EDITOR'S PREFACE.

THE industry, perseverance, acuteness, research and learning displayed in Dr. Jamieson's ETYMOLOGICAL DICTIONARY OF THE SCOTTISH LANGUAGE, will ever excite the admiration and gratitude of all that have occasion to consult that wonderful store-house of philology and antiquarianism. The original work consisted of two quarto volumes, which were published at Edinburgh by subscription, in 1808, and dedicated to George, Prince of Wales. Such was the interest excited by the work, that the additional words contributed by students of Scottish literature, and gleaned by the author in the prosecution of his studies, accumulated in the course of a few years to such an amount as enabled the author to produce, in the form of a Supplement, other two volumes of equal size with their predecessors, which were published at Edinburgh in 1825, and dedicated to his early patron, who had then become the King. After the death of Dr. Jamieson, in 1838, Mr. John Johnstone prepared a second edition of this great work, in which he incorporated the words of the Supplement, with their most popular significations, into the original Dictionary. By omitting the quotations contained in the Supplement, he was able to compress the work into two quarto volumes, which were published at Edinburgh in 1840-41, with the original dedication prefixed. The same editor next prepared an Abridgment of the whole work, which was also published at Edinburgh in 1846, in an octavo volume.

As the copyright of this edition, which for several years had been out of print, had fallen into the hands of Mr. Murray, Aberdeen, he resolved to reprint it in a similar form, but at a greatly reduced price. The editor undertook only to put the sheets correctly through the press. As he proceeded, however, it occurred to him that a word here and there might advantageously be added; and, knowing that Dr. Jamieson was not personally acquainted with the dialect of the northern counties, he asked contributions from those who were qualified thus to enrich the work. To all that responded to the request, therefore, the Editor and Publisher make offer of their grateful acknowledgments.

When nearly the half of the work had been printed, the Editor had occasion to visit the Orkney Islands, and, in addition to words indicated by Robert Scarth, Esq., Banker, and contributed by Mr. Petrie, Kirkwall, he there procured a copy of the recently published "Etymological Glossary of the Shetland and Orkney Dialect," by Thomas Edmondston, Esq. of Bunes, Shetland. Before he had it in his power to ask Mr. Edmondston's permission to make use of his valuable Glossary, that gentleman, having heard of the intended republication of the Abridgment of Jamieson, spontaneously granted the Editor, in the most generous manner, full permission to use his Glossary, as far as available.

The Editor would also take the liberty of expressing his thanks to Mr. Robert Duncan, Lesmahago, for the early interest he took in the work, and the valuable contributions he communicated, as well as to Mr. Jervise, Brechin, for several Forfarshire words. The Editor has, of course, corrected whatever typographical errors occurred in the work he was re-editing, and, in cases of doubt, had frequent recourse to the original volumes; in a few cases he has corrected what was erroneous, as at chanter, fedmal, gowpen, tarricrook, &c.; he has given about one hundred and twenty additional explanations of words; he has added one hundred and six various spellings; and sixty synonyms, besides a few etymologies; he has introduced seventy pithy, idiomatic, and illustrative expressions; and the new words, from his own resources and the contributions indicated, amount to about six hundred and thirty.

In a work of such a multifarious nature, and containing so many words from foreign languages, it would be wonderful if no error had escaped the vigilance of the Editor; but he trusts that such as may be discovered will only be of a trivial nature, and that many will now possess a reliable key to unlock the valuable stores of our Scottish literature, which are shut up in a language that is fast becoming unknown.

Those Englishmen, who have taken but a superficial view of the Scottish language, will learn from this work, that it is neither a collection of barbarous sounds nor a corruption of their own tongue; but that, on the contrary, it has a common origin with the English; and that, while Englishmen have changed the sound, altered the spelling, and dropped many of the words of their forefathers, Scotchmen have preserved to a great extent the primitive language of their Teutonic ancestors, in its native integrity, copiousness and force.

Under particular letters or combinations of letters, occasional remarks will be found respecting the interchanges that take place in different parts of the country; but, from circumstances stated by himself, it is evident that Dr. Jamieson's knowledge of the dialect of the northern Isles was too limited to enable him to make any remarks on them. The Editor may, therefore, advert to some of them here, that he may account for his not having introduced more words from that quarter than he has done. Thus, th is changed into t; as throat, trot; thin, tin; thrang, trang; or into d; as thou, dou; their, dyr; thunder, dunder, or tunner; ch hard is softened, or changed into sh; as chair, shair; shafts, shafis; choked, shokit; qu into wh; as queen, ween; quit, whett; quirm, whirm.

In conclusion, the Editor begs to state, that it will afford him much pleasure to receive from any of his intelligent readers such words as they may discover to have been omitted, with specification of the districts in which they are used, as these will still be available when the work is again submitted to the press. Of such as he has lately received, he has availed himself of what would otherwise have been a blank page at the end of the volume, to present a specimen.

MEMOIR OF DR. JAMIESON.

THE brief Memoir which, through the kindness of the surviving members of Dr. Jamieson's family, is now prefixed to this Abridgment of his greatest work, possesses at least the essential quality of being perfectly authentic. It is in every particular compiled from a rather bulky manuscript autobiography, which was written during the later years of Dr. Jamieson's life, in compliance with repeated solicitations that he would throw together some memoranda of the leading occurrences of his public and literary career.

JOHN JAMIESON was born in the city of Glasgow on the 3rd March, 1759. His father, Mr. John Jamieson, was the pastor of one of the two Seceder congregations which were all then established in that town. His mother's name was Cleland. She was the daughter of Mr. Cleland of Edinburgh, a man who seems to have enjoyed the friendship of the more distinguished of the clergymen of the city, and who had married Rachel, the daughter of the Rev. Robert Bruce of Garlet, son of the second brother of Bruce of Kennet. This reverend person, the great-grandfather of Dr. Jamieson, suffered persecution as a Presbyterian minister, during the troubles of Scotland. Dr. Jamieson's paternal grandfather was Mr. William Jamieson, the farmer of Hill House, near Linlithgow, in West Lothian; a person of respectable connections, being related to several of the smaller landed proprietors of the county, and to some of the wealthy merchants of the then flourishing commercial town of Borrowstounness.

The future lexicographer received his first lessons at a school kept by his father's precentor, a person quite incompetent for the task of tuition. After a course of very imperfect elementary instruction, according to a practice then general, and not yet quite obsolete in Scotland, of leaving the English language to shift, in a great measure, for itself, he was sent, in his seventh year, to the first class of the Latin grammar school of Glasgow, then taught by Mr. William Bald. Bald was a teacher of a stamp not unfrequently met with in those times. He was an admirable boon companion, and possessed of great humour, though more than suspected of undue partiality for the sons of men of rank, or those of wealthy citizens who occasionally gave him a good dinner, and made liberal "Candlemas Offerings." This partiality having been very unfairly manifested to the prejudice of the just claims of the Seceder minister's son to the highest prize in the class, as afterwards admitted by Mr. Bald himself, the pupil was withdrawn at the end of the first year. He was then placed under a private teacher named Selkirk, who is described as a worthy man, and with whom, in two years, and by the unremitting care of his father at home, he made such progress, that he was deemed fit to enter the first "Humanity," or Latin class, in the University of Glasgow, when only nine years old. Dr. Jamieson, in commenting upon his very early appearance at college, gently expresses his regret that his excellent father should have so hurried on his education, and justly remarks, that, however vividly impressions may seem to be received by a young mind, they are often so superficial as to be altogether effaced by others which succeed them. The professor of Humanity was the Rev. George Muirhead, of whom his pupil entertained the most affectionate recollection, and an "indefeasible veneration."

During his second year at the Latin class, young Jamieson also attended the first Greek class, which was then taught by Dr. James Moor, the well-known author of the Greek Grammar which bears his name.

So early in life as this period, the future antiquary was beginning to show a taste for old coins, and other curious objects, on which he expended his pocket-money. A vein for poetry at the same time displayed itself. Both predilections were congenial to those of Professor Moor, with whom Jamieson became so far a favourite, that he kindly explained the coins the boy brought to him, and would show him his own valuable collection, acquired while he had travelled with the unfortunate Earl of Kilmarnock. In short, under Moor, his pupil seems to have made progress in every thing save his proper business, the Greek language.

During his attendance on the prelections of Professor Muirhead, however, the mind of the young student received that bias which influenced the literary pursuits of his after life. "The Professor," he says, in the autobiography above referred to, "not satisfied with an explanation of the words of any classical passage, was most anxious to call the attention of his pupils to the peculiar force of the terms that occurred in it; particularly pointing out the shades of signification by which those terms, viewed as synonymous, differed from each other. This mode of illustration, which, at that time, I suspect, was by no means common, had a powerful influence in attracting my attention to the classical books, and even to the formation of language in general, and to it I most probably may ascribe that partiality for philological and etymological research in which I have ever since had so much pleasure."

The precarious state of his father's health made the studies of an only surviving son, already destined to the ministry, be pushed forward with anxious rapidity. The friendly Professor Muirhead disapproved and remonstrated; but there was too good reason for the precipitance, for Jamieson's father afterwards informed him, that he was much afraid that, having been long a prisoner from complicated disease, he would be early taken away; and, as he had nothing to leave his son, he was most desirous to forward his classical and professional education. He was accordingly next season sent to the Logic class, though, as he remarks, "a boy of eleven years of age was quite unfit for studying the abstractions of logic and metaphysics." This year, also, he considers "entirely lost," and that "it might be blotted out of the calendar of his life." A second year spent in philosophical studies was employed to little more purpose; and though he now studied under the eminent philosopher, Dr. Reid, he had become, during his father's continued illness, too much, he says, his own master to make any great progress "either in the Intellectual or Moral Powers." He, however, took some pleasure in the study of Mathematics; but over Algebra, on which he consumed the midnight oil, the student of eleven, very naturally, often fell asleep. His classical and philosophical studies were certainly begun in very good time; but it is yet more surprising to find the Associate Presbytery of Glasgow admitting him as a student of theology at the age of fourteen!

The Professor of Theology among the Seceders at that period was the Rev. William Moncrieff of Alloa, the son of one of the four ministers who originally seceded from the Church of Scotland, from their hostility to Patronage, and who, subsequently, founded the Secession Church. Though not, according to his distinguished pupil, a man of extensive erudition, or of great depth of understanding, Professor Moncrieff was possessed of qualities even more essential to the fulfilment of his important office of training young men in those days to the Secession ministry; and from the suavity of his disposition, and the kindness of his manners, he was very popular among his students. After attending Professor Moncrieff for one season at Alloa, young Jamieson attended Professor Anderson (afterwards the founder of the Andersonian Institution) in Glasgow, for Natural Philosophy, for which science he does not seem to have had any taste. While at the Glasgow University, he became a member of the different Literary Societies formed by the students for mutual improvement. These were then the Eclectic, the Dialectic, and the Academic; and he was successively a member of each of them.

The Doctor relates many beautiful instances of the mutual respect and cordial regard which then subsisted among the different denominations of the clergy of Glasgow, and which was peculiarly manifested towards his father during his severe and protracted illness. Comparing modern times with those better days, he prophetically remarks:—

“If matters go on, as they have done, in our highly favoured country, for some time past, there is reason to fear that as little genuine love will be found as there was among the Pharisees, who, from sheer influence of party, in a certain sense still ‘loved one another,’ while they looked on all who differed from them in no other light than they did on Sadducees. May the God of all Grace give a merciful check to this spirit, which is not from Him!”

Dr. Jamieson was himself, throughout the whole course of his life, distinguished by a liberal and truly Catholic spirit. His friends and intimate associates were found among Christians of all denominations, though he conscientiously held by his own opinions. If he ever lacked charity, it appears to have been towards the Unitarians, a fact perhaps to be accounted for by his early controversies with Macgill and Dr. Priestley. Episcopalians and Roman Catholics were among his personal friends, even when his position as the young minister of a very rigid congregation of Seceders, in a country town, made the association dangerous to him, as being liable to misconstruction by his zealous flock.

After he had attained the dignity of a student of Theology, instead of condescending to resume the red gown of the Glasgow student, Jamieson repaired to Edinburgh to prosecute his studies, and lived, while there, in the house of his maternal grandfather, Mr. Cleland. He attended the prelections of the eminent Dugald Stewart, then but a young man himself.

During the young student's residence in Edinburgh, he made many valuable and desirable acquaintances, and acquired some useful friends. Of this number was the venerable Dr John Erskine, who continued the friend of Jamieson for the remainder of his honoured life. Dr. Erskine commanded his veneration and love, but he also felt great respect for the Evangelical Doctor's Moderate colleague, the celebrated Principal Robertson, the Historian. Robertson was long the leader of the Moderate party in the Kirk Courts; and young Jamieson, though a conscientious Seceder, and one in a manner dedicated from his birth to the service of the Secession Church, on witnessing the masterly manner in which the Principal conducted business in the Church Courts, felt, in his own words, "That if he were to acknowledge any ecclesiastical leader, or call any man a master in divine matters, he would prefer the Principal in this character to any man he had ever seen; for he conducted business with so much dignity and suavity of manner, that those who followed seemed to be led by a silken cord. He might cajole, but he never cudgelled his troops."

After attending the Theological class for six sessions, the candidate for the ministry was, at the age of twenty, appointed by the Synod to be taken on trials for licence; and in July 1779, he was licensed by the Presbytery of Glasgow.

Dr. Jamieson's first appearance as a preacher was at Colmonell, in Carrick, in Ayrshire, then a very dreary and poor district. From the first he seems to have been popular, and the small isolated congregation of Colmonell wished to obtain the young preacher as their pastor; but to this he gave no encouragement, deeming it his duty to leave such matters to the regular authorities. His next appointment was to the Isle of Bute, and Cowal, in Argyleshire. The picture which he gives of characters and of manners, long since passed away, and their contrast with present times, is a little striking. The venerable Doctor, in old age, relates, "I found my situation on this beautiful island very comfortable. The place of preaching was in Rothesay. I lodged at a farm-house in the parish of Kingarth; and I never met with more kindness from any man than from ———, the minister of the parish." This was not at all in accordance with the Doctor's subsequent experience of the Established ministers in other parishes, and particularly when he came to be settled in Forfar.

Mr. Jamieson passed over to Cowal in the depth of a severe winter, and was lodged in a wretched, smoky hovel, without even glass to the aperture through which light was received, and in which he had to eat, sleep, and study. These were not the palmy days of the Secession Church.

In the beginning of 1780, Mr. Jamieson was appointed by the Associate Synod, (the Supreme Court of the Secession,) to itinerate in Perthshire and the neighbouring county of Angus. After preaching for several Sabbaths in Dundee, in which there was then a vacancy, he made so favourable an impression, that the congregation agreed to give him a call to be their pastor. But Forfar, his next preaching station, was to be his resting-place, and it proved for many years an ungenial and dreary sojourn. To Forfar he was at that time, of course, a total stranger; and in old age he touchingly relates:—"Though I were to live much longer than I have done since that time, I shall never forget the feeling I had in crossing the rising ground, where I first had a view of this place. I had never seen any part of the country before. The day was cold, the aspect of the country dreary and bleak, and it was partly covered with snow. It seemed to abound with mosses, which gave a desolate appearance to the whole valley under my eye. I paused for a moment, and a pang struck through my heart, while the mortifying query occurred—'What if this gloomy place should be the bounds of my habitation?' And it was the will of the Almighty that it should be so."

The congregation of Forfar was at that time but newly formed, and had never yet had any regular minister, being, by orders of the Presbytery, supplied, as it is termed, from Sabbath to Sabbath by young probationers and others.

Three calls were at the same time subscribed for the popular young preacher: from Forfar, from Dundee, and from Perth, where he was wanted as a second or collegiate minister. The congregation of Dundee was large and comparatively wealthy, but the call was not unanimous, and Forfar proved his ultimate destination. It is not easy to conceive a position more trying, in every respect, than that of the young minister at his outset in Forfar; and a man of less energy, although of equal talents, would probably have altogether sunk under the opposition and persecution which he encountered. There was, however, one bright side: he had been affectionately, nay, anxiously wished for by the whole of his congregation. He knew that he was in the path of duty; and, piously resigning "his lot into the hands of the All-Wise Disposer of events," with the assurance which followed him through life, "that his gracious Master would provide for him in the way that was best," he looked forward to the future with firmness.

By degrees Mr. Jamieson became better known and better appreciated. He acknowledges with marked gratitude the obligations he owed, in many respects, to Mr Dempster of Dunnichen, a gentleman of high character and considerable influence in the county, which he represented for some time in Parliament. This benevolent man was his first, and proved through life his fastest friend. Until his acquaintance with Mr. Dempster, which was brought about by an accidental call, Mr. Jamieson's only social enjoyment was in visiting at intervals several respectable families in Perth and its neighbourhood, or the hospitable manse of Longforgan in the Carse of Gowrie, then a residence combining every charm. But the friendship and influence of Mr. Dempster soon procured similar enjoyments for him nearer home. At Dunnichen he was at all times a welcome guest, and there he became acquainted, through the cordial introduction of Mr Dempster, with all the landed aristocracy of the county. This enlargement of Mr Jamieson's circle of social intercourse was further aided and confirmed by his marriage with the daughter of an old and respectable proprietor in the county, Miss Charlotte Watson, youngest daughter of Robert Watson, Esq., of Shielhill, in Angus, and of Easter Rhynd in Perthshire.

With Mr. Jamieson's very limited income of £50 per annum, it must have appeared almost madness to think of marriage, even allowing for the greater value of money at that time; but the bachelor state is deemed incompatible with the ministry in Scotland; and, besides, prudential considerations will not always prevent a young man from falling in love. The union, however, which lasted for more than half a century, proved in all respects a most auspicious one. Mr. and Mrs. Jamieson had, no doubt, for a long period, much to contend with, from limited means and a very numerous family, but the energy and untiring industry of Mr. Jamieson made up for all other deficiencies.

Mr. Jamieson's confidence in Providence, and in his own energies, soon began to reap its reward. To loneliness at home, and indifference, if not neglect, abroad, there now succeeded strong domestic attractions, and the esteem and regard of many respectable neighbours.

Shortly after his marriage, Mr. Jamieson began to work seriously for the press, and continued, for upwards of forty years, a constant and even voluminous writer on diversified subjects. While yet a mere stripling, he had composed some pieces of poetry for "Ruddiman's Weekly Magazine," which we notice only because they were his first attempts as an author. We next find him communicating,—in a series of papers to the Literary and Antiquarian Society of Perth, of which he was a member,—the fruits of his researches concerning the antiquities of Forfarshire. These papers led Mr. Dempster to recommend his writing a history of the county, and the suggestion gave impulse and direction to his local inquiries, although it was never fully complied with. But the publication which seems first to have obtained for him some literary reputation, and the character of an orthodox and evangelical minister, was his reply, under the title of "Socinianism Unmasked," to Dr. Macgill of Ayr, whose alleged heresy had lately been widely bruited.

This work paved the way for his favourable reception in London, which he visited for the first time in 1788-9. He carried to London with him a collection of sermons, afterwards published under the title of "Sermons on the Heart," which became very popular. With the exception of this work, his other writings do not seem to have yielded him much profit, although they added to his reputation. Letters of introduction from Dr. Erskine and others procured for him an extensive acquaintance, particularly in the religious circles and among the evangelical ministers of the metropolis. He mentions the pious and benevolent Mr. John Thornton, the eccentric Ryland the Baptist minister, John Newton, Venn, and Cecil, as of the number of his new friends. He also found antiquarian and literary associates, while his poem on the "Sorrows of Slavery," written with some care, and intended to aid the cause of abolition, then of absorbing interest, brought him under the notice of the abolitionists, and led to an acquaintance with Wilberforce and Granville Sharp.

The consideration he enjoyed in these metropolitan circles, and particularly amongst his religious friends, must have been augmented by his "Reply to Priestly," for which he received the diploma of Doctor of Divinity from the College of New Jersey, the first honour of the kind that had ever been conferred upon a Seceder.

Dr. Jamieson repeated his visits to London at different times, officiating there for his friend Dr. Jerment, when that gentleman went to Scotland. On these occasions, he extended the circle of his general acquaintance, and appears also to have discovered several distant relations, mixing in good society. He speaks amusingly enough of his meeting with a distant female cousin, Lady Strange, the widow of the celebrated engraver, a very lively and clever woman, who, to her last day, took pride in her broad Scotch, and retained all the warmth of early national feeling. When the Doctor, till then a stranger to her, made his formal obeisance, "the good old lady," he says, "ran up to me with all the vivacity of fifteen, and, taking me in her arms, gave me a hearty embrace." She was one of those whose heads and hearts are continually occupied with plans for serving their friends; and her influence, of which she had a good deal, was ever zealously exerted to promote Dr. Jamieson's interests. One of her schemes was, that he should leave the Secession and look for promotion in the Church of England; but such an idea, it may well be believed, could not for a moment be entertained by the conscientious Scotch Dissenter, who had, for a dozen years, been maintaining a family on a stipend of £50 a-year.

During this period, Mr. Jamieson's greatest enjoyment, beyond his own fireside, was found in the society and steady friendship of Mr. Dempster. "Many a happy day," he writes, "have I spent under the roof of this benevolent man. We walked together; we rode together; we fished together; we took an occasional ride to examine the remains of antiquity in the adjacent district; and if the weather was bad, we found intellectual employment in the library, often in tracing the origin of our vernacular words in the continental languages."

The Doctor had not yet projected his great work,—the Dictionary; the first idea of which arose accidentally from the conversation of one of the many distinguished persons whom he met at Mr. Dempster's residence. Dunnichen being long the frequent rendezvous of not merely the most eminent men of Scotland, but of such learned foreigners as from time to time visited the country. This was the learned Grim Thorbrelin, Professor of Antiquities in Copenhagen. Up to this period, Dr. Jamieson had held the common opinion, that the Scottish is not a language, and nothing more than a corrupt dialect of the English, or at least of the Anglo-Saxon. It was the learned Danish Professor that first undeceived him, though full conviction came tardily, and proved, to his satisfaction, that there are many words in our national tongue which had never passed through the channel of the Anglo-Saxon, nor been spoken in England. Before leaving Dunnichen, Thorbrelin requested the Doctor to note down for him all the singular words used in that part of the country, no matter how vulgar he might himself consider them, and to give the received meaning of each. Jamieson laughed at the request, saying, "What would you do, sir, with our vulgar words? they are merely corruptions of English." Thorbrelin, who spoke English fluently, replied with considerable warmth, "If that fantast, Johnson, had said so, I would have forgiven him, because of his ignorance or prejudice; but I cannot make the same excuse for you, when you speak in this contemptuous manner of the language of your country, which is, in fact, more ancient than the English. I have now spent four months in Angus and Sutherland, and I have met with between three and four hundred words purely Gothic, that were never used in Anglo-Saxon. You will admit that I am pretty well acquainted with Gothic. I am a Goth; a native of Iceland; the inhabitants of which are an unmixed race, who speak the same language which their ancestors brought from Norway a thousand years ago. All or most of these words which I have noted down, are familiar to me in my native island. If you do not find out the sense of some of the terms which strike you as singular, send them to me, and I am pretty certain I shall be able to explain them to you." Jamieson, to oblige the learned stranger, forthwith purchased a two-penny paper book, and began to write down all the remarkable or uncouth words of the district. From such small beginnings, made more than twenty years before any part of the work was published, arose the four large quarto volumes of his DICTIONARY and SUPPLEMENT, the complete revolution in his opinion as to the origin of the Scottish language, and that theory of its origin which he has maintained in the learned Dissertations which accompany his Dictionary.

It would not be easy, we apprehend, to explain the difficulties, discouragements, and privations under which that great undertaking was prosecuted through a long series of years. The author had now a large family to maintain and to educate; and he was even embarrassed with debts inevitably incurred, while the prospect of remuneration for his labours was distant and uncertain. How he and Mrs. Jamieson struggled through their accumulating difficulties, might probably have puzzled themselves, on looking back, to explain; but he was strong in faith, and also strenuous in endeavour.

On the death of Mr. Adam Gib, Dr. Jamieson received a call from the Antiburgher congregation of Nicolson Street, Edinburgh, to be their minister; but the Synod opposed both the wishes of the congregation, and Dr. Jamieson's interests and obvious advantage, and that, too, at a period when his removal to the capital would have been of the greatest advantage to his literary projects, and to the professional education of his elder sons. He very naturally felt with acuteness this frustration of his reasonable hopes, but he quietly submitted. A few years more elapsed, when Mr. Banks, the successor of Mr. Gib, having gone to America, the Doctor was again unanimously called, and the Synod now thought fit to authorise his translation. The change from Forfar to Edinburgh was, in every point of view, an auspicious event. His stipend was probably at once quadrupled: he was restored to early connections and literary society, and obtained every facility for prosecuting his philological and etymological researches. Shortly after this time he learnt that the Rev. Mr. Boucher, Vicar of Epsom, was engaged in a work of a somewhat similar character to the Dictionary; and mutual friends advised that the one should buy the other off, and obtain the accumulated materials, for the use of his own work. Any reward for his labours, however inadequate, was then an important consideration with Dr. Jamieson, and he appears, at one time, to have thought of giving up his treasures for £250; but the dislike which he had felt, from the beginning, at either compromise or co-operation, was afterwards fortified by suspicions that Mr. Boucher's view of the Scottish language would degrade it to the level of the English provincial dialects; and the conscientious conduct of the friend of the Vicar, the late Bishop Gleig of Stirling, who was too well aware of the real value of Dr. Jamieson's manuscripts to sanction such a sacrifice, ultimately and happily put a stop to the negotiation. The subsequent death of Mr. Boucher, before the publication of his work, left the field clear for our National Lexicographer. It is not merely as patriotic natives of Scotland that we rejoice in this circumstance, but as the friends of sound literature; and as prizing yet more highly than the learning displayed, that fund of innocent and delightful entertainment and instruction, spread before us in the pages of the Scottish Dictionary, and those imperishable records of our history, our literature, and our usages, which may enable all future generations of our countrymen, and their offshoots in every distant land, to think and feel as ancient Scots; and which will keep open for them the literary treasures of their fathers, the pages of their Burns and Scott; and of those other national works which, but for this master-key, must have very soon become sealed books.

The people of Scotland certainly never took so great an interest in any work that had then appeared in their own country as in Jamieson's Dictionary. It was every one's concern; and after the first two volumes had been published, and had set many thousand minds at work to add to, or endeavour to render more perfect this national monument, the learned author, from the palace and the castle to the farm-house and the cottage, found devoted, and often able auxiliaries, in completing his great undertaking. Those who could not furnish him with words, yet circulated his prospectuses, and procured subscribers to the work. Through the interest and exertions of Lord Glenberrie, the duty on the paper for printing the Dictionary was remitted, in virtue of a provision entitling the publishers of works on Northern Literature to a drawback on the paper used. Among his friends of a later period, none were more zealous than the late Duchess of Sutherland, through whose interest or recommendation he was afterwards chosen one of the ten Associates of the Royal Literary Society, instituted by George IV., and of which each Associate was entitled to a pension of one hundred guineas.

Dr. Jamieson's severest affliction had been seeing the greater part of his numerous family descend to the grave before him; some in infancy and childhood, but others in the prime of life and of usefulness. Of seven sons who reached manhood, only one survived him. Three died in India; of whom two had arrived at distinction in the medical service. His second son, Mr. Robert Jamieson, an eminent member of the Scottish bar, long in lucrative practice, and entitled to look forward to the highest honours of his profession, was cut off a few years before his venerable parent. But his last, and the heaviest blow of all, was the loss of Mrs. Jamieson, a lady equally remarkable for the good qualities of her head and of her heart, who had shared his lot for fifty-five years. His surviving family consists of Mr. Farquhar Jamieson, now a banker in Paris; Mrs. Mackenzie, the wife of Captain Mackenzie of the 21st regiment; and several grandchildren.

In the latter years of his life, Dr. Jamieson was liable to bilious attacks, for which he was recommended to try the waters of different noted Spas in Scotland. From such stations as Pitcaithley, the Moffat Wells, or Innerleithen, he was in the habit of making rounds of visits to those families of the neighbouring nobility and gentry who had been among his earlier friends. The banks of the Tweed, between Peebles and Berwick, had become to him a more favourite and familiar haunt than even the banks of his native Clyde; and many of the happiest days of his later summers were spent amidst the lovely scenes of "Tweedside," and among the friends and relatives whom he had in that classic district. He had always been fond of angling, and, in the Tweed and its tributary streams, he socially pursued the "gentle craft" almost to the close of life. [Of the houses which he had long been in the habit of visiting on Tweedside, none seems to have left a more indelible impression on his memory than Ashestiel, the happy intermediate residence of Sir Walter Scott, whom Dr. Jamieson had first visited in his little cottage at Lasswade, and, for the last of many times, in the lordly halls of Abbotsford, a very short while before Scott went abroad never again to return—himself.]

Besides his DICTIONARY, and the different works which he edited, Dr. Jamieson was the author of numerous volumes, tracts, and pamphlets; he received literary honours both in his own country and from America, and was a Member or Associate of learned societies in different parts of the world.

One of the most important public affairs in which Dr. Jamieson was ever engaged, was bringing about the union of the two branches of the Secession Church, the Burghers and Antiburghers. Those only who understand the history of these great divisions of the Seceders, and their mutual jealousies and dissensions, can appreciate the difficulty and the value of the service of again uniting them, and the delicacy, sagacity, and tact which this object required.

Notwithstanding his bilious and nervous complaints, Doctor Jamieson, considering his laborious and often harassing duties, enjoyed, up to a great age, a tolerable measure of health. His "Recollections," to which he appears to have added from time to time, as memory restored the more interesting events and reminiscences of his earlier years, seem to have terminated abruptly in 1836. He died in his house in George's Square, Edinburgh, on the 12th July 1838, universally regretted, esteemed, and beloved, not more for his learning, piety, and social qualities, than as one of the few remaining links which connect Scottish literature and social life with the Past.

A

ORIGIN OF THE SCOTTISH LANGUAGE.

It is an opinion, which has been pretty generally received, and perhaps almost taken for granted, that the language spoken in the Lowlands of Scotland is merely a corrupt dialect of the English, or at least of the Anglo-Saxon. Those who have adopted this idea, have assigned, some one era, some another, for the introduction of this language from the South; each preferring that which seemed to have the most plausible claim, without entertaining a single doubt as to the solidity of the hypothesis which rendered it necessary to fix such an era. Having long adhered to this hypothesis, without any particular investigation, it is probable that I might never have thought of calling it in question, had I not heard it positively asserted, by a learned foreigner, that we had not received our language from the English; that there were many words in the mouths of the vulgar in Scotland, which had never passed through the channel of the Anglo-Saxon, or been spoken in England, although still used in the languages of the North of Europe; that the Scottish was not to be viewed as a daughter of the Anglo-Saxon, but, as in common with the latter, derived from the ancient Gothic; and that, while we had to regret the want of authentic records, an accurate and extensive investigation of the language of our country might throw considerable light on her ancient history, particularly as to the origin of her first inhabitants.

This assertion seemed to merit a fair investigation. On this I entered, prepossessed with an opinion directly the reverse of that which I now embrace as by far most tenable. I am far from saying, that it is attended with no difficulties. These I mean to submit to the public, in all the force which they appear to have; while at the same time I shall exhibit a variety of considerations, which, if they amount not to full proof, seem to afford as much as can well be expected on a subject necessarily involved in such obscurity, from the distance of time, and from the deficiency of historical testimony.

The learned Camden, Father Innes, and some other respectable writers, have viewed the Picts as Welsh; and have argued, of consequence, that their language must have been a dialect of the Celtic. I will not contend about the name of this people; although there is sufficient evidence that it was written corruptly by the Romans. What particularly demands our attention, is the origin of the people themselves: and also their language, whether it was Gothic, or Celtic.

It would serve no good purpose to enter into any disquisition as to the supposed time of their arrival in this country. As this dissertation is intended merely in subserviency to the following work, it will be enough, if it appear that there is good reason to view them as a Gothic race.

I. HISTORICAL EVIDENCE.—The testimony of venerable Bede has been universally respected, except in as far as his credulity might be viewed as influenced by ecclesiastical attachment. It has been supposed, indeed, that many of the legendary stories, now found in his history, were not written by him; as, in a variety of instances, although they appear in the A. S. translation, they are wanting in the original. Being the earliest historian of this island, he must have been best qualified to give a just account of the Picts; and although we should suppose him to have been under ecclesiastical influence in matters of religion, he could have no end to serve in giving a false account of the origin of this people. Yet, on this subject, even the testimony of Bede has been treated as unworthy of regard; because it is directly eversive of system.

He says—"Cum plurimam insulæ partem, incipientes ab austro possidissent (Brittones), contigit gentem Pictorum de Scythia, ut perhibent, longis navibus non multis oceanum ingressam," &c. Lib. i. l. "When they [the Britons], beginning at the South, had made themselves masters of the greatest part of the island, it happened that the nation of the Picts, coming into the ocean from Scythia, as it is reported, in a few long ships," &c. After giving an account of their landing in Ireland, and of their being advised by the Scots of that country to steer towards Britain, he adds—"Itaque petentes Britanniam Picti, habitare per septentrionales insulæ partes coeperunt; nam austrina Brittones occupaverunt." Ibid. "The Picts, accordingly sailing over into Britain, began to inhabit the northern parts of it, for the Britons were possessed of the southern."

There is not the slightest reason to doubt, that, by the Britons, he means the Welsh; as this is the name by which he designs this people. It is well known that Scandinavia had been called Scythia by Jornandes, two centuries before Bede's time. De Orig. Get. pp. 595-597. Is it said that Bede lived too long after the settlement of the Picts, to know any thing certain as to their origin? It is sufficient to reply, that he undoubtedly gives the received belief of his time, which had been transmitted from preceding ages, and which no writer, for nearly nine hundred years after him, ever ventured to controvert. If Bede could not know whence the Picts came, it can hardly be supposed that we should have superior means of information.

Bede was certainly well acquainted with the Britons or Welsh. Now, although it should be supposed that he had been misinformed as to the origin of the Picts, his assertion amounts to a full proof that they were quite a different people from the former. For had they been Welsh, or indeed Celts of any description, the similarity of language could not have entirely escaped his observation. If an intelligent Highlander can at this day, after a national separation of nearly fourteen hundred years, make himself understood by an Irishman, it is totally inconceivable that the language of the Picts, if British, should have so far lost its original character in a far shorter period.

An attempt has lately been made, by a learned writer, to set aside this testimony of Bede, who, it is admitted, "was contemporary with the Pictish government." "He speaks," it is said, "doubtfully of the Picts, as the second people who came into this island from Scythia; first to Ireland; and thence to North-Britain. But though Bede states all this, rather as what he had heard, than as what he knew, his authority has deluded many writers, who did not inquire whether what he had said modestly could possibly be true." Caledonia, p. 199, N.

But why is it said that Bede speaks doubtfully, or, as it is afterwards somewhat softened, modestly, of the Picts? There can be no other reason for this assertion, than that he uses the phrase, ut perhibent. He therefore states all this, rather as what he had heard, than as what he knew. Doubtless, he could not know it, but by some kind of relation. For, although "contemporary with the Pictish government," it has never been supposed that he could have ocular demonstration as to the landing of this people. Is it meant to be objected, that Bede does not quote his authorities, or that he refers only to traditionary testimony? In a matter of this kind, would it be surprising that he could have referred to nothing else? Viewing it in this light, there is not the least evidence that it was not the general belief. Had it been merely the report of some, opposed by a different account of the origin of this people, he would in all probability have said—ut nonnulli perhibent. Had he known any argument against this account, one, for example, from the diversity of language, would he not naturally have stated this?

But must perhibent necessarily be restricted to mere report? Has it never been used to denote historical narration? Or, as it occurs in the language of Bede, may it not rather be viewed as respecting the more circumstantial account which follows, concerning the size and number of the ships,—(ut perhibent, longis navibus non multis,) than as respecting what precedes, in regard to the migration of the Picts from Scythia? It is a singular circumstance, that Bede uses the very same verb with respect to the chiefs of the Anglo-Saxons. "Duces fuisse perhibenter eorum primo duo fratris Hengist et Horsa." Lib. i. c. 15. Could Bede be in any doubt, whether these were the leaders of his ancestors, little more than two hundred years before his own time?

If, however, Bede wrote doubtfully, how could his authority "delude many writers?" If he indeed mentions this only as a modest opinion, as a matter of mere hearsay, as a thing about which he was himself in hesitation; whence is it, that none of these "many writers," during nearly ten centuries, ever adverted to this till now? Were they all, without exception, so very prone to delusion? This is undoubtedly the conclusion we are left to deduce. They were so blind as to mistake mere doubt for authority; and therefore "they did not inquire whether what he had said modestly could possibly be true." Here the secret breaks out. Bede must necessarily be viewed as writing doubtfully, because he could not possibly be writing the truth. For although neither Bede, nor his followers, did inquire, "we now know, from more accurate examination, that the Picts were certainly Caledonians; that the Caledonians were Britons; and that the Britons were Gauls: it is the topography of North-Britain, during the second and first centuries, as it contains a thousand facts, which solves all these doubts, and settles all controversy about the lineage of the Picts." Caled. ut sup.

Although Bede knew somewhat about the names of places in North-Britain, we, in the nineteenth century, can form a far more certain judgment: and so powerful is this single argument from topography, as to invalidate all other evidence arising from direct historical testimony.

Nennius, who wrote about the year 858, informs us, that "the Picts came and occupied the islands called Orkneys, and afterwards, from the adjacent islands desolated many large regions, and took possession of those on the left, i.e. the north coast (sinistrali plaga) of Britain, where they remain even to this day." "There," he adds, "they held the third part of Britain, and hold it even until now." Cap. 5. ap. Gale, I. 99.

Mr. Pinkerton has made a remark, the force of which cannot easily be set aside, that both Nennius and his coadjutor Samuel "were Welch," and that "therefore their testimony is conclusive that the Piks were not Welch, for they speak of the Piks, while the Pikish name was in full power." Enquiry, II. 161.

That the Picts were not Welch, appears also from the testimony of Gildas, an earlier British writer, who calls them a transmarine nation, who came, ab aquilone, from the north. Ap. Gale, I. 1.

The Saxon Chronicle, which seems to have been begun about the year 1000, perfectly concurs with these testimonies. The account given of the Picts is so similar to that of Bede, that it would almost seem to have been copied from his history. It is more minute in one point; as it is said that they came, ex Australi parte Scythiae, "from the south of Scythia."

The northern origin of the Picts seems to have been admitted by Roman writers. I shall not urge the well-known testimony of Tacitus, with respect to the striking resemblance of the Caledonians to the Germans; for, notwithstanding the partiality of former ages for this ancient writer, as an accurate investigator and faithful historian, we are now told, that "Tacitus talked about the origin of the Caledonians and Germans, like a man who was not very skilful in such investigations; and who preferred declamation to inquiry." Caled. p. 202, N.

The testimony of Claudian, who was coeval with the Emperor Valentinian I., deserves our attention.

Orcades. Incaluit Pictorum sanguine Thule.

Goodall, in his Introduction to Fordun, observes on this passage, that although the Romans slew the Saxons in the Orkneys, it does not follow that they were either the inhabitants of the Orkneys, or of Britain. But one consequence is unavoidable,—that even in this early period the Saxons were acquainted with the Orkneys. Hence, also, it seems highly probable, that they were in a state of confederacy with the Picts, as being a kindred race.

Stillingfleet's reasoning concerning the testimony of Eumenius is very strong. "In his Panegyrick," says the Bishop, "he takes notice of the different state of the Britons, when Cæsar subdued them, from what they were in Constantius his time. 'Then,' saith he, 'they were a rude, half-naked people, and so easily vanquished; but now the Britons were exercised by the arms of the Picts and the Irish.' Nothing can be plainer, than that Eumenius here distinguishes the Picts from the Britons, and supposes them to be enemies to each other. Neither can we reasonably think this a name then taken up to distinguish the barbarous Britons from the Provincial. For that distinction had now been of a very long standing; and if it had been applied to that purpose, we should have met with it in Tacitus, or Dio, or Herodian, or Zozimus, who speak of the Extra-provincial Britains, under no other name but of Britains." Orig. Britann. p. 241.

It has indeed been said, that "the Picts of the third Century appeared to Roman eyes under new aspects, and to the Roman understanding under more formidable shapes." Caled. p. 215. By the reference to B. i. c. 6, the author seems to respect "their peculiar seclusion from the Roman provincials on the south of the walls;" p. 191. But this gives no sort of satisfaction to the mind, as a reason for a new designation. Were they not formerly extra-provincial, as much as in the time of Eumenius? Did they assume a warlike aspect formerly unobserved? Was not their character, in this respect, abundantly well known to Agricola? The idea of Stillington, that the ancient Caledonians, although of Gothic origin, were about this time joined by a new colony from the continent, is at least worthy of mature consideration. V. Orig. p. 246.

Ammianus Marcellinus having said, Pictos Saxonasque, et Scottos et Attacottos, Britannos aerumnis vexasse continuis; Goodall observes, that "it cannot be inferred that the Saxons were Scots or Picts, because these are spoken of as different nations." But from the classification observed by Marcellinus, Pictos Saxonasque, he seems to have viewed these as only different names given to contiguous and kindred nations.

I might refer to the general persuasion of Northern writers, that the Picts were Goths. Vidalinus, in his work, De Linguae Septentrionalis Appellatione, Donsk Tunga, affixed to Gunnlaug. Saga, has cited Torfaeus, Ser. Reg. Dan. pp. 200—203; Pontopiddan, Gest. Dan. T. 2, c. 2, pp. 226, 227; Schoning, Norveg. Reg. Hist.; Torfaeus, Hist. Norv. T. 3, p. 525; Run. Jonas, Element. Ling. Septent.; Bussaeus, Vit. Arii Polphist. c. 3, &c. V. Gunnlaug. Sag. p. 263.

But I shall not urge this as an argument; as it may be said that these writers were all too late to know with certainty the origin of the Picts. While, however, we are assured that the Scandinavians were early acquainted with the northern parts of our island, and made frequent descents on them, it must appear singular indeed, had we reason to believe that they were universally mistaken with respect to the origin of the inhabitants. Had they spoken a dialect of the Celtic, it would have afforded sufficient evidence that there was no national affinity with their invaders.

Nor would it be less remarkable, if almost all our own ancient writers had been grossly mistaken as to the origin of a people, who make so distinguished a figure in our history, and who so long occupied by far the greatest part of Scotland. The general persuasion of the old English writers was the same with theirs.

But the learned gentleman, formerly referred to, views every species of evidence as of no weight whatsoever, when opposed to that of a topographical kind, arising from the names of places in the first and second centuries; especially as these are found in the work of Ptolemy the Geographer. It was my original intention, in this preliminary dissertation, to throw together, as briefly as possible, the various circumstances which indicate the Gothic origin of our ancestors, without entering into the wide field of controversy. But however unpleasant this task, with a gentleman, especially, whose abilities and indefatigable industry I am bound to acknowledge, and who, whatever may be his mistakes, deserves well of his country for the pains he has taken to elucidate her ancient history; yet I find it indispensably necessary to investigate the grounds on which he proceeds, as otherwise any thing here exhibited, under the notion of argument, might be viewed as already invalidated.

In order to erect or support his system, that the Picts were Britons, or the same people with the Welsh, and that no language was spoken in Scotland, before the introduction of what is called the Scoto-Saxon, save the Celtic; the learned writer finds it necessary to assume certain data of a singular description. He either takes for granted, or flatters himself that he has proved, that, till a late period, there were none but Celts in Germany; that the Roman historians are not worthy of credit, in as far as they insinuate any thing opposed to this hypothesis; that the Goths were different from the Scythians; that the Belgic was merely a dialect of the Celtic; and that the stone monuments to be found in Britain were all constructed by Celts.

He assumes that there were none but Celts in Germany till a late period. He does not, indeed, fix the time of the first migration of the Goths into that country; but seems to think that it was scarcely prior to the Christian era. For, as far as I can perceive, the only proof which he appeals to, is that of there being "only two tongues (except the Greek) heard on the western side of the Euxine, the Celtic and the Sarmatic," when Ovid was banished to Tomi by Augustus. But, because there was a body of Goths at this time residing on the Euxine, it cannot amount to a proof that none of this race had previously settled in Germany, or in the northern countries. The Suevi, who certainly were not Celts, were inhabitants of Germany in the time of Julius Caesar, possessing the country now called Mecklenburg, and some neighbouring districts. The Cimbri extended to the Baltic. By many, indeed, they have been viewed as Celts. But the writers of the Universal History, whom Mr. Chalmers often quotes with respect, observe on this head—"The learned Grotius, and after him Sheringham, and most of the northern writers, maintain, with arguments which have not yet been confuted, that the Cimbrians, Getes, and Goths were one and the same nation; that Scandinavia was first peopled by them, and that from thence they sent colonies into the islands of the Baltic, the Chersonesus, and the adjacent places, yet destitute of inhabitants." Vol. xix. 254.

A very able and learned writer, who has paid particular attention to the subject, contends that "the Cimbri, who, in conjunction with the Teutones, invaded Italy, and were defeated by Marius," were Goths. "The country," he says, "whence they proceeded, their close alliance with a Gothic tribe, and the description given of them by the Greek and Latin historians, who appear to have considered them of the same race with the Teutones, clearly prove them to have been of German origin. (Plut. in Mario; Livy, Epit. L. 68; Percy's Preface to Mallet's North. Antiq. p. 38; Mallet, vol. i. 32.) To these considerations it may be added, that the name of their leader, Boiorix, is evidently of Gothic structure; and that Tacitus, who, in his description of Germany, particularly and expressly marks the few tribes who appeared not to be Germans, is entirely silent respecting the Celtic origin of the Cimbri; and in his account points out no difference between them and the other inhabitants. Tacit. Germ. 37." Edin. Rev. for July 1803, pp. 367, 368.

The Suiones have never been viewed as Celts, but generally acknowledged as the more immediate ancestors of the Swedes, although some say, of the Danes. The Sitones, also a Scandinavian nation, were settled in these northern regions before the time of Tacitus. Caesar testifies, that the Teutones and Cimbri, before his time, patrum nostrorum memoria, after harassing all Gaul, had attempted to enter into the territories of the Belgae. Gall. lib. ii. c. 4.

But when ancient writers insinuate any thing unfavourable to our author's hypothesis, he refuses to give them credit. We have seen with what freedom Tacitus is treated on another point. Here he meets with the same treatment, although in good company. "When J. Caesar and Tacitus speak of Celtic colonies proceeding from Gaul into Germany, they only confound those recent colonies with the ancient people, who appear to have been unknown to those celebrated writers. Strabo, who was not well informed with regard to Western Europe, acquaints us, indeed, that the Daci ab antiquo, of old, lived towards Germany, around the fountains of the Danube. Vol. I. 446. If his notion of antiquity extended to the age of Herodotus, we might learn from the father of history, that the Danube had its springs among the Celtae." Caled. p. 15. N.

Respectable as the testimony of Herodotus is, it cannot, in this instance, be preferred to that of Strabo; for it is evident that he knew very little of the Celts, and this only by report. The accurate and intelligent Rennell does not lay much stress on the passage referred to. "Our author," he says, "had heard of the Celtae, who lived beyond the columns of Hercules, and bordered on the Cynesiae or Cynetæ, the most remote of all the nations who inhabited the western parts of Europe.—Who the latter were intended for, we know not." Geog. Syst. of Herod. pp. 41, 42.

If the ancient inhabitants of Germany were unknown to Caesar and Tacitus, with what consistency is it said, only in the page immediately preceding, where the writer speaks of Mascou's work on the ancient Germans, that "the Gothic people," whom he "considers as the first settlers of his country,—obviously came in on the Celtic aborigines; as we learn from J. Caesar and Tacitus?" Caled. p. 14, N. Could these celebrated writers acknowledge the Celts as aborigines, although "the ancient people" who inhabited Germany, "appear to have been unknown to" them?

He also takes it for granted, that the Goths were a different people from the Scythians.

"Every inquiry," he observes, "tends to demonstrate, that the tribes who originally came into Europe by the Hellespont, were remarkably different, in their persons, their manners, and their language, from those people who in after ages migrated from Asia, by the more devious course, around the northern extremities of the Euxine, and its kindred lake. This striking variety must for ever evince the difference between the Gothic and the Scythian hordes, however they may have been confounded by the inaccuracy of some writers, or by the design of others." Ibid. p. 12.

This assertion seems to have at least the merit of novelty. It is probably hazarded by our author, because he wishes it to appear that the Goths did not enter Europe so early as he finds the Scythians did; and also, that the former were never so powerful a race as to be able to people a great part of Europe. But we need not spend time on it; as this passage contains all the proof that is exhibited. I shall only add, that, according to Rennell, the Scythia of Herodotus answers generally to the Ukraine,—“its first river on the west being the Danube.” Geog. Syst. p. 50. Our author admits, that, during the fifth century before our common era, the Goths “inhabited the western shores of the Euxine, on the south of the Danube.” Caled. pp. 12, 13. He places them so nearly on the same spot with Herodotus, that he cannot easily prove that those, whom he calls Goths, were not the same people whom “the father of history” calls Scythians.

The accurate Reviewer, formerly quoted, has shown that, according to Diodorus Siculus, the Scythians settled beyond the Tanais, on the Borders of Thrace, before the time of Sesostris, who, it is supposed, flourished about 1400 A.C. Hence he considers the opinion, independently of its direct evidence, that “500 A.C., they had advanced to the western extremity of Gaul, as by no means absurd or improbable.” Edin. Rev. ut sup. p. 358.

He afterwards shows that Strabo (lib. vii. p. 295, Causab.) “evidently considers the Getae as a Scythian tribe;” adding, “Pliny says, ‘From the Borysthènes, over the whole adjoining country, all are Scythian nations, different tribes of whom dwell near its banks: in one part the Getae, whom the Romans call the Daci.’ Hist. Nat. lib. iv. c. 12. Zamolzis is mentioned by Herodotus, Melp. p. 289; and by Strabo [ut sup.] as worshipped by the Getae; and the authors of the Etymol. Mag., and Suidas, (in voc. Zamolzis) understand the Getae of Herodotus, whom they quote, to be Scythians.” Ibid. p. 359.

Perhaps the strangest foundation of Mr. C.’s theory, is his opinion with respect to the language of the Belgae. He is well aware, that if it appear from ancient history that their speech was Gothic, his whole fabric must fall to the ground; because it is undeniable, that Belgic colonies were settled in Britain before the invasion by Julius Caesar. To me, the existence of the Belgae in Britain, when it was first visited by the Romans, had always appeared an irrefragable proof that the Gothic language was very early spoken, if not in the northern, at least in the southern, parts of our island; and of itself a strong presumption that it was pretty generally extended along the eastern coast. But our author boldly cuts the Gordian knot; finding it easier, doubtless, to do so than to loose it.

“The British Belgae,” he says, “were of a Celtic lineage.”—“This inquiry with regard, both to the lineage and colonization of the Belgae in Britain, has arisen, by inference, rather than by direct information, from J. Caesar, when he speaks of the Belgae as occupying one-third of Gaul, and as using a different tongue from the other Gauls. De Bell. Gall. l. i. c. 1. Yet from the intimations of Livy and Strabo, Pliny and Lucan, we may infer, that J. Caesar meant dialect, when he spoke of language. He ought to be allowed to explain his own meaning by his context. He afterwards says, ‘that the Belgae were chiefly descended from the Germans; and, passing the Rhine, in ancient times, seized the nearest country of the Gauls.’ Ibid. Lib. ii. c. 4. But Germany, as we have seen, was possessed by the Celtæ, in ancient times,” &c. Caled. p. 16. N.

It is evident that the learned writer, notwithstanding the force of historical evidence to the contrary, is extremely unwilling to admit any distinct migration of the Belgæ to Britain. For he adds—"It is even probable, that the Belgæ of Kent (Cantæ) may have obtained from their neighbours the Belgæ of Gaul, their Gaelic name; and even derived such a tincture from their intercourse, both in their speech and in their habits, as to appear to the undistinguishing eyes of strangers, to be of a doubtful descent."

It is asserted that Caesar gives no direct information as to the Belgæ using a different tongue from the other Gauls. He does not, indeed, give any information of this kind. For, although he uses the common name for the country into which the Belgæ had forced their way, calling it Gallia, he expressly distinguishes them from the Gauls. With respect to the difference of the language of this different people, he gives the most direct information. So little ground is there for the most remote idea that he meant only a peculiar dialect, that he uses all those distinguishing modes of expression which could be deemed necessary for characterizing a different race. He marks this difference, not merely in language, but in customs and laws. "Hi omnes lingua, institutis, legibus inter se differunt." Lib. i. c. 1. After the lapse of many centuries, every traveller observes the strong attachment of the Celts, not only to their language, but to their customs; and can it be supposed that they were so thoroughly changed by residing a few centuries in Belgium, although surrounded by kindred tribes? Caesar does not speak like a man who was only throwing out a vague opinion. For he elsewhere informs us, that in consequence of particular inquiry, which he personally made at the deputies of the Rhemi, who of the Belgæ were most contiguous to Gaul, "he found that the greatest part of the Belgæ were sprung from the Germans, and that they had anciently crossed the Rhine, and taken up their abode there, because of the fertility of the country, and expelled the Gauls who inhabited these places." Lib. ii. c. 4.

Is it not evident from this language, that not only Caesar considered the Gauls as a different race from the Germans, but that these deputies were fully persuaded of the same thing? Had they known, or even suspected, that the inhabitants of Germany were originally the same people with the Gauls, would they not naturally have said, that they had sprung from the Gauls of Germany, and not from those of Gallia? Does not the term ortos properly refer to the people or kindred, and not to any former place of residence?

If a single doubt can remain, with respect to the certainty of the migration of the Belgæ to Britain, after it had been possessed by the Celts, it must be removed by attending to what the same historian says in another place. "The interior part of Britain is inhabited by those who, according to tradition, were the aborigines; the maritime parts, by those who, for the sake of war and spoil, passed over from Belgia, who are almost all denominated from those states from which they had their origin; and who began to cultivate the lands which they had conquered. The number of men is infinite," &c. Lib. v. c. 12.

An attempt is made to avoid the force of Caesar's testimony concerning the origin of the Belgæ from the Germans, when it is said, "But Germany, as we have seen, was possessed by the Celtae in ancient times." This, however, is fairly to beg the question. Mr. Chalmers may persuade himself that he has seen this; but, to others, the proof must appear extremely deficient. Although Caesar asserts that the Belgæ differed from the Celts in language, customs, and laws; yet we must believe that he meant nothing more than that there was some slight difference in dialect. Although he asserts that they were mostly sprung from the Germans, we must believe that by them he either meant Gauls, or was not acquainted with his subject. The reader may take his choice; for, in the course of two pages, both these assertions are made.

The learned gentleman seems, indeed, to have overlooked an historical fact of the greatest importance in this inquiry, which has been stated in the clearest light by a well-informed writer, to whom I have had occasion to refer more than once. This respects the application of the name Celts, as used by ancient historians.

“The Greek authors appears to use Κελτικη and Γαλαταια, and the corresponding names of the inhabitants, as strictly synonymous: they apply them sometimes to Gaul in general; at other times the context proves that they are used in their original sense. But Belgic Gaul and its inhabitants are most frequently denoted by the words, Κελτικη and Κελται. The Belgae appear to have attracted most of the attention of these historians; and their description of them is so uniform and accurate, that no doubt can be entertained that they mean the Belgic Gauls, although they call them Κελται. Strabo, speaking of the inhabitants of Britain, says—‘The men are taller than the Gauls (των Κελτων), and their hair less yellow.’ Lib. iv. p. 194, 200. In his description of Germany, ‘Immediately beyond the Rhine, to the east of the Celts, the Germans live, differing little from the Celtic race (του Κελτικου), in their savageness, tallness, and yellowness of hair; and with respect to features, customs, and modes of life, very like the Gauls (τους Κελτους), whom we have already described: wherefore it is our opinion that the Romans have given them very properly the name Germani, implying the common origin of the Gauls (Γαλατας) and them.’ Lib. vii. p. 290. The faithfulness and exact information of this author are well known: we may, therefore, consider his description of the Gauls as accurate: but it will apply only to the German or Belgic Gauls. Yellow or red hair distinguished a German tribe. There was no resemblance between the Celts and Germans. Diodorus Siculus gives a very particular description of Gaul (Γαλαταια, Κελτικη); and it is evident that these terms are frequently employed when he is speaking of that part which Caesar, from whom he has taken his description, says was inhabited by the Belgae. He also expressively says,—‘The Gauls (Γαλαται) are tall, fair skinned, and naturally yellow haired.’ Lib. v. p. 212. Polybius, our author asserts, describes the Gauls who pillaged Rome under Brennus, as Celts: he certainly calls them Celts (Γαλαται, Κελται); but his enumeration and description of their different tribes puts it beyond a doubt that they were German Gauls. He particularly names and describes the Veneti, Semnones, and Boii. Lib. ii. p. 42, Edit. Bas. 1549. We have the express testimony of Strabo, that the first were German Gauls, Lib. iv. p. 194; and the others are enumerated by Tacitus among the tribes of Germany; Tacit. Germ. c. 38, 39. It may be objected, that Polybius mentions the Gauls as coming from a country very remote from any assigned to them by Tacitus and Strabo. But, in the time of the first historian, the Romans were entirely ignorant of Germany, and knew very little of Transalpine Gaul, and therefore could not mention the names or situation of the country whence the invaders originally came. Polybius says, they proceeded into Italy from the adjoining territory on the north: this would be directly on their route from Germany: and as they had most probably occupied it for some time, Polybius, both from this circumstance and his want of information, would consider it as their original or permanent residence. Longolius, in his edition of Taciti Germania, shews that the appellations, Semnones and Boii, are evidently derived from the Gothic, and particularly applicable to the situation and manners of those tribes. Tacit. Germ. edit. Longol. c. 38, 39. Pausanias calls both the Celtic and Belgic inhabitants of Gaul, Γαλαται and Κελται; but as his authority is less important, and his descriptions not so full and definite, we shall only refer to him. Pausanias, Lib. i. pp. 16, 62, 66; Lib. x. p. 644, &c. Edit. Sylbur. Hanov. 1613.

"It is still more evident that the terms Gallia and Galli are frequently employed by the Latin authors, when their observations and descriptions are applicable only to Belgic Gaul and its inhabitants. We need not illustrate this point by the examination of any particular passages, as it is generally admitted, and easily proved." Edin. Rev. ut sup. pp. 366, 367.

But the assumptions of the learned writer, which we have considered, are merely preparatory to the etymological evidence from TOPOGRAPHY, which he views as an irrefragable proof of his hypothesis. We shall first advert to what is said in order to shew that the Belgae were Celts.

"The topography of the five Belgic tribes of Southern Britain," he observes, "has been accurately viewed by a competent surveyor [Whitaker, Genuine Hist. of Britons, pp. 83-145], and the names of their waters, of their head-lands, and of their towns, have been found, by his inquisitive inspection, to be only significant in the Celtic tongue." Caled. p. 16.

Candour requires that it should be admitted, that the Celtic dialects seem to excel the Gothic in expressive names of a topographical kind. The Celts have undoubtedly discovered greater warmth of fancy, and a more natural vein for poetical description, than the Gothic or Teutonic tribes. Their nomenclatures are, as it were, pictures of the countries which they inhabit. But at the same time, their explanations must be viewed with reserve, not only because of the vivid character of their imagination, but on account of the extreme ductility of their language, which, from the great changes which it admits in a state of construction, has a far more ample range than any of the Gothic dialects. Hence, an ingenious Celt, without the appearance of much violence, could derive almost any word from his mother-tongue. Our author has very properly referred to Bullet's Dictionnaire, in proof of "the great variety of the Celtic tongue;" Caled. p. 221. For any one, who consults that work, must see what uncertain ground he treads on in the pursuit of Celtic etymons.

The learned gentleman asserts, that the names in the five Belgic provinces of South Britain are "only significant in the Celtic tongue." I dare not pretend to say that I can give the true meaning of any of them, in another language; because there is little more than conjecture on either side. But if it can be proved, that they may have a signification, in the Gothic or Teutonic, as well as in the Celtic—and one at least fully as probable—this argument must appear inconclusive.

"The Belgic Cantae, in Kent," he says, "derived their significant name from the districts which they inhabited; being the British Caint, signifying the open country." This observation he applies, and it must apply equally well, to "the Cantae in North Britain;" p. 17. By the way, it may be observed, that this is a description of which our author seems peculiarly fond; although it is of a very general nature. For, as he says, p. 201, that the Picts received from the British provincials the descriptive appellation of Peithw, which “denoted the people of the open country;” in the very same page, explaining Venta, the name of a town, he derives it from “British gwent, which, in composition, is went, signifying the open country.” This also shows the flexibility of the language; as the same word may be either caint, gwent, or went. But might not the Cantae receive their name from Alem. and Germ. kant, an extremity, a corner; margo, extremitas, angulus? Does not this more particularly describe the situation? Schilter, I find, vo. Kant, has made the same observation which had occurred to me, He refers to Caesar, who indeed describes Kent as if he had viewed the name as descriptive of its situation; Cujus unum latus est contra Galliam: hujus lateris alter angulus—est ad Cantium. Bell. Gall. Lib. v. 13. It is also far more descriptive than Brit. gwent, of the situation of the Cantae in North Britain, who inhabited the East of Ross-shire; and whose country, as our author observes, p. 66, “ran out eastward into the narrow point” now called Tarbet-ness. There is at least one river in Kent, the name of which is not British. This is the Medway, A. S. Medwaege, i. e. the river which runs through the middle of the country, or holds the midway. It is probable that this was the Belg. name, which the A.-Saxons retained, because the Welsh call Maidstone, Caer Medwag, i. e. the city on Medway. V. Camden. The term Waeg or way appears indeed in the name given to it in the Itinerary of Antonine, Vagniacas.

Mr. Chalmers derives the name of the Thames from Brit. Taw, Tam, &c. “signifying what expands or spreads, or what is calm.” This river, which is one of the boundaries of Kent, has also been explained as significant in a Goth. dialect, by a writer who had no interest in the present question. “There are two rivers in England,” he says, “of which the one is very rapid, and is called Tif-ur, whence at tif-a, praecipit ire: the other Temsa, which is almost stagnate, whence at temsa.” He explains eg tems-a, paululum moveor. G. Andr. p. 237.

In Kent, according to Antonine’s Itinerary, three towns have Dur as the initial syllable, Durovernum, Durolenum, and Durobrivi, or as Camden says, more correctly, Durobrovae. Dur, it has been said, in British and Irish, signifies water; Caled. p. 17, N. But the idea is too general and indefinite, to have given rise to so many names as, in different counties, exhibit this as a component term; as Batavodurum, a Belgic town, now Durstede, &c. Schilter has observed, that, in composition, it signifies a door or mouth, ostium. Now, although the word occurs in Celtic compositions, it seems originally Teutonic. The primary idea is janua, a door, which sense it still retains in almost all the dialects of this language. Brit. dor has the same meaning. But the Teut. term is far more general.

The Regni of Sussex were another Belgic tribe. Baxter says, that Ptolemy wrote Regni for Renci; and derives the name from C. B. rheng, quavis longus ordo, as lying along the coast. He admits that Belg. renc has the same meaning, ordo, series; also flexus, flexus viarum, &c.; Kilian. It has therefore at least an equal claim with the British. The only city mentioned by Ptolemy in this district is Noviomagus. Magus, according to Wachter, is a Celt. word signifying a field, also a colony or town in a field. It frequently occurs in the composition of continental names, en being used for the Latin termination us. But although magus should be originally Celt., the name seems to have been formed by a Teutonic people, nowio being evidently Teut. nieww, new. C. B. newydd is synon., but more remote. This name is the very same with the ancient one of Nimeguen, Teut. Nieuwmegen. This is Noviomagus, i. e. the new colony or town.

The proper Belgæ possessed at least part of Somersetshire, besides Hampshire and Wiltshire. Bath was the Badiza, or, as Baxter reads, the Badiza of Stephans. This the British called Caer badon. But it is evident that the name is not Brit. but Belg. Germ. Franc. Belg. bad, A. S. baeth, Alem. pad, balneum; Alem. Franc. bad-on, Germ. bad-en, A. S. baeth-an, lavare. Ptolemy mentions Uzella aestuarium, which Camden says, is now called Euel-mouth. Now Goth. os signifies the mouth of a river. Thus Uzella would seem exactly to correspond to the modern name; q. os-euel, the mouth of the Euel. To this day, Oyse, in Shetland, where the Celtic never entered, signifies "an inlet of the sea;" Brand's Descr. p. 70.

As the names of many of the Belgic towns end in Dun or Dinum, Mr. Chalmers attempts to show that the Belgæ must have been Celts, because "Dunum and Dinum are the latinized form of Dun and Din, which, in the British and Irish, as well as in the ancient Gothic, signify a fortified place;" Caled. p. 17, N. But if dun has this signification in the ancient Gothic, the argument proves nothing. From what he has stated, the presumption is that it was originally a Goth. and not a Celt. term. For, as he says, that "Dunum is the name of the chief town of the Cauci in Ireland, which is asserted to be a Belgic tribe;" it is questionable if any of the other towns, having this termination, were Celtic. Londinum and Camelodunum were Belgic towns, being situated in the territories of the Trinovantes. Maridunum, according to Baxter, who reads Margidunum, is from Teut. maerg, marl, which is copiously found in the neighbourhood, and dun, town. He says that, in the modern British, mer signifies medulla. But in the old Brit. the term for marl is the same with that now used in English. It may be added that Germ. dun, as signifying civitas, urbs, is only the term, properly signifying an inclosure, locus septus, used in a secondary sense. It is derived from tyn-en, sepire. V. Wachter, vo. Dun.

It has been asserted, that "there is a radical difference in the formation of the Celtic and Gothic names which furnishes the most decisive test for discriminating the one language from the other in topographic disquisitions; and even in the construction of the two tongues: such vocables as are prefixed in the formation of the British and Gaelic names are constantly affixed in the composition of the Gothic, the Saxon, and English names.—Those tests are so decisive as to give the means of discriminating the Celtic from the Saxon or Gothic names, when the form of the vocables compounded are nearly the same." Caled. p. 491. Without disputing the propriety of this position, it is sufficient to observe that, if this be so decisive a test, although the names of places terminating in Dun, Dunum, &c. are elsewhere (p. 17) claimed as Celtic, it must be evident that the claim is unjust. Londinum, Vindonum, Milsidunum, Camelodunum, Rigadunum, Maridunum, &c. must all be Gothic names.

It is a strong assertion, which the learned writer has made, that "the topography of Scotland, during the two first centuries of our common era—contains not a particle of Gothicism;" p. 231. "The Carnabii, Damni, and Cantae, of Scotland are granted to have been Belgic tribes;" Ibid. pp. 16, 17, N. The Carnabii, or with greater approximation to the orthography of Ptolemy, Cornabii, have been supposed to receive their name from the three great promontories which they possessed in Caithness, Noss-head, Duncansby-Head, and the Dunnet-Head. For corn in Brit. is said to signify a promontory. But the name might be derived, in the same sense, from Belg. koer, specula, a watch-tower, and nebbe, a promontory; q. the people who looked attentively from the promontories. Or, if it should be Carnabii, it may be from O. Goth. kar, a man, whence Su. G. karl, A. S. ceorl, id. V. Karl, Ihre, and Verel. Ind. This most probably gives us the origin of a number of names, beginning with Car, which Mr Pinkerton has mentioned, without adverting to the use of the term in Gothic (Enquiry, l. 226;) as the Careni and Carnonacae of Scotland, the Carini of ancient Germany, the Carbilesi and Carbiletæ of Thrace, the Carni, &c. &c. The latter part of the word may be from Nabaei or Navaia, the river Navern. Virvedr-um, Duncansby-head, may be composed of Isl. ver, ora, and vedr, tempestas, q. the stormy coast.

Concerning Berubium, Noss-head, it has been said, that "the word Bery would seem to have been a common appellation to such places, as Dungsby Head, at those times [when Ptolemy wrote]. At this day, a similar promontory in the island of Walls in Orkney, is termed the Bery. The word is clearly of Norwegian derivation. It signifies a place of observation; or a principal station for discovering the approach of an enemy by sea, when at a great distance." P. Canisbay, Statist. Acc. viii. 163. By mistake, however, the writer applies the name Berubium to Dungsby Head. He says, that "there is not a place throughout the parish, whose name indicates the least affinity to" the Gaelic. Tarvedr-um may be from taer-a, atterere, and vedr, tempestas; the promontory where the storm rends or tears ships.

We have already adverted to the meaning of the name Cantae. In the territory of this tribe was the Vara Aestuarium, or Murray Frith, into which runs the river Beaulie, anciently called Farar. Isl. vara, voer in Genit. varar, signifies ora, portus, a harbour, ubi appellat naves; G. Andr. p. 247. Loxa, the name given by Ptolemy to the Murray Frith, may be allied to Isl. loka, a small harbour, porta parva; Verel. These etymons have at least as much probability as those of Baxter; who deduces Varar from C. B. gvar ar isc, maris collum, the neck of the sea, and Loxa from ael osc, supercilium aquae, the brow of the water. Mr. Chalmers says, that the latter "obviously derived its name from the British Lluch, with a foreign termination, signifying an inlet of the sea, or collection of water;" p. 66, N. But the Goth. dialects exhibit this word with far greater variety of use; Su. G. A. S. Alem. log, laga, a lake; Isl. log, laug, lug, a sea, a collection of waters; Su. G. loeg-a, profluente unda vel mare se proluere; Isl. log-ast, fluvium vel aquam tranare; Alem. lauche, collectio aquarum, &c. &c.

He thinks that the Catini, whose name is retained in Caithness, "probably derived their appellation from the British name of the weapon, the Cat, or Catai, wherewith they fought," q. clubmen; p. 67. But the Cateia was a weapon of the ancient Germans. If the testimony of Virgil merits regard, it belonged not to a Celtic but to a Teutonic people.

Teutonico ritu soliti torquere cateias.—Aen. Lib. vii.

For this reason, the Cateia was also called Teutona. Hence Aelfric in his A. S. Gl. says, Clava vel Cateia, vel Teutona, annes cynnes gesceot, i. e. "a javeline of the same kind." Servius informs us that spears were called Cateiae in the Teutonic language." Wachter says, "It is properly a javelin, denominated from katt-en, i. e. because of its being thrown."

This etymon pretty clearly indicates that they were Belgae. They might perhaps be the same people with the Catti, a German nation mentioned by Tacitus. Their name, according to Wachter, signifies warlike, from the Celtic word cat, war.

In the specimens which our author has given of the names of Promontories, Rivers, &c. in North Britain, it is granted that many are undoubtedly Celtic. It is not, however, a satisfactory proof of the British origin of the Picts, that many British names are yet retained in the country which they possessed. For, while it is said that the Scoto-Saxon afterwards prevailed over the Gaelic, it is admitted that the Celtic names of places, whether British or Gaelic, still kept their ground. It is also well known, that in various parts of England, where the descendants of the Anglo-Saxons have resided for upwards of thirteen centuries, the names of some rivers and mountains are still British. Lhuyd even goes so far as to assert, that the names of different rivers are not Welsh or Armorican, but of Irish or Gaelic origin: whence he infers, that those who now speak the Irish language, possessed the southern parts of Britain before the Welsh, and that the latter were only a secondary colony from Gaul. Now, if this be the case as to the Welsh, who have possessed that country for nearly two thousand years, might not the same thing happen in the northern part of the island? V. Lhuyd's Lett. to the Welsh, Transl. pp. 12, 17.

The very same process passes before our own eyes. Do not the British settlers in America very generally retain the Indian names of rivers, bays, mountains, villages, &c. May it therefore be justly inferred, a thousand years hence, that the British were an Indian people?

The author of Caledonia observes, p. 221—"In the subsequent progress of the Gothic tribes over Europe, wherever they occupied countries which had been previously occupied by the Celts, the Gothic intruders not only adopted the names of the rivers, mountains, and other places, that the more lively genius of the Celts had imposed, from a more energetic and descriptive speech; but the Gothic colonists borrowed many terms from the more opulent language of their Celtic predecessors.—The Saxons, who settled in Britain, were prompted, by the poverty of their speech, to follow the example of their Gothic fathers."

Is not this sufficient to invalidate the argument in favour of the British origin of the Picts? If Goths, it is natural to suppose that, like the rest of their brethren, they would retain the Celtic names.

This assertion, however, must not be carried too far. For, notwithstanding the concession frequently made by Schilter and Wachter, that words retained in Germany, to which they could not assign a Gothic origin, are Celtic; other learned writers have viewed the matter in a different light. Leibnitz concludes, from Boxborn's Brit. Dict., that the Welsh have borrowed a great deal from the German. Oper. Vol. IV. P. I. Hist. p. 193. The truth seems to be, as Ihre candidly acknowledges, that some of the most ancient and primitive terms, common to the Gothic and Celtic dialects, are so nearly allied, that it is impossible to determine with certainty to which of them they have originally belonged.

Many of the words, indeed, which the learned writer has selected as exclusively British, appear in the Goth. dialects. Cove, it is said, signifies a creek, from C. B. cof, a hollow trunk, a cavity, a belly. But A. S. cofe, Isl. and Germ. kofe, seem to give the proper sense; spelunca, a cave. Cove-harbour (St. Vigeans, P. Forfars.), is mentioned as confirming the other sense. But its proper name is East-haven. The coves in its vicinity are not creeks, but caves. Kyle, p. 34, a strait, is not confined to Celt. V. Diet. in vo. Heugh, p. 35, a height on the sea-coast, is traced to C. B. uch, high, &c. But the term is strictly Goth. V. Diet. The words having port, a harbour, in their composition, are very oddly claimed as C. B. Forth, it is said, p. 36, N., is merely C. B. porth, a haven, being "the great haven of Edinburgh." Far more accurately might it be deduced from Isl. fiord, Su. G. faerd, a firth. But more probably, the frith took the name of the river, a name which it bears far above Stirling. There is no necessity that Ram, as signifying a point, in a variety of names (p. 36) should be traced to ram, high, or in C. B. what projects. Su. G. and Germ. ram will answer fully as well; ora, margo; terminus. Rin, Rynd, Rhind, denoting a point, may all be traced to Isl. rind-a, protrudo, whence rind-ung, protrusio; or may be the same with Alem. rin, terminus, limes, finis, from rin-en, separare. Ross, a promontory, p. 37, may be allied to Teut. roetse, rootse, rupes, petra, sive mons praeruptus; Franc. roz, id. Although C. B. trwyn signifies a nose, a snout, and Corn. tron, a nose, a promontory, they seem originally the same with Isl. triona, rostrum porrectum.

Among the Rivers, &c., p. 37, the first mentioned are White Adder, and Black Adder, the term being traced to C. B. aweddur, running water. But although written, in some of the Statist. Accounts, Whittader and Whittater, the vulgar pronunciation is merely given. In four instances, where the first of these denominations is explained, it is resolved, as all the South of Scotland knows it ought to be, into White water. Allan, Alwen, Elwin, and Atn, p. 38, are claimed as of Brit. origin. Alem. ellende denotes impetus, from ell-en, festinare. Sw. elf, however, signifies a river; in its inflected form, elfwen or elven. Hence, as has been supposed, the Elb in Germany, Lat. Alb-is. Air is traced to C. B. air, brightness, or aer, violence. Isl. aer corresponds to the latter, furious; aer-ast, to rage, aer-a, to raise to fury. Avon, a river, may be allied to Su. G. aa, water, in general, a river, which assumes the inflected form of aan. V. Rudbeck. Atlant. ii. 52. Bannocburn does not appear to be a dimin. from Gael. ban, as in p. 39, but a Goth. name: V. BANNOCK in Diet. Bello (C. B. bellaw, a tumultuous raging stream): Isl. bell-a, to be driven with noise, and aa, water. The name Bran (O. Gael. a stream, C. B. what rises over, p. 39), may originate from its lucidity; Germ. brand, clear, bright.

The rivers which have the name Calder, are derived from Brit. caled-dur, the hard water, or cell-dur, Ir. coill-dur, the woody water, p. 40. The latter is most natural; because, when this name was given, it must be supposed that the country was almost one wood. Isl. kaelda signifies an impure spring of water, or living water in putrid and marshy ground; V. G. Andr. The Dean (p. 41), might properly enough be traced to Germ. dien-en, humiliare, as it is a very flat stream, that creeps along through Strathmore; as den, a small dale, seems to acknowledge the same origin, q. locus depressus. Don and Doon derived from C. B. down, Ir. don, dark, dusky; or douin, deep, may be from Goth. don-a strepere, to make a noise.

Eden (deduced from C. B. eddain, a gliding stream, p. 43), might be traced to A. S. ea, water, a river; and den, a vale. The very prevalent name of Esk, notwithstanding its evident affinity to O. Gaul. csc, wysc, C. B. wysg, Is. easc, uisg, water, a stream, a river, cannot reasonably disclaim all Goth. affinity. For Isl. wass is the genitive of wattn, water, G. Andr. pp. 248, 249, the form of which is retained in Germ. wasser, aqua, fluvius. Wachter observes, that Belg. esch or asch denotes a stream. This he indeed views as formed from Celt. isaa. But this is at least very doubtful; for this good reason, that the Goth. dialects retain the obvious origin of the name for water, as well as the primary idea, in vos, perfusio aquæ, &c.; V. Dict. vo. WEEZE, v. For, as the learned Hyde says, the reason why water has received this name is plainly because it ouseth out. Hence he expl. Oxford, q. ouse-fort, either the ford, or the castle, on the water. Even the designation Car-leon-ur-usc, i. e. the city of the Legion on the river, is not exclusively Celt. For Wormius, in like manner, thus explains Dan. os or ois; Ostium fluminis; vel sinum maris notat.; Monum. Dan. pp. 195-196. The Runic letter O, or Oys, is thus defined; Sinus maris promontoriis acutioribus excurrentibus, nautis infestis: vel etiam ostium maris portum navibus preebens. Literat. Run. c. xvi. p. 87: V. also Jun. Gl. Goth. p. 22. To this day, Isl. aros signifies the mouth of the river; Verel.

Nothing can be inferred from Ey, in Eymouth, &c. p. 44; for it is unquestionably Goth. If it appears in Celt. in the forms of aw, ew, ea, ey, a river, we find Su. G. a, Su. G. Isl. aa, A. S. ea, pl. aea, Alem. aha, id. Germ. ache, elementum aquæ, Moes. G. aguha, id.; V. Ihre, vo. Aa, amnis. Garry (derived from C. B. garw, Ir. garbh, what is rough, a torrent), may be resolved into A. S. gare, gearw, expeditus, and ea, aqua, q. the rapid stream, S. the yare stream. Lyne (C. B. what is in motion, what flows, p. 46), may be allied to Isl. lin-ur, Germ. lind, mild gentle. Lunan is traced to Celt. lun, lon, lyn, what flows, water, a lake, a pool. Isl. lon, stagnum, lacuna. Now, it is admitted, that "the Lunan in Angus, from its tranquil flow, settles into a number of small pools." There is no necessity for deriving Lid, which indeed seems the proper name of the river vulgarly called Liddal or Liddel, from C. B. llid, "a violent effusion, a gush;" or "O. Gaulish lid, hasty, rapid," p. 47. It may be traced to Teut. lijd, transitus, lyd-en, to glide; to Alem. lid, liquor; to Isl. lid, a bending; lid-a, to hasten, to pass with flight; or to A. S. hlid, hlyd, tumult, noise, like Lid in Devonshire, whence Lid-ford, A. S. hlyda-ford, which Somner thinks denominated from its noisy motion. Nid is derived from C. B. nidd, neth, "a stream that forms whirls or turns," p. 47. A. S. nithe is used in a similar sense; nithe cne, genibus flexis, with bent knees, from nith-an, deorsum. Nethy and Nethan are said to be diminutives of the C. B. word. But Nethan is probably from A. S. neothan, downwards, q. what descends; and Nethy may be q. neoth-ea, the water which descends, or the stream that is lower, in respect of some other. On Orr in Fife, and Orr, Urr, in Galloway, Mr. C. refers to C. B. or, cold, wyr, signifying a brisk flow, Basque ura, water, a river, p. 48. Su. G. ur denotes stormy weather; Alem. ur a river, because by inundation it lays waste like a wild beast; Isl. orra, Martis impetus. Pool, in several compound words, is referred to C. B. poll, Arm. poull, Gael. poll, a ditch, a pool; and it is said that A. S. pol is from the C. B., this word being "in all the dialects of the Celtic, but not in any of the pure Gothick dialects;" p. 48. But Teut. poel is palus, lacuna, stagnum; Su. G.

poel, Isl. poel-a, and Germ. pful, id. Tay and Teviot are both derived from C. B. ta, law, "what spreads or expands; also, tranquil." Isl. teig-ia also signifies to extend. G. Andr. deduces Tif-r, the name of a very rapid river, from tyf-a, praeceps pedare; Germ. tav-en, diffluere, to flow abroad. Tweed,—"C. B. tuedd, signifies what is on a side, or border; the border or limit of a country;" p. 49. This etymon is pretty consonant to modern ideas. But when the name was imposed, Tweed did not suggest the idea of a border any more than Tay, &c. Allicd perhaps to Isl. thwaette, twuette, to wash, from twaa, id., as a river is said to wash a country. A. S. twaede signifies double, and may denote something in reference to the river. This name being given to it in Annandale, we cannot well suppose it to originate from the junction of the Tiviot, and what is called Tweed; although these rivers are so nearly of a size, that one might be at a loss to say which of the names should predominate. Tyne,—"C. B. tain, a river, or running water." Isl. tyn-a, to collect, q. the gathering of waters. Hence, perhaps, Teut. tyne, lacus.

Yarrow, p. 50, to which the same origin with Garry is ascribed, may have been formed from gearw, as above; or from ge, the A. S. prefix, and arewa, an arrow, as denoting its rapidity. According to Wachter, Germ. arf, id. is used in this figurative sense. For he says that Arabo, a river which joins the Danube, has its name from arf, an arrow, because of its rapid motion. Ythan, the Ituna of Richard, is deduced "from Brit. edlain, or ethain, which signifies gliding," as being "a slow running stream. Might it not be traced to A. S. yth, unda, yth-ian, to flow?"

Among the names of Miscellaneous Districts, appears Dal, as signifying a flat field, or meadow, from Brit. dol, Ir. dal, id. p. 53. But this term appears in all the Goth. dialects, for a valley; Moes. G. dalei, A. S. dael, Su. G. Belg. dal, Isl. dal-ur, Alem. tal, tuol, &c. Besides, this is the precise sense of C. B. dól, as given by Lhuyd, vallis; and Ir. dal has no affinity, as explained by O'Brien. For it signifies a share, a portion, evidently the same with Teut. deel, Su. G. del, &c. Nothing can be inferred from the names including Eagles, or Eccles, which our author derives from Brit. eglwys, Ir. eaglais, &c. a church. For they are merely the corruptions of the Lat. name imposed by the monks. Thus the proper writing, of one of the names mentioned, is not Eccles-Magirdle, but Ecclesia-Magirdle. Nothing is done, unless it can be proved that the Gr. word εκκλησία was borrowed from the Celtic. If Fordun, Kincardines. and Forden, Perth. be properly derived from Brit. ford, a passage, a road, the Goth. would have an equal claim; A. S. ford, a ford, fore, iter, Su. G. focre, viae facilitas.

Rayne, Aberd. is traced to C. B. rhann, Ir. rann, rain, "a portion, a division, a division of lands among brothers;" p. 56. Isl. ren, signifies the margin or border of a field; whence rend, ager limitatus; Verel.

Here I only shall add, that the learned writer goes so far as to assert that the very "name of the Belgae was derived from the Celtic, and not a Teutonic origin." "The root," he adds, "is the Celtic Bel, signifying tumult, havock, war; Bela, to wrangle, to war; Belac, trouble, molestation; Belawg, apt to be ravaging; Belg, an overwhelming, or bursting out; Belgiad, one that outruns, a ravager, a Belgian; Belgws, the ravagers, the Belgae;" p. 17.

This, although it were true, would prove nothing as to the origin of the Belgae. For we might reasonably enough suppose that the name had been given them by the neighbouring Celts, who had suffered so much from them, as they invaded and took possession of part of their territories. But as our author commends the Glossaries of Schilter and Wachter as elaborate, p. 16, N. (b), as he justly acknowledges the writers to be “vastly learned,” p. 12, their sentiments merit some regard. Schilter says—“That the name of the Belgæ is German, certainly hence appears, that this people were of a German origin, and having crossed the Rhine, vanquished the Gauls in these lands which they occupied.” He then cites the passage from Caesar, formerly considered, adding—“This migration took place before the irruption of the Cimbri and Teutones, which was A. 111 before Christ; because Caesar says that this was Patrum memoria nostrum, but the other must have been long before, because he uses the term antiquitus.” He derives the name from Alem. belg-en, to be enraged, a term used by Notker, and still in Alsace and Belgium. Thus Belgæ is explained as equivalent to, indignabundi et irritabiles.

Wachter seems to give the same etymon, vo. Balgen. He observes, that ancient writers everywhere mark the wrathful disposition of the Belgæ; and particularly Josephus, Antiq. L. xix. c. 1. Bell. Jud. c. 16, when he calls the Germans “men naturally irascible,” and ascribes to them “fury more vehement than that of wild beasts.”

II.—But besides the evidence arising from history, it certainly is no inconsiderable proof that the northern parts of Scotland were immediately peopled from the North of Europe by a Gothic race, that otherwise no satisfactory account can be given of the introduction of the VULGAR LANGUAGE.

It has been generally supposed, that the Saxon language was introduced into Scotland in the reign of Malcolm Canmore, by his good queen and her retinue; or partly by means of the intercourse which prevailed between the inhabitants of Scotland, and those of Cumberland, Northumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham, which were held by the kings of Scotland as fiefs of the crown of England. An English writer, not less distinguished for his amiable disposition and candour, than for the cultivation of his mind, has objected to this hypothesis with great force of argument.

“This conjecture,” he says, “does not seem to be perfectly satisfactory; nor are the causes in themselves sufficient to have wholly changed the language of the country. If, at the present moment, the Celtic language prevailed over the whole of Scotland, instead of being confined to the Highlands, such a testimony would compel them to admit, either that the Saxons and Danes had been prevented by some unaccountable cause from attempting to form a settlement on the northern shores of this island; or that their attempts had been rendered abortive by the superior bravery and skill of the inhabitants. But, as the same Teutonic dialects are found to form the basis of the language, both in England and in the lowlands of Scotland, Mr. Hume has been induced, and apparently with great reason, to infer, from this similarity of speech, a similar series of successive invasions; although this success is not recorded by the historians of Scotland.

“If this conclusion be admitted, it is evidently unnecessary to refer us to the much later period of Malcolm’s reign; or to seek in his marriage with an English princess, in his distributions of lands among his followers, or in the policy which induced him to change his place of residence, for the establishment of a language, which the Saxons and Danes could not fail of bringing with them; and which, if it had not been thus introduced, the inhabitants of the plains would probably have rejected as obstinately as those of the mountains." Ellis's Spec. Anc. Engl. Poet. I. 226, &c.

To suppose, indeed, that a few foreign adherents of a court, received as refugees, could change the language of a country, is to form the idea of something which would appear in history as a fact completely insulated. Whether the same elegant writer be right or not in his opinion, that William the Conqueror did not think of eradicating the Saxon language, his reasoning, abstractedly viewed, is certainly just. "William must have known that the Franks who conquered Gaul, and his own ancestors who subdued Neustria, had not been able to substitute the Teutonic for the Romance language, in their dominions; that the measure was not at all necessary to the establishment of their power; and that such an attempt is, in all cases, no less impracticable than absurd, because the patient indocility of the multitude must ultimately triumph over the caprice of their armed preceptors." Ibid. pp. 38, 39.

It is undeniable, indeed, that the Norman-French, although it had every advantage, and retained its ascendancy at court for several ages, was at length even there borne down by the Saxon, which had still been spoken by the vulgar. The Romans, although they conquered the South-Britains, civilized them in a considerable degree, and introduced the knowledge of arts among them, seem scarcely to have made any impression on their language. The Goths, who subdued the Romans, and seated themselves in Italy, were in their turn subdued by the very people to whom they gave laws, as receiving their language from them. For it is well known that, although a variety of Gothic words are retained in the Italian, by far the greatest proportion is Roman.

Can it be supposed, then, without directly contradicting universal experience, that a few Saxons, who were not conquerors, but refugees, could give language to the nation that afforded them protection? Has any change similar to this taken place among the Welsh, who are viewed as the same people with the Picts, notwithstanding their intercourse with the English during several centuries, since the cessation of national hostilities? Have the Celts of Ireland renounced their language, in compliment to the English of the Pale, as they have been called, who in proportion were certainly far more numerous than the Saxons belonging to the court of Canmore? Few nations have been more tenacious of the customs and language of their ancestors than the Celtic inhabitants of Scotland. We know how little progress has been made, for more than half a century past, in diffusing the English tongue through the Highlands, although not only the arm of power has been employed to dissolve the feudal attachments, but the aid of learning and religion has been called in. The young are indeed taught to read English, but they often read without understanding, and still prefer speaking Gaelic.

Had the Saxon found its way into Scotland in the manner supposed, it would necessarily have been superinduced on the Gaelic. This has always been the case, where one language prevailed over another, unless the people who spoke the original language were either completely or nearly exterminated. Thus was the Norman gradually incorporated with the Saxon, as the Frankish had been with the Latinized Celtic of France. But the number of Gaelic words to be found in what is called the Broad Scots bears a very small proportion to the body of the language.

It is well known, that in many places on the borders of the Highlands, where, according to the hypothesis controverted, the one language should appear as it were melting into the other, they are kept totally distinct. This is particularly remarked in the account of the parish of Dowally in Perthshire. "It is a curious fact, that the hills of King's Seat and Craigy Barns, which form the lower boundary of Dowally, have been for centuries the separating barrier of these languages. In the first house below them, the English is, and has been spoken; and the Gaelic in the first house (not above a mile distant) above them." Statist. Acc. xx. 490. In some instances a rivulet forms as effectual a boundary, in this respect, as if an ocean intervened.

Malcolm Canmore, according to the testimony of Simeon of Durham and Brompton, in his incursions into England, carried so many captives with him, that they were afterwards seen, not only in every village, but in every house. Had this been literally the case, his army must have borne some resemblance to that of Xerxes. But although this had been literally the case, would captives or slaves overpower the language of their masters? Is it not admitted, at any rate, that after the death of Malcolm they "were driven away by the usual enmity of the Gaelic people;" that "the Celtic inhabitants would not submit to" the authority of Duncan, till he had agreed never again to introduce Normans or English into their country; that "this jealousy of strangers continued under Donal Bane;" and that it "occasioned insurrections under William the Lyon?" Caled. p. 498.

It is evident that some Saxon Barons, with their followers, received lands in Scotland, during some of the succeeding reigns. But a few individuals could not produce greater effects in Scotland, than all the power of the Norman barons in England. It seems also undeniable, that the foreigners of distinction who settled in Scotland, particularly in the reign of David I., were mostly Normans, and therefore could not introduce the Saxon. According to Lesley, Hist. Scot. Lib. vi. p. 201, this was the case even in the time of Canmore.

It is very questionable, if, even during the reign of Edward the Confessor, French was not the language principally spoken at court. It has been asserted, indeed, that during this reign, "the Anglo-Saxon had ceased to be cultivated." V. Ellis's Spec. i. 39. Camden has said, that Edward the Confessor "resided long in France, and is charged by historians of his time to have returned from thence wholly Frenchified." Remains, p. 210.

It has been supposed that this unparalleled change was partly owing to occasional intercourse with the northern counties of England, which were subjected to the Scottish crown. But this intercourse was by far too limited to have any influence in completely changing a language. It would be more natural to invert the idea, and to suppose that the inhabitants of these countries had received the peculiar terms, which they retain in common with the vulgar of Scotland, from the residence of the Scots among them, while the heir-apparent of our crown was Prince of Cumberland.

It is certain that Domesday-book, a work compiled by order of William the Conqueror, from an actual survey of the whole of England, does not include any of the counties lying to the north of the Humber; which is a proof that, in that age, these counties were considered as belonging to Scotland.

Hardyng acknowledges that all the country to the North of the Humber once pertained to Scotland. "He made the bye ways throughout Britain, and he founded the archflamynes, at London one for Logres, another at Yorke for Albany, that nowe is Scotlande; for that time from Humber north that was that tyme Scotland; and the thyrd at Carleon in Wales, for al Wales." Chron. Rubr. of c. 33, Fol. 29, a.

This indeed refers to a period long prior to the Christian era; and the account is evidently fabulous. But I mention it because here it is admitted by the Chronicler, hostile as he was to the independence of Scotland, as a circumstance which could not be denied, that, in former times, the country to the North of the Humber was viewed as a part of Scotland.

But there is still a more natural account of the great similarity of language between Scotland and the North of England. To me it appears that Mr. Pinkerton has proved, from undoubted testimony, that the Picts had possession of the North of England for more than a century before that Ida founded the kingdom of Bernicia; and that, although for a time they were subjected to the power of the Angles, they afterwards regained their authority in this quarter. V. Enquiry, I. 321-335.

It may be viewed as a confirmation of this account, that, in the North of England, th is often changed into d. "In the N.," says Lambe,—"th is frequently changed into d; as, for father, we say fader; for girth, gird; for Rothbury, a town in Northumberland, Rodbury; for Lothian, Loudon." Notes to the Battle of Flodden, p. 80.

This is a distinguishing characteristic of the dialect of Angus, which was undoubtedly a part of the Pictish territory. For baird, both, they still say baid; for skait, injury, skaid; for maith, a maggot, maid, &c. Now, it is well known that this is a peculiarity of the ancient Scandinavian. The Icelanders, at this day, pronounce the th as if it were d; they often, indeed, write d, where th occurs in A. S. and in the German dialects.

It has also been supposed that the Flemings, a considerable number of whom occasionally settled in Scotland, contributed to the change of language. But, from all the evidence that we have of a Flemish colonization, the effect is evidently by far too great for the cause. Whatever influence, as tradesmen, they might be supposed to have in towns, it must have been very inconsiderable in the interior parts of the country. As it is said that—"Aberdeenshire was particularly distinguished in early times, for considerable colonies of Flemings;" it has been inferred, that, "we may thus perceive the true source, to which may be traced up the Teutonic dialect of Aberdeenshire, that is even now called the Broad Buchan." Caled. pp. 603, 604. But it will appear, from the following Dictionary, that many of these words are not Teutonic, but Scandinavian. At any rate, the fact is undeniable, that many of the terms common in S., and especially in the North, are not to be found in any Anglo-Saxon, Flemish, or Teutonic Lexicon, but occur in those of Iceland, Sweden, or Denmark. Were there only a few of this description, it might be supposed that they had found their way into our language by commercial intercourse, or by some straggling settlers. But their number is such, that they cannot be ascribed to any adventitious cause.

Here I might refer the reader to the following words, under one letter only : Bar, Bargane, v. and s., Barrat, Bathe, Bauchle, Beik, Beild, v. and s., Beirth, Bene, a., Beugh, Bike, Bilbie, Billie, Bismar, B'ait, Blout, Bludrier, Boden, Boldin, Boo, Boun, Brachen, Brade, v. and s., Brag, Braith, Brash, Break, v., Bree, s. 2., Brent, a., Breth, Brim, Broche, Brod, v. and s., Brogue, Broukit, Buller, v. and s. Burde. I might also refer to Dordermeat, Emmis, Gleg, Ithand, (eident), Stanners, and to a thousand of the same description.

Here I might also mention the remarkable analogies of idea, displayed in very singular figures, or modes of expression, common to our language with those of the North of Europe ; even where the words themselves are radically different. Many of these occur in this work, which cannot reasonably be considered as merely casual, or as proceeding from any intercourse in later ages ; but, in connection with other evidence, may well be viewed as indications of national affinity. I may refer to the articles, LOUN'S PIECE, and POCKSHAKINGS, as examples of this coincidence.

One thing very remarkable is, that, among the vulgar, the names of herbs in the North of S. are either the same with those still used in Sweden and other northern countries, or nearly allied. The same observation applies, pretty generally through S., to the names of quadrupeds, of birds, of insects, and of fishes.

The circumstance of the Scottish language bearing so striking a resemblance to the English in its form, which has been undoubtedly borrowed from the French, and particularly in its becoming indeclinable, has been urged as a powerful proof that we borrowed our language from our Southern neighbours. But Mr. Ellis has manifested his judgment, not less than his candour, in the solution of this apparent difficulty. He shows that, "at the era assigned for the introduction of A.-Saxon into Scotland, as indeed it had not been previously mingled with Norman, although it had, the Saxon refugees would never have wished to have introduced into that country, which afforded them an asylum, a language which they must have considered as the badge of their slavery." He also shows that, as the "influx of French words did not begin to produce a sensible change in the language of England, till the beginning, or perhaps the middle, of the thirteenth century, its importation into Scotland ought to be capable of being distinctly traced ; and that, as the improvements of the common language would pass, by slow gradations, from the original into the provincial idiom, the compositions of the English bards would be clearly distinguished by superiority of elegance." He denies, however, that this is the case, quoting the elegiac sonnet, on the death of Alexander III., as superior to any English composition of that early period.

Upon the whole, he is disposed to conclude, that "Our language was separately formed in the two countries, and that it has owed its identity to its being constructed of similar materials, by similar gradations, and by nations in the same state of society." He thinks that the Scots borrowed the French idioms and phrases, like the English, from the Norman Romance, "the most widely diffused and most cultivated language, excepting the Italian, of civilized Europe." He also ascribes a considerable influence to the early and close union between the French and Scots, justly observing, that any improvements borrowed from the former, would not be retarded in Scotland, as they were in England, by a different language being spoken in the country from that which was spoken at court; because "the dialect of the Scottish kings was the same with that of their subjects." Spec. I. 226-233.

As it is evident that the language could not have been imported into Scotland by the Saxon refugees, with its French idioms; it is equally clear that these were not borrowed from the English. For, in this case, the language of Scotland must, in its improvements, still have been at least a century behind that of England. Although this had been verified by fact, it would scarcely have been credible that our fathers had been indebted to the English for these improvements. The two nations were generally in a state of hostility; and it is never during war that nations borrow from each other refinements in language, unless a few military terms can be viewed in this light. Too few of our early writers resided long enough in England, to have made any material change on the language of their country, when they returned. Besides, we have a great variety of French terms and idioms, that have been early introduced into our language, which do not seem to have been ever known in England.

Here, also, a circumstance ought to be called into account, which seems to have been hitherto overlooked on this subject. Many families are mentioned by our historians as having come out of France and settled in Scotland, at different periods. It appears, indeed, that many families, of French or Norman extraction, had come into Scotland during the reign of Malcolm Canmore. Sub haec etiam tempora (says Lesley) Freser, Sanchir, Monteth, Montgomery, Campbell, Brise, Betoun, Tailyefer, Bothuell, ingens denique nobilium numerus, ex Gallia venit. De Reb. Scot. Lib. vi. p. 201. It is natural to suppose that these would introduce many French terms and idioms; and, as Mr. Ellis observes, the same language having been spoken at the court and in the country, there would be no resistance to them.

Here, perhaps, it may be proper to take notice of another objection to the derivation of our language from Scandinavia. This is its great affinity to the Anglo-Saxon. But this is of no weight. For, although it appears that a variety of terms were used in the Scandinavian dialects, which had not passed into the Anglo-Saxon and other Germ. dialects, the structure of both were so much the same, that ancient writers speak of them as one language, in the time of Ethelred the son of Edgar. Illa aetate eadem fuit lingua Anglica, Norwegica et Danica; mutatio autem facta est, occupata per Wilhelmum Nothum Anglia. Gunnlaug. Sag. p. 87. V. Peringskiold, Monument. Upsal. p. 182. Seren. De Vet. Sueo-Goth. cum Anglis Usu, pp. 14, 15.

Some have affected to view the celebrated Odin as a fabulous character. The more intelligent northern writers indeed acknowledge that he, to whom great antiquity is ascribed, and who was worshipped as a god, must be viewed in this light. Yet they admit the existence of a later Odin, who led the Scandinavians towards the shores of the Baltic. While it is a presumption in favour of the existence of such a person, it is a further proof that, in an early age, the Saxons and Scandinavians were viewed as the same people; that both Bede and the northern writers trace the lineage of Hengist and Horsa, the chiefs who conquered England, to Odin. Peringskiold has given the genealogy of Hengist, as the twelfth from Odin, which he collected from the most ancient documents, partly printed, and partly in MS. Bede acknowledges the same descent, Hist. Lib. xv., although he shortens the line by several generations.

III.—The Scandinavian origin of the Picts is illustrated by the history of the ORKNEY ISLANDS. We have seen that, according to some ancient accounts, they first took possession of these. That they were, in succeeding ages, inhabited by Picts, is acknowledged on all hands.

Wallace published an authentic Diploma, concerning the succession of the Earls of Orkney, digested A. 1403, not only from the relation of their "faythfull antecessors and progenitors," but from books, writings, and chronicles, both in the Latin and in the Norwegian language; and attested by the Bishop, clergy, and all the principal people of these islands. In this they inform Eric, king of Norway, that, when the Scandinavians took possession of these islands (which was in the ninth century), they were inhabited by two nations, the Peti and Papé; and that the country was not then called Orkney, but the land of the Pets; as yet appears from the name given to the sea that divides Orkney from Scotland, which is called the Pelland Sea." V. Wallace's Account. p. 129. This indeed is still called, in the Icelandic histories, Pelland Fiord.

There is not the least ground to doubt that the Picts are here designed Peti. This is the name given, by Scandinavian writers, to the Picts. Saxo Grammaticus, who flourished in the twelfth century, calls Scotland Petia; Lib. ix. p. 154. It has been conjectured, with great probability, that the Papé, or Papae, were Irish priests; who, speaking a different language from the Pets, were viewed by the Norwegian settlers as constituting a different nation, although acting only in a religious character. For it appears from Arius Frode, that some of these Papae had found their way to Iceland, before it was discovered by the Norwegians.

It has been said, indeed, that "there is reason to believe that the Orkney islands were planted, during early ages, by the posterity of the same people who settled Western Europe," i. e. by Celts; Caled. p. 261. The only proof offered for this idea is, "that Druid remains and stone monuments exist; and that celts and flint arrow-heads have been found in the Orkney islands; while none of these have ever been discovered in the Shetland islands." "This," it is added, "evinces that the Celtic people, who colonized South and North Britain, also penetrated into the Orkney, but not into the Shetland, islands; and this fact also shews, that those several antiquities owe their origin to the Celts, who early colonized the Orkney islands alone, and not to the Scandinavians, who equally colonized both the Orkney and the Shetland islands;" Ibid.

Whether what is here asserted, as to "Druid remains," &c. be true, I do not presently inquire. Let it suffice to observe, that such is the mode of reasoning adopted by the learned gentleman, as plainly to shew how much he is here at a loss for argument. This is indeed a complete specimen of what is called reasoning in a circle. The existence of some monuments in Orkney, contrasted with the want of them in Shetland, evinces that "the first settlers in Orkney were Celts; and also shews that these stone monuments were Celtic."

It is admitted, that "scarcely any of the names of places in Orkney or Shetland, are Celtic." "They are all," it is said, "Teutonic, in the Scandinavian form;" Ibid. Now, this is a very strong fact. We may, indeed, lay aside the limitation. For the most competent judges have not found any. If the Picts who inhabited the Orkney islands were Celts, whence is it that not a single vestige of their language remains? To this query, which so naturally arises on the subject, it is by no means a satisfactory answer, that, "owing probably to some physical cause, the original people seem to have disappeared, in some period of a prior date to our era." What could possibly give birth to so strange a conjecture? It is the solitary testimony of one writer, who lived in an age in which nothing could have been written that was not true, because it would not have been received had it been false. "During the intelligent age of Solinus, those islands were supposed to be uninhabited; and to be 'only the haunt of seals, and orcs, and sea-mew's clang,'" Ibid.

Are we then to view this as the physical cause of the disappearance of the original people? Were these Celts so harassed by "seals, and orcs, and sea-mews," that they forsook their abodes, and sought a place of repose on the continent? Or did these troublesome animals in fact swallow up the wretched inhabitants of Orkney?

But can this dream of Solinus be seriously mentioned? or can it be received in an "intelligent age?" Ere this be the case, some cause, whether physical or moral, which has at least some degree of plausibility, must be assigned for the supposed disappearance of a people, who had been so regularly settled as to have stone monuments and buildings, and so well versed in the art of war as to be acquainted with the use of celts. But it is evident that Solinus was very ill informed concerning the Orkney islands; as he says they were only three in number. And in what he asserts as to their being uninhabited (vacant homines), he gives not the remotest hint that the contrary had ever been the case, but seems indeed to consider them as uninhabitable; Lib. 25.

Since, then, the account given by Solinus is so directly contrary to all probability, to what purpose grasp at it? The reason is obvious. The great topographical test of the genealogy of nations, is here pointed directly against the learned writer. He must either part with this, or devote all the Celts of Orkney to destruction. It is only by some such supposition as that which he makes, that any reason can be given why the names of places in Orkney are all Teutonic. As the stone buildings must necessarily be ascribed to Celts, whence comes it that there is not one topographical vestige of this race in Orkney, although the names imposed by the British, in Scotland, remained long after the people were lost? It is supposed, that the "original people" totally disappeared in some unaccountable manner; and, of course, that their possessions were, for centuries perhaps, uninhabited.

But that no argument may be founded on the Teutonic names in Orkney, we are informed, that "the topography of Orkney, Shetland, and Cathness, is completely different from the Saxon topography of Scotland, which does not exhibit one Scandinavian name that is distinct from the Northumbrian Dano-Saxon;" that "of the Scandinavian names in Orkney, and in Cathness, the great body terminates, according to the Gothic construction, in Buster, signifying a dwelling-place; in Ster, denoting a station or settlement; and in Seter, a seat, or settling-place. But there is not a single instance of the Buster, the Ster, or Seter, in the topography of proper Scotland." Caled. p. 489.

Three terms are here mentioned, which do not occur, as far as I know, to the South of Cathness. They are most probably Norwegian; although, perhaps, it may be doubted if they are to be accounted among the most ancient Scandinavian terms. G. Andreae is referred to; but I can find none of these terms in his Lexicon. Nor does it appear that they are common in Orkney. Brand mentions Kebister in Shetland, p. 110. But a variety of other terminations, common to Orkney and Shetland, and to Scotland, are quite overlooked by the author of Caledonia; as Dale, Ness, Wick, Head, Ton, Bye, so common in the South of S., and Burgh. V. Brand, and Stat. Acc. Bow, which is undeniably Scandinavian, is the name given in Orkn. to the principal house on a farm, or on an estate. That this was not unknown in Scotland, appears from what is said in Dict. vo. Boo.

IV.—A pretty certain test of the affinities of nations is their ARCHITECTURE. A variety of circular buildings in Scotland, and in the Orkney islands, are traditionally ascribed to the Picts. They are found in different parts of the country, and are of two kinds. One of these is above ground, the other almost entirely under it. The first includes their circular spires and castles; as the spires of Abernethy and Brechin, and the castles of Glenbeg in Inverness-shire. V. Gordon's Itin. p. 166. Their subterranean buildings, or those which are nearly so, externally exhibiting the appearance of a tumulus or mound, are still more numerous. Many of these are described by Pennant in his Tour, and by the writers of the Statistical Accounts.

These are almost universally ascribed to the Picts, whether appearing in the Lowlands, in the Highlands, or in the Islands of Orkney. In some instances, however, they are called Danish or Norwegian. Even this variation, in the voice of tradition, may perhaps be viewed as a proof of the general conviction which, from time immemorial, has prevailed in this country, that the Picts were originally a Scandinavian people.

They are by far most numerous in those places where we are certain that the Scandinavians had a permanent abode; as in Sutherland and Caithness, on the coast of Ross-shire, on the mainland, and in the Orkney and Shetland islands. In Sutherland, there are three in the P. of Kildonan, Statist. Acc. iii. p. 410; six in the P. of Far, Ibid. p. 543; almost everywhere in the P. of Rogart, Ibid. p. 567. There is a chain of Pictish buildings on each side of Loch Brura, P. of Clyne; Ibid. x. 304. In Caithness, P. of Olrick, there are six or seven, Ibid. xii. 163; a number in Wick, and "throughout the country in general," Ibid. x. 32; in Dunnet, &c.

The names of these buildings claim peculiar attention. It would appear that they are all Gothic. In the Orkneys they are called Burghs or Brughs. This word cannot reasonably be claimed as Celtic. Nor is it confined to the islands. It is given to one of these structures in Caithness, called the Bourg of Dunbeth. Pennant's Tour, 1769, p. 195. There is an evident affinity between this name, and that imposed on a fortification, in Angus, which tradition calls a Pictish camp. V. Dict. vo. BRUGH. As the Burians in the South of S. are generally viewed as Pictish, although the term may be rendered burying-places, it is not improbable that some of them were erections of the same kind with the Burghs. V. Dict. vo. BURIAN.

They are denominated Picts' houses. Now, as the Picts certainly had names for their fortresses in their own language; had this been Celtic, it is most natural to think that, in some instances, these names would have been preserved, as well as the Celtic designations of rivers, mountains, &c. ascribed to this people.

They are also called Duns. This term is mentioned as equivalent to the other two. "There is a range of watch-houses,—and many remains of burghs, duns, or Picts' houses." P. Northmaven, Orkney, Statist. Acc. xii. 365. Another name is also given to them by the vulgar. V. Dict. vo. HOWIE, CASTLEHOWIE.

Even in those places where Gaelic is now spoken, they seem to have a Gothic designation. The valley in which Castle Troddan, Chalamine, &c. have been erected, is called Glen-beg. The final syllable does not seem Gaelic. It is probably corrupted from Goth. bygg-a to build, byggd, pagus; q. the glen of the buildings or houses. The Pictish castle, in the P. of Loth, Sutherland, is in like manner called Loth-beg, q. the building, situated on the river Loth. The signification little cannot well apply here. For what sense could be made of the little Loth? They are indeed in one place called Uags. "In Glenloch," says Mr. Pope, "are three [Pictish buildings,]—called by the country people Uags." Pennant's Tour, 1769, Append. p. 338. This may be from Gael. uaigh, "a den, grave, cave;" Shaw. In the P. of Liff, they have the synonymous designation of Weems or caves. But these are obviously names imposed by the ignorant people; because they knew neither the use, nor the origin, of these buildings.

I am informed, that in Inverness-shire, the foundations of various houses have been discovered, of a round form, with spots of cultivated ground surrounding them; and that when the Highlanders are asked to whom they belonged, they say that they were the houses of the Drinnich or Trinnich, i. e. of the labourers, a name which they give to the Picts. By the way, it may be observed, that this implies, that, according to the tradition of the country, the Picts were cultivators of the soil, while the Celts led a wandering life. This seems to confirm the sense given of the name Cruithneach, imposed by the Irish on the Picts, q. eaters of wheat.

It has always appeared to me a powerful proof of the Gothic origin of the Picts, that they had left their names to structures apparently unknown to the Celtic inhabitants of Britain. But, of late, this argument has been pointed the other way. Mr. King, a writer of considerable celebrity, contends that all these are Celtic monuments. The proof he gives, is the existence of some buildings of a similar kind in Cornwall and South Wales.

It appears, however, that the remains of what are accounted similar buildings, in South Britain, are very scanty. "There are still some vestiges," he says, "to ascertain the fact. For in the parish of Morvah in Cornwall, are the remains of a most remarkable structure, called Castle Chun, that, as it appears to me, cannot well be considered in any other light, than as one of the first sort of very rude imitations of the mode of building round castles, according to hints given by the Phenicians, and before the Britons learned the use of cement. It bears no small resemblance to the Duns, near Grianan Hill in Scotland, and in the Isle of Ilay."

"It consisted of a strong wall of stones without cement, surrounding a large oval area, and having the interior space evidently divided into several separate divisions, ranging round the inside, leaving an open oval space in the centre. It was even much larger than the two great Duns just referred to in Scotland; the area being 125 feet by 110; and it was moreover surrounded on the outside by a large deep ditch, over which was a zigzag narrow passage, on a bank of earth, with a strong rude uncemented wall on each side.

“From the largeness of the area within, it seems exceedingly probable, that (whilst the surrounding walled divisions served for stores) the more interior oval space was for habitation, like that in a Dun, supplied with floors of timber, supported by posts near the middle, but yet leaving still a smaller open area in the centre of all.

“Dr. Borlase conceived that this, with some other hill fortresses, which are continued in a chain in sight of each other, must have been Danish.” Munim. Antiq. iii. 204, 205.

But this fort, from the description given of it, appears to differ considerably from those called Pictish. It more nearly resembles the hill-forts, such as Finhaven, and that called The Laws, in the P. of Monifieth, both in Forfarshire. Almost the only difference is, that, from whatever cause, they retain indubitable marks of vitrification. In the latter, the vestiges of a variety of small buildings, between the inner and outer wall, are perfectly distinct.

It is no inconsiderable argument against Mr. King's hypothesis, that Dr. Borlase, who was thoroughly acquainted with the Welsh Antiquities, saw no reason to think that these buildings were British.

Besides, it would be natural to conclude that, if the Picts were originally what are now called Welsh, and had learned this mode of building from their ancestors in South Britain, such remains would be far more generally diffused in that part of the island. It is evident, indeed, that these structures were unknown to the Britons in the time of Julius Caesar. In the description of their civitates, there is not a hint of any thing that has the least resemblance. Nor are they mentioned by succeeding Roman writers.

The learned writer, probably aware of this important objection, brings forward a very strange hypothesis, apparently with a design of setting it aside. He thinks that the Picts, who penetrated as far as London, while Theodosius was in Britain, saw the British fortresses, and on their return imitated them. Munim. Antiq. iii. 187. But this theory is loaded with difficulties. Although it were certain that the Picts had penetrated as far as London, there is no evidence that they ever were in Cornwall or South Wales. Besides, although they had seen such buildings, the South Britons long before this time having been completely brought into a provincial state by the Romans, they must necessarily have become acquainted with a style of architecture far superior to that of the subterranean description. We certainly know that it was because they were enervated by luxury that they became so easy a prey to the Picts and Scots. Now, if the Picts were so prone to imitate their enemies, a rare thing, especially among savage nations, would they not have preferred that superior mode of architecture which they must have observed wherever they went? Did they need to go to London to learn the art of building dry stone walls, when, for more than two centuries before this, so many Roman castella had been erected on their own frontiers?

If it should be supposed, as this theory is evidently untenable, that the ancient Celts brought this mode of building into Scotland with them, whence is it that the Irish Celts of this country universally ascribe these forts to a race of people different from themselves? As they were undoubtedly of the same stock with the Welsh, and seem, in common with them, to have had their first settlement in South Britain, how did the Irish Celts completely lose this simple kind of architecture? Did they retain the Abers, and the Duns, &c., the names of rivers and mountains, which had been imposed by the Picts, because their language was radically the same, and yet perceive no vestiges of national affinity whatsoever, in the very mode of defending themselves from their enemies, from wild beasts, or from the rage of the elements? He who can suppose that the Celts of Scotland would thus renounce all claim to the architecture of their ancestors, ascribes to them a degree of modesty, in this instance, unexampled in any other.

Mr. King admits that one example of this mode of building has been described as existing near Drontheim in Norway. It may be observed that the name is the same as in Orkney. It is called Sualsburghh. He reasons as if this were the only one known in the North of Europe; and makes a very odd supposition, although consistent with the former, that the Danes imitated this mode of building in consequence of their incursions into Scotland. V. Munim. iii. 107, 108. But another has been described by Dalberg, in his Suecia, called the castle of Ymsburg, which is situated in Westrogothia. V. Barry's Orkn. p. 97. It is probable that there are many others in these northern regions, unknown to us, either because they have not been particularly described, or because we are not sufficiently versant in Northern topography. What are called Danish forts, in the Western Islands, bear a strong resemblance to these Pictish buildings. V. Statist. Acc. (P. Barvas, Lewis), xix. 270, 271.

It is well known that there are round towers in Ireland, resembling those at Brechin and Abernethy, and that some intelligent writers ascribe them to the Danes, although Sir James Ware claims the honour of them to his own countrymen; Antiq. I. 129. The Danes-Raths, as another kind of building is denominated in Ireland, are evidently the same with the Picts' houses. Their description exactly corresponds; Ibid. I. 137, 138. These Ware acknowledges to be Danish; although his editor Harris differs from him, because Rath is an Irish word. Dr. Ledwich, who contends for the Danish origin of these forts, expresses his "wonder at Mr. Harris, who inconsiderately argues for the Celtic origin of these forts, and that solely from their Irish appellation, Rath, which, though it figuratively imports a fortress, primarily signified security." He adds—"In my opinion it is doubtful whether Rath is not a Teutonic word; for we find in Germany, Junkerraht, Immerraht, Raht-vorwald, &c., applied to artificial mounts and places of defence, as in Ireland." Antiq. of Ireland, p. 185. Perhaps his idea is confirmed by the use of A. S. uraeth. Although it primarily signifies a wreath, or any thing plaited, it has been transferred to a fortification; sustentaculum, munimen. Burh wrathum werian; Urbem munimine defendere; Caed. p. 43, 21. Lye. Most probably it was first applied to those simple enclosures, made for defence by means of wattles or wicker-work.

It may be added that to this day the houses of the Icelanders, the most unmingled colony of the Goths, retain a striking resemblance to the Pictish buildings. They are in a great measure under ground, so as externally to assume somewhat of the appearance of hillocks or tumuli.

The author of Caledonia frequently refers to "the erudite Edward King," praising him as "a profound antiquary." "After investigating," he says, "the stone monuments, the ancient castles, and the barbarous manners of North Britain, he gives it as his judgment, 'that the Picts were descended from the aboriginal Britons;'" Caled. p. 233.

But the learned gentleman has not mentioned that one of the grounds on which Mr. King rests his judgment is, that "the Pictish buildings, or those so called, resemble the British remains in Cornwall and South Wales." It is singular that, while both lay down the same general principle, as a powerful argument in proof of the Celtic origin of the Picts, the one should attempt to prove that these structures are Celtic, and the other strenuously contend that they are Scandinavian, and that the Picts had no hand in their erection.

The chief reason assigned for the latter hypothesis is, that "those Burgs, or strengths, only exist in the countries where the Scandinavian people erected settlements," being "only seen in the Orkney and Shetland islands, in Caithness, on the coast of Sutherland, and in the Hebrides, with a few on the west coasts of Ross and Inverness;" Caled. p. 342.

But in a work of such extent, and comprising so many different objects, it is not surprising that the various parts should not be always consonant to each other. The author has, in one place, referred to the subterraneous buildings in the parish of Liff, as of the same kind with those existing in Orkney; to a work of the same kind in Alyth parish; to several subterraneous works in the parish of Bendothy, expressly called Pictish buildings, Statist. Acc. xix. 359; to a considerable number of these in the parish of Kildrummy, Aberd. "Similar buildings," he adds, "have been discovered in several parts of Kirkcudbright Stewartry;" Caled. p. 97, N. None of these places are within the limits assigned for the Scandinavian settlements.

Several others might have been mentioned. Some, in the neighbourhood of Perth, have been described. V. Pennant's Tour, III. Apend. p. 453. In the parish of Stonykirke, Wigton, are some remains of Druid temples and Pictish castles; Statist. Acc. ii. 56. Edwin's hall, parish of Dunse, Berwick's., corresponds to the account given of the Castles in Glenbeg. "It is supposed to have been a Pictish building;" Ibid. iv. 389, 390. "The Roundabouts in the parish of Castletown, Roxburghs., are commonly called Picts Works;" Ibid. xvi. 64. It appears, then, with what propriety it is said, that "the recent appellation of Pictish castles, or Picts houses, has only been given to those in Orkney and Shetland in Caithness, and in Sutherland." Caled. p. 343.

Mr. Chalmers has given such an account of the remains of one of these forts in the parish of Castletown, as plainly to shew that it corresponds to those which he elsewhere calls Scandinavian. "There are two of those forts near Herdshouse, two on the farm of Shaws, one on Toftholm, one on Foulshiels, one on Cocklaw, one on Blackburn, and one on Shortbuttrees. When the ruins of this fort were lately removed, there was found, on the south side of it, a place which was ten feet wide, and twenty feet long, and was paved with flat stones, and enclosed by the same sort of stones, that were set on edge; and there was discovered, within this enclosure, what seems to intimate its culinary use, ashes and burnt sticks." Caled. p. 94.

It is also urged that "not one of these strengths bears any appellation from the Pictish, or British language;" and that they "have no similarity to any of the strengths of the genuine Picts, or British tribes in North-Britain;" Ibid. pp. 343, 344. But as all the force of these arguments lies in what logicians call a petitio principii, no particular reply is requisite.

It is said that many of these edifices, "in the Orkney and Shetland islands, and in Cathness, have been erroneously called Pictish castles, Pictish towers, and Picts houses, from a fabulous story that attributes to Kenneth Macalpin the impolicy of driving many of the Picts into the northern extremity of our island; whence they fled to the Orkney and Shetland isles." But it has been seen that these designations are not confined to the districts mentioned. Besides, to suppose such a mode of denomination, is entirely opposite to the analogy of tradition; for it is almost universally found that the works of an early age, instead of being given to the more ancient people, to whom they really belong, are ascribed to those of a later age, who have made some considerable figure in the country. Thus, in many places in Scotland, camps, undoubtedly Roman, are vulgarly attributed to Danes. Nor is it at all a natural supposition, that, in those very places said to have been occupied by Scandinavian settlers, their descendants should be so extremely modest as to give away the merit of these structures, which they continue to view with wonder and veneration from their own ancestors to an earlier race, with whom they are supposed to have been in a state of constant hostility, and whom they either expelled or subdued.

The idea that these designations originated from "the fabulous story" of the Picts being driven to the northern extremity of our island, has no better foundation than what has been already considered. The general opinion was entirely different from this. For it was "asserted by ignorance, and believed by credulity, that Kenneth made so bad an use of the power which he had so adroitly acquired, as to destroy the whole Pictish people in the wantonness of his cruelty;" Caled. p. 333.

I shall only add, that it is not easy to avert the force of Mr. King's argument against these being viewed as Danish works. They are to be seen in parts of the country into which the Danes never penetrated. He refers to that, called Black Castle, in the parish of Moulin, in that division of Perthshire called Athole; Munim. III. 199. In the Statist. Acc. it is said—"The vestiges of small circular buildings, supposed to have been Pictish forts, are to be seen in different parts of the parish;" P. Moulin, v. 70. Mr. King, after Pennant, also mentions one on the hill of Drummin, opposite to Taymouth; another, within view of that, above the church of Fortingall; a third opposite to Alt-mhuic, in the neighbourhood of Killin; a fourth, under the house of Cashly; a fifth, about half a mile west, &c.; V. Pennant's Tour, 1772, pp. 50-53. "Most of these," says Mr. King, "lie in Glen Lion; and they shew how numerous these kind of structures were, in what was once the Picts country."

It has also been asserted that "the same Celtic people, who colonized South and North Britain, penetrated into Orkney, but not into the Shetland islands." The reason for this assertion is, "that no stone monuments" nor "flint arrow-heads" have "ever been discovered in the Shetland islands;" Caled. p. 261, N.

But obelisks, or standing stones, are found even in the Shetland islands, into which the Celts never penetrated. Contiguous to one of the Burghs in Walls, "there is a range of large stones that runs across the neck of land, and may have been intended to enclose the spot, as a place of burial, which the building does not occupy;" Statist. Acc. xx. 113. In Bressay, &c. are "several perpendicular stones, about 9 feet high, erected, no doubt, for the purpose of commemorating some great event, but of which we have no account ;" Ibid. x. 202. In Unst, "two ancient obelisks remain, one near Lund, a thick and shapeless rock ; the other, near Uy a Sound, seems to have been a mark for directing into that harbour, and is ten and a half feet high ;" Ibid. v. 201. Whether flint arrow-heads have ever been discovered in Shetland, I cannot well say ; but I have seen knives, made of a kind of agate, which were found in one of the Burghs ; and am certainly informed that stone hatchets are frequently met with of the same kind with those found in Cairns in Scotland.

V.—The absurd idea of the extermination of the Picts by the Scots, as well as that of their expulsion, is so generally exploded that it is unnecessary to say any thing on the subject. It is incredible that a people who seem to have been far less powerful than the Picts, should have been able either to exterminate or to expel them. Could we suppose either of these events to have taken place, what must have been the unavoidable consequence ? Either that the extensive country called Pictland must have remained in a great measure desolate, or that the country of the Scots must have been deserted. For it cannot reasonably be supposed that the Scots, all at once, especially after a succession of bloody wars with the Picts, should so increase in numbers as to be able to people, and still less to defend, the whole of Scotland and its adjacent islands.

The only reasonable position therefore is, that the Picts in general remained in their former seats. Now, if it appear that the people presently inhabiting these districts retain the NAMES which belonged to the Picts, it is a strong proof that they are the lineal descendants of this people. If it further appear, not only that these names are not Celtic, but that they are the same, or nearly so, with those of the Scandinavians, as they are transmitted to us in their most ancient monuments, it must amount to a proof that the Picts had a Gothic origin.

Residing in the county of Angus, which all allow to have been a part of the Pietish dominions, I had many years ago employed this as a test of the origin of the people. I was induced to make this trial, from the circumstance of finding many words commonly used there, which I had not found any where else, and which, upon examination, appeared to be the same with those that are still used in Iceland and other Gothic regions.

The multitude of monosyllabic names must strike every one who passes through that part of our country. Now, it is well known that this forms a distinguishing character in the nomenclature of Scandinavia ; that the names, universally admitted to be most ancient, generally consist of one syllable.

Upon comparing many of the names in Angus, whether of one or more syllables, with those in the Monumenta Danica of Wormius, in Frode's Scheda, and especially in that singular work, the Landnamabok, which gives an account of the different families that settled in Iceland about the middle of the ninth century, it appeared that many of them must have been originally the same.

They are such as do not occur, as far as I have observed, in any memorials of the Anglo-Saxons. Although a greater analogy were observable here, it could be only set down to the account of the common origin of the various Gothic tribes. For the names, in Angus, could not reasonably be ascribed to Saxon settlers, unless it were supposed that the country had in great part received its population from England. They cannot be accounted for, on the idea of any Scandinavian settlement in the middle ages; for it is universally admitted that no such settlement extended farther southward than Ross-shire.

A writer of great research, to whom we have had occasion frequently to refer, has indeed lately attempted to show that all the names of the Pictish kings are British. "The names of the Pictish kings," he says, "have not any meaning in the Teutonic; and they are, therefore, Celtic." They are not "Irish, and consequently are British;" Caled. p. 207. Here I must make the same observation as before with respect to the topography. I cannot pretend to give the true meaning of these names, as there is no branch of etymology so uncertain as this. But if I can give a meaning, and one which is at least as probable as the other, it must appear that the Teutonic, as far as names can go, has as good a claim to the royal line of the Picts as the British. These names vary considerably in the different chronicles. Where any name is given according to a different reading from that adopted in Caled. p. 206, it is printed in Italics. Where there is a blank in the middle column, no British etymon has been given in that work.

The preceding list includes those names only of Pictish kings which are reckoned well warranted by history. There is a previous list, also contained in the Chronicon Pictorum, which has not the same authority. But although there may not be sufficient evidence that such kings existed, the list is so far valuable, as it transmits to us what were accounted genuine Pictish names. Here I shall therefore give the whole list of kings, with similar names from the Landnamabok, that Icelandic record which refers to the middle of the ninth century; adding such names as still remain in Angus, or in other counties, which resemble them, or seem to have been originally the same. A, added to the word, denotes Angus. Where the name given in the middle column is from any other authority than the Landnamabok, it is marked.

G. loga, flamma); Deuchar, Bunch, Bawd, Boath, Darg, Dargie, Bean, Strang, Cudbert, Couttie, Coutts, Shand, Cobb, Neave, Tarbat, Storrier, Candie, Duguid, Broakie, Proffit, Eaton, Fands, Croll, Kettins, Porris, Pressok, Myers, Byers, Neish, Towns, Hillocks, Harsel (Su. G. haer, exercitus, and saell, socius, a companion in warfare); Glenday, Mearns, Kermach, Leys, Dormont, Crockett, Leech, Emslie, Mug, Livy, Geekie, Legge, Craw, Stool, Machir, Goold, Herd, Lungair, Laird, Rind, Annat, Elshet, Pyat, Pet, Stark, Sturrock, Marnie, Grig, Rough, Doeg, pron. Doug, Cossar, Prosser, Torbet, Logie, &c. &c.

VI.—The analogy of ancient CUSTOMS also affords a powerful test of the affinity of nations. I need scarcely mention the almost inviolable attachment manifested to these, when transmitted from time immemorial, especially if connected with religion, or upheld by superstition.

The Celtic inhabitants of this country observed one of their principal feasts on Hallow-eve, which is still called Samh'in. V. SHANNACH. But there is no memorial of any festival at the time of the winter solstice. The names which they have given to Christmas, Corn. Nadelig, Arm. Nadelek, Gael. Nollig, Fr. Noël, Novel, are all evidently formed from Lat. Natal-is, i. e. dies natalis Christi. In Corn. it is sometimes more fully expressed, Deu Nadelig, literally, God's birth-day. In Ir. it is called Breath-la, Breithla; but this means nothing more than birth-day.

Thus it appears that the Celts have not, like the Goths, transferred the name of any heathen feast to Christmas; which nearly amounts to a proof that they previously celebrated none at this season. The matter is, indeed, more directly inverted between the Goths and the Celts. The former, observing their principal feast in honour of the Sun at the winter solstice, transferred the name of it to the day on which it is supposed our Saviour was born; and adopted the Christian designation, such as Christianity then appeared, of Korss-maessa, or Rood-day, for the day celebrated in commemoration of the pretended Invention of the Cross. On the other hand, the Celts, continuing to observe their great annual festival, also originally in honour of the Sun, in the beginning of May, retained the pagan designation of Beltane, with most of its rights, while they adopted the Christian name of the day observed in commemoration of the birth of our Saviour. This difference is observable in our own country to this very day. In those counties of which the Picts were the permanent inhabitants, especially beyond Tay, Yule and Rood-day are the designations still used; while Beltane is unknown, and Christmas scarcely mentioned. But in those belonging to the Celtic territories, or bordering on it, particularly in the West of Scotland, Yule and Rood-day are seldom or never mentioned.

This of itself affords no contemptible proof that the Picts were a Gothic nation, and that they still exist in those districts which were possessed by their ancestors; especially when viewed in connexion with the great similarity between the rites still retained in the North of Scotland, and those formerly common throughout the Scandinavian regions, in the celebration of Yule. The analogy must forcibly strike any impartial reader, who will take the trouble to consult this article in the Dictionary. Had the Picts been exterminated, or even the greatest part of them destroyed, and their country occupied by Celts, it is improbable that the latter would have adopted the Gothic designation of Yule, and quite inconceivable that they would have totally dropped the term Beltane, used to denote the most celebrated feast of their forefathers. Why should this be the only term used in those places formerly under the Celtic dominion, and totally unknown in Angus, Mearns, and other counties, which their language, after the subjugation of the Picts, is supposed to have overrun? Did they borrow the term Yule from a few straggling Saxons? This is contrary to all analogy. Did the Saxons themselves adopt the name given by their Norman conquerors to Christmas? Gehol was indeed used in Anglo-Saxon, as a designation for this day; but rarely, as it was properly the name of a month, or rather of part of two months. The proper and ecclesiastical designation was Mid-winter-daeg, Midwinter-day. Had any name been borrowed, it would have been that most appropriated to religious use. This name, at any rate, must have been introduced with the other. But we have not a vestige of it in Scotland. The name Yule is, indeed, still used in England. But it is in the northern counties, which were possessed by a people originally the same with those who inhabited the Lowlands of Scotland.

Here I might refer to another singular custom, formerly existing among our ancestors, that of punishing female culprits by drowning. We observe some vestiges of this among the Anglo-Saxons. Although it prevailed in Scotland, I can find no evidence that it was practised by the Celts. It is undoubtedly of German or Gothic origin. V. PIT and GALLOWES, Dict.

VII.—A variety of other considerations might be mentioned, which, although they do not singly amount to proof, yet merit attention, as viewed in connexion with what has been already stated.

As so great a part of the eastern coast of what is now called England was so early peopled by the BELGAE, it is hardly conceivable that neither so enterprising a people, nor any of their kindred tribes, should ever think of extending their descents a little farther eastward. For that the Belgae, and the inhabitants of the countries bordering on the Baltic, had a common origin, there seems to be little reason to doubt. The Dutch assert that their progenitors were Scandinavians, who, about a century before the common era, left Jutland and the neighbouring territories, in quest of new habitations. V. Beknopte Historie van't Vaderland, i. 3, 4. The Saxons must be viewed as a branch from the same stock. For they also proceeded from modern Jutland and its vicinity: Now, there is nothing repugnant to reason in supposing that some of these tribes should pass over directly to the coast of Scotland opposite to them, even before the Christian era. For Mr. Whitaker admits that the Saxons, whom he strangely makes a Gaulic people, in the second century applied themselves to navigation, and soon became formidable to the Romans. Hist. Manch. B. i. c. 12. Before they could become formidable to so powerful a people, they must have been at least so well acquainted with navigation, as to account it no great enterprise to cross from the shores of the Baltic over to Scotland, especially if they took the islands of Shetland and Orkney in their way.

As we have seen that, according to Ptolemy, there were, in his time, different tribes of Belgae settled on the northern extremity of our country, the most natural idea undoubtedly is, that they came directly from the continent. For had these Belgae crossed the English Channel, according to the common progress of barbarous nations, it is scarcely supposable that this island would have been settled to its utmost extremity so early as the age of Agricola.

There is every reason to believe that the Belgic tribes in Caledonia, described by Ptolemy, were Picts. For, as the Belgae, Picts, and Saxons, seem to have had a common origin, it is not worth while to differ about names. These frequently arise from causes so trivial that their origin becomes totally inscrutable to succeeding ages. The Angles, although only one tribe, have accidentally given their name to the country which they invaded, and to all the descendants of the Saxons and Belgae, who were by far more numerous.

It is universally admitted, that there is a certain NATIONAL CHARACTER, of an external kind, which distinguishes one people from another. This is often so strong, that those who have travelled through various countries, or have accurately marked the diversities of this character, will scarcely be deceived even as to a straggling individual. Tacitus long ago remarked the striking resemblance between the Germans and Caledonians. Every stranger, at this day, observes the great difference of features and complexion between the Highlanders and Lowlanders. No intelligent person in England is in danger of confounding the Welsh with the posterity of the Saxons. Now, if the Lowland Scots be not a Gothic race, but in fact the descendants of the ancient British, they must be supposed to retain some national resemblance to the Welsh. But will any impartial observer venture to assert, that in feature, complexion, or form, there is any such similarity as to induce the slightest apprehension that they have been originally the same people?

RULES

RENDERING THE USE OF THIS DICTIONARY MORE EASY.

It is difficult to give general rules for the pronunciation of words in a language in which there are so many anomalies as the Scottish; but some examples may be given of the sound of the vowels or diphthongs, and the guttural ch and gh.

A, in man, &c. has nearly the same sound in S. as in E. Vulgar English writers, who use mon for man, hond for hand, &c. believing that this is pure Scottish, show that they have studied the works of Ramsay and Burns to little purpose. The rhymes to such words occurring in Scottish poems, will at once point out the true pronunciation; as, for example,

"Then gently scan your brother man," &c.
Address to the Unco Guid.

"Untie these bands from off my hands," &c.
Macpherson's Farewell.

E long, or the ordinary sound of it in ee, ea, is in the south of Scotland changed into the diphthong ei or ey; hence beis for bees, tei or tey for tea, sey for sea, &c. The pronouns he and me, pronounced very broadly hei and mei, the voice rising on the last vowel, most forcibly strike the ear of a stranger.

Eu is frequently pronounced as English u in tube; as in neuk, beuk, leuk, &c. see also oo in Dictionary.

O in come and coming, is pronounced in S. as in E. In Cumberland, and elsewhere in the north of England, the vulgar say cooming; but this pronunciation obtains nowhere in Scotland.

Oo is often sounded like the French u in une; as in hoolie, hood, hoody, &c.

Ou has frequently the sound of oo in E. good; as in douk, doukar, dour, downwith, fouth, &c.

Ou has also the same sound as in E. round; as in doup, douss, gouk, goul, foursome, &c.

Ow has frequently the sound of oo, in E. good; as in dow, (a dove,) downcome, dowkar, &c.

U in many words has the peculiar sound of the French u in une; as in hule, spune, schule, &c.

Y vowel, used by our ancient writers indiscriminately with i, being in fact only double i, and printed ij in other Northern languages, is to be sought for, not as it stands in the English alphabet, but in the same place with the letter i, throughout the work; as, ydant, diligent; ydilteth, idleness; &c.

Y consonant, corresponds to A. S. G before a vowel; and from the resemblance in form of A. S. G (γ) to the Roman ζ the latter was very improperly used for it in many of the early printed books, as well as in MSS., and when z without the tail came to be used, it was still retained in a number of printed books and MSS. Hence we often meet with Gaberlunzie, instead of Gaberlunye, Tuilzie, for Tuilyie, Zeir, for Yeir, &c.

Ch and gh have often the guttural sound; as in loch, lochan, haugh, Broughton, &c. These sounds, like the French sound of u in une, are, however, impracticable to Englishmen, unless their organs have been early trained to gutturals. Hence we generally find them pronouncing loch lock, haugh haw, Broughton Brouton, &c.

Words not found in SH, to be sought for under SCH.

Words not found in WH, to be sought for under QUH, expressing the sound of the old Gothic guttural.

Words improperly printed in our old books with Z, to be looked for under Y consonant.

ETYMOLOGICAL DICTIONARY

A

THE letter A has, in the Scottish language, four different sounds :

1. A broad, as in E. all, wall. U is often added, as in cald, cold, written also cauld ; and sometimes w ; both as marks of the prolongation of the sound.

2. A short, in lak, mak, tak, S., as in last, past, E.

3. A open in dad, daddie, a father, and some other words, S., as in E. read, pret., ready, adj.

4. A slender or close, in lane, alane, alone, mane, moan, S., like face, place, E. The monosyllables have generally, although not always, a final e quiescent.

A is used in many words instead of o in E. ; as ane, bane, lang, sang, stane, for one, bone, long, song, stone. For the Scots preserve nearly the same orthography with the Anglo-Saxons, which the English have abandoned. Thus the words last-mentioned were written in A.S. an, ban, lang, sang, stan. In some of the northern counties, as in Angus and Mearns, the sound of ee or ei prevails, instead of ai, in various words of this formation. Ane, bane, stane, &c., are pronounced ein, bein, stein, after the manner of the Germans, who use each of these terms in the same sense.

When this letter is written with an apostrophe, as a', it is meant to intimate that the double l is cut off, according to the pronunciation of Scotland. But this is merely of modern use.

A is sometimes prefixed to words, both in S. and O.E., where it makes no alteration of the sense : as abade, delay, which has precisely the same meaning with baide. This seems to have been borrowed from the A.S., in which language abidan and bidan are perfectly synonymous, both simply signifying to remain, to tarry.

A, in composition, sometimes signifies on ; as agrufe, on the grufe or belly, S. ; Isl. a grufu, cernuè, pronè. Johnson thinks that a, in the composition of such E. words as aside, afoot, asleep, is sometimes contracted from at. But these terms are unquestionably equivalent to on side, on foot, on sleep ; on being used, in the room of a, by ancient writers.

A is used, by our oldest writers, in the sense of one. The signification is more forcible than that of the indefinite article in English ; for it denotes, not merely an individual, where there may be many, or one in particular, but one exclusively of others, in the same sense in which ae is vulgarly used, q. v.

A is often vulgarly used for hae, i. e. have ; as, A done, have done.

Ae, adj. One, S. Although ae and ane both signify one, they differ considerably in their application. Ae denotes an object viewed singly, and as alone ; as, " Ae swallow disna mak a simmer." Ane marks a distinction often where there is a number ; as, " I saw three men on the road ; ane o' them turned awa' to the right hand."

AARVHOUS, s. The place of meeting appointed by the Foud-General, or Chief-Governor. Shetl. Apparently from arf, orf, an arrow prefixed to house ; as an arrow marked with certain signs was used by the ancients for assembling the multitude. V. Croishtarich and Fyre Croce. It appears that the arrow, having been originally used to assemble the people for war, had, at least in name, been retained in calling the people to the place appointed for judicial decisions. Thus airchous denotes the house appointed for judgment.

AAR, s. The Alder, a tree, S. O. V. Arn.

AARON'S-BEARD, s. The dwarf-shrub called St. John's Wort, Hypericum perforatum, Linn. Roxb. This plant was formerly believed by the superstitious in Sweden, as well as in Scotland, to be a charm against the dire effects of witchcraft and enchantment. By putting it into ropy milk, suspected to be bewitched, and milking afresh upon it, they also fancied the milk would be cured.

ABACK, adv. 1. Away ; aloof ; at a distance, S. 2. Behind, in relation to place, S. Burns. 3. Back ; used in relation to time past. Angus. Ross's Helenore.

ABAD, ABAD, ABAID, s. Delay ; abiding ; tarrying ; the same with Bad, Bade. A. S. abid-an, manere, to tarry, to stay. Wallace. Doug. Virg.

To ARAY, ABAW, v. a. To astonish. Abayd, part. pa. astonished ; abawd, Chaucer. Fr. estah-ir, to astonish. K. Hart.

ABAIID, part. pa. Waited ; expected. A. S. abad, expectatus, hoped. Douglas.

- ABBOT, s. Probably for dress. Habit. Pittscottie's Cron.
- ABBOT OF UNREASON, a sort of histrionic character, anciently exhibited in Scotland, but afterwards forbidden by Act of Parliament. Acts Mary. This was one of the Christmas sports; and, as the ancient Saturnalia, levelled all distinction of ranks, the design of this amusement was to ridicule the solemnity of the proceedings of an Abbot, or other dignified clergyman. It is the same with the Abbot of Mirvale, and distinguished in name only from the Boy-Bishop, characters formerly well known both in England and in France. The principal personage was denominated the Abbot of Unreason, because his actions were inconsistent with reason, and merely meant to excite mirth. For a more particular account of this, see The Abbot.
- ABC. An alphabetical arrangement of duties payable to Government on goods imported or exported. Acts Ja. VI.
- ABE, s. Diminutive of Ebenezer; pronounced q. Eb6. Roxb.

- ABSOLVITOR. ABSOLVITOUR, ABSOLVITUR, s. A forensic term, used in two different ways:—1. Abso vitur ab instantia. "One is said to be absolved from the instance, when there is some defect or informality in the proceedings; for thereby that instance is ended until new citation."—Spottiswoode's Law Dict. M.S.—2. Absolvitur from the claim. "When a person is freed by sentence of a judge from any debt or demand, he is said to have obtained absolvitur from the pursuer's claim."—Ibid.

AWA, adv. 1. Away; the general pronunciation in S. 2. In a swoon. 3. At all. In speaking of a deceased relation, there is a peculiar and lovely delicacy in this national idiom. When one cannot avoid a reference to the departed, instead of mentioning the name, or specifying the particular tie, as if it were meant to prevent any unnecessary excitement of feeling, either in the speaker or in the hearer, or as if naming the person were a kind of profanation of the hallowed silence of the tomb, or as if the mos-distant allusion were more than enough—it is usual to speak of them that's awa; the plural being most commonly used, as if the beloved object were removed to a still more respectful distance, than by a more familiar use of the singular.

AWA' P THE HEAD. Deranged; beside one's self, Roxb. Syn. By himsell, by hersell.

To AWAII, AWAL, v. a. 1. To let fall. Barbour. 2.

BANGLE, adj. Huffy; pettish; irritable, Aberd.

To BANGISTER-SWIPE, v. n. To cozen; to deceive by artful means, Roxb. From Bangister, q. v. and A. S. swipe; Teut. sweepce, flagellum, seutica.

BANGNUE, s. Bustle about something trivial; much ado about nothing, Selkirks.

BANG-RAPE, s. A rope with a noose, used by thieves to carry off corn or hay, Clydes. Ayrs.

BANGREL, s. An ill-natured, ungovernable woman, Etrr. For. Formed like Gangrel, Hangrel, &c., from the v. to Bang, as denoting violence.

BANGSOME, adj. Quarrelsome, Aberd. Christmas Ba'ing.

BANGSTRIE, s. Strength of hand; violence to another in his person or property. From Bangster. Acts Ja. VI.

BANG-THE-BEGGAR, s. 1. A strong staff; a powerful kent or rung, Roxb. 2. Humorously transferred to a constable, Dumfr. And to a beadle in Derbyshire. Grose. The v. Bang-a, to beat, seems to be the origin of Teut. benghel, bengel, Su. G. baengel, a strong staff or stick, the instrument used for beating.

To BANYEL, v. a. To bandy backwards and forwards. BANYEL, s. A bundle; used in a contemptuous way, Upp. Clydes. TULLYAT, synon.—C. B. bangaw, bound together, compacted.

BANYEL, s. A slovenly, idle fellow, Roxb.—Teut. benghel, Su. G. baengel, rusticus, homo stupidus.

- BARLA-BREIKIS, BARLEY-BRACKS, s. pl. A game generally played by young people in a corn-yard. Hence called Barlabracks about the stacks, S. B. One stack is fixed on as the dule or goal; and one person is appointed to catch the rest of the company who run out from the dule. He does not leave it till they are all out of his sight; then he sets off to catch them. Any one who is taken, cannot run out again with his former associates, being accounted a prisoner; but is obliged to assist his captor in pursuing the rest. When all are taken the game is finished; and he who was first taken is bound to act as catcher in the next game. This innocent sport seems to be almost entirely forgotten in the south of S. It is also falling into desuetude in the north.—Perhaps from barley and break, q. breaking of the parley. This game was well known in England.
- BARLA-FUMMIL, BARLA-FUMBLE. 1. An exclamation for a truce by one who has fallen down in wrestling or play. Chr. Kirk. 2. It is also used, perhaps improperly, for a fall. Colvil.—Fr. parlez, foi melez, "let us have a truce, and blend our faith."

BEGGER-BOLTS, s. pl. "A sort of darts or missile weapons. The word is used by James VI. in his Battle of Lepanto, to denote the weapons of the forceats, or galley-slaves." Gl. Sibb. Hudson writes beggar's bolts. A friend in Warwickshire says, "They were merely stones. We called them Beggars' Bullets in the same ludicrous sense." The word may have originated from contempt of the persons who used these arms, q. bolts of beggars.

BEGOYT, adj. Foolish; as, "nasty begoyt creature," Banfis.—Fr. bigaut, an ass or fool.

To BEGOUK, v. a. To jilt in courtship; to slight a woman, Peebles.

BEGOUK, BEGOWK, s. The act of jilting. Saxon and Gael. Synon. with Begeik, sense 2. Perhaps from guych-en, ridere.

BEGOUTH, BEGOUDE, pret. Began. Wyntown. Begoud is now commonly used, S.—A. S. gynn-an, beginn-an, seem to have had their pret. formed like code, from gan, ire; Beginnan, begode.

BEGRAUN, part. pa. Buried; interred. Douglas.—A. S. graf-an, fodere; Teut. begraven, sepelire.

BEGRETTE, pret. Saluted. Douglas.—A. S. gret-an Belg. be-groet-en, salutare.

BEHUYD, pret. Behoved. Aberd. Reg.

BEHUIS, Behovest or behoves..

BEJAN CLASS. A designation given to the Greek class in the Universities of St. Andrews and Aberdeen; as, till of late, in that of Edinburgh. Hence, the students in this class are denominated Bejans. It is also written Bajan.—Fr. bejaune, a novice; an apprentice; a young beginner in any science, art, or trade. Cotgr. derives bejaune from bec jaunne, literally a yellow beak or bill. Du Cange observes that L. B. bejaunus signifies a young scholar of any university, and bejaunium the festivity that is held on his arrival. The term is thus very emphatic, being primarily used in relation to a bird newly hatched, whose beak is of a deep yellow.—This is also written Bajan.

To BEJAN, v. a. When a new shearer comes to a harvest-field, he is initiated by being lifted by the arms and legs, and struck down on a stone on his buttocks, Fife. This custom has probably had its origin in some of our universities. It is sometimes called Horsing.

BEYIT, pret. Built. Aberd. Reg.—A. S. bycg-an, to build; or by-an, to inhabit, whence bye, a habitation, Su. G. by, id.

BEIK, s. A hive of bees. V. BYKE.

To BEIK, BEKE, BEEK, v. a. and n. 1. To bask, S. Barbour. 2. To warm; to communicate heat to. Ramsay. 3. It is often used in a neuter sense, S. Yvaine. 4. To diffuse heat; used to denote the genial influence of the rays of the sun. Picken's Poems.—Belg. baeker-en is used in the same sense; baeker-en een kindt, to warm a child. We say, To beik in the sun; so, Belg. baeker-en in de sonne. But our word is more immediately allied to the Scandinavian dialects; Su. G. bak-a, to warm.

BEIK, BEEK, s. 1. The act of basking in the sun, or at the fire, S. 2. That which communicates heat, S. O. Picken's Poems.

BEIK, adj. Warm. Bannatyne Poems.

BEIK, s. 1. This word, primarily signifying the beak or bill of a fowl, is "sometimes used for a man's mouth, by way of contempt." Rudd. Douglas. 2. It is used, as a cant word, for a person; "an auld beik," "a queer beik," &c., S. 3. Perhaps at times used for beach.—Belg. biek, Fr. bec, rostrum. It may be observed, that the latter is metaph. applied to a person. V. BEJAN.

BEIKAT, s. A male salmon. V. BYKAT.

To BEIL, BEAL, v. n. 1. To suppurate, S. Maitland Poems. 2. To swell or rankle with pain, or remorse; metaph. applied to the mind, S. B. Ross. Wodrow.—Belg. buyt-en, protuberant? Ihre derives Su. G. bold, a boil, from Isl. bolg-a, intumescere.

BEILIN, s. A suppurating, S.

BEILD, BEELD, s. 1. Shelter; refuge; protection, S. Gawan and Gol.—"Every man bows to the bush he gets beild frae," S. Prov. Every man pays court to him who gives him protection. 2. Support; stay; means of sustenance, S. Douglas. 3. A place of shelter; hence, applied to a house, a habitation, S. Morison. 4. Lee; the shelter found in going to leeward. In the beild of the dyke, on the side of the wall that is free from the blast, S. 5. One who acts as a guardian or protector, S.—A. Bor. beild, id.

STRAIT BEILDS. A shelter formed by a steep hill, Peebles.

BEILDING also occurs where it seems doubtful whether buildings or shelter be meant. Gawan and Gol.—Isl. baele denotes both a bed or couch, and a cave, a lurking-place; cubile, spelunca. It is highly probable that baele is radically the same with Isl. boele, domicilium, habitatio; from bo, to build, to inhabit.

To BEILD, v. a. 1. To protect; to shelter. Monastery. To supply; to support. Wallace. 2. In one passage it seems to signify, to take refuge, in a neuter sense. Gawan and Gol.—This verb, it would seem, has been formed from the noun, q. v., or has a common origin with Isl. bael-a, used to denote the act of causing cattle to lie down.

BEILD, adj. Bold. Houlate.—A. S. beald, id. A. S. Alem. belde, audacia.

BEILED. An ancient sea-faring term; perhaps moored, and for E. delayed.

To BEILL, v. a. To give pain or trouble to; as, "I'll no beill my head about it," Lanarks.

BEILL, s. Perhaps sorrow, care; q. bail. Bannatyne Poems.

BEIN, s. Bone, Ang. One is said to be aw frae the bein, all from the bone, when proud, elevated, or highly pleased; in allusion, as would seem, to the fleshy parts rising from the bone when the body is swollen.

BEIN, BEYNE, adj. Wealthy. BEINLIER, comparative. V. BENE.

To BEIN the pot. V. BEAM, v.

To BEIN, v. a. To render comfortable. A house is said to be bein'd when thoroughly dried, Roxb. V. under BENE, adj. sense 2.

BEINLIKE, BIENLIKE, adj. Having the appearance of abundance; creditable in appearance. Gl. Siller Gun.

BEINNESS, s. Snugness in temporal circumstances; moderate wealth; comfort, S. V. under BENE.

* BEING, BEIN, s. Means of sustenance; as, "He has nae bein' ava," he has no visible means of support, Fife.

BEING, BING, s. The beach of the sea-shore, Mearns.

BEIR, BERE, BIR, BIRR, s. 1. Noise; cry; roar. Douglas. The word is used in this sense by R. Glouc. 2. Force; impetuosity; often as denoting the violence of the wind, S. Vir, virr, Aberd. Douglas.—O. E. birre, byre, birre. The term, especially as used in the second sense, seems nearly allied to Isl. byre, (tempestas), Su. G. boer, the wind; which seem to acknowledge byr-ia, boer-ia, surgere, as their root.

To BEIR, BERE, v. s. To roar; to make a noise. Wallace. Teut. baeren, beren, is expl. by Kilian; Fremere, sublatè et ferociter clamare more ursorum. The learned writer seems thus to view it as a deriva-

- live from baere, bere, a bear. Perhaps, however, the verb is formed from the noun, q. v. V. BIRR.
- BEIRD, s. A bard; a minstrel. Douglas. V. BAIRD.
- BEYRD, pret. Laid on a bier. Mailland Poems.—From A. S. baer, baere, feretrum.
- BEIR-SEID, s. That portion of agricultural labour which is appropriated to the raising of barley. V. BEAR-SEED.
- BEIRTH, BYRTH, s. Burden; encumbrance; charge. Gl. Sibb.—Dan. byrde, byrth; Isl. byrd; Su. G. boerda; Belg. borde; A. S. byrth-in; from Moes. G. baiv-an, Su. G. baer-a, to bear.
- BEYR-TREE, s. The bier on which a corpse is carried to the grave, Aberd.
- BEIS, v. s. Be is; third pers. sing. subj., S. Douglas.—Here the second pers. is improperly used for the third. A. S. byst, sis; Alem. Franc. dist, es, from bin, sum; Wächter, vo. BIN.
- BEIS, BEES. One's head is said to be in the bees when one is confused or stupefied with drink or otherwise, S. Shirrefs.—Teut. bies-en, aestuari, furente impetu, agitari; or from the same origin with Bazed, q. v.
- BEIS, BEES, prep. In comparison with; compared with; as, "Ye're auld beis me;" You are old in comparison with me, Loth. Fife.
- BEYSAND. Quite at a loss; benumbed; stupefied, Eitr. For.—Isl. bysn, a prodigy, q. as one who has seen a prodigy. V. BYSSYM.
- BEIST, BEISTYN, s. The first milk of a cow after she has calved, S.; biestings, E.—A. S. beost, byst; Teut. biest, biest melck, id. (colostrum). A. S. bysting, id.
- BEIST-CHEESE, s. The first milk boiled to a thick consistence, somewhat resembling new-made cheese, Mearns. Beistyncheese, id. Lanarks.
- BEIST-MILK, s. V. BEIST, BEISTYN.
- To BEIT, BETE, BET, BEET, v. a. 1. To help; to supply; to mend, by making addition. Bett, part. pa. Ramsay. Henryson. To beit the fire, or beit the ingle. To add fuel to the fire, S. "To beit, to make or feed a fire," Gl. Grose. To beit a-mister, to supply a want, Loth. 2. To blow up, to enkindle, applied to the fire. Douglas. 3. To excite affection, as applied to the mind. Burns. 4. To bring into a better state, by removing calamity or cause of sorrow; to abate, to mitigate. Wallace.—A. S. bet-an, ge-bet-an, to mend, to restore to the original state; Belg. boet-en; Isl. bet-a; Su. G. boet-a, id., boet-a klaeder, to repair or mend clothes. A. S. bet-an fyr, corresponds to the S. phrase mentioned above, struere ignem. Wallace.
- BEIT, s. An addition; a supply, S. B.
- BEITING, BERING, s. Supply; the act of aiding. Acts Ja. VI.
- BEIT-MISTER, s. That which is used in a strait, for supplying any deficiency; applied either to a person or to a thing; Loth. V. BEIT, v. and MISTER.
- BEYZLESS. In the extreme. Beyzless ill, extremely bad. She is a beyzless clink, she is a great tale-bearer, Upp. Clydes. Perhaps q. bias-less, without any bias or tendency to the contrary. Used as adv. and adj.
- To BEKE, v. a. To bask. V. BEIK.
- BEKEND, part. Known; S. B. bekent. Douglas.—Germ. bekannt, id.; Teut. be-kennen, to know; A. S. be-cunnan, experiri.
- BEKIN, s. A beacon; a signal, Bellenden.—A. S. beacn, Dan. bakn, id.
- BELCH, BELGE, BAILCH, BILCH, s. (putt.) 1. A mon-
- ster. Douglas. 2. A term applied to a very lusty person, S. B. "A burden belch," or bilch, one who is breathless from corpulence, q. burst, like a horse that is broken-winded. Ross. 3. A brat; a contemptuous designation for a child; synon. Belshagh Strathmore.—Teut. balgh, the belly; or as it is pronounced baig, Moray, from Su. G. bolg-ia, bulg-ia, to swell.
- BELD, adj. Bald, without hair on the head, S. Burns. V. BELLIT.—Seren. derives it from Isl. bala, planties. With fully as much probability might it be traced to Isl. bael-a, vastare, prosternere, to lay flat.
- BELD, s. Pattern; model of perfection. V. BELEDE.
- BELD, imperf. v. Perhaps, took the charge of, or protected. Houlate.—Fr. baill, a guardian. In this sense it is nearly allied to E. bailed, Fr. baillier, to present, to deliver up. As, however, we have the word beild, shelter, protection, beld may possibly belong to a verb corresponding in sense.
- BELD CYTTES, s. pl. Bald coots. Houlate.—The bald coot receives its name from a bald spot on its head. It is vulgarly called bell-kite, S.
- BELDIT, part. pa. Imaged; formed. V. BEELDES.
- Houlate*.—Belg. beeld-en; Germ. bild-en; Sw. bild-a-formare, imaginari. A. S. bild, bilith; Germ. Sw. bild, belaele, an image.
- BELDNESS, BELTHNESS, s. Baldness, Clydes.
- To BELE, v. n. "To burn, to blaze."—Wyntown.—This, however, may mean, bellowed, roared, from A. S. bell-an, Su. G. bal-a, id. Chaucer uses belle in the same sense.
- BELE, s. A fire; a blaze. V. BAIL.
- To BELEAGUER, v. a. To surround in a threatening and violent manner. Guthry's Mem.
- BELECHER, BEILCHER, BELCHER, s. Entertainment victuals. Acts Ja. IV. Fr. belle chere, good entertainment. Chere, "victuals; entertainment for the teeth," Colgr.
- BELEFE, s. Hope. Douglas.
- To BELEIF, v. a. To leave; pret. beleft. Douglas.—A. S. be, and leaf-an, linquere.
- To BELEIF, BELEWE, v. a. To deliver up. Douglas. It is also used as a v. n. with the prep. of. Barbour.—A. S. belaeu-an, tradere; belaeued, traditus.
- To BELENE, v. n. To tarry; or, perhaps, to recline to rest. Sir Gawan.—A. S. bilen-ed, inhabited. C. allied to Germ. len-en, recumbere. V. LEIND.
- BELEVE, s. Hope. Bellenden. V. BELEFE.
- BELEWYT, imperf. v. Delivered up. V. BELIEF, v. s.

- BE-LIKE, adj. Probable. "That story's no be-like" Lanarks.
- BELYK, adv. Probably. E. Belike. Bannatyn's Trans.
- BELYVE, BELIFF, BELIUE, BELIFE, adv. 1. Immediately; quickly. Douglas. 2. By and by, S. Barbour. This seems to be the only modern sense of the term in S. 3. At length. Douglas. 4. It is used in a singular sense, S. B. Little belive, or bliue, a small remainder. Popular Ball.—Chaucer, belive, bliu quickly; Gower, blyve, id. Hicckes mentions Fran-

- belbe*, as signifying protinus, confestim; and Junius refers to Norm. Sax. belipe. This is certainly the same word; from Alem. and Franc. belib-an, manere; A. S. belif-an, id.
- BELL, Bel, s. A bubble in water or any liquid. Saïpbells, bubbles formed by blowing out soapy water, S. Teut. belle, bull, a bubble. V. BELLER.
- To BELL, v. n. To bubble up; to throw up or bear bubbles, S. Perils of Man.
- BELL, s. The blossom of a plant; as, "Lint in the bell," flax in flower. Gl. Burns. Heather-bells, &c. Bell in E. the cup of a flower.
- BELL on a horse's face. A blaze; a white mark, S. Armor. baill, a white spot or mark on a horse's face. O. Fr. id.
- BELL of the Brae. The highest part of the slope of a hill.—C. B. bul denotes a prominence, or that which juts out.
- To BELL THE CAT, to contend with one, especially if of superior rank or power; to withstand him, either by words or actions; to use strong measures, without regard to consequences, S. Godscraft.—Fr. Mettre la campane au chat, "to begin a quarrel, to raise a brabble; we say also, in the same sense, to hang the bell about the cat's neck." Cotgr.
- BELL-KITE, s. The bald coat. V. BELD CYTTES.
- BELL-PENNY, s. Money laid up, for paying the expense of one's funeral; from the ancient use of the passing-bell. This word is still used in Aberbrothick.
- BELLAM, s. A stroke or blow, S. B.; radically the same with BELLUM, q. v.
- BELLAN, s. Fight; combat, Douglas.—Lat. bellum.
- BELLANDINE, s. A broil; a squabble. Hogg's Wint. Tales.
- BELLA, s. Bonfire. V. BAIL.
- BELLEIS, BELLIS, s. A pair of bellows. Aberd. Reg.
- To BELLER, v. n. To bubble up. Bp. Galloway. Perhaps allied to Isl. bilur, impetus venti, or bilvige, fuctus maris, or belgia, inflare buccas.
- BELL-HEATHER, s. Cross-leaved heath, S. Erica tetralix. Ess. Highl. Soc.
- To BELLY one's self o' Water. To take a bellyful of water. Syn. with To bag one's self w' water. Aberd.
- BELLY-BLIND, s. The play called Blindman's-buff, S. A.: Blind Harie synonym., S. Anciently this term denoted the person who was blindfolded in the game. Lyndsay. In Su. G. this game is called blind-bock, i. e. blind goat; and in Germ. blinde kuh, q. v. blind cow. It is probable, that the term is the same with Billy Blinde, mentioned in the Tales of Wonder, and said to be the name of "a familiar spirit, or good genius."
- BELLICAL, adj. Warlike; martial. Lat. bellicus. Acts Mary.
- BELLICON, s. A blustering fellow, Ayrs. Fr. belliqueux, warlike; or baligaut, a bragger.
- BELLICOUS, adj. Warlike. Hist. James VI. Lat. bellicus, id.
- BELLIE-MANTIE, s. A name for the play of Blindman's-buff, Upp. Clydes. As the principal actor was not only blindfolded, but enveloped in the skin of an animal, the latter part of the word may be from Fr. manteau, q. v. Billy with the mantle. V. BELLY-BLIND.
- BELLY-FLAUGHT. 1. To slay, or flay, belly-flaught, to bring the skin overhead, as in flaying a hare, S. B. Monroe's Iles. 2. It is used in Loth. and other provinces, in a sense considerably different; as denoting great eagerness or violence in approaching an object.
- Ramsay*. 3. It is also rendered, "flat forward," J. Nicol.
- BELLY-GOURDON, s. A glutton, Fife. Perhaps from Belly, and gurd, gourd, to gorge.—O. Fr. gordin, stupid, &c.
- BELLY-HUDDRON. V. HUDDRON.
- BELLY-RACK, s. An act of gormandizing, Lanarks. q. racking or stretching the belly.
- BELLY-THRA, s. The colic. Gl. Complaynt.—A. S. belg, belly, and thra, affliction. This term, I am informed, is still used on the Border.
- BELLING, s. The state of desiring the female; a term properly applied to harts. Douglas.—Rudd. derives the phrase from Fr. beltier, a ram; but perhaps it is rather from Isl. bael-a, bel-ia, baul-a, Germ. bell-en, mugire, boare.
- BELLIS, s. pl. This perhaps refers to the belling-time of beasts, mentioned above. Wallace.
- BELLIS, s. pl. Bells. Black Bellis of Berwick, artillery of Berwick; so called, perhaps, when Berwick was a bone of contention, and the air so often rung with this harsh music. Spotswood.
- BELLISAND, BELLISANT, adj. Elegant; of an imposing appearance. Forbes on the Rev.—Fr. belle, used adverbially, and seant, decent, becoming, q. v. having a good appearance.
- BELLIT, adj. Bald. Fordun. Scotchchron. V. BELD.
- BELLONIE, s. A noisy, brawling woman, Ayrs.—Lat. Bellona.
- To BELLRAIVE, v. n. To rove about; to be unsteady; to act hastily and without consideration, Roxb. Raive seems to be the same as E. to rove, Isl. hraufa, loco movere; bell may indicate that the term has been originally applied to a wedder which carried the bell, from being disposed to roam. V. BELLWAVER.
- BELLUM, s. Force; impetus. Syn. Bensel.
- BELL-WARE, s. The sea-weed of which kelp is made, Zostera marina. Agr. Surv. Caithn.
- To BELLWAVER, v. n. 1. To straggle, to stroll, S. Saint Patrick. 2. To fluctuate, to be inconstant; applied to the mind, S. 3. Applied to narrative, when one does not tell a story coherently, I am informed, however, that the pronunciation of the term in some places in the west of S. is Bullwaver; and that it is primarily applied to a bull when going after the cow, and hence transferred to man, when supposed to be engaged in some amorous pursuit. The origin of the latter part of the v. is obvious; either from E. waver, or L. B. wayvaire, to stray. Perhaps the allusion may be to a ram or other animal, roaming with a bell hung round its neck. The Monastery.
- To BELOW one's self. To demean. I wadna below mysell sae far, Fife. Perth.
- BELSHACH, s. A contemptuous designation for a child; equivalent to Brat, Strathm. Perhaps from Gael. biolasgach, talkative, biolasgadh, prattling.
- BELSHIE, adj. Fat, and, at the same time, diminutive, Upp. Clydes.
- BELT, s. Often used to denote a strip of planting.
- To BELT, v. a. To flog, to scourge, S. Hogg's Brownie of Bodsbeck.
- To BELT, v. n. To come forward with a sudden spring, S.—Isl. belt-a, belt-ast, signifies, to tumble headlong.
- BELT, part. pa. Built. Douglas.
- To BELT, v. a. 1. To gird, S. Hence, in our old ballads belted knights are often introduced. Belt is sometimes used as the part. pa. Douglas. 2. To gird, as expressive of an honorary distinction.—William Hay, then constable of Scotland, was the first belled Earle of Erroll. Pittscottie's Cron. 3. To gird, metaph. used in relation to the mind. Bellenden.

4. To surround, to environ in a hostile manner. Bellenden.—Isl. belt-a, cingere zona.

BELTED PLAID, s. The plaid or mantle worn by Highlanders in full military dress, S.

BELTING, s. The ceremony of putting on the sword and belt in former times, in making a lord of parliament. Acts Ja. VI.

BELTANE, BELTEIN, s. The name of a sort of festival observed on the first day of May, O. S.; hence used to denote the term of Whitsunday. Febilis to the Play. This festival is chiefly celebrated by the cow-herds, who assemble by scores in the fields, to dress a dinner for themselves of boiled milk and eggs. These dishes they eat with a sort of cakes baked for the occasion, and having small lumps in the form of nipples, raised all over the surface. The cake seems to have been an offering to some Deity in the days of Druidism.—In Ireland, Beltein is celebrated on the 21st June, at the time of the solstice. There, as they make fires on the tops of hills, every member of the family is made to pass through the fire; as they reckon this ceremony necessary to ensure good fortune through the succeeding year.—The Gael. and Ir. word Beal-tine or Beil-tine signifies Bel's Fire; as composed of Baal or Belis, one of the names of the sun in Gael. and tein signifying fire. Even in Angus a spark of fire is called a tein or teind.

BELTER, s. Perhaps beating or bickering; from Gael. bual-am, to beat, buaite, beat, bualadh, beating, bualtaire, one who beats or thrashes another.

BELTH, s. Douglas.—This word may denote a whirlpool or rushing of waters. I am inclined, however, to view it, either as equivalent to belch, only with a change in the termination, metri causa; or as signifying figure, image, from A. S. biliith, Alem. bilid, bileth, id.

To BEMANG, v. a. To hurt; to injure; to overpower, S. B. Minstrely Border.

To BEME, v. n. 1. To resound; to make a noise. Douglas. 2. To call forth by sound of trumpet. Gawan and Gol.—Germ. domm-en, resonare; or A. S. beam, bema, tuba. It is evident that bema is radically the same with dommen, because Germ. domme, as well as A. S. beam, signifies a trumpet.

BEME, s. A trumpet; BMYS, pl. Gawan and Gol.—O. E. beem, id. V. the v.

BEMYNG, s. Bumping; buzzing. Douglas.

BEN, s. A kind of small salmon, generally from seven to ten pounds in weight. They are darker in the back and whiter in the belly than those commonly caught; and appear in the Solway Firth about the end of March, from which time they are taken till the beginning of May. For this reason they are called Wair-bens, that is, the fish that come in Spring. Annandale. Perhaps from Gael. bean, quick, nimble, from the activity and liveliness of the species—or from ban white, owing to the colour of its belly; as the char is called red-wame, from the redness of the same part of the body. Wair is the Gothic designation of spring.

BEN, s. A mountain, used both in composition and by itself. Jacobite Relics.—C. B. ban, a prominence, or what is high; Ir. Gael. beann, bein, a summit, a mountain; C. B. ben is synonym; hence Lat. Peninus, or Apennines. V. BIN.

BEN, adv. 1. Towards the inner apartment of a house; corresponding to But, S. Wyntown. It is also used as a preposition, Gae ben the house, Go into the inner apartment. 2. It is used metaph. to denote intimacy, favour, or honour. Thus it is said of one, who is admitted to great familiarity with another, who either is, or wishes to be thought his superior; He is far ben. "O'er far ben, too intimate or familiar," Gl. Shirr. Lyndsay. Leg. as in ed. 1670, far ben.—A. S. binnan; Belg. binnen, intus, (within); binnen-kamer, locus secretior in penetralibus domus; Killian. Belg. binnen gaan, to go within, S. to gae ben; binnen brengen, to carry within, S. to bring ben.

A BUT and a BEN, S.; i. e. a house containing two rooms. Statist. Acc.

To COME BEN. To be advanced; to come to honour, S. B. Ross.

BEN-END, s. 1. The ben-end of a house, the inner part of it, S. 2. Metaph., the best part of anything; as, the ben-end of one's dinner, the principal part of it, S. B.

BENNER, adj. A comparative formed from ben. Inner, S. B. Poems Buchan Dial.

Sir J. Carr.

THE-BEN, adv. In the interior apartment, S. Ross.

THERE-BEN, adv. Within, in the inner apartment, S. V. THAIRBEN.

BEN-INNO, prep. Within, beyond, S. B. Journal Lond.—From ben, q. v. and A. S. inne, or innon, within; Alem. inna; Isl. inne, id.

BENMOST is used as a superlative, signifying innermost. Ferguson.—Teut. binnenste is synonym.

BENCH, s. A frame fixed to the wall for holding plates, &c., Aberd. Bink, Angus.

BEND, s. A spring; a leap; a bound. Lyndsay. Perhaps from Fr. bond, id. Or it may be merely an oblique use of the E. s. as expressive of the incurvation of the body which generally precedes a leap.

To BEND, v. n. To spring; to bound. Lyndsay.

BEND, BEND-LEATHER, s. Leather, thickened by tanning, for the soles of boots and shoes, S. Rates, A. 1670.

BEND, s. A muffer, kercher, or cowl.

BEND, s. 1. Band, ribbon, or fillet; pl. bendis.

Douglas. "Bend, a border of a woman's cap, North; perhaps from band," Gl. Grose. 2. It is used improperly for a fleece. Douglas.—A. S. bend, baende, Moes. G. bandi, Germ. band, Pers. band, vinculum.

To BEND, v. n. To drink hard; a cant term, S. Ramsay.

BEND, s. A pull of liquor, S. Ramsay.

BENDER, s. A hard drinker, S. Ramsay.

BEND ANEUGH. Expl. Bravely enough, Aberd. Skinner.

BENDROLE, BANDROLL, BEDROLL, s. The prop or rest used formerly for a heavy musket. Milit. Hist. Fr. banderole; E. bandrol, a small flag or pennon worn at the point of a lance.

BENE, v. subst. Are. Bellenden. Chaucer., ben, id. from beon, third p. pl. subj. of the A. S. substantive verb.

BENE is also used for be. King's Quair.

BENE, BEIN, BEYNE, BIEN, adj. 1. Wealthy, well-provided, possessing abundance, S. Henryssone.—This is perhaps the most common sense of the term, S. Thus we say, A bene or bein farmer, a wealthy farmer, one who is in easy, or even in affluent circumstances; a bein laird, &c. 2. Warm, genial. In this sense it is applied to a fire, S. Douglas. 3. Pleasant, comfortably situated. Douglas. 4. Happy, blissful, S. Ferguson. 5. Splendid, showy. Wallace. 6. Good, excellent in its kind. Dunbar. 7. Eager, new-fangled. People are said to be bein upon anything that they are very fond of, Loth. In this sense bayne occurs in O. E. 8. A bein cask, a cask that is quite water-tight, Lanarks. Isl. bein-a, signifies to prosper, to give success to any undertaking. Bein, as allied to this, signifies hospitable; beine, hospitality, hospitibus advenae exhibitia beneficentia. G. Andr. mentions the v. beina, as signifying hospitium beneficia praestare. Beini, hospitality, liberality.

BENE, adv. Well; full bene, full well. Douglas. This word is most probably from Lat. benè, well.

BENEFICIT, part. adj. Beneficed. Acts Mary, From L. B. benefacere, to endow with a benefice.

BENEFICIAL, adj. Of or belonging to a benefice. Fr. beneficial, id.

BENEFIT, s. Allowance to servants besides their money wages, Galloway.

BENELY, BEINLY, adv. 1. In the possession of fulness. L. Scotland's Lament. 2. Well, abundantly. Picken. 3. Exhibiting the appearance of wealth. R. Gilhaize. 4. Happily. Davidson's Seasons.

BENEWA, adv. Beneath; below; Aberdeen; also Benyanu.

BENEW, prep. To clink, apparently to fasten. A. S. beneoeth, id.

BENJEL, s. A heap, a considerable quantity; as "a benjel of coals," when many are laid at once on the fire, S. B. Bensil, however is used in the same sense in the South and West of S. V. BENSELL.

BENJIE, s. The abbreviation of the name Benjamin.

BENK, BINK, s. A bench, a seat. It seems sometimes to have denoted a seat of honour. Kelly.—Dan. benk, Germ. bank, scamnum; Wachter.

BENN, s. A sash. Statist. Acc. V. BEND.

BENNELS, s. pl. A kind of mats, made of reeds woven together, used for forming partitions in cottages; or laid across the rafters to form an inner roof, Roxb. If not synon. with Teut. bendel, fascia, or allied to Isl. bendla, concatenare, perhaps q. ben-walls, from forming a separation between the ben and the but.

BENNELS, LINT-BENNELS, s. pl. The seed of flax, Roxb.; synon. Bolls, Bows.

BENNYST, part. pa. Banished. Aberd. Reg.

BENORTH, prep. To the northward of; besouth, to the southward of, S. Wyntown.

BENSELL, BENSAIL, BENT-SAIL, s. 1. Force, violence of whatever kind, S. Douglas. 2. Exposure to a violent wind; as, "I am sure ye bade a sair bensell," i. e. suffered a severe attack of the gale, Galloway. 3. Transferred to a place exposed to the violence of a storm, and directly opposed to biel. Hence Bensil o' the brae, that point of an eminence most exposed to the weather, Fife. 4. Bensil o' a fire, a strong fire, South and West of S. 5. Stretch, full bent. 6. A severe stroke; properly that which one receives from a push or shove, S. 7. "A severe rebuke," Gl. Shirr. "I got a terrible bensell," I was severely scolded, S. It is not unlikely that the word was originally bent-sail, as alluding to a vessel driven by the force of the winds.

To BENSELL, v. a. To bang, or beat, Gl. Sibb. "Bensel, to beat or bang. Vox rustica, Yorksh." Gl. Grose.

BENSHAW, BEANSHAW, s. A disease, apparently of horses. Polwart. Formed perhaps from A. S. ban, Tent been, os, and hef, elevatio; q. the swelling of the bone.

BENSHIE, BENSHI, s. Expl. "Fairy's wife." Pennant. It has been observed, that this being, who is still revered as the tutelal demon of ancient Irish families, is of pure Celtic origin, and owes her title to two Gaelic words, Ben and sighan, signifying the head or chief of the fairies. But it seems rather derived from Ir. Gael. ben, bean, a woman, said by O'Brien to be the root of the Lat. Venus, and sigh, a fairy or hobgoblin.

To BENSIE, v. a. To strike impetuously, Aberd. Isl. bangs-as, belluino more insultare. V. BENSELL.

BENSOME, adj. Quarrelsome. Skinner. V. BANGSOME.

BERE, s. Barley. Wyntown.

BERESSONE OF. By reason of. Aberd. Reg., passim. To BERGE, v. n. To scold; to storm; generally including the idea of the impotent wrath of women and children, S. O. V. BEARGE.

BERGIN, part. pr. Storming; scolding. Peter's Letters.

BERGLE, BERGEL, s. The wrasse, a fish, Orkn. Barry.—The first syllable of its name is undoubtedly from Isl. berg, a rock. Had it any resemblance to the eel, we might suppose the last from aal, q. the rock eel.

BERGUYLT, s. The Black Goby, a fish. Edmondstone's Zeland.

BERHEDIS, s. pl. Heads of boars. Gawan and Gol. V. BERE.

- To BERY, BERYSS, BERISCH, v. a. To inter, to bury. Douglas.—A. S. byrig-an, id. Junius says that A. S. byrig-an is literally, tumulare. It may, however, be supposed that the primitive idea is found in Isl. birg-ia, Franc. berg-an, to cover, to hide, to defend.
- BERY BROUNE, a shade of brown approaching to red. Gawan and Gol.—We still say, "as brown as a berry." S.—A. S. beria, bacca.
- BERIALL, s. Perhaps, a burial, or a burial-place. A. S. byrgels signifies both, sepulcrum, sepultura. V. BERRIS.
- BERIALL, adj. Shining like beryl. Douglas.

- BERYNES, BERYNISS, s. Burial, interment, Barbour.—A. S. byryngese, sepultura.
- BERIT, imperf. V. BEIR, v.
- BERLE, s. Beryl, a precious stone. Houlate.—From this s. Doug. forms the adj. beriall, shining like beryl.
- BERLY, adj. Apparently strong, mighty. Henryson. This word is the same, I suspect, with E. burly, strong. If berly be the ancient word, either from Gern, bar, vir illustris; or from baer, ursus; especially as Su. G. biorn, id. was metaph. used to denote an illustrious personage.
- BERLIK MALT, s. Malt made of barley. Act. Audit.
- BERLIN, s. A sort of galley. Guy Mannering. Also written Bierling, q. v.
- BERN, BERNE, s. 1. A baron. Wallace. 2. It is often used in a general sense, as denoting a man of rank or authority; or one who has the appearance of rank, although the degree of it be unknown. Gawan and Gol. 3. A man in general. Douglas.—A. S. beorne, princeps, homo, Benson; "a prince, a nobleman, a man of honour and dignity," Somner. Bern, as denoting a man, in an honourable sense, may be from A. S. bar, free, or Lat. baro, used by Cicero, as equivalent to a lord or peer of the realm.
- BERN, s. A barn, a place for laying up and thrashing grain. Gawan and Gol.—A. S. bern, id. Junius supposes that this is comp. of bere, barley, and ern, place, q. "the place where barley is deposited," Gl. Goth.
- BERNE-YARD, s. The enclosure adjoining a barn, in which the produce of the fields is stacked for preservation during winter, S. barnyard.—A. S. berne, horreum, and geard, sepimentum.
- BERNMAN, s. A thrasher of corn, S. A.; elsewhere a barman.
- BERN-WINDLIN, s. A ludicrous term for a kiss given in the corner of a barn, Etr. For.
- BERNY, s. Abbreviation of Barnaby or Barnabas. V. BARNY.
- To BERRY, v. a. 1. To beat; as, to berry a bairn, to beat a child. 2. To thrash corn, Roxb. Annaand. Dumfr.—Su. G. baer-ia. Isl. ber-ia, ferire, pulsare; item, pugnare.
- BERSERKAR, BERSERKER, s. A name given to men said to have been possessed of preternatural strength and extreme ferocity. The Pirate. V. EYRTYN, and WARWOLF.
- BERSIS, s. "A species of cannon formerly much used at sea. It resembled the faucon, but was shorter, and of a larger calibre," Gl. Complaynt S.—Fr. barce, berche, "the piece of ordnance called a base," Cotgr.; pl. barces, berches.
- BERTH, s. Apparently, rage. Wyntown.—Isl. and Sw. braede, id.

- BERVIE HADDOCK, s. Haddocks split, and half-dried with the smoke of a fire of wood, cured for the most part at Inver-bervie. Often called Bervies, S.
- BERWARD, s. One who keeps bars; E. bearward. Colkellie Sow.
- To BESAIK, v. a. To beseech. Aberd. Reg. V. BESEK.
- BESAND, BEISAND, s. An ancient piece of gold coin, offered by the French kings at the mass of their consecration at Rheims, and called a Byzantine, as the coin of this description was first struck at Byzantium or Constantinople. It is said to have been worth, in French money, fifty pounds Tournois. Kennedy.
- To BESEIK, v. a. To beseech, to entreat. Douglas.—A. S. be and sec-an, to seek; Bolg. ver-sock-en, to solicit, to entreat; Moes. G. sok-jan, to ask, used with respect to prayer.
- BESEINE, BESEEN, part. pa. 1. Well acquainted or conversant with; skilled in. 2. Provided; furnished; fitted out. Pitcoltie.—A. S. bese-on; Teut. besi-en, intueri. In the first sense, Beseen denotes one who has looked well upon or into anything; in the second, one who has been well looked to, or cared for, in any respect.
- To BESET, v. a. To become; used as syn. with S. set. Rollock.—Teut. be-sett-en, componere; be set, decens, aptus. V. SET, v.
- BESHACHT, part. pa. 1. Not straight, distorted, Ang. 2. Torn, tattered; often including the idea of dirtiness, Perth. The latter seems to be an oblique use. V. SHACHT.
- BESY, adj. Busy. Wyntown.—A. S. bysi, Belg. besigh, id.; allied perhaps to Teut. byse, turbatus, bijs-en, violento impetu agitari. From Su. G. besa, a term used concerning beasts, which run hither and thither with violence, when stung by gadflies.
- BESID, pret. Burst with a bizzing noise like brisk beer. Dunbar. The same with S. bizzed.
- BESYNE, BYSENE, BYSIM, s. Expl. "whore, bawd," Gl. Sibb. V. BISM.
- BESYNES, s. 1. Business. Wyntown. 2. Trouble disturbance.
- To BESLE, or BEZLE, v. n. To talk much at random, to talk inconsiderately and boldly on a subject that one is ignorant of, Ang.—Belg. beusel-en, to trifle, to fable; Teut. beusel-en, nugari.
- BESLE, BEZLE, s. Idle talking, Ang. Belg. beusel, id. BESMOTTRIT, part. pa. Bespattered, fouled. Douglas.—A. S. besmyt-an, maculare, inquinare; Belg. besmodder-en, Germ. schmader-n, schmutter-n, to stain, S. to smadd, Su. G. smitt-a.
- BESOM, s. A contemptuous designation for a low woman; a prostitute, S. Old Mortality. V. BYSSYM.

 BY, prep. 1. Beyond, S. Pitscottie. 2. Besides, over and above. Pitscottie. 3. Above, more than, in preference to. Davidson's Schort Discurs. 4. In a way of distinction from, S. Wallace. 5. Without. Pitscottie. 6. Away from, without regard to, contrary to. Wallace. By, as thus used, is sometimes directly contrasted with be, as signifying by in the modern sense of the term. This may be viewed as an oblique sense of by as signifying beyond; perhaps in allusion to an arrow that flies wide from the mark.
 BY, adv. 1. When, after; q. by the time that, Pitscottie. This idiom is very ancient. Moes. G. B. the galithun that brothrus is; When his brethrer were gone up. 2. As signifying although; as, "I carena by," I don't care though I agree to your proposal, S. 3. Denoting approximation, or approach from some distance; used in the composition of various adverbs.
 DOWN-BY, adv. Downwards; implying the idea that the distance is not great.
 IN-BY, adv. Nearer to any object; q. v.
 OUR-BY, adv. This, as well as Through-by, is used by neighbours in the phrase "Come our-by," or, "Come through-by," when parks, woods, streams, or some thing that must be passed through or over, intervene between their respective residences, S.

 BIAS, a word used as a mark of the superlative degree bias bonny, very handsome; bias hungry, very hungry, Aberd. V. BYOUS, which is perhaps the proper orthography.
 BIB, s. A term used to denote the stomach, Ang. Borrowed, perhaps, from the use of that small piece of linen, thus denominated, which covers the breast or stomach of a child.
 BYBILL, s. A large writing, a scroll so extensive that it may be compared to a book. Detection Q. Mary.—The word occurs in a similar sense in O. E. As used by Chaucer, Tyrwhitt justly renders it "any great book." In the dark ages, when books were scarce those which would be most frequently mentioned would doubtless be the Bible and Breviary. Or, the use of the word may be immediately from L. J.

- biblus*, a book, (Gr. βιβλος), which occurs in this sense from the reign of Charlemagne downwards.
- BIBLIOTHEC, s. A library. Nicol Burne.—Lat. bibliotheca.
- BIBLIOTHECAR, s. A librarian, ibid.
- BICHMAN, s. Perhaps, for bushman, q. boothman, one who sells goods in a booth. Dunbar.—In edit. 1508, it is bushman.
- BYCHT. V. LYCHT Houlae.
- BICK, s. A bitch; "the female of the canine kind." S.—A. S. bicca, bicce, id.; Isl. bickia, catella.
- To BICK AND BIRR, v. n. To cry as grouse, Roxb. Winter Ev. Tales.—Perhaps allied to Belg. bikk-en, to beat, to chop, as denoting the noise made by its wings. V. BIRE.
- To BICKER, BYKER, v. n. This v., as used in S., does not merely signify, "to fight, to skirmish, to fight off and on," as it is defined in E. dictionaries. It also denotes, 1. The constant motion of weapons of any kind, and the rapid succession of strokes, in a battle or broil. Wallace. 2. To fight by throwing stones; S. 3. To move quickly; S. "He came down the gait as fast as he could bicker." 4. It expresses the noise occasioned by successive strokes, by throwing of stones, or by any rapid motion; S.—C. B. bicre, a battle; "Pers. pykar," id. Gt. Wynt.
- BICKER, BIKERING, s. 1. A fight carried on with stones; a term among schoolboys, S. Bickers, as they are called, were often held on the Caltonhill. They took place almost every evening a little before dusk, and lasted till night parted the combatants; who were generally idle apprentices, of mischievous dispositions, that delighted in chasing one another from knoll to knoll with sticks and stones. Campbell's Journey. 2. A contention, strife, S. Baillie. 3. A short race, Ayrs. Burns.
- BICKER, BIQUOUR, s. A bowl, or dish for containing liquor; properly, one made of wood; S. Evergreen.—Germ. becher; Isl. baukur, bikare; Sw. bagare; Dan. beger; Gr. and L. B. βεικαρι, baccarium; Ital. bicchiere, patera, scyphus.
- BICKERFU, s. As much of anything as fills a bicker, S. The Pirate.

- BICKER-RAID, s. The name given to a kind of indecent frolic which formerly prevailed in harvest, after the labourers had finished dinner. A young man, laying hold of a girl, threw her down, and the rest covered them with their empty bickers; Roxb.
- To BID, v. a. 1. To desire, to pray for, Henryson.—This sense is common in O. E. 2. To care for, to value. Douglas. From the same origin with BEDIS, q. v.
- BIDDABLE, adj. Obedient; pliable in temper; as, "A biddable bairn," a child that cheerfully does what is desired; from the E. v. to bid, to command.
- BIDDABLENESS, s. Disposition to obey; compliant temper, S.
- BIDDABLE, adv. Obediently.
- To BIDE, BYDE, v. a. 1. To await, to wait for. Kelly. 2. To wait for, as implying the idea of defiance. Spalding. 3. To suffer, to endure. "He bides a great deal of pain," S. Westmorel., id. Ross.—An oblique sense of Moes. G. beid-an, A. S. bid-an, expectare.
- To BIDE de, v. n. To continue in one state, S.
- To BIDE or BYD at, v. n. and a. To persist. To abide by. Keith's Hist.
- To BYDE be or by, v. a. To adhere to; as, "I'll no byde be that agreement," S.; the same as Byde at.
- To BYDE KNAWLEGE. To bear investigation; an old forensic term. V. KNAWLEGE.
- BIDE, s. Applied to what one endures. A terrible bide; very acute pain, Loth.
- BYDINGS, s. pl. Evil endured; what one has to suffer, Ang. Ross.
- BIDINGS, s. pl. Sufferings. V. BIDE, v.
- BIEYFIR, s. The designation given to the double portion of meat formerly allotted, by a chief, to his Galloglach, or armour-bearer, in the Western Isles. Martin's West. Isl.—Gael. biadh, meat, food, and fear, a man; i. e. a man's portion.
- BIEYTA'V, s. The name given to the food served up to strangers, taken immediately after being at sea, ibid.—Perhaps beit-hav, from Isl. beit, food, and haf; Dan. hav, the sea.
- BIELD, s. Shelter. V. BEILD.
- To BIELD, v. a. To protect. V. BEILD.
- BIELY, adj. Affording shelter, Gall. Davidson's Seasons. V. BEILDY.
- BIER, s. Expl. as signifying twenty threads in the breadth of a web. V. PORTÉE.
- BIERDLY, BIERLY, adj. Popular Ball.—It is viewed as the same with Burdly, q. v. But to me it seems rather to signify, fit, proper, becoming, from Isl. byriar, ber, dect, oportet.
- BIERLY, adj. Big; burly. Skinner's Christmas Da'ing.
- BIERLING, s. A galley, S. B. Statist. Acc.
- To BIETTLE, BEETLE, v. n. 1. To amend; to grow better; applied to the state of one's health. 2. To recover; applied to the vegetable kingdom; as, "The crap's beetlin' now." Dimin. from A. S. beotian, bet-an, convalescere.
- BIG, Bigg, s. A particular species of barley, also denominated bear, S. Cumb. id. barley. Statist. Acc. V. CHESTER BEAR.—Isl. bygg, hordeum. Dan. byg, Su. G. brugg, id.
- To BIG, BYG, v. a. To build; S. Cumb. Westmorel. id. Wallace.—This word occurs in O. E., although not very frequently. A. S. bycg-an, Isl. bygg-ia, Su. G. bygg-a, aedificare, instruere, a frequentative from bo, id.; as it is customary with the Goths thus to augment monosyllables in o; as sugg-a, from so, a sow.
- To BIG, v. n. To build a nest. A common use of the term in S. "The gray swallow bigs i' the cot-house wa'." Remains Nithsdale Song.
- To BIG round one. To surround, Aberdeen.
- To BIG upon. To fall upon; to attack, Aberd.; perhaps referring to the approaches made by a besieging army.
- BIG-COAT, s. A great-coat, S.
- BYGANE, BIGANE, BYGONE, adj. 1. Past; S. The latter is mentioned by Dr. Johnson as "a Scotch word." Acts Ja. I. 2. Preceding; equivalent to E. predeceased. Douglas.
- BYGANES, BIGONES, used as s. pl. denoting what is past, but properly including the idea of transgression or defect. 1. It denotes offences against the sovereign, or the state, real or supposed. Baillie. In this sense it is used proverbially; Let byganes be byganes, let past offences be forgotten, S. 2. It is used in relation to the quarrels of lovers, or grounds of offence given by either party, S. Morison. 3. It often denotes arrears, sums of money formerly due, but not paid, S. Wodrow.

BIGGAR, s. A bulder, one who carries on a building.
Acts Mary.

BIGGIE, BIGGIN, s. A linen cap. Ayr.—Fr. beguin.
V. BIGONET.

BIGGING, BYGGIN, BYGGIN, s. A building; a house, properly of a larger size, as opposed to a cottage, S. Wallace.—Biggin, a building, Gl. Westmorel. Isl. bigging, structura.

BIGGIT, part. pa. Built.—This word is used in various senses, S. Biggit land, land where there are houses or buildings, contrasted with one's situation in a solitude, or far from any shelter during a storm, S. Barbour. Weill biggit, well-grown, lusty. Melville's MS. A weill biggit body is one who has acquired a good deal of wealth, S. B.

BIGGIT WA'S, s. pl. Buildings; houses, S. Guy Mannering. V. To Big, Bye.

BIGGIT, pret. Perhaps, inclined. King Hart.—A. S. byg-an, flectere.

BIGHT, s. 1. A loop upon a rope. 2. The inclination of a bay, Loth.—Teut. bigh-en, pandari, incurvari, flecti; Isl. bugt, curvatura, sinus. V. BOGHT

BIGHTSOM, adj. Implying an easy air, and, at the same time, activity, S. B. Morrison.—Perhaps q-buzom, from A. S. bocsum, flexibilis; byg-an, to bend.

BIGGY, BYGLY, adj. 1. Commodious, or habitable. Bludy Serk. 2. Pleasant, delightful. Bord. Minst.—From A. S. byg-an, habitare, and lic, similis.

BIGLIE, adj. Rather large, Ettr. For. From big, large, q. big-like.

BIGONET, s. A linen cap or coif. Ramsay.—From the same origin with E. biggin, "a kind of coif, or linen cap for a young child," Phillips; or rather from Fr. beguine, a nun of a certain order in Flanders.

BIGS, Barbour xix. 302. Pink. ed. Leg. Luais, lodges.

BYLYEIT, part. pa. Boiled. Chalmers's Mary.

BYK. Apparently, an errat. for byt, bite. Dunbar.

BYKAT, BEIKAT, s. A male salmon; so called, when come to a certain age, because of the beak which grows in his under jaw; Ang.

BIKE, BYKE, BYIK, BEIK, s. 1. A building, a habitation, S. Gawan and Gol. 2. A nest or hive of bees, wasps, or ants, S. Douglas. 3. A building erected for the preservation of grain; Caltha. Pennant. 4. Metaph. an association or collective body; S. Lyndsay. To skail the byke, metaph. to disperse an assembly of whatever kind; S. 5. A valuable collection of whatever kind, when acquired without labour or beyond expectation. 6. In the North of S. it is used in a similar sense, but only denoting trifles.—Isl. biik-ar, denotes a hive, alvear; and Teut. bie-bock, bie-buyck, apiarium, alvearium, Kilian. The Isl. word is probably from Su. G. bygga, to build, part. pa. bygd; q. something prepared or built. There seems to be no reason to doubt that the word, as used in sense 2, is the same with that denoting a habitation. For what is a byke or bee-bike, but a building or habitation of bees?

To BIKE, v. n. To hive; to gather together like bees, South of S. A. Scott's Poems.

BYKING, s. A hive; a swarm. Syn. Bike, Byke, Ettr. For. Hogg.

BYKNYF, BYKNIFE, s. A knife. Perhaps a house-knife, from A. S. byc, habitatio, and enif, a knife; or it may be a knife lying by one, or at hand. Aberd. Reg.

BYKNYIS, s. Bodkins. Aberd. Reg. V. BOIKIN.

BILBIE, s. Shelter, residence; Ang. This, I apprehend, is a very ancient word. It may be either from Su. G. byle, habitaculum, and by, pagus, conjoined, as denoting residence in a village; or more simply, from Bolby, villa primaria; from bol, praedium, and by, a village. Thus bolby would signify a village which has a praedium, or territory of its own, annexed to it.

BILCH, (putt.) s. 1. A lusty person. 2. In Selkirks, a little, crooked, insignificant person. V. BELCH.

To BILCH, (ch soft) v. n. To limp; to halt, Tweedd. Roxb. Syn. Hithch. Perhaps from Teut. bulcker, inclinare se; or Isl. bylta, volutare, billta, casus lapsus.

BILCHER, s. One who halts, ibid.

BILDER, s. A scab, Ang.—A. S. byle, carbunculus, Su. G. bolda or boeld, ulcus.

BILEDAME, s. A great-grandmother. Colkebbie Sow. Like E. beldam, from Fr. belle-dama. It seems probable that this was an honourable title of consanguinity; and that as E. grandam denotes a grandmother, in O. Fr. grande-dame had the same sense in common with grande-mere; and that the next degree backwards was belle-dame, a great-grandmother. Beldam seems to have fallen into equal disrepute with Luckie, which, as well as Luckie-minnie, still signifies a grandmother, transferred to an old woman, and often used disrespectfully.

BILEFT, pret. Remained, abode. Sir Tristrem.—A. S. belf-an, superesse, to remain; Alem. bilib-en, Franc. bilu-en, manere; Schilter.

To BYLEPE, v. a. To cover, as a stallion does a mare. Douglas.—A. S. behleap-an, insilire, Su. G. leop-a, Teut. loop-en, catulire.

BILES, BYLIS, s. A game for four persons; a sort of billiards. Chal. Life of Mary.—Fr. billé, a small bowl or billiard ball.

BILE, s. A monster. St. Patrick. V. BELCH, BILCH.

BILF, s. A blunt stroke, Ayrs. Ianacks. Galt's R. Gilhaizer. Boff, Buff, syn.

BILGET, s. A projection for the support of a shelf, &c., Aberd.—Teut. bulget, bulga; O. Goth. bulg-ia, to swell out.

BILGET, adj. Bulged, jutting out. Douglas. Su. G. bulg-ia, to swell, whence Isl. bylgia, a billow. Or, Isl. eg belge, curvo; belgia huopta, inflare buccas.

To BILL, v. a. 1. To register, to record. Bp. Forbes.

2. To give a legal information against, to indict; synon. with Delate, Dilate. Acts Ja. VI.

BILL, s. Corr. of E. Bull. Davidson's Poems—From Sw. boel-a, Isl. baul-a, to bellow; Isl. baula, a cow, baul, a bull.

To BILLY, v. n. To low. Corr. of bellow, Galloway. Davidson's Seasons.

BILLY BENTIE, A smart, roguish boy; used either in a good or in a bad sense; as, "Weel, well, Billy benty, I see mind you for that!" S. From billy, a boy, sense 8, and perhaps A. S. bentiith, "that hath obtained his desire;" from bene, a request or boon, and tith-ian, ge-tith-ian, to grant.

BILLY BLYNDE, BILLY BLIN, s. 1. The designation given to Brownie, or the lubber fiend, in some of the southern counties of S. Rem. of Nith. Song. 2. Blind-man's-buff. As the skin of an animal was generally worn by him who sustained the principal character in Blind-man's-buff, or Blind Harie, the sport may be so denominated from his supposed resemblance to Brownie, who is always represented as having a rough appearance, and as being covered with hair. V. BLIND HARIE.

BILLYBLINDER, s. 1. The person who hoodwinks

- another in the play of Blind-man's-buff, S. 2. Metaph. used for a blind or imposition. Perils of Man.
- BILLIE, BILLY, s. 1. A companion, a comrade. Minstrelsy Border. 2. Fellow, used rather contemptuously, S.; synon. child, chap. Shirrefs. 3. As a term expressive of affection and familiarity; S. Ramsay. 4. A lover, one who is in suit of a woman. Evergreen. Still used in this sense, S. B. 5. A brother, S. Minstrelsy Border. 6. Apparently used in allusion to brotherhood in arms, according to the ancient laws of chivalry. Minstrelsy Border. 7. A young man. In this sense it is often used in the pl. The billies, or the young billies, S. B. It is expl. "a stout man, a clever fellow." Gl. Shirr. S. Sometimes it signifies a boy, S. B. as synon. with callan. Ross. —It is probably allied to Su. G. Germ. billig, Belg. billik, equals; as denoting those that are on a footing as to age, rank, relation, affection, or employment.
- BILLYHOOD, s. Brotherhood, South of S. Brownie of Bodbeck.
- BILLIT, adj. "Shod with iron," Rudd. Billit ax. Douglas.—This phrase is perhaps merely a circumlocution for the dipennis, or large ax. V. BALAX.
- BILSH, s. 1. A short, plump, and thriving person or animal; as, "A bilsh o' a callan," a thickset boy, Lanarks. Roxb. Pitch is used in the same sense. 2. A little waddling fellow, Etrr. For.
- BILSHIE, adj. Short, plump, and thriving, ibid.
- To BILT, v. n. To go lame; to limp; also, to walk with crutches, Roxb.
- BILT, s. A limp, ibid.
- BILT, s. A blow, Ayr. Gl. Picken.
- BILTER, s. A child, Dumfr.; Isl. piltter, puellus.
- BILTIE, adj. Thick and clubbish, Lanarks.
- BILTINESS, s. Clubbishness; clumsiness, ibid. V. BULTY.
- BILTIN', part. pr. Limping; as, biltin' awa'. Syn. Littin', O. S.—Isl. bilta, volutare, probabi, inverti.
- To BIM, v. n. To hum, Renfrews. A variety of Bum, q. v.
- BIM, s. The act of buzzing, ibid.
- BIMMER, s. That which hums, ibid.
- To BIN, v. n. To move with velocity and noise; as, "He ran as fast as he could bin," i. e. move his feet, Fife; syn. Binner. Allied, perhaps, to Isl. bein-a, expedire, negotium promovere.
- BIN, s. A sort of imprecation; as, "Bin thae biting clegs!" Sorrow be on these biting clegs; used when one is harassed by horse-flies.
- BIN, s. Key; humour, Aberd. It seems the same as Bind, q. v.
- BIN, s. A mountain, S. O. Galloway.—From Gael. ben, id., Lomond bin, being synon. with Benlomond.
- BIND, BINDE, s. 1. Dimension, size; especially with respect to circumference. A barrel of a certain bind, is one of certain dimensions, S.; hence Barrel bind. Acts Ja. III. 2. It is used more generally to denote size in any sense. Acts Mary. 3. Metaph. to denote ability. "Aboon my bind," beyond my power. This is often applied to pecuniary ability, S. This use of the word is evidently borrowed from the idea of binding a vessel with hoops. 4. Used in reference to morals. A. Scott's Poems.
- BIND-POCK, s. A niggard. Kelly.
- BINDLE, s. The cord or rope that binds anything, whether made of hemp or of straw, S.—Su. G. bindel a headband, a fillet, from bind-as, to bind. Teut. bindel, ligamen.
- BINDWEED, s. Ragwort, S. Wilson's Renfrews. V. YUNWEED.
- BINDWOOD, s. The vulgar name for ivy, S; Hedera helix, Linn.; pron. binwood.—Denominated, perhaps, from the strong hold that it takes of a wall, a rock, trees, &c., q. the binding wood. It is probably the same which is written benwood. Statist. Acc. In Sutherland and its vicinity those who are afraid of having their cows bewitched, and the milk taken from them, twist a collar of ivy and put it round the neck of each of their cows.
- BING, s. 1. A heap in general. Lyndsay. 2. A heap of grain, S. Douglas. 3. A pile of wood; immediately designed as a funeral pile. Douglas. 4. "A temporary enclosure or repository made of boards, twigs, or straw ropes, for containing grain or such like"; Gl. Sibb., where it is also written binne.—Dan. bing, Sw. bing, Isl. bing-r, cumulus.
- To BING, v. a. 1. To put into a heap. 2. Denoting the accumulation of money. Tarras's Poems.
- To BYNGE, v. n. To cringe. V. BEENGE.
- To BINK, v. a. To press down, so as to deprive anything of its proper shape. It is principally used as to shoes, when, by careless wearing, they are allowed to fall down in the heels; S.—O. Teut. banghen, premere, in angustum cogere. Sw. bank-a, to beat, seems allied; q. to beat down. Or it may be a frequentative from A. S. band-an, to bend.
- To BINK, v. n. To bend; to bow down; to curtsy; leaning forward in an awkward manner, Loth.
- BINK, s. The act of bending down. A horse is said to give a bink, when he makes a false step in consequence of the bending of one of the joints. To play bink, to yield, Loth.
- BINK, s. 1. A bench, a seat; S. B. Priests of Peblis. 2. A wooden frame, fixed to the wall of a house, for holding plates, bowls, spoons, &c., Ang. It is also called a Plate-rack; S. The Antiquary. Colvil. 3. The long seat beside the fire in a country house. Tarras's Poems. Probably an oblique sense of the same term which signifies a bench. V. BENK.
- BINK-SIDE, s. The side of the long seat beside the fire. Tarras's Poems.
- BINK, s. A hive. A Bee-bink, a nest or hive of bees; a Wasp-bink, a hive of wasps, Loth. Roxb. Perhaps a corr. of bike, id. though Kilian gives bie-bancke as old Teut. signifying apiarium.
- BINK, s. 1. A bank, an acclivity, S. B. Evergreen. 2. Bink of a peat-moss, the perpendicular part of a peat-moss, from which the labourer, who stands opposite to it, cuts his peats. Stat. Acc.—Wachter observes that Germ. bank, Su. G. baenik, denote any kind of eminence. V. BENK.
- BINKIE, adj. Gaudy; trimly dressed, Tweedd. Perhaps a corr. of syn. term Dinkie, q. v.
- BINN (of sheaves), s. All the reapers on a harvest-field. If not from boon, perhaps from C. B. bydvin, turma, a troop, a company.
- BINNA, v. subst. with the negative affixed. Be not, for be na.
- BINNA, BINNAE, prep. Except, save, but; as, "The folk are a' cum, binnae twa-three," Lanarks. An elliptical term for "if it be not," or be it not. Be na, S. V. CANNA.
- BINNE, s. A temporary enclosure for preserving grain, South of S.—A. S. binne, praesepe. V. BING, sense 3.
- To BINNER, v. n. 1. To move with velocity, and with a humming sound. A wheel is said to binner when driven round with rapidity and emitting a humming sound, Aberd. Mearns. Fife. Lanarks. Syn. Bicker, Birl. 2. To run, or gallop, conjoining the ideas of - quickness and carelessness, Aberd. Mearns.—Probably from C. B. buanawr, swift, fleet; buanred, rapid; from buan, id.

- BINNER, BINNERIN, s. A bickering noise, S. B. Christmas Ba'ing. At the dinner, boiling briskly.
- BINWEED, V. BUNWEDE.
- BYOUS, adj. Extraordinary. Byous weather, remarkable weather, Clydes. Loth. Aberd. V. BIAS.
- BYOUS, adv. Very; in a great degree. Byous hungry, very hungry, ibid.
- BYOUSLIE, adv. Extraordinarily; uncommonly, Loth. Clydes.
- BYOUTOUR, BOOTYER, s. A gormandizer; a glutton, Renfrew. Bootyert, Sirlings. Perhaps a metaph. use of Boytour, the S. name of the bitter, from its supposed voracity.
- BYPASSING, s. Lapse. Acts Ja. VI.
- BYPAST, adj. Past; reckoned by Dr. Johnson "a term of the Scotch dialect."
- BYPTICIT, part. pa. Dipped or dyed. Houlate.—Lat. baptisio.
- BIR, BIRR, s. Force. I find that Isl. byr, expl. ventus ferens, is deduced from ber-a, ferre; Gl. Edd. Saem. Perhaps bir is derived rather from Isl. foer, life, vigour, to which vir, virr, the term denoting force Aberd. seems to have affinity. V. BEIR.
- BIRD, BEIRD, BRID, BURD, s. 1. A lady, a damsel. Gawan and Gol.—As bride is the word used by Chaucer for bird, it is merely the A. S. term for pullus, pullulus. Bird, as applied to a damsel, appears to be the common term used in a metaph. sense. 2. Used, also metaph., to denote the young of quadrupeds, particularly of the fox. V. TOB'S BIRDS. Perhaps this definition should rather belong to Bird, Burd, offspring.
- BIRD, BURD, s. Offspring. This term seems to be generally used in a bad sense; as, witch-burd, the supposed brood of a witch, whore's-burd, &c. Loth. Isl. byrd, nativitas, genus, familia.
- BYRD, v. imp. It behaved, it became. Barbour.—A. S. byreth, pertinet. This imp. v. may have been formed from byr-an, ber-an, to carry, or may be viewed as nearly allied to it. Hence dyreth, gestavit; Germ. berd, ge-baerd, id., sich berd-en, gestum facere. Su. G. boer-a, debere, pret. borde, anciently boerjade.
- BIRD AND JOE. A phrase used to denote intimacy or familiarity. Sitting bird and joe, sitting cheek by jowl, like Darby and Joan, S.
- BIRDIE, s. A diminutive from E. Bird, S.
- BIRD-MOUTH'D, adj. Mealy-mouth'd, S. Ramsay.
- * BIRDS, s. pl. "A' the birds in the air;" a play among children, S.
- BIRD'S-NEST, s. Wild carrot. Daucus carotta, Linn.
- BIRDING, s. Burden; load. Douglas.—A. S. byrthen; Dan. byrde, id. V. BIRTH, BYRTH.
- BYRE, s. Cowhouse. S. Eyer, id. Cumb. Gawan and Gol.—Perhaps allied to Franc. buer, a cottage; byre, Su. G. byr, a village; Germ. bauer, habitaculum, cavea; from Su. G. bo, bu-a, to dwell. Or from Isl. bu, a cow; Gael. bo, id.—Rather from O. Fr. bouverie, a stall for oxen, from bauf, an ox.
- BYREMAN, s. A man-servant who cleans the byre or cowhouse on a farm, Berwick's.
- BIRGET THREAD, BIRGES THREEED. Perhaps Bruges thread. Rates.
- BIRK, s. Birch, a tree, S. Betula alba, Linn. Douglas.—A. S. bir; Isl. diorks; Teut. berck, id.
- BIRKIE, adj. Abounding with birches, S.
- BIRK-KNOWE, s. A knoll covered with birches, S. Lights and Shadows.
- BIRKIN, BIRKEN, adj. Of, or belonging to birch, S. Mayne's Siller Gun. Gawan and Gol.—A. S. beorcan, id.
- To BIRK, v. n. To give a tart answer; to converse in a sharp and cutting way, S.—A. S. bir-can, beor-can, to bark, q. of a snarling humour. Hence,
- BIRKIE, adj. 1. Tart in speech, S. 2. Lively; sprited; mettlesome, Gall.
- BIRKY, s. 1. A lively young fellow; a person of mettle, S. Poems Buchan Dial. 2. Auld Birkie, "In conversation, analogous to old Boy," Gl. Shir. Ramsay.—Allied perhaps, to Isl. berk-ia, jectare, to boast; or diary-a, opitulari, q. one able to give assistance.
- BIRKIE, BIRKY, s. A trifling game at cards, at which only two play, throwing down a card alternately; he who follows suit wins the trick, if he seizes the heap before his opponent can cover his card with one of his own. E. Beggar-my-neighbour. From Isl. berk-ia, to boast.
- To BIRL, BIRLE, v. a. 1. This word primarily signifies the act of pouring out, or furnishing drink for guests, or of parting it among them. Douglas. 2. To ply with drink. Minst. Border. 3. To drink plentifully, S. Douglas. 4. To club money for the purpose of procuring drink. "I'll birlie my bawbie," I will contribute my share of the expense, S. Ramsay.—In Isl. it is used in the first sense; byrl-a, infundere, miscere potem. In A. S. it occurs in sense third, birli-ian, biril-ian, haurire. Hence dyrle, a butler. Isl. byrlar, id. Birle, O. E. has the same signification.
- To BIRL, v. n. To drink in society, S. Old Mortality.
- To BIRL, v. n. 1. To "make a noise like a cart driving over stones, or mill-stones at work." It denotes a constant drilling sound, S. Popular Ball. 2. Used improperly, to denote quick motion in walking, Loth. 3. Sometimes it denotes velocity of motion in whatever way. Davidson's Seasons. 4. To toss up, Loth. Roxb.—Birl seems to be a dimn. from the v. Birr, used in the same sense, formed by means of the letter l, a common note of diminution. Dr. Johnson has observed, that "if there be an l, as in jingle, tingle, tinkle, &c., there is implied a frequency, or iteration of small acts; Grammar E. T. We may add, that this termination is frequently used in words which denote a sharp or tingling sound; as E. whirl, drill; S. tirl, skirl, dirl.
- BIRLAW-COURT, also BIRLEY-COURT. V. BURLAW.
- BIRLEY-OATS, BARLEY-OATS, s. pl. A species of oats, S. Statist. Acc.—It seems to have received its name from its supposed resemblance to barley.
- BIRLIE, s. A loaf of bread, S. B.
- BIRLIE-MAN, s. One who assesses damages; a parish arbirer; a referee, South of S. Loth. Expl. in Gl. Antiquary; "the petty officer of a burgh of barony."
- BIRLIN, s. A long-oared boat of the largest size, often with six, sometimes with eight oars; generally used by the chieftains in the Western Isles. It seldom had sails. Martin's St. Kilda.—Probably of Scandinavian origin, as Sw. bars is a kind of ship; and berling, a boat-staff, Seren. I am informed, however, that in Gael. the word is written buirlin.
- BIRLIN, s. A small cake, made of oatmeal or barley-meal; syn. Tod, Ettr. For. Tweedd.—Gael. bullin, signifies a loaf, and baigphean, a cake.
- BIRLING, s. A drilling noise, S.

BIRLING, s. A drinking match, in which, generally, the drink is clubbed by the company. Bride of Lammermoor.

BIRN, s. The high part of a farm where the young sheep are summered; or dry, heathy pasture, reserved for the lambs after they have been weaned, Roxb. Loth.—C. B. bryn, a hill; Su. G. brun, vertex montis; Isl. bryn and brun, a height in a general sense.

To BIRN Lambs. To put them on a poor dry pasture. Agr. Surv. Peeb.

BIRNY, adj. 1. Covered with the scorched stems of heath that has been set on fire, S. 2. Having a rough or stunted stem; applied to plants, i. e. like the stems of burnt heath, furze, &c., Loth. V. BIRNS.

BIRN, s. The matrix, or rather the labia pudenda of a cow.—Allied, perhaps, to Isl. brund-ur, pecudum coeundi actus, et appetitus inire; G. Andr. C. B. bry, matrix, vulva.

To BIRN, v. a. To burn. V. BRYN.

BIRN, BIRNE, s. 1. A burnt mark, S. Acts Cha. II. 2. A mark burnt on the noses of sheep, S. 3. Skin and Birn, a common phrase, denoting the whole of anything, or of any number of persons or things, S.; from A. S. byrn, burning. Acts Mary.

BIRN, s. A burden, S. B. Ross. To gie one's birn a hitch, to assist him in a strait, S. B. Poems Buchan Dial.—An abbreviation of A. S. byrthen, burden; if not from C. B. burn, onus, byrn-ia, onerare. Davies.

BIRNIE, BYRNIE, s. A corslet; a brigandine. Douglas. A. S. byrn, byrna; Isl. bryn, brynja; Sw. bringa, thorax, lorica, munimentum pectoris; probably from Isl. bringa, pectus.

BIRNS, s. pl. Roots; the stronger stems of burnt heath, which remain after the smaller twigs are consumed, S. Pennycuik.—A. S. byrn, incendium.

BIRR, s. Force. V. BEIR.

To BIRR, v. n. 1. To make a whirring noise, especially in motion; the same with birr, S. Douglas. It is often used to denote the sound made by a spinning-wheel. The Entail. 2. To be in a state of confusion, S. B. It seems to signify the confusion in the head caused by violent exercise. Skinner. V. BEIR, S.

BIRR, BIRL, s. The whizzing sound of a spinning-wheel, or of any other machine, in rapid gyration, Gl. Surv. Nairn.

BIRRING, s. The noise made by partridges when they spring, S.

BIRS, BRASS, s. The gad-fly, Roxb.—E. breese, brize; Ital. brissio; A. S. brimsa.

BIRS, BRSE, BYRSS, BIRSSIS, s. 1. A bristle; "a sow's birse," the bristle of a sow, S. Evergreen. 2. Metaph. for the beard. Knox. 3. Metaph. for the indication of rage or displeasure. "To set up one's birse," to put one in a rage. The birse is also said to rise, when one's temper becomes warm, in allusion to animals fenced with bristles, that defend themselves, or express their rage in this way, S. Course of Conformitie.—A. S. byrst; Germ. borst, burst; Su. G. borst, id. Ihre derives it from burr, a thistle. Sw. saettia up borsten, to put one in a rage; borsta sig, to give one's self airs, E. to bristle up. Hence the origin of E. brush; for Sw. borst, is a brush, borsta, to brush, from borst, seta; a brush being made of bristles.

To BIRSE, BRIZE, BRIZE, v. a. 1. To bruise, S.

Watson. Palace of Honour. Brise is common in O. E. 2. To push or drive; to birse in, to push in, S. Shirrefs. 3. To press, to squeeze. To birse up.—A. S. bryss-an; Belg. bryss-en; Ir. bryss-im; Fr. bryss-er, id.

BIRSSY, adj. 1. Having bristles; rough, S. Douglas. 2. Hot-tempered; easily irritated, S. 3. Keen; sharp; applied to the weather. "A birssy day," a cold, bleak day, S. B. 4. Metaph. used in regard to severe censure or criticism.

BIRSE, BRIZE, s. 1. A bruise, S. Galt. 3. The act of pressing; the pressure made by a crowd; as, "We had an awfu' birse," S.

To BIRSE, BIRSTLE, BRISSE, v. a. 1. To burn slightly; to broil; to parch by means of fire; as, to birse peas, S. Douglas. 2. To scorch; referring to the heat of the sun, S. Douglas. 3. To warm at a lively fire, S. A. Bor. brusle, id. To dry; as, "The sun brusles the hay," i. e. dries it.—Su. G. brasa, a lively fire; whence Isl. bryss, ardent heat, and bryss-a, to act with fervour, ec breiske, torreo, aduro; A. S. brastl, glowing, brastlian, to burn, to make a crackling noise.

BIRSELE, BRISSELE, s. 1. A hasty toasting or scorching, S. Apparently that which is toasted.

BIRST, s. Brunt. To dree or stand the birst; to bear the brunt, Roxb.—From A. S. byrst, berst, malum, damnus, q. sustain the loss; or byrst, aculeum.

To BIRST, v. n. To weep convulsively; to birst and greet, Aberd. This appears to be a provincial pronunciation of E. burst; as, "She burst into tears."

* BIRTH, s. An establishment; an office; a situation, good or bad, S. Gl. Surv. Nairn.

BIRTH, BYRTH, s. Size; bulk; burden. Douglas. V. BURDING.—Isl. byrd, byrth-ur, byrth-i; Dan. byrde; Su. G. boerd, burden; whence byrding, navis oneraria. The origin is Isl. ber-a; Su. G. baer-a; A. S. ber-an, byr-an, portare.

BISHOP, s. 1. A peevish, ill-natured boy; as, "A canker'd bishop," Lanarks. This seems to have originated among the common people in the West, from the ideas they entertained of the Episcopal clergy during the period of the persecution. 2. A rammer, or weighty piece of wood used by paviors to level their work, Aberd.

BISHOPRY, s. Episcopacy; government by diocesan bishops. Apologet. Relation.—A. S. biscoprice, episcopatus.

BISHOP'S FOOT. It is said, The Bishop's foot has been in the broth, when they are singed, S. Tyndale

This phrase seems to have had its origin in times of Popery, when the clergy had such extensive influence, that hardly anything could be done without their interference. A similar phrase is used A. Bor. "The Bishop has set his foot in it," a saying in the North, used for milk that is burnt-to in boiling.

BY-SHIOT, s. One who is set aside for an old maid, Buchan. Tarra's Poems.

BYSYNT, adj. Monstrous. Wyn'town. V. BISMING, &c.

BISKET, s. Breast. V. BRISKET.

BISM, BYSYME, BISNE, BISNE, s. Abyss; gulf.

Douglas. Fr. abyss; Gr. ἀβύσσος.

BISMARE, BYSMER, s. A steelyard, or instrument for weighing resembling it; sometimes bismar, S. B. Orkn. Barry. V. PUNDLAR.—Isl. bismari, besmar, libra, tróitina minor; Leg. West. Goth. bismare; Su. G. besman; Teut. bosmer, id. stater; Kilian. G. Andr. derives this word from Isl. bes, a part of a pound weight.

BISMARE, BISMERE, s. 1. A bawd. 2. A lewd woman, in general. Douglas.—"F. ab A. S. bismere, contumelia, aut bismirian, illudere, dehonorare, polluere," Rudd.

A prodigy; something portentous of calamity. Knox. 3. Bysim is still used as a term highly expressive of contempt for a woman of an unworthy character, S. V. BISMING.—Mr. Macpherson, vo. Bysynt, mentions A. S. bysmarfull, horrendus. Isl. bysmarfull has the same sense; bysna, to portend; bysn, a prodigy, grande quod ac ingens, G. Andr.

BISTAYD, BISTODE, pret. Perhaps, surrounded. Sir Tristrem.—A. S. bestod, circumdedit, from bestand-an; Teut. besteen, circumsternere, circumdare.

BISTER, s. Expl. "a town of land in Orkney; as, Hobbister, i. e. a town or district of high land; Swan-bister, corr. Swambister, supposed to signify the town of Sweno." "A considerable number [of names of places in Orkney and Shetland] end in ster and bister; as, Swaraster, Kirkabister, &c. It is probable, however, that the names at present supposed to end in ster, are abbreviations from seter. Both imply settlement or dwelling." Edmonstone's Zell. Isl. setur, sedes, a seat; so bister, from bi, pagus, and seter i. e. "the seat of a village."

BYSTOUR, BOYSTURE, s. A term of contempt, the precise meaning of which seems to be lost. Polwart. Several similar terms occur, as Fr. bistorie, crooked, boister, to limp; bustarin, a great lubber.

BIT, s. A vulgar term used for food, S. Bit and baid, meat and clothing, S. B. Ross. Although baid be understood of clothing, I suspect that it, as well as bit, originally signified food, from A. S. bead, a table.

BYT, s. A blow or stroke, Aberd. Banff. Douglas.—A. S. byt, morsus, metaph. used.

*BIT, s. 1. Denoting a place, or particular spot; as, "He canna stan' in a bit," he is continually changing his situation. Guy Mannerling. 2. Applied to time; "Stay a wee bit," stay a short while. Black Dwarf. 3. The nick of time; the crisis, S. O. "In the bit o' time." Burns. 4. Often used in conjunction with a substantive instead of a diminutive; as, a bit bairn, a little child, S. Antiquary. 5. Used as a diminutive expressive of contempt. "Ye greet more for the drowning of a bit calf or stirk, than ever ye did for all the tyranny and defections of Scotland."—Walker's Peden.

BITTLE, s. A little bit, S. B. Synon. with bittock, S. A. Pron. buttie or bottie, Aberd.—Dan. bitte, paxillus, paxillulus.

BLACK-QUARTER, s. A disease of cattle. V. BLACK SPAUL.

BLACK SAXPENCE, s. The Devil's sixpence; supposed to be received as a pledge of engagement to be his, soul and body. Though of a black colour, and not of legal currency, the person who keeps it constantly in his pocket, however much he may spend, will always find a good sixpence beside it, Roxb.

BLACK-SOLE, s. A confident in courtship, Lanarks. Syn. with Black-foot.

BLACK SPAUL. A disease of cattle, S. "The Black Spaul is a species of pleurisy, incident to young cattle, especially calves, which gives a black hue to the flesh of the side affected. It is indicated by lameness in the fore foot, and the common remedy is immediate bleeding." Prise Essays, Highl. Soc. S. II. 207.

BLACK-STANE, BLACKSTONE, s. 1. The designation given to a dark-coloured stone, used in some of the Scottish universities, as the seat on which a student sits at a public examination, meant to test the progress he has made in his studies. This examination is called his Profession. "In King's College, Aberdeen, and in Glasgow, the custom of causing the students to sit on the grave-stone of the founder at certain examinations is still literally retained." Bower's Hist. Univ. 2. The term has been used metaph. to denote the examination itself. Melville's Diary.

BLACK SUGAR, s. Spanish licorice, S.

BLACK TANG, s. Fucus vesiculosus, Linn.

BLACK VICTUAL, s. Pulse; and peas and beans, either by themselves, or mixed as a crop, S.

BLACK WARD, s. A state of servitude to a servant, S. M'Kenzie's Inst.

BLACK-WATCH, s. The designation given, from the dark colour of their tartan, to the companies of loyal Highlanders, raised after the rebellion in 1715, for preserving peace in the Highland districts. They formed the nucleus of what was afterwards embodied as the brave 42d Regiment. Waverley.

BLACK WEATHER, s. Rainy weather, Selkirks.

BLACK WINTER, s. The last cart-load of grain brought home from the harvest-field, Dumfr.

To BLAD, v. n. To walk in a clumsy manner, taking long steps, and treading heavily, Dumfr. Lamp, Loth. Clydes.—Teut. be-laed-en, degravare, onerare.—Or, perhaps, to pass over great blads of the road in a short time.

BLAD, s. 1. A long and heavy step in walking, Dumfr.; syn. Lamp, Clydes. 2. A person walking with long and heavy steps, Dumfr.; syn. a Lamper, Clydes.

BLAD, BLAUD, s. A large piece of anything, a considerable portion, S. expl. "a flat piece of anything," Gl. Burns. Polwart. "A blad of bread," is a large flat piece. "I gat a great blad of Virgil by heart;" I committed to memory a great many verses from Virgil.

To DING IN BLADS. To drive or break in pieces. Melville's MS.—This word, as perhaps originally applied to food, may be from A. S. blaed, fruit of any kind; blaed, bled, also denoted pot-herbs; Ir. bladh, a part; bladh-am, I break.

BLADS AND DAWDS, is still the designation given to large leaves of greens boiled whole, in a sort of broth, Aberd. Loth.

BLAD, s. A person who is of a soft constitution; whose strength is not in proportion to his size or looks; often applied to a young person, who has become suddenly tall, but is of a relaxed habit, S. E.—Allied, perhaps to A. S. blaed, as denoting, either the boughs or leaves of trees, or growing corn; as both often shoot out so rapidly as to give the idea of weakness; or, to Germ. blode, the original sense of which is, weak, feeble.

BLAD, s. A portfolio, S. B. Picken.—As, the E. word is comp. of Fr. porter, to carry, and feuille, a leaf; the S. term has a similar origin, being evidently from Su. G. blad, A. S. blaed, folium.

To BLAD. 1. Used impers. "Its bladdin on o' weel" the rain is driving on; a phrase that denotes intermitting showers accompanied with squalls, S. 2. To slap, to strike; to drive by striking, or with violence,

S. Dad. synon. Evergreen. 3. To abuse, to maltreat in whatever way, Aberd. Corn is said to be bladdit, when overthrown by wind. 4. To use abusive language, Aberd. S. A. 5. To spoil; to fatigue with wet and mire; Gl. Surv. Nairn.—Germ. blodern is used in the first sense. Es blodert, it storms and snows; also, blat-en, to blow. Isl. blaegt-a indeed signifies, to be moved by the wind, motari aura; O. Fr. plaud-er, to bang, to maul.

BLAD, BLAAD, BLAUD, s. A severe blow or stroke, S. Jacobite Relics.

BLAD, s. A squall; always including the idea of rain, S. A heavy fall of rain is called "a blad of weel," S. B.

BLAIDRY, BLADDRIE, s. 1. Nonsense; foolish talk. Ramsay. 2. Sometimes it would seem equivalent to E. flummery or syllabub, as if it denoted unsubstantial food. M. Bruce's Lect. 3. The phlegm that is forced up in coughing, especially when in a great quantity. The Crieff beadle viewed this as the primary sense, when he said to an old minister, after preaching, "Ye'll be better now, Sir, ye hae gotten a hantle blethrie aff your stammock the day." 4. Empty parade; or perhaps vain commendation, unmerited applause. V. BLADRY, and BLETHER, v.

BLAIDS, s. pl. A disease. Watson's Coll.—A. S. blaedr, Su. G. blaedot, and Germ. blater, denote a pimple, or swelling with many reddish pimples that eat and spread. A. S. bleacth, leprosy.

BLAIN, s. A mark left by a wound, the discolouring of the skin after a sore, S. Rutherford.—A. S. blegene, Belg. bleyne, pustula. But our term is more closely allied to Isl. blina, which is not only rendered pustula, but also, caesio ex verbere; G. Andr. Germ. blae-en, to swell.

BLAIN, s. 1. A blank, a vacancy. A blain in a field, a place where the grain has not sprung, Loth. 2. In pl. blains, empty grain, Banffs.—Probably a metaph. use of the preceding word; or from A. S. blinne, cessatio, intermissio.

BLAINY, adj. Applied to a field with frequent blanks in the crop, from the grain not having sprung up, Loth.

To BLAINCH, v. a. To cleanse.—From E. blanch, Fr. blanch-ir, to whiten.

To BLAIR, BLARE, v. n. 1. To make a noise; to cry loud, Ang. Roxb. 2. To bleat as a sheep or goat, S. A. T. Scott. V. BLAIRAND.

BLAIR, BLARE, s. 1. A loud sound; a cry, S. A. Jacobite Relics. 2. The bleat of a sheep, Roxb.—Teut. blaer-en, boare, mugire, Gael. blaer-am, to cry, blaer, a cry.

BLAIRAND, part. pr. Roaring; crying.—Teut. blaer-en, mugire, Gl. Sibb.

BLAIR, s. That part of flax which is afterwards used in manufacture, properly after it has been steeped, and laid out for being dried; for, after being dried, it is called lint, S. This in E. is denominated harle.—Sw. blaer, hards of flax; but rather from Isl. blaer, aura, because it is thus exposed to the drought.

To BLAIR, v. n. To become dry by exposure to the drought, Ang.

BLAIRIN, s. The ground appropriated for drying flax, Ang. This term also denotes the ground on which peats are laid out to be dried, Ang.

BLAIS'D, part. pa. Soured, Ang. Fife. V. BLEEZE.

BLAISE, BLEEZE, s. The Blaise of wood; those particles which the wimble scoops out in boring. Clydes.

V. BLAE, BLAY.

To BLAISTER, v. a. To blow with violence. A. S. blaestan, insufflare. E. bluster seems to be originally the same word.

BLAIT, adj. Naked; bare. Fr. of Pélilis.

BLAIT, BLATE, BLEAT, adj. 1. Bashful; sheepish, S. V. Blout, adj. 2. Modest; unassuming; not forward; diffident. Old Mortality. 3. Curt; rough; uncivil, Ang. Aberd. Spalding. 4. Stupid; easily deceived. Gl. Surv. Nairn and Moray. 5. Blunt; unfeeling; a secondary sense. Douglas. 6. We say, "That grass is looking unco blate," when the season is backward, and there is no discernible growth, S. "A blait braird," Clydes.—O. E. blade, silly, frivolous; or in the same sense in which we now speak of a blunt reason or excuse. Isl. blaad-ur, blauth-ur, blaud, soft. The word seems to be primarily applied to things which are softened by moisture. Mollis, limosus, maceratus. Hence used to signify what is feminine; as opposed to huatar, masculine. It also signifies, timid. Bleyde, softness, fear, shame; hug-bleith, softness of mind; Germ. Su. G. blode, Belg. blood, mollis, timidus.

BLAIT-MOUIT, adj. Bashful; sheepish; q. ashamed to open one's mouth.

BLAITIE-BUM, s. Simpleton; stupid fellow. Lyndsay.—If this be the genuine orthography, perhaps from Teut. blait, vaniloquus; or rather, blait, sheepish, and bonne, tympanum. But it is generally written Batie-bum, q. v.

BLAIZE, s. A blow, Aberd. Christmas Ba'ing.—Su. G. blaasa; Teut. blaese, a wheel, a pustule; the effect being put for the cause. S. B. bleach, syn.

BLAK of the EIE, the apple of the eye, S. R. Bruce.

BLAKWAK, s. The bitter, V. Bewter.

BLAMAKING, s. The act of discolouring or making livid by a stroke. Aberd. Reg.

BLAN, pret. Caused to cease. Gawan and Gol. It is, undoubtedly, the pret. of blin.—A. S. blan, blann, cessavit.

BLANCH, s. A flash, or sudden blaze; as, a blanch o' lightning, Fife. This seems radically the same with BLENK, BLINK.

BLANCHART, adj. White. Gawan and Gol.—Fr. blanc, blanche, id. The name blanchards is given to a kind of linen cloth, the yarn of which has been twice bleached before it was put into the loom. Perhaps immediately from Teut. blancke, id. and aerd, Belg. aardt, nature. V. ART.

BLANCHE, s. A certain mode of tenure. "Blanch holding is generally defined to be, that in which the vassal pays a small duty to the superior, in full of all services, as an acknowledgement of his right, either in money, or in some other subject, as a penny money, a pair of gilt spurs," &c. Ersk. Inst. The term may have originated from the substitution of payment in white, or silver money, instead of a duty in the produce of the land. Hence the phrase Fre Blanche.

BLANCIS, s. pl. Ornaments worn by those who represented Moors in the Pageant exhibited at Edinburgh, 1590. Watson's Coll.—If not allied to Fr. blanc, white, it may be a cognate of Germ. Su. G. blaes, Isl. bles, signum album in fronte equi; whence E. blason, S. Bawsand, q. v.

BLAND, s. Some honourable piece of dress worn by knights and men of rank. Maitland Poems—Blanda, according to Bullet, is a robe adorned with purple, a robe worn by grandees. Su. G. blyant, blant, a kind of precious garment among the ancients, which seems to have been of silk.

To BLAND, v. a. To mix; to blend. Douglas.—Su. G. Isl. bland-a, to mix.

BLAND, s. An engagement. Rauf Coilyear. Probably an errat. for band.

BLAND, s. A very agreeable acid beverage used in the Shetland Islands, made of buttermilk. Brand.—Is. blanda, cinnus, mixtura, pro potu, aqua mixto; Su. G. bland, dicebatur mel aqua permixtum.

BLANDED BEAR. Barley and common bear mixed, S. Statist. Acc.—From Su. G. blanda is formed blansaed, meslin or mixed corn.

To BLANDER, v. a. 1. To diffuse or disperse in a scanty and scattered way; also applied to seed-corn. This is said to be blander'd, when very thinly sown, Fife. 2. To babble; to diffuse any report, such especially as tends to injure the character of another, S. 3. Sometimes used to denote the want of regard to truth in narration; a thing very common with tattlers, S. B.—Perhaps from Is. blanda; Dan. bland-er, to mingle, as denoting the blending of truth with falsehood.

BLANDISH, s. The grain left uncut by careless reapers, generally in the furrows during a kemp, Roxb. Perhaps q. "an interval."—Su. G. bland, bländ, inter, between, from blanda, miscere.

BLANDISH, s. Flattery, Roxb. A. Scott's Poems.—O. Fr. blandice, blandys, caresse, flatterie; Roquefort.

He carried a bell, which he rung, still endeavouring to keep out of the way of his hoodwinked partners in the game. When he was taken, the person who seized him was released from the bandage, and got possession of the bell; the bandage being transferred to him who was laid hold of.

BLIND-BITCH. A bag formerly used by millers, Etr. For. The same with Black Bitch, q. v. Hogg.

BLIND BROSE. Brose without butter; said to be so denominated from there being none of those small orifices in it that are called eyes, and which appear on the surface of brose which has butter in its composition, Roxb.

BLIND-COAL, s. A species of coal producing no flame, Lanarks. Agr. Surv. Ayr. In different languages, the term blind denotes the want of a property which an object seems to possess; as, Germ. blind fenster, Su. G. blindfoenster, E. a blind window, Su. G. blinddoer, a blind door, &c. Bald's Coal Trade.

BLIND HARIE. Blindman's-buff, S. Herd. Belly-blind, synon.—In the Scandinavian Julbock, from which this sport seems to have originated, the principal actor was disguised in the skin of a buck or goat. The name Blind Harie might therefore arise from his rough attire; as he was called blind, in consequence of being blindfolded. Or it may signify, Blind Master, or Lord, in ironical language. V. HEER.

BLIND MAN'S BALL, or Devil's Snuff-box. Common puff-ball, S. V. Flor. Suc. Lightfoot.—It is also called Blind man's een, i. e. eyes, S. B. An idea,

- according to Linn., prevails throughout the whole of Sweden, that the dust of this plant causes blindness.
- BLIND-MAN'S-BELLOWS, s. The puff-ball, or Devil's Snuff-box, Roxb.
- BLIND PALMIE or PAWMIE, s. One of the names given to Blindman's-buff, Roxb.
- BLIND TAM. A bundle of rags made up by female mendicants to pass for a child, and excite compassion, Aberd. Synon. Dumb Tam.
- BLYNDIT, pret. Blended. Gawan and Gol.
- BLINDLINS, BLYNDLINGIS, adv. Having the eyes closed, hoodwinked. It denotes the state of one who does anything as if he were blind, S. Douglas.—Germ. Dan. blindings, id. V. LANGIS.
- BLINDS, s. pl. The Pogge, or Miller's Thumb, a fish, Cottus Cataphractus, Linn. West of S. Statist. Acc.—Perhaps it receives this name because its eyes are very small.
- To BLINK, v. n. To glance, &c. V. BLENK.
- To BLINK, v. n. 1. To become a little sour; a term used with respect to milk or beer, S. Bleeze, synon. Chr. Kirk. 2. Metaph. applied to what is viewed as the effect of Papal influence. Walker's Remark. Passages. 3. To be blinkit, to be half-drunk, Fife. 4. To be blinkit, to be bewitched. Su. G. blaenk-a; Germ. blink-en, coruscate, to shine, to flash, to lighten; q. struck with lightning, which, we know, has the effect of making liquids sour; or as denoting that of sunshine, or of the heat of the weather.
- To BLINK, v. a. 1. To blink a lass, to play the male jilt with her, Fife. Glink, synon. Border. 2. To trick; to deceive; to nick, Aberd. Tarras's Poems.
- BLINK, s. To gie the blink; to give the slip, Aberd. Tarras.
- BLINKER, s. A lively, engaging girl, Roxb. In Gl. to Burns it is said to be a term of contempt.
- BLINKER, s. A person who is blind of one eye, S. Blinkert, id. Lancash. Gl.
- BLINNYNG, part. pr. Leg. Blumynq. Maitland Poems.
- To BLINT, v. n. To shed a feeble, glimmering light, Aberd.
- BLINTER, s. Bright shining, Aberd. Tarras.
- To BLINTER, v. n. To rush; to make haste, Aberd. V. BLENTER.
- To BLINTER, v. n. 1. To shine feebly, or with an unsteady flame, like a candle going out, Moray, Aberd. 2. To bring the eyelids close to the pupil of the eye, from a defect of vision, ibid. 3. To see obscurely; to blink, ibid. Perhaps from Blent, glanced, or from Dan. blund-er, to twinkle, to wink at.
- BLYPE, s. A coat; a shred; applied to the skin, which is said to come off in blypes, when it peels in coats, or is rubbed off, in shreds, S. Burns.—Perhaps radically the same with Flype, q. v. or a different pron. of Bleib.
- BLYPE, s. A stroke or blow. St. Patrick.
- To BLIRT, v. n. To make a noise in weeping; to cry. It is generally joined with Greet. To blirt and greet, i. e. to burst out a-crying, S. Kelly. 2. It is also used actively to express the visible effects of violent weeping, in the appearance of the eyes and face; as, "She's a' blirted wi' greeting," Fife.—Germ. blaerr-en, plarr-en, wugire, rugire. Perhaps E. blurt is also radically allied.
- BLIRT, s. The action expressed by the v. "A blirt of greeting," a violent burst of tears, accompanied with crying, S. B.
- BLIRT, s. 1. A gust of wind, accompanied with rain;
- a smart, cold shower, with wind, Loth. 2. An intermittent drizzle, Roxb.
- BLIRTIE, adj. 1. As applied to the weather, inconstant. A blirtie day, one that has occasionally severe blasts of wind and rain, Loth. West of S. 2. The idea is transferred to poverty; "Cheerless, blirtie, cauld, and blae," Tannahill.—Isl. blaer, aura, a blast of wind. E. blurt, seems to be originally the same.
- BLYTE, s. A blast of bad weather; a flying shower, Loth. Synon. Blout.
- To BLYTER, v. a. To besmeer, Aberd. Part. pa. blyter't. Tarras. V. BLUDDER, BLUTHER.
- To BLITHE, BLYTHE, v. a. To make glad. Wallace. A. S. bliths-ian, laetari; Alem. blid-en, gaudere. But perhaps our v. is immediately formed from the adj.
- BLITHEMEAT, s. The meat distributed among those who are present at the birth of a child, or among the rest of the family, S. pronounced blidydeat, Ang. as the adj. itself, blyd, blyid. I need not say, that this word has its origin from the happiness occasioned by a safe delivery. Taylor's S. Poems.
- To BLITHEN, v. a. To make glad, Ayrs. R. Gilhaize. V. BLITHE.
- BLITTER-BLATTER. A rattling, irregular noise, Dumfr. Siller Gun.
- BLYVARE. Perhaps for Blyther, more cheerful. Houlate. A literary friend suggests that this is meant for believer.
- BLYWEST, adj., in the superl. Houlate.—"Blythest, most merry." Gl. Perhaps it rather refers to colour; q. the palest.
- To BLIZZEN, v. a. Drought is said to be blizzening, when the wind parches and withers the fruits of the earth, S. B.—Su. G. blas-a; Germ. blas-en; A. S. blaes-an, to blow.
- BLOB, BLAB, s. Anything tumid or circular, S. 1. A small globe or bubble of any liquid. Bellenden. 2. A blister, or that rising of the skin which is the effect of a blister or of a stroke, S. Gl. Complaynt. 3. A large gooseberry; so called from its globular form, or from the softness of its skin, S. 4. A blot, a spot; as "a blab of ink," S. denominated perhaps from its circular form. Radically the same word with Bleib, q. v.
- BLOBBIT, part. pa. Blotted, blurred. V. Blos. Acts Ja. I.
- To BLOCHER, (gutt.) v. n. To make a gurgling noise in coughing, from catarrh in the throat, Ang. Perth. It is often conjoined with another term; as, Cougherin' and Blocherin'. Boich and Croicheil denote a dry hard cough. Perhaps from Gael. blaghair, a blast.
- To BLOCK, v. a. 1. To plan; to devise. Baillie. 2. To bargain. 3. To exchange; as, "to block a shilling," to exchange it by accepting copper money in lieu of it.—Teut. block-en, assiduum esse in studiis, in opere, in ergastulo; a sense evidently borrowed from a workman who blocks out his work roughly, before he begin to give it a proper form.
- BLOCKE, s. A scheme, &c. V. BLOIK.
- BLOCKER, s. A term formerly used in S. to denote a broker; q. one who plans and accomplishes a bargain, Minshew.
- BLOCKIN-ALE, s. The drink taken at the conclusion of a bargain, Buchan.
- BLOICHUM, s. A term usually applied to one who has got a cough, Ayrs. Evidently allied to Blocher, q. v.

- BLOIK, Blok, BLOCK, s. 1. A scheme, a contrivance; generally used in a bad sense. Douglas. 2. A bargain, an agreement. Acts Ja. VI.
- BLOISANT, part. pa. One is said to have a bloisant face, when it is red, swollen, or disfigured, whether by intemperance, or by being exposed to the weather; Ang.—This appears to be radically the same with E. blowze; "sun-burnt, high-coloured;" Johns.—Teut. blöse, rubor, purpurisum, redness, the colour of purple; blosen, rubescere; blosende wanghen, rubentes genae, purpled cheeks.
- To BLOME, BLUME, v. n. To shine, to gleam. Barbour.—Su. G. blomm-a, to flourish; E. bloom, used metaph. ; or perhaps from A. S. be, a common prefix, and leom-an, to shine, as gleam is from geleom-an, id.
- BLONCAT, s. BLONCATT, BLUNKET, adj. Meaning uncertain. Perhaps like Blunket, pale-blue, or printed.
- BLONK, BLOUK, s. A steed, a horse, Gawan and Gol.—Alem. planchaz, equus pallidus, hodie blank; Schliter. Thus blonk may have originally meant merely a white horse, q. Fr. blanc cheval.
- BLOKKS, s. pl. King Hart.—If this does not denote horses, as above, it may mean blocks of wood.
- BLOOD-FRIEND, s. A relation by blood. Spalding.—Teut. blood-vriend, cognatus, consanguineus; Kilian. Germ. blut-freund, a relation, a kinsman. V. FRIEND, FRIEND.
- BLOODGRASS, s. A disease of kine, bloody urine; said to be brought on when changed from one kind of pasture to another. In the Highlands they pretend to cure it by putting a live trout down the animal's throat. Agr. Surv. Sutherland.
- BLOOM, s. The efflorescent crystallization on the outside of thoroughly dried fishes, Shetl. Isl. bloemi, flos.
- BLOOM-FELL, s. Apparently yellow clover. Hight. Soc. Trans. V. FELL-BLOOM.
- BLOOMS, s. pl. The name given, at Carron Iron-works, to malleable iron after having received two beatings, with an intermediate scouring.
- To BLORT, v. n. To snort; applied to a horse, Fife.
- BLOSS, s. A term applied to a buxom young woman, West of S. Apparently from the same root with E. blouze, a ruddy, fat-faced wench. Fr. bloss, mellow, ripe.
- To BLOT, v. a. To puzzle; to nonplus. Duff's Poems. Perhaps allied to Su. G. bloed, blate, bashful; or to blott, bare, as denoting that one's mental nakedness is made, to appear. Teut. blutten, homo stolidus, obtuus.
- BLOUST, s. 1. An ostentatious account of one's own actions, a brag, Roxb. Berwicks. Synon. Blaw. A. Scott's Poems. 2. Often applied to an ostentatious person, ibid.
- To BLOUST, v. n. To brag; to boast. Synon. Blaw. Apparently from Su. G. blaast (pron. blast), ventus, tempestas, from blaas-a (pron. blos-a), Isl. blaes-a, flare, spirare.
- BLOUT, adj. Bare, naked. Douglas.—Su. G. Isl. blott; Belg. blout, id. The tautological phrase blott och bar is used in Sw. V. BLAIT.
- BLOUT, s. 1. The sudden breaking of a storm, S. Bloutenin, Clydesd. 2. "A blout of foul weather," a sudden fall of rain, snow, or hail, accompanied with wind, S. The Harst Rig. 3. A sudden eruption of a liquid substance, accompanied with noise, S.—Probably allied to Su. G. bloet, humidus; bloeta waegar, viæ humidæ.
- BLOUTER, s. A blast of wind, Buchan.
- BLOWEN MEAT. Fish or flesh dried by the wind passing through dry-stone houses, Shetl. Isl. blaasinn, exhalatus, excisicatus is synon.; from blaes-a, to blow. V. SKEO.

To disfigure the face with weeping, or in any other way, S. Ross. Cleland. 3. To disfigure, in a moral sense; to exhibit in an unfair point of view.
- To BLUDDER, BLUTHER, v. n. To make a noise with the mouth or throat in taking any liquid, S. Sluther, synon.
- BLUDIE-BELLS, s. pl. Foxglove; Digitalis purpurea, an herb, Lanarks. Syn. Dead-men's Bells.
- BLUE, adj. 1. A blue day, a very chill, or frosty day, Roxb. Perhaps synon. with "a blae day," in other parts of S. 2. A blue day, a day in which any uproar or disturbance has taken place, ibid. 3. To look blue. V. BLEW.
- BLUE-BANNET, s. The Blue Titmouse, Parus caeruleus, Linn; Clydes.
- BLUE-BLANKET. The name given to the banner of the craftsmen in Edinburgh. "As a perpetual remembrance of the loyalty and bravery of the Edinburghers on the aforesaid occasion, the King [Ja. III.] granted them a banner or standard, with a power to display the same in defence of their King, country, and their own rights. This flag, at present denominated The Blue Blanket, is kept by the Con- venter of the Trades." Maxil. Hist. Edin.
- BLUE-BLAUERS, BLUE BLAVERS. The plant called the Bell-flower, or wild Blue Campanula, or Rotundifolia, Roxb. The Blue Bells of Scotland, as in old song. V. BLAWORT.
- BLUE BONNETS. The flower of Scabiosa succisa, Linn. It is also called Devil's Bit, E., the end of the root being, as it were, bitten off. This corresponds with Sw. diefvuks-bett, Seren. This seems the same with Blue-Bannets, Lanarks. Expl. Sheeps-bit.—In Gothland in Sweden, this plant has a fanciful name somewhat similar, Baetsmansmyssa, the boatman's cap or mutch.
- BLUEFLY, s. The flesh-fly or Bluebottle, S.
- BLUE-GOWN, s. The name commonly given to a pensioner, who, annually, on the King's birth-day, receives a certain sum of money, and a blue gown or cloak, which he wears with a badge on it, S. V. BEDEMAN.

- BLUFF, s. To get the bluff; to be taken in; to be cheated, Buchan. Tarras.
- To BLUFFERT, v. n. To bluster, as the wind, Aberd.
- BLUFFERTIN, part. pr. Blustering; gusty. V. BLEFFERT.

- BLUFFERT, s. 1. The blast sustained in encountering a rough wind, Aberd. 2. A blow; a stroke, Arg. Mearns. Bluffet is the term used in this sense, Buchan; which may be allied to Bleevit.
- BLUFFLEHEADED, adj. Having a large head, accompanied with the appearance of dulness of intellect, S.; perhaps from E bluff.
- BLUID, BLUDE, s. Blood, S. Rob Roy.
- BLUID-RUN, adj. Bloodshot, S. Bleed-run, Aberd.
- BLUIDY-FINGERS, s. The name given to the Foxglove, Galloway. Davidson's Seasons.—As this plant has received the designation of Digitalis from its resemblance to the fingers of a glove, the name bloody-fingers would almost seem a literal version of Digitalis purpurea. In Germ. it is called fingerhut, q. the covering of the finger; Sw. fingerhattgrass.
- BLUIDVEIT, BLUIDWYTE, s. A fine paid for effusion of blood. Skene. Reg. Maj.—A. S. blodwite, pro effuso sanguine mulcta; from blod, sanguis, and wite, poena, mulcta.

- BLUTTER (Fr. u), s. A term of reproach, Dumfr. Perhaps one who has not the power of retention. Herd's Coll.
- BO, s. Used as synonym. with Bu, Boo, Aberd.
- * BO, interj. "A word of terrour," Johnson. The application of this word will be seen in the S. Prov., "He dare not say Bo to your blanket;" that is, "He dare not offer you the least injury," Kelly. Perhaps, rather, No one can lay any imputation of dishonour on you, or bring forward anything injurious to your character. This word appears to be the same with the S. bu or boo, used to excite terror; and allied to Teut. bauw, larva, spectrum, as well as to C. B. bo, a hobgoblin.
- BOAKIE, s. A sprite, a hobgoblin, Aberd. Shetl.—Norw. bokje, Isl. bocke, bokki, vir grandis et magnificus. In Sanscrit bhuta is the name of an evil spirit. O. Teut. bokene, phantasma, spectrum.

- BOD, s. A person of small size, a term generally applied, somewhat contemptuously, to one who is dwarfish, although of full age, S. Picken.
- BOD, s. A personal invitation; distinguished from Bodeword, which denotes an invitation by means of a letter or a messenger, Upp. Clydes. A. S. bod-ian, "to deliver a message." Somner.
- BOD. Used as a common proverbial phrase, in regard to anything in which one has not succeeded on a former attempt; "I'll begin," or "I'll set about it, new bod, new shod," S. It is doubtful whether bod should be viewed in the sense of boden, prepared; it is probably rather the s. bod, and may mean, I will expect a new proffer, as being set out to the best advantage. Perhaps a kind of horse-market jockey phrase.
- BODAY. Meaning doubtful; perhaps flesh-colour, q. the complexion of the body. Depred. on the Clan Campbell.
- BODDUM, s. 1. Bottom. Douglas. 2. A hollow, a valley. Douglas. 3. The seat in the human body; the hips; as, "Sit still on your boddum there."—Alem. bodem, Germ. Belg. boden, solum, fundus.

- BODE, s. A portent; that which forebodes, Ayrs. Galt.—Isl. bod, mandatum, bod-a, nuntiare, and so on in the cognate dialects. Hence the compound terms, A. S. forebod-an, prænuntiare; Su. G. forebod-a, to foretoken, E. forebode; Isl. fyribodan, omen; Teut. veur-bode, prænuncius et præsagium; such omens being viewed as communicated by a messenger from the world of spirits to give previous warning of some important event.
- BODE, Bod, s. 1. An offer made in order to a bargain, a proffer, S. Ramsay. 2. It is sometimes used to denote the price asked by a vender, or the offer of goods at a certain rate. Antiquary.—Germ. bot, id. from biet-en, to offer. Isl. bud, a proffer, from bioth-a, offerre, exhibere, præbere.
- BODE, s. Delay. Sir Egeir.
- To BODE, v. a. To proffer, often as implying the idea of some degree of constraint. "He did na merely offer, but he boded it on me," S.
- BODEABLE, adj. Marketable; anything for which a bode or proffer may be expected, Etr. For.
- BODEN, part. pa. Preferred.
- BODEN, part. pa. Proffered. V. BODE, v.
- BODEN, BODIX, BODYN, part. pa. 1. Prepared, provided, furnished, in whatever way, S. Acts Ja. I. Well-boden or ill-boden, well or ill provided, in whatever respect, S. 2. It seems to be used in one instance, in an oblique sense, as signifying matched. V. BOUN. Barbour.—Su. G. bo, Isl. bo-a, to prepare, to provide; wael bodd, well provided against the cold.
- BODGEL, s. A little man, Loth.; perhaps, properly, bodsel, V. BON.
- BODY, s. Strength, bodily ability. Barbour. A. S. bodig not only signifies the body in general, but stature.
- BODIE, BODY, s. 1. A little or puny person; as, He's but a bodie, S. 2. Also used in a contemptuous sense; especially when preceded by an adj. conveying a similar idea. Spalding.
- BODIES, s. pl. A common designation for a number of children in a family or school; as, "Ane o' the bodies is no weel," one of the children is ailing.
- * BODILY, adv. Entirely; as, "It's taen away bodily," not a vestige of it remains; q. the whole body is removed.
- BODY-LIKE, adv. In the whole extent of the corporeal frame, Angus. Spalding.
- BODY-SERVANT, s. A valet; one who immediately waits on his master. Guy Mannering.
- BODLE, BODDLE, s. A copper coin, of the value of two pennies Scots, or the third part of an English half-penny. Rudd.—These pieces are said to have been denominated from a mint-master of the name of Bothwell.
- BODWORD, BODWART, BODWORDE, s. 1. A message, S. B. Wallace. 2. A prediction, or some old saying, expressing the fate of a person or family. Marriage.—A. S. boda, a messenger, and word. Su. G. Isl. bod-word is edictum, mandatum. V. BODE, a portent.

To BOG, v. n. To be bemired; to stick in marshy ground, S.; Lair, synon. From the E. noun.

To BOG, v. a. Metaph. to entangle one's self inextricably in a dispute, S.

BOGAN, BOGGAN, BOGGIN, s. A boil; a large pimple filled with white matter, chiefly appearing between the fingers of children in spring, Berwicks. Ayrs.—Isl. bolga, tumour, bolginn, tumidus, bolg-a, bolgn-a, tumescere; Gael. bolg-am, to swell or blister, bolg, a pimple, bolgach, a boil, the small-pox; C. B. bog, a swelling.

BOG-BLUTER, s. The Bittern; denominated from its thrusting its bill into marshy places, and making a noise by bubbling through the water, Roxb. Ayrs. For the same reason it is called Mire-bumper.

BOG-BUMPER, s. Another name for the bittern, Roxb. Perils of Man. V. MIREBUMPER, id. S. B.

BOGGARDE, s. A bugbear, Rollcock. A. Bor. boggart, a spectre. C. B. bwg, larya, terriculamentum.

BOGGIN, s. V. BOGAN.

BOG-GLED, s. The moor-buzzard, Falco aeruginosus, To BOGG-SCLENT, v. n. Apparently to avoid action, to abscond in the day of battle. Colvil.—Perhaps in allusion to him who sklents or strikes off obliquely from the highway, into a bog, to avoid being taken prisoner.

BOGILL, or, BOGLE about the Stacks, or simply, Bogle, a play of children or young people, in which one hunts several others around the stacks of corn in a barn-yard, S. Bogle about the bush, synon. Ritson.—It seems the same game with that called Barley-bracks, q. v. The name has probably originated from the idea of the huntsman employed being a scarecrow to the rest.

BOGILL, BOGLE, BUGIL, s. 1. A spectre, a hobgoblin, S. A. Bor. Douglas. 2. A scarecrow, a bugbear, S. Synon. doolie, cow; being used in both senses.—C. B. bugul, fear, bugwoly, to frighten.

POTATO-BOGLE, s. A scarecrow erected among growing potatoes, S. Potatodoolie, synon. S. B. Guy Man-nering.

BOGILL-BO, s. A hobgoblin or spectre, S. Ramsay. 2. A pettish humour. Philotus.—In Lincolnshire this word is used for a scarecrow, from bogill, or C. B. bogel-u, to affright, and bo, a hobgoblin, q. “the affrighting goblin.”

To BOGLE, v. a. To terrify; to enchant; to bewitch or blind. M' Ward's Contend.

BOGLE about the Bush. Synon. with Bogill about the stacks, S.; used figuratively to denote circumvention. Waverley.

BOGLE-RAD, adj. Afraid of apparitions or hobgoblins, Roxb. V. BOGLE, and RAD, adj. afraid.

BOGGER, s. Perhaps coarse stockings, bog-hogers. Montgomery. V. HOGERS.

BOGSTALKER, s. An idle, wandering, and stupid fellow; one who seems to have little to do, and no understanding, S. V. STALKER. Ramsay.—Borrowed, perhaps, from outlaws, who were seen at a distance hunting in marshy places, where pursuit was more difficult; or from people going into bogs or miry places in quest of the eggs of wild fowls. In doing so they carried a long pole with a flat piece of wood at the end of it to prevent it from sinking and enable them to step from one place to another; in doing which they necessarily looked wistfully and doubtfully around them, like people who did not know what to do.

BOYART, BOYERT, s. A hoy; a kind of ship. Aberd. Reg. Belg. boeijer, id.

To BOICH (gutt.), v. n. To cough with difficulty, Lanarks. Flandr. poogh-en, niti, adlaborare. V. BAICHE.

BOIST, s. Box or chest. Aberd. Reg. V. BUIST.

BOIT, s. 1. A cask or tub used for the purpose of curing butcher-meat, or for holding it after it is cured; sometimes called a beef-boat, S. 2. Used as equivalent to E. butt. Ruddiman.—Germ. butte; Ital. botte, id., whence E. butt. Su. G. byttia, situla, cupa; Teut. botte, id., doliun, orca, cupa.

BOIT, BOYT, BOITT, s. A boat. Aberd. Reg.

BOITSCIPPING, s. Apparently a company belonging to a boat. Aberd. Reg.

To BOITT, v. n. To enter into a boat; to take boat, S. to boat. Acts Ja. VI.—Teut. boot, scapha, limbus, cymba.

BOYTOUR, BUTTER, s. The bittern. Acts Ja. VI.—O. E. buttour; Belg. buttoor, a bird.

To BOK, BOCK, v. a. 1. To vomit, S. Gawan and Gol. 2. To retch, to incline to puke, S. 3. To belch (eructare), S.—A. Bor. boke, bowk, to nauseate, to be ready to vomit; boaac, to retch, to keck, ibid. Perhaps from A. S. bealc-an, eructare. It however has greater resemblance of puke, to which no etymon has been assigned.

BOKEIK, s. Bopeep, a game. The word is now inverted; as keekbo, q. v. Lyndsay.

To BOLDIN, BOLDYN, v. n. 1. To swell in a literal sense. Douglas. 2. Transferred to the mind, as denoting pride, courage, wrath, &c. Pitscottie.

BOLDIN, BOULDEN, part. pa. swelled.—This is softened into bowdin, bowden, S. Often in the pret. and part. It is written bolnys, swells, (Doug. V.) and bolnyt. I hesitate whether these are contr. from boldinnys. boldinnyt, or the v. in another form, more nearly resembling Su. G. buln-a, Dan. bul-ner. Su. G. bul-na, bulg-ia, id. bolginn, swollen. Hence Isl. bilgia, Su. G. bolgia, a billow; because it is raised by the wind; and bolda, a boil, a tumour. Gael. bulg-am, to swell, bulg, a blister.

BOLE, s. A square aperture, &c. V. BOAL.

BOLE, s. A bull; corresponding to taurus. Fordun.—Isl. bauli, taurus, from baul-a; Su. G. boel-a, mugire, whence also, baul, mugitus.

BOLGAN, s. A swelling that becomes a pimple; the same with Bogan, Roxb.

BOLGAN LEAVES, Nipplewort, an herb, S. B. Lapsana communis, Linn.—Perhaps from Isl. bolg-a, tumere, or Su. G. bolginn, swollen, q. "swelling leaves," as being supposed by the vulgar in S. to be efficacious in removing swellings.

To BOLYN, v. n. To lay tack aboard. Mailland Poems.—O. Fr. bolin-er, to sail by a wind, or close upon a wind.

BOLL Lintseed Boll. V. Bow.

BOLLIT, pret. Perhaps, knocked on the head.—Belg. boll-en, id.; Teut. beulije, supplicium, tormentum.

BOLLMAN, s. A cottager. Orkn. Statist. Acc.—Perhaps from Su. G. Isl. bol, villa, and man, q. the inhabitant of a village. It is always pronounced bow-man.

BOLME, s. A boom, a waterman's pole. Douglas.—Germ. baum, Belg. boom, a tree.

BOLNYNG, s. Swelling. Henryson. V. BOLDIN.

BOLNIT. V. BOLDIN.

BOLSTER, s. That part of a mill in which the axletree moves, S.

BOMACIE, s. Perhaps, thunder; thunderstorm, Ayrs.

BOMARISKIE, s. An herb, the roots of which taste exactly like licorice; perhaps the Astragalus glycyphillus of Linn. Upp. Clydes.

BOMBILL, s. Buzzing noise; metaphor used for boasting. Poltwart.—Teut. bommele, a drone.

BOMESPAR, s. A spar of a larger kind. Su. G. bom signifies obex, vectis, a bar or spar for a gate, or for shutting in; Teut. boom, Germ. baum, id.

BOMILL, s. Perhaps a cooper's instrument, q. wimble. Aberd. Reg.

Picken. V. BUMML, v.

BON. Borrowed, begged; "He that trusts to bon ploughs, will have his land lye lazy," S. Prov.—Isl. bon, gratis acceptio, mendicatio; Su. G. boen, preces. Hence, perhaps, E. boom.

BON, s. Apparently, bane, injury. Wallace.

BONACCORD, s. 1. Agreement, amity. 2. A term which seems to have been formerly used by way of toast, as expressive of amity and kindness. Spalding. 3. The motto of the town's arms, by which term Aberdeen is fondly named by her sons.—Fr. bon, good, and accord, agreement.

BONALAIS, BONAILLE, BONAILLIE, s. A drink taken with a friend, when one is about to part with him; as expressive of one's wishing him a prosperous journey, S. Wallace.—It is now generally pron. bonaillie, S. Bonalais might seem to be the plur. But perhaps it merely retains the form of Fr. Bon allez.

BONDAGE, BONNAGE, s. The designation given to the services due by a tenant to the proprietor, or by a cottager to the farmer, Angus. Agr. Surv. Kincard.

BONDAY WARKIS. The time a tenant or vassal is bound to work for the proprietor. V. BONNAGE, s.

BONE, s. A petition, a prayer. Douglas. O. E. id. Isl. baen, precatio, oratio; boon, petitio, gratis acceptio, mendicatio, G. Andr. A S ben, bene, id.

BONNETT, s. "A small sail, fixed to the bottom or sides of the great sails, to accelerate the ship's way in calm weather." Gl. Compl. Douglas.—Fr. bonnette, Sw. bonet, id.

BON-GRACE, s. 1. A large bonnet worn by females. 2. A coarse straw-hat, of their own manufacture, worn by the female peasantry, Roxb. Guy Manner-ing.

BONIE, BONYE, BONNY, adj. 1. Beautiful, pretty, S. Mailland Poems. Boniest, most beautiful. Montgomerie. 2. It is occasionally used ironically, in the same way with E. pretty, S. Priests of Pebblis. 3. Precious, valuable. Minstrelsy Border. Bonny is used in the same sense by Shakspeare, and since his time by some other E. writers. But I suspect that it is properly S. Johnson derives it from Fr. bon, bonne, good. This is by no means satisfactory; but we must confess that we cannot substitute a better etymon.

BONYNES, BONNYNES, s. Beauty, handsomeness. Philotus. Herd's Coll.

BONK, s. A bank. Douglas.—Probably corr. from A. S. benc. Isl. bunga, however, signifies tumor terrae.

BONKER, s. A bench, &c. V. BUNKER.

BONNACK O' KNAESHIP. A certain duty paid at a mill, Ayrs. This is the bonnack due to the servant, (knave). V. KNAWSHIP.

BONNAGE, s. An obligation, on the part of the tenant, to cut down the proprietor's corn. Statist. Acc.—Evidently a corr. of Bondage, q. v.

BONNAGE-HEUK, s. A tenant bound by the terms of his lease to reap, or use his hook, for the proprietor in harvest, Aberd.

BONNAGE-PEATS, s. pl. Peats which, by his lease, a tenant is bound to furnish to the proprietor, ib.

BONNAR, s. "A bond," Gl. Popular Ball.

BONNET. V. WHITE BONNET.

BONNET. Blue Bonnet. This, in former times, in Teviotdale at least, was used as a charm, especially for warding off the evil influence of the fairies. "An unchristened child was considered as in the most imminent danger, should the mother, while on the straw, neglect the precaution of having the blue bonnet worn by her husband constantly beside her. When a cow happened to be seized with any sudden disease (the cause of which was usually ascribed to the malignant influence of the fairies), she was said to be elf-shot; and it was reckoned as much as her life was worth not to 'dad her wi' the blue bonnet.' 'It's no wordie a dad of a bonnet,' was a common phrase when expressing contempt, or alluding to anything not worth the trouble of repairing."—Edin. Mag., April, 1820.

To FILL one's BONNET. To be equal to one in any respect; as, "He'll ne'er fill his bonnet," he will never match him, S. Old Mortality.

To RISE one's BONNET. To excel one in every respect. "May he rise his father's bonnet!" May he be superior to his father; or father-better.

BONNET-FLEUK, s. The Pearl, a fish. Nell's List of Fishes.

BONNET-LAIRD, BANNET-LAIRD, s. A yeoman; a petty proprietor; one who farms his own land. Synon. Cock-Laird. The Entail.

BONSPEL, BONSFELL, s. 1. A match at archery. Pit-scottie. 2. A match, at the diversion of curling on the ice, between two opposite parties, S. Graeme. 3. A match of any kind; as at golf, foot-ball, or even at fighting, Aberd.—Belg. bonne, a village, a district, and spel, play; because the inhabitants of different villages or districts contend with each other in this sport, one parish, for example, challenging another. Or, the first syllable may be traced to Su. G. bonde, an husbandman. Stat. Acc. P. Muirkirk. V. CURL.

BONTE, s. A thing useful or advantageous; a benefit.—Fr. id. Bellenden.

BONXIE, s. The name given to the Skua Gull, Shetl. Neill.

BOO, Bow, s. A term sometimes used to denote a manor-house, or the principal farm-house, or a village, in conjunction with the proper name, Ang.—Su. G. bo, Isl. bu, boo, domicileum, a house or dwelling, also, a village; Moes. G. baua, id. In the Orkney Islands, where the Gothic was long preserved in greater purity than in our country, the principal farm-house on an estate, or in any particular district of it, is in a great many instances called the Boll or Bow. Barry.

BOODIE-BO, s. A bugbear; an object of terror, Aberd. Synon. Bu, Boo.

BOODIES, pl. Ghosts, hobgoblins, Aberd. Journal Lond.—It might be deduced from A. S. boda, a messenger, from bodian, to declare, to denounce. But it seems to be rather originally the same with C. B. bugdhat, hobgoblins, Gael. bodach, a ghost. Waverley.

To BOOFF, v. a. To strike, properly with the hand, so as to produce a hollow sound, Fife.

BOOFF, s. A stroke causing a hollow sound, ibid. Buff, synon. V. BUFF, v. and s.

BOOIT, s. A hand-lantern. V. BOWER.

To BOOK, BEUK, v. a. To register a couple in the kirk-session records for the proclamation of the banns, S. Galt.

BOOKING, s. This act of recording is termed the booking, Fife.

BOOL, s. A semicircular handle, &c. Bool of a pint-stoup. V. BOUL.

BOOL, s. A contemptuous term for a man, especially if advanced in years. It is often conjoined with an epithet; as, "an auld bool," an old round or corpulent fellow, S.—Su. G. bol, the trunk of the body, as distinguished from the head and feet. Wappal, how

To BOOL, BULE, v. n. 1. To weep, in a childish manner, with a continued humming sound, Roxb. 2. To sing wretchedly, with a low, drawing note. Hogg.—Isl. baul-a; Su. G. bol-a, mugre; Sw. boel-a, to low, to bellow.

BOOL-HORNED, adj. Perverse, obstinate, inflexible, S. apparently from the same origin with Bools.—Boolie-horned, Border, and W. of S. A. Bor. buckle-horns, short crooked horns turned horizontally inwards.

BOOL of a Key. The round annular part of a key, by means of which it is turned with the hand, S.

BOOLS of a Pot, s. pl. Two crooked instruments of iron, linked together, used for lifting a pot by the ears, S.; also called clips.—Teut. boghel, numella; Germ. bugel, anything that is circular or curved.

BOOLYIE, s. A loud threatening noise, like the bellowing of a bull, Etr. For. Apparently of the same origin as the v. Bool; the E. v. To Bawl, seems a cognate term.

BOON of Lint. V. BUNE.

BOON of Shearers. A band of reapers; as many as a farmer employs, Dumfr. Loth.—Isl. buandi, ruicola, buanda, cives, from bu-a, habitare; Su. G. bo, id.

BOONMOST, adj. Uppermost, S., pron. bunemist. Ross.—A. S. bufan, bufon, above, and most.

BOORICK, s. A shepherd's hut. V. BOURACK.

BOOST, v. imp. Behoved. V. BOOT, v. imp.

BOOST, s. A box. V. BUIST.

BOOT, BOUT, s. A sieve, Roxb. Apparently corr. from E. bolt, to sift, whence bolter, a sieve.

BOOT, BUT, BOED, BIT, BUD, BOOST, v. imp. Behoved, was under a necessity of, S.; He boot to do such a thing; he could not avoid it. It bit to be; it was necessary that this should take place. Ross. Burns.—Bus and bud occur in the same sense in Ywaine and Gawin. It is a cont. of behoved, Belg. behoef.

BOOT-HOSE, s. pl. Coarse ribbed worsted hose, without feet, fixed by a flap under the buckle of the shoe, and covering the breeches at the knee; formerly worn instead of boots, S. Synon. Gramashes. Heart of Mid-Loth.

BOOTYER, s. A glutton. V. BYOUTOUR.

BOOTS, BOOTES, s. pl. An instrument of torture formerly used in S.; being a kind of iron boot in which the leg was placed and into which wedges were driven to extort confession of criminality. Crookshank's Hist.

BOOTIKIN, s. Diminutive of the above.

BOOZY, adj. Bushy. V. BOUSY.

BOR, BOIR, BORR, s. 1. A small hole or crevice; a place used for shelter, especially by smaller animals, S. Sir Tristrem. 2. An opening in the clouds, when the sky is thick and gloomy, or during rain, is called a blue bore, S. It is sometimes used metaph. Baillie. 3. To tak in, or up a bore, to begin to reform one's conduct, Mearns; synon. with "turning over a new leaf."—Su. G. Germ. bor, terebra; Isl. bora, foramen; A. S. bor-ian, to pierce.

BORAGE GROT, s. A kind of goat, or fourpenny piece, formerly current in S. Perhaps so denominated from the use of borax as an alloy.—Teut. boragie, buglossa.

BORAL, BORALE, BORELL, s. A wimble; an instrument for boring, one end of which is placed on the breast, Teviotd. Hence called a breast-bore, Clydes.—Su. G. Isl. bor, terebum, whence bora, the orifice made, from bor-a, perforare; Teut. boor-en, id.

BORAL HOLE, s. A hole made by a wimble, Selkirks. Hogg.

BORAL-TREE, s. The handle of a wimble, Teviotd.

To BORCH, BOROH, v. a. To give a pledge or security for; to bail. Wallace.

BORCH, BORGH, BOWRCH, BOROW, s. 1. A surety. The term properly denotes a person who becomes bail for another, for whatever purpose. Wallace. 2. A. pledge; anything laid in pawn. Barbour.—The term occurs in both senses in O. E. A. S. borg borh, fi-de-jussor; also, foenus; Germ. burge, a pledge.—Su. G. borgen, suretiship. Ihre derives Su. G. and Isl. borg-a, to become surety, from berg-a, a periculo tueri, to protect from danger. The idea is certainly most natural: For what is suretiship, but warranting the safety of any person or thing?

LATTIN TO BORGH. Laid in pledge. Lattin is the part. pa. of the v. Lat, to let; to lay.—Teut. laeten zijn, ponere.

To STREK, or STRYE A BORGH. To enter into suretiship or cautionary on any ground. Acts Ja. I.

BORD, s. 1. A broad hem or welt, S. 2. The edge or border of a woman's cap, S.—Fr. bord; Belg. boord, a welt, a hem, or selvage; Isl. bard, bord, the extremity or margin.

To BORROW one, to urge one to drink, Ang. Perhaps from borg-en, to pledge. When one pledges another in company, he engages to drink after him; and in ancient times it was generally understood, that he who pledged another, was engaged to drink an equal quantity.

BORROWGANGE, BORROWGANG, s. A state of suretiship. Reg. Mag.—Su. G. edgaang, laggaang, are rendered by Ihre, actus jurandi, from gaa, ire; borrowgange may thus be merely the act of going or entering as a surety.

BORROWING DAYS. The last three days of March, Old Style, S. Complaynt S.—These days being generally stormy, our forefathers have endeavoured to account for this circumstance, by pretending that March borrowed them from April, that he might extend his power so much longer. Those who are much addicted to superstition will neither borrow nor lend on any of these days, lest the articles borrowed should be employed for the purposes of witchcraft against the lenders. Some of the vulgar imagine, that these days received their designation from the conduct of the Israelites in borrowing the property of the Egyptians.

BORROW-MAILL, BURROW-MAIL, s. Annual duty payable to the Sovereign by a burgh for enjoying certain rights. Acts Ja. VI. V. MAIL, tribute.

BOTTREL, s. A thickset, dwarfish person, ibid.—Fr. bouterolle, the shape of a scabbard, the tip that strengthens the end of it; Isl. but-r, truncus, but-a, truncare.

BOTWAND, s. Perhaps a rod of authority or power; from Germ. bot, power, and wand, a rod. Or botwand may be the rod of a messenger, from A. S.; Su. G. bod, a message; A. S. bod-ian; Su. G. bod-a, nuntiare.—In ancient times, among the Gothic nations, when the men capable to bear arms were summoned to attend their general, a messenger was sent, who with the greatest expedition was to carry a rod through a certain district, and to deliver it in another; and so on till all quarters of the country were warned. This rod had certain marks cut on it, which were often unknown to the messenger, but intelligible to the principal persons to whom he was sent. These marks indicated the time and place of meeting. The rod was burnt at the one end, and had a rope affixed to the other; as intimating the fate of those who should disobey the summons, that their houses should be burnt; and that they should themselves be hanged. This was called, Su. G. butkaste, from but, a message, and kaste, [S. cavel] a rod. The Croistara, or fire-cross, anciently sent round through the Highlands, was a signal of the same kind.

BOUCHT, Bought, s. A curvature, or bending of any kind, S. To Look Brown, v. n. To appear discontented. Ross.
BROWNIE, s. A spirit, till of late years, supposed to haunt some old houses, those, especially, attached to farms. Instead of doing any injury, he was believed to be very useful to the family, particularly to the servants, if they treated him well; for whom, while they took their necessary refreshment in sleep, he was wont to do many pieces of drudgery, S. Douglas.—Ruddiman seems to think that these spirits were called Brownies, from their supposed "swarthy or tawny colour." They may be viewed as corresponding with the Swartalfar, i. e. swarthy or black elves of the Edda, as the Liosalfar, white, or fair elves, are analogous to our Fairies.
BROWNIE-BAE, s. A designation given to Brownie, Buchan. The addition to the common name may have originated from Brownies being supposed occasionally to frighten women and children with a wild cry resembling that of a brute animal.
BROWNIE'S-STONE. An altar dedicated to Brownie. Martin's West. Islands.
BROWN JENNET OR JANET, s. 1. A cant phrase for a knapsack. 2. Brown Janet is also explained as signifying a musket. Picken's Gl.

- CAT-HUD, s. The name given to a large stone, which serves as a back to a fire on the hearth, in the house of a cottager, Dumfr.—Su. G. kaette denotes a small cell or apartment, which corresponds to the form of the country fireside; also a bed; a pen. Hud might seem allied to Teut. huyd-en, conservare, as the stone is meant to guard this enclosure from the effects of the fire.
- CATINE, s. Unexplained. A chain, a row? Poltwart.
- CAT I' THE HOLE, s. The name of a game well known in Fife, and perhaps in other counties.—If seven boys are to play, six holes are made at certain distances. Each of the six stands at a hole, with a short stick in his hand; the seventh stands at a certain distance, holding a ball. When he gives the word, or makes the sign agreed upon, all the six must change holes, each running to his neighbour's hole, and putting his stick in the hole which he has newly seized. In making this change, the boy who has the ball tries to put it into an empty hole. If he succeeds in this, the boy who had not his stick (for the stick is the Cat) in the hole to which he had run, is put out, and must take the ball. When the Cat is in the Hole, it is against the laws of the game to put the ball into it.

- CHOSS, s. Choice. Barbour.
- CHOUKS. V. CHOKKIS.
- CHOUSKIE, s. A knave, Shetl.—Apparently from Su. G. Isl. kush-a, pellucere, as it is the business of a G. Isl. to entice others. Ithre gives kouska as the Norw. form of the v. E. chouse is, undoubtedly, a cognate term, and, most probably, cozen.
- CHOW, s. The jowl. V. CHOL.
- CHOW, s. 1. A wooden ball used in a game like Shinty, played with clubs, Moray, Banffs. 2. The game itself is hence denominated The Chow.—Perhaps from Dan. kolle; Teut. kolue, a bat or club; or from Isl. kug-a; Dan. kue, cogere.
- To CHOW, v. a. To chew, S.
- CHOW, CHAW, s. 1. A mouthful of anything that one chews, S. 2. Used, by way of eminence, for a quid of tobacco, S. Ballad Muirland Willie.
- CHOW'D MOUSE. A worn-out person; one whose appearance in the morning shows that he has spent the night riotously. He is called "a chow'd mouse," or said to "look like a chow'd mouse," Roxb.; i. e., like a mouse to which her ruthless foe has given several gashes with her teeth, before condescending to give the coup de grace.
- To CHOWL, CHOOL, (like ch in church), v. n. 1. To chow one's *chaf*s, to distort one's mouth, often for the purpose of provoking another; to make ridiculous faces, S.—Probably corr., because of the distortion of the face, from Showl, q. v. 2. To emit a mournful cry; applied to dogs or children, Fife. As regarding children, it always includes the idea that they have no proper reason for their whining.
- CHOWL, CHOOL, s. A cry of the kind described above, a whine, Ibid.
- CHOWPIS, pres. v. Chops about. Douglas.
- CHOWS, s. pl. A smaller kind of coal, much used in forges, S.—Perhaps from Fr. chou, the general name of coal.—Stat. Acc.

- EGAL, adj. Equal, Fr., Mearns. Meston.
- EGE OR VRE. V. URE, sense 3.
- * EGG. One of the childish modes of divination used on Hallowe'en, S. B., is to drop the white of an egg in wine, or any pure liquid. If a fine landscape, with trees, &c., appears, as interpreted by the lively workings of an excited fancy, one is fated to enjoy a country life; if high houses and steeples meet the eye, it is to be a town life. In the West of S., melted lead is dropped in water for the same end.
- EGG-BED, s. The ovarium of a fowl, S.
- EGGLAR, s. One who collects eggs for sale, S. A. Statist. Account.

ER. 1. The termination of many words expressive of office or occupation, both in S. and E.; as, waiter, a fuller, skipper, a shipmaster, baker, one who bakes, writer, one who writes, &c.—Wachter views this termination, which is also used in Germ., and the other northern languages, as having the same signification with Lat. vir, and C. B. ur, a man. This idea receives powerful confirmation from what he subjoins, that er and man are used as synon. terminations; as, Belg. schipper and schipman, naut, plower and plowman, arator, kauffer and kauffman; mercator, &c. 2. In other words, into which the idea of man does not enter, it is simply used as a termination, like Lat. or, in candör; splendor, &c. V. Wachter, Prot. sect. vi.

GEG. To smuggle the geg, a game played by boys in Glasgow, in which two parties are formed by lot, equal in number, the one being denominated the outs, the other the ins. The outs are those who go out from the den or goal, where those called the ins remain for a time. The outs get the geg, which is anything deposited, as a key, a penknife, &c. Having received this, they conceal themselves, and raise the cry, "Smugglers." On this they are pursued by the ins; and if the geg—for the name is transferred to the person who holds the deposit—be taken, they exchange situations, the outs becoming ins, and the ins, outs. This seems to be merely a corr. pronunciation of Fr. gage, a pawn, a pledge, a stake at play. Qu. Keg?

- GILLIEBIRSE, (g hard), s. A cushion, generally of hair, formerly worn on the forehead of a female, over which the hair was combed, Roxb. The last part of the word is probably the same with S. birse, birse, because of the bristly texture of a cushion of this description. The first syllable may be immediately from gillie as signifying a giddy young woman.
- GILLIE-CASEFLUE, s. "That person of a chieftain's body-guard, whose business it was to carry him over fords." Clan Albyn.—As gillie signifies servant, cas-flue, I suppose, is compounded of Gaelic cas, a foot, and fluch, wet, moist. Thus, it appears that gillie-wetfoot, q. v. is merely a literal translation of this term. V. GILLIE, a boy.

HALF, s. 1. Side. Barbour. 2. Quarter; coast, ib. 3. Part; side. ib.—A. S. hælf, pars, ora, tractus.

* HALF, s. This term frequently occurs in a Scottish idiom, which affords mirth to our Southern neighbours. If you ask, "what's o'clock," when it is half-past three, a Scotsman replies, Half four, i. e. half an hour to four. "Ha!" says the Englishman, "then I must wait dinner a long while, for it is only two o'clock!" But this is a good Gothic idiom, yet common in Sweden; half fyra, "half-past three; half an hour after three;" Widge; literally, "half-four."

HERINTILL, adv. Herein; in this. Acts Ja. IV.

HERIOT, s. The fine exacted by a superior on the death of his tenant, Galloway.—From A. S. herepeat, compounded of here, exercitus, and geot-an, reddere, erogare. This primarily signified the tribute given to the lord of a manor for his better preparation for war; but came at length to denote the best aucht, or beast of whatever kind, which a tenant died possessed of, due to his superior after death. It is therefore the same with the E. forensic term Heriot. Here we have the meaning of the surname of George Heriot.

HERIS, imperat. v. Hear ye. Douglas.

HERISON, s. Hedgehog. Burel.—Fr. herisson.

HERYTOUR, s. 1. An heir. Abp. Hamilt.—Fr. heritier, id. 2. A landholder in a parish, S. Stat. Acc.

HERLE, s. A mischievous dwarf, or imp; applied to an ill-conditioned child, or to any little animal of this description. Perth. This, I suspect, is radically the same with Frie, id.; especially as it is expl. as exactly synon. with Worl.

HERLICH, Lordly.—From Lat. herus, a master, and Germ. lich, like.

HESS, adj. Hoarse. Lyndsay.—Su. G. haes, hes, A. S. haz, id.

To HET, v. a. To strike, Angus; hit, E.

HET, HAT, adj. 1. Hot, S. Ramsay. 2. Keen, metaph. Wallace. Het is not only to be viewed as an adj. but is used both as the pret. and part. pa. of the v. to heat; as, "I het it in the pan," "Cauld kail het again," broth warmed on the second day; figuratively used to denote a sermon that is repeated, or preached again to the same audience, S.

HET-AHAME, adj. Having a comfortable domestic settlement, Gall.

HET BEANS AND BUTTER. A game in which one hides something, and another is employed to seek it. When near the place of concealment, the hider cries Het, i. e. hot on the scent; when the seeker is far from it, Cald, i. e. cold. He who finds it has the right to hide it next, Teviotd. It resembles Hunt the slipper.

- HET FIT. Used in the same sense, Aberd. with Fute Hate, straightway.
- HETFULL, adj. Hot; fiery. Wallace.
- HET HANDS. A play, in which a number of children place one hand above another alternately on a table, till the column is completed, when the one whose hand is undermost pulls it out, and claps it on the top, and thus in rotation, Roxb. Invented, probably, for warming their hands in a cold day.
- HETHELICHE, adj. Reproachful. Sir Tristrem.—Isl. Sw. haediligt, contumeliosus. V. HEYDIN.
- HETHING, s. Scorn. V. HEYDIN.
- HETLY, adv. Hotly, S. Ross.
- HET PINT. The hot beverage which young people carry with them from house to house early in the morning of the new-year; used also on the night preceding a marriage, and at the time of child-bearing, S. Morison.
- HET SEED, HOT SEED, s. 1. Early grain, S. A. Agr. Surv. Berw. 2. Early peas, S. A. Agr. Surv. Roxb.
- HET SKIN. "I'll gie ye a guid het skin," I will give you a sound beating, properly on the buttocks, S.
- HET SKINN'D, adj. Irascible, S.; synon. Thin-skinned.
- HET STOUP. Het Pint, S. J. Nicol.
- HETTLE, adj. Fiery; irritable, Clydes. This seems merely a corr. of Hetfull, used in the same sense by Harry the Minstrel. V. HER.
- HETTLE, s. The name given by fishermen, on the Firth of Forth, to a range of rocky bottom lying between the roadstead and the shore. "The brassy is found, in the summer months, on the hettle or rocky grounds." Neill's List of Fishes.
- HETTLE CODLING. A species of codling, which receives its denomination from being caught on what is in Fife called the Hettle. Out of the hettle into the kettle, is an expression commonly used by old people in Kirkcaldy, when they wish to impress one with the idea that any kind of fish is perfectly caller or fresh.
- HET TUIK. A bad taste. V. TUIK.
- HET WATER. To haud one in het water, to keep one in a state of constant uneasiness or anxiety; as, "That bairn hauds me ay in het water; for he's sae forder-sum, that I'm ay feared that some ill come o'er him," S. This proverbial language would seem to be borrowed from the painful sensation caused by scalding.
- HEUCH, pret. v. Hewed. Gawan and Gol.—Su. G. hugg-a, caedere.
- HEUCH, HEUGH, HEUCH, HUWE, HWE, HEW, s. 1. A crag; a ragged steep, S. Wynt. 2. A steep hill or bank. Everg. 3. A glen with steep overhanging braes or sides, Loth. Bord. Gl. Compl. 4. - HICHTY, adj. Lofty. Douglas.
- HICHTIT, (quilt.) part. pa. In great wrath, suggesting the idea of indignation approaching to frenzy, Ang.; synon. Rais'd.
- HICHTLE, adv. Highly. Keith's Hist.
- TO HICK, v. n. 1. To hesitate, as in making a bargain; to chaffer, Fife, Roxb. 2. To hesitate in speaking, Roxb. Evidently the same with Isl. hik-a, cedere, recedere. A term nearly resembling Hick, was used by our old writers in the same sense. V. HYNK. The E. v. to Higgle may be a diminutive from this source; although viewed by Dr. Johns. as probably corrupted from Haggle.
- HICK, interj. A term used to draught horses, when it is meant that they should incline to the right, Dumfr. Liddisdale.—Isl. hik-a, cedere, recedere. It is also used by coachmen to urge on their horses.
- TO HICK, v. n. To hiccup, Ang. Perth.; synon. Yeisk.—Su. G. hik-a, Teut. hicken, id.
- HICK, s. The act of hiccuping, ibid.—Teut. hick, id.; Su. G. hicka, id.

To HICK, v. n. To make such a noise as children do, before they burst into tears; to whimper, South of S. It is expl. as signifying to grieve, Roxb. Allied, perhaps, to Teut. hick-en, singulare, to hiccup, because of the resemblance as to sound.

HICKERTIE-PICKERTIE, adv. Entirely in a state of confusion, Aberd.; the same with E. higgledy piggledy.

HYD AND HEW. Skin and complexion; skin and colour; also Hyd or Hew. Stewart. Bann. Poems. "It's sae dirty, it will never come to hyd or hew." Loth.

HIDDERSOCHT. Poems Sixteenth Cent. This apparently ought to be two words. Or it may be viewed as a compound term (like A. S. hider-cyme, adventus), from hider, huc, and sohte, the part. pa. of sec-an used in the sense of adire; "I am now come hither to thee alone."

HIDDIE-GIDDIE, Loth. HIRDIE-GIRDIE, adv. Topsy-turvy, Roxburgh. Houlate. Q. the head in a giddy state.

HIDDIE-GIDDIE, s. A short piece of wood with a sharp point at each end, for keeping horses asunder in ploughing; syn. with Broble; Berwicks.

HIDDIL, HIDLINS, adv. Secretly, S. Dunbar.

HIEGATIS, s. pl. High-ways, S. Acts Ja. VI.

HIE HOW, interj. Bravo. Douglas.

HIELAND, adj. Of or belonging to the Highlands of S. Common pronunciation.

HIELANDMAN'S LING. The act of walking quickly with a jerk, Fife. V. LING, LYNG.

HIELAND PASSION. A phrase used in the Lowlands of S. to denote a violent, but temporary ebullition of anger. It evidently intimates the conviction which generally prevails, that the Gaels are sudden and quick in quarrel.

HIELAND SERK. V. SARK.

HIER of yarn. V. HEER.

HIER SOME, adj. Coarse-looking, Aberd.

HIE WO. A phrase addressed to horses, when the driver wishes them to incline to the left, Roxb. Synon. wynd, in other counties.

HIGH-BENDIT, part. adj. 1. Dignified in appearance; possessing a considerable portion of hauteur, S. 2. Aspiring; ambitious; as, She's a high-bendit lass that, ye needna speir her price, S.; i. e. "She will look too high for you; it is vain, therefore, to make your addresses to her."

HIGH-GAIT, HIE-GAIT, s. The high road; the public road, S.; pron. hee-gait.

HIGH-YEAR-OLD, adj. The term used to distinguish cattle one year and a half old, Teviotd.; the same with Heivearald.

To HIGHLIE, v. n. To carry with difficulty, Lanarks. This seems originally the same with Hechle, q. v.

To HYGHT, v. a. To promise. V. HICHT.

HY-JINKS, HIGH-JINKS, s. A very absurd game, in which it was determined by the dice who should for some time sustain a fictitious character, or repeat a certain number of loose verses, under the penalty of either swallowing an additional bumper, or paying a small sum to the reckoning. This appears to be nearly the same with the drunken game called Whig-maleerie. Ramsay. Guy Mannerling.

To HYKE, v. n. "To move the body suddenly, by the back joint." Gall. Encycl. This seems synon. with Hitch, and from the same source, Isl. hik-a, cedere, recedere, or hwik-a, titubare.

To HILCH, v. n. To hobble; to halt, S. Burns.

HILCH, s. A shelter from wind or rain, Selkirks. Beid, synon. S.—Isl. hyl-ia, tegere, celare.

HILCH of a hill, s. The brow, or higher part of the face of a hill; whence one can get a full view, on both hands, of that side of the hill, Loth. It is distinguished from the hip of the hill, which is a sort of round eminence lower in situation than the hilch. It is also distinguished from the ridge, from which both the back and face of the hill may be seen.—This is most probably allied to Isl. Su. G. hals, collis.

HILDIE-GILDIE, s. An uproar, Mearns.; a variety of Hiddie-Giddie, q. v.

* HILL, s. To the hill, with a direction upwards; as, "He kaims his hair to the hill," Aberd.

HILL, s. Husk, Aberd.; E. hull.—Su. G. hyl-ia, tegere. V. HOOL.

HILLAN, s. 1. A hillock, Gall. 2. Expl. "a small artificial hill." Gall. Encycl. A diminutive, perhaps, from A. S. hill, or hilla, collis.

HILL-AN'-HEAP. To mak anything out o' hill-an'-heap, to fabricate a story from one's own brain, Ayr.

HILL-DIKE, s. A wall, generally of sods, dividing the pasture from the arable land in Orkney.

HILL-FOLK, s. A designation given to the people in S. otherwise called Cameronians; more properly the Reformed Presbytery. Waverley.

HILLBALLOW, s. An uproar; a tumult with noise, Roxb.; Hillie-bulloo, Ang.; Hullie-bulloo, Fife.

HILLIGELEEERIE, s. Frolic; giddy conduct. Saint Patrick.

HILLIGELEEERIE, adv. Topsy-turvy, S. B. Hillie-gulair, Perth.—Gael. wile go leir, altogether.

HISK, HISKIE, interj. Used in calling a dog, Aberd. V. ISK, ISKIE.

HY SPY. A game resembling Hide and Seek, but played in a different manner, Roxb. Guy Mannering. V. Ho SPY. This seems the same with Harry Racket, or Hoop and Hide, as described by Strutt, Sports. The station which in E. is called Home, is here the Den, and those who keep it, or are the seekers, are called the Ins. Those who hide themselves, instead of crying Hoop, as in E., cry Hy Spy; and they are denominated the Outs. The business of the Ins is, after the signal is given, to lay hold of the Outs before they can reach the Den. The captive then becomes one of the Ins. For the honour of the game consists in the privilege of hiding one's self.—Ity is still used in calling after a person, to excite attention, or when it is wished to warn him to get out of the way, S., like ho, E. cho, Lat. Spy is merely the E. v. containing a summons to look out for those who have hid themselves.

HISS, interj. Used to excite a dog to attack; as, "Hiss, tak'm!" Aberd.

HISSIE, HIZZIE, s. 1. Corr. of housewife. Burns. 2. Used in a contemptuous way; a hussy. This is also written Huzzie. Guy Mannering.

HOYNED, part. Depred. on Clan Campb.

HOIS, HOISS, s. pl. Stockings; hose. Inventories.
To win the HOISS. To gain the prize; to obtain the superiority. Winyet. A phrase, which seems to have been formerly in common use; borrowed from the custom, which, I believe, still prevails in some parts of S., of running or wrestling, at a Fair, for a pair of hose or stockings as the prize. Or it may refer to the old custom of our country, still retained at weddings, in some places, of throwing the stocking, which has been worn by the bride, on her left leg, on the day of marriage, among the company. The person whom it hits, it is supposed, is the first in the company that will be married.

To HOISE, HYSE, v. n. 1. To brag; to vaunt; to bluster; to rant. 2. To hoist, Aberd.

HOY'S NET. Merely hose-net, according to the prof. of Ettr. For. or the writer's fancy. Perils of Man.

HORN-HARD, adv. Sleeping horn-hard, in profound sleep, S. B.

HORN-HEAD, adv. With full force; impetuously; without stop, Ettr. For.; Born-head, synonym. This seems to refer to an animal rushing forward to strike with its horns.

HORN-IDLE, adj. Having nothing to do; completely unemployed, Loth. Lanarks. Sazon and Gael.

HORNIE, HORNOK, s. A ludicrous name given to the devil, from the vulgar idea of his having horns, S.; sometimes Auld Hornie. Burns.

HORNIE, s. A game among children, in which one of the company runs after the rest, having his hands clasped, and his thumbs pushed out before him in resemblance of horns. The first person whom he touches with his thumbs becomes his property, joins hands with him, and aids in attempting to catch the rest; and so on till they are all made captives. Those who are at liberty, still cry out Hornie, Hornie! Loth.

HORNIE, s. Fair Hornie, equivalent to fair play; probably borrowed from the game of Hornie, or some similar game, Aberd.

HORNIE, adj. Amorous; liquorish, Aysr.; perhaps from the idea that such a person is apt to reduce another to the state of a cornutus.

HORNIE-HOLES, s. pl. A game in which four play, a principal and an assistant on each side. A. stands with his assistant at one hole, and throws what is called a cat (a piece of stick, and frequently a sheep's horn) with the design of making it alight into another hole at some distance at which B. stands, with his assistant, to drive it aside with a rod resembling a walking-stick, Teviotdale.

HORNIE-REBELS, s. A play of children, Aysr.; q. rebels at the horn.

HORNIES, s. pl. A vulgar designation for horned cattle, Roxb. A. Scott's Poems.

HORNS, s. pl. A' Horns to the Lift, a game of young people. A circle is formed round a table, and all placing their forefingers on the table, one cries, A' horns to the lift, cats' horns upmost. If on this any one lift his finger, he owes a wad, as cats have no horns. In the same manner, the person who does not raise his finger, when a horned animal is named, is subjected to a forfeit. These wads are recovered by the performance of some task, as kissing, at the close of the game, the person named by the one who has his eyes tied up. The game is also named, A' the Horns o' the Wood.

HORN-TAMMIE, s. A butt ; a laughing-stock, Aberd.
The term has probably been first employed to denote the person who played the part of the blind man in Blind-man's Buff.

&c. on a wheelbarrow, S.
- HURLY, s. Expl. the "last." P. Buch. Dial.
- HURLY-BURLY, s. A term very commonly used among young people, as signifying the last, the lag, Aberd. Hurl, which has the same signification, would seem allied to C. B. huyr, huwr, slow, tedious, late. Hurly-burly, in this sense, has most probably had no other origin than the playful invention of children, who delight in reduplications.
- HURLIE-GO-THOROW, s. A racket; a great ado, Berwicks.; q. going through with a hurl, i. e. with noise or confusion.
- HURLIE-HACKET, s. 1. Sliding down a precipice,

I, J, Y.

J

JAM

J corresponds to Germ. Belg. sch, Su. G. Isl. sk. Y, as prefixed to verbs, participles, and verbal nouns, is merely the vestige of A. S. ge, corresponding to Moes. G. ga. Je is a termination used for forming diminutives.

JA, s. The jay. Bannatyne Poems.

To JAB, v. a. To prick sharply, Ettr. For.

JAB, s. The act of pricking in this way, ib.

JACK-I-THE-BUSH, s. Navel-wort, Roxb. V. MAID-IN-THE-MIST.

JACK'S ALIVE. A kind of sport. A piece of paper or match is handed round a circle, he who takes hold of it saying, "Jack's alive, he's no die in my hand." He, in whose hand it dies or is extinguished, forfeits a wad; and all the wads are recovered only by performing something under the notion of penance, though generally of an agreeable or mirthful description, Teviotd. It might perhaps be a sort of substitute for the E. sport of Jack-o'-Lent.

JACKSTIO, s. Jack-pudding. Polwart.—Su. G. stoja, tumultuari; Isl. stugg-r, insolens.

JACOB'S-LADDER, s. The name given to the Deadly night-shade, or Belladonna, Ayr.

JADGERIE, s. The act of gauging. Acts Ja. VI. This is evidently from the v. Jedge, q. v. But I can see no reason why our ancestors have substituted j for g in all the cognate languages.

JADIN, s. The stomach of a sow, Fife; the same with Jaudie, q. v.

JADRAL, s. Errat. for Jackal. Tennant's Card. Beaton.
