OLIVER CROMWELL

Lord Protector of the Common-Wealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, &c.

Taken from an original picture by S. Cooper in the possession of Mr. Weeks...
THE LIFE OF

Oliver Cromwell,
Lord-Protector
OF THE Commonwealth
OF England, Scotland, and Ireland.

Impartially collected from the best Historians, and several Original Manuscripts.

The Fifth Edition, with Additions.

Printed for J. Brotherton, at the Bible, next Tom's Coffee-House; and T. Cox, at the Lamb, under the Royal-Exchange, both in Cornhill.

MDCXLIII.
THE CONTENTS.

PART I.

CHAP. I.

CROMWELL's birth and descent, Page 1, 2

His education and manner of Life 3

He falls in with the Puritans ibid.

Is one of the committee of religion in King Charles's third Parliament ibid.

His design of removing to New-England prevented 4

Opposes the draining of the fens ibid.

Is chosen member of the Long Parliament, and concerns himself in the grievances of religion 4, 5

Promotes the grand remonstrance 5

His discourse with the Lord Falkland upon it ibid.

The breaking out of the Civil War 6

CHAP. II.

CROMWELL made Captain of a troop of horse, and his stratagem to try their courage 6

He secures Cambridge, and surprizes the high-sheriff of Hertfordshire ibid.

Is made a Colonel, and is very activ for the Parliament 7

Takes Hilsden-house ibid.

Made Lieutenant-General to the Earl of Manchester, and marches towards Newark ibid.

Defeats the King's troops near Grantham a Relieves

The CONTENTS.

Relieves Gainsborough 8
His own account of the defeat of General Cavendish 9
Marches to Boston 10
Is in great danger near Horn-Castle 11
Advances to the siege of York ibid.
Gains the battle of Marston-Moor 12

CHAP. III.

EARL of Essex and Scotch commissioners, jealous of Cromwell 14
Chancellor Lowden's speech against him ibid.
Archbishop Williams warns the King of him 16
Difference between him and the Earl of Manchester 17
His speech in parliament for the self-denying ordinance 18
He joins Waller, and writes to the parliament 19
The Army new model'd 20
Cromwell's success at Ilip-Bridge 21
He takes Bletchington-house ibid.
His farther success ibid.
He is repulsed at Faringdon-house ibid.
Is joined by Fairfax 22
Is made Lieutenant-General of the horse, notwithstanding the self-denying ordinance 23
The battle of Naseby, and his success therein 24
Good discipline of the troops under him and Fairfax 25
The victory at Naseby owing to his valor ibid.
The King's cabinet with his Letters and Papers taken 26

CHAP. IV.

CROMWELL's conduct in the battle of Langport 28
Bridgewater taken ibid.
Cromwell suppresses the Club-men ibid.
Assists in the siege of Bristol 29
Writes to the Parliament ibid.
Takes the Castle of the Devizes 30
Reduces Winchester ibid.
Storms and takes Basing-house ibid.
Gains
The CONTENTS.

Gains Langford-house, and marches towards Exeter

Dartmouth taken, and Lord Hopton defeated ibid.

Lord Astley routed and taken prisoner

The King escapes from Oxford to the Scotch Army ibid.

Oxford, and all other places submit to the Parliament

The King delivered up to the English, and brought to Holmby ibid.

CHAP. V.

DIFFERENCES arise between the Parliament and Army

The Parliament jealous of Cromwell, and be of them

His discourse with Ludlow thereupon ibid.

He promotes the Army’s jealousy of the Parliament

Agitators and Council of Officers set up by the Army ibid.

Their resolutions

Cromwell General in fact, Fairfax only in name

Declaration of the Parliament against the Army, afterwards rased out of their journal book

A committee of the Parliament sent to treat with a committee of the Army ibid.

Cromwell’s management with the Parliament ibid.

Their design of seizing him, which he escapes

His letter to the parliament ibid.

Sir Harbottle Grimstone’s story of him

And Mr. Locke’s

The King taken from Holmby, and brought to the Army

CHAP. VI.

ELEVEN members of the house of Commons impeach’d by the Army

Cromwell’s design of restoring the King by means of the Independents

His behaviour towards the King

His
The CONTENTS.

His message to Sir John Berkley 49
His discourse with him concerning the King 51
The Agitators and Cromwell doubtful of one another's sincerity towards the King 52
Mr. Ashburnham arrives, and corresponds with Cromwell 53
The King dislikes the Army's proposals, at which they are displeased 53, 54
The Parliament insulted, whereupon several members fly to the Army for protection 55
The Army marches to London, and restores them to their seats 56, 57
Factions in the Army, who are jealous of Cromwell's private treating with the King 57
He prevails on the King to reject the Parliament's propositions 58
The Army very much prejudiced against him 59
The fury of the Agitators ibid.
By Cromwell's advice the King escapes from Hampton-court, and goes to the Isle of Wight 59, 60

C H A P. VII.

Cromwell acquaints the Parliament with being there 61
The rise of the Levellers ibid.
They are suppress'd by Cromwell 63
The Parliament offers a treaty with the King, on condition he would first pass four acts ibid.
A large account of Cromwell's reconciliation with the Levellers, and his quitting the King's interest 64–68
A story of the King's deceiving Cromwell 68
A remarkable discourse between him and Lord Brogdhill 70
A meeting of Officers at Windsor, where Cromwell was present, resolves to have the King prosecuted 72
The Parliament's four bills presented to his Majesty ibid.
He refuses to pass them 73
Cromwell's...
The CONTENTS.

Cromwell’s speech in the house thereupon 73
Votes of no more addresses to the King ibid.
A farther account of the speeches of Cromwell and Ireton 74
Discontents and tumults of the people 75
Cromwell’s management thereupon 76
He contrives a conference between those called the Grandees of the House and Army, and the Commonwealth’s-men ibid.
He courts the Commonwealth party ibid.
He endeavours an union of the Parliament, Army, and City 77

CHAP. VIII.

THE beginning of the second Civil War 78
Proceedings of the Parliament thereupon 79
Several insurrections quell’d 80
Cromwell being sent into Wales, detaches Colonel Horton before him; who defeats Laughorn’s Army 81 Cromwell besieges Chepstow ibid.
Storms Tenby ibid.
Takes Pembroke town and castle 82
The Scots invade England 83
Cromwell marches against them 84
A charge of high-treason fram’d against him to no purpose ibid.
He defeats the Scots at Preston and other places 85
Marches against Monroe 87
Reduces Carlisle and Berwick 88
Enters Scotland, and publishes a declaration ibid.
Marches to Edinburgh, and his reception there 88.

He dispossesses the Hamiltonians 89
Is requested to leave some forces behind him ibid.
Is magnificently treated, and returns for England 90
Arrives at Newcastle, and sends to reinforce the siege of Pomfret 93

Comes
The CONTENTS.

Comes thither himself, and leaving Lambert before it, marches for London.

Chap. IX.

PROCEEDINGS in the Parliament

They resolve upon a personal treaty with the King

Cromwell writes to his friends against it

What hastened Cromwell's return to London

The large remonstrance of the Army presented to the House

Great Contests between the Parliament and Army

The Army marches to London

Notwithstanding which, the Commons vote the King's concessions to be a sufficient ground for peace

Upon which, the Army seizes on several members, and purges the House

Cromwell arrives, and receives the thanks of the House

He is supposed to have the chief hand in the late proceedings

Votes of non-addresses resum'd.

Cromwell's speech upon the motion for trying the King

The King brought to Windsor

Ordinance for trying him

High-court of justice erected

The King brought to St. James's

Endeavours to save him

Conference between Cromwell and the Scotch Commissioners about him

The King's trial, and condemnation

Cromwell's kinsman sent to him on the King's behalf

The execution of the King

His behaviour and character

How far his death is to be imputed to Cromwell

PART
PART II.

CHAP. I.

A COMMONWEALTH Government establiished 110
Another High-court of justice 112
Cromwell's speech against the Lord Capel 113
A private story of Cromwell and Ireton 114
Council of Agitators to be abolished, which occasions fresh disturbance in the Army ibid.
Cromwell again suppresses the Levellers 115
He with the General is treated at Oxford, and at London 117
Some account of the affairs of Ireland, before Cromwell's going over 118
He accepts of the service, and is made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland 121
His remarkable interview with the Lord Broghill 122
His pompous march from London 123
He sends succours before him ibid.
By which means Ormond's army is totally routed 124
He embarks for Ireland, and arrives at Dublin 125, 126

CHAP. II.

CROMWELL storms Tredagh, and puts all in arms to the sword 127
His bravery and conduct 128
Many other places submit to him 129
He takes Wexford by storm ibid.
Reduces Ross 131
Beseiges Duncannon, and retreats from thence 132
His Army marches into winter quarters 133
Many from the enemy revolt to him 134
He
The CONTENTS.

He visits the several garrisons, and takes the field again 134, 135
Several places deliver'd up to him 135
Feathard surrender'd to him upon articles 136
He storms and takes Calan. ibid.
Reduces Gowram 137
Beseiges and takes Kilkenny ibid.
His letter to the Parliament 140
Ormond in great distress 141
Cromwell beseiges Clonmel ibid.
Lord Broghill defeats the Bishop of Ross, and hangs him 142
Clonmel storm'd and taken 143
Other successes in Ireland ibid.
Cromwell appoints Ireton his Deputy 144
All Ireland in a manner reduc'd by him ibid.
His triumphant return to England 145
Ireton's death and character 146

CHAP. III.

THE Scots treat with King Charles II. 147
Dr. Dorislaus murder'd at the Hague 148
The Scots proceed in their treaty with the King 149
The unfortunate expedition of the Marquis of Montros 150
The King arrives in Scotland 151
An Army raised by the Scots ibid.
Cromwell advises to prevent them by invading Scotland 152
His speech in the committee for satisfying the General 153
Fairfax laying down his commission, Cromwell is made General in his room 156
A private conference between General Cromwell and Ludlow ibid.
He consults about the affairs of Ireland 158
He sets out for Scotland, and arrives at York 159
The CONTENTS.

The Scots alarm'd, send a letter to the Parliament, ibid.
The Parliament's declaration of the grounds of their proceedings 160
A declaration of the Lord General Cromwell, to the well-afflicted in Scotland 161
He proceeds in his journey, and rendezvous his army near Berwick 162
He enters Scotland, and arrives at Dunbar 163
Marches to Haddington ibid.
Endeavours to draw the enemy to a general engagement, but in vain 164
Beats them in several skirmishes ibid.
Draws off his army to Muscleburgh 165
Marches again to Dunbar for supplies 166
Advances again towards Edinburgh ibid.
His answer to the General Assembly's declaration 167
Encamps on Pencland hills, and takes Redhaugh 168, 169
Attends the motions of the Scotch Army 169
Retreats to Pencland 170
—— to Muscleburgh ibid.
—— to Haddington 171
And to Dunbar 172
Is in great distress, and calls a council of war 173, 174
Totally routs the Scotch Army in the battle of Dunbar 175

CHAP. IV.

He takes possession of Edinburgh and Leith 177
His two letters to the Governor of Edinburgh castle 178
Several parties in Scotland 180
Various motions of the Lord General Cromwell 182
He publishes a proclamation against the Moss-troopers 183
Monk reduces Denton-house and Roflan-castle 183, 184
Victory
The CONTENTS.

Visàory over Ker and his party in the West 184
The siege of Edinburgh castle 185
'Tis surrendér'd to Cromwell 188
The King crown'd at Scone 189
Colonel Fenwick reduces Hume castle 190
Colonel Monk reduces Tantallon castle 191
Proceedings of the King and his party 192
The great care of the Parliament in providing supplies for the Army ibid.
The sickness of the General 193
His letter to the Council of State 194
A Presbyterian Plot, for which Mr. Love is executed 195
The General prepares for action 196
He marches towards the enemy 197
He takes Calendar-house ibid.
The battle of Fife 198
The fort of Innegfary taken 199
General Cromwell follows the Scotch Army ibid.
Brunt-islend surrendér'd to Lambert 200
The General paffes over into Fife ibid.
He takes St. John's-town 201
The King in great perplexity ibid.
He enters England with his Army 202
General Cromwell sends Lambert after him ibid.
Endeavours of the Parliament to oppose him 203
Cromwell leaving Monk in Scotland, marches into England ibid.
The march of the King's Army 204
They come to Worcester 205
General Cromwell marches after them ibid.
He gives them a total overthrow in the battle of Worcester 207
His letter to the Parliament thereupon 209

C H A P. V.

He returns in triumph to London 211
The isles of Man, Jersey, Guernsey, and Scilly, reduced 212

Monk
The CONTENTS.

Monk finishes the reduction of Scotland 212
The state of that Kingdom afterwards 213
General Cromwell holds a conference to consider of a settlement ibid.
His commission of Lieutenant of Ireland expiring, he is made General of the forces there 216
A rupture between England and Holland 217
Several sea-fights between them 218
A remarkable conference between General Cromwell and Whitelock 219, &c.
Harry Nevill's story concerning him 225
He and his Officers complain of the Long Parliament 226
He writes to the Cardinal de Retz ibid.
Another sea-fight between the English and Dutch 227
The Dutch desire peace ibid.
The General and his Officers continue their complaints against the Parliament 228
The proceedings of the House upon this occasion ibid.
General Cromwell holds a consultation thereupon ibid.
He by force dissolves the Parliament and Commonwealth 229

PART III.

CHAP. I.

GENERAL Cromwell consults how to carry on the Government 233
He and his Council of Officers publish a declaration 234
The entertainment it met with 237
Another declaration ibid.
Victory over the Dutch at sea 239
Gen. Cromwell prepares for a new Parliament 240
His form of summons to the persons nominated for that purpose ibid.
Several acts of the General and Council of State 241
C H A P. II.

C R O M W E L L's first Parliament 243
His speech to them ibid.
He, by an Instrument, constitutes them the supreme Authority 243
Their proceedings ibid.
Acts pass'd by them 244
Their character ibid.
John Lilburn try'd and acquitted 245
The Dutch again sue for peace 246
They are again defeated by the English in a terrible sea-fight ibid.
They apply themselves to the Council of State, and to the Parliament for peace, but in vain 248
They treat privately with General Cromwell 249
The Parliament resign their powers to him 250
He consults with his Council of Officers ibid.
He is declared Lord Protector by the Instrument of Government 251
He is install'd 254
His Oath ibid.
He is proclaim'd 255

C H A P. III.

H I S condition and proceedings at his first entring upon the Government 257
His management with the Army ibid.
— with the Cavaliers ibid.
— with the Presbyterians 258
— with the Commonwealth party ibid.
His first Council 260
He sets out a proclamation 261
Several ordinances pass'd by him 262
His magnificent entertainment in the City 263
Addresses and embassies to him 264
He concludes a peace with the Dutch ibid.
He makes several promotions 265
He is feared and courted by foreign Powers ibid.
The CONTENTS.

The French Ambassador's speech to him 266
His letter to the Prince of Tarente 267
He makes an union of the three Kingdoms 269
A conspiracy against him, for which Gerard and Vowel are executed 270
The Portugal Ambassador's brother commits a riot ibid.
He is condemned and executed 272
Dr. Welwood's remarks upon that transaction ibid.
The Protector calls a Parliament ibid.

CHAP. IV.

The Opening of his second Parliament 273
His speech to the members 274
They choose Lenthal their Speaker, and debate on the Instrument of Government 278
The Protector displeas'd, makes another speech to them 279
He appoints them a Test, which is subscrib'd by several members 281
Their declaration upon it 282
They debate the remaining Articles of Government ibid.
A private accident to the Protector 283
The Parliament not for his purpose 284
He makes a very long speech, and dissolves them 285, &c.

CHAP. V.

Wildman's bold declaration 313
Several risings for the King 314
They are suppress'd 315
The Royalists decimated ibid.
The Protector appoints Major-Generals 316
A story of a farmer of Berkshire 317
Of one Cony, who refus'd to pay taxes to Cromwell ibid.
Of Sir Peter Wentworth 318
Many things worthy of praise in the Protector's Government 319
His
The CONTENTS.

His design of re-admitting the Jews to their trade and worship here 320
A story on that occasion 321
He makes a change in his ministry ibid.
Appoints a committee of trade 322
His answer to the Swedish Ambassador ibid.
He refuses a visit from Christina, Queen of Sweden 323
Is in suspense whether to join with France or Spain ibid.
Inclines to the former 324
Sets out a fleet for Hispaniola ibid.
Which meets with ill success 325
But takes Jamaica ibid.
Blake's success in the Mediterranean 326
The Protector concludes his alliance with France 327
Two great actions of Cromwell in favour of the Protestants abroad 328
His conference with the Lord Broghill 329
The Spanish plate-fleet destroy'd by the English 331
A Parliament resolv'd on 332
The Protector's discourse with Ludlow at the council-table ibid. &c.

CHAP. VI.

THE Opening of Cromwell's third Parliament 336
Petition and remonstrance of the excluded members ib.
The Parliament's proceedings, and acts 337
The Protector's speech to them at his passing of bills 338
The Major-Generals put down ibid.
Account of James Naylor 339
Syndercomb's plot 340
Design of making Cromwell King 341
The Parliament vote, and offer him the title 341,342
He demurs upon it 342
A committee appointed to satisfy him ibid.
He still demurs 344
The CONTENTS

A remarkable conference between him and the Earl of Orrery 345
He endeavours to gain the Army ibid.
Their petition against making him King 347
His speech to the Parliament 348
He refuses the title 350
A digression, concerning a noble design of his, in favour of the Protestant Religion ibid.
He is confirm'd Protector by the humble Petition and Advice of the Parliament 351
The substance of it ibid.
The preamble of it 352
He passes it, and makes a speech to the members 354

CHAP. VII.

His solemn Inauguration 355
The Speaker's speech to him 356
Bills pass'd by him 358
Lambert disgusted and removed ibid.
The remarkable success of Admiral Blake at Santa Cruz 359
His death and character 361
An instance of his regard to the honour of his country 362
The success of the Protector's arms by land 363
The King makes a private offer to him 365
An insurrection design'd and prevented 366
The other house of Parliament 367
The two houses meet, and his Highness makes a speech to them 368
Discord between the two houses 369
The Protector dissolves them ibid.
Plot of the Fifth-monarchy men against him 370
Story of Cornet Day ibid.
The Cavalier plot 371
Trial of Dr. Hewet, Sir Henry Slingsby, and Mr. Mordaunt ibid.
Design upon Ostend 373
Siege
The CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Siege and battle of Dunkirk</td>
<td>373</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The town taken and put into the hands of the English</td>
<td>374</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A remarkable story, setting forth the great policy and power of the Protector</td>
<td>375</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A solemn Embassy to him from the French court</td>
<td>376</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The state of his affairs a little before his death</td>
<td>378</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The death of his daughter Cleypole</td>
<td>ibid.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>He falls sick</td>
<td>379</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>He appoints his son Richard to succeed him</td>
<td>ibid.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>He dies</td>
<td>381</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>His age, and the time of his Government</td>
<td>ibid.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>His character</td>
<td>381, &amp;c.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>His magnificent lying in state</td>
<td>394</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>His pompous funeral</td>
<td>395</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The place of his burial uncertain</td>
<td>397</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Waller's Poem on his death</td>
<td>400</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appendix, containing some account of his children, and</td>
<td>402, &amp;c.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>of the state of affairs to the King's Restoration</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
OLIVER CROMWELL was born at Huntingdon, April 25, 1599. His father was Mr. Robert Cromwell, second son of Sir Henry Cromwell, and brother of Sir Oliver, who at his house at Hinchinbrook, made the noblest entertainment for king James I. at his accession to the English crown, that had ever been offer'd by a private subject. Sir Oliver had a very great estate; but our Oliver's father being a younger brother, had not above 300 l. per annum.

The name of this family was not originally Cromwell, but Williams. Morgan Williams, son and
and heir of William, of a very ancient family in Wales, married the sister of the famous Thomas lord Cromwell, who was made earl of Essex by king Henry VIII. By her he had a son named Richard, who when he grew up was knighted by king Henry, and took the name of his uncle Cromwell, tho' he kept the arms of Williams. He married Frances, daughter and coheir of Sir Thomas Murfyn; and upon the dissolution of the monasteries, obtain'd all those lands in Huntingdonshire, which belong'd to any of them in that county, which amounted to a prodigious value: And this was the first settling of this family in that county. Of this Sir Richard Cromwell, we have the following account: On the 1st of May, 1540, there was held a solemn triumph at Westminster before king Henry VIII. by Sir John Dudley, Sir Richard Cromwell, and four other challengers; which was proclaimed in France, Spain, Scotland, and Flanders: On the second day at tournaments, Sir Richard Cromwell overthrew Mr. Palmer off his horse; and on the fifth day at Barryers, he likewise overthrew Mr. Cuspey, to his and the challengers great honour. He had a son, Sir Henry Cromwell, (our protector's grandfather) who was knighted by queen Elizabeth in the sixth year of her reign. This Sir Henry married Joan, daughter and heir of Sir Ralph Warren, and made his chief seat upon the ruins of a house of nuns at Hinchinbrook. He was a very worthy gentleman, and was highly honour'd and belov'd both in court and country. He had six sons; Oliver, (already mention'd) Robert, Henry, Richard, Philip, and Ralph. The second son, Mr. Robert Cromwell, who was also a gentleman of very good reputation in his country, and was no less esteem'd than any of his ancestors for personal worth, married the daughter of Sir Richard Steward, and by her had the famous Oliver, the subject of the ensuing history.

Though
Though Mr. Robert Cromwell had but a small estate, yet he took great care of his son's education, sending him, when grown up, to the university of Cambridge, where he was a student in Sidney college, though 'twas observ'd, that he was not so much inclin'd to speculation as to action. Whilst he was there his father died, upon which he return'd home, and led an extravagant kind of life, addicting himself to such follies as young persons are too apt to fall into; so that his mother was advis'd to send him up to Lincoln's-Inn, where he betook himself to the study of the law: But not liking that sedentary employment, he soon return'd again into the country, and followed his former vicious courses, to the wasting of a great part of his paternal estate. At length he became greatly reform'd, and grew mighty sober and religious; and having an estate of four or five hundred pounds per annum, left him by Sir Robert Steward, his uncle by his mother's side, he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Baucher.

After his reformation, he adher'd for some time to the church of England, very devoutly attending on the public service; but at length, falling into the hands of some Puritans, he became a zealous friend to that party; frequently entertaining their ministers at his house. After this time he is said to have been so scrupulously just, that having some years before won thirty pounds of one Mr. Calton at play, he now paid it him back again, telling him that he had got it by indirect and unlawful means, and that it would be a sin in him to keep it any longer.

We hear nothing of his acting in a public capacity till the year 1628, when he was one of the committee of religion in king Charles's third parliament, and gave information to the house, that the bishop of Winchester countenanced some who preached downright popery, and that 'twas by his means.
The Life of

1637. His design of removing to New-England prevented.

The power of archbishop Laud growing grievous to the Puritans, he being very severe in his proceedings against them, many of them began to think of taking refuge in foreign plantations; and such numbers of families actually transported themselves, that the government at length taking umbrage at it, publish'd a proclamation, to restrain the disorderly transporting his majesty's subjects to the plantations in America, without a royal licence. Mr. Oliver Cromwell, together with Sir Matthew Boynton, Sir William Constable, Sir Arthur Haserigg, Mr. John Hampden, and several other gentlemen, were preparing to remove themselves, and were actually embark'd for that purpose; but were prevented by the said proclamation, and the following Order of council, "That the lord treasurer of England should take speedy and effectual course for the stay of eight ships now in the river of Thames prepared to go for New-England, and should likewise give order for the putting on land all the passengers and provisions therein intended for the voyage." And thus Mr. Cromwell's voyage to New-England was prevented.

1638. About the year 1638, the king and some lords became undertakers for draining the fen-lands in Lincolnshire, and the Isle of Ely. This project was oppos'd by several, chiefly by the town of Cambridge; and Mr. Oliver Cromwell boldly headed this party against the undertakers for draining the fen. By this means, and by promising his farther assistance in their behalf, he got to be elected burgess for the town of Cambridge in 1640, to serve in that parliament, which was afterwards called the Long Parliament.
In this parliament he soon shew'd himself a zealous and forward oppofer of grievances in religion; and 'tis said, that one time when Sir Thomas Chi-chely and Mr. Warwick were talking with him in the house about the affair of religion, he said, I can tell you, Sirs, what I wou'd not have, tho' I cannot tell what I wou'd.

He was a great promoter of the commons grand remonstrance of all the grievances in the nation from the king's accession to that time, which was presented to his majesty at his return from Scotland, soon after the Irish rebellion and massacre, in which above 150,000 Protestants, men, women, and children, were barbarously murder'd by the Papists. A day having been appointed for retaking this remonstrance into the consideration of the house, upon its not being call'd for till noon that day, 'twas urg'd and consented to, that it should be deferr'd till the next morning; upon which occasion Mr. Cromwell ask'd the lord Falkland, Why be was for deferring it, since that day wou'd soon have determin'd it? Who answer'd, There would not be time enough, for sure it would take some debate; to which the other reply'd, A very sorry one, concluding it would be opposed but by a few: But the debate being enter'd upon about nine the next morning, continu'd all that day and the night following till three in the morning, when it was carried for the remonstrance by nine voices only. And when the house broke up, the lord Falkland ask'd Mr. Cromwell, Whether there had been a debate? Who answer'd, He would take his Word another time; and whispering him in the ear, solemnly assur'd him, That if the remonstrance had not pass'd, he would have fold all he bad the next morning, and never have seen England more; and he knew many other honest men of the same resolution.

The difference between the king and parliament (occasioned by evil counsels on one hand, and...
The LIFE of

1642. The civil war breaks out.

continual jealousies and fears on the other) was now grown to such a height, that soon after the presenting this remonstrance, it broke out into an open war between them; of which, so far as concerns our present purpose, we shall give some account in the following chapters.

CHAP. II.

From the breaking out of the civil war, to the battle of Marston-Moor.

At the breaking out of the war, Mr. Cromwell was commissioned by the parliament, to be captain of a troop of horse, which he speedily rais'd in his own country. In lifting them, he had regard to such only as he thought to be stout and resolute; and having compleated his troop, he us'd this art to prove them: Upon their first muster, near some of the king's garrisons, he privily plac'd twelve of them in an ambuscade, who with a trumpet sounding a charge, made furiously towards the body, of which above twenty, thinking they came from the enemy, presently fled for fear, whom Cromwell immediately cashier'd, and mounted their horses with such as were more bold and courageous.

The university of Cambridge being not far off him, he very seasonably secured it for the parliament, when a great quantity of the college-plate was just upon the point of being convey'd to the king at Oxford. And so active and industrious was he, that when Sir Thomas Connesby, high-sheriff of Hertfordshire, was going to proclaim the earl of Essex, the parliament's general, and all his adherents traytors, at St. Albans, on a market-day, he rushed unawares into the town with a party of horse, surpriz'd the sheriff and his assistants, and sent them prisoners.
Oliver Cromwell.

prisoners to London, to the no small satisfaction of the parliament, who gave him the thanks of the house, from this time looking upon him as a very promising person for their service.

In the year 1643, he was advanced to the degree of a colonel, and by his own management rais'd a regiment of a thousand horse, with which he rang'd about, and with great industry obstructed many levies for the king in Cambridgeshire, Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk; and particularly he defeated the project of a counter-association for the king's service, contriv'd by Sir John Pettus, Sir Edward Barker, and other gentlemen, at the town of Le-stoff in Suffolk, with great secrecy and celerity entering the town and surprizing them all. Here he also gain'd good store of ammunition, saddles, pistols, powder, shot, and several engines of war, sufficient to have serv'd a considerable force. And he surpriz'd those gentlemen in the very nick of time; for as many more, who were before listed, design'd the very next day to have met at the same place, and if their design had succeeded, the whole country had been in great danger of being lost. So that this action of Cromwell's was a very seasonable service to the parliament, and prov'd a great discouragement to all the king's party both in Suffolk, and Norfolk.

After this, he was sent to guard some ammunition from Warwick to Gloucester, and by the way to took Hilsden-house, and in it Sir Alexander Denton, the owner, colonel Smith, many inferior officers, about a hundred horse, thirteen barrels of powder, and about a hundred and fifty common soldiers, besides forty slain; then he gave an alarm to Oxford, and so went on to Gloucester.

He was now made lieutenant-general to the earl of Manchester; and having rais'd a greater force of such as came freely in to him, he march'd towards Lincolnshire, with a resolution to assist those forces which which lay about Newark, one of the strongest garrisons then held for the king. In his march thro' Huntingdonsbire, he disarm'd many who were ill affected to the parliament. He was now above two thousand strong, and receiv'd an addition of horse from captain Hotbam. At his first approach before Newark he perform'd a good piece of service: for captain Wray with his Lincolnshire horse too rashly quartering near the town, was in the night set upon by the garrison, which made a great sally, and surrounded and took all his men. But the alarm coming to Cromwell, he advance'd and at ten o'clock at night fell upon the Newar-kers, rescued captain Wray's troop, and took three of theirs, with the slaughter of many of them. After this, setting down before the town, he took many men and colours at several times; and soon after meeting with twenty-four troops of the king's horse and dragoons near Grantham, he encounter'd them with such fury and resolution, that tho' he had but seven troops with him, he entirely rout-ed them.

The earl of Newcastle, being inform'd that the lord Willoughby of Parbam had got possession of the town of Gainsborough for the parliament, sent his brother colonel Cavendish, lieutenant-general of his army, with a great party of horse and dragoons to summon it, himself marching after with the foot. Upon this Cromwell resolv'd to attempt the relief of that place, and with twelve troops of horse and dragoons march'd thither, where he found the ene-my, who were drawn up near the town, to be more than thrice his number, and no way to attack them, but through a gate and up hill; notwithstanding which disadvantages, he undauntedly fell upon them, and after some dispute, entirely defeated them, killing many of their officers, and among them, lieutenant-general Cavendish.
of this action Cromwell himself gives the following account, in a letter dated July 31. "I march'd after taking of Burleigh, to Grant-bam, and was join'd by the Lincolneers at North Scales, ten miles from Gainsborough. About a mile and a half from the town, we met the forlorn of the Enemy, who drove a troop of our dragoons back to their main body. We advanc'd and came to the bottom of a steep hill, which we could not well get up but by some tracts; and the body of the enemy endeavour'd to hinder us, but we prevail'd and gain'd the top of it. This was done by the Lincolneers, who had the van-guard. A great body of the enemy's horse faced us there, at about a musket-shot distance, and a good reserve of a full regiment of horse behind it. We did what we could to put our men in good order, and the enemy advanc'd towards us to prevent it, and take us at a disadvantage; but in such order as we were, we charged their great body, I having the right wing. We came up horse to horse, where we disputed a pretty while with our swords and pistols, all keeping close order, so that one could not break the other. At last the enemy shrinking a little, our men soon perceiv'd it pressed in upon them, and routed their whole body, some flying on one side, and others on the other, of the enemy's reserve. Our men pursu'd them with good execution about six miles. I perceiving the reserve still unbroken, kept back my major Wballey from the pursuit, and with my own troop, and two troops more of my regiment, we got into a body. In this reserve was general Cavendish, who one while faced me, another while faced four of the Lincoln troops, which were all of ours that engaged the reserve, the rest being in pursuit of those who fled. General Cavendish charged the Lincolneers and routed "routed them. Immediately I fell on his rear with my three troops, which did so astonish him, that he gave over the chase, and would have deliver'd himself from me; but I pressing on, forced him down a hill, and below it drove the general and some of his soldiers into a quagmire, where my captain-lieutenant flew him with a thrust under his short ribs. The rest of the body was wholly routed, not one man staying on the place."

HERE Whitelock says, "This was the beginning of his (viz. Cromwell's) great fortunes, and now he began to appear to the world. He had a brave regiment of horse of his countrymen, most of them freeholders, and freeholders sons, who upon matter of conscience engag'd in this quarrel under Cromwell. And thus being well arm'd within, by the satisfaction of their own consciences, and without, by good iron arms, they would as one man, stand firmly, and charge desperately." Cromwell's policy was very much seen in making choice of such men as these, who had a persuasion they were engag'd in the cause of God, to serve under him against the king's party.

Thus was Gainborough reliev'd; but the victors had but a short time of rejoicing, for within two or three hours, the routed enemy rallying, and joining with the rest of Newcastle's army, march'd against them; whereupon they retreated to Lincoln that night in good order, and without any loss, facing the enemy with three troops at a time, whilst they drew off the rest. Lincoln not being defensibl, Cromwell march'd the next day to Boston, to join the earl of Manchester, who with his new rais'd forces had very seasonably reduc'd Lynn under the power of the parliament.

To prevent any farther addition to Manchester's forces, the earl of Newcastle advance'd with his army, and detach'd a strong party of horse and dragoons
Oliver Cromwell. 1644.

In great danger near Horn-castle.

Oliver Cromwell, appearing by their Standards, to be eighty seven troops, commanded by Sir John Henderson, an old soldier, who understanding that Cromwell was drawn out towards him with the horse and dragoons, made haste to engage him, before the earl of Manchester, with the foot, could march up; as accordingly it happen'd at a place call'd Windsby-field, near Horn-castle. In the first shock Cromwell's horse was killed and fell upon him, and as he rose, he was again knock'd down by the gentleman that charged him, suppos'd to be Sir Ingram Hopton, though others say captain Portington, who afterwards plainly told him, That be aimed at his nose when be hit bis horse on the bead. He never was in more danger in his life; but with difficulty he got remounted upon a poor horse in a soldier's hand, and charg'd the enemy with great resolution. The encounter was very sharp, but lasted not an hour before the royalists were entirely routed by Manchester's troops, about 1500 of them being kill'd, among whom was the lord Widdrington, Sir Ingram Hopton, and other persons of quality. Very few were kill'd on the parliament side. The routed forces were pursu'd by the parliamentarians almost as far as Lincoln; in which pursuit several of them were kill'd and taken prisoners, and many horses and arms taken. In pursuance of this victory, the earl of Manchester march'd directly to Lincoln, far down before it, and summon'd it, and afterwards took it by storm, with very inconsiderable loss.

After this, the earl, with his lieutenant-general Cromwell, advanced to re-inforce the siege of York, which was then invested by the Scotch general Leven, and the lord Fairfax. Soon after, prince Rupert arriving with about eighteen thousand men, caused the besiegers to raife the siege; who joining their forces, resolv'd to watch his motions, and to fight him if they found occasion: But advances to the siege of York.
But a little to refresh themselves, and furnish themselves with provisions which they wanted, they march'd towards Tadcaster.

The prince elevated with success, and not thinking it enough to have relieved the city, if he did not defeat the enemy, contrary to the advice of those that were with him, he march'd after them, and finding them at Marston-Moor, forc'd them to a battle; in which the left wing of his army commanded by himself, charging the parliament's right, so totally routed them, that the three parliament generals, Leven, Fairfax, and Manchester quitted the field, and fled towards Ca-wood castle. Here the prince pursu'd his enemies too far, which lost him the day. The three generals being thus beaten out of the field, the honour of the day fell to Cromwell; for the left wing of the parliament's army, commanded by him, en-gag'd the prince's right, commanded by the earl of Newcastle, who had gain'd an advantageous piece of ground upon Marston-Moor, and caused a battery to be erected upon it, from which captain Walton, Cromwell's sister's son, was wounded by a shot in the knee: Hereupon Cromwell order'd two field-pieces to be brought for annoying the enemy, appointed two regiments of foot to guard them; who marching for that end, were set upon by the foot of the prince's right wing, that fir'd thick upon them from the ditches. Upon this both sides seconding their foot, were wholly engag'd, who before had only stood facing one another. The horse on each side fought with the utmost bravery and courage; for having discharge'd their pistols, and flung them at each others heads, they fell to it with their swords; but after a very obstinate dispute, the victory was obtain'd by Cromwell's brigade, prince Rupert's right wing being totally routed and flying, and the Parliament's horse pursu'ing and killing many of them in their flight. And
Oliver Cromwell.

And now the left wing of the prince's army, who had been victors, came back to their former ground, being confident of victory, and utterly ignorant of what had befallen the right; but before they could put themselves into any order, they were charg'd and entirely routed by the reserves of Cromwell's brigade.

Other accounts are given of this battle, but all agree in ascribing to Cromwell the glory of the action. Some say he was wounded in the right arm at the first charge, and went off to have it dressed; and returning to his post, found the army in that disorder as is above related. Any other man, says F. Orleans, would have run with the stream, and followed such examples as he need not blush at, to seek his safety by flight. Cromwell rather chose to show what good sense could do, when seconded by valour. He presently perceiv'd that the conquerors were in as much confusion as the conquered, those who pursued observing no more order than those that fled; but that there were some brigades of his army that stood firm, and had not yet been engaged. He made no scruple to put himself at their head, and charging with these fresh troops, whom his own prowess inspired with new courage, he so vigorously attack'd the enemy, whom victory had made careless of keeping their ranks, that this unexpected turn chang'd the scene at once, and entirely broke them.

Of the king's forces above four thousand were slain and fifteen hundred taken prisoners; among whom were Sir Charles Lucas, major-general Porter, major-general Tilyard, with about a hundred officers more. All the artillery, great numbers of arms, and a good quantity of ammunition and baggage, fell also into the parliamentarians hands; the prince's own standard, with the arms of the Palatinate, was likewise taken, with many others both of horse and foot. Of the parliamentarians... not above three hundred were slain. This famous battle was fought on the second day of July. Cromwell was greatly cried up for his bravery and conduct, and gain'd the name of Ironsides from the impenetrable strength of his troops, which could by no means be broken or divided. Prince Rupert and his confederates being thus defeated, they quarrel'd among themselves, one reproaching the other for this miscarriage; whereupon the earl of Newcastle, and others of quality, departed out of the kingdom. The siege of York was now renew'd, which city despairing of fresh succours, was soon surrender'd to the parliament by Sir Thomas Glendam, who had been left sole governor of it.

CHAP. III.

From the battle of Marston-Moor to the battle of Naseby.

Cromwell began now to be very much taken notice of, some admiring, and others envying his great success, and dreading his aspiring temper and enterprising genius. The lord general Essex and the Scotch commissioners were particularly jealous of him, so that they were once in consultation, together with Mr. Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir John Meyrick, and others, how to get rid of him, and sent to serjeant Maynard and Whitelock about it; who being come, the earl of Essex told them, that he had sent for them to have their advice and counsel upon a matter of great importance to both kingdoms; whereupon, at his desire, the chancellor of Scotland spake to them, in the Scotch dialect, as follows:

Mr. Maynard and Mr. Whitelock, I can assure you of the great opinion, both my brethren and self have of your worth and abilities, else we should not have have desired this meeting with you: And since it is his excellency's pleasure, that I should acquaint you with the matter upon which your counsel is desired, I shall obey his command, and briefly recite the business to you.

You know very well, that lieutenant-general Cromwell is no friend of ours; and since the advance of our army into England, he has used all under-hand and cunning means to take off from our honour, and merit of this kingdom, an evil requital of our hazards and services; but so it is, and we are nevertheless fully satisfy'd of the affections and gratitude of the gude people of the nation in general.

It is thought requisite for us, and for carrying on the cause of the two kingdoms, that this obstacle or remora be removed out of the way, whom we foresee will be no small impediment to us in the gude design we have undertaken.

He not only is no friend to us and the government of our church, but he is also no well-willer to his excellency, whom you and we have all cause to love and honour; and if he be permitted to go on this way, it may, I fear endanger the whole business; therefore we are to advise of some course to be taken for prevention of this mischief.

You know very well the accord betwixt the two nations, and the union by the Solemn-League and Covenant; and if any be an incendiary between the two nations, bow he is to be proceeded against. Now the matter is, wherein we desire your opinions, what you tak the meaning of the word incendiary to be, and whether the lieutenant-general be not fiek an incendiary, as is meant thereby; and solilk way wud be best to tak to proceed against him, if he be proved fiek an incendiary, that we may clepe his wings from soaring to the prejudice of our cause.

Now you may ken, that by our law in Scotland, we clepe him an incendiary wha kindleth coals of contention, and raiseth differences in the state, to the
To this Mr. Whitelock answer'd, "that the sense of the word incendiary, was the same here as in Scotland; but whether lieutenant-general Cromwell be such an incendiary must be prov'd,
either by his words or actions: That he look'd
upon him to be a gentleman of quick and subtile
parts; and who had a great interest in both houses of parliament, and that it would be needful to collect such particular passages concerning him,
as might be sufficient to prove him an incendiary,
before they could expect the parliament should proceed against him." Mr. Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, and some others, gave an account of some particular passages and words of Cromwell's,
and said, that he had not that interest in the parliament as was suppos'd; and they would willingly have been upon the accusation of him; but the Scotch commissioners were not so ready to join with them in it, and so the lieutenant-general elseap'd.

CROMWELL was now also very much dreaded
by the king's party. His majesty being at Oxford, was willing to have the particular advice of that known statesman archbishop Williams; and so wrote to him at Aberconway in Wales to come to him. The archbishop accordingly waiting on the king, advis'd him by all means to come to an agreement with the parliament; for since the Scots were come into England in such numerous armies, and the English of the parliament's party, in these two last years, had acquir'd a military knowledge, it would in all appearance be impossible for the king long to refit their forces. But above all, he warned him, to have a care of Cromwell, declaring him to be the most dangerous enemy the king had; and there-

Archbp. Williams
warns the king
of him.
fore humbly moved, that either he would win him over to his side by promises of fair treatment, or catch him by some stratagem, and cut him short. This is said to have made such an impression on the king, that he was heard to say, I would some would do me the good service to bring Cromwell to me alive or dead.

About four months after the fight at Marstonmoor, happened the second battle of Newbury, where Cromwell is said to have endanger'd the king's person, had not the earl of Cleveland interpos'd, and bore off the pursuit. This battle was the occasion of an irreconcilable breach between him and the earl of Manchester. Cromwell accus'd the earl of cowardly betraying the parliament, for that he might very easily have defeated the king's army, when he drew off his cannon, if he would have suffer'd him with his own brigade to have charg'd them in their retreat; but that the earl obstinately oppos'd all advice and importunity, giving no other reason, than That if he did overthrow the king's army, the king would always have another to keep up the war; but if his army should be overthrown at that nice juncture, they should be all rebels and traitors, and executed and forfeited by the law. This last expression was heinously taken by the parliament, as if the earl believe'd the law was against them, after they had so often declared, that the law was on their side.

"The earl acknowledg'd, that he had in effect said, That they would be treated as traitors if their army was defeated, when he dislik'd the lieutenant-general's advice, in exposing the army to an unseasonable hazard." And then recriminating upon his adversary, said, "That at another time, Cromwell freely discoursing with him of the state of the kingdom, and proposing an expedient, the earl answer'd, that the parliament would never approve it; to which Crom-1844. "well immediately reply'd, My lord, if you will "stick firm to honest men, you will find an army at
"your command, that will give the law to king and
"parliament: which discourse, he said, made a
"great impression upon him; and finding him
"a man of very deep designs, he was the more
"careful to preserve an army, which he believed
"still faithful to the parliament." These matters were never thoroughly examin'd, tho' the animosities encreased, and the parties on both sides openlly appeared against each other, to the dividing of the city, as well as of the parliament.

A mighty party in the parliament began now
to be dissatisfy'd with their old generals, thinking them too much inclin'd to a peace with the king,
and too great favourers of the Presbyterian party.
Hereupon they are for having the army new mo-dell'd; and that their old friends might be the more civilly dismiss'd from their military posts,
they endeavour to procure an ordinance, for incapacitating all members of parliament for such posts.
Cromwell was a great promoter of this design, and after some had led the way, made a speech in the house for that purpose, declaring, "That there were many things upon which he never reflected before, yet upon re-consideration, he could not but own that all was very true; and till there was a perfect reformation in those particulars recommended to them, nothing they took in hand
would prosper: That the parliament had done wisely in the beginning of the war, to engage many of their members in the most dangerous parts of it, that the nation might see they design'd not to embark others in perils, whilst themselves sat securely out of gun-shot, but would march with them where the danger most threaten'd; and those honourable persons, who had thus exposed themselves, had merited so much of their country, that their memories would
" be
Oliver Cromwell.

be held in perpetual veneration; and whatever should be well done after them, would be imputed to their example. But now God had so blessed their army, that there had grown up with it many excellent officers, who were fitter for much greater charges than they now enjoy'd; therefore he desir'd them not to be terrify'd with an imagination, that they should want able men to fill the greatest vacancy: for besides that it was not good to put so much trust in any arm of flesh, as to think such a cause as this depended upon any one man, he assur'd them, that they had officers in their army, who were fit to be generals in any enterprize in Christendom." He added, "He thought nothing so necessary as to vindicate the parliament from partiality towards their own members; and proffer'd to lay down his own commission in the army, and desir'd, that an ordinance might be prepar'd, to make it unlawful for any member of either house to hold any office in the army, or any place in the state;" and so concluded with an enlargement upon the vices and corruptions crept into the army, and freely told them, "That till the whole army were new modell'd, and brought under stricter discipline, they must not expect any remarkable success in any undertaking." In conclusion, a committee was appointed to prepare an ordinance for the exclusion of all members from the fore-mentioned trusts; which took up much time, and was long debated, but in the end pass'd, and was called the self-denying ordinance.

Some time before, Cromwell had orders from the house to march with all speed into the west, to join Sir William Waller; which he accordingly did, and being join'd they beat up Goring's quarters, who thereupon fled to Exeter. It seems there had been some behaviour in Cromwell's regiment, that gave offence to the parliament; for he now
now sent a letter to the house, informing them,

That since his coming to his regiment, their carriage had been obedient, respective, and valiant;

a good testimony whereof they gave in the late defeat of Long's regiment: That they were forry for their former mutinous carriage, and desir'd

him to send their most humble petition to both houses, That they might again be received into their favour, and their former offence fully par-

don'd; promising a valiant testimony of their future service:’’ which petition was well accepted

by the parliament. After this, he march'd to Cerne in Dorsetshire, where he was join'd by the colonels Holborn and Popbam. The enemy coming within three miles of them undiscover'd, Cromwell

drew into the field there, with design to fight them, tho' superior to him in number; which they perceiving, drew off; and Cromwell was farther re-

inforc'd by the regiments of Norton and Cook, &c.

Upon the passing of the self-denying ordinance,
the army, which had been much diminished by sickness and a late defeat in the west, was order'd to be recruited to one and twenty thousand men,

namely, fourteen thousand foot, six thousand horse;
and one thousand dragoons; and Sir Thomas Fairfax was commission'd general. They who were removed from their commands in the army by this ordinance, were the earl of Essex, the earl of Manchester, the earl of Denbigh, the earl of Warwick, Sir William Waller, lord Grey of Groby, major-general Massy, &c. Cromwell was likewise to have lost his command, and came to Windsor to take leave of the new general; but such interest had been made in the committee of both kingdoms at Westminster, or they were so sensible of his rare talent

for war, that they had sent orders to general Fairfax to detach a party of horse to lie between Oxford and Worcester, for intercepting the correspondence between the king and prince Rupert, and par-particularly

Oliver Cromwell. 21

particularly recommended lieutenant-general Cromwell for that service; who went away with a good party of horse and dragoons, and defeated a brigade of the king's horse under the earl of Northampton and Goring, at Iflip-bridge, kill'd several, and took five hundred horse, and two hundred prisoners, whereof several were officers and persons of quality, as also the queen's standard, besides many other trophies of honour.

He pursued the routed remnant to Bletching-ton-house, where colonel Windebank commanded; who being summoned by victorious Cromwell, and persuaded by his beautiful young bride and the ladies that came to visit her, surrender'd the place, with all the arms and ammunition; for which he was shot to death at Oxford by sentence of a council of war.

About the same time also, Cromwell forced Sir William Vaughan and lieutenant-colonel Little-ton, with three hundred and fifty men, into Bamp-ton-Bush, where he took them both, and two hundred of their men prisoners, with their arms, and sent colonel Fiennes after another party, who took a hundred and fifty horse, three colonels, and forty common soldiers prisoners, with their arms. Being afterwards re-inforce'd by about five hundred foot from colonel Brown's garrison at Abington, Cromwell attempted the reducing of Faringdon-house, and storm'd it; but it was so gallantly defended by Sir George Lisle, that he was forc'd to draw off, having lost fifty of his men; and in his retreat he was attack'd by a party of lieutenant-Goring's horse, lately come from the siege of Taun-ton, who got from him three colours, and took major Bethel prisoner.

It was now order'd by both houses, that lieutenant-general Cromwell should be dispense'd with for his personal attendance in the house, and continue his service and command in the army, for forty 1645. forty days longer, notwithstanding the late ordinance. This, says Whitelock, was much spoken against by Essex's party, as a breach of that ordinance, and a discovery of the intention to continue whom they pleas'd, and to remove the others from commands, notwithstanding their former self-denying pretences.

This lord-general Fairfax began his march in order to relieve Taunton. But the committee of both kingdoms, understanding that prince Rupert was advancing towards Oxford, order'd him to stop his march, and to send only a party of about three thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse to Taunton, whilst he, with the rest of his army, march'd back to join Cromwell and Brown, that they might attend the king's motions with their united forces. The king being join'd by prince Rupert, march'd into Worcestershire, and design'd to relieve Chester, which had been a great while besieged by the parliament's forces under Sir William Brereton; who, when the king was come within twenty miles of Chester, rais'd the siege, and return'd into Lancashire. Upon this, the king diverted his course towards Leicester, and coming before the place, took it by storm.

In the mean time the lords and commons agreed with the committee of both kingdoms, that general Fairfax should invest Oxford, that important head-quarter of the king. Accordingly the general brought up his army near Oxford, and laid siege to it, having his own quarters at Marston, Cromwell at Wilmham, and Brown at Wolvercote. After fifteen days spent without action, the parliament being startled at the loss of Leicester, sent express orders to Fairfax to march away with his army; which he accordingly did on the ninth of June.

The king was marching from Leicester with design to relieve Oxford; but hearing the siege was rais'd, he return'd towards Northampton, causing great great terror to the associated parts. Cromwell, before the breaking up of the siege, had been called from thence to the island of Ely, to support the association, and was shortly to attend his place in parliament, according to the late ordinance: But upon a resolution of the council of war, the general wrote to them, desiring them to dispense with Cromwell's absence from the house, and to appoint him lieutenant-general of the horse. The parliament being sensible of his great usefulness in the field, readily complied with this request, and accordingly commission'd him lieutenant-general of horse to the whole army. Hereupon Cromwell being recruited with six hundred horse and dragoons, came out of the associated parts, and join'd with Fairfax and his main army at Gilsborough. Whitelock says, he now began to increase in the favour of the people, and of the army, and to grow great, even to the envy of many.

The king having tarried a little at Borough-Hill, drew off from thence towards Harborough, and design'd to march to Pomfret, thinking if he were follow'd by the parliament's forces, he should fight with greater advantage northward. But Ireton, by Cromwell's advice, being sent out with a flying party of horse, fell upon a party of the king's rear, quarter'd in Naseby town, and took many prisoners, some of prince Rupert's life-guard, and Longdale's brigade; which gave such an alarm to the whole royal army, that the king at midnight left his own quarters, and for security hasten'd to Harborough, where the van of his army lay. Here calling up prince Rupert, he summon'd a council of war, in which it was resolve'd (chiefly through the prince's eagerness, old commanders being much against it) to give the enemy battle; and since Fairfax had been so forward, they would no longer stay for him, but seek him out. Accordingly being come near Naseby, there they found him; and
and both armies being drawn up in battalia, fac'd each other. Prince Rupert and prince Maurice commanded the right wing of the royal army, Sir Marmaduke Langdale the left, and the king himself the main body; the earl of Lindsey and Jacob Lord Astley, the right hand reserve, and the lord Bard and Sir George Lisle, the left reserve. The right wing of the parliament's army was led by lieutenant-general Cromwell, the left by colonel Ireton, the main body by general Fairfax and major-general Skippon, who fought stoutly, tho' sorely wounded in the beginning of the fight; and the reserves were brought up by Rainsborough, Hammond, and Pride. The place of action was a large fallow field, on the north-west side of Naseby, above a mile broad; which space of ground was wholly taken up by the two armies.

All things being dispos'd, on June 14, at ten in the morning, the battle began with more than civil rage; the royalists word being God and queen Mary, and the others, God with us. Prince Rupert gave the first charge, and engag'd the parliament's left wing with great resolution. Ireton made gallant resistance, but was forced at last to give ground, his horse being shot under him, and himself run through the thigh with a pike, and into the face with a halbert, and taken prisoner, till upon the turn of the battle he regain'd his liberty. The prince chas'd the enemy almost to Naseby town, and in his return summon'd the train, and visited the carriages, where was good plunder; but here, as in the battle of Marston-moor, his long stay so far from the main body was no small prejudice to the king's army.

For Cromwell in the mean time charg'd furious on the king's left wing, and that with good success, forcing them from the body, and prosecuting the advantage, quite broke them, and their reserve: After which, joining with Fairfax, he charg'd
Oliver Cromwell.

charg'd the king's foot, who had beaten the parliament's, and got possession of their ordnance, and thought themselves sure of the victory; but being now in confusion, and having no horse to support them, they were easily overthrown by Fairfax and Cromwell. By this time the king was joined by prince Rupert, return'd from his fatal success; but the horse could never be brought to rally themselves again in order, or to charge the enemy: Upon which the lord Clarendon says, That this difference was observ'd all along in the discipline of the king's troops, and of those under Fairfax and Cromwell, (it having never been remarkable under Essex or Waller, but only under them) That though the king's troops prevail'd in the charge, and routed those they charg'd, they seldom rally'd themselves again in order, nor could be brought to make a second charge again the same day; which was the reason that they had not an entire victory at Edge-Hill; whereas the troops under Fairfax and Cromwell, if they prevail'd, or tho' they were beaten and routed, presently rally'd again, and stood in good order, till they received further directions. In fine, with all that the king and prince could do, they could not rally their broken troops, which stood in sufficient numbers upon the place; so that they were forced at last to quit the field, leaving a compleat victory to the parliament's party, who pursu'd them within two miles of Leicester; and the king finding the pursuit so hot, fled from thence to Abbey-de-la-zouch, and then to Litchfield, and so for a safer retreat into Wales.

Thus ended the famous battle of Naseby, in which the wonderful success of the parliament party was chiefly owing to Cromwell's valour and good conduct, who flew like lightning from one part of the army to the other, and broke thro' the enemy's squadrons with such rapidity, that nothing either could or durst stop him. 'Tis said, that in this
this action, a commander of the king's knowing Cromwell, advanced briskly from the head of his troops to exchange a single bullet with him, and was with equal bravery encountered by him, both sides forbearing to come in, till their pistols being discharged, the cavalier with a flaunting back blow of a broad sword, chanced to cut the ribbon that tied Cromwell's murrion, and with a draw threw it off his head; and now just going to repeat his stroke, Cromwell's party came and rescued him; and one of them alighting, threw up his headpiece into his saddle, which he hastily catching, clapt it on the wrong way; and so bravely fought with it the rest of the day, which proved so very fortunate on his side.

The king's loss in this battle was irreparable; for besides that there were slain above a hundred and fifty officers, and gentlemen of quality, most of his foot were taken prisoners, with all his cannon and baggage, eight thousand arms, and other rich booty; among which was also his majesty's own cabinet, where were reposited his most secret papers and letters between him and his queen, which shewed how contrary his counsels with her were to those he declared to the kingdom; for in one of them he declares his intention, to make peace with the Irish, and to have forty thousand of them over into England to prosecute the war here; and in another he complains, That he could not prevail on his mungrel parliament at Oxford, to vote that the two houses at Westminster were not a lawful parliament; so little thanks, as one observes, who was no enemy to his majesty, had these noble lords and gentlemen, for exposing their lives and fortunes in defence of the king in his adversity; what then might they expect, if he should prevail by conquest? In those letters also he tells the queen, That he would not make a peace with the rebels [the parliament] without her approbation, nor go one jot from from the paper she sent him: That in the treaty at Uxbridge, he did not positively own the parliament, it being otherwise to be construed, that they were so simple as not to find it out; and that it was recorded in the notes of the king's council, That he did not acknowledge them a parliament. These and many other papers relating to the publick were printed with observations, and kept upon record, by order of the two houses, who also made a publick declaration of them, shewing what the nobility and gentry, who follow'd the king, were to expect.

CHAP. IV.

From the battle of Naseby to the conclusion of the first civil war.

The battle of Naseby was truly a deciding battle; for from this grand period, the king's affairs became desperate, and his whole party began to moulder away, and most sensibly to decline everywhere. The parliament's army had no sooner gain'd this wonderful advantage, but like a torrent they soon overflow'd the whole kingdom, bearing down all before them. Leicester was immediately regain'd without any considerable opposition. From thence they march'd to the relief of Taunton, which being besieg'd by Goring's army, had made a wonderful resistance under the command of the valiant Blake. Upon the approach of the parliament's forces, Goring drew off his army towards Langport; and being master of the several passes on the river, hoped to have declin'd fighting, and secured his retreat towards Bridgewater: But the others drew down their ordnance with such advantage, that whilst they did great execution on Goring's army, their foot resolutely gain'd the pass; and the horse advanc'd over; when they so bravely engag'd the enemy, that they soon put them
them to flight, charging them almost to Bridgewater. Cromwell in this action shewed much prudence as well as courage; for he would not suffer part of the horse to pursue the enemy, till they were all come up together; and then himself leading them on, perform'd the work with such suc-
cels, that he took almost all their foot and ordnance.

After this victory, 'twas resolved, in a council of war, to storm the strong garrison of Bridgewater. Accordingly they began the assault on the 22d of July, and forc'd a surrender the very next day. The taking of this place was a very great advantage to the parliament; for thereby a line of garrisons was drawn over the country from the Severn to the south coasts, by Bridgewater, Taunton, Lime and Langport; whereby the counties of Devon and Cornwall, then wholly at the king's devotion, except Plymouth, were in a manner blocked up from all intercourse with the eastern parts.

The merciless rapines and violence practised by the royalists in the western parts had occasioned the rising of a third kind of army, which suddenly starting up in divers counties, assembled to the number of five or six thousand of the middle sort of men.
These soon had the name of Club-Men, and were encouraged by several gentlemen of the country,
who entertain'd particular hopes from this insurrection. The motto of their colours was,

If you offer to plunder or take our cattle,
Be assured we will bid you battle.

This army of Club-Men for some time became very formidable to both parties, each of them endeavouing to gain them over to themselves. But having for some months stood upon their own defence, and molested both armies, they were at last very reasonably suppress'd and dispers'd by the parliament forces under
Oliver Cromwell; who, together with Fairfax, daily gain’d ground in those parts.

Bristol was a place of very great importance, which prince Rupert, with about five thousand horse and foot, held for the king. It was now therefore thought requisite to besiege it for the parliament, and accordingly the army was drawn up towards it. The general being come before it, summoned prince Rupert to deliver up the town; but upon his refusal, it was advis’d by Cromwell and some other chief officers to storm part of it: Which accordingly was executed with so much fury, that the prince thought not fit to run the hazard of a second assault, but immediately surrend’re’d that great and well fortify’d city to the parliament general; whereby the king lost all his chief magazines and war-like provisions, and consequently in a short time South-Wales and all the west of England. Upon this his majesty wrote a sharp letter to prince Rupert, in which he says, I must remember you of yours of the 12th of August, whereby you assure’d me, That if no mutiny happened, you would keep Bristol for four months; Did you keep it four days? Was there any thing like a mutiny: My conclusion is, to desire you to seek your subsistence, until it shall please God to determine of my condition, some where beyond seas; to which end I send you herewith a pass, &c.

Fairfax and Cromwell sent letters to the parliament, relating the particulars of the siege of Bristol, and in Cromwell’s there was this passage: It may be thought that some praises are due to those gallant men, of whose valour so much mention is made: Their humble suit to you, and all that have an interest in this blessing, is, that in remembrance of God’s praises, they may be forgotten. It’s their joy that they are instruments to God’s glory, and their country’s good: It’s their honour that God vouchsafes to use them. Sir, they that have been employ’d in this BRISTOL being thus reduc'd, Cromwell presently takes with him a brigade of four regiments, and marches to the strong castle of the Devizes, whose natural strength was much improv'd by the ingenuity of its governor, Sir Charles Lloyd, who looking upon it to be almost impregnable, return'd no other answer to Cromwell's first summons, but Win it and wear it. But as if nothing could be a sufficient defence against this victorious commander, whose very name began now to strike terror to his enemies, the governor was soon brought to terms, and forc'd to deliver up the place to him.

After this, Cromwell hastens to Winchester, and in his march disarms and disperses the Hampshire club-men thereabouts. Being come before the town, he found it fortify'd; but after a short dispute, he fir'd the gate, and his men enter'd. This done, he summoned the castle; which not surrendering, he planted six guns, and after firing them round, sent a second summons for a treaty, which they also refus'd. Upon this he made a breach with two hundred shot, and then the governor, the lord Ogle, thought fit to beat a parley, which was granted; and colonel Hammond and major Harrison for Cromwell, agreed upon articles for delivering up the castle into the hands of the parliament. Here an instance is given of Cromwell's faithfulness in his punctual observance of articles; for 'tis said, that being inform'd that some of his men had been faulty in this respect, he caus'd one of them to be hang'd to the terror of others, and sent the rest to Oxford, that the governour Sir Thomas Glemham might punish them as he thought fit; who is said with generous acknowledgments to return them to Cromwell again.

His next attempt was upon Basing-house, a very strong place. It was the mansion of the marquis of Winchester.
Oliver Cromwell.

Winchester, a Papist, standing on a rising ground, and encompass'd with a brick rampart lined with earth, having a deep dry ditch surrounding it. Here the marquis stood upon his guard, assisted at first only with his own family and a hundred musqueteers from Oxford; but recruited afterwards by the king from time to time, as there was occasion. This garrison had been often assaulted, but in vain; first by colonel Norton and colonel Harvey; next by Sir William Waller with seven thousand horse and foot; who, though many then called him William the Conqueror, did little more than increase the courage of the besieged, who made many furious sallies upon him. Thus the place stood for some years out-braving all attempts, till the valiant Cromwell endeavour'd the reducing of it, which he very soon effected; for having seen the lord Ogle, the late governour of Winchester, march out according to articles, and settled the affairs of that garrison for the parliament, he the next day march'd for Basing; where being arriv'd, after planting the batteries, and settling the several posts for a storm, his men fell on with great resolution. Colonel Pickering storm'd the new house, and passing through, got the gate of the old house; whereupon they beat a parley, which the parliament soldiers would not regard. In the mean time, colonel Montague's and Sir Hardress Waller's regiments recover'd the strongest work, and beat the enemy from a whole culverin. Then they drew their ladders after them, and got over another work, and the house-wall, before they could enter. Thus was the place reduc'd with very little los's on the parliament's side. Seventy-four of the royalists were slain, among whom were some officers of quality, divers of them Papists. Two hundred were taken prisoners, among whom was the marquis himself, Sir Robert Peak, and several other officers, whom Cromwell sent up to the parliament. They took about
The LIFE of

Gains

Langford-boys.

Marches towards Exeter.

Dartmouth taken by storm; and the lord Hop- ton defeated.

1645.

about ten pieces of ordnance, with a good quantity of ammunition and provisions, and there was rich pillage for the soldiers, of money, jewels, household-stuff, &c. For these important services, the house order'd a letter of thanks to be drawn up to the lieutenant-general.

The next place Cromwell visited, was Langford-house near Salisbury; but Sir Bartholomew Pell having had information of what he had done at Basing, and expecting no better success, submitted at the first summons.

From hence he march'd towards the main body of the army, which was then moving towards Exeter, with a design to lay siege to it: Where being arriv'd, he advanc'd farther westward towards the enemy, and at Bovy-Tracy fought the brigade commanded by the lord Wentworth, taking four hundred horse, and about a hundred foot, prisoners, with six standards, one of which was the king's.

The design upon Exeter being for the present laid aside, the army under Fairfax and Cromwell appear'd before Dartmouth, and took it by storm; which being done, they encounter'd the lord Hopton at Torrington, and gave him an absolute defeat; and then pursu'd the only remains of a royal army into Cornwall, where prince Charles had his own regiment, and other Cornish troops, which compos'd a body of about five thousand horse, and one thousand foot: But not able to resist the multitudes that the parliamentarians were pouring upon him, he embarked with several lords and gentlemen, and found refuge in the isle of Scilly. His troops were left under the command of the lord Hopton, who was so press'd upon by the parliament's forces, that he was obliged to disband on the 14th of March; soon after which Exeter was surrender'd to the parliament. And now lieutenant-general Cromwell came up to London from the general, to advise about the future motion of the army; and taking FAIRFAX and Cromwell having thus scower'd the west, and only Newark remaining in the north, the king's affairs were now in a very low and desperate condition. The royalists in Oxford had indeed still some little hopes from a party commanded by the lord Astley, which were the only forces in the field for the king; but these hopes soon vanish'd; for being encounter'd by colonel Morgan near Stow on the Would, he was entirely defeated, himself and almost all his men being taken prisoners. Astley was so sensible of the consequence of this defeat, that when he was taken, he said to one of the parliament-officers, You have now done your work and may go to play, unless you will fall out among yourselves.

The parliament army, flush'd with irresistible success, was now marching to besiege Oxford, the king's head quarters and place of his residence; who in this extremity resolv'd to throw himself into the hands of the Scotch army, then lying before Newark. He was advised to do this by Monsieur Montrevil, the French ambassador, who was then in the Scotch quarters; and the rather encourag'd to it, because the animosities between the English parliament and the Scots were now grown very high, the latter complaining against the former, for their delays in settling the Presbyterian government of the church according to the Covenant; and for with-holding their pay. In pursuance of this resolution, before the siege of Oxford could be formed, the king escaped from thence on the 27th of April. He went away in disguise, accompany'd only by Dr. Hudson, and Mr. Ashburnham, and riding as a servant to the latter, with a cloak-bag behind him. They went to Henly, Brentford, and Harrow-on-the-Hill, thence towards St. Albans, and making making their way to Harborough, where they expected Monsieur Montrevil; who not being there as he had appointed, the king went to Stamford, thence to Downham, and so to Southam; where finding the French agent, he sent to general Leven, and was conducted by a troop of horse to lieutenant-general Levy's quarters. Oxford being close block'd up, surrender'd on the 22d of June, and the few remaining garrisons soon after, viz. Worcester, Wallingford, Pendennis-castle, and Ragland-castle. The parliament being inform'd of the king's escape from Oxford, and arrival in the Scotch army, were very much startled at it, and sent an order to their commissioners to demand him of them; requiring also their army to advance, in order to hinder a conjunction of the king's party with the Scots, being very jealous of his making terms with them: But upon their surrendering Newark to the English, which the king had order'd to be deliver'd up to them, and general Leven's forbidding his forces to have any communication with the king's party, they began to be pretty well satisfy'd for the present; and so the Scots, having got the king in their possession, march'd with him to Newcastle, where he receiv'd the parliament's propositions for peace: which he not agreeing to, they consult how to take him out of the hands of the Scots, to send them out of England, and to bring him up into safer custody. In order to this, they thought it necessary to reckon with the Scots, who offer'd to accept of a sum in gross, for full discharge of their arrears, to be agreed on by commissioners. These concluded on four hundred thousand pounds, one Moiety of which to be paid before their going home, and the other within stated terms. The delivering up of the king was a tacit condition of this agreement; and accordingly the Scots having received two hundred thousand pounds, which was sent down to them, deliver'd the king, after he had been with them
Oliver Cromwell.

them about nine months, into the hands of the parliament's commissioners, who conducted him to Holmby-house in Northamptonshire. Upon this Mr. Coke has these reflections: "Thus this prince, who before had shifted the worthy members of parliament from one prison to another, that they might have no benefit of their Habeas-Corpus, is himself shifted a prisoner from one place to another, without any hope of an Habeas-Corpus: He that before, by his absolute will and pleasure, would without any law seize his subjects goods, and commit them to prison, cannot now enjoy his own estate in his own house: He that before arbitrarily rais'd ship-money, has not now one ship to command."

Chap. V.

From the conclusion of the first and long civil war, to the king's seizure at Holmby by the army.

The king's party being subdu'd by the parliament, who had also got him into their hands, and the Scots having quietly left the kingdom, and so the long civil war between the king and the parliament, which had been maintained at the expense of so much blood and treasure, being entirely ended, the victors began now to quarrel amongst themselves; and the differences and dissentions in the parliament and army, and chiefly between those two bodies, the civil and military powers, occasion'd a great deal of uneasiness and trouble to the nation. The foundation of all this, as Ludlow tells us, were the high contests between the Presbyterian and Independent parties, the one not enduring any superior, nor the other any equal. The Presbyterians, says he, grasp'd at the whole power, proceeding with equal bitterness against all other sects.
as against the episcopal party; and finding themselves superior in both houses, little doubted of being able to reform the army, and new-model it again; which, without doubt, they would have attempted, had not the death of the earl of Essex, who deceas'd about this time, prevented them. This party prevail'd very much in the city, so that an address was presented to the parliament from the mayor and common-council, wherein after acknowledging the care of the two houses in the reformation of the church, &c. they desir'd, that such assemblies as were privately held to introduce new sects, might be suppress'd, and that those who were distinguish'd by the name of Independents, might be remov'd from all employments civil and military. Ludlow farther tells us, the party in the house that were for betraying the cause of their country, became encouragers of such petitioners as came to them from the city of London, and other places, for a speedy peace, and to suppress sectaries: The army, both officers and soldiers, were complain'd against, as holding erroneous and schismatical doctrines; and for taking upon them to preach and expound the scripture, not being learned nor ordained.

And as Cromwell espous'd the Independent party, the parliament was particularly jealous of him, and was for taking measures to dismis's him, and his chief partizans, from their military pofts. Cromwell was no les's jealous of them, and being aware of what they design'd, resolved to be even with them. Ludlow tells us, that as he was walking with him one morning in Sir Robert Cotton's garden, he inveigh'd bitterly against the parliament, and said familiarly to him, If thy father were alive, he would let some of them bear what they deserve; adding farther, That it was a miserable thing to serve a parliament, to whom let a man be never so faithful, if one pragmatical fellow amongst them rise up and afterse him, he shall never wipe it off; whereas, when one Accordingly from this time Cromwell, to secure himself, and prevent the designs of the Presbyterians, made a strong party for military power, for which he had now a fair opportunity offer'd him: For the Presbyterian party in parliament, knowing that the army was mostly inclin'd to the Independents, were earnestly desirous to break it; and the better to facilitate this design, under the pretence of lessening their great charge, they resolv'd on the disbanding of some troops, and transporting others for the service of Ireland. Cromwell having timely notice of this resolution, he, together with Ireton, insinuated to the soldiers, that the parliament intended to disband them without paying them their arrears, or else to send them into Ireland to die of sickness and famine. Upon this, the soldiers broke out into reviling language against the parliament; and when the orders for disbanding some, and transporting others, as before mention'd, were sent down to them, they refus'd to comply with them. The parliament being inform'd of it, were very much offended at this behaviour of the army; but the prudence and moderation of major-general Skippon, in reporting the matter to the house, much abated the heat of their resentment, though several threatening expressions came from some of them; which occasion'd Cromwell, then in the house, to whisper Ludlow in the ear, saying, These men will never leave, till the army pull them out by the ears.

This spirit of opposition being rais'd in the army, they began now more professedly to enter into competition with the parliament, and to claim a share with them in settling the kingdom; and that they might be upon a nearer level with them, they made choice of a number of such officers as they approv'd, which was called the general's council of officers, officers, and was to resemble the house of peers; and three or four out of each regiment, most corporals or serjeants, were chosen by the common soldiers, and called Agitators, who were to answer to the house of commons. These two bodies met severally, and examin'd all the acts and orders of the parliament towards settling the kingdom, and reforming, dividing, or disbanded the army; and, after some consultations, they unanimously resolv'd and declar'd, "That they would not be divided or disbanded, till their full arrears were paid, and till full provision was made for liberty of conscience; which they said was the ground of the quarrel, tho' hitherto there was so little security provided in that point, that there was now a greater persecution against religious and godly men, than ever had been in the king's government, when the bishops were their judges."

They added, "That they did not look upon themselves as a band of Janizaries, hire'd and entertained only to fight their battles; but that they had voluntarily taken up arms for the liberty and defence of the nation, of which they were a part; and before they laid down those arms, they would see all those ends well provided for, that the people might not hereafter suffer those grievances, with which they had formerly been oppress'd."

Three or four of their own members being sent to the house of commons with this declaration, they with great confidence deliver'd it at the bar. And soon after, the soldiers drew up a vindication of their proceedings, directing it to their general; wherein they complained of a design to disband, and new-model the army; "Which they said, was a plot contrived by some men, who had lately tasted of sovereignty, and being rais'd above the ordinary sphere of servants, would fain become masters, and were degenerated into tyrants."

For which reason they declared, "That they would neither..."
neither be employed for the service of Ireland, nor suffer themselves to be disbanded, till their desires were obtained, and the subjects rights and liberties should be vindicated and secured." This paper being sign'd by many inferior officers, the parliament declar'd them enemies to the state, imprisoning some of them who talk'd loudest: Where-upon they drew up another address to their general, complaining, "How disdainfully they were used by the parliament, for whom they had ventur'd their lives, and spilt their blood; that the privileges due to them as soldiers, and as subjects, were taken from them; and when they com-plained of the injuries done to them, they were abus'd, beaten, and imprison'd."

Upon this Fairfax (who was indeed a Presby-terian, but was only general in name, Cromwell having got the ascendant over him, and having the sole influence upon the army, which he manag'd as he pleas'd) was prevail'd upon to write a letter to a member of parliament, who read it to the house; wherein he took notice of several petitions, which were prepar'd in the city of London, and other places against the army; adding, "That it was look'd upon as strange, that the officers of the army might not be permitted to petition, when so many petitions were receiv'd against them; and that he much doubted, that the army might draw to a rendezvous, and think of taking some other course for their own vindication."

The parliament was exceedingly troubled at these proceedings of the army. However, they resolv'd not to submit to, or be govern'd by those who were their servants, and liv'd upon their pay: And therefore, after many severe expressions against the presumption of several officers and soldiers, they declar'd, "That whatsoever should refuse, being commanded, to engage in the service of Ireland, should be disbanded." But the army would...
The Life of 1647.

Declaration of the parliament against the army, afterwards raised out of their journal-book.

A committee of the parliament sent to treat with a committee of the army.

Cromwell's management with the parliament.

by no means recede from the resolutions they had taken, and falling into a direct and high mutiny, called for the arrears due to them, which they knew where, and how to levy for themselves; nor would they be at all pacify'd, till the declaration of the parliament against them was raised out of their journal-book, and a month's pay sent to them: Nor did this satisfy them, but they still gave out, "That they knew how to make themselves as considerable as the parliament, and where to have their service better esteem'd and requited." This so startled the parliament, that they sent a committee of the lords and commons, some whereof were not at all ungrateful to the army, to treat with a committee of officers, upon the best means to be used, for composing these differences. By which method of proceeding the army seemed to be put upon a level with the parliament; and this also dispos'd general Fairfax to a greater concurrence with the humour of the army, when he saw it was so much comply'd with, and submitted to by all men.

Cromwell hitherto thought it necessary to keep himself as fair with the parliament as possible; for which purpose, having a rare knack at dissimulation, he would seem highly displeased with the insolence of the soldiers, and being still in the house of commons, when any of their addresses were presented, inveigh'd bitterly against their presumption. He also propos'd, That the general might be sent down to the army; who, he said, would soon conjure down this mutinous spirit: And he was so easily believ'd, that he himself was once or twice sent to reduce them to order; and having staid two or three days with them, he would again return to the parliament, and make heavy complaints of the great license that was got into the army; that, for his own part, by the artifice of his enemies, and of those who desir'd that the nation should be again imbru'd in blood, he was render'd so odious... to them, that they had design'd to kill him, if he had not timely escap'd out of their hands." But notwithstanding this, he was greatly suspected by many, of having under-hand encourag'd the army's proceedings; and the most active officers and agitators were believ'd to be his own creatures, who would do nothing without his direction: So that it was privately resolv'd by the chief members of the house of commons, that when he came the next day into the house, which he seldom fail'd to do, they would send him to the Tower.

This design could not be manag'd so secretly,
but Cromwell got intelligence of it; and so when the house the next day expected every minute to see him come in, they had notice given them, that he was met out of the town by break of day, with only one servant, making what haste he could towards the army, where he had order'd a rendezvous of some regiments of the horse, and from whence he sent a letter to the house of commons, to acquaint them, "That having the night before receiv'd a letter from some officers of his own regiment,
That the jealousy the troops had conceiv'd of
him, and of his want of kindness towards them,
was much abated, so that they believed, if he would forthwith come down to them, they would all by his advice be soon reclaim'd; upon this he had made all the haste he could, and did find,
that the soldiers had been abus'd by misinformation; and that he hop'd to discover the fountain
from whence it sprung; and in the mean time
desir'd that the general, and the other officers of the horse, or such as remain'd about the town,
might be immediately sent to their quarters; and he believed it would be very requisite, in order to the suppression of the late distempers, and for the prevention of the like for the future, to have a general rendezvous of the army, of which the general
"general would best consider, when he came down; which he wish'd might be hasten'd."

This account of Cromwell's management with the parliament, leads me to insert here what Sir Harbottle Grimston related to bishop Burnet, concerning him, as we have it in the first volume of the bishop's history, p. 45. During the contests between the army and the parliament (for we cannot exactly assign the time when this happen'd) two officers brought an account to Grimston, that at a meeting of the officers, it being propos'd to purge the army better, that they might know whom to confide in; Cromwell thereupon said, he was sure of the army, 'but there was another body that wanted more to be purg'd, namely the house of commons, and he believed the army only could do that. Grimston brought the officers to the lobby of the house, where they were resolved to justify what they had said; and the commons having then something in debate, he diverted it, saying, he had a matter of privilege of the highest nature to lay before them, which concern'd the being and freedom of the house; and then he accused Cromwell of a design to put a force upon them, and having his witnesses at the door, requested they might be examined. Accordingly they were brought to the bar, and justify'd all they had related to him, and gave a full account of what had pass'd at the meetings of the officers; which done they withdrew; when Cromwell falling down on his knees, made a solemn prayer to God, attesting his innocence, and his zeal for the interest of the house. This he did with great vehemence and many tears, and then made so long a speech in his own vindication, that he tired the house, and wrought so much on his party, that what the officers said, was so little credited, that if it had been moved, Sir Harbottle believed, that both he and they had been sent to the Tower. Cromwell however no sooner got out of the house, but resolving to trust himself himself no more with them, he hastened to the army; and a few days after he brought them up, and forc'd a great many from the house. 'Twas his opinion, it seems, as the bishop observes, with many in those times, that in great occasions, when some were call'd to extraordinary services, they were excused from the common rules of morality; which they thought was the case of the judges among the Israelites.

Another story related by Mr. Locke, in his and Mr. Memoirs relating to the life of Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, first earl of Shaftsbury, may be likewise proper to be here inserted. He tells us, it happen'd one morning that Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper calling upon Mr. Hollis (viz. after their reconciliation, which he also relates) in his way to the house, he found him in a great heat against Cromwell, saying, he was resolv'd to bring him to punishment. Sir A. A. shew'd him how dangerous such an attempt might be, earnestly dissuaded him from it, and told him it would be enough to get rid of him, by sending him with a command into Ireland, which, as things stood, he would be glad to accept. But this would not satisfy Hollis; and so when he came to the house, he brought the matter to a debate, and it was moved, that Cromwell, and those guilty with him, should be punished. Cromwell being then in the house, no sooner heard this, but he stole out, took horse, and posted to the army (which my author says, as he remembers, was at Triploe-Heath) where he informed them of what the Presbyterian party was doing in the house, and made such use of it to them, that they now united together under him, who forthwith led them away to London, giving out menaces against Hollis and his party, who, with Stapleton and some others, were fain to fly; and thereby the Independant party becoming the stronger, they as they call'd it, purged the house, and turn'd turn'd out the Presbyterians. Soon after Cromwell meeting Sir A. A. told him, I am beholden to you for your kindness to me; for you, I hear, were for letting me go without punishment; but your friend, God be thanked, was not wise enough to take your advice. But to return:
44

1647.

The king was all this while at Holmby: But the animosities between the parliament and army still continuing and increasing, the agitators feared the parliament would now for their own security receive him upon any terms, or rather put themselves under his protection, that they might the better subdue the army and reduce them to obedience. Wherefore, being instigated thereto by Cromwell, they on the 4th of June sent cornet Joyce, one of their body, with a party of horse, to take the king out of the hands of the parliament commissioners, and bring him away to the army. Accordingly, Joyce about midnight drew up his horse in order before Holmby-house, demanding entrance. Colonel Greaves, and major-general Brown, who being alarm'd, had doubled the guards, enquiring his name and business, he said his name was Joyce, a cornet in colonel Whalley's regiment; and his business was to speak with the king. Being ask'd from whom, he said, From myself, my errand is to the king, I must and I will speak with him. Greaves and Brown commanded their men within to stand to their arms; but they seeing them to be their fellow-soldiers of the same army, opened the gates, and shook hands with them as old friends. The cornet plac'd his sentinels at the commissioners chamber-doors, and went himself by the backstairs, directly to the king's bed-chamber. The grooms being much surpriz'd, desired him to lay aside his arms, and assured him, that in the morning he should speak with the king: But he with sword and pistol insisted to have the door opened, and made so much noise that it waked his majesty, who who sent him out word, That he would not rise nor speak with him till the morning; upon which the cornet retired in a huff. The king getting up early in the morning, sent for him, who with great boldness told his majesty, he was commanded to remove him. Whereupon the king desired the commissioners might be call’d; but Joyce said, they had nothing to do, but to return back to the parliament. Being ask’d for a sight of his instructions, he told his majesty he should see them presently; so drawing up his troop in the inner court, These, Sir, said he, are my instructions. The king having took a good view of them, and finding them to be proper men, well mounted and arm’d, told the cornet with a smile, His instructions were in fair characters, legible without spelling. Joyce then pressing the king to go along with him, his majesty refus’d, unless the commissioners might attend him; to which the cornet reply’d, He was very indifferent, they might go if they would: So the king being attended by the commissioners of the parliament, went along with Joyce, and was that night conducted by him to colonel Montague’s house at Hinchingbrook, and the next night to Sir John Cutt’s at Childersley near Cambridge. Here Fairfax, Cromwell, Ireton, Skippon, and many other officers came to wait upon the king, and some of them kisst his hand. Tis said, That Joyce being told, that the general was displeas’d with him, for taking the king from Holmby, he answer’d, That lieutenant-general Cromwell had given him orders at London to do all that he had done, and indeed Fairfax now resign’d himself entirely to Cromwell’s judgment, who led and governed him as he pleas’d. And though he was at first dissatisfy’d with this proceeding of Joyce, yet Cromwell soon appeased him, by representing to him, That nothing could have been done of greater advantage to the army and their generals, to the church and state, than what
The life of 1647.

What Joyce had been doing: That the king was on the point of making an accommodation with the parliament, who had determined to send colonel Groves to fetch him; and if Joyce had not fetched him, there would have been an end of both officers and army, and all the pains they had taken for the public good, would not only have been useless, but criminal.

Chap. VI.

From the king's seizure at Holmby, to his departure to the isle of Wight.

The parliament receiv'd the news of the king's seizure by the army, with the utmost amazement and consternation: But this was not all; for about this time, the army drew up a charge of high-treason against eleven members of the house of commons, viz. Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir John Clotworthy, Serjeant Glyn, Mr. Anthony Nickols, Mr. Walter Long, Sir William Lewis, Colonel Edward Harley, Sir William Waller, Colonel Maffey, and Sir John Maynard; for betraying the cause of the parliament, endeavouring to break and destroy the army, &c. This charge was accompanied with a declaration, shewing the reason of what they had done, affirming, that they were oblig'd by their duty so to do, as they tender'd the preservation of the publick cause, and securing the good people of England from being a prey to their enemies. The great end of this charge of treason, being rather to hinder these members, who were the chief of the Presbyterian party, from using their influence in the house (which was very great) in opposition to the proceedings of the army, than the proceeding capitally against them, they determined rather voluntarily to withdraw themselves, than to put the parliament or army to any further further trouble, or themselves to any more hazard.
Oliver Cromwell.

As these eleven members were the chief of the Presbyterian party in parliament; so at the head of the opposite party (who were all call'd Independents, tho' made up of men of different persuasions, as well as of real Independents) were lieutenant-general Cromwell, colonel Ludlow, John Lisle, Esq; Sir Henry Vane, Henry Marten, Esq; Sir Arthur Haslerigg, Sir Henry Mildmay, lord Grey of Groby, lord Monson, Anthony Stapely, Esq; Miles Corbet, Esq; &c. There was another party in the house of commons who declared for neither side, as Mr. Pierpoint, Bulstrode Whitelock, Esq; Oliver St. John, Esq; John Crew, Esq; Sir Thomas Widdrington, colonel Birch, Mr. Goodwyn, Sir John Hippesly, &c. Who sometimes voted with the Presbyterians, and sometimes with the Independents, as they thought conduc'd most to the service of the state; and generally they went with those who were for satisfaction and security, till it was known that the death of the king was meant by it.

Cromwell's great design, was to hinder any conjunction between the king and the Presbyterians; and having now gotten him into his own hands, he was for endeavouring his restoration, by means of the Independents, thinking that thereby liberty of conscience would be the better secured, which the Presbyterian hierarchy would not so well admit of. And indeed the king himself began to think that his condition was alter'd for the better, and to look upon the Independent interest as more consisting with Episcopacy than the Presbyterian, for that it might subsist under any form, which the other could not do. What encourag'd the king the more, was, that he was much more civilly treated since his being in the army, than he was before, whilst he was the parliament's prisoner at Holmby.
Holmby. He was now indeed to make his involuntary progress according to the motion of the army, and so at length was brought to Hampton-Court; but he was every where allow'd to appear in state and lustre, his nobility about him, his chaplains in waiting, and all servants permitted to attend in their proper places. The army had also sent an address to him full of protestations of duty, beseeching him, "That he would be content, for some time, to reside among them, until the affairs of the kingdom were put into such a posture, as he might find all things to his own content and security; which they infinitely desired to see as soon as might be, and to that purpose made daily instances to the parliament." Cromwell indeed thought fit at first to be somewhat up on the reserve in this matter, for fear of increasing the parliament's jealousy of him. The lord Clarendon tells us, That he and Ireton had been with his majesty, without either of them offering to kiss his hand; that the king used all the address he could towards them, to get some promise from them, as knowing them to have the greatest influence upon the army; but they were so reserved, and stood so much upon their guard, and spoke so few words, that nothing could be gather'd from what they said; and they desired to be excused for not seeing his majesty often, upon the great jealousies the parliament had of them, towards whom they professed all fidelity. But after some time, their behaviour towards his majesty was more free and open, they visited him more frequently, and had longer conferences with him; and Cromwell in particular is said to have promised him, "That if he and his party would sit still, and neither act or declare against the army, they would restore him, and make him the most glorious prince in Christen-"
Oliver Cromwell.

1647.

"the king into his hands, he had the parliament " in his pocket." His majesty was very sensible that Cromwell and Ireton bore the greatest sway in the army, and that general Fairfax had little or no influence upon it. We are inform'd, that his excellency conferred with the king in private, and in a particular manner offered him his service; but upon his taking leave, his majesty said to him, Sir, I have as good interest in the army as you: which expression, the general said, was more shocking, and occasioned him more grief and vexation, than all the troubles and fatigues he had endured thro' the whole war.

The news of the king's being in the army, and the civil treatment he met with from them, occasion'd the queen and prince of Wales, then in France, to dispatch Sir Edward Ford, who had married Ireton's sister, but had been an officer in the king's army from the beginning of the war, to found the design of the army, and to promote an agreement between the king and them. Sir John Berkley was likewise sent over upon the like errand; and 'twas in his instructions to procure a pass for Mr. John Alsburnham, to come and assist him in his negociation. Being on his way towards London, he was met by Sir Allen Appesly, who had been lieutenant-governour under him at Exeter; by whom he was acquainted, that he was sent from lieutenant-general Cromwell, and some other officers of the army, with letters and a cypher, as also particular instructions to desire him to call to mind his own discourse at a conference with colonel Lambert, and other officers, upon the surrender of Exeter; when having taken notice of the bitter reproaches cast on the king by those of the army, and supposing that such discourses were encourag'd in order to dispose men's minds for an alteration of the government; he said, "That it was not only a "most wicked, but difficult undertaking, if not "impossible impossible, for a few men, not of the greatest quality, to introduce a popular government, against the king, the nobility and gentry, the Presbyterians, and the genius of the nation, for so many ages accustomed to monarchy; and advis’d, that since the Presbyterians, who had begun the war upon many specious pretences, were found to have fought only their own advancements, by which means they had lost almost all their power and credit; the Independent party, who had no particular obligation to the crown, as many of the Presbyterians had, would make good what the Presbyterians had only pretended to, and restore the king and people to their just and ancient rights; which they were concern’d to do in point of prudence and interest, there being no means under heaven more likely to secure themselves, and obtain as much trust and power as subjects are capable of; whereas if they aim’d at more, it would be attended with a general hatred, and their own destruction. He was likewise order’d by Cromwell, to let Sir John know, “That tho’ to this discourse of his, they then gave only the hearing; yet they had since found by experience, that all, or the greatest part of it was reasonable, and they were resolv’d to act accordingly, as might be perceiv’d by what had already pass’d; and desir’d that he would present them humbly to the queen and prince, and be a suitor to them in their names, not to condemn them absolutely, but to suspend their opinion of them, and of their intentions, till their future carriage should make full proof of their integrity, of which they had already given some testimonies to the world; and that when he had perform’d this office, he would come back to England, and be an eye-witness of their proceedings.”
The parliament at this time fear'd nothing so much, as that the army would make a firm conjunction with the king, and unite with his party, of which there was so much shew; and many imprudent persons, who very much desir'd it, bragg'd too much of it; whereupon the two houses sent a committee to his majesty, with an address of another strain than they had lately us'd, making many protestations of duty, and declaring, "That if he was not in all respects treated as he ought to be; and as he desir'd, it was not their fault, "who were desirous he might be at full liberty, "and do what he would." The army at the same time was not without jealousy, that the king hearken'd to some secret propositions from the Presbyterian party, and design'd to make an absolute breach between the parliament and the army; which occasion'd Ireton to say to him, Sir, you have an intention to be arbitrator between the parliament and us, and we mean to be so between you and the parliament. The king, in the mean time finding himself courted on all hands, was so confident of his own importance, as to imagine himself able to turn the scale to what side soever he pleased. In this temper he was when Sir John Berkley came to him; which he did, after leave obtain'd from Cromwell, who also confirm'd with his own mouth what Sir Allen Appely had before communicated to Sir John, with this addition, "That he thought no man could enjoy his life and estate quietly, "unless the king had his right; which, be said, "they had already declared to the world in general terms, and would more particularly very soon, wherein they would comprize the several interests of the Royalists, Presbyterians, and Independents, as far as they were consistent with one another." Some time after, 'tis said, Sir John meeting him at Reading, as he was coming from the king at Caver'sham, Cromwell told him,
That he had lately seen the tenderest sight that ever his eyes beheld, which was the interview between the king and his children; and wept plentifully at the remembrance of it, saying, "That never man was so abus'd in his sinister opinion of the king, who he thought was the most upright and conscientious man in the three kingdoms; that the Independent party were infinitely oblig'd to him, for not consenting to the propositions sent to him at Newcastle, which would have totally ruin'd them, and which his majesty's interest seem'd to invite him to." Concluding with this wish, "That God would be pleas'd to look upon him, according to the sincerity of his heart towards the king."

The army in general, as well as Cromwell, appeared at this time to be very zealous for the king's interest, and yet they seem'd somewhat to suspect the reality of one another's intentions. Some of the principal agitators, with whom Sir John Berkley convers'd at Reading, declared to him their jealousy, that Cromwell was not sincere for the king, and desir'd him, if he found him false, to inform them of it, promising, that they would endeavour to set him right, either with or against his will. Major Huntingdon, an officer in Cromwell's regiment, who was entrusted by him to command the guard about his majesty, became wholly devoted to the royal interest, and by the king's order brought two general officers to Berkley, as persons in whom he might confide. These two discours'd frequently with him, and assur'd him, "That a conjunction with the king was universally desir'd by the officers and agitators, and that Cromwell and Ireton were great diffamblers, if they were not real in it; but that the army was so bent upon it at present, that they durst not shew themselves otherwise." They likewise inform'd him, "That proposals were drawn up by Ireton, wherein..."
Episcopacy was not requir'd to be abolish'd, nor any of the king's party wholly ruin'd, nor the militia to be taken away from the crown;" and advis'd, "That his majesty would without delay consent to them, there being no assurance of the army, which they had observ'd already to have changed more than once." Cromwell himself was also doubtful of the army. In all his conferences with Berkley, he appear'd exceeding desirous of a speedy agreement with the king, in somuch that he sometimes blam'd Ireton's slowness in perfecting the proposals, and his backwardness in coming up to his majesty's sense; and on the other hand would wish, that Sir John Berkley would act more frankly, and not tie himself up by narrow principles; always declaring, That he doubted the army would not persif in their good intentions towards the king.

By this time Mr. Ashburnham was arriv'd, to the king's great satisfaction. Sir John Berkley convers'd chiefly with the agitators; but Ashburnham was soon of another mind, and openly declar'd, That having always us'd the best company, he would not converse with such senseless fellows as the agitators; that if the officers could be gain'd, they would, without doubt, be able to command their own army; and that he determin'd to apply himself wholly to them. Hereupon there was soon observ'd a great familiarity between him and Wballey, who commanded the guard that attended the king, as also a close correspondence with Cromwell and his son-in-law Ireton, messages daily passing from the king to the head-quarters: Which soon gave the rest of the army a suspicion of some private treaty being carry'd on with the king; who being likewise encouraged by the Presbyterian party (the lord Lauderdale, and several of the city of London, assuring him, that they would oppose the army to the death) when the proposals were brought to him, and his concurrence

Mr. Ashburnham arrives.

And corresponds with Cromwell.

The king dislikes the army's proposals.
The LIFE of

1647.

concerne humbly desir'd by the army, he entertained their commissioners with very disobliger language, saying, That no man should suffer for his sake, and that he repented of nothing so much, as that he passed the bill against the earl of Strafford; and that he would have the church established according to law by the proposals; for there was nothing mention'd in them concerning church-government. The proposals were indeed much more moderate than those sent to him from the parliament; but he unhappily thought, they proceeded only from the necessity they had of him, and in discouraging with them, would frequently use these or the like expressions, You cannot do without me; you will fall to ruin, if I do not sustain you. Not only the officers of the army who were present, but the king's own party, appear'd exceedingly astonish'd at this kind of proceeding; whereupon he began to soften his former discourse, but it was too late; for colonel Rainsborough, who seem'd least of all to desire an agreement with him, immediately going out from the conference, went directly to the army, and gave them to understand what treatment their commissioners and proposals had met with from the king.

Let us now see how matters stood between the parliament, army, and city at this time. The city, who hated the army, had their militia settled on the 4th of May, in the management of the Presbyterians, who were very diligent in compleating their companies: But this was contrary to the design of the army, and judg'd to be a conspiracy against it; whereupon Fairfax, who in every thing was influenc'd by Cromwel, upon the 10th of June wrote a letter to the parliament, That the militia of the city of London might be put into the hands of such as were better affected to the army. This the parliament quietly submitted to, and July 23d repeal'd the ordinance of the 4th of May.

The
The common-council being hereupon assembled, resolv'd to petition the parliament against it, which they accordingly did on the 26th; and presently after, many thousand citizens, young men and apprentices, went in a body and deliver'd another petition, setting forth, "That to order the city's militia was the city's birth-right, belonging to them by charters confirm'd in parliament; for defence whereof, they had ventur'd their lives as far as the army; and therefore they desir'd, that the militia might be put again into the same hands, in which it was put with the parliament's and city's consent, by the ordinance of the 4th of May." Upon the reading of this petition, the house of peers immediately revoked the ordinance of the 23d of July, and renewed that of the 4th of May, and sent it down to the commons for their consent; which they durst not refuse, the apprentices behaving themselves so insolently, that they would scarce let the door of the house be shut, and some of them got in amongst them: And some time after, when the house broke up, the speaker was forc'd back into the chair, by the violence of the multitude, who detain'd him and the members, till they oblig'd them to pass a vote, That the king should come forthwith to London; and another, That he should be invited to come with honour, freedom, and safety. And then both houses adjourn'd for four days.

In this interval, several members, and the speakers of both houses, being apprehensive of danger from such tumults, repair'd to the army, complaining of the violences upon the parliament. The army could not have desir'd a greater advantage than this gave them, who therefore receiv'd the two speakers with the members, as so many angels sent from heaven for their good, shewed them all imaginable respect, professed all submission to them, as to the parliament of England, and declared, That they would re-establish them in their full power, or perish in the attempt. After the four days adjournment, the remainder of the parliament met; and both houses missing their speakers, chose them new ones, and passed the following votes. First, That the king should come to London. Secondly, That the militia of London should be authorized to raise forces for the defence of the city. Thirdly, That power be given to the same militia to choose a general. Fourthly, That the eleven members impeached by the army, should resume their seats in parliament.

The citizens armed with these powers, proceeded to raise forces under the command of Waller, Massey, and Pointz; but they were very much discouraged in their proceedings by the news of the general rendezvous of the army upon Hounslow-Heath, where the two speakers appeared with their maces, and such members as accompanied them, viz. the earls of Northumberland, Salisbury, and Kent, the lord Grey of Werke, the lord Howard, the lord Warton, the earl of Mulgrave, and the lord Say, and six lords more, with the earl of Manchester, their speaker; and about a hundred members of the house of commons, with their speaker, Mr. Lenthal. Besides, the borough of Southwark was generally for the army, which was now marching towards London, to restore the members who fled to them, to their places and authorities. Part of the army seized upon the block-house at Gravesend, and block'd up the city by water towards the East, and the general with the rest of the army, towards the West. Upon this, the aldermen and common-council of the city deferted their three generals, and sent to Fairfax for a pacification; which he granted them upon these conditions. First, That they should desert the parliament then sitting, and the eleven members. Secondly, That they should recall their late declaration. Thirdly, That they should relinquish their present militia. Fourthly, That they should should deliver up to the general all their forts, and the tower of London. Fifthly, That they should disband all the forces they had lately raised, and do all things else, which were necessary for the publick tranquility.
Oliver Cromwell.

The next day, Cromwell march'd to Westminster, and placed the guards in the court, in the hall, and even at the doors of the two houses: and a little after, general Fairfax conducted the several members who had fled to the army, to their seats in parliament; where they annulled all the acts and orders, which had passed since the 26th of July. Two days after, the army march'd, as it were, in triumph thro' the city, the general leading the avant-guard, major-general Skippon the main body, and Cromwell the rear-guard; and all the soldiers having laurel-branches in their hats. After this pompous march, the army was distributed into quarters, in Kent, Surrey, and Essex; and thus they surrounded the city.

The city being subdued, and the parliament and army seemingly reconciled, there now arose differences in the army itself. The agitators, no longer inclin'd to an agreement with the king, were very much disturbed at some of the great officers, who were still for promoting such an agreement: And many in the army complained of the intimacy of Sir John Berkley and Mr. Adburnham, with the chief officers of the army, declaring to the council of agitators, that the doors of Cromwell and Ireton were open to them, when they were shut to those of the army. Cromwell was very uneasy at these discourses, and inform'd the king's party of them, telling Adburnham and Berkley, "That if he were an honest man, he had said enough of the sincerity of his intentions; and if he were not, nothing was enough; and therefore he conjured them, as they tendered the king's service, not to come so frequently to his quarters, but to send privately to him; the suspicion 1647. "suspicion of him being growing so great, that he was afraid to lie in them himself." Thus the agitators, who were supposed to be first set up by Cromwell to oppose the parliament's design of disbanding, began to be very troublesome to him, and were at length set against him, that he was forced for his own safety to make his peace with them, by abandoning the king's interest: as we shall see hereafter.
S8 2fe LIFE os

About three weeks after the army enter'd London, the parliament thought fit to address themselves to the king, in the old propositions of Newcastle, some particulars concerning the Scots only excepted. His majesty advising with Berkley and Abburnham, and some others about him, upon this matter, 'twas concluded to be unsafe for him to treat with the parliament, whilst the army were the masters: And some say, that instructions were given by Cromwell and other officers, That if the king would assent to their proposals, lower than those of the parliament, the army would settle him again in his throne. However it was, the king thought fit to wave the parliament's propositions, or any treaty upon them, and desired a personal treaty upon the proposals of the army. The officers of the army having seen his answer before it was sent, seem'd to be very well pleased with it, and promised to do all they could to procure a personal treaty; and accordingly Cromwell and Ireton, and many of their party in the house, press'd his majesty's desires with great earnestness; but, contrary to their expectations, they met with a vigorous opposition from such as had already conceiv'd a jealousy of their private agreement with the king, and now thought themselves sure of it; the suspicions of them growing so strong, that they were look'd upon as betrayers of the cause, and lost almost all their friends in the parliament. The army likewise, which lay then about Putney, were no less dissatisfy'd with their pro-proceedings, of which they receiv'd daily information from those that came to them from London; so that the agitators began to complain openly in council, both of the king and the malignants about him, and declar'd, "That since the king had rejected their proposals, they were no farther engaged to him, but that they were now to consult their own safety, and the publick good, and having the power devolved upon them by the decision of the sword, to which both parties had appeal'd, and being convinc'd that monarchy was inconsistent with the good of the nation, they resolve to use their endeavours to reduce the government of England to the form of a commonwealth." They also designed to have seiz'd Ashburnham and Berkley, for negotiating the treaty they suppos'd to have been carried on between the king and Cromwell; and carrying their fury yet further, were resolv'd to wrest the king out of the hands of the two traitors, as they call'd Cromwell and Ireton. These things struck a great terror into these two leaders, so that they thought it necessary to draw the army to a general rendezvous, which they could the better bring about, because most of the great officers were still well affected to the king, and disliked these proceedings of the agitators, whose exorbitant power they hoped by that means to suppress. But the agitators having notice of the intended rendezvous, and guessing at the design of it, us'd their utmost endeavours to prevent it, and resolved before-hand to seize on the person of the king.

CROMWELL in the mean time acquainted the king with the danger he was in, and assuring him of his real service, protested to him that it was not in his power to undertake for his security in the place where he now resided. Hereupon the king was resolv'd to make his escape from Hampton-Court; and some advised him to secure his person by leaving the kingdom: But to this he object'd, that that the rendezvous being appointed for the next week, he was unwilling to quit the army till that was over; because, if the superior officers prevailed, they would be able to make good their engagements; if not, they must apply themselves to him for their own security. Several other advices were offer'd him; but he at last resolved to go to the isle of Wight, being very probably, as Ludlow observes, recommended thither by Cromwell, who, as well as the king, had a good opinion of colonel Hammond the governour, who was one of the army. Pursuant to this resolution, the king left Hampton-Court in the night, Berkley and Abburnham with some others accompanying him; and on the 13th of November they all went over to the isle of Wight, being conducted thither by Hammond himself, who the day before came to wait on his majesty at Titchfield.

CHAP. VII.

From the king's escape from Hampton-Court, and departure to the isle of Wight, to the breaking out of the second civil war.

The parliament being inform'd of the king's withdrawing himself from Hampton-Court, was in a terrible consternation, and immediately pass'd an ordinance, declaring, "That it should be confiscation of estate, and loss of life, for any to harbour, or conceal the king's person, without giving information to the parliament." And being now mostly devoted to the army, they caused some of the most noted presbyterians houses to be searched; and sent post to all the ports of the kingdom, "That they might be shut, and no person be permitted to embark, lest the king in disguise should transport himself." And a proclamation was published, for the banishing all such as had ever Cromwell ever born arms for the king, from the city, or any place within twenty miles of it. But within two days their fears were all removed by Cromwell's informing the house, "That he had receiv'd letters from colonel Hammond, of the king's coming to the Isle of Wight, and that he remain'd there in Carisbrook-Castle till the parliament's pleasure should be known." He at the same time assure'd them, "That colonel Hammond was so honest a man, and so much devoted to their service, that they need not fear his being corrupted by any body." And all this relation he made, says my lord Clarendon, with so unusual a gaiety, that all men concluded, that his majesty was where Cromwell desired he should be.

About this time the agitators of nine regiments of horse, and seven of foot, presented a writing to the general, and afterwards to the parliament, declaring:

1. "That the people being unequally distributed by counties, cities and boroughs, for election of their deputies in parliament, ought to be more indifferently proportioned according to the number of Inhabitants.

2. "That this present parliament be dissolved by the last day of September next.

3. "That the people do of course chuse themselves a parliament once in every two years.

4. "That the power of this, and all other future representatives is inferior only to theirs who chuse them, and extends, without the consent of any other person, to the enacting, altering, and repealing of laws; to the erecting and abolishing of offices and courts; to the appointing, removing, and calling to account, magistrates and officers of all degrees; to the making war and peace; to the treating with foreign states; and generally to whatsoever is not reserved by those
The LIFE of 1647.

"those represented to themselves." And here they declare, "That impressing or constraining any to serve in the war, is against freedom, and not allowed to the representatives.

"That in all laws every person be bound alike; and that tenure, estate, charter, degree, birth, or place, do not confer any exception from the ordinary course of legal proceedings whereunto others are subjected." And "That the laws must be equal and good, and not destructive to the safety and well-being of the people.

"These they declar'd to be their native rights, which they were resolv'd to maintain, and not to depend, for the settlement of their peace and freedom, upon him that intended their bondage [meaning the king] and brought a cruel war upon them." Thus the agitators grew still bolder, and were resolv'd to accomplish their designs; and these with their adherents were now called Levellers, and occasioned great disturbance to the parliament and in the army, as likewise the trial and death of the king. They were call'd Levellers in derision only, and because they held that no person, of whatever rank, ought to be exempted from the ordinary course of legal proceedings; but as for what is said of their being against all degrees of honour or riches, it is utterly false.

The time for the general rendezvous being come, they who were of this party, to distinguish themselves, appear'd every one with a paper in his hat, with these words written upon it, The rights of England, and the consent of the people; signifying thereby, that their design was to abolish, not only monarchy, but also the house of peers, and to establish a pure democracy. This was what colonel Rainborough, one of their leaders, assisted by Eyre and Scot, went about soliciting from one regiment to another, stirring up the soldiers against Fairfax,
Oliver Cromwell.

Fairfax, Cromwell, and the other general officers. But Cromwell was resolv'd to endeavour the suppression of this licence: For which purpose, being accompany'd with divers officers, he with a wonderful briskness and vivacity, rode up to one of the regiments, which wore the distinguishing marks, and commanded them to take them out of their hats; which they refusing to do, he caus'd several of them to be seiz'd, and knock'd two or three of them on the head with his own hand; and then the others hearts failing, they submitted to him. He order'd one of those whom he had seiz'd to be shot dead upon the place, and deliver'd the rest into the hands of the marshal, and having dispers'd the army to their quarters, wrote an account of his proceedings to the parliament; who being very desirous to have this spirit quell'd in the army, return'd him the thanks of the house.

The levellers being thus subdu'd, and the parliament and army being now pretty much of a temper, 'twas agreed, that a personal treaty should be offer'd to his majesty, on condition, that as a pledge of his future sincerity, he would forthwith grant his royal assent to four preliminary bills. The first of which was for investing the militia in the two houses: The second, for revoking all proclamations and declarations against the parliament: The third, for making void of all such titles of honour, as had been conferred by his majesty, since his leaving the parliament; and that for the future, none should be granted to any person without consent of the parliament: And the fourth, that the houses should have power to adjourn themselves as they should think fit. The Scotch being not included in this treaty, their commissioners sent a large declaration in very high language to the two houses at Westminster, protesting against the sending of the four bills, and pressing for a personal treaty with the king at London, upon such propositions as should be agreed on by the advice and consent of the two kingdoms. But the parliament was to be aw'd only by the army; and so they order'd the printer of the Scotch declaration to be committed, and then sent them back an answer full of reproof and contempt.

Before we see what reception the four bills met with from his majesty, let us observe how matters pass'd in the army since the late rendezvous. Ludlow, as great an enemy to Cromwell as to the king, gives us the clearest account of the sudden turn of affairs there, which was to the great damage, and even the ruin of the king's interest; whom therefore I shall follow upon this occasion.

He informs us, that colonel Hammond and Mr. Ashburnham had frequent conferences with the king, who had made such promises to Hammond, that he express'd his earnest desire, that the army might resume their power, and rid themselves of the agitators, whose authority, he said, he never lik'd. To this end he sent one Mr. Traughton, his chaplain, to the army, to advise them to make use of those who attended on him, to the army, with letters of compliment to Fairfax, and others of greater confidence to Cromwell and Ireton. He also wrote to them himself, "Conjuring them by their engagements, their honour and conscience, to come to a speedy agreement with the king, and not to expose themselves to the fantastick giddiness of the agitators." Sir John Berkley was appointed by the king, in pursuance of Hammond's advice, to go over to the army; who taking with him Mr. Henry Berkley his cousin, went over from the island with a pass from the governour of Cowes. Being on his way towards the army, he met Mr. Traughton, on his return, between Bagshot and Windsor, who inform'd him, That he had no good good news to carry back to his majesty, the army having enter'd into new resolutions concerning his person. He had not gone much farther, before he was met by cornet Joyce, who told him, "That he was astonish'd at his design of going to the army, for that it had been debated amongst the agitators, whether, in justification of themselves, the king should be brought to a trial;" of which opinion he declared himself to be. Sir John however resolve'd to go to the army, and being arriv'd at Windsor, went to the general's quarters, where the officers of the army were assembled. Being admitted, he deliver'd his letters to the general, who receiving them, order'd him to withdraw. Having waited about half an hour, he was call'd in, when the general, with some severity in his looks, told him, That they were the parliament's army, and therefore could say nothing to the king's motion about peace, but must refer those matters, and the king's letters to their consideration. Sir John then look'd upon Cromwell, Ireton, and the rest of his acquaintance; but they saluted him very coldly, and shewing him colonel Hammond's letter to them, smil'd with disdain upon it.

Finding himself thus disappointed, Berkley went to his lodging; where having staid two hours without any company, he at last order'd his servant to go out, and see if he could find any of his acquaintance. The servant going out, met with one who was a general officer, who bid him tell his master, that he would meet him in such a place at midnight. They being accordingly met, the officer acquainted Berkley in general, that he had no good news to tell him; and then proceeding to particulars, said, "You know, that I and my friends engag'd ourselves to you; that we were zealous for an agreement, and if the rest were not so, we were abus'd: That since the tumults in the army, we did mistrust Cromwell and Ireton;" 66 "Io\u201d, whereof I informed you. I come now to tell you, that we mistrust neither, and that we are resolved, notwithstanding our engagement,
to destroy the king and his posterity; to which purpose Ireton has made two propositions this afternoon; one, that you should be sent prisoned to London; the other, that none should speak with you upon pain of death; and I do now hazard my life by doing it. The way design'd to ruin his majesty, is to send eight hundred of the most disaffected in the army to secure his person, and then to bring him to a trial,
and I dare think no farther. This will be done
in ten days; and therefore if the king can ef-cape, let him do it as he loves his life."

Sir John being exceedingly troubled at this relation, ask'd his friend the reason of this change,
seeing the king had done all things in compliance with the army, and the officers were become superior since the last rendezvous. Whereupon he gave him this account: "That though one of the mutineers was shot to death, eleven more imprison'd, and the rest in appearance over-aw'd, yet they were so far from being so in reality, that two thirds of the army had been since with Cromwell and Ireton, to let them know, that tho' they were sure to perish in the enterprize, they would leave nothing unattempted to bring the whole army
to their sense; and if all fail'd, they would make a division in the army, and unite with any who would assist them in the destruction of their opposers. That Cromwell and Ireton reason'd thus with themselves, If the army divide, the greatest part will join with the Presbyterians, and will most probably prevail to our ruin; or we shall be oblig'd in such a manner to apply ourselves to the king, as rather to beg than offer any assistance;
which if the king shall give, and be so fortunate
as to prevail; if he shall then pardon us, it will
be
Oliver Cromwell. 67

"be all we can expect, and more than we can assure ourselves of: And thereupon concluded, That if they could not bring the army to their sense, it was best to comply with them, a division being utterly destructive to both." In pursuance therefore of this resolution, lieutenant-general Cromwell employ'd all his thoughts and endeavours to make his peace with the party that was most set against the king; pretending, as he knew well enough how to do on such occasions, That the glory of this world had so dazzled his eyes, that he could not discern clearly the great works that the Lord was doing. He also sent comfortable messages to the prisoners he had seiz'd at the late rendezvous, assuring them, that nothing should be done to their prejudice; and by these and the like arts, he perfected his reconciliation with the levelling party.

Sir John Berkley returning to his lodging, dispatch'd his cousin to the isle of Wight with two letters; one to colonel Hammond, giving a general account, and doubtful judgment of affairs in the army; another in cypher, with a particular relation of the conference he had with the forementioned general officer, and a most earnest supplication to his majesty, to think of nothing but his immediate escape. The next morning he sent colonel Cook to Cromwell, to acquaint him that he had letters and instructions to him from the king: But Cromwell return'd him answer by the messenger, That he durst not see him, it being very dangerous to them both; assuring him, that he would serve the king as long as he could do it without his own ruin; but he desir'd, that it might not be expected, that he should perish for his sake.

Thus we have seen the motives, that prevailed on this famous general to abandon the king's interest. And much the same account is given by Salmonet, who will not at all be suspected of being partial to Cromwell: So that if he hitherto acted sincerely
sincerely in his design to serve the king, as is most probable, they who charge him with having contrived his ruin from the beginning of the civil wars, ascribe to him more refined and more ambitious views than he really had. He was indeed ambitious enough, and was as good as any at the art of dissimulation: But certainly nothing hinders; but a dissimulator may sometimes be in earnest; and his ambition might be gratify'd by the private treaty, that was supposed to be carried on between him and the king, by stipulating such honours and advancements for himself and family, as such a service (viz. restoring the king to his throne) might reasonably lay claim to.

And here I cannot omit another account, that is given by some, of Cromwell's falling off from the king, and deserting his interest. They, tell us, that there was a report, that Cromwell made a private article with the king, That if his majesty clos'd with the army's proposals, he should be made earl of Essex, knight of the garter, and first captain of the horse-guards; and Ireton was to be made lieutenant of Ireland. Other honours and employments were likewise stipulated for Cromwell's family and friends. But the king was so uxorious, that he would do nothing without the advice of his queen, who not liking the proposal, he sent her a letter to acquaint her, That though he assented to the army's proposals, yet if by so doing he could procure peace, it would be easier then to take off Cromwell, than now he was the head that govern'd the army. Cromwell, who had his spies upon every motion of the king, intercepted this letter, and thereupon resolv'd never to trust the king more. This indeed is said to have happen'd before the king left Hampton-Court: For upon this they tell us, that Cromwell fearing he could not manage his designs, if the king were so near the parliament and city as Hampton-Court, gave him private information, that he was in no safety there, by reason of the hatred which the agitators bore him; and that he would be more secure in the isle of Wight. Hereupon the king, whilst the parliament and Scotch commissioners were debating his answer to their propositions, made his escape from Hampton-Court; as before related.

I can say nothing to the truth of this story, but leave it to the reader to judge of it as he thinks fit. Only thus much I may observe, that F. Orleans says, 'Twas believ'd in France, that the king had deceiv'd Cromwell; though he makes this to be purely the effect of Cromwell's artifice. And the lord Clarendon speaks of Cromwell's complaining that the king could not be trusted, though he makes his whole carriage towards his majesty to be nothing but hypocrisy and dissimulation, in order to bring about his own designs. However, I shall set down his words. Ashburnbam and Berkley, says he, receiv'd many advertisements (which was a little before the king's escape) from some officers with whom they had most convers'd, and who would have been glad that the king might have been restor'd by the army, for the preferments, which they expected might fall to their share. 'That Cromwell and Ireton resolv'd never to trust the king, or do any thing towards his restoration.' And a little after, he says, That Cromwell himself expostulated with Mr. Ashburnbam, and complain'd, 'That the king could not be trusted, and that he had no affection or confidence in the army, but was jealous of them, and of all the officers; that he had intrigues in the parliament, and treaties with the Presbyterians of the city, to raise new troubles; that he had concluded a treaty with the Scotch commissioners to engage the nation again in blood: And therefore he would not be answerable, if any thing fell out amiss, and contrary to expectation.'
A remarkable discourse between him and lord Broghill.

Agreeable enough to this account is the relation given by the author of the memoirs of the lord Broghill, of a discourse that passed between the said lord and Cromwell, whilst he was in Ireland, in 1650. He informs us, that the lord Broghill being in discourse with Cromwell and Ireton, fell upon the subject of the king's death: Cromwell said, If he [the king] had followed his own mind, and had had trusty servants about him, he bad fool'd them all: Adding, We had once an inclination to have come to terms with him, but something that happened drew us off from it. The lord Broghill seeing they were both in a good humour, ask'd them, Why, if they were inclined to close with him, they had not done it? Upon which Cromwell frankly told him, The reason of our inclination to come to terms with him, was, we found the Scots and Presbyterians began to be more powerful than we, and were strenuously endeavouring to strike up an agreement with the king, and leave us in the lurch; wherefore we thought to prevent them by offering more reasonable conditions: But while we were busied with these thoughts, there came a letter to us from one of our spies, who was of the king's bed-chamber, acquainting us, that our final doom was decreed that day: What it was he could not tell, but a letter was gone to the queen with the contents of it, which letter was sewed up in the skirt of a saddle, and the bearer of it would come with the saddle upon his head about ten o'clock the following night to the Blue-Boar-Inn in Holborn, where he was to take horse for Dover. The messenger knew nothing of the letter in the saddle, but some one in Dover did. We were then at Windsor; and immediately upon the receipt of the letter from our spy, Ireton and I resolved to take a trusty fellow with us, and in troopers' habits to go to the inn; which accordingly we did, and set our man at the gate of the inn to watch. The gate was shut, but the wicket open, and our man staid to give us notice when anyone came with a saddle upon his head. Ireton and I sat in a box near the wicket, and call'd for a can of beer, and then another, drinking in that disguise till ten o'clock, when our sentinel gave us notice that the man with the saddle was come; upon which we immediately rose; and when the man was leading out his horse saddled, we came up to him with our swords drawn, and told him we were to search all who went in and out there; but as he look'd like an honest fellow, we would only search his saddle; which we did, and found the letter we look'd for; and opening it, read the contents, in which the king acquainted the queen, he was now courted by both the factions, the Scotch Presbyterians and the army; that which of them bid fairest for him should have him; that he thought he shou'd close sooner with the Scots than the other. Upon which we speeded to Windsor, and finding we were not likely to have any tolerable terms from the king, we immediately resolved to ruin him.

For a conclusion, I shall set down what Dr. Wellwood, in his memoirs, says, concerning this matter. "As every thing, says he, did contribute to the fall of king Charles I., so did every thing contribute to the rise of Cromwell: And as there was no design at first against the king's life, so it is probable that Cromwell had no thoughts, for a long time, of ever arriving at what he afterwards was. It is known, he was once in treaty with the king, after the army had carried his majesty away from Holmby-house, to have restored him to the throne; which probably he would have done, if the secret had not been like to take vent, by the indiscretion of some about the king; which push'd Cromwell on to prevent his own, by the ruin of the king."

However it was (for these things must still remain under some confusion) it is certain, as the lord Clarendon observes, that a few days after the king's king's departure from Hampton-Court, and after it was known he was in the isle of Wight, there was a meeting of the general officers of the army at Windsor (very probably the same which Ludlow mentions, into which Sir John Berkley was admitted) where Cromwell and Ireton were present, to consider what should now be done with the king: And 'twas resolved, That he should be prosecuted for his life as a criminal person. This resolution, however, was a great secret, whereof the parliament had not the least notice or suspicion; but was, as it had been, to be led on by degrees to do what it had never designed.

The parliament's commissioners being arrived in the isle of Wight, presented the four preliminary bills with the propositions on them to his majesty; and the next day the Scotch commissioners waited on the king, and entered their protestation to this purpose, "That they had endeavoured all ways and means with the parliament of England, for furthering a happy peace; but having seen the propositions and bills brought to his majesty, which they apprehended prejudicial to religion, the crown, and the union between the two kingdoms; they therefore, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, declared their dissent." The king having no mind to pass the four bills, and guessing what might thence ensue, began to think of making his escape. And general Fairfax sent a letter to the house of commons to acquaint them, that there had been some meeting in the isle of Wight, with an intention to rescue the king; for which reason he had sent orders to the governor, to have a strict guard upon his majesty's person. Whereupon the parliament agreed, that his excellency be required to take special care, for securing the king's person in the castle of Carisbrooke, and that Hammond should obey his farther orders and directions.
The commissioners of the parliament were by this time come back with the king's answer, which imported, That he bad refused to pass the bills, or to make a composition in that way; but bad barely offered a personal treaty. Upon this there followed a long debate in the house, and many severe and bitter speeches were made against the king. Among the rest, Cromwell declar'd, "That the king was a man of great parts and great understanding; but withal so great a dissembler, and so false a man, that he was not to be trusted." And thereupon he rehearsed several particulars whilst he was in the army: That the king wished such and such things might be done; which being done to gratify him, he was displeased, and complained of it: That whilst he professed with all solemnity, that he referred himself wholly to the parliament, and depended only on their wisdom and counsel, for settling and composing the distractions of the kingdom, be at the same time bad secret treaties with the Scotch commissioners, bow he might embroil the nation in a new war, and destroy the parliament: Concluding, "That they might trouble themselves no further with sending messages or farther propositions to the king, but that they might enter upon those counsels, which were necessary towards the settlement of the kingdom, without having farther recourse to him." Those of his party seconded this motion with new reproaches upon the person of the king; and after several days spent in passionate debates on this matter, the house of commons voted, First, "That they will make no farther applications or addresses to the king. Secondly, That no addresses or applications be made to the king by any person whatsoever, without leave from the parliament. Thirdly, That they will receive to more messages from the king; and that no person do presume to bring any message from him to the parliament, or any other person. Fourthly, That the person or persons who shall make breach of these orders, shall incur the penalty of high treason. And to these votes the lords soon after agreed.

Some give a larger account of the speeches of Cromwell and Ireton in this grand debate. They say, that Ireton was the first that spake with warmth, and that Cromwell seconded him; and that from the king's refusing to sign the four acts, they inferred, "That he had sufficiently declared himself for arbitrary government:" and alleged, "That he was no longer the protector, but the tyrant of his people; and consequently, that they were no longer his subjects, and that they ought to govern without him; that their long patience had availed nothing; and that it was expected from their zeal to their country, that they should take such resolutions, as were worthy of an assembly with whom the nation had entrusted their safety." They add, that as these two persons were not only members of the house, but also chiefs in the army; after they had first spoken under the former character, they spake again in the other, to this effect: That they were well persuaded of the parliament's good intentions, and were assured, that without suffering themselves to be amused any longer, they would defend the nation by their own proper authority, and by the courage of those valiant men, that were enrolled under their banners, who by their mouths gave them assurances of their fidelity, which nothing could shake. But have a care, said they, that you do not give the army, who sacrifice themselves for the liberty of the nation, any grounds to suspect you of betraying them; and don't oblige them to look for their own safety, and that of the nation, in their own strength, which they desire to owe to nothing, but to the steadiness and vigour of your resolutions. This was a bold speech, if true; and 'tis farther said, that Cromwell, at the conclusion of it, clapt his hand upon his sword.

Thus the parliament and army were united against the king; and now colonel Rainborough, one of the chief of the Levellers, was appointed admiral of the fleet; and two or three members of the house of commons of that party were sent down to the head quarters at Windsor, with orders to discharge from custody captain Reynolds, and some others, who had been imprisoned by the officers of the army, for endeavouring to effect that which they themselves were now doing; and to exhort the officers to use their utmost endeavours towards a speedy settlement.

But notwithstanding this conjunction of the parliament and army, they could not enjoy their power and authority without great disturbance and opposition. The votes of non-attendance had exceedingly enraged the Presbyterians as well as the royal party; and the people in general began to be very uneasy and discontented. Taxes and impositions were continually increased, and became almost an insupportable burden to the nation, and yet there was no likelihood of coming to a settlement for the ease of these grievances; and most believed there would never be any till the king was restor'd. Upon this, the people in many parts of the kingdom began to exert themselves in the behalf of their sovereign, who, however closely confined in the isle of Wight, still held a correspondence in England, and had intelligence from thence. Several petitions were brought to the parliament by great numbers of people, in a tumultuous manner, for a personal treaty with the king; of which the chief were those of Surry, Essex and Kent. And in many places, the people began to think of taking up arms for compassing these designs. Besides, the Scots, pursuant to their treaty with the king, were making all possible preparations for raising an army;
my; wherein the Presbyterians and Cavaliers join'd; tho' with different views; and the Presbyterians in England, discours'd freely of great hopes from the other kingdom. Thus the dark clouds began to gather apace, and in a short time a second civil war infested the whole nation.

In the mean time, as Ludlow tells us, lieutenant-general Cromwell procur'd a meeting of several leading men of the Presbyterian and Independant parties, both members of parliament and ministers, at a dinner in Westminster, in order to promote a reconciliation between the two interests: But he found it a work too hard for him to heal the differences and animosities of these two prevailing parties, one of which would endure no superior, the other no equal; so that this meeting came to nothing.

Another conference was by his contrivance held in King-street, between those call'd the grandees of the house and army, and the commonwealth's-men; in which the grandees, of whom Cromwell was the head, deliver'd themselves with some uncertainty, and would not declare their opinions either for a monarchical, aristocratical or democratical government, maintaining that any of them might be good in themselves, or for the nation, according as providence should direct: Whilst the commonwealth's-men would have it, that monarchy was neither good in itself, nor for the nation, and us'd several arguments to confirm their opinion, recommending at the same time the establishment of an equal commonwealth; notwithstanding which the lieutenant-general profess'd himself for the present to be unresolv'd; and the next day passing by Ludlow in the house, he told him, That he was indeed convinced of the desirableness of what was propos'd, but not of the feasibleness of it.

Cromwell, however, in these times of difficulty and danger, thought fit to court the commonwealth party, and to that end invited some of them to confer with him at his chamber. The next time he came to the house of commons, he inform'd Ludlow of it, who freely told him, That he knew how to cajole and give them good words, when he had occasion to make use of them. Whereupon with some passion he said, They were a proud sort of people, and only considerable in their own conceits. At another time he complain'd to Ludlow, as they were walking in the Palace-yard, of the unbappiness of his condition, having made the greatest part of the nation his enemies, by adhering to a just cause: But his greatest trouble he said was, That many who were engag'd
Oliver Cromwell. 77

in the same cause with him, had entertain'd a jealousy and suspicion of him; which he affirm'd to be a great discouragement to him. This shews, that notwithstanding his late reconciliation with those call'd Levellers, they still suspected he was not true to their cause; and yet, that he found himself under a necessity of keeping as fair with them as possible.

Tumults and insurrections still increasing, and all things seeming to threaten a new war, Cromwell thought it likewise necessary to preserve a good understanding between the parliament and army.
He therefore got the general to write to the house
of lords, to assure them of the army's submission,
and that they would act nothing but in concert with the two houses, and by their order. Being likewise afraid of the city, he propos'd in the house of commons to unite the interests of the parliament, the city, and the army, and to make them (as he said) invincible, by making them inseparable. So a treaty was set on foot, in which indeed the army
was not mention'd, only that the two regiments
that had come into the city upon some disturbance
there, should be withdrawn; but the treaty only mention'd the two houses, and the city: And this conjunction was sufficient for Cromwell at present;
for he thereby prevented the union which the city
was upon the point of concluding with the Scotch royalists;

1648.
The LIFE of

1648.

royalists; and besides, the power which the army had in the house, was at this time sufficient to secure the city to them. But let us now see, how the second civil war was manag'd; and the great share of success our lieutenant-general had therein.

CHAPEL. VIII.

The second civil war, and Cromwell's actions in it.

The first that actually took up arms, were the Welsh; and this they did under the conduct of major-general Laugborn, colonel Poyer and colonel Powel, who had all three been formerly very zealous in acting on the parliament's side; but being now to be disbanded by order of the council of war, they refus'd to obey; and the better to secure themselves, declar'd for the king, and acted by commission and powers from the prince of Wales. Major-general Stradling, and other royalists, joining with Laugborn, he soon had the appearance of a considerable army, which very shortly enabled him to possess himself of the town and castles of Pembroke and Tenby; at which time Chepstow Castle was likewise surpriz'd by Sir Nicholas Kemister. The preparations in Kent for a war were not less formidable; for great numbers in that country rendezvousing near Rochester, they chose Goring earl of Norwich, who was then with them, for their general; and they soon receiv'd a considerable addition to their strength, by great numbers of apprentices and reform'd officers and soldiers daily flocking from London to their quarters; which so frighted the two houses, that they presently restor'd to the city their militia; and Skippon being re-admitted to the command of their forces, they interrupted the communication with Kent, by placing guards upon the passages of the river. The increase increase of the Kentish forces so animated the seamen, that a considerable part of the navy, with captain Batten, sometime vice-admiral to the earl of Warwick, revolted from the parliament, and put themselves under the power of prince Charles. But the fiercest storm was threatened from the preparations in the North, where Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and others of the king's party, having surpriz'd the strong town of Berwick, and Sir Philip Musgrave, and Sir Thomas Glenham, that of Carlisle, had rais'd a considerable body to join with the Scots; who were now about to enter England with a powerful army. Besides this, the earl of Holland, with the duke of Buckingham, the lord Francis his brother, the earl of Peterborough, and some other persons of quality, having form'd a party of about five hundred horse with some foot, for his majesty's service, appear'd with them near Kingston, and declar'd against the parliament. Several castles were seiz'd and declar'd for the king; and among the rest Pomfret was artfully surpriz'd by major Morrice: And there was scarce a county in England, where there was not some association forming to appear in arms for the king.

These vigorous preparations for a war became very formidable to those at Westminster; who hereupon appointed a committee of safety for the commonwealth, which daily sat at Derby-house, and consist of twenty persons, viz. seven lords, and thirteen of the house of commons, of whom lieutenant-general Cromwell was one. This committee had power given them to suppress all tumults and insurrections, and for that end to raise forces as they saw occasion. And then for the more speedy suppression of the several insurrections, the army was divided, and small parties sent to those places where the royalists were weakest. Fairfax, Lambert and Cromwell commanded the rest, every one marching a several way; Fairfax into Kent, Lambert into 1648.
The Life of

Several insurrections quell’d.

The Life of

The earl of Holland and duke of Buckingham were soon defeated by a party of horse and foot that was sent after them, under the command of Sir Michael Livesey. The earl was taken prisoner; the duke, after losing his brother, the lord Francis, narrowly escap’d, and went over to France. The earl of Warwick, with the fleet equipped for him by the parliament, fell down the river towards prince Charles, who with the revolted ships had block’d up the mouth of the Thames, where he lay some time in expectation, presuming that the earl would not fight him, and might perhaps come over to him: But perceiving, by the manner of his approach, that he was mistaken in that particular, he thought fit to make all the sail he could for the coast of Holland. The castles of Deal and Sandwich were reduc’d by colonel Rich; and many of the revolted ships not finding things according to their expectation, return’d to the obedience of the parliament. In the mean time general Fairfax routed the Kentish royalists at Maidstone, and drove the lord Goring with his men into Essex; where, tho’ join’d by the lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lifle, and others, Fairfax forc’d them to shut themselves up in Colchester, where he besieg’d them, and lay before the place a long time; but having compell’d them at last to surrender upon such conditions as he would allow them, Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lifle were shot to death by sentence of the council of war, and the lords Goring and Capel, were sent prisoners to Windsor-Castle.

But passing by these things, as not so immediately concerning our present design, let us see what share of glory lieutenant-general Cromwell acquir’d by his successes in this war.

His business, as before hinted, was to reduce the king’s party in Wales. In order to effect this, he sent sent colonel Horton thither before him, with about three thousand horse, foot, and dragoons, he himself following with as many forces as could be spared from the army. Being within three or four days march of the colonel, he received information, that Laugborn with an army of near eight thousand, had engag'd him at St. Fagon's in Glamorganshire; that upon the first charge his forces gave ground; but afterwards reflecting on the danger they were in, the country being full of enemies, they charged the van of the royalists, where the best of Laugborn's men were, with such fury and resolution, that they obliged them to give way; which those in the rear, being mostly new-rais'd men, perceiving, they began to shift for themselves: Upon which Horton's men prosecuted their advantage with so much vigour and success, that the whole body of their enemies was soon routed, fifteen hundred slain, and near three thousand taken prisoners.

Upon this Cromwell hastens to join him; and in his march comes before Chepstow, where they drew out some forces against him: But colonel Pride's men fell on so furiously that they gain'd the town, and beat the soldiers into the castle; which being strongly fortify'd, and well provided, Cromwell sent to Bristol for some great guns, and hastening into Pembrokeshire, left colonel Ewer to prosecute the siege; who having made a breach on the 25th of May, resolutely attack'd and carried the castle sword in hand; Sir Nicholas Kemish, who commanded there, being slain, and an hundred and twenty taken prisoners.

CROMWELL being arrived in Pembrokeshire, first ordered the storming of Tenby with colonel Overton's regiment, and part of Sir W. Constable's, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Read; and so after several furious assaults, the town first, and then the castle surrendered upon mercy.
LAUGHRON and Powel, after their defeat by colonel Horton, escap'd to Pembroke, which Poyer kept for them. Here they thought themselves safe, when Cromwell appearing, besieg'd them himself in person in that place: But that dreadful name did not so discourage them, but that being fully persuaded that the stopping of that general would be as good as a victory, when the parliament had so much work on their hands elsewhere, they resolved to stand out, and defended themselves long enough to have wearied out almost any other man, as little us'd to be baffled as Cromwell. On the contrary, the rumour of the Scotch invasion daily increasing, animated the lieutenant-general to employ all his skill and vigour for the reduction of this important place. The garrison within, as has been said, was strong and resolute, and the place well fortify'd, which however he was resolved to attempt by storm; and falling on with singular courage, met with gallant resistance: After which, not thinking it advisable to expose his men to new hazards, he determined to gain that by famine, which could not so well be effected by force. And this he was the rather induc'd to do, for that he had certain intelligence of the small quantity of provisions they had in the town and castle; and then, divisions began to arise amongst them, which at length grew to that height, that the soldiers were ready to mutiny against their commanders; crying out, We shall be starved for two or three mens pleasures, better it were that we should throw them over the walls. Accordingly, Cromwell order'd strict guard to be kept in his trenches, to keep them from running out; which order being well observ'd, they were compell'd at length to desire a parley, and on the 11th of July surrend'r'd the town and castle to him upon articles. Laughorn, Poyer, and Powel, and some other officers, surrend'r'd themselves prisoners at mercy. Sir Charles Kemilb,
Sir Henry Stradling, and about ten more officers and gentlemen, were to depart the kingdom within six weeks, and not to return in two years; and all the rest to have liberty to go to their homes, and not to be plunder'd. The sick and wounded were to be taken care of; the towns-men not to be plunder'd, but to enjoy their liberty as formerly; and together with the town and castle, the arms, ammunition and provisions were to be deliver'd up to lieutenant-general Cromwell, for the use of the parliament. Laughorn, Poyer, and Powel were afterwards condemn'd by sentence of a court-martial; but having the favour to draw lots which of them should die, the other two to be spar'd, the lot fell upon colonel Poyer, who was accordingly shot to death in Covent-Garden.

About the time that Pembroke was reduc'd, duke Hamilton enter'd England with an army of about twenty thousand Scots, who were farther strengthen'd by the accession of about five thousand English, under the command of Sir Marmaduke Langdale. Scotland was at this time divided into two parties, very violent in their opposition one to the other; the rigid Presbyterians, who so ador'd the Covenant, in the strictest sense of the letter, that they would not depart from the most rigid clause in it, and were utterly against having any thing to do with the Cavaliers in this expedition; and these were headed by the marquis of Argyle: And the Hamiltonian party, who were in effect for restoring the king without any terms, tho' at the same time, in order to the more easy compassing of their designs, they pretended a great veneration for the same Covenant. Now, tho' the former was a strong party, and their number very great; yet the others had manag'd so dexterously in getting such elections of members for the parliament, as might enable them to carry their point, that when it came to a trial in that assembly, the anti-covenan-
ters carry'd all before them; so that instead of the marquis of Argyle, the duke of Hamilton, who was the chief of this latter party, was appointed general of their army, all the inferior officers being of the same mould and principle; insomuch that the pulpits, which before had proclaimed this war, now accompany'd the army that was marching into England, with their curses.

The house of commons receiving intelligence that the Scots had invaded England, declar'd them to be enemies, and order'd lieutenant-general Cromwell to advance towards them, and fight them. Accordingly, having compleated the reduction of Wales, Cromwell march'd towards the North with all his power; and sent to major-general Lambert, desiring him not to engage with the Scots, till he came up to him and join'd him. Lambert therefore skilfully endeavour'd, rather to harrafs the Scotch army than to fight it; and chose rather to let them advance, that they might have the longer way to retreat home; and he found his task with them much the easier, by reason of their several unseasonable halts, by which means the army was daily diminish'd, and often separated to their great disadvantage; all which was owing either to dark designs in the army, divisions, or weak management.

Whilst Cromwell was on his march northwards, a charge of high-treason was fram'd against him by major Huntingdon before-mention'd, with the advice of some members of both houses, for en-deavouring, by betraying the king, parliament, and army, to advance himself. But it being manifest, as Ludlow observes, that the preferring such an accusation at that time, was chiefly design'd to take him off from his command, and thereby to weaken the army, that their enemies might the more easily prevail against them; the parliament thought thought it most adviseable to discountenance any thing of that nature.
Oliver Cromwell. 85

To proceed: Cromwell having join'd Lambert, both armies met on the 17th of August, near Preston in Lancashire. The English in the Scotch army had the honour of the van, and for a time engag'd Cromwell's men with much bravery; but were at last so vigorously press'd upon by them, that they were forc'd to retreat to a pass, which they endeavour'd to maintain, whilst they sent to the duke for succour; which he not sending, they began to shift for themselves; tho' Langdale afterwards declar'd, That if one thousand foot had been sent to him, he verily believed he should have gained the day; and Cromwell himself acknowledg'd, That he never saw foot fight so desperately as they did. The Scots perceiving the disorder their English friends were put into, it made such an impression upon them, that they soon followed their example, retreating in a disorderly manner; but were so closely pursu'd by Cromwell, that many of their foot threw down their arms, and yielded themselves prisoners, and many were slain. Several principal officers of their foot were likewise taken, with all their artillery, ammunition and baggage. Many of their horse fled towards Lancaster, and were pursu'd near ten miles with great execution.

The duke march'd away in the night, with about eight thousand foot, and four thousand horse; and Cromwell follow'd him with about three thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse and dragoons, killing and taking several in the way; but by the time the rest of his army was come up, the duke recover'd Wigan, before they could attempt any thing upon them. All that night they lay in the field dirty and weary, and had some skirmishing with the enemy, who the next morning march'd towards Warrington, and made a stand at a pass, which for many hours was disputed with great great resolution on both sides: But at length Cromwell beat them from their standing, kill’d about one thousand of them, and took about two thousand prisoners. He pursu’d them home to Warrington town, where they possess’d themselves of the bridge; but Cromwell coming thither, lieutenant-general Bayley desired to capitulate, and had no other terms given him than, _That he should surrender himself and all his officers and soldiery prisoners of war, with all his arms, ammunition, &c._ which was accordingly done; and here were taken four thousand compleat arms and as many prisoners, and the duke’s infantry was totally ruin’d; who, with his remaining horse march’d towards Nantwich, where the gentlemen of the country took about five hundred of them, and kill’d several; and Cromwell sent post to the lord Grey, Sir H. Cholmley, and Sir Ed. Roade, to gather all together with speed for the pursuit of the enemy. And so duke Hamilton being press’d upon by the country, fled at last to Uxeter in Staffordshire; where, with about three thousand horse which he had with him, he was taken, and sent prisoner to Windsor-Castle. Thus the whole Scotch army, which had occasion’d so much terror, was routed and defeated; and what is most remarkable, is, that all this great victory was obtained by Cromwell, with an army amounting to scarce above a third part of the Scots in number, if they had been all together; the conduct of this general, and the goodness of his troops, making amends for the smallness of the number, which was not diminish’d half a hundred in gaining this victory, after the English under Langdale had been beaten. And though indeed the circumstances of this victory are variously related by historians, yet all agree in attributing the honour of it to Cromwell. All the enemy’s cannon and baggage was taken, with their colours; and only some of their horse, which had been quarter’d most backward, made haste to carry news to their country, of the ill success of their arms. They who did not take the way for Scotland, were, for the most part, taken by the activity of the country or the horse that purfu’d them. And Sir Marmaduke Langdale, after he had made his way with some of his men, who continu’d with him till they found it safest to disperse themselves, was discover’d; and being taken prisoner was convey’d to the castle of Nottingham, from whence afterwards he had the good fortune to escape.

Lieutenant-general Cromwell having thus defeated the Scots under duke Hamilton, resolv’d to prosecute the advantage, by marching with all possible speed against Monroe, who was come into England, as a reserve to the duke, with above six thousand horse and foot, and had march’d almost to the borders of Lancashire: But having notice given him, that Cromwell was advancing towards him, and not thinking he should be able to stand before him, who but just before had defeated an army so much exceeding his own, he made what haste he could back into Scotland.

CROMWELL having thus rid the whole nation in general of a great fear, and eas’d the North in particular of that grievous burden they groan’d under, by the plunder and oppression of the Scotch army, resolv’d to prosecute his victory to the utmost, by entering into Scotland itself, that he might effectually root out there whatever threatened any further disturbance. It was generally believ’d, that the marquis of Argyle earnestly invited him to this progress; for notwithstanding duke Hamilton’s defeat, his brother the earl of Lanrick still bore all the sway in the committee of parliament, as well as in the council; and the troops which Monroe had rais’d for the recruit of the duke’s army, were still together, which the few forces rais’d by Argyle were not sufficient to oppose. However, if he did not invite Cromwell, ‘tis certain he was very glad of his coming, and made all possible haste to bid him welcome at his entrance into the kingdom.

CROMWELL with his victorious army continuing his march towards Scotland, in his way reduced Carlisle and Berwick to their former obedience, both being deliver’d up to him on composition. Being just ready to enter that kingdom, he drew his army to a rendezvous on the banks of the Tweed, and order’d a proclamation to be made at the head of every regiment, that none of them should force from the Scotch people any of their cattle or goods, upon pain of death; but that in all things they should behave themselves civilly in their march and quarters, giving no offence to any. As he enter’d Scotland, he declar’d, “That he came with his army to free the kingdom from a force, which it was under from malignant men, who had forc’d the nation to break the friendship with their brethren of England who had been so faithful to them: That it having pleas’d God to defeat the army under duke Hamilton, who endeavour’d to engage the nation in each other’s blood, he was come thither to prevent any further mischief, and to remove those from authority who had us’d their power so ill; and that he hop’d he should in very few days return with an assurance of the brotherly affection of that kingdom to the parliament of England, which did not desire in any degree to invade their liberties, or infringe their privileges.” Upon this the earl of Lanrick, and all the Hamiltonian party withdrew from Edinburgh; and they who continu’d there were resolv’d to comply with Argyle, who they now saw could protect them.

CROMWELL march’d directly for Edinburgh, and in his way was met by many of the Scotch nobility and gentry from the committee of estates, with congratulatory orations in honour of his worthy achievements; acknowledging that his presence presence would conduct much to the composing of the distractions of the kingdom. Being thus conducted to Edinburgh by the marquis of Argyle, and the rest that came to meet him, he was receiv’d there with all the solemnity and respect due to the deliverer of their country. His army was quarter’d about, and supply’d with all provisions the country could afford; and himself was lodg’d in the earl of Murray’s house, where resorted to him the lord chancellor, with many others of the nobility and gentry. The lord provost, with several eminent citizens, came likewise to welcome him thither, and present their service to him. Thus the Scotch Presbyterians, who lately look’d upon the Independent party as the worst of their enemies, now own’d and embrac’d this Seetarian army (as they before call’d it) as their best friends and deliverers.
Oliver Cromwell

Lieutenant-general Cromwell had not been long at Edinburgh, before he demanded of the committee of estates, that they would seclude from all publick trusts, all who had any hand in, or did in the least promote duke Hamilton’s late invasion: To which the committee gave a satisfactory answer. Several other demands were likewise made by him, with which the committee comply’d; and he resolv’d liberty for the parliament of England, to make such further demands as they should think requisite. Whilst he staid with them, the committee sent an order and command to Monroe to disband his troops; which when he seem’d resolv’d not to do, he soon perceiv’d that Cromwell must be the arbitrator; and thereupon he very punctually obey’d the orders of the committee.

Cromwell having thus finish’d what he came about, began to prepare for his return to England; but before he left them, the committee fearing some new disturbance might arise after the departure of the English army, requested him, that he 1648.

He disposed of the Hamiltonian.
he would leave some forces with them, which might be ready to suppress any insurrections; promising, that when they had rais'd a sufficient force for their own defence, they would dismiss them, and send them back into their own country. To this Cromwell readily yielded, and appointed major-general Lambert, with three regiments of horse, for the said service.

Matters having been thus concerted to the satisfaction of both parties, the Scots invited Cromwell and the chief officers of his army to the castle of Edinburgh, whither they were all convey'd in coaches, and were magnificently treated at a banquet prepar'd for them; and at their departure, they were saluted by all the cannon of the castle, and many volleys of small shot. On the 16th of October, Cromwell left Edinburgh, being conducted several miles on his way by the marquis of Argyll, and many others of the Scotch nobility; and at their parting, great demonstrations of affection pass'd betwixt them. Soon after, the committee of estates sent letters to the parliament of England, acknowledging, "That they were sensible of the benefit to Scotland, against the enemies of both nations, by the coming thither of the forces under lieutenant-general Cromwell, and major-general Lambert; and that the deportment of the officers and soldiers had been so fair and civil, that they trusted by their carriage the malignants would be much convinc'd and disappointed, and the amity of both kingdoms strengthened and confirm'd; which they, on their part, should likewise study to preserve."

Cromwell arriving at Newcastle with his army, was nobly treated there, and welcomed with great guns, ringing of bells, and other rejoicings. From hence he bends his course directly to Carlisle, having first order'd some forces for strengthening the siege of Pontefract or Pomfret-Castle.
Oliver Cromwell. 91

Castle. This place; though not very great, was very considerable for its strength, but most remarkable for the valor of those who defended it, whereby it became famous at this time all over the kingdom. The garrison consisted of about four hundred foot, and a hundred and thirty horse, all bold and resolute men, as appear'd by their actions.

One time a party of horse issuing out of the castle, took Sir Arthur Ingram, and carrying him in, oblig'd him to pay one thousand five hundred pounds for his ransom, before he could get out again. At another time captain Clayton, and most of his troops were seiz'd upon by them, and made prisoners. They likewise fetch'd two hundred head of cattle, with many horses, into the castle, whilst Sir Henry Cholmely lay before it with his forces, to keep them in. But the boldest action of all was this (which was indeed a wicked one:) One morning before day, there fall'd out about forty horse, who hasten'd away to Doncaster, where colonel Rainsborough, who had a commission to command in chief before the castle, then quarter'd. Being come near the town, three of the party leaving their companions without, with great confidence march'd in, and enquir'd for colonel Rainsborough's quarters; which being inform'd of, they enter'd, pretending they came to deliver a letter to him, from lieutenant-general Cromwell. When they came to him, being in bed, they told him he was their prisoner; but upon his refusal to go silently with them, they run him thro' with their swords, so that he immediately expir'd. And altho' his forces then kept guard in the town, these bold fellows, with all their party, got back into the castle in the middle of the day.

To repress these insolent proceedings, Cromwell, immediately after he had settled the rest of the northern parts in peace and quietness, came himself before Pomfret; and having order'd the several posts for a close siege, which put a stop to their thus

Comes thither himself, and leaving Lambert before it, marches for London.
thus ranging abroad, he left major-general Lambert, who was just come out of Scotland, with a strong party before it, to compleat the work, whilst himself took his march directly for London.

'Twas in this his return from the north that he wrote the following letter.

S I R,

"I Suppose it is not unknown to you how much the country is in arrear to the garrison of Hull, as likewise how probable it is that the garrison will break, unless some speedy course be taken to get them money, the soldiers at the present being ready to mutiny, as not having money to buy them bread; and without money the stubborn town's-people will not trust them for the worth of a penny. Sir, I must beg of you, that as you tender the good of the country, so far as the security of that garrison is mentioned, you would give your assistance to the helping of them to their money which the country owes them. The governor will apply himself to you either by person or by letter. I pray you do for him herein as in a business of very high consequence. I am the more earnest with you, as having a very deep sense how dangerous the event may be of their being neglected in the matter of their pay. I rest upon your favour herein, and subscribe myself,

S I R,

Your very humble servant,

Knottingly, Nov. 25, 1648.

O. Cromwell.

For my noble friend, Thomas St. Nicholas, Esq;

C H A P.
Chap. IX.

From the second civil war to the King's death.

Before we prosecute our relation of the proceedings of Cromwell and the army, from his return out of Scotland to the king's death, it will be necessary to look a little back, and see how matters were carried in the parliament.

Soon after the army was remov'd from London, by reason of the late insurrections, those of the excluded members who were in England, ventur'd to return to their former seats, and the Presbyterians began to prevail again in the house; and Cromwell and the other officers who were members of the house, had not been long absent before the common-council of the city thought fit to present a petition to the parliament for a personal treaty with the king, as the only way to restore the nation to a happy peace. This appear'd so much to be the sense of the city, that the parliament durst not positively reject it; and indeed the greatest part of them did at this time very much desire the same thing. Hereupon Sir Henry Vane, with the rest of the army-party in the house, were forced to contrive some specious way to delay it, by seeming to consent to it. And so a committee of the commons being appointed to confer with a committee of the city, about means to provide for the king's safety during the time of the treaty, the former perplex'd the other with various questions, to which they knew there could be no answer given without first calling another common-council to receive further instructions. By this device, and by starting new questions at every meeting, much time was spent, and the desir'd delays obtain'd. However, the parliament at last declar'd, "That they would enter into a personal treaty with his majesty for settling the peace of the kingdom; and that..."
that the treaty should be in the isle of Wight, where his majesty should enjoy honour, freedom and safety." And commissioners were sent from both houses to inform the king, "That the parliament desired a treaty with his majesty upon the propositions tender'd to him at Hampton Court, and such others as should be presented to him."

They were no sooner return'd from the isle of Wight with the king's answer, but the parliament had notice of the defeat of the Scotch army; and Cromwell had written to his friends, "That it would be such a perpetual ignominy to the parliament, that no body abroad or at home would ever give credit to them, if they should recede from their former vote and declaration of no more addresses to the king; conjuring them to continue firm in that resolution." But the parliament had made too great a step to go back from what they were now upon; and since the first motion for a treaty, many absent members resorted to the house and promoted the design; so that they were much more numerous than those who labour'd to obstruct it: And so, notwithstanding all opposition, it was declar'd, "That the votes of no-addresses should stand repeal'd; that the treaty should be at Newport; and that his majesty should be there with the same freedom, as when he was at Hampton-Court; that the instructions given to colonel Hammond, for the more strict confining him, should be recall'd; and that all whom the king had nam'd, should have liberty to repair to him, and remain with him undisturb'd." Then they nominated five lords and ten of the house of commons to be their commissioners to treat with the king, and order'd them to hasten the treaty with all possible expedition: But, Sir Henry Vane being one of them, us'd all his arts to delay it, as he had done before with the parliament, in hopes that that Cromwell would finish matters in Scotland time enough to return, and to use more effectual means to obstruct it, than he was furnished with. Cromwell was very well appriz'd of these proceedings, which made him think, that his presence at the parliament was so necessary to restrain the Presbyterianians, who ceas'd not to vex him at any distance, that he would not be prevail'd with to tarry and finish that only difficult work which remain'd, viz. the reducing Pomsret-Castle; but leaving it to Lambert, continued his march for London, as before related.

Forty days were appointed for the treaty; which being expir'd, and all men thinking the treaty was ended, the commissioners received new orders and instructions to enlarge it fourteen days longer and after that to continue it four days more, and last of all one day more; After which the commissioners returned; and whilst their report was under consideration in the house, the large remonstrance of the army was brought from the headquarters, which was now at Windsor, to the house of commons; in which they desired, "That the parliament would lay aside all further proceedings in this treaty, and return to their vote of no-addresses; that the king might come no more to government, but be brought to Justice, as the capital cause of all the evils in the kingdom; that a day might be set for the prince and the duke of York, to appear and answer to such things as might be laid to their charge; and if they fail'd herein, they might be declar'd traitors: That an end might be put to this parliament, and new representatives of the people chosen, for the governing and preserving the whole body of the nation; That no king might be hereafter admitted, but upon election of, and in trust for the people, &c." In conclusion, they press these things, as good for this and other
96

Great contests between the parliament and army.

1648.

The LIFE of

other kingdoms, and hope it will not be taken ill, because from an army, and so servants, when their masters are servants, and trustees for the kingdom.

This remonstrance put the house into a great confusion; but that which occasion'd the greatest consternation, was the news from the isle of Wight, that Hammond was discharged, and colonel Ewer had carried away the king to Hurst-Castle. Upon this the house, which was then in the heat of the debate upon the king's answer, immediately desisted, and voted, "That the carrying the king to Hurst-Castle, was without their advice and consent;" and sent a letter to the general, "That the orders and instructions to colonel Ewer were contrary to those given to colonel Hammond;" and therefore it was the pleasure of the house, that he should recall those orders, and that colonel Hammond should again resume the care of the king's person." But the general (who hitherto agreed in everything with the army) in return, demanded the arrears due to the army; and declar'd, That unless there were present money sent for that purpose, he should be oblig'd to remove the army nearer to London. At the same time the army sent a new declaration to the house, in pursuance of their late remonstrance; which the house refus'd to take into consideration; and some resolute members moved, "That the army might be declared traitors, if they presumed to march nearer London than they were at present; and that an impeachment of high-treason might be drawn up against the principal officers of it." Hereupon the general marched directly to London, and quarter'd at White-ball; and other officers with their troops in Durham-house, the Meuse, Covent-garden, and St. James's; and to supply the present necessity, and prevent all inconveniences, they sent to the

The army marches to London.
the city for forty thousand pounds to be issued out without delay for the army.

Notwithstanding all this, the party in the house who were friends to the treaty, resolved still to exert themselves; upon which there followed a violent struggle between them and those on the contrary side, which continued a whole day and night together: And about five in the morning, December 5, they first put the question, Whether the question should be put? and carried it by a hundred and forty voices against a hundred and four; so that they pass'd the grand question, and voted without dividing, That his majesty's concessions to the propositions upon the treaty, were sufficient grounds for the parliament to proceed upon for the settlement of the peace of the kingdom. And to prevent any after-claps, they appointed a committee to confer with the general, for the better procuring a good intelligence and correspondence between the army and the parliament; and then adjourn'd till the next morning.

The officers and army finding the parliament thus resolute in opposing their designs, and that their coming into the city was not a sufficient check upon them, resolv'd now to exert themselves to purpose. Accordingly some regiments of horse and foot being sent to Westminster, they set guards upon all the avenues to the parliament-house, and seiz'd upon one and forty of the members, as they were entering. And as they made prisoners of these, so about an hundred more were denied entrance into the house; whereupon the rest of the Presbyterian party being somewhat dismay'd at the treatment of their fellow-members, declin'd coming to the house, leaving it to the possession of about an hundred and fifty; who being for the most part officers of the army, were disposed to do every thing according to the direction of their leaders.
The army having thus purged the house from all they either knew or suspected to be enemies to their designs, lieutenant-colonel Axtel came in, and presented to the remaining members the proposals of the army, setting forth, "That they had for a long while sadly beheld and tasted, in their proceedings, the miserable effects of counsels divided and corrupted by faction, and personal interest; and desiring, that all faithful members would acquit themselves by a protestation of their not concurring in the late proceedings, and would then speedily and vigorously proceed to take order for the execution of justice."

The night after this interruption was given to the house, lieutenant-general Cromwell arrived in town, and lay at White-bull; and the next day taking his place in parliament, he had the hearty thanks of the house given him for his great and faithful services perform'd for the nation; which he receiv'd with the greatest appearance of humility (as he was used to do) not taking to himself the least of all those great things perform'd by him, but ascribing them wholly to God, the giver of all victory.

CROMWELL, tho' absent, is generally suppos'd to have influenc'd in all the late proceedings, and to be the chief promoter of them. 'Tis said, that at the leaguer before Pomfret, he induc'd all the regiments under him to petition against the treaty, and for justice on the king; that 'twas by his advice and direction that the remonstrance of the army was drawn up and presented to the house; and some say, that 'twas he that sent colonel Ewer to remove the king to Hurst-castle. 'Tis certain, that both he and his son-in-law Ireton had a very great influence upon the general, and could manage him almost in every thing as they pleas'd. However it was, Cromwell, upon his arrival, declar'd at White-bull, and other places, That he had not been been acquainted with the design (of the army's interrupting the house); yet since it was done, he was glad of it, and would endeavour to maintain it.

The remnant of the house of commons immediately renew'd their votes of non-addresses to the king, and annul'd all those that introduced and succeeded the treaty; and particularly resolv'd, That the king's answer to their propositions was not satisfactory. Soon after it was moved in the house, to proceed capitally against the king, when Cromwell stood up and declared, "That if any man mov'd this upon design, he should think him the greatest traitor in the world; but since providence and necessity had cast them upon it, he would pray God to bless their counsels, though he was not provided on the sudden to give them counsel." On December 16th, a party of horse was sent over to Hurst-castle to bring the king to Windsor; who lay at Farnham on the 22d, and was deliver'd up at Windsor-castle the day following, colonel Harrison commanding the guards about him. Soon after, the council of war order'd, That nothing should be done upon the knee to the king; that all ceremonies of state us'd to him should be left off, and his attendance should be with fewer persons, and at less charge.

Next day the committee of the commons, which had been appointed to draw up a charge against the king, reported an ordinance for impeaching Charles Stuart king of England of high-treason; and for trying him by commissioners to be nominated in the said ordinance; which being agreed to by the commons, was on January 2d carry'd up to the lords for their concurrence. But upon their rejecting it, the commons pass'd these remarkable votes: First, That the people are, under God, the original of all just power. Secondly, That the commons of England, being chosen by, and representing the people, are the supreme power of the nation. Thirdly,
That whatsoever is enacted or declared for law, by the house of commons assembled in parliament, hath the force of law, tho' the consent of the king and house of peers be not bad thereunto.

Then they proceeded to constitute and erect a court, to be called the high court of justice, which should have authority to try the king, and to examine witnesses for that purpose. The number of the commissioners nominated were a hundred and thirty-five, whereof twenty or more had power to proceed. They consisted promiscuously of members of the house, officers of the army, citizens and country gentlemen. About fifty that were nam'd, refus'd to act, of which number were the speaker Lenthall, and general Fairfax. Of those who acted, lieutenant-general Cromwell, and commissary-general Ireton were next the president. The commissioners made choice of serjeant Bradshaw for that office, and nominated Mr. Steel to be attorney-general, Mr. Cook solicitor, Dr. Dorislaus and Mr. Ask to be pleaders against the king; and Westminster-ball was appointed to be the place of trial: In order to which solemn transaction, the king was brought from Windsor to St. James's by colonel Harrison.

On the way Harrison observ'd, that the king was under an apprehension of a fix'd purpose to murder him; and that he let fall some words of the odiousness and wickedness of such an assassination, which could never be safe to the person who undertook it: Whereupon he took occasion to assure him, That he needed not to entertain any such imagination; that the parliament bad too much honour and justice to cherish so foul an intention; that whatever the parliament resolved to do would be very publick, and in a way of justice, to which the world should be witness; and that they would never endure a thought of secret violence. But his majesty could not believe him; nor did he imagine they would ever venture to proceed against him in the way of a publick trial, before all the people.

All the king's friends both at home and abroad now give him for lost; and yet they did not neglect to make their utmost efforts to save him. The States-general order'd their ambassadour to represent to the parliament, that the course they were going to take with the king, would be a lasting reproach to the Protestant interest. The prince of Wales, and prince of Orange, daily sent, as agents, the kindred and relations of Cromwell, Ireton, and other judges appointed to try his majesty, with commission to offer any thing, and to make any promises to save his life, or at least to put off the judgment: And the prince wrote a very pathetical letter to general Fairfax, in his father's behalf. The duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earls of Lindsey and Southampton, as is said, generously offered their own heads to save the king, and would have undertook to suffer in his stead for whatever he had done amiss. Almost all the Presbyterian ministers in the city, and very many out of the country, and some even of the Independents, declared against the design in their sermons, in petitions, protestations, and publick remonstrances. And the Scots at the same time sent commissioners in great haste, to declare and protest against this unheard-of attempt.

These commissioners, as bishop Burnet informs us, came also to Cromwell to argue the matter with him. They highly blam'd indeed many of the king's actions, and in a heavy languid style charg'd him with very great crimes: But still they insisted on that clause in the covenant, whereby they solemnly swore they would be faithful in the preservation of his majesty's person: Upon which they observ'd, on what conditions Scotland, as well as the parliament of England, had engage'd in the war; and what solemn declarations of their zeal and duty to his majesty they had all along made; which would now be found, to the scandal and reproach of the Christian name, to have been false pretences, if now the king was in their hands, they should proceed to extremities. Hereupon Cromwell held a long discourse with them concerning the nature of the regal power; and declar’d 'twas his opinion, that a breach of trust in a king deserved greater punishment than any other crime. And then, as to their covenant, he said, they swore to preserve the king’s person in defence of the true religion; so that if it was manifest, that the establishing of the true religion was hinder’d by the king, so that it could not be effect’d without removing him, then their oaths could not oblige them to the preserving him any longer. He further said, they were bound by their covenant to bring all malignants, incendiaries, and enemies to the cause, to condign punishment; and was not this to be executed impartially? What were all those on whom publick justice had taken place, especially those who suffer’d for joining with Montrofs, but small offenders, who had acted by commission from the king, who was therefore the principal, and so the most guilty? Thus Cromwell had manifestly the better of them at theirown weapons, and upon their own principles.

All endeavours being ineffectual, and the court having finish’d all the necessary preparations, the king’s trial began on Saturday the 20th of January. The substance of the charge against him was, “That he had endeavour’d to set up a tyrannical power, and to that end had rais’d and maintain’d in the land a cruel war against the parliament; whereby the country had been miserably wasted, the publick treasure exhausted, thousands of people had lost their lives, and innumerable other mischiefs committed.” The commissioners for trying him being met in Westminster-Hall on the forelaid day, the
the court order'd the serjeant at arms to send for their prisoner from Sir Robert Cotton's house, whether he had been removed; who accordingly was brought up in the face of the court by colonel Tomlinson, under a strong guard, and deliver'd to the serjeant at arms, who conducted him to the bar, where a crimson velvet chair was plac'd for him. Having heard his charge read, he refus'd to plead to it, either guilty or not guilty, till he should know by what lawful authority he was brought thither; and the answer given not satisfying him, he persist'd in that refusal. The same he did on Monday January 22d, when he was a second time brought before the court; as also the next day, being the third time. Finally, on January 27th, the king being a fourth time brought into the court, desir'd, before sentence was pass'd against him, to be heard before the lords and commons in the painted chamber; with design, as 'tis thought, to have resign'd his crown to his son, the prince of Wales: Upon which the judges retir'd for half an hour to consider of his request; and then returning, they order'd the king to be brought again to the bar; when the president told him, that what he had propos'd was but a further denial of the jurisdiction of the court, and tended to the delay of justice; and if he had no more to say, they would proceed to judgment. And the king answering, he had no more to say, Bradshaw made a long harangue in vindication of the parliament's proceedings, grounding his discourse mostly on this principle, That the people have the supreme power, and the house of commons is the people. This speech being ended, and the charge again recited, sentence was pronounced in these words; For all which treasons and crimes, this court doth adjudge, that the said Charles Stuart, as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and publick enemy, shall be put to death, by the severing his head from his body...
THO' the king was condemn'd, and there appeared no hope of saving his life, yet still endeavours were not wanting for that purpose. The following story is told on this occasion, That colonel John Cromwell, a near relation of the great Oliver, came to town about this time, with credential letters from the States of Holland, where to was added a blank, with the king's signet, and another of the prince's, both confirm'd by the States, for Cromwell to set down his own conditions, if he would now save his majesty's life. The colonel went directly to his kin'sman's house, who was so retir'd and shut up in his chamber, with an order to let none know he was at home, that 'twas with much difficulty he obtain'd admittance, after he had told who he was. Having mutually saluted each other, the colonel desir'd to speak a few words with him in private; and began with much freedom to set before him the heinousness of the fact, then about to be committed, and with what detestation 'twas look'd upon abroad, telling him, That of all men living, he could never have imagin'd he would have had any hand in it, who, in his bearing, had protested so much for the king. To this Cromwell answer'd, It was not he but the army; and tho' he did once say some such words, yet now times were alter'd, and providence seem'd to order things otherwise. And 'tis said, he added, That be bad prayed and fasted for the king, but no return that way was yet made to him. Upon this the colonel step'd a little back, and suddenly shut the door, which made Cromwell apprehend he was going to be assassinated; but the other pulling out his papers, said to him, Cousin, this is no time to trifle with words: See here, it is now in your own power not only to make yourself, but your family, relations and posterity, happy and honourable for ever; otherwise, as they have chang'd their name before from Williams to Cromwell, so now they must be forced to change it again; for this fact will bring such an ignominy upon the whole generation of them, that no time will be able to deface. At this Cromwell paus'd a little, and then said, Cousin, I defire you will give me till night to consider of it, and do you go to your inn, and not to-bed, till you hear from me. The colonel did accordingly, and about one in the morning a messenger came to tell him, He might go to rest, and expect no other answer to carry to the prince; for the council of officers had been seeking God (a phrase, it seems, very much in use at that time) as he also had done the same, and it was resolved by them all, that the king must die.
Oliver Cromwell. 105

A committee was appointed by the high-court of justice to inspect the parts about White-ball for a convenient place for the king's execution: Having made their report, it was determined, that a scaffold should be made near the banqueting-house for that purpose; and 'twas order'd to be cover'd with black. The same day, Jan. 29th, about threescore of the commisioners sign'd a warrant for the king's execution, directing it to colonel Hacker, colonel Hunks, and colonel Phayer, or either of them. Cromwell's name stood the third in this warrant, Bradshaw and lord Grey of Groby only standing before him. The same day the king's children waited on him to take their leave of him. An extraordinary ambassador from the States had his audience in the house of commons; whose errand was to intercede with them for the king's life, and to maintain a good correspondence between England and the United Provinces. The next day, being the 30th of January, about eight o'clock in the morning, his majesty was with a guard brought from St. James's through the park to White-ball, where having staid about two hours in a private room, he was led to a scaffold out of a window of the banqueting-house: And having made a speech, and taken off his George, he kneeled down 1648. at the block, and the executioner at one blow severed his head from his body.

Captain Hewlet was condemned after the restoration, for cutting off the king's head, or at least for being one of the persons who stood mask'd upon the scaffold, though several creditable witnesses depos'd, that Gregory Brandon, the common hangman, had confess'd and own'd that he executed the king, and that he affirm'd as much to the lord Capel, when he suffer'd by the same ax; and captain Hewlet offer'd to make it appear, that he was not then upon the scaffold, nor near it, nay, that he was seiz'd and secured for refusing to be there. Notwithstanding this, Hewlet was found guilty by the jury; but was repriev'd: And if we may believe what Lilly writes in his own life, it was the resolute Joyce (who seized the king at Holmby) that struck the fatal stroke. The account that Lilly gives is as follows, "The next Sunday but one after Charles the First was beheaded, Robert Spavin, secretary to the lieutenant-general Cromwell, invited himself to dine with me, and brought Anthony Pier son and several others along with him to dinner. Their principal discourse was, who it was that beheaded the king: One said it was the common hangman; another, Hugh Peters; others were also nominated, but none concluded. Robert Spavin, as soon as dinner was done, took me by the hand, and carrying me to the South window, said, These are all mistaken, they have not nam'd the man that did the fact; it was lieutenant-colonel Joyce: I was in the room when he fitted himself for the work, stood behind him when he did it, and when done, went in again with him. There's no man knows this but my master Cromwell, my master Ireton, and myself."

The king, in all his sufferings, shew'd a calm and composed firmness, which amaz'd all people; and the rather, because 'twas not natural to him.
Oliver Cromwell. 107

He had many indignities offered to him, especially during his trial; but he bore them all with a true greatness of mind, without disorder, or any kind of affectation. Thus, as bishop Burnet observes, he died greater than he had liv’d, and shew’d that, which has been often remark’d of the whole family of the Stuarts, that they bore misfortunes better than prosperity. He was a prince of great devotion and piety, remarkable for his temperance and chastity, and an utter enemy to all kind of debauchery; and if he had any personal faults, they were much overweighed by his virtues. Happy were it for him, if his government had been as free from blame. The rock on which he split, was an immoderate desire of power, beyond what the constitution allow’d. His reign both in peace and war was a continual series of errors: He was out of measure bent on following his humour; but unreasonably feeble to those whom he trusted, especially the queen. His friends regretted the ascendant she had over him on many occasions; and others taxed him with the character of an uxorious husband. He had certainly a fixed aversion to popery; but was much inclin’d to a middle way between the Protestants and Papists; whereby he lost the one without gaining the other. In short, his whole conduct was such, as verified this maxim, That errors in government have ruin’d more princes than personal vices.

Thus have we got over this dark scene, in which our lieutenant-general is commonly supposed to be chiefly concern’d. But as ’tis not strange he should, if the story of the King’s dealing deceitfully with him be true; so it may more reasonably be concluded, that his son-in-law Ireton, rather than he, was the person who chiefly influence’d in these proceedings. I know Ireton is supposed all along to have acted by Cromwell’s directions; but whether he did or no, may, I think, in many cases be justly conclu-

How far his death is to be imputed to Cromwell.
questioned. Ireton was certainly a zealous commonwealth's-man, which party was always averse to any treaty with the king; and though he with Cromwell was in such a treaty, yet Ludlow thinks he never really intended to close with the king; but only to lay his party asleep, whilst they were contesting with the Presbyterian interest in parliament; but he says no such thing of Cromwell, whom he seems all along to be angry with, for his design of making an agreement with the king, being himself utterly averse to it, and supposing Cromwell's main end was to gratify his own ambition; which is not unlikely; and yet he might have been in earnest in the treaty, and also have design'd the publick good. Cromwell was certainly no commonwealth's-man, though he was forc'd to humour, and in many things actually to comply with the party; and as the agitators and their off-spring the levellers, who were no other than the commonwealth's-men in the army, and whom it is likely Cromwell at first might make use of to bring about some of his designs, were the original contrivers and chief actors in the king's death; so whatever hand Cromwell had in it, seems to be chiefly owing to their fury and desperate resolutions, which made him apprehensive of the greatest danger, if he did not comply with their designs; though at the same time, the contradictions that appear'd in the king's conduct, might the more easily incline him to join purposes with them. In short, what with the danger that threaten'd his person, if he had persist'd to oppose the designs of the levellers; what with the enthusiasm, that was so habitual to him; and what with the consideration of the king's past misgovernment, which had been the original cause of all the evils the nation had suffer'd, and the fear of the like happening for the future, if he should be restor'd; he having discover'd himself to be of a very inconstant and wavering, not to say equivocating temper; Cromwell was
was at length so wrought upon, as to think it necessary, and so lawful, to take off the king; in which towards the last he seem’d to be pretty active, tho’ always in some doubt about it. We are expressly told, he at first shew’d some repugnance to so black an undertaking, as my author calls it, and seem’d to shew his abhorence of it, and not to surmount it, as he said himself; but only because he saw that the providence of God and the necessity of the times, had inspir’d the army to make so terrible a sacrifice; but that that sacrifice, after all, was the only one that could save the state and religion. And I cannot here omit what bishop Burnet says of this matter: He tells us, that Ireton was the person that drove on the king’s trial and death, and that Cromwell was all the while in some suspense about it. “Ireton, says he, had the principles and the temper of a Cæsius in him: He stuck at nothing that might have turn’d England to a commonwealth; and he found out Cook and Bradshaw, two bold lawyers, as proper instruments for managing it.” And we are informed by others, that Ireton was the person who wrought upon Fairfax, and manag’d the affair of the army’s remonstrance, and purging the parliament, and brought it about. To conclude, tho’ I am far from pretending to justify the whole of Cromwell’s conduct in these extraordinary transactions; yet I cannot but think, that a greater load of guilt and infamy is usually laid to his share, than he really deserv’d.
HAVING seen the actions of this wonderful man, during the Life of king Charles, let us now view him under the commonwealth government: But first it may be proper to observe, how this government was establish'd. The first thing the parliament (for so the remnant of the house of commons now call'd themselves) did after the king's death, was to pass an act, ordaining, "That no person whatsoever do presume to proclaim, declare, publish, or any ways promote Charles Stuart, son of the late Charles,
Charles, commonly call'd the prince of Wales, or any other person, to be king or chief magistrate of England or Ireland, &c. without the free consent of the people in parliament, first had, and signified by a particular act or ordinance for that purpose, under pain of being adjudg'd a traitor." Then they made another act, "That such as had assented to the vote, That the king's concessions were a ground for the house to proceed to a settlement, should not be re-admitted to sit as Members." These therefore were commonly call'd the secluded members.

Soon after, Feb. 5. they voted the house of Peers to be useless and dangerous, and an act was accordingly pass'd for abolishing it, tho' Cromwell is said to have appear'd for them. And to remove all that stood in the way of their design'd common-wealth, they resolv'd and declar'd, "That it had been found by experience, that the office of a King in this nation was unnecessary, burdensome, and dangerous to the liberty, safety, and publick interest of the nation; and therefore it should be utterly abolish'd." Then the form of government was declar'd to be a Commonwealth; and a council of state was appointed, consisting of forty persons, whereof Cromwell was one; to whom power was given, to command and settle the militia of England and Ireland, to order the fleet, and set forth such a naval power, as they should think fit; to appoint magazines and stores for England and Ireland, and to dispose of them for the service of both nations, as they thought proper. And they were to fit and execute these powers for the space of one whole year. And now all writs formerly running in the king's name, were to be issued out in the names of the keepers of the liberty of England. And a new oath, or engagement, was prepar'd, to be true and faithful to the government establish'd without king or house of peers; all all who refus'd to take it, to be uncapable of holding any place or office in church or state. If the reader is curious of knowing what persons composed the council of state for this first year, they were as follows: John Bradshaw, Esq; president, earl of Denbigh, earl of Mulgrave, earl of Pembroke, earl of Salisbury, lord Grey, lord Grey of Groby, lord Fairfax, John Lisle, Esq; — Rolles, Esq; Oliver St. John, Esq; John Wild, Esq; Bulstrode Whitelock, Esq; lieutenant-general Cromwell, major-general Skippon, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir William Massam, Sir Arthur Haslerigg, Sir James Harrington, Sir Henry Vane, jun. Sir John Davers, Sir William Armine, Sir Henry Mildmay, Sir William Constable, Alexander Popham, William Purefoy, Isaac Pennington, Rowland Wilson, Edmund Ludlow, William Heveningham, Robert Wallop, Henry Marten, Anthony Stapley, John Hutchinson, Valentine Walton, Thomas Scot, Dennis Bond, Luke Robinson, John Jones, Cornelius Holland, Esqs;

Another High court of Justice. The new commonwealth being thus settled and secur'd, another High court of Justice is now erected for the trial of delinquents. Before this court the duke of Hamilton, the earl of Holland, the earl of Norwich, the lord Capel, and Sir John Owen, being brought, receiv'd sentence of death, for being concern'd in the late invasion and insurrections. After judgment given, they petition'd the commons; and so their reprieve or their execution was put to the vote of the house; and duke Hamilton and the lord Capel were cast, and Sir John Owen fav'd by a considerable majority; as the earl of Holland was cast, and the earl of Norwich fav'd, by the single vote of the speaker, the house being before equally divided as to them; so that Hamilton, Holland and Capel were soon after beheaded in the Palace-yard at Westminster. It must be remember'd here, that when the lord Capel's petition, which his lady deliver'd, was read in
in the house, many spoke in his favour, and said, that he had never deceiv’d or betray’d them, but had always freely and resolutely declared for the king: And Cromwell, who knew him very well, spoke so many things to his honour, and profess’d so much respect for him, that all believ’d he was safe, till he concluded, “That his affection for the publick so out-weigh’d his private friendship, that he could not but tell them, that the question was now, Whether they would preserve the most bitter and most implacable enemy they had:” That he knew well, that the lord Capel would be the last man in England that would abandon the royal interest; that he had great courage, industry, and generosity; that he had many friends who would always adhere to him; and that as long as he liv’d, what condition soever he was in, he would be a thorn in their sides: And therefore, for the good of the common-wealth, he should give his vote against the petition.” It ought also to be remember’d, that Sir John Owen’s reprieve was owing in great measure to the generosity and good nature of commissary-general Ireton, who observing there had been no application made, nor a word said in behalf of Owen, spoke for him thus, as lord Clarendon tells us, “There have been great endeavours and solicitations us’d to save all those lords; but there’s a commoner, another condemn’d person, for whom no man hath said a word, nor has he himself so much as petition’d: Therefore I desire that Sir John Owen may be preserv’d by the meer motive and goodnes of the house;” which was assented to.

About this time, several things were declared by the parliament to be high-treason, and this among the rest, viz. For any soldiers of the army to contrive the death of their general, or lieutenant-general; or endeavour to raise mutinies in the army.
1648.
A little before this, Cromwell and his son-in-law Ireton went along with Whitelock from the council of state, and supped at his house. Here they were very cheerful, and seem'd extremely well pleas'd; and related many wonderful observations of God's providence, in the course of the war, and in the affair of the army's coming to London, and seizing the members of the house. Having thus discours'd together till midnight, they return'd home, and in their passage their coach was stopp'd, and they were examin'd by the guards. They presently told their names; but the captain of the guards would not believe them, and threaten'd to carry these two great officers to the court of guard. Hereupon Ireton grew a little angry, but Cromwell made himself merry with the soldiers, gave them twenty shillings, and commended them and their captain for doing their duty. And they afterwards confess'd that they knew Cromwell and Ireton well enough, and were more strict with them than with others, to let them see they were careful of their duty; which they believ'd these great men came at that time on purpose to observe.

1649. Matters being now brought to some degree of settlement, it was thought fit to abolish the council of agitators in the army; lest they, who had been the chief authors in all the late changes, should now take it in their heads to carry matters further than the present rulers cared they should. But these agitators had tasted too much of power to be willing to be stripp'd of it; but at the same time made a wrong computation of their own strength by the great things they had formerly effected, not considering that their superior officers were now wholly united with the parliament, and entirely concurred with them, in carrying on the same designs. They presently drew up a petition to the lord general Fairfax and his council of officers, against the design of abolishing them; but by
by a council of war, the subscribers of this petition were sentenced to ride with their faces towards the horses tails before the heads of their several regiments, with their faults written on their breasts, to have their swords broken over their heads, and so to be cashier'd the army. Which sentence was accordingly executed upon them in the great Palace-yard at Westminster, to the great exasperation of the Levelling party, who were resolved not so to be suppress'd.

For not long after, there being a rendezvous at Ware, several regiments, among whom was Cromwell's of horse, in pursuance of the forementioned petition, and to be distinguished from others, wore white in their hats, as they had done once before. Cromwell having notice of the design, order'd two regiments of horse from distant quarters, who knew nothing of this combination, to appear there likewise. Being all drawn up, Cromwell, with an angry and down look, rides round, and on a sudden commands one of those two regiments to encompass a regiment of foot; which being done accordingly, he call'd four men by their names out of the body, and with his own hands committed them to the marshal; and immediately calling a council of war (whilst the rest of their confederates flunk their white colours into their pockets, and trembled at this boldness of Cromwell) try'd and condemn'd them. But they had the favour from the court of casting lots for their lives, two only to die; and the two whose lot it was to die, were presently shot to death upon a green bank by the other two in sight of the army. A little before, another leveller, one Lockyer, a trooper, for promoting the engagement and agreement, was shot to death in St. Paul's Church-yard.

Notwithstanding these executions, this humour still continued in the army, and began to break out with greater violence, upon the parliament's voting, voting, that eleven regiments, by lot, should be sent over into Ireland. This enraged them to that degree, that, finding that instead of reaping the advantages they had promised themselves, they were to be exposed to fresh hazards, and the miseries of a starving war, they peremptorily declared against it, as a contrivance to divide them, and gave out, that they would not go for Ireland, till the liberties of the people, for which they first engaged in war, were secured; requiring, That the often-promised representative of the nation might be chosen. And finding that discourses and representations were to no purpose, they began to have recourse to arms. Accordingly Colonel Scroop's regiment, having laid aside their officers, marched with twelve troops from their quarters at Salisbury, towards Burford in Oxfordshire, in order to a conjunction with those of Harrison, Ireton and Skippon, and a party under one Thompson, then lying near Banbury. This they had effected, if the extraordinary diligence of Cromwell and Fairfax had not prevented them: For posting forty miles in one day, they overtook them at Abingdon, and first offer'd them a treaty, wherein satisfaction might be mutually given; and till that were done, that neither party might come within ten miles of each other; to which they agreed: But the Levellers, under Thompson, who had increased their numbers to about five thousand, marched to Burford; where, while they were securely resting themselves, and their horses put into the adjoining meadows, about twelve o'clock at night Colonel Reynolds fell into their quarters, routed them, and took four hundred of them prisoners, and nine hundred of their horses. Thompson took shelter in a wood near Milton, where he fought manfully till he was slain. Of the prisoners three only were executed, who dy'd very resolutely. Cornet Den expressing his grief and sorrow, was reprieved at the instant of execution; which which his companions beholding from the leads of the church, were saluted with a message of decimation, i.e. that every tenth man should die: But at Cromwell's desire they were all pardon'd, and sent home to their own houses. Thus was this insurrection quell'd on the fifteenth day of May.

After this, the lord-general Fairfax and lieutenant-general Cromwell visited Oxford, (the university having sent a deputation to invite them ti-ther) where they were nobly treated, and made doctors of the civil law; at which time also, Sir Hardress Waller and Mr. Rushworth, with eight colonels, were created masters of arts. Then they visited Portsmouth, from whence they return'd to London in triumph, and receiv'd new marks of honour from the parliament. And now, to promote a lasting union between the three principals of power, the parliament, the army, and the city, it was contriv'd, that the speaker, with the house, the general, with the chief officers, and the council of state, should, after hearing two sermons, be magnificently feasted at Grocers-ball, by the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council. This was accordingly done, on the 7th of June; the lord-mayor,
as 'twas usual towards kings, meeting Lentbal the speaker, with the rest of the members, at Temple-bar, and there resigning the sword to him; which having again receiv'd, he carried before him into the city. And having heard two sermons at Christcurch, preach'd by Mr. Goodwin and Dr. Owen, they proceeded to Grocers-ball to dinner. The speaker sat first; next to him the lord-mayor;
then the earl of Pembroke call'd to the lord commissioner Whitelock to sit down as the eldest commissoner of the Great-Seal: Whitelock excuse'd it, and desir'd the earl to sit down first: But he said
aloud, What, do you think I will sit down before you?
I have given place heretofore to bishop Williams, to my lord Coventry, and to my lord Littleton; and you have have the same place they bad; and as much honour belongs to the place under a commonwealth, as under a king; and you are a gentleman as well born and bred as any of them. The earl oblig’d Whitelock to take precedence of him, and sat down himself next to him; then the lord president of the council of state and the other commissioners of the Great-seal; then the earl of Salisbury and the lord Howard; after them lieutenant-general Cromwell, and other members of parliament, and of the council of state, &c. The musick at this feast, which was very sumptuous, was only drums and trumpets; no healths were drank, nor any incivility pass’d. At this entertainment there was presented by the city to the lord-general a large and weighty basin and ewer of beaten gold; and to lieutenant-general Cromwell three hundred pounds in plate, and two hundred pieces in gold.

Cromwell was now just entering upon a new scene of action, and making preparations for the reducing of Ireland to the power of the new commonwealth: But before we describe his memorable exploits in that kingdom, ’twill be proper to take a short view of the posture of affairs there for some time past, and the condition they were now in.

The Irish rebellion, the most barbarous and bloody that was ever executed in any part of the world, in which so many thousand Protestants were most inhumanly massacred, broke out in October 1641, which tho’ it had been contriv’d with such secrecy, and acted with such outrage, yet the city of Dublin was wonderfully preserv’d by Divine Providence; to be an asylum for such as escap’d thither, to avoid the fury of their bloody persecutors. Many of the poor Protestants came over also into England, hoping there to find shelter from the merciless enemy: But this proved little comfort to those distressed souls; for here they found, to the
Oliver Cromwell.

increafe of their grief, that England was preparing on all sides to act the same upon one another, which the Papists had done against them in Ireland. But tho' the difference between the king and parliament increas'd every day; yet 'twas so ordered, that some regiments were sent over into Ireland, to stop the proceedings of the rebels. After the war had been carry'd on for some time in England, the king finding his affairs in a declining condition, and that the parliament gain'd ground upon him, he in 1643, order'd the marquis of Ormond to make a truce with theIrish, that he might have the assistance of those English forces that were in Ireland, in his war with the parliament. A cessation of arms was accordingly agreed upon; but the Irish infamously broke the articles of it: For the English being now gone over to England, they on a sudden rose against the marquis, and had surpriz'd him, if he had not been inform'd before of their design, and escap'd into Dublin: And being in no condition to defend it, but obliged to deliver it up either to the English sent by the parliament, or to the Irish, he gave it up to the English (who made colonel Jones governor) and came over to the king, at what time he was carry'd from place to place by the army.

The marquis had not been long gone, but the treacherous Irish being terrify'd with the news, that the parliament was sending over an army thither, request'd the prince, to whom the marquis had repair'd, to send him back, engaging themselves to submit absolutely to his majesty's authority, and to obey the marquis as his lieutenant, and join with him to expel the parliament's forces. The marquis being accordingly arriv'd, entered into most dishonourable articles with the Irish, who having made a confederacy among themselves, soon became more formidable by the accession of the lord Ingbiquin, president of Munster, and the Scots in the province of Ulster. Before the arrival of the marquis, marquis, the pope's nuncio, who had been sent over to promote the grand rebellion, and had of late behaved himself so tyrannically, that he became intolerable even to the Irish themselves, was expell'd the kingdom: And now the royalists and Irish being united, Ireland seem'd in a fair way of being entirely reduc'd to the king's obedience. But Owen Roe Oneal, the best commander among the Irish, not liking the articles of the confederacy, refused to be included in it, and joining with the parliament's forces relieved Londonderry, then besieged by the lord Ardes. Ormond however and the confederates having a numerous army, the whole kingdom was almost reduced by them, excepting Londonderry, govern'd by Sir Charles Coot, and Dublin the chief city, wherein was colonel Jones with no very considerable force, besides that his men were frequently deserting their colours. The enemy with their formidable army was now marching to besiege it, and sent many threatening summons, requiring a speedy surrender of the place; which notwithstanding, thro' the vigilance of the governor, held out to the confusion of the besiegers. But his present difficulties, and the great danger he was in, made him renew his instances to the parliament, in the most pressing manner for speedy supplies of men and provisions; declaring, that else all would be lost. Hereupon the parliament, not insensible of his condition, began to provide for the relief of Ireland with all possible expedition: And appointed commissary-general Ireton, colonel Scroop, colonel Horton, major-general Lambert, with their four regiments of horse; colonel Ewer, colonel Cook, colonel Hewson, and colonel Dean, with theirs of foot, and five troops of dragoons, all old soldiers of the English army, for the said service: And besides these, other regiments were rais'd by beat of drum, to make up a sufficient force for effectually carrying on so great a work.
The forces being in a great degree of readiness, the parliament began now to think of a general for this expedition; and having had sufficient experience of Cromwell's great abilities, and knowing no man so fit for the employment, they desired him to accept of it; who not without some seeming reluctance at last undertook it, and after many humble expressions of his own unworthiness and disability to support so great a charge, and of the entire resignation of himself to their commands, and absolute dependance upon God's providence, he acquainted them, that he submitted to their good will and pleasure, and desired them to hasten all the necessary preparations; "For he confess'd that kingdom to be reduced to so great straights, that he was willing to engage his own person, purely for the difficulties which appeared in the expedition; and more out of hope to give some obstruction to the present success of the rebels, and to preserve to the commonwealth some footing in that kingdom, than from any expectation that he should be able, with his strength, in any signal degree to prevail over them."

The house was so well pleas'd with this answer, that immediately after, on the 22d of June, he had a pompous commission given him in Latin and English, to command all forces to be sent into Ireland, and to be lord-governor both as to civil and military affairs in that kingdom, for three years: And colonel Jones was made lieutenant-general of the horse. From the very minute of his receiving this charge, Cromwell us'd an incredible expedition in the raising of money, providing of shipping, and drawing the forces together for this enterprize. The soldiers march'd with great speed to the rendezvous at Milford-Haven, there to expect the new lord-deputy.

About this time, Cromwell had a remarkable interview with the lord Broghill; who having form'd...
The LIFE of 1649.

His remarkable interview with the lord Broghill.

a design of deserting the parliament's service, as the earl of Inebiquin had done, came privately to London, intending to go to the king in France. He was no sooner come to London, but a gentleman came to him from the lord governor Cromwell, to acquaint him that he would pay him a visit, if he knew when he would be at leisure; at which Broghill was exceedingly surpriz'd, having never had any acquaintance with him; and told the messenger he suppos'd he was mistaken in the person he was sent to: But the gentleman convincing him he was not, the lord Broghill own'd who he was, and said he would not give his excellency the trouble to come to him, but he would wait upon him. The messenger had not been long gone, before Cromwell came himself, and after compliments pass'd, desired to speak with his lordship in private; when he told him, He had a great respect for him, and was therefore come to acquaint him with something that very nearly concerned him, and to give him his advise upon it. He then told him, that the council of state were informed of his design in crossing the water (which the lord Broghill had communickated to two or three trusty friends only) that instead of going to the Spaw be designed to go to the king, and take a commission from him to act against the parliament in Ireland; That the council had good proof of what he said, and could produce copies of his letters to that purpose; upon which it was resolved to send him to the Tower; which had been done, if himself had not prevented it, and obtained time to confer with him, to see if he could be induc'd to alter his purpose. The lord Broghill seeing it would be to no purpose to evade the matter, ask'd Cromwell's pardon, thank'd him for his good offices, and request'd him to advise him. Cromwell reply'd, That the council of state and be were no strangers to his actions in Ireland; and the subduing of the rebels being committed to him, he was authorize'd by the council
Oliver Cromwell. 123

council to offer him a general command, if he would serve in that war. Broghill readily accepted this offer, and gave his word and honour, that he would be faithful to the parliament: And so having received a commission to be master of the ordnance, and to command in Munster, he embark'd for Ireland, where he was no sooner arriv'd, but several gentlemen, who had serv'd under him in those wars, join'd him; so that he soon form'd a troop of horse, and within a little time after, rais'd a regiment of 1500 foot, which were ready to join the lord governour Cromwell at his landing.

His excellency having dispatch'd his business with the parliament, on the 10th of July left London, setting forward in great state, being drawn in a coach with six horses, and attended by many members of the parliament and council of state, with the chief officers of the army; his life-guard consisting of eighty men, who had formerly been commanders, bravely mounted and accouter'd, both themselves and servants. Thus he was conducted to Brentford, where those gentlemen, who accompany'd him, took their leaves, wishing a prosperous issue to this undertaking; whom he answer'd again with great civility and respect. From hence he posted directly for Bristol, to take order for the train of artillery, and many other matters necessary for the hastening his men on shipboard.

From Bristol he takes his way into Wales, having sent over three regiments before, viz. colonel Reynolds's of horse, colonel Venables's and colonel Monk's of foot. These were shipped from Chester, and the ports thereabout; and being favour'd with a prosperous gale, quickly arriv'd at the port of Dublin, where they were welcome'd with unspeakable joy and gladness. The citizens spare'd for nothing that might be any relief to the sea-sick soldiers, hoping that the recovery of their health might be a means of enlarging their liberties, who now now were almost wholly confin'd within the narrow compass of their city walls. And they were not at all disappointed of their expectation: For Jones having his courage much heighten'd by the coming over of these supplies, now car'd not for the enemy's bravadoes, but resolved to remove them farther off; which he in a very little time effected.

For on the 2d of August he discovered a party of the enemy, about fifteen hundred foot besides horse, drawn down to their new work at Baggot-rath, a place about a quarter of a mile eastward of the city upon the sea. Hence they design'd to run their trenches towards the city-works, thereby to secure those forts which were begun to be rais'd towards the water, that they might hinder the landing of the forces and supplies expected from England. But Jones and Reynolds, with the rest of the commanders in the city, observing the enemy's design, judged it necessary to interrupt them: And so presently drawing out twelve hundred horse and four thousand foot, they soon enter'd the enemy's new works, and fell upon them with so much fury, that they routed the horse at the first charge; and soon after cut in pieces the greatest part of their foot, and took most of the rest prisoners. The report of this disaster soon reach'd the general Ormond's ears, who was then playing at tables in his tent; and understanding also, that Jones was making towards his main army, he wish'd the rebels would come that he might have some sport with them, and so went on with his game: But he was soon forced to leave it; for Jones with his men following the chase to Rathmims, where Ormond's camp was, engag'd his whole army, and after two hours fight, totally routed them with a very great slaughter. Four thousand were reckond to be kill'd on the place and in the chase, and above two thousand five hundred taken prisoners, of whom several were men men of quality, and amongst the rest Ormond’s own brother, himself very narrowly escaping. They left all their great guns, ammunition, and provisions, behind them; and withal a rich camp to reward the valiant soldiers; who with the spoil of it so trick’d themselves up, that when they returned to Dublin, many of the officers did not know their own men, they were grown so fine. This great victory was obtained with the loss of few, not above twenty of the parliament’s party being missing after the fight was over. The success was the more remarkable, because unexpected on both sides; Jones with his handful of men being led on step by step to a compleat victory, whereas their utmost design, at the beginning of the action, was only to beat the enemy from Baggot-rath. Ormond’s party were so surpriz’d, that they had not time to carry off their money, which lay at Rathfarnham, for the paying of their army, where Jones seiz’d four thousand pounds very seasonably for the payment of his men. The marquis upon this defeat fled to Kilkenny with a considerable number: Others betook themselves to Drogheda or Tredab, whither he soon came himself with three hundred horse, and in very good time; for lieutenant-general Jones hoping the town might be so terrified with this overthrow as to surrender, hastened thither with some horse to summon it; but having notice of Ormond’s coming, he marched back to Dublin.

The lord-governor Cromwell being at Milford-Haven, receiv’d the full account of Ormond’s defeat, when he rather expected to hear of the loss of Dublin, and was in great perplexity what to do. But the clouds being dispers’d upon the news of the great success his party had that he sent before, he deferr’d not to embark his whole army. On the thirteenth of August, he set sail from Milford-Haven with thirty-two ships, wherein was the van of his army; Ireton soon following him with the main body body in forty two other vessels, Hugh Peters with twenty sail bringing up the rear. With a very prosperous wind they soon arriv'd at Dublin, where they were receiv'd with all possible demonstration of joy, the great guns echoing forth their welcome, and the acclamations of the people resounding in every street. Cromwell being come into the city, where the concourse of the people was very great (they all flocking to see him, whom before they had heard so much of) at a convenient place he made a stand, and with his hat in his hand made a speech to them, telling them, "That as God had brought him thither in safety, so he doubted not but, by his divine providence, to restore them all to their just liberties and properties; and that all those, whose hearts and affections were real for the carrying on of the great work against the barbarous and blood-thirsty Irish, and all their adherents and confederates, for the propagating of the gospel of Christ, the establishing of truth and peace, and restoring that bleeding nation to its former happiness and tranquility, should find favour and protection from the parliament of England, and from himself, and withal receive such rewards and gratuities, as should be answerable to their merits." This speech was entertain'd with great applause by the people, who all cry'd out, That they would live and die with him.
Arrives at Dublin.

C H A P. II.

His actions in Ireland, and return from thence.

The army having refresh'd themselves, and the lord-lieutenant having settled both the military and civil affairs of Dublin, he drew his forces out of the city to a general muster, where appear'd a compleat body of fifteen thousand horse and
and foot; out of which was drawn twelve regiments, containing in all about ten thousand stout resolute men, for the present service. With this army, furnished with all things necessary, he advanced towards Tredagh, a town well fortified, with a garrison in it of two thousand five hundred foot, and three hundred horse, the flower of the royal army, under the command of Sir Arthur Abston, a brave experienced soldier. The marquis of Ormond had foreseen, that this place, by reason of its neighbourhood and situation, would be first attempted, it not being likely that the enemy would leave so considerable a fortress behind them; and he was in hopes he should have time to recruit his shattered army, and repair the loss of the late defeat, while Cromwell should be wasting his forces against a town they belief’d could hold out a month, and before that time be relieved: But the event shew’d how much he was mistaken.

CROMWELL was no sooner come before Tredagh, but, observing the rules of war, he summon’d the governour to surrender; which summons was slighted, and look’d upon rather as a matter of formality, than that he did believe to have the town upon it. Hereupon the lord-governor order’d all things for a quick dispatch of the siege. Ayscough’s ships block’d them up by sea; and on the land, the white flag was taken down, and the red ensign display’d before the town. The besieged were not much dismay’d at this, as expecting succour from the marquis of Ormond; and they seem’d to be unanimous in this resolution, rather than deliver up the town, to expire with it; as they did not long after.

For Cromwell being sensible of the mischiefs of a long siege, like an impatient conqueror, would not spend time in the common forms of approaches and turnings; but immediately planted a strong battery, which soon levell’d the steeple of a church on on the South side of the town, and a tower that stood near it. The next day, the battery continuing, the corner tower between the East and South walls was demolished, and two breaches made, which some regiments of foot immediately enter'd; but they were not made low enough for the horse to go in with them. Here the utmost bravery was shewn on both sides, the breaches being not more courageously assaulted than valiantly defended. The enemy within so furiously charg'd those who first enter'd, that they drove them back again faster than they came in. Cromwell, who was all this while standing at the battery, observing this, drew out a fresh reserve of colonel Ewer's foot, and in person bravely enter'd with them once more into the town. This example of their general inspir'd the soldiers with such fresh courage, that none were able to stand before them; and having now gain'd the town, they made a terrible slaughter, putting all they met with, that were in arms, to the sword; Cromwell having expressly commanded not to spare any one that should be found in arms; the design of which was to discourage other places from making opposition; to which purpose the lord-governor wrote to the parliament, That be believd this severity would save much effusion of blood. After's men did not fall unreveng'd, for they fought bravely, and desperately disputed every corner of the streets, making the conquerors win what they had by inches. The streets at last proving too hot, they fled to the churches and steeple, and other places of shelter. About an hundred were got into St. Peter's church-steeple, resolving there to fell their lives at as dear a rate as possible; but they were all quickly blown up with gunpowder, only one man escaping, who leap'd from the tower: The wind befriending him, he receiv'd no further hurt by the fall than breaking his leg; which Cromwell's men seeing, took him.
Oliver Cromwell

him up, and gave him quarter. In other places, when they refus'd to yield upon summons, strong guards were immediately put upon them to starve them out; which soon had that effect as to make them surrender themselves to the mercy of the conquerors, which was indeed but small; for all the officers were presently knock'd on the head, and every tenth man of the soldiers kill'd, and the rest thrust on shipboard for Barbadoes. The governour Sir Arthur Aston, here likewise met his fate, being put to the sword among the rest. And thus was this strong place taken and sack'd in less than a week's time, which the rebellious Irish were three whole years in taking. This great action was so surprizing, that O-Neal, at the hearing of it, swore a great oath, That if Cromwell had taken Tredagh by storm, if he should storm bell, he would take it.

The dismal destruction of Tredagh render'd Cromwell's name formidable to all other places round about. Few of them had so much resolution as to expect a summons to surrender; and particularly the garrison of Trim and Dundalk, fearing the like usage, abandon'd them to the conqueror. In this last place their haste was so great, that they left their great guns behind them, on the platforms. Cromwell did not, at that time, carry on his conquests any farther northward, but return'd to Dublin, and march'd with his army toward Wexford, that part lying convenient for subsisting his army in the southern counties. In his march, a place call'd Killingkerick, about fourteen miles from Dublin, being deferted by the enemy, he put a party of his men into it. Arckloe-castle was likewise abandon'd, and many other places submitted to him.

On the 1st of October, Cromwell with his army came before Wexford, and sent a summons to the governour, colonel David Synnot, requiring a speedy answer.

Many other places submit to him.
The LIFE of 1649.

dy surrender. His answer was somewhat dubious, which occasion'd many papers to pass betwixt him and the lord-general Cromwell. The governour did this on purpose to protract time until the earl of Castlehaven had thrown a party of five hundred foot into the town to reinforce the garrison; and having now receiv'd these recruits, he resolv'd to defend the place as long as he could, and seem'd to defy all attempts that might be made against him. Upon this, Cromwell applies himself in good earnest to the work, and bends his greatest force against the castle, knowing, that upon the gaining of that, the town must soon follow. He caus'd a battery to be erected against it, whereby a small breach being made, commissioners were sent from the enemy, to treat about a surrender. In the mean time the guns continued firing, no cessation having been agreed upon; whereby the breach in the castle being made wider, the guard that was appoint-ed to defend it, quitted their post; whereupon some of Cromwell's men enter'd the castle, and set up their colours at the top of it. The enemy observing this, quitted their stations in all parts, so that the others getting over the walls, possess'd themselves of the town without any great opposition, and let open the gates for the horse to enter, tho' they could do but little service, all the streets being barr'd with cables. The town being thus enter'd, none were suffer'd to live that were found in arms; and so they cut their way thro' the streets, till they came to the market-place, where the ene-my fought desperately for some time; but were at last quite broken, and all who were found in arms put to the sword. Ludlow says, that the foot press'd the enemy so close, that, crowding to escape over the water, they so over-loaded the boats, that many of them were drowned. Great riches were taken in this town, it being esteem'd by the enemy a place of strength; and some ships were seiz'd in the
Oliver Cromwell.

the harbour, which had much interrupted the commerce of that coast. The lord-lieutenant Cromwell appointed commissioners to take care of the goods that were found in the town belonging to the enemy, that they might be improv'd to the best advantage for the publick. The reduction of this place was of very considerable advantage to the conquerors, being a port-town, and very convenient for receiving supplies from England. And the severity that was exercis'd here, had the same effect with that us'd before at Drogheda; the terror spreading into all towns and forts along the coast as far as Dublin, spar'd the general the trouble of summoning them.

The winter now coming on, and it being a very wet seafon, Cromwell's troops suffer'd much from the weather, and the flux then raging amongst them. Many thought these reasons should have oblig'd him for the present to put a stop to his conquests; but he was of another mind, and more in the right than they. The difficulties the marquis of Ormond met with in bringing a new army into the field, after his late defeat, the ancient disagree-ment again breaking out between the Papis confederates and him, on account of that disaster, the secret intelligence held by Cromwell in the province of Munster, and the mighty affairs that call'd him back over the sea, seem'd to him more powerful motives for continuing the war, than the winter was to interrupt his progress.

Being thus resolv'd, he marches with his army towards Ros, a strong town upon the Barrow. The lord Taffe was governour of this place, who had a strong garrison with him; and the better to secure it, Ormond, Castlehaven, and the lord Ardes, in their own perfons, caus'd fifteen hundred men more to be boated over to reinforce it, Cromwell's army all the while looking on, without being able to hinder them. However, the lord-governour no sooner...
The LIFE of

1649. sooner came before the town, but he sent the governour a summons to this effect, "That since his coming into Ireland he ever endeavour’d to avoid the effusion of blood, having been before no place, where he did not first send them such terms, as might be for their preservation; and to continue the like course, he now summons them to deliver up the town to the parliament of England." No answer was at present return’d to this summons, till the great guns began to play; when the governour, being apprehensive of the same usage that other garrisons had before met with, was willing to treat; which being allow’d, they came to this agreement, "That the town be deliver’d up to lord-general Cromwell, and they within march away with bag and baggage to Kilkenny." Which fifteen hundred of them accordingly did; but six hundred of them being English, revolted to Cromwell.

In the mean time Kingsale, Cork, Youghall, Bandon-bridge, and other garrisons voluntarily declar’d for the conqueror; which garrisons prov’d of great use to the reduction of Munster, and consequently of all Ireland. Sir Charles Coot and colonel Venables were very successful in the north; and the lord Broghill and colonel Hewson did good service in other places.

CROMWELL having made himself master of Ros, caus’d a bridge of boats to be laid over the Barrow, and his army to sit down before Duncan- non, a strong fort commanded by colonel Wogan: But this place was so well provided with all things necessary, that it was, judg’d it would be time lost to tarry long before it. And so the army quickly rose, and march’d away into the county of Kilken- ny; where the marquis of Ormond, being join’d by Inchequin, seem’d resolv’d to give Cromwell battle. His army was strong both in horse and foot, far surpassing Cromwell’s, which was much weaken’d by by continual duty, difficult marches, the flux, and other diseases. Notwithstanding which, the marquis, upon the approach of his enemy, drew off without making any attempt, or striking one stroke. Upon which, Enistegoe, a little walled town, about five miles from Ros, was reduc'd by colonel Abbot; and colonel Reynolds, with twelve troops of horse, and three of dragoons, march'd up to Carrick; where having divided his men into two parts, whilst he amus'd them with one party, he enter'd a gate with the other, taking about a hundred prisoners, without the los's of a man.

The news hereof being brought to the lord-general Cromwell, then at Ros, where he had continued for some time indispos'd, he immediately march'd away with his army to besiege Waterford, in hopes of gaining that important place before his forces should draw into winter-quarters. Being come before it, he presently detach'd a regiment of horse, and three troops of dragoons to reduce Passage-fort; which party met with the desir'd success, the fort and castle, with five great guns, and much arms and ammunition, being soon deliver'd up to them. But the siege of Waterford was not so successfully carried on; for Cromwell perceiving that the city resolv'd to stand upon their own defence, and it being now December, and the weather very wet, he thought it most advisable to draw off his army into winter-quarters; where they might be refresh'd against the spring, for the better finishing of the work they had so prosperously begun.

In the mean time, a party of the enemy from Waterford, and another from Duncannon, joining together, besieg'd Passage-fort; but being set upon by colonel Zankey, they were totally routed, a great many of them being kill'd, and three hundred and fifty taken prisoners. Several other skirmishes were maintain'd with the like success; but the los's of lieutenant-lieutenant-general Jones, who died about this time at Wexford, of a violent fever, struck a damp upon all. He was a man every way bold and daring, of wonderful courage and resolution, and yet he govern'd his valour with prudence, being not rash, but advis'd in all his attempts: The army had a great loss of him, and his death was soon follow'd by that of colonel Wolf, and scout-master-general Roe. Many of the common soldiers had likewise their share in this mortality, but their numbers were recruited by continual supplies sent from England by the parliament. And now also the Irish, as well as the British soldiers, under the marquis of Ormond, being allur'd by the successes, and wrought upon by the invitations of the common-wealth, as also deterr'd by the plague that rag'd amongst them, together with the want of pay and necessaries, ran by whole troops to Cromwell's camp; who made very great use of the Irish animosities, and of the jealousies between them and Ormond. He us'd to ask some of the marquis's friends, whom he had taken prisoners, What the marquis of Ormond had to do with Charles Stuart, and what obligations he had receiv'd from him; and then would speak of the hard usage his grandfather had met with from king James, and the long imprisonment he had sustaine't by him, for not submitting to an extrajudicial determination, and said, he was confident, if the marquis and he could meet and confer together, they should part very good friends. And many, who heard these discourses, by his permission, gave the marquis information of all he had said.

Whilst the army continued in their winter-quarters, the vigilant and active Cromwell would not sit still, but visit'd all the garrifons that were in his possession in Munster, and order'd all affairs both military and civil. When he came to King-sale, the mayor of the town (as was usual in other places) deliver'd to him the mace and keys; which he he return'd not to him again, but gave them to colonel Stubber the governor. This was the more taken notice of, because it had not been us'd by the lord-lieutenant; but the reason of this proceeding was, because the mayor was an Irifhman, and also a papist, and so 'twas not judge'd proper to entrust such a one with the government of so important a place.
Oliver Cromwell.

About this time the parliament being apprehensive of the designs that were carrying on against them in Scotland in favour of the king, and thinking they might have occasion to make use of Cromwell for preventing the mischief that threatened them from thence, resolv'd that he should be sent for over into England, ordering the speaker to write a letter to him for that purpose; but it being towards the latter end of March before he receiv'd this letter, and it being not his temper to lie long idle, when he knew he had much to do, he proceeded in his work of reducing Ireland, and was very successful in it. The month of January was hardly expir'd, when the army took the field again in two bodies, which he divided on purpose to distress the marquis of Ormond. Himself took one party, and another was led by Ireton, who march'd away to Carrick, in order to reinforce himself by the conjunction of colonel Reynolds. These were to march into the enemy's quarters two several ways, and to meet together at a rendezvous near Kilkenny. In order to this design, Cromwell with his party march'd away over the Blackwater, towards the counties of Limerick and Tipperary. The first place reduc'd by him was a castle call'd Kilkenny, upon the borders of the county of Limerick. After that, he took Clogbern-house, belonging to Sir Richard Everard, one of the supreme council of the Irish. From thence he march'd to Roghill-castle, which upon summons was deliver'd up to him. Here with much difficulty he pass'd the ri-
136 The LIFE of

1649. ver Shewr, and without delay march'd away to Feathard, a garrison town where one Butler was governor. Being got into the suburbs about ten at night, he sent a trumpet with a summons to the town; but they shot at the trumpet, and being inform'd that the lord-lieutenant was with the party, they said, That it was not a fit time to send a summons in the night. Upon this a resolution being taken to storm, the governor thought fit to send two commissioners to treat with the lord-lieutenant; and after one night spent in the treaty, the town was surrender'd the next morning upon articles; which Cromwell the more readily granted them, because he had but few foot, and no great guns nor ladders; and seventeen companies of the Ulster foot were within five miles of the town. The enemy quitted it in some disorder, after which the magistrates sent a petition to the lord-lieutenant, desiring his protection.

The forces having a little refresh'd themselves at Feathard, the general march'd with them from thence to Calan, garrison'd by the enemy. Here he was join'd by Ireton, Reynolds, and Zankey, making up in all a considerable body. The chief strength of Calan consisted in three castles that were in the town; and these the soldiers storm'd one after another, and carry'd them all. Thus the place held out but one day, and paid dear for that short resistance, all who were in arms being put to the sword, except Butler's troops, which surrender'd before the cannon was fired. This so terrify'd some who defended a house about a musquet-shot from the town, that they presently sent to desire liberty to remove to Kilkenny; which the lord-general readily granted. The soldiers having sufficiently furnish'd themselves with the provisions they found in the town, march'd back again to Feathard, by the way, taking the two castles of Croftser, and Bully-nard; after which soon follow'd Kiltennon,
The lord-governor Cromwell had now entirely subdued all places of importance, except Limerick, Waterford, Clonmell, Galloway, and Kilkenny. These were places of great strength, and would take up much time; however, he resolv'd to attempt the last: But fearing the force he had might not be sufficient to carry on the design, he sent orders to colonel Hewson, the new governor of Dublin, to bring him all the forces he could draw out of the garrisons of Wexford, and the other posts he had taken on that side. Accordingly Hewson, after having taken Laughlin-Bridge, join'd the lord-governor's army near Gowram, a populous town, defended by a strong castle, whereof one Hammond a Kentish-man was governor. Being summoned to deliver it up, he return'd a very resolute answer, having great confidence in the valour of his men, who were Ormond's own regiment. Upon this, the great guns began to play, and did such furious execution, that he soon thought it time for him to beat a parley: But it was now too late; for he could obtain no other conditions than these, "That the common soldiers should have their lives, and the officers be dispos'd of as should be thought fit." The place being thus delivered up, to which Hammond was enforc'd by the sedition of the soldiers, he and all the commission-officers but one, were the next day shot to death; and the priest, who was chaplain to the popish soldiers in the regiment, hanged.

After this, the lord-governor proceeds in his design of besieging the city of Kilkenny. The garrison there required a more than ordinary strength to reduce it, as having been again and again reinforc'd by those who had surrender'd upon articles the small towns and castles in that county. But Cromwell, not at all discourag'd at this, on the 22d
1650. of March, sent first of all a small party of horse before to make discovery, and shortly after came up with his whole force. Being advance'd within a mile of the city, he made a stand, and sent a summons to Sir Walter Butler the governour, and the corporation, to deliver up the city, for the use of the parliament of England. The answer which was return'd the next day not being satisfactory, Cromwell made his approaches near to the wall, and caus'd a battery to be erected in the most convenient place for annoyng the besieged, and opening an entrance to the besiegers. In the mean time the besieged were not idle; but observing where the enemy bent his greatest strength, endeavour'd there to make the greatest opposition, by raising two re-trenchments within, strongly pallisading them, and placing some pieces that might play to the best advantage. Cromwell however, having made all the necessary preparations, fell furiously to battering the walls; whereby, after making about an hundred shot, a breach was open'd. In the mean while, colonel Ewer, with a thousand foot, was order'd to attempt another part of the city, called Irish-town; and the better to facilitate this enterprize, the soldiers were order'd to attack the foremention'd breach; which they accordingly did, but were forc'd to retreat with loss. However, the design took effect; for by this means the whole strength of the enemy was held in play, while colonel Ewer with his party gain'd Irish-town; which they did with very little loss. There was on the other side of the river another small town, or suburbs to the main city, and it was thought convenient to send eight companies of foot to possess themselves of it; which was done without any opposition: And this animated them to endeavour to force a passage over the bridge into the city; but the same misfortune happen'd as before at the breach. However, these desperate attempts occasion'd the governour to reflect more seriously Seriously upon his present circumstances; for the garrison in Cantwel-castle, whom he had sent for, had desired passes of the lord-governour Cromwell to go beyond sea, and enter themselves into the service of foreign princes, engaging never to act against the parliament of England; which request Cromwell granted them. But that which most of all discourag'd the governour, was, that he must not only defend himself, but must also be his own relief, there being no army in the field sufficient for that purpose. These things, together with the consideration, that the longer he stood out the worse he would fare, induc'd him to enter into a treaty; and after a day's debate, they came to an agreement upon the following terms: "First, That the city and castle should be deliver'd up to the lord-governour Cromwell, with all the arms, ammunition, and publick stores. "Secondly, The inhabitants of Kilkenny to be protected in their persons, goods, and estates, from the violence of the soldiery; and such as had a mind to remove, to have liberty so to do, three months after the date of the articles. "Thirdly, The governour, officers, and soldiers to march away with bag and baggage. "Fourthly, The city to pay two thousand pounds as a gratuity to his excellency the lord Cromwell's army."

Thus was the city of Kilkenny, which had been the nursery of the late rebellion, and the residence of the supreme council, reduc'd to the parliament's obedience in less than a week's time, and that chiefly by the vigilance, activity, and indefatigable industry of the lord general Cromwell; who would always bear a share in the hardships his soldiers were expos'd to, and never flinch from them at any time when his personal valour was necessary; so that he frequently laid aside the dignity of a great commander, to act the part of a private soldier.

CROMWELL stay'd no longer at Kilkenny than was necessary to settle the affairs of that city; after 1650.

His letter to the parliament.

after which he march'd with the army to Carrick, from thence to proceed upon further action. Here he wrote a letter to the speaker of the parliament, giving a particular account of the taking of Kilkenny, and several other places of less importance. And then concerning his coming over into England, he confess'd he had receiv'd many private intimations of the parliament's pleasure, as to that matter, and copies of their votes; but all these were but private intimations. He said, that he receiv'd not the speaker's letter till March 22d, which was dated Jan. 8. and then supposed the army to be in winter-quarters, and the time of the year not suitable for present action: Upon which he concludes thus;

"Making this as the reason of your command (viz. "the army being in winter-quarters, &c.) and "your forces having been in action ever since "Jan. 29. and your letter which was to be the "rule of my obedience, coming to my hands after "our having been so long in action, with respect "had to the reasons you were pleas'd to use therein; and having receiv'd a letter, signed by yourself of the 26th of Feb. which mentions not a "word of the continuance of your pleasure con"cerning my coming over; I did humbly conceive "it much consified with my duty, humbly to beg "a positive signification, what your will is; pro-
"fessing (as before the Lord) that I am most ready "to obey your commands herein, with all alacri-
"ty; rejoicing only to be about that work which "I am called to by those whom God hath set over "me, which I acknowledge to be you; and fear"ing only in obeying you, to disobey you. I "most humbly and earnestly beseech you to judge "for me, whether your letter doth not naturally "allow me the liberty of begging a more clear ex"pression of your command and pleasure; which "when vouchsafed to me, will find most ready "and cheerfull observance from, &c."
About this time, the marquis of Ormond, the lord Castlehaven, and the bishop of Clogher, reflecting on the desperate condition of their affairs, appointed a meeting in West-Meath, with the gentlemen of that county, to consider of some better way to support their cause, which was now almost ruin'd every where. In this meeting Ormond propos'd; "First, Whether they were able "to raise such forces, as might be sufficient to "engage with Cromwell. Secondly, In case they "were not able to fight, whether it were not ne- "cessary with all the forces they could make, to "fall into the English quarters, and there to "burn and destroy what they could, that they "might not be able to subsist. Thirdly, If this were "not feasible, then whether it were not most con- "venient for them all to join in some propositions "of peace for the whole kingdom; or every one "for himself, to make his particular application." This last expedient was most approv'd of by some; but the chief of them being conscious of their own guilt thought they were not very likely to obtain good conditions, when necessity oblig'd them to be suppliants; and therefore to molest the English in their quarters was judg'd to be most adviseable for them all, thereby to protract time, till they should have a fit opportunity to escape out of the kingdom.

The lord-lieutenant having well refresh'd his army after the siege of Kilkenny, march'd from Carrick, and sat down before Clonmell, another considerable place, in which was a garrison of two thousand foot, and a hundred and twenty horse. No sooner was the siege form'd but colonel Reynolds and Sir Theophilus Jones were order'd to march away with a detachment of two thousand five hundred horse, foot, and dragoons, to prevent Ormond's design of falling into the parliament's quarters; and notice hereof being sent to Sir Charles Charles Coot, he thereupon took the field with three thousand men. But the enemy shifting from place to place to avoid fighting, colonel Reynolds, that his men might not remain idle, besieged Tecrogham. In the mean time, the lord Brogbill being detach'd with another party of one thousand four hundred horse and dragoons, and one thousand two hundred foot, to fight the bishop of Ros,' who with five thousand men, was marching to relieve Clonmell, he soon got up with them and totally routed them, killing about seven hundred upon the place, taking twenty captains, lieutenants, and other officers; as also the bishop himself with the standard of the church of Munster. The lord Brogbill's horse are said to have done the service before the foot came up, and at such a pass, where a hundred musqueteers might have repell'd all the horse in Ireland. The bishop was carried to a castle which was kept by his own forces, and there hang'd before the walls, in the sight of the garrison; who were so dismay'd at it, that they immediately surrender'd the castle to the parliament's forces. This bishop us'd to say, There was no way to secure the English, but by hanging them; and now himself met with the same fate.

These advantages were a great encouragement to those who lay before Clonmell; which the lord-lieutenant us'd more than ordinary industry to reduce, understanding that its defenders were very unanimous, and withal choice men, well armed, and in all respects prepar'd to make a vigorous resistance. Besides, it was govern'd by an active Irishman, one Hugh O'Neal, who had employ'd all hands in the town for casting up new counter-scarps on the inside of the old walls, and doing every thing else that might tend to secure the place; so that it seem'd impossible to gain it by assault.

However, the valiant and active Cromwell, whose business now requir'd a quick dispatch, in regard
Oliver Cromwell.

regard that his service was likely very soon to be wanted elsewhere, resolved to try that course: And so having summon'd the governor to surrender, and receiving no satisfactory answer, he order'd the great guns to be planted; which did such noble execution, that a breach was very soon open'd, which the besiegers, upon a signal given, couragiously enter'd, and met with as gallant a resistance from the besieged; notwithstanding which the former made good their ground, and maintained a fight for four hours together, with doubtful success, there being a great slaughter on both sides: But at last the enemy was forced to quit the place, and betake themselves to flight; and tho' they were very much favour'd by some hills near the town, yet could they not escape the fury of the victorious soldiers, who killed many of them in the pursuit. An eminent commander in the army, who was himself in this fight, gave this account of it: "That they found in Clonmell the stoutest enemy that ever was found by the army in Ireland; and it was his opinion, and of many more, that there was never seen so hot a storm of so long a continuance, and so gallantly defended, neither in England nor Ireland." The subduing of this place, though with so much difficulty, made such an impression on many more, that in a very little time they submitted without so much as striking a stroke.

While Cromwell was thus conquering in one part of Ireland, Coot and Venables had the like success in another, and brought all the north under his obedience: The bishop of Clogher was here entirely routed, and being taken prisoner, met with the same fate as the bishop of Ross; and in this fight three thousand of the old Irish rebels were slain.

Thus the lord-lieutenant was on all hands attended with success; and he gave a constant account count of his proceedings to the parliament and council of state, in all his letters exhorting them to give the glory unto God, to whom it was only due. His proceeding so prosperously in his affairs, and obtaining thereby so great a sway, occasioned a book to be dispersed about this time, entituled, The character of king Cromwell; which, though suppress'd for a libel, is said to have been even receiv'd as a kind of prophecy. And indeed by the good government of the army, in Ireland, and the great success of it, and the well ordering of the civil affairs of that kingdom, Cromwell obtained a very great interest, not only in the officers of the army, both there and here, but likewise in the parliament and council of state, and all their party; only the Scots and Presbyterians were generally no favourers of him or his proceedings. He was now preparing to take Waterford and Duncannon, which he had mis'd of before; and had actually block'd up Waterford, when about the middle of May, he appoints Ireton his deputy. He had been in Ireland about nine months; a very inconsiderable time, if we respect the great work he perform'd therein, which was more than ever any king or queen of England was able to do in so many years before.

WATERFORD was surrender'd soon after his departure; and so remarkable was the parliament's success in all parts of that kingdom, through the active valour, prudence, and industry, of the lord-lieutenant Cromwell, and those whom he employ'd, that in less than a year's time, they were masters of all but Limerick, Galloway, and some few garrisons and forces on the Fastnesses. Before the lord-governor left the isle, that he might the better weaken the Irish, he contriv'd...
triv'd means for transporting no less than forty thousand of them out of the nation, into the service of foreign princes; of whom few ever return'd again to their native country: So great a scourge was he to that rebellious and blood-thirsty generation.

Cromwell having appointed Ireton his deputy, and visited those places in Munster, which had lately submitted to the parliament, with design to settle the civil as well as military affairs of that province; for which end he made John Coke, Esq; chief justice of Munster; and having order'd all things in the best manner that was possible, he embark'd for England, and failed home, as 'twere, in triumph. After a boisterous passage, he landed at Bristol, where the great guns were fir'd thrice over at his arrival, and he was welcom'd with many other demonstrations of joy. Hence, without delay, he posts for London; and on Hounslow-beath, was met by the lord-general Fairfax; many members of parliament and officers of the army, and multitudes of people, who came out of curiosity to see him, who had made himself so famous, and acquir'd such high renown by his great and valiant actions. Being thus attended, he proceeds on, and coming to Hyde-park is saluted with great guns, and several volleys of shot from colonel Barkstead's regiment, which was drawn up in the way for that purpose. Thus in a triumphant manner he enter'd the city of London, amidst a crowd of attendants, friends, citizens, &c. and was receiv'd with great demonstrations of joy. Here 'tis observ'd, that as he did not refuse the honours that were paid to him on this occasion, so he shew'd he had too much good sense to make much account of them; for as he was passing by Tyburn, a certain flatterer pointing to the crowds of people that came to meet him, and saying, See what a multitude of people come to attend your triumph; he answer'd...
answer'd with a smile and very unconcern'd, More would come to see me hang'd. Being conducted to the Cock-pit, which had been prepared for his reception, the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, and many other persons of quality, paid their visits to him, congratulating the safe arrival of his excellency, and expressing their own and the nation's great obligations to him. Having resumed his place in parliament, the speaker in an elegant speech gave him the thanks of the house, for the great and faithful services he had perform'd for the common-wealth in the nation of Ireland: After which the lord-lieutenant gave them a full and particular account of the present state and condition of that country.

And here, as it will not fall in my way in the remaining part of this history, I shall conclude this chapter with the death and character of the lord-deputy Ireton, who died about a year and a half after Cromwell's departure. He had proceeded very successfully in his new government and command; and after the taking of several places, giving articles to some, and making examples of others, he attempted the strong city of Limerick, which after a long siege, at last surrender'd to him: But falling sick of the plague here shortly after, he ended his days on the 26th of November, 1651. This man has been highly extolled by some, and as much condemn'd by others. So far as we have had occasion to mention him in this history, we have given as just an account of his actions and proceedings as we could; wherein the reader must be left to censure or acquit him as he shall think fit, after we have given this short character of him from Whitelock, who seems the most impartial: "This gentleman, says he, was a person very active and industrious (or, as he says elsewhere, a man of industry and invention) and stiff in his ways and pur-
Oliver Cromwell.

He was of good abilities for counsel as well as action; and made much use of his pen, and was very forward to reform the proceedings in law, wherein his having been bred a lawyer was an help to him. He was stout in the field, and wary and prudent in his counsel, and exceedingly forward as to the business of a common-wealth. He married Cromwell's daughter, who had a great opinion of him; and no man could prevail so much, nor order him so far as Ireton could. His death struck a great sadness into Cromwell; and indeed it was a great loss to him, of so able and active, so faithful, and so near a relation, and officer under him. The new commonwealth had also a great loss by his death; who, to express their gratitude for his important services, order'd his body to be brought over to England; where having first lain in state in Somerset-house, he was interr'd at Westminster among the English kings, with the greatest pomp and magnificence.

Chap. III.

From Cromwell's return out of Ireland, to the battle of Dunbar.

In less than a month after the lord-lieutenant's return from his conquests in Ireland, he was employ'd by the parliament in a new expedition against the Scots; who, upon the king's death, had proclaim'd his son prince Charles, king of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, and sent commissioners to him at the Hague, to invite his majesty into Scotland, or rather to acquaint him upon what terms he might come thither: For though they had declare'd his right to succession, yet before he should be admitted to the exercise... of his royal power, he was to "Give satisfaction to the kingdom in those things which concern'd the security of religion, the unity betwixt the kingdoms, and the good and peace of that kingdom, according to the national covenant, and the solemn league and covenant." Whilst these things were transacting, the king began to perceive, that the States-general were very uneasy at his continuance in their dominions, fearing it might give some umbrage to the English commonwealth, with whom they had no mind to break. They gave daily intimations, That the king's residing at the Hague, would be very inconvenient for them; and 'twas owing wholly to the great interest and dexterity of the prince of Orange, that they did not send a message directly to desire him to depart. However, the king resolv'd to remove; and an accident happen'd at this time, which hasten'd that resolution; which was the assassination of Dr. Dorislaus at the Hague. This man had been concern'd in the late king's trial; and being sent as an agent from England, for the getting and continuing a right understanding and fair correspondence betwixt the two Republicks, while he was at supper in his lodgings, with many others at the table, six men enter'd the room with their swords drawn, and bid those at the table not stir, for they intended no harm to any but the agent, who came from the rebels in England, who had lately murdered their king. Hereupon one Whiteford pull'd Dorislaus from the table, and killed him at his feet, saying, Thus dies one of the regicides: And so putting up their swords, they went quietly out of the house, and escaped unpunished, though the States pretended they had used their utmost endeavours to get them apprehended.

The king left the Hague in May, 1649, taking his journey into France, where he staid some months with the queen his mother at St. Germains; But
But the court of France growing uneasy at his continuance there, he at length embark'd for the isle of Jersey, which together with Guernsey, Man, and Scilly, had not yet submitted to the parliament.

It was no sooner known in Scotland, that the king was arrived at Jersey, but Sir George Windram, laird of Libberton, was sent with a message to him; who, in the beginning of October, presented the following desires and offers of the States of Scotland: First, "That he would sign the covenant, and pass an act for all persons to take it. Secondly, That he would pass the acts of parliament in Scotland, which were ratified by their two last sessions. Thirdly, That he would withdraw his commission from the marquis of Montros. Fourthly, That he would put away all Papists from about him. Fifthly, That he would appoint some place in Holland to treat with commissioners from the estates of Scotland. Sixthly, That he would give a speedy answer."

About this time, the rulers in England having prepar'd a fleet against the isle of Jersey, it was judged necessary for his majesty to leave that place, and return through France to Breda. Here he fell into new treaties with the Scotch commissioners, who waiting on him about the latter end of March, insisted on his compliance with the following propositions from the kirk and States of Scotland: First, "That all excommunicated persons should be forbid access to the court. Secondly, That the king would by solemn oath, and under his hand and seal, declare his allowance of the national covenant of Scotland, and of the solemn league and covenant of the three nations. Thirdly, That he should confirm all acts of parliament, enjoining the solemn league and covenant, establishing Presbytery, the di..." 150

The LIFE of

1650. "rectory, the confession of faith and catechism in the kingdom of Scotland, as they are already approved by the general assembly of the kirk, and the parliament; and that he would observe the same in his own family, and swear never to oppose, or endeavour the alteration of the same. Fourthly, That he would consent, that all civil matters might be determined by the present and subsequent parliaments in Scotland, and all matters ecclesiastical, by the general assembly of the kirk."

While the king was consulting with his friends what was best to be done in this exigency, an accident happened that had like to have broke off the treaty. Whilst his majesty resided at the Hague, the marquis of Montross waited on him, and undertook, if he would follow his advice, to restore him to his kingdoms by force of arms. He only desired of the king power to act in his name, and a supply in money, with a letter recommending him to the king of Denmark for some ships, and such arms as he could spare.

All these being granted by the king, and preparations made for the expedition, Montross, with no more than six or seven hundred men, in four ships, resolved to venture his fortune, expecting to join with the northern people in Scotland, who had formerly experienced his great bravery and conduct. He got first to the islands of Orkney, and from thence into the Highlands; but could perform nothing of what he had undertaken, Leslie having ordered colonel Straughan to advance towards him, with three hundred choice horse; who in April, 1650, set upon this ill composed body of Montross, and utterly routed them. Montross fled, but was at last betray'd by one of those to whom he intrusted himself, Mackland of Affin, and was brought prisoner to Edinburgh. He was carried through the streets with the most brutal brutal infamy that could be devis'd, and in a few days, by a sentence pronounced by the lord Lowden, was hanged upon a gibbet thirty foot high for three hours; after which he was quartered, and his head set upon the Talbooth, and his legs and arms over the gates of Sterling, Glasgow, Dundee, and Aberdeen. His behaviour under all his sufferings was as great and firm to the last, as the fury of the covenanters against him was black and universally detested.

The violent party in Scotland were hereupon for breaking off the treaty with the king, though by the date of the marquis's commission, it appeared to have been granted before the treaty commenced: However, it was carried not to recal their commissioners. On the other hand, one would think that this cruelty to one who had acted by his commission, would effectually have prevented the king from complying with them. But he was in no condition to struggle with these men, and so quickly yielded to all their demands. And being furnished with some Dutch men of war by the prince of Orange, he embark'd for Scotland; where he landed on the 16th of June, after a demand from the council, That he would sign both the covenants before he set his feet on the shore; to which he was persuaded to consent. He tarried several days at Dundee, attended with one committee from the parliament, and another from the kirk, who were urging his majesty to sign several propositions, and before he comply'd, would not agree to his coming to Edinburgh to be crowned.

The parliament and committee of estate were likewise endeavouring to raise an army for the king's service, as they alleged'd, and to that end had publish'd an act for training of every fourth man, who was able to bear arms throughout the kingdom. With this army 'twas suppos'd they intended to invade England, and secure the establishment Cromwell advises to invade Scotland.

The establishment of the king in his throne. The preachers were very earnest in their persuasions to engage the people in this cause; and notwithstanding the several obstructions they met with, by reason of their divisions among themselves, they completed their levies to about sixteen thousand foot, and six thousand horse. The king was suffer'd to come once and see this army, but not to stay in it; for they fear'd he might gain too much upon the soldiers. Special care was taken not to suffer malignants or engagers, as they call'd the Hamiltonian party, to be in this army. All who deserted their cause, or were thought indifferent as to either side, which they call'd detestable neutrality, were put out of commission. And now the preachers, thinking they had got an army of saints, seem'd well assur'd of success.

Whilst these transactions and preparations were carrying on in Scotland, the commonwealth of England took great care to provide for its own support and security. To this end, as has been already mentioned, before the king landed in Scotland, it was thought necessary to send forth the lord-lieutenant Cromwell out of Ireland; who immediately advised the council of state, not to be behind hand with their enemy, nor to trust to any after-game, but to prevent the Scots invasion of England, by carrying the war directly into Scotland. But some scrupulous men amongst them objected, That to begin a war with Scotland would be contrary to the covenant: To which it was answer'd, "That the Scots had already broken the covenant, "and that therefore it was not now binding on the "one side, after it had been dissolved on the o-"ther." So that they came at length to this res-"olution, "That having a formed army, well pro-"vided and experienced, they would march it "forthwith into Scotland, to prevent the Scots "marching into England, and the miseries that "might
"might attend such an invasion." The lord-general Fairfax, being advis'd with herein, seem'd at first to like the design; but being afterwards hourly persuaded by the Presbyterian ministers, and his own lady, who was a great patroness of them, he declared, That he was not satisfy'd, that there was a just ground for the parliament of England, to send their army to invade Scotland; but in case the Scots should invade England, then he was ready to engage against them in defence of his own country. The council of state being somewhat troubled at the lord-general's scruples, appointed a committee to confer with him, in order to satisfy him of the justice and lawfulness of this undertaking. This committee were Cromwell, Lambert, Harrison, St. John, Whitelock, &c. Cromwell open'd the conference; and after some previous discourse between the lord-general and the committee, his excellency acquainted them with the ground of his dissatisfaction, declaring, That he did not see that the Scots had given sufficient cause for this invasion of their country by the English. Upon which Cromwell proceeded thus: "I confess, my lord, that if they have given us no cause to invade them, it will not be justifiable for us to do it; and to make war upon them without a sufficient ground for it, will be contrary to that which in conscience we ought to do, and displeasing both to God and good men. But, my lord, if they have invaded us, as your lordship knows they have done since the national league and covenant, and contrary to it, in that action of duke Hamilton, which was by order and authority from the parliament of that kingdom, and so the act of the whole nation by their representatives; and if they now give us too much cause of suspicion, that they intend another invasion upon us, joining with their king, with whom they have made a full agreement, without the assent

His speech in the committee, for satisfying the general.
affent or privity of this common-wealth; and are very busy at this present in raising forces and money to carry on their design: If these things are not a sufficient ground and cause for us to endeavour to provide for the safety of our own country, and to prevent the miseries which an invasion of the Scots would bring upon us, I humbly submit it to your excellency's judgment. That they have formerly invaded us, and brought a war into the bowels of our country, is known to all, wherein God was pleas'd to bless us with success against them: And that they now intend a new invasion upon us, I do as really believe, and have as good intelligence of it, as we can have of any thing that is not yet acted. Therefore I say, my lord, that upon these grounds, I think we have a most just cause to begin, or rather to return and requite their hostility first begun upon us; and thereby to free our country (if God shall be pleas'd to assist us, and I doubt not but he will) from the great misery and calamity of having an army of Scots within our country. That there will be a war between us, I fear is unavoidable: Your excellency will soon determine, whether it be better to have this war in the bowels of another country, or of our own; and that it will be in one of them, I think it without scruple." But no arguments could prevail on the general, who declar'd that his conscience was not satisfy'd as to the justice of this war; and therefore, that he might be no hindrance to the parliament's designs, he desir'd to lay down his commission. Upon which Cromwell spoke again, as follows:

"I am very sorry your lordship should have thoughts of laying down your commission, by which God hath blessed you in the performance of so many eminent services for the parliament. I pray, my lord, consider all your faithful ser-
Oliver Cromwell.

"vants, us who are officers, who have serv'd under you, and desire to serve under no other general. It would be a great discouragement to all of us, and a great discouragement to the affairs of the parliament, for our noble general to entertain any thoughts of laying down his commission. I hope your lordship will never give so great an advantage to the publick enemy, nor so much dishearten your friends, as to think of laying down your commission." But all this would not do: The general still continued in the same mind, and concluded thus: "What would you have me do? As far as my conscience will give way, I am willing to join with you still in the service of the parliament; but where the conscience is not satisfy'd, none of you, I am sure, will engage in any service; and that is my condition in this, and therefore I must desire to be excused."

Cromwell and the other officers in this committee were most earnest in persuading the general to continue his commission; and yet'tis said, there was cause enough to believe that they did not overmuch desire it. Ludlow says, that Cromwell press'd the council of state, "That notwithstanding the unwillingness of the lord Fairfax to command upon this occasion, they would yet continue him to be general of the army, professing for his own part, That he would rather chuse to serve under him in his post than to command the greatest army in Europe." He also informs us, that the foregoing committee was appointed upon the motion of lieutenant-general Cromwell, Who, says he, acted his part so to the life, that I really thought him in earnest. And indeed, if he had not been in earnest, I do not think he would have us'd the most likely arguments to convince the general of the lawfulness of the designed expedition, Fairfax laying down his commission, Cromwell was made general in his room.

A private conference between Cromwell and Ludlow.

A day or two after, there was a private conference between general Cromwell and colonel Ludlow; the occasion whereof was this: The general told Ludlow, as he sat by him in the house, that having observ'd an alteration in his looks and carriage towards him, he apprehended that he had entertain'd some suspicions of him; and being persuaded of the tendency of both their designs to the good of the publick, he desir'd that a meeting might be appointed, wherein they might freely lay open the grounds of their mistakes and misapprehensions, and a foundation might be laid for a good understanding between them for the future. Ludlow answer'd, that he discover'd in him what he had never perceiv'd in himself; yet since he was pleas'd to do him the honour to desire a free conversation with him, he assur'd him of his readiness therein. Hereupon they agreed to meet that afternoon in the council of state, and from thence to retire.
retire to a private room; where general Cromwell endeavou’rd to persuade Ludlow of the necessity incumbent upon him to do several things that appear’d extraordinary in the judgment of some men, who in opposition to him, took such courses as would bring ruin upon themselves, as well as him and the publick cause; assuring him, That his intentions were entirely directed to the good of the people, and that he was most ready to sacrifice his life in their service. Ludlow confeis’d his former dissatisfaction with him and the rest of the army, when they were treating with the king, whom he look’d upon as the only obstruction to the settlement of the nation; and with their actions at the rendezvous, where they shot a soldier to death, and imprison’d several others, upon the account of that treaty; which he conceiv’d to have been done without authority, and for sinister ends: Yet as they had since manifested their adherence to the commonwealth, he was well enough satisfy’d, tho’ some things were still carry’d otherwise than he could wish. Here-upon (as Ludlow himself, who relates this conference, tells us) the general acknowledg’d, that his dissatisfaction with the army, whilst they were treating with the king, was founded upon good reasons, and excus’d what had been done at the rendezvous, as absolutely necessary to keep things from falling into confusion; which must have follow’d upon that division, if it had not been seasonably prevented. He further tells us, that the general profess’d to desire nothing more, than that the government of the nation might be settled in a free and equal commonwealth; acknowledging, that there was no other probable means to keep out the old family and government from returning upon them. Then after a long discourse, favouring much of enthusiasm, after the manner of those times, he added, “That it was his intention to contribute the utmost of his endeavours to make a thorough reformation reformation of the clergy and law: But, said he, the sons of Zerviah are yet too strong for us; and we cannot mention the reformation of the law, but they presently cry out, we design to destroy property; whereas the law, as it is now constituted, serves only to maintain the lawyers, and to encourage the rich to oppress the poor: Affirming, that Mr. Coke, then justice in Ireland, by proceeding in a summary and expeditious way, determin'd more causes in a week, than Westminster-ball in a year." He said further, "That Ireland was as a clean paper in that particular, and capable of being govern'd by such laws as should be found most agreeable to justice; which may be so impartially administer'd as to be a good precedent even to England itself, where, when they once perceive property preserve'd at an easy and cheap rate in Ireland, they will never permit themselves to be cheated and abused, as now they are."

Before the lord-general's departure for the Scotch expedition, he mov'd the council of state, "That since they had employ'd him about a work which would require all his care, they would be pleas'd to ease him of the affairs of Ireland:" Which they not consenting to, he then moved, "That they would at least send over some commissioners for managing the civil affairs; assuring them likewise, that the military being more than major-general Ireton could possibly carry on, without the assistance of some general officer to command the horse, which employment was become vacant by the death of the brave lieutenant-general Jones, it was absolutely necessary to commission some worthy person for that employment, and to authorize him to be one of their commissioners for the civil government." And thereupon he mentioned colonel Ludlow as a fit person for that charge; telling them, "That tho' he himself..."
himself was empowered by virtue of his commission from the parliament, to nominate the lieutenant-general of the horse, yet because the gentleman he propos'd, was a member of parliament, and of the council of state, he desired, for the better securing the obedience of the army to him, that the parliament might be mov'd to nominate and appoint him to that employment."

In the end the council agreed, "That the house should be mov'd to appoint colonel Ludlow lieutenant-general of the horse in Ireland; and that the lord-general Cromwell, major-general Ireton, colonel Ludlow, colonel John Jones, and major Salway, or any three of them, should be authorize'd by act of parliament, to be commissioners for the administration of the civil affairs in that nation." And the parliament concur'd with the council herein, with the addition only of Mr. Weaver, a member of the house, to be one of the commissioners for managing the civil government.

The lord-general Cromwell having thus provided for the well ordering of the affairs of Ireland, on the 29th of June set out on his journey towards the army in the north. He received great demonstrations of respect from the generality of the people, as he passed along; and on the 4th of July he arriv'd at York, accompany'd with many great officers of the army. Here the lord-mayor and aldermen attended him, and invited him and his officers to a stately dinner, where they were highly caress'd, and entertain'd with mighty expressions of joy. But having his business chiefly at heart, he staid here no longer than to order supplies for the army and hasten their rendezvous.

Before this, the committee of estates in Scotland, seeming to be surpriz'd at the news of the English army's marching northwards, began to expostulate the matter with the parliament; sending a letter to the speaker by colonel Grey, to this effect, "That..."
That they wondered at the report of the English army's advance towards their country, and that many of their ships were secured by the English contrary to the act of pacification in the large treaty, whereby no acts of hostility were to be used against each other, without three month's warning given before-hand: That the forces they were raising were only for their own defence; and therefore they desired to know, if the English army, now on their march northward, were design'd for offence or defence; to guard their own borders, or invade Scotland.

Letters of the same import were also sent to Sir Arthur Haslerigg governor of Newcastle, major-general Lambert, and the lord-general Cromwell.

On the other hand, the parliament of England published a declaration of the grounds and reasons of their army's advance northwards; some of which were to this effect: "First, That the Scots, contrary to their agreement, had once already invaded England under duke Hamilton, and were now ready for a second invasion; so that the English were advances against them only by way of prevention. Secondly, That altho' they could not claim to themselves any authority or dominion over the English, yet in Scotland they proclaimed Charles Stuart king of England and Ireland; and since that, promis'd to affist him against this commonwealth. Thirdly, That they declared against the English parliament and army, as sectaries, ranking them with malignants and papists; and had resolved to impose their form of religion upon the English nation."

The Scots perceiving that with all their arts the parliament of England was not to be imposed on, now laboured by all methods possible to render their army odious, and incense the people against them. To this end they gave out, "That Cromwell had a commission to come for Scotland with fire and sword,"
Oliver Cromwell.

1650.

"Sword, and was to give no quarter to any Scot; and that he was to have all he could conquer for himself and his soldiers." And they further reported, "That the English army intended to put all men to the sword, and to thrust hot irons thro' the women's breasts." This exceedingly terrify'd the people, till they were somewhat eas'd by a declaration of the lord-general and the army, directed to the well-affected in Scotland, to the following purpose: "That being to advance into Scotland, for the ends express'd in the parliament's declaration; and considering the practices of some in that nation, whose designs were by unjust reproaches and false flanders to make their army odious, and represent them as monsters rather than men; therefore, to clear themselves, they could do no otherwise than to remind them of their behaviour when they were before in Scotland: What injury was then done either to the persons, houses, or goods of any? Considering this, it was hop'd that the present false reports would not affright them from their habitations." And they further declar'd "from the integrity of their hearts, That such of the gentry and commonalty, as inhabited where the army might come; they being none of those who by their counsels laid the foundation of a second invasion, or clos'd with him who had endeavour'd to engage foreign princes against the commonwealth of England, and had exercis'd actual hostility, by commissioning pirates to spoil the ships and goods belonging thereto; should not have the least violence or injury offer'd to them, either in body or goods; or if any should happen, upon complaint made, redress and satisfaction should immediately be had. Wherefore they desir'd all persons to continue in their habitations, assuring them they should enjoy what they had without any disturbance." Copies of this declaration were immediately...
The general in the mean time leaving York, came to Northallerton, and the next day to Darlington, where, as he pass'd by, the train of artillery, which was quarter'd there, saluted him with seven pieces of ordnance. From hence he posts to Durham, where he was met by Sir Arthur Haslerigg, who conducted him to Newcastle, where he was governour, and entertain'd him there with a great deal of gallantry. Here the lord-general and his officers kept a solemn fast, to implore the blessing of God upon the present expedition: And then having duly consider'd the affairs of the army, he setteld a method for supplying it from time to time with provisions. This done, he leaves Newcastle, and hastens towards Berwick; and his forces being all come up, he on the 20th of July caus'd a general rendezvous of them to be on Haggerston-Moor, four miles from Berwick; where he was receiv'd by the army with great shouting and other signs of joy. Being all drawn up in battalia, there appear'd a gallant body of about five thousand horse and eleven thousand foot. The general march'd them about two or three hundred paces, and then dismiss'd them to their quarters, whilst himself went to Berwick; whence the army's declaration was sent into Scotland, containing the grounds of their march into that kingdom, one copy of it to the Scotch general, another to the parliament, and a third to the committee of estates.

The army being thus quarter'd upon the very edge of Scotland, the lord-general two days after, drew them out on a hill within Berwick bounds; where they had a full prospect of the adjacent country, the stage whereon they were so soon to act their parts. Here he made a speech to them, declaring...
claring the grounds of their present undertaking, and something in relation to his coming from Ireland, and the providence that had design'd this command to him; and exhorting them to be faithful and courageous, and then not to doubt of a blessing from God, and all encouragement from himself. This speech was answer'd with loud and unanimous acclamations from the soldiers; who being order'd to march, went on shouting as they enter'd Scotland. That night they quarter'd in the field near the lord Mordington's castle; where the lord-general, for the better preserving good order and discipline, caus'd a proclamation to be made throughout the camp, "That none, on pain of death, should offer violence or injury to the persons or goods of any in Scotland not in arms; and withal, that none on the same penalty do presume, without special licence, to straggle half a mile from their quarters." From hence they advanc'd for Cumberpath, and the next day arriv'd at Dunbar, where they were recruited with provisions from the ships sent thither from England for that purpose; for the country afforded them none, the Scotch estates having taken a course before-hand, to clear all the country from Berwick to Edinburgh, of all things that might afford any succour or relief to the English army. But this entertainment did not in the least discourage them, it being no other than they expected.

The army being somewhat refresh'd at Dunbar, march'd from thence to Haddington, twelve miles from Edinburgh; and all this without the least opposition, not seeing all this while the face of an enemy in arms; nor did they in all their march see one Scotchman under sixty years of age, nor any youth above six, and but very few women and children; they being all fled from their habitations, upon their ministers telling them, "That the English would cut the throats of all..."
The LIFE of 1650.

"between sixty and sixteen years old, cut off the right hands of all the youths under sixteen and above six, burn the women's breasts with hot irons, and destroy all before them." Whereupon, as the army march'd through some towns, poor women fell on their knees, begging that they would not burn their breasts before they destroy'd them, and children begg'd them to save their lives; so much did the people believe what their ministers had told them.

The next day after the army's remove to Haddington, they understood that the enemy was dispos'd to give them battle on a heath called Gladsmoor. Whereupon the English endeavour'd to possess themselves of the place before them, that they might have the advantage of ground in case they should meet them: But the Scots, it seems, thought not fit to appear. Upon this major-general Lambert and colonel Whally were order'd to advance with one thousand four hundred horse toward Muscleborough, four miles from Edinburgh; and major Hains commanding the forlorn, faced the enemy within three quarters of a mile of their trenches. The next day the lord-general drew up his whole army before Edinburgh, near which the Scotch army was encamp'd upon a very advantageous ground. Here some skirmishes happen'd about the possession of king Arthur's-hill, a place within a mile of the city; which the English gain'd, having beaten the enemy from it; and soon after possessed themselves of a church and several houses. But all these provocations could not prevail on the Scots to forfake their trenches, nor would they by any means be drawn forth to engage in a general combat. The lord-general intended to have made an attempt upon them; but there fell so great a rain, which continued all night, and part of the next day, and his men were so wearied out with hard duty, that he was oblig'd to draw off his army.
my to Muscleborough, there to refresh and recruit it with provisions. As he drew off, the Scots, who labour'd all they could to vex and distress the English army, without coming to a general engagement with them, sallied out, and falling upon the rearguard, put them into some disorder; but major-general Lambert and colonel Whalley coming in to their relief, routed the Scots, and beat them back into their trenches. Lambert was wounded in the charge, and had his horse killed under him; but they took two colours, and several prisoners of the enemy; whilst the king stood all the while upon the castle, and saw the encounter. Some few of the English were kill'd, but far more of the Scots, amongst whom were some persons of quality. After this, the English march'd on quietly to Muscleborough, tho' in a very wet and weary condition; that night they stood upon their guard, expecting every moment to be set upon by their enemy; as at last they were: For between three and four o'clock in the morning, major-general Montgomery, and colonel Straughan, with fifteen companies of choice horse, fell into their quarters with such fury, that they bore down the guards, and put a regiment of horse in disorder. But the English army taking the alarm, charg'd them so home that they put them to the rout, and pursued them within half a league of Edinburgh, killing several officers and soldiers, and taking many prisoners. The Scots, when they fell first upon the English, cry'd out, Give no quarter, but kill all; and particularly they refus'd to give quarter to one captain Phineas, whom notwithstanding the English brought off. There were two ministers in the Scotch party, and one of them was taken prisoner; and 'tis said the Scotch soldiers confess'd, That the ministers did most stir them up to cruelty. The lord-general, to shew his generosity, sent the chief officers of the Scots who were wounded and taken, in his own coach, and the rest in waggons.
waggon to Edinburgh; which gain’d him great applause, and tended much to vindicate him from those reports that had been given out of his cruelty, whereby many had been prejudic’d against him.

The army having now well spent their provisions, the lord-general retires with them again to Dunbar, to meet and take in such fresh supplies as were sent thither by sea, by order of the English parliament. Here they receiv’d their tents and provisions from the ships; and the inhabitants of Dunbar being reduc’d to great want, the general order’d a great quantity of pease and wheat, to the value of two hundred and forty pounds, of that which was sent from London to the army, to be distributed among the poor people there. After convenient supply and refreshment, and two days spent in exhortation to the army, and in seeking God for his blessing upon their actions, they again advanced towards Edinburgh, where the Scots were keeping a solemn thanksgiving for their supposed great deliverance, imagining the English army was quite gone; and the ministers gave God thanks, for turning back the army of severals by the way that they came, and putting terror into their hearts, which made them flee when none pursued. But the sudden return of the army to Muscleborough soon made them ashamed of what they had been doing; tho’ it seems, Lesley was not so confident, but expected another visit from the English; for upon their return, they found Muscleborough more forlorn than before, he having commanded, That the gude women of the town should come away with their gear, and not any stay to brew or bake for the English army on pain of death.

About this time, a trumpet came to the army from lieutenant-general David Lesley, with a declaration of the general assembly, containing the state of the quarrel in which they were to fight; which they desir’d might be publickly known, and was to this effect: "That the general assembly con-
considering there must be just grounds of stumbling,
from the king's majesty's refusing to subscribe
the declaration concerning his former carriage,
and resolutions for the future in reference to the cause of God, the enemies and friends thereof;
dothing therefore declare, That the kirk and kingdom will not own any malignant party, their quarrel or interest, but they will fight upon their former principles, for the cause of God and the kingdom. And therefore as they disclaim all the sin and guilt of the king and his house, so they will not own him nor his interest, any further than he shall disclaim his and his father's opposition to the work of God, and the enemies thereof. And withal, they will with conveninient speed consider of the papers sent to them
from Oliver Cromwell, and vindicate themselves
from the falsehoods contained therein."

To this the lord-general thought fit to return them this answer: "That the army continued the same as they profess'd themselves to the honest people of Scotland, wishing to them as to their own souls; it being no part of their business to hinder them in the worship of God according to their consciences, as by his word they ought;
and that they should be ready to perform what obligation lay upon them by the covenant. But that under the pretence of the covenant mistaken,
a king should be taken in by them, and impos'd
on the English, and this call'd the cause of God
and the kingdom; and this done upon the satisfaction of God's people in both nations, as alleg'd, together with a disowning of malignants, altho' the head of them be receiv'd, who
at this very instant hath a party fighting in Ireland, and prince Rupert at sea on a malignant account; the French and Irish ships daily making depredations upon the English coasts, and all by
by virtue of his commission; therefore the army cannot believe, that whilst Malignants are fighting and plotting against them on the one side, the Scots declaring for him on the other, should not be an espousing of a Malignant interest or quarrel, but a mere fighting on former grounds and principles. If the state of the quarrel be thus, and you say you resolve to fight the army, you will have opportunity to do that; else what means our abode here? And our hope is in the Lord, &c."

General Cromwell finding he could by no means provoke the Scots to an engagement, on the 17th of August march'd his army from Muskleborough, and pitch'd his tents on Pencland hills, within view of Edinburgh. In this march the enemy drew forth several bodies of horse, and facetd the English, but came not within gun-shot. The army being quarter'd on the hills, the lord-general sent out two troops of dragoons to possess themselves of Collington-house. About this time, a serjeant in colonel Cox's regiment and three soldiers his associates, were sentenc'd to be hang'd for plundering a house and stealing a cloak; which sentence was executed on the serjeant, for a terror to others; but the other three were pardon'd. So careful was the general to preserve the country, according to his declaration.

On the 18th the Scots drew forth on the west side of Edinburgh, between the river Leith and the sea, to the number of three thousand horse, apprehending the English design'd to possess a pass over the said river. The lord-general seeing this, drew out a forlorn, and went in person before them, to shew how ready he was to fight. Being come near to their body, one who knew the lord-general, fir'd a carbine at him: Upon which, he call'd out and told him, That if be had been one of his soldiers, he should have been cashier'd for firing at that distance.

This
This was all that was done; for the Scots still having no mind to fight, return’d back again to their quarters. And the next day, part of the English army took the house of Redhaugh, belonging to Sir James Hamilton. It was a garrison situated within a mile and a half of Edinburgh, and had about eighty foot to defend it; and though the English storm’d it in the sight of the enemy’s whole army, yet no party came out to relieve it. Threescore were taken prisoners here; and the place was of great advantage to the English.

On the 26th of August, the Scots sent to general Cromwell, to desire a conference between some of themselves and some of his officers. This being agreed to, and a convenient place appointed, the lord Waristoun, secretary of state, Sir John Brown, colonel Straughan, and Mr. Douglas a minister, with some others, attended for that purpose. The chief design of this conference, was to wipe off a pretended aspersioin that was cast upon them, and spread over both armies, as if they kept themselves, in trenches and holes, not daring to fight. And therefore, the better to vindicate themselves from these calumnies, they assure the English, “That when opportunity serv’d, it should be seen that they wanted not courage to give them battle.”

The next morning the Scotch army, as if they design’d so soon to make good what they had said, drew out upon a march; which the lord general Cromwell no sooner observ’d, but he prepar’d to meet them, hoping now to have some fair play with them. And the soldiers also expected the same thing, being overjoy’d at the very thoughts of engaging; in order to which they immediately took down their tents, laid aside their knap-sacks, and put themselves every way into a fit posture to meet and receive their enemy. But the Scots, it seems, had still no mind to come to an engagement; for when the English army drew near them, they found they...
they were separated from them, by a great bog and a deep ditch; so that they could not come at them to engage, without running such hazards as were not necessary at that time. All that the lord-general could do for the present, was to thunder against them with his cannon. Both armies stood all that night in bataillia; and the next morning, the great guns roared on both sides for about the space of an hour; by which one and twenty of the English were kill'd or wounded, but many more of the Scots, who, for all that, would not remove to any other ground to engage, nor join in a closer fight.

Upon this, the lord-general Cromwell march'd back his army to their former quarters on Pencland hills; where they were no sooner arriv'd but they were inform'd, that the Scots had sent out a party to take in Muscleborough and Preston-pans, thereby to cut off provisions from the English army. Here-upon the lord-general gave orders for the army to march that way; which they were very forward to do, as being to fight for their victuals. But it being a very stormy and tempestuous night, and very dark, he stay'd their march till the next morning; when they arrived at Muscleborough without any molestation from the enemy, who in the mean time took possession of what they had left behind them on Pencland hills; and then dogging them in the rear, watch'd all opportunities to distress them.

F. Orleans gives us this brief account of these various marches of the lord-general Cromwell, in order to bring the Scots to an engagement. "Cromwell, says he, whose interest it was to endeavour to come soon to a battle, in a country where his army found nothing to subsist on, march'd directly towards the enemy, who lay encamp'd between Edinburgh and Leith, to cover those two places, and the heart of the country. The cunning Englishman try'd all ways to draw Leby to fight; but he understood his trade, and it being his interest to protract time, so to ruin the enemy’s army, which had neither ammunition nor provisions but what came from England at a great charge, and with much difficulty; he kept himself so strongly intrench’d, that Cromwell durst not attack him. The English general us’d all the baits and stratagems known in war, to oblige the Scot to fight him; sometimes drawing him towards Dunbar, as if he would have besieg’d Edinburgh, and again moving to get between Sterling and him. But the Scot dexterously avoided all these snares; and tho’ the English army kept up close with him, he so ordered his motions, and posted himself so advantageously, that the whole month of August was spent in those counter-marches, so tedious to a man of Cromwell’s spirit, who could never meet with an opportunity either to fight in open field, or attack his enemy in his camp.

By this means, and by frequent skirmishes and harassing the English, the Scots hop’d at last to tire them out, depending much upon the disagreeableness of the climate to their constitution, especially, if they should keep them in the field till winter, which begins betimes in those parts. And their counsels succeeded according to their wish; for by this time the English army, through hard duty, want of provisions (the stores brought by sea being now exhausted) and the rigour of the season, grew very sickly, and diminish’d daily; the Scotch army in the mean time increasing, and continuing in good heart. The lord-general reflecting upon the sad state of his affairs, and considering the weak and crazy condition of his army, resolved in this exigency to retreat with them once more to Dunbar. Authors differ as to the design of this march; some thinking it was to receive further supplies from the English ships; others, that it was in order to return into England; and others again suppose, that the general intended, by garrisoning Dunbar, to lie there securely for some time, till they might recover strength, and receive convenient recruits both of horse and foot from Berwick. The lord Clarendon says, "Whether that march was to retire out of so barren a country for want of provisions (which no doubt were very scarce; and the season of the year would not permit them to depend upon all necessary supplies by sea;) or whether that motion was only to draw the Scots from the advantageous post of which they were posses'd, is not yet understood." And bishop Burnett tells us, That Cromwell being press'd by the Scotch army, retir'd to Dunbar, where his ships and provisions lay. This seems to be very true, and that Cromwell was then only on the defensive; but whether at his departure from Muscleborough he had actually design'd to return into England, does not appear so certain: Though Ludlow tells us, that when the army came to Dunbar, they shipped their baggage and sick men, and design'd to return into England; and others say, that Cromwell wanting provisions, was there shipping off his foot and cannon, designing only the next day to break through with his horse.
1650.

The LIFE of

To Had-

Whatever the lord-general's design was, he, in pursuance of the foremention'd resolution, on the 30th of August, drew out his army from Muscleborough, and march'd towards Haddington. The Scots observing the English army to retire, follow'd them close; and falling upon the rear-guard of horse in the night, having the advantage of a clear moon, beat them up to the rear-guard of foot. Which alarm, coming suddenly upon them, put them into some disorder. But the Scots, as some say, wanting courage to prosecute the advantage, and withal, a cloud overshadowing the moon, gave the English an opportunity to secure themselves and recover.
recover the main body. Being come to Hadding-son, where they were in continual danger of being assaulted by the enemy, the general order'd a strict watch to be kept, to prevent the worst. The Scots conceiving they had now a more than ordinary advantage, about midnight attempted the English quarters on the west end of the town; but were soon repuls'd and set further off. The next day, being the first of September, the Scots being drawn up at the west end of the town in a very advantageous place, the English drew out on the east into an open field, very fit for both armies to engage in; where having waited some hours for the coming of the Scots, and perceiving that they would not fight but upon an advantage, they, pursuant to their former resolution, march'd away to Dunbar.

The Scotch army follow'd at a convenient dis-stance, being reinforce'd with the addition of three regiments; and seeing the English lodg'd in Dunbar, hover'd about them upon the adjacent hills
like a thick cloud, menacing nothing but ruin and destruction, and looking down upon them as their sure prey.

The lord-general was now in great distress, and look'd upon himself as undone. His army was in a very weak and sickly condition, and in great want of provisions, whereby their courage also was very much abated; whilst the Scots were stout and hearty, in their own country, and upon very advantageous ground. And besides, they more than doubled the English in number, being about twenty seven thousand, whereas the others were but twelve thousand. Some say they had in their army about thirty thousand horse and foot; and the English were reduc'd to ten thousand at the most. General Cromwell, with this sickly company, was now
hemm'd in on every side by those greater numbers
of his enemies; who, to make sure work, had also
by a strong party secur'd Coberspath, the only pass between
between him and Berwick, thereby to hinder all provisions or relief from thence, or to cut off all retreat from the English army, who had not above three days forage for their horses. Thus were they reduced to the utmost straits, so that they had now no way left, but either to yield themselves prisoners, and tamely give up themselves a prey to their insulting enemies; or to fight upon those unequal terms, and under those great disadvantages.

In this extremity the lord-general, on the 2d of September, call'd a council of war, in which, after some debate, it was resolv'd to fall upon the enemy the next morning, about an hour before day; and accordingly the several regiments were order'd to their respective posts. Here we are told by bishop Burnet, That Cromwell, under these pressing difficulties, call'd his officers together to seek the Lord, as they express'd it: After which, he bid all about him take heart, for God had certainly heard them, and would appear for them. Then walking in the earl of Roxburgb's gardens, that lay under the hill, and by prospective glasses discerning a great motion in the Scotch camp; Cromwell thereupon said, God is delivering them into our hands, they are coming down to us. And the bishop says, that Cromwell lov'd to talk much of that matter all his life long afterwards. The Scots, it seems, had now at last resolv'd to fight the English, and to that end were drawing down the hill, where, if they had continu'd, the English, could not have gone up to engage them without very great disadvantage. This resolution was contrary to Lesley's opinion; who, tho' he was in the chief command, had a committee of the states to give him his orders, among whom Warisboun was one. These being weary of lying in the fields, thought that Lesley did not make haste enough to destroy the army of the sectaries, as they call'd them. Lesley on the other hand told them, that by lying there all was sure, but that by engaging engaging in action with brave and desperate men, all might be lost; and yet they still press'd him to fall on. Many have imagin'd that there was treachery in all this; but the foremention'd author says, he was persuaded there was no treachery in it; only Waris ton was too hot, and Lesley was too cold, and yielded too easily to their humours, which he should not have done. This resolution of the Scots, to fall upon the English, was for some time retarded by the unseasonableness of the weather; and in the mean while, as we have already observ'd, Cromwell resolv'd to fall upon them.

The night before the battle proving dreadfully rainy and tempestuous, the lord-general took more than ordinary care of himself and his army. He refreshed his men in the town, and above all things secured his match-locks against the weather, whilst his enemies neglected theirs. The Scots were all the night employed in coming down the hill; and early in the morning, being Tuesday the third of September, before they were put in order, general Cromwell drew out a strong party of horse, and falling upon the horse-guards, made them retire. Then immediately his bodies both of horse and foot advancing, the fight soon grew hot on all sides; till after about an hour's dispute, the whole numerous army of the Scots was totally routed. Two regiments stood their ground, and were almost all kill'd in their ranks. The rest fled, and were pursu'd as far as Haddington with great execution. About four thousand were slain on the place and in the pursuit, and ten thousand taken prisoners, many of whom were desperately wounded. Fifteen thousand arms, all the artillery and ammunition, with above two hundred colours were taken; and all with the loss of scarce three hundred English. Prisoners of note were Sir James Lumsdale lieutenant-general of the foot, the lord Libberton (who soon after dy'd of his wounds) adjutant-general Bickerton, scout-scout-master, Campbell, Sir William Douglas; the lord Grandison, and colonel Gourdon; besides twelve lieutenant-colonels, six majors, forty two captains, seventy five lieutenants, &c. The two Lesleys escap'd to Edinburgh, which upon the news of this defeat was immediately quitted by its garrison, and Leith resolv'd to admit the conquerors, being not able to keep them out. Thus this formidable army, which had so lately triumph'd in a confident assurance of victory, was totally defeated and overthrown by one not half so numerous, which at the same time was reduc'd almost to the last extremity. But this extremity making them fix upon so firm a resolution either to conquer or die, and withal, their falling so suddenly upon the Scots, when they so little expected them, but design'd first to fall upon them, seem to be the true occasion of this wonderful turn of affairs. The lord-general himself drew up a narrative of this memorable victory, and sent it by a courier to the council of state, who order'd it to be read in all the churches of London, with solemn thanksgiving: And the colours taken in this battle being sent up to the parliament, were by their order hung up as trophies in Westminster-bell.
The LIFE of

1650.

CHAP. IV.

From the battle of Dunbar, to the battle of Worcester.

This great success put new life into the English soldiers, who by this means, after having been so long toss'd up and down, almost spent by hard duty, and reduced to such extremity, that they were in danger of being starv'd, now met with good accommodation and refreshment, and had an opportunity to furnish themselves with all necessary supplies. Soon after the battle was was over, the lord-general, the better to improve his victory, and to secure what he had obtained, sent Lambert with a strong party of horse and foot to attempt Edinburgh, the chief city, and secure Leith, that the English ships might there the more readily and conveniently supply the army with all necessaries. The Scots, upon the news of their army's defeat, having deserted Edinburgh, Lambert on the same day obtained a quiet possession of it, as also of Leith; in both which places were found several pieces of ordnance, many arms, and a considerable quantity of provisions; which the Scots, by reason of their haste, could not carry away with them. But though the English had thus possessed themselves of the town of Edinburgh, the castle still remained in the hands of the enemy; which, though judged impregnable, was at last reduced by Cromwell; as we shall see in its proper place.

The lord-general stayed some small time at Dunbar, to settle matters, and to dispose of the prisoners; who being so numerous, that it seemed as much trouble to keep them as it was to take them, about five thousand of them, who were most sick and wounded, were set at liberty; and the rest were driven like turkies to Berwick, by the English soldiers appointed to convey them thither. Soon after Lambert had taken possession of Edinburgh, the lord-general himself came up, and caused his whole army to march into that city; which was done without any loss, save that one of the soldiers had his arm shot off by a cannon-bullet from the castle. And now all possible diligence was used in fortifying Leith, it being judged to be the best and most commodious sheltering-place the English could have in Scotland, for the winter-season.

On the Sunday after the lord-general had entered Edinburgh, he sent a trumpet to the castle, to acquaint quaint the governour, that the ministers who were with him might return to the churches, and have free liberty to preach there; but the ministers return'd him this answer, That they found nothing express'd, whereby to build any security for their persons; and for their return, they resolved to reserve themselves for better times, and to wait upon him who had bidden his face for a while from the sons of Jacob. General Cromwell reply'd in a letter to the governour, as follows:

"Our kindness offer'd to the ministers with you was done with ingenuity, thinking to have met with the like; but I am satisfy'd to tell those with you, that if their master's service (as they call it) were chiefly in their eye, imagination of sufferings would not have caus'd such a return; much less the practices of our party (as they are pleas'd to say) upon the ministers of Christ in England, have been an argument of personal persecution. The ministers of England are supported, and have liberty to preach the gospel, though not to rail; nor under pretence thereof, to over-top the civil power, or debase it as they please. No man hath been troubled in England or Ireland for preaching the gospel; nor has any minister been molested in Scotland, since the coming of the army hither. The speaking truth becomes the ministers of Christ. When ministers pretend to a glorious reformation, and lay the foundation thereof in getting to themselves power, and can make worldly mixtures to accomplish the same, such as their late agreement with their king, and hopes by him to carry on their designs, they may know, that the Sion promised, and hoped for, will not be built with such untempered mortar. And for the unjust invasion they mention, time was when an army of Scotland came into England, not called by the supreme authority. We have said in our papers,
Oliver Cromwell.

"with what hearts, and upon what account we came; and the Lord hath heard us, thou you would not, upon as solemn an appeal as any experience can parallel. When they trust purely to the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God, which is powerful to bring down strong holds, and every imagination that exalts itself, which alone is able to square and fit the stones for the New Jerusalem; then, and not before, and by that means, and no other, shall Jerusalem (which is to be the praise of the whole earth) the city of the Lord be built, the Sion of the Holy One of Israel. I have nothing to say to you, but that I am, Sir, your humble servant, O. Cromwell."

The Scotch ministers sent an answer to this letter, and general Cromwell another letter in answer to them; in which he says: "We look upon ministers as helpers of, not lords over the faith of God's people: I appeal to their consciences, whether any denying their doctrines, and dissenting, shall not incur the censure of sectary; and what is this but to deny christians their liberty, and assume the infallible chair? Where do you find in scripture, that preaching is included in your function? Tho' an approbation from men hath order in it, and may do well, yet he that hath not a better than that, he hath none at all. I hope he that ascended up on high may give his gifts to whom he please; and if those gifts be the seal of mission, be not envious, tho' Eldad and Medad prophesy: You know who bids us covet earnestly the best gifts, but chiefly that we may prophesy; which the apostle explains there to be a speaking to instruction, and edification, and comfort; which the instructed, edified, and comforted can best tell the energy and effect of. If such evidence be, I say again, take heed you envy not, for your own sakes;
1650. "left you be guilty of a greater fault than Moses reprov'd in Joshua, for envying for his sake. "Indeed you err thro' the mistake of the scriptures: Approbation is an act of conveniency, "in respect of order; not of necessity, to give "faculty to preach the gospel. Your pretended "fear, left error should step in, is like the man "that would keep all the wine out of the country, "left men should be drunk. It will be found an "unjust and unwise jealousy, to deny a man the "liberty he hath by nature, upon a supposition "he may abuse it; when he doth abuse it, judge."

The ministers still refusing to return to their churches, the lord-general caus'd English ministers to officiate in their places.

All the chief magistrates of Edinburgh, together with the committees of the kirk and state, fled from thence to Sterling, where they endeavour'd to secure themselves as well as they could. Hither likewise resorted those who had escaped at Dunbar, and did what they could to piece up their shattered army, that by a second encounter they might endeavour to regain their lost credit: To which end recruits were also rais'd by the committee of estates; but it was thought fit to make some change in the officers, not only in the inferior ones, but also in the great commanders: For old Lesley, earl of Leven, was laid aside with dishonour, tho' David Lesley was continu'd.

But all these methods signify'd but little, whilst the Scots were so divided among themselves, and split into so many parties and factions. The ruling party was that which was for the king and kirk; tho' these were again sub-divided into resolutioners and protestors. The resolutioners were so call'd from their adhering to those resolutions, which were pass'd by the committee of estates, and the commissioners of the kirk; "That those who had "made defection, or had hitherto been too backward in the work, ought to be admitted to make profession of their repentance; and then, after such profession made, might, in the present extremity, be admitted to defend and serve their country.” Against these resolutions some of those two bodies protested; who, together with those who adher’d to them, were call’d the protestors. They alledg’d, “That to take in men of known enmity to the cause, was a sort of betraying it, because it was putting it in their power to betray it; that to admit them to a profession of repentance, was a profanation and mocking of God; for that it was manifest, they were willing to comply with those terms, though against their conscience, only that they might get into the army; and that they could not expect the blessing of God upon an army so constituted.” They had a great advantage over the others as to this particular; for this mock penitence was indeed a very scandalous practice. These proceedings gave rise to another faction, which prevail’d chiefly in the western counties; where a great many met, and form’d an association apart, as well against the king and the defection in the kirk party, as against the army of sectaries. These were call’d remonstrators; from their publishing a remonstrance against all the proceedings in the late treaty with the king, when, as they said, it was visible by the commission he granted to James Graham (meaning the marquis of Montros) that his heart was not sincere; and when he took the covenant, they had reason to believe he did it with a resolution not to maintain it, since in his whole deportment and private conversation, he discover’d a secret enmity to the work of God. They imputed the shameful defeat at Dunbar, to their prevaricating in these things: And concluded, “That therefore, according to the declaration of kirk and state, August 13, 1650, they disclaim’d all the 1650.
The Life of

The sin and guilt of the king and his house, both old and new; and that they could not own him nor his interest in the state of the quarrel between them and the enemy, against whom they were to hazard their lives." The chief leaders of this party were colonel Ker and colonel Straughan. Their remonstrance being brought to the committee of estates at Sterling, was after much debate condemn'd as divisive, factious, and scandalous; in which also the commissioners of the kirk concurred; but so nevertheless as, if possible, to bring Ker and his party over by fair means; to which purpose, several papers pass'd between them, and all methods were us'd to heal these divisions. Besides these, there was another party in the north, who were purely for the king, without any regard to the kirk.

Whilst the Scots were thus divided among themselves, and their animosities grew higher and higher, the lord-general Cromwell was active with his victorious forces, which range'd at pleasure about the country. Having his head-quarters at Edinburgh, and having there given his men all necessary refreshment, he drew out the greatest part of his army for Sterling, and with them face'd the castle, having at first some design to storm it; but perceiving the horse could not well second the foot, he chang'd his resolution, and return'd back to Edinburgh. Whither being arriv'd, he order'd all the boats in the Frith to be carried to Leith, to prevent the Scots ferrying over into Fife in order join with the enemy there.

In the mean time preparations were making for the siege of Edinburgh castle; in which the lord-general having given the necessary orders and directions, marched away six regiments of foot, and nine of horse and dragoons, for Glasgow; and by the way of Linlithgow, sent a paper to the committee of estates, to try once more what might be effected
Oliver Cromwell.

effected by fair means; a copy of which was also at the same time sent to colonel Ker and Straughan, for the same purpose. There was little else remarkable in this expedition, but the taking of a small garrison near Kelsitb: And it may be remember'd, that when the English came to Glasgow, and saw one of the legs of the late marquis of Montrose hanging over the gate, they remembering his valiant actions,
took it down, and buried it privately.

The season now admitting of no considerable action, the lord-general return'd again to Edinburgh; where he published a proclamation against a company of sturdy fellows, called Moss-troopers, who very much molested the army, and by the treachery and connivance of the country people, kill'd many of the English soldiers, and grew so bold as to steal some of the train-horses. The proclamation was to this effect: "That finding many of the army were not only spoil'd and robb'd,
but also others barbarously butchered and slain,
by a sort of out-laws, not under the discipline
of any army; and finding that all tenderness to the country produc'd no other effect, than their compliance with, and protection of such persons: Therefore, considering that it is in the country's power to detect and discover them;
and perceiving their motion to be ordinarily by
the invitation and intelligence of country people;
hedeclar'd, that wherever these enormities should be committed for the future, life should be required for life, and a plenary satisfaction for the goods thus stolen, of those parishes and places
where the fact should be committed, unless they did discover and produce the offender."

Soon after this proclamation was publish'd, colonel Monk, with a commanded party of foot, four pieces of ordnance, and a mortar-piece, was sent to reduce Derlington house, one of the nests of these Moss-troopers; which, being join'd by Lambert, 184

The LIFE of 1650.

And Ros-
lan castle.

he soon effected, taking all that were within prisoners; whereof two of the most notorious, with their captain, one Waite, were presently shot to death. After this Monk taking with him a party of six hundred foot, march'd against Roslan castle;
where, tho' at first he met with some resisrance, it
was quickly surrender'd to him.

The lord-general, who would not let slip any opportunity, made what use he could of the differences and dissentions that were in Scotland, and endeavour'd to improve them to his own advantage. To this end, he sent several times to Ker and Straughan in the west, to invite them to come in to him. This had that good effect, that Straughan shortly after withdrew himself from his party, and clos'd with the English, leaving Ker to command all himself. The lord-general still endeavour'd to draw him over, but all in vain; and having an especial eye upon this party, since he could not prevail by fair means, he resolv'd, notwithstanding the difficulty of marching at that time of the year, to endeavour to reduce them by force. Accordingly, about the end of November, he order'd major-general Lambert, and commissary-general Whalley, with five regiments of horse, to march from Peebles to Hamilton, on the south side of the river Clyde;
whilst himself march'd from Edinburgh on the north side. Having staid here some small time till he had good intelligence where Lambert and his party were; and withal, the weather being very bad, he march'd back again to Edinburgh. Ker having notice of this, as also that Lambert was at Hamilton, thought he had now an opportunity to surprise him: And accordingly setting upon a sudden march in the night, with about fifteen hundred horse, he before day with great fury broke into Lambert's quarters; and meeting with no resisrance
at his first entry, he confidently march'd up to the middle of the town. But a captain with about forty soldiers
soldiers having upon the alarm suddenly mounted, and being favour'd by a tree that lay cross the street, obstructed their march till the whole garrison was alarm'd. The suddenness of this attempt put the English into some surprize; but soon recovering themselves, they, to make sure work of it, left part of their forces in the town to encounter the enemy, and to secure the rear, whilst the rest drew out with design to surround the enemy's whole party; who perceiving this in time, very dextrously fac'd about, and betook themselves to flight. In this encounter, which was but short, near a hundred of the Scots were slain, and as many made prisoners. Ker himself was wounded and taken, with his lieutenant-colonel and captain-lieutenant. Those who fled were pursu'd as far as Air, where a party of a hundred and fifty, being the chief remains of the remonstrators, were also put to the rout. This success was the more considerable, in that it would have been very difficult to have engag'd them against their will; for they being well acquainted with the country, and having the inhabitants on their side, could march about as they pleas'd; whereas 'twould have been very dangerous for the English to have follow'd them without a great part of their army; Lesley then lying at Sterling with the Scotch forces, watching all advantages.

This seasonable victory was soon follow'd by the surrender of Edinburgh castle, the most considerable strong-hold in Scotland, which was thought impregnable by situation and art. It is seated upon a high abrupt rock, has but one entrance into it, and that both steep, and by which but two or three can go a-breast, and over looks and commands all places about it; so that the lord-general's men were often very much gall'd in their quarters at Edinburgh, by the great guns playing from thence.

When general Cromwell came first before this strong place, which was soon after the defeat at Dunbar,
186

The LIFE of

1650. Dunbar, he summon'd the governour, colonel William Dundas, to deliver it up to him; which having no effect, he began to consult with his chief officers how to reduce it by force. Nothing seem'd to encourage the attempting of it by storm; and all probable ways being debated, it was at last resolv'd to force it by mines. In order to this work, both English and Scotch miners were sent for, and towards the latter end of September, the gallerries were begun in the night; which the besieged no sooner saw, but they fell to firing upon it with five great guns, and several vollies of small shot. But this prov'd no impediment to the English, who with indefatigable labour wrought thro' the earth, till they came to the main rock. This put them to a stand, but did not make them give over; for having contriv'd ways to make holes in the rock, they fill'd them full of powder, and endeavour'd to make it fly by firing.

But this mining work going but slowly on, the lord-general fearing it would not answer his design, and that he should not be able to blow the castle up into the air, endeavour'd now to level it with the ground; and to that end, with mighty labour and pains, he rais'd a battery fortify'd with gabions and other contrivances, designing to play incessantly from thence with cannons and mortars. The governour was very much amaz'd at this, who now began to think it a vain thing to endeavour to withstand the English industry; tho' it must be said of him, that he did his utmost to answer the expectations of those by whom he was entrusted with this important charge. The battery, notwithstanding all obstructions, being rais'd to a convenient height, four mortar-pieces and six battering guns were drawn from Leith, and forthwith mounted against the castle. But before the word of command was given, the lord-general thought fit once more to summon the governour; which he did on the 11th
Oliver Cromwell.

With of December, in the following terms; "That he being resolved, by God's assistance, to use such means as were put into his hands, for the reducing of the castle, did, for preventing further misery, demand the rendering of the place to him upon fit conditions." To this the governor return'd this answer, "That being entrusted by the committee of estates of Scotland for the keeping of the castle, he could not deliver it up without leave from them: And therefore he desired ten days time to send to them, and receive their answer; upon receipt whereof the general should receive his resolute answer."

But the lord-general knowing his time was precious, made this sudden reply, "That it concern'd not him to know the obligations of them that trusted him, but that he might have honourable terms for himself, and those that were with him: But he could not give liberty to him to consult with the committee of estates, because he heard those among them that were honest enjoy'd not satisfaction, and the rest were now discover'd to seek another interest than they had formerly pretended to; in which if he desir'd to be satisfy'd, he might have information at a nearer distance than St. John's-town."

"Twas design'd, that this party should continue till ten in the morning, December 13. but some great shot flying from the castle the night before, order was given the next morning to try the mortar-pieces, three with shells, and the fourth with stones. Which being done accordingly, the governor thereupon returned an answer to the general's last message; in which "He adjur'd him in the fear and name of the living God (which was call'd upon in the acceptance of his great trust) that liberty might be granted for him to send to the committee of estates; and said, that he would be very willing to receive information" from those of his countrymen whom he could trust.” To this the lord-general reply’d, “That whoever he would appoint to come to him, should have liberty for one hour; but to send to the committee of estates, he could not grant.” The governor took no notice of this, till the mortar-pieces and great guns had for some small time play’d with great violence against the castle. This moved him to send forth a drum, desiring a conference with the provost of Aberdeen, and one more then in Edinburgh; to which the general readily consented: But they knowing it to be an affair of the utmost importance, absolutely refus’d to concern themselves in it, leaving the governor to take his own course. Hereupon Dundas was in great perplexity, and knew not what to do; till having revolv’d the matter a little in his mind, he at last came to this result, to acquit himself manfully in the defence of the place. Accordingly a red ensign was immediately hung out in defiance on the top of the castle, and the great guns began to roar from the battlements of the wall. Upon this, the lord-general thought it high time for him to exert his utmost force; and accordingly sent in upon them such continual showers of shot, that the governor in a short time thought fit to beat a parley, and offer’d to surrender, if his former request, of sending to the committee of estates, might be granted. But this being still refus’d, Dundas and his soldiers thought it not good to hold out any longer against such violent assaults; and so entering upon a treaty with the lord-general, came to an agreement upon these articles: “First, That the castle of Edinburgh, the cannon, arms, ammunition, magazines, and furniture of war, be delivered up to the lord-general Cromwell. Secondly, That the Scots have liberty to carry away their publick registers, publick moveables, private evidences and and writs, into Fife or Sterling. Thirdly, That as to those goods in the castle belonging to any person whatsoever, the owners should have them restored to them: This to be pro-claim'd, that all might take notice of it. Fourthly, That the governor, and all military officers and soldiers, might depart without molestation, carrying their arms and baggage, with drums beating and colours flying, to Bruntisland in Fife: Moreover, the sick and wounded soldiers to stay in Edinburg till cured, and then to receive the same benefit of articles with the rest of their fellows."
The LIFE of

According to these articles, this strong ca-

tle, which gloried in its virginity, as having never before yielded to any conqueror, was, after a siege of three months, deliver'd up to the victorious Cromwell on the 24th day of December; whereby there also fell into his hands fifty three pieces of ordnance, some of them remarkable both for size and beauty, eight thousand arms, fourscore barrels of powder, and all the king's hangings, tapestry and jewels. The subduing of this place was a thing so unexpected by several, that the Scots cry'd out, That Cromwell took it only by silver bullets. But what appeared most strange to others, and which made well on general Cromwell's side, was, That the Scotch army, which lay not very far off, should never attempt the relief of this most important place.

The main businesfs the Scots were now intent upon, was the coronation of the king; which had been long delay'd by the kirk and states, that he might have time to bumble himself for his father's sins and his own transgressions. But the vigorous proceedings of the English put them at last upon hastening that which they of themselves were backward enough in. The first of January was appointed for this solemnity, which was perform'd at Scone, with the greatest Oigo. 1650.

The life of

greatest pomp and magnificence that the present state of the nation was capable of. His majesty having subscribed both the covenants, the marquis of Argyle set the crown upon his head; at which the people expressed their joy by their loud acclamations of, God save king Charles the second. The main design now was to form such an army, as might not only secure what they had still in their hands, but drive the English (whom they now call'd the common enemy) quite out of their country. To effect this, all persons were now promiscuously admitted into the army, commissions were granted for raising horse and foot, and new commanders were appointed. His majesty set up his royal standard at Aberdeen, to which great numbers of volunteers and honorary soldiers flock'd from all parts. From thence he marched to Sterling; where having mustered his army, he made duke Hamilton his lieutenant-general, David Leslie major-general, Middleton major-general of the horse, and Maffey general of the English troops.

The lord-general Cromwell observing these proceedings, was very little concern'd at them. However, to make sure work, he endeavour'd to possess himself of all those garrisons of the Scots, which were on the south side of the Frith. To this end, he order'd colonel Fenwick with his own regiment, and colonel Syler's, to reduce Hume-castle under his obedience. Fenwick immediately upon his receiving these orders, applied himself accordingly to the work; and having drawn his men up before the castle, sent a summons to the governor, as follows:

"His excellency, the lord-general Cromwell, hath commanded me to reduce this castle, you now possess, under his obedience; which if you now deliver into my hands, for his service, you shall have terms for yourself and those with you: If you refuse, I doubt not but in a short time, by God's assistance, to obtain what I now demand."

Colonel Fenwick reduces Hume-castle.
"I expect your answer by seven of the clock tomorrow morning, and rest your servant, George Fenwick."

The governor, whose name was Cockburn, being, it seems, a man of fancy, returned him this quibbling answer: "Right honourable, I have receiv'd a trumpeter of yours, as he tells me, without a pass, to surrender Hume-castle to the lord-general Cromwell: Please you, I never saw your general. As for Hume-castle, it stands upon a rock. Given at Hume-castle this day before seven a-clock. So resteth, without prejudice to my native country, your most humble servant, Tho. Cockburn." And soon after he sent the colonel these lines:

I William of the Wastle
Am now in my castle:
And awe the dogs in the town
Shan't gar me gang down.

But the governor did not long continue in this merry humour: For Fenwick having planted a battery against the castle, and made a small breach, as the English was just ready to enter, Cockburn beat a parley. But the colonel would now allow only quarter for life; which being accepted, the governor with his garrison, being seventy eight commanders and private soldiers, march'd out of the castle; which captain Collinson with his company immediately enter'd, to keep it for the parliament.

Colonel Monk was also detarch'd with about three regiments of horse and foot, to reduce Tantallon-castle. Being come before it, he found the Scots very refractory, whereupon he caus'd the mortar-pieces to play for eight and forty hours: But these did little execution; till six battering guns being planted, were so well manag'd, that the governor
The king having now got some authority, visited all the garrisons in Fife, and endeavoured to put them in such a posture as to hinder the English from landing on that side the Frith. To this end also he drew from Sterling such horse and foot as could be well spar'd, and quarter'd them all along the water-side. Then he visited the highlanders, endeavouring to compose the dissentions that were amongst them, and to prevail on them to rise unanimously for him. Middleton marched out of these parts with a considerable body of horse and foot: And about the same time, the town of Dundee, as a testimony of their great respect to the King, and to shew their forwardness in promoting his interest, advanced at their own charge a compleat well arm'd regiment of horse, whom they sent with a stately tent, and six field-pieces with carriages and ammunition, as a present to his majesty then at Sterling; where all being join'd, made up an army of twenty thousand men. And endeavours were still used for augmenting this army; for which purpose, the earl of Eglanton, with some other commanders, were sent into the West, to raise what forces they could. These coming to Dunbarton to execute their commissions, were suddenly surpriz'd by a party of horse sent thither by colonel Lilburn, for that purpose; who took the earl himself, his son colonel Montgomery, lieutenant-colonel Colburn, &c. and brought them prisoners to Edinburgh.

In the mean time, the parliament of England had a special regard to their army in Scotland, providing for their welfare in all respects. They took care to procure sufficient supplies both of men, money and provisions, which they were continually sending away to them; so that never was an army better provided for than this, as no soldiers ever deserv'd better encouragement than these. Particularly, icularly, admiral Dean arrived about this time at Leith with large supplies from London; and among other conveniencies, brought along with him seven and twenty great flat-bottomed boats, for transporting the army over into Fife. And not long after, captain Butler arriv’d at the same place in the Success (a stout ship formerly taken from the French) with eighty thousand pounds for the payment of the soldiers.
Oliver Cromwell. 193

The lord-general Cromwell had for some time laboured under a very great indisposition, occasioned by the unsuitableness of the climate, and the extreme rigour of the winter season in those parts. This confin’d him wholly to his chamber, and utterly disabled him to act in person with the army, how great occasion soever there might be. Now was the English army under very sad apprehensions; and yet they were not so much dejected and disheartned, as the Scots were elevated and transported at this news; who highly pleas’d themselves with the very fancy of his death; and thereupon readily believ’d the lightest report of it to be true; and when once the conceit had posses’d them, could scarce by any means be brought to believe the contrary; so that a Scotch trumpeter coming out of Fife to Edinburgh, about the restoration of a ship which the English had taken, very confidently affirmed to the soldiers, that their general was dead; and said, they did well to conceal it, but all the world should not make him believe otherwise.

This coming to the general’s ear, who was now in a very fair way of recovery, to convince the man of his mistake, he order’d him to be brought before him. And the conceit was so strongly fix’d in him, that nothing but this could have removed it. However, being now effectually convinc’d, he at his return assur’d those who sent him of the falsity of this report, which had pass’d so currently in the Scotch army. After the lord-general had been somewhat somewhat recover'd, he fell into a very dangerous relapse, which, if he had not been of an extraordinary strong constitution, might have ended his days. But the rulers in England, very much fearing the loss of their general, as knowing no man so fit for that high employment, first of all sent him two eminent physicians, Dr. Wright and Dr. Bates; and presently after, dispatch'd an order into Scotland, permitting him to leave the business of the army, and repair into England, for the recovery of his health and strength, as thinking the air of Scotland might be the occasion of his illness. Upon the receipt of this, he wrote a letter to the lord president of the council of state, dated June 3d, which is as follows:

His letter to the council of state.

"My lord, I have received yours of the 27th of May, with an order of parliament for my liberty to return into England, for change of air, that thereby I might the better recover my health: All which came unto me, whilst Dr. Wright and Dr. Bates, whom your lordship sent down, were with me. I shall not need to repeat the extremity of my last sickness: It was so violent, that indeed my nature was not able to bear the weight thereof; but the Lord was pleas'd to deliver me beyond expectation, and to give me cause to say once more, He hath plucked me out of the grave. My lord, the indulgence of the parliament, express'd by their order, is a very high and undeserved favour; of which, altho' it be fit I keep a thankful remembrance, yet I judge it would be too much presumption in me not to return a particular acknowledgment. I beseech you, give me the boldness to return my humble thankfulness to the council, for sending two such worthy persons so great a journey to visit me; from whom I have received much encouragement and good direction for recovery of my health and strength, which I find, by the goodness
Oliver Cromwell. 195

"goodness of God, growing towards such a state, as may yet, if it be his good will, render me useful according to my poor ability, in the station wherein he hath set me. I wish more steadiness in your affairs here, than to depend in the least upon so frail a thing as I am: Indeed they do not, nor own any instrument, This cause is of God, and it must prosper. Oh! that all that have any hand therein, being so persuaded, would gird up the loins of their minds, and endeavour in all things to walk worthy of the Lord. So prays, my lord, your most humble servant, O. Cromwell."

About this time a plot was discover'd in England, which had been carried on by the Presbyterian party, and chiefly by the ministers of that persuasion, in order to promote the designs of their Scotch brethren, and help forward his majesty's restoration to the English throne, as a king under sufficient limitations, and now in covenant with them. For this Mr. Love, Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Cafe, and Mr. Drake, very eminent Presbyterian divines, besides some others of the laity, were apprehended by order of the council of state. Jenkins, Cafe, and Drake, confess'd themselves guilty, and, that the party might not be too much irritated, were upon their humble submission pardon'd. But Love, as being more guilty than any of the rest, was, together with one Gibbons, beheaded on Tower-hill, on the 22d of August. He was condemn'd on July 5, and the day of execution was appointed to be on the 15th, before which time many petitions were presented from himself and his friends to the parliament, for saving his life, but to no purpose; till on the very day that was appointed for his execution, several ministers, in and about London, came to the house, "Praying earnestly, and in the bowels of Jesus Christ, who, when they were sinners, died for them, if not totally to spare the life".
"life of their dear brother, that yet they would say of him as Solomon of Abiathar, That at this time he shall not be put to death." Upon this he was reprieved for one month; during which time all possible solicitations were used to those in power, and particular application was made to the lord-general Cromwell in Scotland, who sent back a letter signifying his free consent to the pardon of him: But some cavaliers stopping the post-boy, and searching his packet, with great indignation tore the lord-general's letter, that concern'd Mr. Love, as thinking he deserved not to live, who, according to them, had been such an incendiary in the treaty at Uxbridge. And so the parliament and council of state hearing nothing from the general, they took it for granted, that his silence was design'd as an absolute denial; upon which Love was executed on the forenamed day.

General Cromwell was no sooner able to stir abroad, but with eager desire of action, he consulted with his chief officers to carry on the war. For this purpose it was thought proper to contract their quarters, by drawing in the out-guards, or petty garrisons which were of little use, and were often very much molested by the Scots. And now the army being thus drawn together into one body, were supply'd with thirty-three wagons and carriages for the train from Berwick; and all things being in readiness for the campaign, the lord-general, on June 24th, order'd the army to advance to Redhaugh, where they staid not long, but march'd from thence to Pencland hills, a place well known to the English. Here they encamp'd in a most comely and regular order; and the lord-general feasted his officers in his tent, with several of their ladies, as the lady Lambert, and major-general Dean's lady, and many other English gentlewomen, who came from Leith to see the soldiers in their tents.
The army having continu'd some small time in this posture, the lord-general, in order to carry on the present design, march'd them away to Newbridge, and from thence to Elibgow; where, from the battlements of the castle, they could discern the tents of the Scotch army, which lay encamp'd at Torwood near Sterling; where they were guarded with regular fortifications, the horse in great bodies lying about them for security, who were also fenced with a river and with bogs; so that the English could not possibly drive them out of this fastness. However, the lord-general, to try whether he could provoke them to come and fight, march'd his army in battalia so near their main body, that their tents might be perfectly seen; and so stood for the space of eight hours, waiting for the coming of the Scots; who thinking it better to spin out time than to put all to the hazard of a battle, would not come out to engage. Hereupon, the lord-general drew off his army to Glasgow, where having somewhat refresh'd his wearied men, he march'd them back again; and understanding that the Scots had remov'd their camp to Kelsyth, he wheel'd about, and shortly after quarter'd his army at Monks-land, within four miles of the enemy. But they still refus'd to engage, and the general could not attack them without the greatest hazard.

This so provok'd him, that he resolv'd to fall upon part of their forces that defended Calendar-bouse. And so on the 15th of July, he order'd two battering guns to be planted, which having play'd with great violence for about eight hours, at last beat down the walls in several places. Notwithstanding which, the governour expecting relief from the Scotch army, which lay in sight of him, resolv'd to hold out to the utmost. Upon which, the lord-general sent ten files out of every regiment to force them out, since they could not prevail'd on to submit. These brave fellows having provided themselves with faggots, presently unloaded themselves into the enemy's moat, and so springing over into the breach, in half an hour's time wholly possessed themselves of the house, having slain the governor, with sixty-two of his men. The Scotch army all this while looked on, and, as if they were not at all concern'd in the matter, did not send one hand to the relief of their friends.

The lord-general finding that he could by no means provoke the Scots to a battle, resolv'd now to bid fair for Fife, that thereby he might cut off those supplies from them that enabled them to protract time and prolong the war. Accordingly, immediately after the taking of Calendar-house, the valiant colonel Overton, with sixteen hundred foot and four troops of horse, put out into the Forth, being order'd to land at the North-ferry in Fife; which he did in spite of those showers of great and small shot that were pour'd upon him as he approach'd the shoar; in return to which he caused his men to fire upon them out of the boats; which they did with so much courage and bravery, that the Scots were forc'd to break off the dispute, and betake themselves to flight, leaving behind them part of their arms and artillery. In the mean time, general Cromwell kept close up to the Scots with the main body of his army, intending to fall upon their rear, in case they mov'd to disturb this enterprize. However, the king sent major-general Brown, and colonel Holborn with four thousand men to force the enemy out of Fife again; but before they could come up to them, Lambert and Okey pass'd over the Forth with two regiments of horse and two of foot, and join'd with Overton. And so the English, with this unexpected reinforcement falling upon Brown and Holborn, entirely defeated them, killing two thousand upon the spot, and taking prisoners major-general Brown himself, one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, one major, thirteen captains, captain, seventeen lieutenants, twenty-nine ensigns, five quarter-masters, six and twenty serjeants, five and twenty corporals, and above twelve hundred common soldiers, with two and forty colours of horse and foot. Brown being thus defeated and reduced to the condition of a prisoner, liv'd not long after; dying, as was thought, of very grief for this sad disaster. Thus the English got sure footing on the other side of the Frith; and this overthrow prov'd the bane of the Scotch affairs.

Soon after this blow, the English took in garrisons almost as fast as they approach'd them. Lambert, in the first place, came before a strong fort call'd Innesgary, situated in an ifle lying in the Frith, betwixt Queen's-ferry and the pass into Fife. The garrison here was so terrified at the news of the late overthrow, that being summoned by Lambert, they were content to march away with only their swords by their sides, and deliver up the fort, with all the arms, ammunition, and provisions, and sixteen pieces of ordnance, to the English. About this time, a minister, and two students came from Angus to the lord-general Cromwell for protection: One of them was excommunicated for not answering the two following questions: 1. Whether Presbyterian government in Scotland be not in all things conform to the word of God? 2. Whether Cromwell be not antichristian?

The news of the defeat in Fife being brought to the king, who still lay strongly encamp'd in Torwood, occasion'd so great a consternation in his army, that with great precipitation he decamp'd, and march'd into Sterling park. General Cromwell follow'd speedily after them in the rear, and marching over the ground where they so lately lay, he perceiv'd with what a pannic fear they had been seiz'd: For they had left behind them all their sick men, one barrel of powder, three of ball, a great deal of match, many muskets, and three barrels of hand-granadoes.
granadoes. The lord-general followed them within two miles of Sterling, endeavouring to provoke them to an engagement, but all in vain, they making all the haste they could to secure themselves. Hereupon the general, perceiving it was to no purpose to continue here, on the 22d of July march'd away his army to Lithgow; from whence he caus'd the greatest part of them to be transported over into Fife, with the train of artillery, in order to carry on the war on the other side of the water. The general himself retir'd to Leith, to provide for the supply of his soldiers; and here he receiv'd the welcome news of the surrender of Bruntisland to Lambert; who having brought the army before it, the governour of the place was so dismay'd, that after a short parley he deliver'd it up on these conditions: "First, that the soldiers in garrison (being about five hundred) should march away with colours flying. Secondly, That the inhabitants of the town should have what belong'd to them. Thirdly, That all provisions of war, together with all guns and shipping of war, should be deliver'd up for the use of the commonwealth of England." This place was of great advantage to the English; for it being a very commodious harbour, the army might from thence, in the course of their conquests, have continued supplies of all that was necessary and convenient for them.

General Cromwell having settled matters at Leith, immediately cross'd the Frith to his army, which was then at Bruntisland; and so dispatching Whalley to reduce the smaller garrisons upon the coast of Fife, and leaving colonel Wolf's regiment in Bruntisland, he with the rest of the army and train of artillery, on the 30th of July, march'd away towards St. John's-town; that by reducing that important place under his power, he might prevent the Highlanders from sending any supplies, either of men or provisions, to Sterling. Being come before fore it, he sent this summons to the town. “That being inform’d the town was void of a garrison,
save the inhabitants and some few countrymen,
he requir’d them to deliver the fame to him immediately; promising to secure their persons from violence, and their goods from plunder.”
The messenger who carried this summons, was,
contrary to the expectation of the English, deny’d
admittance, and came back with this short reply
from the townsmen, That they were not in a capacity to receive any letters. But to excuse the matter,
the magistrates soon sent after him a message, declaring, “That the king’s majesty had sent a very strong party, able to maintain the town, and overpower them with a governour: But always to observe civility with his lordship, they had obtain’d leave from the governour to excuse themselves, by shewing how unable they were to treat.” It seems, the lord Duffus had the day before enter’d the town with thirteen hundred men;
but the lord-general, upon his refusal of the new summons which he sent him, having drained the water out of the moats round about the town, and batter’d the walls with his cannon, oblig’d him to surrender in a day’s time.

These wonderful successes, which attended the English arms, threw the king’s affairs in Scotland
into great perplexity and distress; whereupon he began to think of making an irruption into England.
He was now much nearer England than general
Cromwell, who could not possibly overtake him,
till after his majesty had been some days march before him. His fate depended upon the success of one battle; and he had reason to believe, that all the northern parts of England were well-affected to him; whither, if he could once reach, he might hope to increase his army by the accession of such men as would render it much more considerable.
Upon this, it was resolv’d, that the army should with
with all possible expedition advance into England, by the nearest ways that led into Lancashire; whether his majesty sent expressses to his friends in those parts, that they might have their soldiers in readiness to receive him. He also sent an express to the earl of Derby, who was then in the Isle of Man, requiring him to meet him in Lancashire.

The marquis of Argyle was the only person who dissuaded the king from marching into England, and that with no inconsiderable arguments; but the contrary opinion prevailing, Argyle retir'd to his house in the Highlands: And so, on the last day of July, the king began his march from Stirling, and on the 6th of August enter'd England by the way of Carlisle with an army of about sixteen thousand men.

The noise of this sudden invasion gave a most terrible alarm to the whole nation, especially to the parliament at Westminster, who were still more dismay'd at the reports of the greatness of the king's army, and his design of mounting his foot-soldiers, and advancing directly to London. They were now ready to pass severe censures on the lord-general Cromwell, and condemned him of rashness and precipitation; whilst he in the mean time took care to satisfy them as well as he could, and assur'd them, "That he would overtake the enemy, and give a good account of them, before they should give them any trouble." Accordingly, that he might lose no time, he order'd major-general Lambert "To follow the king immediately with seven or eight hundred horse, and to draw as many others as he could from the country militia; and to molest the king's march as much as possible, by being near, and obliging him to march close; not engaging his own party in any sharp actions, without a very manifest advantage, but keeping himself entire till he should come up to him."
Oliver Cromwell.

The parliament also exerted themselves to the utmost on this occasion. The militia of most counties was order'd to be drawn into the field; to obstruct the king's march. Two thousand out of Staffordshire, and four thousand out of Lancashire and Cheshire, under the command of colonel Birch, join'd with Lambert and Harrison. The lord Fairfax drew out into the field with a formidable body, to flank the king's army; the militia of the city of London was commanded out, and all the adjacent counties were strictly enjoyn'd by the parliament to set out horse and men at their own charges. An act was also published, wherein it was declared, "That no person whatsoever should presume to hold any correspondence with Charles Stuart, or with his party, or with any of them, nor give any intelligence to them, nor countenance, encourage, abet, adhere to, or assist any of them; nor voluntarily afford, or cause to be afforded or delivered unto any of them, any victuals, provisions, ammunition, arms, horses, plate, money, men, or any other relief whatsoever, under pain of high-treason: And that all persons should use their utmost endeavours to hinder and stop their march."

The lord-general Cromwell being now ready to march into England in pursuit of the Scotch army, endeavou'rd to settle the affairs of Scotland in such a posture, as effectually to secure what was already obtain'd; and gave all the necessary orders to lieutenant-general Monk, whom he resolved to leave behind him with a strong party of foot, and such troops of horse, as might be able to quell any forces which should rise after his departure. This done, the victorious Cromwell, with the remainder of the army, marched out of Scotland, and on the 12th of August crossed the Tine: With which swift march being quite wearied out, he caus'd the army
The army to pitch their tents on Ryson-Haugh, upon the brink of the Tine, whilst himself took up his quarters at Stelley-house, not far from his soldiers. The mayor of Newcastle understanding that the army was near the town, immediately went out, accompanied with the rest of the magistrates, to congratulate the lord-general's arrival in England; and that they might be the more welcome to the soldiers, carried along with them, bread, cheese, biscuit, and beer, for the refreshment of the army. These supplies were very seasonable, and enabled the soldiers cheerfully to continue their march.

The Scots in the mean time by a swift march went on in prosecution of their present design. The king led them through Lancashire, where at the head of his army he was in all the market-towns he pass'd through proclaim'd king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland. But he met not with that encouragement which he expected; for besides that the Scots daily deserted him, the country did not come into him as he believed they would, being continually obstructed by the forces of the commonwealth, which spread themselves over all places. The king with his army marched on towards Warrington on the borders of Cheshire, the passage of which bridge was sharply contested by Lambert and his party, but was at last obtain'd by the king, the Scots, as they fell on, crying out, Ob you Rogues! We will be with you before your Cromwell comes. The king resolv'd to continue his march with the same expedition as he had us'd hitherto, till they should come to such a post where they might securely rest themselves; which the poor soldiers very much desir'd, being extremely fatigu'd with the length of their march, and the heat of the season. His majesty hoping the interest that major-general Massey had in Gloucestershire, would draw a great many in to him from those parts, resolved to direct his march that way.
At last looking upon Worcester as a proper place, he determined to settle there with his army; and accordingly, on the 23d day of August, he enter'd that city with very little opposition; where he resolv'd to abide, and expect the coming of his enemy; and that he might not be wanting in any thing, that might tend to the preservation of himself and forces, he order'd works to be raised for better security. Then he sent a summons to colonel Mackworth governour of Shrewsbury, inviting him to yield up that garrison to him; to which the governour return'd a preremptory denial. He also sent letters to Sir Thomas Middleton, to raise forces for him in Montgomeryshire; but Sir Thomas detain'd the messenger prisoner, and sent up the letter to the parliament. A day or two after the king had taken up his quarters at Worcester, he receiv'd the melancholy news of the defeat of the earl of Derby. This brave man was the only person, who made any considerable attempt to support the king. He got together a body of fifteen hundred horse; but before he could join the king's army, colonel Lilbourn set upon him near Wiggan, and entirely routed him. The earl himself being wounded, retreated into Cheshire, with about eighty horse, and from thence to the king at Worcester.

In the mean time, general Cromwell having refresh'd his soldiers near Newcastle, immediately march'd away by Rippon, Ferry-briggs, Doncaster, Mansfield and Coventry; and at Keinton join'd with the rest of the parliament's forces, under lieutenant-general Fleetwood, major-general Defborough, the lord Grey of Groby, major-general Lambert, and major-general Harrison; making in all about thirty thousand men. The commonwealth had indeed by their new levies increased their forces to a prodigious number; and England never before produced so many soldiers in so short 1651.
206

The LIFE of

... for the standing army, with those other forces newly rais'd by act of parliament, upon this occasion, are said to have amounted to above sixty thousand men.

The lord-general being come up, and having observ'd the posture of the enemy's army, began with an attempt upon Upton-bridge, seven miles from Worcester, designing there, if possible, to pass over his army. Lambert was appointed to manage this affair, who immediately detach'd a small party of horse and dragoons, to see how feasible the enterprize might be. This party coming to the bridge, found it broken down, all but one plank. Over this these daring fellows pass'd, who finding the Scots took the alarm, presently betook themselves to a church for security. Here-upon Maffey, who lay at Upton with about sixty dragoons, and two hundred horse, gave a camifado on the church; but major-general Lambert, having in the mean time pass'd over a new supply of horse, fell furiously upon the enemy's party, and over-powering them, forc'd them to a retreat; which Maffey supported with so much bravery, that sometimes facing, then fighting, and so falling off, himself brought up the rear, and never quitted his station, till he arriv'd with his men at Worcester. In this encounter his horse was kill'd under him, and he receiv'd a shot in his arm. The bridge being thus gain'd, all possible industry was used to make it up; so that lieutenant-general Fleetwood's army quickly pass'd over; which still marching forward, they laid a bridge over the Teame, which falls into the Severn, about a mile beneath Worcester: And the general, in the mean time, caus'd a bridge of boats to be laid over the Severn on his side; and this for the better conjunction of the army, and that the enemy might be the more straiten'd.
Oliver Cromwell.

The Scots drawing out to oppose the lieutenant-general's passage, the lord-general resolved to divert their design, or to obligate them to fight on great disadvantage: To which end, himself in person led over the river two regiments of foot, colonel Hacker's horse, and his own life-guard, on that side of Worcester, which he design'd to attack. Whilst this was doing, lieutenant-general Fleetwood, assisted by colonel Goff's and major-general Dean's regiments of foot, maintain'd a brave fight from hedge to hedge, which the Scots had line'd thick with musqueteers, judging that to be the safest way. And indeed they stoutly maintain'd their ground, till colonel Blake's, Gibbon's and Marsh's regiments came in and join'd with the others against them; upon which they retreated to Powick-bridge, where they were again engaged by colonel Hains, Cobbet and Matthews; and perceiving they were not able to prevail, they thought fit at last to secure themselves by flying into Worcester.

Presently after, the king calling a council of war, it was resolved to engage Cromwell himself. Accordingly, they on a sudden sally'd out against him with so much fury, that his invincible life-guard could not sustain the shock, but was forced to retire in some disorder; and his cannon likewise were for some time in the power of the king's party: But multitudes of fresh forces coming in, at last turn'd the scale on Cromwell's side. The battle continued for three or four hours with great fierceness and various success, till the Scots being overpowered by Cromwell's superior force, were totally routed, flying away in great confusion to secure themselves. The horse made as fast as they could back again towards the north; but the foot ran into the city, being closely pursu'd by some of the conquerors, who furiously flew thro' all the streets, doing such terrible execution, that there was nothing to be
be seen for some time but blood and slaughter.

As soon as the lord-general had forced his way through Sudbury-gate, whilst this party were killing and slaying all they met with, he with some regiments ran up to the Fort-royal, commanded by colonel Drummond; and being just about to storm, he first ventured his person thro' whole showers of shot to offer the Scots quarter, if they would presently submit, and deliver up the fort; which they refusing, he soon reduced it by force, and without mercy put them all to the sword, to the number of fifteen hundred men. In the mean time very considerable parties were sent after the flying enemy, and the country-every where rose upon them. The slain in this battle were reckoned about four thousand, and the prisoners taken in the fight and in the pursuit amounted to about ten thousand; so that near all were lost. The chief of the prisoners were duke Hamilton (brother of the late duke) who died soon after of his wounds; the earl of Derby, who not long after was sentenced to death, and lost his head at Bolton; the earls of Lauderdale, Carnwarth, Rotbas, and Kelley; the lord Sinclair, Sir John Packington, Sir Charles Cunningham, Sir Ralph Clare, major-general Montgomery, major-general Piscoty, Mr. Richard Fanshaw secretary to the king, the general of the ordnance, the adjutant-general of the foot; besides several colonels, and other inferior officers. There were also taken all their artillery and baggage, a hundred and fifty-eight colours, the king's standard, his coach and horses, and several other things of great value. The king escaped, and having wandered for some time in disguise about England, he at last found means to embark, and landed safely at Dieppe in France. This great victory, which was justly look'd upon as the decision of the grand cause between the king and the commonwealth, was obtain'd by general Cromwell on the
the third of September, the same day twelve-month, that the Scots had such a defeat given them by his forces at Dunbar, as lost them their kingdom. Cromwell's word was the same as at Dunbar, The Lord of bofts. The next day the lord-general sent a letter to the parliament; which was as follows:

"I am not able yet to give you an exact account of the great things the Lord hath done for this commonwealth, and for his people; and yet I am unwilling to be silent, but according to my duty I shall represent it to you, as it comes to hand. This battle was fought with various successes for some hours, but still hopeful on your part, and in the end became an absolute victory, and so full an one, as proved a total defeat and ruin of the enemy's army, and possession of the town; our men entering at the enemy's heels, and fighting with them in the streets with very great courage, took all their baggage and artillery. What the slain are, I can give you no account, because we have not taken an exact view; but they are very many, and must needs be so, because the dispute was long, and very near at hand, and often at push of pike, and from one defence to another. There are about six or seven thousand prisoners taken here, and many officers and noblemen of quality; duke Hamilton, the earl of Rothes, and divers other noblemen; I hear, the earl of Lauderdale, many officers of great quality, and some that will be fit objects of your justice. We have sent very considerable parties after the flying enemy: I hear they have taken considerable numbers of prisoners, and are very close in the pursuit. Indeed, I hear the country riseth upon them everywhere; and I believe the forces that lay thro' providence at Bewdley, and in Shropshire and Staffordshire, and those with colonel Lilburne, were in a condition, as if this had been foreseen, to intercept what what should return. A more particular account than this will be prepared for you, as we are able.
I heard they had not many more than a thousand horse in their body that fled, and I believe we have near four thousand forces following and interposing between them and home. Their army was about sixteen thousand strong, and fought ours on Worcester-side Severn, almost with their whole, whilst we had engaged half our army on the other side, but with parties of theirs. Indeed it was a stiff business; yet I do not think we have lost two hundred men. Your new-rais'd forces did perform singular good service, for which they deserve a very high estimation and acknowledgment, as also for their willingness thereunto, farasmuch as the same hath added so much to the reputation of your affairs. They are all dispatch'd home again; which, I hope, will be much for the ease and satisfaction of the country, which is a great fruit of the successes.”

The dimensions of this mercy are above my thoughts; it is, for ought I know, a crowning mercy; surely, if it be not, such a one we shall have, if this provoke those that are concern'd in it to thankfulness, and the parliament to do the will of him, who hath done his will for it, and for the nation; whose good pleasure is, to establish the nation, and the change of the government, by making the people so willing to the defence thereof, and so signally to bless the endeavours of your servants in this late great work.
I am bold, humbly to beg, that all thoughts may tend to the promoting of his honour, who hath wrought so great salvation, and that the fatness of these continued mercies may not occasion pride and wantonness, as formerly the like hath done to a chosen people. But that the fear of the Lord, even for his mercies, may keep an authority, and a people so prospered, and blessed, and witnessed
Oliver Cromwell.

"witnessed to, humble and faithful; that justice
and righteousness, mercy and truth may flow
from you, as a thankful return to our glorious God: This shall be the prayer of, Sir, your most humble and obedient servant, O. Cromwell."

CHAP. V.

From the battle of Worcester, to the forcible dissolution of the Long Parliament.

GENERAL Cromwell having given this deadly blow to the Scots, and to all the king's party, stayed no longer at Worcester, than to see the walls of it level'd with the ground, and the dikes
fill'd with earth, thereby to curb the disaffection of the inhabitants, and to prevent their attempting to secure any enemy for the future. This done,
he march'd up in a triumphant manner to London,
driving four or five thousand prisoners like sheep
before him. Beyond Aylesbury, he was met by four commissioners from the parliament, whom they sent to pay him all the marks of honour and esteem.
When he came to Aston, he was solemnly met by the speaker, and the rest of the members and council of state; and soon after by the lord-mayor, aldermen and sheriffs, and many persons of quality,
with the militia and multitudes of people; who welcom'd him with loud shouts and acclamations, and several volleys of great and small shot. White-
lock says, he carry'd himself with great affability,
and seeming humility; and in all his discourses
about the business of Worcester, would seldom mention any thing of himself, but of the gallantry of the officers and soldiers, and gave all the glory of the action unto God. After some small repose, on the 16th of September, he took his place in parliament, where the speaker made a speech to him,
congratulating his return after so many worthy archievements,
chievements, and giving him the thanks of the house for his great and faithful services to the commonwealth. On the same day, he with his chief officers, was feasted in the city, with all possible state and pomp: And soon after two acts were drawn up, that were much to his honour; one for a solemn thanksgiving-day, and the other for a yearly observation of the third day of September, in all the three kingdoms, with a narrative of the grounds thereof. The parliament likewise settled four thousand pounds a year upon him, out of the estates of the duke of Buckingham, and the marquis of Worcester, besides two thousand five hundred pounds per annum, formerly granted.

Soon after the battle of Worcester, the isle of Man, bravely defended by the heroick countes of Derby, and the isle of Jersey, that had been long maintain'd by Sir George Carteret, were both reduc'd to the parliament's obedience. They had long since been masters of Guernsey, except the chief fort, call'd Cornet-castle, which had been a great while defended by Roger Burges the governour, but was about the latter end of October surrendred by him upon very good articles. And the Scilly isles, which had been the chief harbour for the king's men of war, were some time before reduc'd by a part of the parliament's fleet.

Major-general Monk, whom the lord-general had left in Scotland, to perfect the reduction of that kingdom, proceeded in his work with very good success. Before the fight at Worcester, he took Sterling, the chief strength of the Scots; as also Dundee, with as terrible an execution as Cromwell had before us'd at Tredagh; and surpriz'd a convention of the Scotch nobility, among whom was old general Lesley, and sent them prisoners to London. The example that was made of Dundee, occasion'd such a terror, that St. Andrew's, Aberdeen, Dunbarton, and Durno at castles, with other towns, tours, castles, and strong-holds, either voluntarily declar’d for the conquerors, or surrender’d upon summons. Notwithstanding this, the Scots made one attempt more under Middleton, Huntley, Glen-carne, and others in the Highlands: But they were soon suppress’d and dispers’d by colonel Morgan: So that the English extended their conquests thro' all parts of the kingdom, even as far as the isles of Orkney and Shetland, which now submitted to them.

And here I shall dismiss the affairs of Scotland, for the present, with the remarks that bishop Burnet makes on the state of that kingdom, after this absolute reduction of it under the power of the English. " After this, says he, the country was kept in great order: Some castles in the Highlands had garrisons put into them, that were so careful in their discipline, and so exact to their rules, that in no time the Highlands were kept in better order, than during the usurpation. There was a considerable force of about seven or eight thousand men kept in Scotland: These were paid exactly, and strictly disciplin’d. The pay of the army brought so much money into the kingdom, that it continued all that while in a very flourishing state. Cromwell built three citadels, at Leith, Air, and Inverness, besides many little forts. There was good justice done, and vice was suppress’d and punish’d; so that we always reckon those eight years of usurpation, a time of great peace and prosperity. There was also a sort of union of the three kingdoms in one parliament, where Scotland had its representatives. The marquis of Argyle went up one of our commissioners."

Soon after the victory at Worcester, general Cromwell desir’d a meeting with several members of parliament, and some of the principal officers of the army, at the speaker’s house; where, as Whitelock, who was one of the number, acquaints us,
us, he propos'd to them, "That now the old king
being dead, and his son defeated, he held it necessary to come to a settlement of the nation;
in order to which he had requested this meeting, that they together might consider and advise, what was fit to be done, and to be presented to the parliament."

What pass'd hereupon in this conference, I shall set down as I find it in Whitelock. Lenthal
the speaker began thus: "My lord, this company were very ready to attend your excellency;
and the business you are pleas'd to propound to us, is very necessary to be consider'd. God hath given marvellous success to our forces under your command, and if we do not improve these mercies to some settlement, such as may be to God's honour, and the good of this commonwealth, we shall be very much blame-worthy."

Harrison. "I think that which my lord-general hath propounded, is to advise as to a settlement both of our civil and spiritual liberties, and so that the mercies which the Lord
hath given in to us, may not be cast away;
how this may be done is the great question."

Whitelock. "It is a great question indeed,
and not suddenly to be resolv'd; yet it were pity
that a meeting of so many able, worthy persons as I see here should be fruitless. I should humbly offer in the first place, whether it be not re-quite to be understood, in what way this settlement is desir'd, whether of an absolute republick, or with any mixture of monarchy."

General Cromwell. "My lord commissioner Whitelock hath put us upon the right point; and indeed it is my meaning, that we should consider, whether a Republick, or a mix'd monarchical government will be best to be settled;
and if any thing monarchical, then in whom that power shall be placed."
Sir Tbo. Widdrington. "I think a mix'd monarchical government will be most suitable to the laws and people of this nation; and if any thing monarchical, I suppose we shall hold it most just to place that power in one of the sons of the late king."

Fleetwood. "I think that the question, Whether an absolute republick, or a mix'd monarchy, be best to be settled in this nation, will not be very easy to be determin'd."

Lord-Chief-Justice St. John. "It will be found that the government of this nation, without something of monarchical power, will be very difficult to be settled, as not to shake the foundation of our laws, and the liberties of the people."

Lenthall. "It will breed a strange confusion to settle a government of this nation, without something of monarchy."

Desborough. "I beseech you, my lord, Why may not this, as well as other nations, be govern'd in the way of a republick?"

Whitelock. "The laws of England are so interwoven with the power and practice of monarchy, that to settle a government without something of monarchy in it, would make so great an alteration in the proceedings of our law, that you have scarce time to rectify, nor can we well foresee the inconveniencies which will arise thereby."

Whalley. "I do not well understand matters of law; but it seems to me the best way, not to have any thing of monarchical power in the settlement of our government: And if we should resolve upon any, whom have we to pitch upon? The king's eldest son hath been in arms against us, and his second son likewise is our enemy."
216

The LIFE of

1651.

SIR Thomas Widdrington. "But the late king's third son, the duke of Gloucester, is still among us, and too young to have been in arms against us, or infected with the principles of our enemies."

WITELLOCK. "There may be a day given for the king's eldest son, or for the duke of York, his brother, to come in to the parliament; and upon such terms as shall be thought fit, and agreeable both to our civil and spiritual liberties, a settlement may be made with them."

GENERAL Cromwell. "That will be a business of more than ordinary difficulty; but really, I think, if it may be done with safety, and preservation of our rights, both as Englishmen, and as christians, that a settlement with something of monarchical power in it would be very effectual."

Much more discourse there was by several gentlemen then present. The soldiers were generally for a pure republick, the lawyers for a mix'd monarchy, and many for the duke of Gloucester to be made king; but general Cromwell still put off that debate to some other point; and many think, that having now begun to entertain thoughts of setting up himself, his design in this conference, was only to discover the inclinations of these persons, that he might make a proper use thereof in prosecuting the ends of his own ambition, which was much heighten'd by the finishing stroke that was given to his successes, in the late glorious victory at Worcester.

The commission of general Cromwell to be lord-lieutenant of Ireland being expir'd, the parliament did not think fit to renew that title and office, looking upon them to be more suitable to monarchy, than to a free commonwealth; but they pass'd a vote, "That the act of parliament constituting Oliver Cromwell, Esqs; captain-general and commander in chief of the armies and forces rais'd by their
Oliver Cromwell

their authority within England, should extend to the forces in Ireland, as if Ireland had been particularly named: And that the lord-general be requir'd to appoint such a person as he shall think fit, to command the forces in Ireland, and to commission him accordingly." And so lieutenant-general Fleetwood had the command in chief of the forces in Ireland given him, to hold under the lord-general Cromwell; and under his conduct, that kingdom was in a little time brought into perfect subjection.

Whilst the commonwealth of England was thus everywhere victorious at home, a rupture happened between them and the elder republick the states of Holland; which occasion'd such terrible sea-fights, that no preceding age since the creation had ever produced the like. Some time in the last year, the parliament sent over the chief justice St. John and Mr. Strickland, to treat of a coalition with the Dutch; but they apprehending that this conjunction might rob them of their trade, and be little less than making them a province to England, not only refused to consent to it, but rudely treated St. John; which was so much resented by his haughty spirit, that he made the report of this embassy little to the advantage of the Dutch. Upon this the parliament pass'd the act of navigation, which "prohibited foreign ships from bringing any merchandizes into England, except such as should be of the growth and manufacture of that country, to which the said ships belong'd." By virtue of which law the English took occasion to search the Dutch vessels, and often to make prize of them. The states hereupon sent over four ambassadors for the restoring and preserving a good understanding between the two republicks; but the parliament demanded the arrears for the Dutch fish- ing upon the coasts of England and Scotland, the giving up to justice those of the Dutch who surviv'd; that that were assisting in the massacre of the English at Amboyna; and a free trade up the Scheld. The Dutch seeing how little they were to expect from the English by a treaty, began to prepare for a war; nor were the others behind-hand with them.

The first act of hostility was in December last year, when an English man of war meeting with some Dutch fishermen on the British coast, demanded the tenth herring, in acknowledgment of the sovereignty of the seas, which the parliament was determined to maintain in another manner than had hitherto been done. The Dutch not complying, they fell from words to blows; and the Dutchman shooting first at the English, the English man of war funk one of the Dutch ships, which perished with all her crew.

This was but a skirmish; but the first great sea-fight between these potent republicks, was in May this year; when admiral Van Trump, according to the instructions he had received, refusing to strike sail to the English, Blake the English admiral gave orders to fire at Trump's flag; which being done thrice, Trump, instead of striking it, poured a broadside upon Blake. Hereupon both fleets engaged from four in the afternoon till night; in which fight, the Dutch had one man of war taken, and another funk, one hundred and fifty men kill'd, and their whole fleet much damag'd; whereas the English had not one ship lost or disabled, and but few of their men slain. The second sea-fight was on the 20th of August; when Sir George Ayscough, who was left by Blake to command in the Downs, with thirty-eight men of war, set upon the Dutch fleet of fifty, and fifteen merchant men. This fight having continued three days, the Dutch lost two ships, one funk, and the other burnt, but the English none. On the 28th of October, admiral Blake, with vice-admiral Penn, and rear admiral Bourne, again engag'd the Dutch fleet near the North-Foreland.
Oliver Cromwell.

land, boarded and took their rear-admiral, sunk two more of them, and one was blown up. The rest of the Dutch fleet being very much shattered and forced to fly, was pursued twelve leagues by the English, who lost not one ship in this fight, though many of them were damaged in their rigging. Another furious fight happen'd on the 29th of November, which continued from ten in the morning till six at night; when the Dutch fleet double in number to the English, got the better of them, taking the Garland frigate, burning the Bonadventure, and sinking three more. One of the Dutch flagships was blown up, and all the men lost but two; and Van Trump's and De Ruyter's ships were much damaged.

But to return home: About this time, the lord-general Cromwell meeting with commissioner Whitelock, saluted him with more than ordinary courtesy, and desired to have some private discourse with him. Whitelock waited on him accordingly, and after some previous discourse, the lord-general proceeded thus: "Your lordship hath observed most truly the inclinations of the officers of the army to particular factions, and to murmurings, that they are not rewarded according to their deserts; that others who have ventured least, have gained most, and they have neither profit nor ferment, nor place in government, which others hold, who have undergone no hardships nor hazards for the commonwealth; and herein they have too much of truth; yet their insolence is very great, and their influence upon the private soldiers works them to the like discontent and murmurings. Then as for the members of parliament, the army begins to have a strange distaste against them, and I wish there were not too much cause of it; and really their pride, and ambition, and self-seeking, ingrossing all places of honour and profit to themselves and their friends, and their daily breaking forth into new and violent parties and factions; their delays of business, and design to perpetuate themselves and to continue their power in their own hands; their meddling in private matters between party and party, contrary to the institution of parliaments, and their injustice and partiality in those matters, and the scandalous lives of some of the chief of them; these things, my lord, do give too much ground for people to open their mouths against them, and to dislike them. Nor can they be kept within the bounds of justice, and law or reason, they themselves being the supreme power of the nation, liable to no account to any, nor to be controlled or regulated by any other power, there being none superior, or co-ordinate with them. So that unless there be some authority and power so full and so high, as to restrain and keep things in better order, and that may be a check to these exorbitances, it will be impossible in human reason to prevent our ruin.

WHITELOCK answered: "I confess the danger we are in by these extravagancies and inordinate powers, is more than I doubt is generally apprehended; yet as to that part of it which concerns the soldiery, your excellency's power and commission is sufficient already to restrain and keep them in their due obedience: And, blessed be God, you have done it hitherto, and I doubt not but by your wisdom you will be able still to do it. As to the members of parliament, I confess the greatest difficulty lies there, your commission being from them, and they being acknowledged the supreme power of the nation, subject to no controul, nor allowing any appeal from them. Yet, I am sure, your excellency will not look upon them as generally deprav'd; too many of them are much to blame in those things you you have mentioned, and many unfit things have pass'd among them; but I hope well of the major part of them, when great matters come to a decision."

The lord-general reply'd, "There is little hopes of a good settlement to be made by them, really there is not; but a great deal of fear, that they will destroy again what the Lord hath done graciously for them and us: We all forget God,
and God will forget us, and give us up to confusion, and these men will help it on, if they be suffered to proceed in their ways: Some course must be thought on to curb and restrain them, or we shall be ruined by them." Upon this Whitelock said, "We ourselves have acknowledged them the supreme power, and taken our commisions and authority in the highest concern-ments from them; and how to restrain and curb them after this, it will be hard to find out a way
for it."

The general then put this short question to Whitelock, What if a man should take upon him to be king? Whitelock said, He thought that remedy would be worse than the disease: And the general asking him, Why be thought so, he proceeded, "As to your own person, the title of king would be of no adantage, because you have the full kingly power
in you already, concerning the militia, as you are general: As to the nomination of civil officers, those whom you think fittest are seldom refus'd; and altho' you have no negative vote
in the passing of laws, yet what you dislike will not easily be carried; and the taxes are already settled, and in your power to dispose the money raised. And as to foreign affairs, tho' the ceremonial application be made to the parliament,
yet the expectation of good or bad success in it,
is from your excellency; and particular sollicitations of foreign ministers are made to you only.
of

The LIFE of 1652. " only. So that I apprehend indeed less envy and danger, and pomp, but not less power and real opportunities of doing good in your being geger, than would be if you had assumed the title of king."

The lord-general proceeded to argue, That whoever was actually king by election, the acts done by him were as lawful and justifiable, as if done by a king, who had the crown by inheritance; and that by an act of parliament in king Henry the seventh's reign,
it was safer for the people to act under a king, let his title be what it will, than under any other power. White-lock agreed to the legality, but much doubted the expediency of it; and being asked, What danger
be apprehended in taking this title, he answer'd,
" The danger I think would be this: One of the main points of controversy betwixt us and our adversaries, is, Whether the government of this nation shall be established in monarchy, or in a free state or commonwealth? And most of our friends have engaged with us, upon the hopes of having
the government settled in a free state, and to effect
that, have undergone all their hazards and difficulties; they being persuaded (tho' I think much mistaken) that under the government of a commonwealth, they shall enjoy more liberty and right, both as to their spiritual and civil concernments, than they shall under monarchy,
the pressures and dislike whereof are so fresh in their memories and sufferings. Now if your excellency shall take upon you the title of king,
this state of your cause will be thereby wholly determined, and monarchy establish'd in your per-sion; and the question will be no more, whether our government shall be by a monarch or by a free state, but, whether Cromwell or Stuart shall be our king and monarch. And that question, wherein before so great parties of the nation were engag'd, and which was universal, will by this means
"means become in effect a private controversy only; before it was national, what kind of government we should have; now it will become particular, who shall be our governor, whether of the family of the Stuarts, or of the family of the Cromwells. Thus the state of our controversy being totally changed, all those who were for a commonwealth (and they are a very great and considerable party) having their hopes therein frustrated, will desert you, your hands will be weakened, your interest strightened, and your cause in apparent danger to be ruin'd."
The general here acknowledg'd that Whitelock spoke reason, and ask'd him, What other thing be could propound, that might obviate the present dangers and difficulties, wherein they were all involv'd. Whitelock confess'd, it would be the greatest difficulty to find out such an expedient, but said he had had some things in his private thoughts upon this matter, which he fear'd were not fit, or safe for him
to communicate: But upon the general's pressling
him to disclose them, and promising there should no prejudice come to him by any private discourse betwixt them, and assuring him, he should never betray his friend, and that he should take kindly whatever he should offer; Whitelock began thus:
"Give me leave then first to consider your excellengy's condition. You are invironed with secret enemies: Upon your subduing of the publick enemy, the officers of your army account themselves all victors, and to have had an equal share in the conquest with you. The success which God hath given us, hath not a little elated
their minds, and many of them are busy,
and of turbulent spirits, and are not without their designs how they may dismount your excellency, and some of themselves get up into the faddle; how they may bring you down, and set up themselves. They want not counsel and encouragement
couragement herein, it may be, from some members of the parliament, who may be jealous of your power and greatness, left you should grow too high for them, and in time over-master them, and they will plot to bring you down first, or to clip your wings."

The general upon this thanked Whitelock for so fully considering his condition: It is, said he, a testimony of your love to me and care of me, and you have rightly considered it; and I may say without vanity, that in my condition yours is involved and all our friends, and those that plot my ruin will hardly bear your continuance in any condition worthy of you. Besides this, the cause itself may possibly receive some disadvantage, by the stragglings and contentions among ourselves. But what, Sir, are your thoughts for prevention of those mischiefs that hang over our heads?

WHITELOCK then proceeded: "Pardon me, Sir, in the next place a little to consider the condition of the king of Scots. This prince being now by your valour, and the success which God hath given to the parliament, and to the army under your command, reduc'd to a very low condition, both he, and all about him, cannot but be very inclinable to hearken to any terms, whereby their lost hopes may be reviv'd of his being restor'd to the crown, and they to their fortunes and native country. By a private treaty with him you may secure yourself, and your friends, and their fortunes; you may make yourself and your posterity as great and permanent, to all human probability, as ever any subject was, and provide for your friends: You may put such limits to monarchical power, as will secure our spiritual and civil liberties, and you may secure the cause in which we are all engaged; and this may be effectually done, by having the power of the militia continued in yourself, and whom you shall agree upon after you. I pro-
Oliver Cromwell.

"pound therefore for your excellency to send to the king of Scots, and to have a private treaty
with him for this purpose."

The general hereupon told him, he thought he had much reason for what he propounded: But,
said he, it is a matter of so high importance and difficulty, that it deserves more time of consideration and debate, than is at present allow'd us: We shall therefore take a farther time to discourse of it. And with that he brake off, and went away with some displeasure in his countenance. His carriage also towards Whitelock was from that time alter'd, and his advising with him not so frequent and intimate
as formerly; and not long after, he found an occasion, by an honourable employment, to send him out of the way, that he might be no hindrance to him in the designs he was then carrying on. For
'tis pretty manifest, that he had it now in his thoughts to set up himself, and bring the crown upon his own head: To which purpose Harry Nevill
who was then one of the council of state, us'd
to tell it as a story of his own knowledge,
That Cromwell upon this great occasion sent for some of the chief city divines, as if he made it a matter of conscience to be determin'd by their advice. Among these was the leading Mr. Calamy, who veryboldly opposed the project of Cromwell's single government, and offer'd to prove it both unlawful and impracticable. Cromwell answer'd readily upon the first head of unlawful, and appeal'd to the safety of the nation
being the supreme law: But, says he, pray Mr.
Calamy, why impracticable? Calamy reply'd,
"Ob, 'tis against the voice of the nation, there will be nine in ten against you. Very well, says Cromwell, but what if I should disarm the nine,
and put the sword in the tenth man's band, would not that do the business?"
General Cromwell and his officers, in order to bring about their designs, were now daily complaining of the grievances from the long parliament, and seem'd very zealous upon the common pretences of right and justice, and publick liberty, to put a period to their session: "Which if they would not shortly do themselves, the army and people must do it for them." They particularly complain'd, "That the parliament order'd all things at will, and distributed all valuable employments among themselves; that they were so many kings, and for one sovereign, the nation had many who car'd less for the laws than he they had destroyed; that they embru'd the kingdom in blood, upon pretence of punishing the adversaries of the government, but in reality to gratify their own private revenge; that they had study'd to perpetuate themselves in an employment which ought to be temporary, so that all the good subjects of the commonwealth might share in it; that the parliament ought to be dissolved, and a new representative chosen by the universal consent of the people, according to the scheme laid when monarchy was abolish'd to set up a commonwealth." And that no obstacle might be in the way of the designed future government, means were found to set the young duke of Gloucester at liberty, and send him out of the nation.

Twas about this time that Cromwell sent a letter to the Cardinal de Retz in France; which the said Cardinal thus relates in his Memoirs: "'Tis remarkable that the same night, as I was going home (viz. after he had been to carry some money he had borrow'd for king Charles, who was now at Paris) I met one Tinley, an Englishman, whom I had formerly known at Rome, who told me that Vere, a great parliamentarian and a favourite of Cromwell, was arriv'd at Paris, and had orders to see me. I was a little perplex'd; however, however, I thought it would be improper to refuse him an interview. He gave me a letter from Cromwell in the nature of credentials, importing, that the sentiments I had discover'd in the defence of publick liberty, added to my reputation, had induc'd him to enter into the strictest friendship with me. It was a most civil complaisant letter, and I answer'd it with a great deal of respect; but in such a manner as became a true Catholick and an honest Frenchman.
Oliver Cromwell. 227

On the 18th of February, there happen'd another dreadful fight, between the English fleet commanded by Blake, Dean, and Monk, and the Dutch under Van Trump. This fight lasted three days with wonderful bravery, and terrible slaughter on both sides, tho' the English prevail'd; for the Dutch lost eleven men of war, and thirty merchant-ships; above two thousand of their men being kill'd, and fifteen hundred taken prisoners: But the English lost but one ship, the Southampton, which was sunk; tho' their slain were not many less than those of the enemy.

This great loss so sensibly affected the states of Holland and West-Friezeland, that they dispatch'd letters to the English parliament, to endeavour as peace. This negociation had no effect, tho' it was particularly promoted by general Cromwell himself, who was very desirous to have a peace concluded. The states had offer'd to acknowledge the English sovereignty of the British seas, and to pay three hundred thousand pounds to the English commonwealth; but finding this was not likely to succeed, they apply'd themselves (as we are told) more directly to general Cromwell, promising him vast sums, if he would venture to depose and dissolve the parliament.

However this was, the general and his officers still continued their complaints against the parliament; and petitions, addresses, and remonstrances were... were daily presented from the army, "For the payment of their arrears, the putting an end to this parliament, and summoning a more equal representative; which they told them would be the most popular action they could perform."

Some of the officers were indeed very much concerned at these proceedings, and openly protested against them. Major Streeter was so bold as to declare, "That the general intended to set up himself, and that it was a betraying of their most glorious cause, for which so much blood had been spilt." But Harrison, who was one of the leaders of that party, now known by the name of Fifth-monarchy men, told him, "He was assure'd, the general did not seek himself in it, but did it to make way for the rule of Jesus, that he might have the scepter. To whom the major thus reply'd, "That unless Jesus came very suddenly, he would come too late."

The parliament being very sensible of these proceedings, a great debate arose thereupon in the house; where several of the members, out of justice, reason, or a foreseen necessity, appear'd to be for a dissolution, and a new representative to be chosen; but in the end it was declar'd, that the dissolution of the parliament was too high a matter for any private persons to meddle with; and to give a timely check to any farther presumption of that nature, a committee was appointed to prepare an act of parliament with all possible expedition, "For filling up of their house, and for settling their qualifications; and to declare it high treason for any man to propose or contrive the changing of the present government."

General Cromwell perceiving how unwilling they were to part with their power and authority, which they had so long enjoy'd, on the 19th of April, held a consultation with the chief of his friends in the parliament and army, at his lodgings in Whitehall, to consider of some expedient for the present present carrying on of the government of the commonwealth, and putting a period to the parliament. Some few, particularly Sir Thomas Widdrington and commissioner Whitelock, declar'd what a dangerous thing it was to dissolve the parliament, and how difficult it would be to erect any other form of government: But the general, and most of his officers, with several members of the house, deliver'd their opinion, That it was necessary to take some new measures, and that it was not fit the present assembly of parliament should be permitted to prolong their own power. The conference lasted till late at night, when, without coming to any conclusion, the meeting was adjourn'd to the next morning. Most of them being then again met, the point in debate was, "Whether forty persons, or about that number, of parliament-men and officers of the army, should be nominated by the parliament, and impower'd for managing the affairs of the commonwealth, till a new parliament should meet, and so the present parliament be forthwith dissolv'd." The lord-general being inform'd, during this debate, that the parliament was sitting, and that it was hoped they would put a period to themselves, which would be the most honourable dissolution for them; he thereupon broke off the meeting, and the members of parliament that were with him, left him at his lodgings, and went to the house; where, contrary to their expectation, instead of coming to any resolutions of immediately dissolving themselves, they found them in debate of an act, by which the present parliament was to be continued above a year and a half longer, and then to be dissolv'd.

Colonel Ingoldsby came back to the general, and inform'd him what the house was upon: At which the general, who expected they should have meddled with no other business, but putting an immediate period to their own sitting without any more force dissolves the parliament and the commonwealth.
more delay, was so enrag'd, that he immediately commanded some of the officers to fetch a party of soldiers (to the number of three hundred) with which marching directly to Westminster, he placed some of them at the door, some in the Lobby, and others on the stairs. Himself going into the house, first address'd himself to his friend St. John, and told him, That he then came to do that which griev'd him to the very soul, and what he bad earnestly with tears pray'd to God against: Nay, that he had rather be torn in pieces than do it: But that there was a necessity laid upon him therein, in order to the glory of God, and the good of the nation. Then he sat down and heard the debates for some time on the foremention'd act; after which, calling to major-general Harrison, who was on the other side of the house, to come to him, he told him, That he judg'd the parliament ripe for a dissolution, and this to be the time of doing it. Harrison answer'd, Sir, the work is very great and dangerous, therefore I desire you seriously to consider of it, before you engage in it. You say well, reply'd the general; and thereupon sat still for about a quarter of an hour, and then the question for passing the said act being put, he said again to Harrison, This is the time; I must do it. And so standing up on a sudden, he bad the speaker leave the chair, and told the house, That they had sat long enough, unless they had done more good; that some of them were whore-masters; (looking then towards Harry Martin and Sir Peter Wentworth;) that others of them were drunkards, and some corrupt and unjust men, and scandalous to the profession of the gospel; and that it was not fit they should sit as a parliament any longer, and therefore he must desire them to go away. He charg'd them with not having a heart to do any thing for the publick good, and espousing the interest of Presbytery and the lawyers, who were the supporters of tyranny and oppression; and accused them of an intention to perpetuate perpetuate themselves in power. When some of the members began to speak, he stepped into the midst of the house, and said, Come, come, I will put an end to your prating: Then walking up and down the house, he cry'd out, You are no parliament, and stamping with his feet, he bad them for shame be gone, and give place to honestier men. Upon this signal the soldiers enter'd the house, and he bad one of them, Take away that bauble, meaning the mace; and Harrison taking the speaker by the arm, he came down. Then (as Ludlow informs us) the general addressing himself again to the members, who were about a hundred, said, 'Tis you that have forced me to this, for I have fought the Lord night and day, that he would rather slay me, than put me upon the doing of this work. And then seizing on all their papers, he order'd the soldiers to see the house clear'd of all members; and having caus'd the doors to be lock'd up, went away to Whitehall. "Thus, as Whitelock observes, it pleased God, that this assembly, famous throughout the world for its undertakings, actions and successes, having subdued all their enemies, were themselves overthrown and ruin'd by their servants; and those whom they had rais'd, now pull'd down their masters: An example never to be forgotten, and scarce to be parallel'd in any story! By which all persons may be instructed, how uncertain and subject to change all worldly affairs are; how apt to fall when we think them highest."

The general being return'd to Whitehall, found the officers who were there assembled, in debate concerning this weighty affair, and told them, He bod done it, and they needed not to trouble themselves any farther about it. Some of those officers, who dislik'd what the general had done, particularly colonel Okey, repair'd to him to desire satisfaction in that proceeding, apprehending the way they were.
1653. were now in tended to ruin and destruction. To these he made large pretensions to honesty and concern for the publick weal, professing himself resolv'd to do much more good, and with more expedition than could be expected from the parliament. This put most of them to silence, and made them willing to wait for a farther discovery of his design, before they proceeded so far as to break with him.

Having thus dissolv'd the parliament, general Cromwell went the same day in the afternoon to the council of state, attended by the major-generals Lambert and Harrison; and as he enter'd, spoke thus to them, Gentlemen, if you are met here as private persons, you shall not be disturbed; but if as a council of state, this is no place for you: And since you cannot but know what was done at the house in the morning, so take notice that the parliament is dissolv'd. Serjeant Bradshaw boldly answer'd; Sir, we have heard what you did at the house in the morning, and before many hours all England will hear it: But, Sir, you are mistaken, to think that the parliament is dissolv'd; for no power under heaven can dissolve them but themselves: Therefore take you notice of that. Some others also spoke to the same purpose: But the council finding themselves to be under the same force, they all quietly departed.
THE LIFE OF OLIVER CROMWELL.

PART III.
Containing his actions in the Protectorate; from the dissolution of the Long Parliament, to his Death.

CHAP. I.
From the dissolution of the long parliament, to the meeting of Cromwell's first parliament.

The formidable body at Westminster being thus forcibly dissolved, the lord-general and his party were very busy in consulting how to manage the government, which by this means was fallen into their hands. This single action made Cromwell master of three kingdoms; for tho' he did not take upon himself the title of Protector, till several months after, yet his power was in effect the same, from the very moment that he succeeded in this bold undertaking: Soon after which, he sent for major Salloway and Mr. John Carew, and complain'd to them of the great weight of affairs that by this means was fallen.
1653. fallen upon him; affirming, that the thoughts of the consequence thereof made him to tremble; and therefore desir'd them to free him from the temptations that might be laid before him, and to that end to go immediately to the chief justice St. John, and Mr. Selden, and some others; and endeavour to persuade them to draw up some instrument of government, that might put the power out of his hands. To this major Salloway answer'd, The way, Sir, to free you from this temptation, is for you not to look upon yourself to be under it, but to rest persuaded, that the power of this nation is in the good people of England, as formerly it was. This answer was thought to be not very agreeable to the general, who now appointed a meeting of the chief officers of the army to be at Whitehall, in order to deliberate what was proper to be done in this exigency; and with their advice, he, in the first place, publish'd a declaration of the grounds and reasons for their dissolving the late parliament; which was to the following effect:

"That after God was pleased marvellously to appear for his people, in reducing of Ireland and Scotland to so great a degree of peace, and England to perfect quiet; whereby the parliament had opportunity to give the people the harvest of all their labour, blood, and treasure, and to settle a due liberty in reference to civil and spiritual things; whereunto they were oblig'd by their duty, engagements, and those great and wonderful things God hath wrought for them; they notwithstanding made so little progress therein, that it was matter of much grief to the good people of the land; who thereupon apply'd themselves to the army, expecting redress by their means; who (tho' unwilling to meddle with the civil authority) agreed that such officers, as were members of parliament, should move them to proceed vigorously in reforming what was amiss in the commonwealth," and in settling it upon a foundation of justice and righteousness; which being done, it was hop’d the parliament would have answer’d their expectations. But finding the contrary, they renew’d their desires by an humble petition in August, 1652, which produc’d no considerable effect, nor was any such progress made therein, as might imply their real intentions to accomplish what was petition’d for; but rather an averseness to the things themselves, with much bitterness and opposition to the people of God, and his Spirit acting in them; inasmuch that the godly party in parliament were render’d of no farther use than to countenance the ends of a corrupt party, for effecting their designs of perpetuating themselves in the supreme government. For obviating these evils, the officers of the army obtain’d several meetings with some of the parliament, to consider what remedy might be apply’d to prevent the same: But such endeavours proving ineffec’tual, it became evident, that this parliament, through the corruption of some, the jealousy of others, and the non-attendance of many, would never answer those ends, which God, his people, and the whole nation expected from them; but that this cause, which God had so greatly bless’d, must needs languish under their hands, and by degrees be lost; and the lives, liberties, and comforts of his people be deliver’d into their enemies hands. All which being sadly and serioulsy consider’d by the honest people of the nation, as well as by the army, it seem’d a duty incumbent upon us, who had seen so much of the power and presence of God, to consider of some effectual means, whereby to establisht righteousness and peace in these nations. And after much debate, it was judg’d necessary, that the supreme government should be by the parliament devolv’d upon known persons fearing God, 1653.
The LIFE of

"God, and of approv'd integrity, for a time, as the most hopeful way to countenance all God's people, reform the law, and administer justice impartially; hoping thereby the people might forget monarchy, and understand their true interest in the election of successive parliaments; that so the government might be settled upon a right basis, without hazard to this glorious cause, or necessitating to keep up armies for the defence of the same. And being still resolv'd to use all means possible to avoid extraordinary courses, we prevail'd with about twenty members of parliament to give us a conference; with whom we plainly debated the necessity and justice of our proposals; the which found no acceptance, but instead thereof, it was offer'd, That the way was, to continue still this parliament, as being that from which we might probably expect all good things. This being vehemently insisted on did much confirm us in our apprehensions, that not any love to a representative, but the making use thereof to recruit, and so to perpetuate themselves, was their aim in the act they had then under consideration. For preventing the consummating whereof, and all the sad and evil consequences, which, upon the grounds aforesaid, must have ensued, and whereby at one blow the interest of all honest men, and of this glorious cause, had been endanger'd to be laid in the dust, and these nations embroil'd in new troubles, at a time when our enemies abroad were watching all advantages against, and some of them actually engag'd in war with us; we have been necessitated (tho' with much reluctancy) to put an end to this parliament. Then they promis'd, to put the government into the hands of persons of approv'd fidelity and honesty; and at last declar'd, "That all magistrates and officers whatsoever shall proceed in in their respective places and offices, and obedience shall be paid to them as fully, as when the parliament was sitting."

This declaration was subscribed by the lord-general, and his council of officers, Whitehall, April 22d, 1653. Which council of officers and some others, were soon after form'd into a council of state, which was compos'd of the thirty persons following: Cromwell, Fleetwood, Lambert, Lisle, Harrison, Desborough, Pickering, Wollesly, Ashle-Cooper, Hope, Hewson, Norton, Montague, Bennet, Stapely, Sydenham, Tomlinson, Jones, Tichburn, Strickland, Carew, Howard, Broughton, Lawrence, Holister, Courtney, Major, St. Nicholas, Moyer, and Williams.

The dissolution of the parliament was very grateful and acceptable to a great many people; and this declaration, being sent out into all the dominions of the commonwealth, was answer'd by many congratulations and addresses from the fleet, and army, and people, promising to stand by the general and his council of officers, and acknowledging the justice of the late action. (And this, by the way, gave rise to the practice of addressing, which beginning first under Oliver and his son Richard, has been so common in all the reigns since.) The said declaration was on the 30th day of April seconded by this ensuing, which met with equal submission and obedience.

"Whereas the parliament being dissolved, persons of approved fidelity and honesty are (according to the late declaration of the 22d of April last) to be called from the several parts of this commonwealth to the supreme authority; and although effectual proceedings are, and have been had, for perfecting those resolutions; yet some convenient time being required for the assembling of those persons, it hath been found necessary, for preventing the mis-chiefs

The entertainment met with. Another declaration.

1653.
The LIFE of

1653.

chiefs and inconveniencies which may arise in the mean while to the publick affairs, that a council of state be constituted, to take care of, and intend the peace, safety, and present management of the affairs of this commonwealth; which being settled accordingly, the same is hereby declar'd and published, to the end all persons may take notice thereof, and in their several places and stations, demean themselves peaceably, giving obedience to the laws of the nation as heretofore; in the exercise and administration whereof, as endeavours shall be used that no oppression or wrong be done to the people, so a strict account will be required of all such as shall do any thing to endanger the publick peace and quiet, upon any pretence whatsoever." Subscribed O. Cromwell.

The lord-general Cromwell having now in effect the supreme power in his hands, the first remarkable passage, that befel him, was at sea. The Dutch had form'd mighty expectations from the late revolutions in England, believing the English would by this means be brought to fall together by the ears, and so their work would be very easy with them. With these hopes, notwithstanding their late pretences to peace, they with all imaginable diligence, set out a greater fleet to sea, than they had done before; and Van Trump boasted he would fire the English ships in their harbours, and the Downs, before the English fleet could get out. But the new government, well knowing what credit was to be given to the Dutch protestations, of their sincere love and affection to the English nation, &c. were not behind-hand with them, but did every thing that might advance the maritime preparations; so that in May they sent out another gallant fleet consisting of a hundred ships of all sorts, under the command of Monk and Dean as admirals, Pen as vice-admiral, admiral, and Lawson as rear-admiral. On the second of June, early in the morning, they engag'd the Dutch fleet under Van Trump, De Ruyter, De Wit, and the two Evertons, consisting of a hundred and four men of war, twelve galliots, and nine fireships. This fight happen'd not far from the coast of Flanders, the beginning of which was so fatal, that at the first broad-side of the enemy, admiral Dean was shot off almost in the middle by a cannon ball. The fight continu'd till three in the afternoon, when the wind coming up contrary to the English, the Dutch fled, and were pursu'd by the lightest of the English frigates. The next morning, the two fleets found themselves again near each other, but the wind was so slack that Monk could not come to engage the enemy till about noon; and then the battle began again, and continu'd very hot on both sides, till ten at night. The English fleet charg'd the Dutch with so much bravery and resolution, that they put them into very great disorder; so that tho' Van Trump fired on them to rally them, he could not procure above twenty ships of his whole fleet to stand by him, the rest making all the sail they could away to the eastward: And the wind blowing a fresh gale from the westward, the English pursu'd them with such success, that they sunk six of their best ships, blew up two others, and took eleven with thirteen hundred and fifty prisoners, among whom were six of their principal captains. Towards the end of this battle, admiral Blake came in with eighteen fresh ships; and had not the Dutch shelter'd themselves between Dunkirk and Calais, where 'twas not safe for the English to expose their great ships, by reason of the sands, most of their fleet had in all probability been taken or destroy'd. The loss of the English was greatest in their admiral Dean: Besides him there was but one captain, and about a hundred and fifty com-
General Cromwell prepares for a new parliament.

His form of summons to the persons nominated for that purpose.

The L I F E of

1653.

mon seamen kill'd: More were wounded, but they lost not one ship. Having put their prisoners on shore, and left some of their ships to be refitted, they returned to the coast of Holland, where for some time they block'd up the Dutch in their own harbours, and ply'd to and again betwixt the Texel and the Uly, to hinder ships coming out from thence to join with that part of the Dutch fleet which was got into the Wielings, and to stop up their trade and fishing.

At home, general Cromwell and his council of officers were in the mean time very busy in preparing for a new kind of parliament. Major-general Lambert mov'd, that a few persons, not exceeding ten or twelve, might be intrusted with the supreme authority; Major-general Harrison was for a greater number, and inclin'd most to that of 70, as being the number of the Jewish Sanbedrim. But after some debate, it was resolved by the general and his council to summon select persons, to be nominated by themselves, out of every county; who should be a representative of the whole nation: And the several persons having been agreed upon, letters from the general were thus directed to each of them.

"Forasmuch as upon the dissolution of the late parliament, it became necessary that the peace, safety, and good government of this commonwealth should be provided for; and in order thereunto, divers persons fearing God, and of approv'd fidelity and honesty, are by myself, with the advice of my council of officers, nominated, to whom the great charge and trust of so weighty affairs is to be committed; and having good assurance of your love to, and courage for God, and the interest of this cause, and of the good people of this commonwealth: I Oliver Cromwell, captain-general and commander in chief of all the armies and forces raised
"raised and to be raised within this common-wealth, do hereby summons and require you, being one of the persons nominated, personally to appear at the council-chamber at Whitehall within the city of Westminster, upon the fourth day of July, next ensuing the date hereof, then and there to take upon you the said trust, unto which you are hereby call'd, and appointed to serve as a member of the county of—And hereof you are not to fail. Given under my hand this eighth day of June, 1653. O. Cromwell."

Before the meeting of this convention, several other acts of authority were perform'd by the general. On the 14th of June, he and the council of state put forth a declaration, "To invite all the good people in these nations to thankfulness, and holy rejoicing in the Lord, for the late great victory at sea against the Dutch." And he appointed a day for the meeting of himself and his council of officers for that purpose. Many people were the more pleas'd with this, because it was not a command imposed on them, but only an invitation to keep a day of publick thanksgiving. On the 22d, that there might be no interruption to the administration of justice, the general with the council of state nominated the judges for the summer circuit. And a few days after, they passed an order, forbidding all riotous assemblies in the great level of the fens, and the throwing down of fences and inclosures there.
The several persons summoned by general Cromwell to take upon them the supreme authority, appeared on the appointed day, July 4, about eleven weeks after the dissolution of the late parliament, in the council-chamber at Whitehall, to the number of about an hundred and twenty. Being set round the table, the general, attended by many of his officers, standing about the middle of the table, made a speech to them, "Of the fear of God, and the honour due to his name; remembering them of the wonderful mercies of God to this nation, and the continued series of providence, by which he had appeared in carrying on his cause, and bringing affairs into that present glorious condition, wherein they now were. Then he reminded them of the noble actions of the army in the famous battle of Worcester, and of the applications they had made to the parliament for a good settlement of all the affairs of the commonwealth, the neglect whereof made it absolutely necessary to dissolve it. Hence he shew'd them the cause of their summons, and assur'd them by many arguments, some of which were taken from scripture, That they had a clear call to take upon them the supreme authority of the commonwealth. He said, that he never look'd to see such a day, when Jesus Christ should be so owned, as this day was; and that he had not allow'd himself in the choice of one person, in whom he had not this good hope, That there
Oliver Cromwell.

There was faith in Jesus Christ, and love unto all his saints and people." And concluded with a very earnest desire, "That great tenderness might be used towards all conscientious persons, of what judgment ever they appeared to be."

His speech being ended, he deliver'd to them an instrument engross'd in parchment under his hand and seal, whereby, with the advice of his council of officers, he did devolve and intrust the supreme authority and government of this commonwealth into the hands of the persons then met; and declared, "That they, or any forty of them, were to be held and acknowledg'd the supreme authority of the nation, unto whom all persons within the same were to yield obedience and subjection; that they should not sit longer than the third of November, 1654, and three months before their dissolution, should make choice of other persons to succeed them; who were not to sit longer than a year, and to provide for a like succession in the government."

Then the general and his officers withdrew, and the persons thus commission'd adjourn'd themselves to the next day, to meet in the parliament-house; where they kept a fast, and published a declaration, To stir up the godly of the nation to seek God for a blessing upon their proceedings. They chose Mr. Rouse, an old gentleman of Devonshire, and provost of Eton college, who had been a member of the long parliament, to be their speaker; resolved, that general Cromwell and his chief officers, Lambert, Harrison, Desborough, and Thon- linson, should sit in the house as members; and at once voted themselves to be the parliament of the commonwealth of England, and that all addresses should be made to them under that title. Then they appointed several committees, 1. To consider matters touching the law. 2. Touching prisoners and prisons. 3. For inspection into treasuries, and 1653. eas'g publick charges, 4. For Ireland. 5. For Scotland. 6. For the army. 7. For petitions. 8. To consider what shall be offer'd about publick debts, publick fraud and breaches of trust. 9. For regulating commissions of the peace, and for making provision for the poor. 10. For advance of trade. 11. For advancement of learning. And they referred it to a committee to consider of the laws that hinder'd the progress of the gospel, that they might be repeal'd. The chief laws made by this assembly were these: One for punishing seditious sea-men: Another for marrying by justices of the peace, and registering marriages, births and burials: A third concerning the plantation of Ireland, settling the lands there upon the adventurers and soldiers: A fourth for payment of some publick debts.
The Life of

WHITELOCK says, It was much wonder'd by some, that these gentlemen, many of whom were persons of fortune and knowledge, would upon such a summons, and from such hands, take upon them the supreme authority of this nation. The lord Clarendon informs us, that there were amongst them divers of the quality and degree of gentlemen, who had estates, and such a proportion of credit and reputation, as could consist with the guilt they had contracted: But he says, that much the major part of them consisted of inferior persons, of no quality or name. Ludlow gives them this character: "Many of the members of this assembly had manifested a good affection to the publick cause; (be means a commonwealth:) But some among them were brought in as spies and trepanners; who, tho' they had always been of the contrary party, made the highest pretensions to honesty, and the service of the nation. This assembly therefore being compos'd for the most part of honest and well-meaning persons, who having good intentions, were
"were less apt to suspect the evil designs of others, thought themselves in full possession of the power and authority of the nation, &c." And others speak thus of them: "This very parliament, which had indeed procured very beneficial orders in matters of lesser moment, in the greater concerns had not so good fortune. There was so much confusion in their councils, such a contrariety in their opinions, such a dissonancy in their actings, and disparity in their aims and projections, as that this senate was more like a monster with many heads, than a well-ordered grand assembly or supreme council." One Praise-God Barebones, a Leather-seller in Fleet-street, was a very busy man in this assembly; whence it had the name of Barebone's parliament. It was also called by some the Little parliament; and from an order that none should be admitted into the service of the house, but such of whose real godliness they were first satisfy'd, it was call'd the Godly parliament.

Under this change of government, lieutenant-colonel John Lilburn, whose turbulent spirit in the time of the late parliament had procur'd his banishment, now finding their power at an end, came over into England, and very confidently address'd himself to general Cromwell for protection. But the general well knowing of what spirit John was, committed him to Newgate, and left him to the law: Whereby he underwent a strict trial, in which he discover'd his parts and subtlety by the variety of his pleas, and his invincible temper by the boldness of his replies; and by the favour of the jury was at last acquitted. Oliver seem'd to be much offended with him, and very desirous to have him punished; yet privately paid him a pension equivalent to a lieutenant-colonel's pay.

This person was of so undaunted and ungovernable a temper, as can scarce be parallel'd in any nation.
He was whipp’d and pillory’d in the time of the late king, and suffer’d three years imprisonment, till the times turn’d; when coming into play again, he became a grand leveller, and violent opposer of all that was uppermost. He obtain’d the name of Free-born John, and had such an inveterate spirit of contradiction, that was commonly said of him, that if the world was emptied of all but himself, John would be against Lilburn, and Lilburn against John. Cromwell kept him in prison for some time; and he at last died a quaker.

The Dutch were so humbled by the late descent, that they immediately took up a resolution for peace, and sent over to England a vessel with a white flag, and a messenger to prepare the way for two ambassadors to come over for that purpose. General Cromwell was not averse to a treaty, but would allow of no cessation till it was concluded. This being known in Holland, they could not bear to think of suffering so long the disadvantage of being besieged, and shut up in their ports; but with all possible expedition prepar’d another fleet, that might be sufficient to remove the English from thence; so that in less than two months after their defeat, they had a fleet of an hundred and twenty-five sail. From these wonderful preparations, they had so great confidence of success, that they sent admiral Van Trump out of the Wieldings with ninety-five sail, before the rest were ready, which De Wit soon after brought up to him from the Texel.

On the 29th of July, the English scouts discover’d Van Trump’s fleet; of which they gave notice, that the whole fleet, which then lay about three leagues off to sea, might make up to engage them: But the wind being against them, kept them from any action, till about six in the evening; when about thirty nimble frigates (the rest being still a-stern) began the encounter, which con-continu’d till they were parted by the night. The Dutch bore away towards the Texel, and being re-inforc’d by the ships under De Wit, which were the prime of their navy, whereon they chiefly rely’d, Van Trump immediately endeavour’d to put all in a fighting posture, designing to engage the next day; when the wind being very high, the English fleet, for fear of falling upon the flats, stood out to sea. This made many of the Dutch suppose that the English were flying; insomuch that one of the captains said to Van Trump, Sir, these dogs durst not stand one broadside from your excellency; you may see them plainly running home; and therefore, my lord, miss not the opportunity. But Van Trump, who had had sufficient experience of the English, and knew the meaning of their standing off, gave him this short answer, Do you look to your charge; for if the English were but twenty sail, I am sure they would fight us. The next morning proving fair, both fleets prepared for the battle; and about five o’clock, the Dutch having the weather-gage, began the fight somewhat at a distance; but it was not long before both fleets were desperately engaged. The sea was never adorn’d with a more gallant fight in the beginning of the day, nor cover’d with a more dismal one in the latter end; and no fight was ever carry’d on with more bloody obstinacy and rage, than this was for several hours together. In the midst of this terrible encounter, admiral Van Trump, the glory of the Dutch nation, as he stood upon his quarter-deck with his sword drawn, bravely encouraging his men, being shot into the heart with a musquet-ball, dropt down dead without speaking a word. This struck such a terror into the enemy, and put them in such confusion, that they fled and made all the sail they could towards the Texel. About thirty of their men of war were fir’d or funk, and a great many prisoners taken. The victory was was great, but cost the English dear; for eight of their brave captains, with about four hundred men were slain, and about seven hundred wounded; tho' they lost but one ship. This victory was so acceptable to general Cromwell's parliament, that they appointed a day of thanksgiving for it, and order'd a narrative of it to be publickly read; and gave several gold chains to Blake, Monk, Penn, and Lawson, for their good service, and a gratuity to the rest of the officers and seamen, according to their quality: And 'tis said, that the lord-general himself put the chain, and the medal, with the representation of a sea-fight, about Monk's neck; and having invited him to dinner, made him wear it all the while.

In Holland, after this last defeat, and the loss of their brave admiral, all things were in great confusion and distraction: The common people no longer obey'd their government; the placarts of the States-general were contemn'd, and they in danger to be ruin'd and plunder'd by the ignorant and furious rabble. They therefore with all submission applied themselves by their ambassadors to the English council of state; but from whom they could obtain no other terms of peace, than a coalition, satisfaction for damages, and security against the like for the future, and that the Dutch should take a lease for twenty-one years for fishing, and pay an annual rent. The council of state being thus resolute, the plenipotentiaries resolv'd to try what terms of peace might be had from the parliament: But here they were more confounded and perplexed than before; they found it was very difficult to treat with, and impossible to prevail upon these men, who took the Dutch for the out-works of Babylon, and look'd upon them as carnal and worldly politicians, and enemies to the kingdom of Christ, which they thought was now approaching. In this difficult conjuncture, the States met to consult what was fit to be
be done. 'Twas the opinion of Holland, never to enter into a coalition with England, but that a strict league defensive should be propos'd; that they ought to contract foreign amities, particularly with France, and to equip out a fleet with all expedition. The rest of the provinces were for making a league with the elector of Brandenburgh, and other German princes, and for assisting the Scots, many of whom were now rising under major-general Middleton. But these treaties were remote and dangerous, whilst their necessities were present; for which reason they gave orders to their plenipotentiaries, “To protract time according as they saw disorders to increase between Cromwell and his supreme authority; to be ample in the generals concerning the defence of the reformed religion, and of the household of faith; to reject the coalition, to offer to enter into a strict and intimate league; but deal as tenderly as they could in point of reparation, satisfaction, or security.”

This being all known to the council of state, it was communicated to the parliament; who thereupon said, “That it was no more than was prophesy'd in scripture, and in course to be expected, That the gentiles should rage, and the kings of the earth set themselves against the kingdom of Christ; but they should fall before him, and be broken in pieces.” And they resolv'd now to humble them, by imposing very hard and mortifying articles upon them; so that they seemed to be in no better state, than before the long parliament was dissolv'd. In this extremity the Dutch plenipotentiaries made their applications to the lord-general Cromwell, assuring him, “That in case he would depose the present powers, and assume the government to himself, they would be ready to accord with him, upon more moderate terms, and enter into such a defensive alliance, as would secure him against all his foreign and domestick enemies.”
The general found, that the proceedings of this parliament, tho' all of his own chusing, were so uncommon and unaccountable in many particulars, that none could judge of their designs, or where they would end. And so upon both these accounts he resolv'd to put a period to their power; and the means of doing it were concerted with Rouse the speaker, and some of the general's select friends in the house, who were to bring it to bear with as little disturbance as might be.

Accordingly, on the 12th of December in the morning, the members, who were in the secret, being met a little earlier than usual, it was mov'd in the house, That the sitting of this parliament any longer, would not be for the good of the commonwealth, and that it would be fit for them to resign up their powers into the hands of the lord-general. This being seconded and urged by Sydenham, Wolльsey, and others, the members on the contrary side, who were there, were much startled and spoke vehemently against it: Upon which, those who were for a resignation, being apprehensive, that by delaying time more might come to the house and out-vote them, presently mov'd, That all who were for a dissolution, should rise and walk out. Accordingly, the speaker and as many members as would follow him, went with the mace to Whitehall, and by a writing under their hands, resign'd up their powers to the general. Above twenty of the members, whereof major-general Harrison was one, continuing still in the house, plac'd Mr. Moyer in the chair, and fell to protesting against what the rest had done; but a party of soldiers was sent to turn them out, and so a period was put to this assembly, after a session of five months and eight days.

By this resignation, the politick Cromwell, with his council of officers, was once more posses'd of the supreme power of the kingdom; whereupon he thought fit to advise with them, and with other persons.
persons of interest in the nation, How this great burden of governing England, Scotland, and Ireland, with the armies therein, and the navy at sea, should be borne, and by whom. These soon resolved, That a council of godly, able and discreet persons should be named; and that the Lord General should be chosen Lord Protector of the three nations.

Upon this, a large instrument was drawn up, entitled, The government of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; commonly call'd, The instrument of government. It consisted of forty-two articles, and was in substance as follows:

"That the supreme legislative authority be, and reside in a single person, and the people in parliament; the style of which person to be Lord protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. The executive power to be in the Protector, with the advice of his council; the number whereof not to exceed twenty-one, nor be less than thirteen. All proceedings to run in the name and style of the Lord Protector; and all honours, offices and titles to be derived from him; and that he may pardon all offences but treason and murder. The militia, in time of parliament, to be in his and their hands; but in the intervals only in his and his council's. He and his council to make war and peace with foreign princes. Not to make new laws, or abrogate old ones, without consent of parliament. A parliament to be summon'd to meet at Westminster upon the third day of September, 1654, and afterwards every third year, and, if need be, oftner, which the Protector shall not dissolve without consent in parliament, till after five months. The parliament to consist of four hundred English to be chosen according to the proportions and numbers hereafter expressed, that is to say, for the country of Bedford, six; viz. for the town of Bedford, one; for the coun-
252 The LIFE of

1653. ty of Bedford, five. For the county of Berks, seven; viz. for the borough of Abingdon, one; for the borough of Reading, one; for the county of Berks, five, &c. (The members for Cornwall were in this instrument reduc'd to twelve; those for Essex were enlarg'd to sixteen; and the city of London was to chuse six.) The members for Scotland were to be thirty, and the same number for Ireland. The summoning the parliament to pass under the seal of the commonwealth to the sheriffs; and if the Protector omit or deny that, then the commissioner of the seal to be held under pain of treason to issue out such writs; and in case of failure in him, the high-sheriffs: Such as are elected, to be return'd in to the Chancery by the chief magistrates (sheriffs, mayors, or bailiffs) within twenty days after the election. If either the sheriff, mayor or bailiff make a false return, or any ways procure an undue election, let him be fin'd two thousand pounds. Those who have born arms against the parliament to be incapable of being elected, or giving their vote for any members to serve in the next parliament, or in the three succeeding triennial parliaments; and Irish rebels and Papists to be for ever incapable. None to be elected under the age of twenty-one years, nor unless he be a man of good conversation. None to have votes in elections, but such as are worth 200l. Sixty to make a Quorum. Bills presented to the Protector, if not assented to by him within twenty days, to pass into laws notwithstanding; provided they contain nothing contrary to this instrument. A competent revenue to be settled for the maintenance of ten thousand horse and dragoons, and twenty thousand foot in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and for a convenient number of ships to guard the seas; and upon abating any of the forces by land or sea, the moneys to be brought to the Exchequer to serve sudden occasions. The raising of money for defraying the charge of the present extraordinary forces both at land and sea, to be by consent in parliament, and not otherwise; save only that the Protector, with the advice of his council, shall have power, until the meeting of the first parliament, to raise money for the purposes aforesaid, and also to make laws and ordinances for the peace and welfare of these nations; which shall be in force, till the parliament shall take order concerning the same. All forfeited lands unfolded to belong to the Protector. The Protectorate to be elective, but the royal family to be excluded; and no Protector after the present to be general of the army. Oliver Cromwell to be the present Protector. All the great offices of the commonwealth, such as chancellor, keeper of the seal, treasurer, admiral, governors of Ireland and Scotland, &c. if they become void in time of parliament, to be supply’d with their approbation, and in intervals of parliament with the approbation of the council. The Christian Religion, as contain’d in the holy scriptures, to be the publick profession of these nations; and those that administer it, to be maintain’d by the publick, but by some way more convenient and less liable to envy than tithes. None to be compell’d to consent to the publick profession, by fine or any punishment whatever, but only by persuasion and arguments. None that profess faith in Christ, however otherwise they differ, to be restrain’d from, but to be protected in the exercise of their religion, so they do not quarrel with and disturb others; this liberty not to extend to Popery or Prelacy. All sales of parliament to stand good. Articles of peace to be kept. The Protectors successively, upon entering on their charge, to swear to procure, by all means, 1653.

He is install'd.

"means, the peace, quiet and welfare of the commonwealth, to observe these articles, and to administer all things (to their power) according to the laws, statutes and customs."

All things being prepar'd, on the 16th of December, about three in the afternoon, his Excellency, the Lord General, went from Whitehall to the Chancery court, in the following manner: The commissioners of the great seal march'd first; then the judges and barons in their robes; next to them the council of the commonwealth; then the lord-mayor, aldermen, and recorder of London; after them, came the Lord General, attended with the chief officers of the army. In this procession they ascended the Chancery court, where was set a rich chair of state, with a large cushion, and carpets on the floor. The General stood on the left hand of it uncover'd, till the foremention'd instrument was read; which his Excellency subscrib'd in the face of the court, and took an oath in these words:

His oath. "Whereas the major part of the last parliament (judging that their sitting any longer, as then constituted, would not be for the good of the commonwealth) did dissolve the same, and by a writing under their hands, dated the 12th day of this instant December, resigned unto me their powers and authorities: And whereas it was necessary thereupon, that some speedy course should be taken for the settlement of these nations upon such a basis and foundation, as, by the blessing of God, might be lasting, secure property, and answer those great ends of religion and liberty, so long contended for: And upon full and mature consideration had of the form of government hereunto annexed, being satisfy'd that the same, thro' divine assistance, may answer the ends aforemention'd; and having also been desired and advised, as well by several persons of interest and fidelity in the common-
Oliver Cromwell.

commonwealth, as the officers of the army, to take upon me the protection and government of these nations, in the manner expressed in the said form of government: I have accepted thereof, and do hereby declare my acceptance accordingly; and do promise in the presence of God, that I will not violate or infringe the matters and things contained therein; but to my power, observe the same, and cause them to be observ'd; and shall in all other things, to the best of my understanding, govern these nations according to the laws, statutes and customs, seeking their peace, and causing justice and law to be equally administer'd.

This done, he sat down in the chair, cover'd; and the commissioners deliver'd up the great seal to him, and the lord-mayor his sword and cap of maintenance; which the Protector immediately return'd to them again. The ceremony being over, the soldiers with a shout cry'd out, God bless the Lord protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. And so they went back to Whitehall, the lord-mayor uncover'd carrying the sword before his Highness. When they came into the Banqueting-house, Mr. Lockier made an exhortation to them; and so the lord-mayor, aldermen and judges departed.

Pronently after, the following proclamation, set forth by the council, was publish'd in the Palace-yard, at the Old Exchange, and several other places in London; and as soon as could be, throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland. Whereas the late parliament, dissolving themselves, and resigning their powers and authorities, the government of the commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, by a Lord Protector and successive triennial Parliaments, is now establish'd: and whereas Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of all the forces of this common-wealth, is declar'd 1653. "clar'd Lord Protector of the said nations, and hath accepted thereof: We have therefore thought it necessary (as we hereby do) to make publication of the premises, and strictly to charge and command all, and every person and persons, of what quality and condition soever, in any of the said three nations, to take notice thereof, and to conform and submit themselves to the government so establish'd. And all sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, and other publick ministers and officers, whom this may concern, are requir'd to cause this proclamation to be forthwith publish'd in their respective counties, cities, corporations, and market-towns; to the end none may have cause to pretend ignorance in this behalf." And now care was taken to alter all writs and process, from the style of the Keepers of the liberties of England, to that of Protector. Upon this new advancement, we are told, that Cromwell observ'd new and great state, and all ceremonies and respects were paid to him by all sorts of men, as to their Prince. Thus, as has been observ'd by many, did this extraordinary man, with so little pains, mount himself into the throne of three kingdoms, without the title of King, but with more power and authority than had ever been exercis'd by any preceeding King: He made the greatest figure in Europe in his time, and receiv'd greater marks of respect and esteem from all the Kings and Princes in Christendom, than had ever been shewn to any Monarch of these nations; which was the more wonderful, in that they all hated him, when they trembled at his power, and courted his friendship.

CHAP.
Cromwell being thus rais’d to the power of a monarch, proceeded in the exercise of his government, with the greatest vigour and industry. He and his council set forth several ordinances; amongst the rest, one declaring what offences should be adjudg’d treason; another for repealing those acts and resolves of parliament, which had formerly been made for subscribing to the Engagement against a single person and house of peers; another for appointing persons to be approvers of ministers. At his first assuming the government, there were three great parties in the nation all against him, the Episcopal party, the Presbyterians, and the Republicans: And it requir’d the greatest dexterity and skill to manage these very opposite factions, and to prevent the ill effects of the plots and conspiracies they were so ready to run into. He had only the army to rely upon; and that enthusiastick spirit he had taken so much pains to raise among them, render’d them very intractable; so that he was forc’d to break and imprison many of his officers; and he flatter’d the rest as well as he could, going on in his old way of long and dark discourses.

He was apprehensive of assassination, and other plottings from the Cavalier party; as to the former of which, he took a method that prov’d of great use to him: He would many times openly declare, “That in a war it was necessary to return upon any side, all the violent things that any of the one side did to the other; and this for the preventing greater mischief, and for bringing men to fair war: And that assassinations were such detestable things, that he would never begin them; but if any of the king’s party should endeavour to assassinate him, and fail in it, he "would make an assassinating war of it, and destroy the whole family." And he pretended he had instruments to do this, whenever he should order it. This struck such a terror, that it prov'd a better security to him than his guards. And whenever they were plotting against him, he had his agents and spies amongst them, to give him notice
of their preparations and proceedings; by which means all their schemes were broken, and their designs frustrate, before they could bring them to perfection.

The Presbyterians so dreaded the fury of the commonwealth party, that they look'd upon Cromwell's turning them out to be a happy deliverance
for them; and to soften these the more, he assur'd them he would maintain a publick ministry with all due encouragement, which the Republicans were most against; and he joined them in a commissio
with some Independents to be Tryers of all publick preachers, who should, for the future, be admitted to any benefit. The persons so commission'd did likewise dispose of all the churches that were in the gift of the crown, of the bishops, and of the cathedral churches. Nevertheless, when he perceive that the Presbyterians began to take too much upon them, to be uneasy under the government, or meddle in civil affairs, he found means to mortify them,
and let loose against them those of the other sects,
who took pleasure in disputing with their preachers, and interrupting their religious worship; and
'tis said, he was by many heard to glory, That be had curst that insolent sect, that would suffer none but itself. So that they were forc'd to thank him for permitting them the exercise of their religious worship in their own congregations.

The Republican party were his greatest enemies,
and most bent on his ruin, looking on him as the person who had perfidiously broken all their measures,
sures, and betray'd their glorious cause. This party therefore he studied by all means to divide am-omg themselves, and to set the fifth-monarchy men, and other enthusiasts, against those who proceeded only upon the principles of civil liberty; such as Algernon Sidney, Henry Nevill, Martin, Ludlow, Wildman, and Harrington.

As to Vane and his party, who were likewise call'd Independents, they indeed, from the time they were turned out of the long parliament, retir'd quietly into the country, where they endeav'our'd to prejudice their neighbours against the present government, and yet managed themselves with so much caution, as not to disturb the quiet of the nation, nor give the Protector any great advantage against them.

The Levellers, many of whom had been the most active Agitators in the army, were the most furious and desperate of all the commonwealth party. These, from the time that the general affum'd the title of Protector, which was to them as odious as that of King, profess'd a mortal hatred to his person; and he knew very well that these men, as well as the last mention'd, had great credit in his army, and with some of the chief officers; so that he more really dreaded them, than all the king's party, and subtilly colour'd many of the preparations he made against them, as if they were design'd against the other. The fifth-monarchy men seem'd to be in daily expectation of the coming of King Jesus, and the Protector found it no easy matter to give them satisfaction, since his assuming the government after this manner, look'd like a step to kingship, which they represented as the great Antichrist, which hindered Christ's being set on his throne. To these men he would say with many tears, "That he would rather have taken a shepherd's staff than the
"Protectorship, since nothing was more contrary

But he saw it was necessary at that time, to keep the nation from falling into extreme disorder, and from becoming open to the common enemy; and therefore he only slept in between the living and the dead, in that interval, till God should direct them on what bottom they ought to settle; and then he would surrender the heavy load lying upon him with a joy equal to the sorrow with which he was affected, while under that shew of dignity. He would also carry himself with great familiarity towards these men, and enter into the terms of their old equality, shutting the door, and making them sit down covered by him, that they might see how little he cared for those distances, which for form's sake he was forc'd to keep up with others; and their discourse commonly ended in a long prayer. Thus, with much ado, he pretty well managed the Enthusiasts of the commonwealth party. As to the other Republicans, many of whom were inclin'd to Deism, he call'd them the Heathens, and acknowledg'd he could not so easily work upon them. He had some chaplains of all sorts, and became at length more gentle towards the Episcopal party, who had their meetings in several places about London, without being molested by him. In the end, even the Roman Catholicks courted him; and he with wonderful art carry'd things farther with all parties than was thought possible, considering the great difficulties he had to encounter with.

That he might the better manage the several factions he stood most in awe of, he made choice of the most active and leading men into his council, by whose influence he had the guiding of all the rest of each party. The first persons nominated to be of his council, pursuant to the instrument of government, were major-general Lambert, lieutenant-general Fleetwood, colonel Montague, (afterwards made earl of Sandwich by King Charles II.) Philip lord Viscount Lisle (since earl of Leicester) colonel Desborough, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper (afterwards earl of Shaftesbury) Sir Charles Wolsley, major-general Skippon, Mr. Strickland, colonel Sydenham, colonel Jones, Mr. Roufe, Mr. Lawrence, and Mr. Major; in all fifteen.

On the 21st of December, a proclamation was published by his Highness, with the advice and consent of his council, in the following terms:

"Oliver, lord protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, considering, "That whereas the exercise of the chief magistracy, and the administration of government, "within the said commonwealth is invested and established in his highness, assisted with a council; and left thereupon the settled and ordinary course of justice in the commonwealth (if remedy were not provided) might receive interruption; his highness, in his care of the state and publick justice thereof (reserving to future consideration the reformation and redress of any abuses by misgovernment, upon better knowledge taken thereof) is pleased, and doth hereby expressly signify, declare, and ordain, by and with the advice and consent of his council (who have power, until the meeting of the next parliament, to make laws and ordinances for the peace and welfare of these nations, where it shall be necessary; which shall be binding and in force, until order shall be taken in parliament concerning the same) That all persons, who on the tenth day of this instant December, were duly and lawfully possessed of any place of judicature, or office of authority, jurisdiction, or government, within this commonwealth, shall be, and shall so hold themselves, continued in the said offices and places respectively, as formerly"
formerly they held and enjoy'd the same, and not otherwise, until his Highness's pleasure be farther known: And all the commissions, patents, and other grants, which respect or relate unto the doing and executing of publick justice, and all proceedings of what nature soever in courts of common-law or equity, or in the court of admiralty, or by commissioners of sewers, shall stand and be in the same and like force to all intents and purposes, as the same were on the said tenth day of this instant December, until farther order given by his Highness therein: And that in the mean time (for preservation of the publick peace, and necessary proceedings in matters of justice, and for safety of the state) all the said persons, of whatsoever place, power, degree or condition, may not fail every one severally, according to his respective place, office, or charge, to proceed in the performance and execution of all duties thereunto belonging, as formerly appertaining to them, and every of them, whilst the former government was in being. Given at Whitehall this 21st day of December, in the year of our Lord 1653.

On the 27th, the Lord Protector and his council pass'd an ordinance, for continuing the excise and the commissioners: Another for continuing the act for redemption of captives: And a third for the alteration of several names and forms, used heretofore in courts, writs, grants, patents, commissions, &c. and settling proceedings in courts of law and equity. And shortly after, another ordinance was pass'd, appointing a committee of the army, and treasurers at war, as formerly. These and a great many other ordinances were pass'd by the Lord Protector and his council, before the meeting of the parliament. His Highness apply'd himself very clofely to busines, and was indefatigable in the management of the publick affairs.
All things seeming to favour the Protector and his government, both at home and abroad, he was invited by the lord-mayor, and aldermen, to dine at Grocers-ball on the 8th day of February, being Ash-wednesday. Accordingly, he rode thither in great state, the streets being rail'd on both sides, and the rails cover'd with blue cloth, and the several companies in their liveries standing all the way, according to their superiority, with the city banner and streamers of the respective companies set before them. The lord-mayor Viner, with the aldermen in scarlet and gold chains, rode to Temple-bar, where meeting his Highness with his train, he deliver'd up the sword to him, and after a short congratulatory speech, they proceeded to Grocers-ball in the following manner: The city-marshal, with some other officers, march'd first; then six trumpets, and after them his Highness's life-guard; next, eight trumpets more, followed by the city-streamers; then the aldermen, and the two sheriffs after them; then his Highness's heralds, with rich coats, adorn'd with the arms of the commonwealth. After them, the mace and cap of maintenance were carried before the lord-mayor, who carried the sword bare-headed before his Highness the Lord Protector, who followed with twelve footmen in grey liveries laced with silver, and other ornaments. After the Protector rode major-general Skippon, with the rest of the council, and the great officers of the army. Being come to Grocers-ball, the recorder made a speech to his Highness, declaring, "How happy the city did account themselves under his auspicious government, and also in the enjoyment of his presence with them that day." Then he was feasted in a most splendid and magnificent manner; and before his departure he knighted the lord-mayor with as much grace as if he had been king. At this feast, we are told, that when it was proposed to serve him on the knee, he refus'd it with some disdain, saying, Such ceremonies should be only practis'd at Rome, where they are so greedy of ceremonies, or in kingdoms govern'd by tyrants; but should be banish'd out of a Christian and Protestant commonwealth, as was that of England. Within a short time after, his Highness inv'ted the lord-mayor, aldermen and sheriffs to dine with him at Whitehall: And it was observ'd, that in all his entertainments, audiences, &c. he maintain'd the port of a great Prince, as much as if he had been so born and bred; that his soul extended itself always in proportion to the room that was given it, and in whatever space he stood, he always fill'd it. And now addresses were presented to the Lord Protector, from all parts of the three nations, congratulating his accession to the government; and several foreign ministers came over to him, acknowledging his power, courting his alliance, and giving him his title of Highness.

The Lord Protector soon concluded the peace with the Dutch, having brought them to accept of such conditions as he thought fit to give them: Among which one was, That they should not permit any of the king's party, or any enemy of the commonwealth of England, to reside within their dominions; and another, which was contain'd in a secret article, to which the great seal of the States was affix'd, whereby they oblig'd themselves, "Never to permit the Prince of Orange to be their Stadtholder, general or admiral; and also to deliver up the island of Polerone in the East-Indies, which they had taken from the English in the reign of King James, into the hands of the English East-India company; and to pay three hundred thousand pounds for the old barbarous violence exercis'd towards the English at Amboyna," for which the two last kings could not obtain any satisfaction: "That they should comply with the act of Navigation;"
Oliver Cromwell

"gation; and that they should own the sovereignty of the sea to be in the commonwealth of England, and no more dispute the flag." And thus about the beginning of April, the whole peace was concluded between the Lord Protector and the States General, with all the advantages to himself he could desire.

The Lord Protector, according to the power given him by the instrument of government, supply'd the benches of the courts at Westminster, with the ablest of the lawyers, whom he had invited to the publick service. Mr. Maynard, Twisten, Nudigate, Windham, &c. were made serjeants at law; and Mr. Matthew Hale one of the justices of the common-pleas, &c. Mr. John Thurloe, who had been secretary to the chief-justice St. John, when he was ambassadoor at the Hague, was advanced to the office of secretary of state. And to keep the other two nations in order and obedience, his Highness sent general Monk back again into Scotland, and his youngest son Henry Cromwell into Ireland, whom he made his lieutenant of that kingdom.

As the Protector discover'd a wonderful genius in the management of affairs at home; so his power and policy were more and more observed and reverenc'd abroad; and all nations now contended, by their ambassadors, which should render themselves most acceptable to him. Denmark had the favour of being taken into the Dutch treaty, upon the good terms of making the States responsible for one hundred and forty thousand pounds, to repair the damage which the English suffered from the Danes. About the same time, by the negotiation of his ambassadoor Whitelock, he made a firm alliance with the kingdom of Sweden. He forced Portugal to send an ambassadoor to beg peace, and to submit to make satisfaction for the offence they had committed in receiving prince Rupert, by the payment of a great sum of money; and brought even the two crowns crows of France and Spain, to sue for his alliance. For which purpose, the ambassador of the former, Moniteur de Bordeaux, had an audience of his Highness in the Banqueting-house, Whitehall, on the 29th of March, with the same state and ceremony, as is wont to be used towards foreign Princes; when he addressed himself thus to him.

"Your most serene Highness has already receiv'd some principal assurances of the King my master, of his desire to establish a perfect correspondence between his dominions and England. His Majesty, this day, gives to your Highness some publick demonstration of the same; and his sending his ambassador to your Highness, does plainly shew, that the esteem which his Majesty makes of your Highness, and interest of his people, have more power in his councils than many considerations, that would be of great concernment to a Prince less affected with the one and the other. This proceeding, grounded upon such principles, and so different from what is only guided by ambition, renders the amity of the King my master as considerable for its firmness as its utility; for which reason it is so eminently esteemed and courted by all the greatest Princes and Potentates of the earth. But his Majesty communicates none to any with so much joy and cheerfulness, as to those whose virtuous acts and extraordinary merits render them more conspicuously famous, than the largeness of their dominions. His majesty is sensible, that all those advantages do wholly reside in your Highness; and that the divine providence, after so many calamities, could not deal more favourably with these three nations, to cause them to forget their past miseries with greater satisfaction, than by submitting them to so just a government. And since it is not sufficient for the compleating " of
Oliver Cromwell

of their happiness, to make them enjoy peace at home, because it depends no less on good correspondency with nations abroad; the King my master does not doubt but to find also the same disposition in your Highness, which his Majesty
here expresss in his letters. After so many dispositions expressed both by his Majesty and your Highness, towards the accommodation of the two nations, there is reason to believe, that their wishes will be soon accomplish'd. As for me, I have none greater, than to be able to serve the King my master, with the good pleasure and satisfaction of your Highness; and that the happiness I have, to tender to your Highness the first assurances of his Majesty's esteem,
may give me occasion, by my services, to merit the honour of your gracious affection.

The Protector's zeal for the protestant religion
appear'd on several occasions; of which I shall here instruct one instance, leaving others to some following periods of this history. It is that of a letter to the Prince of Tarente in France, written in Latin (his Latin secretary being the immortal Milton) which is as follows:

Oliverius, Protector Reip. Angliae, Scotiae, Hiberniae, &c. Illustriissimo Principi Tarentino, falutem. Perspetit ex literis tuis ad me datis religi-onis amor tuus, & in ecclesiis reformatas pietas eximia, studiumq; singularare, in ista praestim generis nobilicitate ac splendore, eaq; sub regno, in quo; deficien-tibus ab orthodoxa fide, tot sunt nobilissimis quibusq;
spes uberes propitiæ, tot firmioribus incommoda sub-eunda; permagno me plane gaudio ac voluptate af-secit. Nee minus gratum erat placuisse me tibi co
tpo religionis nomine, quo nihil mibi dilectius atq;
ebarius imprimis esse debet. Deum autem obtestor, quam de me spem ecclesiariun ës expectationem esse oftendis, ës passim ei aliquando vel satisfacere, ës opus
erit, vel demonstrare omnibus, quam cupiam non deesse.

Nullum
Nullum equidem fructum laborum meorum, nullum bujus, quam obtineo in republica mea, sive dignitatis, sive munera, nec ampliorum existimarem nec jucundiorum, quam ut idoneus sim, qui ecclesiae reformatae vel amplificationis, vel incolumentis, vel, quod maximum est, paci serviam. Te vero hortor, ut religione ortodoxam, qua pietate ac studio à majoribus acceptam profiteris, eadem animi firmitate atq; constantia ad extremum usque retineas. Nec sane quidquam erit te tuisq; parentibus religiosis dignius, nec quod pro tuis in me meritis, quamquam tua causa cupio omnia, optare tibi melius aut praecellius queam, quam si sic te pares atq; instituas, ut ecclesiae praesertim patriæ, quarum in disciplina tam felici indole tamq; illustri loco natus es, quod tuo cæteris praebes, tanto firmius in te praedictum suis rebus constituendum esse sentiant. Vale. Alba Aula, Die 26 Junii, 1654. Illustissime dignitatis vestrae studiostissimus,

OLIVERIUS.

Which letter I have thus translated:

"Oliver, Protector of the common-wealth of England, Scotland, Ireland, &c. To the most illustrious Prince of Tarente, greeting. It was a very great pleasure and satisfaction to me, to perceive by your highness's letter which you sent me, your love of religion, and your extraordinary zeal and concern for the reformed churches, especially considering your quality, and that you live in a country where such great things are promised to all persons of your rank, if they forswake the orthodox faith, and so many discouragements are laid in the way of those who continue steadfast. Nor was it less pleasing to me, to find that your Highness approv'd of my care and concern for the same religion, than which nothing ought to be more dear and precious to me. And I call God to witness,
how desirous I am, according as I have ability and opportunity, to answer the hope and expectation which you say the churches have concerning me, and to manifest it to all. Indeed
I should esteem it the greatest and best fruit
of my labours, and of this dignity, or office,
which I hold in this commonwealth, to be put in a capacity of being serviceable either to the enlargement, or the safety, or, which is the chief of all, the peace of the reformed church. And I earnestly exhort your Highness that you would hold fast to the end the orthodox religion you have received from your fathers, with a firmness and constancy of mind equal to the piety and zeal you discover in the profession of it. Nor indeed can there be any thing more worthy of yourself and of your most pious parents; and, though I could desire all things for your sake, yet I can wish you nothing better, nothing more excellent, in return for the civilities you have shown me, than that you so conduct yourself, that the churches, especially those of your own country, in whose discipline you were born with so happy a disposition and of such a noble family, may find
in you a protection answerable to the high station in which you are placed above others.
Farewell. Whitehall, June 26, 1654. Your Highness's most affectionate and most devoted,

OLIVER.

The Lord Protector had resolved more firmly to unite the three nations into one commonwealib. Accordingly, with consent of his council, he made an ordinance, April the 12th, declaring, "How he had taken into consideration, that the people of Scotland ought to be united with the people
of
of England, into one commonwealth, and under one government; and had found, that in December 1651, the parliament then sitting had sent commissioners into Scotland, to invite the people of that nation unto such a happy union; who proceeded so far therein, that the shires and boroughs did accept of the said union, and assent thereunto: For the completing and perfecting which union, he now ordain'd; That all the people of Scotland, and of all the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, should be incorporated into one commonwealth with England; and in every parliament to be held successively for the said commonwealth, thirty persons should be call'd from, and serve for Scotland, &c." And shortly after, another ordinance was made for a like distribution of thirty members from Ireland, to serve in the parliament at Westminster. About the same time an ordinance was published, prohibiting the planting of Tobacco in England; which is a law at this day.

About this time several persons were apprehended, and charged with a conspiracy to murder the Lord Protector as he should be going to Hampton-court, to seize the guards, the Tower of London, and the magazines, and to proclaim the King. The chief of these were Mr. Somerset Fox, Mr. John Gerard, and Mr. Vowel; who being tried by a high court of justice, and condemn'd, Fox, who confess'd much of what was alleged against him, had the benefit of a reprieve; but Gerard was beheaded on Tower-hill, and Vowel hang'd at Charing-cross; both of them denying what they were accus'd of, and dying with great magnanimity and resolution.

Of the same day, there was another execution of an extraordinary nature: Don Pantaleon Sa, the Portugal ambassador's brother, a knight of Malta, and a person eminent in many great actions, who out of curiosity to see England, came over with the ambassador, happen'd to have a quarrel in the New-
New-Exchange with the foremention'd Mr. Gerard; to revenge which, he went thither the next day, with servants arm'd with swords and pistols; where they kill'd another man, whom they took to be Mr. Gerard, and hurt and wounded several others. Upon this there was rais'd a great tumult, and the Portuguese flying to the ambassador's house, the people came flocking thither from all parts to seize the murderers. Cromwell being inform'd of the matter, sent an officer, with a party of soldiers, to demand and apprehend them; who more especially demanded of the ambassador the person of his brother, threatening, if he was not deliver'd up, to break open the house, and take him out by force. The ambassador insisted upon the privilege due to his house by the law of nations, and desired time to send to the Protector, to whom he made complaint of the violence done to him, and requested an audience. His Highness sent him word, "That a gentleman had been murder'd, and others wounded, and that justice must be satisfied; requiring, that all persons concern'd might be deliver'd up to his officer; without which, if he should withdraw his soldiers, the people would execute justice, by a way for which he would not be answerable: But this being done, he should have an audience, and all the satisfaction it was in his power to give." The ambassador finding it in vain to contend, and the multitude increasing their cry, That they would pull down the house, he was, to his great grief, forc'd to deliver up his brother with the rest, who were all sent prisoners to Newgate. The ambassador was most earnest in his solicitations for his brother, being willing the others should be left to the law; but all the answer he could have, was, That justice must be done. And justice was done to the utmost; for being all try'd by a jury of half English and half foreigners, as many as were found guilty, and among them them the ambassador's brother, were condemn'd to die. All were hang'd at Tyburn, says the lord Clarendon; Whitelock says they were all repriev'd, except Don Pantaleon, who, immediately after the execution of Gerard, was convey'd from Newgate
to Tower-hill, in a mourning coach and six horses, attended by several of his brother's retinue; and there, on the same scaffold, loft his head, with as much terror and dejection of spirit, as Gerard had done with courage and resolution. This mightily raised the opinion of the Protector's justice, as well as of his power. And 'tis very remarkable, that on the very day of this execution, the Portugal
ambassador was oblig'd to sign the articles of peace between the two nations; whereupon he immediately went out of town.

Dr. Welwood's remark upon it.

The Protector calls
a parliament.

And here Dr. Welwood remarks, "That whatever reason the house of Austria had to hate
the memory of Cromwell, yet his causing the Portugal ambassador's brother to be executed, notwithstanding his plea of being a publick minister as well as his brother, was, near twenty years after Cromwell's death, brought as a precedent by the Emperor, to justify his arresting and carrying off the Prince of Furstenburgh at the treaty of Cologne, notwithstanding his being a plenipotentiary for the Elector of that name.
And in the printed manifesto, publish'd by the Emperor on that occasion, this piece of Cromwell's justice is related at large."

The Lord Protector knowing, that tho' he had obtain'd the government, it was not confirm'd to him by the people, resolv'd, in pursuance of the instrument of government, to summon a parliament
to meet at Westminster on the 3d of September; and accordingly order'd writs to be issued out for the election of members to serve in parliament, after the manner laid down in the said instrument. It was his greatest care how to manage this assembly,
Oliver Cromwell.

so that they might proceed according to his own desires; but tho' he had a great influence upon the people, and a great awe upon the sheriffs and magistrates, and brought the trial of elections into a committee of his own council, before the opening of the parliament, yet it prov'd not for his purpose; as we shall see in the following chapter.

Chap. IV. His second Parliament.

ON the 3d day of September, tho' it happen'd to be Sunday, the Lord Protector, who reckon'd that his fortunate day, would have the parliament open'd: And so the members, after hearing a sermon at Westminster-abbey, attended his Highness in the Painted Chamber; where he made a speech to them, shewing the cause of their summons; after which, they went to their house, and adjourn'd to the next day. The Protector then rode in state from Whitehall to Westminster-abbey, some hundreds of gentlemen and officers going before uncover'd, and next before the coach, his pages and lacqueys richly cloath'd: On the one side of his coach, went Strickland, one of his council, and captain of his guards, with the master of the ceremonies, both on foot; and on the other side, walk'd colonel Howard (afterwards earl of Carlisle) another captain of the guards. His son Henry and Lambert sat with him in the coach, bare-headed. After the coach came Claypole, master of the horse, with a gallant led horse, adorn'd with the richest trappings; and next after him the commissioners of the great seal, and of the treasury, and divers of the council in coaches, and the ordinary guards. Being come to the abbey door, his Highness alighted; and the officers of the army and the gentlemen went first, next them four maces, then the commissioners of the seal, Whitelock carrying 1654.
The LIFE of

carrying the purse, and Lambert the sword before him. His Highness was seated over-against the pulpit, and the members of parliament plac'd themselves on both sides of him. After the sermon, which was preach'd by Mr. Tho. Goodwin, his Highness went in the same equipage to the Painted Chamber; where being seated in a chair of state set upon steps, the members sitting upon benches round about, all bare, his Highness put off his hat, and made a long and subtle speech to them, which was in substance as follows:

His speech to the members.

He told them, "the danger of the Levelling principles, and of the Fifth-monarchy opinions, of the form of godliness, and the great judgment that had been upon this nation by ten years civil war. That the two pretensions, liberty of the subject, and liberty of conscience (two as glorious things, and as much to be contended for, as any gift God hath given us,) were brought in to patronize those evils. Nay, those abominations swelled to that height, that the axe was laid to the root of the ministry, as Babylonish and Anti-Christian: And as the extremity was great before, so that no man, tho' well approv'd, and having a good testimony, might preach, if not ordain'd; so now, on the other hand, they will have ordination put a nullity upon the calling.

"I conceive in my very soul, said he, that many of the Fifth-monarchy opinion have good meanings; and I hope this parliament will (as Jude says, reckoning up the abominable apostacies of the last times) pluck some out of the fire, and save others with fear; making those of peaceable spirits, the subjects of their encouragement, and saving others by that discipline that God hath ordain'd to reform miscarriages:

"The danger of that spirit being not in the notion, but in its proceeding to a civil transgression; when men come into such a practice, as"
Oliver Cromwell.

to tell us, that liberty and property are not the bodies of that kingdom, and that instead of regulating laws, laws must be subverted, and perhaps the judicial law imposed, or some fancy instead of it (for that was good and honourable in the institution, tho' now by some misapply'd); especially when every stone is turn'd to bring in confusion; this will be a consideration worthy of the magistrate.

Whilst these things were in the midst of us, and the nation rent and torn from one end to the other; family against family, parent against child, and nothing in the hearts and minds of men, but Overturn, Overturn, (a scripture very much abus'd and challeng'd by all men of discontented spirits;) that common enemy in the mean time sleeps not; swarms of Jesuits come over, and have their consiftories abroad, to rule all the affairs of England, and the dependencies thereof: In the mean time visible endeavours were us'd to hinder the work in Ireland, to obstruct the work in Scotland; correspondencies and intelligences were held to encourage the war in those places.

And withal, we were deeply engag'd in a war with Portugal, whereby our trade ceas'd; and not only so, but a war with Holland, which consum'd our treasure, as much as the assessment came to. At the same time we fell into a war with France, or rather we were in it; and all this fomented by the divisions amongst us, which begat a confidence, we could not hold out long; and the calculation had not been ill, if the Lord had not been gracious to us. Besides, strangers increased in the manufacture, the great staple commodity of this nation.

In such an heap of confusion was this poor nation; and that it might not sink into a confusion from the premises, a remedy must be ap-plied:
A remedy hath been applied, This government. A thing that is seen and read of all, and which (let men say what they will, I can speak with comfort before a greater than you all; as to my intention; and let men judge out of the thing itself) is calculated for the interest of the people, for their interest alone, and for their good, without respect had to any other interest.

I may, with humbleness towards God, and modesty before you, say something in the behalf of it.

It hath endeavour'd to reform the laws, and for that end hath join'd persons (without reflection upon any) of as great integrity and ability as any other, to consider how the laws might be made plain, short and easy; which may in due time be tendered.

It hath taken care to put into seats of justice, men of the most known integrity and ability. The chancery hath been reform'd, and I hope to the just satisfaction of all good men.

It hath put a stop to that heady way, for every man that will, to make himself a preacher, having endeavour'd to settle a way for approbation of men of piety and fitness for the work, and the business committed to persons both of the Presbyterian and Independent judgment; men of as known ability and integrity, as (I suppose) any the nation hath, and who (I believe) have labour'd to approve themselves to God and their own consciences, in approving men to that great function.

It hath taken care to expunge men unfit for that work, who have been the common scorn and reproach to that administration.

One thing more: It hath been instrumental to call a free parliament; blessed be God, we see here this day a free parliament; and that it may continue so, I hope is in the heart of every good good man of England: For my own part, as I defir’d it above my life, so to keep it free, I shall value it above my life.

A peace is made with Sweden, (wherein an honourable person [meaning Whitelock] was instrumental) it being of much importance to have a good understanding with our Protestant neighbours.

A peace is also made with the Danes, and a peace there that is honourable, and to the satisfaction of the merchants.

The Sound is open to us, from whence, as
from a fountain, our naval provisions are supplied.

A peace is made with the Dutch, which is so well known in the consequences of it, and the great advantages of a good understanding with Protestant states.

I beg that it may be in your hearts to be zealous of the Protestant interest abroad, which if ever it be like to come under a condition of suffering, it is now; many being banish’d, and driven to seek refuge among strangers.

A peace is made with Portugal, (though it hung long) of great concernment to trade; and the people that trade thither, have freedom to enjoy their consciences, without being subjected to the bloody inquisition.

A treaty with France likewise is now depending.

It may be necessary, in the next place, for you to hear a little of the sea affairs, and to take notice of the great expence of the forces and fleet; and yet 30,000 l. is now abated of the next three months assessment.

These things, which I have before mentioned, are but entrances, and doors of hope;
you are brought to the edge of Canaan (into which many that have gone before could not enter)
The LIFE of

1654. "enter) but if the blessing and presence of God go along with you in the management of your affairs, I make no question but he will enable you to lay the top-stone of this work.

"But this is a maxim not to be despised, Thou peace be made, yet it is interest that keeps peace, and farther than that peace is not to be trusted.

"The great end of calling this parliament, is, that the work of God may go on, that the ship of this commonwealth may be brought into a safe harbour.

"I shall put you in mind, that you have a great work upon you; Ireland to look to, that the beginning of that government may be settled in honour.

"That you have before you, the consideration of those foreign states, with whom peace is not made; who, if they see we manage not our affairs with prudence, as becomes men, will retain hopes, that we may still, under the disadvantages thereof, break into confusion.

"I shall conclude with my persuasion to you, to have a sweet, gracious, and holy understanding one of another, and put you in mind of the counsel you heard this day in order thereunto.

"And I desire you to believe, that I speak not to you, as one that would be a Lord over you, but as one that is resolved to be a fellow servant with you to the interest of this great affair."

Then he wish'd them to repair to their house, and exercise their own liberty in the choice of their speaker.

Being come to the parliament-house, they almost unanimously made choice of the old speaker Mr. William Lenthal, master of the Rolls, to be their speaker. This done, they presently took the Protector's instrument of government into consideration; and the first debate they fell upon, was, Whether...
Oliver Cromwell.

ther the supreme legislative power of the nation should be in a single person, and a parliament. And here many warm speeches were made in direct opposition to a single person; and one said, "That they could not but discern the snares laid to entrap the people's privileges; and for his own part, as God had made him instrumental in cutting down tyranny in one person, so he could not endure to see the nation's liberties shackled by another, whose right to the government could be measured out no other way than by the length of his sword, which was only that which emboldened him to command his commanders." These debates continued for seven or eight days together, to the great grief of the Protectorians, who to save themselves were necessitated to find means for protracting time, and adjourning the house, when the question was ready to be put, because they plainly saw it would be carry'd in the negative.

His Highness being inform'd of these proceedings, and fearing to have that great question put, lest he should be depos'd by a vote of this assembly, on the 12th of September early in the morning, caus'd a guard to be plac'd at the door of the house, and sent to the lord-mayor to acquaint him with the reasons of what he was about to do, that he might prevent any disorder in the city. The members coming at the usual hour, were deny'd entrance, and commanded to attend the Lord Protector, in the Painted Chamber; where he spoke to them as follows:

He told them, "That when he met them a few days since, and deliver'd his mind unto them, he did it with much more hopes and comfort than now; and that he was very sorry to find them falling into heats and divisions. He represented to them the miscarriages of the long parliament, and declar'd, That he had of-
The LIFE of

280

28o

The LIFE of

28o

ten pres'd that assembly, as a member, to put a period to themselves, telling them, That the nation loath'd their sitting; and when they were dissolved, there was no visible repining at it, no not so much as the barking of a dog. He shewed them, by what means he came to the government, together with the consent that the people had many ways given thereunto; and said, that the other day when he told them they were a free parliament, he did also consider, there was a Reciprocal: For that the same government, which made them a parliament, made him Protector; and as they were entrusted with some things, so he was with others. That there were some things in the government fundamental, which could not be alter'd; as, 1. That the government should be in one person and a parliament.
2. That parliaments should not be made perpetual;
which would deprive the people of their successive elections: Nor that the parliament should be always sitting, that is, as soon as one parliament is up, another should come and sit in their places the very next day; which could not be without subjecting the nation to an arbitrary power in governing, because parliaments, when they sit, are absolute and unlimited. The third fundamental was in the matter of the militia:
For in order to prevent the two aforementioned inconveniences, the militia was not to be entrusted in any one hand or power, but to be so disposed, that as the parliament ought to have a check upon the Protector, to prevent excesses in him; so on the other hand, the Protector might have a check upon the parliament, to prevent excesses in them; because if the militia were wholly in the parliament, they might, when they would, perpetuate themselves: But now the militia being disposed as it is, the one stands as a counterpoize to the other; which renders the balance of government the more even, and the govern-

government itself the more firm and stable. The fourth fundamental in the government, was about a due liberty of conscience in matters of religion; wherein bounds and limits ought to be set, so as to prevent persecution. That the rest of the things in the government were examinable, and alterable, as the occasion and the state of affairs should require. That as for a negative voice, he claimed it not, save only in the aforesaid particulars. That in all other things he had only a deliberative power; and if he did not pass such laws as were presented to him, within twenty days after their presentment, they were to be laws without his consent. Therefore, things being thus, he was sorry to understand that any of them should go about to overthrow what was so settled, contrary to their trust received from the people; which could not but bring on very great inconveniences: To prevent which, he was necessitated to appoint a test, or recognition, of the government, which was to be sign'd by them, before they went any more into the house.

The said test or recognition was in these words:

I A. B. do hereby freely promise and engage myself to be true and faithful to the Lord Protector and the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and shall not (according to the tenour of the indenture, whereby I am returned to serve in this present parliament) propose, or give any consent to alter the government, as it is settled in one single person, and a parliament.

This being ingross'd in parchment, was laid on a table near the door of the house, for the members to subscribe before they should be qualified to sit. Accordingly, within a day or two, it was signed by about an hundred and thirty of them, and some days after by above as many more, who thereupon took their places in the house.
The LIFE of 1654.

'Tis said, that those who refus'd to subscribe this engagement, were not only excluded, but some of them taken into custody. Major-general Harrison, the Protector's late great favourite, was now secur'd by a party of horse, by his Highness's order; and colonel Rich, Mr. Carew, and others, being summoned before the council, were requir'd to surrender their commissions; and because they refus'd to engage not to act against the Lord Protector and his government, they were committed to prison.

A debate arising in the house concerning the Recognition, it was thereupon declar'd, "That it should not be intended to comprehend the whole, contained in the forty-two articles of the instrument of government, but only that which requir'd the government of the commonwealth to be by a single person, and successive parliaments." The great point concerning the single person being over-rul'd, the house apply'd themselves to the consideration and debate of the remaining clauses of the instrument of government. They declar'd, "That Oliver Cromwell should be Protector during life; and limited the number of forces to be kept up in England, Scotland, and Ireland, with provision for the payment of them. They agreed upon the number of ships, that they thought necessary for the guard of the seas; and order'd two hundred thousand pounds a year for the Protector's own expense, the salaries of his council, the judges, foreign intelligence, and the reception of ambassadors; and that Whitehall, St. James's, the Mews, Somerset-house, Greenwich, Hampton-Court, Windsor, and the manor of York, be kept unsold for the Protector's use. They also voted a clause to be inserted, to declare the rights of the people of England, and particularly, that no money should be raised upon the nation, but by authority of parliament. And whereas by the instrument of government it was provided, that if the parliament were not sitting at the death of the present Protector, the council should chuse
a successor; they resolv'd, that nothing should be determin'd by the council after his death,
but the calling of a parliament, who were then to consider what they would have done. They also approv'd and confirm'd the present Lord Deputy of Ireland, the present Lords Commis-ioners of the great seal of England, the commissoners of the treasury, and the two chief justices. Among other things, they debated the point of liberty of conscience upon the new government, and agreed to allow it to all, who shall not maintain Atheism, Popery, Prelacy, Profaneness, or any damnable Heresies, to be enumerated by the parliament.

This highly pleased some men; and it is ob-servable, that during these debates, the ministers were so forward and zealous, that they propos'd several fundamentals in religion (viz. their own be-lov'd opinions) to the parliament to be established by them. These debates upon the government continued for some months, in which time also the house took a transient view of the Protector's own ordinances; particularly, one for paying the money into the treasury, rais'd for the propagation of the Gospel in Wales: Another, to make soldiers free in corporations: Another to remove all scandalous preachers and ministers; and a fourth for the surveying of King's and Churches lands. And having gone through the instrument of government,
they p'als'd this additional vote, That no one clause,
of what they had agreed upon, should be look'd upon as binding, unless the whole were consented to.

During these debates in parliament, an odd accident happened to the Protector, which very much endanger'd his life. He having taken upon himself

A private accident

1654.

Digitized by Google
himself the whole government of the nation, and sent ambassadors and agents to foreign kingdoms and states, was again very much courted by them, and presented with the rarities of several countries; and the Duke of Holstein among the rest made him a present of a gallant set of grey Friezeland coach-horses. With these he had a mind to take the air in the Park, attended only with his secretary Thurloe and his guards. Being come into the Park, he would needs take the place of the coach-man; and so mounting the box, he began to lash and drive them on very furiously: But the horses not used to such rough management, ran away with full speed, and never stopp'd, till their driver was thrown with great violence out of the box; with which fall his pistol fir'd in his pocket, though he had the good fortune to receive no hurt.

In the debates upon the government, many things were said, which gave great offence to the Protector and his council, and made it plainly appear, that the parliament were not inclined to answer their whole desire and expectation, and fall in with all they design'd: Hereupon he grew very uneasy, till the five months allow'd for their sitting, by his own instrument of government, should be expir'd. And though the form of government, which they had agreed to, differ'd not in any material point, from that which himself had set up, unless it were in reserving the nomination of his successor to the parliament; yet this one thing was thought very disagreeable to him, and some of his council. However, the dissolution of this assembly was, after much debate in council, resolv'd on; and so the five months of their session, according to the soldiers account of twenty-eight days to the month, were no sooner ended, but the members on the 22d of January were requir'd to attend him in the Painted-chamber, where he dissolv'd them with this most tedious and intricate speech.
"Gentlemen, I perceive you are here as the house of parliament, by your speaker, whom I see here, and by your faces, which are, in a great measure, known to me.

When I first met you in this room, it was to my apprehension the hopefulllest day that ever mine eyes saw, as to the considerations of this world: For I did look at (as wrapt up in you, together with myself) the hopes and the happiness of (tho’ not of the greatest, yet a very great, and) the best people in the world; and truly and unfeignedly I thought so; as a people that have the highest and clearest profession amongst them of the greatest glory (to wit) religion; as a people that have been like other nations, sometimes up and sometimes down, in our honour in the world, and yet never so low, but we might measure with other nations; and a people that have had a stamp upon them from God, God having (as it were) summed all our former glory and honour, in the things that are of glory to nations, in an Epitome, within these ten or twelve years last past; so that we knew one another at home, and are well known abroad.

And (if I be not very much mistaken) we were arriv’d (as I, and truly, as I believe, many others did think) at a very safe port, where we might sit down, and contemplate the dispensations of God, and our mercies not to have been like to those of the antients, who did make out their peace and prosperity, as they thought, by their own endeavours; who could not say, as we, that all ours were let down to us from God himself, whose appearances and providences amongst us are not to be out-match’d in any story.

Truly this was our condition, and I know nothing else we had to do, save as Israel was..."
commanded, in that most excellent Psalm of David, Psalm lxxxviii. ver. 4, 5, 6, 7. The things which we have heard and known, and our fathers have told us, we will not hide them from their children, shewing to the generation to come the praise of the Lord, and his strength, and his wonderful works which he hath done; for he establish'd
a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel,
which be commanded our fathers that they should make them known to their children, that the generation to come might know them, even the children that should be born, who should arise and declare them to their children, that they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his commandments.

This, I thought, had been a song and a work worthy of England, whereunto you might have happily invited them, had you had hearts unto it.

You had this opportunity fairly deliver'd unto you; and if a history shall be written of these times, and of transactions, it will be said (it will not be denied) but that these things I have spoken are true.

This Talent was put into your hands, and I shall recur to that which I said at the first: I came with very great joy, and contentment, and comfort, the first time I met you in this place;
but we and these nations are, for the present,
under some disappointment. If I had purpos'd to have play'd the orator, which I did never affect, nor do, nor I hope shall, I doubt not but upon easy suppositions, which I am persuaded every one of you will grant, we did meet upon such hopes as these.

I met you a second time here, and I confess at that meeting I had much abatement of my hopes, tho' not a total frustration. I confess, that that which dampt my hopes so soon, was some-
Oliver Cromwell.

somewhat that did look like a paricide. It is obvious enough unto you, that the management of affairs did favour of a not-owning, too too much favour, I say, of a not-owning the authority that called you hither; but God left us not without an expedient, that gave a second possibility. Shall I say a possibility? It seemed to me a probability of recovering out of that dissatisfied condition we were all then in, towards some mutuality of satisfaction; and therefore by that recognition fuiting with the indenture that return'd you hither, to which afterwards also was added your own declaration, conformable to, and in acceptance of that expedient; whereby you had (tho' with a little check) another opportunity renew'd unto you, to have made this nation as happy as it could have been, if every thing had smoothly run on from the first hour of your meeting.

And indeed (you will give me liberty of my thoughts and hopes) I did think, as I have formerly found in that way that I have been engaged as a soldier, that some affronts put upon us, some dissatisfaction at the first have made way for very great and happy successes.

And I did not at all despond, but the stop put upon you, would in like manner have made way for a blessing from God, that that interruption being as I thought, necessary to divest you from destructive and violent proceedings, to give time for better deliberations; whereby leaving the government as you found it, you might have proceeded to have made those good and wholesome laws which the people expected from you; and might have answered the grievances and settled those other things proper to you as a parliament, and for which you would have had thanks from all that intrusted you.
What hath happen'd since that time, I have not taken publick notice of, as declining to intrench upon parliament privileges; for sure I am, you will all bear me witness that from your entering into the house upon the Recognition, to this very day, you have had no manner of interruption or hindrance of mine, in proceeding to that blessed issue the heart of a good man could propose to himself, to this very day.

You see you have me very much lock'd up, as to what you transacted among yourselves, from that time to this; but something I shall take liberty to speak of to you. As I may not take notice what you have been doing, so I think I have very great liberty to tell you that I do not know what you have been doing: I do not know whether you have been alive or dead: I have not once heard from you in all this time; I have not, and that you all know: If that be a fault that I have not, surely it hath not been mine.

If I have had any melancholy thoughts, and have sat down by them, why might it not have been very lawful to me, to think that I was a person judged unconcern'd in all these businesses? I can assure you, I have not reckon'd myself, nor did I reckon myself unconcern'd in you; and so long as any just patience could support my expectation, I would have waited to the uttermost to have receiv'd from you, the issues of your consultations and resolutions; I have been careful of your safety, and the safety of those that you represented, to whom I reckon myself a servant,

But what messages have I disturb'd you withal? What injury or indignity hath been done or offer'd, either to your persons, or to any privileges of parliament, since you sat? I look at myself as strictly oblig'd by my oath, since your recognizing the government, in the authority of which you were call'd hither, and sat, to give you you all possible security, and to keep you from any unparliamentary interruption.

Think you I could not say more upon this subject, if I listed to expatiate thereupon? But because my actions plead for me, I shall say no more of this.

I say, I have been caring for you, your quiet sitting, caring for your privileges (as I said before) that they might not be interrupted; have been seeking of God, from the great God, a blessing upon you, and a blessing upon these nations; I have been consulting, if possibly I might in any thing promote, in my place, the real good of this parliament, of the hopefulness of which I have said so much unto you.

And I did think it to be my busines, rather to see the utmost issue, and what God would produce by you, than unseasonably to intermeddle with you. But, as I said before, I have been caring for you, and for the peace and quiet of the nations, indeed I have, and that I shall a little presently manifest unto you.

And it leadeth me to let you know somewhat that I fear, I fear will be thro' some interpretation, a little too justly put upon you, whilst you have been employ'd as you have been (and in all that time expressed in the government, in that government, I say, in that government) brought forth nothing that you yourselves can be taken notice of without infringement of your privileges.

I will tell you somewhat, that (if it be not news to you) I wish you had taken very serious consideration of; if it be news, I wish I had acquainted you with it sooner; and yet if any man will ask me why I did not, the reason is given already, because I did make it my business to give no interruption.
There be some trees that will not grow under the shadow of other trees; there be some that chuse (a man may say so by way of allusion) to thrive under the shadow of other trees; I will tell you what hath thriven, I will not say what you have cherished under your shadow, that were too hard. Instead of the peace and settlement, instead of mercy and truth being brought together, righteousness and peace kissing each other, by reconciling the honest people of these nations, and settling the woful distempers that are amongst us (which had been glorious things, and worthy of Christians to have propos'd) weeds and nettles, briars and thorns have thriven under your shadow. Dissettlement and divisions, discontentment and dissatisfaction, together with real dangers to the whole, has been more multiplied within these five months of your sitting, than in some years before.

Foundations have been also laid for the future renewing the troubles of these nations, by all the enemies of it abroad and at home; let not these words seem too sharp, for they are true, as any mathematical demonstrations are or can be; I say, the enemies of the peace of these nations abroad and at home, the discontented humours throughout these nations, which I think no man will grudge to call by that name, or to make to allude to briars and thorns, they have nourish'd themselves under your shadow.

And that I may be clearly understood, they have taken the opportunities from your sitting, from the hopes they had, which with easy conjecture they might take up, and conclude, that there would be no settlement, and therefore they have framed their designs, preparing for the execution of them accordingly.

Now whether (which appertains not to me to judge of on their behalf) they had any occasion
What preparations they have made to execute in such a season as they thought fit to take their opportunity from, that I know (not as men know things by conjecture, but) by certain demonstrable knowledge, that they have been (for some time past) furnishing themselves with arms, nothing doubting but that they should have a day for it, and verily believing that whatsoever their former disappointments were, they should have more done for them, by and from our own divisions, than they were able to do for themselves. I doubt not, and I desire to be understood so, that in all I have to say on this subject, you will take it that I have no reservation in my mind to mingle things of guess and suspicion with things of fact, but the things I am telling are fact, things of evident demonstration.

These weeds, briars and thorns, they have been preparing, and have brought their designs to some maturity, by the advantages given to them, as aforesaid, from your sitting and proceedings; but by the waking eye that watched over that cause that God will bless, they have been and yet are disappointed. And having mention'd that cause, I say, that slighted cause, let me speak a few words in behalf thereof (though it may seem too long a digression:) Whosoever despiseth it, and will say it is Non causa pro causa, the all-searching eye before mention'd will find out that man, and will judge him, as one that regardeth not the works of God, nor the operations of his hands, for which God hath threatened...
that he will cast men down, and not build them up; that because he can dispute, and tell us, he knew not where the cause begun, or where it is, but modelleth it according to his own intellect, and submits not to the appearances of God in the world, therefore he lifts up his heel against God, and mocketh at all his providences, laughing at the observations made up not without reason and the scriptures, but by the quickening and teaching spirit, which gives life to the other, calling such observations enthusiasms. Such men, I say, no wonder if they stumble and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken, by the things of which they are so maliciously and wilfully ignorant. The scriptures say, The rod hath a voice, and he will make himself known, and he will make himself known by the judgments which he executeth; and do we not think he will, and does by the providences of mercy and kindness which he hath for his people, and for their just liberties, whom he loves as the apple of his eye? Doth he not by them manifest himself? And is he not thereby also seen, giving kingdoms for them, giving men for them, and people for their lives? as it is in the 43d of Isaiah. Is not this as fair a lecture, and as clear speaking, as anything our dark reason left to the letter of the scriptures can collect from them. By this voice has God spoken very loud on the behalf of his people, by judging their enemies in the late war, and restoring them a liberty to worship with the freedom of their consciences, and freedom in their estates and persons, when they do so. And thus we have found the cause of God by the works of God, which are the testimony of God, upon which rock whosoever splits, shall suffer shipwreck.

But it is our glory, and it is mine, if I have any in the world, concerning the interest of those that have an interest in a better world: It is my glory, that I know a cause, which yet we have not lost, but do hope we shall take a little pleasure rather to lose our lives than lose. But you will excuse this long digression.

"I say unto you, whilst you have been in the midst of these transactions, that party, that cavalier party (I could wish some of them had thrust in here to have heard what I say) the cavalier party have been designing and preparing to put this nation in blood again with a witness; but because I am confident there are none of that sort here, therefore I shall say the less to that; only this I must tell you, they have been making great preparations of arms, and I do believe, will be made evident to you, that they have raked out many thousands of arms, even all that this city could afford, for divers months last past.

"But it will be said, May we not arm ourselves for the defence of our houses? Will any body find fault for that? No, for that, the reason of their doing so hath been as explicit, and under as clear proof, as the fact of doing so, for which I hope, by the justice of the land, some will, in the face of the nation, answer it with their lives, and then the business will be pretty well out of doubt.

"Banks of money have been framing for these, and other such like uses; letters have been issued with privy seals, to as great persons as most are in the nation, for the advance of monies, which have been discover'd to us by the persons themselves; commissions for regiments of horse and foot, and command of castles, have been likewise given from Charles Stuart, since your sitting; and what the general insolences of that party have been, the honest people have been sensible of, and can very well testify.
It hath not been only thus; but as in a quinxy or plurisy, where the humour fixeth in one part, give it scope, it will gather to that place, to the hazarding of the whole; and it is natural to do so, till it destroy nature, in that person on whomsoever this befals.

So likewise will those diseases take accidental causes of aggravation of their distemper; and this was that which I did assert, that they have taken accidental causes, for the growing and increasing of those distempers, as much as would have been in the natural body, if timely remedy were not applied. And indeed, things were come to that pass (in respect of which I shall give you a particular account) that no mortal physician, if the great physician had not stept in, could have cured the distemper.

Shall I lay this upon your account, or my own? I am sure I can lay it upon God's account, that if he had not stept in, the disease had been mortal and destructive; and what is all this? Truly I must needs say, a company of men, still like briars and thorns, and worse, if worse can be, of another sort than those before mention'd to you, have been, and yet are, endeavouring to put us into blood, and into confusion, more desperate and dangerous confusion than England ever yet saw.

And I must say, as when Gideon commanded his son to fall upon Zeba and Zalmunna, and slay them, they thought it more noble to die by the hand of a man, than of a stripling; which shews, there is some contentment in the hand by which a man falls; so it is some satisfaction, if a commonwealth must perish, that it perish by men, and not by the hands of persons differing little from beasts; that if it must needs suffer, it should rather suffer from rich men, than from poor men, who, as Solomon says, when they op-

"press,
Oliver Cromwell.

press, they leave nothing behind them, but are as sweeping rain.

Now, such as these also are grown up under your shadow. But it will be asked, what have they done? I hope, tho' they pretend the commonwealths interest, they have had no encouragement from you, but that as before, rather taken it, than that you have administered any cause unto them for so doing, from delays, from hopes that this parliament would not settle, from pamphlets, mentioning strange votes and resolves of yours, which I hope did abuse you. Thus you see, whatever the grounds were these have been the effects. And thus I have laid these things before you, and others will be easily able to judge how far you are concerned.

And what have these men done? They have also labour'd to pervert where they could, and as they could, the honest-meaning people of the nation; they have labour'd to engage some in the army; and I doubt, that not only they, but some others also, very well known to you, have helped in this work of debauching and dividing the army; they have, they have; I would be loth to say, who, where, and how, much more; loth to say, they were any of your own number, but I can say, endeavours have been us'd to put the army into a distemper, and to feed that which is the worst humour in the army, which tho' it was not a mastering humour, yet these took their advantage from a delay of the settlement, and the practices before mention'd, and flopping to pay off the army, to run us into free quarter, and to bring us into the inconveniences most to be fear'd and avoided.

What if I am able to make it appear in fact, that some amongst you have run into the city of London to persuade to petitions and addresses to you for reversing your own votes that you...
you have passed? Whether these practices were in favour of your liberties, or tended to beget hopes of peace and settlement from you; and whether debauching the army in England, as is before expressed, and starving it, and putting it upon free quarter, and occasioning and necessitating the greatest part thereof in Scotland, to march into England, leaving the remainder thereof to have their throats cut there, and kindling by the rest a fire in our own bosoms,
were for the advantage of affairs here, let the world judge.

This I tell you also, that the correspondence held with the interest of cavaliers, by that party of men, called Levellers, and who call themselves commonwealth's-men; whose declarations were framed to that purpose, and ready to be published at the time of their common rising, whereof we are possessed; and for which we have the confession of themselves now in custody; who confess also they built their hopes
upon the assurance they had of the parliament's not agreeing to a settlement; whether these humours have not nourished themselves under your boughs, is the subject of my present discourse, and I think I say not amiss if I affirm
it to be so.

And I must say it again, that that which hath been their advantage, thus to raise disturbance, hath been by the loss of those golden opportunities, that God had put into your hands for settlement. Judge you whether these things were thus or no; when you first sat down I am sure things were not thus; there was very great peace and sedateness throughout these nations,
and great expectations of a settlement, which I remember'd to you at the beginning of my speech, and hoped that you would have entered upon your business as you found it.
There was a government in the possession of the people, I say a government in the possession of the people, for many months, it hath now been exercised near fifteen months; and if it were needful that I should tell you how it came into their possession, and how willingly they received it; how all law and justice were distributed from it, in every respect, as to life, liberty and estate; how it was owned by God, as being the dispensation of his providence after twelve years war, and sealed and witnessed unto by the people; I should but repeat what I said in my last speech made unto you in this place, and therefore I forbear.

When you were enter'd upon this government, raveling into it (you know I took no notice what you were doing) if you had gone upon that foot of account, to have made such good and wholesome provisions for the good of the people of these nations, for the settling of such matters in things of religion as would have upheld and given countenance to a godly ministry, and yet would have given a just liberty to godly men of different judgments, men of the same faith with them that you call the orthodox ministry in England, as it is well known the Independants are, and many under the form of Baptism, who are found in the Faith; only may perhaps be different in judgment in some lesser matters, yet as true Christians, both looking at salvation only by faith in the blood of Christ, men professing the fear of God, having recourse to the name of God, as to a strong tower; I say, you might have had opportunity to have settled peace and quietness amongst all professing godliness, and might have been instrumental, if not to have sealed the breaches, yet to have kept the godly of all judgments from running one upon another, and by keeping them from being over-run by a common enemy, rendered them and these nations, both secure, happy, and well satisfied.

...

"Are these things done? Or any thing towards them? Is there not yet upon the spirits of men a strange itch? Nothing will satisfy them, unless they can put their fingers upon their brethren's consciences, to pinch them there. To do this, was no part of the contest we had with the common adversary; for Religion was not the thing at the first contested for; but God brought it to that issue at last, and gave it in to us by way of Redundancy, and at last it proved to be that which was most dear to us; and wherein consisted this, more than in obtaining that liberty from the tyranny of the Bishops, to all species of Protestants, to worship God according to their own light and conscience? For want of which, many of our brethren forsook their native Countries, to seek their bread from strangers, and to live in howling Wildnesses; and for which also, many that remained here, were imprisoned, and otherwise abused, and made the scorn of the nation.

"Those that were sound in the Faith, how proper was it for them to labour for liberty, for a just liberty, that men should not be trampled upon for their consciences? Had not they laboured but lately under the weight of persecutions, and was it fit for them to sit heavy upon others? Is it ingenuous to ask liberty, and not to give it? What greater hypocrisy, than for those who were oppressed by the Bishops, to become the greatest oppressors themselves, so soon as their yoke was removed? I could wish that they, who call for liberty now also, had not too much of that spirit if the power were in their hands.

"As for profane persons, blasphemers, such as preach sedition, the contentious railers, evil speak-
"...who seek by evil words to corrupt good manners, persons of loose conversations; punishment from the civil magistrate ought to be meet with them; because if these pretended conscience, yet walking disorderly, and not according, but contrary to the Gospel and even to natural light, they are judged of all, and their sins being open, makes them subjects of the magistrate's sword, who ought not to bear it in vain.

The discipline of the army was such, that a man would not be suffered to remain there, of whom we could take notice he was guilty of such practices as these: And therefore how happy would England have been, and you, and I, if the Lord had led you on to have settled upon such good accounts as these are, and to have discountenanced such practices as the other, and left men in disputable things free to their own consciences, which was well provided for by the government, and liberty left to provide against what was apparently evil?

Judge you, whether the congesting for things that were provided for by this government hath been profitable expence of time for the good of these nations? By means whereof, you may see you have wholly elapsed your time, and done just nothing.

I will say this to you in behalf of the long parliament, that had such an expedient as this government been proposed to them, and that they could have seen the cause of God thus provided for, and had by debates been enlightened in the grounds by which the difficulties might have been cleared, and the reason of the whole inforced, the circumstances of time and persons, with the temper and disposition of the people, and affairs both abroad and at home, when it was undertaken, well weighed (as well as they were thought to love their seats) I think in my conscience that they would have proceeded in another manner than you have done, and not have exposed things to those difficulties and hazards they now are at, nor given occasion to leave the people so distempered as now they are, who, I dare say, in the soberest, and most judicious part of them, did expect, not a questioning, but a doing things in pursuance of the government; and, if I be not misinformed, very many of you came up with this satisfaction, having had time enough to weigh and consider the same.

And when I say, such an expedient as this government is, wherein I dare assert there is a just liberty to the people of God, and the just rights of the people in these nations provided for, I can put the issue thereof upon the clearest reason, whatsoever any go about to suggest to the contrary.

But this not being the time and place of such an averment, for satisfaction sake herein, enough is said in a book, entitled, A true state of the case of the commonwealth, &c. published in January 1653. (And for myself, I desire not to keep it an hour longer than I may preserve England in its just rights, and may protest the people of God in such a just liberty of their consciences, as I have already mentioned.) And therefore if this parliament have judged things to be otherwise than as I have stated them, it had been huge friendliness between persons that had such a Reciprocation, and in so great concerns to the publick, for them to have convinc'd me in what particulars therein my error lay, of which I never yet had a word from you. But if instead thereof, your time has been spent in setting up somewhat else upon another bottom than this stands, that looks as if a laying grounds of
of a quarrel had rather been designed, than to give the people settlement; if it be thus, it is well your labours have not arrived to any maturity at all.

This government called you hither, the constitution whereof being so limited, a single person and a parliament, and this was thought most agreeable to the general sense of the nation, having had experience enough by trial of other conclusions, judging this most likely to avoid the extremes of Monarchy on the one hand, and Democracy on the other, and yet not to found dominium in gratia. And if so, then certainly to make it more than a notion, it was requisite that it should be as it is in the government, which puts it upon a true and equal balance. It has been already submitted to the judicious honest people of this nation, whether the balance be not equal, and what their judgment is, is visible by submission to it, by acting upon it, by restraining their trustees from meddling with it; and it neither asks nor needs any better ratification. But when trustees in parliament shall by experience find any evil in any parts of the government, referred by the government itself to the consideration of the Protector and Parliament (of which time itself will be the best discoverer) how can it be reasonably imagin'd, that a person or persons coming in by election, and standing under such obligations, and so limited, and so necessitated by oaths to govern, for the people's good, and to make their love, under God, the best under-propping, and his best interest to him; how can it, I say, be imagin'd that the present or succeeding Protectors will refuse to agree to alter any such thing in the government that may be found to be for the good of the people, or to recede from any thing which he might be convinced casts the balance too much to the single person? And although for the present, the keeping up, and having in his power the militia, seems the most hard, yet if it should be yielded up at such a time as this, when there is as much need to keep this cause by it (which is most evidently at this time impugned by all the enemies of it) as there was to get it, what would become of all? Or if it should not be equally placed in him and the parliament, but yielded up at any time, it determines his power, either for doing the good he ought, or hindering parliaments from perpetuating themselves, or from imposing what religions they please on the consciences of men, or what government they please upon the nation, thereby subjecting us to dissettlement in every parliament, and to the desperate consequences thereof; and if the nation shall happen to fall into a blessed peace, how easily and certainly will their charge be taken off, and their forces be disbanded, and then where will the danger be to have the militia thus stated?

What if I should say, if there should be a disproportion or disequality as to the power, it is on the other hand? And if this be so, where-in have you had cause to quarrel? What demonstrations have you held forth to settle me to your opinion? Would you had made me so happy as to let me have known your grounds. I have made a free and ingenuous confession of my faith to you, and could have wished it had been in your hearts to have agreed that some friendly and cordial debates might have been towards mutual conviction; was there none amongst you to move such a thing? No fitness to listen to it? No desire of a right understanding? If it be not folly in me to listen to town-talk, such things have been proposed, and rejected with stiffness and severity, once and again;
Oliver Cromwell.

agaid; was it not likely to have been more advantagious to the good of this nation? I will say this to you for myself, and to that I have my conscience as a thousand witnesses, and I have my comfort and contentment in it, and I have the witness of divers here, that I think truly scorn to own me in a lyce, that I would not have been averse to any alteration, of the good of which I might have been convinc'd, although I could not have agreed to the taking it off the foundation on which it stands, viz. The acceptation and consent of the people.

I will not presage what you have been about;
or doing in all this time, nor do I love to make conjectures; but I must tell you this, that as I undertook this government in the simplicity of my heart, and as before God, and to do the part of an honest man, and to be true to the interest which in my conscience is dear to many of you (though it is not always understood what God in his wisdom may hide from us, as to peace and settlement) so I can say that no particular interest, either of my self, estate, honour,
or family, are, or have been prevalent with me to this undertaking.

For if you had upon the old government
offer'd to me this one thing; I speak, as thus advised, and before God, as having been to this day of this opinion, and this hath been my constant judgment, well known to many that hear me speak; if this one thing had been in-ferted, that one thing, that this government should have been, and placed in my family hereditary, I would have rejected it,* and I could have done no other, according to my

* Ludlow observes here, that in this he flattered the ambition of major-general Lambert, and kept him in expectation of succeeding him, and so secured his assistance in carrying on his designs.
present conscience and light. I will tell you my reason, though I cannot tell what God will do with me, nor you, nor the nation, for throwing away precious opportunities committed to us.

This hath been my principle, and I liked it when this government came first to be proposed to me, that it put us off that hereditary way, well looking, that as God had declared what government he had delivered to the Jews, and placed it upon such persons as had been instrumental for the conduct and deliverance of his people; and considering that promise in Isaiah, that God would give rulers as at the first, and judges as at the beginning; I did not know, but that God might begin, and though at present with a most unworthy person, yet as to the future, it might be after this manner, and I thought this might usher it in. I am speaking as to my judgment against making it hereditary, to have men chosen for their love to God, and to truth and justice, and not to have it hereditary; for as it is in Ecclesiastes, Who knoweth whether he may beget a fool or wife, honest or not? Whatever they be must come in upon that account, because the government is made a patrimony.

And this I do perhaps declare with too much earnestness, as being my own concernment, and know not what place it may have in your hearts, and of the good people in the nation; but however it be, I have comfort in this my truth and plainness.

I have thus told you my thoughts, which truly I have declared to you in the fear of God, as knowing he will not be mocked, and in the strength of God, as knowing and rejoicing that I am kept in my speaking, especially, when I do not form or frame things without the company.
"pass of integrity, and honesty, that my own conscience gives me not the yea to what I say, and then in what I say I can rejoice.

"Now to speak a word or two to you, of that I must profess in the name of the same Lord, and with that there had been no cause that I should have thus spoken to you; and though I have told you, that I came with joy the first time, with some regret the second, that now I speak with most regret of all.

"I look upon you, as having among you many persons, that I could lay down my life individually for; I could, through the grace of God, desire to lay down my life for you: So far am I from having an unkind or unchristian heart towards you, in your particular capacities.

"I have indeed, as a work most incumbent upon me, consulted what might be my duty in such a day as this, casting up all considerations: I must confess, as I told you, that I did think occasionally this nation hath suffered extremely in the respects mentioned, as also in the disappointments of their expectations of that justice that was due to them by your sitting thus long; and what have you brought forth?

"I did not, nor cannot apprehend what it is, (I would be loth to call it a fate, that were too paganish a word) but there is something in it, that we have not our expectations.

"I did think also for myself, that I am like to meet with difficulties, and that this nation will not (as it is fit it should not) be deluded with pretexts of necessity in that great business of raising of money; and were it not that I can make some dilemma's upon which to resolve some things of my conscience, judgment, and actions, I should sink at the very prospect of my encounters; some of them are general, some are more special, supposing this cause, or this business..."
of man; if it be of man, I would I had never touched it with a finger, if I had not had a hope fixed in me, that this cause, and this business is of God, I would many years ago have run from it. If it be of God, he will bear it up. If it be of man, it will tumble, as every thing that hath been of man, since the world began, hath done. And what are all our histories and other traditions of actions in former times, but God manifesting himself that he hath shaken and tumbled down, and trampled upon, every thing that he hath not planted? And as this is, so the all-wise God deal with it.

If this be of human structure and invention, and it be an old plotting and contrivance to bring things to this issue, and they are not the births of providence, then they will tumble. But, if the Lord take pleasure in England, and if he will do us good, he is able to bear us up; let the difficulties be whatsoever they will, we shall in his strength be able to encounter with them. And I bless God I have been inured to difficulties, and I never found God failing when I trusted in him; I can laugh and sing in my heart when I speak of these things to you, or elsewhere. And though some may think it is an hard thing without parliamentary authority to raise money upon this nation; yet I have another argument to the good people of this nation, if they would be safe, and have no better principle, whether they prefer the having of their will, tho' it be their destruction, rather than comply with things of necessity; that will excuse me; but I should wrong my native country to suppose this.

For I look at the people of these nations, as the blessing of the Lord, and they are a people blessed by God. They have been so, and they will be so, by reason of that immortal seed, which hath hath been, and is among them, those regenerated ones in the land, of several judgments, who are all the flock of Christ and lambs of Christ, tho' perhaps under many unruly passions, and troubles of spirits, whereby they give disquiet to themselves and others; yet they are not so to God, as to us; he is a God of other patience, and he will own the least of truth in the hearts of his people; and the people being the blessing of God, they will not be so angry, but they will prefer their safety to their passions, and their real security to forms, when necessity calls for supplies; had they not been well acquainted with this principle, they had never seen this day of gospel-liberty.

"But if any man shall object, It is an easy thing to talk of necessities, when men create necessities; would not the Lord Protector make himself great, and his Family great? doth not he make these necessities? and then he will come upon the people with this argument of necessity.

"This were something hard indeed, but I have not yet known what it is to make necessities, whatsoever the judgments or thoughts of men are. And I say this, not only to this assembly, but to the world, that that man liveth not, that can come to me, and charge me that I have in these great revolutions made necessities: I challenge even all that fear God; and as God hath said, My glory I will not give unto another; let men take heed, and be twice advis'd, how they call his revolutions, the things of God, and his working of things from one period to another, how, I say, they call them necessities of mens creation; for by so doing, they do vilify and lessen the works of God, and rob him of his glory, which he hath said, he will not give unto another, nor suffer to be taken from him.

X 2  ""
"We know what God did to Herod when he was applauded, and did not acknowledge God; and God knoweth what he will do with men, when they shall call his revolutions human designs, and so detract from his glory, when they have not been forecast, but sudden providences in things, whereby carnal and worldly men are enraged, and under, and at which many, (I fear, some good) have murmured and repined, because disappointed of their mistaken fancies; but still they have been the wise dispositions of the Almighty, though instruments have had their passions and frailties; and I think it is an honour to God to acknowledge the necessities to have been of God's imposing, when truly they have been so, as indeed they have, when we take our sin in our actings to ourselves; and much more safe, than to judge things so contingent, as if there were not a God that ruled upon earth.

"We know the Lord hath poured this nation from vessel to vessel, till he poured it into your lap, when you came first together: I am confident, that it came so into your hands, was not judged by you to be from counterfeited or feign'd necessity, but by divine providence and dispensation. And this I speak with more earnestness, because I speak for God, and not for men; I would have any man to come and tell of the transactions that have been, and of those periods of time, wherein God hath made these revolutions, and find where they can fix a feigned necessity.

"I could recite particulars, if either my strength would serve me to speak, or yours to hear; if that you would revolve the great hand of God in his great dispensations, you would find that there is scarce a man that fell off at any period of time when God had any work to do, that
Oliver Cromwell.

that can give God or his work, at this day, a good word.

It was, say some, the cunning of the Lord Protector (I take it to myself) it was the craft of such a man, and his plot, that hath brought it about. And as they say in other countries,
there are five or six cunning men in England that have skill, they do all these things: Oh what blasphemy is this! because men that are without God in the world, and walk not with him, and know not what it is to pray, or believe, and to receive returns from God, and to be spoken unto by the spirit of God, who speaks without a written word sometimes, yet according to it: God hath spoken heretofore in divers manners, let him speak as he pleaseth. Hath he not given us liberty? Nay, is it not our duty to go to the law and to the testimonies, and there we shall find that there have been impressions in extraordinary cases, as well without the written word as with it; and therefore there is no difference in the thing thus asserted from truths generally re-ceiv'd, except we will exclude the Spirit, without whose concurrence all other teachings are ineffectual. He doth speak to the hearts and consciences of men, and leadeth them to his law and testimonies, and there he speaks to them,
and so gives them double teachings, according to that of Job, God speaketh once, yea twice; and that of David, God hath spoken once, yea twice have I heard this. Those men that live upon their Mumpsimus and Sumpsimus, their Masses
and Service-books, their dead and carnal worship,
no marvel if they be strangers to God, and the works of God, and to spiritual dispensations. And because they say and believe thus, must we do so too? We in this land have been otherwise instructed, even by the word, and works, and Spirit of God.

X 3
To say that men bring forth these things, when God doth them, judge you if God will bear this. I wish that every sober heart, tho' he hath had temptations upon him of deserting this cause of God, yet may take heed how he provokes, and falls into the hands of the living God, by such blasphemies as these, according to the 10th of the Hebrews, If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remains no more sacrifice for sin; (It was spoken to the Jews, that having professed Christ apostatized from him) what then? nothing but a fearful falling into the hands of the living God.

They that shall attribute to this or that person the contrivances and production of those mighty things God hath wrought in the midst of us, and that they have not been the revolutions of Christ himself, upon whose shoulders the government is laid, they speak against God, and they fall under his hand without a Mediator; that is, if we deny the Spirit of Jesus Christ the glory of all his works in the world, by which he rules kingdoms, and doth administer, and is the rod of his strength, we provoke the Mediator; and he may say, I'll leave you to God, I'll not intercede for you, let him tear you to pieces; I'll leave thee to fall into God's hands, thou deniest me my sovereignty and power committed to me; I'll not intercede nor mediate for thee, thou fallest into the hands of the living God. Therefore whatsoever you may judge men for, and say, this man is cunning, and politick, and subtil, take heed, again I say, how you judge of his revolutions, as the products of mens inventions.

I may be thought to press too much upon this theme, but I pray God it may stick upon your hearts and mine. The worldly minded man knows nothing of this, but is a stranger to it; and because of this is his atheism and murmuring at instruments, yea, repining at God himself; and no wonder, considering the Lord hath done such things amongst us as have not been known in the world these thousand years, and yet notwithstanding is not owned by us.

There is another necessity which you have put upon us, and we have not fought; I appeal to God, angels, and men, if I shall raise money according to the article in the government, which had power to call you hither, and did, and instead of seasonable providing for the army, you have laboured to overthrow the government, and the army is now upon free quarter, and you would never so much as let me hear a tittle from you concerning it; where is the fault? Has it not been as if you had had a purpose to put this extremity upon us and the nation? I hope this was not in your minds, I am not willing to judge so; but this is the state unto which we are reduced: By the designs of some in the army, who are now in custody, it was design'd to get as many of them as they could, through discontent for want of money, the army being in a barren country, near thirty weeks behind in pay, and upon other specious pretences, to march for England out of Scotland, and in discontent to seize their general there, a faithful and honest man, that so another might head the army; and all this opportunity taken from your delays; whether will this be a thing of seigned necessity? What could it signify but that the army are in discontent already, and we'll make them live upon stones, we'll make them cast off their governors and discipline? What can be said to this? I list not to unsaddle myself, and put the fault upon others Backs; whether it hath been for the good of England, whilst men have been talking of this thing or the other, and pretending liberty, and a many good words, whether it hath been as it should have been? I am confident you cannot think it has, the nation will not think so. And if the worst should be made of things, I know not what the Cornish-men, or the Lincolnshire-men may think, or other counties, but I believe they will all think they are not safe. A temporary suspension of caring for the greatest liberties and privileges (if it were so, which is denied) would not have been of that damage, that the not providing against free quarter hath run the nation upon. And if it be my liberty to walk abroad in the fields, or to take a journey, yet it is not my wisdom to do so when my house is on fire.
"I have troubled you with a long speech, and I believe it may not have the same resentment with all that it hath with some; but because this is unknown to me, I shall leave it to God,
and conclude with that, that I think myself bound in my duty to God, and the people of these nations, to their safety and good in every respect; I think it my duty to tell you, that it is not for the profit of these nations, nor for common and publick good, for you to continue here
any longer; and therefore I do declare unto you, That I do dissolve this parliament."

C H A P. V.
From the dissolution of his second Parliament, to the meeting of his third Parliament.

Thus the Protector in great displeasure, and in this upbraiding manner, parted with his second parliament; which as it increas'd the indignation of the Republicans, so it gave great encouragement to the Royalists, to go on with the designs
Oliver Cromwell.

Major John Wildman, a noted commonwealth's-man, whom the Protector had expell'd the house at the first opening of the session, was seiz'd with a paper dictated by him, intitled, The declaration of the free and well-affected people of England, now in arms against the tyrant Oliver Cromwell, Esq; and beginning thus: "Being satisfy'd in our judgment and consciences of the present necessity to take up arms for the defence of our native rights and freedoms, which are wholly invaded and swallowed up in the pride and ambition of Oliver Cromwell, who calls himself Lord Protector of England, who hath render'd all Englishmen no better than his vassals, &c." But this man, contrary to the expectation of all his friends, who thought of nothing but his death, was after a short imprisonment discharged and set at full liberty. The Protector at the same time us'd all imaginable arts to secure himself, and prevent a universal odium: He pay'd the fleet and army well, and discharg'd all officers whose fidelity he suspected; carried it very fair with the city of London, giving them the power of their own militia, under their old leader major-general Skippon, treating them and accepting of treats from them; eas'd the common people of some customary burdens, and some part of their taxes; and us'd an indefatigable diligence and unbounded expence in procuring intelligence, and early crushing all designs against him. So that though his mother (who dy'd this year, and was buried with extraordinary pomp and solemnity) was in continual fear of her son's life, and when she heard any gun go off, would cry out that her son was shot, and could not...
not be easy without seeing him safe once or twice a day; and though a thousand of his enemies did really believe, that killing him would be no murder, yet he had the good fortune to escape all dangers.

The Cavalier plot was still on foot, which the Protector had a jealousy was countenanced by the parliament; and he gave out that to be a cause of his dissolving them. The project was, to have several parties rise together in several parts of the nation, about the beginning of March; and though upon the private intelligence the Protector had received, several persons were apprehended, and many arms seiz'd, yet it was still resolved to attempt something. To this end, a cart-load of arms was brought to the place of rendezvous for the northern parts, where 'twas reported the conspirators were to be headed by Wilmot Earl of Rochester. But being somewhat alarm'd at their first meeting, and apprehensive of the regular forces falling upon them before they were sufficiently prepar'd, they dispers'd themselves, leaving their arms behind them. The design was not so soon over in the west, where Sir Joseph Wagstaff, colonel Penruddock, captain Hugh Grove, Mr. Jones, and other persons of condition, enter'd Salisbury with a body of two hundred horse well arm'd, expecting there to have their numbers daily augmented. It was the time of the assizes, and they came thither about five o'clock in the morning; where, having proclaim'd the King, they seiz'd the judges, Rolls and Nicolas, and took away their commissions. They also seiz'd the sheriff; and Wagstaff was for hanging all three of them; but others not agreeing to it, they were at last set at liberty. Their forces not at all answer ing their first expectations, they retired to Dog-town, and from thence march'd as far as Blanford in Dorsetshire, where most men look'd upon them as flying, several of their own party...
Oliver Cromwell.

party stealing from them as fast as others came to them; and those who continued with them, did so rather to secure themselves and obtain better conditions, than from any expectation of success in their undertaking. Captain Union Crook, having intelligence of their motions, pursu’d them into Devonshire, and at South-Molton fell upon them and totally defeated them: Most of them were taken prisoners, and amongst them Penruddock, Grove, and Jones; Wagstaff, Mason, and Mompesson narrowly escaping. Penruddock and Grove were beheaded at Exeter, and others were hang’d in that city; some of them were sent to Salisbury; the place where they had so lately triumph’d, and there try’d and executed; and many were transported to the West-Indies. Thus these insurrections, which at first seem’d to threaten the whole kingdom, expir’d for the present, and the Protector was secur’d without the help of his army.

This plot, which was laid to ruin the Protector, prov’d in the issue of great advantage to him, advance’d his credit, and serv’d to confirm his authority the more. It clear’d him of the reproach of inventing plots himself for an excuse and pretence to continue such numerous forces in pay; and that little success the King’s party met with, was judg’d a good proof that there was not yet sufficient force for the safety and quiet of the kingdom. From hence he took occasion, with the advice of his council, to make an order, “That all who had born arms for the King, or had declar’d themselves to be of his party, should be decimated, or pay a tenth part of their estates, to support the charge of such extraordinary forces, as their turbulent and seditious practices oblig’d him to keep up;” the Protector declaring, That the charge should be laid upon those who had occasion’d it, and not upon the honest party, who had already been so much sufferers. Commissioners were appointed.
appointed in every county for this purpose; and
by this means incredible sums of money were brought into the Protector's coffers. He likewise committed to prison many of those whom he suspected,
as the Earl of Oxford, the Lords Willoughby of Par-
bam, Newport, and Compton; Littleton, Peyton, Packington, Ashburnham, Russel, Legg, Philips, Halsey, and several others. He had also a very watchful eye over the Republicans, and Fifth-monarchy
men, and gave Monk orders to seize major-general
Overton, major Bramstone, Holmes, and other officers.
Overton was sent up to London and committed to the Tower, and his regiment given to colonel Morgan, colonel Okey's to the lord Howard, and cornet Joyce, now colonel, was likewise cashier'd. And finally, to provide for all inconveniences, as well
amongst the people as in the army, he divided England, as 'twere, into so many cantons, over each of which he placed one called by the name of major-general; which major-generals were in the nature of prefects or governors of provinces. These men were to have the inspection and government of the inferior commissioners in every county, to commit to prison all such persons as they suspected,
to levy all moneys which were order'd by his Highness and his council to be collected for the pub-
luck, to sequester all who did not pay their decimation, and to put in execution such farther directions as they should receive; and there was no appeal from any of their acts, but to the Protector himself. Their names and several divisions were as follow: Colonel Kelsey was major-general
for Kent and Surry; colonel Goffe for Sussex, Hampsire, and Berkshire; colonel Desborough for Glocesterhire, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall; lieutenant-general Fleetwood for Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Hertfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk;
major-general Skippon for the city of London; com-
military,
missary-general Whaley for Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Warwickshire, and Leicestershire; major Butler for Northamptonshire, Bedfordshire, Rutland, and Huntingdonshire; colonel Berry for Worcestershire, Herefordshire, Shropshire, and North Wales; colonel Whortley for Chesire, Lancashire, and Staffordshire; major-general Lambert for York,shire, Durham, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Northumberland; and colonel Barkstead for the city of Westminster, and Middlesex.

These major-generals carry'd things with a very high hand, decimating whom they pleas'd, interrupting the proceedings at law, upon petitions of those who thought themselves aggrev'd, and threatening such as would not readily submit to their orders with transportation to the West-Indies.

A certain farmer in Berkshire, being requir'd to pay his tenth, ask'd the commissioners, in case he did so, What security he should have for the other nine parts; and it being answer'd, That he should have the Protector's order and theirs for the enjoyment of the rest; he reply'd, That he had already an act of Parliament for the whole, which he could not but think to be as good security as they could give: But, said he, if Goodman such-a-one and such-a-one (naming two of his neighbours) will give me their bond for it, I know what to say to such a proposal; for if they break their agreement, I know where to right myself; but these sword-men are too strong for me.

About this time also, the Protector having laid some extraordinary tax upon the city, one Cony, who had formerly serv'd him in bringing about his designs, positively refused to pay his share, and vehemently dissuaded others from complying with it: Hereupon the Protector sent for him, and put him in mind of the old friendship that had been between them, telling him, That of all men he did not expect this opposition from him, in a matter that was so necessary for the good of the commonwealth.
Cony in return remember'd him, how great an enemy he had express'd himself to such grievances, and how he had declared, That all who submitted to pay illegal taxes, were greater enemies to their country than they who imposed them; and that the tyranny of princes could never be grievous, but by the tameness and stupidity of the people. When the Protector saw he could not bring him over, he told him, That he had a will as stubborn as his, and be would try which of them two should be master; and thereupon committed him to prison. As soon as the term came on, the prisoner brought his Habeas Corpus in the King's Bench, then called the Upper Bench. Maynard, Twysden, and Windbam being of counsel for him, demanded his liberty, both upon the illegality of the commitment, and of the imposition. The judges could not defend either, and it appear'd plainly what their sentence would be; so that the Protector's attorney requir'd a farther day to answer what had been urg'd. But before that time, the three who were his counsel were committed to the Tower; and the judges were sent for and severely reprimanded, for suffering the liberty they had taken: And when they humbly alledg'd the law and Magna Charta, the Protector told them, Their Magna F— should not controle his actions, which he knew were for the safety of the commonwealth; and ask'd them, Who made them judges? And whether they had any authority to set there but what be gave them; and therefore he advis'd them to be more tender of that which only could preserve them, and sent them away with this caution, That they should not suffer the lawyers to prate, what it would not become them to bear.

At another time, Sir Peter Wentworth, a member of the long parliament, caus'd a collector in the country to be prosecuted at his suit, though he could scarce procure any attorney to appear, or counsel to plead for him. The Protector being inform’d of this prosecution, sent a messenger to bring Sir Peter before the council; where being ask’d the reason of this proceeding, he told them, That he was mov’d to it by his constant principle, That by the law of England no money ought to be levy’d upon the people, without their consent in parliament. The Protector then ask’d him, Whether he would withdraw his action or no; to which he reply’d, If you will command me, I must submit: Cromwell therefore commanding it, he accordingly withdrew his action; and so this matter ended.

But though the Protector proceeded in this arbitrary manner against those who contested his authority; yet in all other cases, where the life of his jurisdiction was not concern’d, he seem’d to have a great reverence for the law, and the constitution, rarely interposing between party and party; and to do him justice, there appear’d in his government many things that were truly great and praise-worthy. Justice, as well distributive as commutative, was by him restored almost to its ancient grace and splendor, the judges executing their office without covetousness, according to law and equity, and the laws; except some few where himself was immediately concern’d, being permitted to have their full force upon all, without impediment or delay. Mens manners, outwardly at least, became likewise reformed, either by removing the incentives to luxury, or by means of the ancient laws now reviv’d, and put in execution. There was a strict discipline kept in his court, where drunkenness, whoredom, and extortion were either banish’d, or severely rebuk’d. Trade began again to flourish and prosper, and most things to put on a happy and promising aspect. The Protector also shew’d a great regard to the advancement of learning, and was a great encourager of it. The university of Oxford, in particular, acknowledg’d his Highness’s respect to them, in continuing their chancellor, 1655. chancellor, and bestowing on the publick library there four and twenty Greek manuscripts, and munificently allowing an hundred pounds a year to a divinity reader. He also order'd a scheme to be drawn for founding and endowing a college at Durham, for the convenience of the northern students.

About this time, a design was form'd by the Protector, of settling the Jews again in this nation; and Manasseb Ben-Israel, a great Rabbi, came over and made his stated proposals, and had a conference upon them, for re-admitting that people to exercise trade and worship in England. The Protector, on this occasion, sent for divers ministers of the gospel, and laid those proposals before them; and at the same time with great earnestness declar'd his opinion, "That since there was a promise that they should be converted, means ought to be us'd to that end; and the most likely way was, the preaching of the gospel in truth and sincerity, as it was then in England, devoid of all papish idolatry, which had rendered the Christian religion odious to them." But the design was so violently opposed that this treaty came to nothing. 'Tis said the Protector had the promise of 200,000 l. from the Jews, in case he procured this toleration for them; which made him so earnest to bring it about: But Bishop Burnet informs us, that he enter'd into this treaty with them for the sake of intelligence. His words are these: "When he understood what dealers the Jews were everywhere in that trade that depends on news, the advancing money upon high or low interest in proportion to the risk they run, or the gain to be made as the times might turn, and in the buying and selling of the actions of money so advanced, he, more upon that account, than in compliance with the principle of toleration, brought a company of them over"
Oliver Cromwell.

"over to England, and gave them leave to build a synagogue. All the while that he was negotiatiing this, they were sure and good spies for him, especially with relation to Spain and Portugal."

Upon this the Bishop tells this story, which he had from the Lord Brogbill, then Earl of Orrery: That as that Earl was once walking with Cromwell in one of the galleries of Whitehall, a man almost in rags appear'd in view; upon which he immediately dismiss'd the Earl, and took that person with him into his closet; who told him of a great sum of money, that the Spaniards were sending over in a Dutch man of war, to pay their army in Flanders; and also whereabouts in the ship the said money was repofited. The Protector then immediately sent an express to Smith (afterwards Sir Jeremy Smith) who lay in the Downs, informing him, "That within a day or two such a Dutch ship would pass the Channel, which he must search for the Spanish money, which was contraband goods;" his Highness being then at war with Spain. Accordingly, when the ship pass'd by Dover, Smith sent and demanded leave to search him. The Dutch captain return'd him this answer, That none but his masters might search him: Upon which, Smith sent him word again, That he had set up an hour-glass, and if he did not submit to the search before it was run out, he would force him. The captain seeing it was in vain to struggle, submitted in time, and so all the money was found. And the next time his Highness saw the Lord Orrery, he told him, he had his intelligence from that seemingly forlorn man he saw him go to some days before.

The lords commissioners of the great seal, were Sir Thomas Widdrington, Whitelock, and Lisle; and William Lenthal, Esq; was master of the Rolls. Widdrington, Whitelock, and Lenthal made their exceptions against executing an ordinance of the Lord 1655.

Lord Protector and his council, For the better regulating and limiting the jurisdiction of the high court of Chancery: Upon which his Highness, not enduring his authority or his acts should be disputed, sent for them to the council-chamber, and there required them to lay down the seal and withdraw. He kept it a few days in his own hands, and then gave it to major Lisle, one of the former commissioners, and colonel Fiennes. And that Widdrington and Whitelock, the ejected commissioners, might not be too much disgusted, his Highness appointed them commissioners of the treasury; and he continued Lentbal in his favour for past services.

Appoints about this time the Lord Protector and his council appointed a committee of trade, to consider how to improve, order and regulate the trade and navigation of the commonwealth. This was an affair of great importance to the nation, and his Highness was very earnest and intent upon it.

As the Protector's power was very great at home, so his influence was no less considerable abroad: About this time an Ambassador Extraordinary from Sweden came over in great pomp and state, and with much ceremony and solemnity had his audience of his Highness in the Banqueting house at White-hall. The Ambassador spake in the Swedish language, and his secretary interpreted what he said in Latin. When he had done, the Lord Protector stood still for some time, and then putting off his hat to the Ambassador, with a carriage full of gravity and state, he answered him in English as follows:

"My lord Ambassador, I have great reason to acknowledge, with thankfulness, the respects and good affection of the King your master towards this commonwealth, and towards myself in particular; whereof I shall always retain a very grateful memory, and shall be ready upon all occasions to manifest the high sense and value I have of his majesty's friendship and alliance."

His answer to the Swedish ambassador.
“My Lord, you are very welcome into England; and during your abode here, you shall find all due regard and respect to be given to your person, and to the business about which you come. I am very willing to enter into a nearer and more strict alliance and friendship with the King of Sweden, as that which in my judgment will tend much to the honour and commodity of both nations, and to the general advantage of the Protestant interest. I shall nominate some persons, to meet and treat with your Lordship upon such particulars as you shall communicate to them.”

CHRISTINA, Queen of Sweden, having abdicated her kingdom upon changing her religion and turning Papist, resolved to go to Rome, and to see as much as she could in her way thither; and the renown of Cromwell made her very desirous to see him. Accordingly she sent her secretary Maldeschi, an Italian, from Fountainbleau in France to London, to procure an invitation from the Protector, who receiv’d the secretary with such marks of respect, as made him hope he should succeed in his errand. He often hinted, that her Majesty would be extremely pleas’d to see so illustrious a captain. Cromwell gave him the hearing, but would not understand his meaning: He return’d compliment for compliment; and the secretary soon understood, that the Protector had no mind to receive a visit from the Queen. And indeed he had three reasons against inviting her; the expence of her stay here, his resentment of her apostasy, and the ill example of her conversation, which was too gallant and intriguing for a Puritan court.

The Protector’s greatest difficulty in his foreign affairs, was, which side to chuse, France or Spain. The latter offer’d, that if his Highness would join with them, they would engage themselves to make no peace, till he should recover Calais again to the English.
1655. English. The Protector was very well pleased with this, thinking it would recommend him much to the nation, to restore that town again to the English empire, after it had been a hundred years possessed by the French. Cardinal Mazarine having intelligence of this offer made by the Spaniards, that he might outbid them, promised, in case the Protector would join with France, to assist him in taking of Dunkirk, a place of much more importance. His Highness was still for some time in suspense, but that which inclin'd him very much to join with France, was this; he saw that if France should assist the King or his brother with an army of Hugonots, to make a descent into England (which was threaten'd if he join'd with Spain) this might be of very dangerous consequence to him who had so many enemies at home, and so few friends; whereas the Spaniards could give those Princes no strength, nor had they any Protestant subjects to assist them in such an enterprise. This consideration made a great impression on him; and whilst he was casting in his mind, what was fit to be done, one Gage, formerly a priest, came over from the West-Indies, and gave him such a relation of the weaknesses, as well as of the riches of the Spaniards in those parts, that he concluded it would be both an important and easy conquest, to seize on their dominions there. By this he hop'd to supply himself with such a treasure, that his government would be establish'd, before he should need to have any recourse to a parliament for money. And as the Spaniards would never admit of a peace with England between the tropicks, he was in a state of war with them as to those parts, even before he declared war against them in Europe. Upon this, he prepar'd a fleet, with a force sufficient, as he thought, to have seiz'd Hispaniola and Cuba; Gage having assure'd him, that success in that expedition would soon make him master of all the rest. When the time of setting out this fleet came on, all men wonder'd whither it should be design'd. Some ima-gin'd it was to rob the church of Loretto; and this apprehension occasion'd a fortification to be drawn round it: Others talk'd of Rome itself; for the Protector's preachers often gave out, That if it were not for the divisions at home, he would go and sack Babylon. Others thought the design was a-against Cadiz, tho' he had not yet broke with Spain.
The French knew nothing of the secret; and the Protector not having finish'd his alliance with them,
was not oblig'd to impart to them the reason of his preparations. All he said about it was this, That he sent out the fleet to guard the seas, and to restore England to its dominion on that element.

This fleet consisting of about thirty men of war, under the command of vice-admiral Penn,
with about four thousand land-soldiers, to be commanded by Venables, set sail in the beginning of this year, directly for Barbadoes, where the two commanders were order'd to break open their commissions. Being safely arriv'd there, and new men taken in to encrease the land army, they sail'd to the island of Hispaniola. Coming about the middle of April before Sancto Domingo, the chief port of that country, Venables landed his men in an ill
place, different from the orders he had receiv'd
from the Lord Protector, and march'd them thro'
such thick woods and uneasy passages, that the Spaniards, with a very unequal number, beat them back. After this they advanc'd again towards the town, taking Negroes for their guides, who led them into an ambuscade; so that they were again
shamefully repuls'd to the bay where they landed,
with the los'd of major-general Haines, and above
six hundred men. They were soon forc'd to reimbark; and then, to make some amends for this unhappy miscarriage, they made another descent
on the island of Jamaica, and obtain'd an easy possession.
feotion of it; which island has ever since remain'd in the hands of the English: Where leaving a good body of foot to secure it, they sail'd back to England. The Lord Protector was never so much disturb'd as at this disaster at Hispaniola; so that Penn and Venables were no sooner come on shore, but he committed them both to the Tower, and could never be prevail'd on to trust either of them again.

About the time that Penn and Venables set out on this unfortunate expedition, admiral Blake sail'd with another fleet into the Mediterranean, to scour those seas of the Turkish pirates; and not meeting with any of them, he bravely resolv'd to seek them out in their ports. He came first before Algiers, and sending to the Dey, demanded that all the English ships might be restor'd, and all the English slaves releas'd. The Dey hereupon sent a rich present to Blake, with some store of fresh provisions, and gave him to understand, "That the ships and captives already taken belong'd to private men, therefore not so much in his power; but yet they should be restor'd at a moderate ransom; and if the admiral thought good, they would conclude a peace, and for the future offer no acts of violence to any of the English ships and natives." A peace being accordingly concluded, Blake sail'd from thence to Tunis, where, having made the same demand as at Algiers, instead of the like submission, he receiv'd this resolute answer; "That there were their castles of Goletta, and their ships and castles of Porto-Ferino; he might do his worst, for he should not think to fright them with the sight of his fleet." Provok'd at this answer, Blake resolv'd to destroy their ships in Porto-Ferino. Accordingly they mann'd their long-boats with stout seamen, and sent them into the harbour to fire those ships, whilst the admiral himself, with all his fleet, thunder'd most furiously with with his cannon against their castles. The seamen, in the mean time, so bravely perform'd their parts, that all the nine Turkish ships of war were soon reduc'd to ashes, with the loss of only twenty-five men, and forty-eight wounded, on the English side. These were actions of the highest conduct and courage, which made the English name very formidable in those seas.

There was another reason of Blake's sailing into the Mediterranean, which was, to demand satisfaction of all princes and states, that had molested the English in the time of war and confusion at home. Accordingly, among other places, he fail'd to Leghorn, and dispatch'd his secretary to demand of the Great Duke of Tuscany 60000 l. for damages sustain'd by the English in his dutchy; Prince Rupert having taken and sold as many English ships, as amounted to that value, to the Great Duke's subjects. The said Duke was willing to pay part of the sum, and desir'd time to consult the Pope about the rest. Blake said the Pope had nothing to do with it, and he would have the whole sum, which was paid him, 35000 Spanish, and 25000 Italian pistoles. The duke pretended that the Pope ought to pay part of the damage, some of the ships having been sold to his subjects; accordingly the next succeeding Pope repaid the Great Duke 20000 pistoles. Admiral Blake sent home sixteen ships laden with the effects he had receiv'd from several states for satisfaction and damages, and they were order'd to sail up the Thames together for a pleasing spectacle to the people.

The King of Spain, provok'd at the late attempt upon his dominions in the West-Indies, declar'd war against England; and the Protector, on the other hand, dispatch'd orders to admiral Blake, to watch the return of the Spanish plate-fleet, and make what destruction he could upon the coasts of Spain; and thought fit now to finish his alliance with France.
with France, sending Lockhart his ambassador thither for that end. His Highness undertook to send over an army of 6000 foot; and when the forts in Dunkirk and Mardyke should be taken, they were to be put into his hands: And the French King likewise oblig'd himself, by this treaty, not to permit King Charles, nor his brothers, nor any of his relations and adherents, excepting the Queen-mother, to remain in any part of his dominions.

About this time, the Protector had two signal occasions given him, to exercise his charity, and display his power, and shew his zeal in protecting the Protestants abroad. The Duke of Savoy rais'd a new persecution of the Vaudois, cruelly murdering and massacring many of them, and driving the rest from their dwellings into the mountains. Upon this the Protector sent to Mazarine, desiring him to put a stop to these proceedings; adding, That he knew well they had the Duke in their power, and could restrain him as they pleas'd; and if they did not, he must presently break with them. The Cardinal objected to this, as unreasonable: He promis'd to do good offices; but said, he could not answer for the effects. However, nothing would satisfy the Protector, till they oblig'd the Duke of Savoy to restore all he had unjustly taken from his protestant subjects, and to renew all their former privileges. For which purpose also he wrote to the Duke of Savoy himself, tho' he had otherwise no concern with him. But the title of Royal Highness being by mistake omitted on the letter, the major part of the council of Savoy was for returning it back unopen'd; but the marquess de Pianezza representing to them, that Cromwell was as haughty as he was powerful, and would not pass by such an affront; that he would certainly lay Villa Franca in ashes, and set the Swiss Protestant Cantons upon Savoy; the letter was read; which, together with the Cardinal's influence, had the desir'd success,
The Lord Protector also rais'd a great sum of money for the Vaudois, and sent over Moreland to settle all their affairs, and supply all their losses.

The other instance was this: There happen'd a tumult at Nismes, in which the Hugonots had committed some disorder; who being apprehensive of very severe proceedings upon it, sent one over with great secrecy and expedition to the Lord Protector Cromwell, to desire his interposition and protection. This express found so good a reception the first hour he came, that his Highness having receiv'd the whole account, bad him, "Re- fresh yourself after so long a journey, and he would take such care of his business, that by the time he came to Paris, he should find it dis- patch'd." Accordingly, that night he dispatch'd an agent with a letter to the Cardinal, and one inclos'd for the King. The letter to the Cardinal was in Latin; to which he added this postscript in French with his own hand; Je viens d'apprendre la revolte des habitants de Nismes. Je recommande a votre eminence les intérêts des réformés. "I have heard of the tumult at Nismes: I recommend to your eminence the interests of the reformed."

He also sent instructions to his ambassador Lockhart, requiring him either to prevail that the matter might be pass'd over, or to come away immediately. The Cardinal complain'd of this way of proceeding; but the necessity of their affairs made him comply. These things rais'd the Protector's character abroad, and caus'd him to be much depended on.

The lord Broghill, who was one of the Protectors cabinet counsellors, was sent for from Ireland to go to Scotland, and be president of the council there; but he was soon weary of the place, tho' he had a salary of 2000l. per Annum. Upon his return to London, Oliver told him, There's a great friend of yours in town. Broghill askng who? Cromwell
Cromwell said, The lord Ormond: He came to town such a day, and is at such a place, naming it. Broghill said, he knew nothing of it: But the Protector bad him send Ormond word that he knew where he was. The lord Broghill went himself, and told him what Cromwell had said; upon which the marquess made haste away: But his lady's papers were seiz'd on, who entreated lord Broghill to intercede for her. As soon as Cromwell saw him, he said with some passion, You have undertaken indeed for the quietness of a fine person! The lady Ormond is conspiring with her husband against me; and by your procurement, I have allow'd her 2000 l. a year of the marquess's estate, because they are sufferers in Ireland. She's a wicked woman, and shall not have a farthing of it. The lord Broghill seeing him angry, return'd a soft answer, which seldom fail'd to pacify him; and humbly desir'd to know what grounds he had for so severe a censure. Grounds enough, reply'd the Protector: There, read it (giving him a letter) 'tis her own hand. Lord Broghill looking upon it, said, It was not lady Ormond's hand, but the lady Isabella Thynn's, between whom and the marquess there had been an intrigue. How will you prove it? said Cromwell. Easly, reply'd the other, for I have some letters of that lady's by me; which being shewn to the Protector, he was satisfy'd.

Having mention'd this instance of intelligence of lord Ormond's being in town, it may be proper enough to insert here what Bishop Burnet says of Cromwell's using Sir Richard Willis for a spy. "O liver, says he, understood that one Sir Richard Willis was chancellor Hyde's chief confident, to whom he wrote often, and to whom all the party submitted. So he found a way to talk with him: He said, He did not intend to hurt any of the party, his design was rather to save them from ruin: They were apt, after their cups, to run into foolis
Oliver Cromwell. 331

"foolish plots, which signify'd nothing but to ruin those who were engag'd in them: He knew they consulted him in every thing. All he desire'd of him was to know those plots, that he might so disconcert them that none might suffer for them. If he clapt any of them up in prison, it should be only for a little time, and they should be interrogated only about some trifling discourse, but never about the business they had engag'd in. He offer'd Willis whatever he would accept of, and to give it when, or as he pleas'd." They struck up a bargain, and none was trusted with this but his secretary Thurloe, who was a very dextrous man at getting intelligence. Thus Cromwell had all the King's party in a net: And the Bishop tells us, he knew every thing that pass'd in the King's little court, and yet not one of his spies was discover'd but Manning, who was shot to death in the territories of the Duke of Newburgh.

The Protector having concluded the treaty with France, resolv'd now on a vigorous prosecution of the war with Spain. For this purpose, admiral Blake, and Montague, afterwards Earl of Sandwich, were order'd with a strong navy to block up the port of Cadiz. Here they lay several weeks, but could not provoke the enemy to come out and fight, till want of water, and other necessaries, oblig'd them to fail to Wyers-bay in Portugal for fresh supplies; captain Stayner, in the mean time, being left behind with seven ships; who, whilst the commanders were gone to the foremention'd place, esp'y'd the Spani'ʃ plate-fleet making directly for Cadiz, and resolved to fall upon it; which, with the Speaker, Bridgewater and Plymouth frigates, whilst the rest were behind, he so bravely perform'd, that in a few hours the whole fleet was quite spoil'd. One ship was sunk, another burnt, in which the marquis of Badajox, vice-roy of Mexico, with his lady and eldest daughter, perish'd in the flames; two were forc'd on ground, one run away.
away, and two remain’d in the conqueror’s hands; which being brought to Portsmouth, the bullion, to the value of above two millions, was there landed, and convey’d in carts to London, as a trophy and triumph of war.

The Protector being now in the height of his glory, resolv’d to call a parliament; to which it is thought by some he could have no other motive or inducement, than to make a party for a crown, and get the title of King conferred on him, which was the only thing he wanted; for as to the power of a King, he was really more formidable than any of the English Monarchs ever were. But others think the necessary expences of the Spanish war was the main occasion of it. Whatever his design was, a parliament was to be summon’d, and writs were issued throughout the three nations for election of members for that purpose; in which all endeavours were us’d to hinder those from being chosen, who were most likely to obstruct the Protector’s designs: For this reason the president Bradshaw, Sir Henry Vane, lieutenant-general Ludlow and others were summon’d before the council; and after consultation, upon their refusing to give security not to act against the government, Sir Henry Vane was sent prisoner to Carisbrook castle, Ludlow was order’d to be taken into custody, and Bradshaw, though permitted to go his circuit, as chief justice of Chester, had letters sent after him to deter persons from giving their votes for him.

Having mention’d lieutenant-general Ludlow’s being taken into custody, I shall conclude this chapter with an account of what pass’d between him and the Protector at the council-table, as previous thereunto. When he appear’d before the council according to summons, his Highness charg’d him with dispersing treasonable books in Ireland, and with endeavouring to render the officers of the army disaffected, by discoursing to them about new models models of government. Ludlow confess'd, he had caus'd some papers to be dispers'd in Ireland, but said they could not justly be call'd treasonable, and that though he knew not it was a crime to debate concerning forms of government, yet, to the best of his remembrance, he had not lately done any such thing. The protector then told him, he was not ignorant of the many plots that were carrying on to disturb the present power; and he thought it his duty to secure such as he suspected. To which Ludlow reply'd, that there were two duties requir'd by God of the magistrate, viz. To be a terror to evil-doers, and a praise to them that do well; and whether his actions were good or bad, he was ready to submit to a legal trial: That he knew no other way to secure the magistrate from being afraid of the people, or the people from the dread of the magistrate, but by both doing what is just and good. You do well, said the Protector, to reflect on our fears; yet I would have you know, that what I do, proceeds not from any motive of fear, but from a timely prudence to foresee and prevent danger; and had I done as I should, I bad secur'd you immediately upon your coming into England, or at least when you desir'd to be freed from the engagement you had given after your arrival: And therefore I now require you to give assurance not to act against the government. The lieutenant-general desir'd to be excus'd as to that, remembering him of the reasons he had formerly given for his refusal; and added, that he was in his power, and he might use him as he thought fit. Pray then, said Cromwell, what is it that you would have? May not every man be as good as he will? What can you desire more than you have? It were easy, answer'd Ludlow, to tell what we would have. What is that, I pray? reply'd the Protector. That which we fought for, said Ludlow, That the nation might be governed by its own consent. I am, said the other, as much for a government by consent 1656. consent as any man; but where shall we find that consent? amongst the prelatical, presbyterian, independdent, anabaptist, or levelling parties? To which Ludlow answer'd, Amongst those of all sorts who have asso ced with fidelity and affection to the publick. The Prot-tector then fell to commending the present government, extolling the protection and quiet which the people enjoy'd under it; and said, he was resolv'd to keep the nation from being imbued in blood. Ludlow said, He thought too much blood had been already shed, unless there were a better account of
it. You do well, reply'd the Protector, to charge us with the guilt of blood; but we think there is a good return for what hath been shed; and we understand what clandestine correspondences are carrying on
at this time between the Spaniards and those of your party, who made use of your name, and affirm that you will own them and assist them. Ludlow told him, he knew not what he meant by his party, and he could truly say, that if any had enter'd into an engagement with Spain, they had had no advice from him to do so; and if they would use his name, he could not help it. His Highness then in a softer way, told him, That he desir'd not to put any more hardships on him than on himself; that he had been always ready to do him all the good offices that lay in his power, and that he aim'd at nothing by this proceeding but the publick quiet and security. Truly, Sir, said the other, I know not why you should be an enemy to me, who have been faithful to you in all your Difficulties. Upon which the Protector said,
I understand not what you mean by my difficulties:
I am sure they were not so properly mine as those of the publick; for in respect to my outward condition, I have not much improved it, as these gentlemen (pointing to his council) well know. To this they appear'd to assent, by rising from their seats; and therefore Ludlow (as he tells us) thought fit not to insist farther on that point; but contented himself self to say, that it was from that duty which he owed to the publick, whereof the Protector express'd so great regard, that he durst not give the security he desir'd; apprehending it to be against the liberty of the people, and contrary to law: For proof of which he produce'd an act of parliament, "For restraining the council from imprisoning any of the free-born people of England; "and if they should do so, requiring the justices of the Upper Bench, upon the application of the aggrieved party, to grant his Habeas Corpus, and give him considerable damages." But, said the Protector, did not the army and council of state commit persons to prison? To this Ludlow answer'd, that the council of state did so, but it was by virtue of an authority granted to them by the parliament; and if the army had sometimes acted in that manner, it had been in time of war, and then only in order to bring the persons secured to a legal trial. A justice of peace, said Cromwell, may commit, and shall not I? Ludlow told him, a justice of peace was a legal officer, and authorize'd by the law to do so; which he could not be though he were King, because if he did wrong therein, no remedy could be had against him. Therefore, said he, if I have offended against the law, I desire to be referred to a justice of the peace, that I may be proceeded with according to law; but if I have done nothing to deserve a restraint, that then I may have my liberty. Upon this, he was order'd to withdraw; and major-general Lambert advis'd, that he might be peremptorily requir'd to give the security demanded: But the Protector said, That the air of Ireland was good, that he had a house there, and therefore he thought it best to send him thither. In the end, the lieutenant-general resolutely refusing to give the said security, was order'd to be taken into custody, as before related.
ON the 17th day of September, the new parliament met his Highness the Lord Protector in Westminster-Abby; where Dr. John Owen, vice-chancellor of Oxford, preach'd a sermon on these words in Isaiah, What shall one then answer the messengers of the nation? That the Lord hath founded Zion, and the poor of his people shall trust in it. This being over, the Protector with the members went to the Painted-chamber, where he made a short speech to them, and then dismissed them to their house: But here they found a guard plac'd, and none were suffer'd to enter but such as had certificates given them; in this form, These are to certify, that A. B. is return'd by indenture one of the members to serve in this present parliament, for—and approved by his Highness's council. By this means near a hundred members were excluded, who thereupon presented a petition to the sitting members, declaring, "That being chosen by the country to serve with them, they were ready to discharge their duty; but were prevented from doing so by the power of the sword, and refus'd admission into the house by a guard of soldiers." Upon this, a committee being sent to the Protector and his council, return'd with this answer, "That if the persons complaining would apply them-selves to them, they should be reliev'd if there was cause." The excluded members therefore seeing no redress, appeal'd to the people in a severe remonstrance, or protestation, complaining, "That the Lord protector had by force of arms invade ded their fundamental right and liberty, and violently prevented the meeting of the people's chosen deputies in parliament; and concluding with an appeal to God and all the good people of England for assistance and protection in their service, &c."

The sitting members made choice of Sir Thomas Widdrington for their Speaker; and 'twas soon perceiv'd that they were disposed to act according to the Protector's mind. On the first of October they resolv'd, "That the war against the Spaniards was undertaken upon just and necessary grounds, and for the good of the people of the commonwealth; and that the parliament doth approve thereof, and will by God's blessing assist his Highness therein." They then proceeded to pass several acts; as "1. An act that passing of bills should not determine this present session of parliament. 2. An act for renouncing and disannulling the pretended title of Charles Stuart. 3. An act for security of his Highness the Lord Protector his person, and continuance of the nation in peace and safety; whereby 'twas made high-treason to attempt, compass, or imagine the death of the Protector. 4. An act for taking away the court of Wards and Liveries. 5. An act for the exportation of several commodities of the breed, growth and manufacture of this commonwealth." And farther, to make good what they had resolv'd, great sums of money were granted to carry on the Spanish war. For this purpose, an act was pass'd, "For an allowance of 60,000 l. a month for three months upon England; another for 5000 l. a month for the same time, on Scotland; and the same on Ireland." There was also another act pass'd, "For 30,000 l. a month for England, 6000 l. a month for Scotland, and 9000 l. a month for Ireland, to be paid for three whole years next ensuing."
1656. "ensuing." Another, "For continuing of tonnage and poundage." And another (which was the revival of an old act) "For preventing multiplicity of buildings in and about the Suburbs of London, and within ten miles thereof; a whole year's revenue to be presently paid for all houses which had been built upon new foundations since the year 1620."

These bills, with several others, were at several times pass'd by the Protector, coming in state as a Sovereign to the Painted-chamber. And when the money bills with some others were pass'd, he made this short speech to the Speaker: "I perceive, that among these many acts of parliament, there hath been a very great care had by the parliament, to provide for the just and necessary support of the commonwealth, by these bills for levying of money now brought to me, which I have given my consent unto: And understanding it hath been the practice of those who have been chief governors, to acknowledge with thanks to the commons, their care and regard of the publick, I do very heartily and thankfully acknowledge their kindness herein."

The parliament had not sat two months when the exorbitant power of the major-generals came under consideration. The Protector had hitherto given them good words; but fearing they might in time eclipse his own greatness, he was now for suppressing their authority. And so Mr. Cleypole, his son-in-law stood up (which was an unusual thing with him) and told the house, "That he could but start the game, and must leave those who had more experience, to follow the chace; and therefore should only say, that he had formerly thought it necessary, in respect to the condition in which the nation had been, that the major-generals should be entrusted with the authority they had exercis'd; but in the present state of affairs,
"affairs, he conceived it inconsistent with the laws of England and liberties of the people, to continue their power any longer." This motion was a clear direction to the court party in the house; who being well assur'd, that Cleypole had deliver'd the sense, if not the very words of the Protector therein, join'd as one man in opposing and abolishing the power of these major-generals.

About this time, one James Naylor, a late soldier under general Lambert, took upon him to personate our Saviour, resembling his picture in his garb, hair, and looks. He went about with disciples, and women ministering unto him, and enter'd the city of Bristol, riding upon an ass, his followers strewing his way with leaves and boughs of trees, and crying, Hoftanna, blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord. He also pretended he could heal the sick, raise the dead, and fast forty days, and gave no other answer to any question, but: Thou hast said it. The magistrates of Bristol sent him up to the parliament, who resolv'd, "That James Naylor was guilty of horrid blasphemy, and a great seducer of the people;" and instead of sending him to Bedlam, which would have been the properest place for him, they ordered the Speaker to pronounce this severe sentence against him, viz. "To stand in the pillory for two hours at Westminster; to be whipp'd by the hangman from Westminster to the Old Exchange, and there to stand in the pillory two hours more; his tongue to be bored through with a hot iron, and his forehead stigmatiz'd with the letter B; to be afterwards sent to Bristol, and convey'd through the city on a horse bare-back'd, and his face backward, and his body whipp'd in the market-place; to be brought back to London, and committed to prison in Bridewell, and there to be kept from all company, and to have no relief, but what he should earn from hard labour; and being debarr'd the the use of pen ink and paper, to be kept to continual work, till he should be discharged by the parliament." Whitelock says, many thought he was too furiously prosecuted by some rigid men. And we must observe likewise, that the above account, which is the most usual, that is given of his heresies and blasphemies, is denied by the body of Quakers, who represent him a plain man, of great zeal, and no great capacity.

About this time, there was a new discovery made of a desperate plot against the Protector’s person; which made the acts pass’d for his security be judged highly seasonable. Miles Syndercomb, a Leveller, having been cashier’d in Scotland, combin’d with one Cecil and one Troop, of his Highness’s life-guard, to assassinate the Protector near Brentford, as he was going to Hampton-Court. Syndercomb, being betray’d by the other conspirators, stoutly deny’d the plot, but was condemn’d upon the statute of 25 Edw. III. the chief justice Glynn declaring it treason in case of a Protector, as well as a King, since by the word King any chief magistrate was understood. The prisoner was found dead, when the day appointed for his execution came; whereupon his body was dragg’d naked by a horse’s tail to the scaffold on Tower-hill, and there bury’d, with a stake driven through it. The Protector was very much disturb’d at this accident; for instead of bringing this man to make some useful discovery to him, which he expected, he found himself under the reproach of causing him to be poisoned, as being afraid to bring him to publick justice. However, a day of publick thanksgiving was appointed for the Protector’s deliverance; when, after a sermon at St. Margaret’s Westminster, his Highness treated the Speaker and Members in the Banqueting-house at Whitehall, with more than ordinary marks of endearment.

On the 6th of February there was a great meeting of learned men at Whitelock’s house at Chelsea, pursuant pursuant to this order of parliament: Ordered, "That it be referred to a committee to send for and advise with Dr. Walton, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Castle, Mr. Clerk, Mr. Poult, Dr. Cudworth, and such as they shall think fit, and to consider of the translations and impressions of the bible, and to offer their opinions therein." And about a Week after, Dr. Walton publish'd the Polyglott bible.

The parliament had sat about six months, when the debate came on in the house about changing Cromwell's title of Protector into that of King. A new instrument was drawn up, and read in the house, having a blank left for the title of the single person, and two other blanks for two houses of parliament. This was brought in by Mr. Pack, a rich alderman of London, who was suppos'd to be very much in the court interest; and when it came to be debated, 'twas sharply oppos'd by the soldiers party in the house; who joining with the Republicans, fell so furiously upon Pack for his presumption and unparliamentary proceeding, that they bore him down from the Speaker's chair to the bar of the house. But this heat lasted not long; for the lord Broghill, chief justice Glynn, and others who were privy to the main design, alledging, "That being masters of their own resolutions, they might retain as much of this new form as was good, and reject what was otherwise"; they by this means brought it to be debated: And tho' they met with some opposition therein, yet when it came to be put to the question, they carried all before them, and grew so bold as to move, "That the blank left for the insertion of the title of the chief magistrate might be fill'd up with the name of King:" Which motion, tho' very much oppos'd by lieutenant-general Fleetwood, was like-wise carried, and the name voted, together with the filling up the two blanks left for the two houses, with the words, House of Commons, and Other House.
This done, on the 4th of April they presented this writing to the Lord Protector, which was still, the humble petition and advice of the parliament of England, Scotland, and Ireland to his Highness; at which time, the Speaker, Sir Thomas Widdrington, made a speech to him, recommending the title and office of a King, as settled here with Christianity itself, approved and retain'd by our ancestors, and every way fitted to the laws and temper of the people of England. The Protector, however inclinable he was to accept of this offer, yet finding it to be against the humour and bent of the army, and the chief officers of it, and that his son-in-law Fleetwood, and his brother-in-law Desborough were particularly averse to it, instead of a ready assent, thought fit to demur upon it; and the better to protract time, in hopes of gaining upon the officers, he desired, "That a committee might be appointed to confer with him, and to offer him better knowledge and satisfaction in this great cause."

A committee was accordingly appointed, which on April 11. met him in the Painted chamber. Whitelock was chairman, and the chief speakers besides him were, the lord Broghill, chief justice St. John, chief justice Glynn, the lords commissioners Fiennes and Lisle, Lenthal master of the Rolls, Sir Charles Wolsley, Sir Richard Onslow, and colonel Jones. These for two distinct days successively entertained the Protector with long speeches, endeavouring to persuade him to accept of the title of King, which the parliament had offer'd him. Their arguments were principally these: "That the name of a Protector, as he held it, was unknown to the English constitution; but the title of King had the only foundation in the ancient and known laws of the nation, was interwoven with our laws, and suited to the genius of the people: That it was the head from whence all..."
Oliver Cromwell.

all the nerves and sinews of the government proceeded; and if a new head was put on, it was a question, whether those nerves and sinews would grow and receive nourishment: That for him to take up the office of King, without the title, was to take it up with all the objections of scandal: That the King, the Laws of the nation, the Liberties of the people, and also Parliaments themselves, had but one foundation, and that the end of the late war was not to destroy Kingship, as appeared by six or seven of the parliament's declarations, one of which was ordered to be read in all churches." His Highness answer'd, That these arguments were cogent, but not satisfactory; that the title of Protector might be adapted to the laws; that providence was against them, that had already altered the name; and that he were much to be blamed, if he should displease so many pious and religious men, who would take offence at such a proceeding." The committee reply'd, "That the title ought to be accommodated to the laws, and not the laws to the title: That the innovation of title was suspected, as being the cover of hidden tyranny, and that the inconveniences of such change were not presently felt; for which very reason, it was by the parliament deny'd to King James, when he came first to this kingdom, to change the title of King of England and Scotland, into that of Great Britain: That by refusing the title of King, he would not so much derogate from his own honour, as from the nation's, for whose honour it was to have a King for the supreme governor: That under the name of Protector was never design'd the supreme moderator, but a temporary officer for guarding the King in his minority, and administering of the kingdom; and that generally such had been unfortunate: That that appellation having at this time sprung from
from the soldiers, favour'd of conquest, and might with very good reason be rescinded by the parliament. That without the title of King
the government would be unstable and flitting,
and would not long stand, being on a tottering foundation; as it had been chang'd three or four times in these five years, and did still fluctuate:
That this had been the great encouragement of those attempts against his person, that the law did not take notice of him as chief magistrate;
and that juries were generally backward in finding any guilty of treason upon that account:
But by the laws made in Edward IV. and Henry VII's time, whatever was done by a King in possession, was good and valid, and all that serv'd under him were safe and exempt from punishment. By those laws his enemies had hitherto pleaded indemnity, but by his assuming what was defir'd, those laws they pretended for their disobedience, would tie them, even by their own principles, to obedience. That tho' part of the long parliament had taken away Kinghip, yet
now it was set up again by a fuller representative of three nations; and since the parliament of England, Scotland, and Ireland, had advis'd and defir'd him to take upon him the title of King, he ought not in reason and equity to refuse it. That Providence was no less conspicuous in turning the government again into monarchy, for avoiding confusion, and bridling the tumults of the people, than in changing the name of Monarchy into Protectorship: And that good and pious men would acquiesce in the decree of the parliament, altho' perhaps they might seem privately to differ." In the end, his Highness gratefully acknowledg'd the kindness of the offer, but would not give a present answer, acquainting the committee, "That he would consider of all they had said, and seek to God for " counsel;
The Protector was now under great difficulties and distraction of mind, and many days pass’d before he could come to a resolution in this weighty affair. Whilst this business was in agitation, the Lord Brogbill (afterwards Earl of Orrery) as Bishop Burnet informs us, coming one day to Cromwell, and telling him he had been in the city, the Protector enquir’d of him, What news be had heard there? The Lord Orrery told him, He had heard he was in treaty with the King, who was to be restor’d, and to marry his daughter. Cromwell shewing no displeasure at this, the Earl said, In the state to which things were reduced, he could see no better expedient: They might bring him in on what terms they pleased; and his Highness might retain the same authority he then had, with less trouble. To this Cromwell answer’d, The King can never forgive his Father’s blood. The Earl reply’d, He was one of many that were concern’d in that, but he would be alone in the merit of restoring him: Upon which the Protector said, He is so damnably debauch’d, he would undo us all; and so went off to other discourse without any emotion; which made his lordship conclude he had often thought of that expedient.

The Protector in the mean time kept himself on such a reserve, that no man knew what answer he would give to the parliament’s offer, tho’ ’twas thought most likely that he would accept of it. He, as Ludlow informs us, endeavour’d by all possible means to persuade the officers of the army to approve the design; for which purpose he one time invited himself to dine with colonel Desborough, and carried lieutenant-general Fleetwood with him. He began to droll with them about Monarchy, and speaking flight of it, said, It was but a feather in a man’s cap, and therefore he wonder’d that men would not please the children, and let them enjoy their rattle. But they they being very serious upon the matter, assured him, That there was more in it than he perceived: That those who put him upon it were no enemies to Charles Stuart; and if he accepted of it, he would draw inevitable ruin on himself and friends. Having thus sounded them, that he might conclude as he began, he told them, They were a couple of scrupulous fellows, and so went away. At another time entering more seriously into debate with these two, he said, It was a tempting of God to expose so many worthy men to death and poverty, when there was a certain way to secure them. But they insisting upon the oaths they had taken, he reply'd, That these oaths were against the power and tyranny of Kings, but not against the four letters that made the word King.

The next day, his Highness sent a message to the house, requiring their attendance to-morrow morning in the Painted Chamber, intending, as all men thought, there to declare his acceptance of the crown: But in the mean time meeting with his brother Desborough, as he was walking in the park, and acquainting him with his resolution, he receive'd this answer from him, That then he gave the cause, and his family also for lost; and tho' he resolved never to act against him, yet he would not act for him after that time. And so after some farther discourse, Desborough went home, and there found colonel Pride, whom the protector had knighted; and imparting to him his Highness's intention to accept the title of King, Pride immediately answer'd, He shall not. Desborough ask'd him, How he would hinder it? Whereupon Pride said, Get me a petition drawn and I will prevent it. And so they both went to Dr. Owen, and prevail'd on him to draw a petition according to their mind.

The next morning, the house being met, some officers of the army coming to the parliament door, sent in a message to colonel Desborough, to let him known that they had a petition, and desired him
Oliver Cromwell. 347

him to present it to the house. But he knowing the contents of it, and thinking it not proper for him to take publick notice of it before it was presented, inform'd the house, that certain officers of the army had a petition to present to them; and mov'd that they should be call'd in, and have leave to present it with their own hands; which the house generally agreed to, not thinking the army would oppose their designs. And so the petition being deliver'd by lieutenant-colonel Mason, was read in the house, and was to this effect; "That they had hazarded their lives against Monarchy, and were still ready so to do, in defence of the liberties of the nation: That having observ'd in some men great endeavours to bring the nation again under their old servitude, by pressing their General to take upon him the title and government of King, in order to destroy him, and weaken the hands of those who were faithful to the publick; they therefore humbly desir'd that they would discountenance all such persons and endeavours, and continue stedfast to the old cause, for the preservation of which they, for their parts, were most ready to lay down their lives."

'Tis hard to say whether the Parliament or the Protector was most surpriz'd at this unexpected address. As soon as his highness heard of it, he sent for his son-in-law Fleetwood, and told him, That he wonder'd be would suffer such a petition to proceed so far, which he might have binder'd, since he knew it to be his resolution not to accept the crown without the consent of the army; and therefore he desir'd him to hasten to the house, and to put them off from doing any thing farther therein. Accordingly the lieutenant-general went immediately thither, and told them, "That the petition ought not to be debated, much less to be answer'd, at this time, the contents of it being to desire them not..."
not to press his Highness to be King; whereas the present business was to receive his answer to what had been formerly offer'd to him; and therefore he desir'd that the debate of it might be put off, till they had received his answer."
The house having agreed to this, receiv'd a message from the Protector, that instead of meeting
him in the Painted Chamber, where he us'd to speak to them, they would meet him in the Banquetinghouse; whither being accordingly come, his Highness made a broken kind of speech to them, as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, I came hither to answer that that was in your last paper to your committee
you sent to me, which was in relation to the desires which were offer'd to me by the house,
in that they call'd their petition. I confess that business hath put the house, the parliament, to a great deal of trouble, and spent much time; I am very sorry, that it hath cost me some and some thoughts; and because I have been the unhappy occasion of the expence
of so much time, I shall spend little of it now.
I have, the best I can, revolv'd the whole buiness in my thoughts, and I have said so much already in testimony of the whole, that I think I shall not need to repeat any thing that I have said. I think it is a government, that the aims of it seeks much a setting the nation on a good foot in relation to civil rights and liberties,
which are the rights of the nation; and I hope I shall never be found to be of them that shall go about to rob the nation of those rights, but to serve them what I can to the attaining of them. It hath also exceeding well provided for the safety and security of honest men, in that great, natural, and religious liberty, which is liberty of conscience. These are great funda-mentals, and I must bear my testimony to them"
(as I have and shall do still, so long as God lets me live in this world) that the intentions of the things are very honourable and honest, and the product worthy of a parliament: I have only had the unhappiness both in my conferences with your committees, and in the best thoughts I could take to myself, not to be convicted of the necessity of that thing, that hath been insisted upon by you, to wit, the title of King, as in itself so necessary, as it seems to be apprehended by yourselves; and I do, with all honour and respect to the judgment of the parliament, testify that (caeteris paribus) no private judgment is to lie in the balance with the judgment of a parliament: But in things that respect particular persons, every man, that is to give an account to God of his actions, must in some measure be able to prove his own work, and to have an approbation in his own conscience of that he is to do, or forbear; and whilst you are granting others liberties, surely you will not deny me this, it being not only a liberty, but a duty (and such a duty as I cannot without sinning forbear) to examine my own heart, and thoughts, and judgment, in every work which I am to set mine hand to, or to appear in or for.

I must confess, therefore, that though I do acknowledge all the other, yet I must be a little confident in this; that what with the circumstances that accompany human actions, whether they be circumstances of time, or persons, whether circumstances that relate to the whole, or private or particular circumstances that concern any person, that is to render an account of his own actions; I have truly thought, and do still think, that if I should (at the best) do any thing on this account to answer your expectation, it would be at the best doubtingly:
The LIFE of

1657. "and certainly what is so, is not of faith; whatever is not of faith is sin to him that doth it, whether it be with relation to the substance of the action, about which the consideration is conversant, or whether to circumstances about it, which make all think indifferent actions good or evil to him that doth it. I lying under this consideration, think it my duty, only I could have wish'd I had done it sooner, for the sake of the house, who have laid so infinite obligations on me; I wish I had done it sooner for your sake, for saving time and trouble; and indeed for the committee's sake, to whom I must acknowledge publickly I have been unseasonably troublesome; I say, I could have wish'd I had given it sooner; but truly this is my answer, That although I think the government doth consist of very excellent parts in all but that one thing, the Title; as to me, I should not be an honest man, if I should not tell you, that I cannot accept of the government, nor undertake the trouble and charge of it, which I have a little more experimented than every man, what troubles and difficulties do befall men under such trusts and in such undertakings; I say, I am persuaded to return this answer to you, That I cannot undertake this government with the title of a King: And that is mine answer to this great and weighty business."

Thus Cromwell, on the 8th of May, refus'd the title of King. And here we must not omit a great design of his, which he had purpos'd to begin his Kingship with, in case he had assum'd it; as 'twas related to Bishop Burnet by one Stoupe, a Griffin by birth, and much trusted by Cromwell in foreign affairs. The design was, to set up a council for the Protestant religion, in opposition to the congregation de propaganda fide, at

A digres-
- He refuses
- sion, containing a
- cerning a
- noble design of his
- sign in favour
- of the protestant religion.
at Rome. His Highness intended it should consist of seven counsellors, and four secretaries for different provinces. The first province was to be, France, Switzerland, and the Valleys; the second, the Palatinate and the other Calvinists; the third, Germany, the North, and Turkey; and the fourth, the East and West Indies. The secretaries were to have each 500l. salary, and to keep a correspondence everywhere, to be informed of the state of religion all over the world, that all good designs by their means might be promoted. A fund of 10000l. per Annum was to be at their disposal for ordinary emergencies; but they were farther to be supplied as there was occasion. Chelsea college was to be fitted up for them, being then an old decay'd building, which had been at first erected for writers of controversy. The Bishop concludes the account thus: "I thought it was not fit to let such a project as this be quite lost: It was certainly a noble one: But how far he would have pursued it, must be left to conjecture."

To return; Cromwell having refused the title of King, the parliament soon voted, "That he should enjoy the title and authority he had already," which was in many particulars enlarged beyond what it was by the former Instrument, by the new one, call'd The humble petition and advice. This instrument consisted of eighteen articles; but I shall only give the substance of the chief ones, as follows: "That his Highness under the title of Lord Protector, would be pleas'd to exercise the office of chief magistrate over England, Scotland, and Ireland, &c. and to govern according to all things in this petition and advice: Also, that in his life-time he would appoint the person that should succeed in the government after his death. That he would call parliaments consisting of two houses, once in three years.
years at farthest. That those persons who were legally chosen by a free election of the people to serve in parliament, might not be excluded from doing their duties, but by consent of that house whereof they were members. That none but those under the qualifications therein mention'd, should be capable to serve as members in parliament. That the power of the other house be limited as therein prescrib'd. That the laws and statutes of the land be observ'd and kept; and no laws altered, suspended, abrogated, or repealed, or new laws made, but by act of parliament. That the yearly sum of a million of pounds sterling be for the maintenance of the navy and army; and three hundred thousand pounds for the support of the government, besides other temporary supplies, as the commons in parliament should see necessary. That the number of the Protector's council should not be above one and twenty; whereof the quorum to be seven and not under. The chief officers of state, as chancellors, keepers of the great seal, &c. to be approved by parliament. That his Highness would encourage a godly ministry in these nations; and that such as do revile or disturb them in the worship of God, may be punished according to law; and where the laws are defective, new ones to be made in that behalf. That the protestant Christian religion, as it is contained in the Old and New Testaments, be asserted and held forth for the publick profession of these nations; and no other; and that a confession of faith be agreed upon and recommended to the people of these nations; and none be permitted by words or writings, to revile or reproach the said confession of faith, &c."

The preamble to this petition was in these words:

"We the knights, citizens, and burgesses in this present
Oliver Cromwell.

present parliament assembled, taking into our most serious consideration the present state of these three nations, joined and united under your Highness's protection, cannot but in the first place with all thankfulness acknowledge the wonderful mercy of Almighty God, in de-levering us from the tyranny and bondage, both in our spiritual and civil concerns, which the late King and his party designed to bring us
under, and pursu’d the effecting thereof by a long and bloody war: And also that it hath pleased God to preserve your person in many battles, to make you an instrument for preserving our peace, altho’ environ’d with enemies abroad,
and filled with turbulent, restless, and unquiet
spirits in our own bowels; and as in the treading down the common enemy, and restoring us to peace and tranquility, the Lord hath us’d
you so eminently, and the worthy officers and soldiers of the army (whose faithfulness to the common cause we and all good men shall ever acknowledge, and put a just value upon;) so also that he will use you and them in the settlement and securing our liberties as we are men
and Christians, to us and our posterity after us;
which are those great and glorious ends, which
the good people of these nations have so freely,
with the hazard of their lives and estates, so long and earnestly contended for. We consider likewise the continual danger which your life is in, from the bloody practices both of the malignant and discontented party (one whereof,
through the goodness of God, you have been lately deliver’d from) it being a received principle amongst them, that no order being settled
in your life-time for the succession in the government, nothing is wanting to bring us into blood
and confusion, and them to their desired ends,
but the destruction of your person: And in case
A a  " things
things should thus remain at your death, we are not able to express what calamities would in all human probability ensue thereupon; which we trust your Highness (as well as we) do hold your self obliged to provide against, and not to leave a people, whose common peace and interest you are entrusted with, in such a condition as may hazard both, especially in this conjunction, when there seems to be an opportunity of coming to a settlement upon just and legal foundations. Upon these considerations, we have judg'd it a duty incumbent upon us to present and declare these our most just and necessary desires to your Highness.

This Instrument being digested and agreed upon, the house sent to the Protector for an audience; which he appointed to be on the 25th of May, in the Banqueting-house. The members waiting upon him accordingly, their Speaker Widdrington presented and read the said Instrument to him, and desir'd his assent; which, after a long pause, he with all the gestures of concern and perplexity, granted; and then declar'd to them as follows:

That he came thither that day, not as to a triumph, but with the most serious thoughts that ever he had in all his life, being to undertake one of the greatest burdens that ever was laid upon the back of any human creature; so that without the support of the Almighty, he must sink under the weight of it, to the damage and prejudice of these nations. This being so, he must ask help of the parliament, and of those that fear God, that by their prayers he might receive assistance from God; for nothing else could enable him to discharge so great a duty and trust. That seeing this was but an introduction to the carrying on of the government of these nations, and there were many things which could not be supply'd without the assistance of parliament, parliament, it was his duty to ask their help in them: Not that he doubted; for the same spirit that had led the parliament to this, would easily suggest the rest to them. For his part, nothing would have induc'd him to take this unsupportable burden to flesh and blood, but that he had seen in the parliament a great care in doing those things which might really answer the ends that they had engag'd for, and make clearly for the liberty of the nation, and for the interest and preservation of all such as fear God under various forms: And if these nations were not thankful to them for their care therein, it would fall as a sin upon their heads. That yet there were some things wanting that tended to reformation, to the discountenancing vice, and the encouragement of virtue; but he spake not this as in the least doubting their progress, but as one that did heartily desire, to the end that God might crown their work, that in their own time, and with what speed they judg'd fit, those things might be provided for." The speech being ended, the members return'd again to their house. And thus did his Highness accomplish a chief part of what he design'd, which was to have his power and authority confirm'd by parliament.

C H A P. VII.

From his being confirm'd Protector by the Parliament's Humble Petition and Advice, to his Death. Concluding with some Account of his Character, and his pompous Funeral.

CROMWELL having thus accepted of the government from the hands of the parliament, 'twas thought fit he should have a solemn Inauguration; which was accordingly appointed to be on the 26th of June, and the house order'd the master of the ceremonies to give notice thereof to all foreign ambassadors and ministers. Westminster-hall was prepared for this solemnity, and adorn'd and beautify'd as sumptuously as it could be for a Coronation. At the upper end there was an ascent raised, where a chair and canopy of state were set, and a table with another chair for the Speaker; and seats were likewise built up for the members of parliament, the judges and officers, and for the lord-mayor and aldermen of London. All things being prepar'd, the Lord Protector came out of a room adjoining to the Lords house (having come thither from Whitehall by water) and in this order proceeded into the hall. First went his gentlemen, then a herald; next the aldermen, another herald, and the attorney-general; then the judges; then Norroy king at arms, the Lords commissioners of the seal, and of the treasury; then Garter king at arms, and after him the Earl of Warwick carrying the sword bare-headed before the Protector, and the Lord-mayor Tichburn carrying the city sword. His Highness standing up under a cloth of state, the Speaker of the parliament made the following speech to him.

"MAY it please your Highness, You are now upon a great theatre, in a large choir of people: You have the parliament of England, Scotland and Ireland before you: On your right hand, my Lords the judges; and on your left hand the Lord-mayor, aldermen and sheriffs of London, the most noble and populous city of England. The parliament with the interposition of your suffrage makes laws; and the judges and governors of London are the great dispensers of those laws to the people. The occasion of this convention and intercourse, is to give an investiture to your Highness in that eminent place of Lord Protector, a name which you had before, but it is now settled by the full unanimous consent"
Then he said, he was commanded by the parliament to make oblation to his Highness of four things in order to his inauguration. At which, being assisted by the Earl of Warwick, and White-lock, he vested his Highness with a robe of purple-velvet lined with ermines; telling him, It was an emblem of magistracy, and imported righteousness and justice. Then he presented him with a bible, richly gilt and boss’d with gold, and told him, It was a book that contain’d the holy scriptures, in which he bad the happiness to be well vers’d; it was a book of books, and contain’d both precepts and examples for good government. Next he put in his hand a scepter of massy gold, saying, Here is a scepter, not unlike a staff; for you are to be a staff to the weak and poor. Lastly, he girt him with a very rich sword, with this comment, This is not a military, but a civil sword; it is a sword rather of defence than offence, not only to defend yourself, but also your people. Then his Highness took an oath, to govern the people of these three nations according to law, &c. Which done, Mr. Manton pray’d, recommending his Highness, the parliament, the council, the forces by land and sea, and the whole government and people of the three nations to the blessing and protection of God. Then the trumpets sounded, and an herald proclaimed his Highness’s title, and all was concluded with the loud acclamations of the people, God save the Lord Protector. The ceremonies being ended, his Highness with his train return’d to Whitehall, and the members to their house, where they adjourn’d their sitting to the 20th of January next. There was a fine medal struck on the occasion of the Protector’s
The ЛІFE. of

1657. inauguration, perform'd by that excellent graver Simmonds; which had on one side the bust of Oliver, and round it, Oliver D. G. R. P. Ang. Sco. Hiberniae Protector. On the reverse was an olive-tree flourishing in a field, with this round it, Non deficient Oliva, Sept. 3. 1657.

Bills pass'd by him. "The bills pass'd by the Lord protector this session, besides those already mention'd, were, "1. An act for limiting and setting the prices for wines. 2. An act for the taking away of purveyance, and compositions for purveyance. 3. An act against vagrants, and wandering, idle, dissolute persons. 4. An act giving licence for transporting fish in foreign bottoms. 5. An act for quiet enjoying of sequestered parsonages and vicarages, by the present incumbents. 6. An act for discovering, convicting, and repressing of Popish recusants. 7. An act for punishing of such persons as live at high rates, and have no visible estate, profession, or calling answerable thereunto. 8. An act for indemnifying of such persons as have acted for the service of the publick. 9. An act for the better observation of the Lord's-day. 10. An act for the better suppressing of theft upon the borders of England and Scotland, and for discovery of highwaymen and other felons. 11. An act for the improvement of the revenue of the customs and excise. 12. An act for the assuring, confirming, and settling of lands and estates in Ireland. 13. An act for the attainder of the rebels in Ireland. 14. An act for the settling of the postage of England, Scotland and Ireland."

LUDLOW tells us, that the next day after the solemnity of the inauguration, there was a feast prepar'd for the assembly and officers of the army; at which 'twas observ'd major-general Lambert was not present; which occasion'd many to suspect he was declining in favour for obstructing.
ing Cromwell's design of being King; for he says he was credibly inform'd, that when that business was on foot, the major-general took the liberty to tell Cromwell, That if he accepted the crown, he could not assure the army to him. Or perhaps he was disgusted at the Protector's reserving to himself the naming of his successor in the government. Some time after, upon the major-general's refusing to take the oath, enjoin'd by the humble petition and advice, not to do any thing against the present government, and to be true and faithful to the Protector, according to the law of the land; his Highness sent for him, and told him, He was well assur'd his refusal proceeded not on account of his new authority; for he might remember, that he himself did at the first press him to accept the title of King; and therefore if he was now dissatisfy'd with the present posture of affairs, he desir'd him to surrender his commission. To this Lambert answer'd, That having no suspicion that it would then be demanded of him, he had not brought it, but if he pleas'd to send for it, he should deliver it; which two or three days after was accordingly done. But the Protector not thinking it safe to disgust him entirely, allow'd him a pension of 2000l. a year, to keep him from any desperate undertaking.

The Protector, now in the height of his grandeur and power, met with one very great misfortune, by the death of his valiant and victorious admiral Blake, after his having added one very signal exploit more this year to his other glories. Having rode out all the winter storms before Cadiz and the coast of Portugal, he received certain intelligence, that another Spanish plate-fleet, much richer than the former, was coming home; and for fear of the English fleet had put into the bay of Santa Cruz in the island of Teneriff, one of the Canaries. Upon this Blake with his fleet weigh'd anchor, April 13, and by the 20th stood off the Ossing of the 1657.

The remarkable success of admiral Blake at Santa Cruz.

The, L I F E of

the said bay; where he accordingly found the galleons arriv'd, to the number of sixteen men of war. The bay was secur'd by a strong castle well furnish'd with great ordnance, besides seven forts
more in several parts of it, mounted with six, four and three great guns a-piece, and united together
by a line of communication from one fort to another, which was mann'd with musqueteers. Don Diego Diagues, the Spanish admiral, caus'd all his smaller ships to moor close to the shoar, cover'd
by the castles and forts, and posted the six large galleons farther off at anchor, with their formidable broadsides to the sea. A Dutch merchantman was at this time in the bay, the master whereof perceiving the English were ready to enter, and that a combat would presently ensue, desired Don Diego's leave to depart: For, said he, I'm very sure, Blake will presently be amongst us; to which the Don resolutely answer'd, Get you gone if you will, and let Blake come if he dares.

BLAKE having call'd a council of war, and finding it impracticable to carry off the galleons, resolved to burn them all: To which end, he first order'd the brave captain Stayner, in the Speaker
frigate, with a squadron to stand into the very bay; who by eight the next morning fell furiously
upon the Spaniards, without the least regard to their forts, and fought them almost an hour. The admiral seconding him, posted some of the larger ships to cannonade the castle and forts; which play'd their parts so well, that the enemy after some time was forced to leave them. Blake for the space of four hours engaged the galleons,
which made a brave resistance, but were at last abandon'd by the enemy; as were likewise the smaller vessels which lay under the forts, which were burnt by Stayner, whilst Blake did the same by the large galleons; so that this whole plate-
fleet, of inestimable value; was utterly destroy'd;
and, which is very remarkable, as soon as ever the action was over, the wind, which before blew strong into the bay, on a sudden veer'd about, and brought Blake with his fleet out to sea, without the loss of one ship, and with no more than forty-eight men kill'd, and a hundred and twenty wounded. The news of this brave and unparallel'd action being brought to England before the end of the session, the parliament order'd a day of thanksgiving for this great success; and the Lord Protector, at their desire, sent the admiral a diamond ring of 500l. value, and knighted Stayner at his return to England.

Blake, after this noble exploit, sail'd back to Spain, where after having kept all their ships and ports in awe, he return'd for England. But falling sick of a fever, he died in the 59th year of his age, just as the fleet was entering into Plymouth found; where he passionately enquir'd for the land, but found his own element the more proper bed of honour. He had a publick funeral solemnly and justly bestow'd upon him, and the honour of being interr'd in Henry VIIth's chappel. The Lord Clarendon says, "He was the first man that declin'd the old track, and made it manifest, that the (naval) science might be attain'd in less time than was imagin'd; and despis'd those rules which had been long in practice, to keep his ships and his men out of danger, which had been held in former times a point of great ability and circumspection; as if the principal art requisite in the captain of a ship had been to be sure to come home safe again. He was the first man who brought ships to contemn castles on shore, which had been thought ever very formidable, and were discover'd by him to make a noise only, and to fright those who could rarely be hurt by them. He was the first that infus'd that proportion of courage into the seamen,
1657. The LIFE of

seamen, by making them see by experience,
what mighty things they could do, if they were resolv’d; and taught them to fight in fire as well as upon water: And tho’ he hath been very well imitated and follow’d, he was the first that gave the example of that kind of naval courage,
and bold and resolute achievements.”

He had a very great regard to the honour of his country, and the English dominion of the seas. He endeavour’d to preserve peace and unity among his seamen, by telling them, “That they should not listen to any news from land, nor mind the changes in the government, but remember that the fleet was English, and that their enemies were foreigners; and therefore they must fight for the honour of the English nation.” One instance of his care to preserve the honour of his country, mention’d by Bishop Burnet, I cannot omit. He says, that Blake happening to be at Malaga with the fleet, before Cromwell made war upon Spain, some of his seamen going ashore, met the boat, as it was carrying about, and not only refused to pay any honour to it, but laughed at those who did. Whereupon one of the priests stir’d up the people to resent
this affront; and so they fell upon them and beat them severely. The seamen returning to their ship, and complaining of the usage they had met with, Blake immediately dispatch’d a trumpeter to the Vice-Roy, to demand the priest who had been the chief occasion of it: To which the Vice-Roy return’d this answer, That be had no authority over the priests, and so could not dispose of him. But Blake sent him word again, That be would not enquire who had power to send the priest to him, but if he were not sent within three hours, he would burn their Town. And so being unable to resist him, they sent the priest to him; who justifying himsel upon the rude behaviour of the seamen, Blake
answer’d,
answer'd, That if he had sent a complaint to him of it, he would have punish'd them severely, since he would not suffer his men to affront the establisht'd religion of any place at which he touch'd; but he took it ill, that he set on the Spaniards to do it; for he would have all the world to know, that an Englishman was only to be punish'd by an Englishman. And so he civilly treated the priest, and dismiss'd him, being satisfy'd that he had him at his mercy. The Bishop says, Cromwell was exceedingly pleas'd with this, and read the letters in council with great satisfaction, telling them, He hoped he should make the name of an Englishman as great as ever that of a Roman had been.

As victory crown'd the Protector's arms by sea this year, so his forces by land were not unsuccessful. The 6000 men which his Highness was oblig'd by his treaty with France to provide, for acting jointly with the French against the Spaniards, being transported under the command of Sir John Reynolds and major-general Morgan, the French had no inclination to begin upon Mardyke or Dunkirk, which when taken were to be put into Cromwell's hands, but march'd to other places which they were to conquer for their own use. But his Highness's ambassadour Lockbart made such repeated representations to the Cardinal, complaining of their breach of faith, not without some menaces, That his master knew where to find a more punctual friend, that as soon as they had taken Montmedy and St. Venant, the army march'd into Flanders and invested Mardyke, which being taken would much facilitate the design upon Dunkirk. The French and English had not lain before this strong place above four days, when it was reduc'd to a surrender upon composition, and deliver'd up wholly into the possession of the English. But presently after, the French being withdrawn into winter-quarters, the Spaniards, who were sensible sensible of what great importance this place was to the preserving of Dunkirk, detach'd a body of horse and foot to retake it. Among these were 2000 English and Irish, commanded by the Duke of York; and they made two very furious storms upon the fort, but were stoutly repuls'd, and forc'd to fly, with the loss of several brave commanders.

LUDLOW, speaking of this action, says, Many of those who were kill'd on the enemy's side were English under the Duke of York: And as it was confess'd by all present, that the English who took part with the French, behav'd themselves with more bravery than any; so it was observ'd, that those of the cavalier party who had join'd with the Spaniards, behav'd themselves worst. The marshal Turenne commanded the army that took Mardyke; to whom Cardinal Mazarine wrote thus, at Lockhart's instance, before the siege: Nothing can be of more fatal consequence to France, than the loss of Cromwell's friendship, and the breach of the union with him; which certainly will be broken, if some strong town is not taken and put into his hands. This conquest was very grateful to Cromwell, who immediately sent ten men of war to guard the port of Mardyke, and cruize on that coast. A foreign popish writer, speaking of this matter, says, "In effect, nothing could flatter the ambition of Cromwell more than this acquisition, knowing he had thereby won immortal glory: He had, without the loss of a man, accomplish'd a design, which the greatest Kings of England had often attempted in vain, at the expence of their people's blood and treasure: He had re-establish'd the English on the continent, and put them in a condition to make themselves masters of both sides of the channel, which had been despair'd of since the loss of Calais."
Upon the French King's entering into an agreement with the Lord Protector of England, King Charles with his family was obliged to leave France and retire to Cologne; where having resided about two years and a half, he this year, upon concluding a treaty with the Catholick King, repaired to the city of Bruges in Flanders, where he found a handsome accommodation for himself and his small court. About this time, among other methods he us'd in order to his restoration, Mr. Echard tells us of a private application he made to Cromwell, which he says came from the mouth of the Dutchess of Lauderdale, who told the same to a person, of whose credit he could make no question. The story is this: That this Lady, afterwards Dutchess of Lauderdale, being a particular friend and acquaintance of Cromwell's, was employ'd to make a private offer and proposal to him, in substance as follows, "That if he would restore, or permit the King to return to his throne, he would send him a blank paper, for him to write his own terms and limitations, and settle what power and riches he pleas'd upon himself, family, and friends." This proposal was first communicated to the Protector's Lady, who liked it very well, believing that besides other advantages, it would bring absolute indemnity and security to her husband, and the whole family. She therefore took an opportunity, when she was in bed with him, to mention the offer to him, and endeavour'd to persuade him to accept of it, as being of the highest moment to the happiness of himself and relations. But he without minding her arguments and persuasions, presently told her, She was a fool, adding this shrewd sentence, If Charles Stuart can forgive me all that I have done against him and his family, he does not deserve to wear the crown of England.
The King keeping his court at Bruges in Flanders, had many consultations with the governor Don John, and was in great hopes the distractions in England might at length turn to his own advantage; which encouraged the Spaniards to protect his person, and accept his arms in Flanders; where the marquess of Ormond, the lord Rochester, the lords Gerrard and Wentworth, the lord Taaf, and general Middleton, had their several regiments quarter'd along the sea-coast, under the command of the Dukes of York and Gloucester; both to assist his Catholick Majesty against his enemies the French, who were supported by Cromwell, and to be in a readiness to transport themselves into England, if any favourable opportunity should invite them. And indeed, an insurrection of the King's friends was at this time design'd; to promote which, there was now publish'd, and with great industry dispers'd, a very bold paper, entitled, Killing no Murder, making it not only lawful but honourable to kill the Protector, as a tyrant and common enemy of his country. This put his Highness into a terrible fright, and made him very vigilant to apprehend the author, who was then conceal'd, not only in his person, but in the very suspicion of his name, tho' since generally believ'd to be colonel Titus, who made a great figure in some of the parliaments after the King's restoration. Some time after this alarm, which serv'd more to put the Protector upon his guard, than to forward the preparations of the royalists, the marquess of Ormond flept over from Flanders, and lay privately in London, to quicken the design, intending also to send for his troops to push on the execution of it. But the Protector, who was always good at intelligence, had (as was before related) corrupted Sir Richard Willis, who seem'd to be at the head of the King's party, and pretended a great deal of zeal for his service, to discover all their most secret contrivances to him; and by his intelligence,
Oliver Cromwell. 367

1657.

The Protector now sent his writs of summons, under the great seal, to divers persons to sit as members of the Other House; the form of which writs was the same with that which was us'd to summon the Peers in parliament. The persons who were to compose the Other House were about sixty in number, among whom were divers noblemen, knights, and gentlemen of ancient families, of good estates, and some colonels and officers of the army. Their names were as follows: the lord Richard Cromwell, the Protector's eldest son; the lord Henry Cromwell, his other son, lord-deputy of Ireland; Nathanael Fiennes, and John Lisle, lords commissioners of the great seal; Henry Lawrence, lord-president of the council; Charles Fleetwood, lieutenant-general of the army; Bulstrode Whitelock, and William Sydenham, commissioners of the treasury; Robert Earl of Warwick, Edmund Earl of Mulgrave, Edward Earl of Manchester, William viscount Say and Seal, Philip viscount Lisle, Philip lord Wharton, Thomas lord Fauconberg, George lord Eure, John Claypole Esq; Charles Howard Esq; whom the Protector made a viscount, John Desborough, and Edward Montague, generals at sea; Sir Charles Wolsley, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Walter Strickland Esq; major-general Skippon, colonel Philip Jones, Sir William Strickland, Francis Rouse Esq; John Fiennes Esq; Sir Francis Russel, Sir Thomas Honeywood, Sir Arthur Haslerigg, Sir John Hobart, Sir Richard Onslow, Sir Gilbert Gerard, Sir William Roberts, lord-chief-justice Glynn, lord-chief-justice St. John, William Pierpoint Esq; John Crew Esq; Alexander Popham Esq; Sir Christopher Pack, Sir Robert Tieburn, Edward Whalley Esq;
The parliament thus improv'd by the addition of another house, met a second time on the 20th day of January, when the Protector came as a Sovereign to the house of Lords, and sending for the Speaker and house of Commons by the black-rod, made a short speech to them, beginning in the old stile, My Lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of Commons; and then discoursing some particulars which he recommended to them; thanking them for their good correspondence the last session, and assuring them, if they went on as they had begun, they should be call'd the blessed of the Lord, and generations to come should bless them; he left his lord-keeper Fiennes to make a long speech to them, with all the state of our ancient Monarchs.

As several of the nobility, who had writs sent to them, refuse'd to sit in the Other House, so Sir Arthur Haftirigg, and some few more of the commons, declin'd that honour, and chose rather to sit in the lower house, for which they had been elected members by the people. Many others also, who had been excluded by the Protector in the first session of this parliament, now ventured to take their seats, upon the third article of the Petition and Advice, by which no members legally chosen, were to be excluded from the performance of their duty, but by consent of that house whereof they were members. By this this means, and the removal of those of the other house, who were, for the most part, taken out of this; a considerable alteration was made in this assembly; so that they soon began to call in question the authority and jurisdiction of the other house, and several of the members, particularly Sir Arthur Haferigg, appear'd very forward in fomenting differences between these two bodies. Upon this his Highness sent for the Commons to the Banqueting-house, where he exhorted them to unity, and to the observance of their own rules in the Petition and Advice. But this having no effect upon them, they went on in the same way; many being against the members of the other house being call'd Lords, others entirely against the having such another house, and some speaking reproachfully of it. These proceedings tended to their own destruction; for the Protector looking upon himself to be aim'd at by them, and that these things were only the testimonies of their envy towards him and his government, began to think of putting a stop to all by dissolving the parliament. Whilst he was revolting this in his mind, on the 4th of February he receiv'd fresh information concerning the diligence of his adversaries in all parts; which quicken'd him to that degree, that he would not stay for one of his own coaches, but taking the first that was at hand, with such guards as he could presently get together, he hurry'd to the Other House: whither being come, he imparted his resolution to dissolve the parliament to lieutenant-general Fleetwood; who earnestly endeavouring to dissuade him from it, he clapt his hand upon his breast, and swore, by the living God be would do it. Then the usher of the black-rod was sent to the Commons to acquaint them, that his Highness was in the Lords house, and there requireth their attendance. Hereupon they, with the speaker, went up, and his Highness made a speech to them, declaring several urgent urgent and weighty reasons, which made it necessary for him, in order to the publick peace and safety, to proceed to an immediate dissolution of this parliament; and accordingly he did dissolve them.

His Highness was the more incensed, because at this time the fifth-monarchy men were forming a dangerous conspiracy to overthrow him and his government; which he suspected was countenanced by many of the parliament. Major-general Harrison was deep in this plot, which was laid for an insurrection to dethrone the Protector. Their chief cabal was held in a house near Shoreditch, where secretary Thurloe, who spared no pains or money for his master's safety, had a spy among them, and suffer'd them to go on till the night before that wherein they had appointed to rendezvous; at which time he sent a party of soldiers, who seiz'd the chief of them as they were consulting about the manner of putting their design in execution. Their arms and ammunition were likewise seiz'd, with a standard of a Lion couchant, as of the tribe of Judah, with this motto, Who shall rouze him up? and several copies of a printed declaration, with this title, The principle of the Remnant, &c. The conspirators apprehended were Venner, Gray, Gowler, Hopkins, Ashton, and others, who were carried prisoners to the Gate-house, where they lay long in a miserable condition, but were spared to create disturbance and their own destruction at another time, viz. soon after the King's restoration.

Shortly after, as Ludlow informs us, some persons who us'd to meet in Coleman-street, to deplor the apostasy of the times, and particularly that of Whitehall, were apprehended by the lord mayor's officers, pursuant to the Protector's orders, as they were coming out of their meeting-place. Among these was one cornet Day, who being accus'd of saying, That the Protector was a rogue and a traitor, confess'd the words; and to justify himself said, that Cromwell had affirmed in the presence of himself and several other officers, "That if he did oppress the conscientious, or betray the liberties of the people, or not take away tithes by a certain time (now past) they should then have liberty to say he was a rogue and a traitor." He desir'd leave therefore to produce his witnesses, who were then present, to what he had asserted. But the business was so manag'd, that he and some others were fin'd and imprison'd for their misdemeanors.

The Cavalier plot was mention'd before. And of this also he had timely informations given him; upon which he sent for the lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council of the city of London, and acquainted them with it, and desir'd their care to put the city into a posture of defence. They accordingly went back with great indignation against the Royalists, and took extraordinary care of their gates and guards, and withal drew up an humble address to his Highness, promising the faith of the city, and the purfè of it, in firmly adhering to him against all his enemies. Addresses also of the same strain were made from general Monk's and other regiments, and from the English forces in Flanders; all which his Highness answer'd with thanks. He now thought it time to proceed against the conspirators themselves, whom he had safely lodg'd in prison. For this purpose a high court of justice was erected, being founded on a law made by the late parliament for the security of his Highness's person. Whitelock was one of the commissi-
372

The Life of

1658. "commissions from the son of the late King, and persuading divers to raise forces by virtue of the fame." That against Sir Henry Slingby was, "For attempting to debauch some of the garrison of Hull to the service of Charles Stuart, and delivering a commission from him to them." And the prisoners of less note were charg'd "With a design of firing the city in several parts, at the time appointed for the insurrection." Dr. Hewet deny'd the jurisdiction of the court, and argu'd against the legality of it; and so for contempt, after having been three times required to plead, he was adjudg'd guilty of the charge; and when he afterwards offer'd to plead, he was told it was too late. Sir Henry Slingby pleaded that he was a prisoner at the time when he was charg'd to have practis'd against the government, and that the persons whom he was accused of attempting to corrupt, had trepann'd him by their promises to serve the King in delivering Hull, if he would give them a commission to act for him; which commission was an old one, that had lain long by him. But all this availing him nothing, he was, together with Dr. Hewet, adjudg'd to die; and accordingly they were both beheaded on Tower-hill, notwithstanding all endeavours that were us'd for procuring their pardon. Six of the meaner sort were condemn'd to be hang'd, but only three suffer'd; one in Tower-street, another in Cheapside, and the third before the Exchange. As for Mr. Mordaunt, he pleaded not guilty; and after a full hearing of the witnesses on both sides, the court acquitted him by one voice.

When these trials were over, the High court of justice was dissolv'd, and the Protector, by Whitelock's advice, referr'd all future trials of conspirators to the Upper Bench, in the course of common law. He not only made Howard a Viscount, but sign'd a patent to make Whitelock one, and three other other patents to make the attorney-general Prideaux, and the solicitor-general, baronets, and John Maynard, Esq; his Highness's serjeant.

In the beginning of this year, a party of the garrison of Ostend, with the privy of the governor, held intelligence with Cardinal Mazarine, and then with the Protector Cromwell, to betray that town into the hands of the French, wherein the Lord Protector was to have his share. Mazarine was to send a land army under the command of marshal D'Aumont, and the Protector was to furnish a fleet for transporting the men. Articles having been agreed on between the supposed conspirators and the Cardinal, on May 14th, the appointed day, the English fleet appeared before Ostend, and the garrison permitted the French to pass and land, who thought of nothing but an immediate possession of the place. But the subtle governour, having suffered the fleet to come to a proper distance, on a sudden pull'd down the white flag that had invited them in, and set up a bloody flag: And before the vessels could tack about, or get out of his reach, he sorely gall'd them by the cannon from the forts; and the French that landed were all, to the number of 1500, slain or taken prisoners, among which laft was the marshal D'Aumont himself.

Presently after this great disappointment, it was resolv'd to attempt the taking of Dunkirk; which was accordingly invested by the French, assisted by 6000 valiant Englishmen, under the inspection of Lockhart, the Protector's ambassadour, but more immediately under the command of major-general Morgan. Whilst they were carrying on their approaches towards the town, the French under marshal Turenne on the side of Newport, and Morgan with his English and a brigade of French horse, on that next Mardyke, they had intelligence brought them, that the Spanish general, Don John... of Austria, with the Prince of Conde, the Prince de Ligny, and the Dukes of York and Gloucester, were advancing with 30,000 men to relieve the place. Hereupon the French King and Cardinal were persuaded by Turenne and others to withdraw their persons, and retire to Calais, and leave all to be determined by a council of war. In the first council, which was held without either Lockhart or Morgan, it was resolved to raise the siege, if the enemy came on. But in the next, when those two were present, Morgan vehemently oppos'd that resolution, alledging, "What a dishonour it would be to the crown of France, to have summoned a place, and broke ground before it, and then 'raisethesiege and run away;" and desiring the council to consider, That if they rais'd the siege, the alliance with England would be broken the same hour. Upon which it was resolved, contrary to their former intention, to give battle to the enemy, if they came on, and to maintain the siege. And the enemy coming on, a desperate fight ensued, in which the Spaniards were in a manner totally routed by the English, before the French came in. At the end of the pursuit, marshal Turenne, with above a hundred officers, came up to the English, alighted from their horses, and embracing the officers, said, "They never saw a more glorious action in their lives, "and that they were so transported with the sight of it, "that they had not power to move, or do any thing." The Spanish army being entirely vanquished, the confederates renew'd their attempts upon the town of Dunkirk with great vigour and industry; and the marquis de Leda the governor, being mortally wounded, as he was falling out upon the besiegers, the Spaniards within desired a present capitulation; which being granted, this important place was surrender'd upon articles, on the 25th of June; when it was immediately deliver'd up into the hands of the English by the French King and Cardinal.
A remarkable story setting forth the great policy and power of the Protector.

O L I V E R  C R O M W E L L.

1658.

And here I cannot omit the following story in relation to this affair, in which both the perfidiousness of the French court, and the policy and power of the English Lord Protector are very remarkably seen. It is thus related by Dr. Welwood. "When the French army being join'd with the English auxiliaries, was on its march to invest the town, Cromwell sent one morning for the French Ambassador to Whitehall, and upbraided him publicly for his master's designed breach of promise, in giving secret orders to the French general to keep possession of Dunkirk, in case it was taken, contrary to the treaty between them. The Ambassador protested he knew nothing of the matter, as indeed he did not, and begg'd leave to assure him, that there was no such thing thought of. Upon which Cromwell pulling a paper out of his pocket, Here (says he) is a copy of the cardinal's order: And I desire you to dispatch immediately an express, to let him know, that I am not to be imposed upon; and that if he delivers not up the keys of the town of Dunkirk to Lockhart within an hour after it shall be taken, I'll come in person and demand them at the gates of Paris. There were but four persons said to be privy to this order, the Queen-mother, the Cardinal, the Marshal de Turenne, and a Secretary. The Cardinal, for a long time, blam'd the Queen, as if she might possibly have blabb'd it out to some of her women: Whereas it was found after the secretary's death, that he had kept a secret correspondence with Cromwell for several years; and therefore it was not doubted but he had sent him the copy of the order above-mention'd. The message had its effect; for Dunkirk was put into the possession of the English: And to-palliate the matter (continues Welwood)
A solemn embassy to him from the French court.

1658.

The duke and marshal of Crequy was dispatched into England, ambassador extraordinary, to compliment Cromwell, attended with a numerous and splendid train of persons of quality; among whom was a Prince of the blood, and Mancini, Mazarine's nephew, who brought a letter from his uncle to the Protector, full of the highest expressions of respect, and assuring his Highness, That being within view of the English shore, nothing but the King's indig- position (who lay then ill of the small-pox at Calais) could have binder'd him to come over to England, that he might enjoy the honour of wait- ing upon one of the greatest men that ever was, and whom, next to his master, his greatest ambi- tion was to serve. But being depriv'd of so great a happiness, he had sent the person that was nearest to him in blood, to assure him of the profound veneration he bad for his person, and how much he was resolve'd, to the utmost of his power, to cultivate a perpetual amity and friendship betwixt his master and him.

Tho' Welwood tells us, this embassy was to palliate the business of Dunkirk, the author of the History of England during the reigns of the royal house of Stuart, says it was to return a compliment Cromwell paid the French King, on his arrival at Calais, just before Dunkirk was surrender'd; when his Highness sent the lord Falconbridge, his son-in-law, with a numerous and splendid retinue, of 150 gentlemen and servants, to con- gratulate that Monarch upon his coming into the neighbourhood of England. He also brought a letter from the Protector to the King, written with his own hand, and another to the Cardinal, pressling the reducing of Dunkirk, as a nest of pi- rates. His lordship had as much honour done him as could be paid to a sovereign prince. All rules in the ceremonials were pass'd over. The Cardinal Cardinal receiv'd him as he came out of his coach, and gave him the right hand in his apartment, which was never done to the imperial ambassador, or the pope's nuncio, and at which all the other foreign ministers grumbled. He was royally treated both by the King and the Cardinal, during the five days of his stay; and after he had taken his audience of leave, his Majesty presented him with a gold box inlaid with diamonds, the arms of France on the cover, and three large jewels for the three Flower-de-luces; on the inside was the King's picture set in diamonds; the whole of 5000 crowns value. And as his Excellency had presented the King with two sets of English horses, from the Lord Protector, and one set to the Cardinal; the King return'd a present of a sword, valu'd at 10,000 crowns; and the Cardinal sent his Highness a suit of tapestry hangings, wrought after the Persian manner in the Gobelins at Paris.

And hereupon, the Duke de Crequi (as was before mention'd) was dispatch'd into England by the French King, to compliment the Lord Protector. He was receiv'd at his landing at Dover by lieutenant-general Fleetwood, accompanied by several great officers in twenty coaches and six, one hundred life-guard, and two hundred horse, who all attended the Ambassador with swords drawn in their hands; besides above 150 gentlemen, who came with Fleetwood on horseback. The Protector met his Excellency at the third stair, and the next day entertain'd him at dinner, seating him at his right hand, and his son the lord Richard at his left. Some say, the Duke presented Cromwell with the keys of Dunkirk, telling him, His master took pleasure in parting with them to the greatest Captain upon earth. He stay'd six days, and at his departure, his Highness presented him with a sword, worth 3000 crowns, and a striking watch set with diamonds of the same value, with above 40 pieces of fine English broad-cloath. He gave also 30 gold watches to the officers and gentlemen of his retinue, and 1000 broad pieces
among his servants.

But as all worldly glory and prosperity must have an end, so our Protector's greatness, which expired only with his life, now drew near to a period. It has been observ'd by some, that tho'
after the dissolution of the last parliament, all things seem'd to succeed at home and abroad, according to his wish, and his power and greatness
to be better establish'd than ever; yet he never had that serenity of mind, after his refusal of the crown, that he before usually enjoy'd: that he was now much more apprehensive of danger to his person than he used to be, and the many plots and conspiracies against him, gave his mind great disturbance; insomuch that he grew very suspicio-sous, and more difficult of access, and was more rarely seen abroad than formerly. Bishop Burnet says, it was generally believ'd that his life and all his arts were exhausted at once, and that if he had liv'd much longer, he could not have held things together. However this be, 'tis certain he was greatly afflicted with the los of some of his family and friends, a little before his death. He seem'd
to be much troubled for the death of his friend,
the old earl of Warwick, with whom he had a fast friendship, tho' neither their humours nor their natures were very much alike; and the heir of that house, who had married his youngest daughter,
died about the same time; so that all his relation
to, and confidence in that family, was at an end.
But that which chiefly disturbed his peace, was
the death of his best beloved daughter, the lady Elizabeth Claypole, who is said to have earnestly interceded for Dr. Hewet's life, and yet in that only instance had a denial from her fond father.
She died at Hampton-Court on the 6th of Augus;
and her body being carried by water to Westminster, after lying in state in the Painted-Chamber, was solemnly interred in Henry the VIIth's chapel.

About a week after her death, the Protector, who had been ill about a fortnight before, grew considerably worse at Hampton-Court, whither he had retired with his council. His disease at first was a kind of tertian ague, which for some time continued under several appearances, with symptoms so favourable, that every other day he walk'd abroad in the palace garden: But now he began to be more confin'd; and about the end of August took his bed, and made a will relating to his private and domestick concerns. His fits still growing stronger, and his spirits weaker, he was remov'd from Hampton-Court to White-Hall (tho' Whitelock says he died at Hampton-Court.) Here he soon appear'd to be delirious, and his physicians began to think him in real danger; tho' his chaplains seem'd still to assure themselves of his recovery; insomuch that Dr. Thomas Goodwin, in his prayer to God for him, is said to have express'd himself thus, That they ask'd not for his life; for they were assur'd he had too great things for this man to do, to remove him yet; but they pray'd for his speedy recovery, because his life and presence were so necessary to divers things then of great moment to be dispatch'd. His sickness still increasing, so that he seem'd to be drawing near his end, those of his council being alarm'd, came to put him in mind to nominate his successor, according to the Humble petition and advice. But he being now almost in a lethargy, and not answering to the purpose, they ask'd him again, whether 'twas his will that his eldest son Richard should succeed him in the Protectorship; to which 'twas said he answer'd, Yes. Ludlow says, the commissioners of the great seal attended for signing the declaration of the person to be appointed his successor; but whether he was
was unwilling to discover his intentions to leave the succession to his son, left thereby he should, in case of recovery, disoblige others whom he had put in expectation of that power; or whether he was so dispos'd in body and mind, that he could not attend that matter; or lastly, whether he would have named, or did name any other, is uncertain: but certain it is, that the commissioners were not admitted till the Friday following, when the symptoms of death were apparent upon him. Others give this account of the Protector's last sickness, and the business of a successor: That after Cromwell had been some time ill, a malignant humour broke out in his foot, which hindering him from the exercise of walking or riding abroad, he oblig'd his physicians to endeavour to disperse it, which they attempting to do, drove it upwards to his heart; by which means he became desperately sick, and in the beginning of September the symptoms of death appear'd upon him; and asking one of his physicians, what he thought of his case? the doctor answer'd, My Lord, there is no more oil in that lamp which has given so much light to both church and state. The dying Protector replied with a magnanimity worthy of him, When do you think it will go out? The physician told him, In two days at farthest: Upon which Cromwell said, It is time then to settle my mind, and provide for the safety of the state. Accordingly he sent for his council, and recommended to them the choice of a successor, tho' by the Humble petition and advice he might nominate one himself, which it was expected he would have done. The author of the History of England, during the reigns of the royal house of Stuart, says, lieutenant-general Fleetwood did, without doubt, expect to have been declared successor to Cromwell, and without doubt had been so promis'd by his father in-law; and he farther says, his manuscript author, who had his memoirs from the
the earl of Orrery (the famous lord Brogbill in Cromwell's time) affirms Oliver made Fleetwood his heir; but one of his daughters knowing where his will was, took it away and burnt it, before Fleetwood could come at it: And a few minutes before Cromwell's death, when he was ask'd, Who should succeed him, he reply'd, In such a drawer of the cabinet, in my closet, you will find it. Fleetwood found himself trick'd, and the whole council against him; so he fell in with them, waiting an opportunity to right or revenge himself. However this was, on the third of September (his beloved and victorious day, on which he had twice triumph'd for two of his greatest victories, at Dunbar and Worcester) about three in the afternoon, the Protector expired; on which day, or, as some say, the day before, there happen'd the most violent storm of wind that had ever been known; which I have not so strong a fancy as to imagine, with a certain author, was any thing preternatural; any more than I can believe the prediction of colonel Lindsey as to the day of the Protector's death, which is founded upon the story of his making league with the devil; a story, which, by the very silliness of the relation, sufficiently confutes itself.

Thus the famous Oliver Cromwell, after so many great actions, so many toils and fatigues, and so many plots and conspiracies against his life, at last died quietly in his bed. He expired in the sixtieth year of his age, five years four months and fourteen days after the dissolution of the long parliament, four years eight months and eighteen days after he had been declared Protector by the Instrument of government, and but one year three months and nine days, after his being confirmed in that office by the Humble petition and advice.

Thus having given a faithful account of the actions of this great man, I might leave every one to judge of his character from thence: However, it may may not be amis to take a short view of it. As to his person, he had a manly stern look, and was of an active healthful constitution, able to endure the greatest toil and fatigue. When he appear'd first in the parliament, he made no great figure, there seemed to be nothing extraordinary in him; he discover'd none of those talents which use to gain applause, and work upon the affections of the hearers and standers by; yet as he grew into place and authority, his parts seem'd to be rais'd, as if he had faculties that lay conceal'd, 'till he had occasion to use them; and when he was to act the part of a great man, he did it without any indecency, notwithstanding the want of custom. His conversation among his friends was very diverting and familiar, but in publick reserv'd and grave. He used often to consult with the Lord Brogbill, Pierpoint, Whitelock, Sir Charles Walsley and Thurlloe; and would be shut up three or four hours together with them in private discourse, and none were admitted to come in to him: He would sometimes be very chearful, and laying aside his greatness, would be exceeding familiar; and by way of diversion would make Verses with them, and every one must try his fancy: He commonly call'd for tobacco, pipes, and a candle, and would now and then take a pipe himself; then he would fall again to his great and serious business, and would advise with them about his weighty and important affairs.

He affected, for the most part, a plainness in his clothes; but in them, as well as in his guards and attendance, he appear'd with magnificence upon publick occasions. He was very temperate, sparing in his diet, and tho' sometimes he would drink freely, yet never to excess: He was moderate in all other pleasures, and after his first reformation, free from all visible immoralities, and seem'd to be a great enemy to vice, and a lover of
Oliver Cromwell. 383

Of virtue, always taking care to suppress the former, and encourage the latter. He writ a tolerable good hand, and a style becoming a gentleman, except when he used to cant, which, whether it was affected or sincere, I leave others to judge. His speeches were for the most part ambiguous, especially in publick meetings, wherein he rather left others to pick out his meaning, than told them himself; tho' at other times he sufficiently shew'd he could command his style according as there was occasion, and would deliver himself with such a force and strength of expression, that 'twas commonly said, That every word he spoke was a thing. He loved men of wit, and was a great admirer of musick, entertaining the most skilful in that science in his pay and family. He respected all persons that excelled in any art, and would procure them to be sent or brought to him. He was very well read in the Greek and Roman story; but 'tis very obvious, that in governing these nations, he studied men more than books, so that his turn was served in all offices. No man was ever better serv'd, nor took more pains to be so: No man more cunningly div'd into the manners of men, and into the tempers of those whom he had any thing to do with, nor sooner discover'd their talents. And if he came to hear of a man fit for his purpose, tho' ever so obscure, he sent for him, and employ'd him; suiting the employment to the person, and not the person to the employment; and upon this maxim in his government depended, in a great measure, his success.

He had undoubtedly a wonderful knowledge of men, and by his great penetration could soon discover their abilities and qualifications: An instance of which we have in Dr. Calamy's Life of Mr. Howe. He tells us, that Mr. Howe having occasion to come to London, had a mind to to hear a sermon at White-ball, on the last Sunday he design'd to stay in town. The Protector seeing him, knew him to be a country minister by his habit; and discerning something more than ordinary in his looks, sent a messenger to him, defiring to speak with him after the service was over. Mr. Howe waiting upon him accordingly, the Protector desir'd him to preach before him
the next Lord's-day; and told him it was in vain to attempt to excuse himself, for that he would take no denial. Mr. Howe pleaded, that his people expected him, and would be uneasy if he staid any longer from them: But Cromwell undertook to write to them himself, and to dispatch one to supply his place, which he actually did; and Mr.
Howe preach'd before him as he was desir'd. Cromwell press'd him to do the same a second and a third time; and after much free conversation in private, nothing would satisfy him but he must be his household chaplain; and he promised to take care that his place should be supply'd at Torrinton to the people's content. Mr. Howe was highly respected by the Protector, and had a great in-tereat in him; though he was once like to lose his favour, upon the following occasion (as related by the above-mentioned author.) The notion of a particular faith in prayer, carry'd even as far as to inspiration itself, prevailed much in Cromwell's court; and great pains were taken to cultivate and support it. Mr. Howe having heard a sermon
from a noted person, in defence of this notion, resolv'd the next time his turn came to preach before the Protector, to oppose such spiritual pride and confidence. Cromwell heard him with great attention; but would sometimes knit his brows,
and discover great uneasiness. After the sermon,
a person of distinction came to him, and ask'd if he knew what he had done; and signified his apprehension, that the Protector would be so offended
at
Oliver Cromwell.

at that discourse, that he would find it a hard matter ever to make his peace with him, or secure his favour for the future: And Mr. Howe himself afterwards observ'd, that Cromwell was cooler in his carriage to him than before; tho' he never mention'd the sermon to him.

To return to his character: He had a rare faculty of examining and winding about the minds of all, even his enemies, which he could beset with innumerable snares and artifices. He often made feasts for the inferior officers of the army, and as they were eating, he would order the drums to beat, and call in his foot-guards, to fall on and snatch off the meat from the table before they had half done; after which, to make farther diversion, he would proceed to throwing of cushions, putting burning coals into their boots and pockets, and a hundred such pranks. And when the officers had sufficiently tir'd themselves with laughing and sporting in that manner, he would wheedle them to open their hearts, and so draw from them some secrets of the greatest moment; while himself, founding the opinions of others, artfully conceal'd his own. He had an absolute command over all his passions and affections, so that he could suit his carriage to all companies and occasions. He would sometimes be very merry and jocund with some of the nobility, and would then take occasion to tell them what company they had lately kept, and when and where they had drank the King and royal family's health; advising them, when they did it again, to do it more privately; and this without the least sign of passion, but in a way of mirth and drollery.

Having entertain'd some jealousy of general Monk in Scotland, he, a little before his death, wrote a letter to him with his own hand. The body of the letter contain'd only some general matters relating to the government; but after his usual drolling manner, he subjoin'd this by way of postscript, which which was indeed the main occasion of the letter: There be that tell me, that there is a certain cunning fellow in Scotland called George Monk, who is said to lie in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart; I pray use your diligence to apprehend him, and send him up to me.
The LIFE of

ALL allow he was an extraordinary genius, and master of the most refin’d policy; that he had a great spirit, a wonderful circumspection and sagacity, and a most magnanimous resolution. His courage and conduct in the field were undoubtedly admirable; he had a greatness of soul, which the greatest dangers and difficulties rather animated than discourag’d; and his discipline and government of the army was in all respects such as might become the most renown’d and accomplish’d General. “He must, says the lord Clarendon, have had a wonderful understanding in the natures and humours of men, and as great a dexterity in applying them, who, from a private and obscure birth (tho’ of a good family) without interest or estate, alliance or friendship, could raise himself to such a height, and compound and knead such opposite and contradictory tempers, humours, and interests, into a confidance that contributed to his designs, and to their own destruction, whilst himself grew insensibly powerful enough to cut off those by whom he had climb’d, in the instant that they projected to demolish their own building.”

AMBITIOUS he certainly was to a very high degree, and yet at the same time seem’d to have a passionate regard to the publick good: And if this was really the case, the former seems to have so far blinded him, as to make him think many things were for the publick good which really were not so: But how far the necessity of affairs, and the confusion and unsettled state the nation was then in; how far this extraordinary case, I say, might justify justify such proceedings in some instances, in order to prevent greater confusions and distractions; or whether this was really Cromwell’s design in those proceedings, I leave the reader to judge. But whatever censure we are to pass upon his actions of this kind, it is allow’d by all, even by his enemies, that he perform’d many great and laudable things to the honour and advantage of the nation. One of them reckons them up thus: 1. By Blake he more humbled and subdu’d the Algerine, Tripoli and Tunis pirates, than ever any before or since did.
2. Westminster-ball was never replenish’d with more learned and upright judges than by him;
nor was justice, either in law or equity, in civil cases, more equally distributed, where he was not a party. 3. When the Norway traders represented to him the mischief and inconveniences of the act of navigation, he, during his time, dispensed with it, and permitted the English to trade to Norway for timber, masts, pitch, tar, and iron, as before the act: And by a law made
in his third parliament, license is given to transport fish in foreign bottoms. 4. Tho’ he play’d
the fool in making war with Spain, and peace
with France, yet he made a more advantageous
treaty of commerce for the English to France, than before they had. 5. Tho’ he join’d forces with the French against the Spaniards, yet he reserv’d the sea-towns conquer’d from the Spaniard, to himself, and so had Dunkirk and Mar-dyke deliver’d up to him; and would have had Ostend, if the garison had not cheated both Mazarine and him; thereby to be arbitrator over the French, as well as Spaniards, when he pleased. 6. Cromwell outv’y’d the best of our Kings, in rendring our laws to the subject in the English tongue: For tho’ Edward I. permitted
pleading in the English tongue, yet he went no farther; whereas Cromwell render’d not only
"the pleadings, but practice, and laws themselves into English." In short, he apply'd himself so industriously to the business of the commonwealth, and discover'd such abilities for managing it, that his greatest enemies acknowledg'd he was not unworthy of the government, if his way to it had been just and innocent. And he shew'd his good understanding in nothing more, than in seeking out capable and worthy men for all employments, but more particularly for the courts of law, which gave a general satisfaction.

Tho' he was brave in his person, yet he was wary in his conduct; for from the time he was first declar'd Protector, he always wore a coat of mail under his clothes. He was very cautious and reserv'd whenever there was occasion, and in matters of greatest moment trusted none but his secretary Tburlooe, and oftentimes not him; an instance of which the secretary us'd to tell of himself: "That he was once commanded by Cromwell to go at a certain hour to Gray's-Inn, and at such a place deliver a bill of 20,000 l. payable to the bearer at Genoa, to a man he should find walking in such a habit and posture as he describ'd him, without speaking a word." Tburlooe did as he was order'd, and never knew to his dying-day either the person or the occasion. At another time the Protector came late at night to Tburloee's office, to give him directions about something of great importance and secrecy; which having done, he observ'd that Mr. Moreland, one of the clerks, was in the room, seeming to be asleep upon his desk; but suspecting that he might not really be so, and that he might have over-heard their discourse, he presently drew a poniard, which he always carried under his coat, and would have dispatch'd him upon the spot, if Tburlooe had not earnestly in- treated him to desist, and assur'd him, that Moreland having fast up two nights together, was now certainly fast asleep.
Oliver Cromwell.

No Prince seem'd to be master of so much, and so particular intelligence as Cromwell; of which I have given some remarkable instances in the foregoing history, and shall here add one more, as wonderful as any of the rest: A gentleman who had serv'd the late King, desire'd leave of the Protector to travel, and obtain'd it, on condition he should not see Charles Stuart. Accordingly arriving at Cologn, he sent to desire of the King that he might wait on him by night, which was agreed to. And when he had fully discours'd of the business he came about, he took leave, having receiv'd a letter which he sew'd within the crown of his hat. Upon his return to England, he came with confidence to the Protector; and being ask'd by him, If be had punctually perform'd his promise? he answer'd, that be bad: But, said his Highness, Who was it that put out the candles when you spoke to Charles Stuart? The gentleman was startled at this unexpected question; and the Protector farther demanding, What be said to him, he answer'd, Nothing at all. Did be not send a letter by you then? said Cromwell; and the gentlemen denying that also, Cromwell took his hat, and having found the letter, sent him immediately to the Tower.

His maintaining the honour of the nation in all foreign parts, gratify'd the temper which is very natural to Englishmen. Of this he was so careful, that tho' he was not a crown'd head, yet his ambassadors had all the respects and honours paid them, which our Kings ambassadors ever had. He would say, That the dignity of the crown was upon the account of the nation, of which the King was only the representative head; and therefore the nation being still the same, he would have the same respect paid to his ministers. And 'tis very observable, that Lockhart, Cromwell's ambassador in France, and governour of Dunkirk, told Bishop Burnet, That when he was sent afterwards ambassador by King Charles,
Charles, he found he had nothing of that regard that was paid him in Cromwell's time.

The regard he had to the commerce of the nation, his care to protect it from foreign insults, and speedy method of obtaining satisfaction and reparation for injured merchants, appears by the following remarkable instance: An English merchant-ship was taken in the chops of the channel, carried into St. Maloës, and there confiscated upon some groundless pretence. As soon as the master of the ship got home, he presented a petition to the Protector in council, setting forth his case, and praying for redress. Upon hearing the petition, the Protector told his council, he would take that affair upon himself, and order'd the man to attend him next morning. He examin'd him strictly as to all the circumstances of his case, and finding, by his answers, that he was a plain honest man, and that he had been concern'd in no unlawful trade, he ask'd him, if he could go to Paris with a letter? The man answer'd he could. Well then, says the Protector, prepare for your journey, and come to me to-morrow morning. He accordingly went, and Cromwell gave him a letter to Cardinal Mazarine, and told him he must stay but three days for an answer. The answer I mean, says he, is, the full value of what you might have made of your ship and cargo; and tell the Cardinal, that if it is not paid you in three days, you have express orders from me to return home. The man did as he was directed, and upon the Cardinal's shuffling with him, return'd as he was order'd. As soon as the Protector saw him, he ask'd him if he had got his money? And upon his answering, he had not, the Protector said to him, then leave your direction with my secretary, and you shall soon hear from me. Tho' there was a French minister residing here, Cromwell did not so much as acquaint him with the affair, but immediately sent a man of war, or or two to the channel, with orders to seize every French ship they could meet with. Accordingly they return'd in a few days with two or three French prizes, which the Protector order'd to be immediately sold, and out of the produce, he paid the merchant what he demanded for his ship and cargo. Then he sent for the French minister, gave him an account of what had happen'd, and told him there was a balance, which, if he pleas'd, should be paid in to him, to the end that he might deliver it to those of his countrymen, who were the owners of the French ships that had been so taken and sold.

Few Princes ever bore their character higher up-on all occasions than our Protector, especially in his treaties with crown'd heads. And 'tis a thing without example that's related by one of the best inform'd historians of the age, namely, Puffendorf, in his Life of the Elector of Brandenburg, That in Cromwell's league with France against Spain, he would not allow the French King to call himself King of France, but King of the French; whereas he took to himself not only the title of Protector of England, but likewise of France: And which is yet more surprizing, in the instrument of the treaty, the Protector's name was put before the French King's. France indeed was then under a minority, and was not arriv'd to that power and greatness, which it afterwards attain'd to; towards which our Protector contributed not a little, by that alliance with France against Spain, which is generally reckon'd the falsest step he ever made, with respect to the repose of Europe, and for which he has been highly reflect'd on. But I shall here set down, in his behalf, what Sir William Temple writes concerning him on this occasion, in the third part of his Memoirs.

"Cardinal Mazarine, says that author, hav-ing surmounted his own dangers, and the difficulties incident to a minority, pursu'd the plan left him by his predecessor (viz. Cardinal Rich-and by his measures taken with Cromwell, and the assistance of an immortal body of 6000 brave English, which, by agreement, were to be continually recruited, he made such a progress in Flanders, that Cromwell soon perceiv'd the balance turn'd, and was grown too heavy on the French side: Whereupon he dispatch'd a gentleman privately to Madrid, to propose there a change of his treaty with France, into one with Spain; by which he would draw his forces over into their service, and make them 10,000, to be continually recruited, upon condition their first action should be to besiege Calais, and when taken, to put it into his hands. The person sent upon this errand, was past the Pyrenees, when he was overtaken by the news of Cromwell's death: Whereupon Mazarine having not only lost his strongest support in Flanders, but observ'd how his design would never be serv'd by any measures he could take with England, however it should be govern'd, resolv'd upon a peace with Spain, and made it at the Pyrenees.

C C.4  lieu ;)

CROMWELL's influence was so great in France, that the Cardinal durst not deny him anything; which he took very hard, and complain'd of to those he could be freewith. He one day made a visit to Madam Turenne, and when he took his leave of her, she, as she was wont to do, besought him to continue gracious to the churches. Upon which Mazarine told her, "That he knew not how to behave himself. If he advis'd the King to punish and suppress their insolence, Cromwell threaten'd him to join with the Spaniard; and if he shew'd any favour to them, at Rome they accounted him an Heretick." 'Twas said, that the Cardinal would change countenance, when he heard Cromwell nam'd; so that it pass'd into a proverb in France, That he was not so much afraid of the devil as of Oliver Cromwell.
SPAIN dreaded him, and courted his friendship, as much as France, tho' the latter prevail'd. When the Spanish ambassador was inform'd, that the fleet under Penn and Venables was gone towards the West-Indies, and that the storm was likely to fall upon some of his master's territories, he applied himself to the Protector, to know whether he had any just ground of complaint against the King his master; if so, if he was ready to give him all possible satisfaction. The Protector demanded a liberty to trade to the Spanish West-Indies, and the repeal of the laws of the Inquisition: To which the ambassador reply'd, That his master had but two eyes, and that he would have him to put them both out at once.

The States of Holland so dreaded him, that they were very careful to give him no manner of umbrage: And when at any time the King or his brothers came to see their sister, the Princess of Orange, within a day or two they us'd to send a deputation to acquaint them, that Cromwell had oblig'd them to give them no harbour. When King Charles was seeking for a pretext for a war with the Dutch, in 1672, he made this one, That they suffered some of his rebellious subjects to live in their country. Borel their ambassador answer'd, That it was a maxim of long standing among them, not to enquire upon what account strangers came to live in their dominions, but to entertain them all, unless they had been guilty of conspiring against the persons of Princes. The King thereupon telling him, how they had us'd him and his brothers, the ambassador with much simplicity answer'd, Alas, Sir, that was another thing: Cromwell was a great man, and made himself be fear'd both by land and sea. To which the King reply'd, I'll make myself be fear'd too in my turn. But, as is observ'd, he was scarce as good as his word.
Even the Turks stood in awe of Cromwell, and durst not offend him. And all Italy trembled at his name, and seem'd under a pannick fear as long as he liv'd. When admiral Blake sail'd into the Mediterranean, the city of Rome, and all the Pope's territories were greatly alarm'd; and the terror of the people was such, that publick processions were made, and the Hoft was expos'd forty hours, to avert the wrath of heaven, and prevent Blake's attacking the dominions of the church. And indeed we are told, that Cromwell used to say, That bis ships in the Mediterranean fshould visit Civita Vecchia, and the found of bis cannon fshould be heard in Rome. But in the midst of this power and grandeur, death put an end to all his high projects and daring designs.

I shall now finifh this work with a particular account of the magnificent funeral of this great man. The corps, at least in appearance, was on the 26th of September at night, privately remov'd from Whitehall in a mourning hearse, attended by his domestick servants, to Somerset-house. A few days after, his effigy was, with great state and magnificence, expos'd openly, multitudes daily flocking to fee the fight, which appear'd in this order. The first room was wholly hung with black; at the upper end of which, was plac'd a cloth and chair of state. In like manner were the second and third rooms, all having scutcheons very thick upon the walls, and guards of partizans for people to pass thro'. The fourth room was compleatly hung with black velvet, the ceiling being also cover'd with the fame. Here lay the effigy under a noble canopy of black velvet, apparell'd in the moft magnificent robes, lac'd with gold, and furr'd with ermines, with a fcepter in one hand, and a globe in the other, and a fword hanging by its fide, and a rich cap on the head, fuitable to the robes.
Oliver Cromwell.

Behind the head was placed a chair and cushion of tiffu'd gold, in which lay an imperial crown, beset with diamonds and other precious stones. The bed of state on which the effigy lay, was cover'd with a large pall of black velvet, under which was a Holland sheet, born up by six stools cover'd with cloth of gold. The bed was inclos'd with rails and balusters, and, besides solemn mourners, surrounded with banners, banrods, and all kinds of trophies of military honours. Within the rails stood eight silver candlesticks about five foot high, with white wax-tapers standing in them, of three foot long. At each corner of the rails was erected an upright pillar, which bore on their tops lions and dragons, holding in their paws streamers crowned. The effigy having for some weeks continued in this posture, on the first of November was remov'd into the great hall, where with new ornaments and ceremony it was plac'd, standing upon an ascent under a cloth of state, with the imperial crown upon the head. Four or five hundred candles set in flat shining candlesticks, were so plac'd round near the roof of the hall, that the light they gave seem'd like the rays of the sun; by all which his late Highness was represent'd as now in a state of glory.

Having remain'd thus till the 23d of November, the waxen effigy of the Protector, with the crown on his head, sword by his side, globe and scepter in his hands, was plac'd in a stately open chariot, cover'd all over with black velvet, and drawn by six horses cover'd with the same, both chariot and horses being adorn'd with plumes and other ornaments. The streets from Somerset-House to Westminster-Abby, were guarded on both sides of the way by soldiers in new red coats and black buttons, with their ensigns wrapp'd in cypres. The procession was in the following manner: First of all went a marshal attended by his deputy, and thirteen more on horse-back, to clear the way. After these follow'd the poor men of Westminster by two and two, in mourning gowns and hoods; and next to them, the servants of those persons of quality that attended the funeral. Then came the Protector's late domestic servants, with his barge-men and watermen, follow'd by the servants of the Lord-mayor and Sheriffs of London; after whom follow'd the gentlemen attendants on foreign ambassadors and publick ministers. After these march'd the poor knights of Windsor in gowns and hoods; then the clerks, secretaries, and officers of the army, admiralty, treasury, navy, and exchequer; next, the commissioners of the excise, of the army, and committee of the navy. Then march'd the commissioners for approbation of preachers, and behind them, all the officers, messengers, and clerks belonging to the privy-council, and both houses of parliament. Next in order follow'd his late Highness's physicians, the head officers of the army, the officers and aldermen of London, the masters of Chancery, and the Protector's council at law; the judges of admiralty, judges in Wales, and master of requests; the barons of the exchequer, judges of both benches, and the Lord-mayor of London; the persons ally'd in blood to the Protector, and the members of the late Other House; the publick ministers of foreign princes, the Dutch ambassador alone, having his train held up by four gentlemen; then the Portugal ambassador, and the French ambassador in like manner; the lords commissioners of the great seal, the commissioners of the treasury, and his Highness's privy-council. These all mov'd in a solemn and pompous procession, each division or company being distinguish'd by drums, trumpets, banners, and led horses.
Then came the chariot with the effigy, on each side of which were six banrods born by several persons; and likewise several pieces of the Protector's armour, carried by eight officers of the army, attended by the heralds. Next went garter, principal king at arms, attended by a gentleman on each hand bare-headed; and then came the chief mourner. After which followed the horse of honour, in very rich trappings embroidered on crimson velvet, and adorned with white, red, and yellow plumes, being led by the master of the horse. The rear of this noble show was brought up by the protector's guard of halberdiers, the warders of the Tower, and troop of horse. The effigy being brought in this manner to the west end of the Abby church, was taken from the chariot by ten gentlemen, and carried through the church under a canopy of state up to the east end, where it was placed in a most magnificent structure built for that purpose, to remain for a certain time exposed to public view.

After all, as the Author of the Compleat History of England observes in his notes, it remains a question, where his body was really buried: It was, says he, in appearance, in Westminster-Abby; some report it was carried below bridge, and thrown into the Thames; but 'tis most probable that 'twas buried in Naseby Field. This account, continues he, is given, as averred, and ready to be depos'd, if occasion requir'd, by Mr. Barkstead, son to Barkstead the regicide, who was about fifteen years old at the time of Cromwell's death: "That the said Barkstead his father, being lieutenant of the Tower, and a great confidant of Cromwell's, did, among other such confidants, in the time of his illness, desire to know where he would be bury'd: To which the Protector answer'd, Where he had obtain'd the greatest victory and glory,"
The LIFE of

"glory, and as nigh the spot as could be guessed where the heat of the action was, viz. in the field at Najeby, Com' Northampton. Which accordingly was thus perform'd: At midnight, soon after his death, the body (being first embalm'd and wrapt in a leaden coffin) was in a hearse convey'd to the said field, Mr. Barkstead himself attending, by order of his father, close to the hearse: Being come to the field, they found, about the midst of it, a grave dug about nine foot deep, with the green sod carefully laid on one side, and the mould on the other; in which the coffin being put, the grave was instantly fill'd up, and the green sod laid exactly flat upon it, care being taken that the surplus mould should be clean remov'd. Soon after the like care was taken that the field should be entirely plough'd up, and it was sown three or four years corn." Several other material circumstances, says the fore-mention'd author, Barkstead (who now frequents Richard's coffeehoule within Temple-Bar) relates, too long to be here inserted.

It is, I think, pretty certain, that Oliver's corpse was not really interr'd in Westminster-Abbey; and consequently, that it was not his body that was afterwards taken up and hang'd at Tyburn for his: But whether this account of its being buried in Najeby Field, or the other of its being sunk in the Thames, is most probable, I cannot say. What is said for the former, we have seen; and the other was related by a Gentlewoman who attended Oliver in his last sickness, as we are told by the author of the History of England during the Reigns of the Royal House of Stuart. She told him, that the day after the Protector's death, it was consultled how to dispose of his corpse; when it was concluded, that considering the the malice of the cavaliers, it was most certain they would insult the body of their most dreadful enemy, if ever it should be in their power; to prevent which, it was resolved to wrap it up in lead, to put it on board a barge, and sink it in the deepest part of the Thames: which was undertaken and performed by two of his near relations, and some trusty soldiers, the following night.
A POEM
Upon the DEATH of
OLIVER CROMWELL,
LORD-PROTECTOR:
Alluding to the STORM that happen'd about that Time.

By Mr. WALLER.

E must resign! heav'n his great soul does claim
In Storms as loud as his immortal fame;
His dying groans, his last breath, shake our isle,
And trees uncut fall for his fun'r'al pile:
About his palace their broad roots are tost
Into the air: So Romulus was loft:
New Rome in such a tempest mis'd her King,
And from obeying, fell to worshipping.
A P O E M.

On Oeta's top thus Hercules lay dead,
With ruin'd oaks and pines about him spread;
Those his last fury from the mountain rent:
Our dying hero, from the continent
Ravish'd whole towns, and forts from Spaniards rest,
As his last legacy to Britain left.

The ocean, which so long our hopes confin'd,
Cou'd give no limits to his vaster mind:
Our bounds enlargement was his latest toil;
Nor hath he left us pris'ners to our isle:
Under the tropick is our language spoke,
And part of Flanders hath receiv'd our yoke.

From civil broils he did us disengage;
Found nobler objects for our martial rage:
And with wise conduct, to his country show'd
The ancient way of conquering abroad.

Ungrateful then, if we no tears allow
To him that gave us peace and empire too!
Princes that fear'd him, grieve, concern'd to see
No pitch of glory from the grave is free.
Nature herself took notice of his death,
And, sighing, swell'd the sea with such a breath,
That to remotest shores her billows roll'd,
Th'approaching fate of their great ruler told.
APPENDIX, CONTAINING

Some Account of the PROTECTOR's CHILDREN, and of the State of Affairs till the KING's Restoration.

The Protector had three sons, Oliver, Richard and Henry. Oliver died young. Richard married Dorothy eldest daughter of Richard Major, Esq; of Hurst in Hampshire; where he liv'd a private life during the greatest part of his father's government; but towards the latter end of it, he was sent for by him to come to court, and made one of his privy council, and soon after was chosen by the university of Oxford to be their chancellor, with which honour he was very solemnly install'd at Whitehall. He was said to be nominated by his father for his successor, tho' the truth of it was very much questioned; and 'twas thought he never design'd him for it, having scarce made any step towards training him up to it. However, upon his father's death, he was solemnly proclaim'd Protector all over England, &c. in the following form of words:

"Whereas it hath pleased the most wise God, in his providence, to take out of this world the most serene and renowned Oliver, late Lord Protector of this commonwealth: And his Highness having in his life-time, according to the Humble Petition and Advice, declared and appointed the most noble and illustrious the Lord Richard,} “Richard, eldest son of his said late Highness, to succeed him in the government of these nations: We therefore of the privy council, together with the Lord-mayor, aldermen and citizens of London, the officers of the army, and numbers of other principal gentlemen, do now hereby, with one full voice and consent of tongue and heart, publish and declare the said noble and illustrious Lord Richard to be rightfully Protector of this commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging; to whom we acknowledge all fidelity and constant obedience, according to law, and the said Humble Petition and Advice, with all hearty and humble affections, beseeching the Lord, by whom Princes rule, to bless him with long life, and these nations with peace and happiness under his government.”

Richard was congratulated hereupon by addresses from all parts of the three kingdoms, declaring their resolutions to stand by him with their lives and fortunes. But the officers of the army being divided among themselves, and the republican party in particular labouring to undetermine him, and restore their beloved commonwealth, he found himself necessitated to call a Parliament. A Parliament was accordingly summoned, which Richard met on the 27th of January, with the same state that the English Monarchs and his Father had done before him. They had not sat long before great differences and contentions arose between them and the army; so that the officers being informed that some votes were pass’d in opposition to their designs, immediately sent Fleetwood and Desborough to the Protector, to advise him forthwith to dissolve the parliament. Fleetwood alleged’d, That if this were not presently done, the nation would certainly be involved in blood. Desborough, who was of a rougher temper, told him, ’Twas impossible...
fible for him to keep both Parliament and Army his friends; and desired him to choose which he would prefer: If he dissolved the Parliament out of hand, he had the Army at his devotion; if he refused that, he believed the Army would quickly pull him out of Whitehall. On the other hand, many members assured him, that the Parliament would continue firm to him, if he would but adhere to them: Some officers of the Army likewise, as Ingoldsby, Whalley, Gough, and Howard, offered to stand by him against those who were called the General Council of the Army; and Howard in particular earnestly pressed him to exert himself by some vigorous action, such as supported his father's authority to the last: You are Cromwell's son, said he, show yourself worthy of that name: This business requires a bold stroke, supported by a good hand; do not suffer yourself to be daunted, and my head shall answer for the consequence. Fleetwood, Lambert, Desborough, and Vane, are the contrivers of this; I will rid you of them; do but stand by me, and second my zeal with your name. Richard answer'd, That he did not love blood; and being a man of an irresolute temper, was at last prevail'd on by the opposite party to dissolve the Parliament.

Having got rid of the Parliament, the council of officers were for laying Richard aside too; and so they prevail'd the remnant of the Long Parliament, which Oliver had ejected, to their seats again; and Richard, after a reign of about seven months and twenty days, return'd to his former private life. When he was quitting his palace of Whitehall, he order'd his servants to be very careful of two old trunks which stood in his wardrobe. The men wonder'd at this; and one of his friends hearing him enquire very earnestly after them, ask'd him what was in them that made him so much concern'd about them? Why, no less, said Richard, than the lives and fortunes of all the good people of England;
England; meaning the numberless addresses that were presented to him.

The Long Parliament having sat about five months, were again put down by the ambitious Lambert; and about three months after were again restor'd, by means of the soldiers revolting from their leaders, and declaring for the Parliament, and the interposition of general Monk, who now march'd out of Scotland, and finding the spirit of the people generally run that way, restor'd the secluded members also to their seats again. This made such an alteration in this assembly, that they soon dissolv'd themselves, having order'd a new Parliament to be summon'd; which Parliament meeting on April 25, 1660, in about a month's time brought in the KING.

The Lord Clarendon tells the following story of Richard Cromwell: That soon after the King's restoration, he found himself under a necessity of retiring into France; and having continu'd some years in obscurity at Paris, upon the first rumour of a war like to break out between England and France, he thought fit to leave that kingdom, and remove to Geneva. Taking his journey thither by Bourdeaux, and thro' the province of Languedoc, he went thro' Pezenas, a town belonging to the Prince of Conti, then Governor of Languedoc, who made his residence there. Staying some time in this place, he happen'd to meet with an old acquaintance of his father's, and his party; who told him, That the Prince of Conti expelld all strangers who came to that town to wait on him, and that he treated all, particularly the English, with great civility; that he need not be known, but that himself would inform the Prince that another English gentleman was passing thro' the town, who would be glad to have the honour of kissing his hand. The Prince, as his manner was, receiv'd him very civilly; and began to discourse with him about the English affairs, asking several several questions about the King, and whether all quietly submitted to his government; and in the end said, Well, that Oliver, tho' he was a traitor and a villain, was a brave man, had great parts, great courage, and was worthy to command; but that Richard, that coxcomb and poltroon, was surely the basest fellow alive; what is become of that fool? How was it possible he could be such a fo? He answer'd, That he was betray'd by those he was trusted, and who had been most obliged by his father; and so having no great pleasure of his visit, soon took his leave, and the next morning left the town. And about two days after, the Prince came to know that it was Richard himself, whom he had talk'd to after that manner. Richard some years before the death of King Charles II. return'd to England; and having lived to a great age, as a remarkable example of the security of innocence, and the instability of human greatness, he died at Cheshunt in Hertfordshire, in the year 1712.

O L I V E R's third son, Henry, married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Sir Francis Ruffel of Chippenham in Cambridgeshire, and was by his father made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; where his deportment rendered him very popular, and he managed the government with so much discretion, that in a small time he brought that disorder'd nation into the most hopeful condition of a flourishing state: But being call'd away by the Long Parliament, upon his brother's submission, he would not offer to resist, but quietly laid down his charge. And thus ended the majesty and glory of the Cromwell family, which had made, not only its own, but all neighbouring nations to tremble.

T H E Protector had four daughters, Bridget, Elizabeth, Mary, and Frances. Bridget was married first to Henry Ireton, whom Cromwell left his deputy in Ireland, and of whom so much has been said in the former part of this history, and he dying, ing, she was afterwards married to lieutenant-general Fleetwood. Elizabeth was married to Mr. John Cleypole, and dy'd a little before her father: Whitelock says she was a lady of excellent parts, dear to her parents, civil to all persons, and courteous and friendly to all gentlemen of her acquaintance; and that her death did much grieve her father. Mary, his third daughter was married to Thomas lord viscount Fauconberg, afterwards created Earl by King William: She had the character of a wife and worthy woman, and was thought more likely to have maintain'd the post than either of her brothers; whence it is commonly said, That those who wore breeches, deserved Petticoats better; but if those in Petticoats (meaning her) had been in breeches, they would have held faster. Frances, the youngest daughter, was married first to Mr. Robert Rich, grandson and heir of the Earl of Warwick; and afterwards to Sir John Russel of Chippenham in Cambridgeshire: She was also a very worthy person. 'Tis of her that the following story is told, by the author of the History of England during the reign of the Royal House of Stuart:

That Mr. Jeremy White, one of Oliver's domestick chaplains, a sprightly man, and a top wit of his court, made his addresses to the said lady Frances, who did not much disencourage him. But Cromwell being told of it, obliged the person who told him to be upon the watch; who hunting Jerry White, as he was commonly called, to the lady's chamber, ran immediately to tell the Protector of it. Oliver in a rage hastening thither, found Jerry on his knees kis'ing the lady's hand, or having just kiss'd it; and ask'd him what was the meaning of that posture before his daughter Frank? White, with much presence of mind, said, May it please your Highness, I have a long time courted that young gentlewoman there, my lady's woman, and cannot prevail; I was therefore bumbly praying praying her ladyship to intercede for me. The Protector turning to the young woman, said, What's the meaning of this, buffy? Why do you refuse the honour Mr. White would do you? He is my friend, and I expect you should treat him as such. My lady's woman desiring nothing more, answer'd, If Mr. White intends me that honour, I shall not be against him. Say'st thou so, reply'd Cromwell, call Goodwin; this business shall be done presently, before I go out of the room. Jerry being gone too far to go back, they were married, and the Protector gave the young woman 500 l. for her portion; which, with what she had sav'd before, made Mr. White easy in his circumstances, but in one thing, which was, that he never loved his wife, nor she him, tho' they lived together near fifty years afterwards. The abovemention'd author says he knew them both, and heard this story told when Mrs. White was by, who did not contradict it, but acknowledg'd there was something in it.

FINIS.