a yoke of paddocks (frogs), the devil himself holding the plough. Quickens (dog-grass) formed the harness and soams (traces); and the sock and coulter were made out of a riglen's (ram's) horn. The covin accompanied the plough, praying to the devil for the fruit of that ground, and that nothing but thistles and briars might be left to the proprietor. The mode of taking away a cow's milk by sorcery was to "pull the tow (rope), and twine it, and plait it the wrong way, in the devil's name, and to draw the tether thus made in betwixt the cow's hinder feet, and out betwixt the cow's forward feet, in the devil's name." When they wished to have fish they went to the shore just before the boats came home, and said three times :—

"The fishers are gane to the sea,
And they will bring hame fish to me,
They will bring them hame intill the boat,
But they sall get of them but the smaller sort."

By employing this charm they obtained all the fish in the boats, leaving the fishermen nothing but slime behind.

Sometimes they employed the powers derived from their infernal master in curing diseases, and Isabel mentions several charms in verse which they repeated, thrice striking the sick person on the sore. More generally, however, they were engaged in laying on, or in prolonging, diseases. Isabel confessed that she and her associates shot forty or fifty persons with elf-arrow heads, manufactured by Satan himself. She attempted to shoot the Laird of Park as he was riding through a ford, but missed him, and received a great cuff from Bessie Hay for her awkwardness. The covin seem to have cherished great enmity against this gentleman, for they devoted all his male children to destruction. For this purpose they made a small effigy of a child in clay, and falling down before their master on their knees, with their hair hanging over their eyes, and looking steadily at him, repeated the following lines :—

"In the devil's name
We pour this water amang the meal,
For long dwinning * and ill heal,
We put it intill the fire,
That it may be burned baith stick and stour;
It sall be burnt with our will,
As any stickle † upon a kiln."

"Then in the devil's name," says the beldame, "we did put it in in the midst of the fire. After it was red like a coal we took it out in the devil's name. Till it be broken it will be the death of all the male children that the Laird of Park shall ever get."

The covin seem to have entertained an equally strong dislike to the Laird of Lochlay, and took measures of a similar kind for the entire destruction of his family. A mixture of dogs'-flesh and sheeps'-flesh, chopped small and seethed for a whole forenoon in a pot, was put by the devil into a sheep's-bag, and stirred about for some time with his hands. A prayer was then offered up by the witches on their knees, with uplifted hands, and eyes fixed steadfastly on the devil, that this charm should destroy the Lairds of Park and Lochlay, and their male children and posterity. "We then," said Janet Braidhead, one of the covin, "came to Inshoch in the night-time, and scattered the mixture about the gate and other places where the lairds and their sons would most haunt, and then we, in the likeness of crows and rooks, stood above the gate, and on the trees opposite. It was appointed so that if any of them should touch or tramp upon it, as well as that it or any of it fall on them, it should strike them with boils, and kill them, which it did, and they shortly died. We did it to make this house heirless." Isabel Gowdie confessed that a similar attempt was made against the life of Mr. Harry Forbes, minister of Auldearn, one of the members of the commission appointed to try the witches, and who was actually present, and subscribed her confession. The instrument employed

* Pining.

† Stubble.

was "a bag filled with the flesh, and guts, and galls of toads, the liver of a hare, pickles of bear (barley), pairings of nails of feet and toes, and bits of rag," which being steeped all night, and mixed by Satan himself, was consecrated by the following charm, dictated by Satan, and repeated three times by the witches on their knees:—

"He is lying on his bed, he is lying sick and sair, Let him lie intill his bed two months and three days mair," &c.

Such is the singular confession made by Isabel Gowdie and her associate Janet Braidhead, to which we are indebted for the most complete information anywhere to be found respecting the rites and ceremonies of Scottish witchcraft. There is no reason to doubt that these wretched creatures were under some strange hallucination, which, stimulated by the prevalent tales of sorcery, led them to mistake dreams and fancies for real events.

The confession of Isabel Gowdie seems to have been made voluntarily, and without compulsion of any kind, but many unfortunate creatures were

Indiction of torture on suspected witches.

subjected to the most cruel tortures in order to compel them to bear evidence against themselves. One common mode of detecting witches was by running pins into their bodies on pretence of discovering the devil's mark, which was alleged to be set on a spot insensible to pain.* The persons who acted as "prickers" of witches were allowed to torture the persons suspected of witchcraft at their pleasure, as if they were following a lawful and useful occupation. At length this brutal practice drew down the reprobation of the privy council, and the prickers were punished as common cheats. Tortures of a much severer kind were often employed to extort from the reputed witches an acknowledgment of their guilt. Sometimes they were hung up by the thumbs, till nature being exhausted, they were fain to confess whatever was laid to their charge. At other times they were subjected to cold and hunger till their lives became a burden. In many cases the thumbikens, and other similar instruments of torture, were employed to extort a confession, until the limbs of the wretched crea-

Case of tortures were crushed to pieces. Alison

Alison Balfour, who was accused in 1594 as an accomplice of the Master of Orkney in his attempts to kill his brother by witchcraft and poison, made her confession after forty-eight hours of the "vehement torture of the caschielaws." By a shocking refinement of cruelty, her aged husband, who was eighty-one years of age, "together with her eldest son and her daughter, were all kept at once, and at the same instant, in ward beside her, and put to tortures at the same instant of time; the father being in the long irons of fifty stone weight, the son galled in the boots with fifty-seven strokes, and the daughter, being seven years old, put in the pilniewinks: to this effect that her said husband and bairns, being so tormented beside her, might move her to make any confession for their relief." In the same way a confession was extorted from Thomas Palpa, who was accused as an accomplice. He was "kept in the caschielaws eleven days and eleven nights; twice in the day, by the space of fourteen days, galled in the boots, he being naked in the meantime, and scourged with tows (or ropes) in such sort that they left neither flesh nor hide on him."* The jury seem to have given no credit to the confessions thus extorted as evidence against the Master of Orkney, for they acquitted him, but they had in the meantime been regarded as conclusive proof of the guilt of the unfortunate creatures who had uttered them. Alison Balfour was burned at the heading-hill in Kirkwall, and behaved with great spirit and courage. When brought out to be executed, "she declared, and took upon her soul and conscience, as she would answer at the day of judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, that she was as innocent, and would die as innocent of any point of witchcraft as a bairn new-born;" and that her false confession was wrung from her by her own sufferings, and the sight of the tortures inflicted on her husband and family.

Sir George Mackenzie, who in the discharge of duties as Lord Advocate, had often Opinion of Sir George Mackenzie.

occasion to conduct witch trials, though he seems to have had no doubt of the reality of the crime, yet speaks in strong terms of the cruel treatment given to the persons accused of it, and of the manner in which evidence was obtained against them. As an example of the way in which these unfortunate creatures might be induced to acknowledge themselves guilty, by the very infamy which the accusation had brought upon them, and the misery which they must have endured, even though their lives had been spared, "I went," he says, "when I was a justice-depute, to examine some women who had confessed judicially; and one of them, who was a silly creature, told me under secrete that she had not confest because she was guilty, but being a poor creature who wrought for her meat, and being defamed for a witch, she knew she would starve, for no person thereafter would either give her meat or lodging, and that all men would beat her and hound dogs at her, and that therefore she desired to be out of the world: whereupon she wept most bitterly, and upon her knees called God to witness to what she said. Another told me that she was afraid the devil would challenge a right to her, after she was said to be his servant, and would haunt her, as the minister said, when he was desiring her to confess; and therefore she desired to die. And really," he adds with great justice, "ministers are ofttime indiscreet in their zeal to have poor creatures to confess in this; and I commend to judges that the wisest ministers should

* Sir Walter Scott says, "There is room to believe that the professed prickers used a pin, the point, or lower part of which was, on being pressed down, sheathed in the upper, which was hollow for the purpose, and that which appeared to enter the body did not pierce it at all."

* Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. i. p. 376.

be sent to them, and those who are sent should be cautious in this particular." *

Another affecting case of the same kind occurred in Lauder. A woman accused, along with several companions, of witchcraft, was committed to the jail of that town, and like the others confessed herself guilty, and entreated to be put to death along with them. The clergyman, however, as

Case of false well as others, was persuaded confession. that her confession was untrue, and "therefore much pains was taken with her that she might recoil from that confession, which was suspected to be but a temptation of the devil to destroy both her soul and body; yea, it was charged home upon her by the ministers, that there was just ground of jealousy that her confession was not sincere, and she was charged before the Lord to declare the truth, and not to take her blood upon her own head. Yet she stiffly adhered to what she had said, and cried always to be put away with the rest. Whereupon, on Monday morning, being called before the judges, and confessing before them what she had said, she was found guilty, and condemned to die with the rest that same day. Being carried forth to the place of execution, she remained silent during the first, second, and third prayer, and then perceiving that there remained no more but to rise and go to the stake, she lifted up her body, and with a loud voice cried out, 'Now all you that see me this day, know that I am now to die as a witch by my own confession, and I free all men, especially the ministers and magistrates, of the guilt of my blood. I take it wholly upon myself—my blood be upon my own head; and as I must make answer to the God of Heaven presently, I declare I am as free of witchcraft as any child; but being delated (accused) by a malicious woman, and put in prison under the name of a witch, disowned by my husband and friends, and seeing no ground of hope of my coming out of prison, or ever coming in credit again, through the temptation of the devil I made up that confession on purpose to destroy my own life, being weary of it, and choosing rather to die than live'—and so died." †

In some cases accusations of witchcraft originated in malice, or other base motives of a similar kind. In 1676 six persons—one man and five women—were condemned to death, and five of them were executed

The Renfrew- on the charge of bewitching Sir shire witches. George Maxwell, of Pollock, in Renfrewshire, principally on the evidence of a vagabond girl, who pretended to be deaf and dumb. Her imposture was afterwards discovered, and herself punished, but too late to save the lives of her victims. A similar case occurred at Paisley in 1697, when no less than twenty persons—one of them a girl of fourteen, another a boy of twelve—were condemned mainly upon the evidence of a girl named Christian Shaw, daughter of John Shaw, Laird of Bargarren. This girl, who was about eleven years of age, in consequence of a quarrel with a maid-servant, pretended to be possessed, and played off a series of ecstasies and convulsive fits so successfully, in the presence of the commissioners appointed by the privy council to try the case, that the persons accused were found guilty, and five of them were burnt upon the green at Paisley, and one of them, John Reed, hanged himself in prison.

The last trial for witchcraft before the Court of Justiciary was that of Elspet Rule, Last trial for which took place on the Dumfries witchcraft. circuit, the 3rd of May, 1708. A majority of the jury found the prisoner guilty, but she was merely sentenced to be branded on the cheek, and banished Scotland for life. The last execution in Scotland for witchcraft occurred at Dornoch in 1722, by the sentence of Captain David Ross, of Littledean, sheriff-depute of Caithness. The victim was an insane old woman belonging to the parish of Loth, "who, among other crimes," says Mr. Kirkpatrick Sharpe, "was accused of having ridden upon her own daughter transformed into a pony, and shod by the devil, which made the girl ever after lame, both in hands and feet, a misfortune entailed upon her son, who was alive of late years." When the wretched crone was brought out to execution, "the weather proving very severe, she sat composedly warming herself by the fire prepared to consume her, while the other instruments of death were making ready." *

In 1735 the penal statutes against witchcraft were repealed; but the belief in the existence of this imaginary Repeal of the laws against crime must still have lingered even witches. among the educated classes in Scotland, as well as among the great body of the people, for in 1743 the Associate Presbytery enumerate among other national sins, that "the penal statutes against witches have been repealed by the parliament, contrary to the express law of God." So ends one of the darkest and most tragic chapters in the domestic history of Scotland. †

The physical and intellectual improvement of the country had been greatly re- Disordered state tarded by the almost incessant of the country civil and ecclesiastical strife which at the Revolution. raged throughout the seventeenth century. At the Revolution, according to Fletcher of Saltoun, there was "in Scotland (besides a great number of families very meanly provided for by the church-boxes, with others who with living upon bad food fall into various diseases) two hundred thousand people begging from door to door. These are not only in noways advantageous, but a very grievous burden to so poor a country; and though the number of them be perhaps double to what it was formerly, by reason of the present great

* Mackenzie's Criminal Law, p. 45.

† Sinclair's Satan's Invisible World Discovered, p. 43; Sir Walter Scott's Demonology and Witchcraft, p. 287.

* Preface to Law's Memorials, p. 107.

† See Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, Sir John Dalrymple's, Darker Superstitions of Scotland, and Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft, by Sir Walter Scott.

distress, yet, in all times, there have been about one hundred thousand of these vagabonds, who have lived without any regard or submission, either to the laws of the land, or even those of God and nature. No magistrate could ever discover or be informed which way any of these wretches died, or that ever they were baptized. Many murders have been discovered among them, and they are not only an unspeakable oppression to poor tenants (who if they do not give bread, or some sort of provision, to perhaps forty such villains in one day, are sure to be insulted by them), but they rob many poor people who live in houses distant from any neighbourhood. In years of plenty many thousands of them meet together in the mountains, where they feast and riot for many days; and at country weddings, markets, burials, and other like public occasions, they are to be seen, both men and women, perpetually drunk, cursing, blaspheming, and fighting together." Such was the state of Scotland at the end of her religious wars and persecutions, when the act for the establishment of parochial schools had

Improvement in the condition and character of the people.

been repealed,* and the ministry of the gospel suspended throughout all her parishes. But no sooner did the people obtain repose from the violent dissensions by which the country had been convulsed, and the parochial system of education become general, than these disorders subsided, extreme destitution rapidly disappeared, and mendicity, though it still subsisted, was confined within comparatively narrow limits. So rapidly did this transformation take place, that De Foe, giving an account of the country in 1717, states that "the people are restrained in the ordinary practice of common immoralities, such as swearing, drunkenness, slander, and the like. As to theft, murder, and other capital crimes, they come under the cognizance of the civil magistrate, as in other countries; but in those things which the Church has power to punish, the people being constantly and impartially prosecuted, they are thereby the more restrained, kept sober, and under government; and you may pass through twenty towns in Scotland without seeing any broil, or hearing one oath sworn in the streets; whereas, if a blind man was to come from there into England, he shall know the first town he sets his foot in within the English border, by hearing the name of God blasphemed and profanely used even by the very little children in the street."

The striking change that had thus taken place in the character and habits of the people, is to be attributed principally to the combined influence of the parochial schools, and of the teaching and superintendence of the clergy. Education was generally diffused throughout the community. Persons were rarely to be met with, even in the lower ranks of life, without the knowledge of reading, writing, and arithmetic. To have a relative unable to read would have been reckoned disgraceful to a whole family. The duties of family worship, and domestic instruction of the young in the principles of religion, were generally attended to, and the Bible formed part of the library of almost every family. The favourite literature of the peasantry consisted of such theological treatises as the Marrow of Modern Divinity, Boston's Fourfold State, The Cloud of Witnesses, Howie's Scotch Worthies, and other similar records of the sayings and doings of those stern Presbyterians, who, during the fierce storm of persecution, had been driven from their churches and compelled to flee with their flocks to the caves and dens of the mountains. The characters of these old champions of the Covenant were regarded with unbounded veneration; and the traditional narratives of their struggles and sufferings were handed down from father to son with devout admiration, and exercised a most important influence upon the opinions and manners of the people.

The duties of the Sabbath were performed with great strictness. It is recorded, Observance of that even in the populous town of Paisley, the inhabitants were so universally regular in their attendance at church, and strict afterwards in keeping within doors, that, down to the close of the eighteenth century, scarcely a single individual was ever seen walking the streets after divine service. In Glasgow the people were equally strict in their observance of the sacred day. "There were families who did not sweep or dust the house, or make the beds, or allow any food to be cooked or dressed on Sunday. There were some who opened only as much of the shutters of their windows as would serve to enable the inmates to move up and down, or an individual to sit at the opening to read."*

It cannot be denied, that a good deal of asceticism mingled with the religion of this period, and that the fiery trials through which the people had passed, had given a somewhat stern and gloomy cast to the national manners and feelings, especially in connection with their religious opinions. Ecclesiastical discipline, too, was wielded with excessive rigour: standing in companies on the street on Sabbath, holding idle discourse there, taking recreation by walking through fields and meadows, giving and receiving visits, were all reckoned offences deserving of church censure. In accordance with these principles, the magistrates in most of the large towns employed officers, termed "seizers" or "compurgators," to perambulate the streets on the Saturday nights; and when, at the approach of twelve o'clock, they happened to hear any noisy conviviality going on, even in a private dwelling-house, they were authorised to enter with-

Severity of ecclesiastical discipline.

* At the commencement of the seventeenth century in Scotland—as it is still in Norway—the Sabbath was held to commence at sunset on Saturday, and to terminate at sunset, or six o'clock, on Sunday.

* See Appendix R.

out ceremony and dismiss the company. Another office of these "seizers" was to perambulate the streets and public walks during divine service on Sundays, and to apprehend all loiterers and evil-doers.

Licentious conduct was severely punished by the kirk session. Exposure on a conspicuous seat in the church, followed by a public rebuke from the minister, a pecuniary fine, excommunication, carting, ducking, and banishment, were the penalties awarded for this crime, without the slightest respect of persons. It was enacted by parliament that "for the first fault, as well the man as the woman, shall pay the sum of forty pounds (Scotch), or than (else) he and she shall be imprisoned for the space of aucht (eight) days, their food to be bread and small drink, and, thereafter, presented to the mercat-place of the town or parochin bare headed, and there stand fastened, that they may not remove for the space of two hours." A second offence incurred the additional penalty of cold water for food, and a shaving of the head; and a third was visited with ducking and banishment. The General Assembly ordered that, in addition to the civil penalties, married persons convicted of licentious conduct should stand on three several Sundays at the kirk door while the congregation was assembling, clad in haircloth, bare legged, and bare footed, each wearing a paper crown inscribed with his crime; they were then to enter the church before the commencement of the sermon, and take their places on the stool of repentance; and finally, at the close of public worship, they were ordered again to repair to the kirk door, and to remain there "to be ane spektakle to the hail peple," till the congregation had departed. After the close of the seventeenth century, these penalties seem to have been somewhat modified, and offenders were usually subjected only to exposure in the church, public rebuke, and a pecuniary fine. A feeling of shame induced many of the female penitents to cover their faces with their plaids while seated on the "pillar of repentance" before the congregation: injunctions were, therefore, issued that the plaids should be laid aside or taken away by the officer from each penitent "before her upganging to the pillar." The practice, however, seems to have continued, for it was subsequently found necessary to ordain, that a sitting muffled with the plaid, went for nothing.

In their anxiety to suppress all customs that might lead to immorality, the clergy placed all festivities and merrymakings under strict regulations. Public dancing and the employment of pipers at weddings, "promiscuous dancing," and "superfluous banqueting," were forbidden under severe penalties. Backbiting, slander, and scolding were rigorously punished. The session of Perth amerced "Catharine Yester and John Denite each in half a merk for flyting" (scolding); and John Tod, for slandering, was ordained to pay a like sum and to stand in the irons two hours, besides asking forgiveness of the person he had injured.

In other cases offenders appear to have been exposed on the cross in default of the payment of the fine. The session of Aberdeen inflicted a pecuniary penalty on the slanderer; but "gif the injurious person be simple and of puir degree he shall ask forgiveness before the congregation of God and the party, and say, 'Tongue, ye lied,' for the first fault; for the second, he shall be put in the cockstool; and for the third fault, shall be banished the town."

Among the rural population and in the small towns, this rigorous discipline seems to have been patiently submitted to; but in the large towns, and especially in the metropolis, the authority of the Church was set at defiance by a class of the community, who were all the more reckless and daring, in consequence of the excessive strictness with which ecclesiastical censures were administered. Midnight riots in the streets were of common occurrence. Drunkenness, too, was a vice that prevailed to a great extent. In Edinburgh, no considerable part of the business of life was carried on in taverns and public-houses; and there lawyers, merchants, and tradesmen might be seen regularly settling their affairs with their clients and customers, over plentiful libations of strong liquors. A similar custom prevailed in Glasgow, where no business was transacted but in the wine shops opposite to the Tontine Exchange. In both cities, dinner parties and other social entertainments usually terminated with hard drinking; and gentlemen were to be met with in a state of intoxication at most evening parties and in all public places.

The domestic accommodations of the Scottish people at this period were of a very limited and inconvenient kind. Even in Edinburgh the residences of the higher classes were small, gloomy, and ill-ventilated. The streets were very narrow, and the houses raised to an enormous height, not unfrequently affording shelter within their walls to thirty or forty families. Edinburgh at that time enjoyed the unenviable distinction of being reckoned the filthiest city in Europe. The streets, especially in the mornings, were covered with all kinds of abominations; and the pigs, which many of the inhabitants kept under the outside stairs that projected from the houses, wandered about unrestrained, and played the part of scavengers. In the rural districts, the internal arrangement of the houses was at least equally inconvenient, and the same disregard of cleanliness and comfort was everywhere manifested. With regard to diet the Scotch had now, to a great extent, adopted the customs of their English neighbours. Tea was introduced into Scotland in 1681; and about the middle of the eighteenth century, it had come into common use among the middle classes of the metropolis. The dinner hour was two o'clock, tea was served at four; and hence this meal was usually termed "the four hours." The intercourse of society was principally by evening parties.

The prosperity of the agricultural population was greatly retarded by the law which vested the administration of justice in the landed proprietors. By means of their hereditary jurisdictions, the barons and chiefs possessed the power of judging both in civil and criminal cases among their dependents. In all lawsuits between landlord and tenant, the former was thus constituted the judge in his own cause. Such a state of things, it is hardly necessary to say, was often productive of great oppression and injustice. The nature of the engagements between the proprietor and his tenantry also tended greatly to keep the latter in a state of poverty and dependence. The farms were usually held from year to year. Little of the rent was paid in money; and the tenants were, in almost every case, bound to grind their corn at the baron's mill (paying, of course, a much larger sum for the operation than they would have done elsewhere), and to perform field-work and other similar labours for the proprietor, while the cultivation of their own farms was left in arrear.

The patrimonial estates of the gentry were inherited by their eldest sons, who were not unfrequently devoted to the legal or military professions. The younger sons usually sought their fortunes abroad. Not a few of them entered into the service of foreign potentates; and during the thirty years' war in Germany, Gustavus Adolphus had in his army four lieutenant-generals, twenty colonels, and an immense number of inferior officers, who were all natives of Scotland. At a later period it was no uncommon thing for the younger sons of noble families to be instructed in some mechanical art. Some sought opportunities of advancement in England, others in the colonies, where they were in many cases successful in acquiring considerable wealth.

As might have been expected, literature was at a very low ebb in Scotland during the seventeenth century. Its voice could scarcely be heard amid the "confused noise" of civil war and the fierce wranglings of ecclesiastical polemics. In the early part of this era, however, there still flourished not a few of those learned Scotchmen who held important offices in the universities of the Continent. The celebrated ANDREW MELVILLE, the indomitable defender of Presbyterian rights and privileges, who, in his youth, filled successively chairs in the colleges of Poitiers and Geneva, ended his career as professor of divinity in the University of Sedan. His numerous works display both remarkable talent, and varied and extensive learning. WILLIAM BARCLAY, a Roman Catholic, professor of law in the University of Angers (1578—1605), was the author of several treatises which at one time enjoyed great celebrity. His largest work was written in vindication of the rights of kings against the arguments of Buchanan, Languet, and other writers on the popular side. His posthumous treatise against the power of the pope, in opposition to Bellarmine, was intended to prove that while the pontiff possesses supremacy in spiritual things, he has no title to temporal power, especially over the dominions of sovereign princes. ROBERT BALFOUR, principal of the College of Guienne, Bordeaux, who was educated at the University of St. Andrew's, was the author of a commentary on Aristotle, which was held in high estimation among his contemporaries. Balfour left behind him the reputation of a learned and excellent man, and, though a zealous adherent of the Romish faith, he showed much kindness to his countrymen, who at that time wandered over the Continent in great numbers in search of education or of literary employment. One of the most learned men of this age was WILLIAM BELLENDEN, styled Magister Supplicum Libellorum,—probably reader of private petitions to King James VI. According to Dempster he was at one time a professor in the university, and an advocate in the parliament of Paris. Bellenden's first work, entitled "Ciceronis Princeps," published in 1608, is a treatise on the duties of a prince, formed out of those passages in the writings of Cicero, which relate to the origin and progress of regal government. This was followed by "Ciceronis Consul, Senator, Senatusque Romanus," a treatise compiled in a similar way on the dignity and authority of the consuls, and on the constitution of the Roman senate. His next publication, entitled "De Statu prisce Orbis in Religione Re Politica et Literis," gives a sketch of philosophy and civil polity among the Hebrews, Egyptians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans. It is the most original of Bellenden's works. These three treatises were subsequently republished in one volume, under the general title, "De Statu Libri Tres." The last work which Bellenden himself published consists of two short poems on the marriage of Charles I. His largest and most elaborate production was a posthumous treatise, "De Tribus Luminibus Romanorum," which was intended to give, in a historical form, a digest of all the statements and reflections of Cicero, Seneca, and Pliny the Elder, respecting the civil and religious affairs of Rome. But the cento from the writings of Cicero is the only one he lived to complete. It was printed at Paris in 1631 or 1634, but it is alleged that the greater part of the impression, being shipped for England, was lost on the passage, and only a few copies remained, which had been left in France. Dr. Conyers Middleton, in his "Life of Cicero," has, without acknowledgment, laid this vast storehouse of materials extensively under contribution, and in many cases has made a mere transcript of Bellenden's work. This act of injustice was exposed by Dr. Parr, who reprinted Bellenden's treatises "De Situ," with a highly laudatory preface.

Among those distinguished Scotsmen whose names were once familiar on the Continent, mention must be made of WALTER DONALDSON, principal of the University of Sedan, and author of several learned works; of MARK DUNCAN, principal of the University of Saumur, the chief seminary of the French Protestants; of DUNCAN LIDDELL,* professor of physic in the University of Helmstädt, and author of various medical works held in great estimation by his contemporaries; of GILBERT JACK, professor of philosophy in the University of Leyden, and author of "Institutiones Physicæ and Institutiones Medicæ;" of JOHN CAMERON, professor of divinity in the University of Saumur, a famous theologian and Biblical expositor, whom Bishop Hall regarded as the most learned writer that Scotland had produced, and who is termed by Milton "a late writer, much applauded," "an ingenious writer, and in high esteem;" † of THOMAS DEMPSTER, professor of humanity in the University of Bologna, a voluminous and learned writer, but a man of restless and turbulent character; ‡ and of JOHN BARCLAY, son of William Barclay, and author of the celebrated Latin romance "Argenis," and various other works.

In this enumeration of Scottish writers, mention must be made of JAMES THE SIXTH, whose "Démonologie," "Basilicon Doron," and "Counterblast to Tobacco," though disfigured by pedantry, display considerable ability and extensive learning.

It is somewhat remarkable that the two greatest writers on Scottish law—Sir THOMAS CRAIG, and LORD STAIR—should have flourished during this unfruitful period. The most important work of Craig is his "Jus Feudale," written for the purpose of illustrating the principles of feudal laws as they have been applied and modified in Scotland. This treatise is of great value, and has not been superseded by any subsequent work on the subject. Sir Thomas was also the author of elaborate treatises in Latin on the "Right of Succession to the English Throne," and in vindication of the independence of the Scottish monarchy, which are still in manuscript, though translations of both were published long after the author's death. § Lord Stair was the first writer who reduced the law of Scotland into a systematic form, and his great work, "The Institutions of the Law of Scotland," still retains its paramount authority.

By far the most celebrated philosopher that flourished in Scotland during the seventeenth century was John Napier, of Merchiston, the inventor of the famous system of logarithms, which has been justly pronounced "a pre-requisite to the solution of the great numerical problems which the subsequent investigations of science have originated." Soon after the appearance of Napier's work, which was written in Latin, an English translation of it was published at Oxford by Henry Briggs, the most eminent mathematician of his day in England, whose admiration of the discovery was so great, that he undertook repeated journeys to Scotland, purposely to visit its venerable author. Besides his mathematical pursuits, Napier dabbled in alchemy, and was fond both of theological studies and of mechanical contrivances. He devised various singular expedients for the purpose of securing his native country from invasion. Among these are enumerated mirrors for burning the enemy's ships, and reflecting artificial fire; a destructive "shot for artillery;" and "a closed and fortified carriage;" besides devices of sailing under water, with divers other stratagems for harming of the enemy, "which," says the inventor, "by the grace of God and work of expert craftsmen, I hope to perform."

Of the historical works published at this period, the most important are the "History of the Church of Scotland," by DAVID CALDERWOOD, a laborious and useful writer, who is also the author of numerous controversial treatises in theology, and the Church History of ARCHBISHOP SPOTTISWOODE, written from the episcopal point of view. The "History of the House of Douglas," by HUME of Godscroft, and the "Annals" of Sir JAMES BALFOUR, Lord Lyon King-at-Arms, are also worthy of notice. The "Diary" of JAMES MELVILLE, nephew of Andrew Melville, contains much curious information relative to the ecclesiastical and literary history of that age. A Latin history of Great Britain and the adjacent kingdoms, from 1572 to 1628, by Dr. ROBERT JOHNSTONE, though highly commended by Lord Woodhouselee, is a work of no great merit. Another historical work of higher order, entitled "The History of Great Britain from the Revolution in 1681 to the accession of George I.," was composed also in Latin by ALEXANDER CUNNINGHAM, travelling tutor to Lord Lorn, eldest son of the Marquis of Argyll. The original is still in manuscript, but a spirited translation by Dr. William Thomson appeared in 1787. The Letters and Journals of ROBERT BAILLIE, the principal of the University of Glasgow, are of great historical value, and have preserved the memory of this profoundly learned and modest scholar, when his numerous controversial writings have fallen into oblivion. DRUMMOND, of Hawthornden, published in 1655 a "History of Scotland from the year 1423 until the year 1542," which, however, adds nothing to the reputation of the author. At a later period appeared two bulky historical works of little worth, "The Martial Achievements of the Scottish Nation," by PATRICK ABERCROMBY, and "The Lives and Characters of the Most Eminent Writers of the Scots Nation," by Dr. GEORGE MACKENZIE. A work of considerable value, entitled "Memoirs of the Court of Augustus," in three volumes quarto, was the production of Dr. THOMAS BLACKWELL, principal of Marischal College, Aberdeen, and the restorer of Greek literature in the north of Scotland.

* Dr. Liddell, who was a native of Aberdeen, was a munificent benefactor to Marischal College of that city.

† The opinions of Cameron, and his pupil and successor, Amyraut, respecting the doctrines of grace and freewill, were adopted by a large party among the French Protestants, and gave rise to lengthened controversy. An edition of Cameron's theological works, in one vol. folio, was published at Geneva in 1642.

‡ For a catalogue of his works see Irving's Literary Scotchmen, vol. i. pp. 363–370.

§ See Tytler's Account of the Life and Writings of Sir Thomas Craig.

* Domestic Annals of Scotland, by Robert Chambers, vol. i. pp. 272, 451.

The theological treatises published at this period were for the most part controversial, and of little permanent importance. An exception, however, must be made in favour of the works of the sainted BISHOP LEIGHTON, which are models of evangelical sentiment and devotional feeling. His commentary on the First Epistle of St. Peter is probably the best expository work in the English language. The writings of Dr. FORBES, professor of divinity, King's College, Aberdeen, have been highly eulogized by Bishop Burnet and Dr. Cave. DRUMMOND of Hawthornden, the friend of Ben Jonson and Michael Drayton, must without doubt be placed at the head of the Scottish poets of the day. His poems are characterized by delicate sensibility and warmth of fancy, combined with great skill in versification, but they are frequently disfigured by Italian conceits. The works of Sir WILLIAM ALEXANDER, the poetical Earl of Stirling, are possessed of considerable merit, especially his songs and sonnets. Although his style is neither pure nor correct, his versification is in general much superior to that of his contemporaries. The poems of Sir ROBERT AYTON, private secretary to James the Sixth's queen, are written in English, and exhibit great elegance and refinement. Dr. ARTHUR JOHNSTON, physician to King Charles I., is the author of a version of the Psalms of David, and of numerous Latin poems, which have been deemed little inferior to those of Buchanan. Of a very different class are the satirical poems of DR. ARCHIBALD PITCAIRNE, a learned physician, which are less remarkable for wit or humour than for gross profaneness and indecency. His Latin poems, however, are of a higher order, and are worthy of commendation for their point and pungency, and great "felicity in clothing pictures of modern manners in classical phraseology."* The "Deliciæ Poetarum Scotorum" shows that, amid the general barrenness, there were a number of accomplished scholars in Scotland at this period. An edition of Horace, which attracted great attention, was published by ALEXANDER CUNNINGHAM, professor of civil law in the University of Edinburgh, and the antagonist of Bentley; and the editions of the classics, published by the learned RUDDIMAN, have justly attained great celebrity.

Scotland was not destitute at this time of men of eminent scientific attainments, but the scanty rewards which their native land provided for such labours, compelled the greater part of them to seek their fortunes in other countries. DAVID GREGORY, the founder of a family which has long held an eminent position in the scientific annals of Britain, and the first teacher who introduced the Newtonian philosophy into the schools, was professor of astronomy in the University of Oxford. JOHN and JAMES KEILL, the former eminent in mathematics, the latter in anatomy, followed their friend Gregory to England; and John, after an interval of four years, succeeded him in his astronomical chair. JOHN CRAIG, a distinguished mathematician, and author of numerous scientific works, was vicar of Gillingham in Dorsetshire. The celebrated ARBUTHNOT, the friend of Pope; DR. CHEYNE, an eminent physician, and author of several valuable professional works; DAVID MALLETT; Dr. ARMSTRONG, the author of the well-known poem entitled, "The Art of Preserving Health;" and his far more celebrated contemporary, JAMES THOMSON, the author of "The Seasons," and "The Castle of Indolence;" and several other scientific and literary men of great note, were in the same way constrained to seek the rewards of their talent and industry in the southern division of the island. BISHOP BURNET, the most eminent British historical writer of the age; ALEXANDER GORDON, the antiquarian; RAMSAY, the author of the "History of Turenne," and the "Travels of Cyrus;" BOWER, the able, but unprincipled, historian of the popes; and various other distinguished Scotchmen, had scarcely any other connection with their native land except the simple fact that they were born there. But the dawn of a better day was already visible, and ere long arose that brilliant galaxy of writers in almost every department of science and literature, who flourished in Scotland about the middle of the eighteenth century, and gave an impulse not only to intellectual pursuits, but also to agricultural and commercial industry, which has converted the barren wastes of their native land into fertile fields, and her poverty-stricken villages into populous and prosperous towns; and has enabled her hardy and enterprising sons to acquire wealth, power, and fame in every quarter of the world.

* Lord Woodhouselee's Essay on the Principles of Translation, p. 260. Pitcairne was the author of several medical works, which were highly commended by Boerhaave and Mead. He was at one time professor of physic in the University of Leyden.

APPENDIX.

NOTE A, p. 37.

The protestation of the Earls of Huntley and Argyll touching the murder of the King of Scots.

In this document the conversation mentioned in the text is narrated, and the inference is drawn from it that Moray must have been privy to the band subscribed by Bothwell and his accomplices for the murder of Darnley. The Regent met the accusation with the following explicit and indignant denial, dated the 19th of January, 1568 :—

"Because the custom of my adversaries is, and has been, rather to calumniate and backbite me in my absence than before my face, and that it may happen them when I am departit furth of this realm slanderouslie and untrewlie to report untruths of me, and namely towards some speeches haldin in my hearing at Craigmillar in the month of November, 1566. I have already declarit to the queen's majestie the effect of the hail purposes spoken in my audience at the time sincerely and trewlie, as I will answer to Almighty God. And, farther, in case any man will say and affirm that ever I was present when ony purposes was haldin at Craigmillar in my audience tending to ony unlawful or dishonourable end, or that ever I subscrivit ony band there, or that ony purpos was haldin anent the subscribing of ony band be me, to my knowledge, I avow they speak wickedlie and untrewlie, whilk I will maintain against them as becomes an honest man to the end of my life: onlie thus far the subscription of bandis by me is true, that indeed I subscrivit a band with the Earls of Huntley, Argyle, and Bothwell, in Edinburgh, at the beginning of October, 1566, whilk was devisit in sign of our reconciliation in respect of the former grudges and displeasures that had been amongst us; whereunto I was constrained to make promise before I could be admitted to the queen's presence, or have ony show of her favour, and there was never na other band either made or subscrivit, nor yet proponit to me in ony wise before the murther of the king; nowther yet after the murther would I ever for ony persuasion agree to the subscription of ony band, howbeit I was earnestlie urgit and pressit thairto be the queen's commandment."

In the alleged confession of Bothwell, Argyll himself is accused of complicity in the murder of Darnley.

NOTE B, p. 42.

Mary's Letters and Sonnets to Bothwell.

The Earl of Morton, by whom these letters and sonnets were produced, affirmed, on his word of honour, that they were found in a silver casket which his servants seized on the person of George Dalglish, one of the Earl of Bothwell's servants, who had brought them out of the Castle of Edinburgh. It was stated that "this casket was left in the Castle of Edinburgh by the Earl of Bothwell before his fleeing away, and he sent for it by one George Dalglish, his servant, who was taken by the Earl of Morton with this small gilt coffer, not fully a foot long, garnished in sundry places with the Roman letter F under a king's crown, wherein were certain letters and writings well known, and by others affirmed, to have been written with the Queen of Scots' own hand to the Earl of Bothwell;" and a promise of marriage, avowed to be written by the Queen of Scots herself, without date, but surmised to have been written before the death of her husband, Lord Darnley. On the Earl of Moray's return from the Continent, and elevation to the regency, the original letters and sonnets were put into his hands by Morton. Moray laid them before the privy-council and parliament of Scotland, in December, 1567, and subsequently before the English commissioners at York and Westminster. After his murder these documents passed successively into the custody of the Regents Lennox, Mar, and Morton. At Morton's death they fell into the hands of the Earl of Gowrie, and are known to have been in his possession in 1582; but they disappeared after Gowrie's execution in 1584, and in all probability fell into the power of James VI., who had strong reasons for destroying the proofs of his mother's guilt. At the time that the originals were laid before the English commissioners, translations were made both into Scotch and English. The former, which was word for word, was printed by George Buchanan at Westminster with the first few lines of the original French placed at the head of each of the letters. From this translation a new French version was made, which was printed at Edinburgh in 1572. The question of the genuineness of these letters has given rise to a keen and protracted controversy, in which Laing, Robertson, Reaumer, Mignet, and other historians take the affirmative; while Chalmers, the elder Tytler, Goodall, Whitaker, Bell, and Miss Strickland, affirm that these documents are spurious. It has been proved by incontrovertible evidence that the copies we now possess correspond with the alleged originals which were laid before the English commissioners. The Scottish privy-council, before which Moray produced the letters on the 4th of December, 1567, acknowledged that they were in the queen's own handwriting, calling them "her previe letters, writtin and subscrivit with her awen hand." The Scottish Parliament, which met ten days later, expressed a similar conviction; and though Argyll, Huntley, Herries, and other friends of Mary, were present, not one of them questioned the authenticity of these documents. And, finally, when they were laid before the conference at Westminster, in December, 1568, the English commissioners, after carefully collating these letters, with others which Mary had, on various occasions, written to Elizabeth, were of opinion that there was no difference between them. Earl Stanhope is of opinion that far the greater part of the letters and sonnets now produced were really written by Mary, and contain abundant proof of her blind infatuation for Bothwell, but that the passages which show her foreknowledge or participation in Darnley's murder were interpolated by her enemies. These passages nearly all occur in the first letter, which was written on several detached pages or loose pieces of paper, and therefore afforded peculiar facilities for interpolations. This opinion carries with it an air of great probability, and gets rid of the difficulties which are inseparable from either the entire admission, or the entire rejection of these documents. For a full account of the facts and arguments on both sides, see Laing's Historical Dissertation on the participation of Mary Queen of Scots in the Murder of Darnley; Principal Robertson's Dissertation on King Henry's Murder in the appendix to his History of Scotland; Mignet's History of Mary Queen of Scots, Appendix G; Goodall's Life of Queen Mary; and Miss Strickland's Lives of the Queens of Scotland, vol. v.

Mr. Tytler's account of the flight of Lutyni and the terror of Joseph Riccio, is quoted p. 39; but Miss Strickland has shown, from an intercepted letter written by Riccio to Lutyni, now in the State Paper Office, that the apprehensions of the former arose out of his attempt to throw upon Lutyni the blame of some peculations of his own, which had been discovered by the queen. See Lives of the Queens of Scotland, vol. v. pp. 107—110, and 195, 196.

Relying on the assertions of Blackwood, Miss Strickland, and other partizans of Mary, I have stated that David Riccio was advanced in years at the time of his death, but it turns out that, when he arrived in Scotland, in 1562, he was only twenty-eight years old, and when he was murdered he was little more than thirty-one years old.

NOTE C, p. 50.

Bothwell's Trial.

DRURY TO CECIL.

"Right Honourable, April 15th, 1567.

"The queen's majesty's letter directed to the Queen of Scots I received the 11th hereof, at x. of the clock, which forthwith I discharged by the Provost Marschal here, who in mine opinion was not the unmeetest I could choose for the purpose.

"He arrived at the court the 12th, at six in the morning, and then used his diligence immediately to deliver his letter, which he had in charge to the queen, attending some good space in court, procuring all that he might by the means of such as were near her person, who told him it was early, and that her majesty was asleep, and, therefore, advised him to tarry sometime thereabouts till she arose, which he did, going out of the court into the town, and shortly after returned, she being not yet risen, and, therefore, walked about till nine, or almost ten o'clock, when all the lords and gentlemen were assembled taking their horse; and then, thinking his opportunity aptest, going into the court as a little before he did (the contents of the letter he brought being conjectured and bruited to be for stay of the assize), was denied passage into the court in very uncourteous manner—not without some violence offered, which seeing he could not be permitted to have recourse as all other persons, whatsoever they were, he requested that some gentleman of credit would undertake faithfully to deliver his letter, from the queen's majesty of England, to the queen their sovereign, which none would seem to undertake.

"Upon this came to him the parson of Oldhamestock, surnamed Hepborne, who told him that the Earl Bodwell had sent him with this message, 'that the earl, understanding he had letters for the queen, would advise him to retire him to his ease, or about some other his business; for the queen was so molested and disquieted with the business of that day, that he saw no likelihood of any meet time to serve his turn till after the assize.'

"Then came the Lord of Skirling, who asked him if his letter were either from the council or the queen's majesty. He told him from the queen's majesty only. 'Then,' said he, 'ye shall be soon discharged;' and so, returning into the court, desired the said person to keep him company at the gate, which he did; and therewith espying a Scottish man, whom he had for his guide, took occasion to reprehend and threaten him of hanging for bringing English villains as sought to procure the stay of the assize, with words of more reproach.

"In this instant Ledington was coming out, and Bodwell with him, at the which all the lords and gentlemen mounted on horseback, till that Ledington came to him demanding him [of] the letter, which he delivered. Then Bodwell and he returned to the queen, and stayed there within half an hour, the whole troop of lords and gentlemen still on horseback, attending for his coming. Ledington seemed willing till have passed by the provost without any speech, but he pressed towards him, and asked him if the queen's majesty had perused the letter, and what service it would please her majesty to command him back again.

"He answered that as yet the queen was sleeping, and, therefore, had not delivered the letters, and thought that there would not be any meet time for it till after the assize, wherefore he willed him to attend; so giving place to the [throng] of people that passed, which was great, and by the estimation of men of good judgment, about four hundred gentlemen, besides others. The Earl Bodwell passed with a merry and lusty cheer, attended on with all the soldiers, being two hundred all harkebuzers, to the Tolbooth, and there kept the door, that none might enter but such as were more for the behoof of the one side than the other. The assize began between ten and eleven, and ended seven in the afternoon.

"The Earls of Argyll and Huntley [were] chief judges. What particularly was done or said there I cannot yet learn, more than that there were two advocates called Crawford and Cunningham, for the Earl of Lennox, who accused the Earl Bodwell for the murder of the king, alleging certain documents for the same, and desiring forty days' term longer, for the more perfect and readier collection of his proofs."

In another letter of Drury's, written about this time, there occurs the following statement respecting the murder of Darnley and the trial of Bothwell:—

"It was Capt. Cullen's persuasion for more surely to have the king strangled, and not only to trust to the train of powder, affirming he had known many so saved. Sir Andro Carr, with others, was on horseback near unto the place, for aid to the cruel enterprise if need had been. The Lady Coldingham, now wife to the young Mr. of Caithness, and sister to the Earl Bodwell, is in credit, and in the place of the Lady Reres, now out of court. Suspicion banished the one, and placed the other. I dare not say as others, that knows more, says.

"Great means were used to have had the Earl of Moray staid in the town till the cruel deed had been done. The Bishop of Glasco, Ambassador of Scotland in France, hath written to the queen, and to the others which the queen hath understanding of, that nothing likes her, of the death of the king. . . . The king was long of dying, and to his strength made debate for his life. The Lord David, son of the duke, is mad, and Arbroath, his brother, has already had a show of the same disease. . . . There accompanied the Earl of Moray to the boundary, his brother the Lord of Holyrood House, the Lord Hume, and the chief of the gentlemen of the March, and some of Lothian, as Brustone and others. The king would often read and sing the 55th Psalm, and went over it a few hours before his death. There were not many that he would of his grief deal with, but to some he would say that he should be slain, and complain him much of his being hardly dealt with. Even now by the under marshal I received this more. His own evil handling. He only kept out of the court, pushed out as it were by force, thrust upon the breast with extremity in the sight of divers gentlemen, which seemed much to mislike therewith.

"A bill set up, 'Farewell gentyll Henry, but a vengeance of Mary.' The queen sent a token and message to Bodwell, being at the assize. The queen, upon Thursday last, passed through the street unto the market, where there were women sitting that had to sell. They rysse as she came near, crying aloud, 'God save your grace, if you be sakeless of the king's deade' [of the king's death]. The queen's advocates, that should have inveighed against Bodwell, are much condemned for their silence. The like at an assize hath not been used. . . . Bodwell rode upon the courser that was the king's when he rode to the assize. The nobility long tarried his coming a horseback to accompany him. There was that followed him above four thousand, whereof the greatest part were gentlemen, besides they that were [in] the streets, which were more in number. The streets were full from the Canon-gate to the castle. Ledington and others told the under-marshal that the queen was asleep, when he himself saw her looking out at a window, showed him by one of La Croke's servants, a Frenchman, and Ledington's wife with her; and Bothwell, after he was on horseback, looked up, and she gave him a friendly nod for a farewell."

NOTE D, p. 51.

Murder of Darnley and behaviour of Bothwell.

DRURY TO CECIL.

Berwick, Feb. 28th, 1566, 1567.

"May it please your honour, &c. . . .

"There hath been other bills bestowed upon the church doors, as upon a tree called the Tron, wherein they speak of a smith who should make the key, and offers (as there might be assurance of the living that by proclamation was offered) he and others will with their bodies approve these to be the devisers, and upon the same venture their lives.

"There was at the meeting at Dunkeld, the Earls Moray, Morton, Atholl, and Caithness, the L. Oglebie, the L. Glamis, Lindsay, and others. Ino. Hepburn, sometime Capt. under the Earl Bodwell of the Hermitage, is thought to be one of the executors of this cruel enterprise; there is one Hugh Leader also suspected. I am promised to understand the certainty. His servant, Sandy Duram, a Scottish man, is thought also to know some part. I will not write of so much as the Scots speak themselves, and some of them of credit.

“The Earl of Bodwell was on Thursday at Edinburgh, where he openly declared, affirming the same by his oath, that if he knew who were the setters up of the bills and writings he would wash his hands in their blood. His followers, who are to the number of fifty, follow him very near. Their gesture, as his, is of the people much noted. They seem to go near and about him, as though there were that would harm him; and his hand, as he talks with any that is not assured unto him, upon his dagger, with a strange countenance as the beholders of him thinks. Even as the L. Darnley and his servant, Wm. Taylor, lay in the house in distance one from the other, even so, as also otherwise, were they found together. Signior Francis, as I hear, minds to pass this way within six or eight days.

“I send your lordship here the copy of some of the bills set up, whereby you may see how undutifully the doers of the same doth behave themselves against their sovereign. I have thought it my part as well to send you this, as I have done in the rest, for that I would, if you should so think meet, that her majesty my sovereign should understand all that comes to my knowledge of the proceedings in these parts. The Lady Bodwell is, I am by divers means informed, extremely sick, and not likely to live. They will say there she is marvellously swollen. Even now is brought me that the queen came upon Wednesday, at night, to the Lord Hawton's house, seven miles off this side, dined by the way at a place called Tranent, belonging to the Lord Seton, where he and the Earl of Huntley paid for the dinner, the queen and the Earl Bodwell having at a match of shooting won the same of them. There is a proclamation made in Edinburgh forbidding all persons for raising up any of the stones or timber at the house where the L. Darnley was murdered. There is one of Edinburgh that affirms how Mr. Jas. Bafourde bought of him powder as much as he should have paid three score pounds Scottish, but he must perforce* it with oyle to that value. Bafourde came to Edinburgh upon Wednesday, at night, accompanied to the tower with thirty horsemen. When he was near unto the tower he lighted, and came in a secret way; [one] is now come to me of this tower that saw him when he came: he is hateful to the people. This person of this tower also assures me that yesterday, being Thursday, before he departed thence, he saw a bill, having been set up the night before, where were these letters written in Roman hand, very great, M.R. L.B., with a mallet near them, which mallet they, in their writing, called a mell.”

* Perfume.

NOTE E, p. 80.

Narrative and confession of Bothwell.

At an early period of his imprisonment, Bothwell wrote a narrative of the leading events which terminated in his flight from Scotland in 1567, and of his subsequent adventures upon the coast of Norway. The original of this paper, which is written in old French, is preserved in the Royal Library at the Castle of Drotningholm, in Sweden. From an attestation upon the MSS. it appears to have been entrusted by Bothwell to the Chevalier de Dantzay, the French ambassador at the courts of Sweden and Denmark, for the purpose of being submitted to the King of Denmark. This interesting document has been published by the Bannatyne Club, under the title of “Les Affaires du Conte de Boduel.” The ambitious views of the Earl of Moray, the murder of Riccio and Darnley, the marriage of Bothwell with the queen, her surrender to the confederate nobles at Carberry Hill, and the flight of her husband, his adventures among the Orkney Isles and upon the shores of Norway, his imprisonment at Malmoe, and his unavailing efforts to induce the King of Denmark to assist in the liberation of Mary, form the prominent topics of the narrative. As might have been expected from the character of the author, it is throughout a tissue of falsehoods. He represents the queen and himself as equally innocent of the murder of Darnley, and accuses Moray and the other confederate lords of having planned and executed this crime, which they afterwards exerted all their malice and ingenuity to fix upon him.

It is alleged by the friends of Queen Mary that Bothwell, immediately before his death, emitted another and totally different confession, in which he acknowledged his own guilt, and exonerated Mary from all foreknowledge or participation in the murder of her husband. Mr. Laing and other writers on the opposite side have represented this alleged confession as a manifest forgery. No such document is now known to exist, but several professed abridgments of it have been given. If these accounts can be relied on, Bothwell, in the presence of several witnesses, “acknowledged himself guilty of the death of the late King Henry, and declared, in the most solemn terms, that the queen was innocent of it, himself with others of the nobles having contrived and executed it.” He named as his accomplices the Earls of Moray, Argyll, Crawford, Glencairn, Morton, Lord Boyd, Lethington, Buccleuch, and others, some of whom were Mary's most zealous supporters. He confessed himself also guilty of having studied necromancy from his youth, and of practising his black arts on the queen. The partizans of this unfortunate princess contend both that these accounts are authentic, and that Bothwell's second narrative is true; and they have all, except Miss Strickland, attempted to give it the weight of a death-bed confession, by representing Bothwell as having died immediately after he had thus avowed his own guilt and declared the innocence of the queen. This, however, is a mistake. The recent researches of some Danish antiquaries have shown that Bothwell lived two years after the date of his alleged confession, and that he died in the fortress of Draghsholm, 14th April, 1578, and was interred in the church of Faareveile, the parish church of Draghsholm. The name of this fortress has been changed to Adelersborg. It is situated on the northern coast of Zealand, between the towns of Holbek and Kallandsborg.

NOTE F, p. 253.

Credibility of the History edited by Crawford of Drumsoy.

The work referred to is styled "Memoirs of the Affairs in Scotland, containing a full and impartial account of the Revolution in that Kingdom, begun in 1667. Faithfully published from an authentic MS. by her Majesty's Historiographer for the Kingdom of Scotland." The editor of this work was David Crawford of Drumsoy, and the avowed purpose of the publication was to furnish an antidote to what he regarded as the pernicious tendency of Buchanan's Scottish history. He states that he had all the substance of the work from an ancient MS. presented to him by Sir James Baird of Saughton Hall, who purchased it by mere accident from the necessitous widow of an episcopal clergyman; and he affirms that he has compared the work with Spottiswood, Melvil, and Camden, and has marked in the margin how far the author agrees with these writers. He adds, "I declare solemnly I have not (that I know of) wrested any of his words to add to one man's credit or impair the honesty of another; and having no manner of dependence upon any party, I have neither heightened nor diminished any particular character or action, but kept as close as possible to his meaning and sense." On the faith of these assertions the "Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland" were received by the public as the genuine composition of a contemporary writer, and as such were unsuspectingly quoted by Mr. Hume and Dr. Robertson, and implicitly relied on by Goodall, Tytler, and Whitaker; whereas, as Mr Laing has proved, "these 'Memoirs' are a downright forgery. Having found a MS. history of the times, Crawford expunged every passage unfavourable to Mary, inserted every fact or assertion which he found in Camden, Spottiswood, or Melvil, whom he quotes on the margin as collateral authorities, and after thus compiling memoirs of his own, protests that, without wresting the words, he has adhered to the sense and meaning of the original." The manuscript which Crawford thus interpolated and falsified has since been published by the Bannatyne Club, under the title of "The Historie and Life of King James the Sext." The editor of it remarks that "it is visibly tinged with the colours of passion and party spirit; that, apparently, it is not the composition of a person actually concerned in the great events which he commemorates, or even very closely allied to the great actors in this eventful period of our annals." The unsupported statement of an anonymous writer of this class ought not to be received as evidence against a man like Regent Moray, especially when the object of the statement is to palliate or extenuate an atrocious crime which had brought deserved odium on the party by whom the assassin was encouraged and protected.

NOTE G, p. 504.

The Burning of Frendraught.

This incident is one of the most mysterious in the whole history of Scotland. It was connected with a feud which arose between Gordon of Rothiemay and Crichton of Frendraught, two gentlemen of Banffshire, in consequence of a dispute about the salmon fishings in the Doveran. Frendraught obtained a legal decision in his favour, and in attempting, with the aid of his neighbours, to execute the law upon his opponent, a rencontre took place on the 1st of January, 1630, in which Rothiemay was mortally wounded and several persons hurt on both sides. In revenge for his father's death, the young Laird of Rothiemay laid waste the lands of Frendraught, who found it necessary to appeal for protection to the king and the privy council. A commission, consisting of Sir Robert Gordon, and other influential gentlemen, was sent to stanch this bloody quarrel, which was at length effected with the aid of the Marquis of Huntley, who was chief to both parties. It was arranged that Frendraught was to pay fifty thousand marks to the widow of Rothiemay as compensation for the slaughter of her husband. "And so," says Sir Robert Gordon, "all parties having shaken hands in the orchard of Strathbogie, they were heartily reconciled."

In the course of the following autumn, a new mischance befell the unfortunate Frendraught. A gentleman named John Meldrum, who had assisted him in his affray with Rothiemay, quarrelled with him for not being sufficiently rewarded for his help on that occasion, and carried off two horses from Frendraught's lands. Meldrum then took refuge with his brother-in-law, Leslie of Pitcaple, and Frendraught repaired thither to reclaim his property. The result was a scuffle between the two parties, in which a son of Leslie's was wounded with a pistol shot. Frendraught immediately repaired to Bog an Gich Castle, the seat of the Marquis of Huntley, to entreat his intercession for the healing of this new quarrel, and was closely followed by Pitcaple at the head of thirty armed men, demanding vengeance for his son's wound. The marquis seems to have acted with great discretion. He refused to allow the two lairds to meet, and endeavoured to appease the wrath of Pitcaple by representing that Frendraught was not to blame for the hurt which his son had received. Pitcaple, however, went away vowing vengeance; and to avert another encounter the marquiss detained Frendraught all night, and next day sent him home under an escort commanded by his son, Viscount Melgum, accompanied by the young Laird of Rothiemay, so lately reconciled to Frendraught, and who, happening to be present on this occasion, generously offered to assist in protecting his former antagonist. The party reached Frendraught Castle in safety, and Lord Melgum and the rest of the escort accepted the invitation of the laird and his lady to remain for the night. After a merry supper they retired to rest. "The viscount," says Spalding, "was laid in ane bed in the old tower going off the hall, and standing upon a vault, wherein was ane round hole devised of old, just under his bed. Robert Gordon, his servitor, and English Will, his page, were both laid in the same chamber. The Laird of Rothiemay, with some servants beside him, was laid in another chamber just above Aboyne's (Melgum's) chamber; and in another room above that chamber were laid George Chalmers of Noth, and George Gordon, another of the viscount's servants. With them also was laid Captain Rolloch, then in Frendraught's own company. All being thus at rest, about midnight that dolorous tower took fire in so sudden and furious a manner, yea, and in ane clap, that the noble viscount, the Laird of Rothiemay, English Will, Colonel Wat, another of Aboyne's servants, and other two, being six in number, were cruelly burnt and tormented to the death without help or relief, the Laird of Frendraught, his lady, and haill household looking on without moving or stirring to deliver them from the fury of this fearful fire, as was reported. Robert Gordon, called Sutherland Gordon, being in the viscount's chamber, escaped this fire with the life. George Chalmers and Captain Rolloch, being in the third room, escaped this fire also; and, as was said, Aboyne might have saved himself, also, if he would have gone out of doors, which he would not do, but suddenly ran up stairs to Rothiemay's chamber, and wakened him to rise, and as he was awakening him the timber passage and lofting of the chamber hastily takes fire, so that none of them could run down stairs again; so they turned to a window looking to the close, where they piteously cried many times, 'Help! help! for God's cause.' The laird and lady with their servants, all seeing and hearing the woeful crying, made no help or manner of helping, which they perceiving, cried oftentimes mercy at God's hands for their sins, syne clasped in each other's arms, and cheerfully suffered their martyrdom. Thus died this noble viscount of singular expectation, Rothiemay, a brave youth, and the rest by this doleful fire."

Popular suspicion fell upon Frendraught and his lady, but evidently without just cause, for they had nothing to gain by a crime which in the circumstances of the case could not have been premeditated, and which from its atrocious character was certain to involve them in the most disastrous consequences; while all Frendraught's family papers, with much gold and silver, both in money and plate, to the value of a hundred thousand marks, were consumed in the fire. Four commissioners appointed by the privy council made strict inquiry on the spot into this lamentable catastrophe. They found that the fire had originated in the ground vault of the tower, where there were marks of it in three several places, one of these being directly under the round hole in the roof, which communicated with Melgum's apartment above; but they were unable to determine whether it was accidental. Meldrum, the quondam retainer of Frendraught, and brother-in-law of Pitcaple, was afterwards brought to trial on the charge of having set fire to the tower, and condemned and executed. But though he bore ill-will to Frendraught, and was proved to have uttered deadly threats against his life, his guilt is far from being clear. The Gordons, however, continued firmly persuaded that Frendraught himself had wilfully set fire to the tower, for the purpose of destroying the young Laird of Rothiemay; and taking the law into their own hands, wasted the estates of Frendraught time after time with fire and sword, until this family, which once possessed three parishes (Forgue, Inverkeithing, and Aberchirder), was reduced to poverty, and in seventy years "was stripped of all and extinguished."—See Chambers' Domestic Annals of Scotland, vol. ii. pp. 45—50, 76—79; and "The Burning of Frendraught," in Aytoun's Ballads of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 155.

NOTE H, p. 659.

Heart of Montrose.

The extraordinary fortunes of Montrose's heart are traced in a letter from the Right Hon. Sir Alexander Johnston, formerly Chief-Justice of Ceylon, which is dated July 1, 1836, and printed in the Appendix to Mr. Napier's Life of Montrose. According to Sir Alexander, the gold filigree box containing the heart of Montrose was in the possession of Francis, the fifth Lord Napier of Merchiston, and by him given, on his death-bed, to his eldest and favourite daughter, who afterwards became Mrs. Johnston and Sir Alexander's mother. She accompanied her husband to India, and during the voyage the gold box was struck by a splinter in action with a French frigate. "When in India," continues Sir Alexander, "my mother's anxiety about it gave rise to a report amongst the natives of the country that it was a talisman, and that whoever possessed it would never be wounded in battle or taken prisoner. Owing to this report it was stolen from her, and for some time it was not known what had become of it. At last she heard that it had been offered for sale to a powerful chief, who had purchased it for a large sum of money." This chief was the pollygar, or captain, of Pandlun-Courchy, a fort and district in the neighbourhood of Madura. Sir Alexander happened to pay him a visit, and induced him to restore the stolen property. It was again lost by Mr. and Mrs. Johnston at Boulogne, during the French Revolution, and was never recovered by them. "We can scarcely conceive a stranger turn of fate," says Earl Stanhope, "than that the same nerves and sinews which had throbbed to the eager pulse of a Scottish hero in the Highlands, should a century afterwards come to be worshipped as a talisman on an Indian idol shrine!"

NOTE I, p. 664.

Treatment of the Prisoners taken at Dunbar.

"Gentlemen,

Newcastle, Oct. 31st, 1650.

"I received your letter, dated the 26th October. In that you desire me that 2300 of the Scots prisoners, now at Durham or elsewhere, able and fit for foot service, be selected and marched thence to Chester and Liverpool, to be shipped for the south and west of Ireland; and that I should take special care not send any Highlanders: I am necessitated, upon receipt of this, to give you a full account concerning the prisoners.

"After the battle at Dunbar, in Scotland, my lord general wrote to me, that there were about 9000 prisoners, and that of them he had set at liberty all those that were wounded, and, as he thought, disabled for future service, and their number was, as Mr. Downing wrote, 5100. The rest the general sent to Newcastle, conducted to Berwick by Major Hopson, and from Berwick to Newcastle by some foot, out of that garrison, and a troop of horse.

"When they came to Morpeth, the prisoners being put into a large walled garden, they eat up raw cabbages, leaves and roots, so many, as the very seed and labour, at 4d. a day was valued at £9, which cabbage (they having fasted, as they themselves said, near eight days) poisoned their bodies; for as they were coming from thence to Newcastle, some died by the way-side. When they came to Newcastle, I put them into the greatest church in the town; and the next morning, when I sent them to Durham, about 140 were sick and not able to march; three died that night, and some fell down in their march from Newcastle to Durham, and died. I having sent my lieutenant-colonel and my major with a strong guard both of horse and foot, they being there told into the great cathedral church, were counted to no more than 3000, although Colonel Fenwick wrote to me that there were about 3500. But I believe they were not told at Berwick, and as to most of those that were lost, it was in Scotland; for I heard that the officers who marched with them to Berwick, were necessitated to kill about thirty, fearing the loss of them all, for they fell down in great numbers, and said they were not able to march, and they brought them far in the night, so that doubtless many ran away.

"When I sent them first to Durham, I wrote to the mayor, and desired him to take care that they wanted for nothing that was fit for prisoners; and what he should disburse for them I would repay it. I also sent them a daily supply of bread from Newcastle, and an allowance equal to what had been given to former prisoners; but their bodies being infected, the flux increased among them. I sent many officers to look to them, and ordered those who were sick to be removed out of the cathedral church into the Bishop's Castle, which belongs to Mrs. Blackiston. Cooks were provided, and they had pottage made with oatmeal, beef and cabbage, a full quart at a meal for every prisoner. They had also coals daily brought them, as many as made about 100 fires both night and day, and straw to lie upon. I appointed the marshal to see all these things orderly done, and he was allowed eight men to help him to divide the coals, meat, bread, and pottage equally. They were so unruly, sluttish, and nasty, that it is not to be believed; they acted rather like beasts than men, so that the marshal was allowed forty men of the lustiest prisoners to cleanse and sweep them every day, who had some small thing given them extraordinary. The above provisions were for those that were in health; as to those that were sick and in the castle, they had very good mutton broth, and sometimes veal broth, and beef and mutton boiled together, and old women appointed to look to them in the several rooms: there was also a physician to let them blood, and dress such as were wounded, and give the sick physic, and I dare confidently say, there was never the like care taken for any such number of prisoners in England.

"Notwithstanding all this many of them died, and few of any other disease than the flux; some were killed by themselves, for they were exceeding cruel one towards another. If any man was perceived to have any money, it was two to one lest he was killed before morning, and robbed; and if any had good cloaths, he that wanted, if he was able, would strangle the other and put on his cloaths.

"The disease of the flux still increasing among them, I was then forced, for their preservation, if possible it might be, to send to all the next towns in Durham, within four or five miles, to command them to bring in their milk, for that was conceived to be the best remedy for stopping of their flux; and I promised them what rates they usually sold it for at the markets, which was accordingly performed by about sixty towns and places. Twenty of the next towns to Durham continue to send daily in their milk, which is boiled, some with water, some with bean flower, the physicians holding it exceeding good for the recovery of their health.

"Gentlemen, you cannot but think strange of this long preamble, and wonder what the matter will be. In short, it is this: out of the 3000 prisoners that my officers told into the cathedral church at Durham, 300 of them, and fifty from Newcastle, of the 140 left behind, were delivered by Major Clarke, by order of the council; there are about 500 sick in the castle, and about 600 yet in health in the cathedral, the most of which are, in all probability, Highlanders, they being hardier than the rest; and we have no other means to distinguish them. About 1600 are dead and buried, and about sixty officers are at the marshal's in Newcastle.

"My lord-general, having released the rest of the officers, and the council having given me power to make what men I thought fit, I have granted to several well-affected persons that have salt-works at Shields, and want servants, forty; they have engaged to keep them at work at their salt-pans, and I have taken out about twelve more weavers to begin a trade of linen-cloth, like the Scots cloth, and about forty labourers.

"I cannot give you on a sudden a more exact account of the prisoners, neither can any account hold true long, because they still die daily, and doubtless so they will, so long as any remain in prison. And for those that are well, if Major Clarke could have believed that they had been able to have marched on foot, he would have marched them by land; but we perceive that divers that are seemingly healthy, and have not at all been sick, suddenly die; and we cannot give any reason for it, only we apprehend they are all infected, and that the strength of some holds it out till it reaches their very hearts.

"Now you fully understand the condition and number of the prisoners. What you please to direct I shall observe, and intend not to proceed further upon this letter until I have your answer upon what I have now written.

"I am,

"Your most affectionate servant,

"AR. HASELRIGGE."

NOTE K, p. 664.

Correspondence between Cromwell and the Scottish Ministers in the Castle of Edinburgh.

"FOR THE HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR OF THE CASTLE OF EDINBURGH.

"Sir, Edinburgh, September 9th, 1650.

"I received command from my lord general to desire you to let the ministers of Edinburgh, now in the castle with you, know that they have free liberty granted them, if they please to take the pains, to preach in their several churches; and that my lord hath given special command both to officers and soldiers, that they shall not in the least be molested.

"I am, sir,

"Your most humble servant,

"EDWARD WHALLEY."

"TO COMMISSARY-GENERAL WHALLEY.

"Sir, Edinburgh Castle, September 9th, 1650.

"I have communicated the desire of your letter to such of the ministers of Edinburgh as are with me, who have desired me to return this for answer.

"That though they are ready to bespent in their Master's service, and to refuse no suffering so they may fulfil their ministry with joy, yet, perceiving the persecution to be personal by the practice of your party upon the ministers of Christ in England and Ireland, and in the kingdom of Scotland since your unjust invasion thereof; and finding nothing expressed in yours whereupon to build any security for their persons while they are there, and for their return hither; they are resolved to reserve themselves for better times, and to wait upon Him who hath hidden His face for a while from the sons of Jacob.

"This is all I have to say, but that

"I am, sir,

"Your most humble servant,

"W. DUNDAS."

"FOR THE HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR OF THE CASTLE OF EDINBURGH, THESE.

"Sir,

Edinburgh, September 9th, 1650.

"The kindness offered to the ministers with you was done with ingenuity, thinking it might have met with the like; but I am satisfied to tell those with you, that, if their Master's service (as they call it) were chiefly in their eye, imagination of suffering would not have caused such a return; much less 'would' the practice of our party, as they are pleased to say, upon the ministers of Christ in England have been an argument of personal persecution. The ministers of England are supported, and have liberty to preach the Gospel, though not to rail, nor, under the pretence thereof, to overtop the civil power, or debase it as they please. No man hath been troubled in Ireland for preaching the Gospel; nor has any minister been molested in Scotland since the coming of the army hither. The speaking of truth becomes the ministers of Christ.

"When ministers pretend to a Glorious Reformation, and lay the foundation thereof in getting to themselves worldly power; and can make worldly mixtures to accomplish the same, such as their late agreement with their king; and hope by him to carry on their design, 'they' may know that the Sion promised will not be built by such untempered mortar.

"As for the unjust invasion they mention, time was when an army of Scotland came into England, not called by the supreme authority. We have said in our papers with what hearts and upon what account we come; and the Lord hath heard us, though you would not, upon as solemn an appeal as any experience can parallel.

"And although they seem to comfort themselves with being sons of Jacob, from whom (they say) God hath hid his face for a time, yet it is no wonder when the Lord hath lifted up his hand so eminently against a family as he hath done so against this, and men will not see His hand—it is no wonder if the Lord will hide His face from such, putting them to shame both for it and their hatred of His people, as it is this day. When they purely trust to the Sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God, which is powerful to bring down strongholds and every imagination that exalts itself,—which alone is able to square and fit the stones for the New Jerusalem,—then, and not before, and by that means and no other, shall Jerusalem, the City of the Lord, which is to be the praise of the whole earth, be built; the Sion of the Holy One of Israel.

"I have nothing to say, but that

"I am, sir,

"Your humble servant,

"OLIVER CROMWELL."

"TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORD CROMWELL, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE ENGLISH ARMY.

"My Lord, Edinburgh Castle, September 9th, 1650.

"Yours I have communicated to those with me whom it concerned, who desire me to return this answer:

"That their ingenuity in prosecuting the ends of the Covenant, according to their vocation and place, and in adhering to their first principles, is well known; and one of their greatest regrets is that they have not been met with the like. That when ministers of the Gospel have been imprisoned, deprived of their benefices, sequestered, forced to flee from their dwellings, and bitterly threatened for their faithful declaring the will of God against the Godless and wicked proceedings of men, it cannot be accounted an imaginary fear of suffering in such as are resolved to follow the like freedom and faithfulness in discharge of their Master's message. That it savours not of ingenuity to promise liberty of preaching the Gospel, and to limit the preachers thereof, that they must not speak against the sins and enormities of civil powers; since their commission carrieth them to speak the word of the Lord unto, and to reprove the sins of persons of all ranks, from the highest to the lowest. That to impose the name of 'railing' upon such faithful freedom, was the old practice of malignants against the ministers of the Gospel, who laid open to the people the wickedness of their ways, lest men should be ensnared thereby.

"That their consciences bear them record, and all their hearers do know, that they meddle not with civil affairs farther than to hold forth the rule of the Word, by which the straightness and crookedness of men's actions are made evident. But they are sorry they have such cause to regret that men of mere civil place and employment should usurp the calling and employment of the ministry, to the scandal of the reformed kirks, and particularly in Scotland, contrary to the government and discipline therein established,—to the maintenance whereof you are bound by Solemn League and Covenant.

"Thus far they have thought fit to vindicate their return to the offer in Colonel Whalley's letter. The other part of yours which concerns the public as well as them, they conceive hath all been answered sufficiently in the public papers of the State and Kirk. Only to that of the success upon your 'solemn appeal,' they say again what was said to it before, That they have not so learned Christ as to hang the equity of their cause upon events, but desire to have their hearts established in the love of the truth in all the tribulations that befall them.

"I do only add that "I am, my lord,

"Your most humble servant,

"W. DUNDAS."

"FOR THE GOVERNOR OF THE EDINBURGH CASTLE, THESE.

"Sir,

Edinburgh, September 12th, 1650.

"Because I am at reasonable good leisure, I cannot let such gross mistakes and unconsequential reasonings pass without some notice taken of them. And first, their ingenuity in relation to the Covenant for which they commend themselves, doth no more justify their want of ingenuity in answer to Colonel Whalley's Christian offer, concerning which my letter charged them with guiltiness 'and' deficiency, than their bearing witness to themselves of their adhering to their first principles, and ingenuity in persecuting the ends of the Covenant, justifies them so to have done merely because they say so. They must give more leave henceforwards, for Christ will have it so,—nill they, will they,—and they must have patience to have the truth of their doctrines and sayings tried by the sure touchstone of the Word of God. And if there be a liberty and duty of trial, there is a liberty of judgment also for them that may and ought to try; which, being so, they must give others leave to think and say that they can appeal to equal judges, Who have been the truest fulfillers of the most real and equitable ends of the Covenant?

"But if these gentlemen do assume to themselves to be the infallible expositors of the Covenant, as they do too much to their auditories, 'to be the infallible expositors' of the Scriptures 'also,' counting a different sense and judgment from theirs—breach of covenant and heresy—no marvel they judge of others so authoritatively and severely. But we have not so learned Christ. We look at ministers as helpers of, not lords over, God's people. I appeal to their consciences, whether any person trying their doctrines, and dissenting, shall not incur the censure of Sectary? And what is this but to deny Christians their liberty, and assume the Infallible Chair? What doth he whom we would not be likened unto (the Pope) do more than this?

"In the second place, it is affirmed that 'the ministers of the Gospel have been imprisoned, deprived of their benefices, sequestered, forced to fly from their dwellings, and bitterly threatened, for their faithful declaring of the will of God;' that they have been limited that they might not 'speak against the sins and enormities of the civil powers;' that to 'impose the name of railing upon such faithful freedom, was the old practice of malignants against the preachers of the Gospel,' &c. Now, if the civil authority, or that part of it which continued faithful to their trust, 'and' true to the ends of the Covenant, did, in answer to their consciences, turn out a tyrant, in a way which the Christians in after times will mention with honour, and all tyrants in after times look at with fear; and 'if' while many thousands of saints in England rejoice to think of it, and have received from the hand of God a liberty from the like usurpations, and have cast off him who trod in his father's steps, doing mischief as far as he was able (whom you have received like fire into your bosom,—of which God will, I trust, in time make you sensible); if, 'I say,' ministers railing at the civil power, and calling them murderers and the like for doing these things, have been dealt with as you mention, will this be found a 'personal persecution?' Or is sin so, because they say so? They that acted this great business have given a reason of their faith in the action; and some are here ready further to do it against all gainsayers.

"But it will be found that these reprovers do not only make themselves the judges and determiners of sin, that so they may reprove; but they also took liberty to stir up the people to blood and arms, and would have brought a war upon England, as hath been upon Scotland, had not God prevented it. And if such severity as hath been expressed towards them be worthy of the name of 'personal persecution,' let all uninterested men judge; 'and' whether the calling of the practice 'railing' be to be paralleled with the malignants' imputation upon the ministers, for speaking against the Popish innovations in the Prelates' times, and the 'other' tyrannical and wicked practices then on foot, let your own consciences mind you!

"The Roman emperors, in Christ and his apostles' times, were usurpers and intruders upon the Jewish state; yet what footstep have ye either of our blessed Saviour's so much as willingness to the dividing of an inheritance, or their 'ever' meddling in that kind? This was not practised by the church since our Saviour's time, till Antichrist, assuming the Infallible Chair, and all that he called church to be under him, practised this authoritatively over civil governors. The way to fulfil your ministry with joy, is to preach the Gospel, which I wish some who take pleasure in reproofs at a venture, do not forget too much to do!

"Thirdly, you say, you have just cause to regret that men of civil employments should usurp the calling and employment of the ministry, to the scandal of the reformed kirk. Are you troubled that Christ is preached? Is preaching so exclusively your function? Doth it scandalise the Reformed Kirks, and Scotland in particular? Away with the Covenant, if this be so! I thought the Covenant, and these 'professors of it,' could have been willing that any should speak good of the name of Christ; if not, it is no covenant of God's approving; nor are these kirks you mention in so much the spouse of Christ. Where do you find in the Scripture a ground to warrant such an assertion, that preaching is exclusively your function? Though an approbation from men hath order in it, and may do well, yet he that hath no better warrant than that, hath none at all. I hope He that ascended up on high may give His gifts to whom He pleases; and if those gifts be the seal of mission, be not 'you' envious though Eldad and Medad prophesy. You know who bids us covet earnestly the best gifts, but chiefly that we may prophesy; which the apostle explains there to be a speaking to instruction, and edification, and comfort,—which speaking, the instructed, the edified and comforted, can best tell the energy and effect of, 'and say whether it is genuine.' If such evidence be, I say again, take heed you envy not for your own sakes, lest you be guilty of a greater fault than Moses reproved in Joshua for envying for his sake.

"Indeed, you err through mistaking the Scriptures. Approbation is an act of convenience in respect of order; not of necessity, to give faculty to preach the Gospel. Your pretended fear lest error should step in, is like the man who would keep all the wine out of the country lest men should be drunk. It will be found an unjust and unwise jealousy, to deprive a man of his natural liberty upon a supposition he will abuse it. When he doth abuse it, judge. If a man speak foolishly, ye suffer him gladly, because ye are wise; if erroneously, the truth more appears by your conviction 'of him.' Stop such a man's mouth by sound words which cannot be gainsayed. If he speak blasphemously, or to the disturbance of the public peace, let the civil magistrate punish him; if truly, rejoice in the truth. And if you will call our speakings together since we came into Scotland, to provoke one another to love and good works, to faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and repentance from dead works; 'and' charity and love towards you to pray and mourn for you, and for your better returns to 'our love of you,' and your incredulity of our professions of love to you, of the truth of which we have made our solemn and humble appeals to the Lord our God, which He hath heard and borne witness to; if you will call things scandalous to the kirk, and against the Covenant, because done by men of civil callings, we rejoice in them, notwithstanding what you say.

"For a conclusion: In answer to the witness of God upon our solemn appeal, you say you have not so learned Christ 'as' to hang the equity of your cause upon events. We, 'for our part,' could wish blindness have not been upon your eyes to all those marvellous dispensations which God hath lately wrought in England. But did you not solemnly appeal and pray? Did not we do so too? And ought not you and we to think, with fear and trembling, of the hand of the Great God, in this mighty and strange appearance of His, instead of slightly calling it an 'event!' Were not both your and our expectations renewed for time to time, whilst we waited upon God, to see which way He would manifest Himself upon our appeals? and shall we, after all these our prayers, fastings, tears, expectations, and solemn appeals, call these bare 'events?' The Lord pity you.

"Surely we, 'for our part,' fear; because it hath been a merciful and gracious deliverance to us. I beseech you in the bowels of Christ, search after the mind of the Lord in it towards you, and we shall help you by our prayers, that you may find it out; for yet (if we know our hearts at all) our bowels do, in Christ Jesus, yearn after the godly in Scotland. We know there are stumbling-blocks which hinder you: the personal prejudices you have taken up against us and our ways, wherein we cannot but think some occasion has been given, and for which we mourn; the apprehension you have that we have hindered the glorious Reformation you think you were upon; I am persuaded these and such like bind you up from an understanding and yielding to the mind of God in this great day of His power and visitation. And, if I be rightly informed, the late blow you received is attributed to profane counsels and conduct, and mixtures in your army, and such like. The natural man will not find out the course. Look up to the Lord, that he may tell it you; which that He would do, shall be the fervent prayer of "Your loving friend and servant,

"OLIVER CROMWELL."

NOTE L, p. 730.

Murder of John Brown of Priesthill.

Mr. Aytoun, in his Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers, has presumed to take Lord Macaulay to task for his account of this dastardly murder, and to deny that any such crime was ever perpetrated by Claverhouse. "For thirty-three years after the revolution," he says, "the details of this atrocious murder were never revealed to the public. Nowhere in print or pamphlet, memoir, history or declaration, published previously to Wodrow, does even the name of John Brown occur, save once in the Cloud of Witnesses, a work which appeared in 1714; and in that work no details are given, the narrative being comprehended in a couple of lines. I have searched for it amidst all the records of the so-called Martyrology, but cannot find a trace of it elsewhere until the Rev. Robert Wodrow thought fit to place the tale, with all its circumstantiality, in his History. . . . Claverhouse had enemies enough to insure the circulation of such a damning tale, supposing it to have been true, long before he had lain for two and thirty years in his grave. He was not without eulogists, whose tribute to his memory was as gall and wormwood to their opponents, and in whose teeth most assuredly the details of such a dastardly and unprovoked murder would have been cast. Yet no man charged him with it. More than a generation passed away, the two kingdoms had been united, and Mar's insurrection quelled, before the miracle-mongering minister of Eastwood ventured, upon no documentary authority at all, to*

* Wodrow was both an honest man and a singularly painstaking and candid writer. But Mr. Aytoun attempts to discredit his testimony, because, like most men of his age, he was a believer in witches, and in the stories respecting the personal appearances of the devil: an objection which applies equally to Dr. Johnson, and to some of the most eminent men our country has produced.

concoct and publish the story which Mr. Macaulay has adopted without scruple."—Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers, p. 334.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to characterize properly these astounding statements, without employing epithets inconsistent with the courtesies of literary controversy. In the first place, Mr. Aytoun charges Wodrow with "concocting" the story upon "no documentary authority at all," and yet admits that he had read the Cloud of Witnesses (published seven years before Wodrow's History), in which the story of the Priesthill tragedy is inserted in the following terms:—"The said Claverhouse, in May 1685, apprehended John Brown in Priesthill, in the parish of Moorkirk, in the shire of Ayr, being at work about his own house, and shot him dead before his own door, in the presence of his wife." Secondly, Mr. Aytoun affirms that "nowhere in print or pamphlet, memoir, history, or declaration published previously to Wodrow, does even the name of John Brown occur, save once in the Cloud of Witnesses." Mr. Aytoun thus admits that he has read the work here referred to, and it expressly quotes as its authority, "a Print intituled 'A Short Memorial of the Sufferings and Grievances of the Presbyterians in Scotland,' printed in the year 1690," in which the murder of John Brown, in 1685, occupies a conspicuous place among the barbarities perpetrated by Claverhouse. Again, in an appendix to the celebrated "Answer to the Scotch Presbyterian Eloquence," published in 1693, there is a "list of those murdered in cold blood without trial, conviction, or any colour of law," and among these we find the following:—"May, 1685, the said Graeme of Claverhouse shot John Brown of Priesthill, in the parish of Moorkirk, in the shire of Air, as at his work before his own door, in presence of his wife." Mr. Aytoun speaks once and again of this story having been derived solely from tradition; whereas Wodrow expressly states, not only that his account of John Brown's character was derived from "people of sense and credit yet alive who knew him," but that his narrative of the murder was compiled from "informations" or written documents; and accordingly there is, in another hand than Wodrow's, a written account of the murder preserved among the historian's MSS. in the library of the Faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh.

A minute account of the death of the Christian carrier is given by Patrick Walker, the travelling pedlar, whose biographies of Peden, Cameron, Cargill, and other leading covenanters, were long highly prized by the Scottish peasantry. Mr. Aytoun affirms that Walker, who received his information respecting Brown from his wife, while "sitting upon her husband's gravestone, utterly contradicts Wodrow and his follower, Mr. Macaulay, in every important particular relative to the details,"—a statement nearly as wide of the truth as the other assertions of Mr. Aytoun respecting this tragedy. So far from contradicting, the two narratives corroborate each other in a very remarkable manner. "They both agree as to the date—the identity of the man murdered—his character and occupation—the work he was engaged in when Claverhouse and his troop surrounded him—the carrying him back to his own door—his prayer before his death—his wife standing by with her child in her arms—her address to Graham when all was over, and his profane reply." They differ in one particular only. Wodrow says Claverhouse himself shot Brown, while Walker says he was killed by the soldiers. As the narrative of the latter was derived from Brown's wife, it is probable that, as she "was in danger of faint," and "her eyes were dazzled," when her husband's life was taken, she could not tell distinctly from whom the shot came, and may have fallen into a mistake regarding this circumstance. But it matters nothing to the point in dispute, or to the character of the murder itself, whether the fatal shot was fired by Claverhouse himself, or by the soldiers who were but his tools, and bound by military law to obey his commands. "Whichever way it be taken, it is the same cold, passionless, remorseless murder, which it is a disgrace to British literature and to the civilization of our age and country to defend."

Sir Walter Scott, whose idolatry of Claverhouse and hatred of the covenanters has left a deep stain on his memory, attempts to palliate this deed by alleging that Brown was a rebel. He omits to state, however, that the sole act of rebellion which Brown committed, was his refusal to hear the episcopal ministers, and his affording refuge to the persecuted covenanters. Mr. Aytoun, following in Sir Walter's wake, talks of Brown being a "rebel" and "an outlaw," and refers to the fact that his name appears in a list of fugitives from the persecution of the High Commission Court, though he takes care to omit from his quotation the statement of Brown's offence as being "for reset"—that is, for harbouring the persecuted covenanters. Even though Brown had been justly proclaimed a rebel and an outlaw, Claverhouse had no authority, either from the common law of Scotland, or from any special warrant, to put him to death. The proclamation issued by the privy council to which Mr. Aytoun refers, merely requires the lieges "not only not to comfort or harbour the said persons, but likewise to do their utmost endeavours to apprehend them as far as in their power." Mr. Aytoun speaks of "the act against conventicles, which has been so much abused;" it would not be easy to abuse over much this infamous act, which declared that all who should preach in houses or in the fields, and all hearers in the fields of the presbyterian ministers, should be punished with death. But this act furnished no authority to Claverhouse for the murder of the "Christian carrier;" for, as Mr. Aytoun is compelled to admit, it was not passed until several days after the date of that event.

Mr. Aytoun is exceedingly wroth with Lord Macaulay for terming Claverhouse "rapacious." "Rapacity," he says, "is a new charge. The worst foe of Claverhouse never yet hinted that there was anything mean or sordid in his disposition. No instance of bribery can be alleged against him; he levied no contributions; and, with every opportunity in his reach of amassing a large fortune, he died in comparative poverty. I am certain that no man really acquainted with Scottish history will gainsay me in this; and as this particular charge has been brought forward without a shadow of authority to support it, I can only express my regret that an author who can write so well should be so reckless in the choice of his epithets." These statements are certainly of a very extraordinary kind, and Mr. Aytoun can escape conviction of the crime of wilful falsehood only by pleading guilty to the scarcely more venial offence of gross and wilful ignorance. The notorious rapacity of Claverhouse has been mentioned by every writer who enters into the history of these dismal times. Lauder of Fountainhall, a judge of the Court of Session, and no friend to the covenanters, has given, in his "Historical Notices of Scottish Affairs," a most vivid picture of the exactions of this bloody persecutor, and the mingled meanness and ferocity by which his conduct was marked. He spoiled the houses of his wretched victims, and exacted the uttermost farthing of the fines imposed upon them. He released some of those whom he had imprisoned for nonconformity, on receiving from them bonds for the payment of 1000 marks a-piece. Having obtained a gift of the forfeited estate of McDougal of Freuch, he was not contented with grasping the property of this unfortunate gentleman, but raised suits for the recovery of debts which had been due to him, and to which, under the gift of forfeiture, the rapacious persecutor had acquired a right. Sir John Dalrymple, and some others of the county gentlemen of Galloway, indignant at these oppressive proceedings, endeavoured to protect their tenants from the exactions of Claverhouse, and Sir John, as heritable bailie of the district, inflicted small fines on the persons accused of absenting themselves from the church, in order to rescue them from the clutches of their oppressor; Claverhouse, in consequence, presented a complaint to the privy council against Sir John, whom he accused of stirring up disaffection by his lenity, and of imposing "mock fynes upon delinquents, not the fiftieth or sixtieth part of what the law appointed, only to prevent Claverhouse's fynes, . . . and had misrepresented him as one who had cheated the king's treasury, in exacting the fynes of heirs and not counting for them; at least falsely giving in a charge to the exchequer far below his intromissions." This charge was strictly true. The crown officers were actually compelled to resort to legal proceedings in order to make him disgorge the forfeited possessions of the covenanters which he was bound to have paid into the exchequer, as, in law, they belonged to the crown until they were gifted away. Not contented with plundering the covenanters, this "honourable man," Lord Fountainhall tells us, tried to cheat his brother persecutor, the Chancellor Queensberry, out of the Barony of Dudhope and Constabulary of Dundee, which had been gifted to Queensberry on condition that he should sell it to Claverhouse at twenty years' purchase. Claverhouse tried to get rid of this portion of the bargain by telling a deliberate falsehood (for which he was reprimanded in open court), to the effect that Queensberry had agreed to give him the estate for nothing. So much for the integrity and generosity of this "man of high and chivalrous honour," whose worst foe, according to Mr. Aytoun, "never yet hinted that there was anything mean or sordid in his disposition."

Mr. Aytoun speaks in glowing terms of the tributes which certain eulogists paid to the memory of Claverhouse. The exact amount of credit due to these tributes, is shown by the following specimen, which proceeds from the author of the "Memoirs of Sir Ewen Cameron:"—"There was no part of the Belles Lettres which he [Graham] had not studied with great care and exactness; he was much master in the epistolary way of writing." Mr. Aytoun, too, speaks of the "accomplishments" of the "noble stripling," Claverhouse; the extent and value of which may be learned from the following specimens of his "epistolary way of writing:"—

"My Lord,—They tell me that the one end of the bridge of Dumbfrich is in Galaua, and that they may hold conventicles at our nose; we not dare to dissipat them, seeing our orders confines us to Dumfriche and Anandell."

"Everybody gave out that house for a bayr, but when they saw that ther was no quarter for it, and that we was com on the place, nobody had the impudence to deny it to have been built a purpose for meeting, and that upon the expence of the comon purse of the disaffected.

"They wer not preaching, and had got away all there women and shildring, . . . but, in end they perceiving that we had the better of them in skirmish, they resolved a generall engadgment, and imediately advanced with there foot, the horse folouing; they came throught the lotehe, and the greatest body of all made up against my troupe."*—(Abridged from an article on "Claverhouse, by Macaulay and Aytoun," in the North British Review, vol. xiii.)

NOTE M, p. 765.

Trial and Execution of Thomas Aikenhead.

Lord Macaulay has narrated this, the only instance of capital punishment for blasphemy in Scotland, in very exaggerated terms, and has done injustice especially to the ministers of Edinburgh, in stating the part which he alleges they took in this tragic incident. He accuses them of being deaf to the entreaties of the miserable youth when he entreated, not for pardon, but for a little more time to receive their instructions, and to pray to Heaven for mercy; of demanding not only the poor boy's death, but his speedy death, though it should be his eternal death, and of crying out even from their pulpits for cutting him off. And he winds up his account of the execution with this statement, "The preachers, who were the boy's murderers, crowded round him at the gallows, and while he was struggling in his last agony insulted Heaven with prayers more blasphemous than anything that he had uttered. Wodrow has told no blacker story of Dundee." The greater part of these charges rest upon no authority whatever. The eloquent and imaginative writer refers to the "Postman" and "Howell's State Trials" as the sources from which his narrative is drawn. The former makes no mention of the ministers, except that several of them assisted Aikenhead in his last moments, and that before leaving the prison they prayed with him at his own request. Howell quotes a passage from a private letter, which states that "it was told it (the reprieve) could not be granted unless the ministers would intercede; but they, out of a pious, though I think ignorant zeal, spoke and preached for cutting him off." This report, for it is nothing more, is flatly contradicted by a statement in the preface to "Two Discourses by William Lorimer," preached at the time of Aikenhead's execution, which shows the part the ministers really took in this unhappy affair. "I am sure," says Mr. Lorimer, "the ministers of the Established Church used him with an affectionate tenderness, and took much pains with him to bring him to faith and repentance, and to save his soul; yea, and some of the ministers, to my certain knowledge, and particularly the late reverend, learned, prudent, peaceable, and pious Mr. George Meldrum, then minister of the Tron Church, interceded for him with the government, and solicited for his pardon; and when that could not be obtained, he desired a reprieve for him, and I joined with him in it. This was the day before his execution. The chancellor was willing to have granted him a reprieve, but could not do it without the advice of the privy council and the judges; and to show his willingness he called the council and the judges, who debated the matter, and then carried it by plurality of votes for his execution, according to the sentence of the judges, that there might be a stop put to that contagion of blasphemy."

* Letters of John Graham of Claverhouse. Printed for the Bannatyne Club.

The execution of this wretched youth cannot be justified, but it is certainly unfair to judge the men of 1696 by the standard of 1856, or to assert, as Macaulay has done, that the Scottish legislators of the former period had "understandings as dark, and hearts as obdurate as those of the familiars of the Inquisition at Lisbon," because, in common with the wisest and best of their contemporaries in England and other countries, they persecuted witches, and in one solitary instance carried into effect the law which made blasphemy a capital crime. The lord-chancellor at this time was Lord Polwarth (formerly Sir Patrick Hume), whom Macaulay leaves no opportunity of vituperating, and says that Aikenhead's condemnation was "the worst action of his bad life." It will be seen from the above statement of Mr. Lorimer, that the chancellor was willing to have granted Aikenhead a reprieve, but was outvoted by the majority of the privy council and judges.

NOTE N, p. 779.

Lord Stair's daughter, the Hon. Janet Dalrymple, termed "the Bride of Baldoon."

The tragic story of this lady has been immortalized by the genius of Sir Walter Scott, but in its actual circumstances it is scarcely less affecting than in fiction. She had engaged herself, without the knowledge of her parents, to the Lord Rutherford, who was not acceptable to them, either on account of his political principles, or his want of fortune. The young couple broke a piece of gold together, and pledged their troth in the most solemn manner; and it is said the young lady imprecated the most dreadful evils on herself should she break her plighted faith.

Shortly after a suitor who was favoured by Lord Stair, and still more so by his lady, paid his addresses to Miss Dalrymple. The young lady refused the proposal, and, being pressed on the subject, confessed her secret engagement. Lady Stair, a lady accustomed to universal submission (for even her husband did not dare to contradict her), treated this objection as a trifle, and insisted upon her daughter yielding her consent to marry the new suitor, David Dunbar, son and heir to David Dunbar of Baldoon, in Wigtonshire. The first lover, a man of very high spirit, then interfered by letter, and insisted on the right he had acquired by his troth plighted with the young lady.

Lady Stair sent him for answer, that her daughter, sensible of her undutiful behaviour in entering into a contract unsanctioned by her parents, had retracted her unlawful vow, and now refused to fulfil her engagement with him. The lover, in return, declined positively to receive such an answer from any one but his mistress in person. As she had to deal with a man who was both of a most determined character, and of too high condition to be trifled with, Lady Stair was obliged to consent to an interview between Lord Rutherford and her daughter; but she took care to be present in person, and argued the point with the disappointed and incensed lover with pertinacity equal to his own. She particularly insisted on the Levitical law, which declares that a woman shall be free from a vow which her parents dissent from: Numbers xxx. 2—5.

While the mother insisted on these topics, the lover in vain conjured the daughter to declare her own opinions and feelings. She remained totally overwhelmed, as it seemed, mute, pale, and motionless as a statue. Only at her mother's command, sternly uttered, she summoned strength enough to restore to her plighted suitor the piece of broken gold, which was the emblem of her troth. On this he burst forth into a tremendous passion, took leave of the mother with maledictions, and as he left the apartment turned back to say to his weak, if not fickle mistress, "For you, madam, you will be a world's wonder!" a phrase by which some remarkable degree of calamity is implied. He went abroad, and returned not again. If the last Lord Rutherford was the unfortunate party, he must have been the third who bore that title, who died in 1685. The marriage between Janet Dalrymple and David Dunbar of Baldoon now went forward, the bride showing no repugnance, but being absolutely passive in everything her mother commanded or advised. On the day of the marriage, which, as was then usual, was celebrated by a great assemblage of friends and relations, she was the same—sad, silent, and resigned to her destiny. A lady very nearly connected with the family told Sir Walter Scott that she had conversed on the subject with one of the brothers of the bride, a mere lad at the time, who had ridden before his sister to church. He said her hand, which lay on his as she held her arm round his waist, was as cold and damp as marble. But full of his new dress, and the part he acted in the procession, the circumstance, which he long after remembered with bitter sorrow and compunction, made no impression on him at the time. The bridal feast was followed by dancing; the bride and bridegroom retired as usual; when of a sudden the most wild and piercing cries were heard from the nuptial chamber. It was then the custom, to prevent any coarse pleasantry which old times perhaps permitted, that the key of the nuptial chamber should be intrusted to the bridesman. He was called upon, but refused at first to give it up, till the shrieks became so hideous that he was compelled to hasten with others to learn the cause. On opening the door they found the bridegroom dreadfully wounded and streaming with blood. The bride was then sought for: she was found in a corner of the large chimney, having no covering save her shift, and that dabbled in gore. There she sat grinning, mopping, and mowing,—in a word, absolutely insane. The only words she spoke were, "Tak up your bonny bridegroom." She survived this horrible scene little more than a fortnight, having been married on the 24th August, and dying on the 12th September, 1669. The unfortunate Baldoon recovered from his wounds, but sternly prohibited all inquiries respecting the manner in which he had received them. He did not very long survive the dreadful catastrophe, being killed by a fall from his horse as he rode between Leith and Holyrood House, 28th March, 1682. (Introduction to The Bride of Lammermuir; Chambers' Domestic Annals of Scotland, vol. ii. pp. 326—328.)

NOTE O, p. 795.

"His majestie's remarques upon the Act for Settling Church Government in Scotland.

"1st. Whereas it is said that the Church of Scotland was reformed from poperie by presbyters without prelaey, his majesty thinks that though this matter of fact may be true, which he doth not contradict, yett it being denied by some who discourse much of a power that superintendents had in the beginning of the Reformation, which was like to that which bishops afterwards had, it were better it were otherwise expressed.

"2nd. Whereas it is said that their majesties doe ratify the Presbyteriall Church government to be the only government of Christ's Church in this kingdom; his majesty desires it may be expressed thus,—to be the government of the church in this kingdom established by law.

"3rd. Whereas it is said that the government is to be exercised by sound presbyterians, and such as for hereafter shall be owned by Presbyterian Church predicatories, as such his majesty thinks that the rule is too generall, depending as to its application upon the opinions of particular men; and, therefore, he desires that what is said to be the meaning of the rule in the reasons sent to him may be expressed in the act, viz.,—That such as shall subscribe to the Confession of Faith and Catechismes, and are willing to submit to the government of the Church as established by law, being sober in their lives, sound in their doctrine, and qualified with gifts for the ministry shall be admitted to the government; and his majesty doth judge that the following declaration might be a good test :—I, A. B., do sincerely declare and promise that I will own and submit to the present government of the Church, as it is now by law in this kingdom; and that I will heartily concur with and under it, for the suppressing of sin and wickednesse, the promoting of piety, and the purging of the Church of all erroneous and scandalous ministers; and I doe also assent and consent to the Confession of Faith. and the Larger and Shorter Catechismes, now confirmed by act of parliament, as the standard of the Protestant religion in this kingdom.

"4th. Whereas it is desired to be enacted that the generall meeting of the ministers doe appoint visitors for purging the Church, etc., his majesty thinks fitt that, for answering even those objections, which the reasons sent to him with the act doe suggest, may be against this method, that what in the mentioned reasons is expressed by a may be, as to the concern of his privy councill in that matter, and the presenting of the visitors to the commissioner, that he may see they are moderate men, be plainly and particularly enacted.

"5th. As to what concerns the meeting of synods and Generall Assemblies his majesty is willing it should be enacted, that they meet at such and such times of the year, and as often as shall be judged necessary, provided always that they apply to him or his privy councill to know if there be any inconveniency as to publick affairs in their meeting at such times, and have his allowance accordingly; and that in all their Generall Assemblies a commissioner in the name of his majesty be there present, to the end that nothing may be proposed but what merely concerns the Church; and in case anything relating to the civill government, or that is prejudicial to it, should be there proposed or debated, the said commissioner may give a stop to it till he has acquainted the privy councill, and received their direction in it.

"6th. Whereas it is desired to be enacted, that the parishes of those thrust out by the people in the beginning of this Revolution be declared vacant upon this reason, because they were put upon congregations without their consent, his majesty desires it may be so expressed, as may be consistent with the right of patrons, which he thinks he hath the more reason to desire because in the reasons sent up with the act, it seems to be acknowledged that this procedure is extraordinary, and not to be drawn into consequence.

"It is his majestie's desire, that such as are of the episcopall persuasion in Scotland have the same indulgence that dissenters have in England, provided they give security to live peaceably under the government, and take the oath of allegiance."

NOTE P, p. 800.

King William's knowledge of the Massacre of Glencoe.

That William was not ignorant of the severities that were threatened in order to bring the Highland clans to terms, is clearly proved by the following, among other letters in the charter chest of the Marquis of Breadalbane. On the 21st of October, 1691, Linlithgow thus writes to the Earl of Breadalbane :—

"My dear Lord,

"We arrived safe here Wednesday night, where I had your lordship's of the 16th. I spoke fully to the secretary of the contents, but he told me he had written you a return upon the same heads; and as to the particulars of the passes he did not find the king inclinable, so that it was not proper to urge it, but you know well that how matters change often at a court, and you may be sure that every proper occasion will be laid hold of that may further your affairs. On the other hand, you would push the clans to do one thing or other, for such as will stand it out must not expect any more offers, and in that case those who have been their friends must act with the greatest vigour against them, and delay till the last cannot be considered as frank dealing. It is written from Edinburgh to this place that none of the clans will submit, even not Lochiel, which does harm, especially when nothing is heard to the contrary, although there be little time yet lost. Lord Raith came in last night to the secretary, and had very indiscreet language of your lordship, and they were so hot that I am afraid the secretary would not have borne it any where but in his own house. The king has been very kind to the D. Q. and me, and in a day or two we are to have our audiences of him. Earl Crawford and that party have changed their note, for now they say they never did any hard things, and are by no means bigot, nor will ever do anything which may disturb the king's affairs here or abroad; but I think this is too gross to pass, except with such who are altogether biassed. Business at home or abroad go as well with the king as is possible. Ireland is entirely reduced, and parliament here is going on with all the cheerfulness and frankness imaginable, so that if some of your clans do all by themselves it will be very nettled, but the last standers out may pay for all, and, besides, I know that the king does not care that some do it, that he may make examples of them."

On the 3rd of November Stair thus wrote to the earl:—

"I showed yours of the 29th of the last to the king. I am sorry for the difficulty you find, &c. I wrott to you formerly that if the rest were willing to concur as the crows do, to pull down Glengarry's nest this winter, so that the king be not hindered to draw four regiments from Scotland, in that case the destroying him and his clan, and garrisoning his house as a midle for communication betwixt Inverlochy and Inverness, will be full as acceptable as if he had come in. This answers all ends, and satisfies thos who complain of the king's too great gentleness. The king hath said to D. Q. that he will very shortly end all Scots affairs, bot if you be here any tim in November you will not com after the mercat. I need not tell you how your enimys insult on the apprehensions that the Hylanders will say the sham articles wer trew, and therfor I am sur you will all that's possible so confutt thes matters, and lett me hear the meathods you think best to reduce Glengarry, and what assistance you are sure of, and what of the forces you will need."

Linlithgow writes on the 5th of November:—

"I can add little to my last, knowing how fully the Secretary wrote you by the last post. The D. of Queensbury has spoken to the king, and finds him in his just sentiments as he could wish. I am to speak to him to-morrow. So that these ten who have been against the settling a government with us see now that they will get it delayed no longer. Only they beg that the K. may delay the doing of it till he see what effect your treaty with the Highlanders produces; and it is too probable that will be granted to them, and your lordship knows what inconveniences there are in delays. I acknowledge that it is little to be wondered at to see the Highlanders shift and delay coming in, considering the encouragement they have got to stand it out. But I always thought that these shams would not have taken the wise men, such as Lochiel, and if he began ance, I would little doubt of most of the others following him; and I wish some of the most obstinate of them would stand it out, that they might be made examples of."

NOTE Q, p. 830.

Alleged Bribery of the members of the Scottish parliament.

Lockhart affirms that in the course of a financial investigation which he made in 1711, he discovered that the sum of £20,540 17s. 7d. was distributed in bribes among the members for the purpose of inducing them to vote for the union; and he gives the following list of the receivers, with the sum which each received:—

	£	s.	d.
To the Earl of Marchmont	1104	15	7
" Earl of Cromarty	300	0	0
" Lord Prestonhall	200	0	0
" Lord Ormiston, Lord Justice-clerk	200	0	0
" Duke of Montrose	200	0	0
" Duke of Atholl	1000	0	0
" Earl of Balcarres	500	0	0
" Earl of Dunmore	200	0	0
" Lord Anstruther	300	0	0
To Mr. Stewart of Castle Stewart	300	0	0
To the Earl of Eglinton	200	0	0
" Lord Fraser	100	0	0
" Lord Cesnock (now Polwarth)	50	0	0
To Mr. John Campbell	200	0	0
To the Earl of Forfar	100	0	0
To Sir Kenneth Mackenzie	100	0	0
To the Earl of Glencairn	100	0	0
" Earl of Kentore	200	0	0
" Earl of Findlater	100	0	0
To John Muir, Provost of Ayr	100	0	0
To the Lord Forbes	50	0	0
" Earl of Seafield, Lord Chancellor	490	0	0
" Marquis of Tweeddale	1000	0	0
" Duke of Roxburgh	500	0	0
" Lord Elibank	50	0	0
" Lord Banff	11	2	0
To Major Cunningham of Ecket	100	0	0
To the Messenger that brought down the Treaty of Union	60	0	0
To Sir William Sharp	300	0	0
To Patrick Coultrain, Provost of Wigton	25	0	0
To Mr. Alexander Wedderburn	75	0	0
To the Commissioner for Equipage and Daily Allowance	12,325	0	0
	£20,540	17	7

On the overthrow of the whig administration, in 1711, this affair received a very minute investigation by the new ministry, who were eager to find some ground of accusation against their predecessors. It was clearly proved that the money was advanced by the English treasury to the Scottish government, but Godolphin affirmed that it had been advanced by way of loan for the purpose of paying arrears of salaries and various other debts due to creditors of the crown. The Earl of Glasgow, by whom the money was distributed, asserted that "it consisted with his own proper knowledge that £12,325 were paid back after the union." There can be no doubt of the fact that the salaries of the public officers were at this time greatly in arrears. The Earl of Marchmont, whose name heads Lockhart's list, is found complaining to the Duke of Argyll that he cannot obtain payment of arrears of his salary as lord chancellor. Cunningham of Ecket, another of the recipients of the alleged bribe, is found earnestly beseeching parliament to repay to him £275 expended out of his own means in the support of officers under his command. The presumption, therefore, is that all the other persons named in the list were in one way or other public creditors, who received only what was their due, especially when we find among them the Duke of Atholl, who was a most strenuous opponent of the union, and Cunningham of Ecket, who was prepared to take up arms against it. It is certain that the government of Harley and St. John, with every disposition to find that bribery had been employed to carry the union, could discover no evidence whatever to warrant this conclusion. See Burton's History of Scotland, vol. i. chap. xii.

NOTE R, p. 967.

Establishment of Parochial Schools in Scotland.

The first effort of the Scottish parliament to promote the education of the people was made in the year 1494, when it was enacted, under a penalty of twenty pounds Scotch, that all barons and substantial freeholders should send their eldest sons to school, to be instructed in classical literature, and afterwards to other seminaries to obtain a knowledge of the laws of the realm. The Reformation took place shortly after, and John Knox proposed, in his "Book of Discipline" that schools should be established in every parish, grammar schools in every town, and universities in the cities. In 1616 the privy council empowered the bishops, in conjunction with the heritors, to establish a school in every parish in their respective dioceses, and to assess the lands for that purpose, for the advancement of true religion, and the training of children "in civility, godliness, knowledge, and learning." This act, however, was not vigorously carried out, and in 1626 an effort was made by Charles I. to remedy the defect. The act of the privy council in 1616 was confirmed by the parliament in 1633, and under its authority schools were instituted in the more cultivated districts of the country. Five years later the General Assembly of the Scottish Church gave directions for "the settling of schools in every parish, and providing entertainment for men able for the charge of teaching youth." A representation was made to his majesty that "the means hitherto appointed for schools of all sorts have both been little and ill paid;" and in 1642 presbyteries were ordained to see "that every parish should have a school, where children are to be bred in reading, writing and grounds of religion." The dissensions which soon after broke out in Scotland unfortunately prevented the nation from reaping the fruits of these wise enactments, and threatened to reduce the whole country to a state of absolute barbarism; but after the Revolution had established peace and order in the kingdom, an act was passed in 1696, which declared that there should be a school instituted, and a schoolmaster appointed in every parish, and salaries provided for the teachers. The maximum salary was fixed at two hundred marks (£11 2s. 2d.), and the minimum at one hundred marks. The right of appointing the teachers and superintending the school was vested in the heritors and the minister of the parish. This famous act laid the foundation of Scotland's proudest distinction, and proved the great source of her subsequent prosperity; and it is owing, not indeed solely, but principally to the national system of education, which this act established, that Scotland, as Lord Macaulay remarks, "in spite of the barrenness of her soil, and the severity of her climate, made such progress in agriculture, in manufactures, in commerce, in letters, in science, in all that constitutes civilization, as the Old World has never seen equalled, and as even the New World has scarcely seen surpassed." For more than a century after the passing of the law of 1696, the Scottish parochial schools were wholly overlooked by the legislature. In consequence the emoluments remained stationary, while those of every other profession and trade increased, and, therefore, the social status, the acquirements, and influence of the teachers were greatly deteriorated. Their depressed condition at length attracted the attention of the legislature, and in 1803 an act was passed which raised the maximum salary to £22 4s. 5d., and the minimum to £16 13s. 4d., exclusive of fees, and declared that a dwelling-house of not more than two rooms should be provided for the schoolmaster; but at the same time deprived all heritors, except those who possessed a hundred pounds of valued rent, of all share in the election of the teacher and the management of the school, and placed the teachers wholly under the jurisdiction of their respective presbyteries, depriving them of the right of appeal to the superior courts. The act further provided that the salaries are to be revised every twenty-five years, the average price of grain during the preceding twenty-five regulating the salary during the succeeding twenty-five. At the first revision in 1828 an addition was made to the salaries of the parochial teachers; the maximum was raised to £34 4s. 4d., the minimum to £25 13s. 3d.; but at the second revision in 1853 these sums were reduced nearly one third. Various attempts have been made of late in parliament to increase the emoluments of the teachers, and to adapt the parochial system of education to the existing state of the country, but unfortunately, owing to petty sectarian jealousies and dissensions, these efforts have hitherto been fruitless.

INDEX.

A.

ABBEY, raid of, ii. 342.
 ABBOT OF UNREASON, i. 555, note; 506, 620.
 ARDY, capture of, i. 203.
 ABERBROTHOCK, ABBEY OF, i. 53, 167. Privileges granted to, 167, note, 175. Parliament held at, 152.
 ABERDEEN, march of Edward I. to, i. 92. Part of Wallace's body sent to, 111. Castle of, taken by Bruce, 126. Surrender of, to Montrose, ii. 556. Taken possession of by Lord Aboynce, 558. Is retaken by Montrose, ib. Severe treatment of the citizens of, 559. Is again taken by Lord Aboynce, and recaptured by Montrose, ib. Tumults in, 580.
 ABERDEEN, SEE OF, founded, i. 69.
 ABERDEEN, BISHOP OF, noticed, i. 360.
 ABERDEEN, KING'S COLLEGE, founded, i. 474. University shut up by Arran, ii. 195. Proceedings against office-bearers, ib.
 ABERNETHY, religious house founded at, i. 53. Bestowed on the Abbey of Aberbrothock, 167. Round Tower of, 54.
 ABERNETHY, SIR LAWRENCE DE, defeated and captured, i. 193.
 ABJURATION, oath of, enacted, ii. 775. Effects of the, ib. Mentioned, 838, 889. It proves a stumbling-block, 890.
 ABOYNCE, LORD, noticed, ii. 558, 559, 624—628.
 ACCOMMODATION, Leighton's scheme of, ii. 700. Its failure, ib.
 ACT "OF ABOLITION," ii. 356, 357. For regulating dress of judges and lawyers, 406, 411. Black, 423. Of 1592, great charter of the Church of Scotland, 444. Of abolition passed in favour of popish ears, 447. Of oblivion passed by Charles I., 594. Forbidding intercession for the children of persons attainted, 690. Incapacitating twelve persons to be named by ballot, 691. Of council against the presbyterian clergy, ib. Of 1712, restoring patronage, effects of the, 776. Passed by parliament establishing Darien Company, 808. For a treaty of union, 818. The Habeas Corpus, suspended, 912.
 ACTORS, English, arrival of in Scotland, ii. 378.
 ACTS OF THE SCOTTISH PARLIAMENT, i. 140, 149, 211, 245, 258, 266, 317, 328, 338, 341, 342, 348, 350, 369, 379, 383, 385, 393, 472, 475, 542, 545, 560, 561, 592. ii. 81—194, 200, 331, 356, 406, 442, 507, 576, 597, 693, 689, 690, 693, 701, 717, 731, 765, 770, 778, 808, 814, 818, 830, 837, 877. Of Security. [See SECURITY.] Of Toleration. [See TOLERATION.]
 ADA, sister of King William, her descendant claims the crown, i. 87.
 ADA, daughter of David, Earl of Huntingdon, her son claims the crown, i. 87.
 ADAMNAN, ABBOT OF IONA, i. 57. Life of St. Columbus by, 49.
 ADAMSON, PATRICK, created Archbishop of St. Andrew's, ii. 273, 422. Exposure of his dishonesty, 274, 277. Character and proceedings of, 422. Character of his declaration, 427. Excommunicated by the synod of Fife, 435. Lectures in presence of the king, 430. Conduct and circumstances of, 440. His bishopric taken from him, ib. His excommunication, ib. His recantation, ib. His death, 441. His want of sound principle, ib.
 "ADMONITION, the Seasonable," a document published by the General Assembly in 1698, ii. 766.
 AGEDRA penates into northern parts of Britain, i. 1. Line of forts erected by, between Clyde and Forth, ib. Invades Galloway, ib. First engagement with Caledonians, 2. Voyage of discovery round north of Scotland, 4. Recall and death, ib.
 AGRICULTURE, state of, i. 280, 343, 367. ii. 400.
 AIDAN sent as a missionary from Iona to Northumberland, i. 50.
 AIKENHEAD, THOMAS, condemned and executed for blasphemy, ii. 765, and Appendix to vol. ii. Note M.
 AIRDROSS, skirmish at, ii. 715. Defeat of Cameronians at, ib.
 AIELIE, EARL OF, joins Montrose, ii. 620, 626. Death of his son at Inverlochy, 623. Defeats Baillie's horse, 627. His flight from Philiphaugh, 629.
 AIRTH, WILLIAM, trial of for heresy, i. 465.
 AITKEN, MARGARET, a pretended witch-finder, ii. 372.
 ALBANY, ROBERT STEWART, EARL OF FIFE, DUKE OF, chosen governor, i. 236. Character of, ib. Created duke of, 241. Resigns his office of governor, ib. His disgraceful conduct respecting his nephew's marriage, 242. His plot against the Duke of Rothsay, 246. Regains the office of governor, ib. His weak and partial administration, 248. Baseness and treachery of, 249. Regency of, after the death of Robert II., 250. Endeavours to prevent the release of James I., ib. Inglorious expedition of, 254. Death of, 255. Popularity of, ib.

ALBANY, MURDOCH STEWART, DUKE OF, taken prisoner at the battle of Homildon Hill, i. 248. Released from captivity, 254. Succeeds his father in the regency, 255. His feeble administration, ib. His turbulent sons, 256. Takes measures to obtain the release of James I., ib. Resigns his office to James, 258. He is arrested, 260. Condemned and executed, ib.
 ALBANY, ALEXANDER STEWART, DUKE OF, brother of James III., character of, i. 352. His imprisonment and escape, ib. Treason of, 354. Is reconciled to his brother, 356. Created lieutenant-general, 357. His treasonable league with the English, ib. Deprived of his office, ib. Forfeiture of, 358. Takes up arms and is defeated, ib. Death of, ib.
 ALBANY, JOHN (son of Alexander Stewart), DUKE OF, invited from France to be regent, i. 413. Is appointed regent in the room of Queen Margaret, 414. His arrival in Scotland, 415. His character, ib. His vigorous measures, ib. Compels the queen to resign to him the custody of the young king, 416. His firmness and forbearance towards the queen, 417. Punishes the factious nobles, 419. Visits France, ib. Dissensions in Scotland during the absence of, 420—423. His return, 424. Factious charges against by Bishop Gavin Douglas, ib. Is forced to declare war against England, 425. His second visit to France, 426. His return, ib. Expedition of, into England, 427. Reasons for disbanding his army, ib. Difficulties of his position, ib. His final departure for France, 428. His regency formally abrogated, 430.
 ALBERONI, CARDINAL, ii. 878.
 ALCUIN, i. 57.
 ALESS, ALEXANDER, canon of St. Andrew's, converted to Protestantism, i. 471. Is obliged to flee, 472.
 ALEXANDER I. succeeds to the throne, i. 59. His marriage, ib. His death, 60.
 ALEXANDER II. ascends the throne, i. 72. Alliance with English barons, ib. Invades England, ib. Joins Louis of France, ib. Reconciliation with Henry III., ib. His marriage, 73. His second marriage, ib. Concludes peace with Henry, 75. His death, ib.
 ALEXANDER III., accession of, i. 76. His marriage, ib. Seizure of his person, ib. English faction overthrown, and his removal to Stirling, ib. Visits English court, 78. Birth of his daughter, ib. Defeats Norwegians at Largs, 79. Concludes peace with them, 80. Attends coronation of Edward I., ib. Marriage and death of his children, ib. His second marriage, 81. His death and character, ib.
 ALEXANDER OF THE ISLES, rebellion of, i. 264.
 ALFORD, battle of, i. 625.
 ALLEGIANCE, oath of, to James VI., ii. 403.
 ALNWICK CASTLE, siege of by Malcolm Canmore, i. 40.
 AMISFIELD, CHARLES, LAIRD OF, i. 358.
 AMNESTY, act of, passed in Scotland, ii. 690.
 ANCRUM MOOR, battle of, i. 588.
 ANGUS, LORD OF THE ISLES, at Bannockburn, i. 133.
 ANGUS, EARL OF, GILBERT D'UMFRAVILLE, refuses to surrender the fortresses of Dundee and Forfar to Edward I., i. 86. Treachery of, to Wallace, 100.
 ANGUS, EARL OF, captures Berwick, i. 201. Death of, in prison, 204.
 ANGUS, DOUGLAS, SECOND EARL OF, is taken prisoner at the battle of Homildon Hill, i. 248. Is arrested, 260. Espouses the side of the king against the Douglasses, 334. Besieges Abercorn Castle, 336. Defeats the Douglasses at Arkenholm, 337. Defeats them a second time, 341. Is rewarded with a grant of their lands, ib. Wounded at the siege of Roxburgh, 345. Chosen lieutenant-general, 346. Assists Henry VI. to recover his crown, 347. Death of, ib.
 ANGUS, ARCHIBALD, EARL OF, "Bell-the-Cat," his treason, i. 354, 357. Murders the king's favourites at Lauder, 355. Deprived of his offices, ib. Renewal of conspiracy by, 360. His quarrel with and slaughter of Spens of Kilsplindie, 364. Treason of, ib. Punishment for his treason, ib. His remonstrance with James IV. before the battle of Flodden, 406. His death, ib., note.
 ANGUS, GEORGE, EARL OF (grandson of "Bell-the-Cat"), i. 412. Marries the Queen Dowager, 413. Heads the English faction, 414. Deserts his wife, 419. Reconciliation and quarrel, 421. Turbulence of, 422. Skirmish with Arran, 423. Flight of, 424. Passes into France, 425. Return of, 429. Attacks Edinburgh, 430. Coalition with Beaton, ib. Is divorced by Margaret, 435. Obtains possession of the king's person, ib. Carries him to

- Teviotdale, 436. Defeats Lennox, 437. Tyranny of, and of Beaton, 439. Retires to Tantallon, 442. Conviction and forfeiture of, ib. Flies to England, 443. Permitted to return, 564. Restored to rank and estates, 571. Enters into a bond with regent, 582. Imprisoned, ib. Displeasure with Henry, 587. Joins Arran against English, 588. Defeats the English at Anercum Moor, ib. Famous reply of, to Henry VIII., 589. Irresolute conduct of, 592. Repudiates his promises to Henry, 599. Is present at the battle of Pinkie, 607. Defeats Wharton and Lennox, 612. Reply to queen's proposals, 620.
- ANGUS, WILLIAM, EARL OF, ii. 149. Convenes lieges to meet at Stirling, 157. Marches against Argyll and Atholl, ib. Besieges Hamilton Castle, 160. Plot of, against Lennox, 170. Banished beyond the Spey, ib. Flies to England, 174. Is declared rebel and forfeited, 176. Joins king after release from Gowrie, 187. Retires beyond the Spey, 190. Joins plot against Arran, 191. Enters Stirling, 192. Sentence of treason and forfeiture, 194. Plot for his assassination, 200. Returns to Scotland, ib. Indignation at condemnation of Mary, 211. Joins Bothwell's plot to seize king, ib. 345. Arrest of, for his connection with the "Spanish Blanks," 347. His escape, 348. Excommunicated, 354. Petitions king for trial, 355. Act of abolition respecting, 356. Summoned for trial, 357. Sentence of treason and forfeiture, 362. Return of, 369. Reconciled to the kirk, 371.
- ANGUS, EARL OF, ii. 784. First colonel of the Cameronian regiment, ib.
- ANNANDALE, EARL OF, his treason, ii. 792. Makes a full confession of his plot against government, 796.
- ANNE OF BRITTANY, letter of, to James IV., i. 410.
- ANNE OF DENMARK, marriage of, to James VI., ii. 337. Her coronation, 338. Claims custody of her son, 365. Birth of a daughter, 370. Death of, 412.
- ANNE, QUEEN, the accession of, ii. 768, 813. Death of her last child, 769. The nomination of her successor, 770. She appoints Queensberry as commissioner, 814. Refuses to hear the address of the dissentients, ib. Her message to the estates, 817. She is empowered to appoint commissioners for the union, 819. Her speech in parliament and assent to the union, 830. Congratulatory address presented to, 835. Her reply to parliament, 836. Death of, 841.
- ANTRIM, EARL OF, discovery of a dangerous intrigue concocted by the, ii. 608.
- ARBROATH. [See ABERBROTHOCK.]
- ARBROATH, LORD, conference with Morton's commissioners, ii. 142. Flies to Flanders, 160. Declares loyalty of self and associates, 213. Appointed governor of Dunbarton Castle, ib.
- ARBUTHNOT, ALEXANDER, poems of, ii. 306. "The Miseries of a Puir Scholar," ib.
- ARGYLL, COLIN, FIRST EARL OF, joins in a conspiracy against James II., i. 354, 361. Created chancellor, 378. Besieges Dunbarton, 381.
- ARGYLL, ARCHIBALD, SECOND EARL OF, slain at the battle of Flodden, i. 408.
- ARGYLL, COLIN, THIRD EARL OF, embraces the cause of James V. against the Douglasses, i. 441. Receives a share of their forfeited estates, 442. Feuds of, with the McLeans, 444.
- ARGYLL, ARCHIBALD, FOURTH, and FIRST PROTESTANT EARL OF, imprisonment of, i. 446. Discontent with the king, 447. Assists Beaton in his attempt to convert the Earl of Angus, 579. Inactivity during the Earl of Hertford's invasion, 592. Appointed one of the Regent Arran's secret council, 599. Commands the western Highlanders at the battle of Pinkie, 607. Gained over to English interest, 612. Subscribes the first covenant, 624, 678. Correspondence with Archbishop of St. Andrew's, 679.
- ARGYLL, FIFTH EARL OF, his last interview with the queen-regent, i. 643. Receives a commission from Queen Mary, 654. Sent by the regent to treat with the congregation, 683. Subscribes a new bond, 684. Sends a letter of expostulation to the Regent, 685. Signs an approval of the Book of Policy and Discipline, 694. Modifications of the ministers' stipends assigned to, 707. Summoned by Mary to deliberate upon her marriage, 740. Supposed plots of, against Mary and Darnley, 745. Rebellion of, 752. Joins in the conspiracy against Ricio, 762. Mary intimates to, her intention of escaping from Holyrood, 768. Conspires against Darnley, ii. 36. Connection with Darnley's murder, 45-49, 141. Presides at trial of Bothwell, 51. One of the band of nobles for Mary's marriage with Bothwell, 53. Joins party for protecting prince, 54, 55. Protests against Mary's marriage, 62. Joins queen's party, 71. Meets Mary at Hamilton after her escape, 83. Attends convention at Largs, 89. Assembles forces, 90, 104. Submits to Mary, ib. Attends king's parliament at Stirling, 130. Sentence of forfeiture rescinded, 132. Submits to church discipline, 244.
- ARGYLL, COLIN, SIXTH EARL OF, feud with Atholl, ii. 150. Resists Morton, ib. Proclaimed rebel, 151. Interview with king at Stirling, 152. Chosen councillor to king, 153, 156. Assembles forces and marches to Falkirk, 157. Treaty of agreement, 158. Appointed chancellor, ib. Present at the king's entry into Edinburgh, 162. Conspiracy of, against king and Arran, 172. Aids release of king, 187. Appointed one of the king's council, ib.
- ARGYLL, ARCHIBALD, SEVENTH EARL OF, marches against popish earls, ii. 362. His defeat at Glenlivet by Huntly, 363.
- ARGYLL, ARCHIBALD, EIGHTH EARL, and MARQUIS OF, joins the covenanters, ii. 551. Is sent to the north, 577. Conduct during his expedition, 578. His speech in parliament, 596. The king meditates vengeance against, 598, 599. Discovers a secret correspondence between the king and Montrose, 616. At the battle of Tippermuir, 619. Skirmishes with Montrose, 621, 622. Defeat at Inverloch, 623. Valuable advice to the parliament, 626. Takes up arms in the Highlands, 645. Incident in connection with Montrose, 656. Places the crown upon the head of Charles II., 669. Opposes the king, 671. Resolute behaviour of, 673. His submission to Cromwell, ib. Retires from public life, 677. His apprehension, 684. He is brought to trial, ib. His defence, ib. He is condemned, ib. His calm behaviour, 685. His execution, 686. Injustice of his sentence, ib.
- ARGYLL, ARCHIBALD, NINTH EARL OF, he takes the test with an explanation, ii. 718. His apprehension and shameful treatment, 719. His escape from prison, ib. Seizure of his letters, 723. His estate annexed to the crown, 732. His departure from Holland in 1685, ib. Lands in Scotland, ib. Publishes his manifesto at Campbellton, ib. Plans thwarted by his associates, 733. The Cameronians refuse to join him, ib. He resolves to make a descent upon the Lowlands, ib. The capture of his stores, ib. He prepares to march to Glasgow, ib. Dispersion of his army, ib. His capture at Inchinnan, 734. His firmness and composure in prison, ib. His execution, 735.
- ARGYLL, COUNTESS OF, present at the murder of Ricio, i. 765. Also at the baptism of James VI., ii. 38. Submits to church discipline, 244.
- ARGYLL, ARCHIBALD, FIRST DUKE OF, restoration of his estates, ii. 794. Crooked proceedings of, against Macdonald of Glencoe, 800. A regiment of his clan selected as the perpetrators of the massacre of Glencoe, 801.
- ARGYLL, JOHN, SECOND DUKE OF, is appointed commissioner, ii. 817. Is appointed commander of the royal army, 851. Threatens Leith Fort, 858. Marches to Dunblane, 867. Fights the battle of Sheriffmuir, 868. His moderation towards the insurgents, 870. He marches northward, 873. Ingratitude of the government to, 881. Jacobite proposals to, ib. Opposes obnoxious clause in the Porteous Bill, 887, 901. Anecdote of, in connection with the Queen, &c., 887.
- ARMS OF SCOTLAND, i. 71, 72. National, ii. 823.
- ARMSTRONG, JOHNNIE, i. 443. Character and execution of, 444.
- ARMSTRONG, WILLIAM (Kinmont Willie), taken prisoner by the English and rescued by Scott of Buccleuch, ii. 499.
- ARMY, SCOTTISH, constitution of, i. 283. English, discontent of at York, ii. 583. Defeat of, by the Scots at Newburn, 584. Retreat of into Yorkshire, ib. Demands of the, ib. Takes possession of the capital, 639. Moderate proposals of, ib. Scottish, of "the Engagement," crosses the Borders in the cause of Charles, 644. Incapacity of the Duke of Hamilton, its leader, ib. English, critical position of, 662. Cabals of the officers in the, 679. Collision between the commons and the, ib. Quarrel between the Rump and the officers of the, ib. Public dissatisfaction with the, 680. Its withdrawal to the south, 742. Royal, posted at Stirling, 851.
- ARRAN, THOMAS BOYD, EARL OF, marriage with the Princess Mary, daughter of James II., i. 348-350. Escapes to the continent, and lives in voluntary exile, ib. [See BOYD.]
- ARRAN, JAMES HAMILTON, EARL OF, Duke of Chateaufort, mismanages the Scottish fleet, i. 402. Return of, to Scotland, 412. Captures Dunbarton Castle, 414. Flight with Home, 417. Makes peace with the regent, 418. Returns to Scotland, ib. Insurrection of, ib. Chosen warden of Marches, 420. Feud with Angus, 422. Skirmish and flight, 423. Conflict of, with Lennox, 436. Retires from government, 438.
- ARRAN, JAMES, SECOND EARL OF, character, and election as regent, i. 564. Imprisons Beaton, 567. Justification of, 570. Treats with Sadler, 572. Interview with him, 574. Seeks interview with Beaton, 577. Perplexed position of, ib. Apostasy of, 578. Receives absolution, ib. Seizes Dalkeith Castle, 581. Flies from Hertford, 584. Deprived of regency, 585. Resistance of, ib. Union with queen, 586. Takes field with Angus, 588. Abortive invasion of, 591. Co-operation with the queen, 602. Leads army to the Borders, 604. Conduct at Pinkie, 607. Consents to resign, 617. Formal resignation of, 618. Appointed governor of Dunbarton Castle, and declared heir-presumptive to the crown, ib. Noticed, 708.
- ARRAN, JAMES, THIRD EARL OF, joins Protestants, i. 633. Proposed marriage of, to Elizabeth, Queen of England, 649. Madness and supposed conspiracy of, 708. Confined first in Draffan Castle, ii. 159. Then in Linlithgow, 160. Cruel and unjust proceedings of the Earl of Morton against, ib.
- ARRAN, JAMES STEWART, EARL OF, accuses Morton, ii. 167. Made Earl of, 170. At Morton's execution, 173. Receives immunity for past conduct, 175. His prodigality, ib. Marries Countess of March, ib. Title confirmed, ib. Rupture with Lennox, 176. Oppressive measures of, 177. Conspiracy against, ib., 191. Capture and imprisonment of, 179. Plot for release of king, 185. Return to court, 188. Obtains governorship of Stirling Castle, and induces James to reside there, ib. Tyranny of, 190, 191. Treachery to Gowrie, 192. Proceedings against the clergy, 194. Offices assumed by him, 195. Conference with Hunsdon, 198. Assumes governorship of Edinburgh Castle, 199. Cruelty to Countess Gowrie, 200. Plot for assassinating Angus, ib. Violence towards Atholl, Maxwell, Home, and Cassilis, 201. Persecution of the church, 205. Treatment of the Danish embassy, 207. Plot for assassination of, 208. Imprisonment and release of, 209. Intrigues with France, 210. Flight of, 212, 428. Declared traitor and forfeiture, 213. Reappearance of, 330, 346. Murder of, ib.
- ARRINGTON, CAPTAIN, NICHOLAS, mission to Scotland, ii. 161.
- ARTHUR KING, chosen leader of the Cambrian Britons, i. 24. Killed, ib.

ARTICLES, LORDS OF THE, origin of, i. 214. Election of the, ii. 568. Bills submitted to the, 569. Their opposition to the royal demand, 738. The committee of, dispute in parliament about the, 778.

ASSEMBLY, GENERAL, meeting of, i. 706, 709. Meeting of, November, 1562, 714. Meeting of, June, 1565, 746. Supplication of, ii. 10. Proceedings in December, 1562, 12. Appoints a public fast, 27. Meeting of, 75. Meeting of, 181. Approval of Ruthven lords, 182. Meeting of, 190. Opposes jurisdiction of Archbishop of St. Andrew's, 239. Letter of, to bishops of England, 241. Meeting of, June and July, 1567, 242. Meeting of, December, 1567, 244. Letter to Mr. Willock, 245. Meeting of, July, 1568, 247. Deputation of, to regent, 248. Meeting of, December, 1568, 249. Letter to, from Glencairn, ib. Deputation of, on Chateherault's claims, 251. Agrees to Moray's proposals, 252. Sends commissioners to meeting of estates at Perth, ib. Proceedings in March, 1570, 255. Measures for education of the poor, 256. Commission to confer with the nobility, 257. Meeting in March, 1571, ib. Complaint of, 260. Meeting in St. Andrew's, March, 1572, 261. Judgment on new ecclesiastical arrangements, 262. Authority of, over bishops and superintendents, 269. Renewed attempt to define limits of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, ib. Reply to James VI.'s letter, 276. Decisive steps taken by, 277. Constitution of, ib. Meeting in June, 1582, 282. Deputation of, to the king, 283. Meeting in October, 1584, 284. Opposition of, to prevailing evils, 1596, 325. Meeting of, at Dunfermline and Linlithgow, 428. Meeting of, 430. Relieves Adamson from excommunication, ib. Proceedings of, 433. Records of found to be mutilated, 434. Measures suggested by, 436. Readiness of, to make sacrifices for the support of the throne, ib. Petitions the king to give up the patronages he had seized, 437. Meeting of, 439. A book written by Adamson against the discipline of, ib. The king attends the meeting of, in person, and delivers a panegyric upon the Church of Scotland, ib. Meeting of at Dundee, 445. Demands vigorous measures against the papists, ib. King's answer to, ib. Meeting of, held at Perth called by the king, 460. Another meeting at Dundee, ib. Proceedings of, ib. Meets at Dundee in March, 462. Dispute between the king and Andrew Melvill, ib. Keen argument in, between contending parties, 463. Conference appointed to be held in presence of the king regarding the points still unsettled, ib. Meeting held at Montrose in 1600, ib. Proceedings of great importance, ib. Deceptive design of the cautions given to clerical representatives sent to parliament, 466. James obtains sanction of, at meeting in 1602, to the appointments which parliament had made, 467. Meeting prorogued for a year, 471. Meeting at Aberdeen prohibited by the king, ib. Prohibition recalled on the understanding that as soon as met they would adjourn, ib. Character of proceedings, 472. Meeting at Linlithgow, 26th July, 478. Apparent zeal of the bishops, ib. Determination to summon a meeting, 479. Proceedings of, ib. Meeting held at Aberdeen in 1605 declared unlawful, ib. Meeting at Aberdeen, 13th August, 1616, 483. Measures adopted by, ib. The king's views of the proceedings, 484. Meeting at St. Andrew's in November, 485. Meeting at Perth, 25th August, 486. Letter read from the king, ib. Offensive conduct of the moderator of, ib. Adoption of the "Five Articles of Perth," ib. Proceedings closed on Black Saturday, 488. Appointed to be held in Glasgow, 542. Disputes regarding the election of members of the, 543. Result of the election of members of the, 544. Attempts to exclude some of the commissioners of the, 545. Celebrated meeting of, in Glasgow, 21st November, 1638, 546. Keen discussion in the, 547. Mr. Alexander Henderson elected moderator of the, ib. Declinations of the bishops discussed, 548. Speech of Dr. Hamilton, procurator of the bishops, in the, ib. Reply to the moderator of the, ib. Encouraging speech of the moderator of the, 550. Declares itself a competent judge of the bishops, 551. Proceedings of the, prohibited under pain of treason, ib. Episcopacy abolished by the, ib. Trial and condemnation of the bishops by, ib. Dissolution of the, 552. King Charles declines to preside at the meeting of the, 555. Traquair appointed commissioner to the, ib. Meeting of the, on the 12th of August, 556. Act passed by the, respecting the bygone events of the church, ib. The accusations against the bishops heard anew by the, ib. Examines "the Large Declaration," ib. Petitions that the suspected authors of "the Large Declaration," should be punished, 567. Dissolution of the, ib. Meeting of the, 28th July, 10. Protracted and keen discussion respecting private meetings, 578, 579. Discussion terminated in the passing of an act, 580. Dissolution of the, ib. Meets at St. Andrew's on the 27th of July, 1641, 601. Henderson chosen moderator of the, ib. Contest regarding private meetings resumed in the, 602. New act regarding meetings passed by the, ib. Communication from English churches received by the, ib. Meets at St. Andrew's, 27th of July, 606. Both King Charles and the parliament attempt to secure the support of, ib. Proposal of, to establish uniformity of church government, ib. Petitions parliament and the king, 607. The English parliament sends a favourable reply to, ib. Principles enunciated by, 652. Dissolution of the, 676. Meeting of the, 755. The position of the, with respect to the government, ib. Dissolution of the, 756. Meeting of the, 759. Abrupt dissolution of the, 760. Meeting of the, held in March, 1694, 762. Sanctions the admission of those episcopals who might be willing to conform, 764. Effort of the, to gain over the covenants, 768. Meeting of the, at the time of the king's death, 767. Meeting of the, 768. Abrupt dissolution of the, 769. Acts passed with regard to the union by the, 771. Appoints a national fast, ib. Proceedings of the, 838. Extreme measures taken by the, against the rights of the people, 891. Act of, against the "Marrow of Modern Divinity," 893. Protest against this act, 894. Process of, against Professor Campbell, ib. Review of the conduct of the, ib. Treatment of Ebenezer Erskine and his associates by, 898. Alarm on the part of the, 899. Sentence of censure against the Seceders rescinded by, ib. Final measures of against the Seceders, 901. Deposition of Gillespie by, 906. Rule of the "moderate" party in the, 907.

ASSEMBLY, WESTMINSTER, meets 1st July, ii. 610. Parties into which it was divided, ib. Protracted debates of, respecting church government, 611. The divine right of presbytery affirmed in the, ib. Question of toleration discussed and condemned by the, ib. The power of the keys, 612. Directory, confession, and catechisms prepared by, and ratified by the Scottish assembly and parliament, ib.

ATHELSTAN invades Scotland, i. 34. Defeated by Iingus, King of the Picts, 45.

ATHOLE, PATRICK, EARL OF, defeats Bisset at a tournament, i. 74. Found murdered in his own house, ib.

ATHOLE, JOHN DE STRATHBOUGH, EARL OF, joins Bruce, i. 115. Cruelty of his execution, 119.

ATHOLE, DAVID, EARL OF, nephew of Bruce, noticed i. 188, 189. Made governor, 191. Defeated and slain, ib.

ATHOLE, WALTER STEWART, EARL OF, conspires against James I. 269. Tried and executed, 273.

ATHOLE, STEWART, EARL OF, keeps James III. in prison, i. 356, 357.

ATHOLE, STEWART, EARL OF, joins party for protecting the young prince, ii. 54. Indignation at marriage of Mary, 59. Joins confederates, 63, 65. Conducts Mary to Edinburgh, 67. Signs the warrant for Mary's commitment to Lochleven, 68. At coronation of James VI., 76. Accompanies Moray to Lochleven, 78. Interview with Mary, ib. Feud with Argyll, 150. Resists Morton, ib. Proclaimed rebel, 151. Interview with the king at Stirling, 152. Office of chancellor conferred on, 153. Joins Argyll against Angus, 157. Death of, 158. Suspected poisoning of, ib.

ATHOLL, JOHN MURRAY, EARL OF, plots to release James from Gowrie party, ii. 185, 186. Imprisonment of, by Arran, 201. Inroad on Huntley's territories, 244. Nominated lieutenant-general beyond Spey, 349. Admits Bothwell to the palace, 351. Intercedes with James in behalf of Bothwell, ib. Escapes to the Highlands, 353.

ATHOLL, MARQUIS OF, apprehended by order of Argyll, ii. 577. Sent prisoner to Stirling, 578. Signs the Cumberland bond, 615. Joins the insurrection of Glencairn, 674. Makes a complaint to the king, 709. Marches against Argyll, 733. Cruelties inflicted on the Campbells by, 736. Pusillanimity and vacillation of, 747. Conduct of, in regard to the vote of forfeiture against James VII., 748. Character of, 784. Declares his allegiance to King William, 785. The Cameronians take up their position in the house of, 790. Plots against government, 795.

ATHOLL, FIRST DUKE OF, protest of, against the union, ii. 819. Aids the Cameronians in a combination against government, 824. Eldest son of, joins the Earl of Mar, 846. Is attainted for his share in the rebellion, 914. [See TULLIBARDINE.]

ATHOLL, SECOND DUKE OF, ii. 918, 919.

ATHOLL MEN, attempt to stop recruiting among, ii. 947.

ATTERBURY, BISHOP OF, ii. 883.

AUCHINLUCK, SIR JOHN, i. 327.

AUCHTERADER, the test, ii. 892.

ATYOFFE, trial and execution of, ii. 735.

AYE, bond subscribed at, ii. 11. Spirited conduct of the presbytery of, 425.

AYTON, SIR ROBERT, the poet, noticed, ii. 571.

B.

BADENFORD, ANTHONY, conspiracy of, ii. 217. Its discovery by Walsingham, 219. Execution of, and confederates, 221.

BACHELORS, LOYAL COMPANY OF, ii. 850.

BACON, FRANCIS, LORD, opinion of, respecting the union between England and Scotland, ii. 402.

BADENOCH, JOHN COMYN, LORD OF, appointed one of the regents, i. 82. Sent to treat with the King of England, ib.

BADENOCH, JOHN THE BLACK COMYN, LORD OF, competitor for the crown, i. 88. [See COMYN.]

BADENOCH, ALEXANDER STEWART, LORD OF. [See STEWART.]

BADENOCH, ALEXANDER STEWART, THE WOLF OF. [See BUCHAN.]

BAILLIE, General of the Covenanters, ii. 623. Surprises and pursues Montrose, 624. Ravages the estates of Huntley, 625. Is defeated by Montrose at Alford, ib. Prudent plan of, overruled by the Committee of Estates, 625. Is defeated at Kilsyth, 626. Surrenders to Cromwell at Warrington, 644.

BAILLIE OF JERVISWOOD, iniquitous trial of, ii. 723. Condemnation and execution, 724. Act passed for the restoration of his estate, 794.

BAILLIE, ROBERT, attends the Westminster Assembly, ii. 610. His account of its discussions, 611, 612. Quoted, 619, 621, 627, 666. His account of Cromwell's visit to Glasgow, 663, note. His letters and journals characterized, 970.

BALCALQUHILL, or BALCANOCHALL, WALTER, minister of Edinburgh, ii. 171. His interview with the Earl of Morton, 172. Protests against the "Black Acts," 195, 423. Is obliged to flee into England, ib. Letter of, to the session and members of his church explaining the reasons of his flight, 424. His return, 211. Offends King James by a sermon censuring the government, 442. Disputes with the king in the high church of Edinburgh respecting the scriptural authority of bishops, 429.

BALCARRES, ALEXANDER, EARL OF, commands the cavalry of the Covenanters at the battle of Alford, ii. 625. Submits to the English, 673. Takes up arms in the Highlands, 674.

BALCARRES, COLIN, EARL OF, his proceedings at the revolution, ii. 745. His fidelity to James, ib. Measures adopted by, in Edinburgh, ib. Letters to, from King James, 780. His arrest, ib.

BALFOUR, SIR DUNCAN, killed, i. 98.

BALFOUR, SIR JAMES, draws up bond for murder of Darnley, ii. 37. Denounced as one of the murderers, 49. Surrenders Edinburgh Castle to Moray, 80. Fights at Langside on the side of the regent, 84. Accused of murder of Darnley, 111. Arrest and liberation of, ib. Restored to honours and estates, 142. Evidence of, against Morton, 171.

BALFOUR, JOHN, of Burley. [See BURLEY.]

BALFOUR, BRIGANDIER, killed at Killiecrankie, ii. 788.

BALFOUR, COLONEL, proclaims King James, at Perth, ii. 848.

BALFOUR, ROBERT, Principal of the College of Guienne, ii. 969.

BALLOL FAMILY, founder of, i. 66.

BALLOL, JOHN DE, i. 76, 77. Acknowledges Edward I. as lord paramount of Scotland, 82, 84, 86. Takes the oath of homage to Edward, 87. Descend, through which he claims the crown, ib. Arguments of, in support of his claim, 88. Decision in favour of, by Edward I., ib. Coronation of, 89. Swears fealty to Edward, ib. Summoned before English courts, ib. Resists Edward's pretensions, 90. Is confined by the Scottish parliament, and regents chosen, 90. Renounces his homage to Edward, 91. Offers submission, and implores a peace, 92. Degrading ceremonial of his abdication, ib. Is confined in the Tower, ib. His character, ib. Philip IV. of France attempts to obtain his liberation, 103. He is released at the request of Pope Boniface, ib. Delivered up to the papal legate, ib. His death, 140.

BALLOL, EDWARD, his designs on the Scottish crown, i. 184. Invades Scotland, and gains the battle of Dupplin, 185. Fortifies Perth, 186. Is crowned, and pays homage to Edward, ib. Expulsion from Scotland, ib. Henry, his brother, slain, ib. Returns, and agrees to dismember the kingdom, 189. Flies to England, 190. Surrenders his claims to Edward, 201. His death, ib.

BALLOL, DONALD, rebellion of, and death, i. 266.

BALLARS, Gude and Godly, ii. 312. Against Romish church, 313. "The Huntie is up," 314. "Wae is the Herds of Israel," ib. "Priests Christ believe," ib. "Remember, remember Man," 315. "Hay trix tringo trix," ib. Border, 500.

BALLARD, JOHN, a seminary priest, his plot for invasion of England, ii. 217. Arrest of, 221. His execution, ib.

BALLOCH, DONALD, rebellion of, i. 339. Executed, ib.

BALMERINO, LORD, joins in the petition of the opposition peers to King Charles I., which is abandoned, ii. 509. His enemies surreptitiously obtain a copy and lay it before the king, 510. His arrest and imprisonment, ib. Trial of, ib. Gordon of Buckie addresses the jury in his behalf, 511. His condemnation, ib. Execution delayed, ib. Popular commotion at his iniquitous sentence, ib. Liberation of, and pardon, ib. He holds important meetings with the supplicant leaders against the service book, 522.

BALMERINO, ARTHUR, LORD, motives of, for taking part in the rebellion of 1745, ii. 919. His trial at the bar of the House of Peers in Westminster Hall, 955. He pleads not guilty, ib. He is convicted and condemned, 956. His undaunted behaviour upon the scaffold, ib.

BALNAVES, SECRETARY, noticed, i. 571.

BALNAVES, HENRY, of Halhill, intrigues of, with England, i. 641.

BANDS among the nobles, i. 365.

BANE, DONALD, takes possession of the throne, i. 44. His death, ib.

BANNOCKBURN, field of, i. 133. Battle of, 136, 137.

BANBOUR, JOHN, author of "The Bruce," quoted, i. 114—165. His works described and criticised, 291—294.

BANCLAY, HUGH, of Ladyland, plot and death of, ii. 371.

BANCLAY, JOHN, author of "Argenis," noticed, ii. 970.

BANCLAY, WILLIAM, professor of law, noticed, ii. 969.

BARD, or BERNACHY, description of a, at the coronation of Alexander III., i. 76.

BARONS. (See NOBILITY.)

BARTHELOMEW, ST., the massacre of, and its effects on Mary's cause, ii. 135, 263.

BARTON, CAPTAIN ANDREW, i. 378, 398, 399, 397. Death of, 398.

BARTON, ROBERT, i. 399.

BASILICON DORON, noticed, ii. 377.

BASS, employed as a prison for the covenanters, ii. 73. Capture of, by four Jacobite officers, 805. Its siege by the government, ib. Capitulates on terms, 806.

BASSANDINE, THOMAS, restrictions laid on, ii. 247.

BASTIE, DE LA, ANTHONY D'ARSIE, i. 419. Activity of, 420. Murder of, ib.

BEACON, or BALE-FIRES, ii. 496.

BEATON, DAVID, CARDINAL, elected to primacy, i. 454. Cruelty of, ib. Visits the papal courts, 437. Counsel of to James V., 459. Conduct of, at the king's death-bed, 461. Alleged forgery of the king's will, ib. Character of, 562. Seizes the regency, 563. Opposition of, to Arran, ib. Opposes Henry's negotiations, 567. Imprisoned, ib. Sympathy for, 568. Escape of, 572. Proceedings of, 576. Refuses an interview to Arran, 577. Circumvents Arran, 578. Attempts to convert Angus, 579, 580. Raised to office of chancellor, 581. Persecutions of reformers by, 583. Flies from Hertford, 584. Supports Arran, 585. Conspiracy against, 590. Renewal of plot against, 595.

Quarrel with Norman Leslie, 596. His persecution of Wishart, ib. Assassination of, ib. Immorality of, 601, 604.

BEATON, JAMES, Archbishop of Glasgow, noticed, i. 412, 414, 224, 428. Coalition with Angus, 430. Flight and reconciliation with Angus, 437.

BEATON, JANE, ii. 319. Marriage of, 321.

BEATON, JOHN, Master of the Household, dispatched to Scotland with proposals of accommodation, ii. 120.

BEATON'S MULL, murder of James III. at, i. 367.

BEAUMONT, HENRY DE, one of the "disinherited barons," i. 189.

BEAUFREIRE, i. 198.

BECK, ANTHONY, Bishop of Durham, i. 82. Appointed Governor of Scotland, 83. Accompanies the army of Edward I. into Scotland, 90. Noticed, 92, 99. Besieges Dirleton Castle, 99, 100. His conduct at the battle of Falkirk, 101.

BELHAVEN, LORD, eloquent speech of, against the union with England, ii. 825.

BELL, CAPTAIN, assists in the capture of Stirling, ii. 130. His execution, 131.

BELL, REV. MR., of Glasgow, appointed to preach before the General Assembly, ii. 547.

BELLENDEN, JOHN, Archbishop of Moray, his works criticised, i. 528. His description of "New manners and the auld Scottis," ii. 287.

BELLENDEN, Justice-clerk, conduct of, to wife of Bothwellhaigh, ii. 113.

BELLENDEN, SIR LEWIS, embassy to England, ii. 206. Offers to find a person to assassinate Arran, 208.

BELLENDEN, WILLIAM, his works noticed, ii. 969.

BENNET, SIR WILLIAM, of Grubbert, ii. 359.

BERRINGHAM, JOHN DE, defeats Edward Bruce, i. 148.

BERTWICK, castle restored to the Scots by Richard I., i. 70. Meeting at, of Edward I., and of the competitors for the crown, 87. Parliament assembled at, ib. Second meeting at, ib. Third meeting at, 89. Besieged by Edward, 90. Capitulation of, and cruelties committed by Edward, 91. Parliament held at, by Edward, ib. Captured by Scotch, 147. Fortification of, by the High Steward, ib. Unsuccessful assault of, by the English under Edward II., 150. Siege raised, 151. Besieged by Edward III., 187. Surrender of, 188. Captured by Ramsay, and retaken, 201—226. Taken by the English, 356. Withdrawal of the garrison from, on the accession of King James VI. to the English throne, ii. 402.

BERTWICK, the DUKE OF, expected to head the Scottish Jacobites, ii. 834.

BIBLE, importation of into Scotland, i. 466. Neglect of, by the Scotch Romanists, 470. Translation of, permitted, 571.

BILAND ABBEY, Edward II. defeated at, i. 155.

BILL passed by the lords for a union of the two kingdoms, ii. 816. Restriction clauses in the, ib. For the union passed by both houses, 830.

BINNING, GEORGE, execution and confession of, ii. 174.

BINNY, WILLIAM, capture of Linlithgow Castle by, i. 130.

BISHOPS, English, acquire extensive influence over James VI., ii. 468. Restored by parliament, 473. Scottish, ordained in London, 481. English, differences of opinion among, ib. Scottish, short-sighted policy of, ib. Procedure of the, 483. Accusation against the, 544. Decline the jurisdiction of the assembly, 548. A committee appointed to draw up answers to the declination of the, ib. The assembly declares itself a competent judge of the, 551. Trial and condemnation of the, ib. Rash conduct of the, 604. Their impeachment by the commons, ib. Consecration of the new, 688. Evangelists of the, 700. "Servile letter of the, to James VII., 740.

BISSET, WALTER, foiled in a tournament by Patrick, Earl of Athole, i. 74. His flight to the English court, ib. Sinister advice of, to the English king, ib.

BISSET, WILLIAM, accused of the murder of the Earl of Athole, i. 74. Protected by Alexander II. and his queen, ib.

BLACK, DAVID, minister of St. Andrew's, his attack on the court and government of James VI., ii. 455. Condemnation of, 457.

BLACK ACTS OF 1584, ii. 423.

BLACKMOORS, at the Scottish court, i. 553.

BLACKATER, CAPTAIN WILLIAM, trial for murder of Darnley, ii. 70. Execution of, ib.

BLACKATER, JOHN, arrested for murder of Darnley, ii. 80.

BLACKBURN, JOHN, imprisonment of, ii. 424.

BLACKETT, SIR WILLIAM, ii. 856.

BLACKFRIARS, i. 168.

BLACKNESS, skirmish at, i. 362.

BLACKWALL, THOMAS, Principal of Marischal College, Aberdeen, noticed, ii. 970.

BLACKWOOD, ADAM, author of a defence of Queen Mary, his works criticised, ii. 297.

BLACKWOOD, LAUREN, LAIRD OF, trial of, for harbouring covenanters, unjustly condemned to death, but reprieved, ii. 721.

BLAIR, LAIRD OF, seized by Dundee, ii. 782.

BLAIR CASTLE seized by the Jacobites, ii. 785. It falls into the hands of government, 791.

BLAKENEY, GENERAL, his defence of Stirling Castle in 1745, ii. 942.

BLANTYRE, LORD, ii. 814.

BOCE, HECTOR, his History of Scotland criticised, ii. 285.

BOHEMIANS, revolt of, ii. 412.

BOLINGBROKE, LORD, ii. 845. Correspondence of, with the Earl of Mar, 846.

BONDS demanded from the western gentry that their families and tenants should attend the parish churches, and refused, ii. 708.

BONDSMEN. (See VILLEINS.)

BONIFACE, POPE, requests Edward I. to release John Balliol, i. 103.

- Claims Scotland from Edward, 103, 105. His arguments in favour of his claim, ib. Deserts the Scottish cause, 107.
- BONKILL, SIR JOHN STEWART OF, i. 99. Killed at Falkirk, 101.
- BOOK OF DISCIPLINE completed, i. 693. Approved of by the leading nobles, 694. Ratification of, refused by the council, ib. 7. Second, completed, 273—275.
- BOOKS, proclamation against, printed in foreign countries, ib. 415.
- BORDERERS, depredations of the, ib. 400. Precautions taken by the English against the, 496. The King's Own, their position at Killiecrankie, 786.
- BORDERERS, state of, in 1527, i. 439. Warfare of, 447. Discontinuance of the name, ib. 402. Condition of, in 1613, 406. Division of the lands of, ib. System of warfare, 495. Towers or peels, ib. Towns and villages, ib. State of, 1611—1613, 490. Clans and feuds, ib. Custom of blood revenge, 491. Power, tyranny, and oppression of the chiefs, ib. Castles, monasteries, &c., 494. Tribes, armorial bearings of the, 497. Visit of James V. and Regent Moray to the, ib. Freebooters, 496. Attempts to subjugate the moss-troopers of, 406, their suppression, 500. Ballads, ib. Present state of, 501. Nobles, their lukewarmness to the royal cause, 628.
- BORDER WARDENS, duties intrusted to, ib. 490. Days of truce held by the, ib. Skirmishes between their followers, ib.
- BORTHWICK, murderer of James III., i. 363.
- BORTHWICK, gunner of James IV., i. 407. Killed at Flodden, 408.
- BORTHWICK, SIR JOHN, accused of heresy, i. 472.
- BOSTON, THOMAS, REV., of Jedburgh, ib. 907.
- BOTHWELL, LORD RAMSAY, treason of, i. 383.
- BOTHWELL, EARL OF, commands the Scottish reserve at Flodden, i. 408. Is killed, 409.
- BOTHWELL, PATRICK HEPBURN, EARL OF, imprisoned, i. 443. Intrigues of, with Henry VIII., 446. Is imprisoned a second time, ib. Character of, 579. Is a suitor for the hand of the queen-dowager, ib.
- BOTHWELL, JAMES HEPBURN, EARL OF, husband of Queen Mary, demands the release of Cardinal Beaton, i. 568. Opposes the Regent Arran, 603. Seizes Wishart, 695, 693. Treachery of, 605. Submits to Somerset, 611. Robs Cockburn of Ormiston, 638. Imprisoned, 708. Returns to France, 737. Trial for treason, ib. Absents himself, ib. Invited to return, 752. Attempts to rescue the queen from the murderers of Ricio, 767. Made lieutenant-general and captain of Dunbar, 771. Rising power of, ib. 34. Character of, and Mary's partiality for, ib. Projects of, ib. Wounded while quelling the disturbances on the Borders, 35. Visited by Mary at Hermitage, ib. Conference at Craigmillar, 36. Makes known to Morton the plot against Darnley, 40. Meets Mary and Darnley, 44. His preparations for the murder of Darnley, 45. His accomplices, ib. Reveals his plot to Paris, ib. Proceedings of, on night of murder, 46, 47. Publicly accused of the murder, 49. Superiority of Leith conferred on, by Mary, ib. Rides into Edinburgh with armed followers, 50. Receives command of Edinburgh Castle from the queen, 51. Mock trial of and acquittal, ib. Lordship of Dunbar Castle bestowed on, 52. Threatens the life of Sir James Melville, 53. Compels the nobles to sign a bond in his favour, ib. His abduction of the queen, 54. His divorce from his countess, 55. Confederacy formed against, by the nobles, 56. Banns of marriage with Mary proclaimed by Craig, minister of Edinburgh, 58. Receives a pardon for his abduction of the queen, 57. Created Duke of Orkney and Shetland, ib. Marriage with Mary, ib. His shameful treatment of Mary, 60. His letter to Elizabeth, 61. Attempt to seize his person at Borthwick, 62. Takes refuge in Dunbar, 63. Returns with an army against the confederated nobles, ib. His attempt on the life of Kirkcaldy, 66. Challenges the confederates at Carberry to single combat, ib. Flight of, ib. His fate, 80, and Appendix E, vol. II.
- BOTHWELL, FRANCIS STEWART, EARL OF, bond for release of King, i. 185. Joins king after his release, 187. His plot against Arran, 191. Indignation of, at Mary's death, 230. Joins Huntley against king, 334. His defeat and imprisonment, 335. Entrusted with authority in king's absence, 337. Seizes the King in Holyrood, 342. Joins friends of Moray, 344. Is proclaimed traitor, 345. His attack upon the king at Falkland, and forfeiture, 350. Intrudes into king's presence, 351. Trial and acquittal of, 352. Conditions granted to, ib. Prevents James leaving the palace, ib. Abortive intrigues of, 353. Is proclaimed rebel, ib. Appears in Leith, 359. Driven from Scotland, 360. Miserable condition of, 364.
- BOTHWELL, ADAM, Bishop of Orkney, marries Mary to Bothwell, i. 57. Names James VI., 76.
- BOTHWELL BRIDGE, the battle of, ib. 713. Defeat of the covenanters at, ib. Merciless slaughter of the fugitives from, ib. Treatment of the prisoners taken at, 714.
- BOTHWELL, SIR ANDREW MORAY OF. [See MORAY.]
- BOTHWELLHAUGH, HAMILTON OF. [See HAMILTON.]
- BOUNE, OR, BOHUN, SIR HENRY, attacks Bruce, and is slain, i. 134.
- BOURIGNON, ANTONIA, ib. 767.
- BOWER, LAIRD, character of, ib. 382, note. Noticed, 381, 390. His connection with the Gowrie plot, 381.
- BOWER, WALTER, his history of Scotland described, i. 297.
- BOWER, ARCHIBALD, author of the "History of the Popes," noticed, ib. 971.
- BOWEN, SIR ROBERT, mission of, ib. 157. Mediates between the two rival factions, ib. Again dispatched to Scotland, 165. Interview with king and Morton, ib. Interview with James, 166. Sent with Carey on an embassy to James, 161. Character of, 347, 348. Death of, 373.
- BOWEN, SIR WILLIAM, appointed ambassador to Scotland, ib. 373, 376.
- BOYD, ROBERT, joins Bruce, i. 115.
- BOYD, ROBERT, LORD, noticed, i. 334. Appointed justiciar, 348. Seizes the person of the king, ib. Appointed governor of the king, ib. Downfall of, 350. Flight and death of, ib.
- BOYD, SIR ALEXANDER, of Duchol, intrigues of, i. 348. Trial and execution of, 350.
- BOYD, SIR THOMAS, assassinates Alan, Lord Darnley, i. 318. Is killed, ib.
- BOYD, SIR THOMAS, marries the Princess Mary, and created Earl of Arran, i. 348. His visit to Denmark, 349. His flight to the Continent, and death, 350.
- BOYD, ROBERT, LORD, joins Moray against the queen, i. 745. Sanctions the murder of Ricio, 762. Goes over to queen's party, ib. 63. Noticed, 103, 106, 118.
- BRAIDSHAW, JOHN, his unfeeling behaviour to Charles I., ib. 648.
- BRADFAIR, the gathering of the clans at, ib. 846.
- BRANDE, JOHN, submits to Arran, ib. 205.
- BREADALBANE, the EARL OF, his character, ib. 797. He negotiates with the Highland chiefs, ib. He is accused of double-dealing, ib. He takes the oath of allegiance to William, 799. His feud with M'ian of Glencoe, ib. His cruel policy, 800. Charge against the, 805. He is imprisoned for a short time, ib. His excuses for his non-appearance at Edinburgh, 850.
- BRECHIN CASTLE, Baliol resigns the kingdom of Scotland at, i. 92. Taken by Wallace, 95. Retaken by Edward I., 108.
- BRECHIN, SIR DAVID DE, nephew of Bruce, i. 125. Taken prisoner and pardoned, 126. Joins conspiracy against Bruce, 153. Trial and execution of, ib.
- BRECHIN, SEE OF, founded by David I., i. 166.
- BRECHIN, battle of, and defeat of the Tiger Earl of Crawford, i. 333.
- BREDA, declaration of, read before parliament, ib. 681.
- BRETAGNE, embassy from, i. 322.
- BREWERS, strike of the Edinburgh, ib. 985.
- BRIGHT, meeting of the Estates at, i. 83. Treaty of, ib.
- BROOK, JOHN, ADMIRAL, deputy, ib. 412. Taken prisoner by the Dutch, ib.
- BROWN, JOHN, of Priesthill, character of, ib. 729. Murder of by Claverhouse, ib., and Appendix I, vol. II.
- BRUCE, FAMILY, origin of, i. 66, 113.
- BRUCE, ROBERT DE, a friend of David II., remonstrates against his invasion of England, i. 62.
- BRUCE, ROBERT DE, LORD OF ANNANDALE, competitor for the crown, ib. 82. Invites the interference of Edward, 84. Acknowledges Edward as lord paramount, 86. Takes the oath of homage to Edward, 87. Descent, through which he claimed the throne, ib. Arguments in favour of, 88. His claim set aside, ib. Claims a part of the kingdom, 89. Noticed, 113.
- BRUCE, ROBERT DE, EARL OF CARRICK, son of the competitor for the crown, takes the oath of allegiance to Edward I., i. 87. Supports Edward against Baliol, 91. Reminds Edward of his promise to give him the kingdom, 92. His marriage to the Countess of Carrick, 113.
- BRUCE, ROBERT, son of the preceding, King of Scotland, joins Wallace, i. 95. Appointed one of the guardians of Scotland, 102. His early character and conduct, ib. League with the Bishop of St. Andrew's, 114. Compact with Comyn, ib. Stabs Comyn at Dumfries, ib. Resolves to claim the throne, ib. His supporters, 115. His coronation, ib. Is excommunicated, 116. Defeat at Methven, ib. Defeated by Lord of Lorn, ib. Narrow escape of, 117. Crosses Loch Lomond, ib. Takes refuge in Rahrin, 118. Story of the spider, and fate of his friends, ib. Treatment of his queen, ib. Estates confiscated, 119. Returns to Scotland, 120. Crosses from Arran to Ayrshire, ib. Defeats a body of the enemy at Turnberry, ib. His brothers executed, ib. Attacked by traitors, 121. Adventures with Galwegians, ib. Escapes from Lorn, 122. Loses his banner, 123. Attacked by freebooters, ib. Surprises a body of the English, ib. Expels the enemy from Ayrshire, 124. Defeats Pembroke at Loudon Hill, ib. Retreats from the Earl of Richmond to the north of Scotland, 125. Illness of, ib. Defeats Buchan and Lorn, 126, 127. Recognised as king, 128. Invades England, 129. Captures Perth, 129. Invades the Isle of Man, 131. Prepares to fight the English at Bannockburn, ib. Encounter with Bohun, 134. His address to his troops, 135. His defeat of the English, 137, 138. Conduct to his prisoners, 139, 140. Subdues Lorn, 142. Goes to Ireland to assist his brother, 143. Defeats Ulster, 144. Incident on his march, ib. His reception of the papal legates, 146. Invades England, 148, 151. Attempts to conciliate the Pope, 149. Negotiations for peace, 152. Another invasion, in person, of England, 154. Victory at Bladon, 155. Truce with England, 156. Truce broken, 157. Again invades England, 160. Concludes peace, 161. His death, dying request, and testament, 162.
- BRUCE, EDWARD, brother of King Robert, i. 123, 125. Exploits of, 126. His treaty with the governor of Stirling Castle, 132. Commands at the battle of Bannockburn, ib. His sorrow for the loss of his friends, 138, note. Inroad of, into England, 140. Invades Ireland, ib. Defeats Ulster and Mortimer, 141, 142. Crowned King of Ireland, 142. Defeated and killed, 143.
- BRUCE, NIGEL, brother of King Robert, i. 115. Parts from his brother, 117. His education, 119.
- BRUCE, ALEXANDER and THOMAS, brothers of King Robert, taken and executed, i. 120.
- BRUCE, CHRISTIAN, sister of King Robert, i. 118, 191. Married to Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell, 156.
- BRUCE, MARY, sister of King Robert, cruel confinement of, 119.
- BRUCE, ROBERT, son of King Robert, i. 185.

- BRUCE, MARJORY, daughter of King Robert, i. 118, 139. Her marriage, 141. Her death, 143.
- BRUCE, DAVID. [See DAVID II.]
- BRUCE, REV. ROBERT, nominated extraordinary member of the privy council in the king's absence, ii. 337, 438. Letter from James to, 338. Anoints the queen at her coronation, ib. Interview of, with James, 354. Sues the crown for his stipend, 375. Estimable character of, 389. Doubts the accuracy of the royal narrative respecting the Gowrie conspiracy, 389, 466. His retirement into England, 459. His letter to Lord Hamilton, ib. The king's dislike to, ib. Refuses to use the form of thanksgiving prescribed by the king, and is in consequence banished from the country, 466.
- BRUCE, REV. EDWARD, embassy of, to England, ii. 360. Dispatched with Mar to intercede for Essex, 392.
- BUCCLEUCH, SCOTTS OF. [See SCOTTS.]
- BUCHAN, ALEXANDER, EARL OF. [See COMYN.]
- BUCHAN, ISABELLA, COUNTESS OF, crowns Bruce, i. 116. Imprisoned by Edward, 118, 131.
- BUCHAN, JOHN COMYN, EARL OF, defeated by Bruce, i. 126.
- BUCHAN, ALEXANDER STEWART, EARL OF, the "Wolf of Badenoch," character of, i. 238. Atrocious conduct of, ib. The son of, see STEWART.
- BUCHAN, JOHN STEWART, EARL OF, sent to France, i. 255. Exploits of, 256. Office of constable of France conferred on, ib. Killed at the battle of Verneuil, ib. note.
- BUCHAN, EARL OF, James III. in custody of, i. 356. Is deprived of the office of great chamberlain, 357. Treason of, 383.
- BUCHAN, EARL OF, chosen councillor to James VI., ii. 156.
- BUCHAN, GENERAL, his arrival in Scotland, ii. 791. He is appointed commander-in-chief of the Jacobite forces, ib. His incompetency, ib. His total defeat at Cromdale, 792.
- BUCHANAN, GEORGE, accompanies Moray to England, ii. 90. Approves of Argyll's advice to the king, 152. Chosen councillor to James VI., 153. Death of, 181. Life, character, works, and death bed, 230, 295.
- BUCKINGHAM, COUNTESS OF, and son, i. 416. Accused of poisoning James VI., ib.
- BUCKINGHAM, DUKE OF, i. 830.
- BULLOCK, WILLIAM, chancellor to Balliol, i. 195. Services and fate of, 197.
- BURGHES AND ANTI-BURGHES, i. 905.
- BURGHLEY, LORD, scheme of, for putting Mary to death, ii. 137. Letters to Leicester and Walsingham, 140.
- BURGHES, origin of, i. 217. Deprived of their privileges, ii. 738.
- BURLEIGH, LORD, chosen president of the Scottish parliament, i. 676.
- BURLEY, a royalist officer, tried and executed for treason, ii. 641.
- BURLEY, BALFOUR OF, one of the murderers of Archbishop Sharp, ii. 710. His appearance and character described, ib. note. His bravery at Bothwell Bridge, 713. Death of, ib. note.
- BURNET, ARCHBISHOP, charge against, i. 700. He is compelled to resign his office, ib.
- BURNET, BISHOP, chief of the "Bishops' Evangelists," ii. 700. Presides in the lords at the discussion of the union, 829.
- BUSHELL, CAPTAIN, at the malt-tax riot in Glasgow, i. 884.
- BUXTON, MR., chaplain of the Northumberland insurgents, i. 856.
- C.
- CABAL, the overthrow of, ii. 704.
- CAERLAVROCK, siege of, i. 104. Castle of, 285. Delivered to Henry, and recaptured by the Scots, 593.
- CALDER, CAPTAIN, shoots Regent Lennox, and is executed, ii. 131.
- CALDERWOOD, DAVID, he is punished for protesting against an act prepared by the Lords of the Articles, ii. 411. Banishment of, 485. His History of the Scotch Church, 970.
- CALDONIANS, i. 9. Tribes of, 9, 10. Civilization of, 14, 23.
- CAMERON, RICHARD, labours among the Border freebooters, ii. 500. He is slain at Airdsmoss, 716.
- CAMERON OF LOCHIEL, ii. 915. He joins Charles, 916.
- CAMERON, JOHN, Professor of Divinity in Saumur, ii. 970.
- CAMERONIANS, oppression of the, ii. 725. Their apologetical declarations, ib. They refuse to join Argyll, 733. They sternly reject the indulgence, 739. Three of their leading ministers admitted into the church, 756. They oppose the union with England, 771. Policy of the, 783. A regiment of, raised, ib.—and stationed at Dunkeld, 790. Their perilous position, ib. Their bravery and successful resistance, ib. They are attacked by the Highlanders, ib. Rising of the, in the west, 827. They form a plan to act in concert with the Highlanders, 828. Their deception of the Jacobite emissary, Colonel Hook, 833. Their plan for the surprise of Edinburgh Castle, 835.
- CAMPBELLS, cruelties inflicted by the Marquis of Atholl upon the, ii. 736.
- CAMPBELL OF CAWDOR, SIR COLIN, sheriff of Argyleshire, ii. 799.
- CAMPBELL OF GLENLYON, he marches against the men of Glencoe, ii. 801. His base treachery, 802.
- CAMPBELL, professor of St. Andrew's, a process against for heresy, ii. 695.
- CAMPBELL, DANIEL, OF SHAWFIELD, his mansion destroyed by a Glasgow mob, ii. 884.
- CANONS, book of, compiled, ii. 513. Oppositions of the presbyterians to, 513. Articles specified, 514. Sensation excited by the publication of the, 515.
- CANNON, GENERAL, commander of the Highlanders after Dundee's death, ii. 789. His inefficiency, ib. He retires to the Isle of Mull, 791. He is appointed second in command of the Jacobite forces, ib.
- CARDAN, a reputed magician, i. 618.
- CAREY, SIR GEORGE, arrival in Scotland, and reception of, ii. 163. Interview with James VI., ib.
- CAREY, SIR ROBERT, raid of, ii. 500.
- CARGILL, DONALD, the covenantor, excommunicates the king and his courtiers, ii. 716. His capture and execution, ib.
- CARLISLE ceded to Prince Henry of Scotland, i. 61. Council held at, 63. Taken by Alexander II., 72. Trial of Scotch Jacobite prisoners at, ii. 877.
- CARMICHAEL, SIR JOHN, appointed warden of Middle Marches, ii. 146. His dispute with Foster, the English warden, 149. Sent as prisoner to Elizabeth, and released, 150.
- CARMICHAEL, LORD, he is appointed commissioner of the General Assembly, ii. 755. His arrival in Edinburgh for the purpose of attending the assembly, 762. He fears a collision between the church and the state, ib. He communicates his apprehensions to King William, ib. He receives new instructions, 763.
- CARNWATH, EARL OF, he refuses to take the oath appointed by parliament, ii. 597. He is tried for high-treason, 875. He is found guilty, ib. He obtains a respite, 876.
- CAROLINA, proposals to establish a Scotch colony in, ii. 722.
- CARPENTERS, GENERAL, he arrives at Newcastle, ii. 856. His attack upon the Jacobite insurgents, 860. His arrival at Preston, 864.
- CARRICK, ROBERT, EARL OF. [See BRUCE.]
- CARRICK, DAVID, EARL OF, title of Duke of Rothesay conferred on, i. 241. [See ROTHESAY.]
- CARRICK, JAMES, EARL OF, made prisoner, i. 249.
- CARSTAIRS, the REV. WILLIAM, he is accused of treason, ii. 723. He is examined by torture, ib. His courage and presence of mind, ib. He becomes confidential adviser of King William, 750. The ministers send intelligence of their perplexities to, 762. He intercepts the king's messenger to Scotland, 763. He intercedes for the presbyterians, ib. Success of his interposition, ib. Character of, 777. His courage and integrity, ib. Act passed for the restoration of his estates, 794.
- CASSILLIS, EARL OF, embassy of, to England, i. 590. Conspiracy of, ib. Death of, 623.
- CASSILLIS, EARL OF, attends king's parliament at Stirling, ii. 130. Sentence of forfeiture rescinded, 132.
- CASSILLIS, MASTER OF, imprisoned by Arrian, ii. 201.
- CASSILLIS, GILBERT, EARL OF, cruelty of, and shocking treatment of the Abbot of Crossraguel, ii. 323.
- CATHCART, LORD, chosen councillor to James VI., ii. 156. Interposes between Morton and Stewart, 168.
- CAVALIERS, the Jacobites begin to assume the name of, ii. 813.
- CECIL, ROBERT, sinister policy of, ii. 117. Visits Mary at Chatsworth, 123. Professes attachment to the interests of James VI., 383. His correspondence with the king, ib. Confides in the Scotch ambassadors, 394. Selfish intrigues of, ib.
- CEYNOCK, CAMPBELL OF, trial of, ii. 722. His acquittal, ib.
- CHALMERS OF GATHERING, i. 624.
- CHAMBERS, CHRISTOPHER AND THOMAS, assassins of James I., i. 272. Execution of, 273.
- CHAMBERS, DAVID, denounced as a murderer of Darnley, ii. 49.
- CHAPTER OF MITTON, i. 151.
- CHARLES I., birth and baptism of, ii. 391. Accession of, in 1625, 602. Proclamation, 31st March, ib. Impolitic conduct, ib. Marriage with Henrietta Maria of France, ib. Tries to obtain the restoration of the Elector Palatine, 505. Resolves to visit Scotland, 506. Progress through England, ib. Arrival at Edinburgh, ib. His reception, ib. Valuable gift presented by the provost to, ib. Hears sermon from the Bishop of Dunblane, ib. Coronation of, ib. Proceeds in state to the meeting of parliament, ib. Violates the privileges of parliament, 507. An act of baseness on the part of, ib. Unpopularity of, in Scotland, 508. Opposition of the nobles to, ib. Neglect and contempt of the nobles, ib. Narrow escape from drowning, ib. Pretended cure of king's evil by, ib. His departure from Scotland, 509. Supplication of the opposition lords to, ib. Ungracious reception, ib. Orders immediate observance of the Liturgy, 516. Representation from the privy-council to, 518. Rash policy of, 519. Duplicity of, 523. Secret instructions of, to the Earl of Roxburgh, ib. Rash policy of, 525. He transmits a proclamation by Traquair, ib. Secretly declares the bishops innocent, ib. Unprincipled conduct of, 526. Is forced to answer his Scottish subjects, 530. His directions to the privy-council, ib. He summons councillors for advice, ib. Pernicious advice given to, by the Bishops of Ross and Brechin, 531. Disingenuous policy of, 532. Addresses a letter to the privy-council, ib. Insincerity of, ib. Underhand policy pursued by, 538. His letter to Hamilton, ib. His correspondence with Hamilton, 539. He declares his intention of again visiting Scotland, ib. His letter to the Provost of Edinburgh, 540. His deceitful instructions to Hamilton, 541. Perfidy of, 545. Secret preparations for war made by, 546. Meditates the invasion of Scotland, 553. His plan of procedure, ib. He orders "the large declaration" to be published, 554. He issues a proclamation, ib. He refuses to receive the covenanters' supplication, 557. His rash resolutions unsupported by many of the English nobility, ib. He advances with the royal army to Berwick, 559. Proclamations issued by, ib. Alarm of his army at the sight of the Scots, 560. Difficulties of his position, 561. A treaty proposed by, 562. His apparent consent to the demands of the commissioners, 563. Declaration of, ib. Scottish fortresses delivered to, 564. Deceitful conduct of, 565. Fourteen of the leading covenanters summoned to appear before, ib. Dissatisfaction of, with the conduct of Lord Traquair, 567. Resolves upon renewing hostilities with the Scots, 570. Arrest of the commissioners, by order of, 573. His warrant to

- behead Lord Loudoun, ib. His preparations for war, 574. Difficulties of, ib. Arbitrary and unconstitutional proceedings of, 575. His illegal and oppressive exactions, ib. He succeeds in raising an army, and sets out to join it, 583. Petitions to, from the English nobility, the city of London, and other places, ib. Difficult position of, 587. His answer to the Scots, ib. Reply of the committee to, ib. Makes preparations to renew the war, 588. His opening speech in parliament, 591. He stigmatises the Scots as rebels, ib. He proposes to visit Scotland, 595. His departure for Scotland, ib. He halts at Newcastle, ib. His arrival in Edinburgh, ib. He consults his privy-council, 596. He opens and addresses parliament, ib. His apology for encroaching on the privileges of parliament, 597. He orders the army to be disbanded, ib. His discussion with parliament respecting the nomination of officers of state, ib. He attempts to overawe the parliament, 599. Is alleged to have been privy to the Irish rebellion, 600. Despatches reviewed by, ib. He entertains the members of parliament, 601. He tries to conciliate the Scottish nobility, ib. He dismisses the parliamentary guards, 603. Presentation of the remonstrance to, ib. Violent and unconstitutional proceedings of, 604. He leaves Whitehall, 605. His warlike resolutions, ib. Lord Maitland presents a supplication to, 607. He returns an evasive answer to the Scots, ib. He issues a manifesto counter to that of the covenanters, 610. His army is totally routed at Marston Moor and Newbury, 614. His successful retreat from Donnington Castle terminates the campaign of 1644, ib. Discovery of a secret correspondence between Montrose and, 616. He sends Montrose a new commission, 627. Rule of his cause, 631. His fruitless attempt to join Montrose, 632. Discovery of his intrigues with the Irish rebels, ib. He disavows Glamorgan's commission, 633. Desperate state of his affairs, ib. His flight from Oxford, ib. He takes refuge in the Scottish camp, ib. Terms offered to, ib. His controversy with Henderson, 634. He refuses the terms offered by the Scots, 635. He is delivered up to the parliament, 636. He is seized by the common soldiers, 638. His treatment by the troops, 639. He rejects the proposals made by the army, ib. His secret negotiations with the Scots, 640. He rejects the modified propositions of the parliament, ib. He is denounced by the troops, ib. He escapes from Hampton Court to the Isle of Wight, ib. Fresh negotiations opened with him, ib. He concludes a secret treaty with the Scots, 641. His reply to the parliament, ib. His reply to the "Declaration" of parliament, 642. Negotiations resumed with, 645. Terms agreed to by, ib. Court appointed for the trial of, 646. He is brought from Hurst Castle to Windsor, 647. His meeting with Hamilton at Windsor, ib. He is brought before the court, ib. Coke states the charge against, ib. He declines the authority of the court, ib. His treatment by the soldiers and the rabble, 648. Rejection of his request to be heard before sentence, ib. Generous offer on behalf of, by his son and friends, 649. His last interview with his children, ib. His conduct on the scaffold, ib. His execution, 650. His character, ib.
- CHARLES II. is proclaimed king, ib. 652. His duplicity, ib. Negotiations with, ib. His commission to Montrose and double-dealing, 653. His arrival in Scotland, 660. His treatment by the clergy, 661. Declaration exacted from, 662. Policy of, 664. His flight from Perth, 665. His return, ib. Improvement in his situation, ib. Faithful address of Robert Douglas to, 668. Takes the coronation oath, 669. Defeat of at Worcester, 672. Escape of, to the continent, ib. His declaration from Breda, 681. His restoration, 682. His dislike to presbyterianism, ib. Perjury of, 682. Dupery of, 709. Complaint made to, by the Scots, 709. Death and character of, 727.
- CHARLES EDWARD, PRINCE, his departure from Rome, ib. 912. He arrives at Paris, ib. He proceeds to Dunkirk, ib. He corresponds with the earl-marischal, 913. He returns to Paris, ib. He intimates his resolution to proceed to Scotland, ib. He is aided by private individuals, 914. His retinue, ib. He embarks for Scotland, 22nd June, 1745, ib. His encounter with a British man-of-war, ib. His arrival in the Hebrides, ib. His interview with Clanranald, 915. He proceeds to the mainland, ib. His perseverance, ib. The spread of the news of his landing, 916. Proceeds to Glenfinnan, and sets up his standard, 917. A price set on the head of, 918. His retort, ib. He resolves to march on the capital, 919. Makes his public entry into Perth, 920. Resumes his march to the south, ib. Takes Edinburgh, 923. His father proclaimed king, ib. Personal appearance of, ib. Defeats the royal army at Preston, 927. Proposes to invade England, 929, 934. Daily employments of, 930. Spirited proclamation, 932. Sets out for the south, 934. Invests Carlisle, 935. Visits Glasgow, 940. Takes his departure for the north, 941. At the battle of Falkirk, 943. Besieges Stirling, 945. Enters Inverness, 947. At the battle of Culloden, 949. Adventures of, 952. He is saved by Flora Macdonald, 953. Hardships endured by, 954. His embarkation and arrival in France, ib. Last days of, 955.
- CHARTER, ancient, of King Atheistane, i. 213.
- CHARTERIS, COLONEL, ib. 862.
- CHASTELLET, offence and execution of, i. 715.
- CHASTELLET-BAULI, DURE, of, protest of, i. 623. His measures against catholics, 641. Deprived of governorship of Dunbarton Castle, 708. Makes his peace with Mary, 737. Surrenders Hamilton and Draphane Castles, ib. Absents himself from General Assembly, ib. 19. Assists to reconstruct Mary's party, 71. Arrangement with Moray, 103. Imprisoned by him, 104. Liberated, 115. Asserts queen's authority, 250. Attempts to secure the support of the General Assembly, ib. Accommodation effected between him and Moray, 251.
- CHATTAN, CLAN, fight between, and Clan Kay, i. 239.
- CHIEFS, HIGHLAND, discent of the, ib. 866.
- CHRISTOLM, WILLIAM, Bishop of Dunblane, immorality of, ib. 319.
- CHRISTIANITY, introduction of, into Scotland, i. 49, 50.
- CHURCH, alarm of ministers for the safety of the, ib. 400. Subversion of the, 403. Constitution and discipline of the, ib. Feeble stand made by the, against Arran's projects, 422. Effect of Arran's administration upon the, 428. Scruples of, about praying for Mary's preservation, 432. Annexation of its lands to the crown, 434. Grievances of the, 436. Petitions from the, for the dismissal of papists from the service of the crown, 437. Progress of the presbyterian, 443. Unsatisfactory relation of, 458. Measures taken by the king against the, 459. Poverty of the, 503. State of the, 675. Feuds between the Resolutions and Protesters in, 675. Council respecting the, 687. The effect of the revolution upon the, 750. The proceedings of parliament with regard to the, 752. Parliament passes an act for the peace and quiet of the, 761. Imminent hazard of a collision between, and state, 762. Measures employed by the, for strengthening her position, 764. The improved position of the, ib. Position and efforts of the, during the rest of William's reign, 765. Feelings of the, with regard to the union, 771. Immediate effects of the union painful to the, 773. Threatenings of danger to the, ib. Settlement of the, postponed, 779.
- CHURCHES, tyrannical proceedings of the king against the, ib. 454. Vacant, character of those appointed to the, 692. Objections started both in Scotland and England to the mutual toleration of the two, 772.
- CLASSES, Act of, passed in parliament, ib. 652.
- CLAYVENHOUSE, JOHN GRAHAM OF, his character, ib. 711. His defeat at Drumclug, 712. His retreat to Edinburgh, ib. His merciless conduct at Bothwell Bridge, 713. His atrocious cruelties to the covenanters, 727. His murder of John Brown, 730, and Appendix L. Attempts to save the life of a covenantor, 731. Created Viscount Dundee, 745. His fidelity to James, ib. Attends the Scottish convention, ib. He is threatened by the covenanters, 747. His flight from Edinburgh, ib. Letters from James to, intercepted, 780. Attempt to arrest, ib. He escapes, ib. He arrives at Inverness, 781. He acts as mediator between Macdonald of Keppoch and the people of Inverness, ib. He proposes to raise the clans, ib. His preparations for another campaign, 784. His march to Blair, 786. He resolves to attack the royal forces under Mackay, ib. He is slain at the battle of Killiecrankie, 787. Treatment of his body by the Highlanders, ib.
- CLELAND, COLONEL WILLIAM, present at Drumclug, ib. 712. Appointed commander of the Cameronian regiment, 784. His intrepid conduct at Dunkeld, 790. His death, ib. Character and attainments of, ib., note.
- CLERGY, i. 69, 128. Contest respecting independence of, 169. Pretensions of English prelates, ib. Contest of, with the pope, 170. Privileges granted to, 171. Character and condition of schools of, 176. Cultivation of arts by, ib. Character of, from 1370 to 1436, 275. Privileges of, ib. Superstition of, ib. Wycliff's doctrines introduced, ib. Policy of James I. towards, 277. Character of, from 1436 to 1488, 377—and from 1436 to 1542, 463, 473. Conduct of, on the imprisonment of Beaton, 563. Assembly and dispersion of, 569. At the death of Beaton, 599. Their persecution of the reformers, 661, 665. Controversy on the Lord's Prayer, 673. Meetings of, ib. Measures of reform among, ib. Provincial council of, 682. Weak arguments of, 690. Pretended miracle, 691. Celebrate mass, 716. Views and efforts of, in 1561, ii. 1. Distribution of revenues among, after Reformation, 7. Their exactions, 316. Ignorance and superstition of, 317. Immorality of, 318. Effects of celibacy among, 319.
- CLERGY, PROTESTANT, outlawry of, i. 627. Book of discipline prepared by, 693. Office of superintendent among, 695. Stipends, ib. Schools, colleges, and universities, ib. Church censure, ib. Elders and deacons, 696. Weekly exercise, ib. Alleged defect in formation of reformed church, ib. Efforts for maintenance, 706. Act providing for, ib. Stipends, 707—ii. 843. Application for provision, ii. 7. Complaints of, 8. Synods, 12. Poverty of, 26. Questions on baptism and marriage, 27. Increasing embarrassment, 30. Morton's injustice to, 146. Pay of superintendents stopped, ib. List of adversaries among, to Lennox and Arran, 178. Deputation to James VI., 183. Opposition of, to banquet to La Motte Fénelon, ib. Arran's tyranny towards, 194. Flight of the, 195. Sufferings of the, 238. Commission to decide jurisdiction of, 244. Intolerance of, 245. Inadequacy of support to, 248. Attempts to regain possession of the thirds, 268. First Book of Discipline prepared by, 273. Second Book of Discipline, 279. Protestation of the, against an act interfering with the rights of the church, 411. De-CLUB, THE, formation of, from French court to Queen Mary, ii. 23. Factions conduct of the, 778. Proceedings of the, 782. Plot of the leaders of the, against King William, 793. They open a correspondence with James, ib. Ignominious defeat of the, 794. Is broken up, 795.
- COBHAM, LORD, worthless character of, ib. 401. Trial, condemnation, and pardon of, ib.
- COCHRANE, EARL OF MAR, i. 352, 354. Murder of at Lauder, 355.
- COCHRANE, SIR JOHN, an associate of Argyll in his invasion of - Scotland, ii. 733. Lands at Greenock, ib. Escapes into Ayrshire, 734. Is betrayed by his uncle's wife, ib. His pardon purchased by his father, 736.

- COCKBURN OF HENDERLAND hanged by James V., i. 443.
- COCKBURN, SIR JAMES, chosen commissioner by Mary, ii. 90.
- COCKBURN, SIR ADAM, noticed, ii. 852.
- COCKERMOUTH, noticed, i. 231.
- COCKIE, an Edinburgh citizen, executed with Kirkaldy of Grange, ii. 145.
- COINAGE, ii. 228.
- COLBARNSPATH, i. 244, ii. 663.
- COLDINGHAM, Regent Arran undertakes an expedition against, i. 586.
- COLLAGE, JOHN, noticed, i. 333.
- COLLAGE, JESUITA, burning of the, ii. 742. Its printing-press and library destroyed, ib.
- COLONISTS, DARIEN, their arrival at, and proceedings there, ii. 810. Distress of the, ib. They are attacked by the Spaniards, ib. Barbarous orders of King William regarding, 811. Continued disasters, ib. Their final destruction, ib.
- COLUMBA, St., birth and parentage of, i. 25. Embarks for Scotland, 26. Lands at Iona, ib. Commences his labours amongst the Picts, ib. His death, 27.
- COLVILLE, SIR RICHARD, noticed, i. 327.
- COLVILLE, JOHN, embassy to England, ii. 184, 185. Refuses to submit to Arran, 190. Plot against Arran, 191. Intrudes into king's presence with Bothwell, 351.
- COLVILLE OF EASTER WEMYSS dispatched to England, ii. 360. Reply to the king's threats to the hughers, 360.
- COMET, appearance of, and alarm caused by, ii. 412.
- COMMISSION, HIGH COURTS or, appointed to be held in Scotland, ii. 407. Union of Scotch and English, ib. Established by King James in Scotland, 479. Courts of, in Glasgow and St. Andrew's united, and placed under the authority of Archbishop Spotswood, 694. Arbitrary and illegal proceedings of, 695.
- COMMISSION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY, contest between the Court of Session and the, ii. 882. Treatment of the Seceders by, 896.
- COMMISSIONERS to negotiate a union with England appointed, ii. 400. They assemble at Westminster, 402. Narrow views of, with regard to the commercial intercourse of Scotland and England, ib. Appointment of, by Charles to treat with the Scots, 562. Meeting of, on the 9th of June, ib. Unexpected appearance of the king before the, ib. They specify their requests in writing, ib. Encouraging reply from the king to the, 563. They present a paper containing the reasons of their demands, ib. Treaty of peace signed on the 18th of June by the, ib. Verbal explanations of the Scotch, disavowed by the English, 564. Scotch, their contest with Laud, 572. Their unsatisfactory interviews with King Charles, ib. English appointed by Charles to treat with the Scots in 1640, 589. Meeting at Ripon of the, ib. Preliminaries agreed on by the, 590. They transfer the treaty to London, ib. A truce concluded by the, ib. Their departure for London, 591. Their charges against Laud, 592. The treatment received by, in London, 593. Inquiry into the conduct of the, sent to offer the crown to William of Orange, 779. Appointed to treat of the union, 814. Result of their deliberations, 815. Reappointment of the, 819. Their meeting and plan of procedure, ib. Proposal made by the Scotch for a federal union, 820—rejected by the English, ib.
- COMMITTEE OF THE ESTATES appointed to remonstrate with Charles at Edinburgh, ii. 570. Request presented to the king by the, ib. For regulating the order of the house, 595.
- COMMONS, HOUSE of, opposition of the, to the Darien Company, ii. 809. Tyrannical conduct of the, ib.
- COMMONWEALTH, the, ii. 652.
- COMPANY, DARIEN, abolition of, ii. 823. Compensation given to members of, ib. [See DARIEN.]
- COMPANY, EAST INDIA, alarm of the, at the Darien Act, ii. 809.
- COMPANY, YORK BUILDINGS, forfeited estates purchased by the, ii. 822.
- "COMPLAINT," work so called, described and analysed, i. 537—541. Quoted, ii. 286.
- COMYN FAMILY, their great influence under Alexander III., i. 76. Supported by the queen, 77. English faction overthrown by, ib. Their leader, Walter, Earl of Monteth, poisoned, ib. Jealousies between them and the Bruces, 86.
- COMYN, JOHN, LORD, OF BADENOCH, appointed one of the regents, i. 82. Sent to treat, in the presence of Edward, with the Norwegian ambassador, ib.
- COMYN, JOHN THE BLACK COMYN, competitor for the crown, takes the oath of homage to Edward I., i. 86. The descent from which he claimed, 87.
- COMYN, JOHN, YOUNGER, OF BADENOCH, surnamed the Red, appointed one of the guardians of the kingdom, i. 102. Defeats the English at Roslin, 107, 108. Is driven to take refuge in the fastnesses, 108. Attempts to defend the passage of the Forth against Edward, ib. Dispersion of his forces, 109. Is obliged to submit to the English king, ib. His claims to the crown, 113. His jealousy of Bruce, ib. Conference with Bruce, 114. Adjustment of their claims on the crown, ib. His betrayal of Bruce to the English king, ib. Murder of, by Bruce and his followers, ib.
- COMYN, SIR ROBERT, slain, i. 114.
- COMYN, ALEXANDER, EARL OF BUCHAN. [See BUCHAN.]
- COMYN, WALTER, slain at Moffat, i. 186.
- COMYN, CASTLE of, taken by Bruce, i. 130.
- "CONCERT," formed by the Jacobites, ii. 911. Treasonable schemes of the, ib.
- CONFEDERACY formed against Bothwell, ii. 58.
- CONFEDERATES attempt to seize the queen and Bothwell, ii. 62. March against Mary at Carberry Hill, 64. Forces and leaders of, 65. Letters to England and France, 69. Letters to Lennox and Moray, ib. Overtures to the Hamiltons by, 72. Act of indemnity, 81.
- CONFERENCE between the privy-council and some ministers regarding the policy of the church, ii. 430. Appointed by General Assembly respecting proposed changes in the church, 463. Meetings held successively at Falkland, St. Andrew's, and Holyrood, ib. Different points discussed by the, 464. Result of the, unsatisfactory to the king, ib. Held at Falkland 15th July, 1608, 478. And 4th May, 1609, 479.
- CONSTANTINE II. succeeds to the throne of Scotland, i. 33. He is slain, ib.
- CONSTANTINE III., accession of, i. 34. Defeats the Danes at Finmore, i. ib. Invades England and is defeated, ib. Retires to a monastery, ib.
- CONTROVERSY, the "Marrow," ii. 832.
- CONVENTICLES, origin of, ii. 694. Severe acts against, 701.
- CONVENTION held at Linlithgow, 11th December, 1607, ii. 477. Proceedings of the, ib. Overture from the king to the, assigning constant moderators in all presbyteries, ib. Of the Estates held 1625, 503. Held at Westminster by the Prince of Orange, 741. Meeting of the, in Edinburgh at the Revolution, 745. Hamilton is elected president of the, 746. Letter read from William to the, ib. Letter read from James to the, ib. Unfavourable effect upon the, ib. Excitement in the, 747. Measures adopted for the defence of the kingdom by, 748. Held at Edinburgh, March, 1659, 760. Draws up a claim of right, ib.
- CONVOCACTION, sitting of the English, ii. 575. Enactments passed by the, ib.
- CORP. SIR JOHN, orders given to, by the government, ii. 918. Marches against the Highlanders, ib. The number and condition of his forces, ib. His perplexity, 919. His unwise march to Inverness, ib. Takes shipping from Aberdeen to Dunbar, 924. Marches to meet the Jacobite forces, ib. Position taken up near Tranent, 925. Irresolute conduct of, ib. Total defeat and flight to Berwick, 927. Joy of, at the defeat of Hawley, 945.
- CORONATION OF ALEXANDER III., manner of, i. 75. Of Robert Bruce, 115. Of James VI., ii. 76. Of Anne, queen of James VI., 338, 439. Of King James and his queen at Westminster, 402. Of Charles I., 506. Of Charles II., 668.
- CORBACK, NEILSON of, a covenantar, shameful treatment of, ii. 696. Is taken prisoner, and subjected to the torture of the boots, ib.
- COTTON, COLONEL, noticed, ii. 865.
- COUCE, INGELRAM DE, noticed, i. 74.
- COUNCIL, PRIVY, petitions King James against the use of the Liturgy, ii. 519. Besieged with supplications against the Liturgy, 520. Order of, for removal of law courts to Linlithgow, ib. In danger from the mob, 521. Forced to join in opposing the service-book, ib. Receives protection from the popular nobles, 522. Issues a proclamation denouncing the tumult, ib. And Court of Session meet at Linlithgow 1st November, 1637, ib. Adjournment to Stirling, ib. Meeting of, summoned by the treasurer to watch the progress of the agitation, 14th November, 1637, ib. Alarm of, at the increase of supplicants against the service-book, ib. Proclamation issued by, ib. Inconsiderate assent, 523. Meeting of, at Dalketh, 12th December, 524. Joint petition from commissioners to, ib. Lords of the, evade the reception of the commissioners' petition, ib. Act of, promising the supplicants a hearing, ib. Accusation against the bishops presented to the, ib. Speeches from deputies to the, ib. Perplexing position of the, ib. A protest against proclamation of the, 525. Meeting of the, to consider the state of the country, 530. Message to King Charles I. from the, ib. Division in the, ib. Petitioned to subscribe the covenant, 535. Appoints a meeting with the covenanters, ib. Important acts passed by, respecting the concessions made by Charles, 542. Acts published by, limiting the attendants of the commissioners, 545. Alteration by, of their acts against episcopacy, 569. Oppressive conduct of the, towards the covenanters, 711. Opposition of the, to the plans of James VII., 737. Communication of, with James Interdicted, 742. Indecision of, with regard to Captain Green, 817.
- COUNCIL, SECRET, LORDS of, memorial addressed to, against the bishops, ii. 521.
- COUNCIL, SECRET, abolished, ii. 832.
- COUNTRY, state of the, in 1603, ii. 400. Condition of the, in 1603—1609, 404. State of the, in 1638, 531. Miserable state of the, in 1651, 668. Financial state of the, in 1654, 677. Distracted state of, in 1688, 1689, 742. Critical position of, in 1693.
- COURT, the shameful conduct of the, to the Marquis of Argyll, ii. 684. Immorality of the, 880.
- COURTS, corruption of the, ii. 704.
- COURTS, LOCAL, establishment of, ii. 832.
- COVENANT, NATIONAL, the drawing up and origin of, i. 624; ii. 163, 278. New signatures to, i. 629. Terms of, 684. Subscribed by king's court, ii. 279. Revival of the, 526. Additional clause to the, 527. Denunciation of the, by the prelatial party, ib. Beneficial influence of the, ib. Concluding declaration of the, 528. Its formal approval by the committees of the tables, ib. Subscription of the, ib. Transmission of copies of the, to all the presbyteries of the kingdom, ib. General submission to the, 529. Opposed by the doctors and magistrates of Aberdeen, 540. Subscription of the, by the high commissioner and privy-council, 567.
- COVENANTERS, great numbers of, ii. 528. Influence of the, ib.

- New supplication to the king from the, 529. Contemptuous answer from the king to the, ib. The proceedings of, declared illegal, 530. Commissioners appointed by, to procure subscriptions to the covenant, 531. Great increase of the, ib. Excesses of the, ib. Outrageous treatment of the prelatial clergy by the, ib. Increased demands of the, 532. A fast proclaimed by the, 533. Meeting of the deputies of the, ib. Their imposing display at the reception of Hamilton, the royal commissioner, 535. Their apparent cordiality with Hamilton, ib. They demand a General Assembly, and a free parliament, ib. They circulate a paper among their friends, ib. They threaten a protest against Hamilton's proclamation, 536. They present a new supplication to Hamilton, 25th June, 537. They protest against the king's proclamation, ib. They justly suspect the sincerity of Charles, 540. They protest against the act of the privy-council, 545. They again petition the king, 553. They are apprised of the designs of Charles, ib. They publish a vindication of their proceedings, ib. Preparation of the, for the defence of the country, 554. Perilous circumstances of the, 555. Their arrangements, ib. Surrender of Edinburgh Castle to the, 556. Capture of the castles of Dunbarton, Dalkeith, Strathavon, Tantallon, and Brodick by the, ib. A new supplication sent to the king by the, 557. They send repeated deputations to the king, 559. A fast proclaimed by the, ib. Vigorous measures adopted by, 560. March towards the Borders to resist the royal army, ib. Again supplicate the king, 562. Fourteen of the leading, summoned to attend the king, 565. They are detained by the populace, 566. Aid of, solicited by the English liberals, 607. Alliance formed by, with the English parliament, 608. Alleged to have been overreached by the English commissioners, 609. An army levied by the, to assist the parliament, ib. Manifesto issued by the, 610. They make overtures to Montrose, 617. Their defeat, by Montrose at Tippermuir, 619—at Bridge of Dee, 620—at Inverloch, 623—at Auldearn, 624—at Alford, 625—at Kilsyth, 626. Insurrection of, in Galloway, 695. Their total defeat, by Dalzell, at Rullion Green, 696. Renewal of the covenant, and publication of manifesto by, ib. Cruel treatment of, after the battle, ib. Condemnation of those accused in their absence, 698. An indemnity offered to, on certain conditions, 699. Description of a communion held by, in the Merse of Berwickshire, 702. Renewed persecution of the, 705. Their disapproval of Sharp's murder, 710. Their defeat at Bothwell Bridge, 713. Increased persecution of the, 714. Effects of the persecution upon their minds and tempers, ib. Not guilty of rebellion, 715. Views of the extreme party amongst the, ib. Renewed persecutions of the, 720, 723, 729. All of the, in prison sent to Dunnottar Castle, 736. Severe sufferings of the, during the journey, ib. Shocking treatment of, in the castle, ib. Many of them sold for slaves, ib. Partial indulgence of the, 739. A few accept the indulgence, ib. The numbers who suffered during the persecution, ib. Dissatisfaction of, with the establishment of the church at the revolution, 756.
- CRAIG, SIR THOMAS, the great lawyer, i. 970.
- CRAIG, JOHN, a distinguished mathematician, ii. 971.
- CRAWFORD, EARLS OF, i. 239, 286, 287, 325, 333, 362, 365, 408, 422, 446, 596; ii. 118, 153, 185, 187, 213, 214, 334, 598, 599, 692, 777, 796.
- CRICHTON OF BRUNSTON, conspiracy of, i. 594.
- CRICHTON, SIR WILLIAM, appointed chancellor, i. 316. Conduct of, 317. Reconciled to Livingston, 318. Carries off the king to Edinburgh, 319. Reconciliation with Livingston, 320, 322. Files to Edinburgh, 323. His estates confiscated, ib. Reconciled to Douglas, 324. Chosen chancellor by king, 326. Attacked by Douglas, 330. Death of, 336.
- CRICHTON, SIR JAMES, i. 334.
- CRICHTON, MARGARET, marriage of, i. 321.
- CRUC, DE, French ambassador, tries to persuade Darnley not to go abroad, ii. 33. Meets Darnley, ib. Attempts to reconcile Mary and confederates, 65.
- CROFTS, SIR JAMES, treachery of, i. 643.
- CRONDALE, defeat of the Highlanders at, ii. 792.
- CROMWELL, OLIVER, his first visit to Scotland, ii. 645. His invasion of Scotland, 661. His manifesto to the Scots, ib. He is foiled by Leslie in his attempt to force the Scottish lines, 662. He is compelled to retreat, ib. His critical situation at Dunbar, ib. Is relieved from his peril by the victory at Doon Hill, 664. Obtains possession of the capital, ib. His correspondence with the ministers of Edinburgh, ib. Conciliatory policy of, 665. His letter to the Committee of Estates, ib. His correspondence with the western levies, 666. His visit to Glasgow, 666, 669. His treatment of the moss-troopers, 666. Reduction of Scottish fortresses by, 668. Severe illness of, 669. He falls in his attempt upon the Scottish lines at Stirling, 670. Prompt measures adopted by, to meet the invasion of England by Charles, 671. His "crowning mercy," the overthrow of the Scotch army at Worcester, 675. Terms presented by, to the Scotch, ib. Prohibits the meetings of the General Assembly, 676. Incorporates the two nations into one commonwealth, 677. Benefits conferred by, on Scotland, ib. Death of, ib. His character, ib.
- CROMWELL, RICHARD, peaceful accession of, ii. 678. His character, ib. He summons a parliament, ib. Opposition of the republican party to, 679. Resignation of, 699.
- CULDESS, origin of, i. 50. Doctrines of, ib. Nature of their establishments, ib. Form of government of the, 51. Controversy regarding the, 51, 52. Religious houses of the, 53. Opposition of, to Romish errors, 65. Denounced by the second council of Chalons, 56—and by fifth canon of the council of
- Ceal-hythe, ib. Learning of, ib. Distinguished writers connected with the, 57. Branches taught in the schools of the, 58. Abrogations of the privileges and observances of the, by Queen Margaret, 59.
- CULEN, accession of, to the Scottish throne, i. 35. His unworthy conduct and death, ib.
- CULLEY, CAPTAIN, an associate of Bothwell, noticed, ii. 62. Accused of the murder of Darnley, 70.
- CUMBERNAULD BOND against Argyll and his associates signed by Montrose and other nobles, ii. 615.
- CUNNINGHAM, ROBERT, accuses Bothwell, ii. 62.
- CUNNINGHAM, JOHN, of Drum Whaseil, at capture of Dunbarton Castle, ii. 126. Keys of Edinburgh Castle entrusted to, 154. Put to death by Arran, 201.
- CUNNINGHAM OF ECKET is chosen leader of the Highlanders and Cameronians, ii. 828. He deserts the cause, ib.
- CUNNINGHAM, ALEXANDER, author of the "History of Great Britain," ii. 970.
- CUNNINGHAM, ALEXANDER, professor in the University of Edinburgh, ii. 971.
- CURATES, character of the, ii. 692. Ejection of, from their churches, 744.
- CURLE, secretary of Queen Mary, arrested and examined, ii. 222. Evidence of, against Mary, ib.
- CURLE, ELIZABETH, attends Mary at her execution, ii. 235.
- CURRY, WILLIAM, assists in the capture of Edinburgh Castle, i. 196.
- CUSTOMS, equalized in England and Scotland, ii. 821. Duties of, evaded by the Scots, 831.

D.

- DACRE, LORD, at the battle of Flodden, i. 407. Intrigues against Scotland, 414. At the battle of Pinkie, 607.
- DACRES, LEONARD, rebellion of, against Elizabeth, ii. 112, 116.
- DALGLEISH, GEORGE, one of Darnley's murderers, ii. 45, 46. Trial and execution of, 81.
- DALGLEISH, NICOI, minister of St. Cuthbert's, tried and condemned for holding correspondence with rebels, ii. 424.
- DALRYMPLE, SIR JAMES, Viscount Stair, advice given by, respecting the union with England, ii. 748. Made president of the Court of Session, 777. His character, 778, 779. Attack upon, ib. Tragic incident in the family of, Appendix, vol. ii, note N.
- DALRYMPLE, SIR JOHN, Earl of Stair, appointed one of the commissioners to offer the crown to William and Mary, ii. 749. Re-appointed lord advocate, 777. His sagacious advice to King William, 778. His conduct, and the charges made against him, 779. Character of, ib. Excepted from indemnity by the club "plotters," 795. Vindictive policy of, towards the Highlanders, 798. His disingenuous proceedings, 800. Procures a warrant against the men of Glencoe, ib. His letters respecting them, 801. His share in the massacre of Glencoe, ib. Is appointed joint secretary, 803. Guilt of the Glencoe massacre imputed to him by the parliament, 804. His dismissal from office, and why, 805—809. His death, 829, note.
- DALZELL, SIR WILLIAM, his jousting with Piers Courtenay, i. 248.
- DALZELL, GENERAL, defeats the covenanters at Rullion Green, ii. 696. His brutal character, 698. Favourable anecdote respecting, ib., note. His cruel treatment of the covenanters, ib. Is present at the battle of Bothwell Bridge, 712. Is excommunicated by Cargill, 716. Instrument of torture brought by, from Russia, 723.
- DALZELL, CAPTAIN, treats with General Willis for the surrender of the Scots at Preston, ii. 865.
- DAMIAN, JOHN, Abbot of Tongland, his attempt to fly, i. 556. Dunbar's satire on, 561.
- DANGEROUS CASTLE, i. 127, note.
- DARIEN COMPANY, the, projected by William Patterson, ii. 807. His explanation of the advantages of, ib. Warmly supported by the government, 808. Extravagant expectations of the people from, ib. Capital subscribed and payment of instalments, ib. Provisions of the act for the establishment of, ib. Subscription books opened for, in London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, ib. And at Hamburg, 809. Alarm of the East India Company and English parliament at, ib. Withdrawal of the English shareholders from, ib. Addresses to the king respecting, ib. His answer, 810. Sailing of the first expedition, ib. Arrival at Darien, ib. Nature of the site, ib. Foundation of New Edinburgh, the intended capital, ib. Sufferings of the colonists, ib. Attacked by the Spaniards, ib. Condemnation of Captain Pinkerton and his crew as pirates, ib. Barbarous orders issued by King William, 811. Desertion of the colony, ib. Dispatch of a second and a third expedition from Scotland, ib. Expedition under Campbell of Finab, and his victory over the Spaniards, ib. Arrival of the second and third expeditions, ib. Their disappointment, quarrels, and difficulties, ib. Blockade of the colony, capitulation to the Spaniards, ib. Final ruin of the colony, ib. Indignation of the Scottish people at the news, ib. Address to the king respecting, 812. His answers and policy, ib. Discussions in the Estates respecting the, ib. Riot in Edinburgh, ib. Seizure of the ship Annandale belonging to the, and its consequence, 816. Its abolition by the treaty of union, 823.
- DARNLEY, LORD, husband of Queen Mary, arrival in Scotland, i. 732. First interview with Mary, ib. Chosen by Mary for her husband, 734. Motives for her choice of, ib. Overbearing conduct of, 735. Intimacy with Riccio, ib. Opposition of the nobles and Protestant party to the match, 736. Disapprobation of Elizabeth, 733. Earl of Moray refuses his consent, 739. Knighted, and created Earl of Ross, 740. Pride and inso-

- lence of, 744. Supposed plots of, 745. Refuses to return to England, 748. Folly of, ib. Married to Mary, 749. Created Duke of Albany, ib. Proclaimed king, ib. Headstrong conduct, 750. Vicious behaviour of, 758. Demands crown matrimonial, 759. Becomes jealous of Riccio, ib. Instigates the plot against Riccio, ib. Draws up the bond for, 762. Objects of conspiracy, 763. His conduct at the murder of Riccio, 766. Imprisons Mary, and takes the government into his own hands, 768. Reconciled to Mary, 769. Protests his innocence at the birth of his son, 771. His quarrels with and hatred of Mary, ii. 31. His intrigues with Rome, ib. Threatens to go abroad, ib. Interview with queen and lords of privy council, 32. States his grievances to Mary, 33. Arrests Mary at Jedburgh, 36. Bond drawn up for the murder of, 37. Plots formed at Craigmillar against his life, ib. Absents himself from the baptism of his son, 38. Takes up his residence at Glasgow, 39. Illness and capricious conduct of, ib. Visited by Mary, 41. Returns with her to Edinburgh, 44. Takes up his abode at Kirk-of-field, ib. Murder of, 46, 47. Burial of, 48. His character, ib.
- D'AUBIGNY, arrival from France, ii. 160. Becomes king's favourite, 161. Created Earl of Lennox, ib. [See LENNOX.]
- DAVID I., succeeds to the throne, i. 60. Expedition against Stephen, ib. War with England, 61. Battle of the Standard, and his defeat, 62, 63. Returns to Scotland, ib. Concludes peace with England, ib. His escape from Winchester, ib. His death, 64. His reign, life, and character, 64, 65.
- DAVID II., birth of, i. 156. Oath of fealty to, ib. Marriage with Princess Joanna, 162. Accession of, 184. Crowned, 185. Removed to France, 188. Return of, 196. Invades England, 197. Made prisoner at Neville's Cross, 198. Revisits Scotland on parole, 199. Intrigues of, ib. Treaty for ransom of, 200, 202. His return and treachery, 203. Treaty with France, 204. Retreats from the pestilence, ib. Proposal to alter succession, 205. Secret treaty with Edward, ib. Marries Margaret Logie, 206. Debts of, 208. Conduct of, 209. Expedition against John of the Isles, 210. Ransom finally paid, 211. Repudiation of debts of, ib. Divorces Margaret Logie, 212. His death and character, ib.
- DAVIDSON, JOHN, secretary, accompanies Killegrew to Scotland, ii. 149. Elizabeth again sends him to Scotland with the French ambassador, 182. Interview with James VI. at Falkland, 196. Recalled, 204. Intercourse with Elizabeth regarding the execution of Mary, 232, 233. Elizabeth's unjust treatment and punishment of, 328.
- DAVIDSON, JOHN, minister of Liberton, confers with the Ruthven lords, ii. 182. Lectures King James, 183. Publishes "A Dialogue between a Clerk and a Courtier," 268. Proceedings raised against, ib. Retires to England, ib. Courage of, 282. Excommunicates Robert Montgomery, ib. Preaches against the king and courtiers, 418. Proposition by, for a great national reformation of manners, 450. Proposes a solemn act of confession on the part of the ministers, ib.
- DAYNECOURT, SIR WILLIAM, slain in battle, i. 134.
- DECLARATION of the Ruthven lords, ii. 181.
- DECLARATION, LARGE, at Newhouse, ii. 567. It is published in the king's name, ib. Dr. Baicanquhal, real author of, ib. Examination of, by the General Assembly, ib. The king is petitioned to punish the author of the, ib.
- DE LA MOTTE, i. 399, 401.
- "DELICIE POETARUM SCOTORUM," ii. 971.
- DEMONOLOGY, TREATISE ON, by James VI., ii. 970.
- DEMPSTER, THOMAS, PROFESSOR, ii. 970.
- DENMARK, treaty with, i. 202. Assistance of, refused, 412. Troops sent to, 422. Embassy from, and its reception, to negotiate about the king's marriage, ii. 207.
- DERWENTWATER, EARL OF, takes part in the rebellion of 1715, ii. 855. Is taken prisoner at Preston, 865. Is tried for high-treason, 875—and condemned, 876. His execution, ib.
- DESPANDYING, JOHN, canon of Elgin, i. 179.
- DEVORCHIL, wife of John de Balliol, i. 73, 88. Founds New Abbey, 168—and Balliol College, Oxford, 278.
- DHU, DONALD, i. 393.
- DICKSON, THOMAS, i. 120.
- DIER, Queen Mary's Butler, attends her to the scaffold, ii. 235.
- DIGBY, LORD, his expedition to the Borders, ii. 632.
- DINGWALL, SIR JOHN, immorality of, ii. 319.
- DISCIPLINE. [See BOOK.]
- DIVORCES, frequency of, before the Reformation, ii. 320.
- DOCTRINE, controversy about, ii. 899.
- DOLLAR, VICAR OF, i. 471. Martyrdom of, ib.
- DONICAN PRIARS. [See PRIARS.]
- DONALD, brother of Kenneth Macalpin, succeeds to the throne, i. 33. His death, ib.
- DONALD IV., succeeds to the throne, i. 34. Slain, ib.
- DONALD BANE. [See BANE.]
- DONALD OF THE ISLES, rebellion of, i. 252. Submission of, 253. Thane of Cawdor, 333.
- DONALDSON, WALTER, Principal of the University of Sedan, ii. 969.
- D'OSKELL, i. 616, 619. Treachery to Mary, 658.
- DOUGLAS FAMILY, origin of, i. 66.
- DOUGLAS, SIR WILLIAM, "THE HARDY," commands the castle of Berwick, i. 91. Capitulates with the English, ib. Swears fealty to Edward, 94. Disregards his oath, and joins Wallace, ib. The castles of Disdeer and Sanguhar taken by, ib.
- DOUGLAS, SIR JAMES, THE GOOD, joins King Robert Bruce, i. 115. Shares in Bruce's wanderings, 116. Kindness of, ib. Wounded at Dalry, ib. Discovers a boat on Loch Lomond, in which Bruce and his followers cross the loch, 117. Makes a successful descent upon the island of Arran, 119. The Douglas
- Larder, 120. The taking of Douglas Castle by the, ib. Another exploit of, 121. Attacks and routs a party of English near Bothwell, 124. Remains in the south for the purpose of reducing the district of Ettrick Forest, 125. Expulsion of the English from Selkirk Forest by, 127. Again demolishes Douglas Castle, ib. Captures Randolph, the nephew of Bruce, 127. Marches with the king into Argyleshire, ib. Invades England as far as Hartlepool, 130. Takes Roxburgh Castle, ib. Commands the left wing of Bruce's army at Bannockburn, 133—136. Disinterested behaviour towards Randolph in a skirmish at Newhouse, 134. Knighted before the battle of Bannockburn, 136. Pursues the English king after the battle, 138. Again invades England, 140. Aids in the government of Scotland during the king's absence, 143. Gallant exploits against the English, 144, 145. Appointed tutor to the heir of the throne, 148. Invasion of England by, 157. Defeats the army of Edward III. in England, 158, 159. Daring exploit of, ib. Renewed invasion of, 160. Bruce's dying injunctions to, 162, 163. His departure for Jerusalem, 165. He is slain by the Moors in Spain, ib. His character, ib.
- DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, Lord of Galloway, brother of Sir James, i. 186. Chosen regent, 187. Defeated and taken prisoner by the English, 188. Proceeds to Berwick, 226. Defeats a body of English at Melrose, 227. Appointed one of the commissioners for the conclusion of a truce with England, ib. Helps to take the Castle of Lochmaben, 228. Invades England, 231—233.
- DOUGLAS, SIR WILLIAM, Knight of Liddesdale, defeated and taken prisoner, i. 187. Exploits, 191—193. Expedition into England, 192. Sent to France, 195. Takes Edinburgh Castle, 196. Treacherous murder of Sir Alexander Ramsay, ib. Treason of, 197, 200. Taken prisoner at the battle of Neville's Cross, 198. Murdered by Lord William Douglas, 200, 313.
- DOUGLAS, WILLIAM, LORD, nephew of Sir James, i. 199. Slays Sir William Douglas, 200, 313. Character of, 231. Descent upon Ireland, 232.
- DOUGLAS, JAMES, EARL OF, invades England, i. 233. Encounter with Hotspur, ib. Defeats Percy at Otterburn, and is slain, 234. His burial, ib.
- DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, EARL OF, intrigues to get his daughter married to the Duke of Rothesay, i. 242. Death of, 245.
- DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, EARL OF, conspires against the Duke of Rothesay, i. 246. Invades England, 247. Bad generalship at the battle of Homildon Hill, ib. Taken prisoner, 248. Conspires and fights against the English king, ib. Once more taken prisoner, ib. Liberation of, 261. Exerts himself to procure the return of James I., ib. Alliance with Henry V., ib. Appointed lieutenant-general of Scotland, 316. His death, 319.
- DOUGLAS, JAMES, Lord of Dalkeith, i. 249, 255.
- DOUGLAS, CATHARINE, heroic defence of James I., i. 272.
- DOUGLAS, WILLIAM, SIXTH EARL OF, and Duke of Touraine, his arrogance and power, i. 320. Murdered in Edinburgh Castle along with his brother David, by order of Livingstone and Crichton, 322.
- DOUGLAS, JAMES THE GROSS, SEVENTH EARL OF, and Lord of Abercorn, i. 322.
- DOUGLAS, WILLIAM, EIGHTH EARL OF, son of James the Gross, i. 322. Reunites the vast estates of the family by marrying his cousin, ib. Created lieutenant-general of the kingdom, 323. Traitorous designs against the king, 324. Becomes reconciled to Crichton, ib. Lawless conduct of, 327. Goes abroad, 330. Returns to Scotland, ib. Again conspires against the king, ib. Murders committed by, 331. Invited to Stirling by James, and murdered, 332.
- DOUGLAS, MARGARET, the Fair Maiden of Galloway, her marriage with William, Earl of Douglas, i. 322. Compelled to marry the ninth Earl of Douglas, 340. Protected by James II., and married to Sir John Stewart, ib.
- DOUGLAS, JAMES, NINTH EARL OF, rebellion and treason of, i. 333, 334. Renounces his allegiance to the king, ib. Pretended submission of, 335. Again rebels, 337. Is abandoned by his followers, ib. Defeated at Arkinholme, ib. Forfeiture of, 338. Protected by the Yorkists, 339. Deserted by his wife, 340. Defeated by the Earl of Angus, 341. Imprisonment and death of, 358.
- DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, EARL OF MORAY, i. 324. Renounces his allegiance to James II., 334. Forfeiture of his earldom, ib. He is slain at the battle of Arkinholme, 337.
- DOUGLAS, HUGH, EARL OF ORMOND, i. 324. Wounded and taken prisoner at Arkinholme, 337.
- DOUGLAS, JOHN, Lord of Balveny, i. 324, 326, 330. Renounces his allegiance to James II., 334. Takes refuge in England after the battle of Arkinholme, 337.
- DOUGLAS, JAMES, of Lochleven, i. 327, 372.
- DOUGLAS, SIR JOHN, of Dalkeith, i. 334.
- DOUGLAS, SIR WILLIAM, of Glenbervie, slain at the battle of Flodden, i. 406.
- DOUGLAS, GAWIN, Bishop of Dunkeld, nominated to the primacy of Scotland, i. 414. Imprisonment of, 415. Mentioned, 417. Dispatched on an embassy to France, 419. Takes part in a skirmish at Edinburgh between the partizans of Arran and Angus, 422. Treasonable intercourse of, with England, 424. Mentioned, 430. Account of the life and death of, 487, 488. Review of his poetry, 489—497.
- DOUGLAS, SIR GEORGE, of Pittendrich, order for his arrest, i. 416. Imprisonment of, 421. Takes charge of the king at the battle of Melrose, 436. Receives a grant of the lands of Stirling of Keir, 437. The king's aversion to, 438. Master of the royal household, ib. Pays a visit to Beaton at St. Andrew's, 440.

- Anger at the king's escape from Falkland, ib. Compelled to flee from Edinburgh, 442. Estates forfeited, ib. And annexed to the crown, 456. Invades Scotland at the head of an English army, 447, 458. Permitted and invited to return to Scotland, 564. Reasonable negotiations for Henry VIII., in Scotland, regarding the marriage of Queen Mary, 567, 571. Interview with Lord Leslie, 568. Attainder reversed, and restored to his estate, 571. Sent as ambassador to the English king, 574. Returns to Scotland, 575. Is again dispatched to the English court, ib. Interview with Cardinal Beaton, 577. Beaton takes possession of Pinkie House, 581. One of the hostages for the performance of a bond with Regent Arran, 582. Set at liberty, 584. Accused of treason, 586. Suspected treachery of, ib. Letter to Henry VIII., 589. Conspiracy against Beaton, 590. Again intrigues with England, 591. Attends a convention at Stirling, 10th June, 1546, 599. Appointed one of Regent Arran's secret council, 600. Treachery discovered, 605. His castles taken by the English, 606, 613. Renewed treason of, 612. Flight of, 613.
- DOUGLAS, LADY MARGARET, birth of, i. 417. Her marriage with the Earl of Lennox, 585. Imprisoned, 741. Committed to the Tower, 743.
- DOUGLAS, WILLIAM, i. 422.
- DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, of Kilspindie, i. 422. Created high-treasurer, 435, 438. Compelled to flee from Edinburgh, 442. Forfeiture of his estates, ib. Implacable conduct of James V. towards, 445.
- DOUGLAS, JAMES, Earl of Morton. [See MORTON.]
- DOUGLAS, JANET, Lady Glamis. [See GLAMIS.]
- DOUGLAS, JOHN, a reformer, i. 691, 693; ii. 260.
- DOUGLAS, GEORGE, the postulate, conspires against Riccio, i. 759. Assists in the murder of, 764, 766. Flight of, 771. Dispatched on a secret mission, 20 June, 1567, ii. 70.
- DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, assists in the plot against Darnley, ii. 40, 45. Estates confiscated, 176. Proposal for his return to Scotland, 209. His recall, 215. Tried and acquitted, 216. Letter from James VI. to, 230.
- DOUGLAS, SIR WILLIAM, assists to confine Mary in his Castle of Lochleven, ii. 68. Warrant issued for his arrest, 168. Flees to England, ib.
- DOUGLAS, LADY, of Lochleven, ii. 68, 82.
- DOUGLAS, GEORGE, assists Mary to escape from Lochleven, ii. 82.
- DOUGLAS, LITTLE, assists Mary to escape from Lochleven, ii. 82.
- DOUGLAS, GEORGE, of Langniddry, ii. 168.
- DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, of Whittingham, ii. 170. Estate confiscated, 176.
- DOUGLAS, JAMES, of Parkhead, estates confiscated, ii. 176. Takes vengeance upon Captain James Stewart, 346. Takes charge of James V. at Falkland, 440.
- DOUGLAS, MALCOLM, of Mains, ii. 201.
- DOUGLAS, PROVOST of Lincluden, his interview with Wotton, ii. 208.
- DOUGLAS, JAMES, of Spot, ii. 342.
- DOUGLAS, MARQUIS OF, present at the first parliament held by Charles I., ii. 607. Two of his castles fall into the hands of the covenanters, 556.
- DOUGLAS, SIR WILLIAM, of Cavers, appointed to proceed to court, ii. 570. Enters Newcastle with a troop of horse, 586. The wife of, 721.
- DOUGLAS, ROBERT, his faithful address to Charles II., ii. 668.
- DOUGLAS, CAPTAIN, his cruelties to the covenanters, ii. 727, 728. "DOUGLAS WARS," ii. 134.
- DOUGLASSES, the estates of, confiscated, ii. 176.
- DOUNE, LADY, seeks revenge for the death of her son, the Earl of Moray, ii. 344. Her death, 345.
- DOWART, MACLEAN OF. [See MACLEAN.]
- DOWNES, JOHN, one of the judges of Charles I., ii. 648.
- DRAG-NET, THE BISHOPS', an act for separation and disobedience to ecclesiastical authority, ii. 694.
- DRAPEERS, frauds practised by, i. 646.
- DRAPHANE, HAMILTON OF. [See HAMILTON.]
- DRAYTON, RALPH BASSET OF, i. 101.
- DRESS of the Caledonians, i. 19. Scoto-Irish, 32. Military, 221. Civil, 222. In the reign of James I., 288. Laws for regulating, during the reign of James II., ii. 373—and of James III., 374. Of judges and lawyers, 406.
- DREUX, COUNT OF, his daughter married to Alexander III., i. 81.
- DRUID, ARCH, i. 10, 12.
- "DRUIDICAL ALTAR," i. 21.
- DRUIDISM, the origin of, i. 10. Remains of, 13.
- DRUIDS, their classes, i. 10. Instruction of their pupils, 11. Doctrines, ib. Sacrifices, ib. Plants held sacred by the, 12. Learning of the, 12, 13. Superstition of the, ib. Island of, 49. Burial-place of, ib.
- DRUM, SIR ALEXANDER IRVINE OF, slain at the battle of Harlaw, i. 253.
- DRUM'S CAIRN, i. 253, note.
- DRUM, IRVINE OF, ii. 618.
- DRUMCLOG, the battle of, ii. 712. Defeat of Claverhouse at, ib.
- DRUM-KRAT, the celebrated council of, i. 29.
- DRUMLANRIG, DOUGLAS OF, sent to smother John Knox, i. 718.
- DRUMMOND, SIR JOHN, of Stobhall, i. 238.
- DRUMMOND, ANNABELLA, daughter of Sir John, and wife of Robert III., i. 238.
- DRUMMOND, WILLIAM, a tutor to the Duke of Rothesay, i. 241.
- DRUMMOND, SIR MALCOLM, murder of, i. 248.
- DRUMMOND, WILLIAM, of Hawthornden, his account of the Earl of Mar's death, i. 352. Patent granted to, in 1625, 547. His works noticed, ii. 970, 971.
- DRUMMOND, LADY MARGARET, mistress of James IV., i. 379. Tragic death of, 391.
- DRUMMOND, FIRST LORD, i. 379. Sent as ambassador to England by James IV., 400. Takes the side of the English party, 414; ii. 56. Suspected of treason, 588. Escapes, 643.
- DRUMMOND, SIR JOHN, ii. 618, 621, 627.
- DRUMMOND, GENERAL, cruelty of, to the presbyterians, ii. 698. A new instrument of torture introduced by, 723. Opposition to the king, 738.
- DRUMMOND CASTLE, ii. 743.
- DRUMMOND, CAPTAIN, scheme of, in connection with the Darien Company, ii. 811. Suspected murder of, 817.
- DRUMMOND OF BOHALDIE, ii. 852.
- DRUMMOND OF LOGIE-ALMOND, ii. 867.
- DRUMMOND, nominal Duke of Perth, joins a secret association in favour of the Pretender in 1741, ii. 910.
- DRUMMOND, LORD JOHN, ii. 911.
- DRUMWHASSER, JOHN CUNNINGHAME, LAIRD OF, ii. 126.
- DUBRIE, ROBERT, of Anstruther, ii. 472.
- DUBRY, SIR WILLIAM, i. 758. His suspicions of Mary, ii. 39. Confidential letters to Cecil from, 70. Dispatched by Elizabeth to Scotland, 119. Sent by Elizabeth to mediate between rivals in Scotland, 129. Negotiates on the part of Elizabeth, 135. Chosen to besiege Edinburgh Castle, 142—surrender of to, 144. Marches with army to siege of Edinburgh, 143.
- DUBRY, SIR DRAW, receives a letter from Davidson regarding Mary's execution, ii. 232. Stands beside the scaffold at her execution, 236.
- "DUST OF THE HUNDRED BATTLES," son of Erp, a Pictish king, i. 24.
- DRYBURGH, ABBEY OF, i. 156, 179. Burnt by the English, 231. Abbot of, ii. 154.
- DUCHAL, case of Porterfield of, ii. 725. [See PORTERFIELD.]
- DUDDINGTON LOCH, ancient remains found in, i. 15.
- DUDLEY, ROBERT, proposed as husband to Mary, i. 721. Created Earl of Leicester, 727. Interview with Melvil, ib.
- DUFF, succeeds to throne, i. 35. Assassinated, ib.
- DUFF, ANGUS, chief of the Mackays, i. 266.
- DUN, ERSKINE OF. [See ERSKINE.]
- DUNBAR, PATRICK, EARL OF, one of the competitors for the crown, i. 87. His treachery, 109.
- DUNBAR, defeat of the Scots at, by Edward I., i. 91—by Cromwell, ii. 663. Treatment of the prisoners taken at, Appendix to vol. ii., note 1.
- DUNBAR, CASTLE OF, delivered to the Scots by the countess, i. 91. Gallantly held by Black Agnes, 193. Salisbury compelled to raise the siege, ib. Surrender of, to the Douglases, 243. Mary and Bothwell take refuge in, ii. 63.
- DUNBAR, ELIZABETH OF, i. 242. Affianced to the Duke of Rothesay, ib.
- DUNBAR, GEORGE, Earl of March, i. 251. Patrick, son of, ib.
- DUNBAR, SIR DAVID, i. 272.
- DUNBAR, WILLIAM, the poet, life of, and criticism of his poetry, i. 475, 487. Quoted, 544, 554, 556.
- DUNBAR, EARL OF, death, ii. 407.
- DUNBAR, GAWIN, Archbishop of Glasgow, appointed chancellor by James VI., ii. 441, 471.
- DUNBARTON CASTLE, i. 24. Taken by Danes, 33. Given up to Edward I., 92, 188. Captured by Arran, 414. Attempt of Lennox upon, 586. Again taken by Arran, 594. Convention of lords at, ii. 71. Captured by Hamilton, 116. Surprised by Crawford of Jordannahill, 126. Surrender of, to the covenanters, 584.
- DUNELANE, BISHOPS OF, i. 278, 422, 454; ii. 38, 61.
- DUNCAN, his accession to the throne, i. 38. Slain by Macbeth, at Bothgowan, near Elgin, ib. Norwegian account of, 47.
- DUNCAN, EARL OF Fife, i. 62.
- DUNCAN, GELLIE, confessions of witchcraft, ii. 960.
- DUNCAN, MARY, Principal of University of Saumur, ii. 969.
- DUNCANSON, JOHN, a minister, ii. 275.
- DUNCANSON, MAJOR, takes part in the massacre of Glencoe, ii. 801.
- DUNCCHA claims the throne, i. 29.
- DUNDAFF, SIR JOHN GRAHAM OF. [See GRAHAM.]
- DUNDALE, i. 141. Defeat and death of Edward Bruce at, 148.
- DUNDAS FAMILY, origin of, i. 66.
- DUNDAS OF DUNDAS, i. 333.
- DUNDAS, W., governor of Edinburgh Castle, his correspondence with Cromwell, Appendix to vol. ii., note K.
- DUNDAS, DEAN OF FACULTY, his connection with the Duchess of Gordon's Medal, ii. 839.
- DUNDEAL CASTLE, death of Robert II. at, i. 237.
- DUNFERMLINE, David II. born at, i. 166. Robert Bruce buried in the Abbey church of, 164. Queen Margaret founds the Benedictine abbey of, 166. Abbots of, ii. 125, 138, 164, 175, 437.
- DUNFERMLINE, EARL OF, made the bearer of a petition from the covenanters to the king, ii. 562. Sent by parliament to the king, 569. Prohibited from coming to court, ib. Sent a second time 570. His first audience of the king, ib.—second and third, 571. Lawsuit with Callender, 705.
- DUNGAL, i. 29, 57.
- DUNGLAS CASTLE, capture of, i. 606. Blowing up of, ii. 585.
- DUNKELD plundered by Danes, i. 34. Primacy removed from Iona to, 53. Bishops of, 145, 326, 356, 448; ii. 38.
- DUNKINRY, the Bog of, defeat of Huntly at, i. 334.
- DUNLOP, BESSY, accused of witchcraft, ii. 958. Her confession, 959.
- DENNBRISSEL, defeat of the English at, i. 145. Murder of the Earl of Moray at, ii. 342.
- DUNNOTTAR CASTLE, taken by Wallace, i. 95. Scottish regalia deposited there, ii. 673, note. Captured by the English, ib. Covenanters imprisoned in, 738.
- DUNOS CASTLE, taken by the Stewart, i. 189.
- DUNSE PARK, Scotch army encamped in, i. 188.
- DUNSE LAW, covenanters' camp on, ii. 564, 580.

DUNSINANE HILL, defeat of Macbeth at, i. 38.
 DUNSTAFFNAGE, i. 127. Castle taken by Bruce, ib. Visit of James I. to, 266.
 DUNWALLON, the last king of Strathclyd, i. 35.
 DUPLANIS, JOHN, a French envoy, i. 417.
 DUPLIN MOOR, BATTLE OF, i. 185.
 DURHAM, BATTLE OF, or Neville's Cross, i. 198; Appendix to vol. i., note P.
 DURHAM, BISHOPS OF, i. 83, 90, 198, 235, 389.
 DURHAM, SIMON OF, i. 170.
 DURHAM, a page, arrested for murder of Darnley, ii. 80.
 DURHAM, DEAN OF, ii. 567.
 DURHAM, THE CASTLE OF, surrenders to the Scots, ii. 586.
 DORIE, REV. JOHN, interview with Morton, ii. 172. Accused by Arran, 190. His flight, ib. Submits to Arran, ib. Denounces Lennox and Arran, 282. Banished from Edinburgh, ib. Consideration of his banishment by the assembly, ib. Proceedings against, 418.
 DORIS, ALEXANDER GIBSON OF. [See GIBSON.]
 DORWARD, ALAN, accused of a design upon the crown, i. 76, 77.
 DUTHAC, ST., shrine of, i. 118, 396.
 DYSAIT, LADY, wife of the Duke of Landerdale, ii. 703.

E.

EADMER, Bishop of St. Andrew's, i. 169.
 EARTHQUAKE in Scotland, ii. 372.
 ECLIPSE of the sun, date found from the rotation of, i. 78.
 EDGAR ascends the throne, i. 59. His reign and death, ib.
 EDGAR AETHELING, i. 39, 41.
 EDGEHILL, battle of, between Charles I. and the parliament, ii. 606.
 EDINBURGH, satirical description of, by Dunbar, i. 543. Invaded and burnt by the Earl of Hertford, 584. Protestant riots in, 719; ii. 737, 742. Sensation in, after the murder of Darnley, ib. 52. Queen Mary's authority proclaimed at, 116. Grange issues a proclamation at the cross of, 127. Discord in, on account of party spirit, 129. Pageants before James VI., 162. Tumult in, on St. Giles's Day, 1558, 289. Proclamations issued in [see PROCLAMATIONS]. Tumult and panic of the inhabitants in, 458, 459. Renewed disturbances in, 521. Effect upon, of the defeat at Killecrankie, 789. Excitement in connection with the union in, 824—826. Suspected traitors summoned to, 850. Porteous mob in, 885. Penal measures against, 887. Excitement upon the arrival of Charles II. in, 920. Measures adopted for the defence of, ib. Presence of the rebel army in, 931.
 EDINBURGH CASTLE given up to Henry, i. 68. Restored, 69. Surrendered to Edward, 92. Captured by Randolph, 131. Balloch's successful stratagem for the taking of, 196. Surrendered to the Regent Moray by Balfour, ii. 80. Queen's party obtain possession of, 116. Bombardment of, by Mar, 132. Elizabeth assists the besiegers of, 142. Blockade of, 534. Surrendered to General Leslie, 556. Again taken possession of, by the Scots, 585. Surrendered to Cromwell, 668—to the Cameronians, 744. Jacobite plot for the capture of, 834. Unsuccessful attempt on, 852. Blockaded by Charles Edward, 931.
 EDINBURGH CROSS, description of, i. 544. Demolition of, ib.
 EDINBURGH, NEW. [See DARIEN.]
 EDWARD I., of England, endeavors to ensnare Alexander III. into an unconditional homage for Scotland, i. 80. Designs against Scotland, 82, 83. Demands recognition of his title as Lord Paramount, 84. His claim recognised, 86. Meets the competitors for the crown at Berwick, 87. Orders the seisin of the kingdom to be given to Baliol, 89. Harsh treatment of Baliol, ib. Invades Scotland, 90. Takes Berwick, ib. Defeats the Scots at Dunbar, 91. Receives Baliol's submission, 92. Sends him to the Tower, ib. Carries off the Scotch regalia to Westminster, ib. Returns to England, 93. Calls a meeting of the English nobility at York, 98. Again invades Scotland, 99. Message of, to Bishop Anthony Bek, ib. Mutiny and famine in his camp, 100. Defeats the Scots at Falkirk, 101. Distress of his army, 102. Concludes a treaty with Philip IV. of France, 103. Delivers Baliol to the pope, ib. Orders Stirling Castle to be surrendered to the Scots, 104. Renewed invasion of Scotland, ib. Lays waste the country, 105. Grants a truce to the Scots, ib. Receives a papal admonition in favour of Scotland, ib. His letter to the pope, 106. Renews his treaty with the Scots, ib. Defeat of his army at Roslin, 107. Marches to Scotland, 108. Destroys a monastery at Dunfermline, ib. Besieges Stirling Castle, 109. Cruelty to the garrison, 109. Cruel treatment of Wallace, 111. Frames a new system of government for Scotland, ib. His preparations to put down the revolt of Bruce, 115. Dies on his march to Scotland, 114. His last request, 125.
 EDWARD II., of England, his character, i. 125. Advances into Scotland, ib. Unsuccessful invasion of Scotland, 129. Attempts to negotiate a truce with the Scots, ib. Preparations for the relief of Stirling Castle, 132. Bad management of his army at Bannockburn, 134. His opinion of the Scottish army, 136. Total defeat at Bannockburn, 137. His flight, ib. Attempts an invasion by sea, 145. Begs the assistance of the pope, ib. Besieges Berwick, 149. Raises the siege, 161. Negotiations of, with Bruce for a peace, 152. Again invades Scotland, 154. Defeat at Bannockburn, 155. Treachery of his nobles, ib. Deposition, 157. Murder of, ib.
 EDWARD III., of England, proclaimed king, i. 157. Breaks off the truce with Scotland, ib. Hardships endured by his army, 158. Narrow escape of, 159. Makes overtures for peace, 160. Favours the claims of Edward Baliol, 164. Duplicity of his conduct, 186. Cruelty at the siege of Berwick, 187. Defeats the Scots at Halidon Hill, 188. Renewed invasion of Scotland 191. Meanness to the Scottish prisoners, 199. Berwick retaken by, 201. Crafty policy of, 203, 207. His death, 225.

 EDWARD IV., of England, proposed alliance of his daughter Cecilia and the Prince Royal of Scotland, i. 351. Concludes a peace with James III., ib. Invades Scotland, 363. Leagues with the Duke of Albany to dethrone James III., 364, 367. Withdraws his army from Scotland, 356. Death of, 358.
 EDWARD VI., of England, negotiations regarding the proposed marriage of, with Queen Mary, i. 565. Accession of, of, 602.
 EDWIN ascends the throne, his defeat and death, i. 28.
 EGLINTON, SIR HUGH, a Scottish poet, i. 624.
 EGLINTON, EARL OF, attends king's parliament at Stirling, ii. 130. Sentence of forfeiture rescinded, 132. Chosen councillor to James II., 156. Share in Gowrie conspiracy, 178.
 EGREMOAT, THE BOY OF, i. 96.
 ELIZABETH, QUEEN OF ENGLAND, accession of, i. 623. Policy of towards the protestants, 635. Sends assistance to the protestants, 637. Motives of, 646. Army of, withdrawn, ib. Proposed marriage of, with Arran, 649. Reply to the embassy, 651. Dispatches Bedford to France, 654. Crooked policy of, 656. Refuses safe-conduct to Mary, 658. Letter of, to Mary, 702. Plans for marriage of Mary, 720. Policy of, 721. Project of, for succession, 722. Caprice of, ib. Letter of, to Cecil, 725. Interview of, with Melvil, 726. Refuses to recognise Mary's succession, 733. Opposes Mary's marriage with Darnley, 738. Violence and perfidy of, 743. Intercedes for Moray, 748. Message to Mary, and reply, 750. Dissimulation of, 756. Base treatment of Moray, ib. Plot against Riccio made known to, 762. Feelings of, on the birth of James VI., 773. Letter of, to Mary after murder of Darnley, ii. 51. Her reply to Melvil and Kirkcaldy, 59. Conduct of, on being informed of Mary's imprisonment, 70. Curious letter of, to Mary, 74. Conduct on hearing of coronation of James VI., 76. Gives orders to prevent Mary's escape, 85. Resolves on retaining Mary a prisoner, 86. Claims right to judge in Mary's cause, 87. Refuses Mary a personal interview, ib. Resolves to proceed with her trial, ib. Commissioners of, at Mary's trial, 90. Receives summary proofs against Mary, 93. Refuses her consent to compromise, 97. Proposals to Mary, 98. Her letter to Mary, 99. Writes Knollys to urge Mary to resign the crown, ib. Pronounces judgment on the cause, 100. Her plan for the subjugation of Scotland, 102. Her proclamation to the Scotch, ib. Proposals to Mary, 105. Sends proposals to Regent Moray, 106. Discovers proposed marriage between Mary and Norfolk, 108. Discovers Norfolk's plot, ib. Quells the insurrection of Westmoreland, 110. Grief at death of Regent Moray, 116. Excommunicated, 117. Recalls Essex, 120. Conduct towards Morton and Lennox, 121. Message to Kirkcaldy, 134. Scheme for putting Mary to death, 137. Her message to Morton, 149. Threatens to deprive James of the succession, 167. Threatens to invade Scotland, 169. Parsimony of, 186. Her letter to James VI., 188. Treason of Throckmorton, 195. Her troubles, 197. Her scheme for regaining ascendancy in Scotland, ib. Conspiracy of William Parry, 204. Dispatches Sir Edward Wotton to Scotland, ib. League with James, 215. Violates her promise, ib. Pretended reluctance to consent to execution of Mary, 228. Her reception of Melvil and Gray's embassy, 231. Signs the warrant, 232. Hints her wish that Mary should be murdered, ib. Her conduct on hearing Paulet's refusal to murder Mary, 233. Her counterfeited sorrow at the death of Mary, 328. Her letter to James, 329. Efforts to prevent James's alliance with Denmark, 336. Crooked policy of, 353. Letter of, to James, 358. Conduct about succession to the throne, 393. Amicable correspondence with James VI., 394. Declining health of, ib. Career draws to a close, 396. Ingratitude of her courtiers, ib. Settled melancholy of, ib. Deputation to, with respect to her successor, ib. Her refusal to name a successor, ib. Her death, 397.
 ELIZABETH, PRINCESS, marriage of, ii. 408.
 ELWESLIE. [See WALLACE.]
 ELLIOT, JOHN, of Park, his combat with Bothwell, ii. 35.
 ELLIOT, SIR GILBERT, clerk of the privy-council, refuses to receive Melan's submission, ii. 800.
 ELPHINSTONE, BISHOP OF ABERDEEN, i. 414.
 ELPHINSTONE, ABBOT OF DUNFERMLINE, chosen councillor to James VI., ii. 153. Sent to England for funds, 164. Trial, sentence, and pardon of, 377.
 ENGAGES, their overthrow, ii. 645. Readmission of the excluded, 667. Their return to power, 669.
 ENTAILS, origin of, ii. 132.
 EPISCOPACY, contest between, and presbytery, ii. 281. Attempts to revive, 177. Establishment of, 423. Continuation of, as settled order of the church, 428. Restoration of, 689.
 EPISCOPALIAN, popular views of the, ii. 750. Resentment against the, ib. Their dissatisfaction with the oath of assurance, 761. A number of, admitted as members of the church courts, 764. Further concession to the, 765. Division among the clergy of the, ib. Efforts to extend the privileges of the, 769. Toleration of, in Scotland, 775. Dismay excited by the toleration of the, ib.
 "EQUIVALENT," the, ii. 822.
 ERIC, KING OF NORWAY, his marriage with Margaret of Scotland, i. 80. His daughter heir to the throne of Scotland, 82. Edward Prince of Wales proposes in marriage to his daughter, ib. Scottish Estates urge him to send his daughter to Scotland, 83—her letter to him, Appendix to vol. i., note B. Claims the crown of Scotland, 87.

ERIC, King of Denmark, Norway, and Sreden, his treaty with James I., i. 282.

ERRINGTON, LANCELOT, ii. 856.

ERROL, EARL OF, joins Spanish faction, ii. 332. Excommunicated, 354. Petitions king for a trial, 355. Act of abolition respecting, 356. Summoned for trial, 357. Sentence of treason and forfeiture against, 362. At battle of Glenlivet, 363. Flight of, and destruction of his castle, 364. Return of, 369. Reconciled to kirk, 371.

ERSKINE, SIR THOMAS, i. 228.

ERSKINE, SIR ROBERT, i. 323.

ERSKINE, JOHN, of Dun, deputation of, to Mary, i. 627. Holds Edinburgh Castle against the queen-mother, 640. At queen's interview with Knox, 719.

ERSKINE, ARTHUR, assists Mary to escape from Holyrood, i. 776.

ERSKINE OF DUN, letter of, to Regent Lennox, ii. 261. Induced to sign a deceptive bond, 425.

ERSKINE, ALEXANDER, intrusted with Edinburgh Castle, ii. 155. Appointed deputy chamberlain, 164.

ERSKINE, SIR THOMAS, at rescue of king from Gowrie, ii. 387.

ERSKINE, LORD, openly requests to be admitted a member of the General Assembly, ii. 550.

ERSKINE OF GRANGE, ii. 844.

ERSKINE, SIR ALEXANDER, Lord Lyon King-at-arms, ii. 850.

ERSKINE, ENSION, is tried and executed at Preston, ii. 875.

ERSKINE, EBENEZER, founder of the Secession Church, his descent, ii. 895. Sketch of his character, 896. His synod sermon, 898. Treatment of, by the church courts, ib. His refusal to return to the church, 900. Is deposed by the assembly, 901. Is censured by the anti-burghers, 905.

ERSKINE, HENRY, minister of Cornhill, persecution of, ii. 895.

ERSKINE, RALPH, sketch of his character, ii. 897.

ESSÉ D'ANDRÉ DE MONTELEMBERT, SIEUR. [See MONTELEMBERT.]

ESTATES, convention of, ii. 356. Authorize return of popish lords, 369. Remonstrance of the, 569. Meeting of the, 607. An army levied by the committee of, 643. Meeting of the, 709. Their servility, ib. Evasive answer of the, to the king, 738. They claim the appointment of the judges, 779. Factious conduct of the, 780.

ESTATES, FORFEITED, disputes about the, ii. 881. Purchased by the York Buildings Company, 882.

F.

FAA, JOHN, gipsy chief, i. 542.

FACULTY, the DEAN OF, his trial for "leasing-making," ii. 839.

FAIRFULD, the ABBEY OF, ii. 2.

FAITH, the CONFESSION OF, ratified by parliament, ii. 753.

FALCONER, DAVID, a naval officer, i. 399. Slain at Tantallon Castle, 442.

FALKIRK, BATTLE OF, between Wallace and Edward I. of England, i. 100; Appendix, note D. Between Prince Charles and the royalists, ii. 943.

FALKLAND PALACE, the Duke of Rothesay murdered at, i. 246. Escape of James V. from, 440. Death of James V. at, 461, 514.

FARR, the HILL OF, i. 713.

FAST CASTLE, captured by Patrick Dunbar, i. 251. Noticed, 392. Interview between Throckmorton and Sir James Melvil at, ii. 73. Mentioned in connection with the Gowrie conspiracy, 381, and note, 383.

FAUCONBERG, LORD, i. 345.

FAUDONSIDE, ANDREW KER OF. [See KER.]

FAWDON, GHOST OF, described by Blind Harry, i. 310.

FAYETTE, LA, i. 422.

FENELLA assassinated Kenneth III., i. 36, 44.

FENELON, LA MOTTE, embassy of, ii. 182. His reception, 183. Banquet to, ib. His intrigues betrayed to Walsingham, 185.

FENTON, WILLIAM DE, i. 229.

FERNAND, the Emperor of Germany, i. 715.

FERRERACE, the Romance of, i. 294; Appendix to vol. i. note W.

FERGUSON, DAVID, i. 690. Admonishes James VI., ii. 283.

FERN, ARBIT OF, i. 467, note.

FERNIHURST, DAVID KER OF. [See KER.]

FEUD between the Maxwells and Johnstones, ii. 491. Finished by the execution of Lord Maxwell, 21st May, 1613, ib. Between the Scotts and Kers, ib.

FEUDS, hereditary revival of, ii. 404.

FIAN, DR., a noted wizard, torture and execution of, ii. 961.

FIENNES, GILLENME DE, his gallant defence of Roxburgh Castle, i. 130.

FIFE, DUNCAN, EARL OF, his assassination, i. 82.

FIFE, SIR DUNCAN BALFOUR, Sheriff of, slain at Blackfronside, i. 98.

FIFE, DUNCAN, EARL OF, i. 115.

FIFE, EARL OF, one of the Seven Earls on Bruce's side, i. 174. Resists the English, 185. Taken prisoner by the English, 198. Accused of high treason, 199.

FIFE, ROBERT STEWART, EARL OF, invades England, i. 231. Chosen governor of the kingdom, 236, 238. [See DUKE OF ALBANY.]

FIFE, MURDOCH, EARL OF, committed to the Tower, i. 253. Returns to Scotland, 254. Succeeds the Duke of Albany as regent, 255. Incapacity to govern, 266.

FIFE, SYNOD OF, excommunicate popish ears, ii. 354.

FINAN, BISHOP, one of the first missionaries sent from Iona, i. 50.

FINDLATER, the Castle of, i. 712.

FINDLATER, LORD, ii. 841.

FINDLATER, OGILVY OF. [See OGILVY.]

FINES imposed as the price of indemnity, ii. 690. Imposed upon husbands for the absence of their wives from church, 725.

FINGAL, i. 7.

FINHAVEN CASTLE, i. 286, 325, 333, 335, 396.

FINTRAY, JAMES GRAHAM, the FIRST LAIRD OF, i. 474, note.

FISHER, EDWARD, ii. 892.

FISHER, JAMES, REV., one of the Seceders, a sketch of, ii. 897.

FLAG, NATIONAL, THE, ii. 823.

FLANDERS, THE EARL OF, i. 103.

FLANDERS, trade with, i. 142. Embassy from, i. 262.

FLEECHE, THE GOLDEN, the order of, i. 448, 514.

FLEMING, ROBERT, joins Robert Bruce, i. 115.

FLEMING, NEIL, slain at Carrickfurgus, i. 138; note, 143.

FLEMING, MALCOLM, secures Dunbarton Castle for Bruce, i. 188.

FLEMING, SIR DAVID, frustrates the designs of the Duke of Albany, i. 249. Slain at Lang-Hermandston, ib.

FLEMING, SIR MALCOLM, of Biggar and Cumberland, dispatched to the court of France by Douglas, i. 320. Executed, 322.

FLEMING, LORD ROBERT, joins in a conspiracy against James III. i. 354. League of, with the Boyds, 365.

FLEMING, JOHN, SECOND LORD, accused of poisoning his wife and her two sisters, i. 391. Office of chamberlain conferred upon, 419. One of the guardians of James V., 423. Slain while hawking, 438, 535, note.

FLEMING, LORD, his mission to France, i. 622. Death of, 623.

FLEMING, LORD ROBERT, i. 758-763, 767. Declines to attend mass with Queen Mary, ii. 28. Signs a bond for the promotion of Bothwell, 53. Joins queen's party, 71, 83, 118. Sent to France with letters from Mary, 86. Escapes from Dunbarton Castle, 127.

FLEMING, LORD, made lord-chamberlain, ii. 196.

FLEMING, MARY, one of the "queen's Maies," i. 614. Married to Secretary Lethington, ii. 51.

FLEMINGS, their bravery at the siege of Berwick, i. 91.

FLEMISH SETTLERS in Scotland, i. 65, 66.

FLEMISH TROOPS assist Edward III. in the Scottish campaign, i. 191. Forced to surrender to the Scots, ib.

FLETCHER, DR., ii. 234.

FLETCHER OF SAITOUN, noticed, ii. 777. Act passed for the restoration of his estates, 794. Quoted, 956.

FLODDEN, BATTLE OF, i. 407. Defeat of the Scots at the, 408. Effects of, upon Scotland, 411; Appendix, vol. i. note B B.

"FLYING, THE," a poetical contest between Dunbar and Kennedy, i. 455-525.

FOGO, JOHN, i. 267.

FOOL, a female, maintained by Margaret Tudor, i. 560.

FOOLS in the houses of the nobles, i. 286. At the court of James IV., 553-and of James V., 560.

FORBES, MASTER OF, conspiracy and execution, i. 452.

FORBES, LORD, ii. 344.

FORBES, JOHN, minister of Alford, obtains an audience of the king, ii. 471. Is assured of the king's steady adherence and determination to make no changes in the constitution of the Scottish Church, ib. Elected moderator of General Assembly, ib. He is tried for high treason, 472.

FORBES, DUNCAN, he holds possession of Culloiden, ii. 866. His scheme for settling the Highlands, 910. Patriotic conduct of, 917.

FORBES, DR., professor of King's College, Aberdeen, ii. 971.

FORDUN, JOHN, one of the authors of the Scottish chronicon, noticed, i. 297.

FOREST KIRK, Wallace chosen a Guardian of Scotland at, i. 98.

"FOREST, the FLOWERS OF THE," ballad in connection with the defeat of the Scots at Flodden, i. 616, note.

FOREST, SIR JOHN, English Warden of the Middle Marches, ii. 146. Taken prisoner by the Scotch, 149, 208.

FORESTS, CHARTER OF THE, i. 98, 99. Grants from the royal, 179. Dilapidation of the, 280.

FORFEITURE of the crown by James VII. declared by the Scottish Estates, ii. 748.

FORFEITURES during the reigns of Charles II. and James VII., reversed, ii. 794.

FORMAN, ANDREW, Bishop of Moray, i. 390, 399, 400, 414, 487.

FORMAN, SIR ROBERT, of Luthrie, i. 723.

FORMS, EPISCOPAL, the extension of, ii. 774.

FORBES, DAVID, ii. 12.

FORREST, HENRY, martyrdom of, i. 469.

FORRESTER, ROBERT, condemned for heresy, and executed, i. 454, 470.

FORRESTER, LORD, ii. 864.

FORREST, DEAN THOMAS, Vicar of Dollar, martyrdom of, i. 454, 470; Appendix to vol. i., note F F.

FORSTER, THOMAS, of Bamfrough, ii. 855. He is appointed commander-in-chief of the Northumbrian insurgents, 856. He proclaims James VIII., ib. Authorized to act as general in England, 862. Folly of, 863. A bill of high treason found against, 877. He escapes, ib.

FORRESTER, SCOTTISH, delivery of the, to Edward I., i. 86-to Charles I., ii. 564.

FOTHERINGAY CASTLE, Queen Mary imprisoned in, ii. 223, 227, 228, 232.

FOTHERINGHAM, SIR THOMAS, i. 379.

FOUNTAINHALL, quoted, ii. 717, 720, 723, 725.

FOURBIN, ADMIRAL, ii. 835.

FOX, BISHOP, of Durham, ii. 389, 390. Sent on a mission to Rome, 400.

FRANCE, first negotiation of, with Scotland, i. 68. Treaty of, with Scotland, 1566. War of, with England, 1592. David II. treats with, 204. Renewed war with England, 211. League with Scotland, 225. Renewed, 250. Embassy to Scotland from, 255. Mar.

- rage of Margaret Stewart to the Dauphin of, 262. Ancient treaty renewed with, 358, 395 [See FRANCIS I.]. Ambassadors to Scotland from, 422. Change in the policy of, 423. Fleet from, with ambassadors, 580, 604, 613. Fleet from, sent for Mary, 614. Death of Scottish ambassadors to, 623. Arrival of assistance from, 636. Treaty with Scotland and England, 645. Withdrawal of its troops from Scotland, 646. Ambassador to Scotland from, 656. Envoys from, 757. Disapproves of Mary's conduct after the murder of Darnley, ii. 50. Intrigues of, with regard to Scotland after Mary's imprisonment, 74. Intrigues of, on the death of Moray, 116. Massacre of St. Bartholomew in, 135. Letter from the Scottish nobility to the king of, 573. Failure of the promised supplies from, to the Jacobites, 854. Fleet of, ordered to proceed to England, 912.—its return and destruction, ib. Arrival of supplies from, 934. Two vessels sent from, to convey Prince Charles from Scotland, 954.
- FRANCIS, WILLIAM, suggests to Randolph a mode of taking Edinburgh Castle, i. 131.
- FRANCIS I., of France, negotiations of, with the Duke of Albany, i. 414, 423. Ungenerous conduct of, towards the Scotch, 419. Negotiations of, with James V., 445—447. James marries the daughter of, 450.
- FRANCIS II., of France, proposed marriage of with Queen Mary, i. 613. Marriage completed, 621, 622. Crown-matrimonial conferred upon, 623. Effects of his accession to the throne, 633. Death of, 652, 696. Consequences of, 653.
- "FRANCIS, ST., THE VISITATION OF," a poem by William Dunbar, i. 476.
- FRANCISCAN FRIARS, establishment of, i. 168. Buchanan's satire against, 472; ii. 290.
- FRANCISCO, Queen Mary's steward, i. 755. Accused as one of Darnley's murderers, ii. 50.
- FRASER, SIR SIMON, defeats the English at Roslin, i. 107. Resists Edward, 109. Outlawed, ib. Taken prisoner and executed, 119. [See Appendix to vol. i., note I.]
- FRASER, SIR ALEXANDER, joins Bruce, i. 125. Slain at the battle of Dupplin, 185.
- FRASER, SIMON, joins Bruce, i. 125. Slain at the battle of Halidon Hill, 188.
- FRASER, JAMES, slain at the battle of Halidon Hill, i. 188.
- FRASER, SIR SIMON, captures Edinburgh Castle, i. 196.
- FRASER, SIMON. [See LOVAT.]
- FRASER CLAN desert the cause of the Pretender, ii. 866.
- "FRATRES FRATERNIMI," a collection of satires against the Romish church by George Buchanan, ii. 291.
- FRESHOOTERS, border, ii. 857.
- FRENCH KNIGHTS, under Vienne, visit Scotland, i. 229. Invade England in concert with Scotch, 230. Misunderstanding of, with the Scots, 231; and return to France, ib.
- FRENDRAUGHT, BARON, his quarrel with Rothiemay, ii. 504. Burning of his castle, Appendix to vol. ii., note G.
- FRENDRAUGHT, LORD, a follower of Montrose, ii. 653. Death of, 660.
- FRUSLEERS, Scotch, their position at Killiecrankie, ii. 786.
- FYFE, JOHN, a reformer, i. 472.
- G.
- "GABERLUNZIE MAN, THE," a ballad composed by James V. i. 530.
- GAEL, origin of, i. 24.
- GAELIC LANGUAGE, origin of the, i. 239.
- GALBRAITH, PATRICK, i. 323.
- GALGACUS, his speech and defeat, i. 3, 4, 67, 73.
- GALLOWAY, i. 1, 32. Insurrection in, 67, 73. Surrenders to Edward I., 106. Ravaged by Bruce, 126. Reduced by Edward Bruce, 124, 207. Annexed to the crown, 338.
- "GALLOWAY, THE WILD SCOTS OF," i. 39.
- GALLOWAY, FERGUS, Lord of, i. 67.
- GALLOWAY, ALAN of, i. 73.
- GALLOWAY, "Galaran" of an ancient romance, i. 291, 309.
- GALLOWAY, THE BISHOP OF, i. 441.
- GALLOWAY, ANDREW, BISHOP OF, i. 600.
- GALLOWAY, THE FAIR MAIDEN OF. [See MARGARET DOUGLAS.]
- GALWEGIANS, i. 39. At the battle of the Standard, 61, 62, 72, 97. Bruce attacked by a body of, 121. Arms used by the, 221. Defy the Earl of Douglas, 331. At the battle of Sauchieburn, 363. Robbery and theft among the, 533.
- GAMBLING, i. 582, note.
- GAMKLIN, BISHOP, i. 77.
- GAMES, i. 222, 551, 552.
- GARDEN, DR., tried for heresy, ii. 767.
- GARDINER, COLONEL, ii. 927. His behaviour at the battle of Preston, and death, ib.
- GARENCIERES, EUGENE DE, a French knight, i. 200, 201.
- GASK, the Forest of, i. 310.
- GASKELNE, battle at, i. 238.
- GATHELUS, a fabulous Spanish king, i. 92.
- GATHELUS, son of Neolus, a fabulous king of Greece, i. 76, 298.
- GAULS, manners and language of, i. 9. Dress of, 19.
- GAUNT, JOHN OF. [See LANCASTER.]
- GAVESTON, a favourite of Edward II., i. 128.
- GAVINO, ANTHONY, "Lord of Little Egypt," a gipsy, i. 541. Curious letter of James IV. regarding, ib.
- "GAWANE, AWNTER OF," an ancient poem by Hugh of the Royal Hall, i. 291.
- "GAWEN AND GOLOGRAS," an ancient Scottish romance, i. 291, 309.
- GEOLOGICAL SECTION.—Tabular view of rocks, vol. i. p. v. Primary formation, vi. Granite, ib. Grampian range, and Ben McDhul, viii. Cape Wrath, x. Gneiss, ib. Mica slate, xi. Quartz rock, xii. Primary limestone, xiii. Clay slate, xiv. Silurian system, xv. Lydian stone, xvii. Organic remains, xviii. Old red sandstone, xxii. Devonian system, xxiii. Cornstone, ib. Organic remains of old red sandstone, xxvi. Poissons Fossiles, ib. Asterolepis, xxvii. Pterichthys and Coccoleus, xxix. Osteolepis, ib. Cephalaspis, xxx. Holopterychius, ib. Edotea, xxxi. Yellow sandstone, xxxiii. Igneous rock, xxxv. Trap rock, xxxvii. Porphyry, xxxviii. Basalt, xxxix. Carboniferous system, xlii. Coal measures, xiv. Organic remains of coal, xlix. Felices, ib. Equisetacea, ib. Lepidodendra, lii. Sigillaria, ib. Coniferae, liii. Carboniferous limestones, liv. Coral reefs, lviii. Geographic distribution of coal, lixi. Table of coal seams, lixii. Lothian coalfield, lxx. Carron coalfield, lxxvi. Lanark coalfield, lxxvii. Ayrshire, lb. Clay, ironstone, and blackband, lxxx. Cannel coal, lxxxi. New red sandstone, lxxiv. Foot-prints, lxxvi. Tertiary system, lxxviii. Order of beds of basalt, lxxix. Leaves, ib. Equiseta, lxxx. Trap formation in Ireland, ib., lxxx. Staffa, ib. Trap islands, lxxxiii. Metals, lxxxiii. Mercury, lxxxv. Zinc, lxxxvi. Manganese, ib. Antimony, ib. Nickel, lb. Lead, ib. Copper, lxxxvii. Iron, ib. Silver, lxxxviii. Gold, lxxxix.
- GEORGE, ST., CHEVALIER DE, ii. 835.
- GEORGE I., his accession, ii. 842. He is proclaimed at Edinburgh, ib.
- GERMAINS, ST., arrival of despatches from, ii. 795.
- GERMAN TROOPS, i. 613.
- GIBBON, quoted, i. 6, 7.
- GIBSON, JAMES, ii. 428.
- GIFFORD OF SHERIFFHALL, i. 358.
- GILBERTINE MONKS, i. 168.
- GILBERTSON, SIR WILLIAM, i. 138.
- GILDEROY, an Irish chief, i. 73.
- GILES, ST., the church of, i. 228, 320. Dunbar's description of, 544, 636, 638.
- GILES, ST., the image of, i. 522.
- GILLESPIE, THOMAS, of Carnock, ii. 906. He is ejected from his living, ib. A sketch of, ib.
- GILLIES HILL, i. 133, 137.
- GILMOUR, president of the court of session, ii. 665. His integrity, ib.
- GIPSEYS, the first appearance of, in Scotland, i. 541. Suppression of, 642.
- GLAMMIS, LORD, i. 362—378. Joins Angus against government, 422.
- GLAMMIS, LORD, conspiracy and trial of, i. 453. Condemned to perpetual imprisonment, ib.
- GLAMMIS, LORD, death of, ii. 152.
- GLAMMIS, MASTER OF, share in Gowrie's conspiracy, ii. 178. At the seizure of James VI., 179. Retires to Ireland, 190. Joins plot against Arran, 191. Enters Stirling, 192. Sentence of forfeiture, 194. His return to Scotland, 211. Receives command of king's guard, 213; and Governorship of Stirling Castle, ib.
- GLAMMIS, JANET DOUGLAS, LADY, conspiracy of, against James V., i. 452. Guilt and death of, 453, Appendix to vol. i., Note XVII.
- GLAMORGAN, LORD, his treaty with the Irish, ii. 632. He is arrested, 633.
- GLANVILL, treatise of, i. 215.
- GLASGOW, disturbances in, ii. 518, 826. Views of Cromwell to, 666, 669, note, ib. Malt tax riot in, 884. Prince Charles takes up his quarters in, 940. Levies contributions in, 941.
- GLASGOW, BISHOP OF, i. 77.
- GLASGOW, BISHOP OF. [See WISHART.]
- GLASGOW, ARCHBISHOPS OF, i. 441, 450, 569.
- GLASGOW, SEE OF, founded, i. 48.
- GLASGOW UNIVERSITY founded, i. 474.
- GLEN, JAMES, ii. 737.
- GLENCAIRN, EARL OF, slain at the battle of Flodden, i. 409.
- GLENCAIRN, EARL OF, joins James III. against the rebellious nobles, i. 362. Slain at Sauchieburn, 363.
- GLENCAIRN, EARL OF, i. 414. League with Arran, 418. Encounter with the Hamiltons, 437.
- GLENCAIRN, WILLIAM, EARL OF, accused of heresy, i. 459, 564, note. Taken prisoner at Solway Moss, 461. Approves of the reformation, 472. His bond with Henry VIII., and return to Scotland, 566. His embassy to London, 575. Renewed exertions in the cause of Henry, 577, 584. Bond with Regent Arran, 582. Defeat and flight of, 585. Joins in the plot against Cardinal Beaton, 590. Assists the English party, 592. One of the Regent's secret council, 600. Again intrigues with England, 605. Treachery of, 612. Signs the national covenant, 624, 629. Joins the army of the Protestants, 628, 632, 639. At the siege of Leith, 642. Rebels against Mary, 745, note, 752. Pardoned, 771. Destroys the chapel of Holyrood, ii. 71. One of the conspirators against Lennox and Arran, 178. Acknowledges himself one of the authors of the Raid of Ruthven, 184. Letter to the General Assembly from, 249.
- GLENCAIRN, EARL OF, insurrection of the, ii. 673. Fights a duel with Sir George Munro, 774. Returns to the Lowlands, and accepts the terms offered by the English, ib.
- GLENCOE, two warrants issued by the king against the men of, ii. 800. Plan for their extirpation, 801. Orders issued for the massacre of, ib. Horrors of the massacre of, 802. Sufferings of the fugitives from, ib. Consequences of the massacre of, 803. Commission appointed to inquire into the massacre of, 804. [See Appendix to vol. ii.]
- GLENDINNING, ROBERT, imprisonment of, ii. 512.
- GLENDOWER, OWEN, a Welsh chief, heads a rebellion in Wales, i. 244, 247.
- GLENSK. [See LINDSAY.]
- GLENGARRY, ALEXANDER OF, i. 455.
- GLENLIVAT, BATTLE OF, ii. 363.
- GLENGUICKEN, MOOR OF, ancient remains found on, i. 14.
- GLOUCESTER, GILBERT, EARL OF, a supporter of Bruce, i. 82.

GLOUCESTER, EARL OF, i. 129. Slain at the battle of Bannockburn, 137, and note, ib. Burial of, 139.
 GLOUCESTER, DUKE OF, regent of England, i. 256. Noticed, 317, 326.
 GLOUCESTER, RICHARD, DUKE OF, appointed lieutenant-general, i. 353. Commands the English forces, 355, 356. [See RICHARD III.]
 GLOUCESTER, DUKE OF, son of Queen Anne, death of, ib. 770.
 GODSCROFT, HUME OF. [See HUME.]
 GODWIN, BISHOP, i. 461.
 GOLDING, RALPH, i. 187.
 GOODMAN, CHRISTOPHER, a reformer, ib. 23.
 GORDON, SIR ADAM DE, ambassador to the Pope, i. 153.
 GORDON, SIR ADAM, incident regarding, and death of, at the battle of Homildon, i. 247.
 GORDON, SIR JOHN, invades the English frontiers, i. 225.
 GORDON, LORD, i. 317.
 GORDON, LADY CATHERINE, wife of Perkin Warbeck, i. 387. Devotion to her husband, 388.
 GORDON, SIR JAMES, of Lochinvar, murder of the Laird of Bomby by, i. 438, 535.
 GORDON, SIR JOHN, of Findlater, attack on Ogilvie and rebellion of, i. 711. Execution, 713.
 GORDON, LORD, imprisoned, i. 713. Restored to his estates, 752.
 GORDON, LADY JANE, Countess of Bothwell. [See BOTHWELL.]
 GORDON, SIR JOHN, of Lochinvar, chosen commissioner by Mary, ib. 90.
 GORDON, ADAM, of Auchindown, reduces the north under the royal authority, ib. 132. Included in treaty of Perth, 143.
 GORDON, WILLIAM, Bishop, immorality of, ib. 319.
 GORDON OF BUCKIE, murder of the Earl of Moray by, ib. 343.
 GORDON, SIR PATRICK, of Auchindown, slain at the battle of Glenlivet, ib. 363.
 GORDON, DUKE OF, is summoned to surrender Edinburgh Castle, ib. 745. He refuses, and is proclaimed a traitor, ib.
 GORDON, DUCHESS OF, ib. 839. Presentation of a medal to the faculty of advocates by the, ib.
 GORDON, GENERAL, ib. 874.
 GORDON, ALEXANDER, a celebrated antiquarian, ib. 971.
 GORTZ, BARON, plot of, against George I., ib. 878.
 GOSPATRICK, a Northumbrian chief, takes refuge in Scotland, i. 39. Lays waste Cumberland, ib. Again takes refuge in Scotland, 40. Receives from Malcolm the castles of Dunbar and Cockburnspath, &c., ib.
 GOURLAY, NORMAN, martyrdom of, i. 469.
 GOWEA, ANDREW, ib. 291.
 GOWRIE, EARL OF, plot of, ib. 178. Obtains possession of casket with Mary's letters, 182. Refuses to give it up to Elizabeth, ib. Interview of, with a deputation from clergy, 183. Acknowledges himself author of the plot, 184. Solicits and obtains pardon from James, 187. Appointed councillor, ib. Retires from court, 188. Obtains permission to retire to France, 191. Joins plot against Arran, ib. Arrest of, 192. Trial and execution, 193.
 GOWRIE, COUNTESS OF, sentence of forfeiture against, ib. 200. Petitions James for pardon, ib. Brutal treatment of, by Arran, ib.
 GOWRIE, JOHN, THIRD EARL OF, his character and popularity, ib. 379. Opposes James VI., 380. Conspiracy of, and its object, ib. His accomplices, 381. Letters of conspirators, ib. Proceedings of, 383-387. Death of, 388.
 GOWRIE HOUSE, construction of, ib. 385.
 GRÆME OF GRIM'S DYKE, i. 5.
 GRAHAM, SIR PATRICK, slain at the taking of Dunbar, i. 91.
 GRAHAM, SIR JOHN, of Abercorn and Dundaff, joins Wallace, i. 99. Slain at the battle of Falkirk, 101, and note, ib.
 GRAHAM, DAVID DE, resists Edward I., i. 109.
 GRAHAM, SIR PATRICK DE, his skill in jousting, i. 194.
 GRAHAM, SIR JOHN DE, his bravery at Neville's Cross, i. 198.
 GRAHAM, SIR ROBERT, imprisoned, i. 259. Conspiracy of, against James I., 269. Banished, and estates confiscated, 270. Assists in the murder of James, 272. Capture and execution, 273.
 GRAHAM, SIR PATRICK, of Kincardine, conspires against James I., i. 269.
 GRAHAM MALISE, nephew of Sir Robert, i. 270.
 GRAHAM, PATRICK, first Archbishop of St. Andrew's, i. 350. Persecution of, ib.
 GRAHAM, LORD, at the battle of Sauchieburn, i. 363.
 GRAHAM, MASTER OF, slain at Pinkie, i. 610.
 GRAHAM, LORD, one of the leaders of the confederates, ib. 65.
 GRAHAM, JOHN, of Peartree, plot for assassinating Angus, ib. 200. Arrested, and divulges the plot, 201.
 GRAHAM, RICHARD, a sorcerer, ib. 341. Execution of, 342.
 GRAHAM, JOHN, of Fintry, execution of, ib. 349, 445.
 GRAHAM OF DUNTRON, ib. 848.
 GRAMPIANS, BATTLE OF THE, i. 2, note, 18, 22.
 GRANGE, LADY, i. 461.
 GRANGE, LAIRD OF. [See KIRKALDY.]
 GRANGE, MANSION OF, ib. 923.
 GRANGER, REV. JAMES, minister of Kinneff, and his wife, conceal the Scottish regalia when Dunnotar was taken, ib. 673.
 GRANTS OF GLENMORISTON, ib. 919, 924.
 GRAY, SIR ANDREW, i. 131.
 GRAY, SIR PATRICK, wounded at Gasklune, i. 238.
 GRAY, SIR PATRICK, his mission to Douglas Castle, i. 331. Assists in the murder of Douglas at Stirling Castle, 332.
 GRAY, LORD, base conspiracy of, against James III., i. 354. Treacherous negotiation with England, 357. Renewed conspiracy and intrigues of, 360. Commands a division of rebels at Sauchieburn, 363.
 GRAY, LORD, i. 585. Treachery of, 605, 612. Deserts Mary's party, ib. 143.
 GRAY, MASTER OF, offers his services to betray Mary, ib. 199. Mission to England, 202. Treachery to Mary, ib. Interview with Hunsdon, and with Elizabeth, ib. His return and conduct, 204. Releases Arran, 209. Letter to Archibald Douglas, proposing return of banished lords, ib. Embassy of, to remonstrate against Mary's condemnation, 230. His treachery, 231. His arraignment and banishment, 330.

 GRAY FRIARS. [See GRAY FRIARS.]
 GREEN, CAPTAIN, accused of piracy and murder, ib. 817. Executed, ib.
 GREENSHIELDS, an English clergyman, ib. 774.
 GREGORY, POPE, i. 52.
 GREGORY, MR., author of the History of the Western Highlands, quoted, i. 64, 67.
 GREGORY, DAVID, professor in the University of Oxford, ib. 971.
 GRESOLLES, a French knight, i. 426. Appointed treasurer by Regent Albany, 428.
 GREY, SIR THOMAS, feats of valour, i. 201.
 GREY, LADY, daughter of the Countess of Surrey, i. 549.
 GREY, LORD, of Wilton, skirmish with the Scots, i. 606. Wounded at the battle of Pinkie, 608. Invades the Eastern Marches, 613. Joins the reformers in their assault on Leith, 642.
 GREY FRIARS, convent of the, in Dundee, i. 286. Church of, 351.
 GRIERSON OF LAGO, his cruelties to the covenanted, ib. 727. Brutal murders committed by, 728.
 GRIEVANCES, a declaration of, by the convention, ib. 749.
 GRIO, usurps the Scottish throne, i. 34, 53. Expelled, ib.
 GRIMANI, a papal legate, i. 580, note, ib.
 GROUCH, the wife of Macbeth, i. 38.
 GUALO, a papal legate, i. 72, 171.
 GUELDERES, MARY OF, affianced and married to James II., i. 326, 374. Her death, 347.
 GUELDERES, ARNOLD, DUKE OF, i. 326.
 GUELDERES, CHARLES D'EGMONT, DUKE OF, solicits the assistance of James IV., against the House of Austria, i. 395.
 GUEST, GENERAL, ib. 921, 922.
 GUISE, MARY OF, married to James V., i. 453. Conduct with regard to a second marriage, 579. Retreats to Stirling, 585. Consultation with the Earl of Angus, 586. Reconciled to Arran, ib. Aspires to the regency, 616. Bad consequences of her accession, 618. Attempts to introduce a standing army, 620. Fortifies Leith, 636. Deposed, 637. Requests a last interview with the lords of the congregation, 643. Her death, 644.
 GUISE, DUKE OF, intrigues with Mary of Guise, i. 616. Further intrigues of, 622.
 GUISE, HOUSE OF, i. 616. Intrigues of, regarding the marriage of Mary, 622, 623. Against Elizabeth of England, 626. Schemes against the Reformation, 633. Policy of the, 651.
 GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, invades Germany, ib. 504. Asks assistance from Charles I., ib. Conference of, with Hamilton at Werben, 505. Wishes to subjugate all Germany, ib. Slain at the battle of Lutzen, ib.
 GUTHRIE, insurrection of, i. 71.
 GUTHRIE, REV. JAMES, trial of the, ib. 686. His execution, 687.
 GWYN, one of the rebels in 1715, anecdote respecting, ib. 862.
 GYLLENBORG, COUNT, Swedish ambassador, plot of, ib. 878.

H.

HABEAS CORPUS ACT, suspended, ib. 849.
 HACKSTON OF RATHILLET, present at the murder of Archbishop Sharp, ib. 715. Taken prisoner at Airdsmoss, ib. Barbarous treatment of, ib. His defence on his trial, 716. His execution, ib.
 HACO, King of Norway, quarrels with Alexander III., i. 78. Invades Scotland, ib. Is defeated at Largs, 79. His fleet destroyed by a storm, ib. Returns to Orkney, ib. His death, ib.
 HADDINGTON, BATTLE OF, i. 459.
 HADDINGTON, burnt by Hertford, i. 584. Siege of, 613. Capture of, 615.
 HADDINGTON, EARL OF, defeats a party of English from Berwick, ib. 585. Is killed at Douglas Castle, ib.
 HADDON, PRINCIPAL, ib. 893.
 HADRIAN, expedition to Scotland, i. 5. Erects ramparts between the Solway and Tyne, ib. Death of, ib.
 HALDANE, MR. PATRICK, ib. 882.
 HALIBURTON OF PITCUB, killed at Killiecrankie, ib. 788.
 HALIBURTON, RALPH DE, i. 110.
 HALIBURTON, WILLIAM, i. 254.
 HALIDON HILL, BATTLE OF, i. 188.
 HALL, THOMAS, assists in the murder of James I., i. 272. His execution, 273.
 HALL, SIR JOHN, one of the murderers of James I., i. 272.
 HALL, JOHN, resists Arran, ib. 205.
 HALL, JOHN, of Atherburn, ib. 856.
 HAMBURG, letter of Wallace to, i. 98. Subscriptions opened at, for the Darien scheme, ib. 809. Opposition of the English resident at, ib.
 HAMILTON, Abbot of Paisley, i. 573, 578. Made treasurer, 581.
 HAMILTON, Abbot of Kilwinning, i. 708. Conspiracy and imprisonment, 756. Conduct before Elizabeth, ib. 63.
 HAMILTON, Archbishop of St. Andrew's, influences Arran, i. 617. Illness and recovery, 618. Enters Edinburgh, 706. Imprisoned for celebrating mass, 717. Declared traitor, ib. 90. Jurisdiction restored, ib. 239.
 HAMILTON, ARCHBISHOP, catechism of, i. 317. Immorality of, 319.
 HAMILTON, ARTHUR, of Merton, surrenders to Morton, ib. 160.
 HAMILTON OF BOTHWELL, made prisoner at Langside, ib. 84. His assassination of Regent Moray, 114. Takes refuge in Hamilton Castle, ib.

- HAMILTON OF STENHOUSE, defends Edinburgh Castle, i. 584.
- HAMILTON, LORD, ii. 333. Renounces his allegiance, 334. Deserts Douglas, 337.
- HAMILTON, LORD, created Earl of Arran, ii. 393. Imprisoned, 397.
- HAMILTON, LORD CLAUD, ii. 83. Joins queen on her escape at Laingside, 84. Declared traitor, 90. Attack on Stirling, 130. flies from Morton, 160. Joins plot against Arran, 191.
- HAMILTON, LORD JOHN, joins plot against Arran, ii. 191.
- HAMILTON, SIR JAMES, of Draphane, i. 423. Murders Lennox, 437. Attempt to assassinate, 438. Reconciled to James V., 442. Coldness of James to, 446. Treason and execution of, 456.
- HAMILTON, JAMES, of Kincavell, reversal of sentence of heresy, ii. 16.
- HAMILTON JOHN, Archbishop of St. Andrew's, made prisoner at Dunbarton, ii. 127. Execution of, ib.
- HAMILTON, SIR PATRICK, brother of Arran, i. 423.
- HAMILTON, PATRICK, martyrdom of, and its effects, i. 468. [See Appendix to vol. I., Note XVIII.]
- HAMILTON PALACE burned, ii. 119.
- HAMILTON, JAMES, SECOND MARQUIS OF, his death, ii. 415.
- HAMILTON, JAMES, THIRD MARQUIS OF, treaty with the King of Sweden, ii. 505. Falsely accused of treason by Ochiltree, ib. Commands the Scottish brigade in the service of Gustavus Adolphus, ib. His services at Guben, Glogau, Magdeburg, &c., ib. is recalled, ib. He is appointed high commissioner to Scotland, 532. Commission to, ib. instructions given to, ib. Departure of, for Scotland, ib. His arrival at Dalkeith, ib. He communicates his views to the king, 534. He declares his mission hopeless, ib. His sympathy for the covenanters, ib. He refuses to enter Edinburgh, 535. Afterwards consents, ib. Splendid arrangements made for the reception of, ib. He intimates his intention of issuing a proclamation, 536. He is displeased with the covenanters, ib. His temporising policy, ib. He gives no answer to the supplication of the covenanters, 537. He pretends to leave Edinburgh for London, but suddenly returns, ib. He issues the king's proclamation, ib. Directions given to, 538. His correspondence with the king, 539. He departs for London, ib. Perfidious policy proposed by, ib. He is again dispatched to Scotland, 540. Impolitic conduct of, ib. His arrival in Edinburgh, ib. He is waited on by deputies from the Tables, ib. He makes two demands, ib. He again departs for the court, ib. He is again sent to Scotland with fresh instructions, 541. He meets the privy-council, 542. He is requested to delay the king's proclamation, 543. He attempts to disunite the covenanters, ib. He visits Glasgow, ib. He calls a meeting of, the 545. His arrival in Glasgow, 546. His reception by the covenanters, ib. Disingenuous conduct of, 547. His speech in the General Assembly, 549. His satisfaction with the moderator's reply, ib. He declares the assembly dissolved, 560. Proclamation issued by the, 551. He departs for court, 5th January, 553. He reads the covenanters' petition to the king, ib. He receives orders to proceed with the fleet to the Frith of Forth, 557. His arrival, ib. Hopeless condition of the troops under, 558. He orders a proclamation from the king to be published, ib. He receives a refusal from the magistrates of Edinburgh, ib. He corresponds with the Earl of Rothes, ib. He intercedes with the king in behalf of Loudoun, 573. He is insulted by Lord Crawford, 598. He is exculpated by parliament, 599. His advice to the King, 616. He is created a duke, 617. His unsuccessful policy, ib. His arrest and imprisonment by Charles I., ib. His opposition to the surrender of Charles, 636. His efforts to rescue the king, 643, 644. He leads the Scottish army into England, ib. His defeat at Preston and capture, ib. His trial and execution, 651.
- HAMILTON, WILLIAM, THIRD DUKE OF, he is elected president of the convention, ii. 748. He becomes an ostensible leader of the Cavaliers, 813. His dissent and retirement, 814. He betrays his party, 818. His treachery, 828. Artful policy of, ib. His fickleness, ib. His embassy to Paris, 841. He is killed in a duel, ib.
- HAMILTON, WILLIAM, FOURTH MARQUIS AND SECOND DUKE OF. [See LANARK, EARL OF.]
- HAMILTON, SIR JOHN, of Orbiston, he bears a message from the privy-council to the king, ii. 530.
- HAMILTON, DR. ROBERT, minister of Glassford, ii. 546. Presents a paper to the General Assembly from the clergy, ib.
- HAMILTON, LIEUTENANT-COLONEL, receives orders to proceed to Glencoe, ii. 801.
- HAMILTON, LORD BASIL, ii. 812.
- HAMILTON, MAJOR-GENERAL, ii. 845.
- HAMILTONS, THE, conduct of, on imprisonment of Mary, ii. 74. Revelations of treachery of, 76. Conference of, at Largs, 89. Forfeiture of, 160.
- HARLAU, BATTLE OF, i. 22, 253. [See Appendix to vol. I., Note S.]
- HARLOW, WILLIAM, a Scottish reformer, takes refuge in England, i. 674.
- HAROLD, Earl of Orkney, i. 71, 73.
- HART, JOCKEY, assists James V. to escape from Falkland, i. 440.
- HARTCLA, SIR ANDREW, i. 155.
- HASTINGS, DAVID DE, incites the people against the Bissets, i. 74.
- HASTINGS, JOHN DE, competitor for the crown, i. 188. Acknowledges Edward I. as lord paramount, ib. The descent from which he claims the crown, ib. Claims part of the kingdom, ib.
- HATTON, brother of Lauderdale, perjury of, ii. 707.
- HAVESHAM, LORD, opposes the union, ii. 829.
- HAWLEY, GENERAL, commander of the English forces in Scotland, ii. 941. His character, ib. Conduct and defeat of, at the Battle of Falkirk, 943. His flight to Edinburgh, 944. Discomfiture of, 945.
- HAY, GEORGE, discussion on episcopal functions, ii. 271. Exposes the conduct of Archbishop Adamson, 274.
- HAY, SIR GILBERT, a Scottish poet, i. 309.
- HAY, LORD, created Earl of Errol, i. 334.
- HAY, Master of Requests, dispatched to England by Mary, i. 743.
- HAY OF TALLO, assists in murder of Darnley, ii. 46. Apprehension of, 81. And trial and execution of, 82.
- HAY, COLONEL, a friend of the Earl of Mar, ii. 845.
- HAY, Constable of Scotland. [See ERROL, EARL OF.]
- HAYE, GILBERT DE LA, and his brother Hugh, join Bruce, i. 115. Noticed, 116, 121.
- HEBRIDES, state of, in 1603, ii. 405. Barbarous condition of the inhabitants, ib.
- HELVETIAN CONFESSION OF FAITH, ii. 240.
- HEMINGFORD, the historian, his description of the Scottish Schiltron, i. 101. Quoted, 110, 119.
- HENDERSON, ANDREW, connection with Gowrie plot, ii. 383. His conduct in the Tower, 386.
- HENDERSON, REV. ALEXANDER, minister of Leuchars, ii. 618. His defence of church liberties, ib. Elected moderator of the General Assembly, 547, 601. He draws up an answer to the king's proclamation, 554. His paper upon the lawfulness of defensive war, ib. One of the deputies to the king, 562. Chaplain to the army, 580. Speech of, 608. Covenant drawn up by, 609. His interview with Montrose, 617. His controversy with Charles I., 634. Death of, ib.
- HENRY I., of England, i. 60.
- HENRY II., of England, i. 67, 70.
- HENRY III., of England, receives homage from Alexander II., i. 72. Alexander marries his sister Joan, 73. Inflamed against Alexander by Walter Bisset, 74, 75. Meditates an invasion of Scotland, and proceeds to Newcastle with an army, 75. Treaty of peace—waives homage from Alexander, ib. His daughter Margaret marries Alexander III., 76. Sends ministers to Scottish court, ib. Interview with Alexander at Roxburgh, ib. Interposes between Haaco, King of Norway, and Alexander, ib. Death of, 80.
- HENRY IV., of England, supplants Richard II., i. 243. His expedition into Scotland, 244. Defeats Hotspur and Douglas at Shrewsbury, 248. Takes James I. prisoner, 249. Negotiations with Albany, 250, 251. His death, 253.
- HENRY VI., of England, treaty with James II. of Scotland, i. 341. Defeated by the Yorkists, 344. Obtains the assistance of the Earl of Angus, 346.
- HENRY VII., of England, renews treaty with James III., i. 359. Intrigues with rebellious Scottish barons, 361. Conspiracy of, against James IV., 383. James IV. supports the plot of Perkin Warbeck against, 386, 388. His truce with Scotland, 389. Death of, 397.
- HENRY VIII., of England, negotiations with James IV., i. 400. Declares war against Scotland, 402. Intrigues against Regent Albany, 418. War with Scotland, 425. His treaty with James V., 443. Intrigues against Cardinal Beaton, 454. His proceedings on death of James V., 565. Negotiations for marriage of Queen Mary with the Prince of Wales, 576. Plots assassination of Beaton, 590. His death, 602.
- HENRY, PRINCE, Carlisle and Doncaster ceded to, i. 61. At Battle of the Standard, 62. Earldom of Northumberland ceded to, 63. Meets Stephen to ratify treaty of peace, ib. His death, 64.
- HENRY THE MINSTREL, or "Blind Harry," i. 309.
- HENRY II., of France, letter from, i. 622. Duplicity of, ib. Death of, 633.
- HENRY III., of France, remonstrates against Mary's execution, ii. 231.
- HENRY, PRINCE, birth, and conspiracy for seizing his person, ii. 357. Baptism, 362.
- HENRYSTOWN, ROBERT, i. 304. description of his poems, 304—308.
- HEPURN OF HALES, i. 247, 325, 334.
- HEPURN OF BOLTON, assists in murder of Darnley, ii. 45. Trial of, 81. Dying declaration of, 82.
- HEPURN OF RICCARTON, dispatched by Mary to Dunbar, ii. 83.
- HEPURN, PATRICK, Bishop of Moray, immorality of, ii. 319.
- HEREFORD, EARL OF, commands at the battle of Bannockburn, i. 136.
- HERMITAGE CASTLE, ii. 492.
- HERON, THE BASTARD, murders Sir Robert Ker, i. 398. At the Battle of Flodden, 408.
- HERON, SIR WILLIAM, i. 405. Influence of his wife on James IV., ib.
- HERON, SIR JOHN, slain at the Raid of Redswire, ii. 499.
- HERRIES, SIR JOHN, of Terregles, hanged by Douglas, i. 331.
- HERRIES, LORD, implores Mary not to marry Bothwell, ii. 52. Joins queen's party, 71. Accompanies Mary to England, 84. Persuades Mary to submit to trial, 89. Chosen commissioner by Mary, 90. Dispatched by her to Elizabeth, 94. Imprisoned by Moray, 104. Liberated, 116. Chosen councillor to James VI., 153. Interview with king and Gowrie conspirators, 179. Indignation at Mary's condemnation, 230.
- HERRIES, DR. HUGH, at rescue of king from Gowrie, ii. 357.
- HERTFORD, EARL OF, invades Scotland, i. 583. Instructions of Henry to, ib. Departure of, 584. Second invasion, 592. Retreat, 593. Created Duke of Somerset, 602. [See SOMERSET.]
- HIGHLANDS, social condition of, in 1603, ii. 404. Petty wars and depredations, ib. Attempts made to restrain these excesses, 405. Feuds in the, 504. A civil war breaks out in the, 780. Failure of an attempt to promote peace in the, 781. Indecisive campaign in the, 782. Suspension of the war in the, 783. Renewal of the war in the, 784. Gatherings in the, 839. Disarming measures in the, 863. A new rising projected in the, ib. State of the, 909. Scheme of President Forbes for settling the, 910.

- HIGHLANDERS, their habits, li. 620. Savage conduct of the host of, 704. Their recall, 709. Increase of their army, 769. Inefficiency of Cannon, their new commander, ib. A body of, defeated by Mackay, ib. Dissensions among the, ib. They attack the Cameronians at Dunkeld, 790. Repulse of the, 791. Their army breaks up, ib. They sign a bond to reassemble on a future day, ib. They resolve to renew the war, ib. Dispersion of the, 792. State of the, 797. Breadalbane negotiates with the chiefs of, ib. The chiefs of the, take oath of allegiance, 798. Causes of their Jacobitism, 910. Treachery of the government towards a regiment of, 911. Renewal of depredations by the, ib. They are opposed to the lauding of Charles, 913. Their march from Perth to Edinburgh, 920.
- HILL, COLONEL, Governor of Fort William, li. 799. He receives orders concerning Glencoe, 801.
- HOG, REV. MR., minister of Carnock, li. 893.
- HOGUE, LA, THE BATTLE OF, li. 803.
- HOLIDAYS, enforced observance of, li. 483.
- HOLLAND, FLORENCE, EARL OF, competitor for the crown, i. 87.
- HOLLAND, A SCOTTISH POET, author of "The Buke of the Howlat," i. 309.
- HOLLAND, THE UNITED PROVINCES OF, intercede for the life of Charles I., li. 649.
- HOME, ALEXANDER, THIRD LORD, defeated by the English, i. 403. His behaviour at the battle of Flodden, 408 and note. Treason of, 416. Imprisonment and flight, 417. Return to Scotland, 418. Execution of, 419.
- HOME, GEORGE, FOURTH LORD, wounded, i. 806.
- HOME, ALEXANDER, FIFTH LORD, li. 65. Atcoronation of James VI., 76. At Langside, 84. At Lethington's trial, 112. Delivered up to Morton at siege of Edinburgh Castle, 145.
- HOME, ALEXANDER, FIRST EARL, imprisoned by Arran, li. 201. Conspiracy against, 359. Released from sentence of excommunication, li. 448.
- HOME, SIR GEORGE, li. 416. Execution of, 419.
- HOME, DAVID, of Wedderburn, murders De la Bastie, i. 420. His assassination of Blackadder, i. 422.
- HOME, SIR JAMES, appointed warden of the Eastern Marches, li. 146. Receives governorship of Edinburgh Castle, 213.
- HOME, SIR ALEXANDER, dispatched to Elizabeth, li. 166. Interview with Burghley, ib. Bond of, for release of James from Gowrie, 185.
- HOME CASTLE, taken from the English, i. 615. Capture of, by Sussex, li. 118. Surrender of, to Cromwell, 668 and note.
- HOMILDEN HILL, BATTLE OF, i. 247.
- HOOKE, COLONEL, his mission from French court, li. 832. Receives doubtful support, 833. He is deceived by the Cameronians, ib.
- HOPE, SIR THOMAS, lord advocate, his vigorous opposition to the Marquis of Hamilton, li. 545.
- HOTSPUR. [See PERCY.]
- HOUSES in the early ages, i. 17. In the reign of James I., 280.
- HOWARD, SIR EDWARD, Lord High Admiral of England, sent on an expedition against the Bartons, i. 398. Death of, 401.
- HOWARD, LORD THOMAS, li. 398. High Admiral of England, 405. Sends an insulting message to James V., ib. At the battle of Flodden, 407.
- HOWARD, SIR EDWARD, at the Battle of Flodden, i. 407, 408.
- HOWARD, LORD WILLIAM, li. 96.
- HOWARD, LORD ADMIRAL, li. 232, 395, 396.
- HOWARD, LORD, condemned, li. 586. Saved by the Marquis of Hamilton, ib.
- HOWISON, JOHN, imprisonment of, li. 424.
- HUBERT, NICHOLAS, or FRENCH PARIS, his evidence regarding the murder of Darnley, li. 45, 46.
- HUCHOWN OF THE AWLE TRAIL, a Scottish poet, i. 291.
- HUGHSON, ROBERT, a Scottish poet, li. 311.
- HUGHSON, THOMAS, translator of "Du Bartas," li. 311.
- HUGH, accession to throne, i. 34. Death of, ib.
- HUME, ALXANDER, of Manderston, intrusted with warrant to arrest Archibald Douglas, li. 168.
- HUME, DAVID, a banished minister, distress of, li. 205.
- HUME, ALEXANDER, of N. Berwick, comes to assistance of James VI., li. 350.
- HUME, ALEXANDER, poems of, li. 369.
- HUME, JOHN, warns Regent Moray of his danger, li. 114.
- HUME, CAPTAIN, at capture of Dumbarton Castle, li. 126.
- HUME OF GODSCROFT, a historian, quoted, i. 384, 414, 444. Noticed, li. 970.
- HUME, ALEXANDER, a covenantar, execution of, li. 721.
- HUME, SIR PATRICK, of Polwarth, persecution of, li. 724. His daughter noticed, ib. Escapes to Holland, ib. Takes part in Argyll's invasion, 733. Character of, ib. Escape of to the continent, 734. Becomes a member of "The Club," 777. Is created Earl of Marchmont and chancellor, 812, and Appendix to vol. II., Note, M. p. 984.
- HUNSDON, conference of, with Arran, li. 198. Embassy to James, 332.
- HUNTINGDON, DAVID, EARL OF, li. 69, 71.
- HUNTLEY, GEORGE, FIRST EARL OF, defeats the Earl of Crawford, i. 333.
- HUNTLEY, ALEXANDER, THIRD EARL OF, at Flodden, i. 408. Noticed, 412. Death of, 428.
- HUNTLEY, GEORGE, FOURTH EARL OF, defeats the English at Hadden Rig, i. 458. Is appointed chancellor, 599. Challenges Somerset, 607. Made prisoner, 610. Promises to join England, 612. Dispatched against the Clanranald, 619. Disgrace of, ib. Joins reformers, 642. Conspiracy of, 711. Invites Mary to Strathogie, 712. Rebellion of, ib. Defeat and death, 713. Estates and title forfeited, ib. Attainder of his body by parliament, 717.
- HUNTLEY, GEORGE, FIFTH EARL OF, his danger when Rieclo was murdered, i. 767. Chancellorship bestowed on, 771. At conference at Craigmillar, li. 36. Consents to the divorce of his sister from Bodwell, 62. Restored to his estates, ib. Protests against Mary's marriage, 62. Joins queen's party, 71. At conference at Largs, 89. Assembles forces, 90, 104. Submits to Moray, 104. Attack of, on Stirling, 130. Conference with Morton's commissioners, 142. Restored to honours and estates, 143.
- HUNTLEY, GEORGE, SIXTH EARL AND FIRST MARQUIS OF, plot to release James from Gowrie's hands, li. 185. Indignation at Mary's condemnation, 230. Joins Spanish faction, 332. His connection with the murder of "the bonnie Earl of Moray," 343. Trial and pardon, 334. Rebellion and flight, 348. Excommunicated, 354. Petitions king for trial, 355. Act of abolition, 356. Summoned for trial, 357. Conspiracy against, 359. Sentence of treason and forfeiture, 363. Proceedings against, ib. At battle of Glenlivet, li. Flight; destruction of his castle, 364. Return of, 369. Reconciled to the kirk, 371. Is again excommunicated, 478. Quarrel with Frendraught, li. 504. Ordered to appear before the privy-council, ib. His arrest, ib. Imprisonment and release, ib. Death of, ib.
- HUNTLEY, COUNTESS OF, makes an offer to synod of Murray on behalf of her husband, li. 369.
- HUNTLEY, GEORGE, SECOND MARQUIS OF, li. 555. Taken prisoner by Montrose, 556, 618. Defeat and flight of, 618. His execution, 652.
- HUNTLEY, JOHN, commander of a Jacobite troop in 1715, li. 857.
- HUTCHINSON, THE REV. PATRICK, li. 907.
- I.
- ICELAND, ISLAND OF, i. 49.
- IDA, founder of Northumbria, i. 25.
- IDA, colonised by Angus, i. 28.
- ILAY, THE EARL OF, lord-justice-general, li. 842.
- INCAPACITATION, ACT OF, passed, li. 778.
- INCHAFFRAY, ABBOT OF, at Bannockburn, i. 136. Monastery of, founded, 167. ABBOT OF, slain at the battle of Flodden, 409.
- INCHCOLM, WALTER BOWER, ABBOT OF. [See BOWER.]
- INCHMARTIN, SIR DAVID, li. 116. Suffers death in the cause of Bruce, 119.
- INCURSE, ABBOT OF, i. 341.
- "INCIDENT, THE," a mysterious plot, li. 599. Escape of the intended victims, ib. Investigation of, ib.
- INGELRAM DE COUCL. [See COUCL.]
- INGLIS, JOHN, the marshal, i. 404.
- INGLIS, SIR JAMES, ABBOT OF Culross, i. 445.
- INNES OF INNES, i. 362. Intercommuning letters of, issued, li. 706.
- INVERLOCHY, BATTLE OF, li. 623.
- INVERARY CASTLE, taken by Montrose, li. 622; by General Dean, 673; by the Marquis of Atholl, 736; and by Mar, 848.
- INVERNESS, i. 264, 347.
- INVERNESS CASTLE, seized by the Jacobites, li. 848.
- IONA, ISLAND OF, first missionaries settle at, i. 28—49.
- IONA, MONASTERY OF, i. 26. Monks of, 32. ABBOT OF, 51—57.
- IRELAND, emigrants from, i. 27—56. Bruce takes refuge on the coast of, 118. Invaded by Edward Bruce, 141; by Sir William Douglas, 232. The cause of Perkin Warbeck supported by, 386. Expedition of the Earl of Arran against, 403. Crown of, offered to James V., 458.
- IRELAND, DR., mission to Scotland, i. 353.
- IRISH MASSACRE, account of, li. 599.
- IRONSIDES, CROMWELL'S, li. 631.
- IRTON, GENERAL, mentioned, li. 631, 633.
- IRVINE, Percy meets the Scottish forces at, i. 5. Edward I., of England at, 195.
- IRVINE, an episcopalian clergyman, preaches to the Jacobite insurgents, li. 859.
- IRVINE, DR., quoted, li. 292.
- IRVING, SIR ALEXANDER, of Drum, slain at the battle of Harlaw, i. 253, note, ib. Noticed, li. 618.
- ISABEL, daughter of David, Earl of Huntingdon, i. 87.
- ISABELLA, daughter of William the Lion, i. 71.
- ISABELLA, Countess of Buchan. [See BUCHAN.]
- ISABELLA, wife of Robert Bruce, i. 164.
- ISABELLA, daughter of the Duke of Albany, married to the Earl of Ross, i. 252.
- ISABELLA, wife of the Duke of Albany, imprisoned, i. 260.
- ISABELLA, daughter of James I., married to Francis, Duke of Bretagne, i. 274.
- ISLA, DONALD BALLOCH, LORD OF, invades the western coast of Scotland, i. 339.
- ISLA, ALEXANDER OF, i. 444.
- ISLA, JOHN OF, i. 445.
- ISLES, WESTERN, li. 46. Men of the, 61. Invaded and subdued by Bruce, 142. Rebellion in, 266. The country ravaged by freebooters from, 320. Dispute between James II. and the King of Norway regarding, 341. Rebellion in, 266, 393, 444. Visited by James V., 455, 558.
- ISLES, JOHN, LORD OF THE, rebellion of, i. 209. His submission, 210.
- ISLES, DONALD, LORD OF THE, rebellion and causes of, i. 252. Fights the battle of Harlaw, 253. Submits to Albany, ib.
- ISLES, ALEXANDER OF THE, Earl of Ross, arrested by James, i. 264. Almost dead and set at liberty, ib. Renewed rebellion of, ib. Delivers himself up to James, ib. Imprisoned, ib. Leagues against James II., 326.
- ISLES, JOHN, EARL OF ROSS, and LORD OF THE. [See ROSS.]
- ISLES, BISHOP OF THE, slain at the battle of Flodden, i. 409.
- ITALY, the Stewart court transferred to, li. 879.

J.

JACK, GILBERT, professor of philosophy, University of Leyden, ii. 970.

JACOBITES, SCOTCH, their submission to government, ii. 747. Feeble opposition of, to the vote of forfeiture, 748. Their perjury, 793. They assume the name of Cavaliers, 813. Apathy in regard to the cause of the Chevalier, 835. Expectations of, from the union, 841. Depressed condition of, 842. Their leaders restrained by government, 843. Take up arms in the south-west of Scotland, 857. Join the English insurgents, ib., 859. A detachment sent by Mar across the Firth, ib. Reach Edinburgh, 858. Take Leith Fort, ib. Abandon it, ib. Halt at Seton House, 859. Disputes with the English, 860. Threaten to attack Dumfries, 861. A portion refuse to march into England, ib. Their arrival at Preston, 862. Bravery of the, 864. Repulse the Government troops, ib. Their unconditional surrender, 865. Cruel treatment inflicted by the royalists upon, ib. Troops under Mar march to Dunblane, 867. At the battle of Sheriffmuir, 868. Propose to negotiate with government, 870. Decrease of the army, ib., 872. Disputes in the camp, 873. Their final dispersion, 874. Punishment of the, ib. Execution of five, 877. Correspondence of, with Cardinal Alberoni, 878. Arrival of forces from Spain, 879. Dispersed by General Wightman, ib. Refugees repair to Italy, ib. Proposals to the Duke of Argyll, 881. Leaders correspond with the Chevalier, 911. Number and character of those who join Prince Charles, 917. March to Edinburgh, 919. Capture of the city, 923. They proclaim James VIII., ib. Resolve to give battle to Sir John Cope, 924. They defeat the royalists at Preston, 927. Kindness to their prisoners, 928. Triumphant return to Edinburgh, ib. Dissensions in the army, 936. State of their cause in Scotland, ib. They march into England, 937. Arrival at Derby, ib. Resolve to retreat, 939. They repulse the English at Clifton, ib. Return to Scotland, 940. Their wretched condition, ib. Defeat the royal army at the battle of Falkirk, 943. Renewed dissensions among, 945. Retreat from Stirling, 946. Reach Inverness, 947. Defeated at the battle of Culodien, 949. Inhuman treatment of, by the royalists, 951. Trials and executions of, 956.

JACOBITES, NORTHERN, rising of the, ii. 855. Holy Island captured by, 856. Proclaim King James at Hexham, ib. Join the Scottish, 857, 859. Disputes with them, 860. March into England, 861. They reach Preston, 862. Plans of defence, 863. Attacked by General Willis, 864. They agree to surrender, 865. Are cruelly treated by the royalists, ib. Tried at Preston, 875. Refuse to affix their names to a bond for managing the Pretender's affairs, 911.

JAMES I., treacherously captured by the English, i. 249. Treaty for release of, 254. Taken to France by Henry V., 216. Liberation of, 257. Marriage of, ib. Ascends the throne, ib. Character, 258. Coronation, ib. His first parliament, ib. Severity of, 260. Marriage of his daughter with the Dauphin, 262. Arrests Highland chiefs, 264. Defeats Alexander of the Isles, ib. Birth of his twin sons, 266. He renews the war with England, 269. Last parliament of, ib. Conspiracy against, ib. Keeps Christmas at Perth, 271. His murder, ib. Character, conduct, and family of, 273. Policy towards the clergy, 277. Trade carried on by, 281. His poetry described and criticised, 290-304.

JAMES II., born, i. 268. Conveyed to Edinburgh, 316. Coronation of, ib. Given up to Livingston, 319. Carried off by Crichton, ib. Returned to Livingston, 320. Seeks Kennedy and Crichton for his Counsellors, 326. Affiliated to Mary of Guelders, ib. Marriage of, 327. Punishes the Livingstons, 328. Prudent conduct of, 329. Seizes Lochmaben and Douglas Castles, 330. Assassinate William, Earl of Douglas, 332. Submission of James, Earl of Douglas, to, 333. Renewal of his contest with the Douglases, ib. Seeks counsel of Bishop Kennedy, 336. Defeats the Douglas faction, 337. Insulting letter of the Duke of York to, 339. He invades England, 344. Lays siege to Roxburgh Castle, 345. His death, character, and family, ib.

JAMES III., coronation of, i. 346. Carried off by Lord Boyd, 348. Treaty of marriage with Margaret of Norway, 349. Marriage of, 350. Character of, ib. Favourites of, 352. Conspiracy against, 354. Seizure of, 355. Murder of his favourites, ib. Imprisonment of, 356. Proceedings against the conspirators, 358. Concludes truce with England, 359. Matrimonial projects of, 360. Rebellion against, 361. Defeat and murder of, 363. Character of, 364. Costume of, 374. Anecdote of, 375.

JAMES IV., joins the rebels against his father, i. 361, 362. Coronation of, 375. Parliament justifies his rebellion, 379. His treatment of his father's supporters, 380, 381. Secret plot against, 383. Character and conduct of, ib. Expedition to Highlands, 385. Repairs Fort Tarbert, ib. Entertainment of Warbeck, 387. Invades England, 388. Concludes a truce with England, 389. Visits the Highlands, 389. Formation of a navy, ib. Prudence of, 390. Treaty of marriage with the Princess Margaret of England, ib. Tragic death of his mistress, 391. Reception of his bride, 392. Marriage of, 393, 397. Influence on Continent, 395. Birth of an heir to, ib. Pilgrimage of, 396. Difference with Henry VII., ib. Attention to navy, 397. Negotiations with France and Pope Julius, 397. Birth of a son to, ib. Corresponds with Henry VII., 401. Letter to Henry, 402. Sailing of his fleet, ib. Invades England, 405. Conduct of, at Flodden, 407. Defeat and death of, ib. Character of, 410. Generosity of, 451. Amusements of, ib. Extravagance of, 554. Love of alchemy, 555. Surgical skill of, 556. Curious experiment by, 557. Remorse and superstition of, ib. Introduction of printing by, ib.

JAMES V., coronation of, i. 411. Removes to Stirling, 425. Assumes the government, 428. Education of, 432. Its interruption by the queen, 435. Attains his majority, ib. Escapes from Angus, 440. Character of, 441. Procedure against the Douglases, ib. Besieges Tantallon, 442. Proceedings against the Borderers, 443. Severity to Archibald Douglas, 445. Proposals of marriage to, ib. Renews treaty with Netherlands, 446. Policy of, ib. Concludes truce with England, 448. Order of Garter and Golden Fleece conferred upon, ib. Proposals of marriage of, 449. Sails for France, ib. Driven back and renews his voyage, 450. Marries the Princess Magdalene, of France, ib. Return to Scotland, and death of queen, 451. Military preparations of, 452. Conspiracies against, ib. Second marriage of, 453. Extends his influence, ib. Birth of a prince, 455. Voyage to Western Isles, ib. 558. Conspiracies against, 456. Melancholy of, ib. Annexation of forfeited estates, ib. Birth of another son, and death of both, 457. Agrees to meet Henry at York, and falls to do so, 458. War with England, ib. Musters his host on Boroughmuir, 459. Factious conduct of his nobles, ib. Second expedition, and rout at Solway Moss, 460. Mental depression and death of, 461. Literary attainments, and poetry of, 528, 530. Adventures, &c., 529. Gold and silver-work, New-year's gifts, and plate of, 559. Sports, amusements, and liberality of, 560, 561. Burial of, 566.

JAMES VI., birth of, i. 772. Baptism, ii. 73, 238. Coronation, 76. Address to parliament at Stirling, 130. Assumes government, 152. Council of twelve peers, 153. Opens parliament at Stirling Castle, 156. New council chosen, ib. Sets out for Edinburgh, arrival and reception, 161, 162. Subscribes the national covenant, 163. Poverty of, 164. Rumoured plot against, ib. Refuses to receive Elizabeth's ambassador, 166. Refuses to discard Lennox, 167. Corresponds with his mother, ib. Interview with Randolph, 168. Refuses to pardon Sir James Balfour, 176. Profriggancy of his court, ib. Captivity of, 179. Interview with Herries and Newbottle, ib. Interview with Carey and Bowes, 181. Deputation from the clergy to, 183. Obtains postponement of convention, 184. Sagacity of, 185. Consults Colonel Stewart as to his escape, 186. Consults Sir James Melville, 187. His release, ib. Pardons conspirators, and visits Ruthven Castle, ib. His perfidy, 188. Letter from Elizabeth, ib. Takes up residence at Stirling Castle, ib. Reception of Walsingham, 189. Interview with Davison, 196. Opens convention at St. Andrew's, 206. Treatment of Danish embassy, 207. Conduct on Arran and Ker being accused of murder of Lord Russel, 209. Submits to terms of banished lords, 212. Pardons Archibald Douglas, 214. Concludes league with Elizabeth, 215. Elizabeth's letter to, 229. Reception of news of his mother's condemnation, 230. Despatches Keith, also Melville and Gray, to London, ib. Pusillanimity of, ib. Letter of, to the assembly, 276. Renounces alliance with England, ib. Attempts to reconcile the nobility, 300. Mysterious policy of, 331. Interview with Jane Kennedy, 332. Rejects Spanish alliance, and adheres to England, ib. Marches against Maxwell, 333. Measures for defence of the country, ib. Success against popish lords, 335. Seeks matrimonial alliance with Denmark, 336. Sails for Norway, ib. Declaration of his motives, 337. Marriage, reception in Denmark, and letter of, to lords of council, ib. Letter to Rev. Robert Bruce, 338, 438. Unwonted tranquillity of the kingdom during his absence, ib. His return with the queen, ib. Addresses congregation at the High Church, 339. Policy towards the barons, 340. Proceedings against witches and sorcerers, ib. Attempt to seize his person, 342. Unjust protection of Huntly, 344. Attempt of Bothwell to seize, at Falkland, 345. Proceedings against conspirators, 347. Interview with Bowes, 348. Expedition against popish lords, 349. Suspicions of his sincerity, ib. Interview with Burgh, ib. Intrusion of Bothwell and Colville, 351. Plot to escape from Bothwell's faction, 352. Summons a convention of nobles at Stirling, ib. Routs Atholl, Gowrie, and Montrose, 353. Visit to Lord Hamilton, 354. Grants trial to Huntly, Angus, and Errol, 355. Deputation to, from Protestant party, ib. Dexterous policy of, 356. Letter from Elizabeth to, 358. Birth of a son, 359. Conspiracy to put to death his friends, ib. Measures against conspirators, ib. Advances against Bothwell, 360. Demands from Elizabeth the expulsion of Bothwell, 361. Address to parliament, 362. Proceeds against popish ears, 363. Dissension with the queen, 365. Plot to seize his person, and that of the prince, ib. His financial difficulties, 366. Mission of Bowes, 367. Contest with the Kirk, 370. Birth of a daughter, ib. His attack on the University of St. Andrew's, 371. Punishes the Borderers, 372. Proceedings against witches, ib. Proceedings respecting succession to English crown, 373. Accusation of Valentine Thomas, 374. Attempts to introduce episcopacy, ib. Commands resisted by Magistrates and Court of Session, 375. His pecuniary embarrassments, 376. Accused of corresponding with the pope, ib. His Basilicon Doron, 377. Band on the succession, 378. Demands for money rejected by parliament, 380. Enticed to Gowrie House, 383. His danger and rescue, 388. His reception at Edinburgh, and account of the Gowrie plot, 389. Orders public thanksgiving to be rendered in all the churches for his escape from the Gowrie conspiracy, 467. By act of parliament, appoints an anniversary commemoration of this deliverance, ib. His suspicion of Elizabeth, and letter from her, 391. Birth of a son, ib. Conduct to Cecil and Essex, 392. Dispatches Mar to intercede for Essex, ib. Competition of the English courtiers to secure his favour, 394. Is proclaimed in London, 397. He receives news of Elizabeth's

- death, ib. His farewell address to the people of Edinburgh, 398. His departure from Scotland, ib. His arrival in London, 399. Legality of his title to the English crown, ib. His coronation, 402. Hopes and fears inspired by his accession to the English throne, 468. Proclaims his adherence to prelacy, 408. Visits Scotland, 410. Arrival in Edinburgh, ib. Scholastic disputations at Stirling, ib. His return to England, 412. Attempts to raise money from the English and Scotch parliaments, 413. Courts an alliance with a Spanish princess for his son, 414. Personal appearance and habits, ib. His character, 417. Indifference of, to the fate of his mother, 433. Indifference to the safety of the country, 436. Lays hold of the patronages of the church, 437. Signs anew the Confession of Faith, ib. Becomes more favourably disposed to presbyterianism, 441. Interview with a deputation from the church, ib. Lenity shown to conspirators, 448. Indications of a change of religious views, 450. Deputation to, 458. Fifty-five questions from, circulated among the synods; some of them answered, 460. Appoints a conference at Hampton Court between the episcopallians and puritans, ib. Filled with indignation at the proceedings of the General Assembly, 472. Summons eight Scottish ministers to appear before him at London, 474. Abruptly closes the conference, ib. Habitual deceptions towards the Scottish people, ib. Attempts to bribe the ministers, 480. Determines to introduce a liturgy, 484. Visit to Scotland in 1617, ib. Calls a meeting of parliament, ib. Proposals made by, 486. Meets the bishops and ministers, ib. Despotic conduct, ib. Leniency to the Romanists, 489. His death, 416, 489.
- JAMES VII., his birth, ib. 509. His avowal of the Romish faith, and visit to Scotland, 716. Is appointed commissioner to the Scottish parliament, 717. His shameful treatment of the Earl of Argyll, 719. His final visit to Scotland, and narrow escape from shipwreck, 720. His harshness and cruelty, 721. His accession to the throne, 728. Conciliatory speech of, at the first meeting of the privy-council, ib. He declines to take the coronation oath, ib. Arbitrary acts of, 737. His encouragement of popery, ib. His letter to the privy-council, ib. He recommends the repeal of the Romish disabilities, 738. His exercise of the dispensing power, 739. The crisis of his affairs, 740. He receives a servile letter from the Scottish bishops, ib. His miserable condition, 741. His flight, ib. His communications with the privy-council interrupted, 742. He sends a letter to the convention, 745. Opens a correspondence with the leaders of "the Club," 793. Ungrateful behaviour of, 795.
- JAMES VIII., proclaimed, ib. 848. Message sent to him at Rome, 912. JANE, daughter of James I., ib. 274. Her visit to France, 325.
- JARDINE CLAN, ib. 492.
- JEDBURGH CASTLE, ib. 68. Taken by the Teviotdale borderers, 251. Expense of its demolition, ib.
- JEDBURGH TOWN, burned by the Earl of Surrey, ib. 426.
- JEDBURGH ABBEY, ib. 166, 167, note, 179.
- "JEDBURGH JUSTICE," ib. 498.
- JEFFREYS, LORD CHANCELLOR, his barbarity, ib. 737—743.
- JERVISWOOD, BAILIFF OF. [See BAILIFF.]
- JESUITS, intrigues of, ib. 210. Zeal and activity of, 437. College of, 737.
- JOAN, sister of Henry III. of England, ib. 73. Married to Alexander II., ib. Her death, 74.
- JOANNA, queen of David II., treaty for her marriage, ib. 161. Its celebration, 162. Her death, 206.
- JOHANNA BRACEFORD, married to James I., ib. 257. Chosen guardian to her son, 316. Marries Sir James Stewart, 319. Imprisoned, and gives up custody of the young king, ib. Death of, 325. Described in the "King's Quair," 300.
- JOHN, accession of, to the English throne, ib. 71. Quarrel with William the Lion, ib. Savage invasion of Scotland, 72.
- JOHNSTON, SIR ARCHIBALD, Lord Warriston, noticed, ib. 528, 537, 543, 551, 562, 583, 589, 610, 660, 676. Is appointed clerk to the assembly, 548. Is knighted, 598. His visit to Montrose, 658. His apprehension, 693. Execution and character, 694.
- JOHNSTON, SECRETARY, son of Sir Archibald, advice of to the clergy, ib. 761. His dismissal from office, 809.
- JOHNSTON, SIR PATRICK, his house attacked by rioters, ib. 824.
- JOHNSTON, DR. ARTHUR, a poet and physician to Charles I., ib. 971.
- JOHNSTONE, SIR JAMES, slain by Lord Maxwell, ib. 405, 491.
- JOHNSTONE OF WESTERHALL, his persecution of the covenanters, ib. 727, 731.
- JOHNSTONE, DR. ROBERT, author of the History of Great Britain, ib. 970.
- JOHNSTONE CLAN, feud of, with the Maxwells, ib. 491.
- JOYCE, CORNET, seizes Charles I. at Holmby House, ib. 638.
- JULIUS II., POPE, sends a consecrated hat and sword to James IV., ib. 396; ib. 673.
- JUSTICIAR, OFFICE OF, ib. 172.
- K.
- KAY, CLAN, defeated by Cian Chattan, ib. 239.
- KELOR, a black friar, martyrdom of, ib. 470.
- KEILL, JOHN, an eminent mathematician, ib. 971.
- KEILL, JAMES, an eminent anatomist, ib. 971.
- KEITH, SIR ROBERT, ib. 133. At Bannockburn, 136.
- KEITH, SIR WILLIAM, of Galston, his brave defence of Berwick, ib. 147, 187, 189, 192.
- KEITH, SIR ROBERT, captures Perth, ib. 186.
- KEITH, ROBERT, besieges his aunt, Lady Lindsay, in her castle of Fyvie, ib. 129.
- KEITH, SIR WILLIAM, dispatched to England, ib. 214. Sent again, to remonstrate against Mary's condemnation, 230.
- KEITH, EARL-MARSHAL, takes part in the Jacobite Insurrection, ib. 878. Intrigues of Marshal Keith, his brother, on behalf of the Jacobites, ib.
- KELLIE, THE EARL OF, takes part in the rebellion of 1745, ib. 924, 933.
- KELLY, JOHN, minister of Spott, crime and punishment of, ib. 257.
- KELLY, an episcopal clergyman, one of the "Seven men of Moldart," ib. 914; noticed, 930.
- KELSO, monks settled at, ib. 187. Meeting of the Scotch and English Jacobites at, ib. 859. James VIII. proclaimed at, ib.
- KENMURE, LORD, commander of the Jacobites in the south-west of Scotland, ib. 857. Tried for high-treason, 875. Condemned and executed, 876.
- KENNEDY, BISHOP OF ST. ANDREW'S, raised to chancellorship, ib. 324. Lands of, ravaged, ib. Chosen councillor by king, 326. Interview with James II., 336. Negotiations with the rebel chiefs, 337. Chosen guardian to James III., 346. Concludes a truce with England, 347. Death and character, ib.
- KENNEDY NINIAN, martyrdom of, ib. 471.
- KENNEDY, WALTER, a Scotch poet, ib. 525.
- KENNEDY, JANE, attends Queen Mary at her execution, ib. 235. Interview with James VI., 332.
- KENNEDY, QUINTIN, disputation of, with Knox, ib. 11.
- KENNETH I., accession of, to crowns of Picts and Scots, ib. 30. His death, 33.
- KENNETH III., succeeds to the throne, ib. 35. Conquers Strathclyde, and defeats Danes, ib. Changes the rule of succession, 36.
- KENNETH IV., succession and death of, ib. 36.
- KENT, EARL OF, delivers to Mary her death warrant, ib. 234. At her execution, 235.
- KER, SIR ROBERT, murder of, ib. 398; ib. 491.
- KER, SIR ANDREW, revenges his father's murder, ib. 398.
- KER, ANDREW, of Faudonside, his share in the murder of Riecio, ib. 766. Excepted from pardon, ib. 89.
- KER OF CESSFORD, heads confederate lords, ib. 65. At Langside, 94.
- KER, HENRY, ib. 161.
- KER, JOHN, of Kersland, leader of the Cameronians, ib. 827. His treachery, 834.
- KER, COLONEL, of Graden, at the Battle of Preston, ib. 925.
- KER OF FERNIEHURST, ib. 419, 420, 443.
- KER OF FERNIEHURST, inroad with Westmoreland and Buccleuch, ib. 116. Appointed provost of Edinburgh, 129. Attack of, on Stirling, 130. Witnesses Morton's execution, 174. Accused of the murder of Lord Russel, 209.
- KERR, GEORGE, confesses conspiracy of "Spanish Blanks," ib. 347, 444. His escape, 350, 445.
- KERR, OF CAR, EARL OF SOMERSET, rise of, ib. 407. Ambition and cupidity of, ib.
- KETHERANS, anecdotes of, ib. 229, 238, 264.
- KILDRUMME CASTLE, defended by Nigel Bruce, ib. 119.
- KILGOREW, SIR HENRY, dispatched to carry out Elizabeth's plans for death of Mary, ib. 137. Communicates his secret mission to Morton and the Regent, 138. Letter of, to Burghley and Leicester, 139. Urges Elizabeth to send assistance to king's party, 142. Letter of, on improved condition of the people in 1572, 147. Again sent to Scotland, ib. Conference of, with Morton, and return, 148.
- KILIECRANKIE, PASS OF, ib. 786. Battle of, 787. Defeat of the royal troops at, ib.
- KILMARNOCK, EARL OF, joins the Jacobites in 1745, ib. 933. Trial and execution, 955, 956.
- KILMARNOCK, COUNTESS OF, ib. 942.
- KILPONT, LORD, murder of, ib. 620.
- KILSYTH, THE BATTLE OF, ib. 626.
- KILWINNING, ABBOT OF, slain at the battle of Flodden, ib. 409.
- KINGSBURGH, MACDONALD OF, assists Prince Charles to escape, ib. 953, note, ib.
- KINGSTON, THE DUCK OF, ib. 937.
- KINMONT, WILLIE, seizure of, and rescue, ib. 368.
- KIRKALDY OF GRANGE, ib. 596, 604. Joins Protestants, 630. Letter to Sir Henry Percy, ib. Interview with him, 631. Defeats a body of French, 640. One of the party for protecting the prince, ib. 34. Letter against Mary, 55. Leads confederates at Carberry, and interview with Mary, 65. Attempt on life of, by Bothwell, 66. At Langside, 84. Liberates Lethington, 111. Joins the Hamiltons, 116. Refuses to be present at the election of Lennox to the regency, 122. Proclaims Lennox a usurper, 127. Letter from Cecil to, 128. Holds parliament in Tolbooth, 129. Rejects Elizabeth's message, 134. Rejects Morton's advances, 141. His defence of Edinburgh Castle, 143. Surrenders to Drury, 144. Letter of, to Burghley, ib. Given up to Morton, 135. Exertions on his behalf, ib. His execution and character, ib. His quarrel with Knox, 258. Message from Knox to, 265.
- KIRKALDY, SIR JAMES, seizure of, ib. 143. Execution of, 145.
- KIRK OF FIELD, murder of Darnley at, ib. 44, 47.
- KIRK. [See CLERGY, MINISTERS, AND CHURCH, PROTESTANT.]
- KIRKPATRICK OF KIRKMICHAEL, ib. 358.
- KNOX, SIR WILLIAM, mission of, to Scotland, ib. 213.
- KNOX, ANDREW, discovers conspiracy of the "Spanish Blanks," ib. 347. Besieges and captures Ailsa, 371.
- KNOX, JOHN, enters St. Andrew's Castle, ib. 603. Taken prisoner and put in chains, 605. Returns to Scotland, 624 (also ib. 675). Followers of, ib. Departs for Geneva, ib. Arrival in Scotland, 267 (also ib. 683). Sermon at Perth, 628 (also ib. 668). Arrival at St. Andrew's, 629. Letter to Percy, 631. Letter and mission to Sir James Crofts, 635. Letter to Secretary of State, ib. Boldness of his exhortations, 639. Conducts service of thanks-

- giving, 647, and i. 689. Publicly called to ministry, 667. Substance of his first sermon, 668. Controversy with Arbuckle, 670. Treatment of, in France, 673. Exposes the evils of mass, and cited on charge of heresy, 675. Letter to the Queen Regent, ib. "Appellation" to nobility and commons, 676. Leaves Geneva, 677. Arrival in Scotland, 683. Sermon at St. Andrew's, 685. Interview with Mary 701, and ii. 5. Summoned before Mary, and his defence, 713. Interview with Mary at Lochleven, 716. Interview with Mary while hawking, 717, and ii. 14. Disagreement with Moray, 718, and ii. 15. Letter to Moray, ib. Sermon to the nobility, ib. Summoned before Mary, ib. Trial before privy-council, 720, and ii. 17. On distribution of ecclesiastical revenues, ii. 8. Disputation with Quinlin Kennedy, 11. Reproves Protestant nobles, 15. Letter to Protestants, 17. Conference with Maitland, 19. Draws up with Craig form of service for public fast, 27. Joins confederates, and his conditions, 71. Coronation sermon of James VI., 76. Letter to Cecil, 113. Funeral sermon of Regent Moray, 115. Denounces Mary as a murderess and adulteress, 126. Inveighs against King of France, 136. His death and funeral, 141, 265. His letter on the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, 240. Visit to England, ib. Circular of, against popery, 240. Sermon at opening of parliament 1567, 243. Letter to Mr. John Wood, 249. Quarrel with Kirkcaldy of Grange, 258. His refutation of charges against his consistency, 269. His preaching at St. Andrew's, ib. Warning to his brethren, 260. Reply to Rutherford's charge of envy, 261. Letter to General Assembly, 262. Last illness of, 264. Message to Kirkcaldy, 265. Interview with Morton, ib. Character, and influence of, 266. His literary character, 289.
- L.
- LAMBERTON, WILLIAM DE, Bishop of St. Andrew's, at coronation of Bruce, i. 115. Taken prisoner, 119. Notified, 128.
- LAMBIE, CAPTAIN, entrusted with custody of Earl of Arran, ii. 160.
- "LAMMERMOOR, THE BRIDE OF." [See Appendix to vol. ii., note N.]
- LAMAR, EARL OF, Secretary of State, ii. 577. Noticed, 587, 599, 627. Protests against the convention of the estates, 607. Loses the king's favour, 617. His protest against the surrender of Charles, 636. Letter of, to the king, 643, note. Disbands his forces after the battle of Preston, 645. Succeeds to the dukedom of Hamilton on death of his brother, 681. Appointed lieutenant of the Scotch army under Charles II., 669. Mortally wounded at Worcester, 672.
- LANCASTER, DUKE OF, rebellion of, i. 154.
- LANCASTER, HENRY OF, afterwards Henry IV., i. 194.
- LANCASTER, JOHN OF GAUNT, DUKE OF, invades Scotland, i. 227. Finds a refuge in Scotland, ib. Again invades Scotland, 228.
- LARGESIDE, BATTLE OF, ii. 84.
- LARGS, BATTLE OF, i. 79. Conference at, ii. 89.
- LAUD, ARCHBISHOP, innovations imputed to, ii. 507. Coronation sermon preached by, ib. Receives a letter from the Edinburgh magistrates, 520. Impeached by the Commons, 592.
- LAUDER, SIR WILLIAM, of Hatton, i. 332.
- LAUDER, BISHOP OF LISMORE, i. 339.
- LAUDER, HENRY, General Assembly meet at house of, ii. 9.
- LAUDER, SIR THOMAS DICK, ii. 923, note.
- LAUDERDALE, EARL AND DUKE OF, sent by the covenanted with their supplication to Charles I., ii. 607. One of the deputies to the Westminster Assembly, 610. Endeavours to persuade Charles to establish presbytery, 636. Hatred of, to Montrose, 660, note. Appointed secretary of state, 683. Procures the restoration of Argyll's estates to his son, 686, 690. Urges the granting of an amnesty, 690. His quarrel with Middleton, 692. His character, ib. His wife's evil influence over him, 703. Monopoly of the offices of state by the creatures of, ib. Opposition to the administration of, 704. His attempt to conciliate his enemies, ib. He is attacked by the English House of Commons, 705. His tampering with the courts of law, 705, 707. Perjury of, ib. His death, 720.
- LAUDERDALE, LADY. [See DYABET.]
- LAW, COURTS OF, ii. 821.
- LAW-BURROWS, WRITS OF, issued, ii. 708.
- LAWRENCE OF LINDORES, presides at trial of Resby and Crawar for heresy, i. 276, 277.
- LAWS, PRIMITIVE, i. 32.
- LAWSON, REV. JAMES, sermon of, before James VI., ii. 162. At death of Morton, 173. A member of a deputation to the king, 182, 183. Inveighs against De Menainville, 183. Protest of against Arran's enactments, and flight of, 195. Appointed colleague to Knox, 264. Discussion on episcopal functions, 271. Opposition of, to the "Black Acts," 423. Letter from, to the church in Edinburgh, 424. His death, ib.
- LAWYERS, banishment of in 1674, ii. 705.
- LEAGUE, HOLY, a popish conspiracy, ii. 203. Discovery of the, ib. Noticed, 436.
- LEAGUE AND COVENANT. [See COVENANT.]
- LECHMORE, MR., his impeachment of the rebel lords in parliament, January 9th, 1716, ii. 875.
- LECKIE, THE LAIRD OF, heads a religious movement, ii. 579. Is persecuted by the Bishop of Dunkeld, ib. Contest with, about private meetings, 579, 602.
- LEICKETH, DUDLEY, EARL OF, proposed in marriage to Mary, i. 721. Implicated in the intrigue of Norfolk, ii. 105. Intrigues to have Mary executed in Scotland, 137.
- LEIGHTON, BISHOP, appointed to the see of Dunblane, ii. 689. His character, ib. His scheme of accommodation, 701. Notice of his works, 971.
- LEIPSIC, BATTLE OF, gained by the Swedes, ii. 505.
- LEITH, fortified by the Queen Regent, i. 637. Assault upon, 638, 642, 643. Convention held at, ii. 261. Fortified by the covenanted, 557. Taken possession of by Brigadier Mackintosh, 558.
- LENNOX, MALCOLM, EARL OF, i. 138.
- LENNOX, EARL OF, execution of, i. 260.
- LENNOX, EARL, revolt of, i. 381.
- LENNOX, EARL OF, slain at the Battle of Flodden, i. 408.
- LENNOX, EARL OF, i. 435. Marches against Angus, 436. Death of, 437.
- LENNOX, MATTHEW, EARL OF, return from France, i. 573. Suit and defection of, 579. Gets possession of French money and stores, 580. Marches against the regent, 582. Enters into a bond with him, ib. Flies to England, 585. Expedition of into Scotland, 586. Proclaimed traitor, 593. Sails with fleet from Dublin, 594. Inroad of, along with Wharton, 611, 612. Return from banishment, 722. Appearance at court, and magnificence of, 723. Restored to titles and estates, 724. Refuses to return to England, 748. Chosen commissioner by Mary, ii. 90. Implores Mary to investigate murder of Darnley's son, 50. Craves time for evidence against Bothwell, 51. Accuses Mary at the conference, 96. Seizes Edinburgh, and ravages the country, 119. Elected interim regent, 121. Formally elected regent, 122. Cruelty at Brechin, ib. Prepares for hostilities, and encamps at Leith, 128, 129. Holds parliament in Canon-gate, 129. Is mortally wounded in the Raid of Stirling, 131.
- LENNOX, COUNTESS OF, imprisoned by Elizabeth, i. 741.
- LENNOX, EARL OF, chosen councillor to James VI., ii. 158. Resigns title for Earldom of March, 161.
- LENNOX, D'AUBIGNY, EARL OF, favours bestowed on, ii. 161. At king's entry into Edinburgh, 162. Alures popery, 163. Appointed lord chamberlain, 164. Evil reports against, ib. Prepares for defence of the country, 169. Conspiracy against, and its defeat, 170. His intrigues, 174. Conduct to presbyterians, 175. Dukedom conferred on, ib. Is refused a pardon for Sir James Balfour, 176. Rupture and reconciliation with Arran, ib. Oppressive measures of, and conspiracy against, 177. Undecided conduct of, 179. Ordered to leave the kingdom, 180. Plot to assassinate Ruthven lords, ib. His departure, ib. Private interview with Elizabeth, 184. His death, 186.
- LENNOX, DEKE OF, arrival in Scotland and reception, ii. 191. Intrusted with authority in king's absence, 337. At Raid of Abbey, 342. Intercedes for Bothwell, 351. Accompanies James to Gowrie House, 384. At rescue, 388. Sent by James on a mission to London, 394. Commissioned to convey the queen and prince to London, 401.
- LESLEY, NORMAN, Master of Rothes, at Ancrum Moor, i. 588. Quarrel with Cardinal Beaton, 596. Assists in the murder of Beaton, 597; see note, ib. Summons of treason against him and his associates, 600. Defence of St. Andrew's Castle, ib. Sentence of forfeiture, ib. Is carried prisoner to France, 605, note.
- LESLEY, JOHN, uncle of Norman, assists in the murder of Cardinal Beaton, i. 596. Sent to treat with Henry VIII., 601.
- LESLEY, JOHN, BISHOP OF ROSS, his mission to Mary, i. 654; ii. 296.
- LESLIE, ALEXANDER, GENERAL, Earl of Leven, takes the lead in the defence of the country, ii. 555. Seizes the Castle of Edinburgh, 556. Unlimited power given to, 558. He advances to Dunse Law with his army, 560. His commission renewed, 577. He writes to Scotland for reinforcements, 588. Created Earl of Leven, 601. Takes the command of the Scottish army sent to the help of the parliament, 609. His movements in the north of England, 613. At the Battle of Marston Moor, ib. Charles takes refuge in his camp, 633. Leads the covenanted, 645. Taken prisoner, 673, 677.
- LESLIE, DAVID, appointed major-general of the Scottish army, ii. 609. Contributes to the victory of Marston Moor, 614. Is recalled from England, 628. Defeats Montrose at Philiphaugh, 629. Massacre of the prisoners by, ib. Is appointed commander of the Scottish army against Cromwell, 661. Position and prudent tactics of, ib. Reduces the English to great straits, 662. Is defeated at Dunbar, 663. Retreats to Stirling, 664, 669.
- LEVEN, LORD, ii. 835.
- LEWIS, ISLE OF, attempt to colonise, ii. 375. Failure of an attempt to subjugate, 405.
- LEX REX, a treatise by Rutherford, burned by order of the estates, ii. 603.
- LIDALL, SIR JAMES, i. 357.
- LIDDELL, DUNCAN, a professor in the University of Helmstädt, ii. 970.
- LIGNFOLLES, THOMAS DE, accompanies Moray to Scotland, ii. 77.
- LIGNONIER, GENERAL, commands a division of the English army against the Scotch in 1745, ii. 936.
- LILBURN, SIR JOHN, i. 225, 234.
- LINDSAY, CHRISTIANA DE, entertains Bailiol, i. 195.
- LINDSAY, SIR ALEXANDER, i. 228.
- LINDSAY, SIR JAMES, and his six brethren, i. 228.
- LINDSAY, ALEXANDER, i. 455.
- LINDSAY, CHRISTIAN, poems of, ii. 311.
- LINDSAY, SIR DAVID, of Glenesk, i. 238. Combat with Lord Wells, 240.
- LINDSAY, LORD DAVID, of Byres, trial of, i. 380.
- LINDSAY, DAVID, of Crawford, marriage of, i. 596.
- LINDSAY, SIR DAVID, his education of James V., i. 432. Dismissal, 433. His description of James's subsequent education, 434. Satires of, 464. Life and poetry of, 497, 528.

- LINDSAY, DAVID, REV., mentioned, i. 157. Converts Lennox, 163. Deputed to the king, 182. Joins embassy of Colville and Stewart, 185. Imprisoned in Blackness Castle, 194, and ii. 423. Discussion on episcopal functions, 271. Accompanies James to Norway, 337. Crowns the queen, 338.
- LINDSAY, SIR JAMES, of Crawford, i. 232, 234. Adventures of, 235.
- LINDSAY, SIR JOHN, of Brechin, ii. 333.
- LINDSAY, PATRICK, defends his brother before the council, i. 390, 406.
- LINDSAY, SIR WILLIAM, i. 226. Defeats the English, 237, 238.
- LINDSAY, LORD, joins plot against Riccio, i. 760. Pardon, ii. 39. Leads confederates, 65. Accepts Bothwell's challenge, 66. Queen's threat against, 67. Conducts her to Lochleven, 68. Compels Mary to sign her abdication, 75. Forces Sinclair to attach the great seal to the document, ib. Accompanies Moray to Lochleven, 78. At Langside, 84. Chosen commissioner by Moray, 90. Chosen councillor to James VI., 153. At parliament in Stirling Castle, 156. Interposes between Morton and Stewart, 158. Share in first Gowrie conspiracy, 178. Joins plot against Arran, 191.
- LINDSAY, ROBERT, of Pitcottie, ii. 298. [See PITCOTTIE.]
- LINDSAY, SIR WALTER, assassination of, ii. 404.
- LINDSAY, LORD, a leading covenant, noticed, ii. 584, 625. Created an earl, 601.
- LINDSAY, LIEUTENANT, at the massacre of Glencoe, ii. 801, 802, 805.
- LINDSAY, LADY SOPHIA, assists her step-father, the Earl of Argyll, to escape from prison, ii. 719. Farewell letter from Argyll to, 735.
- LINLITHGOW, CASTLE OF, built by Edward I., i. 107. Taken, 130.
- LINLITHGOW, PALACE OF, i. 403, 461.
- LINLITHGOW, discovery of silver mines near, ii. 406.
- LINLITHGOW, THE EARL OF, his vindictive policy against the Highlanders, ii. 798.
- LINSEN, THOMAS, tried for alleged accession to the "Porteous Mob," ii. 887.
- LINNING, THOMAS, a Cameronian minister, ii. 756.
- LITERARY HISTORY, i. 289, 474; ii. 285, 969.
- LITSTER, JOHN, Canon of St. Andrew's, i. 278.
- LITURGY, compilation of, for Scotland, by Bishops of Ross and Dunblane, ii. 513. It is sent to London for revival, ib. Unacceptable to the people of Scotland, 515. Directions about the, ib. Proclamation enjoining conformity to, ib. Excited state of the public mind about the, 516. Delayed introduction of the, ib. The king orders immediate observance of the, ib. Agitation in consequence of the king's command, ib. Increasing opposition to, ib. Supplications to the council about the, 518.
- LIVINGSTON, SIR ALEXANDER, i. 316. Besieges Edinburgh Castle, 318. Imprisons the queen-dowager and her husband, 319. Entraps and executes the Earl of Douglas, 321, 322. Resigns his office to his son, 323. Fall of, 328.
- LIVINGSTON, MARY, i. 614, 768.
- LIVINGSTON, LORD, dispatched to Scotland with proposals of accommodation from England, ii. 120. Commissioned to confer on the queen's restoration, 124.
- LIVINGSTON, REV. JOHN, he transmits a petition from the covenanters, ii. 529. The king orders the apprehension of, ib. He returns precipitately to Scotland, ib.
- LIVINGSTONE, CAPTAIN, killed in a duel, ii. 674.
- LIVINGSTONE, SIR THOMAS, ii. 781. He defeats the Highlanders at Cromdale, ii. 792, 800.
- LOCHALSH, ALEXANDER OF, i. 385.
- LOCHMABEN CASTLE, i. 285.
- LOCKHART, SIR GEORGE, made a member of the council of state, ii. 675. Murdered by Chiesly of Dairy, 777.
- LOCKHART, SIR WILLIAM, appointed solicitor-general, ii. 777.
- LOCKHART, GEORGE, of Carnwath, appointed commissioner in connection with the union, ii. 819. Apprehension of, 843. Noticed, 880.
- LOCKHART, YOUNGER, of Carnwath, joins Prince Charles, i. 924, 952.
- LOCKHART, CAPTAIN PHILIP, tried and executed at Preston, ii. 675.
- LOCKHART PAPERS, referred to, ii. 915.
- LOCKHEVEN CASTLE, i. 190; ii. 68, 83.
- LOCHNEVANE, THE BAY OF, landing place of Prince Charles, ii. 915.
- LOCHY, LOCH, ii. 916.
- LOGAN, SIR WILLIAM AND SIR WALTER, ii. 185.
- LOGAN, ROBERT, of Restalrig, share in Gowrie conspiracy, ii. 381. Letters of, 381, 382. Discovery of his letters, 390.
- LOGIE, MARGARET, marriage to David II., i. 206. Divorce and death, 212.
- LOLLARDS, THE, i. 276, 466.
- LONDON, visited by Alexander III. and his Queen, i. 78. Insurrection in, 161.
- LONGUEVILLE, SIR THOMAS DE, surnamed the Red Rover, i. 102.
- LONSDALE, LORD, ii. 862.
- LORN, settles in Scotland, i. 28.
- LORN, LORD OF, attacks Bruce, i. 116, 122. Defeated by, and surrenders to Bruce, 127.
- LORN, JOHN OF, son of the preceding, defeated by Bruce, and takes refuge in England, i. 127.
- LORN, LORD, Earl of Middleton's persecution of, ii. 690.
- LORRAIN, CARDINAL OF, intrigues with the Queen-mother, i. 617, 626, 633, 634, 689. His speech to Throckmorton, 650. Proposes that Queen Mary should marry the Archduke Charles, 715. Sends an envoy to Mary, 758. Letter to, from Mary, ii. 86. [See GUISSE, HOUSE OF.]
- LOTHIAN, a priest, executed, i. 445.
- LOTHIAN, THE EARL OF, commands the covenanting forces against Montrose, ii. 621. He is appointed commissioner to General Assembly, 759. He reads a letter from the king, ib. He addresses the assembly, 760. His abrupt dissolution of the General Assembly, ib.
- LOTHIAN, LADY, sister of the Earl of Argyll, her last interview with, ii. 734.
- LOTHIANS, ceded to Malcolm II. in 1020, i. 37. Great flood in 1358, 204.
- LOUBON, EARL OF, noticed ii. 562, 566, 569, 570, 582, 584, 589, 595, 602. His address to Charles I. vindicating the covenanters, 571. Letter signed by, 573. Charge of treason against, ib. A warrant from the king for his execution, shortly afterwards withdrawn, ib. His liberation, ib. Letter to, from Lord Savile, 580. Created an earl, 601. Sent by the council to the king with an offer of mediation, 606. His advice to the king, 635. His brutal behaviour towards Montrose, 657, note. His concealment in the Highlands, 677.
- LOUBON HILL, BATTLE OF, i. 124.
- LOUIS XIV., death of, ii. 847.
- LOUTH, JOHN DE BERMINGHAM, EARL OF, expels the Scots from Ireland, i. 148. Revolving treatment of Edward Bruce's body by, ib.
- LOVAT, HEW, LORD, his fight with the Macdonalds, i. 585.
- LOVAT, SIMON FRASER, LORD, withdraws his clan from the Jacobites, ii. 866. Corresponds with Prince Charles, 930. Base intrigues of, 933. Meeting between Charles and, 952. Trial and execution of, 957.
- LOUBAN, SIR PIER, governor of Edinburgh Castle, enters the service of Bruce, i. 131.
- LUCY, THOMAS DE, i. 137.
- LUNDIE, WILLIAM, Archdeacon of North Berwick, his defence of Douglas at Otterburn, i. 234.
- LUNDIN, SIR RICHARD, joins Wallace, i. 95. Deserts him, ib. His advice to the English army, 96.
- LUTYN, JOSEPH, a servant of Queen Mary's, ii. 39. Incident in connection with Riccio and, 39, 40, and Appendix, vol. ii., note B.
- LYTTELTON, SIR THOMAS, ii. 829.

M.

- MACALPIN, KENNETH, reign of, i. 33.
- MACALZEAN, EUPHEMIA, daughter of Lord Cliftonhall, trial and execution of, for witchcraft, ii. 962.
- MACARTNEY, GENERAL, i. 841.
- MACAULAY, LORD, quoted, ii. 745, 801, note.
- MACBEE, JOHN, surnamed MACCABEUS, i. 472.
- MACBETH, plays Duncan, i. 38. Succession, defeat, and death of, ib.
- MACDONALD, revolt of the clan, ii. 408. Impolitic leniency to the chieftain of, ib.
- MACDONALD, COLIN, of Keppoch, threatens Inverness, ii. 781. Feud with Mackintosh of Moy, ib.
- MACDONALD, DONALD GORM, proposes to assist Elizabeth, ii. 374.
- MACDONALD, SIR DONALD, of Lochalsh, i. 421.
- MACDONALD OF GLENGARRY and his retainers at the battle of Killiecrankie, ii. 786. He is slain there, 788.
- MACDONALD OF SLEAT, retires to Skye, ii. 790. Accused of treason, and imprisoned, 843.
- MACDONALD, SIR ALEXANDER, of Sleat, anxiety of Prince Charles Edward to secure his assistance, ii. 930. Declares himself in favour of government, 933.
- MACDONALD, SIR JOHN, one of the "Seven Men of Moldart," ii. 914.
- MACDONALD, JENAS, one of the "Seven Men of Moldart," ii. 914. Is accidentally killed, 945.
- MACDONALD OF CLANRANALD, ii. 914. His interview with Charles Edward, 915. Consents to join him, ib. The failure of his mission to the Island of Skye, 916.
- MACDONALD OF BOISDALE, he refuses to join Charles Edward, ii. 914.
- MACDONALD OF KILNOCHMOIDART, consents to join Prince Charles Edward, ii. 915.
- MACDONALD OF KEPPOCH, takes part in the rebellion of 1745, ii. 916.
- MACDONALD OF GLENALADALE, major of the Clanranald regiment at the battle of Preston, ii. 926.
- MACDONALD, MARSHAL, Duke of Tarentum, his opinion quoted, ii. 948.
- MACDONALD, FLORE, assists Prince Charles Edward to escape, ii. 953. Is arrested, note ib. Future career of, ib.
- MACDOUGALS OF LORN, tradition in the family of the, i. 117. [See LORN.]
- MACDUFF, grand uncle of Earl of Fife, i. 89. His death, 101.
- MACDUFF, JOHN, accused of taking part in the Gowrie conspiracy, ii. 390. Tried and executed, ib.
- MACGILL, SIR JAMES, clerk-register, opposes Mary's divorce, ii. 107. At conference on Mary's restoration, 125. Chosen councillor to James VI., 153.
- MACGILL, DAVID, king's advocate, ii. 350.
- MACGILL, THE REV. DR., of Ayr, author of "A practical essay on the death of Jesus Christ," ii. 907.
- MACGREGOR CLAN, turbulence of the, ii. 405. Abolition of the, ib. Their plundering habits, 854.
- MACGREGOR, ROB ROY, marauding expeditions of, ii. 854. Dubious conduct of, at the battle of Sheriffmuir, 869, note.
- MACGREGOR, CAPTAIN JAMES, son of Rob Roy, bravery at the battle of Preston, ii. 928.
- MACGUIRE, LORD, takes part in the Irish Massacre, ii. 600.
- MACLAN OF GLENCOE, delays taking the oath of allegiance, i. 799. His feud with Breadalbane, ib. Offers to submit after the day prescribed, ib. His oath received by the sheriff, ib. Orders issued for the destruction of his clan, 800. Murder of, 802. [See MASSACRE OF GLENCOE.]

- MACKAIL, HUGH, a covenant, trial and condemnation of, ii. 697. His behaviour on the scaffold, ib. His execution, ib.
- MACRAE, LORD RAY, levies a regiment for foreign service, i. 504. He is adjudged a trial by judicial combat, 505.
- MACRAE, GENERAL HUGH, appointed commander of the Scottish forces, ii. 748. Manœuvres in pursuit of Dundee, 782. Conspiracy among his troops, 783. Marches to the north, 785. Position of his troops at Killiecrankie, 786. His total defeat there, 788. His coolness and intrepidity, ib. His retreat to Stirling, ib. Defeats a body of Highlanders, 789. Establishes a chain of military posts in the Highlands, 791. His opinion of Scottish statesmen, 792.
- MACKENZIE, SIR GEORGE, lord-advocate, his cruelty to the covenanters, ii. 716, 724. Quoted, 729, note, and 779, note. Deprived of his office, 738. Claims the protection of the Estates, 747. His opposition to the vote of forfeiture, 748.
- MACKENZIE, THE CLAN, at the battle of Sheriffmuir, ii. 867, 869.
- MACINTOSH OF MOY, chief of the clan Chattan, feud with Macdonald of Keppoch, ii. 781.
- MACINTOSH, BRIGADIER, of Borlum, marches upon Edinburgh in 1715. 858. Takes possession of Leith, ib. Joins the southern Jacobites, 869. Assists in the defence of Preston, 864. Accused of treason, 877. Escapes from Newgate, ib.
- MACLAUCHLAN, WILLIAM, tried for alleged accession to the Portenose Mob, ii. 887.
- MACLAURIN, PROFESSOR, ii. 920.
- MACLEAN, CHIEF OF, slain at the battle of Harlaw, i. 253.
- MACLEAN, LAUCHLAN, of Dowart, slain at the battle of Flodden, i. 409.
- MACLEAN OF DOWART, murdered, i. 444.
- MACLEAN, HECTOR, of Dowart, submits to James V., i. 445.
- MACLEAN OF DOWART, ii. 782.
- MACLEAN OF THE ISLES, commands at the battle of Glenlivet, ii. 363.
- MACLEAN, SIR JOHN, at the battle of Sheriffmuir, ii. 867, 868.
- MACLEAN, CLAN OF, at the battle of Flodden, i. 408. At the battle of Killiecrankie, ii. 786.
- MACLELLAN, GUARDIAN OF LORD BOMBY, ii. 493. Murdered by the Earl of Douglas, ib.
- MACLEOD OF DUNVEGAN, insurrection of, i. 421.
- MACLEOD, NEIL, Laird of Assynt, assists to capture the Marquis of Montrose, ii. 654.
- MACLEOD OF MACLEOD, anxiety of Prince Charles to secure his assistance, ii. 930. Declares himself in favour of government, 933.
- MACLEOD OF MURRAYSIDE, ii. 930.
- MACPHERSON OF CLUNY, joins Prince Charles with a reinforcement, ii. 933, 935. Faithful adherence of, to Prince Charles, 954. Aids the prince to escape, ib.
- MAGDALEN OF FRANCE, married to James V., i. 450. Death of, 451.
- MAGDENBURGH, taken by the Marquis of Hamilton, ii. 505.
- MAGNUS, King of Man, joins Hacon, King of Norway, in his expedition against Scotland, i. 78. Submits to Alexander III., 80.
- MAGNUS, DR. THOMAS, mission of, to Scotland, i. 429.
- MAGUS MOOR, murder of Archbishop Sharp at, ii. 710, 714.
- MAITLAND OF LETHINGTON, mission from the reformers, i. 639. Elected speaker in parliament, 647. His speech, 648. Sarcastic remarks of, 693. Mission to England, and reception, 702. His second mission, 707. His return, 709. Embassy to England, February, 1563, 714. Attends meeting at Berwick, 728. Dispatched to obtain Elizabeth's consent to Mary's marriage, 737. Sneers at Book of Discipline, ii. 7. Modifies supplication of General Assembly, 10. Advice of, to Knox, 17. Conference of, with the reformer, 19. Restored to favour of the queen 31. Conference at Craigmillar, 36. His share in the plot against Darnley, 37. Interview with Morton, 40. Advice to Sir James Melville, 53. Attacked by Bothwell and Huntley, 69. Takes refuge with Atholl, ib. Protests against Mary's marriage with Bothwell, 62. Joins the confederates, 63. Interview with Throckmorton, 76. Interview with Moray, 79. Vindication of confederates, and speech in parliament in 1567, ib. Accompanies Moray to England, 90. Sends message to Mary, 91. Reply to Duke of Norfolk at conference, ib. Interview with him, 92. Advocates Mary's divorce, 107. Accused of murder of Darnley, 111. Trial postponed, 112. Acquitted, 116. Correspondence with Sussex, 120. Is besieged along with Kirkcaldy in Edinburgh Castle, 142. Letter to Burghley, 144. Death of, 145.
- MAITLAND, JOHN, younger, of Lethington, delivered to Regent Morton, ii. 145.
- MAITLAND, SIR JOHN, of Thirlstane, chancellor, ii. 196. Intrigues with Elizabeth, 205. Able advice of to James VI., 339. Suspected implication in the murder of Moray, 345. Retires from office, ib. Recalled by James, 353. Noticed, 356. Conspiracy against, 359. His death and character, 365.
- MAITLAND, SIR RICHARD, of Thirlstane, a poet, ii. 298. Review of his poems, 298, 304.
- MAJESTATEM REGIAM, a celebrated law treatise, i. 215.
- MAJOR, JOHN, the historian, noticed, ii. 285.
- MALCOLM I., acquisition of Cumberland, i. 34. Assassination of, 35.
- MALCOLM II., succeeds to throne, i. 37. Defeats the Danes, ib. Dispute with Canute, ib. His death, 38.
- MALCOLM III. (Canmore), ascends the throne, i. 38. Espouses the Princess Margaret, and invades England, 39. Concludes peace, and again invades England, 40. Concludes peace with William Rufus, 41. Again invades England, ib. Death, character, and conduct, 43, 44.
- MALCOLM IV., succeeds to the throne, i. 66. Overreached by Henry II., 67. Conspiracy against, ib. Quells insurrections in Galloway and Moray, and defeats Somerled, ib. Ceases to govern, 68.
- MALHERBE, SIR WILLIAM, found guilty of treason and executed, i. 153.
- MALLOCH, MR., of Murtrie Shields, ii. 859.
- MALLORIE, SIR PETER, charges Wallace with treason, i. 110.
- MALT-TAX RIT in Glasgow, ii. 884.
- MANCHESTER, I. 1. James VIII., proclaimed at, ii. 862. The insurgent troops halt at, 937.
- MANCHESTER, EARL OF, ii. 614.
- MANDEVILLE, ROGER DE, one of the competitors for the crown, i. 87.
- MANDEVILLE, THOMAS, LORD, slain at the siege of Carrickfergus, i. 143.
- MANIFESTOES, SCOTTISH, concerning the war with England, ii. 581, 582.
- MANSFIELD, WILLIAM MURRAY, EARL OF, ii. 853.
- MAR, DONALD, EARL OF, elected regent, i. 185. Slain at Dupplin, ib.
- MAR, EARL OF, in 1368, i. 210.
- MAR, EARL OF, in 1384, i. 228.
- MAR, ALEXANDER STEWART, EARL OF, his marriage with the Countess of Mar, i. 248. Character of, 252. Commands at the battle of Harlaw, 253. Death of, 255.
- MAR, EARL OF, in 1431, i. 266.
- MAR, JOHN, EARL OF, imprisoned in Craigmillar Castle, i. 352. Death of, ib.
- MAR, COCHRANE, EARL OF, favourite of James III., i. 355.
- MAR, JAMES STEWART, EARL OF, i. 707. Successful expedition of, against the Borderers, 709. Created Earl of Moray, 712. [See MORAY.]
- MAR, EARL OF, guardian of James VI., ii. 53. At his coronation, 76. One of the party against Queen Mary, 118. Chosen regent, 131, 132. Approves of Killgrew's Mission, 138. Formally consents to Mary's execution, 139. His death, 140.
- MAR, EARL OF, takes possession of Stirling Castle, ii. 155. Assists to restore Morton, ib. Noticed, 164. One of an association for the rescue of Morton, 170. Takes part in the "Raid of Ruthven," 178. Ordered to leave the kingdom, 188. Withdraws to Ireland, 190. Returns, 191. Conspires against Arrian, ib. Accused of treason, 194. Noticed, 211, 347. Prince Henry committed to his keeping, 359, 365. With James VI. at Gowrie House, 384. Embassy of, to England, 392. Accompanies the king to London, 398. His contest with the queen, 401. Reconciled to, ib.
- MAR, ERSKINE JOHN, EARL OF, ii. 818. His letter to George I., 844. His marriage, 845. Withdraws his allegiance from the king, ib. Returns to Scotland, ib. His address to the Highlanders at Braemar, 847. Reluctance of his tenantry to assist him, 848. Takes possession of Perth, 853. Levies contributions for support of his army, ib. Incapacity of, as a leader, 866. Refuses to leave Perth, 857. Marches to Dunblane, 867. His position at the battle of Sheriffmuir, 868. His retreat to Perth, 869. Negotiates with the Duke of Argyll, 870. Destructive tactics of his army, 873. Retires to France, 874. Treachery of, 880. Charged with embezzlement, ib. Superseded at the Jacobite court, ib.
- MAR, ISABELLA, COUNTESS OF, her marriage to Alexander Stewart, i. 249.
- MAR, COUNTESS OF, ii. 401.
- MAR, EARLDOM OF, reverts to the crown, i. 268.
- MARCH, EARL OF, i. 76.
- MARCH, PATRICK DUNBAR, EARL OF, competitor for the crown, i. 87.
- MARCH, EARL OF, shelters Edward II. after battle of Bannockburn, i. 138.
- MARCH, EARL OF, conduct of, after the battle of Dupplin, i. 185. Goes over to the English, and swears fealty to Edward, 188. Returns to the Scottish cause, 190. Noticed, 191, 198, 201, 210.
- MARCH, EARL OF, in 1377, sacks and burns Roxburgh, i. 225. Noticed, 227, 233.
- MARCH, GEORGE DUNBAR, EARL OF, his daughter affianced to the Duke of Rothsay, i. 242. Flees to England, ib. Invades Scotland, 244. Defeats the Scots at West Nesbit and Homildon Hill, 247. His return to Scotland, 251. Death of, 255.
- MARCH, GEORGE DUNBAR, EARL OF, deprived of his estates and imprisoned by James I., i. 267. Retires to England, 268.
- MARCH, COUNTESS OF, delivers Dunbar to the Scots, i. 91.
- MARCH, BLACK AGNES, COUNTESS OF, defends Dunbar against the English, i. 193.
- MARCHMONT, EARL OF, appointed royal commissioner, ii. 762. Noticed, 814. His ridicule of Lord Belhaven's, speech in parliament, 826. [See SIR PATRICK HUME.]
- MARGARET, Queen of Malcolm III., i. 39. Death and character of, 41, 43.
- MARGARET, Queen of Alexander III., i. 76. Complaints made by, to the English king, ib. Repairs to England, 78. Delivered of a daughter at Windsor, ib.
- MARGARET, daughter of Alexander II., married to Eric, King of Norway, i. 80. Death of, ib.
- MARGARET, Princess of Norway, i. 81. Her accession to the crown, 82. Guardians chosen, ib. Projects of Edward I. with regard to, ib. [See Appendix to vol. i., note A.] Her death, 83.
- MARGARET, daughter of James I., married to the Dauphin of France, i. 262, 268. The English try to intercept her on her way to France, ib. Noticed, 274. Death of, 325.
- MARGARET, daughter of James II., i. 345. Marriage of, 352.
- MARGARET OF ANJOU, Queen of Henry VI. of England, i. 346. Courage and energy displayed by, during the wars of the Roses, ib.
- MARGARET, queen of James III., negotiations respecting the marriage of, i. 349. Lands at Leith, ib. Marriage of, 350. Her death and character, 359.
- MARGARET, queen of James IV., journey to, and reception in - Scotland, i. 392. Marriage to James IV., 393. Gives birth to a son, 395, 396. Appointed regent, 412. Character and conduct of, 413. Marries Earl of Angus, ib. Deposed from regency, 414. Refuses to give up the young king, 416. Surrender and flight to England, ib. Delivered of a daughter, and death of her youngest son, 417. Deserted by Home and Angus, 418. Arrives at her brother's court, ib. Her return, 419. Reconciliation and quarrel with Angus, 421. Charges against her by Bishop Gavin Douglas, 424. Treachery to Albany, 425. Intrigues and conduct of, 428, 429, 431. Writes to Albany, 431. Divorces Angus, 435. Acknowledges Henry Stewart her husband, ib. Flight and return, 437. Begs the protection of the king, 439. Gives up Stirling Castle to him, 440. Death of, 457.

- MARISCHAL, EARL OF, favourable to the Reformation, i. 460, 675, 694. At the funeral of James VI., 566. Noticed, 571, 579, 581, 585, note. Approves of the conspiracy against Cardinal Beaton, 590. One of James Mary's party, ii. 118. Chosen councillor by James VI., 187.
- MARISCHAL, EARL OF, ii. 564. Sent to England with troops to assist General Leslie, 688. Signs the Cumberland bond, 615.
- MARISCHAL, EARL OF, created lord privy seal, ii. 682.
- MARISCHAL, EARL OF, proclaims James VIII. at Aberdeen, ii. 848. Intrigues with the Jacobites, 878. His sagacious advice to Charles Edward, 913.
- MARISCHAL, COUNTESS OF, ii. 673, note.
- MARJORY, daughter of King William the Lion, i. 71, 74.
- MARJORY, daughter of Robert Bruce, taken prisoner by the English, i. 118. Her marriage, 141. Death of, 143. Noticed, 164.
- MARKEHAM, SIR GRIFFIN, conspiracy of, ii. 401.
- MARLBOROUGH, JOHN CHURCHILL, DUKE OF, deserts the cause of James VII., ii. 741. Noticed, 834. Dismissed from office, 837. Receives a manifesto from James VIII., 844.
- MARMADUKE, SIR JOHN, i. 99.
- MARRIAGE LAW, ii. 320.
- "MARROW OF MODERN DIVINITY," THE, ii. 892. Controversy, concerning, ib. Condemned by the General Assembly, 893.
- MARSHALL, RICHARD, i. 673.
- MARSHALL, REV. STEPHEN, sent as commissioner from the English parliament, ii. 607.
- MARSTON MOOR, BATTLE OF, ii. 613.
- MARTEN, HENRY, ii. 641.
- MARY, daughter of Malcolm Canmore, i. 44.
- MARY DE COUCI, Queen of Alexander II., i. 74. Present at the marriage of her son with Margaret of England, 76. Espouses the cause of the Comyns, 77.
- MARY, daughter of James I., married to Count de Bouquian, i. 274.
- MARY OF GUELDRES. [See GUELDRES.]
- MARY, daughter of James II., married to Lord Boyl, afterwards Earl of Arran, i. 345, 348. Escapes to the continent, 350. Divorced from the Earl of Arran, ib. Married to Lord Hamilton, ib.
- MARY, Queen of England, proposed alliance of, with James V., i. 431. Accession of, 674. Her persecution of the Protestants, ib.
- MARY OF GUISE. [See GUISE.]
- MARY, QUEEN, birth of, i. 461, and 562, note. Accession of, ib. Baptism, 566. Keepers of her person, 671. Treaty of marriage, 575. Seizure of, 576. Coronation, 579. Embarks for France, 614. Treaty, and solemnization of her marriage with the Dauphin, 622. Assumes title of Queen of England, 626. Interview with English ambassador, 650. Death of her husband, Francis II., 652. Sends commissioners to Scotland, 654. Interview with Bedford and Throckmorton, ib. Interview with John Lesley, 655. Refuses to ratify treaty with Elizabeth, and her motives, ib. 657, 658. Refused a safe conduct by Elizabeth, 655. Reply to the ambassador, 659. Embarkation, and arrival in Scotland, ib. Reception of, 698. State of the kingdom, 699. Celebrates mass, 700, and ii. 4, 3. Summons parliament, and interview with Knox, ib. Treatment of the Protestants, 704. Public entry into Edinburgh, ib. Progress through the central counties, 705. Accident at Linlithgow, and reception at Perth, ib. Dislike to Chatelherault and his son, 706. Discourteousness the Catholics, ib. Desires an interview with Elizabeth, 707. Conduct to Chatelherault and Arran, 709. Proposal of marriage by King of Sweden, ib. Projected interview with Elizabeth, her disappointment, 710. Progress to the north, 711. Refuses Huntley's invitation, 712. Refused entrance into Inverness, ib. Illness of, and interview with Knox, 713. Proposals of marriage, 715. Conduct with Chatelstet, ib. Melville's character of her, 716, and ii. 4, 14. Interview with Knox at Lochleven, ib. Interview with Knox while hawking, 717, and ii. 4, 14. Opens parliament, ib. Interview with Knox, 718. Visit to the Highlands, 719. Negotiations for marriage, 720, 729. Dudley, Earl of Leicester, proposed, 731. Residence at St. Andrew's, and conversations with Randolph, 730. First interview with Darnley, 732. Disappointed by Elizabeth, 733. Proposes to marry Darnley, and her motives, 734. Seeks Elizabeth's and Moray's approval, 735. Interview with Moray, 739. Seeks consent of Convention, 740. Reply to Throckmorton regarding her marriage, 741. Dispatches Hay to England, 743. Defeats the plots of Moray and Argyll, 745. Measures against Moray, 747. Letter to Paul de Foix, ib. Reply to Elizabeth's intercession for Moray, 748. Marries Darnley, 749. Her affection for him, 750. Proceedings against Moray, ib. Message from Elizabeth, and her reply, ib. Marches against Moray, 753. Applies for aid to the King of Spain and the Pope, 754. Visit to Fife and Dundee, ib. Proclamation against insurgent nobles, ib. Reply to intercessions of Elizabeth, 755. Pecuniary difficulties of, ib. Expels insurgents, and visits Lochmaben Castle, 756. Reconciliation with Elizabeth, ib. Joins Catholic league, 758, and ii. 28, 29. Conspiracy against her, 762. Opens parliament, 764. Her account of the murder of Riccio, 766. Danger and illness of, 767. Interview with the conspirators, 770. Escapes to Dunbar, ib. Refuses to perform the promise extorted from her, 771. Returns to Edinburgh, and discovers Darnley's guilt, ib. Retires to Edinburgh Castle, 772. Exortions to reconcile her nobles, and birth of a son, ib. Religious views, and proclamation, ii. 3. Distribution of ecclesiastical revenues, 8. Collision with the Protestants, 13. At the trial of Knox, 17. Perplexing position with regard to religion, 22. Reply to demands of the Protestants, and its reception by the assembly, 24, 25. Influence of French envoys in her councils, 29. Quarrels with Darnley, 31. Interview with him before the privy-council, 32. Reply to his statement of grievances, 33. Visits Bothwell when wounded, 35. Her dangerous illness at Jedburgh, ib. Return to Edinburgh, and misery of, 36. Secret conference at Craigmillar, ib. Visits Darnley at Glasgow, 41. Her altered behaviour with Darnley, and behaviour towards him, 44. Her movements on the night of the murder, 46. Behaviour after the murder, 49. Return to Seton, ib. Reply to the Earl of Lennox, 50. Letter from the Archbishop of Glasgow to, ib. Letter to, from Elizabeth, 61. Refuses to delay trial of Bothwell, ib. Her imprudent conduct, 62. Visits her son at Stirling Castle, 53. Letters to Bothwell, her abduction, 54. Return to Edinburgh Castle, 55. Banns of marriage with Bothwell, 56. Marries him, and her apology, 57. Conduct after marriage, and shameful treatment by Bothwell, 60. Manifesto and proclamation of, 62. Attempt to seize her person at Bothwick, ib. Takes refuge in Dunbar Castle, 63. Her adherents, 64. Advances from Dunbar with an army, and meets the confederates at Carberry Hill, ib. Interview with Kirkaldy of Grange, 66. Surrenders to confederate nobles, ib. Her treatment from them, 67. Conducted to Edinburgh, and her reception, ib. Conveyed to Lochleven Castle, and warrant for her commitment, 68. Alleged letter to Bothwell, and public feeling against her, 69. Casket with proofs of her guilt, 70. Her party reconstructed, 71. Refuses to give up Bothwell, 74. Forced to sign abdication, 75. Her abdication proclaimed, 76. Attempted flight, and failure, 82. Her escape from Lochleven, 83. Proceeds to Hamilton, and assemblies Council, ib. Nobles who supported her, and bond for her defence, ib. Applies to England and France for help, ib. Defeated at Langside, and takes refuge in England, 84. Her letters to Elizabeth, 85. Demands a personal interview with her, 86. Third letter and offer to refer her cause to the English queen, ib. Dispatches Lord Fleming, with letters to Charles IX., Catherine de Medici, and Cardinal Lorraine, ib. Interview with Middlemore, refuses to submit to Elizabeth's judgment, and removal to Bolton, 88. Consents to the conference for the decision of her cause, 89. Chooses commissioners, 90. Interview with the Bishop of Ross, 91. Opening of conference, complaint against the regent and party, ib. Secret message from Moray, conference transferred to Westminster, 93. Consents to regent's proposals, and sends her commissioners to Elizabeth, 94. Withdraws her consent, 95. The conference at Westminster, 95, 96. Her commissioners obtain an audience of Elizabeth, 96. Propose a compromise, protest, and withdraw from the conference, 97. Rejects Elizabeth's proposal to resign the crown, 99. Letter to her commissioners, ib. They accuse Moray, 100. Her deputies called before the privy-council, 101. Removed to Tutbury, efforts for her deliverance, 102. Deceived by Moray, 103. Her schemes, 104. Proposed marriage with Norfolk, 105. Writes Elizabeth, and Elizabeth's proposals, ib. Her reply, 106. Her divorce refused, 107. Removed to Coventry, 110. Her authority proclaimed in Scotland, 116. Negotiations for her restoration, 123. Visited by Cecil and Midway, ib. Letter to Elizabeth, ib. Commissioners sent to London to confer on her restoration, 124. Conference broken up, 125. Letters to Norfolk deciphered, 133. Consultation about putting her to death, 136. Interrogated as a criminal, 137. Scheme to put her to death, it is frustrated, 140. Her hopeless condition, 145. Sends a present to her son;—its rejection, 160. Her deplorable condition, 174. Memorial to Elizabeth, and her petitions rejected, 175. Correspondence with the Master of Gray, 202. Offers to sign a bond for the protection of Elizabeth's life, 203. Melancholy condition of, 216. Her letter to Paget, 218. Letter to, from Morgan, 219. Her letters conveyed to Walsingham, ib. Renews her intercourse with Babington, 220. Her arrest, and the seizure of her papers, 222. Evidence of Nau and Curie, 223. Commission for her trial, ib. Her reply to Elizabeth, 224. Consents to appear before the judges, 225. Trial at Fotheringhay Castle, ib. Trial at Westminster, 227. Her condemnation, 228. Proclamation of her sentence, 229. Brutal treatment by Paulet, ib. Her last appeal to Elizabeth, ib. Warrant for her execution, 232. Her reception of its bearers, 234. Her preparation for death, ib. Her execution, 235—237. Her character, 237.
- MARY, daughter of James VII., married to William of Orange, ii. 740. Proclaimed queen, 741. Courage and prudence of, 795. Her death, 806. Amiable character and disposition, ib.
- MARYS, THE "FOUR," see also Fleming, Beaton, Seton, and Livingston, i. 614.
- MASON, SIR JOHN, i. 617.
- MATILDA, Queen of Henry I. of England, i. 59.
- MATILDA, Queen of David I., i. 60.
- MATILDA, daughter of Henry I. of England, i. 60, 63.

- MATILDA, daughter of King Robert Bruce, i. 164.
MATTHEW OF WESTMINSTER, quoted, i. 119.
MAUD, Queen of Henry I. of England, i. 44.
MAULE, SIR THOMAS, his brave defence of Brechin Castle, and death, i. 108.
MAULE, HARRY, at the battle of Sheriffmuir, ii. 868.
MAULEY, SIR EDMUND, Seneschal of England, slain at the battle of Bannockburn, i. 138.
MADRICH, RABANUS, a learned Scotchman, i. 57.
MADVISIERE, MONSIEUR DE, his mission to the Scottish court, i. 755.
MAXWELL, LORD, taken prisoner at Solway Moss, i. 460. Subscribes the bond to Henry VIII., and returns to Scotland, 566. Imprisoned, 581, 582. Gives up Caerlaverock to Henry VIII., 593. Imprisoned by Regent Arran, ib. Appointed warden of the West Marches, 599, and ii. 146. Noticed 604, 611, 616, and ii. 171. Treachery of, 612. In favour of the reformation, 637. Created Earl of Morton, ii. 175. [See MORTON.]
MAXWELL, LORD, dispute with Arran, ii. 201. His defiance of the authority of James VI., 332. Taken prisoner, 333. Intrigues with other popish lords, 334. Slain in a conflict with the Johnstones, 491.
MAXWELL, LORD, revenges the death of his father, 405, 491. His treacherous murder of Sir James Johnstone, ib. Execution of, ib.
MAXWELL OF TERREGLES, submits to, and entertains Queen Mary, i. 756.
MAXWELL, DAVID, capture and execution of, ii. 333.
MAXWELL, Bishop of Ross, ii. 612.
MAXWELL, SIR GEORGE, of Pollock, ii. 966.
MAXIMILIAN, EMPEROR, i. 395, 399.
MEDCOT, CATHERINE DE, i. 653, 715, 758; ii. 66. Her ungenerous conduct to Queen Mary, 720.
"MELKE-MORTHEW MEO," story of, ii. 492.
MELDRUM, WILLIAM, Laird of Blinn, the "Squire Meldrum" of Sir David Lindsay. Attack made upon by Stirling of Keir, i. 420.
MELDRUM, OLD, i. 126.
MELFORT, LORD, ii. 723. Rapacity of, 731. His apostasy, 737. Noticed, 747. Treasonable letters written by, 760.
MELROSE ABBEY, noticed, i. 50, 55, and 588. Alexander II. buried in, 75. Founded by David I., 167. Plundered by the English, 155. The heart of King Robert Bruce buried in, 165. James, Earl Douglas, buried in, 235. Sir William Douglas, Knight of Liddesdale, buried in, 313.
MELROSE, BATTLE OF, i. 436; ii. 494.
MELROSE, THE MONKS OF, their possessions, i. 181.
MELROSE, ABBOT OF, i. 344.
MELROSE, ABBOT OF, slain at the battle of Linlithgow, i. 437.
MELVILLE, JAMES, of Carnbee, one of the conspirators against Cardinal Beaton, i. 596, 666. Assists in the murder, 597.
MELVIL, SIR JAMES, his mission to England, i. 725. His graphic description of Elizabeth's reception of him, 726. His interview with the Earl of Leicester, 727. Returns to Scotland, ib. His account of Riccio, 735, note. Quoted, 757, and note, ib.; ii. 44, note; 62, note; 69. Intercedes with Mary for the insurgent noblemen, ib. His advice to Mary and Riccio, 761, 768. His mission to Elizabeth, 773. Warns Mary against marrying Bothwell, ii. 53. Interview of, with Throckmorton, 73. Meets Moray on his arrival in Scotland, 78. Consulted by James VI., 187. His reception of Walsingham, 188. Discreet policy of, 207. Warns James VI. of Bothwell's conspiracy, 345.
MELVIL, SIR ROBERT, sent by the insurgents to ask assistance from Elizabeth, i. 753. His letter to Cecil, ii. 55, 70. Joins the confederacy against Bothwell, ib., 56. His treacherous conduct towards Queen Mary, 61. His mission to England and return, ib., 72. His interview with Mary at Lochleven, 73, 74; and at Bolton 91. Sent with a secret message to Mary, 93. Sentence of attainder pronounced against, 130. Surrenders to the English, 144. Given up to Regent Morton, 145. His treacherous advice to Gowrie, 192, 196. His embassy to the English court, 232.
MELVIL, ANDREW, principal of the College of St. Andrew's, banished, ii. 190. Returns to Scotland, 211, 270. Situations offered to, ib. His influence in the church, 271. Regent Morton attempts to gain his adherence, 273. Charge brought against, 277. His removal to St. Andrew's, 278. His discourse in the General Assembly, 282. His interview with James VI., 283. Accompanies the king to the north of Scotland, 363. Accusations made against, 371, 377. He is charged with sedition, 418. His courage in presence of the king and council, 420. His flight into England, ib. Adamson's declaration against, 426. His answer, 427. Resumes his labours in St. Andrew's, 431. Anecdote of, 433. Elected moderator of the General Assembly, ib. Lectures in presence of the king, 435. At the coronation of Anne, Queen of James VI., 439. Latin poem composed by, ib. His kindness to Adamson, 440. His interview with the king, 441. Sent to Holyrood House, 447. At a meeting of the estates, 451. His bold address to the king, 452, 461. Deprived of the rectorship, 462. The king's dread of, 463, 465. His eloquent defence of the ministers, 475. Charges brought against, 476. Imprisoned, ib. Removes to the University of Sedan, ib.
MELVIL, SIR ANDREW, master of Queen Mary's household, ii. 225. His last interview with, 235.
MELVIL, JAMES, nephew of Andrew, his description of Knox, ii. 259, 278. He accompanies James VI. to the north of Scotland, 263. His discourse at the meeting of synod, St. Andrew's, 430, 439. Appointed commissioner, 448. His successful interviews with the king, 448, 452, 461, 467, 473, 475. Efforts to ensnare, ib. Banished, 476. Noticed, 970.
MELVILLE, LORD, appointed secretary of state, ii. 777. Appointed commissioner for Scotland, 793. Excepted by James VII. from his promised indemnity, 795. Deprived of his office, 803 and note.
MEMORIAL to the pope, i. 152. To the French government, ii. 880.
MEMORIAL STONES, i. 22.
MENAINVILLE, M. DE, embassy of, ii. 183. Intrigues of, 184. His letters conveyed to Walsingham, 185. His departure, ib.
MENDOZA, a Spanish ambassador, ii. 197, 217.
MENTEITH, COMYN, EARL OF, urges the danger of delaying the coronation of Alexander III., i. 75. Opposes the designs of Henry III. of England, i. 77. Death of, ib.
MENTEITH, WALTER STEWART, EARL OF, joins Bruce in opposing the Maiden of Norway's right to the throne, i. 82.
MENTEITH, ALEXANDER, EARL OF, submits to Edward I. after the battle of Dunbar, i. 91.
MENTEITH, SIR JOHN, betrays Wallace, i. 110.
MENTEITH, ALAN, EARL OF, one of the supporters of Bruce, i. 115.
MENTEITH, MURDOCH, EARL OF, slain at Dupplin Moor, i. 185.
MENTEITH, EARL OF, is taken prisoner at Halidon Hill, i. 188. Executed, 199.
MENTEITH, EARL OF, commands a party of the royalists at the battle of Sauchieburn, i. 363.
MENTEITH, EARL OF, i. 629. One of the commanders of the army of the congregation, 642. Noticed, 694.
MENZIES' CLAN, ii. 788.
MENZIES, MR. OF Cuidares, a bill of high treason found against, ii. 871.
MERCUR, a Scottish merchant, i. 226.
MERCER OF ALDIN, joins Charles Edward, ii. 919.
MERCHANTS OF Edinburgh, the, i. 580.
MARCHISTON, NAPIER OF. [See NAPIER.]
MERLADET, ILLAVE DE, i. 327, 373.
MERS, ravaged by the English, i. 426. The description of a covenanters' communion in, ii. 702.
MERS, MEN OF THE, i. 226.
MESSE, SYNOD OF, ii. 432.
MESNAIGE, a French ambassador, i. 561.
METALS, introduction of into Scotland, i. 34.
METHVEN, BATTLE OF, between Bruce and the English, i. 116.
METHVEN, PAUL, a reformer, trial and excommunication of, ii. 13.
METWAS, SIR PETER, i. 704.
MIDDLEMORE, sent with letters to Mary and Regent Moray, ii. 87. Interview with Mary, 88.
MIDDLETON, GENERAL, assumes the command of the Scottish royalists, ii. 674. Is defeated, and escapes to the continent, ib. Is appointed royal commissioner, 682. His dissolute habits, 683. His treatment of the Marquis of Argyre, 684. Tyrannical behaviour of, ii. 688. His persecution of Lord Lorn, 690. His progress through the west, 691. Downfall of, 692.
MILL, WALTER, trial, death, and its effects, i. 680.
MILLES, THOMAS, his mission to England, ii. 214.
MILLENARY PETITION from the Puritans to James VI., ii. 468.
MILTON, LORD, ii. 910.
MINISTERS, THE PRESBYTERIAN, refuse to sign Adamson's bond, ii. 425. Their interview with James VI., 429. Increase of their numbers, 444. Their poverty, 449. Retirement of some of the leading, 459. Apprehension and banishment of several, 472. They protest against the king's proceedings, 473. Interview between the king and eight, 474. Oppressive treatment of, 477. Protest against the five articles of Perth, 487. Petition against the liturgy, 518. Visit London, 593. Their popularity, ib. Mode of inducing, 676. Charges resigned by a large number, 691. Restoration of some of the ejected, 700, 753. Declare their want of confidence in government, 742. Differences among, 756. Power given to, by parliament, 757. Carstairs interposes with King William on their behalf, 763. Feelings with regard to the union, 771. Modes of appointing and electing, 776, 890. Character of the Seceding, 897.
MINOITE FRIARS, COMYN slain in the convent of the, i. 114. Noticed, 145.
MINSTRELS, early, i. 296, 312, 314.
MINSTRELY of the Scottish Borders, ii. 501.
MITCHELL, JAMES, arrest of, for shooting at Archbishop Sharp, ii. 706. His confession on promise of pardon, ib. Promise revoked, 707. His torture and execution, 708.
"MITH, THE CHAPER OF," a skirmish between the Scotch and English, i. 151.
MOFFAT, a Jesuit, trial and acquittal of, ii. 409.
MOHUN, LORD, ii. 841.
"MORDART, THE SEVEN MEN OF," ii. 914.
MONDERNAGE, M., ii. 161.
MONASTERY, i. 221.
MONCRIEFF, REV. ALEXANDER, one of the first Seceders, ii. 897, 898. Deposed, 901, 905.
MONRODDO, LORD, i. 297, note.
MONCRIEFF, JAMES, lord-advocate, ii. 795, note.
MONEY in the early ages, i. 220, 370.
MONK, GENERAL, character of, ii. 679. His policy in connection with the parliament, 680. Deceptive conduct of, ib. Appointed commander-in-chief, 681. Created Duke of Albemarle, 682. His treacherous behaviour to the Marquis of Argyre, 685.
MONMOUTH, DUKE OF, commands the royal army at the battle of Bothwell Bridge, ii. 713, and note, ib. Obtains an act of indemnity for the insurgents, 714, 716. Prepares to invade England, 732. Ruin of his expedition, 736. Execution of, ib.
MONOPOLIES, i. 218, ii. 704.
MONRO OF FOULIS, ii. 959.
MONRO, GENERAL, ii. 555, 559. Severities of, 578, 608, 644.
MONTAGUE, EARL OF SALISBURY. [See SALISBURY.]

- MONTFOUR, WILLIAM DE, warden of Dundee, i. 130.
- MONTFORT, SIMON DE, Earl of Leicester, i. 76.
- MONTGOMRIE, SIEUR LORGES DE, sent to Scotland with French troops, i. 591.
- MONTGOMERY, ALEXANDER, description of his poetry, ii. 307, 308.
- MONTGOMERY, ROBERT, ii. 423.
- MONTGOMERY, LORD, ii. 584.
- MONTGOMERY, SIR JAMES, one of the commissioners sent to offer the crown to William and Mary, ii. 749. Becomes a member of "the Club," 777. Intrigues with the Jacobites, 793. Dishonesty of, 795. Death of, 796.
- MONTHERMER, RALPH, Earl of Gloucester. [See GLOUCESTER.]
- MONTMORENCY, CONSTABLE, i. 617. Opposition to Queen Mary's marriage with the Dauphin, 621.
- MONTREUIL, a French envoy, ii. 633, 637.
- MONTROSE, taken by Wallace, i. 95. James VIII. proclaimed at, ii. 848.
- MONTROSE, DAVID LINDSAY, Earl of Crawford, Duke of, at the battle of Sauchieburn, i. 363.
- MONTROSE, FIRST EARL OF, killed at Flodden, i. 408.
- MONTROSE, THIRD EARL OF, chosen councillor to James VI., ii. 153. At meeting of parliament in Stirling Castle, 156. Share in first Gowrie conspiracy, 178. Signs a bond for release of the king, 185. Aids his escape, 186. Chosen councillor, 187. Chosen guardian to young Lennox, 191. Joins in a plot for assassinating Angus, 200. Made prisoner at Stirling by the banished lords, 212. Made prisoner by King James, 353.
- MONTROSE, JAMES GRAHAM, the GREAT MARQUIS OF, joins the popular party, ii. 522, 532. Proceedings in the north, 556. Takes Aberdeen, 558. Abandons the cause of the covenanters, 565. Leads his army into England, 563. Defection of, 567. Imprisoned, 595. Sketch of his early career, 615. Signs the Cumberland bond, ib. Again imprisoned, 616. Offers his services to the king, ib. Appears to waver in his allegiance, 617. Attempts to retrieve the royal cause in Scotland, ib. Joined by a body of Irish soldiers, 618. Defeats the covenanters at Tippermuir, 619. Obtains possession of Perth, ib. Again defeats the covenanters at the Bridge of Dee, 620. His manoeuvres in the north, 621. Invades Argyshire, 622. His victories, 623—626. Fate of his sons, ib. Marches to the south, 627. Defeated at Philiphaugh, 629. Flight to the continent, 634. Treacherous letter from Charles II. to, 653. Returns to Scotland, ib. His defeat, ib. Surfeits and adventures of, 654. Taken prisoner, and conveyed to Edinburgh, 655. Condemned without trial, 656. His conference with the clergy, ib. Summoned before parliament, 657. His defence, ib. Lines written in prison by, 658. His dying speech and execution, 658, 659. His character and appearance, ib. Account of his heart, note ib., and Appendix II. to vol. ii. 977.
- MONTROSE, FIRST DUKE OF, ii. 842. Appointed Secretary of State for Scotland, 845.
- MOORS, Sir James Douglas slain by the, in Spain, i. 165.
- MORAVIA, SIR THOMAS DE, i. 202.
- MORAY, INSURRECTION IN, i. 67—73.
- MORAY, ANGUS, EARL OF, insurrection and death, i. 60. Title bestowed on Earls of Mar, 67.
- MORAY, SIR ANDREW, of Bothwell, joins Wallace, and is slain at Stirling Bridge, i. 95, 96.
- MORAY, SIR ANDREW, son of the preceding, accompanies Wallace to England, i. 97. Chosen regent, 186. Capture of, 187. Return of, 189. Again chosen regent, 191. Anecdote of, 192. Invades England, ib. Death and character, 194.
- MORAY, DAVID, BISHOP OF, i. 116, 168—176, 278.
- MORAY, THOMAS RANDOLPH, EARL OF, joins Bruce, i. 115. Taken prisoner by the English, 116. Deserts the cause of Bruce, 127. Taken prisoner by Douglas, ib. Created Earl of Moray, 131. Gallant capture of Edinburgh Castle by, ib. Commands at the battle of Bannockburn, 131, 136. Anecdote of, 134. Expedition of, to, and exploits in Ireland, 141—143. Returns to Scotland, 144. Assists in the capture of Berwick, 147. Appointed tutor to the heir of the throne, 148. Defeats the English, 155. His mission to France, 156. Invades England, 158. Appointed regent, 184. Able administration of, ib. His death, suspected to have been caused by poison, 185.
- MORAY, ANDREW, BISHOP OF, i. 176.
- MORAY, RANDOLPH, EARL OF, eldest son of the Great Randolph, slain at the battle of Dupplin Moor, i. 185.
- MORAY, RANDOLPH, EARL OF, brother of the preceding, i. 186. Chosen regent, 189. Taken prisoner, 191. Slain at Neville's Cross, 198.
- MORAY, EARL OF, i. 230, 232. At the battle of Otterburn, 233. Moray, Earl of, in 1402, taken prisoner at the battle of Homildon Hill, i. 218.
- MORAY, SIR THOMAS, slain at the battle of Harlaw, i. 253.
- MORAY, ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS, EARL OF, i. 324. Forfeited, 334. Slain at Arkinholme, 337.
- MORAY, JAMES CRICHTON, created Earl of, i. 334.
- MORAY, EARL OF, defeats the Mackintoshes, i. 439.
- MORAY, JAMES STEWART, EARL OF, the GREAT REGENT, defeats the English, i. 613. Character, 634. Noticed, 637, 639, 640, 642. His last interview with the queen regent, 643. Parliament appoints him one of the Council of Twelve, 649. Noticed, 653, 654. His mission to Queen Mary, 655. Duplicity of, 656. Invites Knox to return to Scotland, 677. Joins the congregation, 684. Expedition against the queen regent, 685. Subscribes the Book of Discipline 694. Receives Queen Mary at Leith, 698. Noticed, 700. His letter to Elizabeth, 703. Sent to quell the Borderers, 705. Created Earl of Moray, 712. Defeats Huntley, 713. Opposes Knox, 718. Letter to, to Cecil, 723. Attends meeting at Berwick, 723. perplexing position of, 733. Withdraws from court, 738. Interview with Mary, 739. Refuses consent to her marriage, ib. Supposed plots of, 745. Summoned to court, ib. Appeals to Elizabeth, 746. Alleged conspiracy against, 747. Denounced as a rebel, 750. Takes up arms, 752. Seeks assistance from Elizabeth, and is disappointed, 753. Offers submission, ib. Retreats to Carlisle, 756. Treatment of, by Elizabeth, ib. Summoned before parliament, 758. Return to court, 769. Pardon of, 771. Advises Knox to plead guilty, ii. 17. Absents himself from assembly, 19. Conference at Craigmillar, 36. Retreats to France, 52. His assistance sought by the confederates, 59. Fidelity to the queen, 74. Dispatches messenger to England, ib. Appointed regent, 75. Departure from France, 77. Interview with Elizabeth, and arrival in Scotland, 78. Entrance into Edinburgh, and reception, ib. Interview with Mary at Lochleven, ib. Declared regent; interview with Throckmorton and Lethington, 79. Conduct on escape of the queen, 83. At Langside, 84. Offers to submit to Elizabeth's judgment, 87. Proceeds against Mary's friends, 88. Conspiracy against him, 89. Summons parliament, ib. Commanded by Elizabeth to lay down his arms, 90. Summoned to appear against Mary, ib. His commissioners, 91. His defence, 92. Sends Melville with secret message to Mary, 93. Privately gives proofs of Mary's guilt, ib. Interview with Elizabeth, 94. At conference at Westminster, 95. Produces his proofs, 98. Confronted with Mary's commissioners, 101. Receives permission to return to Scotland, ib. Alleged plot against, 103. Reconciled to Norfolk, ib. Arrives in Scotland, and summons convention at Stirling, ib. Marches against the Borders, 104. Imprisons Châtelleraut and Herries, ib. Marches against Argyll and Huntley, ib. Reduces the clans. His reception of the proposals sent by Boyd, 107. Summons assembly of estates, ib. Delivers Norfolk's correspondence to Elizabeth, 108. Subserviency to Elizabeth, 112. Invests Tower of Arlaw, and captures Northumberland, ib. Requests Elizabeth to deliver Mary into his hands, 113. Offers to deliver Northumberland to the English queen, ib. Assassination, character, and funeral of, 114. His communications with, and proposals to the General Assembly, 251. His character, and the effect of his death, 253.
- MORAY, THE COUNTESS OF, ii. 870.
- MORAY, ANDREW FORMAN, Bishop of. [See FORMAN.]
- MORKE, ROGER, his connection with the Irish massacre, ii. 600.
- MORVILLE, HUGH, constable of Scotland, i. 167.
- MORVILLE, RICHARD DE, constable of Scotland, i. 170, 180.
- MORGAN, agent of Queen Mary, ii. 219.
- MORHAM, SIR HERBERT DE, executed, i. 119.
- MORTIMER, CATHERINE, mistress of David II., murdered, i. 204.
- MORTIMER, ROGER, LORD, i. 142, 143. Commander of the English troops in Ireland, 144.
- MORTON, EARL OF, i. 392. Slain at the battle of Flodden, 409.
- MORTON, EARL OF, i. 419.
- MORTON, JAMES DOUGLAS, FOURTH EARL OF, lord chancellor, i. 716. Enters into plot against Riccio, 760. Urges the queen to bestow the crown on Darnley, 769. Deprived of chancellorship, 771. Absents himself from assembly, ii. 19. Pardon, 39. Solicited to join plot against Darnley, 40. Visits Earl of Angus, ib. Aims party for the protection of the prince, 54. Protests against Mary's marriage to Bothwell, 62. Leads confederates, 65. His behaviour to Mary, 67. At coronation of James VI., 76. Accompanies Moray to Lochleven, 78. At Langside, 84. Chosen commissioner by Moray, 90. Refuses to enter Edinburgh on Lethington's trial, 112. Aids Lennox in laying waste the country, 119. Congregates forces, and proceeds against Huntley, 122. Commissioned to confer on Mary's restoration, 125. At attack on Stirling, 131. Delivers up Northumberland, 134. Approves of Killebrew's scheme, 138. Formally consents to Mary's death, 139. Letter from Elizabeth, elected regent, 140. Attempts to negotiate with Grange and Lethington, 141. Election confirmed, 142. Rejects Kirkaldy's terms of submission, 144. Marches against the borders, and appoints warlike, 146. Invades the patrimony of the church; his rapacity, ib. Conference with Killebrew, 148. Refuses to meet Huntington, and Elizabeth's message, 149. Submits to meet him, 150. His interview with Argyll and Atholl, 151. Coalition against, ib. Resignation of, 152. Receives an indemnity, 153, 156. Delivers up Edinburgh Castle, 154. Instigates Mar to seize regency, ib. Invited to Stirling by James, 155. Chosen councillor, 156. His behaviour at the parliament in Stirling Castle, ib. Invites the opposing lords to a banquet, 158. Accused of death of Atholl, ib. Proceeds against the Hamiltons, 159. Besieges Hamilton Castle, 160. Dislike to Lennox, 163. Unfavourable reports against, 164. Interview with Bowes, 165. Applies to Elizabeth, 166. Accused before council, 167. Committed for trial, 168. Intrusted to the care of Captain Stewart, 171. His trial, ib. Conference with Durie and Balcanquhall, ib. Found guilty, 172. Dispatches a letter to James, ib. Conduct during his last hours, ib. His dying confession, and execution, 173.
- MORTON, LORD MAXWELL, FIFTH EARL OF, signs the bond for release of king from Gowrie, ii. 185. Joins Gray's plot, 210. Celebrates mass at Lincludin, 214. Arrest and imprisonment of, ib.
- MORTON, WILLIAM DOUGLAS, SEVENTH EARL OF, appointed lieutenant-general, ii. 349. Quarrel with Lord Maxwell, 404.
- MORTON, WILLIAM DOUGLAS, EIGHTH EARL OF, sent to see the declaration of peace published in the Scottish camp, ii. 564. Noticed, 570. One of the commissioners sent by Charles I. to treat with the Scots, 589.

MONTON, WILLIAM DOUGLAS, TENTH EARL OF, removed from the council, ii. 706.

MORTON, JAMES DOUGLAS, TWELFTH EARL OF, ii. 842.

MOSSMAN, executed for coining false money, ii. 145.

MOSS-THROOPERS. [See BORDER FREEBOOTERS.]

MOUNTJOY, THE EARL OF, ii. 392.

MOWBRAY, SIR JOHN DE, attempts to capture Wallace, i. 110.

MOWBRAY, GEOFFREY, i. 119.

MOWBRAY, SIR PHILIP DE, defeated by the Scots, i. 124. Governor of Stirling Castle, 132. His truce with Edward Bruce, ib. Enters the service of Bruce, 139, 142. Goes to Ireland with Edward Bruce, and is slain, 148.

MOWBRAY, SIR JOHN DE, slain, i. 186.

MOWBRAY, ALEXANDER DE, joins David Bruce's party, i. 189, 190.

MOWBRAY, SIR WILLIAM, taken prisoner by the Scots, i. 459.

"MOY, THE ROUT OF," ii. 946.

MOYNE, Jacobite council held at, ii. 847.

MUNRO, CAPTAIN, commands the Cameronians at Dunkeld, ii. 790.

MUNRO, SIR ROBERT, of Foulis, ii. 933. Slain at the battle of Falkirk, 944.

MURCHISON, THE LAIRD OF, ii. 355.

MURDERAC, JOHN, Laird of Moydart, a notorious freebooter, i. 619.

MURRAY, PATRICK, of Perth, fate of his son, i. 629.

MURRAY, ANDREW, of Tullibardine, treachery and execution of, i. 185.

MURRAY, SIR WILLIAM, of Tullibardine, deserts the court of queen regent, i. 629, ii. 65. Accuses Bothwell of Darnley's murder, 66. Heads a conspiracy against Regent Moray, 89, 152, 155.

MURRAY, JAMES, of Tullibardine, challenges Bothwell, ii. 66.

MURRAY, WILLIAM, of Tullibardine, ii. 390, note.

"MURRAY, MARIE JOHN," ii. 385.

MURRAY, SIR ROBERT, his mission to the ministers in the north, ii. 460.

MURRAY, SIR GIDEON, slain at Auldern, ii. 625.

MURRAY, WILLIAM, brother of the Earl of Tullibardine, executed, ii. 629.

MURRAY, SIR PATRICK, of Auchtertyre, summoned to produce a guarantee for his loyalty, ii. 850. Taken prisoner at Sheriffmuir, 869.

MURRAY, JAMES, aids the Jacobites, ii. 853.

MURRAY, LORD CHARLES, assists to defend Preston against the royalists, ii. 864. Taken prisoner, 865. Tried, 875.

MURRAY, JOHN, of Broughton, mission to France in connection with the Jacobites, ii. 911. Intrigues of, 913, 930. Taken prisoner, 952. Turns king's evidence against Lord Lovat, 957.

MURRAY, LORD GEORGE, joins Charles Edward, ii. 919. Plan of attack proposed by, at Preston, 926. Noticed, 930, 935. His quarrel with the Duke of Perth, 936. Commands a division of the Jacobite army, 937. Dextrous manœuvre of, ib. Advises Charles to retreat to Scotland, 938. Skirmish with the English at Clifton, 939. At the battle of Falkirk, 943. Takes possession of the town, 944. Noticed, 946, 947. Unsuccessful, attempt to surprise the English at Nairn, 948. At the battle of Culoden, 950. Retires to Holland, 952.

MURRAY, SIR DAVID, joins Charles Edward, ii. 924.

MUSGRAVE, LORD, i. 198, 202.

MUSGRAVE, SIR THOMAS, i. 226. Defeated and made prisoner, 227.

MUSGRAVE, SIR PHILIP, ii. 644.

MUSGRAVE, JOHN, commands the English Borderers at Solway Moss, i. 460.

MUSIC in the time of James IV., i. 552.

MUSSELBURGH, position of the Scotch and English forces at, before the battle of Pinkie, i. 606, 607. Chapel of the Lady of Loretto near, 690. Noticed, ii. 64, 924.

N.

NAIRN, LORD, at the gathering at Braemar, ii. 846. Taken prisoner at Preston 865. Tried for high treason and condemned, 875. Resisted, 876. His release, 877.

NAIRN, LORD, joins Charles Edward, ii. 919. Proclaims James VIII. at Perth, 920. Mentioned, 924, 925. At the battle of Preston, 925. Retires to the continent, 952.

NAIRN, REV. THOMAS, ii. 901, 902.

NAIRN, Duke of Cumberland's army halts at, ii. 947, 948.

NAIRNE, MAJOR, his trial and execution at Preston, ii. 875.

NAIRNE, MRS., a Jacobite lady, courageous behaviour of, ii. 928.

NAPIER, LORD, imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle, ii. 616. Present at conference with Montrose, 617. Released from prison, 627. At battle of Philiphaugh, 629.

NAPIER, MASTER OF, noticed, ii. 624, 625, 627.

NAPIER, JOHN, of Merchiston, inventor of logarithms, ii. 381, note, 971.

NAPIER, BARBARA, trial of, for witchcraft, ii. 341, 961.

NARBY, BATTLE OF, ii. 631.

NAU, secretary to Queen Mary, evidence of, against Mary, ii. 223.

NAYARR, KING OF, i. 654.

NAVY, measures of James IV. to improve, i. 339, 546.

NESBIT MOOR, ACTION OF, i. 201.

NESBIT WEST, defeat of the Scots at, i. 247.

NETHERLANDS, Edward I. endeavours to interrupt the trade between Scotland and the, i. 149. Trade of Scotland with, 545.

NEVILLE'S CROSS, OR DURHAM, BATTLE OF, i. 198.

NEVILLE, ROBERT, at the battle of Roslin, i. 107, note ib.

NEWARK, SURRENDER of Charles I. to Scotch army at, ii. 633.

NEWTABLE ABBEY, JAMES IV. meets Queen Margaret at, i. 392.

NEWHOTTE, ABBOT OF, interview of, with James and the Ruthven conspirators, ii. 179.

NEWHOTTE, LORD, resists James VI. at Court of Session, ii. 376.

NEWBURN, skirmish at, ii. 584.

NEWBURN, BATTLE OF, ii. 614.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE, i. 67, 68. Balliol pays homage to Edward I. at, 89. Threatened by Wallace, 97. Musters of the English army at, 98, 149. Assaulted by Douglas, 233. Mentioned, 405; ii. 574, 583, 586, 614, 618, 636, 934. Attempt upon, by the Jacobites, 856.

NEWCASTLE, MARQUIS OF, ii. 607, 613. Flees to the continent, 614.

NEWTON, ADAM, a monk, papal nuncio, i. 146.

NEW YEAR'S DAY, changed to 1st January, ii. 379.

NIDDRY, LAIRD OF, escapes from James VI., ii. 346.

NISBET, JOHN, of Hardhill, bravery of, at the battle of Drumclog, ii. 712.

NISBET, SIR WILLIAM, executed after battle of Philiphaugh, ii. 629.

NITHSDALE, EARL OF, as royal commissioner, holds a convention of the Estates, ii. 503.

NITHSDALE, EARL OF, joins Montrose, ii. 618.

NITHSDALE, EARL OF, at the gathering at Braemar, ii. 846. Taken prisoner at Preston, 865. Tried and condemned for high treason, 875. His escape from the Tower, 876.

NOBILITY, submission of, to Edward I., i. 86, 92, 93. Jealousy of, towards Wallace, 99. League among the, 365. Policy of James V. for reducing the power of, 446. Degeneracy of the, 539. Treachery of the, 605, 612; see also Appendix to vol. I. Note E. E. Improvement in manners of the, ii. 326. Attempt of James VI. to reconcile the feuds of the, 330.

NORFOLK, SCOTTIH, ii. 836.

NORFOLK, EARL OF, disaffected with Edward I., i. 102.

NORFOLK, DUKE OF, invades Scotland, i. 459.

NORFOLK, DUKE OF, presides at conference on Mary's cause, ii. 91. Endeavours to reconcile Mary to the regent, 92. Interview of, with Lethington, ib. Secret interview of, with Moray, ib. Proposed marriage with Mary, 103. Letters to the regent, 106. Withdraws from court, 108. His plot discovered, ib. Committed to Tower, ib. New conspiracy, arrest, trial, and execution, 133.

NORHAM, conference at, i. 84. Treaty of, in 1559, 624.

NORHAM, CASTLE OF, dismantled by David I., i. 61. Balliol swears fealty to Edward I. in, 89. Captured by the Scots, 405.

NORMANS, ANGLO, settlement of, in Scotland, i. 65.

NORTH, LORD, ii. 830.

NORTHUMBERLAND, HENRY PERCY, EARL OF, invades Scotland, i. 225. Retakes Berwick, 226. Noticed, 228, 230, 247. Conspires against Henry IV., 248. Takes refuge in Scotland, 249. Negotiations for betrayal of, ib.

NORTHUMBERLAND, EARL OF, in 1533, i. 447.

NORTHUMBERLAND, EARL OF, in 1568, ii. 98, 108. Rebellion of, 109. Takes refuge in Scotland, 110. Captured by Moray, 112. Betrayed by Morton, and executed, 134.

NORWAY, conquests of Harold, King of, in north of Scotland, i. 45, 46. Disputes between, and Alexander III., 78. Treaties with, 80, 262. Dispute with, 341. Settlement of dispute between Scotland and, 349.

NORWAY, MARGARET OF. [See MARGARET.]

NOTTINGHAM, standard of Charles I. raised at, ii. 606.

NOTTINGHAM, EARL OF, Marshal of England, i. 236.

NOTTINGHAM, EARL OF, protests against the union with Scotland, ii. 830. Removed from office, 876.

NYE, REV. PHILIP, one of the commissioners to the General Assembly, ii. 607. Mentioned, 611.

O.

OATH, THE CORONATION, taken by Charles II., ii. 669. James VII. declines to take the, 728.

OATH OF ASSURANCE conjoined with Oath of Allegiance, ii. 761.

OATH OF ABJURATION, ii. 775, 889.

OATH, THE BURGESS, ii. 904.

OCHILTREE, ANDREW, LORD, joins plot against Riccio, i. 762. Mentioned, ii. 130. Appointed one of James VI.'s councillors, 156. Invites Moray to court, 342. Intercedes for Bothwell, 351. Appointed lieutenant and warden of the Borders, 372.

OCHILTREE, LORD, tried for leasing-making, ii. 506. Imprisoned for twenty years, ib. Set at liberty by Cromwell, ib.

O'CONNOR, the Prince of Connaught, i. 132.

OCTAVIANS, THE, ii. 366, 407.

O'DONNELL, Prince of Tirconnell, i. 387.

O'DONNELL, i. 401.

OGLIVIE, SIR WALTER, slain, i. 238.

OGLIVIE, SIR ALEXANDER, slain at the battle of Harlaw, i. 252.

OGLIVIE, SIR WALTER, i. 268.

OGLIVIE, HENRY, Master of Arts, i. 278.

OGLIVIE, LORD, ii. 152.

OGLIVIE, SIR DAVID, joins Montrose, ii. 626.

OGLIVIE, LORD, ii. 627, 628, 630.

OGLIVIE OF INVERKHANITY, executed, ii. 629.

OGLIVIE OF BARRA, Governor of Dunnottar, ii. 673, note.

OGLIVIE OF BOIN, ii. 855.

OGLIVIE, LORD, joins Prince Charles Edward, ii. 933. Escapes to Norway, 952.

OGLIVY, a Jesuit, cruel treatment of, ii. 409. His trial and execution, ib.

OGLE, SIR ALEXANDER, i. 201.

OGLE, SIR ROBERT, taken prisoner at battle of Otterburn, i. 234.

OGLE, LORD ROBERT, i. 254. Defeated and taken prisoner by the Earl of Angus, 268.

O'KYAN, COLONEL, an Irish officer under Montrose, ii. 621. Taken prisoner and executed at Edinburgh, 623.

OLIPHANT, DAVID, ancestor of the Oliphants, i. 63, 65.

OLIPHANT, SIR WILLIAM, appointed governor of Stirling Castle, i. 104. Defends the castle against Edward I., 109. Surrenders, and is sent to the Tower, 110.

OLIPHANT, WILLIAM, Governor of Perth, i. 129.

OLIPHANT, LORD, taken prisoner at Solway Moss, i. 461. Subscribes the bond to Henry VIII., and returns to Scotland, 566.

OLIPHANT, LORD, in 1572, ii. 143.

O'NEALE, SIR PHELM, assists in the Irish massacre, ii. 600.

ORANGE, PRINCE OF. [See WILLIAM III.]

ORANGE, PRINCESS OF. [See MARY.]

ORRISTON, Justice-clerk, ii. 557. He is dispatched to York with a supplication from the covenanters, ib.

ORRNEY, i. 4, 37, 45, 47. Death of Haco at, 79. Death of the Maiden of Norway at, 83. Ceded to Scotland, 349. Rebellion in, 444. Visited by James V., 455. Annexed to the throne, 456.

ORRNEY, BISHOP OF, i. 62.

ORRNEY, ADAM BOTHWELL, BISHOP OF, marries Queen Mary and Bothwell, ii. 57. Chosen commissioner by Regent Moray, 90. Dissatisfaction with the policy of the regent, 96, 101. Forfeited, 130. Charges brought against, 244, 255.

ORRNEY, BISHOP OF, i. 349.

ORRNEY, HAROLD, EARL OF, Insurrection of, i. 71. Murdered, 73.

ORRNEY, EARL OF, i. 336, 354.

ORRNEY, ROBERT STEWART, EARL OF, imprisoned and executed, ii. 408.

ORMISTON, the LAIRD OF, his share in Darnley's murder, ii. 45, 47.

ORMISTON, HOB, one of the conspirators against Darnley, ii. 45.

ORMOND, MARQUIS OF, ii. 632.

ORMOND, MARQUIS OF. [See JAMES STEWART, DUKE OF ROSS.]

ORMOND, BUTLER, DUKE OF, dismissed from office by George I., ii. 645. Intrigues with Cardinal Alberoni, 878.

ORMISTON, WILLIAM, appointed justiciary of Scotland, i. 93.

O'ROURKE, delivered up to Elizabeth by James VI., ii. 340.

OSMYN, the Moorish King of Granada, i. 165.

OSTIA, ALEBRIC, BISHOP OF, papal legate, i. 63.

O'SULLIVAN, quartermaster-general to Prince Charles Edward, ii. 922, 930, 946, 952.

OSWALD, i. 49.

OTTERBURN, BATTLE OF, i. 234.

OTTERBURN, SIR ADAM, i. 477, 453.

OXBURGH, COLONEL, ii. 865. A bill of high treason found against, 877. Found guilty, ib. Executed at Tyburn, ib.

OXFORD publishes an answer to the petition of the Puritans, ii. 468.

P.

PADUA, H. 379, 383.

PAGET, CHARLES, conspires against Elizabeth, ii. 219.

PAISLEY, ABBEY OF, Cluniac monks at, i. 167. Robert III. buried in, 260. Noticed, 385; ii. 851, 854. Prince Charles Edward levies a contribution on, 941.

PAISLEY, ABBOT OF, i. 384, 429, 661.

PALATINE, ELECTOR, marries Elizabeth, daughter of James VI., ii. 408. Driven into exile, 412. Receives assistance from James VI., ib. Anxiety of Charles I. for his restoration, 505. English and Scottish parliaments promise assistance to, 597.

PALESTINE, David, Earl of Huntingdon, sails for, i. 71. Edward I. commands his heart to be sent to, 126. Robert Bruce wishes his heart deposited in the Holy Sepulchre in, 163. David II. meditates an expedition to, 212. Intended expedition of James IV. to, 400.

PANMURE, Lord, joins the Jacobites in 1715, ii. 848, 868.

PANTER, DAVID, Bishop of Ross, ii. 661.

PANTER, PATRICK, his mission to France, i. 419.

PAPISTS. [See ROMAN CATHOLICS.]

PAPPENHEIM, evacuates Magdeburgh, ii. 505.

PARIS, treaty of, i. 107. Scottish college established at, 176, 278. James V. married at, 460.

PARIS, MATTHEW, quoted, i. 75, 222.

PARIS, EDWARD, an Englishman, suspected of blowing up Douglas Castle, ii. 555.

PARIS, FRENCH. [See HUBERT.]

PARLIAMENT, assembled at Scone, i. 81, 82, 90. Treats with France, and renounces fealty to Edward I., ib. Held at Berwick by Edward, 92. Submission of, to him, ib. Assembled at St. Andrews, 109. Assembled at Scone, 148. Held at Cambus Kenneth, 156. Held at Dairsie, 19. Held at Edinburgh, 201. Held at Scone, 203, 205. Held at Inchmurtach, 205. Held at Perth, 206. Held at Scone, and its measures, 208, 209, 211. Innovations on the constitution of, ib. Origin of, 213. First admission of representatives of burghs, ib. Review of its proceedings, 214. Meets at Scone, and its enactments, 245. Meets at Perth, 260. Frequent meetings of, 262. Held at Inverness, 264. Enactments of, in 1429 to 1431, 265. Principle of representation in, 266. Enactments of, in 1449, 328, 329. Meets at Edinburgh, 1452, 334. Prorogued meeting, 339. Proceedings in 1456, 341. Proceedings in 1458, 342. Proceedings in 1466, 348. Proceedings in 1469, 350. Proceedings in 1485, 359. Proceedings in 1487, 360. Meeting in 1488, 379. Proceedings in 1490, 383. Proceedings in 1493, 385. Meeting at Edinburgh, 1503, 393. Meeting at Perth, 411. Reply to the demands of Henry VIII., 418. Declares war, 425. Proclaims majority of James V., 435. Summoned by him, 441. Institutes college of justice, 447. Assembled in 1543, 569. Reply of, to Henry's proposals, 570. Ambassadors appointed, and other proceedings, 571. Meeting in December, 1543, 581. Meeting in 1544, 585. Rival meeting, 586. Meeting in December, 1544, and April, 1545, 587. Rejects Henry's proposals, 590.

Meeting at Stirling, 593. Meeting in July, 1549, 613. Meeting in December, 1566, 622. Meets on 1st August, 1560, 647. Proceedings of, 648. Petitioned to abolish popery, ib. Establishes protestantism, and abolishes popery, 649, 692. Severity of, against catholics, 649. Meeting in January, 1561, 653. Invites Mary to Scotland, ib. Meeting in May, 1563, 717. Assembled by Moray, ii. 80. Assembled by Lennox, 129. Assembled by Kirkaldy, 130. Confirms Morton's election, 142. Meeting at Edinburgh, confirms treaty of Perth, and peace with England, 143. Place of meeting changed, 156. Meeting at Stirling Castle, 156. Meeting at Edinburgh, 162. Confirms immunities bestowed on Lennox and Arran, 175. Meeting in 1584; enactments against the clergy, 194. Meeting at Linlithgow, 213. Meeting in 1587, 331, 361. Opposition of the nobles in, to the king, 411. Held in Edinburgh, 413. Alarm occasioned by proceedings of, 423. Ratification of the changes made by the General Assembly at Glasgow, 481. Held in the Tolbooth, Edinburgh, 507. Opposition of, to Charles I., ib. Falsification of the record of, 508. Meeting and prorogation of, 558. Alteration in its constitution, ib. Prorogation of, 569. The Long, held, 591. Extended powers of the, ib. Citizens of London petition, 593. Held in 1641, 595. Ratification of the acts of 1640 refused by, 596. Encroachment of the king on the privileges of, ib. Resolves to assist the Elector Palatine, 597. Meetings of, at Stirling and Perth, 626. Resolves upon war, 643. Remonstrates with the English on behalf of Charles I., 649. Meets after a lapse of eight years, 701. Dissolution of, 705. Meeting of, ib. Its servility to the king, 717. Proceedings in 1685, 731; and in 1686, 737. With regard to the church, 752, 753. Oath of assurance appointed by, 761. The union discussed by, 770. Proceedings of, in 1693, 793; and in 1695, 804. Examines into the massacre of Glencoe, ib. Disent of several members, 814. Demand for a new, 815. Division among the members, 817. Proceedings of, regarding the union, 818. Last meeting of held, 3rd October, 1706, 823. Petitions to, against the union, 825.

PARLIAMENT, ENGLISH, Boliol appears before, i. 89. Held at Carlisle, 102. Held at Lincoln, 106. Answer of, to the papal bull, ib. Held in 1315, 140. Treaty of, for a perpetual peace with Scotland, 161. Suspects Charles I. of instigating the Irish rebellion, ii. 600. Discontented state of, 603. Discussion between the two houses, 604. Measures adopted by, against the king, 605. Applies to Scotland for aid, 607. Solemn league and covenant ratified by, 609. Presbytery partially established by, 612. Army remodelled by, 630. Propositions of, rejected by Charles, 640. Preliminary conditions required by, ib. Reply of Charles to, 641. Resolutions of, against further addresses to the king, ib. Declaration of, against the king, 642. Invades Scotland, 661. Summoned by Richard Cromwell, 678. The Rump, reassembling of, 679. Resolves to restore Charles II., 681. Passes a bill in favour of the union, 816. Proceedings of, with regard to the treaty of union, 829.

PARLIAMENT, BRITISH, first session of, ii. 831. Proceedings of, with regard to the forfeited estates of the Scottish nobility, 881. Measures adopted by to secure the tranquillity of the kingdom in 1745, 912. Measures of, to prevent future Jacobite insurrections, 957.

PARMA, DUKE OF, ii. 332. Intrigues with the Scottish papists, 334.

PARRY, DR. WILLIAM, a Welshman, conspires against Elizabeth, ii. 204. Put to death, ib.

PATERSON, WILLIAM, supposed originator of the Bank of England, ii. 807. His connection with the Darien scheme, ib. Death and character, 812.

PATRONAGE, change of the law, ii. 755. Abolished, 795. Restoration of, in 1712, 890. Appeals against, 891. Injurious influence of, upon the church, ib.

PATKIN, MR., historian of the rebellion of 1715, his sermon to the insurgents, ii. 859.

PAUL, MR., a bonjouring clergyman, executed at Tyburn, ii. 877.

PAUL, SIR AMIAS, cruelty of, to Mary, ii. 229. Rejects proposals to murder her, 233.

PAYNE, NEVILLE, imprisonment and torture of, ii. 796.

PEATES, OF PEASE, BRIDGE, i. 606; ii. 662.

PEDDY, ALEXANDER, a Cameronian minister, ii. 729.

PEEBLES, i. 217, 218; ii. 629.

PEEBLES, MONASTERY OF, i. 168.

“PEEBLES TO THE PLAY,” a humorous poem by James I., i. 288, 304.

“PEEBLES, THREE PRIESTS OF,” the three tales of the, i. 375.

PEERS, SCOTCH, ii. 840, and note, ib.

PEKLEVÉ, Bishop of Amiens, i. 688.

PEMBROKE, AYMER DE VALENCE, EARL OF, defeated by Wallace, i. 98. Appointed Guardian of Scotland, 115. Defeats Bruce at the battle of Methven, 116, 122. Retires to Carlisle, 124. Again invades Scotland, ib. Defeated at the battle of Lucdon Hill, ib. Deprived of his office, 125. At the battle of Bannockburn, 136. Appointed Warden of England, 140.

PEMBROKE, EARL OF, ii. 106.

PEMBROKE CASTLE, siege of, ii. 644.

PENNYTH, i. 227. Jacobite army at in 1745, ii. 939.

PEPSYIAN LIBRARY, Cambridge, ii. 299.

PERCY, ALAN DE, i. 62.

PERCY, HENRY, invades Scotland, i. 95.

PERCY, HENRY, i. 161. His Scottish estates restored, 184. Receives instructions to keep the Marches for Edward III., ib. Assists Edward Boliol against the Scots, 197. Appointed to treat with William Douglas, 198. Negotiates at Berwick for the freedom of David II., 202.

PERCY, HENRY, surnamed Hotspur, invades Scotland, i. 225. Forced

- to retreat, 226. Besieges Berwick, ib. His encounter with Douglas, 233. Taken prisoner at the battle of Otterburn, 234. Gains the battle of Homildon Hill, 247. Conspires against Henry IV., 248. Slain at the battle of Shrewsbury, ib.
- PERCY, HENRY, son of Hotspur, takes refuge in the Castle of St. Andrew's, i. 249. Kindness shown by the Scots to, 254. Obtains his freedom, ib.
- PERCY, SIR RALPH, taken prisoner by the Scots at Otterburn, i. 234.
- PERCY, SIR HENRY, i. 630, 631, 635.
- PERCY, HENRY, Earl of Northumberland. [See NORTHUMBERLAND.]
- PERCY, DR., quoted, i. 314, 583.
- PERINGHEE, quoted, i. 650.
- PERSECUTION in Scotland, ii. 403, 698, 706, 717, 726, 728, 739.
- PERTH, captured by Robert Bruce, i. 129. Taken by Edward Balliol, 185. Recaptured by Keith, &c., 186. Siege of, 195. Embraces the reformed opinions, 627. Destruction of monasteries at, 628. Given up to the queen-regent, 629. Taken by the Reformers, 630. Treaty of, between the king's and the queen's party, ii. 142. Gowrie conspiracy at, 384. Surrenders to Montrose, 619. James VIII. proclaimed at, 848. Occupied by Mar in 1715, 853. Prince Charles Edward enters, 920, 936. Duke of Cumberland fixes his head-quarters at, 946.
- PERTH, MONASTERY of, the Dominicans or Black Friars at, i. 271. James I. murdered in, 271, 272. James I. buried in, 274. Margaret, Queen of James IV., buried in, 457. Carthusian church at, destroyed, 628.
- PERTH, NORTH INCH of, battles on, i. 239, 323.
- PERTH, "ARTICLES OF," confirmed by parliament, ii. 413, 487. Nature of the, ib. Strife occasioned by, ib. Rigid enforcement of, 488. Effects of, ib.
- PERTH, EARL OF, appointed Justice-general, ii. 720. Cruelty of, 721. Office of chancellor bestowed upon, 725. Apostasy of, 737. Flight and capture of, at the Revolution, 743.
- PERTH, DUKE OF, ii. 852. Joins Prince Charles Edward, 919. Noticed, 923, 925, note. At the battle of Preston, 925. One of Charles Edward's council, 930. Appointed general of the Jacobite army, 935. Besieges Carlisle, ib. Quarrel of, with Lord George Murray, 936. Resigns his appointment, ib. At the battle of Culloden, 950. Dies on his way to France, 952.
- PETERBOROUGH, DEAN OF, his address to Queen Mary at her execution, ii. 236.
- PHILIP IV., of France, Edward I. marries his sister, i. 103. Disputes with Edward concerning Balliol and the Scots, ib. Furnishes Wallace with credentials to his agents at Rome, ib. Attempts to procure Balliol's freedom, ib. His treaty with Edward, 107. Treachery to the Scots, ib. Mediates between England and Scotland, 128.
- PHILIP VI., of France, endeavours to mediate between England and Scotland, i. 190. Edward III. declares war with, 192, 197.
- PHILIP, THE FORESTER of PLATANE, takes the Castle of Forfar from the English, i. 126.
- PHILIP II., of Spain, promises to assist Mary, ii. 174. Intrigues with the Scottish Catholics, 203, 334, 340, 360. Prepares to invade Britain, 331.
- PHILIPPAUGH, BATTLE OF, ii. 629. Trial and execution of the principal prisoners taken at the, ib.
- PHILIPPA, Queen of Edward III. of England, i. 187.
- PHILLIPS, THOMAS, an agent of Walsingham, assists in detecting conspirators against Elizabeth, ii. 219, 220.
- PHILPOT, JOHN, a London merchant, i. 226.
- PICETS, THE, i. 23, 24. Chronological table of the kings of, 25. Conversion of, to Christianity, ib. Civil wars and defeat of, 27. Invade Loth, 30. Alliance with Achaia, and union of the crowns of the Scots, ib. Mode of choosing kings, 31. Laws, &c., 32. Territories of the, ib. Noticed, 39. Monasteries founded by, 53. Noticed, 61, note. Language of the, 289.
- PIMANTA, DON JUAN, ii. 811.
- PINCERNA, the office of, i. 173.
- PINKERTON, quoted, i. 38, 234, 251, 275, 280, 288, 326, 359, 374, 380, 399, 424, 458, 532; ii. 299, 300.
- PINKETON, CAPTAIN, one of the Darton colonists, ii. 810.
- PINKIE, BATTLE OF, i. 607, 608. Prisoners, and slain, 610.
- PIPERDEN, skirmish at, i. 268.
- PIPERAINE, DR. ARCHIBALD, ii. 971, note ib.
- PITKININ, LORD, opposes the repeal of the penal laws in 1687, ii. 738.
- PITSCOTTIE, LANDSAY OF, quoted, i. 377, 378, 380, 383, 397, 401, 403, 404, 408, note, 420, 438.
- PITSLIGO, LORD, joins Prince Charles Edward, ii. 930, 933. Appointed colonel of the Angus Horse, 935. At the battle of Falkirk, 943. Takes refuge in Norway, 952.
- PITTARROW, LAIRD OF, ii. 8.
- PITTENWEEM, i. 167.
- PITTENWEEM, THE PRIOR OF, i. 450.
- PITTENWEEM, PRIORY OF, ii. 80.
- PLAGUE, in Scotland, i. 96, 200, 267, 320, 540; ii. 372. In London, 402. In Edinburgh, 415.
- PLEAN MOOR, Jacobite army at in 1745, ii. 942.
- PLINT, quoted, i. 13.
- PLUSCARDIN, PRIORY OF, i. 168.
- PLUTO, summons of, before Ffodden, i. 404.
- POETRY OF THE EARLY AGES, i. 289, 315.
- POICTIERS, BISHOP OF, i. 269.
- POLE, RICHARD DE LA, claims the English crown, i. 427.
- POLLOCK, LAIRD OF, taken prisoner by Dundee, i. 782.
- POLMAIS-THORN, murder of Alan Stewart at, i. 318.
- POLWARTH, LAIRD OF, ii. 492, 497.
- POLWARTH, CHURCH OF, ii. 767.
- POLWARTH, HUME OF. [See HUME, SIR PATRICK.]
- POLWARTH, LORD, at the proclamation of George I. in Edinburgh, ii. 842. Raises a reinforcement in 1715, 852.
- PONT, ROBERT, appointed a member of a deputation to admonish James VI., ii. 183. Protests against Arran's enactments, and flight of, 195. Dissents from the deed of assembly respecting Archbishop Adamson, 431. The bishopric of Calthness offered to, 433.
- "PONTIUS ET SIDOYNE," romance of, i. 274.
- POPES. [See ROME, COURTS OF.]
- PORTHOES, CAPTAIN, his conduct at the execution of Wilson, ii. 886. Trial and imprisonment of, ib. Seizure and execution of, by the Edinburgh mob, 887.
- PORTFIELD OF DUCHAL, trial of, ii. 725.
- PORTMOAK, MONASTERY OF, i. 63. Noticed, ii. 896.
- PORTUGUESE, vessels captured by the Bartons, i. 397.
- POST NATI, privileges of the, ii. 402.
- POTTERY in the early ages, i. 19.
- POULTRY, i. 181.
- POWRIE, WILLIAM, share of, in murder of Darnley, ii. 45, 46. Sent to Castle of Hermitage, 50. Trial of, 82.
- POYNINGS, SIR EDWARD, governor of Ireland, i. 387.
- POYNTEZ, COLONEL, ii. 632.
- PRÆMONSTRATENSIAN MONKS, i. 167. Adam, a canon of the order of, 176.
- PRAGUE, the reformers of, i. 277.
- PRAGUE, BATTLE OF, i. 412.
- PRESBYTERIANS. [See PROTESTANT PARTY, also CLERGY, SCOTTISH PROTESTANTS.]
- PRESSER, WILLIAM DE, captures the Earl of Moray, i. 191.
- PRESTON, MID-LOTHIAN, the queen-regent and the reformers negotiate at, i. 631. Battle of, ii. 926.
- PRESTON, LANCASHIRE, the Scots defeated by Cromwell at, ii. 644. Taken by the Jacobites in 1715, 862. Assaulted by the royalists, 863. Surrender of the Jacobites at, 865. Trial and execution of prisoners taken at, 875. Entry into, of Prince Charles Edward, 937.
- PRESTON, a favourite of James III., executed, i. 355.
- PRESTON OF CRAIGHILLAR, sent to Scotland as commissioner from Queen Mary, i. 664.
- PRESTON, DR., ii. 158.
- PRESTON, CAPTAIN, his mission to Elizabeth, ii. 391.
- PRESTON, GENERAL, ii. 927, 931, note.
- PRESTON-PANS, i. 606.
- PRETENDER, THE. [See JAMES VIII. and PRINCE CHARLES EDWARD.]
- PRIDE'S PERCE, i. 646.
- PRIESTHILL, murder of John Brown at, ii. 729.
- PRINROSE, SIR ARCHIBALD, ii. 627, 682, 687.
- PRINTING introduced, i. 475.
- PROTESTANTS, party of the, in Scotland [see REFORMATION, REFORMERS, AND MINISTERS], collision of, with the catholics, i. 626. Letters from, to the regent, nobility, and prelates, 628. They invest Perth, 630. Enter Stirling, secure Linlithgow, and take possession of Edinburgh, ib. Letter to Cecil from, 632. Letter from Cecil to, ib. Truce of, with the regent, ib. Interview of, with Chatehault and Huntley, ib. Evacuate Edinburgh, ib. Measures of, and union with Arran, 633. Advance to Edinburgh, 637. Appoint councils, ib. Reply to regent's message, and assault Leith, 638. Defeated and dispersed, 639. Assume the whole authority of the kingdom, 641. Conference of, with Norfolk at Berwick, ib. Treaty of, with England; assault Leith; joined by Huntley; attempted negotiation with, 642. Conclude treaty with France, 645. Treaty of Berwick confirmed, 649. Covenant subscribed by, 678. Formation of congregations, 679, 680. Petition of, to the queen-regent, 679. Proposals by, to the regent, 681. Conference of, at Preston with her, 687. Their Confession of Faith, 691. Views of, on the subject of Mary's marriage, 744. Apprehensions of, 760. Supplication of, to the council, ii. 1. Collision of with Mary, 13. Demands of, 23. Differences with the catholics in regard to persecutions, 29. Deputation of, to James VI. on the trial of the popish lords, 355. Intolerance of the, 357. The king deserts the cause of the, 403. Attachment of the, to the policy of the Presbyterian church, 429. Apprehensions of the, from the Spanish Armada, 435. The king becomes favourably disposed towards the, 441. Policy of the, restored by act of parliament, 442. Conspiracy for the overthrow of the, 445. Displeased at the king's levity to the popish lords, 447. Duplicity of the king towards, 469. His severe treatment of the, 488, 489. Policy of Charles I. towards, 502, 512. Opposition of the, to the book of canons, 515. Revive the national covenant, 526. Apprehensions of, from the Romanists, 599. Claims of the, upon the gratitude of Charles II., 682. Schemes of Charles against, 688. Laws passed against, 693. Views of the extreme, 715. Partial indulgence extended to, by James VII., 739. Noticed, 742. Support William of Orange, 744. Effect of the revolution upon the, 750. Proceedings of parliament with regard to, 752. Dissensions among, 792.
- "PYLLUS," work by Adamson in defence of episcopacy, ii. 439, 440.
- PURITANS, ii. 399. Hostility of James VI. to, 469, 479.
- PYM, MR., ii. 580. Impeaches the Earl of Strafford, 592.

Q.

"QUAIR KING'S," a poem by James I., described, i. 299—303.

QUEEN OF MAY, proscribed, i. 620.

QUEENSBERRY, LORD, at the battle of Newburn, ii. 584.

QUEENSBERRY, DUKE OF, presides as justice-general at the trial of the Earl of Argyll, ii. 719. Created lord-treasurer, 720. Appointed Scottish commissioner, 731. Dismissed from office, 737, 738. Intrigues with the Jacobites, 795.

QUEENSBERRY, DUKE OF, noticed, ii. 512. Appointed commissioner by Queen Anne, 814. Reappointed, 823. Speech in the last Scottish parliament, ib. Jacobite intrigues betrayed on, 823, 834.

QUEENSFERRY, II. 343, 346, 670.
QUEENE, or Scottish handmill, I. 19.
QUEHELE. [See CHATTEN CLAN.]
QUINCIES, DE, THE, I. 65.
QUINCY, ROGER DE, Earl of Winchester, I. 73.
QUYNTINE, a poet, I. 525.

R.

RAASY, ISLAND OF, Prince Charles Edward takes refuge in, II. 953.
 "RABBLINGS" of the curates, I. 745.
RACHIRIN, THE ISLE OF, Robert Bruce takes refuge in, I. 119.
RADCLIFFE, CHARLES, a Jacobite leader, II. 860.
RAGMAN, ROLL THE, I. 162.
RAID OF RUTHVEN, II. 178. Of the Abbey, 342. Of Falkland, 345. Of Reidswire, 498. Of Carey, 500.
RALGH, SIR WALTER, II. 394. Plot of, 401. Execution of, 402.
RAMBOUILLET DE, mission of, II. 28.
RAMBOURGN, SIR JOHN, character of, I. 245. His quarrel with the Duke of Rothesay, 246. He assists in his murder, ib.
RAMSAY, SIR ALEXANDER, exploits of, I. 193, 194. Murder of, by the Black Knight of Liddesdale, 196, II. 493.
RAMSAY, WILLIAM, of Dalhousie, I. 201.
RAMSAY, ALEXANDER, captures Berwick, I. 226.
RAMSAY, JOHN, of Balmain, a favourite of James III., I. 356.
RAMSAY, ALEXANDER, at capture of Dunbarton Castle, II. 127.
RAMSAY, JOHN, comes to aid of the king at Gowrie House, I. 387.
RAMSAY, COLONEL, II. 790.
RAMSAY, author of the History of Turenne, II. 971.
RANDOLPH, SIR THOMAS, letter of, to Cecil, I. 720. Presses Elizabeth to decision on Mary's marriage, 729. Interviews of, with Mary at St. Andrew's, 730. Letter of, to Cecil, 736. His account of state parties, 737. Misrepresentations of, 743, 748. Makes known plot against Riccio, 759. Sent as ambassador to Scotland after death of Moray, II. 117. Files to Berwick, 119. Ordered to return to Edinburgh, 120. Letter of, to Kirkcaldy of Grange, 121. Again sent to Scotland, 151. Again sent, on trial of Morton, 168. Interview of, with James, ib. Applies to parliament, 169. Secret measures of, ib. Flight of, 170. Embassy of, to conclude treaty, 214.
RANDOLPH, THOMAS, Earl of Moray. [See MORAY.] RATCLIFFE, JAMES, II. 932, note.
RATCLIFFE, SIR EGREMONT, II. 109, 110.
REAY, LORD, II. 627, 654.
REAY, LORD, IN 1745, II. 933.
RED FRIARS, monasteries belonging to the, I. 168.
RED ROVER. [See DE LONGUEVILLE.]
REDMAN, SIR MATTHEW, I. 235, 236.
REFORMATION, THE [See also PROTESTANT], progress of, in Scotland, I. 448, 465, 472. Henry VIII. endeavours to influence James V. in favour of, ib. Power of the church at the period of, 463. Queen Mary's connection with, 562. Favoured by Regent Arran, 564. Connection of Wishart's martyrdom with, 596, 662, also Beaton's murder, 598, 666. Attachment of Knox to, 603, 667. Policy of the queen-regent towards those in favour of, 619, 629. Knox determines to complete, 624. Important letters concerning, 630, 631. Elizabeth's views in connection with, 635. She assists the cause of, in Scotland, 637. Rapid progress of, 684. Establishment of, 697.
REGIAM MAJESTATEM, I. 215.
REID, ADAM, a reformer, defence of, I. 466.
REID, Bishop of Orkney, I. 569. Death of, 623.
REIDSWIRE, RAID OF, II. 498.
RELIGIOUS ESTABLISHMENTS in the sixth, twelfth, and fourteenth centuries, I. 48–59, 166–172.
RENT and value of land, I. 182.
RENWICK, JAMES, martyrdom of, II. 739.
RESBY, JOHN, a reformer, trial and execution of, I. 276.
RESTALING, I. 319; II. 383.
RHIEMS, ARCHBISHOP OF, I. 262, 269.
RHIEMS, Mary of Lorraine buried in the Monastery of St. Peter at, I. 644.
RHYMER, THOMAS THE, account of his poetry, I. 289–291.
RHYN, WILLIAM, tutor to the Earl of Gowrie, II. 380.
RICCIO, DAVID, I. 735. Origin of conspiracy against, 759. General dislike to, 761. Progress of plot against, 762. Murder of, and its effect, 764, 765. Advises Mary's accession to the Bayonne League, II. 28.
RICCIO, JOSEPH, succeeds his brother, I. 772. Mysterious incident connected with, II. 39, 40, 973. Supposed share in Darnley's murder, 50. Sets out for France, ib.
RICHARD I., CŒUR DE LION, relinquishes his claim of supremacy over Scotland, I. 70. His expedition to the Holy Land, ib.
RICHARD II., invades Scotland, I. 230. At a tournament between English and Scotch knights, 240. Deposed, 243. Supposed death of, ib. Mystery concerning, 244.
RICHARD III., I. 357. Concludes a truce with Scotland, 358. Slain at the battle of Bosworth, 359.
RICHARDSON, REY. ANDREW, II. 906.
RICHMOND, DUKE OF, II. 574, 649.
RICHMOND, PALACE OF, [See HENRY VII., of England.]
RICHMOND, PALACE OF, I. 390, 392. Death of Queen Elizabeth at, II. 396, 397.
RIDDELS, THE, I. 65.
 "RIGHT, CLAIM OF," II. 749.
ROB ROY. [See MACGREGOR.]
ROBERT I. [See BRUCE.]
ROBERT II., birth of, I. 143. Accession of, 224. Coronation, family, and character, ib. Treaty with France, ib. Resignation of the government, and death of, 236, 237.

ROBERT III., succeeds to the throne, I. 238. Amiable conduct of, 243. Death and character of, 250.
ROBERTSON OF STOWAN, I. 412.
ROBERTSON, PRINCIPAL, quoted, II. 48. His influence in the church, 906, 907.
ROGERS, a musician, a favourite of James III., I. 362. Murder of, 355.
ROLAND OF GALLOWAY, I. 69.
ROLAND, JOHN, works of, II. 309.
ROLLO, LORD, attends the Jacobite gathering at Braemar, II. 846. Imprisonment and liberation of, 877.
ROLLO, younger, of Powburn, joins Prince Charles Edward, II. 924.
ROMANS, first landing of, I. 1. Final departure of, 8.
ROME, alleged visit of Wallace to, I. 103. Pilgrimage of William, Earl of Douglas, to, 330. Prince Charles Edward leaves, II. 912. Death of Charles at, 955.
ROME, church and court of, Scotland excommunicated by, I. 72, 171. Noticed, 73, 74, 170, 603; II. 108, 110, 238, 246, 329, 331, 357, 367, 702. Grant given to Henry III. by, I. 76. Balliol delivered up to, ib. Interferes with Edward I. in behalf of the Scots, 105, 106. The Scots deserted by, 107. Excommunicates Bruce and his adherents, 116, 119. Again interferes between the Scotch and English, 145. Prudent conduct of Bruce towards, 146. Bruce negotiates with, 149. Memorial from the Scottish barons to, 152. Embassy of Randolph to, 156, 175. Margaret Logie appeals to, 212. Position of the Scottish clergy in connection with, 275. Sanctions the University of St. Andrew's, 278. Appeal of James IV. to, 384. Embassy from, to James, 396. League of, against France, 399. Legate sent from, to negotiate with James V., 449. Cardinal Beaton's connection with, 454. His visit to, 457. Measures adopted to resist the encroachments of, upon the church, 463. Beaton supports, 583, 662. Effect of Beaton's murder, upon the cause of, 598. Opposition of Knox to, 624, 668. Effect of the queen-regent's policy upon, 625. Support given to, by the House of Guise, ib. Elizabeth's opposition to, 626. Opposition of the congregation to, 628. Temporising policy of Elizabeth with regard to, 635. Power of, abolished by parliament, 648, 692; II. 81. Schemes of the Guises in connection with, I. 651. Envoy sent from, to Mary at Rhilms, 655. Earl of Arran joins, 661. Controversy and measures of reformation among clergy of, 673. Letter of Knox against, 675. Reformers withdraw from the rites of, 678. Moderate conduct of the reformers towards, 686. Errors of, exposed by the Reformers, 690. Cause of, supported by Mary, 700, 760; II. 2, 24. Trial of several adherents of, 14. League in favour of, 28. Effect of Riccio's death upon, 30. Intrigue of Darnley with, 31. Excommunication of Elizabeth by, 117. Promises to aid the Duke of Norfolk, 132. Connection of, with the massacre of St. Bartholomew, 135, 263. Bishop of Ross intrigues on behalf of, 159. Lennox abjures the errors of, 163, 279. James VI. unites with, to secure Mary's liberty, 167. Intrigues of, in behalf of Mary, 174. Conspiracy of, against Elizabeth, 196. League of, against the Protestants, 203. Ballard's scheme in connection with, 217. George Buchanan's satire against the, 291. Supported by Bishop Lesley, 296. Renewed intrigues of, 334, 339, 346, 437. Connection of, with "the Spanish Blanks," 347. James corresponds with, 376. Opposes James, 395. Toleration shown towards, by James, 414. Supported by Charles I., 502. Supposed connection of, with the Irish massacre, 599, 603. Supported by Charles II., 682. James VII. endeavours to establish, 737, 738. Outrages perpetrated against, 742. Support given to the Jacobites by, 862, 909, 933.
RONALD OF THE ISLES, murder of, I. 197.
ROSBERTY, EARL OF, II. 842.
ROSES, WARS OF THE, I. 344.
ROSLIN, defeat of Edward at, I. 107. Noticed, II. 688.
ROSS, Macbeth Maormor of, I. 38. Insurrection in, 70. Subdued by the Norwegians, 46. Noticed, 393.
ROSS, WILLIAM DE, competitor for the crown, I. 87.
ROSS, EARL OF, I. 66, 467, note.
ROSS, EARL OF, at the taking of Dunbar, I. 91. Submits to Edward I., ib.
ROSS, EARL OF, in 1306 betrays Bruce's family, I. 118.
ROSS, HUGH, EARL OF, slain at Halidon Hill, I. 188.
ROSS, EARL OF, in 1339 at the siege of Perth, I. 195.
ROSS, EARL OF, his feud with Ronald of the Isles, I. 197.
ROSS, EARL OF, rebellion of, I. 209. Submits to David II., 210.
ROSS, EARL OF, I. 242.
ROSS, ALEXANDER, EARL OF, I. 252.
ROSS, EARLDOM OF, claimed by Donald of the Isles, I. 252. Annexed to the crown, 351.
ROSS, EARL OF, treason of against James II., I. 332. Summoned to appear before parliament, 334. [See ALEXANDER, LORD OF THE ISLES.]
ROSS, JOHN, EARL OF, leagues with the Earl of Douglas, I. 339. Submits to James II., 342.
ROSS, DONALD, EARL OF, rebellion of, I. 347. Fate of, ib.
ROSS, JOHN, EARL OF, rebellion of, I. 351.
ROSS, JAMES STEWART, MARQUIS OF ORMOND, DUKE OF, son of James III., I. 361. Secret plot against, 383.
ROSS, ALEXANDER STEWART, DUKE OF, I. 415. His death, 417.
ROSS, LORD, taken prisoner at the battle of Langside, II. 84. Noticed, 118.
ROSS, LORD, conspiracy of, and correspondence with James VII., II. 793. Betrays his associates, 795. His interview with Queen Mary, ib.

- ROSS, SIR WALTER, slain at Bannockburn, i. 138.
- ROSS, SIR JOHN, of Halket, i. 327.
- ROSS, SIR JOHN, i. 525.
- ROSS, JOHN, a Highland chieftain, i. 264.
- ROSS, BISHOP OF, i. 249.
- ROSS, LESLEY, BISHOP OF, his mission to Queen Mary at Rheims, i. 654, 655. Noticed, ii. 21, 32, 101, 117, 123, 168. At the baptism of James VI., 38. Signs the bond for Bothwell's marriage with Mary, 53. Adheres to the cause of Mary, 63. Forfeited, 90. Chosen commissioner by Mary, ib. His interview with the queen, 91. His mission to London, 94. His interview with Mary at Tutbury, 102. Favours the scheme of Mary's marriage with the Duke of Norfolk, 105. Proposals made by, to Elizabeth, ib., 106. Co-operates in the rebellion of the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, 109. Protests against Regent Moray's proceedings, 113. Remonstrates with Elizabeth against invading Scotland, 118. Negotiates on behalf of Mary, 120. Indignation of at the treachery of Elizabeth, 125. Assists the King of Spain in corresponding with Mary, 133. Committed to the Tower, ib. Commanded to leave the kingdom, ib. Intrigues on behalf of Mary, 159. Sketch of, 296, 297. Reinstated by James VI., 329. [See also LESLEY, JOHN.]
- ROSS, DAVID PANTER, BISHOP OF. [See PANTER.]
- ROSS, DAVID LINDRAY, BISHOP OF, ii. 467.
- ROSS, BISHOP OF, ii. 531, 563.
- ROSS, HENRY SINCLAIR, BISHOP OF, and dean of Glasgow, i. 470, 620. Acquires Knox, 720; ii. 18.
- ROSS, EUPHEMIA, wife of Randolph, Earl of Moray, afterwards married to Robert II., i. 224, 270, 321.
- ROSS, EUPHEMIA, wife of Sir Walter Lesley, i. 252.
- ROSS, EUPHEMIA, daughter of Alexander, Earl of, i. 252.
- ROSS, COUNTERS OF, imprisoned, i. 264.
- ROSS, COUNT OF, protected by James II., i. 340.
- ROTHES, EARL OF, slain at the battle of Flodden, i. 407.
- ROTHES, NORMAN LESLEY, MASTER OF. [See LESLEY.]
- ROTHES, EARL OF, his embassy to France, i. 622. Death of, 623.
- ROTHES, EARL OF, i. 649. Assists in the conspiracy against Riccio, 762. Noticed, 769. Pardoned by Queen Mary, 771.
- ROTHS, EARL OF, a member of an association against Lennox and Arran, ii. 178. Noticed, 185. Aids James VI. to escape from the Gowrie faction, 187. Chosen councillor, ib. Taken prisoner by the rebel lords, 212.
- ROTHES, EARL OF, opposes Charles I. in parliament, ii. 507, 508. Insulted by Charles, ib., 526. Petition presented to Charles, by, 509. Noticed, 510, 533, 536, 541. Letters from, to the Scottish noblemen, 532. One of a deputation to the Marquis of Hamilton, 534. Petitions for a warrant to accuse the bishops, 544. Proceedings of, in the General Assembly, 547. Protest of, against the decision of the commissioner, 550. His correspondence with Hamilton, 558. Appointed commissioner, 562. His interview with Charles, ib. Signs a letter to the King of France, 573. Appointed to meet the English commissioners at Ripon, 589. Deserts the cause of the covenanters, 595.
- ROTHES, EARL OF, at the coronation of George I. in Edinburgh, ii. 842. Noticed, 859.
- ROTHES, EARL AND DUKE OF, taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, ii. 672. Noticed, 677. Appointed president of the council, 682. His mission to London, 684. Views of, respecting the Scottish Church, 687. Dismissed from office, 699. Perjury of, 707. Excommunicated, ii. 716. Death of, 720.
- ROTHESAY, DAVID STEWART, EARL OF CARRICK, DUKE OF, character of, i. 241. Appointed king's lieutenant, ib. His marriage, 242. Defends Edinburgh Castle against the English, 244. Reckless conduct of, 245. Conspiracy against, 246. Imprisonment and death of, ib. Albany accused of his murder, ib. [See Appendix to vol. I., note R.]
- ROTHESAY, JAMES STEWART, DUKE OF. [See JAMES IV.]
- ROTHESAY CASTLE, i. 189. Taken by the Earl of Lennox, 586.
- ROTHESAY, BARON, his quarrel with Frendraught, ii. 504. [See also Appendix to vol. II. Note G.]
- ROUGHI, JOHN, one of the chaplains of Regent Arran, i. 660.
- ROW, JOHN, ii. 23, 25. Draws up assembly's reply to Mary, 387. Discussion of, on episcopal functions, ib.
- ROWARDENNAK, ii. 854.
- ROWL, SIR JOHN, a Scotch poet, i. 525.
- ROXBURGH, i. 61, 72, 76, 104, 108. Convent of Franciscan friars at, 168. Schools and churches of, 176. Noticed, 217. Burned by the Earl of March, 225. Again burned by the Scots, 251.
- ROXBURGH CASTLE, surrendered to Henry II. of England, i. 68. Restored by Richard I., 70. Given up to Edward I., 92. Besieged by Wallace, 99. Taken by Sir James Douglas, 130. Bailiiff takes possession of, 187. Surrendered to Edward III., 199. Besieged by Regent Albany, 254. Besieged by James I., 269. James II. killed at the siege of, 346. Protector Somerset builds a new fort upon the site of, 611.
- ROXBURGH, EARL OF, ii. 523. Letter of, to Charles I., 530. Appointed lord privy seal, 598.
- ROXBURGH, DUKE OF, Scottish Secretary of State, dismissed from office, ii. 885.
- RUBAY, MONS. DE, i. 619.
- RUFUS, WILLIAM, his dispute with Malcolm Canmore, i. 40.
- RULLION GRKEN, battle of, ii. 696. Cruel treatment of prisoners taken at, ib.
- RUMBOLD, an Englishman, his connection with the Rye House Plot and Argyll's invasion, ii. 735. Trial and execution of, ib.
- RUMP, THE. [See PARLIAMENT.]
- RUPERT, PRINCE, ii. 613. At the battle of Marston Moor, ib., 614.
- Retires into Lancashire, ib. Conduct of, at the battle of Naseby, 631. Occupies Bristol, ib. Ordered to leave the country, 632.
- RUSSET, JEROME, a reformer, i. 453. Burned, 464.
- RUSSEL, LORD, death of, ii. 208.
- RUSSELL, LORD WILLIAM, execution of, ii. 722.
- RUSSELL, ADMIRAL, ii. 803.
- RUTHERFORD, REV. SAMUEL, ii. 579. At the Westminster Assembly, 610. His death, 687.
- RUTHERGLEN, ii. 84, 711.
- RUTHVEN, SIR WILLIAM, Sheriff of Perth, slain, i. 323.
- RUTHVEN, LORD, joins James III. against the rebellious nobles, i. 362. Slain at Sauchieburn, 363.
- RUTHVEN, LORD, in 1515, i. 416.
- RUTHVEN, LORD, appointed one of Queen Mary's guardians, i. 571. Chosen councillor, ib., 591. Nights with Lord Gray for the provostship of Perth, 585, 586.
- RUTHVEN, PATRICK, LORD, Provost of Perth, answer to Mary of Guise, i. 627. Deserts her court, 629. Reinstated in his office, 630. Harasses the French, 640. Joins plot against Riccio, 759. Cruelty of, to Queen Mary, 765. Assists in the murder of Riccio, 767. His flight to Newcastle, 771. At the trial of Knox, ii. 17.
- RUTHVEN, WILLIAM, FOURTH LORD, pardoned by Queen Mary, ii. 39. Note, ib. Noticed, 45, 74. Joins confederacy against Bothwell, 58. One of the leaders of the confederate army, 65. Conducts Mary to Lochleven, 68. Chosen councillor, 153. Created Earl of Gowrie, 175. [See GOWRIE.]
- RUTHVEN, ALEXANDER, MASTER OF, ii. 379. His connection with the Gowrie conspiracy, 381. Entices James VI. into Gowrie House, 383. His remonstrance and struggle with James, 386. Is slain, 397.
- RUTHVEN, ANDREW, a retainer of Gowrie's, ii. 383. His connection with the Gowrie conspiracy, 384.
- RUTHVEN, ALEXANDER, ii. 388.
- RUTHVEN, VIOLET, conduct of when Gowrie was killed, ii. 388.
- RUTHVEN, HOUSE OF, ii. 388, note. Extirpated, 389, 390. Noticed, note, ib.
- RUTHVEN, RAID OF, ii. 178. Pronounced treason, 190. Noticed, 283.
- RUTHVEN, LORDS, THE, attempt to assassinate, ii. 180. Declaration of, 181. Obtain approval of General Assembly, 182. Obtain approval of Convention of Estates, 184. Noticed, 284.
- RUTHVEN, GENERAL, forfeited, ii. 576.
- RUTHVEN CASTLE, ii. 178, 187.
- RUTLAND, LORD, ii. 586.
- RYAN, LOCH, Robert Bruce's brothers defeated at, i. 120.
- RYCAUT, SIR PAUL, ii. 809.
- RYE HOUSE PLOT, arrest of the Scottish patriots implicated in the, ii. 722.

S.

- SABBATH BREAKING, ii. 324. Strict observance of, 967.
- SACHEVERELL, DR., ii. 774.
- SACROBORO, JOHANNES DE, or JOHN HOLYBUSH, i. 176.
- SADLER, SIR RALPH, embassy of, i. 461-464. Second embassy of, 468. Mission to Scotland in 1543, 569, 577. Mentioned, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 580, 590, 634. Letter of, to Henry, ib. Letter of, to Crichton, 595. Mission of, under Elizabeth, ii. 90, 137.
- SALBURY, MONTAGU, EARL OF, besieges Dunbar, i. 192, 193.
- SALBURY, EARL OF, i. 317, 326, 344.
- SALTOON, LORD, ii. 118.
- SALTOON, FLETCHER OF. [See FLETCHER.]
- SANDILANDS, SIR JOHN, of Calder, murdered, i. 331.
- SANDILANDS, SIR JAMES, of Calder, i. 472, 571. Embassy of, to France, 650, 696. Rescues James VI. at the "Raid of the Abbey," ii. 342.
- SANGHAR, LORD, heads confederates, ii. 65.
- SARK, BATTLE OF, i. 326.
- SATCRDAY, BLACK, ii. 414, 488.
- SACCHIEBURN, BATTLE OF, i. 363.
- SAVAGE, JOHN, plot of, ii. 217.
- SAVILLE, LORD, his letter to the Scottish army, ii. 580. Discovery of its forgery, 589.
- SAVOT, DUKE OF, i. 327.
- SAVOT, LOUISA OF, i. 434.
- SAXE, MARSHAL, ii. 912.
- SAXONS, THE, invade Lothian, i. 75.
- SAXONS, ANGLO, settlement of, in Scotland, i. 65.
- SAXONY, ELECTOR OF, his declaration in favour of the Swedes, ii. 605.
- SCARBOROUGH, EARL OF, Lord-lieutenant of Northumberland, ii. 856.
- SCHAW, SIR JAMES, of Sauchie, slain, i. 371.
- SCHAW, LADY, gallant conduct of, ii. 851.
- SCHREVEZ, WILLIAM, Archdeacon of St. Andrew's, his persecution of Bishop Graham, i. 361. Mentioned, 356, 359.
- SCHOOLS in the early ages, i. 176, 473, 636. Parochial, establishment of, ii. 967; Appendix to vol. II. note R. p. 988.
- SCONE, i. 72, 75. Parliament of Alexander III. held at, 81. Noticed, 82, 89, 115, 148, 166, 175, 185, 186, 209, 218, 224, 238, 245, 258, 411, 668. Palace and Abbey of, burned, 685 ii. 571, 920.
- SCONE, ABBOT OF, i. 115, 119, 429.
- SCOTCHMONON, THE, i. 298.
- SCOTT, MICHAEL, the wizard, i. 176.
- SCOTT, SIR WALTER, slain at the battle of Homildon Hill, i. 248.
- SCOTT, SIR WILLIAM, of Balwearie, i. 409, 417, 418.
- SCOTT, SIR WALTER, of Buccleuch, attempts to deliver James V. from the Douglas, i. 436; ii. 494. Imprisoned by him, 443. At the battle of Ancrum Moor, 588. Slain by the Kers, ii. 492. His widow noticed, 321, 322.

- SCOTT OF BUCCLEUCH, inroad of, with Westmoreland and Fearnhurst, ii. 116. Attack of, on Stirling, and made prisoner, 130, 131.
- SCOTT, SIR WALTER, of Buccleuch, ii. 367. His rescue of Kinmont Willie, 368, 499. Imprisoned, 369. Sent to England on parole, 500. Returns to Scotland, 369, 500.
- SCOTT OF TUSHYLAU, a border freebooter, hanged, i. 443; ii. 498.
- SCOTT, SIR WILLIAM, marriage of, with "Meikle-mouthed Meg," ii. 492.
- SCOTT, WALTER, or WAT OF HARDEN, anecdotes of, ii. 497.
- SCOTT, MARY, "The Flower of Yarrow," ii. 497.
- SCOTT, ALEXANDER, poems of, ii. 304, 305.
- SCOTT, GENERAL, taken prisoner by the Highlanders, 1745, ii. 916.
- SCOTT, SIR WALTER, quoted, ii. 491, 501, 557.
- SCOTT CLAN, noticed, ii. 492. Feud of, with the Kers, 591.
- SCOTTISH LANGUAGE, origin of the, i. 289.
- SCOTTUS, JOHN DUN, i. 176.
- SCRIPTURES, HOLY, reading of, permitted, i. 660.
- SCROFULA, pretended cure of, by royal touch, ii. 509.
- SCROPE, LORD, i. 198, 202.
- SCROPE, Archbishop of York, i. 249.
- SCROPE, LORD, in 1432, i. 267.
- SCROPE, LORD, warden, ii. 68, 102. Invades Scotland, 118.
- SCROPE, LORD, warden, ii. 367. His quarrel with Scott of Buccleuch, 268, 499.
- SCROPE, LADY, sister of the Duke of Norfolk, ii. 86. Sends James VI. the news of Elizabeth's death, 397.
- SCRYMGOUR, ALEXANDER, constable of Dundee, i. 98.
- SCRYMGOUR, SIR JAMES, constable of Dundee, killed at battle of Harlaw, i. 253.
- ST. ANN'S HEAD, i. 605.
- ST. ADRIAN, i. 48.
- ST. ANDREW FORT, in the Gulf of Darien, ii. 810.
- ST. ANDREW'S, origin of the Culdee house at, i. 53, 54. Visited by Edward I., 87. Franciscan friars established at, 163. Schools in, 176. Casual mention of, 217, 218, 262. Paul Crawar burned at, 276. University of, founded, 278, 474. Angus and Beaton at, 434. Birth of James V.'s son at, 455, and his death at, 457. Martyrdom of Patrick Hamilton at, 468. Martyrdom of Wishart at, 596. Mentioned, 647; ii. 279. Sermon of Knox at, 668. Walter Mill burned at, 680.
- ST. ANDREW'S, BISHOPS OF, i. 60, 75, 77, 82, 102, 114, 115, 119, 128, 169—171, 202, 224, 242, 245, 249, 254, 278, 385, 409, 419, 422, 464, 470, 487, 649, 654, 679; ii. 104, 127, 260.
- ST. ANDREW'S, CASTLE OF, destroyed by Moray, i. 192. Duke of Rothesay imprisoned in, 246. Prince James resides in, 249. Noticed, 437, 573. Beaton assassinated in, 596. Besieged by the party of Arran, 601. John Knox takes refuge in, 603. Surrender of, to the French, 604.
- ST. BARTHOLOMEW, massacre of, ii. 135, 263, note.
- ST. BRIDE, CHURCH OF, i. 121, 347.
- ST. CLAIR, SIR WILLIAM, of Roslin, i. 165.
- ST. CLAIR, SIR JOHN DE, i. 233.
- ST. COLM, ABBOT OF, i. 297.
- ST. COLUMBA, birth, education, and labours of, in converting the Scots, i. 25—27, 49. Doctrines of, 60—52. Noticed, 53, 65.
- ST. COLUMBANUS, an Irish Culdee, i. 57.
- ST. CUMMIAN, a learned Culdee, epistle of, i. 57.
- ST. DUTHAC, queen and daughter of Robert Bruce take refuge in the sanctuary of, i. 118. Shrine of, i. 396, 468.
- ST. GERMAIN, i. 18.
- ST. JOHN, SIR JOHN DE, defeated in Galloway by Edward Bruce, i. 126.
- ST. JOHN, OF TORPHICHEN, LORD, i. 694.
- ST. JOHN, SIR JAMES SANDILAND, LORD. [See SANDILAND.]
- ST. KIERAN, i. 48.
- ST. LEONARD'S COLLEGE, founded, i. 474.
- ST. MARGARET, CHAPEL OF, i. 168, note.
- ST. MUNGO, OF KENTIGERN, i. 25.
- ST. NINIAN, OR ST. RINGAN, i. 25, 48.
- ST. NINIANS, SHRINE OF, i. 396.
- ST. PATRICK, birth and character of, i. 57.
- ST. PETER, THE MONASTERY OF, Mary of Lorraine buried in, i. 644.
- ST. RULE, OR ST. REGULUS, noticed, i. 48. Foundation of the Church of, at St. Andrew's, 54.
- ST. SABINUS, CARDINAL, excommunicates Bruce, i. 119.
- ST. SALVATOR, COLLEGE OF, at St. Andrew's, i. 348, 474, 604.
- ST. WOLOC, noticed, i. 48.
- SEAFIELD, LORD CHANCELLOR, commissioner to the General Assembly, ii. 768. Noticed, 815, 819.
- SEAFORTH, EARL OF, ii. 623, 883. Espouses the cause of the government, 933.
- SEAFORTH, character of the first, ii. 897, 908. Loyalty of the, 904.
- SEAFORTH, THE, ii. 888. Origin and cause of, 899. Its results, 901. Progress of, 904. Union of, with the Relief Church, 908.
- SECURITY, ACT OF, ii. 770. Origin and nature of the, 816. Suspension of the, 828.
- SEDLICK, COMMENTARY OF, noticed, i. 55.
- SEGRAVE, SIR JOHN DE, invades Scotland, i. 107. Defeated and made prisoner at Roslin, ib. Taken prisoner at Bannockburn, and exchanged, 139.
- SELBY, WALTER, a border freebooter, i. 197.
- SELBY, SIR WILLIAM, knighted by James VI., ii. 398.
- SELKIRK, burned, i. 254. Mentioned, ii. 629.
- SELKIRK, FOREST OF, i. 179, 189.
- "SELKIRK, SOUTHERN OF," at the battle of Flodden, i. 411, note.
- SEMPLE, SIR JAMES, ii. 377.
- SEMPLE, LORD, in 1566, i. 770.
- SEMPLE, SIR ROBERT, sheriff-depute and governor of Dunbarton, i. 333.
- SEMPLE, LORD, slain at the battle of Sauchieburn, i. 363.
- SEMPLE, SIR ROBERT, i. 549.
- SEMPLE, ROBERT, poems of, ii. 312.
- SEPTICULAR VASES, i. 19. Memorials, 21.
- SERFS, Scottish, i. 177.
- SESSION, COURT OF, in 1457, i. 367. New constitution of, 446. Bribery of, ii. 324. Proceedings in 1723, 852.
- SETON, SIR CHRISTOPHER, brother-in-law of Bruce, i. 115, 116. Executed, 119.
- SETON, JOHN DE, brother of Sir Christopher, executed, i. 119.
- SETON, SIR WILLIAM, gallant defence of Berwick by, i. 187.
- SETON, THOMAS, son of Sir William, hanged before Berwick, i. 187.
- SETON, SIR ALEXANDER, of Gordon, i. 325.
- SETON, SIR WILLIAM AND SIR HENRY, slain at the battle of Brechin, i. 333.
- SETON, ALEXANDER, a Dominican friar, confessor of James V., i. 469. Embraces the reformed doctrines, ib. Becomes chaplain to the Duke of Suffolk, ib.
- SETON, SIR ALEXANDER, of Touch and Tillibody, i. 469, note.
- SETON, LORD, in 1542, i. 567, 571, 572.
- SETON, LORD, assists Mary to escape from Holyrood, i. 770. Joins queen's party, ii. 71. Meets her at Lochleven, 83. Made prisoner at Langside, 84. With his sons, witnesses Morton's death, 174. Joins in a bond for release of James from Gowrie, 185.
- SETON, SIR JOHN, dispatched in pursuit of Randolph, ii. 170.
- SETON OF TOUCH, keys of Edinburgh Castle entrusted to, ii. 157.
- SETON OF PARBREATH, ii. 366.
- SETON, SIR ALEXANDER, president of the session, ii. 369. Opposes James VI. in the Court of Session, 375, 398.
- SETON, MR., of Pitmedden, his address in favour of the union, ii. 825.
- SETON, MR., of Barnes, proclaims James VIII. at Kelso, ii. 859.
- SETON, MARY, one of "the four Maries," i. 614.
- SETON HOUSE, ii. 859, 876, 925.
- "SEVEN SISTERS," cannon so named, i. 404, 409.
- SEVERUS, the Roman emperor, invades Scotland, i. 5. His death, 6.
- SHAFTOE, CAPTAIN, tried and executed at Preston, ii. 875.
- SHARP, JAMES, Archbishop of St. Andrew's, attempts to secure the liberties of the presbyterian church, ii. 687. His treacherous desertion of the presbyterians, 688. His ordination, 689. Crafty policy of, ib. Charge brought against, 697. Disgrace of, 699. Attempt to assassinate, ib. Warrant forged by, 706. Perjury of, 707. Murder of, 710. Efforts to apprehend his murderers, 717.
- SHARP, SIR WILLIAM, brother of James, illegal proceedings of, ii. 706.
- SHARP, SIR JAMES, connected with the rebellion of 1715, ii. 877.
- SHAW OF SAUCHIE, treason of, i. 361, 363.
- SHAW, ANDREW, of Polkemmet, i. 466.
- SHAW, QUINTYN, a poet, noticed, i. 525.
- SHAW, QUERRY TO JAMES VI., slain, ii. 392.
- SHAW, LADY, of Greenock, distinguished loyalty of, ii. 851.
- SHAW, CHRISTIAN, several persons condemned as witches on evidence of, ii. 966.
- SHELDON, Bishop of London, ii. 692.
- SHELLEY, EDWARD, lieutenant of the Bullenars, at Pinkie, i. 608.
- SHKPFIELDS, Scottish, manners of, i. 541.
- SHERIDAN, SIR THOMAS, advice to Charles Edward before Culloden, ii. 949. Escapes to the Continent, 952.
- SHERIFFDOMS, origin and nature of, i. 174.
- SHERIFF, THE BATTLE OF, ii. 867.
- SHERWEE, JOHN, official of St. Andrew's, i. 279.
- SHIPPING in the early ages, i. 219. In the time of James IV., 516.
- SHREWSBURY, BATTLE OF, i. 248.
- SHREWSBURY, EARL OF, delivers Mary's death warrant, ii. 234.
- SHREWSBURY, EARL OF, in 1568, ii. 98, 102.
- SIBBALD, COLONEL, ii. 618, 621. Executed, 660.
- SICILY, KING OF, i. 346.
- SIGURD, a Norwegian chief, appointed first earl of the Orkneys, i. 46. He invades the north of Scotland, ib. His marriage with the daughter of Malcolm II., 47.
- SIMPSON, a priest, martyrdom of, i. 454.
- SIMPSON, SIR DUNCAN, martyrdom of, i. 470.
- SIMPSON, AGNES, a witch, accuses Bothwell, ii. 341.
- SIMPSON, REV. PATRICK, resists Arran's attack on the church, ii. 205.
- SIMPSON, PROFESSOR, in the College of Glasgow, process against, ii. 892. Unsound doctrines taught by, 894. Renewed proceedings against, ib. Forbidden to teach, 895.
- SINCLAIR, WILLIAM, Bishop of Dunkeld, i. 145.
- SINCLAIR, SIR WILLIAM, slain, i. 165.
- SINCLAIR, SIR WALTER, at battle of Otterburn, i. 234.
- SINCLAIR, SIR JOHN, at the battle of Otterburn, i. 234. Commissioner to France, 237.
- SINCLAIR, SIR WALTER, slain at the battle of Homildon Hill, i. 248.
- SINCLAIR, HENRY, Earl of Orkney, death of, i. 255.
- SINCLAIR, WILLIAM, Earl of Orkney, i. 268.
- SINCLAIR, PATRICK, i. 441.
- SINCLAIR, LORD, i. 444.
- SINCLAIR, JAMES, governor of the Orkneys, i. 444.
- SINCLAIR, OLIVER, favourite of James V., i. 460.
- SINCLAIR, HENRY, i. 620.
- SINCLAIR, SIR JOHN, Bishop of Brechin, marries Queen Mary and Darnley, i. 749.
- SINCLAIR, THOMAS, forced by Lindsay to attach the great seal to Mary's abdication, ii. 75.
- SINCLAIR, MAJOR, ii. 654, 655.
- SINCLAIR, MASTER OF, a Jacobite leader, ii. 851. Proposed submission of, 870.
- SINGING AND SINGERS, i. 552.
- SKENT, the clerk-register, ii. 366.

- SKINNER'S FIELD, or SKIRMISH FIELD, scene of the battle of Melrose, i. 436, note.
- SKYE, ISLAND OF, i. 252. Attempt to colonise, i. 375.
- SLAINES, CASTLE OF, ii. 335, 364.
- SLAVERY, existence of, in Scotland, i. 178.
- SMALL, GEORGE, an elder among the early Protestants, i. 674.
- SMETON, REV. THOMAS, ii. 178, 181, 283.
- SMUGGLING, rise and growth of, ii. 832. Prevalence of, 885.
- SODOM, BISHOP OF, i. 87.
- SOLWAY, THE, i. 1, 6, 124.
- SOLWAY MOSS, defeat of the Scots at, i. 460. Prisoners taken at, 565.
- SOMERVELL, invades Scotland i. 66. Defeated and slain, 67.
- SOMERSET, DUKE OF, in 1463, i. 307.
- SOMERSET, DUKE OF, invades Scotland, i. 606. Gains the battle of Pinkie, 609. Retreat of, 611. [See HARTFORD.]
- SOMERSET, KERR, or CAR, EARL OF, suspected of having poisoned Prince Henry, ii. 408.
- SOMERVILLE, SIR JOHN DE, i. 116. Executed, 119.
- SOMERVILLE, LORD, anecdote of, i. 375.
- SOMERVILLE, LORD, taken prisoner at Solway Moss, i. 461. Signs the bond of Henry VIII., and returns to Scotland, 566. Imprisoned, 581. Noticed, 699.
- SOMERVILLE, LORD, in 1560, i. 649, 740; ii. 83.
- SOPHIA, PRINCESS, ii. 842.
- SORNKIS, or STURDY BURGARS, i. 285.
- SODUS, NICHOLAS DE, competitor for the crown, i. 87. The descent on which he founded his claims, ib.
- SODUS, SIR JOHN DE, appointed one of the Guardians of Scotland, i. 102. Sent as commissioner to France, 107. Noticed, 109. Slain, 148.
- SODUS, SIR WILLIAM DE, conspiracy of, i. 153. Noticed, 173.
- SODUS, LORD, murder of, ii. 492.
- SOUTHERS, EARL OF, ii. 534, 536, 555.
- SOUTHERS, EARL OF, at the Jacobite gathering at Innamar, ii. 846. Proclaims James VIII. at Montrose, 848.
- SOW, an instrument of war used at the siege of Berwick, i. 150; and of Dunbar, 193.
- SPAIN, PRINCE OF, proposals of marriage from, to Queen Mary, i. 657.
- SPAIN, COURT OF, intrigues of, with Scotland, ii. 332, 334. Assists the Jacobites, 878.
- SPALDING, a citizen of Berwick, betrays the town to the Scots, i. 147.
- SPANISH ARMADA, preparation of, ii. 331. Sailing of, 333. Its destruction, 334.
- SPANISH FACTION, ii. 332, 444.
- "SPANISH BLANKS," conspiracy of the, ii. 347.
- SP-NOK, JOHN, a priest, executed for murder, i. 439.
- SPANCK, secretary to the Earl of Argyll, examined by torture, ii. 723. His confession, ib.
- SPENS, SIR PATRICK, the bailiff of, i. 312.
- SPENS OF KILPATRICK, slain by the Earl of Angus, i. 384.
- SPENS, JOHN, arrested for the murder of Darnley, ii. 80.
- SPENS OF WORMISTON, killed at the siege of Stirling, ii. 131.
- SPORTS, out of-door, i. 551; in-door, 552. Noticed, 560.
- SPOTTISWOOD, JOHN, appointed superintendent of Lothian, i. 690. Mentioned, 691, 693, 773; ii. 24, 244.
- SPOTTISWOOD, ARCHBISHOP, first of Glasgow, afterwards of St. Andrew's, son of John, ii. 407. Appointed lord of session, ib. Created chancellor, 612. Cupidity of, 516. Noticed, 525. History of, mentioned, i. 644, 647, 665, 673; ii. 970.
- SPOTTISWOOD, SIR ROBERT, president of the Court of Session and Secretary of State for Scotland, ii. 525, 594, 598, 627. Executed, 630.
- SPROT, GEORGE, discovers Logan's letters respecting the Gowrie conspiracy, ii. 390. His execution, 391.
- SPYKIE, LORD, slain, ii. 404.
- SQUADRON VOLANTE, the party so called, ii. 817.
- SPAIR, VISCOUNT. [See DALRYMPLE.]
- SPAIR, EARL OF. [See DALRYMPLE.]
- STAIR, LADY, one of the Lollards of Kyle, i. 466.
- STANLEY, SIR EDWARD, at the battle of Flodden, i. 407.
- STAPLETON, GENERAL, at battle of Culledon, ii. 949.
- STARKAD, an Englishman, murder of, i. 398; ii. 491.
- STARK, HELEN, executed for heresy, i. 661.
- STERLE, SIR RICHARD, i. 876.
- STEPHEN, King of England, i. 60—63.
- ST. PHAN, WILLIAM, Bishop of Dunblane, i. 278.
- ST. PYLE, KIRK OF, i. 424.
- STEWART, ALEXANDER, the High, i. 76. At the Battle of Largs, 79. His death, ib.
- STEWART, JAMES, THE HIGH, appointed one of the regency, i. 82. He goes over to Bruce, ib. He swears fealty to Edward, 92. His submission to Edward, ib. Noticed, 107, 109.
- STEWART, WALTER, THE HIGH, at the battle of Bannockburn, i. 133, 136. Marries Marjory Bruce, 141. Noticed, 143, 147. Defends Berwick, 150, 151. His death, 156.
- STEWART, ROBERT, THE HIGH, his birth, i. 143. Oaths of fealty taken to, 157. At the battle of Halidon Hill, 188. Chosen joint regent with Moray, 189. Succeeds Moray, 195. Captures Perth and Stirling, ib. At the battle of Neville's Cross, 198. Elected guardian of the kingdom, 199. Joins the nobles against David II., 206. Imprisoned along with his son, 206. Ascends the throne as Robert II., 224. [See ROBERT II.]
- STEWART, SIR JOHN, of Bonkill, joins Wallace, i. 19. Slain at the battle of Falkirk, 101.
- STEWART, SIR JOHN, slain, i. 148.
- STEWART, SIR JAMES, of Rosyth, slain at the battle of Halidon Hill, i. 188.
- STEWART, SIR ROBERT, i. 232.
- STEWART, DUNCAN, ravages the Lowlands, i. 238.
- STEWART, WALTER, Lord of Brechin, i. 242.
- STEWART, ALEXANDER, i. 248. [See EARL OF MAR.]
- STEWART, SIR ROBERT, of Ralston, i. 255.
- STEWART, SIR JOHN, Earl of Buchan, sent to the assistance of France, i. 255.
- STEWART, SIR ROBERT, of Darnley, i. 256.
- STEWART, MURDOCH, Duke of Albany. [See ALBANY.]
- STEWART, WALTER, eldest son of Albany, tried and executed, i. 260.
- STEWART, SIR JOHN, of Dundonald, "the Red," i. 260. Slain, 261.
- STEWART, ALEXANDER, imprisoned, tried, and executed, i. 260.
- STEWART, JAMES, attempts to revenge the death of his father Albany, i. 260. Takes refuge in Ireland, 261.
- STEWART, SIR DAVID, of Rosyth, i. 260, 269.
- STEWART, JOHN, of Darnley, constable of the Scotch auxiliaries in France, i. 262.
- STEWART, SIR ROBERT, assists in the murder of James I., i. 269, 271. Executed, 273.
- STEWART, ALAN, Lord of Darnley, slain, i. 318.
- STEWART, ALEXANDER, conflict of, with the Boyds, i. 318.
- STEWART, BERNARD, sent by the king of France on a mission to James V., i. 395.
- STEWART, ALEXANDER, Archbishop of St. Andrew's, slain at the battle of Flodden, i. 409.
- STEWART, SIR JAMES, "the Black Knight of Lorn," marries Queen Joanna, i. 319. Imprisoned, ib. Mentioned, 325, 326, 340.
- STEWART, JOHN GORME, of Atholl, slain, i. 323.
- STEWART, SIR ALLAN, slain, i. 331.
- STEWART, SIR JAMES, slain, i. 331.
- STEWART, ANDREW, Bishop of Moray, i. 367.
- STEWART OF ARDGOWAN, sent to the aid of the King of Denmark, i. 422.
- STEWART, HENRY, Queen Margaret's partiality for, i. 429. Acknowledged by her as her husband, 436. Imprisoned by the lords of the council, ib. Created Lord Methven, 442.
- STEWART OF LORNE, and WILLIAM STEWART, two Scotch poets, mentioned and quoted, i. 526—528.
- STEWART, LORD HENRY, Abbot of St. Colm, i. 659.
- STEWART, LORD ROBERT, son of James V., i. 765. Warms Darnley of his danger, ii. 46.
- STEWART, EMMÉ. [See D'AUBIGNY.]
- STEWART, LORD JAMES. [See EARL OF MORAY.]
- STEWART, CAPTAIN JAMES, second son of Lord Ochiltree, introduced to King James VI., ii. 161. His character, ib. Accuses Morton before the council, 167. Created Earl of Arrar, 170. Conveys Morton from Dunbarton to Edinburgh, 171. His charges against Lord Thirlstane, 330. His return to court, 346. His withdrawal and murder, ib. [See ARRAN.]
- STEWART, COLONEL WILLIAM, brother of Arran, capture of by Mar and Douglas of Lochleven, ii. 179. Dispatched as ambassador to England, 184. Captured, Gowrie, 192. Accuses Vinton and Gray of treachery, 210. Defends Stirling, 212. Made prisoner, ib. Accuses the Master of Gray of treason, 310.
- STEWART, SIR WILLIAM, Lord Treasurer of Scotland, ii. 319, 330, 332.
- STEWART, ALLAN, commendator of Crossraguel, shocking treatment of, by the Earl of Cassilis, ii. 323.
- STEWART, WALTER, prior of Biantyre, one of the Octavians, ii. 366.
- STEWART, ROBERT, son of James V., and Earl of Orkney, executed, ii. 408.
- STEWART, WILLIAM, accuses Andrew Melville, ii. 420.
- STEWART, SIR LEWIS, of Blackhill, ii. 547, 589, 616.
- STEWART, SIR THOMAS, of Grandtully, arrest of, ii. 578.
- STEWART, LIEUTENANT-COLONEL ALEXANDER, conspiracy of, ii. 599.
- STEWART, JOHN, of Ladywell, execution of, for leasing-making, ii. 616.
- STEWART OF ARDVOICHEL, assassinated Lord Kilpont, ii. 620.
- STEWART OF BALLECHIN, governor of Blair Castle, ii. 785.
- STEWART, LIEUTENANT-COLONEL, governor of Edinburgh Castle, ii. 857.
- STEWART OF ARDSHIEL, at the battle of Preston, ii. 926.
- STEWART, SIR JAMES, dispatched to France by Prince Charles Edward, ii. 930.
- STEWARTS OF AFFIN, at the battle of Preston, ii. 926. At the battle of Falkirk, 943. And at Culledon, 949.
- STIRLING, CAROL, of ancient remains found in, i. 14.
- STIRLING, BATTLE OF, and victory of Wallace, i. 96.
- STIRLING, parliament held at, i. 71, 77, 77. Mentioned 218, 319, 327, 362, 417, 561, 585, 691, 593, 599, 683; ii. 76, 103, 130, 192, 212, 279, 410, 670, 851, 858, 869, 941. Queen Mary crowned at, 579. The royal army posted at, 851.
- STIRLING CASTLE, given up to Henry II., i. 64. Surrendered to Edward I., 92. Besieged and taken by the Scottish guardians, 104. Siege and capture of, by Edward I., 109, 110. Besieged by Edward Bruce, 132. Surrender of, 139. Rebuilt by Edward III., 191. Captured by the Stewart, 195. The residence of James V., 411, 529. Surrender of, by the queen dowager, 416. James V. escapes to, from Falkland, 440. Queen Mary privately married to Darnley in, 748. Parliament held in, ii. 155. Surprised of the confederates of the Earl of Gowrie in, 192. Prince Henry born in, 359. Captured by Monk, 672. Besieged by Prince Charles Edward, 942, 945.
- STIRLING, SIR JOHN, i. 193.
- STIRLING OF KEIR, shameful outrage of, i. 420. Slain, 437.
- STIRLING OF KEIR, nephew to Montrose, ii. 616.
- STIRLING OF GLOBAT, defends Dunbarton Castle, i. 586. Gives it up to Regent Arran, 694.
- STOBE, a Scotch poet, i. 525.
- STONIE, MEMORIAL, i. 22.

STONES OF STENNIS, OF THE ORCADIAN STONEHENGE, i. 22.
 STONE OF DESTINY, i. 92, note, 161.
 STORMONT, LORD, at the Jacobite gathering at Braemar, ii. 846.
 STORNOWAY, subjugation of the Inhabitants of, ii. 405.
 STRACHAN, COLONEL, ii. 652, 653, 661, 667.
 STAFFORD, THOMAS WENTWORTH, EARL OF, ii. 574, 586. Impeachment of, 592. Tried and executed, ib.
 STRAITON, WALTER, page to James I., murder of, i. 272.
 STRAITON, DAVID, martyrdom of, i. 470.
 STRATHALLAN, LORD, at gathering at Braemar, ii. 846. Joins Charles Edward and the Jacobites, 936, 938, 941.
 STRATHAYON, CASTLE OF, dismantled, i. 337. Taken by the Covenanters, ii. 556.
 STRATHBOGIE, CASTLE OF, burnt by the Earl of Moray, i. 334. Destroyed by James VI., ii. 364.
 STRATHBOGIE, JOHN DE. [See ATHOLL.]
 STRATHCLYDE, kingdom of, i. 24.
 STRATHERN, EARL OF, captured at taking of Perth, i. 129.
 STRATHERN, EARL OF, slain at Neville's Cross, i. 198.
 STRATHERN, EARL OF, i. 233.
 STRATHERN, MALISE GRAHAM, EARL OF, i. 270.
 STRATHERN, MALISE, EARL OF, i. 321.
 STRATHERN, COUNTESS OF, privy to a plot against Robert Bruce, i. 153.
 STRATHMORE, EARL OF, efforts of, for a free toleration of all Protestants, ii. 769.
 STRATHMUR, EARL OF, killed at the battle of Sheriffmuir, ii. 868.
 STRATHMUR, seizure of the Duke of Rothesay at, i. 246.
 STRICKLAND, FRANCIS, one of the "Seven Men of Moidart," ii. 914.
 STRIVELIN, SIR JOHN DE, besieges Lochleven, i. 190.
 STROKALTEER, incident in the wood of, i. 192.
 STROZZI, LEON, Prior of Capua, besieges St. Andrew's, i. 604. Arrival of, with assistance from France, 613.
 SUCCESSION to the Scotch throne, settlement of, i. 140, 148. Act of, ii. 816.
 SULLY, HENRY DE, Grand Butler of France, i. 156, 156.
 SUPERINTENDENT, OFFICE OF, i. 690, 695; ii. 269.
 SUPERSTITION, of the clergy, ii. 275, 317. Prevalence of, 325. Of the Borderers, 501. Of the covenanters, 714, note.
 SURREY, JOHN WARREN, EARL OF, appointed Guardian of Scotland, i. 93. Defeated by Wallace at Stirling, 96.
 SURREY, EARL OF, i. 392, 397, 405. Commands at the battle of Flodden, 407. Invades Scotland, 426.
 SURREY, COUNTESS OF, frolic of with James IV., i. 549.
 SUSSEX, EARL OF, appointed commissioner by Elizabeth, ii. 90, 105. Invades Scotland, 118, 122. Letter to Randolph, 125.
 SUSSEX, EARL OF, in 1594, his mission to Scotland, ii. 362.
 SUTHERLAND, EARL OF, slain at Haldon Hill, i. 188.
 SUTHERLAND, EARL OF, taken prisoner at Neville's Cross, i. 198. Mentioned, 230, 233.
 SUTHERLAND, EARL OF, in 1561, i. 654; ii. 53, 118, 171.
 SUTHERLAND, EARL OF, mentioned, ii. 854, 866. Espouses the cause of the government, 933.
 SWEARING, profane, i. 127, note. Prevalence of, in Scotland during the sixteenth century, ii. 324, 325.
 SWEDEN, treaty with, i. 262. Mentioned, 395. Compact of, with Scotland annulled, 512.
 SWEDEN, KING OF, proposals of marriage from, to Queen Mary, i. 657.
 SWEDEN, KING OF, treaty of the Marquis of Hamilton with, ii. 505.
 SWEDEN, CHARLES XII., KING OF, treacherous movement of, against the Hanoverian dynasty, ii. 878.
 SWEET HEART, ABBEY OF THE, erected by Devorguili, wife of John Balliol, i. 168, note.
 SWINTON, SIR JOHN, at the battle of Homildon Hill, i. 247.
 SWINTON, SIR WILLIAM, at the battle of Baugé, i. 255.
 SWINFORD, Bishop of Galloway, ii. 521. Attacked in the streets of Edinburgh, ib. Seeks shelter in the privy-council, ib. Redoubled fury of his assailants, ib. Earl of Traquair and Wigton attempt his relief, ib. Fresh outburst against, ib.
 SYLVIVS, ANNAEUS (Pope Pius II.), visit of, to Scotland, i. 249.
 SYNODS, appointment of, ii. 12. Of Merse and Teviotdale, 432. Of Fife, 460. Proposals made to the, by the government, 473. Petitions from the, 629.

T.

TABLES, institution of, i. 522. Appointment of commissioners to form the, 523. Course adopted by, 526, 528. Assemble at Edinburgh, ib. They give their formal approval to the national covenant, ib. A deputation sent to Aberdeen from the, 540. Their controversy with the doctors of Aberdeen, ib. Deputies from the, wait upon Hamilton, ib. They threaten to summon a General Assembly, ib. Deputies of, protest against the royal declaration, 542. Requisition issued by the, 545.
 TACITUS, quoted, i. 1, 3.
 TALBOT, LORD RICHARD, made prisoner, i. 189.
 TALE TELLERS and BALLAD SINGERS, i. 652.
 TALLO, HAY OF. [See HAY.]
 TANISTRY, law of, i. 31.
 TANTALLON, CASTLE OF, i. 417. Siege of, 442, 452, 456, 460, note; ii. 493, 556, 668.
 TARBET, VISCOUNT, i. 761, 763, 781, 798.
 TARNAWAY, OF DARNAWAY, FOREST OF, i. 179.
 TARNAWAY CASTLE, dismantled, i. 337. Description of, 712, note.
 TARRAS, EARL OF, accusation against, ii. 723. Noticed, 732.
 TARRAS MOSS, a refuge for freebooters, ii. 496.
 TAXATION, ii. 820.

TAXES, enacted upon herrings, ii. 409; laid on land, 821; on malt, 840.
 TAYLOR, WILLIAM, Darnley's page, murder of, ii. 47.
 TEMPLARS, KNIGHTS, i. 167, and note. Master of, slain at Falkirk, 102.
 TENCIN, CARDINAL, mentioned, ii. 911, 912.
 TERRITORIVM annexed to villages and hamlets, i. 179.
 TERRY, SIR HUGH, unfeeling conduct of, i. 672.
 TEST OF PASSIVE OBEDIENCE, enactment of, ii. 718. Dissatisfaction caused by, ib. Argyll takes, with an explanation, 719.
 TEST dispensed with by James VII., ii. 739.
 TEST, THE AUCHTERARDER, ii. 892.
 TESTAMENT OF CRESEIDE, a poem, by Henryson, i. 304.
 TESTAMENT, KING ROBERT'S, ii. 495.
 TESTAMENT, NEW, introduction of, into Scotland, i. 466. Reading of, prohibited, 472. Permitted, 660.
 TEVIOTDALE, i. 154, 1-0.
 TEWESBURY, BATTLE OF, i. 351.
 THE THREE TALES OF THE FAIRIES OF PEEBLES, i. 375-377.
 THEFT, prevalence of, i. 533; ii. 931.
 THIRLSTANE, SIR JOHN SCOTT OF, fidelity of, to James V., i. 459, note.
 THIRLSTANE, LORD CHANCELLOR MAITLAND. [See MAITLAND.]
 THIRLWALL, Governor of Douglas Castle, i. 122.
 THOMAS THE RHYMER, character, poems, and prophecies of, i. 289.
 THOMAS VALENTINE, accusation of against James VI., ii. 374.
 THOMSON, JOHN, Leader of the men of Carrick, i. 148, 188.
 THOMSON, JAMES, the poet, ii. 971.
 THOR, THE LONG, charter of, founding the church of Aednam, i. 167.
 THORE, a serf, i. 177.
 THORPE, WILLIAM, a follower of Wycliffe, i. 275.
 THRAVE, or THRIEVE, CASTLE, i. 593; ii. 493.
 THRIEPLAND, SIR DAVID, a Jacobite, ii. 874.
 THRIEPLAND, SIR ROBERT, ii. 924.
 THROCKMORTON, interview of, with Mary, i. 650. Letter of, to the English council, 652. Interview of, with Lord James Stewart, 655; and with Mary, 657. Remonstrates with Mary against her marriage, 741. Intercedes on behalf of Moray, 757. Arrival of, in Scotland, ii. 73. Interview of, with Sir James Melville, ib. Interview of, with Morton, ib. Interview of, with Tullibardine and Lethington, 76. Letter to, from Elizabeth, ib. Interview of, with Moray and Lethington, 79. Departure of, ib. Letters from, to Moray and Lethington, 106.
 THUMBKENS, an instrument of torture, ii. 723, and note.
 THURSTAN, Archbishop of York, i. 170.
 TIGER EARL, OF CRAWFORD, i. 325, 326, 333, 334.
 TILL, RIVER, i. 407.
 TIPPERMUIR, BATTLE OF, ii. 619.
 TITHES, revocation of, by Charles I., ii. 502. Impropriated valuation of, 503. Surrender of, ib.
 TOD, SIR THOMAS, treason of, i. 383.
 TOLBOOTH OF EDINBURGH, i. 419, 423, 544. Parliament held in, ii. 129, 370. Broken open by the Porteous mob, 837.
 TOLERATION of episcopacy in Scotland, ii. 775. Offence taken at, ib. Act of, passed, 837.
 TONGLAND, MONASTERY OF, i. 167.
 TONGLAND, ABBOT OF, an Italian adventurer, i. 556.
 TORBAY, landing of King William at, i. 740.
 TOUTPICHEN, an assembly of the barons held at, by Wallace, i. 98. The principal seat of the Knights of St. John, 167, note.
 TORWOOD, i. 102, note, 132; ii. 116, 716, 920, 942.
 TORY ministry, ii. 841. Fall of the, 845. Party, 846, 847, note.
 TOTTS FRIAR, defends prayers to saints, i. 673.
 TOUCH, HOUSE OF, garriously, ii. 851.
 TOURNAMENTS, i. 184, 372, 340, 549, 554.
 TOWNS, GEORGE, an Edinburgh citizen, spirited conduct of, after Flodden, i. 411.
 TOWERS and TOWNS, BORDER, ii. 405.
 TOWN GUARD OF EDINBURGH, ii. 886, 886, 920.
 TOWNLEY, FRANCIS, an English Jacobite, ii. 937, 939, 955.
 TRADE AND COMMERCE, i. 280, 369. Foreign, 545. Restrictions on, 546. Free, with England during the Commonwealth, ii. 675.
 TRADES, corporations of, i. 543.
 TRAIL, Bishop of St. Andrew's, i. 242, 245.
 TRAINED BANDS, ii. 920.
 TRAGENT, dinner of Queen Mary and Bothwell at, ii. 49. Position of the royal army at, 924, 925. Prince Charles dines at the inn of, ib., note.
 TRAQUAIR, EARL OF, ii. 516, 521. Summons privy-council to meet, and writes to the supplicants, 522. Summoned to court, 524. States grievances complained of, 525. Suspicions of his sincerity, ib. Return of, from court, ib. Waited on by a deputation of popular lords, ib. Secret agents divulge instructions given to, ib. Recommends a base policy to the king, 530. He orders the military stores to be conveyed to Dalkeith, 534. Unfounded accusations against, ib. Recommends the recall of the canons and liturgy, 541. Base artifices of, 545. He is appointed commissioner to the General Assembly, 565. Deceitful conduct of, ib. Signs the national covenant, 567. Incurs the displeasure of the king, ib. He is ordered to prorogue parliament until 2nd June, 1640, 569. His return to court, 570. Oversight of, 576. Excluded from the Act of Oblivion, 594.
 TREASON, alteration in the law of, ii. 836.
 TREASURER, LORD, accounts of in the reign of James IV., i. 547-561.
 TREATY, between Stephen and David I., i. 63. Between Scotland and France, 68. Between William II. and Henry II., ib. Between William II. and Richard Cœur de Lion, 70. Between Alexander II. and Prince Louis, 72. Between Alexander II. and Henry III., 75. Between Alexander III. and Norway, 80. Between the Scottish regents and Edward I., 82, 83. Between Edward I. and the French king, 107. Between France and Scotland, 166. Between Robert Bruce and England, 160, 161. For the ransom of David II., 202. Of David II. with France, 204. Secret, of David II. with England, 205. Between Scotland and France, 225. Between Albany and Henry IV., 254. Between the Scotch and Henry V. for the release of James I., 256. Between James II. and Henry VI. of peace with England, 351. Ancient, with France, renewal of, 358, 395. Of marriage between James IV. and the Princess Margaret, 390. Between England, France, and Scotland, 414. With England for the marriage of Queen Mary, 575. Of peace between England, France, and Scotland, 615. Between England and Scotland, 624. Between Elizabeth and the Reformers, 641, 642, 645. Confirmation of, by parliament, 649. Ratification of, refused by Mary, 650—657. Between the Marquis of Hamilton and the King of Sweden, II. 505. Between Charles I. and the Scots, 590, 593. Of Uxbridge, 630. Of Utrecht, 847.

Trial of Knox before the privy-council, I. 721; II. 17. Of Bothwell for treason, I. 737; for murder of Darnley, II. 61. Of the accomplices of Bothwell, 81, 82, 174. Of Regent Morton, 171. Of the Earl of Gowrie, 192. Of Lord Balmerino, 510. Of Charles I., 647—649. Of the Marquis of Argyll, 684, 685. Of the Rev. James Guthrie, 687. Of Sir Archibald Johnston, of Warriston, 693. Of the Earl of Argyll, 719. Of the Dean of Faculty, 839. Of the Jacobite Lords, &c., 875. Of the Scotch Jacobites in 1715, 877. Of the Jacobites in 1745, 955, 956. Of Lord Lovat, 957. Of the Scotch witches and wizards, 958—966. Of Thomas Aikenhead, 765, and Appendix M. to vol. II.

TRIESTE, SIR, tale of, I. 290.

TROOPS, SCOTTISH, in the service of the King of Denmark for three years, II. 504. Enlist under Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, lb. Incorporated into a national brigade, lb. Sail 16th July, land 4th August on the banks of the Oder, lb. Distinguished bravery of, at the battle of Leipzig, lb. First employ platoon firing, 505. Ultimately incorporated with the Swedish army, lb. Continue to follow the fortunes of the Swedes, 506.

TRUCE, DAYS OF, held by Border Wardens, II. 498.

TULLIALAN, BARON OF, executed for murder, I. 445.

TULLIBARDINE, MURRAY OF, his treachery, I. 185. Punishment of, lb.; II. 155.

TULLIBARDINE, EARL OF, II. 619.

TULLIBARDINE, MARQUIS OF, 846, 879, 914, 915, 917, 919, 952.

TURBOT, biographer of Queen Margaret, I. 41, 42.

TURBOT, Bishop of St. Andrew's, dispute regarding, I. 169.

TURNBERRY CASTLE, seat of Robert Bruce, I. 113. Held by Lord Percy, 120.

TURNBULL, ALEXANDER, depredations of, I. 534.

TURNBULL, JAMES, I. 534.

TURNER, SIR JAMES, a soldier of fortune, an oppressor of the Covenanters, II. 695, and note to 697. Taken prisoner, lb.

TUTBURY, Queen Mary imprisoned in, II. 102.

TWEED, RIVER, I. 427.

TWEEDALE, MARQUIS OF, attempts to bring about a union of the kingdoms, II. 701. Appointed commissioner, 804. His dismissal from office, 809. Secretary of state, 917, 918.

TWEEDALE, LADY, disinherited by Lauderdale, II. 720.

TWENON, SIR MARMADUKE, at the battle of Stirling, I. 96. At the battle of Bannockburn, 139.

TWISSEL BRIDGE, crossed by the English before Flodden, I. 407.

TYNDALE'S version of the New Testament, I. 466.

U.

UCHTRED, Earl of Northumberland, at war with Malcolm II., I. 37. Assassinated, lb.

UCHTRED OF GALLOWAY, assassinated, I. 69.

UCHTRED, SIR THOMAS, I. 155.

UISTEN, I. 28, 29. Occupied by the Scots, 144. Chieftains of, join Edward Bruce, 141.

ULSTER, RICHARD DE BURGH, EARL OF, supports Bruce's title to the throne, I. 82. Prepares to resist the Scots, 141. Defeated by Edward Bruce, 142. By Robert Bruce, 144. His daughter married to Bruce, 164.

UMFRVILLE, GILBERT DE, Earl of Angus, I. 86, 100.

UMFRVILLE, INGHENAM DE, his mission to the French court, I. 107.

UMFRVILLE, SIR INGRAM DE, governor of Ayr, I. 121. Defeated by Edward Bruce, 126. His advice to Edward II. at the battle of Bannockburn, 136. Retires to England, 153.

UMFRVILLE, BARON, I. 199.

UMFRVILLE, SIR ROBERT, surnamed "Robin Mendmarket," defeats the Scots at Fullophlaw, I. 243. Captures fourteen Scottish vessels, 251. Invades Scotland, 254.

UNGES THE GREAT, I. 27.

UNION between Scotland and England proposed by James VI., II. 400, 469, 813. Appointment of commissioners to treat of, 400. Instructions given to the commissioners, 471. Fears excited by the proposal of, 469. Opinions of the General Assembly regarding, 470. Nature of the, during the Commonwealth, 674. Question of the, discussed, 770. Feelings of the Scotch Church regarding, 771. Objections to, 772. Effects of, on the church, 773. Obstacles to, 813. Recommended by King William, lb. Commissioners appointed to treat of a, 814. Result of their deliberations, 815. Bill passed by parliament for a, 816. Queen Anne's message regarding a, 817. Act for a treaty of, 818. The queen empowered to appoint commissioners for a, 819. State of public opinion regarding, lb. Meeting of commissioners to treat of a, lb. Proposals on the part of England for a, lb.; on the part of Scotland, 820. Terms of a, agreed on, 820—823. State of public mind in Scotland regarding the, 823. Popular excitement against the, 824. Petitions against the, 825. Debates on the treaty of, lb. Articles of, approved by parliament, 826. Popular tumults against the, 826, 827. Opposition of the Cameronians to the, lb. Ratification of the treaty of, 829. Debates in the English parliament respecting, lb. Passing of the bill for the, 830. Royal assent to the, lb. Alleged bribery for the purpose of carrying, Appendix Q. to vol. II. Unpopularity of the, 831. Impolitic mode of carrying out the, lb. Bill to repeal the, 841.

UNION of the Burgher and Anti-burgher Synods, II. 907; and of the Secession and the Relief churches, 908.

UNIVERSITY of St. Andrew's, foundation of, I. 278, 474. Of Glasgow, 474. Of Aberdeen, lb. Of Oxford and Cambridge, mentioned, 76, 207. Of Paris, 57, 176, 279, 285, 287, 296, 475, 528. Of Bologna, 279.

UNIVERSITIES, Scottish, vagabond scholars of the, I. 315. Continental, number of Scotchmen who held office in the, 472; II. 287.

UNREASON, ABBOT OF, I. 506, 555, note, 620.

UPTON BRIDGE, II. 672.

UPSAL, ARCHBISHOP OF, I. 395.

URBICUS, LULLIUS, Roman governor of Britain, I. 5. Administration of, lb.

URNEBRIG, a German, superintends the manufacture of gunpowder in Scotland, I. 399.

URRY, SIR JOHN, II. 623. Surprises Montrose, 624. Is defeated by him at Auldearn, 625. Taken prisoner, 663. His execution, 660.

UTRECHT, TREATY OF, II. 847.

UXBRIDGE, TREATY OF, II. 630.

V.

VACONAR, BATTLE OF, I. 35.

VALENCE, BISHOP OF, I. 642.

VALENTIA, Roman province of, I. 8, 24, 25.

VALENTINE'S DAY, conduct of the Scotch council on, II. 709.

VANE, SIR HENRY, II. 609, 674.

VASSALLS' ACT, II. 849, 850.

VEITCH, WILLIAM, an ejected minister, II. 719.

VERAC, M., arrival of, with message from France, II. 119. Made prisoner at Dunbarton, 127.

VERNEY, SIR EDMUND, II. 562.

VESCI, WILLIAM DE, competitor for the crown, I. 87.

VESSELS of bronze and gold, I. 19.

VICENZA, BISHOP OF, I. 103.

VIENNE, JOHN DE, expedition of, to Scotland, I. 229. Invades England with the Scotch, 230. Anecdote of, lb.

VIKINGS, THE, I. 32. Oppose Harold, King of Norway, 45.

VILLORES, SEBASTIAN DE, accused of the murder of Darnley, II. 70.

VILMORE, M., appointed comptroller, I. 619.

VIFONT, SIR WILLIAM, I. 138.

VIFONT, ALAN DE, 188, 190.

VITELLI, MARQUIS OF, II. 109.

VITRIFIED PORTS, I. 16.

VOIDIE, THE, or parting cup, I. 271, 286.

"VOLANTE SQUADRON," I. 817.

VOLUNTEERS, THE, II. 860, 861, 921.

W.

WADE, GENERAL, II. 788, 878, 883, 934, 935, 936, 941.

WADSE, attempts to regulate, I. 543.

WALKER, PRINCE OF, birth, II. 740.

WALLACE, SIR WILLIAM, sheriff, I. 93. First exploits of, 94. Joined by Bruce, Earl of Carrick, and other barons, 95. Deserted by them, lb. His success, lb. Defeats the English at Stirling, 96. Invades England, 97. Chosen guardian of Scotland, 98. Defeats the Earl of Pembroke, lb. Defence of the country by, against invasion of Edward, 99, 100. His defeat, 102. Resigns the guardianship, lb. Visits France, and captures the Red Rover, 108. Summoned before parliament, 109. Capture, trial, and execution of, 110, 111.

WALLACE OF CRAIGIE, slain at the battle of Sark, I. 327.

WALLACE, ADAM, a reformer, trial and martyrdom of, I. 672, and note.

WALLACE, captain of the guard in the Chapel Royal, II. 742.

WALLINGFORD HOUSE, junior of, II. 679.

WALPOLE, SIR ROBERT, II. 849, 875, 881, 910.

WALSH, a Jacobite, owner of the Doutelle, II. 914.

WALSINGHAM, English ambassador, II. 188, 189, 204, 205, 208, 213, 217, 219, 220, 221, 227, 233, 329.

WAR, CIVIL, commencement of the, II. 606. Crisis of the, 614. Renewal of the, 630. Termination of the, 634.

WARBECK, PERKIN, I. 386. Visit of, to Scotland, 387. His marriage, lb. Accompanies James IV. in his invasion of England, 388. His fate, 389.

WARDENS, BORDER, II. 490.

WARDLAW, HENRY, Bishop of St. Andrew's, I. 249, 258. Establishes the University of St. Andrew's, 278.

WARRISTON, SIR ARCHIBALD JOHNSTON OF, [See JOHNSTON.]

WARWICK, EARL OF, at Pinkle, I. 606.

WAT OF HARDEN, II. 497.

WATT, a freebooter, II. 666.

WEAPONS AND ARMOUR, I. 547.

- WEBERTON, JOHN DE, i. 127.
 WEBSTER, REV. MR., libels Professor Simpson, ii. 892.
 WEDDERBURN, SIR JOHN, a Jacobite, execution of, ii. 956.
 WEDDINGS, PENNY, ii. 327.
 WEEMS, OF CAVER, i. 17.
 WEEMS CASTLE, seat of the chief of Clan Menzies, ii. 788.
 WEEMS, LAIRD OF, ii. 801.
 WELSH, THE, at the battle of Bannockburn, i. 138.
 WELSH, REV. JOHN, of Ayr, trial and defence of, ii. 472. Banishment of, 489. Courage of his wife, ib.
 WEMYSS OF LOGIE, ii. 346.
 WEMYSS, EARL OF, commissioner to the General Assembly, ii. 601.
 WEST, DR., embassy of, i. 400.
 WESTERN ISLES, voyage of James V. to, i. 455. State of, in 1603, ii. 405.
 WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY. [See ASSEMBLY.]
 WESTMINSTER HALL, trial of Charles I. in, ii. 647. Consecration of Scotch bishops in, 689.
 WESTMORELAND, EARL OF, rebellion of, against Elizabeth, ii. 109. Noticed, 116.
 WEST NESBIT, defeat of Scots at, i. 247.
 WHARTON, LORD, English warden, inroad of, i. 611. Defeat of, 612. Cruelty of, 613.
 WHARTON, LORD, condemned to be shot, ii. 586. Saved by the Marquis of Hamilton, ib.
 WHIGS, mentioned, ii. 841, 845, 850, 876, 924.
 WHITEFORD, COLONEL, at the battle of Preston, ii. 925, 927.
 WHITEHALL, ii. 604, 605, 649, 681.
 WHITEFIELD, GEORGE, the Methodist, visit of, to Scotland, ii. 903, 904.
 WIDDINGTON, LORD, a Jacobite peer, ii. 856, 865. His brother mentioned, 862. Impeachment of, 875. Release of, 877.
 WIGHT, ISLE OF, Charles I. escapes to, ii. 640, 641, 645.
 WIGHTMAN, GENERAL, ii. 851, 859. Commands the centre of the royal army at Sheriffmuir, 867. Disperses a Jacobite force, 879.
 WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR, invades Scotland, i. 40.
 WILLIAM II., surnamed "The Lion," succeeds to the throne, invades England, and is made prisoner, i. 68. Surrenders the independence of Scotland, ib. Return and marriage of, 69. Recovers the independence, 70. Misunderstanding of, with John, 71. Marches against Guthred, and death of, ib.
 WILLIAM OF ORANGE, landing of, in England, ii. 740. Summons a convention, 741. Is proclaimed king, ib. Declaration of, published in Scotland, 742. His consultation with a number of leading Scotchmen, 744. Proclamation issued by, for protection of the episcopal ministers, 745. Letter of, to the Scottish estates, 746. Crown of Scotland settled on, 748. Coronation oath taken by, 749. His views respecting church government, 752, 754. Objected to by the Cameronians, 756. Letters of, to the General Assembly, 760, 767. Influenced by Carstairs, 750, 763. Feelings of, towards Scottish statesmen, 792. Instructions of, to Melville respecting patronage, 795. His treatment of Montgomery, 796. Implicated in the massacre of Glencoe, 800, 806, note P. Appendix to vol. ii. His unjust policy in regard to the Darien scheme, 809. His barbarous orders respecting the Darien colonists, 811. Death and character of, 812.
 WILLIAM, FORT, erection of, ii. 792. McIan of Glencoe's visit to, 799. Spoil of the Macdonalds taken to, 803. Noticed, 911, 916, 947.
 WILLIAMS, THOMAS, chaplain to Regent Arran, i. 660.
 WILLIAMS, ARCHBISHOP, ii. 604.
 WILLIS, GENERAL, ii. 863. Attacks the rebels at Preston, 864. Grants terms to them, 865.
 WILLOCK, JOHN, a Reformer, i. 638. At the death of the queen-regent, 644. Noticed, 682, 684, 687, 690.
 WILSON, a servant of Bothwell, share of, in the murder of Darnley, ii. 45, 46. Sent to the Castle of Hermitage, 50.
 WILSON, GEORGE, at the rescue of the king from Gowrie, ii. 387.
 WILSON, MARGARET, a Scottish martyr, ii. 729.
 WILSON, a smuggler, the cause of the Porteous mob, ii. 885, 886.
 WILSON, WILLIAM, one of the first Seceders, ii. 897, 899, 900, 902, 903.
 WILSON, FLORENCE. [See VOLUSENUS FLORENTINUS.]
 WILTON, LORD GREY DE, conspiracy of, ii. 401. His trial and condemnation, ib. Pardon of, 402.
 WIMUND, an adventurer, invades the mainland of Scotland, i. 63. Imprisoned, 64.
 WINDSOR, council of officers held at, ii. 641. Charles I. brought to, 647.
 WINE, adulteration of, i. 377.
 WINRAM, JOHN, sub-prior of St. Andrews, i. 669. Appointed superintendent of Elfe, 690; ii. 257.
 WINRAM, GEORGE, of Liberton, his zeal in the cause of Covenanters, ii. 553.
 WINRAM, MAJOR, one of the persecutors of the covenanters, ii. 729.
 WINTON, EARL OF, a Jacobite peer, ii. 859, 860, 861, 865. Impeachment of, 874. Defence of, 876. Escape and fate of, ib.
 WINZERT, NYNIA, a learned Scotchman, ii. 295, 296, 317, 318.
 WISHART, ROBERT, Bishop of Glasgow, i. 115, 119, 139.
 WISHART, GEORGE, the martyr, i. 595. Character and conduct of, 663. Capture, trial, and martyrdom of, 664, 665. Attempts made to defame his character, 667.
 WISHART, DR., biographer of Montrose, ii. 624. Narrative of, 659.
 WISHART, PRINCIPAL, ii. 921.
 WITCHES, proceedings against, ii. 340, 341, 372. Trial and execution of, ii. 958—966. Repeal of laws against, 966.
 WITHAM, GENERAL, at Sheriffmuir, ii. 867.
 WITNESSES, CLOUD OF, quoted, ii. 716, 717, 730, 731, 909, 967, Appendix L. to vol. ii.
 WODKOW, quoted, ii. 687, 692, 710, 720, 725, 726, Appendix L. to vol. ii.
 WOGAN, COLONEL, gallant exploits and death of, ii. 674.
 WOLF, OF Badenoch. [See BUCHAN.]
 WOOD, JOHN, secretary of Regent Moray, i. 96.
 WOOD, SIR ANDREW, the celebrated admiral, i. 353. Exploits of, 378, 382.
 WORCESTER, MARQUIS OF, ii. 631.
 WORCESTER, BATTLE OF, and victory of Cromwell, ii. 672.
 WORTHES, SCOTS, quoted, ii. 729, 730, 909.
 WOTTON, SIR EDWARD, English ambassador, ii. 205—211.
 WYND, HENRY, takes part in the battle of Clan Chattan and Clan Kay, i. 239, 297.
 WYNTON, ANDREW, author of the "Cronykil of Scotland," noticed, and his work described, i. 295.

X.

- XANTONGE, BISHOP OF, i. 269.
 XANTONGE, COUNTY OF, i. 419.
 XIPHILINE, quoted, i. 14, 18.

Y.

- YESTER, LORD, i. 441.
 YESTER, LORD, i. 610; ii. 331.
 YETHOLM, muster of the Scots at, i. 232.
 YORK, i. 448, 458. Siege of, ii. 613.
 YORK, ARCHBISHOP OF, i. 850.
 YORK, DUKE OF, expedition of, i. 344.
 YORK, DUKE OF, ii. 716—720. [See JAMES VII.]
 YORK BUILDINGS COMPANY, ii. 882.
 YORKISTS, i. 344.
 YULE, OR CHRISTMAS, observance of, i. 416; ii. 325.

Z.

- ZEALAND, i. 262, 397.
 ZOUCHE, WILLIAM le, i. 161.

- WAT OF HARDEN, ii. 497.
 WATT, a freebooter, ii. 666.
 WEAPONS AND ARMOUR, i. 221, 266, 282, 371, 547, 608.

- WADE, GENERAL, ii. 788, 878, 883, 934, 935, 936, 941.
 WAGES, OF LABOUR, i. 183. Attempts to regulate, 543.

ERRATA.

Vol. I.,	page 224,	2nd col.,	sentence, "In addition," &c., delete last clause.
"	"	239, 1st	" line 28, for James read David.
"	"	325, 2nd	" 48. " Isabella read Margaret.
"	"	403, 1st	" side note, for Owen read Arran.
"	"	418, 1st	" line 29, side-note, for Arran read Angus.
"	"	440, 1st	" 52, for Pathhead read Parkhead.
"	"	443, 2nd	" 39, " Henderson read Henderland.
"	"	613, 1st	" lines 14 and 31, for G.ay read Grey.
Vol. II.,	"	259, 2nd	" line 23, for Andrews read St. Andrew's.
"	"	569, 1st	" third side-note, for retraction read retraction.
"	"	691, 1st	" line 43, third side-note, for vicars and read presbyterian.

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

H&SS
B 172
V.2

