

Presented to the LIBRARY of the UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO
by

MRS. TALBOT P. GRUBBE

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

PRINCE CHARLES EDWARD STUART.

The Pictorial History of SCOTLAND.
VOL. II.

Copied by permission of Mr A. Hill.

PRINCE CHARLES EDWARD AND THE HIGHLANDERS ENTERING EDINBURGH AFTER THE BATTLE OF PRESTON PANS

T. P. GRUBBE
TORONTO

THE PICTORIAL
HISTORY OF SCOTLAND,

FROM

The Roman Invasion to the Close of the Jacobite Rebellion.

A.D. 79 — 1746.

BY JAMES TAYLOR, D.D.,

ASSISTED BY

PROFESSOR LINDSAY, D.D., PROFESSOR EADIE, D.D., LL.D., JOHN ANDERSON, D.D., GEORGE MACDONALD, ESQ., F.E.I.S.,

AND OTHER CONTRIBUTORS.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. II.

ILLUSTRATED WITH ENGRAVINGS ON STEEL.

LONDON:

JAMES S. VIRTUE, CITY ROAD AND IVY LANE;
AND NEW YORK: 26, JOHN STREET.

1859.

1133889

TO

THE REV. JOHN BROWN, D.D.,

PROFESSOR OF EXEGETICAL THEOLOGY TO THE UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH,

AND

SENIOR MINISTER OF THE UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CONGREGATION, BROUGHTON PLACE, EDINBURGH,

THIS VOLUME

IS AFFECTIONATELY DEDICATED BY

HIS GRATEFUL PUPIL AND FRIEND,

JAMES TAYLOR.

CONTENTS OF VOL. II.

CHAPTER XXXI.		CHAPTER XLIX.
	A.D.		A.D.
Ecclesiastical History	1561—1567.	Charles the First	1644—1647.
	PAGE 1		PAGE 615
CHAPTER XXXII.		CHAPTER L.
Mary	1566—1567. 31	Charles the First	1647—1649. 638
CHAPTER XXXIII.		CHAPTER LI.
Regency of the Earl of Moray	1568—1569. 85	The Commonwealth	1649—1660. 652
CHAPTER XXXIV.		CHAPTER LII.
Regencies of Lennox and Mar	1570—1572. 116	Charles the Second	1660—1685. 682
CHAPTER XXXV.		CHAPTER LIII.
Regency of Morton	1572—1574. 141	James the Seventh	1685—1688. 728
CHAPTER XXXVI.		CHAPTER LIV.
James the Sixth	1584—1587. 194	Ecclesiastical History	1688—1712. 750
CHAPTER XXXVII.		CHAPTER LV.
Ecclesiastical History	1566—1570. 238	William and Mary	1688—1694. 777
CHAPTER XXXVIII.		CHAPTER LVI.
Ecclesiastical History	1570—1585. 255	William	1694—1702. 807
CHAPTER XXXIX.		CHAPTER LVII.
Literary History of the Period	1465—1600. 285	Anne	1702—1707. 812
CHAPTER XL.		CHAPTER LVIII.
Manners and Morals of the Period	1542—1600. 316	Anne	1707—1714. 831
CHAPTER XLI.		CHAPTER LIX.
James the Sixth	1587—1603. 328	George the First	1714—1716. 842
CHAPTER XLII.		CHAPTER LX.
James the Sixth	1603—1625. 400	George the First and Second	1716—1736. 878
CHAPTER XLIII.		CHAPTER LXI.
Ecclesiastical History	1583—1603. 418	Ecclesiastical History	1712—1820. 888
CHAPTER XLIV.		CHAPTER LXII.
Ecclesiastical History	1603—1625. 468	George the Second	1741—1746. 909
CHAPTER XLV.		CHAPTER LXIII.
State of the Borders	1511—1613. 490	Manners and Morals of the Period	1576—1688. 958
CHAPTER XLVI.
Charles the First	1625—1638. 502
CHAPTER XLVII.
Charles the First	1639—1641. 553
CHAPTER XLVIII.
Charles the First	1641—1644. 593
		APPENDIX 972
		INDEX 998

THE PICTORIAL HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

CHAPTER XXXI.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

A.D. 1561—1567.

AFTER the death of Francis II., King of France, the Romanists in Scotland, anticipating the speedy Views and efforts of Romanists and Protestants at the time of Mary's return. return of the now widowed Scottish queen to her own dominions, cherished the hope that this event would prove highly advantageous to their cause; and when the time appointed for the meeting of Parliament drew nigh—viz. May, 1561—they assembled in large numbers in Edinburgh, and made no secret of their expectations. The Reformers, also, felt that it was their duty to take some measures for the protection of their principles, which had so recently received the sanction and support of law; and they, like their opponents, appeared in considerable force in the metropolis. They paraded the streets in companies, though in a peaceable and orderly manner, taking possession in particular of the High-street, from which the bishops and their followers were thus excluded.* On the 27th of May, a meeting of ministers and laymen connected with the reformed cause was convened, which has been designated the Second General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. At this meeting it was resolved to present a humble supplication to the lords of the Secret Council, craving the ratification of certain specified points, all of which had been embraced in the Book of Discipline, and to which many of the lords, therefore, had already given their concurrence. These points had reference to the suppression of idolatry, and all its monuments; the appointment of some fixed provision for superintendents and ministers, exhorters and readers; the augmentation of the number of superintendents and ministers; the infliction of punishment on those who abused and despised the sacraments; and the adoption of means for preventing popish bulls from being promulgated and carried into effect in Scotland.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 126; Knox, vol. ii. p. 161.

These topics are exhibited at considerable length under seven different heads, which are designated Articles; and then follows the supplication, expressed in a bold and resolute tone. "Please your honours, and the wisdoms of such as are presently convened with you in council, to understand, that by many arguments we may perceive what the pestilent generation of the Roman antichrist within this realm intendeth; to wit, that they would of new erect their idolatry, take upon them empire above our conscience, and so command us, the true subjects of this realm, and such as God of his mercy hath under our sovereign subjected unto us, in all things to obey their appetites. Honesty craveth, and conscience moveth us, to make the very secrets of our hearts patent to your honours in that behalf, which is this; that before these tyrants and dumb dogs ever empire above us, and above such as God hath subjected unto us, we the barons and gentlemen professing Christ Jesus within this realm, are fully determined to hazard life, and whatsoever we have received of God in temporal things. Most humbly, therefore, we beseech your honours that such order may be taken, that we have not occasion to take again the sword of just defence into our hands, which we have willingly, after God had given victory both to your honours and to us, resigned over into your hands, to the end that God's Gospel may be publicly preached within this realm, the true ministers thereof reasonably sustained, idolatry suppressed, and the committers thereof punished, according to the laws of God and man. In doing whereof your honours shall find us not only obedient to you in all things lawful, but also ready at all times to bring into order and obedience such as would rebel against your just authority, which, in absence of our sovereign, we acknowledge to be in your hands; beseeching your honours, with upright judgment and indifferency, to look upon these our few articles; and by these, our brethren,* to signify unto us such Supplication addressed to the Council.

* The deputation consisted of the Master of Lindsay, afterwards Lord Lindsay of Byres; Gordon, Laird of answers again, as may declare your honours worthy of that place whereunto God, after some danger sustained, in his mercy hath called you. And let these enemies of God assure themselves, that if your honours put not order unto them, we shall shortly take such order, that they shall neither be able to do what they list, nor yet to live upon the sweat of the brows of men, who are no debtors to them. Let your honours conceive of us nothing but all humble obedience in God; but let the papists be yet once again assured, that their pride and idolatry we will not suffer." *

This supplication was favourably received by the Secret Council. Lord James Stewart had by this time returned from France, bringing letters from the queen,† in which she expressed it to be her will, that whilst the Council maintained quietness, and suffered nothing to be done in violation of the treaty made at Leith, till she returned herself, they were to allow the religious system at present established to continue undisturbed.‡ Now, the articles presented by the commissioners of the Reformed Church, were considered as indispensable to the safety and unfettered operation of the new ecclesiastical body; and, therefore, an ordinance was passed by the Council, corresponding to every head of the articles above-mentioned, and concurring with all the views that were expressed in them.§ At the same

Lochinvar; Kerr, Laird of Fernihirst, ancestor of the Marquis of Lothian; Douglas, Laird of Whittingham, afterwards a senator of the College of Justice; Thomas Menzies, Provost of Aberdeen; and George Lovell, Burgess of Dundee.—Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 6.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 127, 128; Knox, vol. ii. pp. 162, 163.

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 166; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 129; Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 437; Cook's History of the Reformation, vol. iii. p. 14; Burnet, vol. iii. p. 313; Leslie, lib. x. p. 533.

‡ The editor of Keith's History, and some others, deny that Lord James Stewart brought any kind of commission from France to Scotland. All that Keith himself however says, is, that while Knox speaks of letters, and Buchanan mentions a commission, Leslie makes no reference to either. Mr. Lawson maintains that Buchanan's statement about a commission is disproved by her majesty's own letter to Sir Nicholas Throckmorton. But this is a mistake. What Mary says in her letter is, that Lord James brought no commission from Scotland, but not that she gave him no commission back. Her own words are these—"I shall only here tell you that the Lord James, who is presently with me, came only to pay his duty to me as his sovereign lady, without any commission whatsoever relating to anything else." Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, however, says, in his letter to Queen Elizabeth, that, although Mary had intended to give a formal commission under her seal to Lord James Stewart, yet she afterwards changed her mind, and sent after him by the messenger he left behind, not the commission he expected, but only certain letters. It cannot, therefore, admit of reasonable question, that there were at least written instructions sent by her majesty to Scotland with Lord James Stewart, with regard to the management of affairs till the period of her own return. And this is just what Knox affirms. The mere silence of Leslie is not sufficient to disprove the positive testimony of so many other witnesses; for, although he returned in the retinue of her majesty, yet, having failed in the special object of his own mission to France, he might not be cognisant of all that was done.—Keith, vol. ii. pp. 24–27.

§ Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 128–130; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 6.

time it was decreed, that the remaining monuments of idolatry should be destroyed, and the Earls of Arran, Argyle, and Glencairn, were directed to carry out this object in the west, whilst Lord James was appointed to proceed with the same view to the north. In the west, the abbeyes of Failfurd, Kilwinning, Crossraguel, and Paisley, were demolished;* and in the north, such changes were effected as greatly displeased the Earl of Huntly, though he feigned acquiescence in all that was done.

The uprightness and Christian integrity of Lord James Stewart, in the course he pursued, are susceptible of the most decisive proof. When he waited upon the queen, his sister, in France, she was willing to place herself entirely under his direction, and to give him a commission under her seal; but his religious principles, and his conviction that it was for the advantage of his country to remain on good terms with the Protestant kingdom of England, were the great barriers to his advancement. Strenuous efforts were made by her majesty, and by the Cardinal of Lorraine, to detach him from his religious views and associates, but he stood firm against all their solicitations and arguments; and Sir Nicholas Throckmorton affirms, in his letter to Elizabeth, that this was the reason why the formal commission promised to him was not given. "The special cause why she hath changed her opinion of my Lord James is, that she could by no means dissuade him from his devotion and good opinion towards your majesty, and the observation of the league between your majesty and the realm of Scotland. And also that she, nor the Cardinal of Lorraine, could not win nor divert him from his religion, wherein they used very great means and persuasions. Neither the fear of his sovereign's indignation could waver him, nor great promises win him." Steadfastness amid such temptations to laxity and change, is commonly regarded as the best possible proof of incorruptible integrity.†

Mary's arrival in her own dominions, which took place on the 19th of August and called forth the liveliest demonstrations of satisfaction and joy, was an event that could not fail to exert a marked influence upon the state of religious parties in Scotland. Educated in the Romish faith, and long accustomed to consider the religion professed by her subjects as a most wicked heresy, she could not be expected to give her cordial support to an order of things which had been so recently established, and established too against her will. On the contrary, she was persuaded that it would be the crowning glory of her reign to bring back her kingdom to its ancient allegiance to the Pope; and her uncles of the house of Guise, who were parties to a league sanctioned by the Council of Trent for suppressing

Mary's views with regard to religious affairs in Scotland.

* Considerable portions of the abbeyes of Paisley and Crossraguel still continue in existence, and some partial remains of the other two.

† See Sir Nicholas Throckmorton's letter, as recorded in Keith, vol. ii. p. 29.

the Reformation throughout Europe,* used all their influence to confirm her in her views, and to secure her co-operation in their scheme for the destruction of all religious liberty. That it was her fixed purpose to restore the Roman Catholic religion on the first favourable opportunity is plain, from a conference which she had before leaving Paris with Throckmorton, the English ambassador.† “I trust,” said Mary, “the queen, your mistress, will not encourage my subjects to continue in their disobedience, nor to take upon them things that appertain not to subjects. You know there is much ado in my realm about matters of religion.”—“Madam,” he replied, “as you think it unmeet to be constrained by your subjects, so it may like you to consider, the matter is as intolerable to them to be constrained by you in matters of conscience; for the duty due to God cannot be given to any other without offence of His majesty.”—“Why,” said she, “God doth command subjects to be obedient to their princes; and commandeth princes to read his law, and govern thereby themselves and the people committed to their charge.” Subjects, in Mary’s view, were bound to follow the religion of their sovereign. The designs of the queen are still more apparent from the letters of Cardinal St. Croix to Cardinal Borromeo, which describe how encouraging Mary’s uncle, the Grand Prior of France, conceived the prospects of popery to be in Scotland at the time he left that country, and how favourably he considered matters were advancing for the restoration, at no distant period, of the ancient religion.‡ It was the queen’s purpose to depress, by little and little, the party of the Reformers, until those who were attached to the Romish church became so strong, as to be able to regulate all things after their own mind. Meanwhile, however, it was necessary to dissemble, as the Protestants were the most numerous body in the kingdom, and were possessed of all power; and, accordingly, Mary professed that she had no intention of disturbing the settlement of religious affairs, which had been made by parliament before her arrival. The reformed church was to stand, so long as it should appear unsafe to attempt its overthrow.

The Protestant nobles who had sent Lord James Stewart to France to invite their sovereign home, were unwilling that she should be allowed more than the private exercise of her religion; and there were not a few who considered even this concession to be inconsistent with the claims of public duty, and dangerous to the welfare of the nation. The very flattering reception, however, which the queen received on her arrival in her own kingdom, and the opinion of her uncles that she should take advantage of the spirit of loyalty so highly excited in her favour,§ determined her to profess her religion, and observe its rites with more publicity than was agreeable to her subjects; and she ordered preparations to be made for the celebration of a solemn mass in the chapel of Holyrood House, the very Sunday after her arrival. The first rumour of this intention kindled a flame of dissatisfaction. It seemed as if all that had been acquired by the toilsome efforts and painful sufferings of years was now to be lost in one moment. Threatening crowds gathered around the abbey, declaring that they would not suffer the realm to be profaned by the idolatry of the mass. The Mas- ^{Tumult in consequence.} ter of Lindsay, followed by a crowd as excited as himself, rushed into the court of the palace, and cried out that the idolatrous priest should die the death according to God’s law. The wax candles were broken on the way to the chapel, and every thing portended a serious tumult, when some of the leading men among the Protestants exerted themselves to repress the zeal of the multitude, and to restore tranquillity. Knox did what lay in his power to dissuade his followers from employing force to prevent the service.* He tells us, that he was so concerned for the public tranquillity, and so loath to offend those of whom he had conceived a good opinion, that in secret he strove to mitigate and cool the fervency with which multitudes were animated against conceding to the queen the liberty which she desired, though he afterwards came to think that he had done wrong on this occasion. Lord James Stewart also exerted himself to preserve the public tranquillity, taking his station at the door of the chapel, under the pretence of keeping Scotsmen from witnessing the profane rites of popery, but really with the view of guarding against disturbance.† Still the dissatisfaction continued; the Protestants repaired in great companies to the abbey in the afternoon, and it was loudly demanded that there should be no repetition of an idolatrous rite, which was utterly opposed to the holy Scriptures, and forbidden under pain of death by the law of the land.

After a few days a proclamation was issued by the queen, with the advice of the Privy Council, for the purpose of ^{Proclamation issued by the} quieting the public mind. Refe- ^{queen and Privy} rence was made to the great in- ^{Council.} conveniences that might result from the religious differences of the nation, and to the intention of her majesty to take measures for effecting a settlement, that might be conducive to the honour of God and the tranquillity of the realm; and meanwhile all men were forbidden, under pain of death, to attempt any change either publicly or privately upon the religious system that existed in the country at the time of her majesty’s arrival. At the same time, the proclamation strictly charged all the lieges that none should molest or trouble any of her majesty’s domestic servants, or any of those who had come in her company from France, in word, deed, or countenance, for any cause what-

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 131.

† Keith, vol. ii. p. 33; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 134.

‡ McCrie’s Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 305.

§ Ibid. p. 24.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 277.

† Spottiswood, p. 179; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 148.

soever, either within the palace or without, or make any derision or invasion of them under any pretence whatever, under pain of death.* This last clause, although it made no direct mention of liberty of conscience, was designed for the protection of the queen and her followers in the exercise of their religion, and it gave serious offence to the Offence taken at the proclamation. great mass of the Protestants. The Earl of Arran protested against it on the ground, that although her majesty's servants were not to be interfered with in the prosecution of their lawful business, yet idolatry was an offence against God, more abominable and odious than even murder, and, therefore, no more to be tolerated than that crime. John Knox, too, on the following Sunday, preached against the idolatry of the mass, and against the toleration of it that was covertly implied in the proclamation of the Secret Council, declaring that one mass was more fearful to him than if ten thousand armed enemies were landed in any part of the realm, of purpose to suppress the whole religion. "For," said he, "in our God there is strength to resist and confound multitudes, if we unfeignedly depend upon him, whereof heretofore we have had experience: but when we join hands with idolatry, there is no doubt but that God's amicable presence and comfortable defence leaveth us, and what shall then become of us? Alas! I fear that experience shall teach us to the grief of many."†

The opposition of the Reformers to the mass, and the difficulty with which Mary succeeded in obtaining liberty to observe it even in her own chapel, have been a thousand times appealed to as exhibiting decisive evidence of the unparalleled bigotry that reigned in Scotland at the time of the Reformation. But the premises only support the conclusion, if we apply to the Scotchmen of that day the maxims of religious liberty which are now universal amongst Protestants. This, however, is manifestly unjust. The true theory of religious liberty was quite unknown in those days. Our reforming forefathers must be tried, not by the standard of the present age, but by the standard of their own times. The proper question is, did they fall behind their contemporaries, or were they quite upon a level with them, or were they, perhaps, even somewhat in advance? Were they less tolerant of Romanists than Romish nations were of Protestants in the same age? No man who is acquainted with the history of those times can for a moment doubt, that the proceedings of the Scottish Reformers will bear comparison with the proceedings of any other nation in Europe. What Roman Catholic kingdom can be mentioned, that received with open arms an avowedly Protestant prince, coming to them from a foreign country in the helpless plight in which Mary came to Scotland? Did the French nation cheerfully submit to the government of Henry IV., who had been educated in Protestant principles, and whose title to the throne was undoubted? No; they compelled him to avow himself a Roman Catholic, and to join in the observance of mass;* and even his recantation of the principles in which he had been reared never effaced the stain of heresy from his name, nor secured the affections of his Roman Catholic subjects. Now the parallel to this on the part of the Scottish Reformers, would have been their refusal to recognise the title of Mary to the throne unless she avowed herself a Protestant, and joined in the observance of Protestant worship. But, all-powerful as they were in the country, and weak and helpless as she was, they never dreamed of proposing such conditions to her: they cordially welcomed her home, and even tolerated her (although doubtless with scruples on the part of many) in the observance of her own religion. It is undeniable, therefore, that the Scottish nation acted towards Mary with unexampled liberality, and proved themselves to be decidedly in advance of their age. And this is the judgment pronounced by a French writer, who is more just to our Reformers than many sympathisers with Romanism among ourselves. "Mary," he says, "was brought up in France, accustomed to see Protestants burnt to death, and instructed in the maxims of her uncles, the Guises, who maintained that it was necessary to exterminate without mercy the pretended reformed. With these dispositions she arrived in Scotland, which was wholly reformed, with the exception of a few lords. The kingdom received her, acknowledged her as their queen, and obeyed her in all things according to the laws of the country. I maintain, that in the state of men's spirits at that time, if a Huguenot queen had come to take possession of a Roman Catholic kingdom with the slender retinue with which Mary went to Scotland, the first thing they would have done would have been to arrest her, and if she persevered in her religion, they would have procured her degradation by the Pope, thrown her into the Inquisition, and burnt her as a heretic. There is not an honest man who can deny this."†

What degree of blame our ancestors are fairly open to.

It was a favourite saying of Mary's, when she was pleading for permission to observe all the rites of her own religion, "Conscience—conscience! it is a sore matter to constrain the conscience." This is an undeniable truth. But did the Romanists remember it, when they burned Patrick Hamilton, and George Wishart, and Walter Mill? Did the Romanists remember it, when they offered to Henry IV. the alternative of the loss of his kingdom, or the abjuration of his religion? Did Mary herself remember it, when she entered into the scheme of her uncles to reduce Scotland again under the spiritual dominion of the Pope? The true test of a genuine regard to the rights of conscience, is not the liberty men are ready to claim for themselves, but the liberty they are willing to

* Browning's History of the Huguenots, p. 186.

† Histoire du Calvinisme et celle du Papisme mises en parallèle; ou Apologie pour les Reformateurs, pour la Reformation, et pour les Reformez, tome i. p. 334. A Rotterdam, 1683. McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 28.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 272; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 144.

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 276.

concede to others, when they have power and are in a position to impose restrictions. Until the Romanists give us some examples of this species of regard to the rights of conscience, their outcry against disabilities laid upon themselves is unworthy of a moment's notice. Let them come into court with clean hands. The remarks of Bayle are just as applicable and as worthy of regard at the present moment, as when they were first written. "The papists themselves are the first in this country—viz. Britain—to exclaim that there is nothing more unjust than to distress conscience: a sentiment ridiculous in their mouth, and not only ridiculous, but treacherous, and marked with that dishonesty which they have uniformly discovered for so many ages. For they would not fail, in three years, to burn and butcher all who refused to go to mass, if they acquired the power, and could avail themselves of the baseness of a sufficient number of court parasites—men of venal souls, and unworthy of the Protestant name which they bear—to overturn the fundamental barriers which so salutarily restrain the royal power."*

That Mary's concern for the rights of conscience was of the one-sided character which has always prevailed among Romanists, plainly appears from the famous conference she had with Knox, shortly after the disturbance occasioned by the celebration of mass in the chapel of Holyrood House. After calling the Reformer to account for the theoretical views he entertained regarding female government, as is recorded at length in the preceding chapter of this history, her majesty thus addressed him: "But you have taught the people to receive another religion than their princes can allow. How can that doctrine be of God, seeing God commandeth subjects to obey their princes?" Here it is assumed that subjects have no right to form their own religious opinions; that it is the conscience of the prince, and not of the people, which alone is entitled to consideration; and that if they adopt a religion not sanctioned by the civil power, they are chargeable with rebellion. Her maxim embodied the very essence of intolerance; for if subjects are bound to be of the same religion as their sovereign, then it must be his duty to compel them to abandon their own religious opinions and observances. The bold and unanswerable reply of the intrepid Reformer, so different from the smooth words generally spoken by the flatterers of princes, must have startled Mary: "Madam, as right religion took neither original nor authority from worldly princes, but from the eternal God above, so are not subjects bound to frame their religion according to the appetite of princes; for often it falleth forth, that princes are the most ignorant of all others of true religion. If the people of God had been of the religion of Pharaoh, to whom they were a long time subject, what religion should there have been in the world? The three children said expressly to Nebuchadnezzar, 'We will make it known to thee, O king, that we will not worship thy gods.'—"Think you," said she, "that subjects having power may resist their princes?"—"If their princes exceed bounds, madam, they may be resisted even by power. If children join together against their father, stricken with a phrenzy and seeking to slay his own children, take his weapons from him, bind his hands, and keep him in prison till his phrenzy overpass, do they any wrong? or will God be offended with them for hindering their father from committing horrible murder? Even so, madam, if princes would murder the children of God, their subjects, their blind zeal is but a mad phrenzy."*

Knox then brought forward his favourite idea, first enunciated in his famous discourse at St. Andrew's, that the Jewish people in our Lord's day had not degenerated so far from the institutions and ordinances given by Moses, as the Church of Rome had declined from the purity of the Gospel as exhibited in the writings of the Apostles. From this view Mary dissented, and alleged that she had read differently. "But have you heard any teach, but such as were allowed by the Pope and his cardinals?"—"You interpret Scripture," said she, "after one manner, and they after another: whom shall I believe, or who shall be judge?"—"Further than the Word teacheth you," said he, "ye shall neither believe the one nor the other. The Word of God is plain in itself. If there appear any obscurity in one place, the Holy Ghost, who is never contrarious to himself, explaineth the same in other places. Papists allege, that the mass is the institution of Christ Jesus, and a sacrifice for the quick and the dead: we say, it is but the invention of man, and, therefore, an abomination before God. Christ neither said nor commanded mass to be said at the last supper."—"You are too hard for me," said she; "but if they were here whom I have heard, they would answer you."—"Would to God," said he, "madam, the most learned papist in Europe, or whom you would most believe, were here present, and that ye would hear patiently the matter reasoned to the end!"—"Well," said she, "ye will, perhaps, get that sooner than ye believe."—"Assuredly," said he, "if ever I get it in my life, it is sooner than I believe: for the ignorant papists cannot reason patiently; the learned will never come in your audience to have the ground of their religion searched. They know they are not able to sustain reasoning, except fire and sword and their own laws be judges."—"So say ye," quoth the queen.—"So we have seen," said he, "to this day. For how oft have they been required to come to conference; but it could not be obtained, unless themselves were admitted judges? Therefore, madam, it behoveth me to say again, that they dare never dispute, but where themselves are both judge and party.”*

* Bayle, as quoted in McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 306.

* Knox, vol. ii. pp. 231, 232; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 151.

Knox has been blamed for the plainness with which he addressed Mary in this conference. Certainly, he brought some very unpalatable truths before her mind; and it would have been well if others too, instead of censuring him for his faithfulness, had copied his example, and spoken to her more frequently the words of truth and soberness. No persons in this world have suffered more than princes, from being kept in ignorance of important principles and facts; and those have been their greatest enemies, who have flattered their prejudices, and unduly exalted their prerogatives. Mary's own race were ultimately ruined by pertinaciously holding fast their lofty notions of arbitrary power and divine right, and no way of saving the country was left, but driving them from a throne, which they had long made the seat of tyranny and the instrument of oppression. Yet Mary herself is entitled to the deepest sympathy, for she had the unspeakable misfortune to stand in the breach when the conflict was just beginning between the rising spirit of liberty and the old ideas of the prince's power; and she had been brought up in circumstances the worst fitted that could be imagined to prepare her for her difficult duties. Hers was indeed a trying position, where hardly any course of conduct could shield her from perplexities and troubles. In a country where the great bulk of the people were of one religion, and the sovereign of another, and that too at a time when the principles of religious liberty were unknown, a conflict was inevitable; and the only question was, which party should be under the necessity of yielding. Mary thought that “the people should not be taught another religion than their prince allowed;” but the people, on the other hand, conceived that the prince should follow their religion; and succeeding generations, with one voice, have decided that this latter course affords the only practical solution of the difficulty. A people and a prince cannot long be of different religions with any reasonable prospect of good government; and as kings are made for the people, and not the people for kings, the prince must conform to the people's religion. Under a hereditary monarchy, the sovereign at least must be debarred from the full enjoyment of religious liberty, or, in words which are less offensive in appearance though the very same in substance, the nation have a right to say whether they shall be ruled by a sovereign whose religion they approve, or one whose religion they condemn. Those who blame the Reformers for adopting these so-called narrow notions, would do well to remember that they are the very notions upon which the British nation is acting at the present moment. And surely if it is right for us to continue restrictions, by which the throne is made inaccessible to certain sentiments and views, it could not be wrong in our forefathers to establish these restrictions at first. Nor can it be said that the sovereign is unfairly or harshly dealt with, for restrictions of some kind or other are necessarily connected with the privilege of hereditary succession to office. And when the restrictions cannot be conscientiously complied with, by no means let the prince violate his conscience; but let him, as an immortal being, who hopes to wear a heavenly crown, copy the godlike example of Moses, and sacrifice that earthly greatness, which could only be a snare and a temptation to him.

Knox himself maintained his principles with unflinching faithfulness, and, whether in the pulpit, or among the nobles, or in private conference with her majesty, he was always the same single-minded, truth-speaking, fearless man. But all connected with the Protestant interest were not actuated by the same exalted and unselfish views as the great Reformer, and all were not equally able to resist the blandishments of a court. Change in the feelings of many Protestants connected with the court.

The zeal of not a few began to evaporate after Mary's return from France; their interest in those religious doctrines, which they had professed before the world and vowed to maintain, suffered a sensible diminution; and this change became very apparent, when the time arrived for holding the next General Assembly of the Reformed Church. A considerable number whose duty it was to have been present absented themselves, and when some superintendents and ministers were sent to them to inquire into the reason, they complained that secret meetings had been held without their knowledge. The ministers, on their part, denied that anything had been done contrary to the order which had been agreed upon, and reproved them for not meeting with their brethren, according to an appointment in which they themselves had concurred. Some of the courtiers then questioned the propriety of holding conventions without the knowledge of the prince. To this it was replied, that the queen knew well enough that there was a Reformed Church within the realm, and that they had rules and regulations and appointed times for meeting. “True,” rejoined Maitland of Lethington, “the queen knows all this well enough, but the question is, whether the queen allows such conventions.” This was the remark of a selfish and time-serving man, who was prepared to sacrifice all the fruits of the long struggle, through which the nation had passed, to the will of a single individual. Knox replied, with a clearness and force which were irresistible: “If the liberty of the Church is to stand upon the queen's allowance or disallowance, we are assured we shall be deprived, not only of assemblies, but also of the public preaching of the Gospel. Take from us the freedom of assemblies, and take from us the Gospel; for without assemblies, how shall good order and unity in doctrine be kept? It is not to be supposed that all ministers shall discharge their office so duly, or behave themselves so well in their conversation, as that they shall not need admonition. It may be, also, some refractory persons will not admit the admonition of simple ministers; for remedy whereof, it is necessary that there be general assemblies holden, in which the judgment and gravity of many may correct and repress the follies and errors of a few.*

* Knox, vol. ii. pp. 284, 285; Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 152, 153.

These remarks carried conviction to the minds of the great majority of the nobility and barons who were present, and it was agreed to counsel her majesty not to interfere with the Assembly; but if she were jealous of what might be done at the meeting, to send commissioners to attend in her interest.

An attempt was also made, at this time, to procure her majesty's ratification of the Book of Discipline; but Lethington sneered at the idea. "How many," said he, "of those who subscribed the book will be subject to it?"—"All the godly," it was answered.—"Will the Duke?" said he.—"If he will not," replied Lord Ochiltree, "I wish his name were not only scraped out of that book, but also out of our number and company; for why should men subscribe, if they mean not to do what they promised?" Lethington then affirmed that many subscribed in fide parentum, as children are baptised. But Knox rejoined, "that the remark was as untrue as it was unseasonable; for the book had been read in public audience, as they all knew, and its heads discussed for a number of days, and no man was asked to subscribe what he did not understand." The secretary, however, and the courtiers were immovable on this subject, and the ministers were given to understand, that the ratification of the Book of Discipline was a point that would never be conceded to them.†

Having failed in procuring the ratification of the Book of Discipline, the friends of the Reformed Church presented certain Articles to the Council, craving the suppression of idolatry, the settlement of faithful ministers throughout the country, and the appointment of a suitable provision for them. Reference was made to the promise of her majesty not to alter the religion which she found established in the country at the time of her arrival, but a church could not exist without ministers, and ministers could not exist without some provision for their support. Hitherto, however, the revenues of ecclesiastical benefices had gone either into the hands of noblemen and barons, or into those of the Romish clergy; and the church which had been established by parliament had received almost nothing. This was a difficult question for the Council to deal with. If the Reformed Church was to be upheld as the established church of the land, it must be supported: on the other hand, the parties who had possession of the church revenues were numerous and powerful, and would not relinquish them without a struggle. Many of the Romish bishops and abbots, when they began to see that their possessions were likely to go out of their hands, had granted perpetual leases to their friends and relatives, with the concurrence of the Pope; and many had made arrangements with powerful nobles in their neighbourhood, and had transferred their lands and revenues to them. And if the parties who were in possession of the church lands held them with a tenacious grasp, there was another party that really needed an accession of income as well as the Protestant ministers. The properties belonging to the crown had been greatly dilapidated during the long minority, and it was indispensable that some provision should be made for maintaining the queen and her court in suitable dignity. A compromise was the result of all these competing claims, and it was determined, at last, with the consent of the bishops and others interested, who felt that it was better to give up a part than run the risk of losing the whole,* that two-thirds of all ecclesiastical revenues should remain in the possession of the Romish clergy, or the "auld possessors," as they were designated, and that the remaining one-third should be conferred upon the crown, with the understanding that out of it the Protestant ministers should receive a suitable maintenance.†

Commissioners were accordingly appointed, to whom it was ordained that returns of the rentals of all benefices should be transmitted, from places within the "Mount," or the Grampian range, before the 24th of January ensuing, and from places beyond that boundary, before the 10th of February; but the returns transmitted to the commissioners were exceedingly few, and repeated injunctions required to be issued in order to ensure attention to the question. And while some neglected altogether to send returns, others made fraudulent valuations, and thus the gross amount of church revenues was represented to be far inferior to what it really was.‡

This whole arrangement gave great dissatisfaction to the Protestant ministers, and certainly it was open to serious objections. It was unreasonable that the Romish clergy, who were set aside by act of parliament from being the authorised instructors of the nation, should receive two-thirds of the ecclesiastical revenues, and that those upon whom the duty of preaching the Gospel to the community was laid by the government, should receive not even the remaining one-third, but only an uncertain fraction of it. Much better would it have been to secularise the whole mass of ecclesiastical property at once, converting it into a revenue for the support of the state and thereby lightening the public burdens, and leaving the teachers of religion to be supported by the voluntary offerings of those to whom they ministered.

* Knox, vol. ii. pp. 294, 296; Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 159, 160.

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 297; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 160.

* Spottiswood, p. 183.

† Tytler, vol. vi. p. 292.

‡ Knox, vol. ii. pp. 300—306.

The very idea that the government had undertaken the support of the Church, however imperfectly the duty might be performed, prevented the congregations from feeling that they had any special concern with that matter. If all support had been refused by government, the members of the various churches would have been trained to habits of liberality; and many evils that resulted subsequently from undue dependence upon the state, and from the exclusion of the people from an active concern in church affairs, would have been avoided. The people of Scotland were just as able, had they been thrown upon their own resources, to maintain religious ordinances, as the poor and persecuted churches of primitive times; and we know that in those early days the Gospel spread with a rapidity unexampled at any subsequent period. But the idea of the absolute necessity of public support to a church was an error of the age, which had become firmly rooted during the days of popish darkness, when the people hardly received any religious instruction at all, and when they were not recognised as having anything else to do with the church, but to observe her rites and ceremonies.

Knox expressed himself with great and merited severity regarding the distribution of the ecclesiastical revenues of the kingdom into three parts, and the appropriation of but a fragment of one of those parts to the support of the church now established by law. "If the end of this order pretended to be taken for sustentation of the ministers be happy, my judgment faileth me, for I am assured that the spirit of God is not the author of it; for first I see two parts freely given to the devil, and the third must be divided betwixt God and the devil. Well, bear witness to me that this day I say it, before long the devil shall have three parts of the third, and judge you then what God's portion shall be."*

Knox's view of the distribution of ecclesiastical revenues.

Besides the parties commissioned to ascertain the amount of ecclesiastical revenues, there were others appointed under the designation of "Modifiers," whose province it was to modify the stipends that should be paid to ministers; and certainly, if the excellence of modification lay, as the etymology of the word might suggest, in circumscribing within narrow limits, they discharged their duty with singular ability and success. It seems to have been their chief concern that the ministers should be well kept down, and have no opportunity of "being over wanton," to use the words of Knox, "in their living;" for to some they assigned but one hundred marks, and three hundred marks was the highest sum they allocated to any, excepting superintendents and a few others. And what added to the evil was, that even these miserable sums were not faithfully and regularly paid. The Laird of Pittarrow, who had been all along a warm friend of the Reformation, was the individual appointed to pay the stipends according to the modification made; and hence arose a satirical proverb, reflecting upon him: "The good Laird of Pittarrow was an honest, earnest professor of the true religion; but the devil may run away with the comptroller, for he and his collectors are become greedy factors."*

Not a few complaints were made by the ministers about the impossibility of their living upon the small sums allocated to them; but they were coolly told that many lairds had not so much at their disposal. To this it was replied, that the function of ministers craved books, quietness, leisure, and travail, to edify the kirk; whilst lairds could employ their time in waiting upon their worldly business. The stipends of ministers, who had no trade, should not be modified according to the rents of other men, who might, and daily did, augment their income by divers means. Their complaints, however, neither excited sympathy at court, nor obtained redress. One day, the Secretary Lethington, when the support of ministers was the subject of conversation, exclaimed in anger †—"The ministers have this much paid them yearly, and which of them all has ever yet thanked the queen for it, or thanked God for her majesty's liberality towards them?" Knox tells us that one smiled, and answered—(doubtless it was Knox himself)—"Assuredly, I think that such as have received anything gratis of the queen are unthankful, if they acknowledge it not. But ministers are not in this position. I am persuaded that neither third part, nor two parts, ever appertained to any of her predecessors within this realm these thousand years past. The queen hath no better title to what she usurps, either in giving to others, or taking to herself, than those who crucified Christ had to divide his garments; yea, not so much, for the soldiers parted not the garments of our Lord till he was crucified. But the queen and her flatterers part the spoil, while poor Christ is preaching amongst us. Let the Papists who have got the two parts, and some the thirds, free, and others who have gotten abbacies and kirk-lands in feu thank the queen: the poor preachers will not yet flatter for the feeding of their bellies."‡

Tytler avers that the arrangement regarding ecclesiastical revenues, when fairly considered, must be allowed to have been creditable to Mary, as involving a valuable and important concession, as legally recognising the right of Presbyterian ministers to be supported by the state, and as indicating her acquiescence in the reformed religion as the established faith of the country.§ But certainly this is building a huge structure upon a narrow foundation. No man can blame Mary for adhering, as an individual, to her

How far Mary deserves credit for the distribution of ecclesiastical revenues.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 172; Knox, vol. ii. p. 310; Tytler, vol. vi. p. 293.

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 312.

‡ Ibid.

§ Tytler, vol. vi. p. 293.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 310.

own religion; but to claim credit to her for not overturning the established religion of the country is an absurdity, when she must have felt that this was a thing utterly beyond her power, and that the very attempt to do it would have involved the immediate loss of her crown. It is plain from her conversation with Knox, already referred to, that she considered the maintenance of the Protestant religion as a painful necessity. "Ye are not the kirk," said she, "which I will nourish; I will defend the kirk of Rome, which I think to be the true kirk."* About this time, too, she received letters from the Pope and from her uncles in France, whose counsel she was always disposed to follow when she could do so with safety, advising her to show favour to the Earl of Huntly, who had most power, and was best inclined to advance the interests of the Romish faith; and it is a well authenticated fact that Huntly, before her majesty's northern expedition took place, made various attempts to assassinate the Earl of Mar, afterwards Moray, who was the principal support of the reformed cause. And Archbishop Spottiswood mentions that, about this time, when certain petitions were presented to the queen at Stirling for the abolition of mass, and other superstitious rites of the church of Rome, her reply was, "that she would do nothing in prejudice of the religion she professed, and that she hoped, before a year was expired, to have the mass and Catholic profession restored through the whole kingdom."†

Now, this was all natural enough on the part of Mary, and she can hardly be blamed for it. It was an honest avowal of what there can be no doubt she felt in her inmost soul; but certainly it shows the absurdity of making it a ground of commendation, that she acknowledged the reformed religion as the established faith, and agreed to give any amount, however small, of pecuniary support to its ministers. A more reasonable view of the subject is, that Mary hoped she might be able, at no distant period, to overthrow the reformed religion, and to restore the church of Rome to its former position in the country; and in this case the two-thirds, which were left in the hands of the Romish incumbents and their friends, would remain for the support of the restored system; and the one-third might continue in the possession of the queen, and be appropriated entirely to the expenses of the court.‡ And meanwhile the utterly inadequate provision that was made for the Protestant ministers was calculated, so far as outward appearances have any influence on the respectability of men, to bring them as an order into contempt. That they maintained their influence in the country at all, is a proof of the inherent vitality of their principles, and of the energy with which they devoted themselves to the preaching of the Gospel and the discharge of their official duties.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 233; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 152.

† Spottiswood, p. 185; McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 60.

‡ Hetherington's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 34.

An assembly of the church was held at Edinburgh, on the 29th of June, in the Meeting of the house of Mr. Henry Lauder, com- General Assembly prising superintendents, ministers, at Edinburgh. elders, and barons, as commissioners from towns and shires. The whole number present amounted, according to the Book of the Universal Kirk, to thirty-five;* which shows, after every allowance is made for those who might be unable to attend, that but a small portion of the country as yet was planted with churches, and brought under the care of settled ministers. The first business that engaged the attention of the assembly was an inquiry into the doctrine, life, and diligence of the various office-bearers of the church; after which, all present were required to give an account of the state of religion in their several districts, and to mention any offences or crimes of whose prevalence they were cognisant, that a timely remedy might be applied. Measures were also adopted for securing the cordial co-operation of elders with ministers in the government of the church; and ministers were strictly enjoined to be subject to superintendents, who were to visit them from time to time, and to take notice particularly what books they had in their possession, and what evidence they gave of having faithfully and profitably perused them. On account of the great scarcity of preachers, temporary arrangements were made, to subsist till the next assembly, by which a number of ministers were required to preach at intervals in certain vacant churches. It was found that Mr. John Sharp had altogether relinquished preaching; and although he pleaded inability to continue this duty till he should have acquired further knowledge, the assembly were satisfied with his gifts, and ordained him to serve in the ministry wherever the superintendent of Lothian should place him, under pain of incurring the censures of the church. Mr. Sharp, however, followed his own course. He became an advocate, and long practised at the bar with great success; nor were the threatenings of the church ever carried into effect against him. It must be admitted that it was a stretch of power, and that if successful, it would have been pernicious to attempt to retain any man in the ministry against his will; but there can be no doubt that the assembly were actuated by the desire of doing everything that was possible for spreading the Gospel through every corner of the land.†

At this assembly it was agreed to present to the queen's majesty and her most honourable council an earnest supplication for redress of grievances. The continuance of the mass was vehemently complained of; it was called the fountain of all impiety, not only because many take boldness to sin by reason of the opinion they have conceived of that idol, viz., "that in virtue of it they obtain remission of sins; but also because,

Supplication of the Assembly for redress of grievances.

* Book of the Universal Kirk, pp. 8, 9.

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 337; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 183; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 8.

under colour of the mass, whores, adulterers, drunkards, blasphemers of God, contemners of his holy sacraments, and such other manifest malefactors, are maintained and defended. For, let any mass-sayer, or earnest defender of mass, be deprehended in any of the foresaid crimes, no execution can be had; for it is alleged that all is done in hatred of his religion; and so the wicked are permitted to live wickedly, cloaked and defended by that odious idol. And if your majesty ask why we are so earnest now? we answer, because we find ourselves frustrated of our hope that your grace's heart would have been so far mollified as to hear the public doctrine taught within this realm; by which our further hope was, that you would have suffered your religion to be tried by the true touchstone of God's word." The punishment of flagrant vices was demanded—such as adultery, fornication, blasphemy, contempt of God, his word and sacraments. "If any object that the infliction of punishment cannot be commanded without a parliament, we answer that the eternal God, in his parliament, hath pronounced death to be the punishment of adultery and blasphemy; whose acts, if you put not in execution, he will not only repute you patrons of impiety, but also not fail to punish you for neglecting his judgments." The case of "poor labourers of the ground, poor destitute persons, orphans, widows, and strangers, and of poor ministers of Christ," was next brought into view. The labourers of the ground were described as oppressed by those who paid their thirds according to the recent enactment, inasmuch as they exacted from the poor an equivalent for what they paid to the queen, or to any other party. "The indigent and helpless were so despised, that it seemed a wonder God allowed the sun to shine upon the earth, where no mercy was shown to his creatures. And, as for the ministers, their livings were so modified, and so ill-paid, that most of them lived but a beggar's life. And all this cometh of that impiety, that the idle bellies of Christ's enemies must be fed in their former delicacies. We dare not conceal from your grace and honours our conviction, which is this, that neither by the law of God, nor by any just law of man, is anything due unto them who now exact from poor and rich the two parts of their benefices, as they call them. And, therefore, we most humbly require that some order may be taken with them, that they be not set up again to empire above the people of God; for we fear that such usurpation to their former state shall neither, in the end, be pleasing to themselves, nor profitable to those who would replace them in their tyranny. That a competent living should be assigned to them, we object not, provided the labourers of the ground be not oppressed, the poor utterly neglected, and the ministers of the word so sharply treated as they are now."*

This supplication was unanimously approved by the Assembly, but the courtiers, and especially Lethington, were utterly opposed to the idea of presenting such a document to her majesty. "Who ever saw it written to a prince 'that God would strike the head and the tail.' " It was answered[†] that Isaiah used this manner of speaking, a man acquainted with the court, and said to be of the king's stock. "But why use these words, 'that if the Papists did what they list, men would begin where they left;,' for I am assured the queen will never erect nor maintain Popery." "Let your assurance," it was responded, "serve for yourself, it cannot serve us, for her proceedings argue the contrary." It was concluded that the supplication should be presented in its present shape, unless the secretary would agree to frame another of similar import. To this Lethington assented; and he so remodelled it that, when it was presented to the queen by the superintendents of Lothian and Fife, she said, "Here are many fair words; I cannot tell what the hearts mean." "And so," says Knox, "for our painted oratory, we got a name very near to flatterers and dissemblers. And this was all the answer the supplication of the Assembly received."*

On account of the scarcity of preachers, the Assembly had judged it expedient to appoint various ministers to proceed to different parts of the country, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel among the inhabitants, and supplying the various churches. In pursuance of this appointment, George Hay preached with great effect, for the space of a month, in all the churches of Carrick; and Knox himself visited Kyle and Galloway, proclaiming the unsearchable riches of Christ with his usual eloquence and power, and followed by multitudes wherever he went. It appears that Knox had some suspicion (although he acknowledges without any palpable ground) of the motives by which her majesty was actuated in visiting the northern counties of Scotland during this summer, that being the part of the kingdom where Popish principles still continued in the ascendant; and, therefore, he wrote to the Duke of Chatelherault, to whom the Archbishop of St. Andrew's and the Earl of Huntly, the leading noblemen in the Romish interest, had made some overtures for a change of public measures, warning him of the guilt he should incur by opposing the Reformation, and the ruin he would certainly bring upon his house and name.† The Reformer also communicated his fears to the nobility and barons of the west country, and exhorted them, while they were faithful in their allegiance to the existing government, to be watchful lest the religion which they professed should be exposed to danger from the machinations of its numerous and unscrupulous enemies. A meeting was accordingly held at Ayr of the barons and gentlemen of Kyle, Cunningham, and Carrick, who were attached to the doctrines of the Reformation; and, after due deliberation, they agreed to subscribe the following bond: "We, whose Supplication modified by Lethington before being presented.

Expedient for remedying the evils occasioned by scarcity of preachers.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 338; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 188.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 345.

† Ibid, 346.

names are under written, do promise, in the presence of God, and of his Son our Lord Jesus Christ, Bond subscribed at Ayr. that we, and every one of us, shall and will maintain and assist the preaching of his Holy Evangel, now of his mere mercy offered unto this realm, and also will maintain the ministers of the same against all persons, power, and authority that will oppose the doctrine proposed, and by us received. And further, with the same solemnity, we protest and promise that every one of us shall assist others, yea, and the whole body of Protestants within this realm, in all lawful and just actions against all persons; so that whosoever shall hurt, molest, or trouble any of our body shall be reputed enemy to the whole, except the offender will be content to submit himself to the judgment of the Kirk now established among us. And this we do, as we desire to be accepted and favoured of the Lord Jesus, and re-accounted worthy of credit and honesty in the presence of the godly. At the borough of Ayr, the ferd* day of September, the year of God, MDLXII."† This bond was subscribed by about two hundred gentlemen of property and influence in the west, which shows how deep a root the doctrines of the Reformation, so faithfully preached by Wishart some years before, had taken in that quarter.

While Knox was in Ayrshire, the zeal of Quintin Kennedy, brother of the Earl of Cassilis, and Abbot of Crossraguel, was stirred up to offer him battle on the disputed territory of religion; and accordingly he wrote to the Reformer, that understanding he had come to that neighbourhood seeking disputation, he would not refuse, but, on the contrary, "earnestly and effectuously coveted" to encounter him. It was arranged, after sundry communications, that they should meet on the 28th September, in the house of the provost of Maybole, forty persons on each side being admitted as witnesses of the dispute, and then as many more as the house could conveniently hold. When they met, Knox "addressed himself to make public prayer," which sorely offended the Abbot at first; but, as Knox would not allow himself to be hindered, Kennedy and his friends gave audience; and, when the prayer was concluded, he exclaimed, "By my faith, it is well said!" The subject agreed upon for conference was the sacrifice of the mass, which the abbot, after protesting that he was not to be understood as allowing that this was at all a disputable question, having been already determined by general councils, declared himself ready to defend; and Knox, on the other hand, maintained that, whether you considered the name of the mass, its form and action, the efficacy ascribed to it, or the administrator with his authority for doing what he did, it was utterly destitute of foundation in Scripture. To this the Abbot replied that it was not his purpose to defend any man's mass, yea, not even the Pope's own mass, but only the mass of Jesus Christ, conformable to the definition contained in his work, which Knox had undertaken to impugn; and he described the mass as being, in its substance and effect, the sacrifice and oblation of the Lord's body and blood given and offered by him in the Last Supper. The argument adduced in proof of this position was grounded upon the alleged oblation of bread and wine by Melchisedek to God, when he met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings. Christ was a priest after the order of Melchisedek, and as Melchisedek had offered bread and wine to God, therefore it followed that Christ must have made an oblation of his body and blood in the bread and wine of the Last Supper. "Your ground, my lord," said Knox, who took care to explain that he so designated him, not on account of his office, but on account of his blood, "is that Melchisedek is the figure of Christ in that he did offer unto God bread and wine, and that 'it behoved Jesus Christ to offer in his latter supper his body and blood in the forms of bread and wine. I answer to your argument that Melchisedek offered neither bread nor wine unto God, and therefore your conclusion is utterly unsupported." "Prove that," said the Abbot. Knox rejoined that he was not bound to prove a negative. It was incumbent upon the Abbot to point out that Melchisedek had offered to God the bread and wine which he brought along with him. The Abbot, however, insisted that Knox should show for what purpose Melchisedek carried forth bread and wine with him when he went to meet Abraham, if not to offer them to God; and then the Reformer, although protesting that it was not he, but the Abbot, who was bound in argument to prove what was done with the bread and the wine, declared his opinion to be that they were designed for the refreshment of Abraham and his servants. This opinion was now keenly assailed by the Abbot, who endeavoured to show that Abraham being loaded with the spoils of the enemy did not need any supply of food from Melchisedek; and, moreover, he remarked that the text said Melchisedek brought forth the bread and the wine, but it was very unlikely that one man, and that man a king, should carry as much food as would refresh three hundred and eighteen men.

Knox would gladly have entered on a more general and comprehensive view of the subject, taking up the various points which he had indicated in his opening remarks. The Abbot, however, would not let go his hold of Melchisedek, whom he had pressed with so little reason into the service of the mass, but continued to urge a variety of objections against Knox's view of the purpose for which bread and wine were brought out by the King of Salem. And, at length, when Knox insisted that he should prove that the bread and wine were offered by Melchisedek as an oblation to God, he put into his hands a book, to which he referred him for proof of this position; and thus the disputation was brought to a close. Knox was desirous that the conference should be continued, if not in Maybole,* where there was a difficulty of procuring entertainment for all who were assembled, at least in Ayr, where no such inconvenience would be experienced; but this the Abbot declined, saying that he would come to Edinburgh for the purpose, provided the queen's permission were obtained.†

* Fourth.

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 348.

Another meeting of the General Assembly was held at Edinburgh, on the 25th December, in the old Council-house; at the opening of which prayer was offered up by John Knox, for the presence and help of God's Holy Spirit. The first business which engaged the attention of the Assembly, was an inquiry into the manner in which all the office-bearers of the Church had discharged their duties since last meeting; and the impartiality and strictness with which the scrutiny was conducted, are apparent from the fact, that charges were brought against some even of the superintendents. The Superintendent of Fife was accused of being slack in preaching, rash in excommunicating, and too much given to worldly affairs; the Superintendent of Angus was blamed for admitting unqualified persons to be ministers, exhorters, and elders, and not taking sufficient pains to secure, on the part of those under his inspection, the faithful discharge of their official duties. There were many popish priests residing in their former parishes, who, without being examined or admitted by the authorities of the Reformed Church, took upon them the office of parish ministers. It was therefore ordained by the Assembly, that all who had before been "slandrous in doctrine," and had not satisfied the "Kirk," or who had not been presented by the people to the superintendent, and examined and appointed by him to their charges, as well those called bishops as others, should be inhibited from preaching, unless they signified their readiness to appear before the superintendents, or before commissioners appointed by the Assembly for this purpose, that they might receive admission from them in the usual form. A copy of this act was to be affixed to the doors of all the principal churches.

Complaint was made that the north country was for the most part destitute of kirk ministers, and, therefore, measures were taken for the appointment of a superintendent in Aberdeen. Three individuals were nominated by the Assembly as candidates, any one of whom the church in Aberdeen might choose to the office; and the Superintendents of Fife and Angus, and such learned men as they might associate with them, were appointed to complete the settlement in due form in the kirk of Old Aberdeen. Similar measures were taken for the appointment of a superintendent over Dumfries, Galloway, and Nithsdale; two individuals being nominated as candidates for the office, and, meanwhile, one of them, who had formerly been Bishop of Galloway, was commissioned to admit ministers, exhorters, and readers, and to do all that was urgently needed for the planting of kirks. This case proves that bishops converted from popery were not allowed to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction in virtue of the episcopal office with which they had formerly been invested. If the Scottish Reformers had attached importance to the so-called apostolic succession, they had the means of preserving it among them; but, in their view, the true successors of the Apostles were those who held the same doctrines, exhibited the same zeal in the promulgation of them, and manifested the same Christian uprightness and integrity of life. Successors of the Apostles, holding different doctrines from those which they held, not troubling themselves to preach any doctrines at all, living in gross and notorious immorality, and yet having power to communicate a divine influence and authority by imposition of their hands, constituted an anomaly and an absurdity, which our reforming forefathers had too much earnestness of purpose, and too much appreciation of the spiritual character of the Gospel, to tolerate for a moment.

Power was given by this Assembly to superintendents, in their synodical conventions, with the concurrence of Translation of ministers. a majority of the ministers and elders present, to translate ministers from one church to another within their own bounds; and ministers were charged to obey the appointments thus made. It was also ordained that synods Synods. should be held twice every year, viz. in April and October, on such days as the superintendents might fix, and that due intimation should be made by them to the churches, that the minister, with an elder or a deacon from each church, might repair to the appointed place, and take part in deliberating on those affairs which were of common interest to all. Enactments were made with regard to a uniform order to be observed in the administration of the sacraments, the solemnisation of marriage, and the Celebration of burial of the dead, in accordance with the book of Geneva; and it was appointed that the communion should be observed four times each year in boroughs, and twice in rural parishes.

In this assembly, the superintendents of Angus, Lothian, Glasgow, and Fife were Extent of appointed as a commission, along jurisdiction of with David Forbes, to consult with the Church. the Lords of the Secret Council, for the purpose of ascertaining what causes were to come under the jurisdiction of the Church, and what order should be followed in deciding them. This commission was also entrusted with the task of endeavouring to procure the discontinuance of markets that were held on the Lord's day, and of bringing under the notice of her majesty the urgent necessity of

* There was a great scarcity of provisions, and Dr. McCrie remarks, that if bread and wine had been brought into the room where they were assembled, there would have been no difficulty in deciding what could be the purpose of such a phenomenon.

† McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. pp. 66—72.

making some provision for the support of the poor.

Many complaints were made with regard to the stipends and inadequacy of the stipends paid to ministers, and the want of mansees, which were detained by the former possessors, or let in feu to nobles and barons. The comptroller, justice-clerk, and clerk of register, promised that, where the thirds were remitted to the possessors and the queen's majesty, they would charge the principal intrmitters and possessors of the tithes to pay the ministers' stipends; and, with regard to mansees, they would endeavour to get them assigned to the queen's third part, that the ministers might thus come into the possession of them. Some proposals were made for the presentation of a supplication to her majesty with regard to the idolatry of the mass set up in various quarters, but the reception which had been given to the former supplication prevented any step from being taken at this time.*

One very painful case occurred at this assembly, which, while it showed that scandals will sometimes make their appearance where they are least to be expected, at the same time demonstrated that the Reformers were determined to maintain Scriptural discipline in the Church. Paul Methven, who had taken so distinguished a part in promoting the Reformed doctrines, was charged with adultery; and the Assembly, although it might be supposed they would have been tempted, for the credit of the Church, to suppress the proceedings, yet threw aside all prudential considerations, and appointed John Knox to proceed to Jedburgh, in January, to investigate the evidence of the charge, and to report to the Session of the Church in Edinburgh, who, along with the Superintendent of Lothian, were commissioned to pronounce sentence as they should see cause. Methven was found guilty and excommunicated. He retired to England, where he remained for several years; but he wrote again and again to his friends in Scotland, making the deepest professions of penitence, and most earnestly craving to be received back into the fellowship of the Church. At length, his case was taken up by the Assembly, in June, 1566, and when he appeared before them, he fell on his knees, burst into tears, and said he was not worthy to appear in their presence, but desired them, for the love of God, to allow him to make a public expression of his penitence. It was his wish that the minutes relating to his case should be expunged from the records of the Church, but, although this request was decidedly refused, yet he was taken under discipline, and certain ministers were appointed to arrange the form of his restoration. A very severe course of discipline was prescribed to him. He was to appear at the principal entry of St. Giles's Church, in Edinburgh, when the bell was ringing for worship, at 7 o'clock on Wednesday morning, clothed in sackcloth, his head and his feet bare, and, after standing outside till the prayer and psalms were finished, he was to enter the church that he might hear the sermon, during which he was to be "placed in the public spectacle above the people." All this was to be repeated on Friday, and again on Sunday, on which last occasion, at the close of worship, he was to profess his sorrow before the congregation, and then resuming his wonted apparel, he was to be received back into the communion of the Church. The same process was to be gone through at Dundee and Jedburgh, as these were places where he had laboured in the work of the ministry. The ordeal was a very severe one, and Methven felt it to be a grievous burden, alleging that he was treated with overstrained severity. However, by the advice of his friends, he entered upon it, and went through the greater part of it; but his courage failed him before it was completed, and he retired again into England, deeply mortified and lamenting that he could never again recover his lost reputation.*

Few will now deny that the course of discipline prescribed to Methven was of too humiliating a character, and calculated to destroy all his influence, on the supposition that he had been restored to any office in the Church. But we must remember that the Reformers considered it one of the greatest blemishes in the Church of Rome, that all discipline for acts of immorality had been laid aside; and they had severely and justly inveighed against the gross licentiousness universally prevalent among the clergy, who, although professing celibacy, and highly extolling its virtues, yet took other men's wives and daughters, and had children openly acknowledged as their own, without ever being called in question for these flagrant breaches of morality. It was not surprising, therefore, that when the first case of this kind arose amongst themselves, the Reformers should mark their abhorrence of it very strongly, and adopt such measures as might appear best calculated to prevent any laxity of manners from creeping into their own ranks. They are often blamed for the severity and alleged coarseness with which they censured the vices of the court, but their sincerity, at least, is apparent from the fact that they were more severe upon offenders in their own ranks than upon any others. Their object was to erect an exalted standard of moral and Christian excellence in the country, and if they erred in the excessive severity of some of their plans, their error is at least one that should shield them from all sneering reproach. Of no class of men could it more truly be said, that their very failings leaned to virtue's side.

The spring of 1563 witnessed a new collision between the queen and the Protestants. At Easter, the adherents of the Romish Church, encouraged by the continued toleration of mass in the queen's chapel, and by secret promises of New collision between her majesty and the Protestants.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 205—210; Knox, vol. ii. pp. 363—366; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 12.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 210; Knox, vol. ii. pp. 366—531; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 23; McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 74.

royal protection,* commenced the public celebration of the mass in various parts of the kingdom. This excited a great commotion; and the Protestants, despairing of any measures of coercion on the part of her majesty's Council, determined, without asking the interference of the court, to carry the law into effect wherever they had the power. This was naturally very offensive to the queen, and she sent for Knox to Locheven, with the view of inducing him to dissuade the people, and particularly the gentlemen of the west, who were very zealous in the matter, from interfering with any man for the exercise of his religion. Knox reminded the queen what the law of the land was, and assured her that if it were faithfully executed, the Protestants would maintain the utmost quietness and submission. Mary then blamed the Protestants for attempting to take the sword of the magistrate into their own hands; but Knox rejoined that the sword of justice was God's sword, and that chief magistrates were not the only parties who had the right of inflicting punishment, for power was given by act of parliament to all judges within their bounds to search out mass-mongers and hearers of mass, and to punish them according to the laws. "Therefore it is expedient," said he, "that your majesty consider what is the thing your grace's subjects look to receive of your majesty, and what you ought to do to them by mutual contract. They are bound to obey you, but in God: you are bound to keep the laws unto them. You crave of them service; they crave of you protection and defence against evil-doers. Now, madam, if you shall deny your duty to them which openly craveth that you punish malefactors, think you to receive full obedience of them? I fear, madam, you shall not." This freedom on the part of the Reformer excited the displeasure of the queen, and she hurriedly broke off the conversation.

Conference between her majesty and Knox.

It was Knox's purpose to return immediately to

A second conference between her majesty and Knox.

Edinburgh; but next morning Mary sent for him again, and he met her at Kinross, while she was amusing herself with the favourite pastime of hawking. She received him with the utmost familiarity and condescension; all trace of displeasure had vanished from her countenance; and she entered into conversation with him on various subjects. Among other things, she mentioned that she understood there was to be a superintendant appointed for Dumfries, and that the Bishop of Athens† was desirous of filling the office. Knox allowed that he was a candidate. "If you knew him," said she, "as well as I do, you would never promote him to any office in your kirk."—"What he hath been, madam, I neither know nor yet will I inquire: for, in time of darkness, what could we do but grope and go wrong, as darkness carried us. But if he fear not God now, he deceives many more than me. And yet, madam, I am assured God will not suffer his Church to be so far deceived as that an unworthy man shall be elected where free election is; and the Spirit of God is earnestly called upon to decide betwixt the two."—"Well," replied her majesty, "do as you please; but that man is a dangerous man." Her words led Knox, who had a commission connected with the appointment, to delay the election till further proof of his sincerity should be obtained; and, in fact, it turned out that he had been guilty of corrupt practices.* The conduct of the Countess of Argyle, her own sister, natural daughter of James V., was next made a subject of conversation by the queen; and as Knox had once before been the means of producing a reconciliation between that lady and her husband, she requested, as a personal favour, that he would again interpose his best endeavours to bring their dissensions to a close. And she concluded the conversation by saying—"And now, as touching our reasoning yesternight, I promise to do as you required. I shall cause summon all offenders, and you shall know that I shall minister justice."—"I am assured then," replied Knox, "that you shall please God, and enjoy rest and tranquillity within your realm, which, to your majesty, is more profitable than all the Pope's power can be."

In accordance with this promise of her majesty, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, the Prior of Whithorn, the Parson of Sanquhar, and other Romanists, to the number of forty-seven, were summoned to appear before the Proceedings against the Archbishop of St. Andrew's and others.

Justiciary Court, charged with celebrating mass, and attempting to restore Popery. Their trial took place on the 19th of May, a very few days before the meeting of parliament. When the queen asked counsel of the old Laird of Lethington, he replied that she must see her laws kept, otherwise she could expect no obedience. It was ultimately decided by the court that the offenders should be subjected to restraint; and they were accordingly "committed to ward," some in one place, and some in another.†

Knox was not a little gratified with the conversation which her majesty had held with him; and the report which he gave of it to his brethren, coupled with the proceedings that were immediately afterwards instituted against the Archbishop of St. Andrew's and his associates, produced a very favourable impression upon the public mind. In consequence of this, Mary obtained from the Protestants whatever she desired;‡ for this was the reasoning of many—"We see what the queen has done; the like of this was never heard of within

Impression made upon Knox by the queen.

* McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 77.

† The titular Archbishop of Athens, Alexander Gordon, afterwards Bishop of Galloway, was the person referred to, and not the Bishop of Cathenis, or Caithness, as some have imagined.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 374.

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 380; McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 83.

‡ Knox, vol. ii. p. 380.

the realm; we will bear with the queen; we doubt not but all shall yet be well." Knox, however,

His change soon changed his mind. He became of view. persuaded that her sole purpose had been to disarm him by a display of familiarity and condescension, and to deceive the Protestants by a partial execution of the laws against mass, that she might induce them to abstain, at the meeting of parliament which was now close at hand, from urging their demands with regard to religion; and the result was exactly in accordance with this view of the subject. For, though some of the Protestants were deeply impressed with the conviction that in this, the first parliament held since her majesty's return, it was indispensable to obtain a ratification of the treaty of peace made in July, 1560, and a confirmation of the establishment of the Protestant church; yet others, although perhaps equally concerned about these important objects, conceived that it would be better not to urge them upon her majesty's attention at present. Let this parliament pass over, it was said, and a more favourable opportunity will be found, when the queen's marriage comes under consideration, for making a final settlement with regard to religion. It was answered by Knox, that poets and painters were right in representing occasion with a bald hind-head; that an opportunity once offered, and allowed to pass by, was seldom recovered again. It was on this occasion that the intimate friendship which had so long subsisted between Knox and the Earl of Moray was interrupted, and they became so much estranged from each other, that for a year and a half they scarcely

Breach between exchanged words. Knox had a Knox and Moray. soul elevated above all worldly considerations of mere policy, and he could not bear that the cause of God should be pushed aside to make room for matters of earthly and passing interest. It touched him to the quick, that men who had contended so long for a good cause, and had been the means of raising it to so high an elevation, should allow their zeal to cool, and lose the most favourable opportunity for completing the work which they had begun. Knox was not a man who could suppress his feelings, or was ever afraid to utter them. Before parliament separated, he took occasion in a discourse, at which many of the nobility were present, to exhibit the mercy which God had showed to the realm, in delivering it from a degrading bondage, and to describe the ingratitude with which this mercy had been received. "And is this

Knox's reproof then your thankfulness to God, to
of the Protest- betray his cause, when you have ant nobles. it in your own hands to establish it as you please? The queen, say you, will not agree with us. Ask from her what by God's word you may justly require, and if she will not agree with you in God, you are not bound to agree with her in the devil. Let her plainly understand so much of your minds, and steal not from your former stoutness in God, and he shall prosper you in your enterprises. But I see nothing but re-coiling from Christ Jesus. Yea, some say that we have nothing of our religion established by law or parliament. Albeit the malicious words of such can neither hurt the truth of God, nor yet us who depend thereon; yet the speaker, for his treason committed against God and against this poor commonwealth, deserves the gallows." And before he concluded, he made a reference to the rumours current regarding the queen's marriage. "This, my lords, will I say, that whenever the nobility of Scotland, professing the Lord Jesus, consent that an infidel (and all Papists are infidels) shall be head to your sovereign, you do what lies in your power to banish Christ Jesus from this realm; you bring God's vengeance upon the country, a plague upon yourselves, and perchance you shall do small comfort to your sovereign."*

The freedom with which Knox expressed himself regarding the marriage of the queen, gave great offence both to Protestants and Romanists, and, above all, to the queen herself. He was summoned into the royal presence to answer for his conduct. So far was he, however, from retracting what he had said, that he expressed to her majesty the same sentiments which he had uttered in public. Knox was a stranger to fear. He always spoke as his conscience dictated, and in no circumstances would he stoop to the mean artifice of denying or explaining away what he had really said. He was ready to bear anything in the shape of reproach or suffering, but "he dared not hurt his conscience, or betray the commonwealth, through his silence."†

Whatever may be thought by some of the prudence of Knox, in taking upon him to give an opinion respecting the marriage of his sovereign, there can be no rea-
Correctness of Knox's view. sonable doubt that his sentiments were correct and judicious. It is easy to depict in moving terms the hardship of imposing restraints upon the choice of a queen in a matter so personal to herself; but the marriage of a sovereign, particularly if a female, is a very different thing from the marriage of a subject, and it concerns the community just as much as it concerns the sovereign. And, in fact, the correctness of Knox's view has been confirmed by the judgment of all succeeding times; and it is now the established law and practice of this country, to guard the throne from the infection of Romish principles. It comes with an ill grace, therefore, from men of the present generation to condemn Knox for the bigotry of his sentiments, when they have themselves adopted them. Rather is he to be admired for the forecasting sagacity which enabled him to anticipate what the bitter experience of subsequent times compelled the country to establish with all the solemnity of law. The marriage of a British queen to an avowed Romanist would not be tolerated at the present day, though it cannot be said that such a connexion would be attended with more danger now, than in the unsettled times of the Reformation. Yet there are persons who would themselves disapprove of the marriage of our sovereign to a Romish prince, who charge Knox with intolerance and bigotry for the view which he took of the anticipated marriage of Mary, as if he should have been in advance, not only of his own time, but also of the boasted enlightenment of the nineteenth century.

* Knox, vol. ii. pp. 334—336.

† Iuid, p. 369.

If it be said that Knox, as a minister of the Gospel, had no right to intermeddle with such matters, let it be remembered that there was no newspaper press in those days, through which public feeling could be expressed, or public opinion moulded and regulated. The pulpit combined within itself the functions which are now divided between pulpit and press; and Knox was both the master intellect of his age, and the special guardian of those very interests which were most likely to be injured by the marriage of the queen to a Romish prince. It was, therefore, undoubtedly his duty to lift up a warning voice when he saw danger approaching. Those who imagine that there was no danger to the religion of the country, should remember that in this very year, on the 10th of May, the Cardinal of Lorraine presented letters to the Council of Trent from the Queen of Scotland,* submitting herself to the council, and promising to bring both England and Scotland under subjection to the Apostolic See, so soon as she should be advanced to the crown of England. If this design had been accomplished, (and who will say that Mary would not have rejoiced to accomplish it, if she had been able?) it is only necessary to look to Spain and Portugal, and other Romish countries, to see a picture of the state we should have been in at the present moment. It is strange perversity, and something like ingratitude, for men who enjoy the precious blessings of liberty and prosperity so profusely scattered abroad in this highly favoured land, to raise a cry of bigotry and officiousness against the very persons whose untiring efforts, patient watchfulness, and far-seeing sagacity, were the means, under God, of laying the foundations of that superstructure of freedom and greatness which is now the wonder of the world. Do they mean that it would have been worth while to sacrifice all these blessings, for the sake of allowing Mary entire liberty to do as she pleased?

A General Assembly of the Church was held at Perth, in June. After the usual trial of superintendents, and other office-bearers, commission was given to sundry ministers to plant kirks, to suspend, deprive, and transplant ministers, to confer vacant benefices, and to procure the eradication of all monuments of idolatry within the bounds assigned to them. Their authority was equal to that of the superintendents, but it was limited to a year's duration, requiring to be renewed from time to time; and the purpose of their appointment was to hasten forward the work of bringing the Church into a position of settled and complete efficiency throughout the whole country. The right of appeal from sentences of ministers, elders, and deacons, to synodal conventions, and from synodal conventions to the general assembly, was established; although, for the purpose of preventing unnecessary and factious appeals, it was ordained that the synod and the assembly should have the power of imposing a fine, which was to be distributed among the poor, upon parties whose appeals were found altogether unwarranted. Measures were also adopted for the advancement of a sound moral and religious education, and for the prevention of publications calculated to corrupt the purity of gospel truth. It was decreed that no work should be published on any religious topic without being first submitted to the superintendent of the district, and approved by him and such learned men as he thought proper to consult. This was an arbitrary measure, calculated to do more harm than good, which shows how defective were the views of liberty entertained by the Reformers, and how slow our forefathers were to discover the benefits of a perfectly free press.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 215.

A sentence which had been pronounced by the deceased Bishop of Ross, acting under a commission from the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, on the 26th August, 1534, against James Hamilton of Kin-cavell, Sheriff of Linlithgow, was brought under the notice of this assembly, and pronounced null and void; and all that had followed upon that sentence was reversed, Mr. Hamilton being restored to his honours, fame, and dignity. The charges on which the Bishop of Ross's sentence had been grounded were, that Mr. Hamilton had said that Patrick Hamilton died a good Christian, and he was content to die the same death; that there was no purgatory; that we ought not to pray for the dead; that man hath not free will in the Popish sense; also, that he said the Lord's Prayer in the vulgar tongue; that he had books in his possession condemned and suspected of heresy; and that he despised, and led others to despise, the preaching of the friars.*

Reversal of an old sentence pronounced by the Bishop of Ross.

While the queen was making a progress through the western counties, her French servants and attendants, whom she had left in Holyrood-house, observed mass with greater publicity than usual. This gave serious offence to the inhabitants of Edinburgh, many of whom repaired to the palace, and some of the more zealous Protestants entering the chapel, charged those who were present with transgressing the laws.† Intel-

Offence taken at the celebration of mass in Edinburgh.

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 14; Calderwood's History, vol. ii. p. 223; Cook's History of the Reformation, vol. iii. p. 147.

† Spottiswood says that the Protestants forced the gates, and that some of the Papists were thrown into prison, while others, with the priest himself, escaped by the back way. But Knox, whose opportunities of knowing what took place ligence of these proceedings having been transmitted to Mary, Patrick Cranstoun and Andrew Armstrong were accused of forethought felony, hamesucken, violent invasion of the queen's palace, and spoliation of the same; and the 24th of October was appointed as the day of their trial for these offences. The brethren in Edinburgh, becoming apprehensive that it was intended to proceed to extremities against these men, authorised John Knox to write to the Protestants throughout the country, informing them how matters stood, and craving their assistance. This commission was duly executed by Knox, who wrote a circular letter, describing the dangerous circumstances in which the two brethren were placed, and pointing out the necessity of measures being taken for their defence. "My good hope is," he concludes, "that neither flattery nor fear shall make you so far decline from Christ Jesus, as that, against your public promise and solemn bond, you will leave your brethren in so just a cause. And though there were no danger, yet cannot your assembly be unprofitable, for many things require consultation, which cannot be had unless the wisest and godliest convene. Doubting nothing of the assistance of our God, if we uniformly seek his glory, I cease further to trouble you, committing you heartily to the protection of the Eternal."*

A copy of this letter falling into the hands of Mr. Henry Sinclair, President of the College of Justice, he immediately transmitted it to her majesty, at Stirling, with his opinion that it contained grounds for instituting proceedings against Knox himself. The letter was immediately laid by the queen before the Privy Council, who, to the great joy of her majesty, pronounced it to be treasonable; and, accordingly, the Reformer, instead of having the opportunity of defending others in their day of need, was placed himself in the position of a culprit, and summoned to stand trial for treason. The Earl of Moray and Secretary Lethington endeavoured to persuade him to acknowledge his offence, and to throw himself upon the queen's mercy, otherwise the consequences might be very alarming. "I praise my God," said Knox, "through Christ, that I have not learned to cry conjuration and treason at everything the godless multitude condemn, nor to fear what they fear. I have the testimony of a good conscience that I have done nothing but my duty; and my hope is that, whatever ensues, God will give me patience to bear it."—"But how can you defend yourself?" said Lethington. "Have you not convoked the queen's lieges?"—"If I have not a just defence," said Knox, "let me smart for it."—"Let us hear your defences," said they, "for we would be glad you were found innocent."—"No," said he, "I am informed by divers, that I am already condemned, and my cause prejudged: therefore, I might be reputed a fool, if I should make you privy to my defences."*

When the day of trial arrived, which was about the middle of December, Knox appeared before the Council, and the brethren of Edinburgh attended in such numbers, that all the stairs and passages were filled. The queen herself was present; and when she saw Knox standing at the end of the table bareheaded, she first smiled, and then laughed outright, saying, "Yon man made me weep, and never shed a tear himself: I will see now if I can make him weep."† The secretary then handed to Knox the letter on which the charge of treason was grounded, that he might inspect it, and acknowledge whether it was written by him. Having briefly examined it, the Reformer replied—"I remember I indited a letter in October to brethren, in diverse quarters, of such things as displeased me; and good conviction have I that the scribes would not willingly adulterate my original, although I left several blanks with them; so I acknowledge both the handwriting and the ditement."—"You have done more," said Lethington, "than I would have done."—"Charity," replied Knox, "is not suspicious."—"Well," said the queen, "read your own letter, and then answer as you shall be demanded." The letter having been read by Knox in a loud and distinct voice, the queen exclaimed—"Heard you ever, my lords, a more despiteful or treasonable letter!"—"Are you not sorry," inquired Lethington, "that such a letter hath escaped your pen, and come to the knowledge of others?"—"My lord secretary," replied Knox, "before I repent I must be taught my offence."—"Offence!" said Lethington, "if there were no more than convocation of the queen's lieges, the offence cannot be denied."—"But there is a difference," rejoined Knox, "between a lawful and an unlawful convocation. If I be guilty in this, I have offended often since I last came into Scotland; for what convocation of the brethren hath been to this hour to which my pen hath not served?"—"What is this?" said the queen. "Methinks you trifle with him. Who gave him authority to convocate my lieges? Is not that treason?"—"No, madam," said Lord Ruthven. "He convoketh the people to hear prayer and sermons almost daily, and there is no treason in this."—"Hold your peace!" said the queen; "let him answer for himself."—"I began," said Knox, "to reason with the secretary, whom I take to be a far better dialectician than your grace, that all convocations are not unlawful; and my Lord Ruthven hath given an instance."—"I will say nothing," said the queen, "against your religious meetings; were far superior to the Archbishop's, gives no countenance to this statement; but, on the contrary, affirms that nothing further was done or said, than entering the chapel and addressing the priest. That Knox's account is correct is clear from this consideration, that if he had misrepresented any of the facts in his circular letter, this would have been laid to his charge at his trial; but, although the letter was produced, it was not alleged that it contained any unfair statement of the facts of the case. (Spottiswood, p. 188; Knox, vol. ii. p. 393.)

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 393; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 232.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 235; Knox, vol. ii. p. 402.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 226.

but what authority have you to convocate my subjects when it pleaseth you, without my warrant?"—"Madam, to satisfy your grace, I answer, that at my pleasure I never convocated four persons but according to the order appointed by the brethren. I have given diverse advertisements, and great multitudes have assembled thereupon. If your grace complains that this hath been done without your commandment or warrant, I answer, so hath all that God hath blessed within this realm from the beginning of this action. Therefore, madam, I must be convicted by a just law that I have done against the duty of God's messenger in writing this letter, before I can be sorry or repent. What I have done, I have done at the commandment of the Kirk within this realm. Therefore, I think I have done no wrong."

Another ground of accusation against the Reformer was now brought forward, and it was alleged that one sentence of his letter charged the queen with cruelty of disposition. "This fearful summons is directed against them (viz. the two brethren) to make, no doubt, a preparation upon a few that a door may be opened to execute cruelty upon a greater multitude." In reply to this charge, the Reformer denied that he had represented the queen as possessed of a cruel nature. He was speaking of Papists generally, and he referred to the experience of the whole assemblage, whether the supporters of the Romish faith were not deadly enemies of those who professed the Gospel, and thirsted for their extermination? "God forbid," exclaimed the lords, almost with one voice, "that ever the lives of the faithful stood in the power of Papists, for just experience hath taught us what cruelty lieth in their hearts!"—"Think you, then, my lords, that the insatiable cruelty of the Papists within this realm shall end in the murdering of these two brethren, now unjustly summoned, and more unjustly to be accused? I think no man of judgment can so esteem, but rather judge that by these two they intend to prepare for their bloody enterprise against the whole number. Therefore, madam, cast up when you please the Acts of Parliament. I have offended nothing against them, for I accuse not in my letter your grace of a cruel nature."

After a good deal more reasoning and investigation, Knox received permission to Acquittal of Knox. retire to his house for the night. "I thank God," said he, "and the queen's majesty. I pray God, madam, to purge your heart from Popery, and to preserve you from the counsel of flatterers." When the question was put to the cabinet whether Knox was guilty or not, the lords voted with one voice that they could find no offence. And when the queen and Lethington, displeased with this issue, put the question again to the vote, the lords were indignant at this attempt to overawe them, and re-affirmed their former decision. Even the Bishop of Ross, a zealous Romanist, voted on the same side; and, when taunted by the queen for following the example of others, he replied—

"Your grace may understand that it is neither affection to the man, nor love to his profession, that maketh me to absolve him, but the simple truth, which plainly appeareth in his defence."

Efforts were now made in private to prevail upon Knox to confess a fault and submit himself to the queen's will; and assurance was given to him that he should simply be required to enter within the Castle of Edinburgh, and be permitted immediately to return to his own house. But he was firm as a rock. "God forbid that my confession should condemn the noblemen who upon their conscience, and with the queen's displeasure, have absolved me. Besides, you cannot really wish me to confess a fault, unless you would have me cease from preaching, for how can I exhort others to peace and Christian quietness, if I confess myself an author and mover of sedition?"†

At the General Assembly, which met on the 25th December, 1563, Knox, to the surprise of many, maintained a profound silence till it should be decided whether he had exceeded his commission in issuing the circular letter, for which he had been brought to trial before the queen's council. Having defended himself before the council, on the ground that he was acting not as a private individual, but under authority received from his ecclesiastical superiors, he now called upon the Assembly to say whether they acknowledged the justice of this ground of defence. The Assembly at once decided that Knox had received a charge from the whole Kirk convened at Edinburgh to call meetings of the brethren in cases of emergency, and it was testified by Lord Lindsay, the lairds of Kelwood, Abbotshall, and Cunninghamhead, the superintendents of Angus, Fife, Lothian, the West, and Galloway, and the great bulk of the meeting, that they remembered well that Knox had desired to be relieved from the aforesaid charge, and that the Assembly would not accept his resignation of it, but required him to continue advertising the brethren from time to time as occasion should require.‡ Thus Knox was acquitted both by the civil tribunal and by the General Assembly, to the great disappointment of many, who had assured the queen that they would be able to procure his condemnation before both tribunals.

At this Assembly the usual trial of superintendents and commissioners took place, when several of them were accused of remissness in preaching, and other deficiencies in the discharge of duty. Commissions were renewed for the planting of additional churches. Ministers, exhorters, and readers were enjoined to visit the sick, and to use the co-operation of elders and deacons in this duty, and several ministers were suspended or censured for sundry faults or omissions of duty. Touching the burial of the poor, it was ordained that a bier should be provided in every country parish, and that persons living adjacent to the house where the dead lay should follow the corpse to the grave, and bury it six feet under the earth.*

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 241; Knox, vol. ii. p. 411; Heylin's History of the Presbyterians, book iv. p. 177.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 239; Knox, vol. ii. p. 412.

‡ Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 244.

The Book of Discipline was again brought under the consideration of the Assembly. A revision of it was agreed to, and Earl Marischal, Lord Ruthven, the Lord Secretary, the Commendatory of Kilwinning, the Bishop of Orkney, the Clerk of Register, the Justice-Clerk, Henry Balnaves, David Forbes, and George Buchanan, were entrusted with this important task. They were to commence their examination before the 6th of January, and to be prepared for reporting to the next General Assembly, or to the Lords of Articles, if a parliament should be held in the meantime.

The year 1564 was one of comparative quietness.

Meeting of the General Assembly.

When the Assembly convened in June, most of the Protestants who were connected with the court at first absented themselves. This attracted observation in the Assembly; and, on the motion of the Laird of Lundie, certain members were appointed to wait upon them for explanation, and to desire them to assist their brethren with their presence and counsel. On the day following, accordingly, they did attend; but the Duke of Chatelherault, the Earls of Argyre, Moray, Morton, Glencairn, Marischal, Rothes, the Master of Maxwell, the Secretary, the Justice-Clerk, the Clerk of Register, the Comptroller, and others, met by themselves in the inner council-house; and after consultation, they requested that the superintendents and some of the more learned ministers should be sent to confer with them. To this request the Assembly replied, that, being convened to deliberate upon the common affairs of the Kirk, they could not want the individuals with whom the Lords desired a conference; and, besides, it was not to be expected that the whole body would rest satisfied with conclusions that might be adopted in a private conference, where the arguments and reasons were heard by but a few. At length it was promised by the Lords that no decision should be come to, till the whole matter was brought before the Assembly in open court; and, on this condition, the superintendents of Angus, Fife, and Lothian, together with a few of the leading and more influential ministers were appointed to meet with the Lords, for conference on the topics which they were desirous of bringing under the notice of the Church.†

This conference was conducted almost entirely

Conference between the Lords and some leading ministers.

by Maitland and Knox. The secretary claimed credit to the queen for the religious liberty which she granted to the Protestants, although she herself held different religious principles, and blamed the ministers, particularly Knox, for the manner in which they prayed for her in their public services, and for the doctrines which they taught concerning the obedience due to her authority. Knox, in reply, recited what he designates the most vehement manner of prayer he was in the habit of using in public. "O Lord! if it be thy good pleasure, purge the heart of the Queen's Majesty from the venom of idolatry, and deliver her from the bondage and thralldom of Satan, in which she hath been brought up and still remaineth for lack of sound doctrine. And let her see by the illumination of thy Holy Spirit that there is no means to please thee but by Jesus Christ thine only Son, that she may avoid eternal damnation awaiting the finally impenitent, and that this poor realm may escape the vengeance that inevitably follows idolatry when maintained against the manifest word."* And he avowed that he could not, consistently with his conscientious convictions, adopt a form constructed on different principles, and such as would be pleasing to the secretary. "But why pray with a condition, 'if it be thy good pleasure?'"—"Because," replied Knox, "the Scripture saith, 'If ye shall ask anything according to his will he shall hear you.'"—"But in so doing you insinuate a doubt into the people's hearts with regard to her conversion."—"Not I, my lord, but her own obstinate rebellion causeth more than me to doubt of her conversion."—"Wherein rebelleth she," said he, "against God?"—"In all the actions of her life," replied Knox; "but in these two things especially, that she will not hear the preaching of the blessed Gospel, and that she maintains the idolatry of the mass."—"But she thinketh not that rebellion."—"Neither so thought they that offered their children to Moloch, and yet the Spirit says they offered them to devils."—"But yet why pray you not for her majesty without a doubt?"—"Because I have learned to pray in faith, and faith dependeth upon the word of God. Do you think the Apostles prayed themselves as they command others to pray?"—"Who doubteth of that?" exclaimed the whole company.—"Well, then, Peter said to Simon Magus, 'Repent, and pray to God that, if it be possible, the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee.' And to speak freely, my lord, I wonder if you yourself doubt not of the queen's conversion, for more evident signs of induration have appeared in her, than Peter outwardly could espy in Simon Magus."†

With regard to the very delicate subject of the resistance that may be given to the civil power, Maitland blamed Knox for teaching that a distinction should be made between magistracy as an ordinance of God, and the persons placed in authority, and therefore affirming that subjects were not bound to obey princes when they commanded unlawful things. "My lord," replied Knox, "the plain words of the Apostle affirm that the powers that be are ordained of God, for the preservation of quiet and peaceable men, and for

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 18.

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 425.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 255; Knox, vol. ii. p. 428.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 256, 257; Knox, vol. ii. p. 430.

the punishment of malefactors. Whence it is plain that the ordinance of God, viz., the office, is one thing, and the person clothed with power is another, for God's ordinance is the preservation of mankind and the punishment of evil-doers, which is holy, just, and perpetual; but men clothed with authority are commonly profane and unjust. 'I have said, Ye are gods, and all of you children of the Most High; but ye shall die like men, and you, princes, shall fall as others.'* Here the persons of rulers are threatened with death, but not the authority itself, which is holy and permanent. The prince, then, may be resisted, and yet the ordinance of God not be violated. For the people resisted Saul when he had sworn that Jonathan should die, and they delivered Jonathan, so that not a hair of his head fell to the ground."—"I doubt," replied Maitland, "if they did right."—"The Spirit of God," replied Knox, "accuseth them not of any crime, but rather praiseth them, and condemneth the king for his foolish vow and cruel mind. The same Saul commanded Ahimelech and the priests of the Lord to be slain, because they had committed treason by holding communication with David. His guard would not obey the unjust command, but Doeg became the executioner of the king's cruelty. I will not ask whether the servants of the king, in refusing to obey, resisted God, or whether Doeg, in murdering the priests, obeyed a just authority; for the Spirit of God, in the fifty-second Psalm, condemns the deed as a cruel murder, and affirms that God would punish not only him who commanded, but also him who did it. Therefore, I conclude that they who withstood Saul's command were not guilty of resisting the ordinance of God."†—"Then will ye," said Lethington, "have subjects to control their princes and rulers?"—"What harm," replied Knox, "should the commonwealth receive, if the corrupt affections of ignorant and godless rulers were moderated, and so bridled by the wisdom and discretion of godly subjects, that they do no wrong nor violence to any man?"—"All this reasoning," exclaimed the secretary, "is out of purpose; for we speak as if the queen should become such an enemy to our religion as to persecute and put innocent men to death for it, which I am assured she will never do. If she should attempt this, I should be as forward to oppose her as you are or any in this realm; but there is no such thing. Our question is, whether we may and ought to suppress the queen's mass, or whether her idolatry shall be laid to our charge."—"Idolatry," replied Knox, "ought not only to be suppressed, but the idolater ought to die the death, unless we are prepared to condemn God's law."—"I know," said Maitland, "the idolater ought to die the death, but by whom?"—"By the people of God," rejoined Knox, "for the commandment was made to Israel. Yea, commandments are given that if it be heard that idolatry is committed in any city, inquisition shall be made; and, if it be found true, then the whole body of the people shall gather together and destroy that city, sparing neither man, woman, nor child."—"But there is no commandment," replied the secretary, "given to the people to punish the king if he be an idolater."—"I find no privileges," responded Knox, "granted by God to kings, more than to the people, to offend God's majesty."—"Granted," said Maitland, "yet the people may not be judge to their king, to punish him though he be an idolater."—"God," said Knox, "is the common judge of both; and what his word commandeth to be punished in the one, is not to be forborne in the other."—"We agree in that," said Maitland, "but the people must not execute God's judgments, but leave it to himself to do so, who will either punish by death, war, imprisonment, or other kind of plagues."—"I know," replied Knox, "that the last part of your reason is true, but for the first, you have no other warrant but your own imagination, and the opinion of such as fear more to offend princes than God."

Another example adduced by Knox in defence of his principle was the case of The case of Uzziah and
Azariah. Uzziah, who, when he presumptuously entered the temple of the Lord to burn incense, was withstood by Azariah and eighty of the priests, valiant men, and obliged to retire from the sanctuary. "But the priests," said Maitland, "only spoke to the king, and used no further violence."—"The text," says Knox, "declares that they withstood him, and caused him to depart hastily."—"They did that," replied Maitland, "after he was seen to be leprous."—"They did so before; but even this last act confirms my proposition; for my assertion is, that kings have no more privilege than the people to offend God's majesty, and, if they do so, they are no more to be exempted from punishment. So that, if the king be a murderer, adulterer, or idolater, he should suffer according to God's law, not as a king, but as an offender. That the people may carry God's law into execution, this history proveth; for, as soon as the leprosy was espied in Uzziah's forehead, he was not only compelled to depart from the sanctuary, but he was also removed from all public society and administration of the kingdom, and compelled to live in a house apart, according to the law. None resisted the execution of the sentence pronounced in God's law with regard to the leprous. Therefore, yet again say I, that the people ought to execute God's law even upon their princes, when their known crimes deserve death, and

* Ps. lxxxii. 6, 7. The translation given by Knox of this passage is somewhat different from the authorised English version. It is a translation, however, which has been adopted by Gataker and others. But, according to either version, the passage is equally suitable to the Reformer's argument. The idea expressed in it is, that princes are exceedingly exposed to the danger of being removed by a violent death. According to one version, there is a doom threatened; according to the other, this doom is referred to as a well-known fact. There was a saying of similar import current among the Romans:—"Ad generum Cereris sine cæde et sanguine pauci descendunt reges et sicca morte tyranni." The Hebrew verb translated "fall," in the verse quoted from Ps. lxxxii., when applied to death, always indicates a violent death.

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 436; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 262.

especially when they are such as may infect the rest of the multitude. And now, my lords, I will reason no longer, for I have spoken more than I intended."—"And yet," said Lethington, "I cannot tell what can be concluded."—"Albeit you cannot, yet I am assured what I have proven:—1. That subjects have delivered an innocent man from the hands of the king, and have not in this offended God. 2. That subjects have refused to strike innocents when the king commanded, and in so doing have not denied just obedience. 3. That those who struck innocents at the command of the king were reputed murderers before God. 4. That God has armed subjects against their natural king, that they might take vengeance upon them according to his law; and lastly, that God's people have executed God's law against their king without blame. And therefore I am assured that not only God's people may, but are bound to do the same, where the like crimes are committed and the like power is given."*

This conference, while it displays the logical Estimate of skill and acuteness of Maitland, the conference, and the fearless intrepidity and vigorous intellect of Knox, gives a striking exhibition of the unripe, yet expanding, views which prevailed regarding great constitutional questions, and some fundamental principles of Christian theology. Both of the disputants held that the penalties affixed by the ancient Hebrew legislator to idolatry, and some other transgressions of the moral law, were still binding, and ought to be inflicted by Christian nations upon offenders; and on this principle, with regard to which they were both in error, it is obvious that the argumentation of Knox was but little shaken by anything that Maitland advanced. The great principle of religious liberty was as yet unknown; and if Knox and his Protestant brethren did not hold it, they were at least not inferior in this respect to their opponents. They did not occupy a lower ground with regard to the principle of religious liberty, and they stood immeasurably higher with regard to the practice of it; for never in one single instance, even when they had the power, did they carry out their ideas about idolatry to the extent of shedding blood. This is acknowledged even by Lesley, the Bishop of Ross, who declares that the humanity of the Protestants ought not to be concealed, for they never put any to death for their religion, drove but few into exile, and threw fewer still into prison.† They were wrong in theory, as all classes and sects then were; but their spiritual elevation, and Christian benevolence and mercy, prevented them from erring in practice. "God," says Knox, addressing persecutors, "will not use his saints and chosen children to punish you; for with them is always mercy, yea, even although God have pronounced a curse and malediction, as in the history of Joshua is plain. But as you have pronounced wrong and cruel judgment without mercy, so will he punish you by such as in whom there is no mercy."*

The most vulnerable part of Knox's share in the conference is what he says about the form of prayer he was in the habit of using for the queen. He might entertain the doubts which he mentions about the likelihood of her majesty's conversion; but it was not requisite that he should give public expression to these doubts in the pulpit, to the manifest detriment of the royal authority. True, Peter suggests a doubt with regard to the forgiveness of Simon Magus; but his was a case of shocking hypocrisy and wickedness, disclosed on the very spot; and, after all, it is by no means clear that, if Peter had been praying himself for Simon, and not merely appealing to his conscience to make him feel his guilt, he would have embodied the same doubt in his own address to God. And, besides, there is unquestionably more need of caution in making public reference to a sovereign than to a private individual, for unguarded reflections and suggestions in this case may be productive of wide-spread mischief. When Paul exhorted Christians to pray for kings and for all in authority, at a time when heathen princes occupied the highest seats of power, it could hardly be his idea that the prayers might be thrown into a shape calculated to expose them to suspicion, and thus to weaken their influence.

With regard to the remaining point handled in the conference, it cannot now be made a subject of dispute in the British dominions, whether resistance to princes ever be allowable in any case. Knox undoubtedly had hold of a sound principle, which it required the spirit of a hero to promulgate in the times in which he lived, and the bold avowal of which constitutes one of his claims to the veneration of posterity. What would have been the position of Britain at the present moment, if no resistance had ever been made to the arbitrary rule of the Stewarts? It must be acknowledged, however, that the Scottish Reformer does not exhibit the principle of resistance with all the requisite limitations and conditions. Nor is this much to be wondered at. The world was but awakening to a sense of the absurdity and ruinous tendency of arbitrary power, as it had long been exercised; and if the new principle was not stated in sufficiently guarded terms, this is only what takes place in the case of every new principle, whether in science, or art, or politics. Knox also exposes himself to misconception by not separating the case of justifiable resistance to the entire authority of a government, when it is chargeable with incorrigible and destructive tyranny, from the case where opposition is given to a ruler on the ground of some single violation of law, and with the sole view of securing redress of the special grievance complained of. It is not every illegal act, or even every course of illegal acts, that will justify the attempt to subvert a government; nor does Knox mean to say this, though his neglect of the distinction above adverted to might suggest such a conclusion to some minds. What he evidently means is, that the ruler is as much bound by the law of the land as the subjects are, and should be held amenable to it when he offends. This was a novel conception in Knox's time, for practically the sovereign had been above the law; but it is no novelty now—it is a universally recognised principle in our day. The statutes enacted in parliament bind those who enact them as much as they bind the rest of the community; and members of either branch of the legislature—yea, the very occupant of the throne—may be cited before the courts of law. The supremacy of law over all persons, supreme and subordinate, is the keystone of British liberty; and that supremacy is the very thing for which Knox, although sometimes using language unguarded and calculated to offend, does battle so valiantly with the learned secretary. We have all reason to bless God that such a man as the Reformer preceded us in the land: he sowed seeds which are now yielding precious fruits in the security and well-being of all classes of the community.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 452.

† "Humanitas non est reticenda, quod eo tempore, paucos Catholicos de religionis re mulcarent exilio, pauciores carcere, morte nullos."

* Answer to the Cavillations of an Anabaptist, p. 449.

It does not appear whether any formal report was made to the Assembly of what was done in the conference, or whether any decision was pronounced at all with regard to the disputed points. Lethington having omitted to write to Calvin and other learned men on the Continent for their judgment, as he had long before engaged to do, the request was made to Knox, before the conference broke up, that he would write to them, in order to ascertain their mind; but he declined, on the ground that he had already consulted them, and would therefore expose himself to a charge of ignorance or forgetfulness if he should do so again. "But I will show you a surer way; write and complain of me that I have taught and maintained constantly such doctrine as offendeth you; so shall you know their minds plainly, whether they and I agree in judgment or not."*

The effect of this conference was to exasperate the courtiers against the ministers, who were charged with being over-scrupulous and precise.

Complaint And certainly there was some ground for this complaint; for not only were the prayers which many of them offered up for the queen in their public ministrations clogged with the unseemly qualifications already described, but, at the Assembly in connexion with which the conference conducted by Maitland and Knox took place, they agreed to petition for the complete and universal suppression of mass, so that but one form of religion should be suffered to appear in the country. After the queen's mass had once been tolerated, it was hardly fair to ask that she should agree to be deprived of it, and at the same time to expect that she would cordially co-operate in strengthening the foundations of the Protestant church. Accordingly, it was not judged prudent by Moray, Argyle, Glencairn, and the secretary, who attended the Assembly in order to observe its proceedings, that such a document should be presented to her majesty; but they engaged that, while declaring to her grace the good mind and obedience of the Assembly they would use their utmost endeavours to effect the full and final establishment of the Protestant worship, and to procure a suitable fixed maintenance for the ministers.* A special request was also presented to the queen for a gift of the friars' kirk in Kirkcudbright, that it might be occupied in time coming as the parish kirk of that place.

Similar propositions were again brought before the Assembly which met in December. Meeting of the Assembly in December. It would appear that no effectual measures had been taken for satisfying the reasonable requirement of the ministers, that suitable provision should be made for supporting the ordinances of the Gospel.⁴ This demand was therefore again renewed, and at the same time complaint was made that the law against the celebration of mass was suffered to be violated with impunity, and that the transgressors of this law had now become so numerous, that apprehensions were to be entertained of some sudden judgment of God alighting upon the land. Thus, continual applications were made by the Reformers for the complete establishment of their system, and for the suppression of mass; while these demands, whatever promises might be made at the time, were continually evaded.

Mary cannot be blamed for adhering to the religious system which she believed to be best; nor is it marvellous that she postponed from time to time the full and final ratification, so often asked from her, of the form of worship set up by the Reformers. But undoubtedly it was a signal misfortune to herself, and to the country at large, that her religious views were so utterly at variance with those held by the great body of her subjects. This was a principal source of her perplexities and troubles. In an age when the idea of religious liberty was as yet undeveloped among any party, it was impossible that the conflicting claims of a Popish queen and a Protestant community could be satisfactorily harmonised. In other circumstances, Mary might have been a prosperous and happy sovereign, for she possessed many of the qualifications requisite for securing public respect, and for managing the affairs of government; but the position of matters in Scotland was such at the time, that nothing but jealousy and mutual distrust could exist between her and her subjects. The continual demands which were made by the Protestants for the full and final establishment of the reformed church, and for the suppression of what they designated the idolatry of the mass, were no doubt primarily grounded upon their thorough conviction of the truth and value of their system; but, at the same time, they derived all their asperity and harshness from the fears which were entertained that the Protestant Church was in hourly danger of subversion. Nor could this be regarded as a visionary or groundless alarm, although many positive assurances were given by the queen that she had no such hostile intentions. The continued postponement of the promised ratification of the Acts, passed in 1560 before her return in favour of the Reformed Church, was itself a suspicious circumstance. In fact, the Protestant worship existed merely by sufferance, for all that was done by the queen in its favour was declared to be obligatory merely "till she should take some final order in the matter of religion." * It is a well-authenticated fact, too, that she had given many assurances to her friends on the Continent of her purpose to overthrow the reformed system as soon as possible, and to replace the Romish Church upon its ancient foundations. At the beginning of this very year she had written a letter to the Pope himself, lamenting that she had found her kingdom overrun with damnable errors, and declaring that it had been her unflinching purpose, from the day she left France, to re-establish the ancient religion in her own dominions. These designs of the queen, which with her convictions it is not wonderful that she entertained, by no means escaped the watchful eye of the Reformers; and they explain and palliate much of that severity in their language, which would have been altogether inexcusable if she had really made up her mind, as Tytler † insinuates was the case, to allow the Protestant Church to remain undisturbed.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 280.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 283; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 24.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 280; Knox, vol. ii. p. 461.

The jealousies springing from these causes were greatly augmented, when the subject of the queen's marriage with Darnley began to engage the attention of the country. It was understood that this favoured nobleman was a Papist, or quite ready to become one. And, although some persons argued that a queen should have the same liberty of choice in regard to marriage which was conceded to the meanest subject, yet others maintained that the heir of a kingdom stood in peculiar circumstances, "for, in choosing a husband, she appointed at the same time a king over the people; but it was more reasonable, they thought, that the whole people should choose a husband for one woman, than that one woman should elect a king to rule over the whole people." ‡ Mary was placed in very perplexing circumstances. Her negotiations with Elizabeth, in reference to her marriage, had been protracted beyond all endurance by the artifices of the English queen, and she had experienced nothing but duplicity and deceit at the hands of her so-called loving sister, whose object seemed to be to throw every possible barrier in the way of her marrying at all. At length, her impetuous nature burst through all the toils which artful and unprincipled negotiation had woven around her, and she determined on a marriage with Darnley, to which at length, although great dissatisfaction continued to be felt by multitudes, she succeeded in securing the consent of the Estates of the realm.

The religion of Darnley was the main reason on account of which so many disapproved of his elevation to the honour of being the queen's consort. It was conceived that if the Reformed Church, so dear to the great bulk of the nation, was exposed to peril from the views of the queen herself, who had hitherto delayed giving to the act of 1560 the ratification that was so much desired, and was supposed to be contemplating the re-establishment of Popery, the danger would be vastly augmented when the influence of a Popish consort was conjoined with that of the sovereign.

Religion the main objection to the queen's marriage with Darnley.

All these causes conspired to augment the fears of the Reformers for the stability of their church; and their increasing alarm, which had but too solid grounds to rest upon, led them, at their meeting in June, to employ far stronger language in presenting their claims to her majesty than they had ever yet ventured to do. They now required, in certain articles which were drawn up by Erskine of Dun, John Willock, Christopher Goodman, and John Row,* that the blasphemous mass, with everything pertaining to Popery, should be suppressed throughout the whole realm; that the celebration of mass for the queen in her own chapel should also be discontinued; and that the sincere word of God, and the true religion now adopted in the land, should be established and ratified everywhere, as well in the queen's own person as in the subjects. With regard to the ministry, they craved that sure and definite provision should be appointed for their support; that vacant benefices should be conferred upon qualified persons, whose fitness for preaching the Gospel, and discharging all the duties of the ministry, was to be determined by the superintendents; that no bishopric, abbacy, priory, deanery, or provosty, having many kirks annexed to it, should ever again be granted to any single person; but that the kirks should be severally assigned to different individuals, with a suitable maintenance and place of residence. Request was also made that only individuals found qualified by the superintendents, "sound and able in doctrine," should be permitted to act as instructors of the young in schools and colleges; that provision should be made for the support of the poor and of schools, out of lands which had been set apart for charitable purposes, and out of rents and emoluments pertaining to the different orders of friars; that the law should be carried into effect, by judges appointed for the purpose in every province, against parties guilty of any of the horrible crimes which abounded in the land; and that some means should be devised for diminishing the burden which the rigorous exaction of tithes imposed upon the poor labourers of the ground.*

* Robertson, vol. i. p. 280. † Tytler, vol. vi. p. 361.

‡ Spottiswood, p. 189.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 484.

Some have supposed that the strong language employed by the Assembly in their address to the queen on this occasion, particularly with regard to the discontinuance of her own mass, is to be ascribed to the influence of Moray and other discontented lords, who, having refused their consent to her marriage with Darnley, and having thus lost their position at court, stirred up the church against her as a means of exciting popular discontent, and with this view suggested demands so utterly unreasonable, that it was certain they would meet with a denial.† But there is no need of such an hypothesis to account for the procedure of the Reformers. The fact is, that all along they had demanded substantially the same things, and so far were they from ever needing to be stirred up to present strong claims in favour of their system, that it had been repeatedly found necessary by Moray to restrain their ardour and to soften their language. The views of the Reformers themselves, their increasing alarm at the prevalence of the mass, the continual postponement of the promised ratification of the Reformed worship, and the apprehension, justified by various circumstances, that it was her majesty's design to restore Popery on the first favourable opportunity, are quite sufficient to explain the augmented severity of tone apparent in the articles adopted on this occasion. Nor, if we except the single sentence where it is required that the queen herself should give up her mass and become a Protestant, can it be truly said that there is anything contemptuous or unreasonable in the whole document.

Others have alleged that it was the hope of obtaining a favourable answer from the queen, grounded upon the friendly interview she had recently held with some of the superintendents, which led the Assembly to express their demands more fully and pointedly than they had ever done before. With the view of allaying the wide-spread dissatisfaction that was felt with her intended marriage, Mary had sent for Willock, Winram, and Spottiswood in the month of May, had assured them there was nothing she desired more earnestly than the glory of God, had promised to them that she would be ready to listen to a discussion with regard to the doctrines of Scripture, and had even said that she would attend the public preaching when such persons were in the pulpit as pleased her, particularly the superintendent of Angus, who was a mild and sweet-tempered man. Not unlikely this conversation might lead some to suppose that there was ground for expecting the queen's speedy relinquishment of Popery, and spontaneous accession to the Protestant cause; but there could not be many who would attach much importance to sentiments and promises that were manifestly uttered with the view of gaining an immediate end. It was the fear of approaching days of darkness, alarm at the long delay of the promised ratification of the act establishing their church, and dread that Popery would be restored to its former power in the land, that dictated the strong language in which the Reformers addressed the throne at this time.*

The feelings and apprehensions entertained by the Protestants during this eventful year, appear, from certain expressions in a church testimonial given by Erskine, Spottiswood, Winram, and Knox to two brethren who were leaving their native country to reside for a period abroad. "The one," it is said, "hath so purely taught the word of salvation, and the other hath so uprightly administered justice in civil actions subjected to his charge, that the godly with us cannot but lament the absence of two such notable instruments, who were lights in the Church of Christ, comfortable to the afflicted, and fearful to the wicked doers. If then you ask, why are they ejected from us? we answer, because that now, to the grief of many, iniquity commands, tyranny reigns, and the cause of the righteous is utterly suppressed among us. For albeit of God's great mercy we have yet the Evangel of Jesus Christ openly preached, yet dare not the principal men that travailed for God's glory in these last troubles—other than they that have determined to offer their bodies a sacrifice for witnessing of his truth—appear before the magistrates that now for our humiliation are placed above us: for causes of treason are laid to the charge of innocent men, their substances are spoiled, and their lives are sought, because they have travailed for maintenance of virtue and suppression of idolatry, of which number these two brethren are chief men."†

At length, after sundry delays, the queen's marriage with Darnley having in the meantime taken place, an answer to the answer was returned to the requests of the Protestant Church.

What was said in reply to the first part of their memorial was perfectly fair and reasonable, although, according to the views which prevailed in those times, it would not be judged at all satisfactory. The queen avowed her conviction of the truth of Popery, and declared that she neither would nor might abandon the religion in which she had been brought up, as such a step would both do violence to her own conscience, and also deprive her of the friendship of the King of France and other princes, her confederates. And she added, that she had no intention of interfering with the conscientious convictions of any of her subjects, but would leave them to worship God in the way they considered best. With regard to Apprehensions prevalent among the Protestants.

The queen's answer to the articles of the Assembly.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 287—289; Knox, vol. ii. pp. 485, 486.

† Cook's History of the Reformation, vol. iii. p. 181.

* Hetherington's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 36; Cook's History of the Reformation, vol. iii. p. 179; Knox, vol. ii. p. 481.

† Miscellany of the Wodrow Society, vol. i. p. 287.

the final ratification of the privileges of the Protestant Church, which had been established by the Parliament of 1560, her majesty's answer was by no means so explicit or honest. She declared, what was no doubt quite true, that she had not the power herself of granting the ratification which was demanded, for such a measure necessarily required the consent of all the Estates of the realm; but here there was obvious insincerity, for the fact was that nothing but her own opposition had delayed the ratification for the last five years. With regard, again, to the sustentation of the ministers, and the appointment of qualified persons to vacant charges, there was the same want of honesty in the queen's reply: "Her majesty thinks it no way reasonable that she should defraud herself of so great a part of the patrimony of her crown as to put the patronages of benefices forth of her own hands, for her own necessities in bearing of her great and common charges will require the retention of a great part in her own hands." Here there are several flagrant mistakes. The thirds of ecclesiastical revenues were not the patrimony of the crown: they had indeed been assigned to the queen by recent arrangements, but under the burden of providing a suitable maintenance for the Protestant ministers, so that, according to the existing law, these ministers had the same right to their share of the revenues in question as Mary herself had. The retention of them, therefore, by the queen, and the neglect to appoint ministers to vacant charges with the view of diminishing the expenditure needed for the Church, were an obvious violation of law, and it was easy to see that it was only necessary to carry on this process for a few years to sweep the Protestant Church, in so far as it was a state-church, from the face of the land. The reference to patronages, too, was altogether irrelevant, and only fitted to perplex the subject, by throwing the real matter of complaint out of view; for the Assembly, in their address, had not expressed the slightest intention, or even wish, to deprive the crown of the patronages belonging to it, but had only requested that measures should be taken for filling up vacancies, some of which were of seven years' standing, with men qualified to preach the Gospel, and to discharge all ministerial duties.*

It could not be expected that the queen's reply would be satisfactory to the Reformers; in fact, it was only calculated to strengthen the apprehensions which were already entertained by many, that it was her majesty's fixed purpose (although she assured the Protestants that she had no intention to deprive them of their religious liberty) to undermine their ecclesiastical system by gradual steps, and in the end to restore the Romish Church to its ancient position in the land. It was a dangerous game that Mary was playing, and she did not sufficiently estimate the vigour and determination of the men with whom she had to contend. If she had honestly, in accordance with the declarations so frequently made by her, abstained from interfering with the religious institutions chosen by her subjects—if she had paid to the ministers of the Protestant Church that amount of pecuniary support which by the law of the land they were entitled to receive—and if she had filled up vacancies as they occurred with suitable men,—she might have adhered to her own religion, exposed perhaps to an occasional outcry against her idolatry, and she might also, with ordinary prudence, have retained her crown to the day of her death; but her procedure was such as could not fail—particularly in an age when the connection between Church and State was conceived to be as indispensable as the existence of civil government itself—to suggest the question, how can a Popish queen efficiently discharge the duties which necessarily devolve upon the sovereign of a Protestant country? And this is a question which it is far more difficult to answer than those imagine, who see nothing but bigoted intolerance and unwarrantable rebellion in the whole conduct of the Reformers towards Mary.

The queen's answers were brought before the Assembly in December, and it is ^{Views expressed by the Assembly.} not wonderful that they were judged altogether unsatisfactory.

Mr. John Row, minister of Perth, was appointed to prepare a reply to them, which, after being considered and approved by the Assembly, was put into the hands of the sovereign. In this document, after an expression of deep sorrow and grief that her majesty continued unconvinced of the truth of the Protestant doctrines, and of the impiety of the mass, which is designated nothing but a mass of impiety from beginning to end, the question of benefices is handled, and the misconceptions of the queen with regard to their nature and the claims of the Assembly are very clearly pointed out. "It is not our meaning that her majesty or any other patron within the realm should be defrauded of their just patronages; but we mean that, whensoever her majesty or any other patron doth present any person to any benefice, the person presented shall be tried by learned men in the Kirk, such as presently are the superintendents appointed for that use. And as the presentation of the benefices pertaineth to the patron, so the collation, by law and reason, pertaineth to the Kirk, whereof the Kirk should no more be defrauded than the patrons of their presentation. For otherwise, if it shall be lesum* to the patrons absolutely to present whomsoever they please, without trial or examination, what then may we look for but mere ignorance without all order in the Kirk? As to the second point, concerning the retention of a good part of the benefices in her majesty's own hands, this point abhors so far from good conscience, as well of God's law as the public order of our common laws, that we are loath to open up the ground of the matter

Grounds of dissatisfaction with the queen's answer.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 488; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 295.

* Lawful.

by any long circumstances. And, therefore, we most reverently wish that her majesty would consider the matter with herself and her wise council, that however the patronages of benefices may appertain to herself, yet the retaining of them in her own hands, undisposed to qualified persons, is ungodly, and contrary to all public order, and brings confusion to the poor souls of the common people, who should thus be provided with teachers to instruct them in the way of salvation. And where her majesty concludeth in her second answer, that she is content that a sufficient and reasonable sustentation be appointed for ministers, by assignments in places most commodious, consideration being had of her own necessity; as we are very desirous that her grace's necessity be relieved, so our duty urgeth that we notify to her grace, the right order which should be observed by her in this behalf, which is this:—The tithes are to be reputed properly the patrimony of the Kirk, wherewith, before all other, those that travail in the ministry, and the poor indigent members of Christ's body, ought to be sustained, kirks repaired, and the youth brought up in letters. Which things being done, other necessities may be reasonably supplied, according as her grace and her godly council shall think expedient. Always we cannot but thank her majesty most reverently for her liberal offer of assignment to be made to ministers for their sustentation, which nevertheless is conceived in such general terms, that without condescending more specially upon the particulars no execution can ever follow thereupon. And so, to conclude at the present, we desire earnestly her majesty's answer to the said articles to be reformed; beseeching God that as they are reasonable and godly in themselves, so her majesty and the Estates presently convened may be inclined and persuaded to approve and accomplish the same.*

In this Assembly complaints were made of the Poverty of the extreme poverty and distress with ministers. which the ministers of the Gospel were encompassed, and of the violent obstruction which was not unfrequently given to them in the discharge of their duties; and a supplication was presented to her majesty and the council for the more faithful payment of the stipends which had been assigned to them. At the same time, an earnest appeal was made by the Assembly to ministers to continue faithful in the discharge of their duties under all trials, and on no account to allow themselves to be tempted by any inducements or difficulties to change their vocation. "Seeing that our Master Christ Jesus pronounces, that he is but a mercenary shepherd who seeing the wolf coming fleeth for his own safeguard; and that the very danger of life cannot be a sufficient excuse for such as fall back from Jesus Christ; we noways think it lawful that such as have once put their hands to the plough, shall leave the heavenly vocation return to the profane world for indigence or poverty. Lawfully they may leave an unthankful people, and seek where the Evangel of Christ may bring forth better fruit, but lawfully they may never change their vocation.*"

The privations and sufferings of the ministers at this time were very great, and some of them, seeing no likelihood of any improvement in their position, were hesitating whether they might not quit their posts, and betake themselves to worldly callings. With the view of preventing such a painful and pernicious result, not only did the Assembly pronounce the judgment that a minister was bound, under all difficulties, to adhere to his vocation, but they also appointed Knox to pen "a comfortable letter," in the name of the Assembly, for the encouragement of ministers, exhorters, and readers. This letter describes the whole ministry of the realm as standing in extremity, for want of reasonable provision for themselves and their poor families. It next brings into view the eminent success which had attended the preaching of the Word in Scotland, the manner in which idolatry had been exposed and wickedness rebuked, and the comfort which the ministrations of the Gospel had brought to many consciences oppressed with ignorance and impiety. And then it admonishes the ministers to perseverance amid all dangers and difficulties. "Consider, dear brethren, what slander and offence shall we give to the weaker, what occasion of rejoicing shall the enemies have, and to what ignominy shall we expose the glorious Evangel of Jesus Christ, if for any occasion we shall desist and cease from public preaching of the same. We that admonish you are not ignorant, neither altogether without experience, how vehement a dart poverty is, and what troublesome cogitations it is able to raise, yea, even in men of greatest constancy. But yet, dear brethren, we ought earnestly to consider with what conditions we entered into this most honourable vocation: for if we lay before us other conditions than Jesus Christ laid before his Apostles, when he sent them forth to preach the glad tidings of his kingdom, we either deceive ourselves, or else we declare ourselves not to be the true successors of those whose doctrine we propose to the people. They were sent forth as sheep among wolves. And think we that the same Evangel which they preached can have any other success in our ministry than it had in theirs? In gifts we must confess ourselves far inferior to these lights of the world; in diligence and painful travail we cannot be compared; and yet we look to be partakers of the kingdom which God hath prepared for such as patiently abide the coming of Christ. And shall we in nothing communicate with them? They were sometimes whipped, sometimes stoned, oft cast into prison, and the blood of many sealed up their doctrine. And shall we for poverty leave the flock of Jesus Christ before that it utterly refuse us? God forbid, dear brethren; for what shall dis-

* Keith, vol. iii. p. 125; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 298; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 37.

* Keith, vol. iii. p. 130; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 40.

tinguish us from mercenaries and hirelings, if not our constancy in adversity? We deny not but that, if in one city we be persecuted we may flee to another; yea, if one realm cast us off, we may receive the benefit of another; but ever still with these conditions, that we cast not from us the profession that publicly we have made, nor cease to feed the flock of Jesus Christ. May we whom God hath called unto the honour of being the ambassadors of His good will desert from our vocation, because we cannot be provided with reasonable livings as God hath commanded and our travails deserve? The Spirit of God gives us for answer in the Scriptures, that Elias was sent to be fed by the ravens, that Eliseus and his fellow-scholars were compelled to gather herbs to make pottage, that Paul did oft live by the work of his own hands. Let us, therefore, stand fast not only in the truth, but also in the defence and advancing of the same, which we cannot do if we cease from our public vocation; and let us commit our bodies to the care of Him who feedeth the fowls of the air, and who hath declared that He knows what we need, and will provide for us. It is but poverty that is threatened to us, which, if we be not able to contain, how shall we abide the fury and terror of death, which many thousands before us have suffered for the testimony of the same truth which we profess and teach, and have despised all worldly redemption as the apostle speaketh? This is but a gentle trial which our Father taketh of our obedience; which, if we willingly offer to him, the bowels of his fatherly compassion will rather cause the heavens, yea, the rocks and rivers, to minister unto us things necessary to the body, than he will suffer us to perish if we dedicate our whole lives to him. Let us be frequent in reading, earnest in prayer, diligent in watching over the flock committed to our charge, and then there is no doubt but the Eternal God will remedy this extremity. He will confound our enemies, and convert our tears and mourning into joy, to the glory of his own name, and to the comfort of posterity, through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord, whose Holy Spirit comfort you and us to the end.”*

The question was brought under the consideration of this Assembly, whether, in cases where baptism had been administered by a Popish priest, it was requisite to repeat the ordinance when the parties applied for admission to the Protestant Church; and it was decided that it was only necessary to instruct such persons in the Gospel, and to make them fully sensible of the errors of Popery, but not at all to rebaptize them. And this decision has been very generally acquiesced in by the Protestants of Scotland as sound and judicious. Another important question engaged the attention of the meeting, whether a man might marry his wife's brother's daughter, or his wife's sister's daughter; and it was declared that such marriages were unscriptural, and that where they were contracted they were null, and ought not to stand.*

At this Assembly it was judged necessary, on account of the threatening aspect of the times, to appoint a public fast. Appointment of a public fast, during which confession might be made of the sins of the nation, and earnest prayer be presented to God for the turning away of his wrath; and Knox and Craig, the ministers of Edinburgh, were commissioned to draw up a form of service suitable for the occasion. The reasons assigned for this solemn observance were—the wickedness and impiety that prevailed in the land, the lukewarmness and carnal wisdom of many of the professed adherents of the Gospel, the publicity with which mass was celebrated in many places, and the small ground there appeared to be for expecting a favourable change in the queen's sentiments. Another main reason, too, by which the Assembly were swayed in making the appointment was the critical position of Protestantism through the whole of Europe. The Council of Trent had recently enacted a decree for the extirpation of the Protestant name, and the Popish princes had entered into a combination for the purpose of carrying this decree into effect. The cardinals and bishops were to contribute large portions of their revenues for defraying the expenses of the new crusade; and it was confidently anticipated that the Lutheran and Calvinistic sects would be everywhere rooted out, and not only France and Germany; but all other realms, be brought under the dominion of one apostolic governor and pastor. “If any think,” say Knox and Craig, in the treatise of fasting which they issued, “that such cruelty cannot fall into the hearts of men, we send them to be resolved by the fathers of the last Council of Trent, who, in one of their sessions, have thus concluded:—All Lutherans, Calvinists, and such as are of the new religion, shall be utterly rooted out. The beginning shall be in France, by conducting of the Catholic king, Philip of Spain, and by some of the nobility of France; which matter put into execution, the whole power of both, together with the Pope's army and force of the Duke of Savoy and Ferrara, shall assault Geneva, and shall not leave it till they have sacked it, saving in it no living creature. And with the same mercy shall so many of France as have tasted of the new religion be served. From thence expedition shall be made against the Germans, to reduce them to the obedience of the Apostolic See. And so shall they proceed to other realms and nations, never ceasing till that all be rooted out that will not make homage to the Roman idol. How fearful a beginning this determination had, France will remember more ages than one. For how many—above a hundred thousand men, women, babes, virgins, matrons, and aged fathers—suffered, some by sword, some by water, some by fire, and other torments, the very enemies themselves are compelled to acknowledge. And albeit that God in his mercy in part disappointed their cruel enterprises, yet let us not think that their will is changed, or their malice assuaged. No; let us be assured that they abide but opportunity to finish the work that cruelly against God, against his truth, and the true professors of the same, they have begun—the whisperings whereof are not secret, neither yet the tokens obscure. For the trafficking of that dragon now with the princes of the earth, his promises and flattering enticements, tend to no other end but to inflame them against Jesus Christ, and against the true professors of his Gospel. For who can think that the Pope, cardinals, and horned bishops, will offer the greatest portion of their rents for sustaining of a war, from which no commodity should (as they suppose) redound to themselves?”*

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 307.

* Book of the Universal Kirk, pp. 38—41.

If there was ground for alarm in December, at the time when the public fast was appointed, an event occurred in February which shows that the cause of the Reformed Church, and the persons of its adherents, were exposed to more immediate peril than their worst fears had suggested. While Mary was deliberating upon the course to be pursued with regard to Moray and the other banished lords, two gentlemen, De Rambouillet and Clernau, arrived on a mission from the French court, accompanied by Thornton, a messenger from Beaton, the Scottish ambassador in France. Besides the ostensible occasion of their visit, which was to invest Darnley with the Order of St. Michael, they were entrusted with a far more important business, which they secretly brought under Mary's consideration. They informed her of the league which had been entered into at Bayonne, between France and Spain and the emperor, for the suppression of heresy, and the extermination of the enemies of the Romish faith; and producing a copy of this infamous document, which the Cardinal of Lorraine had sent to her, they urged her to affix her name to it, and to become a member of the coalition. It was represented to her, that fidelity to her religious principles, the relation in which she stood to the Romish princes upon the Continent, as well as a regard to the peace and well-being of her own dominions, and the consolidation of her shattered authority, all demanded of her to take this decisive step. These views were warmly seconded by Riccio, whose influence at this time was unbounded; and although she could not be ignorant of the shock which her conduct would give to the religious feelings of her subjects, and of the opposition which it would excite against her authority as soon as it became known, yet, yielding to the advice and entreaties of her foreign friends, and supposing that she might be able with their assistance to crush the Reformed Church in Scotland, she affixed her signature to the league, and thus committed herself to a mortal struggle with the Protestant portion of her subjects.†

* Dunlop's Confessions, vol. ii. pp. 662–664; McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 140.

† Keith, vol. ii. p. 391; Robertson, vol. i. p. 312; McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 143; Melvil's Memoirs, p. 64.

Mary's accession to the League of Bayonne has been denied by some of her partisans; but the evidence upon which it rests is quite decisive. Randolph, in a letter to Cecil, dated 7th February, 1566, thus writes:—"There is a band lately devised, in which the late Pope, the Emperor, the King of Spain, the Duke of Savoy, with divers princes of Italy are the leaders (and the Queen-mother is suspected to be of the same confederacy), to maintain Papistry throughout Christendom. This band was sent out of France by Thornton, and is subscribed by this queen, the copy thereof remaining with her, and the principal to be returned very shortly, as I hear, by Mr. Stephen Wilson, a fit minister for such a devilish device. If the copy hereof may be gotten, that shall be sent, as I conveniently may." Nor can it be doubted that all Mary's previous conduct had been such as to render it by no means unlikely that she would join such a confederacy. Her continued refusal to ratify the Act establishing the Reformed Church, could only be explained on the supposition that she was waiting for some favourable opportunity to restore the Church of Rome to its ancient position. Her letters to the Pope, and to her uncles, the Cardinals of Lorraine and Guise, express in very strong terms the hope which she entertained of being able to bring Scotland once more under the dominion of the Papal hierarchy. In a letter written to the Archbishop of Glasgow, her ambassador in France, dated 9th March, 1566, she informs him that she had placed the spiritual state in their ancient position in parliament, and that she had intended to have done some good with respect to restoring the "auld religion." The documents preserved in the Medicean archives, at Florence, prove that the Italian princes took a deep interest in the affairs of Scotland at this time, and were expecting its reconversion to Popery; and Cosmo I., Grand Duke of Tuscany, maintained an agent at Edinburgh, with the view of helping forward this object. Randolph too states, in the letter above referred to, that it was moved in the Queen's Council that mass should be restored in St. Giles's Church; and it is affirmed in Knox's history, that the altars were already prepared which were to be set up in that Protestant place of worship. Strenuous efforts, also, were made at this time to prevail upon sundry noblemen to attend mass along with the queen; and some actually did yield to her majesty's solicitations, although others positively declined to be present at such a service, among whom Randolph mentions Fleming, Livingston, Lindsay, Huntley, and Bothwell. Now the adhesion by the Scottish queen to the League of Bayonne was in perfect consistency with all these views and proceedings. With the desire which Mary had for the restoration of Popery, and with the hopes which she entertained of succeeding in this object, it was to be expected that she would co-operate in a scheme for the extension of Popery, which the Pope himself had sanctioned, and which her most valued friends so strongly recommended; and therefore not only is the external evidence in support of the fact of her signing the league quite in harmony with all the antecedent probabilities of the case, but all pretext also is taken away for describing her signature as the act of an unguarded moment.*

Mary's accession to the conspiracy of the Romish princes for the extermination of the Protestant cause throughout Europe, was the most fatal step she ever took.† It convinced the Protestants not only that there was no hope that their church would be maintained in its position, but also that times of darkness and persecution were again to be expected in the country. The burnings and drownings by which popish supremacy had been signalised, were sufficiently recent to make the Scottish people sensitively alive to the dangers with which they were threatened; and it is not marvellous that many of them came to the conclusion that the limits of submission to the queen's authority were now reached, and that they were justified in adopting measures for excluding from office one who could accede to a plot which, if successful, involved the destruction of multitudes of her own subjects. The idea of Mary's dethronement was now entertained by many as the only expedient by which the country could be delivered from the convulsions and troubles that seemed approaching. Doubtless there were other influences conspiring to the same result, with regard to some of which Mary deserved more pity than censure; but there can be no question that the religious element was the most powerful means of her overthrow; and it is difficult to discover what other course the Protestants of Scotland could have pursued, unless they had made up their minds to see all the dearest interests of their country trampled for ever in the dust. Were they to wait quietly till the exterminating sword of the confederates of Bayonne assailed their liberties, and destroyed the church which they had erected with so much toil, and labour, and suffering? Were they to stand patiently by till a system was established that rekindled the flames in which Patrick Hamilton, George Wishart, and Walter Mill had expired, for their refusal to acknowledge the truth of popish doctrines?

It may be said that the league of Bayonne was not worse in principle than what was openly avowed by the Protestants themselves, when they spoke of the duty of putting idolaters to death. Now this is quite true. The fact is, that neither Romanists nor Protestants, at that period, had any just conception of the true nature of religious liberty. But still there was an enormous difference between the two parties. The Protestants held the principle of persecution; but they held it merely as a theory, which they never, on any occasion, reduced to practice to the extent of putting any man to death simply for his religion. Their instinctive tendency to a right practice, springing from the influence which the Gospel had over them, always got the better of their wrong principle when any case occurred for carrying it into effect; while, on the other hand, the Romanists never scrupled to employ fire and sword in order to overcome the obstinacy of those who could not believe as they did. A Romish confederacy of powerful princes for the suppression of heresy was a terrible engine, which all experience demonstrated would be productive of incalculable mischief and sorrow. It was not Mary's popery, considered simply in itself, that roused her subjects to attempt her overthrow; but it was the evident disposition which she manifested to restore popery to that public authority and power, which had been the source of so much misery in days whose memory was still fresh throughout the length and breadth of the land.

The influence of the French envoys who had brought the league of Bayonne to Scotland, produced an immediate effect upon the counsels of Mary, and she determined to proceed to extremities in the Parliament which was now fast approaching, against Moray and the other banished lords. Her plans, however, were defeated by the assassination of David Riccio, who was her principal adviser at this time. The origin design, and execution of this barbarous plot have been minutely traced and described in the preceding chapter; and the charge which has been recently brought against John Knox of being one of the conspirators, has been fully considered, and shown to be altogether destitute of foundation. Yet there can be no doubt that the Reformer rejoiced in the temporary deliverance and security which it was the means of procuring for the Church; and it is probable, also, that he would not greatly condemn the conduct of the parties who had perpetrated the deed. In those troublous times the removal of an obnoxious individual by private violence, if it was only believed that he deserved to die, was not looked upon with the same abhorrence as such an atrocity would excite in our day. The age was familiar with blood, the ideas of public justice and of private revenge were only disentangling themselves from one another, and the very best of men were not altogether free from the errors and feelings characteristic of the times.*

The assassination of Riccio produced an immediate change in the aspect of public affairs.

* It seems to have been the purpose of the parties who assassinated Riccio to bring him to a public trial; but the impatience of the king hurried on his death. Douglas of Lochleven, who was implicated in the proceedings, says that it was their purpose "to have punished him by order of justice, but men proponit and God disponent udir wais, be sic extraordinair means, quhilk truly my aune hart aborit quhan I saw him; for I never consentit that he suld haiff been usit by [beside] justice, nather was it in any nobleman his mind."—M.S. Papers of the Laird of Lochleven.

* Knox, vol. ii. pp. 524, 540; Keith, vol. ii. pp. 392, 411; Robertson, vol. i. p. 312; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 20.
† Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 21—25.

Parliament did not meet for the transaction of Effect of business at the time appointed; Riccio's death. and the plans which the queen had imagined she would be able to carry out were rendered altogether abortive. The relative position of parties was completely altered, for while the banished lords returned from England, and thus strengthened the Protestant interest, the Popish counsellors of her majesty were struck with alarm, and sought security by removing from court. And although Mary, escaping from Edinburgh with Darnley, whom she had gained over to her views, and retiring to Dunbar, defeated the schemes of the conspirators and recovered her authority, yet she was unable to replace matters in their former position. Other affairs now engaged her attention; and for the present nothing could be done towards the restoration of the old religion. The ministers of the Reformed Church prosecuted their labours with unabated zeal; the people crowded with boldness to the public prayers and preaching of the word; and great numbers of the nobility also made their appearance in the churches. The dangers with which the cause of the Protestant faith had been threatened resuscitated the religious fervour of the people, and confirmed their attachment to the pure doctrines of the Gospel. Prosperity and peace tempt to indifference in religion, but dangers and difficulties awaken men to a sense of the importance of spiritual concerns. The great end of trials is to dispel the dream of carnal security, and they form part of God's plan of dealing both with individuals and communities.*

The renewed zeal that was felt in the cause of the Reformed Church did not prevent the ministers from sinking into still deeper poverty. If her majesty formerly had been but little disposed to bestow upon them a suitable portion of the thirds of benefices, according to agreement, her own necessities, now augmented by recent occurrences, rendered it more difficult than ever for her to do justice to them. They were reduced to so great an extremity, through the neglect of the court to pay their allotted stipends, that the superintendents and other ministers felt themselves necessitated, before the next meeting of the Assembly, to present a supplication to the queen. In this supplication reference is first made to the Act passed by her majesty's council and nobility in December, 1562, for the maintainance of ministers out of the thirds of benefices, and subsequent confirmations of this Act are also brought into view. It is mentioned, that for a period of about three years payment of the allotted proportion had been made to the ministers of the Church; but complaint is made that, for some time past, their claims had been altogether disregarded. "Notwithstanding all this, now of late, we your majesty's poor orators aforesaid, are put wrongfully and unjustly from their aforesaid part of the above specified thirds by your majesty's officers, and thereby brought to such extreme penury and extreme distress, that we are not able any longer to maintain ourselves. And albeit we have given in divers and sundry complaints to your majesty herein, and have received divers promises of redress, yet have we found no relief: therefore we most humbly beseech your majesty to consider our most grievous complaint, together with the right above specified, whereon the claim is grounded."*

This supplication was not attended with any immediate benefit. The queen promised that so soon as the nobility and council convened, it should be taken into serious consideration and redress afforded. Meanwhile, the period of her majesty's confinement was drawing nigh, and it was said by the courtiers, for the encouragement of the ministers, that after that event she would establish religion upon a solid footing, and provide all things suitably for its support. Earnest prayers were presented during the month of May, in all the Protestant churches, for the queen's safe delivery; and, on the 19th of June, she brought forth a son, who afterwards ascended the throne as James VI. The lords and the people assembled in vast multitudes in the great kirk of Edinburgh to render thanks unto God for the birth of a prince, and to pray that he might be endowed with all gifts and graces from on high. There were great public rejoicings in the metropolis, the artillery of the castle was fired, and bonfires were kindled in all parts of the city and through the country.†

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 529; Keith, vol. iii. p. 134.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 321.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 527; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 321.

CHAPTER XXXII.

MARY.

A.D. 1566—1567.

THE conjugal harmony which had been restored between the Scottish queen and her husband, by the birth of an heir to the throne, was not of long continuance. The cause of the fresh quarrel which now broke out, was the dissatisfaction of Darnley at the course which Mary resolved to pursue with respect to the banished lords. Finding it impossible to restore the tranquillity of her kingdom, or to form a vigorous government, as long as so many of the most eminent and powerful of her nobles were hostile to the crown and at enmity amongst themselves, she resolved to sacrifice her own feelings and to adopt a lenient course towards the murderers of Riccio. This prudent policy was powerfully recommended by Moray, whom the queen now treated with great confidence; but it was violently opposed by Darnley, who declared openly that these men "were in no wise to be trusted from the experience he had had of their false, disloyal practices, and knowing them to be without fear of God or pity towards men." He hated

Darnley's Moray's very shadow, he said, and hatred to even went the length of assuring Moray. the queen "that he saw no security for his own life or her government, so long as Moray was in existence—that the death of such a traitor would be a public benefit, insuring the repose of the whole realm and the comfort of well-disposed people; for which reasons he had made up his mind to have him slain as soon as opportunity might serve for the execution of his purpose." This statement, indeed, rests on the authority of Blackwood,* which is not entitled to much weight; but it is corroborated by the evidence of Bedford, who, in a letter to Cecil, says: † "The queen has declared to Moray that the king bears him evil will, and that he said to her that he is determined to kill him, finding fault that she doth bear him so much company; and, in like manner, she wills Moray to speak of it to the king, which he did a few nights since in the queen's presence and in the hearing of diverse. The king confessed that reports were made to him that Moray was not his friend, which made him speak that thing he repented; and the queen affirmed that the king had spoken such words unto her, and confessed before the whole house that she would not be content that either he or any other should be unfriendly to Moray. Moray inquired the same stoutly, and used his speech very modestly. In the meantime, the king departed very aggrieved." In spite of Darnley's opposition, Lethington and the lairds of Brunston, Ormiston, Hatton, and Calder were pardoned and restored to favour, and the queen was urged to extend her grace also to Morton and Lindsay, who were still under sentence of outlawry. Darnley was enraged at this act of clemency, and alarmed at the return to court of men whom he knew to be his personal enemies; he foolishly began to intrigue with the Roman Catholic party, in the hope of gaining their support, and, says Knox, "by the advice of foolish cagyots he wrote to the Pope, to the King of Spain, and to the King of France, complaining of the state of the country, which was all out of order, all because that mass and popery were not again erected, giving the whole blame thereof to the queen, as not managing the Catholic cause aright." This secret correspondence with the Pope was discovered, and a copy of the letters having been placed in the hands of the queen, widened the breach between her and her foolish husband, who now began to suspect that a plot had been formed against his life, and even threatened to leave the country and proceed to the continent. An interesting letter from De Croc, the French ambassador to the queen-mother of France, throws considerable light on the relation between Mary and her husband at this crisis. After mentioning that the lords connected with both parties were now "so well reconciled together with the queen, through her wise conduct, that he could not perceive a single division," De Croc goes on to say, "But if the queen and these lords are well together, the king, her husband, is as ill both with the one side and the other; nor can it be otherwise, according to the manner in which he deports himself, for he wants to be all in all, and the paramount governor of everything, and for that end he puts himself in the way of being nothing. He often bewails himself to me; and one day, when I told him that if he would do me the honour of informing me what it was he complained of in the queen and the nobles, I would take the liberty of mentioning it to them, he said—as he has often done—that he wished to return to the same state he was in when he first married. I assured him he could never return to that, and if he had found himself well off then, it behoved him to have kept so; that he must perceive that the queen, having been outraged in her person, could never re-instate him in the authority he had before; and that he ought to be very well contented with the honours and benefits she gave him in treating him as king-consort, and supplying him and his household very liberally with all things requisite."* Darnley, it appears, had communicated to the French ambassador his resolution to go abroad, "as he felt himself in a state of despair." De Croc, "a wise, aged gentleman," as Holinshed calls him, "attempted, but without effect, to divert him from this insane project. His father, Leunox, to whom the Pardon of Lethington and his friends.

Darnley's intrigues with Rome.

Grounds of the king's discontent.

He threatens to leave the kingdom.

* History of Mary Queen of Scots, p. 22; Miss Strickland, vol. iv. p. 354.

† Letter in State Paper Office, quoted by Raumer.

* Labanoff, vol. i. pp. 374-5.

youth had also confided his intention of leaving Scotland, having vainly endeavoured to shake his determination, wrote to inform the queen that "he found his son had made up his mind to leave the realm, and had got a ship ready to convey him beyond seas; that he had said all he could to alter his determination; but finding he had not sufficient influence to induce him to change his obstinate purpose, he besought her majesty to take it in hand, and try what she could do."* The queen immediately laid her father-in-law's letter before her Privy Council, who, in the official record of these proceedings drawn up by Lethington, state that "if her majesty were surprised by this advertisement from the Earl of Lennox, these lords were no less astonished to understand that the king, who may justly esteem himself happy on account of the honour the queen has been pleased to confer upon him, and whose chief aim should be to render himself grateful for her bounty, and behave himself honourably and dutifully towards her, should entertain any thought of departing after so strange a manner out of her presence; nor was it possible for them to form a conjecture from whence such an imagination could take its rise. Their lordships, therefore, took a resolution to talk with the king, that they might learn from himself the occasion of this hasty determination of his (if any such he had), and likewise that they might thereby be enabled to advise her majesty after what manner she should comport herself in this conjuncture. The same evening," continues the narrative of the Privy Council, "the king came to Edinburgh, but made some difficulty to enter into the palace, by reason that three or four lords were at that time present with the queen, and peremptorily insisted that they should be gone before he would condescend to come in; which deportment appeared to be abundantly unreasonable, since they were three of the greatest lords of the kingdom, and that those kings who by their own birth were sovereigns of the realm, have never acted in that manner towards the nobility. The queen, however, received this behaviour as decently as was possible, and condescended so far as to go to meet the king without the palace, and so conducted him into her own apartment, where he remained all night; and then her majesty entered calmly with him upon the subject of his going abroad, that she might understand from himself the occasion of such a resolution; but he would by no means give or acknowledge that he had any occasion offered him of discontent."†

"The Lords of Council being acquainted early next morning that the king was just a going to return to Stirling, they repaired to the queen's apartment, and no other person being present except their lordships and Mons. de Croc, whom they prayed to assist them. "Early next morning," says de Croc himself, "the queen sent for me, and for all the lords and other councillors. As we were all met in their majesties' presence, the Bishop of Ross, by the queen's desire, declared to the Council the king's intention to go beyond sea, for which purpose he had a ship lying ready to sail; and that her majesty's information hereof proceeded not from the rumour of the town, but from a letter written to her by his own father, the Earl of Lennox, which letter was read in the Council. And thereafter the queen prayed the king to declare, in the presence of the lords, and before me, the reason of his projected departure, since he would not be pleased to notify the same to her in private between themselves. She likewise took him by the hand, and besought him for God's sake to declare if she had given him any occasion for this resolution, and entreated he might deal plainly and not spare her." The Lords of the Council then addressed him with all humility and reverence, and told him that the "occasion of their meeting was to understand whether he had formed a resolution to depart by sea out of the realm, and on what ground, and for what end. That if his resolution proceeded from some discontent, they were earnest to know what persons had afforded an occasion for the same. That if he could complain of any of the subjects of the realm, be they of what quality whatsoever, the fault should be immediately repaired to his satisfaction. And here," they continued, "we did remonstrate to him that his own honour, the queen's honour, the honour of us all, were concerned; for if, without just occasion ministered, he would retire from the place where he had received so much honour, and abandon the society of her to whom he is so far obliged, that in order to advance him she has humbled herself, and from being his sovereign had surrendered herself to be his wife—if he should act in this sort, the whole world would blame him as ingrate, regardless of the friendship the queen bore him, and utterly unworthy to possess the place to which she had exalted him. On the other hand, that if any just occasion had been given him, it behoved the same to be very important, since it induced him to relinquish so beautiful a queen and noble realm; and the same must be afforded him either by the queen herself or by us, her ministers. As for us, we professed ourselves ready to do him all the justice he could demand; and for her majesty, so far was she from ministering to him occasion of discontent, that, on the contrary, he had all the reason in the world to thank God for giving him so wise and virtuous a person as she had showed herself in all her actions."

His interview with the queen and the Lords of the Privy Council.

"Then her majesty," so the narrative proceeds, "was pleased to enter into the discourse, and spoke affectionately to him, beseeching him that, seeing he would not open his mind in private to her the last night, according to her most earnest request,

* De Croc to the French ambassador and to the Queen-mother of France. Keith, vol. ii. p. 456.

† "When he and the queen were a-bed together, her majesty took occasion to talk to him about the contents of his father's letter, and besought him to declare to her the ground of his designed voyage; but in this he would by no means satisfy her."—De Croc to the Archbishop of Glasgow.

he would at least be pleased to declare before these lords where she had offended him in anything. She likewise said that she had a clear conscience; that in all her life she had done no action which could any way prejudice either his or her own honour; but, nevertheless, that as she might perhaps have given him offence without design, she was willing to make amends as far as he should require, and therefore prayed him not to dissemble the occasion of his displeasure, if any he had, nor to spare her in the least matter. But though the queen and all others that were present, together with Monsieur de Croc, used all the interest they were able to

His stubborn and unreasonable behaviour. persuade him to open his mind, yet he would not at all own that he intended any voyage, or had any discontent, and declared freely that the queen had given him no occasion for any." According to the French ambassador, the lords added, that "they could see plainly, by the bad countenance with which he had received them, that they were the cause of his intending to go away, and prayed him to let them know in what they had displeased him." "For my part," continues de Croc, "I told him that his voyage would affect either the honour of the queen or his own. If he went with just occasion, that would touch the queen's; if without, it would not at all redound to his praise; and that I could not fail to give my testimony, both as to what I had formerly seen and did at present see. At last, he declared that he had no ground at all given him for such a determination; and thereupon he went out of the chamber of presence, saying to the queen, 'Adieu, madam, you shall not see my face for a long space.' After which, he likewise bade me farewell; and next, turning to the lords in general, he said, 'Gentlemen, adieu.'" De Croc then adds this remarkable sentence respecting the general opinion entertained of Darnley's foolish and wayward conduct:—"It is in vain to imagine that he shall be able to raise any disturbance; for there is not one person in all this kingdom, from the highest to the lowest, that regards him any farther than is agreeable to the queen. And I never saw her majesty so much beloved, esteemed, and honoured, nor so great a harmony amongst all her subjects as at present is by her wise conduct, for I cannot perceive the smallest difference or division."*

A few days after this scene before the Privy Council, Darnley, who was as unstable as he was wayward and headstrong, requested De Croc to meet him at a place between Edinburgh and Glasgow, where he was staying with his father, and intimated his desire that the queen would send for him. De Croc replied, that "he did not doubt of the goodness of the queen, but there were not many wives who would send in quest of him, after he had gone away, as he had himself declared, without any cause. There are but two things, as far as I can see," continues the ambassador, "that can have put him into this state of desperation. The first is, the reconciliation of the lords with the queen, because he is jealous that they hold her in higher esteem than himself; and, as he is proud and haughty, he likes not for foreigners to perceive it. The other is, that he is assured that whoever shall come to represent the Queen of England at the baptism will not make any account of him, and he is apprehensive of receiving an open slight."*

But though Darnley, with the stubborn forwardness of a petted child, had Darnley's obstinately refused to state his statement of grievances in presence of the his grievances. French ambassador and the Privy Council, he thought proper, a few days later, to write a letter to the queen, telling her that he had two causes of complaint. "One is," says Secretary Lethington, "that her majesty trusts him not with so much authority, nor is at such pains to advance him and make him to be honoured in the nation, as she at first was. And the other point is, that nobody attends him, and that the nobility desert his company. To these two points the The queen's queen has made answer, that if reply.

the case be so, he ought to blame himself, not her; for that in the beginning she had conferred so much honour upon him as came afterwards to render herself very uneasy, the credit and reputation wherein she had placed him having served as a shadow to those who have most heinously offended her majesty; but, however, that she has, notwithstanding this, continued to show him such respect that, although they who did perpetrate the murder of her faithful servant had entered her chamber with his knowledge, having followed him close at the back, and had named him the chief of their enterprise, yet would she never accuse him thereof, but did always excuse him, and was willing to appear as if she believed it not. And then, as to his being not attended, the fault thereof must be charged upon himself, since she has always made an offer to him of her own servants. And for the nobility, they come to court to pay deference and respect according as they have any matters to do, and as they receive a kindly countenance; but that he is at no pains to gain them, and make himself beloved by them, having gone so far as to prohibit those noblemen to enter his room, whom she had first appointed to be about his person. If the nobility abandon him, his own deportment towards them is the cause thereof; for if he desire to be followed and attended by them, he must in the first place make them to love him, and to this purpose must render himself amiable to them, without which it will prove a most difficult task for her majesty to regulate this point; especially to make the nobility consent that he shall have the management of affairs put into his hands, because she finds them utterly averse to any such matter."†

* De Croc to the Queen-mother of France. Strickland's Lives, vol. iv. p. 380.

† Letter by the Lords of the Privy Council of Scotland to the Queen-mother of France, dated October 8, 1566. Keith, vol. ii. p. 459.

* Letter from Mons. de Croc to Archbishop Beaton, dated Oct. 15, 1566. Keith, vol. ii. p. 451.

It appears, from a letter of Robert Melvil to Archbishop Beaton, dated October 22, that, besides the allegation that he was contemned by the nobility, Darnley bitterly complained that he "could not obtain such things as he sought," viz. the removal from office of Secretary Lethington, the Justice-Clerk, Bellenden, and Makgill, the Clerk-Register, whom he denounced as the principal conspirators against Riccio.*

By these exhibitions of folly, fickleness, and treachery, the weak-minded and Darnley renders himself obnoxious to all parties. His bitter opposition to the pardon and restoration of Morton excited the indignation of Moray, Lethington, Argyle, and the other friends of that baron. His intrigues with Rome, and avowed desire to re-establish papal supremacy in Scotland, rendered him an object of intense dislike to the Protestants; the friends of Elizabeth suspected him of tampering with the English Roman Catholics; the Hamiltons were alienated by long-breathed family feuds, and regarded him as an obstacle between them and the crown; while "the queen bitterly repented that she was tied to a wayward and intemperate person, who had already endangered her life and her crown, and was constantly thwarting every measure which promised the restoration of tranquillity and good government."†

In proportion as the alienation between Mary Rising power and her husband increased, the of Bothwell. Earl of Bothwell rose in her confidence and esteem. This bold, bad man, whose connection with the Scottish queen was followed by the most fatal consequences to her fortunes and reputation, was the grandson of that Earl Adam who fell at the Battle of Flodden, in a desperate attempt to retrieve that disastrous day. He had succeeded his father in 1556, while yet a youth, and, though a professed adherent of the Protestant faith, had joined the party of the queen-regent against the congregation. After Mary's return to Scotland, he was expelled the kingdom for an attempt to assassinate the Earl of Moray; but on the disgrace and banishment of that nobleman, he was recalled and received into favour, and as a reward for his faithful services to the queen, after the assassination of Riccio, he was appointed Lieutenant or Warden of the Marches,‡ an office of great trust and power, and till then usually divided into three distinct governments. He was also restored to his hereditary office of Lord High Admiral, and rewarded with the gift of the rich abbeys of Melrose and Haddington, the castle and lordship of Dunbar, together with an extensive grant of the crown demesnes.* He was notorious alike for his profligacy† and his boundless and unscrupulous ambition; and having His character.

by his profuse expenditure involved himself deeply in debt, his embarrassment made him ready to adopt the most desperate enterprises to retrieve his dilapidated fortune. "Although he was far from handsome, his martial bearing, his taste for pleasure, the undaunted resolution of his character, his air of chivalrous devotion, and easy and elegant continental manners, beneath which he concealed the wild and extravagant passions of his country, charmed the imagination of the queen, and gave him great influence over her."‡ His progress in the royal favour seems to have been exceedingly rapid, and was soon manifest to all. About the end of July, little more than a month after the birth of the prince, one of the English envoys wrote to Cecil—"Bothwell carries all the merit and countenance in court. He is the most hated man among the noblemen, and thereof may fall out somewhat to his cumber one day, if the queen takes not up the matter the sooner." A few weeks later (August 3rd) it is said that "the earl's insolence is such, as that David was never more abhorred than he is now;" and, on the 9th, Bedford writes to Cecil—"Bothwell is still in favour, and has a great hand in the management of affairs."§ He speedily acquired a complete ascendancy over the queen, all her measures were directed by his advice and authority, and all favours and preferments passed through his hands. By his marriage with Lady Jane Gordon (February, 1556) he had become allied with the most powerful family of the north; and his influence procured for his brother-in-law, the Earl of Huntley, the important office of Chancellor. Not content, however, with wielding paramount influence at the royal court, Bothwell aspired His audacious to gain the affection, and even the project.

hand, of the queen; and audacious as the project may appear, it was formed and carried on, as Robertson remarks, under very favourable circumstances: "Mary was young, gay, and affable; she possessed great sensibility of temper, and was capable of the utmost tenderness of affection. She had placed her love on a very unworthy object, who required it with ingratitude, and treated her with neglect, with insolence, and with brutality; all these she felt and resented. In this situation, the attention and complaisance of a man who had vindicated her authority and protected her person, who entered into all her views, who soothed all her passions, who watched and improved every opportunity of insinuating his designs and recom-

* Keith, vol. ii. p. 461.

† Tytler, vol. vii. p. 54.

‡ "The king and she [the queen] have been at great debate and strife for the choosing of a lieutenant. The king would have his father, and she would have the Earl of Bothwell to be lieutenant, by reason he bears evil will against the Earl of Moray, and has promised to have him dead or alive, and for that case she makes him her lieutenant, and not the Earl of Lennox."—Cockburn to Cecil, October 2nd, 1565. MS. State Paper Office.

* Diurnal of Occurrents; Anderson, vol. i. p. 90.

† "I assure you Bothwell is as naughty a man as liveth, and much given to the detestable vices."—Randolph to Cecil, April 6th, 1566.

‡ Mignet's Life of Queen Mary, vol. i. p. 236.

§ Letters in the State Paper Office, quoted by Raumer. "Now the Earl of Bothwell's favours increased, which miscontented many."—Melvil's Memoirs, p. 154.

mending his passion, could scarce fail of making an impression on a heart of such a frame as Mary's.* It is not easy to determine at what precise time this profligate and unscrupulous nobleman "first allowed the sentiments of a lover to occupy the place of that duty and respect which a subject owes to his sovereign;" but Sir James Melvil, who was in constant attendance at the court, is of opinion that Bothwell's plot for the murder of Darnley and the possession of the queen's person, had its origin about the time when she dispatched him to suppress the disturbances in Liddesdale.†

On the 6th of October, Bothwell, in discharge of his duties as Warden of the Marches, left Edinburgh for the Borders, which were at this time disturbed by the feuds of the Armstrongs, Elliots, and Johnstons; and two days later the queen, accompanied by her ministers and the officers of the household, set out for Jedburgh for the purpose of holding a court of justice. On that same day, Bothwell, in an attempt to make prisoner, with his own hand, a notorious freebooter named John Elliot, of Park, was so severely wounded that, according to report, he was left for dead on the field. "I have," says Lord Scrope in a letter to Cecil, "presently gotten intelligence out of Scotland that the Earl of Bothwell, being in Liddesdale for the apprehension of certain disordered persons there, had apprehended the Laids of Mangertoun and Whitehaugh, with sundry other Armstrongs of their surname and kindred, whom he had put within the Hermitage.‡ And yesterday, going about to take such like persons of the Elliots, in pursuit of them, his lordship, being foremost and far before his company, encountered one John Elliot, of the Park, hand to hand, and shot him through the thigh with a dag,§ upon which wound the man feeling himself in peril of death, with a two-handed sword assailed the earl so cruelly, that he killed him ere he could get any rescue or succour of his men."|| The news of this affray reached Mary at Jedburgh, where

Mary's visit to

Bothwell at the Hermitage.

she was detained by her judicial duties until the 15th, on which day she took horse, and, accompanied by Moray and some other nobles, rode to Hermitage Castle, from twenty to twenty-five miles distant from Jedburgh, to visit her favourite lieutenant, who lay there wounded. The object of this journey has been differently interpreted by the partizans and the assailants of Mary. According to the former, she went for the purpose of conferring with the earl on the state of that disturbed district, of which he was the governor; while the latter affirm that this visit furnished most conclusive proofs of her attachment to Bothwell.* There was no insurrection, it is said, to demand her presence, no visible circumstances to require, or even to justify, a visit from the queen, which can therefore be accounted for only on the explanation given by a contemporary altogether favourable to her cause,† that "understanding the certain report of this accident, the queen was so highly grieved in heart that she took no repose until she saw the wounded earl." We are informed by Lord Scrope, that Mary remained two hours at the Castle of Hermitage, "to Bothwell's great pleasure and contentment,"‡ and afterwards, on the same day, returned to Jedburgh.§ The fatigue of this long ride, exposure to the night air, and, adds Crawford, "the great distress of Dangerous illness of the queen.

her mind for the Earl of Bothwell, threw Mary into a severe illness."

Lethington, however, ascribes her sickness to mental distress occasioned by the baseness and ingratitude of her husband. "The occasion of the queen's sickness," said he, "so far as I can understand, is caused of thought and displeasure; and I trow by what I could wring further of her own declaration to me, the root of it is the king; for she has done him so great honour, without the advice of her friends, and contrary to the advice of her subjects, and he, on the other hand, has recompensed her with such ingratitude, and misuses himself so far towards her, that it is a heartbreak to her to think that he should be her husband, and how to be free of him she sees no outgait."|| For ten days the physicians despaired of the queen's life; indeed, it was at one time reported at Edinburgh that she was dead. She believed herself dying, expressed her entire resignation to the divine will, earnestly exhorted the nobility to live in amity and peace with each other, and diligently provide for the government of the kingdom and the education of her son. She entreated that they would carefully train him in all virtue and godliness, and suffer none to approach him whose example might pervert his manners or his mind. She recommended to them the state of religion within the realm, praying them to "trouble nor press no man in his conscience that professeth the Catholic religion," and to respect the rights of conscience "whilk is ane sair matter to press." Mary also sent her affectionate remembrances by De Croc to the King of France and her relatives in that kingdom, and declared her resolution to die in the faith of the Roman Catholic religion.¶ "She desired," says Knox, "the lords to pray for her to

* Laing, vol. i. p. 14; Mignet, vol. i. p. 240; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 58.

† Historie and Life of King James the Sext.

‡ Caligula, Book iv. p. 104.

§ If we are to admit the authenticity of the famous letters said to have been found in the silver casket, Mary, notwithstanding the fatigues of the way, sat up until late at night writing to Bothwell.

|| Letter from Secretary Lethington to the Archbishop of Glasgow. Laing's History of Scotland, Appendix, No. I.

¶ Lesley, Bishop of Ross to the Archbishop of Glasgow Kirk, Appendix, No. XIV.

* Robertson, vol. i. p. 321.

† Melvil's Memoirs, pp. 170, 173; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 58.

‡ A strong castle in Liddesdale, once the property of the Douglas family: the scene of the murder of the gallant Sir Alexander Ramsay by the "Dark Knight of Liddesdale." See vol. i. p. 196. It now belongs to the Duke of Buccleuch.

§ A pistol.

|| Lord Scrope to Cecil, Carlisle, October 8th, 1566. MS. State Paper Office.

God, she said the Creed in English, and desired the Lord of Moray, if she should chance to depart, that he would not be over extreme to such as were of her religion. The bruit went from Jedburgh that the queen was departed this life, or at least she could not live any time, wherefore there were continually prayers publicly made at the church of Edinburgh, and divers other places, for her conversion towards God and amendment." Her youth and good constitution, however, triumphed over the attack, and, though much weakened, she soon recovered so far as to be able to return to the capital.

Darnley did not arrive at Jedburgh until the 28th of October, two days after the queen was out of danger. He has been greatly blamed for the tardiness of his visit, but perhaps without just cause. We learn from Birrell that intelligence of the queen's illness did not reach Edinburgh until October the 25th, and as Darnley was with his father at Glasgow, and had no friend at court, it is probable that he did not receive earlier notice; and as he reached Jedburgh on the 28th, he may have set out to see his consort as soon as he was made acquainted with her extreme danger.* From whatever cause, he was received so coldly that he remained only one night in Jedburgh, and returned on the following day to his father, Lennox, at Glasgow.

On the 9th of November the queen, with her court, left Jedburgh, and proceeded first to Kelso, and thence by Berwick and Dunbar to Craigmillar, near Edinburgh, where she arrived on the 20th, and remained for nearly three weeks. During her residence at Craigmillar, she still suffered from pains in her right side, and her liver also was disordered. She fell into a profound melancholy, often heaved deep sighs, and seemed ready to sink under the burden of her cares and perplexities, and the contradictory passions by which her bosom was torn.† "The queen," wrote De Croc to the Archbishop of Glasgow, December 2nd, "is in the hand of her physicians, and I do assure you is

Her great misery. not at all well, and I do believe the principal part of her disease to consist of a deep grief and sorrow. Nor does it seem possible to make her forget the same. Still she repeats these words, 'I could wish to be dead!' You know very well that the injury she has received is exceeding great, and her majesty will never forget it. The king, her husband, came to visit her at Jedburgh the very day after Captain Hay went away. He remained there but one single night, and yet in that short time I had a great deal of conversation with him. He returned to see the queen about five or six days ago, and the day before yesterday he sent word to desire me to speak with him half a league from this, which I complied with, and found that things go still worse and worse. I think he intends to go away to-morrow; but in any event I am much assured, as I have always been, that he wont be present at the baptism. To speak my mind freely to you (but I beg you not to disclose what I say in any place that may turn to my prejudice), I do not expect upon several accounts any good understanding between them, unless God effectually put to his hand. I shall only name two. The first reason is, the king will never humble himself as he ought; the other is, the queen can't perceive any one nobleman speaking with the king but presently she suspects some contrivance among them."*

The knowledge of Mary's feelings towards her husband appears to have suggested Secret to certain of her nobles a project conference at for her deliverance from the miserable Craigmillar. position in which she was placed. If we are to believe an account which was subsequently prepared in the interest of Mary, and with her knowledge and approbation, Lethington, Moray, and Bothwell hoped to obtain the pardon of Morton and his accomplices in the murder of Riccio, by pandering to the queen's hatred to Darnley. According to this document, Lethington and Moray proposed, at Craigmillar, to Argyle and Huntley, that they should unite their efforts to procure the recall of Morton and his associates, by devising some expedient to obtain a divorce between Mary and her husband. These noblemen having given their consent to the proposed expedient, they went in a body along with Bothwell into the queen's presence, and laid the proposal before her. The astute and unprincipled secretary, with whom the project seems to have originated, commenced by reminding her majesty of "the great number of grievous and intolerable offences the king, ungrateful for the honour received from her, had committed." He added, "that Darnley troubled her grace and them all," and that, if he was allowed to remain with her majesty, he "would not cease till he did her some other evil turn, which she would find it difficult to remedy." He then proceeded to lay before the queen the plan which the lords had devised, and promised that, in concert with the rest of the nobility, they would find means to separate her from her husband by a divorce, provided she would be pleased to pardon Morton, Lindsay, Ruthven, and their associates. The queen at first gave her consent to this proposal, upon condition that the divorce should be legal, and should do no prejudice to the rights of her son; otherwise she declared she "would rather endure all torments, and abide the perils that might chance her in her lifetime." Bothwell here interposed, and assured her that there was no danger that any injury could be done to

* "When he understood at Glasgow of this suddaine visitation, he addrest himself with expeditioun, first to Edinburgh, and next to Jedburgh, notwithstanding whereof he was not made welcome as appertinit."—Historie of James the Sixth. On the other hand, the French ambassador, in a letter from Jedburgh, October 24, says, "The king is at Glasgow, and has not come to this place, although he has both received advertisement, and has had time enough to come had he been willing. This is such a fault as I know not how to apologize for it."—Keith, Appendix, No. XIV.

† Melvil's Memoirs, p. 170.

* Keith, Preface, p. 7.

CRAIGMILLAR CASTLE.

the rights of the infant prince; alleging "that though his own father and mother were divorced, yet his father's titles, offices, and estates, descended lawfully to him." It was remarked that, after the divorce, Darnley had better live in some part of the kingdom at a distance from the queen, or retire from the country. Mary on this expressed a hope that peradventure he might change for the better, and offered to retire for a season to France, and remain there till he acknowledged his faults. To this Lethington replied in mysterious terms, hinting that another way might be found of putting an end to her sorrows. "Madam," said he, "soucy* ye not we are here of the principal of your grace's nobility and council, that shall find the moyen [mean] that your majesty shall be quit of him without prejudice to your son; and albeit that my Lord of Moray be little less scrupulous for a Protestant nor [than] your grace is for a papist, I am assured he will look through his fingers thereto, and will behold our doings, and say nothing to the same." To this significant statement Mary replied, "I will that ye do nothing whereby any spot may be laid to my honour or conscience; and therefore I pray you rather let the matter be in the estate as it is abiding, till God of his goodness put remeid thereto, [than] that ye believing to do me service may possibly turn to my hurt and displeasure." The conference was concluded by Lethington, who said, "Madam, let us guide the matter among us, and your grace shall see nothing but good, and approved by parliament."† A widely different interpretation has been put upon this remarkable conversation by the friends and the enemies of the Scottish queen. The former affirm that Mary commanded Lethington, Bothwell, and their associates to abandon all thoughts of their nefarious design, and that she meant even to reject the plan for a divorce; while the latter assert with equal confidence that she understood the full meaning of Lethington's dark insinuation, displayed no great indignation at the idea, and offered but slight opposition to the project; and even Tytler admits that the queen was put upon her guard, and ought to have taken precautions to defeat the abominable design of the conspirators. She did nothing of the kind, however, but contented herself with merely giving an injunction which was not likely to be obeyed, and which Bothwell and his associates not improbably regarded as an indirect approbation of their design.*

Bothwell and his associates lost no time in making the requisite preparations for the execution of their infamous plot. With a combination of legal formalities and revolting barbarity highly characteristic of the age, a solemn "band" or covenant for the perpetration of the murder of Darnley was drawn up at Craigmillar by Sir James Balfour—"the most corrupt man of his age," an unscrupulous partizan of Bothwell—and signed by Huntley, Lethington, Argyle, and Balfour himself, and placed in the hands of Bothwell. It declared their resolution to cut off the king as a young fool and proud tyrant, who was unfit to rule over them, and pledged themselves to stand by each other, and defend the deed as a measure of State.†

On the 11th of December Mary proceeded to Stirling, to make the necessary arrangements for the baptism of the young prince. It was remarked that the preparations for the ceremony, which were on a scale of unusual magnificence, and the reception of the foreign ambassadors, were committed to Bothwell, although he was a Protestant. Elizabeth, who had consented to be godmother to the young heir to the Scottish throne, appointed the Countess of Argyle to act as her representative, and dispatched the Earl of Bedford, her ambassador, with a font of gold to be used at the ceremony, valued at upwards of one thousand pounds. In her instructions to Bedford, she desired him to express jocularly her fear that, as the font had been made as soon as she had heard of the prince's birth, he might now have outgrown it. "If you find it so," said she, "you may observe that our good sister

* See Mignet's Life of Queen Mary, vol. i. pp. 245-6; Bell's Life of Queen Mary, p. 77; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 64.

† The existence of this band for the murder of Darnley is proved by the confession of the Laird of Ormiston, who was executed for his share in this crime. He says Bothwell "let me see ane contract subscriyvit by four or five hand-writes, quhilk he affirmit to me was the subscription of the Erle of Huntlie, Argyll, the Secreter Maitland, and Sir James Balfour, and alleaged that mony mae promisit wha wald assist him gif he were put at, and thairafter read the said contract, quhilk as I remember conteint thir words in effect:—'That for sa mickle it was thought expedient and maist profitable for the commonwealth by the hail nobilitie and lords under subscriyvit that sic ane young fool and proud tiranne should not reign nor bear reull over thame; and that for diverse causes, thairfor, that they all had concluded that he should be put off by ane way or uther; and whosoever sould take the deid in hand, or do it, they sould defend and fortifie it as themselves, for it sould be every ane of their awin recknit, and halden dane by themselves.' Quhilk writing, as said Erle shew unto me, was deysvit by Sir James Balfour, subscriyvit by them all, ane quarter of ane year befor the deid was done."—Laing, vol. ii. pp. 321-322; Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. i. p. 512. This statement of Ormiston is confirmed by Paris, another of the murderers, who confessed that Bothwell informed him that he was sure of Lethington, the enterpriser of the whole, and of Argyle, and Huntley his brother, whose handwrits he had for the deed; and that they were willing to have done it the last time they were at Craigmillar. (See Depositions of Paris, servant to the queen. Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. i. p. 503.)

* French—mind ye not, se soucier.

† Appendix to Keith, No. XVI. "The Protestation of the Earls of Huntley and Argyle touching the murder of the King of Scots." In forming an opinion respecting the credit due to this narrative, it must be borne in mind that it was drawn up under the eye of the queen, during the conferences at Westminster, after she was accused of complicity in the murder of her husband, and with the avowed object of throwing the guilt of this crime upon Moray and Lethington. It was transmitted to Argyle and Huntley for their signatures, and to be returned; and it is more than doubtful whether it was ever submitted to these noblemen. Moray, in reply to this or some other similar accusation, says—"If any man will say and affirm that ever I was present when any purpose was held out at Craigmillar, in my audience, tending to any unlawful or dishonourable end, I avow they speak wickedly and untruly, which I will maintain against them as becomes an honest man till the end of my life."—Appendix to Keith, p. 139. See Appendix A.

has only to keep it for the next child, provided it be christened before it outgrow the font.”* “The excessive expenses and superfluous apparel,” says Knox, “which were prepared at that time exceeded far all the preparations that ever had been devised or set forth before in this country.” To meet the extraordinary expenditure thus incurred, the queen levied an assessment of twelve thousand pounds, with the permission of a kind of irregular meeting of the three Estates. This meeting of the lords temporal and spiritual, and of the representatives of the boroughs, was called by the Privy Council, who stated the queen’s necessities, and informed them that some of the greatest princes in Christendom had requested permission to witness, through their ambassadors, the baptism of the prince. It was therefore moved, and unanimously carried, that their majesties should be allowed to levy a tax for “the honourable expenses requisite.” The tax was proportioned in this way—“six thousand pounds from the spiritual estate, four thousand from the barons and freeholders, and two thousand from the boroughs.”†

The baptism for which such costly preparations had been made took place on the 17th of December, and was performed, according to the Roman Catholic ritual, by the Archbishop of St. Andrew’s, assisted by the Bishops of Dunblane, Dunkeld, and Ross. The royal infant received the names of Charles James; the former, in compliment to the King of France, Mary’s brother-in-law; the latter, because, as she said, her father and all the good kings of Scotland, his predecessors, had been called by that name.‡ Mary was exceedingly anxious that Moray, Huntley, Bothwell, and other influential nobles of her court, should countenance the ceremony by their presence, but they peremptorily declined. “The queen laboured much,” says Knox, “with the noblemen to bear the salt, grease, and candles, and such other things, but all refused.” Only two of the twelve earls and three of the barons ventured to cross the threshold of the chapel, and the Countess of Argyll had afterwards to do penance for the share she took in the business of the day. The affable and winning manner of the queen produced the most favourable impression on the minds of the foreign ambassadors, and she sent them home enriched with valuable gifts; but we learn from the letters of De Croc, that, in spite of all her efforts to throw off the melancholy by

Melancholy of which she was oppressed, she was the queen. sometimes obliged to retire, in order to indulge her sorrow and give vent to her tears. “The queen,” says the French ambassador, “behaved herself admirably well all the time of the baptism, and showed so much earnestness to entertain the goodly company in the best manner, that this made her forget in a good measure her former ailments. But I am of the mind that she will give us some trouble as yet; nor can I be brought to think otherwise, so long as she continues to be so pensive and melancholy. She sent for me yesterday, and I found her laid on a bed, weeping sore, and she complained of a grievous pain in her side. I am much grieved for the many troubles and vexations she meets with.”*

The principal cause of the grief of the unhappy queen was, of course, the perverse and stubborn conduct of her husband. Although he was living in the palace at Stirling, he absented himself from the baptism of his son, and amid the gaieties which accompanied the ceremony, he remained shut up in his own apartment, where he was left in absolute solitude, thus proclaiming to all both the queen’s domestic unhappiness and the contempt into which he had fallen. Some have supposed that this step was taken on purpose to mortify and offend his consort, and that the causes of it are to be found in his sullen and jealous temper, and the ill-disguised hostility with which he was regarded by Moray, Bothwell, and the ruling party at court, while others maintain that no reason can be assigned for his absence but a prohibition from the queen, and that no provision was made for his appearance either at the baptism or at the subsequent festivals.‡ Be this as it may, it is certain that throughout the festivities which graced this joyous occasion, the father of the young heir to the throne remained in sullen seclusion, deprived of every appearance of power or respect, shunned by the nobility on account of the queen’s displeasure, and even by the foreign ambassadors living under the same roof. “The king,” says De Croc, “had still given out that he would depart two days before the baptism; but when the time came on he made no sign of removing at all, only he still kept close within his own apartment. The very day of the baptism he sent three several times desiring me either to come and see him, or to appoint him an hour that he might come to me in my lodgings; so that I found myself obliged at last to signify to him, that seeing he was in no good correspondence with the queen, I had it in charge from the most Christian king to have no conference with him. And I caused tell him likewise, that as it would not be very proper for him to come to my lodgings, because there was such a crowd of company there, so he might know that there were two passages to it, and if he should enter by the one, I should be

* Keith, Preface, p. 7.

† Tytler, vol. vii. p. 67; Laing, vol. i. p. 22. Camden states that Bedford was instructed by Elizabeth not to give Darnley the title of king; and this, it has been asserted was the cause of his absence; but no such thing is to be found among Bedford’s instructions, and it is utterly at variance with the advice which Bedford gave the queen by Melvil—that she would entertain her husband as she had done at first, for her own honour and the advancement of her affairs. (See Robertson, vol. i. p. 333.) The “History of James the Sixth” positively affirms, that “nather did King Henrie come thair, albeit he was in Strivling all that while, nather was he permitted or requyrit to cum onyline.”

* Instructions to Bedford, Nov. 7, 1566; Keith, vol. ii. p. 479. The font weighed 333 ozs., and was valued by Stowe at £1,043. 19s.

† Keith, vol. ii. pp. 434-5, note.

‡ Letter from De Croc to the Archbishop of Glasgow. Keith, Preface, p. 7.

constrained to go out by the other. His bad deportment is incurable, nor can there be any good expected from him for several reasons, which I might tell you was I present with you. I can't pretend to foretell how all may turn, but I will say that matters cannot subsist long as they are without being accompanied by sundry bad consequences.”*

A few days after the baptism of her son, Mary yielded to the earnest entreaty of Moray, Lethington, and Bothwell,† and granted a pardon to Morton, Ruthven,‡ Lindsay, and seventy-six of their accomplices, who had been banished for the murder of Riccio. From this act of mercy she excepted only two marked delinquents—George Douglas, who had seized the king's dagger and struck Riccio the first blow, and Andrew Ker, of Faudonside, who had presented a pistol to her breast. Darnley had throughout strenuously opposed the pardon of his former accomplices, whom he had betrayed and abandoned; and knowing well that his conduct had made them his implacable enemies, he became greatly terrified at the prospect of their speedy return. So highly indeed was he offended and alarmed at their recall, that he abruptly quitted Stirling on the very day on which the pardon of the exiles was signed, and took up his residence with his father, the Earl of Lennox, at Glasgow. It was rumoured at the time, that there was a design to apprehend and confine him to prison; while, on the other hand, the friends of the queen alleged that he had it in contemplation to seize the person of the young prince, to have him crowned without delay, and to assume the government in his name.§ The queen herself,

Mary's opinion in a letter to the Scottish ambassador in France, after mentioning these rumours and the efforts she had made to trace their origin, proceeds to speak with much severity of the perverse and jealous behaviour of Darnley. “As for the king our husband,” said she, “God knows always our part towards him; and his behaviour and thankfulness to us is equally well known to God and the world, especially our own indifferent subjects see it, and in their hearts

* De Croc to Archbishop Beaton, Stirling, December 23, 1566; Keith, Preface, p. 7.

† “The queen here hath now granted to the Earl of Morton, to the Lords Ruthven and Lindsay, their relaxation and pardon. The Earl of Moray hath done very friendly to the queen for them, so have I, according to your advice. The Earls Bothwell and Atholl, and all other lords, helped therein, or else such pardons could not so soon have been gotten.”—Bedford to Cecil, 30th of December, 1566. Morton's pardon was facilitated by a promise which he transmitted from Newcastle by his kinsman, Archibald Douglas, during the baptism, that he would concur with his associates in a bond to support the queen's authority and to abandon her husband. (See Laing, vol. ii. pp. 363—366.)

‡ The Ruthven here spoken of is the son of the Lord Ruthven who took so active a part in the murder. This sanguinary ruffian had died in exile some months previous to this.

§ These reports were attributed to William Hiegate and William Walcar, two servants of the Archbishop of Glasgow; but when interrogated and confronted they denied that they had ever made any such statements.

we doubt not condemn the same. Always we perceive him occupied and busy enough to have inquisition of our doings, which, God willing, shall always be such as none shall have occasion to be offended with them, or to report of us any ways but honourably, however he, his father, and their fautors speak, which we know want no good will to make us have ado if their power were equivalent to their minds. But God moderates their forces well enough, and takes the means of the execution of their pretences from them; for we believe they shall find none, or very few, approvers of their councils and devices imagined to our displeasure and misliking.”*

The opinion which the queen expressed in such decided terms respecting the isolation and impotence of her husband was quite correct. His conduct had stripped him alike of character, authority, and adherents; and at the time this letter was written he was confined to his bed by a dangerous illness, which attacked him soon after his return to Glasgow. The dangers The king's illness.

to which the unhappy prince was exposed at this time must have been well known to many, and it was not unnaturally affirmed by popular rumour, that he had been poisoned by some of his servants, who had been bribed by Bothwell to perpetrate this crime. The report however was false, for the disease threw out an irruption over his body, and proved to be the smallpox. As soon as Mary heard of his illness, she sent her own physician to attend him, but she suffered nearly a month to elapse before she paid him a visit.†

At this period a suspicious incident occurred, which Mr. Tytler — whose laborious researches in the State Paper Office first brought the affair to light—regards as connected with the conspiracy to which Darnley soon after fell a victim. “In Mary's service,”

Mysterious incident connected with Joseph Riccio and Joseph Lutyni.

he says, “there were two Italians, Joseph Riccio and Joseph Lutyni. Joseph Riccio was brother to the unhappy secretary, David. He had arrived in Scotland soon after his brother's murder, and had been promoted by Mary to the office which it left vacant. All that we know regarding him is, that the queen treated him with favour; and Lennox, after the assassination of his son, the king, publicly named him as one of the murderers. Of Lutyni we know nothing, except that he was a gentleman in the queen's household, and an intimate friend of Joseph Riccio. This Lutyni Mary now sent on a mission to France (6th January, 1566-7), but he had only reached Berwick when she dispatched urgent letters directing that he should be instantly apprehended and brought back to Scotland, as he was a thief, and had absconded with money. Sir William Drury, Marshal of Ber-

* Letter of Queen Mary to the Archbishop of Glasgow, Keith, Preface, p. 8.

† Carte mentions it as a proof of Mary's affection for her husband, that though she never had the smallpox herself, she ventured to attend him. But this is a mistake, for Mary is known to have had the smallpox in her infancy.

wick, to whom these letters were addressed, on examining him appears to have found upon his person, or some way to have got possession of, a letter written to him by his friend Joseph Riccio; and its contents convinced Drury that the Scottish queen dreaded the disclosure of some important secret of which Lutyni had possessed himself. Alluding to Mary's letters, and the discrepancy between the slight reasons assigned for his apprehension and her great anxiety to have him again in her hands, Drury observed to Cecil—"And therefore giveth me to think that I can gather as well of the matter as of the gentleman, that it is not it [the money] that the queen seeketh so much, as to recover his person; for I have learned the man had credit there, and now the queen mistrusteth lest he should offer his service here in England, and thereby might with better occasion utter something either prejudicial to her, or that she would be loath should be disclosed but to those she pleaseth."

"Riccio's letter was certainly fitted to raise these suspicions. He told Lutyni that they were both vehemently blamed, that they were accused of acting a double part, and that Lutyni in particular was railed at as having been prying into the queen's private papers; and he implored him, when examined on his return, as he valued his own safety and his friend's life, to adhere to a certain story which he [Riccio] had already told the queen. On interrogating Lutyni, Drury found him in the greatest alarm, affirming that if he were sent back to Scotland it would be to 'a prepared death.' Upon this he consulted Cecil, and received orders not to deliver him up, but to detain him at Berwick. The whole circumstances are exceedingly obscure; but it appears to me certain from Riccio's letter that Lutyni had become acquainted through him with some secret, the betrayal of which was a matter of life or death; that Mary suspected that he had stolen or read some of her private papers; that she had determined to examine him herself upon this point; and that everything depended on his deceiving the queen on his return, by adhering to the tale which had already been told her. When it is considered that at this moment Bothwell, Lethington, and their accomplices, had already resolved on the king's death—when we recollect the conference at Craigmillar, in which they had hinted their intentions to the queen, and had been commanded by her to do nothing that would touch her honour—when we know that Bothwell, who was at this time in the highest favour with Mary, was the custodian also of the written band for the murder of Darnley—there appears to me to be a presumption that Joseph Riccio, who must have hated the king as the principal assassin of his brother, had joined the plot; that his terrors arose out of his having revealed to Lutyni the conspiracy for Darnley's murder; and that the queen suspecting it had resolved to secure his person."*

* Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 71—74; and Proofs and Illustrations.

Meanwhile the plot against the life of the king was steadily advancing. Bothwell, The plot is eager to obtain new accomplices, made known to Morton. had already gained the concurrence of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's and Lord Caithness; and no sooner had Morton returned from his banishment, in the month of January, 1566—7, than he proceeded to meet him at Whittingham, the seat of Archibald Douglas, his near relative, and used every exertion to obtain the co-operation of a man of so much ability and resolution. As an inducement for him to take part in the projected enterprise, Bothwell assured him that the queen had given her consent. Morton does not appear to have expressed either surprise or disapprobation on hearing of the plot; but the banishment he had just suffered had rendered him more cautious, and he replied that as he was just relieved from exile, and was still forbidden to approach the court, he was unwilling to meddle with new troubles when he had scarcely got rid of an old offence; and on this ground declined to join the conspiracy. In a second interview, to which Lethington was admitted, Bothwell renewed his urgent solicitations, and declared that it was the wish of the queen that Darnley should be removed; but the crafty baron still refused to have anything to do with the matter, unless the queen's written consent was produced. "I desired the Earl of Bothwell," said he, in his dying confession, "to bring me the queen's handwrite of this matter for a warrant, and then I would give him an answer, otherwise I would not meddle [intermeddle] therewith; which warrant he never purchased [procured] unto me."* Upon this Bothwell and Lethington returned to Edinburgh, accompanied, at Morton's request, by Archibald Douglas, "to return with such answer as they should receive of her majesty." Douglas was soon after ordered by the secretary to proceed to Whittingham, and tell Morton that "the queen would receive no speech of the matter appointed unto him." Having expressed a wish that the answer entrusted to him should be made more clear and explicit, Lethington replied that "the earl would sufficiently understand it."† Shortly after, Morton proceeded to St. Andrew's, to visit the Earl of Angus; and, a day or two before the murder was committed, Douglas was again dispatched to let Morton know that the affair was near its conclusion, and to request his concurrence and aid; but the earl replied, that since the written warrant from the queen, which Bothwell had promised, had not been produced, he would tions, No. II., where the documents referred to are given at length. Lutyni was sent back to Edinburgh by Drury about a week after the murder of the king. On his arrival Mary did not see him, but directed that he should be examined by Bothwell, who was apparently satisfied with the reasons the Italian gave for his flight, and permitted him to return to Berwick. The queen at the same time sent him a present of thirty crowns, and he soon after left the country, expressing the utmost satisfaction at his escape.

* Morton's confession, in Laing, vol. ii. p. 354.

† Letter from Archibald Douglas to the Queen of Scots, ibid., p. 366.

nave nothing to do with the project. Whether Bothwell had made an unauthorised use of Mary's name, in order to gain the assistance of Morton, or prudential motives alone induced Mary to refuse to give her written sanction to the plot, is one of the many disputed points connected with this atrocious affair. It is contended by Laing, that as the queen herself, previous to the conferences in England, avowed her knowledge that Lethington and Morton were privy to the murder, and declared that the former at least would be very loath to appear against her, she must have been fully apprised of the interview which Bothwell and the secretary had with Morton at Whittingham; and as that interview must have taken place during her absence at Glasgow, when Bothwell was employed to provide a house for the reception of her husband, the sole purport of the message brought by Archibald Douglas was to show to Morton that the queen would hear no speech, not of the murder,—of which the least intimation must have alarmed her, if innocent,—but of the written warrant, the matter promised or appointed unto him, which Morton demanded under her hand. This conclusion, he contends, is confirmed by the confession of Morton, after he was condemned to death as accessory to the murder. When the apparent justice of his sentence was urged by the clergy who attended him, inasmuch as he had confessed his foreknowledge and concealment of the crime, he replied, that he durst not reveal it, for fear of his life. "For at that time to whom should I reveal it? To the queen? She was the doer thereof. I was minded to have told it to the king, but yet I durst not, for fear of my life; for I knew him to be sic a bairn [such a child], that there was nothing told him but he would reveal it to her again, and therefore I durst not, for fear of my life." "It is evident," says Mr. Laing, "that Morton required the queen's warrant in writing, not to satisfy his own mind concerning her intentions (of which he could have little doubt when he considered her as the doer), but to retain it in his custody for his own vindication, if the murder should afterwards be laid to his charge."*

On the 22nd of January Mary set out for Glasgow, to pay a visit to the king, who was now partially recovered from his illness. He appears to have received some vague warnings of the plot against his life, and had recently heard from one of his servants that the queen had expressed herself towards him in very harsh terms. He was therefore greatly surprised at this unexpected visit, and not without apprehensions as to its object. Under this feeling, he sent a gentleman named Crawford, one of his father's retainers, to meet the queen, with a message excusing himself for not waiting upon her in person, on the ground that he was afraid to do so, on account of the sharp words which she had spoken of him. To this Mary answered, that "there was no receipt could serve against fear," and that if he did not feel concerned of guilt, he would have had no apprehension of danger. On reaching Glasgow she proceeded to Darnley's bedchamber, and, after some conversation on indifferent topics, the subject of their mutual estrangement was introduced. He expressed deep penitence for his offences, complained of her cruelty in refusing to accept of his professions of regret and offers of amendment, pleaded his youth and the want of good counsel in extenuation of his errors, and, with many declarations of his unalterable affection for her, solemnly promised that if she would once more forgive him, he would never again offend her. Mary, on the other hand, reminded him of his intention to retire to the continent, and of the project ascribed to him by Hiegate and Walear. He affirmed that he had never been serious in his threats of leaving the kingdom, and vehemently denied the truth of the other charge. He then informed her that he had learned from the Laird of Minto that she had refused to sign a paper which had been presented to her at Craigmillar, subscribed by certain others, authorising his seizure, and, if he resisted, his assassination. He added, that he would never think that she who was his own proper flesh would do him any hurt; and if any others should intend to injure him, they should buy it dear, unless they took him sleeping. He expressed his extreme delight at seeing her once more by his side, and begged her never to leave him again. Mary refused to take up her residence in the same house, as he was not yet purified from his sickness, which could not be done there. She then told him, that as he was weak and unable to bear much fatigue, she had brought a litter with her to carry him to Craigmillar; and he declared his readiness to accompany her, if she would consent that they should again live together as husband and wife. She promised that it should be as he had spoken, and gave him her hand; but added, that he must be thoroughly cleansed of his sickness first, which she trusted he shortly would be, as she intended to give him the bath at Craigmillar. She also requested that he would keep their reconciliation secret, lest it should give offence to some of the lords; to which he replied, that he could see no reason why they should dislike it.

As soon as this remarkable interview terminated, Darnley related all that had passed to Thomas Crawford, and requested him to communicate the particulars to his father, Lennox. Crawford immediately committed the conversation to writing, "as nearly word for word as his memory would serve him," and the paper, which still exists, endorsed by Cecil, was produced by him when he was examined on oath before the Commissioners at York, December 9th, 1568. He also states that he was asked by Darnley what he thought of the queen's proposal to carry him to Craigmillar. "She treats your majesty too like a prisoner," was the reply. "Why should you not be taken to one of your own houses in Edinburgh?"—"It struck me much in the same way," answered Darnley, "and I have fears enough; but may God judge between us. I have her promise only to trust to; but I have put myself in her hands, and I shall go with her, though she should murder me."*

* Laing, vol. i. p. 30; vol. ii. p. 61.

The question has often been asked, how is this sudden change in Mary's behaviour—this attempt to remove the suspicion and to regain the confidence of her husband—to be accounted for? Her apologists affirm, that Darnley's dangers awakened all the gentleness of her nature, and she forgot the wrongs she had endured. "Time," they say, "had abated the vivacity of her resentment; and, after its paroxysm was past, she was more disposed to weep over her afflictions, than to indulge herself in revenge. The softness of grief prepared her for a returning tenderness. His distresses effected it. Her memory shut itself to his errors and imperfections, and was only open to his better qualities and accomplishments. He himself, affected with the near prospect of death, thought with sorrow of the injuries he had committed against her. The news of his repentance was sent to her. She recollected the ardour of that affection he had lighted up in her bosom, and the happiness with which she had surrendered herself to him in the bloom and ripeness of her beauty. Her infant son, the pledge of their love, being continually in her sight, inspired her sensibilities. The plan of lenity which she had previously adopted with regard to him; her design to excite even the approbation of her enemies by the propriety of her conduct; the advices of Elizabeth, by the Earl of Bedford, to entertain him with respect; the apprehension lest the royal dignity might suffer any diminution by the universal distaste with which he was beheld by her subjects; and her certainty and knowledge of the angry passions which her chief counsellors had fostered against him,—all concurred to divest her heart of every sentiment of bitterness, and to melt it down in sympathy and sorrow. Yielding to tender and anxious emotions, she left her capital and her palace in the severest season of the year to wait upon him. Her assiduities communicated to him the most flattering solacement; and while she lingered about his person with a fond solicitude and a delicate attention, he felt that the sickness of his mind and the virulence of his disease were diminished." On the other hand, those writers who have taken an unfavourable view of Mary's character and conduct, are of opinion that the sudden transition which she made from jealousy and distrust to apparently strong affection, wears a very suspicious air, and must be regarded as the effect of artifice, not of any real change of feeling towards her husband. Her conduct, they affirm, showed that she no longer felt that warmth of conjugal affection which prompts to sympathy, and delights in all those tender offices which sooth and alleviate sickness and pain. When she heard of the king's illness, she did not even put on the appearance of this passion. Notwithstanding his danger, she amused herself with excursions to different parts of the country, and suffered near a month to elapse before she visited him at Glasgow. By this time the violence of the distemper was over, and the king, though weak and languishing, was out of all danger. The breach between Mary and her husband was not occasioned by any of those slight disgusts which interrupt the domestic union without dissolving it altogether. Almost all the passions which operate with greatest violence on a female mind, and drive it to the most dangerous extremes, concurred in raising and fomenting this unhappy quarrel. Ingratitude for the favours she had bestowed—contempt of her person—violations of the marriage vow—encroachments on her power—conspiracies against her favourites—jealousy, insolence, and obstinacy, were the injuries of which Mary had great reason to complain. She felt them with the utmost sensibility; and, added to the anguish of disappointed love, they produced those symptoms of despair which we have already described. Her resentment against the king seems not to have abated from the time of his leaving Stirling. In a letter written with her own hand to her ambassador in France, only two days before she set out for Glasgow, no token of this sudden reconciliation appear, no indication is given of returning affection, no intimation of her intended journey, no allusion whatever is made to his sickness, or to his absence from court. On the contrary, it contains bitter reflections on his past ingratitude, on his jealous and busy inquisition into her actions, and on his inclination to disturb her government, if he were able, in conjunction with his father and their friends, whose attempts she treats at the same time with contempt and scorn. The conclusion, it is alleged, which these facts seem to warrant is strengthened by the consideration that Darnley's murder, which was perpetrated a few days afterwards, caused her no grief, inspired her with no regret, called forth in her no desire for vengeance, and induced her to take no means for bringing the assassins to justice, and, above all, when she became, shortly afterwards, the wife of her husband's murderer.*

Two of Mary's celebrated letters to Bothwell were written during her brief stay at Glasgow, and, if their genuineness can be relied on, certainly furnish conclusive evidence of her dissimulation.† The first of these, written two days after her arrival, was sent by a Frenchman named Nicolas Hubert, but usually called Paris, from the place of his birth, whom Bothwell, whose servant he had been, had placed in the queen's service, and who was one of the agents employed in the murder of her husband. After an account of her journey to Glasgow, she proceeds to describe her interview with Darnley, his mistrust and apprehensions of danger, and his expressions of devoted affection, exactly as they are mentioned in the deposition of Thomas Crawford, to whom, as we have seen, the particulars were communicated by Darnley. She then goes on to say—"I made as though I thought all to be true, and that I would think upon it. You never heard him speak better, nor more humbly; and if I had not proof that his heart is as soft as wax, and mine as hard as diamond, whereuntil no shot can make breach but that which comes forth of your hand, I would have almost had pity of him. However, fear nothing, for the place shall hold unto the death. Remember, in recompense hereof, that ye suffer not your heart to be won by that false race* that will travel no less with you for the same. I do here a work that I hate much; but I had begun it this morning, and you would list to laugh to see me lie so well—at the least to dissemble so well—and to tell him truth betwixt hands. We are coupled with two false races; the devil sunder us, and God knit us together for ever for the most faithful couple that ever he united. Send me word what you have determined hereupon, that we may know by the one the other's mind for marring of anything. I am weary, and am going to sleep, and yet I cannot forbear scribbling as long as there is any paper. Cursed be this pocky fellow that troubleth me thus much! for I had a pleasanter matter to discourse unto you but for him. This day I have wrought till two of the clock upon this bracelet to put the key in the clift of it, which is tied with two laces. I have had so little time, that it is very ill made, but I will make a fairer; and in the meantime take heed that none of those that be here do see it, for all the world would know it, for I have made it in haste in their presence. To be short, he will not come but with condition that I shall promise to be with him as heretofore, at bed and board, and that I shall forsake him no more; and upon my word he would do whatsoever I will, and will come, but he hath prayed me to tarry till after to-morrow. To make him trust me I must feign something unto him; and therefore, when he desired me to promise that when he should be well we should make but one bed, I told him (feigning to believe his fair promises) that if he did not change his mind between this time and that, I was contented, so as he would say nothing thereof; for (to tell it between us two) the lords wished no ill to him, but did fear lest, considering the threatening which he made in case we did agree together, he would make them feel the small account they have made of him, and that he would persuade me to pursue some of them; and for this respect should be in jealousy, if without their knowledge I did break the game made to the contrary in their presence. And he said unto me, very pleasant and merry, 'Think you that they do the more esteem you therefore? But I am glad that you have talked to me of the lords. I hope that you desire now that we should live a happy life; for, if it were otherwise, it could not be but greater inconvenience should happen us both than you think. But I will do now whatsoever you will have me do: I will love all those that you shall love, and so as you make them to love me also.' To be short, he will go anywhere upon my word. Alas! I never deceived anybody; but I remit myself wholly to your will, and send me word what I shall do; and whatsoever happen to me, I will obey you. Now, if to please you, my dear life, I spare neither honour, conscience, nor hazard, nor greatness, take it in good part, and not according to the interpretation of your false brother-in-law, to whom I pray you give no credit against the most faithfull lover that ever you had or shall have. See not also her [Lady Bothwell] whose feigned tears you ought not more to regard than the true travails which I endure to deserve her place, for obtaining of which, against my own nature, I do betray those that could lett [hinder] me. God forgive me, and give you, my only love, the good luck and prosperity that your humble and faithfull lover doth wish unto you, who hopeth shortly to be another thing unto you, for the reward of my pains. It is very late, although I should never be weary in writing to you, yet will I end, after kissing of your hands." Notwithstanding her professions of devoted attachment to Bothwell, she expressed herself disgusted at the perfidy, or "hateful deliberation," which her passion induced her to practise. "You constrain me so to dissimulate," she said, "that I am horrified, seeing that you do not merely force me to play the part of a traitress. I pray you to remember, that if desire to please you did not force me, I would rather die than commit these things, for my heart bleeds to do them." Carried away by the violence of her love, she told Bothwell that she would obey him in all things, and begged him not to conceive a bad opinion of her, "because," she continued, "you yourself are the occasion of it. I would never act against him to gratify my own private revenge."*

* Deposition of Thomas Crawford, MS. State Paper Office; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 78; Anderson's Collections, vol. iv. p. 169.

* See Dr. Gilbert Stewart's History of Scotland; Bell's Life of Queen Mary, chap. xx.; Tytler's Vindication of Mary Queen of Scots, vol. ii. p. 69; Laing's History, vol. i. p. 26; Robertson, vol. i. p. 338; Mignet, vol. i. p. 254.

† See Appendix B, in reference to Mary's Letters and Sonnets to Bothwell.

If we may credit the confession of Paris upon his trial, along with this communication he was charged to deliver to Bothwell a purse containing three or four hundred crowns, together with the bracelets to which the queen referred in her letter. He was also instructed to inquire of Bothwell and Lethington whether, on Darnley's return, he was to be lodged at Craigmillar or Kirk-of-Field, that he might have the advantage of good air; as it was deemed expedient that he should not take up his residence at Holyrood, lest the young prince should catch the disease.† To this matter reference is made in the letter to Bothwell: "Let me know what you have determined to do touching you know what, that we may understand each other, and that nothing may be done otherwise." Paris affirms that he fulfilled these commissions, and waited upon Bothwell and Lethington, who were both of opinion that it would be better to convey Darnley to the Kirk-of-Field, which was a suburb of Edinburgh, occupied by gardens and buildings, and from its airy situation well fitted for the residence of an invalid. One of the houses situated beside the town wall, in a comparatively solitary place, and belonging to Robert Balfour, a brother of Sir James Balfour, who had drawn up the bond for the murder, was selected by the conspirators as suitable for the execution of their infamous project. Paris declared that he twice perceived Bothwell in conference with James Balfour, and that he was finally sent back with the following message: "Return to the queen, and commend me very humbly to her grace, and tell her all will go well, for Mr. James Balfour and I have not slept the whole night; so we have set all things in order, and have got ready the house. And tell the queen that I send to her this diamond by your hands, and that if I had my heart I would send it to her very willingly."*

* Laing, vol. ii., Appendix, pp. 150—191.

† Second deposition of Nicolaas Hubert, named Paris, Laing, vol. ii. p. 303; Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. i. p. 503.

* Lady Bothwell's family.

On the 27th of January Mary and Darnley left Glasgow together, and travelled by slow and easy stages to Edinburgh, which they reached on the last day of this month. Bothwell met them with his attendants a short way from the capital, and accompanied them to the Kirk-of-Field. The largest and most commodious residence in this quarter was the duke's lodging, as it was called, the town-house of the Duke of Chatelherault. On their arrival, Nelson, Darnley's servant, was about to prepare this mansion for the reception of his master; but the queen prevented him, and informed him that the king was to take up his residence in Balfour's house, whither the necessary furniture was conveyed.† This house, which was speedily destined to become so notorious, from its connection with the fate of the unhappy Darnley, had formerly belonged to the prebendaries of the Kirk-of-Field.‡

* Second deposition of Paris; Laing, vol. ii. p. 310.

† "It was devised in Glasgow that the king should have lyne first at Craigmillar; but because he had nae will thairfor, the purpose was altered, and conclusion taken that he should ly beside the Kirk-of-Field, at quhilk tyme this deponir believit ever he should have had the duke's house, thinking it to be the lugeing preparit for him; but the contrare was then schawin to him by the queen, wha conveyit him to the uther house; and at his coming thereto the chalmir [chamber] was hung, and a new bed of black figured velvet standing therein."—Evidence of Thomas Nelson concerning the murder of King Henry Darnley. Laing, vol. ii. p. 292.

‡ "'The Kirk-of-Field, in which,' says Melvil, 'the king was lodged, in a place of good air, where he might best recover his health,' belonged to Robert Balfour, the provost, or head prebendary of the collegiate church of St. Mary-in-the-Fields, so called because it was beyond the city wall when first built. When the wall was afterwards extended it enclosed the Kirk-of-Field, as well as the house of the provost and prebendaries. The Kirk-of-Field, with the grounds pertaining to it, occupied the site of the present college, and of those buildings which stand be-

It was small, confined, and insecure, consisting only of two stories, one of which contained a cellar and another room, and the other a gallery, which extended above the cellar, and a bedchamber, which corresponded with the room on the groundfloor. Darnley was established in this chamber, while his three servants, Taylor, Nelson, and Edward Simons, occupied the gallery. The cellar on the ground-floor was transformed into a kitchen; and the queen had a bed prepared for herself in the room immediately below Darnley's bedchamber. By her directions, the door at the foot of the staircase which communicated between the groundfloor and the upper rooms was removed, and employed as a cover for the vat in which Darnley was bathed; so that no security but the portal-doors of the gate remained.*

During the ten days which Darnley spent in this residence, Mary attended him with the most assiduous care; she passed much of the day in his society, and slept several nights in the chamber under his apartment. The marks of tenderness and affection which she showed him seem to have partially dispelled his suspicions and fears; and, though not without some apprehensions of the plot which had been formed against his life, he trusted to the queen's promises, and evidently believed that her presence would protect him from the machinations of his enemies. But while the unhappy prince was indulging these dreams of security, and the reconciliation between the queen and him seemed complete, he was on the very brink of destruction. Many persons entertained suspicions of Bothwell's murderous designs, but no one durst apprise tween Infirmary and Drummond Street. In the extended line of the wall, what was afterwards called the Potterrow Port, was at first denominated the Kirk-of-Field Port, from its vicinity to the church of that name. The wall ran east from this port, along the south side of the present college and the north side of Drummond Street, where a part is still to be seen in its original state. The house stood at some distance from the kirk; and the latter, from the period of the Reformation, had fallen into decay. The city had not yet stretched in this direction much farther than the Cowgate. Between that street and the town wall were the Dominican Convent of the Black Friars, with its almshouses for the poor and gardens, covering the site of the old High School, and the Royal Infirmary, and the Kirk-of-Field with its provost's residence. The Kirk-of-Field house stood very nearly on the site of the present north-west corner of Drummond Street. It fronted the west, having its southern gavel so close upon the town wall, that a little postern door entered immediately through the wall into the kitchen. It contained only four apartments. * * * Below, a small passage went through from the front door to the back of the house; upon the right hand of which was the kitchen, and upon the left a room furnished as a bedroom for the queen when she chose to remain all night. Passing out at the backdoor, there was a turnpike stair behind, which, after the old fashion of Scottish houses, led up to the second story. Above, there were two rooms corresponding with those below. Darnley's chamber was immediately over Mary's; and on the other side of the lobby, above the kitchen, 'a garde-robe,' or 'little gallery,' which was used as a servants' room, and which had a window in the gavel, looking through the town wall, and corresponding with the postern door below. Immediately beyond this wall was a lane shut in by another wall, to the south of which were extensive gardens."—Bell's Life of Queen Mary, chap. xx.

* Evidence of Thomas Nelson; Laing, vol. ii. p. 293.

Darnley of his danger, as "he revealed all," says Melvil, "to some of his own servants, who were not all honest;" or rather, according to Buchanan and Morton, he told everything to the queen herself. Only three days before the murder, Lord Robert Stewart, Mary's illegitimate brother, informed Darnley "that if he retired not hastily out of that place, it would cost him his life." Darnley immediately informed Mary, who sent for Lord Robert, and in the presence of her husband questioned him on the subject; but he, afraid of involving himself in danger, retracted what he had formerly said, and denied that he had ever made any such statement. "This advertisement," says Melvil, "moved the Earl Bothwell to haste forward his enterprise." That flagitious noble was now busily occupied in making all due preparations for the accomplishment of his murderous project. He had secured the active co-operation or tacit assent of the Earls of Huntley, Argyle, and Caithness, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, Archibald Douglas, and many others of the leading lords and officers of the crown; and, in addition to these accomplices of high rank, he secured the services of a number of hardened and unscrupulous villains, of whose courage and devotedness he had ample proofs, and who readily consented to become the instruments of his crime. Four of these—Dalgleish,

Bothwell's preparations for the murder of the king.

Wilson, Powrie, and French Paris His accomplices. —were merely menial retainers; the other four who were present at the "deed-doing" were the Laird of Ormiston, Hob Ormiston, his uncle, John Hepburn of Bolton, and John Hay of Tallo. The Frenchman Paris, who had been long in the employment of Bothwell, and on his recommendation was taken into the queen's service shortly before the perpetration of the murder, rendered important assistance in enabling his former master to obtain the keys of some of the doors of the Kirk-of-Field House, of which he caused counterfeit impressions to be taken. If we may credit the statement of Paris, it was not till Wednesday, the 5th of February, that the plot was revealed to him by Bothwell; and in the confession which he made on his trial, when two years later he was condemned to be executed for his complicity in the murder, he relates, in terms of striking simplicity, his feelings when he was made acquainted with the terrible secret, and his apprehensions that it would issue in his own destruction. "On hearing him," he says, "my heart grew faint; I did not say a word, but cast down my eyes." Bothwell asked him impatiently what he thought of the plan. "Sir," he replied, "I think that what you tell me is a great thing."—"What is your opinion of it?" reiterated Bothwell.—"Pardon me, sir, if I tell you my opinion according to my poor mind."—"What! are you going to preach to me?"—"No, sir; you shall hear presently."—"Well, say on." Paris then reminded him of the troubles and misfortunes of his past life, from which he was now happily delivered, and of the extraordinary favour which he had attained; and endeavoured to dissuade him from the commission of this crime, as it would certainly destroy his present tranquillity, and endanger his influence. "If you undertake this thing," he said, "it will be the greatest trouble you ever had, above all others that you have endured; for every one will cry out upon you, and you will be destroyed."—"Well," said Bothwell, "have you done?"—"You will pardon me, sir," answered Paris, "if you please, if I have spoken to you according to my poor mind."—"Fool that you are!" said Bothwell, "do you think that I am doing this all alone by myself?"—"Sir," said Paris, "I do not know how you are going to do it, but I know well that it will be the greatest trouble that you ever had."—"And how so?" said Bothwell. "I have already with me Lethington, who is esteemed one of the most prudent men in this country, and who is the undertaker of all this; and I have also the Earl of Argyle, my brother Huntley, Morton, Ruthven, and Lindsay. These three last will never fail me, for I have begged for their pardon; and I have the signatures of all those I have mentioned to you. We were desirous to do it the last time we were at Craigmillar; but you are a fool, and poor of spirit, unworthy to hear anything of consequence."* Paris finally consented to do what Bothwell required, and afforded him all the aid in his power in completing his preparations for the murder.

Till within a few days of the deed, Bothwell had not made up his mind how Darnley was to be put to death. He held various secret meetings with his four principal accomplices, at which the plans of attacking Darnley when walking in the garden adjoining the Kirk-of-Field, and of stabbing him in his bed at midnight, were successively proposed and rejected, as alike dangerous and uncertain; and it was at length resolved to employ gunpowder, and to destroy both the house and its inmates. A quantity of powder was accordingly brought from the Castle of Dunbar, and conveyed to Bothwell's own lodgings, in the immediate vicinity of Holyrood; and Paris was instructed to admit Hay of Tallo, Hepburn, and Ormiston into the queen's bedchamber, on the evening appointed for the execution of the murder, that they might deposit the powder there beneath the room in which Darnley slept. Paris declared that having, contrary to Bothwell's orders, placed the queen's bed immediately under that of the king, Mary herself came into the room in the evening, and ordered him to change the position of the bed.† He also alleged, that on the Saturday evening before the murder she removed from her own chamber a rich coverlet of fur; and Nelson, one of Darnley's servants, who was found beneath the ruins of the house, says that the queen caused a bed of new black velvet to be removed from the king's apartment, and an old one to be substituted in its place.*

* Deposition of Paris, Laing, vol. ii. p. 299.

† "The queen said to me, 'Fool that you are, I will not have my bed in that place!' and so made me remove it; by which words I perceived in my mind that she was aware of the plot. Therefore, I took the courage to say to her, 'Madam, my Lord Bothwell has commanded me to take to him the keys of your chamber, because he intends to do something in it—namely, to blow up the king with gunpowder.'—'Do not talk about that at this hour,' said she, 'but do what you please.' Upon this I did not venture to say anything more."—Second Deposition of Paris, Laing, vol. ii. p. 312.

The night of Sunday, the 9th of February, was fixed by the conspirators for the execution of their villainous project. At dusk Bothwell assembled his accomplices in his lodgings, concerted his plan with them, and allotted to each the part he was to perform.† The queen dined that day at Holyrood, and between seven and eight o'clock went to sup with the Bishop of Argyle, in the house of Mr. John Balfour, where the bishop lodged. About nine she rose from the supper-table, and, accompanied by the Earls of Argyle, Huntley, and Cassilis, went to visit her husband at the Kirk-of-Field, where she professed her intention to remain during the night.‡ Meanwhile, three of Bothwell's retainers—Dalglish, Powrie, and Wilson—had been employed in conveying the gunpowder in bags from their master's lodgings to the convent gate, at the foot of Blackfriar's Wynd, where it was taken from them by Hay of Tallo, Hepburn, and Ormiston, who carried it up to the house. When they had conveyed the whole, they were ordered to return home; and as they passed up the Blackfriar's Wynd, they saw "the quene's grace gangand before them with licht torches," and Powrie, as if suddenly conscience-stricken, said to Wilson, "Jesu! Pate! whatna gait is this we are ganging? I trow it be not good."§ Bothwell, who was present at the banquet given by the Bishop of Argyle, and quitted the entertainment at the same time with the queen, kept at a distance, walking up and down the Cowgate, while his accomplices received and deposited the powder. A large empty barrel had been concealed by his orders in the garden of the Dominican convent, and into it the conspirators intended to have put all the bags containing the powder; and the barrel was then to have been carried in at the lower backdoor of Darnley's house, and placed in the queen's bedroom, where Paris was ready to receive it. But in consequence of the barrel turning out to be so large that it could not be taken in by the backdoor, it became necessary to carry the bags one by one into the bedroom, where they were emptied in a heap on the floor. Bothwell, who seems to have been alarmed at the delay caused by their proceedings, came to inquire if all was ready, and urged his accomplices to make haste "before the queen came forth of the king's house; for if she came forth before they were ready, they would not find such commodity." At length, when all their arrangements were completed, Ormiston went away; but Hepburn and Hay remained with their false keys in the room with the gunpowder, and Bothwell went up stairs and joined the queen and her attendants in Darnley's apartment. Shortly afterwards Paris also entered the king's bedroom;† and the queen then recollected that she had promised to give a masque at Holyrood in honour of the marriage of her French servant, Bastian, to Margaret Carwood, one of her favourite women; and taking farewell of Darnley, embraced him, and left the house with her suite, including Bothwell, and proceeded by torch-light to Holyrood.

Bothwell accompanied the queen to the apartments where the festivity was proceeding; and Paris, who carried in his pocket the key of the queen's bedroom at the Kirk-of-Field, followed in his train. If we are to credit the confession which he made at his trial, the Frenchman, upon entering the apartment where the dancing and masking was going on, retired in a melancholy mood to a corner, and stood apart by himself. Bothwell, observing him, and fearing that his behaviour might attract notice, went up to him and angrily demanded why he looked so sad; adding in a whisper, that if he retained that gloomy countenance before the queen, he should be made to suffer for it. Paris replied, that he did not care what became of himself, if he could only get permission to go home to bed, for he was ill. "No," said Bothwell, "you must remain with me; would you leave these two gentlemen, Hay and Hepburn, locked up where they now are?" "Alas!" answered the unhappy valet, who felt himself completely in the power of his relentless master; "what more must I do this night? I have no heart for this business." Bothwell then put an end to the conversation by ordering Paris to follow him immediately. About midnight Bothwell quitted the palace, and came "to his own lodging in the abbey," where he changed his rich court-dress of black velvet and satin for a dress of common stuff, and wrapt himself up in his riding cloak. Taking Paris, Powrie, Wilson, and Dalglish with him, he went down the lane which ran along the wall of the queen's south gardens, joining the foot of the Canongate, where the gate of the outer court of the palace formerly stood. As they passed the door of the queen's garden the party was challenged by one of the sentinels, who demanded, "Who goes there?"—"Friends!" answered Powrie.—"What friends?"—"Friends of

* Deposition of Powrie, Laing, vol. ii. p. 292.

† "Paris passes to the king's chalmere, where the king, the queen, and the Erle Bothwell and others were . . . and as the deponar believes Paris shew the Erle Bothwell that all things were in readiness, and syne soon thereafter the quene and the lordis returnit to the abbay."—Deposition of Hay of Tallo. "Sche [the queen] tuk purpose (as it had been on the sudden) and departit as sche spak to give the mask to Bastiane, wha that night was married to her servand."—Deposition of Nelson, Laing, vol. ii. pp. 292-293.

‡ "The chalmere wherein she lay the said twa nights, and promisit also to have bidden there upon the Sunday at night."—Nelson's Deposition, Laing, vol. ii. p. 293.

§ Deposition of Powrie, Laing, vol. ii. p. 272.

Lord Bothwell."* On this they were allowed to proceed, and going up the Canongate, they found that the Netherbow Port, by which they intended to enter the city, was shut. Wilson immediately awoke John Galloway, the porter, calling to him to "open the port to friends of my Lord Bothwell." Galloway, in surprise, asked, "What they did out of their beds at that time of night?"† They made no answer, but passed on. Proceeding up the High Street, they called at Ormiston's lodgings, intending to take him with them; but the laird, though he had assisted in conveying the powder into the Kirk-of-Field, was unwilling to take any further share in the commission of the crime, and, on knocking at his door, they were told that he was not at home. They went without him down a close below the Blackfriars Wynd (apparently Todrig's Wynd), and entering the convent gardens already mentioned, they stopped at the back wall, a short way behind Darnley's residence. Here Bothwell left Powrie, Wilson, and Dalgleish, and proceeded with Paris alone to the Kirk-of-Field, where he waited for Hepburn and Hay of Tallo in Balfour's garden.

Up to this point the proceedings of the conspiracy are perfectly clear, but great obscurity rests on what followed, and it has never been ascertained with certainty how Darnley was murdered. The unhappy prince had become greatly changed since his illness; and frequently said that he knew he should be slain, complained that he was hardly dealt with, and lamented that there were few near him whom he could trust. After the departure of the queen, as though foreboding the destruction which was impending over him, he sought consolation in the sacred Scriptures, and repeated the 55th Psalm, which contained many passages adapted to his peculiar situation. After his devotion he went to bed, and fell asleep; Taylor, his young page, being beside him in the same apartment.‡ Thomas Nelson, Edward Simons, and a boy lay in the gallery or servants' apartment on the same floor, and nearer the town wall. According to one account, it was at this moment that the two murderers concealed in the queen's bedroom perpetrated their crime. By means of their false keys they gained access to the king's apartment; but the noise having awakened their miserable victim, he jumped out of bed in his shirt and pelisse, and endeavoured to escape. He was seized however by the assassins, and strangled after a desperate resistance; his cries for mercy being heard by some women in the nearest house. His page was put to death in the same manner, and their bodies were carried into a small orchard near at hand, where they were found next morning, unscathed by fire or powder, the king in his shirt only, and the pelisse by his side. The house was then blown up, in order completely to obliterate all traces of the murder.* On the other hand, Bothwell's accomplices when brought to trial, while fully admitting their share in this horrible tragedy, emphatically deny that Darnley was first strangled or assassinated and then carried out to the garden. Hepburn declared expressly that "he knew nothing but that Darnley was blown into the air, for he was handled with no man's hands that he saw." The Laird of Ormiston, before his execution, "being requirit by the minister gif he knew not that the king was otherways handlit by men's hands, for it is commonlie spoken he was brought forth and wirryit [strangled], wha answerit, 'As I shall answer to my God I know nothing, but he was blawin up, and did inquire the same maist diligentlie at John Hepburn, and John Hay, and all that tarried behind me, wha swore unto me they never knew na other thing but he was blawin up.'" And Hay deposed that Bothwell some time afterwards said to him, "What thought ye when ye saw him blown into the air?" Hay answered, "Alas! my lord, why speak ye of that; for when ever I hear such a thing the words wound me to death, as they ought to do you." And in the continuation of Knox's history it is mentioned, that medical men, "being convened at the queen's command to view and consider the manner of Darnley's death," were almost unanimously of opinion that he was blown into the air, although he had no mark of fire.†

Whatever was the precise mode in which the unfortunate prince was murdered, no doubt rests on the part acted by Bothwell. It will be remembered that when Dalgleish, Powrie, and Wilson, were left at the foot of the convent gardens, the arch-conspirator and Paris passed over the wall at the back of Darnley's residence, and joined the murderers, who had remained locked up in the queen's bedroom. On the arrival of Bothwell, Hepburn lighted the match which was connected with the gunpowder lying in a heap upon the

* This version of the murder is based on a despatch from the Pope's Nuncio to Cosmo I., which was found in the archives of the Medici by Prince Labanoff, and by him communicated to Mr. Tytler, who has framed his narrative of Darnley's death in accordance with its statements, and has been followed by the acute and able author of the "History of Mary Queen of Scots." (See Tytler, vol. vii. p. 83, and Mignet, vol. i. pp. 268-9.) This was also the prevalent belief in Scotland; as is proved by a proclamation published on the 20th of June, 1567, in which Bothwell is accused not only of having conspired against the life of the king, but of having killed him with his own hands. "Of the quhilk murder he is found not onlie to have bin the inventor and devyser, but the executor with his awin hands, as his awin servantis being in companie with him at that unworthie deid has testifiet." The questions which the court put to Hepburn, Hay, and the other murderers, on their trial, show clearly that it was the prevailing opinion at the time that the king was strangled. It appears that Bothwell wished it to be believed that the house had been struck by lightning. Melvil says, on the morning after the murder Bothwell "came forth and told me he saw the strangest accident that ever chanced—to wit, the thunder came out of the lift [sky] and had burnt the king's house, and himself found lying dead a little distance from the house under a tree, and willed me to go up and see him, how that there was not a mark nor a hurt on all his body."

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 550; Bell's Life of Queen Mary, chup. xxi.

* Deposition of Powrie, Laing, vol. ii. p. 270.

† Ibid., p. 275; Deposition of Dalgleish.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 82.

floor, and having locked the doors, they returned in a body to the convent gardens to wait the explosion. The match, however, burnt too slow for their impatience; and a quarter of an hour having elapsed without any noise being heard, Bothwell insisted on returning to look in at the back window of the bedroom, to see if the light was burning, but was prevented by Hepburn, who pointed out the danger. At length the match took effect about two o'clock in the morning.* With a loud noise, like the bursting of a thunder-cloud, the house blew up into a thousand fragments, leaving scarcely a vestige standing of its former walls; and "great stones of the length of ten feet, and of the breadth of four feet, were found blown from the house a far way." Paris, who compares the explosion to the noise of a storm of thunder condensed into one clap, fell almost senseless through fear, with his face upon the earth. Bothwell himself, "though a bold, bad man," confessed a momentary panic. "I have been at many important enterprises," he said, "but I never felt before as I do now." The assassins hurried terror-stricken from the spot, and passing out at the convent gate, they separated in the Cowgate. Bothwell himself, with part of his attendants, went up a wynd, "be east the Friar Wynd," and crossing the High Street, endeavoured to get out of the city by leaping a broken part of the town wall in Leith Wynd; but finding it too high, they were forced to rouse once more the porter at the Netherbow. They then passed down St. Mary's Wynd, and along the south back of the Canongate to the earl's lodgings in the palace. In passing the door of the queen's garden they were again challenged by the sentinels, and answered as before that they were friends of the Earl of Bothwell, carrying despatches to him from the country. The sentinels asked "if they knew what noise that was they had heard a short time before?" They told them they did not.† On reaching his lodgings, Bothwell called for something to drink, and taking off his clothes, went to bed immediately.

The cry almost immediately arose in the city that the Kirk-of-Field had been blown up, and the king slain. The tidings quickly reached Holyrood, and were communicated to Bothwell by George Hacket, one of the servants of the palace, who knocked loudly at his door, and demanded admittance. The door was opened, and "when he came in, he appeared to be in ane great effray, and was black as any pik [pitch], and not ane word to speak." Bothwell, with the greatest coolness, asked him what was the matter. "The king's house," said Hacket, "is blown up, and I trow the king is slain!" At these words Bothwell started in well-feigned astonishment and alarm, and shouted "Treason!"* He then dressed himself, and having meanwhile been joined by Huntley, a brother conspirator, and some others belonging to the court, they repaired to the queen's apartments, and acquainted her with the dreadful fate of her husband.

At daybreak, the citizens of Edinburgh crowded in great numbers to examine the scene of the murder. It was found that the three servants who slept in the gallery were all buried in the ruins, out of which Nelson alone was taken alive † the sole survivor of the five persons who were in the house at the time of the explosion. Bothwell, however, soon repaired to the spot with a guard of soldiers, and having dispersed the horror-stricken crowd, removed the bodies of the king and his page to a neighbouring house, without permitting any one to examine them. But it did not escape the notice of the spectators that the bodies displayed no wounds, and had not been scathed by fire or powder.‡

Such was the miserable fate of Henry Stewart, Lord Darnley, in the twenty-first year of his age, and only eighteen months after his disastrous union with the Scottish queen. "Had he died a natural death," says Dr. Robertson, "his character. His character. end would have been unalmented, and his memory have been soon forgotten; but the cruel circumstances of his murder, and the remissness with which it was afterwards avenged, have made his name to be remembered with regret, and have rendered him the object of pity, to which he had otherwise no title."§ He had been to Scotland only a cause of civil war; to his nobility an object of contempt, of pity, or of hatred; and to his wife a perpetual source of misfortune. Any praise he may deserve must be given to him almost solely on the score of his personal endowments: his mind and disposition had been allowed to run to waste, and were under no control but that of his own wayward feelings and fancies. Keith, in the following words, draws a judicious contrast between his animal and intellectual qualities:—"He is said to have been one of the tallest and handsomest young men of the age; that he had a comely face

* "Thereafter the Erle of Bothwell, accompanyt with Paris and Geordie Dalglish, came to the back-yard, and the said Hepburn, wha had twa keys of the back-door, lichtit the lunt [match], and came with the deponer, and lockit the doors after them, and fand the Erle of Bothwell in the yard, wha speerit at them gif they had done that quhilk he had bidden them, and fryt the lunt; and they answerit that it was done. And after my lord and they tarryit in the yard ane lang time; and when my lord saw that the matter came not hastily to pass, he was angry, and wald have gane in himself into the house; and the said John Hepburn stoppit him, saying thir words, 'Ye need not.' And my lord said thir words, 'I will not gang away till I see it done;' and within ane short space it fryt; and when they saw the house rising, and heard the crack, they ran their way."—Deposition of John Hay, Laing, vol. ii. p. 280.

† Laing, vol. i. p. 235; Bell, chap. xxi.

* Deposition of William Powrie, Laing, vol. ii. p. 271.

† "This deponer and Edward Symons lay in the little gallery that went direct to south out of the king's chalmir, having ane windo in the gawill [gable] thro the town wall, and besyde them lay William Tailzeir's boy, quhilk never knew of ony thing till the house wherein they lay was fallin about them; out of the quhilk how soon this deponer could be red he stood upon the ruinous wall till the people convenit, and then he gat claithis, and sa departit."—Deposition of Thomas Nelson, Laing, vol. ii. p. 294.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Feb. 11, 1566-7; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 86.

§ Robertson, vol. i. p. 342.

and pleasant countenance; that he was a most dextrous horseman, and exceedingly well skilled in all genteel exercises; prompt and ready for all games and sports; much given to the diversions of hawking and hunting, to horse-racing and music, especially on the lute; he could speak and write well, and was bountiful and liberal enough. But, then, to balance these good natural qualifications, he was much addicted to intemperance, to base and unmanly pleasures; he was haughty and proud, and so very weak in mind, as to be a prey to all that came about him; he was inconstant, credulous, and facile, unable to abide by any resolutions, capable to be imposed upon by designing men, and could conceal no secret, let it tend ever so much to his own welfare or detriment.*

It must have been evident to all that immediate Unsatisfactory investigation promised the best, behaviour of almost the only hope of the discovery of the king's murderers; the queen.

but to the surprise and indignation of the public, and the deep mortification of the queen's friends, she manifested none of that activity and resolution which she had displayed after the murder of Riccio, but kept her bed in a dark room, and would communicate with her most faithful servants by the medium of Bothwell alone. The murderer of her husband was the only one of her nobles who had access to her presence; and, according to the evidence of Paris, on his return from the Kirk-of-Field, was admitted to a conference under the curtain of her bed—a statement which is confirmed by Melvil, whom Bothwell met at the door of the chamber, and informed him “that the queen was sorrowful and quiet, which occasioned him to come forth.”†

The task of communicating the catastrophe to the French court was left to the Privy Council, which was almost entirely composed of the instigators and accomplices of the murder; but the queen herself dispatched at the same time a letter to the Archbishop of Glasgow, her ambassador at Paris, in which she speaks with horror of “that mischievous deed,” as she terms it, which had spread consternation throughout all Scotland,—“a matter so horrible and so strange, that the like was never heard of in any country.” She intimates that the enterprise was directed against her as well as the king, as she lay most part of the week in the same lodging, remained there with most of the lords till midnight, “and of very chance tarried not all night, by reason of a masque at the abbey; but we believe it was not chance, but God, put it into our head.” She expresses no grief or pity for the untimely fate of her husband; but speaks of the diligence which the Privy Council had already exerted to discover the murderers, and her own resolution “to punish the same with such rigour as shall serve for example of this cruelty to all ages to come.”‡ It was not till the Wednesday after the murder, however, that a proclamation appeared offering a reward of two thousand pounds Scot (£166 sterling) to any who would give information regarding the perpetrators of the crime. On the same day the body of the king was brought to the chapel of Holyrood, “very secretly;” and interred on the Saturday night following, “without any kind of solemnity or mourning heard among all the persons at court,” and without the presence of any of the nobles or officers of state, except the Justice-Clerk Bellenden and Sir James Traquair.* On the same day that her husband was buried, Mary conferred upon Bothwell the reversion of the feudal superiority of Leith, which had been already mortgaged to the citizens of Edinburgh, and which gave him not only the command of the harbour, but indirectly great influence over the capital.

Shortly after the proclamation offering a reward for the discovery of the assassins had been issued, a paper was fixed during the night on the door of the Tolbooth, or common prison, denouncing Bothwell, James Balfour, and David Chambers, as the authors of the murder, “the queen herself assenting thereto.” Voices, too, were heard in the streets of Edinburgh at midnight, accusing the same persons. Another proclamation was issued by the queen, calling on the author of the paper to divulge his name, and to subscribe the charge, which produced a second placard on the 19th, requiring that the promised reward should be first lodged in honest hands, and that four of the queen's servants, who were mentioned by name, should be arrested; and undertaking that, as soon as these conditions were complied with, the author and four friends would discover themselves. But Mary had already left Edinburgh on the 16th, and removed to Seton, accompanied by Bothwell, Argyle, Huntley, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, and Secretary Lethington, who were all deeply implicated in the assassination of the king; and instead of adopting any vigorous measures to discover and secure the conspirators, she speedily seemed to have forgotten the whole affair in the pursuit of gay and festive amusements. She and Bothwell would shoot at the butts against Huntley and Seton; and on one occasion, after winning the match, they forced these lords to pay the forfeit in the shape of a dinner at Tranent.† On the very day after the second placard appeared, a pension was conferred upon Francis, one of her servants, who was denounced by name as accessory to the murder of Darnley; the vicarage of Dunlop was bestowed upon Archibald Beton, usher of the king's chamber, who kept the keys of the Kirk-of-Field; Durham, the king's porter, who was accused of betraying his master, was rewarded with a place and pension;‡ and all inquiry into that atrocious crime was silently, yet completely, abandoned.

* Birrell's Diary; Historie of James the Sext; Laing, vol. i. p. 50.

† MS. State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 91.

‡ Laing, vol. v. pp. 35-36

* Keith, vol. ii. pp. 506—509; Bell, chap. xxi. p. 88.

† Laing, vol. ii. p. 315; Melvil's Memoirs, p. 174.

‡ Labanoff, vol. ii. pp. 3-4.

On the 20th, the Earl of Lennox, father to the murdered king, wrote to Mary in pathetic terms, earnestly imploring her to apprehend the suspected persons, and to lose no time in assembling the Estates of the realm, for the purpose of investigating the circumstances of his son's death. She replied, that the placards contradicted each other, and that she was at a loss on which to proceed; that she had already desired a parliament to be summoned, and that, as soon as it met, the death of the king should be the first subject brought forward for consideration. Lennox wrote again on the 26th, stating that when he advised her majesty to assemble her nobility, he did not allude to the meeting of parliament, which had been proclaimed before Christmas, and could not be held immediately; but, as the crime demanded prompt measures, her majesty should, for her own honour, and for the tranquillity of the realm, apprehend the accused, and commit them to prison. Their names, he added, were notorious to the world, and he marvelled they should have been kept from her majesty's ears; but, to prevent all mistakes, he should repeat them: the Earl of Bothwell, Mr. James Balfour, Mr. David Chambers, and black Mr. John Spens, were denounced, he said, in the first placard; in the second, Francis, Bastian, John de Bourdeaux, and Joseph, David Riccio's brother. And he besought the queen to assemble the nobility and council, and by public proclamation to summon the authors of the placards to appear before them, and be confronted with those whom they had accused. But he besought her in vain. She professed, indeed, her determination that the persons named by Lennox "should abide and underlie such trial as by the laws of the realm was usual." "They being found culpable," she added, "in any way of that crime and odious fact named in the placards, and whereof you suspect them, we shall, even according to our former letter, see the condign punishment as vigorously and extremely executed as the weight of that fact deserves; for indeed, as you write, we esteem ourselves a party, if we were resolute of the authors."*

In spite of these professions, it became painfully evident that the queen had no serious intention of adopting vigorous measures to discover the perpetrators of the murder. Meanwhile, not a few persons from whom important information might have been elicited, and some even of those arraigned in the placards, took the opportunity of leaving the country. Joseph Riccio, Bastian, Francis, the queen's Italian steward, Dolu, her treasurer, and several other Frenchmen, set out with all speed for the continent; whilst Powrie and Wilson were sent by Bothwell to the Castle of Hermitage. The symptoms of public dissatisfaction, however, became every day more apparent; and reports were current, and daily gathered strength, which denounced Bothwell by name as the deviser of the assassination, and vaguely indicated his accomplices. A bill fastened on the Tron* declared that the smith who had furnished the false keys to the king's apartment would, on due security, come forward and point out his employers. Two new placards were also hung up, on one of which were written the queen's initials, M.R., with a hand holding a sword; and on the other Bothwell's initials, with a mallet painted above, supposed to be an allusion to the only wound found upon Darnley, which appeared to have been given by a blunt instrument.† These manifestations of public feeling rendered Bothwell furious. Accompanied by fifty armed men he rode into Edinburgh, and publicly declared, with fierce oaths and gestures, that if he knew who were the authors of these placards he would "wash his hands in their blood." It was observed that his whole deportment showed that he was animated by the suspicions of guilt as much as by anger; that his followers, as they passed through the streets, kept a vigilant watch on the citizens, and crowded around their leader, as if they apprehended an attack; and that whenever he spoke to any one of whose friendship he was not assured, he watched his motions with a jealous eye, and always kept his hand on the hilt of his dagger.‡

At this juncture Mary received a letter from the Archbishop of Glasgow, her ambassador at the court of France, entreating her, in the most solemn and earnest terms, to institute a public inquiry into the murder, and to lose no time in bringing its authors to justice. He informed her, with courageous honesty, that in France the most unfavourable opinion was entertained of her own conduct, and that it was currently reported that the slaughter of her husband had taken place with her consent. "Of this deed," he says, "if I should write all that is spoken here, and Letter from the Archbishop of Glasgow.
also in England, of the miserable estate of the realm by the dishonour of the nobility, mistrust and treason of your whole subjects—yea, that yourself is greatly and wrongously calumniated to be the motive principal of the whole, and all done by your command, I can conclude nothing besides that which your majesty writes to me yourself, that since it hath pleased God to preserve you to take a vigorous vengeance thereof, that rather than it be not actually taken, it appears to me better, in this world, that you had lost life and all. * * * Here it is needful that you show forth now, rather than ever before, the great virtue, magnanimity, and constancy, which God has granted you; by whose grace I hope you shall overcome this most heavy envy and displeasure of the committing thereof, and preserve that reputation in all godliness which you have acquired long since; which can appear no ways more clearly than that you do such justice as the whole world may declare your innocence, and give testimony for ever of their treason that have

* A post in the public market where goods were weighed.

† Tytler, vol. vii. p. 91.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil, 28th Feb., 1567; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 90. See Appendix C.

* Keith, vol. ii. p. 532.

committed, without fear of God or man, so cruel and ungodly a murder." *

On the same day, Mary received a letter of condolence and advice from Elizabeth, in which she vehemently entreated her to take immediate steps to vindicate her reputation. "Madam," she wrote,

Letter from Elizabeth. "my ears have been so astonished, and my mind so grieved, and my heart so terrified, at hearing the horrible sound of the abominable murder of your late husband and my deceased cousin, that I have even now no spirit to write about it; and although my natural feelings constrain me greatly to deplore his death, as he was so near a relation to me, nevertheless, boldly to tell you what I think, I cannot conceal from myself that I am more full of grief on your account than on his. O madam! I should not perform the part of a faithful cousin, or an affectionate friend, if I studied rather to please your ears than to endeavour to preserve your honour; therefore, I will not conceal from you what most persons say about the matter, namely, that you will look through your fingers at taking vengeance for this deed, and have no intention to touch those who have done you this kindness,—as if the act would not have been perpetrated unless the murderers had received assurance of their impunity. Think of me, I beg you, who would not entertain such a thought in my heart for all the gold in the world." She then went on to urge her, in the strongest terms, not to leave so great a crime unpunished. "I exhort you," she adds, "I advise and beseech you to take this thing so much to heart, as not to fear to bring to judgment the nearest relation you have, and to let no persuasion hinder you from manifesting to the world that you are a noble princess, and also a loyal wife." †

A month had now elapsed since the assassination of the king, and yet Mary had taken no steps to punish the perpetrators of the crime, or to vindicate herself in the eyes of the world. Instead of ordering the arrest of the principal criminal and his associates, her infatuated predilection for that atrocious villain became every day more apparent. She loaded him with new favours, and, in addition to the Superiority of Leith, the Castle of Blackness and the Inch, she conferred upon him the command of the Castle of Edinburgh, which had been previously held by the Earl of Mar, governor of the prince royal. Now, however, the honest and energetic remonstrances of the Archbishop of Glasgow, the blunt and vehement accusations of Elizabeth, the bitter reproaches of the Queen-mother of France and the cardinal her uncle, the loud clamours of the people for inquiry into the murder, the solemn exhortations of the preachers, that all men should betake themselves to prayer and repentance, and their appeals to God that he would be pleased "to reveal and revenge," convinced the queen that something must be done to avert universal odium, and she at last gave orders that Bothwell should be brought to a public trial. The manner, however, in which this tardy exhibition of justice was conducted, rendered it evident from the first that the trial was Bothwell's trial, intended to be nothing else than a mockery. Mary now became as anxious to hasten, as she had previously been to prevent the impeachment of her favourite. A fortnight only was given to the Earl of Lennox to collect evidence; and he received orders to appear at Edinburgh on the 12th of April, to prefer and maintain his charges against Bothwell. It was in vain that Lennox pleaded the necessity of delay, and urged that when the suspected persons were still at liberty, powerful at court, and about her majesty's person, it was impossible that a fair and just trial could take place. It was in vain too that Elizabeth, at his request, wrote to the Scottish queen in the strongest terms, advising her to listen to so just a request, and to allow the father and friends of the deceased king time enough to obtain such evidence as might bring the crime home to the guilty. She warned her that a refusal would excite strong suspicions against her, and urged her to give the world occasion to declare her guiltless of so base a crime, for otherwise she would be shunned by all princes, and hated by the common people; "and rather than this should happen to you," she adds, "I would wish you an honourable burial more than a sullied life. I pray the Lord to inspire you to do what may most conduce to your own honour and the consolation of your friends." *

Unfortunately for her own reputation and happiness, Mary refused to listen to the prudent advice of Elizabeth, and the just request of Lennox. The trial was allowed to proceed, and was conducted in all respects according to the arrangements agreed on in a council at which Bothwell himself was present, and gave directions regarding his own arraignment. On the day appointed (April 12th) the assize opened at the Tolbooth, before a jury consisting principally, if not wholly, of the favourers and partizans of the accused. "The tribunal was presided over by one of the fautors of the murder, the Earl of Argyle, then hereditary Lord High

* Robertson, Appendix XIX, vol. i. This letter, which was written only four days previous to the trial, was entrusted for delivery to the Provost Marshal of Berwick, who did not reach Edinburgh till the morning of the 12th of April, the very day on which the trial took place. On announcing himself as the bearer of a letter from Elizabeth, he was rudely treated, reproached as an English villain who had come to stay the assize, and informed that the queen was too much occupied with the matters of the day to attend to other business. At length, observing Bothwell and Lethington coming out of the palace, the provost marshal delivered Elizabeth's letter to the secretary, who, accompanied by Bothwell, carried it to Mary. On their return, Lethington informed the English envoy that the queen was asleep, and could not receive the letter; but the falsehood of this excuse was immediately shown, for at this moment a servant of De Croc, the French ambassador, who stood beside Elizabeth's messenger, looking up, saw and pointed out the queen and Mary Fleming, wife of the secretary, standing at a window of the palace; nor did it escape their notice that as Bothwell rode past, Mary gave him a friendly greeting for a farewell. (Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 97-8.) See Appendix D.

* Keith, Preface, p. 9.

† Labanoff, vol. vii. pp. 102-103.

Justice, and guarded by two hundred hackbutter; while four thousand of Bothwell's armed adherents mustered in the streets and squares of Edinburgh. The law officers of the crown were either bribed or intimidated into silence: no witnesses were summoned. The accuser, the Earl of Lennox, who was on his road to the city, surrounded by a large force of his friends, received orders not to enter Edinburgh with more than six in his company, and he therefore declined to come forward in person. The accused, the Earl of Bothwell, presented himself before the court of justice with a confident and careless air. Mounted on the late king's favourite horse, and surrounded by guards, he was escorted to the Tolbooth with base obsequiousness by a large number of gentlemen. As he passed before the queen, who was standing with Lady Lethington at one of the windows of Holyrood Palace, he turned towards her, and she gave him a friendly greeting for a farewell. She expressed her sympathy with his position even more publicly by sending him, rather from impatience than anxiety, a token and a message whilst he was before his judges.

"It was quite impossible for her to feel any uneasiness about the result of this judicial farce. The session of the Court of Justiciary was neither long nor uncertain. After the indictment, which inculpated Bothwell, but brought no distinct charge against him, had been read,* the Earl of Lennox was called upon to make good his accusation. Upon this a gentleman named Robert Cunningham stood forward, explained the reasons which had prevented the earl his master from appearing in person, and declared that he was sent by him to reiterate the charge of murder against the Earl of Bothwell, but to request delay for the purpose of obtaining the necessary evidence. On this being refused, Cunningham protested against the validity of any sentence that should acquit "persons notoriously known to be," as he said, "the murderers of the king, as my lord my master alleges." The crown lawyers were silent, to the great disapprobation of the people; and Bothwell, His acquittal. having pleaded not guilty, a unanimous verdict of acquittal was pronounced, in the absence of all evidence. He then had the audacity to challenge his accusers by a public cartel, and offered to maintain his innocence by arms against any gentleman who should still brand him with the murder."†

This scandalous and premeditated acquittal could give satisfaction to no one; and instead of justifying the queen in the opinion of the people, it served only to increase the public suspicions and dissatisfaction. Even the lowest classes gave expression to their feelings in the streets and in the queen's presence; and the market-women, as she passed along, would cry out, "God preserve your grace if you are sackless [innocent] of the king's death."

* The murder was alleged to have been committed on the 10th, instead of the 9th of the month—a flaw in the indictment too manifest to be accidental.

† Mignet's History, vol. i. p. 235.

Mary, however, pressed recklessly onward in the course on which she had entered. She added new favours to those which she had so recently lavished on Bothwell, bestowed upon him the lordship and Castle of Dunbar, and extended his powers as High Admiral. So completely had she resigned herself to the influence of one strong, engrossing passion, and so strange seemed her infatuation, that it was currently reported that Bothwell had bewitched her by means of the sorceries of his old paramour, the Lady Buccleuch.* None of the nobility seemed to have either the inclination or the ability to resist his power. Moray, who alone could have opposed him with any hope of success, had left the capital on the day preceding the king's murder; and shortly before Bothwell's trial, with the permission of the queen, had retired to France. Lennox took refuge in England; while Morton,† Argyle, Huntley, and Lethington, professed to be among Bothwell's firmest adherents.

Immediately after the trial parliament assembled, and Bothwell was selected to bear the royal sceptre before the queen at its opening.‡ The sentence of the jury acquitting the favourite was ratified, the placards which had been posted up in the capital were condemned, and a rigid inquiry instituted against their authors; all the royal grants to Bothwell were approved of, with a eulogium on his past services, dangers, and losses; five of the jurors who had acquitted him received the confirmation of their respective grants from the crown; and Huntley, who was an accomplice in the murder, and now gave his consent to the divorce of his sister from Bothwell, obtained the restoration of his estates, which had been under confiscation for several years.

Public rumour now began to anticipate the crisis which was rapidly approaching. "The bruit began to rise," says Sir James Melvil, "that the queen would marry the Earl of Bothwell; whereat every good subject that loved the queen's

Continued favour of Bothwell.

Reports regarding the marriage of Mary and Bothwell.

honour and the prince's safety had sore hearts, and thought her majesty would be dishonoured, and the prince in danger to be cut off by him that had slain his father."§ Few, however, of Mary's servants had the honesty to dissuade her from this step, and the courage to brave the power and anger of the detested and dreaded favourite. One of her nobles indeed, Lord Herries, on hearing the rumour of the intended marriage, travelled express to court, threw himself at the queen's feet, and implored her not to compromise her honour, endanger the life of her son, and ruin herself, by marrying the person who was universally regarded

* Lay of the Last Minstrel, note E, where the masculine character of this lady is strikingly portrayed.

† Some time before this, Morton, after a secret and midnight interview with the queen, recovered the Castle of Tantallon, and other lands, which he had forfeited by his rebellion; and in return for this, his whole power and interest were assured to Bothwell.

‡ Keith, vol. ii. p. 553.

§ Melvil's Memoirs, p. 175.

as the murderer of her husband. Mary appeared surprised, declared that she did not understand the meaning of the rumour, and that "there was no such thing in her mind,"—a statement to which it is impossible to give credit. Herries was so well aware of the danger which he incurred by giving her this judicious but useless advice, that he immediately quitted the capital, and hastened home by relays of horses which he had stationed along the road, in order to escape Bothwell's pursuit and revenge.* The same warning and advice were given by Sir James Melvil, one of Mary's most faithful servants, but with no better result. He showed her a letter from a person named Thomas Bishop, one of her partizans in England, declaring that if the queen married Bothwell, "the murderer of the king, the husband of another woman, she would tyne [lose] the favour of God, her own reputation, and the kingdoms of England, Ireland, and Scotland." The queen received his interference very ill, affirmed that the letter was a device of the secretary to ruin Bothwell, and immediately informed the earl of the advice which she had received. The wary Lethington pointed out to Melvil the danger which he had incurred by his imprudent candour: "So soon," said he, "as the Earl Bothwell gets word, as I fear he will, he will not fail to slay you. I pray you retire with diligence."—"It is a sore matter," replied Melvil, "to see that good princess run to utter wreck, and nobody to forewarn her."—"You have done more honestly than wisely," was Lethington's rejoinder.

The result soon showed the accuracy of his judgment. Bothwell, on learning the advice which Melvil had given, was so enraged, that he declared he would have his life; and Melvil was obliged to conceal himself for several days, until the queen had succeeded in allaying the anger of her flagitious favourite.†

Events now rapidly hastened the consummation which had for some time been foreseen. On the evening of the 19th of April, the day on which the parliament rose, Bothwell invited nearly all the nobility who were then in Edinburgh to supper, in a tavern kept by a person of the name of Ainslie. During the entertainment, the house was surrounded by a band of armed men; and after the festivity had been protracted till a late hour, Bothwell rose and proposed his marriage with the queen, affirming that he had obtained her consent, and even, according to some testimonies, producing her written warrant empowering him to submit the proposal to her nobility. He then requested them all to affix their signatures to a bond declaring their conviction of his innocence, binding themselves to defend him against all calumniators, and recommending "this noble and mighty lord" as a suitable husband for the queen, whose continuance in solitary widowhood was, they said, injurious to the interests of the commonwealth. They further bound themselves to promote the marriage between the queen and Bothwell with their "votes, counsel, fortification, and assistance, in word and deed." "And in case," it was added, "any should presume, directly or indirectly, openly, or under whatsoever colour or pretence, to hinder, hold back, or disturb the same marriage, we shall in that behalf hold and repute the hinderers, adversaries, or disturbers thereof, as our common enemies or evil willers * * * and in case we do the contrary, never to have reputation or credit in no time hereafter, but to be accounted unworthy and faithless traitors." * Morton, Huntley, and Argyle, the accomplices of Bothwell, were no doubt privy to his schemes, and promoted them with the utmost zeal. The Romish ecclesiastics, who were devoted to the queen, instantly declared their satisfaction with the proposal. In the confusion which ensued, the Earl of Eglinton made his escape; the rest, partly by promises and flattery, partly by terror, were prevailed on to give their consent, and to subscribe a paper which, as it has been justly said, "leaves a deeper stain than any occurrence in that age on the honour and character of the nation." Among the names attached to this bond are those of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's; the Bishops of Aberdeen, Dunblane, Brechin, and Ross; the Earls of Morton, Argyle, Huntley, Cassilis, Sutherland, Errol, Crawford, Caithness, Glencairn, and Rothes; and the Lords Boyd, Glamis, Ruthven, Home, Herries,† Fleming, Seton, and Sinclair. "Among the subscribers," says Robertson, "we find some who were the queen's chief confidants; others who were strangers to her councils, and obnoxious to her displeasure; some who faithfully adhered to her through all the vicissitudes of her fortune, and others who became the principal authors of her sufferings; some passionately attached to the Romish superstitions, and others zealous advocates for the Protestant faith. No common interest can be supposed to have united men of such opposite interests and parties in recommending to their sovereign a step so injurious to her honour, and so fatal to her peace. This strange coalition was the effect of much artifice, and must be considered as the boldest and most masterly stroke of Bothwell's address." ‡

Two days after the bond was signed, Mary left Edinburgh to visit the prince, her son, who was then in the keeping of the Earl of Mar. There can be little doubt that previous to her departure it was arranged between her and Bothwell, that on her return he should carry her off by force, and thus make himself master of her person apparently against her will. A remarkable anonymous communication, addressed to Cecil, at this juncture probably to Cecil, shows that Mary was Bothwell's accomplice in her pretended

* Keith, vol. ii. pp. 563—565.

† This nobleman, who so strenuously advised the queen against this fatal marriage, was gained over, by an extensive grant, to promote Bothwell's views.

‡ Robertson, vol. i. p. 354.

* Melvil's Memoirs, p. 175.

† Ibid., p. 177.

Band of the nobles for Bothwell's marriage with the queen.

Anonymous letter to Cecil.

abduction, and that their secret plans had been betrayed by some of their confidential agents. "This is to advertise you," says the informant, "that the Earl of Bothwell's wife is going to part with her husband, and a great part of our lords have subscribed to the marriage between the queen and him. The queen rode to Stirling this last Monday, and returns on Thursday. I doubt not but you have heard how the Earl of Bothwell has gathered many of his friends, and, as some say, to ride in Liddesdale; but I believe it is not, for he is minded to meet the queen this day, called Thursday, and to take her by the way, and bring her to Dunbar. Judge you gif it be with her will or no; but you will hear at more length on Friday or Saturday, if you will find it good that I continue in writing as occasion serves. I wald ye reif this * after the reading. This bearer knows nothing of this matter. There is no other thing presently to write of; but after all you will please receive my hearty commendations by him that is yours, that took you by the hand. At midnight."†

Among the letters to Bothwell, said to have been found in the silver casket, there are several bearing to have been written during Mary's absence at Stirling, which show the state of her feelings at this period. She thus expresses her suspicions of Huntley, who, it would appear, had been let into the secret, and endeavoured to dissuade her from carrying out the plan. "He preached unto me that it was a foolish enterprise, and that with mine honour I could never marry you, seeing that being married you did carry me away; and that his folks would not suffer it; and that the lords would unsay themselves, and would deny that they had said. I told him that seeing I was come so far, if you did not withdraw yourself of yourself, that no persuasion, nor death itself, should make me fail of my promise." In a subsequent letter, she explains the part which she was to act in the abduction. "As for the handling of myself," she says, "I heard it once well devised. Methinks that your services and long friendship, having the goodwill of the lords, do well deserve a pardon if above the duty of a subject you advance yourself, not to constrain me, but to assure yourself of such place nigh unto me that other admonitions or foreign persuasions may not let [hinder] me from consenting to that, that you hope your service shall make you one day to attain; and, to be short, to make yourself sure of the lords, and free to marry; and that you are constrained for your safety, and to be able to serve me faithfully, to use an humble request, joined to an importunate action." It appears that difficulties had arisen on the part of those who were to form her escort. The Earl of Sutherland and others declared with vehement protestations, that the queen should not be carried off while under their protection; and the Earl of Huntley was apprehensive that he would be accused of ingratitude towards the queen, and of having betrayed her. Alluding to these obstacles, Mary says, "I have thought good to advertise you of the fear he hath that he should be charged and accused of treason, to the end that without mistrusting him you may be the more circumspect, and that you may have the more power; for we had yesterday more than three hundred horse of his and of Livingston's. For the honour of God be accompanied rather with more than less, for that is the principal of my care." *

The queen remained three days at Stirling, but was not allowed to enter the apartments of the prince with more than two of her ladies; for the Earl of Mar, from some suspicion which he entertained, refused to admit the rest of her suite.† On Thursday, the 24th, she left Stirling to return to Edinburgh, as ^{Bothwell's} abduction of the ^{queen.} Cecil's correspondent had predicted. In the meantime, Bothwell, in accordance with Mary's urgent recommendation, had assembled a powerful body of his retainers, and met her at Almond Bridge, near Cramond, about six miles from Edinburgh, accompanied by eight hundred horsemen. Suddenly surrounding her attendants, he took her horse by the bridle, and conducted her to his Castle of Dunbar, which he had prepared for her reception. Lethington, Huntley, and Dunbar, who were in the royal train, were carried off along with the queen; and when Melvil remonstrated against this lawless proceeding, he was informed by Captain Blacater, one of Bothwell's confidential servants, that all had been done with the queen's own consent. It is certain that she expressed neither surprise, nor terror, nor indignation, at the outrage committed on her person, and the insult offered to her authority.‡

While these deplorable events were proceeding, a number of the nobles, including the Earls of Morton, Argyle, Atholl, and Sir William Kirkcaldy of Grange, were secretly organising a party for the protection of the infant prince against the designs of Bothwell. Knowing well the unscrupulous character of the favourite, they believed that the murderer of the father would not hesitate to destroy the son if he stood in the way of his ambitious

* Laing, vol. ii. p. 218; Mignet, vol. i. p. 294.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil, 27th April, 1567.

‡ "At the Bridge of Craumont, the Earl of Bothwell, being well accompanied, raveshitt the queen, and so took her that same night to the Castell of Dunbar, not against her awen will."—Birrell's Diary. "Then Bothwell, thinking thair was na controversie agais him in Scotland, conveinit the number of aucht hundred horsemen; and as the queen was cumand from the Castell of Striveing, to have returned to Edinburgh, he met her on the way, and conveyit her per force, as appeirit, to the Castell of Dunbar, to the end he might enjoy her as his lawful spous. * * * The friendly love was so heighlie contractit betwixt this great princess toward her enorme subject, that there was na end thereof * * * sa that she sufferit herself patiently to be led quhair the lover list. And all the way nathir made obstacle, impediment, clamour, nor resistance, as in sic accidents used to be, or that she might have done by her princely auctoritie, being accompanyt by the noble Earl of Huntlie, and Secretar Maitland of Lethingtoun."—Historie of James the Secht.

* I would have you tear this.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office; Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 107-8.

schemes. "The marriage of the queen to Bothwell," wrote Drury to Cecil, "and the death of the prince, is presently looked for." The leaders of this new confederacy against Bothwell were well aware of the power of their opponent, and the danger which they would incur from a premature disclosure of their plans; they cautiously resolved, therefore, while organising their strength, to consult Elizabeth before taking any open step. On the 20th of April, the day after Ainslie's supper,

Grange's letters against the queen.

Kirkaldy of Grange addressed a letter to the Earl of Bedford, informing him of the degrading subjection of the nobles, and of the infatuation of Mary, who was no longer mistress of her own actions; but assuring the earl, that if Elizabeth would assist him and his friends, the murder of Darnley would be speedily avenged. Kirkaldy pointedly drew Bedford's attention to the dangerous situation of the infant prince, and predicted Mary's speedy marriage to Bothwell, of whom, he said, she had become so "shamefully enamoured," that she had been heard to say "she cared not to lose France, England, and her own country for him; and shall go with him to the world's end in a white petticoat before she leave him." He concluded his letter in these words:—"Whatever is dishonest reigns presently in our court. God deliver them from their evil."* Again, on the 26th of April, two days after the queen's abduction, Kirkaldy addressed the following indignant letter to Bedford:—

"This queen will never cease until such time as she have wrecked all the honest men of this realm. She was minded to cause Bothwell ravish† her, to the end that she may the sooner end the marriage, whilk she promised before she caused Bothwell murder her husband. There is many that would revenge the murder, but they fear your mistress. I am so suited to for to enterprise the revenge that I must either take it upon hand, or else I maun leave the country, the whilk I am determined to do, if I can obtain license; but Bothwell is minded to cut me off, if he may, ere I obtain it, and is returned out of Stirling to Edinburgh. She minds hereafter to take the prince out of the Earl of Mar's hands, and put him in his hands that murdered his father, as I writ in my last. I pray your lordship let me know what your mistress will do, for if we will seek France, we may find favour at their hands, but I would rather persuade to lean to England. This meikle‡ in haste from my house, the 26th of April."§

Mary passed some time under the roof of Bothwell's well, and meanwhile the necessary preliminaries to the marriage were hurried forward with all speed. A process for divorce, on the ground of consanguinity,|| was instituted by Bothwell in the court of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, whose ancient consistorial jurisdiction was suspected to have been restored with this object. A similar process was commenced at the same time by the Countess in the Commissariat or Reformed Court, on the ground of adultery; and with such indecent haste was the suit hurried through both courts, that it was concluded in two days, and the sentence of divorce was pronounced on the 3rd of May.* On that day Mary returned from Dunbar to Edinburgh. As she entered the city, Bothwell caused his followers to cast away their spears, as if to prove that no force was used by them; and dismounting with apparent courtesy, he took the queen's bridle, and led her into the castle, which was then in the keeping of his creature, Sir James Balfour.†

On the 7th of May Sir Robert Melvil, who had joined the confederacy of the nobles for the delivery of the queen out of the hands of Bothwell and Melvil to Cecil the revenge of the king's murder, wrote to Cecil, informing him that the French court had offered to join the lords against Bothwell, and entreating him to consider the conduct of the queen as the effect of the evil counsel of those around her, rather than proceeding from herself. All men, he said, were of opinion that Bothwell would soon complete this marriage, and pass to Stirling to seize the prince; and the confederates were resolved never to consider their sovereign at liberty so long as she remained in the company of that traitor, who had committed so detestable a murder, whatever he might persuade or compel her to say to the contrary.‡ Next day Kirkaldy of Grange wrote on the subject to Bedford, —and of Grange and in still stronger terms: "All to Bedford.

such things," said he, "as were done before the parliament I did write unto your lordship at large. * * * At that time the most part of the nobility, for fear of their lives, did grant to sundry things both against their honours and consciences, who since have convened themselves at Stirling, where they have made a 'band' to defend [each] other in all things that shall concern the glory of God and common weal of their country. The heads that presently they agreed upon is, first, to seek the liberty of the queen, who is ravished and detained by the Earl of Bothwell, who was the ravisher, and hath the strength, munitions, and men of war at his commandment. The next head is the preservation and keeping of the prince. The third is to pursue them that murdered the king. For the pursuit of these three heads, they have promised to bestow their lives, lands, and goods. And to that effect their lordships have desired me to write unto your lordship, to the end they might have

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Grange to Bedford, 20th April.

† Forcibly to seize—rapio.

‡ Much.

§ MS. Letter, State Paper Office; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 109.

|| Bothwell was the cousin in the fourth degree to Lady Jane Gordon: a very distant relationship on which to found a process of divorce, even according to the Roman Catholic ritual, which prohibits the marriage of cousins-german, unless sanctioned by a papal dispensation.

* Keith, vol. ii. p. 675; Laing, vol. ii. pp. 86—88.

† Historie of James the Sext.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 111.

your sovereign's aid and support for suppressing of the cruel murderer, Bothwell, who, at the queen's last being in Stirling, suborned certain to have poisoned the prince; for that barbarous tyrant is not contented to have murdered the father, but he would also cut off the son, for fear that he hath to be punished hereafter. The names of the lords that convened in Stirling was the Earls of Argyle, Morton, Athol, and Mar. These forenamed, as said is, have desired me to write unto your lordship, to the end that I might know by you if your sovereign would give them support concerning these three heads above written. Wherefore I beseech your lordship, who I am assured loveth the quietness of these two realms, to let me have a direct answer, and that with haste; for presently the foresaid lords are suited unto by Monsieur de Croc, who offereth unto them in his master the King of France's name, if they will follow his advice and counsel, that they shall have aid and support to suppress the Earl Bothwell and his faction. * * * Also he hath admonished her [Mary] to desist from the Earl Bothwell, and not to marry him; for if she do he hath assured her, that she shall neither have friendship nor favour out of France, if she shall have to do; * but his saying is, she will give no ear. * * *

"There is too joined with the four forenamed lords, the Earls of Glencairn, Cassillis, Eglinton, Montrose, Caithness; the Lords Boyd, Ochiltree, Ruthven, Drummond, Gray, Glamis, Innermeith, Lindsay, Hume, and Herries, with all the whole West Merse and Tiviotdale, the most part of Fife, Angus, and Mearns. And for this effect, the Earl of Argyle is ridden in the west, the Earl of Atholl to the north, and the Earl of Morton to Fife, Angus, and Montrose. The Earl of Mar remaineth still about the prince, and if the queen will pursue him, the whole lords have promised, upon their faiths and honour, to relieve him. * * *

"In this meantime the queen is come to the Castle of Edinburgh, conveyed by the Earl Bothwell, where she intendeth to remain until she have levied some forces of footmen and horsemen, that is, she minds to levy 500 footmen and 200 horsemen. The money that she hath presently to do this, which is five thousand crowns, came from the font your lordship brought unto the baptism,† the rest is to be reft and borrowed of Edinburgh, or the men of Lothian."

These important letters, which were entirely unknown till they were brought to light by the researches of Mr. Tytler, show clearly, as here marks,

* If she shall have to resist her enemies.

† This was the silver font, or basin and ewer, which Elizabeth had presented as godmother at the baptism of the prince. It appears from the confession of Paris, the French valet, that the queen, after her marriage, gave it to Bothwell; and it was found by the confederate lords in the possession of Acheson, the Mint-master, to whom it had been sent, not, as they supposed, to be coined into money, but to have Bothwell's arms substituted for those of the prince. This silver font was recently in the possession of the Mar family, and was a piece of costly and curious workmanship. (Laing, vol. ii. p. 316, note.) that the formidable coalition against the queen, which was supposed to have arisen after her marriage with Bothwell, was fully formed nearly a month before that event; that its ramifications were extensive and deep; that Sir Robert Melvil, in whom the Scottish queen reposed implicit confidence, had joined the confederacy, in the hope of rescuing his royal mistress from what he represents as unwilling servitude; that the plot was well known to Monsieur de Croc, the French ambassador, who, after having in vain remonstrated with Mary against her predilection for Bothwell, gave it his cordial support; and, lastly, that it had been communicated to Elizabeth, whose assistance was earnestly solicited.*

Three days after the queen's return to Edinburgh, a message was sent by a person named Thomas Hepburn to Craig, the colleague of Knox, commanding him to publish the banns of matrimony betwixt the queen and Bothwell; but this he peremptorily refused to do, on the ground that Mary had sent no written command, and stated the common report that she was held captive by Bothwell. Upon this the Justice-Clerk brought a written mandate from the queen, enjoining the publication of the banns, and contradicting the report of her captivity. Craig however still had scruples, and insisted upon seeing the queen and Bothwell before giving intimation of the marriage. He was admitted to a meeting of the Privy Council, where Bothwell presided, and with honest boldness laid to his charge the dreadful crimes of which he was accused—rape, adultery, and murder, the suspicion of collusion between him and his wife, the hasty divorce, and proclamation of the banns. No satisfactory answer was returned, but the faithful and undaunted minister, having thus exonerated his conscience, did not deem himself justified in longer refusing to obey the injunctions which he had received. He therefore proclaimed the banns from the pulpit; but after relating in the presence of the congregation the steps which he had already taken, and the obstinate determination of the parties to proceed, he added these appalling words:—"I take heaven and earth to witness that I abhor and detest this marriage as odious and scandalous to the world; and I desire the faithful to pray earnestly that God would turn it to the comfort of this realm."†

This solemn warning, however, produced no effect upon the infatuated queen; and on the 12th of May she came in person to the Court of Session, and in the presence of the chancellor, the judges, and the nobility, whom she had summoned for the occasion, she declared that she was now at full liberty; and that, though the conduct of Bothwell in seizing her person had at first excited her indignation, yet, in consideration of his past services and his subsequent good conduct, she had pardoned his offence, and resolved to advance him to higher honours. She at the same time affixed her signature to a deed promising that she would not at any future time impute to the nobles as a crime the consent they had given at Ainslie's supper to the bond for her marriage. On the same day, Mary granted a formal pardon to Bothwell, before all the Lords of Session and others, for his late conduct in taking her to, and detaining her in, Dunbar, "contrary to her majesty's will and mind." * She also created him Duke of Orkney and Shetland, and placed the coronet on his head with her own hands. Next day she signed her contract of marriage with "this noble and mighty lord," in order that she might put an end to her solitary widowhood, and increase the number of her descendants.† And

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office; Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 109—114.

† Anderson, vol. iv. p. 280.

Mary's marriage to Bothwell. finally, on the 15th of May, at four o'clock in the morning, the marriage ceremony was celebrated in the great hall of Holyrood Palace, according to the rites of the Protestant religion, by Adam Bothwell, Bishop of Orkney, one of the few prelates who had abjured Romanism and joined the Reformers.‡ On the same day the ceremony was performed in private, according to the Roman Catholic ritual. In the sermon which the bishop preached on the occasion, he enlarged upon Bothwell's professed penitence for his former evil life, and his resolution to amend and conform to the discipline of the Protestant Church.§ Only five of the leading nobility were present, together with Craig, the minister of Edinburgh. The event was not accompanied by the pageants and rejoicings usual on such occasions, and the people beheld it either with grief or in stern and gloomy silence. On the following morning, a paper was found fixed to the palace gates with this ominous verse, prognosticating what was destined too soon to be realised—

"Mense malis Maio nubere vulgus ait." ||

* This fact discloses an object which Bothwell had in view in the seizure of the queen's person—viz. that under the pretext of having detained her person, he should receive a pardon for treason and all other crimes whatsoever, in which the murder of the king was virtually included. By the law of Scotland, the most heinous crimes must be mentioned by name in a pardon, and then all lesser offences are deemed to be included in the general clause, "and all other crimes whatsoever." To seize the person of the sovereign is high treason, and Bothwell hoped that a pardon for this crime would extend to every other crime of which he had been accused. (See Laing, vol. i. p. 91; Robertson, vol. i. p. 357.)

† Anderson, vol. ii. p. 276. It is affirmed that on the 5th of April, seven days before Bothwell's trial, a marriage contract was signed between the queen and him at Seton House; and this contract, which is alleged to have been found in the silver casket, with Mary's secret letters and sonnets to Bothwell, was produced by Moray during the investigation of the charges against the queen.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 118.

§ The bishop was afterwards suspended by the General Assembly, "because he had solemnised the marriage of the queen and the Earl of Bothwell, which was altogether wicked and contrair to God's laws and the statutes of the Kirk."—Booke of the Universal Kirk, Part I., pp. 112, 114.

|| Ovid. Fast., lib. v. l. 490; Keith, vol. ii. p. 586. A rooted prejudice long existed in Scotland, among all ranks, against marrying in the month of May; and among the lower classes few marriages are still celebrated during that month.

This miserable marriage, to which may unquestionably be traced the greater part, if not the whole, of the subsequent misfortunes of Queen Mary, was now consummated. Everything had been done by her most faithful adherents and friends to divert her from this fatal step. It was then felt—and we may add that the impression is still forced upon the mind—that this marriage with a man of reputation so infamous, and so immediately concerned in the murder of the late king, was a circumstance which induced the very gravest suspicion that Mary herself had been cognizant of the foul plot which ended in the assassination of her husband. Such convictions, so strongly entertained by her best friends, urged them in the boldest manner to remonstrate with her as to the glaring impropriety and danger of the step which she meditated. These remonstrances, as we have seen, were disregarded, and the irretrievable step taken which proved so fatal to her interests. This step has sometimes been excused by the lame defence that her reputation having suffered from her residence for several days under the roof of a man "so audacious and uncontrollable as Bothwell," she was placed in a position which rendered her marriage with him an act of necessity rather than choice. Others have held that the very fact of her person having been seized, and her freedom of action interfered with, explains the otherwise revolting circumstance of her having consented to this union. This explanation, however, is entitled to no weight; for Mary appeared publicly in the Court of Session, and in presence of the chancellor, judges, and a number of the nobility, solemnly declared that she was now in the enjoyment of her full liberty, and consequently that her consent was not extracted by force. No explanation, indeed, can ever be given which can exculpate Mary with respect to this infamous marriage; and, unfortunately, it must always be regarded as a strong presumptive proof of her participation in Bothwell's guilt as the murderer of her husband.*

Mary's first care after her marriage was to address the court of France, and offer what explanations were possible with regard to a proceeding which was certain to be viewed by her friends with the strongest disapprobation. The apology which she framed, and the accompanying instructions to her ambassador, were drawn up with great dexterity and art. After recapitulating at length, and in the most eulogistic terms, all Bothwell's services, both to her mother and herself, and enlarging upon his influence in Scotland, his favour with the nobility, and their anxiety that he should become king, she proceeds to gloss over in the

* The acute David Hume, being told of a new work which had appeared, in which the author made a well-argued defence of Queen Mary—"Has he shown," said the historian, "that the queen did not marry Bothwell?" Of course he was answered in the negative. "Then," replied Hume, "in admitting that fact, he resigns the whole question."—Sir Walter Scott.

most dextrous manner his recent conduct, and to extenuate, if not to defend, the abduction of her person. "Being at Dunbar," she says, "we reproached him the honour he had to be so esteemed of us, the favour we had always shown him, his ingratitude, with all other remonstrances which might serve to rid us out of his hands. Albeit we found his doing rude, yet were his answer and words but gentle: that he would honour and serve us, and would noways offend us, asking pardon of the boldness he had taken to convoy us to one of our own houses, whereunto he was driven by force, as well as constrained by love, the vehemency whereof had made him to set apart the reverence which naturally, as our subject, he bore to us, as also for safety of his own life: and then began to make us a discourse of his whole life, how unfortunate he had been to find men his un-friends whom he had never offended; how their malice never ceased to assault him on all occasions, albeit unjustly; what calumnies they had spread of him touching the odious violence perpetrated in the person of the king our late husband; how unable he was to save himself from the conspiracies of his enemies, whom he could not know, by reason that every man professed himself outwardly to be his friend, and yet he found such hidden malice that he could not find himself in surety, unless he were insured of our favour to endure without alteration; and on no other assurance of our favour could he rely, unless it would please us to do him that honour to take him to husband, protesting always that he would seek no other sovereignty, but, as formerly, to serve and obey us all the days of our life, joining thereto all the honest language that could be used in such a case.

"When he saw us like to reject all his suit and offers," continues Mary, "in the end he showed us how far he had proceeded with our whole nobility and principals of our Estates, and what they had promised him under their handwriting. If we had cause then to be astonished we leave to the judgment of the king and queen [of France], our uncle, and our other friends. * * Many things we resolved on with ourself, but never could find an outguilt [deliverance]; and yet he gave us little space to meditate with ourself, even pressing us with continual and importunate suit. * * As by a bravade in the beginning he had won the first point, so ceased he never till by persuasions and importunate suit, accompanied not the less with force, he has finally driven us to end the work begun, at such time and in such form as he thought might best serve his turn: wherein we cannot dissemble that he has used us otherwise than we would have wished, or yet have deserved at his hand,—having more respect to content them by whose consent, granted to him beforehand, he thinks he has obtained his purpose, than regarding our contentation or weighing what was convenient for us." *

* Keith, vol. ii. pp. 592—601; Bell's Life of Queen Mary, chap. xxiii.

According to Buchanan, she also instructed her envoy to apologise in the following terms for the hurried manner in which the marriage was performed:—"After he had by these and many other reasons shaken my constancy, and extorted from me, partly by force and partly by flattery, a promise of marriage, yet could we not by any argument obtain from him—who always feared a change in our disposition—any delay in celebrating our nuptials, not even till we should communicate the matter to the King and Queen of France, and the rest of our allies; but, as by a bold act he had at first reached the summit of his wishes, he never ceased from the most importunate entreaties till he forcibly compelled us to consummate what he had begun, and that at the time and in the manner that seemed to him most convenient for perfecting his design." *

We have already seen that a confederacy had been formed, among the most powerful of the nobility, for the purpose of destroying Bothwell and taking possession of the government. It is difficult to conceive that in the circumstances some such enterprise should not have suggested itself to the minds of all honourable and patriotic men. The appalling character of the late events, taken in connection with this most infamous and indecent marriage, sufficiently account for the universal indignation manifested throughout the land, and the shout of a people's anger, that rang loud and threatening even in the ear of royalty. Nor was this feeling confined to Scotland alone; it pervaded England, circulated through France, and was diffused through the continent,—Europe cried out shame upon Scotland and the nation which had looked upon such terrible deeds, and the world echoed the cry. The attention of every neighbouring people was fixed upon the astonishing events which, more rapidly and with more startling effect than the incidents of a drama, had been crowded into the last three months. "A king murdered with the utmost cruelty in the prime of his days, and in his capital city; the person suspected of that odious crime suffered not only to appear publicly in every place, but admitted into the presence of the queen, distinguished by her favour, and entrusted with the chief direction of her affairs; subjected to a trial which was carried on with the most shameful partiality, and acquitted by a sentence which served only to confirm the suspicions of his guilt; divorced from his wife on pretences frivolous or indecent; and after all this, instead of meeting with the ignominy due to his actions or the punishment merited by his crimes, permitted openly, and without opposition, to marry a queen, the wife of the prince whom he had assassinated, and the guardian of those laws which he had so grossly violated! Such a quick succession of incidents, so singular and so detestable, is not to be found in any other history. They left, in the opinion of foreigners, a mark of infamy on the character of the nation. The Scots were held in abhorrence all over Europe; they durst scarce appear anywhere in public; and, after suffering so many atrocious deeds to pass with impunity, they were universally reproached as men void of courage or of humanity, as equally regardless of the reputation of their queen and the honour of their country.*

* Buchanan, vol. ii. p. 513.

Such being the aspect of the times, it cannot be a matter of surprise that a confederacy should be formed of high-spirited nobles, whose sense of the shame brought upon their country by the unprincipled Bothwell would naturally be keen, and their determination strong to take summary and speedy vengeance. But while such undoubtedly are our first impressions, subsequent events compel us to modify our opinion. That there were men who acted in accordance with the spirit we have just indicated, and were influenced by considerations involving the safety of the prince and the honour of the nation, is undoubted. Such, for example, was Stewart, Earl of Athol, remarkable for a uniform and bigotted attachment to Popery, but whose indignant patriotism overcame all other feelings, and associated him heart and soul with the most conspicuous leaders of the Reformed religion. But it cannot be denied that the great majority of the nobles who united themselves in this league acted under the influence of no higher, more disinterested motives than those of ambition or resentment; and that while pursuing on many occasions just and necessary ends, they were actuated by principles and passions of a base and unjustifiable character. These are charges which are made on no vague imputation, but are proved by well-authenticated facts, and by the unimpeachable testimony of their own subsequent conduct. History allows us to come to no other conclusion than this, that these men were plotters against the government and the sovereign, and that her marriage with Bothwell was only the pretence which gave colour and plausibility to their enterprise.

There is one circumstance which of itself is no slight confirmation of the statements now advanced. The noblemen who now confederated together for the destruction of Bothwell were, in not a few instances, the very persons who had subscribed the bond declaring it for the interests of the country that the queen should take him for her husband; so that it would seem, that whatever were the secret inclinations of the queen herself, the above-named nobles were anxiously desirous to yield to them, not in deference to their sovereign, but in furtherance of their own schemes, which they soon perceived would be most advantageously promoted by sanctioning a union with Bothwell, and thus most effectually directing popular indignation against herself and her profligate husband. "This marriage," says Keith, "was an action for which her well-wishers were sorry and grieved at heart, seeing that by it she mightily increased the aversion already instilled into the people, and deprived her friends of all just apology on her behalf; and an action which her enemies rejoiced to see accomplished, since by it she laid the foundation, as it were, of her own ruin, and advanced their wicked designs faster than they themselves could have looked for."† There is, therefore, little doubt that Mary was the victim of a conspiracy on the part of Morton and his unprincipled associates, and unconsciously she was all too ready to precipitate her own downfall. Among other members of the conspiracy was the Secretary Lethington, who, although he had not avowedly given in his adherence, became nevertheless an object of suspicion to Bothwell. This nobleman and his intimate associate, Huntley, therefore determined to put the secretary to death; and, having one day met with him in the chamber of the queen at Dunbar, they attacked, and would have slain him, if her majesty had not boldly thrown herself between them, and declared that if a hair of his head perished, it should be at the peril of their lives and lands. Maitland, however, was compelled to fly, and leaving the court he took refuge with the Earl of Athol.†

Moray had for some time resided in France, having, as will be remembered, obtained permission from the queen to return to the continent shortly after the murder of the king. The value of his council and co-operation was highly estimated by the confederated nobles; and communications were made to him explaining their plans, and requesting his assistance. The court of France, exasperated by the queen's marriage, manifested sympathy with the views of men who aimed at the destruction of an upstart, whose elevation they regarded with disgust and hatred. Much encouragement also was naturally to be expected from the Protestants of France, who identified the proceedings of the Reformed lords with the interests of religion and the prosperity of the church to which they belonged, and in whose name, alas! were often performed many of the most questionable actions of those troublous times. Nothing however could be attempted (in spite of the encouragement they received from various quarters), before an answer was received from Elizabeth in reply to the representations made to her on the part of Robert Melvil and Kirkaldy of Grange. But the English queen was by no means disposed to assist them in the manner required. At this time various motives combined to withhold her from adopting decidedly aggressive measures against her sister in Scotland. Though avowedly jealous of Mary, she was still more jealous of the royal prerogative; and, for a time at least, refused to sanction any proceedings which had for their object to interfere with, or to prescribe any limitations to, the exercise of that prerogative. Understanding that the confederated lords proposed not only to bring Bothwell to trial, and to rescue Mary out of his hands, but also to crown

Reply of Elizabeth to Melvil and Kirkaldy of Grange.

* Keith, vol. ii. p. 565.

† Melvil's Memoirs, p. 178.

* Anderson, vol. i. p. 128; Robertson, vol. i. p. 361.

the infant prince, she intimated her resolution to give them no assistance in such an enterprise. They had made strong representations to Elizabeth of the violent treatment which Mary had received from Bothwell, the restraint put upon her person, and the interference with her freedom of action. In reply they were informed, that if the Queen of England could put any confidence in the letters of her sister, she was under no restraint, but had acted all along with her own free will, and in the exercise of her own judgment—that she had in fact consented to all that had lately happened; and that “to crown the prince during his mother’s life was a matter, for example’s sake, not to be digested by her or any other monarch.” Elizabeth, however, was incapable of acting a generous or disinterested part in relation to Scotland and Scottish affairs. Always on the watch for an opportunity of self-aggrandizement; eagerly desirous to establish permanently in Scotland an influence which should regulate the affairs of that country according to English interests; and, above all, anxious if possible, and without danger to herself, to humble Mary—her equal as a queen in virtue of her claim to the throne of England, and her rival as a woman—she saw in the present aspect of affairs an opportunity not to be thrown away of accomplishing the schemes which lay nearest her heart. Refusing to sanction the intention of the confederates to crown the infant prince, as an infringement of the royal prerogative, she nevertheless professed her readiness to assist them, provided they complied with one very simple condition—viz., the surrender of the young prince into her hands, for safe keeping in England. Such was the disinterested character of Elizabeth’s professions of unwillingness to interfere with the royal prerogative of her sister in Scotland. The only step which was immediately taken by the English sovereign, was the issuing of orders to the Earl of Bedford to hasten forward to the Scottish Borders, in order, by his nearness to the scene of action, to watch the progress of events, and by his very presence to hold out some encouragement and promise of support to the disaffected nobles. Cecil also was instructed to plant his spies about the court in Scotland, and to exercise such vigilance that every, even the most insignificant, movement of the queen and Bothwell should be instantly reported to his royal mistress. Information also of an authentic character was in this way conveyed to the English secretary, of the French intrigues conducted by the ambassador, De Croc, and of all the measures adopted by the lords of the Secret Council. In spite of the dangers by which she was surrounded, Mary appears to have been for a brief season unsuspecting of her perilous position, and to have indulged in a fatal and delusive dream of security. She was not, however, wholly uninformed of the dissatisfaction of her subjects; the contempt in which she was held in many parts of the country; and the frequent and private meetings of many of the nobles whose loyalty she had reason to suspect, and whose affection she had wholly lost, if indeed she had ever possessed it. But these rumours, or rather unquestionable facts, we are told she treated with contempt, observing on one occasion, “Atholl is but feeble; for Argyle, I know well how to stop his mouth; as for Morton, his boots are but new pulled off, and still soiled—he shall be sent back to his old quarters.”*

Many attempts were made by Mary to persuade her people that the marriage with Bothwell was in accordance with her wishes, and fully answered her expectations. They were amused with pageants and tournaments, according to the fashion of the times. The queen herself, though wearing mourning on the fatal morning of her wedding, now cast off her “mourning weeds,” decked herself in gay and becoming bridal attire, and frequently rode abroad with the duke, her husband, making a great show of contentment and happiness. Bothwell also aided her in keeping up those fictitious appearances. In public, he treated her with every respect, refusing to be covered in her presence; and, on one occasion, it is related of Mary that playfully resenting this ceremonious treatment on his part, she snatched away his bonnet and insisted on placing it on his head.† These details are all the more striking, and become indeed distressing, when contrasted with the real circumstances of the case. It is certain that a very short time sufficed to open the eyes of the unfortunate queen to the infatuation of her conduct. It is painful indeed to reflect on her now unprotected, and truly miserable condition. Bothwell was a man destitute not only of all principle, but of all honourable feeling. He was coarse in mind, sensual in character, brutal in conduct. Greater contrast could scarcely be imagined than those which, in strong relief, were presented by the characters of Bothwell and Mary. To all who were familiar with her habits, even to the least observant of the attendants at court, it was but too evident that she was a changed and wretched woman. Even now it is impossible to read, without feelings of burning indignation, the treatment she received at the hands of her shameless husband. Shameful treatment of the queen by Bothwell.

On the evening of the day on which her marriage was celebrated, Bothwell appears to have behaved towards her with coldness and indifference. It is related by the French ambassador, De Croc, who paid her a visit on that occasion at her own request, that he perceived a strange formality between her and her husband, which she begged him to excuse, saying that if he saw her sad, it was because she did not wish to be happy, as, she said, she never could be, wishing only for death. Another painful circum-

* This alludes to the recent return of Morton from his banishment. MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil, 20th of May, 1537.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil, May, 1567.

stance is also mentioned by Sir James Melvil. On one occasion, after an interview with Mary—probably with Bothwell also—at the palace, he proceeded to the castle; there, as he himself expresses it, “to deal with Sir James Balfour not to part with the castle, whereby he might be an instrument to save the infant prince, to save the queen, who was so disdainfully handled, and with such reproachful language, that Arthur Erskine and I, being present, heard her ask for a knife to stab herself, or else, said she, I shall drown myself.*

We have seen that about a fortnight after her marriage she dispatched a messenger to France, to explain and excuse the step which she had taken, and to conciliate that court in favour of herself and husband. This was the Bishop of Dunblane, who was also instructed to proceed to Rome on the same mission of conciliation. It now became necessary

An envoy dispatched to England. that a similar envoy should be commissioned to the court of England; and to this office was appointed Robert Melvil, brother to Sir James,—a choice peculiarly unfortunate, as this gentleman was the secret but determined enemy of Bothwell, and one of the principal associates in the confederacy of the nobility which aimed at his destruction. In these days it was no uncommon thing for the most trusted messengers to betray their employers; and even men of birth and character were found capable of playing a treacherous and dishonourable part. This was the case with Melvil. He was a man generally esteemed, and with a fair reputation, but he was nevertheless false to his royal mistress. It

Treacherous conduct of Robert Melvil. has sometimes been attempted to excuse his conduct by the supposition that he accepted the commission to England, and at the same time acted as the agent of the queen's enemies, the more effectually to promote her interests,—as by making himself acquainted with their designs, he should be better able to check or counteract them. But it is just as probable that he made himself the envoy of Mary in order to betray her, as that he became the representative of the confederates for the purpose of arresting their schemes and confounding their enterprise. Whatever may have been the motives by which he was actuated, it is certain that he abused the confidence with which he was treated, in revealing to his associates the plans he was instructed to promote, and the objects proposed by Mary in the mission on which he was now dispatched. He was entrusted with letters to Elizabeth and Cecil, both from Bothwell and the queen; and, as he himself informs us in his declaration, he was instructed to excuse to her sister of England the recent marriage of his mistress, and to implore that princess not to expose her to shame, or interrupt those friendly relations which still subsisted between the two countries.† At the same time he was the bearer of despatches from the confederated lords, the purport of which was to inform the English queen that they charged their mistress with the murder of her late husband, and that therefore, judging she had forfeited the throne, they were determined to drive her from it. That Melvil was devoted to the interests of those whose cause he had thus undertaken to represent, and in a manner to plead, appears from this, if from nothing else, that Morton, one of the principal movers in the enterprise, described him to Elizabeth as their trusty friend, whom they had commissioned to unfold to her majesty their as yet undeveloped schemes.* The letter of Bothwell sent by this envoy to Elizabeth is somewhat remarkable, both in its manner and contents; it is expressed in “a bold, almost a kingly tone,” very unlike that which usually pervaded the addresses to the English queen, which were generally written in a servile, almost abject spirit. Bothwell, though a bad man and a moral coward, was not without a certain natural audacity; which, though not characteristic of his general bearing, was ready to show itself at any emergency, and to carry him triumphantly through the most difficult and trying scenes. He was not uninformed, he said, of the dislike with which he was viewed on the part of Elizabeth; but he protested it was wholly undeserved, and he should endeavour by his actions to prove what he now asserted. He avowed his willingness to render to the Queen of England whatever was due to her of honour or service. He declared his resolution to preserve, if possible, the relations of friendship and peace between the kingdoms, and that no interruption of the concord should ever be traceable to him, directly or indirectly. In conclusion, he observed, that men of greater birth, of more eminent qualifications, might have been preferred to the high station he now occupied; but he boldly affirmed that none could have been selected more zealous for the preservation of her majesty's friendship, of which she should have experience at any time it might be her pleasure to employ him.†

While Melvil was absent on his mission to England, the confederate nobles prepared to take decided measures,—being now indeed committed to this course by the correspondence into which they had entered with Elizabeth. It was necessary, however, that they should proceed with caution. Having themselves signed the bond not only sanctioning the queen's marriage with Bothwell, but declaring it to be for the interests of Scotland, it was impossible they could suddenly, and at once, disclaim their own act, and brave the indignation as well of the queen as of the country. Another circumstance necessitating caution on the part of the disaffected lords, was the fact that in denouncing Bothwell as the murderer of the late king they

* Hopetoun MSS.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bothwell to Elizabeth, 5th of June, 1567. Bothwell at the same time wrote to Cecil and Throckmorton by Robert Melvil.

* Melvil's Memoirs, p. 180

† Melvil's Declaration.

exposed themselves to great danger, as Bothwell could at once implicate them by the production of the bond which contained their signatures approving of the deed. Nevertheless we now find Morton, Argyle, Lethington, and Huntley, protesting against the marriage, and loudly execrating the conduct of the unprincipled Bothwell.

The enemies of Mary had for some time industriously disseminated the most shameful rumours throughout the country; and, in order to disabuse the minds of her people, the queen issued a manifesto, in which she endeavoured to vindicate herself and her husband from the imputations which had been cast upon them, and which were calculated to alienate the affections and weaken the allegiance of her hitherto devoted subjects.* This manifesto however, though skilfully worded, was of little service, and was unattended by any good effect.†

About this period Mary issued proclamations for her nobles to assemble and attend her husband on an expedition to Liddesdale, to quiet the disturbances which had lately broken out in that district. Most of the nobility, however, had left the court, and the remainder paid no attention to her command. It was found impossible to collect an army, so little regarded was the queen's authority, and so much detested was the man she had chosen for her husband. It is reported of Bothwell, that there was only one company even of the hired mercenaries which he could trust, and that was one commanded by a Captain Cullen, a man suspected to be deeply implicated in the murder of Darnley.‡

The confederates now resolved on taking the bold and decided step of attempting to seize the persons of Mary and Bothwell. In a country like Scotland, at a period too when every man was available for service in war, it was not difficult at any time to raise a considerable force. Thus we find that when the rebel lords marched against their queen, they numbered upwards of a thousand men. Apprised of their schemes, and unprepared for active resistance, Mary had recourse to flight. Her natural place of refuge was the Castle of Edinburgh, and thither she would gladly have retired, could she have relied on the loyalty of the governor, Sir James Balfour. This, however, had been shaken by the representations of the confederates; and it was felt to be unsafe to entrust the person of the sovereign to his keeping.§

* Keith, vol. ii. p. 612.

† About this time, also, it is probable was adopted another measure which Mary had devised for the security of herself and government. This was a bond, which was drawn up for the purpose of binding over all who signed it to the service of the queen and Bothwell. The tenor of the bond was, "that they were bound to defend and assist the queen and her husband, the Duke of Orkney, in all their enterprises, and that the queen and her husband were bound to protect and maintain them." It appears that this bond had been projected previous to the marriage, and that the only noble who refused to sign it was the Earl of Moray.

‡ MS. State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil, 31st of May, 1567.

§ That the loyalty of Balfour was shaken, was probably

In these circumstances, Bothwell conducted the queen to the Castle of Borthwick,* the seat of the Laird of Crookston, about ten miles from Edinburgh. Here, while sitting at supper, they were very nearly surprised by Morton and his force; who, making an undiscovered night march, surrounded the castle, and almost succeeded in capturing Bothwell, who escaped, however, by means of an unguarded postern in the back wall. He appears to have halted at the distance of a few miles from Borthwick, and next day he was joined by the queen, who fled from the castle in man's apparel, booted owing in no considerable degree to the representations made to him by Sir James Melvil, of which an account is furnished in his "Memoirs of his own Life." A few days subsequent to the interview of Melvil with Mary at Holyrood—already alluded to—Sir James paid a visit to the governor of Edinburgh Castle, of which the following is his own account: "Now, said I to Sir James Balfour, that there was no surety for him to be out of suspicion, but to keep the Castle of Edinburgh in his own hands, and to be that good instrument to save both queen and prince, in assisting the nobility who were about to crown the prince, and to pursue the Earl Bothwell for the king's [Darnley's] murder. And without he took part with them thereuntil, he would be held as airt and part of the said murder, by reason of his long familiarity with Bothwell; and that it was a happy thing for him that the said earl was become in suspicion of him,—assuring him that I had intelligence by one that was of the Earl's counsel, to wit, the Laird of Whitlaw, for the tyme capten of the Castell of Dunbar, that Bothwell was determined to take the Castell of Edinburgh fra him, and mak the Laird of Benstoun, Hepburn, capten thereof, and then to put the prince there in his keeping." Balfour promised to act as Sir James Melvil advised him, and to oppose his friends and fellow-conspirator Bothwell, if Kirkaldy of Grange would promise to protect him, "in case the nobilitie mycht alter upon him; for he and many of them had run contrary courses before, so that he durst not credit them. The Earl of Mar," continues Sir James Melvil, "being advertist hereof by his brother, Alexander Arskin, who was trew and cairfull for the prince's safety, came secretly to me at midnight, for the days were dangerous for all honest men. Now my Lord of Mar being continually required and boasted to deliver the prince out of his hands, at length granted, with condition only, to dryve tyme, that ane honest, responsible nobleman should be made capten of the Castell of Edinburgh; because he saw na uther sure house to kepe him until he sould deliver him unto the queen, his mother, quhilk he was not myndit to do sa lang as he mycht resist. Albeit he was not a gud disismilaire, but thought it a meit answer to dryve a little tyme, and suage the present fury, untill the nobility might convene to pursue the murder and crown the prince, as they had concludit at a secret meeting among themselves. Which was not so secret but that ane of the said lords made advertisement thereof to the Earl Bothwell, how that they were myndit to environ the Palace of Hal-lirud House, and take him therein; whereupon he forgot the suiting of the prince, and was only carefull how to saif himself."—Memoirs (Maitland Club), pp. 180-181; Keith, vol. ii. p. 606, note by Editor.

Attempted seizure of the queen's person by the confederate lords, 7th June, 1567.

* The Castle of Borthwick was erected by Sir William Borthwick, created Lord Borthwick before 1430. The great hall is forty feet in length, and so high in the roof that a man on horseback, it is quaintly said, "could turn a spear in it with all the ease imaginable." John, eighth Lord Borthwick, held out the castle against Cromwell, after the victory of the latter near Dunbar; and though he was compelled to surrender, obtained honourable terms, was allowed to leave his stronghold unmolested, and fifteen days to remove his effects. His great grandfather, John, fifth lord, was the proprietor in the reign of Queen Mary, and was one of her most zealous adherents. A small apartment is still shown in Borthwick Castle as Queen Mary's Room, and was evidently hung with tapestry during her occupation.

and spurred. On the same day (June 13) they took refuge in the Castle of Dunbar.* This attack was not the only event which discovered to Mary the critical position in which she was now placed. It was generally understood that Huntley was no longer to be depended on, and that he was guilty of betraying her confidence and corresponding with her enemies. Secretary Lethington, also, whom Bothwell had carried prisoner to Dunbar when he seized the queen at Almond Bridge, though pretending the utmost devotedness to her interests, constantly informed the confederates of all her plans, and at last withdrew himself from her court. It was further reported to her majesty that Moray had arrived in England to take part against her; and that Lord Home, one of the most powerful of the Border chiefs, was most zealous and determined in his opposition to her cause.†

Baffled in their enterprise, the confederates retired to Edinburgh, which they reached early in the morning; and, breaking open the gates, they entered without opposition. The inhabitants were at first unfavourable to their cause, though, as already remarked, Balfour, the governor of the castle, was wavering in his allegiance. Several of the most distinguished adherents of the queen—such as the Lord Boyd, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, the Bishop of Ross, and the Abbot of Kilwinning—were at this time present in the city. On the approach of the confederates, they retired into the castle; but the governor, aware that their presence would compromise him in the eyes of those with whom he was about to associate, dismissed them from the castle and city. The next day the confederates formed themselves into a kind of council, and in that capacity issued a proclamation to the following effect:—

Proclamation by the confederates. "That whereas the queen's majesty being detained in captivity, and as neither able to govern her realm, nor try the murderer of her husband, we of the nobility and council command all her subjects, specially the burghers of Edinburgh, to assist the said noblemen and council in delivering the queen, and preserving the prince, and in trying and punishing the king's murderers. And we command the lords of session, commissaries, and all other judges, to sit to do justice according to the laws of this realm, notwithstanding any tumult that may arise in the time of this enterprise; with certification to all who shall be found acting contrary to these proceedings, that they shall be suspected as fautors of the foresaid murder, and punished as traitors." ‡

At the same time other proclamations were made at the Market Cross of the city, in the name of the queen, commanding all "sensabill personis betwix sextie and sextene" to proceed to Borthwick, "to relief her and her spouse, under pain of deid." Another royal proclamation, on the same day, enjoined all such "sensabill personis" to meet in Edinburgh, and hold themselves in readiness to march wherever they were required; and a third was intended to be announced at seven o'clock in the same evening, ordering the parties in the city to return to their respective homes; but the confederates prevented the announcement of this proclamation, by taking the heralds into custody.*

A second proclamation on the part of the confederates summoned the lieges of Edinburgh, "to be ready on three hours' warning to pass forward with them to deliver the queen's person, and take revenge on the Earl of Bothwell for detaining her." Similar proclamations were entrusted to the care of macers and officers of arms, who were ordered to proceed with them to the towns of Perth, Dundee, St. Andrew's, Stirling, and Glasgow. It is worthy of notice that at this time the party of confederates was by no means strong. Many of their friends had not joined them; others had grown lukewarm in the cause; not a few were disaffected on account of the failure of the attempt upon Borthwick Castle, attributing the escape of Bothwell to their negligence and want of due precaution.† Notwithstanding these unfavourable symptoms, Atholl and Lethington, however, they received a great accession to their party in the persons of the Earl of Atholl and Secretary Lethington, who, after wavering in their allegiance, had suddenly left the court, and now finally deserted the queen.‡

* Diurnal of Occurrents in Scotland, printed for the Bannatyne Club, p. 113.

† Lord Herries says—"If the queen had been able to spin out a little more time, she might without great trouble have been master of the field within a few days, for people came in daily to her assistance; and upon the other side, the party of the confederates still decreased, and the lords themselves were beginning to think upon dissolving."—Historie of the Reigne of Marie Queene of Scots.

‡ It is reported that the town of Edinburgh not only afforded the associators plenty of refreshments, but likewise 200 harquebusiers. In addition to the assistance rendered to the confederates by the citizens of Edinburgh, sundry compositions, both in prose and rhyme, were published, to "move the hearts of the haill subjects," says Sir James Melvil, "to assist and take part with so gude a cause."—Memoirs, printed for the Bannatyne Club, p. 182. Some of these "lybells," Sir James says, were "pityful and persuasive," and they were chiefly directed against Bothwell. The following is a specimen of those pasquinades, in doggerel rhyme, preserved with another in Calderwood's large History, and printed in the Wodrow Society's edition of that writer's "Historie of the Church of Scotland," vol. ii. p. 350. It refers to Bothwell's mock trial and acquittal:—

"I hold it best ye give him assize
Of them that wrought the enterprize,
And consented to that foule band,
And did subscribe it with their hand;
And other sillie, simple lords,
Who feare their hanging into cords.
God is not glee'd, though ye him clenge,
Belive me, weil He will revenge
The slaughter of that innocent lamb.
Metr vindictum, et ego retribuam.
Ye wold faine clenge; I love it the waur,
It makes it the more suspect by farre.

[The

* Lord Herries says that "Bothwell disguised himself in a woman's habit, and the queen in a man's; and in the night they deceived the guards, and rode off to Dunbar Castle."—Historie of the Reigne of Marie Queene of Scots, printed for the Abbotsford Club, p. 93.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil, 20th May, 1567; Ibid., 7th June, 1567.

‡ Anderson's Collection, vol. i. p. 128.

Great exertions were made to induce the citizens to join them. Among other things, they ordered a banner to be displayed, on which was painted a rude representation of the scene of the late murder, particularly the tree under which was found the body of the king, and beside it the young prince kneeling, with this motto underneath, "Judge and avenge my cause, O Lord!" This device, as might be expected, produced a very powerful effect on the minds of the common people, who discovered great sympathy with the cause of the confederates; and this feeling in a short time communicated itself to the magistrates, and induced them also to intimate their adherence.

In the meantime Mary and Bothwell were not idle. Proclamations were issued in the name of the queen, summoning her loyal subjects to assemble for her defence at Dunbar. This summons was obeyed by great numbers; in particular by the Border barons and gentry, the followers of Home, who deserted his standard, and united themselves to the forces of Mary. She was also joined by several of the nobility—such as Lords Seton and Borthwick; the Laids of the Bass, Waughton, Ormiston, Cockburn, Wedderburn, Blackadder, and Langton—"all men of good following, and by their examples numbers of country people willingly offered their service."*

On Saturday, the 14th of June, Mary and Bothwell well left Dunbar, and advanced from Dunbar towards the confederates with an army amounting to about 2000 men. The first night they passed at Seton. Next morning they marched to Gladsmoor, where a proclamation on the part of the queen was read to the army. In this document she said that a number of conspirators, discovering malice towards herself and the duke her husband, pretended, and imposed the pretence upon others, that they were associated in order to revenge the death of the late king; all which was a false and forged invention, none having better cause to revenge the king's death than herself, if she knew the authors of it. Further, she said, that as to the duke her husband, he had been fully acquitted of the crime, and his innocence was established. They declared that their aim was to rescue her from captivity; but they who had recommended her marriage with Bothwell were fully aware that she was no captive. They had assembled their forces in ap-

 Her proclamation to the army.
 but to what danger could that prince be exposed, seeing that he was now in their own hands? Therefore, it was evident, she concluded, that their real design "was to overthrow her and her posterity, that they might rule all things at their pleasure, and without controulment." The proclamation closed by making liberal promises of reward to those who remained steadfast to her cause, and in the approaching contest fought manfully for their queen and country.*

The queen's next movement was to entrench herself on Carberry Hill, about eight miles from the capital, where there still remained the old fortifications which previous to the battle of Pinkie had been thrown up, twenty years before, by the Duke of Somerset. Hearing of this rapid advance, the confederate lords immediately set out from the city with the intention of attacking her position. The confederates march to meet the queen on Carberry Hill, 15th June. It does not appear that they anticipated this alacrity on the part of Mary, nor that they were in the best state of preparation for hazarding an engagement with her army. Calderwood says:—"The lords found not such concurrence out of all quarters as they expected, and such worthy enterprise required; for many favoured the other party, or suspended their aid till they saw farther. They wanted likewise artillery and munition necessary for the siege." [This was probably an allusion to their proposed attempt on Dunbar.] "When they began to deliberate on dissolving their army, the queen cometh forward with her forces." Lord Herries states, that "getting sudden intelligence in the night of the queen's approach, and that she was advanced already to Seton, they were forced to take courage, and presently beat to drums. The force, as is said, was not many; but, because they had the affections of the town of Edinburgh, they appeared in the morning a considerable number. Forces of the confederates. With these they marched out betimes in the morning, and lay down at Mussel-

* This proclamation is found in Spottiswood's History, folio, p. 206. Crawford's MS. says that the proclamation bore—that if any man should slay an earl, he should have a forty pound land; for the slaughter of a lord, a twenty pound land; and for the slaughter of a baron, a ten pound land; and Calderwood's MS. adds—"for the slaughter of a zeaman, the escheat of a zeaman."—Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland. Keith, vol. ii. p. 627, note.

The farther in filthe ye stamp, but doubt
 The fouller sall your shoes come out;
 Ye being chieftain of that tryst,
 Ye braid of [resembled] him that speired at Christ.
 'An sum ego, Jesu Christe?'

Who answered, 'Juda, tu dixiste.'
 Have I advertise you in time,
 If that you cledge him of that crime,
 Ather for love, or yith for terrour,
 I sall protest for wilful errour."

Other circumstances occurred to excite the people against the queen and Bothwell, as the latter was considered capable of perpetrating any villany. The proclamations of the queen against Liddesdale, commanding her subjects in the more southern shires to meet her and Bothwell, her lieutenant, at Melrose, on the 15th of June, were misunderstood, or wilfully perverted. Instead of an expedition against the rebellious Borderers, it was rumoured and believed that it was intended to assemble a large force, march to Stirling Castle, and compel the Earl of Mar to resign the charge of the infant prince. This widely circulated allegation, when told to the queen, elicited her "Declaration upon the Bruitis," or reports, in which, as Chalmers observes, "she avowed her affection for her people, disclaimed any wish to innovate upon the established laws, and hoped that she had placed her son in such safe hands, that the security of his person and the cultivation of his mind need not be doubted, to whom these charges are committed, according to the ancient practice; but such declarations were not much regarded."—Life of Mary, vol. i. pp. 223-224. Keith, vol. ii. p. 624, note by Editor.

* Lord Herries adds—"There were two hundred hired soldiers and some field pieces of ordnance. The noblemen and gentry put their men in the best order they could, and with these forces the queen resolved to march to Leith."—Historie of the Reigne of Marie Queene of Scots.

burgh, a short distance from Carberry Hill*—where the queen's forces were posted. They made the greater haste that they might be masters of the town and bridge, which was a strong pass; and then sent out parties to view the countenance of the queen's army."† But whatever might be the strength of the confederates in point of numbers, they had unquestionably the advantage over the queen in superiority of rank, reputation, and influence. Their forces were composed chiefly of the higher classes, who had joined them with the enthusiasm of men whose personal feelings were interested in the success of their cause. On the other hand, the forces of the queen consisted for the most part of a raw, undisciplined multitude, hastily assembled, without courage, and without experience.

The army of the confederates, as stated by an authority which can be relied on, Their leaders. was formed into two divisions.

Lord Home and the Earl of Morton commanded the first—the other was led by the Earls of Glencairn, Atholl, and Mar. Among the prominent leaders may be mentioned Lords Lindsay, Ruthven, Graham, and Sanquhar; and Sir William Murray of Tullibardine, Douglas of Drumlanrig, and his son, Ker of Cessford, and Kirkaldy of Grange.‡ "The two armies," says that ancient chronicle, the 'Diurnal of Occurrences,' "remained in each other's sight the whole day," and the movements of the confederate lords, from five in the morning till twelve o'clock noon, were planned to shelter themselves from the heat of the sun,—as it is quaintly expressed, "to have the pre-eminence and advantage of the sun," whilst the queen and her forces remained stationary on Carberry Hill till eight in the evening.

At this time there was present with Mary the French ambassador, De Croc, and at this critical juncture he attempted to mediate between the two parties. De Croc, as we have seen, was strongly opposed to the queen's marriage with Bothwell, had intimated to her the extreme displeasure of the French court, and even negotiated with the confederates to assist them in their enterprise against the government, provided they would consent to deliver the prince into the custody of France.

The French ambassador endeavours in vain to accommodate matters.

Now, however, he felt anxious, if possible, to bring about an accommodation, and his offer having been accepted by the queen, he passed over to the confederate army, and obtained an interview with Morton and Glencairn. He represented to them that he had come to see "if there was any possibility to pack up things without blood, to both their goods—that it was lamentable that the queen and her subjects should be at such a distance, that nothing could satisfy their displeasure but blood and slaughter, and whomsoever should get the better, yet the loss fell to the country. He showed them that the queen was inclined to peace—that she would willingly grant an oblivion, and take it upon oath that no man should ever be called in question for what was done in opposing her authority."* To this representation it was replied on the one hand by the Earl of Morton, that they had not taken up arms against the queen, but against the murderer of the late king; and that if her majesty would either give him up to be punished, or remove him from her company, she should find in them a continuation of all dutiful obedience, and that they could admit of peace on no other condition. On the other hand, it was answered haughtily by the Earl of Glencairn: "We are not come here to ask pardon for any offence we have done, but rather to give pardon to those who have offended."

De Croc, having returned from his fruitless mission, the confederates prepared to advance upon the entrenched position of the queen. They were encouraged to this step by observing indications of wavering on the part of Mary's army, and receiving information of several cases of desertion. Melvil remarks that Bothwell had excited the indignation of the whole camp by his treatment of the queen, that part of his own company detested him, and another part believed that "her majesty would fain have been quit of him, but thought shame to be the doer thereof directly herself."†

For the purpose then of commencing the attack, the confederates dispatched Kirkaldy of Grange, with two hundred horse, accompanied by Douglas of Drumlanrig, Ker of Cessford, and Home of Cowdenknowes, with orders to sweep round the hill of Carberry towards the east side, with the view not only of taking advantage of the level ground which lay in that direction, but also of placing themselves between the queen and the Castle of Dunbar, and so intercepting Bothwell in case he should attempt to fly. Perceiving that it was the gallant Kirkaldy who headed this force, Mary, who had always entertained the greatest respect for his character as an honest, generous-hearted man, sent forward Cockburn of Ormiston, inviting him to an interview with the queen. Grange, having at once consented, rode forward; and in a few words assured her majesty that her subjects were yet true to their allegiance, and would readily obey her if she only separated herself from Bothwell. "All in this field, madam," said the loyal soldier, "will love, honour, and serve you, if you

Mary's interview with Kirkaldy of Grange.

* A part of Carberry Hill is now planted, and the stone on which Mary sat when she held the interview with Kirkaldy of Grange, subsequently narrated, is still known as the Queen's Seat.

† Calderwood's Historie of the Church of Scotland, printed for the Wodrow Society, vol. ii. p. 362.

‡ Ibid.; Historie of the Reigne of Marie Queene of Scots, printed for the Abbotsford Club, p. 93.

* Historie of the Reigne of Marie Queene of Scots, printed for the Abbotsford Club, p. 94.

† Melvil's Memoirs, p. 182-183. "He was so beastly and suspicious," says Melvil, speaking of Bothwell's scandalous treatment of this miserable queen, "that he suffered not to pass over a day in patience, or giving her cause to shed abundance of salt tears."—Memoirs, p. 182.

"will only abandon the murderer of your husband." It is related of Bothwell, that when he heard these words, he ordered a soldier to raise his harquebuss, and shoot him down; and Kirkaldy's life was only preserved by a shriek from the queen, and the exclamation—"Shame me not by so foul a murder!"* It was probably at this moment that Bothwell, in a spirit of reckless bravado or impulsive audacity, threw out a challenge to the confederates, and sent his defiance to any one that dared to accuse him of the king's murder. Kirkaldy carried this defiance to his companions in arms, and it was instantly accepted by James Murray of Tullibardine. This was the same Murray who had affixed to the Tolbooth of Edinburgh an answer to one of Bothwell's protestations of innocence. Bothwell, however, refused to fight with him, on the ground of his inferiority in rank. It is said that on the same ground he had refused the offer of Kirkaldy to take up the gage he had thrown down. His challenge was next accepted by Sir William Murray, who exclaimed—"I at least am his peer; my estate is better than his, and my blood is nobler!" This was intimated to Bothwell, who still refused, on pretence that Tullibardine "was not his equal in degree of honour;" and at last singled out his "old associate and fellow-conspirator," Morton, who avowed his willingness to fight him instantly on foot with two-handed swords. But when this was agreed to, Lord Lindsay of the Byres interposed, and asserted that the combat belonged of right to him, as the relative of the murdered Darnley, and implored the confederate lords, by the services he had rendered and still hoped to render, to allow him in courtesy to meet Bothwell. Morton and his associates, desirous of gratifying so old and faithful a friend, consented to his wishes; and the former presented him with his own sword, a well-known and much esteemed weapon, which had once been worn by his renowned ancestor, Archibald, Earl of Angus, surnamed Bell-the-Cat. Lindsay then armed himself, and kneeling down before the ranks of the confederates, audibly prayed for the divine assistance to strengthen him for the trial, imploring God to protect the innocent and to punish the guilty. Bothwell was not deficient in personal courage, and the combat would have taken place, had not Mary interfered, and expressly forbidden it; saying that Bothwell was her husband, and that he should not fight with any of them.†

Bothwell's dastardly attempt on the life of Grange.

Bothwell's defiance and challenge to the confederates.

By this time the army of Mary had so dwindled away, that there only remained about her person sixty gentlemen and the band of hagbutters. In this situation, forsaken by her forces, at the mercy of the confederates, but assured by them of their unshaken allegiance, provided she was separated from Bothwell, there seems to have been no alternative left to this unhappy queen, but to surrender herself into the hands of the insurgents. She intimated her willingness to comply with their demands; but required Kirkaldy, in the first place, to obtain for her their solemn assurance that they would abide by the terms of their engagement. This having been given on the part of the confederate lords, she exchanged a few words with her husband, and then parting from him with tears—prophetic, indeed, for she never saw him again—she placed herself in their hands. There is some obscurity in this part of the narrative, which in all probability will never be cleared up. It is clear that Mary had made up her mind to separate from Bothwell; but what method she took to reconcile him to this step, and how he was induced to give his consent, still remains a mystery, De Croc, the French ambassador, says, in his letter to Catherine de Medici, that "Bothwell became greatly alarmed; and at last, asked the queen whether she would keep her oath of fidelity which she had made to him. She answered 'Yes,' and gave him her hand upon it. He then mounted his horse, and fled with few attendants." This, however, is merely conjectural, as De Croc was not present at the scene which he describes; having, after his unsuccessful mediation, retired to Edinburgh. This account, however, may be accepted as the nearest possible approximation to the truth.

One circumstance appears worthy of notice, that the confederates offered no opposition to the departure of Bothwell. This is surprising, when we consider that their avowed object in taking arms was to bring to justice the murderer of Darnley. The only explanation which can be given of such inconsistent conduct is, that they dared not bring Bothwell openly to trial; seeing that such a course would necessarily implicate his associates in the crime for which he was arraigned, and involve in a similar condemnation Morton, Huntley, Lethington, and Argyle.*

* Two accounts of Bothwell's flight from Carberry Hill will be read with interest. The queen "persuaded him," says Calderwood, "to withdraw himself secretly out of the field, for she had tried that few except his own friends and dependers would fight; at least, were anxious the battle might be delayed till the next day, that Huntlie and the Bishop of St. Andrew's would come with new forces, if Bothwell in the meantime would not decide the question by single combat. While the queen was conferring with Grange, Bothwell conveyed himself secretly from the army, and hasted with speed to Dunbar, himself alone, because he would trust none; yet others report with seven or eight. After he had taken the flight, sundry shirked away by hundreds, forties, and thirties. One was sent from the queen's army with a long pike, and cast it down before the horsemen of the other army, in token the victory was theirs."—Calderwood's History, vol. ii. p. 364. Lord Herries, on the other hand, says that when Kirkaldy was sent to treat with the queen, he "had a secret commission underhand, and a token from the Earle of Morton to Bothwell, to advise him to retire himself from the fury of the people to some part out of the kingdom for a small time, until he wrought business in a right posture; but that the people are so hot, that if he do stay, it was not possible to keep them from destruction on both sides, and gave assurance

* Melvil's Memoirs, p. 183.

† Calderwood's Historie of the Church of Scotland, printed for the Wodrow Society, vol. ii. p. 363; MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil, June 19th, 1567.

Having seen that Bothwell made good his escape, and was not pursued, Mary advanced towards Kirkaldy, and intimated that she placed herself in the hands of the confederates, relying on their promises. "Laird of Grange," said

Mary's reception by she, "I render myself unto you, confederates. on the conditions you rehearsed to me in the name of the lords." She then offered her hand to the baron, which he kissed; and, taking hold of her horse's bridle, he conducted her from the hill to the camp of his associates. Here she was received with every demonstration of respect on the part of the nobles. They threw themselves on their knees before her, and Morton exclaimed, "Here, madam, is the true place where your grace should be; and here we are ready to defend and obey you as loyally as ever nobility of this realm did your progenitors!" Her reception by the soldiers was by no means so cordial or encouraging. The armed ranks closed round her with menacing gestures, and on every side were heard words of reproach and threatening. So turbulent were the men, that Grange and others were compelled to draw their swords, and force them into silence. In her address to the lords, she said that she had come to them, not out of any fear she had had of her life, nor yet doubting of the victory, if matters had gone to the worst, but abhorring the shedding of Christian blood, especially of those that were her own subjects. She had yielded to them, avowing that she would be guided by their counsels, and trusting they would respect her as their born princess and lawful queen.

The very first request, however, which Mary preferred, she was made to feel, in a most significant manner, the melancholy position in which she was now placed. Learning that on the preceding night the Hamiltons had advanced to Linlithgow in great strength, she expressed a desire that a message from her might be communicated to them. This was sternly refused; and on hearing of this determination, she broke out into passionate reproaches, appealed to the promises they had made, and demanded how they ventured to treat her as a prisoner. Her entreaties and threats were alike disregarded; and losing all command of herself, she called for Lindsay, one of her most refractory nobles, and bade him extend to her his hand. He obeyed her; and, taking hold of it she exclaimed, "By the hand which is now in yours, I will have your head for this!"*

that if he would slip aside, he may go freely whether he pleased in securitie, for none shall be suffered to follow. Bothwell gave trust to these conditions, and retired privately out of the army with only two men, and went to Dunbar Castell. The other party said he retired by command of the queen; but, however it was, he left the field without trouble or danger."—Histoire of the Reigne of Queene Marie, p. 94. If this account be true, it proves the consummate hypocrisy and villany of Morton, who contrived to make even Kirkaldy of Grange a tool in the negotiation at Carberry Hill; though it is farther said of Kirkaldy, that "he took Bothwell by the hand," and desired him to depart, promising that no one should oppose or follow him; "and thus, by their own consent, Bothwell passed away."—Chalmers' Life of Mary Queen of Scots, vol. i. p. 229. Bothwell's own "narrative," affords no information respecting the events at Carberry Hill, and is chiefly curious for its falsehood and deliberate perversion of facts. He pretends that the queen and the gentlemen with her opposed his combat with Lord Lindsay, because, he says, "Lord Lindsay was not of such parentage as to be comparable to me, nor of such an ancestry or house; and that, moreover, I was a husband worthy of the queen. Nevertheless, I so persuaded the queen and all of them, by the many reasons I urged, that they eventually consented that the combat should take place." "Shortly afterwards," he continues, "I repaired to the field of action, to await the arrival of my antagonist, where I remained till very late in the evening. He did not, however, make his appearance, as I will prove, when necessary, by the testimony of one thousand gentlemen [une mille gentilhommes], upon pain of forfeiting my life. As night approached, I prepared to give battle to the enemy, by putting my troops in marching order, they also doing the like on their side." Bothwell then details, with the same disregard to truth, the queen's answer denying her alleged captivity; her conference with Kirkaldy among the forces of the confederates, to prevent the effusion of blood; the advice he gave her not to rely upon their fair promises, but to retire with him to Dunbar, and allow him to defend her "just cause," when he knew well that his own retreat to Dunbar had been cut off; her refusal; his advice to her to obtain a guarantee for her safety, and the false assurances given to her. "When everything was agreed upon," he continues, "under a promise of inviolable adherence to the terms stipulated by the two armies, in presence of the nobles and others then assembled, the queen requested me to return with my troops to Dunbar, where she would join me. Wherefore I departed from her, upon the solemn promise which had been given, as well orally as in writing."—Les Affaires du Conte de Boduel, pp. 18—20. It is curious that Buchanan, Knox, and Spottiswood, take no notice of Bothwell's challenge to Morton, and all their accounts are most imperfect. "The proper battle," Chalmers observes, "had been between Bothwell and Morton, two of the murderers of the king; and the best consummation had been if they had killed one another, as two of the most guilty men on earth."—Life of Mary, vol. i. p. 228. (Keith, vol. ii. p. 635, note by Editor.)

At seven o'clock in the evening of this eventful day, the unhappy queen made her Mary is conducted entrance into Edinburgh, riding to Edinburgh. between Morton and Atholl, and in the most deplorable condition imaginable. Her hair was dishevelled, her dress covered with dust; and she was ready to faint from want of refreshment, as well as from a sense of her misery and humiliation. Calderwood states that her face was "disfigured with dust and tears;" that she could "scarcely be holden on her horse, through excess of grief and faintness;" and that all the way she lingered, looking for some help. It is reported that her sufferings were immeasurably aggravated by the conduct of the confederates, who conducted her to the capital by a route which compelled her to pass by the ruins of the Kirk-of-Field House, and to gaze upon the scene of that terrible tragedy, the very thought of which must have been harrowing and insupportable. As she rode through the streets, Her reception she was greeted on all sides by the by the populace. populace with yells and the most opprobrious epithets.† Before her eyes there was borne the banner

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil, June 18th, 1567.

† Mary might have been prepared for this cruel treatment, by her reception on the part of the forces at Carberry Hill. Calderwood says, "When she came to the re-re-guard, all cried out to burn the adulteress and murderer of her husband." Lord Herries writes, "On her passing through the army, they used her with great contempt. They had the king's picture, as he was murdered, painted upon their ensigus; and in one of the corners the young prince drawn, on which was represented a rude likeness of the murdered Darnley, and the infant prince, kneeling beside the body, and imprecating vengeance on his father's assassins. This fearful ensign was carried by the soldiers, and had for its motto these words, "Judge and revenge my cause, O Lord!" The first step of the confederates was to secure the queen's person during the night; this they did by placing her, in defiance of her remonstrances, in the provost's house, where she was strictly guarded.* Here, deprived of the attendance of her women, she passed, as may well be supposed, a most miserable night. With the return of morning, there came a repetition of the horrors of the preceding day. The first object she perceived was the hateful banner, which, with a refinement of cruelty, the populace had hung up opposite to her residence. It is said that, maddened by this spectacle, worn out with fatigue and anxiety, she fell into a delirium, during the paroxysms of which she tore her dress, already hanging about her person loose and disordered, and in this pitiable state addressed the crowd from her window in the following terms:—"Good people, either satisfy your cruelty and hatred by taking away my miserable life, or release me from the hands of such inhuman tyrants!" This speech melted the hearts of many who heard it, and the new-born, crying to heaven for vengeance against the murderers of his father. These ensigns, at all the corners of the camp, were spread abroad as she went through, and the soldiers, in a barbarous manner, shouted, 'Burn the adulteress!' The queen was mightily overtaken with grief and anger at these contemptible words and spectacles. She could not contain herself from tears."—Historie of the Reigne of Marie Queene of Scots, p. 95.

Mary is confined for the night in the provost's house.

* The provost's house, at that time, as we learn from the "Diurnal of Occurrences," p. 115, belonged to Sir James Henderson:—"The queen was lodged," says that ancient chronicle, "in James Henderson's house of Fordell, being then the Provost of Edinburgh's house, wherein he remained." The Provost of Edinburgh was the queen's former host, Sir Simon Preston, of Craigmillar. The house stood at the head of Peebles Wynd, an alley leading from the High Street to the Cowgate, which occupied the site of the present Blair Street and part of Hunter Square, close to the Tron Church. The tenement was known as the "Black Turnpike;" and tradition assigned to it the most extraordinary antiquity, affirming that it was erected by no less a personage than Kenneth, King of Scotland, the extirpator of the Picts, and that it had been at one time occupied by King Robert Bruce; but according to Maitland ("History of Edinburgh," folio, 1753, p. 187-188), it was built by George Robertson, Burgess of Edinburgh, and it is mentioned in a deed, dated 1461, as the property of the son of that person. Maitland describes the Black Turnpike as a "magnificent edifice, which, were it not partly defaced by a false wooden front, would appear to be the most sumptuous building perhaps in Edinburgh." It was of great height and extent, with one front to the High Street, and the other to Peebles Wynd, which contained three common stairs, leading to the different storeys of the tenement. The room in which Queen Mary was confined for the night, on this occasion, is alleged to have been only thirteen feet square and eight feet high, the window looking to the street. She was lodged in it under a strong guard, without even one female attendant to wait upon her, and locked up to pass the night in a state of mind which can be better imagined than described. The Black Turnpike was demolished in 1788, to complete the plans of South Bridge Street, and it was probably at the time the most ancient house in Edinburgh. (Keith, vol. ii. p. 639, note by the Editor.)

citizens were meditating some measure for the rescue of the queen, when she was suddenly removed, under a strong guard, to Holyrood Palace. This was only a preliminary step to further and still more violent proceedings. After a hurried consultation, the confederated nobles came to the resolution of confining their sovereign in the secluded castle of Lochleven. This castle, situated in the midst of a lake, belonged to Sir William Douglas, one of the confederates, a kinsman of Morton, and the husband of the mother of the Earl of Moray.* The warrant for the commitment of the queen to the custody of Douglas was made out on the 16th of June, and signed by the Earls of Morton, Atholl, Mar, and Glencairn; the Lords Ruthven, Home, Lindsay, Ochiltree, and Graham. On the evening of that day, Mary was conducted thither with every circumstance of indignity which could add to her sense of humiliation. Leaving the palace of Holyrood, which she never saw again, at ten o'clock at night, she was treated with such marked insult, as not to be allowed to select a single dress for her journey or subsequent comfort. She was compelled to ride thirty miles to Lochleven Castle, mounted on a miserable hack, in poor and soiled attire, and without any of those necessities which common decency would not have denied to a woman, but which these barbarous men refused to their queen. The persons to whom was entrusted the business of conducting Mary to her place of confinement † were Lords Ruthven and Lindsay, Mary confined in Lochleven Castle by the confederates.

* The character of this lady is finely delineated by Sir Walter Scott, in the "Abbot."

† Lochleven Castle, as already mentioned, occupies an island near the western shore of Lochleven, at Kinross, and between it and the promontory on which Kinross House is built, near the site of the old Castle of Kinross, a causeway of large stones is laid beneath the water, which in this part is so shallow that, in dry seasons when the surface is low, a person can wade along it to the island. Lochleven Castle and its courtyard comprised a considerable portion of the island which is called the Castle Island, and now contains, since the last draining of Lochleven in 1840, five acres; but in Queen Mary's time the island was much more limited. The remaining part was chiefly cultivated as a garden, which has been long a waste, though it still displays a few fruit trees in a wild and decayed state. The great tower or keep of the castle is on the north-west corner of the courtyard, on the side of the island next Kinross. It is a square tower four storeys high, with round, projecting turrets at the corners, the walls upwards of six feet thick. The entrance is on the second storey, which must have been ascended by an outside stair, with a drawbridge at the top, but every vestige of this stair has disappeared. The door opened directly into the great hall, which includes the whole of the second storey, having a square passage into the vaults below, and the two upper storeys appear to have been bedrooms. The courtyard, which when entire was of considerable extent, was surrounded by high walls, flanked at the corners by towers, and contained a variety of buildings for the accommodation of the garrison. The chapel stood west of the great tower on the west side of the courtyard. According to tradition, the round tower on the south-east corner, flanking the south and east walls, was the part where Queen Mary was imprisoned, and if such be the fact, her accommodation was most wretched. This tradition is probably authentic, as we know that "Lady Lochleven" treated Mary with great severity, and insulted her on every possible occasion. The castle and the other buildings have been long in ruins, but they will always be of interest as connected with Queen

LOCHLEVEN.

Kinross-shire.

men every way suitable to their office; being, as has been justly remarked, of peculiarly "savage manners even in that age."

The only man who appears to have remonstrated with the confederates against this cruel treatment of their queen was Kirkaldy of Grange. In defence of their conduct they alleged that Mary had broken her promise to have no communication

Alleged letter of Mary to the Earl of Bothwell.

with Bothwell, and had actually written to him a letter from her prison in Edinburgh, to the effect that she would never forsake him, and warning him to be on his guard.* This story is related by Sir James Melvil, who says that the letter was dispatched by Mary on the night of her arrival in the city, and was treacherously delivered up by the messenger to whom it had been entrusted. He says "that her majesty wrote a letter to the Earl of Bothwell, and promised a reward to one of her keepers to have it safely conveyed to Dunbar to the said Earl, calling him her dear heart, whom she would never abandon nor forget, even though absent, and that she sent him away only for his safety, willing him to be comforted and be on his guard; which writing the lord delivered unto the lords, after he had promised to do the contrary. Upon the which letter the lords took occasion to send her to Lochleven to be kept, against their promise as she alleged; and they again affirming that by her own handwriting she had declared that she had not, and would not, leave nor abandon the Earl of Bothwell." Whatever truth there may be in this story, it is certain that it was made the pretext for violently detaining the queen's person, and committing her to close custody in Lochleven Castle.

At this time the public feeling was decidedly hostile to Mary, as we have already seen from the treatment she experienced from the citizens of Edinburgh. This is very strongly expressed in a letter from Sir Nicholas Throckmorton to Queen Elizabeth, shortly after Mary's imprisonment in Lochleven. "Though these lords and councillors," says Throckmorton, "speak reverently, mildly, and charitably of their queen, so as that I cannot gather by their speech any intention of cruelty or violence, yet I do find by intelligence that the queen is in very great peril of her life, by reason that the people assembled at this convention do mind vehemently the destruction of her. It is a public speech amongst all the people, and amongst all the Estates (saving the councillors), that their queen hath no more liberty nor privilege to commit murder or adultery than any other private person, neither by God's law nor by the laws of the realm." In another letter, dated two days subsequent to the former, Throckmorton writes to the Earl of Bedford that "the queen is in great danger, by reason of the great rage and fury of the people against her."

Mary. The surface of the lake having been reduced by draining, it was feared that the island would be joined to the main land, and become a suburb of Kinross. This is not the case, and the appearance of the island is much improved; the dark, massive ruins of the castle are conspicuous amid the delightful scenery of Kinross, standing out in the lake, which is now reduced from a circumference of fifteen to twelve miles, and from a depth of nineteen feet to that of fourteen. (Keith, vol. ii. p. 642, note by Editor.)

* Melvil's Memoirs, printed for the Bannatyne Club, p. 185.

The queen's person having been thus secured, and the infant prince committed to the custody of one of their friends, the Earl of Mar, the confederates now determined to dispatch letters to England and the court of France, explaining and justifying the measures they had adopted. In addressing themselves to the English queen, they declared that their only motive in taking up arms against their sovereign had been her separation from Bothwell and the punishment of the murderers of the late king. They expressed their determination not to desist from their enterprise till these objects were secured, but that when these were accomplished they would willingly return to their allegiance and restore the queen to liberty. They alluded to their rumoured intention of de-throning Mary, crowning the infant prince, and establishing a regency, and solemnly declared that such an idea had never been entertained. In these circumstances they entreated her majesty to put a favourable construction on their conduct, and to afford them countenance in the enterprise in which they were engaged, by sending them some three or four thousand crowns, which might be expended in the hire of mercenaries, in which case they promised to submit themselves wholly to her guidance; and they hinted that should these wishes not be complied with, they should be obliged to turn to France, the court of which would certainly make them very advantageous offers of assistance and co-operation.†

The confederates dispatch letters to England and France.

In their despatches to France, the confederates expressed themselves in more general terms. They were already certified of the willingness of the government to afford them substantial aid. De Croc, the ambassador, as already noticed, had expressed himself to the confederates as favourable to their cause, and had even ventured to recommend that the infant prince should be intrusted for safety to the custody of France, as Mary herself had been in troublous times. It appears indeed that he had gone further, and had actually advised the lords, now that they had secured the person of the queen, to keep her in their own hands.‡ Letters were at the same time dis- —and to Lennox patched to the Earls of Lennox and Moray. and Moray, relating the recent events, and intimating that their presence would be acceptable in Scotland.§

On the night of the queen's journey from Holyrood to Lochleven, two persons were apprehended on

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office.

† MS. State Paper Office, Sir John Foster to Cecil, June 20, 1567.

‡ Ibid., Drury to Cecil, June 29, 1567.

§ Ibid., July 9, 1567.

suspicion of having been concerned in the murder of Darnley. These were Captain William Blackater, and a foreigner, named Sebastian de Villours. One Captain Cullen, a follower of Bothwell, and well-known as an unprincipled and desperate man, had also been seized on the arrival of the confederates in Edinburgh. The foreigner either made good his escape or was set at liberty, nothing having been proved against him. Of Cullen there is nothing further related; and, as is shrewdly remarked by a recent historian, "it is possible he may have been commanded to say nothing, because he might have told too much." Blackater, however, was tried before the Privy Council, convicted, and executed in the presence of an immense crowd at the Cross of Edinburgh.*

An event now happened which remains to this

Discovery of the celebrated casket said to afford proofs of Mary's guilt.

day involved in considerable mystery. This was the discovery of that famous silver casket, which it is said contained indubitable proofs of the guilt of Mary. It appears that this casket was the property of Bothwell, and having been left for security in the Castle of Edinburgh, had been sent for by that nobleman, and instead of being conveyed to him, had, through the treachery of a servant, been delivered into the hands of the confederates. The principal papers contained in it consisted of letters and sonnets, alleged to be in the handwriting of the queen, and addressed to the earl. It was asserted, on the part of the confederates, that these and other documents found in this casket furnished an ample justification of their conduct, and the most unanswerable proof that they had not without reason charged Mary with being implicated in the murder of her husband. There is one circumstance to be taken into account in judging of the truth or falsehood of this story, namely, that in the confidential letters of Drury to Cecil at this period, written from day to day, and containing the minutest information respecting all the current events of the period, there is no allusion to the discovery of such papers as implicated Mary, which, if it had been made, could hardly have escaped the notice of so acute an observer. It is not to be forgotten, however, that the confederates were not likely to make too much of this discovery in one aspect of it, however they might do so in another. Anxious as they were to secure any documents which might justify their own conduct, they would shrink from exposing the contents of this casket until they had been carefully examined,—inasmuch as they knew that the bond implicating some of their own number in the murder of the king was in the possession of Bothwell, and might be contained among these papers. The whole affair is mysterious, and probably incapable of being cleared up. One thing may be mentioned, that on the 20th of June, the day of the reported discovery, George Douglas, one of the most trusted of their number, was dispatched by the confederates on a secret mission to the Earl of Bedford.*

Elizabeth, on receiving the intelligence communicated by the confederates, was perplexed by conflicting feelings. On the one hand, she was by no means displeased that her rival should be distressed and humbled,

Feelings and conduct of Elizabeth when informed of the late events.

or that the affairs of the kingdom should be embroiled in such a manner as to afford her an excuse for interposing between the contending parties. Always desirous of establishing the ascendancy of English counsels in Scotland, she gladly hailed the opportunity now afforded for her interference. On the other hand, she held extreme opinions on the subject of the royal prerogative. Regarding the person of the sovereign as inviolable, she could not view with indifference the seizure of Mary, and her imprisonment in Lochleven. That subjects, however much they might resent the proceedings of their princes, should venture to take up arms against them, and deprive them of authority, was a doctrine altogether abhorrent to Elizabeth. And as in this respect the confederates had set a bad example to her own subjects, she felt herself called upon to put on, at least, the appearance of concern and indignation. Elizabeth was further influenced by several considerations of an opposite character. However much disposed to resent the outrage upon Mary, and to vindicate the royal prerogative, she was not unaware of the importance of giving countenance to the confederates, as representing the great party of Protestant Reformers. Bearing in mind the hint thrown out in the letter of the lords, that France was disposed to countenance their enterprise, and dreading that another alliance between this kingdom and Scotland might be contemplated, she at once perceived what advantages might be secured to herself, and how much the interests of Protestantism might be advanced by entering into some relations with the confederates, and persuading them, if possible, to entrust the prince to the guardianship of England. Thus influenced by motives of an opposite description, Elizabeth appears to have adopted a course which neither compromised her with the one party nor the other. In appearance she openly and warmly sympathised with Mary, and dispatched Robert Melvil, then at court, with a letter to intimate to his mistress how deeply she resented the treatment she had received. Throckmorton, her ambassador, a man who had hitherto shown himself rather friendly than otherwise to the Scottish queen, was ordered to hold himself in readiness to proceed to Scotland. In his instructions we find him required to remon-

* "The 24th day of June, Captain William Blackater was drawn backward in a cart from the Tolbooth of Edinburgh to the Cross, and there was hanged and quartered, for being a participant in the king's murder. He solemnly denied any participation in that crime, as he should answer to the eternal God at the day of judgment. The captain, however, had but little chance of escape whether guilty or not, having been tried by a jury of gentlemen of Lennox, who were for the most part vassals and servants to the earl thereof."—Diurnal of Occurrences in Scotland, printed for the Bannatyne Club, p. 116.

* Anderson, vol. ii. p. 92; MS. Letter. State Paper Office. Bedford to Cecil: Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 139-140.

strate with the confederates in the following terms: "By earnest speeches" he was to show them "how incredible we took it at the first when we heard of her imprisonment, thinking surely that persons of such honour as they be (being the principal of the nobility of that realm) could never be induced to offer such violence to her, their sovereign, as to commit her to any manner of prison. For though we will not deny but she may be charged with some faults or oversights, yet we take it not to be appertaining to subjects in such a manner to reform their prince, but otherwise to deal by advice and counsel; and failing thereof, to commend the rest to Almighty God. And this you may say, we do not think as a prince that would partially regard the privilege of another prince, because we ourselves are called by God's order to that estate; but that we think it so ordained by God, and received for a truth in doctrine in all good Christian government."*

The violence of the measures adopted with regard to Mary produced, as was naturally to be expected, a re-action in her favour. The queen's party, though dispirited and broken up, was not extinct; and, soon after her imprisonment in Lochleven, attempts were made to re-unite her scattered adherents. Accordingly, several of the nobles convened at Hamilton, and consulted as to the measures to be adopted. At the head of this party were the Duke of Chatelherault and the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, his brother. The latter was the real leader and main-spring of the movement, as the duke had been for some time a resident in France. It is easy to understand the motives which urged upon the faction of the Hamiltons the necessity of making a demonstration in favour of the queen. They might, indeed, have been disposed to take up arms in her defence in virtue of her relationship to their chiefs; but this was altogether a subordinate consideration. The grand motive which actuated their conduct was their dread lest the continued captivity of the queen should lead to what of all things they desired least—the coronation of the young prince, and the appointment of a regency. This they regarded as the ultimate design of Morton and his party, and they determined that, if possible, it should be defeated. For this purpose, a conven-

The queen's party reconstructed by the Archbishop of St. Andrew's.

The lords hold a convention at Dunbarton. The lords of the nobility was held at Dunbarton, on the 29th of June, which was attended by all the principal leaders of the movement. At this meeting it was determined that a proclamation should be issued, summoning all good citizens to be ready on nine hours' warning to take arms for the rescue of the queen.†

Here they were joined by Argyle and Huntley,

* Copy of instructions for Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, for matters to be imparted to the lords of Scotland, Keith, vol. ii. p. 670.

† MS. State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil. He states that the confederates are very anxious for the return of Lennox to Scotland to beard the Hamiltons.

who had deserted the confederates; and by the Earl of Crawford, Lords Herries, Seton, and Fleming. The proceedings of this convention were regarded with great interest by the ambassador De Croc, and reported by him to the French court.*

The confederates were naturally much alarmed at the tidings which they received of this rival association. Deliberating on the measures most calculated to strengthen their cause and increase the number of their adherents, they resolved on consolidating a more close and intimate alliance with the Reformed party. The leaders of the movement against the queen were for the most part Protestants; and on their first arrival at the capital they had sought to engage on their behalf the popular feeling by a display of zeal against popery in the shape of an attack upon the chapel of Holyrood, in which they demolished the altars, shrines, and images. This outrage was perpetrated by Glencairn and his retainers on the 24th of June, the day on which Captain Blackater was tried and executed for the murder of Darnley.

Knox had for some time been absent from Scotland; but shortly after the murder of the king he returned to the kingdom, to play that foremost part in its troubled history for which he was so well fitted by his eminent abilities, his indomitable spirit, and the extraordinary influence he possessed over all classes. The assistance which the confederates were anxious to secure from the Reformer he was willing enough to render, provided they should comply with the certain conditions which he laid down. He stipulated that the parliament held at Edinburgh in 1560 should be recognised as valid, and its acts incorporated among the statutes of the kingdom. This was the famous parliament by which popery had been overthrown, and the Reformed faith established; the acts of which were repudiated by Mary, although virtually they were held valid, in spite of her refusal to recognise them. Further, it was stipulated by the Reformer that the patrimony of the Church, which had been so scandalously appropriated by the nobles, should, as far as practicable, be restored; that the instruction of the young, and the superintendence of the public seminaries of education, should be entrusted to the clergy of the Established Church; that popery—or, as he termed it, idolatry—should, if requisite, be put down by force of arms; that the young prince should be committed to the guardianship of faithful tutors, who should be held responsible for his education and godly upbringing; and, finally, that measures should be taken to bring to justice the murderers of the king.† These stipulations having been readily agreed to, Knox embraced the cause of the confederates, and supported it with all his characteristic energy and enthusiasm.

Knox joins the confederates.

At this time also an attempt was made to induce the Hamiltons, and some of their friends, to identify their interests with those of the confederates. For this purpose letters were addressed to Argyle, Huntley, Herries, and others, requesting them to repair to Edinburgh, to be present at a meeting of the Assembly of the Church, which had been adjourned to the 20th of July. With the view of securing their compliance, Knox was dispatched, in company with three of his brethren, Douglas, Row, and Craig; and, bringing to bear upon them all the weight of his personal influence, he besought them to attend and aid the great work of confirming the authority of the Church, and re-establishing it in the possession of its alienated patrimony. The Hamiltons, however, probably from some suspicion of the sincerity of the lords, obstinately refused to give in their adherence.

* MS. State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil.

† Knox, p. 449.

It has been already remarked that Mary was peculiarly unfortunate in the servants whom she selected for any more than usually important service, which required not only talent and experience, but above everything, fidelity and conscientiousness. Whatever may have been the qualifications of Robert Melvil in respect to ability, he was lamentably deficient in honesty and good faith.

Robert Melvil's mission to England, and return.

We have seen that he was dispatched by his mistress to England on a mission of the greatest delicacy. To this trust he proved altogether faithless. Instead of furthering the interests of his queen, he laboured to create and cement an amicable understanding between the confederates and Elizabeth; and, as the sequel showed, with success. He informed them that they might expect support from England; that their projects were far from displeasing to the sovereign of that country; that in particular she thought well of the plan of obliging Mary to resign her crown in favour of her infant son. The character of Melvil's negotiations will, however, be best explained by the following extracts from a letter addressed by him to Cecil, previous to his visit to Mary at Lochleven Castle, whither he repaired to give an account of his mission. "It may please your honour," he says, "to be advertised I came to this town [Edinburgh] upon the twenty-ninth of June, and have imparted the queen's majesty's good disposition in the assisting and partaking with the lords to prosecute the murderers of the king, and to preserve the prince in the custody of the Earl of Mar. Whereof the said lords most humbly thank her highness. The whole particularities that I had your honour's advice in, according to the queen your sovereign's meaning, is not at this present resolved on, by reason the most part of noblemen are gone to their houses to repose them and their friends, except the Earls of Morton and Atholl, with my Lord Home, my Lord Ledington, Sir James Balfour, captain of the castle, who is daily in council with them, and Mr. James Macgill, and the Justice Clerk. The cause of their going from this town is by some bragging of the Hamiltons, with the Earl of Huntley, minding to convene their forces and make their colour [pretence] for the delivery of the queen; albeit it be credibly reported that they fear the king's murder to be laid to some of their charges; I mean the Bishop of St. Andrew's; wherefore it was thought most convenient that the noblemen and gentlemen should in the meantime have their friends in readiness. Before my coming the lords did write divers instructions unto me, besides a letter written to the queen's majesty subscribed by them. The effect whereof was, that as they did understand by me of the good inclination of your mistress and council, being addicted to help them in their most need, so, for their parts, their goodwill to do her majesty service, before all other, with time shall be declared. As for their dealing with France, they have used them so discreetly, as neither France may have any just cause to be offended, and the queen your sovereign well pleased. The lords presently needs but money, for they have already listed divers men of war, and is taking up more. The Hamiltons is judged to be maintained by the queen's substance, and countenanced by France to have money, seeing that France is in doubt to persuade our noblemen. Wherefore, sir, it is most needful that with all expedition money may be procured of the queen your sovereign, and sent thither with Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, or by some of the Borders, for that necessity that they will be pressed to, will be within eight or ten days, which I thought meet to advertise your honour of; and what order shall be taken for my going to the queen is not agreed upon, by reason the most part of the lords are not present; and my Lord Ledington being greatly empesched with affairs, might not have leisure to concur at length, but is glad to understand of the care your honour has, that we should do all things by justice and moderation. And that the queen your sovereign may be content with your conference with me, he does well like of your advice in divers heads: always there is matter enough probable [proveable] to proceed upon that matter we first agreed upon, and farther is thought expedient. Ye shall with diligence be advertised; and refers the rest to my Lord of Ledington's letter, who does repose himself upon the care he hopes your honour will continue in for to set forward their honourable enterprise; and the lords, for their part, will accord with your ambassador to keep the prince; and to her highness's desire will put him in the custody of her majesty, if at any time hereafter they shall be minded to suffer him to go in any other country. The whole novels [news] here I refer to my Lord of Ledington's letter; and as I learn further your honour shall be advertised. At Edinburgh, the first of July. R. Melvil."*

From this letter it is sufficiently obvious what the intentions of Elizabeth professedly were.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Robert Melvil to Cecil, 1st July, 1567; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 152.

apparently instructed to remonstrate with the confederates, and to secure the deliverance of Mary from captivity, in reality Throckmorton was to assure them that assistance would not be wanting in the hour "of their utmost need," and to urge on them the speedy carrying out of their design—the dethronement of Mary, the seizure of the person of the prince, the establishment of a nominal regency, and the virtual ascendancy of English counsels.

In the letter from Melvil to Cecil, just quoted, the reader cannot fail to have remarked a mysterious sentence, which conveys no definite information, but, through dark and almost unintelligible hints, alludes to a subject which seems to have been so paramount in the mind both of the writer and of his official correspondent, as to be at once apprehended by the latter on the slightest allusion to it by the former.*

The words adverted to intimate that Lethington approved of some advice tendered to him by Cecil in a matter equally important to both, and that there was information enough already possessed to enable them to go on with it, with the prospect of a successful issue. The question not unnaturally suggests itself—what was this matter alluded to by Melvil in such mysteriously guarded language? We cannot accept Mr. Tytler's supposition, who conjectures—as he confesses wholly without authority—that this sentence related "to the scheme of compelling their sovereign to agree to their wishes, by a threat of bringing her to a public trial for the murder of the king." That the words will bear such an interpretation is doubtless true; that such an intention on the part of the confederates was entertained by them, and seriously too, is also, we think, undoubted; but we question whether such a nefarious project had at this period at least suggested itself; and we think the conjecture, that the language in dispute referred not to Mary, but to one or other of the guilty associates concerned in the king's murder, whom the rest had resolved to betray, and to deliver up to punishment, in order that through this parade of justice the public mind might be satisfied and appeased, rests upon as much authority, and is a supposition as plausible as that made by the historian alluded to. It is well known that one of the professed objects for which the confederates were banded together, was the punishment of the king's murderers; but if no steps were taken in this direction, and if all their efforts were seen to have for their object the seizure of the queen's person and the subversion of her government, public indignation would be directed against them, and the tide would be turned in the queen's favour. Pledged therefore, as it were, to fix the murder on some personage who might be held responsible for the deed, and baffled in the meantime in their endeavours to capture Bothwell, what more natural than that they should adopt the expedient indicated, and prove their zeal in this matter by the betrayal of some one of their less ignoble associates, who might be powerless either to accuse them or to defend himself?

Having returned to Scotland, Melvil's first step was to visit his mistress in her confinement at Lochleven. At this interview he delivered the letter of the Queen of England, but was much disappointed that he was not allowed to see her alone, as Lindsay, Douglas, and Ruthven, insisted on being present at the conference. Some days afterwards, however, he was again sent to Lochleven, and permitted to see the queen alone. At this interview he states that he exerted his influence to induce Mary to renounce Bothwell, but without producing the least impression on her mind.

Throckmorton, the English ambassador, arrived at Edinburgh about the 12th of July. We have seen the nature of his instructions to the confederates. To the queen he was commissioned to express the dissatisfaction his royal mistress felt with the manner in which Mary had neglected to prosecute her husband's murderers; to intimate her extreme displeasure at the marriage she had contracted with a man like Bothwell, adding that she had almost resolved to hold no further intercourse with one who had shown so little regard to what was due to her own dignity and honour; but that the indignities which had been put upon her by her own nobles, and the hardships and imprisonment to which she had been subjected, had excited compassion for her sufferings and reprobation of the conduct of the confederates, as opposed to the duty which they owed as subjects to their sovereign; and that in these circumstances she would endeavour to compel them to do her justice and to set her at liberty.*

The ambassador, on his way to Scotland, was met by Secretary Lethington at Coldingham, and by him escorted to Fastcastle, a stronghold on the coast, near St. Abbs Head, described by Throckmorton as "very little and very strong; a place fitter to lodge prisoners than folks at liberty." Here he obtained an interview with Sir James Melvil, which gave him little satisfaction. In a letter written on the same day to Cecil, he expresses his conviction that the confederates were suspicious of the sincerity of Elizabeth, and feared "that if they were not fortunate, she would leave them in the briars."

From Fastcastle Throckmorton proceeded to the capital, attended by Lord Home and an escort of four hundred horse. His conjectures as to the disposition of the confederates were not without good foundation. He was received by them with extreme coldness. Morton, whom he accidentally met in the streets, evaded entering upon business with him, on the plea that a solemn fast was held on that day; nor did he intimate at what time the

* The sentence runs thus:—"He [Lethington] does well like of your advice in divers heads; always there is matter enough probable [proveable] to proceed upon that matter we first agreed upon, and farther is thought expedient."

* Copy of instructions to Throckmorton, June 30, 1567.

confederates would meet with him. In the evening he was waited upon by Lethington, from whom he learned that the confederates were resolved that he should not be allowed to visit the queen. She was guarded in her island prison with extreme rigour, and every precaution taken to prevent any communication being made to her which did not first pass through the hands of her guardians. Access to her presence had already been denied to Monsieur Villeroy, who had been commissioned to visit her in the name of the King of France; and, therefore, it was alleged if admission were granted to the English ambassador it would be regarded as an insult by the French court. The policy pursued by the confederates towards England was extremely cautious. Far from wishing to embroil themselves with this government, they hoped rather by conciliation, and the moderate character of their designs, to secure its sympathy and co-operation. The proposals of the French court at this time did little to their honour to their originators, considering in what relation they had hitherto stood towards the unfortunate Mary. It was intimated that no opposition would be made to the dethronement of the queen, provided that French influence was allowed its due ascendancy in any government that might be formed during the minority of the prince. As to Mary herself, it was proposed by the ambassador, De Croc, to seclude her for life in some French convent.*

These propositions were fully reported to the English minister by Secretary Lethington. That they were not exaggerated appears, among other circumstances, from the extraordinary efforts made by the French court to induce the Earl of Moray to adopt their views, and promote them by his personal influence in his native country. "Great is the travail and pain," writes Norris to Cecil, "that hath been here taken to win the Earl of Moray, offering both the Order and great augmentation of living; which, as he hath sent me word, he hath refused; lest, by taking gifts, he shall be bound, where he is now free." † To the honour of Moray he declined these magnificent offers, and, so far from affording any countenance to the designs of the confederates, he dispatched a gentleman of the name of Elphinstone to convey to the queen an assurance of his fidelity, and his determination to devote himself to her interests.

This messenger arrived in England shortly after the departure of Throckmorton, and was immediately admitted to an interview with Elizabeth. This conference, we are informed, was secret, and lasted fully an hour. What passed we have no means of ascertaining; but whatever were the tidings he communicated, or the arguments he used, they had a favourable effect on the mind of the queen, inclining her to take a more lenient view of the conduct of Mary, and to look with corresponding severity on the proceedings of the confederates. Certain it is, that on the termination of this interview a messenger was sent immediately to Cecil, informing him that Moray had dispatched letters to Mary, praying her to accept of his assurances of devotion, and placing himself solely at her disposal; and that by the same channel he had addressed bold remonstrances to the confederates, upbraiding them with their rebellious and audacious conduct. Further, he was charged to tell Cecil to prepare instantly a letter to Mary, which she would herself sign; though unwilling, as she said, to write it herself, seeing "that she had not used her well or faithfully in these broken matters that be past. The purport of it," she continued, "must be to let her know that the Earl of Moray never spoke defamedly of her for the death of her husband; never plotted for the secret conveying of the prince to England; never confederated with the lords to depose her: on the contrary, now in my sister's misery, to let her learn from me the truth, and that is, that she has not a more faithful and honourable servant in Scotland."*

The fortunes of Mary were now at the lowest ebb. Her communication with the world was almost wholly cut off; she was surrounded by stern and jealous keepers, such as Lindsay and Ruthven, "men familiar with blood, and of coarse and fierce manners." Elizabeth amused her with fair words, France was avowedly hostile, and the Hamiltons, from whom she had naturally expected to receive hearty and disinterested support, were, to say the least, indifferent and lukewarm. Throckmorton, indeed, does not hesitate to avow his opinion that, as the Hamiltons were next heirs to the crown, they would have been very willing to see both Mary and her son securely disposed of; "making a show," as he says, "of the liberty of the queen, that they might induce those lords to destroy her, rather than they should recover her by violence out of their hands." †

The only person on whom Mary could place any reliance was, perhaps, the last to whom in this emergency she would have been inclined to look—viz. the Earl of Moray—whose messenger arriving at the capital, and demanding audience of the queen to deliver his letters, received a peremptory refusal. About this time, also, Robert Melvil being again admitted to her presence, besought her with much earnestness to renounce Bothwell; and a letter from Throckmorton, of which he had consented to be the bearer, urged her to the same course. But, with a strange infatuation, she clung to this brutal villain; and believing herself to be pregnant, she absolutely refused to dissolve her marriage with him, and thus to brand her child with illegitimacy. Several important concessions, however, she did make at this interview, protesting

* This information is derived from a gentleman of the court, a Mr. Heneage, who happened to be in waiting in the antechamber, and was sent to Cecil.—M.S. Letter, State Paper Office.

† Throckmorton to Elizabeth, 18th July, 1567.

* Throckmorton to Cecil, 12th July, 1567.

† M.S. Letter, State Paper Office, Norris to Cecil, 13th July, 1567.

that she was willing to consent to commit the government either to the Earl of Moray or to a council of the nobles. Adverting to the place and the rigour of her confinement, she entreated the confederates to remove her to Stirling Castle, as her health was already materially injured by her residence in Lochleven. To this effect she addressed a letter to the lords, in concluding which she appealed to them, in affecting language, that if they would not give her the respect due to her as their sovereign, they should at least treat her as the mother of their prince and the daughter of their king. It is said that at this interview she produced a letter, requesting Melvil to transmit it to Bothwell. This he indignantly refused, upon which she threw it passionately into the fire.*

While the current of public opinion was thus strongly directed against Mary, the Assembly

Meeting of the General Assembly.

of the Church was convened, at which the conduct of the queen was made the subject of long and stormy debates. Many of the ecclesiastical leaders proposed the adoption of the most violent measures, holding that the queen was demonstrably guilty of most of the dreadful crimes of which she was accused, and that she ought therefore to suffer the extreme penalty of the law. Others argued for a more moderate course, pointing out that advantage might be taken of the circumstance that Mary had already offered to resign the government into the hands of the Earl of Moray. After much altercation this

Abdication of the crown forced on Mary.

course was adopted, and three instruments were drawn up in conformity therewith, which were entrusted to the bitterest enemy of Mary, the brutal Lord Lindsay, who was ordered to proceed at once to Lochleven, and to compel the queen to attach her signature to them. The first of these important documents intimated her abdication

Three instruments drawn up—their import.

of the crown in favour of her infant son, and authorised preparations for his immediate coronation. The second invested "her dear brother," the Earl of Moray, with the regency, in consequence of the tender age of the prince. The third appointed the Duke, together with the Earls of Lennox, Argyle, Atholl, Morton, Glencairn, and Mar, as a council of regency, to carry on the government till the arrival of the Earl of Moray; and in case of his declining to accept of his high office, invested them with power to continue in that capacity.

Previous to the interview of Lindsay with his sovereign, it is said that Melvil assured her privately that her refusal to comply with the demands of the confederates would endanger her life. Arguments were also used to the effect that such documents—executed in captivity and under compulsion—were invalid, and that she might therefore sign them without scruple. Melancholy and humiliating was the position in which this unfortunate queen now found herself. An immured captive and an accused criminal—a disowned sovereign and a weak woman—it was in vain that during a few moments of stormy passion she Mary attaches avowed her determination to re- her signature, nounce her life rather than her crown. The necessities of the moment were inevitable, and the scowling countenance of Lindsay, as he laid before her the fatal instruments, shadowing out as it were the doom awaiting her if she should persist in her resolution, overcame her repugnance, and forced her, with trembling hand and eyes filled with tears, to attach her signature to the documents which stripped her of her authority, and brought to a close the first act of this most tragic history of the beautiful, but erring and suffering, daughter of the house of Stewart.

From the now uncrowned queen Lord Lindsay hastened to the Keeper of the Privy Seal, in order that this being affixed to the resignation, the apparent validity of the document might be complete. The keeper, however, Thomas Sinclair, having protested that the signature had been obtained by compulsion, and was therefore invalid, Lindsay resorted to his usual brutal violence, assaulted Sinclair's house, tore the seal from his hands, and forced him to attach it to the documents he had brought.*

On the evening of the 25th of July, the abdication of Queen Mary, and the ap- Abdication proclaimed, July 25. pointment of a regency, were pro- claimed, July 25. claimed at the Cross of Edinburgh. No time was now lost by the confederate lords, and every preparation was made for the immediate coronation of the youthful prince. Invitations were issued to the English ambassador and the Hamiltons to be present at this ceremony. From both parties, however, were received courteous but decided refusals. Throckmorton stated that the whole proceedings were contrary to the wishes of his sovereign, and would certainly occasion her extreme displeasure. The Hamiltons reminded the lords that they had taken no part in these contests, and declined to countenance the contemplated proceedings. They offered, indeed, no opposition to the course proposed, but intimated their wish, which was allowed, to present a formal protest that this coronation should not be considered as in any way prejudicial to the claims of the Duke of Chatelherault as next heir to the crown.

The High Church at Stirling having been selected as the place where the coronation should be held, the lords and ecclesiastical leaders early repaired to that city. Here disputes arose as to the manner in which the ceremony should be performed. Some contended, and Knox among the number, that the prince should not be anointed, but simply crowned,—“anointing being a Jewish rule, and abrogated by the Gospel dispensation.” On the other hand, it was argued that the anointing was not a superstition, but “an ancient solemnity,” recognised universally throughout Christendom, and ought not therefore on this occasion to be

* Melvil's Declaration, Hopetoun MSS., Throckmorton to the Queen, July 18, 1567.

* Mr. Riddell, in Blackwood's Magazine, October, 1817.

omitted. This opinion ultimately prevailed. Every effort was made by the confederate lords to render Coronation of the ceremonial effective and imposing. The church, which is now known as the West Kirk, is a magnificent Gothic fabric of hewn stone, with an arched roof, supported by two rows of plain but massive pillars. A procession was formed from the castle to the church, in which the Earl of Atholl bore the crown, the Earl of Morton the sceptre, and the Earl of Glencairn the sword. The infant prince, who was then but fourteen months old, was carried in the arms of the Earl of Mar. The ceremony lasted from two till five in the afternoon, and was inaugurated by the reading of the deeds of abdication. Knox preached the sermon; Bothwell, Bishop of Orkney, performed the "anointing;" the crown was held over the king's head by the Earl of Mar, and his infant hands were made to touch the sword and sceptre. The Earl of Morton and Lord Home took the oaths on the Gospels on behalf of their sovereign, that he would maintain the Reformed faith, and root out heresy; the lords swore allegiance by placing their hands on his head; the burgesses followed their example; and at the conclusion of the protracted ceremonial, the infant king was carried back to the castle by the Earl of Mar. Loud rejoicings in the capital celebrated the consummation of this event; and at night bonfires blazed, and the protracted revels bore witness to the general satisfaction of the people.*

As had been predicted by the English ambassador, the intelligence of these astounding events was received by his sovereign with alarm and anger. Although in no inconsiderable degree to blame for the circumstances which excited her wrath, she pretended that her whole line of conduct had pointed to results of an opposite character. Ever working out her dark and selfish policy towards Scotland, no sooner did that policy develop itself in disastrous consequences, than she hastened to exculpate herself, protesting that she was the aggrieved party, and simulating a well-enacted surprise, or even a righteous indignation.

In the present instance her tone was loud and threatening. She prohibited Throckmorton, her ambassador, from holding official relations with men who had treated her counsels with marked and contemptuous indifference, and vowed that "she would make herself a party against them, to the revenge of their sovereign and an example to all posterity."† At the time when these letters were delivered, Morton, Mar, Glencairn, Home, and Lethington arrived in Edinburgh, in order to be on the spot when the Regent Moray should land, to whom they had dispatched an envoy, informing him of his high appointment. Obedient to his instructions, Throckmorton refrained from holding any intercourse with them. He was visited, however, by the Comptroller, Tullibardine, brother-in-law of the Earl of Mar, and one of the council of regency. This interview was the occasion of some most astounding revelations, made voluntarily on the part of Tullibardine, as to the treachery of the Hamiltons, hitherto regarded as the most devoted of the queen's adherents.

Extraordinary revelations of the treachery of the Hamilton party.

"Within the last forty-eight hours," said the Comptroller, "the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, on the part of the Hamiltons, has proposed to us to put the queen to death. They have recommended this course as the only certain method of reconciling all parties; and on our consenting to adopt it, they are ready to join us to a man, and to bring Argyle and Huntley along with them."

Throckmorton, a man of honour and integrity, was inexpressibly shocked at this statement, and ventured to express his doubts as to its authenticity. He reminded his informant that there was nothing to be gained by the queen's death, but much by her life,—as being divorced from the infamous Bothwell, she could be induced to marry a son of the duke's or one of Argyle's brothers. To this Tullibardine replied: "My lord ambassador," said he, "these matters you speak of have been in question amongst them, but now they see not so good an outgain by any of those devices as by the queen's death. For she being taken away, they account but the little king betwixt them and home,* who may die. They love not the queen, and they know she hath no great fancy to any of them; and they fear her the more because she is young and may have many children, which is the thing they would be rid of." In the evening of the same day, Throckmorton was visited by Secretary Lethington, who substantially confirmed the statements made previously by Tullibardine. The conversation which then ensued has been minutely detailed in a letter from the ambassador to his royal mistress, and its discovery we owe, like many other documents which have thrown new light on this important period of our history, to the indefatigable exertions of Mr. Tytler. This conversation is of too interesting a character not to be given in the words of its recorder. "The same day," says he, speaking of the events of the 7th of August, "the Lord of Lethington came to visit me, on behalf of all the lords. He demanded of me when I heard from your majesty, and what was the matter why I had sent to Stirling for audience. I answered, to let the lords and him understand what your majesty did think of their rash proceedings; finding the matter very strange in this hasty sort to proceed with a queen, their sovereign, being a prince anointed, not having imparted their intent to your majesty. For answer, the Laird of Lethington said, 'My lord ambassador, these lords did think their cause could suffer no delays; and as for imparting their purposes to the queen's majesty your sovereign,

* Throckmorton to Elizabeth, July 31, 1567.

† Instructions to Throckmorton, July 27.

* Home means here the succession to the throne, to which the Hamiltons were the nearest heirs after Mary and her son.

they doubted that neither she would allow that such was meet for them to do, neither could take any of their doings in good part. And where you have charged us with deprivation of the queen from her royal estate, it doth appear by such instruments as I sent you from Stirling, that we have not denuded the queen of her royalty, but she hath voluntarily relinquished the same to her son.' 'I asked him,' continued Throckmorton, 'What free will there might be, or uncompulsory consent, for a prisoner, and such an one as every day looked for to lose her life?' 'Yea,' said he, 'it is you that seek to bring it to pass, what show soever the queen your mistress, or you do make to save her life, or set her at liberty. For the Hamiltons and you concur together; you have nothing in your mouths but liberty, and nothing less in your hearts. My lord ambassador, I have heard what you have said unto me; I assure you, that if you should use this speech unto them which you do unto me, all the world could not save the queen's life three days to an end; and as the case now standeth, it will be much ado to save her life.' 'I said, 'My Lord of Lethington, if you remember, I told you at my first coming hither, when I understood you minded the coronation of her son, that when you had touched her dignity you would touch her life shortly after.' 'Well, my lord,' said he, 'I trust that you do not take me to be one that doth thirst my sovereign's blood, or that would stain my conscience with the shedding of the same? You know how I have proceeded with you since your coming hither. I have given you the best advice I could to prevent extremity; and either the queen your sovereign will not be advised, or you do forbear to advise her. I say unto you, as I am a Christian man, if we which dealt in this action would consent to take the queen's life from her, all the lords which hold out and lie aloof from us, would come and conjoin with us within these two days. This morning the Bishop of St. Andrew's and the Abbot of Kilwinning, have sent a gentleman unto us for that purpose. And likewise the Earl of Huntley hath sent to Duncan Forbes within this hour, to conclude with us upon the same ground; and, to be plain with you, there be very few among ourselves which be of any other opinion.'"

This acknowledgment on the part of Lethington, frank as it was terrible, drew from Throckmorton urgent remonstrances against proceeding to such a desperate extremity. To this it was replied by the secretary, that such a course would never find an advocate in him; but said he, "'How can you satisfy men that the queen shall not become a dangerous party against them, in case she live and come to liberty?' I said, 'Divorce her from Bothwell.' He said, 'We cannot bring it to pass: she will in nowise hear of the matter.'" Here terminated this remarkable conversation, somewhat abruptly, owing to the arrival of Sir James Balfour to summon Lethington to the council.* It thus appears that Mary was at this time placed in circumstances of extreme peril. Relentlessly pursued by her enemies, she was even more endangered by the falsehood, treachery, ambition, and cold-blooded cruelty of her once boasted friends, and apparently most devoted adherents. One only chance of saving her life appeared to remain to this forlorn queen, and that depended on the disposition of her "brother," the newly appointed regent. With what anxious solicitude must the poor beleaguered prisoner have expected his arrival! The eyes, indeed, of the nation were directed to Moray as their only hope. They were growing weary of this state of inquietude and suspense—all things falling into wreck and chaos, the vessel of the State drifting visibly towards shoals and quicksands; and it was a source of satisfaction and comfort, that the helm of government was about to be assumed by a man of such capacities and spirit as the Earl of Moray.

On the first intimation being made to him of his election to the regency, Moray prepared instantly to leave France, and embark for Departure of Moray from France. his native country. It may be presumed that the nature of the policy to be adopted by the new governor was anxiously debated both at home and abroad. At home, the question whether he would support the queen or unite with her adversaries against her, was the subject of agitating conjecture. Nor was it easy to determine what course he would pursue, as it was some time before reported that he approved of the designs of the confederates; though, as they were extremely anxious to gain him, this may have been merely a rumour industriously circulated from partisan motives; and latterly he had decidedly sided with the queen, sending over his servant from France with expressions of sympathy and offers of service. Abroad, it was equally important to France and to England that the policy of the regent should be in accordance with the principles which led each country to labour for the establishment of an ascendant influence in the counsels of Scotland. Accordingly, each court anxiously endeavoured to obtain from him an expression of his views favourable to their plans. We have seen what munificent offers the French government made to gain him over to its interests, and how all those brilliant offers were resolutely refused. This circumstance induced that court to throw in his way every obstacle in their power to hinder his departure,—their fears suggesting the not unnatural suspicion that overtures had already been made to him on the part of England, which he was disposed to entertain. From this difficulty Moray escaped with his usual adroitness. Refraining from committing himself by any promise, he assured the king in general terms that he would be faithful to his sovereign, and in all his actions to consult her true interests. With this understanding, he departed from court, accompanied by Monsieur de Lignerolles, who apparently had no other object in view than the conveyance of a message from his sovereign to the associated lords; but whose real object was to watch the conduct of the regent, and if possible prevent his interview with the English queen. Although this was impossible, yet, on account of a circumstance which happened shortly before the departure of Moray, his interview with

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Throckmorton to Elizabeth, 9th of August, 1567.

His interview with Elizabeth. Elizabeth was extremely unsatisfactory. This was the intelligence communicated to him by Elphinstone, whom he had sent with letters to Mary, that conclusive proofs of her guilt had been discovered, and that he himself had seen and read an epistle from her to her fugitive husband, by which it was unquestionably shown that she had been an accomplice in the murder of Darnley.*

Such tidings could not fail to leave the most unpleasant impressions on the mind of Moray, prejudicing him against his sovereign, and proportionably inducing him to put a more favourable construction on the conduct of the confederates. Elizabeth, it was well known, was making loud protestations of indignant sorrow at the ignominious treatment of their sovereign by the Scottish rebels, and of her determination at all hazards to effect her delivery. On explaining, however, her projects to the Earl of Moray, she was met on his part by such manifest coldness and indifference as to rouse the anger of Elizabeth, and lead her to indulge in some hasty expressions, which Moray construed into threats. This language was resented by him, and they parted with feelings of mutual distrust.

After an absence of five months, Moray returned

His arrival to Scotland, accompanied by Ligerles, and reached Berwick on the 8th of August. Here he was met and entertained by Bedford, an old friend and ally, and also by the Lord Clerk-Register, Sir James Macgill, and by Sir James Melvil. These gentlemen had been deputed by two opposite factions, into which the confederates were now divided: the one apparently resolved to be satisfied with nothing short of the destruction of the queen; the other, willing to spare her life, and afford her honourable treatment. From Berwick the regent proceeded to Bound Rode, the boundary between the two kingdoms, where he was met by a body of four hundred noblemen and gentlemen. On the 10th, Moray rode to Whittingham, where he was received with great cordiality by Morton and Maitland, in the very house where, a year and a half previously, the murder of Darnley had been discussed. This strange coincidence, however, by no means prevented Maitland and Morton from echoing the expressions of abhorrence which the regent used in speaking of that infamous transaction, and promising to aid him in making every exertion to bring the murderers to justice.

On the 11th of August Moray entered Edinburgh, and was received with the enthusiastic acclamations of the citizens. The regent entered on his duties with great activity, his first object being to make himself acquainted with the character and views of the two factions, whose respective representatives had met ^{His entrance into Edinburgh,} him at Berwick. On that occasion he had refused to commit himself to either party, alleging his resolution to inquire into and judge personally of the state of matters. This he endeavoured to do during the first few days after his arrival. According to the testimony of Throckmorton, Moray seems to have been at this time acting with fairness and sincerity.

The only objection which Moray entertained to the acceptance of the regency, was founded on the rumour which had reached him that the demission of the queen had been extorted from her by threats. In these circumstances, before giving his final answer, he requested the confederates to allow him to visit her at Lochleven. This request they were at first unwilling to grant; but fear of the consequences of their refusal at length induced them to consent.

On the 15th of August, Moray, accompanied by Morton, Atholl, and Lindsay, proceeded to Lochleven, and were admitted into the presence of the captive queen. They were received ^{Moray's interview with Mary at Lochleven, 15th Aug.} with tears, and many bitter complaints respecting the unworthy treatment to which she had been subjected. Both before and after supper Mary conversed privately with Moray, endeavouring to sound his intentions, pathetically reminding him of her grievances, alluding to the affection she had always entertained for him, craving his protection from the malice of her enemies, and relying, as she said, with confidence on his wisdom and generosity. To all this Moray at first made no reply.* Implored, however, to speak plainly, whatever might be the nature of his communications, Moray reminded her of the whole history of her past reign and life: the shameful manner in which the kingdom had been misgoverned—her own imprudent and criminal conduct—the murder of Darnley—the mock trial of Bothwell—her love for that abandoned and dishonoured man—her disgraceful marriage—the indignation of her subjects—the misfortunes that had now overtaken her—and, lastly, the determination of some of the confederates to bring her to an ignominious trial, the consequences of which might be fatal to her liberty—perhaps to her life. His manner in delivering his sentiments was severe, his language bitter, and almost fierce. "He behaved himself," remarks Throckmorton, "rather like a ghostly father unto her, than a counsellor."† This conversation detained them till past midnight, and he at length left her, "leaving her that night in hope of nothing but God's mercy."‡

In the morning, Moray had a second interview with Mary, in which, seeing that she was now completely subdued, he gave her some hopes that her life might be preserved. He could not, he said, assure her of her liberty, as that lay not

* Throckmorton to the Queen, Keith, vol. ii. p. 734.

† Ibid.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Norris to Cecil.

Engraved by

W. Edwards.

The Assassination.

THE REGENT MURRAY.

OBIT 1570.

From the Original at Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh.

within his power; "neither was it good for her to seek it, nor presently for her to have it, for many respects." This speech re-assured the queen, and gave her much comfort. She expressed her gratitude, took him in her arms and kissed him, and urged upon him the acceptance of the regency. This was a step, he said, which many reasons induced him to decline. After some time spent in pressing him to assume the government, he at length consented; and she committed to his keeping her jewels and other valuable articles, offering at the same time to sign any papers which might be required for the establishment of his authority. On his departure, she again embraced him lovingly, and shed many tears, charging him to give her blessing to the prince her son.*

Leaving Lochleven, Moray repaired to Stirling, Moray declared on a visit to the prince. From thence he returned to Edinburgh regent,
 Aug. 22, 1567.

on the 19th of August, and the next day was proclaimed regent with the usual ceremonies. His inauguration into this high office took place within the council chamber of the Tolbooth. Here assembled the lords temporal and spiritual, the lords of the secret council, and the commissioners of burghs. The instruments granted by the queen were first read. After this, the regent delivered an address, in which he declared his own abilities to be inferior to the great trust which was now made over to him; but expressed his determination to discharge it with all fidelity, to the best interests of the prince and the country. He then took an oath on the Gospels, His oath. that he would serve God according to his word, revealed in the Old and New Testaments; that he would maintain the national form of religion as then adopted; that he would govern the people according to the ancient and loveable laws of the kingdom; procure peace, repress all wrong, maintain justice and equity, and root out from the realm all heretics and enemies to the Church of God.†

Shortly after his solemn inauguration into the office of regent, Moray had an interview with the English ambassador, Throckmorton. At this interview Maitland of Lethington was present. The envoy of Elizabeth lost no time in expressing the indignation of his mistress at the late events, and especially at the conduct of the confederate lords. Maitland, in a spirited address, vindicated himself and those associated with him. He disclaimed all intentions of proceeding to extremities with Mary. "So far from it," said he, "Mr. Ambassador, we wish her to be queen of all the world; but now she is in the state of a person in the delirium of a fever, who refuses everything which may do her good, and requires all that may work her harm. Be assured nothing will be more prejudicial to her interest than for your mistress to precipitate matters. It may drive us to a strait, and compel us to measures we would gladly avoid. Hitherto have we been content to be charged with grievous and infamous titles; we have quietly suffered ourselves to be condemned as rebels and unnatural traitors, rather than proceed to anything that may touch our sovereign's honour. But beware, we beseech you, that your mistress, by her continued threats and defamations—by hostility, or by soliciting other princes to attack us, do not push us beyond endurance. Think not we will lose our lives, forfeit our lands, and be challenged as rebels throughout the world, when we have the means of justifying ourselves. And if there be no remedy, but your mistress will have war, sorry though we be, for rather will we stake our fortunes than put our queen to liberty in her present mood, resolved as she is to retain and to defend Bothwell, to hazard the life of her son, to peril the realm, and to overthrow her nobility. For your wars we know them well:—you will burn our borders, and we shall burn yours; if you invade us, we do not dread it, and are sure of France. For your practices to nourish dissensions among us, we have an eye upon them all. The Hamiltons will take your money, laugh you to scorn, and side with us. At this moment we have the offer of an agreement with them in our hands. The queen, your mistress, declares she wishes not only for our sovereign's liberty, and her restoration to her dignity, but is equally zealous for the preservation of the king, the punishment of the murderer, and the safety of the lords. To accomplish the first—the queen's liberty—much has been done; for the rest, absolutely nothing. Why does not her majesty fit out some ships of war, to apprehend Bothwell, and pay a thousand soldiers to reduce the forts and protect the king? When this is in hand, we shall think her sincere; but for her charge to set our sovereign at liberty, and restore her to her dignity, it is enough to reply to such strange language, that we are the subjects of another prince, and know not the queen's majesty for our sovereign."*

This language was by no means pleasing to Throckmorton, who, turning to Moray, said he trusted that such sentiments were not approved of on his part. To this the regent replied—"Truly, my lord ambassador, methinks you have had reason at the Laird of Lethington's hands. It is true that I have not been at the past doings of these lords, yet I must commend what they have done; and seeing the queen, my sovereign, and they have laid on me the charge of the regency, a burden I would gladly have avoided, I am resolved to maintain their action, and will reduce all men to obedience in the king's name, or it shall cost me my life."†

Throckmorton now perceived that his further residence in Scotland was useless. Departure of Elizabeth accordingly gave him the English ambassador. permission to return, after he had again addressed a remonstrance to the confede-

* Throckmorton to the Queen, Keith, vol. ii. p. 734.

† Anderson's Collections, vol. ii. pp. 252, 253.

* Throckmorton to Elizabeth, Keith, vol. ii. p. 744.

† Ibid.

rates, and in vain requested leave to visit Mary in her confinement. On the 29th of August he took his departure for England.

The regent commenced his reign by taking the Measures taken most active and energetic mea- to apprehend sures with a view to the capture of Bothwell. Bothwell. "He went stoutly to work," says Throckmorton, "resolved rather to imitate those who had led the people of Israel than any captains of that age." Bothwell, it seems, after skulking about for some time, a wretched fugitive, had fled to Orkney, and turned pirate. Murray of Tullibardine, with the Laird of Grange and three armed ships, were dispatched in pursuit of him. It may be perhaps as well to mention in this place the fate of this wretched man, with whom, so far as the history of Scotland is concerned, we

Fate shall have no more to do. Accord- ing to Lord Herries, Bothwell fled from Orkney to Denmark. There, being recognised by some Scotch merchants, they informed the regent of his presence in that country. Moray, on hearing this, instantly sent a message to the King of Denmark to put him to death, "for an example to all that shall attempt a prince's life." This request was not complied with; his life was spared; but it was made so miserable as to be rendered more unendurable than a thousand deaths. He was thrown into a loathsome dungeon, "where none had access to him but those that carried to him such scurvy meat and drink as was allowed, which was given him in at a little window. Here he was kept ten years, till, being overgrown with hair and filth, he went mad, and died—a just punishment for his wickedness."*

The regent's next anxiety was to secure the kingdom in the name of the prince, and persuade the people to recognise his authority. This he managed with his usual ability and dexterity. He had at one time great suspicions of the designs of the Hamiltons, who had made a show of opposing him when he assumed the regency. But whatever might have been their intentions, they were unable to give effect to them, in consequence of their acting without a leader and without a plan. The next

Balfour sur- renders the Castle of Edinburgh. step was to obtain possession of the Castle of Edinburgh, retained in the hands of the notorious Sir James Balfour—one of the most unprincipled and profligate villains of his age or country. Beyond doubt, Balfour was one of the principal actors in the murder of the king; but, on his consenting to surrender the castle, he not only obtained an ample remission of his crime, but was presented with the sum of five thousand pounds and the Priory of Pittenweem, and his son received an annuity. This was a discreditable transaction, and in some degree to distract public attention from it, great activity was shown in bringing to justice some of the more obscure agents in the murder of Darnley. Among those apprehended were a page of the king's called Durham, John Hay of Tallo John Spens, John Blackater, and James Edmonson.* Of Tallo's guilt there was no doubt; but according to Bedford, in a letter to Cecil, Moray rather repented having brought him to trial, as he laid open the whole conspiracy in its minutest details, "declared who were the executioners of the same, and went so far as to touch a great many, not of the smallest."†

So perplexing was the position in which the regent found himself, that he suppressed Tallo's examination, and remanded him back to prison. The regent next made himself master of the Castle of Dunbar, which was still held in the name of Bothwell. For a few days the garrison held out, but, being bombarded by Moray, at length surrendered. All the measures taken to secure the safety of the kingdom were crowned with success; and, on the 15th of September, Cecil was informed that everything in Scotland was quiet, and the government of the regent completely established.

On the 15th of December parliament assembled, in compliance with a summons Parliament from the regent. It was attended assembled, by fourteen abbots, twelve earls, sixteen lords and masters,—as the eldest sons of noblemen were then called,—and twenty-seven commissioners of burghs. The discussions were opened by a speech from Secretary Lethington. The subjects, he said, which they had met to consider were of the greatest importance. They were called upon to consult for the establishment of a uniform system of religion; the acknowledgment of the just authority of the king, in consequence of the queen's free demission of the crown in his favour; the sanction to be given to the appointment of a regent to act during the minority of the king; and, lastly, the punishment of the murderers of the late prince. He concluded a spirited address, framed with wonderful adroitness, by an eloquent allusion to the manner in which the Reformed religion had spread during the short period that it had been in existence. "As to religion," said he, "the quietness you presently enjoy declares sufficiently the victory that God, by his word, has obtained among you within a space of eight or nine years; how feeble the foundation was in the eyes of men—how unlikely it was to rise so suddenly to so large and huge a greatness—with what calmness the work has proceeded, not one of you is ignorant. Iron has not been heard in the house of the Lord; that is to say, the whole has been builded, set up, and erected to this greatness without bloodshed. Note it, I pray you, as a singular testimony of God's favour, and a peculiar benefit granted only to the realm of Scotland, not as the most worthy, but chosen out of his Providence from among all nations, for causes hid and unknown to us, and to foreshow his almighty power, that the true religion has attained a free course universally throughout the whole realm, and yet not a Scotsman's blood shed in the forthsetting of the whole quarrel. With what nation in the earth has God dealt so mercifully? Consider the progress of religion, from time to time, in other countries—Germany, Denmark, England, France, Flanders, or where you please; you shall find the lives of many thousands spent before they could purchase the tenth part of that liberty whereunto we have attained, as it were sleeping upon down beds.*

* Historie of the Reigne of Marie Queene of Scots, printed for the Abbotsford Club, p. 96. See Appendix E.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bedford to Cecil.

† Ibid; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 194.

The first business of the parliament was the election of the Lords of the Articles; and this having been done, the three Estates sanctioned the queen's demission of the crown, the king's coronation, and the appointment of Moray to the regency. The next step was the promulgation of a solemn decree abolishing the authority of the Pope, thus ratifying the Act passed to the same effect in the disputed parliament of 1560. It was ordered that the Confession of Faith, formerly approved of, should now be published under the sanction of parliament. Heretics and hearers of mass were declared liable to various penalties—for the first offence confiscation of movables, banishment for the second, and death for the third. Persons who opposed the Confession of Faith, or refused to receive the sacrament after the Presbyterian form, were declared to be no members of the Church of Christ. The examination and admission of ministers were declared to be prerogatives inherent in the Church; but to lay patrons was committed the power of presentation, with an appeal to the General Assembly, if their nomination of a qualified person was not sustained by the ministers and superintendents; and, lastly, all kings, at their coronation, or princes, or magistrates acting in their place, were bound to take the oath for the support of the true Church and the extirpation of heresy.†

The question as to the restoration of the Church lands next came before the parliament. But this was by no means one easy of settlement. The laymen who had appropriated these lands exhibited a determination to retain them in their own hands, and with difficulty consented to restore a third of the benefices.‡ Some reformation was ordered in the schools and colleges, and the regulation was adopted that no teachers should be admitted but such as had been examined and approved by the appointed visitors and superintendents. Lastly, in regard to ecclesiastical matters, it was resolved that as concerned the preaching of the Word, the reformation of manners, and the administration of the sacraments, no other powers should be acknowledged than those which were now claimed by the Presbyterian church.§

These matters were arranged with great unanimity. But the question of the queen's guilt or in-

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, in Lethington's own handwriting.

† Spottiswood, p. 214; Maitland, vol. ii. p. 1004; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 200.

‡ Maitland, vol. ii. p. 1007.

§ Ibid.

nocence gave rise to conflicting opinions, awakened angry feelings, and occasioned debates of great violence. It was by one party argued that she ought to be brought at once to a public trial, and, if convicted, that she should be punished as the laws directed. This point was freely discussed, some going so far as to assert that the sovereign was not amenable to any earthly tribunal for any crime of which she might be guilty, and that she was accountable for her conduct to God alone. After a stormy debate, it was resolved that an Act of indemnity should be passed indemnifying

the confederate lords for all the proceedings they had taken against the queen, and resolving that her imprisonment should be continued. In this Act we find mention made of those letters to Bothwell, alleged to be in the handwriting of Mary, of which so much use was afterwards made during her trial. The Act made those letters the foundation of its exoneration of the lords. It stated that they should never be subjected to prosecution for what they had done; because, if the queen were confined, it was solely in consequence of her own fault and demerit; seeing that, by several of her private letters, written wholly with her own hand, and sent by her to Bothwell, it was most certain that she was cognisant, art and part, of the murder of the king, her husband. This Act having been ordered to be printed, the parliament was dissolved.* Whether the mystery that attaches to these letters will ever be cleared up is doubtful. They had been given up to the regent by the Earl of Morton, as appears from an Act of the Council, dated the 16th of September, 1568. But while Moray was thus placed in possession of proofs which were alleged to criminate his sovereign, he was also in a condition to bring home the murder of the king to several of the most distinguished of the confederate lords. It appears that the infamous bond which was drawn up with a view to that bloody deed, and which implicated Huntley, Argyle, Lethington, and Balfour, was intrusted to the governor of Edinburgh Castle for safe custody, and when the latter surrendered the castle, that bond, with the cognizance of Moray, was destroyed, while the letters criminating Mary were preserved. This we learn from a letter addressed by Drury to Cecil, in which he says, "The writings which did comprehend the name and consents of the chief for the murdering of the king is burned into ashes, the same not unknown to the queen; and the same that concerns her part kept to be shown, which offends her." On the other hand, it is strange to find Drury in the same letter observing that "Moray made fair weather with Mary, and was dealing very soundly and uprightly."†

The Regent now determined that the criminals formerly arrested as accomplices in the king's murder should be brought to trial. They were four in number; Hay of Tallo; Hepburn of Bolton; George Dalglish, a page; and

* Goodall, vol. ii. p. 62—69. † Tytler, vol. vii. p. 204.

William Powrie, servant to Bothwell. It was natural that this trial should be looked forward to with the greatest expectations. It was confidently reported that revelations would then be made implicating some of the highest persons in the land, as it was generally believed that the whole details had been made known by Captain Cullen, who had lately been executed. In this, however, the public were disappointed. Nothing was revealed at the trial which was not already well known. The trial and execution occupied only one day; and the only declaration publicly made was that given forth on the scaffold, in his last moments, by Hepburn of Bolton, to the effect that the bond had been signed by Argyle, Huntley, and Lethington. The indignation of the people was very great when they found that no steps were taken, or likely to be taken, to bring to justice the more prominent criminals; who, in fact, from the deplorable state of the law, and the defective character of the administration of justice, as well as their own exalted station and great power and influence, found themselves in a position from which not even the regent, armed with all the authority of the law, could displace them. The punishment of these men, indeed, great offenders as they undoubtedly were, was, humanly speaking, impossible. The people, however, felt the disappointment bitterly; but showed their displeasure in a very harmless manner, by attaching handbills and pasquinades to the doors of the Privy Council and the regent's house. The following is an example: "Queritur :—Why John Hepburn and John Hay of Tallo, are not compelled to declare openly the manner of the king's slaughter, and who consented thereunto."

On this and various other grounds the government of the regent had already become unpopular. Many of the nobility also were alienated. The Hamiltons had ever feared him; Herries was not to be trusted; Balfour had retired in disgust; Morton, Lethington, and Atholl, were disaffected. But an event now took place which threatened to inflict a fatal blow on his authority. This was the escape of Queen Mary from her imprisonment at Lochleven. Mary had exerted herself from the first in endeavouring to excite the compassion of her keepers. Among those who were greatly interested in her fate, and attached themselves with a fidelity that never wavered to her falling fortunes, was George Douglas, the younger brother of Lochleven, and son of Lady Douglas, who kept the castle. It has been asserted that Mary, by her

"flatteries and caresses," tempted this youth to aspire to her hand, and induced him to devote himself heart and soul to effect her deliverance. We have no reason to suppose that there is any truth in this allegation. It is perfectly gratuitous. There is not a particle of evidence in its favour left us by contemporary writers; and it is not to be supposed that, if there had been any foundation for this statement, such a man as the historian Buchanan would have omitted to notice it, seeing how greatly it would have reflected on a queen whom he has invariably sought occasion to disparage. George Douglas was nine years younger than Mary, and the explanation of his conduct given by Buchanan is perfectly rational, and consistent with the circumstances of the case. "Douglas," he says, "having a promise of indemnity from the queen for himself and his partisans, and being excited with the hopes of great wealth and power for the future, had resolved to effect the deliverance of the queen." The enterprise, however, was not of easy achievement, for the queen was guarded with the most jealous care. In a letter which she wrote to Catherine de Medici, the queen-mother of France, she thus expresses herself:—"I am so closely watched, that I have no leisure but during their dinner, or when they sleep, for their daughters sleep with me." In terms almost similar, but more significant, she had written to the Archbishop of Glasgow—"I have neither paper nor time to write further, except to beg the king, the queen, and my uncles, to burn my letters; for if they know that I have written, it will cost the lives of many, and put me more in danger, and cause me to be confined more closely." An attempt had already been made on the part of George Douglas to effect the escape of Mary, but had failed. Mary's attempted flight from prison—her failure. She had nearly succeeded in making good her flight from prison in the disguise of a laundress, when she was discovered and recognised by the remarkable whiteness and beauty of her hands. It appears that no other precautions were adopted to guard against her escape, after this warning, than the banishment of Douglas from the castle. The queen, however, was determined to be free. Douglas was enthusiastically devoted to her cause, and continued to communicate with Mary by means of a page called Little Douglas, though it does not appear that he had much right to the family name. To the adroitness of this page Mary was indebted for her liberty. "On the evening of the 2nd of May," says Mr. Tytler, "this youth, in placing a plate before the Castellan, contrived to drop his napkin over the key of the gate of the castle, and carried it off unperceived. He hastened to the queen, and hurrying down to the outer gate, they threw themselves into the little boat which lay there for the service of the garrison. At that moment, Lord Seton and some of her friends were intently observing the castle from their concealment on a neighbouring hill; a party waited in the village below; while, nearer still, a man lay

* Another example may be given from a MS., State Paper Office, which bore the title of "A letter sent by Maddé to my Lord Regent and the haill Estates :—"

"My lordes all, the king is slain,—

Revenge his cause in hand,

Or else your doing is all in vain,

For all your general band.

If ye shall punish but simple men,

And let all the principal pass,

Then God and man shall you misken,

And make you therefore base."

Tytler, vol. vii. p. 208.

watching on the brink of the lake. They could see

Mary makes a female figure, with two attendants, glide swiftly from the outer gate. It was Mary herself, who, breathless with delight and anxiety, sprang into the boat, holding a little girl, one of her maidens, by the hand; while the page, by locking the gate behind them, prevented immediate pursuit. In a moment her white veil with its broad red fringe, the concerted signal of success, was seen glancing in the sun. The sign was recognised and communicated; the little boat, rowed by the page and the queen herself, touched the shore; and Mary, springing out with the lightness of recovered freedom, was received, first by George Douglas, and almost instantly after by Lord Seton and his friends."*

Having thus adroitly effected her escape, Mary instantly took horse, hastened to the Ferry, and proceeded without drawing bridle to Niddry Castle, having been joined on the road by Lord Claud Hamilton with fifty horse. Here she rested for a few hours, wrote to her friends in France, dispatched Hepburn of Riccarton to Dunbar, with the hope that this fortress might be delivered into her hands, and directed him to proceed afterwards to Denmark, and carry to Bothwell the news of her deliverance. She then proceeded to Hamilton, where for the present she felt assured of her safety.

The tidings of Mary's escape flew like wildfire through the country, and in many districts were heard with enthusiastic expressions of loyalty and devotion. Numbers crowded to her court at Hamilton. Among the rest were the Earls of Argyle, Cassillis, Eglington, and Rothes; the Lords Somerville, Yester, Livingston, Herries, Fleming, Ross, and Borthwick. Finding herself thus supported, and at the head of upwards of six thousand men, Mary adopted the boldest measures. First, she assembled her council, and declared to them that she had been coerced into signing the instruments which deprived her of her rights as a sovereign. An act was immediately passed by the council, stigmatising as treasonable and void the steps taken by the confederates to procure Mary's demission of the crown,

* Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 211, 212. It is traditionally stated that, as soon as the queen's flight was discovered, a shot was fired from the castle, which fortunately missed the boat. The page threw the keys of the castle into the lake, and they lay in the bed of Lochleven till 1805, when they were found by a boy wading on the margin of the lake, at the close of a very dry autumn, when the water was uncommonly low. The keys were covered with rust, and fastened by an iron ring, which mouldered when rubbed by the hand. The boy carried them to the schoolmaster of Kinross, who sent them to George, sixteenth Earl of Morton, heritable keeper of Lochleven. The keys of Lochleven Castle are now in the Museum of the Antiquarian Society, Edinburgh. The spot where Mary landed is on the south side of the lake, and is well known as Mary's Knoxe. At the east end of the adjoining parish of Cleish there is a bridge over the Gairney rivulet, which falls into Lochleven, with a stone inserted in it by the late Right Hon. William Adam, Lord Chief Commissioner of the Jury Court in Scotland, having an inscription marking the route by which Mary fled after her escape.

the coronation of the prince, and the establishment of the regency. Nor was this all; a bond was at the same time drawn up, pledging all who adhered to it to fight to the last in defence of their queen; and to this bond were attached the signatures of nine earls, nine bishops, eighteen lords, twelve abbots and priors, and nearly one hundred barons.

Meanwhile, the situation of the regent, who was then at Glasgow, was of the most critical nature. The city was only eight miles from Hamilton, and deserters were every moment passing over from his own camp to the more popular standard of the sovereign. At this time, he received a message from the queen couched in a friendly spirit, and making overtures for entering into negotiations. It was now that the remarkable character of Moray exhibited itself as fully equal to the emergencies of his position. He was advised to retreat. "Retreat," he said, with the decision of a man rapid in the calculation of consequences, "must not for a moment be contemplated. It is certain ruin; it will be construed into flight; and every hour's delay will strengthen the queen, and discourage our adherents. Our only chance is an instantaneous attack, before Huntley, Ogilvy, and the northern men, have joined the royal force."*

The regent, however, by pretending to deliberate upon the offers of negotiation, secured a brief interval for completing his preparations. He then issued a proclamation, calling upon all men to assist him in maintaining the government of the king; sending, at the same time, information to his friends and adherents. These measures were in part successful. In a remarkably short space of time he was joined by Morton, Glencairn, and Lennox, and their respective forces. Men and cannon were dispatched from Stirling by the orders of the Earl of Mar; the cavalry, though not numerous, were commanded by a veteran of great experience and military talents—Kirkcaldy of Grange. In ten days the regent found himself at the head of four thousand men. In the meantime, John Beaton was dispatched by Mary into England and France, to request the assistance of their respective courts. Elizabeth, on hearing of the queen's escape, at once sent Dr. Leighton into Scotland, with orders to assure Mary that she rejoiced in her deliverance from captivity, and would assist her to regain her rights provided she would be guided by her counsels, and would reject the interference of all foreign powers. As to the court of France, there happened to be present in the camp of the queen its representative, Monsieur de Beaumont, who had come over with the intention of seeing her previous to her escape.

The policy which Mary proposed to follow in her present critical circumstances was cautious and prudent. She was anxious to avoid an encounter with the enemy, and proposed to retire to Dunbarton, a fortress in possession of her adherents. In this step, however, she was opposed by the Hamiltons, who, presumptuously relying on the superiority of their forces, determined to take advantage of an opportunity which might never again present itself, of dealing a fatal blow at the government of the regent, and involving his authority and himself in one common destruction.* So much respect, however, was paid to the remonstrances of the queen, that her army was ordered to begin its march in the direction of Dunbarton. Moray's forces were advantageously posted on the lands of Barrowfield, near Rutherglen bridge over the Clyde, and in the immediate vicinity of Glasgow. The regent occupied the north side of the river; the queen moved along the south. Intelligence being received on the morning of the 13th of May that the royal forces were moving along the south bank, Kirkaldy of Grange, who was well acquainted with the ground, immediately forded the river with a hag-butter mounted behind every trooper, and posted them in the manner of modern sharpshooters and riflemen among the numerous cottages and hedges which abounded in that locality. The spot where the battle was fought was in the neighbourhood of the little village of Langside—the hill overlooking which was occupied by the forces of the regent, who crossed the river soon after Grange.† On the advance of the royal army, two thousand men, headed by Lord Claud Hamilton, endeavoured to force the position of Kirkaldy; but were so warmly received by a well-directed fire, as to be almost instantly compelled to retire with great loss. Rallying, however, under their intrepid leader, they again advanced, and endeavoured bravely to ascend the hill, in front of which they now found themselves. In this attempt they partly succeeded, but at the very moment when they had almost gained the summit, and were already breathless and exhausted with the effort, they were confronted by the flower of the regent's army, which had not yet engaged, and which were led by such distinguished soldiers as Morton, Home, Ker of Cessford, and the gallant Grange. Here a desperate combat took place, of which it is remarked by Sir James Melvil, that so closely were the spears of the pikemen interlaced with each other, that when the men behind threw their discharged pistols and the fragments of shattered spear-staves in the faces of their adversaries, they never fell to the ground, but remained lying upon the pikes.‡ Both parties fought with great courage, and the issue was for some time doubtful. The right wing of the regent's vanguard, consisting of the commons of the barony of Renfrew, began to give way, but were rallied by Grange, who brought up to their assistance a fresh body of troops, under Lindsay, Lochleven, and Sir James Balfour. This reinforcement turned the tide of battle, and threw the ranks of the queen's army into disorder. Moray seized the favourable moment to charge with the main battle; and this well-timed assault upon troops wearied and already half discomfited, threw them into instant confusion, forced them back, and drove them into flight.* The impetuous attack of some two hundred highlanders, "with the leaps and yells peculiar to their mode of fighting," completed the discomfiture of the queen's army. The contest lasted only three quarters of an hour, and the regent, it is said—though this is almost incredible—lost only a single man. Three hundred were reported as having fallen on the queen's side; according to some accounts, only half that number. Ten pieces of cannon were taken, and a number of prisoners. Among those of distinction may be enumerated Lords Seton and Ross; the sons of the Earls of Eglinton and Cassillis; the sheriffs of Ayr and Linlithgow; the lairds of Preston, Innerwick, Pitmilny, Balwearie, Boyne, and Tra-brown; Robert and Andrew Melvil, two sons of the Bishop of St. Andrew's, and a son of the Abbot of Kilwinning, and Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh.†

* Tytler, vol. vii. p. 214.

Battle of Langside, and total defeat of the queen's forces, 13th May.

The unfortunate Mary witnessed this brief but decisive battle from a neighbouring eminence, near the Castle of Cathcart. Up to the year 1790 a hawthorn-tree marked the interesting locality, which being then completely decayed through age, has, we believe, been succeeded by another, to preserve the memory of the place from which the hapless queen witnessed the ruin of her cause. When all suspense was at an end, Mary—as it were a second time dethroned—took refuge in flight; and such was her terror of again falling into the hands of her enemies, that she did not venture to halt till she reached the abbey of Dundrennan, in Galloway, nearly sixty miles from the field of battle.‡ It was here that, contrary to the advice of her faithful friends and servants, Mary came to the fatal resolution of throwing herself upon the protection of Elizabeth. With the view of ascertaining whether she would be generously received by England, Lord Herries, by whom she was accompanied, sent a messenger to Lowther, the deputy governor of Carlisle, to inquire whether his royal mistress might safely take refuge in that city. Before, however, an answer could be received, the irretrievable step was taken. Travel-soiled and weary, she crossed over in a boat to Workington, in Cumberland, where she was recognised by the gentlemen of the country, and conveyed first to Cockermouth, and then to Carlisle. Thus miserably ended what may be called the fourth act of the tragical history of the unfortunate wife, mother, and queen, Mary Stewart.

* Melvil's Memoirs, p. 201.

† This was the assassin of the Regent Moray. Keith, vol. ii. p. 817; MS. State Paper Office, Advertisements of the Conflict in Scotland, May 16, 1568.

‡ MS. State Paper Office, Advertisements of the Conflict in Scotland.

* Melvil's Memoirs, p. 200.

† Ibid., pp. 200, 201; Memoirs of James VI.

‡ Melvil's Memoirs, pp. 200, 201.

LANGSYDE.

Scene of the Defeat of Mary Queen of Scots.

DUNDRENNAN ABBEY

Retreat of Queen Mary after the Battle of Langside.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

REGENCY OF THE EARL OF MORAY.

A.D. 1568—1569.

It is very easy for us, with the record of subsequent events before us, to censure as imprudent the conduct of the unfortunate Mary in taking refuge within the territory of her crafty and unscrupulous enemy. But Mary's character was as remarkable for frankness and rashness as was that of her wily cousin for duplicity and dissimulation; and, notwithstanding all her experience of Elizabeth's treachery, she could not bring herself to believe that a sister sovereign, and a near relative, after solemn and reiterated professions of regard and affection, should receive her, in her present desolate situation, otherwise than with the respect due to her rank, and the commiseration required by her misfortunes. Besides these personal considerations, there were not wanting others sufficient to recommend the step even to less impulsive minds, and stronger and more matured judgments. It was reasonable to suppose that the indignities offered to royalty itself, in the person of Mary, would be resented with instinctive indignation by the sovereign of the sister kingdom; that she would naturally take part with Mary against her rebellious subjects, and assist in re-instating her in her lost authority. To have remained in Scotland was certain imprisonment—perhaps even death itself—whilst an escape to France was difficult, if not impossible. In addition to all this, Elizabeth had publicly intimated her displeasure at the treatment of the Scottish queen by the regent and his party; and, during the period of her imprisonment, had with great apparent earnestness urged her liberation. Elizabeth had even invited her to come to England for protection, promising to meet her in person, and to receive her as became the dignity of a sovereign princess.*

Notwithstanding all these promises, we are now to witness the utter frustration of Mary's hopes, and a base violation of all the promises of the English queen, accompanied and followed by such a series of acts of studied treachery and unrelenting malignity as will continue to stain the name of Elizabeth to the latest posterity.

Before crossing the Solway Frith, Mary had addressed a letter to Elizabeth from Dundrennan Abbey, in the following terms:—"My very dear sister, without giving you a narrative of all my misfortunes, since they must be known to you already, I will tell you that those of my subjects whom I have most benefited, and who are under the greatest obligations to me, after having revolted against me, kept me in prison, and treated me with the utmost indignity, have at last entirely driven me from my kingdom, and reduced me to such a condition that, after God, I have no hope in any one but you."† On her arrival at Workington, Mary wrote again to Elizabeth, representing in strong and affecting language the treatment she had received, and the deplorable condition to which she was now reduced, and requesting her assistance against her enemies. "God," she said, "in his infinite goodness, has preserved me, for I found refuge with Lord Herries, with whom, and some other lords, I am come into your country; being assured that, on learning their cruelty, and how they have treated me, you will, according to your kind disposition, and the trust that I place in you, not only receive me for the preservation of my life, but aid and assist me in my just quarrel, and summon other princes to do the like. It is my earnest request that your majesty will send for me as soon as possible, for my condition is pitiable, not to say for a queen, but even for a simple gentlewoman. I have no other dress than that in which I escaped from the field. My first day's ride was sixty miles across the country, and I have not since dared to travel except by night, as I hope to prove to you, if it pleases you to take pity on my extreme misfortune."‡ At the conclusion of this touching epistle, she signs herself "Your very faithful and affectionate good sister, and escaped prisoner."

On receiving Mary's letter, Elizabeth, unmoved by the distress of the unfortunate queen who had made such touching appeals to her generosity, and regardless of her own professions and promises, immediately issued orders to the sheriffs and justices of the peace of the county of Cumberland, enjoining them indeed to treat the fugitive queen and her attendants with honour and respect, but at the same time charging them to keep strict watch over her, and prevent her escape.†

Elizabeth and her advisers were now greatly perplexed as to what line of conduct they should adopt towards the illustrious fugitive, who had thus so unexpectedly placed herself in their power. Different courses of procedure were submitted for consideration, each of which, and its probable consequences, were examined and discussed with anxious care.§ To re-instate her on the Scottish throne, it was argued, would be to render her more powerful, and therefore more dangerous than ever, especially should she succeed in forming an alliance with France, and renew her pretensions to the throne of England. Nor would permitting her simply to return to Scotland be unattended with hazard, as she had still a numerous and powerful party there, who might again be organised, and obtain the ascendancy. To allow her to escape to France seemed equally perilous. An attempt on the part of the French king to restore to Mary her lost au-

Elizabeth gives orders to prevent Mary's escape.

* Labanoff, vol. ii. pp. 71, 72; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 2.

† Labanoff, vol. ii. pp. 76, 77; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 3.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Tytler, vol. vii. p. 222.

§ Anderson, vol. ii. pp. 34, 39, 102; Robertson, vol. i. p. 393.

* Camd., p. 489; Anderson, vol. iv. pp. 99, 120; Murdin, p. 369; Robertson, vol. i. p. 460.

thority—an event in itself highly probable—would involve the presence of a French army in Scotland, which might become a source of anxiety, if not of danger, to the English queen and her ministers, as well as to the great body of the people, who desired the preservation of the Protestant Church, which would thus be endangered. To allow her the privilege of a free asylum in England seemed more hazardous than all, as she would probably become the rallying point of the Roman Catholic party, who might hatch plots for the subversion of both Church and State.

One other course yet remained, free indeed from all the dangers which appeared so formidable in the plans under discussion for the disposal of the Scottish queen, but, at the same time, contrary to the most solemn pledges repeatedly and voluntarily given by Elizabeth, and at variance with every principle of justice and international law, and every sentiment of humanity—viz. to detain Mary a prisoner in England. Evil counsel and maxims of state policy prevailed, and the unprecedented spectacle was offered to the world of the sovereign of a great nation, and that sovereign a woman, forcibly detaining within her realm an independent princess, who had never injured her, who was, moreover, her near relative, and who had cast herself, in her hour of misfortune and peril, on her generosity and protection. Of this cruel policy, and the treachery and falsehood by which it was accompanied, it is scarcely possible for the Scottish annalist, even at this distance of time, to speak with the unimpassioned calmness which is generally expected from the historian.

In the meantime Elizabeth, with characteristic dissimulation, dispatched Lady Scrope, sister of the Duke of Norfolk, to wait upon Mary; and Lord Scrope, the Warden of the Western Marches, and Sir Francis Knollys, the Vice-Chamberlain, were sent with letters of condolence. Mary, impatient of these formalities, strenuously demanded a personal interview with Elizabeth;

but they replied, that while their mistress sympathised deeply with her in her misfortunes, she could not, consistently with her own honour, admit the Queen of Scots into her presence until she had cleared herself of the horrid imputation publicly made against her of the murder of her own husband. The unsuspecting queen fell at once into the snare thus artfully laid to entangle her. She expressed astonishment at this unexpected objection to her reasonable demand, and protested with indignation against the imputation cast upon her; but, at the same time added, that she was willing to produce before the English queen such proofs of her innocence, as would completely remove the scruples to which they referred. This incautious offer, which, as we shall see, was made an occasion of much subsequent misery to the unfortunate Mary, was eagerly urged in a third letter, which she now wrote to Elizabeth, entreating her without delay to admit her into her presence, and give her an opportunity of vindicating her character from the horrid imputations cast upon it by her enemies. But she added, if any resolution against assisting her had already been formed, she begged that she might be permitted to leave the kingdom as freely as she had entered it. She had sent up, she said, Lord Herries to communicate with the queen, and had dispatched Lord Fleming with a message to France. She remarked that the delay already incurred was most injurious to her cause, and complained of having been detained for fifteen days in the condition of a prisoner. Before concluding she reminded Elizabeth of some circumstances connected with a ring, which she now transmitted along with her letter, and which seems to have contained some device in the shape of a heart, in allusion to which she says, "Remember, I have kept my promise: I have sent you my heart in the ring, and now I have brought to you both heart and body, to knit more firmly the tie that binds us together.*"

Lord Fleming was made the bearer of important letters from Mary to Charles IX., Catherine de Medici, and the Cardinal of Lorraine; in which she begged the court of France to assist her, by sending two thousand men to the relief of Dunbarton, which still held out against the regent, together with money for the maintenance and equipment of five hundred cavalry, with artillery and ammunition, to enable her to regain possession of the other fortresses of Scotland. In her letter to the cardinal, her uncle, which is remarkable at once for its pathos and simplicity, she says, "If you have not pity on me now, I may say with reason that it is all over with my son, my country, and myself; and that I shall be as ill off in another quarter of this country as in Lochleven. I entreat you to consider that my enemies are few, and that all the rest of the nobility are with me; their people begin to desert them, had I ever so little support. For they know well that their quarrel is unjust, and that in Scotland and here, where I have little to say to their calumnies and false reports, they are esteemed traitors and liars; and, on this account, they strive to prevent me from quitting the kingdom and confine me here. * * * I beseech you to hasten to send us some support in earnest. * * * I now commit myself to the competency of the bearer hereof, and beseech you to have compassion for the honour of your poor niece, and provide the assistance which the bearer will mention to you; and, in the meantime, send money, for I have not wherewith to purchase bread, nor linen, nor clothes.

* Anderson, vol. iv., part i., pp. 48—50; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 223.

Mary writes a third time to Elizabeth.

Mary dispatches Lord Fleming with letters to Charles IX., Catherine de Medici, and the Cardinal of Lorraine.

Elizabeth resolves on detaining Mary a prisoner in England.

Mary demands a personal interview with Elizabeth.

Mary offers to refer her cause to Elizabeth.

"The queen has sent me hither a little linen, and provides me with one dish. The rest I have borrowed, but I cannot do so any more. You will participate in this disgrace. * * * God tries me severely : however, rest assured I shall die a good Catholic." *

Mary's hopes of aid, however, were bitterly disappointed; for, though all the continental princes took a lively interest in her cause, yet such was the state of public affairs at that period, that none of them durst venture to interfere actively in her behalf. Charles IX. had just concluded the second civil war, and was making preparations for a third, which proved still more arduous and protracted; and Philip II., to whom Mary had also applied for assistance, was occupied in quelling an insurrection in the Netherlands, and repressing a revolt among the Moors in Granada.†

Mary was not long in discovering that she had committed a fatal error in referring her cause to the judgment of Elizabeth. That wily princess, with a disingenuousness which formed so prominent a feature of her character, now laboured to found on that reference, which was made in unsuspecting confidence to her as a relative and an ally, a claim to bring Mary and her accusers to trial before her as a superior and a judge. Pretending to understand what was merely an offer of explanation to satisfy Elizabeth's private scruples, as an acknowledgment of jurisdiction, she proposed to appoint commissioners to hear both parties; and wrote to the regent, requiring him to authorise proper persons to appear before them on his behalf, and vindicate his conduct in taking up arms against his sovereign. With a view to impart to these proceedings the semblance, at least, of legality, the absurd and almost forgotten claim of superiority over Scotland was revived, so that with or without the consent of the parties, Elizabeth might assume as a right the prerogative of deciding the contest between the Queen of Scots and her accusers.‡ Moray, it is true, had no sooner heard of Mary's taking refuge in England, and of her offer to submit her cause to the judgment of the English queen, than he sent Wood, his secretary, to intimate his willingness to appear in person, accompanied by Morton, to answer any charges made against him, and to produce evidence in justification of his conduct. He even offered to enter himself prisoner in the Tower of London, if he failed to prove to the satisfaction of Elizabeth that Mary had been accessory to the death of her husband.§ Nevertheless, it was not without regret and apprehension that he now felt called on by a mandate which it was dangerous to disobey, to come forward as the public accuser of his sovereign; and to place his own authority, which it had cost him so much effort to establish, and possibly his rank, fortune, and even liberty, on the doubtful hazard of a trial by foreign and irresponsible judges. Elizabeth, however, had no intention to allow the matter to take such a turn as to damage either the regent or his party. Her aim was to stimulate Moray to make public every proof of Mary's guilt which he could possibly produce, in order that she might find a pretext for detaining the Scottish queen as a prisoner, if not for proceeding to greater extremities.

Elizabeth construes Mary's offer of reference into an acknowledgment of jurisdiction, and proposes to appoint commissioners to hear both parties.

In furtherance of her crooked policy, Elizabeth dispatched Mr. Middlemore with a message both to Mary and the regent. She informed the latter that he was accused by his sovereign of the highest crimes which a subject could commit against his prince—rebellion against her authority, imprisonment of her person, and expulsion from her dominions by force of arms; and she enjoined him to forbear "from all manner of hostility and persecution against all such as have lately taken part with the late queen, and to suspend all manner of actions against them both by law and arms." * She added that her royal sister, who would, in the meantime, observe the same abstinence, had committed to her the hearing and ordering of her cause; and required him to produce before her his defences against the crimes laid to his charge.

Middlemore dispatched with messages from Elizabeth to Mary and the regent.

Middlemore reached Carlisle on the 13th June, and on the following morning was admitted to an audience with Queen Mary, in the presence of Scrope and Knollys. He represented to her that the queen, his mistress, could not at present, without compromising her own reputation, admit the Scottish queen into her presence, seeing that she lay under the imputation of the horrid crime of murdering her husband; and that, in fact, it would be prejudicial to Mary's own cause should such an interview take place; for, as Mary herself had constituted the English queen as judge in her cause, such a meeting previous to the trial would give occasion for suspicions of partiality on the part of Elizabeth, which, for the sake of the Queen of Scots, as well as her own, she was anxious to avoid. "But," he added, "if it could please you to forbear until some good trials be made of your innocency, then you would see with what love, with what heart, and with what joy her majesty would both receive you and embrace you, yea, and do everything for you that you could desire." †

Elizabeth refuses Mary a personal interview.

At the mention of the words judge and trial, Mary's indignation was roused. She now clearly saw through the artful policy of the English queen,

* Contemporary copy, British Museum; Sloane MSS., 3199, fol. 341.

† Mignet, vol. ii. p. 6.

‡ Robertson, vol. i. p. 398.

§ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil, May 22, 1568, and June 17, 1568; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 224.

* Letter from Elizabeth to Moray, June 8, 1568; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 227; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 12.

† Letter from Middlemore to Cecil, 14th June, 1568; Anderson, vol. iv. pp. 81, 87; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 13.

and retracted the unfortunate appeal she had made to the judgment of that princess.* "I have no other judge but God!" she exclaimed; "neither can any take upon themselves to judge of me. Of my own free will, indeed, and according to the good trust I reposed in the queen, my sister, I offered to make her the judge of my cause. But how can that be, when she will not suffer me to come to her?" She accused Elizabeth of partiality, inasmuch as she had summoned Moray and the other rebels who had joined him to appear in her presence, to accuse their sovereign, while she refused to that sovereign the like privilege in making her defence. "Whoever heard," she asked, "that subjects and traitors should be permitted to plead against their prince? And yet," she added, "if they must needs come, bid the queen, my sister, call up Morton and Lethington, who are said to know most against me—confront me with them—let me hear their accusations—and then listen to my reply. But I suspect that Lethington would be loath of such an errand."†

Middlemore, somewhat disconcerted at the storm which he had raised, endeavoured to pacify the queen by assuring her that Elizabeth, in this investigation, was chiefly anxious to prove Mary's innocence; and that undoubtedly it would issue in her triumphant acquittal of all the charges brought against her, in the utter discomfiture of her enemies, and her ultimate restoration to her authority as Queen of Scotland. Mary, however, continued to demand a personal interview with Elizabeth, or otherwise to be supplied with assistance, and to be permitted to return to Scotland and punish her rebellious subjects.

It would seem that, from some expressions let fall by Serope and Knollys, Mary had been led to entertain the belief that the proposed investigation would be conducted entirely with a view to clearing her character from the imputations cast upon it; that, in fact, no evidence would be permitted to be brought against her; but, on the contrary, that the proceedings would be so regulated as to criminate her accusers. She was now completely undeceived. She protested vehemently against Moray's being required to repair to England to produce evidence against his sovereign; and, in a letter written to Elizabeth the same day (13th June, 1568), she expresses astonishment that Elizabeth should refuse her an interview on such a frivolous pretext; and inveighs indignantly against the degradation of being confronted, in a judicial investigation, with her own subjects, and rebels too against her authority. "Remove from your mind, madam," she says, "the idea that I came here for the preservation of my life (for neither the world nor the whole of Scotland have rejected me), but I came to regain my honour, and to request aid to chastise my false accusers; not to reply to them, as if they were my equals, but to accuse them before you, whom I chose in preference to all other princes, as being my nearest relative and staunch friend; doing you, as I supposed, an honour in naming you the restorer of a queen, who expected to receive this benefit at your hands. I find, however, to my great regret, that you have put another interpretation on what I have done. * * * I neither can nor will reply to their false accusations, and justify myself as a defendant against my own subjects. They and I, madam, are in no respect on an equality; and, even were I to be kept prisoner here, I would rather die than submit to this indignity."*

This spirited letter, which threatened to frustrate Elizabeth's machinations, she laid before her Privy Council, who determined, notwithstanding Mary's protest and remonstrance, to proceed with the investigation. Elizabeth and her Privy Council resolve to proceed with the trial.

They decided that, until the Queen of Scots had vindicated her character, Elizabeth could not, in consistency with her own honour, either give her the assistance which she demanded, or permit her to leave the kingdom; and that, for the safer custody of her person, they considered it necessary to have her removed to some place of strength in the interior of the country. They further gave it as their opinion that, in virtue of the ancient feudal superiority of England over Scotland, Mary might legally be brought to trial.†

On the 13th of July, the decision of the Privy Council with respect to the custody of the captive queen was carried into effect. Sir Mary is removed George Bowes was sent to Carlisle, accompanied by a strong escort, and under pretext of bringing Mary near to Elizabeth, conveyed her, in spite of her strong remonstrances, to Bolton, a castle in Yorkshire, belonging to Lord Serope.‡ The unfortunate Scottish queen was now completely in the power of her ruthless enemy; and, though still treated with somewhat of the outward respect due to her rank, was in reality a prisoner.

After his victory at Langside, the regent commenced vigorous proceedings against the queen's broken and scattered party. Six gentlemen who had been taken prisoners were tried for treason, and condemned to death; but, after being led out for execution, were pardoned, at the intercession of Knox. Moray soon afterwards proceeded with a numerous army towards the western counties, where the adherents of the queen were most numerous, and where indeed the nobility were nearly all of that party; and he would have acted against them with unsparing rigour, but, having received from Middlemore Elizabeth's message at Dumfries, he, in deference to her demand, suspended hostili-

* Letter from Mary to Queen Elizabeth, 13th June, 1568, Labanoff.

† Letter from Middlemore to Cecil, 14th June, 1568; Anderson, vol. iv. pp. 87—90; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 14; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 229.

‡ "A memorialis of the consultation of the Privy Council of England touching the Queene of Scotts, June 20, 1568," Anderson, vol. iv. pp. 102—106.

‡ Anderson, vol. iv. p. 14.

ties,* and expressed his readiness to appear before her as the accuser of his sister and sovereign, and in defence of his own conduct.†

The only remaining obstacle to the trial of this great cause was the adverse resolution of the Scottish queen; and, accordingly, to shake this resolution, Elizabeth now employed all her art, and every form of duplicity of which her subtle mind was capable. The regent, as we have seen, had already acknowledged Elizabeth's jurisdiction; but, in doing so, he desired to be informed what further proceedings were meant to be adopted in the event of his being able to prove the truth of his accusations against Mary.‡ Cecil, in his answer, informed the regent that it was not the intention of Elizabeth to encourage any accusation against the Scottish queen, much less to proceed to any condemnation; that she was unwilling to admit of any faults in her sister; and that her sole object was to settle all disputes, and bring the controversy to an amiable conclusion.§ There is reason to believe that this answer was intended to be communicated to Mary by Herries, who was then at the English court; and that, if sent to the regent at all, it was nullified by a subsequent message. On the other hand, Lord Herries, gained over by false promises, was made an instrument of persuading his mistress to accept of Elizabeth's adjudication. He was dispatched to Bolton, instructed to inform Mary that the English queen desired to investigate the matters in dispute, not as a judge, but as her dear cousin and friend, and with the purpose of restoring her to her royal authority, if she should establish her innocence; and that even if the regent and his party were to succeed in justifying their conduct, it was nevertheless the intention of Elizabeth to make arrangements peaceably between Mary and her subjects. To this promise certain conditions were annexed—viz. that she was to renounce all claim to the throne of England during the life of Elizabeth and her issue—that she should give up the league with France—and that she should renounce the mass, and receive the Common Prayer after the form of England.|| While Mary was cajoled by this mendacious message, the regent, it is believed, was secretly encouraged to prepare all the evidence he could against his sister, with the assurance that if he should succeed in proving his case, Mary would continue to be detained a prisoner in England.¶ These negotiations were conducted by Herries on the part of Mary; and, by Cecil's direction, such parts only of the proposals made by Herries were communicated to Moray as it was deemed expedient for him to know,* whilst all the messages of the regent were carefully concealed from the Scottish queen.

In the meantime, the contests of the two opposite factions had thrown Scottish ^{Disturbed state of Scotland.} affairs into a very disturbed condition. Owing to the severity of the regent's government, he had become extremely unpopular with the great mass of the nation. Many of his former supporters had become estranged from him, while his enemies were united through a sense of common danger. A conspiracy was even formed for taking away his life, at the head of which were Murray of Tullibardine and his brother, who had taken so conspicuous a part in the arraignment of Bothwell.‡ These discontents were fanned into a flame by the regent's summoning a parliament to proceed to the forfeiture ^{The regent summons a parliament.} of all persons of distinction who refused to submit to the authority of the young king. The queen's party became greatly alarmed at this proceeding; and Argyle, Huntley, and the Hamiltons, uniting in favour of the queen, held a convention at Largs, on the 28th July, when they resolved to rouse the Borderers to invade the English territory, and wrote to the Duke of Alva, earnestly requesting his assistance.‡

While these events were in progress in Scotland, Elizabeth at last prevailed on ^{Mary consents to the conference.} Mary to consent that a conference should be held, in which the differences between her and her subjects should be submitted to the decision of commissioners appointed by the English queen. Herries having arrived at Bolton, submitted to his mistress the proposals of Elizabeth; and Mary, whose spirit was now much subdued by her misfortunes, was at length persuaded to yield. He told her that Elizabeth had charged him to say to her, "that if she would commit her cause to be heard by her highness's order, but not to make her highness judge over her, but rather as to her dear cousin and friend to commit herself to her advice and counsel; that if she would thus do, her highness would surely set her again in her seat of regiment and dignity regal, in this form and order:—First, her highness would send for the noblemen of Scotland that be her adversaries, to ask account of them, before such noblemen as this queen herself should like of, to know their answer, why they have deposed their queen and sovereign from her regiment; and that if, in their answers, they could allege some reason for them in their so doing (which her highness thinks they cannot do), that her highness would

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Cecil, 17th June, 1568; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 230.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Moray to Cecil, 22nd June, 1568; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 231; Moray's answer to Middlemore, 22nd June, 1568, in Goodall's examination of the letters said to be written by Mary Queen of Scots to James, Earl of Bothwell, vol. ii. p. 75, Edinburgh, 1754; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 20.

‡ Goodall, vol. ii. p. 75; Moray's answer to Middlemore, 22nd June, 1568.

§ Goodall, vol. ii. p. 89; Answer by Cecil to the Earl of Moray's proposals, 31st June, 1568; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 231.

|| Letter from Knollys to Cecil, 28th July, 1568; Anderson, vol. iv. pp. 109, 114; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 22.

¶ Tytler, vol. vii. p. 231, 232.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Moray to Cecil, 22nd June, 1568, with enclosure.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, 20th July, 1568, Drury to Cecil; also id. ibid., same to same, 31st July, 1568; also id. ibid., same to same, 3rd August, 1568.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, 10th July, 1568.

set this queen in her seat regal conditionally; that those her lords and subjects should continue in their honours, estates, and dignities to them appertaining. But if they should not be able to allege any reason of their doings, that then her highness would absolutely set her in her seat regal, and that by force of hostility, if they should resist.”*

Perhaps in no single instance is the detestable duplicity of the English queen more conspicuous than in the communication which she addressed, about the same time, to the regent. “Whereas,” she says, “we hear say that certain reports are made in sundry parts of Scotland, that whatsoever should fall out now upon the hearing of the Queen of Scots’ cause, in any proof to convince or acquit the said queen concerning the horrible murder of her late husband, our cousin, we have determined to restore her to her kingdom and government, we do so much mislike hereof, as we cannot endure the same to receive any credit; and therefore we have thought good to assure you that the same is utterly devised by the authors to our dishonour. For as we have been always certified from our said sister, both by her letters and messages, that she is by no means guilty or participant of that murder (which we wish to be true), so surely, if she should be found justly to be guilty thereof, as hath been reported of her (whereof we would be very sorry), then indeed it should behove us to consider otherwise of her cause than to satisfy her desire in restitution of her to the government of that kingdom. And so we would have you and all others think, that should be disposed to conceive honourably of us and our actions.”†

The affairs of Scotland continued in a very unsettled state. Huntley and Argyle were still at the head of a numerous force, and having reduced all the northern and western parts of the kingdom under the queen’s authority, were advancing rapidly towards the southern provinces, when their progress was interrupted by an order from the queen, who, in compliance with the wish of Elizabeth, commanded them to suspend hostilities, at the same time informing them that the regent would be compelled by Elizabeth to adopt a similar course.‡ There is reason, however, to believe that no such mandate had as yet been issued to Moray; at all events, if issued, it was not obeyed. The object of Huntley and Argyle had been, to prevent Moray from holding the parliament which threatened with ruin both themselves and their party. No sooner, however, were their forces disbanded than the parliament assembled; and had it not been for the energetic interference of Lethington, every baron who had espoused the queen’s cause would have been proscribed. Among those who were declared traitors and forfeited were the Archbishop of St. Andrew’s, Lord Claud Hamilton, the Bishop of Ross, and many other persons of distinction.* The lords of the queen’s party vehemently complained of the cruelty and injustice of these proceedings, and were about once more to have recourse to arms. Moray, however, got the start of them, and, with a force which he hastily raised, repaired to the districts of Anandale and Galloway, where the severity and promptitude of his proceedings would speedily have put down all opposition, when a message from the English queen at last arrived, commanding him instantly to lay down his arms, and send commissioners to York to answer for his conduct to his sovereign. This imperious mandate, which was, doubtless, at such a moment highly distasteful to the regent, was enforced by the threatening, that on the least resistance or delay the Scottish queen would immediately be set at liberty, and assisted by Elizabeth against her enemies, while his refusal would be regarded by the English queen as a proof of Mary’s innocence and his own guilt.† Moray proceeded, though reluctantly, to obey; and all hostilities in Scotland were suspended until the result of the conference should be known.

Mary chose as her commissioners Lesley, the Bishop of Ross, the Lords Herries, Boyd, and Livingston, Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar, the Abbot of Kilwinning, and Sir James Cockburn of Stirling.‡ The regent was summoned to appear in person;§ and with him were joined as commissioners, by his own appointment, the Earl of Moray, the Bishop of Orkney, Lord Lindsay, and the Commendator of Dunfermline. To these he added several assistants, among whom were the celebrated George Buchanan, James Macgill of Rankeilor, Henry Balnaves of Halhill, and Maitland of Lethington, whom the regent suspected of a leaning to the queen’s cause, and from his great popularity dreaded to leave behind.|| Elizabeth appointed as commissioners on her part the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Sussex, and Sir Ralph Sadler.¶ The first of these was at this time Earl Marshal, and one of the most powerful of the nobility; the second was president of the council at York, and held the military command of the northern districts; and the third was chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, a member of the Privy Council, and a statesman of high ability and long experience.

Previously to appointing her commissioners, Mary had desired an interview with the Bishop

* Anderson, vol. iv., part i., pp. 125, 126.

† Camden apud Kennet, vol. ii. p. 412; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 236.

‡ Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 33, 34; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 24; Robertson, vol. i. p. 475; Tytler, vol. iii. pp. 196, 197.

§ Mignet, vol. ii. p. 24.

|| Tytler, vol. vii. p. 237; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 25; Robertson, vol. i. p. 405.

¶ Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 3—7; Goodall, vol. ii. p. 109.

 Mignet, vol. ii. p. 25.

* Anderson, vol. iv. pp. 109, 110; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 234.

† Letter from Elizabeth to Moray, 20th September, 1568; Robertson, Appendix XXVIII.; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 23.

‡ Anderson, vol. iv., part i., pp. 125, 126.

Mary chooses her commissioners.

The regent summoned to appear in person.

of Ross, a man of great ability and warmly attached to her cause, but whom she had not consulted before agreeing to the conference now to be held.

Mary's interview with the Bishop of Ross.

When he arrived at Bolton on the 18th September, he expressed great sorrow at the resolution which Mary had taken. He remarked that if she brought forward evidence to criminate the regent and his party, it might naturally be expected that "they would undoubtedly utter all they could for their defence, although it were to her dishonour and that of the realm;" and maintained that it would have been much better to attempt deciding the dispute by an amicable arrangement, without accusation on either side. Mary, however, relying on the promises of Elizabeth, and probably still more on the assistance of the Duke of Norfolk,—who had become secretly attached to her cause,—was in high hopes of a favourable issue. She declared her belief that "there was no such danger in the matter as he supposed; for she trusted she would find the judges favourable, principally the Duke of Norfolk, who was first in commission, and doubted not that the Earl of Sussex would be ruled by him as his tender friend, and Sir Ralph Sadler would not withstand their advices."* Her hopes from the favourable disposition of the Duke of Norfolk were not without foundation. The duke's sister, Lady Scrope, had assured her of the duke's assistance to the utmost of his power; and it is even understood had made the first overtures to her of a marriage between her and the duke, when, by his assistance, she should be re-instated in her dominions;† a project which, as we shall afterwards see, proved fatal both to the duke and to the Scottish queen. The duke himself had moreover, according to Mary's own statement to the Bishop of Ross, sent her a message to Bolton expressing attachment to her interest.‡

Mary's hopes at this juncture were no doubt much damped by the arrival of Robert Melvil at Bolton with a message from Lethington. He informed her that the regent had resolved to produce against her all the evidence in his power, and particularly the letters found in the silver casket, copies of which Lethington had procured and now sent for her inspection. He farther informed her that he had been induced to come to England solely with a view to her interest, and requested to know in what manner he could best promote that interest at the approaching conference.§ Mary, having carefully examined the letters, which were translations from the original French into the Scottish language, did not dispute their authenticity.|| In her reply to Lethington she requested him "to stay the rigorous accusations of Moray," to confer with the Bishop of Ross, in whom she had entire confidence, and to "labour with the Duke of Norfolk in her favour."*

The 4th of October was the day fixed on for the commencement of the trial of this important cause—a proceeding altogether without a parallel in history, whether we consider the magnitude of the matter at issue, the rank of the parties principally concerned, the distinguished individuals of whom the commission was composed, or the remarkable anomaly of one sovereign pleading by her deputies at the bar of another, opposed by the head of a faction that had deprived her of her throne and expelled her from her dominions.

On the day appointed, the conference was opened with great solemnity. The Opening of the Duke of Norfolk presided, and, for conference, 4th Oct. what purpose does not very plainly appear, commenced the proceedings by reviving the obsolete assertion of feudal superiority formerly claimed by Engiad over Scotland, and demanding that Moray, having consented to refer his cause to Elizabeth, should now do homage to the English crown. Moray, who regarded this preliminary assertion, and the demand founded upon it, as nothing less than a studied insult to the whole Scottish nation, as well as to himself and the Scottish commissioners, coloured with indignation, seemed to hesitate what course to pursue, and remained silent; but Maitland, with characteristic adroitness and presence of mind, replied, that when England restored to the Scottish sovereigns the counties of Northumberland and Cumberland, and the manor of Huntingdon, which they formerly possessed, it would be time enough to talk of homage. "This recognition of supremacy," he added, "had always been conditional and limited on the part of Scotland, which had remained entirely independent as regarded its own territory, and in this respect had been more free than England, which until lately had paid Peter's pence to the Pope."† After this spirited answer, the duke did not think proper to urge the point; but when the oaths had been administered, protests were entered on both sides.‡

The real business of the conference now commenced. The commissioners of the Scottish queen were first permitted to prefer their complaint against the regent and his party. Complaint of Mary's commissioners against the regent and his party. It comprised a clear and distinct narrative of their treasonable proceedings: their making open war against the queen's troops, their violent seizure and imprisonment of her person, their forcing her to resign her crown, and the usurpation of the royal authority by Moray, under pretext of acting in the name and on the behalf of

* Murdin, pp. 52, 53; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 196; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 27.

† Melvil's Memoirs, p. 206; Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 15; also, Norfolk to Cecil, 9th October, 1568, Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., p. 42; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 198; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 30.

‡ Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 49, 50.

* Murdin, p. 52. Examination of the Bishop of Ross at the Tower, Mignet, vol. ii. p. 26; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 238.

† Murdin, p. 52; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 26.

‡ Murdin, p. 52.

§ Ibid.

|| Tytler, vol. vii. p. 196.

the young prince, the queen's infant son. In conclusion, Mary's commissioners demanded in her name redress of all these flagrant grievances, and her speedy restoration, through the aid of the Queen of England, to the peaceable enjoyment of her royal authority.*

Before proceeding to reply, the regent desired and obtained a preliminary conference with the English commissioners. He wished to know whether they could guarantee that their mistress would, after the production of the evidence, proceed to give judgment in the case, and pronounce Mary guilty or not guilty; and whether, in the event of finding her guilty, Elizabeth would signify her approval of his proceedings, maintain him in the regency, and support the government of the young king.† These questions the commissioners did not consider themselves authorised to answer, but remitted them to Elizabeth herself.

It was now expected that the regent would, in defence of the his own vindication, prefer his regent. accusation against Mary, and produce his proofs of the horrid crime with which she had been publicly charged by him and his party. To the astonishment and dismay, however, of the English commissioners, and even of his own friends, he made no allusion whatever to the alleged complicity of the queen in the murder of her husband; but attempted a tame and feeble defence, grounded on the odious marriage of the queen with Bothwell, the danger to which the infant prince was thus exposed, and the temporary restraint on the queen's personal liberty necessary for his safety and that of the State, her subsequent abdication, and her acquiescence in the regency during her son's minority. On this occasion, Moray betrayed a timidity and hesitation that did not seem naturally to belong to his character, and which at once mortified and surprised the Scottish commissioners, and astonished those of the English queen. The mystery, however, is now easily solved.

The Duke of Norfolk, though in obedience to the command of his sovereign he was acting in his present capacity, was extremely desirous to avoid the exposure which he apprehended would result from this investigation, and therefore strove anxiously, though secretly, to bring about a reconciliation between Mary and the regent. For this purpose he sought an interview with Lethington,

The Duke of Norfolk seeks an interview with Lethington. in which he expressed astonishment that a man enjoying such a reputation as he justly did for wisdom and moderation, should have been induced to take part in these proceedings against his sovereign. "Is England," he asked, "judge over the princes of Scotland? How could we find it in our hearts to dishonour the mother of our future king? or how could we answer afterwards for what we have done, seeing that, by bringing his mother's honesty in question, we jeopardise his right to the crown of England? It had been rather the duty of you, his subjects," he continued, "to cover her imperfections, if she had any, leaving her punishment unto God, who is the only judge over princes."* Lethington warmly concurred in these sentiments; declared that he was there as the friend, not the enemy of the queen, and professed himself ready to do everything in his power to promote a reconciliation.† Norfolk inquired if, in this matter, the regent might be trusted? Lethington replied, that he might; and readily undertook to communicate with the regent on the subject, and to make arrangements for a private interview between the regent and the duke.‡ The interview took place at night, in a gallery of the house in which the duke at that time resided.§

In the conversation which ensued, Norfolk remonstrated with the regent, as he had done with Lethington, on the impolicy and even danger of his appearing there as the public accuser of his sovereign. He expressed his astonishment that Moray, whom he had always regarded as an honourable and prudent man, should seek to fix a stain on the reputation of his mistress by the imputation of crimes, which, if proved against her, would not only be discreditable to the country and to himself, as her kinsman, but would even endanger her son's succession. He assured the regent that Elizabeth would never consent to regulate the succession to the English crown; being less solicitous to avoid the danger to the country of a disputed succession after her death, than the anxieties and apprehensions which might arise from nominating her successor during her lifetime. The point being thus left undetermined, the Queen of Scots and her son would, he argued, unquestionably possess the true title, which none would venture to dispute, provided that nothing were now done to weaken their claim.|| He did not fail further to work on the fears of the regent by suggesting to him, that, in the event of Mary's recovering her authority, he could expect no mercy at her hands, after having endeavoured to fix an indelible stain of infamy on her character; and that he might rest assured he would receive neither succour nor countenance from the Queen of England. In conclusion, he recommended that the dispute should be compromised by Mary's ratifying her abdication in favour of her son, and Moray's agreeing, on the other hand, to suppress the letters intended to be produced as evidence of Mary's guilt.¶ Moray objected, that these documents having already been communicated to the Scottish parliament, their suppression, even if that

* Melvil's Memoirs, p. 94; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 31.

† Ibid.; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 200, 201.

‡ Mignet, vol. ii. p. 31.

§ Letters from Moray to Lord Burleigh, Robertson, Appendix xxxiii. || Melvil, p. 206, 207.

¶ Robertson, Appendix xxxiii.; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 32.

* Anderson, vol. iv. p. 52; Goodall, vol. ii. pp. 123, 126.

† Goodall, vol. ii. pp. 130, 131, 9th October, pp. 126, 127.

were now possible, would not benefit Mary, while it would expose him to the reproach of having preferred a charge which he was unable to substantiate. Norfolk strove in vain to persuade the regent to destroy the letters; the utmost he could extort from him was a promise not to produce them. "You are grievously deceived," said Norfolk, "if you imagine the Queen of England will ever pronounce sentence in this cause. Do you not see that no answers have been returned to the questions which, upon this point, were addressed by you to us, and forwarded to the queen? Nay, you can easily put the matter to a more certain proof: request an assurance, under the queen's hand, that when you accuse your sovereign, and bring forward your proofs, she will pronounce sentence. If you get it, act as you please; if it is not given, rest assured that my information is true, and that all that will come of your accusation will be repentance for your own folly."*

Moray, upon whom this conversation made a deep impression, determined to follow the advice of Norfolk, in so far as to abstain from bringing any accusation against Mary, without first having some assurance, such as he had already demanded from the English queen. In this determination he was confirmed by Lethington and Melvil, to both of whom he had, in confidence, given an account of his secret interview with Norfolk,—a circumstance, however, which he carefully concealed from the other Scottish commissioners.†

The regent now dispatched Robert Melvil on a secret mission to Bolton, with instructions to propose to Mary terms of accommodation, founded on the suggestion made to him by Norfolk at their interview. He proposed that she should ratify her abdication made at Lochleven in favour of her son, confirm Moray in the regency during the young prince's minority, and agree to reside in England under the protection of Elizabeth, with a revenue suitable to her rank as a queen; while, on his part, he would agree to abstain from bringing forward any accusation against her.‡

In the meantime, Moray, with a view to satisfy the English commissioners that he had ample materials for defending himself and proving the guilt of his sister, instructed Lethington, Macgill, and Buchanan, privately to exhibit to them the alleged proofs; consisting of documents already referred to, which, it was asserted, had been found in the famous silver casket given by Mary to Bothwell.§

* Melvil's Memoirs, p. 207, 208, 4to edition; also Dépêches de La Motte Fénelon, vol. i. p. 17; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 201; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 33.

† Melvil's Memoirs, p. 208, 4to edition.

‡ Hopetoun MSS., Declaration of Robert Melvil; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Knollys to Cecil, 25th October, 1568; Mignet vol. ii. p. 36.

§ Letter to Elizabeth from her commissioners at York, 11th October, 1568, Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 58—63; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 36; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 202.

The English commissioners having carefully examined these papers, Norfolk drew up a summary of their contents, and transmitted it to Elizabeth. This document was accompanied by a letter signed by Norfolk, Sussex, and Sadler; in which they requested their royal mistress to inform them whether, in her judgment, the evidence thus furnished would be sufficient to convict the Queen of Scots of the crime laid to her charge. They added, at the same time, in their own names and those of the other commissioners, that in their opinion the letters and papers referred to furnished conclusive evidence against Mary, provided they were really in her handwriting.* Norfolk's object in being a party to this communication, which was confidential, and not intended to be made public, evidently was to save Mary's reputation from the infamy with which he clearly saw it would be covered, if these documents should be produced at the conference. He hoped in this way to obtain a private, extra-judicial sentence from Elizabeth, which, even though unfavourable to Mary, would be the less of two evils. This course, he seems to have taken for granted, would be more agreeable to Elizabeth than to publish the dishonour of her sister; in whom, as she said, she was not disposed "to allow of any faults." "Our best plan," said he, in a consultation with the Bishop of Ross, "is to get quit of present infamy and slander, and let time work the rest."† Norfolk, though no stranger to the treacherous disposition of Elizabeth, had not fathomed the depth of her duplicity. She had determined, if possible, to induce Moray publicly to accuse his sovereign of the murder. His unexpected moderation was to her a source of bitter disappointment; as she conceived that to blacken the character of the Scottish queen would afford a pretext for detaining her as a prisoner, and, even were she to be re-instated in her dignity, might otherwise be turned to the advantage of England.

With a view to bring the proceedings of the conference more immediately under her own control, and to defeat the plans of Norfolk and the regent, — of which certain vague rumours had reached her ears, — Elizabeth now suddenly transferred the conference to Westminster. The conference transferred to Westminster. Elizabeth now suddenly transferred the conference to Westminster, under the pretext that the distance of York from the capital caused much delay in the settlement of this important cause; not, however, without special precautions to prevent either Mary or her commissioners from taking the alarm by suspecting some sinister motive on her part.‡ In a letter from Elizabeth, the original draft of which is still extant, Norfolk and those who acted with him are warned to take especial care to prevent or lull suspicion on the part of Mary and her commissioners, by inducing them to believe that this change was made solely with a view to the more speedy adjustment of the contest, and the restora-

* Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 62, 63.

† Murdin, p. 53; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 38.

‡ La Motte Fénelon, vol. iv. p. 18.

A summary of the proofs transmitted to Elizabeth.

tion of the Scottish queen to her throne in a manner at once honourable and safe to herself and her subjects.* In this arrangement both Mary and the regent were induced to concur.†

It was not without difficulty that Melvil had succeeded in persuading Mary to agree to the proposal of the regent for an accommodation, by ratifying her abdication and confirming him in his authority. At length, however, Melvil's arguments prevailed, and he was dispatched to Moray to signify her consent. At the same time Mary wrote to Elizabeth, declaring her satisfaction that her cause and her honour were now in the hands of her sister, to whose care, above that of all others, she desired to confide them. Four of her commissioners, Boyd, Herries, the Bishop of Ross, and the Abbot of Kilwinning, were sent to London as the bearers of this message.‡

Preparatory to the new conference, Elizabeth employed every artifice which her ingenuity could devise, to induce Moray to bring forward his accusations. On the arrival of Mary's four commissioners, she admitted them to an audience, when she informed them that, having carefully reviewed all the proceedings of the former conference, she was of opinion that the regent and his confederates had utterly failed to produce any satisfactory defence of their conduct; and that no course now remained for them but to confess their guilt, and to sue for pardon, which she would endeavour to obtain for them. With this view, she added, she had transferred the conference to London; and, to give greater solemnity to the proceedings, had named certain additional commissioners, who, in conjunction with those formerly appointed, would forthwith proceed to the final adjustment of this controversy, unless the regent had something more weighty to urge in his defence.§ The desire, indeed, to consummate her triumph over the fallen queen took such possession of Elizabeth's mind, that she could no longer conceal it; but, in defiance of common decency, she threatened to deprive Moray of the regency, and to bestow it on his ancient rival, the Duke of Chatelherault, if the former persisted in his refusal to accuse his sovereign.|| In the midst of these menaces, whose object, however detestable, was at least openly avowed, Elizabeth was once more playing her game of hypocrisy with Mary's commissioners, by secretly encouraging them to hope for the speedy restoration of their mistress to her country and throne.¶

In the meantime, Mary's fears were roused by intelligence privately communicated to her by Hepburn of Riccarton, a gentleman who had formerly been a follower of Bothwell's, and who was now in London. He assured her that Elizabeth, so far from being favourably disposed to her cause, was most anxious to obtain proof against her, and would most probably succeed in forcing Moray to desert Norfolk, and to accuse his sovereign.* Alarmed by this intimation, Mary sent fresh instructions to her commissioners, enjoining them on no account to suffer the opposite party to assume any other position than that of defendants, and allowing them no power of action beyond bringing about a reconciliation. Being desirous, she said, to conduct herself as a mother towards her subjects, she was reluctant to treat them rigorously, or to prosecute them before a foreign tribunal,—a mode of proceeding which would tend to widen the breach between her and them, instead of restoring a friendly feeling, which she was most anxious to cultivate. She accordingly gave authority to her commissioners to extend her royal clemency to Moray and his confederates in the presence of the English queen, and to endeavour to bring about an accommodation, without prejudice, however, to her honour and queenly dignity, which she was determined not to submit to any prince in the world. She added, that if they should observe any encouragement given to her adversaries to accuse her, they were immediately to demand for her a personal interview with Elizabeth, and, in the event of being refused, to break off the negotiation.†

At this time a circumstance occurred which still further increased Mary's fears, and roused her suspicions regarding the object of Elizabeth in appointing this second conference. The regent admitted to an audience with Elizabeth. On the arrival of the regent in London, he was admitted to an audience with the queen, and was received by her with marked tokens of respect, and even of affection. Mary naturally felt deeply mortified, as well as indignant, at this partiality; and immediately wrote to her commissioners, charging them to complain before the English nobility, as well as the ambassadors of foreign princes, of the unjust and cruel treatment to which she had been subjected. Her adversaries, she said, and rebels against her authority, were freely admitted into the presence of the queen, while she was not only denied that privilege, but even detained at a distance, and confined as a prisoner; they were encouraged to prefer accusations against her, while she was not permitted to appear in her own defence. In these circumstances, she enjoined her commissioners once more to demand for her a personal interview with the English queen, and instructed them to declare that, if this

* Original draft, State Paper Office, Papers of Mary Queen of Scots, October 16, 1568, Elizabeth to her commissioners, Tytler, vol. vii. p. 246.

† Haynes, p. 454.

‡ Mary to Elizabeth, 22nd October, 1568, Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., p. 95, Lesley's Negotiations.

§ Anderson, vol. iv., part. ii., p. 95; Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 25, 26.

|| Tytler, vol. vii. p. 205.

¶ Mignet, vol. ii. p. 39.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Papers of Mary Queen of Scots, Knollys to Cecil, 21st Nov., 1568, Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 205, 206.

† Labanoff, vol. ii. pp. 229—231; Goodall, vol. ii. pp. 185—187.

were refused, she recalled her consent to the conference, and protested that all further procedure would be null and invalid.* Her commissioners, however, did agree to the opening of the conference: either Mary's letter did not arrive in time, or, what is perhaps more probable, they had been cajoled by Elizabeth's professions of affectionate regard for their mistress.†

The position of the regent had now become embarrassing in the extreme. He had proceeded to London with the determination of adhering to his compact with Norfolk, and of abstaining from all accusation against his royal sister; or, if any unexpected event should occur to render that course impracticable, to revert to the ratification of her demission of the crown, according to his former proposal, to which she had already agreed. To his dismay, however, he discovered that Elizabeth was fully cognisant of his arrangement with Norfolk. The secret had been betrayed by a confidant of Mary to Morton, and he had revealed it to Cecil, who had communicated it to the queen. To add to his embarrassment, he now received a message from Mary, informing him that Norfolk had forbidden her to ratify her demission of the crown, and she therefore could not abide by her agreement. It is difficult to imagine a combination of circumstances more perplexing. To persist in withholding his proofs of Mary's guilt was in effect to become his own accuser, and to draw down upon himself the indignation even of his own party,—and, what was probably even more dreaded, to incur the enmity of the English queen, who had threatened to strip him of his authority in Scotland, and who certainly had the power to carry her menace into effect; while, on the other hand, to proceed with his accusation was certain to ensure his own ruin and that of his party, if ever Mary should be restored to supreme power. In this dilemma, he resolved to pursue a middle course—to draw up his accusation, but to refuse to submit it to the conference until he obtained the assurance he had demanded from Elizabeth during the proceedings at York.‡

The conference commenced at Westminster, on the 25th November, in the hall called the Camera Depicta, the Scottish commissioners having refused to assemble in any chamber where judicial sentences were wont to be pronounced.§ To the three English commissioners formerly appointed, Elizabeth now added Lord Chancellor Bacon, the Earls of Arundel and Leicester, the Lord Admiral Clinton, and Mr. Secretary Cecil.‖

* Goodall, vol. ii. p. 184.

† Anderson, vol. iii. p. 25.

‡ Tytler, vol. vii. p. 205; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 40.

§ Calderwood's History of the Kirk of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 448.

‖ “The Journal of First Session of the Commissioners upon the 25th day of November, 1568,” Anderson, vol. ii., part ii., p. 101.

The proceedings were opened by the delivery of a protest on the part of Mary's commissioners, that no steps should be taken to compromise the rights and dignity of their royal mistress, who, as an independent sovereign, acknowledged the jurisdiction of no prince on earth; and they demanded that, as Moray had been admitted into the presence of Elizabeth, and allowed to prefer accusations against his sovereign, a similar privilege should be granted to Mary, that the queen might hear her defence from her own lips. Elizabeth disclaimed any wish to injure the honour of their sovereign, or to assume over her the office of a judge, but declared that she could not admit her into her presence until the cause was decided.* The Lord Chancellor, who acted as president, informed Moray that his defence at the York conference was considered inconclusive; and for the purpose of stimulating the regent to speak out more freely, he added—“Her majesty principally wishes that, upon the hearing of this great cause, the honour and estate of the Queen of Scots may be preserved, and found sincerely sound, whole, and firm; but if she shall be justly proved and found guilty of the murder of her husband—which were much to be lamented—she shall either be delivered into your hands, upon good and sufficient sureties and assurances for the safety of her life and good usage of her, or else she shall continue to be kept in England, in such sort as neither the prince her son, nor you, the Earl of Moray, shall be in any danger by her liberty. And for the time to come, her majesty will maintain the authority of the said prince to be king, and the government of the realm by you, the Earl of Moray, according to the laws of Scotland.”†

By this declaration, the regent felt considerably re-assured, and, addressing the commissioners, said that it was with extreme reluctance he entered upon this odious task; that he and his party had ever been averse to publish anything to the dishonour of their sovereign; and that, rather than accuse her before foreigners, they had already suffered in their own reputation, and would willingly suffer much more—even exile itself; but that the violence and importunity of the opposite faction constrained them to produce, in their own defence, those accusations which they had hitherto withheld, and which, if it were possible, they would still gladly consign to oblivion.‡

Before, however, producing their accusation and the evidence by which it was supported, the regent required an assurance, under the queen's hand, such as he had demanded at York. To this Cecil, with feigned indignation, pertly replied, that he had already received ample assurance, and that it ill became the regent to suspect or doubt the word of the Queen of England. “Where,” he demanded, “is your accusation?”—“It is here,” answered John

* Goodall, vol. ii., pp. 188, 189, 23rd November, 1568.

† Goodall, vol. ii. pp. 201, 202; Anderson, vol. iv. part ii., pp. 109—113.

‡ Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 115, 118.

Wood, the regent's secretary, who sat beside him at the table, at the same time plucking the document from his bosom ; " it is here, and here it must remain till we see the queen's handwriting."*

At this instant, Bothwell, the Bishop of Orkney, who, in common with Morton, Lindsay, the Abbot of Dunfermline, and Buchanan, was dissatisfied with the timid policy of the regent, and was desirous to push matters to extremity, stepping hastily up to Wood, snatched the paper from his hand, and, running towards the table, laid it before the English commissioners. Wood rushed after him, amid the ill-suppressed laughter of the spectators of this strange scene, but too late to prevent the bishop from accomplishing his purpose. The Extraordinary scene in the conference.

die was cast, and the long-suppressed accusation against Mary was now in the hands of her enemies. It is suspected that this extraordinary proceeding was the result of a preconcerted arrangement between Wood and Cecil, with the concurrence of such of the regent's commissioners as were known to be adverse to Mary.† Be this as it may, such an unseemly scramble was, if not supremely ludicrous, certainly very unbefitting the dignity of such grave personages, and on such a momentous occasion. The regent, seeing his policy thus suddenly and unexpectedly baffled, was confounded and dismayed ; while Cecil, smiling complacently, was delighted to see his embarrassment. Lord William Howard vociferously applauded the dexterity of Bishop Turpy, as Orkney was facetiously called, and Lethington, in despair, whispered in the regent's ear that he had ruined his cause for ever.‡

The accusation set forth, in strong and distinct

The regent's accusation.

language, that, while Bothwell was the chief perpetrator of the murder of the late king, Mary was in the foreknowledge of the horrid crime ; that it was committed not merely with her consent, but at her special desire ; and that she actually assisted in the formation and execution of the plan. This, it was alleged, was evident from her having openly interfered to frustrate the ends of justice at the trial of Bothwell, and still more from her precipitate and scandalous marriage with that nobleman. At this critical moment, the Earl of Lennox opportunely appeared before the tribunal, and, with tears in his eyes, accused Queen Mary of having conspired the death of his son, and demanded justice. He declared that he had hitherto despaired of obtaining justice at the hands of man ; but now that the Queen of England, whose natural born subject his son was, had appointed a commission for the trial of this great cause, he placed his case with entire confidence in the hands of their lordships.* It is difficult to believe that the appearance of Lennox on this occasion was a spontaneous movement on his part. There is, on the contrary, a strong presumption that it was the result of a preconcerted arrangement, for the purpose of adding greater solemnity to the proceedings, and greater weight to any accusation that might be brought forward against Mary. Her commissioners, perplexed and alarmed at the nature and extent of the accusation against their mistress, deliberated for two days on the course they should pursue.† In conformity with their instructions, however, before breaking up the conference, they indignantly repelled as false and calumnious the imputations which had been made on the honour of their mistress, and complained that a proceeding so contrary to law and justice should have been tolerated in England. Writing to the English commissioners, they say, " My lords, we are heartily sorry to hear that our countrymen intend to colour their most unjust, ungrateful, and shameful doings against their natural sovereign, liege lady, and mistress, who hath been so beneficial to them. Her grace hath made them, from mean men, earls and lords ; and now, without any evil deserving on her part, in either deed or word, to any of them, she is thus recompensed with calumnious and false reports, and slandered to her reproach in this great matter, whereof they that now pretend herewith to excuse their treason were the first inventors—having written with their own hands that devilish bond, the conspiracy for the slaughter of that innocent young gentleman, Henry Stewart, late spouse of our sovereign, and presented her in marriage to their wicked confederate, James Earl Bothwell, as was made manifest before ten thousand people in Edinburgh."‡ They further denounced Moray and his party as " rebels and calumniators," whose example might prove dangerous to other princes ; and go on to say, " If this in them be tolerated, what prince lives upon the face of the earth whose ambitious subjects may not invent some slander to deprive them of their supreme authority during their lifetime ? Your wisdoms well understand how far their doings exceed the bounds permitted to subjects in the holy and sacred Scriptures, and violate the loyal duty which they owe to their native princes."

The Earl of Lennox appears at the conference, and accuses Mary.

Mary's commissioners now demanded an immediate audience of Queen Elizabeth.§ Being admitted into her presence, Mary's commissioners demand and obtain an audience with Elizabeth. they solemnly protested against the irregular and unjust manner in which the proceedings had been conducted. They reminded her of her royal promise, that, in the absence of their mistress, no procedure should be permitted to be taken that might in the

* Melvil's Memoirs, pp. 96, 97.

† Melvil's Memoirs, p. 96.

‡ Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., p. 119 ; Tytler, vol. vii. p.

* " The Journal or Third Session of the Commissioners, 29th November, 1568," Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 121, 122.

† Laing, vol. i. p. 155.

‡ " A letter from the commissioners of the Queen of Scots to the commissioners of the Queen of England, 1st December, 1568," Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 129, 130.

§ Goodall, vol. ii. pp. 209—213.

slightest degree affect her honour and dignity, or compromise her royal authority; and they justly complained that this promise had been grossly violated; that the rebellious subjects of the Queen of Scots had been admitted into her presence, and not only allowed, but encouraged to traduce the honour of their sovereign by the false and calumnious imputation of a horrid and unnatural crime; and they now reiterated their demand that, in common justice, their mistress should be permitted to appear personally, and be heard in her own defence; and that, in the meantime, her traitorous accusers should be arrested and kept in custody until brought to answer the charges made against them.*

Elizabeth was at first embarrassed by the boldness of this demand. That it was just and reasonable she could neither doubt nor deny; but compliance with it formed no part of her tortuous policy. Her mean and spiteful malignity had been so far gratified by the public production of a revolting accusation against her unfortunate kinswoman; but her triumph was not complete until she obtained possession of the alleged proofs of Mary's guilt. Her crafty mind was not wanting in expedients to accomplish this end. Addressing Mary's commissioners, she remarked that the Queen of Scots had an undoubted right to be heard in her own vindication, but that the regent and his party having, in their own defence, accused the queen of being accessory to the murder of her husband, it was proper that they should first be called on to produce such evidence as they pretended to possess to substantiate their accusation. She declared she had never believed her sister to be guilty, and that the only reason for hitherto refusing her a personal interview was on account of the scandalous imputations under which she lay; but, having resolved to send for the commissioners and demand their proofs, she would afterwards willingly hear the queen in her own vindication.† Mary's commissioners expressed indignation and astonishment at the manifest partiality and injustice of allowing parties who stood charged with the guilt of treason, in a most aggravated form, and who ought consequently to be placed on their own defence, to come forward a second time as the accusers of their sovereign, and that too before that sovereign had been permitted to be heard in her own justification; and they solemnly protested that they would be no parties in any subsequent proceedings, and that nothing hereafter to be done should receive their consent, or in any degree prejudice the rights of the queen, their mistress.‡

It has been noticed as a strong presumption of Mary's guilt, or at least of her complicity in the infamous transaction in question, that on the same day her commissioners sent a message to the regent,

proposing a compromise, in virtue of which he and his accomplices, notwithstanding all that had happened, might once more be admitted into the favour of their sovereign, and this painful dispute be finally set to rest.* But, in justice to Mary, it should be borne in mind that this proposal did not emanate from her, but from her commissioners alone, without her knowledge or consent;† and that, whether or not the alleged proofs afforded conclusive evidence of her guilt, would, after all, be only matter of opinion, on which different minds would adopt opposite views, according to prejudice or their capability of weighing evidence; while her commissioners were naturally anxious that nothing farther should be adduced to strengthen suspicion, and thus leave a stain or a doubt on the reputation and honour of their mistress. Elizabeth, however, rejected the proposal as inconsistent with the honour of her royal cousin, and insisted that a queen labouring under so horrible an imputation ought, in justice to herself, to enter into no compromise; and that, as Moray and his associates had presumed, in order to justify their own proceedings, to prefer such an odious charge against their sovereign, they were bound to prove what they had advanced, on pain of being denounced at once as traitors against their queen's authority, and calumniators of her character.‡ It was accordingly resolved that, at the next meeting of the conference, the regent should be called on, in his own defence, to produce evidence of the truth of his allegations against the Queen of Scots, his rightful sovereign.

At this meeting, which was held on the 6th of December, the Bishop of Ross and his associates demanded admission. They complained of the violation of Elizabeth's promises of friendship, as well as of the shameful departure from all the ordinary rules and forms of justice by which these proceedings had been characterised; and declared that, as the Queen of England had determined to receive from the regent his proofs of his injurious allegations against their sovereign, before she was permitted to be heard in her own defence, they were compelled to dissolve the conference. They then delivered a written protest, in which they formally declared that they would hold as null and void anything that might subsequently be done against the honour or royal dignity of the queen, their mistress.§ Cecil declined to receive this protest, under pretence that it was founded on a misrepresentation of the answer of Queen Elizabeth; but Mary's commissioners withdrew, repeating that they would neither treat nor appear again.||

Elizabeth refuses her consent to a compromise.

Meeting of the conference,
6th Dec.

Protest of the Bishop of Ross.
Withdrawal of Mary's commissioners from the conference.

* Goodall, vol. ii. pp. 213—219; Correspondence of La Motte Fénelon, 10th Dec., 1568, vol. i. p. 38—51; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 46; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 209; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 456.

† Goodall, vol. ii. p. 221, 4th Dec.; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 47; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 210.

‡ Goodall, vol. ii. p. 223.

* Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 135, 137. The Journal of the Privy Council of England, 4th Dec., 1568; Mignet, vol. ii. pp. 47, 48.

† Tytler, vol. vii. p. 211.

‡ Goodall, vol. ii. p. 224.

§ Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., p. 145, 6th Dec., 1568.

|| Ibid., p. 146.

Notwithstanding this declaration, followed by the withdrawal of Mary's commissioners, a step which, according to common justice, as well as all law and precedent in such matters, should have terminated the conference, the commissioners of the English queen, in obedience to her command, summoned Moray and his associates before them, and delivered to them a message from Elizabeth, which may be pronounced a masterpiece of hypocrisy and mean artifice. They declared that the queen, their mistress, had commanded them to testify to the regent her high indignation and displeasure at his conduct, in having so grossly violated his duty to his sovereign as to accuse her of such an odious and unnatural crime, and that he was now required to defend himself. They stated to him and his friends that "the queen's majesty thought it very strange that they, being native subjects of the Queen of Scots, should accuse her of so horrible a crime, hateful both to God and man—a crime against law and nature—which, if their accusation were true, would render her infamous in the sight of all princes in the world. Her majesty, therefore, had willed her commissioners to tell them that, although in this deed they had forgotten their duties of allegiance towards their sovereign, she did not mean to forget the love of a good sister, a good neighbour, and a good friend of the Queen of Scots." *

This piece of artful perfidy was followed by the effect so long desired by Elizabeth, and pursued through a labyrinth of treacherous policy such as has no parallel in history. The regent, produces his proofs of Mary's guilt.

thus placed in a dilemma, at last laid his proofs before the English commissioners. These consisted of the depositions of some servants of Darnley, and the confessions made upon the scaffold by Hepburn, Hay of Tallo, and Powrie, who were executed for the murder of the late king; the Book of Articles, drawn up for the instruction of the Scottish council, and containing the examinations of Dalgleish, Powrie, Hepburn, and Hay; the Acts of the Scottish parliament, confirming the authority of the regent and the abdication of the queen; and, finally, both the originals and certified copies of the letters, sonnets, and other documents said to have been found in the silver casket, and which Elizabeth had already privately examined.†

The whole evidence against the Scottish queen having now been laid before the commissioners, it might be supposed that nothing farther remained but to pronounce judgment. The malignity of the English queen, however, was not yet fully gratified. With a view still more effectually to ruin the reputation of Mary, she desired to bring the cause before a more numerous and public tribunal. For this purpose she summoned a meeting of the Privy Council, and deputed the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, both of whom were Catholics, and the Earls of Shrewsbury, Worcester, Huntingdon, and Warwick, to assist in the deliberations.* The meeting took place at Hampton Court, on the 14th of December; and, from some expressions of Cecil's in a letter to Norris, it may be inferred that there was at first an intention of bringing the matter to a final decision.† Their lordships having been first sworn to secrecy, the whole evidence against the Queen of Scots was laid before them; and sundry authentic letters written by her to Elizabeth were compared with those found in the silver casket. After a careful examination of the handwriting and the orthography, which, at that period, was in some measure arbitrary, the council declared they could find no difference between them.‡ Yet still, instead of pronouncing judgment on the cause before them, they went no farther than to signify their general approbation of the course pursued by their sovereign.

Elizabeth, thus fortified, began to throw off the mask. She sent for the Scottish commissioners, and informed them, in reply to their reiterated demand that the Queen of Scots should be admitted to a personal defence, that, after what had just transpired, it was more than ever imperative upon her, from a due regard to her own honour, to refuse to accede to such a demand. There were three queen: either she might send to court some confidential person charged with her defence; or, Elizabeth would send commissioners to receive it; or, lastly, Mary might instruct her own commissioners to defend her cause. She added, that, if the Queen of Scots declined to avail herself of any one of these methods, such a refusal would be considered tantamount to an admission of her guilt.§ The Bishop of Ross and his friends once more vehemently protested against the flagrant injustice with which their sovereign had been treated, and insisted that, as she had been denied the privilege of defending herself—a privilege freely accorded, as a matter of right, to common malefactors—she should be permitted forthwith to return to Scotland or to retire to France; and farther, as their own services were no longer required, they requested their dismissal. To this Elizabeth answered, that they were at liberty to go to Bolton and confer with their mistress, but should not be permitted to quit the kingdom until the conclusion of the conference.

A few days afterwards, Elizabeth wrote a letter

* Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., p. 170.

† Cabala, p. 155; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 213.

‡ Journals of the proceedings of the Lords of the Privy Council of England with some of the chief of the nobility, at Hampton Court, 14th and 15th days of December, 1568, Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 172, 173; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 51.

§ Goodall, vol. ii. pp. 257, 260, 263, 264.

* Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 146, 147.

† Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 150—154, 165—173; Goodall, vol. ii. pp. 141, and 257—259; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 466.

Meeting of the Privy Council, 14th Dec.

Elizabeth sends again for Mary's commissioners.

Her proposals to them.

to Mary, in which, as well as in all her subsequent Elizabeth writes letters to the Queen of Scots, we to Mary. no longer meet with those expressions of respect and affection which she had so hypocritically employed in all her former communications. On this occasion, she blamed Mary's commissioners for breaking up the conference without replying to the regent's accusation, and then added, "We have long been very sorry for your mishaps and great troubles, but we find our sorrows now doubled in beholding such things as are produced to prove yourself the cause of all the same. And our grief therein is also increased, in that we did not think at any time to have seen or heard matters of so great apparance and moment to charge and condemn you; nevertheless, both in friendship, and nature, and justice, we are moved to cover these matters, and stay our judgment, and not to gather any sense thereof to your prejudice, before we hear of your direct answer thereunto."* Before concluding, Elizabeth urged Mary to send an answer by one of the three methods proposed to her commissioners. It is impossible to determine with certainty whether this was really the point to which she was most desirous of bringing the matter, or whether, as is more probable, her object was to intimidate Mary, so as to induce her to ratify her abdication, to continue to reside in England, and to consent to her infant son being brought thither also, to be placed under Elizabeth's protection. At all events we find Elizabeth, the very next day, propounding this scheme in a private

Elizabeth writes to Knollys to urge Mary to resign her crown. communication to Knollys, in whose keeping Mary then was. She expressed herself desirous of proceeding no farther in the cause of the Scottish queen, and remarked that it would be much better to persuade Mary to resign the government into the hands of Moray, and to agree to reside in England; while the infant prince, for his safety, should be placed under the protection of the English queen. The more effectually to gain Mary's consent, she further suggested that the whole cause so long under trial should be consigned to perpetual silence;† and she artfully instructed Knollys to make it appear to Mary as if this suggestion was made by himself.

Rejecting with indignation this insidious proposal, as derogatory to her honour, Mary rejects the proposal. Mary wrote to her commissioners, directing them to demand inspection both of the originals and copies of the letters and other writings that had been produced against her, declaring her readiness, when this was done, to give in such answers as would not only fully establish her own innocence, but prove her enemies to have been themselves the authors and perpetrators of the crime which they charged upon her, their sovereign. Though clothed in the diction of the sixteenth century, this document, which is still extant, exhibits little or none of that heavy, lumbering style so common in writers of that period. It is fresh, eloquent, vigorous, pathetic; and, with some slight verbal alterations, might very well pass for a production of the present day. "Forasmuch," she says, "as the Earl of Moray and his Mary's letter adherents, our rebellious subjects, to her have added unto their pretended commissioners.

excuses, produced by them for colouring of their horrible crimes and offences committed against us, their sovereign lady and mistress, in these words: — 'That as the Earl of Bothwell hath been principal executor of the murder committed on the person of the late Henry Stewart, our husband, so we knew, concealed, devised, persuaded, and commanded the said murder.' The answer which we think good to be given them in our name thereon is, they have falsely, traitorously, and wickedly lied; imputing unto us maliciously the crime whereof they themselves are authors, inventors, doers, and some of them proper executors. And where they alleged that we impeded and stopped inquisition and due punishment to be made of the said murder, it is another calumny; to the which having sufficiently answered by the reply produced at York, wherein they were stricken dumb, and likewise in that which they rehearse of our marriage with the Earl Bothwell, think not necessary to make them further answer, but to refer them to the answer on both these points in the said reply. And, as to when they allege we should have been occasion to cause our son follow his father hastily, they cover themselves with a wet sack. And that calumny should suffice for proof and inquisition of all the rest. For the natural love of the mother toward her child confoundeth them; and the great thought that we ever had of our son sheweth how shamefully they are bold to set forth, not only that which conformably to the malice and impiety of their hearts they judge in others by their own proper affection, but of that whereof in their conscience they know the contrary."* She farther goes on to maintain, that their sole object was to obtain possession of her person, and usurp her authority; and that, for this purpose, they had feigned a wish to free her from the power of the Earl of Bothwell, who had seized her person with their consent; to avenge the murder of the king, of which they themselves had been guilty; and to preserve the life of the young prince, who was in the hands of the Earl of Mar, one of their own accomplices. Before concluding, she formally retracts her abdication, as having been extorted from her by force.†

Mary's commissioners, in obedience to her command, did not fail to accuse Moray and his confederates of the crime which they had imputed to their sovereign.‡ This unexpected denunciation

* Letter from Elizabeth to Mary, 21st Dec., 1568; Anderson, vol. iv., part ii., pp. 183, 184.

† Goodall, vol. ii. p. 279, 22nd Dec., 1568.

* Letter from Mary Stewart to the Bishop of Ross, Lord Herries, and the Abbot of Kilwinning, 19th December, 1568; Labanoff, vol. ii. pp. 259, 260; Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 463, 464.

† Ibid.

‡ Goodall, vol. i. pp. 271, 272; Laing, vol. i. p. 178.

greatly perplexed Elizabeth, who took time to deliberate on the matter, and to consult with Cecil as to the course she should pursue. In the meantime, however, the Bishop of Ross demanded an audience. His mistress, he said, was prepared to answer her accusers so soon as she had access to the writings, or at least copies of the writings, that had been produced in evidence against her; and he now, peremptorily required that, in common justice, these documents should be furnished to her, that she might prove her calumniators to be the authors of the murder they denounced, and expose them as liars and traitors before the whole world. This demand, so just and reasonable in itself, Elizabeth attempted to evade, by falling back on the original proposal of an abdication and a compromise; but Ross promptly replied, that he was commanded by his mistress to declare, once for all, that she never would consent to this proposal; that, on the production of the letters she was ready to defend herself; that she was even willing, on honourable and safe conditions, to extend her royal clemency to her adversaries, notwithstanding their aggravated offences; but that, to enter into any compromise with them, or to resign her rightful authority, would be to accuse herself; that this was a course she would rather die than adopt, and that the last words she should utter should be those of a queen of Scotland.*

By this resolution, if persevered in, Elizabeth's darling scheme, so long cherished and so unscrupulously pursued, was effectually frustrated. She was mortified to the heart, and, like a perverse child, testified her characteristic impatience of restraint and contradiction. She urged Ross to write again to his mistress, but he firmly refused. She next required him to hold a conference on the matter with her Privy Council. He complied, but would not move one hair's-breadth contrary to his instructions: he persisted in declaring Mary's determination to be final.

With a view to weaken, if not to nullify the impression made by the letters, the Bishop of Ross writes to Elizabeth. Bishop of Ross, not as a commissioner, but in his private capacity, as one concerned for the honour of his sovereign, wrote a letter to Elizabeth, in which he sets forth that the presumptions of Mary's criminality, arising out of these documents, would not be held sufficient to convict any private person. He argued that it could not be verified that the letters were written by her hand, and that it was highly improbable, even on the supposition of her guilt, that she would hazard her estate and character by such writings; that, moreover, his mistress had declared them to be forgeries; and that several persons were known to be able successfully to counterfeit her handwriting. He farther urged, with some reason, that parties who had been traitors to their sovereign, and had even had the presumption to imprison her person, were not likely to scruple to counterfeit her handwriting; and that persons who themselves stood chargeable with the crime of treason, could not be lawful accusers or witnesses in such a case. He adds—"If they would press to verify their cause by comparison of letters, the same is not sufficient, cum de jure fallacissimum sit genus probandi, per conjurationem literarum; that writings which are written in form of missive letters or epistles make no faith, specially where in the same no words depositive, or giving express command are contained, as in these may be seen; and also that they are not subscribed by her, sealed or signed, no certain date of year, month, or day set down."* Whether this letter had any influence on the mind of Elizabeth we have no means of ascertaining; but, in the absence of the writings themselves, or even authentic copies of them, the opinion of the Bishop of Ross (though an adherent of Mary), addressed to the English queen while the documents were still extant, may in some measure help to guide the judgment of posterity on the delicate and much vexed question to which his letter refers.

It is impossible to avoid the suspicion that the manifest and shameful partiality of Elizabeth in refusing to exhibit to Mary the writings produced in proof of her guilt, arose from some secret dread of the disclosures which might follow, tending to criminate Moray and his associates, whom she had determined at all hazards to support; yet the demand was in itself so reasonable, that, although she had resolved to avoid compliance with it, she was unwilling to incur the odium of an explicit and final denial. Moray earnestly requested permission to return to Scotland, on the plea that his adversaries were endeavouring in his absence to raise commotions in the kingdom. The conference was now dissolved; and it was in vain to expect that Mary would revoke her resolution, as communicated to her commissioners. No ingenuity, therefore, could find a plausible pretext for further protracting these negotiations. Nothing now remained but to pronounce judgment. Accordingly, on the 10th of January, 1569, Moray and his associates were summoned to appear before the Privy Council, to receive the final judgment of Elizabeth in this important cause. Cecil, in the queen's name, then informed them that, in her majesty's opinion, "nothing had been as yet adduced against him (Moray) and his adherents that might impair their honour and allegiance;" while, with regard to Mary, "on the other hand, nothing had been sufficiently proven or shown by them against the queen, their sovereign, whereby the Queen of England should conceive any evil opinion of her good sister." In the conclusion of his address, he informed Moray that he should forthwith receive permission to return to Scotland, and resume his government.†

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 467.

† Goodall, vol. ii. pp. 301, 305; Labanoff, Chronological Summary; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 60; Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 216, 217.

* Goodall, vol. ii. p. 301.

It is needless to comment on the utter absurdity and inconsistency of this sentence; these must be palpable to the plainest understanding. As emanating from Elizabeth herself, after so many displays of tortuous and contradictory policy, shuffling, evasion, subterfuge, and tergiversation, it needs excite no surprise; she, like the unjust judge, "feared not God, neither regarded man." But it is certainly matter of surprise that men like Cecil, claiming to be men of honour, high in social position and official station, and ranking among the acutest intellects of the age, should, by concurring in such a judgment, subject themselves to the merited condemnation and unmitigated contempt of posterity. This conclusion, however, was in perfect accordance with Elizabeth's original policy; and, indeed, seems to have been resolved on before the meeting of the conference at York, as plainly intimated by Norfolk at his first secret interview with the regent.* Nor need we be at any loss to discover what Elizabeth's motive was in thus instituting proceedings which she intended from the first should end precisely where they began, and leave the great matter in dispute just where she found it. That object was unequivocally manifested towards the conclusion. It was, so effectually to damage the reputation of her unfortunate relative, as to furnish a plausible pretext for detaining her as a prisoner in England; and so to humble her spirit as to induce her to consent finally to ratify her abdication, and to signify her willingness that the infant prince should be transferred to the custody of the English queen. Matters being so arranged, Elizabeth expected to be able to exercise, though indirectly, a paramount influence in Scottish affairs, especially as the regent would thus be indebted to her for the confirmation of his authority, and partly dependant on her for its continuance.

The last scene of the drama had yet to be enacted; and before the regent re-
The regent confronted with Mary's commissioners. ceived permission to depart, he was once more, at his own desire, confronted with Mary's commissioners.† A meeting of the English council was summoned at Hampton Court. There were present the Duke of Norfolk; the Earls of Pembroke, Derby, Bedford, and Leicester; Sir William Cecil, and Sir Walter Mildmay. Ross and Herries, on the one side, and Moray, Morton, Lethington, Macgill, Orkney, Balnaves, and Buchanan, on the other, were summoned to attend. Cecil opened the proceedings by delivering a message from the queen, to the effect that she had resolved to give permission to the Earl of Moray and his adherents to return to Scotland; but a report having been spread abroad that they had been concerned in the murder of the late king, Moray had desired to meet the deputies of the Queen of Scots, and he now wished to know whether, in their own name, or in that of their mistress, they were prepared to make such an accusation against him and his friends.* Mary's commissioners replied, that, in their own name, they had not hitherto, and would not now prefer any accusation; but that they had written instructions from the queen, their mistress, to accuse Moray and his party as the chief authors of that murder, and some of them as its actual perpetrators; that these instructions had been communicated to the English queen; and that the charge had been publicly made, and never departed from. They farther declared, that if they were allowed to inspect the writings produced against their mistress, or authentic copies of them, they were ready not only to prove her innocence, but to show by incontestable evidence who the parties were that had committed this foul deed.† Moray strongly, and with great apparent indignation, asserted his innocence; and offered to proceed to Bolton, to answer to the charge in the presence of his sister. He was told, however, that this was quite unnecessary, as her written accusation had already been submitted to the English queen. What result was expected from this meeting does not very clearly appear; but, whatever was its object, it broke up, like all the others, without arriving at any definite conclusion.

Next day (12th January) the regent received permission to return to Scotland;‡

but before his departure he was supplied with a considerable sum of money by the English queen,

The regent receives permission to return to Scotland.

who, at the same time, promised to support to the utmost of her power the authority of the young king.§ Shortly after, Mary's deputies were again called on to appear before a meeting of the Privy Council, when Mary's deputies again called before the Privy Council.

Cecil informed them that the original writings produced against the Scottish queen had been delivered back to the regent; but that his mistress had consented to furnish copies of them to Mary, on condition of her giving a declaration, under her hand and seal, that she would reply to the charges contained in them. The deputies replied, that two written declarations of the kind required had already been communicated to the English queen, and that to ask for more would only be productive of unnecessary and inconvenient delay. They complained of the partiality and injustice which had been displayed in the conduct of these proceedings; and demanded to know, since the regent and his associates were permitted to depart, why this privilege was still denied to their mistress, and even to themselves. The regent, they added, ought to have been detained to answer to the charges brought against him, if the Queen of England was really desirous that the Scottish queen should enter on her defence. To this it was answered, that the regent had engaged to return when required, and that they would also probably be allowed to depart; but with respect to the Queen of Scots, she could not

* See supra, p. 92.

† Goodall, vol. ii. p. 307; Laing, vol. i. pp. 185, 186.

* Goodall, vol. ii. p. 307.

† Ibid., p. 309.

† Ibid., p. 308.

§ Ibid.

be permitted to leave the kingdom. The deputies energetically denounced this iniquitous determination, and withdrew; after having formally protested against anything that might be done to the prejudice of the estate, honour, or person of their mistress, and against the validity of any documents they might cause her to sign during her captivity.*

Mary, in the meantime, had been removed from Bolton to Tutbury, as being at a greater distance from the Scottish frontier; and transferred from the custody of Lord Scrope, brother-in-law to the Duke of Norfolk, to that of the Earl of Shrewsbury.† She arrived at Tutbury on the 3rd February; and, four days afterwards, the Bishop of Ross, Lord Herries, and her other commissioners, waited on her, to present her with the account they had prepared of the conferences at York and Westminster, and to receive her approbation of their proceedings.‡

It is not to be wondered at that Mary, exasperated at the treatment she had received at the hands of her perfidious and unnatural kinswoman, should now concert measures for her own deliverance and the punishment of her enemy. With this view she entered into correspondence with her partisans in Scotland, and encouraged and entreated them to hold themselves in readiness to commence a contest on her behalf.§ She endeavoured to interest the court of France in her favour, to excite the Spaniards to an invasion of the island, and to rouse the Roman Catholics in the north of England in her defence.|| In the meantime, a scheme had been concocted by Elizabeth, in conjunction with Cecil, her principal minister, for drawing the affairs of Scotland entirely within her own control, and ultimately bringing that country under the domination of England. By this project,—an outline of which in the handwriting of its author is still extant,—the young prince was to be sent by Moray to be educated in England, under the inspection of Elizabeth; Moray was to be nominally dependant on the English queen, by whom his whole public policy was to be dictated; while Mary was to be persuaded, by certain arguments minutely detailed by Cecil, to remain in England.¶

Mary was not long discovering this iniquitous plot, and having communicated it, in a highly coloured and probably somewhat exaggerated form, to her friends in Scotland, the whole country was roused to indignation. The intelligence flew like lightning from one extremity of the kingdom to the other. It was represented that the regent had sold his country to the English queen, “had offered to put the young king in her hands, and to deliver to her the castles of Edinburgh and Stirling, and to receive English garrisons in them, and to do his endeavour to put in her hands all the rest of the strengths of the realm; that the regent should be legitimated and proclaimed successor, if the young king died without issue, and that he should hold the kingdom in fealty and homage of the Queen of England.”* Among other rumours far too improbable for belief, it was alleged that an arrangement had been made for settling the English succession on the Earl of Hertford, who had engaged to marry one of the daughters of Cecil.† To allay the ferment excited by these reports, Elizabeth issued a proclamation, in which she specifically notices, and pointedly denies, every one of them in detail. With regard to the transference of the young prince to England, she says, “Although it is truth that some motions have been made,—as well by the Earl of Lennox and the lady his wife, being, as it is known, parents to the late murdered father of the prince, as by others,—that if hereafter it should be seen that the said prince could not safely continue in Scotland, from the attempts of the murderers of his father, and others his mortal enemies, that then he might be nourished in England, under the custody of such as now have the charge of him, and are known to have most tender care of him. But hereof was there never more of convention or accord; neither yet was there heard of her majesty any word of the Earl of Moray, or any of his company, to allow of any removing of the same prince out of Scotland, or out of the charge of them that now have his custody.”‡ This statement, though destitute of truth, has nevertheless an appearance of candour, which must have told in Elizabeth’s favour, and tended to re-assure the minds of the people of Scotland.

Moray, though he had received permission to return to Scotland, was in no haste to commence his journey. He had placed himself in a very embarrassing and even dangerous predicament. The Duke of Norfolk was greatly enraged against him for having broken the promises he had made at York, and thus damaged the cause of Mary, and interposed fresh obstacles in the way of the duke’s marriage, so ardently desired, with that princess; and as the power of that nobleman was paramount in the northern counties of England, through which Moray must necessarily pass on his homeward journey, he was, not without reason, in dread of being waylaid and assassinated before he could reach the Scottish border. Nor was this all; the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland were Elizabeth issues a proclamation to the Scottish people.

Moray’s dangerous position.

* Goodall, vol. ii. pp. 310, 313; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 219; Labanoff.

† Labanoff, vol. ii. pp. 279, 280, 286, 296.

‡ Ibid., pp. 296, 297.

§ Labanoff; Mignet, vol. ii. pp. 64, 65.

|| Mignet, vol. ii. p. 65.

¶ MS. British Museum, Caligula CI, fol. 273, 22nd December, 1568; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 223.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 473, 474; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 223.

† Robertson, vol. i. p. 494.

‡ Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 475; Haynes, pp. 500–503; Robertson, Appendix, No. xxviii.

exasperated at his having accused of such heinous crimes the Catholic heir to the English throne, to whose accession the Romish party looked forward with such high expectations; and, it is alleged, that a plot for the destruction of the regent had actually been organised, with the cognisance of both Mary and Norfolk, and the execution of it entrusted to the Earl of Westmoreland.* In this perplexing and perilous situation, Moray, through the intervention of Throckmorton, sought an interview with Norfolk;† during which he expressed deep contrition for what he had done, but declared that he was involuntarily drawn into the line of conduct he had pursued through the stratagems of the English queen. He affirmed that his only motive for having engaged at all in this distressing controversy, was his desire for the safety of the young prince, his sovereign; that his affection for his sister, who had ever been dear to him, remained unaltered; and that, if she would only renounce her impious marriage with Bothwell, and espouse some honourable person, such as the duke himself, he would be happy to promote the union, convinced as he was that it would be for the benefit of both nations. He even mentioned the affair to the Bishop of Ross, dispatched Robert Melvil to Mary herself on the same errand, and promised to use his influence with the Scottish nobility to obtain their consent. By these promises and assurances he completely succeeded in re-establishing himself in the fa-

ciled to Norfolk. vour of Norfolk, who forthwith sent injunctions to his adherents to abstain from obstructing the progress of the regent;‡ and, at parting, the duke pathetically exclaimed, "Earl of Moray, thou hast Norfolk's life in thy hands!"§ Moray was fully aware of the plots which had been concocted for his destruction, and had the precaution to remain several weeks in London, after having obtained leave to depart.||

Even Mary herself was deceived by Moray's professions and promises. She had a numerous and influential party in Scotland still devoted to her cause; and she had appointed as her lieutenants the Duke of Chatelherault and the Earls of Argyle and Huntley; to the first of whom she had given the flattering title of her adopted father. The duke had the whole strength of the Hamiltons at his command; the influence of the two earls was predominant in the north; and Lord Boyd, with other powerful nobles, were enthusiastic in her cause. Nevertheless, Mary was so far imposed upon by Moray's artifices, that she enjoined her adherents in Scotland to abstain in the meantime from all hostilities. At the same time the English queen, having been apprised of Moray's danger by means of intercepted letters and sundry reports, thinking her own credit at stake, sent strict injunctions to the wardens of the northern counties, that when the regent came near the Borders they should take care to have him safely conveyed into Scotland. Many of the courtiers, too, offered to accompany him with a retinue; but this he courteously declined. Lord Home, also, having learned that the hostile lords had raised two hundred Liddesdale men for the purpose of intercepting the regent between Morpeth and Berwick, advertised Lord Hunsdon, the Governor of Berwick, of the circumstance, and Moray arrives in Scotland, sent post to the regent himself, 2nd Feb., 1569. desiring him to be upon his guard. In consequence of these precautions, and of direct instructions from Elizabeth herself, Moray was escorted to Berwick by a numerous company of armed men, and he reached Scotland in safety on the 2nd day of February, 1569.*

The regent, on his return, found the kingdom comparatively tranquil; but he was too well aware of the strength and deeply-rooted hostility of his adversaries to allow himself to be lulled into a false security. On the 12th of February he summoned a convention at Stirling, consisting of the nobility, clergy, and commissaries of the burghs, and obtained from them a general approbation of his conduct, and a ratification of his proceedings in England. He next gave orders for an immediate muster of his troops, and marched without loss of time to Glasgow, determined to surprise his enemies before they had leisure either to deliberate or to organise their forces.†

The Duke of Chatelherault having now returned to Scotland, his adherents assembled in great numbers, and having been joined by Cassillis and Lord Herries, he issued a proclamation, as the queen's deputy, commanding that no orders should be obeyed except those which were issued by himself and such persons as he might appoint, and stigmatising the regent as a usurper.‡ Disconcerted, however, by the activity and energy displayed by Moray, the duke and his adherents, whose followers lying in different quarters of the kingdom had not had time to unite their strength, were reduced to the necessity of coming to an accommodation. At a personal conference held with the regent at Glasgow, on the 13th of March, a provisional treaty of peace was concluded.§ It was stipulated, on the one hand, that the duke's party should acknowledge the young king's authority; and, on the other, that all who had been forfeited

He summons a convention at Stirling, 12th Feb.

The Duke of Chatelherault and his party meet the regent at Glasgow.

* Murdin's State Papers, p. 51; Melvil's Memoirs, p. 99.
† Melvil's Memoirs, p. 98.

‡ Melvil's Memoirs, p. 99; Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 40, 41; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 224.

§ Robertson, Appendix xxxiii.; Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 36—39; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 63.

|| Letter from Moray, Robertson, Appendix xxxiii.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 476, 477.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Moray to Cecil, 8th February, 1568-9; ibid., same to same, 17th February, 1568-9; ibid., 25th February, 1568-9; ibid., B C, Moray to Sir John Foster, 15th March, 1568-9.

‡ Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 477.

§ Journal of Occurrences, p. 141; MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 13th March, 1568-9.

for their adherence to the queen should be restored, and that measures consistent with the sovereignty of the king should be taken for upholding her honour and dignity. It was farther agreed, that a committee selected from the nobles on both sides, and including the regent himself, the duke, the

A committee appointed for the pacification of the kingdom.

Earls of Argyle and Huntley, Morton, Mar, Atholl, Glencairn, and Lord Herries, should assemble at Edinburgh on the 10th of April, and concert measures for a general and definitive pacification of the kingdom. Finally, the regent agreed that the duke and his adherents should be allowed to return in security to their estates, whilst they consented to disband their forces, and to surrender, if required, themselves or their eldest sons as securities for the due performance of their part of the treaty.* This arrangement being concluded, the leaders of both parties repaired to Stirling to pay-homage to the young king; and there the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, the Earl of Cassillis, and Lord Herries, delivered themselves up to the regent as hostages; while he, on the other hand, liberated the prisoners who had been taken at the battle of Langside.†

The regent, with his characteristic vigilance and

The regent marches his troops to the Border.

activity, hastened to turn to account the interval of tranquillity thus afforded him. Instead of disbanding his forces, as was expected, he marched them against the Border freebooters, whose excesses, during his absence in England, had given rise to much grievous complaint and alarm throughout the frontiers of both kingdoms. In this expedition he was completely successful; and he and his followers, animated with fresh confidence in their own prowess, returned to Edinburgh in triumph.

In the meantime, Mary and her friends in England had not been idle. Plans had been secretly formed and matured, and negotiations entered into for her restoration; and the French king, having nearly completed his subjugation of the Huguenots, would, it was hoped, in a short time be at leisure to render assistance to his friends in Scotland. Mary, however, alarmed at the defection of her adherents and their recognition of the young king's authority, wrote to the duke and Lord Herries, expressing astonishment and dissatisfaction at the course they had adopted.‡ Her letters reached them the evening before the convention, and occasioned them such poignant distress, that the duke wept the whole night, Herries even fell sick,§ and both resolved to retract their acknowledgment of the king's authority.

Schemes of Mary and her friends in England.

On the morrow, the duke, Herries, Cassillis, and other nobles, who composed the committee, met at Edinburgh, as agreed on. Huntley and Argyle, who had refused to be included in the treaty, were not present. As a preliminary to the proceedings, the regent handed to the duke a paper containing an acknowledgment of the king's authority, and desired him to sign it. The duke objected to this demand as premature. They had met, he said, to deliberate regarding the measures to be pursued with respect to their captive queen, and this matter being arranged to their mutual satisfaction, he and his adherents were prepared to sign the acknowledgment. They had, he continued, observed every article of the treaty; they had placed themselves confidently in his power; they had delivered hostages into his hands, and their lives and properties were now at his disposal; but they acted in reliance on his honour, and trusted that he would not sully his own reputation by deceiving them. The regent, without answering this remonstrance, immediately ordered his guards to arrest the duke and Herries. The latter was conveyed, a prisoner, to the castle without a moment's delay; and next morning the duke himself was subjected to the same indignity, both being placed in the custody of Kirkaldy of Grange.*

Meeting of the committee at Edinburgh.

The Duke of Chatelherault and Lord Herries imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle.

This unwarrantable and violent stretch of authority excited alarm and indignation throughout the country, and alienated from the regent many who had hitherto been his friends. The opposite party were exasperated beyond measure; but the regent allowed them no time to rally. He immediately marched his troops against Argyle and Huntley, who had risen in arms in the north, and who, in fact, had nearly the whole power of the northern districts at their command. Intimidated, however, by the bold conduct of the regent, finding him at the head of a numerous force, and having nothing less to expect, in case of defeat, than forfeiture and all the pains of treason, they did not venture to oppose him, but thought it prudent to come to an accommodation. Argyle was the first to submit, and Huntley, being left alone, soon afterwards followed his example. On the 10th of May they met at St. Andrew's, signed an acknowledgment of the authority of James VI., surrendered their artillery to the regent, and gave hostages for their peaceable behaviour for the time to come.† Pursuing his advantage, the regent now marched his army into the northern highlands, where the clans still remained faithful in their allegiance to the queen. He ravaged the Popular alarm and indignation. Argyle and Huntley submit to the regent.

The regent reduces the clans to obedience.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 15th March, 1569; Tytler; La Motte Fénélon, Correspondence, vol. i. pp. 300—302; Mignet.

† Tytler, vol. iii. p. 226; Cabbala, p. 161; Crawford's Memoirs, p. 106; Robertson; Tytler.

‡ Despatch from La Motte Fénélon to Charles IX., 6th May, 1569; Mignet.

§ Ibid.

* Melvil's Memoirs, p. 219; History of James the Sixth, pp. 39, 40; MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Herries to Elizabeth, 5th July, 1569; Tytler; Crawford's Memoirs, p. 111.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B. C., Lord Hunsdon to Cecil, 19th May, 1569; Spottiswood, p. 229; Tytler, Mignet.

country, took possession of the castles, levied heavy fines on all who had distinguished themselves in the queen's cause; and, finally, succeeded in reducing them to obedience, and compelling them to swear allegiance to the king.

In the meantime, a numerous and influential party had been secretly organised in England for the purpose of promoting a marriage between Mary and the Duke of Norfolk. This union seemed a desirable one to men of all parties. The health of Elizabeth was in such a precarious condition, and had been liable for some time to such frequent fluctuations, that she was not expected long to survive; and as she had hitherto obstinately refused to regulate the succession to the crown, all classes looked forward with apprehension to the calamity of a dynastic war, such as had convulsed and desolated the country for nearly half a century, in consequence of the rival pretensions of the houses of York and Lancaster. The marriage of the first nobleman in the kingdom with the most direct descendant of Henry VII., and the nearest relative of the present sovereign, seemed to give assurance of an easy and peaceable solution of this difficulty, and was therefore looked on as a very desirable event. The Protestant party would view with pleasure the elevation of Norfolk, who professed to be a Protestant, to a position in which he might prove a bulwark to the established Church; and the Romanists gladly anticipated the accession of a princess under whose rule they might confidently hope, if not for ascendancy, at least for the utmost toleration. Accordingly, the scheme was joyfully acquiesced in by a large part of the nobility and other persons of influence both in England and Scotland. In the former, the Earl of Arundel, a member of the Privy Council, the Earl of Pembroke, Master of the Queen's Household, the Earls of Westmoreland and Northumberland, Lord Lumley, and other noblemen, all Roman Catholics, fully concurred in the project; and the Earls of Cumberland, Bedford, Sussex, and Derby, whom Norfolk consulted on the subject, gave at least a tacit approval. Even Leicester himself professed to be zealous in the cause, though his sincerity seems open to suspicion. Throckmorton and Cecil also signified their approval, and contributed their assistance.* In Scotland the scheme received the apparent concurrence of the regent and his secretary, John Wood, and was actively promoted by Lethington and the Bishop of Ross. Norfolk looked abroad as well as at home for assistance. He consulted with the ambassadors of France and Spain,† and received from them an assurance of the favourable disposition of their respective sovereigns;‡ nor did he and his coadjutors despair of obtaining the assent of Elizabeth, even by force, if other means should fail.*

Impatient of the state of captivity in which she was so long and unjustly detained, Mary writes to and reduced to desperation by the Elizabeth. discomfiture and dispersion of her party, Mary now wrote in dignified and energetic terms to the English queen. She denounced the violent proceedings of Moray, who, notwithstanding Elizabeth's pledges, had proceeded to put down by force of arms, and to treat as rebels, all who had remained faithful in their allegiance to their queen; and she requested, once for all, and "without any further trifling," to be explicitly informed whether or not Elizabeth intended to restore her to her country. "Any other answer," she added, "I cannot but take to be a refusal, which would cause me, to my great regret, to accept any other aid that it might please God to send me."† Elizabeth, whose relations with foreign powers, particularly with France and Spain, were at that moment in a very precarious state, was justly alarmed by this menace; and, in accordance with her usual temporising policy, sought to avert the danger, or at least to postpone the crisis, by entering into a negotiation with the captive queen. Recognising the Bishop of Ross as Mary's ambassador, she feigned a willingness to treat on the basis of certain proposals made by the bishop, and submitted to her and her Privy Council. In these proposals, which are said to have Elizabeth's been drawn up by Leicester,‡ it proposals.

was stipulated: First, that the Scottish queen shall not disturb the government of the Queen of England, or the legitimate heirs of her body, by affecting any title to the crown during their lifetime, provided that, in their defect, the title of the Queen of Scotland and her heirs to the succession be fully recognised. Secondly, a treaty of alliance and friendship between the two kingdoms shall be entered into with the advice of the Estates in both countries. Thirdly, the two foregoing stipulations shall be confirmed by the oath of both queens, and sealed with their seals, having first been ratified by the parliaments of both nations; and, as a further guarantee on the part of the Queen of Scots, she will procure the Kings of France and Spain to be securities for the fulfilment of her promises. Fourthly, the Queen of Scotland shall extend her clemency to all her subjects who have offended her during the late troubles, provided they be now willing to return to their allegiance, to give up to her keeping the young prince her son, to restore to her her jewels and other property of which they had deprived her, and to deliver over to her the strongholds of the kingdom, now in their possession. Fifthly, all concerned in the planning and execution of the murder of the late king shall be

* Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 51, 61, 62; Camden's Elizabeth, Kennet, vol. ii. p. 420; Throckmorton to Lethington, 20th July, 1569; Robertson, Appendix xxxii; Tytler; Mignet.

† Despatch from La Motte Fénelon, vol. ii. p. 127.

‡ Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 63.

* Despatch from La Motte Fénelon, 27th July, 1569, vol. ii. pp. 126, 127.

† Mary to Elizabeth, 26th April, 1569, Labanoff, vol. ii. p. 333.

‡ Camden's Elizabeth, Kennet, vol. ii. pp. 419, 420.

brought to trial without delay, and punished according to the laws of the realm. Sixthly, the queen shall promise never again to receive into her kingdom the Earl of Bothwell, but shall, by the advice and consent of her nobles, obtain a divorce from him. Seventhly, all these stipulations having been agreed to, the Queen of England shall provide an honourable escort to convey the Queen of Scotland back to her dominions, where she shall be re-instated in her authority, and all acts and statutes to the contrary shall be annulled.* These proposals having been deliberately considered and adopted by the Privy Council, Lord Boyd was dispatched with them to Mary, with the understanding that, if they obtained her consent, they were to be submitted to the consideration of the Scottish nobility. Without the knowledge of Elizabeth, to these articles there was added one relating to the marriage of the Scottish queen with the Duke of Norfolk, and recommending this union as calculated to promote the tranquillity and cement the friendship of the two kingdoms. The article runs thus: "Because it was feared that the Queen of Scotland might marry some foreign prince, whereby the religion of the country might be altered, and the good estate of both realms endangered, it is therefore desirable that she should accept some nobleman of England in marriage, specially the Duke of Norfolk, who is first of the nobility of that realm, and most fit of all others."† To add greater weight to this overture, the Earls of Leicester, Arundel, and Pembroke, and Lord Lumley, sent Mr. Candish as a special messenger to accompany Lord Boyd to Tutbury, carrying with him some valuable presents to Mary, together with a very affectionate letter written by Leicester himself.‡ Mary at once assented to nearly all the conditions proposed; but, with regard to some of them, she requested time to consult some of her foreign allies. Respecting the marriage with Bothwell, she said, in reply to Mr. Candish, "that

Mary's answer. she had been so vexed by her marriages in times past, that she had no thought of any such matter, but rather was minded to live a solitary life all her days; yet, nevertheless," she added, "all other things being agreed and concluded to her honourable satisfaction, she was content to use the advice of the queen and nobility of England in her marriage, and specially in favour of the Duke of Norfolk, whom she liked before all others, because he was well reported of and loved by the nobility and estates of his country."§

The projected marriage was still carefully concealed from Elizabeth; but being strongly urged to complete a treaty for the restoration of Mary, on the basis of the proposals made by the Bishop of Ross, she once more submitted the matter to the consideration of her Privy Council. The conference resulted in Lord Boyd being dispatched to Scotland with the proposals of the Queen of England and her nobility.* He carried with him letters to the regent from Elizabeth, Mary, the Duke of Norfolk, and Sir Nicholas Throckmorton. He met Lord Boyd dispatched to Scotland with proposals from Elizabeth, and letters to the regent. Moray at Elgin, on his return from his expedition against the clans of the north, and presented him with his letters and despatches. In the letter of the English queen, three propositions were made with respect to Mary, any one of which might be adopted. First, she might be re-instated unconditionally and absolutely in her authority as Queen of Scotland; or, secondly, she might be associated with her son in the government of the kingdom, while Moray should continue to act as regent, until the prince should attain the age of seventeen years; or, thirdly, without having any share in the government, she might reside in Scotland as a private individual, but enjoy the title of queen in public acts and patents, and be provided with a maintenance suited to her exalted rank.† Mary's letter chiefly referred to her marriage with Bothwell, and intimated her desire that that marriage should be reviewed by properly qualified judges, in order that, if found illegal, it might be declared null, and she should be free to marry whom she pleased. Norfolk, in his letters to the regent, reminded him of his promise when they last met with regard to the marriage, and urged him to its fulfilment. "I have proceeded," he said, "so far therein that I can neither with conscience revoke what I have done, nor with honour proceed further, until you shall remove all such stumbling blocks as are hinderances to our more apparent proceedings. When these obstacles are removed, the rest shall follow to your contentment and comfort. Wherefore my earnest request to you, my good lord, now is, that you will proceed herein with such promptitude, that the enemies to this good purpose of uniting this land into one kingdom in time coming, and of maintaining God's true religion, may not have opportunity, through delay, to hinder our determination."‡ He farther referred the regent to Lord Boyd for the removal of any doubts or scruples he might entertain; and, in conclusion, assured him that he felt for him the affection not only of a faithful friend, but of a natural brother.§

Throckmorton had entrusted Lord Boyd with letters both to the regent and to Lethington. To the former he remarked, that he must now lay aside all his conscientious doubts and scruples; that the proposed marriage of his sister with Norfolk had gained the approbation and support of a party so numerous and powerful that opposition on his part would be not only vain, but ruinous; while, on the other hand, his active co-operation would render

* Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 46—49; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 79.

† Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 50—52.

‡ Camden, vol. i. p. 186.

§ Ibid., vol. ii. pp. 53, 54.

* Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 51, 55.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 489; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 232; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 85.

‡ Letter from Norfolk to Moray, 1st July, 1569, in Haynes, p. 620.

§ Ibid.

him one of the most beloved and popular men of which the kingdom could boast. To Lethington, with whom he had contracted an intimate friendship during his frequent embassies to Scotland, he also strenuously recommended the union as a most fortunate one for both kingdoms, and urged him to promote it to the utmost of his ability. He assured him that the whole nobility of England were in favour of the project; that even Cecil himself had signified his approval; and that it only remained now to obtain the consent of Queen Elizabeth, which he believed would not be refused. "It has been hitherto," he added, "concealed from Elizabeth that you, as the fittest minister, might propound it to her on behalf of the regent and nobility of Scotland."*

Lethington was perhaps as eager for the accomplishment of the project as Throckmorton himself. With the regent, however, the case was different. The restoration of the queen would obviously involve the downfall of his own authority; and he was too ambitious of power, and had already sacrificed too much both of principle and character to acquire and to retain it, recklessly to lend himself to the promotion of a scheme by which it would be wrested from his hands. He was, however, desirous of saving appearances with Norfolk, whom it would now be dangerous, as well as disgraceful, a second time to deceive. He accordingly flattered Lord Boyd into the belief that he was personally anxious to forward the views of Norfolk, and would do his utmost to promote them. At the same time he referred him to the General Assembly of the Estates of the kingdom, which he had appointed to meet on the 26th of July. Meanwhile, however, with profound dissimulation, he secretly endeavoured to persuade his adherents to reject the proposal as fraught with danger both to the cause of the Reformation and of the young prince.†

The regent summons a General Assembly of the Estates of the kingdom.

The important convention, on which so many

Meeting of the Assembly, 26th July. hopes and fears were suspended, met at Perth, as had been appointed, on the 26th July. The three proposals transmitted by the English queen claimed priority of consideration; and the result was precisely what that crafty princess had desired and anticipated, and the regent had laboured to secure. The first proposition—that Mary should be re-instated in her sovereign authority as Queen of Scotland—was rejected without discussion. The second—that she should be associated in the government with her son—was voted dangerous, if not impracticable.‡ The third—that she should live in Scotland as a private individual—though not absolutely rejected, met with but little favour, and after a brief discussion, was reserved for future consideration.

* Sir Nicholas Throckmorton to Lord Lethington, 20th July, 1569, Robertson, Appendix xxxii.

† Anderson, vol. iii. p. 70.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Lord Hunsdon to Cecil, Berwick, 5th August, 1569; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 85.

When Mary's letter respecting a divorce from Bothwell was read to the convention a debate ensued, in which Violent discussions.

much violence and acrimony were displayed on both sides. In this discussion Lethington, on the one side, and Macgill, the Clerk-Register, on the other, took a prominent part. The former strongly advocated the dissolution of the marriage, and maintained that this might be effected without detriment either to the Church or the young king. Macgill, in reply, stigmatised the style of Mary's letter as an insult to their sovereign, inasmuch as she had designated herself Queen of Scotland, whereas they had no other sovereign than the young king, her son. He further expressed indignation at her having addressed as head of the Church the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, "an obstinate rebel, a heretic, and a papist." He maintained that the convention, by listening to such a proposal, would in some degree admit its justice; while to grant it, would involve them in the guilt of treason and blasphemy. It was answered that, as to the style of the queen's letter, a new procuration would be obtained, conceived in such terms as would be agreeable to all parties. To this it was replied, that there was no occasion for haste; for, as Bothwell was out of the country, the law required that he should have a citation of sixty days, within which time she would have leisure to send a new commission; but, if she really desired to get rid of Bothwell, she might write to the King of Denmark, requesting that he might be put to death for the murder of her husband, and then she might marry whom she pleased.* Lethington taunted his opponents, who had recently been clamorous for a divorce, with having so suddenly and unaccountably changed their minds, when he was interrupted by Richardson, the Treasurer, who charged him with having spoken treasonably, inasmuch as he had argued against the authority of the king; and he denounced as traitors, and threatened with the penalties of the law, all who should dare to support him. This menace put an end to this tumultuous debate; Mary's application for a divorce Mary's divorce was refused,† and the Assembly refused. broke up in anger and confusion. Thus were the prospects of the unfortunate Mary for a moment lighted up with an illusory gleam, only to be enveloped in more hopeless obscurity; whilst her relentless cousin, and her brother, triumphed in the success of their cruel and treacherous policy.

A still heavier trial, however, awaited the captive queen. Her plans, and those of the Duke of Norfolk, had been confided to so many persons of different ranks in society that rumours of the matter, as might have been expected, at last reached the watchful ears of Elizabeth. At first she was not aware that the project had been so far matured, and had extended into so many ramifications, so that she contented herself for the present with mysterious hints to Norfolk about his ambition, desiring him to take care on what pillow he laid his head, and commanding him, on pain of forfeiting his allegiance, to have nothing more to do with the Queen of Scots. Her suspicions, however, being now awakened, she could not rest until she had laid open the whole of the intrigue, which, in the progress of her investigation, began to assume an aspect at once threatening and mysterious. She soon discovered that even her council were in favour of this project, and had already given it both countenance and support. She was still farther alarmed to find that the hopes of the Romish party had become strangely revived and elevated in the anticipation of this union; and as La Motte Fénélon was incessantly urging her, in the name of his sovereign, to re-instate the Queen of Scots in her dominion, she now angrily replied that she would never give her consent to this proposal, and that Mary had by her crimes deserved the imprisonment to which she was subjected. "I am aware," she said, "of all the intrigues that have been carried on since she entered this kingdom. Princes have large ears, which hear far and near. She has attempted to move the interior of this realm against me, by means of some of my subjects, who promise her great things; but they are persons who conceive mountains, and bring forth only mole-hills. They thought I was so foolish that I should not perceive their doings."*

* Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 489, 490.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Lord Hunsdon to Cecil, Berwick, 5th August, 1569; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 235; Historie of James the Sext, p. 41.

Norfolk, notwithstanding the prohibition and threat of Elizabeth, did not abandon his project. He seems still to have clung to the belief that the full extent to which the intrigue had been carried might, for a time at least, be concealed from Elizabeth, and that at length a knowledge of the numbers and power of his party would intimidate her into a reluctant consent to the marriage. The dread, however, of some premature disclosure, together with some vague idea of prosecuting his design by means of a rising in his favour, if milder means

Norfolk should fail, induced him suddenly, withdraws from court. on the 23rd September, to withdraw from court to his seat in Norfolk; and, soon after, the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, and Lord Lumley, following his example, retired to their estates;† whilst the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland actually held themselves in readiness to effect a rising in the northern counties. They had already even proceeded so far as to contemplate changing the established religion of the country.‡ In the meantime, however, the whole

Elizabeth discovers the whole plot. plot was discovered by Elizabeth, whose indignation and resentment, now excited almost to frenzy, Leicester hastened to avert from himself by making a full disclosure of the secret. Several of his associates took the same course; and the regent himself, in answer to a message from the English queen, was so base and obsequious as at once to deliver into her hands the whole of his secret correspondence with Norfolk, together with an apology for the part he had taken in the transaction. He declared that the dread of assassination had induced him to lend his countenance to a scheme of which he never approved, and endeavoured to palliate his own offence and that of his supporters by representing that the leniency and even favour with which she herself had treated Mary, had left them in some measure in doubt as to the line of conduct they ought to have pursued.*

The regent delivers up to Elizabeth his correspondence with Norfolk.

The duke, on his arrival in Norfolk, surrounded himself with Roman Catholics. Indeed, though professing to be a Protestant, there is much reason to doubt his sincerity. Calderwood expressly affirms that, "howsoever the Duke of Norfolk made a show of profession of the true religion, yet was he in heart a papist. His sons were brought up in papistry; the chief men of trust in his house were papists; the last wife he married was a papist, and now he is as bent to marry a papist; his chief accomplices in the conspiracy were papists."† Norfolk's danger, however, was now imminent; and no alternative was left him but submission or rebellion. Had he followed the counsel of his friends, the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, he would at once have taken the field. But he was not equal to the occasion; for, at the last hour, a more timid policy prevailed. He wrote an humble letter to Elizabeth, attributing his absence from court to grief on account of her displeasure, assuring her that he had all along firmly resolved never to marry the Queen of Scots without her majesty's full consent, acknowledging his error in having so long delayed to acquaint her majesty with his wish, but protesting that he was as much as ever devoted to her service, and had never entertained any thought inconsistent with his allegiance to her as his sovereign. Elizabeth, however, was in no mood to listen to apologies and explanations; but, vouchsafing no answer, commanded him to return to London within four days, Norfolk is on pain of treason. She at the same time summoned the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, and Lord Lumley, to appear and take their places in the council without delay.‡ Norfolk hesitated for some days, and consulted Cecil as to his safety. Cecil induced him to believe, and probably himself believed, that the queen's resentment would proceed no farther than words. The duke accordingly obeyed the summons, and was forthwith committed to the Tower.§ Pembroke, Arundel, and Lumley, who at once obeyed

* Despatch of La Motte Fénélon, 1st September, 1569, vol. ii. pp. 211, 212.

† Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 72, 73.

‡ La Motte Fénélon's Correspondence, vol. i. p. 258—262, 16th March, 1569

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Moray to Cecil, Dumfries, 29th October, 1569; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 236.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 508.

‡ Haynes, pp. 529, 530.

§ Ibid., pp. 528, 533.

the royal mandate, and were not considered so deeply implicated as Norfolk, were confined and guarded in their own houses.*

Before his arrival in London, Norfolk had sent a special messenger to his brother-in-law, the Earl of Westmoreland, who, in conjunction with the Earl of Northumberland and others, was on the point of raising the standard of rebellion, desiring him in the meantime to keep quiet, as any appearance of insurrection would expose the duke to almost certain destruction. When the messenger reached Topcliff, the seat of the Earl of Northumberland, where the conspirators were then assembled ready for action, observing Westmoreland in the park, "he required him," in the duke's name, "for all the brotherly love that existed between them, not to stir; for, if he did, the said duke was then in danger of losing his head."† The surrender and imprisonment of Norfolk did not, however, prevent the outbreak of rebellion, though it lessened the probability of its success. The Romanists of the northern counties, animated with the most extravagant expectations of the ascendancy of their party, were all disposed to take up arms; and under the guidance of the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, and the heads of other ancient and powerful families residing in that quarter, had held frequent meetings to concert measures for the deliverance of the Queen of Scots, and the restoration of their ancient faith; when the Earl of Sussex, in obedience to the command of Elizabeth, summoned the two earls to meet him at York, and demanded to know what were their intentions. They, nevertheless, so far succeeded in imposing on the credulity of Sussex, and lulling his fears asleep, that they were permitted to remain at liberty. Still, however, they hesitated as to the course they should adopt, until at last their fears for their own safety impelled them to a decision; and, being again requested by Sussex to meet him at York, and commanded by the queen to attend her at court, they refused to obey; ‡ so that they had now no alternative but flight or open rebellion.

Northumberland and Westmoreland raise the standard of rebellion.

The latter was determined on; and accordingly, on the 14th of November, they marched from Brancepath, the residence of the Earl of Westmoreland, at the head of five hundred horsemen,§ and proceeded towards Durham. They were ranged under a banner containing a device intended to represent the Lord Jesus Christ on the cross, with his five bleeding wounds—an ensign plainly indicating the object of the enterprise.|| The people of Durham having opened their gates to the rebels, they found themselves, without a struggle, masters of the town; and proceeding to the cathedral, they burned the

Bible and service-book, broke in pieces the communion-table, and restored the Romish form of worship.* They then issued a proclamation, setting forth that their object was to procure the liberation of Mary and the

They take possession of Durham, and issue a proclamation.

recognition of her right of succession to the English throne; to re-establish the Roman Catholic religion; and to liberate the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, and Lord Lumley, whom they announced as being of their party.† "Forasmuch," they proclaimed, "as divers disordered and evil-disposed persons about the queen's majesty have, by their subtle and crafty dealing to advance themselves, overcome, in this our realm, the true and Catholic religion towards God, and by the same abused the queen, and disordered the realm,—and now, lastly, seek and procure the destruction of the nobility,—we therefore have gathered ourselves together, to resist by force, and the rather by the help of God and you good people, and to see redress of these things amiss, with restoring of all ancient customs and liberties to God's Church and this noble realm, lest if we should not do it ourselves, we might be reformed by strangers, to the great hazard of the State of this our country."‡ Such was the favourable reception of this proclamation that they speedily found themselves at the head of a thousand cavalry, and of five or six thousand infantry, in a state of tolerable equipment.§ They farther sought assistance from the King of Spain, and secured the co-operation of the Duke of Alva The Duke of Alva promises assistance. and the Bishop of Ross. Alva promised to aid them with a numerous force, and sent over to their assistance the Marquis of Vitelli, one of his ablest officers, under the pretence of carrying a message to Elizabeth. The queen, however, suspecting his real intentions, compelled him to leave his military escort at Dover; while he himself proceeded to London, with not more than five attendants.|| In the north the malcontents were joined by Sir Egremont Ratcliffe, brother to the Earl of Sussex,¶ while the earl himself, remaining true to his allegiance, prepared for the defence of York. The Wardens of the Eastern, Middle, and Western Marches, were in readiness to defend the towns of Berwick, Newcastle, and Carlisle.†† Meanwhile the insurgents, meeting with no opposition, made themselves masters of Richmond, Allerton, and Ripon; and Christopher Neville was sent to fortify Hartlepool, where supplies from the Duke of Alva were expected speedily to be landed.‡‡

Elizabeth, now seriously alarmed, began to take

* Sharpe's Memorials of the Rebellion, pp. 36, 37.

† Ibid., pp. 193, 202, 203.

‡ Strype, vol. i., part ii., p. 313.

§ Ibid., p. 315; Sharpe's Memorials, pp. 65, 66, 71.

¶ Gonzalez Apuntamientos, pp. 95, 96; Labanoff, vol. ii. pp. 386, 387; Haynes, pp. 541, 544.

¶ Sharpe's Memorials, p. 71.

 Ibid., pp. 76, 77.

†† Ibid., pp. 79, 80

‡‡ Ibid., p. 77.

* Haynes, pp. 534—536.

† Sharpe's Memorials of the Rebellion, Appendix, pp. 195, 196.

‡ Haynes, p. 52; Sharpe's Memorials, pp. 27, 292, 294.

§ Sharpe's Memorials, pp. 37, 322.

|| Strype's Annals of the Reformation, vol. i., part ii., p. 323.

most energetic measures for crushing the rebellion, and defending the country from foreign invasion. At the outbreak of the insurrection, the Scottish queen had been subjected to a more rigorous imprisonment, and for this purpose had been re-conveyed from Winkfield (where she had been confined for about five months) to Tutbury, and there committed to the custody of the Earl of Huntingdon, a nobleman who was particularly obnoxious to her, who was associated in his odious office with her former keeper, Shrewsbury. Her favourite domestics had been dismissed, her actions more strictly watched, and her letters intercepted.* Now, however, Elizabeth, justly dreading the effect of her liberation, if that should be attempted, ordered her to be removed from

Mary is removed Tutbury to Coventry,† where, it to Coventry. was hoped, she would be beyond the reach of the insurgent party; and this precaution, in fact, frustrated the intention of the rebels, who had actually resolved to march from Durham to Tutbury, in order to set Mary at liberty.‡ It even appears that an order under the Great Seal had been issued for her execution, which would have been carried into effect but for the speedy suppression of the rebellion.§ As a precaution against foreign invasion, Elizabeth gave orders for seven of her largest ships of war to cruise between the coasts of England and the Netherlands.|| She farther issued a proclamation, declaring the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland rebels and traitors; and gave orders to Lord Hunsdon and Sir Ralph Sadler to join the

Elizabeth northern contingents, under the adopts energetic Earl of Sussex, with all the forces measures. at their disposal.¶ She appointed lieutenants to levy subsidiary forces in the different counties of the kingdom, and gave directions for the immediate formation of two armies in the south, under the command respectively of the Earl of Warwick and Admiral Clinton, who had orders to proceed with all expedition towards York, to the assistance of the Earl of Sussex against the rebels.

While these exertions were being made on the part of the government, the rebel army had overrun the open country, and passed through the unfortified towns as far as Boroughbridge; but seeing no appearance of the succours they expected from the Pope and from Philip II. of Spain, they became dispirited, and, after a short delay, commenced a retrograde movement.†† Having in vain attempted

The rebels lay in their progress to intimidate the inhabitants of the larger towns, or to siege to seduce them from their allegiance. Its surrender. they laid siege to Barnard Castle. This fortress was gallantly defended for twelve days by Sir George Bowes; but provisions falling short, and a mutiny having arisen in the garrison, he was forced to surrender.* This, however, was the last success obtained by the rebels. The queen's forces, now organised and united as to their plans of action, were preparing to assail them at all points. Sir John Foster, Warden of the Middle Marches, surprised and took possession of Northumberland's castles of Alnwick and Warkworth, and effectually prevented any communication between him and his retainers in these quarters. He then directed his course towards Newcastle, where, having been joined by Sir Henry Percy, Northumberland's brother, he attacked and vanquished the rebels in the north of Durham.† Meanwhile the Earl of Sussex, with a force consisting of twelve hundred cavalry and four thousand foot soldiers, advanced to meet the insurgent army under the two earls, and to offer them battle;‡ and the united armies, amounting to twelve thousand men, under the command of the Earl of Warwick and Admiral Clinton, were advancing from the south by forced marches, to attack them.§ In these hopeless circumstances they assembled their followers at Durham, on the 16th December, and, resolving to abandon an enterprise in which it seemed madness any longer to persevere, they disbanded their infantry, and retreated with their cavalry first to Hexham and afterwards to Naworth Castle, in Cumberland, where they dispersed the remainder of their force, with the exception of a small detachment of cavalry, with which they fled into Scotland.||

Westmoreland, accompanied by Sir Egremont Ratcliffe and a few other leaders of the discomfited insurgents, were hospitably received by the Border chiefs of Buccleuch and Fernyhirst;¶ whilst Westmoreland sought refuge in the Tower of Harlaw, a stronghold belonging to Hector Armstrong, a Border freebooter.

Thus ended an insurrection which, with less rashness and greater ability on the part of its leaders, and prompt support from their powerful foreign adherents, might have endangered, if not overthrown, both the throne of Elizabeth and the Established Church of the realm, raised the captive Mary to the sovereignty of the English nation, and restored the Romish Church to its ancient power and splendour in England. Such a result would have changed the whole aspect of public affairs in Britain, and would probably have checked the

* Sharpe's Memorials, pp. 95, 98.

† Lingard, vol. viii. pp. 52, 58; Camden in Kennet, vol. ii. pp. 421, 422.

‡ Sharpe's Memorials, pp. 78, 102, 103.

§ Ibid., p. 103.

¶ Sharpe's Memorials, pp. 104, 109; La Motte Fénelon's Correspondence, vol. ii. p. 426.

¶ Ibid., pp. 148, 150, 295; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 242.

 Copy of the time, State Paper Office, instructions for Mr. George Cary, signed by Sussex, Hunsdon, and Sadler, 22nd December, 1569; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, copy of the time, Moray to Sussex, Peebles, 22nd December, 1569; Tytler; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 509.

* Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 78.

† Labanoff, vol. ii. p. 395.

‡ Labanoff, Chronological Summary.

§ Letter from Leicester, 10th October, 1585; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 383.

¶ La Motte Fénelon's Correspondence, vol. ii. pp. 401, 402.

¶ Sharpe's Memorials, pp. 55, 67, 68; Haynes, pp. 553, 555.

 Ibid., 560—567; La Motte Fénelon, vol. ii. p. 401.

†† Sharpe's Memorials, pp. 65, 66.

They are beset by the queen's troops, and abandon the enterprise.

Northumberland and Westmoreland take refuge in Scotland.

progress of the Reformation in both kingdoms for centuries. But, while we have reason to rejoice that divine Providence brought about a different result, there is little satisfaction in the reflection that the power of the unprincipled Elizabeth became thereby more firmly consolidated; and humanity will weep over the cruel captivity in which the unfortunate Queen of Scots was now hopelessly left.

The regent, greatly alarmed by the intelligence of the Roman Catholic insurrection, whose success would have overthrown his own power, and anxious to evince his devotion to the cause of the English queen, to whom he owed so much, and still looked for support, had hastily embodied a large force, which he summoned to assemble at Peebles, on the 20th December, in order to march across the Border to the assistance of his ally; but the sudden termination of the contest rendered his aid unnecessary.* Notwithstanding the servility of the regent in delivering up to Elizabeth his correspondence with the Duke of Norfolk, he had, ever since the discovery of his intrigue with that nobleman, fallen under her distrust and suspicion. She had even ordered Cecil and Lord Hunsdon, the Governor of Berwick, to keep a watchful eye upon his proceedings; so that while he had failed to propitiate his patroness, he had, by his betrayal of Norfolk, incurred the odium and resentment of a large party in Scotland, who had formerly been his supporters. At the head of this party was the restless and intriguing Secretary Lethington, who, aware that he was now viewed with suspicion by the regent, placed himself for greater security under the protection of the Earl of Atholl; † and, being at a distance from court, and encouraged by the presence of his friends, he never ceased his exertions in favour of Mary. The regent at length resolved at all hazards to get rid of Lethington. With this view he summoned him to Stirling, to attend a meeting of the council in his official capacity as secretary, under pretence that his assistance was necessary in conducting the affairs of the government. Lethington obeyed with reluctance, for he was not without suspicion of some sinister intention on the part of the regent. The council was attended by Morton, Mar, Glencairn, Lindsay, Atholl, Semple, and others; and scarcely had the secretary taken his seat, when Captain Crawford, a retainer of the Earl of Lennox, requested to be admitted to an audience on behalf of that nobleman, on business of great and urgent importance. On being allowed to enter, he fell down on his knees, and solemnly accusing William Maitland of Lethington and Sir James Balfour of having been the murderers of the late king, demanded justice. ‡ Lethington, amidst the astonishment and consternation of the council, listened to the charge with contemptuous indifference, and coolly remarked, that he thought his long and faithful services to the state might have exempted him from the suspicion of such a revolting crime, and from being accused by a person of so mean a rank; but, since the charge had been made, he was ready to find security to stand his trial on any day that might be appointed, and had no apprehensions as to the result. Crawford, however, still kneeling, vindicated his own rank as a gentleman and a servant of the late king; declared his readiness to prosecute the offenders, and his ability to prove the charge; and appealed to the council whether bail ought to be accepted in such a case. A long and violent altercation ensued, which resulted in the offer of security being refused; whereupon the secretary was instantly arrested, and, by command of the regent, was conveyed to Edinburgh, and confined in the house of Forrester, one of Moray's dependents.* Meantime a party of horse was dispatched to Sir James Balfour's residence at Monimail, in Fifeshire; and, having made him prisoner, conveyed him also to the capital, whence he was transferred to the Castle of Blackness; but, after a short confinement, he was at the earnest intercession of some of his friends set at liberty.†

Lethington is accused before the council of the murder of the king.

Lethington is arrested by command of the regent.

Moray's triumph over the secretary was but of short duration. Kirkaldy of Grange, Lethington's old associate and tried friend, proceeded after nightfall to the house in which he was confined, and, presenting a counterfeit order from the regent for his release, succeeded in conveying him in safety to Edinburgh Castle, of which Kirkaldy was then governor. Here the secretary found an asylum until the 22nd of November, the day that had been appointed for his trial.‡ He still, however, declared himself ready to answer to the charges brought against him; and the regent, on his part, had fully determined to proceed with the trial.§

He is liberated by Kirkaldy of Grange.

Moray's popularity had reached its acme at the time of his accession to the regency. From the commencement of the conferences at Westminster it began to decline; and, at the period of which we now speak, he had become odious to a large number of the nobility and to the great mass of the people, including many who still gave him an outward show of support from a regard to their own class interests.|| Lethington, on the other hand, was one of the ablest and most popular men in the king-

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Moray to Cecil, 22nd November, 1569; MS. Copy, State Paper Office, the regent's proclamation, Edinburgh, 18th December, 1569.

† Tytler, vol. vii. p. 238.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Lord Hunsdon to Cecil, Newcastle, 7th September, 1569; Diurnal of Occurrences, pp. 147, 148; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 239.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Moray to Cecil, Stirling, 5th September, 1569; also, Lord Hunsdon to Cecil, Alnwick, 8th September, 1569; Diurnal of Occurrences, pp. 147, 148.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 505.

‡ Melvil's Memoirs, p. 218; MS. Declaration of Robert Melvil, in the Hopetoun Papers; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 505.

§ Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 240, 244.

|| Melvil's Memoirs, p. 220.

dom; and of this the regent was soon furnished with a very mortifying proof. At an early hour in the morning of the day appointed for the trial, multitudes of the secretary's friends assembled in arms; Lord Home occupied the streets of Edinburgh with a large body of cavalry; and, as the day advanced, the concourse of armed men became so numerous, that the Earl of Morton, who was to be the principal accuser of the secretary, though backed by three thousand followers, whom he had assembled near Dalkeith awaiting the orders of the regent,* refused to venture into the city. To crown all, Kirkaldy, the staunch friend of the accused, held the castle, which completely commanded the town. Lethington's counsel, Clement Little, an able and accomplished lawyer, now appeared at the bar of the tribunal, and submitted that as his client had appeared, and was ready to stand his trial, but no prosecutor had come forward to accuse him, he was entitled to a verdict of acquittal. The regent, however, who had taken the precaution of surrounding himself with a strong guard, rose and declared that so long as the court was surrounded with armed men, the trial should not proceed. "When ye enterprised," said he,

Lethington's trial is postponed.

"the revenge of the king's slaughter, I was in France. You desired me to come home and take upon me the regiment. You caused me to take an oath that I should to the uttermost revenge the murder of the king; and ye, on the other part, swore to fortify me. Now, there is a gentleman accused of this murder, but ye have convened to hinder justice. Therefore, ye shall understand, I will continue this day of law to another time. If he be clean, he shall suffer no harm; but if he be found guilty, it shall not be in your hands to save him."† Such was the regent's speech, as reported by Calderwood; nor does it differ in any material point from the report given by Moray himself the next day, in a letter addressed to Cecil. But, what is of much more importance, the same letter proves beyond a doubt the humiliating position of subserviency to England in which he had placed himself and his country. It in fact appears that the prosecution of the Scottish secretary was mainly undertaken with a view to gratify the English queen, to whom he had become an object of intense dislike, on account of the prominent part he had taken as a partisan of Norfolk. From the same source we learn that Moray was at this very time in daily expectation of instructions from Elizabeth for the regulation of his conduct with respect to Lethington, and that his trial was postponed to give time for their arrival.

If any evidence were still wanting of Moray's subserviency to the English queen, enough is to be found in the concluding paragraph of the same letter. Alluding to the recent rebellion, he says, "I have offered already to Mr. Marshal, of Berwick [meaning Sir William Drury], to take such part in her highness's cause and quarrel with the whole power of this realm that will do for me as he shall advertise me; * * * and since the matter not only touches her highness's obedience, but that we may see our own destruction compassed, who are professors of the gospel, let not time drive, but with speed let us understand her majesty's mind."*

The regent was not tardy in giving substantial proof of his zeal in the cause. He issued a proclamation, charging "all the lieges on this side of the Forth" to meet him in arms at Peebles on the 20th December, in defence of their country, and "for the preservation of the true religion."† Having been previously informed by Sussex that the rebel earls had sought an asylum within the Scottish territory, he sent messengers to the different seaports of the kingdom, with orders to keep a strict watch to prevent their escape; and, proceeding by rapid marches towards Hawick, invested the Tower of Harlaw, where Northumberland The regent had taken refuge; and partly by invests the intimidation, partly through the Tower of Harlaw.

persuasions of John Carmichael, of that ilk, who was instigated by the Earl of Morton,‡ and still more by means of a large bribe, induced Hector Armstrong to deliver up the unfortunate earl, who was immediately carried to Edinburgh, and afterwards imprisoned in the Castle of Lochleven.§ The infamy of this transaction was increased by the nature of the bribe, by which the cupidity of the freebooter was so far tempted that he violated the laws of hospitality held sacred by the Border thieves, and thus lost caste even among these outlaws. Bannatyne informs us in his "Memoirs" that "these countrymen lost nothing of this trouble, for they got his [the earl's] gold, his jewels, and his wife's jewels, esteemed to a great sum."||

But if these proceedings increased the unpopularity of the regent among his own countrymen, he was so far compensated by completely regaining the confidence and favour of the English queen, who now spoke warmly in his commendation to his ambassador, the Abbot of Dunfermline, and sent to assure him of her support and assistance, promising that all the force of England should be at his command.¶

Thus encouraged, the regent applied to Elizabeth for assistance both in money and military stores; and, at the same time, made a request

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Moray to Cecil, Edinburgh, 22nd November, 1569; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 246.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, copy, the regent's proclamation, Edinburgh, 18th December, 1569; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 246; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 509.

‡ Ibid.

§ Journal of Occurrences, p. 154; Lesley's Negotiations, p. 83; Anderson, vol. iii; Labanoff's Chronological Summary.

|| Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 509.

¶ Ibid., pp. 509, 510.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 506.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 507; MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Moray to Cecil, Edinburgh, 22nd November, 1569, endorsed in Cecil's hand, "Earl of Murray to me, concerning the day of law for Lydington;" Tytler, vol. vii. p. 245.

which he had long had in contemplation, and had

The regent requests Elizabeth to deliver Mary into his hands. been waiting a favourable opportunity to prefer. This was, that she should deliver Mary into his hands, to be kept in safe custody in Scotland, where he promised "that she should live her natural life, without any sinister means taken to shorten the same,"* while a maintenance suitable to her rank should be provided for her. Nicholas Elphinstone was dispatched with the document containing this application; in which Elizabeth is reminded of the troubles that had arisen in England in consequence of Mary's residence in that kingdom, and of the still greater danger likely to arise from her continued detention there. It was argued that, "as Mary was notoriously the ground and fountain from whom all these tumults, practices, and daily dangers did flow;" and as she had such opportunities for continuing these disturbances so long as she remained in England, it would be wise policy to have her removed into Scotland, where she would be placed at a greater distance from the focus of these intrigues, as well as from the princes and ambassadors of foreign countries, who abetted her cause. It was farther urged that, in the present divided state of the kingdom of Scotland, the regent felt unable much longer to maintain the common cause, unless the person by whom all these disorders were occasioned were put into his hands. In this request the regent was joined by Morton, Mar, Glencairn, Lords Lindsay, Ruthven, and Semple, with the Masters of Marischal and Montrose.† A letter on the same subject was also addressed to Cecil by John Knox, then far advanced in life. "Benefits," he says, "of God's hand received crave that men be thankful, and danger known would be avoided. If ye strike not at the root, the branches that appear to be broken will bud again, and that more quickly than men can believe, with greater force than we would wish. Turn your een[eyes] unto your God; forget yourself and yours when consultation is to be had in matters of such weight as presently be upon you. Albeit I have been fremedly [strangely] handled, yet was I never enemy to the quietness of England. God grant you wisdom. In haste, of [at] Edinburgh, the second of January. Yours to command in God.

"JOHN KNOX, with his one foot in the grave.

"More days than one would not suffice to express what I think."‡

A recent historian has attempted to draw from this letter an inference as illogical as it is injurious to the character of its illustrious author. That it is "somewhat dark" may be allowed; but we leave the intelligent and unprejudiced reader to judge whether the language employed, taken in connection with the occasion on which it was written, and what is known of the writer's public reputation, warrants the belief that the great Reformer meant "to urge the absolute necessity of putting Mary to death." No such question had then been agitated; and as the letter was dispatched at the same time, and most probably by the same messenger, as the demand for the extradition of the captive queen, it is certainly more natural to infer that no more was intended than "to urge the absolute necessity" of complying with that demand.

* Copy of the "Instrument," MS., State Paper Office, but without date; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 247.

† Ibid.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, John Knox to Cecil, Edinburgh, 2nd January, 1569-70; endorsed by Cecil's clerk, "Mr. Knox to my Mr. —."

As a farther inducement to Elizabeth to deliver up Mary, the regent had the baseness to offer to surrender the Earl of Northumberland, although, according to his own opinion, as expressed in the "instrument," it was "against every feeling of honour and humanity to surrender a banished man to slaughter;" and he further promised that he "would serve her majesty in England as they are accustomed to do their native princes in Scotland, and out of England, upon reasonable wages."* When the Bishop of Ross became aware of these proceedings, he presented a protest to Elizabeth against a proposal which, if agreed to, would, he considered, prove fatal to the Scottish queen; and he also solicited the ambassadors of France and Spain to remonstrate against it.† Nevertheless, it is not improbable that Elizabeth's consent might have been obtained, had not the sudden death of the regent, by the hand of an assassin, put a stop to the negotiation.

James Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh was the person who committed this crime. He had been taken prisoner at the battle of Langside, and condemned to death. His life, however, was spared by the regent; and he subsequently, amongst others, recovered his liberty through the arrangement made between the regent and the Duke of Chatelherault, on the 13th March, 1569. But the forfeiture which usually accompanied the sentence of death for political offences was carried into execution, and he was stripped of all his hereditary possessions. His wife was heiress of a small estate named Woodhouselee, situated on the banks of the Esk; and thither she retired, without any suspicion that the sentence of forfeiture extended over that property. In this, however, she was mistaken: it had been bestowed on Bellenden, the Justice-Clerk, one of the most rapacious of the regent's creatures; and the inhuman barbarity of the manner in which he proceeded to take possession of it was a disgrace even to that age, and was followed by most disastrous consequences. In the middle of a winter night, the unfortunate lady was expelled from her home in a state of partial nudity, and left in that condition to wander in a neighbouring wood, where before next morning she became furiously insane. From that day Hamilton vowed revenge against the regent, whom he considered as the principal cause of this domestic calamity. His kinsmen, the Hamiltons, who had long detested the regent, applauded his resolution, and encouraged him in the enterprise. He lay in wait for the regent on his return from Dunbarton—first in Glasgow, and afterwards in Stirling; * but not finding an opportunity of effecting his purpose, he proceeded to Linlithgow, through which the regent was to pass on his way from Stirling to Edinburgh. In the High Street of Linlithgow there was a house belonging to Hamilton's uncle, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, and near to that in which the regent was wont to lodge; and, having got possession of this tenement, he deliberately proceeded to make preparation for the execution of his fatal design. He strongly barricaded the door, spread a feather bed on the floor, that the noise of his footsteps might not be heard, hung up a black cloth on the wall opposite the window looking into the street, that his shadow might not be observed, and provided a swift horse ready saddled in a stable behind. Observing that the small gate in the wall of the enclosure behind was too low to permit the egress of a man on horseback, he removed the lintel stone, and returning to the house, took his station in an apartment or wooden gallery, having a trellised window, commanding a full view of the street. Underneath this window, through which he purposed to take his aim, he cut a hole just sufficient to admit the barrel of his caliver; and, having finished his preparations, he charged his piece with four bullets, and coolly awaited the approach of his victim.†

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, a note of the principal matters in Nicholas Elphinstone's Instructions, 19th January, 1569-70.

† Lesley's Negotiations, p. 34; Anderson, vol. iii.; also Dépêches de La Motte Fénelon, vol. ii. pp. 389, 390.

The regent was not altogether without warning of his danger. Obscure intimations of it had several times been made to him; and even on the very morning of the fatal day, John Hume, one of his followers, earnestly besought him not to pass through the principal street, but to go round by the back of the town, and offered to point out to him the very house where the assassin lay in wait for him.‡ This advice he had resolved to follow, but found it difficult or impossible to do so, on account of the great concourse of people who had assembled to witness the procession. He accordingly rode slowly forward through the town, amidst the acclamations of the populace, intending to quicken his pace as he passed the suspected house. This intention, however, was also frustrated by the pressure of the crowd, which became every moment more dense, so that the assassin had time to take a sure and deliberate aim. Accordingly, no sooner had the regent arrived in front of the Archbishop's house than Hamilton, levelling his piece with deadly precision, shot him through the lower part of the abdomen, and the ball passing quite through the body, killed the horse of Arthur

Douglas, who rode on his other side.* For a few moments all stood as if paralyzed with surprise and horror; but, at length, a simultaneous rush was made to the door of the house whence the shot proceeded. It was found to be strongly barricaded; and, long before entrance could be obtained, Hamilton, who had not lost a moment in mounting his steed, was already several miles from the town. He fled straight to Hamilton Castle, where he was received in triumph by Lord Arbroath, of whom he was a retainer, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, and a whole host of the faction of the Hamiltons, who welcomed him as the champion of their party, and the deliverer of their country from the oppression of an odious tyrant.†

In the meantime the regent, though in a state of great exhaustion from the loss of blood, had still sufficient strength left to walk to the palace. His medical attendants, at first, entertained hopes of his recovery, but symptoms of a fatal termination speedily appeared; and being informed of his approaching end, he received the intelligence with the greatest calmness.‡ Amid the tears and lamentations of his attendants, great regret was expressed that he had spared the life of Hamilton, and thus contributed to bring about his own ruin. In this regret, however, he refused to share, mildly remarking that he "in nowise repented of his clemency;"§ and having affectionately recommended the young king to the care of the nobility then present, he expired tranquilly about eleven o'clock in the evening.|| Thus died by the hand of an assassin the Earl of Moray, Regent of Scotland, in the fortieth year of his age,¶ and the third of his government.

From the different and even diametrically opposite opinions entertained regarding Character of this remarkable man, it is impos- the regent. sible for the Scottish historian to portray his character in a manner satisfactory to all parties. That he was a powerful instrument in the hand of Providence for upholding and promoting the cause of the Reformation, furnishes no reason why the Protestant writer should seek to conceal or palliate his faults and imperfections, and hold him up to posterity as a model of consistent and exemplary piety. It is indeed much to be regretted that the man who, for a considerable period, was regarded as the leader of the Reformation in Scotland should, by any part of his public conduct, have furnished its adversaries with weapons which they have endeavoured to turn against Protestantism itself. But that cause neither stands nor falls with the character of any one individual among its supporters. The claims of truth are para-

* MS. State Paper Office, B C, Hunsdon to Cecil, Berwick, 24th January, 1569-70; also ibid., same to same, 26th January, 1569-70; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 252.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, copy endorsed by Hunsdon himself, Hunsdon to Elizabeth, Berwick, 30th January, 1567-70; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 253.

‡ Spottiswood, p. 233.

§ Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 511.

|| Ibid.

¶ He was born in 1530, and died in 1569-70, Tytler, vol. vii. p. 254.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 510.

† Historie of King James the Sext, p. 46.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Hunsdon to Cecil, Berwick, 26th January, 1569-70; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 252.

ESCAPE OF BOWWELLHAUGH.

After the murder of Regent Murray.

mount, and while Protestantism will gain nothing by an attempt to set these aside, it has, on the other hand, nothing to fear from allowing them to their fullest extent. It is conceded, on all hands, that the regent was possessed of many noble and commanding qualities, which eminently fitted him for the high station that he occupied, and were in numerous instances successfully employed in promoting the public good. He was wise and politic in counsel—prompt and vigorous in action. He evinced no inconsiderable military skill; and his self-possession and personal intrepidity in difficult, trying, and perilous circumstances, are unquestionable. In an age comparatively rude, turbulent, and unsettled, he introduced order and regularity into the management of public affairs; he was a patron of learning and an enemy to licentiousness; while his strict and impartial administration of justice among the common people rendered his government extremely popular, and contributed, among other causes, to secure to him the flattering title, by which he was familiarly known, of “the Good Regent.” He has the reputation of having been generally moral in his private life. His zeal for the reformed religion was ardent and conspicuous; and it has been recorded of him that “he ordered himself and his family in such sort, that it did more resemble a church than a court.”* In speaking of the personal religion of this eminent person, we must take into account his whole public conduct as recorded in history, and judge upon the old but sure principle—“by their fruits ye shall know them.” Making every reasonable allowance for the times in which he lived, and the circumstances in which he was placed, it cannot and it needs not be disguised that there was much in the public policy of the regent which no ingenuity, combined with the utmost amount of Christian charity, can possibly reconcile with any religious principle. Moray’s leading motive seems to have been the gratification of personal ambition. For this he was ready to sacrifice—and actually did sacrifice—conscience, honour, the ties of natural affection, and the independence of his country; and for this, we fear it must be added, he was equally ready to assume the outward semblance of zeal for the reformed religion, as a means of increasing his popularity with a powerful party in the state, and securing the support of the English queen. That he was consenting to the murder of

* Spottiswood, p. 233.

Riccio, with a view to his own return to power, is generally admitted; while he tacitly, at least, approved of the murder of Darnley by his close union with the perpetrators of that crime, and his endeavours through their means to criminate his sovereign.* His treatment of his sister, to whom he owed his authority, whom he had deprived of her crown and her liberty, and scrupled not to employ means to deprive of honour, if not of life itself, must be condemned as at once ungrateful and unnatural, and an utter violation of public decency. His betrayal of Norfolk, and his offer to deliver up Northumberland, were inconsistent with every principle of honour and humanity; while his mean servility to Elizabeth, and the sacrifice which he had nearly effected, even of the independence of the kingdom, must for ever deprive him of all claim either to lofty-mindedness or patriotism.

In personal appearance the regent was manly and prepossessing. His natural manner, as it appeared in the earlier years of his life, was modest, affable, and courteous; but after his accession to power he became reserved, haughty, and imperious. This change alienated from him many of his former friends, who, if not actually hostile, kept aloof and looked for his downfall.

His remains were carried from Linlithgow to Stirling, thence conveyed by sea to Leith, and afterwards taken to the palace at Edinburgh. His funeral, which took place on the 14th of February, was attended by the magistrates and great numbers of the citizens of Edinburgh, by whom he had been beloved and respected. Many gentlemen from the country also joined in the mournful procession. His body was carried to the High Church, within which it was interred. It was borne by the Earls of Mar, Morton, Glencairn, and Cassillis, and the Lords Glamis, Lindsay, Ochiltree, and Ruthven; and was preceded by the Laids of Grange and Colvil of Cleish, the former bearing his banner, and the latter his coat-armour. The procession was closed by the servants of his household, who appeared overwhelmed with grief. On entering the church, the bier was placed in front of the pulpit, which was occupied by John Knox, who preached the funeral sermon, taking as his text, “Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord.”†

* Tytler, vol. vii. p. 254; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 115.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Randolph to Cecil, Edinburgh, 22nd February, 1569-70; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 255; Diurnal of Occurrences, p. 168.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

REGENCIES OF LENNOX AND MAR.

A.D. 1570—1572.

THE death of Moray was followed by an alarming crisis in both kingdoms. No sooner had the faction of the Hamiltons received intelligence of that event than they assembled in arms, openly testifying their joy at the downfall of the tyrant by whom their country had been oppressed, and declaring their resolution to march to Edinburgh to liberate their chief, the Duke of Chatelherault, and to take vigorous measures to strengthen and extend their party.* These resolutions were speedily carried into effect. The queen's party,

The queen's authority proclaimed at Edinburgh. The duke and Lord Herries liberated. now elated with fresh hope, and embracing a majority of the nobility, soon became predominant. They seized on Edinburgh, and publicly acknowledged and proclaimed the authority of the queen.

The castles of Edinburgh and Dunbarton were ere long in their hands, and the Duke of Chatelherault and Lord Herries were released from their captivity. Lethington, also, after a short examination

Lethington is acquitted. by a council of the lords, was acquitted and set at liberty, and, along with Grange, speedily joined the ranks of their friends. Meanwhile succours from France had arrived in the Clyde; and the Lairds of Buccleuch and Fernyhirst, the chiefs of the powerful Border clans of the Scotts and Kers, summoning their retainers, made a predatory inroad into England, in company with the Earl of Westmoreland, and committed great ravages.† This expedition appears to have been undertaken less for the sake of plunder than for the gratification of revenge, and a desire to kindle war between the two countries.‡

The demise of the regent, which had so suddenly revived the hopes and the activity of the queen's party in both countries, and had occasioned a frenzy of delight among her adherents abroad, struck Elizabeth with consternation. On receiving the intelligence, she shut herself in her apartment and gave way to a flood of tears, exclaiming that she had lost the best and most useful friend she had in the world.§ What she chiefly dreadde was the reconciliation of the two factions into which Scotland was divided, the consequent restoration of the queen, and the annihilation of her darling project of establishing a paramount and permanent control over the affairs of that country. The state of matters there, already described, served to confirm and aggravate these apprehensions. The English party in Scotland,

* MS. State Paper Office, Information anent the punishment of the regent's murder; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 257.

† Tytler, vol. vii. p. 257.

‡ Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 513.

§ La Motte Fénelon's Correspondence, vol. iii. p. 54.

which it had cost so much intrigue to organise, was in imminent danger of being subverted; and so urgent did this danger appear to Lord Hunsdon, that the very day after the death of the regent he wrote to Cecil, earnestly requesting the immediate attention of Elizabeth to the affairs of Scotland, assuring him that important matters would certainly result from the event that had just taken place; and, in particular, that it would be necessary carefully to watch the movements of "the great faction which remained, who were all French."*

Nor were these the only difficulties with which Elizabeth had to contend. The Catholic party in England were numerous, powerful, discontented, and intriguing; and, encouraged by the new phase of the Scottish affairs, were ready once more to rise in rebellion. An occasion was not long in presenting itself. Leonard Dacres, a Catholic gentleman, second son of Lord Dacres of Gillisland, had secretly participated in the rebellion raised by the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, but had been prevailed on by his friends to abstain from openly committing himself as a party to that rash enterprise. Still, however, restless and discontented, his hatred against the government was suddenly fanned into a flame by the loss of the family estates, of which he believed himself heir, but which had been legally adjudged to belong to the daughters of his elder brother. Resenting this as a premeditated affront and injury, he instantly raised the standard of rebellion, collected three thousand men, and seized the castles of Naworth and Greystock, with other strongholds. Though this insurrection was speedily crushed, yet, occurring at such a conjuncture, it added greatly to the distress and perplexity of the English queen. Lord Hunsdon immediately marched from Berwick with all the forces at his disposal, and having joined Sir John Forster, warder of the Middle Marches, who had raised a body of the Border militia, they attacked the rebels on the banks of the little river Gelt, in Cumberland, and, after a sanguinary struggle, completely defeated them; and Dacres, escaping from the battle-field, fled into Scotland.† But notwithstanding this momentary success, the storm seemed still to be gathering and thickening all around the political horizon.

The news of the regent's death had been received in France with triumphant exultation, and the Catholics, having obtained repeated victories over the Huguenots, who had been defeated at Moncontour and Jarnac, had lost St. Jean d'Angely, and failed in their attempt on Poitiers, were now making active preparations to assist their partisans in Scotland.‡

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Hunsdon to Cecil, 24th January, 1569-70; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 256.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Hunsdon to the Queen, 20th and 27th of February, 1569-70; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 263; Lingard's History of England, vol. viii. p. 53.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, French Correspondence, Norris to Cecil, 17th February, 1569-70, Angiers; ibid., Norris to Cecil, 25th February, 1569-70.

In Spain the intelligence had given equal satisfaction. Douglas, a messenger employed by the Bishop of Ross, was dispatched to Scotland with letters to the friends of the Scottish queen sewed under the buttons of his coat. He had already twice supplied them with money, and he now urgently exhorted them to persevere until the arrival of aid from Philip.* In addition to this, Elizabeth was, not without reason, alarmed by the apprehension that the Duke of Alva, who was actively engaged in fortifying his position in the Netherlands, and constructing citadels to prevent any further revolt in that country, would soon find himself at leisure to make a descent upon England.

At the same time, the Pope issued a bull of excommunication against the English queen, by which she was declared guilty of heresy, and deprived of her right to the crown of England, and her subjects were held absolved from their oaths of allegiance. Several copies of this bull were transmitted to the Duke of Alva, who immediately forwarded some of them to Don Gueraldo d'Espes, the Spanish ambassador in London; and one copy was soon afterwards found posted on the door of the Bishop of London's residence.†

It now became absolutely necessary, in order to save both kingdoms from anarchy and ruin, if not from the calamity of foreign invasion, that some decided measures should be taken; and never did Elizabeth stand so much in need of wise and energetic counsellors to avert the perils to which she had exposed herself and the kingdom by her own detestable policy. The sagacity of Cecil traced all these evils to their source—Elizabeth's unjust and ungenerous treatment of the Scottish queen, and her ambitious desire of rendering herself in effect mistress of the sister kingdom. The sinister remedy which he proposed showed that he and his mistress were worthy of each other. Scotland, said he, in a memorial which he drew up on the state of the kingdom, was the rallying point for all Elizabeth's enemies, foreign and domestic. In the union of its factions lay the strength of that country; and this union, which, before the death of the regent, Leithington and Grange had laboured to secure, and nearly succeeded in effecting, would by that event be more easily and speedily accomplished. To prevent this must be the policy of the English queen: she must keep up an English party, and foment civil discord. To this end, he added, that two things were necessary, and must receive immediate attention. First, an ambassador must be sent to Scotland, ostensibly to assist in the pacification of the kingdom, but in reality to sow the seeds of dissension, and promote disunion and confusion; and, secondly, a regent must be appointed, sufficiently subservient to submit implicitly to the dictation of the English queen. Unfortunately, princes at no time experience any difficulty in finding tools ready to execute their worst purposes; and two men eminently fitted to carry out Cecil's dishonourable policy were promptly fixed on. Not more than three days after the death of the regent,* Randolph, one of the most experienced and unscrupulous masters in the art of political intrigue, was dispatched as ambassador to Scotland, with secret instructions such as no honourable or candid mind could consent to obey. Melvil informs us that "he was deliberately directed secretly to kindle a fire of discord between the two factions in Scotland, which could not be easily quenched."† The appointment of a regent was a work of greater time, but no difficulty was experienced in the selection. The person chosen by Elizabeth was the Earl of Lennox, the grandfather of the young king, who, being a man of no ability, would readily submit to be directed; and, being in fact a pensioner on the bounty of Elizabeth, would not dare to disobey her mandates. Another circumstance tended powerfully to recommend this choice. The houses of Hamilton and Lennox had long been opposed to each other; and the ancient enmity subsisting between them would probably be increased tenfold by the elevation of Lennox to the regency; so that the chances of reconciliation between the hostile factions would thus be greatly diminished.‡

Randolph arrived in the Scottish capital on the 9th February,§ and found the affairs of Scotland in a state of confusion and distraction, which no doubt, to his mind, must have been highly gratifying. At a meeting of the Privy Council, he laid before them his instructions, and assured them of the friendship and support of his royal mistress, so long as they acted on the principles by which the government of the late regent had been guided. He promised that, on her part, the confinement of Mary should be maintained with increasing rigour, and that she would support them both with men and money; while, on the other hand, he stipulated that they should prevent the young king from falling into the hands of the opposite faction and being carried into France; that they should maintain the Protestant religion, and preserve peace; and, finally, that they should deliver up the fugitive Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland.||

A convention of the whole nobility of the kingdom was summoned to be held on the 4th of March, to take these matters into consideration, and to

* MS. Letter, draft, State Paper Office, entirely in Cecil's hand; Minute of the Queen's Majesty's Letter, 29th January, 1569-70.

† Melvil's Memoirs, pp. 227, 230, 231; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 259.

‡ Melvil's Memoirs, p. 227.

§ Tytler, vol. vii. p. 259.

|| MS. Letter, draft, State Paper Office, in Cecil's hand; Minute of the Queen's Majesty's Instructions, given to Mr. Randolph, 29th January, 1569-70; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 262.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Hunsdon to Cecil, 26th January, 1569-70.

† Labanoff's Chronological Summary; Lingard, vol. viii. p. 56; Camden, pp. 211, 213.

proceed to the still more important business of appointing a regent;* and letters were dispatched to Lennox, requiring his immediate presence in Scotland. Meanwhile the kingdom was agitated to its centre by two hostile parties, whose rival pretensions burst asunder the bonds of civil society, and ranged chosen friends, and even near relatives, under opposite banners. One of these still maintained allegiance to their captive queen; the other acknowledged the authority of the young prince, her son. Both were sincerely desirous for the restoration of public tranquillity; but the ambition of their respective leaders, and the incessant intrigues of the English party, maintained in fatal vitality the flames of civil discord.

A convention of the nobility is summoned for the election of a regent, &c.

Of these factions, by far the stronger was that of the queen, which included in its ranks not only a numerical majority, but the most powerful and ancient of the nobility. The Duke of Chatelherault, with all the numerous branches of that influential family of which he was the chief; the Earls of Argyle, Huntley, Atholl, Errol, Crawford, Marischal, Caithness, Cassilis, Eglinton, and Sutherland; the Lords Herries, Home, Seaton, Ogilvy, Ross, Borthwick, Oliphant, Yester, Fleming, Boyd, Somerville, Innermeith, Forbes, and Gray; together with Kirkaldy of Grange and Maitland of Lethington—the former esteemed the ablest soldier, and the latter the greatest statesman, of which the country could boast—were all enthusiastically devoted to the cause of the captive queen, and ready to take up arms in her support.† This party, powerful from their rank and influence, were moreover already in possession of the two most important strongholds in the kingdom—the castles of Edinburgh and Dunbarton—the former commanding the capital, the latter protecting the port by which succours from abroad could be most easily introduced into the kingdom. The English party, on the other hand, though they had numerous adherents in the towns, and were supported by the whole body of the Presbyterians, included comparatively few of the nobility; and these, with the exception of the Earl of Morton, were far less powerful than most of their opponents. With this nobleman were associated the Earls of Mar, Glencairn, and Buchan; with the Lords Glamis, Ruthven, Lindsay, Cathcart, Methven, Ochiltree, and Saltoun.‡ It is easy to see that but for the interference of the English queen, the adherents of Mary must speedily have overcome those of the king, who had already been driven out of the capital.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, endorsed by Randolph; Letters sent by the Lords for the Assembly, 17th February, 1569-70; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 262.

† MS. State Paper Office, Petition to Elizabeth, 16th April, 1570, endorsed by Cecil; Duke of Chatelherault, and his associates, to the Queen's Majesty; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 264.

‡ MS. Copy of the time, State Paper Office, Instructions given by the Lords of Scotland to the Commendator of Dunfermline, 1st May, 1570; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 265.

The restoration of Mary began now to be regarded by Elizabeth with most lively apprehension. To prevent this consummation, the secret machinations of Randolph, however successfully carried on, seemed too mild and too slow in their effect; and more violent measures were determined on. The predatory incursions made by the Scotts and Kers on the English Border, and the circumstances of unusual cruelty by which their last invasion had been attended; the asylum granted within the Scottish territory to the English rebels, and the constant alarm in which the kingdom was kept by the intrigues of Mary's partisans, were now seized on by Elizabeth as a pretext for an armed intervention in the affairs of Scotland. Accordingly, early in the spring of 1570, she gave orders to the Earl of Sussex and Lord Scrope to invade Scotland on the east and west, professedly for the purpose of seizing the fugitive rebels, but in reality to intimidate and crush the queen's party, and to incite the factions to civil war.*

The Earl of Sussex and Lord Scrope invade Scotland.

The lords of the queen's party, alarmed by the threatened invasion, employed their utmost efforts to avert it.† Three several envoys were dispatched to Sussex to dissuade him from advancing; Lethington warned Leicester that such a hostile demonstration would have the effect of uniting all parties in Scotland as against a common enemy; and the Bishop of Ross and the French ambassador strongly remonstrated against it with Elizabeth. All, however, was in vain. The vindictive spirit of the English queen, already roused into action, was still further excited by Randolph, who alarmed her by information of a pretended conspiracy against her life, of which he artfully insinuated that Mary was the prime mover;‡ while Morton fabricated accounts of hostile preparations on the part of both Lethington and his opponents, representing the party of the former as being weakened by the desertion of Grange.

The work of devastation now commenced; and seldom has a hostile invasion been conducted with such merciless severity. Sussex, penetrating into Teviotdale and the Merse, the country of Buccleuch and Fernyhirst, laid in ruins fifty castles, plundered and destroyed three hundred villages, burnt a large number of granges,§ and subsequently besieged and took possession of Home Castle, one of the strongest fortresses in the district. Meanwhile Lord Scrope, entering the western Border, ravaged the country with fire and sword, remorselessly destroying villages and farm-houses, and burning or carrying off the whole agricultural

* MS. Letter, draft by Cecil, State Paper Office, the Queen to Mr. Randolph, 18th March, 1569-70; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 268; Melvil's Memoirs, p. 227.

† Copy of the time, endorsed by Cecil, State Paper Office, Instructions for the Laird of Trabroun, 15th April, 1570; also, MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 18th April, 1570, John Gordon to the Queen's Majesty.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 14th April, 1570, Randolph to Cecil; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 269.

§ Spottiswood, p. 178; Murrin, p. 769; Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 90.

produce of the country.* Elizabeth immediately followed up these savage proceedings by dispatching the Earl of Lennox to Scotland, accompanied by Sir William Drury, escorted by the old bands of Berwick,† consisting of twelve hundred foot and four hundred horse. Lennox was instructed to place himself at the head of the party of the young king, his grandson, and, in conjunction with Morton, to advance to Edinburgh, and inflict summary vengeance on the Hamiltons, in retaliation for the murder of the regent.

Lennox, to whom such a commission was peculiarly grateful, proceeded to execute it with the most unsparing ferocity, and ravages rivalling those perpetrated by Sussex and Scrope in the southern districts, were now committed in the very centre of the kingdom. Aided by Morton, he regained possession of the capital, and marched to the relief of Glasgow, which was then besieged by the Hamiltons. These Lennox and his coadjutor speedily dispersed; and then commenced a cruel devastation of Clydesdale and Linlithgowshire—razing the castles of the queen's adherents, destroying the villages, and laying waste the whole district. On this melancholy occasion, Hamilton Palace, belonging to the Duke of Chatelherault, with his castles of Linlithgow and Kinneil, and the mansions of his kindred and adherents, were plundered and laid in ruins.‡

These barbarous proceedings, which continued during a great part of the summer of 1570, threw the country into anarchy and confusion, and seemed to threaten it with absolute ruin. The kingdom was in fact “divided against itself”—two governments had been called into existence; and the contentions and animosities of the two rival factions kept the kingdom in perpetual commotion. The state of the country at this time is thus graphically described by Sir James Melvil, who had an opportunity of observing personally many of the circumstances which he relates:—“Now,” he says, “the two furious factions being framed in this manner, the hatred and rage against each other grew daily greater. For Master Randolph knew the diversities that were amongst the noblemen, and the nature of every one in particular, by his oft coming and long residence in Scotland. Among the ladies he had a mother and a mistress, to whom he caused his queen send oft communications and tokens. He used also his craft with the ministers [clergy], and offered gold to divers of them. One of them that was very honest refused his gift, but he told him that his companion took it as by way of charity. I am not certain if any of the rest took presents; but undoubtedly he offered to such as were in meetest rowmes [offices], to cry out against factions here and there, and kindle the fiercer fire, so that the parties were not content to fight and shed each other's blood, but would flyte [scold] with injurious and blasphemous words, and at length fell to the down-casting of each other's houses, whereunto England lent their help. * * * Then, as Nero stood up upon a high part of Rome, to see the town burning which he had caused set on fire, so Master Randolph delighted to see such fire kindled in Scotland, and by his writings to some in the court of England, glorified himself to have brought it to pass in such sort, that it should not be got easily slokenit [extinguished with water] again; which, when it came to the knowledge of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, he wrote in [into] Scotland to my brother and me, and advertised us how we were handled, detesting both Master Cecil, as director, and Master Randolph, as executor.”* Such is a picture of the deplorable condition of Scotland at this period, drawn by an eye-witness; and such the description of the heartless knavery of Randolph, by one who had long been his intimate acquaintance.

Repeated attempts had been made and frustrated to hold the convention of the nobility, which had been appointed to meet on the 4th of March. Wearied with incessant discord and uncertainty, and alarmed at the disorganised state of the country, all men now longed for the establishment of a vigorous and stable government, so that a settled order of things should once more be introduced. The leaders of both factions began accordingly to make vigorous preparation for a final struggle. The barons on both sides assembled their vassals, and held armed conventions in various parts of the kingdom; and Morton and Mar, encouraged by the English queen,‡ congregated a formidable body of their adherents in the capital.

In the midst of these preparations, the king's party were dismayed by the arrival of Mons. Verac, a messenger from the court of France, bringing letters to the queen's party, encouraging them by promises of assistance; and as similar promises had already been made by the court of Spain, they now felt emboldened to take active and decided measures. Collecting their whole forces, they marched to the capital, compelled Randolph to flee to Berwick, and summoned the whole nobility to meet in a general convention, to be held in Linlithgow, to consider what answer they should return to Verac's communications, and to concert measures for the pacification of the country. They at the same time addressed a petition to the English queen for the immediate restoration of Mary, as a means of putting an end to the divisions and distractions of the kingdom.‡

Elizabeth at last began to fear that the dissensions she had fomented, and the severities she had

* Melvil's Memoirs, pp. 233, 234.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Mar to the Queen of England, Edinburgh, 14th March, 1569-70; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 267.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Duke of Chatelherault and his associates to the Queen's Majesty, written towards the end of March, 1570, dispatched from Edinburgh, 16th April.

* Spottiswood, p. 237.

† Journal of Occurrences, p. 176.

‡ Ibid., p. 177; Muriin, p. 769.

practised in Scotland, had been pushed too far, and might have the effect not only of uniting against her the whole Scottish nation, but of provoking the hostile interference of foreign powers, especially of the French king, who was likely soon to be in a position to give effectual assistance to his friends in Scotland. Yielding, therefore, to the remonstrances of the French ambassador and the Bishop of Ross, she wrote to Sussex, declaring that as the professed object of invading Scotland was only to punish her rebels, she was sorry he had carried matters to such an extremity, and could not think of authorising him to besiege Dunbarton, a measure which had been strongly recommended by Lennox in his exultation at the success of his expedition.* At the same time, she ordered Randolph to return from Berwick to Edinburgh, and to inform both factions that, having "reasonably" chastised her rebels, she was now willing, agreeably to the suggestion of the Bishop of Ross, Mary's ambassador, to enter into a negotiation for restoring that princess to her dominions. Meanwhile she directed Sussex to correspond with Morton and his party. The Bishop of Ross repaired to Chatsworth, whither Mary had recently been removed from Tutbury; and having assisted her with his advice in drawing up offers of accommodation, Lord Livingston and John Beaton were dispatched with them to Scotland.

The English troops withdrawn from Scotland.

The English troops were then withdrawn; and Elizabeth, with assumed moderation, endeavoured to soothe both factions, by declaring her earnest desire for the pacific settlement of the affairs of the country.

The utter insincerity of these assurances might have been predicated at the time, and soon became manifest in the result. The kingdom, reduced almost to a state of anarchy, continued to be agitated by civil commotions, and rent asunder by contending factions. Public and private business, the administration of justice, the pursuits of commerce and industry, even the tillage of the ground were alike neglected. The arm of the law was paralysed, its authority treated with contempt. Having no supreme head to whom they could appeal for protection, the weak ranged themselves under the banner of some leader of their own selection, while the utmost efforts of the well-disposed and patriotic to restore order were rendered abortive. Meanwhile the unhappy Mary languished in captivity, the Bishop of Ross and the Lord Livingston continued to negotiate in her behalf,† and Cecil procrastinated by lengthened and fruitless deliberations with the Privy Council.

Public characters, it is said, are public property; and this holds true as respects not only their contemporaries but their posterity. And as much light may sometimes be thrown on historical events by a more intimate acquaintance with the prime actors in the great drama, we think it not beneath the dignity of history to quote the following correspondence, illustrative of the characters of some of the leading men of this period. The Earl of Sussex, who had been one of the commissioners in the conference at York, and consequently was well acquainted with the union formerly subsisting between Moray, Morton, and Lethington, was selected by Elizabeth to remonstrate with the latter on his desertion of his party. Lethington, in reply to his letters, made some caustic observations on the cruelties recently perpetrated by Sussex, as well as on the disgraceful conduct of the king's faction towards their queen and their country. Sussex answered by a charge of gross inconsistency against the secretary, requesting to know how he could reconcile his public accusation of murder against his sovereign with his present zeal in her defence. "Your lordship," said he, addressing Lethington, "must call to remembrance that your queen was by you and others, then of the faction of Scotland,—and not by the queen, my sovereign, nor by her knowledge or assent,—brought to captivity, deprived of her royal estate, to which she was by God's ordinance born lawful inheritrix, condemned in parliament, her son crowned as lawful king, the late Earl of Moray appointed by parliament to be regent, and revoked from beyond the seas; yourself held the place of secretary to that king and state; and after she escaped from her captivity, from the which the queen, my sovereign, had by all good means sought to deliver her, and had been the only means to save her life while she continued there, yourself and your faction at that time came into England, to detect her of a number of heinous crimes by you objected against her; to offer your proofs, which to the uttermost you produced, to seek to have her delivered into your own hands, or to bind the queen's majesty to detain her in such sort as she should never return into Scotland, and to persuade her majesty to maintain the king's authority. Now, my lord, to return to my former questions, which be but branches from those roots, and cannot be severed from them. I do desire to know by what doctrine you may think that cause to be then just, which you now think to be unjust? [how] you may think your coming into England, your detecting her of crimes by you objected, your proofs produced for that purpose, your requests delivered to the queen, my sovereign, to deliver her into your custody, or to promise to keep her as she return not to Scotland, and to maintain her son's authority (then allowed always by you to be your lawful king),—by what doctrine, I say, may ye think the causes hereof to be then just, which you now think to be unjust?"

"I would be glad to admit your excuse, that you were not of the number that sought rigour to your queen, although you were with the number, if I could do it with a safe conscience. But, as I will say, 'Non est meum accusare, aliud ago,' and therefore I will not enter into those particularities, so can I not make myself ignorant of what I saw openly delivered by word and writing, with a general assent of the late regent, and all that were in his company, which tended not to a short restraint of your queen's liberty, but was directly either to deliver her captive into your own custody, or to bind the queen, my sovereign, to detain her in such sort as she should never after trouble the State of Scotland; wherein if her perpetual captivity or a worse matter were meant, and not a restraint for a time, God and your own conscience, and others that dealt then with you, do know. It may be you dealt openly on the one side and secretly on the other, wherein how the queen, my sovereign, digested your doings, I know not; but this I know well, that if her majesty would have digested that which was openly delivered unto her by the general assent of your whole company, in such sort as you all desired, devised, and earnestly (I will not say passionately) persuaded her at that time to do for her own surety, the benefit of Scotland, and the continuing of the amity between both the realms, there had been worse done to your queen than either her majesty or any subject of England that I know, whomsoever you take to be least free from passions, could be induced to think meet to be done.*

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Lennox to Cecil, 17th May, 1570, Edinburgh; MS. Letter, ibid., 16th May, 1570, Edinburgh; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 271.

† MS. State Paper Office, B C, Minute of the Queen's Letter to Sussex, a draft by Cecil, July 29, 1570; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 277; Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 91.

Lethington artfully evaded these pointed interrogatories by remarking, that if he must needs go into an exculpation it would "touch more than himself;" then changing the subject, and referring to a previous letter of Sussex, in which he claimed credit for having withdrawn the English army, he ironically complimented Sussex on his zeal and activity in punishing his mistress's rebels. "When your lordship," said he, "writeth that you intend to revoke her majesty's forces, I am glad thereof, more than I was at their coming in; and it is not amiss for their ease to have a breathing time, and some rest between one exploit and another. This is the third journey they have made in Scotland since your lordship came to the Borders, and you have been so well occupied in every one of them, that it might well be said, * * * they have reasonable well acquitted themselves of the duty of old enemies, and have burnt and spoiled as much ground within Scotland, as any army of England did in one year these hundred years bypast, which may suffice for a two months' work, although you do no more."†

As a specimen of Randolph's turn for personality, a letter of his may be quoted to Kirkaldy of Grange, on his accepting the rich living of the Priory of St. Andrew's, with which, it is said, Mary had presented him as a bribe for his services. "Brother William," said he, "it was indeed most wonderful unto me when I heard that you should become a prior! That vocation agreeth not with any thing that I ever knew in you, saving for your religious life led under the cardinal's hat, when we were both students in Paris."*

But to return to the narrative. The perfidious and selfish policy of Elizabeth, of which, as it happened to suit her purpose, her friends as well as her enemies were indiscriminately the victims, was now bitterly felt by two of her most zealous and unscrupulous tools. Her reply to a message conveyed to her by the Abbot of Dunfermline from Morton and Lennox, plainly convinced them that after they had by her own desire taken up arms in her cause, they were now to be abandoned to their fate, in such a position that to advance without her assistance was impracticable, while to recede would be ruinous to themselves.†

Their own safety, and even the continued existence of their party, now demanded vigorous and decided action, and accordingly they resolved on the bold expedient of procuring the appointment of Lennox to the regency; and as they acted with the consent of Randolph, the English Ambassador, they had reason to believe that this step, if not altogether in accordance with the views of the English queen, would at least be regarded with leniency. As a tentative measure, however, they ^{Lennox pointed interim} summoned a convention of the lords ^{Lieutenant-governor of Scotland.} of the king's party at Stirling, on the 16th of June, and appointed Lennox to the office of interim Lieutenant-governor, under the king, until the 12th of July, thus allowing time to advertise Elizabeth of the circumstances, and ascertain her farther pleasure in the matter. They made no delay in giving her information of this decision, at the same time obsequiously imploring her advice as to the regency, or in other words, her choice of the person on whom it would be agreeable to her that this important office should be conferred.‡ Her reply was couched in terms of affected disinterestedness, and of anxiety to promote the cause of order in Scotland. She pretended to deplore the distracted condition of that country. She declared she thought it now indispensable that some regular government should be established, and while, in her opinion, the choice of her cousin, the Earl of Lennox, as

* MS. State Paper Office, B C, Minute of the Queen's Letter to Sussex, a draft by Cecil, 29th July, 1570; Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 91; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 276.

† Copy of the time, State Paper Office, Instructions of the Lords of Scotland to the Abbot of Dunfermline, 1st May, 1570; also copy State Paper Office, the Lords of Scotland to the Queen's Majesty, 1st June, 1570, Edinburgh, by the Abbot of Dunfermline; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Lennox, Morton, and the Lords to the English Privy Council, 24th June, 1570; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 277.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Lennox, Morton, and the Lords, to the Privy Council, 24th June, 1570. "The names show the truth of Lethington's observations as to the weakness of the king's party, both in the ancient nobility and in numbers, in comparison with the queen's." They are Earls Lennox, Morton, Mar, Glencairn, Angus; Lord Glamis, Lindsay, Ruthven, Ochiltree, Borthwick, Cathcart, and Graham, the Master of Montrose. Of the clergy, Robert (Piteairn), Abbot of Dunfermline, and Robert, Bishop of Caithness. Tytler, vol. vii. p. 278.

* Copy of the time, MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Sussex to Ledington, 29th July, 1570; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 275.

† Copy of the time, State Paper Office, Ledington to Sussex, 2nd June, 1570, Dunkeld; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 276.

regent would, from his near relationship to the king, be a very suitable and proper one,* she did not pretend to dictate, but would be satisfied on whomsoever their choice might fall.

Being now somewhat re-assured, they lost no time in proceeding to the accomplishment of their object; and in a convention of the lords of their party, held at Edinburgh on the 12th July, they formally elected the Earl of Lennox regent of the kingdom. The opposite party were taken by surprise. Lethington was absent in Atholl; Huntley, whom Mary had appointed her Lieutenant-governor,† was then in Aberdeen, mustering his adherents; and the other lords of that faction were occupied in arming and training their vassals and other followers in various quarters of the country. Grange, who from his commanding position as governor of the Castle of Edinburgh, could easily have interrupted the proceedings and dispersed the convention, contented himself with refusing to be present, or even to hear Elizabeth's letter when read by Randolph, giving orders that no cannon should be fired after the proclamation,‡ and treating the whole affair with indifference and contempt. Sussex warmly remonstrated with him by letter, but without effect. The lords of the queen's party avowed their intention to hold a parliament at Linlithgow on the 4th of August, and publicly declared their determination never to acknowledge Lennox as regent.§

A contest of this nature between two such powerful parties, and in which interests of such magnitude were at stake, was not likely to be decided without an appeal to arms. Exasperated against each other to the highest degree, both factions accordingly now began to make ready for that sanguinary struggle, which resulted in a civil war of almost unparalleled atrocity. The newly-elected regent, sensible of the comparative weakness of the king's party, immediately applied to England for aid; and in his instructions to Nicholas Elphinstone, his messenger, drew such a picture of the strength, preparations, and activity of his opponents, as greatly to alarm the English queen, and intreated her to send him without delay supplies of men, arms, and money, adding that without, at least, one thousand foot soldiers his cause was desperate.|| Elizabeth forthwith sent instructions to Sussex to make an inroad on the western Borders, but, with her accustomed duplicity, enjoined him to proceed "very secretly,"—that is, to conceal the fact that he was acting under her orders, and to hide the real object of the expedition under the pretence of chastising her rebels the Daeres.* It is unnecessary to brand the conduct of Elizabeth on this occasion as it deserves; the bare statement of the fact is revolting to every ingenuous mind. While thus "very secretly" encouraging, and even actively engaged in promoting a civil war, she publicly reproached the contending factions for distracting the country by their unceasing strife, and flattered Lord Livingston and the Bishop of Ross into the belief that she was desirous of negotiating with them for the restoration of the queen.

The threatened assembling of a parliament at Linlithgow was naturally contemplated by Lennox with apprehension and alarm, as likely to lead to his deprivation of office and the final overthrow of his party. Accordingly, as the time appointed for the meeting of the Estates approached, he commenced the most active measures to prevent it. In conjunction with the Earl of Morton, he advanced against Huntley, at the head of a powerful force, and, having stormed the Castle of Brechin, Lennox had the atrocious cruelty to hang thirty-four of the unfortunate garrison, including a number of their officers, in front of his own residence.†

In the meantime Sussex was not idle. In obedience to his instructions, he suddenly commenced a most destructive and barbarous inroad into the district of Annandale, at the head of four thousand men, and ravaged the country as far as the town of Dumfries, sacking and destroying castles and even private dwellings, plundering the peaceable inhabitants, and spreading destruction and dismay everywhere throughout his progress. His own letter to Elizabeth on this subject is very graphic, and, at the same time, places his character as a fit instrument for the execution of her nefarious policy in a most unfavourable light. "I repaired," he says, "with part of your majesty's forces to Carlisle, and receiving no such answer from the Lord Herries as I expected * * * I entered Scotland the 22nd of this present, and returned thither the 28th, in which time I threw down the castles of Annand and Hoddum, belonging to the Lord Herries; the castles of Dumfries and Caerlaverock, belonging to the Lord Maxwell; the castles of Tynehill and Cowhill, belonging to the Lairds of Tynehill and Cowhill; the castles of Arthur Greame and Richies George Greame, ill neighbours to England and of Englishmen sworn, now Scots, and some other piles where the rebels have been maintained."‡ In a letter of the same date, addressed to Cecil, he says, "That he had avoided as much as he might the burning of houses or corn, and the taking or spoiling of cattle or goods, to make the revenge appear to be for honour only," and adds, "I have not left a stone house to an

* Spottiswood, p. 241.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Sussex to Cecil, July 16, 1570, Alnwick; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 278.

‡ Copy of the time, State Paper Office, B C, Sussex to Cecil, 19th July, 1570, Alnwick; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 278.

§ Copy of the time, State Paper Office, B C, Instructions by Lennox to Nicholas Elphinstone, 23rd July, 1570.

|| MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Instructions to Nicholas Elphinstone, 23rd July, 1570; ibid., Lennox to Randolph, Stirling, 31st July, 1570; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 279.

* Draft by Cecil, State Paper Office, 26th July, 1570, the Queen to Sussex.

† Copy of the time, State Paper Office, Randolph to Sussex, 14th August, 1570; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 280.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Carlisle, 29th August, 1570, Sussex to the Queen's Majesty; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 281.

ill neighbour within twenty miles of this town."* The qualifying phrase, "as much as he might," speaks volumes as to the unscrupulous nature of the proceeding, and very plainly indicates, even if direct evidence were wanting, that extensive havoc of the kind referred to was committed; while the concluding remark—so lightly, if not boastfully made—that he "had not left a stone house to an ill neighbour for twenty miles" around, presents us with a picture of wide-spread desolation, and an exhibition of savage and indiscriminate cruelty disgraceful to any age or nation.

While these atrocities were in progress, the game of dissimulation continued for the restoration of Mary. Negotiations for the restoration of Mary were still proceeding; but Elizabeth took care to clog her proposals with terms which that unfortunate princess could not accept. One of these was that the English queen should be put in possession of the castles of Edinburgh and Dunbarton. When this proposal was made by the Bishop of Ross, it was, without a moment's hesitation, indignantly rejected. Mary, braving the utmost malignity of her treacherous cousin, promptly replied that, whatever might befall herself, it should never be said she had sold that country into bondage of which she was the rightful queen and natural guardian.† For the space of two months after the invasion of Sussex, these sham negotiations were continued, but terminated, as was intended, just where they began. Cecil, accompanied by Sir Walter Mildmay, a member of the English Privy Council, repaired to Chatsworth, in Derbyshire, where Mary still resided, in order to lay before her and discuss with her the conditions of an accommodation. The Bishop of Ross, as we have seen, had previously repaired thither also to assist her by his counsel; and the nature of the proposals, as well as the political rank of the parties entrusted with them, seemed to indicate that Elizabeth was at last in earnest.‡ Meanwhile, Elizabeth had concluded a treaty with the two Scottish factions, which lasted from September, 1570, until April, 1571, and ultimately tended to promote the pacification of the country.§

Mary, after consulting with her commissioners, and communicating with the King of France and the Duke of Alva, accepted the overtures which had been made to her. She agreed to give Elizabeth every guarantee in her power, consistent with her dignity and her honour, for her faithful fulfilment of the treaty. She consented to relinquish all claim to the throne of England during the life of Elizabeth or her issue, if she should have any. She did not object to an alliance offensive and defensive between the two kingdoms, provided its object was clearly defined. She pledged herself to hold no intercourse with the subjects of the Queen of England without her knowledge and consent. She promised that, within a given time, she would send Elizabeth's rebels out of the country, though, from motives of honour and humanity, she could not think of giving them up. She consented that, before being restored to liberty, she should deliver as a hostage the young prince, her son, into the hands of Elizabeth, to be educated and brought up in England, until he should be fifteen years of age. And lastly, she promised not to marry again without Elizabeth's consent.

As a further security, it was required that six hostages chosen from the Scottish nobility should be sent to England. Mary, however, stipulated that the number should be reduced to four, and should not include the Duke of Chatelherault; the Earls of Argyle, Huntley, or Atholl; the Lords Fleming or Seaton; or the Wardens of the Western Borders; and that the earls and lords, or the eldest sons of earls and lords, who might be selected, should have liberty to revisit Scotland, to attend to their own affairs, provided that during their absence they should furnish substitutes of equal rank. Mary further agreed to have the treaty ratified by parliament; and consented that, if she violated it, either by attacking Elizabeth or assisting her enemies, she should not only forfeit all right of succession to the throne of England, but also be deprived of the crown of Scotland, which should then immediately devolve on her son.* After some discussion, sustained on the part of Mary with a dignity, judgment, and spirit, that excited the admiration even of Elizabeth's ministers themselves, the principal points were agreed on; and the unfortunate captive queen now hoped that the time was at hand when she should be restored to her liberty and her crown, of which she had been so long and so unjustly deprived.

In the fulness of her heart, she wrote to Elizabeth a very affecting and affectionate letter, which, from its simplicity, pathos, and eloquence, as well as from the light it throws on the character of its author, is well worthy of a place in this history. "Madam," she says, "my good sister, I have received the letters which you were pleased to write to me by Mr. Cecil, your secretary, and Mr. Mildmay, the Chancellor of your Exchequer, which have produced in me two contrary effects: the one of displeasure, to see by them your mistrust of my sincere intentions; and the other of pleasure, that your long silence is broken by your letters aforesaid, and your mind so far laid open by them, that inasmuch as you have been pleased to instruct your trusty councillors to communicate with me on your part, I have some little room to hope, instead of despair, for some good and speedy determination of my affairs, so long expected by me; in which hope I am much confirmed in, that you have been pleased to send me two of your most agreeable and faithful councillors. From whom having

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Carlisle, Sussex to Cecil, 29th August, 1570.

† Copy of the time, State Paper Office, Randolph to Sussex, 14th August, 1570; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 280.

‡ Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 96.

§ Ibid., pp. 95, 96.

* Labanoff, vol. iii. pp. 88—115; Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 101—108.

learned your pleasure, and such particulars as you charged them to communicate to me, I have so freely discussed with them every point that I trust it will satisfy you, and prove my affection to you, that on my part there remains no longer any scruple to obstruct our sincere and reciprocal friendship, which I prefer to that of any other prince. In proof of which, I consent to place in your hands the most valued jewel which God has given me in this world, and my sole comfort—my only and dear son; whose education, desired by several, is entrusted to you, and by him and me preferred before all others to your good pleasure. According to which I have willingly agreed to all obligations reasonably required, the more readily so that my intention is sincere to observe the conditions agreed upon between us, resolving henceforward to cast anchor, and terminate my weary voyaging in the haven of your natural goodwill towards me. Having recourse, instead of a pledge, to the merit of my humble submission and obedience, which I offer to you as if I had the honour of being your daughter, as I have that of being your sister and nearest cousin, and yielding to none in obeying and honouring you now as heretofore, if you please to accept me as entirely yours. In return for which I respectfully desire the favour of your presence, which will afford indubitable assurance of your perpetual favour henceforward, and hope to induce me never to swerve from your pleasure and command. And although by your letters and messages I can depend upon your goodwill and favour, nevertheless the favour of your presence and your own word alone can stop the mouths of those who either may vilify or try to break our treaty, esteeming it defective, as wanting such an evidence of good faith between us. For how are they to judge of us, seeing that we agree in all other points, and that I have been more than two years in your power, if I return without obtaining admission to your presence,—except that there is some deep-rooted displeasure in your heart towards me, seeing a similar refusal has never been made to any sovereign, so far from between a relative so near, and one who is so desirous to please you?

“Then, madam, my good sister, do not refuse this my very humble request to see you before my departure, so as to remove from me all fear of being undeservedly in your disfavour; and thus relying altogether on your goodwill, I shall have an indissoluble bond of friendship between us twain sufficient to shut the mouths of our mutual enemies who might pretend to the contrary; and by the same means I shall discover to you the secrets of my heart, of which I have given some insight, but darkly, to Mr. Cecil, your secretary, reserving, however, the chief point to that truly happy day so much desired by me, with the deference which I begged him to communicate to you on my behalf. Hoping that, having heard from your two trusty councillors and my ambassador, whom I send to you, hourly to receive your good pleasure and contentment, the sincerity with which I desire to proceed to satisfy you on all points, you will accede to my affectionate request. I shall devote myself more and more to love, honour, and obey you, which I am resolved to do, nevertheless; and, if you please so to favour me, I would beg of you first of all to command me when you please, where you please, in what company, to remain as secretly, as long or as short, without seeing or being seen but by you, with whom alone I have to do; of which God is my witness, that I have no other design but to convince you, and assure myself of your favour, without prejudice to any one, but to your satisfaction and my great consolation, which I desire after God from you; whom I pray to move your heart to receive graciously the offer which I make of mine, and that he may give you, madam, my good sister, a long and very happy life.—From Chatsworth, the 16th of October, 1570.”*

For the honour of human nature, it is to be hoped that, with the exception of Elizabeth, no creature having a woman's heart beating in her bosom could remain unmoved by such a touching appeal. But the heart of Elizabeth, besides being “deceitful above all things,” was “hard as a piece of the nether millstone.” Mary, however, at last believing her sincere, subscribed the treaty; and, although some of its conditions were far from being agreeable to her, she seemed resolved faithfully to observe them. In a letter which she addressed at this time to the Pope, she says that she had been compelled by a regard to the state of the country, as well as by the dangers with which she was daily threatened, and the desertion of many who ought to have assisted her, to conclude a peace with Elizabeth on the disadvantageous conditions which were offered her, and assures him that she should never fail to act honourably and conscientiously.†

That the negotiation should terminate in this manner was very far from Elizabeth's intention. Its terms had indeed been agreed on by the contracting parties; but they were now to be subjected to a fresh discussion by a body of deputies appointed to meet in London. The two contending parties in Scotland were required to send commissioners to confer with the English queen on the restoration of Mary, and a treaty of alliance between the two kingdoms. The commissioners of Mary's party—the Bishop of Galloway and Lord Livingston—were promptly on the spot, and in conjunction with the Bishop of Ross, then in London, were ready to proceed with the important business entrusted to them.‡ Not so the deputies of the opposite faction, who had doubtless received instructions to procrastinate. Four months had elapsed since the return of Cecil and Mildmay from Chatsworth, and the commissioners of the Scottish Scottish commissioners sent to London to confer with Elizabeth as to the restoration of Mary.

* Labanoff, vol. iii. pp. 107, 108, copy, Archives of the kingdom at Paris, Cartons des Rois, K. No. 95.

† Bzovius, p. 710, 31st October, 1570.

‡ Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 111.

queen had been for two months at their post; still those of the king's party—the Earl of Morton, the Abbot of Dunfermline, and Sir James Macgill—had not yet arrived.* When at length they made their appearance, they found the treaty had already been virtually set aside. The Duke of Alva had disapproved of its general tenour,† and Charles IX. objected to two of its clauses, which Elizabeth considered of vital importance—viz. the education of the young prince in England, and the dissolution of the ancient league between Scotland and France.‡ But, even if these points had been conceded, it is evident that Elizabeth never intended to adhere to the treaty.§ She now insisted on the insertion of clauses to which she was well assured Mary would never agree; and Morton, Pitcairn, and Macgill, co-operated in this mean artifice, by declaring that they had only general instructions to treat of an amicable alliance between the two kingdoms, but had no authority to agree either to the restoration of Mary, or to the delivering up of the young prince to the care of Elizabeth.|| This behaviour of Morton and his associates appears to have resulted from a previous correspondence of Morton with Cecil and Sussex,¶ and was therefore clearly traceable to the treachery of Elizabeth herself. Her base policy roused the indignation of the Bishop of Ross, who complained that his mistress had been cruelly deceived, denounced the whole proceeding as an unworthy subterfuge, and declared that if the Queen of England was sincere in these negotiations, the restoration of the Queen of Scots might be accomplished without difficulty, dishonour, or danger. The result of the conference, however, had been determined on before it commenced; his broken up without coming to any decision.

The conference

remonstrance could not alter the resolution of those to whom it was addressed; and the proceedings were abruptly terminated by the English deputies, who declared that as the Scottish commissioners could not come to an agreement, the negotiation was at end.††

It is not difficult to discover a motive on the part of Elizabeth for this elaborate piece of treachery. The conference had been commenced to propitiate the French king, at the time when the close of the third civil war was likely to leave him leisure to assist Mary's adherents in Scotland, was protracted so long as Elizabeth entertained apprehensions of a union between the kings of France and Spain for the restoration of Mary, and broken off as soon as she was relieved from all apprehensions with regard to the policy of the French court, by the proposal of a marriage between herself and the Duke of Anjou.*

While this solemn farce was being enacted in London, Lennox had never ceased harassing with relentless severity such as were opposed to his government in Scotland; and he finally resolved on summoning a parliament to proceed to the forfeiture of the leaders of the queen's party. Elizabeth signified a feigned disapprobation of these proceedings, by remonstrating in such a manner as was plainly intended rather to encourage than to check them.† This duplicity was carried so far as to disgust Sussex, who, though a ready and far from fastidious tool in taking vengeance on the adversaries of his mistress, had too high a sense of honour to suffer his reputation to be compromised by all her mean and disingenuous artifices. Hearing that Lethington was threatened with the penalties of treason, he wrote to Randolph in the following terms:—"Master Randolph, I hear that Lethington is put to the horn, his lands and goods confiscated and seized; if so it be, it doth not accord with the good faith the queen's majesty meant in the articles accorded between her highness and the Bishop of Ross, nor with the writing I subscribed: and therefore I have written to the regent and others in that matter. * * * And although I for my part be too simple to be made a minister in princes' causes, yet truly I weigh mine own honour so much, as I will not be made a minister to subscribe to any thing wherein my good faith and true meaning should be abused to my dishonour, or any person trusting to that he shall accord in writing with me, should thereby be by fraud deceived."‡

Party strife had now attained to such a height in Scotland as to threaten the dissolution of society. The distinctions of "king's men" and "queen's men" were to be found in every town and village throughout the country, and the most deadly political rancour, inflamed by mistaken religious zeal, tore asunder every tie of neighbourhood, friendship, and consanguinity. Men of opposite factions branded each other with opprobrious epithets, and charged each other with revolting crimes. Lennox was stigmatised by Huntley as an alien, a usurper, and a tool of Elizabeth; while, on the other hand, Huntley and his associates were denounced as traitors and enemies to religion, and as the murderers of the late king and the regent. These charges were retorted upon those by whom they were made; and the dispute becoming public, ended in the production of the band for the murder of Darnley, to which, among others, was affixed the signature of the Regent Moray himself. To

* Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 125; Letter from Mary to Sussex, Labanoff, vol. iii. pp. 197, 198.

† Memoir addressed by Mary to the Bishop of Ross, 8th February, 1571, Labanoff, vol. iii. p. 182.

‡ Letter from Mary to La Motte Fénelon, 31st May, 1571; Labanoff, vol. iii. pp. 262, 263; Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 121; La Motte Fénelon's Correspondence, vol. iv. p. 367.

§ Cecil's letters to Walsingham, 24th March and 7th April, 1571; Digges, pp. 67, 68; Mignet, vol. ii. pp. 127-8.

|| Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 125, 127, 130, 131, 133; La Motte Fénelon's Correspondence, vol. iv. p. 4.

¶ Tytler, vol. vii. p. 232.

 Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 134, 137, 139.

†† Ibid., pp. 138, 139.

* La Motte Fénelon's Correspondence, vols. iii. and iv., passim.

† Original Draft in Cecil's hand, State Paper Office, 25th September, 1570; Minute of the Queen's Majesty's letter to Sussex, Tytler, vol. vii. p. 233.

‡ Copy of the time, State Paper Office, 8th October, 1570, Sussex to Randolph; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 233; Diurnal of Occurrences, p. 193.

this it was answered, that the band produced was not the true band for the king's murder, but one substituted by Lethington for the original band, which he had abstracted. We have no means now of deciding this dispute, but the very existence of such a document, signed beyond doubt by men of the first rank in the state, presents us with a dismal picture of the state of society at that period.

During this excited state of the public mind, Knox denounces John Knox warmly espoused the cause of the king's party, and with great vehemence publicly from the pulpit denounced Mary as a murderer and an adulteress, and her adherents as traitors. His zeal, which had all along been ardent and conspicuous, was, perhaps, at this juncture still further inflamed by rumours of an alliance in Mary's favour between France and Spain, which he regarded with horror, as the two greatest bulwarks of Popery and most uncompromising adversaries of the Protestant faith. "It has been objected against me," he said, "that I have ceased to pray for my sovereign, and have used railing imprecations against her. Sovereign to me she is not, neither am I bound to pray for her in this place. My accusers, indeed, term her their sovereign, and themselves the nobility and subjects professing her obedience; but in this they confess themselves traitors, and so I am not bound to answer them. As to the imprecations made against her, I have willingly confessed that I have desired, and in my heart desire, that God of his merey, for the comfort of his poor flock within this realm, will oppose his power to her pride, and confound her and her flatterers and assisters in their impiety. I praise my God he of his merey hath not disappointed me of my just prayer; let them call it imprecation or execration, as pleases them. It has oftener than once stricken, and shall strike in despite of man, maintain and defend her whoso list. I am farther accused that I speak of their sovereign (mine she is not) as that she were reprobate, affirming that she cannot repent; whereto I answer, that the accuser is a calumniator and a manifest liar, for he is never able to prove that at any time I have said that she could not repent; but I have said, and yet say, that pride and repentance abide not in one heart of any long continuance. What I have spoken against the adultery, against the murders, against the pride, and against the idolatry of that wicked woman, I spake not as one that entered into God's secret counsel; but being one, of God's great merey, called to preach according to his blessed will, revealed in his holy Word, I have oftener than once pronounced the threatenings of his law against such as have been of counsel, knowledge, assistance, or consent, that innocent blood should be shed. And this same thing I have pronounced against all and sundry that go about to maintain that wicked woman, and the band of those murderers, that they suffer not the death according to his Word, that the plague may be taken away from this land, which shall never be, so long as she and they remain unpunished according to the sentence of God's law." *

A most unexpected event, of great importance to the regent and his party now occurred. This was no other than their sudden surprise and capture of the Castle of Dunbarton. This party. Dunbarton Castle captured by the regent's party. fortress, the only place of strength in the west still held by the opposite faction, had, ever since the commencement of the civil war, been kept possession of in the queen's name by Lord Fleming, the governor. From its peculiar position, on a high and precipitous rock, rising abruptly from the river, it was in that age deemed impregnable; and, as commanding the great estuary of the Clyde, was esteemed the most secure and convenient place for the landing of troops or munitions of war from abroad. It happened that the wife of a soldier of the garrison, named Robertson, had been wrongfully, as he supposed, accused of theft, and punished by order of the governor; † and Robertson, in revenge, having made his escape, applied to Robert Douglas, a kinsman of the regent, offering to put him in possession of the castle if furnished with every necessary preparation, and a sufficient number of men to follow him as their guide. The scheme on examination appearing to be practicable, sealing-ladders and other apparatus requisite were speedily provided, and Captain Crawford, of Jordanhill, was appointed to conduct the enterprise, assisted by John Cunninghame, Laird of Drumwhassel, reputed one of the bravest men and most skilful officers of his time. Having sent on before him a party of horse to intercept all passengers, and thus prevent intelligence of the proceeding from being spread abroad, Crawford, accompanied by Robertson and a small band of resolute men, set out from Glasgow about sunset, on the 1st of April, and arrived about midnight at the hill of Dunbuck, about a mile from Dunbarton, where he met Drumwhassel and Captain Hume, attended by a hundred men. Here for the first time the soldiers were made acquainted with the nature of the undertaking, and being provided with ropes and sealing-ladders, they set forward in silence, and soon reached the bottom of the rock. A party of horsemen were left at some little distance behind to keep watch, and the avenues leading to the castle were secured to prevent intelligence reaching the governor. It had been a clear moonlight night, but the moon had now set, and a dense fog enveloped the summit of the rock. It was decided that the attempt should be made at a place called the Beak, where the rock was highest, and in consequence less carefully guarded; but the ladder was no sooner fixed, than the weight and impetuous rush of the eager assailants loosed it from its fastenings, and brought it to the ground. No one, however, was hurt by the fall; and, after listening and finding all quiet, they were satisfied that the noise had not reached the ears of the gar-

* Bannatyne's Journal, pp. 109, 112, inclusive; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 47–50.

† Ibid. p. 54.

T. Alton.

WINDMILLARION CASSIDE FROM THE COLYDIE.

J. D. 1841

riſon. Accordingly, having faſtened their ladder more ſecurely, they once more commenced their aſcent. The ladder was ſixty ſteps in length, and when they had reached its ſummit they found themſelves diſtant about twenty ſteps from a ſmall ledge of the rock, where an aſh-tree grew from the cleft. To this ſpot Crawford and the guide clambered with much difficulty and danger, and having reached it they, by means of cords which they faſtened to the roots of the tree, ſoon brought up the ladders and their companions. They were ſtill, however, at a great diſtance from the bottom of the wall.* Having managed to make faſt their ladder a ſecond time, they once more began to mount; but when they had proceeded half-way, a new and moſt unexpected obſtacle preſented itſelf. One of their party was ſeized with a fit, and, clinging in a ſtate of inſenſibility to the ladder, rendered it impoſſible for any one to paſs him. To have thrown him down, beſides being repugnant to feeling, might have attracted the attention of the guards above, and occaſioned a diſcovery; but in this dilemma Crawford, with great preſence of mind, ordered the man to be bound faſt to the ladder, and turning the other ſide of it, they were able to aſcend as before. In this manner they reached the foot of the wall juſt as day began to dawn; but this laſt obſtacle, though of conſiderable height, was ſoon ſurmounted. Faſtening the iron hooks of their ladder to the copeſtone, Alexander Ramsay, Crawford's enſign, followed by two others, was the firſt to aſcend, and in a few moments appeared on the parapet. He was inſtantly obſerved by the ſentinel, who had ſcarcely time to give the alarm when Ramsay diſpatched him. Three ſoldiers of the gariſon were immediately on the ſpot, but he managed to keep them at bay until the arrival of his companions. In the meantime the old wall, being ſhaken by the weight and violence of the aſſailants, gave way, and falling inwards, left a patent way for the entrance of the whole party. They ruſhed forward with great fury, ſhouting out "A Darnley! a Darnley!" and ſeizing on the cannon, turned them againſt the gariſon, who by this time completely alarmed had turned out half naked, but were ſo overcome with ſurpriſe and terror that they offered no reſiſtance. Lord Fleming, the governor, making his way down a dangerous ravine, eſcaped through a poſtern-gate, and, getting into a ſmall fiſhing-boat, fled unattended into Argyreſhire. The aſſailing party did not loſe a ſingle man in this daring enterpriſe, and only four of the gariſon were ſlain. Among the priſoners taken in the caſtle were Verac, the French ambaffador; John Fleming, of Boghall; John Hall, an Engliſh gentleman, who had taken refuge in Scotland after Dacres' rebellion; the Lady Fleming, wife of the governor; Alexander, Maſter of Livingſton; and John Hamilton, Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, who was found armed with a ſhirt of mail and a ſteel cap.†

The official character of Verac as the ambaffador of a foreign power was ſo far reſpected that, after a ſhort detention, he was ſet at liberty. Lady Fleming was treated by the regent with great courteſy and kindneſs, and was not only ſuffered to continue at liberty, but was permitted to carry with her her plate and furniture. John Hall was ſent back to England, and Fleming of Boghall was committed to priſon; * but the Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, bearing the hated name of Hamilton, and perſonally obnoxious to the regent, was reſerved for prompt and condign vengeance. The Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's is hanged and quartered.

He was immediately conveyed under a ſtrong eſcort to Stirling, and there, on a charge of having been acceſſory to the murder of the king and the late regent, he was without any formal trial condemned to death; and on the fourth day after his capture was ignominiouſly hanged and quartered.† There can be little doubt that he was guilty of the crimes imputed to him, while his profligate life deprived him of all public ſympathy; at the ſame time, the hurried and irregular character of the proceedings againſt him ſhewed that they were dictated as much at leaſt by party rancour and perſonal malevolence, as by the love of juſtice.‡

Both parties, now exaſperated to frenzy againſt each other, prepared for a final and moſt deadly ſtruggle. Notwithſtanding the loſs of Dunbarton, which was felt to be a terrible blow to their hopes, the queen's faction did not deſpair of ultimate ſucceſs. Grange, who in the meantime had increaſed the number of his gariſon, and made great deſenſive preparations, ſtill held poſſeſſion of the Caſtle of Edinburgh, and overawed ſuch of the citizens as belonged to the oppoſite faction. He even iſſued a proclamation, declaring Lennox to be a uſurper, and commanding all who acknowledged his authority to quit the city within ſix hours; he alſo ſeized the arms belonging to the inhabitants, and fortified the gates of the city.§ A further proclamation was published in due form, on the 30th of April, at the market Croſs of Edinburgh. "To all and ſundry noblemen," ſo runs the document, "barons, gentlemen, and other lieges through all Scotland, I, Sir William Kirkaldy of Grange, knight-captain of the Caſtle of Edinburgh, make it manifeſt that forasmuch as Matthew Earl of Lennox having unlawfully intruded himſelf in the regiment of this realm, hath lately cauſed publiſh ſundry letters at divers burghs of the ſame, full of calumnies, in-

Grange iſſues a proclamation declaring Lennox a uſurper.

p. 203; Buchanan, book xx., cap. 28—32; Hiſtorie of James the Sext, pp. 70, 71; alſo MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Drury to the Privy Council, 3rd April, 1571; alſo MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Drury to the Privy Council, 9th April, 1571; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 54—57.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 58.

† Tytler, vol. vii. p. 290; Robertson, vol. ii. p. 17; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 58, 59.

‡ The following diſtich was affixed to the gallows on which he ſuffered:—

"Cresce diu felix arbor, ſemperque vireto Frondibus, qui nobis talia poma feras."

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 71.

* "When they were at the tree, they had five ſcore faddoms to the root of the wall."—Calderwood.

† Robertson, vol. ii. pp. 15—17; Diurnal of Occurrents, juries, and untrue reports against me, by persuasion of certain factious persons, enemies to their native country, and to all such as tended the liberty thereof, and in effect commanding and charging in his pretended manner all men, and especially my friends and servants, and men of war whom I have conducted for preservation of the said castle, to abandon and leave me and my service, to the end, as clearly may appear, that he might the more easily betray and surprise the same, and thereby to continue in his detestable tyranny, to the utter subversion of the laws, estates, and liberty of this our native country: For what cruelty, grief, heirship, oppression, destruction of policy, he and his faction have used and done by-gone, I leave to be judged by your wisdoms as a thing most notoriously known. * * * * Further account of my doings I will not give the said Earl of Lennox, whose usurped regiment I never acknowledged, nor yet intend to do, but rather opposed myself at the beginning, and ever since, to the same. And how I have behaved myself in keeping or using of the said castle, without violence or injury, and how uprightly I have ever meant and mean anent this realm, and pacification of the present troubles, I call God to witness most earnestly, and all other good men within Edinburgh, and others within the recke [smoke] of this house: Requiring herefor all good Scotchmen, and those that fear God without hypocrisy, as they tender the welfare of this their native country, to fortify and assist me to continue in keeping of this said house, against whatsoever persons shall happen to invade me, my friends, partakers, or the said castle, as I shall be ready to maintain and defend every one of them in case they be invaded by any unlawful means, for that cause or other causes under colour thereof: Certifying all such as will not concur with me in the cause and quarrel fore-said, that I will be their unfriend at my power, discharging myself to them by these presents, which I thought good to verify to all subjects of this realm: Protesting before God and the world that I mean nothing, but to be ready to maintain the true religion established within this realm, with the common weal and liberty of this my native country, without any kind of particular of my own.”*

Notwithstanding these solemn protestations, it would seem that Grange had but very recently been guilty of various acts of illegal violence, subversive of that “common weal” to which he professed so much regard. In particular, he had broken open the common prison of Edinburgh, and liberated a soldier who had been guilty of assassinating a gentleman in the public street; and it is alleged had, at the same time, carried off a woman who had been cognizant of the murder of the regent. That these allegations, if false, were currently reported and believed is evident from a letter addressed to him at that time by Cecil, indignantly remonstrating with him on the flagrant impropriety of his conduct. “How you will allow my plainness,” he says, “I know not; but surely I should think myself guilty of blood, if I should not thoroughly mislike you; and to this I must add that I hear, but yet I am loath to believe it, that your soldiers that broke the prison have not only taken out the murderer, your man, but a woman that was there detained as guilty of the lamentable death of the last good regent.

“Alas! my lord, may this be true? and, with your help, may it be conceived in thought that you—you, I mean, that was so dear to the regent, should favour his murderers in this sort? Surely, my lord, if this be true, there is provided by God some notable work of his justice to be showed upon you; and yet, I trust, you are not so void of God’s grace: and so for mine old friendship with you, and for the avoiding of the notable slander of God’s word, I heartily wish it to be untrue. * * * * I pray you commend me to my Lord of Ledington, of whom I have heard such things as I dare not believe of him, and yet his deeds make me afraid of his well doing.”*

Meanwhile Lennox repaired to Edinburgh, resolved to hold a parliament, and to concentrate there all the forces at his disposal, with a view to consolidate his own power, and, by one great effort, to ruin for ever the opposite faction; and having been joined by Morton, Macgill, and the Abbot of Dunfermline, who had now returned from England, they determined to recommence warlike operations at all hazards. Lennox accordingly gave orders for assembling the whole military strength of the kingdom at Linlithgow, on the 19th of May, while Morton collected at Dalkeith the regular troops that had been accustomed to act under the authority of the regent’s government.† Grange, on the other hand, felt himself sufficiently strong to cope with the utmost force of his enemies. He was joined by the duke with three hundred horse and one hundred hagbutters, by Herries and Maxwell with two hundred and forty horse, and by Huntley and Fernyhirst with such followers as they could muster. He had also received a supply of money from Mary, who still found means to keep up a secret intercourse with her friends, together with a thousand crowns, besides ammunition and arms, from France. Thus encouraged and re-inforced, and strong in his position in the Castle of Edinburgh, he resolved to hold out to the last extremity, without any apprehension as to the issue.

The time was now at hand for the assembling of the parliament, which had been summoned by the king’s party to meet at Edinburgh. The regent, however, not having sufficient artillery to assault the town, was unable to gain admittance. It was therefore resolved that the meeting should take place in a house at the head of the Canongate, which was included within the liberties of the city

* Copy, State Paper Office, endorsed by Cecil, “Copy of my letter to the Laird of Grange, 10th January, 1570-71.”

† Diurnal of Occurrences, p. 209.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 61—63.

though situated without the walls.* In order to command this street, and to protect the parliament from any attempt on the part of Kirkaldy and his followers to interrupt the proceedings, Lennox and Morton encamped at Leith, on the 9th May, with their united forces, and erected a small battery on an elevated spot called the Dow Craig, above the Trinity Church. Having taken these precautions, the parliament assembled on the 14th of May,† the members having obeyed the proclamation with great exactness, in order to obviate any objection that might be taken to the legality of the meeting. Never was parliament held under such extraordinary circumstances. Kirkaldy exerted himself to the utmost to interrupt the meeting, and during their deliberations kept up a constant cannonade upon them from the battlements of the castle. All however was in vain: they proceeded to business, as was natural under such circumstances, with the utmost dispatch; and, during their brief sederunt, they managed to pass an Act attainting Lethington, his brother, Thomas Maitland, and others of the same party, and then adjourned, appointing the next meeting to be held at Stirling on the 14th of August.‡

The regent holds a parliament in the Canongate.

Kirkaldy, not to be behind his opponents, on the 12th June held a rival parliament in the queen's name, in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh.§ At this meeting, a letter from the queen was read, declaring invalid her deed of demission and her consent to her son's coronation; whereupon supplication was made, setting forth that the deed having been "extorted by just fear of present death, and without consent and authority of the Estates of the realm, it is not, nor ever was valuable, nor can by the laws of nature, God, nor man be sustained." In conformity with this an Act was passed in these terms: "The lords spiritual and temporal, and commissioners of the burghs presently assembled, being with the said supplication ripely advised: It is statute and ordained by the authority of the parliament foresaid, that the said pretended demission, renunciation, and overgiving of the crown, and consequently the coronation of her dearest son, the regiment and usurped authority thereupon depending, with all that followeth thereupon, for the reasons specified in the said supplication, and good considerations notour to the whole estates, are, were, and from the beginning have been null in the self, void, and of no force nor effect; and so are to be reputed and holden of no validity in all times to come, but to cease, and have no farther effect during her majesty's life: and that the whole subjects of the realm are bound to acknowledge their natural band of allegiance to her majesty, as their only undoubted sovereign, like as the same pretended demission and coronation, with all that followed thereupon, had never been devised, nor yet had been, in rerum natura, the same, notwithstanding, according to the desire of the said supplication, and that letters be directed thereupon, in form as effairs.

"Attour, it is statute and ordained, that no man take upon hand to alter, change, innovate, or pervert in any sort, the form of religion and administration of the sacraments, publicly professed and established within this realm, that the Evangel sincerely preached may have course and be prorogated, without let, hindrance, or impediment to the honour of God and comfort of his Kirk; and that all superintendents, ministers, exhorters, and readers, in public prayers and supplications, make their prayer in a decent form; namely, for the queen's majesty, our sovereign lady, and her dearest son, the prince, and for her highness's council, and whole body and states of this commonwealth."* A proclamation of the queen's authority in terms of this Act was made next day at the Cross of Edinburgh,† and the parliament was adjourned until the 26th August.‡

The picture which historians have drawn of the miseries to which the nation at this period was subjected, are, even at this distance of time, distressing to contemplate. All the natural bonds by which society is held together gave way under the exasperation of political rancour. Neighbour was alienated from neighbour, friend from friend, brother from brother. The contagion reached even to the children, who fought together in the streets, under the common party distinctions of "king's men" and "queen's men."§ Nor were the peaceably disposed permitted unmolested to remain neutral. The citizens of Edinburgh, placed between the fire of the castle on the one hand, and that of the besieging army on the other, were compelled either to take part in the defence of the city or to join the besiegers, and thereby incur the penalty of confiscation. The latter distressing alternative was embraced by not fewer than two hundred of them, who sought refuge in the regent's camp. Even the municipal government of the city was violently dissolved; and Ker of Fernyhirst was, by the authority of Grange, appointed as provost, with a council composed of his military retainers.||

The English queen now interposed, avowedly for the purpose of mediating between the contending factions and restoring public tranquillity. Her sincerity, however, has been questioned;¶ not unreasonably, if we may judge from the result, taken in connection with her known character for duplicity and intrigue. On this occasion she sent Sir William Drury, Marshal of Berwick, to open negotiations with the leaders of both parties. The

Sir William Drury is sent by Elizabeth to open negotiations with the leaders of both parties.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 78.

† Ibid.

‡ Ibid. Robertson, who refers to Calderwood as his authority, says the 28th of August.

§ Ibid.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 91—96.

† Ibid., p. 97.

‡ Crawford's Memoirs, p. 177.

§ Ibid., p. 179.

|| Journal of Occurrences, p. 226.

¶ Melvil's Memoirs, p. 240; MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Morton to Elizabeth, Leith, 23rd August, 1571.

articles he proposed to them in the queen's name were seven in number, and provided chiefly for a cessation of hostilities on both sides: "so the same may be beneficial to the king's party," the safe custody of the king's person in the hands of his present guardians, and a remit to Elizabeth of "all matters in controversy public and private." This attempt at pacification proved utterly abortive. The regent refused his consent to a truce, unless the adverse party should restore the fortalices and castles which they had taken during the former abstinence;* and their contentions were renewed with increased violence.

On the 26th August,† as had been appointed, the queen's parliament once more assembled in Edinburgh. The meeting was attended, however, by only two bishops and three of the superior nobility;‡ nevertheless they passed sentence of forfeiture and treason against nearly two hundred persons belonging to the opposite faction; including Lennox, the regent, Morton and Mar, the Lords Lindsay, Hay, Cathcart, Glamis, Ochiltree, Macgill, the Clerk-Register, the Bishop of Orkney, and many other persons of distinction. §

The regent, on the other hand, on the 28th August held his parliament, consisting of the three Estates of the realm, at Stirling. The meeting was numerous and imposing; and the young king, only five years of age, arrayed in the robes of royalty, was brought thither by the Earl of Mar, and addressed the assembly in a speech which had been prepared for him. "My lords," he said, "and ye, the true subjects, who are convened here, as I understand, to minister justice; and because my age will not suffer me to exercise my charge myself, by reason of my youth, I have given power to my good sir, as regent and tutor to me, and you to assist him therein, as ye will answer to God and me thereafter."|| The parliament then proceeded to pronounce sentence of attainder against the Duke of Chatelherault, the Earl of Huntley, Sir William Kirkaldy of Grange, the Lord Claude Hamilton, the Abbot of Arbroath, Sir James Balfour, Robert, afterwards Sir Robert, Melvil, and various other persons who had rendered themselves conspicuous among the queen's party. It was also resolved that an embassy should be sent to Elizabeth, with a view to draw closer the alliance between the two kingdoms, and to express their assurance of the speedy and final overthrow of Mary's party.¶ At this meeting were present the Earls of Argyle, Eglinton, and Cassillis, and Lord Boyd, who had hitherto been zealous partisans of the opposite faction, but whom the regent had gained over to the king's party. Boyd had even been one of Mary's commissioners in the conferences at York and Westminster, and in that capacity had been admitted to her confidence, and become acquainted with all her schemes. At this meeting a circumstance occurred perhaps too trifling to find a place in history, but which we mention because it has been recorded by several historians of note. The young king observing a hole in the roof of the building, or, as others say, in the cloth that covered the board at which he sat, asked some one near him what house they were in, and on being informed that it was the House of Parliament replied, "There is a hole in this parliament." This remark was construed by many persons at that time into a prediction of the death of the regent, an event which occurred a few days afterwards.*

While the regent and great part of his adherents were still in Stirling, and, confident in their numbers and their dis- Stirling surprised by the queen's party. tance from the capital, were living in a state of fancied security, the bold and fertile genius of Kirkaldy suggested one of the most daring enterprises that had been attempted during these protracted struggles. This was nothing less than by a sudden and dextrous movement to surprise the town and Castle of Stirling, and seize the principal leaders of the king's party. Kirkaldy had purposed to conduct this exploit in person; but the lords of his party succeeded in persuading him to the contrary, representing to him that by endangering his own safety he endangered the cause of the queen, and promising that the affair should be managed in precise accordance with his directions. The leaders selected for this undertaking, however, were men of known courage and ability. These were Huntley, Lord Claud Hamilton, Buccleuch, Spens of Wormiston, and Ker of Fernyhirst, accompanied by two officers, named Calder and Bell. The last, who was a native of Stirling, and intimately acquainted with all the passages of the town, was constituted ensign-bearer to a company, and appointed to act as guide.† To the conduct of these leaders was assigned a party consisting of sixty mounted hagbutters and about three hundred foot-soldiers,‡ who, however, were provided with horses for the journey.§ This small but resolute band set out from Edinburgh on the evening of the 3rd September; but, in order to deceive their enemies, instead of proceeding directly towards Stirling, they took the road to Peebles. This ruse had the desired effect, as it was rumoured in the camp at Leith that they contemplated an attack upon Edinburgh. Small parties of horsemen had in the meantime been sent out to intercept the travellers between Stirling and Edinburgh, to prevent intelligence of the expedition from being conveyed to

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 97—99.

† Ibid., p. 136.

‡ Spottiswood, p. 256; MS. Letter, State Paper Office, August, 1571; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 295.

§ Diurnal of Occurrents, pp. 236, 242, 243; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 136.

|| MS. Letter, State Paper Office, John Case to Drury, Stirling, 29th August, 1571; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 136.

¶ MS. State Paper Office, August, 1571, Persons forfeited in Scotland; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 296; Maitland, vol. ii., 1124; Diurnal of Occurrents, p. 245.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 136.

† Ibid., p. 139.

‡ Robertson, vol. ii. p. 22.

§ Ibid.

the capital.* When the darkness of night had set in, the hostile band, suddenly turning to the right, took the road leading to Stirling, and pushing rapidly forward, arrived a little before dawn within a mile of the town. Here they left their horses, and under the conduct of their guide entered Stirling by a secret passage, and before the townspeople were stirring took possession of the principal streets. They instantly proceeded to carry out their daring plan, and amid loud shouts of "A Hamilton! a Hamilton! Remember the Archbishop of St. Andrew's! All is ours!" † they burst into the noblemen's houses, and in a few minutes made prisoners of the regent, Argyle, Morton, Glencairn, Cassillis, Eglinton, Montrose, and Buchan, with the Lords Semple, Cathcart, and Ochiltree. Of these Morton alone made any resistance: he barricaded his house, and defended it with such obstinacy that it was not until two of his people were slain, ‡ and his house set on fire, that he surrendered to the assailants. The victory was now complete; and, had it not been for the misconduct of the Borderers, the queen's party would in all probability have obtained permanent supremacy in the kingdom. The Liddesdale-men, however, accustomed to the predatory expeditions of the Border, broke their ranks, and dispersing themselves over the town, began to plunder the shops and booths of the inhabitants. Intelligence of what was going forward at last reached the Earl of Mar, governor of the castle, who sallying forth with forty soldiers, and taking possession of an unfinished building in the Market-place, commenced firing on the intruders, many of whom were confusedly congregated there, and soon drove them to another quarter of the town. Here they were assailed by the townsmen, who had turned out in arms to assist the governor, and, being seized with a sudden panic, they took to flight with such precipitation that they trod upon each other. In the midst of this confusion, Morton and the other noblemen who had been made prisoners, taking courage, and seizing on such weapons as happened to be at hand, turned on their guards, and after a brief struggle effected their own liberation. The cause of the assailants was now desperate: some surrendered themselves to their own prisoners, others took to flight. Pursuit, however, was impossible, as they had taken possession of all the horses in the town, and, mounted on these, were soon beyond the power of their enemies. Calder, frantic with rage at the failure of the enterprise, resolved to put the regent to death. Spens of Wormiston, to whom the regent had surrendered, and who had received strict orders from Grange to save his life at any risk, suddenly threw himself between Calder and the regent, just as the former was in the act of firing, and the shot passing through Wormiston's body, mortally wounded the regent in the back. The soldiers of the king's party then fell upon Spens, and hacked him to pieces. The regent shot notwithstanding the earnest entreaties of Calder, treaties of Lennox, who, amidst his own sufferings, implored them to spare him. The regent was conveyed on horseback to the castle; and a physician, on examination of the wound, at once pronounced it to be mortal. Feeling that he was approaching his end, he called his lords to his bedside, and in a parting address reminded them that, in obedience to their desire, he had assumed the office of regent; he declared that in doing so he was in no degree actuated by motives of personal ambition; he recommended his grandson to their care, and entreated them to be careful to appoint as regent a man who feared God and wished well to his country. Then, grasping Mar by the hand, he besought him to convey his love to his Meg (meaning the countess his wife), to endeavour to console her, and to say that he committed her to the goodness of the Almighty.* He expired the same evening, the 4th of September.

The assassination of the regent was avenged on Calder, the perpetrator, and on Execution of Bell, as accessory, with revolting Calder and Bell. cruelty. Bell was first put to the torture, and afterwards hanged; and Calder was broken on the wheel. On examination under torture Bell admitted that he had called out, "Shoot the regent! the traitor is coming upon us, and ye will not get him away." Calder confessed his crime, to which he said he was instigated by Lord Huntley and Lord Claud Hamilton, in revenge for the death of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's.†

In this daring enterprise not more than nine of the assailants were slain, and sixteen, including Buccleuch, made prisoners. They had been masters of the town for about three hours, and but for the want of discipline already referred to, might have slain or taken prisoner every person of distinction within its walls, and thus subverted the king's party for ever.‡

On the next day after the death of Lennox, the nobles assembled to elect a successor to the regency. There appeared three candidates for the office—Argyle, Morton, and Mar—the last of whom was elected by a plurality of voices. There were many circumstances to recommend this preference. Argyle, as we have seen, had been but recently won over from the queen's faction, and, it might be supposed, was scarcely yet entitled to take the leadership among his new associates, to whom he had so long been opposed. Morton was supported by English influence, which was felt even by his own party to have already at least sufficient weight in Scottish affairs; moreover, though possessed of great talent, his ambition

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Burghley, Berwick, 10th September, 1571; Spottiswood, p. 257.

† Second Examination of Bell, State Paper Office, 6th September, 1571; MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 6th September, 1571.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Burghley, 13th September, 1571; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 299.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, from Scotland, a spy to Lord Burghley, 5th September, 1571; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Grange and Lethington to Sir William Drury, 6th September, 1571; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 297.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 139.

‡ Ibid.

was inordinate—his disposition imperious, daring, crafty, and unscrupulous—his temper harsh and overbearing. Mar, on the other hand, had been distinguished by a degree of honesty, disinterestedness, moderation, and love of peace, extremely rare among the notables of these times; and had, besides, the good fortune of being at that very moment instrumental in rescuing the whole party from impending ruin. That his abilities were not of the highest order, and his power comparatively limited, so far from being a bar to his advancement, was an additional recommendation, as he was thus less likely to become formidable to his haughty and jealous compeers.*

At an adjourned meeting of the parliament, held at Stirling, the appointment of Mar to the regency was approved and ratified; and the sentence of forfeiture passed against the Earls of Argyle, Eglington, and Cassillis, and Lord Boyd, was rescinded,—“seeing they were now come to the obedience of the king’s authority.”

At the same time a letter was concocted to be sent to the leaders of the queen’s party, who still remained in the Castle of Edinburgh. This message, which was delivered by the person entrusted with it into Lethington’s own hand, is thus superscribed:—“The nobility and estates of this realm of Scotland, presently convened in parliament at Stirling, in the fear of God and lawful obedience of the king, our sovereign lord, to all persons now remaining in the burgh and Castle of Edinburgh, the 7th of September, 1571.”

Its tone was moderate and conciliatory. It briefly alluded to the calamities suffered by the nation, and particularly by the capital, through the proceedings of the queen’s party, and admonished them of the danger of obstinately persisting in the course they had been pursuing. “The end must be,” it represented, “either that he [the king] be obeyed, and peace and justice restored in this commonwealth, or then the force of you now compassed within that castle must undo him, whose subjects we profess ourselves to be, and so, consequently, exterminate us and our posterity. What ground ye build on in your enterprise, or what certainty ye can look for, or the course ye run, let every one of you consider by himself, and look upon the inconveniences of this war, if it will continue, and of the fruits which peace and justice would bring. * * * To be short, this realm may no longer sustain this contempt, rebellion, and confused state; but either must the king, our sovereign lord, his authority be obeyed, the town of Edinburgh set at liberty, and the seat of justice restored, to the universal commodity and ease of the subjects, or then must we give our lives, and employ our substance and friends, in the quarrel.” But while this threat was held out on the one hand, the parties were on the other assured of safety and protection, in the event of their following the “advice” tendered to them. The document concludes in these terms:—“And if our admonition be rejected, we protest that as ye yourselves have been, and are, the occasion of all the evil and extremity which hath followed your obstinacy and contempt, so whatsoever harm or inconvenience happen to any of us in prosecution of this just cause, that our bloods and scathes [injuries] be required at your hands and your posterity’s.”*

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 14th September, Berwick, Drury to Burghley; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 300; Spottiswood, p. 257; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Berwick, 14th September, 1571, Drury to Burghley. Drury gives Mar a high character as “one of the best nature in Scotland, and wholly giver to quietness and peace”

This communication does not seem to have produced any immediate change of purpose in the parties to whom it was addressed. Grange still continued to hold out successfully, and, confident in his position and resources, to bid defiance to his enemies. The regent accordingly attempted to reduce the city by bombarding it—first from the east side, and afterwards from the south; but, after a siege of eight or nine days, was foiled in both instances, and compelled to fall back upon Leith.† Nor were his attempts at negotiation more successful, every effort being secretly counteracted by Morton, whose disappointed and unprincipled ambition led him to sacrifice the peace of the kingdom to the gratification of a mean and spiteful malevolence against his more successful competitor. But this was not his only or even principal motive for his nefarious conduct. He was a tool of Elizabeth, and at this time was actually pensioned by that impersonation of cold-blooded selfishness, hypocrisy, and intrigue, to carry out her abominable policy of fomenting discord, and protracting those fierce and sanguinary struggles which had already brought the kingdom to the brink of destruction.‡

The queen’s party now enjoyed a brief period of success. Mar felt his inability to cope with the complicated difficulties of his position, and anxiously petitioned Elizabeth for the assistance which he naturally expected from that quarter, but which it did not accord with her policy to grant; while, in the north, Adam Gordon of Auchendown, brother of the Earl of Huntley, a man of high military genius, after several successful conflicts with the king’s troops, reduced the whole of that quarter into subjection to the authority of the queen.¶ But these triumphs were short-lived. An event now occurred in Eng-

The regent bombards the Castle of Edinburgh.

Adam Gordon reduces the north to the queen’s obedience.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 143, 144.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Berwick, 9th October, 1571, Drury to Burghley; MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Hunsdon to Burghley, Berwick, 4th November, 1571; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 301; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 153.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Instruction by Morton, given to Sir William Drury to communicate to the Queen’s Majesty, about 28th November, 1571; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 305.

§ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, endorsed by Cecil, Cunningham’s Demands, 1st October, 1571; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 301.

¶ Historie of James the Sext, pp. 109, 113.

land which proved the precursor of the final extinction of Mary's hopes, and the ruin of her party in Scotland. This was the discovery of a new intrigue of the Duke of Norfolk, with a view to the liberation of the Scottish queen, and his marriage with that princess. The duke had been liberated from the Tower under the promise of his holding no farther communication with the Queen of Scots; but a train of circumstances occurring apparently favourable to his long-cherished design, he was

New conspiracy of the Duke of Norfolk. induced, regardless of his promise, to lend himself to a plot which proved ultimately fatal to both parties. Mary, disappointed of all her hopes of succour from the court of France, which, in consequence of the projected marriage of Elizabeth with the Duke of Anjou, she considered as in league with her enemies, now looked to the King of Spain for assistance. Philip, through the medium of the Bishop of Ross, had for some time not only kept up a secret correspondence with Mary, but had repeatedly sent small sums of money both to herself and her party in Scotland. The bishop had entrusted as his agent in carrying on a negotiation with Mary, one Ridolphi, a Florentine gentleman who resided in London under the guise of being a banker, but who was in reality an agent of the Pope. Mary, thinking it necessary to inform the Duke of Norfolk of what was going forward, wrote to him a long letter in cipher, complaining of the manner in which she had been treated by the court of France, intimating her resolution to solicit the aid of the King of Spain, and recommending to him Ridolphi as a person at once worthy of his confidence, and able materially to assist in the advancement of the project. The duke rashly entrusted the letter to his secretary, Hickford, with orders first to decipher it and then commit it to the flames; but the perfidious secretary, instead of burning the letter, hid it under the duke's bed.

The duke naturally listened with eagerness to the representations of Ridolphi, which flattered his hopes of the ultimate completion of a scheme he had long had so much at heart. Ridolphi assured him of pecuniary aid from the Pope, to any extent that might be required, and informed him that the Duke of Alva was in readiness to land an army of ten thousand men near London. He represented to him that the Roman Catholics of England were but awaiting the signal of revolt to rise en masse; that many of the nobility were impatient to join them; that all looked to him as the leader of this great enterprise; and that its success, under such propitious circumstances, could scarcely be doubted. Norfolk, dazzled by the prospect of the splendid prize before him, and credulously confident of the means by which it was proposed to be attained, had the temerity to allow his name to be employed in the negotiations with the Pope and the Duke of Alva, for entering on this daring and desperate enterprise. In the meantime, however, obscure intimations of the conspiracy had reached the ears of the government, and the interception of a sum of money which had been entrusted by the French ambassador to Barker, one of Norfolk's secretaries, to be conveyed, together with certain letters in cipher, to some of Mary's adherents in Scotland, was the means of leading to a full discovery of the premeditated treason. Hickford, in conjunction with Bannister, Norfolk's steward, undertook, with permission of their master, to find means of sending both the money and the letters to Lord Herries; but the person employed to convey them, inferring from the weight of the packet that it contained gold, and suspecting the object for which it was sent, instead of proceeding with it to Scotland, placed it in the hands of Burghley.* The three agents in this transaction were instantly arrested, and subjected to a rigid examination, which led to the apprehension of the duke and the whole of his domestics.

He is arrested, and again committed to the Tower.

On being conveyed to the Tower, Hickford unreservedly disclosed the whole secret,† and indicated the place where the cipher in which Mary's letters were written, the letters themselves, and sundry other treasonable papers were deposited. These, together with the evidence of the Duke's domestics, and a confession wrung from the Bishop of Ross, under the threat of torture,‡ were deemed conclusive evidence of his guilt. On the 14th of January, 1571, he was brought to trial before a jury of twenty-seven peers, was found guilty, and condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, two days thereafter. The execution of the sentence, however, which was commuted to that of decapitation, was from time to time delayed; but at last, on the 2nd of June, he suffered death by the hands of the executioner on Tower Hill.§

He is tried, found guilty, and condemned to death.

The Bishop of Ross, who had been deeply implicated in this conspiracy, was arrested and committed to the Tower; and, notwithstanding his privileges as an ambassador, his papers were searched, and he was even threatened with death,—the crown lawyers having declared that an ambassador found guilty of a conspiracy against the sovereign to whom he is accredited, thereby forfeits his privileges, and may be subjected to the penalties of the law, like a common malefactor. After a protracted imprisonment, he was liberated, on condition that he should quit the kingdom.

The Bishop of Ross is arrested, and imprisoned in the Tower.

From this time forward the captive queen was treated with greater rigour than ever. She was not permitted to have an ambassador at the English court; she was kept under strict guard; the number of her attendants was diminished; and no person was allowed to see her except in presence of her

* Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. pp. 169—171; see also the Examinations and Confessions of Barker, Hickford, and Bannister, Murdin, pp. 67—146.

† Lesley's Negotiations, Anderson, vol. iii. p. 172.

‡ Ibid., pp. 189—200.

§ Howell's State Trials, vol. i. p. 1032.

keepers.* Meanwhile, Elizabeth publicly avowed her resolution to abandon all attempts to restore the Queen of Scots, and henceforward to employ all the means in her power to induce the people of Scotland to acknowledge and obey no other sovereign than the young king.

This resolution, which she communicated to the leaders of both factions, tended not a little to dishearten the queen's party and to depress their energies. Nevertheless, she felt that it was more easily taken than carried into effect; but desirous, if possible, to accomplish her object by peaceable means, she had recourse in the first instance to advice, promises, and threatenings. With this view, she gave orders to Sir William Drury and Lord Hunsdon to open a correspondence with Grange, which, however, led to no definite conclusion. Afterwards, Mr. Cairns was dispatched from Berwick, by Lord Hunsdon, to the Castle of Edinburgh, as the bearer of the following message from Elizabeth:—

Elizabeth sends a message to Grange and others to the Castle of Edinburgh.

“Her majesty's pleasure is, that ye leave off the maintenance of civil discord, and give your obedience to the king, whom she will maintain to the uttermost of her power. And if ye will do so, she will deal with the regent and the king's party to receive you in favour upon reasonable conditions, for security of life and livings. In respect the Queen of Scots hath practised with the Pope, other princes, and her own subjects, great and dangerous treasons against the state of the country and destruction of her own person, she will never suffer her to be in authority, so far as in her lieth, nor to have liberty while she liveth. If ye refuse these offers, her majesty will presently aid the king's party with men, munition, and other things against you. Whereupon her majesty desireth your answer with speed.”† Though this message was sufficiently explicit as regarded the views and wishes of Elizabeth respecting the contending factions, yet, taken by itself, it could not be regarded by Grange and his party as a summons to unconditional surrender; and, on ascertaining from Hunsdon that he had no authority to enter into any specific treaty in the name of Elizabeth, her offer was regarded as insidious and insulting, and summarily rejected. Though they must have felt that they were losing ground, they had still too much confidence in their own strength, numbers, and resources, to be intimidated by empty menaces.

Meanwhile, Elizabeth contented herself for several months with having recourse to her favourite policy of fomenting dissension; and never perhaps did any country exhibit to the world such a scene of public and private cruelty and misery, as Scotland did during the winter and spring of 1571-2. In the open country, as well as in the capital, and in every town and village throughout the length and breadth of the kingdom, civil war raged with the most relentless fury. Castles, towns, and villages were beleaguered, and committed to the flames; men of opposite factions, as if possessed by the demon of destruction, butchered each other with the most savage ferocity;* and the terrors of the law, in their most dreadful forms of torture and death, were superadded to those of military execution. The victims of the gibbet were hurried to death in parties of forty or fifty at a time. With a view to starve the capital into surrender, Morton had ordered all the mills in the neighbourhood of the city to be destroyed, and interdicted all persons from supplying it with provisions; and countrymen, and even women, transgressing this order, were hanged on the spot, or scourged and branded on the cheek with a hot iron. These complicated miseries, still remembered in the traditions of the country under the name of “the Douglas wars,” leave a stain of indelible infamy on the memory of Elizabeth and of Morton, who were the chief agents in exciting and perpetuating this “reign of terror.”

These severities were more productive of odium to their authors than of damage to their adversaries. In almost every quarter of the country the cause of the queen was still in the ascendant. The capital and its castle, the most important stronghold in the kingdom, were still in the hands of her party, who were occasionally supplied with arms, ammunition, and money, by the courts of France and Spain, and had still reason to expect from the latter, at least, continued assistance;† whilst the garrisons of Niddry, Livingstone, and Blackness, fully supplied them with provisions.‡ In the north, as we have seen, Gordon had completely established the queen's authority; Fernyhirst had been not less successful in the south; and in the west Lord Semple, a strenuous supporter of the king's party, had met with a signal defeat.

The history of this dreary period was still further darkened by an act of base ^{Morton} ingratitude on the part of Morton, ^{delivers up} which has left a perpetual stain Northumberland. upon his memory. During his exile in England, he had contracted an intimate friendship with the Earl of Northumberland, to whom he became indebted for numerous acts of disinterested kindness. Northumberland himself was now a prisoner in the Castle of Lochleven, where he had been confined ever since he had taken refuge in Scotland, in the year 1569; yet Morton, in whose charge he then was, actually sold his unfortunate friend to the English government for a sum of money, which was divided between him and Douglas ^{His execution.} of Lochleven. Lord Hunsdon, governor of Berwick, into whose custody Northum-

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Randolph and Drury to Leicester and Burghley, Leith, 23rd February, 1571-2; also ibid., same to Hunsdon, Leith, 26th February, 1571-2; also MS. Letter, Randolph and Drury to Lord Hunsdon, Leith, 10th April, 1572; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 304.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Randolph and Drury to Lord Hunsdon, 26th February, 1571-2; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Mar to Burghley, 30th April, 1572.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury and Randolph to Hunsdon, 17th April, 1572.

* Strype's Annals of the Reformation, p. 50.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 156; Robertson, Appendix iv.

berland was delivered, had him conveyed to York, where he suffered death by the hands of the executioner.*

In the meantime, a treaty of alliance had been formed between England and France; and De Croc, as representative of the French king, repaired to Scotland, and in conjunction with Sir William Drury, on the part of Elizabeth, entered into negotiations for a truce for two months between the contending factions, preparatory to a general pacification of the country. The negotiations, which were commenced before the end of May, did not terminate until the 30th of July, when the

An abstinence "form of the abstinence" agreed on. on was signed by both parties at Leith and Edinburgh.† It provided that the truce should commence on the 1st August, and continue "till two months be fully outrun;" that, as soon as possible, a convention of the nobility and estates of the realm should be assembled, to concert measures for establishing a general peace; that in the meantime the town of Edinburgh, and all other towns throughout the kingdom, shall be set at liberty, and be patent to all, without hinderance or molestation; and in the event of the assembly of the nobility and estates being unable to effect a reconciliation, all differences shall be referred to the King of France and the Queen of England as arbiters, by whose decision both parties agreed to abide. "Providing," it is added, "that the abstinence or pacification that may follow thereupon in nowise touch the king our sovereign lord and his estate, to the prejudice thereof."‡ On the same day, proclamation of the truce was made at the Cross of Edinburgh, to the great joy of the inhabitants; and on the day following the soldiers of the regent, and such of the citizens of Edinburgh as had assisted him at Leith, sought admission into the town. They were not, however, permitted to enter until the following day, when, according to the agreement, the truce really commenced. They accordingly remained all night in the Canongate under arms, and next morning the regent, and the lords who were with him, made their public entrance into the city, and caused proclamation of the "abstinence" again to be made, with certification "that none, on nowise, presume or take upon hand to do, or attempt anything tending to the violation thereof, under the pain of death."§

It is not easy to understand how the leaders of the queen's party, who had shown such capacity for public business, should have been induced to subscribe a treaty containing a reservation in favour of the young prince, as their "king and sovereign lord," an admission that yielded up one of the principal objects in dispute—the claims of their mistress, which had been supported at such a cost of bloodshed and misery, and which they were still in an advantageous position to maintain. Whether there was bad faith on both sides it is difficult to determine; at all events, through the influence of Morton, who was evidently desirous of again plunging the country into civil war, all attempts at assembling the nobility and Estates for the purpose named in the treaty were frustrated; and it was not until the 22nd September, when the truce had nearly expired, that the regent came to Leith, to make an appointment with the leaders in the castle. After a long conference, nothing was concluded except a further The abstinence cessation of hostilities, to con- continued. tinue for eight days after the 26th. On a renewal of the conference, the truce was continued four days more; and finally, on the 8th of October, a farther abstinence was proclaimed, to continue until the 6th December.*

At this period an event occurred which, while it startled and appalled the whole civilised world, proved a heavy blow to the cause of Mary and her adherents, and contributed to hasten and consummate the ruin in which that party was ultimately involved.† This was no other than that atrocious outrage in France, known in his- The massacre tory and tradition as "the Mas- of St. Bartho- sacre of St. Bartholomew." The lomew. leaders of the Protestant party throughout the kingdom had been artfully allured to the capital, under solemn assurances from the king of protection and favour; and during a period of seven months they were treated at court, and among the Roman Catholic nobility and gentry of Paris, with apparent respect, cordiality, and familiar friendship. A dark conspiracy, however, at the head of which was the king himself, had been previously entered into, and was all the while being matured for their destruction. Accordingly, on an appointed day, under authority of a warrant signed by the king's own hand, a general and indiscriminate massacre of the Protestants was suddenly commenced. Fellow-citizens, neighbours, and intimate associates, were slaughtered in cold blood, with circumstances of such revolting cruelty, and on a scale of such appalling magnitude, as to be without a parallel in the sad history of human depravity. Five hundred persons of rank, and ten thousand others, without distinction of age or sex, were thus butchered in the capital alone, the streets of which for several days literally streamed with blood, while the monarch himself, attended by his courtiers, enjoyed the spectacle from the windows of the palace, and amused themselves with firing on such of the terrified citizens as flew to the gates for protection.‡ Similar orders were dispatched to the

* Crawford's Memoirs, pp. 55, 222; Camden, p. 445;

MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Hunsdon to Burghley, 1st May, 1572; ibid., Mar to Hunsdon, 23rd May, 1572; also ibid., Hunsdon to Burghley, 29th May, 1572; Gonzalez, p. 376.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 215.

‡ Ibid., pp. 215, 216.

§ Ibid., pp. 218, 219.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 225.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B.C, Sir William Drury to Lord Burghley, 15th September, 1572; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 308.

‡ Sully's Memoirs, vol. i., Edinburgh Edition; Mc'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. i. p. 216; Bannatyne's Journal, p. 388; Turner's Elizabeth, vol. iv.; History of England, p. 322.

different provinces of the kingdom, and were as unscrupulously obeyed; so that in one week not fewer than seventy thousand persons fell by the hands of these licensed murderers.* These dreadful atrocities, which no respectable Romanist will now attempt to defend, were publicly applauded in Spain, and at Rome, where the shocking blasphemy was perpetrated of offering solemn thanksgiving to God for the success of this diabolical conspiracy.†

The intelligence of these transactions, the details of which continued to arrive day after day, excited universal horror and alarm among the Protestant party both in Scotland and England; and apprehensions began to be entertained of a combination for the extirpation of the Protestants, embracing all the Roman Catholic princes of Europe. The increased abhorrence of popery, and the suspicion of all its professors, which these events excited, materially damaged the cause of Mary, while it strengthened that of the opposite party, and contributed to extend the influence of Elizabeth in Scotland. At the same time, the regent and lords, in consequence of a supplication presented to them by the barons, gentlemen, and other adherents of Protestantism then in Edinburgh, issued a proclamation, ordering a convention of commissioners to be sent from particular kirks, to be held in Edinburgh on the 20th October, "to consult, advise, and deliberate upon such matters and overtures as may be proposed to the regent and lords of the Privy Council, tending to the mutual defence of the professors of Christ's Evangel within this realm from the furious rage and lawless cruelties of the bloody and traitorous papists, executors of the decrees of the devilish Council of Trent; and in such things further as may advance God's glory and true religion."‡ Meanwhile, the ministers of Edinburgh inveighed vehemently against the authors and perpetrators of the enormities in France; and John Knox "bade tell the French ambassador that the sentence was pronounced in Scotland against that murderer, the King of France; that God's vengeance shall never depart from him nor his house, but that his name shall remain in execration to the posterities to come; and that none shall come of his loins that shall enjoy the kingdom in peace and quietness." De Croc, the French envoy, complained to the regent and lords of council; but it was answered that they could not stop the mouths of the ministers from speaking even against themselves.§

The mournful intelligence of these events in France was communicated to Elizabeth by Walsingham, the English ambassador at the court of Charles IX., and was received by the Protestants throughout the kingdom with deep sorrow, mingled with consternation and alarm. On his first appearance at court after the massacre, Fénélon, the French ambassador, found the queen and court habited in mourning. The scene, which must have been very solemn and affecting, is thus graphically described by himself:—"A gloomy sorrow sat on every face; silence, as in the dead of night, reigned through all the chambers of the royal apartment; the ladies and courtiers were ranged on each side, all clad in deep mourning, and as I passed through them not one bestowed on me a civil look, or made the least return to my salutes.*" The queen's countenance, as he advanced towards her, wore a mingled expression of sorrow and indignation.† On his attempting to justify the massacre, she made no secret of her horror at that infamous transaction, of her distrust of his explanations, and her fears of the consequences; and, on his assuring her of the continued friendship of the king, his master, she replied "that she greatly feared that those who had led that prince to abandon his natural subjects, would also lead him to abandon a foreign queen like herself."‡

Elizabeth indeed was seriously alarmed for the security of the Protestant establishment in England, and even for her own personal safety. She apprehended that Protestantism was everywhere threatened by a gigantic Popish conspiracy, of which the outbreak in France was only "the first fruits." She became in consequence distrustful of her Roman Catholic subjects; and brooding over the troubles by which her government had been disturbed, and was still threatened, through the machinations of Mary's friends both at home and abroad,—instead of blaming her own perfidious and cruel policy in unjustly detaining as a prisoner an independent sovereign not amenable to her jurisdiction, and who, as her near relative, had fled to her for protection,—she now began to cherish the most deadly hatred, and, it is to be feared, to form the most deadly designs against her poor helpless captive.

That Elizabeth now earnestly desired the death of the Scottish queen, it is impossible to doubt; but whether the subject was first directly broached by her, or by her too subservient minister, Burghley, is not so obvious, nor is it of much importance to determine. At all events, the project had been talked of, and was in fact under serious consideration. The English bishops, in answer to a question propounded by Burghley, had stated as their opinion that Elizabeth might justly put Mary to death;§ and juriconsults had attempted to prove that it would be lawful.|| Parliament wished to proceed against her by a bill of attainder; but, being forbidden by the queen, they resolved at least to pass an act excluding her from the suc-

* Carte, vol. iii. p. 522.

† La Motte Fénélon's Correspondence, vol. v. p. 122.

‡ Ibid., p. 126.

§ See British Museum, Caligula, c. ii. fol. 524; and D'Ewes' Journal, p. 507; also Lingard, vol. viii. pp. 106—108.

|| Ibid.

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. ii. p. 628.

† Robertson, vol. ii. p. 35.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 225, 226.

§ Ibid., p. 226.

Reception of the French ambassador at the English
court.

cession to the English throne. These wishes and resolutions, though no doubt sufficiently agreeable to Elizabeth, did not suit her present policy, and accordingly she put a stop to further proceedings at that time by proroguing the parliament.* She had already publicly declared that no evidence had been produced sufficient to convict Mary of the murder of her husband, and she therefore could not, without scandalous inconsistency, bring her to trial on that charge; while, to put her to death without trial would be to incur an amount of odium from which even Elizabeth's unscrupulous mind shrank.

As a preliminary to future procedure, perhaps Mary at that time not very definitely interrogated as fixed, Lord De la Ware, Sir Ralph a criminal. Sadler, and Thomas Bromley, Elizabeth's Solicitor-General, had, after the death of Norfolk, been dispatched to Sheffield, to interrogate Mary as a criminal on thirteen articles, regarding her connection with the conspiracy for which that nobleman had suffered.† She answered with great firmness and dignity. She disclaimed all hostile intentions against the life or government of Elizabeth in consenting to a marriage with the Duke of Norfolk, and affirmed that she had no other object in view than her own deliverance and that of Scotland, through the instrumentality of Ridolphi, and her relations with the Pope and the King of Spain.‡ These explanations were not deemed satisfactory; but if this interview was ever intended to pave the way for a public trial, this intention was, after the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, abandoned for a secret and still darker method of getting rid of the unfortunate queen.

This plan, or rather plot, was concocted by Elizabeth, Burghley, and Leicester; and was intended to be put into execution, not in England, but in Scotland, and in such a way as to transfer the odium of Mary's death from Elizabeth to the leaders of the king's faction. The conduct of this nefarious project was entrusted to Sir Henry Killegrew, Burghley's brother-in-law, who was dispatched to Scotland with two missions—one public and ostensible, the other secret and real.§ According to the former, he was required to confer with the regent and Morton, on the one hand, and with Grange, Lethington, and other leaders of the queen's party on the other, with a view to a pacification; to urge upon them a strict adherence to the truce; to communicate to them a detailed account of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew; to impress on them his belief that it was premeditated, and formed only a part of a widely extended conspiracy; to represent to them that the interests of both parties, and the peace and prosperity of both kingdoms were in jeopardy; and to entreat them to lay aside their animosities, and unite in defence of the common weal. According to the latter, he was with the utmost secrecy to concert with the regent and Morton a plan for putting Mary to death. This plan, which was known only to its originators—Elizabeth, Burghley, and Leicester—was communicated to Killegrew by Elizabeth herself, in the presence of these noblemen, but under repeated and solemn injunctions of inviolable secrecy. The instructions were drawn up by Burghley, and are still extant in his handwriting.* Killegrew was informed that he was required to explain to the regent and Morton that the time had now arrived when, for their own safety, as well as that of Elizabeth, it had become absolutely necessary to put Mary to death; and that, although it would be an easy matter to have her executed in England, yet, "for sundry weighty reasons," it was judged preferable to deliver her over to her enemies in Scotland, "to proceed with her by way of justice." That by this expression it was not intended to recommend a public trial, with a judicial sentence and execution, will, as we proceed, appear evident from the construction put on it by Mar and Morton, who of course would accept the interpretation of it given by Killegrew at their conferences with that gentleman. To secure the object of his mission, Killegrew was enjoined to use his utmost endeavours with the regent and Morton to induce them to make application for the delivery of Mary into their hands; but he was especially instructed to take care so to manage the matter that the demand should appear as their own spontaneous act. If made, he was authorised to agree to it, but on the solemn assurance that they should without fail put Mary to death. As a guarantee for the fulfilment of this stipulation, he was instructed to demand hostages, who must be either children or near relatives of the regent and Morton. Finally, he was once more solemnly warned not to allow Elizabeth's name to appear in the negotiation; he was reminded by the queen herself that only Burghley, Leicester, and himself, were privy to this important and delicate affair; and he was dismissed with the significant warning, that if it "came forth, or was ever known, he must answer for it." Killegrew answered "that he would keep the secret as he would his life."†

On his arrival in Scotland, Killegrew lost no time in proceeding to the dispatch of the business assigned to him. His first care was to avail himself of the agitated state of the public mind, consequent on the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, to excite suspicion and hatred against the Catholics, and detestation of an alliance with France, as a

* Murdin, p. 224.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Killegrew to Burghley and Leicester, 23rd November, 1572.

* Lingard, vol. viii. pp. 91, 92; D'Ewes' Journal, pp. 200, 207, 224; Digges, pp. 203, 219.

† Camden, p. 442; MS. State Paper Office, Papers of Mary Queen of Scots; the Lord De la Ware's and the rest of the Commissioners' proceedings with the Scottish Queen, 11th June, 1572; also MS. Draft by Cecil, State Paper Office, Minute to the Scottish Queen by the Lord De la Ware, &c.; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 310.

‡ Labanoff's Collection, pp. 47—54.

§ Tytler, vol. vii. p. 311.

means at once of strengthening the English party in Scotland, diminishing the influence of the queen's faction, and gradually preparing the country for the extreme measure which was the object of his secret mission. In this endeavour he was powerfully assisted by Knox, who, though so enfeebled by disease as to be scarcely able to move without help, still continued to ascend the pulpit, and, with unimpaired energy of mind and vehemence of expression, denounced the murderers of the Protestants of France. Having repaired to Stirling to meet the regent, Killegrew communicated to him the object of his public mission. The answer of Mar was favourable and explicit. He expressed himself decidedly hostile to a French alliance; and declared that so long as he entertained any expectation of aid from England, he would never consent to a league with any foreign power.

Agreeably to his instructions, Killegrew reported his movements in fulfilment of his public mission to the Secretary of State; but all that related to his secret errand was communicated to Burghley and Leicester alone; and it is almost exclusively from such parts of the correspondence which ensued as are still extant, that we are enabled to bring to light this hidden "mystery of iniquity." In a letter which he addressed to them, dated the 19th of September, he informs them that he "had already dealt with a fit instrument, and expected that the regent and the Earl of Morton would soon break their minds unto him secretly." * This "instrument" was Mr. Nicholas Elphinstone, who had formerly been a dependent of the Regent Moray, and is said to have been no stranger to such dark intrigues. From this it would appear that Killegrew had, in the first instance, kept in the background, and avoided all direct sounding of the regent and Morton as to his secret object, or "the great matter," as, for the sake of obscurity as well as brevity, it is frequently termed in this correspondence. This method of procedure, though cautious and politic, does not appear to have suited the impatience of Burghley and Leicester, who could not rest until the deed of blood had been accomplished. They accordingly wrote jointly to Killegrew, urging him to expedition. "After our hearty commendations," they say, "we two have received your several letters directed to us, whereof the last came this last night, being of the 24th of September; and as we like well the comfort you give us of the towardness in the special matter committed to you, so we do greatly long to receive from you a further motion with some earnestness, and that both moved to you and prosecuted by them of valour, as we may look for assurance to have it take effect; for when all other ways come in consideration, none appeareth more ready to be allowed here by the best than that which you have in hand. Wherefore we earnestly require you to employ all your labours to procure that it may be both earnestly and speedily followed there, and yet also secretly as the cause requireth: and when we think of the matter, as daily, yea hourly, we have cause to do, we see not but the same reasons that may move us to desire that it take effect, ought also to move them, and in some part the more, considering both their private sureties, their common estate, and the continuance of the religion; all which three points are in more danger from [for] them to uphold than for us. The causes thereof we doubt not; but you can enlarge to them, if you see that they do not sufficiently foresee them. We suspend all our actions only upon this, and therefore you can do no greater service than to use speed.

"Your loving friends,

"W. BURGHLEY."

"From Windsor, the 29th of September, 1572." *

Killegrew had more welcome news to communicate to his friends in his next despatch. "The great matter" had made such progress as actually to form a subject of conversation between him and Morton, when the latter signified his approval of the scheme, and promised cordially to co-operate in its accomplishment. Shortly afterwards, through the intervention of the Abbot of Dunfermline, a conference on the proposed secret execution of Mary was arranged to be held at Dalkeith on the 9th of October. As Morton was at that time confined by sickness, the meeting was held in his bed-chamber, the only parties present being the regent, Morton, and Killegrew. The result was communicated by Killegrew to Burghley and Leicester in the following letter:—

"My singular good lords,—What has passed here since my last, touching the common cause, I have written to Mr. Secretary at length.†

"Now for the great matter ye wot of. At my being at Dalkeith with my Lord Regent's grace, the Earl of Morton and he had conference, and both willing to do the thing you most desire; howbeit I could have no answer there, but that both thought it the only way and the best way to end all troubles, as it were, in both realms. They told me, notwithstanding, the matter was dangerous, and might come so to pass, as they should draw war upon their heads; and, in that case, or rather to stop that peril, they would desire her majesty should enter in league defensive, comprehending therein the cause of religion also.

"We came" (he continued) "to nearer terms, to wit, that her majesty should, for a certain time, pay the sum that her highness bestoweth for the keeping of her in England, to the preservation of this crown, and take the protection of the young king. All this I heard, and said if they thought it not profitable for them, and that if they meant Killegrew communicates to Morton his secret mission regarding Mary.

Morton and the regent approve of the scheme of secretly executing Mary.

* MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. iii. fol. 365, Killegrew to Burghley, 19th September, 1572.

* MS. British Museum, Caligula, c. iii., fol. 394. This letter, being a first draft by Cecil, is signed only by him. Tytler, vol. vii. p. 315.

† Referring to his prosecution of his public mission.

not to will me to write earnestly as their desire, I would not move my pen for the matter; whereat the Earl of Morton raised himself in his bed, and said that both my Lord Regent and he did desire it as a sovereign salve for all their sores: howbeit, it could not be done without some manner of ceremony and a kind of process, whereunto the noblemen must be called after a secret manner, and the clergy likewise, which would ask some time. Also that it would be requisite her majesty would send such a convoy with the party that in case there were people would not like of it, they might be able to keep the field; adding further, that if they can bring the nobility to consent, as they hope they shall, they will not keep the prisoner three hours alive after he* come into the bounds of Scotland. But I, leaving of these devices, desired to know indeed what they would have me write; and it was answered that I should know further of my Lord Regent's grace here. So, as this morning, a little before dinner, going to take my leave of him as he was going towards Stirling, he told me, touching that matter which was communed upon at Dalkeith, he found it very good, and the best remedy for all diseases, and willed me so to write unto your honours; nevertheless, that it was of great weight, and, therefore, he would advise him of the form and manner how it might be best brought to pass, and, that known, he would confer more at length with me in the same. Thus took I my leave of him, and find him indeed more cold than Morton, and yet seemed glad and desirous to have it to come to pass. * * * * Although there be that do assure me that the regent hath, after a sort, moved this matter to nine of the best of their party, to wit, that it were fit to make a humble request to the queen's majesty to have hither the cause of all their troubles, and to do, etc., who have consented to him, and that I am also borne in hand that both he and the Earl of Morton do, by all dexterity, proceed in the furtherance thereof, yet can I not assure myself of anything, because I see them so inconstant, so divided. * * * * I am also told that the hostages have been talked of, and that they shall be delivered to our men upon the field, and the matter dispatched within four hours, so as they shall not need to tarry long in our hands; but I like not their manner of dealing, and, therefore, leave it to your wisdom to consider if you will have me continue to give ear, and advertise [if] I shall: if not, I pray your lordships let me be called hence." †

On the 13th of October, Killebrew again wrote to Burghley and Leicester, informing them that he had again been at Dalkeith; and in an interview which he had with Morton and "two of the ministers, he found them" very hot and earnestly bent on the "matter." On that occasion Morton informed him that if the regent showed any coldness, or was reluctant to proceed in the "great matter," it should be done without him; for as Morton was lieutenant-general of the whole kingdom on this side the Tay, he had sufficient power to carry the plan into effect.* At the same time, he hinted that the coldness and reserve of Elizabeth had alienated many who would otherwise have co-operated with them, and that if she really desired the execution of Mary, she must be more cordial and generous in her support. To this Killebrew replied, that if Morton could then give him an assurance that the work would certainly be performed, he might rely upon being satisfied to his utmost desire, but without such an assurance it would be vain to expect that a defensive alliance with England should be formed, or, as he himself expressed it, "without it a man can promise nothing."

His next despatch, which was written from Stirling, must have tended to re-assure the minds of Burghley and Leicester as to the disposition of the regent towards the execution of "the great matter." Killebrew informs them that he "found him very earnest. He had sent," he said, "his resolute mind to the Lord Morton by the Abbot, and desired him (Killebrew) to write speedily to Burghley and Leicester, that they might further the same by all possible means, as the only salve for the cure of the great sores of the commonwealth." Killebrew added, "I perceive that the regent's first coldness grew rather for want of skill how to compass so great a matter, than for lack of goodwill to execute the same. He desired me also to write unto your honours to be suitors unto your majesty for some relief of money towards the payment of his soldiers." †

The regent and Morton at last formally signified their consent to put Mary to death, and sent to Killebrew, by the Abbot of Dunfermline, a statement of the conditions on which they were prepared to "dispatch the matter."

The regent and Morton formally consent to put Mary to death.

These were, that the Queen of England should take the young king under her protection; that his rights should not be invalidated by any sentence passed upon his mother, and that these should be maintained by a declaration of the English parliament; that a defensive league between the two kingdoms should be established; that the Earls of Huntingdon, Bedford, or Essex, should attend at Mary's execution with two or three thousand men, who should afterwards assist the troops of the young king in besieging the Castle of Edinburgh; that this fortress, when reduced, should be placed in the hands of the regent; and, finally, that England should pay all the arrears due to the Scottish troops. ‡

The conditions proposed by them.

Deeply dissatisfied with this result of his arduous and dark negotiations, Killebrew immediately

* MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. iii., fol. 376, same to same, October 13, 1572; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 213, 322.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Killebrew to Burghley and Leicester, 19th October, 1572, Stirling.

‡ Tytler, vol. vii. p. 323.

* Sic in the original.

† MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. iii., fol. 375, Killebrew to Burghley and Leicester, October 9, 1572.

transmitted the conditions, by the hands of a confidential messenger, to Burghley, to whom they appeared so exorbitant as to threaten the failure of the whole project. While Killegrew, however, was penning his despatch, an event had occurred that put a stop to the secret negotiation for the present, and ultimately led to its entire abandon-

Sudden death of the Regent Mar. ment. This was the sudden death of the Regent Mar, who, after an illness of a few days, expired at

Stirling on the 28th of October. Considerable doubt hangs over the cause of his death. Suspicions of his having been poisoned were, at the time, entertained by many;* but most historians agree in ascribing his sudden dissolution to a broken heart, occasioned by grief at the distracted state of the country, and his inability to cope with the difficulties of his position.†

This unexpected event, while it greatly disconcerted Killegrew, threw Burghley into a state of perturbation hardly to be expected from his cool temperament and collected mind. The intelligence reached him on the 3rd of November; and on the same day we find him writing, in terms betokening great anxiety, both to Leicester and to Walsingham, the English ambassador at the court of France. His letter to the former, which is wholly in his own hand, shows plainly that he now looked on the scheme of procuring the execution of the queen in Scotland as hopeless, and had already begun to fall back on that last resource, the odium of which Elizabeth was so anxious to avoid. "My lord," he says, "this bearer came to me an hour and a half [alf] after your departure. The letters which he brought me are here included. I now see the queen's majesty hath no surety but as she hath been counselled, for this way that was meant for dealing with Scotland is, you may see, neither now possible, nor was by their articles made reasonable. If her majesty will continue her delays for providing for her own surety by just means given to her by God, she and we will vainly call upon God when the calamity shall fall upon us. God send her majesty strength of spirit to preserve God's cause, her own life, and the lives of millions of good subjects, all which are most manifestly in danger, and that only by her delays: and so consequently she shall be the cause of the overthrow of a noble crown and realm, which shall be a prey to all that can invade it. God be merciful to us."‡ In his letter to Walsingham he says, "The twenty-eighth of the last, the good regent of Scotland is dead, as I think by a natural sickness, and yet the certainty is not known. This will make our success the worse in Scotland, for I fear the conveyance away of the king; and yet there is care taken for surety; but I can almost hope for no good, seeing our evils fall by heaps, and why the heaps fall not upon ourselves personally, I see no cause to the let thereof in ourselves. God be merciful to us. * * * *

The eminent historian † to whom we are so much indebted for bringing to light the details of this dark plot, has well remarked, "Thus was Burghley and Leicester's project for Mary's secret execution, by the hands of her own subjects, destroyed by the death of Mar at the moment he had consented to it; and the scheme which these cruel and unscrupulous politicians conceived themselves to have so deeply laid—on which they pondered, as Cecil owned, 'daily and almost hourly,' entirely discomfited, and cast to the winds.

"Mary, in the meantime, was herself unconscious of the danger she had escaped; and, indeed, it is worthy of observation, that so well had the English ambassador kept his counsel, and so true were the conspirators to their secret, that, after a concealment of nearly three centuries, these dark intrigues, with all their ramifications, have now for the first time been made a portion of our national history."

On the death of Mar, Elizabeth immediately wrote to the widowed countess, recommending to her care the young king, in whose welfare she expressed a deep interest. She also sent a very flattering epistle to Morton, whom she styled her dear cousin, and, in anticipation of the honour which awaited him, addressed him by the title of regent. In this letter she speaks of his public conduct in terms of high commendation; expresses a hope that he and the nobility would watch over the safety of the young prince, and concert measures for the peace of the kingdom; and, in allusion to the appointment of a successor to Mar, she hoped the election would not disturb the public tranquillity. ‡

Elizabeth writes to Morton, addressing him as regent.

The high office which Morton had so long coveted, and the functions of which he had, Morton elected regent 24th November. in a great measure, exercised during the comparatively feeble administration of Mar, was now within his grasp. His ability, wealth, and influence; his popularity with the majority of the nobility, and with the leading men of the Church; and the support of the English party, excluded all competition; and, accordingly, in a parliament held at Edinburgh on the 24th of November, he was, after a slight opposition on the part of the Castilians, as the queen's party were called, chosen regent of the kingdom. § Proclamation of his authority was made on the following day, with the usual formalities. ||

* MS. Letter, Vespasian, F. vi., fol. 181 d., Burghley to Walsingham, 3rd November, 1572; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 327.

† Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 311—325.

‡ Copy, State Paper Office, 4th November, 1572, Elizabeth to Morton.

§ Copy, State Paper Office, Killegrew to the Queen, 2nd December, 1572; see MS. State Paper Office, 19th November, 1572, Noblemen and others met at the convention in Edinburgh.

|| Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 243.

* Tytler, vol. vii. p. 327.

† Robertson, vol. ii. p. 37; Aikman's Buchanan, vol. ii. p. 630.

‡ MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula. c. vii., fol. 386, Burghley to Leicester, 3rd November, 1572.

CHAPTER XXXV.

REGENCY OF MORTON.

A.D. 1572—1574.

THE same day that witnessed the elevation of Death of John Morton to the regency terminated Knox. the career of the celebrated reformer, John Knox. Worn out by long-continued and excessive mental toil, acting on a bodily frame which had originally been robust, he expired at his own house in Edinburgh, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. It falls not within our province to trace the impressions which this extraordinary man left on his own and all succeeding ages. His name belongs rather to ecclesiastical than civil history. Nevertheless religion and politics were so intimately blended in the revolutions of that turbulent period, that unquestionably he exercised a most extraordinary degree of influence upon the leading men of the state, and, through them, on the government of the country. In his fierce and uncompromising hostility to popery, in every degree and form, and his ardent zeal for the establishment of the Reformed religion, he became a strenuous supporter of the king's faction, and contributed not a little to its ultimate success by the weight of his influence, the sagacity of his counsels, and the vehemence of his popular eloquence. In defence of what he conceived to be right, and unmitigated condemnation of what he believed to be wrong, few men have ever equalled Knox in moral courage. Unawed by the wealth, or rank, or power of the parties to whom he was opposed, he fearlessly spoke out what he believed to be truth; and even royalty itself quailed and trembled under the vehemence of his denunciations. "I am called," he said, "to speak the truth, and the truth I will speak, impugn it whoso list." His remains were

Funeral of attended to the grave by many of Knox. the nobility, including the regent himself, who, when the body had been deposited in the tomb, pronounced over it this brief but forcible and just eulogium: "There lieth one who never feared the face of man."*

The truce, which was to have expired on the Renewal of 6th of December, was renewed the abstinence. until the 1st of January.† In the meantime the regent, who had now no purpose to serve by prolonging the distractions of the country, began in earnest to renew the negotiations for peace, which had been commenced by his predecessor, and thwarted by his own treacherous policy. Elizabeth, also, who could no longer place any confidence in her alliance with France, and who still dreaded a renewal of French intrigue with Mary's adherents in Scotland, was desirous of a union among all parties, as a means of anticipating such a contingency. Since the death of the Regent Moray, the queen's faction, in addition to its original members, at the head of whom was the Duke of Chatelherault, had received considerable accessions to its numbers by desertions from the opposite party. Among the leaders of this section, Kirkaldy of Grange, Maitland of Lethington, and Lord Home, were conspicuous. But the two sections, though united in the promotion of a common object, had all along to a certain degree remained distinct. Of this circumstance Morton now endeavoured to avail himself, by proposing a separate accommodation with each, hoping in this way to detach them from each other, and by preventing their acting in concert to diminish the power of both. With this view he addressed himself first to Grange and Lethington, in the hope that, as they had formerly belonged to the king's party, and had actually assisted in placing him on the throne, they might more easily be induced to abandon the queen's cause. In this, however, he found himself mistaken. Behind the battlements of the strongest fortress in the kingdom, Grange felt secure in the meantime against any attack of the regent. He had moreover recently received a supply of money from France, with a promise that, if he could only hold out until Whitsuntide, he should obtain effectual assistance from the same quarter.* Thus fortified, the Castilians hoped ultimately to find themselves more than a match for their enemies, and did not despair of being able to release the queen, and to destroy the influence of the English party in Scotland. In order to gain time, however, they feigned to enter warmly into the negotiations, but insisted that the whole of the queen's party should be included in the pacification, and that Grange should be permitted to retain the command of the castle for six months after the conclusion of the treaty.† With these conditions the regent had too much penetration and sagacity to comply, and the negotiation was consequently broken off.

Foiled in this attempt, the regent next addressed himself to the other section of the queen's party. These he found more tractable. Wearied by a civil contest, in which neither side had gained much advantage, and which had desolated the country for a period of five years; and, discouraged by the decided declaration of the English queen, the duke and his adherents were now disposed to listen favourably to the proposals of the regent for an accommodation. Preparatory to this it was secretly resolved between them and the regent, that no proceedings should be instituted against any of the parties concerned in the murder of Darnley, or of Lennox, the late regent. Without this preliminary arrangement, all attempts to produce a reconciliation seemed hopeless, as several leading men of both parties were unquestionably implicated in these crimes. In the murder of Darnley, the regent himself, as well as Huntley, Argyle, and Sir James Balfour, who had recently joined the king's party, were all deeply involved; while in that of Lennox, the prime movers belonged to the family of the Hamiltons.* This arrangement having been made and confirmed to the satisfaction of both parties, a conference was appointed to be held at Perth, on the Conference for 3rd February, between the regent's a pacification. commissioners on the one hand, and the Earl of Huntley and Lord Arbroath, son of the Duke of Chatelherault, on the other, for the purpose of discussing the terms of an accommodation. The meeting was attended by Killegrew, Queen Elizabeth's ambassador, with whose advice and assistance a treaty was concluded, of which the following were the principle articles:—That all parties claiming any benefit from the pacification "shall acknowledge, affirm, and confess the confession of Christian faith and true religion of Jesus Christ, now publicly preached and professed within this realm, established and authorised by laws and acts of parliament;" that they shall acknowledge the authority and submit to the government of the king, and to that of the Earl of Morton, as regent; that they shall acknowledge to be illegal, and "of no force, weight, or effect," everything done in opposition to the king since his coronation; that all prisoners taken on both sides shall be liberated, and all the lands which had been declared forfeited, restored to their owners; that all acts passed against the queen's adherents shall be annulled, and a complete amnesty granted them for all the crimes of which they have been guilty since the 15th of June, 1567; and, finally, that, with the consent of both parties, the treaty shall be ratified by parliament.† On the 23rd of the same month these articles of pacification were subscribed by the regent; and thus was completed the first step towards the ruin of the queen's party. Killegrew, writing to Lord Burghley on this occasion, exultingly remarks—"And now there remaineth but the castle to make the king universally obeyed and this realm united, which peradventure may be done without force after the accord; notwithstanding, in my simple opinion, which I submit to your honour's wisdom, it standeth with more reason and policy for her majesty to hasten the aid rather now than before this conference. I mean so that it may be ready, if need require to execute, otherwise not."‡

* Spottiswood, p. 266; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 242.

† Ibid., p. 243.

* Digges, p. 314. † Melvil's Memoirs, pp. 118, 119.

In the meantime the abstinence, which, in so far as related to the party of the Hostilities renewed. Hamiltons and Gordons, had been prolonged to the 16th of February,§ had terminated as respected the party in the castle on the 1st of January. No sooner had this day arrived than, at six o'clock in the evening, the signal for the renewal of hostilities was given from the castle by the firing of cannon; and immediately after trenches were formed around the fortress, and sentinels posted to prevent all ingress and egress.* Firing soon commenced on the city, which, in consequence of the return of the inhabitants whom Grange had expelled, was now mostly devoted to the cause of the king. In the midst of these warlike demonstrations a parliament was nevertheless held within the capital, the house where it assembled being protected by a bulwark from the fire of the castle. In this parliament, the election of Morton to the regency was confirmed; all proceedings of former parliaments under the young king since his coronation were ratified; and all acts passed by the rival parliaments in the name of the queen were declared invalid and treasonable.

Killegrew had repeatedly urged on the English government the importance of giving assistance to the supporters of the king's cause in Scotland, but hitherto with but partial success. Assurances of aid, both in men and money, had indeed been given;† and a sum of money, amounting to about £2,500, was actually transmitted for this purpose, with directions that it should be delivered to Morton with great secrecy, and to be expended only "on extraordinary causes."‡ Beyond this, however, nothing was done; and when the moment for decisive action arrived the English queen became irresolute. She was afraid that her active interference might occasion a rupture with France; she grudged the expense, and shrank from the hazard of besieging the last stronghold of the queen's party; and peevishly maintained to her council that Morton ought to be able to reduce it without help from her. This untimely timidity greatly alarmed Killegrew, who immediately wrote to Burghley, representing to him that by abandoning the enterprise at this critical moment Scotland would be lost to England, and become leagued with France; and employing many strong arguments, with a view to overcome the scruples of his royal mistress. His arguments prevailed over the queen's fears. Two skilful engineers, named Johnson and Fleming, had been sent by Elizabeth to examine the state of the defences of Edinburgh Castle, with a view to a siege, and they had reported that, with a sufficient force and battering trains, the place might be taken in twenty days. Elizabeth now resolved that the attempt should be made; and Sir William Drury was chosen to conduct the enterprise. Accordingly, orders were transmitted to him to hold himself in readiness at a moment's notice to march with the army, and transport the requisite artillery to Edinburgh.

To all but Grange and Lethington the condition of the party in the castle seemed utterly hopeless. Almost every day brought intelligence of some fresh

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 26th January, 1572-3; Notes and Titles of Acts as were passed in the Parliament began at Edinburgh, 15th January, 1572; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 335.

† Crawford's Memoirs, p. 251; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 261—271.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 18th February, 1572, Killegrew to Burghley; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 333.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 259.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 252.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Sir William Drury to Burghley, 21st December, 1572, Edinburgh; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 330.

‡ Original, State Paper Office, B C, Sir Valentine Brown to Lord Burghley, 26th December, 1572; ibid.

disaster. Verac, who was on his way from France Critical position as the bearer of relief from the of Grange and French king, was driven by a storm Lethington. into Scarborough, and detained a prisoner. Sir James Kirkaldy, the brother of Grange, having landed at the Castle of Blackness with reinforcements in money, arms, and ammunition, which he had collected in France, was betrayed and seized, and the castle itself surrendered to the regent.* The queen's party, already brought to the brink of ruin by the defection of the Hamiltons and Gordons, was still further weakened by the desertion of the Lords Gray and Oliphant, the Sheriff of Ayr, and the Lairds of Buccleuch and Johnston; and Huntley had managed also to include in the treaty of Perth his brother, Sir Adam Gordon, who had been the main prop of the party in the north. But these accumulated reverses, so far from intimidating Grange and Lethington, seemed only to confirm their obstinate determination to hold out to the last. They still clung to the hope of relief from France, and placed implicit reliance on the strength of their walls, though defended by a garrison of not more than two hundred soldiers.†

The English army, consisting of five hundred hagbutters and a hundred and forty pikemen, under the command of Sir William Drury, now left Berwick, bringing with them a considerable train of artillery. They disembarked at Leith, on the 25th of April, and having been joined by seven hundred soldiers of the regent, they marched to summons a parliament.

The regent
Sentence of treason and forfeiture pronounced against the Castilians.

Edinburgh, and commenced preparations for the siege.‡ While these were going on, the regent summoned a parliament, which confirmed the league with England, ratified the treaty of Perth, in conformity with which Huntley and Balfour were restored to their honours and estates, and passed a sentence of treason and forfeiture against the Castilians.

Before commencing the siege a summons of surrender, in the name of the regent and the English general, was sent to Grange; but although Robert Melvil, Pitarrow, and others of the party, were disposed to capitulate, and though the supply of water and of provisions was nearly exhausted, yet such was the obstinacy of the governor, and the influence which Lethington had over him, that he refused to surrender, declaring he would hold the castle until he was buried beneath its ruins.

Trenches were now formed, and regular approaches of Edinburgh were carried on against the fortress; artillery was placed on the principal spots commanding the walls; and all was in readiness for the attack. All these preparations were made with little or no interruption from the besieged—a circumstance which seemed to imply a deficiency of ammunition within the place. On the 17th of May the artillery of the besiegers opened fire on the principal bastion, called "David's Tower," when a prolonged and piercing shriek, distinctly audible in the English camp, issued from the women within the fortification. Killebrew, who himself worked in the trenches, and who seems to have kept, for the information of Burghley, a journal of the proceedings, thus describes the commencement of the siege:—"This day, at one of the clock in the afternoon, some of our pieces began to speak such language as it made both them in the castle, I am sure, think more of God than they did before, and all our men and a great many others think the enterprise not so hard as they before took it to be. * * * I trust, to be short, that after the battery shall be outlaid, which, as they say, will be ready by the twenty-first of this month, the matter will be at a point before the end of the same. * * * Thanks be to God, although it be longsome, it hath hitherto been with the least blood that ever was heard in such a case; and this conjecture we have to lead us that they want store of powder within, for they have suffered us to plant all the ordnance, and to shoot yesterday all the afternoon without any harm from them. * * *"

* Historie of James the Sext, p. 127. It was betrayed to the enemy by the treachery of the wife of Sir James Kirkaldy; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 338.

† Crawford's Memoirs, p. 265.

‡ Tytler, vol. vii. p. 341.

After an unintermitted cannonade of six days the guns of the castle were silenced, and in the afternoon of the 23rd of May the southern wall of "David's Tower" gave way, and, falling with a great crash, choked up with its ruins the passage within the outer gate. On the following day the eastern bulwark opposite the gate, the portcullis, and an outer bastion, called "Wallace's Tower," on the northern side, were demolished; and on the 26th the "Spur," or blockhouse, forming the outer defences of the place, was, almost without resistance, stormed by the English.†

The condition of the garrison was now deplorable.

Their ammunition was exhausted; their wells were choked up with rubbish; the greater part of the soldiers were ill for want of a sufficient supply of food and water, so that not more than

Deplorable condition of the besieged.
They solicit and obtain an armistice of two days.

about forty men were fit for active service. The besiegers now prepared for a general assault, when Grange, at last convinced that further resistance was hopeless, made his appearance on the ramparts with a white rod in his hand, and obtained from Drury an armistice of two days, preparatory to a surrender. A conference was immediately held between Grange and Robert Melvil, on the part of the Castilians, Killebrew and Drury on that of the Queen of England, and Lord Boyd on the part of the regent, when Grange offered to surrender on

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Edinburgh, Kill-grew to Burghley, 17th May, 1573; also Drury to Burghley, 10th May, 1573. "After the first tyre of ordnance, great cries and shouts was made by the women of the castle, terming the day and hour black."

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Burghley, 28th May, 1573; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 343; Calderwood vol. iii. p. 283.

condition of surety being given for the lives and property of himself and all his comrades, for liberty to Lord Home and Lethington to retire into England, and permission for himself to remain unmolested in his native country.*

To these conditions Morton scornfully refused to consent. His most formidable adversaries were now almost within his grasp, and he was determined if possible to prevent their escape. With respect to the great body of the garrison he was willing, if they came out singly and without arms, to let them go where they pleased; but nine of their leaders must be excepted, and must submit to have their fate determined by the Queen of England, conformably to the treaty made between her majesty and the King of Scotland.† These were Kirkaldy of Grange, William Maitland of Lethington, Alexander Lord Home, Robert Melvil of Murdocairny, the Bishop of Dunkeld, and the Laids of Restalrig, Drylaw, and Pitarrow. Even at this trying moment the spirit of Grange remained undaunted. He and his companions in misfortune, convinced that they had no mercy to expect at the hands of the regent, rejected the terms proposed to them, and declared their determination rather to perish, sword in hand, behind their last ramparts. In the meantime, the regent found means to acquaint the soldiers of the garrison with his intention to grant them life and liberty;‡ and they, plainly perceiving that further resistance was vain, and would expose them to certain destruction, refused to support their leaders in their desperate resolution, and rising in mutiny, threatened to hang Lethington over the walls if he did not within six hours persuade the governor to surrender.§ In this dreadful dilemma, Grange adopted an expedient which seemed to offer him and his comrades at least a chance for the preservation of their lives. Though steadfast in his rejection of the proposal of the regent, he secretly admitted two companies of the English within the walls on the night of the 29th of May; and next

They surrender morning he and his companions to Drury. surrendered, with this express declaration, that they gave themselves up, not to the Regent of Scotland, but to the Queen of England, and to Sir William Drury, as her general. To his head-quarters they were accordingly conveyed, where, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the regent, they were courteously received.|| But Morton, who conceived that his government should be in perpetual disquiet and danger so long as Grange and Lethington, the two opponents whose abilities he had most reason to dread, survived, immediately wrote to Burghley, demanding that the prisoners, who had been the principal authors of the troubles in Scotland for so long a period, should be given up to him, that they might be dealt with as their crimes had deserved, and entreating that as they were now prisoners of the English queen she would without delay decide their fate.* Killegrew, who could not be actuated by the same motives as the regent, joined in his request, and advised their execution, while Drury waited impatiently to know how he was to dispose of his charge.

Meanwhile Grange and Lethington addressed the following letter to Burghley, whom, as he had once been on habits of intimate friendship with both of them, they expected to interfere in their behalf:—"My Lord,—The malice of our enemies is the more increased against us, that they have seen us rendered in the queen's majesty's will, and now to seek refuge at her highness's hands. And, therefore, we doubt not but they will go about by all means possible to procure our mischief; yea, that their cruel minds shall lead them to that impudency to crave our bloods at her majesty's hands. But whatsoever their malice be, we cannot fear that it shall take success; knowing with how gracious a princess we have to do, which hath given so many good proofs to the world of her clemency and mild nature, that we cannot mistrust that the first example of the contrary shall be shown upon us. We take this to be her very natural parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos.

"We have rendered ourselves to her majesty, which to our own countrymen we would never have done, for no extremity [that] might have come. We trust her majesty will not put us out of her hands to make any others, especially our mortal enemies, our masters. If it will please her majesty to extend her most gracious clemency towards us, she may be as assured to have us as perpetually at her devotion as any of this nation—yea, as any subject of her own; for now with honour we may oblige ourselves to her majesty further than before we might, and her majesty's benefit will bind us perpetually. In the case we are in, we must confess we are of small value; yet may her majesty put us in case, that perhaps hereafter we will be able to serve her majesty's turn; which occasion being offered, assuredly there shall be no inlack of goodwill. Your lordship knoweth already what our request is; we pray your lordship to further it. There was never time wherein your lordship's friendship might stand us in such stead. As we have oftentimes heretofore tasted thereof, so we humbly pray you let it not inlack us now, in time of this our great misery, when we have more need than ever we had. Whatsoever our deservings have been, forget not your own good natural. If by your lordship's mediation her majesty conserve us, your lordship shall have us perpetually

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Killegrew to Burghley, 27th May, 1573; also ibid., Sir William Drury to Burghley, 23th May, 1573; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 344.

† Copy of the time, State Paper Office, the Regent's answer to the Castilians, 28th May, 1573; also State Paper Office, "Conditions of rendering the Castle;" Tytler, vol. vii. p. 344.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 283.

§ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Killegrew to Burghley, 20th June, 1573.

|| MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Sir William Drury to Burghley, Leith, 5th June, 1573; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 345.

* MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. iv., fol. 85, verso, Morton to Burghley, 31st May, 1573.

bound to do your service. * * * Let not the misreports of our enemies prevail against us. When we are in her majesty's hands, she may make us what pleaseth her. * * * From Edinburgh, the 1st June, 1573." *

This affecting letter does not appear either to have been noticed by Burghley, or to have moved him to interpose with the queen on behalf of its unfortunate authors. Elizabeth, however, seemed to hesitate, from what motive we have no means of ascertaining; but, before coming to a decision, she desired to be informed "of the quality and quantity of the prisoners' offences." But Killegrew and Morton, fearing the consequences of delay, urged her so vehemently to authorise their execution,

They are that at last she delivered them up given to to Morton, to be dealt with as he the regent. pleased. Before, however, her decision reached Scotland, Lethington died in prison;

but whether by a natural or voluntary death is uncertain. Melvil says he "ended his days after the old Roman fashion;" † but this may have been merely a report invented and propagated by his enemies. Drury, who felt his own honour partly compromised by Elizabeth's decision, unwillingly obeyed her mandate, and delivered Grange, Home, John Maitland, Lethington's younger brother, and Robert Melvil, to the regent. ‡

The impending fate of Grange roused many of his friends to strenuous exertion in his behalf. One hundred gentlemen, embracing several of his kinsmen, offered to purchase his pardon by becoming servants to the house of Angus and Morton in a perpetual "bond of man-rent," and paying to the regent the sum of two thousand pounds and an annuity of three thousand marks. The regent, however, would listen to no terms: his thirst for vengeance on his most troublesome and formidable enemy, whose now fallen fortunes might have mollified a less hard and cruel nature, overcame in the heart of the regent even his ruling passion, avarice. According to his own account he was confirmed in his resolution, and urged on to the execution of his fatal purpose, through "the denunciations of the preachers," who cried out that "God's plague would not cease until the land was purged with blood." §

On the 3rd of August Grange, together with his brother, Sir James Kirkaldy, and two persons named Mossman and Cockie, who had been accused of coining false money in the castle, were taken from the abbey to the Cross of Edinburgh, and there ignominiously hanged. Grange and Mossman suffered first, and afterwards their heads were cut off and stuck on the highest points of the castle. Sir James and Cockie were executed together at a subsequent part of the same day. Grange met his fate with unshrinking fortitude; he was attended in his last moments by Mr. David Lindsay, minister of Leith, and expressed, when on the scaffold, deep penitence for his sins and unshaken attachment to the cause of the queen.*

Thus terminated the extraordinary career of Kirkaldy of Grange, who was named by the Constable Montgomery, the first soldier in Europe. His character is thus briefly summed up by Melvil: "He was humble, gentle, and meek, like a lamb in the house, but a lion in the field; a lusty, stark, and well-proportioned personage, and of a hardy and magnanimous courage." †

The intelligence of these sad events in Scotland deeply affected the unfortunate Hopeless captive queen. With the fall of Edinburgh Castle and the death of Grange her party in Scotland was entirely crushed, while the faint gleams of hope arising from the expectation of assistance from abroad seemed about to be extinguished. In England, since the death of Norfolk, though she had many secret friends, she had no longer a party at once able and willing to assist her. From France it seemed equally vain to expect succour. By the treaty of Blois, that country was now in league with her arch enemy Elizabeth, who moreover was then involved in a sham negotiation of marriage with the Duke D'Alençon, son of Catherine de Medicis. Nor were her expectations from Spain much brighter. The Duke of Alba was at heart no longer her friend, and the feeble and undecided efforts made in her favour by the king were sedulously thwarted through the influence of his ambassador. ‡ These accumulated misfortunes, together with the rigour of her confinement in a damp and wretched abode, at last broke down the courage and impaired the health of the unhappy queen, whom, as she had for the present ceased to exercise any influence on public affairs, history must, for a time, leave to pine in sickness and in solitude.

The storm of faction had now spent its fury, but the long-vexed waters still continued to heave and to strew the shore with the wrecks occasioned by the tempest. During the state of public confusion, from which the country was now beginning to emerge, the restraints of law had everywhere been weakened, and in many instances entirely disregarded. In every quarter of the kingdom the regular administration of justice, which had never been very firmly established, had lapsed nearly into abeyance, so that alarming disorders prevailed, and crimes of all sorts were committed with im-

* MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. iv., fol. 86, Lethington and Grange to Lord Burghley, 1st June, 1573.

† Melvil, p. 242.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Drury to Burghley, Leith, 18th June, 1573.

§ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Morton to Killegrew, 5th August, 1573; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 348; Diurnal of Occurrences, p. 336.

* MS. State Paper Office, Killegrew to Burghley, 3rd August, 1573; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 349; Melvil's Diary, pp. 26—28; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 231, 285.

† Melvil's Memoirs, p. 257.

‡ Gonzalez, pp. 370, 371.

punity.* The rapine and bloodshed by which the Border districts in particular had long been disturbed and desolated, had acted most injuriously on public morality, and transformed nearly the whole population into predatory hordes, among whom the rights of private property and the value of human life were utterly disregarded. To repress these disorders, which had called forth repeated remonstrances from the English government, the regent now energetically addressed himself. With this view he advanced to Jedburgh, at the head of four thousand men, and having held an interview with Sir John Forster, the English Warden of the Middle March, for the purpose of concerting measures to put a stop to these enormities,† he succeeded in overawing the chiefs of the Border freebooters, and compelling them to give pledges for their good behaviour.‡ He at the same time appointed as wardens Sir James Home of Cowdenknowes for the Eastern, Sir John Carmichael, one of his principal ministers, for the Middle, and Lord Maxwell for the Western Marches.§ With a like vigorous hand, he successfully set himself to enforce respect and obedience to the law, and to restore public tranquillity throughout the kingdom. But the advantages of a firm and regular government, such as Scotland had never previously enjoyed, and which might have secured to the regent the respect and gratitude of his countrymen, were counterbalanced by the exorbitant and illegal nature of his exactions, and the excessive rigour with which they were collected. Morton's besetting sin was avarice, and like most men who have given themselves up to this odious vice, he was not scrupulous as to the means he employed for its gratification.

His first attack was on the patrimony of the Church. One third of the benefices, amounting at most to a very small pittance, had been allotted by parliament for the maintenance of the Protestant clergy; but this sum, small as it was, had from various causes never been paid with regularity; and in not a few instances during the period of the civil commotions it had not been paid at all, so that many of the parochial clergy had been subjected to grievous distresses and privations, of which they had often and justly complained. Under pretence of remedying this grievance, the regent artfully persuaded the clergy to resign their third of the benefices into his hands, promising to make the stipend of each minister local and payable in the parish where his charge was situated; but adding, that if upon trial this system were not found to work well, he would on their application re-instate them in their former position.|| No sooner, however, did he obtain possession of the thirds than his duplicity became manifest. Two, three, and sometimes even four parishes were assigned to one minister, who was required to preach in them by turns, while in his absence readers were appointed, with a salary of from twenty to forty pounds Scots a-year. The ministers discovered when too late the snare into which they had fallen. The regent had allotted to the Church the smallest possible modicum of the thirds, and openly seizing on the remainder, appropriated it to his own purposes. They now applied to be re-instated conformably to arrangement and the promise of the regent; but, after some evasion and delay, they were authoritatively told that the surplus belonged of right to the crown, and that therefore it was the province of the regent and council, and not of the ministers, to regulate the stipends. At the same time, the payment to the superintendents was entirely stopped, and their office declared unnecessary, as bishops had been appointed to the dioceses, and to them belonged the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The ministers, thus deprived of their protectors, to whom in cases of defective sustentation they were accustomed to appeal, had no alternative but to become suitors at court, where their complaints were treated with neglect and contempt. These proceedings not only rendered the regent extremely unpopular with the clergy, but disgusted a great part of the nation.

The laity had speedily to suffer much more grievously than the clergy from Morton's unscrupulous rapacity. The nobility were irritated and oppressed by his rigorous collection of the royal revenues, and still more by his recalling the grants by which the crown-lands had been alienated; while the middle and lower classes were surrounded by spies and informers, who accused them of imaginary crimes, and exaggerated petty offences, that the accused might be compelled to purchase immunity from punishment by the surrender of their property. Many persons who had remained in the capital during the late civil discords were, on no other grounds, arraigned as rebels who had resisted the authority of the king, and were compelled either to submit to a public trial or to avert it by paying heavy fines. The money thus collected, it was understood, was to have been partly applied towards the indemnification of the citizens whose property had been destroyed, and the remainder towards the exigencies of the state. No such application however was ever made; all was absorbed by the rapacious regent. A system of organized robbery, in the name and under the colour of law, was now instituted such as has no parallel in modern history. The very courts where justice ought to have been administered with impartiality to all, were in a great measure converted into engines of state for the purpose of extortion. Parties known or suspected to be possessed of wealth were dragged before them, or threatened with their vengeance, on false charges fabricated by agents of government, or on pretences too

* Robertson, vol. ii. p. 51.

† Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 8.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, the Regent to Lord Burghley, Kelso, 30th August, 1573; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 1.

§ Diurnal of Occurrents in Scotland, p. 337; Spottiswood, p. 272.

|| Spottiswood, p. 273.

frivolous to bear investigation; and subjected to exorbitant fines, or strip of their heritable property, as a punishment for imaginary crimes. Society being thus infested and pervaded by a numerous body of men paid by the state for the purpose of discovering, or fabricating, offences against the law, it is easy to see that innocence was no protection, and that scarcely any individual was safe from prosecution. Merchants were amerced on the charge of sending coin out of the country, and Protestants for eating flesh in Lent; and even common mechanics for having accidentally, or by necessity, been resident in a town when occupied by the queen's forces. In addition to all these means of spoilation, two expedients were adopted rarely resorted to by the worst governments in the worst times; the first was debasing the current coin of the realm. By Morton's order a fourth part of alloy was mixed with every pound of silver; consequently the real value of the coin was diminished in proportion, and in this way a wholesale fraud was practised on the public.* The second was the gross injustice to the fair trader of selling licenses for carrying on prohibited branches of commerce.

Even all these sources of gain did not satisfy the inordinate avarice of Morton. Though possessed of ample wealth as a private nobleman, and enriched by the nefarious practices we have described, he had the meanness to perpetually petition the English queen for pecuniary aid. He represented to her that as it was by her assistance and advice he had entered upon the regency, so he confidently expected her aid, and especially in money and pensions bestowed upon his friends; and complained, with the abject humility of a mendicant impostor, of his limited resources as compared with the pecuniary necessities of his position.†

We pause here to notice a fact highly interesting

Beneficial changes in the social condition of the country. Growing importance of the middle classes.

to the politician and the philosophical student of history. During this turbulent period, when the country was torn asunder by contending factions, whose fierce and protracted animosities seemed to threaten the very existence of civil society, a great and highly beneficial change was found to have taken place in the social sentiments and condition of the people. The power and influence of the feudal barons had begun to decline; the progressive extension of commerce had given birth to a middle class, who were rising daily in importance; and even the lower orders, instructed in the parish schools and from the pulpits of the Protestant clergy, had begun to feel their own strength, and to perceive that with political duties they had also political rights. This remarkable change, the influence of which is visible in every subsequent period of Scottish history, took place in a remarkably short space of time. Killebrew, who was familiar with Scottish society in 1567, thus writes to Burghley on his next visit to Scotland in 1572:—"Methinks I see the noblemen's great credit decay in this country, and the barons, burrows, and such like, take more upon them; the ministers and religion increase, and the desire in them to prevent the practices of the Papists; the number of able men for service very great, and well furnished both on horse and foot; their navy so augmented as it is a thing almost incredible."*

Though the project of sending Mary to Scotland to be put to death, or "the great matter," as it was obscurely termed, had been for some time in abeyance, it had not altogether ceased to occupy the attention of the English queen. In May, 1574, she dispatched Killebrew into Scotland, mainly for the purpose of re-opening the negotiations on this subject. His written orders on this occasion seem to be no longer extant, but the fact is abundantly proved by other documents. Killebrew, on reaching the Scottish capital, immediately saw reason to apprehend that the time for accomplishing this object was past, and wrote to Walsingham to that effect.†

In accordance, however, with the usual double policy of Elizabeth, the ambassador had a twofold mission,—one ostensible, the other real, or rather one avowed, the other secret. The avowed object of Killebrew's embassy was to ascertain "whether he (the regent) was constant in his affection towards England; how his government was liked by the people; whether the Scottish queen had yet any party there; and, above all, to discover whether France was intriguing, as had been reported, to get possession of the young king." With regard to a proposal made by the regent for a defensive and religious league, the ambassador had orders to answer that her majesty considered that unnecessary at present, but that he might confidently look to her for support on the occurrence of any emergency. Respecting the regent's request for money, Killebrew was delicately to wave all discussion.

A residence of two months in Scotland afforded the ambassador sufficient opportunity of fulfilling his open mission. He found that the sentiments of the regent and the nobility towards England had undergone considerable alteration. The former was dissatisfied at the rejection of the proposed league, and still more at the silence of Elizabeth in respect to affording him pecuniary assistance and granting pensions. The latter, no longer humble suitors for the favour of the English queen, had grown "lusty and independent;" spoke magniloquently of their alliance having been courted by "great monarchies;" and complained of the depredations committed by English pirates on Scotch merchant ships. The government of the regent,

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Killebrew to Burghley, 11th November, 1572.

† MS. State Paper Office, "Instructions given to Henry Killebrew, Esq.," &c., 22nd May, 1574, signed by Walsingham; also, MS. State Paper Office, Killebrew to Walsingham, 8th June, 1574, Berwick.

* Ruddiman's Preface to Anderson's Diplomata, p. 74.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, the Regent Morton to Burghley, 21st January, 1573-4, Haddington.

though in many respects far from popular, he found to be vigorous, conducive to public order, and implicitly obeyed, but more through fear than affection. The state of the country was prosperous to a degree that excited his astonishment, and for which he found it difficult to account. He had left it, he said, "in a consumption," and still expected to find it in a feeble and languishing condition; but notwithstanding the destruction of public confidence, the interruption of business, and all the multiform distractions and miseries of a sanguinary and long-continued civil war, manufactures and commerce were already once more in a flourishing state; past sufferings seemed to be forgotten, and men of all parties to be reconciled. He found French intrigue to be still at work, but the queen had no longer any avowed and organised party, and all the secret machinations of foreign emissaries were incapable of disturbing the government of the regent or the peace of the country.

With respect to "the great matter," which formed the secret object of his mission, the ambassador was not equally successful. The regent indeed seemed quite willing to lend himself to that atrocious project, but he was not the man to barter his co-operation for vague promises and flattering compliments; and Killegrew soon discovered that the price he expected in the shape of an immediate advance of money to himself, and the settlement of pensions on his accomplices, was far beyond what Elizabeth, from her characteristic parsimony, would be likely to grant. So deeply was Killegrew convinced of this, that he at last petitioned to be recalled. In his letter to Walsingham, he says, "I see no cause why I should remain here any longer. * * * especially if you resolve not upon the league nor upon pensions, which is the secret ground I do see to build 'the great matter' upon, without which small assurance can be made. I pray God we prove not herein like those who refused the three volumes of Sybilla's prophecies, with the price which afterwards they were glad to give for one that was lost; for sure I left the market here better cheap than now I find it." *

As the regent, however, was then about to undertake a progress to the north,† Killegrew was directed to accompany him thither, with a view to ascertain more definitely his sentiments regarding "the great matter," which Elizabeth appears to have had now more anxiously than ever at heart. In a letter dated 18th July, Walsingham thus addresses the ambassador:—"I think it not convenient that you be recalled until such time as you have advertised how you find the regent affected touching 'the great matter' you had in commission to deal in; and therefore I think fit you accompany the regent till you be revoked." ‡

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Killegrew to Walsingham, 12th July, 1574, Edinburgh; MS. Letter, State Paper Office, same to same, 23rd June, 1574; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 11.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Killegrew to Walsingham, 23rd June, 1574.

‡ MS. Letter, draft, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Killegrew, 18th July, 1574.

Agreeably to his instructions, Killegrew accompanied the regent, and, as appears from some imperfect memoranda still preserved,* on their arrival at Aberdeen they held a conference on the important subject in question. The details, however, are wanting; but it is evident that they arrived at no definite result,—the great obstacle apparently being the exorbitant terms demanded by the regent for himself and his coadjutors.

Elizabeth was greatly disconcerted at the failure of this negotiation. Impelled on the one hand by her fears, which excited an ardent desire to get rid of her troublesome prisoner, and restrained on the other by her innate parsimony, the result—as not unfrequently happens when two powerful passions come into collision—was complete indecision; and after sundry anxious consultations with her ministers, further consideration of "the great matter" was in the meantime abandoned.

In the month of August, Killegrew returned to London, charged by Morton to ^{Return of the} communicate with Elizabeth on ^{English am-} the danger to which the Protestant ^{bassador.} Church was exposed from the intrigues of foreign powers, and urging immediate attention to this important subject. Many months elapsed, however, before the regent received any answer to this communication; but, in the meantime, mortified by the neglect, and impelled at once by resentment and by necessity, he began to cultivate the friendship of the French party in Scotland.

Walsingham, by whom this change was speedily perceived, and by whom indeed it had been for some time anticipated, had already written to Elizabeth, warning her of her danger, in a tone of importunate remonstrance, but without effect. Her hollow friendship with Catherine de Medicis, and her equally hypocritical dalliance with the Duke D'Alençon, gave rise to hesitation and delay, in a matter which she was very sensible could not with safety be much longer neglected. He now wrote in great alarm to Burghley, informing him of this new turn in Scottish affairs; and the very next day he wrote to Elizabeth, conjuring her, "for the love of God," to adopt instant measures to avert the threatened danger, by establishing amicable relations with Scotland. "Already," he said, "the regent was conferring favours on the Hamiltons, who were entirely French; already he was plotting to get the young King of Scots out of the hands of his governor, Alexander Erskine; Henry III., the new King of France, was well known to be devoted to the house of Guise; and, with such feelings, what was to be expected but that the moment he had quieted the disturbances in his own realm, he would keenly embrace the cause of the Scottish queen?" †

The caution of Elizabeth now took the alarm,

* MS. Memorandum, State Paper Office, 16th August, 1574.

† MS. Letter, original draft, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Burghley, 11th April, 1575; also, State Paper Office, original draft, Walsingham to Elizabeth, 12th April, 1575; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 15.

and she dispatched Killegrew once more as her ambassador to Scotland, accompanied by Mr. Davidson, whose name became afterwards so well known in history as that of Elizabeth's secretary. This gentleman the ambassador had instructions to leave as English resident at the Scottish court.* Before their arrival in Scotland, however, a circumstance occurred which threatened for a moment to interrupt the pacific relations of the two kingdoms. At one of the customary Warden Courts, held for the settlement of differences such as might naturally be expected to arise where two kingdoms are conterminous, without any very precise line of demarcation between them, Sir John Carmichael, Keeper of Liddesdale, demanded from Sir John Forster, the English Warden of the Middle Marches, that an Englishman, who had been convicted of theft, and who was well known as a troublesome offender, should be delivered up for punishment, conformably to the recognised law of the Marches. With this demand Forster hesitated to comply; and on Carmichael insisting, a passionate altercation, accompanied with high words and menacing demeanour, arose, when Forster's attendants, misconstruing these as a signal for attack, let fly a shower of arrows, by which one Scotchman was killed and several wounded. The Scotch retaliated; but, being inferior in numbers and taken by surprise, were repulsed, and put to flight. Meeting, however, a party of men from Jedburgh, who were on their way to attend the warden court, they rallied, and, joining with them, returned to the scene of action, where they attacked, and after a short conflict entirely routed the followers of the English warden. In this encounter Sir John Heron, Keeper of Tynedale, and twenty-four common soldiers, were left dead on the field; while Sir John Forster, Sir Francis Russell, son of the Earl of Bedford, Sir Cuthbert Collingwood, Mr. Ogle, Mr. Fenwick, and about three hundred others, were taken prisoners, and carried by the Earl of Angus to the regent, then at Dalkeith.

The regent, who deeply regretted the unfortunate occurrence, received them with great courtesy and kindness; and having detained them and treated them with much hospitality for a few days, he dismissed the prisoners of inferior rank, on receiving an assurance from them that they would return to Scotland if required. He, however, detained the warden; but at the same time wrote to Elizabeth, expressing his readiness to afford redress. She immediately sent instructions to Killegrew, her ambassador, to demand satisfaction from the regent, and to inform him that she had appointed Lord Huntingdon, the president of the council at York, and lieutenant of the northern counties, to proceed to the Borders, where she expected the regent to meet him in person, in order to have the matter investigated. This the regent, on the ground that it was derogatory to the dignity of his office, peremptorily refused to do; but offered to send as his representative the justice-clerk, to arrange a meeting to be held in Scotland.*

From the temper in which Elizabeth received information of Morton's refusal, it was evident that she had been accustomed to consider him more in the light of her lieutenant for the government of a province than as the regent of an independent kingdom; and unquestionably the mean subserviency to England evinced by all the previous regents of Scotland, and which Morton himself had at first displayed, must have contributed to foster that intolerable arrogance with which she presumed to intermeddle with Scottish affairs. She broke into a violent paroxysm of rage, and gave vent to her fury in a message to the regent, which she herself dictated, and which she commanded Killegrew to deliver without reservation or delay. As this document is not only characteristic of Elizabeth, but serves to show the contemptuous feeling with which she regarded the supreme ruler of Scotland, we give the substance of it, as drawn by a contemporary historian, from the original manuscript, to which he had the privilege of access. "She had seen," she said, "certain demands made on his part by the justice-clerk, and did not a little wonder at so strange and insolent a manner of dealing. He had already been guilty of a foul act in detaining her warden, the governor of one of the principal forts in her realm; he had committed a flagrant breach of treaty; and had she been inclined to prosecute her just revenge, he should soon have learned what it was for one of his base calling to offend one of her quality. And whereas he goeth about to excuse the detaining of our warden, alleging that he feared he might revenge himself when his blood was roused for his kinsman's death, such an excuse seemed to her, she must tell him, a scornful aggravation of his fault; for she would have him to know that neither Forster nor any other public officer or private subject of hers dared to offer such an outrage to her government as for private revenge to break a public treaty. As to the conference with Huntingdon, instead of receiving her offer with gratitude, he had treated it with contempt; he had taken upon him to propose a place of meeting four miles within Scotland,—an ambitious part in him, and savouring so much of an insolent desire of sovereignty, that she would have scorned such a request had it come from the king his master, or the greatest prince in Europe. To conclude, if he chose to confer with the Earl of Huntingdon at the Bond Rode,† she was content; and he would do well to remember that his predecessor, the Regent Moray, had not scrupled to come to York, and afterwards to London, to hold a consultation with her commissioners."‡

This undignified and intemperate message, which

* MS. Relation of the affairs of Scotland from 1566 to 1579; Warrender's MS. Collections, vol. B, fol. 208.

† The Boundary Road, a place on the Marches near Berwick, common to both kingdoms.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, to Killegrew, in Scotland, from the Queen; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 17.

* MS. State Paper Office, Original Instructions to Henry Killegrew, 27th May, 1573.

did little honour to their mistress, Huntingdon and Killebrew had the good policy to mollify before presenting it to the regent.* It had, notwithstanding, the desired effect. The regent took the alarm, and submissively met Huntingdon at the place appointed. After a conference of some days, the matter in dispute was amicably arranged. The regent dismissed his prisoners, after bestowing on them some valuable presents, and sent Carmichael as a prisoner to England to solicit pardon from the queen. Here he was detained for a few weeks, when the queen, whose pride was gratified and her anger allayed by Morton's submission, dismissed her prisoner with a present.

On again taking up his residence in Scotland, Killebrew still found the country in the same prosperous state in which he had left it. All lamented the late untoward occurrence by which peace had been endangered, and earnestly desired a continuance of friendly relations with England. The regent appeared to continue steadfast in his attachment to that country, and firm in his rejection of a French alliance. On the other hand, the rigour of his government, his oppressive and arbitrary exactions, and his imprisonment of some of the most wealthy merchants of Edinburgh, had rendered his administration extremely unpopular among the middle and lower classes of society; while his encroachments on the patrimony of the Church, and his introduction of episcopacy, were odious to the zealous Presbyterians and the great body of the clergy. Many of the latter, in their eloquent and pointed invectives from the pulpit, contributed to inflame the general discontent, which, so far from being allayed, was still further augmented by the declaration of the regent, that there would be no peace or order in the country until some of them had been hanged.†

As yet the weight of the regent's despotic rule had fallen chiefly on the middle and lower ranks, by whom it had been borne, if not without murmuring, at least without open resistance. Emboldened by this success, urged on by his rapacious avarice, and blind to his own real situation, he now eagerly embraced an opportunity which arose of making his power felt by the nobility. Owing to a circumstance not uncommon at that period, a feud

Feud between Argyle and Atholl.

Interference of
the regent.

had arisen between Argyle and Atholl, two of the most powerful nobles of the time, possessed of extensive territories, and commanding nearly the whole northern districts of the country. A vassal of Argyle's having committed some depredations on the lands of Atholl, the latter demanded that he should be delivered up for punishment. Argyle resisted, whereupon Atholl took up arms to enforce his demand; and both earls, at the head of their feudal retainers, prepared to proceed to extremities, when the regent interposed his authority, and compelled them to disband their followers.

These proceedings on the part of the two earls, though undoubtedly illegal, were by no means uncommon in those times, when each nobleman acted like a monarch within his own domain, and exercised an independence which no king of Scotland had hitherto felt himself strong enough to bring within the restraint of law. In such cases, accordingly, it had been customary to allow the matter to rest when peace had been restored. The regent, however, resolved to found on this outbreak a charge of treason against the two noblemen, in order that he might obtain a pretext to seize upon their estates. This, for Morton, would have been in itself a sufficient motive; but he was besides actuated by personal enmity. Atholl, being a Roman Catholic, was disliked and suspected by the regent, and probably still more because he was understood to be at the head of a party who were desirous that the young king should immediately assume the reins of government in his own person. Argyle, on the other hand, had been involved in a quarrel with Morton, arising out of the disputed possession of certain jewels which had formerly belonged to the queen. These jewels, which were of great value, Mary had at one period delivered to her brother the Earl of Moray to keep; but he had never restored them, as he alleged he had advanced money upon them to the state. Argyle had married the widow of Moray, and thus the jewels had passed into his family. Morton insisted on their being restored, agreeably to an order made by parliament. This demand was resisted by Argyle and his lady; and it was not until Morton had threatened to place them both under arrest that the jewels were finally delivered up to him. Argyle was thus completely estranged from Morton; and, although he had formerly co-operated with him on many occasions, was now ready to contribute to his overthrow.*

It has been said that "an enemy unites all to whom he threatens danger." This proverb was verified in the present instance. Argyle and Atholl, having received information of the regent's design, forgetting their private quarrel, united for their mutual defence; and, when summoned to appear before a court of justice, they peremptorily refused to obey. Soon after, Argyle having received some affront from the clan Donald, again had recourse to arms; and, when commanded by the regent to disband his forces, he not only refused obedience, but, in open defiance and contempt of the regent's authority, tore his letters to pieces, maltreated the messenger, and compelled him and the witnesses who accompanied him to swear that they would never again enter the territory of Argyle on a similar errand. It would have been difficult as well as dangerous for the regent, at any season, to proceed against these not less powerful than insolent contemners of his authority; but, as these occurrences took place in the commencement of winter,

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Killebrew to Leicester, 14th August, 1575.

† Calderwood, MS. Hist. British Museum, Ayscough's Catalogue, No. 4735, p. 1053 of the MS.; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 22.

* Tytler, vol. viii. p. 23.

when it would have been hopeless to attempt, in the face of a fierce and hardy population, to penetrate their wild mountainous country, Morton, though highly exasperated, could do nothing farther than proclaim them rebels.*

A storm had long been gathering over the head of the regent, of which it is impossible to suppose that a man of his penetration, vigilance, and sagacity—with all the information furnished by secret emissaries, whom he kept in pay both in England and Scotland—could be insensible. The unprecedented severity of his government, his attack on the patrimony of the Church, his attempts to introduce episcopacy, his iniquitous contrivances for extorting money under the name of fines, and the oppressive weight of taxation which he imposed, had alienated from him the affection, or roused against him the indignation and enmity of the great body of the people; while the nobles, whom he took little pains to conciliate, or to attach to his person and government, were mortified by neglect, and disgusted with a distant and haughty demeanour, to which they had been unaccustomed under their sovereigns, and which they would scarcely have brooked even from royalty itself. A power-

Coalition of the nobility against Morton. ful coalition of the nobility had in consequence been formed; their object, which they were not very careful to conceal, being to effect his removal from power by inducing the youthful monarch to take the reins of government into his own hands. Of all this Morton could not be ignorant; but he had little apprehension that the thunder-cloud was so ready to burst. His intentions towards Argyle and Atholl, though baffled by the union of these two powerful noblemen, precipitated the event. The nobility, who had witnessed in silence the plunder and oppression of the plebeians, now became alarmed for the safety of their own order. They perceived that hereditary rank, title, wealth, and influence, which had often been able successfully to cope even with royal authority, were no longer to afford any protection against indignity and confiscation, and saw with scornful indignation a despotic ruler raised from their own body attempt, in the exercise of a merely temporary and delegated authority, to place his heel on the necks of the ancient nobility of the country.

Though these sentiments had long been secretly entertained, it was difficult to see how any change could be effected for some years to come, as the king was then only in his twelfth year, and of course as yet unqualified to govern. Morton had calculated on this, and consequently was in no haste to secure himself in his position. He had, however, formed his plan, and was only awaiting a convenient time to carry it into execution. This was to obtain possession of the king's person, and to entrust the command of Stirling Castle to one of his own creatures. Having thus got the prince in his own power, he hoped by flattering him with the no-

minimal authority of king, to be able to dictate all his measures, and, in this way, to govern the kingdom in his name, as effectually as he had done while sole regent, and, at the same time, with diminished responsibility. He proceeded, however, with his characteristic caution; for though aware of the confederacy which had been formed against him, he did not perceive the imminency of his danger. Walsingham, however, had the sagacity to discern the tokens of an impending revolution; and Elizabeth, anxious to avert a rupture between Morton and the nobility, which might endanger both kingdoms by exposing them to foreign intrigue, in December, 1577, sent Sir Robert Bowes to Scotland with instructions to endeavour to effect a reconciliation, and to threaten Morton with her displeasure, and even active opposition, if he should prove obstinate. He was also the bearer of a very flattering letter from Elizabeth to the Earl of Atholl, expressing her favourable sentiments towards him and recommending peace.* That his mission was attended with no very marked success, may be gathered from a letter which he addressed to Leicester from Berwick, in October of the same year. "Albeit," he says, "those matters (in Scotland) are for a season wrapped up, yet it is not unlike, without wise handling, and some charge to her majesty, that the fire will be readily kindled again. * * * * The readiest way, in my opinion, to preserve the realm in quietness, with continuance of this amity, is to appease and * * * † all the griefs between the regent and others of the realm, and by friendly reconciliation and union to make him gracious amongst them. For which he must receive some apt lessons, with gentleness, from her majesty: but, with the same, he must also receive some comfort agreeable to his nature." ‡ This last recommendation, though no doubt delivered with sincerity, sounds very like a satire on the avaricious propensities of Morton, and would hardly have been intelligible to Leicester and his mistress, if this trait in the regent's character had not been a frequent subject of remark and merriment at the English court.

The envoy had proceeded thus far on his return, but Elizabeth having, in the meantime, become alarmed by some fresh intelligence of the progress of French intrigue in Scotland, he was ordered to retrace his steps to the Scottish capital, and there watch the progress of events. Shortly after Randolph was sent to Scotland on a mission to the young king and the regent on the same important subject, but with more definite instructions. All attempts, however, to reconcile the opposing parties had now become hopeless. The final catastrophe

* MS. Instructions to Thomas Randolph, 30th January, 1577-8, State Paper Office; Original draft of MS. Letter, State Paper Office, the Queen's Majesty to the Earl of Atholl, December, 1577; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 25.

† Word illegible in the original.

‡ MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. v., fol. 86, Sir R. Bowes to Leicester, 9th October, 1577, Berwick; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 26.

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 20.

came suddenly, and the downfall of the regent's government was complete.

To Alexander Erskine, who, on the death of his brother, the Earl of Mar, had been appointed to the guardianship of the young king and the command of Stirling Castle, belongs the distinction of having been the first to discover the secret machinations of Morton for getting possession of the king's person. Erskine immediately wrote secretly to Argyle and Atholl, inviting them to come to Stirling Castle, and promising them an interview with the young king, who, he said, was already acquainted with their grievances, and disposed to redress them. Argyle was not long in availing himself of this invitation. He reached Stirling, accompanied by his customary retinue of followers, on the 4th of March, and was at once admitted into the presence of the youthful sovereign. He represented to him, in glowing colours, the miserable condition to which the country was reduced by the extortion and misgovernment of the regent; he complained of his insolent and haughty bearing to the nobility, and of the severity with which he himself had been treated in having been denounced as a rebel, though his loyalty had ever been unimpeachable; and implored him to call a council of the nobility to examine into the public grievances, and particularly into the charges made against himself, and in the meantime intreated permission to remain with his majesty until the day of trial. And further, in the event of the complaints against the regent being found true, he conjured the king to take the government into his own hands, and thus put an end to a system of misrule, by which his subjects were plundered and oppressed. Erskine warmly joined in recommending the same course, as did also the other members of the coalition,—Glamis, the chancellor, the Abbot of Dunfermline, the secretary, Tulibardine, the comptroller, the Lords Lindsay, Ruthven, Ogilvy and others. The same measure was also strongly advocated by the celebrated George Buchanan, one of the tutors of the youthful monarch. As had been previously concerted, Atholl was absent, but arrived just at the time his presence was required. The king informed him of Argyle's complaint and request, and demanded his advice. Feigning to be previously unacquainted with what had been going forward, he calmly replied that he thought Argyle's request quite reasonable, and that he considered it highly expedient, under present circumstances, to summon a convention of the nobility to inquire into the state of the nation, all ranks of which had so long suffered from the regent's tyranny. He had scarcely finished when messengers arrived with letters from Morton, representing in strong terms the rebellious conduct of Argyle and Atholl, urging the necessity of inflicting exemplary punishment on such offenders, and desiring to have his majesty's commands as to what measures he should adopt. He concluded by declaring his readiness to proceed against them in due course of law, if such were his majesty's pleasure;

but, on the other hand, if his majesty was disposed to overlook such an open outrage against the royal authority, he requested to be relieved from the cares of office, and ^{Resignation of the regent.} permitted to retire into private life, in which case the only favour he should solicit from his majesty, in return for his long and important services, should be a full and formal approbation of his conduct as regent, subscribed by his majesty and ratified by parliament. The young king, and all the lords present, at once agreed that the regent's offer of resignation should be accepted; and letters were ordered to be dispatched to all the nobility, requiring their immediate attendance. To Argyle and Atholl was committed the task of sending these summonses, and they took care to address them to none but their own friends, and such as they knew to be adverse to Morton. These were found to include nearly the whole of the nobility, and not a few whom Morton had supposed to be entirely in his interest. The convention having met, Morton's letter was laid before them, when they unanimously resolved that his resignation should be accepted, and that the James assumes king should take the government the government. into his own hands. Morton was not long in receiving information of these proceedings, the result as well as the promptitude of which took him completely by surprise. With a view to gain time, in the forlorn hope of finding an opportunity of retracting his rash offer, he immediately dispatched one of his friends with a message to the king, requesting him to endeavour to bring about a reconciliation between such of the nobility as were then at variance, before making any changes among the officers of the state. This application, however, came too late, and received no attention; for in the meantime Glamis, the chancellor, and Lord Herries, had been sent to him with a written notification of the king's resolution, by the advice of a convention of the nobility, to take the government upon himself, and requiring him to give in writing a formal resignation of his office as regent, and, at the same time, to draw out the form of discharge which he was desirous of receiving, in order that his majesty should submit it to the consideration of his council. This message was accompanied with a very kind letter from the king, written with his own hand, in which he assured Morton that it was only "because he saw no other way to maintain concord among his subjects he had accepted the government, and that he was confident to have the defects of his age and experience supplied by his nobility, especially by himself, whom he would ever love and acknowledge as his trusty cousin, most tender to him in blood, and one of his true and faithful counsellors."*

Morton received the unwelcome messengers not merely with composure, but with apparent cheerfulness, and rode with them from Dalkeith, where he was then resident, to the Cross of Edinburgh

* Spottiswood says, "These be the words of the letter."

where, after listening to the proclamation made by the herald of the king's assumption of the government, he resigned, in the presence of the assembled citizens, the ensigns of his authority; and, without the least appearance of reluctance, retired to his country-seat at Lochleven, where his mind seemed wholly occupied in improving his garden, and other rural occupations. The joy of the people of all ranks was excessive, and the deafening acclamations by which it was testified, painfully convinced Morton that he had utterly forfeited the affections of his countrymen. His apparent weakness in thus tamely surrendering that authority which they thought him legally entitled to maintain and defend, at once astonished and grieved the few friends that yet remained to him. They considered the king, in consequence of his tender years, unqualified to govern; and that, as the Estates in Parliament had fixed the age of seventeen as his majority, in conformity with the queen's deed of demission, he was not entitled, without their express consent, to assume the reins of government before arriving at that age. The day after Morton had resigned the government, Lord Boyd, one of his most intimate friends, sorrowfully reproved him for not having consulted with his adherents before taking so important a step, and giving place so precipitately to his enemies, who employed only the bare name of the juvenile sovereign to strip him of an authority with which he had been clothed with their own consent, and which he ought to have retained for five years longer.* Morton, though he attempted to justify his conduct, secretly and bitterly regretted the step that he had taken, but which it was now impossible for him to retract. His demission was accordingly transmitted to the king, from whom Morton's discharge. he received a full approbation of his public conduct during the regency, and a pardon in the most ample form which his own ingenuity could devise, declaring him incapable of being accused or brought to trial for any crime or past offence without exception. He also granted him a full discharge for all his intrusions with the public money during the period of his government. This deed was moreover declared to be irrevocable, and the lords of the king's council bound themselves under a penalty of five hundred thousand pounds to procure its confirmation by parliament at the first meeting of that body.†

A council of twelve peers was appointed to sit at Edinburgh to assist the king in the administration. These were the Earls of Argyle, Atholl, Montrose, and Glencairn; the Lords Ruthven, Lindsay, and Herries; the Abbots of Newbottle and Dunfermline; and the Prior of St. Andrew's, together with two supernumerary or extraordinary councillors; Buchanan, the king's tutor, and James Macgill, the clerk-register. All royal letters were to be countersigned by four of their number, with out which formality they were to be held invalid.

Intelligence of this alarming change, that had so suddenly taken place in Scottish affairs, was conveyed to Killegrew by Randolph in a few hurried and incoherent lines, written on the eve of his departure for London, whither he was about to proceed, that he might personally communicate to Elizabeth information of the unexpected revolution. We quote the letter as a characteristic specimen of Randolph's jocular way of treating very serious matters, and of his laconic style:—"All the devils in hell are stirring and in great rage in this country. The regent is discharged—the country broken—the chancellor slain by the Earl of Crawford—four killed of the town out of the castle—and yet are we in hope of some good quietness, by the great wisdom of the Earl of Morton. There cometh to her majesty from hence an ambassador shortly. I know not yet who, but Sandy Hay* in his company. It behoveth me to be there before; and so show my wife."†

The death of Glamis the chancellor, to which he alludes, was in no way connected with the stirring events to which Randolph's letter chiefly refers, but resulted from an accidental quarrel between his retinue and that of the Earl of Crawford. The office of chancellor was conferred on the Earl of Atholl, Morton's principal opponent. This appointment, while it strengthened the faction in one direction, weakened it, by diminishing its popularity, in another, for he, as well as the chief favourites of the king—the Earls of Eglinton and Caithness, and the Lord Ogilvy—were either avowed Papists, or suspected of a partiality to popery; and as Morton, whatever had been the errors of his government, had never been suspected of any leaning in this direction, a certain change of sentiment in his favour, rather felt than expressed, had taken place in the minds of many of the Protestant party. Of this he was not altogether ignorant; for, although he seemed to have quite laid aside all his ambitious projects, and to be contented in the quiet enjoyment of rural retirement, he was eagerly watching the course of events, and awaiting the first favourable opportunity once more to take the lead in directing public affairs. The scheme which he was concerning for the accomplishment of this end was prematurely developed by imprudent precipitancy, as well as by a breach of faith, on the part of the confederate nobles; who, gaining confidence from the easy victory they had obtained over Morton, proceeded not only to strip him of every remaining token of his once formidable power, but to make demands quite at variance with the solemn engagements into which they had so recently entered, and to which the young king was himself a principal party. Acting under their advice, the king required Morton to

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 396.

† Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. pp. 24, 25; Robertson, vol. ii. p. 60.

* Alexander Hay, clerk-register.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Randolph to Killegrew, 20th March, 1577, signed, in jest, Thomazo del Niente; Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 28, 29.

deliver up the Castle of Edinburgh, which he still continued to hold, together with the royal palace in the capital, and the queen's jewels, which he had extorted from Argyle and his lady; to contribute a sum of money towards defraying the expenses attendant on the king's assumption of the government; and to give an account of his management of the Mint, and the revenue he had derived from it. It was further ordered that a rigid investigation of the state of the Border counties should be set on foot, and that Morton's nephew, the Earl of Angus, should be displaced from his office of warden.

Morton was naturally unwilling to surrender a fortress the possession of which might materially contribute to the promotion of his ambitious designs. He did not indeed refuse compliance with the king's demand, but he delayed to obey it; and as his brother the captain was in the meantime actively engaged in storing the place with provisions,* it may be inferred that Morton had actually contemplated defending it. The inhabitants of the town, suspecting his purpose, intercepted a convoy of victualling stores on their way to the castle; whereupon the constable of the castle, Archibald Douglas, at the command of the captain, came out with a party of soldiers, who, discharging their pieces among the people, slew several of them, and wounded others. The population, enraged and alarmed, rose in arms, and so strictly watched all the avenues of the castle, that ingress and egress were alike impossible.† Under these circumstances, Morton, without any show of resistance, surrendered the place to Lords Ruthven and Lindsay, who immediately took possession of the royal apartments and the crown jewels; while the keys of the gates were delivered to Seton of Touch and Cunningham of Drumwhassel.‡ As to the money, Morton was not so facile. He peremptorily refused compliance with the king's demand, alleging that he had borne the expense of the civil war; that he had supported not merely the dignity of his own office, but also the king's household; and that he had repaired and ornamented the royal palaces at an expense far beyond what the revenues of the crown were adequate to meet. With respect to the Mint and the wardenship of the Borders, he was content, he said, to leave these entirely to the discretion of the king, to the support of whose dignity, when he came of age, he would willingly sacrifice his entire fortune.§ In return for all these concessions, the fallen minister, with apparent humility, simply requested that parliament at its next meeting should pass an act approving of his administration while in office.

Before the departure of Randolph for the English court, Morton, in a brief conference which he held with him, committed to his care a letter for Burghley,* from some expressions in which, as well as from the letter of Randolph to Killebrew already quoted, it is evident that he had informed Randolph of certain schemes he had in view, but which he was too cautious to commit to writing. It may also be inferred, from Randolph's words in the letter referred to, that he entertained great hopes of the success of Morton's plans.

Argyle and the other confederate lords, having formed their council,† met at Edinburgh, and issued a proclamation A parliament summoned. for the assembling of parliament on the 10th June. But while they now felt secure in the possession of the power they had so suddenly acquired, and Morton, apparently contented with the private station into which he had sunk, no longer gave them any uneasiness, they were on the eve of a revolution not less sudden and complete than that to which they owed their present elevation. The mind of the ex-regent had been occupied during his retirement with other subjects than those of agriculture and gardening, to which he feigned to be so much devoted. He had been plotting his own return to power, if not under the name of regent, at least with an authority equal to that which he had wielded while he enjoyed that title. Having insinuated himself into the confidence of the young Earl of Mar, the son of the regent of that name, and the nephew of Alexander Erskine, governor of the Castle of Stirling, he represented to that young nobleman, then in his twentieth year, that being by hereditary right entitled to the governorship of Stirling Castle, he was suffering great injustice at the hands of his uncle, who ought now to resign to him the command of that fortress and the custody of the king's person. He hinted that so long as his uncle continued to usurp these important trusts, he, and not the young earl, was looked upon as the head of the ancient house of Mar. He declared that this was an indignity to which the earl ought not, in justice to himself, any longer to submit, especially when by one bold effort he might place himself in his rightful position—an attempt in which, if necessary, he would be seconded by the whole strength of the house of Douglas, and assisted by the counsel of his uncles, the Abbots of Dryburgh and Cambuskenneth.

These promptings, so flattering to the love of enterprise natural at his age, were not lost on the youthful nobleman. On the 26th April, attended by his customary retinue, he repaired to the castle, and being admitted as usual without suspicion, he remained there for the night. Rising early in the morning, and assembling his attendants under the pretence of going on a hunting expedition, he proceeded, along with the two abbots his uncles, to the gates, where they were met by Erskine, who had gone to let them out. He was

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 396.

† Ibid.

‡ Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 27.

§ Ibid.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, the Earl Morton to Lord Burghley, 28th March, 1578.

† MS. Record of the Privy Council, in Register-house, Edinburgh, 24th March, 1577-8.

immediately surrounded by the whole party. Mar forcibly took possession of the keys; the abbots branded him as a usurper; and, before his shouts of "treason" could bring the garrison to his assistance, he was expelled from the castle, of which Mar immediately took possession; and placing new guards at the gates, induced the garrison without difficulty to swear fidelity to him as the governor, and thus remained at once master of the fortress and custodian of the young king.

When intelligence of this unexpected event reached the council, at Edinburgh, they rode in a body to Stirling, and, presenting themselves at the gates of the castle, demanded admittance. This, however, Mar refused, unless they chose to come one by one, each accompanied by not more than a single attendant.*

Thus repulsed, the council assembled at Stirling, and issued a proclamation forbidding any nobleman to repair thither with more than a certain limited number of armed attendants—namely, an earl with twenty-four, a lord with sixteen, and a baron with six. In the meantime, however, they sent secret orders to assemble the whole of their own forces.†

At the earnest desire of the king, a reconciliation took place between Mar and his uncle, when it was agreed that the former should retain the custody of the Castle of Stirling and of the king's person; while to the latter was assigned the keeping of the Castle of Edinburgh, with, however, free access to his majesty at all times.

No change had as yet been made in the government of the country, which, notwithstanding these transactions at Stirling, might immediately have resumed its functions, as if no such event had taken place; but Morton, who, though he had hitherto kept in the background, was universally suspected of having prompted Mar's enterprise for the furtherance of his own ambitious designs, was now once more to appear on the scene, and to wield, under a different name, a power greater than that of which he had been deprived. The king and his advisers summoned a meeting of the council to be held at Stirling on the 10th June, for the purpose of arranging the business to be submitted to the consideration of parliament, which was to assemble at Edinburgh in the ensuing month. To this meeting Morton was specially invited by a letter from the king,—a preconcerted measure probably contrived by Morton himself, and brought about through the influence of Mar and other friends who were near the king's person. The summons was of course readily obeyed; and Morton, setting out at midnight with a small retinue, was admitted into Stirling Castle by Murray of Tullibardine. At the meeting of the nobles Morton was, out of respect for his former high position, elected president; and it was not long ere he gained a complete ascendancy in the council, as well as over Mar and the young monarch.* By advice of the council, the Abbot of Dunfermline was sent as ambassador from the king to Elizabeth, with instructions to thank her for the great favour with which she had ever regarded him, to insure a continuance of peace between the two countries, and "to propose a stricter league for their mutual defence and the maintenance of true religion."†

The time appointed for the meeting of parliament now drew near; but Morton, who ^{Place of meeting of parliament changed.} never quitted the castle,‡ unwilling either to leave the king behind, or to carry him to Edinburgh, where the opposite faction was so strong, persuaded the king to issue a proclamation changing the place of meeting to the great hall in Stirling Castle.

Argyle and his party, dreading the growing power of Morton, who had virtually both the king and the castle in his keeping, were ^{Resolution of Argyle and his party.} not less alarmed than offended at this change; and forthwith assembling in the capital, they passed a resolution declaring that they would on no account attend a parliament assembled within a fortress held by their enemies, and where consequently "men might not declare their minds freely." This new measure occasioned not less dissatisfaction among the citizens of Edinburgh. The residence of the king at a distance from his capital had long been felt as a grievance; but when they learned that the parliament was also to be removed to Stirling, their discontent broke out into open complaint, and rumours, however absurd and incredible, if fitted to excite public feeling against the king's advisers, were eagerly received and propagated. That the king was detained as a prisoner—that he was to be conveyed to England—that the new parliament intended to dissolve the ancient league with France—that the country was to be betrayed into the hands of the English queen—were among the reports which obtained circulation, and kept the public mind in a state of anxiety and alarm.

In this emergency the council issued a proclamation in the name of the king, declaring that the royal residence had been fixed at Stirling in conformity with his majesty's own desire; that no change whatever in the foreign relations of the country had ever been contemplated; and that the parliament about to assemble had no other object in view than to pass such acts as might tend to promote the honour of God, the safety of the king, and the good of the country. This, however, did not allay the ferment. The fears and suspicions that had taken hold of the minds of the citizens were exaggerated and confirmed by the determined attitude of the lords then at Edinburgh. There

* MS. Calderwood, British Museum, Ayscough, 4735, p. 1061; also original draft, State Paper Office, Articles delivered by Argyle, Atholl, &c., to Lord Lindsay; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 34.

† MS. Draft, State Paper Office, 18th June, 1578; ibid.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 409. "Morton remained in the castle, the rest of the nobilitie in the town."

* MS. Calderwood, British Museum, p. 1061; Calderwood's Historie, vol. iii. p. 408.

† Ibid.

they had resolved to remain, to content themselves with sending a deputation to Stirling to protest against the legality of a parliament in which freedom of discussion was impossible, and to petition the king to adjourn the meeting to a fitter time and place.

Morton, who had now the chief, if not the sole direction of affairs, was not to be in power. turned from his purpose by this opposition; and on the day appointed (the 16th July) the parliament assembled within the great hall of Stirling Castle. The king, arrayed in his robes of state, opened the session in a short speech,

Meeting of which was no sooner concluded parliament. than the Earl of Montrose and Lord Lindsay presented themselves as commissioners from the Earls of Argyle and Atholl, and their adherents, in whose names Lindsay protested that nothing done by this convention should prejudice the nobility, their heirs, successors, and posterity, of their liberties granted by his majesty's predecessors; because, being held within a fortress, it was not a free parliament, that it had consequently not the authority of a parliament, and all its proceedings should be held null and void. He further protested for remedy of law in case it were otherwise.* Morton, who, in the absence of Atholl the chancellor, filled his place, now commanded Lindsay and Montrose to take their own places. Lindsay replied that they would do so if commanded by the king, but not otherwise; and the king having repeated the command, they obeyed, after having taken instruments that they did so at the command of the king. After a sermon preached by John Duncanson, the minister of the king's household, and a speech by Morton, the parliament was proceeding to the election of the lords of the Articles, when they were again interrupted by Lindsay, who once more protested that every act of such a parliament was illegal and null, and ridiculed the choosing of the lords of the Articles as a farce. Morton, now losing all command of temper, gave vent to his fury in a fierce invective against Lindsay, whom, unmindful of the royal presence, and in violation of the dignity of the assembly, he loaded with abuse. "Think ye, sir," said he, "that this is a court of churls or brawlers? Take your own place, and thank God that the king's youth keeps you safe from his resentment."—"I have served the king in his minority," replied Lindsay, "as faithfully as the proudest among ye; and I think to serve his grace no less truly in his majority." On this Morton was observed to whisper in the ear of the king, who immediately rising, confused and blushing, gave utterance to a short speech, which had no doubt been concocted for him by Morton beforehand, in anticipation of Lindsay's protest. "Lest any man," he said, "should judge this not to be a free parliament, I declare it free; and those who love me will think as I think." †

Lindsay being thus silenced, the business proceeded without further interruption. The resignation of Morton was formally accepted, and the king's assumption of the government ratified and confirmed. A new council was appointed, consisting of the Earl of Morton, who sat as chief; the Earls of Argyle, Atholl, Lennox, Rothes, Glencairn, Eglinton, and Buchan; the Lords Boyd, Ochiltree, and Cathcart, and the Abbots of Dryburgh and Cambuskenneth. It was enacted that this council should continue in office until further order should be taken by parliament; that they should hold their sittings at Stirling, or at such other place as the king might select as his residence for the time; that four should remain with the king by course for two months, beginning with Morton, Lennox, Boyd, and Cambuskenneth, but that it should be lawful for any of the rest to remain with the king, if they pleased, during the whole year; that three should subscribe along with the king all public acts and deeds issued in his name; and that, in the absence of the secretary, Mr. George Buchanan and Mr. Peter Young should subscribe such things as belonged to his office. A full discharge was also given to Morton for all his acts and intromissions during the regency.*

In the meantime, Montrose had withdrawn from the hall and ridden hastily to Edinburgh, where, having joined the lords of his party, he affirmed that he was the bearer of secret instructions from the king, commanding his subjects to assemble in arms, and rescue him from the thralldom in which he was held by Morton and his faction. There is some reason to doubt the truth of this assertion, but it was readily believed by the citizens, who, dreading a renewal of the tyranny of their old oppressor, flew to arms, and declared their resolution to deliver their sovereign and their country from the odious usurpation of a traitor, who had bartered their independence for English gold. Highly gratified by this outburst of enthusiasm, Argyle and Atholl sent an encouraging message to the citizens, informing them that the lords would quickly join them with a force sufficient to overwhelm their enemies, and restore to the king that freedom of action of which he had been treasonably deprived. As a preliminary step, the recusant lords issued a declaration, in which Morton was accused of having, by means of confederates, clandestinely surprised the Castle of Stirling, of keeping the young king in a state of captivity, so that his most faithful subjects and councillors could not find access to him, of arbitrarily changing the place of meeting of parliament, and of levying troops in the king's name for the support of his own usurped authority; and they, therefore, avowed their determination to employ means for setting the king at liberty, and saving the country from the yoke of the tyrant. This declaration was circulated everywhere throughout the kingdom; and

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 413.

† Ibid., p. 414; also MS. Calderwood, British Museum, pp. 1062, 1065.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 417, 418; draft, State Paper Office, Names of the King's Ordinary Council; and Acts of Parliament of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 94.

the lords began to summon their vassals and prepare for war.*

By retiring to Edinburgh, Montrose fortunately escaped imprisonment; for next day the council issued an order commanding him and Lindsay, under pain of rebellion, to confine themselves to their lodgings.† Lindsay, who had remained behind, was constrained to obey; but, after the lapse of a few days, he departed without having obtained permission,—an act of disobedience which seems to have been overlooked, as Lindsay, notwithstanding what had occurred, was suspected of a leaning to Morton's faction.‡

Argyle and Atholl, having assembled their feudal Preparations retainers, joined the armed citizens and occupied the capital, in contemptuous disregard of an order from the Privy Council, commanding them, under pain of treason, to depart from Edinburgh within twenty-four hours. The most active preparations for hostilities now commenced on both sides; noblemen summoned their armed vassals, private citizens flew to arms, proclamations and counter-proclamations were issued by the opposing factions, and the country seemed once more on the eve of being desolated by civil war. Sir Robert Bowes, the English ambassador, laboured earnestly to bring about a pacification. On the 11th August, however, Argyle and Atholl marched out of Edinburgh with one thousand followers; and such were the zeal and alacrity of their adherents, that when they had reached Falkirk, two days afterwards, they found themselves at the head of an army of seven thousand men. Before them was carried a banner of blue silk, on which was painted the figure of a boy looking through a grated window, with the inscription—

"Liberty I crave,
And cannot it have," §

This of course was meant to represent the young king as held in captivity by Morton, and underneath was written a declaration expressing the resolution of the combatants to set him free or die in the attempt.

Morton, on the other hand, acted with his accustomed boldness and activity. Under his direction, Angus, who had just been appointed Lieutenant-general of the kingdom, issued a proclamation setting forth his commission to convene the lieges at Stirling on the tenth day of August, armed for war and with provisions for fifteen days, for the defence of the king's person against certain disobedient persons who had risen in arms and levied troops, to the danger of the prince and the disturbance of the peace and quietness of the kingdom.* The king also, though detesting the new guardianship under which he was placed, and especially dreading the stern and haughty bearing of Morton, who now wielded the whole power of the state, was constrained to issue a proclamation declaring that it was his own free choice to reside at Stirling, that he was under no manner of restraint, and that he was satisfied with the attendance of Mar, in whom he could place more confidence than in those persons who were now raising such commotions in the country. When this proclamation reached Edinburgh, the lords of Argyle's party would not allow it to be published.† Angus speedily found himself at the head of a body of five thousand men, and with these he directed his march towards Falkirk, where the opposing force had halted, and encamped within their view, on the opposite side of the Carron. His army, though inferior in numbers to that of Argyle and Atholl, consisted chiefly of men of higher rank, and had the advantage of acting, nominally at least, under the royal authority; but, on the other hand, many of them had taken up arms rather in obedience to the king's command than from any favour to Morton, and declared that they would not strike a single blow against the opposite party.‡ Skirmishing had commenced between Interposition the advanced posts of the two of Bowes. armies, and a general engagement seemed about to take place, when Sir Robert Bowes, accompanied by two of the principal ministers of the kirk, Mr. James Lawson and Mr. David Lindsay, presented himself on the field, and in the name of his mistress, the queen, once more interposed for the preservation of peace.§ A lengthened and acrimonious discussion ensued, during which an incident occurred which, though in itself of comparatively little public importance, had probably a great effect on the minds of both armies, and contributed towards the result of the negotiations. One Tait, a Teviotdale man and a follower of Ker of Cessford, who belonged to Argyle's party, boastfully advanced to the front of the lines, and challenged any horseman of the opposite party to single combat. The challenge was accepted by one of the followers of the Master of Glamis, named Johnston, and a small plain by the river's side, within sight of the horsemen of both armies, was selected as the scene of action. At the first charge Tait fell mortally wounded, leaving his comrades disheartened by what would probably be considered by many of them as an evil omen, while by some of the opposite party it would be esteemed a token of success.

The mediation of Bowes was ultimately successful, and peace was for the present Pacification. restored. Various circumstances conducted to this result. Morton was, not without

* MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. v., fol. 101, Lord Hunsdon to Burghley, 19th August, 1578, Berwick; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 36; Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. pp. 30, 31.

† MS. Books of Privy Council, Register-house, Edinburgh, 17th July, 1578.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 417.

§ MS. Letter, Caligula, c. v., fol. 101, Lord Hunsdon to Burghley, 19th August, 1578, Berwick; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 38.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 423.

† Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 31.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 424.

§ Ibid.; also MS., Calderwood, p. 1071.

reason, distrustful of his troops; while Argyle and Atholl were convinced that, even if successful in their first encounter, they were in no condition to follow up their victory. To obtain possession of Stirling Castle appeared at once essential and impracticable, as Morton, besides his own resources, which were great, could reckon on support to any necessary amount from the Queen of England. An agreement was accordingly drawn up in the name of the king, in which he declared that, "foreseeing the wreck and calamity with which the realm shall be afflicted, if the present division and apparent trouble be suffered further to proceed: therefore, with advice, consent, and mature deliberation of the lords of our secret council * * * we have pronounced, declared, statute, and ordained, and by these letters declare statute, and ordain as followeth:—First, that all hostility shall without any delay cease; all forces be dissolved, except some bands of horsemen already retained upon our charges, which bands we will shall only be employed for the quietness of our borders, and others our affairs, and not against the lords at Linlithgow, or any of their adherents in this late action. Forasmuch as we understand, and are thoroughly persuaded, that the lords convened at Edinburgh took arms for the love and tender affection they bare to us, we accept and allow the same since the tenth of June last as good services done, and all the parties and adherents in the same are accepted by us as good subjects and servants. We will that our right trusty cousin and counsellor, the Earl of Argyle, shall remain with our council, and be lodged within our castle at Stirling, with the like number as any other nobleman is lodged therein, saving the Earl of Mar, who hath the custody thereof; and that the said Earl of Argyle shall have the like access unto us and our ear as any other nobleman about us shall have. We will likewise that the Earl of Montrose and Lord Lindsay shall be added to our council, as two of the three appointed by our late act of parliament, and the third to be nominated when we think time. We will call eight noblemen, with advice of our dearest sister and cousin, the Queen of England, and by their counsel and assistance, God willing, before the first day of May next, we will take order for the reconciliation of our nobility to be united, for all actions and griefs fallen among them by occasion of these troubles, and final ending of the same. * * * Our will and pleasure is, that "all the noblemen, barons, and gentlemen, our subjects, coming to us to do their dutiful services and good offices, shall be admitted to our presence and free speech, as to good subjects appertaineth. * * * Given under our signet, and subscribed by us, with advice of the lords of our secret council present. At Stirling, the 15th day of August, and of our reign the twelfth year, 1578."*

Though this agreement was signed by both parties, their reconciliation was only apparent. The arbitrary rule of Morton, and his attempts to humble the ancient nobility of the country, were still fresh in the recollection of Argyle and his party, who, naturally dreading the consolidation of his power, laboured to undermine it; but, after a scene of angry contention and mutual accusation, in the presence of the king, their animosities were for the present hushed up, though it is probable that they were still as far as ever from a cordial reconciliation.

To celebrate and cement this agreement, Morton invited the principal lords, including those who had so recently been his opponents, to a sumptuous banquet, immediately after which, Atholl, who had been one of the guests, was seized with violent sickness, and four days afterwards died at Kincardine. The suddenness of the distemper, its apparent connection with the banquet, and the confirmation of Morton's position, which would obviously have resulted from the removal of such a formidable rival, excited, if they did not justify, a suspicion of poison, which was universally entertained, and publicly expressed, particularly by the friends of the deceased earl, who did not scruple to accuse Morton of having wilfully occasioned his death. Morton, however, who was not ignorant of these accusations, either strong in conscious innocence, or relying on his power of crushing his accusers, treated the imputation with contempt. In the meantime the body was opened, and the contents of the stomach examined by a learned committee of physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries, put on oath, but they could not agree in their verdict. Some confidently affirmed that the presence of poison was palpable and undeniable; others as confidently denied the presence of any deleterious substance whatever. Among the latter was Dr. Preston, one of the most eminent physicians of his time, who in the heat of the discussion, as a proof of the sincerity of his conviction, was rash enough to taste the contents of the stomach. He was immediately taken ill, and, though saved with some difficulty from falling a victim to his experiment, his health was never afterwards completely re-established.* From this dispute we may form some conception of the low state of chemical science at that period. Analysis, so well understood at the present day, would quickly, by means of a few simple but infallible tests, have placed the matter beyond the reach of doubt. As it was, the doctor's sudden and continued sickness served greatly to strengthen, and, in the minds of many, fully to confirm the suspicions entertained of Morton's guilt; but no attempt was made to institute proceedings against him.

The office of chancellor, vacant by the death of Atholl, was conferred upon Ar- Argyle appointed gyle, who in consequence became chancellor. more reconciled to the supremacy of his rival in the king's council. Morton was now at peace with all parties, and fully re-instated, though under a different name, in all the power he had formerly enjoyed. But, notwithstanding this apparent reconciliation,

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 424, 425.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 443.

few experienced and intelligent observers failed to perceive that the present state of matters was not likely to be of long duration. Such appears to have been the opinion of Sir Robert Bowes, the English ambassador, who was intimately acquainted with the condition of Scottish affairs. In a letter addressed to Burghley from Edinburgh, shortly before his return to the English court, he thus expresses himself:—"By my common letters to the lords of her majesty's council, the weltering estate of this realm, that now attendeth but a tide for a new alteration of the court, will appear to your lordship, and how necessary it is in this change approaching, and in the confederacies presently knitting, to get some hold for her majesty amongst them."*

These apprehensions were partly grounded on the state of parties in Scotland itself at the time, but had probably still more emphatic reference to the precarious condition of the foreign relations of the country, and the schemes then concerted for the restoration of Mary and the re-establishment of Romish supremacy.

The return of Morton to power had at first given great pleasure to Elizabeth, who regarded that event as highly favourable to the English party in Scotland; but she was not yet fully aware of the dangers, both within and without, by which his government was threatened, and which in so short a time brought it to a sudden and disastrous close. On the other hand, the present crisis in Scottish affairs was looked on by the Roman Catholic party both at home and abroad as one eminently favourable to an attempt to restore their ancient faith. The Bishop of Ross, who had never ceased to exert himself for intrigues of the the promotion of this object, in connection with the liberation and restitution of his mistress, was now on the continent, intriguing with the courts of France, Spain, and Germany, and calling on them to unite with the Pope at this juncture to advance the project which he had so much at heart. The English ministers, though they had spies and informers in every country in Europe, were not apprized of the extent of these machinations until accident threw into the hands of Walsingham and Burghley a packet of intercepted letters written in cipher. From these it was discovered that Atholl had maintained a close correspondence with the Bishop of Ross, and that at the instigation of Mary a project was set on foot for seizing the young king and conveying him to France. It further appeared that Henry III., the Duke of Guise, the Emperor of Germany, and the Duke of Bavaria, with all of whom Ross had been in communication, had signified their readiness to unite for the purpose of liberating Mary and restoring her to the throne of Scotland, and once more establishing the Roman Catholic faith in that kingdom. The discovery of this formidable conspiracy excited consternation and alarm in the minds of Elizabeth and her ministers, and undoubtedly contributed to hasten the catastrophe which ultimately fell on the unfortunate Scottish queen, in whose unjust detention these troubles had originated.

Once more secure in the possession of power—fortified by the name and authority of the young sovereign, whom he employed as an instrument for advancing his own ambitious designs—untaught by experience, and incited by his native cupidity—Morton once more ventured to lay his hand on the nobility. He had already gained over to his party or crushed the most formidable of his enemies, and there now remained only the house of Hamilton, of all his opponents, from whose power and influence he felt he had anything to dread; while the extensive possessions of that ancient family were viewed with covetous eyes by him and his faction. The Duke of Chatelherault was dead, and his eldest son, the Earl of Arran, then hopelessly insane, had been for some time confined in Draffan Castle, under the guardianship of his mother. Lord John Hamilton, the second son, sometimes mentioned in history as Lord Arbroath, was Abbot of Aberbrothwick, and acted as administrator of the family estates; the third, Lord Claud Hamilton, was Commendator of Paisley. In the event of the predecease of Mary and of the young king, Arbroath was next heir to the throne of Scotland; and at that time he was reckoned one of the wealthiest noblemen in the kingdom. His extensive estates, situated in the Netherward of Clydesdale, and comprising a large portion of that district, adjoined to those of the Earl of Angus, which embraced nearly the whole of the Overward. Morton and the Douglasses had long coveted these rich possessions, thus conveniently situated; and a pretext was not wanting for seizing and confiscating them. The melancholy condition of Arran, the elder brother, precluded any charge from being brought against him; but the two younger brothers had been accused of being accessory to the assassination of the Regents Moray and Lennox, and on that charge had been included in the general act of attainder; and as the amnesty stipulated in the treaty of Perth did not extend to such as had participated in these murders, it was determined to proceed against the unfortunate noble-Morton against the Hamiltons.
men on the former sentence, and, without any trial or legal evidence of their guilt, to subject them to the penalties of treason. Morton found no difficulty in inducing the council to grant a commission to himself, together with the Earls of Mar and Eglinton, and the Lords Ruthven, Cathcart, and Boyd, to proceed against the Hamiltons, and to seize on their persons and estates.*

Morton had calculated on this commission, and was already prepared to act upon it without loss of time, or giving his victims warning of his intentions.

* MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. v., fol. 109, Sir R. Bowes to Burghley, 3rd November, 1578, Edinburgh.

* MS. British Museum, Caligula, c. v., fol. 82; also draft of the King's proclamation against John Hamilton, some time Commendator of Arbroath, and Claud Hamilton, some time Commendator of Paisley, dated 2nd May, 1579; Bowes' Papers; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 44.

With this view he had previously hired a band of mercenaries, whom he assembled at a few hours' notice, and, with the other members of the commission, set out at their head, and marched towards Hamilton. Fortunately, the brothers had received notice of these transactions, and managed, though not without much difficulty, to make their escape. Lord Arbroath fled to Flanders, where he lived for some time in great indigence; and Lord Claud, after remaining under cover for a short time, escaped into England. On the 4th of May, Morton and Angus

Siege of the Castle of Hamilton. besieged the Castle of Hamilton, which had been entrusted to the keeping of Arthur Hamilton of Merton. After an unsuccessful resistance of two days, he offered to surrender on condition of his own life and the lives of the other defenders being spared, and pardon being secured to them for all past offences, with the exception of the murder of the king and the regents,—all the three crimes having been laid to the charge of the Hamiltons without discrimination. These terms were rejected with disdain, and Merton was forced to surrender unconditionally.* He and his companions, among whom was a brother of Bothwellhaugh, named Arthur, who had assisted in the escape of the murderer of the regent, were conveyed to Stirling; and, notwithstanding much influence was employed to save them, they were all hanged. The Castle of Draffan was next invested; but its garrison having deserted during the night, it surrendered at the first summons. There was still, however, an obstacle which stood between Morton and the gratification of his unscrupulous rapacity. Whatever might have been the offences of his two brothers, Arran at least could be convicted of no crime; and consequently the family estates, which devolved on him as the eldest son, could not be legally confiscated. This obstacle, however, was easily surmounted by a man of Morton's unprincipled character, wielding almost the whole power of the state. In gross violation of justice and common sense, and by a flagrant perversion of the law, it was held that Arran, though incapable of controlling his own actions, and altogether ignorant of what was going on, was nevertheless responsible for the acts of his servants; and as they had refused obedience to the king's summons to surrender, he was declared guilty of treason, and his estates were forfeited. He was consequently conveyed to Linlithgow, where he and his mother were kept in rigorous confinement, in the custody of Captain Lambie,† a coarse and brutal man, and an inveterate enemy of the house of Hamilton.‡ The revenues of Arbroath and of his brother, Lord Claud, were sequestered; and even private gentlemen connected with the Hamiltons "were forced to underlie the law, and pay great sums of money."* The ruin of the noble and ancient house of Hamilton now seemed to be complete; but the unjust and arbitrary proceedings by which it had been brought about began to excite the fears of the nobility for the dignity and stability of their order. To allay these apprehensions, which Morton well knew might ultimately endanger his own power, a proclamation was issued in the king's name, in which he declared that he had authorised these proceedings against the Hamiltons only to avenge the murder of his father and of the two regents, as he was bound in conscience and duty to do; and that every article in the pacification should remain intact.†

Forfeiture of the Hamiltons' estates.

Mary had beguiled some of the solitary hours of her captivity in embroidering a rich vest for her son, which she sent him about this time by Naeve, her secretary, together with an affectionate letter and some valuable jewels; but as the letter was addressed "To our loving son, James, Prince of Scotland," the messenger was dismissed without being admitted to the king's presence, and carried back the gifts to his unfortunate mistress.‡

Morton seemed to have obtained firm possession of that power to which he had waded through so many crimes; but the day of terrible retribution was approaching. The king had now reached an age at which it was found impossible to confine him any longer within the walls of Stirling Castle; and as the inhabitants of the capital were extremely dissatisfied at the continued absence of the sovereign, Morton, to whose influence this was ascribed, was exceedingly unpopular among them. With a view, therefore, to conciliate them, and yielding to a necessity which he could no longer avert, he resolved to comply with their wish by removing the king to Edinburgh, where he now summoned a parliament to assemble. In the midst of the preparations for the king's removal, an event occurred which, though seemingly of no great moment in itself, ultimately led to consequences of great importance. This was the arrival from France of the king's youthful cousin, Esmé

Arrival

Stewart, commonly called Monsieur of D'Aubigny. D'Aubigny, the son of John Stewart, brother of Matthew Earl of Lennox, the late regent. The title of Lord D'Aubigny was derived from the town of Aubigny, in Berri, which had been given to John Stewart, of the family of Lennox, and had ever since belonged to the younger brother of that house.§ He had been educated at the court of France, and is described as a youth of highly prepossessing appearance, good temper, graceful manners, and elegant accomplishments. The ostensible objects of his visit were to congratulate his royal relative on his accession, and to claim the estates and title of the Earl of Lennox; but it was rumoured and generally believed that

* MS. Letter to Sir George Bowes, supposed to be from Mr. Archibald Douglas, Edinburgh, 24th May, 1579, copy of the time, Bowes' Papers; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 45; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 442.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 442.

‡ Tytler, vol. viii. p. 46.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 442.

† Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 35.

‡ Ibid.; Robertson, vol. ii. p. 59.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 457.

he had been sent over by the house of Guise, with a view to fill the place of Atholl, to counterbalance the influence of Morton, to re-organise the French party in Scotland, and renew that friendly intercourse which had long been interrupted between the two countries. This belief was strengthened in the minds of many by the circumstance that, on his departure, the Duke of Guise had accompanied him to the ship. He was attended by Monsieur Momberneau, a person distinguished by brilliant wit, and gay and sprightly manners;* and by Mr. Henry Ker, a man of retired habits, who had long been his confidential servant, but who now, from what cause does not appear, was suspected by the ministers of the Kirk of being employed on some secret mission by the Guises.†

D'Aubigny had not been many days at court ere

He becomes the king's favourite. his royal cousin, who now began to exhibit that predilection to favouritism, founded on superficial and frivolous qualifications, by which he was distinguished to the end of his life. In a very short time D'Aubigny was created Earl of Lennox, the king having induced his grand-uncle to resign that title, and accept in its stead that of Earl of March. To support D'Aubigny in his newly-acquired rank, the king bestowed on him the temporalities of Aberbrothwick, which had been forfeited by Lord John Hamilton. Nor was this all: James further testified his ardent attachment to his favourite by appointing him Governor of Dunbarton Castle, Captain of the King's Guard, and First Lord of the Bed-chamber.‡ The royal favour, thus munificently expressed, had its usual effect upon the courtiers. The favourite rose into high consideration; Argyle and many of the principal nobility hastened to pay court to him, and bind themselves to his service.§

About the same time another young man was introduced to the notice of the king, and soon began to participate with Lennox in his favour and confidence. This was Captain James Stewart, the second son of Lord Ochiltree. The two favourites, however, were of very different characters: Lennox was undesigning, open, and generous—unsuspicious, and therefore liable to be imposed on—affable and courteous in his deportment, besides excelling in almost all the youthful sports and pastimes of the age, and therefore fitted to be an agreeable companion to the young sovereign; but destitute of political sagacity, inexperienced in public business, and ignorant of the state of the nation, and therefore manifestly unqualified for the office of a minister of state. Stewart, on the other hand, is described as a young man of profligate habits, addicted to every vice, and regardless even of common decency. He was fertile in the formation of ambitious schemes—often aimed at objects seemingly unattainable—and displayed in the pursuit singular dexterity, fearless audacity, and shameless impudence. Notwithstanding this dissimilarity of character, the two young courtiers, it is said, lived together in harmony, and shared their master's favour without any feeling of jealousy or rivalry, such as is common between favourites.*

The sudden elevation of D'Aubigny, the doubt that hung over the object of his visit to the court of Scotland, and the influence which he, a Roman Catholic, evidently possessed over the young king, were sources of profound anxiety, if not of actual alarm, to Elizabeth. She was haunted by the terror of a French alliance with Scotland, and the consequent downfall of English influence in that country, and still more by the dread of a Roman Catholic league, for the restoration of Mary and the re-establishment of popery. These fears were moreover every day increased by the communications of her secret agents, who were employed in great numbers both in Scotland and France. Unwilling, however, to make any public demonstration before the objects of her apprehension had assumed some definite and palpable form, she resolved in the meantime to content herself with sending a vigilant and intelligent agent to keep a strict watch on the course of events. For this mission she selected Captain Nicolas Arrington, an officer of the garrison of Berwick, who had already given repeated proofs of his capacity, as well as his acquaintance with Scottish affairs. He was, of course, entrusted with a double commission. His open instructions were to intercede with the king in favour of the Hamiltons. This would afford him, it was supposed, an opportunity of carrying out without exciting suspicion the secret objects of his mission, which were to study the character and penetrate the designs of D'Aubigny, to ascertain the state of parties, and what views were entertained with respect to the marriage of the king.† His mediation in favour of the Hamiltons completely failed; the king, probably by the instigation of Morton, appeared inflamed with resentment against them, and would consent to no mitigation of their punishment. Respecting the marriage of the king, Arrington wrote to Burghley, informing him that no definite proposal had yet been made, either by D'Aubigny or the council; but, with regard to D'Aubigny himself, he remarked, "It was evident that the young French stranger had already won the affection of his royal kinsman, and might look for high preferment," if he could be prevailed on to change his religion.‡

The time appointed for the meeting of parliament having arrived, the king, attended by his favourites, set out for Edinburgh. He proceeded from Stirling to Linlithgow on the 29th September,

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 457.

† Tytler, vol. viii. p. 50.

‡ Robertson, vol. ii. p. 60.

§ MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. v., fol. 133, and also 135, Boves to Burghley, 22nd October, 1579, Berwick; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 52.

* Robertson, vol. ii. p. 61.

† Tytler, vol. viii. p. 50.

‡ Ibid; MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. v., fol. 130, Nicolas Arrington to Burghley, 10th October, 1579, Berwick.

and, on the following day, made his entry into the capital. He was accompanied by Morton, Angus, Argyle, Montrose, Mar, Lindsay, Ochiltree, the Master of Livingston, and the Master of Seton, and was escorted by a body of about two thousand horse. The Homes and the Kers, with about three hundred horse, met him at Corstorphine. The burgesses of Edinburgh, arrayed in armour, received him at the gate of the city, when he alighted, and was saluted with a discharge of cannon from the castle. The people of Leith met him at a spot called Quarrell Holes; and he reached the abbey amid the acclamations of the multitude and the thunder of artillery from the ships in the Firth.*

The presence of James in the capital of his kingdom diffused extraordinary joy among the inhabitants, who now fondly hoped that they were entering on a new era, in which they should once more enjoy the blessings of peace, social order, and prosperity, under the regular government of their ancient line of kings. Their satisfaction was testified, according to the manner of that age, by much pompous ceremony and a profusion of costly pageantry, much of which, in these more sober and practical times, would be deemed idle and ridiculous. These ceremonies have been described with great minuteness, and with wonderful agreement as to details, by most of the historians of that period, and present us with a variety of curious particulars, interesting to the antiquarian and the student of manners and customs. "The king the king. made his entry in Edinburgh," says Calderwood, in his quaint and graphic manner, "at the West Port upon Friday, the 17th October. He was received by the magistrates of the town under a pompous pale of purple velvet. That port presented to him the wisdom of Solomon deciding the plea between the two women who contended for the young child, and the servant that presented the sword to the king with the child. After he had entered in at the port, Mr. John Sharpe made an harangue in Latin. The Provost, Baillies, Treasurer, Dean of Guild, rode with foot mantles; the rest of the council, and other honest men of the town, about three hundred, clothed in velvet, satin, and silks, and twenty-four officers, clothed in black, were there also at his entry. At the old port of the Strait Bow hung a glorious globe, which opened artificially as the king came by, wherein was a young boy presenting the keys of the town to his majesty, all made of massive silver, and were presently received by one of the Lords of the Secret Council. The musicians sang the twentieth Psalm, and others played upon the viols. When he came down to the Old Tolbooth, the fore-face whereof was covered with painted deals, there he saw the crafts' standards and pinsells [penoncelles] set, and four fair young maids representing the four cardinal virtues—Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or, as others report, Peace, Justice, Plenty, and Policy. Every one of them had an oration to the king. The wheel of fortune was burned with powder. When he came down over against the Great Kirk, Dame Religion desired his presence, so he lighted at the lady's steps, and went into the Great Kirk. Mr. James Lawsons made an exhortation upon Psalm second, verse tenth, and exhorted the king and the subjects to do their duty, to enter in league and covenant with God, and concluded with thanksgiving. After sermon was sung the twentieth Psalm. When he came to the Cross, there Baelhus sat on a puncheon, with his painted garment and a flower garland. He welcomed the king to his own town, and drank many glasses, and east them among the people. There were there run three puncheons of wine. At the Salt Tron was described the genealogy of the kings of Scotland: a number of trumpets sounded melodiously, and crying with a loud voice 'Weele fare to the king.' At the Nether Bow were represented the conjunction of the planets, as it was in the time of his nativity, and Ptolemæus describing his beauty and fortunes bestowed upon him by the influence of the stars. From the West Port to the Nether Bow, all the stairs on the High Street were covered with tapestry, eards, and boards. Many were hurt on the streets through throng. From the Nether Bow he went to the abbey. The town of Edinburgh presented him with a cupboard worth six thousand merks."*

Throughout all the solemnities and ceremonies of this reception, the king publicly exhibited his partiality to his favourite, Lennox; he was ever by his side, and walked on his right hand during the procession, which lasted upwards of one hour. He was lodged in the royal palace, and sumptuous apartments were provided for him next to the king's bedchamber. These tokens of the royal favour drew upon their object, as a matter of course, the sycophantish adulation of all who had access to him, and expected, through his medium, to win their way to distinction at court. Wherever he went he was treated with a consideration befitting the most exalted rank, and eagerly—

"Followed, flattered, sought, and sued."

The parliament assembled, according to appointment, on the 20th October, and Meeting of parliament. was opened with great solemnity by the king in person, Angus carrying the crown and Argyle the sceptre;† but, excepting some explanatory and declaratory acts regarding the Kirk, no business was transacted of any public importance.

The exalted rank which Lennox had so suddenly attained, the high consideration in which he was held by the nobility, and, still more, his great influence with the king, began now to give Morton serious uneasiness. His pride would not stoop to pay court to the favourite—a foreigner and an upstart—who owed his unmerited elevation to the foolish preference of the king—a youth of fifteen.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 458, 459.

† Ibid., pp. 459, 460.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 457, 458.

He nevertheless could not get rid of the mortifying conviction that Lennox must be regarded as a rival, who had already, to some extent, succeeded in pushing him aside, and who might ultimately unite with his enemies in driving him from power. But Morton had been accustomed to crush his enemies, not to flatter them; he had triumphed over all opposition during his regency; he had forced his way back to the highest office in the state, in spite of a powerful coalition of the principal nobility; he had since overthrown and ruined the ancient house of Hamilton, notwithstanding its near connection with royalty itself; and, confident in the resources of his own daring genius, he did not despair of being able to undermine the credit of the favourite. To this task he therefore addressed himself with his characteristic cunning and dexterity.

Suspicious had, from the first, been entertained regarding the real object of D'Aubigny's visit to Scotland. These Morton now took care to revive and strengthen. By means of his friends, reports were industriously circulated that Lennox was actually a secret agent sent over by the Duke of Guise and the Pope, for the purpose of inducing the young king, if possible, to embrace popery, and of subverting the established religion of the country. In proof of this, sundry facts were brought prominently forward and strongly insisted on. Lennox himself was professedly a Papist; the Duke of Guise had accompanied him to Dieppe, and had remained in secret conference with him for six hours in the ship;* before repairing to Scotland, he had held frequent consultations with the Bishops of Glasgow and Ross, regarding, among other subjects, as was alleged, an association between the young king and his mother in the government, and an alteration in the state of religion in Scotland;† though he had been so poor that his annual rents did not amount to more than ten thousand francs, and his lands besides were under mortgage, yet he had brought over with him forty thousand pieces of gold, in crowns and other coins; part of this money had already been given to Lady Argyle, and a warm and intimate friendship had suddenly sprung up between him and the earl.‡ From this last circumstance it was inferred that the money was intended to be employed in corrupting certain of the nobility.§ These rumours did not fail to alarm the clergy, who were peculiarly sensitive to every thing that seemed to them to threaten danger to the Protestant Church. Their own fears were speedily communicated to their congregations; the cry of "the Church in danger" resounded from the pulpits; solemn warnings were uttered against the dark intrigues of popery; and even the conduct of the king in entertaining popish favourites at court was condemned and lamented.

So great was the excitement of the public mind that the king sent for the ministers of the Kirk, and informed them of the errors of popery, and finding him willing to be instructed, was desirous that one of their number should be appointed for that purpose. Their choice, which met with the king's approval, fell upon Mr. David Lindsay, one of the ministers of Leith, who had not continued his instructions above a few weeks ere Lennox was, or feigned to be, convinced, publicly abjured the errors of the Romish creed, and professed himself a Protestant and a member of the Scottish Presbyterian Church, by signing the Confession of Faith.* The principal ground of complaint was thus obviated, but the sincerity of Lennox was suspected; and the public jealousy was still farther augmented by the publicity given to certain intercepted dispensations from the Pope, by which Roman Catholics were permitted to profess, subscribe, or even swear whatsoever they pleased, provided they did so with a view privately to promote the interests of the Romish Church.† It is but justice, however, to Lennox to record the fact that he professed himself a Protestant at his death.‡ The utter recklessness of all moral principle implied in these dispensations, which entirely destroyed all confidence between Roman Catholics and Protestants, even when confirmed by the sanctity of an oath, excited universal horror and apprehension among the adherents of the Reformed religion, and led to the formation of that memorable bond known in history by the name of the "National Covenant." This remarkable document, which was drawn up by Mr. John Craig, consisted of an explicit abjuration of the errors of the Romish Church, stated in detail, and a solemn engagement to adhere to and defend the doctrine and discipline of the Reformed Church in Scotland; an express recognition of the authority of the king, "as a comfortable instrument of God's mercy, on whose safety and good behaviour" depended the stability of the Reformed religion; and an engagement, on the part of the covenanters, to defend his person and authority with their "goods, bodies, and lives, in the defence of Christ's evangel, liberties of the country, ministrations of justice, and punishment of iniquity, against all enemies within this realm and without." This bond, which was framed in terms of an oath, was subscribed by the king and his household, and all ranks of men in the realm were enjoined by an order of the Privy Council and an act of the General Assembly to do the like.§

These precautions undoubtedly indicated a general distrust in the stability of the present state of

* Robertson, vol. ii. p. 62.

† Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 38.

‡ MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. vi., fol. 36, Bowes to Burgheley and Walsingham, 16th May, 1550, Edinburgh; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 62.

§ Spottiswood, p. 309; Cook's History of the Church of Scotland, vol. i. p. 311.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 460.

† Ibid.; State Paper Office, French Correspondence, Paulet to Walsingham, 29th August, 1579, Paris; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 63.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 460, 461.

§ Ibid.

the kingdom; and many circumstances contributed to aggravate this feeling of insecurity in the minds of men of far-seeing political sagacity. Notwithstanding the great amount of national wealth manifested by the extravagantly expensive pageants that attended the king's public entry into the capital, and the vast revenues of many of the nobility, such was the poverty of the king that he

Poverty of the king. could not without difficulty uphold the dignity of his position: he could scarcely even provide for his personal security. The royal revenues had, during his nonage, been plundered to such an extent, by various officials entrusted with their management, that he was unable to raise so much as three thousand pounds for the charges of his household; while the nobility, who had risen in proportion as the king had lapsed into indigence, "would spare nothing they possessed to the king's aid without deadly feud."* For the safety of the king's person, at this period, when sudden and violent changes were by no means uncommon, it had been considered advisable that the king should be provided with a body-guard, and should be constantly attended by six of his Privy Council in rotation; but money could not be found to pay the soldiers, the councillors refused to furnish their own table, and the king could not meet the expenses of their maintenance, so that he was frequently left almost alone, and with no attendants but his domestics.†

A representation of this wretched state of destitution, in which the young king had entered on his government, had some time before‡ been made to Elizabeth by Elphinstone, Abbot of Dunfermline, who had been sent to the English court chiefly for this purpose; but the queen, with her habitual parsimony, refused to lend the least assistance.§ Since that time the evil had gone on increasing, while the feuds that had arisen among the nobility, since the arrival of Lennox, had rendered it doubly necessary to take precautions for the security of the king's person.

The reports which Morton had raised with a view to destroy the reputation of Lennox, his rival, were soon followed, probably in retaliation, by alarming rumours against himself. It was said that he had been for some time carrying on a secret correspondence with the English queen, respecting a plot for seizing the young king and conveying him to England. Morton immediately brought the matter under the notice of the council, indignantly protested his innocence, and demanded to be brought to trial; but the council unanimously declared their disbelief of the accusation, and issued a proclamation against such as propagated false reports, tending to produce discord between the king and any of his nobility. Nevertheless, as if some suspicion of Morton's guilt were secretly entertained, the office of Lord Chamberlain, which had long been in abeyance, was revived and bestowed upon Lennox; Alexander Erskine, Captain of the Castle of Edinburgh, and one of Morton's most inveterate enemies, was appointed his deputy; a guard of twenty-four young noblemen was organized to attend closely on the king, and Lennox and Erskine were named as its commanders.*

Morton was much annoyed and not a little alarmed by these arrangements, which appeared tacitly to insinuate some doubt of his fidelity; but scarcely had they been made when another rumour arose, which once more threw the whole court into consternation. Intelligence was brought to the Earl of Mar that Lennox and his faction had formed a conspiracy for carrying off the king to Dunbarton, and thence conveying him to France; and the night of the 10th April was named as the time fixed on for carrying the plot into execution.† It was also rumoured that a confederacy had been formed by the same party against the Earl of Morton, for the purpose of convicting him of participating in the murder of the king's father. Sir James Balfour, then a voluntary exile in France, and who it was well known was involved in the guilt of that horrible crime, had offered, it was said, on promise of pardon, to produce the bond entered into by the murderers, containing, among other signatures, that of Morton, so that his guilt could be fully established, and his punishment rendered certain.

In the meantime, the dreaded night of the 10th April arrived. The king was then at Stirling Castle, and extraordinary precautions were employed to insure his safety. No one was permitted by Mar to have access to him, and guards were placed both within and without his bedchamber. Lennox, in well-grounded alarm, retired to his own apartments, attended by a band of armed followers, and threatened the last extremity of his vengeance against any who should attempt to molest him. Many of his adherents, including Argyle, Sutherland, and Glencairn, when they learned his danger, hastened to Stirling Castle, but were denied admittance within the gates. Confusion, perturbation, and terror reigned throughout the castle. A mysterious and undefined dread, as of some supernatural agency, took possession of the minds of men but little subject to the emotion of fear, yet the night passed without anything occurring to justify these apprehensions. Arrington, who was then an inmate of the place, wrote to Burghley an account of this remarkable scene. "The young king," he said, "is in heavy case, and much amazed with these troubles, and the more by reason of his great affection for D'Aubigny,

* MS. British Museum, Caligula, c. v., fol. 155, copy, Memorial of the present state of Scotland, 31st December, 1579; Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 53, 54.

† Ibid.

‡ 30th July, 1578.

§ MS. State Paper Office, Demands of the Abbot of Dunfermline, Ambassador from the King of Scots, 30th July, 1578; Tytler, ut supra.

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 39.

† MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. vi., fol. 8, Captain Arrington to Lord Burghley, 16th April, 1580, Berwick; Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 55, 56.

whom he perceives the mark they shoot at. Mons. D'Aubigny, with his faction, doth offer to abide the trial by law, or otherwise, in their very persons, that there was never any such plot or meaning by him, or his consent, or by any other to their knowledge, to have drawn the king either to Dunbarton or any other sinister course.*

Little credit can be attached to any of these rumours, by which so much uncaseiness was occasioned; and we shall probably not err widely from the truth, if we regard them as fabrications invented and propagated by the rival factions of Morton and Lennox, having no reality in themselves, though based on actual and well-known circumstances which gave them an air of probability.

Lennox, though he vehemently denied the imputations cast upon him, yet, with that candour which formed a marked feature of his character, frankly admitted that he would gladly see such changes effected in the administration of affairs as would protect the revenues of the crown from the depredations of parties whom Morton and Mar had thrust into office.

Elizabeth, however, who attached more importance to these mutual accusations than they probably deserved, became alarmed. She had been informed by her ambassador in France that there was a project in agitation for carrying the young king to that country, and her mind was in consequence predisposed to give ready credence to the designs imputed to Lennox and his associates. She accordingly dispatched Sir Robert Bowes as her ambassador to Scotland, with instructions thoroughly to investigate the grounds of the report of an attempt to convey the king to France, to uphold to the utmost of his power the influence of Morton and his party, and to undermine that of Lennox, to intercede for the pardon of the Hamiltons, and to insinuate that the queen would not object to gain over by pensions some of the chief persons in authority. Of such urgent importance did the object of his embassy appear to Elizabeth and her council, that, before setting out, he was directed, by letter from Walsingham, to use his utmost vigilance and dispatch, as a rumour prevailed in Spain that mass had actually begun to be celebrated in Scotland, and that the Roman Catholic party were preparing to attack the Protestants by force of arms. Walsingham stated, moreover, that to his certain knowledge Ker of Fernyhirst, a Catholic and an active partizan of the queen's faction, accompanied by Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh, the assassin of the Regent Moray, had recently ridden post from France into Spain.† The importance attached by Walsingham to these vague rumours, and this apparently not very important event, strongly indicate the panic that had seized upon the English government.

* MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. vi., fol. 7, Arrington to Walsingham or Burghley, 10th April, 1580, Stirling. The address of the letter is torn away. Tytler, vol. viii. p. 57.

† Draft, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Bowes, 3rd July, 1580.

Bowes was very courteously received at the Scottish court; but no sooner did he allude to the subject of the Hamiltons, than a change took place in the king's demeanour, which convinced the ambassador that there was little hope of success in that object of his mission.* Nor were his hopes of being able to revive the declining authority of Morton much more considerable. Morton himself was among the first to perceive that his power was on the wane, while that of his enemies was on the increase; and he had nothing to hope from the favour of the king, who now seemed entirely alienated from him. Unable to cope with these adverse circumstances, he had begun to think of providing for his safety by withdrawing into private life. He communicated his apprehensions and his half-formed resolution to the English ambassador in a secret conference, held during the night in Stirling Castle, when he expressed his fear that it was now in vain to make any attempt to crush Lennox, who, by professing to be a Protestant, had so far secured the support of the Protestant clergy that they had addressed to the council a letter in his favour.†

This despondency on the part of Morton was, however, more feigned than real: he still clung to power, and the intention of abandoning public life was, unfortunately for himself, very far from being fully formed. His design in seeking this secret interview, there is good reason to believe, was, at least in the first instance, to ascertain to what extent, if any, Elizabeth was inclined to furnish him with "the sinews of war;" for we find him shortly afterwards declaring to Bowes that he would be compelled for his own security to throw himself into the arms of Lennox and his faction. "He utterly distrusted," he said, "Elizabeth's intention to be at any charges for the affairs of Scotland; his own peril was great and imminent; yet, had he been backed by England, he would have adventured to beard his enemies, and to have retained the country at the devotion of the queen. It was too late now; and to save himself from ruin, he would be driven to means which could be profitable to neither of the realms, and were much against his heart."‡

With regard to the alleged conspiracy for the abduction of the king, Bowes had considerable difficulty in arriving at any certain conclusion. The king himself was at first extremely reserved on that subject; and it was not until the ambassador had, in the course of repeated interviews, insinuated himself into the king's favour and confidence, that he could obtain through that channel any such information as he was in quest of. At last, however, Bowes partially succeeded in

* MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. vi., fol. 25, Bowes to Burghley and Walsingham, 3rd May, 1580; Stirling; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 58.

† MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. vi., fol. 31, Bowes to Burghley and Walsingham, 10th May, 1580, Stirling.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bowes to Walsingham, 2nd August, 1580.

overcoming the king's scruples; and from sundry particulars communicated by his majesty, it appeared that a conspiracy had actually been on foot, but for a very different purpose from that which rumour had assigned to it. Its real object was the overthrow of Morton, the dismissal of Mar and others of that party, and an entire remodelling of the king's council, under the leadership of Lennox and Argyle. It was moreover in contemplation to introduce into the council Sir John Seton, Sir George Douglas, and other attached servants of the captive queen. This intelligence confirmed Bowes in the suspicion that Lennox, as originally surmised, was actually an agent of the house of Guise, and that he had succeeded in gaining over the young king to the French party.*

With a view to counteract the influence of Lennox, and if possible to bring back the king under English influence, the ambassador sought a private interview with the king, on a subject of great delicacy and importance—the succession to the throne of England. The particulars of this interview were detailed in a letter written in cipher, and addressed by Bowes probably to Burghley or Walsingham, for the address having been lost it is impossible to determine with certainty. Of the authenticity of the letter itself, however, there is not the slightest doubt. "In private with the king," he says, "I have offered to acquaint him with a secret greatly importing him and his estate, and lately discovered to me by letters, which were not out of the way in case he should desire sight thereof; and, taking his honour in pledge for the secrecy, which he readily tendered, I opened to him at large all the contents specified in the cipher note last sent to me, and to be communicated to him, persuading him earnestly to beware that he made not himself the cause of greater loss to him than France, Scotland, or Lennox could countervail. He appeared here to be very much perplexed, affirming that he would both most chiefly follow her majesty's advice, and also ask and require her counsel in all his great adocs. * * * In which good resolution and mind I left him; wherein, with good company and handling, I think he may be well continued. But Lennox having won great interest in him, and possessing free and sure access to him at all times, * * * I dare not therefore assure, in his tender years, any long continuance or sure performance of this promise."†

The ambassador's misgivings turned out to be well founded: the influence of Lennox proved more than a counterpoise to the lures of Elizabeth and the efforts of Bowes, and became daily more and more predominant.

In the meantime Morton, alarmed at the danger by which he and his party were threatened, applied as a last resource to Elizabeth. She immediately sent instructions to Sir Robert Bowes, who had recently been recalled from Scotland, and was then at Berwick, to return to the Scottish court without delay, to accuse Lennox of practices tending to disturb the peace of the two kingdoms, and to insist in her name on his instant removal from the council. Bowes obeyed; but such an extraordinary demand being considered by the council as an insult to the king, and an encroachment on the independence of the kingdom, they affected to doubt his powers, and desired him to produce his commission. This he refused to do to any except the king himself, who, on learning the nature of his instructions, refused to admit him to an audience. The ambassador retired in disgust without taking leave, and the court, surprised, and probably in some degree alarmed at his abrupt departure, sent Sir Alexander Home to expostulate with Elizabeth on the subject. The English queen, however, indignant at the treatment which her ambassador had received, and which she considered as an affront to herself, refused to admit Home into her presence, but referred him to her treasurer, Lord Burghley, to whom he was ordered to impart his commission. Burghley courteously apologised to Home for his having been refused an audience of her majesty, assuring him that this was very far from proceeding from any disrespect to him individually; but at the same time declaring that the queen was highly displeased at the treatment of her ambassador, in having his commission doubted, in being required to exhibit his instructions, and denied admittance into the presence of the king. This indignity, however, he added, he was far from imputing to the king personally, who might well be excused on account of his youth and inexperience, but to the pernicious advice of bad counsellors, by whom he was misled, and who had abused his confidence. He then commenced an enumeration of what he considered to be important services rendered by his mistress to the king. She had watched over him from his cradle, she had placed the crown on his head, and had laboured to defeat the machinations of his enemies; and he recommended the ambassador to advise his master to beware of sacrificing the friendship or rejecting the counsel of so powerful an ally, who had ever regarded him with a mother's tenderness, through the influence of an inexperienced young man, a Frenchman by birth, married to a French woman, and at heart a Papist, who had in view his own aggrandizement, and hoped, now that the Hamiltons were in disgrace and exile, to be declared next heir to the crown. The ambassador commenced his reply by assuring Burghley that the intelligence of the young king was remarkable for his years, and that his affection and devotedness to the queen were great, as he could easily convince her majesty, if he were honoured with an audience. To this Burghley answered, that it was in vain to speak of an audience, as the queen had determined not to see him; and as to the intelligence of the king, he had given no proof of it in reposing so much confidence in the counsel of a single individual, in opposition to that of so many tried and experienced friends.*

* Tytler, vol. viii. p. 60.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, original cipher and decipher. The letter contains proof that its date must be the 16th or 17th May, 1580. Tytler, vol. viii. p. 61.

On his return home, the ambassador reported his uncourteous reception at the English court, and the unpleasant conference he had held with Burghley. All this was imputed to the agency of Morton, through his correspondence with the English government, and thus tended still farther to exasperate the hatred of his enemies and to hasten his downfall.

As a last resource, Elizabeth directed Bowes,

Elizabeth who had not yet left Edinburgh, threatens to de- though he had withdrawn from prive James of court,† once more to alarm the the succession. king regarding the succession.

He was instructed to assure him in strict secrecy, that if he continued to follow the counsel of Lennox, in preference to that of the English queen, his right to succeed to the throne of England would be abrogated by an act of parliament, and conferred on another. James, however, regarding this as an empty menace, showed no inclination whatever to discard his favourite; and the queen shortly afterwards recalled her ambassador, but directed him, before finally taking leave, to express to the king in strong terms her sense of his ingratitude. At this uncourtly interview the ambassador thus expressed himself:—"His royal mistress," he said, "was bitterly mortified to find that this was all the return for her care of James ever since his eradle. She had little expected to be treated with contempt, and to see promoted to credit and honour the very man against whom she had expressed so much suspicion and dislike; but hereafter he might find what it was to prefer a Duke of Lennox before a Queen of England."‡

James, now undisturbed by the remonstrances of his haughty relative, began to display a growing attachment to France. He entered into correspondence with his mother,§ and was persuaded by Lennox to unite with the courts of Rome, Paris, and Madrid, to secure her liberty.

The ruin of Morton, one of the bitterest enemies of Mary, was hastened by these events, and was now at hand. Lennox and his faction had long looked for some pretext to get rid of him; but he seemed to be so fenced round by his power, wealth, and influence, as to have no point left open to attack. The present opportunity was eagerly embraced of completing the alienation which had been long on the increase between him and the king. Nor was this difficult to accomplish. James had all along rather feared than loved him. Morton had taken no pains to ingratiate himself with the youthful sovereign; he had neglected the courtly arts of flattery; and his demeanour more resembled that of a tutor than a minister. A vulnerable point was at length thought of, by which this formidable minister might be assailed. In the deed of indemnity granted to him at the termination of his regency, no mention was made of one crime, with which before his accession to power he had been openly charged—namely, that he had been in some way accessory to the murder of Darnley. On this charge it was now determined to arraign him; and an accuser, whose reckless boldness rendered him equal to the task, was found in the person of Captain James Stewart, a man who was ready to embark in any enterprise, however hazardous, that seemed likely to lead to fortune and conciliate the royal favour. Stewart was a man of learning, and, being nearly connected with John Knox, who had married his sister, it is supposed had been at first destined for the Church; but his ambition, love of enterprise, and restless activity, prompted him to embrace another and a very different mode of life. He chose the profession of arms, which he pursued as a soldier of fortune in the wars of France and Sweden. His moral character was infamous in the extreme, his desire of power was great, and he was utterly unscrupulous as to the means he employed for attaining it.

With a view to secure the conviction and condemnation of Morton, it had been arranged that Sir James Balfour, who was then an exile in France, and who it was supposed had in his possession the bond for the murder of Darnley, should return secretly to Scotland, and overwhelm Morton at once by exhibiting that infamous document, with his signature attached to it.*

Morton had been warned of his danger, but with characteristic pride and obstinacy, refused to avail himself of the opportunity to escape; and at the next meeting of the council took his place as usual at the board where the king presided. They had not been long assembled when the usher entered, and announced that Captain James Stewart was at the door, and solicited an audience on business of great and urgent importance. He was immediately admitted, when, falling down on his knees before the king, he said—"My duty to your highness has brought me here to reveal a wickedness that has been too long obscured. It was Morton accused that man (pointing to Morton), before the council. now sitting at this table, a place he is unworthy to occupy, that conspired your royal father's death. Let him be committed for trial, and I shall make good my words."† Amidst the excitement caused by this extraordinary scene. Morton seemed to retain his wonted firmness and composure. Rising from his seat, he for a moment regarded his accuser with a scornful and contemptuous smile; then, turning towards the king, "I know not," he said, "by whom this informer has been set on, and it were easy for one of my rank to refuse all reply to so mean a person; but I stand

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. pp. 39, 40; Robertson, vol. ii. pp. 63, 64.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 473.

‡ Original draft, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Bowes, 7th October, 1580; Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 65, 66.

§ Original Letter, State Paper Office, James VI. to Mary Queen of Scots, 29th January, 1580-1.

* Tytler, vol. viii. p. 63.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bowes to Walsingham and Burghley, 1st January, 1580-1; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 68.

upon my innocence—a fear no trial. The rigour with which I have prosecuted all suspected of that murder is well known; and when I have cleared myself, it will be for your majesty to determine what they deserve who have set this perjured tool of theirs to accuse me.” Stewart, who remained still on his knees, retorted with great warmth. “It is false, utterly false!” he exclaimed, “that any one has instigated me to make this accusation. A horror for the crime, and zeal for the safety of my sovereign, have been my only counsellors; and as to his pretended zeal against the guilty, let me ask him where has he placed Archibald Douglas, his cousin? That most infamous of men, who was an actor in the tragedy, is now a senator, promoted to the highest seat of justice, and suffered to pollute that tribunal, before which he ought to have been arraigned as the murderer of his prince.”* Having uttered these words he sprang to his feet, and Morton laying his hand on his sword, a conflict would probably have ensued, had not Lords Lindsay and Cathcart interposed to prevent it. The king ordered them both to be removed; and the justice clerk, who sat at the council-table, having declared that according to the law a person accused of treason must instantly be warded, the council,

Is committed after a brief consultation, ordered for trial. Morton to be committed. He was at first confined in one of the apartments of the palace, from which he could without much difficulty have made his escape;† but, though strongly urged by his friends to do so, he firmly refused, declaring “that he would rather die ten thousand deaths than betray his innocency in declining trial.”‡ Two days afterwards he was removed to the Castle of Edinburgh, of which Alexander Erskine was then governor, and shortly afterwards to that of Dunbarton, where he was committed to the custody of Lennox, who, as we have seen, had been entrusted with the command of that fortress. A warrant was also issued for the arrest of Archibald Douglas, who was then residing with his lady at the Castle of Mortram; but George Douglas, younger, of Langniddry, having been apprised of the circumstance, hastened to give him warning with such precipitation as to destroy two horses by the way. Archibald instantly fled to England, and escaped just in time to save himself from the clutches of Alexander Hume of Manderton, who had been entrusted with the warrant for his apprehension, and who arrived at the castle about five o’clock the following morning.§

The news of the accusation and imprisonment of Morton, who had so largely contributed to the maintenance of the English influence in Scotland, gave great uneasiness to Elizabeth. Without loss of time she dispatched Randolph as her ambassador into Scotland, with instructions to remonstrate strongly with the king, and ordered Lord Hunsdon, the governor of Berwick, to assemble a body of troops and march across the Borders.*

The ambassador, who reached the capital on the 18th of January, found to his dismay that there scarcely remained an English party there. On the contrary, the alliance with England had become so odious to the great body of the people that he considered his life in danger, and wrote to Walsingham, who had given him in his despatches merely the title of envoy, requesting that he should be addressed as ambassador, in order that the respect due to that rank might protect him from outrage.† Nor did he find the nobility in general more favourable. All were either decidedly hostile, or were shy and distrustful, with the single exception of the Earl of Angus, who was ready to risk life and fortune in defence of his kinsman. The great bulk of the nobles were watching the course of events before declaring themselves, and in particular looked for some more substantial proof than mere words of Elizabeth’s sincere intention to support them, in the event of their actively engaging to promote the object of Randolph’s mission. They had already witnessed so many examples of her double and treacherous policy, in deserting in their hour of peril those whom she had artfully induced to espouse her cause, that she had entirely lost their confidence. Randolph’s application to the king was even less satisfactory. Instead of His interview conciliating him, he had in the first with the king. instance given him great offence by studiously avoiding all communication with Lennox.‡ In vindication of this part of his conduct, he charged Lennox with being an agent of the Pope and of the house of Guise, and with carrying on a secret correspondence with the enemies of both kingdoms; and in proof of these charges he offered to produce an intercepted letter from the Bishop of Ross to the Pope, which would fully satisfy the king as to their truth. James warmly repelled the accusation as utterly false. Lennox, he said, was an honourable man, and, being his near kinsman, had come to visit him from motives of affection; and with regard to the intercepted letter, if there really existed any such document, it was either a forgery or was concocted by the Bishop of Ross for Lennox’s ruin. “The bishop’s character,” he added, “is well known: he is my declared traitor and rebel; a favourer and kinsman of the Hamiltons, the mortal foes of the house of Lennox; and no one would be more likely than Beaton to think his labour well bestowed, if, by his letters and intrigues, he might cause me to suspect and discard my kinsman, who has embraced the true religion, and is zealous for my honour and interest. On this head,” he continued, “the duke is anxious for the

* Spottiswood, p. 310.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 481.

‡ Aikman’s Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 42.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 481, 482.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Randolph, 8th January, 1580-1; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 70.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Randolph to Walsingham, 22nd January, 1580-1; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 71.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Randolph to Walsingham, 22nd January, 1580-1, Edinburgh, Sunday; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 71.

fullest investigation, and will refuse no manner of trial to justify himself from so false a slander; and as to the trial of Morton, my good sister cannot be more solicitous on that head than I myself. But what would she have? Can she complain that a man accused in my own presence of the murder of my father has been imprisoned till the evidence be collected against him? or is it reasonable to be angry because the day of trial is not fixed, when she is aware that Archibald Douglas, a principal witness, has fled into England, and that till the Queen of England delivers him up, Morton cannot possibly be arraigned?"*

These pointed remarks, to which the ambassador appears to have made little reply, left him small ground to hope for the success of this part of his mission. Elizabeth and her ministers had at first assumed a high and menacing tone, as if resolved

Elizabeth threatens to invade Scotland. The country was threatened with invasion; † the king was warned to beware of the fate of his predecessors; ‡ and the life of the Queen of Scots, it was declared, should be forfeited, if that of Morton were not spared. §

Notwithstanding the threat of invasion, Hunsdon was in no haste to make preparations, and no English troops were led across the Borders. Elizabeth was not disposed to risk a war between the two kingdoms in defence of Morton; and, though lavish in her threats, she refused to grant any aid in the shape of money. Meantime Lennox and his faction were preparing for the national defence with the utmost activity, and the whole military force of the kingdom was ordered to be ready to repel the invading army of the English. In addition to the feudal militia, who in cases of emergency were bound to serve at their own expense, great numbers of hired, or as they were called "waged soldiers," were enlisted for the protection of the king's person, and supplies for carrying on the war with England were voted by the three Estates of the realm.

Randolph, having been unable to make on the king any impression favourable to the object of his mission, now addressed himself to the parliament.

He made his appearance personally before that body, and in a speech which lasted for two hours, he enumerated and dwelt upon many of the benefits which the king and kingdom of Scotland had derived from the friendship of his royal mistress, and the alliance that had subsisted between the two nations, and accused Lennox of intriguing to disturb these amicable relations, to the great danger and detriment of both kingdoms. Elizabeth, he said, without demanding any territorial advantages for herself, had, at a great expense of blood and treasure, rescued the Scots from the thralldom of the French alliance, and established the true religion amongst them; she had ever warmly espoused the cause of the king, and had been mainly instrumental in placing and retaining the crown upon his head; and she had, with their co-operation, defeated all the machinations of popish princes, who had sought to deprive them of their ancient rights, to abolish amongst them the Protestant form of worship, and bring them under subjection to the See of Rome. Notwithstanding all this, he said, the queen his mistress had of late observed with concern an unusual coldness and apparent alienation in the Scottish Council, which she could ascribe to no other cause than to the mischievous interference of Lennox, who, as he was ready to prove by an intercepted letter from the Bishop of Ross, had come to Scotland as an agent of the Pope and the house of Guise, for the purpose of alienating the mind of the king from the friendship with England, subverting the Protestant establishment, and, by means of an alliance with France, re-establishing popery. That this person, a foreigner, and profoundly ignorant as to the real condition of the country, was allowed to direct the counsels of the king, and had abused that power and influence which he had done nothing to deserve, in seeking to displace the king's tried and faithful servants to make room for his own adherents; and, in particular, not content with having effected the removal of the Earl of Morton from the council, he was now engaged in conspiring the absolute ruin of that nobleman, who had so long laboured to promote the king's interest, to resist the encroachments of popery, and to preserve the blessings of the English alliance. He therefore called upon the parliament, in the name of his mistress, the Queen of England, to interfere for the removal of such a pernicious counsellor from the presence of the king, to protect Morton from the malice of his enemy, and to secure for him a fair and impartial trial. He added, that if force should be necessary for the accomplishment of these ends, he had authority from his mistress to promise them such assistance in men or money as they might require.*

These exertions on the part of Randolph proved as unsuccessful with the parliament as his previous efforts had been with the king. Lennox denied the truth of the accusations brought against him, demanded a full investigation into his conduct, and defied his enemies to the proof; and parliament proceeded to vote a supply of forty thousand pounds for the maintenance of the war with England.†

Thus a second time disappointed, Randolph had now recourse to that species of intrigue in which he was probably the most accomplished master of the age. He endeavoured secretly to organise a faction, consisting of the friends of Morton and all

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, the King of Scots and his Council's answer to Mr. Randolph, 7th February, 1580-1.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Hunsdon to Randolph, 3rd February, 1580-1.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Leicester to Randolph, 15th February, 1580-1.

§ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Randolph, 9th February, 1580-1; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 73.

* Robertson, vol. ii. pp. 66, 67.

† Tytler, vol. viii. p. 74.

who regarded the favourite with envy or jealousy, with the view of employing force, if other means should fail, to seize on the person of Lennox, or even to put him to death by some sudden and open attack. This measure was in fact a part of Randolph's secret instructions.* In this way, if by no other, it was hoped that the king would be secured to the English party, and finally detached from such counsellors as might induce him to prefer a French to an English alliance, or to seek the liberation of the captive queen.

With such activity and zeal did Randolph labour

Conspiracy to mature this seditious scheme against Lennox. that, in a very short time, an association for carrying it into effect was formed amongst the nobles. Their design, as described by Bowes in a letter addressed to Leicester, was to seize the person of the king and arrest or murder Lennox, according to circumstances. "Albeit," he said, "the levy of the forces newly assembled in Edinburgh and elsewhere, and the planting themselves about the king to guard his person against suspected surprise or violence, doth greatly threaten the stay or defeat of the purposes intended, whereof I know your lordship is advertised; yet I am in good hope that, if any opportunity be found, the parties associate will with good courage attempt the matter." In reply to this, Elizabeth signified her approbation of an attempt being made to "surprise" Lennox, provided it were executed at a time when he was separated from his young master; but would not consent to any violence being offered to the king himself.†

The plot was now ripe for execution. The conspirators had succeeded in corrupting some of the king's household, and, through their means, had obtained duplicates of the keys of the king's private apartments. Their plan was to enter the palace as secretly as possible, to seize the person of the king, and convey him to England, and to put Lennox, Argyle, and Montrose to death.‡ At the same time an association was formed, having for its object the rescue of Morton from his captivity, the principal actors being the Earls of Angus and Mar. The conspiracy was conducted with the utmost secrecy, all the arrangements having been concocted between Randolph and Angus, at meetings held by night, frequently in the fields. One of the chief conspirators was the Laird of Whittingham, brother to Archibald Douglas; and four confidential servants of Morton were engaged in the plot, and made acquainted with the most secret intentions of the association. Lord Hunsdon, who was also a party to the conspiracy, held an army in readiness at Berwick to march across the Borders the moment he received intelligence of the king's seizure, this being the signal agreed on between him and the leaders of this daring enterprise. The arrangements having been completed, nothing now remained but to carry the plot into execution, when Lennox received a hint which led to the discovery of the whole secret. Suspicion having fallen on Douglas of Whittingham, The conspiracy he was seized by Lennox, and the is defeated.

mere threatening of the rack proved sufficient to extort from him a full revelation of the conspiracy. Morton's servants, Fleck, Nesbit, Reid, and Jordan, were also arrested and put to the torture, and Angus was banished beyond the Spey. Randolph, who had for some time been so extremely unpopular that he was not only daily assailed with libels, but was actually in danger of assassination, finding his dark machinations now thoroughly exposed, fled precipitately by Flight of night from the capital, and took Randolph.

refuge in Berwick. Sir John Seton was immediately dispatched after him, with instructions to complain of his conduct, and to remonstrate against the concentration of troops on the Scottish Borders; but he was not allowed to proceed beyond Berwick. At the moment, however, when war seemed most imminent, Elizabeth, who had never any intention of embroiling the two kingdoms on account of Morton, finding all her efforts to save him by means of threats and intrigue unavailing, ordered Hunsdon to withdraw his troops, and recalled her ambassador.*

The utter failure of all these exertions in favour of Morton naturally tended to strengthen the hands of his enemies, and to render his situation more hopeless than ever. The arrogance and malignity of Stewart, his accuser, were now increased tenfold; and he even threatened vengeance against those who had instigated him to enter on the enterprise, if they should fail to prosecute it to the utmost extremity, declaring that if they "did not make an end of the old tyrant, he would soon make an end of them."† As is usual in such cases, the few friends still remaining to Morton began gradually to desert a cause which they deemed hopeless; and the nobles and others whose assistance had been purchased by Elizabeth, finding that she herself had at last abandoned the fallen minister to his fate, followed her example, and consulted their own safety by a reconciliation with the opposite party.

In the meantime, Captain Stewart continued to rise in the favour of the king, who Stewart created Earl of Arran. bestowed on him the vacant title of Earl of Arran. Shortly afterwards the new peer received a commission, in conjunction with Montrose, to convey Morton from

* MS. Instructions to Mr. Randolph, 6th January, 1580-1; also Memorial for Secret Objects; Caligula, c. vi. 104—106.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 14th March, 1580-1, Bowes to Leicester; also MS. British Museum, Harleian, 6990, fol. 479; Original draft, Walsingham to Hunsdon, 15th March, 1580-1.

‡ MS. Harleian, copy of the time, Randolph to Hunsdon, 20th March, 1580-1.

* Tytler, vol. viii. p. 78.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 11th January, 1580-1, Bowes to Lord Burghley and Sir Fr. Walsingham; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 78.

Dunbarton Castle to Edinburgh. In the execution of this mission they were attended by a band of their friends and dependents, and an escort of soldiers both horse and foot.* When Morton, who had not heard of Stewart's advancement, was shown the commission, he started as he read the words "James, Earl of Arran," and eagerly exclaimed, "The Earl of Arran! who is that? The Earl of Arran is dead."—"Not so," was the reply, "that title is now held by Captain James Stewart."—"Is it so?" said he, "then indeed all is over; and I know what I must look for."† On the 27th May the party reached Edinburgh with their prisoner, who was warded, under a strong guard, in the house of Robert Gourlay; and few or none were permitted to have access to him.‡

In these trying circumstances, and with the almost certain prospect of the awful doom that awaited him, Morton behaved with calm, undaunted courage. It is said that during his imprisonment, which had now continued for about five months, he had expressed deep contrition for the crimes into which he had been drawn by his inordinate ambition and love of power, deplored the indulgence in sinful pleasures by which his private life had been stained, and employed much of his time in the study of the sacred Scriptures.§

On the day of trial, the 1st of June,|| extraordinary precautions were taken in anticipation of an attempt to rescue Morton. Two bands of soldiers were stationed at the Cross, and two above the Tolbooth, within which the trial was to take place; and a third body of troops, together with a number of armed citizens, was drawn up along the principal street, so as to ensure his safe conveyance from his lodgings to the Tolbooth.¶

The indictment, which is now lost, consisted of numerous counts or charges, some of them too trivial to incur the punishment of death, others probably fabricated from distorted facts. Nineteen of these have been preserved in Mr. John Davidson's Memorials. Before the trial commenced, however, a message arrived from the king, commanding the court to pass from all the charges except the "foreknowledge and concealing of the king's father's murder."†† The jury, which consisted of his avowed enemies, included Argyle, Chief-Justice, Montrose, Sutherland, Rothes, Glenearn, Ogilvie, Maxwell, Seton, Wemyss, Wauchton, Dairsie, and Loehinvar;‡‡ and although he challenged several of them, particularly Argyle and Seton, his objections were overruled, and these noblemen were retained upon his assize.

The illegality and manifest injustice of this procedure at once convinced Morton that his doom was sealed. "I saw," he said, in the conference which subsequently took place between him and Mr. John Durie and Mr. Walter Balcalquhall, "so partial dealing against me, that it had been all alike to me, if I had been as innocent as Saint Stephen, as if I had been as guilty as Judas. For I perceived plainly that there was nothing but my life sought, howsoever it had been, which appeared in this, that no exception against any person that was to pass upon mine assize could avail. For I required the Earl of Argyle to purge himself of partial counsel given to the pursuer my accuser. He purged himself indeed, but I know the contrary, that he gave partial counsel to him. Likewise the Laird of Wauchton, the Lord Seton, and such others, who were known to be my enemies, notwithstanding any lawful exception, were put upon my assize. In consideration whereof, I cannot be persuaded of a thing which it behoved me to communicate to you, and it is this: I perceive it is not my life only that they are seeking; but they who are the authors of my death had some other purpose in hand, which they perceived could not goodly be done, unless I and such others who favour the good cause were taken out of the way. And therefore I cannot but suspect that I have been so handled, and such as hereafter shall be put at, that they may have a more patent way to do their turn; and I pray God, that ye that are to live behind me see not the practice thereof. But I fear it sore."* As the records of the Justiciary Court, containing the particulars of the trial, have been lost, we are left in the dark as to the nature and extent of the evidence produced; but it is known that Arran, in order to extort evidence, put several of Morton's domestics to the torture, and treated them with savage cruelty.† No direct or reliable proof, however, was probably produced to convict him of actual participation in the murder. The evidence of Sir James Balfour, which, it was hoped, would of itself have been sufficient to establish Morton's guilt completely broke down, as he either had not in his possession, or would not produce, the bond for the murder of Darnley.‡ That Morton had foreknowledge of the crime and concealed it, he himself admitted, both at his trial and subsequently; but, in justification of this, he pleaded extenuating circumstances which ought to have had great weight with the court. In the conference held after his condemnation with Mr. John Durie and Mr. Walter Balcalquhall, it was said to him, "Apparently, my lord, ye cannot justly complain of the sentence that is given against you, seeing that with your own mouth ye confess the foreknowledge and concealing of the king's murder, of which two points only ye should not be able to abide the law." He answered, "I know that to be true, indeed. But yet they should have considered the danger that the revealing of it would have brought me to at that time; for I

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 556.

† Spottiswood, p. 213.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 556.

§ Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 79, 80.

|| Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 557; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 80.

¶ Ibid.

 Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 557, 558.

†† Ibid.

‡‡ Ibid.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 567.

† Robertson, vol. ii. p. 81.

‡ Tytler, vol. viii. p. 80.

durst not have revealed it for fear of my life. For at that time whom to should I have revealed it? To the queen? She was the doer thereof. I was minded, indeed, to the king's father, but I durst not for my life; for I knew him to be such a bairne [child] that there was nothing told him but he would reveal it to her again. And therefore I durst in no wise reveal it. * * * I foreknew indeed and concealed, because I durst not reveal it to any creature for my life."* The jury found him

He is found guilty of the foreknowledge and guilty. concealing, in terms of his own confession; but as "concealing" did not seem to imply such an amount of criminality as participation, the words "art and part" were added at the suggestion, it is said, of Arran and Montrose.† The terms are the same as are still employed in the law of Scotland. He was declared, "convicted of counsel, concealing, and being art and part in the king's murder." On hearing the words "art and part," Morton, who had during the trial manifested little or no emotion, became much agitated, and, striking the table repeatedly with a small staff which he usually carried, he exclaimed with great vehemence, "Art and part! art and part! God knows it is not so." He was condemned, according to the barbarous custom of the time, to be beheaded, drawn and quartered. The more odious and disgusting part of the sentence was, however, remitted by the king, who appointed that he should suffer death next day by decapitation.‡

During the awful interval betwixt his sentence and execution, Morton is said to have manifested unusual composure of mind. He felt, he said, a serenity to which he had long been a stranger. He supped with apparent cheerfulness, and slept calmly until about three in the morning. He then rose, and after writing for three or four hours, lay down again. In the morning he dispatched a messenger with a letter to the king, who, however, refused either to read it or hear it read; but, as Calderwood informs us, "ranged up and down the floor of his chamber, clanking with his finger and his thumb."§ Shortly after, he was visited by some of the ministers of the city, when that long and interesting conference ensued to which we have already referred, and an account of which has been preserved, drawn up by Mr. John Durie and Mr. Walter Balcalquhall, and attested by all who were present.||

In regard to his prospects for eternity, he expressed himself full of confidence and joy. "As concerning all the glory," he said, "I had in this world, I care not for it, because I am persuaded now that all the honours, riches, friends, pleasures, and whatsoever I had in the world, is but vanity. And as concerning the estate whereunto now I am brought, I thank God for it; and am at this point, that I am content rather to render my life than to live, because I know, that as God has appointed a time for my death, so hath he also appointed the manner thereof. And, therefore, seeing now is the time, and this is the manner that best pleaseth my God to take me, I am content; and as for my life in this world, I care it not a penny, in respect of that immortal and everlasting joy which I look for, and whereof I am assured." And being desired, in the name of God, not to stand in defence of his own innocence, but plainly to confess his sins to God's glory, and to think however man had acted towards him, yet in the sight of God he was worthy of all he was about to suffer and much more, he answered, "However it be that men have done, I remit them to God and their own conscience. But I acknowledge, indeed, that God hath always done justly to me, and not only justly, but mercifully also, because I acknowledge myself, of all sinners, to have been one of the greatest; a filthy abuser of my body in the pleasures of the flesh, given over much to the world, and pleasures thereof, and such other sins as God might justly lay to my charge; and that I expressed not the fruits of my profession in my life and conversation. And therefore I beseech God to be merciful to me. And indeed now I acknowledge the great mercy of God in this, that among all the benefits he hath bestowed upon me, this is one of the chief, that in this, my last trouble, he hath given me space and leisure to repent my sins and to be at a point with my God. In which trouble also I have found greater comfort than ever I could have found before, because thereunto I had concluded with myself, that if God should have spared my life and delivered me out of this trouble, that then I should have cast away all the cares of the world, the pleasure of the same, and delight of all earthly things, and dedicated myself hereafter to serve my God in all kind of quietness and simplicity. And if it should please God to take me in this trouble, I had concluded to be content therewith also, being always assured of the mercies of God. And, therefore, now I thank God that now I find me at this point, that I am rather content to die than live, and that I shall not see the miseries to come; for I will assure you, that I think this to be the most acceptable time that ever God could have taken me. For I perceive and foresee such miseries and confusion to ensue, that I thank God I shall not see them; and ye who fear God and live behind me, when as ye shall see these, ye shall wish of God to be where I shall be, that is with him."

With respect to the crime for which he was about to suffer, he freely repeated his confession of foreknowledge and concealment, but solemnly denied that he had been consenting to it, or was in any manner a party in its commission. He declared that on his return from England, whither he had been banished on account of his concern in the murder of Riccio, in coming from Wedderburne to Whittingham he met the Earl of Bothwell, when he first informed him of the plot for the murder of

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 561, 562.

† Ibid., pp. 558, 559.

‡ Spottiswood, p. 314; Crawford's Memoirs, p. 332.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 559.

|| Ibid., pp. 559—573; Bannatyne's Memorials, Bannatyne Club Edition, p. 317.

the king, and requested him to take part in it, as it was the queen's wish that Darnley should be taken out of the way; that he firmly refused "to meddle with the matter," and that, on being still further urged by Bothwell, he desired him to produce a warrant in the handwriting of the queen, when he would give him a final answer; but that such a warrant had never been furnished, and that, even if it had, he purposed to have banished himself again, and "turn his back upon Scotland until he had seen better." On being asked concerning the manner of the king's death, or whether he was acquainted with any of the secrets connected with the murder, his answer was, "As I shall answer to God, I know no more secret in that matter than I have already told, and heard by the depositions of such as have already suffered for it, which depositions are yet extant."

It is difficult to doubt the sincerity of these solemn asseverations, made by a man standing on the verge of eternity, and who had no longer any motive for concealment. Morton's life had indeed been stained by many crimes, some of them no less atrocious, but history must do him the justice to acquit him of any active participation in that for which he suffered.

On being questioned concerning the alleged poisoning of the Earl of Atholl, he answered, "Let God never be merciful to me if ever I knew anything of that matter, or heard of it, before I heard the common bruit of the country;" and on being asked if he had made any conspiracy against the Earl of Lennox, he answered, with like solemnity, "I never thought in my heart, nor purposed any conspiracy against the Earl of Lennox, nor minded ever to do him hurt, in body or otherwise."

Being reminded of his conduct towards the Church, his attempts to introduce episcopacy, and his obstructing in various ways the progress of the truth, when he might have done much good, both during his regency and since, he frankly admitted that he had done many things which he could not defend, but added, "As I shall answer to God, I did nothing in these matters either of contempt, malice, or otherwise; but if there was anything done amiss, it was of ignorance, and for lack of better knowledge, and if I had known better I would have done otherwise, and was now purposed, at last, to have helped them so far as I might."

The ministers remained with him until noon, after which he retired for a short time to his chamber. About two o'clock they returned, and dined with him, and remained with him until his execution. In a short time his keeper entered the apartment, and desired him to proceed to the scaffold. He seemed surprised, and replied, "Seeing they have troubled me this day over much with worldly matters, I supposed they should have given me this one night to have advised ripely with my God." His keeper answered, "All things are ready now, my lord, and I think they will not stay."—"I praise my God," said the earl, "I am ready also."

As he passed to the gate, on his way to the scaffold, he was met by Arran, who had been appointed to command the guards, and brought back to his chamber, where he was required to remain, until his confession should be put into writing, and subscribed by himself and the ministers present. Morton answered, with great calmness, "Nay, my lord, I pray you trouble me no more with these things, for now I have another thing to advise upon, that is, to prepare me for my God; seeing now I am at a point to go to death, I cannot write in the estate that I am now in. All these honest men can testify what I have spoken in that matter." Arran professed himself satisfied with this answer, but added, "Now, my lord, ye will be reconciled with me, for I have done nothing upon my particular against you." Morton answered, "It is no time now to remember upon quarrels; I have no quarrel to you or any other; I forgive you and all other, as I will all to forgive me."

He then proceeded, with a calm and undaunted mien, towards the scaffold, where Execution of he made a short but impressive Morton. speech to those around him. After briefly repeating his confession of having concealed his foreknowledge of the king's murder, suppressing, however, the name of his near relative, Mr. Archibald Douglas, who had been so deeply implicated in that crime, he said—"I testify before God that, as I have professed the Evangel which this day is taught and professed in Scotland, so also willingly I lay down my life in the profession thereof. And howbeit I have not walked according thereunto as I ought, yet I am assured God will be merciful to me; and I pray all good Christians to pray for me. And I charge you all, in the name of God, that are professors of the Evangel, that ye continue in the true profession, and maintain it to your power, as I should have done, God willing, with my lands, life, and all, if I had had days. Which, if ye do, I assure you God shall be merciful to you. But if ye do it not, be assured the vengeance of God shall light upon you, both in body and soul."* Mr. James Lawson, one of the ministers, then engaged in prayer, during which Morton lay with his face on the ground, sobbing and sighing aloud; and so great was his agitation, that his whole frame shook and his body rebounded from the earth. After prayer, he arose with a serene and even cheerful countenance, and having cordially shaken hands with his friends around him, and bidden them farewell, he knelt down, and, refusing to have his hands bound, calmly laid his neck on the block. While in this posture, Mr. James Lawson, stooping down, whispered in his ear some ejaculations, which Morton repeated after him with a firm voice, and as he pronounced the words "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" the axe fell and terminated his earthly career. The execution took place about four o'clock in the afternoon of Friday, the 2nd of June. The body, covered with an old cloak, lay on the scaffold till eight in the evening, when it was carried by common porters to the usual burial-place of criminals, and there interred. None of his friends durst attend it to the grave, or show their affection and respect by any outward token of grief. His head was fixed on the highest part of the Tolbooth, where it was suffered to remain, a public and revolting spectacle, for not less than eighteen months.* It was observed that Fernyhirst, who was known to have been pre-cognizant of the murder of the king, had placed himself in a window from which he could conveniently witness the execution, and that he appeared to take delight in the spectacle. Lord Seton also, and his two sons, were among the spectators; and so anxious were they to witness the sight, that they had taken the precaution to pull down a stair by which their view would have been interrupted.†

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 574.

On the same day, the Earl of Angus, in dread of being apprehended by those who had procured the death of his uncle, fled from Hawick to Carlisle, whence he soon after proceeded to court, where he was honourably received and hospitably entertained by Elizabeth.‡

On the day following Morton's execution, George Binning, a servant of Archibald Douglas, was executed as an accomplice in the king's murder; and his confession, if it may be credited, affords some insight into the circumstances attending that obscure transaction. He asserted that his master, then a dependent of the Earl of Bothwell, was present at the perpetration of the murder, and in his hurry and confusion lost one of his slippers; that when he came home his clothes were begrimed with clay; and that as he himself was making his escape, he encountered in a dark lane several persons with their heads muffled up, so that he could not discern their countenances, but that he heard one of them speak, and thought from the voice that he was a brother of Sir James Balfour.§

The death of Morton was soon followed by fresh troubles and alarms. As that event left Lennox and Arran without a rival, they, by means of their influence over the king, wielded for a time the whole power of the state. One consequence of this was soon discernible in an increase of French influence, and a revival of the hopes and intrigues of

Intrigues of the Roman Catholic party. the Roman Catholic party. imprisoned queen the death of Morton was a source of lively satisfaction; || and she once more began to entertain expectations of happier days. She had at first distrusted Lennox, but he had now acquired her confidence, and she opened up a correspondence with him; and although she had all along refused to give her son the title of king, and had induced the Romish princes of the continent to do the same, she now admitted that title; and the Duke of Guise following her example, wrote a letter in very friendly terms to James under that designation.* This change was obviously connected with a project which had been set on foot, by which it was proposed that James should resign the crown to his mother, and that she should then re-transmit it to him, and retire from the cares of government. Mary had not only consented to this project, but had entrusted the Duke of Guise with full powers to negotiate for its accomplishment.† This, however, it would appear, was only the ostensible part of a scheme which secretly aimed at changes far more important—namely, the restoration of popery, the deliverance of Mary from captivity, and her re-establishment on the throne of Scotland.‡ This scheme had been hatched by the Jesuits, concerted with Lennox, and even assented to by the king himself. It had further received the approbation of the Pope, the house of Lorraine proffered their zealous support, and the King of Spain promised military assistance.§

In the meantime, Mary's condition had become so deplorable as to justify strong measures on the part of her friends and herself for effecting her liberation. She had now been a prisoner for thirteen years, during the greater part of which she had been subjected to such rigorous confinement, and suffered so much from anxiety and disappointment, that her health was completely broken down and her spirit crushed. From the want of exercise, and the cold and inhospitable mansions that had been selected for her imprisonment, she had almost entirely lost the use of her limbs, and had to be carried by her servants in a chair or litter. In these distressing circumstances she applied to Elizabeth, pathetically entreating to be allowed the use of a coach, that she might have the benefit of a little fresh air and exercise by driving in the park of Sheffield Castle. She also requested the attendance of two additional female servants and two men-servants, which she felt to be necessary in her present feeble state; and solicited passports for Lady Lethington and Lord Seton, whose society might in some degree alleviate her solitude. These simple and reasonable requests, which common humanity would have required no persuasion to grant, were warmly seconded by Castelnau, the French ambassador, but were peremptorily refused by the relentless Elizabeth.||

Mary had still spirit enough left to feel strong indignation at this fresh instance of Elizabeth's cruelty, and for a moment to entertain a scheme of personal resentment. She hastily resolved to resign, in favour of her son, her right of succession to the English throne, with a hope that he would invade England, and with the help of the Roman

* MS. State Paper Office, B C, Scrope to Burghley, 18th August, 1581; also B C, same to same, 30th September, 1581; also MS. State Paper Office, Bowes to Burghley, 3rd October, 1581.

† Labanoff, vol. v. pp. 185—187.

‡ Mignet, vol. ii. pp. 207, 208.

§ Ibid.

|| Addition aux Mémoires de Castelnau, p. 519; Chalmers' Life of Mary, pp. 384, 388.

* Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 48.

† MS. Calderwood, British Museum, Ayscough, 4736, fol. 1153; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 84.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 576.

§ MS. Calderwood, British Museum, Ayscough, 4736, fol. 1156; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 84.

|| Labanoff, vol. v. pp. 264, 265.

Catholic powers of the continent, seconded by the discontented among the subjects of Elizabeth herself, involve in merited ruin her odious enemy. But this project, so fraught with danger to her own life, as well as to her son's succession, was on calmer thought abandoned. She, however, presented a memorial to the queen and the English parliament, requesting that she might be heard, by deputies of her own appointment, on the subject of her title.* She declared it was not on her own account that she preferred this request, as her constitution was now so much shattered that she could not reasonably expect to survive her sister, but solely on account of her son, whose rights she, as a mother, felt a natural anxiety to secure. She therefore earnestly entreated Elizabeth to listen to her petition, by recognising the right of her son to the succession, as a means of promoting the tranquillity and amity of the two kingdoms. This request, however, was one of the last that Elizabeth would be disposed to grant. It was part of the settled policy of her whole reign to leave this point undetermined; and accordingly the petition was rejected, apparently without receiving any serious consideration either from the queen or her ministers. It was in consequence of this disappointment, perhaps, more than from any other cause, that Mary was finally induced to throw herself on the assistance of France, when that project known in history by the name of "the Association" was formed, for the purpose of carrying out the scheme to which reference has just been made, for securing the acknowledgment of James's title as King of Scotland, as well as for other objects, which, in the absence of full and authentic information, have been but obscurely and doubtfully hinted at by historians.

Vague rumours of these projects getting into circulation, alarmed and agitated the minds of the Protestant party, as well as of the English faction, and were followed, as usual, by reports calculated to increase the consternation. Among others, it was said that the king was about to marry a princess of the house of Lorraine. The inconsistent conduct of Lennox tended to augment rather than allay these fears and suspicions. Though still professing an ardent desire to maintain friendly relations with England, his demeanour towards the Presbyterians was greatly changed. The ministers of the Kirk were treated with coldness and neglect; and it soon became evident that he had entered into the views of the king respecting episcopacy, and was prepared to support him to the utmost of his power in attempting to establish it as the national religion.

Shortly after Morton's execution, Arran, in fear of being some time called to account for his illegal and barbarous proceedings for the purpose of extorting evidence against that nobleman, made his appearance before the king in council, and acknowledged that he had not only tampered with Morton's servants, but had subjected some of them to the torture: he lamented, he said, the necessity he was under of resorting to such measures, and craved an act of approval from his majesty and the council. This of course, in their present temper, was easily obtained. An act was passed declaring his whole conduct honourable, and incapable of being called in question at any subsequent period.*

Arran, whose dissolute habits formed a prominent part of his character, had arrived at that advanced stage of profligacy when public opinion is set at defiance, and he now attracted the attention of the whole nation by a course of conduct which, even in that age, when a lax morality was rather the rule than the exception, excited universal horror and disgust. On his first arrival in Scotland, and before he had risen by royal favour to wealth, rank, or influence, he had been hospitably entertained at the residence of the Earl of March, to whom he became indebted for many acts of unmerited and disinterested kindness. Requiring, however, the friendly offices of his benefactor with base ingratitude, he seized the opportunity afforded by that familiar intercourse, to which he had been unsuspectingly admitted, to seduce the wife of his noble benefactor, a young and beautiful woman, but, as she probably deserved, described by historians of that time to be "intolerable in all the imperfections incident to her sex." Impatient of restraint, and regardless of even the outward semblance of decency, he next persuaded her, with a view to legitimize the coming offspring of their guilty passion, to sue for a divorce against her husband, on a ground which no woman even pretending to modesty would ever have assumed. Overawed by the influence and power of Arran, the court readily pronounced judgment of divorce; and immediately thereafter Arran and the countess were publicly married, with great pomp and solemnity.

Though these proceedings were beheld with abhorrence by men of all ranks, they seem to have excited no such sentiment in the king; on the contrary, the earldom of Arran, which Stewart had only received by gift, was now confirmed by a solemn investiture. At the same time Lennox was made a duke, the earldom of Orkney was conferred on the Earl of March, that of Gowrie on Lord Ruthven, and that of Morton on Lord Maxwell.† These marks of royal favour were no doubt conferred as a reward for the assistance rendered by their recipients in the overthrow of Morton.

In a parliament which now assembled, all the honours and immunities bestowed on Lennox and Arran were ratified and confirmed. No opposition appears to have been shown to this act; for as the king had previously intimated to the Earls of Mar, Eglinton, and Glencairn, and the Lords Lindsay, Boyd, Herries, and Ochiltree, that he would dispense with their presence, it is probable that none of the ad-

* Original record of Privy Council, in the Register-house, Edinburgh, 3rd June, 1581.

† Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 86, 87.

verse party were in attendance on this occasion.* At this meeting the adherents of the late Earl of Morton, including the Earl of Angus, Archibald Douglas of Whittingham; James Douglas, Prior of Pluscardine, and James Douglas of Pittendreich, two natural sons of Morton; Douglas of Parkhead; and Archibald Douglas, Constable of the Castle of Edinburgh, were declared rebels, and their estates were confiscated. In this parliament, the overweening presumption of Lennox met for once with a check from his master. Endeavouring to obtain a pardon for Sir James Balfour, as a reward for his assistance in bringing about the condemnation of Morton, James refused his request, referring him to those acts of parliament in which it was ordained that no person should ever be restored who had been implicated in the king's murder.† The existing statutes for the protection of the Church were confirmed by this parliament; an act was passed prohibiting the exportation of wool; another for the regulation of the coinage; and a sumptuary law, directed against certain extravagancies in dress, equipage, and entertainments, which had begun to prevail among the common people as they advanced in wealth, but which were viewed with great dissatisfaction by the nobility, as tending to obliterate those outward marks of distinction which they considered as belonging exclusively to their order.‡

Lennox and Arran had hitherto enjoyed the royal favour apparently without any feeling of rivalry; but at length Arran, in the pride of his newly acquired honours, and urged on by the extravagant ambition of his wife, could no longer bear to see the precedence universally accorded to Lennox, and accordingly took every opportunity of slighting or affronting him. This alienation was soon followed by an open rupture. At the opening of the parliament, Lennox, as chamberlain and captain of the guard, claimed the honour of carrying the crown before the king,§ which he insisted was part of the duties and privileges of his office; and Arran in consequence was so mortified that he withdrew, and absented himself from the meeting. This circumstance so irritated the king that he next day retired to Dalkeith, taking Lennox along with him, and prohibited Arran from coming near the court.|| Arran having in vain attempted to raise a party in the council against Lennox, was at last fain to purchase a reconciliation with his rival by most abject and humiliating submissions. The odium with which Arran was generally regarded was rather increased than diminished by his attempts during this rupture to ingratiate himself with the people. He feigned an extraordinary zeal for the reformed religion, paid court to the clergy, and strove to confirm the suspicion that Lennox was an emissary of the house of Guise and an agent of the Pope. As he was believed, in consequence of his former intimacy with the duke, to be well acquainted with such secrets, these insinuations naturally found credence with many.* While these dissensions continued, Arran and his countess were observed to attend sermons and prayers with great regularity, and pretended that they were excluded from court merely on account of their attachment to the Protestant faith.†

The reconciliation of the two favourites was a source of great disappointment to the nobility, who had hoped, in consequence of the rupture that had taken place, to regain their ascendancy in the king's council; but Lennox and Arran, forgetting their mutual differences, now combined to keep the king entirely in their own hands; and James, who was more devoted to amusement than to public business, willingly gave himself up to their guidance. Under such management, the manners of the court became shamefully licentious: it consisted almost entirely of persons of the most corrupted morals, who openly outraged the common decencies of life, and whose conversation consisted mostly of obscene jests and disgusting buffoonery. In such companionship, it is not to be wondered at that the king's morals became sadly debased—that the salutary lessons he had received from his sage tutors in early life were in great measure forgotten or disregarded—and even the language of his ordinary conversation acquired a taint from which it was never afterwards wholly free. At this time also, being estranged from his best counsellors, who had either retired in disgust, or were studiously kept at a distance, and adopting the maxims of inexperienced young men, who knew little of the real condition of the country, and who maintained themselves in favour by flattering his vanity, he imbibed those exalted notions of the royal prerogative which, being utterly inconsistent with the genius of a free people, ultimately proved ruinous to the house of Stewart.

At this period the civil history of Scotland began to assume a new phase; a contest, which continued to agitate and distract the country, more or less, during several succeeding reigns, having now commenced between the Church and the court. The Presbyterian form of church government has ever been adverse to the encroachments of despotic power, both on the jurisdiction of the Church itself and on the political rights and liberties of the people; and at this time especially the freedom of speech permitted from the pulpit, and of which many of the ministers now availed themselves in denouncing all manner of public grievances, in some measure answered the same purposes which are at the present day served by the freedom of the press. Lennox and Arran were not slow in per-

At this period the civil history of Scotland began to assume a new phase; a contest, which continued to agitate and distract the country, more or less, during several succeeding reigns, having now commenced between the Church and the court. The Presbyterian form of church government has ever been adverse to the encroachments of despotic power, both on the jurisdiction of the Church itself and on the political rights and liberties of the people; and at this time especially the freedom of speech permitted from the pulpit, and of which many of the ministers now availed themselves in denouncing all manner of public grievances, in some measure answered the same purposes which are at the present day served by the freedom of the press. Lennox and Arran were not slow in per-

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bowes to Burghley, 18th October, 1581.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B. C, Thomas Selby to Mr. Thomas Foster, 29th November, 1581; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 87.

‡ Ibid., p. 88.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 592.

|| Spottiswood, p. 315.

* Robertson, vol. ii. p. 84.

† Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 54.

ceiving this, and accordingly were ready to embrace any scheme by which the mouths of these troublesome advocates of popular rights, who had so often dragged their own misdeeds before the bar of public opinion, were most likely in their judgment to be effectually closed. For this purpose no plan appeared to them so feasible as that of bringing the ministers, by means of patronage, into subserviency to the state. Hence the preference given to episcopacy by the court at the period of which we write, and which has ever since been given by the abettors of despotic government. At this time indeed the bishops were so obsequious to the court, to which they owed their promotion, that their office was deemed by the people to be dangerous to civil liberty. Nor were they in greater favour with many among the nobility, who regarded with jealousy a class of men elevated from among the common people to a rank at least equal to their own, privileged like them to sit in parliament, and enjoying like them titular honours. The two favourites, however, in accordance with the known bias, if not in obedience to the express command of the king, determined to make an effort to revive episcopacy as it had been originally established at the Reformation; while the great body of the people, and the ministers, in their provincial synods and general assemblies, were resolved to resist it to the utmost of their power, and at all hazards, as indeed it had already, either expressly or by implication, been condemned as antisciptural by several assemblies.

The attempt to revive prelate brought the government into direct collision both with the clergy and the people. The church-courts directed the thunders of excommunication against all who should accept the office of a bishop; but these sentences were annulled by the royal authority, one of the leading ministers was imprisoned, and another was banished from the capital.

These encroachments upon the liberty and independent action of the Church, were accompanied and followed by a series of arbitrary and violent proceedings in civil matters, on the part of the two odious favourites into whose reckless hands the management of public affairs had been committed. Intoxicated by the possession of power, and grown wanton in its exercise, they had become obnoxious to all ranks of the community. In almost every county of the kingdom courts were held, which would appear to have been rather instruments of extortion than courts of justice. Before these the proprietors of land were summoned, and, on the least neglect or accidental omission of any of the numerous forms peculiar to feudal tenures, were fined with unprecedented and intolerable severity. The jurisdiction of the lord-chamberlain over the boroughs, which, as these had advanced in wealth and influence, had gradually become obsolete, was now revived, and "Chamberlain Ayres" were held, that—in the exercise of a power over which the highest courts in the kingdom had no control*—subjected the municipalities to unjust and grievous exactions. In addition to all these causes of discontent, the public mind was haunted by suspicions and anxieties respecting a design said to be on foot for dissolving the alliance with England, and agitated by rumours of the intrigues and progress of "the Association."

These accumulated evils were all traced to the machinations and wicked counsels of Lennox and Arran, as their source; and all who wished well to their country, and especially to the Protestant cause, earnestly desired the downfall of these odious ministers. That event was now at hand, although, secure in the possession of royal favour and support, they were the last to discover their own danger. A conspiracy was already formed to force the king to part with his favourites. The Scottish nobility had witnessed with increasing impatience and indignation the arrogance and presumption of two upstarts, who took precedence of them on all occasions, and so completely monopolised the king's confidence that his best friends and wisest counsellors were thrust aside, and no longer possessed the influence due to their rank and their former services. Elizabeth, also, who had been alarmed by the intrigues of Lennox and the house of Guise for the liberation of Mary and the restoration of popery, and had viewed with mortification the decline of English influence in Scotland, was ready to lend her countenance and aid to any scheme likely to effect the rescue of the king from these reckless and inexperienced advisers.

The leaders of the conspiracy, according to the custom of the times in such secret and dangerous enterprises, had drawn up a written "band," or agreement, declaring the object of their confederation, and binding themselves to stand or fall by each other in attempting its accomplishment. This contract was entitled "Form of the Band made among the noblemen that is enterprised against Dobany."† It set forth in strong terms the circumstances which had led to their association. These were declared to be "the dangers incurred by the professors of God's true religion; the intended overthrow of the Gospel by godless men, who had crept into credit with the king's majesty; the perversion of the laws; the wreck of the ancient nobility and the ministers of religion; the interruption of the amity with England; and the imminent peril of the king's person, unless some remedy were speedily adopted. Wherefore," it continued, "we have sworn in God's presence, and engaged by this 'band,' to punish and remove the authors of these intended evils, and to re-establish justice and good order, as we shall answer to the eternal

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 635. "Sundry of the brethren of Glasgow were summoned to this Ayre, for whom no relief under surety could be had, notwithstanding of suspension given by the Lords of Session."

† Caligula, c. vii., fol. 14, British Museum, a copy. By Dobany is meant D'Aubigny, i. e. Lennox. Tytler, vol. viii. p. 104.

God, and upon our honour, faith, and truth.* The names of the subscribers can be only imperfectly gleaned from contemporary letters and other scattered documents, as the original "band" has been lost, and the names are not given in the copy. There seems little doubt, however, that the Association comprised the Earls of Mar, Glencairn, Gowrie, Argyle, Montrose, Eglinton, and Rothes; the Lords Lindsay and Boyd; the Masters of Glamis and Oliphant; the titular Abbots of Dunfermline, Paisley, Dryburgh, and Cambuskenneth; and various other persons of distinction.† Among the clergy, the principal adversaries of Lennox were Lawson, Lindsay, Hay, Smeton, Polwart, and Andrew Melvil;‡ who, though they might not have been parties to the "band," seem to have been cognizant of it, and to have given it their approbation.§ The conspirators had not yet determined in what way their object was to be effected; but circumstances having transpired which led to the belief that some intimation of the conspiracy had reached the ears of the court, they were compelled, from a regard to their own safety, to proceed energetically with their enterprise, which it would thus have become doubly hazardous as well as disgraceful to abandon.

From a letter addressed by Bowes to Walsingham, and communicated to the associated lords, they learned with dismay that Lennox was fully cognizant of the plot formed against him and Arran, and had resolved on adopting bold and decisive measures to frustrate the designs of the conspirators.|| "I am informed," he says, "the duke intendeth to persuade the king's majesty to commit to ward the Earls of Glencairn and Mar, the Lords Lindsay and Boyd, and sundry other best affected in religion; * * * and also afterwards to hasten the death of the principals of them; whom I hear that he will not pursue for the death of David, the Italian (as from France ye have been advertised), but rather to charge them with late matter and conspiracy intended, and to have been put in execution by them and their complices in the last month of July, against the king and himself. And in case the information given me be true, then there is a secret intention and practice in device,—that after the execution of such principal persons in Scotland as would be most ready to defend religion, and the apprehension and safe custody of others known to be chiefly devoted that way, the alteration of that state in Scotland should be attempted; and the matter to reach into England so far and with such speed as the [confederates] who practise can perform." This information, which had been communicated by Bowes to the associated lords with a view to stimulate them to active and immediate exertion, had the effect desired.* They felt themselves placed in a position of the utmost peril, with scarce a moment to deliberate on their course of action. To stand still was certain destruction, to proceed was full of danger. But they were men equal to the occasion, and at once resolved to embrace an apparently favourable opportunity which now occurred of entering on their daring enterprise.

The king had been at Athole, enjoying his favourite pastime of the chase, and intended The Raid of to stop at Dunfermline on his way Ruthven. to Edinburgh. Here the associated lords had at first purposed to meet him, and present a supplication, setting forth the danger to which his majesty and the kingdom were exposed through the illegal and oppressive conduct of Lennox and Arran, and demanding their dismissal from the king's council; but, as the two favourites were not with the king, and he was attended by a slender train, it was feared that they might have arranged to meet him there with a retinue, and that thus the object of the conspiracy might be frustrated. But Gowrie, Glamis, and Lindsay, who had numerous retainers and friends in the neighbourhood of Perth, were desirous, if possible, to draw the king thither. Accordingly he was invited to stop at Gowrie's seat of Ruthven Castle, and as he had no suspicion that the invitation covered any secret design, he frankly accepted it. He had not been long there before Gowrie, Mar, Lindsay, and Glamis, had assembled a thousand men and surrounded the castle. The king, seeing an unusual concourse, and observing that he was surrounded by many faces he had not been accustomed to see, began to feel some alarm for his safety, or at least for his liberty. He had the tact, however, to conceal his uneasiness; and flattered himself with the belief that if any restraint were really intended, he should find an opportunity of liberating himself from it while engaged in the sports of the field. Next morning, however, as he was preparing to set out, a party of the nobles entered his bedchamber, and having removed his guards, presented their supplication, setting forth in bold and energetic language the grievances of which they complained, and concluding in these emphatic terms: "Sir, beholding these dangers to be imminent and at hand, without speedy help, and seeing your most noble person is in such hazard, the preservation whereof is more precious to us than our own lives; seeing also no appearance that your majesty was forewarned thereof, but like to perish before ye could perceive peril, we thought we could not be answerable to God, neither be faithful subjects to your highness, if, after our ability, we prevented not this pitiful disaster, and preserved your majesty from the same. For this effect, with all dutiful humility and obedience, we, your majesty's true subjects,

* Caligula, c. vii., fol. 14, British Museum, a copy; also MS. Calderwood, p. 1210; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 105.

† Tytler, vol. viii. p. 105; Aikman's Buchanan, vol. iii. p. 59; Robertson, vol. ii. p. 89.

‡ MS. Calderwood, fol. 1201.

§ Tytler, vol. viii. p. 108.

|| Bowes to Walsingham, 15th August, 1582; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 384.

* Original draft, Sir Robert Bowes to Walsingham, 25th August, 1582, Bowes' Letter-book; see also Woddrington to Walsingham, 19th July, 1582, Caligula, c. vii.; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 108.

are here convened; desiring your majesty, in the name of the eternal God, and for the love ye bear to his true religion, your country, and subjects, that, as ye would the tranquillity of your own estate, to retire yourself to such a part of your country, where your majesty's person may be most surely preserved and your nobility; where, under peril of our lands, lives, and heritages, your majesty shall see the disloyalties, falsehoods, and treasons of the persons foresaids,* with their complices, evidently proven and declared in their faces; to the glory of God, advancement of his true religion, your majesty's preservation, honour, and deliverance, pacifying of your perturbed commonweal and country, and to their perpetual ignominy, infamy, and shame."† Though James treated the noblemen present with great courtesy, and appeared graciously to listen to their remonstrance, he nevertheless could not conceal his anxiety to be gone; and, stepping towards the door of the apartment, he was intercepted by Glamis, who informed him that the lords then present considered it safer for his majesty to remain where he was. James insisted on instantly departing, but Glamis, placing his leg before him to prevent his egress, sternly commanded him to remain. James expostulated

Captivity of and entreated, and finally burst the king. into tears. Some of the lords, moved by the distress of the young monarch, remonstrated with Glamis, but he answered firmly, "No matter of his tears, better bairns weep than bearded men." This speech made such an impression on the mind of James that, it is said, it was never afterwards forgotten or forgiven.‡

Meanwhile, intelligence of the king's captivity had reached Arran in his retreat at Kinneil, about eighteen miles from Edinburgh; § and, without a moment's delay, he and his brother, Colonel Stewart, attended by a party of horse, hastened towards Ruthven. The latter, however, was intercepted by Mar and Lochleven, who attacked, defeated, and made him prisoner, after he had been severely wounded; || while Arran, who in his eager anxiety had, nearly

Imprisonment unattended, hastened to the spot by of Arran. a nearer way, was made prisoner and placed under a guard the moment he reached the castle; and had it not been for the humane interference of Gowrie, with whom he had formerly been connected in ties of friendship, his life would have fallen an immediate sacrifice to the fury of the conspirators, who were with difficulty restrained from ridding their country of a man whom they considered its greatest enemy. Without being permitted to see the king, he was afterwards sent a prisoner to Stirling Castle.

Lennox was surprised at Dalkeith, where he was then residing, ¶ by the news of these astounding events; but instead of hastening, like Arran, to the rescue of his master, he endeavoured to provide for his own safety by taking refuge in the capital, where he imagined he would be more secure. He found the city in a state of great excitement. The Protestant clergy, elated by the success of the associated lords, inveighed from the pulpit against the duke and Arran, and laboured to induce the people to make common cause with the leaders of the "Raid of Ruthven." The magistrates, on the other hand, anxious to allay the popular ferment, discountenanced the zeal of the clergy, and sent messengers to Ruthven to ascertain from the king's own mouth the truth or falsehood of his reported captivity.

As soon as Elizabeth had received intelligence of this revolution, she dispatched Sir George Carey to Scotland with orders to co-operate with Bowes in promoting the object of the associated lords, who had already received, both from Bowes and Walsingham, repeated assurances of the sympathy, and, if necessary, the active support of the English queen.

During this period of captivity, James affected a degree of calmness and submission which were far from his heart. He even laboured under the apprehension, which there is no reason to believe was well founded, that his life was in danger, and pondered over many schemes for effecting his escape and taking vengeance on the conspirators. He was however closely watched, and cut off from all communication with his favourites and their adherents.

Lennox, on this occasion, betrayed the feebleness and indecision of his character. He hesitated and procrastinated until the time for action was passed, and at length, after an unsuccessful attempt to rouse the inhabitants of Edinburgh to take up arms in defence of their sovereign, he sent Lord Herries and the Abbot of Newbottle to propose certain terms of accommodation, which however were scornfully rejected.* On the arrival of Herries and his companion at Stirling Castle, whither the king had been conveyed, and where he was still detained a prisoner† by Gowrie and his associates, they were not permitted to see the king except in presence of those who now acted as his council. Being introduced, "The Duke of Lennox," they said, "had sent them to inquire into the truth of a rumour, that his sovereign lord was forcibly detained in the hands of his enemies; for, if it were so, it was his duty to set him free, and with the assistance of his good subjects he would instantly make the attempt." Before Gowrie and his friends had time to reply, James, starting up, passionately exclaimed, "I am a captive! which I wish all my subjects to know, and earnestly desire the duke to use all his endeavours to procure me my liberty." The associated lords, though somewhat perplexed by this declaration, soon recovered their presence of mind, and, addressing his majesty with much apparent humility, besought him not to imagine

* Lennox and Arran.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 369, 640.

‡ MS. Calderwood, Ayscough, 4737, fol. 682, 683; Spotiswood, p. 320.

§ Tytler, vol. viii. p. 108.

¶ Ibid., p. 111.

|| Ibid.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 113.

† Mignet, vol. ii. p. 222.

himself under any restraint, for he was at liberty to go wherever he pleased; they declared that his majesty had not more faithful subjects than themselves, and, as a proof of their affection, they had resolved not to permit the Duke of Lennox and the Earl of Arran any longer to mislead him, to his own hurt, the oppression of the Church, and the detriment of the kingdom. In conclusion, they counselled his majesty, if he valued the life of the duke, to advise him without delay to retire quietly to France, otherwise they would call him to account for his conduct, and enforce against him the utmost penalty of the law.* To this threatening message,

Lennox ordered which they committed to Herries, to leave the kingdom. They added a peremptory command to Lennox to deliver up Dunbarton Castle, to quit the kingdom within twelve days, and in the meantime to confine himself with a few attendants to his residence at Aberdour or Dalkeith. These orders Lennox was extremely reluctant to obey; and though he durst not make an open show of resistance, he continued for some time to linger about Edinburgh, undecided as to the course he should pursue. At length, by the advice of some of his friends, he retired to the Castle of Dunbarton, where he purposed to remain and watch the course of events, in the expectation that some change might occur in his favour. The lords, however, remained firm to their purpose, and insisted so urgently on his quitting the country, that it was with much difficulty, at the earnest request of the king, that he obtained a respite of only a few days.

In the meantime, taking counsel with some of his adherents, he was strongly urged to assassinate the not to yield without a struggle. They exhorted him boldly to attack his enemies without delay, and promised to assist him with a force sufficient to overwhelm Gowrie and his faction, and to free the king from their control. Gaining courage from the countenance of his advisers, Lennox was induced to lend himself to an enterprise which served to confirm as well as hasten his downfall. It was determined, on one of the dark nights of December, suddenly to surprise the palace at Edinburgh, whither the court had removed,† put to death the Ruthven lords, and liberate the king. This plot was discovered and thwarted by the ministers and the ever-vigilant Bowes, the English ambassador; and notwithstanding that parties of horse had assembled for the attack, the enterprise was abandoned, and the king still remained in captivity.‡

As might have been expected, this unsuccessful attempt served to strengthen the hands of the Gowrie faction, and to render the position of the duke more hopeless than ever. A letter was immediately sent to him, which the king was forced to subscribe, accusing him of disturbing the government, and thereby endangering his majesty's safety; and, at the same time, a herald was dispatched to him, under the authority of the council, commanding him instantly to quit the kingdom, under pain of treason.* Under some evasive pretext, however, he still continued to delay his journey; but on the 14th December he was again charged by the council immediately to depart, and the messenger sent with this mandate had instructions to put him to the horn in case of disobedience. At the same time a sharp letter was sent him from the king, showing him that "his wilful ignorance was like to bring him and the country into great danger, and himself to destruction."† Further delay was now impossible; but before his departure Lennox wrote a pathetic letter to his royal master, Lennox. complaining grievously of the treatment he had received, and styling himself "the most miserable man in the world."‡ Having obtained permission to pass through England into France, he set out on his journey from Dalkeith on the 21st December,§ to the deep regret of the king, but to the joy of the great body of the people.

From the period of his first detention in Ruthven Castle up to the present time James had never ceased to be a prisoner, while the whole acts of his government were dictated or supervised by the Ruthven lords, who had violently installed themselves in office as his council. That their usurpation, however, might have at least the semblance of loyalty, they had extorted from the king a declaration, stating "that it was his own free and voluntary choice to remain at Perth, that his person was under no restriction, and that the noblemen who at present attended him had only done their duty, and performed a good service to himself and the commonwealth; and prohibiting any attempt to disturb the public peace, under pretence of rescuing him from restraint." This declaration, which was proclaimed in Edinburgh,|| of course imposed on nobody; but, founding on it as a confirmation of their authority, the council boldly proceeded in the exercise of all the functions of a regular government. They subjected Arran to more rigorous confinement, under the custody of the Earl of Gowrie,¶ and they summoned a convention of the nobility, before whom they desired the attendance of commissioners of the Church, promising to hear their complaints and redress all grievances. About the same time, Sir Robert Bowes and Sir George Carey, having arrived as ambassadors from the Queen of England, were received by the council with a cordial welcome, and admitted to an audi-

* MS. Letter, Sir George Bowes to Walsingham, 9th December, 1582, Bowes' Letter-book; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 125.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 692.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, endorsed by Cecil, "From the Duke of Lennox to the Scottish King, from Dunbarton, 16th December, 1582;" Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 125, 386.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 693.

|| Ibid., p. 646.

¶ Ibid., p. 648.

* Spottiswood, pp. 320, 321.

† Tytler, vol. viii. p. 124.

‡ MS. Calderwood, fols. 1244, 1245; also MS. Letter, Sir George Bowes to Walsingham, 6th December, 1582.

ence with the king.* The real object of their embassy, as we have already seen, was to strengthen the hands of Gowrie and his faction; but this, which of course was a secret mission, was concealed under the specious pretence of a friendly inquiry after the king's safety, and an endeavour to effect a reconciliation between him and his nobles.

At the interview which took place, the ambassadors presented a gracious message from their sovereign; but, as it contained some reflections on the conduct of Lennox, and in particular charged him with contemplating an alteration in religion and the subversion of his majesty's government, the king became greatly excited, and beginning to suspect that Elizabeth was cognizant of the whole conspiracy, he defended his favourite with great warmth, affirming that Lennox had done nothing without the advice of the council, and declaring that he did not believe it possible to prove him guilty of any treasonable designs.† To the other parts of the message James gave a general answer; but, though he publicly declared himself satisfied with the conduct of the lords, he privately whispered something of his real sentiments and condition to Carey, and entreated him to represent to his mistress the true state of affairs.‡ At the request of the ambassadors, he consented to the return of Angus, who had been living in exile in England ever since the death of his uncle, the Earl of Morton.‡

The associated lords, although thus far successful in their bold enterprise, still felt some misgivings as to the irregularity of their proceedings; and, not satisfied with a proclamation in their favour, which they had extorted from the king, they were desirous of still further justifying their conduct in the eyes of the nation. With this view they drew

"Declaration" up and published a "Declaration," of the Ruthven lords, explaining the motives that had induced them to adopt the course which they had taken. The general purport of this document, which extends to a great length, may be partly gathered from its title, which runs thus: "A Declaration of the just and necessary causes moving us of the Nobility of Scotland, and others the King's Majesty's faithful subjects, to repair to his highness' presence, and to remain with him, for resisting of the present dangers appearing to God's true religion and professors thereof, and to his highness' own person, estate, and crown, and his faithful subjects, that have constantly continued in his obedience; and to seek redress and reformation of the abuse and confusion of the commonwealth, removing from his Majesty the chief authors thereof, while the truth of the same may be made manifest to his highness' Estates, that with common consent, redress and remedy may be provided. Directed from Stirling, with special command and licence to be printed. Anno, 1582."* In this manifesto the misdeeds of Lennox and Arran, particularly with reference to the Church, are largely insisted on and unsparingly denounced. Reference is also made to their negotiations with the king's mother, their overawing the courts of law, and annulling forfeitures without the authority of parliament. It concludes in these words: "And, finally, that the said corruptions, abuses, and disorders, entered within these late years in the commonwealth, either in the corruption and misusing of justice, or the King's own person, house, rent, officers, order of council, and government of the public affairs, oppressing and extorsing of subjects under colour of justice or otherwise, being particularly considered, may be so amended and reformed, as God may be thereby pleased, the King's Majesty honoured and loved, and that the nobility and subjects may live in justice, peace, and tranquillity, relieved of the cruelties, dangers, and calamities, intended against them in time coming."†

At this period died George Buchanan, one of the most remarkable men that Scotland ever produced, and who, though occupying no prominent official station, exercised a mighty influence over public affairs, and left the impress of his great and highly cultivated mind on the age in which he lived. Mr. Thomas Smeton, a clergyman and a contemporary, sums up an estimate of his character in this brief but comprehensive sentence: "The ornament of our age, the sampler of ancient virtue and piety; a miracle of profound erudition, the father and prince, or chief of all the learned, and of all kind of learning."‡ He expired at Edinburgh on the 28th September, 1582, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and in such poverty that he did not leave means sufficient to defray his funeral charges. He was interred at the public expense in the church-yard of the Grey Friars. No tombstone was erected to his memory, and even tradition has failed to record the spot where his ashes repose.§

The General Assembly met in the New Kirk at Edinburgh, on the 9th October;|| Meeting of the and the Ruthven lords, who were General Assembly. extremely anxious to obtain some legal approval of their irregular proceedings, eagerly embraced the opportunity of endeavouring to strengthen themselves through the authority of the Church. With this view they appointed the Abbot of Paisley to submit to the assembly the grounds on which they vindicated the course they had adopted, and which were nearly the same as those set forth in their published "Declaration." The assembly unanimously concurred in recog-

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 673. Carey had audience on the 12th September, MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 14th September, 1582, Carey to Elizabeth. Endorsed by himself, "Copy of my letter to the Queen's Majesty." Bowes was at Berwick on the 10th, and at Stirling on the 14th September. Bowes' Letter-book; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 117.

† Calderwood, MS., fol. 1213.

‡ Aikman, vol. iii. p. 66.

§ Ibid.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 651.

† Ibid., p. 665.

‡ Ibid., p. 674.

§ Irving's Life of Buchanan, p. 309.

|| Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 675.

nizing the dangers to the Church and to the commonwealth, as specified in the name of the lords, but, before pronouncing an opinion on the "Action," as it was termed, they deputed two of their members, Mr. James Lawson and Mr. David Lindsay, to confer with the king respecting these dangers, "to open the same at length to his majesty, and to report his answer thereanent." The king's answer was highly satisfactory. He confessed that previously to the late enterprise of the nobility, religion, as professed within the realm, was in peril; and his own safety, which he considered to be intimately united with that of the true religion, was also endangered. He acknowledged also that sundry abuses had crept into the administration of civil affairs, and that all good men were in duty bound to concur in averting these dangers to the Church, as well as to his person and estate, and "for reformation of the common weal." On receiving this answer, the assembly proceeded to pass an act embodying his majesty's acknowledgment, and solemnly approving of the late enterprise.

They farther declared, "that their honours employing themselves to the averting of all these dangers, have done good and acceptable service to God, their natural and bounden duty to their sovereign, and showed their careful affection to their country; and that the prosecution and following out of the said good and godly cause, all particulars laid aside, is, and shall be, most acceptable to all that fear the majesty of God aright, tender the preservation of the king's majesty's most noble person and estate, and love the prosperous and happy success of the troubled nation."* This act, dated 13th October, 1582, was ordered to be published from the pulpits of all the churches; and all who should maliciously or violently oppose themselves to the "good cause," were ordered to be placed under the censure of the Church, and, in case of continued obstinacy, to be reported to the king's majesty and his council "to be punished civilly."†

This approbation of the public "Action" of the associated lords did not prevent the ministers from sharply rebuking the open profligacy that prevailed among them, and censuring them for their appropriation of the ecclesiastical revenues. Mr. Davidson, the minister of Liberton, who had been sent to confer with them, called on them to begin the work of reforming the commonwealth with a reformation in their own lives, and to evince their sincerity by delivering up the teinds to their rightful owners.‡

During the agitations of this unsettled period, the celebrated casket containing Mary's letters and sonnets to Bothwell had, by some accident, fallen into the hands of the Earl of Gowrie; and Sir Robert Bowes, the English ambassador, having with his usual vigilance, discovered this circumstance, forthwith reported it to Elizabeth. By her urgent instructions he endeavoured to obtain possession of it; but Gowrie, to whom he applied, answered him at first evasively, and would not admit the fact. On being further urged by Bowes, who convinced him that he had undeniable evidence that the casket was in his hands, he declared that he would not be justified in delivering up such important documents to the Queen of England without the authority of the king. Of the insincerity of this answer there can be no doubt, as the king was at that time a mere puppet in the hands of the faction, but it convinced Bowes that it would be vain to persist in his application. The casket and its curious contents have long since been lost, and their existence cannot be traced with certainty beyond this period. It is more than probable that they were, at the time, retained by Gowrie with the view, if opportunity should offer, of one day turning them to his own advantage.*

The intelligence that James was a prisoner in the hands of a faction excited considerable sensation throughout the continent, particularly at the court of France; and Henry III., dreading the ascendancy of the English influence in Scotland, sent La Motte Fénélon as his ambassador to Edinburgh, with instructions to employ his utmost endeavours towards extricating the king out of the hands of a party devoted to the interests of England. Elizabeth, with a view to counteract the influence of the French ambassador, dispatched Davison as her envoy along with him, under pretence of assisting him in his negotiations. La Motte was extremely desirous of reaching Scotland before the departure of Lennox, while, on the other hand, Elizabeth was at least equally anxious that no communication should take place between these two parties, as she had received secret information that La Motte had instructions to promote the scheme of the "Association," for uniting the queen and her son in the government, to propose a marriage between the young king and a princess of France, and to encourage the Romish party by promises of support. Accordingly, Walsingham so artfully contrived to throw one obstacle after another in the way of La Motte's departure, that before he set out Lennox was far on his way to London. They, however, met upon the road near York, but Davison, who was present during their interview,† managed to render it extremely short.‡

La Motte was received by the king with many tokens of respect; but the nobles by whom he was surrounded were jealous of the interposition of France, and not without apprehension of some attempt being made to revive French influence in

* Bowes' Letter-book; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 123.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 693.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Davison to Burghley, 3rd January, 1582; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Sir W. Mildmay to Walsingham, 29th December, 1582; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Burghley to Walsingham to Mr. Bowes, 4th January, 1582-3; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 126.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 677, 678.

† Ibid.

‡ MS. Calderwood, fol. 1227.

the affairs of Scotland. The clergy did not fail to sound the alarm. They inveighed with great vehemence against the court of France and the ambassador, and protested against any alliance being formed with such wicked persecutors of the Church. Having such opposition to contend with, and being at every step closely watched by Davidson, La Motte could make no progress in his mission, but prepared to take his leave without being able to effect any change in the king's condition, or even to obtain an answer to his proposal for associating the queen in the government with her son.

On the 20th January, Mons. De Menainville, Embassy of another French ambassador, with Mons. De instructions to join La Motte Fé- Menainville. nélon, landed at Leith with a great train of attendants,* and demanded an immediate audience of the king. Renewed denunciations from the pulpit followed; and, not satisfied with these, the clergy appointed a deputation to wait on the king, and solemnly to admonish him to beware of the French ambassador.† The deputation consisted of Pont, Lawson, Lindsay, and Davidson; and on being ushered into the royal presence, having delivered their message, the king thanked them for their advice, and said he "would use common courtesy, but no great familiarity;"‡ observing that he was bound by the law of nations to be courteous to all ambassadors, and was obliged to receive them, even from the Pope or the Grand Turk. This proposition Lawson confidently denied, but James maintained it with great firmness, and took occasion to censure Lawson for the manner in which he had spoken of the French ambassador. "As for that," replied the ministers, "the priests speak worse of your grace in France than we of the King of France in Scotland."—"And must ye imitate them in evil?" inquired the king—"Not in evil," they answered, "but in liberty. It is as fair for us to speak the truth boldly, as they boldly speak lies;§ and if we were silent, the 'chronicles' would speak and reprove it."—"Chronicles," replied James, "ye write not histories when ye preach." This conversation, in which the venerable committee met with rather sharp handling from the precocious acuteness of the young king, was abruptly terminated by Gowrie, who observed that he "thought it best they (the ambassadors) should be dispatched as soon as could be possible."|| The ministers now retired; but Davidson, lingering behind the others, craved a word in the king's ear. "Sir," he said, "I thought good to advertise you, but not before the rest, that ye swore and took God's name in vain too often in your speeches." The king, so far from being displeased, thanked him for his admonition, praised him for the manner in which it was given, and, placing his hand affectionately on his shoulder, accompanied him to the door of the apartment.*

But the zeal of the clergy was not the less ardent against the popish ambassadors; and, in anticipation of their practising during their stay some of the peculiar rites of their Church, a question had arisen and been discussed whether it would be right in any case to tolerate the celebration of the mass even in private. De Menainville, who had become aware of this circumstance, took occasion, at his first public audience with the king, boldly to claim what he considered to be his privilege as an ambassador. Having risen from kissing the king's hand, he replaced his cap upon his head, and, with great firmness and dignity, said, "I am come from the most Christian King of France, my sovereign, to offer all aid to the establishment of quietness; and, being an ambassador and not a subject, I crave to be treated as such; and as I have food allotted for my body, so do I require to be allowed the food of my soul, I mean the mass, which, if it is denied me, I may not stay and suffer a Christian prince's authority and embassy to be violated in my person."† This was followed by still more vehement and pointed denunciations from the pulpits of the Protestant clergy. Mr. James Lawson "pointed out the French embassy" as the mission of the King of Babylon, and characterised Menainville as the counterpart of the blaspheming Rabshakeh.‡

At the request of some of the merchants of Edinburgh, who traded with France, Banquet of La the king addressed a letter to the Motte Fénelon Town-council, directing that a Motte Fénelon at Edinburgh. public banquet should be given to La Motte Fénelon, who was now about to take his departure.§ This message the magistrates communicated to the ministers, and requested their advice. As might in consistency have been expected, the ministers were unanimously opposed to showing such a mark of respect to one whom they were in the habit of denouncing as an idolater and an emissary of Antichrist. "Banqueting," said they, "is a sign of love; if, therefore, ye be sincere, ye seal by this feast your fellowship and true love with the murderers of the people of God; if you dissemble, it is hypocrisy." This logic, though it might convince the magistrates, did not influence their decision. Contrary to the advice which they had solicited, and despite the repeated and solemn admonitions of the clergy, and the opposition of many of the citizens, they resolved to proceed with the entertainment. The ministers, seeing their counsel thus despised, and what they no doubt considered a great national sin about to be perpetrated, had recourse to a measure at once extraordinary and characteristic. At Opposition of a meeting of the Kirk session, held the clergy. on Sabbath the 3rd of February, being the day

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 697.

† Ibid.

‡ Ibid.

§ MS. Calderwood, pp. 1247—1251, inclusive, British Museum; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 131.

|| Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 698.

* MS. Calderwood, fols. 1250—1252.

† Ibid., fol. 1253.

‡ Tytler, vol. viii. p. 133.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 699.

immediately preceding that of the banquet, it was resolved that the congregation should meet next day for fasting and prayer. Intimation of this resolution having been made to the people, they assembled next morning between nine and ten o'clock, and did not separate until the termination of the banquet, about two in the afternoon.*

In the meantime, Lennox had arrived in London, bringing with him from James a letter and a message for the English queen. Elizabeth had at first refused to see him on any consideration, but she subsequently admitted him to a private interview, during which she rated him severely and at great length on his misgovernment. Lennox bore all with apparent meekness and humility, and answered with so much courtliness and good sense, that Elizabeth at last softened down and dismissed him courteously.†

Shortly after the meeting of the General Assembly, a convention of the Estates of the Estates. was held; and the Ruthven lords, who had, as we have seen, obtained for their enterprise the extorted approbation of the king and the voluntary approval of the assembly, eagerly embraced the opportunity of obtaining the sanction of the only remaining authority now requisite to give validity to their proceedings. The convention was opened by the king in person with a short speech, in which he expressed regret at the prevailing dissensions, and desired the advice of the Estates. On this, one of the lords present rose, and addressing the king told him, "That the dissensions were caused by those who, having possession of his majesty's ear, abused his favour, ruled the state as they chose, and disdained the advice of their fellow-councillors,—particularly Lennox and Arran, whose misrule was such that unless some noblemen had procured a remedy by repairing to his majesty, both Church and state must in a short time have been subverted." The Earls of Mar, Gowrie, and Glencairn then rose, and acknowledged that they were the chief authors of the enterprise, and having stated their motives retired. The convention

then passed an act approving of their proceedings, and declaring it incompetent to institute any action civil or criminal against the associated lords, collectively or individually, for what they had done.‡ They refused, however, to make any special mention of the grounds and motives of their enterprise, as set forth in their printed "Declaration," which the convention, therefore, would neither ratify nor condemn.§

Meanwhile, the struggle for ascendancy between the French and English interests in Scotland was carried on with increased zeal by both parties.

On the one hand, De Menainville, with the secret concurrence of the king, was anxiously engaged in organizing a party for the overthrow of Gowrie and his associates, and the consequent liberation of the sovereign from the thralldom in which they had so long held him. For this purpose the French ambassador was liberal both in money and promises. On the other hand, Bowes and Davison, if not so actively, were as usefully employed, and, with a vigilance which no artifices of their adversary could elude, followed his movements and detected all his intrigues; and if they had, like him, had "the sinews of war" at their disposal, the English interest would speedily have become triumphant, and might have been established on a basis beyond the power of French machinations to shake. Such, however, was the niggardly parsimony of their mistress, that almost every advantage had to be foregone which it required the aid of money to secure. All the efforts of her ambassadors to counteract the growth of French influence at court were consequently frustrated. The king, indeed, listened to their remonstrances with apparent respect, and even with expressions of gratitude, but so strong was his desire to regain his freedom, that he continued nevertheless to countenance the efforts of De Menainville to strengthen his party. At the same time, he had the prudence to caution his friends against any premature movement which might endanger the success of their enterprise.

To have stirred at the present moment would have been madness, for the Gowrie faction, though somewhat on the decline, yet, backed as it was by the great influence of the Church, was still far too formidable to be openly attacked. On the 18th of April they held a convention at Edinburgh, and passed a resolution to assemble parliament; but James, who had the penetration to see that this measure, by exposing his designs, would subject them to certain defeat, as well as endanger the safety of his friends, strongly remonstrated against it, adding even tears to his entreaties. The lords, though inflexibly adhering to their purpose, had the weakness to yield so far as to postpone the meeting till October—a concession which ultimately contributed to the overthrow of their power.

In the meantime, Colonel Stewart, brother of the Earl of Arran, and Mr. John Colville, were sent as ambassadors to the court of England. These two persons in reality represented the two great contending parties in the state. The former was in the confidence of the king, and bribed by De Menainville;* the latter was attached to Gowrie and his faction. In imitation of the double policy of Elizabeth, a double mission was confided to them. First, they were instructed to represent in a friendly manner to the English queen the measures adopted by James at this critical period for the security of his government and the peace of the kingdom, and to Colonel Stewart and Mr. John Colville sent as ambassadors to England.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 699.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, (supposed to be from Fowler) to Walsingham, January, 1582-3; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 127.

‡ Aikman, vol. iii. p. 66; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 689.

§ Original minute, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Bowes, 2nd March, 1582-3; also State Paper Office, same to same, 27th February, 1582-3; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 134.

* Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 135, 136.

solicit her advice and assistance; to induce her to restore the English estates which had formerly belonged to the king's grandfather and grandmother, the Earl and Countess of Lennox; and to consult with her majesty on the subject of the king's marriage:* and, secondly, they had it in commission to make diligent investigation, with a view, if possible, to discover the great secret of Elizabeth's views and intentions regarding the succession to the English throne.†

By means of spies and other agents on the continent, Walsingham had fully penetrated the depth of French intrigue with reference to Scottish affairs, and was well aware that James maintained a close correspondence with the queen his mother, and that the English refugees, as well as foreign Roman Catholics, were in constant communication with their friends in England on the same matters.‡ Nor was he less acquainted with the secret machinations of De Menainville, whom James still retained at court, although he had completed his mission and obtained his passports. Walsingham's information in this case was derived from La Motte Fénélon himself, through the medium of a spy named Fowler; who, under pretence of a devoted attachment to French interests and to the cause of the captive queen, had insinuated himself into the confidence of several of the leading men of that party, and, having thus become acquainted with their proceedings and designs, revealed the whole to the secretary.§ From his disclosures it appeared that La Motte had in his possession, for the information of the French king, a list of the noblemen who had united in a bond for the liberation of the king. These were the Earls of Huntley, Arran, Atholl, Montrose, Rothes, Morton, Eglinton, Bothwell, Glencairn, and Crawford, with the Lords Home and Seton. Besides organising this powerful coalition, De Menainville had the tact so successfully to sow discord among the opposite party, that even their leader, Gowrie, alarmed for his personal safety, began to waver.||

Another and very unexpected source of information with regard to the views and intentions of James and his secret advisers now opened to Walsingham, through the treachery of a confidential servant of De Menainville. He had been entrusted by his master with the conveyance of despatches to Mauvissière, the French ambassador in London; but, from what motive does not very clearly appear, he opened them, and gave copies of them to Bowes, by whom they were transmitted to Walsingham. From these it appeared that the king's party, impatient of delay, were still urging him to immediate action, and by one sudden and vigorous effort to surprise and overwhelm the Gowrie faction, and effect his emancipation. James, however, with a sagacity and caution unusual at his years, still repressed the imprudent zeal of his friends, which he saw was likely to lead to the ruin of their enterprise, and bring upon himself a still more hopeless thralldom. Besides, though (as he had secretly, and probably with truth, assured La Motte Fénélon) "his heart was French,"* yet he was unwilling to forfeit the favour of Elizabeth, and thereby endanger his succession. He desired, therefore, in the meantime, to keep up the game of dissimulation until the return of his ambassadors from the English court, an event still at some distance, as they had not yet taken their departure. Meanwhile Elizabeth wrote to Bowes, commanding him to urge the immediate departure of De Menainville; and Burghley and Walsingham, with a view to counteract the French influence in Scotland, recommended the immediate advance of ten thousand pounds, one half to be given to the king, and the other distributed amongst the nobility. But greatly as Elizabeth dreaded the increasing influence of France in Scottish affairs, her parsimony prevailed. She would not part with a single farthing. "She did utterly dislike such a point, because it cast her into charges."†

De Menainville having fully matured his scheme for the king's liberation, and, as he hoped, for the return of Lennox, De Menainville took his departure by sea from Leith in the beginning of May; and at the same time Stewart and Colville, the two ambassadors, accompanied at the special request of the king by Mr. David Lindsay, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, set out for London. On their arrival they were hospitably entertained by Leicester, and in a short time admitted to an audience by the queen. She received them with great courtesy, and with many expressions of regard and affection for her young cousin; and, as she had been requested, did not fail to give him numerous advices. As to "assistance," she was less liberal. Though Colville strongly represented the absolute necessity of having a strong body-guard of hired soldiers to secure the king's person against any sudden attempt of the opposite party to liberate him from his present necessary restraint, the utmost she could be prevailed on to advance was three hundred pounds; and even this pitiful sum she insisted that Bowes should pay upon his own credit. Walsingham, in communicating his instructions to Bowes on this point, considerably added, "if her majesty should happen to lay the burden upon you, I will not fail to see you myself discharged of the same."‡ With regard to the subject of the king's marriage, Elizabeth promised to write her-

* MS. Calderwood, fol. 1257; State Paper Office, April, 1583, Instructions to Colonel Stewart.

† Instructions to Colonel Stewart, ut supra.

‡ MS. Calderwood, fol. 1254.

§ State Paper Office, Fowler to Walsingham, 28th March, 1583; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 136.

|| State Paper Office, copie de la première lettre, endorsed, "Menainville to La Motte, 28th March, 1583."

* Tytler, vol. viii. p. 137; State Paper Office, Walsingham to Davison and Bowes, 9th March, 1582-3, original minute; Tytler, ut supra.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Bowes, 2nd March, 1582-3; also Fowler to Walsingham, State Paper Office, April, 1583; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 139.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, minute, Walsingham to Bowes, 9th May, 1583; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 146.

self; but briefly referred all other points to her ministers.

Two days after the Scottish ambassadors had left London on their return homewards, Bowes wrote from Edinburgh to Walsingham, informing him that a meeting had taken place in Falkirk between the Earls of Huntley, Atholl, Montrose, and others of the nobility, their "purpose" being, as he expressed it, "to welter* the court and state;" and the two ambassadors who had just left the English court, joined him in declaring their belief that without immediate assistance in men and money, such as had been promised by the queen to the Ruthven lords at the commencement of their enterprise, a change of government, and the total subversion of the English party in Scotland, would certainly ensue.† All these representations could not relax the sordid grasp of Elizabeth; and even the three hundred pounds which Bowes had advanced out of his own funds, Walsingham declared would turn out a dead loss to the ambassador, if he depended on her majesty for repayment. "Thus, you see," he said, "notwithstanding it importeth us greatly to yield all contentment to that nation [Scotland], how we stick at trifles. I pray God we perform the rest of the things promised."‡

The Ruthven coalition was now on the verge of ruin; and even Gowrie himself, who had lost large sums of money which he had expended in the enterprise—the expenses of which should have been borne equally by all concerned—resolved to desert his party, and take the first opportunity of making his peace with the king.

At this critical juncture, James was plunged into great grief by the unexpected intelligence of the death of his favourite, the Duke of Lennox, to whose speedy return, on his own expected liberation, he was looking forward with fond and lively hope. Shortly after the arrival of Lennox in France, the distress of his mind consequent on the separation from his master, to whom he was evidently much attached, is supposed to have brought on a fever, which terminated his life. In his last moments he professed a firm adherence to the Protestant faith; and on the day of his death he addressed a letter to the king, informing him that no hope remained of his recovery, and exhorting him to confide no longer to such as were devoted to the English interests, but rather to take counsel with those of his own party. A blank had been left for the insertion of the names of certain parties he had in view, but death had arrested his hand before he could fill it up.§ James's grief was excessive; and he evinced the strength of his attachment to his earliest favourite by many acts of kindness towards his posterity,|| and the respect with which he desired his memory to be cherished. Shortly after the death of Lennox, the king published a declaration, setting forth that his late dear cousin, the Duke of Lennox, had died in the true Christian faith, as established in Scotland, and threatening with severe penalties all who should dare to contradict this by speech or writing, either in prose or rhyme.* There can be little doubt that this proclamation was, partly at least, levelled against some of the ministers of the Church, who had taken occasion in their discourses to speak reproachfully of the character of the duke, and one of whom in particular had declared that, as he had thirsted for blood, so he died in blood—alluding to the disease of which it was reported he had died.†

Elizabeth at this time instructed Bowes, her ambassador, to endeavour to discover the views and sentiments of the king and his council respecting the negotiations which had for some time been carried on with the captive Queen of Scots, with a view to restoring her to liberty, and associating her with her son in the government. Both the king and his council expressed a decided aversion to any such arrangement. The former remarked, that although, as a dutiful son, he would willingly co-operate in the restoration of his mother to liberty, he had not consented, and never would consent, to the project of an association—at least, in the form she had proposed. The councillors were strongly repugnant, not merely to the scheme of an association, but even to the release of Mary from imprisonment. In regard to the former, they observed that it had already been proposed and rejected during the regency of Moray; and as to the latter, they dreaded the increased influence she would thus acquire, as the head of a party that might endanger the peace, if not the safety of the state. If, they asked, she can maintain so formidable a faction while a captive in England, what would she not do when she regained her freedom?‡

James had now been for nearly ten months virtually a prisoner in the custody of the Gowrie faction; and though impatient beyond measure of the restraint imposed on him, and incessantly planning some means of escape, yet, with a dissimulation and self-control extremely rare at his period of life, he appeared so contented, and even cheerful, that the associated lords imagined him quite resigned to his condition; and as Lennox was dead, and Arran was kept at a distance from court, they were lulled into a false security, they relaxed in their vigilance, and many of them retired to their estates. James, taking advantage of these circumstances, consulted with Colonel William Stewart, who had the command of his body-guard, and whom he had gained over to his interest, as to the

* Set in commotion.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Colville and Stewart to Walsingham, 18th May, 1583.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Bowes, 29th May, 1583; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 147.

§ MS. Calderwood, fols. 1268, 1269.

|| Robertson, vol. ii. p. 95.

* State Paper Office, copy of the Proclamation for Lennox, 27th July, 1583; also MS. Letter, Bowes' Letter-book, 31st July, 1583, Bowes to Walsingham; Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 150, 151.

† Calderwood (vol. iii. p. 715) expressly affirms that he died of dysentery.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bowes to Walsingham, 29th June, 1583, Edinburgh; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 148.

best method of effecting his escape. Whether the merit of devising the scheme ultimately adopted belongs to Stewart, as asserted by Robertson,* or to James, or both, does not appear, and is of no great importance. Certain it is, it was not planned by the party organised by De Menainville. The first step was to summon a convention of the Estates to meet at St. Andrew's, on pretence of deliberating on some points respecting the relations with England,—care being taken to call none but such as were supposed to be favourable to the king's design. Before the day of meeting, Stewart recommended the king to unfold the scheme to some of his councillors in whose judgment and fidelity he could confide, and to advise with them, before committing himself to so hazardous an enterprise. The king, in consequence, sent for Sir James Melvil, to whom the undertaking appeared so full of danger, that he laboured to dissuade him from attempting it. Finding however that James remained firm to his purpose, he wisely advised him, in the event of success, to proclaim a general amnesty, without conditions or reservations of any description, to accede to the demands of the Church, and to be careful to select as his counsellors men of acknowledged wisdom and probity—advices which James readily promised to follow.†

Under the pretext of paying a visit to his grand-uncle, the Earl of March, James was allowed to proceed from Falkland, where he then held his court, to St. Andrew's, accompanied by Colonel Stewart and a few others, whose attendance was, no doubt, esteemed a guarantee for his safe custody. To avoid exciting suspicion, he at first took up his abode in an inn within the town; but some of the lords, when they heard of his sudden departure from Falkland, becoming alarmed, rode immediately to St. Andrew's with a band of armed followers, and the king, perceiving his danger, withdrew to the castle. He had no sooner entered than Colonel Stewart commanded the gates to be shut, admitting only a few persons whom he could trust, and excluding all the rest of the attendants.

Argyle, Huntley, Crawford, Montrose, Rothes, and others, who were privy to the enterprise,‡ arrived next morning, and were admitted into the castle; and, as they came unarmed, the other lords did not at first despair of recovering possession of the king's person; but, weakened as they were by the desertion of Gowrie, their leader, the attempt was ultimately abandoned as hopeless. In the meantime, Mar sent a messenger in urgent haste to Angus, to inform him of what had occurred; and he in turn instantly dispatched a courier to Bothwell, entreating him to join him with all his followers without delay. The summons was obeyed; but when Angus and Bothwell, with their armed attendants, came within six miles of St. Andrew's, they were met by a herald, who charged them in the king's name, under pain of treason, to dismiss their forces, and proceed unattended. This order they did not dare to disobey: they rode on singly to the castle, and presenting themselves before the king, he commanded them to return to their residences, and remain there till he should call them.*

Gowrie, who now trembled for his safety, having obtained permission from the king, Submission of repaired privately to St. Andrew's, Gowrie. and, falling on his knees before his majesty, in the presence of Argyle, Atholl, Rothes, and other noblemen, professed penitence for what he had done, and implored and received forgiveness. At the same time, anxious to extenuate, if not to justify his offence, while he admitted there was "a fault in the form," he argued that the deed itself was not evil, "in respect of the great danger that both religion and the commonwealth did stand into at that time."†

The revolution was now complete, and, happily, had been effected without the effusion of blood. James, with the excess of joy natural in one so young, felt himself once more his own master, with the freedom of choosing his own counsellors. In conformity with the salutary advice of Sir James Melvil, he assembled all the lords of both parties, the neighbouring gentry, the chief magistrates of the adjacent towns, the ministers, and the heads of colleges, and in their presence declared that, although he had for some time been forcibly deprived of his proper freedom of action, he would not impute this to any person as a crime; that he now intended to bury in oblivion all the irregularities that had taken place during his minority, to accede to the demands of the Church, and to govern all his subjects with indiscriminating impartiality and affection. As a proof of his sincerity, he paid a visit to the Earl of Gowrie at Ruthven Castle, and, in the very place where the offence had been committed, confirmed to Gowrie the pardon he had already accorded to him.‡ As an evidence of his impartiality, he commanded two of each faction—Angus and Bothwell on the one side, and Huntley and Crawford on the other—to withdraw for a short time from court; and appointed as his permanent council the Earls of March, Argyle, Gowrie, Montrose, Marischal, and Rothes.§

But this conciliatory policy, which greatly enhanced the young king's popularity, and which might have gone far to heal the unhappy divisions that had so long prevailed, was but of short continuance. Arran, who had been permitted to reside for some time on his estate of Kinneil, was very desirous of being admitted to an interview with the king; and James, who had never ceased to cherish an affection for him, was not less anxious to see his profligate favourite. His re-appearance at court was vehemently opposed by the council,

* Vol. iii. p. 98.

† Aikman, vol. iii. pp. 69, 70.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 715.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 715; also MS. Letter, Bowes to Walsingham, 29th June, 1583, Bowes' Letter-book.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 715, 716.

‡ Melvil, p. 272.

§ Aikman, vol. iii. p. 70.

as well as by Sir James Melvil, who warned the king of the danger of again receiving into his confidence a person obnoxious to the nobility, and detested for his crimes by the great body of the people. James promised that he would not admit him again to his confidence, and that he should not remain at court above a single day; and, at last, yielding to the king's importunity, the lords consented to the interview. James flew to embrace

Return of him; he immediately regained his Arran to court. ascendancy in the royal confidence Perfidy of the and favour, and began to manifest king. that overbearing arrogance which had formerly rendered him so odious to men of all parties.* The king now cast aside his moderation, and, regardless of his own solemn declaration, so recently and publicly made, he issued a proclamation, in which the Ruthven enterprise was denominated treason, and the exercise of the royal clemency declared to be limited to such as should acknowledge their offence and sue for pardon within a specified time.† The Ruthven lords were not less astonished than alarmed by this act of royal perfidy; and, seeing they could no longer trust to the word and honour of their sovereign while he continued to be guided by the treacherous and vindictive counsels of the restored favourite, began to concert measures for their own security.

When intelligence reached Elizabeth of the return of Arran to power, and of the disreputable policy to which James, at his instigation, had resorted, she wrote to the king, reproaching him in severe terms for his breach of faith to the Ruthven lords, and his strange inconsistency in again putting himself under the guidance of Arran, after having written to her respecting the dangerous course which he was pursuing; "And yet," she added, "you would make them guilty who delivered you therefrom! I hope you more esteem your honour than to give it such a stain; since you have so oft protested that you was resolved to notice these lords as your most affectionate subjects, in the full persuasion that all they had done was by them intended for your advantage." In conclusion, she requests him to suspend further proceedings until the arrival of a trusty messenger, whom she should send to advise with him. James, suppressing his resentment at this sharp rebuke, perhaps the more keenly felt because it was deserved, professed to receive it "at this time as proceeding from a sisterly love," thanked her for her kind offices in attempting to procure his liberation, and excused his conduct on the plea that "the time" was "unfit to dispute too precisely upon circumstances that were determined by those who were masters of him and the state." He then concludes—"When you desire that I proceed no further until a trusty messenger may come from you, I intend to stay from doing anything, till then, that you may be justly offended with."*

It is remarkable that Elizabeth should have attached so much importance to this embassy as to feel a difficulty in determining who should be entrusted with it, and still more remarkable that, notwithstanding the urgency of the case, she should have taken not less than two months in coming to a decision; while, during this long interval, proceedings, so far from being stayed, were carried on with unusual vigour and activity. Angus, now the head of the house of Douglas, was banished beyond the Spey; Mar and Glamis were ordered to leave the kingdom; † the Laird of Lochleven, besides being imprisoned, was stripped of his property; such officers of the king's household as were suspected of a bias in favour of England were dismissed; while, on the other hand, those who were known to be favourable to the French interest were retained and promoted. Even Gowrie, though he had twice received the royal forgiveness, and notwithstanding all that had occurred had been taken into the king's confidence, was treated with such indignity by Arran that he was forced to retire from court; and, though invited by the king to return, such were the presumption and insolence of the upstart, that he felt compelled not only to withdraw a second time, but, apprehensive of still more violent proceedings, he at length formed a resolution to quit the kingdom. At the same time, Arran, who was evidently desirous of getting the king entirely into his own power, procured the appointment of Governor of Stirling Castle, and induced the king to take up his residence there, so that no one could, without his permission, be admitted into the presence of the sovereign. The choice of Elizabeth seemed to lie between Walsingham and her cousin, Lord Hunsdon; Walsingham the more extended experience, sent to Scotland. greater prudence, and superior sagacity of the former being in some degree counterbalanced by the infirmities of his advanced age. Walsingham was at length preferred to this delicate and responsible trust. Owing to his age and consequent infirmities, he was obliged to travel in a coach by easy stages; nevertheless, he came with a degree of state rather befitting a prince than an ambassador, being attended by a retinue of six score horsemen.

The ambassador reached Edinburgh on the 1st September, and was received by Sir James Melvil, who gave him a cordial welcome in the king's name; and on the 7th he was conducted by Sir James to Stirling, and thence to Perth, where the king had appointed his reception to take place.‡ After some unnecessary delay, he was admitted to an interview, and, though received by James with much apparent courtesy, yet, as he refused to hold any intercourse with Arran, he was subjected to

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bowes to Walsingham, 5th August, 1583.

† MS. State Paper Office, copy of the Proclamation, 30th July, 1583; also Bowes to Walsingham, 31st July, 1583; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 150.

* Melvil, pp. 279, 283.

† Spottiswood, p. 326.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bowes to Walsingham, 19th September, 1583; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 724.

sundry indignities from that courtier and his minions. So keenly did Arran feel the neglect with which he was treated, and so far did he carry his resentment, that he took every opportunity of insulting the venerable ambassador. He even refused to admit into the king's presence the Captain of Berwick, and other persons of note who formed part of Walsingham's retinue.* The ambassador's instructions were to remonstrate with the king on the late changes, made without any previous intimation to her majesty, contrary to his promises to her by letter and through her ambassadors, as well as his own; on his harsh dealing with sundry noblemen and other well-affected persons, in constraining some of them to accept remission for actions approved by an instrument on the word of a prince, as well as by an act of council, the convention of the Estates, and the General Assembly of the Church; and on the recall of Arran, contrary to his frequent promises and assurances given to her majesty.† James's replies were more remarkable for ingenious duplicity and palpable misstatements than for candour and truth. With respect to his approval of the Ruthven enterprise, he pleaded that it was given under restraint. Regarding his dealing with the noblemen implicated in that affair, he declared that he had only proceeded according to the laws of the realm, and had offered mercy to such as should acknowledge their offence, and crave pardon; and as to others, having still some danger to apprehend from their practices, it was necessary to bring them to trial, and to inflict on them the punishment which their offences deserved. As to the removal of such of his councillors as were best affected to the English queen, he remarked that he was a free prince, and could best judge who were meetest for his own service; and that he thought her majesty should not examine more curiously into the affections of his council than he did with hers. Walsingham's rejoinder to this pert reply was—"You are but a young prince yet, and of no great judgment in matters of government; and many an elder one would think himself fortunate to meet an adviser like my mistress. But, be assured, she is quite ready to leave you to your own guidance. I have not come down to seek an alliance for England, which can live well enough without Scotland, but to charge your majesty with unkind dealing to her highness, and to seek redress for past errors."‡ Lastly, respecting the recall of Arran, James remarked, that as the imprisonment of that nobleman had ensued on his own restraint, so his liberation could not be effectually known until he had been called into his majesty's presence and company.§ At the conclusion of the interview, the ambassador complained of certain depredations committed by the Scots upon the Borders; and James having promised that the matter should be investigated, Walsingham took his leave, the king having first requested to see him next day in private. As this private conference, however, does not seem to have taken place, it is probable that Arran had interfered to prevent it.

On the eve of his departure, Walsingham addressed a letter to Burghley, in which he remarks—"You will easily find that there is no hope of the recovery of this young prince, who, I doubt (having many reasons to lead me so to judge), if his power may agree to his will, will become a dangerous enemy. There is no one thing will serve better to bridle him, than for her majesty to use the Hamiltons in such sort as they may be at her devotion."*

This politic suggestion was not long in setting Bowes to work in a new direction; and such was his activity, that before the ambassador had left the country, he had originated a counter-revolution for the removal of Arran, and the complete restoration of the English interest in Scotland. His machinations, however, were soon discovered and defeated, through the vigilance of Arran; and the queen, dissatisfied with the result of this project, as well as with that of Walsingham's mission, resolved to suspend her judgment on Scottish affairs for the present, and to recall Bowes.†

As no very important results to either country followed, or could well have been expected to follow from Walsingham's embassy, it has been conjectured that his principal errand was to endeavour to ascertain the capacity and disposition of the king, who had now reached that period of life when the character is usually so far developed as to authorise an experienced and penetrating observer, like Walsingham, to pronounce judgment upon it with tolerable accuracy; and as James, though not very remarkable for depth or breadth of intellect, had an excursive imagination and ready utterance, his conversation was showy and specious, and so far impressed the sagacious ambassador, that he gave Elizabeth a very flattering report of the abilities of her young cousin, whom she accordingly ever afterwards treated with more becoming respect.‡

The apparent indifference of Elizabeth, while it damped the ardour of those who were opposed to the now dominant faction, strengthened the hands of the king and his ambitious favourite, so that they speedily triumphed over all their enemies; and the latter, who seemed desirous to concentrate in his own hands the whole power of the state, induced the king to confer on him the offices of Lord High Chancellor and Governor of the Castle of Edinburgh. Meanwhile, Angus, Mar, and Glamis; the Lairds of Lochleven and Cleish; the Abbots of Dunfermline and Cambuskenneth, with others who had been concerned in the Ruthven

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Burghley, 11th September, 1583.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Elizabeth to Bowes, 22nd September, 1583; also ibid., Bowes to Walsingham, 15th October, 1583; also ibid., Walsingham to Bowes, 30th September, 1583, York; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 158.

‡ Melvil, p. 293.

* Melvil, p. 296.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 725.

‡ MS. Letter, draft, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Elizabeth, 11th September, 1583, St. Johnston.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 728.

enterprise, found it necessary for their own safety to acknowledge their offences, and crave forgiveness. Great exertions were made to bring all the offenders to follow this example; but, as many still kept aloof, a convention of the Estates was summoned, which, through the detestable perfidy of Arran, was so managed as to consummate the ruin of the Gowrie party. He treacherously represented to the noblemen, as they arrived in the capital to be present at the meeting, that the king graciously intended to grant to each of them individually, after being subjected to some merely nominal punishment, for the sake of appearance, a full pardon for his participation in the offence, provided they would all concur in a vote of the convention declaring the Ruthven enterprise to be treason; but certifying to such as would not consent, that they should be considered as impeaching the king's honour by suspecting his promise.

Under the impression that Arran had been specially commissioned by the king to make this communication, they considered it prudent to follow the course prescribed; and accordingly, at their first meeting, the Estates unanimously passed an act declaring "the surprise and restraint of the royal person," in August last, "a crime of high treason of pernicious example, and meriting severe punishment," and recommending a rigorous prosecution of all those who had been engaged in it, and had not within the prescribed time embraced the king's offer of pardon. They, at the same time, ordered the act of council approving of the enterprise to be erased from the council books, as having been passed while the king was under restraint. Thus fortified, the king now declared his determination to punish with the utmost severity all who refused to acknowledge their offence and sue for forgiveness.

The principal leaders of the Gowrie faction, who had hitherto kept aloof, now justly alarmed, submitted to the king's mercy. Angus retired beyond the Spey, Mar and Glamis and the Abbots of Cambuskenneth and Dryburgh withdrew to Ireland, Lord Boyd and the Lairds of Lochleven and Easter Wemyss repaired to France; while others were committed to prison, or confined within certain bounds. Mr. John Colville alone refused submission, and sought refuge in Berwick;* whilst Gowrie, renewing his promises of obedience, was permitted to remain at court.†

The most formidable opponents of Arran, however, were the ministers of the Church; and, difficult as the task was, he began to adopt vigorous measures to silence them and reduce them to obedience. Mr. John Dury, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, and Mr. Andrew Melvil, Principal of the College of St. Andrew's, were the first to be attacked. The former, having denounced from the pulpit the recent proceedings, was forced, under the threat of having his head stuck on the West Port, to explain and partially to modify some of his expressions; while the latter, who had given a similar offence, having been called before the council, firmly declined their jurisdiction, declaring that to the Presbytery only was he accountable for any thing contained in his discourses from the pulpit; and when the king endeavoured to convince him of the contrary, he sternly replied, that his majesty "perverted the laws both of God and man." It was not likely that the determined bearing and bold words of the venerable principal would be tolerated by the vindictive and haughty spirit of Arran, especially at a crisis like the present. Notwithstanding Melvil's declinature, which they vainly endeavoured by threatenings to induce him to withdraw, William Stewart was brought forward as his accuser, and several witnesses were examined; but, being unable to prove any thing criminal against him, he was arraigned on the extraordinary and almost ludicrous charge of declining the authority of the court; and being of course found guilty, he was sentenced to be imprisoned in the Castle of Edinburgh, and to be still further punished in person and property at the king's discretion. Having learned, however, that his place of confinement was to be changed to a damp and noisome dungeon in the Castle of Blackness, without waiting the appointed time for the execution of his sentence, he sought safety in a precipitate flight to Berwick.* The expatriation of Melvil, who, from his great learning, zeal, and intrepidity, was considered the head and champion of his party, so far from intimidating or silencing his brethren, was followed by vehement denunciations from the pulpit, in which the king was accused of having extinguished the lamp of learning, and deprived the Church of the ablest and most faithful guardian of its liberties.† Several of the most distinguished among the ministers were next summoned before the council, and interrogated as to their sentiments regarding the Ruthven enterprise, and the measures subsequently pursued, which they were urged explicitly either to approve or condemn. In this embarrassing position, afraid lest by any unguarded expression they might be subjected to a criminal prosecution, they prudently requested permission to give their answers in writing. This being conceded, written answers were accordingly returned, in which they declared that they adhered to the judgment formerly pronounced by the General Assembly respecting the Raid of Ruthven; that, as individuals, they considered it lay beyond their province to pronounce opinions on matters political; and that, if his majesty were desirous of obtaining the sentiments of the Church respecting that transaction, they recommended him to apply to the General Assembly.

In the meantime, without waiting for any command from the king, the assembly met, and, avoiding any direct statement of their opinion, drew up

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bowes to Walsingham, 29th December, 1583.

† Ibid.

* Spottiswood, p. 330.

† Ibid.

and presented a list of grievances, from which it was no difficult matter to infer what their opinion really was concerning the Raid of Ruthven, as well as many of the proceedings that had taken place since the king had been freed from restraint. To this memorial, however, no satisfactory answer was obtained.

The government of Arran became now every day more tyrannical and arbitrary; and the Privy Council, acting under his direction, proceeded to exercise an authority which, even in those times, when the powers of the executive were not very strictly defined, was felt to be altogether unwarrantable. After the escape of Melvil, they passed an act ordaining that such ministers as should hereafter fall under the displeasure of the king should be apprehended without the formality of a legal charge; and that all who should hold communication with those who had left the kingdom, should be treated as guilty of treason.

At this time the young Duke of Lennox, then only thirteen years of age, arrived in Scotland from the French court, accompanied by the Master of Gray, whom James had sent to France for this express purpose. He landed at Leith, where he was met by Arran and Huntley, who conveyed him to Kinneil, where the court then was. The king testified his respect for the memory of his departed favourite by the affectionate reception he now gave to his son, and the substantial benefits he conferred on him. He welcomed him with heartfelt joy, invested him with his father's honours, confirmed him in possession of the family estates, and placed him under the guardianship of the Earl of Montrose.*

The banishment of the Ruthven lords, and the partial restraint imposed on the preachers, were succeeded by a short period, not indeed of contentment, but of outward tranquillity, during which Arran ruled with despotic and almost undivided authority. But the lords, though in exile, still continued to wield a great influence over a numerous and powerful, though now disorganised party; and as they did not consider the Church, the civil interests of the country, its foreign relations, or even their own persons to be in safety, so long as the king continued to be guided by the violent and pernicious counsels of Arran, they were already Conspiracy busily engaged in concerting a plot against Arran. for his destruction. The principal conspirators were Angus, Mar, the Master of Glamis, the Earl of Bothwell, and Lord Lindsay. Their object was to liberate their country from the galling yoke of Arran, by forcibly removing him from the king's council. With a view to the prosecution of their enterprise, Angus had secretly quitted his retreat beyond the Spey, and Mar and Glamis had come over from Ireland. At the same time, Lord Claud and Lord John Hamilton, who were also parties to the conspiracy, were sent from England to the Borders by Elizabeth, that they might be ready to co-operate when the plot was ripe for execution. Meanwhile, Gowrie, mortified by the studied neglect of the king, and the haughty and insolent bearing of Arran, and probably also influenced by some indefinite apprehension of danger, asked and obtained from the king permission to retire to France. Intending to embark at Dundee, he had proceeded thither; and, while waiting for the departure of the vessel in which he was to set sail, he received information of the conspiracy, and was urged to engage in it. He hesitated for some time, but at length consented; and although an order had been issued commanding all such as had obtained permission to leave the kingdom to depart without delay, he contrived, under various pretexts, to put off his voyage; and having assisted in arranging the plan of the enterprise,* held himself in readiness to join his fellow-conspirators in arms, when the time for action should arrive. That the conspiracy was secretly encouraged by Elizabeth and her ministers is beyond a doubt. Mr. John Colville, who was the principal agent of the plot in London, was in constant communication with Bowes and Walsingham on the subject; and some difficulty having occurred in consequence of the opposition of a certain bishop, whose name does not transpire, Colville held a secret consultation with Walsingham on the point, as appears from a letter he subsequently addressed to him, in which he says—“Concerning the bishop, the more I think of the matter, the more necessity I think it that he, and all other strangers of his opinion, were removed; for it is a common proverb—Hostes si intus sint, frustru clauduntur fores; neque antiquam expellantur tute cubandum est.”† But Arran had in the meantime, through the treachery of Glencairn and Atholl, become acquainted with the whole secrets of the conspiracy, and kept a watchful eye over all the movements of its leaders. Anxious, however, that they should proceed, until by some overt act they should incur the penalties of treason, he contented himself with making such preparations that he could proceed against them at a moment's notice; and did not stir until the plot was matured, and the first movements towards putting it in execution had actually been begun. The time for action at length arrived. The scheme had embraced as one of its leading features the surprisal of the Castle of Stirling, where the conspirators intended to fortify themselves, and issue a proclamation declaring their object to be the delivery of the king from his present evil counsellors; and Angus, Mar, and the Master of Glamis, were already on their march to that place, while Gowrie remained at Dundee, ready to join them at an appointed signal. Arran accordingly

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bowes to Walsingham, 26th November, 1583; ibid., same to same, 20th November, 1583; Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 160, 161; Spottiswood, p. 328.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Bowes to Walsingham, 20th January, 1583-4; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 163.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Colville to Bowes, 23rd March, 1583-4; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 163.

dispatched Colonel William Stewart, with a body of a hundred soldiers, who, arriving at Dundee before sunrise, surrounded the castle, where Gowrie then resided. He defended himself with great bravery for about twelve hours, and even endeavoured to rouse the inhabitants to his assistance; but at length, being compelled to surrender, he was apprehended, and conveyed a prisoner to Edinburgh.*

Meanwhile intelligence had reached the court that Mar, Angus, and the Master of Glamis, had Surprise of Stirling Castle. entered Stirling with a body of five hundred horse, and taken possession of the castle. Not a moment was lost in making preparations to attack the insurgents. In two days an army amounting to twelve thousand men had mustered in the capital, and the young king, attended by many of the nobility, placed himself at their head, and took the road to Stirling. By this time, however, the news of Gowrie's capture had reached the insurgents, and this, together with the failure of that support which they had expected from their friends, and their disappointment at not receiving a sum of money which had been promised them by the English queen, completely disheartened them; and finding themselves in no condition to cope with the large force with which the king was advancing to attack them, they left a small garrison in the castle, with difficulty made their escape into England, and threw themselves on the protection of Elizabeth.† The castle surrendered on the first summons, and four of the garrison, including the captain, were hanged. The failure of this conspiracy naturally tended to strengthen the hands of Arran and his party, and emboldened them to pursue the most unpopular and violent measures.

As one of the professed objects of this insurrection was the maintenance of religion, it was strongly suspected that some of the ministers had been secretly concerned in it; but though attempts were made to implicate several of them, there was no evidence to prove their guilt. Three of those who had particularly fallen under suspicion were searched for at their houses by the king's guard; but they had found means, along with some others, to escape into England.‡

It was now resolved to bring Gowrie to trial; but though there could be no doubt whatever of his guilt, it would seem that there was not sufficient evidence to warrant a legal conviction. This, however, Arran had more than one motive for earnestly desiring to secure—the gratification of personal enmity on account of Gowrie's frequent opposition to him in the council, and a wish to obtain a share of the Gowrie estates, on which

Arran's wife had long looked with a covetous eye.* In order to supply the deficiency of direct evidence against the unfortunate nobleman, Arran had recourse to an expedient so base as to be worthy of peculiar reprobation. Accompanied by Sir Robert Melvil and some other members of the Privy Council, Arran paid a visit to Gowrie in his prison, under the guise of an old friend who felt deeply concerned for his safety. Unsuspicious of treachery, Gowrie entreated his old associates to intercede with the king in his behalf; but they replied that the king was highly incensed against him for the share he had taken in the expulsion of the Duke of Lennox; and that therefore any such intercession would prove ruinous to themselves, without being beneficial to him. "What then," said Gowrie, "is to be done?"—"Our advice," they replied, "is, that you write a general letter to the king, confessing your knowledge of a design against his majesty's person, and offering to reveal the particulars if admitted to an audience. This will procure you an interview, which otherwise you have no chance of obtaining. You may then vindicate your innocence, and explain the whole to the king." Gowrie hesitated to adopt this insidious advice. "It is a perilous expedient," said he; "I never entertained a thought against the king; but this is to frame my own dittay,† and may involve me in utter ruin."—"How so?" said his treacherous counsellors. "Your life is safe, if you follow our counsel; your death is determined on, if you make no confession."—"Goes it so hard with me?" replied Gowrie. "If there be no remedy, in case I had an assured promise of my life, I would not stick to try the device of the letter."—"I will willingly pledge my honour," said Arran, "that your life shall be in no danger, and that no advantage shall be taken of your pretended confession."‡ Gowrie, trusting to this assurance, wrote a letter as he had been directed, and sent it to the king; but instead of receiving an answer, as he had been led to expect, he was immediately placed upon his trial. No evidence having been produced sufficient to satisfy the Trial of Gowrie.

jury of his guilt, they were about to pronounce a verdict of acquittal, when Arran, who, in shameless violation of common decency, sat as one of their number, taking the letter from his pocket, demanded of the unfortunate Gowrie whether he could deny his own handwriting. "It is mine assuredly," he replied, "nor can I deny it; but, my lords, this letter was written, these revelations were made, on a solemn promise of my life. You must remember it all," said he, looking at Arran and the others at whose instigation the letter had been written; "how at first I refused; how earnestly I asserted my innocence; how you sware to me, upon your honour and faith, that the king should grant me my life if I made this confession."

* Melvil, p. 210.

† Accusation.

* MS. Letter, Caligula, c. viii., fol. 9, Bowes to Walsingham, 19th April, 1584, Berwick.

† MS. Calderwood, Ayscough, 4736, fol. 1321; Home's History of the house of Douglas, p. 376; Spottiswood, p. 331.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Moyse's Memoirs, p. 50; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 169; Historie of James the Sixth, p. 103.

‡ MS. State Paper Office, Form of certain devices used by Arran and Sir R. Melvil against Gowrie, endorsed by Davison, in a letter to Walsingham, dated 27th May, 1584, Berwick; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 170.

To this simple but pointed appeal, which, in the circumstances under which it was uttered, carried in itself a strong presumption of his innocence, no answer was returned, and the detestable villainy which it exposed seems to have excited no horror in the minds of his judges. The lord-advocate replied that the lords had no power to make such a promise; and when Gowrie in despair appealed to the oaths of Arran and his companions, they solemnly denied that any such promise had been given.* The jury having retired to deliberate on their verdict, Gowrie, who now saw, when too late, the snare which had been laid for him, convinced that he had no mercy to expect, called with seeming indifference for a cup of wine, in which he drank to several of his friends around him. He also confided to one of them an affecting message to his wife, and requested him to conceal his unhappy fate from her for a short time, as she had just been delivered of a child, and consequently could not without danger of her life be startled by such appalling intelligence. The jury soon returned into court with a verdict of guilty, which he heard with unshrinking fortitude; and being about to address the court, he was interrupted by the judge, who informed him that his time was short, as the king had already sent the warrant for his execution. "Well, my lord," he replied, "since it is the king's contentment that I lose my life, I am as willing to part with it as I was before to spend it in his service; and the noblemen who have been upon my jury will know the matter better hereafter. And yet, in condemning me, they have hazarded their own souls, for I had their promise. God grant my blood be not on the king's head! And now, my lords," he added, "let me say a word for my poor sons. Let not my estates be forfeited. The matters are small for which I suffer. Failing my eldest boy, then let the second succeed him." Even this consolation was denied him. He was informed that the penalty of treason, of which crime he had been found guilty, necessarily included that of forfeiture. After retiring for a short space, attended by a minister, he proceeded to the scaffold, from which he briefly addressed the people who had assembled to witness his last moments. He strongly asserted his innocence of any designs against the person of the king, and described the treacherous device to which his life was now to fall a sacrifice. His neck having been bared to receive the fatal Execution of stroke, he with great composure, Gowrie. and even apparent cheerfulness, tied the handkerchief over his eyes with his own hands, then kneeling down and resting his neck on the block, his head was severed from his body by a single blow. The disgusting process of quartering the body having been dispensed with, the head was sewed on to the trunk, and the remains of the unfortunate nobleman were wrapped in a scarlet cloth, with which the scaffold had been covered, and conveyed by his friends to their last resting-place.*

The character of Gowrie was marked by traits which are rarely combined in the same individual. He had been in His character. early life an active accomplice in the murder of Riccio; and in his riper years he was factious, turbulent, intriguing, and revengeful.† Yet, it is said that, considering the period at which he lived, he was a person of cultivated mind and refined taste, no mean proficient in the scholarship common at that time, and a patron and amateur in music and the fine arts. That he had been deeply implicated in the late conspiracy to subvert the government there can be no doubt; ‡ but, for this offence, the distressing condition of all the great public interests of the kingdom, consequent on the misgovernment of Arran, may be pleaded as an extenuation, if not an apology. This, however, was not the offence for which he suffered—he fell a victim to the malignity and infidelity of Arran, who, under the mask of friendship, pledged his word and honour to a lie, and thus induced the unfortunate man to accuse himself of a crime of which there is no reason to believe that he had been guilty.

* MS. British Museum, Caligula, c. viii., fol. 29; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 172.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Menainville to Mauvisière, 28th March, 1583.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Colville to Walsingham, 12th May, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 173.

* MS. British Museum, Caligula, c. viii., fol. 24, Form of examination and death of William Earl of Gowrie, 3rd May, 1584; Tytler, ut supra.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

JAMES THE SIXTH.

A.D. 1584—1587.

THE failure of the late insurrection confirmed Arran in the possession of his ill-gotten power, and encouraged him to adopt the most violent and arbitrary measures for the purpose of completing his triumph, by effectually crushing all opposition. A parliament was summoned to be held at Edinburgh* on the 22nd of May, and never was parliament more obsequiously subservient to the will of Meeting a minister. An act was passed, of parliament. in which Angus, Mar, and Glamis, were declared guilty of treason, and their estates forfeited to the crown. But the opposition of the Church was what, above all other things, Arran at once feared and detested. He felt that nothing had been gained while there existed a body of men claiming a jurisdiction distinct from that of the civil power; and so long as ecclesiastical functionaries were permitted, in the Church courts and from the pulpit, to inflame the minds of the people by exposing and denouncing the errors of the king and the government. James, moreover, though he professed an unwavering attachment to the Protestant faith, detested Presbyterianism,—on account of its supposed tendency to foster independence of thought and a love of liberty, more consonant to the genius of a republican than that of a monarchical and all but despotic government; he therefore determined, at all hazards, to re-introduce and fully establish episcopacy. A plan of attack on the Church was accordingly concocted, and made ready to be submitted to the consideration of parliament. The ministers, ever on the alert, had got notice that some measure affecting the Church was in contemplation, and of course were exceedingly anxious to know the nature of its provisions. This, however, the court being equally solicitous to conceal, the Lords of the Articles were sworn to secrecy; and when at length the matters were submitted to parliament, the deliberations were carried on with closed doors. The ministers now took the alarm, and deputed Mr. David Lindsay, one of their number, to represent their apprehensions to the king, and to entreat that no act affecting the Church should be passed without previously being submitted to the consideration of the General Assembly; but Arran, having got notice of his errand, caused Lindsay to be apprehended as he was crossing the palace-yard, and ordered him to be conveyed to the Castle of Blackness. Undiscouraged by this violent proceeding, the ministers next appointed a deputation to proceed to parliament, and solemnly protest against any act being passed tending to infringe the liberties of the Church; but the doors were shut against them, and they were compelled to depart without obtaining admission.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Davison to Walsingham, 23rd May, 1584.

The parliament, thus left to the guidance of the court, proceeded to pass a series of Acts against laws totally subversive of the constitution and discipline of the Church. The authority of the king was declared to be supreme in all manner of causes, and to extend over all persons; while to decline his judgment, or that of his council, in any matter whatever, was pronounced to be treason. To pretend an exemption from the jurisdiction of the civil courts, and to attempt to diminish the power of any of the three Estates in parliament, were prohibited under the same penalty. The jurisdiction of all courts, civil and ecclesiastical, not previously authorised by the king and the Estates in parliament, was forbidden; and the holding of assemblies, general or provincial, without the king's permission or appointment, was also prohibited under severe penalties. The uttering—either privately or publicly, in sermons, declamations, or otherwise—of anything to the reproach of the king, his ancestors, or his ministers, and all intermeddling with the affairs of his majesty or his estate, past, present, or future, were declared to be capital crimes,* and the utmost penalties of the law were ordained to be inflicted even on those who heard such speeches without giving information. Finally, the whole spiritual jurisdiction was declared to be vested in the bishops, and such other persons as should be constituted king's commissioners in ecclesiastical causes. As a corollary to these infamous enactments, the sentence of excommunication, which had been pronounced by the General Assembly against Montgomery, was recalled; and a commission was entrusted to the Archbishop of St. Andrew's for the reformation of the university of that place, which was suspected of having been liberalised beyond endurance by the doctrine and example of Melvil, its indomitable principal.† This servile parliament, which seems to have met only to legalise the edicts of one of the most unprincipled minions that ever scrambled into power, wound up its infamous proceedings by ordaining that all persons having in their possession Buchanan's History of Scotland, or his treatise, entitled De jure Regni, should lodge them with the Secretary of State, to be by him "revised and reformed."‡

The decrees so deeply affecting the liberty and independence of the Church, though not yet officially promulgated, were already well known and excited universal indignation and alarm among the clergy and their flocks. Their rage against Arran, who was believed to be the author of these obnoxious measures, was openly expressed; and many suspected, and did not hesitate to affirm, that the king himself was at heart an enemy to the Reformed Church.§ In the meantime, to prevent as much as possible any ebullition of popular

* Spottiswood, fol. 333; MS. Letter, Davison to Walsingham, 23rd May, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 178.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Davison to Walsingham, 27th May, 1584.

‡ Ibid.; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 178.

§ Spottiswood, p. 333.

feeling, orders were sent to the magistrates to silence, or even forcibly drag from the pulpits, all preachers who should presume to criticise or impugn the enactments in question; but the civic rulers were in no haste to enter on this odious task, and on the very next day, being Sunday, the ministers declaimed with all their wonted freedom, and with more than their usual acrimony, against those laws by which they declared that both civil and religious liberty was utterly subverted; and when on the following day the acts, according to custom, were proclaimed at the Cross of Edinburgh, Robert Pont, one of the ministers of the capital, and also one of the lords of session, accompanied by two of his brethren, Lawson and Balcanquhall, solemnly and publicly protested against them in the name of the Church.* This bold act enraged Arran to the highest pitch. He deprived Pont of his office as a lord of session, and gave orders for his apprehension, and that of the others who had concurring with him in the protest; but, unwilling to expose themselves to the ruthless vengeance of their enemy, they withdrew from the city during the night, and though hotly pursued by a party of the king's guard, they succeeded in reaching Berwick in safety by daybreak the next morning.* Their example was followed by all the ministers of Edinburgh, and nearly every clergyman of eminence throughout the kingdom; and the few that remained were speedily subjected to grievous hardships and indignities. They were required to subscribe a bond engaging to obey the late acts of parliament affecting the Church, and to acknowledge the authority of the bishops, under pain of being deprived of their livings. Many preferred the latter alternative, and sought safety in flight, while others were either intimidated or cajoled into compliance. In addition to these violent proceedings against the ministers of the Church, such of the professors of the universities as fell under the suspicion of the court were imprisoned or sent into exile, the students were dispersed, and the universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen were shut up.†

These violent measures at once appalled and enraged the whole community; and suspicions began to be entertained, which were speedily followed by reports openly circulated and eagerly believed, that the king was at heart a Papist, and was paving the way for the introduction of popery. At the same time, the public indignation against Arran, who was regarded as the author of all these national calamities, was roused to the highest pitch. Not content with having subverted the constitution of the Church, forced into exile many of its most eminent ministers, closed the seminaries of learning, and openly trampled on all law and justice in the multiplied oppressions which he practised on all whom he suspected of being inimical to his government, he instituted a system of espionage reaching even to the domestic hearth, and thus in a great measure destroyed that confidence between man and man, without which civil society can scarcely exist. His appetite for forfeitures, of which he generally contrived to appropriate the largest share, was no way inferior to that which had formerly distinguished the Regent Morton during the worst period of that tyrant's rule. Besides a multitude of informers whom he kept in pay, he publicly offered a bounty for the discovery of treason, by issuing a proclamation offering a reward, besides a full pardon, to all persons who should discover any treasonable conspiracy or correspondence. Under the influence of such a temptation, false accusations, supported by perjured witnesses, soon flowed in abundantly. Men of unimpeachable character, if known to be of independent and patriotic spirit, and more especially if possessed of property, were thus arraigned and convicted of imaginary and even impossible crimes. Some were put to death as felons, many were imprisoned or sent into banishment, the estates of such as were possessed of landed property were forfeited, and Arran with the barons who were his base accomplices in villainy divided the spoil. The seeds of distrust were thus sown broadcast over the face of society; the ordinary intercourse of friend with friend, and neighbour with neighbour, was interrupted or darkened by suspicion; and no man felt secure of liberty, property, or life. But the ambition of Arran was equal to his avarice, and he was not less distinguished by the love of power than by its abuse. He aimed at nothing less than engrossing in his own hands all the high offices of the state, as they became vacant. On the demise of Argyle he was appointed to the office of chancellor, which had been held by that nobleman.* He was already governor of the castles both of Stirling and Edinburgh. He even coveted and obtained the office of provost of the capital; and at length consummated his ambitious schemes by procuring himself to be nominated lieutenant-general of the whole kingdom.

The revolution which had taken place in the affairs of Scotland, and the consequent decline of the English interest in that country, were a source of much solicitude and embarrassment to Elizabeth and her ministers. Arran was the greatest support of the French faction, but since the failure of the late conspiracy his power had become less assailable than ever; and yet Elizabeth saw clearly, that so long as he continued in authority she could not hope to manage Scottish affairs as she had formerly done. She had expected that the success of the conspiracy would have been followed by the restoration of the exiled lords, and that by their union with Angus, the head of the powerful house of Douglas, the ruin, or at least the displacement of Arran might easily have been effected; but that expectation was now at an end, and it was not easy to see how the banished lords, with any support or assistance she could in decency afford them, could now make head against so powerful an opponent. In these circumstances, she bethought her of the strange expedient of attempting, by attaching Arran to her interest, to exert through him the influence she was so desirous of exercising over the public policy of Scotland. She accordingly dispatched thither Davison, one of her principal secretaries, who, on sounding Arran, found him quite disposed to receive his advances, and to enter into the views of the English queen. Arran was well aware that detested as he was by the nobility and the great body of the people, he had no security except in the favour of the king, on whose fickle temper he could place little reliance; and he therefore eagerly embraced the opportunity of ingratiating himself with a princess, to whose protection he might look as the strongest bulwark of his own power.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Davison to Walsingham, 27th May, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 179.

† Cotton. MS., quoted by McCrie, Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 227.

Davison had afterwards an audience of the king, at Falkland, in the presence of the young Duke of Lennox, Arran, Huntley, Montrose, and others of the nobility. The interview was far from being amicable, and led to no specific result. James indeed received the ambassador's letters courteously, but he passionately complained of the protection afforded by Elizabeth to the rebellious lords, and her refusal to deliver them up. The ambassador endeavoured to vindicate the conduct of his mistress on the grounds of her ignorance of the circumstances of the late changes, and, in turn, complained of his majesty's refusal to deliver up Holt, the Jesuit, who was known to be intriguing against the government of Elizabeth. He added, however, that as for the exiled nobles, the queen would take care that they should give no disturbance to his majesty's government. James replied, with a spirit and promptitude that took the ambassador by surprise, that there was not much necessity for this assurance, as he hoped he could look well enough to the defence of his kingdom against such rebels as she had taken under her protection. In a short time James, dropping affairs of state, began to talk of the more congenial subjects of hunting and pastimes, and left the ambassador to confer with Montrose, with whom he dined.*

Davison remarked, with horror, the miserable condition to which the country was reduced by a system of misgovernment, which he seemed to attribute fully as much to the king himself as to his tyrannical minister. In a letter which he addressed to Walsingham at this time, he says, "The proceedings of this court are thought so extreme and intolerable as have not only bred a common hatred and dislike of the instruments, but also a decay of the love and devotion of the subjects to his majesty. * * * The want of their ministers exiled; the imprisonment of Mr. David Lindsay in the Blackness; and the warding of Mr. Andrew Hay in the north, who refused to subscribe their late acts of parliament, do not a little increase the murmur and grudging of the people; besides the lack of the ordinary ministry here, which is now only supplied by Mr. John Craig and Mr. John Brand, at such times as they may be spared from their own charges. The king is exceedingly offended with such of them as are fled, blaming them to have withdrawn themselves without cause, notwithstanding some of their friends were already in hands, and warrant given forth for their own charging and apprehending before their departure." * * * "Arran," he observed, "had been promoted to the high office of chancellor; Sir John Maitland, secretary; Sir Robert Melvil, treasurer-depute; and Lord Fleming, lord-chamberlain; whilst Adamson, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, was in high favour, constantly at court, and busily occupied in his schemes for the total destruction of the Presbyterian form of church government, and in the persecution of its ministers and supporters."*

Whatever sentiments might be excited in the mind of Elizabeth by this very prosaic, but not the less distressing description, the account given by Davison of French influence in Scotland, the feelings of James towards his mother, the constant correspondence he kept up with her, and the progress of the scheme by which she was to resign the government to her son, called forth most lively feelings of alarm and indignation. After a long enumeration of portentous circumstances, the ambassador expressed his conviction, "that the Scottish queen, though elsewhere in person, sat at the stern of the government, and guided both king and nobles as she pleased."†

At the very time when this alarming intelligence arrived from Scotland, a conspiracy against the life of Elizabeth Throckmorton's treason. was detected within her own kingdom; and from disclosures made by Francis Throckmorton, a Cheshire gentleman, who was afterwards executed on the charge of being implicated in these treasonable proceedings, it appeared that a design was on foot for the invasion of England. Among the papers of Throckmorton was found a list of the most eminent Romanists in England, and another of the principal harbours in the kingdom, with an exact account of their situations and the depth of water in each. The enterprise it was alleged was to have been conducted by the Duke of Guise, assisted by the Pope, the King of Spain, and the English exiles, and many of the Roman Catholics at home were ready to join the invaders on their landing. Though some doubt has been thrown over the truth of these revelations, which were elicited by torture, yet many collateral circumstances concur in imparting to their leading features, at least, a degree of probability amounting almost to certainty. The English exiles were loud in their denunciations of the barbarous treatment of the Scottish queen, and the persecution to which the

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 10th June, 1584, Davison to Walsingham; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 183.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Davison to Walsingham, 10th June, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 185. † Ibid.

Roman Catholics in England were subjected; and, at this time, by means of secret agents, they were engaged in dispersing throughout the kingdom publications exciting the hatred of their partizans against Elizabeth, and in attempting to persuade them that to take away her life would be not merely justifiable but meritorious. Her maids of honour in particular were invoked to the performance of this bloody office, and undisguisedly exhorted to treat their mistress as Judith did Holofernes, and thus render their names revered by the Church to the end of time.*

Elizabeth was now reaping an abundant harvest

Troubles of Elizabeth. of cares and disquietudes—the natural fruit of her own perfidy, injustice, and persevering cruelty towards her unfortunate sister; and while her present position demanded immediate and vigorous action, the crisis was as full of difficulty as it was of danger. In dread of the machinations of Mendoza, the Spanish ambassador, from which she considered her life to be in peril, she ordered him to quit the kingdom within fifteen days.† But the great difficulty of regaining her lost influence in Scotland, and thus defeating the projects in favour of Mary—the chief source of all her embarrassments—still remained. In this dilemma she had recourse to the opinion and counsel of Davison, who persuaded her that at present it would be in vain to intercede with the king in favour of the exiled lords, and that any attempt to interfere by force of arms to effect such a change in his councils as she desired would be too hazardous to merit consideration.‡ Ever fertile in resources, however, there still appeared to Elizabeth three methods by which she might hope to accomplish her object, but each of these was beset with difficulties, and two of them were directly opposed to each other. The first was to afford such assistance in money, arms, and troops to the banished lords—Angus, Mar, and Glamis—as would enable them to displace Arran, and take into their own hands the management of public affairs. But Elizabeth had one strong objection against this method, it would involve her in “charges,” a thing which she “did utterly dislike;” besides, it would engage her in the support of the Presbyterian Church, whose polity she regarded as republican in its tendency, and therefore “misliked” as much as James himself or his obnoxious minister. A second method was to enter into a compact with Arran, and through him to govern the king, who was entirely guided by his counsels. This method appeared the more feasible, that Arran had already secretly offered to devote himself to her service, had evinced and expressed his predilection for the Episcopalian form of Church government, and declared himself in favour of the alliance with England. But to this plan the almost insuperable objection of “charges” was equally applicable. Arran and his coadjutors had already manifested such inordinately acquisitive propensities, that there was no hope of securing their co-operation without pensions, a matter in which she might have to compete with France. The amount of outlay that might thus be necessary defied conjecture. In addition to this, Elizabeth felt that it would be impossible for her to act in concert with Arran without withdrawing all countenance from the Douglasses and Hamiltons, whom she would much rather employ as instruments for his destruction. The third scheme was to enter into a treaty with the captive queen, who it was supposed would accept almost any terms by which she was likely to be restored to liberty. Such proposals might accordingly be made to her as to alarm James into a compliance with the wishes of the English court. Besides, Mary had already signified her readiness, on condition of being set at liberty, to resign the government in favour of her son; to use her utmost influence to procure the restoration of the banished lords; to cement the amity with England; to discountenance the Romanists in their attempts to disturb the English government; and to acquaint Elizabeth with many secrets which would enable her to thwart the designs of her enemies. But to embrace this method would be to act in direct contradiction to the counsel of her sage and experienced ministers, Burghley and Walsingham, both of whom had repeatedly and strongly expressed their conviction, that if the Queen of Scots were set at liberty, the life of Elizabeth and the existence of the Protestant Church in England would be equally endangered. In this perplexity, Elizabeth called Burghley and Walsingham to her aid, and submitted these rival schemes to their consideration. With respect to an arrangement with Mary, the two ministers concurred in dissuading their mistress from adopting any measure of this description; but they differed in opinion on the other two schemes. Burghley advised her to attach Arran to her interest by sending a confidential minister to hold a secret conference with him on the Borders,* hoping through him to govern the king and re-establish the English influence in Scotland. To this policy Walsingham was strenuously opposed. He considered that no reliance could be placed on the promises or engagements of Arran, and that the relative position of the two kingdoms would never be satisfactorily adjusted so long as his present power continued. On these accounts Walsingham warmly advocated the only remaining expedient, that of supporting the banished lords and using them as instruments for Arran's overthrow. Such, he observed, was the odium in which the king and his tyrannical and haughty minister were held by the nation, that the exiled lords would be welcomed as deliverers, and, if properly assisted with men and money, would speedily drive Arran from the helm of affairs, and render English influence once more predominant.

* MS. State Paper Office, Instructions to Lord Hunsdon, 30th June, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 190.

* Camden, p. 497.

† MS. despatch of Bernardino de Mendoza to the Catholic king. Archives of Simancas, Inglaterra, fol. 839; Mignet.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Davison to Burghley, 23rd June, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 188.

Elizabeth was in this instance more crafty than her ministers. She resolved not to embrace exclusively any one of the three plans which had been under consideration, but, strange as it may appear, to adopt them all, and in the first instance carry them on simultaneously. By this disingenuous policy she hoped to hold all the parties at her devotion, to play the one against the other, and in the sequel to gain her object by treacherously sacrificing such tools as might be found no longer adapted to her purpose.

She commenced this triple game of dissimulation by appointing Lord Hunsdon, the Governor of Berwick, to hold a meeting with Arran on the Borders.* The conference, however, was delayed for some weeks in consequence of the vanity of Arran, who, holding the high office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, was ambitious to appear with such imposing pomp and magnificence as might dazzle the English envoy, and impress him with exalted ideas of the rank and power of the personage with whom he was about to treat. In the meantime, Davison, acting under the instructions of Walsingham, was busily employed in Scotland, in secretly plotting the downfall of Arran, and in organising a party in favour of the exiled noblemen. He was even labouring to seduce the Governor of Edinburgh Castle to betray his trust by delivering up that important stronghold to the Queen of England. At the same time, Colville was not less busy in London. In conjunction with Elizabeth, with whom he had frequent private interviews, he was concerting plans to secure the triumphant return of the banished lords, and endeavouring to induce the Hamiltons to join them in making a sudden irruption into Scotland, for the purpose of seizing Arran or putting him to death, compelling the king to renounce the French alliance, and thus paving the way for the restoration of English influence.

The arrangements for the conference having been at length completed, Hunsdon and Arran met on the 14th of August, at a place called Foulden, near Berwick. Arran made his appearance with a display of grandeur and pomp more befitting a sovereign prince than a minister. He was attended by a splendid retinue of five thousand horse, and accompanied by five privy councillors. The conference was held between Hunsdon and Arran alone, and lasted for five hours—the five councillors being left waiting without, like menials, during the whole of that time. The obsequious deference paid to the haughty upstart by these attendants, some of whom belonged to the highest rank of the ancient Scottish nobility, astonished Hunsdon, who, in a letter addressed to Burghley, remarked that their demeanour rather resembled that of servants than of fellow-councillors. Arran, at the commencement of the conference, solemnly renewed his professions, previously made to Davison, of inviolable attachment to the English interest, and assured Hunsdon that no step should be taken by the king which might tend to disturb the peaceful relations of the two kingdoms. But though Hunsdon, in return, courteously promised on behalf of Elizabeth that the exiled nobles should be removed into the interior of the country, to prevent their occasioning uneasiness to the king or his government by their intrigues, yet, in obedience to the command of his mistress, he complained that James had, contrary to his promises, been courting an alliance with France, had ceased to cultivate amicable relations with England, and treated with unkindness and ingratitude his royal relative, the English queen, to whom he had been so much indebted. In proof of this, he referred to his holding intercourse with the Pope, his tolerating the dark machinations of Jesuits within his dominions, his projected “association” with his mother, his banishment of the noblemen most favourable to the interests of England, and the want of due respect which had in several instances been manifested towards her majesty’s ambassadors. He concluded by expressing on the part of his mistress a hope that Arran would now, agreeably to his own professions, counsel the king to adopt a course of policy tending to establish a close and lasting amity between the two kingdoms, and, in accordance with this, to restore the banished lords.

Arran, in reply, promised to employ his utmost influence in counteracting French intrigue and promoting amity with England. He denied that the king had held any secret intercourse with the Pope, or that he was aware of any Jesuits being within the kingdom; and affirmed that, if he had ever entertained, he now abandoned the intention of forming the “association” with his mother. He vindicated, however, the conduct of the king with respect to some of the English ambassadors, on the ground that they had been sowing sedition and encouraging—nay, actually plotting—rebellion. With regard to the restoration of the exiled lords—a subject on which Arran, for obvious reasons, felt painfully sensitive—he expressed his astonishment that the queen should intercede for such manifest traitors, and would give no assurance that he should employ any influence on their behalf.

The marriage of the king was known to be a matter regarding which Elizabeth, who naturally dreaded the consequence of an alliance with a French princess, felt not a little uneasiness; and Arran, anxious to prove his devotion to her service, adroitly availed himself of this circumstance, by promising to keep James from marrying for three years, under pretence that the queen had in view for him a partner of the royal blood, who would then be marriageable, and on his union with whom she would declare him heir to the throne of England.

The two ministers, having finished their long conference, returned to their companions out of doors, when Arran, who, as well as Hunsdon, appeared to be in uncommonly good humour and high spirits, turning to the Scottish lords, said—"Is it not strange to see two men accounted so violent and furious as we two are, agree so well together—I hope to the contentment of both crowns and their peace?"* The irritability of temper ascribed by Arran to himself and Hunsdon seems indeed to have formed a prominent feature in their characters, for at that time they had the unenviable reputation of being the proudest and most irascible noblemen in their respective countries. It would appear that their unusual complacency on this occasion had its source in private gratification rather than in the successful issue of their public mission. Hunsdon and Burghley had formed the project of bringing about, through the intervention of Arran, a marriage between the young king and a niece of Hunsdon, whose family, as he was cousin to Elizabeth, was consequently of royal blood.† This secret transaction gave great offence to Walsingham, who seems ever afterwards to have regarded his brother minister with more or less distrust.‡

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Davison, 2nd July, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 192.

A short time previous to this, the Master of Gray, a young nobleman just returned from his travels, had been introduced to the notice of the king. He is described as a person of most prepossessing exterior, elegant manners, and insinuating address, but of a thoroughly base and treacherous disposition. He was moreover inordinately ambitious, and was already deeply versed in the mystery of court intrigue. During a residence in France he had been admitted to court, and had attracted the favourable notice of the Duke of Guise, by whom he had been employed as a confidential agent in his secret negotiations with the Queen of Scots, to whose cause he professed an ardent and devoted attachment. His external qualifications soon made a deep impression on the susceptible mind of the young king; and as he rose into favour, he began to excite the jealousy of Arran, who, in order to get rid of a person who might ultimately prove a rival, pointed him out to James as the most fitting person in the kingdom to be sent as ambassador to the court of England.

Gray, who formed part of the suite of Arran, was after the conference introduced to Hunsdon, to whom he presented a confidential letter from the king, relating to the intrigues and conspiracies by which the government of Elizabeth had been so frequently disturbed. In addition to this, Gray informed him that he had an important communication to make, but which he must solemnly pledge himself to conceal from every human being with the exception of the queen: this was, that the king intended shortly to dispatch him to Elizabeth with some ostensible message, to prevent suspicion, but in reality to disclose to her all the secret intrigues and machinations of Mary. Unfortunately, with these Gray was too well acquainted. The captive queen, confidently relying on his hypocritical professions of devotion to her interest, had been induced in the course of their secret correspondence to open too freely to him her own projects and those of her friends, and the means by which they hoped to carry them into effect. It is not easy to find language to characterise the base and unmanly perfidy of the wretch who laboured to gain the confidence of the unhappy queen only to abuse it, and who was now prepared for his own sordid ends to reveal all her secrets to her bitterest enemies. And what shall be said of the unnatural conduct of James, who so far forgot the duty of a son and the dignity of a king as to concur with this vile catiff in betraying his mother? Hunsdon did not keep his promise, but the very next day communicated the whole matter in a private and confidential letter to Burghley, without which we should have had no information of this dark transaction. "Now, my lord," he says, "for the principal point of such conspiracies as are in hand against her majesty, I am only to make her majesty acquainted withal by what means she shall know it—yet will I acquaint your lordship with all. The king did send the Master of Gray at this meeting to me, with a letter of commendation, under the king's own hand, whom he means presently to send to her majesty, as though it were for some other matters; but it is he that must discover all these practices, as one better acquainted with them than either the king or the earl (but by him).* He is very young, but wise and secret, as Arran doth assure me. He is no doubt very inward with the Scottish queen and all her affairs, both in England and France—yea, and with the Pope, for he is accounted a papist; but, for his religion, your lordship will judge when ye see him; but her majesty must use him as Arran will prescribe unto her, and so shall she reap profit by him. * * * I have written to Mr. Secretary [Walsingham] for a safe-conduct to him; but nothing of the cause of his coming, but only to her majesty and to your lordship. If Mr. Secretary be slow for this safe-conduct, I pray your lordship further it, for the matter requires no delay."†

Elated with the successful issue to which he believed matters had been brought by the conference, Arran now returned in triumph to the capital, and again placed himself at the helm of the state. Shortly before his departure for Foulden, he had detected the intrigues of Davison with the captain of the Castle of Edinburgh, for the delivery of that important fortress into the hands of the English. To prevent such attempts in future, and at the same time to add to his already exorbitant power and influence, he now determined to become master

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Sir Edward Hoby to Dr. Parry, 15th August, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 196.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Hunsdon to Burghley, 1st October, 1584; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Davison to Burghley, 27th July, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 197.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Davison, 12th July, 1584; Tytler, ut supra.

* Sic in original.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Hunsdon to Burghley, 14th August, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 199.

of the castle himself.* Accordingly, dismissing the governor and his subordinate officers, he filled their places with his own dependents and followers, compelled Sir Robert Melvil, who had the custody of the crown-jewels and wardrobe, to surrender the keys to him, and taking possession of the royal apartments, appropriated them as a residence for himself and his household.† He had now under his command four of the strongest fortresses in the kingdom—Dunbarton, Stirling, Blackness, and Edinburgh; his wealth, acquired by forfeitures and otherwise, was enormous; he had monopolised in his own person nearly all the high offices of the state; the king was in a great measure a tool in his hands, and none could find access to his presence without Arran's permission. Such an extraordinary course of fortune inflamed the natural arrogance and presumption of the favourite to an intolerable degree. He assumed the consequence and state of a prince, and actually asserted a right to kingly dignity. Pretending that he was a lineal descendant of Murdoch, Duke of Albany, he even boasted that his title to the throne of Scotland was preferable to that of the king himself. Such was the eagerness with which he embraced every opportunity of gratifying his inordinate pride, that on his return from the conference, he caused himself to be saluted with a discharge of cannon from the batteries of the castle—a mark of distinction that had hitherto been reserved exclusively for the king or the regents, or for announcing the assembling of parliament. This audacious arrogance excited in the minds of men of all classes mingled emotions of disgust and indignation, while the recollection of Arran's previous abuse of power filled them with apprehension for the future. No protection from his intolerable tyranny and oppression was to be expected from the king, no redress of wrong and outrage from the administrators of the law. Even parliament, which ought to have defended the rights of the people whom it professed to represent, had become in the hands of Arran little more than a state engine for executing his nefarious projects. All was at his mercy—he, in fact, was the state. It is not surprising, therefore, that as summonses were now issued for the assembling of the Estates, consternation and alarm spread like an epidemic throughout the kingdom: proscriptions, forfeitures, imprisonments, exile, and the scaffold, and every imaginable form of lawless and violent misrule, were expected once more to afflict the nation. Nor were these fears chimerical. Overawed by Arran and his wife, who was as

Meeting notorious as himself for ambition of parliament. and overbearing arrogance, parliament obsequiously passed, without the formality of discussion, such acts as were dictated to them by the imperious minister.‡ In this parliament not fewer than sixty persons were subjected to the sentence of forfeiture, including the Earls of Angus and Mar; the Countesses of Mar, Gowrie, and Cassilis; the Master of Glamis, and others.* An act was also passed ordaining all ministers, readers, and masters of colleges, under pain of losing their stipends, within forty days to subscribe the act of parliament acknowledging the king's power over all estates, spiritual and temporal; and, further, to submit to the jurisdiction of their ordinary bishops; with certification to such as should not comply within the specified time that they should not afterwards, though willing, be allowed to do so.† An instance of unmanly cruelty on the part of Arran, which took place on this occasion, deserves to be recorded. As the king, attended by the lords, was walking in pompous procession to the Tolbooth, where the parliament was to assemble, the unfortunate Countess of Gowrie presented herself before him on her knees, and with tears entreated for grace to herself and her four children, who had never offended his majesty; but Arran, who walked beside the king, hastily drew him away, pushed aside and threw down the weeping lady, and actually trod upon her, leaving her, much injured, in a swoon on the street.‡

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Davison, 12th July, 1584; and ibid., same to same, 13th August, 1584.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Davison to Walsingham, 16th August, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 203.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Davison to Walsingham, 24th August, 1584.

The parliament was no sooner dissolved than Arran and his accomplices, armed with the acts which had just been passed, proceeded to gratify their avarice in the work of confiscation, and their ambition in the ruin of their adversaries. But Arran was not satisfied with the simple administration of the laws, however oppressive these might be, and even though framed under his own direction. The forfeiture of the Earl of Angus had been decreed, but Arran thirsted for his blood; and, in conjunction with Montrose, now concocted a Plot for the plot for the assassination of that nobleman. Of this scheme there is Angus.

too much reason to believe that the king himself was at least cognisant, if not also participant. Angus, though an exile in England, still continued to exercise a great influence in Scottish affairs, and was particularly obnoxious to James, on account of his rigid adherence to the Presbyterian form of worship, and his determined opposition to the king's efforts for the introduction of episcopacy. It was accordingly resolved to employ means to get rid of this formidable opponent, and Arran and Montrose were not long in finding a willing instrument for the accomplishment of their dark design. John Graham of Peartree had long had a deadly feud with Angus, on account of the execution of Robert Graham, one of John's near kinsmen. This circumstance being known to Montrose, he communicated his purpose to the Laird of Cleugh, one of his dependents, who dispatched a boy named Monse to Graham, desiring him to come to Edinburgh. Graham obeyed, and on his arrival was entertained with much festivity by Montrose and Arran for several weeks, during which many jests passed between him and these noblemen regarding his feud with Angus. At length they had him conveyed to Falkland, where the king was then residing; and there, in an outer chamber of the palace, the two earls and the king urged him to avenge the blood of his kinsman by putting Angus to death, and proposed to him at the same time to assassinate the Earl of Mar and the Abbot of Cambuskenneth. So far as Angus was concerned Graham agreed to their proposal without hesitation, provided the king would reward him handsomely. James answered that he would presently give him sixty French crowns, and would afterwards bestow upon him and his heirs a considerable piece of land lying near Montrose. With regard to Mar and Cambuskenneth, Graham, having no feud with them, would not on any terms agree to become the instrument of their destruction. At the close of this interview, Montrose presented Graham with a gun, or "short riding-piece," as it is described by Calderwood, and promised to send him the crowns by the Laird of Cleugh.* That such an atrocious felony should have been planned by the sovereign, in conjunction with the first minister of the crown, seems to us, who happily live in a different age, almost incredible; but, besides that the fact is established by evidence too strong to admit of disbelief, it is quite in keeping with the low standard of morality and the reckless disregard of human life which prevailed among the Scottish nobility at this period. This dark project, however, was providentially frustrated. As Graham was observed lurking suspiciously about the neighbourhood of Newcastle, he was arrested; and, having been brought before Lord Scrope for examination, he not only confessed his wicked intention, but gave a minute and circumstantial account of his dealings with the king, Arran, and Montrose and his confederates. Scrope immediately transmitted information of this discovery to Walsingham,† who judged it prudent in the meantime to divulge it to none except Angus and Mar, to whom it might serve as a salutary warning.‡

* Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 198.

† Ibid.

‡ Ibid.

In the meantime, Arran continued his career of lawless rapacity and revenge. Not contented with the revenues derived from the high offices of the state with which he was invested, and the vast territorial wealth which he had acquired, he imprisoned the Earl of Atholl because he refused to divorce his wife, a daughter of the Earl of Gowrie, and to entail his estates on him. He required Lord Maxwell to exchange part of his hereditary estate for the lands of Kinneil, which had come into his possession by the forfeiture of the Hamiltons, and which he consequently held, as he was aware, by no very certain tenure; and because Maxwell naturally refused compliance with such an unreasonable demand, Arran contrived to revive an ancient feud between him and his hereditary rival, the Laird of Johnston, and artfully to place them in such circumstances of antagonism, that, had it not been for an outbreak of the plague, which occurred at that time, the whole district would probably have been involved in civil war. In defiance not only of justice, but of common decency, Arran further committed to prison Lord Home and the Master of Cassilis—the former because he refused to give up the lands of Dirleton, which lay contiguous to part of Arran's property, and the latter because he would not lend him a sum of money.

These flagrant acts of injustice and oppression rendered Arran universally detested; but his bold defiance of public opinion was manifested by proceedings still more flagitious. David Home of Argaty and his brother Patrick were, at his instigation, or perhaps more properly by his express command, tried, condemned, and executed, on the charge of corresponding with rebels, simply because they had received letters from some of the banished lords, though these communications were proved to relate to matters of private business. About the same time, John Cunninghame of Drumwhassel and Malcolm Douglas of Mains, two gentlemen of fortune and respectability, having fallen under the suspicion of the tyrant, were arraigned on a charge of treason, in having conspired to seize the person of the king when on a hunting expedition, and to deliver him into the hands of the exiled lords, who were preparing to cross the Borders. Only one witness appeared against them; and, although in their defence they fully established their innocence, and even proved that, under the circumstances, the commission of the crime was impossible,* they were nevertheless found guilty, condemned, and put to death as traitors.

These iniquitous proceedings against his opponents amongst the laity, Arran now followed up by an attack on the ministers of the Church. He issued a proclamation commanding all ministers to deliver up the rentals of their benefices, and ordained that none should receive stipends except such as had signified their adherence to the acts for the abolition of Presbyterianism and the establishment of Episcopacy. Many of the clergy resisted this demand, and were ordered to quit the kingdom within twenty days; but, at the same time, were prohibited from seeking an asylum among their exiled brethren either in England or Ireland.† Notwithstanding this cruel order not a few of the recusant ministers, rather than abandon their flocks, chose to remain; and, though at the peril of their lives, denounced the late acts from the pulpit and avowed their resolution not to obey them.‡

* Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 240.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B.C, 22nd December, 1584. Scrope to Walsingham.

‡ Ibid., "For the matter of Peartree, I have kept the same secret, saying to the Earls of Angus and Mar, who, I trust, will use it as the same behoveth." Tytler, vol. viii. p. 206.

* Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 363.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Davison to Walsingham, 16th August, 1584; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 267.

‡ Ibid., p. 208.

Elizabeth, having now maturely considered and fully arranged her plans of double policy regarding the affairs of Scotland, was prepared to act, on the shortest notice, as circumstances might seem to warrant. She had maintained a close correspondence with the banished lords, she had professed an ardent interest in their cause, and encouraged them with promises of support when the time for action should arrive. Angus, Mar, Glamis, Lord Arbroath, the head of the house of Hamilton, and other noblemen, with their retainers, as well as the exiled ministers, were now at her command; and held themselves in readiness, the moment she should give the signal, to burst across the Borders, secure the person of the king, and overwhelm his obnoxious minister in merited ruin. She had, moreover, resumed her pretended negotiations with Mary; and, by holding out to her a delusive prospect of freedom, had induced her to make offer of such concessions and sacrifices that even Walsingham, with all his characteristic caution, advised that her offer should be accepted. Worn out with long confinement, and broken down by multiform cares and sorrows, she was now content to resign the government into the hands of her son, if she were only allowed her liberty and the undisturbed exercise of her religion.

In this position of affairs, Elizabeth now awaited with impatience the arrival of the Master of Gray as ambassador from Scotland, as upon the result of his mission her policy at this crisis would, she felt, in a great measure depend. She had in turn flattered and encouraged all parties, and she was now ready, without compunction, to sacrifice such as she should find unadapted to her purpose. Of the treachery of Gray, Mary had received some intimation from Foutenay, the French ambassador, and had in consequence expressed some suspicion of his fidelity. At this Gray, with impudent hypocrisy, pretended to take great offence; and, before proceeding on his embassy, wrote to her affecting the indignation of injured innocence, and protesting that he considered the course he was now following as the best for her interest. He thought it politic, in order to prevent suspicion, that the king should abandon "the association," and negotiate with Elizabeth solely for himself; and having thus gained the confidence of Elizabeth, he might be able successfully to use his influence to procure the liberation of his mother. Mary, however, was not thus to be deceived; she immediately and indignantly replied, that such a proposal could only emanate from one who was her enemy, and that as such she should in future regard him. On this Gray took occasion entirely to break with the poor captive queen, wrote to her in disrespectful and angry terms, and forthwith set off for England to consummate his villainy.* He halted at Berwick, where he held a conference with Hunsdon, and, contrary to the express injunctions of the king and Arran, who ordered him to communicate his secret instructions to Burghley alone, he insinuated himself into the confidence of Hunsdon by disclosing the whole to him. He informed him that he was commissioned to insist on the banished lords being either delivered up, or denied any longer an asylum in England, and that on the queen's complying, or promising to comply with this demand, he was ready in return to give her such information regarding all the plots recently concerted against her person and government, whether by France, Spain, the Queen of Scots, or the Pope, as should enable her to traverse all their machinations, and avert the intended mischief.*

Having arrived in London, he was very soon admitted to an audience with Elizabeth, to whom he communicated the objects of his mission as he had represented them to Hunsdon.

Arrival of the Master of Gray at the English court.

That he was well acquainted with the secret machinations of the Scottish queen and her friends, both at home and abroad, the unbounded confidence reposed in him by Mary, and the active part he had taken in these machinations, leave no room to doubt; and that he was therefore in a position to render most important service to the English queen is certain.† To the surrender or expulsion of the banished lords, in return for which this service was offered, he annexed other two conditions—that Elizabeth should break off all treaty with Mary, and that she should make an annual grant to the king of a considerable sum of money. To induce compliance with these proposals, he represented to her that James entertained the most implacable hostility against the exiled nobles, whom he believed to be at that very time plotting against his person and government; that the liberation of the Queen of Scots would be attended with great danger both to her majesty and to the king his master; that the proposed "association" with her son was fraught with still greater peril to Elizabeth, who ought, therefore, to pursue such a line of policy as should tend to separate their interests; and, finally, that James was so wretchedly poor that he was likely to fall into the arms of France, unless her majesty should outbid that power in the largeness of her munificence. But in duplicity, selfishness, and perfidy, Gray was almost a match even for Elizabeth herself, who was the very impersonation of these base qualities. He had been commissioned to the English court in the interest of the king and Arran, his minister, but he was as ready to prove false to them as he had been to betray the unfortunate queen. He had two objects of his own in view—to procure the downfall of Arran, and to advance himself in the favour of Elizabeth; and for the attainment of these he was willing to sacrifice every object he had been sent to promote. He cordially hated Arran as a rival, even more than on account of the odious qualities of that minister, and artfully endeavoured to undermine his credit

* Hunsdon to Burghley, 19th October, 1584, Papers of Master of Gray, p. 13.

† Ibid.; Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 212, 214.

* Papers of Master of Gray, Bannatyne Club, pp. 30—37.

with the English queen. He represented to her, that in order to counteract the dangerous influence of Mary and her friends, it would be wise policy to labour to secure the establishment of an administration in Scotland, under the guidance of a minister inimical to that princess, and hinted that Arran was so venal that his professions of hostility to Mary and of devotion to her majesty could not be relied on; but he added that he, the Master of Gray, already stood so high in the estimation of the king that, if backed by the powerful support of Elizabeth, he would undertake to supplant Arran in the royal favour, drive him from power, and so to manage the young king as to bring about an indissoluble league between the two countries, procure the recall of the banished lords, and effect a complete separation between Mary and her son.

While detesting the treachery, it is impossible not to admire the consummate art displayed by this ingenious villain in making this proposal. He was aware that Arran had never been trusted by Elizabeth, and that though for the present she flattered his vanity by her condescension, and cajoled him by a specious appearance of favour, she would rejoice at his downfall. He knew that she was anxious for the return of the banished lords, and that she would be glad of any pretext for breaking off her insincere negotiations with Mary; and he calculated that, if he could only persuade Elizabeth of the possibility of attaining these objects by his means, his exaltation to the place and power now possessed by Arran was certain. Elizabeth listened to these overtures with much pleasure, especially as by the plan proposed the odium of disappointing the hopes she had so cruelly excited in the mind of the Queen of Scots would then be transferred from herself to the young king; and as she was anxious for an alliance with Scotland, having for its basis the defence of both kingdoms against the hostile attempts of the Roman Catholics of the continent—an alliance consequently in which the captive queen could not be included.

The negotiations with Mary were still pending, when a circumstance occurred which fully opened the eyes of Elizabeth to the plots which the Romish party throughout Europe were concerting against her. Creighton, a Jesuit, and a Scottish priest named Abdy, being on their voyage from Flanders to Scotland, were captured by a Danish corsair, and delivered up to Walsingham. During the chase which preceded their capture they had hastily torn up their papers and cast them into the sea; but the wind having blown them back into the ship, the fragments were collected, and having been carefully put together again, were found to contain a plan for the invasion of England by Spain and the Duke of Guise. Under the influence of the torture, Creighton made such disclosures as excited universal alarm among the Protestants throughout the kingdom. It appeared that a formidable conspiracy, under the name of the "Holy League," had been entered into by the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Guises, for the purpose of extirpating Protestantism throughout Europe; and that England, which was considered its stronghold, had been selected as the first object of attack. To oppose this powerful confederacy, Elizabeth proposed a combination of all the Protestant princes in a league for their common defence, and with this view dispatched ambassadors to Denmark and Germany. At the same time, such was the excitement among the Protestant party at home, that an association was formed throughout the kingdom for the protection of the royal person and government; and the members pledged themselves to pursue to the death all who should make any attempt against the life of the queen, as well as the person on whose behalf such an attempt should be made.* This association, which was first projected by Leicester, was eagerly joined by persons of all ranks; and in a parliament which was now held, its objects and constitution were approved and legalized. An act was at the same time passed providing that, in the event of any enterprise against the life of the queen being attempted by or for any person claiming a title to the succession at her death, it shall be lawful for her majesty to constitute a court by a commission under the great seal for the trial of such offences, and with authority to pass sentence upon the parties implicated. And further, in the event of a sentence of "guilty" being pronounced, it was ordained that "all persons" against whom this sentence should be passed, should be excluded from all right of succession to the crown, and should be liable, together with their aiders and abettors, to be prosecuted to the death by her majesty's subjects.†

These measures greatly alarmed the captive queen, who at once saw that she was the person against whom they were principally aimed, and regarded them as designed to pave the way for at last depriving her of life, as she had been so long deprived of liberty. She had shortly before been transferred from Sheffield to Wingfield Castle, and from the custody of the Earl of Shrewsbury to that of Sir Ralph Sadler and Lord Somers. To testify her abhorrence of any attempt being made in her name, or on her account, on the life of Elizabeth, she proposed to sign the bond of the Association; but her signature being declined, she had a similar declaration drawn up, which she signed for herself alone. Learning that the Master of Gray had been employing means to separate her interests from those of her son, she wrote to him to be cautious lest he should injure the title which her son held from her, adding that she intended "to leave him all the government, only reserving to herself the authority due to a mother, as her misfortunes and cares had made her lose all taste for the rest."‡

While the country was agitated by the discovery

* Camden, vol. ii. p. 418; Lingard, vol. viii. p. 172.

† Carte, vol. iii. p. 687.

‡ Labanoff, vol. vi. p. 71.

of the great Catholic conspiracy, which seemed threatening to involve civil and religious liberty in one common ruin, to roll back the tide of time, and to re-introduce the darkness and despotism of former ages, the life of the queen was in imminent peril from another quarter. A Welshman named William Parry, a doctor of laws, and a member of the House of Commons, had formed the resolution of taking away the life of his sovereign, and had been for some time watching an opportunity of effecting his purpose, when his design was fortunately detected. Not a little mystery hangs over this affair, and the accounts given of it by historians are inconsistent and contradictory. It is said that he had acted as a secret agent of Walsingham, and in that capacity had visited Italy and France, and had mingled much with the English and Scotch refugees in those countries. While there he had become reconciled to the Church of Rome, and was desirous of evincing the sincerity of his new-born faith by perilling his life in this unhallowed enterprise. He was probably strengthened in his determination by a book which about this time was published by Cardinal Allen, with a view to prove that it was not only innocent but meritorious to put to death an excommunicated heretic; and, according to his own account, he was urged to the commission of the deed by the Nuncio Raggazoni, Cardinal di Como, the Roman Secretary of State, and the Pope himself, who encouraged him by the grant of a plenary indulgence. He was further instigated by the Jesuits, both at Venice and Paris, and animated by the approbation of the English exiles. He had frequent access to the queen, but had hesitated to embrace the opportunities thus afforded him. His design at last was divulged by another agent of Walsingham's, named Neville, the only man in England to whom he had confided the dreadful secret. He confessed his guilt, but pleaded his former services in mitigation of punishment. He was nevertheless put to death in a shocking and barbarous manner, having been disembowelled while still alive.*

It may be easily imagined that the discovery of this premeditated treason tended greatly to intensify the excitement of the public mind, as well as the apprehensions of Elizabeth, at this alarming crisis. She was consoled and gratified, however, by the affectionate loyalty of her subjects in forming the association for the protection of her person, and thus felt sufficiently secure to follow the counsel given her by the Master of Gray. She now determined to lend her aid towards undermining Arran, as a preliminary to the return of the banished lords; she suspended her negotiations with Mary, and had her removed from Wingfield to the fortress of Tutbury; and she appointed Sir Edward Wotton as ambassador to Scotland, in room of Davison, whom she had recalled.

The ostensible object of Wotton's embassy was to prevail on James to join the Protestant league. Its secret purposes were—first, the overthrow of Arran; and, secondly, the re-establishment of the English influence in Scotland on a firm and enduring basis. Great caution was to be employed in labouring to effect these objects. He was instructed to ingratiate himself with the noblemen opposed to Arran, to endeavour to gain their confidence, and to assist to the utmost of his power in promoting their designs. With regard to the second of these aims, the ambassador was instructed to make no direct or formal overture to the king, but artfully to endeavour to win his affection as an agreeable companion; to throw him off his guard by seeming to enter cordially into his amusements; to flatter him by appearing to share in his caprices; and then to seize every opportunity, indirectly, and as it were incidentally, to give his mind a bias in the required direction.

Perhaps no man in the kingdom was better adapted to such a mission than Wotton. He is described as a person of insinuating address and polished manners; he was affable, sprightly, and entertaining; and concealed a subtle and intriguing spirit under the mask of the easy and careless gaiety of a man of fashion. He had travelled much, and, being an acute observer of men and manners, his mind was furnished with a large store of humorous observations and amusing anecdotes. He excelled in all the sports of the field and other pastimes to which James gave up so large a portion of his time; and being furnished with the appropriate present to the young monarch of eight couples of the best trained and fleetest hounds, and some choice horses, it was expected that he would be welcomed as a most agreeable associate.

The Master of Gray now returned to Scotland, intent on the prosecution of the base project on which he had so successfully entered; and the king and Arran, unconscious of the perfidious manner in which he had betrayed his trust, thanked him for the success with which he had managed to carry through the object of his mission.* At the same time, Elizabeth did not fail to play her part in this drama of elaborate treachery. While actually occupied, in conjunction with Gray, in an attempt to compass the overthrow of Arran, and bring about the restoration of the exiled lords, she wrote to the former in flattering terms, and ordered the latter to withdraw from Newcastle into the interior of the country.† Meanwhile Gray laboured to alienate the mind of the king from his mother, and wrought so successfully on his fears and those of the council, that they unanimously resolved to abandon the project of an "association," as fraught with danger both to the youthful monarch and the country.‡ This result was of course highly

* MS. Letter, Master of Gray to Elizabeth, 24th January, 1584-5; ibid., Colville to Walsingham, 31st December, 1584; also Papers of Master of Gray, p. 41, Master of Gray to Walsingham, 24th January, 1584-5; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 218.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Colville to Walsingham, 31st December, 1584.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Gray (under the assumed title of Le Lievreau) to Elizabeth; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 218.

grateful to Elizabeth, and so increased her confidence in Gray's management, that she seemed prepared to pursue any line of policy he should suggest. The more effectually to disarm all suspicion of these secret machinations, Gray now wrote to Elizabeth, entreating her for the present to appear to discountenance the designs of the banished lords, who were now anxiously awaiting her permission to cross the Borders. On becoming apprised of this apparent change of sentiment on the part of the queen, they addressed themselves in pathetic terms to Walsingham, representing that all things were in readiness for the enterprise, that their friends in Scotland were impatient for their arrival, and they now only waited for the signal from her majesty to march suddenly into Scotland, seize the king's person, and expel Arran ignominiously from his councils and from the country. To their dismay their proposal was received with coldness: they were informed that the queen, reflecting on the failure of their former attempt at Stirling, was apprehensive of a like result in the present instance, and therefore thought it better to adopt the more moderate course of mediation.*

The king and Arran, now relieved from all apprehensions of molestation on the part of these formidable exiles, felt themselves at liberty to renew their attacks on the Church. The ministers were everywhere compelled either to subscribe the acts of parliament establishing episcopacy, or to relinquish their charges; all communication with their exiled brethren was prohibited under heavy penalties; even to pray for them was held to be a crime, and visited with severe punishment.† In these trying circumstances the greater number seem to have submitted; among whom were John Durie, who had so long and strenuously resisted, John Brande, formerly the colleague, and John Craig, the coadjutor of Knox. Among the few who held out and braved the indignation of the court were Mr. Patriek Simpson, Mr. Robert Pont, and Mr. John Hall. The presbytery of Ayr were unanimous in their condemnation of certain parts of these obnoxious statutes, which they subscribed in this manner:—"The first act of Parliament, made in the year 1584, we approve; the third and fourth we deem as devilish, and express against God's Word." They then took instruments that they subscribed no otherwise, and were accordingly deprived of their stipends.‡ Such indeed was the distressing condition to which many of the recusant ministers were reduced, that David Hume, one of the exiles, writing from Berwick to Mr. James Carmichael, declares that his estates were forfeited, and his wife and children reduced to beggary; and yet, he added, "he might be grateful he was alive, though in exile, for at home terror occupied all hearts. No man," he concluded, "while he lieth down is sure of his life till day."*

Regardless of the odium to which these violent proceedings exposed him, and unconscious of the plot now concerted for his destruction, Arran continued to revel in his abuse of power with the most wanton license. He persecuted with relentless malignity all who were connected with the exiled lords; in gratification of his cupidity and of his revenge against all who dared to oppose him, law, justice, and humanity, were alike trampled under foot; while his insolent and haughty bearing to the ancient nobility, and his impatience of all rivalry in the favour of the king, rendered him at once feared and detested, and excited a universal desire for his overthrow.

Immediately after the return of Gray, James had dispatched another embassy Bellenden sent as ambassador to England. to London, at the head of which was Sir Lewis Bellenden, the Justice-clerk. He was instructed to accuse the banished lords of participation in the conspiracy of Mains and Drumwhassel, and to demand their expulsion from England. On his arrival, the accused noblemen were brought to London, on pretence of hearing the charges brought against them; and in a conference with the ambassador, held in the presence of Elizabeth's council, they had no difficulty in completely establishing their innocence. Though sent with the concurrence, if not by the direct appointment of Arran, Bellenden was as reluctant as Gray to promote the views of that odious minister. On the contrary, he secretly consulted with Elizabeth and the banished lords as to the return of the latter to Scotland, and the means to be adopted for Arran's overthrow. It was still, however, deemed expedient to preserve appearances with Arran, until the time should arrive when the mask might be dropped with safety; and accordingly Bellenden, by desire of the queen, wrote to him in strong terms, assuring him of her continued regard. Elizabeth had little difficulty in inducing most of the Scottish courtiers to enter into her designs—a circumstance which can excite no surprise, as Arran, so far from taking pains to conciliate them, seemed to seize every opportunity to mortify, insult, and oppress them. Gray, Sir John Maitland, and Bellenden, were at this time the individuals in whom she chiefly confided. The last she had sent back to Scotland, along with Sir Edward Wotton, her ambassador.

Wotton having arrived in Edinburgh, was soon admitted to an audience with the king. In conformity with his open instructions, he congratulated James on his resolution to break off Arrival of Wotton, the English ambassador. "the association" with his mother; thus delicately sounding him again on this important subject, and rendering it more difficult for him, if he should feel so inclined, to retract his determination. With regard to the formation of a firm league with England in

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Colville, 10th January, 1584-5.

† Spottiswood, p. 336.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 351.

* MS. Letter, Calderwood, British Museum, Ayscough, 4736, fol. 1528.

defence of the Protestant cause, he found the king, in common with the bulk of the nation, inclined to enter warmly into that measure. A convention of the Estates was accordingly held at St. Andrew's, which was opened by the king with a speech of considerable length and ability, in which he described the popish league as "the confederating together of all the bastard Christians in a league which they term holy, albeit it be most unholy in very truth, for the subversion of the true religion in all the realms throughout the world." He set forth in strong terms the necessity of uniting all princes professing the Protestant faith in a counter-league for their mutual defence; and concluded by laying before the convention "a form of act to be subscribed by them, wherein they promised to ratify and approve in parliament whatever he or any in his name should conclude with the Queen of England, or any in her name, for the making and effectuating of the aforesaid league." This act, which was unanimously adopted and signed by the convention, concludes in these words:—"Wherein we do fully consent the league be defensive and offensive; and do solemnly avow, in quarrel and maintenance thereof, neither to spare lands, lives, goods, nor gear, or whatsoever it hath pleased God to grant to us. In witness whereof, in presence of his highness, we have subscribed these presents with our hands. At St. Andrew's, the last of July, 1585."* The complete success of Wotton in this object of his mission has been in part ascribed by Robertson and other historians to the promise of a pension, which he was authorised to hold out as an encouragement to James, whose necessitous circumstances rendered any aid of this description peculiarly acceptable.† It does not, however, appear necessary to lay much stress on this motive, if we consider the alarm naturally produced by the rapid progress of the formidable confederacy of popish princes against Protestantism, and their "full intent to prosecute their ungodly resolution with all severity, not only in their own estate and dominion, but also in other kingdoms, where they [could] pretend no lawful power nor authority to deal."‡ The amount of the pension was five thousand pounds annually—a sum at that period far from inconsiderable; yet Wotton was instructed by Walsingham not rashly to name the exact amount, lest the smallness of the sum should do more harm than good.§ The donation, if considered small, was probably rendered more palatable by the fact, which Wotton took care to mention, that it was the same sum allowed to Elizabeth by her father before she ascended the throne. The ambassador was also entrusted with a commission of a more delicate nature. The subject of James's marriage, regarding which however nothing had been as yet definitely fixed, was a source of no little anxiety to Elizabeth. She was in dread lest he should form an alliance that would enable him to escape from her control, or to obtain a dowry which should render him independent; and having learned that an embassy was about to proceed from Scotland to Denmark, Wotton was instructed to ascertain its object, and, if that should turn out to be any matrimonial scheme, he was ordered to do his utmost to throw obstacles in the way. He was also to seize any favourable opportunity that might occur to sound the king himself on this matter, and endeavour to elicit his sentiments regarding the daughter of the King of Denmark, by alluding to her in his presence. With reference to the banished lords, he was instructed to inform the king that Elizabeth considered his resentment against them as excessive and indefensible; that Arran had accused them of a conspiracy against his life, and that, still more recently, a similar charge had been brought against them by Bellenden; but that, on investigation, both stories turned out to be so destitute of evidence and even probability, that she considered them as mere inventions contrived for some sinister purpose.*

But, besides these open instructions, the ambassador had as usual a secret commission, requiring for its management a rare combination of caution, cunning, and dexterity. This was no other than the ruin of Arran, who still continued to be cajoled into the belief that he stood high in the confidence and favour of the English queen. In reality, however, Elizabeth had ceased to expect any great advantage from his attachment to her interest, even if that attachment could be relied on; and she was now prepared, in conformity with her premeditated policy, to cast him off as a tool no longer fit for her purpose. The plot for his overthrow had been contrived by Gray while in London, with the help of Walsingham, and the full knowledge and concurrence of Elizabeth, who further had prevailed on Bellenden to become a party to its execution. On Wotton's arrival he found Gray and his coadjutors deeply occupied in maturing the plan of the conspiracy, which had already advanced so far, and was regarded with such confident anticipations of success, that they were anxiously deliberating in what manner they should dispose of their victim when he should fall into their hands—whether they should get rid of him once for all by assassination, or content themselves with driving him from the king's councils. This question was decided by Elizabeth herself, who wrote to Gray by Wotton, recommending that the life of Arran should be spared. This advice, however, was only adopted conditionally, as appears from a letter addressed next day by Wotton to Walsingham, in which he says—"By my letter that myself did deliver to the Master of Gray from her majesty, their purpose is altered, at her majesty's request, to deal with him by violence; not-

* Calderwood, vol. iv. pp. 373—377.

† Robertson, vol. ii. p. 115; Aikman, vol. iii. p. 94.

‡ Act subscribed by the convention.

§ MS. State Paper Office, minute, Walsingham to Wotton, 23rd May, 1585; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 221.

* MS. State Paper Office, Instructions to Sir Edward Wotton, April, 1585; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 221.

withstanding, upon the least occasion that shall be offered, they mean to make short work with him." * A similar reservation was made by Gray, in a letter addressed also to Walsingham, on the same day, in which he signifies his willingness to act according to her majesty's recommendation, unless his own life should be in danger. "When life is gone," he significantly added, "all is gone to me." †

About this time three ambassadors, attended by a splendid retinue, arrived in Scotland from the Danish court. The ostensible object of their mission was to demand the restoration of Orkney and Shetland to the crown of Denmark; but their secret instructions were to endeavour to negotiate a marriage between a princess of that country and the young king. They were introduced to him at Dunfermline, and received with much courtesy; and, having presented their claim, they were directed by James to remove to St. Andrew's, and there await their answer. At the same time, anxious to show them the respectful attention due to their official rank, he informed them that they should be accommodated with the use of his own horses for their journey. Arran and Wotton, however, who seem to have discovered the real object of the embassy, resolved not only to employ every means in their power to thwart it, but to take every opportunity to insult and disgust the ambassadors. Accordingly, when they were about to take their departure for St. Andrew's, Arran maliciously interfered to prevent the horses promised by the king from being brought to them; and the ambassadors, who, trusting to the royal offer, had not otherwise provided for their journey, found themselves obliged to perform it on foot. Though naturally indignant at this treatment, they remained for some time at St. Andrew's, impatiently expecting the king's answer; but though he had repeatedly fixed a day for giving them a final audience, Wotton and Arran contrived to induce him to break every appointment. In the meantime, Arran employed certain of his emissaries to watch their motions, and to mock and insult them whenever they appeared in public; while Wotton, playing a deeper game, artfully ingratiated himself into their favour by his attentions, pretended to sympathise with them on the indignities to which they had been subjected, and informed them, under a pledge of secrecy, that their king and country were spoken of by James and his courtiers in the most disrespectful and contemptuous terms. At the same time, he strove to instil into the mind of the facile monarch something of that very contempt of which he accused him. He represented the Danish monarchs as a race of traitors—men of ignoble descent and barbarous manners, and utterly unworthy of being allied by marriage to the King of Scotland, the lineal descendant of the most ancient monarchs of Europe.

The ambassadors, at last—exasperated by insult, mortified by neglect, and wearied out with delay—threatened to take their departure without receiving the king's answer, when Sir James Melvil fortunately discovered the unworthy artifices of Wotton, and hastened to expose them to the justly offended ambassadors, who were thus induced to change their determination. In the meantime, with like intent, he sought a private audience with the king, and with some difficulty succeeded in disabusing his mind of the prejudices instilled into it by the English envoy, who had so recklessly endangered the amity between the two nations by his insidious interference. He represented to James that Denmark, so far from being a semi-barbarous state, had already formed amicable relations with many of the continental powers; that great honour had been done to him by the splendid embassy which he had undervalued and misused; and that the royal family of Denmark actually stood in near relationship to himself. The explanations of Melvil had the effect of undeceiving the mind of the king; he now clearly saw that he had been misled, commended Melvil's discretion in putting the matter in its proper light, and said he would not for his head but that the truth had been shown him. Having mollified the ambassadors by a somewhat more respectful treatment, and given them an agreeable, if not a satisfactory answer to their message, he courteously dismissed them.

Though Wotton's ostensible mission was now at end, he continued to prolong his stay at the Scottish court; and while apparently wholly immersed in festivity and amusement, he was intent on seizing every passing occasion of influencing the mind of the king, who took much pleasure in his society, and from whom he was seldom absent. At one time he would casually advert to the unhappy dissensions among the nobility, which he partly attributed to the king's protracted dislike to the banished lords; at another he would make some slight general allusion to the promised pension, and again gently drop a recommendation of an early conclusion of the league with England. On this point, indeed, James seemed inclined to go every length the ambassador could desire; and when at last the details of the treaty were submitted to him, they received his cordial and unre-served assent.*

At the same time the English envoy was eagerly, though secretly, labouring to secure the other objects of his embassy. He was in constant communication with Gray, Bellenden, and the other conspirators; and as suspicions had arisen that Arran, notwithstanding all his professions of zeal for the adjustment of the league with England,

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 31st May, 1585; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 222.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Master of Gray to Walsingham, 31st May, 1585; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 222.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 5th June, 1585; ibid., 7th June, 1585, Heads of the League; ibid., Walsingham to Wotton, 27th June, 1585; also ibid., Thomas Miller to Archibald Douglas, 8th July, 1585; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 223.

was actually intriguing with France to counteract it, the question began to be entertained whether they ought not to avert the danger by at once cutting short his career. It is melancholy to be

Plot for the assassination
of Arran.

obliged to add that the assassination of Arran was at length resolved on; that Elizabeth and

Walsingham were cognizant of the intended murder; and that, almost incredible as it may seem, Bellenden, the Lord Justice-clerk, and the second criminal judge in the kingdom, offered to Wotton to find a person who would perpetrate the crime, if the ambassador would assure him that Elizabeth would take the assassin under her protection. The indefatigable researches of Mr. Tytler, to which we have so often had occasion to refer, have brought to light incontestable proofs of the existence of this dark design, and of the implication in the guilt of premeditated murder of the personages we have named. This evidence is to be found in letters addressed by Wotton to Walsingham and Elizabeth, containing minute and circumstantial details respecting the proceedings and deliberations of the conspirators; "and although the letters are in many places written in cipher, and wherever the intended murder is directly mentioned the words have been partially scored out, still, fortunately for the truth, we have a key to the cipher, and the erasure is often legible."*

Wotton was not a little perplexed by Bellenden's proposal, for though quite willing that Arran should be put to death, and persuaded that such an event would be highly satisfactory to his mistress, he was reluctant to share either in the danger or the odium; and Elizabeth, in the exercise of a like selfish caution, had given special instructions to her ambassador not to implicate her in the transaction. It may be interesting to give some extracts from Wotton's letter to Walsingham regarding the intended murder. It will be observed that the ambassador employed certain numbers to designate the individuals whose names he was anxious to keep under a double seal of secrecy, a key to these numbers having no doubt previously been furnished. The letter describes an interview between Wotton and Douglas, Provost of Lincluden, who turned out to be the assassin provided by Bellenden, and is distinguished in this secret correspondence by the number 38.† "The Tuesday, in the morning," says the ambassador, "38 came likewise to me, that used, in effect, the same discourse that . . . had done before, all tending to a necessity of . . . which, for the weal of the realms, should be done, so that the doers of it have thanks for their labour.‡ I propounded to him, whether he might not be better discouraged § by way of justice. 'Yea,' quoth he, 'worthily for twenty offences; but the king will not admit such proceedings.' Then

I asked if 20 [Morton] might not attempt it, seeing he was already engaged; but that, for want of secrecy, he said, and distance, was full of danger. At last, I perceived, by his speech, that himself was to do it. * * * The thing he requires, as he saith, is to have thanks for his labours, and for his good affection he bears to her majesty: and if he fortune to despatch it, that he be relieved with some money, to support him in the estate of a gentleman till he were able to recover the king's favour again; and this, I trust, quoth he, 14 [the Earl of Leicester] and 15 [Mr. Secretary] will not deny. In general speeches, I told him that your honours were personages that had him in special recommendation. * * * I told him I would make relation of this matter to your honours: and he said he would write himself to Mr. Secretary; and so praying me, if I did write aught, to commit his name to cipher, we departed."* This atrocious conspiracy was happily frustrated; but it leaves an indelible stain on the memory of all concerned.

James, who had from the first manifested a strong inclination to the proposed league with England, had now finally resolved on that important measure, and was impatient for its conclusion, when an event occurred which, though by no means uncommon in those unsettled times, threatened at first to be followed by an open rupture between the two kingdoms. At a meeting, or "day of truce," as it was then called, held on the Borders in Teviotdale, between the wardens of the Middle Marches, Sir John Foster on the one side, and Kerr of Fernyhirst on the other, a quarrel happened to arise amongst them and their armed attendants, in which Lord Russell, the eldest son of the Earl of Bedford, was slain. This broil would appear to have been purely accidental, and though it was declared to be so by Foster, the English warden,† yet Elizabeth, her secretary, and Wotton, her ambassador, feigned to consider it as a premeditated design on the part of Fernyhirst, at the instigation of Arran—whose niece he had married—for the purpose of involving the two kingdoms in war. In reality, however, the occurrence was merely laid hold of as affording a favourable opportunity of bringing Arran into discredit with the king;‡ and Foster, notwithstanding his previous declaration to the contrary, was ordered to draw up a memorandum tending to show that the attack had been preconcerted.§ On the strength of this document, Wotton accused Fernyhirst to the king of being accessory to the murder at the instigation of Arran, and demanded that both should be committed to ward.|| James was greatly distressed at

* MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. viii., fol. 195, Wotton to Walsingham, 1st June, 1585; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 29th July, 1585; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 226.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B C, Sir John Foster to Walsingham, 28th July, 1585.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 31st July, 1585.

§ MS. State Paper Office, B C, Sir John Foster's reasons to prove the murder of Lord Russell was intended: Tytler vol. viii. p. 228.

|| Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 379.

* Tytler, vol. viii. p. 224.

† MS. Letter, Wotton to Walsingham, 9th June, 1585; Caligula, c. viii. fol. 109; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 225.

‡ Expelled from court or from the king's councils.

the delay he apprehended this untoward event would occasion to the ratification of the league, which he had evidently sincerely at heart; and losing command of his feelings, he threw himself on his bed, and wept like a child, protesting his own innocence, and exclaiming that "it had not grieved him so much if ten thousand men had entered into the country and spoiled to Edinburgh."*

Wotton's demand having been warmly advocated by the Master of Gray, Arran was committed a prisoner to the Castle of St. Andrew's, while Fernyhirst, besides being placed in confinement in Dundee, was threatened with being sent to England to stand his trial. The ambassador and his associates did not fail to embrace the opportunity afforded by the absence of Arran from court, to push forward and mature their plans for his overthrow, and for the return of the exiled lords; but their progress was, in the meantime, interrupted by a new act of treachery on the part of Gray, who, in consideration of a bribe from Arran, procured his liberation from confinement at St. Andrew's, with permission to reside in his own mansion at Kinneil. The scheme devised for the overthrow of this much detested minister was thus threatened with defeat, and seemed likely to result rather in consolidating than subverting his power.†

Elizabeth was now once more immersed in a sea of troubles and perplexities. Arran it was certain had proved false, and was again intriguing with France; and her only remaining hope, the Master of Gray, could no longer be relied on, he having betrayed her by liberating Arran, after becoming acquainted with the whole of her complicated and crafty policy for the ruin of that minister. Conjoined with Gray, therefore, Arran was absolutely unassailable, no point seemed open for attack. Her crafty mind, so fertile in expedients, for once failed her; she was caught in her own net, and while she imagined herself the deceiver, she had the mortification of finding herself deceived. In this strait, relief came from a very unexpected quarter. The Master of Gray, though apparently on friendly terms with Arran, whose liberation he had so recently procured, knew well that the friendship was utterly hollow on both sides, or rather, that each was at heart the deadly enemy of the other; and now that Arran's position was strengthened by the failure of the late attempt, it was not without reason that Gray began to feel his own position far from secure. Distrusted however by all parties for his perfidy, he was scarcely less at a loss than Elizabeth what course to pursue. Under these circumstances, he thought it prudent to retrace his steps, and to fall back on an expedient which, while it seemed to offer her the only chance of safety, might be a means of restoring to him the lost favour of the English queen:—this was to unite himself with the party of the banished lords and exiled ministers, and, through their means, to effect a new revolution in Scotland. With this view he addressed a letter to Archibald Douglas, then an exile in England, who, notwithstanding the crimes by which his life had been stained, was on such terms of intimate friendship with Walsingham and the exiled lords and ministers, as to render him a fitting medium of communication with their party. To him, therefore, Gray unreservedly propounded his scheme.

He proposed that Angus, Mar, and Glamis, should endeavour to adjust their differences with the Hamiltons, and unite with them in an invasion of Scotland; he assured them that if such an attempt were ever to be made, now was the time, and that there would be such a general diversion in their favour, that they would be able to muster two to one against their enemies. He promised also to lend all his influence towards the promotion of their enterprise; and hinted that he hoped to be able to find means to get rid of Arran, and that he would even make the attempt himself, if he could do it so secretly as to avoid being suspected. He affirmed that they would be joined by Bothwell and Lord Home, and he thought also by Cessford; and he concluded by assuring Douglas that if they would now come down, the king should either yield or leave Scotland.*

In the meantime the king, accompanied by Wotton, had gone on a hunting expedition to Dunbarton, and thither Gray repaired, for the purpose of communicating his scheme to the ambassador. Wotton entered warmly into his views, and immediately wrote to Walsingham, giving him an account of the plot, and strongly recommending its adoption. It was, he said, the advice of Gray that her majesty, pretending to be deeply offended about the slaughter of Lord Russell, should refuse to conclude the league for the present, and should meanwhile give the exiles permission to cross the Borders; and he had the strongest confidence that with some reasonable grant of money they would, with the help of their friends in Scotland (many of whom were prepared to join them the moment they set foot on the Scottish soil), be able to seize the person of the king as well as that of his hated minister, and effect a salutary revolution in the government of the country. Gray himself, Wotton added, would give every assistance in his power; and if the project should be favourably regarded by the English court, he would dispatch a confidential friend of his and of the exiled lords to consult with Angus and the other lords about its execution; and as to the league, he would undertake to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion.†

The plot, which received the cautious approval

* MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. viii., fol. 222, Master of Gray to Archibald Douglas, 14th August, 1585.

† State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, Dunbarton, 25th August, 1585. Partly written in cipher; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 232.

* Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 380.

† MS. Letters, State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 29th and 30th July. 6th, 7th, 13th, 19th, and 21st August, 1585; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 228.

of Walsingham, was eagerly embraced by the expatriated lords and the ministers, their brethren in exile; and Lords Claud and John Hamilton, the mortal enemies of Arran, having become reconciled to Angus and his party, determined to unite with them against the common enemy. At the same time Gray, who was now energetically occupied in maturing his plot, secured a valuable accession to the party in Scotland in the person of the Earl of Morton, formerly Lord Maxwell, who held a most distinguished place among the nobility for his skill and experience in military affairs. This nobleman, who was warden of the Western Borders, had shortly before fallen under the displeasure of the king by slaying Captain Lammie, the commander of a party of the king's forces, which had been sent to the assistance of the Laird of Johnston, who had been attacked by Morton. By the advice of Arran, the king was preparing to bring a strong body of troops against Morton, whom he had determined to punish for this bold defiance of his authority,* when proposals were made to him by Gray to join the conspiracy. Influenced, perhaps, more by considerations of personal safety than any other motive, he at once embraced Gray's offer, mustered his forces, and encamped on the Borders, in readiness to join the expected invaders.† Information of this circumstance was immediately transmitted by Wotton to Walsingham, both of whom witnessed with much satisfaction the growing strength of Gray's party.‡

The final event was retarded by the apparent indifference or indecision of Elizabeth, and still more by the vigilance of Arran, and the power which, though nominally a prisoner in his house at Kinneil, he still possessed. He was in constant communication with the French government, from which he had recently received a large sum of money;§ and, in conjunction with three notorious Jesuits—Holt, Dury, and Bruce, whom he then harboured in Scotland,||—he was intriguing to bring about the restoration of the queen and the re-establishment of popery.¶ Besides this, he was as busily engaged in forming designs against his enemies, as they were in pushing forward their plot for upsetting his government and devising schemes for taking away his life.

Of the conspiracy originated by Gray, as well as of Wotton's zeal and activity in promoting it, Arran was fully cognizant; and of this the ambassador was made painfully aware by Arran's brother, Colonel Stewart, who openly reproached him for his treachery in the presence of the king. He indignantly, and even scornfully repelled the charge, but he was not the less sensible of the dangerous ground on which he stood. He rightly considered, that with an enemy so powerful, and at the same time so vindictive and unscrupulous, as Arran, even the respect due to his official character as an ambassador would be no protection from assassination. Accordingly, he again and again wrote to Walsingham, representing that his life was in danger. "Though ye in England," he wrote from Stirling, "be slow in resolving, Arran and his faction sleep not out their time; for they are now gathering all the forces they can make, and within three or four days Arran meaneth to come to court, and to possess himself of the king, in despite of the queen of England, as he saith; which if he do, I mean to retire myself to the Borders for the safety of my life, whereof I am in great danger, as my friends which hear the Stewarts' threatenings do daily advertise me. Your honour knoweth what a barbarous nation this is, and how little they can skill of points of honour. Where every man carrieth a pistol at his girdle (as here they do), it is an easy matter to kill one out of a window or door, and no man able to discover who did it. Neither doth it go for payment with those men to say I am an ambassador, and therefore privileged, for even their regents and kings have been subject to their violence.

"This, notwithstanding, I would not be so resolute to depart, if by my tarrying I might do her majesty any service. But I find the king so enchanted by Arran, and myself so hated of him, as I cannot hope to negotiate to any purpose so long as Arran shall be in court. If the Queen of England would send down the lords, they will be able to work wonders here, and to remedy all inconvenients. If the Queen of England do it not, this country will be clean lost and all her friends wrecked. Other hope to England than in them, I see none, the king being young and easily carried, and most about him either papists or atheists."*

On the same day, in a second letter to Walsingham, the ambassador thus expressed himself: "The Master of Gray, through our English delay, findeth himself driven to a great strait; for the king presseth him greatly to meet with Arran, and threateneth that unless he do it, he shall have just cause to suspect him. But the Master assureth me he will by one means or other avoid it, and will hold good these fourteen days. Therefore what ye will do must be speedily done.

"I am not, for my own part, the greatest favourer of [violent courses], and therefore have hitherto rather related other men's speeches and opinions than given my advice. But now matters frame so overthwartly, as I must needs conclude, that no good can be done here, but by the way of . . . ;† which being used, you may bring even the

* State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 12th September, 1585.

† Historie of James the Sext, pp. 212, 213; State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 30th September, 1585, Stirling; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 233.

‡ State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 30th September, 1585, Stirling.

§ Original, State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 4th September, 1585, Stirling; also same to same, 21st August, 1585.

¶ Original, State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, Stirling, 18th September, 1585.

* State Paper Office, 22nd September, 1585, Stirling, Wotton to Walsingham.

† The word is in cipher.

proudest of us to [cry] for miseri corde on our knees."*

It is remarkable that, although the conspiracy was now fully organized and all the arrangements completed, and notwithstanding its existence was no secret, Gray and Wotton still continued at court, and were suffered, without molestation, to embrace the opportunities thus afforded them of penetrating the designs of the opposite faction, and holding daily communication with the other conspirators. On the 5th of October, Wotton wrote again to Walsingham, informing him that the king had determined to lead his forces in person against Morton, before the 20th of October, and that Arran was to be set at liberty and restored to court. If any attempt, therefore, he added, were to be made against Arran, there was not an instant to lose.†

Elizabeth was at length roused into action, and throwing off her assumed coldness and reserve, she ordered her ambassador to solicit an immediate audience of the king, and, in her name, to demand that Kerr of Fernyhirst, the murderer of Lord Russell, should forthwith be delivered into her hands. She of course neither wished nor expected that this demand should be complied with, but the refusal would afford a pretext for withdrawing Wotton from court, when the time should come for throwing off all disguise and proceeding to carry the plot into execution.

All things being now in readiness, Elizabeth at Return of the length gave the long-desired per- banished lords. mission to the banished lords to set forward on their important enterprise. Angus, Mar, and Glamis, were then in London, attended by Mr. Andrew Melvil, Mr. Patrick Galloway, and Mr. Walter Balcanquhal; but before setting out on their journey, they engaged in a solemn exercise of humiliation and prayer at Westminster, and implored, with many tears, that the Almighty would strengthen them for their undertaking, and grant them success.‡ Having reached the Borders, they were soon joined by the Hamiltons; and entering Scotland, they were met at Kelso by Bothwell, Home, Wedderburn, Cessford, and other barons and gentlemen.§ The news of their arrival spread rapidly throughout the country, and was everywhere received with exultation. The king himself was amongst the last to become aware of what was going forward. He was occupied near Hamilton, in company with Wotton, in his favourite pastime of the chase, when intelligence reached him that the banished lords had crossed the Borders, and had been joined by Morton with all the forces at his command. Not less alarmed than surprised by this information, he immediately sent for Arran, and returned with him to Stirling, both the town and castle of which had recently been strongly fortified for the protection of the king and court in perilous emergencies. In the meantime, Wotton had consummated his intrigues in Scotland by a plot for seizing the person of the king in the park at Stirling, and conveying him to England; but this design having been discovered, the king gave orders to arrest the ambassador in his house, intending to carry him along with the army, which was now on the point of proceeding against Morton, and to hold him as a hostage. The ambassador, however, being apprised of his danger, escaped during the night on a fleet horse to Berwick, whence he wrote to Walsingham and the queen, representing that having been informed of the king's order for his arrest, he had judged it better for her majesty's service to quit Scotland than by remaining to "bring ruin upon the common cause."* He at the same time wrote a letter to the king, alleging the return of Arran to court as an excuse for his abrupt departure.

On the 25th of October the lords advanced to Jedburgh, where they issued a pro- They issue a clamation setting forth the mo- proclamation. tives that had impelled them to take up arms and repair to the king. These were declared to be the delivery of his majesty from his present evil counsellors, the restoration of the privileges and independence of the Church, the rescue of the country from the grievous oppressions to which it had been so long subjected through the misgovernment of Arran, and the preservation of amicable relations with England. This proclamation, which was published everywhere throughout the kingdom, called on men of all ranks both in the towns and in the country to assist in the enterprise, under pain of being reputed "partakers and maintainers of all vice and iniquity, assisters of the traitorous conspirators aforesaid [Arran and his coadjutors], and enemies of true religion, his majesty's authority, and of the public quietness betwixt the two realms."†

The court was now in great consternation and perplexity. Arran and Stewart Consternation accused Gray as the author of the of the court. conspiracy, and importuned the king to send for him without delay and put him to death.‡ Gray, who was then in Perthshire busily engaged in strengthening and organising his party, boldly obeyed the summons, and making his appearance before the king, repelled with feigned indignation the accusation of Arran and his brother, and defended himself with such courage and adroitness as evidently to impress the royal mind with a conviction of his innocence. Arran and his party were now exasperated to the highest degree, and resolved to assassinate both Gray and Bellenden at the first opportunity, should it even be in presence of the king.§

* State Paper Office, 15th October, 1585, Berwick, Wotton to Elizabeth; same to Walsingham.

† Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 388.

‡ Relation of the Master of Gray, by Bannatyne Club, p. 59.

§ Ibid.

* State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 22nd of September, 1585, Stirling; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 237.

† State Paper Office, Wotton to Walsingham, 5th October, 1585, Stirling.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 381; also MS. History, Ayscough, 4736, fol. 1545.

§ Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 382.

So sudden and unexpected had been the crisis, that no time was left for making preparation to defend the place. Only a few troops had been assembled, and these so heartless in the cause that they could not be relied on; the castle had not been provisioned for a siege, and so strong was the current of popular feeling against Arran and his faction, that the hurried and feeble efforts made for the defence were secretly thwarted or rendered ineffectual by those to whom the arrangements were entrusted. Meanwhile the lords, who were not unacquainted with the state of affairs at Stirling, pressed forward with alacrity towards that place, and, at the head of nine or ten thousand men,* reached Falkirk on the 31st of October. Next day they marched forward to a place called St. Ninian's, within one mile of Stirling, where they halted and made preparations to offer battle to their enemies. The king's party, however, were in no condition to accept the challenge to meet the invaders in the open field; but a considerable body of troops, under the command of Colonel William Stewart, were drawn up in the market-place within the town, prepared to make at least a show of resist-

The lords gain possession of Arran undertook to defend the Stirling bridge that led to the town. The lords found means, however, to enter during the night through a narrow lane, by which they could only pass one by one, and thus without resistance obtained possession of the town. Arran, seeing that all was over, and dreading the consequence of falling into the hands of his enemies, locked the gate, threw the keys into the river, and fled for his life, accompanied only by a single individual of his suite. Colonel Stewart made a desperate attempt to repel the invaders by firing upon them as they entered the market-place; but although the army of the lords was weakened by the insubordination of the Borderers, who broke their ranks and roamed over the town in search of plunder, yet the forces under Stewart, unsupported by the townspeople and lukewarm in the cause, were quickly routed, and Stewart himself, hotly pursued, was forced to take refuge in the castle.† Montrose, Crawford, and the other lords of Arran's faction then at Stirling, followed his example, so that the place was crowded to excess with persons of distinction, including many of both parties.‡

During these proceedings the moderation of the lords was conspicuous, and served not merely to increase their popularity, but even to mollify the resentment of the king himself. Every effort was made to spare the effusion of blood, so that the fatal casualties on both sides amounted to a very inconsiderable number.§ Having now become masters of the town, the lords next prepared to lay siege to the castle. They had proceeded so far as to plant their banners before the block-house or principal bastion, when the king, sensible of the impossibility of making a successful defence, felt it necessary to attempt an accommodation. He accordingly sent out the Master of Gray, under the protection of a flag of truce, to demand the object of their hostile approach. They replied in submissive and conciliatory terms, that they had come to offer their dutiful services to his majesty: they declared "that nothing was more dear to them than the king's honour and safety, but, banished their country, robbed of their estates, their friends cruelly prosecuted, and all access to his majesty denied, they were forced, in order to save themselves from ruin, to act as they had done; yet, if admitted into his majesty's presence, they would humbly solicit his forgiveness." James consented to an interview, which he was not in a position to refuse, on three conditions: first, that his life, honour, and estate should be preserved; secondly, that the lives of Montrose, Crawford, and Colonel Stewart should be spared; and thirdly, that all matters should be transacted peaceably.* To the first of these conditions the lords eagerly consented, protesting solemnly that they never had any other intention than to preserve his majesty's person, dignity, and estate, and to deliver his majesty out of the hands of such as, under pretext of his name and authority, had oppressed both the Church and the commonwealth, and exposed to danger both his life and his crown. As to the second, they replied that seeing the persons he had named had troubled and oppressed the whole nation, they felt bound in duty to his majesty, and from the love they bore to their country, to seek the means of delivering them up to public justice, to be dealt with as they had deserved. With respect to the third, they humbly supplicated his majesty that he himself should take order, and see all things conducted peaceably to the contentment of his subjects, and they promised him all aid and assistance.† In return they required of the king that he would consent to reform the corruptions and abuses that had crept into the Church and commonwealth, by the evil government of those who had abused his authority, and that he would subscribe a short declaration which they had drawn up to that effect. They further required that, for their own security, the castles and strengths of the realm, together with the persons of their enemies, by whom the king was then surrounded, should be delivered into their hands;‡ and, lastly, that the king's guard should be changed, and a captain appointed of their nomination. However unpalatable to James Submission of these demands might be, resist- the king. ance was hopeless, and he reluctantly submitted. The gates of the castle were now opened, and the lords, having made prisoners of the Earls of Montrose, Crawford, and Rothes, together with Lord

* Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 339.

† Ibid., p. 390.

‡ Relation of the Master of Gray, by Bannatyne Club, p. 60.

§ Calderwood, vol. iv. pp. 390, 391.

* Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 391.

† Ibid.

‡ Ibid.; also Relation of the Master of Gray; papers of the Master of Gray, printed by the Bannatyne Club, p. 60.

Doune, Sir William Stewart, and others, were admitted into the presence of the king. The scene which now presented itself was very remarkable. Those bold barons who but a few hours before had threatened to lay siege to the royal residence, and had just, with arms in their hands, dictated terms to their sovereign, now fell on their knees before him and implored his forgiveness. Lord Arbroath, as first in rank, being nearly related to the sovereign, spoke for all. They were come, he said, to offer their duty to his majesty, and humbly to implore his forgiveness and favour. "My lord," answered the king, "I never saw you before, and I must confess that of all this company you have been most wronged. You were a faithful servant of the queen, my mother, and in my minority, when I was incapable of judging, you were indeed hardly used. As for the rest of you, did not your own conduct procure your sufferings? And as for you, Francis" (turning to Bothwell), "who has stirred up your unquiet spirit to come in arms against your prince? When did I ever wrong thee? Yet, as I believe, none of you meant any harm to my person, I give you all my hand and heart; I will remember nothing that is past, provided that for the future you behave as dutiful subjects.* A pardon was then granted them in the most ample form, and all their measures which had led to this pacification were declared to be loyal and acceptable service to their prince.† Next day this remission and declaration were publicly proclaimed; and the lords, availing themselves of the victory they had achieved, assumed at once the functions of government. By their Arran pro- order, and in the king's name, claimed a traitor. Arran was proclaimed a traitor in the market-place; the king's guard was changed, and the command of it taken from Colonel Stewart and conferred on the Master of Glamis; Lord Arbroath was appointed Governor of Dunbarton Castle, and the Earls of Crawford and Montrose were committed to his custody; the Castle of Edinburgh was delivered to the keeping of Sir James Home, of Coldingknowes, Tantallon to Angus, and Stirling to the Earl of Mar.

A parliament was now summoned to meet at Meeting of Linlithgow, in which the royal pardon granted to the returned lords was ratified and confirmed, the decrees of forfeiture formerly passed against them were annulled, and they were fully reinstated in all their honours and possessions; while Arran was declared a public enemy, and stripped of his title, which reverted to the representative of its former owner. Under his original designation of Captain James Stewart, which he ever afterwards retained, he took refuge in some obscure corner of the western coast, and skulked abroad, unhonoured and unpitied, during the remainder of his ignominious existence. No attempt appears to have been made to apprehend and bring him to justice for the many enormous crimes of which he had been guilty during the dismal period of his iniquitous administration; and, indeed, it is but too evident that the king still cherished for him an undiminished affection, and was not without hope that some new turn in the wheel of fortune might once more restore him to power. This may be justly inferred from the fact that the office of chancellor, vacant by the expulsion of Arran, was not filled up; but the duties of that high functionary were devolved in the meantime on Maitland the secretary, under the title of vice-chancellor, without doubt in the expectation of Arran's speedy return.*

Contrary to the express stipulation made with the king by the lords on their return, nothing was done in this parliament towards redressing the grievances of the Church. James was as resolutely bent as ever on upholding the late arbitrary enactments; and the lords, apparently contented with their own restoration to their honours and estates, basely stooped to ingratiate themselves with the king, not merely by letting slip an opportunity so favourable for securing the liberties of the Church, but even by acquiescing in the continued enforcement, under the renewed authority of parliament, of the most tyrannical laws, by which so many of the distinguished ministers who had been their own companions in exile were persecuted and oppressed.

In the meantime, the Master of Gray had lost no time in conveying to Elizabeth, her Secretary Walsingham, and Archibald Douglas, the gratifying intelligence of the triumphant success of the conspiracy; and, in his letter to Walsingham, he assured him that if Elizabeth would now send an ambassador to Scotland, the league between the two kingdoms would, without further delay, be concluded to her entire satisfaction.† Sir William Knollis was selected for this important mission, and was forthwith accredited to the Scottish court. On the 23rd of November he had audience of the king at Linlithgow. James received him with much courtesy and many professions of devotion to the queen his mistress. He expressed himself entirely in favour of the proposed league, which he professed his readiness to conclude without delay; and declared that although the invasion of Angus and his friends had at first excited his displeasure, their demeanour had subsequently been such that he had become perfectly reconciled to them, and had cause rather to bless God that so great a revolution had been effected without bloodshed than to regret what had taken place. Knollis, in his official letter to Walsingham, declares that he saw no reason to doubt the sincerity of the king; that he and the lords appeared to be on friendly and confidential terms; that he was under no restraint, but was in the daily habit of hunting with a few attendants; and that as Arran was now

* Spottiswood, pp. 342, 343.

† Relation of the Master of Gray, p. 61; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 242.

* McCrie's Life of Melvil, p. 351.

† State Paper Office, Master of Gray to Walsingham, 6th November, 1585; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 242.

out of the way, and Montrose, Crawford, and the rest of that party were in custody, no apprehension of any sudden change seemed to exist.*

Shortly afterwards, James dispatched Sir William Keith with a message to the Embassy of Randolph. English queen, requesting her to send an ambassador to Scotland with full powers to negotiate for the final adjustment of the treaty between the two kingdoms.† Randolph, who had already acted so conspicuous a part in Scottish affairs, was charged with this important commission, and in a few days once more made his appearance at the Scottish court. Short however as the interval was, he found on his arrival that he was likely to have difficulties to contend with which he had not anticipated. An ambassador from France had just arrived, bringing with him, as was reported, a cargo of French crowns, whose suspected destination could not fail to give considerable uneasiness to the English envoy. Popery was still struggling to regain a footing in the country; the emissaries of the imprisoned queen were carrying on their secret machinations in connection with their party in England; Holt and other Jesuits continued to lurk in the country, under the protection of Huntley, Montrose, Crawford, and other Roman Catholic noblemen; and Morton, emboldened by his late success, publicly testified his adherence to popery, and shocked the whole Protestant community by causing mass to be celebrated in the Provost Church of Lincluden.‡ All these circumstances contributed to shake the confidence of the ambassador in the king's sincerity; nor were his doubts altogether removed by the prompt arrest of Morton, and his imprisonment, by order of the king, in the Castle of Edinburgh.

Randolph had been instructed to congratulate James, in the name of the queen his mistress, on the tranquillity which then prevailed in his dominions, to signify her desire to prosecute the negotiations for a permanent religious league between the two kingdoms, and to caution him to beware of French intrigue. He was further commanded to insist on the delivering up of Fernelhirst, as well as of Holt and the other Jesuits, who were still harboured in Scotland; to advise the rigorous prosecution of Morton for his late offence; and the adoption of the severest proceedings against Arran, who was still at large, though proclaimed a traitor. In return for the king's compliance with these demands, Elizabeth promised to bestow on him an annual pension, and solemnly to engage by a deed under her hand and seal to suffer no attempt to be made to prejudice or set aside his right of succession to the crown of England.§

* State Paper Office, Mr. William Knollis to Walsingham, Litchow, 23rd November, 1585; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 243.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Randolph to Walsingham, 24th February, 1585-6; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 244.

‡ Spottiswood, p. 344; copy, State Paper Office, Roger Ashton to Walsingham, 17th January, 1585-6; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 245.

§ Original draft, State Paper Office, principal points of Mr. Randolph's instructions; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 246.

On the third day after his arrival, the ambassador was admitted to an audience, and found the king full of professions of affection for his sister, whose advice he declared his readiness to follow, as the best that could be given; and although, as Randolph afterwards learned from Maitland, the secretary, and Bellenden, the justice-clerk, very tempting offers had been made by France, and the pecuniary necessities of the king were at that time unusually urgent, the ambassador succeeded in obtaining the signature of James to the league with England, and transmitted it to Elizabeth for her ratification.*

Thomas Milles, the ambassador's assistant and secretary, was employed as the bearer of this important document. He was at the same time instructed to communicate to Elizabeth information of a plot against her life, which was then being concocted both in Scotland and England, and to warn her to be upon her guard. Randolph wrote also to Burghley and Walsingham on the subject; but, apparently unwilling to commit to writing such particulars as had come to his knowledge, referred them to Milles for further information. That something very alarming was in agitation there can be no doubt. The matter is involved in mystery; but there is reason to believe that this conspiracy formed part of the plans of the popish league, whose ramifications extended over a great part of Europe. In Randolph's letter to Walsingham, he evinces his serious apprehensions of the threatened danger in these significant terms:—"The men, and perchance the women, are yet living, and their hearts and minds all one, that devised or procured the devilish mischiefs that hitherto, by God's providence, she hath escaped. You have heard, both out of Spain and France, what is to be doubted out of the Low Countries. I have seen what warning hath been given for her majesty to look unto herself; and, in the presence of God, I fear as much despite and devilishness from hence as from them all; though I judge the king as free as myself, and could himself be content that he were out of this country."† It is impossible not to believe that all these secret machinations, by which the mind of Elizabeth was kept in almost perpetual disquietude, were in part the fruit of her own persevering cruelty, perfidy, and injustice to the Queen of Scots; so surely does iniquity bring along with it its own punishment.

The inveterate insincerity and dissimulation of the English queen were on this occasion again displayed in her treatment of the young king, with whom we might suppose she was now on terms of strict and confidential friendship. Having obtained his signature to the league, which she had so much at heart, she now threw off the mask of affectionate regard which she had assumed with a view to flatter him into compliance, and meanly violated the promise of pecuniary aid made by her ambassador as a counterpoise to the large offers made by France. On the return of Milles with the treaty of the league, to which Elizabeth had adhibited her signature, he brought with him an autograph letter from the queen to James, expressed in such harsh and contemptuous terms as excited his violent resentment; * while, to add to his chagrin and disappointment, he found that the pension, which, according to the promise of Wotton, should have been twenty thousand crowns, had now sunk to four thousand pounds. Such were the rage and disappointment of the young king, that he strongly expressed his regret at having subscribed the treaty, and was with difficulty prevailed on by the ambassador to abide by his engagements.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 1st April, 1586, Randolph to Lord Burghley, by Thomas Milles; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 247.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Randolph to Walsingham, 2nd April, 1586; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 248.

All obstacles, however, being at length surmounted, the ambassador took his departure, and shortly afterwards the negotiations were finally concluded by commissioners from both kingdoms, who met at Berwick on the 19th June.† By this treaty, which was declared to be offensive and defensive, the high contracting parties bound themselves to defend the evangelic religion, as professed in both countries, against all adversaries, notwithstanding any previous league to the contrary. In case of either country being invaded, it was stipulated that no assistance should be given by the other to the invader, notwithstanding any alliance that may have formerly existed between them. If England should be invaded in any part remote from Scotland, it was agreed that the King of Scots, at the request of the Queen of England, should send to her assistance, but at her expense, a body of forces not exceeding two thousand horse and five thousand foot; and if Scotland should be invaded, Elizabeth engaged to send to the assistance of James three thousand horse and six thousand foot. In the event of England being invaded at any point within sixty miles of the Scottish Borders, it was stipulated that James should assemble his whole forces, and take the field against the invader, in the same manner as he would do in the defence of his own country. If Ireland should be attacked, all Scottish subjects were to be prohibited, under pain of rebellion, from passing over into that country to assist the queen's enemies. It was further agreed that all rebels harboured within either country should either be delivered up or expelled from the kingdom; that no agreement should be contracted by either party with any foreign state in contravention of this treaty; that all former treaties of amity between the two kingdoms should continue in force; and that, on the king's attaining the age of twenty-five, this league should be confirmed by the parliaments of both kingdoms.‡

The conclusion of this important contract, which was proclaimed at Berwick on the 5th July, gave sincere satisfaction to the English queen; as it not only afforded her a great security against foreign invasion, and freed her from that perpetual source of inquietude—the dread of the ascendancy of French influence in Scotland, but completely separated James from his mother. James, at the same time, was gratified by the receipt of a letter from Elizabeth, written with her own hand, in which she assured him that she would suffer no step to be taken which might derogate in any degree from his right of succession to the English crown.*

At the intercession of Elizabeth, through Randolph, her ambassador, James, about this time, astonished and shocked the whole nation by the recall and pardon of Archibald Douglas, who had fled into England about six years before, on account of his participation in the murder of the king's father. That he had foreknown and concealed that crime he himself admitted; that he was actually present at its perpetration was asserted by his own servant, Binnie, when on the scaffold, who declared that his master returned home after the explosion covered with soil and dust. James had often required Elizabeth to deliver him up, but in vain. He had been for some time imprisoned by her, but ultimately acquired her favour and confidence by betraying the secrets of the Scottish queen, by whom he had been trusted and employed; and Elizabeth now interceded for his recall, that he might employ his influence at the Scottish court to counteract that of the captive queen and her partisans. Having obtained the king's permission to return, he brought to him a letter written by Elizabeth in his favour,† and was treated not merely with forbearance, but with courtesy and kindness. It is not easy to penetrate James's motives for his extraordinary and unnatural conduct in this affair; but the worst has yet to be told. After perusing Elizabeth's letter, James ordered all the courtiers present to retire, that he might hold a private conversation with Douglas on the subject of the murder. "At your departure," said the king, "I was your enemy, and now at your returning I am and shall be your friend. You are not ignorant what the laws of this realm are, and what best may agree with your honour to be done for your surety. I must confess her majesty's request in your favour to be honourable and favourable, and your desire to have come by assize‡ to be honest; and I myself do believe that you are innocent of my father's murder, except in foreknowledge and concealing—a fault so common in those days that no man of any dealing could misknau;§ and yet so perilous to be revealed, in respect of all the actors of that tragedy, that no

* Spottiswood, p. 351.

† MS. draft, State Paper Office, Elizabeth to James, Scottish Royal Letters, 6th April, 1586; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 252.

‡ To be tried by a jury.

§ To be ignorant.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Randolph to Walsingham, 13th May, 1586, Edinburgh; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 249.

† Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 587.

‡ MS. State Paper Office, principal points of the articles of the league, 5th July, 1586.

man, without extreme danger, could utter any speech thereof, because they did see it, and could not amend it; and therefore I will impute unto you neither foreknowledge nor concealing, and desire that you will advise with my secretary what may be most agreeable to my honour and your surety in trial, and it shall be performed.*

It is easy to see how this advising with the secretary, under such circumstances, was likely to

His trial terminate. Douglas was brought and acquittal. to a pretended trial, in which all the forms of justice were utterly disregarded. He was allowed to frame his own accusation, and to choose his own assize; he appears even to have been the only witness examined, and no questions were asked but such as had been previously agreed on with the accused himself.† He was of course acquitted, and was not only received into the king's confidence and friendship, but subsequently restored to his rank and estate, and sent back to the court of England in the quality of ambassador.

It is now time to return to the unfortunate Queen of Scots, whom we have so long left almost unnoticed in her cruel captivity. A victim to the mean jealousy, selfishness, and implacable malignity of Elizabeth, she had, contrary to every sentiment of humanity, and every principle of justice and international law, been now detained a close prisoner for nineteen years in various parts of England, not unfrequently under the most painful restrictions, and in mansions so inhospitable as scarcely to be fit for the residence of human beings. During that long period she had been subjected to mortifications, privations, and indignities without number, and incessantly tantalized by pretended negotiations, holding out hopes of liberty foredoomed to end in disappointment. She was now past the prime of life; her long confinement and Melancholy condition of Mary. continual anxieties had broken her health; the want of exercise and a chronic rheumatism, induced by the coldness of the apartments in which she was imprisoned, had so far deprived her of the use of her limbs that she could not walk without assistance;‡ and the energy of her mind, no longer supported by the buoyancy of youth, was rapidly giving way under the pressure of accumulated misfortunes, cares, and sorrows. That she was, throughout the whole period of her captivity, a source of anxiety and alarm to the English queen, was only what might naturally have been expected. An independent sovereign, unjustly detained a prisoner within the dominions of another, she obeyed one of the first instincts of human nature in endeavouring to effect her escape; rendered comparatively impotent by the restraint under which she was placed, it was natural and proper that her friends, and all whom the common sentiments of justice and humanity prompted to commiserate her condition, should exert themselves to procure her liberation; disgusted with fruitless attempts at treaty, weary of concessions which only deepened her humiliation, and hopeless of obtaining release by appeals to either the justice or the clemency of Elizabeth, she had a perfect right to ask the assistance of any foreign power at once able and willing to help her; nor can Mary reasonably be blamed if, in order to regain her freedom, she had encouraged or even solicited an invasion of the kingdom. The danger to which the government of the English queen was thus exposed, the consequent embarrassments in which she was involved, and the continual perturbation by which her life was embittered, though the natural fruits of her own flagitious conduct, intensified her hatred of the unhappy queen, and led her at an early period, as we have seen, to seek relief by depriving her of life. Such was the engrossing selfishness of Elizabeth's character, that it seems frequently to have extinguished within her all sense of justice, and to have blinded her to the plainest dictates of reason. In her eagerness to gratify her own desires, she forgot that others had rights as well as herself, and, as in the case of Mary, was guilty at once of the wickedness and the folly of first inflicting an unmerited injury, and then regarding with indignant astonishment, and punishing as a crime, the attempt to escape, or the natural impulse to resent it. Unfortunately for Mary, nearly every attempt made in her favour by foreign powers aimed also at the restoration of popery in England. This enlisted against her the whole of the Protestant party in the kingdom, and thus strengthened the hands of Elizabeth and her ministers, and encouraged them to adopt the most violent measures. Still more disastrous was it that the fanatical zeal of some of her supporters should have prompted them to embark in the criminal enterprise of attempting to assassinate the Queen of England, and raise Mary to the throne of that kingdom.

Ever since the agitation of "the great matter," during the regency of Mar, the desire of getting rid of her prisoner by death had been cherished by Elizabeth, and numerous consultations on this dark subject had taken place between her and her ministers, who at length, with an ungenerous, forecasting policy, began to pave the way for bringing about the object which they had so much at heart. It is impossible to doubt that the league with Scotland was eagerly sought as a means to this end, inasmuch as it would effectually separate Mary from her son; that the same end was in view in the earnest intercession of Elizabeth for the recall and pardon of Archibald Douglas, who, having betrayed the secrets of the captive queen, now offered to consummate his villainy by promoting the design for her destruction; and, above all, the iniquitous measure recently passed by the parliament was unmistakeably intended to effect the final ruin of the unfortunate princess, by rendering her responsible for the crimes of others, though perpetrated without her knowledge or consent.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Archibald Douglas to Walsingham, 6th May, 1586.

† Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 587.

‡ MS. British Museum, Caligula, c. ix., fol. 333; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 312.

By means of the abominable system of espionage, which in this age was reckoned a necessary appendage of government, Walsingham about this time detected the existence of two distinct though combined plots—one for the assassination of Elizabeth, the other for the invasion of the kingdom, the dethronement of Elizabeth, and the re-establishment of the Catholic religion in England; and the real or imputed implication of Mary in the guilt of both, at length ushered in the last scene in the long-protracted drama of her tragical sufferings.

It is no easy matter to give a clear view of the involved and complicated details of these plots, which, from the secrecy with which they were carried on, the number of persons engaged in them, some of whom were implicated in both, and the difficulty, or rather impossibility of separating truth from falsehood, amidst varying and sometimes conflicting statements, were not well understood even by contemporaries, and have been recorded with no little variety by historians. It is said that three priests—Dr. Gifford, Gilbert Gifford, and Hodgson—belonging to the English Jesuit seminary at Rheims, having adopted the blasphemous notion that the papal bull by which Elizabeth was excommunicated was dictated by the Holy Ghost, had instilled this impious doctrine into the mind of John Savage, an officer in the Spanish army, a furious bigot, and a man of reckless bravery; whom they induced to believe that the assassination of an excommunicated heretic was a most meritorious action in the sight of God, and would insure him who accomplished or even attempted it an eternal crown of glory. The distempered mind of Savage being wrought up to a high pitch of fanatical enthusiasm, he bound himself under a solemn oath to put the queen to death, and immediately prepared to return to England to execute his design.* It was arranged that he should station himself in a gallery through which the queen was in the habit of passing to chapel, and there either stab her with a poniard or shoot her with a pistol; or, if judged more convenient, he was to attack her when walking in her garden, or when taking the air attended only by her women.†

In the meantime, John Ballard, a priest of the same seminary, returned to France, after having travelled, under different disguises, for five or six years among the Catholics in various parts of England and Scotland, instructing them in the principles of their faith, and confirming them in their hatred of Elizabeth, whom they esteemed the most formidable heretic of their day. In these peregrinations he had observed that a general feeling of discontent with the institutions under which they lived prevailed amongst the Catholics, and he was led to conclude that they wanted only a competent leader, with a little aid and encouragement from their brethren abroad, to induce them to rise in open rebellion. Pondering over these impressions, and stimulated by an ardent zeal to crush Protestantism in what was regarded as its stronghold, he formed the project of invading England, overturning the government of Elizabeth, and re-establishing the Roman Catholic Church. Full of this scheme, he consulted with the Spanish ambassador, Mendoza, who was then in Paris, from whom he received ample encouragement, and some assurance of support from the King of Spain and the Duke of Guise. But Charles Paget, an Englishman and a zealous Catholic, to whom he also broached the enterprise, succeeded in persuading him that no attempt of the kind could be successful until Elizabeth should be removed and Mary set at liberty. Ballard, in consequence, returned to England under the assumed name of Captain Fortescue, to renew his intrigues, and, if possible, to pave the way for the great revolution which he had projected.

On his arrival in England, he imparted his design to Anthony Babington, a young gentleman descended from an ancient family in Derbyshire, possessed of a large fortune, imbued with an ardent zeal for the Catholic religion, and devoted to the cause of the captive queen. This gentleman, during a residence in France, had become acquainted with the Archbishop of Glasgow, Mary's ambassador at the court of that country, by whom he had been furnished with letters of recommendation to Mary, as a person in whom she might confide, and who was well qualified to be of service in her cause. He had also been recommended to her by Thomas Morgan, her agent on the continent, who was at this period suffering imprisonment in France, on account of his connection with Throckmorton's conspiracy. Mary, in consequence, wrote to him a confidential letter on his return to England, and for some time employed him to manage her foreign correspondence, and to supply her with secret intelligence.* The increasing vigilance of her keepers, however, had latterly compelled him, from a regard to his own safety, to desist from these offices, though he was still enthusiastically devoted to her interest. He cordially approved of Ballard's project, but strongly expressed the same opinion entertained by Paget—that it was essentially necessary to success first to get rid of Elizabeth. Ballard assured him that that important preliminary would soon be accomplished, and acquainted him with Savage's vow, who was then in London watching an opportunity to effect his purpose. Babington expressed lively satisfaction with this information, but suggested that such an enterprise was far too important to be left in the hands of one individual. He Babington's therefore proposed to associate five conspiracy. other gentlemen with Savage in this hazardous attempt, on which such momentous consequences appeared to hang; and Ballard having acquiesced in this proposal, they began to look around them for fit instruments to perpetrate their atrocious design. They were not long in finding five persons on whose secrecy and courage they could place reliance, and who were willing to unite with Savage in this daring and perilous adventure. These were Barnwell, of a noble family in Ireland; Abingdon, son of the late cofferer of the royal household; Charnock, a gentleman of Lancashire; * Charles Tilney, the heir of an ancient family, and one of the queen's band of gentleman pensioners; and Chidiock Titchbourne, a gentleman of Southampton. The conspirators held frequent secret deliberations, at which they maturely discussed their plans of procedure, and assigned to each his separate part in the tragie drama. Babington himself undertook to conduct the project for the liberation of Mary. In this he was to be assisted by Edward Windsor, brother to the lord of the same name, Thomas Salisbury, Robert Gage, John Travers, John Jones, and Henry Doune,—all of them gentlemen of rank, and united together by the ties of private friendship and coincident zeal in the cause of their common faith. It was arranged that, at the time fixed for the queen's assassination, Babington and his coadjutors should attempt the rescue of Mary, by attacking her guards with a party of a hundred horse when she should be taking an airing.

* Carte, vol. iii. p. 601; and MS. British Museum, Caligula, c. ix., fol. 290, Savage's Confession; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 262.

† Howell, vol. i. pp. 1130, 1131.

* Hardwicke's Papers, vol. i. p. 227.

In the meantime, the great project for the invasion of England was resumed by Spain and France, in conjunction with Mary's friends both in England and Scotland; and though, from the rigid surveillance under which she was placed since she had passed into the custody of Sir Amias Paulet, Mary's facilities for corresponding with her friends abroad had been greatly restricted, she had never ceased to countenance and encourage that enterprise; and at this time she found means to address a letter to Charles Paget, giving minute details as to what she considered the most likely methods of attaining their object. As this letter furnishes the most faithful and graphic delineation which we possess of the features of this great plot, we shall give some extracts serving to throw light on the complications of this remarkable period. "I have been," she says, "since the departure from Wingfield, so wholly without all intelligence of foreign affairs, as not knowing the present state thereof, it is very difficult for me to establish any certain course for re-establishing the same on this side; and methinks I can see no other means to that end, except the King of Spain, now being pricked in his particular by the attempt made on Holland and the course of Drake, would take revenge against the Queen of England; whilst France, occupied as it is, cannot help her; wherefore I desire that you should essay, either by the Lord Paget, during his abode in Spain; or by the Spanish ambassador, to discover clearly if the said King of Spain hath intention to set on England. * * * In case that he deliberate to set on the Queen of England, esteeming it most necessary that he assure himself also of Scotland, either to serve with him in the said enterprise, or at the least to hold that country so bridled that it serve not his enemy, I have thought good that you enter with the ambassador of Spain in these overtures following: to wit—that I shall travel by all means to make my son enter in the said enterprise; and if he cannot be persuaded thereunto, that I shall dress a secret strait league among the principal Catholic lords of that country and their adherents, to be joined with the King of Spain, and to execute at his devotion what of their parts shall be thought meet for advancing of the said enterprise; so being they may have such succours of men and money as they will ask, which, I am sure, shall not be very chargeable, having men enough within the country, and little money stretching far and doing much there. Moreover, I shall dress the means to make my son be delivered in the hands of the said King of Spain, or in the Pope's, as best by them shall be thought good; but with paction and promise to set him at liberty whensoever I shall so desire, or that, after my death, being Catholic, he shall desire again to repair to this isle. * * * This is the best hostage that I and the said lords of Scotland can give to the King of Spain for performance of that which may depend on them in the said enterprise. But withal must there be a regent established in Scotland that [may] have commission and power of me and my son (whom it shall be easy to make pass the same, he being once in the hands of the said lords) to govern the country in his absence; for which office I find none so fit as the Lord Claud Hamilton, as well for the rank of his house as for his manhood and wisdom; and to shun all jealousy of the rest, and to strengthen him the more, he must have a council appointed him of the principal lords, without whom he shall be bound not to ordain anything of importance. I should think myself most obliged to the King of Spain, that it would please him to receive my son, to make him be instructed and reduced to the Catholic religion, which is the thing in the world I most desire, affecting a great deal rather the salvation of his soul than to see him monarch of all Europe; and I fear much that so long as he shall remain where he is (amongst those that found all his greatness on the maintenance of the religion which he profeseth), it shall never be in my power to bring him in again to the right way; whereby there shall remain in my heart a thousand regrets and apprehensions, if I should die, to leave behind me a tyrant and persecutor of the Catholic Church.

"If you see and perceive the said ambassador to have gout in these overtures, and put you in hope of a good answer thereunto, which you shall insist to have with all diligence, I would then, in the meantime, you should write to the Lord Claud, letting him understand how that the King of Spain is to set on this country, and desireth to have the assistance of the Catholics of Scotland, for to stop, at least, that from thence the Queen of England have no succours; and to that effect you shall pray the said Lord Claud to sound and grope the minds hereunto of the principal of the Catholic nobility in Scotland. * * * And to the end they may be the more encouraged herein, you may write plainly to the Lord Claud that you have charge of me to treat with him of this matter. But, by your first letter, I am not of opinion that you discover yourself further to him, nor to other at all, until you have received answer of the King of Spain, which being conform to this designation, then may you open more to the Lord Claud; showing him that to assure himself of my son, and to the end (if it be possible) that things be passed and done under his name and authority, it shall be needful to seize his person, in case that willingly he cannot be brought to this enterprise; yea, and that the surest were to deliver him into the King of Spain's hands, or the Pope's, as shall be thought best; and that in his absence he depute the Lord Claud his lieutenant-general and regent in the government of Scotland; which, you are assured, I may be easily persuaded to confirm and approve. For, if it be possible, I will not, for divers respects, be named therein until the extremity. * * * I can write nothing presently to the Lord Claud himself, for want of an alphabet between me and him, which now I send you herewith enclosed, without any mark on the back, that you may send it unto him." *

* Camden, in Kennet, vol. ii. p. 516.

These passages completely identify Mary with the projected invasion; and as the letter in which they occur was intercepted, the disclosure thus made must have greatly exasperated Elizabeth and her ministers against their unfortunate prisoner. If Mary ever had any knowledge of the intended assassination, it must have been subsequent to this period. Indeed, it would appear from a letter sent to her by her agent Morgan, more than a month afterwards, that the conspirators were particularly careful to avoid doing anything which might implicate her in this atrocious design. Alluding to Ballard, who, he informs her, was then in England, labouring in the common cause, Morgan says—"He followeth some matters of consequence, the issue whereof is uncertain; wherefore, as long as these labours of his and matters do continue, it is not for your majesty's service to hold any intelligence with him at all, lest he or his partners be discovered, and they, by pains or other accidents, discover your majesty afterwards to have had intelligence with them, which I would not should fall out for any good in the world. And I have specially warned the said Ballard not to deal at any hand with your majesty, as long as he followeth the affairs that he and others have in hand, which tend to do good, which I pray God may come to pass; and so shall your majesty be relieved by the power of God." *

The conspirators continued to hold frequent consultations, and were gradually ripening their dark project into action, in the full belief that their proceedings were shrouded in impenetrable secrecy; but all along every step they took was as fully known to Walsingham as to themselves. Maud, one of his spies, having insinuated himself into the confidence of Ballard, accompanied him to France, became acquainted with the plot at its very origin, and transmitted information of it to Walsingham. Another of his creatures, named Polly, pretending an enthusiastic zeal for the cause, had sought to join the conspirators only that he might betray them; and Gilbert Gifford, on his arrival in England, whither he had been sent to stimulate the conspirators, basely offered his services to Walsingham as a hired spy. Confiding implicitly in his integrity, the conspirators entrusted to him the conveyance of the letters and other papers passing between them and Mary relative to "the great enterprise" of the invasion—an office of great responsibility, difficulty, and danger. Finding his manœuvres obstructed, through the vigilance of Paulet, he applied to Walsingham, in the hope that through his interference all difficulties might be obviated. Walsingham proposed to Paulet the expedient of permitting the bribery of one of his servants, who might act as a medium between Gifford and his prisoner; but Paulet, who, though a harsh and somewhat unfeeling jailer, appears to have been a man of unbending integrity, refused to yield to the suggestion of the less scrupulous secretary. Gifford, however, found a fitting agent for his purpose in a brewer, by whom the household was supplied with ale, and who, in consideration of a bribe, agreed to convey letters to the captive queen, and to bring her answers to his employer. The letters were thrust into a crevice of the wall, and covered with a loose stone, and the answers were returned in the same manner. The whole correspondence of course found its way to Walsingham, under whose direction the letters were opened, deciphered, copied, and then forwarded to their destination.† In these operations he was assisted by two agents, whose skill and ingenuity were well adapted to his purpose. One of these, Thomas Phellipps, had a remarkable dexterity in detecting plots, and in discovering the meaning of documents written in cipher; the other, named Gregory, had, by long attention and practice, acquired the art of opening letters, however carefully sealed, and closing them again in such a manner as to render detection impossible. By means of these auxiliaries he became as well acquainted with the plots maturing for the invasion of the kingdom as he already was, through the medium of his spies, with the conspiracy for assassinating the queen. The egregious folly and vanity

* MS. State Paper Office, decipher by Phellipps, Queen of Scots to Charles Paget, 20th May, 1586, Chartley; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 268.

* Morgan to the Queen of Scots, Murdin, p. 527.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Paulet to Walsingham, 11th April, 1586; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 270.

of Babington and his brother-conspirators, and their overweening confidence in the secrecy of their proceedings, were strikingly displayed in a piece of imprudence which furnished Walsingham at once with additional evidence of their guilt, and extraordinary facilities for their detection. They got a picture executed, consisting of their own portraits in a group, with that of Babington in the middle, and having a motto appended to it intimating that the parties were united in some dangerous enterprise. A copy of this painting found its way to Walsingham, who showed it to the queen; and so faithfully were the likenesses portrayed, that on one occasion, when walking abroad, she recognised the countenance of Barnwell, one of the assassins.

Conformably to the counsel of Morgan, Mary had hitherto abstained from all communication with Babington and his fellow-conspirators; and whatever interpretation she may have put on Morgan's obscure reference to the designs of Ballard, there is no reason to believe that up to this time she was at all cognizant of the plot against the life of Elizabeth; and so long as this state of matters continued, it is not easy to see how her arch-adversary, Walsingham, who was eagerly watching her motions, could have found any pretext for connecting her with that treasonable design. Unfortunately for Mary, she was induced, by the recommendation of Morgan, to renew her intercourse with Babington; and as all the letters that passed between them were conveyed by Gifford, they were of course carried first to Walsingham, deciphered by Phellipps, and copied. The originals were forwarded to their destination, and on the copies thus obtained the captive queen was subsequently arraigned as an accessory in the plot for putting Elizabeth to death. That such was actually the case seems to have been somewhat too hastily assumed by historians. There are many reasons why such an hypothesis should be received with caution, if not with distrust. Elizabeth and her ministers, Burghley and Walsingham, had already shown themselves not only extremely desirous of the death of Mary, but utterly unscrupulous as to the means of obtaining that object, provided only they could escape the odium of being implicated in the deed. The motives that gave birth to this savage wish were of no ordinary force. The machinations of Mary and her friends had for nearly nineteen years harassed the mind and disturbed the government of Elizabeth; conspiracy had succeeded conspiracy, treason had followed treason, and now a formidable coalition of foreign powers threatened the country with invasion, and a determined company of assassins had banded together to take away her life, and were only waiting an opportunity to strike the blow. That the death of Mary should have been contemplated by Burghley and Walsingham on their own account, as a very desirable event, was quite natural. The life of Elizabeth was the only barrier betwixt them and the accession to the crown of England of a woman whom they had been the willing instruments of oppressing, deceiving, and insulting, beyond hope of forgiveness. The utter extinction of their own power and influence was the least they had to expect at her hands; and they consequently could not look forward to her exchanging her prison for the throne without the most serious apprehensions. We have thus no security that the documents said to be copies of Mary's letters were not forged or falsified: they were disowned by Mary herself on her trial, and the originals have never been produced. That Walsingham had tampered with one of these letters is positively asserted by Camden, and his averment has been subsequently corroborated by a note discovered by Mr. Tytler in the State Paper Office. Camden's assertion is, that after opening one of Mary's letters to Babington, Walsingham and Phellipps cunningly inserted a postscript, desiring him to send the names of the six conspirators; and it is likely, he says, they added other things too.* The note found in the State Paper Office, and which is in the same cipher as Mary's letter to Babington, is endorsed in the hand-writing of Phellipps—"The postscript of the Scottish Queen's letter to Babington," and runs thus: "I would be glad to know the names and qualities of the six gentlemen which are to accompany the designment; for that it may be I shall be able, upon knowledge of the parties, to give you some further advice necessary to be followed therein [And even so do I wish to be made acquainted with the names of all such principal persons, as also who be already, as also who be]; † as also from time to time, particularly how you proceed; and as soon as you may, for the same purpose, who be already, and how far every one privy hereunto." ‡ After this disclosure, the uncorroborated evidence of Walsingham, and his not more base assistants and informers, can no longer be relied on. His object was at all hazards to secure the condemnation of Mary; and it is not more certain that Babington and his sanguinary associates had conspired for the destruction of Elizabeth, than that Walsingham and his ignominious accomplices had conspired for the destruction of the Scottish queen.

Babington, becoming anxious for the arrival of the foreign succours, at last determined to send Ballard into France to hasten their departure; and for this purpose furnished him with money to defray his charges; and, having procured an introduction to Walsingham, applied to him for two passports, one for himself and the other for Ballard, under a feigned name. To avoid incurring suspicion, he pretended to have an ardent zeal for the service of the queen; and offered to proceed to the continent, where he had insinuated himself, as he said, into the confidence of the Roman Catholics, and would, by means of his connexion with them,

* Camden, in Kennet, vol. ii. p. 517.

† The words within brackets are scored through in the original, but still legible.

‡ This note was deciphered and certified by Mr. Lemon of the State Paper Office, so that there is no doubt of its authenticity; Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 287, 288.

obtain important information regarding their proceedings, and be able to detect and frustrate all their machinations. The wily secretary feigned to be highly pleased with this manifestation of loyalty, commended him for his zeal, promised him assistance and reward, treated him with much apparent confidence and sincerity, and assured him that the passports would speedily be furnished.

Anxious to obtain full proof of the guilt of Babington and his confederates, and if possible to implicate Mary in their design, Walsingham for some time delayed giving orders for their apprehension. It was necessary moreover to proceed with great caution, lest any of them, prematurely taking the alarm, should manage to escape. Meanwhile, he had communicated to Elizabeth a full account of the discoveries he had made; and that princess, becoming daily more alarmed at the continued danger to which her life was exposed, at last peremptorily insisted on his immediately taking measures to secure her safety by arresting the conspirators. A warrant was consequently

Arrest of issued for seizing Ballard, and Ballard. this circumstance becoming known to the others, struck them with such terror, that they immediately held a consultation to determine what course they should adopt. Some were of opinion that they should not lose a moment in endeavouring to effect their escape, while others proposed that Savage and Charnock should without delay proceed in the execution of their fatal purpose. This counsel seems to have prevailed, for Babington instantly supplied Savage with money that he might purchase a court-dress to facilitate his access to the royal presence. On the second day, however, finding themselves still at liberty and unmolested, they became re-assured; and Babington had even the boldness to wait upon Walsingham, to endeavour to procure Ballard's liberation. The pear was not yet fully ripe, and the politic secretary once more dissembled. He received the conspirator with renewed tokens of courtesy and consideration, apologised for the arrest of Ballard, which he attributed to the strictness with which the law was enforced against seminary priests, and promised to exert himself to procure his release. So far was Babington thrown off his guard by the frankness and apparent cordiality of the minister, that he was prevailed on secretly to take up his residence in Walsingham's house, that they might have more frequent opportunities of conferring together before Babington's departure for France. Observing, however, that he was strictly watched, his suspicion was aroused, he made his escape, and hastened to warn his fellow-conspirators of their danger. They all took to flight in various disguises, and for some time eluded the officers who were sent in pursuit of them by concealing themselves in woods and barns; but at last, impelled by hunger, they quitted their hiding-place, and, being soon recognised, they were apprehended near Harrow-on-the-Hill, and conveyed to London. They were speedily brought to trial, along with eight others who had been concerned in the plot, and who had been seized in different parts of the kingdom: the evidence against them, which was ample Execution of Babington and his confederates. and incontrovertible, was corroborated by their own confession; they were found guilty, and were executed on the 20th and 21st of September.

It is painful to have to record of a woman and a queen that the doom of death, according to the ordinary sentence of the law, was not sufficient to satiate her desire of vengeance: she had the revolting cruelty to apply to her council for some "new device" to augment and prolong the sufferings of the criminals. The answer of Burghley was characteristic of that cold yet obsequious minister; he replied that the mode of execution prescribed by law would be fully as terrible as any new device, provided the executioner took care "to protract the action" to the extremity of endurance, and to the sight of the multitude.* Accordingly, on the first day, the executioner got special directions to that effect, and seven of the culprits were cut up alive after being partially strangled. The multitude, however, though they had been previously exasperated against the criminals, were so enraged and shocked at this savage spectacle, that on the following day the remaining seven, though subjected to the penalty of the law, were spared the infliction of these aggravated tortures.†

The death of the Queen of Scots, so long and earnestly desired, had for some time been predetermined by Elizabeth and her secretary; and the question how that event was to be brought about now engaged the anxious attention of the council. Elizabeth herself, and such of her ministers as shared her more intimate confidence, proposed that Mary should be brought to a public trial, in terms of the statute passed during the preceding year, evidently in anticipation of the occurrence of events such as those in which the unfortunate and deeply injured queen was now involved. Others were averse to this procedure: they considered that it would be derogatory to the blood-royal of England if one so nearly allied to the sovereign should be tried by subjects and condemned like a common malefactor, and that as the constitution of Mary was now broken down by long confinement, she should be suffered quietly to terminate a career which, in all human probability, could not be much prolonged. Leicester alone advised that she should be secretly put to death by poison; and even sent a theologian to endeavour to convince Walsingham that the deed would be justifiable. But Walsingham, who saw his way out of the difficulty without incurring the odium of concealed and cold-blooded murder, rejected the proposal with expressions of abhorrence, and, in common with the majority of the council, insisted on proceeding by open trial.

Great precaution had been employed to prevent

* Lingard, vol. viii., 8vo edition, pp. 215, 216.

† Camden, in Kennet, vol. ii. p. 618.

all tidings of the detection of Babington's conspiracy from being conveyed to the Queen of Scots, lest she should destroy any letters or papers in her possession which might tend to prove her complicity in the plot for the destruction of Elizabeth; and such were the care and the success with which every avenue of information had been closed, that while all England resounded with the appalling intelligence, and the public mind was excited almost to frenzy, the individual most deeply concerned was still in total ignorance of the matter. The time at last arrived for proceeding with the development of the plot of which Mary was to be the victim. On the morning of the 8th of August, Paulet, her keeper, conformably to a previous arrangement made with Mr. Waad, one of the queen's privy council, invited her to a stag-hunt in the park of Tixall, in the neighbourhood of Chartley, where she then resided. She accepted the invitation, and, mounted on horseback, was proceeding to the field, accompanied by a small suite, including her two secretaries, Nau and Curle, when she was met by Sir Thomas Georges, who was sent down by order of Elizabeth, and who with cruel abruptness informed her of the discovery of the plot for the murder of Elizabeth, of the trial and execution of Babington and his confederates, and of the charge preferred against herself of being accessory to the conspiracy. Astonished and agitated by this announcement, she desired to return to her apartments, when she was informed by Georges that he had received orders not to permit her to return to Chartley, but to convey her to Tixall. Losing for a moment her self-command, she gave way to a violent invective, and loudly protesting against this indignity, called on her attendants to protect her; but, at once convinced that resistance was hopeless, she suffered Paulet to conduct her to Tixall without further remonstrance.* At the same time Nau and Curle were arrested, and sent off separately under a strong escort to London.

During Mary's residence at Tixall she was by Seizure of Elizabeth's special instructions Mary's papers. closely confined, deprived of her own domestics and served by strangers, refused the attendance of her chaplain, denied the use of writing materials, and cut off from all intercourse with her friends. In the meantime, Waad had repaired to Chartley, where he broke open Mary's caskets, cabinets, and other private repositories, and seizing on all her letters and writings sent them up under seal to London. Among these were found many letters from foreign parts, as well as from sundry noblemen and gentlemen in England, expressing sentiments of respect and attachment; who now, to atone for what they had caused to fear might be imputed as a crime, signalled themselves by their enmity to the unfortunate princess.† Upwards of sixty different keys to ciphers were also discovered, and about two thousand pounds in money, all which were taken possession of. Great was the joy of Elizabeth at this fresh triumph over her defenceless victim. In the overflowing of her heart, she wrote to Paulet in extravagant terms of gratitude and affection; and, desirous of gloating over the distresses of the fallen queen, in a subsequent letter she entreats him to write her a full account of everything done to Mary; not, she said, that she had any doubt of his having performed his duty, but "simply that she might take pleasure in the reading thereof."*

On the 25th August, Mary was removed from Tixall to her former residence at Chartley, under the conduct of Sir Amias Paulet and a strong escort. As she issued from the gates of the castle, she was surrounded by a crowd of poor people, and, on some of them soliciting alms, she answered, weeping, that she had none to bestow. "All," she said, "has been taken from me; I am a beggar as well as you!" Then, addressing Sir Walter Ashton, the proprietor of Tixall, and other gentlemen of the neighbourhood composing her escort, she exclaimed with tears, "Good gentlemen, I am not witting of anything intended against the queen!" On reaching Chartley and entering her own apartment, finding her repositories had been broken open, and her papers, money, and jewels carried away, she was filled at once with anger and disgust; but, regaining her self-possession, she exclaimed, there were two things of which the Queen of England could not deprive her—her birth and her religion.† She added that some of them might live to repent of this outrage—words that evidently discomposed her stern keeper.‡

It was now fully resolved that Mary should be brought to a public trial, and, in order that this judicial inquiry might have the wished-for result, great efforts were made to find or to fabricate sufficient evidence to connect her with the plot against the life of Elizabeth. Nau and Curle had already undergone repeated examinations, but as yet nothing of this kind had been elicited from them. That she had been privy to the conspiracy for the invasion of the kingdom was capable of incontrovertible proof, and was in fact afterwards freely admitted by Mary herself; but this was not the point which Walsingham was most desirous to establish. For conduct so natural, if not justifiable, under the circumstances in which she had been involuntarily placed, he felt that it would be impossible to involve her in the penalties of a capital condemnation. This is evident from the extreme anxiety which he manifested to obtain from Mary's own papers some proofs of connexion with Babington's plot. Writing to Phellipps, who was then at Chartley, he laments that Nau and Curle could not be brought to confess that they had

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Mr. Necasius Yet-swert to Sir Francis Walsingham, Windsor, 19th August, 1586; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 297.

† Strangue, p. 176; Chalmers, vol. i. p. 427, et seq.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Paulet to Walsingham, 27th August, 1586; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 302.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Sir Amias Paulet's postils to Mr. William Waad's Memorial; ibid., Esnevall to Courcelles, 7th October, 1586.

† Camden, p. 518.

any knowledge of the letters that had passed between Mary and Babington, and fretfully adds, "I would to God that these minutes could be found,"—evidently alluding to the drafts of Mary's letters, which he expected would be found in her repositories. It is clear from this that up to the 3rd of September, when this letter was written, he did not consider the evidence against Mary as conclusive. It now occurred to Burghley that Nau and Curle would be more communicative if they were first assured of their own personal safety, as it was evident that they could not implicate their mistress without involving themselves in the charge of treason. He accordingly wrote to Sir Christopher Hatton, suggesting that an assurance of this kind should be given them; and adding, with coarse and unfeeling jocularly, "Surely then they will yield in writing somewhat to confirm their mistress' crime, if they were persuaded that themselves might scape, and the blow fall upon their mistress, betwixt her head and her shoulders."† In a letter from Walsingham to Phehlips, of the same date, he remarks that it was evident Mary's "minutes were not extant," and suggests to him, as he was then at court, to endeavour to obtain from Elizabeth the promise of some favour to Curle, in order to induce him to speak out more explicitly.‡ Encouraged by an assurance of safety, Nau gave a minute account of the manner in which Mary conducted her private correspondence, with the assistance of himself and Curle, but still made no disclosures which were deemed satisfactory. At last Burghley threatened to send him to the Tower—a measure which, as Nau well knew, involved the application of the torture. Under terror of this menace, he addressed a long declaration privately to Elizabeth, in which he admitted Mary's knowledge of the existence of Babington's plot, but denied her being in any way accessory to it. "She neither invented," he said, "nor desired, nor in any way meddled with it." This document was thrown aside by Burghley as of no importance; § in the case of Mary, simple foreknowledge would not be sufficient for a capital conviction. On the second day, which sealed the terrible fate of Babington and his confederates, Nau and Curle, with that dreadful example before their eyes, were again examined before the lord-chancellor, Burghley, and Sir Christopher Hatton. It is a suspicious circumstance that no perfect official record of this examination has been preserved, and that for a knowledge of its result we are obliged to have recourse to an original minute drawn up by Phehlips. In this document it is stated that Nau confessed his having written to Mary's dictation a letter to Babington, in which, among other matters, she expressed a wish to know the means by which the six gentlemen intended to proceed, and in what manner she was to be liberated from her confinement. This statement, which was corroborated by Curle, does not seem to add much to the declarations formerly extorted from the two secretaries; but no evidence more conclusive was likely to be obtained, and it was now determined that the trial should proceed.

Elizabeth and her advisers had two modes of procedure open to them. By the statute of 25 Edward III., it was declared high treason to conspire against the king, to excite war within the kingdom, or to hold communication with the king's enemies. But though this law seemed quite applicable to the case of a subject, it appeared impossible to bring under its operation an independent sovereign, who had entered the kingdom, not as an invader, but a fugitive; and who, having been forcibly detained there, could not be considered a subject of the queen, and consequently was not amenable to her jurisdiction. But the iniquitous statute passed the preceding year, by which power was given to prosecute and to condemn to death the person for whom, as well as the persons by whom any attempt was made to dethrone the reigning sovereign, had been framed expressly to meet this case, which in the very nature of things was likely to arise; and on that statute it was determined to try, to convict, and to put to death the Queen of Scots.

In terms of this act, Elizabeth appointed a commission, consisting of the most distinguished officers of state, peers, the trial of Mary. of the realm, and councillors of the crown, who, together with five judges, were constituted a high court of justice, to hear and decide this important cause. Some preliminary difficulties were started as to the designation of the royal prisoner; but it was finally agreed that she should be styled "Mary, daughter and heir of James V., late King of Scots, commonly called Queen of Scots, and Dowager of France."† The commission, over which Lord-Chancellor Bromley presided, and which consisted of forty-six individuals,‡ met on the 11th October, at Fotheringay Castle, in Northamptonshire, whither Mary had been removed on the 25th September, and where it had been arranged that the trial should take place. Next morning they sent to her Sir Walter Mildmay, Sir Amias Paulet, and Edward Barker, a notary, who delivered to her a letter from Elizabeth, in which, after much severe invective and many bitter reproaches, she accused her of having been concerned in a conspiracy against her person and government, informed her that a regard to her own safety had at last compelled her to institute an inquiry into her conduct, and therefore required

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Phehlips, 3rd September, 1586.

† MS. Letter, Burghley to Sir Christopher Hatton, 4th September, 1586; Lingard, vol. viii. p. 219.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Walsingham to Phehlips, 4th September, 1586; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 303.

§ MS. State Paper Office, 10th September, 1586. Endorsed in Burghley's hand: "Nau's long declaration of things of no importance, sent privately to her majesty."

* MS. State Paper Office, 21st September, 1586; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 306.

† Strype, vol. iii. p. 362.

‡ Howell, vol. i. pp. 1166—1168.

her to abide by the mode of trial prescribed by the laws under whose protection she lived, and submit to the judgment of the noblemen whom she had appointed by commission under the great seal to examine into and decide upon her cause.* Mary read the letter without betraying any emotion either of trepidation or astonishment. "I cannot but be sorry," she said, "that my sister is so ill-informed against me as to have treated every offer made by myself or my friends with neglect. I am her highness's nearest kinswoman, and have forewarned her of coming dangers, but have not been believed; and latterly 'the association,' for her majesty's preservation, and the act passed upon it, have given me ample warning of all that is intended against me. It was easy to be foreseen that every danger which might arise to my sister from foreign princes or private persons, or for matter of religion, would be laid to my charge. I know I have many enemies about the queen: witness my long captivity; the studied indignities I have received; and now this last association between my sister and my son, in which I was not consulted, and which has been concluded without my consent. As to my answer to the accusation now made," she continued, "her majesty's letter is indeed written after a strange sort. It seems to me to partake of the nature of a command; and it is perhaps expected that I am to reply as a subject. What!" she exclaimed, colouring with indignation, "does not your mistress know that I was born a queen? and thinks she that I will so far prejudice my rank and state—the blood whereof I am descended—the son who is to follow me, and the foreign kings and princes whose rights would be wounded through me, as to come and answer to such a letter as that? Never! Worn down as I may appear, my heart is great, and will not yield to any affliction. But why discuss these matters? Her majesty knows the protestation I have once before made to the lord-chancellor and Lord De La Ware; and by that I still abide. I am ignorant of the laws and statutes of this realm; I am destitute of counsel; I know not who can be my competent peers; my papers have been taken from me; and nobody careth or will speak in my behalf, though I am innocent. I have not procured or encouraged any hurt against your mistress. Let her convict me by my works, or by my writings. Sure I am, neither the one nor the other can be produced against me. Albeit, I am free to confess that when my sister had rejected every offer which I made, I remitted myself and my cause to foreign princes.†

This reply was reported to Elizabeth, and a few days afterwards the commissioners sent a deputation of their number to wait upon Mary, and endeavour to overcome her resolution, but she still firmly declined their jurisdiction; and to this resolution she steadfastly adhered at three successive subsequent interviews. Bromley the chancellor, and Burghley the treasurer, employed much reasoning to induce her to submit; but she overpowered them with her arguments, and embarrassed them with her pointed and sarcastic interrogatories. On one of these occasions she requested Bromley to explain to her a passage in Elizabeth's letter declaring that she was subject to the laws of England, and lived under their protection. "I came," she said, "to England to request assistance, and I was instantly imprisoned. Is that protection?" The learned dignitary of the law, unable to make any reasonable reply, had recourse to an evasion destitute alike of adroitness and plausibility. "The meaning," he said, "of their royal mistress was plain; but, being subjects, it was not their part to interpret it."*

Finding themselves unable to shake Mary's determination, the commissioners resolved to hear evidence and pronounce sentence in the absence of the accused; but Elizabeth, when informed of this, wrote privately to Burghley, directing him and the other commissioners not to pronounce sentence until they had repaired to her presence, and fully reported their proceedings.† Elizabeth was secretly mortified by Mary's obstinacy and haughty replies; for, although the commissioners should follow up their resolution of pronouncing sentence in her absence, it would scarcely be possible to carry the sentence into effect. To shake this determination Elizabeth wrote her a letter, in which she artfully insinuates that in the event of her yielding some favour might be shown her.

"You have in various ways," she says, "attempted to deprive me of my life, and to bring ruin on my kingdom by shedding of blood. I have never proceeded so hardly against you; but, on the contrary, have cherished and preserved you as faithfully as if you were my own self. Your treasons will be proved and made manifest to you in that place where you now are. For this reason, it is our pleasure that you answer to the nobility and barons of my kingdom, as you would do to myself were I there in person; and, as my last injunction, I charge and command you to reply to them. I have heard of your arrogance; but act candidly, and you may meet with more favour. "ELIZABETH."‡

The tone of stern menace assumed in this letter, and the doubtful hint at lenity with which it concludes, shook Mary's resolution, which was at last completely upset by the subtle insinuations of Sir Christopher Hatton, Elizabeth's vice-chamberlain, who represented to her that her refusal to plead, while it would be construed into an admission of her guilt, would be in other respects productive of no benefit to her, as the commission would un-

* Camden, in Kennet, vol. ii. p. 521.

* MS. draft, State Paper Office, 5th October, 1586; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 307.

† MS. State Paper Office, 12th October, 1586, the Scottish Queen's first answers; Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 307, 308.

† MS. Letter, copy, British Museum, Caligula, c. ix., fol. 332, the English Queen to Lord Burghley, 12th October; MS. State Paper Office, the Queen to the Lord Treasurer and the Commissioners, a draft, in Secretary Davison's hand; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 309.

‡ Lingard, vol. viii. p. 223.

doubtedly proceed with the trial, and give judgment in her absence. "You are accused," he said, "but not condemned.* You are, it is true, a queen; but the royal dignity does not exempt its possessor from replying to the imputation of a crime such as neither the civil nor the canon law, nor the law of nations, nor the law of nature, could save from prosecution. If you are innocent, the queen's commissioners, who are just and prudent men, will rejoice with all their hearts at your making your innocence apparent. The queen herself will be no less pleased, I assure you. When I left her, she declared to me that nothing ever gave her greater pain than to see you accused of such a crime. Dispense then with that vain privilege of royal dignity which cannot avail you; appear in court, maintain your innocence, do not lay yourself open to suspicion by avoiding the trial, and do not risk sullyng your reputation with an everlasting stain." To this Burghley, who was present, signified his assent, adding, that they would proceed next day with the trial, even should she be absent. Is it surprising that the poor captive queen, without a counsellor or friend with whom to consult, should, after a sleepless night, during which her mind vibrated between opposite decisions, at last yield, and consent to appear before the judges?

Next day, being the 14th of October, the commissioners assembled as a court of justice for the trial of this important cause in the great hall of Fotheringay Castle, which had been fitted up for the occasion. The upper half of the hall was railed off; and at one end of this section, under a canopy of state surmounted by the arms of England, was placed in an elevated position an arm-chair for the Queen of England, which in her absence remained unoccupied. On each side were ranged benches for the commissioners, who sat in the order of their respective dignities. On the right of the chair were seated the Lord-Chancellor Bromley, the Lord High-Treasurer Burghley, the Earls of Oxford, Kent, Derby, Worcester, Rutland, Cumberland, Warwick, Pembroke, Lincoln, and Viscount Montague; on the left were Lords Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Stafford, Gray, Lumley, and other peers, near to whom were the knights of the Privy Council—Crofts, Hatton, Walsingham, Sadler, Mildmay, and Paulet. More in the front were placed, on the right, the Chief-Justices of England and the Chief-Baron of the Exchequer; and on the left, the other judges and barons, and two doctors of civil law. Around a table in the centre were seated the queen's attorney-general, Popham; her solicitor, Egerton; her law-serjeant, Gawdy; and Thomas Powell, clerk of the crown, together with two clerks to take down the proceedings.† At the lower end of this table, with its back to the rail which divided the hall, was placed a chair, without any canopy, for the Queen of Scots; while the space behind the rail was allotted for such gentlemen of the neighbourhood and other persons as were allowed to be present.*

Mary descended to the great hall at nine o'clock in the morning, supported by the master of her household, Sir Andrew Melvil, and her physician, Burgoin, and escorted by a guard of halberdiers. One of her maids of honour carried her train, a second a chair covered with crimson velvet, and a third a footstool; and as she advanced it was observed that she was lame, and required to be supported. On entering the hall, she bowed to the lords with great dignity; and on being conducted to the chair intended for her, observing that it was not placed under the canopy, but in an inferior position, she seemed to feel the humiliation, and said, with a momentary appearance of resentment—"I am a queen; I was married to a King of France, and my seat ought to be there." Then looking mournfully round the assembled lords, statesmen, and lawyers—"Alas!" she said, "here are many counsellors, and yet there is not one for me!" The scene must have been to an indifferent spectator, if any such were present, at once highly interesting and deeply affecting; and, even at this distance of time, we cannot but blush for this assembly of able and experienced statesmen and politicians, erudite judges and subtle lawyers, all arrayed against a defenceless woman, without friend or counsellor, and denied even the use of her own papers. Yet the spirit of their unfortunate victim, as yet not altogether crushed by her protracted sufferings, rose superior to all these disadvantages, and her demeanour throughout the whole of these iniquitous proceedings was such as might well have put to shame those judges, who in very truth had assembled, not to try, but to condemn her.

Mary being seated, the lord-chancellor stood up, and commenced the proceedings by informing her that she was accused of conspiring against the life of the Trial of Mary. queen, and of attempting to disturb the peace of the kingdom; and that her majesty had at last determined to bring her to trial, because, had she failed to do so, she would be guilty of neglecting the cause of God, and of bearing the sword of justice in vain.† Burghley then requested her to hear the commission under which they had been appointed, which would be read by the clerk of the crown. This ceremony being finished, Mary rose and protested that, although she had, from a regard to her own honour, appeared there to hear and answer the accusations brought against her, she did not acknowledge the jurisdiction of the court; that none had the power to commission them to try her, because she had no superior, but was a free princess, and subject to none but God; and she now called her servants to witness that she answered under this protestation. To this it was replied by Burghley, that they were acting under the authority of the law, to which all persons

* Howell, vol. i. pp. 1171, 1172.

† Ibid., pp. 1172, 1173.

* Tytler, vol. viii. p. 311.

† Howell, vol. i. 1173.

resident within the realm were subject, and which recognised no distinctions of rank. The Crown-Serjeant Gawdy then proceeded to open the charges against the Queen of Scots. These were twofold—participation in a project for the invasion of the kingdom, and a conspiracy for the assassination of the queen. In support of these accusations, he produced alleged copies of correspondence with Morgan, Paget, Mendoza, the Archbishop of Glasgow, Babington, and others, together with certified copies of the confessions of Babington and the other conspirators, and the disclosures made by Nau and Curle. These being read and commented on with the specious subtilty common to men experienced in legal disputation, it was argued that the case was clearly proved, and that Mary Stewart must be held as convicted of the double crime laid to her charge. In this opinion the Attorney-General Puekering and the Lord-Treasurer Burghley expressed their concurrence. Mary defended herself with great calmness and dignity. The first part of the charge she was at no pains to deny. The proposal made by Spain in her behalf she declared was not new, it had been formerly made; but so long as she had entertained hopes of obtaining her freedom by milder means, she had rejected it. Now, however, that all her expectations from England had been disappointed, she maintained her right, and avowed her determination, to look to foreign powers for assistance. Her alleged concurrence in the conspiracy for assassinating Elizabeth she solemnly and emphatically denied. “I would disdain,” she said, “to purchase all that is most valuable on earth by the assassination of the meanest of the human race; and worn out as I now am with cares and sufferings, the prospect of a crown is not so inviting that I should ruin my soul in order to obtain it. Neither am I a stranger to the feelings of humanity, nor unacquainted with the duties of religion; and it is my nature to be more inclined to the devotion of Esther than to the sword of Judith. If ever I have given consent by my words, or even by my thoughts, to any attempt against the life of the Queen of England, far from declining the judgment of men, I shall not even pray for the mercy of God.”* After complaining of the grievous injustice to which she was subjected in being denied the privilege usually accorded to the meanest criminals—the aid of counsel and access to her papers—she proceeded, with an ability which at once surprised and confounded her accusers, to examine the nature of the evidence on which they sought her condemnation. She denied having ever seen Anthony Babington, received any letters from him, or written any to him. As for Ballard, she declared she had never before even heard his name; and complained that copies only of her pretended correspondence had been produced, whereas, in common justice, nothing short of her own handwriting and signature should be held sufficient to convict her of so odious a crime. That Babington should have written the letter ascribed to him was possible; but she challenged them to prove that she had ever received, much less answered it. If they still maintained that she had ever corresponded with that person, she demanded production of that correspondence itself, instead of the pretended copies, which she denounced as forgeries. Until this was done, she contended there was no evidence against her; there was nothing for her to disprove; and she must content herself with simply, but solemnly, denying that she had ever written the letters imputed to her, or participated in any plot for the assassination of the Queen of England. “I do not deny,” she said, weeping, “that I have longed for liberty, and earnestly laboured to procure it: nature impelled me to do so; but I call God to witness that I have never conspired the death of the Queen of England, or consented to it. I confess that I have written to my friends, and solicited their assistance in my escape from her miserable prisons, in which she has now kept me a captive queen for nineteen years; but I never wrote the letters now produced against me. I confess, too, that I have written often in favour of the persecuted Catholics; and had I been able, or even now at this moment were I able to save them from their miseries by shedding my own blood, I would have done it, and would now do it; but what connection has this with any plot against the life of the queen? and how can I answer for the dangerous designs of others, which are carried on without my knowledge? It was but lately,” she added, “that I received a letter from some unknown persons, entreating my pardon if they attempted anything without my knowledge.”*

With a view to neutralise the effect of this defence, which attacked the evidence in its weakest points, the crafty Burghley undertook to reply. He recapitulated the whole history of the conspiracy; showed the manner in which, according to Nau’s declaration, Mary carried on her correspondence; insisted that the written declarations of Nau and Curle were corroborated by the confessions of the conspirators; and contended that the correspondence between Mary and Babington was proved in the clearest manner, and that there could be no doubt of her knowledge and approval of the conspiracy.

During his address, Burghley took occasion to mention the Earl of Arundel as in some manner connected with the conspiracy; on which Mary, overpowered with emotion, burst into tears, and exclaimed: “Alas! how many calamities has the noble house of Howard endured for my sake!” Becoming once more composed, she proceeded to reply to the treasurer’s subtle speech. She considered, she said, the confessions of Babington and the other conspirators as of no importance; nor could she be certain that what was produced as the confession of the former was even his writing. But why, she asked, had he not been confronted with her before being put to death? why was she denied this opportunity of clearing herself? and why were Nau and Curle, who were still alive, not now present, that it might be seen whether they would assert before her face what it was alleged they had said behind her back? She admitted that her secretaries had written her letters, and put them in cipher; but she could not be certain that they had not inserted things which she had not dictated. Was it not even possible, she asked, that they might have received letters addressed to her without delivering them; or sent others away in her name, and in her cipher, without her knowledge? "And am I," she continued, "am I, a queen, to be judged guilty on such proofs as these? Is it not manifest that there must be an end to the majesty and security of princes, if they are made to depend on the writings and the testimony of their secretaries? I claim the privilege of being judged from my own words and my own writings. If they have written anything which may be hurtful to the queen my sister, they have written it altogether without my knowledge; let them bear the punishment of their inconsiderate boldness. Sure I am that if they were here present they would clear me of all blame in this cause; and still more certain am I that had my papers not been seized, and were not I thus deprived of my notes and letters, I could have more successfully and minutely answered every point which has been so bitterly argued against me."*

* Camden, p. 519, et seq.; Strangue, p. 192, et seq.

* Avis de Monsieur Bellièvre, p. 103; Camden, p. 523.

In the course of this discussion, Mary repeatedly complained of being deprived of her papers, and, alluding to the ease with which her cipher might be counterfeited, she directly accused Walsingham of having basely altered or fabricated the documents on which the charges against her were founded, in order to procure her condemnation. "What security have I," she said, turning towards him, "that these are my very ciphers? A young man lately, in France, has been detected forging my characters. Think you, Mr. Secretary, that I am ignorant of your devices used so craftily against me? Your spies surrounded me on every side; but you know not perhaps that some of your spies on me proved false, and brought intelligence to me. And if they have thus acted," she added, addressing the whole assembly, "how can I be certain that he has not forged my ciphers to procure my death? Has he not already formed deep schemes against my life and that of my son?"

Agitated by this attack, Walsingham instantly rose, and with great vehemence exclaimed: "I call God to witness that I have done nothing as a private individual unbefitting an honest man, nor, as a public servant of my royal mistress, anything unworthy of my office. I have declared my conviction of criminality, because the safety of the queen and the kingdom concern me in an extraordinary manner. I have traced with the greatest care all the plans directed against the queen and against the kingdom, and even if that traitor Ballard had offered me his aid to discover them, I would not have repulsed him."* With this evasive answer Mary declared herself satisfied, and begged that he would not give greater credence to those that slandered her, than she did to such as slandered him. Spies, she added, were not much to be depended on. After some further discussion, the high court adjourned until the following day.

At the second meeting, Mary commenced by again declining the jurisdiction of the court, and demanding that her protest should be recorded. In again entering on her defence, however, she admitted, but defended, her letters to Morgan, Paget, and Mendoza; she even acknowledged that her secretaries had by her orders written certain notes to Babington, but, at the same time, positively asserted that these notes referred exclusively to the plans for her delivery from her captivity—plans which she held herself perfectly justifiable in encouraging, even if they involved the invasion of the kingdom. But she again solemnly denied all participation in the plots against the life of Elizabeth, and persisted in her rejection of the evidence of Babington and her two secretaries. In conclusion, she demanded to be heard before parliament, or to be admitted to an interview with Elizabeth;† and added—"As one accused of crimes, I desire that I may have another day of hearing, and I claim the privilege of having an advocate to plead my cause; or, being a queen, that I may be believed on the word of a queen."‡

Burghley once more undertook to reply, and again went over the evidence. During his address, he was subjected to repeated interruptions by Mary, who reiterated her protestations of innocence, and demanded more conclusive proof; but after an altercation, which did not materially affect the case, the court, in consequence of secret instructions from Elizabeth,§ suddenly adjourned, to meet on the 25th of October at Westminster. This delay was particularly displeasing to Walsingham, who anxiously longed to have the fatal sentence pronounced; and in a letter addressed to Leicester, a few days before the final meeting at Westminster, represented it as a judgment from heaven that her majesty had not the power to proceed against the Queen of Scots as her own safety required.||

While Mary was still detained at Fotheringay, in the charge of her stern jailer, the high court assembled at Westminster, according to arrangement, on the 25th of October, and recommenced this extraordinary trial. After the proofs adduced at the former meetings of the court had been again brought forward, Nau and Curle were personally ex-

* Howell, vol. i. p. 1182; Camden, vol. ii. p. 499; Advis de M. Bellicore, in Egerton, p. 103.

† Howell, vol. i. p. 1188.

‡ Camden, pp. 524, 525.

§ MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, c. ix., fol. 333; Howell, vol. i. p. 1187; Camden, vol. ii. p. 506; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 322.

|| MS. Letter, Caligula, c. iv., fol. 415, Walsingham to Leicester, 15th October, 1586; Tytler, ut supra.

* MS. British Museum, Caligula, c. ix., fol. 333; Howell, vol. i. p. 1182, 1183; Hardwicke, vol. i. p. 233; Camden, vol. ii. p. 500; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 318.

amined, and corroborated their former confessions.* These, it would appear, had not been satisfactory to Walsingham and Burghley; inasmuch as they merely proved that Mary had received certain letters from Babington, and had dictated certain answers, but did not afford conclusive evidence that she had dictated the passages referring to the assassination of Elizabeth. On this occasion, however, nothing more decided could be elicited from them. On the contrary, according to Nau's own account of this examination, he boldly maintained that the most important charges made against Mary were utterly false; and that though Walsingham attempted to overawe him into silence, he declared "the commissioners would have to answer to God and all Christian kings, if on such false charges they condemned an innocent princess."†

As had been pre-determined, the commissioners found Mary guilty, and condemning her to death.‡ On the same day, at the instigation of Burghley, the commissioners and judges published a declaration, "that the sentence did no wise derogate from the title and honour of James, King of Scotland; but that he was in the same place, degree, and right, as if the sentence had never been pronounced."§

It is not easy to decide the question of Mary's guilt or innocence—a question which the judgment of this most irregular court in no way affects; but the fact that her enemies thought it necessary, in order to procure her condemnation, to resort to a mode of trial in which all the ordinary forms of judicial procedure, and every principle of law and justice, were openly violated, will ever furnish a strong presumption of her innocence. She was wholly in the power of those who thirsted for her blood. The principal documents produced against her were not originals, but alleged copies from deciphered letters, and therefore worthless as evidence; so that it is perfectly clear, as has been well remarked—"that under such a system Mary may have been wholly innocent, and yet may have been made to appear guilty."||

Four days after this a parliament was summoned, which confirmed the judgment of the commissioners, declared their sentence to be legal, and unanimously petitioned the queen, that as she tendered the security of the kingdom and the safety of her own life, she would, without delay, allow the sentence to be published and carried into effect. "By neglecting to do this," they said, "you would incur the displeasure of Heaven, and expose yourself to the chastisements of God's justice, who has left us several severe examples of it in the holy Scriptures."¶

The answer of Elizabeth to this message was strikingly characteristic. She expressed deep thankfulness to the Almighty for having so wonderfully preserved her life amidst so many dangers, and professed her high gratification at the devoted affection of her subjects, who, after a reign of twenty-eight years, had evinced a stronger attachment to her than on the day she ascended the throne. She spoke of her unfortunate sister more in sorrow than in anger, declared her willingness to pardon her, if the matters involved had concerned herself only, and concluded by saying, "Do not hurry my decision. It is an affair of great importance, and I am accustomed to deliberate longer on less weighty matters before making up my mind. I shall pray Almighty God to enlighten my understanding, and to show me what will be best for the interests of his Church, the prosperity of my people, and your own security."

Two days after this, Elizabeth, with feigned reluctance to proceed to the last extremity against her unfortunate kinswoman, sent a message to both houses of parliament, entreating them to consider of some more lenient method of dealing with the Queen of Scots, so that she might be spared the pain of assenting to the execution of the sentence pronounced against her;† but as Elizabeth no doubt wished and expected, the two houses, after much deliberation, unanimously determined "that they could find no other way." This answer was immediately conveyed by the lord-chancellor and the speaker of the House of Commons to the queen, who was then at Richmond. Her reply, if it may be so called, was probably intended to evince a continued repugnance to agree to the fatal decision: "If," she said, addressing the chancellor, "I should say unto you that I mean not to grant your petition, by my faith, I should say unto you more than perhaps I mean; and if I should say unto you I mean to grant your petition, I should then tell you more than it is fit for you to know, and so I must deliver you an answerless."‡

The next step was to communicate to Mary the result of her trial, of which she was yet ignorant. For this purpose Elizabeth dispatched Lord Buckhurst and Mr. Beal, the clerk of the Privy Council, to Fotheringay, who, arriving there on the 22nd of November, announced to Mary the sentence of her judges, its subsequent ratification by both houses of parliament, and their importunate demand to have it immediately carried into execution. She received the dreadful tidings without any apparent emotion, and reiterated her protestations that she was innocent of any design against the life of Elizabeth. On being warned that she had no mercy to expect, and offered the assistance of a Protestant bishop or dean in her last hours, she mildly but firmly refused the offer; and pathetically entreated that she might be allowed the attendance of her almoner, who had been for some time debarred from her presence.

* Hardwicke Papers, vol. i. p. 224.

† Lingard, vol. viii. p. 219.

‡ Howell, vol. i. p. 1188.

§ Camden, p. 526. || Tytler, vol. viii. p. 273.

¶ Howell, vol. i. p. 1190; Camden, vol. ii. p. 508.

* Howell, p. 1194; Camden, vol. ii. pp. 509—511.

† Howell, pp. 1194, 1195.

‡ Parliamentary History, vol. iv. p. 298.

This indulgence was granted, but after a short time it was again withdrawn.

Her morose and unfeeling keeper, Paulet, unmoved by her misfortunes, now laboured to aggravate her sufferings by treating her with studied indignity. On the following day he abruptly entered her chamber, and with unmanly insolence informed her that she was no longer to be treated as a queen, but as a private woman, who was already dead in law, being under capital condemnation for a detestable crime, and that therefore all insignia of royalty must in future be dispensed with. He then ordered Mary's attendants to remove the dais, or cloth of state surmounted by her arms; and on their refusing to comply, he called in some of his own domestics, who perpetrated this paltry insult. He then put on his hat and sat down, and observing a billiard-table, which stood in her apartment, he commanded it to be taken away, remarking that such idle amusements were unbecoming a person in her present condition. This brutal behaviour, for which he had not even the poor apology of an order from Elizabeth,* has left an indelible stain on the name of Sir Amias Paulet.

Proceeding with her usual caution before giving her final decision, Elizabeth now issued an order that the sentence against Mary should be publicly proclaimed, in the expectation that some outburst of popular feeling against the Queen of Scots might have the appearance of extorting from her her fatal determination. In this she was not disappointed. The people, in contemplation of the calamities which their sovereign and the nation had so narrowly escaped, were unanimous in demanding vengeance on the unfortunate queen, whom they regarded as the author of all those perils; and testified by extravagant public rejoicings their satisfaction at the announcement of her condemnation.†

The Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Mayor, and aldermen of London, were present at the proclamation in that city; the ceremony was accompanied by the ringing of bells and other demonstrations of satisfaction, which were kept up for the space of twenty-four hours. In all parts of the kingdom similar rejoicings took place, and bonfires were seen blazing in every direction.‡ No doubt therefore remained that the doom pronounced on the Queen of Scots met with the general and cordial approval of the nation, and that any mitigation of her punishment would, at this moment, have rendered Elizabeth and her ministers extremely unpopular.

At this time Mary made her last appeal to the callous heart of Elizabeth in the following affecting letter:—

"MADAM,—I bless God with my whole heart that, by means of your final judgment, he is about

* Letter of Mary, in Jebb, vol. ii. p. 293; also Bissellii Maric Stuartæ Acta, p. 219.

† Lingard, vol. viii. p. 233.

‡ Bibl. Nat. MS. 9513; Coll. de Mismes, vol. iii. fol. 389; Life of Egerton, p. 92.

to put a period to the wearisome pilgrimage of my life. I make no petition that it should be prolonged, having already but too well known its bitterness: I only now supplicate your highness that, since I cannot hope for any favour from those exasperated ministers, who hold the highest offices in your state, I may obtain from your own bounty these three favours:—

"First. As it would be vain for me to expect a burial in England, accompanied by the Catholic rites practised by the ancient monarchs, your ancestors and mine, and since the sepulchres of my fathers have been broken up and violated in Scotland, I earnestly request that, as soon as my enemies shall have glutted themselves with my innocent blood, my body may be carried by my servants to be interred in holy ground: above all, I could wish in France, where rest the ashes of the queen my most honoured mother. Thus shall this poor body, which has never known repose as long as it was united to my soul, have rest at last, when it and my spirit are disunited.

"Secondly. I implore your majesty, owing to the terror I feel for the tyranny of those to whose charge you have abandoned me, let me not be put to death in secret, but in the sight of my servants and others. These persons will be witnesses to my dying in the faith, and in obedience to the true Church; and it will be their care to rescue the close of my life and the last breathings of my spirit from the calumnies with which they may be assailed by my enemies.

"Thirdly. I request that my servants, who have clung to me so faithfully throughout my many sorrows, may be permitted freely to go where they please; and to retain the little remembrances which my poverty has left them in my will.

"I conjure you, madam, by the blood of Jesus Christ—by our near relationship—by the memory of Henry the Seventh, our common ancestor—by the title of queen, which I bear even to my death, refuse me not these poor requests, but assure me of your having granted them by a single word under your hand,

"I shall then die as I have lived,

"Your affectionate sister and prisoner,

"MARY THE QUEEN."*

It is probable that this letter was never delivered to Elizabeth;† at all events, it remained unanswered, and her requests were disregarded.

In the meantime, intelligence of the trial and condemnation of Mary had reached Scotland, where it excited a general feeling of dismay and indignation. The condemnation of a Scottish princess, the mother of the reigning sovereign, appeared both to the nobles and the people to imply an insolent claim of superiority on the part of the English queen, which was felt by every Scotsman with the keenness of a personal insult. James, who might have been expected to participate in these sentiments in an intense degree, as well as to be filled with alarm at the imminent danger to

* Jebb, vol. ii. pp. 91, 92.

† Ibid.

which his mother was exposed, evinced a calmness and moderation which, though admitting of some extenuation, is extremely discreditable to his memory. It must be kept in view, however, that James had never personally known his mother, and therefore could not be expected to entertain towards her that warmth of filial affection which is excited by the recollection of a mother's tenderness. Besides this, the crafty Walsingham had laboured gradually to prepare the mind of the facile young monarch for the anticipated crisis, and by operating on his characteristic selfishness to alienate his affections from his unfortunate parent. At an early period of the proceedings he had sent to James an account of the conspiracy, and had employed the Master of Gray artfully to insinuate to him that he owed little to a mother who had been the means of procuring the death of his father. Care was also taken to send him extracts from the alleged correspondence of Mary with Babington, particularly those portions of it in which she speaks reproachfully of James, and recommends the seizure of his person. All this must have tended to extinguish within the breast of James any spark of filial affection lingering there; and, indeed, such was the apathy which he discovered on this occasion, that the French king felt it necessary to instruct his ambassador, Monsieur de Courcelles, then in Scotland, to stimulate James to make some exertion to save his mother. In reply to the ambassador, James appears to have treated this grave matter, which so nearly concerned his own honour—to say nothing of his mother's life—with a most unbecoming levity and indifference. He replied, and it is to be hoped he really believed, "that his mother was in no danger; and as for the conspiracy, she must be contented to drink the ale she had brewed. He loved her," he said, "as much as nature and duty bound him; but she knew well she bore him as little goodwill as she did the Queen of England: her practices had already nearly cost him his crown, and he could be well content she would meddle with nothing but prayer and serving of God."*

Very different were the sentiments of the nobility and the people, who were inflamed with resentment at the audacious insolence of the English queen. Angus, Lord Claud Hamilton, Huntley, Bothwell, Herries, and others of the principal nobility, were so exasperated by a sense of the degradation to which their country was subjected, that they declared their determination rather to risk the chances of a war with England than submit to such an indignity.†

James at length, stimulated by the representations

Sir William Keith is sent to London to remonstrate with Elizabeth.

of the French king, and probably now fully convinced of his mother's danger, dispatched Sir William Keith to London with a letter to Elizabeth, in which he expressed astonishment and indignation that English subjects should have presumed to pass sentence of condemnation on a Scottish princess, and warned Elizabeth that he could not quietly suffer her to stain her hands in the blood of his mother, her own nearest kinswoman and her equal in rank, and over whom she could claim no jurisdiction. He at the same time wrote to Walsingham in a menacing tone, and instructed Sir William Keith to speak out, if necessary, still more strongly, and to co-operate with the French ambassador in his endeavours to secure the safety of his unfortunate parent. He had already written urgently on the same subject to Archibald Douglas, his ambassador in London;* but it was strongly suspected that this perfidious minister, who had formerly betrayed the Queen of Scots, employed his influence on this occasion in counteracting the efforts that were made to save her life.†

Keith arrived in London early in November, and after some apparently unnecessary delay was admitted to an audience. Elizabeth, with her accustomed hypocrisy, feigned to be overwhelmed with concern about the circumstances in which Mary was placed, and swore by the living God that to save her life she would willingly part with one of her own arms; but lamented that she was urged to the adoption of extreme measures by the importunity of her ministers and the apprehensions of her people. After considerable delay and repeated interviews, James, finding that Keith made no progress in the object of his mission, became impatient, and wrote to him with fresh instructions, and in terms of such indignant remonstrance and undisguised menace, that Elizabeth burst into a frenzy of rage, and so far forgot her queenly dignity, as to expel Keith from the council-room by personal violence. She was with difficulty restrained by her courtiers from giving full sway to her fury; but next day her passion had subsided, and she replied in a more moderate tone to the message of the Scottish king. James, on his part, alarmed at his own boldness and that of his envoy, and forgetful of his honour as an independent sovereign, and his duty as a son, had the pusillanimity to address an apology to Elizabeth, and to send Sir Robert Melvil and the Master of Gray to the English court, to retract or attempt to explain away the offensive points of his previous message.‡

This base timidity and subservience had its origin in a private communication at this time received from Walsingham,§ containing some sig-

* Appendix to Robertson's History of Scotland, No. XLIX., King James to Archibald Douglas, October, 1586; also same, No. L., Archibald Douglas to the King, 16th October, 1586.

† Lodge's Letters, vol. ii. (8vo. edit.) p. 295, Master of Gray to Archibald Douglas, 9th December, 1586.

‡ MS. Letter, copy, Warrender MSS. B., fol. 336, King James to Elizabeth, 15th December, 1586.

§ Warrender MSS. B., fol. 334. A memorial of certain heads to be communicated to the Lord Secretary of Scotland.

* October 4, extract from Monsieur Courcelles' Negotiations, Bannatyne edition, p. 4. † Ibid., pp. 11, 13.

Pusillanimity of James. Embassy of Sir Robert Melvil and the Master of Gray.

nificant allusions to the English succession—an object apparently of far more importance in James's estimation than the safety of his mother. His selection of Gray for this mission leaves a dark shade of suspicion over the motives of the Scottish king. This perfidious noble had already, as James well knew, basely betrayed and grossly insulted the unfortunate Mary; he was a devoted partizan of Elizabeth and her ministers, and was therefore under temptations to prove false to his trust, which a man of his treacherous and unprincipled character was not likely to resist. Of all this James was fully aware, and the result was such as he could scarcely fail to have anticipated. Though ostensibly zealously labouring to secure the object of his mission, he was secretly co-operating with Archibald Douglas in encouraging Elizabeth to proceed to the last extremity, whispering in her ear, "The dead cannot bite;" and persuading her that she had nothing to fear from his master's resentment, which would be found to consist rather in clamour than in sustained action. By these perfidious arts all the efforts of Sir Robert Melvil, who strove earnestly and faithfully to secure the object of his embassy, were effectually counteracted.

At their very first audience it became painfully evident to Melvil that there was little to hope for, either from the fears or the clemency of Elizabeth. They proposed that James should pledge himself, and give as hostages into Elizabeth's hands some of his principal nobility, that in the event of Mary's life being spared no attempt should be made by her, or on her account, against the life or government of Elizabeth; but this offer was contemptuously rejected without a moment's consideration. It was then proposed that Mary should resign in favour of her son all right of succession to the English crown. "How is that possible?" said Elizabeth; "she is declared 'inhabil,' and can convey nothing."—"If she have no rights," answered Gray, "your majesty need not fear her; if she have any, and your majesty will permit her to transmit them to her son, he will then possess the full title of succession to your highness." This proposal irritated Elizabeth, who could not bear to speak on the subject of the succession. "What!" she exclaimed, in a loud and angry voice, and with a great oath, "get rid of one and have a worse in her place? Nay, then I put myself in a more miserable case than before. By God's passion, that were to cut mine own throat! and for a duchy or an earldom to yourself, you, or such as you, would cause some of your desperate knaves to kill me. No, by God! your master shall never be in that place." Gray then, with affected earnestness, begged that Mary might be allowed a respite of fifteen days, that they might have time to communicate with their master. This request, however, was peremptorily refused; and the queen, in a state of great excitement, rose and proceeded to leave the room. Melvil followed her, and entreated that she would suspend the execution of the sentence at least for eight days. "No," she sternly replied, "not for an hour!"*

Besides these efforts on the part of James, some attempts had been made by Henry III. in favour of his unfortunate relative the Queen of Scots. He had never manifested any very deep sympathy for her during the long period of her captivity, but no sooner had the intelligence of her trial and condemnation reached the court of France than he felt bound in decency, as well as from a regard to the dignity of princes, which was attacked as he conceived in her person, to interfere in her behalf. He accordingly sent Monsieur de Bellievre as his ambassador to Elizabeth, to remonstrate against this unprecedented proceeding, and to use his endeavours to avert the fate impending over the unfortunate queen. After a first and second interview with Elizabeth, finding that he could obtain no assurance for the life of Mary, Henry wrote to his ambassadors with more peremptory and urgent instructions. On the 6th January, Bellievre had an audience at Greenwich, where the queen was then residing; and after much persuasion and many arguments, perceiving that he made no progress towards his object, he assumed a threatening tone. "If it be your majesty's good pleasure," he said, "to set at nought such high considerations, and to disregard the prayers of the king, my master, he has charged me to tell you, madam, that he shall resent this proceeding as a thing adverse to the common interests of kings, and most especially offensive to him."† This menace roused the haughty spirit of the English queen: "Monsieur de Bellievre," she angrily exclaimed, "are you charged by the king, my brother, to hold this language to me?"—"Yes, madam," answered Bellievre; "I am expressly commanded so to do by his majesty."—"Have you," rejoined the queen, "this power signed by his hand?"—"Yes, madam," replied Bellievre; "the king my master, your good brother, has expressly enjoined and charged me, in letters signed by his own hand, to address these remonstrances to your majesty."—"Then I desire," added Elizabeth, "that you declare the same signed by your hand."‡ Bellievre, having presented a copy of his instructions, withdrew; and, having now no hope of success, he left London a few days afterwards on his return to his court. A fresh attempt however was made by Aubespine, the resident French ambassador; but all farther negotiations, and, for a time, all friendly relations between the two kingdoms were suddenly broken off, in consequence of a quarrel originating in a

* Robertson, vol. ii., Appendix, No. xiv.; Memorial of the Master of Gray, 12th January, 1586-7.

† Bibl. Nat. Bethune, MS. No. 8955; Registers of Villeroy and Colbert, MS. No. 18; Miscellanies; Advis delce qui a este fait en Angleterre, par M. de Bellievre sur les affaires de la Roynie d'Ecosse, en mois de Novembre et Decembre, 1585, et Janvier, 1587; Life of Egerton, p. 109; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 334.

‡ Life of Egerton, p. 101; Carte, vol. iii. pp. 613, 614

pretended conspiracy against the life of Elizabeth, which was said to have been traced to some of the ambassador's suite.

Elizabeth, rightly judging that she had little danger to fear from the resentment either of Henry or James, had now determined to strike the blow, notwithstanding their remonstrances, and in defiance of their threatenings, both of which would proceed, as she supposed, no further than words. But though unwavering in her resolution at all events to get rid of Mary, she was most anxious to have it believed that she was extremely reluctant to authorise her execution, and to make it appear that her consent was extorted from her by the clamours of her people. To excite these to a higher pitch, she judged it necessary to operate on their fears. With this view extravagant and baseless rumours, tending to alarm the public mind, were, from time to time, industriously circulated throughout the kingdom: one day it was reported that the Duke of Guise had made a descent upon Sussex, and that a Spanish army had landed at Milford Haven, and had been joined by the Roman Catholics; another, that an attack had been made on Fotheringay Castle, and that the Queen of Scots had effected her escape; and a third, that the northern counties had risen in rebellion, and that a conspiracy had been formed to assassinate the queen and to burn the capital.* These expedients soon produced the desired effect—the minds of the people were excited to frenzy, and the almost universal national will demanded the instant execution of the sentence passed upon the Queen of Scots, who was believed to be the cause of all these threatened calamities.

Meanwhile Elizabeth seemed to be irresolute, although incessantly importuned by her Privy Council to issue the warrant for Mary's execution. Another and a darker scheme had taken possession of her mind; and she gave her councillors to understand, by obscure allusions and broken expressions, that, though as desirous as themselves to get rid of Mary, she was anxious to transfer the odium of putting her to death from herself to her ministers. She even appeared to have entertained a hope that they would have spared her the pain of appearing to act in the matter at all, by adopting some secret method of destroying their victim. There is not much reason to believe that they shrank from following out this hint through any strong abhorrence of private assassination; but they knew well the perfidious disposition of Elizabeth, and had good ground to apprehend that as soon as they had fulfilled her wish she would sacrifice them to her own reputation. The suggestion was allowed to pass, as if it had not been understood; and Elizabeth, who really was in a dilemma between her wish to strike the blow and her fear of the consequences, became moody and solitary, laid aside her customary amusements, indulged in soliloquies, and was often heard to mutter the Latin aphorism—"Aut fer aut feri: ne feriare, feri."*

At last, however, compelled either to abandon her intention with regard to Mary or to act for herself, she sent Lord-^{Warrant for Mary's execution.} Admiral Howard to order her secretary Davison to bring her the warrant for Mary's execution, which had already been drawn up by the Lord-Treasurer Burghley,† and lay in his possession unsigned. Davison obeyed, and, on the 9th February, at ten o'clock in the morning, presented himself before Elizabeth with the document. She read it over, called for a pen, and deliberately affixed her signature, then, raising her head, jocularly asked Davison whether he was not sorry she had done so. After some courtly reply from the secretary, she ordered him to carry the warrant to the lord-chancellor to be sealed, but directed that it should be done as secretly as possible; then, again assuming an air of pleasantry, she added, "You may show it, however, to Walsingham, though I fear the blow will kill him on the spot."

Resuming her gravity, she directed that the execution should not be done publicly in the court of the castle, but in the great hall, where the trial had taken place; and dismissed Davison with an injunction to trouble her no more on that subject, as she had now done all that in law or reason could be required of her.‡

As the secretary was in the act of retiring, the queen, as if incidentally recollecting something she had omitted to say, detained him for a few moments, and complained of Sir Amias Paulet and others, who, she said, might have relieved her of this burden. "Even yet," she added, "it might be so done that the blame might be removed from myself, if you and Walsingham would write jointly to Sir Amias and Sir Drew Drury, to sound them on the subject." Davison was base and obsequious enough not to reject this horrible proposal, but promised to write to Sir Amias, and inform him of her majesty's wish; and the queen having solemnly enjoined him to have the matter closely handled, permitted him to depart.§

On the afternoon of the same day Davison visited Walsingham, and informed him of the revolting communication which the queen expected them to make to Paulet and Drury. Apparently without any hesitation, they proceeded to comply with the abominable proposal; and ere the close of the day, the following effusion of cold-blooded villainy was on its way to Fotheringay Castle.

"To SIR AMIAS PAULET.

"After our hearty commendations. We find by speech lately uttered by her majesty, that she doth note in you both a lack of that care and zeal for

* "Strike or be stricken; strike lest thou be stricken;" Camden, in Kennet, vol. ii. p. 534.

† Caligula, c. ix., fol. 470.

‡ Davison's defence, drawn up by himself, in Caligula, c. ix., fol. 470, printed by Nicolas.

§ Nicolas's Life of Davison, p. 84.

* Camden, in Kennet, vol. ii. p. 533; Ellis's Letters, second series, vol. iii. p. 166, 109.

her service that she looketh for at your hands, in that you have not in all this time, of yourselves (without other provocation), found out some way to shorten the life of that queen; considering the great peril she is subject unto hourly, so long as the said queen shall live. Wherein, besides a lack of love towards her, she noteth greatly that you have not that care of your own particular safeties, or rather of the preservation of religion, and the public good and prosperity of your country, that reason and policy commandeth; especially, having so good a warrant and ground for the satisfaction of your consciences towards God, and the discharge of your credit and reputation towards the world, as the oath of "association," which you both have so solemnly taken and vowed; and especially the matter wherewith she standeth charged being so clearly and manifestly proved against her; and therefore she taketh it most unkindly that men professing that love towards her that you do, should in any kind of sort, for lack of the discharge of your duties, cast the burden upon her, knowing as you do her indisposition to shed blood, especially of one of that sex and quality, and so near to her in blood as the said queen is.

"These respects we find do greatly trouble her majesty, who, we assure you, has sundry times protested that if the regard of the danger of her good subjects and faithful servants did not more move her than her own peril, she would never be drawn to assent to the shedding her blood. We thought it very meet to acquaint you [with] these speeches lately passed from her majesty, referring the same to your good judgments. And so we commit you to the protection of the Almighty.

"Your most assured friends,

"FRANCIS WALSHINGHAM.

"WILLIAM DAVISON."

"London, 1st February, 1586." *

The original of this letter was found among Paulet's private papers, † notwithstanding it was accompanied with a solemn injunction from Davison to commit it to the flames, and a promise that his answer should be similarly disposed of. Paulet, however, though a harsh and severe man, shrank from the commission of murder, and absolutely refused compliance with the detestable proposal. Within an hour after the receipt of the letter, he had communicated its contents to Drury, and the following answer was dispatched to Walsingham;—

"Your letters of yesterday coming to my hands this present day at five in the afternoon, I would not fail, according to your directions, to return my answer with all possible speed, which [I] shall deliver unto you with great grief and bitterness of mind, in that I am so unhappy as to have liven to see this unhappy day, in the which I am required, by direction from my most gracious sovereign, to do an act which God and the law forbideth. My good livings and life are at her majesty's disposition, and I am ready to lose them this next morrow, if it shall so please her, acknowledging that I hold them as of her mere and gracious favour. I do not desire them to enjoy them but with her highness's good liking; but God forbid that I should make so foul a shipwreck of my conscience, or leave so great a blot to my poor posterity, to shed blood without law and warrant. Trusting that her majesty, of her accustomed clemency, will take this my dutiful answer in good part." *

This letter was carried by Davison to the queen, who perused it with strong symptoms of dissatisfaction, and passionately declared that she hated those fine speakers—those "precise and dainty fellows"—who promise much and do nothing, but throw all the burden on her shoulders. † In the meantime, the warrant for Mary's execution had been sealed by the lord-chancellor, and transmitted to the Privy Council, who, without again consulting the queen on the subject, addressed a letter enclosing it to the Earl of Shrewsbury. It was with considerable hesitation and anxiety, however, that they adopted this step, without renewed authority from their capricious mistress; but that the responsibility might not be confined to one only of their number, the letter was subscribed by Burghley, Leicester, Hunsdon, Knollis, Walsingham, Derby, Howard, Cobham, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Davison. ‡ Its conveyance was entrusted to Beal, the clerk of the council, who arrived with it at the seat of the Earl of Kent on the evening of the 4th of February. Thence he proceeded next day to Fotheringay Castle, and announced his dreadful errand to Sir Amias Paulet and Sir Drew Fotheringay. §

To the Earls of Shrewsbury and Kent, and the high sheriff of the county, was committed the office of seeing the warrant carried into execution; and intelligence having been sent to the former of these noblemen, the two earls came to the castle on the morning of Tuesday, the 7th of February, accompanied by several persons who were to assist in the dismal preparations. The unusual bustle and concourse threw the servants of Mary into terrible alarm, as they rightly conjectured that the fears under which they had for more than two months laboured on account of their mistress were now about to be realised. || About two o'clock, the two earls sent to demand an interview with Mary, who sent in answer to say that she was in bed and indisposed; but if the business was urgent, she would rise and admit them. Learning from them in reply that the matter would not admit of delay, she immediately rose, and having dressed, Kent and Shrewsbury, accompanied by Paulet, Drury, and Beal, were ushered into her apartment, where, surrounded by most of her household, they found her seated at a

* Hearne's Robert of Gloucester, vol. ii. p. 675.

† Ibid., pp. 391, 392.

‡ Ellis's Letters, second series, vol. iii. pp. 111, 112.

§ La Mort de la Roynie d'Escoce, Jebb, vol. ii. p. 512.

|| Ibid., p. 612.

* Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle, by Hearne, vol. ii. p. 674.

† Life of Davison, p. 85.

small work-table. They advanced uncovered, and bowing respectfully, briefly informed her that Elizabeth, urged on by the importunate solicitations of her subjects, had felt compelled to grant warrant for her execution. Beal then read the warrant, to which she listened in silence and with composure. When he had finished, she made the sign of the cross, and bowing down her head, said—"God be praised for the news you bring me! I could receive none better; for it announces to me the conclusion of my miseries, and the grace which God has granted me to die for the honour of his name and of his church, Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman. I did not expect such a happy end, after the treatment I have suffered and the dangers to which I have been exposed for nineteen years in this country—I, born a queen, the daughter of a king, the grand-daughter of Henry VII., the near relation of the Queen of England, Queen-Dowager of France, and who, though a free princess, have been kept in prison without legitimate cause, though I am subject to nobody, and recognise no superior in this world excepting God."* At this solemn moment she renewed her protestations of innocence, and laying her hand on the Roman Catholic version of the New Testament which was on the table—"I am condemned," she said, "by a tribunal which had no power over me, for a crime of which I here solemnly declare I am innocent.† I have neither invented, nor consented to, nor pursued any conspiracy for the death of the Queen of England." On hearing these words, the Earl of Kent interrupted her, asserting that the book she had sworn on was false, and the Roman Catholic version, and that therefore her oath was of no value. "It is the translation in which I believe," replied Mary. "Does your lordship suppose that my oath would be better if I swore on your translation, in which I do not believe?"‡

Mary now requested that her almoner, who had been a second time debarred from her presence, but who was still in the castle, might be permitted to attend her, to assist in preparing her for death, and to administer that spiritual consolation which she considered it sinful to receive from one of a different creed. This request, however, was refused; and she was offered by the Earl of Kent the services of the Dean of Peterborough, Dr. Fletcher, whom the two earls had brought with them. Mary peremptorily rejected this offer, and expressed astonishment that such a request should have been denied. She was prepared, however, she said, to die in the Catholic faith, which had been professed by her ancestors. Inquiring what time she was to die, Shrewsbury answered—"To-morrow, madam, about eight o'clock in the morning."

The two earls having withdrawn, Mary ordered her attendants to hasten the preparations for death. She then wrote to her almoner, that she might have time to arrange her affairs. At this awful interval, while her attendants were bathed in tears, it was remarked with astonishment and admiration that her demeanour was not merely composed, but her manner unusually and unaffectedly cheerful. "Come, come," she said, "Jane Kennedy, cease your weeping, and be busy. Did I not warn you, my children, that it would come to this? And now, blessed be God! it has come, and fear and sorrow are at an end. Weep not, then, nor lament, but rejoice rather that you see your poor mistress so near the end of all her troubles. Dry your eyes, then, and let us pray together." She then knelt down with her women, and after spending a short time in devotion, she rose, and opening her cabinet, she proceeded to count the money she had left, and dividing it into separate portions, put each sum into a purse by itself, with a slip of paper, on which she wrote with her own hand the name of the person for whom it was intended.

Supper being introduced, she ate sparingly, as was her custom, and conversed cheerfully with those about her, particularly with Burgoin, her physician, to whom, after a short fit of abstraction, during which a placid smile unconsciously lit up her countenance, she said, "Did you remark, Burgoin, what that Earl of Kent said in his talk with me—that my life would have been the death, as my death would be the life of their religion? Oh! how glad am I at that speech! Here comes the truth at last; and I pray you remark it. They told me I was to die because I had plotted against the queen; but then arrives this Kent, whom they sent hither to convert me, and what says he? I am to die for my religion."*

After supper, she summoned all her servants into her chamber, and calling for a cup of wine, she drank to them with many expressions of affection, and asked them to pledge her. They did so on their knees, and with many tears asked her forgiveness if ever they had offended her. She frankly forgave them, and in turn asked their forgiveness for any uneasiness she might have unnecessarily occasioned them. She exhorted them to adhere steadfastly to the Catholic faith, and to live in peace and love with each other, which, she remarked, they might more easily do, now that Nau, who had so often sown dissension among them, was out of the way. Nau, indeed, was the only person of whom she spoke with any degree of acrimony. She even accused him of being the cause of her death; but added, that she forgave him. She afterwards proceeded to select from her wardrobe various articles of dress, which she distributed as presents among her ladies, accompanying the delivery with some affectionate remarks to each of them. She then wrote to her almoner, lamenting that she was denied the consolation of his presence, but requesting him to watch with her that night, pray for her, and send her his absolution.† She afterwards wrote her will, of which she ap-

* La Mort de la Roynie d'Escosse, Jebb, vol. ii. p. 625. Camden, in Kennet, vol. ii. p. 534.

† Camden, in Kennet, vol. ii. p. 534; La Mort de la Roynie d'Escosse, Jebb, vol. ii. p. 625.

* La Mort de La Roynie d'Escosse, Jebb, vol. ii. pp. 614, 615.

† Ibid., vol. ii. p. 618.

† Ibid., vol. ii. p. 616.

pointed the Duke of Guise the principal executor.* As it was now about two o'clock in the morning, she sealed up her papers, and gave them in charge to her servants, remarking that she had now done with the affairs of this world. She retired to rest, having first caused her feet to be washed; and Jane Kennedy, at her desire, read to her at her bedside a portion of a work entitled, "The Lives of the Saints"—a book of which she was very fond. During the short period she had to rest she did not appear to sleep, but she was calm and composed. Her eyes were shut, a sweet smile was upon her face, and she frequently moved her lips and lifted up her hands as if in prayer. Before daybreak she arose, saying she had now only two hours to live; and, recollecting that she would require a handkerchief to bandage her eyes, she selected for that purpose one of the finest, adorned with a fringe of gold. She dressed with more than her usual care, after which she repaired to her oratory, where, kneeling down with her women at the altar, she spent some time in prayer. Ere she had finished, the fatal hour of eight had arrived, and a loud knock was heard at the door. She intimated that she would soon be ready, and continued her devotions; but in a very short time the knock was repeated, and, the door being opened, the high-sheriff, with a white wand in his hand, walked into the apartment, and advancing to the altar, where she still knelt, said—"Madam, the lords await you, and have sent me to you."—"Yes," replied Mary, rising from her knees, "let us go." Burgoin, her physician, who assisted in raising her, now handed her an ivory crucifix which lay on the altar, inquiring whether she did not wish to take that with her. "Oh, yes, yes!" replied Mary, kissing it, "it was my intention to have done so; many, many thanks for putting me in mind." She then desired one of her suite to carry it before her; and the sheriff preceding her, conducted her to the door of the apartment, where a heart-rending scene took place. Her servants, who were following her, were now informed that they must return, as orders had been given not to permit them to be present at the execution. This order, as harsh as it was unexpected and unnecessary, was received by the afflicted household with loud lamentation and unavailing remonstrance; while Mary calmly remarked that it was hard to prohibit her poor servants from witnessing her last moments. They fell at her feet, wept aloud, kissed her hand, clung to her robe, and were with difficulty separated from her and locked up in the chamber. At the foot of the great staircase, she was received by Shrewsbury and Kent; and here too, waiting to take his last farewell, was her old attached servant, Sir Andrew Melvil, the master of her household, whom, for some time before, her keepers had not permitted to come into her presence. On seeing her, he fell on his knees, burst into tears, and bitterly lamented that he should be the bearer of such dismal tidings to Scotland. "It will be," he said, "the most sorrowful message I ever carried, to announce that the queen, my sovereign and dear mistress, is dead."—"Thou shouldst rather rejoice, good Melvil," replied Mary, "that Mary Stewart has arrived at the close of her misfortunes. Thou knowest that this world is only vanity, and full of troubles and misery. Bear the tidings that I die firm in my religion—a true Catholic, a true Scotchwoman, a true Frenchwoman. May God forgive those who have sought my death! The Judge of the secret thoughts and actions of men knows that I have always desired the union of Scotland and England. Commend me to my son, and tell him that I have never done anything that could prejudice the welfare of the kingdom, or his quality as king, nor derogated in any respect from our sovereign prerogative."*

Turning to Shrewsbury and Kent, she now expressed a hope that her secretary, Curle, might be pardoned, and an earnest wish that her servants, including her women, might be permitted to be present at her death. This the Earl of Kent decidedly refused, as the women would probably occasion disturbance by their lamentations, and perhaps be guilty of some superstitious act—as, for example, dipping their handkerchiefs in her blood. "My lord," said Mary, "I pledge my word that they will do nothing of the kind. Alas, poor souls! they would be gratified at taking leave of me; and I am sure your mistress, being a virgin queen, would not refuse to allow another queen to have her women about her at the moment of her death. She cannot have given you such rigorous orders. You would grant me more than that, even if I were a person of lower rank; and yet, my lords, you know that I am your queen's cousin. You certainly will not refuse me this last request. My poor girls wish only to see me die."† Probably unwilling to incur the odium of refusing such a request, the two earls, after a short consultation, consented to permit two of her ladies and four of her gentlemen to attend her to the scaffold. She selected Burgoin, her physician; Gorion, her apothecary; Gervais, her surgeon; Didier, her butler; Jane Kennedy, and Elizabeth Curle.‡ Immediately on their coming down, she entered the great hall leaning on the arm of her physician, and followed by Sir Andrew Melvil, who bore her train. Her dress consisted of a gown of dark crimson velvet, such as she had been accustomed to wear on solemn occasions, a cloak of figured satin of the same colour, a high collar and hanging sleeves, while over all was thrown a white veil reaching to her feet.§

The scaffold, which was erected at the upper end of the hall, consisted of a platform Execution of twelve feet square, and about two Mary. feet in height, covered with black cloth, and surrounded by a rail. On it were placed the chair

* MS. Cottonian Library, Caligula, c. iv., fol. 465; Jebb, vol. ii. p. 635.

† A Report of the manner of the Execution of the Scots' Queen, in Ellis, vol. iii., second series; La Mort de la Roynie d'Escosse, Jebb, vol. ii. pp. 635, 336.

‡ Ibid.

§ Ibid., pp. 639, 640.

* Labanoff, vol. ii. pp. 485—491.

intended for Mary, two other chairs, a cushion, and the fatal block, all covered with the same sombre material. Mary ascended the steps, and seated herself on the chair, without changing countenance, and with queenly ease and dignity. The Earls of Kent and Shrewsbury sat on her right hand, at her left stood the sheriff, and in front two executioners dressed in black velvet. The Dean of Peterborough, Sir Amias Paulet, Sir Drew Drury, Beal, the clerk of the Privy Council, and others, stood beside the scaffold; at a little distance, ranged along the wall, stood Mary's servants; and in the lower part of the hall, behind a barrier, were the guards and other attendants, together with such of the neighbouring gentry as had been permitted to be present, the whole forming an assemblage of about two hundred persons. Amid breathless silence, Beal read the warrant for the execution. During this ceremony, Mary's mind seemed to be occupied with other subjects; she appeared serene and tranquil, and the same gentle smile still illumined her features that had been remarked during the previous evening. Beal having finished, she made the sign of the cross, and with a clear and firm voice said—"My lords, I am a queen born, a sovereign princess, not subject to the laws, a near relation to the Queen of England, and her lawful heirress. After having been long and unjustly detained a prisoner in this country, where I have endured much pain and evil, though nobody had any right over me, being now, through the strength, and under the power of men, ready to forfeit my life, I thank God for permitting me to die for my religion, and in presence of a company who will bear witness that, just before my death, I protested, as I have always done, both in private and in public, that I never contrived any means of putting the queen to death, nor consented to anything against her person." * She went on to deny having ever entertained any feelings of enmity towards Elizabeth, and referred to the conditions she had offered in order to procure her liberty, as proof of her anxiety for the tranquillity of England.† "I will here," she said, "in my last moments, accuse no one; but when I am gone, much will be discovered that is now hid, and the objects of those who have procured my death be more clearly disclosed to the world." ‡

After she had pronounced these words; the Dean of Peterborough ascended the scaffold, and addressing her, said—"Madam, the queen, my excellent sovereign, has sent me to you—" He had proceeded thus far, when Mary interrupted him. "Mr. Dean," she said, "I am firm to the ancient Roman Catholic religion, and I intend to shed my blood for it." § The dean, however, persisted in addressing her; and when requested to desist, pleaded the orders of the queen in council, which he felt bound, notwithstanding her remonstrances, to obey. At last, assuming a resolute tone of voice, she declared she would not hear him, and peremptorily commanded him to be silent. At this moment the Earl of Kent, observing her intently looking on the crucifix which she held in her hand, "Madam," said he, "that image of Christ serves to little purpose, if you have him not engraved upon your heart."—"Ah!" replied Mary, "there is nothing more becoming a dying Christian than to carry in his hands this remembrance of his redemption. How impossible is it to have such an object in our hands, and keep the heart unmoved." * The dean then commenced reading the prayers for such an occasion, as contained in the Anglican ritual; while Mary, kneeling apart, repeated in Latin the three penitential psalms—"Miserere mei Deus," "In te, Domine, speravi," "Qui habitat in adjutorio." † After this she prayed in English, beseeching God to grant peace to the world, and "the true religion" to England. She prayed also for the Pope, for the Catholic Church, for the king her son, for the Queen of England, and for all her enemies; then, kissing the crucifix, and making the sign of the cross, she exclaimed, in a clear and distinct voice, "Like as thy arms, Lord Jesus Christ, were spread out upon the cross, even so receive me within the outstretched arms of thy mercy! extend thy pity, and forgive my sins!" ‡ Having finished her devotions, she arose, and the executioner advanced towards her to assist in removing a portion of her dress. She smiled, and beckoning him to withdraw, said, playfully, that she had not been accustomed to have such valets de chambre, or to undress before so many people. § She then called Jane Kennedy and Elizabeth Curle, who were now kneeling at the foot of the scaffold, and with their assistance completed her preparations. Seeing them dissolved in tears, and on the point of giving way to their grief, she placed her finger on her lips in token of silence, reminded them she had promised in their name that they would be silent, and desired them to pray for her. "Instead of weeping," she said, "rejoice; I am very happy to leave this world, and in so good a cause." || She then kissed them, gave them her blessing, and made the sign of the cross over them; and Jane Kennedy having bandaged her eyes, she desired them to leave her. She then seated herself in the chair, clasped her hands together, and held her neck fixed and upright, supposing she was to be beheaded after the French mode, in a sitting position, and with a sword. As she sat expecting the fatal blow, she repeated the words, "In thee, O Lord, have I trusted; let me never be put to confusion." Her misconception excited for a moment much wonder among the spectators; but the mistake having been discovered and explained to her, she immediately knelt down, groped for the block, and without the slightest symptom of trepidation, rested her neck upon it. While in this attitude, she had time to

* Jebb, vol. ii. p. 636.

† Ibid., p. 637.

‡ Tytler, vol. viii. p. 356.

§ Ellis, p. 115.

* Jebb, vol. ii. pp. 47, 200, 307; and same volume, Mort de la Roynie d'Escosse, p. 637.

† La Mort de la Roynie, &c., Jebb, vol. ii. p. 638.

‡ Ibid.

§ Ibid., p. 639.

|| Ibid.

repeat the beautiful and affecting words—the last which she uttered—“Into thy hands I commend my spirit, for thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth!” The spectators could no longer suppress their emotion; and even the executioner, unfortunately participating in the general sensation, became so unnerved that, missing his aim, the blow fell ineffectually on the nape of the neck. The heroic victim, however, remained motionless, and did not even utter a sigh; and the second blow, more steadily directed, severed the head from the body. The executioner then holding it up, called aloud, “God save the queen!” and the Dean of Peterborough exclaimed, “So let all Queen Elizabeth’s enemies perish!” To this one solitary response was heard. It proceeded from the Earl of Kent. “Yes,” he said, with a loud voice; “Amen, amen; would to God that all the enemies of the queen were in that state!”* The rest of the spectators remained silent and in tears, overcome with mingled sentiments of pity and admiration. Thus perished Mary Stewart, Queen of Scotland, in the forty-fifth year of her age, after a cruel captivity of nineteen years.

As the attendants were lifting the body to convey it to the state-room of the castle, Mary’s little favourite dog was discovered covered with blood, concealed under her mantle, and close to the remains of its mistress, from which it resisted all attempts to entice it away, and had at last to be removed by force.†

The body was embalmed, though with no great care for its preservation; after which it was wrapped in wax-cloth, and deposited in a leaden coffin enclosed within one of wood. It was suffered to lie in the great chamber until the 1st of August, without any one being allowed to approach it; and with such absurd jealousy was this restriction enforced, that even the keyhole of the door was stopped up, on its being discovered that some of her people were in the habit of looking through it.‡ The remains were, by order of Elizabeth, interred with regal pomp in the Cathedral of Peterborough, whence they were, twenty-five years afterwards, removed by James to Henry the Seventh’s Chapel, in Westminster.

Mary Stewart was a woman in every way remarkable; whether we consider the attractive beauty of her person, the vigour of her intellect, the liveliness of her imagination, the warmth of her temper, her varied accomplishments, the extraordinary vicissitudes of her life, or the tragical manner in which it was brought to a premature close. It is remarkable that, in the absence of any fixed standard of female loveliness, it is agreed on all hands that Mary approached, both in form and feature, the very beau idéal of human beauty. Such was the opinion of her contemporaries—an opinion not less warmly entertained by men of the present age, to whom her personal appearance, by means of authentic portraits still extant, is perfectly familiar. To these external qualifications she possessed mental endowments in every respect correspondent—a comprehensive, powerful, almost masculine intellect, a rich and poetical imagination, highly susceptible temperament, and exquisite delicacy of taste. Her mind, thus naturally gifted, was enriched with all the accomplishments common in that age among persons of the most exalted rank. Her manners were polished, engaging, insinuating; she excelled in music, both instrumental and vocal; she was skilled in various languages; and she wrote, both in verse and prose, with an ease, a vigour, and an eloquence, rarely attained, and often, when occasion demanded, with a tenderness and pathos truly affecting. The moral character of Mary, however, was unfortunately far inferior to her intellectual endowments. She was hasty in temper, imperious, obstinate, vindictive; and at various periods, in the most important events of her life, she exhibited a more than ordinary share of the faults and frailties incident to human nature. Her actions sprung frequently from impulse, instead of being dictated by sound judgment. She was rash and confiding even to imprudence, and her attachments were consequently often sudden, violent, and immoderate. To these causes may be traced many of those errors by which her life was stained, and the calamities by which it was embittered. Setting aside the much-vexed and perhaps undeterminable question of her guilt or innocence, with reference to the horrid crime of participation in the murder of her husband, enough remains in her alliance with the principal actor in that tragedy to merit the severest condemnation. Whatever allowances may be made from the unhappy circumstances in which she was placed, the lax morality of the age, or the taint received in early life at the licentious court of France, it is impossible to extenuate, much less justify, her conduct in this matter. But for this one great error of her life Mary had to endure an unusually severe and protracted punishment. It led to all that train of sufferings inflicted on her by her unnatural cousin, and which were terminated only by a violent and ignominious death. Her attachment to the Roman Catholic religion may be pronounced bigoted, but it was at least sincere. On this point she was certainly far less intolerant than the professors of that creed usually are; and whatever may be said of the errors of the Church of Rome, it is impossible not to admire the firmness with which she adhered to the last to those principles of which she conscientiously approved.

* Teulet, vol. ii. p. 831; Jebb, vol. ii. p. 101; Ellis, p. 117.

† Mort de la Roynne d’Escosse, Jebb, vol. ii. p. 641; Ellis’s Letters, second series, vol. iii. p. 117.

‡ Mort de la Roynne, &c., Jebb, vol. ii. p. 646.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

A.D. 1566—1570.

FOR a short period, both previous to the birth of James and subsequent to that event, public affairs seemed to be moving on smoothly and satisfactorily. All classes of the community were disposed to be pleased; and the hopes and anticipations which not unnaturally clustered around the young prince made the mass of the people willing to overlook existing causes of discord and dissatisfaction. This, however, was but a deceitful calm. The elements of a storm were gathering. A convulsion was at hand, which was to shake Mary from that seat to which she had been elevated as the descendant of a long and illustrious line of ancestors. That she was now a mother, might naturally have been expected to confirm the stability of her government, by disencumbering the question of the succession of all difficulties; but this very circumstance, through her own exceeding imprudence, became the means of her more speedy and complete overthrow. Queen in her own right, with an infant son to succeed her in due course of years, how secure should her position have been! But that son by common consent was almost immediately substituted in her room. The birth of James, so fortunate for the nation, brought only sorrow and perplexity to his mother.

It appears from Mary's correspondence with the Pope, that she was determined to re-establish the Romish faith in Scotland at the earliest possible period; and she expected that the administration of the baptismal rite to her son with extraordinary pomp and magnificence, and in accordance with the forms prescribed by Rome, would tend to inspire her subjects with a reverence for the sacraments of the Church, now so much despised by them.* Notwithstanding Mary's numerous promises that she would do nothing in opposition to the established religion of her subjects, she had adopted the resolution some time prior to this period to admit a nuncio from the Pope publicly into her dominions. Cardinal Laurea, Bishop of Mondovi, had been appointed to this office by Pius V., who had at the same time transmitted by him a present of twelve thousand crowns to the queen.† In her answer to the Pope's letter, she had expressed her grateful sense of his liberality; she had promised that she would exert her utmost power for the re-establishment of the Romish Church; she had declared that she would receive the nuncio with all possible respect, and would take care to have the baptism of her son administered with all the ceremonies of the Romish ritual. But although the nuncio had reached Paris, and had sent over one of his attendants with part of the money, yet, on consideration, it was not judged prudent by Mary that he should be allowed to witness the baptism of her son, as his presence would offend Elizabeth, who was sending a magnificent embassy into Scotland to represent her on that occasion. Measures were therefore taken to prevent the popish nuncio from leaving the shores of France.

The baptism of the young prince, which took place at Stirling, on the 17th of December, was conducted with singular magnificence. All the arrangements for the ceremony were superintended by Bothwell. The Count de Brienne was present as ambassador from the King of France; and the Earl of Bedford, attended by a numerous and splendid train, represented the Queen of England, who sent for the occasion a font of gold with a basin and ewer. The rite was performed by the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, with all the ceremonies usually employed in the Romish Church, excepting only the application of spittle, to which the queen entertained a repugnance. The Earl of Bedford, and all the noblemen who belonged to the Reformed Church, remained outside the chapel during the administration of the ordinance, that they might neither witness nor countenance by their presence the superstitious ceremonies which had been superadded to the baptismal rite by the Church of Rome.*

The extraordinary expenses connected with the prince's baptism, and other events during the year, so exhausted the queen's resources, that no part whatever of the money due to the ministers of the Reformed Church, out of the thirds of ecclesiastical revenues, was paid to them this year. They were allowed to languish in a state of abject poverty.† Their zeal, however, for the glorious cause, in which they were embarked was such, that they adhered to their ill-requited labours, and discharged all the duties of their office with exemplary fidelity and diligence. Complaint was indeed made by them of the injustice which they were suffering, and the queen and her council were therefore obliged to devise some method for relieving the pressing wants of the Church. An assignation was made, for sustentation of the ministry, of certain victuals and money in sundry places and districts, to be taken up and disposed of by the said ministers and their collectors as they might judge most expedient; and letters were given forth commanding the clerk of register, and the comptroller, and all others whom it concerned, to deliver authentic copies of the said assignation to the ministers.‡

At the meeting of the General Assembly, which was held in December, the question was considered

* Robertson, vol. i. p. 339; Conaei Vita Mariæ, vol. ii. p. 51.

† Vita Cardinalis Laureæ, vol. iii. p. 325.

* Tytler, vol. vii. p. 66; Spottiswood, p. 197; Robertson, vol. i. p. 341.

† Robertson, vol. i. p. 345.

‡ Keith, vol. iii. p. 145.

whether the assignation made by the queen in favour of the ministers should be accepted for relief of their present necessity or not. After a long discussion, it was thought good to accept the said offer of money and victuals, if they might be obtained without delay. "Nevertheless, in consideration of the law of God, which ordains the persons who hear the doctrine of salvation at the mouth of his ministers, and thereby receive special food to the nourishment of their souls, to communicate temporal sustentation to their pastors; their answer is, that having just title to crave bodily food at the hands of the said persons, and finding no others bound unto them, they only require from their own flock that they will sustain them according to their bounden duty; and what it shall please them to give for their sustentation, if it were but bread and water, neither will they refuse it nor desist from their vocation. But to take from others contrary to their will, whom they serve not, they judge not their duty, nor yet reasonable. Always they most heartily thank the lords that bestowed their labours and pains in procuring the foresaid assignation, most heartily requesting their honours to persevere until they bring it to some perfection. Nevertheless, the whole assembly solemnly protested that the acceptance of the foresaid assignation does not pre-judge the liberty of the Kirk to sue for that which justly pertaineth to her patrimony in time and place convenient at any time hereafter."*

Views of the Assembly with regard to this assignation.

But if the ministers of the Reformed Church had reason to complain of the manner in which the funds destined for the support of religion were diverted to other purposes, their apprehensions were far more excited by a commission which was granted to the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, restoring him to his ancient jurisdiction as a Romish bishop, and authorising him to hold spiritual courts for the trial of various causes. The jurisdiction of these courts had been abolished by parliament in the year 1560, and a different method instituted of managing the business which had usually come before them. This ill-judged proceeding of the queen may fairly be regarded as furnishing evidence of her increasing determination to overthrow the Protestant Church, and to establish again the Romish faith upon its ruins. The revived jurisdiction of popish spiritual courts was no small step towards the accomplishment of her object. It has also been suspected that another reason existed for the restoration of the archbishop's jurisdiction, although this reason may not have been known to the queen at all, but may only have influenced Bothwell, by whose advice her majesty was at this period mainly guided. This most unprincipled man seems already to have formed the bold and reckless design of marrying the queen himself. That the restoration of the archbishop's authority was effected by his means seems past a doubt;* and it is a fact, that soon after the murder of Darnley he took measures for having pronounced in the archbishop's court a divorce between himself and his countess, Lady Jane Gordon. The process was hurried through the court with most indecent haste, and was completed in two days.† There is therefore abundant reason to believe that Bothwell, at least, must have planned the murder of Darnley as early as December; and the painful doubt suggests itself, that the queen herself when she consented, at Bothwell's suggestion, to restore the archbishop's jurisdiction, may not have been unacquainted with the object which Bothwell intended that restoration to subserve.‡

The jurisdiction of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's restored.

But whatever may have been the reasons for the re-organisation of the Romish spiritual courts, the measure excited the utmost alarm among the whole body of the Protestants; and the subject was warmly taken up by the General Assembly. It was agreed that an humble supplication should be presented to the lords of the secret council, beseeching them to use their influence for the protection of the pure Gospel of Christ from the dangers with which it was threatened. "We, therefore, in the fear of our God, and with grief and anguish of heart, complain unto your honours that that conjured enemy of Jesus Christ, and cruel murderer of our dear brethren, most falsely styled Archbishop of St. Andrew's, is reponed and restored by signature past to his former tyranny; for not only are his ancient jurisdictions, as they are termed, of the whole bishoprick of St. Andrew's granted unto him, but also the execution of judgment, confirmation of testaments, and donation of benefices, as more amply in his signature is expressed. If this be not to cure the head of the venomous beast which once within this realm, by the potent hand of God, was so broken down and banished that by tyranny it could not have hurt the faithful, judge ye. His ancient jurisdiction was that with certain colleagues he might have condemned for heresy upon probation, as pleased him and them. What they have judged to be heresy heretofore, ye cannot be ignorant; and whether they remain in their former malice or not, their fruits and travels openly declare. The danger may be feared say ye, but what remedy is there? It is easy and at hand, right honourable, if ye will not betray the cause of God and leave your brethren, who will never be more subject to that usurped tyranny than they will to the devil himself. Our queen ought not, nor justly may, break the laws of this realm, and so consequently she may not set up against us, without our consents, that Roman antichrist again: for in a lawful and most free Opposition of the General Assembly to the archbishop's jurisdiction.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 548; Laing, vol. i. pp. 75, 76.

† Letter of Drury to Cecil, 2nd May, 1567.

‡ Robertson, vol. i. p. 336; Spottiswood, p. 197; McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 149; North British Review, No. vii. p. 18; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 110.

* Book of the Universal Kirk, pp. 46, 47; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 329; Keith, vol. iii. p. 145.

parliament was that odious beast deprived of all jurisdiction, office, and authority within this realm. If hereof ye plainly and boldly admonish our sovereign, and without tumult only crave justice, the tyrants dare no more be seen in lawful judgment, than dare the owls appear in daylight."*

Besides the supplication of the assembly to the Knox's letter secret council, a letter was also addressed by Knox to the adherents of the Reformed Church, with the view of warning them of the dangers which might ensue from the commission given to the Archbishop of St. Andrew's. "Now are matters so far discovered that he who seeth not the plain subversion of all true religion within this realm to be concluded and decreed in the hearts of some, must either confess himself blind or else an enemy to the religion which we profess. For besides the open erecting of idolatry in divers parts of this realm, and besides the extreme poverty into which our ministers are brought, that cruel murderer of our brethren, falsely called Archbishop of St. Andrew's, most unjustly, and against all law, hath presumed to his former tyranny, as a signature past for his restitution to his ancient jurisdiction, as it is termed, more fully doth proopt. What end may be looked for from such beginning the half blind may see. And yet we have heard that a certain sum of money and victuals should be assigned by the queen's majesty for sustentation of our ministry. But how any such assignation can stand in stable assurance when that Roman antichrist shall be intruded above us, we can no wise understand. Yea, further we cannot see what assurance any within this realm that have professed the Lord Jesus can have of life or inheritance, if the head of that odious beast be cured amongst us. And, therefore, we yet again crave of you to advertise us with reasonable expedition of your judgments, that with unity of mind we may oppose ourselves to such tyranny as is intended against us. As from the beginning we have neither spared substance nor life, so mind we not to faint unto the end to maintain the same, so long as we can find the concurrence of brethren; of whom (as God forbid) if we be destitute, yet are we determined never to be subject to that Roman antichrist, neither yet to his usurped tyranny. But when we can do no further to suppress that odious beast, we mind to seal with our blood to our posterity, that the bright knowledge of Jesus Christ hath banished that man of sin and his venomous doctrine from our hearts and consciences."†

A copy of the Helvetic Confession of Faith, Helvetic Confession of Faith composed this year by the pastors of Zurich, had been sent to Scotland considered. In September, with the view of ascertaining how far the Church of Scotland agreed with the Reformed Churches on the continent. A meeting of the superintendents and some of the most learned ministers had been held immediately after its arrival, who, after reading the document, found that the doctrines embodied in it agreed perfectly with their own: the only difference being that the Church of Scotland observed no festival days, but the Sabbath day only. This Confession was brought before the assembly in December, and the court being highly satisfied with it, ordered the translation of it made by Mr. Robert Pont to be printed, together with a letter expressing their approbation of its contents, that part only excepted where mention is made of the observance of certain holy days. This confession was subscribed not only by the Tigurine Church and their confederates of Berne, but also by the Churches of Schaffhausen, Rhaetia, Milan, Geneva, Savoy, Polonia, and Hungaria. It designates superiority of ministers above ministers a human appointment, and confirmation a device of men. It condemns baptism by midwives or any women, as also prolix public prayers, the chanting of prayers, the multiplication of ceremonies, and the observance of saints' days.*

Knox had for some time past been so obnoxious to the queen that he was not allowed to preach in Edinburgh. Knox proceeded to England. Nay, his very presence in the kingdom was an annoyance to her majesty. It has been alleged that he was privy to the conspiracy against Riccioli, and that this was the ground of Mary's increased dislike to him at this time. But there is no reason whatever to suppose that he knew anything of the designs of the conspirators, although it is not improbable that after the event, considering the influence which it had upon the state and prospects of the Church, he may have expressed himself in terms calculated to irritate the queen. In these circumstances, as his two sons were in England, pursuing their studies at Cambridge, he considered it a favourable opportunity for paying a visit to the sister kingdom, that he might both indulge his paternal affection, and observe how the cause of Christ was advancing in places where he himself had formerly preached the Gospel. With that submission to lawful authority which always characterised him, he presented a request to the assembly for permission to proceed to England. Not only was this permission cheerfully granted, on condition that he should return to his native country before the 25th of June following, but letters also were given to him bearing testimony to his honest conversation and godly doctrine during his whole ministry in Scotland. "John Knox, bearer of these presents, has been a true and faithful minister, in doctrine pure and sincere, in life and conversation in our sight inculpable; and he has so faithfully used the talents granted to him by the Eternal, to the advancement of the glory of his godly name, to the propagation of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and edifying of the church."

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 51; Spottiswood, p. 198; Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 335, 336; Keith, vol. iii. p. 152; Knox, vol. ii. p. 539.

† Knox, vol. ii. pp. 543, 545.

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 534; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 334; Keith, vol. iii. p. 157.

preaching, that of duty we must heartily praise His godly name for that so great benefit granted to him for our utility and profit.”*

The assembly also availed themselves of the opportunity of sending by Knox a letter to the bishops and ministers of England, entreating them to deal gently with those of their brethren who scrupled to wear the sacerdotal vestments prescribed by law. The question of conformity was agitated at this period with great zeal and bitterness in England, and many individuals were sorely persecuted on account of their disapprobation of the corner-cap and surplice, as having popish associations connected with them. Knox himself, during his former residence in England, had been exposed to trouble on the same grounds, and he knew the excellence of many of the persons who scrupled to conform; and therefore it is probable that it was he himself who moved the assembly to interfere in behalf of their suffering brethren in the south. “It has come to our knowledge, reverend pastors, that divers of our brethren—some of them the most learned in England—are deprived of all ecclesiastical function and forbidden to preach, and thus are stopped from promoting the kingdom of God, because they have a scruple of conscience to use such garments as idolaters in time of darkness have used in their superstitious service; which report cannot but be very dolorous to our hearts, when we consider the sentence of the Apostle—‘If ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another.’ We intend not at this time to enter into the question, so keenly agitated, whether such apparel is to be accounted among things indifferent. Wherefore we crave that Christian charity may so far prevail with you, the pastors and guides of Christ’s flock in England, that you do one to another as you desire others to do to you. You cannot be ignorant what tenderness is in a scrupulous conscience. The consciences of some of you reclaim not at the wearing of these garments, but many thousands are otherwise persuaded. If surplice, corner-cap, and tippet, have been the badges of idolaters in the very act of their idolatry, what have the preachers of Christian liberty and the rebukers of superstition to do with the dregs of that Roman beast? The brethren that refuse such unprofitable apparel, do neither condemn nor molest you who use such trifles. On the other hand, if you that use these things will do the like to your brethren, we doubt not but therein you shall please God, and comfort the hearts of many who are wounded with the extremity which is used against these godly and beloved brethren.”†

The following year brought about a complete revolution in the affairs of Scotland. A rapid succession of shocking crimes, glaring imprudences, and sudden revolutions, filled the minds of men with astonishment, indignation, sudden change and terror. A whirlwind swept in the position over the country, and men held ^{of affairs.}

their breath at the deeds which were done. The visit of the queen to her sick husband in Glasgow, his removal in a litter to Edinburgh and lodgment in a solitary house on the town-wall, his murder almost immediately afterwards, and the blowing up of the house with gunpowder; the accusation brought against Bothwell of being the perpetrator of the deed, his mock trial, the undisguised marks of affection shown to him by the queen during its progress, and his acquittal; the divorce sued for before the restored court of the Archbishop of St. Andrew’s of Bothwell from his countess, and the adultery of which he confessed himself guilty; and, finally, the marriage of Mary to this most infamous man, the undoubted murderer of her own husband, and an adulterer by his own admission—these were events which fanned existing jealousies and discontents into an inextinguishable flame of opposition to the authority of the queen. The part which Mary took in prevailing upon the king to remove to Edinburgh by renewing her professions of affection for him, the employment of the restored jurisdiction of the Archbishop of St. Andrew’s in effecting the divorce of Bothwell from his own wife, and the unconcealed intimacy between Mary and Bothwell, even while he was on trial for the murder of Darnley—all lent a strong colour of probability to the supposition that she was previously cognisant of the design to destroy her husband. And even were she supposed innocent of all connection with this shocking deed, her speedy marriage to the undoubted perpetrator of the crime—an adulterer acknowledged, a man divorced from his lawful wife to make room for her—showed an utter disregard of all the decencies of life, and insulted the moral principles of the whole nation. The feeling everywhere arose that to permit a person, who had so outraged decency and morality, to retain possession of the throne would bring disgrace upon the name of Scotland. A powerful confederacy was speedily formed against her authority, and an open rupture soon followed. Some few friends rallied round her, but the charm of the royal name and the influence of the royal authority were gone. Mary’s own soldiers refused to fight for her, though she besought them with tears in her eyes to march against her enemies. Her surrender at Carberry Hill led by rapid steps to her imprisonment in Lochleven Castle, and her forced abdication of the throne; and her son, still an infant, was crowned king at Stirling, on the 27th July.*

Great indignation has been expressed in modern times against those who took up arms against Mary, and the Protestants in particular have been loaded with the most virulent abuse; but it has been clearly shown that they were by no means the worst enemies of the queen.

* Supra, vol. ii. pp. 44–76; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 133.

* Keith, vol. iii. p. 148; McCrie’s Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 147; Spottiswood, p. 198; Strype’s Grindal, Appendix xx.; Burnet’s History of the Reformation, vol. iii., Appendix xci.

† Knox, vol. ii. p. 545; Spottiswood, p. 143; Keith, vol. iii. p. 150; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 333.

The house of Hamilton, who have been generally represented as her most faithful adherents, were ready to concur in the nefarious project of getting rid of her by taking away her life; and the Archbishop of St. Andrew's and the Abbot of Kilwinning, the two leading men of this party, urged this course as the only certain method of reconciling all parties. Her relatives and friends, too, in France were thoroughly disgusted with her whole proceedings at this time; and, being convinced that she had shut herself out from all prospect of a peaceable or prosperous reign, they were indifferent whether she was restored to liberty or detained in prison.* The conviction, in fact, was all but universal that she had utterly disqualified herself for the government of the country; and the same conviction would have remained undisturbed to the present day, but for the heavy misfortunes which darkened the subsequent years of her unhappy life. It was the treacherous and cruel treatment which she received from Elizabeth, her long-continued captivity, the patience and fortitude with which she bore her numerous and extraordinary trials, and the violent death by which her career was terminated, which turned the tide of sympathy in Mary's favour, and led many to question whether she had not been too harshly treated by those who deprived her of her crown. Great misfortunes are often sufficient to efface the censure due to great crimes, although it is plain that they cannot alter past deeds, and ought not therefore to influence our judgment regarding them.

The change thus effected in the civil government of Scotland, the details of which are fully recorded in the thirty-second chapter of this history, was highly favourable to the cause of the Reformed Church. It was Mary's own personal views and feelings which had been the grand obstacle in the way of the Reformers, and had kept them in continued fear of the re-establishment of popery; and when her authority therefore was set aside, they speedily obtained that full ratification of their system for which they had long contended in vain. Their influence over the community was unbounded; and as the confederate lords who had taken up arms against the queen needed their countenance in prosecuting measures which, however just and proper, were necessarily attended with great danger, so they were the more disposed to make such concessions as the Church might require. Thus, everything conspired to forward the views of the Reformers. Their hearts had long been sick with hope deferred, but now they had the prospect of being able to establish their system upon a solid and permanent basis. They emerged at once from the darkness of perplexity and trouble into the brilliant light of hope and peace.

The usual meeting of the General Assembly took place in June, after the imprisonment of the queen, but before any final resolution had been taken with regard to the occupancy of the throne. The confederate lords, failing to procure the concurrence of the house of Hamilton and others of the nobility in their measures, made overtures to the assembly that these brethren should be invited to Edinburgh for the purpose of conferring about the state of religion, and bringing the ecclesiastical policy of the kingdom into a position of security and efficiency. This proposal met with the hearty approbation of the assembly; and Knox, Craig, Douglas, and Row, were appointed as commissioners to prepare a circular, and to transmit it to the earls, lords, barons, and commendators of abbeys. In this letter, after dwelling upon the dangers to which the country had been exposed from popery, and the difficulties and trials with which the Reformed Church had been perplexed, they declare that the assembly judged it needful, "by an universal concurrence and consent of the whole professors of Christ Jesus within this realm," to ward off the dangers with which they were surrounded; and for this purpose had appointed that a General Assembly of the whole professors of all estates and degrees should be held in Edinburgh on the 20th of the next month—viz., July. The object of this extraordinary meeting was declared to be that a perpetual order might be taken for the liberty of the Kirk of God, and for the sustentation of ministers and decaying members, and that a sure union and conjunction might be established among all the members, so as to enable them to withstand the rage and violence of their enemies.*

These circular letters did not in general attain the object for which they were designed. Most of the noblemen to whom they were addressed, although they avowed unshaken attachment to the Protestant faith, yet declared that in the present unsettled state of the kingdom they did not consider it expedient for the Church to hold such a meeting, nor consistent with a regard to their own safety for them to attend it. Argyle and Lord Boyd, and the commendators of Arbroath and Kilwinning, sent written answers to this effect. The Provost of Aberdeen, however, Thomas Menzies, whilst excusing his absence, expressed entire concurrence in the course which the brethren were pursuing, and declared that the community over which he presided would acquiesce in the decisions of the assembly, and maintain the same with their bodies and goods.†

When the assembly met in July, they proceeded at once to deliberate regarding the measures which should be adopted by the government in order to secure the well-being of the Church. Articles, prepared by a committee appointed for the purpose,

* Tytler, vol. vii. pp. 174, 177; Throckmorton's letter to Leicester, 9th August, 1567.

* Spottiswood, p. 208; Keith, vol. iii. p. 170; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 370; Cook's History of the Reformation, vol. iii. pp. 280, 281.

† Spottiswood, p. 209; Keith, vol. iii. p. 178.

were laid upon the table, and after mature deliberation they were approved of, and subscribed by the nobility first, and then by the barons, superintendents, and commissioners of towns. The substance of these resolutions was as follows:—The parliament held in 1560, before the queen's arrival, was to be declared a lawful parliament in the first meeting of the Estates that should now be held; and all the acts which had been passed in it regarding religion, and the abolition of popery, and the Pope's usurped authority, were to be considered as having the force of law, and to be carried into effect accordingly. The arrangement by which the thirds of benefices were to be appropriated to the support of the ministry of the Church was to be faithfully acted upon, until some final settlement should be made by which the entire patrimony of the Church might be expended in accordance with God's Word. Also the noblemen, barons, and other brethren subscribing the articles, were to make the utmost possible effort, in the first lawful parliament, for the complete restoration to the Church of her own patrimony; and nothing was to be done in that parliament until ecclesiastical affairs were first settled and arranged. None were to be allowed to hold office in colleges, or to take the superintendence of schools, unless they were tried and approved by the superintendents and visitors of the Church. Crimes and offences committed against the law of Heaven were to be punished according to God's Word, and the utmost effort was to be made to bring to justice all parties who had been in any way accessory to the murder of the late king; and the noblemen, and barons, and all subscribers of the articles, were to aid in defending the young prince, whom God had given them, against all who might seek his life. All kings and princes who might afterwards reign in Scotland were to be required, before being crowned, solemnly to swear and promise that they would maintain and defend, by all means in their power, the true religion of Christ presently professed within the kingdom. The young prince was to be committed to the care of wise, godly, grave, and learned men, that he might be trained up in virtue and the fear of God, and thus be prepared for discharging faithfully and efficiently the solemn and important duties of the exalted position for which he was destined. The noblemen, barons, and others subscribing the articles, were to agree to convene in arms for the subversion of all monuments of idolatry, especially the odious and blasphemous mass; and they were to make a progress through the whole realm for this purpose, removing all idolaters and others not admitted to the ministry from all functions, whether public or private, establishing the true religion of Jesus Christ in every place, and appointing superintendents, ministers, and other needful functionaries in the Church. "And sick lyke shall punish all other vices which presently abound within this realm, which God's law and the civil laws command to be punished, and chiefly the murder of the king lately committed. And in like manner they shall promise faithfully to reform schools, colleges, and universities, throughout the realm; to expel and remove idolaters who have charges, and others that have not yet joined themselves to the true Kirk of Christ, and plant faithful instructors in their room, to the end the youth be not infected with poisonous doctrine at the beginning, which cannot afterwards be purged."*

Parliament met on the 15th of December, when John Knox preached, and in his discourse he took occasion to admonish the house to begin their proceedings with the affairs of religion, as the most likely means of enabling them to prosecute their other business successfully. The promises made by the leading nobility to the assembly in July were not forgotten. Thanks were rendered to Almighty God for the free course, which the Gospel of Christ had obtained throughout the whole realm of Scotland. From small beginnings the cause had advanced till it reached a great magnitude, and no blood had been shed by its supporters on purely religious grounds. "Iron has not been heard within the house of the Lord, that is to say, the whole has been builded, set up, and erected to this greatness without bloodshed."† The acts passed by the parliament of 1560, whose ratification had so often been sought in vain from the queen, for the abrogation of the Pope's jurisdiction and authority in Scotland, for the abolition of mass, and the punishment of those who either listened to it or performed it, were renewed and confirmed. The confession of faith was again ratified, and those who opposed it were declared to be no longer members of the Kirk within this realm. It was decreed that kings and princes, at the time of their admission to authority, should be required to bind themselves by an oath that they would maintain the true religion now established in the land, rule in accordance with God's Word and the laws of the realm, and root out those who were declared by the true Kirk to be heretics and enemies of God's true worship. It was also enacted that none but those who professed the religion now established by law should be permitted to hold any public office, unless it was hereditary or already conferred for life.‡ With regard to the appointment of ministers, it was enacted that while the right of presentation was reserved to the ancient patrons, under the obligation of exercising it within six months, the examination and admission of the persons presented belonged to the Kirk; and where the superintendents and other office-bearers of the Kirk refused to admit the patron's presentee, the final appeal was to be made to the General Assembly, whose decision was to settle the question.§

Meeting of parliament in December.

* Spottiswood, p. 209; Book of the Universal Kirk, pp. 65—68; Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 378, 382; Keith, vol. iii. p. 178.

† Leithington's speech in the parliament of Dec., 1567.

‡ Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 389.

§ Spottiswood, p. 214; Maitland, vol. ii. p. 1006; Brown's Compendious History of the Church of Scotland, pp. 36, 37.

Hitherto the ministers of the Reformed Church had lived in a state of great destitution. The arrangements made for their support had never been faithfully carried into effect, and yet they had continued with most exemplary patience and self-denial to discharge the functions of their office. This important subject was brought under the notice of parliament, and an act was passed which, while it acknowledged the injustice with which the ministers had been treated, and the poverty to which they had been reduced, provided more fully and with greater honesty of purpose for their support in time to come. "Because the ministers have been long defrauded of their stipends, so that they have come into great poverty and necessity, and yet have continued in their vocation without payment of their stipends for a great space: wherethrough they may be constrained to leave their vocation, unless remedy be provided: therefore our sovereign lord, with advice of my lord regent and the Estates of this present parliament, has statuted and ordained that the hail thirds of the hail benefices of the realm shall now instantly, and in all time coming, first be paid to the ministers of the Evangel of Jesus Christ and their successors, and ordains the lords of session to grant letters charging all and sundry intromittors to answer to the said ministers and their collectors, notwithstanding any discharge given by our sovereign lord's mother to any persons of the said thirds—aye, and until the Kirk come to the full possession of their proper patrimony, which is the tiends."* Here the Church's title to ecclesiastical property was acknowledged in words; but there never seems to have been any serious intention of bestowing it upon her in its integrity. There were not a few who were even disposed to withhold the thirds, but the position of public affairs overruled objections which might otherwise have been pertinaciously pressed, and an enactment of great apparent liberality and promise was passed.† This enactment, too, proved of very considerable benefit to the Church for a time.‡

It was also appointed that a yearly account of the whole thirds should be rendered to the Exchequer, and that the surplus, after the payment of all the stipends allotted to ministers, should be appropriated to the use of the sovereign. Jurisdiction was also formally granted to the Kirk by the king's grace, with advice of the regent and parliament, which jurisdiction was described as consisting in the preaching of the true word of Jesus Christ, correction of manners, and administration of the holy sacraments; and it was declared that there was to be no other face of a Kirk or of religion, and no other ecclesiastical jurisdiction acknowledged within the realm. With the view of settling precisely the boundaries of the jurisdiction which was to belong to the Kirk, commissioners were appointed—viz., Sir James Balfour, Prior of Pittenweem; Mark, Commendator of Newbottle; John, Prior of Coldingham; Mr. James Macgill of Rankelior Nether, Clerk-register; William Maitland of Lethington, Secretary; Sir John Bellenden, Justice-clerk; John Erskine of Dun; Mr. John Spottiswood, Superintendent of Lothian; John Knox, and Mr. John Craig—to consider what special points should appertain to the jurisdiction of the Kirk, and to report their judgment to the next parliament.* It was also decreed that no persons were to be allowed to teach in universities, colleges, and schools, unless they were tried and approved by the superintendents of the Kirk or visitors; and patrons who had provostries, prebendaries, or chaplainries, in their gift, were enjoined to appropriate them to the support of bursars studying at college.

The General Assembly met at Edinburgh on the 25th December, a few days after the Meeting of the General Assembly. Bishop of Orkney, was charged with neglecting the visitation of the churches placed under his superintendence, and with having solemnised the marriage of the queen to Bothwell; and for these offences he was deprived of all office in the Church. John Craig, minister of Edinburgh, was called to account for having proclaimed the banns of marriage between the queen and Bothwell; but he gave such an account of the steps which he had taken in the case as fully satisfied the assembly that he had acted a becoming part, and could in no way be charged with having helped forward that scandalous marriage.†

At this meeting, also, John Craig, David Lindsay, George Buchanan, and George Hay, were empowered to cite before them all ministers, elders, and deacons of churches, under the charge of the superintendent of Fife, that they might state their complaints against him, which shows that the office of superintendent was essentially different from the office of bishop in modern times.‡ Commissioners were also appointed to co-operate with those who had been nominated by government for the consideration of what should pertain to the jurisdiction of the Church, and to decide questions that might in the meantime arise.§ The Earl of Argyle being charged with living apart from his wife, and with other offences, declared his readiness to submit to the discipline of the Church; and the Countess of Argyle, having acknowledged that she had offended God by countenancing with her presence the baptism of the king in a papistical manner, was ordained to make public repentance in the Chapel-Royal of Stirling.||

The position of the Reformed Church was now

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 92; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 390.

† See supra, vol. ii. p. 56.

‡ Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 393.

§ Scott's Apologetical Narration, p. 20; Spottiswood, p. 219.

|| Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 397.

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 91.

† Maitland, vol. ii. p. 1007.

‡ McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 160; Robertson, vol. i. p. 400.

completely different from what it had ever been Position now occupied by the Reformed Church.

before. Its authority was acknowledged and sanctioned by parliament, and no other ecclesiastical jurisdiction was recognised as existing in the country. This signal triumph was achieved by the strenuous and persevering labours of the Reformers. For years they had struggled on amidst innumerable discouragements and in the face of great dangers, and often it had seemed as if their cause were upon the very brink of ruin. During those days of darkness, the ministers were frequently altogether unprovided for; they suffered all the privations of the most abject poverty; yet still they laboured in preaching the Gospel with an earnestness which no sufferings could cool or destroy; and their zeal and boldness and evangelical fervour gradually extended their influence through the length and breadth of the land. At the period when the first General Assembly was held, in 1560, there were only twelve Protestant ministers in Scotland; but during the seven years that followed, although these were years of trial and difficulty, so many churches were planted and brought to the settled enjoyment of the ordinances of the Gospel, that the number of ministers amounted to between two and three hundred; and readers and exhorters had increased in a similar proportion.* The buffetings of the storm had but rooted the Protestant faith more firmly in the land; and it promised to flourish long, and to expand its branches on every side, affording fruit and shade to many succeeding generations.

The high satisfaction which the Reformers felt at the present position of affairs is apparent from a letter which the assembly sent to Mr. Willock, who was then in England, to invite his return. They had long been tossed upon the boisterous waves of civil discord and religious persecution, but they were now moored in a commodious and safe harbour. "As the Lord our God hath at all times been, from the beginning of this his work of reformation and restitution of his true worship and religion within Scotland, loving brother in the Lord, most beneficial and bountiful toward this realm, so hath he now, by this last most miraculous victory and overthrow, poured forth in greatest abundance the riches of his mercy, in that not only he hath driven away the tempest and storm, but also hath quieted and calmed all surges of persecution, as now we may think well our ship is received and placed in a most happy and blessed port. Our enemies, praised be God, are dashed; religion established; sufficient provision made for ministers; order taken and penalty appointed for all sorts of transgression and transgressors; and, above, all, a godly magistrate, whom God of his eternal and heavenly providence hath reserved to this age, to put in execution whatsoever he by law commandeth. Now then, loving brother, as your presence was to us all in time of trouble most comfortable, so it is now of us all universally wished; but most earnestly craved by your own flock, who continually at all assemblies have declared the force of that conjunction, the earnestness of that love, the pith of that zeal and mutual care that bindeth the pastor to his flock, which neither by process of time is diminished, nor by separation and distance of places restringed, nor yet by any tyranny and fear dissolved. True it is that at this their most earnest and just petition we have winked this while past, not but that to us all your absence was most dolorous. But in respect of troubles we judged it more meet to await such opportunity as now God, in this most wonderful victory of his Evangel, hath offered. Therefore, seeing all impediments are removed, and your flock still continueth in earnest suit for you, and now everywhere throughout the realm commissioners and superintendents are placed, and one offered to them, and by them refused altogether, awaiting for you, we could no longer stay, but agree to this their desire. The time is proper now to reap with blitheness that which before by you was sown in tears, and to enjoy the fruit of your most wearisome and painful labours. It shall be no less pleasant to you to see your native country at liberty, which you left under the heavy burden of most cruel servitude, than comfortable to behold the religion of Jesus Christ throughout all this realm flourishing, virtue increasing, virtuous men in reputation. Now shall you see the capestone of that work whereof you laid the foundation."*

The ministers of the Reformed Church, it is plain from this letter, now felt that their cause had completely triumphed. They had secured for their principles the formal sanction of the legislature in all its branches, and they placed such perfect confidence in the honesty and integrity of the regent, as to feel assured that the statutes enacted in their favour would not be allowed to remain a dead letter. And if they had laboured with unflinching zeal in the discharge of their sacred duties, even during the dark and troublous times of the queen-mother's regency and Mary's unfortunate reign, they were determined now to redouble their efforts, and to persevere till they had planted churches in every corner of the land. Willock's return was eagerly desired by them, that his zeal, experience, and influence, might aid them in carrying out their purposes; and, indeed, they were ready to welcome efficient and faithful labourers from every quarter.

Much fault has been found with the friends of the Reformed Church for the intolerant and persecuting statutes which they enacted at this time, prohibiting the existence of any other Church in the land, and confining all public offices to members of their own communion. Doubtless these enactments were inconsistent with attaches to the intolerance of the Reformers.

What blame

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 74; Hetherington's History, p. 39; McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 161.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 399, 400; Keith, vol. iii. p. 195.

the principles of civil and religious liberty; and it would have been to the everlasting honour of the Reformed Church to have altogether dispensed with them. But it would be a great injustice to bring their proceedings to the test of the principles which now prevail among Protestants. We must consider how they were circumstanced at the time. We must remember the practical lessons which they had received from the Church of Rome, and the sentiments which prevailed universally in those days regarding Church and State. The true idea of religious liberty was then altogether unknown. No freedom of thought or action had been granted to the Reformers by the Church of Rome, so long as she retained any measure of power; and they knew full well that if that Church should ever regain its authority in the land, the "fiery trials" which had entailed so much misery upon them, and which were still fresh in their memory, would all be renewed. It was not the practice of the Romish Church then, any more than it is now, to permit the existence of any separate Christian society, if any means, however cruel and nefarious, could accomplish its destruction; and it is not at all wonderful that measures of repression should have been adopted against a body which has never shrunk from any enormity that promised to advance her own interests. If Rome had practised toleration towards the Reformers when authority and power were lodged in her hands, then she might with reason have complained of the different treatment which she received when her day of weakness and trial came. But the censures which have been so profusely poured upon the Reformers for their intolerance of popery, by writers in the interest of Rome, cannot but appear chargeable with shameless partiality, when it is remembered that, whilst the persecuting measures of Rome have always been carried out with relentless vigour, the intolerance of the Reformers never led them in one single instance to go the length of shedding blood. It seems to be the idea of many, that because Rome has always avowed her right to employ force in bringing back wanderers to her fold, therefore she is but acting in character when she persecutes, and ought not to be severely blamed for any deed of the kind which she has ever perpetrated; whereas, on the other hand, because Protestants have now universally come to the conclusion that persecution is alike wicked and impolitic, therefore even their ancestors, who were but groping their way to the adoption of this great principle of religious liberty, ought to be denounced as intolerant and bigoted fanatics, because they did not all at once arrive at the clear perception of its truth and importance. It is as if a threat to commit murder, followed by the perpetration of the deed, were to be visited with a lenient censure; while the person who merely uttered the threat, but shrank back from embroiling his hands in blood, should be denounced as a cruel and bloody-minded man.

Considerable light is thrown upon the relation of the Church to the State by the enactments which elevated Protestantism to the position of the established religion of the country. On the one hand, it is obvious that the State did not construct a creed and a form of ecclesiastical government for the Church, and then impose these upon the nation by civil authority. The Church existed previously to its establishment, and the doctrines which it embraced were the result of the diligent study of the Holy Scriptures by the Reformers themselves. But, on the other hand, it is equally undeniable that the Estates of the realm did not conceive themselves obligated to ratify whatever doctrines the Church might have previously adopted. They exercised a right of deliberation on every point, whether it related to doctrine or discipline. Indeed, we have seen that when the Confession of Faith was originally prepared, it was drawn up by men nominated for this purpose by the government; and when that same Confession was first sanctioned, it was debated article by article in parliament.* The Reformed Church was established by the Estates of the realm, because, after careful examination, they approved of its constitution and doctrines; and all the special privileges which were conferred upon it as an Established Church were derived from the State. Its jurisdiction was defined and ratified by the State, and its endowments were derived from funds under the control of the same authority. Doubtless the State consulted the Church in reference to the nature of the jurisdiction which it might be proper for her to possess; but it was also considered necessary that the sanction of the State should be given to whatever jurisdiction she might be entitled to exercise as an Established Church. The connection between the Church and the State has been designated by some, a compact which continues obligatory upon both parties, so long as neither of them violates the original stipulations. This is quite a mistake. There was nothing analogous to a compact in the whole transaction. If the Church were now to change her views with regard to the propriety of receiving support from the State, it would be quite competent for her, independently altogether of the views which the State might entertain, to renounce all the privileges of her present position; and equally, on the other hand, if the State should become persuaded that the manner in which civil and religious affairs are at present interwoven is injurious to the community, or if the State should come to the conclusion that altered circumstances required the connection between Church and State to be placed upon a different footing, it would be quite competent for parliament to enact that henceforward there should either be no Established Church, or an Established Church modelled after a different fashion. To deny the right of parliament to make any such change, is in reality to deny the legality of the present Established Church; for was not this Church substituted

Nature of the connection between Church and State.

* Supra, vol. i. pp. 691, 692.

by parliament in the room of a previously existing establishment, which was abolished without its own consent, and deprived of all support and jurisdiction? What should there be in an act of parliament passed in the year 1567, that should place its revision for ever beyond the power of parliament, any more than in other acts which were passed before that time, or which have been enacted since?

It appears that the letter sent by the assembly ^{Return of} in December to John Willock, ^{Willock.} urging his return to Scotland to aid them in forwarding their great and now promising enterprise, at once determined him to revisit his former scene of labour; for we find him in the following year acting as superintendent of the West, and then appointed Moderator of the General Assembly in July, 1568.* Hitherto there had been ^{Meeting of} no very rigid rule with regard to the persons who were permitted to ^{the General Assembly.} take part in the proceedings of the assembly, and no little disorder and confusion had often prevailed, in consequence of the multitudes who convened, and the indiscretion of some who wished to be thought more zealous and faithful than others. These considerations were urged by Willock as a reason for declining the office of moderator; but on receiving a promise that ready submission should be given to his authority, and that some regulations should immediately be adopted with regard to the constitution of future assemblies, he agreed to accept the office. Accordingly, it was enacted that henceforward none should be permitted to speak or vote in assemblies excepting superintendents, commissioners appointed to visit churches, commissioners of shires, boroughs, and universities, and ministers nominated expressly for the purpose. Commissioners of burghs were to be appointed by the council and Kirk of their own towns. Commissioners of shires and ministers were to be appointed in the synodal convention of the diocese to which they belonged; and all persons claiming a seat in the assembly were to produce written evidence of their commission. And it was enjoined that in order to prevent the same individuals from being always re-appointed to sit as members in the supreme court, ministers and commissioners should be changed from year to year. And for the purpose of saving the assembly from being troubled or molested with unnecessary business, it was ordained that no matters should be brought before the supreme court which the superintendents might and ought to determine in their synodal conventions. It would thus appear that with regard to some points decisions of synods were to be final, and there can be no question that this would still be a very wise arrangement, and would save a vast amount of trouble and expense, though there might be considerable difficulty experienced in drawing a sufficiently discriminating line between such cases, and those which were to be reserved for the supreme court, or which might be brought there by appeal.*

The scarcity of ministers throughout the country had led some readers to overstep the boundaries of their office, and to engage in preaching the Word and administering the sacraments. It was therefore ordained by the supreme court that such intrusion upon the office of the ministry was no longer to be tolerated; and superintendents were enjoined to prohibit all readers from acting in this manner, under pain of being dealt with as transgressing the rules of the Church and the Act of Parliament.†

Sundry regulations were adopted at this time, which show that society was in a very unsettled state, and that a spirit of violence and revenge was continually impelling men to the commission of aggravated crimes. The sacredness of human life was not sufficiently recognised in the country. We find it ordained that persons who had been hurried on to the perpetration of murder should abstain from all participation of the sacraments till they satisfied the Church; and that their admonition should take place publicly where the crime was committed, to the end men might understand that the Church winked not at the shedding of innocent blood.‡ It was also ordained that the murderer, adulterer, or incestuous person, should not be received to repentance by any particular Church till he had first presented himself before the General Assembly; and that afterwards he should be subjected to the same discipline which had been prescribed to Paul Methven.§ In the case of discipline for the shedding of blood, the weapon with which the deed was done, or one similar to it, was to be carried in the hand of the criminal during the whole time. Persons, too, who were guilty of oppressing children were to appear publicly in the church, clothed with sackcloth, and having the feet and head bare. Of course, these ecclesiastical regulations did not interfere with the punishment assigned by the civil law to the crimes in question. They make it plain, however, that too frequently the sword of public justice remained slumbering in its scabbard.||

Thomas Bassandine had printed a book entitled “The Fall of the Roman Kirk,” in ^{Restrictions} which the king was designated the ^{laid on Bassan-} head of the primitive Church. ^{dine the printer.} The same printer had also appended an indecent song to an edition of the Psalm-book published by him, probably with the idea that the song would tend to promote the sale of the psalter. Whether it was his object to get the song into circulation under the shelter of the psalter, or to promote the sale of the psalter by the insertion of the song, does not appear. But the facts were brought under the notice of the assembly, who ordained that the song should be deleted, and also that the offensive

* Spottiswood, p. 219; Keith, vol. iii. p. 195; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 104.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 422.

‡ Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 100.

§ Supra, vol. ii. p. 13.

|| Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 422.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 421.

designation in the treatise regarding the Roman Kirk should be altered, and the whole treatise revised. Mr. Bassandine, too, was enjoined in all time coming to abstain from publishing anything without procuring license from the supreme magistrate, and submitting all that pertained to religion to the revision of some one appointed by the Kirk.*

The expectations of a fixed and suitable maintenance for the Church, which the ministers had been led to cherish, in consequence of the enactments of parliament at the close of the preceding year, so far from being realised, had met with a very considerable disappointment.† It was found that the thirds of benefices assigned for the support of the Church did not in fact yield to the ministers one half of the stipends which it was proposed they should receive, and in some places not even one fourth. The assembly therefore felt themselves under the necessity of complaining. They conceived it to be very unreasonable that papists, whom they designated enemies to God's Kirk and the commonwealth, and laymen who laboured not in the ministry of the Word at all, should receive and enjoy, without any deduction whatever, two-thirds of all ecclesiastical revenues, whilst the ministers of the Church, who performed all the labour of instructing the people, did not receive even the remaining one-third, excepting under heavy deductions. They sent, therefore, to his grace the lord regent a deputation, consisting of the superintendents of Fife, Angus, and Lothian, Messrs. John Craig and John Row, ministers, together with the Laird of Barganie, to make known their grounds of complaint, and to request his grace to make an arrangement by which the two-thirds of benefices, retained by those who performed no duty in return for them, might be burdened with all the common incidental charges, whilst the one-third should be paid over to the Church, without any deduction, for the support of the ministry, of schools, and of the poor, according to the will of God. This very reasonable proposal was brought before the secret council, but although the regent himself was disposed to accede to the request of the ministers, there were too many influential persons interested in keeping matters as they were; and therefore the utmost he was able to accomplish, was to secure an agreement that measures should be taken for enforcing a more faithful and regular payment of the portion due to the Church. And any legal expenses that might be incurred through the resistance of individuals found withholding what was due to the ministers, were to be defrayed by those individuals, as much being claimed from them above the value of the debt sued for as would meet these expenses. ‡

The same deputation were also instructed to confer with the regent with regard to sundry benefices which were vacant, and to request that he would either present qualified persons to them with advice of the assembly, or permit the assembly to dispose of them, seeing they had now been vacant for more than six months. They were to bring under his notice the state of the College of Aberdeen, and to request that he would give commission to certain persons to institute a thorough investigation into its position, and empower them to reform its abuses, to remove corrupt and inefficient office-bearers and regents, and to place qualified persons in their room, that the youth might be instructed in godliness and letters. Another topic which was to be brought before the notice of the regent related to odious crimes and vices, which abounded in many parts of the kingdom, and which it was declared to be the duty of the magistrates to punish, that the wrath of God might be turned away from the realm. No farther steps had yet been taken with reference to a final settlement of the limits of the jurisdiction of the Church. An urgent request was therefore to be presented to his grace, that he would require those of the council who had formerly been appointed to consider this subject to meet with the persons whom the assembly had nominated for the same purpose, that they might arrange this important question, and draw some definite line of demarcation between civil and sacred questions.

To the requests of the assembly regarding all these points, favourable answers were returned by the regent with advice of his council. He promised to present qualified ministers to all common churches that were vacant; and with regard to chaplaincies, he desired to know the opinion of the assembly, that he might do nothing with which they might afterwards have occasion to find fault. He ordained that a commission should be organised for the reformation of the College of Aberdeen, and for the appointment of godly and qualified masters. He signified his purpose of causing the justice-clerk to institute proceedings against all persons who were chargeable with the crimes and vices referred to. And he named the 8th of August as the day when the civil and ecclesiastical commissioners should meet for the purpose of arranging the boundaries between civil and sacred things.*

The assembly were desirous that the regent would concur with them in augmenting the number of superintendents. But there were difficulties in the way of such a step at present, and therefore his grace declared that the assembly must, in the meantime, appoint commissioners to do the work of superintendents.

These answers of the regent were highly favourable: indeed, he was always disposed to do as much as lay in his power for the benefit of the Reformed Church. The ministers placed all confidence in him, and they again were the leading supporters of his government, so that both interest

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 100.

† Robertson, vol. i. p. 400.

‡ Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 101; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 425; Hetherington, p. 40.

* Spottiswood, p. 219.

and inclination prompted him to grant all their reasonable desires. The enemies of the Reformed Church were the enemies of the regent, and they were numerous, powerful, and unscrupulous. The following letter, written by Knox to Mr. John Wood, in England, shows the fears which he entertained with regard to the safety of the reformed cause and the preservation of the regent's life:—"We look daily for the arrival of the duke and his Frenchmen, sent to restore Satan to his kingdom. Let England take heed, for assuredly their neighbours' houses are on fire. I would, dear brother, that you should travail with zealous men that they may consider our state. Without support we are not able to resist the force of domestic enemies, unless God work miraculously, much less are we able to stand up against the power of France, the substance of the Pope, and the malice of the house of Guise. The whole comfort of the enemies is this, that by treason or other means they may cut off the regent, and then cut the throat of the innocent king. How narrowly the regent hath escaped once, I suppose you have heard. As their malice is not quenched, so ceaseth not the practice of the wicked to put in execution the cruelty devised. I live as a man already dead from all affairs civil, and therefore I praise my God, for so I have some quietness in spirit, and time to meditate on death, and upon the troubles I have long feared and foreseen. The Lord assist you with his Holy Spirit, and put an end to my travails to his own glory, and to the comfort of his Kirk, for assuredly, brother, this miserable life is bitter unto me."*

The conference of civil and ecclesiastical commissioners, appointed to take place on the 8th of August, with the view of fixing the limits of the Church's jurisdiction, appears never to have been held.† The question was one encompassed with great difficulties; and although it was frequently brought under the notice of the regent and his council by those who were interested in its settlement, yet the consideration of it was continually postponed. The ministers were exceedingly desirous of having the boundaries defined, within which it should be considered proper and legitimate for them to act in their spiritual character; and the numerous applications which they made to the civil power to concur with them in some arrangement with regard to this point, must exonerate them from the charge of wishing unduly to extend their own privileges; but the government, whether they were afraid of entering upon so perplexed a question, or were apprehensive that the Church would push her claims farther than they were disposed to allow, shrank back from the consideration of the subject. And, at this period, there were other and more urgent questions forcing themselves upon the attention of the regent and his associates: the civil affairs of the country were in a critical position, and it required their utmost skill and efforts to prevent the government of the king from being overthrown by the partisans of Mary. Her escape from Lochleven, her flight into England after the battle of Langside, and the tedious and painful proceedings which ensued,—the regent and most of the leading men of his party conceiving it necessary to follow her into Elizabeth's dominions, that they might prevent that princess from espousing her cause or attempting to restore her to the Scottish throne,—not unnaturally occupied their minds so completely as to leave no room for those questions connected with the limits of the Church's jurisdiction, which it had been proposed to consider at this time.*

A meeting of the General Assembly was held on the 25th of December, at Edinburgh, Meeting of the in the Nether Council-house, at General Assembly. the opening of which prayers were made by Knox for the assistance of the Holy Ghost. Very few attended this meeting, and there is no mention made of any one who acted as moderator. An epidemic malady prevailed in Edinburgh at the time, currently described as the plague, which carried off 2550 individuals during the period of the regent's absence; and, at the same time, provisions were unprecedentedly scarce and dear throughout the whole country.† It so happened, too, that at the time of the assembly's meeting, the weather was uncommonly tempestuous and stormy in all parts of the kingdom, and brethren at a distance thus found it impracticable to proceed to the metropolis. These causes, added to the absence of the regent and the uncertainty and difficulty in which the civil affairs of the country were involved, rendered the meeting an exceedingly thin one; and on this account those who were present did not feel themselves warranted to transact the ordinary amount of business. And besides all this, the position of the government rendered it impossible for the privy council to take any interest in the affairs of the Church, and without their concurrence there were many questions that could not be settled or considered at all.‡

Almost the only business that came before this assembly was a letter from William, Earl of Glencairn, which exhibits the deep and enlightened interest always taken by this nobleman in the prosperity of the Church of Christ. It was his lordship's earnest desire to have been present at the meeting of the supreme court, that he might take part with his Christian brethren in advancing the interests of religion; but urgent business connected with the public affairs of the

* Hetherington's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 40; supra, vol. ii. p. 83.

† The following extract from the "Diurnal of Occurrents" shows the extent of the evil: "In all this year preceeding, the pest being in Edinburgh and Leith and Cunnongate, thair was ane verie greit darth in this realme, sua the boll of eit meill was sauld for iiii pundis xii shillings, the boll of quheit for iiii pundis x shillings, and the boll of brid for iiii pundis."

‡ Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 106; Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 470, 471.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 428.

† Spottiswood, p. 219.

kingdom, and his distance from the place of meeting, threw a barrier in his way, though he assured the assembly that whatever measures might be adopted by them, he would concur in carrying them forward to the utmost of his power. His concern for the comfortable support of the ministers of the Gospel was more disinterested than that of almost any who belonged to the Protestant Church; for he had spontaneously and without delay put the Church in possession of the thirds of the bishopric of Glasgow, nor had he allowed his own interests, as was the practice with so many, to interfere with the faithful appropriation of the funds under his hand. He also requested the assembly to take measures for the settlement of two ministers, Mr. John Porterfield and an Englishman, who is described as both godly and learned; which requests were cheerfully acceded to, the assembly praising God for the enlightened zeal displayed by his lordship, and expressing the conviction that the Lord Jesus Christ would strengthen his lordship unto the end.*

For the settlement of questions which it was not found possible to consider in a satisfactory manner at the meeting in December, it was agreed that another meeting should be convened on the 25th of February. At the same time, it was provided that if any unforeseen obstacles should arise, some other day and place might be fixed upon, not only convenient for the ministers and commissioners of towns and kirks, but also suitable for the nobility and privy council, "quhaise presenee is very requisite for setting forward the affairs of the Kirk."†

Before the time fixed for the additional meeting of the General Assembly arrived, the regent had returned from England; and as it so happened that the pestilence began immediately thereafter to abate, all the most unfavourable circumstances which had exerted so detrimental an influence upon the former meeting were now changed, and it was not found requisite either to postpone the meeting or to change its place. At the time and place originally appointed the assembly met, and Mr. David Lindsay was chosen to fill the moderator's chair.

The civil affairs of the country at this period were a very threatening aspect. During the regent's absence in England, rumours most prejudicial to his character had been industriously circulated through the country; to the effect that he had agreed to send the infant king to the court of England, to be educated under Elizabeth's care, and that he had stipulated to have himself declared legitimate, and recognised as the nearest heir to the Scottish throne, in the event of the young king dying without issue. It was also said that in return for the support given to him by the English queen in maintaining these pretensions, he was to acknowledge the supremacy of England over Scotland, and to hold his crown as a vassal of the neighbouring kingdom.* Within a fortnight, too, after the regent's return, the Duke of Chatellerault arrived in Scotland, bringing with him a commission from Mary, by which he was authorised to govern the country in her name. He immediately issued a proclamation forbidding the lieges to yield obedience to any but himself, and those who might be appointed to office by him. A counter-proclamation was issued by the regent, at the Cross of Edinburgh, commanding the king's lieges to repair to Glasgow by the 10th of March, and preparations were made on both sides for an appeal to arms in defence of their respective views and claims.

The influence of the Church in public affairs is apparent from the fact that the duke addressed a letter to the assembly, the object of which was to gain over the ministers to his side, and to induce them to use their influence to prevent the people from proceeding to Glasgow, in obedience to the regent's summons. He professed it to be his determined purpose that the Word of God should have free passage through the whole realm, that the sacraments should be administered according to the institution of Jesus Christ our Saviour, and that all true subjects should be protected in the possession and enjoyment of all that belonged to them. He also declared it to be his desire that there should be a convention of the whole Estates of the realm, in a quiet and peaceable manner, to investigate the origin of the present troubles, and that after exploring God's grace and direction, they should proceed to apply remedial measures to existing evils; and he promised at the same time that he and all who continued under obedience to the queen, "our sovereign," would submit to whatever might be agreed upon in such a convention. And he concluded with stating that, although he would prefer to turn the forces which he had levied against thieves and oppressors of the realm, yet, if the Earl of Moray persisted in attacking him, he trusted in God and the justness of his cause, and doubted not that he would receive the support of all true men, and be able to defend himself. "Therefore, we require you in God's behalf to make some of our affairs and mind patent to the people; and if ye find out aught on our part, duty requieth that you come and reason upon the same with us, when you shall find us reasonable in all causes, according to God's Word and equity.†

When this letter was read in the assembly, the brethren determined to consult the regent before taking any steps in the way of replying to it. They were earnestly desirous of interposing their good offices, with the view of bringing about an accommodation; but they did not feel at Attempt of the duke to secure the support of the General Assembly.

Accommodation effected through the influence of the Church.

* Tytler, vol. vii. p. 270; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 475; Haynes, pp. 500—503.

† Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 109; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 481.

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 105.

† Ibid., p. 106.

liberty to correspond with an individual who was endeavouring to overturn the government of the king, without acquainting the court with their proceedings, and obtaining permission to put forth their efforts. Accordingly, they appointed Messrs. John Spottiswood, John Winram, and John Row, to repair to his grace the regent, to ascertain his pleasure with regard to the letter which they had received from the duke, and then with his concurrence to proceed to the duke, and to employ all possible efforts to prevail upon him and his friends to acknowledge the authority both of the king and of the regent. Nor were their efforts unsuccessful. Mainly through their instrumentality, a personal conference was brought about between the regent and the duke, at Glasgow; and it was arranged that the duke should submit to the king's authority, and that he and his friends should be restored to their honours and possessions.*

With all the regent's good-will to the Church, and honest endeavours to promote her welfare, the state of the country was so unsettled, that everywhere advantage was taken of the ministers, and occasion was given for loud complaints against the encroachments of cupidity. Benefices were sold and let on long tacks and leases, to the prejudice of the ministers; and the collectors appointed by the Church to uplift her portion of revenues were forcibly displaced, and others put into their room, who were actuated by totally different feelings and interests. Petitions were presented at this time to the regent against such proceedings; and it was craved that an efficient remedy should be applied to these claimant evils, not only for the sake of the Church, which was suffering much damage, but also on account of that portion of the ecclesiastical revenues which accrued to the public exchequer. It was also urged, as an arrangement which it was indispensable to adopt, that those who had many benefices should be obliged to relinquish all of them but one. Leave too was asked from his grace and the secret council to proceed from admonitions to more weighty censures against the Earl of Huntley, for his grievous and tyrannical oppression of the Church. The subject of settling the limits of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction was again urged upon the consideration of the government; and they were also reminded in strong terms of the duty of visiting with punishment odious crimes, which provoked God's displeasure against the whole land. There is one point embraced in the petition of the assembly to the regent which shows how defective their views still were of religious liberty, and how much they were in the habit of intermingling civil and sacred things. They craved that order should be taken for the punishment of those who were already excommunicated, and who despised the censures of the Church.†

A fast was appointed to be observed throughout the whole country, and the terms of the appointment suggest how slow the transmission of intelligence was in those times. It was to continue for eight days, and to commence on the 13th of March, in all places to which notice of the appointment might come before that time. In all other places it was to begin at such times as the superintendents, after becoming aware of the assembly's enactment, might think proper to appoint. The same order of worship and service were to be followed as in the case of the first fast; and all were to observe sobriety in eating and drinking during the continuance of the prescribed period.*

While the regent was in the northern counties, engaged in investigating and punishing the excesses which had been committed during his absence in England, the state of the College of Aberdeen was brought under his notice, and the principal and some of the regents were charged with holding popish sentiments. They were therefore summoned before the council, and their subscription to the following paper was demanded:—"We whose names are underwritten do ratify and approve from our very hearts the Confession of Faith, together with all other acts concerning our religion, given forth in the parliaments holden at Edinburgh on the 24th August, 1560, and the 15th December, 1567; and join ourselves as members to the true Kirk of Christ, whose visible face is described in the said acts; and shall in time coming be participant of the sacraments now most faithfully and publicly ministered in the said Kirk, and submit ourselves to the jurisdiction and discipline thereof."† (On their refusal to affix their names to this document, they were deprived of all the honours, dignities, and functions which they had enjoyed within the college; and they were even forbidden to engage in the instruction of the young in any part of the realm of Scotland. Steps were also taken against these same individuals by Erskine of Dun, superintendent of Angus and Mearns, in virtue of a commission received from the assembly to visit the sheriffdom of Aberdeen and Banff, and to bring the spiritual authority of the Church into operation against offenders. With advice, counsel, and consent of the ministers, elders, and commissioners of kirks in the district, sentence was pronounced against Alexander Anderson, principal; Andrew Galloway, sub-principal; and Andrew Anderson, Thomas Owsten, and Duncan Norie, regents,—excluding them from membership in the Church, depriving them of the office of teachers, and forbidding them to exercise this function either publicly or privately in the College of Aberdeen, or in any other quarter of the kingdom.‡

These proceedings of his grace the regent, and

* Supra, vol. ii. p. 27; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 304; Book of Universal Kirk, p. 110.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 491, 492.

‡ Ibid., vol. ii. p. 492.

* Spottiswood, pp. 228, 229; supra, vol. ii. p. 103.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 485.

Proceedings
against the office-bearers of the College of Aberdeen.

of the superintendent of Angus and Mearns, were

Character of highly approved by the General Assembly of the Church, which met in Aberdeen. in Edinburgh in July,—as being calculated to maintain and extend the dominion of Protestant principles, and to undermine the influence of popery in the land. And although it may be easy to show that they are not in all points consistent with the views of civil and religious liberty now universally prevalent among Protestants, yet when we consider the temper of the times, the dangers which threatened the newly-established Church, the unscrupulous character of its enemies, and the persecution which they themselves everywhere practised when they had the power, we cannot think it strange that measures of undue severity should have been adopted against them. The exclusion, indeed, of papists from the office of teachers in Protestant colleges and schools was a very fair and legitimate course, not merely allowable, but imperatively demanded by every principle of reason and religion. But to debar them from the privilege of teaching anywhere, whether publicly or privately,—although quite consistent with the principles which they themselves applied to others, and therefore in one sense fair, as being measure for measure,—was nevertheless a breach of that great principle of religious liberty to which all parties, except the Romanists, have now given their hearty adhesion.

The mutual confidence subsisting between his grace the regent and the Church, is apparent from a communication which he sent to the assembly, excusing his absence from the meeting as unavoidable, and bringing under their notice the necessities of the king's government. He reminds them that he himself had been most willing to put the Church in full possession of her patrimony, and with this view had proposed to make a dissolution of the prelaties; but that he had found some difficulty in obtaining the consent of the Estates to the assignation even of the thirds of benefices to the ministry. And he appeals to themselves as quite aware that since that time he had done everything for the support of religion, which the civil troubles afflicting the country had rendered at all practicable. "One thing we must call to remembrance, that when we travelled in parliament to cause the Estates to decern the thirds to pertain to the ministry, they opposed themselves to us; alleging that with the sustentation of the ministry there was also regard to be had to the support of the prince in sustaining of the public charges, otherwise they would be burdened with exactions. And so this dangerous argument compelled us to promise to the Estates that we would take upon us, if the act were granted to the Kirk, that they would agree to anything judged reasonable for supporting the public charges of the prince. And, accordingly, the commissioners of the Church agreed to certain assignations out of the thirds for support of the king. And this would have been sufficient, if civil trouble had not occurred. Which now moveth us to write to you in this form, praying you rightly to consider the necessity of the case; that the Kirk will be very ill obeyed without the king's authority; that now the property of the crown is not able to sustain the ordinary charges; that in the beginning the thirds would not have been granted but for the necessities of the prince; and that when the late arrangement was made, the Estates scrupled to declare the thirds to pertain to the ministry, until we became surety that the Kirk would again condescend upon so much, as might be sufficient for the support of public affairs."*

Mr. John Wood, the bearer of the regent's letter to the assembly, was also instructed by his grace to propose that a sufficient sum should be taken from the whole thirds now in the hands of the Church, and granted for certain years to the lord regent, in order to defray the public charges of the government. To this proposal the assembly at once agreed, declaring that in consideration of his grace's necessity in regard to the public charges, they consent that the whole sums of silver and money craved by his grace be granted and promptly rendered by the collectors. And the several sums of victuals and money were to be assigned upon such benefices and thirds as were at once most convenient for the Kirk, and most suitable to the regent; and it was to be understood that the regent should not solicit the Kirk to alienate any further portion of her rents, nor lay upon her thirds the burthen of any other pension.†

A convention of the states of the realm having been appointed by the regent to take place at Perth on 26th July, to consider the proposals of Elizabeth‡ with regard to the unfortunate Mary, whom she was neither willing to set at liberty nor found it safe to detain in captivity, the General Assembly appointed commissioners to attend this meeting, and to carry to the regent their answer to his letter, as also to bring certain other matters under his consideration. Renewed attention was drawn to the necessity of definitely fixing the boundaries between the ecclesiastical and the civil jurisdiction. It was proposed that measures should be adopted for the support of the poor, and particularly that some portion of the tithes should be appropriated to this important object. The propriety of appointing superintendents throughout the whole realm was urged upon the regent; and it was craved that persons possessing a plurality of benefices should be obliged to relinquish all of them save one. Protection was also sought against the arts and contrivances by which many continued to defraud the Church of the revenues assigned to her by law. Two other Concurrence of the assembly in the regent's proposal.

Commissioners sent by the assembly to the meeting of the Estates at Perth.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 499, 500; Book of the Universal Kirk, pp. 113, 114.

† Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 502, 503.

‡ Supra, vol. ii. p. 107; Spottiswood, p. 231.

points were embraced in the instructions of the commissioners. It was considered a most desirable and proper arrangement that all superintendents, ministers, exhorters, and readers, should have particular assignations of funds for their support, made to them from sources within their own bounds. And then, with the view of facilitating this arrangement, it was requested that the regent and his council would use their authority to have the thirds of benefices so separated and divided from the other two parts, that the Kirk might as easily intrmit by her own portion, as the other proprietors did with what was recognised as belonging to them.*

All these propositions received a very favourable consideration from the regent, and courteous answers were returned to the commissioners of the assembly.† The civil affairs of the country, however, were in too perplexed a condition, and the minds of men were too deeply engrossed with the propositions of Elizabeth and the dangers which threatened the country from the partisans of Mary, to allow that attention to be given to ecclesiastical concerns which the Church considered necessary. Hardly anything could be done at the present moment. Still, it was gratifying to the ministers to know that the leading men connected with the government were disposed to co-operate with them in placing ecclesiastical affairs upon a satisfactory and permanent basis. And thus they had good grounds for cherishing the hope that, so soon as existing difficulties were somewhat smoothed, the cause which they prized above everything else would receive its full share of attention from the rulers of the country.

These hopes of the ministers and adherents of the Reformed faith were destined to receive a sudden and sore disappointment. They were dashed to the ground by the same stroke which laid the regent in the dust. ‡ There were no warmer friends in the country of the king's authority, and of the administration of Moray, than the ministers of the Protestant Church. And when the career of this powerful nobleman was terminated by the hand of an assassin, they felt that the blow had struck themselves and the cause which was dearest to their hearts. Moray was justly considered as one of the pillars of the Reformed Church, and to him the ministers had learned to look with confidence and hope. Nor is there any just ground to question that he was sincerely and conscientiously attached to the Protestant faith. That he was a man of vast ambition is undeniable, that in seeking the gratification of his love of power he was not unfrequently drawn into tortuous courses, must be admitted; but that his profession of religion was assumed and maintained merely in subserviency to his political views, is a supposition contradicted by the whole tenour of his life. It is forgotten by those who entertain this idea, that he adhered faithfully to the same religious principles from the commencement to the close of his career; and that he did so although there were seasons when the avowal of the opposite principles would have opened up to him a far more likely prospect of worldly greatness and honour—as at the period of his return from France, in 1561, when strenuous efforts were made by Mary and by the Cardinal of Lorraine to detach him from his religious views, and when very weighty inducements were presented to him for this purpose.* When individuals change their religious principles once and again, and by this means secure for themselves an augmentation of worldly prosperity, there may be ground for suspecting their sincerity, or, at least, for supposing that worldly considerations have created a greater influence over them than they were well aware of themselves. But when any change they have made has either run counter to their worldly interests, or when they have refused to change in spite of great inducements held out to them, it is quite unreasonable to question their sincerity, merely because the principles they have clung to may have extended their influence in another quarter. And besides the power which accrued to Moray from his consistent adherence to Protestant principles, he was a man possessed of uncommon natural abilities, which eminently fitted him for the position of a ruler. He was singularly qualified for conducting the affairs of government. Within little more than a year, he brought the country, which had been exceedingly disordered, into a state of comparative quietness; and he enforced universal submission to the authority of the king. His whole course of procedure, both in the administration of justice and in the regulation of his own private conduct, was such as to procure for him, from the spontaneous voice of the nation, one of the most honourable of titles, viz., that of “the Good Regent,” by which he was long remembered among the people of Scotland. His house was like a little sanctuary, where no profane or unseemly words were heard. The worship of God was regularly maintained in his family; and when the chapter was read after dinner or supper, it was his custom to propose questions in regard to it, and to engage in conversation respecting the truths of the Gospel with learned men, of whom there were usually some at his table.† He was of a liberal disposition, and freely bestowed favours upon his friends. He was very affable to his domestics, and yet rebuked them very sharply when they were guilty of any improprieties.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 493.

† Ibid., p. 496.

‡ Supra, vol. ii. p. 114. Since the account of the regent's murder was written, I have discovered that the story, so often retailed by modern writers, of the cruelty alleged to have been shown to the assassin's wife is unworthy of credit, as it rests solely on the authority of “Crawford's Memoirs,” a book which has been proved to be a tissue of fabrications from beginning to end.—(See Appendix F.)

* Supra, vol. ii. p. 2.

† Spottiswood, p. 233; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 511; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 308.

The death of the regent occasioned the utmost sorrow and consternation amongst all the adherents of the Reformed Church. Knox felt that he was robbed of a dear friend, that the country was deprived of a wise and prudent governor, and that the Reformed cause had lost one of its most powerful and faithful adherents. The estimation in which he held the regent is apparent not only from the discourse which he preached on the occasion of his funeral, on the text, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord,"* but also from the form of prayer which he used at the conclusion of the service:—"In our extreme miseries we called, and thou in the multitude of thy mercies heard us. O Lord, in what misery and confusion found he this realm, and to what rest and quietness now by his labours suddenly he brought the same, all estates, but especially the poor commons, can witness. Thy image, O Lord, did so clearly shine in that personage that the devil, and the people to whom he is prince, could not abide it. And so to punish our sins and ingratitude, who did not rightly esteem so precious a gift, thou hast permitted him to fall, to our great grief, into the hands of cruel and traitorous murderers. He is at rest, O Lord, and we are left in extreme misery: be merciful to us, and suffer not Satan utterly to prevail against thy little flock within this realm: neither yet, O Lord, let blood-thirsty men attain the end of their wicked enterprises. Preserve, O Lord, our young king: although he be an infant, give unto him the spirit of sanctification with increase of the same as he groweth in years. Let his reign be such that thou mayst be glorified, and thy little flock comforted by it. Seeing we are now left as a flock without a pastor in civil policy, and as a ship without a rudder in the midst of a storm, let thy providence watch, Lord, and defend us in these dangerous days, that the wicked of the world may see, that as well without the help of man as with it, thou art able to rule, maintain, and defend the little flock that dependeth upon thee. And because, O Lord, the shedding of innocent blood hath ever been, and yet is odious in thy presence, yea, defileth the whole land where it is shed and not punished, we crave of thee, for Christ's sake, that thou wilt so try and punish the two treasonable murders lately committed, that the devisers and authors of them may be either thoroughly converted or confounded. Lord, let the world know that thou art a God that can deprehend the wise in their own wisdom, and the proud in the imagination of their wicked hearts. Lord, retain us that call upon thee in thy true fear. Give us strength to fight our battle, yea, to fight it lawfully, and to end our lives in the sanctification of thy holy name."*

* Diurnal of Occurrents, p. 158; Letter of Randolph to Cecil, 22nd February, 1569.

* Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 514; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 173. Spottiswood mentions rather a strange fact in connection with the regent's assassination. He died on Saturday evening, and intelligence of the event reached Edinburgh before next morning. An individual, afterwards known to be Thomas Maitland, a younger brother of Lethington, contrived to place in the pulpit where Knox was to preach a paper with these words written upon it: "Take up the man whom you accounted another God, and consider the end whereto his ambition has brought him." Knox proceeded with his discourse as if nothing unusual had occurred; but, towards the close of it, he took occasion to advert to the loss which the Church and commonwealth had sustained in the death of the regent, and showed how God often took away good rulers on account of the sins of the people. "I perceive," added he, "although this be an event we should all take to heart, there be some that rejoice in this wicked fact, making it the subject of their mirth; amongst whom there is one that hath caused a writing to be cast in this place, insulting upon that which is all good men's sorrow. This wicked man, whoever he be, shall not go unpunished: he shall die where none shall be to lament him." And shortly afterwards, when the troubles of the country increased, Maitland betook himself to travel, and passing through Italy, died there with no friend to wait upon him. Spottiswood mentions that he ascertained all the circumstances from Maitland's own sister.—(Spottiswood, p. 234; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 264; Mackenzie's Lives of Scottish Writers, vol. iii. p. 195.)

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

A.D. 1570—1585.

VERY great commotions ensued after the death of Commotions consequent upon Moray's assassination.

the regent, which distracted the country for a long period. The adherents of Mary, animated by the hope of being able to replace her upon the throne, flew to arms, succeeded in gaining possession of Edinburgh, and publicly proclaimed the queen's authority in the metropolis. On the other hand, the late regent's party, who were all favourable to the authority of the young king, were determined to maintain the existing order of things. And Elizabeth, whilst professing to interpose her good offices for the pacification of the Scottish realm, in reality did everything in her power to fan the flame of discord. With that duplicity which was so prominent a feature of her character, she pretended to aim at the reconciliation of the different parties into which the country was divided; but, secretly, she took measures to stir up animosities and jealousies between them, with the view of more effectually bringing them all under her power. The negotiations into which she entered for the restoration of the captive queen to her throne, although conducted with much form, were never intended to be anything but a fruitless illusion, most tantalising to her unfortunate victim, but quite of a piece with the tortuous policy in which the English queen delighted. She had no wish, it is true, that the supporters of the infant king's authority should be driven from the helm of affairs; but it was her desire that they should barely be enabled to maintain their position of superiority, and thus always feel themselves dependent upon her favour, and be obliged to act in subservience to her wishes.

It is impossible to trace the proceedings of this period, and of the years that follow, without feeling the deepest sympathy for Mary, who was so long the victim of the cruel and deceitful machinations of her English kinswoman. The longer her captivity continues, the mind retains less and less impression of the great and glaring faults which led to her dethronement; and we are persuaded that but for the sufferings of the later period of her life, far more unanimity would have prevailed in regard to the propriety and necessity of the step, by which the authority of her infant son was established in the room of her own. Many who have been guilty of scandalous offences and crimes have owed it to distresses and persecutions afterwards assailing them, that they have been saved from the world's stern condemnation, under which they must have otherwise inevitably sunk.

The fierce struggle that was now carried on between the contending parties in Scotland, was productive of extreme distress and suffering to all classes of the community. It seemed as if the bonds of society were about to be utterly dissolved. The minds of men were filled with the most deadly rancour towards one another; and "king's men" and "queen's men" everywhere contended for the triumph of their respective parties.*

Sufferings consequent upon the anarchy that prevailed.

In the meeting of the General Assembly which was held in March, a few weeks after the regent's assassination, the deep sorrow and regret which were felt by all the members of the Re-

Proceedings of the General Assembly in March.

formed Church, on account of that mournful event, and the detestation with which the crime was regarded, were very apparent. It was ordained that sentence of excommunication should be pronounced against the murderer in all the principal towns of the kingdom, and in all parish kirks where proper order prevailed. All other persons, too, who might yet be convicted of being accessory to the nefarious deed, or of concurring in it, were to be proceeded against in a similar manner.† In the same meeting the regulation was first adopted, which has continued to exist to the present day, that the moderator of one assembly should open the following one with prayer and discourse, and that immediately thereafter the new moderator should be chosen. It would appear that some ministers, discouraged by the difficulties with which they found themselves encompassed, had forsaken the pulpit, and betaken themselves to other employments, particularly to that of pleading causes before the lords of session. With the view of preventing such desertion of the work of the ministry, it was agreed that henceforward there should in all cases be a more formal and public admission to the sacred office, so that ministers might feel themselves solemnly pledged to continue in their vocation.‡ A charge had been brought against the Bishop of Orkney, of having made a simoniacal exchange of his bishopric in the north for the Abbey of Holyrood;§ and also of having to a great extent abandoned the practice of preaching the Word; of having allowed the churches within his diocese to fall into decay, so that some of them had been converted into sheepfolds;|| and of continuing to designate himself by his former Episcopal titles, such as "Reverend Father in God," which were not at all suitable to the ministers of Christ. His answers to the different accusations preferred against him were presented to this meeting, and Messrs. Knox, John Craig, and David Lindsay, were appointed to consider the sufficiency of his defence, and to report their

* Supra, vol. ii. p. 129.

† Spottiswood, p. 235; Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 541;

M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 177.

‡ Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 120.

§ Calderwood, vol. ii. pp. 530—534.

|| Churches being sheepfolds in a figurative sense, perhaps the bishop imagined that, as he was not using them in that way, the least culpable diversion of them from their proper purpose was to make them sheepfolds literally: they would thus be the channels of a kind of parabolic instruction in their respective parishes.

views to the next meeting of assembly. Sundry individuals were brought under discipline for homicide, adultery, and incest; and it was decreed that they should appear at their own kirks, bareheaded and barefooted, on three several preaching days, and should afterwards be admitted into the body of the congregation in their own clothes; their offences were also to be publicly declared by the officiating ministers, that the civil magistrate might know their crimes, and thus not be able to excuse their impunity by pretending ignorance. From this it appears that neither, on the one hand, did the assembly consider their censures as at all interfering with the punishment which it was the magistrate's province to inflict; nor, on the other, did they view the magistrate's proceedings as rendering their spiritual censures in any degree less necessary. Occasionally, some of the ministers manifested more zeal than discretion in administering the discipline of the Church amongst their flocks. A parishioner of Ochiltree had been debarred from the Lord's-table for removing a shoe from a horse's foot on a Sabbath afternoon; but the assembly ordained, when the case was brought before them by appeal, that he should be re-admitted to all the ordinances and privileges of the house of God.* The degrees of relationship within which marriage might take place formed a frequent subject of reference to the assembly; and their decisions show that while certain principles were considered as fixed and unalterable, they were by no means disposed to allow restrictions to be multiplied unnecessarily. In the very first meeting of the General Assembly that was held—in the year 1560—it had been declared that the restrictions imposed by the Pope upon marriage (extending as far as the fourth degrees of affinity and consanguinity) should all be disregarded in Scotland, and that those restrictions only which had their foundation in the Word of God should continue in force.† And it was now decided, in a case where two men had married two sisters, that although neither of the men could ever afterwards marry the other sister, yet there was nothing to prevent either of them from marrying the daughter of the other man by another woman.‡ So groundless is the assertion, frequently made, that the existing restrictions upon marriage in this country are popish in their origin, and have been borrowed without inquiry from the canon law of the Church of Rome.

While the country was divided into two hostile parties, some adhering to the existing order of things, and others attempting to restore the queen's authority, the Church was most decided and cordial in upholding the government of the young king. At the meeting of the General Assembly held in July, all other authority was repudiated, and ministers were enjoined to pray publicly after their sermons for the preservation of his majesty's person and authority, under pain of exposing themselves to the censures of the Church. And it was declared that if any subjects of the realm, whatever might be their rank, should presume to forbid any minister from obeying this ordinance of the General Assembly, or should throw any impediments in his way, such troublers of the public peace should be excommunicated as rotten members, unworthy of the society of Christ's body; and all superintendents and commissioners of provinces were commanded to take measures for ensuring the publication of this decree in all parish churches. It was also ordained that certain brethren should be sent as deputies from the assembly to such earls, lords, barons, and other gentlemen as were opposed to the king's government, with instructions to use all possible means and arguments for bringing them back to their allegiance; and to assure them that in case of disobedience, the Church would use against them that spiritual sword which God had put into her hands. Mr. Andrew Hay and Mr. David Lindsay were commissioned to wait for this purpose upon the Duke of Chatelherault, the Earls of Argyll, Eglington, Cassillis, Lord Boyd, and other barons and gentlemen in the western parts; and the Laird of Dun, Superintendent of Angus and Mearns, was sent with the same view to the Earl of Crawford, Lord Ogilvie, and their accomplices in Angus.*

The practice of deserting the office of the ministry, formerly under the consideration of the assembly, seems to have continued; for, in addition to the measures already adopted with the view of checking this evil, it was enacted that every minister should be required to protest solemnly, at the time of his inauguration, that he would never at any time forsake the sacred vocation on which he had entered, under pain of infamy and perjury. Ministers already placed were also required to make the like protestation in their synodal conventions, and the same was to be inserted in the records—"ad futuram rei memoriam." The Reformed Church was always distinguished for the deep and engrossing interest which it took in the spiritual well-being of the community, and the ministers scrupled at no self-denial which was considered needful to advance these high objects. Young and old shared their attention. It was their continual demand, which they urged with unwearied earnestness upon the government, that schools should be instituted and maintained in all parts of the country. And at this time it was enacted that, in every parish, ministers and elders should examine all children on three several occasions; viz., at the ages of nine, twelve, and fourteen, with the view of ascertaining what progress they were making, under their parents and instructors, in the knowledge of Christian doctrine.†

Measures for promoting the steadfastness of ministers;

—and the education of the young.

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 118. † Ibid., p. 3.
‡ Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 542.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 3; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 121; Spottiswood, p. 242.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 2; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 121.

Before the assembly broke up, a commission was appointed, consisting of Erskine of Dun, Winram, Spottiswood, Macgill of Rankelior, Knox, Craig, Lindsay, the Lairds of Balvaird, Spott, Braid, Carnail, Dreghorn, Lundie, Houston, Drumwhassel, Coldenknowes, Carden, Fawdenses, Thornton, Inelbrackie, with authority to meet in Edinburgh, as often as the nobility should convene before next assembly, and to present to them certain articles, supplications, and complaints; as also to co-operate with them in whatever might be proposed for setting forward the glory of God, maintaining the pure Gospel of Christ within the country, and upholding the authority of his majesty the king.

Already one of the most active supporters of the Reformed Church had committed a most flagrant sin, and had thus brought a stigma upon the office of the ministry, and the cause of religion.* Another case, of a still more aggravated character, occurred during this autumn, which was eagerly laid hold of by the enemies of the Reformation, and employed to derogate from the credit and influence of the Reformed ministers. Mr. John Kello, minister of Spott, was guilty of the horrid crime of murdering his own wife. After the perpetration of the deed he might have escaped, for no suspicion alighted upon him; but the sufferings which he endured in his own conscience, and the sorrow he felt for the dishonour which he had brought upon religion, were such that he determined, in proof of the sincerity of his repentance, to confess his crime, and to surrender himself to the hands of justice. In the written memorial which he prepared before his execution, the inward struggles of conscience by which his soul was agonised, and by which he was compelled to make known his guilt, are touchingly detailed. "I discoursed with myself whether to abandon this country or to remain. If I left the country, and thus accepted the deed, I should live in perpetual terror, and besides bring a perpetual infamy on the Kirk of God. Then I thought to conceal the fact from the world, supposing it sufficient to acknowledge my offence before God. But, at last, I said to myself, What if I be presented before a judge, where confession of the truth shall be required? Shall I not only live in murder, but heap sin upon sin, and confirm my damnation with perjury? Shall the love of this wretched life so shut the doors of my heart, that I shall never return unfeignedly to my God? Shall I, miserable creature! leave an everlasting slander upon the Kirk of God, for which Christ, the son of God, gave his life? And so did I conclude to make public confession of my offence, and to present myself to receive punishment. And whereas before I was troubled and distressed, both in mind and body, I have since enjoyed quietness of conscience and bodily strength."†

Kello's crime, repentance, and punishment.

* Supra, vol. ii. p. 13.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 18; Bannatyne's Journal, VOL. II.

A meeting of the General Assembly was held at Edinburgh on 5th March. It was the wish of the regent, the Earl of Lennox, that the meeting should be transferred to Stirling or Glasgow; but there were various impediments which prevented the assembly from acceding to this request, although it was agreed that the next meeting should be held in Stirling. Several articles relating to the jurisdiction of the Church were adopted, with the view of being proposed to the regent and his council for their sanction; viz., that in addition to the preaching of the Word, and the administration of the sacraments, the Kirk should be recognised as vested with the right of judging between true and false doctrine; of electing, examining, and admitting persons to the office of the ministry, or suspending and depriving them for lawful causes; of admonishing for the correction of manners, excommunicating, and receiving to repentance; of judging in ecclesiastical matters between persons belonging to the Kirk, especially those invested with the office of the ministry; of proceeding from admonition to the process of excommunication, where necessary, against those who rob the church of her patrimony; and, finally, of deciding in cases of divorce. A large number of individuals, superintendents, ministers, and gentlemen, were appointed to bring these points under the notice of the regent and his council at Stirling, or wherever he might be pleased to appoint. Hitherto many subjects had been introduced at once before the General Assembly, without having engaged the attention of the inferior courts at all. It was now ordained that all questions should be first considered by superintendents and commissioners in their synodal conventions, and that only those which were found too hard for them should be transmitted to the supreme court for settlement. On the same grounds, too, it was decided that henceforward questions should not be admitted into the General Assembly at the suggestion of individual ministers. Evils had been found to spring from the solemnization of marriages in private houses, and therefore it was appointed that every marriage should be celebrated in the face of a congregation, and that too by the minister of the place to which the parties belonged; or, if anything hindered him from being present, or the marriage took place at a distance, that his testimonial and permission should in the first instance be procured.* It was also decided that the commission of fornication with one sister constituted a perpetual barrier to marriage with another; it being intercourse, whether in marriage or out of marriage, which is forbidden in Leviticus with persons standing in certain relationships to one another.

Kirkaldy of Grange, Governor of the Castle of p. 39—50; Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. i., part ii., p. 14. He was first hanged, and then his body was burned to ashes. His goods were also declared forfeited to the crown, but they were afterwards restored to his children.

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 125; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 35—41.

Edinburgh, being a zealous partisan of the queen, the opponents of the existing government were nowhere more bold or sanguine than in the metropolis. There had also been a personal quarrel between Kirkaldy and Knox; the Reformer having

Feelings entertained against Knox by the queen's party in Edinburgh.

strongly condemned the governor for rescuing by force an individual who had been imprisoned by the magistrates on a charge of murder.

Very bitter feelings were in consequence cherished at this time by many in Edinburgh against Knox; and on the third day of the meeting of the General Assembly, a placard was dropped from the Upper Council-house, where the lords were sitting, into the Nether Council-house, where the assembly were met, reflecting very severely upon the character of the Reformer. A similar placard was also affixed during the night to the door of the Assembly-house, in which it was alleged that, on the preceding Sunday, "he had charges thrown out against the Reformer.

Anonymous

openly in the kirk of Edinburgh railed most seditiously against our sovereign lady, the nobility, and other subjects professing obedience to her grace; calling her an idolatress, a murderer, an adulteress, with other injurious and slanderous words, as is notoriously known to this whole burgh. Attour, whereas in duty he should not only have prayed for her, but exhorted the whole Kirk to pray for her welfare, repentance, and conversion to God; not only doth he omit the same, but he useth all manner of imprecations against her, and speaketh of her as if she were reprobate, and neither repented nor could repent; thus entering into the secret counsel of God, as though he were privy thereto. By which conduct he maketh the religion of Jesus Christ to be evil spoken of, and the whole ministry to be hated and abhorred; and by intermingling civil and profane matter with the word of God, he divideth the Church into contrarious factions. Wherefore we beseech your wisdoms to put order to the said John, that he desist from such intolerable railing against our sovereign lady, and such meddling with matters above his commission.* This placard was sent by the assembly to the lords of session in the Upper Council-house, with the view of ascertaining whether they knew who had written it; but all of them, as well as the advocates, utterly denied having any acquaintance with its origin. The assembly therefore issued a notice, inviting the writers of the placards, or any persons, to appear and make good the charges against Knox, at the same time promising them all justice. No one appeared; but another placard of a similar character was secretly affixed to the door of the church, calling upon the assembly to consider the charges, and declaring that "the in-givers of the supplications expected them to be, as well an admonition to the criminal, as to the assembly itself. Yet if he, upon his corrupt sense and perverse affection, persist in his arrogant malice, he shall not want one or more accusers at the next assembly, provided he be then law-biding, and not fugitive, according to his accustomed manner."*

This concluding sentence contained a notoriously false insinuation. Knox never shrank from any difficulty. He was always ready to meet his accusers, and he gave them every opportunity of assailing him; and, in this very instance, it was not he that was shunning the accuser, but the accuser who was afraid to meet him. He was advised by some of his friends to pay no farther attention to the anonymous charges levelled against him, but this he positively refused; and on the following Sabbath-day, the assembly being now closed, at the end of his discourse he entered boldly upon his defence. "That I have called her an obstinate idolatress, one that consented to the murder of her own husband, and one that hath committed adultery, I willingly grant and never mind to deny. But railing and sedition they are not able to prove against me, unless they first oblige Isaiah, and Jeremiah, and Ezekiel to recant, from whom I have learned plainly and boldly to call wickedness by its own names—a fig, a fig; a spade, a spade." And as to the charge that he had not prayed for the queen, he answered that he was not bound to pray for her in the pulpit, because he did not recognise her as his sovereign.† "And I let them understand that I am not a man of law, that has my tongue to sell for silver or the favour of the world." The accusation of entering proudly and arrogantly into God's secret counsel, Knox met in a very feeling manner. "If they understood how fearful my conscience is, and ever hath been, to exceed the bounds of my commission, they would not have so boldly accused me." And then he showed that what he had spoken against adulterers, and murderers, and idolaters, was not uttered by him as one who entered into God's secret counsel, but as one who denounced the threatenings of the divine law against those who daringly violated its precepts. And with regard to the allegation of his accusers, anonymous though it was, affording sufficient reasons for proceeding against him, he showed that even a heathen judge had refused to act in this manner towards Paul, on the ground that it was not the custom of the Romans to try any man until his accusers stood face to face before him. And as to the insinuation that he might be "fugitive" before another assembly came round, he simply remarked that his days and ways were in the hand of God, who had brought him to an age at which he was not apt to flee far; and that, moreover, no man could prove that he had ever fled from his flock, excepting at their own command.‡

* Bannatyne's Journal, p. 104.

† It would almost surpass belief, were it not an undeniable fact, that on the ground of this defence, Knox and the Reformers have been charged with maintaining the principle "that to pray for or forgive our real or reputed enemies, is no part of a Christian's duty.—(Crawford's Memoirs of Scotland, p. 186; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 185.)

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 43, 44; Bannatyne's Journal, pp. 100—102; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 184.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 50; Bannatyne's Journal, p. 114; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 185.

Another anonymous placard was affixed to the door of the church before the following Sabbath, charging Knox with inconsistency, in having written a work against the government of females, and yet praying for queen Elizabeth, and seeking her help against the liberties of his native country. These accusations also the Reformer met in the pulpit, and refuted with his usual eloquence and power. "The crafty accuser thinketh that no force of reason is able to break his argument. Yet my good hope is, that the hammer of God's truth shall prove it to be more fragile and weak than ever glass was. Neither doth the prayer of God's servants for the maintenance of commonwealths, where the people of God remain, prove that God's servants allow all things done in those commonwealths; neither yet doth the seeking of help even from the wicked prove that the godly justify the wicked. Some of God's prophets comforted the kings of Israel, although they were wicked, and some forewarned them of dangers. But did any of these acts prove that the prophets approved that kingdom of idolatry, and their defection from the house of Judah? Jeremiah prayed for the prosperity and health of Nebuchadnezzar. Did he therefore justify his cruelty against Jerusalem? His own prophecy beareth witness that he did not. And so my praying for the Queen of England cannot prove that I do anything contrary to the truth contained in that book. The like answer I give to the second member of his proof. Even were it shown that I seek and procure her aid, yet would not this prove either that my doctrine is false, or that I am working against the truth. David, when pursued by Saul, sought support and refuge of Achish, King of Gath. Did he therefore justify all the enormities that were practised in Palestine? But one thing in the end I may not premit, and that is to give him the lie in his throat that either dare or will say that ever I sought support against my native country. What I have been to my country, albeit this unthankful age will not know, yet the ages to come will be compelled to bear witness to the truth. And thus I cease, requiring of every man who has anything to oppose against me, to do it so plainly, that I may make myself and all my doings manifest to the world. For to me it seemeth a thing unreasonable that in this my decrepit age I should be compelled to fight against shadows, and owlets that dare not abide the light.*"

The boldness of the Reformer, coupled with his unanswerable logic, excited against him the most deadly malignity. His personal safety was threatened, and, on one occasion, a gun was fired through his window towards the spot where he usually sat, but, providentially, he was in a different part of the room at the time. Alarmed by this base attempt upon his life, his friends presented an urgent request to him to remove from Edinburgh for a season; but with that disregard of personal danger which was ever a prominent feature of his character, he turned a deaf ear to all their entreaties; until at length they assured him that, if he were attacked, they were determined to stand up in his defence; and then, if any blood were shed, the fault would be his. This argument prevailed; and on the 5th May the venerable Reformer, now enfeebled by age, set out for St. Andrew's, the scene of his early conflicts and labours.*

Here Knox lived secure from anything like an assault upon his person, but he was exposed to very serious annoyances. With his usual boldness

Preaching of Knox in St.
Andrew's.

and eloquence he preached the Gospel; and, whilst expounding the 11th chapter of Daniel, he brought under review the dangers to which the Reformed faith was exposed in Scotland, exposed the machinations of its enemies, and denounced in no measured terms the assassination of the late regent. Although he was so infirm as not to be able to walk without assistance, yet in the pulpit he seemed to recover all his wonted energy and fire. James Melvil was a student in Andrew's at the time, and in his Diary he describes the appearance of Knox at this period, and the impression made by his preaching. "I heard him teach there the prophecies of Daniel that summer and the winter following. I had my pen and my little book, and took away such things as I could comprehend. In the opening up of his text he was moderate for the space of half an hour; but when he entered on the application, he made me so to grew † and tremble, that I could not hold my pen to write." He needed to be lifted up into the pulpit, and was obliged to rest for a little after entering it; but before he finished his discourse, he became so active and vigorous that it seemed as if he would "ding the pulpit into blads," ‡ and fly out of it. §

The topics upon which Knox insisted, and the zeal and boldness with which he expressed his sentiments, were highly displeasing to those who favoured the queen's party in St. Andrew's, particularly to Robert and Archibald Hamilton, the one a minister and the other a professor. Rumours prejudicial to the character of the Reformer were put into circulation, which he at once set himself to trace to their authors, and which he proved to be altogether groundless. The subject was brought under the cognizance of the masters of the university, before whom Knox appeared, that he might give an account of his proceedings for their satisfaction; although he protested that, by so doing, he did not at all mean to invalidate the liberty of the pulpit, or the authority of the regular church courts, to which alone he considered himself responsible. ||

* Bannatyne's Journal, pp. 140, 144; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 188; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 242.

† Thrill or shudder.

‡ Beat the pulpit in pieces.

§ James Melvil's Diary, pp. 26, 33.

|| Smetoni responsio ad Hamiltonii Dialogum, p. 90; Bannatyne's Journal, pp. 364, 384.

* Bannatyne's Journal, p. 119.

Knox constrained by his friends to proceed to St. Andrew's.

At the commencement of the Reformation an arrangement had been made by which one-third of the ecclesiastical revenues of the kingdom was to be appropriated, under considerable deductions, to the support of the Reformed Church, whilst the remaining two-thirds were to continue in the hands of the former possessors. This arrangement was considered, from its nature, as being of a temporary character; and it was the view and expectation of the ministers of the Reformed Church that, from time to time, as the incumbents were removed by death, the revenues thus set free should be appropriated to the support of schools, colleges, and churches. But the nobility were by no means disposed to allow such an amount of property to be applied to any such purposes. They would have preferred annexing the best portions of the ecclesiastical benefices to their own estates; but as they could not take such a step without perpetrating too great an outrage upon the sentiments and feelings of the nation, they fell upon a plan which promised to answer the same purpose equally well. The patronage of bishoprics and other rich livings might be obtained by individual noblemen from the court, and then they might be presented to certain ministers, with a secret understanding that the chief portion of the revenues should be allowed to pass into the hands of the patrons themselves.*

The Earl of Morton was the first individual who carried this dishonourable expedient into practice. Hamilton, New Archbishop of St. Andrew's, having fallen into the hands of the captors of Dunbarton Castle in April, 1571, and been condemned to suffer on the gibbet, Morton immediately procured for himself the right of disposing of the archbishopric, and then nominated to that dignity John Douglas, Rector of the University of St. Andrew's. It was well enough understood that the earl himself, although not archbishop in name, yet had a far greater interest in the temporalities of the see than Douglas.†

Knox was not slow to perceive and denounce the nefarious character of this arrangement. He saw that it was calculated, not only to bring about an extensive dilapidation of ecclesiastical revenues, but also to introduce the grossest corruption of manners among the ministers of the Church, by making simony universal. Age and infirmity now prevented him from attending to take part in the business of the General Assembly; but he sent a letter to the meeting at Stirling, in August, warning his brethren of the dangers which he saw approaching, and urging them to be faithful in keeping out unworthy men from the ministry. "If ability of body would have suffered, I should not have troubled you with this rude dytement. I exhort you that you take heed to yourselves, and to the flock over which God hath placed you as pastors. Unfaithful and traitors to the flock shall you be reputed before the Lord Jesus, if with your consent, directly or indirectly, you suffer unworthy men to be thrust into the ministry of the Kirk, under any pretence whatever. Remember the judge before whom you must give account, and resist that tyranny as you would avoid hell fire. This battle I grant will be hard, but in the second point it will be harder; that is, that with the like uprightness of heart and strength in God, you gainstand those merciless devourers of the patrimony of the Kirk. If men will spoil, let them do it to their own peril and condemnation. But communicate not ye with their sins, of what estate soever they be, either by consent or by silence. With public protestation make it known to the world that you are innocent of such robbery, which will ere long provoke God's judgment upon those who are guilty of it."*

At a meeting of parliament held this same month in Stirling, commissioners appointed by the General Assembly appeared to crave a redress of grievances. They petitioned that benefices should be bestowed only upon qualified persons; that manse and glebes should not be let in feu, but be assigned to ministers; and that flagrant crimes be visited with merited punishment. But no regard was paid to their just demands. They protested against the Rector of St. Andrew's being allowed to take his seat in parliament till he should be admitted to office by the church courts; but Morton commanded him to vote as Bishop of St. Andrew's, on pain of treason; and the nobility seemed quite determined to carry out the new plan of disposing of the richer benefices, that they themselves might enjoy the principal portion of the revenues accruing from them. They were frequently bestowed upon totally unqualified persons; earls and lords were made bishops, and even babes were promoted to benefices which required learned preachers. Pluralities were multiplied; and even the thirds, to which the title of the Protestant Church had all along been recognised, were intercepted to supply the necessities of the court.†

These proceedings excited deep dissatisfaction through the whole country. Even before the meeting of parliament, Knox in a letter to a friend declared that the nobility cared nothing for the instruction of the ignorant, if they could only get the church lands annexed to their own families. After parliament was over, John Row denounced the judgments of Complaints presented by commissioners of the assembly.

Dissatisfaction created through the country by these proceedings.

* Bannatyne's Journal, pp. 251, 283; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 197; Hetherington's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 41.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 156.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 133; Spottiswood, p. 257; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 129; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 200.

† Bannatyne's Journal, pp. 251, 253, 255; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 138; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 198; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 129.

God upon the noblemen and courtiers for their covetousness and disregard of the remonstrances of the Church. And a complaint was presented to the regent and his council, signed by a considerable number of gentlemen, barons, and other Protestants, which contains some singular and disgraceful disclosures. "Your grace, and the nobility fighting with you, against traitors we grant, go about to cut off from our posterity the fountain of living waters, the true and free preaching of the blessed Evangel of Jesus Christ. For while that earls and lords become bishops and abbots, gentlemen, courtiers' babes, and persons unable to guide themselves, are promoted by you to benefices which require learned preachers. When such enormities are fostered, what face of a Kirk shall we look for ere long within this realm? We, without boasting of ourselves, must speak the truth, which is that from the beginning of this action we have served without suit of other reward, than to have the poor Kirk of Christ set in freedom. Whereof perceiving ourselves to be utterly disappointed, we dare not promise service as heretofore we have done, for we are not ignorant of the mutual contract which God hath placed between the supreme power and the subjects."*

The regent having issued letters in St. Andrew's, Erskine's letter at the instance it was commonly to the regent. believed of the Earl of Morton, discharging the collectors of the Kirk from gathering the thirds, Erskine of Dun entered into a correspondence with him upon the subject, and prevailed upon him to recall these letters. In the document prepared by Erskine, the views entertained by the most intelligent and faithful members of the Church regarding the procedure of the court came very clearly out. The creation of bishops at the late parliament in Stirling is designated "that great disorder." The nobility are censured for having refused to listen to the complaints of the Church against so crying a grievance. The necessity of speedily redressing the wrong is warmly insisted upon. It is declared that the spoil which so many are making of the revenues of the Church shall bring plague and destruction upon their own heads. And with regard to bishops, their superiority to superintendents is altogether denied.†

With the view of allaying existing dissatisfaction, and devising some order of things which might meet the views of all parties, the regent and his council summoned together an extraordinary meeting of the superintendents and ministers at Leith, in January, 1572. At this convention, which it was urged should have all the powers of a General Assembly, six individuals were nominated to meet with six of the privy council, for the purpose of drawing out a scheme of church government. They did meet accordingly, and the conclusions which they adopted bear ample evidence of the influence which was exerted over them by the court; for although Erskine of Dun, whose sentiments were so clearly exhibited in the letter which he wrote to the regent, was one of their number, yet the proceedings assumed a highly prelatical colouring. It was arranged that, in consideration of present circumstances, the names and titles of archbishops and bishops should remain in use, at least, until the king's majority, and that the boundaries of the ancient episcopal dioceses should not be changed. Persons qualified according to the standard set up by Paul in his letters to Timothy and Titus, and at least thirty years of age, were to be appointed to these dignities; and a chapter or assembly of learned ministers was to be annexed to every metropolitan or cathedral seat. Archbishops and bishops were to exercise no other jurisdiction in spiritual matters than that which already belonged to the superintendents; and they were all to be equally subject to the General Assembly. Likewise, in admitting persons to any function in the Church, they were to follow the advice of at least six belonging to the chapter of their diocese, although as many of the chapter as chose might be present, and take as much part as they chose in the proceedings.*

The ordinary half-yearly meeting of the assembly was held at St. Andrew's in March. A committee was appointed to meet in John Knox's house for the purpose of considering the articles which had been prepared by the commissioners of the Church, and of his grace the regent, in January; but they do not seem to have been able to make up any report, for nothing is stated in the record of proceedings.† The probability is, that Knox recommended opposition to the new order of things which it was proposed to introduce, and that the committee appointed to confer with him neither had the courage to take up the strong ground which he advised, nor yet chose to run altogether in opposition to his wishes and views, and therefore did nothing at all. Certain it is, that in the preceding month, when the inauguration of the Bishop of St. Andrew's took place, Knox refused to take any part in the proceedings, although solicited to do so by the Earl of Morton. Nay, he even went the length of pronouncing an anathema upon both the giver and the receiver of the benefice; and when John Rutherford, Provost of the Old College, alleged that he was actuated by envy, he defended himself and repelled the charge in these striking words:—"I have refused a greater bishoprick than ever this was, which I might have had with the favour of greater men than he hath this.‡ I did, and do repine for discharge of my conscience, that

* Spottiswood, p. 260; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 172; Records of Privy Council, 16th January, 1571; Altare Damascenum, p. 727.

† Altare Damascenum, p. 728.

‡ Edward VI., with the concurrence of his privy council, offered Knox a bishopric, but he refused it.—(M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. i. p. 100.)

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 146; Bannatyne's Journal, p. 250.

† Calderwood vol. iii. pp. 159—161; Bannatyne's Journal, pp. 279—288.

the Kirk of Scotland be not subject to that order,* as the order appointed by the Book of Discipline had been long ago confirmed in parliament."

Although nothing was decided at this assembly in reference to the newly devised ecclesiastical arrangements, yet it was ordained that the superintendents should continue to exercise the same authority and jurisdiction as formerly. Winram, superintendent of Fife, had proposed, in consequence of the inauguration of an archbishop in St. Andrew's, to demit his office, but the brethren present would not receive his resignation. He was appointed to continue to discharge the functions of a superintendent as before, nor was he to be subject to the jurisdiction of the archbishop, although he might co-operate with him in his visitations, or in any other department of duty.†

The subject of the new arrangements proposed by the court for the government of the Church was again brought before the assembly, which met at Perth in August. These arrangements were acquiesced in by the meeting, although they were very far from being approved of. A protestation was unanimously adopted to the effect that as the titles of archbishop, dean, archdean, chancellor, chapter, were considered by many to be slanderous and offensive, and appeared to savour of popery, the assembly would prefer that these names were changed into others of a less offensive character. Where "archbishop" had been used before in connexion with any diocese, it was judged proper that the simple word "bishop" should now be employed; and it was suggested that in the room of "chapter," the phrase "bishop's assembly" might be substituted; and "moderator of the bishop's assembly," might be the designation used instead of "dean." And with regard to the whole scheme, it was unanimously declared that the assembly acquiesced in it merely as an interim measure, to remain in force till some more perfect order could be obtained from the regent and nobility. And they pledged themselves to make every effort in their power, in order to procure the establishment of some more suitable and scriptural form of church government. In what direction their efforts would be put forth to effect modifications on the existing system, the objections already made in the assembly, as well as the known opinions of the leading men, sufficiently indicate.‡

Such was the origin of that modified species of episcopacy which was introduced into Scotland during the minority of James VI. It was a contrivance of the nobility, not grounded on any enlightened scriptural conviction, but designed as the means of enabling them to appropriate a part of the ecclesiastical revenues to themselves. The ministers of the Church were by no means satisfied with it; but through the influence exerted over numbers of them by particular noblemen, they were prevailed upon to submit to it as a temporary measure. "Some of the ministry," says Calderwood, "were poor; some covetous and ambitious; some did not take up the gross corruption of this human invention; some had a carnal respect to some noblemen their friends; and thus it was easy for the court to obtain the consent of many ministers."* Throughout the country the true nature of the whole scheme was thoroughly appreciated; and the opinion of the people was bluntly but significantly expressed in the designation which was currently given to the bishops created at this time. In allusion to a practice which prevailed of placing a calf's skin stuffed with straw, denominated a "tulehan," before cows to induce them to give their milk freely, the bishops were universally nicknamed "tulehan bishops"—the bishop obtained the title, but the patron received the milk or temporal advantage of the benefice. So universally, indeed, was the true nature of the new bishoprics recognised when they were first introduced, that even Patrick Adamson, although he afterwards accepted one of them, gave a most correct and graphic description of them in a discourse delivered at St. Andrew's, the week after the installation of Douglas. "There were three sorts of bishops," he said, "my lord bishop, my lord's bishop, and the Lord's bishop. My lord bishop was in the time of papistry; my lord's bishop is now, when my lord gets the benefice, and the bishop serves no purpose but to make good his title; the Lord's bishop is the true minister of the Gospel."†

The increasing infirmities of age prevented Knox from being present at the meeting of the General Assembly held at Perth, in August. He sent, however, a letter to the brethren there congregated, in which he admonished them to be assiduous in prosecuting the great work to which they had devoted themselves; to contend boldly for the faith once delivered unto the saints, and particularly to beware of allowing the Church to fall under the bondage of the universities; and, finally, he commended them to the protection of the Lord Jesus Christ.‡ Sundry articles accompanied this letter, to be presented by Mr. John Winram and Mr. Robert Pont, to the effect that the assembly should use means for preventing unqualified persons from being appointed to vacant bishoprics; should oppose the bestowment of pensions out of benefices by simple donation of the lord regent, without the consent of the superintendents or bishops; and should require all bishops admitted, according to the ecclesiastical order now observed, to present a yearly account of their whole rents, in order that provision might be made for such objects as the Church might consider most expedient and necessary.§ From the strain of these sug-

Letter from Knox to the General Assembly.

* Bannatyne's Journal, pp. 229, 375; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 207.

† Bannatyne's Journal, p. 330.

‡ Book of Universal Kirk, p. 132; Spottiswood, p. 258; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 221; McCre's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 199.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 207.

† James Melvil's Diary, p. 32.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 222.

§ Ibid., vol. iii. pp. 766, 767.

gestions, it has been concluded that Knox quite approved of the restoration of the episcopal office in the Scottish Church; but all that can be inferred is, that seeing the office was actually introduced, and knowing that no successful opposition could be given to it at present, he was desirous of guarding as much as possible against those evils which he anticipated from its existence, and which he well knew were the grand reason why the nobility were so determined to maintain it. And it is plain that if his suggestions had been adopted by the assembly, and if they could have been carried into effect, they were perfectly calculated to defeat the selfish ends which the new bishoprics were designed to serve. His own views of the episcopal office were well known.* In a letter to Mr. John Wood, dated 14th February, 1568, he had expressed himself thus:—"I would most gladly pass through the course which God hath appointed to my labours, giving thanks to his holy name that it hath pleased his mercy to make me not a lord bishop, but a painful preacher of his blessed Evangel."† Only the preceding year, too, his sentiments had been exhibited with sufficient emphasis and clearness at the installation of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's. And James Melvil, who was a student in the university at the time, declares in his Diary that Knox opposed himself directly and zealously to the making of bishops.‡

It was in September of this year that intelligence reached Scotland of that atrocious slaughter of the Protestants by the Romanists of France, which is so well known under the designation of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew.§ Invited to Paris by the king, to be present at the marriage of his sister, the leaders of the Protestant party—princes, nobles, and admirals—had no apprehension of the terrible stroke which their perfidious entertainers were secretly preparing to inflict upon them; when, at a given signal, during the darkness of night, armed ruffians were let loose upon them; and neither the feebleness of age, nor the helplessness of infancy—neither dignity of rank, nor elevation of character, nor tenderness of sex, could protect them from the stroke of the infuriated assassin. For several days, not only in the capital, but also throughout the provinces, the murderous work went on; and the numbers that fell, butchered in cold blood, defenceless and unresisting, have been variously estimated at from fifty to one hundred thousand persons. Seventy thousand is reckoned a moderate computation.¶ Consternation and horror seized the whole body of Protestants throughout the length and breadth of Europe. It was made transparent as day, that the combination of princes formed some years before for the extermination of heretics was designed to be a terrible reality.* And the impression produced in Scotland was perhaps deeper than anywhere else, on account of the unsettled state of the country, and the persevering efforts which the partisans of Mary were making to replace her upon the throne. The pulpits rang with denunciations of popery. The horrible barbarities perpetrated in France, in the name of religion, were the theme of every tongue. And as Mary's former connexion with the princes who were leagued together for the extirpation of Protestants, although concealed, had been well known, and had contributed not a little to her dethronement,† so now the shocking scenes exhibited in France, which were just the natural and premeditated result of that league, struck a deadly blow at the party in Scotland favourable to her restoration, and even gave an impulse to designs which were at this time entertained against her life.‡

Immediately after the intelligence arrived of the savage massacre of the French Protestants, the regent and his council, at the instance of barons, gentlemen, and other friends of the Reformed faith, summoned a convention of commissioners from the various churches to meet in Edinburgh, on the 20th October, for the purpose of devising measures of defence against the furious rage of "the bloody and traitorous papists."§ Tytler says it was no doubt by Knox's advice that this convention was summoned.|| And although his name is not specially mentioned in connexion with the proceedings, yet we can readily believe that this intrepid old man, weak and worn as he now was, who never deserted his post or remained

Convention held in consequence of the massacre.

* Supra, vol. ii. pp. 26, 27; Bannatyne's Journal, pp. 394—396; Turner's Elizabeth, vol. iv. p. 321.

† Tytler, vol. vii. p. 25. The Massacre of St. Bartholomew is one of the most diabolical scenes to be found in all history. It gives an awful view of the unrelenting and cruel character of the popish system: for it cannot be said, that the immediate actors only are to be blamed for the atrocious deed, and not the Church of Rome. True, it was perpetrated at the command of the French king, instigated by his wicked mother. But was it condemned by the Pope and the rulers of the Romish Church? Was the so-called holy city filled with mourning, lamentation, and sorrow, when the shocking intelligence arrived? Was the King of France rebuked and excommunicated for his unexampled perfidy and cruelty? It would almost surpass belief, were it not a thoroughly accredited historical fact, that the Pope and his cardinals marched in joyful procession to the Church of St. Mark, and publicly rendered thanks to Heaven, in the open face of day, for the signal triumph gained by the Church over her enemies. Nay, so much were they intoxicated with delight at the news of the massacre, that, as if to preserve the memory of an illustrious achievement, and to stir up succeeding times to the imitation of it, they actually struck a medal, on the one side of which was the head of the reigning Pope, Gregory XIII., and on the other, an angel with a crucifix in the left hand and a sword in the right, the meaning of which was explained by the motto—"Hugonotum strages" (slaughter of the Huguenots). And thus was it blasphemously affirmed that this deed of hell was approved by God, and performed by a divinely commissioned agent. Has the Church of Rome to this day condemned the Massacre of St. Bartholomew? Has it ever repudiated the principal of persecution?—(Robertson, vol. iii. p. 30.)

‡ Lingard, vol. viii. p. 107.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 226.

|| Tytler, vol. vii. p. 335.

* Bannatyne's Journal, p. 375.

† McCreie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 203.

‡ Melvil's Diary, p. 31.

§ Supra, vol. ii. p. 135.

¶ Alkman's Buchanan, vol. ii. p. 628; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 374.

silent in the hour of danger, would not be the last to perceive the need of some united action against principles which could allow, and persons who could have recourse to, such appalling enormities. The Parisian massacre was but one act of a great tragedy, whose leading object was the extermination of the Protestants throughout Europe; and where the next scene might be laid who could tell? When the convention met, they first of all took measures for stirring up the ministers, and other office-bearers of the Church, to diligence in the discharge of their various duties; that the Gospel of Christ might be everywhere made known to the people in its purity; that the discipline of the Church might be faithfully administered for the suppression of vice, and that schools might be instituted and liberally supported for the training of the young. The subject of popery was next brought under review; and when we reflect upon the specimen of its spirit and doings, which the convention had before their eyes, as the very occasion of their meeting, it can hardly appear wonderful that they should have adopted measures not altogether consistent with our ideas of religious liberty. It may admit of some question what even we ourselves would do, with all the boasted light of the nineteenth century, if there existed at the present moment a confederacy of popish princes for the extermination of Protestants; if in a neighbouring country seventy thousand individuals had just been put to death in cold blood, in pursuance of the schemes of that confederacy; and if a popish prince known, or even suspected, to belong to so bloody an alliance were laying claim to the sceptre of Great Britain, and waging war in order to grasp it. Let those who feel doubtful what they themselves would propose in such a conjuncture of affairs pause before they condemn our ancestors for what they did, when this hypothetical case was an actual reality. It was recommended by the convention that all papists remaining in the country should be required to recant their principles; that those who refused to do so should be immediately banished; and that if any such banished persons should be found in the country after a certain period, they should be considered deserving of death, as enemies to God, the king, the Kirk, and the commonwealth. An earnest request was also presented to the government to carry into execution the Act of Parliament which excluded papists from all public offices and situations of trust.* And with regard to foreigners belonging to the Romish Church, whether residing in Scotland or abroad, it was considered necessary that, for protection against their machinations, and for the maintenance of the true religion against error, a league and confederacy should be made with England, and other reformed countries upon the continent; yet it does not appear that any Romanist suffered, either in person or property, in consequence of these proceedings of the convention. Our protestant ancestors, although they had not sufficient light to lead them to relinquish the persecuting principles which they had learned from Rome, yet were restrained by the benign influence of their religious views and feelings from carrying out these principles into practice. They were better than their principles. Yet, strange to say, they are more blamed in some quarters for the views which they entertained with regard to the lawfulness of punishing religious error, than the Romanists are, who not only held the same views, but carried them relentlessly into practice.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 229.

The career of the illustrious Knox, beyond all question the greatest man of his Approaching times, was now rapidly drawing close of Knox's career. a close. He had recently returned from St. Andrew's to his flock in Edinburgh, at their own earnest solicitation; and although enfeebled by age, and worn out with the numerous labours and harassing anxieties of many years, he had resumed his labours among them. As the weakness of his voice prevented him from being properly heard in St. Giles's church, he caused his friends to procure for him a smaller place of meeting, designated by Bannatyne the Tolbooth,* where he continued to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ with all his accustomed fervour and earnestness. Feeling that his end was near, he prevailed upon the council of the town to take measures for providing another minister to occupy his place; and Mr. James Lawson, one of the professors in Aberdeen, was selected for this purpose. Knox himself preached at the admission of his colleague, and although he could hardly walk, yet he was enabled to speak in such a manner as gave the liveliest satisfaction to all who were within reach of his voice. He prayed most fervently that the richest blessings of heaven might come down upon the head of his successor; and he admonished the people to adhere steadfastly and faithfully to the religious principles which they had been taught; and having pronounced the benediction, he walked home, leaning upon his staff and upon the arm of an attendant, in the midst of a numerous crowd, who followed him home to the door of his dwelling, from which he never again came forth alive. Most appropriate and beautiful end for such a man as Knox!—he laboured while he could bear even to be propped up, and he laid him down to die when he could labour no more.†

During his last illness,—which began upon the very day of his colleague's induction, and not improbably was occasioned by the share which he took in the service,—he enjoyed in rich abundance the consolations of the Gospel; and his words were full of instruction to all who had the privilege of visiting him. Shortly before his death he sent for Mr. David Lindsay, Mr. James Lawson, and the elders and deacons of the church, and bidding them farewell,

* Bannatyne's Journal, pp. 386, 387.

† Spottiswood, p. 265; Mc'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 218.

he addressed them in the following terms: "The day approaches for which I have long thirsted, wherein I shall be relieved of all cares, and be with my Saviour Christ for ever. And now God is my witness, whom I have served with my spirit in the Gospel of his Son, that I have taught nothing but the true and solid doctrine of the Gospel, and that the end I proposed in all my preaching was, to instruct the ignorant, to confirm the weak, to comfort the consciences of those who were humbled under the sense of their sins, and bear down with the threatenings of God's judgments such as proud and rebellious. I am not ignorant that many have blamed, and yet do blame, my too great rigour and severity; but God knows that in my heart I never hated the persons of those against whom I thundered God's judgments: I did only hate their sins, and laboured with all my power to gain them to Christ. That I forbore none, in whatsoever condition, I did it out of the fear of my God, who had placed me in the function of the ministry, and I knew would bring me to an account. Now, brethren, for yourselves I have no more to say, but to warn you that you take heed to the flock over whom God hath placed you overseers, and whom he hath redeemed by the blood of his only-begotten Son. And you, Mr. Lawson, fight a good fight, do the work of the Lord with courage and with a willing mind. And God from above bless you and the Church, whereof you have the charge. Against it, so long as it continueth in the doctrine of truth, the gates of hell shall not prevail."*

Before Lindsay and Lawson retired, the dying Reformer unburdened his mind to them in regard to Kirkaldy of Grange, to whose former steadfastness in the faith, when they were confined together in the prisons and galleys of France, he looked back with fond affection. "There is one thing grieveth me exceedingly: you have seen the courage and constancy of the Laird of Grange† in God's cause, and now, unhappy man, he hath cast himself away. I will pray you two take the pains to go unto him, and say from me, that unless he forsake that wicked course wherein he is entered, neither shall that rock on which he confideth defend him, nor the carnal wisdom of that man whom he counteth a demi-god (Lethington) make him help, but shamefully he shall be pulled out of that nest, and his carcase hung before the sun. The soul of that man is dear unto me, and, if it be possible, I would fain have him to be saved." These words of Knox, although they produced but little impression upon Kirkaldy at the time, yet were afterwards remembered by him when he was compelled to surrender his stronghold, to meet the award of justice. And it is recorded that at the time of his execution he acknowledged that Knox had spoken with something of prophetic truth; and also that he derived consolation from the good wishes and prayers of the dying Reformer for his soul, which he desired to be repeated to him by Lindsay.*

The Reformer was visited by many of the most distinguished men in the country, Morton's in- and in particular by the Earl of <sup>Morton's in-interview with
Knox.</sup> Morton, who was on the eve of being elected to the office of regent, vacant by the death of the Earl of Mar. Having inquired of the earl whether he was privy to the conspiracy for the murder of the late king, and having received an answer in the negative, he addressed him thus: "Well, God has beautified you with many benefits which he has not given to every man; as he has given riches, wisdom, and friends, and now is to prefer you to the government of this realm. Therefore, in the name of God, I charge you to use all these benefits aright, and better in time to come than you have done in time past; first, to God's glory, to the furtherance of the Evangel, the maintenance of the Church of God and his ministry; next, for the weal of the king and his realm, and true subjects. If so you shall do, God will bless you and honour you; but if you do not so, God shall spoil you of those benefits, and your end shall be ignominy and shame."†

As his end approached, he became more and more engrossed with meditation <sup>Consolations and experiences of
Knox.</sup> and prayer. Such expressions as these frequently dropped from his lips: "Come, Lord Jesus. Sweet Jesus, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Be merciful, Lord, to thy Church, which thou hast redeemed. Give peace to this afflicted commonwealth. Raise up faithful pastors, who will take charge of thy Church. Grant us, Lord, the perfect hatred of sin."‡

On Sabbath, the 23rd November, the first day of the national fast appointed by the recent convention, after lying quiet for a considerable period, he burst out into the joyful exclamation: "I have been these two last nights in meditation on the troubled state of the Church of God, the spouse of Jesus Christ, despised of the world, but precious in the sight of God. I have called to God for her and have committed her to her head, Jesus Christ. I have fought against spiritual wickedness in heavenly places, and have prevailed. I have been in heaven, and have possession. I have tasted of the heavenly joys, where presently I am."||

On the following day, which was his last upon earth, he endured considerable pain; but his soul was comforted by the reading of the fifteenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians. Having fallen into a slumber, which was interrupted by heavy moans, he was asked by his friends what was the cause of his sighing, when

* Melvil's Diary, pp. 34—36; Spottiswood, p. 266; Mc'Crrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 224.

† Bannatyne's Journal, p. 508; Mc'Crrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 226.

‡ Mc'Crrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 227; Tytler, vol. vii. p. 402; Bannatyne's Journal, p. 425.

|| Bannatyne's Journal, p. 424.

* Spottiswood, p. 266; Mc'Crrie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 221—223.
† Supra, vol. i. p. 671.

he replied: "I have formerly, during my frail life, sustained many contests and many assaults of Satan, but at present he hath assailed me most fearfully, and put forth all his strength to devour and make an end of me at once. Often before has he placed my sins before my eyes, often tempted me to despair, often endeavoured to ensnare me by the allurements of the world; but these weapons were broken by the sword of the Spirit—the word of God, and the enemy failed. Now he has attacked me in another way: the cunning serpent has laboured to persuade me that I have merited heaven and eternal blessedness by the faithful discharge of my ministry. But, blessed be God, who has enabled me to beat down and quench this fiery dart, by suggesting to me such passages of Scripture as these—'What hast thou that thou hast not received?' 'By the grace of God I am what I am.' 'Not I, but the grace of God in me.' Upon this, as one vanquished, he left me. Wherefore I give thanks to my God, through Jesus Christ, who has been pleased to give me the victory; and I am persuaded that the tempter shall not again attack me, but within a short time I shall, without any great pain of body or anguish of mind, exchange this mortal and miserable life for a blessed immortality, through Jesus Christ."*

At ten o'clock, after the evening prayer, which he heard distinctly, he uttered a sigh, and said, "Now it is come."

Bannatyne then drew near, and desired him to think of the comfortable promises which he had so often declared to others; and perceiving that he had lost the power of speech, he requested him to give a sign that he died in peace, upon which he lifted up one of his hands, and sighing twice, expired without a struggle.†

Thus died John Knox, in the sixty-seventh year of his age, after a life of incredible labour, and trial, and danger.

His character and influence.

No individual has ever exerted a greater influence over the affairs of Scotland in any age; nor has there ever existed an individual in the land whose influence could have been more salutary. The elements of his unparalleled power are to be traced in a singular combination of admirable qualities, wonderfully adapted to the demands of the critical times in which he flourished. He was a man of uncommon vigour of mind—penetrating, subtle, and of most rapid conception; and he was thoroughly versant in all the branches of knowledge which were cultivated in his day. Though he was of a comparatively feeble constitution, yet his mind wrought with an intensity that knew no pause; and he devoted himself with the most ardent zeal to whatever he undertook. The object that engaged the supreme affection of his soul was the Gospel of Christ, of which he had acquired most clear and accurate conceptions, in consequence of the uncommon frequency with which he read and pored over the Scriptures; and it became a perfect passion with him, which expired only with his life, to proclaim to his countrymen the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to rescue them from the errors and corruptions engrafted upon Christianity by the papal system. His preaching was characterised by amazing eloquence—at one time laying hold of the sinner's conscience with a power which nothing could resist, at another infusing consolation into hearts alarmed and terrified by the enormity of their sins; and he continued to preach with unabated energy to the very last, even after he needed assistance to enable him to ascend the pulpit stairs. There is something sublime in the spectacle of this old man, eloquent, hardly able to stand, yet still wielding an unequalled power in the handling of the sword of the Spirit, and in piercing with it the consciences of men.

Knox had views of civil liberty far in advance of the practice, and even of the theory, of the times in which he lived; not the will of the ruler, but law was the supreme authority with him. The prince, in his view, was as much bound to submit to the law of the land as the meanest subject, and was to be held responsible in the event of violating it; and, without a question, the lovers of liberty, and of the British constitution, owe to his memory a debt of gratitude which no time can repay, for the consistency and the courage with which he ever maintained this grand principle. No man was ever more submissive to lawful authority than Knox—no man was ever more determined to resist the mere will of the ruler; and it is because this broad and palpable distinction is so much overlooked by men, that the Reformer is sometimes represented by ignorant and prejudiced partisans as an enemy to authority and a seditious disturber of the peace.

Unflinching fearlessness was a distinguishing trait of Knox's character; and this was a quality which found ample opportunities for exercise in those troubled and dangerous times. Never was there a truer eulogium uttered regarding any man, than that which Morton pronounced upon Knox on the day of his funeral: "Here lies one that never feared the face of man." When duty summoned him to action, he never regarded any danger or difficulty that might lie in the way; and whatever judgment he formed regarding any scheme or system, he never shrank in any place, or under any circumstances, from avowing: neither the presence of prince nor of nobles could induce him to suppress the honest conviction of his heart. He has been blamed for coarseness and obstinacy, and certainly he was not a smooth or pliant man; neither, if he had been so, would he have been able to accomplish the work for which Providence obviously designed him. If we approve of the work, and rejoice in the success which attended it, we must beware of finding fault with the qualities that were indispensable to its execution. It is as

* Bannatyne's Journal, p. 426; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 230.

† Bannatyne's Journal, p. 427; Smetoni Responsio, p. 123; Spottiswood, p. 266; M'Crie's Life of Knox, p. 232.

JOHN KNOX.

From the Original at Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh.

unreasonable to condemn Knox for the want of a certain polish of manners, as it would be to find fault with an axe destined to fell trees that it had not the fine thin edge of a razor. But, after all, Knox's coarseness was a quality of which it would be well that there were a vast deal more in the world. It was not the coarseness of a vulgar mind, which delights in grovelling and base ideas—it was the utterance of a mind that abhorred all vice, and had no patience with the practice of designating sin by soft and gentle epithets, calculated to veil from the sinner's own view the enormity of his transgression. He denounced prevailing sins in the plainest terms, no matter what might be the rank or influence of the persons whose conduct he had occasion to condemn; and he justified his conduct by the practice of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and all the other prophets of the most high God.

Knox was a man, too, of incorruptible integrity. As he feared no danger, so he desired no favour from any. Not one single action of his life can be pointed to which manifested anything like selfishness. He lived for God, and he was ready to die rather than abandon the path of duty. He was devoted to the advancement of the moral and spiritual wellbeing of his countrymen; and no private ends of his own ever had the smallest power to turn him aside from the prosecution of that object. He received the veneration of his own contemporaries, who knew him best, and had witnessed the services which he performed for his country; and, although afterwards it became fashionable to decry him as a fanatic and a coarse-minded bigot, yet the clouds of calumny that for many years obscured his fame have to a great extent been dispelled, and his noble character now shines forth with unclouded lustre. And while genius and eloquence, devotion to God and disinterested labours for mankind, the love of civil liberty and incorruptible integrity, and a spirit of self-sacrifice that will rather die than neglect its duty, have any power to attract the regard of mankind, the name of Knox will be remembered with gratitude to God for having raised up such a champion of truth and righteousness, and with admiration of the man whose self-denying labours were the instrument of accomplishing so much for the good of his country, and of the world.

The death of Knox removed one great barrier to the success of Morton in that course of procedure with regard to the Church, upon which he had entered even before his elevation to the regency. It was he who first contrived the plan of appointing bishops, who, whilst nominally invested with a right to all the immunities and revenues of their several dioceses, nevertheless received for their own benefit only a small portion of the emoluments, the surplus being paid into the hands of the patrons. And not satisfied with the hold which he had thus acquired over the larger benefices, he soon began to cast a covetous eye upon the thirds; actuated by the double motive of enriching himself and of crippling the Church, whose power was the object of his great and growing jealousy. With the ostensible view of acceding to a request which had been repeatedly made by the ministers, and of correcting abuses which he alleged had crept into the mode of collecting the revenues, he proposed to the assembly, at their meeting in August, that a change should take place in the management of the thirds; and he engaged, on receiving the control of these funds, that each minister's stipend should be made payable in places "cwest and most commodious" to his residence, and should always be first paid, whatever other claims might present themselves. And with the view of removing every objection which the assembly might entertain to this plan, he promised that if upon trial they found that their interests were in any way compromised by it, he would restore to them their former rights whenever they desired it. Thus the thirds passed into the hands of the regent, and the ministers became dependent upon him for their support.*

It was not long before the evils of the new arrangement began to manifest themselves, and it became quite apparent to the ministers that they had been deceived. Morton's plan was obviously calculated—perhaps even had been designed—to plunder and cripple the Church. For the regent and his council immediately adopted the practice of appointing one minister to take charge of two, or three, or even four churches; and then, in order to remedy the evil of insufficient spiritual oversight, they stationed readers in the different parishes, to read prayers during the minister's absence, allowing these readers a very trifling compensation. In this manner the surplus of the thirds that accrued to the king's revenues was considerably augmented, and the Church was proportionably impoverished, one stipend being made to serve for two, or three, or four parishes.

And beside these, there were other and great inconveniences connected with the new plan. Formerly, when the superintendents were entrusted with the assignation of stipends, the ministers could apply to them with something like confidence, and state their necessities and wrongs with the conviction that an attempt, at least, would be made to extend relief to them.† But now they were obliged to give attendance at court, that they might obtain "assignments and precepts of payment;" and frequently their demands for the maintenance promised to them were altogether disregarded, so that their time was wasted, and their tempers were fretted by disappointment. The superintendents, too, instead of being able, as formerly, to help the ministers, were reduced to the same distress.‡ The sums allocated to them were withheld, and when they complained of this treatment, they were told that their office was now quite superfluous, as there were bishops placed in the dioceses, and the government of the Church properly belonged to them.

* Spottiswood, p. 273; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 294, 391; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 5.

† Spottiswood, p. 273.

‡ Tytler, vol. viii. p. 5.

The dissatisfaction which prevailed in consequence of these grievanecs among the office-bearers, and indeed the whole body of the Reformed Church, was very great. In a work bearing

Davidson's Dialogue between a Clerk and a Courtier.

ing the title of "A Dialogue between a Clerk and a Courtier," Mr. John Davidson, a regent in St. Leonard's College, St. Andrew's, discussed the subject of the appointment of one minister to four churches, and reasoned regarding it with a force and power which augmented the excitement prevailing through the country. The object of this work,—which had been composed by its author only with the view of being circulated in manuscript, but which in some way or other had been committed to the press without his knowledge,—was to show in a lively and spirited manner that the charge of four parish churches was by far too great a burden for any single individual to bear. The courtier defends the practice of putting several churches under one man's care; but the clerk condemns such an accumulation of duties, and, in support of his views, he appeals both to the experience of ministers on whom such a burden of official engagements had been laid, and to the experience of congregations which had been obliged to content themselves with a fractional portion of a minister's labours. The clerk, in the end, is represented as having the best of the argument; and, after much reasoning on both sides, he states his conclusion strongly, and intermingles some powerful appeals, with the view of arresting attention and exciting the public mind.* The work is written in a metrical shape, and plainly and fearlessly exposes the true motives for the very reprehensible practice which it condemns.†

Proceedings instituted against Davidson.

council against Davidson for the publication of this book, and he was summoned before them, first at Haddington, and afterwards at Holyrood House. As the work was anonymous, it was their object to prevail upon him to deny that he was the author of it, and with this denial apparently they would have been satisfied; but he not only acknowledged the book to be his production, but even maintained that there was nothing "libellous or damnable in its matter." The subject was taken up also by the General Assembly, in March, 1574. Both the work of Davidson, and an answer to it, which had been published by Mr. John Rutherford, Provost of St. Salvador's College, were, after much resistance on the part of Rutherford, laid upon the table; and a committee was appointed to read them, and to prepare a report with regard to the character of their contents. But the committee, afraid, on the one hand, to offend the regent by approving of Davidson's book, and yet not perceiving anything in it which they could condemn, declined pronouncing any judgment at all, under the pretence that too small a number had attended their meeting; and the assembly also, influenced by similar feelings, were not disposed to pursue the subject with greater vigour. Davidson, thus left defenceless, and obliged to find security for his appearance to underly the law on the 17th of June, found himself in a situation of considerable peril, and, in the end, by the advice of some of his friends, he fled.* After lurking for a time in the west of Scotland, he retired into England, and, during his exile, he also visited the continent; nor was he permitted to return to his native land till after Morton's fall, when he comes before us again as minister of Liberton, and acts a very prominent part.

The inconveniences and evils attendant upon the new mode of levying and distributing the thirds, soon convinced the ministers that they had committed a serious mistake in agreeing to transfer them into the hands of the court; and therefore they craved that the regent would restore them to the Church, agreeably to the promise which he had given when the change was made, and allow them to manage them themselves, as they had formerly done. But sundry objections were started against this demand, and various delays were artfully interposed; and at length the ministers were told, that seeing the surplus of the thirds belonged to the king, it was more fitting that the regent and his council should modify the stipends of ministers, than that the Church should be allowed to determine what surplus should accrue to the king. Thus baffled in their attempts to remedy the evil of an insufficient inspection of parishes, which had grown out of the change in the administration of those funds, the General Assembly decided that in cases where one minister had several kirks placed under his pastoral care, he should be required to fix his residence at some one of them which should be accounted his charge, and which he was on no account to neglect; and with regard to the others, he was to take such an oversight of them as the bishop or superintendent might think expedient. In this way the assembly strove to maintain the standard of ministerial

Attempt of the Church to regain possession of the thirds.

* Davidson's defence; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 317—324; McCre's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 126.

† The following lines from the conclusion of this poem are presented as a specimen of it:—

"Forsuith, schir, said the courtier,
I am assurit had ilk preacher
Unto the matter been als frak
As ye have been heir sen ye spak,
It had not come to sic ane heid
As this day we see it proceed.
But I can see few men amang them,
Tho all the world suld clean our gang them,
That has ane face to speak again
Sic as the Kirk of Christ profane.
Had gude John Knox not yet been dead
It had not come unto this head,
Had they myntit till sic ane steir
He had made heaven and earth to heir."

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 311—314.

efficiency at as high a level as possible. It cannot be denied, however, that their counsels displayed a considerable amount of timidity; for in stating the grounds of the regulation, they declare that it was to remain in force till God of his mercy should thrust forth more labourers into his harvest. Doubtless there was a scarcity of labourers, but that was not the main reason for the enactment which it was found necessary at this time to make. The scarcity was to some extent artificial. It was created by the parsimony of the government; and accordingly, Davidson, in the apology which he issued for his flight, commenting upon the evils of a systematic conjunction of parishes, says, "It is a mockery of God to say that you will wait till God stir up more labourers; and in the meantime you do not use the means of augmenting their number, but rather shut your eyes when the way is pointed out."*

As the restoration of the order of bishops had led the government to treat the superintendents with neglect, and even to withhold from them their accustomed revenues,† several of them, unable to meet the expenses to which they were exposed, laid their resignations upon the assembly's table; but the assembly decidedly refused to accept them.‡ On the contrary, they declared that the jurisdiction of the bishops was in no respect superior to that of the superintendents, and that both orders of office-bearers were equally subject to the authority of the General Assembly. The superintendents were not to grant collation of benefices without the advice and assistance of at least three qualified ministers; and equally the bishops were to consider themselves bound by the same restrictions. And no bishop was to give collation of any benefice within the bounds of a superintendent without his written consent. And not only did the assembly thus assert their authority over the bishops, but they exercised it. At the meeting held in August, the conduct of the Bishop of Dunkeld, who was alleged to have made a simoniacal paction with the Earl of Argyle, and who had neglected the injunction of the last assembly, to excommunicate the Earl of Atholl, was brought under review; and while his explanation in reference to the first point was accepted, he was commanded, under pain of suspension, to pronounce the sentence of excommunication upon Atholl within forty days. The proceedings, also, with regard to the admission and election of the Bishop of Moray were subjected to a very strict revision; and a commission was appointed to investigate the whole case, and to prepare it for being submitted to the judgment of the assembly at their next meeting.§

Morton's dislike of the Church, and jealousy of her influence, are apparent from the circumstance that he scrupulously avoided giving any countenance to her assemblies, by either attending them himself, or deputing any one to appear in his name. At the meeting held in March, the assembly ventured to remonstrate with him on this point, reminding him that two assemblies met every year, and that the most noble in the land had formerly frequented these meetings; and they craved that he would still (as had been customary with his predecessors) either honour them with his personal presence, or at least send commissioners authorised to represent him: "Your grace's absence is to our hearts most dolorous and lamentable." And they appointed Lawson and Lindsay, the ministers of Edinburgh and Leith, and the lairds of Barganie and Thornton, commissioners of Edinburgh and Perth, to present their supplication to his grace. The reception given to these brethren was very rough and uncourteous. Fixing upon that part of the document which referred to the Church's appointment, and the parliament's sanction of two general assemblies each year, the regent demanded, "Who gave them authority to convocate the king's lieges, without his advice who was in authority?" The commissioners, abashed by the suddenness and sternness of the question, remained silent for some time, until one of them summoned up courage to say, that they were convened in virtue of the authority and commandment of Jesus Christ, the great head of the Church. They were then dismissed, without receiving any satisfaction in regard to the object of their visit.*

The efforts of the assembly were renewed this year to procure a settlement of the long pending question of the limits of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The subject was one not well understood in that age. Civil and sacred things were by far too much intermingled; but the ministers were not more in error than the rest of the community—the Church was not more at fault than the State. It was universally conceived that the Church and the State should embrace the whole community, and thus be commensurate with each other; and therefore it was held that excommunication ought to infer the loss of civil privileges, and by act of parliament it did so. Accordingly, we find that even the regent himself had proposed to the assembly, during the preceding year, when he was contriving to obtain possession and management of the thirds, that notice of all excommunications should be sent to the lord-treasurer or his clerk, who should take measures before the Court of Session to compel the parties to satisfy the Church, under pain of rebellion and consequent confiscation of all their property. No doubt the assembly approved of this course; and they enacted, too, that persons who knowingly Renewed attempt to define the limits of ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

* Spottiswood, p. 273; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 309, 318.

† The superintendent of Lothian stated that he had received no stipend for two whole years.—(Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 332.)

‡ Spottiswood, p. 273; Scott's Apologetical Narration, p. 32; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 141.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 304, 308, 330, 331.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 306.

received and entertained excommunicated individuals, should themselves be subjected to the discipline of the Church; and in order that no one might be able to pretend ignorance, it was agreed that in all synodical conventions lists should be drawn up of all who were excommunicated within the district, and these lists were to be brought to the General Assembly, with the view of being made known to the whole country. Another enactment was made, which had at least the merit of fairness—that in the case of those offences which had the discipline in sackcloth assigned to them, it should not be in the power of superintendents to exempt any offender, whatever might be his rank, from the rigour of sackcloth for any sum of money exacted or paid under pretence of being applied to pious uses. One of the crimes for which this species of discipline was expressly appointed, was that of consulting with witches—whose extraordinary powers were not doubted either by civil or sacred courts at that period, nor for many years afterwards.*

But whilst we disapprove of the persecuting principles so common in those days, it is but fair for us to remember that the laws affixing civil penalties to sentences of excommunication were not first enacted at the instance of the Reformed Church: they had come down as a legacy from popish times, and were allowed to remain in force for some years after the Reformation. That they were generally approved, there can be no doubt; but there is reason to believe that some of the ministers had begun to doubt the wisdom and justice of such enactments.†

In the summer of this year Andrew Melvil returned to his native country, after an absence of ten years, during which period he had risen to astonishing proficiency in all branches of learning, and had taught with uncommon success both in France and Geneva. It was with difficulty that his friends abroad could be prevailed upon to part with him. His determination to resign the office which he held in Geneva occasioned much sorrow to his colleagues and to the magistrates; and when he left them, they gave him most ample testimonials of their approbation and esteem. Beza declared, in a letter addressed to the General Assembly, that the greatest token of affection which the Church of Geneva could show to Scotland was the fact of their allowing themselves to be deprived of Andrew Melvil, that he might return to his native land, to enrich the Church with his great erudition and eminent piety.‡ The fame of his talents and learning was so great that his return was considered a public blessing; and certainly the goodness of Providence was very apparent, both in the event itself and in the critical juncture at which it occurred. Knox was now gone, and no other individual had arisen who seemed capable of supplying the void thus left. A scheme was in operation for the total subversion of the liberties of the Church; and her enemies were also attempting to reduce her to a state of abject poverty. And although the assembly saw the danger, and had already devised some measures in order to ward it off, yet there was none among them fitted by his ability, and influence, and determination, to take the lead in the struggle which was approaching. Most opportunely Melvil arrived. He was the very man adapted to the crisis. And he was soon invited to take the helm of the Church, with the view of guiding her through the storm, whose premonitory symptoms were already very apparent.*

Shortly after Melvil's return to Scotland, the regent, aware that a man of his Different situation offered to Melvil. ability, and learning, and fame, must soon acquire a powerful influence in the country, endeavoured to attach him to his own person and interests, that he might employ him as an instrument, along with others, for the subjugation of the General Assembly, and for the assimilation of the Church of Scotland to the hierarchy of the sister kingdom. With this view he offered him the situation of domestic instructor or chaplain in his own family, and promised that he should be advanced to some position more adequate to his merits on the next occasion that offered; but Melvil, although yet but indifferently acquainted with the regent's designs, declined the proposal, because he disrelished the life of a courtier, and preferred to be occupied as an instructor in some university. Strenuous efforts were made by the commissioners of the Synod of Fife to procure his settlement in St. Andrew's, as Provost of St. Mary's College. Similar efforts were made by Boyd, Archbishop of Glasgow, and George Hay, commissioner of the west, to obtain his services for the University of Glasgow; and at length he was prevailed upon to visit Glasgow, where he was appointed to the office of principal of the college. He entered upon the discharge of his duties with ardour and zeal, and brought under the notice of the students new authors and subjects, which had hardly ever been heard of before in Scotland. He taught with so much success that the college became quite crowded, and not a few who had already finished their course at St. Andrew's, entered anew upon their studies under his care.† The discipline of the university was also maintained by the principal with a firm hand, and the attempts of certain youths of high rank to set his authority at defiance were promptly and signally defeated.‡

* M'Crie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 155.

† James Melvil's Diary, p. 50; Calderwood, vol. vii. p. 339; M'Crie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. pp. 64—72.

‡ Sibbald's Prodrum Nat. Hist. Scotiæ, Part n., lib. iii., pp. 2—4. It was the custom in those times for the principal to inflict corporal punishment with his own hands, in presence of the masters and students; but Melvil devolved this disagreeable task upon the regents.—(Life of Robert Boyd of Trochrig, pp. 84—100.)

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 296, 299.

† Altare Damascenum, pp. 312, 313; M'Crie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 203.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 328; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 25.

The ministers of the Church as a body were actuated by a strong desire to sustain and extend the efficiency of their religious system, and to prevent unqualified persons from being appointed to any spiritual function. For this purpose, at the meeting of the General Assembly held in March, they passed an enactment ordaining that as the greater number of commentaries upon the Scriptures were written in the Latin tongue, bishops, superintendents, and commissioners should admit none to the office of the ministry but such as were competently acquainted with that language.* This enactment was designed not only to elevate the general standard of attainments among the office-bearers of the Church, but also to restrain, and as soon as possible terminate, the practice which had become so common among the nobility of appointing their own dependents, however ignorant, or dissolute, or juvenile, to the richest benefices. In some cases, even infants were appointed to ecclesiastical livings. A custom had also long prevailed of throwing some of the narrative portions of Scripture into the form of comedies and tragedies, which were acted publicly, sometimes even upon the Lord's-day, and under the eye of the ministers of the Church. The assembly, justly considering that the tendency of such an employment of holy writ was to expose the Word of God to contempt and profanation, forbade the practice, threatening ministers who countenanced it with deposition, and others with being subjected to the discipline of the Church. And one thing must be allowed, that, however unduly coercive the measures of the assembly sometimes were, they never spared themselves. The dress suitable to ministers and their families was brought under discussion at this time, and a committee was appointed to consider the subject, who prepared and presented a very minute report, to the effect that all sumptuous apparel and garish colours ought to be shunned, and that it was only proper to use plain fabrics, of such colours as black, russet, gray, and brown, and formed into garments of simple construction. The assembly had yet to learn that, although undoubtedly there are proprieties in dress, which cannot be overlooked by the ministers of the Gospel, or by any Christians, without detriment to the interests of religion; yet the subject has too indefinite a connection with morals to admit of its being made the subject of legislation, and must always be left to the good sense of individuals.†

The influence of Andrew Melvil upon the counsels of the Church soon began to make itself apparent. He was one of the number appointed in March to confer with the regent's commissioners upon the jurisdiction and policy of the Church,‡ and to prepare this difficult question, destined soon to become the subject of engrossing interest and of fierce contention, for being publicly discussed in the assembly. And in August, again, he took a prominent part in the discussion of the question,—which was raised by John Durie, one of the ministers of Edinburgh,—whether the office of bishop, as existing at the time in the Church of Scotland, was a function which had any foundation in the Word of God. Spottiswood says that Durie was urged on by Melvil to introduce the subject into the assembly, and that the opposition to bishops mainly originated with him.* Now it is certain that there was previous intercourse between Melvil and Durie in regard to the subject,† and it is also highly probable that Melvil's arguments had an influence upon Durie's mind in making him more decided, but it is quite contrary to the evidence of history to represent opposition to episcopal rule as an innovation that originated with Melvil. The bishops themselves were the innovation, so far as the Reformed Church was concerned. They had been introduced but three or four years before, and we have seen that from the first the great body of the ministers were opposed to the appointment of such office-bearers, and only submitted to it from necessity, and on the understanding that it was merely a temporary expedient.‡ During the discussion introduced by Durie, Melvil expressed himself with great zeal and decision upon the subject of episcopacy, maintaining that the authority of Scripture is alone entitled to settle what offices ought to exist in the Church. He argued that although certainly the word "bishop" was to be found in the writings of the Apostles, still it bore in them quite a different signification from what was now given to it, being applied equally to all the ministers of the Gospel. And he concluded with affirming that the corruptions which had crept into the order of bishops were so great, that until a reformation was effected it would not go well with the Church, nor could religion be preserved in purity.§

This discussion issued in the appointment of a committee of six individuals, three of whom were opposed to the episcopal office, and three were somewhat favourable to it, to confer together upon the subject, and to report their judgment to the assembly.|| Those on the negative side of the question were John Craig, formerly Knox's colleague, but now minister of Aberdeen; James Lawson, minister in Edinburgh; and Andrew Melvil: those on the affirmative side were George Hay, commissioner of Caithness; John Row, minister of Perth; and David Lindsay, of Leith.

* Spottiswood, p. 275; McCre's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 180.

† James Melvil's Diary, pp. 52, 53; Scott's Apologetical Narration, pp. 33, 34.

‡ McCre's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 147.

§ Row, p. 54; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 347, 355.

|| McCre's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 184; Spottiswood, De regimine ecclesiæ Scotiæ, p. 42.

* Hetherington, p. 44; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 344, 345; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 146.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 345, 355.

‡ Acts of Parliament of Scotland, vol. iii. pp. 89, 90.

The report which they prepared was constructed upon the principle of a compromise between the extreme views on either side. They did not consider it to be expedient, at the present moment, to give a direct answer to the main question regarding the lawfulness of the episcopal function as it existed at the time in Scotland; but they were unanimous in thinking that the name "bishop" belonged, according to its usage in Scripture, to all who had charge of a particular flock, with commission to preach the Gospel, administer the sacraments, and execute discipline. They were also of opinion * that some might be chosen from amongst the ministers to oversee and visit some district of country, of reasonable bounds, besides their own flocks; and that these persons might be authorised to appoint ministers, with consent of the ministers of the district and of the congregations over whom they were placed; as also to suspend from office, with the same concurrence, for reasonable causes.† This report was favourably received by the assembly; and although there were six bishops present, not one of them uttered a syllable in defence of the episcopal function.‡

These proceedings were by no means agreeable to the regent, nor was he at all pleased with the assembly for deposing, as they did at this time, the Bishop of Dunkeld, for dilapidation of his benefice.‡ But he was involved in a difficult struggle with the Earls of Argyre and Atholl, who, although most hostile to one another, had yet laid aside their mutual jealousies, that they might direct their combined efforts against him; and these perplexities, affecting himself, obliged him to give a comparatively mild answer to the deputation sent by the assembly to inform him of what they were doing.§ The message which he transmitted by them to the assembly was to the effect, that he would like to know whether they were disposed to stand by the policy agreed upon at Leith; or if not, that they would condescend upon some form of government by which they would be willing to abide, and, therefore, he expressed the desire that they should revise the heads drawn up at the last conference. || This suggestion was readily embraced by the assembly. A large committee was appointed for this purpose, consisting of persons from all parts of the country, who were first to convene in their several districts upon the first Tuesday of June; and afterwards to hold an aggregate meeting, or, at least, a meeting containing representatives from all the district meetings in Stirling, upon the last day of July, to compare their several labours, and to draw up a general report for the autumn meeting of the assembly.* Meanwhile, they renewed their adherence to the principle agreed upon at the last meeting, that the name of bishop, as used in Scripture, belongs to all who have the spiritual oversight of a particular flock; and they further decided that all the existing bishops should be required to take special charge of some one parish.† The kirk of Dunblane, accordingly, was assigned to the Bishop of Dunblane with his own consent; and the canonry of Ross, in like manner, to the Bishop of Ross. The Bishop of Glasgow offered some reasons, grounded upon the mode of his first appointment, why he could not restrict himself to a particular church; but he promised to preach statedly, sometimes in Glasgow and sometimes in Ayr, according as his engagements might require him to be in the one neighbourhood or in the other.‡

Bishops and superintendents had now been declared by the assembly to possess the same jurisdiction, and to be equally subject to the authority of the supreme court. Commissioners of provinces also discharged duties of precisely the same kind; but they were in general appointed from year to year. At this time it was considered that the districts placed under the inspection of these office-bearers were too extensive, and that on this account discipline in many quarters was not duly administered. And as the offices held by these functionaries were not viewed as resting upon express scriptural authority, like the office of pastor or elder, a number of other persons were appointed, under the designation of visitors, to take charge of more limited districts of country. Their duties were to be very nearly the same as those which had been discharged by bishops, superintendents, and commissioners. The visitor was to call together the ministers within the bounds of his visitation; to hold synodal assemblies, and act as moderator; to try ministers; to take the oversight of schools and of churches within his district; to appoint ministers, with advice of the ministers of the neighbourhood; to receive the presentations of patrons, and to give "letters testimonial" to the presentee when lawful impediments were taken away; to plant churches where there was need of them, and to attend to the repairing of kirks and kirkyards, to the state of manse and glebes, and whatever else pertained to the welfare and respectability of the house of God. These duties, so necessary to the smooth working of the machinery of the Church, were discharged by visitors for several years. But after presbyteries were properly constituted, the office of visitor, which was merely a temporary expedient, fell into disuse.§

Notwithstanding the regent's apparently frank acquiescence in the course which the assembly

* Row the historian, son of John Row the Reformer, who was one of the committee described in the text, says that the opinion here mentioned had reference to the time of the first planting of a Church in a country—"in ecclesia constituenda."—(Row, p. 56.)

† Spottiswood i, p. 276; Scott's Apologetical Narration, p. 35; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 152; Wodrow's Life of Andrew Melvil, p. 9.

‡ Spottiswood, p. 276.

§ Supra, vol. ii. p. 150; Hetherington, p. 44.

|| Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 361, 362.

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 155.

† Scott's Apologetical Narration, p. 35; Row, p. 57.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 368.

§ Scott's Apologetical Narration, pp. 35—37; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 364.

were pursuing, he was very assiduous in the employment of private influence to divert them from a course which he disliked so much. With this view he had offered to Melvil, some time previously, the rich benefice of Govan, on condition that he would desist from his opposition to the continuance of bishops in the Church.* But Melvil, whom the regent totally misjudged when he supposed him accessible to those influences which had so great a power over himself, scorned the bribe; and he remained deaf to every overture, although the benefice remained undisposed of for nearly two years as a lure to him, Morton sometimes remarking that he was depriving himself of a great benefit for the sake of new opinions and over-sea dreams. At length the regent, by the advice of Adamson, tried a different course, and attempted to mollify and gain over the principal by spontaneously annexing the benefice of Govan to the College of Glasgow. But although Melvil was highly gratified by the decided improvement which was thus made in the position of the college, yet he held and defended his opinions as before: neither a naked bribe, nor yet a spontaneous act of kindness, could tempt him to deviate from the path of duty. Nor was he more accessible to the influence of threats. On one occasion the regent, provoked at the failure of all his efforts to secure his adhesion, attempted to overawe him. He complained that the Church and kingdom were kept in a state of continual uncertainty and turmoil, by persons who were striving to introduce their own conceits and foreign notions. But Melvil replied that the views of himself and his friends were grounded, neither upon their own fancies nor upon the practice of foreign Churches, but upon the Word of God, which he quoted in his own defence. The regent, unable to reply to his arguments, lost temper, and in the violence of his anger exclaimed, "There will never be quietness in this country till half-a-dozen of you be hanged or banished!" "Tush, sir!" replied Melvil; "utter these threats to your purple-robed minions. It is the same to me whether I rot underground or in the air. The earth is the Lord's. My country is wherever goodness is. I have been ready to give my life, when it would not have been half so well expended, at the pleasure of my God. I have lived out of your country ten years, as well as in it. Let God be glorified, it will not lie in your power to hang or exile his truth."†

But all were not so invulnerable against the varied artillery of the regent as Melvil. Patrick Adamson, who had expressed himself, at the time of Douglas's advancement to the Archbishopric of St. Andrew's, with so much courage and graphic discrimination, forgetful of his publicly declared sentiments, now listened with consenting mind and ready ear to the voice of the regent, when he offered the same situation to himself. Melvil had resisted even the temptation of the archbishopric, which it is mentioned by his nephew James was designed for him,* but Adamson at once fell before this polished shaft when it was aimed at his integrity. He not only accepted the office from the regent, but he declined submitting to be tried by the assembly,—as the laws of the Church required, before being admitted to the chapter,—on the avowed ground that the regent had forbidden him. And when called to account by the assembly for this irregularity, he craftily prevailed upon them to drop proceedings against him, by promising that he would submit in all things, so soon as the great question relating to the policy of the Kirk was brought to a conclusion.†

This question was under the consideration of a large committee, who reported their proceedings from time to time, and received fresh instructions from the assembly. The various topics had first of all been apportioned among them, and then the articles prepared by each had been examined by the whole body, and, finally, they were submitted to the General Assembly. The points in regard to which the greatest difficulty had been felt, were those relating to the deaconship, patronage, and divorce.‡ At length, however, the work was brought to a close, and a fair copy of it was prepared to be sent to the regent, when the sudden revolution took place which deprived him of the reins of government.§ He had all along upheld the order of bishops, and desired to bring the Church of Scotland into conformity with that of England; and most probably, but for the political difficulties which cramped his efforts, and the confederacy which at length deprived him of his office, he might have been able to defeat altogether the measures of reformation which the Church were bent upon carrying forward. His extraordinary avarice impelled him to maintain the bishoprics, as the readiest means of appropriating to himself a portion of the ecclesiastical revenues; and his jealousy of the free spirit which the assembly had ever displayed, disposed him to take all means of restricting and crippling their power. It was noticed that during his whole regency he studiously shunned countenancing the assembly with his presence, although he was often requested, and sometimes repeatedly at the same meeting, to afford them the gratification of seeing him in the midst of them. It was conjectured that the readiness with which he selected Andrew Melvil, Alexander Arbuthnot, and George Hay, to proceed as the repre-

* Hetherington, p. 44.

† Spottiswood, p. 277; Row, p. 60; James Melvil's Diary, p. 59; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 371, 378; McCrie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 192.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 380, 381, 382, 399; Row, pp. 60, 61.

§ James Melvil's Diary, p. 60.

* James Melvil's Diary, p. 64; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 369.
† James Melvil's Diary, p. 68; Hetherington, p. 45;
McCrie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 196.

sentatives of Scotland to the general council convened at Magdeburg, for the establishment of the Augsburg Confession of Faith, proceeded from no special confidence in those individuals, or desire to do them honour, but from a wish to have them out of the way for a time, that he might not be thwarted in his plans. But want of means for defraying the expenses of their journey prevented them from setting out at all, and they remained at home to fight the battles of the new policy, and to oppose the schemes of the regent. Morton's avarice seems to have been stronger than even his dislike of the proposed Book of Discipline.*

A meeting of the General Assembly was held shortly after James assumed the reins of government into his own hands, at which it was agreed that the Book of Policy, already very thoroughly scrutinised, and almost unanimously adopted, should be again reviewed by Lindsay, Lawson, and Pont, and copies of it prepared to be laid before his majesty† and the council for their approbation. At the same time commissioners were appointed to confer—should conference be desired—with any commissioners whom the king and his council might nominate. At this meeting, also, the feeling of the assembly against the order of bishops was still more powerfully manifested. The assumption by them of the title of "lord bishop" was condemned, and it was enacted that they should be called by their own names, or simply brethren; and the corruptions of the state of bishops were declared to be so great, that it was determined that no bishop at all should be elected or admitted from that time till next assembly. And when next assembly came, the feeling against the episcopal order had acquired so much additional strength, that the enactment was extended to all time coming, till the order of bishop should be taken away root and branch. And with regard to existing bishops, it was required that they should submit to be reformed according to the Word of God; that they should become pastors of one flock; that they should renounce the exercise of all criminal jurisdiction; that they should be content with reasonable livings, and that they should not assume any authority over other ministers and elders.‡

When the Book of Policy was presented to the king and his council, it met with a very favourable reception from his majesty, who gave a "very comfortable" answer to the commissioners, and promised that he would do everything in his power for the advancement of true religion, as presently professed in the realm. Commissioners were also appointed by the council, who met with commissioners of the Church in Edinburgh, in June; and, after conference, they agreed to all parts of the Book of Discipline, excepting four heads, which were to be reconsidered.* It was the expectation, therefore, of the commissioners of the Church, that when the parliament met in Stirling, in July, the Book of Policy would be ratified and sanctioned; but when they attended for this purpose, and stated their desire, the lords of the articles threw obstacles in the way, alleging that the question was one of great difficulty, and would require a longer time for consideration than the parliament could afford to bestow upon it. The Bishop of St. Andrew's also affirmed that at the joint conference in Edinburgh there had only been conference and disputation, but that no conclusion whatever had been adopted. This great change in the position of the question regarding ecclesiastical policy is to be accounted for by the fact that in the meantime Morton, although no longer regent, had yet contrived, with the help of the young Earl of Mar, to regain his former power, and now possessed the chief, if not the sole direction of affairs.† The commissioners of the Church were greatly disappointed; they craved that at least all the points which had been agreed to at Edinburgh should be ratified: but this was refused. The Earl of Morton then offered that some points selected out of the Book of Policy should be established by law; but the commissioners of the Church declared that they were not empowered to accede to any such proposal. And the result was, that after various delays, commissioners were appointed by the king and his council to meet with the commissioners of the assembly, and to prepare a report on the subject of ecclesiastical polity for the next meeting of parliament.‡

During the course of these unsatisfactory proceedings at Stirling, a scene occurred in which the Bishop of St. Andrew's figured with very little honour to himself. Exposure of the Bishop of St. Andrew's. At the meeting of assembly held in April, when the Book of Ecclesiastical Policy was finally agreed upon by the brethren, Andrew Melvil and George Hay had expressed the opinion that it should be subscribed by all the brethren individually; but Adamson objected to this proposal, alleging that they had an honest man for their clerk, whose single subscription might suffice for them all, and that it would seem to throw a doubt upon his faithfulness if every man subscribed for himself. "Well," exclaimed Hay, "if any man deny this afterwards, he is not honest." And to Adamson in particular he said, "There is my hand, Mr. Patrick, if you come against this hereafter, after now so thoroughly consenting to it, I will call you a knave, be it in ever so public a place." Afterwards, at the meeting in Stirling, when the commissioners of the Church desired the ratification of the policy, Morton asked Adam-

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 387; McCrie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 194.

† Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 75.

‡ Row, pp. 62, 63; James Melvil's Diary, p. 62; Spottiswood, p. 303; Calderwood, vol. pp. 403, 432.

* The minutes of this meeting, so favourable to the Book of Policy, were afterwards torn out of the records of the Church.—(McCrie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 198.)

† Supra, vol. ii. p. 156; Row, p. 64; James Melvil's Diary, p. 76.

‡ Spottiswood, p. 259; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 415.

son if he had assented to it, when he replied that he had refused to subscribe it, insinuating that he had expressed his dissent at the time. On the first convenient opportunity that offered, Hay took Adamson by the hand, and, in the presence of witnesses who were cognizant of all the facts, he thus addressed him: "O knave, knave! I will crown thee the knave of all knaves."*

Agreeably to the appointment made at Stirling

Meeting of commissioners regarding the Book of Policy, in December.

in July, the commissioners met in December, to confer regarding the Book of Policy. There were present the Earl of Buchan, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, the Archbishop of Glasgow, the Commendator of Dunfermline, the Laird of Dun, the Laird of Seggie, the Tutor of Pitcur, George Buchanan, Peter Young, and of ministers, Lawson, Lindsay, Pont, and Row. As the appointment of this meeting had proceeded from the council alone, and the commissioners of the assembly viewed their commission as having expired in July, they protested that they met simply in consequence of missives addressed to them individually from the king, and not as having any commission from the Kirk. The meeting sat for eight days, and they examined the whole Book of Policy article by article.† Spottiswood mentions that he had in his possession the original manuscript which lay upon the table of the commissioners; and he describes in his history the marginal notations which they had made upon every separate article. Many of the principles and rules laid down in the book are described as agreed to by the meeting just as they stood. Some of them are slightly changed, mostly in the way of having a few words or some clause erased. And a very considerable number are marked as having been referred to further reasoning. Some also are described as requiring to be suppressed, and others as needing to have something else substituted in their room. The points marked in these ways, and which of course constituted the obstacle to the ratification of the Book of Policy, have reference in the main to church government, to the different kinds of office-bearers, to the patrimony of the Church, and to the power which a Christian magistrate may be permitted to exercise in the Church. Upon the whole, it was obvious from the notations of the commissioners that whatever hopes might be held out to the ministers to soothe them, the ratification of the book, which they had compiled with so much care, and which they longed so ardently to see acknowledged by the State, was not at all to be expected from the present rulers of the country.‡

And so it turned out: for under one pretext or another, the application of the Book of Policy. Church for the civil sanction of her favourite policy was always evaded. It hardly fared even so well with this scheme of ecclesiastical government, which is known under the designation of the Second Book of Discipline, as it had done with the first; for formerly, although the council did not formally sanction the document, yet not a few of them subscribed it as quite in accordance with their own views.* But now neither they nor the parliament sanctioned the book, nor yet did any number of the nobles express their approbation of its principles. There were frequent discussions both in the council and in parliament regarding it, and again and again did the assembly strenuously urge their claim that it should be ratified; but the objections to it on the part of the civil functionaries were too deep-seated to be overcome.†

From the time of Melvil's return to his native country, Beza had continued to take a deep and growing interest in the religious condition of Scotland. Having been consulted by the chancellor, Lord Glamis, a nobleman of great wisdom and integrity, with regard to some points in the Book of Policy, he wrote a treatise entitled "De triplici Episcopatu," which was translated into English, and exerted no small influence in recommending the principles of presbyterian polity. Melvil also corresponded with Beza on the subject, and his letters bring out very clearly the grounds of the keen opposition which was given to the Book of Discipline. In one letter, after expressing the persuasion that the king's own feelings were favourable to the Reformed Church and its general constitution, he says, regarding his favourites and advisers:—"They complain that, if pseudo-episcopacy be abolished, the state of the kingdom will be overturned; if presbyteries be established, the royal authority will be diminished; if the ecclesiastical goods are restored to their legitimate use, the royal treasury will be exhausted. They plead that bishops, with abbots and priors, form the third estate in parliament; that all jurisdiction, ecclesiastical as well as civil, pertains solely to the king and his council; and that all the ecclesiastical property should go into the exchequer. In many, this way of speaking and thinking may be imputed to ignorance; in more, to a flagitious life and bad morals; in almost all, to a desire of seizing such of the Church property as yet remains, and the dread of losing what they have already got into their possession. They also insist, that the sentence of excommunication shall not be held valid until it has been approved by the king's council, after taking cognizance of the cause. And they desire to have everything done by the authority of a single bishop and perpetual overseer of the churches, rather than by the common sentence of presbyters possessing equal authority."‡

Next summer, James sent a letter by the hands of John Duncanson, the minister of his household,

* Supra, vol. i. p. 694; M'Crie's Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 5; Dunlop's Collection of Confessions, vol. ii. p. 436.

† Spottiswood, p. 302; Hetherington, p. 46.

‡ Melvil, Theod. Beza; Id. November, 1579; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 397; M'Crie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. pp. 153—155, 2nd edition.

* James Melvil's Diary, p. 62; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 416.

† Spottiswood, p. 289.

‡ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 433.

to the only meeting of the assembly which was held during the course of the year. The object of this communication was to urge upon the ministers the propriety of avoiding for the present all reference to their favourite scheme of policy, and to request them to confine their attention to the ordinary business of the Church. Various considerations were set before them to overcome the reluctance which it was known they would feel to postpone a measure considered by them so indispensable. The tender age of the king, the difficulties and embarrassments of public affairs, the need of every effort on the part of all to maintain peace and quietness throughout the realm, were adduced as reasons for the delay desired by his majesty. And the hope was held out to them that ere long, should circumstances become more favourable, their wishes might be gratified. The parliament was soon to meet, and the best qualified individuals connected with it would be appointed to take the subject into serious consideration.* "Whatsoever in the former conferences touching the policy of the Kirk was remitted, to be reasoned and decided by our estates in parliament, let it so rest, without prejudging the same by any of your conclusions at this time, seeing our parliament so shortly now approacheth, and that we are well pleased and content that before the same such matters as are not yet fully reasoned may be consulted upon, and prepared to pass in form of laws. And the meetest for that work shall be expressly employed, to the end that things conferred upon and agreed may be presented to our estates, to be approved in our parliament, and duly carried into effect, for the advancement of true religion, and the comfort of the members of the Kirk in our realm."†

The letter of his majesty engaged the serious

Reply of the assembly to his majesty's communication. attention of the assembly; and the effect of it was to prevent them from taking any very decided step with regard to the Book of Policy.

They appointed commissioners, partly barons and partly ministers, to convene wherever the parliament should be held, for the purpose of presenting such articles and heads as they should consider suitable for the maintenance of God's glory and policy in the Kirk, and to crave with all humility and earnestness the ratification of the same. And they transmitted a written supplication to his majesty in the shape of a reply to his letter, in which they expressed their gratitude to God for his bountiful goodness towards the king and the realm in favouring them with the universal preaching of true doctrine; and then they urged upon him the duty of prosecuting to perfection the Reformation so auspiciously begun, by the establishment of a meet policy in the Kirk of God, not taken out of the cisterns of human traditions, but from the pure fountain of God's holy Word. That there were great difficulties in the way they allowed, but they reminded his majesty of the impediments which Zerubbabel and the Jews had to encounter in rebuilding the Temple of Jerusalem. And other examples they adduced, both from the Scriptures and from ecclesiastical history, of fervent faith and earnest zeal on the part of rulers and princes in carrying forward important reformations in the Church of God. And, in fine, they assured his majesty that the promotion of God's glory, and the establishment of true religion, would bring to him exceeding honour and perpetual renown. "All other glory at last shall decay, and all commendation that resulteth from other princely acts either is not of long endurance, or hath commonly mixed with it such things as be also worthy of blame. But the honour of this act shall endure for ever, and shall be fully approved by him whose judgment cannot be but equal and right who is the eternal Lord of lords and King of kings, whom with most humble hearts and instant prayers we beseech to bless your majesty with continual and daily increase of his abundant blessings, as well spiritual as temporal, and to maintain in wealthy prosperity your princely state, to the praise and glory of his holy name, your assured salvation, comfort, and quietness of this country, the overthrow of the power of Satan, and advancement of the kingdom of Jesus Christ."*

Not unfrequently the king, with advice of his secret council, had issued letters ^{Other proceedings of the assembly.} designed to arrest the execution of the acts of the General Assembly, and had summoned ministers before him, to answer for sentences of excommunication pronounced by them according to the rules of the Church. This practice the assembly considered as an unwarrantable encroachment upon their rights, and, therefore, whilst complaining of the injustice which they had already sustained, they craved that the civil power would never again suspend the execution of acts and sentences of the ecclesiastical courts. They also renewed the powers of the commissioners appointed to deal with Patrick Adamson for his conduct in regard to the bishopric of St. Andrew's; and further they authorised them to charge him with other offences, such as voting in parliament after having submitted to the assembly, and opposing the Book of Policy in the legislature after having agreed to it, along with his brethren, in the church courts in all points but four.† The written acquiescence of James Boyd, Archbishop of Glasgow, in the proceedings of the assembly for the reformation of the episcopal order, was presented to this meeting. In his letter he declared that, according to the duty of all faithful pastors, he submitted himself in all points.‡ Spottiswood says that his submission was not at all a voluntary act—that he was constrained to it by the

* Row, p. 66.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 443, 444: Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 186.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 456; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 190.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 444, 447, 470.

‡ Spottiswood, p. 303.

harsh procedure of Andrew Melvil; and that he was so much affected by this and another injury which he sustained about the same time from the hands of a cousin of his own, viz., the demolition of the House of Lockwood, that he fell into a state of mental depression, of which, not long afterwards, he died at Glasgow.

The charge of ingratitude brought against Melvil for his procedure in this case is Unreasonable-ness of the charge brought against Melvil. exceedingly unreasonable. It is quite true that the Bishop of Glasgow took a leading part in bringing Melvil to Glasgow, and placing him in the situation of principal of the college. But it does not follow from this that Melvil was bound to regulate his procedure as a member of the church courts in accordance with the views of the bishop, however different his own convictions might be. Such an idea would be destructive of all independence of mind, and would render it impossible for one man to accept a situation offered to him through the instrumentality of another. In no walk of life ought a patron, or superior, or employer, or landlord, to be viewed as acquiring a right to control the conduct of the individual whom he selects; and the mere fact that the refusal to acknowledge such a right should in any case be converted into a charge of ingratitude, manifests an utter perversion of view as to the obligations connected with such relationships. Besides, it must be remembered that when Melvil came to Glasgow the obligation was not regarded as lying upon his side, but altogether upon the side of those to whose entreaties he yielded: there was earnest suit made for him from different parts of the country, and when he decided on going to Glasgow, he was acknowledged to be doing a great favour to his friends in that quarter, and proportionable disappointment was felt in the other places which had sued for his services. It is quite ridiculous, therefore, to denounce him as an ungrateful man, because he followed his own judgment, and not the judgment of the Bishop of Glasgow, in the course which he pursued as a member of the General Assembly. Besides, it is plain from the records of the Church, that Melvil was not the person entrusted with the task of procuring Boyd's subscription to the act of assembly passed at Stirling in 1578: this duty was devolved upon David Weemes, minister in Glasgow. And, further, the bishop lived two full years after the time when Melvil is alleged to have given him his death-blow; and he acted, too, under the authority of the General Assembly, as commissioner of Carrick, and also as one of a committee appointed to present articles to the king.*

Any expectations which the king's letter to the assembly in July, 1579, might have excited of the ratification by civil authority of the Book of Policy, were doomed to disappointment.† The parliament satisfied themselves with passing acts to the effect that those persons only were members of the Church of Scotland who professed the doctrine contained in the Confession of Faith; and they described the jurisdiction of the Church as consisting in the preaching of the Word, the ministration of the sacraments, and the correction of manners. The repeated disappointments which they had thus experienced through the continued evasion of their demands by the king and his council, impelled the Church to take a more decisive step than they had ever yet done. At the meeting of assembly held in Dundee in the summer of 1580, they declared that the episcopal function, as it was then commonly understood, had no sure warrant, authority, or ground in the Word of God; and, therefore, with one voice, they passed an act abolishing the office in the Kirk of Scotland, and charging all those persons who held it, to demit at once, and to desist, under pain of excommunication, from all ministerial duties, until they were admitted anew by the General Assembly.* This bold and sweeping measure was adopted by the assembly with perfect unanimity; not one individual,—although liberty was given to all to express their views,—lifting up his voice in defence of the episcopal office. As the doctrine of the Book of Policy regarding bishops was one of the parts of it which were most obnoxious to the court, this step of the assembly very plainly intimated that they were determined, whether with or without civil ratification, to pursue their own course. They also condemned the practice which had been introduced of appointing one minister to take charge of several congregations, as tending to the overthrow of all discipline and good order, and the deprivation of the souls of men of their true food; and they ordained that every several congregation should be provided with a minister of its own. And as the change made by Morton during his regency in the mode of collecting the thirds had been the chief cause of the existing pluralities, they complained to his majesty of the grievous hurt which the Church had sustained from that proceeding, and supplicated that the original act of parliament made with reference to the thirds might be again brought into operation; and they suggested that if all unnecessary pensions were revoked, there would still be a sufficient surplus accruing to his majesty from the thirds. Nor was the favourite Book of Policy forgotten by them; an earnest request was made that it might be established by an act of the privy council, until another parliament should be held, which might sanction and confirm it with due solemnity.

Decisive steps taken by the assembly.

The General Assembly was in all respects a court of popular constitution, in which Popular constitution of the assembly. entire freedom of debate prevailed. The jealousy entertained by the members of everything like even a seeming en-

* Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 445, 446; M'Crie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 140; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 190.
† Spottiswood, p. 302.

* Row, p. 71; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 194; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 471; James Melvil's Diary, p. 80.

croachment upon their liberty was manifested on this occasion. It had been the practice from the time of the moderatorship of Arbuthnot, Principal of Aberdeen College, to appoint certain individuals, who were denominated assessors, to confer with the moderator in regard to the business of the assembly. It was feared by some that these assessors, in conjunction with the moderator, might contrive to exert too great a control over the affairs of the Church, and that thus in the end some species of tyranny or usurpation might be established, and the liberty of the members impaired. This feeling was expressed both at the meeting in July and October; but when the point was canvassed, the fear was judged to be visionary, and the assembly determined to continue the practice of appointing assessors, on account of the great advantages which attended it. Perfect freedom of debate is of the highest importance to church courts, and even a somewhat morbid jealousy of whatever might threaten to enroach upon it, may be pardoned.* And it is a fact that afterwards this very practice of appointing assessors, though attended with a preponderance of benefit for a time, was so perverted as seriously to infringe upon the liberties of the Church.†

Melvil had now occupied the place of principal in the university of Glasgow for about six years, with great honour to himself and signal benefit to the institution. He had introduced quite a new style of teaching, and had very much extended the range of subjects brought under the notice of the students. At this time the assembly, having succeeded in procuring the assent of parliament to a scheme for the reformation of the University of St. Andrew's, fixed their eyes upon Melvil as the individual best qualified to carry the scheme into effect, and they ordained, with the approbation and concurrence of his majesty, that he should remove from Glasgow to St. Andrew's, and take with him such individuals as he considered best qualified to co-operate with him in founding a theological school. Melvil was exceedingly averse to leave Glasgow, where the work of tuition, to which he was enthusiastically devoted, was prospering so much in his hands; but he submitted to the decision of the assembly, and removed to St. Andrew's in the beginning of winter, taking James Melvil, his nephew, along with him.‡ He was succeeded at Glasgow by Thomas Smeton, minister of Paisley, a man of great learning and excellence, and of a most amiable disposition. Not a few were doubtful of the propriety of transferring a minister from the charge of a congregation to the exercise of the doctoral office in a university; but the assembly decided that, for the weal and universal profit of the Church of God in the realm, the translation might take place, and, agreeably to the king's letter of appointment, they allowed Smeton to relinquish his pastoral duties.*

Hitherto the Presbyterian scheme of Church government had not fully developed itself in Scotland. There was a General Assembly, which was the first court organised for the transaction of business. There were also elderships in the several congregations, which had been brought into operation by the assembly's authority. And there were synodal conventions, which had been instituted at a still later period, comprehending large districts of country. But there were not yet any properly organised presbyteries: the rudiments of them existed in the chapters of dioceses, and in the exercises or weekly meetings of the ministers and elders of neighbouring parishes. At the meeting of 1579, the assembly had said, in answer to a question from the Synod of Lothian, "the exercise might be judged a presbytery." This year, in consequence of the assumption of the office of visitors by some individuals without authority, the assembly considering this a corruption tending to tyranny, and holding that such power should flow from a presbytery, appointed a committee to devise a "platt of presbyteries" applicable to the whole country, and to prepare a report against their next meeting.†

Much dissatisfaction prevailed in the country at this time in consequence of the influence which two favourites, Monsieur D'Aubigny, created Earl of Lennox, and Captain James Stewart, created Earl of Arran, had acquired over the mind of the king. Lennox was a Romanist, and the idea, first entertained by a few, at length took complete possession of the public mind, that he was an agent of the Duke of Guise, and of the Pope, sent over for the purpose of perverting the mind of the king, and thus accomplishing the overthrow of the Reformed Church. Many circumstances lent a high colour of probability to this supposition, and the minds of men became every day more excited, until something like a panic seized the nation. The pulpits resounded with denunciations of popery, and the conduct of the king in lavishing so many favours upon foreigners and Papists was loudly condemned.‡

With the view of calming the public excitement, the king sent for the ministers of Edinburgh, and told them of the exertions which he had been making for the conversion of his cousin, the Earl of Lennox, and of the consent which he had obtained from him to admit a Protestant minister into his house to instruct him. With the approbation of the king, Lindsay, minister of Leith, a man well skilled in the French tongue, and on whose mode-

Preparation to institute presbyteries.

Dissatisfaction felt at the influence possessed by the king's favourites.

Origin of the National Covenant.

* Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 162.

† Biographia Britannica, vol. i. p. 236; Mc'Crie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 136.

‡ James Melvil's Diary, p. 83; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 476.

* Book of Universal Kirk, p. 195; Register of Privy Seal, vol. xlvii. fol. 61.

† Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 192; Hetherington, p. 47; Scott's Apologetical Narration, p. 46.

‡ Supra, vol. ii. p. 163; Spottiswood, p. 308.

ration and wisdom dependance could be placed, was appointed to this delicate office; and after a few weeks Lennox declared that he was convinced, made a profession of the Reformed faith, and openly, in the Church of St. Giles, renounced the errors of popery. This procedure on the part of Lennox, although his sincerity was suspected at the time, was probably the result of conviction, for he avowed himself a Protestant at his death; and it might have had the effect of completely allaying the excitement of the public mind, but for the fact that immediately afterwards certain dispensations from Rome were intercepted, by which Roman Catholics were allowed to promise, swear, subscribe, and do whatever else might be required of them, provided that in heart they continued firm, and did what they could secretly to advance the interests of the Romish faith.* These dispensations, which manifested an utter disregard of the most common principles of morality, and tended to the complete subversion of all confidence between men of different religious persuasions, fanned the flame of popular excitement and jealousy to an intenser heat than before; and the state of the public mind became such that the king saw something must be done immediately, in order to avert the alarming consequences which everything portended as likely to ensue. With this view he caused Mr. John Craig, whom he had nominated to be his minister, to draw up a Confession of Faith, abjuring all the corruptions of Rome, whether relating to doctrine or rites; and containing a clause by which the subscribers called God to witness that in their minds and hearts they agreed to the confession, and did not feign or dissemble in any sort. This confession was commonly called the King's Confession; it was also designated Craig's Confession; and, in the end, it came to be known by the name of the First National Covenant of Scotland. It is drawn up in the form of an oath. First of all belief is avowed in the true Christian doctrine, as expressed in the Confession of Faith of the Church of Scotland; then follows a long enumeration of the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome, which the subscribers declare they condemn and detest; then, with special reference to the dispensations which had come from Rome, the subscribers, disavowing all double dealing, call the searcher of hearts to witness that their minds and hearts do fully agree with their confession, promise, oath, and subscription, as now made and given; and, finally, the subscribers, recognising his majesty as God's instrument for the maintenance of the Church and for the ministration of justice, protest, and promise, and swear, to defend his person and authority with their gear, bodies, and lives, against all enemies at home or abroad.†

This covenant was subscribed at Edinburgh on the 28th January, 1581, by the king and all his household, and an order was issued for a universal subscription of it throughout the realm. The General Assembly, too, at their very next meeting, stamped upon it the seal of their approbation, and described it as a Christian, true, and sound confession.* And they enacted that measures should be taken for promoting the subscription of it in every parish.

The same desire to allay existing dissatisfactions, which led the king to originate and enforce the confession which went under his name, prompted him also to send a commissioner to the assembly, viz., the Laird of Caprington, with instructions regarding a point which had been under the consideration of the assembly at their previous meeting. His majesty declared that, with the advice of his council, and of ministers with whom he had conferred on the subject, he had caused a scheme to be prepared for the constitution of elderships or presbyteries, to bear rule over a number of parishes lying together; and he requested the assembly to take the matter into consideration, as it was calculated to effect a great improvement in the mode of exercising ecclesiastical discipline over all the realm. To this desire of the king the assembly heartily responded, praising God who had moved his heart to take such an interest in the Church. Accordingly, a number of individuals, who were best acquainted with the geographical features of the country, were appointed to consider the rolls presented by the king's commissioners; and, on the ground of the report prepared by them, it was decided that presbyteries should be immediately established in a number of places, each comprehending from twelve to twenty-four churches. The first seats of presbyteries were Edinburgh, St. Andrew's, Dundee, Perth, Stirling, Glasgow, Ayr, Irvine, Haddington, Dunbar, Chirnside, Linlithgow, Dunfermline; and others were to be constituted from time to time as experience dictated.†

Although these proceedings seemed to indicate a very favourable disposition on the part of the king towards the Church, yet there were other parts of his conduct which did not afford the same satisfaction to the assembly. Their claim in regard to the thirds he set aside, on the alleged and somewhat dubious ground that what they desired would neither prove so advantageous to themselves as they imagined, nor so productive of revenue to the sovereign for the common charges of government. And with regard to the Book of Policy, on which the affections of the assembly were so strongly concentrated, it was merely said that further conference would take place with the view of its being set forward and prepared for ratification.

Covenant subscribed by the king and his court, and approved by the assembly.

Some presbyteries constituted.

Book of Policy finally sanctioned by the assembly.

* Strype's Annals, vol. ii. pp. 630, 631.

† Supra, vol. ii. p. 163; Spottiswood, p. 308; Row, pp. 68, 73; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 50; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 67; Hetherington, p. 47.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 526; Scott's Apologetical Narration, p. 46.

† Scott's Apologetical Narration, p. 48; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 523.

The truth is, the king was not at all disposed to relinquish episcopacy. He was willing that the assembly should have elderships or presbyteries; but he seems to have hoped that his concession of this point to them, would lead them to recede from the opposition which they were giving to the existence of bishops. Their views, however, were quite decided; and therefore they resolved, as they saw no certain prospect of obtaining a civil sanction to their beloved scheme of policy, to express their own entire approbation of it, and thus to give it all the sanction which it was in their power to impart. "Forasmuch as travels have been taken in framing the policy of the Kirk, and divers suits have been made to the magistrate for approbation thereof, which albeit yet have not taken the happy effect which good men would wish, yet, that posterity may judge well of the present age, and of the meaning of this Kirk, the assembly hath concluded that the Book of Policy, agreed to in divers assemblies before, shall be registered in the acts of assembly, and remain therein 'ad perpetuam rei memoriam,' and copies of it shall be taken by every presbytery."*

The scheme of policy thus sanctioned by the General Assembly, though not by the State, and known under the designation of the Second Book of Discipline, was the result of much thought and of long protracted labours. James Melvil mentions in his Diary that every sentence of it was agreed to almost unanimously; there was no such thing as carrying any point by a mere plurality of votes. In proportion as any principle was found to be difficult, conference regarding it was prolonged, and prayer presented to God for direction; and finally, with one voice, with consent and unity of mind, a conclusion regarding it was adopted. It contained, therefore, a most correct exhibition of what was the mind of the whole Church at the period of its composition.†

The Second Book of Discipline was a far more thoroughly digested production than the first; more compact in its structure, and more precise in its definitions. The presbyterian scheme of ecclesiastical government is more fully developed in it, and scriptural authority is more decidedly claimed for it. A line of distinction is first drawn between civil and ecclesiastical power. As ministers are subject to the judgment and punishment of the magistrate in external things, if they offend; so ought the magistrates to submit themselves to the discipline of the Kirk, if they transgress in matters of conscience and religion. The government of the Church consists in three things—doctrine, discipline, and distribution; corresponding to which are three different kinds of office-bearers—preachers, rulers, and deacons. The bishop, as a pastor of pastors, is not recognised: bishop and pastor are one and the same, and spiritual oversight of a single congregation is the function belonging to all who hold this office. The doctor is distinguished from the pastor, his office being, either in congregations, or schools, or colleges, or universities, to expound the Word of God, and to explain what is difficult, without those practical applications which more especially belong to the pastor. Elders are the spiritual rulers of the Church, and the name includes both those who labour in word and doctrine, and those also who merely rule. "As the pastors and doctors should be diligent in teaching and sowing the seed of the Word, so the elders should be careful in seeking the fruits of the same among the people."* Deacons are office-bearers whose duty it is to receive and distribute the ecclesiastical goods; and in the discharge of their functions they must be guided by the judgment of the presbyteries or elderships. And all these office-bearers ought to be appointed by election and ordination, and in no case whatever should a person be intruded into any office contrary to the will of the congregation among whom he is to act or labour.

The church courts recognised by the Second Book of Discipline are the General Assembly, composed of representatives from all parts of the country; provincial synods, having authority over large districts; and presbyteries, comprehending a number of neighbouring parishes. From the lower of these courts cases, after being examined and decided, might be carried by appeal to the higher, till they reached the General Assembly, whose judgment was to be final. It is worthy of remark that the same definite distinction is not made between sessions and presbyteries, which is now universally recognised among Presbyterians. It was not considered necessary that each particular congregation, especially in landward districts, should have an eldership for its own government: it was conceived to be better that two, or three, or four particular churches should have a common eldership to superintend them jointly, and some of these elders were to be chosen from each church.†

The distinction between civil and ecclesiastical authority was drawn pretty accurately in the main, although there were some duties assigned to the magistrate which no man now conceives to belong to him, and others which very many in our times are persuaded lie quite out of his province. Not only was it declared to be his duty to prevent the Church from being invaded by false teachers and hirelings, but it was also conceived to be incumbent upon him to maintain the discipline of the Church, and to punish civilly those who refused to submit to its censures.‡

The conduct of the assembly, in proceeding to express their own final approbation of the Second

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 526; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 218; Spottiswood, p. 302; Hetherington, p. 47.

† James Melvil's Diary, pp. 77, 78; McCrie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 136.

* Spottiswood, p. 294.

† McCrie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 121.

‡ Spottiswood, p. 298.

Book of Discipline, and to enrol it in their records, while the king was still desirous that further conference should take place in regard to it between commissioners representing both parties, seems to have had the effect of widening the breach between his majesty and the Church. There was reason to believe that his late display of zeal against popery had been mainly occasioned by the wide-spread dissatisfaction which he saw was felt with the countenance he had shown to Romanists. And there were many whose fears suggested to them that, in conjunction with these Romanists, he was planning the overthrow of the Reformed Church. These were probably exaggerated alarms. Certain it was, however, that he and his ministers and favourites all disrelieved the constitution of the existing Church in Scotland, and were desirous of making it thoroughly episcopal; and the recent procedure of the assembly made them more determined than ever to accomplish their purpose. The assembly, however, who were quite aware of the opposition they had to expect, were equally determined to maintain the principles which they had established; and thus a conflict ensued between episcopacy and presbytery, which threatened to be obstinate and protracted. Lennox and Arran employed every art to impress upon the king's mind the idea that such a scheme of ecclesiastical government as the ministers were setting up, was utterly inconsistent with the authority which should exist in a pure monarchy; and the ministers, on the other hand, were not only persuaded that their policy was grounded in Scripture, but they were also stimulated to more than ordinary exertion in its defence by the growing conviction that the Reformed faith itself was in danger of being overthrown, to make room for popery.*

An occasion soon occurred for the commencement of hostilities between the supporters of the two systems of church government. At the death of Boyd, Archbishop of Glasgow, who had been for some time afflicted with mental depression, Lennox, whose influence over the king gave him almost unlimited power in the disposal of patronage, conceived the idea of appropriating to himself the revenues of the bishopric of Glasgow. With this view he made offer of the bishopric to sundry individuals, on the understanding that he himself was to enjoy the bulk of the revenues; but the offer was declined, as contrary to the regulations of the General Assembly. At length the emissaries of Lennox came in contact with Robert Montgomery, and contrived to form an engagement with him, the bargain being this—that as soon as he was admitted bishop, he should dispose the lands, lordships, and whatsoever belonged to the prelaey, to the duke and his heirs, for the yearly payment of one thousand pounds Scots, with some horse-corn, and poultry. And what made the case more flagrant, was the fact that this same Robert Montgomery had been so exceedingly zealous in support of the Book of Policy, that he had proposed to the assembly to censure upon the spot all who spoke in defence of the corrupted order of bishops. Hardly anything more base could be imagined. Even Spottiswood censures the conduct of Montgomery as vile, and such as merited opposition from the ecclesiastical authorities.*

Proceedings were raised against Montgomery in the assembly which met in October. The grand charge against him was, that he had accepted the office of bishop, and made a simoniacal paction with the patron; but as the king refused to permit the mere acceptance of a bishopric to be treated as a fault, an accusation was drawn up touching his doctrine and life, on the consideration of which his majesty was quite willing that the assembly should enter.† At the close of the meeting the case was committed for trial to the presbytery of Stirling, with full power to hear and examine accusations; and Montgomery was charged, under pain of excommunication, to abstain from all attempts at securing the bishopric, and thus embroiling the Church in discord and confusion.‡ Supported, however, by the king and Lennox, and the council, he set the threat at defiance. Nay, he even made a violent attempt, in the month of March, aided by a number of the royal guards, to expel the minister from the pulpit of the church in Glasgow, and to take possession of it himself.§ The presbytery, resisting this forcible measure, were summoned to appear before the council at Stirling, in April, where also the synod of Lothian were cited in the same cause. An humble request was presented by the ministers to his majesty that he would not interfere with the Church in the execution of her own discipline; but at the same time they protested that they would perform their duty to the uttermost, and obey God rather than man. When summoned into the presence of the council they declined, as had been previously agreed at a consultation of brethren, to acknowledge the king's right to judge in such a case; but they were willing that his majesty, or any of his council, should hear the whole matter "extra judicium." Being dismissed for a little, they were not called in again, which led some of the brethren to fear that their departure might appear a desertion of the cause. Durie and Davidson were therefore sent to the clerk of council, to procure a copy of the declinature which had been presented by Pont. But the clerk denied that any such thing had been mentioned. When Davidson, however, declared that they would vindicate their conduct from the pulpit, where they had God's commission

* Spottiswood, p. 316; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 104; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 677; Scett's Apologetical Narration, p. 49.

† Spottiswood, p. 316.

‡ Row, p. 89.

§ Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 695; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 109.

* Tytler, vol. viii. p. 103; McCrie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 175.

to speak, and would publish their wrongs to the world, the document was produced, and an extract of it given to them.*

The ease was again brought under the consideration of the assembly in April. The country was in a state of high excitement, both on account of Montgomery's ease, and also because it was known that a number of Romish priests had arrived. It was rumoured, too, that plans were on foot by which the king was to resign the crown to his mother, and then to receive it from her again—the object of this manœuvre being to destroy the validity of all that had been done for the Reformed faith. Decided measures were therefore resolved upon by the assembly against Montgomery, and they proceeded to carry them into effect, although a messenger-at-arms entered the house, and commanded the assembly to desist from their proceedings. The assembly, however, were determined to pronounce sentence of excommunication by the mouth of their moderator.† Montgomery himself became alarmed when he saw the resolution of the meeting, and, after conference with brethren appointed to meet with him, he expressed himself willing to submit to the authority of the Church. Soon, however, through the influence exerted over him by Lennox, he resumed his attitude of defiance, and, in spite of his suspension, preached as usual. He raised legal proceedings against the assembly, with the view of nullifying what they had done in his case. In these circumstances, the flame of excitement was stirred up to an intenser heat than ever. John Durie boldly sounded the note of alarm in the pulpit, and denounced Lennox and Arran as abusers of the king, with all that bold and fiery eloquence for which he was so remarkable, which so excited the king against him that he was immediately summoned before the council, and banished from Edinburgh. The presbytery of Glasgow, too, when met in obedience to the instruction of the assembly to give a decree against Montgomery, were commanded to desist; and when they refused, their moderator was dragged from the chair, smitten upon the face, so that one of his teeth was driven out, and then he was lodged for some days in prison. Despite all opposition, however, the presbytery carried out their purpose, and transmitted the requisite document to Edinburgh; on the reception of which the presbytery of Edinburgh—as enjoined by act of assembly—appointed John Davidson, a man of such ardent and fearless courage that he was styled by Lennox “a little devil,” to pronounce the sentence of excommunication in the church of Liberton, of which he was minister. This duty Davidson performed on the Lord's-day following, which was the 10th June. A proclamation was immediately issued by the council, declaring this excommunication null and void, and the civil and ecclesiastical authorities were thus brought into direct collision.*

The ministers of the Church were not slow to muster their hosts to the battle. An extraordinary meeting of the General Assembly was summoned at Edinburgh on the 27th of June, at which Andrew Melvil, moderator of the preceding meeting, was appointed still to preside. In his opening discourse, he entered at once upon the consideration of the present position of the Church and nation. The bloody gully,† he declared, of absolute power was whetted for their destruction; and the object of their tyrannical oppressors was to pull the crown from Christ's head, and to wrench the sceptre out of his hands. A scheme had been formed for the demission of the crown to Mary, and the purpose of this measure was to render invalid all that had been done against popery, and to prepare the way for the restoration of that idolatrous system. The leading agents in this scheme were Beaton, Roman Catholic Bishop of Glasgow, and Lesley, Bishop of Ross. Had not Lesley written to the imprisoned queen, explaining their plans to her by means of a painting which exhibited a boy sitting at her feet, and receiving counsels from her to follow the example of his ancestors in religion and conduct? “This,” exclaimed he, “will be called meddling with civil affairs, but these things tend to the wreck of religion, and therefore I rehearse them.”‡

The first topic that came before the assembly was the banishment of Durie from Edinburgh; and the question was raised, in consequence of an application from himself for advice, whether he was bound to submit to the sentence of the king's council, so manifestly unjust. Great warmth prevailed in the meeting; and Davidson utterly objected to the proposal of even asking the king to repon a minister of Christ. But the assembly took a more moderate view of the subject, and decided that it was Durie's duty to leave Edinburgh for the present, though they expressed their perfect satisfaction with his doctrine and life, as sound and wholesome, upright and honest, and gave him licence to preach the Gospel wherever God in his providence might afford him opportunity. At the same time they forbade the presbytery of Edinburgh to declare Durie's pulpit vacant, or to take any measures for admitting another into his place, as any election would be considered null and void.

The main business of the assembly was at length taken up. A document was prepared containing a list of grievances, of which the assembly sought redress. They complained that his majesty, by the advice of evil counsellors, had

Meeting of the General Assembly.

Consideration of Durie's banishment.

Redress of grievances sought from the king.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 597; Records of Privy Council, April 12, 1582.

† Calderwood, vol. viii. pp. 601, 605, 611; James Melvil's Diary, p. 118.

* Spottiswood, p. 320; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 114; Calderwood, vol. iii. pp. 622, 631; Hetherington, p. 49; Book of the Universal Kirk, p. 256.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 622; Tytler, vol. viii. pp. 114, 115; M'Crie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 181.

usurped the spiritual power and authority which properly belonged to Christ, the only king and head of the Church, and that thus they were threatened with the erection of a new popedom in the person of the king. And in proof of the justice of what they said, and as examples of unwarrantable encroachment upon the spiritual domain, they mentioned the bestowment of benefices upon unworthy persons without the Church's admission; the prohibition of presbyteries, synods, and the General Assembly, from administering the discipline of the Church; the banishment of John Durie from his flock; countenance given to excommunicated persons; the disannulling by the council of the sentence of excommunication pronounced upon Robert Montgomery; the violent expulsion of the moderator of the Glasgow presbytery from his chair; the ejection of the minister of Glasgow from his pulpit on the very day of the communion by one of the king's guard; the imprisonment of a church officer for delivering letters entrusted to him by his ecclesiastical superiors, and a variety of other points. And the document concluded with beseeching his majesty most humbly, for the love of God, who had placed him upon his royal throne, and had hitherto wonderfully maintained and defended his authority, carefully to look upon these matters as became the lieutenant of God and a Christian king; and with the advice of men that feared God and tendered his grace's estate and the quietness of the realm, so to redress their grievances, that Christ above all might be acknowledged, his messengers without fear suffered to execute their office, the course of the Gospel advanced, and wrong-doers deterred from injuring the ministers and professors of God's Word.*

A deputation, consisting of the Moderator, Erskine of Dun, the ministers of the king's house, Robert Pont, James Lawson, Thomas Smeton, David Lindsay, George Hay, Andrew Polwart, Peter Blackburn, Patrick Galloway, William Christison, James Melvil, Thomas Buchanan, Patrick Gillespie, John Porterfield, David Ferguson, and John Brand,† was appointed to proceed to Perth, and present these grievances of the Church to his majesty, at a meeting of the nobility to be held on the 6th of July. On their way to Perth, the deputation received not a few intimations of the dangerous nature of the service on which they were embarking. Sir James Melvil, after they reached the place of their destination, counselled his relative, Andrew Melvil, to depart at once from the town. But Andrew replied that he had no fear, and that come what would, their commission should be executed. When they were admitted into the royal presence, they read the remonstrance, and laid it upon the table. Arran immediately snatched up the document, and, with a furious countenance, exclaimed, "Who dare subscribe those treasonable articles?" Andrew Melvil at once stepped forward, and said, "We dare, and will subscribe them; and we will surrender our lives in the cause!" and, seizing a pen, he affixed his name to the document, and all the rest of the deputation followed his example. This intrepidity at once calmed the fury of Arran, the king remained silent, Lennox spoke in a conciliatory tone, and the ministers were dismissed in peace.*

The conflict, however, did not terminate here. During the brief interval between the meeting of assembly and the arrival of the deputation at Perth, Montgomery had been openly proclaimed at the Cross of Edinburgh, as Bishop of Glasgow, and his excommunication declared null and void. And, in like manner, after the protest of the Assembly was laid before the Council with so much intrepidity by the deputies, he appeared immediately in Edinburgh, with the determination of still maintaining his title to the bishopric. His presence in the city excited very great dissatisfaction, and he was commanded by the magistrates to depart. But he was hardly gone, when a proclamation was made at the Cross, declaring him to be a good Christian and a true subject, and charging all men to receive him as such, notwithstanding his pretended excommunication; and, accordingly, he at once returned. This was considered as an encroachment upon the privileges of the town, and a large meeting of merchants and craftsmen was held next day, along with the civic authorities, with the view of obliging him to depart; and the provost and magistrates accordingly decided that he should be expelled. Arran, sitting at the time in judgment with the lords of session, made an effort in his favour; but the lords declared that the measure he proposed was contrary to law. Montgomery was obliged therefore to retire; and so strong was the public indignation against him, that the provost, with the view of consulting his safety, sent him away by a private road, and he took refuge in Dalkeith.†

Lennox was exceedingly enraged at these proceedings, and being determined to Displeasure of take vengeance upon their authors, Lennox. he procured authority from the king for holding a chamberlain's ayre, or court, on the 27th of August, for the purpose of inquiring into the late seditions at Edinburgh. And there can be little doubt that a heavy blow would have descended upon all who were in any way implicated in those transactions. But a sudden revolution took place, known by the name of the "Raid of Ruthven," which completely altered the position of affairs.‡ Lennox, lately so powerful, was obliged to leave the country, and passing through England, he retired to France; and Arran was debarred from all intercourse with the king. A proclamation was put forth by the lords concerned

* Book of the Universal Kirk, pp. 256, 257; Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 630; McCrie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. p. 182.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 627; Book of Universal Kirk, p. 255; Tytler, vol. viii. p. 118.

* Tytler, vol. viii. p. 118.

† Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 635.

‡ Supra, vol. ii. p. 178.

in this remarkable enterprise, in which they justified the measures they had taken, on the ground of the tyranny and oppression practised by Lennox and Arran; the efforts which they had made to mislead and corrupt the king; the dangers to which their proceedings had exposed religion, and their interference with ministers of the Gospel in the discharge of their spiritual functions. "Finding ourselves in continual danger, and hourly looking for execution of the cruelties intended against us, we thought nothing better than to repair to his majesty, and remain beside him, removing the chief and principal authors of these enormities, until the truth be manifested to his highness and the estates; and that by common advice such speedy and substantial remedies may be provided, so that ministers of God's true religion may exercise their functions, as well in the free dispensation of the Word as in the administration of the sacraments, and the use of ecclesiastical censures and discipline."*

When the General Assembly met in October, a Meeting of the General Assembly. commissioner appeared before them from the lords connected with the Raid of Ruthven, to explain the grounds upon which they had proceeded, and the objects they had in view, to obtain an expression of the assembly's approbation of their conduct, and to request that every minister might be enjoined to declare to his own flock the reasons of what they had done. Nothing could more plainly testify the great influence which the Reformed Church was known to possess in the country. The assembly, while they declared that they were not ignorant of the dangers to which religion had been exposed, yet considered it prudent, before expressing any opinion as to the conduct of the lords, to send a deputation to the king himself. Lindsay, Lawson, and the king's own ministers, were appointed to confer with his highness; and they reported that he acknowledged the peril with which religion had been threatened, and the indirect measures which had been employed to the detriment of it. He also acknowledged that there had been abuses in the commonwealth before the late enterprise of the nobility; and he considered that all good men ought to concur in averting danger from the Kirk, his person, estate, and in reforming the common weal.

When these sentiments of his majesty were reported to the assembly, they passed a resolution expressing approbation of the object which the lords had aimed at, and of the course which they had pursued for its attainment. This resolution embodied an account of the application made to them by the lords, and also detailed the reply which the king had given to the deputies sent to consult with him; and it concluded with appointing that all ministers should bring the subject before their congregations, with the view of explaining the grounds of the late enterprise, and justifying the steps which had been taken, as tending to effect the deliverance of the Church and the reformation of the commonwealth from abuses.*

For a considerable period after the Raid of Ruthven the Church enjoyed comparative peace. The king seemed to acquiesce heartily in the presbyterian government which had been set up, and to have abandoned the idea of attempting any innovations upon it. The ministers were highly gratified, and felt and expressed much thankfulness to his majesty; and they prosecuted the great ends of their calling with assiduity and faithfulness, undisturbed by outward dangers or internal commotions.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 664.

* Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 679; Hetherington, p. 50.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

LITERARY HISTORY OF THE PERIOD.

THE honour of having been the first Scotsman who wrote the Latin language fluently, if not elegantly, belongs to HECTOR BOYCE, or BOECE, who was born at Dundee about the year 1465. He received the first rudiments of learning in his native town, and completed his education in the University of Paris. He was appointed a professor of philosophy in the College of Montaigu, where he gained the friendship of the celebrated Erasmus. On the establishment of King's College, Aberdeen, he was induced to resign his academical appointment, and to become principal of the new seminary. He was also appointed Canon of Aberdeen and Rector of Tyrie, in the same county; and in 1527, the year of the publication of his history, James V. bestowed upon him a pension of fifty pounds, which apparently was doubled two years later. In 1528, the magistrates of Aberdeen voted him a present of a ton of wine when the new wines should arrive, or, according to his option, the sum of twenty pounds Scots, "to help to buy him bonnets."

The earliest publication of Boece, the "Lives of the Bishops of Aberdeen," appeared in 1522. His most famous work, the "History of the Scots," was published five years later. Though by no means faultless as a specimen of Latinity, it displays a considerable degree of elegance, and speedily acquired a reputation which it has not been able to retain. His object seems to have been to clothe the rude chronicles of his native land in a classical dress, and to embellish the meagre lists of its kings with what he considered suitable characters and actions, without the slightest regard to facts. According to Bishop Lloyd, he put Fordun's tales "into the form of an history, and pieced them out with a very good invention—that part in which he chiefly excelled." He professes to have found in the Monastery of Icolmkill the works of certain Scottish historians, among others, of Vere-mundus, Archdeacon of St. Andrew's, and Cornelius Campbell,—who, according to Bishop Stillingfleet, never existed, except in Boece's fertile imagination. It is at least certain that not a single vestige of their writings is now to be found; and his work, once so much admired, is now remembered only as a receptacle for the wildest of the fables which used to be authoritatively received as constituting the earliest section of the annals of Scotland. It would be injustice, however, to the author to pass unnoticed his ardent patriotism and his love of freedom, by which he was honourably distinguished, at a period when the greater part of his contemporaries professed the most slavish maxims of submission. The reproach which the advocates of absolute authority have levelled at him redounds highly to his honour—that his principles of polity were no better than those of Buchanan.* It has been justly remarked by Maitland, that "in forming a final estimate of the literary character of Boece we must bear in mind that when scholarship—in this country at least—was rare, he was a scholar, and contributed by reviving ancient learning to dispel the gloom of the middle ages; and that while the history of his country existed only in the rude pages of the chroniclers who preceded him, or in the fading records of oral tradition, he embodied it in narrative so interesting, and language so beautiful, as to be worthy of a more refined age."†

Boece appears to have died at Aberdeen in 1536, when he must have attained the age of threescore and ten.

Boece's "History of Scotland" was translated into the Scottish language by JOHN BELLENDEN, Archdeacon of Moray, a favourite of James V.‡ This translation was published in 1536, and constitutes the earliest existing specimen of Scottish literary prose. Though somewhat free, it affords evidence of highly competent scholarship, and is distinguished by the fluency and neatness of its style, and the variety and occasional felicity of its phrasology. Bellenden also executed a translation of the first five books of Livy, and is reported by Bale to have written a treatise, "De Litera Pythagoræ." His translations were undertaken at the request of the king, and he was rewarded by a grant of £114 from the royal treasury, and the gift of the archdeaconry of Moray. He was subsequently appointed Canon of Ross, and received a grant for two years of the forfeited emoluments of two clergymen who were convicted of treason. But though a dignitary of the Church, and a friend of the reigning monarch, Bellenden, in his poetical epistle subjoined to his version of Boece's history, expresses himself in a strain of manly freedom highly creditable to his independence and public spirit, and depicts in bold and unequivocal terms the distinction between a king and a tyrant, and the miseries to which wicked princes have generally been exposed.

The principal of St. Salvator's College, St. Andrew's, at this period, was JOHN MAJOR, or MAIR, the instructor of Buchanan and Knox, and one of the most vigorous thinkers of his time. He was educated both in England and in France, and for some time held the situation of a professor in the University of Paris. "In that situation," says Dr. McCre, "he acquired a more liberal habit of thinking and expressing himself on certain subjects than was yet to be met with in his native country, and in other parts of Europe. He had imbibed the sentiments concerning ecclesiastical polity maintained by John Gerson and Peter D'Ailly,

* Irving's Literary Scotchmen of the Last Four Centuries, vol. i. p. 5.

† Maitland's Biographical Introduction to Bellenden, p. xxxv.

‡ Supra, vol. i. p. 528.

who so ably defended the decrees of the Council of Constance, and the liberties of the Gallican Church, against the arguments for the uncontrollable authority of the sovereign pontiff. He taught that a general council was superior to the Pope, and might judge, rebuke, restrain, and even depose him from his dignity; denied the temporal supremacy of the Bishop of Rome, and his right to inaugurate or dethrone princes; maintained that ecclesiastical censures, and even papal excommunications, had no force if pronounced on irrelevant or invalid grounds. He held that tithes were not of divine right, but merely of human appointment; censured the avarice, ambition, and secular pomp of the court of Rome, and of the episcopal order; was no warm friend of the regular clergy; and advised the reduction of monasteries and holidays.*

"His opinions respecting civil government were analogous to those which he held as to ecclesiastical polity. He taught that the authority of kings and princes was originally derived from the people; that the former are not superior to the latter collectively considered; that if rulers become tyrannical, or employ their power for the destruction of their subjects, they may lawfully be controlled by them, and, proving incorrigible, may be deposed by the community as the superior power; and that tyrants may be judicially proceeded against, even to capital punishment."†

Major's "History of the Nation of the Scots" is a work of no great merit; but his metaphysical writings, though now utterly neglected, like others of their time and kind, fully vindicate the fame which he enjoyed as one of the most acute and original teachers of the scholastic philosophy of the middle ages. It must be confessed, however, that many of the questions which he discusses are trifling and useless, and that his style is remarkably harsh and inelegant.

The first original work in Scottish prose was The Complaynt published at St. Andrew's, in 1548, of Scotland. by an unknown author; it is entitled "The Complaynt of Scotland," and consists of a meditation on the distracted state of the country, and the vices of the various classes of the community. This work, of which an analysis has already been given, ‡ is enlivened by a great deal of quaint fancy, and is exceedingly valuable on account of the minute illustration of manners and customs in which it abounds. The difference between the language of this treatise, and that employed by contemporary English writers, is very marked. "Radically identical with that which was spoken in the south, the Scottish language had by this time assumed decisively the character of a separate dialect. It retained much more of the antique than the English did, because it had not received nearly so thorough a development in literature, and wanted especially the cultivation which would have been given by a free use of literary prose. It had also contracted, through the provincial isolation of the country, many peculiarities which were neither old Saxon nor modern English; and those were now receiving continual accessions." * The following extract from this curious work, in the original spelling, may serve to show the state of the Scottish language at this period, as well as to afford a specimen of the characteristic provincial words and phrases with which the work abounds:—

"There eftir I heard the rumour of rammache + foulis and of bystis that made grite beir, † quhilik past beside burnis and boggis on green bankis to seek their sustentation. Their brutal sound did redond to the high skyis, quhil the deep hou$ cauernis of eleuchis || and rotchie eraggis ansuert vitht ane high note of that same sound as thay beystis had blauen. It aperit be presumyng and presuposing, that blaberand eecho had been hid in ane hou hole, cryand hyr half ansueir, quhen Narcissus ryelt sorry soelit for his sarandis, quhen he was in ane forrest, far fra ony folkis, and there efter for love of eecho he drounit in ane drau vel. Nou to tel treutht of the beystis that maid sic beir, and of the dyn that the foulis did, ther syndry soundis hed nothir temperance nor tune. For fyrist furtht on the fresche fieldis the nolt maid noyis vitht mony loud lou. Baytht horse and meyris did fast nee, and the folis neckyr. The bullis began to bullir, quhen the schiep began to blait, because the calfs began till mo, quhen the doggis berkit. Than the suyne began to quhyrne, quhen thai herd the asse rair, quhilik gart ¶ the hennis kekkyt, quhen the eekis creu. The ehelkyns began to peu when the gled quhissillit. The fox followit the fed geise and gart them ery elaik. The gayslingis eryit quhilik, quhilik, and the dukis cryit quaik. The roepen of the raunyis gart the cras erope. The hudditerauis cryit varrok, varrok, quhen the saunnis †† murnit, because the gray goul mau pronostieat ane storme. The turtill began for to greit, quhen the cusehet zoulit. The titelene followit the goilk, †† and gart hyr sing guk, guk. The dou$$ croutit hyr sad sang that soundit lyik sorrow. Robeen and the litil oran |||| var hamely in vyntir. The jargolyne of the suallou gart the jay angl, ¶¶ than the merveis maid myrtht, for to mok the merle.††† The leverok ††† maid melody up hie in the skyis. The nyctinghal al the nycht sang sueit notis. The tuechitis$$$ cryit theuis nek, quhen the piettis elattrit. The garruling of the stirlene gart the sparrou cheip. The lyntquhit sang counterpoint quhen the oszil zelpit. The grene serene sang sueit, quhen the gold spynek chantit. The rede sehank ||||| cryit my fut, my fut, and the

* Spalding's History of English Literature.

† Singing (Fr. ramage).

‡ A shrill noise.

|| Cloughs, deep valleys, or ravines in the hills.

¶ Forced, caused.

¶¶ Cuckoo.

¶¶¶ Jangle.

††† Lark.

§ Hollow.

 Crows.

†† Swans.

||| Wren.

 Thrush.

$$$ Lapwings.

||||| Fieldfare.

* These sentiments are collected from his Commentary on the Third Book of the Master of Sentences, and from his Exposition of Matthew's Gospel: printed in Latin, at Paris—the former, anno. 1517; the latter, anno. 1518.

† Life of John Knox, vol. i. p. 8.

‡ Supra, vol. i. pp. 537–541.

oxee * cryit tueit. The herrons gaif aney yild skreel as the kyl † hed bene in fyir, quhilk gart the quhapis ‡ for fleivtnes fle far fra hame."

Compare with this the following description of the "New Manneris and the Auld of Scottis," extracted from Bellenden's translation of Boecce's history, published in 1536:—

"Our eldaris howbeit thay war richt virtewis baith in weir and peace, war maist exercit with temperance; for it is the fontane of all virtew. Thay disjunits airly in the morning, with smal refectioun, and sustenit thair liffis thairwith quhil the time of sowper; throw quhilk thair stomok was never surfetly chargit, to empesche thain of uthir besines. At the sowpar thay war mair large; howbeit thay had bot ane cours. Thay eit, for common, fiesehe half raw; for the saup is maist nurisand in that maner. All dronkatis, glotonis, and consumers of vittalis, mair nor was necessar to the sustentation of men, war tane, and first commandit to swelly thair fowth ¶ of quhat drink thay plesit, and incontinent thairefter was drownit in ane fresche rever. * * * Now I belief nane hes sic eloquence, nor fouth of langage, that can sufficientlie declare, how far we, in thir present dayis, ar different fra the virtew and temperance of our eldaris. For quhare our eldaris had sobriete, we have chriete and dronkines; quhare thay had plente with suffieence, we have immoderat cursis [courses] with superfluite; as he war maist noble and honest, that culd devore and swelly maist; and, be extreme diligence, serchis sa mouny deligat coursis, that thay provoke the stomok to ressave mair than it may sufficientlie degest. And nocht allenarlie  may surfet dennar and sowper suffice us, above the temperance of oure eldaris, bot als to continew our schamefull and immoderit voracite with duple dennaris and sowparis. Na fishe in the se, nor foul in the aire, nor best in the wod, may have rest, but socht heir and thair, to satisfy the hungry appetit of glotonis. Nocht allenarly ar winis socht in France, bot in Spainye, Italy, and Greece; and, sumtime, baith Aphrik, and Asia socht, for new delicius metis and winis, to the samin effect. Thus is the world sa utterly socht, that all maner of droggis and electuaris, that may nuris the lust and insolence of pepill, ar brocht in Scotland, with maist sumptuous price, to na les damage than perdition of the pepill thereof: for, throw the immoderat gluttony, our wit and reason ar sa blindit within the presoun of the body, that it may have no knowledge of hevinly thingis; for the body is involvit with sic clowdis of fatnes, that, howbeit it be of gud complexioun be nature, it is sa opprest with superfleu metis and drinkis, that it may nothir weild, nor yit our †† the self; bot, confessand the self vincust, gevis place to all infirmiteis, quhill it be miserably destroyit."

Long before this period, a considerable number of Scotchmen held situations in the continental universities, and had acquired a high reputation for talent and learning. But the disturbed state of Scotland during the era of the Reformation, the insecurity, the poverty, and want of employment, which they had to encounter at home, as well as the adventurous and enterprising spirit of their nation, greatly increased the number of expatriated Scotchmen, who, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, were to be found teaching science and philosophy in every school of Europe. "The number of Scotchmen," says Dr. McCrie, "who taught in these seminaries was great. They were to be found in all the universities and colleges; in several of them they held the honourable situation of principal, and in others they amounted to a third part of the professors."* The learned men who adhered to the ancient faith, and were expelled from their native land for their attachment to the Roman Catholic tenets, and the stern Presbyterians, who were ejected by James VI., equally found shelter and employment in the continental seats of learning.† The same period which saw these learned Scotchmen, Wilson, Serymgeour, and the elder Barclay, received among the foremost scholars of Europe, witnessed three of their countrymen occupying professional chairs at Sedan, and two, if not three, at Leyden, at one and the same time. The accomplished John Cameron left Glasgow, sojourned successively at Bergerac, Sedan, Paris, Bourdeaux, Geneva, Heidelberg, Saumur, and Montauban, there to rest at last, everywhere delivering his learned prelections to admiring audiences. Thomas Dempster, the type of this class, a man of vast learning and proved ability, held office at different times in various colleges in England, France, Spain, and Italy; and in the course of his strange adventures met with four learned Scotchmen at Louvain, and a Scotch doctor at Tournay. He also speaks of a Scotch regent at the College of Navarre, at Paris, and of two Scotch professors at Montpellier.‡

One of the most distinguished of these adventurous scholars was FLORENCE Florence WILSON, better known by his Wilson. Latinized name of Florentinus Volusenus. He was born on the banks of the Lossie, near the town of Elgin, about the commencement of the sixteenth century, and received a part of his education in the University of Aberdeen. He subsequently prosecuted his studies in the University of Paris, where he acted for some time as tutor to a nephew of Cardinal Wolsey. In 1534 he set out for Rome, in the train of Jean du Bellay, Bishop of Paris, but was prevented by illness from proceeding further than Avignon. In addition to his bodily malady, he had to struggle with poverty,

* Life of Melvil, vol. ii. p. 279.

† There was a class of continental universities where no "test" was in use; and in Italy especially the scholar was encouraged to teach in his peculiar province, without exclusion of creed or country.—(Sir W. Hamilton's Discussions on Philosophy, p. 359; Preface to the Records of the University and King's College, Aberdeen, p. 81.)

‡ Ibid., p. 30.

‡ Small hedge-sparrow. † Kiln. † Curlews.
§ Breakfasted. ¶ Until. ¶ Full quantity, or fill.
 Not only. †† Oversee, rule.

as his funds were now exhausted; but in this extremity he fortunately learned that the bishop of the diocese, the celebrated Cardinal Sadoletto, was anxious to find some properly qualified person to teach the public school of Carpentras, a town of France in the department of Vaucluse. He lost no time in proceeding to the episcopal residence, where the elegance of his manners, as well as his extensive literary acquirements, procured him a most favourable reception. The following letter from the cardinal to his nephew, Paolo Sadoletto, gives an interesting account of their first interview, and communicates several particulars of Wilson's life.

"Four days ago I had by chance gone into my library when already night, and was turning over some books very diligently, when my chamberlain announced there was some one who wished to speak to me. I inquire, Who is he? A person in a gown, was the answer. I order him to be admitted. He comes in. I ask what he may want, that he should come to me at such an hour? (For I was anxious to get quit of the man speedily, and return to my studies.) Then he, having entered on his introductory matter in very humble terms, conversed with such propriety, correctness, and modesty, as to produce in me a desire to question him particularly, and to become more intimately acquainted with him. So, having shut my book and turned round to him, I began my queries—of what country he might be, what was his profession, and for what purpose he came into this neighbourhood? Upon which he replies, 'I am a Scot.' 'What,' say I, 'do you come from that uttermost part of the earth?'—'Even so,' said he.—'Where then have you studied the liberal sciences?' (Which question I put to him because his discourse savoured of genius and elegant Latinity.)—'I applied myself to philosophical pursuits,' said he, 'first in my own country during many years; afterwards I studied at Paris, and had there under my tuition a brother's son of the Cardinal of York.* Subsequently, when the uncle's death occasioned the lad to be taken from me, I betook myself to Monseigneur du Bellay, Bishop of Paris, and was about to accompany him to Rome, had not a severe illness separated me from him on our journey.'—'What, then, do you look for here?' was my question.—'In the first place,' said he, 'a longing to come and see you, which I mainly desired, urged me hither; then, as it had been told me at Avignon, you were in want of some one to teach in your city-school, I thought of offering myself to you, in case I should be fit for the undertaking: not being indeed so desirous of the office as anxious to make myself agreeable to you; and having at the same time understood that whatever function I might enter upon near your person by your direction, or at your request, would redound to my praise.'

"What think you now? So much did he please me, that very early next morning I would send for Glocerius, the magistrate, and for Helia. I explained to them my expectations of the man, and related everything in regard to him that had so highly gratified me; for assuredly they had little chance of finding, in any native of Italy, this man's modesty, prudence, and propriety of address and appearance."

With the view of making farther proof of the attainments of his visitor, the cardinal invited the chief magistrates and several learned men to meet him at dinner. After the entertainment, various subjects connected with natural philosophy were discussed at the instigation of the cardinal, and Wilson displayed so much modesty, as well as knowledge, that all were charmed with him, and he was immediately appointed master of Carpentras School, with an annual salary of seventy crowns. Sadoletto, in concluding his narrative, expresses himself much gratified to find that his new friend was qualified to instruct his pupils in the Greek language.*

The accomplished scholar, thus highly commended, appears to have taken up his residence at Carpentras in the month of November, 1535; and it is probable that he remained there till 1546. His earliest publication was a theological tract, printed at Lyons in the year 1539. Conrad Gesner mentions that he met him in that city in the course of the following year, and expresses great hopes of the benefits which his learning would confer on the studious. In 1543, Wilson published the Latin "Dialogue on Tranquillity of Mind," on which his reputation chiefly rests. This treatise has always been admired, by those who take an interest in classical studies, for the elegance and beauty of its composition, as well as for the extensive learning and philosophic genius which it displays. In easy, graceful Latinity it has been thought by some not inferior to the writings of his more celebrated friend Buchanan. In the year 1546, Wilson formed the resolution of returning to his native country; and, from a letter addressed to him by Sadoletto, we learn that he had written asking the cardinal's advice respecting the course he ought to pursue in the religious dissensions which at that time distracted Scotland. Dr. Irving is of opinion that Wilson "cherished no violent antipathy towards the cause of the Reformation. The increasing defection from the popish Church he imputes in terms sufficiently plain to the pride, luxury, and negligence of the prelates; and three of the Italian reformers, Martyr, Ochino, and Læcisio, he mentions not merely without censure, but even with undissembled approbation. If he had returned to Scotland, and lived a few years longer, it appears highly probable that he would formally have renounced the gross errors and superstitions of the Church in which he had been educated."† But he was not permitted to reach his native land: in the course of his journey he was taken ill, and died at Vienne, in Dauphiny, about the close of the year 1546. Bartholomew Aneau, to whom he was

* Miscellany of the Bannatyne Club, vol. i. pp. 328, 329.

† Irving's Literary Scotchmen, vol. i. p. 32.

* The celebrated Cardinal Wolsey.

personally known, speaks in high terms of Wilson's manners, as well as of his virtues; and commends him for his skill in the arts and sciences, and his knowledge, not merely of the classical languages of antiquity, but also of the modern tongues—French, Italian, and Spanish, which he had acquired, he adds, by a residence in the countries where they are spoken.* And Buchanan has commemorated his excellences in the following beautiful lines:—

"Hic Musis, Volusene, jaces charissime, ripam
Ad Rhodani, terra quam procul a patria!
Hoc meruit virtus tua, terra quæ foret altrix
Virtutum, ut cineres conderet illa tuos."

The name of the Apostle of the northern Reformation must not be omitted in the John Knox.

roll of learned Scotchmen who flourished at this period. The true eminence of this great man, however, lies in a different field, and his mind was steadfastly fixed on objects infinitely more important than either learning or literary fame. He did not view this as the sphere in which he was called to labour. "That I did not in writing communicate my judgment upon the Scriptures," says he, "I have ever thought myself to have most just reason. For considering myself rather called of my God to instruct the ignorant, comfort the sorrowful, confirm the weak, and rebuke the proud, by tongue and lively voice, in these most corrupt days, than to compose books for the age to come (seeing that so much is written, and by men of the most singular erudition, and yet so little well-observed), I decreed to contain myself within the bounds of that vocation whereunto I found myself especially called."† The life of KNOX is written in the history of his country, and as the leading events of it have already been related, they need not be recapitulated here. With regard to his writings, he published only one of the many sermons preached by him during his ministry, and that was extorted from him by peculiar circumstances. "It affords," says his biographer, "a very favourable specimen of his talents, and shows that if he had applied himself to writing, he was qualified for excelling in that department. He had a ready command of language, and expressed himself with great perspicuity, animation, and force. Though he despised the tinsel of rhetoric, he was acquainted with the principles of that art; and when he had leisure and inclination to polish his style, wrote with propriety, and even with elegance."‡ In 1557, he published at Geneva his famous treatise entitled, "The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women," directed principally against Mary of England and the queen-regent of Scotland. The principal proposition of the work is thus stated in the first sentence: "To promote a woman to bear rule, superiority, dominion, or empire above any realm, nation, or city, is repugnant to nature, continually to God, a thing most contrarious to his revealed will and approved ordinance; and, finally, it is the subversion of all equity and justice." But the work by which he is best known as an author is "The History of the Reformation of Religion within the Realm of Scotland," printed after his death. As it was composed at intervals, amid the confusion of intestine strife, and the distractions of a busy life, it is undigested, almost fragmentary, altogether without method; and it has none of the calm, philosophic discrimination which holds the balance fairly between rival parties. But in spite of these defects, from the author's access to the various sources of information, and his remarkable power and skill in narrating events and delineating characters, the work still maintains its value as the source from which much of our knowledge of the ecclesiastical proceedings during the eventful era of the Reformation is derived. Although it is the production of a zealous partizan, who was himself a chief mover and main actor in the events which he has narrated, the accuracy of his statements has in the main been confirmed by the researches of later historians. As a fair specimen of this celebrated work, we may give the following characteristic description of the tumult at Edinburgh on St. Giles's-day, 1558:—

"Yet would not the priests and friars cease to have that great solemnity and manifest abomination which they accustomedly had upon Saint Giles's-day:—to wit, they would have that idol borne, and therefore was all preparation necessary duly made. A marmoset idol was borrowed from the Gray friars (a silver piece of James Carmichael was laid in pledge). It was fixed with iron nails upon a barrow, called their fertour. There assembled priests, friars, canons, and rotten papists, with tabours and trumpets, banners and bagpipes; and who was there to lead the ring but the queen-regent herself, with all her shavelings, for honour of that feast! West about goes it, and comes down the High Street and down to the Canon-cross. The queen-regent dined that day in Sandie Carpetyne's house, betwixt the Bows, and so, when the idol returned back again, she left it and went in to her dinner. The hearts of the brethren were wondrously inflamed, and, seeing such abomination so maintained, were decreed to be revenged. They were divided into several companies, whereof not one knew of another. There were some temporisers that day, who, fearing the chance to be done as it fell, laboured to stay the brethren. But that could not be, for immediately after that the queen was entered in the lodging, some of those that were of the enterprise drew nigh to the idol, as willing to help to bear him; and, getting the fertour upon their shoulders, began to shudder, thinking that thereby the idol should have fallen. But that was provided and prevented by the iron nails, as we have said; and so began one to cry, 'Down with the idol! down with it!' and so without delay it was pulled down. Some brag made the priests' patrons at the first, but when they saw the feebleness of their god—for one took him by the heels, and dashing his head to the causeway, left Dagon without head or hands, and said, 'Fy upon thee, thou young Saint Giles, thy father would have tarried four suel!'—this considered, we say, the priests and friars fled faster than they did at Pinkie Cleueh. There might have been seen so sudden a fray as seldom has been seen among that sort of men within this realm; for down goes the cross; off goes the surplice; round eaps corner with the crowns. The Gray friars gaped; the Black friars blew; the priests panted; for such a sudden fray came never among the generation of Antichrist within this realm before. By chance there lay upon a stair a merry Englishman, and seeing the discomfiture to be without blood, thought he would add some merriness to the matter, and so he cried over a stair, 'Fy upon you, whoresons, why have you broken order? Down the street ye passed in array, and with great mirth. Why flee ye, villains, now without order? Turn and strike every one a stroke for the honour of his god! Fy, cowards, fy! ye shall never be judged worthy of your wages again!' But exhortations were then unprofitable, for after that Bel had broken his neck there was no comfort to his confused army.

* Les Emblemes de Seigneur Andre Alciat de nouveau translatez en François, &c., Lyons, 1549; Miscellany of the Bannatyne Club, vol. i. p. 330.

† Preface to his Sermon.

‡ Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 277.

"The queen-regent laid up this amongst her other mementoes, till that she might have seen the time proper to have revenged it. Search was made for the doers, but none could be deprehended, for the brethren assembled themselves in such sort, in companies, singing psalms and praising God, that the proudest of the enemies were astonished."

It must be noticed that there is a marked difference between the style of Knox and the vernacular language employed by his contemporaries. The Reformer, during his residence in England, had acquired the English orthography and mode of expression. Hence one of his controversial opponents attacked his style as being affectedly and unpatriotically English. "Gif ye," says Ninian Winzet, "throw curiositie of novationis hes forzet our auld plane Seottis, quhelk zour mother lernit zow in tymes euming, I sall wrytt to zow my mynd in Latin, for I am nocht aequyntit with zour Southeroun."*

Besides various letters and other publications suited to the circumstances of the country, Knox, a few months before his death, published a vindication of the Reformed religion, in answer to a letter written by a Scotch Jesuit called Tyrie. "His practical treatises," says Dr. McCrie, "are among the least known, but most valuable of his writings. In depth of religious feeling, and in power of utterance, they are superior to any works of the same kind which appeared in that age. The thoughts are often original, and always expressed in a style of originality possessing great dignity and strength, without affectation or extravagance. His defence of predestination, the only theological treatise of any size which was published by him, is written with perspicuity, and discovers his controversial acuteness, with becoming caution, in handling that question."*

GEORGE BUCHANAN, the fellow-student and friend of Knox, but less deeply immersed in the political and ecclesiastical struggles of this period, found time to earn for himself an imperishable reputation, both as a writer of prose, and as the best Latin poet of his age. It has been stated, indeed, by a competent authority,† that since the fall of Rome there has hardly been any one who has written Latin with an excellence so complete and uniform; and he is admitted, even by those who most keenly dislike his opinions, to have been not only a man of eminent and versatile genius, but one of the finest and most correct classical scholars that ever appeared in Christendom. He was born about the beginning of the year 1506, at a farmhouse called the Moss, situate in the parish of Killearn, and county of Stirling. He was educated both at Paris and St. Andrew's; and, during the prosecution of his studies, appears to have suffered much from the privations of poverty. In 1529 he was appointed a professor in the College of St. Barbe, where he taught grammar for about three years. He next undertook the superintendence of the education of the young Earl of Cassillis, "a youth of the most promising talents, and of an excellent disposition;" and, after a residence of five years in France, they both returned to Scotland. Buchanan had by this time adopted the tenets of the Reformers, and while residing at the seat of his pupil, in Ayrshire, he composed a little poem called "Somnium," in which he denounced the impudence and hypocrisy of the Franciscan friars, and expressed his own dislike of a monastic life. This satire rendered him extremely obnoxious to the ecclesiastics, but does not seem to have proved any barrier to the royal favour, for about this period James V. appointed him tutor to one of his natural sons, who bore his own name, and has in consequence been generally confounded with the celebrated James Stewart, who afterwards became Earl of Moray and Regent of Scotland. The Franciscans were naturally indignant at the promotion of the person who had so severely satirised them, and endeavoured to undermine his influence by representing him to the king as a heretic and a man of depraved morals. James, however, was well aware of the real character of the friars, and, at this period of his reign, was by no means disposed to lend himself to the promotion of their views. He therefore commanded the poet to renew his attack on his clerical enemies. Buchanan accordingly applied himself to the composition of the poem entitled "Franciscanus,"—one of the most biting satires ever written, and which rendered him ever after the object of the implacable hatred of the popish clergy. At the beginning of 1539, a fierce

* Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 279.

† Spalding's History of English Literature, p. 193.

* Life of Knox, vol. ii. p. 277 (note).

Engraved by E. Scriver.

GEORGE BUCHANAN.

From a Picture by Francis Pourbus sen. in the possession of the Royal Society.

persecution began against the adherents of the Reformed faith; five individuals, accused of Lutheranism were committed to the flames, and the obnoxious poet was apprehended and committed to prison. Having learned that Cardinal Beaton had offered James a sum of money as the price of his blood, Buchanan, dreading that the avarice of the king might induce him to consent to his condemnation, made his escape through the window of the apartment in which he was confined; and after encountering new dangers from the freebooters on the Borders, and the contagion of a pestilential disease then raging in the north of England, he succeeded in reaching London in safety. He soon after passed over to France, and through the influence of his friend Andrew Govea, a native of Portugal, he was appointed professor of Latin in the College of Guienne. He resided at Bourdeaux three years, during which he composed four tragedies, together with various other poems. On leaving Bourdeaux he returned to Paris, where he obtained the situation of regent in the College of Cardinal le Moine. In 1547, Andrew Govea, having been appointed by the King of Portugal to preside over the recently founded University of Coimbra, succeeded in inducing Buchanan—with his brother Patrick and several other eminent scholars, including two Scotchmen, John Rutherford and William Ramsay—to accompany him to Portugal, which at this time was almost the only country in Europe free from internal commotions. The death of Govea, however, in the following year, deprived Buchanan and his associates of his protection, and three of their number were thrown into the dungeons of the Inquisition. After an imprisonment of nearly two years and a half, Buchanan was sent to a monastery, for the purpose of being converted to popery by the instructions of the monks. In this confinement he began his great work, the translation of the Psalms, which, however, was not completed till after his return to his native country. He was at length restored to liberty, and after a short visit to England he returned to France about the beginning of 1553, and was appointed a regent in the College of Boncourt. Two years later he was engaged by the celebrated Comte de Brissac to superintend the education of his son, and spent the following five years with his pupil, alternately in Italy and France. A civil war having broken out in France, Buchanan returned to his native country. In spite of his decided attachment to the Protestant doctrines, he was favourably received at the Scottish court, and was appointed to assist the youthful Queen Mary in her classical studies. Every afternoon she read with her tutor a portion of Livy, and he dedicated to his royal mistress his admirable version of the Psalms, as well as one of the most finished and beautiful of his productions, the Epithalamium composed on her first nuptials. This accomplished princess was evidently by no means insensible of his claims upon her favour, for on the death of the Abbot, Quintin Kennedy, in 1564, she bestowed upon Buchanan the temporalities of Crossraguel Abbey, which amounted in annual value to the sum of five hundred pounds Scots. Two years later, the office of Principal of St. Leonard's College, St. Andrew's, was conferred upon him by the Earl of Moray. About the same time he prepared for the press a miscellany, entitled "Fratres Fraterrimi," consisting of a collection of pungent satires against the Romish Church; and in the year 1567 he published another collection, consisting of "Elegiæ, Silvæ, Hendecasyllabi." His poetical and classical pursuits did not prevent him from taking a deep interest in the struggle now going on between the Romanists and the adherents of the Reformed faith. He sat as a member of various assemblies, was appointed one of the commissioners for revising the Book of Discipline, and was chosen moderator of the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh on the 25th of June, 1567. After the murder of Darnley, and the deposition of the unfortunate Mary, Buchanan joined the party of Regent Moray. He was present at the conference which was held at York, and subsequently at Westminster, for the purpose of investigating the charges brought against the queen, and composed in Latin a violent attack upon her character and conduct, entitled "Detectio Mariæ Reginæ," which was laid before the commissioners at Westminster, and was afterwards industriously circulated by the English court. In 1570, Buchanan was appointed one of the preceptors of the young king, then only four years of age. Patrick Young and the two abbots of Cambuskenneth were associated with Buchanan in this important situation. Young, who was of a mild disposition, and unwilling to offend the future dispenser of public favour, treated his royal pupil with great lenity. But Buchanan was a stern disciplinarian, as well as a man of independent spirit, and discharged the duties of his office with a strictness and severity which left an indelible impression on the mind of the king. Long after his accession to the English throne, James was accustomed to say of a person who held a high office at his court, that "he ever trembled at his approach, it minded him so of his pedagogue."* The proficiency which the young monarch attained in classical learning is the best proof of the fidelity and success with which his studies were conducted. It has been justly said that Buchanan made him a scholar, and nature had destined him for a pedant.

* "Sir Mungo had been early attached to the court in the capacity of whipping-boy, as the office was then called, to King James VI., and, with his majesty, trained to all polite learning by his celebrated preceptor, George Buchanan. The office of whipping-boy doomed its unfortunate occupant to undergo all the corporeal punishment which the Lord's anointed—whose proper person was of course sacred—might chance to incur in the course of travelling through his grammar and prosody. Under the stern rule, indeed, of George Buchanan, who did not approve of the vicarious mode of punishment, James bore the penance of his own faults, and Mungo Malagrowth enjoyed a sinecure; but James's other pedagogue, Master Patrick Young, went more ceremoniously to work, and appalled the very soul of the youthful king by the floggings which he bestowed on the whipping-boy when the royal task was not suitably performed."—Sir Walter Scott.

The following anecdotes, which are given by Dr. Irving in his Life of Buchanan, may serve to show the mode in which the learned tutor discharged the duties of his important office :—

“The king having taken a fancy for a tame sparrow, which belonged to his playfellow, the Master (afterwards Earl) of Mar, solicited him without effect to transfer his right; and in endeavouring to wrest it out of his hand, he deprived the poor little animal of life. Erskine having raised due lamentation for its untimely fate, the circumstances were reported to Buchanan, who lent his young sovereign a box on the ear, and admonished him that he was himself a true bird of the bloody nest to which he belonged.

“A theme, which had one day been prescribed to the royal pupil, was the conspiracy of the Earl of Angus and other noblemen during the reign of James III. After dinner James was diverting himself with Mar, and as Buchanan, who in the meantime was intent on reading, found himself annoyed by their obstreperous mirth, he requested the king to desist; but as no attention was paid to the suggestion, he threatened to accompany his next suggestion with something more formidable than words. James, whose ear had been tickled by the quaint application of the apologue mentioned in the theme, replied that he would be glad to see who would bell the cat. His venerable preceptor, who might have pardoned the remark, was perhaps offended with the mode in which it was uttered; he threw aside his book with indignation, and bestowed upon the delinquent that species of scholastic discipline which is deemed most ignominious. The Countess of Mar, being attracted by the wailing which ensued, hastened to the scene of his disgrace, and taking the precious deposit in her arms, she demanded of Buchanan how he presumed to lay his hands on the Lord’s anointed? To this interrogation he is said to have replied in a very unceremonious antithesis, which does not admit, in this delicate age, of the distinct specification which it received in the less scrupulous days of Dr. Mackenzie.”

“One of the earliest propensities which James discovered,” says Dr. Irving, “was an excessive attachment to favourites; and this weakness, which ought to have been abandoned with the other characteristics of childhood, continued to retain its ascendancy during every stage of his life. His facility of complying with every request alarmed the prophetic sagacity of Buchanan. On the authority of the poet’s nephew, Chytraeus has recorded a ludicrous expedient which he adopted for the purpose of correcting his pupil’s conduct. He presented the young king with two papers, which he requested him to sign; and James, after having slightly interrogated him respecting their contents, readily appended his signature to each, without the precaution of even a cursory perusal. One of them was a formal transference of the royal authority for the term of fifteen days. When Buchanan had quitted the royal presence, one of the courtiers accosted him with his usual salutation; but to this astonished person he announced himself in the new character of a sovereign, and with that happy urbanity of humour for which he was so distinguished, he began to assume the high demeanour of royalty. He afterwards preserved the same deportment towards James himself; and when the latter expressed his amazement at such extraordinary conduct, Buchanan admonished him of his having resigned the crown. This reply did not tend to lessen the monarch’s surprise, for he now began to suspect his preceptor of mental derangement. Buchanan then produced that instrument by which he was formally invested, and, with the authority of a tutor, proceeded to remind him of the absurdity of assenting to petitions in so rash a manner.”

As might have been expected in one who was so ardent a lover of freedom, one of Buchanan’s chief objects in his system of instruction was to inspire the youthful monarch with a hatred of tyranny. In the dedication to a short Latin tragedy, entitled “Baptistes, sive calumniæ tragœdia,” which was written in November, 1576, when James was just out of his twelfth year, he says, “But this more especially seems to belong to you, which explains the torments and miseries of tyrants, even when they seem to be in the most flourishing state, which I esteem not only advantageous, but even necessary for you now to understand, that you may begin early to hate what you should always avoid. I desire also that this book may be a witness to posterity, that, if at any time you act otherwise, by the influence of wicked counsellors, or the wantonness of power getting the better of education, you may impute it not to your preceptors, but yourself, that slighted their good advice. God grant you a better fate, and (as your favourite Sallust has it) render beneficence natural to you by custom, which I sincerely wish and hope with many others.” Again, in the dedication of his more celebrated work, entitled “De Jure Regni apud Scotos,” which was written three years later, he says he thought good to publish it, that it might be a standing witness of his affection towards James, and admonish him of his duty to his subjects. “Many things persuaded me that this my endeavour should not be in vain; especially your age, not yet corrupted by prave opinions, and inclination far above your years for undertaking all heroic and noble attempts, spontaneously making haste thereto; and not only your promptitude in obeying your instructors and governors, but all such as give you sound admonition; and your judgment and diligence in examining affairs, so that no man’s authority can have much weight with you, unless it be confirmed by probable reason.” “I do perceive also,” continues Buchanan, “that you, by a certain natural instinct, do much abhor flattery, which is the nurse of tyranny, and a most grievous plague of a kingdom; so as you hate the court solacisms and barbarisms, no less than those that seem to censure all elegancy do love and affect such things, and everywhere in discourse spread abroad as the sauce thereof, those titles of majesty, highness, and many other unsavoury compellations. Now, albeit your good natural disposition and sound instructions, wherein you have been principled, may at present prevent you from falling into this error, yet am I forced to be something jealous of you, lest bad company, the fawning foster-mother of all vices, draw aside your soft and tender mind into the worst part, especially seeing I am not ignorant how easily our other senses yield to seduction. This book, therefore, I have sent to you to be not only your monitor, but also an importunate and bold exactor, which, in this your tender and flexible years, may conduct you in safety from the rocks of flattery, and not only admonish you, but also keep you in the way you are once entered into; and, if at any time you deviate, it may reprehend and draw you back, the which if you obey, you shall, for yourself and all your subjects, acquire tranquillity and peace in life, and eternal glory in the life to come. From Stirling, January 10, 1579."

About the same time that he became tutor to the king, Buchanan obtained the honourable situation of keeper of the privy seal, which entitled him to a seat in parliament. Meanwhile, in spite of his numerous and important avocations, and the precarious state of his health, he found leisure to compose various works, both in prose and verse. In a satirical tract, called the "Chameleon," written in the Scottish language, he exposes the fickle and unprincipled character of the famous secretary, Maitland of Lethington, whose final desertion to the queen's party he seems to have highly resented. He also drew up "Ane Admonition direct to the trew Lordis Mantenaris of the Kingis Graces Authoritie," in which he earnestly adjured them to protect the young king from the dangers to which he was exposed on the death of Regent Moray. But by far the most important work which he prepared at this time was his profound and masterly compendium of political philosophy, entitled "De Jure Regni apud Scotos," which was first printed at Edinburgh in 1579. It is in the form of a dialogue between the author and Thomas, the son of Sir Richard Maitland; and though professedly relating to the rights of the Scottish crown, it comprehends a very able and spirited exposition of the general principles of government. Sir James Mackintosh has termed this treatise the "incomparable tract, 'De Jure Regni,' in which the principles of popular politics, and the maxims of a free government, are delivered with a precision and enforced with an energy, which no former age had equalled, and no succeeding has surpassed."* "The three great sources of a free spirit in politics," says Mr. Hallam,† "admiration of antiquity, zeal for religion, and persuasion of positive right, which separately had animated Ia Boetie, Languet, and Hottoman, united their streams to produce in another country the treatise [De Jure, &c.] of George Buchanan, a scholar, a Protestant, and the subject of a very limited monarchy. This is a dialogue elegantly written, and designed first to show the origin of royal government from popular election, then the right of putting kings to death according to Scripture, and the conditional allegiance due to the crown of Scotland, as proved by the coronation oath, which implies that it is received in trust from the people. The following is a specimen of Buchanan's reasoning, which goes very materially farther than Languet had presumed to do. 'Is there then,' says one of the interlocutors, 'a mutual compact between the king and his people?'—M. Thus it seems.—B. Does not he who first violates the compact, and does anything against his own stipulations, break his engagement?—M. He does.—B. If, then, the bond which attached the king to his people is broken, all rights he derived from the agreement are forfeited?—M. They are forfeited.—B. And he who was mutually bound becomes as free as before the agreement?—M. He has the same rights and the same freedom as he had before.—B. But if a king should do things tending to the dissolution of human society, for the preservation of which he has been made, what name should we give him?—M. We should call him a tyrant.—B. But a tyrant not only possesses no just authority over his people, but is their enemy.—M. He is surely their enemy.—B. Is there not a just cause of war against an enemy who has inflicted heavy and intolerable injuries upon us?—M. There is.—B. What is the nature of a war against the enemy of all mankind?—M. None can be more just.—B. Is it not lawful in a war justly commenced, not only for the whole people, but for any single person, to kill an enemy?—M. It must be confessed.—B. What then shall we say of a tyrant, a public enemy, with whom all good men are in eternal warfare? may not any one of all mankind inflict on him every penalty of war?—M. I observe that all nations have been of that opinion; for Theba is extolled for having killed her husband, and Timoleon for his brother's, and Cassius for his son's death."*

It need not be matter of surprise that tenets such as these should have excited fierce opposition, and that in the course of a few years the principles which Buchanan had so boldly enunciated should have been attacked by various writers both at home and abroad; among others by his countrymen, Blackwood, Winzet, and Barclay, all of whom were zealous Roman Catholics, and subsequently by Sir Thomas Craig, the celebrated lawyer, and Sir George Mackenzie, the able but profligate tool of the court in their prosecution of the Covenanters. Two years after Buchanan's death, the Scottish parliament formally condemned his Dialogue and History, and, under a penalty of two hundred pounds, commanded every person who possessed copies to surrender them within forty days, in order that they might be purged of "the offensive

* Mackintosh's Defence of the French Revolution, p. 303.

† Literature of Europe, vol. ii. p. 37.

* Hallam's Literature of Europe, vol. ii. p. 96.

and extraordinary matters" which they contained. Twenty years later the privy council of Scotland issued a proclamation prohibiting all subjects, of whatever rank or degree, from transcribing or circulating any copies of a manuscript translation of the Dialogue. And in 1683 this treatise had the honour of being condemned to the flames by "the loyal and orthodox" University of Oxford, along with the political works of Milton and other liberal writers.

The last production which Buchanan lived to complete was his "History of Scotland," which issued from the press in the year 1582. This great work is divided into twenty books; the first three contain a kind of introductory dissertation respecting the geographical situation of the country, the nature of the soil and climate, the ancient names and manners, and the primitive inhabitants, together with a series of quotations from the Greek and Latin authors. The historical narrative properly commences with the fourth book. In the earlier part of the history he has unfortunately adopted too many of the fables of his predecessor Boece. As Dr. Robertson justly remarks, "instead of rejecting the improbable tales of chronicle writers, he was at the utmost pains to adorn them, and has clothed with all the beauties and graces of fiction those legends which formerly had only its wildness and extravagance."* The sketch of the earlier reigns is brief and rapid, but after the accession of King Robert Bruce the narrative becomes much more copious and interesting. By far the largest proportion of the work is taken up with the history of the eventful period of the Reformation; and as the author was deeply engaged in many of the transactions which he relates, his narrative has no doubt been tinctured by his passions and prejudices, and must be regarded as the production of a zealous partizan rather than of a calm and impartial spectator. His style is clear, correct, and elegant, and is held to unite the excellences of Livy and Sallust; while the moral and political reflections with which the work is enriched are profound and masterly. Mr. Hallam eulogizes the work as written with strength, perspicuity, and neatness; few modern histories, he says, are more redolent of an antique air.† Le Clerc declares that Buchanan has written better than any one else in prose and verse;‡ that is, has written prose better than any one who has written verse so well, and the converse. Thuanus remarks that although much of his time had been spent in scholastic occupations, yet his history might be supposed the production of a man whose whole life had been exercised in the political transactions of the State; the felicity of his genius and the greatness of his mind having enabled him so completely to remove every impediment incident to an obscure and humble lot. And, in the opinion of Bishop Burnet, "his style is so natural and nervous, and his reflections on things are so solid, that he is justly reckoned the greatest and best of our modern authors."*

Buchanan's reputation, however, rests mainly on his poems, which are justly declared to unite more than any other compositions of their kind originality of matter with classic elegance of style. The most celebrated of them is his "Translation of the Psalms," which Le Clerc has pronounced incomparable, though it must be admitted that it is very unequal, and is frequently diffuse. One of the most celebrated of his lyrical pieces is the exquisite Ode on the Month of May. Mr. Hallam is of opinion that his best poem is that on the Sphere, in which he descants on the absurdity of the Pythagorean system. Joseph Scaliger and Henry Stephens placed Buchanan at the head of all the poets of his age; and all France, Italy, and Germany, says Maittaire, have since subscribed to the same opinion, and conferred that title upon him.†

Buchanan did not long survive the publication of his History. In the month of September, 1581, his friends, Andrew Melvil, Principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrew's, James Melvil, and his own nephew, Thomas Buchanan, Provost of the Collegiate Church of Kirkhill,—having heard that the "History of Scotland" was in the press, and the author unwell, passed over to Edinburgh to pay him a visit. Their interview with the venerable scholar is thus graphically described by James Melvil, in his well-known Diary:—"When we came to his chamber, we found him sitting in his chair, teaching his young man that servit him in his chamber to spell a, b, ab; e, b, eb, &c. After salutation, Mr. Andro says, 'I see, sir, ye are nocht idle.'—'Better this,' quoth he, 'nor [than] stealing sheep or sitting idle, quhilk is as ill.' Thereafter he schew [showed] us the Epistle Dedicatorie to the king, the quhilk, when Mr. Andro had read, he tauld him that it was obscure in some places, and wanted certain words to perfy the sentence. Says he, 'I may do na mair for thinking on another matter.'—'What is that?' says Mr. Andro. —'To die,' quoth he; 'but I leave that and mane ma [more] things for you to help.'"

After some conversation respecting Blackwood's reply to Buchanan's treatise "De Jure Regni," the visitors proceeded to Arbuthnot's printing-office, to inspect the work which had excited such high expectations. They found the printer had proceeded in his labour as far as the passage relating to the burial of David Riccio, and being afraid that the freedom with which the historian had spoken of that event might give offence to the king, and lead to the suppression of the book, they requested Arbuthnot to suspend the printing till they should see the author. On returning to his house they found him in bed, "and asking him how he did, 'Even going the way of weifare,' says he. His kinsman then pointed out the obnoxious passage, and suggested that it should be softened, lest it

* History of Scotland, vol. i. p. 5.

† Literature of Europe, vol. i. p. 511; vol. ii. p. 257.

‡ Bibliothèque Choisie, t. viii.

* Irving's Literary Scotchmen, vol. i. p. 91.

† Literature of Europe, vol. ii. p. 147.

might induce the king to prohibit the entire work. 'Tell me, man,' was the intrepid reply of the veteran scholar, 'if I have tauld the truth.'—'Yes,' says Mr. Thomas, 'I think sa.'—'I will bide his fead [feud, enmity] and all his kin's, then,' quoth he. 'Pray, pray to God for me, and let Him direct all.' So by the printing of his chronicle was finished, that maist learned, wyse, and godly man ended this mortal life.*

He died on the 28th of September, 1582, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and was interred in the Gray Friars' Church-yard, Edinburgh. His funeral took place at the public expense; and, according to Calderwood, was attended by "a great company of the faithful."†

One of the most learned and able defenders in Scotland of the old creed was Ninian Winzet. NINIAN WINZET (pronounced Win-geet), who was born at Renfrew, in the year 1518. Nothing is known with certainty of his education, or the mode in which his early years were spent; but about the year 1551 he was appointed master of Linlithgow School, a situation which he continued to hold for ten years. In the year 1561 he was deposed from his office by the Protestants, who were of opinion that they could not safely leave the grammar-schools under the charge of popish masters. "At the command," he says, "of Dean Patrick Kinlochy, preacher in Linlithgow, and of his superintendent, gentle reader, when I, for denying only to subscribe your fantasy and faction of faith, was expelled out of that, my kindly town, and fra my tender friends thair, whose perpetual kindness I hoped that I had conquest [acquired] by the spending of about ten years of my most flourishing age, not without manifest utility of your commonwealth, and by all appearance had obtained sic [such] favour of them as any sic man might have of any community. I thought I had no cause to be ashamed. But to rejoice and glorify my God (according to St. Peter's rule), for that I suffered not as a wicked person or an evildoer, but as an unfeigned and faithful Christian."‡

After his expulsion from his office, Winzet prepared three controversial tracts, in which he discusses, among other subjects, the vocation of the clergy, and endeavours to prove that Knox and his brethren had, according to the rules of the canon law, no proper calling to minister in the Word and sacraments. Soon after the publication of these tracts, he sent to the press his "Last Blast of the Trumpet," in which the same opinions are maintained. But the Reformers had not yet learned the principles of religious toleration, and while this work was in the press, a magistrate and several attendants visited the printing-office, and seized and suppressed all the copies that could be found. The printer was fined and imprisoned; and the author, finding he could no longer remain in his native land with safety, sought refuge in Flanders. In the course of the following year he published his "Buke of four scoir three Questions tuccling Doctrine, Ordour, and Maneris," together with a translation into his native language of the work of Vincentius Lirinensis, "Against the Profane Novations of Heresies." To his version of this well-known treatise, Winzet prefixed a long dedication to the queen, dated at Antwerp, 2nd of December, 1563. He appears to have translated, also, the sixth book of Optatus, Bishop of Milevis, in Numidia, against the Donatists,—a treatise of Tertullian against heresy,—and a discourse of Renatus Benedictus, "concerning Composing Discords in Religion." In the year 1565 he removed to France, and, according to a somewhat doubtful authority, took the degree of A.M. at Paris, and was there elected one of the procurators in that university. He is said to have also visited Italy, but he ultimately found a retreat in Germany, where he closed a long and chequered life. In the year 1576 he was nominated by the Pope abbot of a Scotch monastery of the Benedictine order, at Ratisbon. He also received the degree of D.D. His monastic government has been highly commended, not only on account of his restoration of the dilapidated buildings of the abbey, and the improvement of its revenues, but because of his efforts to increase the strictness of its discipline.

His attention to the duties of his new office did not abate his controversial ardour, for his two most elaborate works were produced after his ecclesiastical preferment was conferred upon him. They were both written in the Latin language, and were dedicated to the Duke of Bavaria. The first, which is entitled "Flagellum Sectariorum," or the "Scourge of Sectaries," contains an exposure of the manifold evils arising from heresy and schism. The other is a political treatise, intended as an answer to the celebrated work of Buchanan, "De Jure Regni apud Scotos," and, as might be expected, strenuously supports the sacred and inviolable rights of kings. Winzet survived the publication of these two works for the space of ten years. He died 21st September, 1592, at the age of seventy-four. Winzet was undoubtedly an able, learned, and honest man. His courage and sincerity are strikingly shown by the boldness of his animadversions on the corrupt state of the Roman Catholic Church in Scotland, and by the indignant language in which he denounces the simony, luxury, sloth, and licentiousness of the clergy. In his Tractate addressed to the queen, pastors, and nobility—to quote one passage out of many—he thus handles the churchmen:—

"Your dumb doctrine in exalting ceremonies only, keeping in silence the true Word of God necessary to all men's salvation, and not resisting manifest errors, to the world is known. What part of the true religion by your slothful dominion and princely estate is not corrupted or obscured? Have not many, through lack of teachment, in

* Diary of James Melvil, p. 121, Wodrow Society's Edition.

† Dr. Irving's Memoirs of the Life and Writings of George Buchanan; and Literary Scotchmen, vol. i. pp. 67—97.

‡ Ibid., p. 101.

mad ignorance misknown the duty which we all owe to our Lord God, and so in their perfect belief have sorely stammered? Were not the sacraments of Christ Jesus profaned by ignorants and wicked persons, neither able to persuade to godliness by learning nor by living? Of the which number we confess the most part of us of the ecclesiastical state to have been, in our ignorant and inexpert youth unworthily by you admitted to the ministration thereof. Were ye commanded in vain of God by the mouths of his prophets and apostles to watch attently and continually upon your flock, and know diligently the same by face? Or gave the princes of the earth yearly rents (as the disciples in the beginning sold their lands and gave the prices thereof unto the apostles), to the end that every one of you might spend the same upon his dame Dalila, and bastard brows? And albeit it chance oft to the infirmity of man that he fall asleep when he should most wake, and be given to pastime when he should most diligently labour; but yet, oh merciful God! what deadly sleep is this that has oppressed you, that in so great uproar, tumult, and terrible clamour, ye wake not forth of your dream? Awake! awake! we say, and put to your hand stoutly to save Peter's ship."*

Even in his address to the "Calvinian Preachers," though he upbraids them for demolishing the monasteries, instead of reforming them, he does not hesitate to admit the gross abuses to which the monastic life had led.

"Ye misknow not the monastic life to have stood specially in the renouncing of the world, and pleasures of the body, not only from unlesum [unlawful] whoredom, but from marriage sometime to them lesum, to the intent that they might thereby more easily wait on prayer and godly study; not refusing honest corporeal exercise, by example of Saint Paul, to sustentation of their bodies. Yet—notwithstanding in our days the same was abused among many in idleness and wealthy life, and cloaked with glistening ceremonies of garments and such like, more than in true religion—why have ye shorn away in this matter the wheat together with the vetches? Why have ye knocked down the monasteries, and principal policy of this realm, and counselled the rents thereof unjustly to be appropriated to others? Of the which monasteries every one, by a godly reformation, besides a company to wait on prayer, might have been a college of godly learning, to the support of poor students."†

One of the most distinguished supporters of the Roman Catholic Church in Scotland at this period was the celebrated JOHN LESLEY, Bishop of Ross. He was born on the 29th of September, 1527, and was the son of a priest, probably of Gavin Lesley, rector of Kingussie. He received his education at King's College, Aberdeen, where he took the degree of A.M. In the twentieth year of his age he became a canon of the cathedral churches of Aberdeen and Elgin. He afterwards proceeded to the continent, and spent several years in the prosecution of his studies at Paris, Poitiers, and Toulouse. At Paris he took the degree of LL.D., and read lectures on the canon law for nearly a year. On his return to his native land in April, 1554, he was nominated professor of the canon law in the University of Aberdeen, and was subsequently appointed parson of Oyne and Mortlach, prebendary and canon of the cathedral church of Aberdeen, and official of that diocese. "I did accept," he says, "the office judicator of the diocese of Aberdeen, wherein I travelled ten yerres, and how I did behave myself therein I report myself to the testimonie of the countrie; for besides the ministration of justice in mine owne office, I assisted the sheriffe of the shire with my counsell for execution of justice according to the lawes, and employed alsoe other whyles great travells in compoundinge and agreeinge of differences betwixt parties proceedinge either of deadly feads, or other debates for lands or goods, which is the right office of a judge, as saith the jurisconsult."*

Bishop Lesley.

On the death of Francis II., the first husband of Queen Mary, Lesley was dispatched to France by the leaders of the Roman Catholic party, for the purpose of counteracting the efforts of the Prior of St. Andrew's, and prepossessing the youthful sovereign in favour of their cause. He appears to have discharged his mission with fidelity and zeal, and, at the same time, to have recommended himself to the good graces of the queen. Shortly after her return to her own dominions, he was admitted an ordinary judge of the Court of Session; the abbacy of Lindores was also conferred upon him; he was nominated a member of the privy council, and on the bishopric of Ross becoming vacant early in 1565, the queen likewise secured to him this high preferment. To the fortunes of his unhappy sovereign Lesley adhered with unshaken fidelity. After her flight into England, he acted as one of her commissioners during the conferences which were held at York, and subsequently at Westminster, and was afterwards appointed her ambassador to the English court. He was deeply implicated in the various intrigues and plots which were from time to time concocted for Mary's restoration to liberty and to her throne; and his zeal for the service of his royal mistress repeatedly subjected him to imprisonment, and exposed him to considerable personal danger. He was ultimately allowed to retire into France in the month of January, 1574. In the following year he was sent by the queen on a mission to Rome, where he received a very gracious reception from the reigning Pope, Gregory XIII. During his three years' residence at the papal court he prepared for the press his "General History of Scotland," which was published at Rome in the year 1578. Having received the appointment of papal nuncio to the imperial court, Lesley travelled through Germany,

* Edition 1835, pp. 5—7.

† Ibid., p. 110.

* Lesley's Negotiations, p. 7; Irving's Literary Scotchmen, vol. i. p. 124.

and remained for some time at Prague, where the Emperor Maximilian was then residing. After visiting the Duke of Bavaria, and other Roman Catholic princes of the empire, he proceeded towards the coast of France adjacent to Britain, with the view of promoting an intrigue for the restoration of the Romish Church in Scotland, through the influence of the Earl of Atholl. This scheme having failed, in consequence of the sudden death of the earl in April, 1579, Lesley took up his residence in France, where he was soon afterwards appointed by the Cardinal de Bourbon, Archbishop of Rouen, suffragan and vice-general of that diocese. He continued to discharge the duties of this office for the space of fourteen years. The civil war between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants was then raging in France, and Lesley took an active part in encouraging the citizens of Rouen to resist the assaults of the Huguenots, who invested that city in 1591. As a reward for his services, he was appointed by Clement VIII. to the vacant bishopric of Constance in Normandy; but he appears to have derived no advantage from this preferment. The distracted state of affairs in France induced him to quit that country and seek refuge in Flanders. In the letter which Queen Mary wrote to Philip on the day before her execution, she entreated him to recompense the faithful services which had been rendered to her by the Bishop of Ross, and Philip accordingly directed the Prince of Parma, governor of the Netherlands, to bestow upon Lesley the first bishopric that should become vacant in those provinces, and in the meantime to provide for him a suitable maintenance. A pension of fifty crowns a month was accordingly assigned to him, and a strenuous effort was made by the nobility and councillors of state to procure for him the vacant archbishopric of Mechlin. But all his schemes of ambition were cut short by his death, which took place at Brussels, 1st May, 1596, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

Lesley was undoubtedly an able and accomplished man, but his acquirements were those of a lawyer and a statesman rather than of a theologian. His principal work is his Latin History of Scotland, which, though elegantly written, and applying in its later portion a good deal of important information, is far inferior to the work of Buchanan. It terminates with the year 1562, and is divided into ten books, the first seven of which are merely an abridgement of the fabulous narration of Hector Boece. He also published an edition of his History in the Scottish language, but extending only from the death of James I. to the year 1661. This work is not a mere transcript of the original sketch, but contains a number of minute details and domestic occurrences, which he probably found it difficult to clothe in classic attire. It contributes, therefore, some few particulars to the materials of our national history; but, as the author remarks, a still higher value is attached to it "as a specimen of pure and vigorous composition."

tion, in his native language, by one of the most able and accomplished Scotchmen of the sixteenth century." Lesley is also the author of a work, in ten books, concerning the "Origin, Manners, and Affairs of the Scots;" of an acute but unscrupulous defence of Queen Mary; of a tract on female government, in answer to Knox's "Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women;" and of a religious treatise entitled "Pious Consolations for an Afflicted Mind," which he composed during his confinement in the Tower of London, and transmitted to Queen Mary, who derived so much comfort from it that she translated a portion of it into French verse. A similar work, which he prepared soon after, and sent to her on the 1st of October, 1573, was also highly appreciated.*

ADAM BLACKWOOD, another zealous defender of Queen Mary, was born at Dunfermline in the year 1539. As his father was killed in battle before he himself had reached his tenth year, and his mother died soon after, overwhelmed with grief, his grand-uncle, Robert Reid, Bishop of Orkney, and president of the Court of Session, took charge of his education, and sent him to the University of Paris, where he made considerable progress in classical studies; and at a subsequent period applied himself to mathematical and philosophical pursuits. He resided two years in the University of Toulouse, and soon after his return to Paris published in 1574 a poem on the death of the infamous Charles IX.; and in the following year his first two books on the connection between religion and government. The province of Poitou had been assigned to Queen Mary for the payment of her dowry; and, on the recommendation of James Beaton, Archbishop of Glasgow, she bestowed upon Blackwood the office of a counsellor or judge of the parliament of Poitiers. After taking up his residence in that city, he published a reply—the earliest that appeared—to Buchanan's masterly dialogue, "De Jure Regni." Though this treatise displays no inconsiderable amount of talent and learning, it has now sunk into oblivion. After the death of Queen Mary, he published a long account of her death, and a zealous vindication of her character, entitled, "Martyre de la Roynie d'Escoce," &c. The writer who could compose a panegyric on the bloodthirsty monster Charles IX., the promoter of the St. Bartholomew Massacre, was not likely to feel any hesitation in undertaking the defence of Mary's most ambiguous or even criminal actions; and not contented with employing the most unblushing falsehoods to vindicate her conduct, Blackwood has exhausted the vocabulary of invective and abuse in heaping the most scurrilous charges upon her enemies, especially upon Queen Elizabeth and John Knox. The former he places among the vilest of the human race, and the latter he accuses of the most revolting crimes, and describes him as a true monster and apostle of Satan, an apostate and an incestuous person.* Besides these, his best known works, Blackwood is the author of a small volume of poems, and a collection of pious meditations in prose and verse. He died in 1613, at the age of seventy-four. An elegant edition of his works, in Latin and French, was published in Paris in 1644.

* Literary Scotchmen, vol. i. pp. 122—146.

In this enumeration of the Scottish prose literature of this period mention must be made of the autobiography of SIR JAMES MELVIL, the prudent and moderate statesman, and faithful adherent of Queen Mary; and of the "Chronicles of Scotland," written by Lindsay of Pitscottie, and extending from the accession of James II. to the middle of the reign of Mary. But the literary pretensions of this prolix and undigested record do not rank high, though its general tediousness is occasionally relieved by passages of graphic and picturesque narration.

The intestine broils by which Scotland was at this time distracted were peculiarly unfavourable to the cultivation of the Muses, and the Scottish poets of this age were few in number and far inferior in poetical genius to their predecessors. One of the best known of these versifiers is SIR RICHARD MAITLAND, Land of Thirlstone, or Lethington, who, as Dr. Irving remarks, is entitled to the remembrance of posterity, both as a cultivator and as a preserver of Scottish poetry. He belonged to an old and distinguished family, and was born in the year 1496. At an early period of life he lost his father, who fell on the 9th of September, 1513, at the fatal field of Flodden. He received his education at the University of St. Andrew's, and afterwards in France, where he remained several years, in order to prosecute the study of the laws. On his return to his native country, he is said to have recommended himself to the favour of James V., but it is not known what office he held at the court of this accomplished monarch. In the year 1554, he was nominated an extraordinary lord of session, and on the 13th of November following was admitted by the title of Lethington.† He was soon after appointed one of the auditors of the treasurer's accounts, and on two occasions acted as a commissioner to adjust the differences with England regarding the Borders. In the discharge of this duty he displayed great prudence and sagacity, and his conduct was highly lauded by the English commissioners. Some time

* In spite of Blackwood's notorious mendacity, his statements are quoted by Miss Strickland, in her recent "Life of Queen Mary," as if they were entitled to implicit credit.

† By the original constitution of the Court of Session the king had the power of naming three or four lords from his great council of parliament, who might, as extraordinary members, sit and vote with the ordinary judges (Act 1537, c. 40). But the numbers allowed by this act was so far exceeded that seven, and in some cases even eight, extraordinary lords appear in the same sederunt. This abuse gave rise to great complaints, and it was finally put an end to by an act of the legislature, passed 10th George I., c. 19. — (See Poems of Sir Richard Maitland, published by the Maitland Club, Introductory Notice, p. xxxi.)

between the years 1559 and 1561 Sir Richard was deprived of his sight, as we learn both from an entry in the Records of the Court of Session* and from his poem on the arrival of Queen Mary in Scotland (A.D. 1561), in which he thus pathetically alludes to this calamity:—

"And though that I to serve be not sa abill
As I was wont, because I may not see,
Yet in my hairt I shall be firm and stabil."

This melancholy deprivation did not, however, incapacitate him from business, for in 1561 he was admitted an ordinary lord of session; and, in 1562, he was also nominated Lord Privy Seal, and a member of the privy council. But in 1567 he resigned his office of Keeper of the Seal in favour of his second son, John, the ancestor of the Earls of Lauderdale. As became his judicial office, Sir Richard took no active part in the civil war which raged between the adherents of the king, and of his mother; but he was, nevertheless, involved in the sufferings inflicted upon the unsuccessful party. His eldest son, the able but unscrupulous Secretary Maitland, was ultimately a zealous partizan of the queen; and as Lethington had been temporarily granted to him by his father, the king's party laid waste the lands, seized the castle, and retained forcible possession of the estate till the year 1581, when it was restored to its venerable owner. His patience and resignation under this grievous wrong may be learned from his poem entitled "Solace in Age":—

"Now me to spulye † some men nocht spares;
To tak my gear na captaine cares,
They are sae bauld;
Yet time may come may mend my sairs, ‡
Tho' I be auld.
"Some now by force of men of weir, §
My house, my lands, and my gear,
Fra me they hald;
Yet as I may shall mak gude cheer,
Tho' I be auld.
"Sae weel is kend || my innocence
That I will nocht for myne offence
Flyte like ane skald; ¶
But thank God, and tak patience:
For I am auld."

In 1571 a still more painful calamity befell the aged knight by the death, at the age of twenty-two, of his youngest son, Thomas, the author of several Latin poems, but better known as one of the interlocutors in the masterly dialogue of Buchanan, "De Jure Regni." Two years later, the eventful career of his eldest son came to a melancholy termination;  and his only remaining son John, who was made prisoner with his brother, was closely confined in Tantallon Castle. After the downfall of Morton, however, he was restored to liberty, and in 1581 was appointed by James VI. ordinary lord of session. The infirmities of advanced age had now unfitted the venerable Sir Richard for the discharge of all the duties of his office, a

* Poems of Sir Richard Maitland, published by the Maitland Club, Introductory Notice, p. xxxiv.

† Spoil. ‡ Sores. § War.
|| Known. ¶ Scold.  Supra, vol. ii. p. 14

the lords of session, in 1584, "granted him immunity and license to attend when he pleased." But his bodily infirmities increased to such an extent, that in little more than a month after this indulgence had been conceded to him, he was compelled to resign his seat on the bench. On his final retirement from public life he was permitted to exercise the unusual privilege of resigning in favour of a particular person, and of reserving to himself, during his life, the fees and profits of the office. His protracted life was now near a close: full of years and honours, he died on the 20th of March, 1586, in the ninetieth year of his age. His wife, who was a daughter of Thomas Cranston, of Corsby, a younger branch of the noble family of Cranston, and had been the faithful sharer of his joys and sorrows for sixty years, died on his funeral-day. Sir Richard Maitland has been highly lauded for his benevolence and patriotism, as well as for his learning and piety. His poems, which appear to have been all written after he had reached his sixtieth year, are characterised by shrewdness and good sense, rather than by warmth of fancy and brilliancy of imagination. They are pervaded too by a love of justice and hatred of oppression, and breathe a fine spirit of benevolence and philanthropy; but they are chiefly valuable on account of the light which they cast upon the manners and customs of the age. The memory of this amiable old man deserves no less to be cherished on account of the good service which he has rendered to the literature of his native country, in preserving from oblivion many beautiful specimens of the genius of the poets of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. He appears to have commenced his collection of ancient Scottish poetry about the year 1555, and to have continued his labour of love for many years. His collection consists of two volumes, a folio and a quarto: the former contains 176 different poems; the latter, consisting of ninety-six pieces, is in the handwriting of his youngest daughter, Mary, and must have been finished very shortly before the death of the venerable knight. Of these precious volumes, which are now deposited in the Pepysian Library, in Magdalene College, Cambridge, the learned Pinkerton thus speaks:—"The prodigious influence, and great and universal acquaintance of Sir Richard Maitland, joined to his being a tolerable poet, and a man of curiosity and taste himself, afford his collection every possible advantage. Hence it may be looked upon as the chief treasure of ancient Scottish poetry."* On account of his pre-eminence as a collector of the poems of his predecessors, his name has been assumed as the designation of a modern literary club, formed for the purpose of rendering the unpublished writings of the early Scottish authors more accessible to the general reader. One of the earliest works printed by this society was their patron's "History of the House of Setoun," which, up to that time, had remained in manuscript; and they shortly after issued a collected edition of his poetical works, some specimens of which had been previously published by Pinkerton and Sibbald.

Perhaps the most curious and interesting of Sir Richard's poems are his satirical pieces, in which he lashes the follies and vices of his age. His "Satire on the Toun Ladyes" gives a minute and amusing description of the female dress and manners of that period, and may be compared with Lindsay's "Supplication against Syde Tails," probably written not long before:—

"Sum wives of the burrows-toun
Sa wonder vane are and wantoun,
In world they wair* not what to wear,
On claithes they wair† monie a croun,
And all for new fangleness of geir.‡

"Their gouns are costlie and trimlie trails;
Barrit with velvours§ slieve, neck, and tails,
And their foreskirt of silks seir,
Of finest camroche their fak-sails,||
And all for new fangleness of geir.

"And of fine silk their furrit clokis,
With hingand sleeves like geill-pokes;
Na preaching will gar them forbeir
To wear all things that sin provokes,
And all for new fangleness of geir.

"Their wyliecots man weill be hewit,
Broiderit richt braid, with pasmentis sewit.¶
I trow, wha wald the matter speir,
That their gudmen had cause to rue it,
That ever their wives wear sic geir.

"Their woven hose of silk are schawin,
Barrit abone with tasteis drawin;
With gartens of ane new manner
To gar their courtliness be knawin;
And all for new fangleness of geir.

"Sometimes they will beir up their gown,
To schaw their wyliecot hingen down;
And sometimes baith they will up beir,
To schaw their hose of black or brown;
And all for new fangleness of geir.

"Their collars, carecats, and hals beeds,††
With velvet hats high on their heads,
Cordit with gold like ane younker,
Broiderit about with goldin threads,
And all for new fangleness of geir.

"Their shoon‡‡ of velvet, and their muills;§§
In kirk are not content of stulls,|||
The sermon when they sit to hear;
But carry cushions like vain fuills,
And all for new fangleness of geir.

"They say wives are so delicat
In feeding, feasting, and bankat,¶¶
Some not content are with sic cheer
As weill may suffice their estate,
For new fangleness of cheer and geir.

"And some will spend mair, I hear say,
In spice and drops on ane day,
Nor wald their mothers in ane year;
Whilk will gar mony pack decay
When they sa vainlie waste their geir.

"Therefor, young wives, especiallie
Of all sic faults hald you free;
And moderately to live now leir
On meat, and claiht accordingly;
And not sa vainlie waste your geir.

* Wot. † Spend. ‡ Attire. § Velvet.

|| An upper garment, or robe, of fine cambric, from fak, a fold or ply of anything.

¶ Embroidered with any costly material.

 Garters. †† Beads for the hause or throat.

‡‡ Shoes.

§§ Slippers usually made of fine cloth or velvet, and embroidered. ||| Stools. ¶¶ Banquet.  Live.

* Preface to Ancient Scottish Poems, p. vii.

"Leif,* burgess men, ere all be lost
On your wives to mak sic cost,
Which may gar all your bairns bleir; †
Seche that may not want wine and roast
Is able for to waste some geir.

"Between them, and nobles of blude
Na difference but ane velvet huid; ‡
Their camroche curches are as dear;
Their other claithes are as gude,
And they as costlie in other geir.

"Of burgess wives though I speak plain,
Some landwart ladies are as vain,
As by their claitthing may appeir;
Weirand gayer, nor them may gain:
On our vain claiths wastand geir."

"There is nothing new under the sun." Maitland's "Complaint aganes the Lang Law-sutes," shows at how early a period the long complained of abuses arising out of protracted legal proceedings originated:—

"Sair is the recent murmur and regret
Among the lieges risen of the lair;
Thro' all the countrie baith of rich and puir;
Plenand § upon the Lords of the Sait,
That their lang process may no man endure.

"The Barons say that they have far mair spendit
Upon the law, or their mater was endit,
Nor || it was worth: therefore richt sair they rue
To found ane plea that ever they pretendit;
But left it to their heirs to pursue.

"The puir folk say that they, for falt of spending
Man leave the law, it is sae lang in ending;
Lang process them to poverty has brocht:
For of their skaith by law can get na mending,
That they are fain to gree ¶ for thing of nocht.

"Some gives the wyte  that there is on the Sessioun,
Some not sae cunning, nor of sae gude discretioun,
As there before into that room has been;
Whilk, doing justice, keepit their profession;
Of whom their was nae cause for to complain.

"Now ye that are nocht of this Sait content
Pass to the Prince; to him your cause lament;
And him exhort, and pray affectionlie,
That in that Sait he wald nae man present,
In time to come, but they that are worthy!

"Gude cunning †† men, that are wise and discreet;
Practitioners gude, and for that senate meet;
Men of gude conscience, honestie and fame;
That can with wit and truth all matters treit;
And has by prudence purchased ane gude name.

"And syne gar call the College of Justice,
All their dependers, and others that are wise,
And try the cause of law the langsomeness;
And gar them soon some gude order devise
To further justice, and shorten the lang process," &c.

As a pendant to this complaint respecting the "law's delay," take the poet's description of the "Evils of New-found Laws."

"Lord God how lang will this law last,
By whilk some trew men are oppress;
Of housis and landis dispossess
Without ane cause?
Some sair are drest,
Some sair molest,
By new-found laws.

"For lack of justice some getts wrang,
And some by traitouris tyrannis wrang;
Some in the Sessioun lyeis ou'r lang,
And hulic †† speeds;
Sair is the sang
Puir folks amang
That justice needs.

* Leave. † Cry till their eyes be red. ‡ Hood.
§ Complaining. || Than. ¶ Agree.
 Blame. †† Skilful. ‡‡ Slowly.

"By mein of court some getts land,
Thinking that conqueis* ay sall stand;
Tho' courts has been changend
As does the moon;
That some haveand
Ane wark in hand,
And leif it soon.

"Think ye that are sa proud oppressiours,
Tho' ye in court have intercessiours,
That God will thole† sa great transgressiours Unpunischet be?
For God's disgressiours,
And wrang possiours,
Repent sail ye."

Maitland's poem, entitled "Against Oppressioun of the Commouns," as Pinkerton justly observes, "does the highest honour to the philanthropy of the author, and merits praises superior to any that genius can procure." The oppression of the commons inveighed against in this piece, seems to have been occasioned chiefly by their exchanging spiritual for temporal exactors of tithes. "Everything in the Book of Discipline that repugned to the corrupt affections of the nobility," says John Knox, "was termed in their mockage 'devout imaginations.' Some of them had greedily grippet the possessions of the Kirk, and others thought they would not lack their parte of Christ's cote. There were nane mair unmerciful to the puir ministers than were they that had the grittest rentes of the kirkes. But, according to the auld proverbe, 'The bellie has nae ears.'" Maitland denounces in indignant terms the exactions of the landlords and lay proprietors of tithes, and entreats the lords and lairds to show kindness and liberality to their tenants.

"It is grit pitie for to see
How the commons of this countrie
For theft and reif,‡ and plaine oppressioun,
Can naething keip in their possession
Whair of that thay may mak ane lyfe;
Yet nane will punishe that transgression;
Till nocht be left to man nor wyfe.

"Some with deir farme are herriet § hail,
That want to pay but penny mail;
Some by thair lordis are oppress,
Put frae the land that thay possessed;
Sair || service has some herriet soon;
For carrage als ¶ some has no rest,
Tho' thair ain wark sould ly undone.

"Sum commons that has been welk stakit
Under kirkmen are now all wrakit; **
Sin that the teind, and the kirk landis
Came in grit temporal memnis handis;
Thay gar the tennents pay sic sowmes ††
As thay will ask, or wha gane standis
Thay will be put soon frae thair rowmes.

"The teind †† whilk tennents had before
Of thair ain mailings, corn, and store,
Thair laird has taen it our thair heid;
And gars them to his yaird it leid;
But thair ain stock thay dare not steir,
Tho' all thair bairns sould want breid,
Till thay have led thair teind ilk yeir. §§

* Gain. † Endure. ‡ Robbery.
§ Robbed, cleaned out. || Sore. ¶ Also.
 Wrecked. †† Sums. ‡‡ Tithes.
§§ The tithes which the farmers used to purchase from the monks were now held by the landlord, who compelled his tenants to convey them to his barnyard, before they were permitted to cart home their own corn.

" Sic extortoun and taxatioun
Was never seen into this nation
Taen of the commons of this land,
Of whilk sun is left waste land,
Beacaus few may sic changes beir;
Mouy lus whips now in thair hand
That wont to have baith jak and speir. *

" Whairthro the haill communitie
Is brocht now to sic povertie;
For they that had gude hors and geir,
Has scantlie now ane crooket meir; †
And for thair saddils they have sods;
They have nae weapons worthe for weir;
But maun defend with stanes and clods.

" Thairfor, my lordis, I yow pray
For the puir commons find some way;
Your land to thame for sic price geif, †
As on thair mailing they may leif, §
Sufficientlie to thair estait;
Syne thame defend that naue thame grief;
That they may serve you ayre and lait.

" Riche commons are richt profitable
Whan thay, to serve thair lord are able,
Thair native cuntries to defend Frae thame that hurt it wad pretend;
For we will be ower few ane nummer
Gif commons to the weir || not wend;
Nobils may not beir all the cummer.

" Help the commons baith lord and laird!
And God thairfore sall you reward;
And gif you will not thaim supplic,
God will you plaig thairfor justlie,
And your successioun after you,
Gif they sall have nae mair pitie
On the commons nor ye have now."

The border thieves, taking advantage of the distracted state of the country during the contests between the Protestants and Romanists—especially after the death of Regent Moray—"made continual herships, stouths, and reifs upon the peaceable subjects dwelland in the innecountries [inland counties]." In the year 1570 they made an incursion into Lauderdale, and carried off the whole movable property belonging to Sir Richard and his tenants, on the lands of Blythe and Tullos. According to a statement drawn up by the worthy knight himself, the freebooters carried off thirteen score of milk ewes, with their lambs, nine yeld ewes, seven score of wedders, and an equal number of hogs, seventeen cows, six stirks, fourteen draught oxen, four stots, with "ane dun horse of thrie yeir auld." The poet revenged himself upon these reivers by a poem "Aganis the Theivis of Liddisdail," in which he describes with considerable humour the habits of these "minions of the moon."

" Of Liddisdale the common theifs
Sae pertlie steals now and reifs, ¶
That nane may keip
Horse, nolt, nor sheep; nor yet dare sleep,
For their mischiefs.

" They plainly throw the country rides,
I trow the meikle devil them guides!
Where they onsett;
Aye, in their gait  there is nae yett ††
Nor dure them bides. ††

* Many who were formerly accustomed to appear armed in the field, were now obliged to betake themselves to the humblest employment.

† Mare. † Give. § Live.
|| War. ¶ Robs.  Road.
†† Gate. †† Door them hinders.

" They leave richt nocht, wharever they ga;
There can na thing be hid them fra.
For, gif men wald
Their houses hald, than wax they bald
To burn and slay.

" Thai* theifs have neirhand † herriet haill
Etrick forest and Lauderdaill;
Now are they gane
In Lothiane; and spairis nane
That thay will wail. ‡

" Thai lands are with stouth § sa socht
To extreme povertie are brocht.
Thair wicked scrowis ||
Has laid the plowis, ¶ that nane, or few, is
That are left oucht.

" But  common taking of blak mail,
They that had flesh, and breid, and ail,
Now are sae wrakit,
Maid puir and nakit, fain to be slakit
With watter-kail. ††

" Thai theifs that steills and tursis hame, ††
Ilk ane of thame has ane to-name; §§
Will of the Lawis;
Hab of the Schawis; to mak bare wa's,
They think na schame.

" They spuilie puir men of thair packs, |||
They leif thame nocht on bed, nor backs;
Baith hen and cock,
With reill and rok, ¶¶ the Lairds Jock
All with him tak's.

" They leif not spindill, spoone, nor speit, ***
Bed, bowster, blanket, sark, nor scheet.
Johne of the Parke
Rypes ††† kist and ark; ††† for all sic wark
He is richt meit.

" He is weil kend, Johne of the Syde,
A gretar theif did never ryde.
He nevir tyres,
For to brek byres; ou'r muir and myres,
Ou'r gude ane gyide.

" Thair is ane, callit Clement's Hob,
Frae ilk puir wyfe reiffs her wob. §§§
And all the laif, |||||
Whatever thay haif; the devil resave
Thairfor his gob. ¶¶¶

" So sic grit stouth wha'er wald trow it,
But gif sum great man it allowit?
Richt sair I trow,
Tho' it be trow; thair is sae few
That dar avow it.

" Of some great men they have sic gait,
That redy are thame to debait;
And will up weir
Thair stolen geir; that nane dar steir
Thame, air nor lait. ****

" What causes thieves us ou'r-gang,
But want of justice us amang?
Nane takes care,
Tho' all forfay; nae man will spair
Now to do wrang.

" Of stouth tho' now they cum gud speid,
That nather of men nor God hes dreid,
Yet, or I dee,
Some sall thame see, hing on a tree
Till they be deid."

* These. † Almost. ‡ Select. § Theft.
|| Larvæ (fig). ¶ Ploughs.  Besides.

†† Broth made with vegetables, without meat.
‡‡ Pack up and carry off.

§§ Nick-name, or nom de guerre. Owing to the Borderers being divided into large clans bearing the same surname, individuals were usually distinguished by some epithet derived from their place of residence, personal qualities, or descent. |||| Wallets.

¶¶ Both the spinning instrument and the yarn.

 Spit. ††† Searches. ‡‡‡ Meal chest.

§§§ Web. ||||| Rest. ¶¶¶ Mouth.

* Early or late. These border freebooters were frequently protected by the great barons.

The poems which follow are valuable chiefly on account of the striking picture which they give of the distracted state of the country, torn by the incessant and bloody contests between "king's men" and "queen's men;" the corruption which prevailed at court; and the miseries endured by the commons, who were oppressed and robbed by the barons at their pleasure; "kirkmen cled lyk men of weir;" the laws openly trodden under foot, or perverted for the oppression of the poor; all mirth and gladness banished from the land. Such is the view which Maitland gives of his native country in his poems "On the Miseries of the Time," "On the Troublous Times," "Satire on the Age," "Against the Wars," "Against Discord among the Lords," and "Lament for the Disorders of the Countree."

SATIRE ON THE AGE.

"Where is the blythness that has been
Baith in burgh and landwart seen
Amang lordis and ladies schein,*
Dancing, singing, game, and play?
But weill I wat nocht what they mein;
All merriness is worne away."

"For now I hear na worde of Yule
In kirk, on cassay,† nor in skull;
Lordis lettis their kitchings cule
And draws them to the abbay;
And skant has ane to keep their mule;
All housholding is worne away;

"I saw no gysaris ‡ all this yeir;
But kirkmen cled lyk men of weir,
That never cummis in the queir.§
Lyk ruffians is their array;
To teach and preach that will not leir; ||
The kirk gudes they waste away."

"Kirkmen affore were gude of lyfe,
Preachit, teachit, and staunchit stryfe;
They fearit nather sword nor knyfe,
For love of God the suith to say:
All honorit them baith man and wyfe;
Devotion was nocht away."

"Our fathers wyse were, and discreit,
They had baith honour, men, and meit,
With love they did their tennents treit;
And had aneuch in press to lay;
They wantit nather malt nor wheat;
And merriness was nocht away."

"And we hald nather Yule nor Pace,
But seek our meit from place to place;
And we have nather luck nor grace;
We gar our landis doubill pay;
Our tennents cry, 'Alace! alace!
That routh and pittie is away!'"

"Now we have mair, it is weill kend,
Nor our forbears ¶ had to spend;
But far less at the yeirs end;
And never has ane merrie day;
God will na ryches to us send,
Sa lang as honour is away."

"We waste far mair now lyke vain fuillis,
We and our paige to turs our muillis,
Nor they did than that haid grit Yuillis;
Of meit and drink said never nay:
They had lang furmes  where we have stuillis,
And merriness was nocht away;

"Of our wanthrift †† sum wytes ††† playes,
And sum their wantoune vain arrayis;
Sum the wyte on their wyfes layes,
That in the court wald gang sa gay;
And care nocht wha the merchand payis
Till pairt of land be put away."

"The kirkmen keeps na professioun;
The temporall men commits oppressioun,
Puttand the puire from their possessioun;
Na kynd of feir of God have they,
They cummar * baith the kirk and sessioun,
And chases charitie away."

"When ane of them susteinis wrang
We cry for justice, heid and hang;
But when our neibouris we our-gang
We lawbour justice to delay;
Affectioun blindis us sa lang,
Alle equitie is put away."

"To mak actis we have sum feill;
God wott gif that we keep them weill!
We cum to bar with jack of steill,
As we wald bost † the judge and 'fray;
Of sic justice I have na skeill,
Where reull and ordour is away."

"Our laws are lichtleit ‡ for abusoun;
Sumtyme is clokit with collusioun;
Whilk causes of bluid the great effusioun,
For na man spairis now to slay;
What bringis cuntries to confusioun
But where that justice is away?"

"Wha is the wyte, § wha can schew us?
Wha but our nobillis that sould know us,
And till honorabill deidis draw us!
Let never comounweill decay;
Or els sum mischeif will bewaf us,
And nobillness we put away."

"Put our awin lawis to executione
Upon transgressouris mak punitioun
To cruell folk siek na remission;
For peace and justice let us pray;
In dreid sum strange new institutione
Cum, and our custome put away."

"Amend your lyfes, ane and all,
And be war of ane suddan fall;
And pray to God, that maid us all,
To send us joy that lasteis ay;
And let us nocht to sin be thrall;
But put all vyce and wrang away."

NA KYNDNES AT COURT WITHOUT SILLER. ||

"Sometime to court I did repair,
Therein some errands for to dress;
Thinkand I had some friends their
To help forward my business;
Bot, nocht the less,
I fand nathing but doubliness;
Auld kindnes helps nocht ane hair."

"To ane grit court-man I did speir; ¶
That I trowit my friend had been,
Because we war of kin sa near;
To him my matter I did mene;
But, with disdane,
He fled as I had done him tene;
And wald nocht bide my tale to heir."

"I wend, that he, in word and deed,
For me, his kynsman, sould have wrocht;
But to my spech he tuke na heed;
Neernes of blude he set at nocht;
Than weel I thoct,
When I for sibness  to him socht,
It was the wrang way that I geid. ††

"My hand I put into my sleeve,
And furth of it ane purse I drew;
And said I brocht it him to give;
Baith gold and silver I him schew; ††
Than he did rue
That he unkindlie me misknew,
And hint the purse fast in his neif. §§

* Bright. † Causeway. ‡ Masquers.
§ Choir. || Learn. ¶ Forefathers.
 Benches. †† Unthrif, extravagance. ††† Blames.

* Cumber. † Threaten. ‡ Despised.
§ Blame. || Money. ¶ Inquire.
 Relationship. †† Went. †† Shewed.
§§ Fist.

"Frae time he gat the purse in hand
He kyndlie cousin callit me,
And bade me gar* him understand,
My business all hailalie;
And sware that he
My true and faithfull friend sould be
In court as I please him command.

"For whilk better it is, I trow,
Into the courte to get supplé
To have ane purse of fine gold fou,†
Nor to the hiest of degree,
Of kyn to be;
Sae alters our nobilitie.
Grit kynrent helps lytill now.

"Therefore, my friends, gif ye will mak
All court men yours as ye wald,
Gude gold and silver with you tak;
Than to get help ye may be bald;
For it is tauld,
Kindness of court is coft and sald,‡ Nearness of kyn, na thing thay rak."§

"LAMENT FOR THE DISORDERS OF THE COUNTRYE.

"O Lord our sin has done the tein,
That plaigit thus has this countrie;
I trow was never heard nor seen,
In Scotland greater miserie:
Great evil in to this land we see
A slauchter, hership, theft and reif;
Destruction of all pollicie,
And all manner of maist mischief.

"Now wardlie wisdom is deceit,
And falsset haldin pollicie;
Richt few from guill can now debait,
So great is the hypocrisie:
Some will speak fair and friendfullie,
For profit wald dissaive their brother;
Sa rife|| is infidelitie,
Ane kinsman skant may trow ane other.

"Among the Lordis syn the great strife,
Misrule in all this region;
Whilk has gart mony lose their life;
And troublit burges and baroun:
Craftsmen and commons are put down
By theft, reif, and continual weir;¶
Neir herreit is our principal town,
Our merchands daylie wastund geir.

"Frae some is taen baith house and land,
Wrangouslie as the manner shaws;
Whom doing wrang they never fand,
But for all cryme will bide the laws:
Baith of their deeds and their saws,
Yet are they spulyet of their rent,
Wha has this done the Great God knows,
Wha grant them grace for to repent.

"Some has their place brunt in gleid,
Their guidis spulyet hailalie;
Their servants slain, some brunt to deid,
Them selves taen uncourteouslie,
And haldin in captivite;.
Wha wald have for ane missive bill,
Obeyit the auctoritie,
And count at my Lord Regent's will.

"Alas, it is ane cairfull case,
That our Lords cannot agree;
Whilk for to do give they had grace,
Wald stench his great iniquitie:
Ane thing there is that troubles me,
Thocht some wald fain mak gude concord,
Yet ay for ane there is twentie,
To hound †† muteine and saw ‡‡ discord.

"But we sould rather all lament,
Their plaigs perturbing us sae sair;
And of our sins us repent,
With firm purpose to sin nae mair;

Syne pray to God baith late and air
To tak frae us this cruel scourge.
And frae his mercie stanche our cair,
And of all weir this country purdge.

"My Lordis all that are divydit,
Could ye aggre it were the best;
And gar this realm be godly guidit,
All things to be with wisdom drest;
Than better might ye put to rest,
This land that now is furthe of ordour,
And tham releive that are opprest,
The theifis stanch and rewl the bordour.

"Sen ye are of ane nation all,
Ilk ane of other have pitie;
Ye wait* not yet what may befall,
Sik chance has been richt hastelie,
May gar you think that unitie,
Sall to you all be profitabil,
And needfull that ye friends be,
Ye ken your courts are never stabil.

"Wha ever get the upper hand,
Of their reward they know nothing;
Nor yet how lang that they sall stand
To have the rewl of Queen or King:
And speciallie, when they are young,
Therefore ye sould tak richt gude gaird,
Of lasting feid† how on you bring,
Uncertain syne of your rewaird.

"O Lord, sik grace send to us here
All Scottis men for to aggre;
Ilk ane to bruik‡ their land and geir,
That them pertenis richteouslie;
Syne perfyte justice we may see,
In courts, consistorie, and sessioun,
Craftsmen and commons may peaciablie
Their living win without oppressioun."§

"The Laird of Lethingtoun's Counsell to his Son, being in the Court," was in all probability addressed to his eldest son, the famous Secretary Maitland.
In its shrewdness and knowledge of the world, it bears some resemblance to the counsels which Polonius gave to his son Laertes, in "Hamlet."

"My son, in court gif thou pleisais remain,
Thy my counsel into thy mynd imprint:
In thy speaking luik that thou be nocht vain;
Behald and hear, and to thy toung tak tent;
Be no liar, else thou art schent;
Found thee on treuth, gif thou would weill betide;
To govern all and rule be nocht our bent:
He rules weill that weill in court can guide.

"Be nocht ane scorner, nor fainyeit flatterer,
Nor yet ane rounder§ of invented tales;
Of it thou hears be nocht ane clatterer;
Fall nocht in plee for thing that lyttill vailis:
Haive nocht to do with other men's faillis;
Fra wicked men thou draw thee far on side;
Thou art ane full gif thou with faillis dailis:
He rules weill that weill in court can guide.

"Bewair whom to thy counsel thou reveal,
Sum may seem true and yet dissemblers be;
Be of thy promise and condition leil;
Waist nocht thy guid in prodigalitie;
Nor put thine honour into jeopardie;
With folk disfamit nather gang nor ryde;
With wilfull men to argue is folleie:
He rules weill that weill in court can guide.

"Be no dyser nor playster at the cairts,
But gif it be for pastyme, or small thing;
Be nocht blawin with winds of all airts,||
Constance in gude of wisdom is ane sign;
Be wise and tentie, in thy governing,
And try them weill in whom thou wilt confide;
Sum fair words will give, wald see thee hing:¶
He rules weill that weill in court can guide.

* Make. † Full. ‡ Bought and sold.
§ Reck, regard. || Abundant. ¶ War.
• Sayings. †† Stir up. ‡‡ Sow.

* Wot. † Feud. ‡ Enjoy.
§ Propagator. || Quarters. ¶ Hang.

"Attour * all things ay to thy prince be true
In thoct, and deed, in word, in wark, and sicht;
Fra tressonabill company eschew;
Thy prince honour, and proffit at thy nicht;
Set ay forwar the puir baith day and nicht;
And let na thing the common weill elyde;
And at all time maintein justice and richt:
He rules weill that weill in court can guide.

"Press nocht to be exalted above uther,
For gif thou do, thou sall be sair invyt;
Great perill is to tak in hand the ruther, †
Till first that thy experience be tryt:
Think, at the last thy doing will be spyt,
Thocht thou with slicht wald cover it and hyde;
And all thy craft shall at the cross be cryt:
He rules weill that weill in court can guide.

"Thocht thou in court be with the heichest plaicit,
In honour, office, or in dignitie,
Think that sumtime thou may fra it chaisit;
As some has been before, and yet may be;
Needful it is, therefore, to gang warlie,
That raklesslie thou snapper ‡ nocht, nor slyde;
Ken aye thyself best in prosperitie:
He rules weill that weill in court can guide.

"Bewar in giffing of ane hie counsel
In matters grit, and counsel specialle;
Whilk, by the working of the world, may fail,
Thocht it seem never sa apperantlie;
Behald the worldis instabilitie;
That never still into ane stat dois byde;
Bot changing ay, as dois the moone and see:
He rules weill that weill in court can guide.

"Gif with the pepill thou wald lovit be,
Be gentle, lawlie, and meik in thy estait;
For an thou be uncourteus, proude and hie,
Than all the world shall thee detest and hait:
Flee flaying, flattering, falsheid, and dissait;
Invent nathing that may the realme devyde,
Or shall occasion trouble and debait:
He rules weill that weill in court can guide.

"Grund § all thy doing upon suithfastnes;
And hald thee ay gude company amang;
Gather na geir with craft and wretchitnes;
Preiss nocht to conqueis || ony thing with wrang;
Evill-gottin gndis lastys never lang:
Thocht all war thyne, within this world sa wyde,
Thou sall fra it, or it fra thee sall gang:
He rules weill that weill in court can guide.

"Above all things, I thee exhort and pray,
To ples thy God set all thy busie cuire,
And syne thy prince serve, luif weill and obey;
And, as thou may, be helpand ay the puire;
Sen ¶ ertylie things will nocht ay endure,
Thairfor in hevyn ane place for thee provide,
Whair thair is joy, rest, glori, and all plesour;
Unto the wilk eternal God us guide."

In the year 1568, when the prevailing pestilence compelled men from the dread of infection to abandon their usual employments, George Bannatyne, a citizen of Edinburgh, compiled a volume of miscellaneous Scottish poetry, which is surpassed in real value and importance by no other existing collection. To this "Ballat Buik" we are indebted for the preservation of the poems of ALEXANDER SCOTT, "the Anacreon of Scotland," as Pinkerton, with somewhat exaggerated praise, has termed him. He flourished about the year 1560, but nothing is known of his birth or connexions, the nature of his employment, or the events of his life. From some detached hints scattered through his works, he appears to have been a layman and a friend to the Reformation. The local allusions contained in his poem on the "Justing of Adamson and Syme" have given rise to the conjecture that he resided in Dalkeith. From various other passages it is certain that much of his life was spent, if not in the city, at least in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh.* One of his poems alludes to his wife. He is usually placed at the head of the early minor Scottish poets. His compositions, which are nearly all of an amatory character, display considerable elegance and harmony; and his style, compared with that of his poetical contemporaries, is remarkably terse and precise. "Without displaying," says Mr. David Laing, "either the same energy and inventive powers, or the depth of feeling and the comprehension which distinguish the works of his more illustrious predecessors, Scott's poems, independent of their poetical merit, are interesting from the many curious allusions which they contain to the existing state of manners, sentiments, and public affairs. He manifests no fondness for those abstract personifications which seem to have delighted the fancy of the author of the 'Cherrie and the Slae;' but he is equally remarkable with Montgomery for fluency and copiousness of expression:—and Scott occasionally shows a considerable knowledge of human nature. His love-poems possess a singular degree of sweetness and elegance for the period in which they were written; and some of his lyric pieces are peculiarly graceful and harmonious. Indeed, for general elegance and simplicity, for correctness, and for facility in versification, Scott's verses may be compared with those of any English poet of the same age."†

The following specimens of the poems of this Scottish Anacreon may serve to show the justice of Mr. Laing's commendation.

"IN PRAIS OF THE TWA FAIR ENE OF HIS MISTRESS.

"Thow well of vertew, floure of womanheid,
And patrone unto patiens,
Lady of lawty baith in word and deid,
Rycht sobir, sweet, full meik of eloquens,
Baith gude and fair: to your magnificens
I me commend, as I have done before,
My sempil heart for now and evirmore.

"For evirmore I sall you service mak,
Sen, of before, into my mind I made,
Sen first I knew your ladyship, bot lak,
Bewtie, youth of womanheid ye had,
Withouthen rest my heart couth nocht evade.
Thus am I yours, and aye sinesyne have been Commandit by your gudly twa fair ene.

"Your twa fair ene maks me oft syis to sing,
Your twa fair ene maks me to sych also,
Your twa fair ene maks me grit comforting,
Your twa fair ene is wyt of all my wo,
Your twa fair ene may no man keep them fro,
Withouthin rest that gets a sicht of them,
Thus of all vertew weir ye now the name.

"Ye beir the name of gentilnes of blude,
Ye beir the name, that mony for ye deis, ‡
Ye beir the name, ye are baith fair and gude,
Ye beir the name, that farrer than yow seis,
Ye beir the name, fortune and you agreis,
Ye beir the name of lands of lenth and breid, §
The well of vertew and floure of womanheid."

* Scott's Poems, Introductory Notice, p. xi.

† Ibid., pp. xiii, xiv.

‡ Dies.

§ Long and broad.

* Above. † Rudder. ‡ Stumble.
§ Ground. || Acquire. ¶ Since.

" TO HIS HEART.

" Hence, hairt, with her that must depart,
And hold thee with thy sovereign;
For I had leifer * want me hairt,
Nor have the hairt that does me pain.
Therefor go, with thy love remain,
And let me live thus unnolesst;
See that thou come not back again,
But byde with her thou lovest best.

" Sin she that I have servit lang
Is to depairt so suddenly,
Address† thee now, for thou sall gang
And bear thy lady company;
Fra she be gone, hairtless am I;
For why? thou art with her possesst,
Therefor, my hairt! go hence in hy,‡
And byde with her thou lovest best.

" Tho' this belappit body here
Be bound to servitude and thrall,
My faithfull hairt is free inteir,§
And mind to serve my lady at all.
Would God that I were perigall,||
Under that redolent rose to rest.
Yet at the leist my hairt thou sall
Abide with her thou lovest best.

" Sin in your garth ¶ the lilly whyte
May not remain among the laif,
Adew the flour of haill delyte!
Adew the succour that may me save!
Adew the fragrant, balmy suaift††
And lamp of ladies luestiest,‡‡
My faithfull heart she sall it have,
To byde with her it lovest best.

" Deplore, ye ladies clear of hue,
Her absence, sen she must depart,
And specially ye lovers true,
That wounded be with love's dart;
For some of you sall want aine hairt
As well as I; thairfor at last
Do go with myn, with mynd inwart,
And byde with her thou lovest best."

" RONDEL OF LUVE.

" Lo what it is to lueve,
Lerne ye that list to pruve;
By me, I say, that no ways may
The grund of greif remove.
But still decay, both nycht and day;
Lo what it is to lueve.

" Lueve is ane fervent fyre,
Kindillit without desyre,
Schort plesour, lang displeasour;
Repentance is the hyre;
Ane pure tressour, without messour;
Lueve is ane fervent fyre.

" To lueve and to be wyis,
To rege with gude advyis;
Now thus, now than, so gois the game,
Incertaine is the dyce;
Their is no man, I say, that can Both lueve and to be wyis.

" Flee always from the snair,
Lerne at me to beware;
It is ane pane and dowbill trane
Of endless wo and cair;
For to refrane that danger plane,
Flee always from the snair."

" Gar stanche all stryfe, and stabill * thy estaits
In constance, concord, charité, and lueve;
Be busie now to banish all debates
Betwixt kirkmen and temporal men does move;
The pulling down of pollicie reprove.
And let perversit prelatis leif perquier;
To do the best besekand † God above
To give thee grace against this gude new year.

" At cross gar cry by open proclamation,
Under grit pains, that neither he nor seche ‡
Of Halve Writ have any disputation,
But letterit men or learnit clerks thereto;
For lymmer lads and little lassies lo
Will argue baith with bishop, preist, and freir,
To dantoun this, thou hes aneuch to do;
God give thee grace against this gude new year.

" But wyte the wicked pastours wald not mend
Their vicious living, all the world prescrvvis
They tuke na tent their traik sould turn till end,
They were sa prond in their prerogatyvis;
For wantonnes they wald not wed na wyves,
Nort yet live chaste, but chop and change thair cheir;
Now to reform thair filthy litherous lyvis,
God give thee grace against this gude new year.

" Thay brocht thair bastardis with the skrufe they skraip,
To blende thair blude with barrouns by ambitoun;
Thay purest pitthless pardons frae the Pape,
To cause fond fulis confide he has fruition
As God, to give for sinns full remission,
And sauls § to save from suffering sorrows seir;
To sett aside sic sorts of superstition,
God give thee grace against this gude new year.

" They lost baith benefice and pension that mareit,
And wha eat flesh on Fridays was fyre-fungit,||
It maid nae miss what maidens they misereit;
On fasting days they were nocht brint nor hangit:
Licence for luthric fra thair lord belangit,
To give indulgence as the devil did leir; ¶
To mend that menyé has sae monye mangit
God give thee grace against this gude new year.

" They lute  thy lieges pray to stokis and stanes,
And paintit paipers, watis nocht what they mein; ††
They bad them bek and bynge ‡‡ at deid men's banes;
Offer on kneis to kiss, syne saive their kin:
Pilgrimes and palmaris past with them betwene,
Sanct Blais, Sanct Boit, blate bodeis een to bleir: §§
Now to forbid this grit abuse has bene,
God give thee grace against this gude new year.

" They tyrit God with tryssillis tume trentalis,|||
And daift him with daylie dargeis, ¶¶
With owklike abitis,  to augment their rentalis
Mantand mort muumlingis, mixt with monye leis,
Sic sanctitude was sathanis sorceris,
Christis sillie schiepe, and sobir flok, to smeir;
To ceiss all sindrye sectis of hereseis,
God give thee grace against this gude new year.

" With mess nor matynes nowayis will I mell,
To judge them justlie passis my ingyne,
They gyde nocht ill that governis weill them sell,
And lalalie on lawtie layis their lyne:
Dowtis to discus, for doctouris are devyne,
Cunning in clergie to declair them cleir;
To ordour this, the office now is thyne,
God give thee grace against this gude new year.

" The epistolls and evangelis now are prechit,
But sophistrie or cereumoneis vane;
Thy pepill, maist pairt, truele now are techit,
To put away idolatrie prophaine:

* Establish.

† Beseeching.

‡ Man nor woman.

§ Souls.

|| Fanged or seized by the fyre, i. e. burned as heretics.

¶ Learn.

 Let, allowed.

†† Coloured prints, of which they understood not the meaning.

‡‡ Bow.

§§ To blear the eyes of simple persons—to impose on their credulity.

||| A service of thirty masses performed for the dead.

¶¶ Daily digres.

 Weekly obits, or the service performed for the dead.

As a specimen of a different style of writing, we give a few stanzas of his "New Year Gift to the Quene when she came first Hame," which presents a curious and instructive view of the state of Scotland at the commencement of Queen Mary's reign:—

* Rather.	† Make ready.	‡ Hast.
§ Entirely.	Competent, able.	¶ Garden.
 Rest.	†† Embrace.	‡‡ Most beautiful.

But in some hartis is gravit new agane,
Ane image callit euvatyce of geir ; *
Now, to expell that idol stands up plane,
God give thee grace against this gude new year.

"For some are sene at sermonis seem sae halye,† Singand Sanct Davidis psalter on their buiks,‡
And are but biblists fairsing full their bellie,
Backbytand nyctbours, noyand them in nuiks,
Rugging and ruifand § up kirk-rentis lyke ruiks.
As verrie waspis against God's word makis weir,||
Sic Christianis to kiss with chanteris kuiks,
God give thee grace against this gude new year." &c.

ALEXANDER ARBUTHNOT, Principal of King's Alexander College, Aberdeen, was born in Arbuthnot. the year 1538. He was descended from a respectable family in the Mearns, which was afterwards ennobled by Charles I. According to Archbishop Spottiswood, he was educated in the University of St. Andrew's, and afterwards in France, where he spent five years in studying law under the celebrated Cujacius. He returned to his native land with the view of following the profession of an advocate, but he afterwards relinquished this intention, and applied himself to the study of theology. After entering into holy orders, he was presented to the living of Arbuthnot and Logie Buchan. In the year 1569, he was appointed Principal of King's College, Aberdeen, in the room of Alexander Anderson, who, along with several of the professors, was removed from office on account of his refusal to sign the Confession of Faith. "By his diligent teaching and dexterous government," says Spottiswood, "he not only revived the study of good letters, but gained many from the superstitious whereunto they were given." He was repeatedly chosen Moderator of the General Assembly, and was on various occasions appointed by his brethren to discharge most important and delicate duties. Some have supposed that he is to be identified with Alexander Arbuthnot, who at this period held the office of king's printer, but of this there is no satisfactory evidence. His death, which took place at Aberdeen on the 10th of October, 1583, at the premature age of forty-five, appears to have been regarded as a great calamity to the Scottish Church, and to the national literature. His contemporary, James Melvil, has pronounced Arbuthnot one of the most learned men in Europe at that time, and represents him as "a man of singular gifts of learning, wisdom, godliness, and sweetness of nature." And Spottiswood, who cannot be suspected of partiality for a leader of the Presbyterian party, has thus delineated his character:—
"He was greatly loved of all men, hated of none; and in such account for his moderation with the chief men of these parts, that without his advice they could almost do nothing, which put him in a great fasherie,¶ whereof he did oft complain. Pleasant and jocund in conversation, and in all sciences expert; a good poet, mathematician, philosopher, theologian, lawyer, and in medicine skilful, so as in every subject he could promptly discourse, and to good purpose." *

In 1572 Arbuthnot published at Edinburgh a work entitled, "Orationes de Origine et Dignitate Juris," which was honoured with an encomiastic Latin poem by Thomas Maitland. His poetical reputation rests on two poems, which have been preserved in the Maitland Collection. We give a few stanzas from the most important of these, entitled "The Miseries of a Puir Scholar :"—

"I hate thraldome, yet maun I bing and beck,
And jouk and nod some patroun for to please;
I love freedom, yet maun I be subject;
I am compellit to flatter with my feys.†
I me torment some other for till ease
Wha of my travale scantlie is content.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

"I love larges and liberalitie,
Yet povertie to spend does mak me spair;
I hate averice and prodigalitie,
To get sum gear yet maun I have great cair.
In vanitie syn I maun it outwair—
Woun by ane wretche and into waistris spent.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

"I love delight, and wrappit am in woe;
I love pleasure, and plungit am in pane;
I list to rest, yet maun I ryde and go;
And when I list to flie I maun remain.
With warldlie care a gentil hart is slane.
I feel the smart, and dare not mak my plaint.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

"I hate flatterie, and into words plane
And unaffeit language I delight;
Yet maun I leir to flatter, gloss, and fayne,
Whether I list to speak or yet to wryte;
Or else men shall not count me worth a myte;
I shall be reckinit rude or negligent.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

"Scorning I hate, yet maun I smile and smirk
When I the moks of other men behold;
Yea, oft-times maun I laugh, suppose I irk,
When bitterlie their tauntis they have tould.
And sometime als whether I nyl or wald, ‡
And scorn for scorn to gif I maun tak tent.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

"With temperance I wald use meat and drink,
And has all surfat-banquet in despite;
And yet at feast and banquet maun I wink,
And at them haunt where I have no delight;
I use the evil, and has withall the wyte;
Tho' body bow, yet does the heart dissent.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

"All costlie claithis I count not worth ane preine, §
Which does but foster pride and vanitie;
Yet dare I not in common place be seen,
'Less I be clothit somewhat gorgeously;
And be I not, then men shall tak of me,
And call me othwer wretche or indigent.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

"With heart and mind I love humilitie,
And pauchtie pride richt sair do I detest,
But with the high yet maun I heichlie be,
Or with that sort I shall no sit in rest;
This world has made the prover manifest:
Wha is a sheep the wolf will soon him rent.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

"I hate all shameless gloriositie,
And me delight in modest shamefastnes;
Yet shall I not be countit worth ane flie,
Without I speak of all mater by guess;
Gloir and brag out, and take a face of brass;
Nathing misknow under the firmament.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

† Covetousness of money, avarice.

† Holy.

‡ Books.

§ Tearing and riving.

¶ War. The allusion is to the grasping avarice of the barons, who seized the church lands, and were most rigorous in exacting the payment of tithes.

¶ Trouble.

* Spottiswood's History of the Church of Scotland, vol. ii.
p. 319; Irving's Lives, vol. ii. p. 176.

‡ Will or not.

† Foes.

§ Pin.

"I love justice, and would that everie man
Had that which rightly does to him pertain;
Yet all my kin, allya, or my clan,
In right or wrang I maun always maintene;
I maun applaud when they their matters mene,
Tho' conscience thereto do not consent.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

"In poetrie I preis to pas the time,
When careful thoughts with sorrow sayles me;
But if I mell with meter or with ryme,
With rascal rymers I shall rakint be;
They shall me bourdin als with mony lie,
In charging me with that which never I meant.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

"I wald travel, and idleness I hate,
If I could find some gude vocation;
But all for naught: in vain lang may I wait,
Or I get honest occupation;
Letters are lightliet in our nation;
For learning now is neither life nor rent.
What marvel is tho' I murne and lament?"

ALEXANDER MONTGOMERY, the author of the Alexander "Cherrie and the Slae," is re-Montgomery. garded as one of the most popular of the early Scottish poets; but the information respecting his life and character which has been transmitted to our times is exceedingly scanty.
According to Timothy Pont, he was born at Hazel-head Castle, in the county of Ayr. If this statement be correct, it is probable that he was a younger son of the proprietor of that estate, who was a cadet of the noble family of Eglinton; but it appears to be at variance with the following line in his poem entitled "The Navigatioun:"—

"As for myself, I am ane German borne."

Nothing is known of his early years and training, beyond a statement made by his poetical antagonist, Polwart, that he was sent "into Argyle some lair to leir"—some learning to learn. He is commonly described as a captain, and it may therefore be presumed that he had followed the profession of a soldier. He appears to have been at one period in the service of the Regent Morton, and to have been afterwards employed in some capacity or other by the king. His services were rewarded, in 1583, by an annual pension of five hundred marks. In 1586 he received the royal license to travel for five years in France, Flanders, Spain, and other countries. He was detained for some time in a foreign prison; and it appears that the payment of his pension had been unjustly withheld—
"to his great hurt, hinder, and prejudice; whereas his good service merited rather augmentation than diminishing of the said pension." But the former grant was renewed and confirmed by a writ of the privy seal, dated at Holyrood House, 21st March, 1588. He was afterwards, however, involved in a tedious lawsuit in the court of session respecting the payment of his pension; and from the indignant language in which he addresses the judges, he seems to have felt deeply aggrieved by the law's proverbial delay. From the following sonnet it would appear that Montgomery had his full share of the misfortunes which so often befall his poetical brethren:—

"If loss of guidis, if greatest grudge or grief,
If povertie, imprisonment, or pane,
If for guidwill ingratitude agane,
If languishing in languor but relief,
If debt, if dolour, and to become deif,
If travell tint,* and labour lost in vane,
Do properlie to poets appertane,
Of all that craft my chance is to be chief.
With August, Virgil wantit his reward,
And Ovid's lute as luckless as the lave:
While Homer lived his hap was very hard,
Yet when he died seven cities for him strave:
Tho' I am not like one of them in arte,
I pingle them perflytie in that parte."

In another sonnet addressed to a brother poet,
Robert Hudson, he thus describes his situation:—

"My best beloved brother of the band,
I grein † to see the sillie smiddy smeik: ‡
This is no lyfe that I live up-a-land
On raw red herring reistit in the reik, §
Synne I am subject sometyne to be sick,
And daylie deeling of my auld disease, ||
Ait ¶ bread, ill ale, and all things are ane eik,
This barme and blaidry buists up all my bees."

Several of Montgomery's shorter pieces are found in the Bannatyne Collection, and must, therefore, have been written before the year 1568.
Three of his poems—"Echo," the "Flyting," and the "Cherrie and the Slae"—are quoted in "Ane Schort Treatise conteining some Ruleis and Cautelis to be observit and eschewit in Scottis Poesis," published by King James in the year 1584. The time of the poet's death is uncertain, but it must have taken place before 1615, as the title-page of an edition of his works published in that year avers that the "Cherrie and Slae" had been revised not long before the author's death.

The poems of Montgomery display a considerable amount of elegance and fancy, though not always under the guidance of good taste. His versification is remarkably harmonious, and when freed from their antique spelling, many of his poems might easily be mistaken for compositions of the present day. His fame chiefly rests on the "Cherrie and the Slae," a poem of considerable length, and which, in spite of not a few faults, deserves the popularity which it has attained. It must be admitted, however, that the allegory is harsh and obscure, as is evident from the widely different interpretations which have been given of it. According to one critic, "the object of the poem is to represent the wishes, hopes, reasonings, and attempts of a lover, the mistress of whose passion was by her rank and her personal excel-lences exalted greatly above his condition." According to another, "the allegory of the poem is that moderate pleasures are better than high ones."
While Dr. Irving, with greater probability, con-jectures that "the genuine explanation of the allegory may perhaps be, that virtue, though of very hard attainment, ought to be preferred to vice:
virtue is represented by the cherry, a refreshing fruit growing on a tall tree, and that tree rising from a formidable precipice; vice is represented by

* Lost.

† Long.

‡ The smithy smoke.

§ Dried in the smoke.

|| This old disease appears to have been the gravel.

¶ Oat.

 Slae.

the sloe, a fruit which may easily be plucked, but is bitter to the taste.* The opening stanzas of this poem present a fair example of the author's descriptive powers:—

"About ane bank where birds on bewis †
Ten thousand times their notes renews,
Ilk hour into the day;
The merle and mavis ‡ might be seen,
The progne and the philomene, §
Whilk causit me to stay.
I lay and leant me to ane bus ||
To hear the birds' beir;
Their mirth was sa melodius
Thro' nature of the yeir:
Sum singing, sum springing
With wings into the sky;
So trimlie and nimble
Thir ¶ birds they flew me by.

"I saw the hurecheon  and the hair,
Wha fed among the flowers fair,
Were happing to and fro;
I saw the cunning and the cat,
Whose downs with the dew was wat,
With mony beists mo:
The hart, the hynd, the dae, the rae,
The founart, †† and the fox,
Were skipping all fra brae to brae
Among the water brox;
Sum feeding, sum dreiding
In case of sudden snairs,
With skipping and tripping
The haunitit all in pairs.

"The air was sa attemperate,
But ‡‡ ony mist immaculate,
But purefeit and cleir:
The flowers fair were flourishit
As Nature had them nurishit,
Baith delicate and deir;
And every blume on branch and bewch
So prettily were spread,
And hang their heads out ower the heuch, §§
In May's colour cled;
Sum knopping, some dropping
Of balmy liquor sweet,
Distilling and smelling
Thro' Phoebeus hailsum heit.

"The cuckoo and the cuschat ||| cryde,
The turtle on the other syde
Na pleasure had to play;
So schil in sorrow was her sang,
That thro' her voice the roches rang,
For Echo answerit ay;
Lamenting sair Narcissus' case,
Wha starvit at the well,
Wha with the shadow of his face
For luve did slay himsel:
Whiles weeping and creeping
About the well he baid;
Whiles lying, whiles crying,
But it na answer made.

"The dew as diamonds did hing
Upon the tender twists ¶¶ and ying,
O'er-twinkling all the trees;
And aye where flowers flourishit faire
There suddainly I saw repaire,
In swarms, the sounding bees,
Some sweetly has the hony socht
Till they were clogg't sore,
Some willingly the waxe has wrocht
To keep it up in store:
So heeping with keeping,
Into their hyves they hide it;
Precyselie and wyselie
For winter they provyde it.

"To pen the pleasures of that park,
How every blossome, branche, and bark
Against the sun did shine,
I leave to poetis to comyle
In staitlio verse and lofty style:
It passis my ingyne,
But as I mused myne allane,
I saw ane river rin
Out our ane craggie rock of stane,
Syne lichtit in ane liu,*
With tumbling and rumbling
Among the rocks round,
Dewalling and falling
Into that pit profound."

Montgomery is the author of a considerable number of sonnets constructed on the Italian model, and it is highly probable that his taste was formed by the study of the Italian poets. The "Flyting" between Montgomery and Sir Patrick Hume, of Polwart, seems to have been written in imitation of the Flyting between Dunbar and Kennedy, and contains every epithet of scurrility and abuse which a fertile imagination could devise, although it seems to have been merely an effort of ingenuity, not the result of a real quarrel. Montgomery's miscellaneous poems are numerous, and some of them possess considerable merit. He has also written many devotional pieces, and has versified several of the Psalms. In conjunction with some other writers, "principals of English poesy in their time," he offered to execute a complete version. † As a specimen of his religious poetry we may give his third sonnet, and a few stanzas from his "Godly Prayer."

"Iniquite on earth is so increast;
All flesh but few with falsit is defyld,
Givin ow'r of God with gredynes beguyl'd;
So that the puir, but pitie are oppress.
God in his justice dou na mair digest
Sik sinful synn with symonie defyld,
But must revenge, their vices are so vyld,
And pour down plagues of famine, sword, and pest.
Aryse, O Lord, deliver from the lave ‡
Thy faithful flock before that it infect.
Thou sees how Satan sharps for to dissave
If it were able even thyne auin Elect.
Sen conscience, love, and charitie all laiks,
Lord, short the season, for the Chosin's saiks."

"A GODLY PRAYER (OR LAMENTATION)."

"I've sinn'd, Father, be merciful to me;
I am not worthy to be call'd thy chyld,
Who stubburnly have look't so long astray,
Not lyk thy son, but lyk the prodigue wyld.
My sylie saul § with sin is so defyld
That Satan seeks to catch it as his pray.
God grant me grace that he may be begyld'd.
Peccavi, Pater, miserere mei. ||

"I am abash'd how I dare be sa bald
Before thy godly presence to appeir,
Or hazard anes ¶ the hevins to behald,
Wha am unworthy that the earth suld beir,
Yet damn me nocht whom thou has bocht so deir.
*Sed salvum me fac, dulcis Fili Dei. ***
For out of Luke this lesson now I leir.
Peccavi, Pater, miserere mei.

"If thou, O Lord, with rigour woldst revenge,
What flesh befor thee faultles suld be fund?
Or who is he whose conscience can himself clenge,
But by his birth to Satan he is bund?"

* Montgomery's Poems, Biographical Notices, p. xix.

† Boughs.

‡ The blackbird and thrush.

§ Swallow and nightingale.

|| Bush.

¶ These.  Hedgehog.

†† Badger.

‡‡ Without.

§§ Ravine.

||| Woodpigeon.

¶¶ Boughs.

* Waterfall.

† Montgomery's Poems, Biographical Notice, p. xxii.; Blackwood's Magazine, vol. iii. p. 180.

‡ Rest.

§ Soul.

|| I have sinned, Father be merciful to me.

¶ Once.

 Save me, O beloved son of God.

Yet of thy grace thou took away that grund,
And sent thy Son our penalty to pay,
To save us from that hiddious, hellish hund.
Peccavi, Pater, miserere mei.

"I hope for mercy though my sinnes be huge;
I grant my gylt, and grones to thee for grace.
Though I suld flie where sall I find refuge?
In hevyn, O Lord?—there is thy dwelling place,
The earth thy footstool; yea, in hellis, alace
Down with the dead, but all must thee obey,
Therefore I ery while I have tyme and space,—
Peccavi, Pater, miserere mei.

"O gracious God, my gyltines forgive,
In sinners' death since thou dost not delyte,
But rather that they suld convert and live,
As witnessis thy sacred, holy wryte.
I pray thee, then, thy promise to perfyte
In me; and I sall with the Psalmist say
To pen thy praise and wondrous works indyte:
Peccavi, Pater, miserere mei."

JOHN ROLLAND, a native of Dalkeith, or at least a resident in that town, translated out of prose into Scottish verse the celebrated collection of tales, entitled "The Seven Sages," or "The Seven Wise Masters of Rome," one of the most popular works of fiction of the middle ages. This translation was made in 1560, but was not published till 1578. Rolland was the author of another poetical work, entitled "The Court of Venus," which is alluded to in his prologue to the "Seven Sages," and must therefore have been completed previous to the year 1560, although it was not printed till 1575. This poem is so rare that the copy in the British Museum is the only one known to be extant. It is divided into four books, and is written in stanzas of nine lines. Mr. Laing says it is a prolix and uninteresting allegory, and is an evident imitation—both in the subject and his manner of treating it, no less than in the measure—of "The Palace of Honour," by Bishop Douglas. Nothing whatever is known of the character or life of the author.

Another Scottish poet who flourished at this period was ALEXANDER HUME, the second son of Patrick, fifth baron of Polwarth, in Berwickshire. He was born about the year 1560, and was educated first at St. Andrew's and afterwards in France, where he resided four years, in all probability pursuing the study of law at one of the universities of that country. After his return to Scotland he followed the legal profession for three years, but abandoned it in disgust at the corrupt and venal practices which at that period disgraced the Scottish courts of law. He ultimately went into the Church, and in the year 1598 was appointed minister of Logie, near Stirling, where he continued till his death, on the 4th of December, 1609. He has sometimes been erroneously supposed to have been the author of the "Flyting" addressed to Montgomery; but this poem was the production of his elder brother Patrick.

The poems of Hume are marked by a quick perception and deep feeling for the beauties of external nature, and his selection of poetical images is generally pleasing and judicious. His works everywhere evince a purity of sentiment, and breathe the aspirations of a humble and truly pious heart, which cannot fail to command respect.

In the following specimen of his poetry, describing the successive appearances of nature during a summer's day, there is a train of images, says Mr. Campbell, that seems peculiarly pleasing and unborrowed—the pictures of a poetical mind, humble but genuine in its cast. The various objects characteristic of a Scottish landscape are painted with truth and clearness, and a calm devotional feeling pervades the poem. Some of the customs spoken of, however, such as the use of "callour wine in caves," and "sallads steep'd in oil," are suited to the climate of France, where the poet spent four years, rather than of Scotland.*

"THANKS FOR A SUMMER'S DAY.

"O perfect light, which shaid† away
The darkness from the light,
And set a ruler o'er the day,
Another o'er the night;

"Thy glory, when the day forth flies,
More vividly does appear,
Nor‡ at mid-day into our eyes
The shining sun is clear.

"The shadow of the earth anon
Removes and drawis by,
Syn§ in the east, when it is gone,
Appears a clearer sky.

"Whilk|| soon perceive the little larks,
The lapwing and the snipe,
And tune their song, like Nature's clerks,
O'er meadow, muir, and stripe.

"But every bold nocturnal beast
No longer may abide,
They hie away, both maist and least,¶ Themselves in house to hide.

* * * *

"The golden globe incontinent
Sets up his shining head,
And on the earth and firmament
Displays his beams abroad.

"For joy the birds with boulden†† throats,
Against his visage sheen‡‡
Take up their kindly music notes,
In woods and gardens green.

"Upbraids§§ the careful husbandman,
His corn and vines to see,
And every timeous||| artizan
In booths works busily.

"The pastor quits the slothful sleep,
And passes forth with speed,
His lile camow-nosed¶¶ sheep,
And rowting kye to feed.

"The passenger from perils sure,
Goes gladly forth the way;
Brief, every living creature
Takes comfort of the day.

* * * *

"The misty reek,††† the clouds of rain,
From tops of mountain skails,†††
Clear are the highest hills and plain,
The vapours take the vales.

* Preface to Hume's Hymns and Sacred Songs, p. vii.

† Shaded. ‡ Scottee for than. § Then.

|| Which. ¶ Largest and smallest.

 Abroad. †† Emboldened. ‡‡ Shining.

§§ Uprises. ||| Early. ¶¶ Flat-nosed.

 Lowing kine. ††† Fog. ‡‡‡ Pours off.

" Begair'd * is the sapphire pend†
With sprains‡ of scarlet hue;
And precious, from end to end,
Damask'd white and blue.

" The ample heaven, of fabric sure,
In clearness does surpass
The crystal and the silver, pure
As clearest polish'd glass.

" The time so tranquil is and clear,
That no where shall ye find,
Save on a high and barren hill,
The air of passing wind.

" All trees and simples, great and small,
That balmy leaf do bear,
Than they were painted on a wall,
Nor more they move or steir. §

" The rivers fresh, the callour || streams,
O'er rocks can swiftly rin, ¶
The water clear like crystal beams,
And makes a pleasant din.

* * * *

" Calm is the deep and purple sea,
Yea, smoother than the sand;
The waves that woltering  wont to be,
Are stable like the land.

" So silent is the cessile air,
That every cry and call,
The hills and dales, and forest fair,
Again repeats them all.

" The clogged busy humming bees,
That never think to drown, ††
On flowers and flourishes of trees,
Collect their liquor brown.

" The sun, most like a speedy post,
With ardent course ascends;
The beauty of our heavenly host
Up to our zenith tends.

* * * *

" The breathless flocks draw to the shade,
And freshure †† of their fault;
The startling nolt, §§ as they were mad,
Run to the rivers cald.

" The herds beneath some leafy trees,
Amidst the flow'rs they lie;
The stable ships upon the seas
Tend up their sails to dry.

" The hart, the hind, the fallow deer,
Are tapish'd || at their rest;
The fowls and birds that made thee beare ¶¶
Prepare their pretty nest.

" The rayons dure  descending down,
All kindle in a gleid; †††
In city, nor in burrough town,
May nane set forth their head.

" Back from the blue pavedment whun, †††
And from ilk plaster wall,
The hot reflexing of the sun
Inflames the air and all.

" The labourers that timely rose,
All weary, faint, and weak,
For heat down to their houses goes §§§
Noon-meite and sleep to take.

" The callour * wine in cave is sought,
Men's brothing † breasts to cool;
The water cold and clear is brought,
And sallads steeped in ule. ‡

" With gilded eyes and open wings,
The cock his courage shows;
With claps of joy his breast he dings §
And twenty times he crows.

" The dove with whistling wings so blue,
The winds can fast collect,
Her purple pens turn many a hue
Against the sun direct.

" Now noon is gone—gone is mid-day,
The heat does slake at last,
The sun descends down west away,
For three o'clock is past.

* * * *

" The rayons of the sun we see
Diminish in their strength,
The shade of every tower and tree
Extended is in length.

" Great is the calm, for everywhere
The wind is setting down,
The reek || throws up right in the air,
From every tower and town.

* * * *

" The mavis and the Philomeen, ¶
The sterling whistles loud,
The cushats  on the branches green,
Ful quietly they crood. ††

" The glomin †† comes, the day is spent,
The sun goes out of sight,
And painted is the occident
With purple, sanguine bright.

" The scarlet nor the golden thread,
Who would their beauty try?
Are nothing like the colour red,
And beauty of the sky.

* * * *

" What pleasure then to walk and see,
Endlang §§ a river clear,
The perfect form of every tree
Within the deep appear.

" The salmon out of cruives |||| and creels, ¶¶
Uphailed into scouts; ***
The bells and circles on the weills, †††
Through leaping of the trouts.

" O sure it were a seemly thing,
While all is still and calm,
The praise of God to play and sing
With trumpet and with shalm.

" Through all the land great is the gild †††
Of rustic folks that cry;
Of bleating sheep, fra they be fill'd,
Of calves and rowting kye.

" All labourers draw hame at even,
And can to others say,
Thanks to the gracious God of Heaven,
Quhilk §§§ sent this summer day."

The names of Thomas and Robert Hudson, Christian Lindsay, William Fowler, John Burel, Balnevis, Clapperton, Robert Semple, and various

* Drest out. † Arch. ‡ Streaks.
§ Stir. || Cool. ¶ Run.
 Tumbling. †† To drone, or to be idle.
†† Freshness. §§ Oxen. ||| Carpeted.
¶¶ Beare, probably means music. To beare, in old Scotch, is to recite. Wynton, in his Chronicle, says, "As I have heard men beare on hand."
 Hard, or keen rays. ††† Fire.
††† Whinstone.
§§§ In old Scottish poetry little attention is paid to giving plural nouns a plural verb.

* Cool. † Burning. ‡ Oil.
§ Beats. || Smoke. ¶ Thrush and nightingale.
 Wood-pigeons.
†† A very expressive word for the note of the cushat, or wood-pigeon.
‡‡ Evening. §§ Along.
||| Places for confining fish; generally placed in the dam of a river. ¶¶ Baskets.
 Small boats, or yawls. ††† Wells.
††† Throng. §§§ Who.

other poets who flourished in Scotland about the close of the sixteenth century, have been handed down to the present day, but the greater part of their writings have perished. THOMAS HUDSON is the author of an English translation of Du Bartas' "Historie of Judith," which was undertaken at the request of King James, and published in 1584. ROBERT HUDSON was a court poet, and a person of some influence; but his works, with the exception of one or two sonnets, have all perished. Montgomery addressed to him several of his sonnets, and appears to have relied upon his friendship with misplaced confidence, if we may credit CHRISTIAN LINDSAY, who, in a spirited sonnet,—the only one of his poems which has been preserved,—thus upbraids Hudson with his treachery:—

"Oft have I heard, but after fund it true,
That courtiers' kyndness lasts but for a while:
Fra once your turnis be sped, why then adieu!
Your promiseist friendship passes in exyle.
But, Robene, faith ye did me not beguyle:
I hit aye of ye as of the lave.
If thou had wit, thou wald have mony a wyle,
To mak thyself be knawin for a knave.
Montgomery, that sic hope did once conceive
Of thy guidwill, now finds all is forgotten:
Tho' nocht but kindness he did at thee crave,
He finds thy friendship as it ripens is rotten.
The smekie smeiths cares not his passit travel,
But leaves him lingering, deeing of the gravel."

Several anonymous pieces of considerable merit have been preserved in the Bannatyne Collection. Two of these, a poem "In Praise of the Worthy Knycht, Sir Penny," and "The Wooing of Jock and Jenny," are peculiarly interesting on account of the light which they cast upon the manners and customs of the period:—

"Rycht fain wald I my quentauns * mak
With SIR PENNY; and what ye why?
He is a man will undertak
Lands for to sell, and als to buy;
Therefor me think rycht right fain wald I
With him in fellowship to repair;
Because he is in company
Ane noble guide baith late and air.†

"SIR PENNY for till hald in hand
His company they think so sweet;
Sum gives na care to sell his land
With gude SIR PENNY for to meet;
Because he is a noble spreit,
Ane furth ‡ man and forsaend;
There is no matter to end complete
Till he set to his seal and hand.

"SIR PENNY is a vailyeant man,
Of meikle strength and dignitie;
And evir sen § the world began
In to this land autoreist || is he;
With king and queen may ye nocht see
They treat him aye sa tenderly,
That there can na thing endit be Without him in their company ?

"SIR PENNY is a man of law,
Wit ye weil, baith wise and war,¶
And mony reasons can furth shaw
When he is standand at the bar;
Is nane sa wise can him defar
When he proponis furth ane plea,
Nor yet sa hardy man that dar
SIR PENNY tyne  or disobey.

* Acquaintance. † Early.
‡ In comfortable circumstances. § Since.
|| Possessed of authority. ¶ Wary.  Lose.

"SIR PENNY is baith sharp and wise;
The kirkis to steir * he takes on hand;
Disponar he is of benefyis.
In to this realm, o'er all the land,
Is none so wicht dar him ganestand;
So wisely can SIR PENNY wirk,†
And als ‡ SIR SYMONY his servand,
That now is guider of the kirk.

"If to the court thou makes repair,
And thou have matters to proclame,
Thou art unable weil to fare,
SIR PENNY an thou leave at hame.
To bring him furth think thou na schame,
I do ye weil to understand;
Into thy bag beir thou his name,
Thy matter comes the better till hand.

"SIR PENNY now is made ane owle,
They wrik him meikle tray and tene;
They hald him in till he hair-mowle, §
And makes him blind of baith his een; ||
Thereowt he is but seyndill ¶ seen,
Sa fast theira in they can him steik **
That poor commons can nocht obtene
Ane day to byd with him to speik."

"THE WOOING OF JOCK AND JENNY.

"Robeyns Jock came to woo our Jenny
On our feast evin, when we were fou; ††
She brankit fast, and made her bonny, ‡‡
And said, 'Jock, come ye for to woo; §
She burneist her baith breast and brow,
And maid her clear as oye cluck; §§
Then spak her dame, and said, 'I trow
Ye come to woo our Jenny, Jock.'

"Jock said, 'Forsooth, I yearn full fain
To lout ||| my head, and sit down by you.'
Then spak her mother, and said again,
'My bairn has tocher-gude to gie you.'
'Té, hé,' quoth Jenny, 'keek, keek, ¶¶ I see you:
Mother, yon man maks you a mock.'
'Why say ye sae? now leeze me o' you.'
'I come to woo your Jenny,' quoth Jock.

"'My bairn,' she says, 'has of her awin
Ane goose, ane grice,  ane cock, ane hen,
Ane calf, ane hog, ane fute-braid sawin, †††
Ane kirk, ane pin, that ye weil ken,
Ane pig, ‡‡‡ ane pot, ane raip there ben,
Ane fork, ane flaik, ane reell, ane rock; §§§
Dishes and dublaris nine or ten.
Come ye to woo our Jenny, Jock?'

"'Ane blanket, and ane wecht, ||||| also
Ane schule, ¶¶¶ ane sheet, and ane lang flail,
Ane ark, * ane almry, †††† and ladles two,
Ane milk-syth with ane swine-tail,
Ane rusty whittle ‡‡‡‡ to shear the kail.
And wheel, ane mell §§§§ the beir ||||| to knock,
Ane cog, ane caird wantand ane nail.
Come ye to woo our Jenny, Jock?'

"'Ane furme, ¶¶¶¶ ane furlet, ane pot, ane peck,
Ane tub, ane barrow with ane wheelband,
Ane turs,  ane troch, and ane meal seek,
Ane spurtill ††††† braid, and ane elwand.'
Jock took Jenny by the hand,
And cried, 'Ane feast!' and slew ane cock,
And made a bridal upaland.
'Now have I got your Jenny,' quoth Jock.

* Manage. † Work. ‡ Also.
§ Covered with mould. || Eyes. ¶ Seldom.
 Shut. †† Tipsy.
‡‡ Tripped away hastily, and dressed herself to the best advantage.
§§ Clear as a beetle—a proverbial expression.
||| Stoop. ¶¶ Look.  Young pig.
††† Corn sufficient to sow a certain quantity of ground.
‡‡‡ An earthenware vessel. §§§ Distaff.
|||| An instrument used in winnowing corn.
¶¶¶ Shovel.
* Wooden chest for containing oatmeal.
†††† Wooden press. ‡‡‡‡ Rusty knife. §§§§ Mallet.
||||| Barley. ¶¶¶¶ Bench.  Truss.
††††† A stick used in making porridge.

"Now, dame, I have your bairn marreit,
Suppose ye mak it nevir sa teuch,*
I let you wit she is nocht miscaireit,
It is weill kend I have enuech;
Ane crookit gleyd fell our ane heuch,
Ane spade, ane speit, ane spur, ane sock,
Withouthin oxin I have a pleuch,
To gang together Jenny and Jock.

"I have ane halter, and eik ane heck,†
Ane cord, ane creel,‡, and als ane cradle,
Five fiddler of raggis to stuff ane jack,§
Ane auld pannel of ane laid saddle,¶
Ane pepper-polk made of a padell,
Ane spounge,|| ane spindle wantand ane nok,
Tua lusty lips to lick ane ladle,
To gang together Jenny and Jock.

"Ane brechame,¶ and twa broches fine,
Weill bucklit with a bridle rein,
Ane sark made of the Linkome twine,
Ane gay green cloak that will not stain;
And yet for mister I will nocht fain,
Five hunder fleas now in a flock,
Call ye nocht them ane jolly menyé,
To gang together Jenny and Jock?

"Ane trene truncheon,†† ane ramhorn spoon,
Twa buits of barkit blasnit leather,
All graith that gains to hobbill shoon,‡‡
Ane thraveruk to twine ane tether,
Ane bridle, ane girth, and ane swine bladder,
Ane maskene-fat,§§ ane fetterit lock,
Ane sheep weill kept fra ill weather,
To gang together Jenny and Jock.

"Tak thir||| for my part of the feast;
It is weill knawin I am weill bodin;
Ye may nocht say my part is least.
The wife said, 'Speed, the kail are soddin,
And all the lifferoch is fust and loddin;¶¶
When ye have done, tak hame the brock,'
The roast was teuche sa were they bodin,
Syne gaid together Jenny and Jock."

In Bannatyne's Collection there are several poems

Robert ascribed to a poet named ROBERT Semple. SEMPLE, whom several writers have sought, on very slender evidence, to identify with the Scottish peer of that name, who succeeded to the title in 1572. It is well known, however, that Lord Semple continued to profess the Roman Catholic religion; while the poems of Robert Semple contain the most unequivocal proofs of having been written by a Protestant. There is some reason to believe that Semple, the poet, was a captain in the army; and he speaks of himself as having been present at the siege of Edinburgh Castle, in 1573. It appears from a sonnet addressed by Montgomery to Robert Hudson, that Semple was not exempt from the ordinary misfortunes of poets:—

"Ye knaw ill guyding genders mony gees,
And specially in poets: for example,
Ye can pen out twa couple an ye pleis—
Yourself and I, old Scot and Robert Semple."†††

* Tough.

† Wooden erection from which horses eat hay and straw.

‡ Basket.

§ A quantity of rags to quilt his coat of mail.

¶ Probably a fob, or purse, which closes with a spring.

|| Horse-collar.

†† Shirt made of the Lincoln twine—a sort of cloth so called.

‡‡ Wooden trencher.

§§ Instruments requisite for mending shoes.

||| Brewing vat. ¶¶ These.

¶¶ Our mess is sufficiently boiled and thickened.

 Remnants.

††† Montgomery's Poems, p. 15.

In Birrel's Diary, under the date January 17, 1568, it is mentioned that "Ane play was made by Robert Semple, and performed before the Lord Regent and divers others of the nobility." It has been conjectured that the play referred to is the comedy of "Philotus," the only existing specimen of the early Scottish drama that has any appearance of having been composed about that period. But there is no evidence that Semple was the author of this piece, and it is well known that various other plays, which were written and acted during the sixteenth century, were never printed, and have not survived to our day.*

We must not omit to mention a singular work which appeared at this period, Gude and termed "A Compendious Book of Godly Ballads. Godly and Spiritual Sangs, collectit out of sundrie parts of the Scripture, with sundrie of other Ballads chainged out of profaine Sangs for avoiding of Sinne and Harlotrie." This collection, as stated in the preface, was for the use of "young persons and sic [such] as are not exercisit in the Scriptures, who will sooner conserve the true Word nor when they hear it sung in Latin, the whilk they wot not what it is. But when they hear it sung, or sing it themselves, into their vulgar tongue with sweet melodie, then shall they love their God, and put away profane and unclean sangs." The Scottish people have from a very early period been passionately fond of popular songs, and there is abundant evidence that this taste was peculiarly prevalent at the era of the Reformation. In the words of Hume of Logie, in the preface to his "Hymnes or Sacred Songs," "in princes' courts, in the houses of great men, and at the assemblies of young gentlemen and young damsels, the chief pastime is to sing profane sonnets and vain ballads of love, or to rehearse some fabulous feats of Palmerin Amadis, or other such like reveries." It seems to have occurred to some well-meaning but ill-judging friends of religion and morality, that if they could succeed in substituting religious poems for the songs in common use, many of which were of a profane and licentious character, they would contribute not a little towards the reformation of national manners and morals. They accordingly proceeded to compose a number of "godly and spiritual" songs and ballads, as closely resembling the profane originals as possible in structure of verse and in style of imagery, and intended to be sung to the same tunes. In this way, "John, come kiss me now," "The bonny broom," "I'll never leave thee," "Ye'll never be like my auld gudeman," and various other amatory tunes, were "married" to spiritual hymns and songs, unobjectionable no doubt in sentiment, but beyond measure dull and prosaic. This practice, it seems, did not give universal satisfaction, for Mr. Geddes, minister of Wick, notices an objection which was raised by "some inconsiderate persons" to this blending of the sacred with the profane:—"O, say they, we remember some of these airs or tunes were sung heretofore to amorous sonnets, wherein were some obscene expressions. To this I answer, first, That in this practice I have the precedent of some of the most pious, grave, and zealous divines in the kingdom, who, to very good purpose, have composed godly songs to the tunes of such old songs as these, 'The bonny broom,' 'We'll all go pull the heather,' and such like, and yet without any challenge or disparagement. Secondly, It is alleged by some, and that not without some colour of reason, that many of our airs or tunes are made by good angels, but the letters or lines of our songs, by devils. We choose the part angelical, and leave the part diabolical. Thirdly, It is possible and probable that these vain, profane men, who composed those naughty, amorous sonnets, have surreptitiously borrowed those grave, sweet tunes from former spiritual hymns and songs; and why may not we again challenge our own, plead for restitution, and bring back to the right owner, applying those grave airs again to a divine and spiritual subject? Lastly, we find Paul, the great Apostle of the Gentiles, sanctified some sentences and verses of Greek poets, converting them into spiritual maxims; and why may not we (finding the measures of a melodious tune or air indifferent in themselves) consecrate and apply them to a sacred poem?"* In spite of this ingenious apology for the practice referred to, there is reason to fear that these spiritual parodies, from the indecent allusions which many of them suggested, their unseemly mixture of images sacred and profane, and the irreverent familiarity with which they addressed the Deity, were calculated to do more real harm to religion than the evil which they were intended to put down.† The following may be taken as a fair specimen of these "Gude and Godly Ballads:"—

* "Philotus: a Comedy," published by the Bannatyne Club.

"John, come kiss me now;
John, come kiss me now;
John, come kiss me by and by,
And mak nae mair adow.

"The Lord thy God I am
That, John, does thee call.
John represents the man
By grace celestiall.

"My prophets call, my preachers cry,
John, come kiss me now;
John, come kiss me by and by,
And mak nae mair adow."

"Who is at my windo, who, who?
Goe from my windo, goe, goe.
Wha calls there so lyke ane strangere?
Goe from my windo, goe, goe.

"Lord, I am here ane wratchit mortall,
That for thy mercy does cry and call Unto thee, my Lord celestiall.
See who is at my windo, who, who?

"How daris thou for mercy cry,
Sa lang in sin as thou does lye?
Mercy to have thou art not worthie.
Goe from my windo, goe.

"With richt humble heart, Lord, I thee pray
Thy comfort and grace obtaine I may;
Shaw me the path and ready way
In at thy door for to goe," &c.

"Till our Gudeman, till our Gudeman,
Keep faith and love till our Gudeman.

"For our Gudeman in heven does ring
In glore and bliss without ending,
Where angels ever sing Osan!
In laude and praise of our Gudeman.

"Our Gudeman desires three things:
Ane heart wherefra contrition springs,
Synne love him best our souls that wan,
When we were lost fra our Gudeman.

"And our Gudeman that ever was kind
Requires of us ane faithful mind,
Synne charitable be with every clan
For love onlie of our Gudeman," &c.

[To the air of "Leave thee, leave thee!—I'll never leave thee."]

"Ah, my love! leave me not,
Leave me not, leave me not;
Ah! my love, leave me not
Thus, mine, alone.

"With ane burden on my back;
I may not bear it, I'm so weak;
Love! this burden from me tak,
Or else I am gone.

"With sins I'm laden sair;
Leave me not, leave me not,
With sins I am laden sair,
Leave me not alone."

The following lines are said to have been sung to the tune of "Hey, tutti tatti," which is now united to the immortal lyric—"Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled:"—

"Hey, now, the day dallis,*
Now Christ on us callis,
Now wealth on our wallis
Appears anone:
Now the Word of God rings,
Whilk is king of all kings,
Now Christ's flock sings
The night is near gone."

Not a few of the songs or ballads contained in this singular collection are satirical invectives against the Romish priests, whose avarice, luxury, and profligacy, are exposed in the most unsparing terms. From an early period, indeed, a deadly feud had subsisted between the ballad-mongers and the clergy. The latter, as Mr. Tytler observes, were the bitter enemies of the minstrels, whom they considered as satirical rivals, or intruders, who carried off from the Church the money which might have been devoted to more pious and worthy uses. They talk of them as profligate, low-bred buffoons, who blow up their cheeks, and contort their persons, and play on horns, harps, trumpets, pipes, and Moorish flutes, for the pleasures of their lords; and who, moreover, flatter them by songs, and tales, and adulatory ballads, for which their masters are not ashamed to repay these ministers of the prince of darkness with large sums of gold and silver, and with rich embroidered robes.† So keenly did the clergy feel the attacks of their poetical adversaries, that a provincial council held at Linlithgow, in 1549,

Satirical ballads against the Romish Church.

* Dawns.

† History of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 373; Ancient Scottish Melodies, p. 31.

* Ancient Scottish Melodies, printed for the Maitland Club, p. 38.

† Ibid., p. 39.

considered it necessary to fulminate a special denunciation against all who should be found to have in their possession any books of rhymes or vulgar songs abusive of the clergy, or containing any heretical tenets; and in 1551, an act of parliament was passed prohibiting the publication of "anie buikes, ballats, sangs, blasphematus rimes, or tragedies, either in Latin or in English," without royal license obtained "fra our Soverain Ladie and the Lord Governour." The Reformers seem to have been well aware of the powerful influence which such poetical invectives exert upon the popular mind, and they accordingly lost no opportunity of exposing in "ballats and sangs" the indolence and corruption, the luxurious habits and profligate livcs, of the priests. And few missiles could have been more effective in hastening the downfall of the papal system, and the expulsion of its "eremites and friars, white, black, and grey, with all their trumpery." The following ingenious allegory of the power and evil influence of the Pope was adapted to the air of "The hunte is up, the hunte is up," which appears to have been popular at this period both in England and Scotland.*

"With huntis up, with huntis up;

It is now perfect day;

Jesus, our king, has gone a hunting;

Who likes to speed they may.

"Ane cursed fox lay hid in rocks,

This long and many a day,

Devouring sheep while he might creep;

None might him 'schape away.

"It did him good to lap the blude

Of young and tender lambs;

None could him miss, for all was his—

The young ones with their dams.

"The hunter is Christ, that hunts in haste;

The hounds are Peter and Paul;

The Pope is the fox; Rome is the rocks

That rubs us on the gall.

"The cruel beast he never ceased,

By his usurped power,

Under dispence to get our pence,

Our souls to devour.

"Wha could devise such merchandise

As he had there to sell,

Unless it were proud Lucifer

The great master of hell?

"He had to sell the Tantonie † bell,

And pardons therein was,

Remission of sins in old sheep-skins,

Our souls to bring from grace.

"With bulls of lead, white wax, and red,

And other whiles with green,

Closed in a box: this used the fox:

Such peltre was never seen," &c.

"WAE IS THE HERDS ‡ OF ISRAEL.

"Wae is the herds of Israel,

That feeds not Christ's flock,

But daintily they feed themsel,

Syne does the people mock.

"The silly sheep was all forlorne,

And was the wolf's prey,

The herds teindit § all the corne,

The sheep could get na strae. ||

* According to an old author, one Gray acquired the favour of Henry VIII., and afterwards that of Protector Somerset, for making "certaine merry ballades," whereof one chiefly was "The hunte is up."

† St. Anthony's bell.

§ Tithed.

‡ Shepherds.

|| Straw.

"They gatherit up baith wool and milk,
And syne took na mair cure.
But clad them with the costly silk,
And sic like clad their hure.

"Therefore, says God, I will require
My sheep furth of their hands;
And give them herds at my desire
To teach them my commands.

"And they shall nouthir feed themsel,
Nor yet hunger my sheep,
I shall them from my Kirk expel,
And give them swine to keep."

"PRIESTS, CHRIST BELIEVE.

"Priests, Christ believe,
And only traist* into his blude,
And nocht into your warks gude,
As plainly Paul can preve.†

"Priests, learn to preach,
And put away your ignorance;
Praise only God, his word advance,
And Christ's people teach.

"Priests, cut your gowne,
Your neukit bonnet put away,
And cut your tippet into twae,‡
Go, preach from towne to towne.

"Priests, thole § to preach,
Sen ye yourself can preach na thing,
Or we your brawling down sall bring,
And na mair with you fleecche. ||

"Priests, take na tiend,
Except the word of God ye shaw,
Tho' ye allege your use and law,
It is nocht as ye weind.

"Priests, take na kyis, ¶
The umost  claithe ye sall quit-claime
Fra sax puir bairns with their dame,
A vengeance on you cryis.

"Priests, burn na ma,
Of wrang delation ye may hyre,
And false witness na mair inquire,
And let abjuring ga.

"Priests, leave your pryde,
Your scarlet and your velvet soft,
Your horse and mulis costly coft,
And jack-men by your side.

"Priests, sober be,
And fecht †† not, nouthir boist nor schoir, ††
Misreule the realme and court no moir,
And to your kirks flee.

"Priests, mend your life,
And leave your foul sensualitie
And vyle stinkand chastity,
And ilke ane tak ane wife.

"Priests, pray no more
To Sanct Anthone to save your sow,
Nor to Sanct Bride to keepe your cow,
That grievis God right sore.

"Priests, worship God,
And put away imagerie.
Your pardons and fraternitie,
To hell, the way, and road.

"Priests, sell no mass,
But minister that sacrament,
As Christ in the New Testament,
Commandit you expresse.

"Priests, put away
Your paintit fire of purgatrie,
The ground of your idolatrie,
It is near domes-day," &c.

* Trust.

† Prove.

‡ Two.

§ Suffer.

|| Coax, wheedle.

¶ Cows.

 Finest. The mortuary, or corpse present, as it were; see supra, vol. i. pp. 471, 531.

†† Fight. Probably an allusion to the quarrels of the higher ecclesiastics respecting precedence, and their other privileges.

‡‡ Boast nor threaten.

"REMEMBER, REMEMBER MAN.

"Remember man, remember man,
'That I thy saul from Sathan wan;
And has done for thee what I can;
Thou art full deir to me.

Is, was, nor sull be none,
That may thee save but one,
Only, therefore, believe me on,
And thou sall never die.

"Wolves, whom of my evangelists write,
And Paul and Peter did of dite,
Allace, have you deceived quite
With false hypocresie.
My New Testament, plain and gude,
For whilk I shed my precious blude
With cruel suffering, on the rude,*
They hald for heresie;

"And has set up their false doctrine
For covetice instead of mine,
With fire and sword defends it syne,
Contrarie my word and me.
The Anti-Christ is come, but † dout
And has you trapped round about;
Forth of his girne ‡ therefore come out Gif ye wald saved be.

"His pilgrimage and purgatie,
His worschipping of imagerie,
His pardons and fraternitie,
With zeal and good intent.
The whisperit sins called th' ear-confession,
With his priests mumblit absolution,
And mony other false abusoun
The Paip § has done invent.

"With masses sauld || by priest and freir
For land and money wonder deir,
Whilk is the ground-stone of their queir,
And root of all their pryde;
His Pater-noster bocht and sauld,
His numbered aves and psalms tald,
Whilk my New Testament nor my Auld
On no wayes can abyde.

"Their holy matines fast they patter,
They give you breid and sell you water,
His cursings on you als ¶ they clatter,
Tho' they can hurt you nocht;
Gif ye will give them caip or bell,
The cling thereof they will you sell,
Suppose the sauls  suld go to hell,
They get nathing unbocht.

"They sell you als the sacramentis sevin,
They might have made as weill eivin,
Few or mony, odd or evin,
Your purses for to pyke;

Wald they let but twa usit be,
Of Baptisme and of my bodie,*
As they were institute by me,
Men wald them better like.

"Their trifles all are made by men,
Whilk my Gospell did never ken,
My law and my commandments ten
They hyde from men's eine; †
My New Testament they wald keep downe,
Whilk suld be preached from towne to towne,
Cause it wald cut their lang tailit gowne,
And shaw their lyfe unceline," &c.

"HAY TRIX, TRIM GO TRIX, UNDER THE GRENE-WODE TREE.

"The Paip, that pagane full of pryde,
He has us blindit lang,
For where the blind the blind dois gyde,
Na wonder baith ga wrang;
Like prince and king he led the ring
Of all iniquitie.
Hay trix, trim go trix,
Under the grene-wode tree.

"But his abomination
The Lord has brought to licht,
His Popische pryde and threefald croun
Almaist has lost their might;
His plak pardons are but lurdons ‡
Of new-found vanitie.
Hay trix, trim, &c.

"His Cardinals has cause to murne,
His Bischops borne aback;
His Abbots gat an uncouth turne
When schavelings went to sack;
With burgess wyvis they led thair lyvis,
And fure § better nor we.
Hay trix, trim, &c.

"His Carmelites and Jacobinis,
His Dominikes had great do;
His Cordeleiris and Augustinis,
Sanct Francis order too.
The silly Freirs mony years
With babbling bleirit our ee.
Hay trix, trim, &c.

"The blind Bishop he could nocht preich
For playing with the lasses,
The silly Freir behuivit to fleech
For almous that he assis:
The Curat his creed he culd nocht reid,
Shame fall the companie.
Hay trix, trim," &c.

* The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

† Eyes.

‡ Rogues.

§ Fared.

* Cross.

† Without.

‡ Snare.

§ Pope.

|| Sold.

¶ Also.

 Souls.

CHAPTER XL.

MANNERS AND MORALS OF THE PERIOD.

THE 'troubled times' of a revolution are seldom favourable to morality: and the exactions of the clergy, the corruptions of the Church in the first instance, and the struggle between the Romanists and the Protestants to which these led, exercised the most injurious influence on the morals of the people. The grasping spirit everywhere manifested by the clergy; their rigid exaction of tithes; their forced sale of indulgences and dispensations; their taxes upon marriages, baptisms, burials, and all the rites which they declared to be needful for salvation; their spoliation of the widow and the orphan, the helpless and the dying; together with their indolent, luxurious, and licentious lives, had rendered the ordinances of religion contemptible in the estimation of the community. Payment of offerings originally voluntary was now exacted with the utmost rigour, under the terrors of excommunication. At all the great festivals of the Church the 'kirk dues' were demanded. "A heavy tax was levied on every event, from baptism to burial; even afterwards the heavy hand of the priest was there. If the deceased was wealthy, the 'quot of his testament' formed a large deduction from the succession; if poor, still 'the heriot and the umaist cloth,' i.e. the best animal and the richest garment, were taken from his widow and orphans for 'pious uses.'" No wonder that these endless exactions were felt by the people to be 'a grievous burden, and heavy to be borne;' and that the mortuaries formed one of the most popular grievances when the storm at length burst, and swept away the whole system as an intolerable nuisance.

"And als* the vicar, as I trow,
He will not fail to take ane cow,
And upmaist claiith, tho' babes them ban,
From ane puir sillie husbandman;
When that he lysis for till dee,†
Having small bairnis twa or three;
And has three kye withouten mo,
The vicar must have ane of tho,
With the gray cloke that happs‡ the bed,
Howbeit that he be puirly clad.
And gif the wife dee on the morne,
Tho' all the babes suld be forlorne,
The other cow he cleiks§ away,
With her puir coat of raploch gray;
And gif within twa days or three
The oldest child happens to dee,
Of the third cow he will be sure.
When he has all then under his cure,
And father and mother baith are deid,
Beg maun the babes without remeid." ||

In a remonstrance addressed by individuals attached to the Romish faith "to the prelates and other churchmen assembled in the provincial council holden at Edinburgh in March and April, 1559, craving redress of several grievances complained in the ecclesiastical administration of Scotland," this subject is referred to in the following terms:—

"Item, because that the corps-presents, cow and finest claiith, and the silver commonlie callit the Kirk richts and Pasch offerings, whilk is taken at Pasch fra men and women, for distribution of the sacraments of the blesst body and blude of Jesus Christ, were at the beginning but as offerings and gifts, at the discretion and benevolence of the giver only; and now, by distance of time, the kirkmen uses to compel men to the paying thereof by authority and jurisdiction, sa that they will not only fulminate their sentence of cursing, but als stop and debar men and women to come to the ready using of the sacraments of haly Kirk, till they be satisfiet thereof with all rigor; whilk thing has na ground of the law of God nor haly Kirk, and als is very sclaundrous, and gives occasion to the puir to murmur gretumly againes the state ecclesiastic for the doing of the premissis, and that sic things be na mair usit in tymes to come within this realm."*

While the clergy were thus rigorous in exacting their dues from all classes, poor as well as rich, they were far from being equally attentive to the performance of their religious duties. In many districts of the kingdom, the avarice and selfishness of the monks had left the people destitute of all religious instruction, except the preaching of the begging friars. In the course of time the monasteries had swallowed up the parochial livings, so that the rural clergy appear to have been literally starved. The monks, in one way or other, had contrived to obtain possession of the patronage of almost all the churches; to swell their already overgrown revenues they not only seized the tithes, but monopolized the vicarage dues also. The parochial duties, such as they were, were discharged by some outlying brother of the monastery, or by a poor vicar pensioner, ground down to the lowest amount of maintenance. In vain were appeals made to Rome against these nefarious proceedings, and angry bulls fulminated by the popes against the avarice which was undermining the authority and influence of the Church. The evil continued to increase until a large portion of the secular clergy ceased to officiate, and the remainder were rendered utterly inefficient and contemptible. As might have been expected, the great body of the people forsook the churches long before the Reformation:—"the singers in the cathedrals sang to empty benches; the priests went through their services without an audience;" and papal bulls, earnestly entreating the people to come once again to their 'dear mother Church,' proved utterly inefficient to remedy the growing evil.† From one of the canons promulgated by

The ordinances of religion forsaken and despised by the people.

* Also. † Die. ‡ Covers. § Snatches.
|| Sir David Lindsay's Works, vol. ii. p. 53, and vol. iii. 105. See also supra, vol. i. p. 508.

* Liber Officialis Sancti Andree, pp. 30, 31; Abbotsford Club.
† Liber Episcopatus Glasguensis, vol. i., No. xx.

the provincial council held in 1551, "it appears," says Lord Hailes, "that in the most populous parishes few of the parishioners attended mass on Sundays, much less on other festivals; that of those who attended some scoffed and behaved irreverently, while others busied themselves in merchandise even at the church porch." This statement is fully borne out by the following graphic sketch that an old Scottish poet gives of "the indecent manner" in which "a great number of fools behave in church:"—

- " Into the church then comes another sotte,
Without devotion, jetting up and downe,
Or to be seene, and to showe his garded cote:
Another on his fiste a sparhawke or fawcane,
Or els a cukow, and so wasting his shone.*
Before the altars he to and fro doth wande,
With even as great devotion as a gander.
- " In comes another, his houndes at his tayle,
With lynes and leases, and other like baggage,
His dogges barke, so that withoutten fayle,
The whole church is troubled by their outrage;
So innocent youth learneth the same of age,
And their lewde sound doth the church fill.
But in this noyse the good people kepe them still.
- " One time the hawkes bells jangleth hye;
Another time they flutter with their wings;
And now the houndes barking strikes the skye,
Now sounde their fete, and now chaynes ringes;
They clap with their hands; by such maner thinges
They make of the church for their hawkes a mewe,
And kanel for their doges, which they shall after rewe.
- " There are handled pleadings and causes of the lawe,
There are made bargaynes of divers maner thinges,
Byings and sellings scant worth a hawe,†
And there are for lucre contrived false leasings;
And while the priest his masse or matins sings,
These foolles which to the church do repayre,
Are chatting and bobling, as it were in a fayre.
- " Some gikle and laugh, and some on maydens stare,
And some on wives with wanton countenance,
As for the service they have small force or care,
And full delite them in their misgovernance:
Some with their slippers to and fro doth prauce,
Clapping with their heeles in church and queare,
So that good people cannot the service heare.
- " What shall I write of maydens and of wives,
Of their roundings and ungodly communing?
How one a slaunder craftily contrives,
And in the church thereof hath her talking,
The other have thereto their eares leaning,
And when they all have heard forth hir tale,
With great devotion they get them to the ale."‡

The behaviour of the clergy themselves seems to have been equally irreverential. In the cartulary of Moray are inserted the "Constitutiones Lyncolnienses," as proper rules for the priests of that diocese, from which we learn that they were to enter the place of worship not with insolent looks, but decently and in order, and were to be guilty of no laughing, or of the perpetration of any base jokes, and were to conduct their whisperings in an under tone.

It could scarcely be expected that the people would continue to respect or support a church which had suffered ignorance and superstition of the clergy. religion to degenerate into a mere form, and which sought to retain its hold upon the nation not by faithful instruction, or by the holy lives of its rulers, but by pompous ceremonies, superstitious legends, false miracles, and the virtues of relics and saints. What kind of religious teaching could be expected from men, who, like the priests of Glasgow, sought to impose upon their flocks by the exhibition of such relics as a bit of the wood of the true cross; a golden vial with part of the hair of the blessed Virgin; a golden vial containing part of the coat of St. Kentigern and Thomas-à-Becket; the mouth of St. Ninian in a golden casket; part of the zone of the blessed Virgin, and a small vial of crystal containing a portion of her milk; a bit of the manger in which Christ lay; a small saffron-coloured vial containing the oil which emanated from the tube of St. Kentigern; a small bag with part of the sweat of St. Martin; 'a precious bag' with the breasts of St. Kentigern and Thomas-à-Becket; various sacks and chests containing the bones of saints and other superstitious articles equally childish and debasing? * The gross ignorance of the Scottish clergy, indeed, is acknowledged by the most strenuous defenders of the Romish Church. The learned Winzet, one of the ablest opponents of Knox, admits that their 'dumb doctrine' consisted solely in gorgeous ceremonies, while the word of God was carefully concealed; and deplors that many, through lack of instruction, had erred from the faith; while the sacraments of Christ were profaned by ignorant and wicked persons, destitute alike of learning and of piety, in which number he candidly confesses the greater part of the clergy to have been.† Robert Reid, Bishop of Orkney, Alexander Milne, Abbot of Cambuskenneth, and a few others of the better class of churchmen, saw the danger to which the Church was exposed, and laboured to avert the storm by improving the lives and learning of the body. A provincial council which met at Linlithgow, and then adjourned to Edinburgh, in 1549, attempted to enforce a reformation of the manners of ecclesiastical persons by the publication of a new code of fifty-seven canons, in the preamble to which it was admitted that the two prime causes of the prevailing heresies were the corruption and profane lewdness of the clergy of almost every degree, and their gross ignorance in all branches of learning. A subsequent council promulgated a canon enjoining the printing and publication of a compendium of the popish doctrines in the Scottish dialect, known as Archbishop Hamilton's Catechism,—though for the use of the clergy only, who were anxiously cautioned to take care that their copies did not get into the hands of any of the laity, unless it might be of some good, grave, faithful, and discreet men, to whom they should have the permission of their bishops to show the book on being convinced that it was desired rather for the sake of instruction than from curiosity. It was ordered, however, to be read to the people in the churches on Sundays and holidays. The Dean and Chapter of Aberdeen, in a

* Shoes.

† A hawthorn berry.

‡ Extracts from Barclay's Poems; Sibbald's Scottish Poetry, vol. ii. pp. 437, 438.

* Liber Episcop. Glasg.

† Supra, p. 295.

memorial of advice (dated January 15th, 1558) which they presented to Bishop Gordon, for the reformation of religion and the suppression of heresy within the diocese, earnestly recommended that "preaching should be made within the haill diocie; that there be sent letters monitors upon the haill persons, abbots, and priors, to cause preaching to be made within their kirks betwixt this and Fastern's even next, at least ance in ilk parish kirk, and ane uther tyme betwixt that and Pasche, with continuation, conforme to the acts provincial, under pains containt thereintil; and failing thereof, that my Lord cause send ane preacher to ever ilk kirk that is nocht preachit in Lentron thereafter: and to take up the pains thereof to be applyit to certain preachers to be sent through the diocie: and letters to be direct thereupon, upon the fermorars thereof, conform to the statue provincial; sa that the people be nocht in danger because of inlaik of preaching of the true Catholic Faith. And writings to be made thereupon by my lord to them all that are absent to come and make residence within the diocie and chanonrie of Aberdene, and to reform the kirks, and cause preachings to be made thereintil according to the acts."*

The morals of the clergy, however, and especially of cially of the great ecclesiastics, the clergy. were beyond the reach of such partial and feeble efforts. In the language of Winzet, even in the midst of the "great uproar, tumult, and terrible clamour" of the Reformation they were so "oppressed with deadly sleep that they woke not forth of their dream." The testimonies of their own friends carry more conviction than all the denunciations of their enemies, of the absolute decay of learning, and the degradation of morals among the clergy of that period. The learned George Cone, a zealous adherent of the old faith, writes in the strongest terms of the low aims and sensual lives of the clergy, and the dreadful corruption of manners which prevailed among them. There was a public brothel, he says, in the dwellings of many of the priests, and men consecrated to the service of God were in the nightly habit of frequenting taverns. Neither the honour of matrons nor virgin modesty was safe from their sacrilegious lust; so that the veneration which the people once entertained for their spiritual instructors was now turned into contempt.† The provincial council held in 1549 makes the humiliating confession that "corruption of manners and profane lewdness of life, together with gross ignorance of literature and science, prevailed among the clergy of almost every degree." The Roman Pontiff himself beheld with dismay the degraded state of the Scottish Church, and there is preserved in the cartulary of Moray ‡ a bull, which one of the Innocents directed to three English bishops, enjoining them to redress, by all the terrors of the ecclesiastical and civil powers, the atrocious evils that reigned unpunished among the Scottish clergy. They marry, he says, in defiance of all ecclesiastical rule; they resign their clerical character when necessary for their interests, or the gratification of their passions, and resume it again at will in order to enjoy under priestly privilege immunity from their crimes. The Dean and Chapter of Aberdeen, in their address to the bishop already referred to, entreat, first of all, "that my lord bishop cause the kirkmen within his diocese to reform themselves in all their slanderous manner of living, and to remove their open concubines, as well great as small." And that their recommendations for the reformation of the Church, "by the help of God, may take better effect, they humbly and heartily pray and exhort my lord, their ordinary, for the honour of God, relief of his own conscience, and weil of his diocie, and the eveting of great scandal, that his lordship will be so good as to show edificative example; in special in removing and discharging himself of the company of the gentlewoman by whom he is greatly slandered; without the which be done, divers that are partners say they cannot accept counsel and correction of him who will not correct himself. And, in like manner, cause his lordship's servants to reform themselves; because, next himself, it seems him to begin at his own household."* Bishop Gordon, indeed, was no worse in this respect than his brethren, for the prelates of that day were almost without exception living in open violation of their ordination vows. "Such of them as were contented with one woman were esteemed virtuous; nay, ladies of good condition thought it no shame to live as their avowed concubines, and found the sympathy of society not averse to such a departure from the celibacy which the Church pretended to enforce."

The satirists of the day make constant reference to the 'great prerogatives' of the clergy—

"Who may aye part with their wives
Without divorce or summoning,
Then take another without wedding;"

and denounce in no measured terms the base spirit of the barons, who, for the sake of a large dowry, were content to marry the illegitimate daughters of the great ecclesiastics. Sir David Lindsay, in his "Satire of the Three Estates," represents Temporalty, or the barons, as beseeching King Correction:—

"Of our daughters to have compassion,
Whom we may na way marry, by the Rood,
Without we make some alienation
Of our land for their supportation.
For why? The market raisit bene sa hie
That Prelates' daughters of this nation
Are married with sic superfluite;
They will not spare to give twa thousand pound
With their daughters to ane noble man,
In riches sa they do superabound.
But we may not do sa by Saint Allan.
Thir proud Prelates our daughters sair may ban,
That they remain at hane sa lang unmarried."†

* Registrum Episcopatus Aberdenensis, vol. i., Preface, p. lviii.

† Conæus de duplici Statu Religionis, p. 90.

‡ No. 260; North British Review, vol. ii. p. 378.

* Reg. Epis. Aberd., p. lxi.

† Works of Sir David Lindsay, vol. ii. p. 79.

Ample evidence can be produced from the public records of the kingdom to show that their complaints were by no means exaggerated. The head of the Scottish hierarchy at this eventful period was Cardinal David Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrew's—the Wolsey of Scotland as he has been termed. And it is well known that during the greater part of his life he lived in open concubinage with Marion Ogilvy, a member of an old baronial house, and had by her a numerous family. Three of his sons had letters of legitimation under the great seal, on the 10th of November, 1539. "For not less than four of their sisters, all taking their father's name, and all in recorded documents setting forth his style and rank as honourable to them, large dowers found matches among the best of the Scottish nobility and gentry."* The successor of Beaton was Archbishop Hamilton, author of the Catechism already referred to, who lived openly with the wife or widow of his kinsman, Hamilton of Stenhouse; and among the goods and chattels inventoried in her will, mention is made of three grants of legitimation in favour of as many children by the primate. Another fierce persecutor of the Protestants was William Chisholm, Bishop of Dunblane from 1527 till 1564. Keith states that this prelate, "being a great adversary to the new Reformation, he alienated the episcopal patrimony of this Church to a very singular degree, most of which he gave to his nephew, Sir James Chisholm of Cromlix. He likewise gave great portions to James Chisholm of Glassengall, his own natural son, and to his two natural daughters, one of whom was married to Sir James Stirling of Keir, and the other to John Buchanan of that ilk." His example was followed by Patrick Hepburn, Bishop of Moray, who alienated the revenues of that opulent see to provide for a very large family, whose several legitimations are duly recorded. The last Roman Catholic bishop of Argyle was Robert Montgomery, a son of the first Earl of Eglinton. On the 9th of July, 1543, letters of legitimation under the privy seal were granted in favour of Michael, Robert, and Hugh Montgomery, "bastard sons of the reverend father in Christ, Robert, Bishop of Argyle." Mention is made of four sons of Alexander Gordon, the last of the ante-Reformation bishops of Galloway, who joined the Reformers that he might marry Barbara Logie, his mistress, and make his children by her legitimate.

As an example of the glaring scandals to which the licentiousness of the priests gave rise, Knox mentions what he calls 'a merry bourd,' that occurred at St. Andrew's before Gawin Dunbar, Bishop of Aberdeen, a zealous and unscrupulous assistant of Cardinal Beaton in suppressing heresy. "During the imprisonment of Sandie Furrou," says Knox, "Sir John Dingwall, according to the charity of churchmen, entertained his wife. For the which cause, at his returning, he spake more liberally of priests than they could bear, and so was he denounced to be accused of heresy, and called to his answer to St. Andrew's. The man 'understood nothing of religion,' and met the charges against him with an onslaught on his judges. The first article was, that he despised the mass. His answer—"I hear no masses in eight days than three bishops there sitting say in a year." Accused, secondly, of contempt of sacraments: 'The priests,' quoth he, 'are the most common contemners of sacraments, and especially of matrimony;' and 'that he witnessed by any of the priests there present, and named the men's wives with whom they had meddled;' but especially Dingwall, who had seven years together abused his own wife and consumed his substance; adding, 'For God's sake, will ye take wives of your own, that I and others whose wives ye have abused may be revenged upon you?' Then 'the old Bishop of Aberdeen (Dunbar), thinking to justify himself before the people, said, 'Carle, thou shalt not know my wife.' Alexander answered, 'My lord, ye are too old; but, with the grace of God, I will drink with your daughter ere I depart.' And thereat was smiling of the best, and loud laughter of some; for the bishop had a daughter married with Andrew Balfour in that same town."*

Bishop Dunbar's immediate successor was William Stewart, who held the high office of Lord-Treasurer of Scotland. He was appointed in 1532, and was one of those who with Cardinal Beaton sat in judgment in the Cathedral of St. Andrew's upon Sir John Borthwick, "accused of maintaining that the Pope had no greater authority than any other bishop; that indulgences or pardons granted by the Pope were of no force or effect; that clerks may lawfully marry; that churchmen ought not to enjoy temporalities, and other heresies." He was succeeded (May 17, 1546) by William Gordon, fourth son of Alexander, third Earl of Huntley, the prelate whom the dean and chapter of his diocese so earnestly exhorted to reform his own life. His character is thus briefly and plainly drawn by Spottiswood: "This man, brought up in letters at Aberdeen, followed his studies a long time in Paris, and returning thence was first parson of Clat, and afterwards promoted to the See. Some hopes he gave at first of a virtuous man, but afterwards turned a very epicure, spending all his time in drinking and whoring. He dilapidated the whole rents by feuing the land, and converting the victual-duties in money, a great part whereof he wasted upon his base children and their mothers." The registers of the diocese fully bare out these severe statements respecting the conduct of this unworthy prelate. Mention is made of no fewer than forty-nine 'charters of assedation' of various portions of the land belonging to the bishopric, granted by him to different individuals during the course of a single year—1549; and on the 20th of October, 1565, he granted

* History of the Reformation, vol. i.; Quarterly Review, vol. lxxxix. pp. 37, 38.

* Quarterly Review, vol. lxxxix. p. 44.

a charter of the lands of North Spittal to Janet Knowles (probably the 'gentlewoman by whom he was greatly slandered') in life-rents, and to his children, George, John, and William, and Elizabeth, Margaret, and Martha Gordon, in fee.*

But this open violation of their vows of chastity was not confined to such prelates as Beaton, Gordon, Hepburn, and Chisholm; the most learned, zealous, and amiable among them were, in this respect, not a wit purer than the others. David Panter, Bishop of Ross, a statesman and a scholar, 'a person,' says Keith, 'of most polite education and excellent parts,'—his successor, Lesley, the faithful servant of Queen Mary,—and even Gawin Douglas, Bishop of Dunkeld, the scholar and poet,—all lived 'according to what might then be called the license of their order.' This general demoralisation of the ecclesiastical order must be regarded as the inevitable result of their enforced celibacy, and shows the pernicious consequences of making 'a law so hard upon human nature that the sympathies of mankind are in favour of breaking it.'

The bad example of the clergy must have exercised an exceedingly injurious influence upon the laity, and there is abundant evidence that a similar laxity of morals prevailed among all classes of the community. One great cause of the licentiousness which existed at this period was the state of the law of marriage, coupled with the vile traffic in dispensations, and the divorces to which they led. It was not deemed sufficient to prohibit the marriage of relations as detailed in the Levitical code; the prohibition was extended to all persons within eight degrees of consanguinity, or, in other words, who had had a common great grandfather, or great great grandmother. Marriage was forbidden also to persons within eight degrees of affinity, or relation by marriage. Even unlawful intercourse formed a bar to a union between either of the parties and the relations of the other within the prohibited degrees; and the ignorance or bona fides of either party was of no avail to legalize a marriage forbidden by this monstrous law. The prohibition was further extended to all connected within the same degrees through spiritual relationship, or that created by baptism, which affected not only the relatives of the baptizans and baptizatus, but all the connexions arising from the relation of godfather and godmother, and the children for whom they stood sponsors, in the same way as if they had actually been parents and child. The Pope of course claimed the power to dispense with these prohibitions; and the sale of dispensations to persons within the forbidden degrees contributed largely to replenish the papal treasury.

The effects of this abominable system in a narrow
Its injurious and thinly peopled country like influence. Scotland may be learned from various contemporary documents. The Archbishop of St. Andrew's, writing in 1554 for the information of the Pope, states that such was the connexion between families in Scotland it was almost impossible to find a match for a person of good birth that should not come within the prohibited degrees. "On that account," he adds, "as the minds of men are always prone to evil, many persons marry in the promise or hope of a dispensation to be procured afterwards, but tiring of the connexion, either divorce their wives or put them away, under the pretext of the want of a dispensation, and their inability to afford the expense necessary for procuring one." The archbishop dwells with great earnestness on the evils which flowed from this state of the law—the grievous injury inflicted on the offspring of such marriages—the alienation of friends—the discord and strife, robberies and bloodshed, to which the system gave rise. The queen-mother wrote to the Pope on the same subject, February 1, 1556, and declared that in consequence of the great distance of Scotland from the papal court, the dangers and inconveniences of the journey, and the poverty of the people, many marriages were daily contracted within the prohibited degrees, to the great scandal of the Church, and the danger of souls.

* Reg. Aberd., Epis. p. lxx.

By the canon law, as it existed in Scotland before the Reformation, marriage Frequency of was theoretically indissoluble, but divorces.
in fact it had become a mere temporary contract, which either party might dissolve at pleasure. If both or either desired a separation, it was easy to find a plea to prove that it was originally null and void. The existence between the man and woman of a relation by consanguinity or affinity within the forbidden degrees, unlawful intercourse, or spiritual connexion by baptism on the part of one of the two with a person related within those degrees to the other party, a previous contract, however irregular, and although not regarded by the parties themselves at the time as constituting a marriage, as well as misconduct subsequent to union, were deemed sufficient to procure a divorce. All decency was thrown aside. Not only profligate courtiers and ambitious barons, but ladies of high rank openly avowed their own guilt and shame, in order to obtain a separation from their husbands. "Disoluteness," says Mr. Riddell, "great in Scotland before the Reformation, in no manner more displayed itself than in the unlicensed intercourse between the sexes, which was certainly increased by the forbidden degrees comprising a great range of connexions (so much so that there came to be but few high families who were not thereby barred from marriage at common law), combined with the necessity of obtaining dispensations for marriage to obviate the objections, that were often long in arriving from Rome; for in these circumstances parties enamoured of each other, unable to brook the requisite cruel delay, either, nevertheless, de facto married, or dealt in fornication, or concubinage. After the arrival of the dispensation, their love having cooled, they frequently jilted each other, 'ad altera vota convolantes;' while they even made their unlawful intercourse a further handle, good as it was, for the jactitation of the putative marriage, by continuing which they incurred excommunication. Such separations with undue divorces and re-marriages became so frequent as, according to Major, to become a national reproach. It was impossible, too, even for parties who bona fide regularly married, owing to the extent still of the forbidden degrees, properly to know whether they were really lawfully married, or not living in incestuous concubinage.*

The immorality was probably not less in the lower classes, but as their poverty prevented them from availing themselves of the legal steps to obtain a divorce, the highest ranks figure most conspicuously in the records of the ecclesiastical courts. The queen herself set this shameful example to her subjects. In less than a year after the death of her husband, James IV., and in little more than three months after the birth of their son Alexander, Margaret Tudor married the Earl of Angus, a youth of nineteen. After she was tired of him, she carried on an amour with the Regent John, Duke of Albany. She next became enamoured of young Henry Stewart, afterwards Lord Methven; and in order to be at liberty to marry him she commenced a suit of divorce against Angus, who ultimately yielded to her wish, and admitted that he had "been precontracted to a gentlewoman (a daughter of Traquair), who bore a child to him before he married the queen: and so by reason of the precontract he could not be her lawful husband." On this ground the marriage was declared null and void by the Cardinal Bishop of Ancona, on the 11th of March, 1527; and on the 2nd of April Margaret gave her hand to Henry Stewart. Becoming speedily tired of him in his turn, she determined to be free to marry a fourth time, and for this purpose had recourse again to those convenient marts for matrimonial jobs—the church courts. On the plea that Methven was cousin eight degrees removed to her second husband, Angus, or, in other words, that they were the great great grandchildren of a common ancestor, and that this constituted an affinity between her and Methven, she demanded that her third marriage should be set aside. The obedient official yielded to her imperious requirements, and pronounced a decree annulling the marriage, which is found registered in the extant volume of the records of the consistorial court. But her son, the young King James V., forbade the promulgation of the sentence, and thus prevented the additional disgrace to the royal family.

The same convenient instrumentality was called into operation when the granddaughter of Queen Margaret resolved to espouse the infamous Bothwell. He alleged that his countess, the Lady Jane Gordon, was related to him within the fourth degree, and on this ground the ecclesiastical court, which was hastily re-constituted for the purpose, pronounced a decree annulling their marriage. At the same time, to please the Reformed party, a collusive suit was instituted by the countess against her husband in the new commissary court, and a divorce was obtained by her on the ground of Bothwell's adultery with a servant. In this instance at least the usual complaints respecting the proverbial delays of the consistorial courts were not applicable, for the proceedings commenced on the 5th, and decree of nullity was pronounced on the 7th of May, 1567.

Another member of the royal family is mixed up in these records of shame, with a noble baron and a dignified ecclesiastic, in 'one of the strangest and darkest stories to be found even in Scotch family history.' James IV. having debauched the wife of William, third Lord Crichton, that nobleman, in revenge, seduced the king's youngest sister, Margaret, a princess of great beauty. The fruit of this amour was a daughter, named Margaret Crichton, 'who inherited the passions and misfortunes of her lineage.' After having married in succession two burgesses of Edinburgh, William Todrick and George Halkerston, she was wedded to George, Earl of Rothes, by whom she had a numerous family. During the absence of the Earl as ambassador, she carried on an intrigue with Patrick Panter, Abbot of Cambuskenneth, secretary of state, the first scholar and diplomatist of his age, and bore to him a son, who was afterwards Bishop of Ross. On the 27th of December, 1520, the earl obtained a suit of divorce against her, not on the ground of adultery, but on the convenient plea that she was within the prohibited degrees.* But it is said that they were afterwards reconciled, and that she was restored to her former situation as his lawful wife.

Even an illicit connection with one person was deemed a sufficient impediment to marriage with another related to the former within the uncanonical degrees. In the extant volume of the records of the consistorial court mention is made of the case of Janet Beaton, the Lady Buccleuch of the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel.' She was the daughter of Sir John Beaton, of Creich, in Fife, and was first married to Sir James Creichton, of Cranston Riddell. Having been left a widow in 1539, she soon afterwards married Simon Preston, the young Laird of Craigmillar. In 1543, she instituted a suit of divorce against him, and was not ashamed to publish her own disgrace, and to set forth as the ground of her suit that before her marriage to her present husband she had had sinful intercourse with Walter Scott, of Buccleuch, and that Buccleuch and Preston were within the prohibited degrees, as they were the great-grandson and the great great grandson of a common ancestor. On that allegation the marriage was declared null;

* If the earl had instituted his suit on the ground of adultery, he would merely have obtained a decree of separation, as a real marriage is indissoluble according to the Romish law; but, on the plea of sib-ness, the marriage was pronounced null from the beginning, and he was consequently at liberty to marry again.

and the motive of the suit immediately became manifest, for on the 2nd of December, 1544, Janet was wedded to her old paramour, Buccleuch. After his assassination in the streets of Edinburgh by the Kers, in revenge for the death of Cessford at the battle of Melrose,* she formed a connection with the Earl of Bothwell, and was proved to be 'quietly married or handfast' to that notorious villain. At the time of Darnley's murder the Lady of Buccleuch was still in popular belief associated with Bothwell, and was charged with administering magic philtres to the queen, with a view to secure her majesty's love to him. In the well-known placard which was affixed to the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, Mary was accused of assenting to the murder 'through the persuasion of the Erle Bothwell and the witchcraft of Lady Buccleuch.'

The number of children rendered illegitimate through these frequent divorces, the children. or rather decrees of nullity, must have been very great. In some cases, although the marriage was dissolved, the offspring were notwithstanding declared to be legitimate. The marriage of George, first Earl of Rothes, was dissolved after it had lasted for twenty years, on the usual plea that his countess and himself were within the forbidden degrees. But as his eldest son had married into the powerful family of St. Clair, it was not to be expected that they would patiently acquiesce in a decision which deprived him and his children of their rights. It was ultimately decided by the arbiter, to whom the matter was referred by mutual consent, that the earl should obtain a divorce, but that the legitimacy of his offspring should be preserved, by his judicial deposition that he did not know of the relationship between him and his wife till after the birth of all their children.

The proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts were Immorality of expensive, and were consequently the common undertaken only by people of people. some wealth; but the records of the church courts, immediately after the Reformation, furnish abundant evidence that the lower classes were equally profligate. In the small city of Perth there were eighty convicted cases of adultery annually; and, in 1570, Adam Bothwell, Bishop of Orkney, was charged before the General Assembly "with leaving the flock destitute without shepherd, whereby not only ignorance is increased, but also most abundantly all vice and horrible crimes are there committed, as the number of six hundred persons convicted of incest, adultery, and fornication, in Zetland, beareth witness." This account of the morals of his flock was not contradicted by the bishop, who contented himself with merely denying that he had abandoned absolutely the preaching of the word. The testimony of the church courts is corroborated by the writings of the poets of this period, which furnish abundant evidence of the prevalence among all classes, barons, priests, and people, of a licentious-ness, accompanied by a coarseness and brutality which argue a darker barbarism than was to be found at the time in any other country of Europe.*

Our great epic poet represents 'lust' as dwelling 'hard by hate,' and the law- Turbulence less violence alike of peer and and cruelty of the barons. peasant equalled their profligacy.

The sanguinary feuds of the aristocracy, often arising from trifling quarrels, depopulated whole districts; while their right of private war, the ties of man-rent, and the abuses of their baronial jurisdictions, were the constant sources of misery and strife among all classes of the community. Feudal hatred and revenge deluged the country with blood, and even the sovereign himself was not secure from their atrocities. As the great baronial chiefs were constantly accompanied by bands of armed followers, bloody encounters were continually taking place whenever those who held each other at feud happened to meet; and to such an extent did this ferocious spirit prevail, that quarrels and bloodshed were not unfrequently witnessed among them even on their way to church, or on the Sabbath; and the churchyard and the very porch of the sacred edifice were often polluted by their murders. Nor was this all; these proud barons had no scruples in employing assassination for the purpose of removing an obnoxious rival: and so prevalent did this foul practice become,—especially during the reign of Mary and the minority of her son,—that the country became on account of it 'a byeword and a reproach' among foreign nations. The brutal murder of Riccio by a band of conspirators, consisting of the principal nobles of the kingdom, the lord chancellor, and even the king-consort himself; the murder of Darnley by a similar combination; the assassination of Regent Moray; the negotiations which Mar, Morton, and other leading barons entered into with Elizabeth to put Mary to death,† and other similar transactions that disgraced the court and the country at this period, all show the reckless disregard of life by which the Scottish barons and their retainers were characterized. A bond or obligation is still in existence, signed by the Earl of Cassilis, by which he engaged upon his honour to pay to Hew Kennedy, his younger brother, the sum of 1200 marks yearly, besides a maintenance for six horses, on condition that the said Hew should murder the Laird of Auchendrane. The father of this suborner of murder, in whose family cruelty and grasping avarice seem to have become

* Liber Officialis Sancti Andree; Inquiry into the Law and Practice in Scottish Peerages, by John Riddell, Esq.; Quarterly Review, vol. lxxix., Art. II.

† The intrigues which Henry VIII. entered into for the purpose of procuring the assassination of Cardinal Beaton; the attempt of Elizabeth to bribe Mar and Morton to murder their sovereign; and the efforts which the English queen and her councillors made to induce Paulet, the keeper of Mary, secretly to dispatch his helpless prisoner, may serve to show that though England was at this period much more civilised and wealthy than Scotland, the morals of her rulers at least were at an equally low ebb.

hereditary, was guilty of a still more atrocious act of villany, for the purpose of wresting the revenues of Crossraguel from the hands of Allan Stewart, commendator of that abbey.

The story is circumstantially related by Bannatyne, secretary to John Knox, and is also fully recorded in the minutes of the privy council of 20th June, 1571:—

Atrocious cruelty of the Earl of Cassilis. Master Allan Stewart, by means of the queen's corrupted court, obtained the abbey of Crossraguel. The Earl of Cassilis, thinking himself greater than any king in these quarters, determined to have the whole benefice (as he hath divers others), to pay at his pleasure; and because he could not find such security as his insatiable appetite required, this shift was devised. The said Mr. Allan, being in company with the Laird of Bargany (also a Kennedy), was by the earl and his friends enticed to leave the safeguard which he had with the laird, and was suddenly seized and carried to the house of Dunure, where, for a season, he was honourably treated (gif a prisoner can think any entertainment pleasing); but when the earl found that Stewart could not, either by promises or menaces, be induced to alienate to him the land of the abbacy, he caused his luckless prisoner to be conveyed to a secret chamber in 'ane house callit the Black Vault of Denbie.' In the chamber there was a great iron chimney, under it a fire. 'My lord abbot,' said the earl, 'it will please you confess here that with your own consent you remain in my company, because ye durst not commit yourselves to the hands of others.' The abbot answered, 'Would you, my lord, that I should make a manifest lie for your pleasure? The truth is, my lord, it is against my will that I am here; neither yet have I any pleasure in your company.'—'But ye shall remain with me, nevertheless, at this time,' said the earl.—'I am not able to resist your will and pleasure,' said the abbot, 'in this place.'—'Ye must then obey me,' said the earl; and with that were presented unto him a feu-charter of the whole lands pertaining to the abbey, together with a nineteen and five years' lease of the tithes.

After that the earl spied repugnance, and saw that he could not come to his purpose by fair means, he commanded his cooks to prepare the banquet; and so first they took off the abbot's clothes even to his skin, and next they bound him to the chimney, his legs to the one end and his arms to the other, and so they began to feed the fire; and that the roast might not burn, they spared not flambing with oil [basting as a cook bastes roasted meat]. Lord, look thou to sic cruelty! And that the crying of the miserable man should not be heard, they closed his mouth that the voice might be stopped. In that torment they held the poor man till that often he cried, 'E'ye upon ye! will ye no ding whingers [daggers] in me, and put me out of the world, or else put ane barrel of powder under me, rather than to be tormented in this unmerciful manner!' The famous king of Carriek and his cooks, perceiving the roast to be aneuch [sufficiently done], commanded it to be tane from the fire, and the earl himself began the grace in this manner, 'Benedicite Jesus Maria, you are the most obstinate man that ever I saw; gif I had known that ye had been so stubborn, I would not for a thousand crowns have handled you so; I never did so to man before you.' And yet he returned to the same practice within two days, and ceased not till he obtained his foremost purpose, that is, that he had got all his pieces subscribed as well as ane half-roasted hand could do it. The earl, thinking himself sure enough so long as he had the half-roasted abbot in his own keeping, and yet being ashamed of his presence by reason of his former cruelty, left the place of Dunure in the hands of certain of his servants, and the half-roasted abbot to be kept there as prisoner. The Laird of Bargany, out of whose company the said abbot had been enticed, understanding (not the extremity, but) the retaining of the man, sent to the court, and raised letters of deliverance of the person of the man according to the order, which, being disobeyed, the said earl for his contempt was denounced rebel and put to the ban. But yet hope there was none, neither to the afflicted, neither yet to the purchaser (i. e. procurer) of the letters, to obtain any comfort thereby, for in that time God was despised and lawful authority was condemned in Scotland. The Laird of Bargany, perceiving that the ordinary justice could neither help the oppressed nor yet the afflicted, applied his mind to the next remedy, and in the end, by his servants, attacked and took the house of Dunure, where the poor abbot was kept prisoner, and carried him to Ayr, where publicly at the market cross he declared how cruelly he was entreated, and publicly did revoke all things that were done in that extremity.*

"Stewart, shortly after regaining his liberty, applied for redress to the Regent Lennox, and the privy council; and their decision shows singularly the total interruption of justice at this calamitous period, even in the most clamant cases of oppression. The council declined interference with the course of the ordinary tribunals of the country, which were completely under the control of the Earl of Cassilis; and only enacted that he should abstain from molesting the unfortunate commendator, under the surety of two thousand pounds Scots. The Earl was appointed, also, to keep the peace towards the celebrated George Buchanan, who had a pension out of the same abbacy to a similar extent, and under the like penalty. The ultimate issue of this affair does not appear; but as the house of Cassilis are still in possession of the greater part of the feus and leases which belonged to Crossraguel Abbey, it is probable the talons of the King of Carriek were strong enough, in those disorderly times, to retain the prey which they had so mercilessly fixed upon."†

* Bannatyne's Journal, c. xxii.

† "Ivanhoe," note 4.

While ignorance and lawless violence were thus prevalent, we need not wonder that all classes of the community, even the highest, were characterised by rudeness of demeanour. Even in the court of the accomplished Queen Mary, where, if any place, courtesy might have been expected, the grim and turbulent barons elbowed their way in the rudest manner, and would shoulder and shoot Riccio aside when they entered the queen's presence, and found him always speaking with her. The clergy themselves, who greatly excelled the barons in literary attainments, were yet liable to the same censure. It is mentioned by Knox, that, on one occasion, at Glasgow, Archbishop Dunbar and Cardinal Beaton had a furious quarrel respecting their right of precedence in a procession to the cathedral. After many hot and foul words, the controversy grew so fierce that a battle commenced between the followers of the two dignitaries, even in the church porch; heads were broken, beards torn out by handfuls, and caps and tippets rent to shreds, while crosses and cross-bearers were thrown to the ground and trampled under foot.

A great cause of the rudeness and backwardness of the country, at this period, was the want of an influential middle class, to fill up the space in society between the lord and the serf. The Scotch tenantry were maintained rather for the purpose of swelling the retinue and augmenting the power of the barons, than with a view to cultivate and increase the fertility of the soil. They were entirely dependent upon their landlords, and, as they rented their farms, for the most part, from year to year, and might, at any moment, be ejected at the pleasure of their feudal superiors, they had no encouragement to devote themselves to the improvement of the soil. Ejection did not unfrequently take place, and, as might have been expected in such a state of society, the assassination of the intruder, by those whom he had dispossessed, was an event of common occurrence.

It appears, from the records both of the church courts, and of the parliament, that profane swearing, the vice of profane swearing was exceedingly prevalent among all classes of the Scottish people at this period. With the view of repressing it, the assembly ordained that in "everie honest man's or woman's house there be tane up of everie swearer, how oft the same chance, whilk is potent [able] to pay silver for every fault, ane hardheid;"* and every person who might be heard swearing in the street, was 'to be sharplie punished with a palmer [stroke] on the hand.'† The following act of parliament, dated 29th November, 1581, imposing penalties on those who were guilty of this vice, shows that no class was exempt from its influence:—

"Our Soveran Lord, with advice of his three Estates of this present parliament, ratifies and approves the act of parliament holden at Edinburgh, the first day of Februar, the year of God, 1581, intituled, the act against them that swears abominable oaths, and ordains the same effect and execution in time coming, after the form and tenor thereof, under the fourth and last pain specifiet in the same. That is to say, for the first fault, everie prelate of kirk, earl, or lord, four shillings; ane baron or beneficit man constitute in dignitie ecclesiastic, twelve pence; ane landit man, freeholder, vassel-feuer, burgess, and small beneficit men, six-pence; ane craftsman, yeoman, or servant-man, fourpence; the puir folkis that has na geir, to be put in the stocks, joggis, or prisonit, for the space of four hours; and women to be weighed and considerit conform to their blude and estate of their parties that they are copulate with. For the second fault, every prelat, earl, or lord, eight shillings; every baron or beneficit man in dignitie, two shillings; every landit man, freeholder, vassel-feuar, and small beneficit men, twelve pence; and every craftsman, yeoman, or servant, eight-pence; the space of the puir folkis imprisonment to be doubleit. And for the third fault, the said second pains to be doubleit. And for the fourth and last fault, the offenders to be banished, or put in ward, for the space of a year and day at the king's will; and sicklike all other estates, after their quality, to be punished efferandlie. And the foresaid pains to be uptaken and applied to the use of the puir folkis. And for the better execution hereof, that censors be appointed in the market-places of all boroughs, and other public fairs, with power to put the swearers of sic abominable oaths in ward till they have payed the said pains, and find suretie to abstain in time coming, and that by direction and commission of sheriffs, stewards, bailies, provosts, aldermen, and bailies of boroughs, lords of regalities, and other ordinary officers. And that all householders detail to the magistrates the names of all sic persons as transgress this present act, that upon complaint thereof to be made to the king's majesty and his Privy Counsel, they shall be called and committed to ward during his highnesses will, and find suretie under great pains at his highnesses sight, for exact diligence to be shown in executing of the said act thereafter."

The Sabbath has always been systematically violated in all Popish countries, And of Sabbath and it appears to have been a diff- breaking. cult matter to root out various practices among the Scottish people at this period, which led to the desecration of that sacred day. It was declared to be every way profaned—by drinking, travelling to markets, feeing of servants, and making other bargains and contracts. "At first, the prohibition against craftsmen and labourers performing work on this day, was limited to 'the tyme of prayers and preaching.' It was enacted by the magistrates of Aberdeen, that all persons walking in the road, or playing in the links or other places, the time of preaching or prayers on the Sunday, were to be fined. But gradually the rule grew stricter, and we find, in the burgh records of this city, the wife of one of the citizens, for working on the Sabbath-day, fined in six shillings and eightpence; and it was ordained that 'na baxters [bakers] within this burgh, work or baken meat, in time coming, on the Sabbath, under a penalty.' Persons absent from sermon were fined three shillings and fourpence. Two of the bailies were ordered to pass through the town every Sabbath-day, and note such as they find absent from the sermons, either before or after noon.

* The Book of the Universal Kirk of Scotland, part iii., p. 6. A hardheid was a small coin of mixed metal or copper. Fr., hardie, small copper money, named from Philip le Hardi, who caused them to be struck.

† Ibid., p. 35.

"It was more than usually difficult to put down a market, which was held on Sunday, for the sale of 'flesh, fish, peats, kail, and herbs.' A slight relaxation was permitted in those who sold kail and herbs, it being allowable to deal in these after four o'clock, afternoon, on Sundays, but all the other commodities found in the market were to be escheated.

"Salmon fishing was carried on to a considerable extent on Sundays, and many of the proprietors of fishings refused to relinquish this practice; some of whom, 'preferring, as appears, their greed and avarice to the glory and worship of God, have continued and persistit in working and fishing of their waters on the Sabbath-day, to the high dishonour of God, the manifest contempt of his law, and slander of the gospel.' Some promised to forbear from this practice absolutely, some 'if their neighbours will forbear,' and some refused to abandon it."*

A detailed exposition of prevailing immoralities is given in a curious document, which was published by the General Assembly of 1596. In this paper are noticed, among a variety of other crying evils, the existence in the bosom of the Church of some clergymen not given to their book, in their sermons obscure and too scholastic, cold, and wanting zeal, flatterers, dissembling at public sins, and especially of great persons within their congregations, for flattery or for fear; of others, 'light and wanton in behaviour, as in gorgeous and light apparel, in speeches, and in using light and profane company, unlawful gaming, as dancing, carding, dicing, and such like;' of others described as 'swearers or banners, profaners of the Sabbath, drunkards and fighters,' &c.; of others 'given to unlawful and incompetent trades and occupations for filthy gain, as holding of hostelries [inns], taking of usury beside conscience and good laws, bearing worldly offices in noblemen's and gentlemen's houses, merchandize, buying of victuals and keeping to dearth,' &c.

A continuation of this statement of corruptions was subsequently prepared, the first head of which consisted of an enumeration of certain habitual offences of James and his queen. "First," it said, "as strangers and other good subjects, repairing to the court, have been comforted to see Christian religion religiously exercised, so now they are somewhat troubled, seeing the exercises of the reading of the word at table, and reverent sayings of the grace before and after meat, divers times omitted; that, on the week-day, the repairing to hear the word is more rare than before; and that his Majesty be admonished to forbear hearing of speeches, in time of sermon, of them that desire to commune with his Majesty; privy meditations in spirit and conscience with God earnestly to be recommended to him; his Majesty is blotted with banning and swearing, which is common to courtiers also. The Queen's majesty to be reformed, her company, her not repairing to the word and sacraments; night-waking, balling, and such like, concerning her gentlewomen." But to this was tacked another chapter, entitled, "The common corruptions of all estates," which bewails the existence of "an universal coldness and decay of zeal in all estates, joined with ignorance and contempt of the word, ministry, and sacraments;" "and where there is knowledge," it is added, "no sense nor feeling; which sheweth itself manifestly by this that they want religious exercises in their families, as of prayer and of reading the word, or the same for the most part abused and performed by cooks, stewards, jack-men, and such like, the masters of the families being ashamed to use these exercises of godliness in their own persons; and no conference at their tables but of profane, wanton, and worldly matters." "Superstition and idolatry," the paper goes on, "is entertained, which appeareth in keeping of festival days, bon-fires, pilgrimages, singing of carols at Yule [Christmas]." There is also "great blasphemy of the holy name of God, among persons of all estates, with horrible banning and cursing in all their speeches; profanation of the Sabbath, and especially in seed time and harvest, and common journeying on the Sabbath, trysting [making appointments] on worldly matters, exercise of all kinds of wanton games, keeping of markets, drinking, and the like." Mention is made of "a great number of idle persons, without lawful calling, as pipers, fiddlers, songsters, sorners, pleasants, strong beggars, living in harlotry, and having their children unbaptized, and noways repairing to the word." Then follows a short concluding enumeration of "offences in the courts and judgment seats." Here the paper boldly affirms, in the most unqualified terms, that the country groans under the curse of "a universal neglect of justice, both in civil and criminal causes;" that the judges are "for the most part unmeet, either in respect of want of knowledge or of conscience, or of both;" that "when any office vaiketh [is vacated] the worst men are advanced, both to high and inferior rooms;" and the Court of Session is openly charged with "buying of pleas, delaying of justice, and bribery."*

Making all due allowance for the exaggeration usual in such documents, the testimony of the

* Selections from the Ecclesiastical Records of Aberdeen, published by the Spalding Club, pp. 29, 30.

* Calderwood's History.

assembly combines with other evidence to prove that the state of morals in Scotland at this period was most deplorable. There is a remarkable letter, addressed by Lord Binning to

Lord Binning's account of the state of the country.

James VI., which gives the following appalling, but, we believe, true picture of the state of Scotland at the commencement of his majesty's reign:—"The Islanders oppressed the Hielandmen, the Hielanders tyrannised over their Lawland neighbours, the powerful and violent in the inn-countrie domineered over the lyves and goods of their weak neighbours; the Borderers triumphed in the impunity of their violences to the portes [gates] of Edinburgh; treasons, murthours, burnings, thefts, reiffs, herschips, houghing of oxen, breaking of milnes, destroying of growing corn, and barbarities of all sorts, were exerced in all parts of the countrie, no place or person being exemed or inviolable. Edinburgh being the ordinarie place of butcherlie revenge, and daylie fights: the parochie churches and churche-yairds being more frequented upon the Sunday for advantages of neighbourlie malice and mischief nor [than] for God's service. Noblemen, barons, gentlemen, and people of all sorts being slaughtered, as it were, in public and uncontrollable hostilities; merchants robbed and left for dead in daylight, going to their mercats and fairs of Montrose, Wigtown, and Berwick. Ministers being dirked [stabbed] in Stirling, buried quick [alive] in Clydesdale, and murthoured in Galloway. Merchants of Edinburgh being waited [waylaid] in their passage to Leith, to be made prisoners and ransomed."* To the same purport is the testimony of Sir Richard Maitland, Alexander Scott, and other contemporary poets; whose writings are filled with invectives against the turbulence and incessant feuds of the nobles, the avarice and licentiousness of the priests, the oppression of the poor, and the general disregard of law and order manifested by all classes of the community.

One of their most frequent complaints is respecting the denial or delay of justice, and the corruption of the judges and rulers. A very characteristic story is told by the historian of the house of Somerville, of the mode in which justice was administered during the regency of the grasping and avaricious Earl of Morton. Lord Somerville having an important cause to be decided, which the influence of the regent could make to be determined as he himself should think fit, by the advice of an old and experienced friend of Morton, was induced to adopt the following singular expedient. He waited on the regent, and recommended his case to his favourable opinion—a kind of personal solicitation which was then much in use. Having spoken with the regent for a short time, he turned to depart, and opening his purse as if to take out some money to give to the ushers and attendants, as was the custom upon such occasions, he left the purse on the table as though he had forgotten it. Morton called after him, "My lord, your purse; you have forgotten your purse;" but Lord Somerville hastened away, without turning back. He heard nothing more of the purse, which he had taken care should be pretty full of gold; but the regent that day decided the cause in his favour.

About the close of the sixteenth century, the example of their English neighbours began to exercise a beneficial influence on the Scots, and

Improvement in the manners of the nobility.

to soften the rudeness of their domestic life. Stately mansions occasionally superseded the old, gloomy baronial castles. Among the higher nobles cups of pewter and platters of wood were discarded for services of gilt metal and even of plate; and cleanliness and convenience began to take the place of dirt and domestic discomfort. This improvement, however, was almost entirely confined to the nobility and clergy, and even among them was only partial, for we find that the beds of the young nobles still frequently consisted of nothing but straw. The huts and hovels of the peasantry remained as before. The houses of the farmers were mean, unsightly buildings, consisting only of two apartments, and the shops of tradesmen and merchants, even in the metropolis, were but miserable sheds of wood covered with thatch.

A gradual improvement had been taking place with the extension of the commerce of the kingdom, and at this period so many foreign luxuries had been imported into the country that various severe laws were enacted for the purpose of suppressing this departure from the rudeness and simplicity of former times. The use of drugs, confections, and foreign spiceries, was prohibited to all except prelates and peers, and persons possessing an annual income of £2000 Scots. In the establishments of the great barons all the retainers

Taste for foreign luxuries.

Mode of sitting sat at the same table with their superiors, but their position at table varied according to their rank, and the chief dainties were reserved for those privileged to sit at the upper end of the board. The menials received a small allowance of animal food, but lived chiefly on corn and vegetables. Great quantities of red colewort and cabbage were used, and salted Food and cooking.

meat. Porridge was a common article of food, as it still continues to be among the lower classes in Scotland. A lively idea of the mode of living among the poorer knights and barons is furnished by a writer of that period, who says, "Myself was at a knight's house, who had many servants to attend him, that brought in his meat with their heads covered with blue caps; the table being more than half furnished with great platters of porridge, each having a little piece of sodden meat; and when the table was served, the servants did sit down with us; but the upper mess, instead of porridge, had a pullet with some prunes

* Melrose Papers, vol. i. p. 270.

in the broth. And I observed no art of cooking, or furniture of household stuff, but rather rude neglect of both, though myself and my companion, sent from the governor of Berwick about Border affairs, were entertained after their best manner."*

Music appears to have been a favourite accom-

Drinking paniment to dinner; wine was habits. used in great abundance, and ale and malmsey were also drunk frequently to excess. Among the higher classes dinner was served at eleven, and supper at six o'clock. The convivial habits of the people manifested themselves

Weddings. with peculiar force at marriages and funerals. Music, songs, dancing, feasting, and drinking, were the indispensable accompaniments of every wedding. Among the poorer classes it was the custom for each of the guests to contribute towards defraying the expenses of the marriage feast, and the sum thus subscribed was generally found sufficient to enable the young couple to begin the world with some degree of comfort. After the Reformation, the clergy made a strenuous effort to suppress these "Penny Weddings," as they were commonly termed, but without effect. The utmost they could do was to limit the contribution of each guest to the moderate sum of five shillings Scots.

Hunting and hawking continued to be favourite

* Fynes Morrison.

amusements of the higher classes. For the common people weapon-shaws were held regularly several times a year; Amusements and, at these meetings, leaping, running, wrestling, quoits, shooting at the papingo, and archery, were the active games practised. Tennis, hand and football, and golf, were among the out-door games. Dancing was a favourite recreation; and cards, dice, chess, draughts, and backgammon, served also to beguile the tedium of their in-door life.

The funeral customs of the people closely resembled those which still exist among the Irish. The friends Funerals. and neighbours of the deceased kept constant watch beside the corpse till the time of interment. This was termed holding the lyke-wake. The materials of feasting and drinking were of course provided in the greatest abundance. On the day of the interment, the whole assembled company were entertained with the same profusion. If the deceased was a person of rank, the interment was frequently accompanied with the ringing of bells and discharges of muskets and artillery; and after the funeral the friends and relatives of the family returned to the house 'to drink the dirgie,' and generally spent the night in festivity and mirthful tumult. This practice, which necessarily led to gross abuses, has been discontinued only within a comparatively recent period.

CHAPTER XLI.

JAMES THE SIXTH.

A.D. 1587—1603.

THE death of Mary, while it relieved Elizabeth of a rival whom she at once feared and hated, plunged her into new anxieties and apprehensions. Her audacity in procuring the condemnation and death of a sovereign princess, over whom, by the law of nations, she could claim no jurisdiction, had given offence to all the sovereigns of Europe. They considered that, in the person of the Queen of Scots, royalty itself had been insulted and degraded; and Elizabeth had, therefore, no security against the formation of a formidable coalition, that might endanger the peace and safety of England in its attempts to vindicate the majesty of crowned heads, which, in the blind pursuit of a cruel and selfish policy, she had trampled under foot. She had especial reason to dread the resentment of the kings of Scotland and France; all whose supplications, remonstrances, and even threats, to save from the ignominious death of a common malefactor one so nearly related to them by the ties of blood, she had haughtily set at nought.

To avert these dangers, and, if possible, to relieve herself of the terrible odium which she was sensible she had incurred, she had recourse to her wonted expedients of hypocrisy and dissimulation. She affected to receive the tidings of Mary's death with overwhelming astonishment, indignation, and sorrow.* With the mimic emotion of a tragedy-queen, her countenance changed, she gasped in vain to find utterance, and stood for some time fixed like a statue in silent amazement. When she had counterfeited this mood long enough, as she thought, to produce effect, she tried another, and, with great artistic skill, got up for the occasion one of those favourite outbursts of violent passion with which she was wont to terrify her courtiers. Having sufficiently displayed her anger, she gave vent to her sorrow in loud wailings, tears, and lamentations; she habited herself in deep mourning, forsook all society but that of her women, and wept incessantly—at least, when any one was present to bear witness to the depth and sincerity of her grief. The object of all this hollow display, by which nobody was deceived, speedily became apparent. She wished to shift the blame of Mary's death from her own shoulders to those of her ministry, whom she now basely accused of having acted not only without her knowledge or consent, but in direct contravention of what they knew to be her express wish and fixed determination. The chief weight of her pretended resentment fell on Davison, whom she blamed for having, before she had an opportunity of again speaking to him, precipitately carried the warrant to be sealed by the chancellor, and laid it before the privy council, in order to have it executed without her knowledge. She deprived him of his office, and gave orders to have him arrested and committed to the Tower. He was afterwards brought to trial in the Star Chamber, and condemned to pay a fine of ten thousand pounds and to be imprisoned during the queen's pleasure. This fine, which was rigorously exacted, reduced him to indigence; and, after suffering a long confinement, he had the deep mortification of being thrown on the bounty of the government, which made him some wretched allowance, barely sufficient to maintain existence.

But with the exception of Walsingham, who, at the time the warrant for Mary's execution was issued, was or pretended to be sick, the whole privy council were subjected to the queen's displeasure. She declared that in sending the warrant to Fotheringay they had been guilty of usurping her authority, and had insulted her by attempting to place her under their guardianship, as if she were incapable of acting for herself.* Burghley, who had delivered the warrant to Beale in the name of the council, was, notwithstanding his long and devoted services, banished from court; and so keenly did the veteran statesman feel this disgrace, that he requested leave to resign his office and retire into private life. Leicester and Hatton, because they had been present at the meeting of the council, and had concurred in its decision, were subjected to the same punishment; and Beale, who, in obedience to the council, had carried the warrant to Fotheringay, was dismissed from his office of clerk to the privy council, and placed in some subordinate position in York.†

By these proceedings she hoped to exculpate herself in the eyes of the world, and especially to conciliate the kings of France and Scotland, whose resentment she had most occasion to dread. Though there is no reason to believe that the affection of James for his mother was particularly strong, the intelligence of her death filled him with grief and indignation, and he openly declared his determination to avenge it.‡ In this sentiment the nobility and the nation in general cordially participated. They felt that the Queen of England, by presuming to put to death the mother of their sovereign, had offered a flagrant indignity both to that sovereign and to themselves. In their present temper, therefore, they were ready to support the king in proceeding to the utmost extremity. Of this Elizabeth was fully aware, and she hastened to avert, if possible, the threatened storm. With this view, she dispatched Robert Carey, the son of her cousin Lord Hunsdon, with a letter to

* Teulet, vol. ii. pp. 902, 903.

† Robert Beale to Lord Burghley, April 24, 1595, in Ellis, third series, vol. iv. pp. 112, 120.

‡ Lord Scrope to Walsingham, February 21, 1587; Wright's Queen Elizabeth and her Times, vol. ii. p. 333.

* Chateaufneuf to the king; Despatch dated the 27th of February; Bibl. Nat., fonds de Bethune, No. 8880; and Teulet, vol. ii. pp. 896, 897; Mignet, vol. ii. p. 371; Hume, vol. v. pp. 320, 321.

James, written by her own hand, and abounding in falsehood and hypocrisy. "My dear brother," she said, "I would you knew, though not that you felt, the extreme anguish that overwhelms my mind, on account of that miserable accident which has happened far contrary to my inclination. I have, therefore, sent my kinsman, whom you have been formerly graciously pleased to favour, that he may instruct you truly of that which my pen refuses to write. I beseech you that as God and many others know my innocence in this case, so you will believe that if I had commanded it, I should not have disavowed it. I am not so base-minded as that the fear of any living creature should make me afraid to do what is just, nor so degenerate or vile as to deny it when done. Openness best becomes a king, and I shall never stoop to dissemble. This assure yourself of from me, that as I know it was deserved, I would never have laid the blame on another, but neither will I impute to myself that which I did not so much as think of. You will learn the particulars from the bearer; and, believe me, you have not in the world a more loving kinswoman, and more dear friend, nor any that will watch more carefully to preserve you and your state; and if any would persuade you to the contrary, consider them as more attached to others than to you. Thus in haste I have troubled you, beseeching God to send you a long and happy reign." James so far from receiving the ambassador into his presence, would not even permit him to enter Scotland, but compelled him to stop at Berwick. At the same time, the Estates of the kingdom, who were then sitting, incited him to take revenge for the dishonour that had been done to himself and the nation, and offered to peril their own lives and fortunes in the contest; and Lord Sinclair, when the courtiers were habited in mourning, made his appearance clothed in armour, which he declared was the only fitting mourning for the occasion. Seizing this opportunity for strengthening their own party, the Roman Catholics advised James to form an alliance with the King of Spain, and to lay immediate claim to the crown of England, as the only means of averting his own ruin and that of the kingdom, at the hands of Elizabeth.

In the meantime, James, virtually renouncing the alliance so recently formed with England, recalled his ambassadors from the court of that country, and permitted the Border chiefs, Fernyhirst, Cessford, Bothwell, Angus, Jolinston, and others, to ravage and lay waste the English frontier. The nobility were in arms with their retainers, both in the north and south, and urgently demanded permission to carry fire and sword to the gates of Newcastle;* while the people of the islands were allowed to pass over into Ireland to assist the rebels who had risen under Tyrone.† Besides these warlike demonstrations, James seemed to manifest some desire to strengthen his position by an alliance with the Romish party. At the instigation of the Jesuits, he received the emissaries of the King of Spain, reinstated the Bishop of Ross, and accredited the Archbishop of Glasgow as his ambassador to the French court.*

Carey, on being refused admittance into Scotland, had written to his court for instructions. He was directed to entrust his letter to one of the council, to be delivered to the king, together with a memorial setting forth that it had been the queen's fixed determination never to execute the sentence passed upon the king's mother, notwithstanding the urgent intreaties of her ministers, the continued importunities of her nobility, and the clamours of her people; that she had delivered the warrant to Davison to be secretly kept, and not to be put in force, unless in the event of an actual invasion of the country in Mary's behalf, or an attempt to rescue her by means of a popular insurrection; but that Davison, having improperly showed it to the privy council, they had, without her knowledge, much less her consent, ordered it to be put in execution; that Davison for this grave offence should be subjected to her severe displeasure; that she protested to God the fatal deed had been done before she knew of it; and that had his majesty only been present to witness the distress into which this sad event had plunged her, he would have pitied rather than blamed her. The letter of Elizabeth, together with Carey's message was conveyed to the king by Melvil and the Laird of Cowdenknowes, whom he had sent to Berwick to receive them; but the truth was too well known in Scotland for such hypocritical excuses to obtain credence, and the messages, which were considered in the light of an additional insult, rather inflamed than mollified the resentment of James and his nobility.

Elizabeth now became seriously alarmed at the aspect of affairs in Scotland. Nor were her fears groundless. Scotland, indeed, alone was not likely, in the event of open hostilities to prove an overmatch for the sister kingdom; but Elizabeth was embarrassed by other complications. Extensive preparations for the invasion of England were then in progress on the coasts of Spain and Flanders. A formidable rebellion was still raging in Tyrone; and if to these causes of alarm were added an open rupture with Scotland, it was evident that the kingdom would be placed in a position of great difficulty, if not peril. All these considerations rendered Elizabeth extremely solicitous to conciliate James, and secure amicable relations with Scotland. With this view, Walsingham, by Elizabeth's order, wrote to Lord Thirlstane, James's secretary, a very long and politic letter, in which he discussed with great ability the question of peace or war with reference to the king's own interest, and endeavoured to operate both on the hopes and fears of the young monarch, in order to

* Tytler, vol. ix. p. 7.

† Ibid., pp. 4—12.

* Tytler, and Papers of Simancas, series B., packet 59, No. 3, and packet 58, No. 187.

induce him to abstain from all acts tending to disturb the friendly connection between the two kingdoms. He represented the hopelessness of success that must attend a contest with England, if Scotland should trust to her own force alone; while the expedient of calling in the aid of a stronger power might, without effecting his purpose, involve James in innumerable troubles, and the nobility and people of England, exasperated by his hostility, would most probably take measures to deprive him of the succession. He was warned against trusting either to France or Spain for support. The religion he professed, it was argued, rendered him odious to the monarchs of both these kingdoms, who would naturally be averse to the union of England and Scotland under his rule, an event which would be highly prejudicial to the Romish cause. The King of France in particular would, it might be supposed, view such a union with peculiar dissatisfaction, as it would deprive him, in the event of war, of the opportunity of distracting the forces of England by engaging Scotland in the contest. Besides this, it was urged that as James was nearly related to the house of Guise, the determined enemies of Henry III., he could not expect that monarch in any way to contribute to his aggrandizement. As to the King of Spain, he was to be regarded rather as a rival than an ally; because, as a descendant of the house of Lancaster, and the nearest Catholic heir by blood to the crown of England, he claimed a right to this inheritance superior to that of James himself. Finally, he was admonished to give no ear to such persons as sought to instigate him, from false notions of honour, to avenge his mother's death, as the true honour of a prince consisted in wisdom, justice, and moderation, and not in obeying at all hazards the blind instinct of revenge.* These considerations, though they seemed to have no immediate effect on the mind of James, and did not lead him at the time to discourage the animosity which then prevailed against England, or to restrain the ravages of the Border chiefs, probably contributed in the end to induce him to suppress his resentment, and gradually to reassume at least the semblance of amity with the court of England.

At this time a signal punishment, though far from equal to his deserts, at length overtook the odious Master of Gray, who, though still young in years, had risen to the unenviable distinction of being one of the most experienced, accomplished, and profligate villains of the age. On the accusation of Sir William Stewart, brother of Captain James, he was arraigned on sundry charges of treason.† Among these was the crime of having violated his trust as ambassador at the court of England, by contributing through his advice to secure and hasten the execution of Mary, to intercede for whose life had been the object of his mission. This charge was fully proved; and, though at first he denied it with his characteristic boldness and effrontery, yet, finding he had lost the royal favour, and that he was deserted by all his friends, he at last pleaded guilty, and threw himself on the king's mercy. In accordance with his own confession, he was adjudged guilty by the court, and condemned to die the death of a traitor. At the earnest intercession, however, of the Earl of Huntley and Lord Hamilton, his sentence was commuted into that of perpetual banishment, under pain of death in the event of his returning. Being prohibited from proceeding either to England or Ireland, he retired to France, where he resided for several years. He afterwards obtained permission to return to Scotland, but he never again rose either to power or distinction.*

Captain James Stewart, at whose secret instigation the charges against Gray had probably been preferred, thinking this a favourable opportunity for revenging himself on the rest of his enemies, now ventured to address from his hiding-place a letter to the king, offering to prove that Thirlstone and some others of the council had been equally guilty with Gray of recommending the death of his mother, and had even been accessory to a project for seizing the person of the king, and delivering him into the hands of the English. But time and absence, and a more ripened judgment, had now emancipated the king from the pernicious influence of this profligate minion, and all the courtiers were united against him. On receiving his letter, the king laid it before his council, and, by their advice, an order was sent to Captain James to enter himself in ward, in the palace of Linlithgow, until inquiry should be made into the truth of his accusation, under pain of forfeiture, for an attempt to sow discord between the king and his nobility. Apparently unwilling, however, voluntarily to place himself within the grasp of his enemies, Captain James declined to comply with this order. No proceedings appear to have been instituted against him, excepting that the office of chancellor, which he still nominally held, was declared vacant, and, to his bitter mortification, was conferred on Thirlstone, whom he had accused.

The king, who had now reached his majority, issued a proclamation summoning parliament to meet on the 29th of July. Previously to this, however, he had formed the laudable design of attempting to effect a reconciliation between such of his nobility as were known, The king at- from whatever cause, to be at tempts to enmity with each other. For this reconcile the nobility who purpose, he invited the whole of were at variance. the nobility to meet him at Edinburgh, where he prevailed upon them to declare that they now buried in oblivion their mutual animosities, and to promise that they would henceforth live together in amity. Lord Yester alone declined compliance with the king's anxious desire, by refusing to be reconciled to Lord Traquair; but having been committed to the castle for his contumacy, after a few months' confinement he at last yielded. In the meantime the king invited the others to a magnificent banquet in the palace, after which they walked in procession hand in hand to the Cross of Edinburgh, where a table had been spread, and a sumptuous entertainment provided for them by the magistrates of the city. Here they drank to each other with apparent cordiality, amid the shouts and rejoicings of the assembled citizens, while a discharge of artillery from the castle inaugurated this happy epoch of peace and amity. Unfortunately, however, it was of no long duration. The wounds of deadly hate "had pierced too deep" to be so easily cured, and before the conclusion of the year most of these hollow pledges were forgotten or disregarded.

* Spottiswood, pp. 359—362.

† Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. i., part iii., p. 157; Historie of James the Sext, p. 227; Spottiswood, p. 363.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B. C., Wodrigton to Walsingham, 29th April, 1587; Ibid., Carville to Walsingham, 12th May, 1587; Tytler, vol. ix. p. 12.

The attention of parliament which now assembled, was first directed to the Meeting of parliament. Affairs of the Church. All the Acts affecting the Church. laws passed since the Reformation in favour of the Protestant religion were ratified, and new and severe enactments were passed against seminary priests and Jesuits. An act was also passed annexing the unappropriated church lands to the crown. This measure, all the consequences of which neither the king nor the parliament could at the time foresee, largely contributed, by diminishing the revenues and the influence of the bishops, to bring about the total abolition of their order in the Scottish Church, and to introduce that form of church polity which was afterwards established.* In this parliament the king procured an act to be passed, reviving the statute of 1427, requiring the commons to send deputies to represent them in parliament, a practice which was followed ever afterwards. At the close of their proceedings, a strong and unanimous desire was manifested by the Estates to avenge the death of Mary by an attack upon England; and after an eloquent and pathetic address from Thirlstane on this subject, such was the enthusiasm of the assembly, that they threw themselves on their knees in the presence of the king, and bound themselves by a solemn vow to peril their lives and fortunes in the contest.†

The faction of the Popish lords, emboldened by these manifestations, redoubled their activity in intriguing with Spain and the Low Countries; and with the secret concurrence, or at least connivance, of the king, messengers were sent thither to flatter Philip with expectations of assistance from Scotland in his attack on the dominions of Elizabeth.‡ Notwithstanding the late act, Jesuits and seminary priests, in disguise, traversed the country, and, in connection with the Romanists on the continent, laboured to promote the two great objects of dethroning Elizabeth and re-establishing the Roman Catholic religion.* This mysterious policy of James, who was now in constant intercourse with the Spanish faction, was well known to the English queen, and at this crisis could not fail to give her serious uneasiness.

The position of Elizabeth, at this moment was, indeed, one of extreme difficulty and danger, and such as to render a close alliance with the Scottish monarch an object of far greater importance to her than it had ever hitherto been. Preparation of an armament by Philip II. of Spain. Fears of Elizabeth. For some time the attention of all Europe had been attracted to the vast preparations for some warlike enterprise, which were being made by Philip II. of Spain. By the conquest of Portugal the vast resources of India were opened up to him, and the commerce of the East poured countless riches into his treasury. All this wealth, together with the treasures of America already in his possession, were expended in fitting out an armament such as the world had never before seen. Elizabeth, conscious of the provocation she had given Philip by assisting his rebellious subjects in the Netherlands, and by allowing her ships of war to insult the coasts of Spain, intercept the galleons from the West Indies, and menace the Spanish colonies in that quarter, had abundant reason to fear that England would be the first object of attack. Nor could these apprehensions fail to be heightened by the consideration of the bigoted character of the Spanish monarch, his intense hatred of the Protestantism of England, his zeal to extend the Romish faith, his desire to avenge the death of Mary, and his own ambitious pretensions to the English crown. In these circumstances, Elizabeth could not view without increasing alarm the alienation of the Scottish king and the machinations of his Roman Catholic subjects, who, she was well aware, relying on the assistance of Spain, expected nothing less than to be able to effect the subversion of the Protestant Church, and the re-establishment of the Popish religion in Scotland.† In the meantime, Philip laboured assiduously to gain over the young king of Scots to co-operate with him in his great enterprise. He urged him to assist in revenging the indignity offered to himself and his people by the execution of his mother; he invited him to share in the conquest of England; and offered him his daughter, the Infanta Isabella, in marriage. Besides these negotiations with the king, he sent over numerous emissaries, chiefly priests and Jesuits, to tamper with the nobility and the people, by inducing them, through the influence of bribes and promises, and by every other means in their power, to embrace popery, and renounce their

* Spottiswood, p. 365.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B. C., Carlyle to Walsingham, 3rd August, 1587; Tytler, vol. ix. p. 14.

‡ MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B. C., Carlyle to Walsingham, 11th September, 1587; also ibid., B. C., Wodrigton to Walsingham, 29th April, 1587; Tytler, ut supra.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B. C., Collingwood to Walsingham, 21st May, 1587; Tytler, ut supra.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, Carlyle to Walsingham, 1st January, 1587-8; Tytler, vol. ix. p. 16.

allegiance to their sovereign. Nor were these efforts altogether unsuccessful. A powerful faction, headed by Huntley, Errol, and Crawford was organised, and openly embraced the cause of Spain; and Lord Maxwell, arriving from the court of that country, now proceeded to assemble and arm his followers, to be in readiness to join the Spaniards on their landing. These efforts, there was reason to suspect, were seconded by Archibald Douglas, then in England, by the exiled Master of Gray, in France, and by Sir William Stewart, at the head-quarters of the Prince of Parma,* who was then in Flanders, with a powerful army destined to embark in the Spanish enterprise. Amid the exacerbation of party feeling attendant on these events, rumours of projects of a still darker complexion were afloat. It was said that a scheme was in contemplation for the assassination of the king and the Chancellor Maitland; and, whether this were true or false, it is certain that both considered their lives in danger;† and that James, in particular, thought it necessary to dissemble, and to affect a neutrality which he did not feel, but which seemed to promise him a temporary security.‡

James, in fact, had been dissembling throughout; he was willing to exercise the petty revenge of giving uneasiness to Elizabeth by coquetting with Spain, permitting the intrigues of the Jesuits, and appearing to encourage the Spanish faction within his dominions; but he understood his true interest, and was fully resolved not to sacrifice that to his resentment. He was at heart opposed to Spain, firm in his adherence to the Protestant Church, and ready to make common cause with Elizabeth on the first overture from that princess, if she would only evince an honest determination to assist him with troops and money. This course, though probably felt by the haughty Elizabeth to be somewhat humiliating, necessity soon forced her to adopt, and she accordingly dispatched Lord Hunsdon to endeavour once more to renew the interrupted correspondence between the two courts. At this time, however, an unexpected incident re-kindled James's expiring resentment, and threatened for the moment to frustrate the mission of Hunsdon. Jane Kennedy, who will ever be remembered in history as the attached and favourite attendant of the unfortunate Mary, being on a visit to Scotland from France, where she had resided ever since the death of her mistress, solicited and obtained a private audience of the king. They were shut up together for two hours, during which she gave such an affecting account of the sufferings and death of Mary, that James was overwhelmed with sorrow and indignation, and threatening revenge, refused to hold any further communication with Elizabeth. But fortunately this mood was transitory; on reflection prudential considerations inclined him to renew the negotiations, and he sent the Laird of Carmichael to meet Hunsdon, who was then at Hutton Hall, on the Borders.* Such, however, was the alarming state of the country at this crisis, that these conferences with Hunsdon had to be carried on with the utmost secrecy. According to the account which he gives in a letter to Burghley, the Romish party, with Huntley at their head, were nearly in open rebellion, anxiously urging Philip and the Duke of Parma to commence an invasion of England through Scotland, and promising to join the Spanish forces, on their arrival, with a body of troops sufficient to crush all opposition.† James, on this occasion, displayed a decision of character and a steadfast adherence to principle, beyond what his previous history would have prepared us to expect. Though tempted by the high offers of Philip and other foreign princes who were most anxious to secure his alliance, he rejected them all, together with the hand of the Infanta, and resolved to co-operate with Elizabeth, in opposition to Spain, and in defence of Protestantism in both countries. He certified to her that he considered the Papists as their common enemy, who should receive no encouragement at his hands; and protested that his only reason for breaking off for a time their amicable relations was the shedding of his mother's blood, from the guilt of which he had considered she had failed to vindicate herself. He was not long in giving her a practical proof of his sincerity. Lord Maxwell was at that time engaged in organizing an armed force in Dumfriesshire, for the purpose of uniting with the Spaniards, who were expected to land on the west coast of Scotland, and enter England from the Borders. Lord Herries, the warden, finding himself unable to suppress this rising, which was every day gathering fresh strength, gave information to the king, who immediately summoned Maxwell to appear before the council. Maxwell not only disregarded this summons, but began to take measures to set the royal authority at defiance by fortifying the Border strongholds, of which he held possession. Enraged at his presumptuous contumacy, James, hastily collecting a body of troops, placed himself at their head, and marched to Dumfries, where Maxwell, unprepared for this sudden movement, narrowly escaped being made prisoner. Next day the king summoned the castles of Lochmaben, Langholm, Threave, and Caerlaverock, to surrender. They all

James rejects the Spanish alliance, and adheres to England.

* MS. State Paper Office, January, 1587-8; Tytler, ut supra.

† MS. Letter, British Museum, Caligula, D., Hunsdon to Burghley, 25th November, 1587; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B.C., same to same, 14th December, 1587; and ibid., same to same, 27th December, 1587; Tytler, ut supra, p. 17.

‡ ibid.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B.C., Hunsdon to Burghley, 23rd January, 1587-8; also ibid., same to same, 17th January, 1587-8.

† Intercepted Letters of Huntley, Morton, and Lord Claud Hamilton, in the name of the Catholic gentlemen of Scotland, to the King of Spain, MS. deciphered by Philips, 1588-9, State Paper Office; also MS. Letter, State Paper Office, B.C., Hunsdon to Burghley, 31st March, 1588.

obeyed except Lochmaben, the captain of which, David Maxwell, felt himself secure in consequence of the king's want of artillery; but James having borrowed a battering-train from the English warden, and begun to demolish the place, the garrison surrendered to Sir William Stewart, the brother of Captain James, on condition that their lives should be spared. James, however, who had not assented to this condition, determined to seize the opportunity of making his authority respected, and immediately ordered the governor and six of his men to be hanged.* On the following day, the king sent Stewart in pursuit of Lord Maxwell, whom he overtook, and conveyed a prisoner to the capital.

Transported with delight at this manifestation of zeal and intrepidity, Elizabeth immediately dispatched Mr. William Ashby to the Scottish court, to convey to James her thanks and congratulations, together with promises of more substantial support; but if these promises were ever meant to be kept, the intention probably passed away with the enthusiasm of the moment. Ashby informed the king that his mistress intended to confer on him an English dukedom, with an annual pension of five thousand pounds; that she would raise and maintain for him a body-guard of fifty Scottish gentlemen; and that, as a security against any insurrectionary movements taking place in the event of a descent by the Spaniards, she would levy a body of soldiers, consisting of one hundred horse and a like number of infantry, to act upon the Borders.† James willingly accepted these tempting offers, and in return suppressed the turbulence of the Borderers, restrained those who were disposed to create a diversion by invading Ireland, and prohibited all Scottish auxiliaries from passing over to the enemies of Elizabeth, so that she was enabled to concentrate the whole naval and military strength of her kingdom to meet the threatened invasion.

James had just returned to Edinburgh, after the sailing of the affair of Lochmaben, when news Spanish Armada. arrived of the sailing of the great Spanish Armada. He immediately summoned a meeting of the Estates, and, in an opening speech, descanted on the advantages of a strict union between Scotland and England, and represented to them that an invasion of England, as it was an invasion of his rights, would speedily be followed by an attempt to subjugate Scotland also. Religion, he said, was the pretext for the invasion of England, but in this respect both countries were the same. "For myself," he said, "I have ever thought mine own safety, and the safety of religion, to be so conjoined as that they cannot well be separated; neither desire I to live or to reign longer than while I am able to maintain the same. I know that the opinion of some is, I have now a fair opportunity of revenging the wrong and unkindness done me by the death of my mother; but, whatever I think of the excuses which the queen has made me, I will not be so foolish as to take the help of one stronger than myself, nor will I seek to gratify my own passions at the expense of religion, and the risk of putting in hazard, not only this kingdom, but those that belong to me after her decease."* These views were warmly supported by the chancellor, Thirlstane, who, at the same time, suggested a plan for putting the kingdom into a state of defence. He proposed that, as the Queen of England had not asked their assistance, they should limit their efforts to the defence of their own country; that an enrolment should be made of all the men in the kingdom capable of bearing arms; that a commission should be given to a nobleman in each district to take the command of the forces there raised; Measures for the defence of the kingdom.

that all the seaports of the kingdom should be vigilantly watched; that beacons should be erected on the hills and other conspicuous places to give the alarm, by day or night, on the first appearance of any fleet approaching the coast; and that the king and council should remain in the capital, to watch over and direct the whole defensive operations. With the exception of Bothwell, who was eager to seize so favourable an opportunity of humbling the power of England, the Estates unanimously concurred in sanctioning the proposed measures, which were accordingly carried into effect. On the 5th of August proclamation was made at the market-cross of Edinburgh, charging certain noblemen to convene the forces of every shire within the realm, for defence of the Protestant religion and his majesty's estate, and the "withstanding of strangers to land within his highness's bounds." These noblemen were also authorised "to make proclamations for convening of his majesty's subjects as they should think meet, to set bale-fires upon the hills, for gathering of the subjects," who were commanded to rise under pain of the loss of life, land, and goods, and to hold frequent musters throughout the kingdom.†

The whole Protestant population, as one man, acquiesced in the wisdom and the necessity of these vigorous measures, and were ready, at all hazards, cordially to support the government. At the same time James wrote a letter to the English queen, offering to assist her in the defence of her kingdom with the whole forces of the realm; and Elizabeth was so highly gratified with this proof of the young king's cordiality, that she sent Sir Robert Sidney to thank him in her name, and, in return, to proffer her help, if the Spaniards should land in Scotland. In a conversation with this ambassador, James evinced his sense of the duplicity of the King of Spain in courting his alliance, by remarking that the only favour he expected from that monarch, was like that which Polyphemus promised to Ulysses—to be devoured last.‡

* Historie of James the Sext, p. 236.

† MS. Letter, State Paper Office, William. Ashby to Lord Burghley, 16th August, 1588.

* Aikman, vol. iii. p. 162.

† Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 681.

‡ Aikman, vol. iii. p. 162.

The details of the signal destruction which overtook the Spanish Armada, arrogantly styled the "Invincible," are well known, and belong rather to English than Scottish history. It made its appearance in the Channel about the middle of July, and cruised about for some time, in expectation of being joined by a fleet and armament under the Prince of Parma, who, however, was strictly blockaded in the ports of Flanders by a Dutch squadron. While waiting for this expected reinforcement, the Spanish fleet was attacked by the English, under Sir Francis Drake, and, after a series of disasters, the admiral deemed it prudent to return home. Contrary winds, however, having prevented him from sailing through the Channel, he resolved to stretch northwards, and circumnavigating the islands of Great Britain and Ireland, to return by the Atlantic Ocean. After passing the Orkney Islands, the fleet was overtaken by a dreadful storm, and the Spaniards, being unacquainted with the navigation of these dangerous seas, their ships were dispersed and disabled, and the greater number were wrecked among the Hebrides and on the coasts of Scotland and Ireland. The shattered remains of the Armada arrived in Spain about the end of September, bringing with them the tidings of a disaster which carried dismay into the bosom of almost every family of note in that kingdom; for such had been the ambition of the nobility to participate in the conquest of England, that there was scarcely a house of distinction that had not furnished its quota to this ill-fated expedition.

This providential delivery was followed by great rejoicings among the Protestants in both kingdoms. In Scotland this exultation was accompanied by peculiar religious solemnities. A fast, conjoined with the celebration of the Lord's Supper, was held throughout the whole country for three consecutive Sabbaths, commencing on the 19th of October.*

An incident occurred at this period, which, though it had little practical bearing on the great events we are now considering, is well worthy of a place in history, inasmuch as it shows that the detestation of popery, rendered more ardent by the recent attempts to subvert the Protestant institutions of both kingdoms, did not in any degree repress the promptings of humanity towards Roman Catholics in distress. Early one morning, before the fate of the Armada was known in Scotland, one of the Spanish ships, having on board about seven hundred men, was forced ashore by a tempest, at the little seaport of Anstruther, on the coast of Fife; but, so far were the inhabitants from taking this opportunity of imprisoning or otherwise punishing their enemies, who were now completely in their power, that they supplied the soldiers and seamen with food, clothing, and shelter, of which they stood much in need; while the admiral and his officers were hospitably entertained by the magistrates and gentlemen of the neighbourhood, until they obtained the king's license and protection to return home.*

