IN presenting to the Public the First Volume of the SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Conductors cannot refrain from stating the high satisfaction which they feel in contemplating the success with which their labours have, thus far, been crowned. The Periodical was originally projected with the avowed design of "Illustrating and enforcing the doctrines of the Bible,—the great essential principles of Evangelical Grace and Truth;" and how far this design has been fulfilled may be readily seen by a reference to its pages. The most strenuous efforts have been exerted to combine solid Scriptural instruction with interesting and varied information, and it must certainly afford sincere pleasure to every well constituted mind, that a periodical exclusively devoted to topics connected with the spiritual and eternal concerns of mankind, should be so widely diffused, in the course of a few months, as to cover the length and breadth of the land, and be welcomed weekly, with ever increasing interest, by all classes of the community. Such a result is in the highest degree encouraging, and calls for the liveliest gratitude to Almighty God, the promotion of whose cause,—the wisest, the noblest, and the best,—the SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD is humbly destined to subserve.

In the present Volume are contained Original Articles by upwards of One Hundred Authors, clerical and lay. In point of literary merit, the contributions speak for themselves; and it is impossible, we conceive, to find, within the same limited space, in any other publication whatever, so great a quantity of varied and valuable information, bearing the authority of the names of the Authors.

That a Publication of this nature is calculated, under the Divine blessing, to produce the most salutary effects can scarcely, for a moment, be doubted, communicating, as it does, a varied combination of truths, both useful and entertaining, and that too, compressed within such narrow limits as to be readily perused by multitudes who have neither leisure nor opportunity to avail themselves of works of larger dimensions. And, accordingly, it appears from the accounts received from all parts of the country, that even in districts the most remote, and hitherto excluded from the range of periodical literature, whether secular or religious, the SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD has been uniformly received as a boon, and has led, in numerous instances, to the most gratifying change in the character and conduct not of individuals merely, but of whole families. There is reason to hope, indeed, that the weekly distribution of Forty Thousand Copies of a Publication so completely adapted for instructive perusal, both on Sabbath and week-days, will ultimately be productive of incalculable good to the country at large. In these encouraging circumstances, the Conductors pledge themselves to proceed with redoubled alacrity and vigour in the Christian cause in which they have embarked, trusting in the strength of HIM to whom they are desirous that all the glory of their success should be ascribed.

RELIGION—A MATTER OF SUPREME IMPORTANCE.

BY THE REV. R. S. CANDLISH, A. M.,
Minister of St. George's Parish, Edinburgh.

THE importance of Religion, as a primary and principal element to be taken into account, in fixing the conditions or reckoning the chances of individual or social well-being, is held universally, but on different grounds by different men, according to the variety of their own personal views on the subject of Religion itself.

1. Thus, there are not a few who look upon Religion, very much as the inhabitants of a country reclaimed from the sea may be supposed to look upon the wide waste of waters around them; or as emigrants in a newly cleared tract of land may look upon the wild tenants of the adjoining forest. The ocean displaced from his old domain, the savage beast dispossessed of his former home, is regarded by the new intruders with suspicion and alarm, as a mischievous and dangerous neighbour, to whose neighbourhood, however, they must needs submit, as a necessary condition of the very settlement they have got, and whose power, since they cannot rid themselves of it altogether, they must just regulate or restrain as best they may. In the same spirit, many view the religious sentiment, the instinctive feeling of veneration, which they acknowledge to be an original principle in the mind. Men, they say, are endowed with it by nature for wise ends. It is involved in that rational and moral constitution which is the distinctive characteristic of the human race, as superior to the race of brutes; and without that susceptibility of reverential emotions on which Religion depends, there could be no society, no civilization. But though it be an unavoidable result of that mental organization which fits men for society—since, to be capable of social, man must be made capable of something like religious, feelings—still this sentiment of religion finds no great favour in their eyes. However indispensable to the formation of society, they hold it to be not very essential to its advancement. Indeed, considering the mighty energy of religious zeal when it possesses the soul, and the fearful ravages which under its blind impulse have been wrought on earth, they are inclined to give it just so much countenance as may serve to retain within safe limits, or guide in a safe channel, the current which they cannot wholly check. Hence their policy is to manage the religious spirit in individuals and communities, so as to render it harmless. They would flatter it by a decent profession of civility—or give it vent, as by a safety valve, in gay and gorgeous pageants, in solemn and stately forms—or amuse it and lay it asleep by vague, unmeaning, but fair-sounding generalities. And just as they might coax out of an infant's hands a dangerous toy, they contrive, by smooth words of respectful acknowledgment, to avoid a direct quarrel with religion and to keep men in good humour on the subject, while their aim is to remove as far as possible away from their ordinary habits of thought and action, a class of motives which seem to them not only practically useless for the purposes of life, but even likely, unless very cautiously watched, to be positively dangerous and detrimental. We need scarcely remark that such views, however they may affect to coalesce with a religion of idle ceremony, or a religion of loose indiscriminating sentiment, are substantially infidel and ungodly.

2. Again, there is a numerous set of men, not quite so suspicious or so much afraid of this potent spirit, who take in hand not only to prevent its mischievous explosions, but even to make it a safe and quiet instrument of some little service to the individual and to the commonwealth. These persons, not content with erecting a barrier against the threatening tide, carefully open a few narrow sluices, and admit a measured portion of the water into well adjusted reservoirs and canals, where it may securely be made to minister to the commerce or convenience of the town. But still it is with so much anxious fear that they venture on such a step, and with so many precautions and such constant warnings against the risk of even an hair-breadth's excess or overflow, that it is well seen they are dealing with an unfriendly element,—tampering with a power which they dare not freely trust. Religion, according to them, or the sentiment of devout reverence and conscientiousness, may, if duly regulated and controlled, be turned to a good and useful account. The morality of the Bible is their favourite theme of praise. The precepts of holiness and peace which it contains—its maxims of spotless purity and righteousness—the spirit of benign gentleness and love which it breathes—and the beautiful representation which it gives of all the highest excellencies and the fairest graces of human character, in the person of the blessed Saviour, all these amiable features of the Gospel are felt to be conducive to the virtue and the happiness of mankind. And the doctrine of a wise Creator, a bountiful and merciful Guardian and Protector, is acknowledged to be a fit auxiliary to those sanctions of law and conscience by which men are governed and society is kept together. But as the settlers amid the forest who might desire to make use of its wild tenants and to turn their services to advantage, would scarcely dare to do so until they had been first of all tamed and subdued; so it is a Religion well tamed and subdued, and made very subservient and compliant to their own worldly principles, that these admirers of the gain of godliness prudently patronize. They encourage just so much of the religious spirit as may be useful or convenient for checking the grosser kinds of vice, and adding something of the credit of the Christian name to the superficial plausibilities of advancing civilization. But then the Christianity they recommend must be trimmed into correspondence with their views of man's nature and condition and highest good. It must be cut and fashioned so as to fit into their merely secular plans for his improvement—it must be kept in a second and subordinate place—it must observe prescribed limits—it must follow a prescribed track. Not for the world would they, if they could help it, trust it loose among men, free to take its own way and wield its own influence. They dread its vagaries and excesses unrestrained. They are sensitively alive to the hazard of enthusiasm and fanaticism. They have a sacred horror of peculiar and exclusive dogmas. Thus, if they do use Religion for the purposes of life, they use it as they would use a sharp-edged tool or doubly-loaded fire-arms, with extreme caution and reserve; and while their whole plans and proceedings, arranged for the most part on earthly principles alone, prove it to be their real opinion, that the world could go on well enough without Religion at all,—the hesitation with which they let in a very scanty and doubtful influence of principles higher and more heavenly, shows how much they fear, that with Religion having its free course, the world would be turned upside down. Surely this also is but thinly-disguised infidelity and ungodliness.

3. Now, the fatal error of both these views lies in their regarding Religion merely in its bearings on the interests of men, and not as in itself of primary moment; in their preferring the question of its utility to the question of its truth. For certainly, the use that may be made of Religion is but a secondary consideration. The first is its own reality. Is there a God above us, such in character as conscience within us attests Him to be? Has He been forgotten and forsaken, disowned and disregarded by men, his reasonable creatures, as all experience declares? Is He in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, as the Gospel proclaims? Is this Religion? and is it a reality? Then, if so, it is a reality to be dealt with as itself alone on its own account vitally important, and not merely on account of certain advantages or disadvantages that we may think likely to flow from it. It is not our servant, to do our bidding—our instrument, to serve our purposes—our property, on which we may cut and carve, and which we may form and fashion to our own liking. It is our master—it must command us—it must have us, and all that is ours, placed at its disposal—we, and all that is ours, belong to it, or rather to the God whom it reveals as reconciled. And it is when in this spirit we give to God his due supremacy, and make Religion itself, and for its own sake, our chief concern, to which all other interests must be postponed—it is then only that we can know its true and actual influence on these very interests of ours; for then only do we give it a fair trial. For, to judge fairly of the effects or tendency of any plan, we must suppose its essential conditions fulfilled. Now, the very essence of the Religion of the Gospel, is the willing subjection of ourselves, and all that is ours, to God. We may fancy a Religion which does not involve such subjection, but which rather makes the fear of God subject to the consideration of our own present interests. This, however, is not Christianity—nor, in truth, is it Deism either—for, if there be a God, He must be in all things and over all things Supreme. The very notion, therefore, which we in that case form of Religion, prevents us from rightly estimating its power either for good or for evil—for it is a notion radically wrong and self-contradictory. But now assume the reality of such a Religion as alone can properly be so called at all, and let its rightful pre-eminence be assigned to it; and then estimate its blessings and its obligations. This reference of all things to God—to God sovereign and gracious, this acknowledgment of God in all things—of God as a personal friend in Jesus,—does it not sweeten all, ennoble all, hallow all? Does it not give zest to every joy, soothe every sorrow, lighten every care, elevate every rational pursuit, and make all labour honourable? It is as if long troubled and wearied with the attempt to manage an entangled and involved estate, in which we found perpetual vexation and annoyance, we at last gave it all over to ones kilful and faithful, who, relieving us of all anxiety, provides for us in all respects far better than we were ever provided for before. It is as if the toil of dreary solitude were cheered and gladdened by the countenance and sympathy of an approving and rewarding master. So blessed a thing is it to have peace with that God who will be present in the multitude of our thoughts, and will establish every work of our hands. In the formation of character, such Religion as this alone can be influential. Other sorts of religion lie on the surface; their forms and feelings may be merely superadded to a state of mind which continues very much as it was before. This alone goes to the very foundation. It changes wholly a man's relation to God, and therefore also to all other things. It changes his views of God, and therefore also of all things else. It makes God the centre to which his affections tend, and from which they go forth to other objects, so that all his human regards now partake of the intensity and purity and stability of a regard that is eternal and divine. Finally, in the conduct of affairs, this Religion exerts a salutary power. Religion, as men often conceive of it, is to be kept close prisoner to the church and to the closet, because its forms and its feelings cannot find fitting time or space amid the busy dealings of merchants in the streets, or the commonplace intercourse of neighbours in their houses. But Christianity is a Religion not of form or feeling merely, but chiefly of Principle; and therefore it can find admittance where ceremony would be out of place and high wrought sensibility out of taste, for right principle is never unseasonable or inapplicable. It speaks to the conscience for God, and it has a word to say, in the making of every bargain—in the discharge of every trust—in the issuing of every command—in the rendering of every service—in the conducting of every conversation—in the eating of every meal—in every meeting of friends—in every interview of foes—in every common act of kindness done—in every injury received—in every transaction in every relation of life—it has a word to say, and the word is this: "Do justice, love mercy, walk humbly with your God:"—and "whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus:"—"whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF FELIX NEFF.

FELIX NEFF was born in the year 1798, and brought up in a small village, near Geneva, under the care of his widowed mother. His early education appears to have been such as reflected great credit upon the wisdom and piety of his kind parental instructor. No pains were spared to impart to his youthful mind a taste for knowledge, and, above all, to impress him with a sense of Divine things. And it happens rarely, very rarely, indeed, that the feelings awakened, and the principles imbibed, in the house of a pious parent, are ever entirely lost. On the mind of Neff, these early impressions appear to have been of the most salutary and lasting description. From childhood, his employments, and even his very amusements, were of a rational kind. With an ardent love of natural scenery, and a taste for the sublime and beautiful, which the surrounding country tended so strongly to gratify, he delighted to wander among the mountains, or along the banks of the peaceful lake.

The aspiring dispositions of young Neff led him at an early age to look forward to a life of military enterprise; and accordingly, although for a time he was employed in the nursery-grounds of a florist, he exchanged his peaceful profession for that of arms, and entered the military service of Geneva in the year 1815. As a soldier, he conducted himself to the entire satisfaction of his superior officers, so that in the course of two years he was promoted to the rank of serjeant of artillery. By the rough discipline of the camp, Providence was preparing Felix Neff for the toils and privations which he was destined to undergo in the service of the Redeemer. And this fact is in beautiful accordance with the mode in which the people of God are usually fitted for the duties which the Almighty appoints them to discharge. Both in the peaceful occupation of a florist, and in the more active employment of a soldier, Neff was gathering up precisely that kind of information, and those peculiar habits which he afterwards required.

Neff soon distinguished himself, in the corps to which he belonged, both by his undaunted courage, and his devoted piety. This latter quality appears to have been by no means agreeable to his superior officers, who are represented by his biographer as having wished him out of the service, so much did they feel offended at the scrupulous strictness of his conduct. At length, so decided did his mind become in its preference of Divine things, that he was advised to quit the regiment, and dedicate himself to the work of the ministry. Before taking a step so important, however, he spent a considerable part of his time in meditation and prayer, that he might experience the direction of a wisdom far higher than his own. And the result was, that he left the army in 1819, and commenced a course of study, with a view to the sacred office. He read the Bible with deep and prayerful attention, and so anxious does he appear to have been to render Scripture familiar to his mind, that he made a concordance of his own, and filled the margins of several copies of the Old and New Testament with remarks and memoranda. "Some of these," says Dr Gilly, "are still in the possession of his friends, and are held in most affectionate estimation, and are consulted as the voice of one who being dead, yet speaketh."

As a still further preparation for the practical duties of the sacred office, Neff was employed for two years as a catechist, or lay-helper, in the Swiss cantons of Neuchâtel, Berne, and the Pays de Vaud. This office, which has been long existent in the Protestant churches on the Continent, forms an excellent probationary exercise for candidates for the holy ministry. And we are glad to hail its introduction to a certain extent in our own country; and we trust that, by the blessing of God, it will be the means of raising up in the midst of us a number of active, and energetic, and devoted pastors. Accustomed, before receiving ordination, to visiting families, and catechising the young, and comforting the sick, and, in short, all the other duties of a parish, with the exception of those which peculiarly belong to an ordained ministry—young men are the better prepared to enter upon the work of parochial clergymen with efficiency and success.

In 1821, Neff removed from Switzerland, having been invited to officiate as catechist to a pastor at Grenoble, in France. After labouring faithfully there for six months, his services were requested at Mens, in the Department of the Isère, to supply, as far as possible, the place of an absent pastor. Here, however, from various circumstances, and, among the rest, from the want of sympathy in religious feeling between him and the people among whom he was labouring, he felt his situation by no means comfortable, so that in one of his letters, written at this time, exhibiting the state of his mind, we find him thus expressing himself:—"I often retire to my chamber, ill at rest, and greatly dissatisfied with myself. I reproach myself, on the one hand, for having betrayed my sacred trust, and, on the other, for being a time-server, and afraid of pressing my opportunities." Yet, notwithstanding the complaining style in which this letter is couched, the labours of Neff at this time were unremitting, not confined to Mens, but extending to the whole department, which contained no fewer than 8000 Protestants, scattered over a surface of 60 miles square, with only three regular pastors, one of whom was absent. In these circumstances, Neff was employed chiefly in the work of a missionary.

After having faithfully discharged the duties of a catechist for four years, and more especially as his labours at Mens were brought to a close by the return of the pastor for whom he officiated, Neff was desirous of obtaining ordination to the office of the holy ministry. In this, however, there was some difficulty. He was unwilling to apply for ordination to the Established Church of Geneva, in consequence of the unscriptural doctrines held by most of its ministers; and being a foreigner, he had no claim upon the Protestant Church of France. In this dilemma he thought of visiting England, where he had become known chiefly through the medium of the Continental Society. Though quite unable to speak the English language, he proceeded to London in the beginning of May 1823, and was ordained, on the 19th of that month, in Mr Clayton's chapel in the Poultry.

During his stay in London, Neff felt himself very uncomfortable and solitary from his ignorance of the language, and accordingly he lost no time in returning to France, and to the scene of his former labours at Mens. His reception was exceedingly gratifying. The people "left their shops and their husbandry work to meet him. They crowded round him, some half-stifed him in their embraces, others kissed his hand, others wept with joy, and all signified the sincerity of their affection and respect." Though urged to remain among them, and to accept the office of pastor in the commune of St. Sebastian, he judged it prudent to decline the request.

His affections were set upon the section of the High Alps. He thought he would rather be stationed there, than in those places which are situated under the beautiful sky of Languedoc. At length his wishes were gratified. The elders of the Protestant Churches of Val Queyras and Val Fressiniere applied to the Consistory in his behalf, and the consent of that body having been obtained, he entered in January 1824 upon his pastoral duties. The charge assigned to this devoted man of God was such as most men would have shrunk from. It consisted of seventeen or eighteen villages, scattered over an extent of nearly 80 miles in the high passes of the Alps,—a region of barrenness and desolation, impassable during a great part of the year from the depth of the snow. Such was the scene of labour which Neff preferred to the cultivated plains and fertile valleys where his lot, had he so wished, might have been cast.

It was in the midst of a most inclement season that

Felix Neff travelled to that inhospitable region which was to be the scene of his future labours. His first employment, on reaching the place, was to become acquainted with every village and hamlet within his extensive parish. Though in the depth of winter, and exposed to the utmost severities of wind and weather, he went forth in the cause of his Master, preaching the glad tidings of salvation from one end of the district to the other. An affecting incident which occurred in one of his excursions, may give some idea of the simple character of the people among whom Neff laboured.

"Neff had been performing three services in the church of Dormilleuse, to a congregation which filled the little sanctuary, and he was, afterwards proceeding towards Romas, the upper part of this mountain village, followed by many of the inhabitants of that quarter, who had been among his hearers. Suddenly they were alarmed by some loud cries behind them. These were occasioned by the sudden illness of a young woman of the party, who was stretched upon the ground without any signs of life. In fact, the vital spark had fled, and thus a young person of twenty-six years of age, of a robust frame, who had been present at the three services in the course of the day, and who had been joining in the psalmody with great animation but a few minutes before, was now carried home a breathless corpse. The consternation of her parents was extreme, for she had been the only strong and healthy member of the family, and the principal support of it; but they bore their loss without a murmur, and what they most lamented, was the suddenness of her death, without having had time to commend her soul to God. The poor mother, in particular, testified the utmost submission to the blow, although she had three children nearly blind, and her husband was feeble and in bad health. During the two nights that the corpse remained unburied, the house was filled with people, who came to offer their condolence, and especially with young women. Neff embraced the opportunity of reading appropriate passages of Scripture, and of pouring in such consolations and admonitions as were most applicable, and exhorted them to watch and pray, and to keep themselves in readiness against the coming of the Lord. When the time came for placing the corpse on the bier, the unhappy mother repeated aloud a prayer, in French, for the dying, and then all of a sudden she burst out in patois—'Alas! my poor child had not time to utter these words. Death has seized her, as the eagle snatches up the lamb, as the rock falls and crushes the timid kid of the chamois; oh! my dear Mary, the Lord has taken thee at the very gate of his temple. Thy last thoughts were therefore, we hope, directed towards Him. Oh! may He have made thy peace before the throne of God, and received thee in paradise!' All the inhabitants of Dormilleuse attended the melancholy procession to the grave, and their pastor read the Ninetieth Psalm, as the earth closed upon the coffin, and then delivered an address, which the mourners are not likely to forget."

The indefatigable exertions of Neff for the spiritual welfare, and even the temporal comfort of his people, were truly exemplary. No opportunities were lost, no labour spared, to minister to their souls the bread and the water of life. A lively description of his varied endeavours to benefit their souls, is thus given by his worthy biographer, Dr Gilly:—

"It was not on Sunday only, that he went the round of his churches, but he was ever visiting now one quarter, and then another: and happy did they esteem themselves at whose table he sat down, and under whose roof he lodged for the night. When his arrival was expected in certain hamlets, whose rotation to be visited was supposed to be coming round, it was beautiful to see the cottages send forth their inhabitants, to watch the coming of the beloved minister. . . 'Come, take your dinner with us.'—'Let me prepare your supper.'—'Permit me to give up my bed to you,'—were re-echoed from many a voice, and though there was nothing in the repast which denoted a feast-day, yet never was festival observed with greater rejoicing than by those, whose rye-bread and pottage were shared by the pastor Neff. Sometimes, when the old people of one cabin were standing at their doors, and straining their eyes to catch the first view of their 'guide to heaven,' the youngsters of another were perched on the summit of a rock, and stealing a prospect which would afford them an earlier sight of him, and give them the opportunity of offering the first invitation. It was on these occasions, that he obtained a perfect knowledge of the people, questioning them about such of their domestic concerns as he might be supposed to take an interest in, as well as about their spiritual condition, and finding where he could be useful both as a secular adviser and a religious counsellor. 'Could all their children read? Did they understand what they read? Did they offer up morning and evening prayers? Had they any wants that he could relieve? Any doubts that he could remove? Any afflictions wherein he could be a comforter?'

"It was thus that he was the father of his flock, and master of their affections and their opinions; and when the seniors asked for his blessing, and the children took hold of his hands or his knees, he felt all the fatigue of his long journeys pass away, and became recruited with new strength. But for the high and holy feelings which sustained him, it is impossible that he could have borne up against his numerous toils and exposures, even for the few months in which he thus put his constitution to the trial. Neither rugged paths, nor the inclement weather of these Alps, which would change suddenly from sunshine to rain, and from rain to sleet, and from sleet to snow; nor snow deep under foot, and obscuring the view when dangers lay thick on his road; nothing of this sort deterred him from setting out, with his staff in his hand, and his wallet on his back, when he imagined that his duty summoned him. I have been assured by those who have received him into their houses at such times, that he has come in chilly, wet, and fatigued; or exhausted by heat, and sudden transitions from excessive heat to piercing cold, and that after sitting down a few minutes, his elastic spirits would seem to renovate his sinking frame, and he would enter into discourse with all the mental vigour of one who was neither weary nor languid."

In all respects Neff showed himself the father and the friend of his people. He taught them to improve their houses, to cultivate their lands, and extend their temporal comforts as far as their peculiar circumstances would admit. And the earnestness of his anxiety on their behalf was met with a rich return of gratitude and confidence and affection. In one district of his parish, more especially, which had been in a more destitute condition than the rest, he felt a lively interest. "From the first moment of my arrival," says he, "I took them as it were to my heart, and I ardently desired to be unto them even as another Oberlin." And so he actually proved. Though he found it impossible to devote more than a week in each month to this half-barbarous district, a change for the better was very soon apparent. Indeed, so extraordinary was the improvement of the peasantry of the Val Fressiniere in social manners and family comfort, no less than in agriculture, to attract the attention of strangers; and so sensible were the people themselves of the advantage arising from their improved condition, that they looked upon their pastor with the most confiding affection and regard. They had received a counsellor from heaven, and these simple-hearted people appreciated the blessing.

In the course of his labours, Neff found great difficulty from the imperfect education which the young received at school. He, therefore, resolved to endeavour, as much as possible, to introduce an improved system of education. This, however, might appear impracticable, there being no schoolmasters capable of undertaking the task. Every obstacle only tended the more to rouse the energies of Neff. He resolved to take upon himself the office of schoolmaster,—a circumstance which is thus noticed by his biographer:—

"Behold the preacher surrounded by his classes in a miserable stable, correcting the tone of one, the pronunciation of another, and the articulation of a third; patiently dinning sounds and sense into their ears, and making them spell the words, and divide by syllables, and repeat by sentences again and again, until he had put them into something like a fair training. Behold him also, to keep his pupils in good humour, and to mingle something pleasing with the dull routine of reading and spelling, putting aside his books and giving lessons in music. This was a most successful as well as agreeable expedient; it was soon found that the best singers were also the best readers, and application to the more attractive lesson was usually accompanied by proficiency in the duller acquirement."

Encouraged by the success of his exertions in the cause of education, Neff resolved to erect a schoolhouse. The situation chosen for the building was the village of Dormilleuse, and his mode of proceeding is thus graphically described.

"He persuaded each family in Dormilleuse to furnish a man who should consent to work under his directions; and having first marked out the spot with line and plummet, and levelled the ground, he marched at the head of his company to the torrent, and selected stones fit for the building. The pastor placed one of the heaviest upon his own shoulders,—the others did the same, and away they went with their burthens, toiling up the steep acclivity, till they reached the site of the proposed building. This labour was continued until the materials were all ready at hand; the walls then began to rise, and in one week from the first commencement, the exterior masonry work was completed, and the roof was put upon the room. The windows, chimney, door, tables, and seats, were not long before they also were finished. A convenient stove added its accommodation to the apartment, and Dormilleuse, for the first time probably in its history, saw a public school-room erected, and the process of instruction conducted with all possible regularity and comfort."

Having completed the school-room, the indefatigable pastor commenced his work as a teacher, dedicating his time chiefly to the Normal department of his plan, or the training of schoolmasters, who might afterwards conduct the education of the children on an improved system. The winter of 1826-7 was accordingly spent at Dormilleuse; and such was the anxiety of Neff to improve the pupils who had put themselves under his care, that fourteen or fifteen hours out of the twenty-four were spent in study. The spot which had been selected for this experiment, was the most secluded and dreary of the whole Alpine districts, and the season was remarkably severe and stormy. But nothing could chill the efforts of Felix Neff. He persevered in his good work, until the close of winter called for the return of the little party of students to their different communes. The inhabitants of Dormilleuse regretted the breaking up of a society, which, though small, spread a cheerfulness throughout the secluded village. The account of the parting scene is thus beautifully given by Dr Gilly.—

“On the evening before they took their leave, the young men of the village prepared a supper for their new friends, and invited them to the parting banquet. It was a simple and a frugal repast, consisting of the productions of the chase. The bold hunter contributed his salted chamois, the less enterprising sportsman of the mountain laid a dried marmot upon the table, and one or two of the most successful rangers of the forest produced a bear's ham, as a farewell offering, in honour of the last evening on which the conversation of this interesting group was to be enjoyed. It was at the same time a pleasing, and a melancholy festival, but I do not find, in the pastor's Journal, that either the achievements of their ancestors, who had garrisoned this rocky citadel, and had repulsed numberless attempts to storm it, or the exploits of the chasseurs, who had furnished the festive board, formed the conversation of the evening. It seems to have savoured rather of the object which originally brought them together, and when one of the party remarked,—‘What a delightful sight, to behold so many young friends met together—but it is not likely that we shall ever meet all together again!’ the pastor took the words up like a text, and enlarged upon the consolatory thought, that though they might see each other's faces no more in this life, they would most assuredly meet again in a joyful state of existence in the world to come, if they would persevere in their Christian course. He then gave them a parting benediction, and, after a long and mournful silence, which each seemed unwilling to interrupt, either by uttering the dreaded good-bye, or moving from his seat, the valedictory words and embraces passed from one to another, and they separated. The next morning at an early hour, they were seen winding down the mountain path to their several homes; they of Dormilleuse gazed after them till their figures were lost in the distance, and the village on the rock appeared more dreary and desolate than ever.”

Next year they again assembled, but, through the kindness of friends, in circumstances of greater comfort than before. Neff, however, found that his health was gradually declining. The severe labours and privations to which he had been subjected, began to prey upon a constitution never remarkably robust. In the winter of 1827, he performed his various duties with great difficulty. A total derangement of the digestive organs had taken place, and the internal pains to which he was in consequence subject, were greatly aggravated by a severe accident which he had sustained in the knee. When his pupils had returned at the end of the second session, if we may so term it, of the Normal institution, Neff felt that his disorder had greatly increased, his stomach had entirely lost its tone, and refused to receive any thing but liquida.

It now became evident that an immediate removal from the severe climate of the Alpine region was absolutely necessary. For a time he felt very reluctant to separate himself from a people among whom his labours had been so signally blessed. At length, however, after travelling over the greater number of the villages to bid an affectionate farewell to his flock, he set out for Geneva, with the view of deriving benefit, if possible, from his native air. The relief from his sufferings, which he rather hoped for than expected, was partially granted. Taking advantage of intervals of apparent restoration to health, he uniformly exerted himself in some pious work, which most frequently led to a relapse.

As a last resource, he was advised to try the effect of mineral waters, and accordingly he resided for some time at Plombières. While there, he preached regularly to the Protestants of the place. Having experienced a considerable revival of his strength, he returned to Geneva. On his arrival there, however, he began gradually to droop. His spirits failed him, his body became emaciated, and it was but too evident to his friends that his stay on earth would be short.

“It was most heart-rending,” said a spectator of his sufferings, “to behold him, thus pale and emaciated, his large eyes beaming with an expression of fortitude and pain; covered, from head to foot, with four or five woollen garments, which he was obliged to change frequently; submitting, in silence, and with the greatest calmness, to the application of the moxas,* a painful operation, which was constantly repeated; suffering the pangs of hunger; counting the hours, and at last venturing to take something, then waiting with anxiety till the food, such as it was, should digest, and thus passing all his days and nights during a long succession of relapses, and of physical prostration, which we sometimes looked upon as a relief.”

Even in the utmost extremities of his distress, his Alpine flock dwelt much upon his mind. He was now quite aware that his labours among them were for ever come to a close. Still, even on his death-bed, he pressed upon them, by letter, the precious truths which he had been privileged to urge upon them from the pulpit. And when unable to write, he employed his mother as amanuensis, to whom he dictated two letters, addressed to his beloved flock. Though unable, for want of room, to insert either of these beautiful and impressive letters, we cannot refrain from presenting our readers with an extract of the touching reply of the simple peasants of the Alpine valleys, to a letter which had been sent to prepare them for the mournful tidings which his friends would too soon be called to communicate.

“It is we, it is we, who are the cause of your long illness. Had we been more ready to listen to you, you would not have had occasion to fatigue yourself in the deep snow, nor to exhaust your lungs, and all the powers of your body. Oh, how much pain has it cost you to teach us: like our good Saviour, you forgot yourself for our sakes. Dear pastor, sensible of the affection you have always manifested towards us, we desire, with all our hearts, to be useful to you. We can say, with truth, that if our lives could be of service to you, we would give them, and then we should not be doing more for you than you have done for us. May the Lord bless you, and grant you patience in this long trial. May He shower upon you a thousand benedictions from on high, and recompense you for all the pains you have taken of us! Your reward is in heaven: an immortal crown awaits you. We will conclude by entreating your prayers in our behalf; unworthy as we are, we do not forget you in ours. Every family, without exception, from the heights of Romas to the foot of the Indus, salutes you, and you will see the names of some of them in this letter. We are your unworthy, but entirely devoted brothers.”

* An Indian or Chinese mox, used in the cure of some disorders, by burning it on the part affected.

The closing scene was now fast approaching—it was in complete harmony with the whole course of his life. "Tell me not how the man died," was once the saying of a pious minister, "but tell me how he lived." We have seen "how holily, and justly, and unblameably," Felix Neff spent his laborious and useful life. Let us attend him in his dying moments, and listen with devout eagerness to the latest aspirations of this man of God.

"We had the satisfaction," said a narrator of the dying scene, "of being much with him towards the close of his painful career, and we never heard a murmur escape from his lips. He was grateful for the affection shewn towards him, and returned it abundantly. Often, after our poor services, he threw his arms round our necks, embraced us, thanked us, and exhorted us with all his soul to devote ourselves to God. 'Believe my experience,' said he, 'He only is your sure trust, He only is truly to be loved. If you should one day be employed in the preaching of the Gospel, take heed not to work to be seen of men. Oh, with how many things of this kind do I reproach myself! My life, which appears to some to have been well employed, has not been a quarter so much so as it might have been! How much precious time have I lost!' He accused himself of unfaithfulness in the employment of his time, and of having been vain-glorious: he, whose labours were scarcely known to a few friends! who had refused to marry, that his heart might be entirely devoted to his Master, and whose ardent charity for his fellow-creatures had brought him, at the age of thirty-one, to his bed of death! Knowing his love for sacred music, we frequently assembled in a room near his own, and sung, in an under-tone, verses of his favourite hymns, and a paraphrase on the thirty-first chapter of Jeremiah, which he had himself composed. This singing filled his soul with a thousand feelings and recollections, and affected him so much, that we were obliged to discontinue it, though he did not see us, and he heard us but faintly.

"About a fortnight before his death, he looked on a mirror, and discovering unequivocal signs of dissolution in his countenance, he gave utterance to his joy: 'Oh, yes! soon, soon I shall be going to my God!' From that time he took no more care of himself: his door was open to all, and the last hours of the missionary became a powerful mission. His chamber was never empty, he had a word for every one, until he was exhausted by it. In the full enjoyment of all his mental faculties, every thing was present to his memory: the most trivial circumstances, even conversations which he had held many years previously, and he made use of them with extraordinary energy in his exhortations. On his mother's account only did he show the least inquietude: old, feeble, and devoted to him, she could not restrain her tears. Before her, he assumed a firmness which amounted even to reproach; then, when she left him, no longer able to refrain from weeping himself, his eyes followed her with tenderness, and he would exclaim 'my poor mother!'

"He made presents to his friends, and set apart some religious books for many persons to whom he still hoped to be useful; after having underlined several passages, he thus wrote the address:—'Felix Neff, dying, to _____'

"We shall have an indelible recollection of the last letter that he wrote; it was a few days before his death. He was supported by two persons, and, hardly able to see, he traced at intervals, and in large and irregular characters which filled a page, the lines which follow, addressed to some of his beloved friends in the Alps. What must have been the feelings of those who received them, with the persuasion that he, who had traced them, was no more!

"'Adieu, dear friend, André Blanc, Antoine Blanc, all my friends the Pellissiers, whom I love tenderly; Francis Dumont and his wife; Isaac and his wife; beloved Deslois, Emilie Bonet, &c. &c.; Alexandrine and her mother; all all the brethren and sisters of Mens, adieu, adieu. I ascend to our Father in entire peace! Victory! victory! victory! through Jesus Christ.

FELIX NEFF.

"The last night of his life, we and some other persons remained to sit up with him. Never shall we forget those hours of anguish, so well called the 'valley of the shadow of death.' It was necessary to attend to him constantly, and to hold him in his convulsive struggles; to support his fainting head in our arms, to wipe the cold drops from his forehead, to bend or to straighten his stiffened limbs; the centre of his body only retained any warmth. For a short time he seemed to be choking, and we dared not give him any thing: A few words of Scripture were read to him, but he did not appear to hear; once only, when some one was lamenting to see him suffer so much, and said, 'poor Neff,' he raised his head for an instant, fixed his large eyes full of affection upon his friend, and again closed them. During the long night of agony we could only pray and support him. In the morning, the fresh air having a little revived him, he made a sign that he should be carried to a higher bed; they placed him on this bed in a sitting posture, and the struggles of death began. For four hours we saw his eyes raised to heaven; each breath, that escaped from his panting bosom, seemed accompanied with a prayer; and at that awful period, when the heaviness of death was upon him, in the ardent expression of his supplication he appeared more animated than any of us. We stood around him weeping, and almost murmuring at the duration of his sufferings, but the power of his faith was so visible in his countenance, that our faith too was restored by it; it seemed as though we could see his soul hovering on his lips, impatient for eternity. At last we so well understood what his vehement desire was, that with one impulse we all exclaimed: 'Come Lord Jesus, come quickly.'

"Two days afterwards, (his death took place 12th of April, 1829,) we accompanied his remains to the tomb. Over his resting place were read some beautiful verses of that Word which shall never pass away. We then prayed, and in compliance with his wish, his numerous friends, who were assembled at the grave, sang together those lines of M. Vinet, of which the stanzas conclude thus:—

'They are not lost, but gone before.'"

FIRST DISPENSATION OF THE LORD'S SUPPER IN SCOTLAND AT THE TIME OF THE REFORMATION.

(Extracted chiefly from Buchanan's History.)

On the morning on which Wishart was to be executed, the priests sent two Franciscan monks to acquaint him that the time of his death drew near, and to ask if he wished to confess his sins to them, as was customary; he replied that he had no need for friars, nor any wish to converse with them, but if they would gratify him so far, he would be happy to be visited by the learned man who had preached the day before." On this being reported, the sub-prior, after he had obtained the permission of the bishop, came to the prison in the Castle, where Wishart was confined, and held a long conversation with him, intermingled with many tears. At length, after he had ceased weeping, from which he could not refrain, he kindly asked, whether he would not wish to partake of the sacrament of the Supper? "Most willingly," answered the martyr, "if according to Christ's appointment it be shewn forth in both kinds, namely, in bread and wine." Winram immediately returned to the bishops, and, with a view of conciliating them, informed them that the prisoner solemnly affirmed his innocence of the crimes with which he was charged, and that he did not say so to avert his impending death, but only to leave a testimony to man of that innocence which was known to God. The effect, however, was quite opposite: the Cardinal (Beaton) inflamed with rage, exclaimed, "As for you, Mr Sub-Prior, we know very well already what you are." Winram then asked whether the prisoner would be allowed the communion of the holy body and blood of the Saviour? when the other priests, after having consulted a little together, gave it as their opinion, "that it did not appear proper that an obstinate heretic, condemned by the Church, should have any church privileges." This determination was reported to Wishart; and it does not appear that he saw Mr Winram again. At nine o'clock the friends and domestics of the governor having assembled to breakfast, he was asked whether he would partake with them; to which he frankly replied, "with more pleasure than I have done for some time past, for I perceive you are devout men, and fellow-members of the same body of Christ with me, and also because I know this will be the last food I shall partake of on earth." Then addressing the governor, "I invite you, in the name of God, and by that love which you bear to our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to sit down at this table a little, and attend to me while I address an exhortation to you, and pray over the bread which we are about to eat, as brethren of Christ; and then I shall bid you farewell." In the meantime the table being covered, as is the custom, with a linen cloth, and bread placed upon it, Wishart began a short and clear discourse upon the Last Supper, and the sufferings and death of Christ, and spoke about half an hour; he especially exhorted them to lay aside wrath, envy, and malice, that their minds might be filled with love one to another, and so become perfect members of Christ, who daily intercedes that we through him, our sacrifice, may obtain eternal life. Having spoken to this effect, he gave God thanks, and broke the bread, and gave a little to each, and in like manner he gave the wine, after he himself had tasted, entreating them to remember, in this sacrament, along with him, the last memorial of Christ's death; but for himself, a more bitter cup was prepared, for no other reason than preaching the gospel. After this he again retired to his chamber, and finished his own private devotions.

Probably since the first institution of the Supper, it has seldom been celebrated under circumstances more solemn and affecting. Wishart was a man of the most mild and amiable temper, of a sweet and venerable appearance, and his manners are said to have been particularly engaging. He had been a kind of inmate in the governor's family for nearly two months, and during that time seems to have conciliated the affections of his keeper and attendants, the most of whom were, probably through his means, become "partakers of like precious faith," as he addressed them, upon this occasion, as persons whom he knew to be fellow-members of the same body of Christ. In less than three hours he was to stand in the presence of that God and Saviour whose dying love they were commemorating, and to be honoured, to glorify his name, by passing through the flames to heaven. With what energy would he address them,—with what reverential attention would they listen! Scarcely can a scene of deeper interest be imagined, excepting, perhaps, some which followed, when,

"Leaning on his spear,
The martyr vet'ran heard the word of God."

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT GORDON, D. D.,

"Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord."—HEB. xii. 14.

THE duties prescribed in this verse are at all times necessary, and therefore it is at all times seasonable to inculcate them. There was, however, a peculiar propriety in urging them upon the Hebrews, especially in the circumstances in which they were then placed. It appears from various notices in the New Testament, that the Jews, notwithstanding the reverses which, as a nation, they had sustained, and the degradation to which they had been reduced, still cherished an overweening idea of their own superiority, regarding themselves as the special objects of the Divine favour, and conceiving that they were entitled to look on other men with contempt. Of those among them who did not believe the gospel, we find the apostle thus speaking in his Epistle to the Thessalonians:—"They both killed the Lord Jesus and their own prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men: forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved." Of this spirit a very notable example is recorded in Paul's own history: for on a certain occasion, when he addressed his countrymen in Jerusalem, detailing to them the circumstances of his conversion to the faith of the gospel, and giving an account of the apostolic commission which he received from the Lord Jesus, who said to him, "depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles;" we are told that "they gave him audience unto this word, and then lifted up their voices and said, away with such a fellow from the earth: for it is not fit that he should live." And even with regard to those who did believe the gospel, they were so zealous of the law, that they seemed to think none should be admitted to the privileges of the gospel without being required at the same time to observe the institutions of Moses. In so far, then, as the Hebrews might be under the influence of such prejudices and prepossessions, they would be in danger of giving way to a contentious spirit; and if they did so, surrounded as they were by enemies who waited for their halting, they would not only give increased bitterness to the hatred and opposition of gainsayers, but bring discredit on the faith which they professed, by giving the adversaries occasion to speak reproachfully. And in like manner, they might stand in need of being especially reminded of the necessity of personal holiness. It is well-known, that their unbelieving countrymen looked upon themselves as a holy people, in virtue of their descent from Abraham, and their separation from the rest of the world by their being in possession of a Divine revelation, and a divinely instituted form of worship; and that, resting in their distinctive privileges, they were disposed to substitute this, what they considered hereditary holiness, for that purity of heart and life which it was the great end of all their privileges to produce. If, then, the Hebrew Christians, previously to their conversion to the faith of the gospel, had been accustomed to cherish the same delusion, they might still require to be warned against it; and there was therefore a peculiar force and propriety in the apostle's admonition as addressed to his countrymen, "Follow peace with all men, and hoiness, without which no man shall see the Lord."

But the precept, as we have already remarked, is at all times a most important one, and can never therefore be unseasonably urged. In Old Testament prophecy, Christ was foretold as the "Prince of Peace," in "whose days the righteous should flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth;" and when the fulness of time was come, his birth was announced as "peace on earth, and good will towards men." In fact, peace is frequently used in Scripture to express every thing that is comprehended in Christ's salvation. When, by his death, he bore the penalty of our offences, made reconciliation for iniquity, and opened up a new and living way of access to God; it is said that he made peace for us by the blood of his cross. When, through faith in this atonement, our reconciliation to God becomes a matter of experience; the blessed fruits of our justification or acceptance with him, are represented as consisting of "peace and joy in believing,"—even "the peace of God that passeth all understanding." And the ultimate design of all this is declared to be, that by the indwelling of the spirit in our hearts, we may be united to Christ and to one another in the bonds of love and affection, as members of the same spiritual body, children of the same family, and heirs of the same heavenly inheritance; and that being thus made perfect in one, we may, by our example and our influence, diffuse among men that peace which Christ came to procure and to publish. And if it be the great design of the gospel thus to give us peace with God, with ourselves, and with one another, then the gospel is practically known and felt, only in so far as it has produced this effect: and professing Christians cannot more palpably belie their principles, than by cherishing an angry, contentious, or vindictive spirit. Did they regard one another as children of the same Heavenly Father, and did they really hope to spend together an eternity of holy fellowship with God; it were impossible that they could give way to such a spirit without feeling, on serious reflection, that they had betrayed and brought discredit on the cause which ought to be dearer to them than life: for however little ungodly men may know, or be able to conceive of the comforting, elevating, and purifying influence of the Gospel, they are quick-sighted enough to perceive the revolting inconsistency of men who profess to be pilgrims on the earth, and fellow-travellers towards a better, even a heavenly country, "falling out by the way," or, in the emphatic language of the apostle, "biting and devouring one another." And even though Christians may be able, in justification of an angry and irritable spirit, to plead that they have sustained injury, and it may be at the hands of men who make no profession of Christianity; still if they did but reflect on the forbearance and long-suffering patience with which God endured their innumerable provocations; they could not fail to be humbled by the melancholy contrast between the mercy which had forgiven them ten thousand talents, and their unwillingness to remit to an offending fellow-creature his hundred pence.

But the precept in the text goes much farther than merely to inculcate a sort of passive avoidance of giving offence—a meek and patient endurance even of unprovoked injuries, rather than being the cause of dissension or discord. We are required to "follow peace with all men," or, as it is elsewhere expressed in Scripture, "to seek peace and ensue it"—to follow it as a thing which is not easily attained, and which we are ever in danger of losing. And did men really act in the spirit of this precept—were they so deeply and so habitually affected with a sense of their own obligations to God's forgiving mercy, as to feel that it is the true honour and dignity of their nature to imitate his forbearance and compassion—and had they such a lively anticipation of the holy and blessed society to which they hope hereafter to be united, as to awaken and keep alive in their minds, an ardent desire to see something of the same love and harmony characterising mankind on earth: What a different aspect would professedly christian communities exhibit, from what, I fear, they but too frequently present! How often would they suppress those angry feelings with which they are so prone to resent a real or supposed injury! How easily would they be brought to an amicable adjustment of differences, which too often terminate in irreconcilable quarrels? How cheerfully would they at times sacrifice something of their worldly interest, rather than give occasion to a dispute, the consequences of which, it may be impossible to foresee! And in how many instances might they not succeed, even in disarming the opposition of gainsayers, and constraining them to acknowledge that the tendency of the gospel is as happy as it is holy! All this, it is true, implies a degree of humility, self-denial, and regard for the interests of others, which, it is to be feared, is not frequently exemplified; and would lead to a line of conduct, which, in many cases, might be esteemed too humbling to be reasonably required or expected. The objection, however, is the dictate of pride; for whatever may be the maxims and opinions of the world on the subject, the most honourable and becoming course is that which the apostle has prescribed:—"Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath, for it is written, 'Vengeance is mine: I will repay, saith the Lord.' Therefore if thine enemy hunger feed him; if he thirst give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

Is the apostle's precept then to be understood in an absolute and unqualified sense? Does it require us at any expense to follow peace with all men? In reply to this question, I would refer to the same precept as it is elsewhere stated in Scripture, when the apostle says to the Romans, "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men." The injunction as thus expressed, obviously assumes, that there may be cases in which it is not possible for Christians to live in peace with all men; and every one who knows any thing of the world or of the Christian warfare, must know that such cases do frequently occur—cases in which peace can be attained, only in a way in which it must not be followed. The Christian, for example, may be brought into connexion with men who will not permit him peaceably to maintain his religious profession—men who will take offence at many things in his character and conduct, which they feel to be a silent reproof of their own—and who will not be backward, therefore, to manifest their dislikes in such a way as may be sufficiently annoying to put his steadfastness to a severe trial. There is reason to believe, that in all ranks of society, the young especially are frequently exposed to such a temptation; and that no efforts on their part will be successful in disarming the opposition of such gainsayers, unless they consent to abate somewhat of their rigorous adherence to Christian principle, or, it may be, run into a participation with them in their unholy practices. It is plain, however, that peace is not to be purchased at such a price; and our text plainly intimates that it is not; for while the apostle admonishes Christians "earnestly to follow peace with all men," he adds, "and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." It is evident, indeed, in the case of the Hebrews, that without this qualification, the command to follow peace with all men must have led to an open renunciation of their christian profession; inasmuch as nothing short of this could have disarmed the opposition of unbelieving and ungodly men, at whose hands they had already suffered bitter persecution, and endured a great fight of afflictions. But in fact, the peace here inculcated, is itself a branch of that holiness, "without which no man shall see the Lord;" for inasmuch as it implies on the part of those who follow it, forbearance, compassion, and affectionate concern for the well-being of others, it is that in which they do most clearly reflect the image of their Divine Master—of Him, "who patiently endured such contradiction of sinners against himself"—"who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously." But this very holiness, so far from securing for Christians peace and goodwill with all men, may sometimes be the very means of rendering them objects of suspicion and secret dislike, if not of open hatred: for though our Lord's birth was announced as peace on earth and good will to men—and though the tendency of every thing in his life and doctrine was to reconcile them to God and to one another, yet in point of fact the guilty passions of men have often converted the Gospel of Peace into an occasion of animosity and strife. And all this was foretold by our Lord himself; for we find him, on a certain occasion, saying to his disciples, "Suppose ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you, nay; but rather division: for from henceforth there shall be five in one house divided, three against two, and two against three." Christians, then, are neither required nor permitted to follow peace with all men, at the expense of compromising any Christian principle, or relinquishing any Christian duty: for whatever quietness they might thereby secure, they would only be contributing to the temporary and deceitful stillness of spiritual death—leaving men undisturbed in the fatal indulgence of sin. Holiness, in the Scripture acceptance of the term, will always be offensive to ungodly men—for besides comprehending in it the practice of all those virtues, and the faithful discharge of all those duties, which are essential to the temporal well-being of society, and which most men, therefore, are able in some measure to appreciate, and disposed to approve,—it implies also such a devout sense of the Divine presence—such a reverential regard for the Divine law—and such a spiritual tone of mind and character, as cannot fail to lead those who witness it to think more frequently and more solemnly of God and of eternal things than they feel it agreeable or easy to do. But, however offensive it may be, no part of Christian holiness must be left uncultivated. Till we are brought into a state of entire conformity to the Divine image, we cannot be in a state of preparedness for the full enjoyment of the Divine presence: and if we are not now in the way of being transformed into this likeness—if we are not conscious of a growing capacity for spiritual enjoyment, even delighting ourselves in God—but if, on the contrary, we feel aversion to that spirituality of character, which the Scriptures do everywhere ascribe to the saints, then what is the blessedness to which we professedly look forward in another world? If here we can see nothing to admire in the Divine character, as revealed to us in Scripture, or in the Divine image, as it is partially reflected in our fellow-men—and if now we can find no gratification or delight in holding fellowship with God; it is obvious that a more vivid manifestation of his perfections, and a nearer approach to his presence, such as the Scriptures represent heaven to be, would only prove infinitely more distasteful to us: and it follows, therefore, from the very nature of things, what is here announced as the unalterable ordination of God, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord."

MISSIONS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT M'CHEYNE.

THE advantages which the Christian mind derives from a constant intercourse with Missionary subjects, are very many and very great.

I. A spirit of intercession in behalf of the heathen is encouraged.

It was "when Jesus saw the multitudes that he was moved with compassion, and made his disciples pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth labourers into his harvest." (Matt. ix. 36.) This shows how completely the Son of God was also the son of man, for with us it is always the sight of the object that calls forth the emotion. We come—we see—we are conquered. It was "when Paul saw the city wholly given to idolatry that his spirit was stirred in him." (Acts, xvii. 16.) The eye affected the heart. Just so will it be with every Christian mind. Set him down, like Buchanan, among the myriads that shout around the car of Juggernaut; or, like Gutzlaff, among the more civilized idolaters of China,—the man who is the follower of Paul, as he was of Christ, will be "stirred in spirit," and "moved with compassion," and one vent of the full heart will be in prayer to the Lord of the harvest. But we who sit at home cannot see the spirit-stirring sight, we are cut off from this blessed influence to drive us to our knees. Nor can any written information wholly make up this deficiency. The hearing of the ear will never produce so powerful an effect as the seeing with the eye. Yet, in the absence of the greater influence, how dare we neglect to use the less? When we cannot see, how dare we refuse to hear? If we live in ignorance of the state of the heathen world, how can we pray intelligently on its behalf? If we content ourselves with general notions of its idolatries, and barbarities, and struggles against the Light, shall not our petitions be general, unfervent, and ineffectual? On the prayers of the children of God depends the coming of the kingdom and the conversion of the heathen, as it is said in the 2d Psalm, "Ask of me." Should not every child of God then bring himself under those influences which shall bind him to intelligent, fervent, effectual prayer on this behalf. Come, then, true child of God, who art bound to the service of Christ in thy native soil, come and let us gather from the records of faithful men who have jeopardized their lives in the high places of heathenism, food for meditation, and incitement to prayer. Let us give ear to these spies of the land of darkness, that when they tell us of some spot where grace is beginning to drop from above "like the first of a thunder shower," our prayers, mingled with thanksgivings, may arise with interest and intelligence on this special behalf: or, when they tell us of some stronghold of Satan, fortified on every side by the triple brass of superstition, self-righteousness, and lust, our united cry may ascend into the ears of the Lord God of Sabaoth,—“Have respect unto the covenant, for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty.”

II. Intercourse with Missionary subjects helps forward personal holiness.

We find in 1 Thess. ii. 16, that "forbidding the preaching of the word to the Gentiles," was looked upon by God as the filling up the cup of sins,—the crowning transgression of the Jewish people; and conversely, the bidding and enabling faithful men to preach the word to the Gentiles, is one of the essential virtues of the child of God. And if it be a good and gracious thing to send grace, it is but the continuation of this grace to look after them,—to sympathise with their difficulties and encouragements,—to weep with them when they weep over obstinate sinners,—to rejoice with them and the angels, when they rejoice over one sinner that repenteth. But love increases and abounds, the more it is conversant with its object; increase on appetite seems to grow by what it feeds on; and the sure effect of increasing and abounding love toward all men, is a surer establishment in personal holiness. (1 Thess. iii. 12, 13.) The very effort of sending a man to convert others, makes us ask the question, "Am I myself converted?" The very sight of so many millions left in ignorance of "the only name whereby we may be saved," whilst we have heard it from our infancy, overpowers the believing mind with an abiding sense of the sovereignty of God, and the freeness of his electing love. Privileges are used more ardently,—thanksgivings are offered more feelingly,—“What have I that I did not receive,” is graven more durably upon the heart. And if God does bless the efforts of our Missionaries, how is every grace of the new nature stirred into a burning flame! When the Greenlander, the Hindoo, or the Chinese becomes a believer in Jesus,—when the same gracious feelings which sparkled in our bosoms "when first we saw the Lord,"—have evidently got possession of these barbarian souls,—when we can trace a kindredness of sentiment and affection,—a oneness of spirit with these last of men,—then we remember that it is written, "we being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another." Our lagging faith is by sympathy quickened into active exercise. The flame of our "first love" is rekindled, and we hasten to "do the first works."

III. Intercourse with Missionary subjects makes us watch more anxiously the coming of the kingdom.

"When the world shall say peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them." To them "the day of the Lord cometh as a thief in the night." But the children of God "are not in darkness that that day should overtake them as a thief." Does not this Bible truth imply that the saints are watchful and intelligent as to the signs of the times? And is not the state of the Jewish and heathen world the very page to which we must chiefly look for signs of the latter day glory? "When the branch of the fig-tree is yet tender and putteth forth leaves, we know that summer is nigh." So likewise shall there be infallible signs of the coming of the season when the Beloved shall speak and say unto his bride, "Rise up my love, my fair one, and come away. For lo the winter is past, the rain is over and gone." These buddings and premonitions of the coming summer of our world, "none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand." And why? Just because "the wise," the taught of God, are not fools nor slow of heart to believe all that is written concerning the coming of the kingdom of Jesus; and they are on the watch for the first vibrations of that shaking of the earth and the heavens that shall usher in the kingdom "that cannot be moved." Where is the intelligent child of God who is not even now looking with most intense interest upon the movements now making in Hindostan, and upon the strange spirit of enquiry that within these few years has caused such a shaking in the Jewish community, like the shaking of the dry bones in the open valley? As upon the first streaks of the eastern sky before the breaking of the day,—the day when "the fulness of the Gentiles being come in, all Israel shall be saved,"—the day when the whole temple being completed, of which Christ is the foundation-stone, corner-stone, and top-stone,—the Lord shall "be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe."

Child of God, sleep not thou as do others, but having thine own heart established with grace, be ever moving the anxious question, "Watchman, what of the night? watchman, what of the night?" And then shall the answer be returned to thee,—“The morning cometh!”

ISHMAEL IN THE DESERT.*

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

THE story of the young and adventurous Ishmael forms an episode in patriarchal history full of interest, on account of the disastrous circumstances with which it opens, and of its exhibiting in the character and habits of that wayward youth, the germ of a mode of life, whose wild and irregular feelings are still indelibly impressed on one of the most singular people that have existed in the world. Of the various misfortunes, however, that clouded his early days, it does not fall within our province to speak; and, accordingly, we hasten to consider him in the situation of an outcast from his father's tent, and wandering in the neighbouring wilderness of Beersheba. For whatever reason he had repented to that desolate region—whether he chose it as the nearest route to Egypt for his mother, who was going to seek in her own country, and among her kindred, for the asylum which the jealousy of her mistress denied her,—or whether his proud spirit had resolved to bury its cares and disappointments in the depths of that boundless solitude, he had scarcely planted his footsteps within its border, when he was overtaken by one of those disasters so common to those who attempt to explore the secrets of the Desert. It is impossible to read the simple and graphic narrative of the sacred historian without emotions of the liveliest sympathy in behalf both of the youthful sufferer, whom a burning thirst was threatening with a premature and excruciating death, and of the distracted mother, who, wrapped up in the fate of her son, appeared totally insensible to the misery of her own situation, alone and without hope in an inhospitable wild. But, perhaps, of those who give the tribute of their generous pity to the affecting tale of Ishmael's distress, few are aware of the real extent of a calamity altogether unknown in a temperate climate, or can picture to themselves how severe must have been the privation that prostrated the spirit and energies of a youth of seventeen, whose hardy frame and intrepid character soon after made him the first among the stirring spirits of the place. We are so accustomed to the influence of a humid atmosphere, and a sky tempered by the friendly interposition of clouds,—to perpetual verdure smiling on the mountains and valleys, and rivers diffusing their watery treasures by a thousand channels, and forming essential elements of every landscape, that we find it difficult to entertain the idea of a scene so fearfully wild as to be destitute of every one of these natural features, or to conceive the dreadful state to which the want of them—especially the want of the common article of water—often reduces the unfortunate people who chance to be placed in a situation so unpropitious. This, however, was precisely the character of the dreary solitude whose want of resources had so nearly proved fatal to Ishmael. The wilderness of Beersheba, or Shur, lying at the north-eastern extremity of the Red Sea, and forming the northern part of the great Arabian Desert, is, according to the testimony of those who have crossed it, a vast expanse of uninhabited country, which, by the straightest route from north to south, cannot be traversed in less than about forty days; and it is so wild and desolate a region, that it seems to have been doomed by the Creator to the curse of perpetual sterility. Throughout the whole extent of it not a blade of verdure is to be seen, nor the voice of living thing to be heard, and but for a few hardy plants—the tamarind and acacia, which here and there strike their roots into the clefts of the rocks, and nourished by the dews of night, “waste their sweetness on the desert air”—there would be nothing to dispel the feeling which this dismal scene strongly produces, that here was a region where nature was wholly dead. Vain is the hope of the traveller, that, the first dreary spots being passed, his eye may yet rest on some oasis, his panting frame be refreshed under some grateful shade, and he may arrive at some stage where the peopled city or village will remunerate his toils with the pleasures of society. From day to day, from morn to night, he prosecutes his irksome journey, while nothing is seen but the same tedious monotony,—nothing but the frightful precipices and the bright sand,—which the fierce rays of a vertical sun are scorching.

— “There no spring in murmurs breaks away,
Or moss-grown fountains mitigate the day;
In vain he hopes the green delights to know,
Which plains more blessed or verdant vales bestow;
There rocks alone, or tasteless sands are found,
And faint and sickly winds for ever howl around.”

COLLINS.

The springs are but few and scanty all over the desert, in that part especially where Ishmael wandered, a traveller who crossed it having found only four in the space of a hundred and fifteen miles, situated at the distance of four, six, and even eight days' journey from each other; and, besides the danger of missing them, always liable to happen in a trackless solitude, but particularly so in the wilderness of Paran, which in many places is full of rugged and precipitous cliffs, around the base of which the traveller has to seek his way; it may happen, that after the greatest exertions have been made to reach these springs, they are found entirely choked with the moving sand, or that they prove, to the mortification of the luckless traveller, so impregnated with brackish qualities, from the beds of sulphur or salt over which they roll, as to increase, instead of allaying, his already insufferable intensity of thirst. And then follows a scene of the most dreadful and protracted sufferings which a human being can experience. The burning thirst, rendered more violent by the fierce heat of the glowing firmament and the fiery sand, produces an intense agony in every part of the frame, and the dry and contracted feeling of the skin, the eyes appearing like balls of coagulated blood, the unnatural swelling and hardness of the tongue and lips, increasing difficulty of seeing and hearing, the total loss of speech, together with the most painful sensations in the throat; all these, which are invariable consequences of unalleviated thirst, indicate a universal derangement of the bodily system, produce langour and insensibility, and at last bring the unhappy sufferer, after many a struggle, to drop on the ground, happy if, like Ishmael, he can purchase a brief respite from his misery, by sheltering his scorched head under one of the dwarfish acacias that are strewed around.* In such circumstances, it is said that five hundred dollars have been given for a draught of water. But, in general, where one is placed in such extremities, all who are with him are, more or less, in a similar state of distress; and then no bribe, however great, no entreaties, however importunate, can procure a single drop; for of what use would all the wealth of the Indies be in a place where death would be the inevitable consequence of parting with the precious beverage? The master of a whole caravan is then not better privileged than the meanest of his slaves; and, as the desire of self-preservation triumphs over every consideration, when one drops the victim of thirst, his companions, however they may commiserate the sufferer, are obliged to pass on without delay, and abandon him to his fate. And how terrible such a situation, to be exposed in a savage interminable desert! In vain does he exert his expiring energies, in a last effort to cry out for help, or to hoist the signal of distress. Not a soul is near to whisper the accent of sympathy, or to pour a drop of water on his burning lips, not even an echo responds to his cries, and he lies there, dreaming of the murmur of limpid streams, and of wandering along the verdant banks, and stooping to swallow the delicious draught, till the effort to obey the impulse of imagination dissipates the enchantment, and awakens him to all the horrible realities of his situation,—a helpless and forsaken wanderer, perishing for thirst in a vast howling wilderness!

* Thevenot found a person in precisely the same circumstances as Ishmael, having, in his agony, thrust his panting head under a small bush, to smell any damp that might be there. These small bushes were probably the very cause of Ishmael and his mother not being able to see the well which was so near him. Mr Campbell was once in this predicament. Having travelled the whole day without water, and halted about sunset in great distress from thirst, he found in the morning that he had been spending the night within a few yards of an abundant supply of the precious fluid.

No general description, however, of the misery of such a situation can convey so vivid a picture of Ishmael's distress as the unvarnished and circumstantial narratives of those who have had the courage to brave, and the good fortune to survive, the perils of the same, or a similar scene. And, to the reader of the Bible, who meets, both in the story of the son of Hagar, and the travels of the Israelites in the wilderness, with several notices of this kind of distress, which the rapid narrative of Moses introduces only by incidental allusion, an important and grateful service may be rendered by subjoining the most interesting particulars of the accounts of some individuals who have felt all the horrors consequent on a failure of water in the Arabian desert. The following story is given on the testimony of the celebrated Burckhardt, who travelled over that dreary region; it relates to a small caravan of five merchants, with about thirty slaves, and a proportionate number of camels, who were passing, for the purposes of trade, from Berber to Egypt, and having received intelligence that they were to be way-laid by a band of robbers at a well which lay on their road, they determined on choosing a more easterly route, by another well of no less repute with travellers. They had placed themselves under the conduct of a trusty and experienced guide, but as the way they had chosen was not much frequented, they soon wandered out of the proper track, and for five days could not discover where they were. Meanwhile their stock of water failed, and as their necessities were increasing every hour, they determined to direct their course by the setting sun, in hopes of reaching the Nile. After having sustained the pangs of thirst for two days, fifteen of the slaves and two of the merchants died. Another, who was owner of the camels, conceiving that the beasts might, by sagacity or instinct, be more successful than their masters in discovering the situation of water, requested his companions to tie him fast to the saddle of his stoutest remaining camel, to prevent his falling through weakness, and then allowed the animal to carry him in whatever direction it chose; but neither the merchant nor his camels were afterwards heard of. Meanwhile the caravan, now diminished to a little party, came in sight of the mountains of Shigrè, which they recognised, and where they knew they were certain of finding water; but they were so greatly enfeebled, through fatigue and privation, that neither men nor beasts were able to proceed any further. Throwing themselves down at the foot of a projecting rock, whose shade promised them a little respite from their misery, they despatched two servants, with two of the strongest remaining camels, in quest of water. The messengers, however, had not proceeded far ere one of them dropped on the ground, through perfect feebleness, and, unable to speak, merely waved his hand to his companion to leave him, and to return with water as quickly as possible. The survivor accordingly continued his solitary and now almost hopeless task,—for so great was his own debility, and the excessive thirst that preyed on him, that his eyes became dim, and he lost the road, though he was well acquainted with the situation of the spring. Having wandered about a long time he alighted under the shade of a tree, and fastened the camel to one of the branches, but the impatient beast having scented the water, broke its halter, and, wearied as it was, galloped off at a furious rate in the direction of the well, which, it afterwards appeared, was about half an hour's distance. The servant well understood the movements of the camel, and hastened to follow it, but after advancing a few hundred yards he fell exhausted on the ground, and had lain a considerable time, expecting nothing but death, when a kind Providence directed a Bedouin of the neighbourhood to that place, who threw a little water on the face of the expiring man, and in a short time succeeded in restoring him. They proceeded together to the spring, and after filling as many skins as they could carry, returned to the stragglers of the caravan, whom they had the satisfaction of finding still alive.

A French traveller relates an occurrence similar to this, but which awakens a more melancholy interest, both from the greater number of persons who were overtaken with the calamity, and the disastrous consequences with which it was attended. The caravan belonged to a Turk who speculated in the slave trade, and who having with great care, and at a great expense, reared and educated some female slaves he possessed, was on his way to dispose of them at the market of Bagdad. They had taken with them a copious supply of water, and had calculated on being able to renew it at a well which they had to pass; but, to their great disappointment, they found it completely dried, and they were reduced, in consequence, to the greatest distress. The first object that struck the eye of the Frenchman as he approached, was the owner of the caravan running about in a state of distraction, and bewailing, in most doleful terms, his situation, and the ruin of his fortunes; on a nearer view a spectacle was disclosed that would have wrung pity out of the hardest heart. In the midst of twelve eunuchs and about a hundred camels, was a band of two hundred girls of most exquisite beauty, of from twelve to fifteen years of age, lying on the ground in a state approaching to insensibility, produced by excessive fatigue and thirst. Some had already sunk under their distress, and were thrown into a pit dug for the purpose; the greater part, however, showed, by their panting bosoms and imploring looks, that they were still alive, but so faint and feeble that had water been within their reach, they could not have made the necessary exertion to carry it to their lips. The air was rent with the piercing cries of the dying girls, and many a wistful eye was cast on the traveller and his companions for a drop of the precious fluid. Deeply affected by such a scene, he was proceeding to open his leathern bottle, and to distribute its contents among as many as possible of the pitiable objects, when his guide rushing forward with the peremptory exclamation: "Madman, wouldst thou have us also perish of thirst," dashed off the unfortunate slaves, seized hold of the water skin, and threatened with instant death the first who ventured to touch it. The traveller, knowing that the ruthless Arab was in the right, and was acting as his own friend, was obliged to yield to the cruel necessity; and, as their departure from the scene of horror took away the last ray of hope from the perishing girls, a shriek of despair was raised, every one crying out with frantic vehemence for death to come and relieve them from their sufferings.—It was a most distressing scene; even the Arab, not unused to such spectacles, could no longer resist; he took one that lay nearest him, poured a drop of water on her burning lips, and placed her behind him on his camel, with the view of presenting her as a present to his wife. The poor slave fainted several times as she parted from the spot, —but being borne across the desert at a rapid pace by her deliverers, was spared the agony of witnessing the death that inevitably awaited her less fortunate companions.

ON THE ARRANGEMENT OBSERVED IN THE ASSEMBLY'S SHORTER CATECHISM.

BY THE REV. DUNCAN MACPARRAN,

Minister of Renfrew.

FREQUENT notice has been taken of the extraordinary simplicity of arrangement and depth of thought observable in the Assembly's Shorter Catechism. Of the former, I have just had a remarkable proof, in reading over Dr Chalmers' Preface to the first volume of the new edition of his works. With his usual clearness and analytical acumen, he proposes two methods of studying Theology. According to the one, the first object of contemplation is the Divine Being; and then the history of his doings in this world; detailed in natural, if not chronological order. The other fixes at once on some awakened sinner, and accompanying him as he advances in knowledge and holiness, describes progressively the discoveries which he makes, or which are made to him, in the word and works of God. The former considers God abstractly, and follows out the other branches as so many of his works. And divinity taught upon this principle, recommends itself to reason, as regularly deductive and capable of systematic arrangement. And accordingly, this is the principle on which catechisms and systems of divinity are usually constructed. The other, instead of the matter observed, takes up the observer; and simply recording what he is supposed to see and feel, as he advances towards perfection, the same subjects pass in review; but they are seen from different points, and under different lights. They are seen, not as abstract truths, but as practical directions. And this, therefore, is the view of divine truth best fitted for the guidance of the heart and conduct. The principles thus referred to, are, if we mistake not, the same with the categories of Aristotle and the first principles of Bacon; the one assuming, as the basis of his arrangement, being, or the things about which men think; and the other, the powers of mind by which these are known and enjoyed. Now, it is perhaps new to some of our readers to be told, that the profound distinctions of an Aristotle and a Bacon, are employed in the construction of that humble Primer called the Shorter Catechism; and that the prolific mind of a Chalmers could not have selected a finer example of its own original speculations, than is to be found in this directory for catechising such as are of a weaker capacity.

The number of Questions in this little manual, is, in all, one hundred and seven. The first three are introductory—God's chief or principal end in creating man, the rule by which men may attain to that end, and the principal branches into which that rule may be divided, are the topics thus introduced.

From the beginning of the fourth Question, to the end of the thirty-eighth, we have a system of divinity, regularly constructed according to the first of the two principles explained. Every thing stated under these questions, is laid down speculatively; that is, as a matter of study and contemplation, not of command and direction. Each answer tells us what is, and not what should be. The arrangement of topics, also, is such as to shew their consecutive dependence on each other, so that, like so many links of a chain, they are all suspended from the primary Question,—“What is God?” This will be observed in a mere rehearsal of the subjects, of which the Questions are composed;—the being and attributes of God,—the persons in the Godhead —the divine purposes or decrees,—the execution of these in creation,—their fulfilment in providence,—the special providence of God towards man, in an unfallen state,—in the fall and its consequences,—in redemption from these,—in the character and offices of the Redeemer,—in what he did on earth to redeem man, and in what he is raised to in heaven, for the farther purposes of redemption,—in applying to sinners the blessings of redemption by the Holy Spirit,—his operations in effectual calling, justification, adoption, and sanctification,—and the fruits of these in life, at death, at the resurrection, and throughout eternity.

From the beginning of the thirty-ninth Question, to the end of the book, the topics are strictly practical, and they are so arranged as to furnish an appropriate directory for every stage of Christian advancement. The subjects introduced, are not presented speculatively, but as pointing to the conscience and the heart, and as leading forth the mind, and guiding the conduct, into the ways of God. And accordingly, the arrangement, instead of assuming some principle in the matter of contemplation, assumes a principle in the man, and proceeds to address and direct him in all his advances onward to perfection. It is in this way that the thirty-ninth Question commences with what “God requireth of man?” It is thus the first arrow driven from this quiver, is so pointed as to aim at the conscience, God's witness in man. And the commandments which follow, are as a bundle of these. They are variously pointed, yet all have a point; and this very diversity only fits them the more for the diversified circumstances in which man is found. One, for example, is aimed at the conscience of such as worship strange gods,—another at those who worship even the true God, through the medium of images,—a third at the blasphemer,—a fourth at the Sabbath-breaker,—a fifth at children who are disobedient to parents,—a sixth at murderers,—a seventh at adulterers,—an eighth at thieves,—a ninth at liars,—and a tenth at the covetous. And to render each of these sharp as a “two-edged sword,” there is under each, first, what concerns the “want of conformity to;” and then, what belongs to the “transgression of;” in other words, a “required,” and a “forbidden,” with occasional reasons also annexed. Nor does each commandment point only to as many individual sins or duties, but under these, to as many classes of both. It is therefore scarcely possible to conceive of any arrangement better fitted to bring home guilt to every conscience. And it is accordingly followed by other questions, respecting man's inability to keep the commands, the sins of which he thus becomes guilty, and the eternal judgments to which he is exposed. By these, he is left helpless and hopeless, under a sentence of condemnation, and is thus driven to enquire, what he must do to be saved. Here the very next question takes him up, tells him how he may escape the wrath and curse of God due by sin, and explains this, under the heads of faith in Jesus Christ, repentance unto life, and the ordinary means of grace. Even in this subordinate arrangement, the condition of the enquirer is kept steadily in view. The only direct answer which can be given to the question, "What must I do to be saved?" is "repent and believe;" and agreeably to this, the only points immediately explained in the Catechism, are faith in Jesus Christ, and repentance unto life. Repentance is the turning of the heart from every thing else to God, as reconciled in Christ; and faith is the looking at Christ believingly, as the gift of God, and receiving him as the salvation of the soul. But this very "looking at Christ," and "turning of the heart" to God, as reconciled in Christ, imply some knowledge of his will, and create a desire for the enjoyment of other ordinances. And these next follow, under the teaching of the word, the observance of the sacraments, and the exercise of prayer. An awakened and repenting sinner seeks early and earnestly to know the will of God. The Catechism meets him, offering instruction respecting the profitable reading of the word, and waiting on the ordinance of preaching. But supposing him to be in some measure instructed, he yet desires to receive seals of the covenant, and may never before have partaken of any of its signs. The nature, use, and proper observance of the sacraments are therefore now unfolded. And last of all comes prayer, not as if the individual were up till this time considered prayerless, but because it is now that he especially requires to be taught how to pray for such things as he ought; and this, because it is now that he declares himself to be an heir of those promises on which prayer rests, and through which it obtains blessings. The prayer of the soul, like breath in the natural body, is essential to life, and, like it, begins properly as soon as we are born anew. But though this be its beginning, its end is unseen. The renewed soul becoming more and more conformed to the will of God, enters more and more into the spirit of prayer, and finds, in the simple but comprehensive example with which the Catechism concludes, materials more and more fitted for guiding its intercourse with the Father of spirits.

1. By using the Catechism in the right observance of these distinctions and principles, we shall be better able to understand each question in its true and proper meaning; and the reason why such questions as Effectual Calling and Justification are so far separated from Faith in Jesus Christ and Repentance unto Life; and how, in general, the doctrines of the gospel, as contained in both parts of the Catechism, should not be together. These things happen, simply because we have, in the first, a speculative system, and, in the latter, a practical directory. The doctrines of the Gospel are necessary to both, but require to be presented in different forms, so as the more perfectly to secure the different ends contemplated.

2. Each division may thus be turned to its own proper use. Suppose, for example, that I were asked in what book a clear outline of the Christian faith might be found and studied, I would at once say, "In the first thirty-eight Questions of the Assembly's Shorter Catechism." But if I were asked for a practical guide, to lead men to Christ, and to train them to holiness, I would say, "Begin at the thirty-ninth Question, and be guided by those which follow, onward to the end."

3. Given children might, on these principles, be taught to greater advantage than they usually are. Instead of beginning to instruct a child, respecting the abstract character of God, the distinctions of personality in the Godhead, the doctrine of decrees, and other matters of difficult comprehension, I would begin my attempts to instruct him, with the meaning and application of each succeeding commandment, and onwards to the end; by which time, he would have materials out of which to conceive of God, of his purposes and works; and his mind would be also, in some measure, prepared for more abstract processes of thinking.

4. Much of the apparent abstruseness of this little work would in this way disappear, and on the same principle on which science becomes comparatively easy, when perceived in a proper course and by proper means. Depart from the arrangements of a Linnæus and Jussieu, and the beautiful order observable in botany will appear confused and perplexing; or invert the order in any process of mathematical enquiry, and the evenness of the way along which we find an easy path, will be rugged to the master, and impassable to the pupil. And strange were it, indeed, if an arrangement so exact and so well adapted to its own special ends as that of the Catechism, should nevertheless leave each Question to be taken up, like some cube cast on a gammon board, in any order and with equal intelligence.

5. If these principles and distinctions were more observed, more justice would be done to the merits of the work, and it would be rendered more generally useful.

Burying alive of Widows in India.—The burying alive of widows manifests, if that were possible, a still more abominable state of feeling toward women than the burning them alive. The weaners (caste or tribe of weaners) bury their dead. When, therefore, a widow of this tribe is deluded into the determination not to survive her husband, she is buried alive with the dead body. In this kind of immolation, the children and relations dig the grave. After certain ceremonies have been attended to, the poor widow arrives, and is let down into the pit. She sits in the centre, taking the dead body on her lap, and encircling it with her arms. These relations now begin to throw in the soil; and after a short space, two of them descend into the grave, and tread the earth firmly round the body of the widow. She sits a calm and unremonstrating spectator of the horrid process. She sees the earth rising higher and higher around her, without upbraiding her murderers, or making the least effort to arise and make her escape. At length the earth reaches her lips—covers her head. The rest of the earth is then hastily thrown in, and these children and relations mount the grave, and tread down the earth upon the head of the suffocating widow—the mother!—Why, my dear friend, the life of the vilest beast that walks upon the earth is never taken away by a process so slow, so deliberate, so diabolical as this. And this is the state of your sex in British India!—In how many situations, where we expected it not, are we reminded of the testimony of the divine word; in every part of the heathen world, in the miserable state of woman, what a confirmation of the denunciation,—“To the woman, He said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow.”—Genesis, iii. 16.

SACRED POETRY.

TO A FRIEND ENTERING THE MINISTRY.

High thoughts at first, and visions high
 Are ours of easy victory;
 The Word we hear seems so divine,
 So framed for Adam's guilty line,
 That none, unto ourselves we say,
 Of all his sinning suffering race,
 Will hear that Word so full of grace,
 And coldly turn away.
 But soon a sadder mood comes round—
 High hopes have fallen to the ground,
 And the ambassadors of peace
 Go weeping, that men will not cease
 To strive with Heaven,—they weep and mourn,
 That suffering men will not be blest—
 That weary men refuse to rest,
 And wanderers to return.
 Well is it, if has not ensued
 Another and a worse mood,
 When all unfaithful thoughts have way,
 When we hang down our hands, and say
 Alas! it is a weary pain,
 To seek with toil and fruitless strife—
 To chafe the numbed limbs into life,
 That will not live again.
 Then if spring odours on the wind
 Float by, they bring into our mind
 That it were wiser done, to give
 Our hearts to nature, and to live
 For her—or in the student's bower
 To search into her hidden things,
 And seek in books the wondrous springs
 Of knowledge and of power.
 Or if we dare not thus draw back,
 Yet, oh! to shun the crowded track
 And the rude throng of men! to dwell
 In hermitage or lonely cell,
 Feeding all longings that aspire
 Like incense heavenward, and with care,
 And lonely vigil nursing there
 Faith's solitary pyre.
 Oh! let not us this thought allow—
 The heat, the dust upon our brow,
 Signs of the contest we may wear:
 Yet thus we shall appear more fair
 In our Almighty Master's eye,
 Than if in fear to lose the bloom,
 Or ruffle the soul's lightest plume,
 We from the strife should fly.
 And for the rest in weariness,
 In disappointment, or distress,
 When strength decays, or hope grows dim,
 We ever may recur to Him,
 Who has the golden oil divine,
 Wherewith to feed our fading urns,
 Who watches every lamp that burns
 Before his Sacred shrine.

THE FOOLISH LOVE OF THE WORLD.

Judge in thyself, O Christian! is it meet
 To set thine heart on what beasts set their feet?
 'Tis no hyperbole, if you be told,
 You delve for dross with mattocks made of gold.
 Affections are too costly to bestow
 Upon the fair faced nothings here below:
 The eagle scorns to fall down from on high,
 The proverb saith, to pounce a silly fly;
 And can a Christian leave the face of God
 To embrace the earth, and doat upon a clod!

JOHN FLAVEL, 1680.

"AS THY DAY, SO SHALL THY STRENGTH BE."

When adverse winds and waves arise,
 And in my heart despondence sighs,—
 When life her throng of care reveals,
 And weakness o'er my spirit steals,—
 Grateful I hear the kind decree,
 That "as my day my strength shall be."

When, with sad footstep, memory roves
 'Mid smitten joys, and buried loves,—
 When sleep my tearful pillow flies,
 And dewy morning drinks my sighs,—
 Still to thy promise, Lord, I flee,
 That "as my day my strength shall be."

One trial more must yet be past;
 One pang,—the keenest and the last;
 And when, with brow convulsed and pale,
 My feeble quivering heart-strings fail,
 Redeemer, grant my soul to see
 That "as her day her strength shall be."

LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

It is to the children of God you are obliged for the support of the world; they, as it were, bear up the pillars of it; and that moment God has called in his last elect, the world will be burnt up. When Lot lingered, the angel took hold of his hand, and the hand of his wife, and the hand of his two daughters, and brought them out of the city, for the angel said, "I cannot do any thing till thou be come to Zoar," and when he had got safe to Zoar, God rained fire upon Sodom.—*M. Interesting Facts.—Gibbon, who in his celebrated History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, has left an imperishable memorial of his enmity to the Gospel, resided many years in Switzerland, where, with the profits of his works, he purchased a considerable estate. This property has descended to a gentleman, who out of his rents expends a large sum annually in the promulgation of that very Gospel which his predecessor insidiously endeavoured to undermine, not having had courage openly to assail it. Voltaire boasted, that with one hand he would overthrow that edifice of Christianity, which required the hands of twelve apostles to build up. At this day, the press which he employed at Fery to print his blasphemies, is actually employed at Geneva in printing the Holy Scriptures. Thus the self-same engine, which he set to work to destroy the credit of the Bible, is engaged in disseminating its truths. It may also be added as a remarkable circumstance, that the first provisional meeting for the re-formation of an Auxiliary Bible Society at Edinburgh, was held in the very room in which Hume died.

THE DIVISION OF MANKIND INTO FAMILIES.

BY THE REV. JAMES BUCHANAN,
Minister of North Leith.

THE Family Arrangement is a divine institution. It is not a creation of human policy, nor a result of human contrivance, but the wise and well-ordered product of divine wisdom and benevolence; and, indeed, it is one of the most admirable of God's arrangements. His wisdom is not more displayed in the construction of an individual man, than in the construction of the social system in which every such individual is placed. God has chosen that the whole race should be divided into so many little communities; each of which is under the superintendence and government of its natural head, and all its members bound together by the ties of natural sympathy and affection. For this end, he has so arranged the economy of his providence, that men are brought into the world in a state of absolute helplessness—the helplessness of infancy; and that from their earliest years, they are placed in a state of entire dependence on their parents, and of absolute subjection to their authority. They are not created in a condition of solitary independence, but born in certain social relations, which make their very birth a bond of mutual interest and endearment, and provide for them a company of friends and protectors on their first entrance into the world.

The parent is invested with absolute authority;—but that this authority might be tempered in its exercise with mercy and compassion, and that power so despotic might not degenerate into tyranny, God has implanted in every parent's heart a love for his offspring, insomuch that, although previously he may have neither felt nor shewn any peculiar liking for children, yet no sooner is his child born, than the instinct comes into play, and his heart yearns over the little one with a new and hitherto unknown tenderness. This parental affection is perfectly disinterested, being irrespective of all personal profit or advantage, and contemplating only the comfort and welfare of its objects; and it is not only so disinterested, but so strong and self-denied, that it prompts the parent to subject himself to many hardships and privations in the upbringing of his children, which nothing else except a strong natural affection would prompt him to undergo. But for this natural instinct, the Family Arrangement could not serve the beneficent purposes for which it was designed.

These purposes are, to draw forth into exercise, and, by exercising, to develope and strengthen, the moral and social affections of infant humanity—to bring children from their earliest infancy under a course of training—to form in them habits of subjection to authority—of submission to a superior will—of order, and regularity, and self-denial in their daily conduct, and thus to prepare them, as it were in a private nursery, for the intercourse, and business, and duties of manhood;—these, in reference to the present and visible world,—but far more in reference to the world invisible and eternal,—to secure for them, from their earliest infancy, the benefit of a father's counsel and a father's care: to teach them betimes the lessons of piety, commended with persuasive power by the lips of a parent, whom God would have to be at once a master and a priest in his own house,—and to give them, by the type of an earthly father, some idea of the character in which He himself best loves to be known, even as their Father in Heaven!

The institution of families seems to be one of God's chief ordinances for the education of the world. Even did the children of a family receive no set lessons—they are so placed by a wise Providence, that they cannot fail to derive from their connections a large amount of useful information; they pick it up, day by day, from the conversation and example of those who are older and more experienced than themselves; and all the advantages which they derive from the intimate and familiar intercourse of domestic life, must be ascribed to that wise arrangement by which one generation of human beings is linked to another—so linked, that the current experience and knowledge of the world, are transmitted imperceptibly, and almost without an effort, from sire to son continually.

Here, then, is the whole human race divided, as it were, into myriads of little communities, each with its own natural head and protector, to whom, by a powerful instinct, every child looks up with reverence, and from whom he hears without quarrel, and believes without hesitation, the instructions that are given, at a period when he is neither qualified to discover the truth for himself, nor to appreciate the grounds of evidence on which it rests.

Were we asked to survey the social system, and to name that part of it which most strikingly illustrates the wisdom and benevolence of God,—which is the most widely beneficial in its results, the most essential to the comfort and happiness of society, the best guarantee of social order and advancement; we should (notwithstanding the difficulty of making a selection, where all is so wise and perfect) point to the FAMILY ARRANGEMENT,—that admirable device of Omniscient Wisdom, whereby the wants of infant humanity are provided for—a practical education in part secured—the exercise and consequent expansion of the affections promoted—that arrangement whereby each of us was taught a fellow-feeling with our kind, and united with society and formed to a fitness for it, ere yet we had learned to speak or walk—that arrangement which leaves no man a solitary recluse, but binds up all nations and kindreds in little domestic monarchies, cemented by strong natural affections, and governed by paternal authority alone—that arrangement which, by conferring power on the parent, and teaching the children subjection from their earliest years, makes every house a school of early training for public life—that family arrangement, we regard as one of the masterpieces of Divine Wisdom. Destroy it, or break down the barriers by which its integrity is as yet preserved, and you will do more to demoralize, and ultimately to disturb society, than could be effected by any other supposable means. No anarchy would be so dreadful—no devastation so universally ruinous, as that which must spring from the disruption or decay of these domestic societies: and valuable as many of our social institutions are—our schools, our colleges, our senates, our municipal and civil institutions, none of them all can bear comparison, in point of practical utility, with the simple and unostentatious arrangement of Providence, by which we are united together in families.

Hence God takes one of his chosen titles: "He is the God of families."—"of all the families of the earth." As such he should be acknowledged, not by individuals merely, but by families in their collective capacity. Every head of a family should be God's priest in his own house, as well as the instructor and pattern of his children: and kneeling down with his children around him, should offer up daily thanks for family mercies, and spread out all the family wants at God's footstool. Oh! if that family be peaceful which is knit together by strong natural affection, how much is its peace hallowed and confirmed, when natural affection is strengthened and purified by the benign influence of Religion! And how consoling to a parent's mind must the reflection be, that, although he may and must be soon removed from among his children on earth, he has committed them as a Family into the hands of his and their Father in Heaven!

The family institute being a chief means of the world's education, the question arises, Ought Religion to be made an exception to that general rule which prescribes the duty of a parent to instruct his children? If so many civil and secular advantages flow from the family arrangement, in consequence of the means thereby afforded for the diffusion of common knowledge amongst mankind, shall we suppose that God had no respect, in this remarkable arrangement, to the diffusion of religious and moral instruction? On the supposition that there is a God, and that man is capable of religion, this exception cannot, on any ground, whether of reason or of expediency, be for one instant admitted; for this were virtually to affirm, that God has less regard for the diffusion of knowledge, in proportion as the subject to which it relates is important to mankind. In the Bible, God declares that the very end for which the Family Arrangement was devised and established, was, that by means of it, religion might be maintained in the world, and transmitted from father to son for ever "Did not God make one? Yet had He the residue of the spirit, and wherefore one? that He might seek a GODLY SEED." (Malachi, ii. 15.) It was, then, with a view to raise up a Godly seed, that the Family Arrangement was formed; and as this can only be secured by the religious instruction of youth, it follows that the teaching of religious truth is the first duty of parents—a duty so fundamental, that it rests on the very end for which marriage was ordained.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF BERNARD GILPIN.

AMONG the many illustrious names which adorned the annals of the Church in Britain during the sixteenth century, that of Bernard Gilpin stands pre-eminent—a man, whose zeal in the cause of pure and undefiled religion was so fervent—and whose public labours for the spread of the Gospel were so incessant, extensive, and successful, as to have procured him the distinguished appellation of the Apostle of the North, while his character exhibited such a bright display of every quality we are accustomed to esteem in man, and venerate in the Christian—his life was such a beautiful portrait of the minister inculcating faith, and the Christian bringing forth the fruits of it in the world, that it deserves to be made familiar to the mind of every reader, as an epistle to be known and read of all men. This venerable person was born in Westmoreland, of a family of rank, established for centuries in that county, and distinguished for their services both in peace and war—in the year 1517, so remarkable for the birth of the Reformation in Germany. After receiving the elementary principles of education at a provincial school, he was, on his parents discovering his strong predilection for retirement and study, removed to the University of Oxford, in order to prepare himself for entering the Church. At that distinguished seminary, he devoted himself principally to the study of Theology, and with such indefatigable zeal and industry did he endeavour to master the original languages of the Scriptures, and accomplish himself in all the subsidiary branches that were thought essential to the character of an able and learned divine, that he was acknowledged, by universal consent, to be the first man of his day: his society was courted by all who were eminent for rank and literature—and after being loaded with the highest honours which his own University had to confer, he was trans-and to the New College, which had been founded by Cardinal Wolsey, and which was supplied, through his influence, with the most illustrious men in the kingdom. The peaceful course of academic life on which he then entered, was interrupted by the keen discussions to which the spread of the Reformed principles gave rise; and as he had been bred up in the Romish faith, and had hitherto enjoyed no opportunity of judging of the new opinions, but from the representations of those who were opposed to them—it is not to be wondered at, that he regarded them with an unfavourable eye, and exerted his great influence to give the death-blow, to what he sincerely, though ignorantly, considered a pestilential heresy.

At an earlier period, he had signalized himself as the champion of the established religion, in a public disputation with the celebrated Hooper, afterwards Bishop of Worcester; and when, during the tolerant reign of Edward VI., the influx of the persecuted Protestants of the Continent into England became greater, and the most encouragement was given to the professors of the Reformed faith, inasmuch, that many of them were preferred to the highest places—and Peter Martyr was established as Divinity Lecturer at Oxford—all eyes were turned to Gilpin, as the best qualified to controvert the doctrines that were so zealously and powerfully taught by this continental divine and his associates. The advocates of Popery saw, with the utmost anxiety, that the whole University were carried away by the eloquent discourses of the new teacher of theology—and that unless some immediate and decisive steps were taken, it would be lost to their cause for ever—and, accordingly, they went, from day to day, with the most urgent solicitations, to Gilpin, to come forward in the defence of the common faith, and vindicate it from the attacks that threatened the stability and existence of the established form of worship. But Gilpin's mind, though not convinced, had been greatly staggered, by his former discussions with Hooper, as to many of the tenets and practices of the Church; and when he at length yielded to the pressing demands of his friends, to engage in a public controversy with Martyr, it was less in the character of a partisan, than of one who was desirous of discovering on which side the truth lay. No sooner was his determination known, than the curiosity of the public was wound up to the highest pitch—the friends of both parties made the most assiduous and extensive preparations, and long before the hour of meeting, the great hall of the College was crowded by an immense throng of people, divided in sentiment, and each confident of the success of his cause, from the powers of the respective champions. It was a deeply interesting and solemn meeting. Martyr began the proceedings of the day, by stating at length the opinions of the Reformers on the various points of Christian doctrine and duty—and by showing that the prevailing notions on these subjects were destitute alike of support from Scripture and the writings of the Fathers. Gilpin listened with the most profound attention to his long and learned discourse; and when at length it came to his own turn to take part in the debate, he rose with the utmost solemnity, and in the midst of an assembly, who waited in breathless expectation, to hear him enter on an indignant and overwhelming refutation of his adversary, he declared himself so struck with the force of Martyr's reasoning, and with a comparison of the weakness of his own arguments with those of the Reformer, that he had nothing to reply, and abruptly gave up the contest, by declaring his resolution never again to engage in the controversy, till he had obtained all the information of which he was desirous, and well sifted the arguments on both sides of the question. Such an honourable acknowledgment betokened a mind that was a sincere lover of truth—and Peter Martyr, contrasting it with the conduct of the rest of his opponents, remarked, "That they were such hot-headed zealots, he had no great concern about them; but Mr Gilpin was so upright, and discovered such sincerity in his words and actions, that it grieved him to the heart to see him continue in the darkness of prejudice and error; and he fervently prayed to God, that he would open the mind of that honest priest to the knowledge of the truth." The prayer was not ineffectual. Gilpin was so impressed with the result of this controversy, that he determined not to lose a day till he had entered on a rigid and impartial enquiry into the authorities and proofs by which the two systems of opinion were supported. By daily searching the Scriptures, and fervent solicitations for direction from the Father of Lights, he soon gained such an insight of the truth, that he threw himself into the ranks of the Reformers—and from that moment his life, with all his powers of body and soul, became a constant living sacrifice to the cause and the glory of God.

Passing over several years, in the course of which he was appointed preacher to the Court—spoke with the most intrepid spirit against the reigning vices of the higher orders—secured the favour of the famous Cecil, afterwards Lord Burleigh, and travelled on the Continent for a while, to enlarge his acquaintance with the Reformed opinions, we hasten to the most splendid part of his career—his appointment to the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring. In order to understand the nature of his situation, it is necessary to observe, that he returned to England, after the accession of Mary to the throne—that he was perfectly aware of the persecuting measures which had been adopted by the Court against all who embraced the reformed opinions, and that he had come to his native country, not knowing the things that were to befall him there, but determined to suffer all things in defence of what he had embraced, and believed to be the cause of truth. The charge of Houghton-le-Spring, too, was just the situation for a man possessed of the spirit and energies of Gilpin. Lying in the most northern part of England, its remoteness had exempted it from the influence of the Act of Uniformity, passed in the days of Edward, establishing the new religion. The ancient superstition continued there in all its force, and acquired fresh vigour, from the known attachment of Mary to that faith; and when it is added that the character of the population was debased by the grossest ignorance,—that the institutions of law were little if at all respected,—that as to personal security, every one was the avenger of his own quarrel, and as to property,

Sufficeth them: the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can;"

some idea may be formed of the Herculean labours of the man who undertook to reclaim such a lawless people to order, religion, and virtue. A mind less fervent and resolute than Gilpin's would have shrunk from the task, but it was exactly such a post as was requisite for the development of resources and zeal like his. He had not been long, however, in the discharge of his important duties in this place, when the success of his labours, and the severe invectives he threw out against the supine and ignorant priests around, gave rise to a formidable conspiracy against him; and as his enemies conceived, that if he were accused before Tonstall, the Bishop of Durham, who was his relative, and through whom he had obtained his appointment, that prudent and mild ecclesiastic would find means of screening him from their vengeance, they resolved to appeal to Bonner, the Bishop of London, whose fiery zeal in the Popish cause promised him a useful instrument for the accomplishment of their designs; and that prelate, entering into their views, warmly applauding their zeal for the Church, and promising to bring the offender to the stake in a fortnight, summoned Gilpin to repair to London without delay, to answer to an impeachment, consisting of thirteen articles, the chief of which was, that he preached repentance and salvation by Christ, instead of insisting on the important topics of transubstantiation, purgatory, holy water, images, and prayers to the Saints. This intelligence did not surprise him, as he had long been preparing to honour the Truth, whether by his life or his death; and, accordingly, having called an old and faithful servant, he told that kind domestic of the stratagem of his enemies; that he had been accused before the Bishop of London, from whose sanguinary and relentless temper he had nothing to hope; bade him prepare without delay a long garment, in which he might decently appear at the stake, and then with the utmost composure, awaited the arrival of the messengers who were sent to apprehend and convey him to the capital, where neither he nor his enemies anticipated any thing but a premature and violent death.

The cause of truth and righteousness, however, was yet to derive much important service from the labours of Gilpin,—and it is singular by what unexpected means Providence often accomplishes his purposes, and preserves the lives of useful and holy men. It was a favourite saying of the subject of this Memoir, that “nothing ever happens but what is for our good.” During his journey to London he met with an accident which fractured his leg,—and to those who tauntingly asked him, whether he imagined this misfortune was for his good, he firmly replied “that he believed it would prove so.” The event answered his expectations, for before he was able to resume his journey, Queen Mary having died, her sister, Elizabeth, ascended the throne,—a stop was put to the reign of terror and persecution,—the cause of the Reformation triumphed, and Gilpin, among others, was left to the full exercise of his judgment, and to the prosecution of all his contemplated plans of usefulness among the benighted, degraded, and turbulent people over whom he had received the oversight. With a mind fully alive to the magnitude and difficulties of his undertaking, but supported by an unwavering faith in the promise of divine assistance, he set himself to the task of converting that moral desert into a fruitful field, and he brought to it a zeal that would achieve every thing that was not impossible, and which, ardent though it was, was uniformly kept under the direction of the most enlightened Christian principle. Wisely concluding that he never would make any impression upon a rude, grovelling, and immoral race, until he had convinced them that he had their good at heart, his first object was to conciliate their affections, and this he soon accomplished by the affability and condescension of his manners. Retaining the native dignity of his character, and never forgetful of the gravity that became his profession, he mingled in every society, and became a partner in all the innocent pastimes and recreations of the age. He was the promoter of every improvement in the domestic and social condition of his people—was the patron of the arts—the encourager of industry—the physician and lawyer, as well as the spiritual guide of the people. In short, he was continually among them—seemed to live only for their good—and though his great reputation procured him many offers of the highest preferment, he modestly, but steadily, declined them—the sole object of his ambition being to bring under the power of Christianity, and consequently of civilisation, the wild and neglected district where Providence had placed him. To effect these objects, he was not only instant in season and out of season in expounding and enforcing the truth as it is in Jesus, but his patrimonial estate, together with the income derived from his rectory, were almost wholly expended on useful and charitable objects. His generosity, indeed, was the admiration of the whole country. Forty bushels of corn, twenty of malt, and a whole ox, with a proportionable quantity of other provisions, were the usual consumpt of his family in a fortnight; and while the poor and the way-faring man never appealed to his hospitable door in vain, he was in the habit of making every Sabbath, after divine service, a day of public entertainment, especially from Michaelmas till Easter, during which season he expected all his parishioners and their families in succession, and took care always to guide the conversation into agreeable and edifying discourse. Such public-spirited conduct, together with the extensive scale on which his hospitality was displayed, extended his fame far and wide, inasmuch, that Houghton-le-Spring became the resort of all classes, each to see and to hear the Apostle of the North.

Among others who waited on Gilpin at his residence, was the famous Lord Burleigh, Secretary to Queen Elizabeth, who being on his return from Scotland, whither he had gone on matters of state, could not resist the opportunity of paying his respects to the pious pastor of Houghton-le-Spring. The call was so sudden, that Gilpin had no notice of the intended honour, till the arrival of the statesman was announced; but the economy of such an establishment was not disturbed, even by the presence of so illustrious a personage, as the Prime Minister of England—the daily routine of the household was observed, without the least alteration—and the noble guest was so struck with the polite and hospitable reception he met—with the vast crowds that composed the household of Gilpin—with the perfect order, simplicity of manners, and virtuous habits, that characterised the various orders of the people; and, above all, with the dignified, enlightened, and truly Christian character of the owner, that he could not help lingering on an eminence that commanded the last parting view of Houghton-le-Spring, and comparing the turmoil and agitation of his own political career, with the peace and happiness of that envied spot, exclaimed, “There is the enjoyment of life, indeed! Who can blame such a man for refusing a bishopric? What can he want to make him happier, or more useful to mankind?”

But the sphere of his ministrations was not limited to the bounds of his parish—the whole of the northern parts of England were then inhabited by a people sunk in the most deplorable ignorance, and totally without the means of religious instruction. Over these wild and neglected districts, Gilpin made it a rule to travel once every year; and in every town and village, when he could collect an audience, did he labour to inculcate the grand doctrines of the gospel, to expose the danger and misery of vice, and impress on their minds the idea of a future judgment. The fatigue incident to these travels, was the least of the difficulties that lay in the way of his apostolic labours. For, in every part of those extensive regions, but particularly in the Debateable Land—which, lying on the Borders, was alternately possessed by the Scotch and English, and was the common theatre on which strife was constantly maintained by the two nations—it was dangerous for any person to go alone, and without escort. Plunder and bloodshed were the order of the day—the utmost vigilance was often ineffectual to secure one's person and property from the attacks of the assassin and the thief; and to displease, or quarrel with a single individual, was sufficient to rouse hundreds to arms, as the avengers of his cause. Into a country, so dreadfully disorganized, few or none had ever entered with the embassy of Peace. But Gilpin had long directed his benevolent views towards its stern and ferocious possessors, and at a fit time he entered and traversed it, preaching the glad tidings of salvation, with a success that surpassed his most sanguine expectations. Every year was this indefatigable servant of Christ seen climbing the steeps, and penetrating the glens of this wilderness, for the lonely cottages of the inhabitants; and although, for so toilsome and dangerous an expedition, the mildest season of the year might seem desirable, yet, as he knew that the people there were most at home and unemployed at Christmas, he left the comforts of his own mansion at that inclement season, and travelled over the mountainous regions of Westmoreland, Liddesdale, and Northumberland, stopping in every hamlet, and almost in every hut, to tell the people of the way by which they must be saved. Many and severe were the privations to which he was subjected during these excursions. Sometimes being in total want of provisions,—more frequently, owing to the want of roads and the distance of places, being overtaken by night, without the shelter of a roof. On those occasions, his duty was to cause the single attendant that accompanied him to ride about with the horses, while he himself, tracing a small circle, walked about on foot, and kept the vital warmth, till the dawn directed his benevolent footsteps on some fresh errand of mercy. Nor was he altogether free from difficulties, even after he had reached an inhabited place, and got a multitude assembled to hear the Gospel from his lips. That wild people, who almost constantly breathed the atmosphere of discord, and were some of them thirsting for the blood of their neighbours, would sometimes burst into feuds in his very presence, and it required the exercise of all his judgment and Christian fortitude to keep the peace between the contending parties. One remarkable instance of this occurred during a prolonged stay at Rothbury a village, situated at the rise of the river Coquet. Among those who repaired to the ministrations of Gilpin, were two persons, between whom there existed a deadly feud. For some time they viewed each other in sullen silence; but happening one day to be seated close to each other, they became mutually so enraged, that in the middle of the service, the preacher was suddenly stopped by the din of arms; and rushing between the combatants, at the imminent hazard of his own life, re-conciliated with them in such strong terms, on their outrageous, criminal, antichristian behaviour, that he succeeded in restoring them to peace and harmony so long as he remained among them. On another occasion, he perceived, as he entered the place of public worship, a sword suspended on the wall, which was the customary mode in those days of giving a challenge. He stepped forward, tore it down in presence of the congregation, and made it the burden of his discourse, to show his audience how much at variance all such practices were with the mild and forgiving spirit of the Gospel.

It would occupy a volume to particularize all the memorable instances of Gilpin's zeal, or to enumerate all his places of usefulness within his parish and without, during a long and most laborious life. Nor was its close less characteristic than his better days had been, of a mind wholly bent on doing good. When he felt his infirmities accumulating, and that he was near his end, he ordered himself to be carried to a suitable apartment, and all the various classes of his parishioners to be brought to him to receive his parting blessing and advice. The rich and the poor, the young and the old, came in procession into the presence of their dying pastor, who uttered a short prayer suitable to the circumstances of each; and after he had thus seen the faces of almost all his well-known flock, recollecting the names of some who had not profited by his ministry, he sent for them also, and cried them, with all the solemnity of a dying man, and with all the influence which his venerable character could command, to abandon the paths of folly and sin, and attend to the things that belonged to their peace. Thus lived and died Bernard Gilpin, whose zeal for the glory of his Master, and the salvation of men, was inferior to that of none since the days of the apostles, and the fruits of whose indefatigable missionary labours were visible long after in the districts which were the scene of them, in the high tone of morals, the social happiness and the establishment of order, propriety, and virtue among a people, who, before he went among them introducing the Gospel, were "without God in the world, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another."

REMARKS ON PSALM CXVIII.

BY THE REV. R. S. CANDLISH, A.M.,

Minister of St George's Parish, Edinburgh.

THIS Psalm is a song of triumph, a lyrical poem or sacred ode, celebrating some great deliverance or victory achieved; and it bears the form of a dramatic scene or dialogue, different personages being introduced as taking part in its sacred strains of praise and thanksgiving. Of these the chief and most important naturally is the illustrious conqueror himself, who, as the hero of the scene, takes the lead in the high pomp of worship. He is represented as going up in solemn and majestic state to the temple, there to acknowledge the recent and signal interposition of the Lord on behalf of himself and his people. A crowd of grateful followers swell his train, exulting in his triumph and their own. At the gates of the temple, he is received and welcomed by the officiating Levites and the Priests, and within the temple is heard the voice of prayer and benediction. According to this arrangement, the Psalm when sung in the public service of the Jewish Church, would probably be distributed among the different bands or companies of their full choir, some sustaining the character of the prince and his attendants, others personating the ministering functionaries of the temple.

PART FIRST.

The procession advances slowly up the hill towards the Temple.

The conqueror speaks alone, reciting the details of his victory, his attendants occasionally joining in to express their glad assent.

Ver. 1. The general company in the conqueror's train;

"O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: because his mercy endureth for ever."

Ver. 2. The common people in his train;

"Let Israel now say, that his mercy endureth for ever."

Ver. 3. The priests in his train;

"Let the house of Aaron now say, that his mercy endureth for ever."

Ver. 4. The whole company again united;

"Let them now that fear the Lord say, that his mercy endureth for ever."

Ver. 5—8. The conqueror alone;

"I called upon the Lord in distress: the Lord answered me, and set me in a large place.

"The Lord is on my side; I will not fear: what can man do unto me?

"The Lord taketh my part with them that help me: therefore shall I see my desire upon them that hate me.

"It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man."

Ver. 9. The followers assenting;

"Yes, it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes."

Ver. 10—15. The conqueror alone;

"All nations compassed me about: but in the name of the Lord will I destroy them.

"They compassed me about; yes, they compassed me about: but in the name of the Lord I will destroy them.

"They compassed me about like bees; they are quenched as the fire of thorns: for in the name of the Lord will I destroy them.

"Thou hast thrust sore at me, that I might fall: but the Lord helped me.

"The Lord is my strength and song, and is become my salvation.

"The voice of rejoicing and salvation is in the tabernacles of the righteous: the right hand of the Lord doeth valiantly."

Ver. 16. His followers re-echo the sentiment;

"The right hand of the Lord is exalted; the right hand of the Lord doeth valiantly."

Ver. 17—18. The conqueror alone;

"I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord.

"The Lord hath chastened me sore: but he hath not given me over unto death."

PART SECOND.

The procession is now arrived at the gates of the Temple.

Ver. 19. The conqueror alone, demanding admission;

"Open to me the gates of righteousness: I will go in to them, and I will praise the Lord."

Ver. 20. The Ministers of the Temple, within (throwing open the gates:)

"This gate of the Lord, into which the Righteous One shall enter."

Ver. 21. The conqueror alone within the Temple;

"I will praise thee; for thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation.

Ver. 22—24. The ministers of the Temple (welcoming Him in triumph);

"The stone which the builders refused, is become the head stone of the corner."

"This is the Lord's doing; it is marvellous in our eyes.

"This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it."

Ver. 25. The conqueror alone (in intercessory prayer);

"Save now, I beseech thee, O Lord; O Lord, I beseech thee, send now prosperity."

Ver. 26. The ministers of the Temple (pronouncing a twofold benediction, first, on him as the Saviour, and secondly, on the people whom he has saved);

"Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: we have blessed you out of the house of the Lord."

Ver. 27. The victorious Host (presenting a sacrifice of thanksgiving);

"God is the Lord, which hath shewed us light: bind the sacrifice with cords, even unto the horns of the altar."

Ver. 28. The conqueror alone (returning thanks, as well satisfied with the whole result);

"Thou art my God, and I will praise thee; thou art my God, I will exalt thee."

Ver. 29. The whole assembly join again in loud chorus;

"O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever."

Such seems the plan of this splendid song of victory. Even now, in simply reading it, we cannot fail to admire its stately and solemn grandeur; but how imposing, how overpowering, must the effect have been, when executed in the perfect style of David's minstrelsy, and with all the accompanying majesty, all the po and circumstances of the Jewish ritual; now the sweetness of a single tone, faintly yet clearly heard, and again the mingled melody of a thousand voices, echoing through all the compass of the Temple's vast and gorgeous magnificence. Now, though it may not be very easy to ascertain on what particular occasion this Psalm was originally composed, what national deliverance, what prince's illustrious triumph it was designed, in the first instance, to celebrate; yet, judging even from the ordinary spirit of this sort of religious composition, it might be sure, that ultimately it has reference to the Messiah and to his salvation. That the Jews so understood it, is proved by the use made of verse 26, Matt. xxi. 9. And our Lord's quotation of the same verse, in Matt. xxiii. 39, as well as the frequent application of verse 22 in different passages of the New Testament (as in Matt. xxi. 42, Acts, iv. 11, Ephesians ii. 20, 1 Peter, ii. 7.) puts the matter beyond doubt. The Psalm, therefore, celebrates the return of the Messiah from his mortal conflict with the enemies of God and man, delivered from the power of death, triumphing over sin and hell, and bringing with him the mighty multitude of those whom he has saved. The Conqueror with his train going up in procession to the Temple, the Messiah with his followers, the redeemed of every age, entering into that Heaven, of which the Temple was a type; and the ministers of the Temple throwing open the gates to give the Conqueror and his people welcome, may represent the angelic inhabitants of Heaven, who cease not day and night to praise the Lord that was slain, and among whom there is joy in Heaven over every sinner that repenteth, and every saint, as they conduct him into the realms of bliss. In this view, the complete and comprehensive is the Psalm in both its parts.

Part I. Messiah recites the depth of his humiliation (ver. 5—7.) These are fitting words in the mouth of Him, "who, in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up supplications and prayers, with strong crying and tears, was heard in that he feared—who, though he was a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered," (Heb. v. 7, 8.)—"Who, being made all things like unto his brethren," experienced and experimentally learned—in his life of sorrows—his agonies in the garden—his death on the cross—the trials of obedience and the efficacy of that faith, in which having overcome, he exclaims, "It is better to trust in the Lord, than to put confidence in man." Ver. 10—] describe Messiah's severest trials. 1. The consent and combination of all nations and all men against him (10—12.) "He was despised and rejected of men" (Compare also Psalm ii, as explained in Acts, iv. 25.) He bore the opposition, above all, he bore the sins of a men, men of all kindreds, and peoples, and tongue 2. The rage of a single foe (ver. 13;) the head of the confederacy—the serpent who was to bruise the heel of the woman's seed (Gen. iii. 15)—the great adversary, Satan, the tempter in the wilderness, the prince of this world, who, in the hour and the power of darkness came to assail Messiah, and found nothing in him (John, xiv. 30.) (See also Heb. ii. 14.) 3. A trial yet more terrible, the hiding of his Father's countenance (ver. 18)—Yes, it pleased the Lord to bruise him. He was mistaken of God (Isaiah, liii. 4—10.) When H has our sin, He bore the Lord's righteous wrath: witness the cry on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" But he was not given over. "Thou wilt not leave my soul in Hades, neither wilt thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption." (Psalm vi. 10.) I shall not die, but live—"I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore." (Rev. i. 18.)

Part II. Messiah ascends up on high, claims and receives admission into the true sanctuary, into Heaven above, and is welcomed, his work being finished, as the Righteous One, (ver. 20.) His righteousness entitling himself and his people to enter into the Holiest of all. And appearing there as the Captain of our salvation, his first care still is to glorify the Father (ver. 21) according to his own prayer and his practice while yet on earth, "Father, glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee—I have glorified thee on the earth, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." (John, xv. 1-4.) And all his exaltation, as well as all his humiliation, is primarily intended to be "to the glory of God the Father." (Phil. ii. 11.) The angels and attendant spirits, "who desire to look into these things," and "to whom, through the Church, is made known the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 10), admiring the finished work of redemption (ver. 22-24), join with the redeemed in giving God the praise. Then we have (ver. 25) Messiah as intercessor, pleading for his people; and (ver. 26) the blessing merited by him dispensed to them by his ministers, whether the angelic hosts above, or his ordained servants below. And now Messiah's people (ver. 27) "having boldness to enter into the Holiest by his blood.....draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith" (Heb. x. 19-22;) "risen with him," and admitted with him immediately into the Divine presence and favour—they offer "the sacrifice of praise to God, i. e. the fruit of their lips, giving thanks to his name: to do good and to communications not forgetting, since with such sacrifices God is well pleased." Laying hold of the sacrifice of propitiation provided, as their own, they, as reconciled, "permeated by the mercies of God, present their bodies a living sacrifice (of thanksgiving) holy and acceptable unto God." (Rom. xii. 1.) Finally, (ver. 28,) Messiah "seeing of the travail of his soul, and being satisfied," (Isa. liii. 11,) rests in the fulfilment of the eternal covenant, "having done the will of the Father," (Ps. xl. 8,) and obtained it for the people given to him. (Jehi, xvii. 2.) And as at the opening, so now at the close (ver. 29) of this record of salvation—the call to praise being justified by the magnificent detail, and all voices and all hearts were carried along in one tide of sympathetic song,—the glad and grateful strain again rings through all the universe, "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever."

LEGH RICHMOND'S MOTHER;

OR,

THE INFLUENCE OF A PIOUS PARENT.

In the interesting Memoirs of the Rev. Legh Richmond, the following passage occurs, strikingly descriptive of the beneficial effect produced upon his mind by the instructions and admonitions of a beloved parent. "I well remember, in the early dawn of my expanding reason, what care she laboured to instil into my mind a sense of the being of God, and of the reverence which is due to him; of the character of a Saviour, and his infinite merits; of the duty of prayer, and the manner in which it ought to be offered up at the throne of grace. Her way of enforcing these subjects was like one who felt their importance, and wished her child to do so likewise. First instructed by her to read, I have not forgotten, in my Bible lessons, with what simplicity and propriety she used to explain and comment on the word of God, its precepts and examples. These infantine catechetical exercises still vibrate in my recollections, and confirm to my own mind the great advantage attendant upon the earliest possible endeavours to win the attention, and store the memory with religious knowledge. Her natural abilities, which were of a superior character, enabled her to converse with a very little child with much effect; and there was a tenderness of affection, united to a firmness of manner, which greatly promoted the best interests of a nursery education.

"My mother had six children, three of whom died in infancy. A very affecting circumstance accompanied the death of one of them, and was a severe trial to her maternal feelings. Her then youngest child, a sweet little boy, just two years old, was, through the carelessness of his nurse, precipitated from a bed-room window upon the pavement beneath. I was at that time six years of age, and happened to be walking on the very spot, when the distressing event occurred; I was, therefore, the first to take up, and deliver into our agonized mother's arms, the poor little sufferer. The head was fractured, and he only survived the fall about thirty hours. I preserve still a very distinct and lively remembrance of the struggle between the natural feelings of the mother, and the spiritual resignation of the Christian. She passed the sad interval of suspense in almost continual prayer, and found God a present help in time of trouble. Frequently, during that day, did she retire with me; and, as I knelt beside her, she uttered the feelings and desires of her heart to God. I remember her saying, 'If I cease praying for five minutes, I am ready to sink under this unlooked-for distress; but when I pray, God comforts and upholds me: his will, not mine, be done.' Once she said, 'Help me to pray, my child: Christ suffers little children to come to him, and forbids them not,—say something.' 'What shall I say, mamma?—shall I fetch a book?' 'Not now,' she replied; 'speak from your heart; and ask God that we may be reconciled to his will, and bear this trial with patience.'

"The day after the infant's death, she took me to the bed on which my little brother lay; and kneeling down, she wept for a few minutes in silence; and then taking his cold hand in one of her's, and mine in the other, she said,—'Lord, if it had not been thy good pleasure, it had not been thus. Thy will be done! I needed this heavy trial, to shew me more of myself, and to wean me from the world. Forgive my sins, O God! and let me not murmur.' Then looking at the cherub countenance of her babe, she added—'Thou art not lost, but gone before!' She then put his hand into mine, and said—'If you live, my child, never forget this; and may I one day meet you both in heaven!'

"I have dwelt upon this part of my dear parent's history with the more minuteness, because she has frequently told me, that it was not only the greatest shock which her feelings were ever called upon to sustain; but that she was persuaded it was over-ruled by God for the most salutary purpose, as it concerned the spiritual discipline of her own heart. To the end of her life, she wore a little locket attached to her watch; it contained a lock of her poor little Henry's hair; and she often looked at it, and spoke of it, as a remembrance of God's goodness to her at a most trying season."

DISCOURSE,

BY THE REV. JAMES BARR, D. D., Minister of Port-Glasgow.

"But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed."—JAMES i. 25.

THE real Christian is distinguished from the merely nominal Christian, by nothing so much as by his perseverance in well-doing. In almost everything else, religion may be counterfeited, and that, too, with a resemblance so exact, as to deceive not only observers, but the individuals themselves, who are the subjects of the delusion. A consistent perseverance, however, in the path of duty, is the character of the true Christian only. Others may endure for a while, he continues faithful to the death. Others, sooner or later, draw back unto perdition, he believes to the saving of the soul. He makes a profession of the Gospel, not like others, from considerations of worldly interest or reputation, but under a deep conviction of its truth, and from the experience of its peaceful and sanctifying influence. Religion is with him not merely a matter of necessity, but of choice: not only is his conscience affected; his heart also is engaged. The service which it demands is at once his duty and his happiness. You have a correct and discriminating account of him in the comprehensive and pointed language of our text: "But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein; he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed."

Without, however, adverting further to the object of the believer's contemplation, as stated in this passage, than simply to remind you that it is the Gospel which is here styled, with the utmost propriety, "the perfect law of liberty," we would proceed to the consideration of the main subject of the text, which you perceive is intended to point out the manner in which the believer views the Gospel.

"Whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty." A law must in the first instance be known and understood. There are two ways in which we may arrive at a correct acquaintance with the perfect law of liberty. It is by means either of the eye or the ear; by examining it for ourselves, or by receiving an account of it from the testimony of others. Both of these are alluded to in our text. The man whom the apostle pronounces "blessed" is he who "Looketh into the perfect law of liberty." He does not merely look at it; he looks into it. The word is expressive of fixed, earnest, and scrutinizing inspection. The same term is elsewhere used to describe the exercise of the angels in heaven, when it is said, in reference to the redemption of Christ: "which things the angels desire to look into." denotes the posture of bending forward the body, the spirit of eager curiosity, and in the act of minute investigation. Such is the disposition of the Christian enquirer, looking into the perfect law of liberty. He does not take matter on trust, or second-hand. It is not enough that he has been instructed in the truths of the Gospel in his youth by parents or others: He must look into it with his own eyes, and form a judgment of it from personal observation. Nor is he satisfied with a superficial inspection, or a general survey: He must look into it particularly—embracing in his enquiry every doctrine it reveals, every precept it recommends, and every ordinance it appoints; considering the nature and importance of each separately, estimating the evidence and excellence of the whole collectively. He gives it not a mere passing glance, but considers it with a steady, deliberate attention; reflecting on it calmly, dispassionately with personal application, and fervent prayer. We need hardly remark, that by this exercise of looking into "the perfect law of liberty," is meant a course of diligent, patient, humble, and prayerful searching of the Scriptures, in which this "perfect law" is presented to our view, and where everything may be learned that is necessary to be known concerning it. The Bible is justly, though familiarly compared to a looking-glass; it exhibits to man the reflection of his own image. In a glass he beholds his natural face: but in the mirror of Revelation, he contemplates an exposure of the inner man: he can discover the state of the heart; and see what is his character in the estimation of the God on whom he depends, and to whom he is accountable. But the glass of this "perfect law" sets before him other objects of the deepest interest. It discloses to him the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ: it unfolds the plan of redeeming mercy; opens up the way of reconciliation, through the blood of the cross, by the operation of the Holy Spirit; makes manifest the privileges of the people of God, both in a state of grace, and in the kingdom of glory. These, and numberless other topics of supreme importance connected with them, or included under them, invite the inquiries of the student of Scripture, and engage his attention from day to day. He looks into them not merely with the bodily eye, but with the eye of faith, realizing their truth, persuaded of their necessity, continually discovering more and more of their grandeur and efficacy, contemplating them with unfeigned growing delight; and by each new discovery animated to pursue his researches until, in the light of eternity dissipating every shade of ignorance and error, he shall in God's light see light, and know even as he is known. But our acquaintance with this subject may be promoted by other means. "Faith cometh by hearing." The man whom the apostle has pronounced "blessed," employs not only the eye, but also the ear. He not only "looketh into the perfect law of liberty," but is

"A hearer" of it, and attends to the preaching of the word, as well as the reading of it. Some attempt to excuse their absence from the House of God, by pleading that they read their Bibles at home. Admitting the truth of the plea, still we say that they are without excuse. Reading cannot serve as a substitute for hearing. Both are enjoined by the same authority, nor can the Divine blessing be expected on either, unless that authority be respected and obeyed in the observance of both. But there is reason to suspect, that those who seldom hear the word in public, do not often read it in private. Were they to read it in a proper temper, and with real profit, the effect would appear in a disposition to hear it. Our Shorter Catechism has laid down the doctrine of Scripture on this subject, where it teaches, that "the Spirit of God maketh the reading, but especially the preaching of the word, an effectual means of convincing and converting sinners, and of building them up in holiness and comfort through faith unto salvation." What then are we to understand by a hearer of the gospel? Of those who stately attend on the preaching of it, do all possess, in the sense intended by the apostle in our text, the character of hearers? Let me refer you to the parable of the sower for an answer to this question. Various characters are there described, who are said to have heard the word, but all of them, with the exception of one class, were hearers only deceiving their own selves. For this reason, our Lord found it necessary to give the caution, "take heed how ye hear," as well as the caution, "take heed what ye hear." We cannot venture to say which of these admonitions is the more important of the two; but we can feel no difficulty in deciding, and no hesitation in declaring, which of them receives the greater degree of attention from the generality of professing Christians. Their attention is so much engrossed with what is said to them, that they seldom think of how it is received by them. With some, the hearing of the Gospel degenerates into a mere exercise of taste; they are pleased with a discourse according as it is well put together and agreeably delivered. A large proportion hear rather in the capacity of judges than in the character of learners; they are satisfied or offended with what they hear, just in proportion as it accords more or less with their preconceived opinions on the point that happens to be discussed; or are ready to catch or cavil at every expression that does not coincide with their mode of speaking, though it may be susceptible of a meaning quite consistent with soundness in the faith, or zeal for the holiness, of the Gospel. I might enumerate other classes of hearers in great variety, all of them equally in error with those now alluded to; but time does not permit, nor does the subject call for it. Our text contains a description that includes them all. They are all "forgetful" hearers. They all forget the very thing which they should be most concerned to remember; and that is, their own personal interest in what they hear. They forget that their design in hearing should be the same with God's design in speaking, and that is, that the heart may be made better. What they hear, however, makes no lasting or practical impression. Having once heard it, they have done with it for ever. The sense passes away from the mind almost as quickly as the sound ceases to vibrate on the ear. They resemble him who "beholds his natural face in a glass, who goeth away, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was." But the man whom the apostle declares to be blessed, is "not a forgetful hearer." He listens with deep attention, having both the understanding, the conscience, and the heart in exercise. He mingles faith with what he hears, and endeavours to make it his own, by retaining the substance of it in his memory—by reviving it in his private meditations—by comparing it with the standard of God's word; above all, by faithfully taking it home in the way of self-application "for doctrine, reproof, correction and instruction in righteousness." He hears with a view to the purposes of edification and practice; carefully extracting from what he hears, motives to excite, principles to influence, rules to direct, cautions to guard, and consolations to support him. Above all, he endeavours to follow up the design, and to secure the profit of hearing, by a course of devoted obedience. It is not enough that he cultivates a knowledge of "the perfect law of liberty" by looking into it and by hearing it. There is no necessary connection between a knowledge of the truth and the experience of its sanctifying influence. We can suppose the whole contents of the Sacred Volume to be treasured up in the understanding and memory, without a single sentence of it being written on the heart. What the better are we for knowing the doctrines of the Gospel, if our knowledge discovers itself only in the fluency with which we talk about them, and in the ability with which we contend for them? The truth must be known, but so as to be felt and acted on; it must be received not with a merely intellectual and speculative faith, but in the exercise of a faith which unreservedly submits to be guided by its light, and governed by its power. The views of doctrine which we embrace, having found their way to the heart and conscience, must exhibit the character, and exert the influence of practical principles: For true religion is altogether a practical thing. In this view, the apostle here contemplates it. The man whom he pronounces "blessed," is, in opposition to the "forgetful hearer,"

"A doer of the work." It is observable that he says nothing of believing, and speaks only of doing. Nor was it necessary that he should. True religion necessarily includes principle, and begins with it. The obedience which the Gospel demands is supposed to spring from faith as its principle. The "doer of the work" must, in the first instance, be a believer of the word. The fountain must be cleansed that her streams may be pure. The tree must be made good that the fruit may be good. But as principle must precede, so it will produce practice. The believer, in obedience to the impulses of his renewed nature, will also become a doer. Infidels talk much about virtue, and make lofty pretensions to it; but to praise it is one thing, and another thing to practice it. You must look to the disciple of the Cross if you would see the reality of it embodied and maintained. Others may put on a fair appearance, but he keeps the heart with all diligence. Others may be doers of some things—the slave of intemperance may be a very humane man—the votary of Mammon may boast of his sobriety—persons who follow their inclinations in breaking habitually the second table of the law, may find it their interest to pay some outward regard to the requirements of the first; forgetting that he who professes to love God, but “hateth his brother, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.” “He that offendeth in one point is guilty of all.” But that man who from right principles yields obedience to any one precept of the law, will, under the impulse of the same principles, yield obedience to every other precept; will resist sin in all its forms, and pay a regard to duty in all its branches. He loves the things that are excellent, and, therefore, pursues the things that are lovely and of good report; he walks in the fear of God, and runs in the way of his commandments; shines forth in the beauty of holiness, having his path like that of “the morning light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day.” What he ought to be at any time, he desires and endeavours to be at all times. To complete the description of the man whom he pronounces “blessed,” the apostle includes this thought. It is added, that he “Continueth therein.” Of what use are momentary impulses and superficial impressions? There is a goodness which promises fair, but it soon vanishes, like the morning cloud and the early dew. Let none conclude that they are converts from the ardour of first impressions. Some begin well, and for a time run their race with apparent zeal and devotedness, but by and bye difficulties arise, and obstacles stand in the way, for which they were not prepared, and which discover to others what had never once been suspected by themselves, that their hearts are not right with God, and that the root of the matter is not in them. “But if any man draw back,” saith God, “my soul shall have no pleasure in him.” The charge of the Saviour to each of his disciples is, “Be thou faithful to the death and I will give thee a crown of life.” But occasional intervals of seriousness will not make up the life of faith, or illustrate the power of godliness. The seed sown by the wayside may spring up, but it cannot strike its roots deep into the earth, and therefore speedily withers away. But the Spirit of God having once taken possession of the heart, can never be expelled, and will never resign his charge. He who has begun the good work will perform it unto the day of Christ. The children of God, therefore, go on from strength to strength; they cannot fall away, because they are divinely upheld. Some are called disciples, of whom it is said that they went back and walked no more with Jesus. But they were disciples only in name, not in reality. “They who go out from us make it manifest that they were not of us, else they would have continued with us.” Of them that are in Christ he will lose none, neither can any pluck them out of his hand. They continue in his love, and persevere in his service. Of the man whom our text commends, it is said, not only that he looketh, and doeth, and heareth, but that he “continueth therein.” He continues to look,—is not satisfied with gazing for a while, and then desisting from his enquiries; but resumes them daily with increasing ardour and delight; exploring more fully the height, and depth, and breadth, and length of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge. He continues to be a hearer, esteeming it his high privilege to have the Gospel preached to him; and feeling the heavy responsibility which this privilege has imposed upon him, he carefully embraces and improves the opportunities of public instruction that are afforded him, steadily repairing to the courts of God’s House, and watching at the posts of his doors; listening with teachableness and respect, even to the weakest of Christ’s ambassadors; giving earnest heed to the things which are spoken, and not driven about by every wind of doctrine. And, as the happy effect, he continues a “doer of the work,” following the Saviour through good and bad report—holding fast the beginning of his confidence—still pressing on towards the mark—not weary in well-doing—steadfast and unmoveable—ever abounding in the work of the Lord; for as much as he knows that his labour in the Lord is not in vain. He knows this from the best authority. The apostle has said of him, in most emphatic language, “This man “Shall be blessed in his deed.” This blessedness, though principally future, is partly present. He is even now blessed with an assured confidence, built on the rock of ages, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail; he is blessed with an approving conscience, which bears testimony to the sincerity of his profession, or the genuineness of his character, and holding out to him the prospect of a gracious reception, and a triumphant acquittal, at the tribunal of his Judge. He is blessed with a good hope, which rests on the surest foundation, is warranted by the clearest evidence, and is animated by the most glorious prospects. He is blessed with a contented mind, satisfied with the dealings of his Heavenly Father, thankful for his mercies, patient under his chastisements; but the cup of the Christian’s experience has in it a mixture of bitter ingredients. The consummation of blessedness is reserved for the just made perfect, who shall suffer neither the misery of desire ungratified, nor the sickness of hope deferred; who shall drink deep in the river of pleasures, and be replenished with that fullness of joy which is at God’s right hand for evermore. Yet this blessedness, perfected in heaven, is begun on earth. The believer has already the blessing that maketh rich. Our Lord enumerates no fewer than nine blessings, commonly called Beatitudes, in the outset of his sermon on the Mount, the whole of which are united in the experience of the man whom the apostle has characterized in our text. But this blessedness should be viewed in its connections with character. The apostle associates it with the doing of the work. He shall be blessed, yet not for doing, but in doing it. The blessing is not the recompense, though it is the accompaniment of the deed. Every man shall receive according to the deeds done in his body, and yet the reward is of grace, not of debt; he has his reward in his work. In the keeping of God's commandments there is a great reward. Every true disciple says with the Master, "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me;" and with the apostle declares, "Not by works of righteousness that we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us;" and in the same spirit, the redeemed in glory cast their crowns at the foot of the throne, and consider it their noblest privilege, and find it their sweetest enjoyment, and make it their constant exercise to trace the source, and celebrate the mercy of their deliverer, while they say, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing." It only remains that I exhort you to Make this blessedness your own. For this purpose, look to the perfect law of liberty; or rather, through this law, look to Christ himself, the law-giver and the dispenser of liberty. If the Son makes you free, ye shall be free indeed. Take his yoke upon you, which is easy, and his burden, which is light. Having received him as your righteousness and strength, commit your souls to God in the faith of his atoning blood; and thus delivered from the fear and the power of your enemies, you may serve God acceptably in holiness and righteousness all the days of your life.

Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free. Beware of abusing this liberty as a cloak of licentiousness. Being no longer under the law, but under grace, reckon yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God. Let not sin any longer reign in your mortal bodies; mortify your members which are upon the earth; ye are not now your own, but bought with a price. No man is his own master; yet every man has a master. One is your master, even Christ. You have said to him, "Lord, Lord," by a religious profession: Let it now appear that you have been sincere in this profession, by your adherence to his service, and your readiness to forsake all, and follow him. Remember our Lord's description of the man who heareth his sayings and doeth them not; and beware, lest in you be verified the folly and wretchedness of the man "who built his house on the sand; and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, and it fell, and great was the fall of it." May God, by his Spirit, keep you from falling, and preserve you through faith unto salvation, and present you before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy.—AMEN

LOCUSTS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMESON,

THE little insect, so well known by this name to the reader of the Scriptures, from the frequent allusions made to it by the Prophets, and from its having been sometimes employed as one of the most formidable agents in executing the judgments of an angry Providence, is a native of Arabia. Its most prominent features are, its yellow colour—the peculiar structure of its head, which, on account of its resemblance to that of a horse, has suggested the language of Joel, who says, that "they have the appearance of horses"—a wide and open mouth, and in the two jaws, four large teeth, so formed, as to cross each other, like the limbs of a pair of scissors, and so remarkably sharp and powerful, that in the bold language of the prophet just alluded to, they are called "the teeth of a great lion." In size, the locust is from five to six inches long, and about an inch thick, although, from there being several varieties in the species, there are some mentioned by travellers of a much larger description. The manner of their production, which is singular and interesting, is thus described by a celebrated natural historian:—"The female, having chosen a piece of light earth, well protected by a bush or thick hedge, makes a hole for herself, so deep, that her head just appears above it, and there deposits an oblong substance, exactly the shape of her own body, which contains a considerable number of eggs, arranged in neat order, in rows, against each other, which remains buried in the ground most carefully, and artificially protected from the cold of winter." As the season advances, and the heats become stronger, the eggs are gradually hatched by the influence of the sun, till at last the young insects, bursting the shell, and emerging from their sheltered holes, form into bands, and commence their flight in search of food—a circumstance in their natural history noticed by Nahum, who says, (iii. 17.) "The locusts camp in the hedges in the cold day," or season; "and when the sun ariseth, they flee away." Few of the insect tribe equal the locust in fecundity; and the numbers of them, which appear flying together, are so immense, as almost to surpass the bounds of credibility; for according to one traveller, who saw a swarm of them in Abyssinia, it was so great, that their approach was indicated a whole day before their appearance, by the tinge given to the ground from the reflection of their yellow wings; and, according to another, they looked in the distance like a succession of dense, sombre clouds, darkening the air—extending in columns of two or three miles in length, and half of that in breadth; and as they approached the place where the observer stood—the immense extent of this winged army cast an awful gloom, like that of an eclipse—that portion of it, which was directly over the head of the traveller, was more than an hour in passing him. Their flight from one place to another is always regulated by the means of obtaining food; and the countless numbers that swarm together, make them a terrible scourge to any country that is subject to their visitations.

Justly alarmed at the approach of such unsparing depredators, the people of the East have recourse to various expedients for frightening or driving them away—sometimes by the noise of drums and pipes, or by loud shouts—which both Niebuhr and Morier saw adopted by the peasantry in Arabia and Persia, and which Job alludes to, (xxxix. 20,) as a common practice in his day—and sometimes by kindling fires, at short distances, which, however, are often extinguished by the infinite swarms that press on so rapidly that to those in front retreat is impossible—and the fires are literally put out by the load of the carcasses. On the failure of all attempts to expel the invaders, the inhabitants are obliged to betake themselves for shelter to their houses, lest by appearing to stand and contest the prey of the locusts, they excite the resentment of the tiny enemy—for these creatures, insignificant as they are, do not, like many larger animals, flee from man. On the contrary, they do not scruple, when provoked, to attack the people; and as from their slender form, and rapid motions, they often elude the blows that are aimed at them, they are able to cause great annoyance from the poignancy of their stings. Obligated, therefore, to let them alone, from fear of personal consequences, the wretched inhabitants, whose territories they invade, abandon themselves to despair, well knowing, from dire experience, that their fields and gardens will soon be so desolate, that not a vestige will be left of anything fit for the good of man or beast. So vast and wide spread, indeed, is the havoc they produce, that it is scarcely possible for a native of this country to form an idea of the dreadful ravages committed by these insects, being infinitely greater than the worst devastations of those exterminating hordes, that were appropriately termed the scourge of God. The space of ground which these destructive swarms occupy, sometimes extends over several miles—in one instance, mentioned by a Portuguese traveller, over no less than 24 miles. And no sooner do they alight, than their countless multitudes, gnawing with insatiable avidity every thing that lies in their way, make a noise, which the Prophet Joel compares to the crackling of fire amid dry stubble, or the rustling of chariots in a battle. Every thing of beauty or productiveness speedily vanishes before these ravenous creatures—nothing can escape—for one swarm succeeds so rapidly to another, that what is left or overlooked by the first, is sure to fall a prey to the rapacity of those that succeed; in the language of one who was an eye-witness of their havoc, not a leaf was left upon a tree—not a blade of grass in the pastures, nor an ear of corn in the fields—all wore the marks of dreadful devastation; and what in the morning was a beautiful and fertile plain, full of tall stalks of ripening grain, and adorned with flourishing wood, appeared in a few hours a dreary and desolate waste, overspread with leafless and naked boughs, and bearing the aspect of a whole country that had been scorched by an immense conflagration. Many years often elapse, before the effects of these terrible ravages are repaired; for, although the fields may next season be clothed with verdure, and the trees recover their bark and their leaves, yet, from the great check given to vegetation, and from the fetid excrements left on the ground, the quality of the grain and of fruits degenerates, a circumstance particularly incident to vineyards, and which was long ago remarked, as appears from the language of Joel, who, foretelling a judgment of locusts, enumerates, among the consequences of the visitation, the disappointment it would occasion to wine-bibbers.—(i. 5.) From these circumstances then we may easily judge of the extent of damage done, in any country subject to so terrible a calamity; and we can perceive also, the greatness of the judgment that was brought upon the land of Egypt by the plague of locusts, as well as the reason of its being among the last of the plagues. These insects never visit Egypt; and as the Sacred History informs us, that they were brought by an east wind—which accords with the testimony of all travellers, who say, that they came from Arabia, their birth-place—and directing their route northwards, without turning either to the east or west, spread over all the adjacent countries—so the strangeness of the occurrence, so contrary to the well-known habits of the creatures, betokened the interposition of Almighty Power in bringing that plague upon the land. And from what has been already said of them, we may easily perceive the reason also of their being among the last plagues that were brought on the refractory Egyptians; for as it was the divine purpose to introduce those judgments by degrees, till He had shewn that idolatrous people the vanity of all their hopes from their wretched deities—and although hail and thunder had already greatly injured the whole produce of the fields—so to give, as it were, the finishing-stroke, and blast all the fruits which the fertile soil of Egypt would soon raise again, after these phenomena had passed—the sovereign anger of His own cause commissioned the locusts to appear, “which crowded the face of the earth, that we could not be able to see the face of the earth—and eat the residue of that which escaped, which remained from the hail, and eat of every tree which grew out of the field.”

Nor is the whole of the calamity occasioned by these formidable creatures confined to the produce of the soil. The most fatal consequences to human life often proceed from the multitudes of dead carcasses that lie putrifying on the ground. The effluvia from these is so strong and offensive, that, to use the words of a celebrated traveller, any one who crushes them with his horse's foot, or even approaches them, is reduced to the necessity of washing his nose with vinegar, or applying his handkerchief, soaked in that liquid, constantly to his nostrils. Multitudes of people in different countries of Asia, and especially of Africa, have at different times perished from this cause. Orosius relates one incursion of them in particular into Africa, when, after making every vestige of vegetation disappear, they flew away to the sea and were drowned, and the carcasses being driven ashore, emitted a stench equal to what might have been produced by the dead bodies of 100,000 men. Augustine mentions a pestilence produced by the same cause, which cut off about 800,000 people in Numidia, and many more in the countries that bordered on the coast. In modern history, instances are recorded of vast multitudes of locusts being blown by strong winds into the Southern parts of Europe, and occasioning great distress. In the Venetian territories alone, no less than 30,000 people were destroyed by a plague occasioned by a visit of locusts in 1487.

Strange and loathsome as it may seem, these insects are used in some places as an article of food, and they are said to taste not unlike red herrings. The way of preparing them is various, as they are sometimes dried and salted, and sometimes they are eaten fresh, as is done, in many parts of Arabia and Persia, by the people, who, as we are told by Salt, “after broiling them, separate the heads from the bodies, and devour the latter, in the same manner as Europeans eat shrimps and prawns.” Many other travellers testify to their being a favourite article of food in the more mountainous and poorer regions of the East; and we cannot but be surprised, therefore, with the knowledge of these facts, that so many commentators should labour to make the food of John the Baptist to be the fruit of some wild tree, when nothing can be plainer, than that the inhabitants of the poor and sequestered district he frequented, would, in all probability, make use of locusts as their successors in the same quarters do in the present day.

REVIEWS OF NEW RELIGIOUS PUBLICATIONS.

On Natural Theology. By THOMAS CHALMERS, D.D. and L.L.D., Professor of Theology in the University of Edinburgh, and Corresponding Member of the Royal Institute of France. Vol. I. 12mo. Glasgow, W. Collins, 1836.

MAN, it has been often remarked, is a religious creature; that is, he is fitted by the natural constitution of his mind to understand and to feel the force of religious principle and motive. It is this very peculiarity in the structure of the human being which prepares him at once to know that there is a God, and that if there be such a Being, certain feelings of reverence, homage, and obedience ought to be exercised towards him. There have been individuals, it is true, who have openly professed themselves to be Atheists, declaring their entire disbelief in the existence of a Supreme Being. But such men are evidently doing violence to the nature of which they are possessed. Reason and conscience are at one in their attestations as to the reality of the Divine existence; and hence, Atheists are without excuse. The evidence around and within them is sufficient to convince them, but the secret of their Atheism is, that they will not be convinced. The light shines with overwhelming brightness, but such is their unwillingness to submit themselves to its cheering influence, that they deliberately shut their eyes upon it.

And even independently altogether of the actual evidence for the existence of a God, the mere presumption that there may be such a Being, is of itself sufficient to bring us under obligation to make further investigation, if possibly we can arrive at a settled conviction of this great question. We dare not remain at rest upon the matter. It is too momentous to be left unsolved. It is not a mere speculative truth, which it is of little consequence to us whether it be satisfactorily established or not. It is a strictly practical truth, which involves consequences of vital importance to our comfort and happiness. If the question then shall once be proposed, I must not, I cannot, I dare not, rest until it shall have been solved in some way or other. On this subject we may quote some excellent remarks from the admirable work of Dr Chalmers now before us:—

"Man is not to blame, if an atheist, because of the want of proof. But he is to blame, if an atheist, because he has shut his eyes. He is not to blame, that the evidence for a God has not been seen by him, if no such evidence there were within the field of his observation. But he is to blame, if the evidence have not been seen, because he turned away his attention from it. That the question of a God may lie unresolved in his mind, all he has to do, is to refuse a hearing to the evidence. He may abide without the conviction of a God, if he so choose. But this his choice is matter of criminality towards him; but to be satisfied that He should remain unknown, is like criminality towards Him. There is a moral perversity of spirit with him who is willing, in the midst of many objects of gratification, that there should not be one object of gratitude. It is true that, even in the ignorance of God, there may be a responsibility towards God. The Discerner of the heart sees, whether, for the blessings innumerable with which He has strewed the path of every man, He is treated, like the unknown benefactor who was diligently sought, or like the unknown benefactor who was never sought for. In respect, at least of desire after God, the same distinction of character may be observed between one man and another—whether God be wrapt in mystery, or stand forth in full development to our view. Even though a mantle of deepest obscurity lay over the question of His existence; this would not efface the distinction, between the pious on the one hand who laboured and aspired after Him; and the impious on the other which never missed the evidence that it was not care for, and so grovelled in the midst of its own sensuality and selfishness. The eye of a heavenly vision is upon all these varieties; and thus, whether it be darkness or whether it be dislike which hath caused a people to be ignorant of God, there is with him a clear principle of judgment, that He can extend even to the outfields of atheism."

If then the question as to the existence of a Divine Being is of such a nature that no man can safely leave it unexamined, the enquiry naturally suggests itself, "Are there not some men who are so situated, that not even the slightest evidence on this subject is within their reach?" Without hesitation we answer, No. There lives not a man upon the earth whose path is not strictly strewed with proofs the most satisfactory and convincing, that there is a God. Or, to use the eloquent language of our author:—

"There is no individual so utterly a stranger to the name and the conception of a Divinity, as to be without the scope of this obligation. They have all from their infancy heard of God. Many have been trained to think of Him, amidst a thousand associations of reverence. Some, under a roof of piety, have often listened the prayers of early childhood to this unseen Being; and, in the oft repeated sound of morning and evening orisons, they have become familiar to His name. Even they who have grown up at random through the years of a neglected boyhood, are greatly within the limits of that responsibility for which we plead. They have at least the impression of a God. When utterance of Him is made in their hearing, they are not startled as if by the utterance of a thing unnoticed and unknown. They are fully possessed, if not with the certainty, at least with the idea, of a great eternal Sovereign, whose kingdom is the universe, and on whose will all its processes are suspended. Whosoever may have escaped from the full and practical belief of such a Being, he most assuredly hath not escaped from the conception of Him. The very imprecations of profaneness may have taught it to him. The very Sabbaths he spends in riot and blasphemy at least remind him of a God. The worship-bell of the church he never enters, conveys to him, if not the truth, at least an imagination of the truth. In all these ways, and in many more beside, there is the sense of a God upon his spirit—and if such a power of evidence hath not been forced upon his understanding so as to compel the assurance that God is—at least such intimations have been given, that he cannot possibly make his escape from the thought that a God may be. In spite of himself this thought will overtake him, and if it do not arrest him by a sense of obligation, it will leave guilt upon his soul. It might not make him a believer, but it ought to make him an inquirer—and in this indifference of his there is the very essence of sin—though it be against a God who is unknown."

In the present Treatise, the argument for the Being of a God is carried up from even the lowest presumption to that accumulated, and even still more accumulating, mass of evidence which impresses us with a conviction of absolute certainty. The proofs drawn from external nature are so numerous, and have been so admirably treated in the work of Dr Paley, that it is unnecessary to do more than refer to them. But there is another class of proofs drawn from the mind and heart of man himself, which have been but seldom noticed. In the discussion of this part of the evidence, accordingly, Dr Chalmers has been somewhat extended. As a specimen, we may extract the following remarks upon conscience:—

"Now it is in these phenomena of Conscience that Nature offers to us, far her strongest argument for the moral character of God. Had He been an unrighteous Being himself, would He have given to this the obviously superior faculty in man, so distinct and authoritative a voice on the side of righteousness? Would He have so constructed the creature of our species, as to have planted in every breast a reclaiming witness against himself? Would He have thus inscribed on the tablet of every heart the sentence of his own condemnation; and is not this just as unlikely, as that He should have inscribed it in written characters on the forehead of each individual? Would He so have fashioned the workmanship of His own hands; or, if a God of cruelty, injustice, and falsehood, would He have placed in the station of master and judge, that faculty which, felt to be the highest in our nature, would prompt a generous and high-minded revolt of all our sentiments against the Being who formed us? From a God possessed of such characteristics, we should surely have expected a differently-moulded humanity; or, in other words, from the actual constitution of man, from the testimonies on the side of all righteousness, given by the vicegerent within the heart, do we infer the righteousness of the Sovereign who placed it there. He would never have established a conscience in man, and invested it with the authority of a monitor, and given to it those legislative and judicial functions which it obviously possesses; and then so framed it, that all its decisions should be on the side of that virtue which He himself disowned, and condemnatory of that vice which He himself exemplified. This is an evidence for the righteousness of God, which keeps its ground, amid all the disorders and aberrations to which humanity is liable; and can no more, indeed, be deafened or overborne by these, than is the rightful authority of public opinion, by the occasional outbreakings of iniquity and violence which take place in society."

And again,

"It is true that rebellious man hath, with daring footstep, trampled on the lessons of Conscience; but why, in spite of man's perversity, is Conscience, on the other hand, able to lift a voice so piercing and so powerful, by which to remonstrate against the wrong, and to reclaim the honours that are due to her? How comes it that, in the mutiny and uproar of the inferior faculties, that faculty in man, which wears the stamp and impress of the highest, should remain on the side of truth and holiness? Would humanity have thus been moulded by a false and evil spirit; or would he have committed such impolicy against himself, as to insert in each member of our species a principle which would make him feel the greatest complacency in his own rectitude, when he feels the most high-minded revolt of indignation and dislike against the Being who gave him birth? It is not so much that Conscience takes a part among the other faculties of our nature, but that Conscience takes among them the part of a governor, and that man, if he do not obey her suggestions, still, in despite of himself, acknowledges her rights. It is a mighty argument for the virtue of the Governor above, that all the laws and injunctions of the governor below are on the side of virtue. It seems as if He had left this representative, or remaining witness, for himself, in a world that had cast off its allegiance, and that, from the voice of the judge within the breast, we may learn the will and the character of Him who hath invested with such authority his dictates. It is this which speaks as much more demonstratively for the presidency of a righteous God in human affairs, than for that of impure or unrighteous demons, as did the rod of Aaron, when it swallowed the rods of the enchanters and magicians in Egypt. In the wildest anarchy of man's insurgent appetites and sins, there is still a reclaiming voice,—a voice which, even when in practice disregarded, it is impossible not to own; and to which, at the very moment that we refuse our obedience, we find that we cannot refuse the homage of what we ourselves do feel and acknowledge to be the best, the highest principles of our nature."

Had our limits permitted, we would gladly have enlarged our remarks upon this valuable work. Suffice it to say, however, that characterized as it is by the Author's well-known vigour of thought and richness of illustration, it cannot fail to be regarded as an important accession to the Literature of Theology, and take its place as a standard work on that department of the science of which it treats.

THE CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Family Worship.—A household in which family prayer is devoutly attended to, conjoined with the reading of the Scriptures, is a school of religious instruction. The whole contents of the sacred volume are in due course laid open before its members. They are continually reminded of their relation to God and the Redeemer, of their sins, and their wants, and of the method they must take to procure pardon for the one, and the relief of the other. Every day they are receiving "line upon line, and precept upon precept." A fresh accession is continually making to their stock of knowledge; new truths are gradually opened to their view, and the impressions of old truths revived. A judicious parent will naturally notice the most striking incidents in his family in his devotional addresses: such as the sickness, or death, or removal for a longer or shorter time, of the members of which it is composed. His addresses will be varied according to circumstances. Has a pleasing event spread joy and cheerfulness through the household? it will be noticed with becoming expressions of fervent gratitude. Has some calamity overwhelmed the domestic circle? it will give occasion to an acknowledgment of the divine equity; the justice of God's proceedings will be vindicated, and grace implored through the blood of the Redeemer, to sustain and sanctify the stroke.

When the most powerful feelings, and the most interesting circumstances, are thus connected with religion, it is not unreasonable to hope that, through divine grace, some lasting and useful impressions will be made. Is not some part of the good seed thus sown, and thus nurtured, likely to take root and to become fruitful? Deeply as we are convinced of the deplorable corruption of the human heart, and the necessity, consequent on this, of divine agency to accomplish a saving purpose, we must not forget that God is accustomed to work by means; and surely none can be conceived more likely to meet the end. What can be so likely to impress a child with a dread of sin, as to hear his parents constantly deprecating the wrath of God as justly due to it; or to induce him to seek an interest in the mediation and intercession of the Saviour, as to hear him imploring it for him, day by day, with an importunity proportioned to the magnitude of the subject? By a daily attention on such exercises, children and servants are taught most effectually how to pray: Suitable topics are suggested to their minds; suitable petitions are put into their mouths; while their growing acquaintance with the Scriptures furnishes the arguments by which they may plead with God.—ROBERT HALL.

Family Religion.—Reader, I beg of you, as from Christ, for his sake, for your soul's sake, your children's sake, for the sake of the church and kingdom, that you will conscientiously and seriously set up family religion; calling upon God, singing his praises, and instructing your children and servants in the Scripture and Catechism, and in a wise and diligent education of youth. Hear me, as if I begged it of you with tears, on my knees. Alas, what doth the world suffer by the neglect of this! It is out of ungodly families that the world hath ungodly rulers, ungodly ministers, and a swarm of serpentine enemies of holiness and peace, and their own salvation. What country groaneth not under the confusions, miseries, and horrid wickedness, which are all the fruits of family neglects, and the careless and ill education of youth? It is a work of great skill and constant care to instruct and educate your children, and to keep them from tempting company and snares. To cry out of dumb and unfaithful ministers, while you are worse at home yourselves, is but self-condemnation. Are ministers more obliged to care for your children's souls, by nature, or by vow and covenant, than you are? Can they do that for whole parishes which you will not do for one household, or your own children? The first charge and part is yours: if families treacherously neglect their part, and then look that all should be done at the church, you may as wisely send boys to the universities before they are taught to read and write in lower schools. If there be any hope of the amendment of the wicked, miserable, and distracted world, it must be mostly done by family religion and the Christian education of youth. "Godliness is profitable to all things;" but the curse of God is in the house of the wicked, and the ungodly betrayers of souls, of themselves, children, and servants, will very quickly be summoned to a terrible account; especially those that should, as rulers, be exemplary to the vulgar, and are ashamed to own serious family religion, as if all beyond some formal and lip-labour, were a dishonour to their houses, or a needless thing.—BAXTER.

Sanctified Affliction.—Worldly sorrow is worthy of pity—because it leadeth to death; but this deserves nothing but envy and congratulation. If those tears were common, hell would not so enlarge itself. Never sin, repented of, was punished; and never any thus mourned, and repented not. Lo, you have done that, which you grieve you have not done. That good God, whose act is his will, accounts of our will as our deed. If he required sorrow equal to the heinousness of our sins, there were no end of our mourning! Now his mercy regards not so much the measure as the truth of it; and accounts us to have that, which we complain to want. I never knew any truly penitent, who, in the depth of his remorse, was afraid of sorrowing too much; nor any unrepentant, who wished to sorrow more. Yea, let me tell you, that this sorrow is better, and more than that deep heaviness for sin which you desire. Many have been vexed with an extreme remorse for some sin, from the gripes of a galled conscience, which yet never came where true repentance grew—in whom the conscience plays at once the accuser, witness, judge, and tormentor; but an earnest grief for want of grief, was never found in any but a gracious heart. You are happy, and complain. Tell me, I beseech you, this sorrow you mourn to want: is it a grace of the Spirit of God, or not? If not, why do you sorrow to want it? If it be, oh! how happy is it to grieve for want of grace! The God of all truth and blessedness has said, "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness;" and with the same breath, "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted!" You say you mourn: Christ saith, "You are blessed." You say you mourn: Christ saith, "You shall be comforted." Either now distrust your Saviour, or else confess your own happiness, and, with patience, expect his promised consolation. What do you fear? You see others stand like strong rocks—unshaken, unremoved. You are but a reed, a feeble plant tossed and bowed with every wind, and with much agitation bruised. Lo, you are in tender and favourable hands, that never brake any whom their sins bruised—never bruised any whom temptations have bowed. You are but flax, and your best is not a flame, but an obscure smoke of grace. Lo, here his Spirit is as a soft wind, not as cold water; he will kindle, but will never quench you. The sorrow you want, is his gift. Take heed, lest while you vex yourself with details of the measure, you grudge at the giver. Beggars may not choose. This portion he has vouchsafed to give you; if you have any, it was more than he was bound to bestow. Yet you say, What! no more? as if you took it unkindly that he is not more liberal. Even these holy discontents are dangerous. Desire more, (as much as you can,) but repine not, when you do not attain. Desire, but so as to be free from impatience, free from unthankfulness. Those that have tried can say, how difficult it is to complain, with due reservation of thanks. Neither know I which is worse—to long for good things impatiently, or not at all to desire them. The fault of your sorrow is rather in your conceit, than in itself; and if indeed you mourn not enough, stay but God's leisure, and your eyes shall run over with tears. How many do you see sport with their sins, yea brag of them! how many that should die for want of pastime, if they might not sin freely—and more freely talk of it! What a saint are you to those, that can droop under the memory of the frailty of youth, and never think you have spent enough of tears! Yet so I encourage you in what you have, as one that persuades you not to desist from suing for more. It is good to be covetous of grace, and to have our desires herein enlarged with our receipts. Weep still, and still desire to weep;—but let your tears be as the rain in the sunshine—comfortable and hopeful; and let not your longing savour of murmur or distrust. These tears are reserved—this hunger shall be satisfied—this sorrow shall be comforted! There is nothing betwixt God and you—but time. Prescribe not to his wisdom—hasten not his mercy. His grace is enough for you:—his glory shall be more than enough.—BURNOP HALL.

Good Fruits.—It is no good fruit that proceeds not out of a heart aiming at the obedience of all God's will: such kind of men are but almost Christians, and shall be almost saved: such as their Christianity is, such shall their salvation be; they are come nearer to religion, so they shall but come nearer to heaven.—Another thing necessarily required to good fruit is, that there be special regard had to the duties of that particular calling wherein a man is placed by God's providence. As God hath fitted every man to live in some calling, so each man's calling is appointed him for that end, to be, as it were, the testimony of his religion, and the matter in which he should show himself what is in him. For this is to be held for a rule, that religion doth not abolish ordinary callings, nor exempt any man from taking some lawful way or other, by which to do good to himself and human society; but rather, it is a man's only direction for the choosing of a calling, and for the lawful employing himself in the same. Paul, writing to the Thessalonians, and exhorting them to increase more and more in religion, persuades them, also, "to meddle with their own business," and to work with their hands. It is said of the shepherds, to whom the birth of our Saviour was revealed by the angels, that when they had been at Bethlehem, and seen the babe in the manger, they returned back to their callings. John the Baptist, preaching repentance to the people, when they flocked about him, every man asking what he should do, put them over all to their callings:—"What shall we do?" said the publicans. "Require," saith he, "no more than that which is appointed unto you."—"And what shall we do?" quoth the soldiers. "Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely, and be content with your calling."—HERON.

Crellius was a Socinian, and a leader of that party. The grace of God was signally manifested in bringing him to right views of the truth. He not only rejoiced to see his daughters bow the knee to the crucified Saviour, but he himself turning to the Lord, called upon him as his Lord and his God; and found, at the latter end of his life, no consolation but in the atonement by the blood of Jesus, and wished that all his books could die with him. This has been testified, not only by his daughters, but by all who were with him before his end.—Note to Latrobe's Hist. of Un. Brethren.

TO "THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD."

BY THE REV. DUNCAN GRANT, A.M.,
Minister of Forres.

BEAUTEOUS on our heath-clad mountains,
May our HERALD's feet appear;
Sweet, by silver lakes and fountains,
May his voice be to our ear.
Let the tenants of our rocks,
Shepherds watching o'er their flocks,
Village swain and peasant boy,
'Thee salute with songs of joy!

CHRISTIAN HERALD! spread the story
Of Redemption's wond'rous plan;
'Tis Jehovah's brightest glory,
'Tis his highest gift to man;
Angels on their harps of gold,
Love its glories to unfold;
Heralds who its influence wield,
Make the waste a fruitful field.

To the fount of mercy soaring,
On the wings of faith and love;
And the depths of grace exploring,
By the light shed from above;
Shew us whence life's waters flow,
And where trees of blessing grow,
Bearing fruit of heavenly bloom,
Breathing Eden's rich perfume.

Love to God and man expressing,
In thy course of mercy speed;
Lead to springs of joy and blessing,
And with heavenly manna feed
Scotland's children high and low,
Till the Lord they truly know,
As to us our fathers told,
He was known by them of old.

To the young, in season vernal,
Jesus in his grace disclose;
As the tree of life eternal,
'Neath whose shade they may repose,
Shielded from the noon tide ray,
And from ev'ning's tribes of prey;
And refresh'd with fruits of love,
And with music from above.

CHRISTIAN HERALD! may the blessing
Of the Highest thee attend,
That, this chiefest boon possessing,
Thou may'st prove thy country's friend:
Tend to make our land assume Something of its former bloom,
When the dews of heaven were seen
Sparkling on its pastures green,

When the voice of warm devotion
To the throne of God arose—
Mighty as the sound of ocean,
Calm as nature in repose;—
Sweeter, than when Araby
Perfume breathes from flow'r and tree,
Rising 'bove the shining sphere,
To Jehovah's list'ning ear.

Humility.—In the early part of Hervey's ministry—when he was an avowed Armenian, there lived in his parish a ploughman, who usually attended the congregation of Dr Doddridge, and was well instructed in the doctrines of grace: Mr Hervey being advised by his physician, for the benefit of his health, to follow the plough, in order to smell the fresh earth, frequently accompanied this ploughman in his rural employment. Understanding the ploughman was a serious person, he said to him one morning, "What do you think is the hardest thing in religion?" to which he replied, "I am a poor, illiterate man, and you, sir, are a minister; I beg leave to return the question."—"Then," said Mr Hervey, "I think the hardest thing is to deny sinful self:" grounding his opinion on that solemn admonition of our Lord,—"If any man will come after me, let him deny himself."—"I harangued," says Mr Hervey, "upon the import and extent of the duty, shewing that merely to forbear the infamous action is little—we must deny admittance, deny entertainment, at least, to the evil imagination, and quench even the kindling sparks of irregular desire. In this way I shot my random bolt." The ploughman replied, "Here is another instance of self-denial, to which the injunction extends, and which is of very great moment in the Christian religion: I mean the instance of renouncing our own strength and our own righteousness—not leaning on that for holiness, nor relying on this for justification." In repeating the story to a friend, Mr Hervey observed, "I then hated the righteousness of Christ, I looked at the man with astonishment and disdain, I thought him an old fool, and wondered at what I then fancied the motley mixture of piety and extravagance in his notions. I have seen clearly since who was the fool—not the wise old Christian, but the proud James Hervey. I now discern sense, solidity, and truth in his observations."—Brown's Memoirs of Hervey.

Ancient Christians.—We learn, from Chrysostom, that women and children had frequently the Gospels, or parts of the New Testament, hung round their neck, and carried them constantly about with them. The rich had splendid copies of the sacred writings on vellum, in their libraries and book-cases; but as the art of printing was not known till many ages after, complete copies of the Scriptures were, of course, exceedingly scarce.

It is, however, very observable, that in the primitive church, children were particularly encouraged in the efforts which they made to commit to memory the invaluable truths of the divine volume. Of one Marcus, who was well instructed in the morning of life, it is recorded, that he became so expert in the Scriptures, when he was but a youth, that he could repeat the whole of the Old and New Testaments. Of one or two others it is said, that being men of good memories, they got the Scriptures by heart, only by hearing them continually read by others, they not being able to read a single word.

Value of the Bible.—From the register of Alnwick, bishop of Norwich, it appears, that a Testament of Wickliff's version, in the year 1429, cost four marks and forty pence, £2 16s. 8d., (equal to more than twenty pounds of our present money;) a large sum in those days, when five pounds was considered sufficient for the annual maintenance of a respectable tradesman, or a yeoman, or one of the inferior clergy.

ON THE PARABLES OF OUR SAVIOUR.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM,

Minister of the College Church, Edinburgh.

A CONSIDERABLE portion of the instructions which our Saviour addressed to men while upon earth, was conveyed by means of parables. His parables occupy a considerable part of the Gospels, and are generally felt and acknowledged to be very interesting and important. While many parts of the Scriptures are by many readers quite forgotten, and leave no impression behind them, the parables are more or less recollected, and exert some influence upon men's opinions; and it is therefore of much importance that their nature should be correctly understood, and that a right mode of ascertaining their meaning should be generally adopted. A parable means in general a comparison, but in the restricted sense in which it is usually employed, it denotes a story or narrative of incidents, commonly taken from ordinary life, designed to shadow forth or embody some important truth or practical instruction, and fitted, in the peculiar form which it assumes, to convey the truth or instruction with advantage. Parables were common among the ancient and especially the Eastern writers, and several occur in the Old Testament Scriptures. Our Saviour's parables, however, are the most interesting specimens of this kind of composition, at once from their singular beauty, and the importance of the information and instruction which they are intended to convey. They consist generally of a simple narrative of circumstances, such as might probably have occurred in the usual course of things, and in the ordinary intercourse of society. The story is commonly an appeal to our natural feelings of justice and equity, and is so framed, as to be admirably adapted to insinuate a truth, against which there might exist a prejudice, and to impress it upon the understanding and the memory; and to bring home practical instructions, that is, the duty and propriety of acting in a certain manner, with peculiar power to the heart and the conscience. At the same time, these interesting and important portions of Scripture are liable, like other parts of it, to be wrested and perverted by unlearned and unstable persons, in such a way as to produce much error and mischief. The principal source of error and of injury in the explanation and application of our Saviour's parables, is the notion which seems often to be entertained, that every thing stated in the parable must have some corresponding circumstance or idea, which it was intended to typify or shadow forth, a notion which is neither consistent with the general idea of a parable, nor capable of being applied fairly and rationally to the explanation of the parables which we actually find in the New Testament.

As illustrations of the erroneous mode of applying parables which we have in view, we may mention that we have heard an argument gravely adduced against the Scriptural doctrine of predestination from the parable of the talents, founded upon this consideration, that the master regulated his conduct toward those whom he had intrusted with the talents, solely by a reference to their actual conduct, and not by any previous purpose or determination of his own; and we have heard the doctrine of universal pardon defended from the parable of the servants, whose debts were remitted, because both of them (supposed to typify those who are saved and those who perish) had something forgiven. It is quite plain that these two parables were not intended to give any information upon the subjects respectively referred to, and that this mode of applying them did not only bring out errors in these instances, but necessarily involved gross absurdity in itself. The great point to be kept in view in explaining and applying our Saviour's parables, is, that they are commonly designed to shew forth, and to impress one or more great truths or practical principles—that it was for this purpose that the parable was constructed, and that, of course, every thing not bearing upon the elucidation of these leading truths and principles, is to be regarded as incidental and adventitious. When our blessed Saviour intended to convey some important instruction, and resolved, in his wisdom, to convey it in the form, or through the means of a parable, it must naturally follow, as the next step in the process, that he would determine to make a parable for that purpose, and fitted to serve the particular end he had in view. Now, as a parable just consists of a story, or narrative of minute and familiar incidents, and as without this it could not properly be a parable at all, the making of a parable of course implies the insertion of a variety of minute circumstances, which were not intended to have any separate significance. Without being minute, specific, and familiar, there can be no parable, and therefore in every parable we may expect to find minute circumstances introduced into the narrative, which were not intended to convey any particular meaning, and whose insertion is fully accounted for by the statement, that they were inserted for the purpose of making a parable, it having seemed meet to infinite wisdom to employ a parable upon that occasion, to serve an important end. Some persons, out of a feeling of respect for the Sacred Scriptures, have adopted the erroneous notion, that the statements of the Bible have and were intended to have all the meanings which they can possibly be made to bear. And it is almost equally unreasonable to suppose, that all the various circumstances introduced into a parable, are intended to have a meaning, and to impress a truth or principle. Such a notion rests upon no solid foundation. It is not demanded by a judicious reverence for Scripture, and it is not required, nay, it is not admitted, by a regard to the true nature of a parable. If this mode of interpreting parables were to be adopted, and fully applied, it would require a constant stretch of imagination, and a habitual disregard of the sober and rational use of our faculties; and the consequence would be, that he would be the best interpreter of the parables who had the most fertile imagination, and who could invent the greatest number of real or apparent resemblances between the minute statements of the parable, and religious truth or moral precepts.

In explaining and applying any one of our Saviour's parables, the first great object to be aimed at, is to get a clear and distinct conception of the chief purpose which the parable was intended to serve, or of the leading truth or principle which it was designed to convey or impress, and then to apply its different statements in such a way as to bring out that purpose, or truth, or principle, in the clearest and most affecting manner.

The leading object of a parable, the principal truth or precept which it was intended to impress or to enforce, may in general be discovered without much difficulty, although, as the discovery of this is by far the most important step in the application of it, the utmost care should be employed to ascertain it correctly, and to have a clear and distinct idea of it produced upon the mind.

The leading objects of parables,—and in one or two instances, especially in the parable of the sower, a minute explanation of the statements,—are made known to us by our Saviour himself, and in other cases, they are left to be collected or inferred either from the connection in which they are introduced, or from a consideration of the general scope of the parables themselves. But whatever materials may be afforded for ascertaining the leading truths or precepts which particular parables were intended to impress, it is of essential consequence for the proper application of any parable, and in order to derive from it the full amount of instruction which it was intended to convey, that its chief object or its leading principle should be ascertained, and should then be distinctly kept in view, and steadily applied to the elucidation of its minute statements. Unless this principle of interpreting and applying the parable be firmly embraced and steadily adhered to, we shall be in constant danger of falling into error,—of giving an unbridled license to our imagination,—of bringing our own notions and fancies to the parables to be countenanced by them, instead of regulating all our opinions by a fair application of each portion of Scripture, and thus of making the word of God speak in the manner the best suited to gratify our own desires, and to promote our own views. When the right mode of interpreting parables is employed, by first of all ascertaining the leading object which a particular parable was intended to serve, and then keeping this continually in view, we find from experience that they are admirably fitted to bring out important truths and great practical principles in a peculiarly clear and impressive way, to imprint them deeply on the memory, and to commend them with power to the heart and the conscience. It is deserving, however, of careful observation, that while our Saviour's parables are in many respects fitted to serve, and do, through the divine blessing, actually serve this important purpose of elucidating truth, it was not this consideration that originally led our Saviour to have recourse to them, but one, as he himself has assured us, directly the reverse. The reason why our Saviour employed parables, which was not to elucidate truth, but to conceal it from those to whom they were originally addressed, we will illustrate in a future number.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF JOHN FREDERIC OBERLIN,

Pastor of Waldbach, in the Ban de la Roche.

THE life of a country clergyman, who seldom or never travelled beyond the range of his own parish, however eminent he may have been for the attainments of personal piety, or for the zeal and variety of his spiritual labours, presents but few incidents of that description, which is calculated to engage in his narrative the sympathies of a deep and general interest; and accordingly, the reader who betakes himself to this species of biography, can anticipate in imagination the course of the unchequered tale—accompanies the subject of the memoir in the preparation and discharge of his public duties, or follows him in his private walks, as he goes from house to house, renewing the daily routine of those peaceful exercises, by which he seeks to bring his people to God, and prepare them for a better world. The life of the individual, of whom we are about to give a brief notice, formed a remarkable exception to the quiet and contemplative course marked out for pastors of this description.

Endowed by nature with a character, which combined, in a singular degree, the opposite qualities of a love of study and private meditation, with a spirit of constant activity and enterprise—he was placed by Providence in a station which afforded the completest scope for the development of his peculiar talents—and guided by the bent of his own mind, as well as by a strong necessity, he brought the whole force of his natural and acquired resources to bear, with such devoted, and at the same time, well-directed enthusiasm, on the promotion both of the temporal and spiritual interests of his flock, and succeeded in accomplishing so vast an improvement on their domestic and social economy—that his history will be found as attractive to the lover of romance, as it deserves to be known to the Christian, as a beautiful example of the power and the fruits of faith.

Oberlin was born at Strasbourg, on the 31st August, 1740, of a reduced, though highly respectable family. His father held an office in the Gymnasium of that city,—an institution which was designed as a preparatory school for the Lutheran college of the same place—and devoted his leisure time to the education of his nine children. As it often happens, however, the chief burden of forming the minds of that young family devolved upon the mother, who was a woman of a sound judgment, and superior accomplishments, and possessed, in great perfection, the happy art of training up her children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. On the evenings of every day, she assembled them around a table, to read to them some interesting narrative, in which instruction was blended with amusement—whilst, in the meantime, her little auditors were busily employed in copying some drawings, which their father had sketched for them during the day; and scarcely a night passed, without a general request, before separating, that “dear mamma would favour them with one beautiful hymn”—one of those sacred songs which Luther composed, in conjunction with some of his illustrious contemporaries, and which being carefully impressed on the memories of the young in his day, were powerful instruments in spreading the influence of the Reformed religion. The hymn sung by the Oberlins was always followed by a prayer; and there can be little doubt, that the strong impression which these evening occupations of his childhood made on the mind of the young Frederic, contributed to form those peculiar features of character, which were so remarkable in the future pastor of Waldbach. As the children grew up, the elder Oberlin judiciously adapted their studies and pastimes to their advancing age; and among the various expedients which the indulgent father contrived for their amusement, was one, that took such a hold of the mind of Frederic, as nearly shaped the course of his future life. A small property, belonging to the family, lay a few miles out of the town of Strasbourg. Thither the father repaired with his family, once every week, during the summer months, and used to perambulate the walks of the little garden attached to the house, with a drum tied to his waist, while his seven boys were taught to follow him, and go through all the different military evolutions. So fond were they all—and particularly Frederic, of this stirring exercise—that he came to talk of nothing but soldiers and warfare—read every book he could procure, that detailed battles and sieges—and frequented the society of some soldiers that were quartered in the town, till his uncommon knowledge of military affairs attracted the notice of the superior officers, and he obtained their permission to join in their exercises. This fondness for a soldier's life, however, did not meet with the approbation of his father, who having destined him for a learned profession, deemed it necessary to interfere, and remove him from the scene of such dangerous attractions. And although Frederic was naturally of an ardent and lively temper, yet, perceiving the views of his father to be decidedly opposed to his following the camp, his sense of filial duty made him cheerfully defer to paternal advice, and enter with the same enthusiasm on the peaceful pursuits of literature, as he would have done had he been left to his own inclinations, or the more stirring career of a military life. The course of his studies, which were at first general, and without any view to a particular profession, were gradually directed, through the force of his own taste, as well as of circumstances, to qualify him for the office of the ministry.

Shortly after he has commenced his theological career, the attention of the Strasbourg citizens was powerfully arrested, by the appearance among them of a preacher, of the name of Dr Lorentz, who, in addition to great powers of popular eloquence, dwelt so much, and so impressively, on the grand doctrines of evangelical truth, that crowds repaired to him wherever he went. Among others, who waited on his ministry, was Oberlin's mother, who, herself a woman of ardent piety, felt the views of this evangelical minister more suited to her spiritual wants and desires than the jejuæ morality she was accustomed to hear in the churches of Strasbourg; and having expressed a strong wish that her favourite son, Frederic, should accompany her to hear Dr Lorentz on the following Sabbath, she prevailed upon him so far, by her urgent solicitations, that, in spite of the prohibition of the theological professors, he went—was delighted with the strain of the preaching—became a regular and diligent attendant on the Doctor's sermons—and gradually came, through prayer and reading of the Scriptures, to adopt the evangelical views of divine truth, as those most agreeable to the Word of God. His impressions of the importance of religion, always strong, were greatly deepened; his resolution to dedicate himself to the work of the ministry assumed a more decided character; and to confirm himself in the principles and habits of piety, he renewed his baptismal consecration to God by a formal covenant, agreeably to the method recommended by Dr Doddridge in his “Ris and Progress.” Having completed his course of theological study, he was ordained a minister according to the forms of the Lutheran Church, but continued for seven years without any pastoral charge, being desirous of maturing his mind and enlarging his knowledge, before he entered on the active performance of duties, the qualifications for which he rated at a high standard. Meanwhile, he entered as private tutor into the family of M. Ziegenhagen, an eminent surgeon in Strasbourg, where, besides other advantages, he acquired that knowledge of botany, medicine, and general science, which enabled him afterwards to render such beneficial services to his parishioners. In that humble situation he had continued for seven years, when he was offered the chaplaincy of a French regiment—a situation which, as it accorded with the early passion he had cherished for a military life, as well as afforded an extensive prospect of usefulness among a class of persons who generally stand much in need of a zealous spiritual instructor, he readily accepted; and in order to qualify himself the more fully for the situation, he left M. Ziegenhagen's family—hired an obscure lodging up three pair of stairs, where he shut himself from the world, and devoted himself to a course of extensive study. Though forgetting the world in this retirement, he was not himself forgotten, for M. Stouber, pastor of the Ban de la Roche, being about to leave his charge for a more important one in Strasbourg, immediately directed his eyes to Oberlin as the fittest person to be his successor. And as that office, which he ultimately accepted, altered the whole complexion of his future life, it may be proper, at this stage, to give some idea of the state of that parish at the time when M. Stouber served.

The Ban de la Roche, or Steinthal, is a mountainous district in the north-east of France, bordering on Alsace, and forming part of the western ramifications of the Haut Champ, an isolated range of mountains, detached by a deep valley from the eastern boundary of the pass of the Vosges. It comprehends two parishes, of which Rothau is one, while the other, containing three churches, extends over the five hamlets of Foudai, Belmont, Waldbach Bellefosse and Zolbach, and is inhabited entirely by Lutherans. The whole district comprises about 9000 English acres, of which more than a third is covered with wood, 2000 are laid out in pasture, and the remainder is cultivated for the common food of the peasantry—oats, rye, and potatoes. The inhabitants of this canton had long enjoyed, in common with the other people of Alsace, an entire liberty of conscience, which was stipulated for by a special decree, when the province was incorporated with France, and which was never infringed, even during the bloody persecutions that were directed against the Protestants in other parts of France. Circumstances, however, prevented the people from reaping the advantages of this privilege, for that district having been unfortunately the seat of conflict during the Thirty Years' War, was so laid waste, as to be scarcely habitable. There were no roads—no implements of agriculture; the very knowledge of the art of cultivating the ground was scarcely possessed by the secluded semi-barbarian inhabitants, who, to the number of eighty or a hundred families, subsisted almost wholly on roots and herbs, which were the spontaneous produce of the soil, and lived in a state of society, the misery and degradation of which can be more easily imagined than described. The hope of the young generation being superior to their parents in this sequestered region, may be judged of by a single anecdote of what occurred to M. Stouber on his first arrival. Being desirous of visiting the school, he was directed to a miserable cottage, where a number of children were crowded together, without any occupation, and in so turbulent a state, that it was difficult for him to procure an answer to his enquiries for the master. "There he is," said one of them, as soon as silence could be obtained, pointing to a withered old man, who lay on a little bed in one corner of the apartment. "Are you the schoolmaster, my good friend?" enquired Stouber. "Yes, sir."—"And what do you teach the children?"—"Nothing, sir."—"Nothing! How is that?"—"Because," replied the old man, with characteristic simplicity, "I know nothing myself."—"Why then were you made schoolmaster?"—"Why, sir, I had been taking care of the Waldbach pigs for a great number of years, and when I got too old and infirm for that employment, they sent me here to take care of the children." This man affords a specimen of all the schools in the five villages, which were taught by masters no better qualified, and to which the children were sent, for no other purpose than to be kept out of mischief. The pastor lost no time in endeavouring to reform the schools; for such was the deplorable ignorance of the people, and so greatly had the office of schoolmaster fallen into contempt, that he could not prevail on any individuals to allow their sons to enter on such an employment; and it was not till the happy thought struck him, to change the name of Schoolmaster, and call him Superintendent of the school, that he succeeded in obtaining the services of some promising and active young men. Having drawn up an alphabet for their use, and prepared a series of spelling and reading books, the zealous pastor raised, by the assistance of a benevolent individual at Strasbourg, a sum sufficient to build a wooden school-house, and to afford a small salary to each of the masters. In introducing these improvements, he had to encounter the greatest difficulties from the prejudices of the people, who did not perceive the use of spelling-books, filled with whole pages of unconnected syllables; but when they perceived, to their astonishment, that by this means, the children were enabled in a few months to read any book that was put into their hands, their elder brothers and sisters, and even the parents also, in many instances, expressed a desire for instruction; in consequence of which, a school for adults, during part of the Sunday, and the long winter evenings, was opened. Having brought them to this stage, Stouber's next object was to introduce the Scriptures among them, for although they were Protestants of the Lutheran Church, and had a pastor always resident among them, they had never seen a Bible. They thought of it only as a certain large book containing the word of God, and were not easily persuaded that the French Protestant Bibles, which their pastor distributed among them, of which he had received about fifty as a present, and for wider circulation had divided each into three parts, and bound them into thin volumes, were the same as the large book. By degrees, however, their prejudices wore off, their diligent pastor laboured to make them acquainted with the sacred contents of the Bible, and adapting his style of preaching, which was decidedly evangelical, to the state and acquirements of his flock, succeeded, through the divine blessing, in bringing many under salutary impressions, and raising the tone of morals among the people at large during the fourteen years of his residence among them. Anxious, as such a pastor might naturally be expected to feel, that the course of moral and religious improvement he had commenced in the Ban de la Roche should be carried on, he did not relinquish the charge till he had made every exertion to provide a successor animated with a kindred spirit to himself; and being well acquainted with the pious and energetic character of Oberlin, he waited upon him, as we have already said, to request his acceptance of the pastoral engagement. The situation in which he found the young scholar, is too singular and characteristic to be passed without notice. On opening the door, the first object that caught his attention was a small bed, standing in one corner of the room, covered with brown paper hangings, "that," said Stouber to himself, "would just suit the Steinthal." On approaching the bed, he found Oberlin lying upon it and suffering from a violent toothache. He rallied him about the simplicity of his curtains and the homeliness of his apartments. "And pray," continued he, after having taken a survey of the room, "what is the use of that little iron pan that hangs over your table?"—"That is my kitchen," replied Oberlin. "I am in the habit of dining at home with my parents every day, and they give me a large piece of bread to bring back in my pocket. At eight o'clock in the evening I put my bread into that pan, and having sprinkled it with salt and poured a little water upon it, I place it over my lamp, and go on with my studies till ten or eleven o'clock, when I generally begin to feel hungry, and relish my self-cooked supper." Stouber was delighted—felt that this was the very man he wanted, and immediately proposed to him to take the vacant parish of the Ban de la Roche. Nothing could have been more congenial to Oberlin's own mind; and accordingly, having resigned the chaplaincy, and completed all his arrangements, after many earnest prayers that a blessing might rest upon himself and the little flock of whom he was to take the oversight, he accompanied his new friend back to Waldbach, and arrived there on the 30th March, 1767, in the twenty-seventh year of his age.

It had been the anxious desire of his parents, with whose entire approbation he had made this change in his mode of life, that he should take a partner with him to his sequestered parsonage. His mother particularly was earnest on the subject, and Oberlin, who was easy on the point, consented, on condition that she should point out to him where he was to find a suitable wife. Having directed him to the daughter of a rich brewer's widow who resided in their neighbourhood, and with whom she had received a hint that he might succeed, he resolved to make the experiment; but as it had been his practice from his earliest years to wait for some intimation from Providence, he earnestly prayed to God that he would direct him in forming a judgment whether this would be likely to prove a happy and useful connection. The spirit was good, but the manner in which he followed it was wrong, as he very inconsistently laid down to himself the signs by which he would judge of the will of Providence, with the manner in which the mother should receive him. If she herself should broach the subject, he was to consider it as a proof that heaven approved of the proceeding, but if not, his line of duty was to do nothing in the matter. Accordingly, having repaired to the house and been admitted, the widow gave him a kind reception, took a chair beside him, talked of the weather, the news of the day, and other things, till the conversation being at length exhausted without the lady having thrown out the slightest hint about her daughter, Oberlin abruptly rose and left the parties in utter astonishment as to the nature and object of his visit. A second attempt at matrimony, made, however, with better judgment, likewise failed; and giving up, therefore, in the meantime, all thoughts of marriage, he resolved to settle himself down in his parsonage along with his mother, who went to assist him at his outset in life, and then left him with a younger sister. About a year after, Madeleine Witter, a relation of his family, came on a visit of a few weeks to his house—a young lady of great accomplishments, and impressed with serious views of religion, the daughter of a professor in the University of Strasbourg, though she had lately been deprived of both her parents. The time of her departure was approaching, when one morning after breakfast, finding the young lady sitting in a summer-house in the garden, he went up to her, and commenced the conversation, by saying, “that he had felt a strong impulse in his mind, which he considered a divine intimation that she was to be his wife, and that as she knew his situation, he wished her to take the matter into consideration, and give him the result of her deliberations in a few days.” Miss Witter, rising from the seat, and placing one hand before her eyes, held the other towards him; the decision was made, a decision on which she had reason to congratulate herself ever after, and which he made with feelings of the warmest piety, as was evinced by a most affecting prayer which he wrote on the occasion.

His domestic happiness being thus provided for, it is time to consider Oberlin carrying on his plans of usefulness in his parish, and it is here that the character of this extraordinary man will be seen to put forth all its energy. “Confident,” says the historian of his life, “that strength would be afforded if rightly sought, Oberlin resolved, when he entered on his cure, to employ all the attainments in science, philosophy and religion, which he had brought with him from Strasbourg, for the improvement of the parish, and the benefit of the parishioners.” Such was the spirit and the resolution with which he had taken possession of the parish; and as we are about to give some details of the indefatigable exertions he made for improving the temporal condition of the people of that place, it is necessary to state, that his first and grand object was to preach the truth as it is in Jesus, with the earnest desire, if possible, to save souls. In the attainment of this object, he was instant, in season and out of season, in inculcating upon the minds of his parishioners the grand doctrines of the corruption of human nature—the atonement of Christ—the unerring and sanctifying influences of the spirit, and the connection between faith and works. But in order to convince them, that in teaching them spiritual things, he had their real welfare at heart, he sought to do them good in matters which came home to every one’s experience, and to shew them, that in the most common and secular affairs of life, the grand principle of doing all for the glory, and in obedience to the will of God, ought to be applied, as the most efficient source of industry, order, and every social improvement. In this view it was, that he began every undertaking; and as the object of all of them was, at much trouble and expense to himself, to benefit the people, it might have been expected, that they would have hailed his plans with the liveliest satisfaction and gratitude. Whether he had begun prematurely or not, certain it was, that the most violent opposition was made to him as an innovator, and an extensive conspiracy was formed against him, of which, however, he obtained warning in time to enable him to defeat the attempt. Sunday being the day fixed for its execution, he on that day took for his text these words of our Saviour, in the fifth chapter of Matthew:—“But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also,” and proceeded from these words, to speak of the Christian patience with which we should suffer injuries, and submit to false surmises and ill usage. After the service, the malecontents met at the house of one of the party, to amuse themselves in conjecturing what their pastor would do, when he should find himself compelled to put in practice the principles he had so recently explained. What must have been their astonishment, when the door opened, and Oberlin himself stood before them. “Here am I, my friends,” said he, with that calm dignity which inspires even the most violent with awe. “I am acquainted with your design. If I have violated the rules I laid down for you, punish me for it; it is better that I should deliver myself into your hands, than that you should be guilty of the meanness of an ambush.” These simple words produced their intended effect. The peasants, ashamed of their scheme, sincerely begged his forgiveness, and promised never again to entertain a doubt of the sincerity of the motives by which he was actuated, and of his affectionate desires to promote their welfare. Strengthened by the advantage he had gained from this occurrence, Oberlin proceeded in his plans; and as all the roads belonging to the Ban de la Roche were impassable for the most part of the year, and the greater portion of the parish had no method of communication with the neighbouring towns, but by stepping-stones over the Bruche, which was a mountain torrent, broad and often flooded, he directed his views to open up regular channels of intercourse between Waldbach and the rest of the world, justly considering, that the mode of living, the intelligence and the moral character of his people, would never be permanently and efficiently improved, so long as they continued in their then insulated state. His first proposal then was, to effect a communication with the high-road that led to Strasbourg; and having assembled the people, he suggested to them, that they should blast the rocks, construct with the demolished masses of stone, a high wall sufficient to support a road along the banks of the river, and build a bridge across that stream at a certain turn of the road. The peasants were overwhelmed with astonishment at a project which appeared to them next to an impossibility, and every one began to make excuses, some regarding the difficulties of the undertaking, others on account of private business, some one thing and some another; whereupon, Oberlin, who was prepared for all this, exclaimed,—“That it was a work, of which all would reap the benefit, they having a road and market for their produce, constant intercourse with the inhabitants of other districts, and a great increase of comforts and of the means of living both for themselves and their children, and concluded by saying, “let all who feel the importance of the work, come labour with me.” No sooner had he finished these words, than with a pickaxe on his shoulder, he proceeded to the spot, while the astonished peasants, catching a portion of his enthusiasm, forgot their objections, and ran every one to bring their tools to work along with him. He assigned to each individual his part, selecting for himself and a confidential servant, the most rugged and difficult places; and regardless of the thorns by which his hands were torn, and the bruises he received from the tumbling of the loose stones, he laboured with unabated energy. Every week did the pastor, who had laboured faithfully and zealously to impress their spiritual concerns on his flock, return at the head of 260 of his people, to labour with his hands; the spirit of emulation spread, numbers of fresh workmen flocked in every succeeding day—contributions, raised through his influence in Strasbourg, and other places, poured in to enable him to pay the workmen, and defray all other expenses. Walls were raised, the course of torrents directed into new channels; and in short, incredible exertions were made, which at length were amply rewarded, and the practical wisdom of the undertaking displayed, in the safe, easy, and regular communication, opened by means of the new road and the new bridge between the five hitherto separated villages.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE INFLUENCE OF RELIGION EXHIBITED IN A PRISON.

THE following remarks by Mr Abbott, in reference to the improved mode of treating prisoners in America, are well worthy the attention of the Christian public in our own country. They shew the possibility of rescuing a most degraded class of men at once from temporal misery and eternal ruin.

"The prisons of our country may be considered as hospitals, moral hospitals; where those whose disease has become so violent and malignant that it is no longer safe to allow them to go at large in society, are shut up, so that they can injure no one, at least for a time. It has been, and it is now, the practice, in many countries, to shut up these miserable victims together, and leave them to themselves. Of course they grew worse and worse. The practice is as absurd as it would be to send a hundred patients in all the stages of fever, consumption, and plague, into one great crowded hospital together, with no physician, no medicine, and no attendants but turnkeys, and there to leave them; each one, by the unobstructed intercommunication, conveying his own peculiar infection to all the rest; the whole exposed to every cause that can aggravate disease, and thus forming one living mass of pestilence and corruption. Such have been a great many prisons, and those who entered them came out far worse than when they went in.

"Some philanthropists formed, some years ago, the plan of visiting these prisons, and carrying the Bible there, believing that its moral power would be great enough to cure even those desperate cases of disease. And it has succeeded. A vast number of the most abandoned men have been entirely reformed by it. I do not mean that they have pretended to be reformed while in the prison, but have been proved to have been reformed by their good conduct after having been restored to society, when the time of their imprisonment had expired."

The following interesting narrative affords ample illustration of the truth of these remarks.

"There lived in one of the middle States, some years ago, a man whom I shall call W. I suppress his real name. His character was bad, and he lived with another man, whose character was worse than his own.

"His employer having some quarrel with another man, wanted W to kill him. He endeavoured, for five or six months, to induce him to do it, but he did not succeed. W., however, shewed a degree of indecision about it, which encouraged his wicked employer to persevere. A good man would have refused an application like that, in such a manner, that it never would have been renewed.

"The employer, however, understood his character, and, like all other bad men who endeavour to induce others to commit crime, he knew of an agent which would effectually assist him to prevail upon W. to do the fatal deed. That agent was ardent spirits, the universal stimulus to crime. He accordingly gave it to him, not in such quantities as completely to intoxicate him, but moderately, only enough to destroy what little conscience he had, and yet leave him, in a considerable degree, the possession of his faculties.

"After he had drank the rum, he went and lay down to sleep in the skirts of a wood, where they expected to commit the murder. In a little while, another man, who had been employed to assist in this work, came and woke him up, and said to him, 'If we mean to do any thing, we had better do it now.' W. accordingly rose, and they went together. When they came to their victim, Jack shot at him, and then his accomplice took the gun and beat him over the head till he was dead.

"Two persons were hung for this crime, and W. was sentenced to the State prison for a long time. The man whom they had killed was a very bad man, but, as W. afterwards said, that was no cloak for him.

"When W. came to the prison, he was very ignorant. He did not know his own age accurately, and he could not read. There was, in that prison, however, a very faithful chaplain, who, knowing that the Bible alone could be the means of reforming the miserable convicts, always placed that book before them immediately. When they could not read, he used to teach them. I have been told that this course has been taken to teach them. The first lesson was the first word in the Bible—I.

"'That word is I,' the teacher would say to the prisoner in his cell. 'Can you see how many letters there are in it?'

"'Two,' the prisoner would reply, after examining it.

"'Yes,' answers the teacher. 'The first letter is called i; the second, n. These letters are very common in the Bible, and in all reading. See if you can find another n, anywhere on this page.'

"The prisoner then would look very attentively along the lines until he found the letter required. If he made a mistake, and found an m or an r instead, the teacher would explain the difference, and call his attention more fully to the true form of the n. He would also explain the difference between the capital and small i, and shew his pupil that he must expect to find the small i, generally. He would then leave him, asking him to find as many of these letters as he could before the teacher should come again.

"The next lesson would be the next word—the; and thus the pupil would go on slowly, spelling his way until he had learned to read for himself. The attempt was proposed to W., and he commenced it, and, although considerably advanced in life, he made no little progress in his work. He soon was able to read well, and as the truths of the word of God came home to his mind, they produced their usual effects there. They led him to see his sins, and to feel them, and they led him to come to the Saviour for pardon. His whole character was changed; but I must allow him to describe this change in his own words.

"These words were taken down by the same gentleman whom I have mentioned before. He visited him in prison, and, after first conversing with him in regard to the crime for which he had been committed, asked him,

"'W., how do this and all your other sins now appear to you?'

"'Very great,' said he, 'but this does not appear so great as all my other sins against God, cursing and swearing, and getting drunk. When I first began to reflect in my cell, I saw my sins so great, that I felt I could not be forgiven. I was sitting down one day at my work in the prison, and the chaplain came along and asked me my crime. I told him.

"That," said he, "is one of the greatest crimes; but then you may remember David's sin, and he was forgiven. Let your crime be as great as it will, pray to God, and put your trust in him, and you shall find rest to your soul."

"He told me also, that if I could not read, he would visit me in my cell, and put me in the way. I shall ever love him while God gives me breath; I shall love the chaplain, for he put me in the way to save my soul. He persuaded me to go to God, and try to find mercy, and yet, master, I had a doubt in my heart, my sins were so heavy, whether I should be forgiven. The chaplain soon left me, and I went into my cell, and poured out my heart to God, to have mercy on me. But the more I prayed, the more miserable I grew. Heavier and heavier were my sins.

"The next day Mr B. came along, and I asked him to read a chapter to me. As God would have it, he turned to the 55th chapter of Isaiah. It said, 'Every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy wine and milk without price.' He read along to where the prophet says, 'Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon. For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts.'

"I found this gave me great encouragement to go on to pray, to see if I could find relief from all my troubles, the load of sin that was on my heart.

"A night or two after that the chaplain came to my cell, and asked me how I felt. I told him my sins were greater than I could bear, so guilty, so heavy. He asked me if I thought praying would make my sins any less; I gave him no answer. He soon left me, and I went again to prayer. I was almost fit to expire. In all my sorrows I had not a right sorrow. My sorrow was because I had sinned against man.

"The Sunday following, just after I had carried my dinner into my cell, I put my dinner down, and I went to prayer. I rose, and just as I rose from my prayer, the chaplain was at the door. 'We are all guilty creatures,' he said to me, 'and we cannot be saved, except God, for Christ's sake, will save us. If we pray and go to God, we must go in the name of Jesus Christ; if we expect to be saved, we must be saved through the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ.' Then I picked up encouragement.

"The sins which you have committed,' he went on, 'are against your fellow-creatures, but they are much more against God.' Now, I never knew before that they were against God. When the chaplain left me, I went to prayer again. I could eat nothing that day. I did not eat a mouthful.

"I recollected at that time that a minister had told me, whenever I had a chapter read, to have the 51st Psalm. I could not see any body to get to read it, and how to find it I did not know; and the Sunday following, before the keeper unlocked the door, I rose up and went to prayer, and I prayed, 'O Lord, thou knowest I am ignorant, brought up in ignorance. Thou knowest my bringing up. Nothing is too hard for thee to do. May it please thee, O Lord, to shew me that chapter, that I may read it with understanding.' I rose from prayer, and went to my Bible, and took it up. I began the first psalm, and turned over and counted every psalm, and it appeared to me that God was with me, and I counted right to the 51st psalm. I could read a little, and I began to spell H-a-v-e m-e-r-c-y, &c.

I looked over the psalm, and spelt it, and read it, and then put the Bible down, and fell upon my knees, and prayed. 'Have mercy upon me, O God: according to the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions. Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquities, and cleanse me from my sins; for my sin is ever before me. Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight; that thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and clear when thou judgest.'

"When I came to the words, 'Deliver me from blood-guiltiness,' I was struck dumb. I could not say any more at that time. I fell upon my knees, and prayed to God to have mercy upon me for Christ's sake. But I only grew more and more miserable. The load of my sins was heavier and heavier.

"All that I had ever done came plain and open in my sight, and I was led to see that I must perish; there was no help for me; all my sin was upon my own head."

"Such is the miserable criminal's account of the suffering to which he was brought, by the sense of guilt which the Bible was the means of fastening upon his soul. He continued in this state for some time, until at last, as he himself describes it, one day when he was praying in his cell, his burden of guilt was removed. He felt that he might hope for pardon through Jesus Christ. The relief which this feeling brought over his mind seems to have been almost indescribable. Every thing wore a new aspect; even the gloomy prison seemed a cheerful and happy place. His expressions of joy would appear almost extravagant to any person, not sufficiently acquainted with the human mind to understand how the whole aspect of external objects will be controlled by the emotions which reign in the heart. W. concluded his narration in these words.

"And ever since that, master, this place, where I have been confined, has been to me more like a palace than a prison; every thing goes agreeable. I find I have a deceitful heart, but Jesus tells me, if I lack knowledge, he will always lend, if I cast my care on Jesus, and not forget to pray. It is my prayer morning and evening that I may hold out. If I die here, let me die, Lord, in thine arms. I have great reason to bless this institution, and every stone in it."

"Now, although it is not very common to obtain, in writing, accounts of changes of character among convicts, so full and minute as this, yet the cases themselves are common; so common, that where a prison is regulated in such a manner that the prisoners are not exposed to evil influence from each other, and the Bible has the opportunity to try its power, the whole aspect of the prison is changed."

To shew still further the power of religious instruction over the minds of even the worthless inmates of a prison, we may select from the same writer, an account of a SABBATH SCHOOL in the prison at Charlestown, Massachusetts.

"When we came up to the iron door in the front of the building, we found several gentlemen who had come over from Boston to act as teachers in the Sabbath school, waiting there for admission.

"When all the prisoners had gone into the chapel, the outer door was opened by a keeper, and we all passed in; the heavy door was swung to behind us, and its strong bolt secured. We turned from the entry into that end of the building which was used as a chapel. There was an aisle passing up the centre, on each side of which were seats half filled with the convicts. The chaplain stood in a pulpit at the further end, and on each side of him were the teachers, gentlemen from Boston, who had come to assist these unhappy men to read and to understand the word of God.

"The congregation presented a singular and striking appearance. Had it not been for their dress, I might have forgotten that I was in a prison. But they were all dressed in coarse clothes of two colours, one side of the body being red, and the other of some different hue. This is the uniform of crime. The object of it is, I suppose, not to mortify them with a perpetual badge of disgrace, but to expose any one who should by any means escape, to immediate detection by the inhabitants of the country around.

"Is it possible, thought I, as I looked over this most interesting assembly, that all these men have come voluntarily this morning to read and study the word of God? Yes, that was the fact. This exercise was entirely voluntary, and out of two or three hundred who had been condemned for crime, about one-half were accustomed to come voluntarily on Sabbath morning to study the book which proclaims from heaven free forgiveness of every sin.

"The chaplain opened the school with prayer. He then explained to the teachers, that the plan to be pursued was simply to hear the prisoners read the Bible, and explain its contents to them. He desired them to confine their conversation strictly to the business in hand, and requested the prisoners not to ask, and the teachers not to answer, any questions relating to other subjects. He then distributed the teachers around the room, giving each one a small class. Three convicts fell to my charge.

"I opened the New Testament, and let them read in rotation; and more apparently humble and docile students of the Bible I never saw. They read slowly and with hesitation, and I thought at first with a little embarrassment; this, however, soon passed away, and it was most interesting to watch the eager expression upon their countenances as the various truths, which were such glad tidings to them, came to view. We read the parables of the one sheep and the one piece of money, which was lost, Luke xv., and it seemed as if the whole chapter was written expressly for prisoners.

"One of these convicts, after expressing a strong interest in these parables, said that the Bible appeared like a very different book to him now from what it did in former times.

"How did it formerly appear to you? asked I.

"Oh, I used to despise it. I used to wonder why so much was made of the Bible. It seemed to me that I could write as good a book myself."

"Well, have your views of it changed now?"

"Oh, yes," said he, "I am fully persuaded it is the word of God now."

"What caused you to disbelieve it formerly? Was it the influence of bad company?"

"Why, sir, to be frank, it was ignorance. I had not studied it. I had read a little here and there, but not attentively, or with a right spirit."

"What led you to change your views of it?"

"I did not change my views until I came to this institution. I had some days of solitary confinement when I first came, with no book but the Bible; and when I first began to reflect, I recollected that a Christian family, whom I once lived with, seemed to enjoy more real and substantial happiness than any other persons I ever saw; and this led me to think there might possibly be something in religion. So I thought I would examine the Bible in earnest, and I found it a very different book from what I had supposed. I took a very strong interest in it, and at last a minister preached a sermon here from the text, 'What shall I do to inherit eternal life?' and that, I hope, led me to the Saviour. I hope and trust that I have really given my heart to God."

"I told him that what he said gave me great pleasure, and that I hoped he would persevere in Christian duty, and find the Bible a source of happiness to him as long as he should live.

"When I first came to this institution," he replied,

"I thought it was rather a hard-case to be shut up here so long. My time is, however, almost out. In a few weeks I shall go away, but if I have really been led to see and forsake my sins, I shall never have any reason to regret coming here."

"The chaplain about this time gave notice that it was time for the services to be closed, and I could not converse with my other scholars much. One of them told me, however, that he had been brought up by pious parents, and had read the Bible when he was a child; 'It was, however,' said he, 'only to please my parents. I gave no heed to it. I have found it, since I came to this institution, a very different book.'

"I afterwards learned that there was as much reason, as under the circumstances there could be, to hope that all three of these criminals had really repented of sin, and found peace with God, and that they would return to society to be useful and happy while they live, and admitted to heaven when they die.

"Such cases as these, too, are becoming very numerous in prisons where the convicts are separated from each other, and exposed to the influence of the word of God. Since this plan has been adopted, in this very prison the results have been most decisive. The number of prisoners, and especially of recommitments, is very much reduced; and the whole number of convicts, which was formerly 375, has been reduced, under the operation of this system, to 225, and is now constantly reducing."

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. DAVID STRONG,

One of the Ministers of Kilmarnock.

"But the path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. The way of the wicked is as darkness."—PROV. iv. 18, and first clause of 19th verse.

WE cannot help being struck, in the perusal of the Sacred Writings, with their happy adaptation to the faculties and understandings of the plainest men. Profound arguments can be followed and comprehended by very few; abstract and didactic statements become dry and uninteresting; but when the instruction which it is the purpose of a teacher to convey, is enclosed in a parable, illustrated by a comparison, or associated with some pleasing or familiar idea, the impression is instantly and pleasingly made upon that delightful faculty which marches as a discoverer in advance of the judgment—we mean the imagination. This plan accordingly prevails through a large proportion of the inspired volume; and our blessed Lord himself, who knew well what was in man, has sanctioned the method, by his own almost invariable practice. An instance of this mode of imparting the lessons of heavenly wisdom, occurs in the beautiful image made use of by the wise man in our text. What contemplation in the moral world more interesting than the steady, heavenward course of the righteous man? and what more glorious object could be selected in the natural creation, to suggest a vivid picture of this progress, than the advancing brilliancy of the morning's light? About the meaning of the expression, "the path of the just," we can entertain no doubt. Were there any unfallen men in this world, we should at once apply the description to them; but being aware, on the best authority, that there are none of such a character, we turn to those who are justified, and progressively sanctified, through a union with the Saviour, and we find it beautifully emblematical of their history. What a warmth of fresh and delightful feeling does it awaken in the mind, when we think of the early dawn, as its first streaks tinge the eastern horizon—then of the grey light deepening into the rosy glow that intimates the sun's approach—then of the full radiance of the blazing orb of day—then of his triumphant march up the steep ascent of heaven—and then of the full splendour of his beams as he attains the majesty of noon! If it is essential to a similitude that it should dignify the subject which it is used to elucidate, the light of heaven which the Creator commanded into being, is surely the most perfect image which we can conceive, to represent the light of spiritual life. The renewed man is found of God in a condition of moral darkness; but as the knowledge of saving truth gradually manifests itself in its regenerating power, his graces deepen in intensity, and increase in strength, till others see his good works, and till he is in some degree meet for the inheritance of the saints in light.

Sadly does the life of the unregenerate contrast with this bright career: for, "the way of the wicked is as darkness." Ignorant of the true light, without its guidance, devoid of its consolations, without experience, without hope, the cheerless bewildered soul must pass into the blackness of darkness for ever.

In addressing you for a little upon this topic, we shall endeavour to point out some of the marks of the Christian's progress towards the perfection of heaven; and then contrast this progress with "the way of the wicked."

The first mark which we shall specify of the Christian's progress towards heavenly perfection is, that his knowledge is gradually increasing. He can know no more, some may reply, than the truths which are stated in the Revealed Word; and what beyond these does he require to learn? We answer that he must advance in the knowledge of those objects with which he has already been made acquainted—in his perception of the loveliness of the divine character—in a subjective acquaintance with himself, with his own condition in consequence of sin, with his weaknesses and wants; and farther, in his perception of the full and perfect adaptation of the Gospel remedy to every symptom of his case. We allude to a very ancient distinction that has been noticed, between the increase of knowledge extensively, and its increase intensively; "which latter is equivalent to a profound and growing feeling;" and thus does a Christian come to discover, as has been pointedly remarked, that "he who gives himself up to all righteousness, is guided into all truth." It must be very evident, that the more a heaven-taught man devotes himself to serious meditation, sitting like a coroner upon a soul which is naturally dead, the more witnesses will present themselves to attest the real cause of its condition, namely, that it is a death in trespasses and sins. He will obtain clearer views of the subtle and disguised workings of corruption—he will be more thoroughly satisfied of the desperate alienation of the human heart from God—he will acquiesce more completely in that description of our helpless estate, which avers, that there is "in us no good thing," that "how to perform that which is good we find not," and that we are, in consequence, children and heirs of wrath. He will, accordingly, be conducted to a more profound view of the value and importance of that work which was finished at Calvary, to a more unreserved renunciation of every claim to divine favour, on the ground of his own good works, and to a more heartfelt conviction, that he must be justified by faith alone. He will discern more unequivocally as his experience advances, the necessity of that thorough change of heart which the Scriptures call "being renewed" and "born again," and in the accomplishment of which, the Holy Spirit is the agent. The Christian knowledge of these vital points goes on, we say, perpetually augmenting towards the brightness of that perfect day, when, every shadow of doubt and ignorance dispelled, his faith shall be turned into vision, and he shall see the Highest as face to face.

The second mark of the Christian's progress, which we shall specify, is that his humility is deepening. The unawakened transgressor goes on from day to day, thinking that he is doing no particular harm, and that if he has his faults, he must just try to get the better of them. But the knowledge of his unworthiness, which we lately spoke of, prostrates him who is enlightened, in the dust and ashes of self-abasement; while the inability experienced in bygone days, to do what heaven requires, creates an utter distrust of his own resolutions for the future. When our first parents were in a condition of innocence, the tempter got admission to their minds, and led them into a direful act of disobedience; and how much more is he to be dreaded by those to whose propensities evil is congenial? Noah, who had so wonderfully witnessed the power and consequences of moral degeneracy—Moses the meek, who had conversed with Jehovah—and Aaron, who witnessed his terrors and his goodness in the wilderness, yet fell into sin. So did David, the inspired singer of Israel, and Solomon, the wisest among men, and Judas, who was the treasurer amidst our Lord's disciples, and Peter, who was so eminent a pastor over the flock of the good Shepherd. When he who is wise unto salvation finds his own proneness to offend in accordance with the infirmities so signally manifested in the history of the Church, he says, how much more does it become me to put no confidence in the flesh, but to look up to Him who alone is able to keep me from falling! As the genius who has arrived at the highest proficiency in any art or science, finds it hardest to please himself with his own work, and sees best the inferiority of his attainments to the standard of perfection, so the saint who entertains the loftiest views of the holy character of God, will form the most lowly and shrinking estimate of his own strength and performances. His conscience becoming always more easily offended, his consciousness of offences will be more frequently awakened. The thought of his liability to do that which is so bad in its nature, and so horrible in its effects, will bring him often to sit at the foot of the cross in the sackcloth of humility, and will often cause the smile of celestial hope and confidence to beam through tears. There is an indescribable beauty that invests this grace of humility when beheld even by the eye of ordinary observation; and what a pearl of price must it appear to him who said, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of God."

It is a third mark of the Christian's progress, that his desire and alacrity to do the will of God are becoming more ardent. This is the result of all that he knows of the Sovereign of the Universe, since He delights in righteousness. This is the natural result of the unreserved admission of Gospel truth into the mind, since those who believe in God must be careful to maintain good works. There is none other way of proving that we are the subjects of the divine government. There is none other mode of shewing that we are truly walking in the path of the just, or righteous, than by abounding in the deeds of righteousness. The creed of Antinomians is a refuge of lies, and their practice is a demonstration that they are on the broad way that leadeth to destruction. The Bible tells us of the motives to action—it furnishes us with maxims and rules of conduct—it points out to each of us the duties of his sphere—it directs our contemplation to that spotless model, the High Priest of our profession—and it shews us that human virtue, though it "has nothing to do in furnishing us with a claim to the reward of heaven, yet in the character fitting us for it, is all in all." This information which we possess respecting the will of our Father who is above, is the spring and the directory of the Christian's behaviour. That the Lord hath commanded it, is his reason for obedience; that the Lord loveth the ways of uprightness, is enough to draw his steps into the paths of the upright. God can, unquestionably, look upon our hearts, though we were incapable of performing a single act in his service. Superior orders of intelligence may discern the sentiments of our bosoms, since there is joy in heaven over a sinner that repenteth; but from the expression used in the text, that the path of the just shineth more and more, we gather, that their fellow-men must be able to observe and to admire it. It is only the wicked that cometh not to the light, lest his deeds should be made known: Christians are to be epistles of Jesus, known of all men: they are, without ostentation, to let their light shine before men; and the blessedness is thus to be theirs, of leading many to righteousness. The best men require to be admonished to be far more decided in their profession than they are; for they are prone to be backward and reserved, and to place their candle under a bushel. What is there so little apt to be mistaken as the beams of day? Meteors that flash across the sky, and for a moment dazzle our sight, may perplex the traveller in the darkness of night; but as to the clear and progressive light of the sun there can be no misconception. There ought to be as little possibility of doubt about a good man's way, of what sort it is. He must be seen to leave iniquity behind him—to be regulated in his choice and his wishes by the will of his Saviour—to be eager to follow whithersoever the Spirit will guide him—to be a pattern to others, shaming the vicious, and stimulating the well disposed—to exhibit the character of Heaven in its purity and majesty, and to resemble that blessed worthy, whose short but glorious memorial was this, "that he pleased God." Christ, who left us such a pattern, was the true light which lighteth every man: and that light must each one reflect from his character and history, who shall melt away at last into the brightness of the perfect day.

It is a fourth mark of the Christian's progress, that his affection for the things of time is diminishing. Where the treasure is, there will the heart be also. As any body rises above the ground, up into the regions of space, that which philosophers call the attraction of gravitation affects it less and less; and if it could be elevated sufficiently, the earth would at length lose its power over it altogether, and it would be drawn away towards some other planet. This explains, in the way of illustration, the process which takes place with respect to the human soul. Through the operation of grace, its affections are progressively exalted towards Him who reigns above. It soars higher and higher on the wings of faith and love—the attractive power, which formerly chained it to the world, loses by degrees its influence—and when at length its sanctification is complete, it shall regard Him, who is its portion, as the chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely. It is a most unfavourable symptom of a man's religion, when he finds his heart strongly set on temporal gratifications, and greatly satisfied by them. Far be from us the thought of lightly esteeming the comforts given by a gracious Providence; but it behoves us to remember, that the things lent to us here are merely temporary means, preparatory to an everlasting end; and these things, unhappily, Satan converts into instruments, whereby to turn our affections, and effect our destruction.

There is a sort of sentimental poetry, which some people appear to mistake for the genuine exaltation of the spirit above a debasing devotedness to perishable pleasures: but such effusions are the mere expressions of disappointment, discontent, or a morbid, vain fancy—they are based upon no enlightened views of that which constitutes the real worthlessness of this world, and on no fixed and rational preference of those possessions which never grow stale. Many men, from the want of a cheerful submission to their Father's will, are dissatisfied with their present condition.

and, therefore, idly suppose that it would fare better with them in some distant region of dreamy repose. But such is not the estrangement from the delights of time which we enjoy. It, on the contrary, leads the Christian to receive life and its gifts, be these greater or smaller, with thankfulness, and to improve them with fidelity; and yet to regard his present existence as only a preparation for that approaching state in which he shall dwell with a sacred society in holiness and peace. While he tarries here, he enjoys divine protection and communion; but then, he is perpetually solicited by the temptations of sin—he is living in a place which his Saviour commanded him not to love, neither the things that are in it—he is but a stranger and a pilgrim—and his path must lead him completely away from any engrossing anxiety about objects which perish with the using.

The last mark which we shall notice of the Christian's progress is, that by his increasing love for God and his people, he evinces his progressive meetness for that heaven which is love. This sentiment of love is to form the motive of his conduct—it is to constitute the measure of his fitness for the upper sanctuary—and it is to be the grand element in the felicity of the saints. Persons who estimate the character of the Supreme solely from the visible events of his Providence, are apt to lay such stress upon the misfortunes and misery which they experience, that they entertain often very meagre views of his beneficence; and their unregenerate hearts regard him with much cold indifference, nay, indeed, with enmity. But he who sees all events arranged for the correction, purification, and perfecting of the just, cherishes far different feelings. He is sensible of the tenderness, the sympathy, and the grace, of which he is the constant object; and his strong impulse is to regard his pitying Benefactor with thankful affection. Surely, if his bosom is capable of throbbing with one emotion, he must love that Being who first loved him. Then he thinks of the friend who promised him the victory over all tribulation, and of that invisible, ever-working agent, who strengthens him for the else fatal combat with his worst enemies, and what sentiment can fill his mind but love? He contrasts an eternity of ir retrievable, unutterable misery, amid the endurance of wrath and the execrations of blasphemy, with the pure and seraphic ecstasy that shall reign for ever in the bright realms of bliss; and if unbounded goodness can be supposed to touch the soul, shall it not glow with love? If he thus regards his God, it is a proof that His spirit is working in him. If that spirit dwell within him, the same mind that was in Christ must be also in him, and, therefore, he must love his fellow-men, and particularly the brethren of the same faith. He meets these brethren in a strange country—the world, and he treats them with kindness. He sees the sharers of his own nature, wandering as prodigals far from comfort, and surrounded by enemies, and he uses the means within his reach for conducting them to a heavenly home. Is not this the Christian's character? Is it not what his Master enjoins? Is it not that to which his belief and his privileges naturally lead? Is it not that which we should expect of the man who is advancing in meetness for communion with the blest? Ah! brethren, there is no formality, no hypocrisy, no self-indulging indolence in a temper like this. Look at many who are denominated Christians, and it is a hard matter to decide wherein they are different from other men. Setting aside certain forms and professions to which they adhere, we observe no indication of that regard to their invisible head, which, in the nature of things, and from the plain demands of the written word, we should expect. Strong affection for any human creature uniformly appears in the frequency and the warmth with which we think of him—in the watchfulness we manifest for his interest—and in our desire to live in his society, and enjoy his intercourse. His friends, too, we respect, and feel ourselves bound, by a strong tie, to shew them all courtesy, and render them all good offices. But many within the visible church never furnish us with one palpable proof, by sentiments expressed or zeal displayed, that God lives in their hearts—never take pains to shew that they more desire the growth of Christianity than the reign of Paganism, never feel the slightest additional interest in a fellow-immortal on account of his being a fellow-believer, and a member of the flock of Him whom they call their Shepherd. These are not the dispositions that shall be crowned and cultivated in the Paradise above; for as thoughts and feelings can only be demonstrated by the things which are expressed and done, so these latter must bear witness to our possession of that true light which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. If we be members of that innumerable company of kindred spirits, who, with one heart, shall sing one song in heaven, the sympathy of mutual love must impart warmth to our character and intercourse on earth.

We shall now, in the second place, shortly contrast this progress with "the way of the wicked," which Solomon saith "is as darkness." How opposite are the destinies of those who share one common nature, and proceed from the same forming hand! One advances to glory, honour, and immortal happiness, while the other sinks into tribulation, and anguish, and the darkness of that night which knows no morrow. To compare, for an instant, spiritual with earthly things, their sadly opposite courses are like those of two brothers, alike in form, in mind, and in advantages, who start from the same goal to run the race of life; the one of whom, by a patient continuance in well-doing, attains the prize of fortune and of fame, while the other wastes his substance with riotous living, and ends his days in misery and infamy. Think on the different lives and fates of Cain and Abel, of Absalom and Solomon, of Judas and his brother apostles, of the ruined angels flung down to hell, and those who kept their first, their glorious estate. Such instances illustrate the contrast which we are called in the text to contemplate. The just and the wicked are originally the work of the same Creator, protected by the same Providence, enjoying a common nature, both intellectual and moral, reading perhaps the same Bible, and equally brought within the outward call of the Gospel. The one, with willingness and joy, receives the overtures of peace, and lays them up in his heart; but the other is deaf to the voice of the charmer, charm he ever so wisely. Here begins their visible difference, and here their tracks part, as they steer their hence opposite courses in quest of happiness. The one, by an unerring compass, is guided to the abodes of light and smiling plenty; but the other gropes his way to destruction, in the region of shades and perpetual desolation. The wicked walks without knowledge, he dies without hope. He is unacquainted with Him whom to know is life eternal, and his feet stumble upon the dark mountains. You see under what sort of moral government the people of this world are by nature. Whatever be their speculations as to the attributes of the Supreme, you observe, that the gods whom they obey are their own will, and their own irrepressible passions. Whatever be their abstract reasonings about justice and virtue, these fade as spectres of the brain before the forward claims of present interest. How to appease the divine displeasure, which they cannot help believing to be due to transgression; how to escape temptation, and the numberless enticements of what they cannot but know to be evil—these are perplexing inquiries which they may evade but cannot answer. They are strangers to the covenant of promise, and, therefore, their way is as darkness. These things, however, are only the beginning of sorrows; for a mistaken cheerless life is but the precursor of a hopeless death. Brethren, to live without God and Christ and hope in the world, whether we be speculative, or whether we be practical infidels, is sufficiently sorrowful; but an unprovided eternity, a leap in the dark, an instantaneous transition from the stout-hearted pride, the reckless unconcern, or the feverish excitement of a distempered soul, to the tremendous majesty of the judgment seat of the Eternal, is an idea that may well madden the brain that is not past feeling. Then think of what succeeds, when eternal justice executes its fixed decree against those who held its threatenings at defiance. We would rather use the language of persuasion than of terror, but the whole counsel of God must be declared without reserve. What is prosperity or wealth to the wicked? It is the fountain of temptation to unbridled folly, vanity, and sensuality in early life; and to avarice and covetousness which bind the soul to earth in advanced age. What to them are rank and temporal consideration? They are heights from which the mind looks down in gloomy despondency to the helplessness of the last conflict and the humiliation of the tomb. How do they regard poverty and misfortune? As sufferings which cannot be repaired, and therefore the causes of discontent, envy, and perhaps despair. What are the effects when the world finds them in obscurity, and treats them with neglect? They are prone to peevishness and misanthropy, and by the recklessness of their conduct, at length to merit that contempt with which they have been regarded. In every position of the affairs of the wicked, the outward objects to which they cling disappoint them. When they retire into the recesses of their own bosoms, the counsellor that sits there upbraids them. The rapid progress of life's journey, when they consider it, appals them. And when these congregated evils gather round the departing soul, like the unwholesome and impenetrable mist, settling down at the close of the short winter's day—when the affrighted soul espies no star of peace beyond the grave—shall we doubt that their way is as darkness? Unless the Saviour's grace be granted to them even in the last hour, what is their decease but the removal of a curtain which conceals a state, wherein he that is filthy shall be filthy still, and he that is in darkness shall abide in darkness still? The path of the just leadeth for ever upwards in the light of knowledge, purity, and joy; but the heart of the wicked shall sink through eternity into deeper and still deeper degrees of estrangement from God, moral pollution, and tribulation which cannot be comforted.

A PICTURE OF CHINA IN ITS RELIGIOUS AND MORAL ASPECT.

"The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty."

BY THE REV. ANDREW BONAR.

It is a doctrine of Scripture, that nothing but the full knowledge of God can call into exercise our whole moral being. Some of the principles of our nature will infallibly remain unmoved, if the great and mighty principles of love to the true and fully revealed God do not send forth its energy on the soul. Hence, "without God in the world," is one of the melancholy epithets applied to unconverted men, as if to intimate, that being thus without God, they had utterly wandered from the sphere of true intelligence and nobility. Now, this being the case, we need not wonder that Scripture also maintains, that wherever there is ignorance of God and the Redeemer, there the soul is open to the inroads of malignity. In other words, the fallen man, being unreclaimed by any influence from Heaven, is exposed to perversions of every sort; not least—though the fact be little noticed—to cruelty. A Christian philosopher can easily trace the cause of this, knowing at once the devil's malignant ambition to cast at least some features of his own dark image over his own children, and also the natural inclination of depraved beings to strange and fanatic deeds.

But it is a statement of facts that we would here adduce to prove this truth. We take a case, which is considered in general as an exemption to our remark; but which, along with all others yet examined, is a literal fulfilment of the Psalmist's words—"The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty."

China is generally considered as no way remarkable for vice. But this is altogether a misconception. It is a land thoroughly immersed in religious darkness, and pervaded by superstitious cruelties. And think of such a scene, as four hundred millions of people, exposed at present, as they have been for thousands of years, to such horrid influence! It may well stir up any heart to utter the prayer, "Have respect unto the covenant!" Our authority for the following facts is the missionary Gutzlaff, in a late narrative of his voyages; and vivid though they be, the discoveries which he has made of the Chinese character are nothing but specimens, gathered on the shore, of an immense and unfathomable gulf of pollution and misery.

The religion and mythology of the Chinese is a dark and cheerless system, blending, with anomalous incongruity, atheism and the lowest kinds of polytheism. Their creed presents no proper object of reverence, hope, confidence, or love; affords no balm for the troubles of the mind, no support under the ills of life, no hope for the future; their highest prospect is annihilation, or a change by transmigration to the body of some other being in creation. Their good traits are all virtues of public opinion, and hence, though no doubt sincere in many cases, yet in most they are rather show than reality. Conscience has few checks but the laws of the land. They are selfish, cold-blooded, and inhuman. In the punishment of criminals, in the infliction of tortures, they are barbarously cruel: human suffering or human life is but rarely regarded by those in authority, when the infliction of the one, or the destruction of the other, can be made subservient to the acquisition of wealth or power.

The need in which China stands of the change which the Gospel only can effect, is clearly evident, when, in addition to the oppression and violence under which the nation groans, the fraud and lying practised by system, the bribery and injustice which fills her courts, the deception that characterises all her dealings, is considered the complicated system of false religion, presenting scarcely any thing but darkness, confusion, and absurdity; with the multitude of her idols, which, according to the expression of one of her sects, are as numerous as the sands of the Hang river. Vice exists in all its diversified forms, and crimes of the most debasing character are perpetrated with a frequency, unequalled, perhaps, in any other part of the world. The tender sympathies of the heart are counteracted or destroyed by familiarity with cruelty and selfishness. The female sex, as in every other heathen country, is subjected to the most humiliating degradation, considered as being no better than an inferior order of creation. Hence, infanticide is perpetrated among them, to a degree almost beyond belief. It is, according to one writer, tacitly considered a part of the duty of the police of Pekin, to employ certain persons to go their rounds, at an early hour in the morning, with carts, in order to pick up the bodies of such infants as may have been thrown out into the streets during the course of the night. No enquiries are made: the bodies are carried to a common pit, without the city walls, into which those that are living, as well as those that are dead, are said to be thrown promiscuously. Dogs and swine are let loose into the streets, at an early hour, before the police carts go their round, and hence the scenes that may arise may be conjectured. Some calculate 9000 infants thus exposed in the capital alone, every year; or about 24 every day. Those who reside on the river, throw their female infants into the river, with a gourd tied round their necks. And this unnatural crime is so common among them, that it is perpetrated without any feeling, and even in a laughing mood. Such is a specimen of the Chinese cruelty, the offspring of darkness. And the depth of this darkness is such, as to degrade them as intelligent beings, and subject them to the overflowing of vice and immorality. Mr Gutzlaff relates one scene that illustrates this; but so shocking as to baffle all description. And yet no wonder that such deeds appeared, when we read of their gods,—works of men's hands, that could inspire no awe and command no virtue. For on approaching to the shore, near Pekin, he saw written on a shop, in large characters, "Idols and Budhas, of all descriptions, neatly made and repaired." Intellect, we see, is prostrate, and every moral principle out of course.

What a tremendous thought, that for centuries upon centuries, such a state of things has gone on in incessant flow! What patient, long-suffering in God! What forbearance towards man, although millions of men have every day insulted and disowned him. And O! then, what disclosures and terrors are ready against the judgment-day! And even now, too, how earnest, how deep, how intense, must be the ever-ascending groans of creation, so cursed by sinful man! and waiting for the redemption of the sons of God!

DEATH-BED SCENES.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER MOODY.

As men live, so do men die.—We remember having heard a shrewd observer of mankind remark, that the views which he had previously formed of human nature, were forcibly overturned by the following incident:—He was following a band of reapers in the field, and overheard their conversation. One of them, who herself made a zealous, but most inconsistent profession of religion, was sister to a woman who had just been sentenced to death for a daring murder. The approaching execution formed the topic of discussion; and the individual from whom, most of all, silence might have been expected on such a subject, was kindly entertaining her companions with a minute and detailed account of the part which the criminal was preparing to act at the closing scene—that after death the world might adjudge her innocent! This was human nature displaying itself under extraordinary circumstances, yet not in any extraordinary manner, but just as we see it developed every day. It has been said that men may live hypocrites, but that hypocrites they cannot die. The remark may be true to a certain extent, but we are deceived if it hold good universally, or even generally. In by far the greater number of cases men are found to die very much the same as they have lived. And if a man have wickedness enough to practise hypocrisy during life, he will easily find hardihood enough to persist in that hypocrisy in death.

Many have no opportunity of seeing death but in the departure of their own relatives and friends, when it is to be expected, and almost to be desired, that the judgment should be biased, if not blinded, by the affections; and that the feelings wrought in the hearts of the living should prevent any accurate and impartial observation of the feelings that are at work in the dying. In other instances, the observer, if a stranger, and therefore unbiassed, may be without the means of bringing the past life into comparison with the scene before him; or again, the sufferer may belong to those classes of society in which the feelings, if not disguised, are however habitually concealed from the knowledge of others. Having had occasion to witness various scenes of death, under circumstances which presented none of these impediments to observation, we have thought it might prove beneficial to narrate a few cases out of many, not with the idea of presenting any other view of the subject than must have been suggested to any other observer, but for the sake of furnishing those who may not have enjoyed a similar opportunity with materials, by which they may be assisted in forming their judgment on this the most solemn of all sublunary scenes.

In illustration of the remark, that men usually die as they have lived, we have referred to an instance of hypocrisy in a situation peculiarly awful; and we go on to record other cases explanatory of the same truth, in reference to various other features of character. Before proceeding, however, we shall illustrate the observation in a different light; for while men, for the most part, die in the same habits of thought which they have previously cherished, it is likewise seen that the outward manner of their death often bears a striking correspondence to the manner of their lives.

We knew an Antinomian. He was a man of considerable acuteness of mind; subtle, speculative, metaphysical; and considering his station in life, might be reckoned a man of reading and information. Next to the Bible, his right hand book, was Cudworth's Intellectual System; and the ancient systems of Heathen philosophy and divinity were favourite topics of discourse. When reminded of the comparative uselessness of such inquiries, and of the vital importance of fixing the eye steadily on the true light which now shineth, he would reply:—"That may be very true, but for my part I like to look at THEM." He seemed, however, to dwell on Pagan ignorance chiefly for the sake of triumphing in the clearer knowledge now enjoyed; for the Scriptures were his principal study, and he appeared to be both fully persuaded of their truth as a divine revelation, and to be thoroughly conversant with their contents. Of a winter evening, we have lifted the latch of his cottage door, when he could have no expectation of any one calling, and have found him poring over his large family Bible, which he would read for hours together. We took the Bible as it lay open, and made some practical remarks on what he had been reading; but of these he was evidently very impatient, and was uneasy till he found opportunity for turning aside to "foolish questions" and "perverse disputings." In principle and in practice, he was out and out Antinomian. One virtue, indeed, he might be allowed to possess. In a situation of some responsibility, and where there was ample opportunity for fraud, he was acknowledged by persons of conflicting interests to be not merely honest, but scrupulously faithful and just. Why he was so, it is hard to say—probably, because he regarded integrity as convenient and useful in human society; for it formed no article of his creed, "that they who have believed in God, should be careful to maintain good works." The Christian he accounted free from every moral obligation; and acting agreeably to his faith, he systematically desecrated the Sabbath, never entering any place of worship; "his mouth was full of cursing and bitterness," oaths constantly on his tongue, to which were added curses, in his frequent fits of passion; and he was besides an habitual drunkard. For those sins he felt no sorrow, he professed none, but made them subject of impious boasting. "I am the chief of sinners," he would say, "but what matters it? Christ died for sinners, he died for me, and why should I be afraid of death."—"Would you not dread," we have asked him, "to die in a state of intoxication?"—"Why should I? Noah was a drunkard, David a murderer, Peter a liar. I know that my Redeemer liveth, and I shall be happy to die at any time. I should gladly die in a fit of drunkenness." Poor man, he was taken at his word. He had occasion to go from home for a day or two on business. On parting, he told his wife, that he had been making up his account with God, and had in prayer been committing himself and his family to the care of his Creator, and that if it pleased providence that he should never see them more, he was ready to depart. He saw them no more. Not having returned at the time appointed, considerable anxiety began to be felt throughout the village, and the more so, as he was to bring with him a large sum of money. Men were sent out in every direction in search of him, and his horse having been found without the rider, serious apprehensions were entertained that he had been murdered. It was soon ascertained, however, that the Banking-house had refused to grant his demand, on account of his being in such a state of intoxication, that it was thought unsafe to trust him with it. He had accordingly set out without it on his journey homeward; but the way he had taken was most unfit for a drunken man, lying as it did through sands which were flooded by the sea at every tide. Well acquainted though he was with the road, he had wandered, had fallen from his horse, and was found dead on the sands. He was not drowned, for it happened that the tide was a low one, and had not covered the place where he lay; but he died a more lingering and miserable death, by cold and fatigue; or, in the emphatic language of the men who carried home his corpse, "he perished." Death found him in that very state in which he had so impiously boasted that he would cheerfully encounter his terrors. How awfully significant in such a case, was the judgment pronounced by an earthly tribunal.—Died by the visitation of God.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Christian Lukewarmness.—Why is our knowledge of divine truth so often, at best, but as the moonlight of a frosty night—clear, but cold, very cold; instead of resembling the cheering, warming, gladdening, as well as brightening radiance of the summer sun? Why does our professed love to the Saviour produce so little self-denial or sacrifice for His sake, so little devotedness to His service; and yet still less conformity to His example? Why have we so little, if any thing, of the mind and temper that was in Christ Jesus? Why do we search the Scriptures, and attend all the ordinances of divine grace, and run from lecture to lecture, and sermon to sermon, with so little profit—so little visible growth in grace, or progress in holiness? Why, in a word, is there so little of separation from the spirit, as well as the society of the world; so little of the life of God in our souls, or the love of God in our hearts, or the peace of God in our bosoms, or the image of God in our lives?

To all this I answer—chiefly because we are so little in prayer—cordial, humble, fervent, persevering prayer. Because we talk so much about God in public, but so little with God in private; because we are so much more every where, than in our closets; and in every exercise, than in devotion; and in every attitude, than on our knees; and thus, the blessing of the Holy Spirit, not being abundantly vouchsafed, because not fervently implored, a withering blight comes over all our doings, and we read, and hear, and talk, and labour, so almost, if not altogether, in vain.—REV. H. WHITE.

Christian Love.—If the sun shines on a dull brick or stone, they reflect none of its beams, there is nothing in them capable of this; nor is there, in an ungodly man, any natural power of reflecting the light of God. But let the sun shine upon a diamond, and see what rays of sparkling beauty it emits. Just so the Christian who has the graces of the Spirit; when God shines on his soul, beams of celestial loveliness are reflected by him on the world. The Christian's character should savour of holiness. The promise is, "I will be as the dew unto Israel;" and how sweet is the fragrance of the flower after the gentle falling of the dew—so must the true believer be under the soft distilment of the droppings of heaven on his heart. Cultivate a spirit of love. Love is the diamond amongst the jewels of the believer's breastplate. The other graces shine like the precious stones of nature, with their own peculiar lustre and various hues, but the diamond is white; now in white all the colours are united, so in love is centered every other Christian grace and virtue—"love is the fulfilling of the law."—REV. R. HILL.

Joseph, a Type of Christ.—Jesus Christ, prefigured by Joseph, the beloved of his Father, sent by his Father to see his brethren, is the innocent blood sold by his brethren for twenty pieces of silver; thus he became their Lord, their Saviour, and the Saviour of strangers, and the Saviour of the world; which he could not have been without their design of destroying him, without their sale and their rejection of him. In the prison, Joseph innocent between two criminals; Jesus on the Cross between two thieves. Joseph predicted the safety of the one and the death of the other from the same appearances; Jesus Christ saves the one and leaves the other after the same crimes. Joseph only foretold, Jesus did. Joseph asked of him who should be restored, that he would think of him when he should arrive at his honours; he whom Jesus saved, asked, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom."—PASCAL.

This salvation of the house of Israel by the hand of Joseph, was upon some accounts very much a resemblance of the salvation of Christ. The children of Israel were saved, by Joseph their kinsman and brother, from perishing by famine, as he that saves the souls of the spiritual Israel from spiritual famine is their near kinsman, and one that is not ashamed to call them brethren. Joseph was a brother that they had hated and sold, and as it were killed, for they had designed to kill him. So Christ is one that we naturally hate, and, by our wicked lives, have sold for the vain things of the world, and that by our sins we have slain. Joseph was first in a state of humiliation; he was a servant, as Christ appeared in the form of a servant; and then was cast into a dungeon; he was in a state of great exaltation, at the king's right hand as his deputy, to reign over all his kingdom, to provide food, to preserve life; and being in this state of exaltation, he dispenses food to his brethren, and so gives them life, as Christ was exalted at God's right hand to be a Prince and Saviour to his brethren, and received gifts for man, even for the rebellious, and them that hated and had sold him.—JONATHAN EDWARDS.

[The two preceding extracts exhibit a remarkable coincidence of thought between two eminent writers.—Ed.]

Ingratitude shown in rejecting Christ.—There is a nearness to God which we are not only allowed, but called to in the loving dispensation of the Gospel, so that now we are not to be strangers any longer, but friends; we are to have fellowship and communion with God. Why do not our hearts even leap for joy? why do not our souls triumph in these discoveries of love? Even because we know not the greatness of our privileges, the highness of our calling, the excellency of our advancement, the blessedness of this life, the sweetness of these employments, the satisfaction of these enjoyments, the comfort of this heavenly life, the delights of this communion with God. We know not the things which belong to our peace: and thus, when God calls us to that which he sent his Son for; when Christ offers us that which cost him so dearly: we, with the greatest unworthiness, vilest ingratitude, refuse, slight, and contemn it, what think we? Doth it not go even to the heart of Christ, and to speak after the manner of men, doth it not grieve him to the soul, to behold his greatest love scorned, and the end of his agony to be more vilely accounted of than the basest of our lusts?

Let us therefore, according to that high calling wherewith we are called, enter into an intimate acquaintance with God; and as we find our souls acting naturally towards those things which are naturally dear to us, so let us strive to lighten our spiritual affections.—JANEWAY.

Value of the Gospel.—About six months ago, I was attacked by a violent fever, and in my own apprehensions, for about two days was on the borders of eternity. I never before felt my mind so calm and happy. Filled with the most overwhelming sense of my own unworthiness, my mind was supported merely by a faith in Christ crucified. I would not for the world have parted with that text, "The blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin." I never before saw such a beauty and grandeur in the way of salvation by the death of Christ, as on that occasion. I am fully persuaded the evangelical doctrines alone are able to support the mind in the near views of death and judgment.—ROBERT HALL.

Prayer, the Fountain of every Benefit.—Prayer is the fountain of grace, the parent of every virtue, the enlightener of the mind, the consolation of the sad, the joy of the happy, the food of the soul, the source and safeguard of every benefit. Prayer averts the wrath of God, obtains the pardon of sin, conquers our vices, delivers us from danger, and inflames us with the love of God. In it all the virtues are exercised. Faith stands foremost, for no one would pray, did he not believe that God is present to hear him, and that he not only can, but will grant the things requested, if they be not asked amiss. Hope is raised up, for we have confidence in the help and mercy of God. Love is excited, by the consideration of the divine goodness, which urges us to love God above all things. By it we learn to fulfil all righteousness, and to weigh all things with the wisdom of the just. Fortitude is exercised, for he who prays has resolved to serve God, and to endure all opposition for the love of Him. Temperance is begotten, for he who prays tastes the delicacies of heaven, and has his affections weaned from earthly and corporeal enjoyments. The gifts of the Holy Spirit will also lead him to put forth all his strength, for by prayer his mind is enlightened respecting eternal things, he enjoys the wisdom of God, and approaching God himself, creature knowledge becomes vain in his esteem; and whilst the clear light diffused throughout his soul, leads him to put forth all his strength to obtain the things that profit most, he is not less in the dark as to the best and most effective way of putting forth his strength, for it is written, "if any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth liberally." Human friendship receives a new impulse whilst we pray for others. The sense of the divine Majesty, conceived by him who lives a life of prayer, so fills him with the fear of God, that the fear of man is rooted out. Thus, he who is much upon his knees in prayer, is clothed with many resplendent virtues.—BONA.

Preparation for Death.—When you lie down at night, compose your spirits as if you were not to awake till the heavens be no more. And when you awake in the morning, consider that new day as your last, and live accordingly. Surely that night cometh, of which you will never see the morning, or that morning of which you will never see the night; but which of your mornings or nights will be such, you know not.

Let the mantle of worldly enjoyments hang loose about you, that it may be easily dropt, when death comes to carry you into another world. When the corn is forsaking the ground, it is ready for the sickle; when the fruit is ripe, it falls off the tree easily: So, when a Christian's heart is truly weaned from the world, he is prepared for death, and it will be the more easy to him. A heart disengaged from the world is a heavenly one, and then we are ready for heaven when our heart is there before us.—BOSTON.

Affliction.—The refiner of silver requires patient and long waiting to make the silver fine, and to bring it to its highest point of perfection. In the operation, he not only places his crucible on the fire, but heaps fire around and upon it. Under this process, it at first throws out a dark and offensive smoke, which as the heat and its effects increase, becomes less offensive until it altogether ceases: and the silver becomes transparent, and beautifully white; and the point of requisite perfection and purity is when the refiner sees his own likeness reflected in the pot. It would be idle to point out how admirably this account of the process of refining silver, illustrates the gracious process by which, through means of affliction, our heavenly Father carries on the work of purification in the heart of his children.—Anonymous.

SACRED POETRY.

ECHO.

I stood on the banks of a swift-flowing river,
While I marked its clear current roll speedily past,
It seemed to my fancy for ever repeating
That the dearest enjoyments of life would not last.
Oh! tell me, I said, rapid stream of the valley,
That bear'st in thy course the blue waters away,
Can the joys of life's morning awake but to vanish,
Can the feelings of love be all doom'd to decay?
An Echo repeated—"All doomed to decay."

Flow on in thy course, rapid stream of the valley,
Since the pleasures of life we so quickly resign,
My heart shall rejoice in the wild scenes of nature,
And friendship's delights while they yet may be mine.
Must all the sweet charms of mortality perish,
And friendship's endearments—Ah! will they not stay?

The simple enchantments of soft blooming nature,
And the pleasures of mind—must they too fade away?
The Echo slow answered—"They too fade away."

Then where, I exclaimed, is there hope for the mourner,
A balm for his sorrow, a smile for his grief?
If beautiful scenes like the present shall vanish,
Where—where shall we seek for a certain relief?
Oh! fly, said my soul, to the feet of thy Saviour,
Believe in his mercy, for pardon now pray,
With him there is fulness of joy and salvation,
Thy gladness shall live, and shall never decay:
The Echo said sweetly—"Shall never decay."

יהוה צדקנו

JEHOVAH TSIDKĒNU.

"The Lord our Righteousness."—The Watchword of the Reformers.

I ONCE was a stranger
To grace and to God,
I knew not my danger,
And felt not my load.
Though friends spoke in rapture
Of Christ on the tree, Jehovah Tsidkĕnu was Nothing to me.

I oft read with pleasure,
To soothe or engage,
Isaiah's wild measure,
And John's simple page;
But ev'n where they pictured
The blood-sprinkled tree, Jehovah Tsidkĕnu seemed
Nothing to me.

Like tears from the daughters
Of Zion that roll,
I wept when the waters
Went over his soul;
Yet thought not that my sins
Had nailed to the tree
Jehovah Tsidkĕnu—'twas
Nothing to me.

But when free grace awoke me
By light from on high,
Then legal fears shook me,
I trembled to die;
No refuge, no safety,
In self could I see—Jehovah Tsidkĕnu my Saviour must be.

My terrors all vanished
Before the sweet name;
My guilty fears banished,
With boldness I came
To drink at the fountain
So copious and free,— Jehovah Tsidkĕnu is
All things to me.
Jehovah Tsidkĕnu, my
Treasure and boast,
Jehovah Tsidkĕnu, I
Ne'er can be lost.
In Thee I shall conquer,
By food and by field,
My cable, my anchor,
My breastplate and shield!
Even treading the valley,
The shadow of death,
This "Watchword" shall rally
My faltering breath;
For while from life's fever
My God sets me free,
Jehovah Tsidkĕnu my
Death song shall be.

Collins the Poet.—Collins is well known as a celebrated English poet. In the latter part of his life, he withdrew from his general studies, and travelled with no other book than an English New Testament, such as children carry to school. When a friend took it into his head to see what companion a man of letters had chosen, the poet said, "I have only one book, but that book is the best."

True Independence.—When Mr Campbell went upon his first mission to Africa, the Bible Society sent along with him a number of Bibles, to be distributed to a Highland regiment, stationed at the Cape of Good Hope. Arrived there, the regiment was drawn out, in order to receive the Bibles. Mr C. and the box which contained them were placed in the centre, and on his presenting the first Bible to one of the men, he took out of his pocket four shillings and sixpence for the Bible, saying, "I enlisted to serve my king and country, and I have been well and amply paid, and will not accept of a Bible as a present, when I can pay for it."

Beza.—It is related of Beza, one of the Reformers, that when he was old, and could not recollect the names of persons and things he had heard but a few minutes before, he could remember and repeat the epistles of St Paul, which he had committed to memory when he was young.

THE VALUE OF THE SABBATH.

BY THE REV. ARCHIBALD BENNIE,

Minister of Lady Yester's Parish, Edinburgh.

WE may illustrate the value of the Sabbath, by considering it, first, as a day of rest; and secondly, as a day of religious duty and privilege.

I. That occasional intervals of repose are necessary for the healthy and vigorous action both of the mind and the body, is felt by the most unthinking. We cannot continue long at any process of labour without pausing to recruit; and it has generally been observed, that when any one has attempted to dispense with repose for a considerable period of time, the unnatural attempt has issued either in premature decay, or in some violent shock to the system, which has unfitted him for further exertion. The regular return of night, though a most wise provision in the divine economy, does not altogether meet our need of rest. It repairs the exhaustion of the preceding day, and refreshes for the toils of that which follows. But, besides that night, as a season of rest, is often abridged by our carrying the labours of day into it, there seems to be a necessity for occasional pauses, over against which no labour is to be set,—during which, the constitution, like the soil, may lie fallow, and both mind and body, freed from all labour and restraint, may be invigorated for that alternation of toil and rest, which makes up the ordinary day of life. The mind, it is true, is capable of much longer, and more intense labour than the body, and does not stand so much in need of relaxation and relief; but even it, though the better, the far nobler part, may be overstretched; and though scarcely ever totally inactive, nor is it desirable that it should be so, it requires a cessation from its ordinary pursuits, a variety in its exercises and engagements, in order that it may maintain its vivacity and vigour unimpaired. Now, the Sabbath, as a day of rest, completely answers this end. It is a pause in the rapid flow of life. It is an interval of withdrawal from its business and cares. It is an interruption to the bustle and hurry, by which both body and mind are often worn out, and utterly enfeebled. Even when there is no real religion, it causes a man to stand still from want of scope for worldly transactions, and inability to obtain the co-operation of others, which, on the Sabbath, is not to be commanded. The mind, it is true, will be active on that day as well as on others, but it will not be active according to task. Its activity is voluntary, unforced, and, if we may so speak, non-exhausting. There is something in the very repose of the Sabbath, which has a refreshing effect upon the mind. The city is at rest. The plough lies motionless in the field. If a man goes abroad, he sees not the stir and crowd of other days. He feels that there is a respite from the ordinary law and tax of humanity. Even the brute-beast is spared. Though all the great processes of nature are going on, yet such is the effect of association, that the very aspect of the scenery around us seems to partake of the stillness which rests upon the works and the ways of man. The poet of the Sabbath has very beautifully expressed this:—

“ How still the morning of the hallowed day!
Sounds the most faint attract the ear,—the hum
Of early bee, the trickling of the dew,
The distant bleating mid-way up the hill.
To him who wanders o'er the upland leas,
The blackbird's note comes mellow from the dale;
And sweeter from the sky the glad some lark
Warbles with heaven-tuned song; the lulling brook
Murmurs more gently down the deep-worn glen.”

Nor is it to be overlooked, that there seems to be a peculiar felicity in the appointment of each seventh day to be a day of rest. Habit, no doubt, has a great influence on our feelings with respect to this. But there is a general feeling that a longer term of business and toil than six days, would be oppressive, and that a shorter would be a hurtful interruption to the necessary avocations and pursuits of life. Even men who are not in the least alive to the religious sanction and design of the Sabbath, appear to be willing to admit this view of it. For though some, in their idolatrous pursuit of wealth and other objects, often break in on the rest of the Sabbath, and, in practice, literally blot it out of many weeks in the year, yet even these persons are conscious, sooner or later, that they have bent the bow too far; while all who reflect calmly and comprehensively on our nature and condition, will be ready to allow, that as interrupting the drudgery and care of life, which, in many cases, are little better than a grinding at the mill, the Sabbath justly claims to be considered as a most wise and beneficent institution. In those countries in which it has been unknown, men, under the conviction that occasional rest is indispensable, have felt the necessity of holidays and festivals to break the tedium and the monotony of life. These, however, have afforded a poor substitute for the Sabbath, both because they have been rare, and because, partly owing to their rareness, they have been too often marked by an intemperance and excess, which, in a great measure, have counteracted their beneficial effects. If a sagacious statesman or monarch were to propose to himself the question, What institution of a general kind is best adapted to promote the health, the bodily activity and comfort, and the mental vigour and enjoyment of a people? he could think of none so simple, so wise, and so efficient, as the institution of the Sabbath. He could not issue a more admirable proclamation, than that each seventh day should be a day of rest;—a day, on which the hand of the mechanic should cease from its labour, and the foot of the pilgrim pause in its travels;—a day, on which the silence of repose should come down on city and plain, the business of life be suspended, and its cares forgotten.

II. The Sabbath is a day of religious duty and privilege. This is its grand distinguishing characteristic, to which the rest of the body is designed to be subservient. For though rest in itself is salutary, yet the rest of mere idleness, particularly as respects the mind, would be attended with pernicious effects. The body is respited from toil, and the mind from its ordinary pursuits, that duties of the most sublime spirituality may be engaged in. These duties give to the Sabbath its peculiar sanctity. It is a day set apart for religious meditation and devotional exercises. During the other days of the week, religion may be said to hold a divided empire. It is but one element, even when it is supreme, and all-pervading; and though its influence should be powerfully felt, the mind is necessarily occupied with a variety of interests and cares, which exhaust its energy and consume time. But the Sabbath-day is designed to exclude other things, that religion may have the whole field of thought to itself,—that it may be considered in its vastness and glory without distraction,—and that by calm meditation upon its truths, and the exercise of the affections in devotion, whatever injury, in point of clearness or influence, it may have sustained during the week, may be repaired, and a fresh impulse given to our diligence and zeal in the performance of its duties. This is what is implied in keeping the Sabbath holy, the language of the Fourth Commandment. For mere rest is not holiness,—pastime or amusement is not holiness; and hence they who would interpret that commandment as only implying these, do most entirely mistake its import and design. To keep it holy, is undoubtedly to spend it in religious duty. It is the “day which God has made.” He made it for man,—to meet the great and urgent wants of his nature and condition; and it only answers its high end, when it helps him on in his preparation for eternity,—in that work of salvation, which, under grace, is his highest employment on earth.

The worship of God, both in public and in private, forms the most prominent duty of the Sabbath. It is the only day, indeed, on which public worship can be conveniently and efficiently performed. Private worship belongs to every day; but public worship requires men to assemble in considerable numbers, and for a considerable period of time; and hence, it is peculiarly appropriate to a day on which the ordinary employments and cares of life are laid aside. This great branch of duty invests the Sabbath, to the sincere Christian, with a deep and holy charm. In one sense, that day has a value to the impenitent, though they are insensible to it. As a divine institution, it is an appeal to a lost world, on the subject of their highest interests. Its very solemnity comes upon mankind like a voice of power. Its peacefulness, the cessation of toil, and bustle, and merchandise, has something religious in it. Besides, the Sabbath places the means of grace within the reach of the careless and profane. The sanctuary is open; the devout are seen hastening from their homes, in decent attire, that they may join in worship; the Word is publicly preached, and sinners are invited to partake of salvation. But the true value of the Sabbath belongs to the believer. Conceive a man, pursuing salvation with intense earnestness,—deeply alive to spiritual excellence,—realising things unseen and eternal—and feeling from day to day the common concerns and engagements of life to be comparatively sordid, as well as to be accompanied with much to grieve, annoy, and hinder the soul in its upward progress—its aspirations after purity, peace, and love:—Conceive the value of the Sabbath to such a man. He welcomes it as a refuge from distraction and care. It is as a haven after a storm. Its quiet comes down like sunshine upon his soul. It invites him to duties the most delightful and reviving. It brings him into the full presence of the God whom he loves, and the Saviour in whom he trusts—with no cloud or shadow intervening to impair his joy. It banishes all that is low, frivolous, and earthly. It calls him to the house of Prayer,—the scene of his dearest associations, his most exalted pleasures, and his holiest desires. It spreads out before him the richly furnished table of divine provision, and supplies the food by which he is to be nourished and refreshed. It lifts him to a noble elevation above the world and its cares. When fully enjoyed, it is heaven upon earth. “One day in thy courts is better than a thousand.”

Private worship, we have said, belongs to every day. But the Sabbath affords peculiar advantages for observing it, both in the family and the closet. There is not only more time, more freedom from all disquietude and interruption, but public duty comes in aid of private, and attunes the mind to it. The train of pious thought being longer continued, the mind has time to kindle into a glow upon it, as well as to avail itself of those helps to devotion, which reading and meditation supply. Family worship is observed with more interest and solemnity than on other days. The members of the domestic circle can then be all assembled. Worship comes not like an intrusion on what is secular. There is no violent transition to it. It flows naturally and easily from the design of the Sabbath. It is closely allied to its public duties. The Bible, in one sense the book of every day, is emphatically the book of the Sabbath. Family worship, too, beautifully crowns the lessons of parental advice, and the work of parental instruction. When the father has been imparting counsel, warning against temptation, and encouraging to piety and virtue, it is a most appropriate close to his task to worship God. There is not a more delightful spectacle, than is exhibited when a Christian father sits on a Sabbath evening in the midst of his children, explaining the wisdom of the precious Word; or kneels with the young worshippers around him in fervent reverential prayer. Such domestic scenes are the proper and hopeful nurseries of the Church.

“ O Scotland! much I love thy tranquil dales:
But most on Sabbath eve, when low the sun
Slants through the upland copse, 'tis my delight,
Wandering, and stopping oft, to hear the song
Of kindred praise arise from humble roofs;
Or, when the simple service ends, to hear
The lifted latch, and mark the gray-haired man,
The father and the priest, walk forth alone
Into his garden-plot, or little field,
To commune with his God in secret prayer,—
To bless the Lord, that in his downward years
His children are about him:”

Closet or secret prayer has also peculiar advantages on the Sabbath. A day, with so much of heaven in it, prepares the Christian for the most endearing communion with God. The whole day has a purer atmosphere than the other days of the week. The closet is a bright and hallowed spot. The Christian enters it with his mind serene, spiritually sensitive, and more than usually elevated in its thoughts. The great truths, heard or read during the day, have imparted to his views an extraordinary vividness. As he communes with God, it seems as if the realities of faith stood personified before him, and he felt the blessedness and joy of their presence. The closet is Bethel; and the angels of God ascend and descend on the ladder of the New Covenant.

Such is a faint illustration of the value of the Sabbath. When thus spent, and thus enjoyed, it is indeed a day of high and holy privilege,—a foretaste of heaven,—a cluster of grapes from the vines of that promised land. It soothes the cares of discipline, and refreshes after the fatigues of pilgrimage. It repairs the injuries sustained in the spiritual conflicts of the past, and prepares for the hazards and hardships of trials yet to come. It is as a green spot in the wilderness, with the freshness of a flowing stream, and the shelter of an overshadowing rock. We conclude this paper with the following lines of the inimitable and truly

Christian poet, Cowper, on the right observance of the Sabbath:—

“ What says the prophet? Let that day be bless'd
With holiness and consecrated rest.
Pastime and business both it should exclude,
And bar the door the moment they intrude;
Nobly distinguish'd above all the six,
By deeds in which the world must never mix.
Hear him again. He calls it a delight,
A day of luxury, observed aright;
When the glad soul is made heaven's welcome guest,
Sits banqueting, and God provides the feast!”

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF JOHN FREDERIC OBERLIN,

THE spirit of industry being thus awakened in the Steintal, Oberlin was not the man to let it sleep. To enable the people to carry on effectually further improvements, he erected a dépôt for agricultural tools and implements of husbandry—for whenever any of them were lost, broken, or out of repair, two whole days were lost in going to Strasbourg to get them replaced. He established, also, a lending fund, for those who had no ready money; but under such strict regulations, that those who did not repay the sums they had borrowed at the stipulated period, were deprived for a certain time of the privilege. As there had been no mechanic of any description, he made provision for introducing trades among the people, by choosing some of the readiest and most promising lads, and sending them to Strasbourg, to serve a short apprenticeship, with various artisans—so that, by this wise expedient, the Ban de la Roche was soon supplied with masons, carpenters, glaziers, cartwrights, blacksmiths, and workmen of every art, without the people being subjected to the trouble, expense, and loss of time which they had previously incurred; and the money which had formerly been spent at a distance, was circulated freely among themselves. He carried his improvements into their dwellings, which were formerly, most of them, nothing more than wretched hovels, hewn out of the rocks, and without any cellars to preserve their potatoes, which formed their principal food, from the influence of the frost. He was anxious, also, to improve their agriculture; but the people, supposing that, from his habits and mode of life, he could not have so much knowledge on that subject as they themselves had, resisted all his attempts; and he, wisely judging, that an appeal to themselves would be the most certain way of convincing them, resolved to put his theories in practice, on a small piece of ground belonging to the parsonage. Having dug trenches, four or five feet deep, he planted various slips of apples, pears, plums, cherries, and walnuts, and made a large nursery of a piece of ground, which had been hitherto totally neglected, from the supposed sterility of the soil; and, in due time, the peasants, astonished at the rich produce of their minister's ground, compared with the scanty return of their own, flocked to enquire by what methods he had met with such abundant crops. In answer to their inquiries, he, according to custom, after having directed their minds to Him, “ who causeth the earth to bring forth her bud, and crowneth the year with his goodness,” gave a minute explanation of the mode, by observing which, they would ensure themselves, by the blessing of Providence, crops equally strong and abundant as his own. This experiment was attended with a result more important to his parishioners, in its immediate effects, than the taste for planting trees, which was universally diffused. They lived almost entirely upon potatoes; but owing to various causes, this root had degenerated so much, that about the time of Oberlin's arrival, in 1767, fields that had formerly yielded from 120 to 150 bushels, furnished only between 30 and 50. The people imputed this to the poverty of the soil; but Oberlin, perceiving the cause, procured some new seed from Holland, Switzerland, and Lorraine, which, being well adapted to the sandy soil of the mountains, produced potatoes superior in quality to any that had ever been known in the district. He taught them the importance of manure, and the means of enriching it by fermentation, encouraging them to collect all sorts of refuse, the leaves of trees, stalks of rushes, fir-tops, old rags—everything, as furnishing materials for a useful compost. And, lastly, with a view to complete those agricultural improvements, as well as to promote new ones in his parish, he formed a society, consisting of the more intelligent farmers, among whom were included people of taste and knowledge from other quarters, and excited the spirit of industry and experiment among them, by the distribution of prizes, periodically, to those who reared the best cattle, or exhibited any new contrivances of mechanical skill.

These various improvements, however, which he introduced among his people in agricultural gardening, and the other useful arts of life, were only parts of the system which he had sketched for the benefit of his parish; and while he was indefatigable in his exertions to improve their temporal condition, he was never, for a moment, unmindful of the spiritual services, to which they had a claim, and which he felt to be the principal and proper part of a minister's duty. Various were the plans he adopted for this great end. In 1779, he printed and circulated an address, at the beginning of the year, among the people of the Steinthal, in which he reminded them of the blessings and privileges they had long enjoyed—impressed upon them the increasing responsibility they thereby incurred to improve them to their spiritual advantage—called upon all to embrace, by faith, the overtures of reconciliation with God, made through a crucified Saviour, and exhorted them, in the most earnest and affectionate manner, to let their walk and conversation be becoming the Gospel. The young of his flock particularly engaged his pastoral solicitude. For their benefit, he procured subscriptions among his friends, to erect a school, of a commodious and permanent description, in each of the five villages of his parish—trained up several intelligent young men, under his own eye, to the theory and practice of intellectual education, and founded institutions of a humbler kind, under the management of conductrices, or female superintendents, for the reception, and preparatory tuition of infants, whom he had often seen neglected, while their parents were at work, and their elder brothers and sisters were at school. From these schools, the infants were removed, at a proper age, to the higher seminaries, where they were instructed in reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, the principles of agriculture, astronomy, sacred and profane history—the pastor having a general superintendence over the whole, and reserving solely to himself the department of religious instruction. Every Sunday, the children of each village, in turns, assembled at the church to sing the hymns they had learned, to recite the lessons they had prepared during the week, and to receive an admonition from the lips of the minister. Such an impression was made by these benevolent and useful exertions, that funds poured in upon him from various quarters, in such abundance, as enabled him to establish a library for the adults, and one of a simple kind for the scholars—a museum, consisting of a collection of indigenous plants and objects in natural history, and of philosophical and mathematical instruments. With part of these funds, he drew up, printed, and circulated among his people, an almanack, containing a list of all the popular superstitions, with an exposure of their absurdity, and a collection of all sorts of observations that promised to be useful. The grand object which he had in view in all these, was to inform their understandings, and to impress them with a sense of the wisdom and goodness of the Creator; and so much did he endeavour to make them connect their diligence in business with religion, that he made it essential to receiving the rite of confirmation, that the young candidates should bring a certificate from their parents, that they had planted two young trees, or contributed something to the general good. And this he did, not for the purpose of conferring a temporal benefit under the sanction of a religious ordinance, but on the broad principle of the apostle, "that whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we should do all to the glory of God." The principles of religion, Oberlin taught them to carry into practice in the minutest affairs of life—to take, for instance, a stone out of the way, if it were likely to incommode a traveller, on the principle of love to their neighbour. Things, which done by other men, would be only matters of convenience, he always taught should be done as a religious duty; and all the institutions of that society which he formed and established among the rude people over whom he was placed, were conducted on this principle. From the year 1782, when the social improvements of his people were so far advanced that they did not need so much of his attention, he directed himself almost wholly to their religious interests. He formed a society, denominated "The Christian Society," for which he drew up a set of rules, and the object of which was, the promotion of the spirit of prayer and of religious conversation; but owing to much violent opposition, it was not of long continuance. He next caused a circular to be sent to every cottage in his parish, calling upon his people to join him in the establishment of a monthly prayer-meeting for the spread of the Gospel, and the stability and success of missionaries engaged in that cause; and also that every one should, on Sunday and Wednesday, at five o'clock in the evening, prostrate himself before God, in the name of Jesus Christ, and engage in prayer, first for himself, then for every member of his household, mentioning the names of each—then for all the friends of God of his acquaintance—then for all in authority; and that on Saturday evening they should, at a certain hour, pray God to bless the preaching of the Gospel on the ensuing Sabbath.

About this time, and after sixteen years' uninterrupted happiness in the married state, Oberlin was deprived of his beloved wife; and ever after, says his biographer, the passive graces shone as conspicuously in his character, as the active virtues had done before. The first intelligence of the event, for it was very sudden, threw him into a stupor; but recovering in a little, he threw himself on his knees, and returned thanks to God, that his beloved partner was now beyond the reach or the need of prayer. They had prayed, at the commencement of their union, that they might live together as the people of God. And he now prayed, "If it be a thing which we may ask of Thee, O grant that we may not be long separated." The desire of departing and being with Christ, which had always been a strong principle of his mind, and the belief that he would not be long in following his wife had taken such hold of him, that in the firm persuasion of his death not being far distant, he composed a long paper of directions, admonitions, and warnings, to all classes of his people, which he carefully laid aside, with orders that it was not to be opened till after his decease. But Providence had still much for him to accomplish in the world, and with that composure and resolution which was the fruit of his faith, and which so remarkably distinguished him, he continued in the midst of his people, labouring among them in word and doctrine more zealously than ever. Meanwhile, the loss of his wife was in some measure supplied to his family by a pious orphan, Louisa Schepler, whom he had educated, and who being now twenty-three years of age, begged, in the most affectionate manner, to be allowed to take the management of his household affairs and his children, asking only one return for her faithful services, that she might be permitted to take the name of Oberlin.

The arrangements of Oberlin's house were exactly of such a kind as might be expected from his character. On the door of every room he had some pasteboard fastened, containing a verse from the Bible, or some useful moral maxim; and to all his visitors he gave, as a welcome, a printed text, such as "Abide in me, and I in you," or, "Seek those things which are above." His walls were covered with engravings, portraits of eminent characters, plates of animals, drawings of minerals, and, in short, with everything calculated to convey to the mind definite ideas of objects in natural history. His meals were always at early hours, exact at the time, and consisted of the simplest possible articles; and during the repast, he frequently engaged in useful discourse, having a very happy talent of improving every occurrence. There was one room in his house, where he was most frequently to be found, and that was his workshop, where he kept his tools, and where he made many things for his people with his own hands. He had there a turning-lathe, a printing-press, and a press for bookbinding. His mechanical turn made nothing come amiss to him; and everything he could think of for the comfort of the poor, and the temporal improvement of the people, he prepared at his own expense, and with his own hands, in that workshop.

At the breaking out of the French Revolution, Oberlin was attached to its principles; and his son, who entered the service as a volunteer, fell almost in the first campaign—a loss which he bore with the greatest resignation. Like the rest of the clergy, at that dreadful period, he was deprived of his scanty income, but it was in some measure supplied to him by the heads of his parish, who made an annual collection for him, by going from house to house; but from the increasing disasters of the times, that precarious revenue was diminished from year to year. And yet his equanimity and his trust in God never forsook him amid his own and his family's distress. One consolation was left him, that while in the Reign of Terror that then prevailed, every kind of worship was prohibited, and men of talent, learning, and influence, were thrown into dungeons, he was allowed to prosecute his labours without molestation—a liberty, however, which he owed not to the clemency of the Government, but to the remoteness and poverty of his situation. His house consequently became an asylum to persons of all creeds, and to individuals even of the most distinguished rank, to all of whom he opened his hospitable door, without regarding the personal risk to which his generosity exposed him. Nor was he ever molested, for, with the exception of one occasion, when he was falsely accused of having excited his people against the existing order of things, and from which charge he was speedily dismissed, the well-known integrity and Christian principles of this great man procured for him an almost solitary exemption from the miseries to which men of public character were then subjected. From the failure of his income, he was reduced to the necessity of providing some means of maintaining his family; and as soon as the fall of Robespierre and other circumstances enabled him to carry his plans into effect with safety, he announced his intention of taking ten or twelve pupils into his house. The sons of several distinguished foreigners were soon put under his care, and he had then in a short time in his power an income, which enabled him once more to indulge his benevolent dispositions. He publicly declared to his flock, that he would release them from the duty of contributing to his support, although every contribution they chose, and found it convenient to make for him, he would still cheerfully accept as a mark of their goodwill; but he desired that they would still continue to contribute, whether in the shape of goods or money, for the schoolmasters, and for every other charitable object established among them. He himself, with the assistance of Louisa Schepler, superintended the distribution of whatever was thus contributed, keeping an exact account of every article disbursed, whether on his own account, or for the public good, as it was a constant maxim with him to "do all things in order," and to "owe no man anything." It may appear surprising, how a man, with so slender an income as Oberlin, could have any thing to spare, much less to carry on his numerous plans of public usefulness.

His ability arose, not certainly from the abundance of his resources, but from his habits and principles, for, having been early impressed, through the writings of Moses, with the laws concerning tithes, he resolved to observe them, and devoted three tithes of all he possessed to the service of God and the poor. The same habits he had impressed upon his people, and the plan was this,—he kept three boxes, on each of which suitable texts of the Mosaic law were inscribed. The contents of the first were assigned to the erection and repair of the churches and schools, to the support of masters and mistresses for the latter, to the purchase of Bibles and religious books, and to the advancement of every thing connected with the worship of God and the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom. The second box was for receiving funds appropriated to the improvement of the roads that led to the churches and schools, for dinners to the poor, and for repairing of injuries. The contents of the third box were for the service of the poor, and for compensation of losses by fire, which were frequent in the district. So scrupulous was he in discharging his obligations to these boxes, that whenever he heard that the sum was not sufficient for any one of the above purposes, or when he was under the necessity of taking any thing out for a time, he kept a debtor and creditor's account between himself and the box; so that by the small sums put from time to time into these boxes, he and his people, who were taught to imitate his example, had almost always funds at command for any useful or charitable object.

The extraordinary exertions of Oberlin for the public good had long attracted attention; and when at the restoration of the Bourbons, the French Government was settled, his claims to some public tribute were brought under the notice of Louis XVIII., who sent him the ribbon of the Legion of Honour. The Royal Agricultural Society of France voted him a gold medal; and what was a greater, and to him more valuable, honour, the British and Foreign Bible Society made him their first foreign correspondent, and forwarded to him a large donation of Bibles. In the full enjoyment of health and domestic happiness, he saw his children respectably married and placed in honourable stations; and with a mind immovably resting on the sure Foundation, this venerable man, at the age of fourscore, looked calmly forward to the hour of his departure. Nevertheless he did not abate in his public labours; he went continually about among his people as much as his increasing infirmities would allow. When he left home, he always wore a cocked hat and the red ribbon he had received from his Sovereign. On the Sabbaths he officiated in each of the five churches in his parish by turns; and one of the people of the hamlet where he was to preach, brought a horse for him, on which he rode in his pastoral robes, some of the principal farmers of the district meeting him, each agreeing to enjoy in rotation the honour of entertaining their beloved pastor at dinner. The intervals of public worship were passed in dining with the bourgeois, and afterwards visiting some of the old and excellent men and women of the place. On his return to his family, the evening of the Sabbath was spent in reading the Scriptures, and edifying conversation, concluded by a French hymn, in which all the household joined. His public services in the way of preaching were not confined to the Sabbath, for, "every Friday evening, he conducted worship in German for the benefit of people of the neighbourhood who were better acquainted with that language than French." His congregation on a Sunday consisted of about 600 persons, but on the week days, of about 200 persons; and Oberlin, laying aside all form, seemed on such occasions, more like a grandfather surrounded by his children and grandchildren, to whom he was giving suitable instruction, than the minister of an extensive parish. In order that no time might be lost, he used to make his female hearers knit stockings during the service, not indeed for themselves or their families, but for their poorer neighbours, as he believed that this charitable employment would not distract their attention, nor interrupt the devotional spirit which pervaded the evening assemblies. When he had pursued for half an hour the strain of his reflections upon the portion of Scripture which he had just been reading, he would often say to them, "well, my children, are you not tired? Have you not had enough? Tell me, my friends?" To which inquiry, his parishioners would reply,—"No, Papa, go on, we should like to hear a little more;" though on some occasions, with characteristic frankness, the answer was,—"Enough, we thank you, for one time;" and the good old man would leave off in the midst of his discourse, or wait a little, and afterwards resume it, putting the same question again at intervals, until he saw that the attention of his congregation began to flag, or until they, perceiving that he spoke with less ease, would thank him for his instructions, and beg him to conclude. Nor was it to the pulpit alone that this indefatigable minister of Christ confined his spiritual labours. He used to go frequently among the people on pastoral visits, during which he carried with him a book, in which he marked down his observations, as to the character and condition of each, under distinct heads, such as the class of "idlers," "bad managers," "promising," "decidedly religious," &c. Another method he took, was to make his remarks on the state of his congregation under the Ten Commandments. And on all these occasions of pastoral visitation, he entered in the most familiar and affectionate manner into converse with the humblest.

Oberlin's last illness was sudden and of short duration, and he evinced the same placid resignation and composure of mind which his previous life had manifested; on the most trying occasions, exclaiming at intervals in broken sentences, "Lord Jesus, take me speedily. Nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done." His funeral was attended by crowds from all quarters, anxious to pay the last tribute to the memory of Dear Papa, as he was always styled, and to look on his venerable countenance, which they were enabled to see through a glass lid which covered the coffin. As the funeral procession left the house, they placed on the coffin the clerical robes of the late pastor, along with his Bible, and to the pall was fixed the decoration of the Legion of Honour. Ten or twelve young females joined in a hymn at the grave. The oldest inhabitant carried an inscription for the tomb, bearing the words, "Papa Oberlin." And after the procession had reached the church, and the coffin was placed on the altar, beneath which it was to be buried, the Rev. M. Jaegle mounted the pulpit, pronounced the funeral sermon, and concluded by reading a paper in the handwriting of the deceased, which he had addressed to all his parishioners; and its affectionate and earnest exhortations tended greatly to increase the regret and lamentation for the loss of so apostolic a minister.

THE CONVERSION OF AN INFIDEL.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

[The narrative which follows, is extracted, by permission, from a work, consisting of authentic accounts of the power of Divine Truth, as exemplified in various cases which have actually occurred both in the army and navy. The work, which bears the name of a highly respectable Baptist minister in Edinburgh, Mr Innes, is entitled, "The Church in the Army;" published by Waugh and Innes.]

"I should premise, that ever since I was seventeen years of age I had been an open infidel and deist, having been made so at that early age by an old grey-headed gentleman, who attacked me one night at his house in Hereford, where I was spending the evening with his son. The old man, thinking I was an artless easy prey, commenced the subject after tea—warily and artfully, lest I should be shocked and frightened away. He tempted me, just as the devil did Eve, by casting suspicious doubts and evil surmises into my mind, till he excited my eager curiosity to hear all he had to say; telling me it was true wisdom and knowledge, and that I and all Christians were blinded by priestcraft, &c. As I knew nothing of the arguments in proof of the authenticity of the Scripture and truth of the Christian religion, he, in the course of a couple of hours, so powerfully tempted me—exciting in me every bad passion, particularly my pride to gain this knowledge and be wiser than the Christian world at large, and that I might be above all law to God, and sin with impunity—that I stretched forth my hand, and did pluck of the forbidden tree and eat. Instantly the poison began to work and corrupt within me; for I left him late, and on going home, finding my sisters had gone to bed, I thought I could not rest till morning to attack them as I myself had been attacked; and when I gained opportunity, endeavoured, by rant, boldness, and boasting, to poison them with the same abominations I had now imbibed.

"I continued in this state, a proud infidel boaster, till I went to a place called Moluill, in the county of Leitrim, in Ireland, on detachment; having, alas! ere this, corrupted many a young man with the poison of infidelity: for I had learnt all the jargon, cant, sophistry, and impudence of this system of the devil; and to be thought a clever fellow, and to raise a laugh, I used to ridicule Christ and his religion—but I own it was more out of sinful pride and vanity, than from disrespect in my judgment, or enmity to the character of Christ and his religion. However, I did not, and could not, in any sense, believe His religion or the Bible to be true. I had never read any arguments or books of evidences of the truth of Christianity, nor would I read them; but I had greedily devoured all the infidel writings I could meet with. The fact is, I did not wish to be convinced of the truth of the Bible and the Christian religion. I was an infidel from the love of sin, that I might indulge therein with impunity and liberty, and without fear of evil consequences; and for the same reasons would have been an open professed atheist, but I could not. And I believe in my soul that every infidel and atheist is so solely from the same motives; and I am persuaded that most of this class of men feel as I did, if they would but tell the truth—but they are ashamed to do so—for, although I launched into all the pleasures and sins of the ungodly world, I was miserable; and, like Milton's Satan, carried a hell within me, from which, no more than from myself, could I escape by change of time, or place, or scene. I knew there was a God, omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent, holy, righteous, and true. I could not but believe and deeply feel, though I denied it, that there was a judgment-day to come—a heaven, and a hell. These truths I never could shake off, and I was, therefore, at times, when not in the intoxication of pleasure and revelry, miserably wretched. There were some simple arguments which, from their reasonableness and truth, always tormented me; and by means of which I was literally my own tormentor; or rather my conscience was, which indeed 'makes cowards of us all.' The arguments were these: namely, If Scripture be true, all my disbelief and rejection of it can never make it false; and it never has been proved false: which, after all the opposition, and attacks, and sifting it has met with from every quarter, is a negative and presumptive proof that it is true. I reject it solely from necessity, not from choice of judgment or conscience; for I know its doctrines are grand and good, and most worthy of God; whereas the scheme I have embraced, but cannot fully believe in, of no future state and annihilation, is putting myself on a level with the beasts that perish, and is base: now if I were to be happy hereafter, I should naturally wish, like the Christians, to live for ever, as a recompense for all the pain, misery, and wretchedness of this world: so that I am forced, through necessity alone, to wish (for, after all, I cannot so believe it as to dispel my fears) to be annihilated at death. I therefore embrace the infidel doctrines in opposition to the Scriptures, although I know the infidel doctrines to be bad in themselves and productive of all evil, and the Scripture doctrines good, and productive of all good; but I reject the Scriptures, because they assert a future hell. Take away the hell, and I will instantly embrace and profess Christianity; for I should like, as would every infidel, if he spoke the truth, to go to heaven and be happy for ever, whatever that happiness may be. Yea, if there should be no happiness, but merely an exemption from misery, I should like it above all things, and embrace Christianity for the sake of it; for any thing is better than an eternal hell; and if there really be such a place of punishment, I know I deserve it: and if this be a truth, that there is an eternal hell, then my disbelief, or rather my trying to disbelieve it, but in vain, and rejection of it, cannot make it less true; for, if true in itself, it must ever remain so, which is the very nature of truth.

"But, particularly, the following old and simple argument always upset me at once, because it was short and incontrovertible, and embraced the whole of what I have here stated: namely, If the Christian religion be false, the Christian will lose nothing by it, but then will only be on a footing with the infidel, provided infidelity be true: but if Christianity be true, the Christian will gain every thing by it, and the infidel lose every thing; and then infidelity will be proved to be false, and an eternal hell proved for infidels. In short, come what will, whichever be true or false, the Christian can lose nothing by embracing his system; whereas the infidel may lose every thing, if his system prove false: therefore the chances are against the infidel, and it is possible and probable he may be cast into hell for ever.

"This argument used to make me terribly afraid whenever I would reflect upon the subject; for I clearly saw, that, as it was more than probable, and natural, and rational, there was a hell, it was probable, if I lived and died an infidel, I should be in it for ever. These thoughts would put to flight all my boasting, pleasures, and amusements, and dash down the draught of animal happiness from my lips, or at least so embitter and poison it, that I was often miserable beyond description; but through shame and pride, never told my feelings to any one.

"When I arrived at Mohill, I had the good providence to be introduced to a truly Christian lady; and after I had enjoyed her acquaintance a short time, I began to perceive and admire her great excellence. She was so benevolent and kind, and shewed such a real interest in my present and eternal welfare and happiness, knowing what were my perverted sentiments, and how wretched I must be, that I soon became intimate enough to unboosom my whole soul to her, with all its misery. And from the time I first knew her, respecting and admiring Christianity, and its excellence, so vividly manifested in her, I ceased to oppose or ridicule the Christian religion. In short, she so won my confidence and high regard, that I told her sincerely all my past history, my infidelity, and all my present wretchedness.

"The first time I thus conversed with her, she said, 'I have a strong presentiment, and feel persuaded, that ere a year is passed you will be a true Christian.' I replied, 'I most sincerely hope you may prove a true prophetess; for I would give worlds to be a Christian, as you are'—for I both knew her excellence and virtues, and that she was ever happy; and my own sin and guilt, and that I was ever miserable.

"During my acquaintance with this Christian lady, she used every argument to win me over; and shewed that pity, kindness, and compassion, which the Gospel proves is the only way to this happy end, 'In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth.' The happy result was, that in a short time I found I had no doubts left of the truths of the Scriptures, and that I believed them in my conscience, as I did ever before that fatal night the hoary-headed infidel taught me to disbelieve and reject them.

"During three months I had the privilege and happiness of this Christian lady's kind counsel and interest in my spiritual welfare, I gradually became more and more sincerely anxious to become a true Christian, such as I knew she was; and to believe with that holy saving faith, of which she used to speak, and which she proved from Scripture to be the gift and operation of the Holy Spirit on the mind. As yet, however, I could not understand in the slightest degree the real meaning of the nature or power of faith, or of spiritual things generally. All was darkness, mystery, and an enigma to me, both as to understanding these things, or feeling their power on my soul. And this is agreeable to 1 Cor. ii. 14: 'The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.' Yet she told me, that if I prayed in truth and sincerity, and read the Scriptures in prayer—if I asked, it would be given me—if I sought, I should find—and she was sure I should do so; and that ere long I should possess this spiritual, saving, purifying faith, and be a truly regenerated child of God. This she always affirmed, judging from my sincerity and candour; as I seriously confessed, with sorrow, that I was a sinner, guilty and miserable, and that I longed anxiously to be made a real Christian.

"At this time I had many convictions of sin, and began to pray in private for pardon, which I had entirely left off, since the night I was corrupted by the old sinner, the deist: and I also think my Christian landlord used sometimes to read the Scriptures and pray with me. I now respected the religion of Christ and his real disciples; I loved the Saviour (although I could not call him my Saviour) and his children dearly, however poor or mean in life they might be; and, indeed, had gradually done so from the time my first friend took such an interest in my spiritual welfare and happiness.

"Shortly after this, my detachment was called in to head-quarters; immediately upon which I got leave of absence, and went to pay a visit for several months to my relations in my native island, the Isle of Man.

"In the Isle of Man I heard the Gospel preached by an old schoolfellow, the Rev. R. Browne, a minister of a sweet Christian spirit. In his sermons he dwelt much on the universal depravity of mankind, the nature and necessity of regeneration, the blood and merits of Christ, and the mercy of the Father through Him to the chief of sinners, in a very powerful and energetic manner; and, as his discourses were delivered extempore, they came with the more power to my heart. By constantly attending his ministry, having the benefit of his and other Christian people's society, (who used to meet together for social prayer and reading the Scriptures,) and by reading good books and tracts, I gradually became influenced, I trust, by the truth as it is in Jesus. As I heard and read the primary fundamental truths on which all real Christians of all denominations agree, I learned to pray earnestly to Jesus Christ, under a sense of guilt, now deeply felt, for pardon and salvation, regeneration and holiness; and I do trust the good work of grace was then begun in my regeneration and conversion of soul to God; for I was sincere and zealous at that time among all my friends and relations, endeavouring to lead them into the truth, so far as I experimentally knew it.

"When I was led to see the true nature and grounds of a sinner's justification before God; that it was not conditional, but unconditional, and through the righteousness of Christ imputed by faith—that is, that the sinner upon believing is pardoned, accepted, and invested with a title to eternal life, for the sake of the infinite merits of Jesus Christ, (who died, the just for the unjust, to reconcile us to God,) through the mercy and sovereign grace of God the Father:—when I understood and received this blessed truth, I was quite overwhelmed with that joyous grief which ever accompanies true repentance 'not to be repented of.' I now saw clearly that a repenting, believing sinner is completely and eternally justified, through faith, without the deeds of the law; even through the righteousness of God, who can be (or appear) just, as well as merciful, while 'the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus; so that to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted to him for righteousness.' Now I plainly saw the meaning of, heartily embraced, and rejoiced in, these blessed passages, and multitudes more of the same nature throughout the Word of God. They now appeared as with a sunbeam; and I was only amazed at myself in being so sinfully blind and obstinate as not to understand and receive them before; and that I could have been so long bewitched as to resist or oppose their plain and obvious meaning.

"The immediate effects of this change wrought in me by the Holy Spirit were great. My load of uncertainty, legality, self-righteousness, and unhappiness was removed entirely, and my soul filled with peace and joy. I was brought as into a new world of being; looked upon the Word of God, religion, and all things in the kingdoms of nature and providence, as well as of grace and glory, through a new medium; old things, indeed, in many important senses, had passed away, and all things had become new. And as to love to God in Christ, not only for mercies generally, but these sure, eternally sure mercies, my heart was ready to burst its bounds; and now in deed and in truth I felt powerfully the words of Jesus to Mary, 'Her sins, which are many, are forgiven her; therefore she loveth much.' Full assurance of faith and hope filled my soul, and I felt as already in heaven. Now I could say, with Paul, 'I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in him; not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith.' Now I felt I had power, through Christ strengthening me, to rush into the midst of the battle against the world, the flesh, and the devil, and to give a helping hand to others. Oh! truly they say falsely who affirm that these are doctrines tending to laxity of moral and spiritual conduct and life: surely they who have felt their power, (and they only can give an opinion,) can testify to the very reverse, and assert that they inspire (under the Spirit's teaching) the Christian soldier's heart to begin and continue to fight the good fight of faith unto death. And why? because he has been assured by the Captain of his salvation that he shall gain the victory, and come off 'more than conqueror through Him that loved him.' Of that he is assured by the immutable oath of his God and Saviour when he begins the contest: and, oh! surely this will make him fight manfully and courageously, even though he were a coward before through his doubts and fears and uncertainty of victory."

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. R. S. CANDLISH, A. M.

Minister of St. George's Parish, Edinburgh.

"He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool."

Prov. xxviii. 26.

THIS maxim of the wise man is justified by the description which the prophet Jeremiah gives:—"The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked; who can know it?" For, if it be indeed such as it is there represented, assuredly the heart cannot be very trust-worthy. And that it is so, that the prophet's description is but too correct, must appear abundantly evident to all who have ever sincerely and seriously engaged in the difficult task of self-examination. The very difficulty of the task (and who that ever tried it in earnest, has not found it difficult?) proves how full the heart which is the subject of it must be of treachery and of secret vice; and how true it is, that we can scarcely hope to gain that complete knowledge of it, which alone could warrant our placing any confidence in it. For, however we may think ourselves fixed in our attachment to holiness, and our dislike of every thing that has even the appearance of sin, can we tell how much of this specious goodness is the result of religious principle in the soul; and how much of it, on the other hand, is due to the mere force of circumstances, the restraints of society, the absence of temptation? Can we be sure, that no alarming symptoms, no latent tendencies to crime escape our cursory observation? Do we scrupulously watch over every unhallowed passion in its birth, and check the slight and seemingly insignificant beginnings of evil? Do we detect, in each loose desire, the rage and violence of unbridled appetite,—in every word and look of causeless anger, the very spirit of the murderer? Can we guard against those enemies within us, which may rise in a sudden hour of weakness and of trial, and prevail over all those holy principles and holy resolutions which seem now to be so sure and strong? If we can thus thoroughly ascertain the whole amount of our strength, and the real extent of our infirmities, in that case, perhaps, it may be wise, and prudent, and safe, to trust in our own hearts. But if not; if it be so hard a task to search and know our own thoughts, and motives, and habits; if we are apt continually to be deceived or mistaken; if there be in our secret souls, a depth of depravity which we can never fathom; then, assuredly, the wise man's maxim is sagacious and sound, and he who trusteth in his own heart, must be indeed a fool.

But, not only is this maxim founded on a just view of the human heart, it is abundantly justified and confirmed by universal experience, and may be illustrated experimentally.

I. One striking proof of the proverb in our text, we have in our proneness to relapse into sins, of which we fancied, perhaps, that we had long ago fairly repented. When the sinner is first convinced of his sin,—when he is, by some signal warning, or some special call, arrested in his thoughtless career, and awakened to reflection, and made keenly and bitterly sensible of the guilt and danger of his evil practices or his evil passions; then, with emotions of deep contrition, and in faithful dependence on that God whose grace has disposed him to repent, the sinner—fleeing to the cross of Christ, and seeing there his sin's exceeding sinfulness, grieving over it, and hating it, and turning from it to the God of love—determines, by a vigorous exertion of self-denial and holy resolution, to renounce for ever the habit which has hitherto tyrannised over the powers and affections of his soul. He makes at once his prompt, yet firm choice, between God and the world. He lingers no longer in reluctant hesitation. He seeks no excuse, no compromise. He pleads not even for delay. But at once and for ever, he consents to break off all connection with the world's temptations, and to remove his feet as far as possible from the fair, but fatal paths, in which before he was wont to go astray. He feels his own weakness too, and therefore, industriously avails himself of all the means of grace. By holy meditation,—by frequent retirement,—by the reading of the Scriptures,—by unceasing prayer, he strives to fortify his still feeble resolution, and to keep out of his mind all thoughts, and all desires, in the least connected with his former evil course. He shuns his old companions, and attaches himself to persons of sound religious views. He avoids every place, every amusement, every pursuit, which may tend, however remotely, to remind him of former liberties, and excite again the lusts of his unrenewed nature; and he labours so to busy himself in works of holy obedience, as to leave no leisure for his inclinations to wander. He starts at the slightest approach to excess. He is always watchful, always on the alert, and being ever sensible of his liability to relapse, he never, for an instant, loses his devoted reliance on the Saviour, never forgets to look to Him, who alone can carry on the good work begun in his soul.

Thus warily, thus humbly, thus devoutly—trusting nothing to his own good dispositions, trusting all to Him who delivers from evil—thus does he for a time go on, and so long does he continue to walk both wisely and safely.

But soon his evil heart of unbelief tempts him again to depart from the living God. He finds that by divine grace, his rigid self-discipline and his pious care have been in some degree successful. He finds, or fancies he finds, his character to be now completely and fairly changed. He thinks, therefore, that he may now calculate somewhat on the sincerity of his repentance, on the soundness of his principles, and the strength of his newly acquired taste for the beauty of holiness; his newly formed habits of self-government and self-command. His conversion has been fully tried and proved; he has ceased to do evil, he has learned to do well. What need, then, he asks himself, of all that timid caution, which might be prudent, perhaps, in the infancy of his religious convictions, but which may surely be dispensed with now, when these convictions have attained their full and vigorous maturity? Why should he still be so very careful and scrupulous? There cannot, he may flatter himself, there cannot now be much danger of his yielding tamely to the slightest solicitations of appetites which he has learned to subdue, or pleasures which he has been brought to abhor, or companions whose friendship he has long ago renounced. There seems, too, to be something weak and cowardly in his thus timorously confining himself within so narrow a circle of formal trenchments and defences; why not venture boldly to cast aside his reserve, and go forth and mingle a little more freely with the world, and so boldly put to the test his repentance and his faith?

Thus, the penitent is unwarily betrayed by the very speciousness of his penitence, and that feeling of false shame, which is weak man's weakest point. He begins to relax at times his vigilance; to approach a little more nearly and less timidly the scenes and the circumstances of his former sinful pleasures. And as, perhaps, no immediate or serious harm may follow, he is fatally encouraged to venture still more confidently. He gradually and almost insensibly diminishes the fervour and the frequency of his devotions,—the pure sincerity of his single trust in God; and step by step he proceeds, from caution to negligence, from negligence to rashness, till the feeble barrier is at last broken down, and one sad moment serves at once to prove the madness of his high and proud self-confidence, and to blast the fruits of all his watching and his prayers. He finds his old enemy—the evil habit, the unruly passion which once subdued him, and which now, he thought, he had at last subdued—he finds it still much stronger than he imagined; lurking insidiously within him, even when he seemed to have wholly rooted it out; ready to take advantage of the least departure from strict discipline, and to start up again as fresh and strong as ever. He finds, that however fair the show of reformation might be, yet, when he trusted in his own heart, he was indeed a fool.

II. Another practical and experimental proof of the wise man's assertion in our text, we have, in the various turns of the believer's struggle with indwelling sin. The sins under this head referred to, are not, as in the former instance, sins apparently forsaken, into which the penitent may relapse, but rather sins which we may be even now vainly struggling to forsake—the sins which do most easily beset us. Thus, to select one example, which may easily be applied to other cases: We are sensible, perhaps, of a particular defect in our character—a certain unbecoming and unchristian quickness of temper, we shall suppose—a hastiness to take offence—a disposition easily fretted by disappointment, or irritated by petty provocations. This may be our besetting sin, our special infirmity, over which we have most occasion to lament. For we feel, it is presumed, the absolute necessity of getting the better of this infirmity, and it is no mere careless wish with us, but an earnest and anxious desire, to acquire that charity which beareth all things. We feel that this blemish, however trifling it might appear to a worldly eye, forms a serious barrier of separation between us and the love of God; that there can be no solid comfort to our souls, as long as this one sin prevails within us. Hence we turn our attention particularly to this most assailable point in our characters, this doubtful quarter, this, our weak and vulnerable side. We strive to fortify and secure it, by devout resolutions, by fervent appeals to God, by a holy and watchful jealousy of ourselves. Every day, as we rise in the morning, we determine to keep a stricter guard on our temper than before, and to let no earthly consideration overthrow our meekness, and our settled equanimity; and aware of our weakness in the hour of danger, and well remembering our many falls and failures in time past, we form our determination humbly and piously, in the shape of a prayer, rather than a vow, that so it may have a chance of being all the better kept.

Thus far all is well—thus wisely do we begin the day. But then, no sooner do we enter on its ordinary occupations, than we allow our minds to be absorbed in the busy tumult of society—to be hurried away by the engrossing eagerness of worldly hopes and fears. At intervals, perhaps, we pause one instant, to bestow a passing thought on our danger and our infirmity—to recollect the morning's resolution—to repeat hastily the morning's prayer. But again we rush heedlessly on, and at the very moment, perhaps, when we fancy ourselves most secure—when we have just successfully resisted some really severe trial of our patience, and are congratulating ourselves with soothing self-complacency on this flattering proof of our amendment, little grateful to Him to whose grace we owe it, and little dreaming that we are even then more in need of his grace than ever,—in such a proud moment of premature and unseasonable triumph, some trifling inconvenience, some accidental provocation, some petty annoyance, some slight domestic discomfort, scarcely worthy of a single serious thought, may gain an easy victory over our unguarded temper, and cast us down at once, from the height of our rash self-confidence, to the depths of mortified dejection and despair.

III. In illustrating this maxim, we may pass from the Christian's continual struggle with the sin that dwelleth in him, to the resolute stand which he is called upon to make against the evil that is in the world. Here our propensity to trust in our own hearts finds much excuse in that vague and indeterminate generality with which God has seen fit to give us rules and directions in this particular. There is nowhere in his word—which is the only rule of our conduct—there is nowhere laid down, any distinct and well-defined line of separation between the things which are, and the things which are not consistent with our Christian profession. "Love not the world, neither the things of the world"—"Be not conformed to the world,"—are, indeed, emphatic commandments. But then our Lord himself came eating and drinking. He countenanced no useless austerity. He intended that his followers should not be taken out of the world, but should live and act, for his glory, in the world. We must join in the affairs of men, and we may be quite sure that we are not forbidden to join also in their pleasures. The point is, how far we may safely do so; and on this point much is necessarily left to the prudence and discretion of each believer.

Now, as this liberty is probably left to us, in part at least, for the very purpose of proving our wisdom, so, in the exercise of it, we find large occasion for displaying our folly. Instead of walking humbly and fearfully with our God, in the midst of an evil generation, as a due sense of our frailty and our dependence would lead us to do, we seem rather disposed to give free scope to our desires of growing conformity to the world, confident in our supposed ability to stop short at any time, and say to our wildest passion, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." In this too, as in the other instances, we are commonly betrayed, by gradual steps, into that confident pride which goeth before a fall. We begin, of course, very smoothly and plausibly—we make our first experiment with certain little liberties and compliances, in themselves very harmless, which interfere not perceptibly with the delicacy of our feelings, and the general regularity of our conduct. All seems as decent, and proper, and correct, as in the days of our most rigid and scrupulous precision. We are thus encouraged to unbend, yet a little more, the strict severity of our notions. For we must live as others do, we must accommodate ourselves, in some degree, to the views and practices of our associates. Still there is no very sensible diminution of our religious zeal—our devotion in prayer—our pious trust in God. We gather courage apace—presently we become liberal enough to smile at our former strait-laced scruples, and venture a sly remark on the conscientious but absurd and antiquated peculiarities of those whom we were wont to reverence. Still all seems well—we are merely growing more enlightened, and more free from narrow-minded prejudices. We gradually change our tone;—and speak of human frailty,—not as once we did, with the view of humbling our pride, and confirming our watchfulness, and rendering our prayers more earnest for that grace which is made perfect in weakness—but as a palliation or excuse for what we call our trivial, and natural, and venial failings. We begin to regard with an in-pliant eye compliances and offences from which once we would have shrunk in disgust or in horror. Thus, imperceptibly, we lose our hold of the divine support, for we cease to care much whether we are supported or not. We tamper with temptation—we linger on the very verge of pollution, and become familiar with crime—we gaze on the forbidden region of delights, till our desire is kindled,—we nurse and foster our desire, as nearer and nearer we advance, and stretch out our hand, to touch, to handle, to snatch a trembling joy; and still enlarging, and yet again enlarging, the circle in which we move, we retire to a greater distance from our Saviour's love, and make new encroachments and new inroads on the accursed border. Confessing that our corrupt inclinations still long for certain forbidden indulgences, we yet heedlessly loiter still, within sight and within reach of the glittering prize, though we feel our longing becoming daily more intense, and our power to resist it daily giving way. But why trace farther the ungrateful picture? The end may be too probably foreseen. We shall have to thank that love which we despise, and certainly not the strength of our own hearts in which we trust, if, by some seasonable interposition, we are roused to a sense of impending ruin, ere we are hurried on, as the holy David was, by the irresistible impatience and impetuosity of passion, from heedlessly yielding to the first irregular suggestions of appetite, to the crimes of adultery, and cold-blooded treachery, and deliberate and cowardly murder.

IV. One other instance of this folly we may mention: Our proneness to rely on the amount of our attainments, the sufficiency and the stability of our own conscious and confirmed integrity. For so perverse, so ingenious in its flatteries is our self-love, that the very experience which we may have had of the efficacy of divine grace, is made a reason why we should cease to trust in it; that those very attainments in goodness for which we confess ourselves to be wholly indebted to our God, furnish a pretence for imagining now that we can do without his help. We readily acknowledge, that except the Lord had been on our side, we could never have advanced so far. But then we think that all the difficulty is now fairly past—that what remains of our course is smooth and easy—that the first impulse and the proper bias having been given, the ball will roll on, as of its own accord, to the appointed mark. So that, in the very same instant, we shall render thanks most humbly, for the past influences of the Holy Ghost, who has in part sanctified us, and yet secretly and practically cherish the delusion, that the work of our sanctification, thus auspiciously and promisingly begun, will, without any anxiety on our part, or any feeling of helpless dependence, naturally and quietly go on to perfection;—forgetting that still, to the very last, as it is God who must work in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure, so we must continue, while we work out our own salvation, to do so with fear and trembling.

It is thus that a little calm weather causes us to dwell securely, taking no thought of our crazy state, and making no provision for the storm that may be coming. The goodly summer show of our many Christian decencies deceives us, lulls us into negligence, and insensibly leads us to rely on what we are, and not on that grace which has made us what we are. No doubt, if our vigilance were still awake, we might see in our religious principles, strong as they seem, many symptoms of remaining frailty. But to such hints we are willingly blind. We easily forget the imperfection which adheres to our best services and our best qualities, and please ourselves with the idea, that some one favourite Christian virtue, at least, is now strong enough for any emergency. And from the very instant in which such an idea begins to prevail within us, that particular virtue may be pronounced the feeblest and the most precarious of all that we have. A slight change of circumstances—some very trifling accident, unforeseen and unexpected—a new temptation suddenly assailing us—may lay the proud structure in the dust, and teach us how vain it is to trust in any degree of excellence, in any height of Christian perfection, and to lose sight of Him, from whom that very excellence derives all its stability, in whom alone we can hope to continue for a single hour free from deadly sin. It is in this way that the very best qualities of the very best men, become, in one sense, the means of their fall—when they become the ground of their self-confidence—when they beguile them into the rash delusion of trusting in grace already received, rather than in grace every instant promised. The zeal of Peter was no doubt sincere, when he said to his Master,—“Though I should die with thee, yet will I not betray thee.” Nor was it a cold or lukewarm zeal which would have called forth his sword in his Master's defence. Yet his assurance failed him in the hour of trial, for it rested on himself alone. Warned as he was, he rushed heedlessly into danger, and fell the victim of his folly in trusting in his own heart. Even the meekness of Moses—of him concerning whom we have divine testimony, that he was “very meek above all men which were upon the face of the earth”—even his meekness was not proof against all provocation. On one memorable occasion, at the Waters of Strife, his passion was kindled, so that he spake unadvisedly with his lips;—which one offence, we know, deprived him of the glory of leading the Israelites into the land of promise. And the single instance of the Syrian Hazeel, who, when Elisha with tears foretold his future cruelties, with the honest indignation of conscious honour, repelled the charge, “Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?” the recollection that this very man no sooner heard that he was destined to be King of Syria, than the lust of empire made all his goodness melt away, and turned him at once into a traitor, an assassin, and a tyrant,—this one instance were enough to convince us, that not the best of all our good dispositions is in any case trust-worthy —that the heart is indeed deceitful above all things—that he who trusteth in its fairest promises, will too surely, in an hour when he thinketh not, find that his trust has been vain, and himself a miserable fool.

By these, then, and other similar instances, may the folly of trusting in our own hearts be evinced; and thus, by practical experience may the fact be proved, that if we are to stand at all, we must stand by Faith; since in the very instant of our forgetting Him who is the object of our faith, and becoming fearless and high-minded, in that very instant we are almost sure to fall. Let us then learn in time the lesson of that distrust in ourselves, which must lie at the very foundation of our faith in the Lord Jesus, that “walking wisely we may be delivered.” For this is the moral which the wise man in our text suggests. He would not discourage or deter us—he would not fill us with anxious fears—he would not make us conscious of sin and of weakness, and then leave us doubtful of pardon and of help—he would not have us shrink from any one of the duties or the trials to which we are called. But he would have us walk wisely, circumspectly, cautiously, yet boldly, with our eyes turned away from ourselves to God; and he assures us then of safety and deliverance. He would have us cherish a practical and habitual sense, not merely in general of the frailty of human nature, but in particular, of our own infirmity and our own helplessness. He would have us, not merely at intervals, acknowledge our dependence upon God, and then go away to live in forgetfulness of him, as if the fact of our having confessed our weakness and implored his help in the morning, would operate as a charm to save us during all the thoughtless hours of the busy day. He would have us at all times, in business and in pleasure, at home and abroad, in all our concerns, carry about with us a settled conviction of the folly of trusting in our own hearts. For it is folly, and it must be ruin.—What else is it, indeed, that lures and betrays to destruction the thousands who, like Felix, put away from them the word of truth that would make them tremble and repent? Day after day, they go on in their carelessness,—indifferent about religion, and the purifying influence of its faith and its hopes. Do they mean to go on thus for ever? Surely they contemplate a future change, either sudden and abrupt, or gradual and insensible. The evil is, that they know not their own utter inability to make that change themselves. They intend not to live always, at least they intend not to die, unconverted, unsanctified. But fondly, madly, they would persuade themselves, that they can convert and sanctify their own souls, at whatever time, and in whatever manner they may find it necessary or convenient. This is the delusion which they cherish—this the false confidence which soothes them in their delay. They trust in their own hearts, in their natural goodness, in their strength of principle, their resolution, their honour, their promise of stedfast amendment. But they grasp a lie in their right hands. The heart is not good. We cannot make it, we cannot keep it good. It is the work of God; and our sole resource is, to seek Him while he may be found—to embrace the mercy and the grace of his gospel—to enter into covenant with Him, that he may be our God, that he may dwell in us, that he may redeem us from all iniquity, and purify us unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. In faith, therefore, let us walk humbly with our God, let us watch and pray continually that we enter not into temptation, since however willing the spirit may be, yet the flesh is weak. “Trust ye then in the Lord alone for ever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength.” Amen.

PRAYER TO THE DEAD.

BY THE REV. ROBERT M'CHEYNE.

It is very interesting to compare the accounts which different missionaries give of different people and their superstitions, in order to find out the identity of human nature that runs through them all.

The following extract is from the Journal of the Rev. Mr Nicolayson, once the fellow-student and roommate of Gutzlaff, now labouring most faithfully in the cause of Christ, among the Jews, in “the City of the Great King.”

“I engaged with Rabbi S. in a discussion on the practice of Jews praying on the graves, which he admitted to have two intents, as stated in the Testament, 1. That we may be the more forcibly reminded of the fact that we are but dust and ashes, and fast returning to that original of our existence as to the body, that we may be the better prepared to make this humiliating confession of Abraham in our prayer before the Holy One. And, 2. That we may thus avail ourselves of the intercession and merits of our sainted forefathers. In reference to this last motive for this practice, I expressed to him my deep and sincere regret, to find the Jews thus given over to those very superstitions which have so sadly disgraced so great a portion of the nominally Christian Church. He tried to excuse this by saying, that it is not taught as a doctrine of divine authority, nor the practice enjoined as a necessary duty, but only encouraged as tending to minister consolation to the distressed mind. I contrasted it with the Old Testament doctrine of justification, and the utter worthlessness of human merits upon this point. He endeavoured to lessen the force of this contrast, by referring to Moses' appeal to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in his intercessions for the people. But this was easily obviated by the fact, that, in the first place, it is not to the merits of these patriarchs, but to God's free promise to, and covenant with, them, that this appeal is made; and, in the next place, that it is not the justification of Israel he here pleads for, but the conversion of the threatened punishment of blotting them out, which might have seemed inconsistent with that covenant. In fact, that very generation perished in their sins. Rabbi S. was convinced that both the practice and principle of prayer to the dead, are inconsistent with the pure principles and worship of the Scriptures.

“Feb. 24, 1835.—Visited the tomb of Huldah the prophetess—Jews have free access to it, and we found several here saying their prayers.”

Now, if we leave this interesting Missionary, and his labours of love, among the broken-off branches of God's olive-tree, and follow his fellow-student to the scene of his labours in an opposite region of the globe—among the Chinese, a people who seem to have nothing in common with the Jew—we shall find a strange identity of superstition. The following extract is from "Abeel's Residence in China," an interesting little work:—

"According to the superstitious custom of the Chinese, they have just been paying their annual visit to their departed relatives; repairing their tombs; decorating the surrounding spots with coloured papers; offering sacrifice to their manes, and attending to numerous rites, which they conceive to be becoming in the living, and not only gratifying to the dead, but quite necessary to their comfort. The more wealthy erect on these occasions booths on the hills, assemble their kindred, prepare a sumptuous entertainment, provide candles, incense, gold and silver paper, suits of clothes and other articles, which, being converted by the operation of fire into smoke, pass, they imagine, into the world of spirits. There they kneel and pray to this effect:—'We, a multitude of children, grandchildren, and other descendants, now, on such a day, have come hither to worship at our ancestors' tumuli. We pray, that by the protection of our ancestors, we may become prosperous, and that their descendants may be constantly supported.' Even those who profess to believe the doctrine of spiritual annihilation or metempsychosis, are among the most scrupulous in their offerings to the dead. It appears to be a very prevailing opinion, that the spirit, or one of the spirits, as they believe in a plurality, continues in the vicinity of the dispossessed body; that the sympathy between them remains almost as perfect as before their separation; and that the comfort of the living agent is materially affected by the regard shown to it, or to its decaying companion by earthly relatives. The idea of having none to sacrifice at their tombs, and supply them with such things as they are supposed to need in the invisible state, is abhorrent to a Chinaman."

Leaving the cemeteries of the Chinese, let us enter into the temples of the Roman Catholic all over the world, and still do we find the prayer ascending to the dead. Nay, there we find what we did not before, an assembled conclave of men, declaring, with an assumed tone of infallibility, "that the saints do pray for men, that it is profitable to invoke them, and to have recourse to their prayers and assistance." And further, hurling an anathema on those who say, "that their relics and sepulchres ought not to be honoured."

Truly, Satan is "Prince of the Power of the Air," for his delusions spread wherever there is air for man to breathe. Ask the Jew, the Chinese, the Romanist, why he lifts up unholy hands in prayer to the dead, "intruding into those things which he hath not seen?" The Jew will appeal to the Talmud, the Chinese to some Antediluvian lawgiver, the Romanist to tradition and the Church, as authorities for the practice, and perhaps they are all equally successful in the appeal. But might not an intelligent child point out a primary authority, whence these authorities derive all their information and all their power,—namely, the natural heart "led captive by Satan at his will," the fleshly mind which puffs up with vanity the poor children of darkness, ignorant of or despising, "the ONE Mediator between God and Man?"

THE SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT.

It gives us great pleasure to lay before our readers a spirited historical account of that act hallowed in the recollection of Scottish Christians, the signing of the Solemn League and Covenant. The account is taken from a recently published work containing much valuable information, entitled, "The Life and Times of Alexander Henderson," by the Rev. John Aiton, Minister of Dolphinton. The narrative is as follows:—

"Wednesday the 28th day of February, 1638, was a proud day for Henderson, and one of the most memorable mentioned in the history of that period. By this time the Presbyterians had crowded to Edinburgh to the number of sixty thousand; and, to give all solemnity to the occasion, a fast had been appointed to be held in the Church of the Greyfriars. All were astir by the morning's dawn; the Commissioners of Barons were early met, and about half-past eight, Rothes and Loudon joined them.

"It was agreed, that 'all the rest of the barons and gentlemen that wer in toune sould meitt in the Greyfreer Kirk, be two hours in the afternoon, whar Rothes and Loudon sould meitt with them,' to sign the Covenant. This union, the great pillar of strength to the cause, having been thus effected with perfect harmony amid a world of difficulties, was the occasion of vast joy to all concerned.

"Long before the appointed hour, the venerable Church of the Greyfriars, and the large open space around it, were filled with Presbyterians from every quarter of Scotland. At two o'clock, Rothes, Loudon, Henderson, Dickson, and Johnston, arrived with a copy of the Covenant, ready for signature. Henderson constituted the meeting by prayer, 'very powerfullie and pertinentlie' to the purpose in hand. Loudon then, in an impressive speech, stated the occasion of their meeting. After mentioning that the courtiers had done every thing in their power to effect a division among the Presbyterians, and when thus weakened to introduce innovation, and that they should therefore use every lawful means for keeping themselves together in a common cause, he said, that in a former period, when Papal darkness was enlightened only from the flaming faggot of the martyr's stake, the first Reformers swore in Covenant to maintain the most blessed word of God even unto the death. In a later period, when apprehensions were entertained of the restoration of Popery, King James, the nobles, and people throughout every parish, subscribed another Covenant, as a test of their religious principles. The Covenant, now about to be read, had a similar object in view, and had been agreed to by the Commissioners. In conclusion, he, in their name, solemnly took the Searcher of Hearts to witness, that they intended neither dishonour to God, nor disloyalty to the King. The Covenant was next read by Johnston, 'out of a fair parchment, about an elne squair.' When the reading was finished, there was a pause and silence still as death. Rothes broke it, by requesting that if any one of them had objections to offer, he would now be heard. They were told, that if these objectors were of the south and west country, they should repair to the west end of the Kirk, where Loudon and Dickson would reason with them; but if they belonged to the Lothians, or to the country north of the Forth, they were to go to the east end, where he and Henderson would give them every satisfaction. 'Feu comes, and these feu proposed but feu doubts, which were soon resolved.' These preliminaries occupied till about four o'clock, when the venerable Earl of Sutherland stepped forward, and put the first name to the memorable document. Sir Andrew Murray, minister of Ebdy, in Fife, was the second who subscribed. After it had gone the round of the whole Church, it was taken out to be signed by the crowd in the churchyard. Here it was spread before them like another roll of the prophets, upon a flat grave-stone, to be read and subscribed by as many as could get near it. Many, in addition to their name, wrote, till death, and some even opened a vein, and subscribed with their blood. The immense sheet in a short time became so much crowded with names on both sides throughout its whole space, that there was not room left for a single additional signature. Even the margin was scrawled over; and as the document filled up, the subscribers seem to have been limited to the initial letters of their name. Zeal in the cause of Christ, and courage for the liberties of Scotland, warmed every breast. Joy was mingled with the expression of some, and the voice of shouting arose from a few. But by far the greater portion were deeply impressed with very different feelings. Most of them, of all sorts, wept bitterly for their defection from the Lord. And in testimony of his sincerity, every one confirmed his subscription by a solemn oath. With groans, and tears streaming down their faces, they all lifted up their right hands at once. When this awful appeal was made to the Searcher of Hearts, at the day of judgment, so great was the fear of again breaking this Covenant, that thousands of arms which had never trembled even when drawing the sword on the eve of battle, were now loosened at every joint. After the oath had been administered, the people were powerfully enjoined to begin their personal reformation. At the conclusion, every body seemed to feel that a great measure of the divine presence had accompanied the solemnities of the day, and with their hearts much comforted and strengthened for every duty, the enormous crowd retired about nine o'clock at night. Well, indeed, might Henderson boast, in his reply to the Aberdeen doctors, 'that this was the day of the Lord's power, wherein we saw his people most willingly offer themselves in multitudes, like the dew-drops of the morning—this was indeed the great day of Israel, wherein the arm of the Lord was revealed—the day of the Redeemer's strength, on which the princes of the people assembled to swear their allegiance to the King of kings.'

"Next day, 1st of March, some of the leading Presbyterians went to Tailor's Hall, where the ministers who had more recently come to town were met. Here again the doubts of every one were stated with freedom, and after having been removed by arguments similar to those already detailed, about three hundred of the clergy added their names. The Covenant was next carried round the city, and signed by many who could not attend the day before. On this occasion, it is said that a multitude of women and children followed it weeping and praying. Some of the nobles took a copy with them wherever they went, and solicited the subscription of those whom they met. On the Friday, a copy for signature was transmitted to every shire, bailiery, and parish. In the country, it was everywhere received as a sacred oracle. Much more than was necessary has been said on both sides, in an angry spirit of controversy, about children being allowed to subscribe. In answer to these imputations, Rothes expressly asserts, that only the hands of those who were admitted to the Sacrament were allowed to be put to the parchment. It has also been often asserted by the Court historians, and was complained of by the Marquis of Hamilton, that coercive measures were used to procure names; and that several who refused at Glasgow, St Andrews, and Lanark, were not only threatened, but beat into compliance. It cannot be denied, that some who had the management of the subscriptions in the country carried their preposterous zeal too far—that non-conforming ministers, who after exhortation still refused to subscribe, were 'dismayed' by Presbyterians—and that even personal compulsion was resorted to in some instances. In fact, both Rothes and Baillie lament that their good cause had been thus hurt by ungodly violence. But it is by no means true, that these disorders were encouraged by the leaders, or that they were even exercised to any considerable extent. The testimony of Rothes, Henderson, and Baillie, is surely conclusive on this point. All classes of the community were admitted, and public notaries were at hand to act for those who could not write; but so far from the unwilling being forced to subscribe, they were not, even after consenting, admitted to enjoy the privilege. Every body was not allowed to come forward. No distinction was made in point of rank or circumstances, but there was in respect of character and conviction. Some men, says Henderson, of no small note, offered their subscription, and were refused, till time should prove that they joined from love to the cause, and not from the fear of men. No threatenings were used, except those of divine judgment; nor force, except that of reason. The matter was so holy, says Rothes, that they held it to be irreligious to use wicked means for advancing so good a work. Baillie says, that they had no remedy for such unhappy grievances, till the law was made patent. 'I was present,' says Livingstone, 'at Lanark, and several other parishes, when on Sabbath, after the forenoon's sermon, the Covenant was read and sworn, and I may truly say, that in all my lifetime, excepting at the Kirk of Shotts, I never saw such motions from the Spirit of God. All the people generally and most willingly concurred. I have seen more than a thousand persons all at once lifting up their hands, and the tears falling down from their eyes; so that through the whole land, excepting the professed Papists, and some few who adhered to the prelates, people universally entered into the Covenant of God.' The writer of the Edinburgh Collections not only bears testimony in similar terms to the manner in which the Covenant was signed and sworn in the Greyfriars and College Kirks of Edinburgh, but he asserts that, on Sunday the 28th April, the Communion was solemnly given to the people in these two kirks, according as it was given before the Assembly at Perth, after twenty years interruption. The same writer states, that there were about this time many Jesuits in Scotland, who laboured by argument and gold to make converts. One of them, called Abernethy, made an open recantation in the Greyfriars Church. On the day following that on which the Jesuit was converted, Lindsay, a minister from the north, who had long refused to subscribe the Covenant, preached in the same church. In the end of his sermon, he declared that for a long time he was in a great wrestling with the doubts of his own conscience; thereafter calling sundry times with fervent prayer to God to resolve his mind, he at length got resolution to his conscience to yield and subscribe, which he did. And he stated in his sermon, that since his subscription, he had such comfort in his mind as he was not able to express, and that for all the earth he would not turn back. All this he declared with tears in his eyes, attesting God for the verity of it, to the great consolation of all who heard him."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Christian Light.—There is a spirit of light and knowledge flows from Jesus Christ into the souls of believers, that acquaints them with "the mysteries of the kingdom of God," which cannot otherwise be known. And this spirit of knowledge is withal a spirit "of holiness;" for purity and holiness are likewise signified by this "light." He removed that huge dark body of sin that was betwixt us and the Father, and eclipsed Him from us. The light of his countenance "sanctifieth by truth;" it is a light that hath heat with it, and hath influence upon the affections, warms them towards God and divine things. This darkness here, is indeed the shadow of death, and they that are without Christ, are said, till he visit them, "to sit in darkness and in the shadow of death," Luke i. 79; so, this "Light is life," John i. 4; it doth enlighten and enliven, begets new actions and motions in the soul. The right notion that a man hath of things as they are, works upon him, and stirs him accordingly, thus this light discovers a man to himself, and lets him see his own natural filthiness, makes him loathe himself, and fly from himself,—run out of himself. And the excellency he sees in God and his Son Jesus Christ, by this new light, inflames his heart with their love, fills him with estimation of the Lord Jesus, and makes the world, and all things in it that he esteemed before, base and mean in his eyes. Then, from this light arise “spiritual joy and comfort,” which are frequently signified by this expression, as in that verse of the Psalmist, (the latter clause expounds the former,) “Light is sown for the righteous, and joy for the upright in heart!” Psal. xvii. 11. As this “kingdom of God’s dear Son,” that is, this kingdom of “light,” hath righteousness in it, so it hath “peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.” Rom. xiv. 17. It is a false prejudice the world hath taken up against religion, that it is a sour melancholy thing; there is no truly lightsome and comfortable life but it. All others, have they what they will, live in darkness; and is not that truly sad and comfortless? Would you think it a pleasant life, though you had fine clothes, and good diet, never to see the sun, but still to be kept in a dungeon with them? Thus are they who live in worldly honour and plenty, but still without God; they are in continual darkness with all their enjoyments.

It is true, the light of believers is not here perfect, and therefore neither is their joy perfect; it is sometimes overclouded; but the comfort is this, that it is an everlasting light, it shall never go out in darkness, as it is said, in Job xviii. 5, “the light of the wicked shall;” and it shall within a while be perfected; there is a bright morning without a cloud that shall arise. The saints have not only light to lead them in their journey, but much purer light at home, “an inheritance in light.” Col. i. 12. The land where their inheritance lieth is full of light, and their inheritance itself is light; for the vision of God for ever is that inheritance. That city hath no need of the sun, nor of the moon, to shine in it, for “the glory of the Lord doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.” Rev. xxi. 23. As we said, that uncreated Light is the happiness of the soul, the beginnings of it are our happiness begun; they are beams of it sent from above, to lead us to the fountain and fulness of it. “With Thee,” says David, “is the fountain of life, and in Thy light shall we see light.” Psal. xxxvi. 9.—LEIGHTON.

Effects of Faith.—If I look into the Gospel glass, my looking is a figure of my faith; for unless I look I can neither see Christ nor myself. When I look, what do I see? Christ crucified, and God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself. My eyes, my soul, are fascinated with wonder and solemn delight. My heart melts, my eyes overflow; my head is as water while I look on Him whom I have pierced. The burden of guilt gently unlooses and rolls into his quiet sepulchre, and the peace of God calms all the tumult of my breast. For a season, I am so engaged in the contemplation of the heavenly vision, that I have no leisure to consider myself; but at length I catch a glimpse of my own countenance and image. I recognise the same features, but how wonderfully are they changed; what a spirit is lighted up in these faded eyes! Peace is enthroned on the brow so lately wrinkled by care—celestial splendours play upon my temples—all my gaping wounds are healed, and not a scar is left behind. My tattered filthy rags are exchanged for a robe made white in the blood of the lamb. Immortal vigour braces every nerve, I tread in air, and Abba, Father, bursts spontaneously from my loving heart.—MELVILLE HOANE.

The prayer of all should be, “Lord Jesus, as thou hast got death, and him that hath the power of death, under thy feet, even so, Lord, put them under ours.”—ROMAINE.

Man’s Disease, and the Gospel Remedy.—Man, in his original state, was the object of the kind regards of the Supreme Being—he knew and loved his Creator—he was innocent, obedient, and happy. His state and character were in perfect harmony, and calculated to perpetuate each other. His intellectual and moral faculties were in complete unison. He was good and he was happy—and his goodness and happiness were plainly fitted, by their re-acton, to secure an indefinite progress in both. “How is the gold become dim—how is the pure gold changed!” Man the sinner, is the object of the righteous displeasure of the Moral Governor of the world. He misconceives the true character of God, and hates him—he violates his law, and renders himself miserable. Guilt, ignorance, error, depravity, misery—these are the leading characteristics of man in his present state. These circumstances bear the same relation to each other that their opposites did in the primeval state. Ignorance, and error, and depravity lead to guilt. Guilt perpetuates and increases ignorance, error, and depravity; and all work together with a fearfully systematic regularity and certainty of result, in sinking man in a bottomless pit of degradation and wretchedness. The machinery of man’s constitution remains, in a great measure at least, unaltered, but it has got under a malignant influence—and works as steadily and powerfully in destroying, as under a happier influence it would have done in perfecting his moral nature.

If these views are correct, it follows, of course, that there must be system and order in any dispensation, or series of dispensations, which has for its object the restoration of human nature,—there must be something, which, according to the laws of the divine moral government, shall lay a foundation for a change of man’s relations in reference to the supreme Being—there must be something, which, according to the laws of the human constitution, will effect a complete transformation of the character—and these, whatever they may be, may be expected to have a close connection. The Bible is substantially a revelation of such a restorative dispensation,—an account of the way in which ignorant, guilty, depraved, miserable man may, in a consistency with the perfections of the divine character, and the principles of his own constitution, be forgiven, and be made truly wise, and good, and happy for ever. In that revelation which contains a detail of those divine dispensations, which have the restoration of man for their object, we are led to anticipate, and we do not anticipate in vain, certain grand principles which bind together what, at first view, may appear unconnected statements, and give a character of consistent regularity to the whole.—REV. JOHN BROWN.

Edification.—I read in a learned Physician, how our provident mother, Nature, foreseeing men (her wanton children), would be tampering with the edge-tools of minerals, hid them far from them in the bowels of the earth, whereas she exposed plants and herbs more obvious to their eye, as fitter for their use. But some bold empiricks, neglecting the latter (as too common), have adventured on those hidden minerals, oftentimes (through want of skill), to the hurt of many, and hazard of more.

God, in the New Testament, hath placed all historical and practical matter (needful for Christians to know and believe), in the beginning of the Gospel. All such truths lie above ground, plainly visible, in the literal sense. The prophetic and difficult part comes in the close. But though the Testament was written in Greek, too many read it like Hebrew, beginning at the end thereof. How many trouble themselves about the Revelation, who might be better busied in plain Divinity! Safer prescribing to others, and practising in themselves positive piety, leaving such mystical minerals to men of more judgment to prepare them.

SACRED POETRY.

THE DEATH OF THE RIGHTEOUS.

How fair and how lovely it is to behold
The sun in its splendour approaching the west!
Its race is near run, and, refulgent as gold,
It glides through the ether, as hastening to rest.
It sinks—but in sinking 'tis only to rise,
Its splendour and glory afresh to display;
It sets—but in other and far distant skies,
It rises and reigns in the brightness of day.
Yet far more resplendent than this is the scene
Of the good man approaching the confines of time,
All loving, all peaceful, all calm and serene,
He passes away with a brightness sublime.
He dies—but no pencil can ever display
The splendour and glory that burst on his sight,
As, guided by angels, he speeds on his way,
Through the portals of praise to the temple of light.

MISSIONS.

Light for the dreary vales
Of ice-bound Labrador!
Where the frost-king breathes on the slippery sails,
And the mariner wakes no more;
Lift high the lamp that never fails,
To that dark and sterile shore.
Light for the forest child!
An outcast though he be,
From the haunts where the sun of his childhood smiled,
And the country of the free;
Pour the hope of Heaven o'er his desert wild,
For what home on earth has he?
Light for the hills of Greece!
Light for that trampled clime,
Where the rage of the spoiler refused to cease
Ere it wrecked the boast of time;
*If the Moslem hath dealt the gift of peace,
Can ye grudge your boon sublime?*
Light on the Hindoo shed!
On the maddening idol-train,
The flame of the suttee is dire and red,
And the fakir faints with pain,
And the dying moan on their cheerless bed,
By the Ganges laved in vain.
Light for the Persian sky!
The sophy's wisdom fades,
And the pearls of Ormus are poor to buy
Armour when Death invades;
Hark! hark!—'tis the sainted Martyr's sigh
From Ararat's mournful shades.
Light for the Burman vales!
For the islands of the sea!
For the coast where the slave-ship fills its sails
With sighs of agony,
And her kidnapped babes the mother wails
'Neath the lone banana tree!
Light for the ancient race
Exiled from Zion's rest!
Homeless they roam from place to place,
Benighted and oppressed;
They shudder at Sinai's fearful base;
Guide them to Calvary's breast.
Light for the darkened earth!
Ye blessed, its beams who shed,
Shrink not, till the day-spring hath its birth,
Till, wherever the footstep of man doth tread
Salvation's banner, spread broadly forth,
Shall gild the dream of the cradle-bed,
And clear the tomb
From its lingering gloom,
For the aged to rest his wearied head.

THE BLIND GIRL TO HER MOTHER.

MOTHER, they say the stars are bright,
And the broad Heavens are blue—
I dream of them by day and night,
And think them all like you.
I cannot touch the distant skies,
The stars ne'er speak to me—
Yet their sweet images arise,
And blend with thoughts of thee.
I know not why, but oft I dream,
Of the far land of bliss;
And when I hear thy voice, I deem,
That Heaven is like to this.
When my sad heart to thine is pressed,
My follies are forgiven,
Sweet pleasure warms my beating breast,
And this I say is Heaven.
O, Mother, will the God above
Forgive my faults like thee?
Will He bestow such care and love
On a blind thing like me?
Dear Mother, leave me not alone!
Go with me, when I die—
Lead thy blind daughter to the throne,
And stay in yonder sky.

Jerusalem.—We have viewed Jerusalem from different stations, have walked around it, and within it, and have stood on the mount of Olives, with Josephus' description of it in our hands, trying to discover the hills and valleys as laid down by him, near 1800 years ago; and after all our research, we compare Jerusalem to a beautiful person, whom we have not seen for many years, and who has passed through a great variety of changes and misfortunes, which have caused the rose on her cheeks to fade, her flesh to consume away, and her skin to become dry and withered, and have covered her face with the wrinkles of age; but who still retains some general features, by which we recognise her as the person who used to be the delight of the circle in which she moved. Such is the present appearance of this Holy City, which was once "the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth."—PLINY FISK.

THOUGHTS ON THE DEATH OF THE RIGHTEOUS.

BY THE REV. JOHN A. WALLACE,

CONSTITUTED as this world is, the true believer cannot remain here, and at the same time be completely happy. He may have undergone a most decided change of mind, through the regenerating influence of God's Holy Spirit;—he may have escaped in a great measure from corruptions, by which, at a former period, he was held in a state of the most galling bondage;—and, through the power of a vigorous faith, he may have gained many signal victories over the world, and the flesh, and the devil;—and by these means, the highest principles of Christianity may have been brought to a state of great maturity within him; but still, it is quite clear, that no succession of victories which it is possible for him to gain, and no degree of advancement which it is possible for him to reach, can exempt him altogether from the manifold evils which are incident to this present state of existence. Even though his faith should be as strong and as steadfast as it has ever been in the case of the noblest Christian, there will, nevertheless, be much in his own experience to convince him, that this is not his rest; that his heaven is not to be found on this side of the grave; that the consummation of his peace is to be reserved for the perfection of a loftier and a holier world. Indeed, it is one of the great laws of Christianity, that just in proportion to his progress in the path of holiness, will be the clearness of his perception in regard to the evil and hateful-ness of sin. Thus, the man who is the most distinguished Christian, who has risen to the highest and the holiest walks of the Christian life, and reached to the remotest distance from the vanities and the pollutions of the world, and breathed most freely of the spirit of heaven, is just the man, who, of all others, is the most sensitively alive to its intolerable abominations. And were he to be doomed to live for ever in the present world, and at the same time, to be perpetually advancing in the graces of the Holy Spirit, it would be to him a state of the most galling and insupportable bondage. Hence, we hear of an ancient saint exclaiming, amid the darkness of an ancient dispensation,—“I would not live always, for my days are vanity;” nay, rising superior to the horrors of death and the grave, “For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and not for another, though my reins be consumed within me.” Words these which are followed up by the language of the noblest apostle, under a clearer and a more glorious dispensation. “Oh wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death:” “For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate me from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.” In fact, there can be no relief for the Christian but a complete change of scene, as well as a complete change of nature. He must not only be regenerated in the spirit of his mind, but he must be taken away from the evil of the present world. Therefore, there is a breaking down of the mortal tabernacle,—a separation of the spiritual from the material,—a disruption of the soul from the body, that the one may return straightway unto God who gave it, and the other be purified in the grave for the glories of a new and endless life.

Behold, then, the righteous man and the merciful conflicting with the troubles of this mortal state—harassed, and tempted, and dispirited—toiling amidst the storm, and crouching beneath the agonies of death, and let your prayers and your sympathies be his. But behold him with his eyes closed, lying in his loneliness on the bed of death, sleeping in Jesus; and rejoice ye with exceeding joy. For the man truly hath gone to his rest. His day of trial, and of conflict, and of suffering, is past for ever. Even the frail and mortal body—the occasion of so much anxiety—the instrument of so much sin, is ransomed from all its troubles; and though sad be the transition through which it is destined to pass, that nevertheless is the cause of no annoyance to the spirit itself. The spirit hath left it to its rest, “in the sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection from the dead.” And the spirit itself, freed from the gross impediments of its material tenement, hath returned unto God, and is walking onwards, and within the veil, and without interruption, and everlastingly, in its own uprightness.

How magnificent the prospect to every true believer! To think of the independence of the immortal and imperishable spirit—its capacity for thought and for enjoyment, even when the tabernacle in which it once lived, and acted, and breathed, is wasting away and perishing in the dust—the vital energy of a spirit that needs no refreshment and no repose any more for ever! How vivid the light which it throws over the gloom and the desolations of the grave! And how glorious the transition from the body resting in the grave, as if it were purifying itself from its corruptions, and reposing in peacefulness after all the toils of its mortal conflict—the transition from the body, to the untired and untiring spirit, escaped from its fetters, ransomed from its pollutions, walking onwards for ever in its uprightness!

In penning these thoughts, we cannot refrain from adverting to a very solemn and most affecting dispensation of divine Providence, to which our attention has been lately called, and which ought to make a very deep impression on the mind of every one. We refer to the death—the sudden death of one of the brightest and the most illustrious ornaments of the Church of Christ—one of the most eminent and distinguished men of God—a man, certainly, of whom it may be truly said, that he hath entered into peace, that he is now resting on his bed, that he is walking in his uprightness.

Is there a man in Scotland, whose spirit does not thrill with emotion at the mention of the name of M'Crrie—the Historian of the Reformers of Italy and of Spain—the Historian of the Martyrs of Scotland—the Historian of the immortal Knox—a man who, in his day and generation, has done the mightiest service to the cause of the Reformation—to the cause of the Church of Christ?

His memory deserves to be held in sweet and fragrant remembrance in the spirit of every patriot—of every member of the Church—of every man of God. That man of high and masculine intellect, who had been drinking deeply into the spirit of the martyrs, and ennobling his mind with the philosophy of history, and commanding universal admiration by the mastery of his genius, the independence of his principles, and the strength, and the sterling worth, and the high honour of his character—that man, on whose lips, so late as the Lord's day previous to his decease, his own devoted flock were hanging with the liveliest interest, as he was discoursing to them of the great realities of an eternal world, and who, two days after, was walking abroad amid the light of day—that man, with all his greatness, and with all his accomplishments, is now gone from us, like a shadow that declineth. God looked upon him in the strength of his manhood, in the maturity of his character, in the glory of his renown. He passed by him as he was walking by the way. He touched him with his hand. And in the lapse of a few hours, the fashion of his countenance was changed—the light of his keen eye quenched—the thoughts of his bright intellect had perished—his family, his brethren, his flock, were all left behind—his labours in the cause of the Reformation were interrupted—his station in the Church of Christ was abandoned—the place of his own sanctuary left desolate—and, mighty and matchless as he was, behold him now, stretched out upon his bed, amid the stillness and the helplessness of death.

Oh, Death! thou art a mighty conqueror—Thou destroyest the hopes of man—Thou respectest not the persons of any—Thou preyest upon the strongest and the healthiest of the sons of men—And beneath thy sceptre, the most admired and the best beloved are arrested, cut down, and withered. But the dust alone of the mortal and the material tabernacle is thine. The spirit is beyond thy power—the spirit is free—the spirit returneth unto God!

Oh, Christianity! at the grave where the mighty are fallen, thy glory is most glorious of all—Thou revivest the hope which death seemed to have destroyed—Thou pourest the balm of consolation into the heart which death seemed to have broken—Thou watchest over the dust which death seemed to have claimed as his own—Thou walkest in thy majesty over the silent and the solitary domain of the grave, marking and numbering the dead that are in the Lord, shedding the radiance of a soft and tranquillizing light over all that land, though else it were but the land of darkness, as of Darkness itself; and crying with the voice of a conqueror, mightier than the King of Terrors, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast forth her dead." "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: Oh death! I will be thy plagues! Oh grave! I will be thy destruction!"—"Blessed then are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth, yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works do follow them." Until the day of Christ they shall "rest in their beds, each one walking in his uprightness." And then "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, shall the dead be raised, and this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality, and then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, 'Death is swallowed up in victory.'"

A PASTOR'S SKETCHES.*

No. I.

(*Memoir of John J*****, a Christian Peasant.*)

I HAD not been many days admitted to my charge as minister of a parish not far from Edinburgh, when the name of John J—— was read out in Church as "in great distress, and desiring to be remembered in prayer."

* The reason for withholding the name in all articles of this nature must be obvious; and we are sure that our readers will not perceive such authentic sketches with less interest, because they are presented in an anonymous form.—Ed.

Receiving this as an intimation that a visit from his parish minister would not be unwelcome, I went next day to his cottage, and found him laid in an enclosed bed, where, on first entering from the clear light of day, he was but dimly visible. The first sound of his voice was enough to awaken an interest in him. He spoke in a soft and placid tone, and his words were in the language of Canaan. As my eye gradually adapted itself to the light of the cottage, I perceived by and by an old man, verging upon fourscore years. His tremulous frame showed that the hand of God had smitten him with palsy, while his countenance reflected the expression of an inward serenity and benevolence. Having been paralytic for three long years, he met every repeated stroke of his disease as the messenger of death, and at the time I saw him, he conceived that his departure was at hand. Yet the prospect excited in him no disquietude or dismay, and his blessed composure, as soon became apparent, was not the effect of stupor or insensibility, but of that precious faith in Christ, who hath overcome death, and who alone can deliver men from the fear of death. Having learned, during our conversation, that he had passed many sleepless days and nights, I asked him how he occupied his thoughts the while? "In meditating on his Word," was his reply. "On what part of Scripture have you more recently been meditating?"—"On the sixth and seventh of John's Gospel—a part of Scripture which I have often found very comfortable." These chapters he had perfectly committed to memory, as well as many other favourite passages, and when unable to read, was wont to recal them, to nourish and refresh his soul. After repeating a few of those verses with a propriety and simple pathos, which marked beyond the possibility of mistake his relish of the Truth, he said, "That is a comfortable Scripture. I have often been instructed and comforted by it in the night seasons."

The secret of its happy influence upon his heart was soon explained. "For," said he, "I make a point, in reading or remembering Scripture, to take every word as from the mouth of Christ; this fills up the gap between the dead letter and the living Author, so that it comes with greater power and preciousness to the heart." This observation struck me as indicative of great simplicity and strength of faith in his own mind, and as supplying a most useful hint to every one for the more impressive and profitable reading of the Word of God. I do not doubt, but that every man who is taught of God, and reads the Bible in the exercise of a true faith, will, like this good old man, more or less closely to connect divine truth with its divine Author. But it must be feared, also, that many set themselves to read their evening and morning portion in the closet or family, without being careful to bring God near while they read, or bearing solemnly in mind that it is God who speaks to them. As many as complain that the Scripture has little power over their conduct, and little preciousness to their hearts, will find, if they inquire, that their experience is to be referred to this cause; and the man who will adopt the method of this simple peasant, and "make a point" of hearing the voice of Christ in every command, and invitation, and promise of the written Word, will find himself bound by its commands, encouraged by its invitations, and comforted and refreshed by its exceeding great and precious promises. It was no doubt owing to this truly Christian exercise of mind, that, as this man told me, and often repeated to the praise of God's love and faithfulness, "he was never left without something to comfort him." He found no full and unfulfilling consolation in meditating on God's Word, that those sleepless nights, which are so often the subject of complaining among the old and infirm, were to him seasons of positive enjoyment. "I enjoy wanting sleep," said he to me on one occasion, "for when I doze, my thoughts wander, and are unprofitable.

But when I cannot sleep, I can think; and it is never but some word is given me to comfort me."

From my first interview with this humble Christian, I felt strongly drawn to him; and as his advanced age and shattered frame precluded all hope that I should know him long, I left him with the purpose of soon repeating my visit.

After a brief interval, accordingly, I went back to his cottage, and found that the violence of his disease had passed away. He was now seated by the fire, in his wooden chair, a fir table at his side, and his Bible, his constant companion and counsellor, laid upon it. His conversation on this and other occasions, has escaped my memory. I remember well, however, it was always such as to evince, that his devotion was not like that of some who may be met with confined to a sick or dying bed, but the fixed habit of his renewed nature.

Though he was not given to speak of himself, but would have dwelt continually on the Scriptures, their gracious Author, and his great dependence on them for occupation to his mind, and encouragement to his hope, I became acquainted by degrees with his simple history. He was born in the parish where he lived and died. In his eleventh year he was left an orphan, and was received into the house and service of an uncle, who appears to have been a man of piety, and attentive to the Christian education of his children and household. From this early period, John received no more schooling. He continued in his uncle's house till his seventeenth year, when he left it for another service, which, as the country phrase goes, "promised to do more for him." In this humble capacity he spent his life, and, like a man of unambitious and contented mind, made very few changes in the course of it, his terms of service being ten, or thirteen, or seventeen years. Indeed he said to me, that he never was in the place in which he was not comfortable. And why should his experience in this respect be so widely different from that of thousands and tens of thousands in the present day, who are "given to change," who find nothing right, and none who use them well, go where they will, and who fit from one service to another, in the vain hope of "bettering themselves?" The cause was not in his condition, but in his disposition. He possessed a humble mind. He had learned, in whatever state he was, "therewith to be content." "It is no every thing that puts John about," said one of his neighbours. Another, in somewhat peculiar, but expressive phrase, said of him, "He is a contented piece of flesh." This disposition might, to some degree, be the gift of nature, but in the beautiful and blissful extent in which it reigned in his bosom, it was the result of Christian principle, the fruit of his filial confidence, and of his heavenly hope.

From various little circumstances which he mentioned to me, I have reason to believe that his mind had been brought under the influence of Christianity in early life. He told me, indeed, "he did not remember the time when he was without the fear of God." How far it was allowed its just practical influence upon him through life, I am not able to determine. I remember one or two little incidents of his early life, which he repeated to me, and which, if they exhibit the deficient power of right and conscientious principle, serve at the same time to evince the presence and operation of grace in his soul. On one occasion, he broke through a garden hedge to steal gooseberries, but ere he had completed his transgression, conscience resumed its power, and he drew back his hand already stretched out to the tempting bush. His own words were, "restraining grace held my hand, and I went back the way I came without touching a berry." Men who estimate sin by its visible effects rather than by the sanctity of the law it violates, or the majesty of the Lawgiver on whose authority it tramples, may be apt to ascribe the feelings of this good man for his deliverance from this sin to a weak or scrupulous conscience. But if ever the Spirit of God visit their hearts as a spirit of conviction, and lead them to see sin in its own intrinsic odiousness, they will feel that it is only the fool who can mock at any sin, however little, and that deliverance from any act of that deceitful and ensnaring evil which seduces the transgressor from bad to worse, till he fall into ruin, is, indeed, the cause of thanksgiving to God, through whom we stand. St Augustine, whose youth was spent in ungodliness, but whose age was happily as signally eminent for Christian character, dwells with frequent and bitter expressions of penitential sorrow upon the very sin for his preservation from which this man gave God the praise. If the sin, as committed, sowed the seed of such grief and bitter regret, not less, surely, ought preservation from it, as remembered, to be made the cause of gratitude and praise.

Another instance of the sins of his youth I may mention, for the sake of shewing how unhappy he was in sinning. A companion of his being about to leave the parish on the Lord's day, he was prevailed on to accompany him into an inn by the way-side to take a parting glass. He had no sooner yielded to solicitation, however, than he was filled with remorse and shame. "I could not look the people in the face whom I met going to church, I was so ashamed," said he, and from that day to the last hour of his life, he steadily avoided all such profanation of the Lord's day. It is, alas! but too evident, that in our day such conduct is not so feared or shunned by multitudes of both sexes. The suburbs of our cities are thronged with young people, who spend great part of their Sabbaths in the taverns, and who meet the returning worshippers unabashed. Alas! their steps take hold on hell. They stand on the brink of a steep and dangerous descent, and are ready to fall into deepest ruin. O that they had more of that tender watchful conscience which would give them no rest until they were recovered out of the snare of the devil. O that they had more of that resolved purpose, which would embolden them to say to all who would seduce them to such profanation of the holy Sabbath,—“Depart from me, ye wicked men, for I will keep the commandments of God.”

While it appears from the incidents just mentioned, that this man feared the Lord from his youth, I am disposed to think, that his years of trouble, the last four years of his earthly life, were the season of his most signal progress in the life of grace. During this time, he was relieved from labour—his sole occupation was reading the Scriptures, and storing his mind with their precious truths; and indeed I have seldom seen a man, who might with so much truth have adopted the words of the Psalmist, “O how love I thy law, it is my meditation all the day.” When he began to speak on this theme, it was as the letting out of water. An allusion to a Scripture text often gave occasion to the repetition of an entire chapter, with a propriety, and pathos, and unction which only a deep experimental sense of its meaning and preciousness could produce. And indeed, there was a consistency and a finish about his simple character, which shewed that the Gospel had come to him not in word only, but in power, and that his whole man was cast into and formed upon its pure and elevating truths.

During his last illness, he exhibited a fine instance of the triumph of faith over the severities of bodily pain, and the terrors of approaching death. Though he suffered much, there did not one word of complaining escape him. On one occasion, his wife said to him, “You seem to suffer greatly;” he replied, “But I suffer not from the hand of man; when I suffer much, much comfort comes on the back of it, for the hand of my friend in heaven is laid upon me, and strikes (strokes) my wounds.” In speaking to me of his losses and afflictions in his family, he at once appeared to lose sight and feeling of them; and with tremulous, yet triumphant accents, exclaimed, “Children die—friends die—comforts die—I die; but the Lord liveth, and blessed be my rock, and let the God of my salvation be exalted.” Speaking to me of his poverty, I said to him, “You, John, know what this means; I know thy poverty, but thou art rich.”—“Yes,” said he, “and it is all through Him, who, though rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we, through His poverty, might be rich.” Speaking of his prospects, he assumed the language of the apostle. “I know that when the earthly house of this tabernacle shall be dissolved, I have a building of God, eternal in the heavens;” and as if catching the spirit of triumph from the expression of his confidence, he proceeded to give utterance to it in these other words of Paul, “O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!” I asked him if he used this language to express his own experience, he said, “he did.”—“Like Paul, then, you must be willing to depart?”—“Yes, Sir, to tell you my mind, I am at this moment more willing to depart and leave the world, than I was ever willing or anxious about anything in the world; for, blessed be His name, He has reconciled himself to me as my Saviour and my friend, and why should I desire to linger here?” This blessed confidence was not the feeling of the moment, strong when death seemed distant, feeble when it drew near. It was the unshaken, and almost uninterrupted state of his mind. One morning when I asked him how he felt, he answered, “I am wading among thorns and briars; but there is light above, and soon shall I see face to face, and shall behold His glory.” But though he had an hour of conflict, he had not one moment of distrust or terror. Even in the depth of his trouble, he held fast his confidence and hope. Another morning, he said to me, “I have had a sweet visit from my Lord.” I asked him to explain it, but he said, “I cannot, it is not lawful for me to utter it.” While he lay in this state of assured confidence and joyful hope, the gable of his house fell down, and threw the family into great consternation. Notwithstanding of his great nervous debility, he felt no disquiet or alarm. “We need na fear,” said he to his wife, who was much flurried by the accident,—“we need na fear, we are under the shadow of the Almighty.”—“Ye hae strong confidence, John,” said she. “Na,” Mally, said he, “I hae a stronger tower.” It is not easy to find, as it appears to me, a more beautiful specimen of the self-renouncing spirit of the Christian than this language manifests. It is as if he had said, don't admire my fortitude; consider rather who sustains and protects us, and wonder rather it is not greater both in you and me. In this state of mind he continued to the end. “How poor would I be to-day,” said he, on one of the last days of his life, “without Christ. Blessed be He who has revealed his glorious Gospel to me.” I shall not soon forget the last articulate words I heard him speak. On my asking him once again the ground of his hope for eternity, he summoned up his little remaining strength to a last effort, and his voice swelling into animation and pathos, which gave a character of sublime and most melting eloquence to his words, he replied, “Christ is my hope, I have no righteousness of my own; blessed be He, for the fountain opened in his blood. On Him I depend for my salvation. Through Him I look for justification at the Father's judgment-seat. From Him I trust to have a place among the spirits of the just in the New Jerusalem, where I shall sing for ever and for ever the new song, ‘Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive honour and blessing, and glory and praise.’”

On the morning of this day, as his wife informed me, he had asked the day of the week. On his being told it was Friday, he said, “Then I hae now but two days and little more to suffer, before I shall be at rest.” It fell out according to his presentiment. On the evening of the Sabbath, John entered into rest. “Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace.”

REMARKS ON ISAIAH, CHAPTER XVIII.

The following exposition is taken from the elaborate Dissertation of Bishop Horsley, the finest specimen perhaps extant, of profound and sagacious Scripture criticism. Instead of the Bishop's own translation of the chapter, excellent as it is, we prefer giving the authorized version, as it stands in our common Bibles, only arranging it in lines, according to the manner of Hebrew poetry. In the first verse, we change "Woe to" into "Ho!" a change justified in the notes. In the second verse, we omit the word "saying," which our translators have supplied, printing it as usual in italics, to shew that it is not in the original. In the same verse, as well as in the last verse, instead of "a nation meted out," we say, with Bishop Horsley, "a nation expecting, expecting." And in the fourth verse, instead of "I will consider in my dwelling-place," we adopt, as more correct, the rendering suggested by our translators themselves in the margin, "I will regard my set dwelling-place," "I will cast my eye upon my prepared habitation."—Horsley. In these slight variations, we adhere to the text of the authorized version.

1. Ho! Land shadowing with wings, which art beyond the rivers of Ethiopia,
  2. That sendest ambassadors by the sea
Even in vessels of bulrushes upon the waters!
Go, ye swift messengers,
To a nation scattered and peeled,
To a people terrible [or wonderful] from their beginning hitherto,
A nation expecting, expecting, and trodden down,
Whose land rivers have spoiled.
  3. All ye inhabitants of the world, and dwellers on the earth,
See ye, when He lifteth up an ensign on the mountains,
And when He bloweth a trumpet, hear ye.
  4. For thus the Lord [Jehovah] said unto me,
"I will take my rest (and yet I will regard my set dwelling-place)
Like a clear heat upon herbs, [or, just before lighting,]
Like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest."
  5. For afore the harvest, when the bud is perfect,
And the sour grape is ripening in the flower,
He shall both cut off the sprigs with pruning-hooks,
And take away and cut down the [useless] branches.
  6. They shall be left together unto the fowls of the mountains
And to the beasts of the earth;
And the fowls [birds of prey] shall summer upon them, [it, i. e., God's dwelling-place, v. 4.]
And all the beasts of the earth shall winter upon them.
  7. In that time shall the present be brought Unto the Lord [Jehovah] of Hosts;
[The present] of a people scattered and peeled,
Even of a people terrible from their beginning hitherto,
A nation expecting, expecting, and trodden under foot, Whose land rivers have spoiled—[shall be brought]
To the place of the name of the Lord of Hosts, Mount Zion.
- "It has been assumed by most interpreters, 1st, that the principal matter of this prophecy is a woe, or judgment; 2dly, that the object of this woe is the land of Egypt itself, or some of the contiguous countries; 3dly, that the time of the execution of the judgment was at hand, when the prophecy was delivered.

"I set out with considering every one of these assumptions as doubtful; and the conclusion, to which my investigations bring me, is, that every one of them is false. First, the prophecy indeed predicts some woeful judgment. But the principal matter of the prophecy is not judgment, but mercy; a gracious promise of the final restoration of the Israelites. Secondly, the prophesy has no respect to Egypt, or any of the contiguous countries. What has been applied to Egypt is a description of some people, or another, destined to be principal instruments in the hand of Providence, in the great work of the resettlement of the Jews in the Holy Land; a description of that people, by characters by which they will be evidently known, when the time arrives. Thirdly, the time for the completion of the prophecy was very remote, when it was delivered, and is yet future; being indeed the season of the Second Advent of our Lord."

Ver. 1. "Ho" land.—"Many interpreters render the exclamation by 'Wo to'—But the particle is not necessarily comminatory. Sometimes it is an exclamation of surprise; and very often it simply calls persons at a distance: and so it is to be taken here."

"Shadowing with wings."—"The shadow of wings is a very usual image in the prophetic language, for protection afforded by the stronger to the weak. God's protection of his servants is described by their being safe under the shadow of his wings. And in this passage the broad shadowing wings may be intended to characterise some great people who should be famous for the protection they should give to those whom they received into their alliance."

"Beyond the rivers of Ethiopia."—"The land of Cush in holy writ (commonly rendered Ethiopia) is properly that district of Arabia where the sons of Cush first settled. But as this race multiplied exceedingly, and spread, not only into other parts of Arabia, but eastward, round the head of the Persian Gulf, to the confines of Susiana; and westward, across the Arabian Gulf, into the region since called Abyssinia; the land of Cush is often taken more largely. The rivers of Cush in this place, may be either the Euphrates and the Tigris on the east, or the Nile, and its adjacent streams on the west. But which of these are meant, it must be left for time to shew."

Ver. 2. "That sendest ambassadors by the sea."—"Messengers in this place, in the English, might be better than ambassadors; for the original word may be taken for persons employed between nation and nation, for the purposes either of negotiation or commerce."

"In vessels of bulrushes."—"Navigable vessels are certainly meant; and if it could be proved, that Egypt is the country spoken to, these vessels of bulrushes might be understood literally of the light skiffs, made of that material, and used by the Egyptians upon the Nile. But if the country spoken to be distant from Egypt, vessels of bulrush are only used as an apt image, on account of their levity, for quick-sailing vessels of any material. The country, therefore, to which the prophet calls, is characterised as one, which in the days of the completion of this prophecy, should be a great maritime and commercial power, forming remote alliances, making distant voyages to all parts of the world with expedition and security, and in the habit of affording protection to their friends and allies. Where this country is to be found is not otherwise said, than that it will be remote from Judea, and with respect to that country, beyond the Cushean streams."

"Go, ye swift messengers."—"The word 'saying' has been inserted in our public translation, and many others of a late date, upon a supposition that the words which follow, 'Go, ye swift messengers,' &c. are a command given by the people, called to in the first verse, to messengers sent by them. But it should rather seem, that the command to the swift messengers is the prophet's command, that is God's command by the prophet; and that the swift messengers to whom the command is given, are the very people called upon in the first verse; who by their skill in navigation, and their perpetual voyages to distant parts were qualified to be swift carriers of the message. First, the prophet calls upon this people; he summons them to attend to him; then he declares for what immediate purpose they are summoned, viz. to be the carriers of a message."

"To a nation scattered and peeled."—"The first participle, 'scattered,' or 'dragged away,' may be applied to a people forcibly torn from their country, and carried into captivity. And the second, 'peeled,' or 'plucked,' may be applied to a people plundered of their wealth, and stripped of their power. Or, as the word is sometimes used for the plucking of the hair of the beard in contumely, it may be applied figuratively to a depressed people, treated every where with insult and indignity. Thus both these participles may be more naturally applied to the Jews in their present condition, than to any other nation of any other time."

"To a people terrible from their beginning hitherto."—"To a people terrible,' &c.—'to wit, the Jews,' says the annotator in the English Geneva Bible, 'who, because of God's plagues, made all other nations afraid of the like; as God threatened.' The word, if I mistake not, is applicable to whatever excites admiration or awe. And the people of the Jews have been from their very beginning, are at this day, and will be to the end of time, a people venerable in a religious sense, awfully remarkable, on account of the special providence visibly attending them."

"A nation meted out and trodden down," "or literally rendered, according to the ancient translations, 'A nation expecting, expecting, and trodden down.' Now, are not the Jews, I would ask, in their present state, a nation 'expecting, expecting, and trampled under foot?' still without end expecting their Messiah, who came so many ages since, and everywhere trampled under foot, held in subjection, and generally treated with contempt? And is not this likely to be their character and condition till their conversion shall take place?"

"Whose land the rivers have spoiled."—"Rivers,' i. e. the armies of conquerors, which long since have spoiled the land of the Jews. The inundation of rivers is a frequent image in the prophetic style for the ravages of armies of foreign invaders. (Isaiah, viii. 7, 8.)

"Thus it appears that the description of the people to whom the swift messengers are sent, agrees most accurately in every particular with the character and condition of the dispersed Jews, a nation dragged away from its proper seat, and plucked of its wealth and power; a people wonderful, from the beginning to this very time, for the special providence which ever has attended them, and directed their fortunes; a nation still lingering in expectation of the Messiah, who so long since came, and was rejected by them, and now is coming again in glory; a nation universally trampled under foot; whose land, 'rivers,' armies of foreign invaders, the Assyrians, Babylonians, Syromacedonians, Romans, Saracens, and Turks, have overrun and depopulated.

"We have now heard messengers summoned; we have heard a command given to them to go swiftly with the message; we have heard the people described to whom the message was to be carried. It might be expected we should next hear the message given to the messengers in precise terms. But in prophecy, the curtain (if the expression may be allowed) is often suddenly dropped upon the action that is going on before it is finished, and the subject is continued in a shifted scene, as it were, of vision. In the present instance, the scene of messengers sent upon a message is suddenly closed with this second verse, before the messengers set out, before even the message is given to them. But the new objects which are immediately brought in view evidently represent under the usual emblems of sacred prophecy, other parts of the same entire action, and declare with the greatest perspicuity the purport, the season, and the effect of the message. An ensign or standard is lifted up on the mountains; a trumpet is blown on the hills: the standard of the cross of Christ; the trumpet of the Gospel. The resort to the standard, the effect of the summons, in the end will be universal. A pruning of the vine shall take place after a long suspension of visible interpositions of Providence, just before the season of the gathering of the fruits. Fowls of prey and wild beasts shall take possession of Jehovah's dwelling-place. But at that very season, when the affairs of the church seem ruined and desperate, a sudden reverse shall take place. The people to whom the message is sent, shall be conducted in pomp, as a present to Jehovah, to the place of his name, to Mount Zion."

Ver. 3. "See ye—hear ye," or, "shall see—shall hear."—"The prophecy announces a display of God's power and providence which should be notorious to the whole world, and particularly, I think, alludes to a renewed preaching of the Gospel with great power and effect in the latter ages."

Ver. 4. "For thus the Lord," &c.—"This verse seems to describe a long suspension of the visible interpositions of God in the affairs of this world and in favour of his people; during which, however, his providence is not asleep; he is all the while regarding his set dwelling-place—i. e., Zion, directing every thing to the ultimate prosperity of his people, and to the universal establishment of true religion."

"The Lord takes his rest, like a clear heat upon herbs," or "a parching heat just before lightning."—"The stillness of that awful pause is described under the image of that torpid state of the atmosphere in hot weather which precedes a thunder-storm, when not a gleam of sunshine breaks for a moment through the sullen gloom; not a breath stirs; not a leaf wags; not a blade of grass is shaken; no rippling wave curls upon the sleeping surface of the waters; the black ponderous cloud covering the whole sky seems to hang fixed and motionless as an arch of stone, Nature seems benumbed in all her operations. The vigilance nevertheless of God's silent providence is represented under the image of his keeping his eye, while he thus sits still, upon his prepared habitation. The sudden eruption of judgment threatened in the next verse, after this total cessation, just before the final call to Jew and Gentile, answers to the storms of thunder and lightning which, in the suffocating heats of the latter end of summer, succeed that perfect stillness and stagnation of the atmosphere. And as the natural thunder at such seasons is the welcome harbinger of refreshing and copious showers, so it appears the thunder of God's judgments will usher in the long desired season of the consummation of mercy. So accurate is the allusion in all its parts."

Ver. 5. "He shall cut off the sprigs, and take away the branches."—"These words express not simply sprigs and branches, but 'useless shoots,' 'luxuriant branches,' which bear no fruit, and weaken the plant; and properly such shoots and branches of a vine. A vine, in the prophetic language, is an image of the church of God; the branches of the vine are the members of the church; and the useless shoots and unfruitful luxuriant branches are the insincere nominal members of the church; and the pruning of such shoots and branches of the vine is the excision of such false hypocritical professors, at least the separation of them from the church by God's judgments. This verse therefore, and the following, clearly predict a judgment to fall upon the church for its purification, and the utter destruction of hypocritical professors of the truth.

"The time is fixed in the beginning of this verse, 'For afore the harvest,' &c. This pruning will immediately precede the harvest and the ingathering. The season of the harvest and of the gathering of the fruit is the prophetic image of that period, when our Lord will send forth his angels to gather his elect from the four winds of heaven; of that period, when a renewed preaching of the Gospel shall take place in all parts of the world, of which the conversion of the Jews will perhaps be the first effect.

Ver. 6. "They shall be left together," &c.—"That is, the shoots and branches cut off as unfruitful and useless shall be left."

"Summer upon them—winter upon them."—"The pronoun of the third person in the original is singular, 'it.' The true antecedent of this singular pronoun in the original is the word, 'my dwelling-place,' in verse 4; which dwelling-place may be understood literally of Mount Zion. It was a prevailing opinion in the primitive ages that Antichrist's last exploit would be, to fix his seat of empire on that holy spot, where he would ultimately perish."

Ver. 7. "In that time shall the present be brought," &c.—"In that time."—Immediately after this purgation of the church, at the very time when the bird of prey, with all the beasts of the earth, Antichrist with his rebel row, shall have fixed his seat between the seas, in the holy mountain, 'a present shall be brought,' &c. the nation, described in verse 2, as those to whom the swift messengers are sent, after their long infidelity, shall be brought as a present unto Jehovah. (Compare chap. lvi. 20.) They shall be converted to the acknowledgment of the truth, and they shall be brought to the place of the name of Jehovah, to Mount Zion; they shall be settled in peace and prosperity in the land of their original inheritance.

"This then is the sum of this prophecy, and the substance of the message sent to the people dragged about and plucked. That in the latter ages, after a long suspension of the visible interpositions of Providence, God, who all the while regards that dwelling-place, which he never will abandon, and is at all times directing the events of the world to the accomplishment of his own purposes of wisdom and mercy, immediately before the final gathering of his elect from the four winds of heaven, will purify his church by such signal judgments as shall rouse the attention of the whole world, and in the end strike all nations with religious awe. At this period the apostate faction will occupy the Holy Land. This faction will certainly be an instrument of those judgments by which the church will be purified. That purification therefore is not at all inconsistent with the seeming prosperity of the affairs of the atheistical confederacy; but after such duration as God shall see fit to allow to the plenitude of its power, the Jews converted to the faith of Christ will be unexpectedly restored to their ancient possessions.

"The swift messengers will certainly have a considerable share as instruments in the hand of God in the restoration of the chosen people. Otherwise, to what purpose are they called upon (verse 1) to receive their commission from the prophet? It will perhaps be some part of their business to afford the Jews the assistance and protection of their fleets. This seems to be insinuated in the imagery of the 1st verse. But the principal part they will have to act will be that of the carriers of God's message to his people. This character seems to describe some Christian country, where the prophecies relating to the latter ages will meet with particular attention; where the literal sense of those which promise the restoration of the Jewish people will be strenuously upheld; and where these will be so successfully expounded as to be the principal means, by God's blessing, of removing the veil from the hearts of the Israelites.

"Those who shall thus be the instruments of this blessed work, may well be described in the figured language of prophecy as the carriers of God's message to his people. The situation of the country destined to so high an office is not otherwise described in the prophecy than by this circumstance, that it is 'beyond the rivers of Cush:'—that is, far to the west of Judea, if these rivers of Cush are to be understood, as they have been generally understood, of the Nile and other Ethiopian rivers; far to the east, if of the Tigris and Euphrates. The one or the other they must denote, but which, is uncertain. It will be natural to ask, of what importance is this circumstance in the character of the country, which, if it be any thing, is a geographical character, and yet leaves the particular situation so much undetermined, that we know not in what quarter of the world to look for the country intended, whether in the East Indies, or in the western parts of Africa or Europe, or in America? I answer, that the full importance of this circumstance will not appear till the completion of the prophecy shall discover it. But it had, as I conceive, a temporary importance at the time of the delivery of the prophecy, namely, that it excluded Egypt.

"The Jews of Issiah's time, by a perverse policy, were upon all occasions courting the alliance of the Egyptians, in opposition to God's express injunctions by his prophets to the contrary. Issiah therefore, as if he would discourage the hope of aid from Egypt at any time, tells them that the foreign alliance which God prepares for them in the latter times, is not that of Egypt, which he teaches them at all times to renounce and to despise, but that of a country far remote; as every country must be that lies either west of the Nile or east of the Tigris."

DOGS IN EASTERN CITIES.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMESON,

It is scarcely possible for an European to form an idea of the intolerable nuisance occasioned in the villages and cities of the East, by the multitude of dogs that infest the streets. The natives, accustomed from their earliest years to the annoyance, come to be regardless of it; but to a stranger these creatures are the greatest plague to which he is subjected; for, as they are never allowed to enter a house, and do not constitute the property of any particular owner, they display none of those habits of which the domesticated species among us are found susceptible, and are destitute of all those social qualities which often render the dog the trusty and attached friend of man,—the lively companion,—the faithful guardian, and the favorite on every hearth. Instead of the gentle, attractive, and almost rational creature he appears to be among us, the race seems wholly to degenerate in the warm regions of the East, and to approximate to the character of beasts of prey, as in disposition they are ferocious, cunning, blood-thirsty, and possessed of the most insatiable voracity: and even in their very form, there is something repulsive; their sharp and savage features; their wolf-like eyes; their long hanging ears; their straight and pointed tails; their lank and emaciated forms, almost entirely without a belly, give them an appearance of wretchedness and degradation, that stands in sad contrast with the general condition and qualities of the breed in Europe. They are almost wholly outcasts from human habitations; and, consequently, in Asiatic countries, the beautiful traits of canine fidelity and attachment are altogether unknown. There the hand of man is seldom extended to offer the stroke or the morsel of kindness; and the creature that receives or snatches it from the unwilling hand, would, in a few hours after, if an opportunity offered, mangle and devour the corpse of his benefactor without the smallest repugnance. These hideous creatures, dreaded by the people for their ferocity, or avoided by them as useless and unclean, are obliged to prowl about everywhere in search of a precarious subsistence; and, as they have never been subjected to any discipline, and run generally in bands, their natural ferocity, inflamed by hunger, and the consciousness of strength, makes them the most troublesome and dangerous visitors to the stranger who unexpectedly finds himself in their neighbourhood, as they will not scruple to seize whatever he may have about him, and even in the event of his falling, and being otherwise defenceless, to attack and devour him. It is chiefly, however, at night, that these prowlers are the most formidable; for even those which lie during the heat of the day, lazy, inactive, and scarcely raising their head to growl at the passenger who may have chanced to trample on them, run about, whenever the shades begin to fall, and the inhabitants to disappear from the streets, and are so intolerable by their perpetual din, and their sudden and furious attacks, that it is an attempt never made without the greatest risk, to walk abroad at night, and without sufficient protection. This circumstance, which is frequently noticed by travellers in the East, may be illustrated by an incident described in a very lively manner by the French traveller Denon. It occurred on the day of his entry into Alexandria, when that city was stormed by the French in the late war, and having omitted to take with him some necessary articles of clothing, he had gone for that purpose to his ships, and was returning considerably later than he had anticipated to the city, which he found totally deserted; the stillness of midnight prevailing, and not a glimmer of light, but what was afforded by the stars and clear atmosphere of the climate. He had not proceeded far, when he was met by a troop of furious dogs, who attacked him from the streets, the doors and the low roofs of the houses, with so much ferocity, as almost to deprive him of the power of self-defence. No sooner had he passed the territory of these, than he was received by a fresh band of assailants, till at length, molested and wearied almost to death, he thought of taking a circuitous route along the suburbs of the city, by which, after climbing over walls, and wading a considerable depth into the river, he came, after the greatest fatigue, about midnight to one of the French sentinels, convinced that dogs are one of the greatest pests of an Oriental city. Chateaubriand, speaking of Galata, near Constantinople, says, that "the almost total want of women, the want of wheel-carriages, and the multitude of dogs without masters, were the three distinguishing features of the city;" and Le Bruyn, describing another Eastern city, says, "great numbers of dogs crowd the streets; they do not belong to any one, but either get their food as they can, or are supported by the charitable, who give money to bakers and butchers to feed them, and even leave legacies for that purpose." In ancient times, they seem to have been no less a nuisance than they are to the modern cities of the East; for we find the sacred writers making several allusions to the particulars now mentioned regarding the character and condition of dogs in terms so graphic, and so like what an observer of the present day might use, as to convey the impression, that the ancient inhabitants of Palestine witnessed the same spectacles, and were subjected to the same molestations, as are found still to exist in all the towns and villages throughout the East. Thus, the Psalmist, (Psalm lix. 14, 15,) "at evening they return, and make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city; they wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied." In the 22d psalm, in which he gives a prophetic description of the sufferings of Messiah, he uses these expressions: "dogs have compassed me; the assembly of the wicked have enclosed me;"—aptly representing, under the image of a band of ferocious dogs attacking a defenceless passenger, the proceedings of the insolent and infuriated multitude, who insisted for the crucifixion of Jesus. To the same features in the character of Eastern dogs, allusion is made in the following passage from Isaiah:—"The watchmen of Israel are blind; they are ignorant; they are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark, sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber: yea, they are greedy dogs, which can never have enough." Under this figurative language the prophet described the indolence, unfitness, and rapacity of the prophets and teachers of his corrupt age; the application of his bold metaphors may easily be made by help of the statements already given, of the disposition and habits of the dog in Eastern countries; but he has included one additional circumstance that remains to be noticed to complete the description of the Oriental breed. He calls them "dumb dogs; they cannot bark;" and this, too, is in exact accordance with what is found to be the case still; for travellers, who have attended to this point, inform us, that the canine species degenerate so much in hot countries, that in a short time they lose their voice and cannot bark, so that they either make a hideous melancholy howl, or, as in some places, become altogether dumb. These animals, driven by hunger, greedily devour every thing that comes in their way; they glut themselves with the most putrid and loathsome substances that are thrown about the cities, and of nothing are they so fond as of human flesh; a repast, with which the barbarity of the despotic countries of Asia too frequently supplies them, as the bodies of criminals slain there for murder, treason, or violence, are seldom buried, and lie exposed till the mangled fragments are carried off by the dogs. Many travellers in the East mention their having met with such disgusting spectacles, and Bruce, in particular, describes the streets of Gondar, the capital of Abyssinia, as strewn with pieces of carcases, and that he was rendered miserable at seeing his own hungry dogs, twice let loose through the carelessness of his servants, and bringing off the heads and arms of slaughtered men into the court-yard to eat them at leisure. With these circumstances in our knowledge, we cannot be surprised at those parts of the Sacred History which describe the readiness of the dogs to lick up the blood of the much injured Naboth; or at the wretched fate of the royal accomplices in this murder; with one of whom, the atrocious Jezebel, the dogs had been so busy, that when the messenger came to bury her corpse, "they found no more of her than the skull and the feet, and the palms of her hands." And we are enabled to judge also of the severity of the divine judgment upon the guilty and impenitent nations of old, when the Almighty threatened to visit them, among other terrible scourges, with multitudes of furious and ravenous dogs:—"I will appoint over them four kinds, saith the Lord; the sword to slay, and the dogs to tear, and the fowls of heaven, and the beasts of the earth, to devour and destroy." (Jer. xv. 3.)

The unsocial and disgusting propensities which the dog exhibits, together with the general state in which he lives as a wandering outcast, have made him be regarded, in all ages, by the people of the East, with the greatest aversion and contempt; and hence, one of the strongest terms which they can ever employ towards one whom they hold in little or no estimation, is, to call him a dog. Various examples of this occur in the course of the Sacred History. "Am I a dog," said the Philistine champion to David, "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" alluding to the defences with which people are obliged to furnish themselves against the attacks of these furious animals. "After whom," said David, wishing to express his own insig-

• In a more settled and advanced state of Eastern society, more attention is paid to the domestication of the dog, and the owners shew him acts of kindness. Thus, in the Gospel history, we read of the dogs being fed with the crumbs that fell from their master's table; a circumstance, which, while it indicates a higher status as occupied by the dog at that period, is probably to be accounted for by the custom of the ancients not using a linen cover for their tables; but merely rubbing them with a wet sponge, and after eating, cleansing their hands with the soft parts of the bread, instead of a towel. So that the crumbs used for this purpose, or dropped by the guests on the table, were reserved as the portion of the dogs. Perhaps, too, the graphic circumstance introduced into the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, of the dogs licking the sores of the beggar, is to be interpreted rather of the private and well-fed pack of Dives, than of a ravenous band, whom the feeble arm of the aged and diseased mendicant would have been ill able to keep at bay.

nificance as an enemy of Saul,—“after whom is the king of Israel come out? After whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog?” Mephibosheth, by way of expressing his own humility, and thereby magnifying the liberality of king David towards him, said, “What is thy servant, that thou shouldst look upon such a dead dog as I am?” Abner, when accused of an odious crime by his master, Ishbosheth, made this indignant reply:—“Am I a dog’s head, that thou chargest me to-day with a fault concerning this woman; i. e., am I the head, the foremost and most headstrong of a band of grovelling dogs, that thou treatest me so?” Hazael, too, when informed by the sorrowing prophet of the dreadful cruelties he would perpetrate on the land of Israel, when he ascended the throne of Syria, the haughty soldier indignantly repelled them as an imputation on his honour. “But, what, is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?”

Before bringing this article to a close, one other circumstance in the natural history of the dog, though not peculiar to the Oriental species, may be mentioned as illustrating an interesting passage of Scripture. It is well known that dogs, when about to quench their thirst, do not, with slow and deliberate caution, stoop down upon their knees, but continue in a standing posture, and, merely stretching out their neck to the surface of the water, “lap, by forming the end of their tongue into the shape of a hollow spoon, by means of which, they lave or throw up the water with the greatest expedition into their mouth.” The power of imitating this rapid mode of quenching thirst, was, as every reader of the Bible knows, the test by which the elite of the Israelitish army was selected for the enterprise of Gideon. The reduction of his forces was intended as the trial of his faith, and as the vast multitude who obeyed his summons at first, comprised numbers unfit for a bold and daring enterprise, the manner in which the reduction was effected was admirably calculated to distinguish the active and intrepid, from those who were indolent and fond of ease. The Israelites seem to have had the same practice that still prevails among the wandering people of Asia and Africa, who, when, on a journey or in haste, they come to water, do not stoop down with deliberation on their knees, but stand, bending forward only as much as is necessary to bring their hand in contact with the stream, and throw it up with such celerity and address, that they do not drop a particle, although the hand never touches the lips. The sound made by this action strongly resembles the lapping of a dog; and thirst is allayed in this manner far sooner than by any other. “I frequently attempted,” says Mr Campbell, “to imitate this practice, but never succeeded, always spilling the water on my clothes, or some part of my face, instead of the mouth;” and another traveller, who several times made the same experiment with a company of Arabs, says, that his companions were always done almost before he had commenced. Those of the Israelites, therefore, who quenched their thirst in this rapid manner, shewed themselves to be fit for a work that required expedition; and the rest were dismissed according to the divine direction. Gideon with his select band began his midnight march to the enemy’s quarters, and to the execution of that ingenious stratagem, which, by the favour of heaven, was the means of achieving one of the most splendid victories that Israel ever gained over their numerous enemies.

• In the New Testament, the word occurs also in the same metaphorical sense, and is applied either to those who were not the descendants of Abraham, and heirs of the promise, or to persons of grossly impious, immoral, and unworthy characters. It is used in the first sense in this passage: “It is not meet to take the children’s bread, and cast it to dogs.” It occurs in the second sense in the following passages: “Give not that which is holy unto the dogs.” (Matt. vii. 6.) “For without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolators, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie.” (Rev. xxii. 15.) “Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers.” (Phil. iii. 2.) The same epithet has continued to the present day to be used by Eastern people as a term of infamy and reproach. Two historical anecdotes may be mentioned as illustrative of this. “The Grecian dog,” was the usual title given by the Mahomedans to the Emperor of Constantinople, (Ottley’s Hist. of the Saracens,) and the letter of the famous Haroun-al-Raschid to the Emperor Nicephorus, was addressed to the Roman Dog, (Gibbon, vol. vii. p. 44.)

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, Minister of Craig.

“Who is a wise man endowed with knowledge among you? Let him shew, out of a good conversation, his works, with meekness of wisdom.”—JAMES, iii. 13.

“IN understanding be men,” says the Apostle Paul; and he is unworthy of the name of man who is contented to know nothing, and to remain on a level with the lower animals around him. Mankind, indeed, are in general sensible of the credit which belongs to wisdom and knowledge. Though they may not be so diligent as they ought in pursuing them, they are sufficiently desirous to appear to possess them. They will bear any reproach more easily than that of ignorance or stupidity; and many would choose rather to be blamed for a wicked action, than to be despised for a weak understanding. They look more, however, to the semblance than to the substance of wisdom. They are pleased with whatever gives them the appearance of a superior understanding. They are easily puffed up by a very small portion of knowledge. They are too frequently deceived by its counterfeits, or at least persuaded to pursue its least valuable branches. And especially do they fail to make a right use of the better knowledge which they may possess. Justly, then, does the apostle remind us in the text, of the character and influence of genuine wisdom: “Who is a wise man endowed with knowledge among you? Let him shew, out of a good conversation, his works, with meekness of wisdom.”

In Scripture language, the term “wisdom” ordinarily signifies the knowledge and fear of God, especially that enlightening of the mind which flows from the word and spirit of Christ; and the superior excellence of this wisdom may be well expressed in the words of Solomon, “Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man who getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold.” Soon may a little reflection satisfy every man, how justly this heavenly wisdom is proposed to us as the most precious of all, as alone worthy of the name of wisdom. And the more deeply to impress your minds with the importance and value of this exalted blessing, we propose to set before you, in the following discourse, a view of the salutary influence of this true wisdom as exhibited in the text.

Much of what is called wisdom and knowledge among men, can scarcely be said to have any influence at all; and very frequently all that can be said in its praise is merely this, that it is a more sedate species of amusement than men commonly pursue. But it may be that there is some difficulty in attaining it, and that every one is not able to make such an acquirement. Hence, it is esteemed by many as of no small value, because it exercises their faculties, ministers to their vanity, or plausibly occupies their time. Other kinds of wisdom and knowledge there are, which may be sufficiently applicable to practical purposes, and sufficiently useful for promoting the temporal interests of their possessor, but which have no salutary influence on the heart or conduct. Such kinds of wisdom may often be attained by the most worthless persons, and may sometimes render them only the more daring in their wickedness, and the more dangerous to their fellow-men. But it is the distinguishing character of the wisdom mentioned in the text, that it both produces good fruit for the use of others, and exerts a purifying influence on the heart where it dwells.

I. It leads to a "good conversation," or manner of life. Every man's manner of life may be considered as at once the evidence and the effect of his principles. It will generally be good or bad, according as he is influenced by heavenly or earthly wisdom. The smallest portion of divine knowledge, truly impressed upon the heart, will exert a greater influence upon the course of life, than all the stores of mere human learning,—while, on the other hand, many may be endowed with knowledge sufficient to manage the affairs of an empire, who yet have no rule over their own spirits, and no discretion to guide their own steps. Often, indeed, may we see the utter inefficacy of all human wisdom in renewing the soul itself, sadly demonstrated by the striking spectacle of men, who possess its highest attainments, rushing into the same madness of folly, and falling into the same depths of vice, as the most ignorant and stupid of their race. How little is the worth of that wisdom which makes a man wise for others, but not wise for himself; wise towards men, but not wise towards God; wise for this world, but a fool for the next; wise for the lowest, but a fool for the highest of his concerns! But it is at once the great excellence and good effect of the wisdom here mentioned, that it directs our manner of life now, so as to prepare us for a better life to come.

This is the truest wisdom and most useful knowledge. "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil, that is understanding." Thus, to depart from evil is the natural fruit of such wisdom, wherever it dwells. "When wisdom entereth into thine heart, and knowledge is pleasant to thy soul,"—"discretion shall preserve thee, understanding shall keep thee, to deliver thee from the way of the evil man."

Who, then, is a wise man, and endowed with knowledge, among you—who among you professes to put any value on this wisdom, or to cherish any portion of it in his heart? Let him shew, that he wishes to follow a good conversation, or manner of life. You are well assured, that the calling, with which you are called in the Gospel of Christ, is a "holy calling," and that the wisdom which cometh down from above is first pure—pure in its whole character and influence. For this end it cometh down, namely, to make us "free from the law of sin," and to purify "us unto God a peculiar people." Let every one, therefore, who seemeth to have this wisdom, or wishes to have it, feel his obligation "to cleanse himself from all filthiness of the flesh and of the spirit."—"Let your conversation always be as becometh the Gospel," and your conduct "as the children of God, blameless, harmless, and without rebuke." Let it never once enter into the imagination of your minds, that you truly possess any portion of heavenly wisdom, if it is not your full desire and endeavour to be "holy in all manner of conversation." Wherever there prevails a deliberate ungodliness of spirit, or unrighteousness of conduct, there is neither the "spirit of knowledge" nor "the wisdom of the just." No inconsistency can be greater, no delusion more fatal, than to suppose it possible for you to be guided by "the wisdom which is from above," while you shew not "a good conversation" or manner of life. But,

II. It leads to "good works;" let him shew out of a good conversation his works.

The wisdom and knowledge of which we are speaking, regulate the manner of life, not only by keeping their possessor from evil, but also by inclining him to good. He who is wise, ceases not only to be the servant of sin, but learns to become an "instrument of righteousness." He not only rejects what would be disgraceful and debasing in practice, but studies to be "full of mercy and of good fruits." He is not content with avoiding whatever would be offensive to his Maker, hurtful to his neighbour, or injurious to his own best interests; he strives, farther, to do what may be pleasing in the sight of God, profitable to man, purifying to his own spirit. This wisdom cometh, as we are repeatedly taught, not only that we may be "purified unto God," but be also "zealous of good works;" not only that we should be "blameless and harmless," but also "shine as lights" "in the world;" not only that, by "naming the name of Christ, we should depart from iniquity," but also that, by faithfully discharging every duty, we should "adorn his doctrine in all things." Thus the apostle prays for the Colossians, that they "might be filled with this knowledge in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, that they might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work." This is always the character of heavenly wisdom, the design for which it is bestowed, the effect which it is fitted to produce, the effect which it will, more or less, produce upon every one who is guided by its light. Not only will it lead you to shun evil, but also to do good; and whenever it is not the aim of any one to follow both these objects, then, unquestionably, he shews himself deficient in true wisdom and Christian knowledge. You may see a certain degree of these duties in different persons, but it is their union in the same soul which distinguishes the wise man. You may see an individual doing good works which are useful, generous, charitable; and you may be ready to say:

"this is a wise man and endowed with knowledge." But when you look again, you see in him a conversation that is not good, a manner of life which is disorderly and ungodly, and you are compelled to feel that true wisdom dwells not in his heart, that his wisdom, as saith the apostle, is "sensual, and not that which cometh from above;" that his works, therefore, must proceed from some lower principle, some lower view, some lower impulse, than what the knowledge of God would have inspired, and that, though the things themselves that he does are good, yet he is not good who does them. Again, you may see an individual, whose manner of life is good, quiet, orderly, inoffensive, and you may be ready to say, with the gladness of Christian charity, here is "a wise man and endowed with knowledge;" but when you look again, you see in him no readiness to shew good works; no desire to find out something for the honour of God or the good of man; no great willingness to do such things, even when presented to his mind and placed within his power; nothing in short of that benevolent alacrity, "by love to serve another," which distinguishes the true disciple; nothing but selfish considerations always uppermost, minding only his own ease and seeking only his own profit. You see with sorrow that wisdom is not there; that the mind has not yet been enlightened, nor the heart warmed by its heavenly beams; that the wisdom which such a one appeared to have is earthly, and not that which cometh from above; and that all his sobriety, decency, and regularity of life, must, therefore, flow from some other considerations than what the knowledge of God would have inspired. Who then is a wise man and endowed with knowledge among you? let him shew not only "a good conversation," or manner of life, but also out of that conversation or manner of life, as its natural accompaniment, let him bring forth, as he may find the ability and opportunity, "his works" of righteousness and mercy. Let him never forget "to do good and to communicate," knowing that "with such sacrifices God is well pleased." Knowing this, let him "neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of the Lord." Let him remember the word of that heavenly teacher, that "hereby only do we know that we know him if we keep His commandments;" and that "he who loveth not his brother," and sheweth not that love by doing him good, "knoweth not God."

III. It leads to "meekness," or gentleness. "The meekness of wisdom," that unassuming and unoffending deportment, which always becomes, and ought always to attend, true wisdom and superior knowledge. This expresses the temper and spirit in which all that is here recommended is to be prosecuted and practised. You are to study to shew a good manner "of life," and to abound in all "good works;" but in all this, to guard against every thing that could justly be accounted harsh, censorious, overbearing, or intolerant towards others. It is one of the most distinguishing features of "the wisdom from above," that it is "gentle, and easy to be intreated;" and it is the exhortation of Him "in whom dwelleth all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," "Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart." Always, then, must you keep in mind this essential mark of true wisdom, which is so very apt to be overlooked. You may, at times, see an individual, whose manner of life is good, and who is active also in good works; zealous for God, and not unfriendly towards men; and you may be ready to say with confidence, this is a "wise man, and endowed with knowledge." But you look again, and you discern few tokens of meekness and humility, but rather many symptoms of "strife and vain glory," of bitterness and envying, of perverse passion, and spiritual pride. You behold, with sad regret, that wisdom is not there, and that amidst all the doings of zeal for God, or benevolence towards man, there mingle other sentiments than what the knowledge of God should inspire.

"Who then is a wise man, and endowed with knowledge, among you?" Let him not only shew a good manner of life, and such good works as become the Gospel of Christ, but farther, let him study to do all these things in the spirit of the Gospel, and after the example of the Lord. Let him study to be gentle, "shewing meekness towards all men," and "remembering always what manner of spirit you should be of." Such a spirit is not only a duty in itself, a part of the Christian character, but is in a manner the appropriate dress in which every heavenly grace and good work should be arrayed. Thus, you are exhorted to associate this meekness with every form of well-doing; to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called with all lowliness and meekness; to "hear with meekness the ingrafted word;" to give a reason "of the hope that is in you with meekness;" to "restore one who is overtaken in a fault in the spirit of meekness;" in "meekness, to instruct those that oppose themselves." This is the way in which you are to shew or exercise your wisdom; and hence it is called "the meekness of wisdom," that which belongs to it as a property, which becomes it as an ornament, which proceeds from it as an effect, which proves it to be from above.

Observe then, in one view, these features and fruits of heavenly wisdom, and be assured, that no other deserves the name. It leads to a good conversation or manner of life, to good works or fruits of righteousness, to a spirit of meekness or Christian humility, as the Psalmist expresses it in one short sentence, "to depart from evil, to do good, and to seek peace;" or, as it is more fully described by this apostle, as "first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and of good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy." Keep ever in view this its true character, that you may not be deceived by any counterfeit in its place. Be not indeed, severe towards others, or desponding in spirit, because, both in them and in yourselves, this wisdom may bear about it, at the best, many marks of human infirmity. But though far from having fully attained or fancying yourselves perfect, see that you cordially approve this its true character, that you diligently seek it more and more in its purity, that you humbly follow it as your true glory to the end. "If any man lack this wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." If any man have this wisdom in any measure, let him shew it in its true features, and by its blessed fruits, as here described. And let him thus shew it, not for the praise of men, but for the good of men; not in the spirit of strife, but in all meekness; not as his merit before God, but as giving glory to God, the great father of lights, and growing in the likeness of Him, "in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," and who alone must be made to us of God, "wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." Amen.

SCRIPTURAL RESEARCHES,
No. I.

ON THE ORIGIN AND LANGUAGE OF THE EARLIEST NATIONS.

BY THE REV. JAMES ESDAILE,
Minister of the East Church, Perth.

"After their families, after their tongues, in their countries, and in their nations."—Gen. x. 20.

MANY authors have written on the connection between Sacred and Profane History, and most of them seem delighted when they can discover a coincidence, as if the Sacred Scriptures needed the support of heathen authority. The heathen authors scarcely pretend even to guess at the origin of nations, but content themselves with recording a few puerile fables, and unauthorized traditions. The Scriptures, on the other hand, state a few naked facts, which, scanty as they are, gather strength with extending knowledge, and throw light on the history of the world, and on the ways of Providence. In the remarks which I am now to make, I do not intend to adduce heathen authority in support of Scripture, but to shew that the Scriptures explain many facts well known in profane history, for which heathen authors have never attempted to account.

I propose, then, in the first place, to shew that the Hebrew language was more extensively diffused than any other ever spoken by man; and secondly, to account for this on Scripture authority.

Almost every body knows, that Hebrew was the language of Palestine, the vernacular tongue of the Jews, and it is embalmed and consecrated in the Old Testament Scriptures. From particular circumstances, it was preserved in its greatest purity among the Jews. We have an account of the interesting circumstances, which carried the father of the tribes of Israel, with his whole family and dependents, into the land of Egypt, where his descendants continued between two and three hundred years. Their mother tongue, during all this time, was preserved from fluctuation and innovation, by their distinct separation from the Egyptians, as they had a particular district allotted to them, where they followed the pastoral occupation of their ancestors, an employment despised by the Egyptians. After their deliverance from Egypt, they remained for forty years in the wilderness of Arabia, unmixed with the surrounding nations, with whom they were in constant hostility. During this period, a sacredness and stability were given to their language, by the writings of Moses, containing not only the religious ordinances which they were to observe, but the municipal laws by which they were to regulate their civil polity; and it is evident, that nothing can give such prevalence and permanence to language, as to make it the vehicle by which the laws are administered, and the services of religion performed.

But though the Hebrew was thus preserved in peculiar purity among the Jews, we shall commit a great mistake in imagining that it was peculiar to the Hebrew nation. It was the language of the Babylonians, of the Medes and Persians, of the subjects of the great King Ahasuerus, who reigned over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, from India, even unto Ethiopia. It was the language of Arabia, of Syria, of Phœnicia, of Egypt, and of Carthage. These assertions must be supported by proofs, and it will not be difficult to furnish them.

Every reader of Scripture is familiar with the history of the Jewish captivity, when Jerusalem was taken, its temple destroyed, and its inhabitants carried captive to Babylon, where the race continued for seventy years, when they were re-established in their own country by the order of Cyrus.

Now, the language of Babylon, during this period, was Chaldee, which differs from the Hebrew not more than the Doric or Ionic dialects differ from the parent Greek. A considerable part of the books of Daniel and Ezra, who were themselves among the captives at Babylon, are written in Chaldee, and present no difficulty whatever to a Hebrew scholar; and these are the only genuine specimens that remain of the language of the mighty Babylonish empire. We may perceive, then, that the Hebrew, which is identical with the Chaldee, though the least influential of all languages, on the literature of Europe, was nevertheless the language of one of the greatest empires whose names stand on the records of history.

But the Hebrew language did not merely extend to the borders of India, it extended as far westward as the Pillars of Hercules; always, however, keeping clear of Europe. Let us trace its vestiges over this extensive tract. The language of Syria, which bordered on the Babylonian, Median, and Persian empires on the west, was the same as the Chaldee, which we have seen to be a dialect of the Hebrew. Of this we have ample opportunities of judging, as there is a version of the Scriptures into Syriac, which though it may be considered as modern when compared with the fragments in Daniel and Ezra, is nevertheless sufficient to satisfy us that it is substantially the same as the ancient Chaldee, and both of them, of course, in the closest affinity with the Hebrew.

But this is not all; the language of the vast peninsula of Arabia, comprehending in ancient times many powerful states and kingdoms, is to this day substantially Hebrew. The Arabic is undoubtedly one of the oldest spoken languages,—I would be inclined to say, that it is absolutely the oldest spoken language—on the face of the earth. But this most ancient and venerable language is so thoroughly impregnated with Hebrew, that Parkhurst, the Hebrew lexicographer, has declared that the Arabic of the Alcoran is nothing but a compound of the different dialects of the Hebrew.

The Canaanites, the original occupants of Palestine, and the Phœnicians, who spread along the eastern margin of the Mediterranean, used the same language as the Jews; this is apparent from the history of Abraham and of his grandson Jacob, who sojourned for many years in the midst of these people, conversing freely with them, and migrating from place to place without any fixed local habitation, and without any interruption from difference of tongues. But I have said, that the Hebrew language extended, on the African side, as far as the Pillars of Hercules or Straits of Gibraltar. We find it, indeed, existing there at this day in a corrupted state, in the language of the Moors, which is chiefly Arabic. But it belonged in ancient times to a much more important, and more powerful people, who were the founders of Carthage, the rivals of Rome, and who fell in the death-struggle with that state, for the dominion of the Mediterranean, which would necessarily give to those who possessed it the supremacy among the nations of the world; for it is girdled by the finest and most fertile countries of Europe, Asia, and Africa, which must all have been at the mercy of the state which held the sceptre of the sea.

There are, indeed, no remains of Carthaginian literature to attest the language which was used by this people; but we have from other sources undoubted evidence that the language of Carthage was a dialect of the Hebrew: for the proper names of persons and places, mentioned by the classic authors, are all of Hebrew origin. Thus, the names Hamilcar, Hannibal, Asdrubal, Miberbal, &c. are pure Hebrew compounds, and convey to every Hebrew scholar a distinct signification. And what puts this matter beyond a doubt, is the circumstance of Plautus, the oldest comic writer of Rome, having introduced into one of his plays a sentence uttered by a Carthaginian slave, which the learned always regarded as unmeaning gibberish, to ridicule a barbarous tongue, till Bochart shewed that it was a distinct dialect of the Hebrew, and had a precise and appropriate meaning.

Thus have I endeavoured to trace the existence and prevalence of the Hebrew tongue, in one form or another, from the western boundaries of India, to the western limits of the Mediterranean. I believe it may appear strange to some, that a language now so little known should have had such an extensive influence in ancient times; and it shall now be my business to account for this state of things. The most obvious solution would appear to be, that all who spoke the same language must have proceeded from the same stock, and must have spread, in colonizing migrations, over the extensive territories which have been mentioned, carrying their language and their customs along with them.— Though we may be pretty sure that this conjecture is not far from the truth, yet it is desirable that it should be confirmed by unsuspected evidence, and by facts which may throw some light on the history of nations, and on the rise or decline of different states.

And it fortunately happens, that in regard to all the cases which I have mentioned, we have evidence, amounting to demonstration, for a solution of all the facts which I have adduced: though I must notice one obvious difficulty which presents itself in all inquiries of this kind; I mean, the confusion of tongues which took place at Babel; from which it is inferred, that it must be impossible to trace the original language of mankind. It is not essential to my argument to prove that the Hebrew is the original language of mankind, though there are very strong presumptions in favour of this opinion. And there is no necessity for supposing that the confusion produced at Babel was permanent: the object of the miracle was the dispersion of mankind, that they might fulfil the purpose for which they were created, which was to replenish the earth and subdue it: but this they had determined not to do: and having found what they reckoned an eligible situation, they said, "Let us build us a city and a tower—lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." Nothing could defeat this conspiracy against the purposes of Heaven more effectually than the confusion of tongues. As this was effected by a miracle, it would be worse than absurd to attempt an explanation of it; a miracle which can be explained on any principle of natural causes is no miracle at all, however extraordinary it may be in its appearances and results. But certainly, whatever diversities of language were introduced, there is no necessity for believing that the original language was abolished. Diversities sufficient to effect a complete dispersion, and relinquishment of the undertaking were produced; but the delightful spot on which they had pitched as their permanent residence was not to be relinquished; and it is probable that the party which remained there was composed of those who spoke what had been the common language of the human race, up to the time of the enterprise at Babel.

At all events, we are sure that Hebrew was the language spoken by Abraham, who was a native of Chaldea, and distinguished by the epithet of the Hebrew. He was the lineal descendant of Shem, one of the sons of Noah, and lived for a considerable time as his contemporary. It is likely, therefore, that Abraham spoke the language of Shem; and we may be sure that Shem spoke the language of his father Noah, and that Noah spoke the language of the Antediluvians, as it had descended from Adam.

But leaving these arguments for the primeval origin of the Hebrew language, let us endeavour to account for its prevalence over such extensive regions of the earth. We need not be surprised, then, that the Jews and Babylonians should speak the same language, when we find that Abraham, the father and founder of the Jewish nation, was a native of Ur of the Chaldees in the land of Babylon, and that he dwelt in Mesopotamia, the most fertile district of the Babylonian empire, till he was called to leave his kindred and his father's house, and go in search of the inheritance which God had promised, not to him but to his offspring. His children and their descendants, therefore, spoke the language of Chaldea, or Babylon, which was, in fact, the cradle of their race, though it afterwards proved a step-mother and oppressor. It was 400 years before the Israelites were fully established in the land promised to their fathers, which they were compelled to seize by force of arms, and were expressly commanded to root out its idolatrous inhabitants. Yet the people whose country they invaded, spoke essentially the same language with themselves, though they were from a different stock. No record in the world but one could throw any light on these circumstances. But in the 10th chapter of Genesis, we are told that all the different branches of the Canaanites who had taken possession of the land of Palestine, were the descendants of Canaan, the son of Ham, the son of Noah; whilst the Israelites were the lineal descendants of Shem, the brother of Ham. And as Shem and Ham undoubtedly spoke the language which they had learned from their father Noah, they as undoubtedly transmitted this language to their respective descendants, although this was the only link between them, their feelings being placed in determined and irreconcilable hostility.

On the same principle, and on the same authority, we can account for the Phœnicians, or Sidonians, speaking the same language with the Jews and the Canaanites, as they are the descendants of Sidon, the son of Canaan, and grandson of Ham, from whom they named their principal city Sidon, and were themselves first known among other nations by the name of Sidonians. Nothing could be more natural, than that the descendants of two brothers should speak the language common to their fathers; though in the case of their descendants, this language might be a little varied by local or accidental circumstances.

Having seen that the Babylonians, Canaanites, Jews, and Phœnicians spoke substantially the same language; and having shewn from the sacred record how easily this may be accounted for, we can have no difficulty in explaining how the Carthaginians, an afflicted race, should speak a kindred tongue. This could be accounted for even on heathen authority; for it is universally admitted, that Carthage was peopled by a colony of Phœnicians. The name Pœni, by which the Carthaginians are usually known, is a proof of this, it being universally understood to be the same as Phœni, which is the same as Phœnices.

The heathen authors, from that love of the marvellous, which made them disfigure the truth in order that they might produce effect, have treated us with a romantic story about the peopling of Carthage by a Phœnician colony under Queen Dido, who fled from Pygmalion, the murderer of her husband Sicheus, and with a number of faithful followers built the city of Carthage, and founded a state, which was for a long period the most formidable enemy of Rome. This story forms one of the most beautiful episodes in the Æneid. But we have no need of romance to account for the policy of an enterprising commercial people like the Phœnicians, in fixing on such a locality as Carthage for increasing their wealth and extending their influence. They were fully aware of the advantage of such situations as Tunis and Algiers for facilitating their commercial enterprises, and for giving them, in fact, the command of the trade of the Mediterranean. In the enterprising spirit of their Phœnician ancestors, the Carthaginians cast their eyes on Sicily, which brought them into immediate contact with the Romans, and led to a long series of desperate conflicts, which ended in the utter ruin of the Carthaginian power; insomuch, that the industry of man in modern times has not been able to discover where the rival of Rome, the mistress of the world, once stood.

It only remains to account for the introduction of the Hebrew language into Arabia. Sir W. Drummond, in his Origines, without any reference to the subject of language, states, that Arabia was peopled by the descendants of Ham. This can only be partially true. It would, however, sufficiently account for the Arabians speaking a language which was common to the sons of Noah.

But there is a distinct and simple statement in Scripture, which accounts in a most satisfactory manner for the use of the Hebrew language in Arabia. We read in Scripture, that when Ishmael was driven out along with his mother from the house of Abraham, on the birth of his son Isaac, he went into the desert, which must mean Arabia, as it is described as lying between Egypt and Assyria; and there founded, not only a sovereignty, but established no less than twelve dynasties, under his twelve sons, whose names are mentioned, and by which names, many of the districts in Arabia were afterwards distinguished, such as, Nebaioth, Kedar, Jetur, Dumah, &c. We read repeatedly in Scripture of the tents of Kedar; and some of the first heathen classics speak of Nebaioth, and Jetur or Itur. Ovid, in distributing the winds, refers to this Nebaioth, as a kingdom. And Virgil, in his Georgics, not only alludes to Itur, from whom the country of Iturea had its name, but to a distinguishing feature in the character of Ishmael, his father; and the Scripture says of Ishmael, the father of Itur, that "he went into the wilderness, and became an archer."

Here, then, we find a large part of Arabia peopled by the descendants of Abraham, who spoke the Hebrew language in its greatest purity. But this is not all; Esau, the grandson of Abraham, and a kind of outcast like Ishmael, established an independent sovereignty in Arabia, viz., the kingdom of Edom, or Idumea. The Scripture tells us, that Esau was also called Edom, and mentions eight kings descended from him, who governed the kingdom of Idumea. Need we wonder, then, at the prevalence of the Hebrew tongue in Arabia, when we find that the whole country was parcelled out into dynasties under the government of the descendants of Abraham the Hebrew? And I would farther observe, that the name of Edom explains the epithet of the Red Sea, which travellers have in vain puzzled themselves to explain. This sea was called the Idumean Sea, or the sea of Edom, and Edom in the Hebrew language means red. This is the true origin of the name, and all other explanations are futile and absurd.

Nay, the language of ancient Egypt, which has been so mystified by the hitherto inexplicable character in which it has been written, must have been originally the same as the Hebrew. This is obvious, on the admitted principle that cognate nations must have kindred tongues. Now, Egypt is repeatedly called in Scripture the land of Ham, and wherever the word Egypt occurs in any version of the Bible, the word in the original is always Misraim; and Misraim was the second son of Ham, who settled in Egypt, as his elder brother Cush did in part of Arabia, and his younger brother Canaan, in the land which bore his name. Thus, then, we see the whole of Asia Minor, Assyria, Media, Persia, Arabia, Palestine, Phœnicia, Egypt, and the north of Africa where it borders on the Mediterranean, all speaking dialects of the same tongue; whilst we find, in a record entirely above all suspicion, notices thrown out as it were by accident, and apparently of no interest whatever to the general reader, yet explaining what no other record can unriddle, and supplying a link to connect the present race of men with the first generations of the world.

A JEWISH MARRIAGE.

MR FRISK, an American Missionary, gives the following account of a marriage ceremony as celebrated among the Jews:—

"The gentlemen assembled in a large apartment, in reality the court, but now used as a parlour. We were seated on a divan at one end of the court, where the ceremony was to be performed. Near us stood a large wax candle, and from the ceiling were suspended seven chandeliers. Some of the candles were burning, though it was not dark. All the Orientals have a great fondness for burning lamps and candles in their places of worship, and on all religious occasions. At the opposite end of the court was a kind of gallery, where the bride was making preparation for the ceremony, and in front of which hung stripes of different coloured paper, red, pale red, and yellow, some of them covered with gold leaf. Now and then the bride shewed herself through the lattice or wooden net-work, which stood in front of the gallery. It reminded us of Solomon's Song, ii. 9, 'My beloved is like a roe, or a young hart; behold he standeth behind our wall, he looked forth at the windows, shewing himself through the lattice.'

"About five o'clock the high priest (Rabbi Mercado) and five other Rabbis came in, and took their seats on the divan, and the service soon commenced. First, the clerk and people repeated in Hebrew the eighteen Benedictions of the name of God. Then the high priest arose, and said, 'Blessed are they who dwell in thy House; they shall praise thee for ever.' The people responded, 'Blessed people whose God is the Lord.' After this the evening prayer was said, in which the name of God occurs eighteen times. Each time this name was repeated, the Rabbis shook and trembled. After this prayer the nuptial torch was lighted. It was a large wax candle, dividing itself into nine branches all of which were burning. This was carried up to the gallery of the ladies, where the bride was waiting, the bridegroom being all the time among the gentlemen below. Boys then began to beat on cymbals, and the bride was conducted down stairs, covered with a long white veil, preceded by three women with cymbals, and led by two others. Several women also followed her, one of whom occasionally uttered a shriek, which we at first supposed a shriek of distress, but were afterwards told it was an expression of joy. The whole court now wrung with cries, shouts, and the noise of the cymbals. The bride being led to the divan, the bridegroom took his place by her side, and both continued standing, while Rabbi Mercado, accompanied by the people, repeated the 45th Psalm, 'My heart is inditing a good matter,' &c. The Rabbi then took a cup of wine, and said, 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, who hast created the fruit of the vine.' The people responded, 'Blessed be He, and blessed be His name.' Rabbi. 'Blessed be thou, O Lord, who sanctifiest thy people by wedding and by marriage.' People. 'Blessed be He, and blessed be His name.'

"One of the Rabbis then took a ring and put it on the finger of the bridegroom, and then on the finger of the bride, and then gave it to the bridegroom, who placed it on the finger of his bride, saying, 'Verily, thou art espoused to me by this ring, according to the law of Moses and of Israel.' A large shawl was then thrown over the new married couple, and the Rabbi, twice giving them wine to drink, said, 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, who hast created all things for thy glory. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, who hast created man in thy likeness, and hast prepared for him and from him a house for ever and ever.' At the end of each sentence, the people responded, 'Blessed be He, and blessed be His name.' Rabbi. 'Rejoice, shout and be merry, thou barren. Thou wilt soon gather thy children about thee in joy. Blessed art thou, O Lord, thou that makest joyful Zion's children. Thou makest joyful with joy a lovely pair, as thou didst make joyful thy creature according to thy image in the garden of Eden of old. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who rejoicest bridegroom and bride! Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, who hast created rejoicing and joy, and also bridegroom and bride! The voice of love and affection, cordiality, peace and friendship, shall be speedily heard in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem; the voice of rejoicing and the voice of joy; the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride; the voice of shouting, and of wedding-days, and of marriage, and of feasting-days, and the voice of the music of the youth. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who makest joyful the bridegroom with the bride, and makest them prosper.'

"After this the bridegroom took the cup of wine and tasted it, and then gave to his spouse. Both of them continued standing during the whole service. Then the Rabbi said, 'Praise the Lord, for his mercy endureth for ever. Joys shall increase in Israel, and sorrows shall flee away, and it shall be for a good sign.' As the Jews present offered their congratulations to the bridegroom, they said, 'A good sign.' The nuptial torch was then extinguished, but immediately lighted again, and the bride was reconducted to her chamber by the women with the sound of cymbals.

"While the Rabbis were performing the service, some of the people attended to it with great devotion, but others were talking, laughing, and walking about the room. The Rabbis went through the service in the hurried, indistinct manner, which seems to pervade all religious services in the East."

Lawfulness of Amusements.—In judging of the innocence or immorality of prevalent amusements, you will do well to keep before your minds the three following questions as so many tests. 1. Can you make them the subject of believing prayer? Supposing you have ventured to engage in them, can you ask the blessing of God to accompany them, for your benefit? and on returning from them, perhaps at the hour of midnight, can you offer up thanks to him for having given you the opportunity of joining in them? If you cannot, be assured they are amusements which cannot endure the scrutiny of an enlightened conscience, or the eye of a holy God. 2. Can you indulge in them without having your religious feelings impaired or weakened? Can you return from them with an increased wish for the study of divine truths, and the enjoyment of devotional duties? Can you say, after ruminating on the impressions they have left on your hearts, that they have stimulated and strengthened your gracious affections and spiritual desires? If you cannot, you have reason to pause, to consider, and to ask yourselves whether or not you are "keeping yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life"—whether or not you are "seeking those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God." 3. Enquire farther whether the pursuit of them will afford you comfort in the immediate prospect of death. Will they help to assuage the sorrows of dissolution, and dissipate the gloom of the grave? Will they contribute to sustain the confidence, the courage, and the hope of the departing soul, and to embolden her approach upwards to the tribunal of the Judge? Or are they calculated rather to leave a sting in your awakened conscience, to plant a thorn in your dying pillow, and to cast an additional shade on the dark valley. Ah! my young friends, these are so many criteria by which you may judge of the character and tendency of fashionable amusements, and discover the duty and importance of "choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season."

I most readily grant that periods of relaxation are necessary to refresh and invigorate the powers of our minds. But it does not follow, that we are at liberty to fritter away valuable portions of time either in abject sloth or frivolous recreations. As moral beings accountable to God for the use to which we apply our passing hours, and awaiting an immortal existence beyond the skies, we should see whether there may not be found recreations that combine utility with relaxation. It is by no means necessary, as the popular notion is, that the change should be from an employment that is useful to one that is useless; but the object may be even better accomplished by a change that shall keep the mind still employed to advantage. If your ordinary employment is one that lays your faculties under severe contribution, that to which you resort for amusement ought undoubtedly to require but moderate mental exercise; and in cases of great exhaustion from intellectual effort, it may be proper to give the mind, for a season, an entire dispensation from the labour of connected thought. But in all ordinary cases, you will find that in unbending from severe exertion of mind, with reference to renewing that exertion with greater success, you need not yield to positive inaction, or occupy yourself with any thing that is trifling, but may still be doing something for the benefit of yourself or your fellow-creatures. If you regulate your amusements by a regard to this principle, you will find it a most effectual means of redeeming time, and will have the pleasure to reflect "that even your hours of relaxation are hours of usefulness."—MACINDOE.

The Love of Christ.—Comparisons can give but a very imperfect view of this love which passeth knowledge. Though we should suppose all the love of all the men that ever were, or shall be on the earth, and all the love of the angels in heaven, united in one heart, it would be but a cold heart to that which was pierced with the soldier's spear. The Jews saw but blood and water, but faith can discern a bright ocean of eternal love flowing out of these wounds. We may have some impression of the glory of it, by considering its effects. We should consider all the spiritual and eternal blessings, received by God's people for four thousand years before Christ was crucified, or that have been received since, or that will be received till the consummation of all things; all the deliverances from eternal misery; all the oceans of joy in heaven; the rivers of water of life, to be enjoyed to all eternity, by multitudes as the sand of the sea-shore—we should consider all these blessings as flowing from that love, that was displayed in the cross of Christ.—MACLAURIN.

SACRED POETRY.

ON MUNGO PARK'S FINDING A TUFT OF GREEN MOSS IN THE AFRICAN DESERT.

"WHATEVER way I turned, nothing appeared but danger and difficulty. I saw myself in the midst of a vast wilderness, in the depth of the rainy season, naked and alone, surrounded by savage animals, and men still more savage. I was five hundred miles from the nearest European settlement. At this moment, painful as my reflections were, the extraordinary beauty of a small moss in fructification irresistibly caught my eye. I mention this to show from what trifling circumstances the mind will sometimes derive consolation, for though the whole plant was not larger than the top of one of my fingers, I could not contemplate the delicate conformation of its roots, leaves and capsule, without admiration. Can that Being, thought I, who planted, watered and brought to perfection, in this obscure part of the world, a thing which appears of so small importance, look with unconcern upon the situation and sufferings of creatures formed after his own image? Surely not. I started up, and disregarding both hunger and fatigue, travelled forward assured that relief was at hand, and I was not disappointed."

THE sun had reached his mid-day height,
And poured down floods of burning light
On Afric's barren land;
No cloudy veil obscured the sky,
And the hot breeze that struggled by
Was filled with glowing sand.

No mighty rock appeared its head
To bless the wanderer with its shade
In all the weary plain;
No palm-trees with refreshing green
To glad the dazzled eye were seen,
But one wide sandy main.

Dauntless and daring was the mind
That left all home-born joys behind
These deserts to explore—
To trace the mighty Niger's course,
And find it bubbling from its source
In wilds untrod before.

And ah! shall we less daring shew,
Who nobler ends and motives know
Than ever heroes dream—
Who seek to lead the savage mind,
The precious fountain-head to find
Whence flows salvation's stream?

Let peril, nakedness and sword,
Hot barren lands, and despot's word
Our burning zeal oppose—
Yet, Martyn-like, we'll lift the voice,
Bidding the wilderness rejoice
And blossom as the rose.

Sad, faint and weary on the sand
Our traveller sat him down; his hand
Covered his burning head,
No resting for the eye he found;
All nature seemed as dead.

One tiny tuft of moss alone,
Mantling with freshest green a stone,
Fixed his delighted gaze—
Through bursting tears of joy he smiled,
And while he raised the tendril wild
His lips o'erflowed with praise.

"Oh, shall not He who keeps thee green
Here in the waste, unknown, unseen—
Thy fellow exile save?
He who commands the dew to feed
Thy gentle flower, can surely lead
Me from a scorching grave!"

The heaven-sent plant new hope inspired—
New courage all his bosom fired,
And bore him safe along;
Till with the evening's cooling shade
He slept within the verdant glade,
Lulled by the negro's song.

Thus, we in this world's wilderness,
Where sin and sorrow—guilt—distress
Seem undisturbed to reign—
May faint because we feel alone,
With none to strike our favourite tone
And join our homeward strain.

Yet, often in the bleakest wild,
Of this dark world, some heaven-born child,
Expectant of the skies,
Amid the low and vicious crowd,
Or in the dwellings of the proud
Meets our admiring eyes.

From gazing on the tender flower,
We lift our eye to him whose power
Hath all its beauty given;
Who, in this atmosphere of death,
Hath given it life, and form, and breath,
And brilliant hues of heaven.

Our drooping faith, revived by sight,
Anew her pinion plumes for flight,
New hope distends the breast,
With joy we mount on eagle wing,
With bolder tone our anthem sing,
And seek the pilgrim's rest.

R. M'CH—

Love of the Bible.—During the time that Dr Kennicott was employed in preparing his Polyglot Bible, he was accustomed to hear his wife read to him in their daily airings, those different portions to which his immediate attention was called. When preparing for their ride, the day after this great work was completed, upon her asking him what book she should now take, "Oh," exclaimed he, "let us begin the Bible."

Clear views of a Greenlander.—The following is from a discourse of a Greenland convert:—"How deep our fall must have been, we may learn from the sufferings of Jesus! When God created the visible world, he used only one word, 'Let it be,' and it was; but our redemption could not be accomplished by a word; to restore us poor creatures He had to descend from heaven—live and suffer as man—tremble, and groan, and sweat bloody sweat;—and at last expire in torments,—that He might redeem us by His blood. Can any one therefore, refrain from loving our Saviour, and devoting soul and body to His service?"

Wilberforce, the son of the late Rev. Legh Richmond, two hours and a-half before his death, went to bed and laid his head upon the pillow. His father said, "So he giveth his beloved rest." Wilberforce replied, "Yes, and sweet indeed is the rest which Christ gives." He never awoke from this sleep.

WHY ARE CHRISTIANS AVERSE TO RECOGNISE THEIR OWN CHRISTIANITY?

By the REV. JAMES SILVERIGHT,

A YOUNG child of a reflecting turn of mind, in which the seeds of piety had been early sown, when first taught to read the doctrines and precepts of Jesus Christ in the New Testament, besought her parents, with constant importunity, to tell her where Christians lived—saying, she longed to go to their country and dwell there, to see their divine religion, and live like them. And when her parents smiled at her simplicity, and told her she saw Christians every day, and had always lived among them, it seemed to her a mockery; for those she had hitherto known, appeared, she thought, to have nothing in their manner of living that resembled the disciples of Jesus, and therefore could not be the people she desired to see. This might seem a childish fancy, which a wider range of observation, with a ripened understanding and an experienced eye, would in a little while chase away. It were well, however, if a want of conformity to Christ among nominal Christians were but the fancy of inexperienced youth, and not a fact of such frequent occurrence that sober reason is compelled to own it; and struck with the palpable incongruity, and unable to reconcile ordinary practice with the holy principles of the Christian faith—reason demands other examples, and asks, like the untutored child, Where shall Christians be found?

We are aware that many things, besides the pure love of Christianity, may induce men to complain that Christians are rare. There is a fault-finding generation, who spy nothing but spots and wrinkles in the fairest features of Christian character; to whom censure is a mental repast, and who take as much pleasure in the discovery and publication of some new fault or inconsistency in men eminent for piety, as is felt by those who explore the starry firmament, on bringing to light some new celestial phenomenon. Had such censorious observers beheld the church at Corinth, as described by its apostolic founder, instead of owning that the Lord "had much people there," they would have rather denied that any such could be found where so much division and disorder manifestly reigned. When we hear the uncharitable and narrow-minded severely pronouncing that a true Christian is one of the rarest things in the world, we lay no stress on a judgment tinged with malevolence, and dictated by a morbid propensity to detraction. None but a Christian can judge fairly of other men's Christianity, and none will judge more leniently than he.

Others complain that few true Christians are to be met with, because they entertain a mistaken and preposterous idea of what Christianity actually is. In certain minds of an imaginative texture, there floats a vague and indefinite conception of the religion of Christ, to which are assigned qualities the most romantic and superhuman. It is something too exalted to walk on earth,—too angelical to tenant a corporeal frame,—too mystic and refined to mingle with life's ordinary conditions, or associate with the homeliness of common sense. It deals in abstractions which it seldom sees even partially embodied in human character, and admits nothing to be Christian, but what is shiningly and superlatively so. Initial steps, gradual progress, imperfect holiness, it disclaims, and calls for absolute attainments, and full conformity to its own arbitrary model. It will not own grace in the stalk nor in the blade; shew it the full ear, otherwise your plant is fit only to be cast into the fire. These persons look down from their transcendent altitude upon the Christian world beneath, and men of highest Christian stature appear in their eyes scarcely distinguishable, while the ordinary sort are not recognised at all.

There are more Christians, however, in the world than the uncharitable either wish or know, and far more than the advocates of an ideal Christianity will ever allow. Is the baptised world then full of Christians? To ascertain this matter, let us lay aside the report both of the romantic and the uncharitable, and go forth for information with an unerring standard in our hands. What standard is more authentic than that exhibited by our Lord in his Sermon on the Mount? With it, therefore, we repair to yonder bright and brilliant assembly, gaily disporting themselves in all moods of mirth that youthful fancy, devising pastime, can suggest. They were all baptised, and, no doubt, call themselves Christians. Let us apply our Lord's Beatitudes to this gamesome throng, and see which of these fitting figures abides the test? which of them on its application stands confest a serious Christian? They will be serious on Sabbath we are told. Of that we are not sure; but we know they are not serious now. We turn away grieved at the result; reflecting on the vanity of seeking Christians under a mask of folly.

But yonder is a congregated populace, whose shouts and vehemence indicate some vast tumult of anger or transport of joy. These, too, were baptised Christians. Shall we apply our Beatitudes here? Shall we begin to say,—“Blessed are the poor in spirit—blessed are the meek—blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness?”—no man hears us—our blessings are drowned in the wild uproar—our test is disregarded—and we ourselves hardly escape the trial of some Shibboleth, with which we are fiercely menaced. We hasten from an arena of strife, clamour, and agitation, well befitting the ancient worshippers of “the image that fell down from Jupiter,” but most unsuitable to the character of those we seek. We are bid tarry, and look more narrowly at the scene, and we may chance to discover even ministers there. It may be so, we answer; but it is Christians we seek; and if Christians, compelled by a sense of duty, should shew themselves there; their duty fulfilled—they will not swell the public passion, but retire in peace.

Some one now chides us for seeking Christians at scenes and seasons such as we have hitherto described. “Go to the Sabbath concourse, and number, if you can, the followers of Christ.” Thither, accordingly, we repair, and at first sight conclude, that now the Christian world is found. This conclusion is somewhat shaken on a nearer view, sometimes by the fewness of the worshippers in the midst of a teeming population, and sometimes by a lamentable want of attention, reverence, and devotion, conspicuous in the greater part of the Sabbath auditory. Notwithstanding these occasional abatements, however, we freely admit, that were the estimate to be taken in churches only—one would easily infer that our land is full of Christians. But, in our judgment, he is not a Christian in church who is not one out of it; and on this principle we reckon pulpit-Christians, and pew-Christians, of little account, unless every day-conduct bear the application of Christian rule, and unless the stream of life that runs through the six other days of the week, be traceable to the sanctuary as its source, and plainly taste of its origin.

We do not reckon God's husbandry fruitless, nor suppose that the field of the world is unproductive of better things, because tares grow rankly, and first attract the passer by to notice them. True Christians, taken collectively, are doubtless a numerous host; only we seldom find them hitherto in masses of imposing magnitude—and therefore, leaving the myriads of church-going Christians with no attempt to measure the length and breadth of their Christianity while assembled formally in the temple—let us follow them into their dwellings apart, and learn from their spontaneous and habitual order of life what evidence of Christianity they afford. And, first of all, it is reasonable to inquire what they themselves think of their state. And here, to our surprise, we find scarce one among twenty that freely and frankly recognises his own Christianity, without reserves and hesitations, that indicate a mind unsatisfied, and most unassured as to its own belief. It would seem as if an “almost Christianity” were to many an ultimate attainment—and nothing is more rare among the generality of modern Christians, than a full, sincere, and hearty recognition of the truth, as personally accepted, and consciously held, and ingenuously professed. How is it that the most careless stand to the profession of Christianity, and cry, “we are Christians”—while men of much apparent worth, of much profession in other respects, and goodly practice, when we come to ask them if they are altogether Christians—if they are believers, and have faith—seldom own a settled persuasion as to their state? No doubt, it is sin and deep ignorance that prompts the careless class so boldly to aver their Christianity; but we cannot discern the virtue of disavowal, or of a partial qualified recognition, on the part of others, from whose manner of life a direct acknowledgment of interest in Christ might have been fairly anticipated. In fine, were we to estimate Christians by the rule of recognising their own Christianity, we should be led to think that true Christians are less numerous among us than we had fondly believed. Not that we unchristianise all who decline to recognise their own faith—for many upright souls belong to this number, who clearly shew to others what themselves profess they but doubtfully see. But we think a greater decision in this respect would obviate many anxieties that disquiet the mind, and impede the practice of duties, as well as hinder the expansion of grace.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE REV. THOMAS BOSTON.

OF all the names that adorn the annals of piety in our land, there is not, perhaps, one which is more uniformly associated in the minds of our countrymen with the religion of the heart, than is that of Thomas Boston. In his life written by himself, he tells us, that he was born in the town of Dunse, on the 17th of March 1676, that he was the youngest of seven children, and having been born in his mother's old age, he was, therefore, sometimes called “God's-send.” Trifling as this last circumstance may appear, we have no doubt that it had considerable effect in regulating the future current of his life. A parent's views with respect to his children are often influenced by very trivial matters; and there is little doubt that Boston at a future period of his life, often in casting himself upon the care of Providence, reflected that he was in a manner the child of Providence.

We know but little of the character of his parents both of them appear however to have served the Lord. His father, indeed, suffered imprisonment as a nonconformist, which shews this much at least, that he looked upon religion as a matter of vital importance.

Thomas Boston was very early sent to school, and before the age of eight he could read the Bible and understand the historical parts of it, in which, even at that period of his life, he found the greatest pleasure. But though even then he might have called the Word of God his delight, and though in his conduct man, who looks only upon the outward appearance, could not find much to blame, it was not however till the twelfth year of his age, that by means of the preaching of Henry Erskine, the father of Ralph and Ebenezer, he became awfully alive to his lost state by nature, and to the glorious provision made for fallen man in the Gospel. We thus see that while his heart was yet tender, having sought the Lord, according to the promise he found him; and as the natural fruit of early piety, he experienced much of the pleasure of religion, while his youthful breast glowed with love to God, as his Father and his Friend.

From this period to the time of his death, it may almost be said literally, that religion was the business of his life. In the every day history even of the vast majority of the people of God, their worldly concerns occupy a prominent place, while their religion is too often comparatively lost sight of. But the life of Thomas Boston shews him to have been a man who sought "first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," and who made all other objects completely subordinate to this his great, his supreme desire. Not that it is to be supposed he became a recluse, one who was constantly shut up in his closet, and shunned converse with men, that he might hold uninterrupted fellowship with God. No. It is from this that the contemplation of his character is of use to men in general,—whilst he lived by the faith of an unseen God, he diligently exerted himself in the discharge of the duties which God had assigned him in the world. Having attended the grammar school of Dunse between four and five years, and obtained a good knowledge of Latin and a slight acquaintance with Greek, it was his desire to enter the University, but the want of funds prevented his doing so during two years. This circumstance almost made him lose heart, and he would have given up his views of the ministry and chosen a trade, had not his father encouraged him. "Meanwhile," says he, "the difficulties I had to grapple with in the way of my purpose, put me to cry to the Lord in prayer on that head, that he himself would find means to bring it about. And I well remember the place where I was wont to address the throne of grace for it, having several times thereafter had occasion to mind it, in giving thanks for that he had heard the prayers there put up for that effect."

His father being enabled, after two years, to pay the expenses of his education, he entered the University of Edinburgh in the year 1691, and continued there three sessions. Having thus obtained a complete knowledge of the various branches of literature then taught, he commenced the study of Theology under Professor George Campbell, in the beginning of the year 1695.

At the close of the session he made application for the office of parish schoolmaster at Penpont, but being unsuccessful he accepted the same office in the neighbouring parish of Glencairn. Not long after he had entered upon his duties, however, becoming disgusted with the conduct of the minister, in whose house he resided, he soon resigned the charge. The next situation he obtained, was in the family of Lieutenant-Colonel Bruce of Kennet, as tutor to Andrew Fletcher of Aberlady, a son of his lady by a former marriage. Having remained a twelvemonth in this situation, he returned to his native place, and obtained license from the Presbytery of Chirnside on the 15th of June 1697. His residence in the family of Bruce of Kennet, he speaks of as highly useful to him, especially in wearing off his natural bashfulness, and in increasing his acquaintance with human nature. And though that period was not without its troubles, it seems to have been peculiarly endeared to his recollection by the comforts wherewith God visited his soul. "There," says he, "I had some Bethels where I met with God, the remembrance whereof hath many times been useful and refreshing to me, particularly a place under a tree in Kennet Orchard, where, January 21, 1697, I vowed the vow and anointed the pillar;" and immediately after he adds, "I did there solemnly covenant with God under a tree, with two great boughs coming from the root, a little north-west from a kind of ditch in the eastern part of the Orchard." This particular description of his Bethel, strongly reminds us of the deep impression which their place of worship had made upon the hearts of the captive Israelites when they exclaimed,—"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy."

After he was licensed to preach the Gospel, he continued during two years and three months to do duty in various places as a probationer. Being well aware of the deadness of mankind at large to any right sense of divine things, he tells us that he commenced "in a rousing strain; and would fain have set fire to the devil's nest." But Jesus Christ soon became his favourite theme. He did not, however, at this period, fully understand the Gospel, especially the doctrine of the perfect freeness of the grace of God, so that he often found himself much perplexed in studying his sermons upon this subject, and would almost have given it up entirely had he not been convinced, that whatever other topics may be entered upon by a minister of Christ, the thought of giving up this main topic whilst addressing condemned sinners could only be from the devil. And it must not be imagined, that he found this subject to be less rousing than others, for setting it forward as he did in opposition to all self-sufficiency, there could certainly be no more rousing theme. As a proof that this was indeed the effect of his preaching, it may be mentioned, that one evening after he had thus been endeavouring to drive men out of themselves to Christ, he was told, that "he had put not only those that never knew anything of God, in the mist, but even terrified such as had known him." At no time of his life had he any one subject on which he perpetually insisted to the exclusion of every other. He was an experimental Christian, so that even at the commencement of his ministry his own experience often led him to the choice of such subjects as would be most useful, and some of his discourses were written with a more special reference to his own besetting sins. Dealing thus faithfully with himself, it need not be said that notwithstanding the hardness of the human heart, his labour was not without effect; inasmuch that he tells us there was a report "he had more wit than his own;"—the hearing of which greatly encouraged him, as shewing that the character of the Word of God, as a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart, was discovered in his preaching.

While he was a probationer, he resided for some time within the bounds of the Presbytery of Stirling, in the house of Thomas Brown of Barhill, to whose sister-in-law, Catherine Brown, he was afterwards married. When there, he officiated in the neighbouring parishes, but the principal scene of his ministerial labours was the Merse,—his native district, where he was settled in the parish of Simprin, 21st September 1699.

The parish of Simprin, which is now united to that of Swinton, was one of the smallest in the country. The population amounted to about ninety individuals, all of them inhabiting the same village. The stipend was small in proportion amounting to five chalders of grain and 80 merks Scots money. The circumstances of the parish would have been to most men an occasion of indolence, but Boston drew from them an argument for being more diligent than his brethren. The difficulties attendant on collecting a scattered flock are many, and the condition in which they come together in bad weather, is a sufficient reason for abridging the services; but the people of Simprin stayed close at hand, and could be collected without exposure to the elements, in the worst of weather, and this was accounted by Mr Boston a sufficient reason for being more abundant in his public labours than the neighbouring clergy. And as for his private labours, the same circumstance which enabled his people so readily to come to him, cut off all excuses for not going to them. During the time he remained at Simprin, he preached twice on the Sabbath; and in the evening, at his first coming, he had a catechetical discourse; but afterwards becoming more completely aware of the ignorance of his people, instead of lecturing on the catechism, he catechised his flock. The morning of Monday, he usually devoted to extraordinary devotions in private; afterwards he visited the sick, that is to say, those who were not dangerously ill, for he confined his visitation of them to no particular times. As an instance of the assiduous attention which he paid to the sick, we may adduce the following brief extract in his own words:—"Being with E. P. the night before her death, I had no satisfaction in converse with her; which affected me exceedingly. Thereupon I came in to my closet and set myself to wrestle with God on her account, and then went to her again, and was much comforted in her; so that my spirit was more than ordinarily elevated." On the evening of Tuesday, there was a meeting for prayer and Christian fellowship. Wednesday appears to have been the day particularly set apart for the visitation of his parish, though he sometimes devoted part of Tuesday and Friday, and even Saturday, to a similar purpose. On the evening of Thursday, he had a week-day sermon, and Friday and Saturday were more especially allotted by him to Sabbath preparation. So that it would appear he found little time for idleness, although his parish was so remarkably small both in extent and in population. Indeed his labour, or rather the confinement and want of exercise which attended it, was more than his constitution could endure, and had he not, when his health began to give way, been removed to Etterick, a parish requiring more bodily labour, there is little doubt he would have sunk under his work.

It was while at Simprin that he married Catherine Brown, a woman of a kindred spirit with himself, who, he tells us, was a "crown to him in his public station and appearances, but whose weak state of health often pierced his heart, and kept him much on his knees before the Disposer of health and sickness."

It was here also, in the year 1702, whilst treating of the ordinary method of the Spirit with sinners in conversion, that, sensible of the delicacy of the subject, and desiring to say nothing which was not well digested, he commenced writing out his sermons at full length, a custom which was then uncommon, though now nearly universal; and although he felt this afterwards, in his own language, "to be a yoke, he never could throw it off." It may be remembered also, that it was whilst at Simprin he first met with the celebrated work entitled the "Marrow of Modern Divinity." It is generally known, that upon the printing of a new edition of this work, with a preface by Mr Hog of Carnock, it was, at the instigation of Mr James Haddow, Principal of the College of St. Andrews, taken into consideration by the General Assembly, and, after having been examined in committee, was condemned in the year 1720, chiefly on account of its Antinomian tendency. In the controversy to which this book gave rise, Boston took a lively interest; and as his own opinions were decidedly in favour of the "Marrow," he republished the work, appending to it a copious collection of valuable Notes, explanatory of the text.

Mr Boston removed to Etterick on the 17th of June 1707. "It was an extremely disunited parish, and one where there was much profession of religion, and many Bibles, but very little religious knowledge, and still less of the power of godliness." There were many things to trouble him here, but the two principal he states to have been, their great attention to public affairs, compared with their attention to personal religion; and their desertion of his ministry. As examples of the former, he says, "The sabbath sermons were coldly enough received, but remarkable was the pricking up of ears when any thing relative to the public came on, which was a wounding observe to me." And as for the forsaking of his ministry, he complains that many would, on his entrance, leave the houses which he came to visit ministerially, and even those who occasionally attended his ministrations, thought nothing of staying away several sabbaths successively. Besides, there existed much strife and wickedness, and even profanity amongst the people. All these things led him to feel that "he had just come from home, and was, in a manner, beginning his ministry." But, by dealing faithfully with offenders, and insisting in the pulpit on the need men have of Christ, these latter transgressions were much restrained. The tendency to forsake his ministry was greatly lessened about nine years after his coming to Etterick, on his refusing the parish of Closeburn, and thereby making manifest to his people his sincere desire for their welfare. And as for their overweening attention to public matters, in preference to their own eternal welfare, this of course decreased, as their sense of higher interests increased.

The different conditions of the parishes of Etterick and of Simprin, gave rise to a different routine of duties. We have already seen the plan he pursued at Simprin. Whilst at Etterick, he had but one diet on the Sabbath, and so long as his health permitted, he catechised his people once in the year, and visited them ministerially twice besides, and on these occasions he used to impress upon them the practical use of what they heard from the pulpit, and pray with them for a blessing upon themselves and their families.

Whilst at Simprin he was in the habit of having the sacrament of the Lord's Supper administered twice in the year; but for the first two years after he came to Etterick, it was not administered at all. From that period it was administered annually, except during the years 1717, 1726, and 1729, when family affliction prevented its celebration. Perhaps no better idea of the effect of his labours could be given, than is afforded by his own statements respecting the first and the last dispensations of that ordinance whilst he was minister of Etterick. "At the first," he says, "there were 5 communicants of our own parish;" and as the statement respecting the last not only affords a striking contrast to this, but presents an interesting view of the manner of the people, we may transcribe it at length. "The tokens distributed to communicants were 777; the collection on the three days £77:13:4d. Scots. There were about nine score strangers in Midgehop; for score of them, William Blaik, husband of Isabel Biggart, entertained, having before baked for them half a barrel of meal for bread—bought 4s. 10d. Sterling worth wheat bread, and killed three lambs, &c.—made beds. And I believe their neighbour, Robert Biggart, Isabel's brother, would be much the same. This I record once for all, for a swatch of the hospitality of the parish; for God hath given this people a largeness of heart, to communicate of their substance on these, and other occasions also. And my heart has long been that occasion particularly concerned for a blessing on their substance, with such a natural emotion as it is had been begotten of my own body. Those within a mile of the church still had the greater weight on solemn occasions."

Whilst he was at Etterick, any time that he could spare from other duties was devoted to the publication of his works, and to the composition of a treatise on the Hebrew points. His practical works, especially his "Fourfold State," will never be forgotten while there are Christians in our country to read it. Some there are, indeed, who are prevented from perusing his writings, by a sort of floating imagination, that though a very good man, he was a weak man. And true it is he knew his own weakness, but this is the very reason why the power of godliness was so well known to him. If, however, we would regard him as weak compared with others, we venture to say, that few have equalled him in mental power, any more than in piety. His practical writings may shew this truth, but his "Miscellaneous Questions" shew it still more clearly. Though it is not to be expected that all who read them will be convinced by his arguments, considering that the subjects involve the most difficult points in Theology, yet all who read them will acknowledge that there have existed few more skilful reasoners. Indeed, there is one piece which he wrote to prove that the world, properly speaking, was not created once only, but is created anew every instant, where his reasoning is almost identical with that of President Edwards, on the same subject; and although the conclusion of both may be admitted to be erroneous, to err with Edwards is an honour to which very few men can attain.

The reputation which Boston obtained as a Hebraist is, we believe, not generally known; but on this subject it may be enough to mention, that Michaelis, the most celebrated scholar of his day, speaks of him as the "most illustrious and most learned Boston," and says, "that he had handled the subject of Hebrew punctuation with so much ingenuity, accuracy, cautious solidity, assiduity and attention to the natural principles of the doctrine, as to leave all others whom he had seen or read far behind."

His domestic character is perhaps better depicted in the following brief quotation than could be done by volumes. "While I was walking up and down my closet in heaviness, my little daughter, Jane, whom I had laid in bed, suddenly raising up herself, said she would tell me a note, and thus delivered herself:—'Mary Magdalene went to the sepulchre—she went back again with them to the sepulchre; but they would not believe that Christ was risen, till Mary Magdalene met him, and he said to her, "Tell my brethren"—they are my brethren yet.' This she pronounced with a certain air of sweetness. It took me by the heart. 'His brethren yet,' (thought I), and may I think that Christ will own me as one of his brethren yet? It was to me as life from the dead."

In temper he himself tells us, "he was timorous and hard to enter on, but eager in the pursuit when once entered." His private walk with God, however, is the most striking circumstance of his life. Not merely had he family fasts upon remarkable and sacramental occasions, but he hardly ever wrote a letter without first asking the divine direction and assistance.

And how did this man die? Such a question is surely unnecessary. He died as he lived—a citizen of that city whose builder and founder is God—one who, while on earth, lived by faith and not by sight; and one who, amidst much weakness, was strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. The following letter, written a few weeks before his death to a correspondent in Edinburgh, and supposed to be the last letter which he wrote, shews a soul weaned from this world, yet patiently abiding the Lord's good time.

"My very dear Sir,—I am obliged downright to acquaint you, that I have been of a considerable time, and am still, in an apparently dying condition. All business is quite given over; and I can no more, as matters stand, correspond with any about the MSS., or any thing else, but must leave them to the Lord, and the management of my friends, as he shall direct them. I do not doubt but your God, who has seen meet to row you into deep waters, will, in due time, bring you out; but there is need of patience.

"I cannot insist.—The eternal God be your refuge, and underneath the everlasting arms, and plentifully reward your twelve years' most substantial friendship.—I am, my very dear Sir, yours most affectionately," &c.

He died on the 20th of May 1732, aged 56. We know but little of his latter end. His public services in the church of Christ were not much interrupted by his indisposition; and when he was so debilitated by it as to be unable to go out to the church, he preached from a window in the manse, the auditory standing without. His fortitude in the immediate prospect of dissolution never forsook him. His patience under the chastisement of a Father's hand was uninterrupted. Inured to afflictions, as well personal as domestic, he bore them with that quiet submission, and unreluctant resignation, which a filial spirit can alone inspire. Viewing them as originating from his heavenly Father, the habitual language of his heart was, "Shall I receive all good at the hand of God, and shall I not receive evil."

HONESTUS;

OR, THE MAN THAT CRIED, "WHO WILL SHEW ME ANY GOOD?"

BY THE REV. ROBERT LEE,

Minister of Inverbrothock, Arbroath.

"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

"Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

"For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."—MATTHEW, xi. 28, 29, 30.

"Rest!" This is the very thing which all men everywhere are seeking—which they are anxiously running hither and thither in pursuit of—and almost all complaining that they cannot find. Solomon was the wisest of men, and he thought he might find what others had sought in vain. He had all the means and the will to make the search, and accordingly he ransacked the whole world. If you read his Book "Ecclesiastes," you will hear him complaining much like a man who had been to "gather figs of thorns and grapes of thistles." None of us will ever have the power to make this experiment on the same scale as Solomon; but if we had, we should infallibly come to the same conclusion. We should all of us become preachers from his text, "Vanity of vanities." The whole world lies in wickedness, and the whole world lies blinded by this delusion, that in the world itself, in its pursuits, pleasures, enjoyments, (as they are called,) there is a substantial and real good, such, that if being obtained, the soul will be satisfied. And many thousands of immortal souls pursue this phantom from childhood to youth, from youth to manhood, from manhood to old age, and thence into the grave, and never will be persuaded that it is nothing but a phantom; and the same phantom assuming many different forms, to suit the changing tastes of the deluded creatures who chase it.

Honestus was a boy of good parts and dispositions, and one that began early to observe and reason for himself. He thought that if he could escape from the confinement of school, and the drudgery of learning his lessons, and were left at liberty to go and do as he liked, he should be happy. Honestus was surprised, even in childhood and early youth, to find that things did not please him as he expected they would, but that, when he obtained anything he had desired, instead of resting with that, his only rest was to begin directly to wish and seek something else.

As he grew up, vanity put on a new dress to suit his altered taste. He fell into those strong and pleasing emotions, in which youth imagines it has discovered the elixir of life. But that passion was quickly consumed by the fierceness of its own flame, and it left only ashes, which happily contained some few grains of wisdom.

The love of knowledge succeeded, and the ambition to be distinguished for learning. "Oh, how excellent is knowledge!" all around him cried; and Honestus sighed, "amen," and determined that he should not be left behind in the race for so noble a prize. Neither was he. But this youth soon learned, what none of the books of science taught him, that it was possible to know a great many things, and yet be miserable, through ignorance of the one thing needful. And many thought Honestus must be happy because he was distinguished; they envied the honours which they supposed satisfying, only because they had them not—while he was wishing he had never existed, or that God had made him one of the irrational creatures, for which no hell is prepared either in the present world or in the future—that he were a dog, a worm, or a stone. For he knew of a God, but he did not know God—the portion and rest of the soul. He knew God enough to feel that he testified in his conscience against Him—to dread Him as an enemy—to harbour dark suspicions, as if he had been created by one who delighted in his misery. He thought of God only as the judge and tormentor of the wicked, and such he felt himself to be. He dreaded God too much to love Him. He was conscious of being God's enemy, and he reasoned that God must be his, and he knew what he might expect from such an enemy. And then, oh how he wished there were no God! He would have that God out of existence if he could. Had there been any such power as Fate, he would have prayed to that power that God might no longer be.

Honestus then tried pleasure and dissipation. He studied the arts of pleasing in society with great success; for he was soon in universal request. He was now almost never out of the whirl of company. The whole circle in which he moved liked him—so interesting he was, so gay, so happy he seemed, and then so respectable, so correct, so moral. Honestus soon found this was not the true road. He saw that these people were a set of mutual dupes and hypocrites, who tried to keep each other in countenance by each smiling in the presence of the rest. And all acted the joyful so well, that each imagined he was the only person who was not so; and tried the game again, to see whether it would not bring him what it seemed to bring all others, but in truth brought none. What shall this poor deluded man seek to next? Is his darkened understanding to be seduced by more wiles of the devil? Shall he, like another Sü, be driven over more lands, restless and tortured by an eternal sting? Now he dreams he shall find rest in travel. He crosses the sea, he "surveys the cities and the manners of many nations," and "holds speech with people of a strange language." But alas! he was forced to admit that it was much easier to flee from his home than from himself—that "the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear with hearing," and that the void of the heart is too large for the world to fill.

What shall now be tried? Is not the man at length satisfied that the evil is not without but within—not in his circumstances, but in himself? Oh! the manifold wiles of the devil, to keep the soul from God!—the fruitful expedients and endless refuges of lies, of which the corrupt and darkened mind is the dupe and the slave! Once more Honestus will venture a stake—if he loses now, he knows not what he shall do. He is possessed of a small fortune, but he will engage in professional pursuits, to gain distinction. The prospect pleases, till the distinction is gained. For the man is of such indomitable energy, that his purposes and their fulfilment are never far asunder. What next? Amass a fortune, retire, and spend the evening of life in that peace which the morning and heat of the day had been forward to promise, but slow to fulfil. Here is another Moloch, before which this idolater proposes to offer the dearest sacrifices—not discerning that this, like all the former, is nothing but a dumb idol—which neither can hear nor answer his vows.

The love of money is frequently the last load which the devil prepares for the backs of his faithful slaves. This is very often the last stage of the life of sin and of alienation from God. Avarice keeps the last inn on the road which leads to hell, and many, at all times, are her elderly and reputable guests. But what Solomon says of the lewd woman (Prov. vii.) is true of her:—"Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death." Most of the cold-hearted respectable class of sinners land here; and as it is a decent house (the men are scrupulous about reputation) they are content to dwell in it, though every thing is frozen, and they lead a kind of frozen life, which if it deadens pleasure deadens pain also, till their summons comes, and they pass to the place where dwell Dives and they that gluttons are, with Judas, Balaam, Demas, and all those who loved the present world and "the wages of unrighteousness."

Did Honestus land here? No. By the mercy of God he escaped that snare. He had long "suspected himself a fool." Lately, "he knew it and he found his place." When he had finished his professional experiment, "he did chide his infamous delay;" and now that he was to retire from the world, "he resolved and re-resolved," as so many have done who yet "died the same." Still he is unhappy. Still plagued with his old disease—a vacuity of spirit—a seeking for what he knows not where to find. Long custom, indeed, hath now taught him better to bear his load; and as eternity approaches, it gradually begins to appear to his mind's eye as if it were further distant. This delusion is strange, yet Honestus was distinctly conscious of it, and many others have been so.

But what ails the man? Surely he has committed some monstrous crime, and is haunted with the terror of an evil conscience! Hath he, like another Orestes done foul murder, that, like him, he is pursued by a chorus of implacable furies? To human eyes, the man hath lived on the whole well. He hath not been dishonest, nor dishonourable, nor cruel. And if his youth was not altogether stainless, yet he did nothing which the world is not very ready to palliate, yea excuse. Al that know the man love him, they esteem and even admire him. Why then doth his open and ingenuous countenance convey nothing but emptiness, sorrow, and fear?

When Orestes was pursued by the furies for the murder of his mother, who deserved to die, though not by the hand of her own son, he was directed by the oracle to take shelter at the altar of the god of light. Would that all who are haunted with fears—those furies of the mind—would listen to that oracle, spoken from Heaven: a "most sure word of prophecy," which directs to see the temple and the altar of Him, who is both the light and the life of the world! Run we then, and lay firm hold of this altar, on which one sacrifice hath been offered that purges the conscience from guilt and fear, and on which the blessed radiance of God's forgiving love and mercy beams and rests so sweetly, that confidence and hope shall be kindled by it, and that "perfect love shall follow, which 'casteth out tormenting fear,' and 'maketh His commandments not grievous,' and 'peace the peace of God,' which passeth understanding."—Indescribable serenity, too perfect a gift to descend from any but from the Father of Lights,—shall keep our hearts through the knowledge and love of God.

Does any one still ask why this respected and an able person is not happy? I answer, the causes are these two:—The absence of good is evil, the want of pleasure is pain, the want of happiness is misery. The soul of man has been created with an appetite for good, not apparent but real, as his body has been with an appetite for real and solid nourishment. And without the former, the soul can no more be satisfied than the body without the latter. We may deaden or mock those appetites. When they "ask bread we may give them a stone, when they ask a fish we may present them with a serpent;" but without their proper supply they never can be at rest. The bodily appetite and the spiritual may, both of them, be abused with that which has the appearance merely of what they crave, but they will rest in this only all the deception has been detected. "It shall ever be as when a hungry man dreameth, and behold he eateth; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty: or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold he drinketh; but he awaketh, and behold he is faint, and his soul hath appetite."—Isaiah, xix. Many people think, that if a person has nothing to make him miserable he must, of course, be happy. How foolish this supposition! As foolish as to conclude that a man must therefore be rich because nobody robs him; or strong and healthy because no one wounds him; or live for ever because no person stabs or poisons him. Happiness is not the negation of misery, though misery is the negation of happiness. This is the first cause why Honestus has all his life resembled that man in the Gospel, (Luke xi.) "out of whom the unclean spirit went, and who walked through dry places seeking rest but finding none." Did any one ever think it wonderful that a thirsty person was uneasy till he got drink wherewithal to quench his thirst? or should we pronounce it strange that he felt still unsatisfied, though many things were presented to him which had got the name, but not one of them the nature and properties of what he sought?

The second cause of this man's discomfort, was a certain light which had got into his conscience—a light which came from heaven doubtless, but was to him worse than darkness, for it gave him nothing but fear. He knew thus much, that his whole life had been one series of rebellions against God, or rather one continuous act of rebellion. He did not remember, that during his whole life he ever performed one action, on the simple ground, that God required it; and he shuddered at the judgment of his Maker therein already pronounced in his own conscience, against more than fifty years of actual and active opposition to His government and will, of contemptuous disregard of His authority. He was filled with consternation at his own madness in having so daringly despised an enemy out of whose hands he could not even hope to escape. And when he awoke in the morning and found himself still out of hell, he wondered whether this forbearance on the part of God were an overflowing of mercy, or a refinement of cruelty, reserving him for a severer punishment. The devil helped him to favour the last supposition, which increased his fear and hatred of God.

Honestus, having got out of the world, and having found that his calm retreat was only another of the "clouds without water," by which a lying spirit had promised that his soul should be refreshed and satisfied, saw at length, with a clearness not to be mistaken, that his whole inner man was wrong; that his whole notions and sentiments must be radically false; in short, that the fault was not without in his conduct, but within, in his own mind. But how did other men feel? Honestus was a person of extensive reading and observation, and he remarked that the great majority of people were not very unlike himself, though not to the same degree dissatisfied; that, when they spoke candidly, they confessed they had followed shadows,— "sown the wind and reaped the whirlwind." The only exceptions to this, seemed to be that class of persons, who are enthusiastic about Christianity, and who are commonly called "saints." These men did confidently affirm they had found what all others, and themselves aforesaid, sought in vain. Two things respecting these people Honestus remarked as singular; first, that they were unanimous in their assertion; and, second, that they were all very confident in it, and the more enthusiastic they were, so much the more confident. It might not be amiss he thought to try this experiment also. The hopes of religion extend to another world, and therefore, if delusive, they would at least please him during the whole of this. Honestus had never been a professed infidel,—he had been infidel only in fact and in life. He had never laughed at the Bible, he had only despised it by every thing he did, and said, and thought. As for atheism, his had never gone farther, than "being without God in the world," and wishing there were no God. He had even sometimes said his prayers, but God had never given him what he did not wish. And though he went occasionally to church, which he thought a laudable custom, and useful for example's sake, he found all he sought there, that is—nothing at all.

Honestus knew something of the evidences of Christianity. He had read Butler's "Analogy" many years ago, and this was the chief reason why he had not grown a professed infidel in self-defence. He now began seriously and diligently to read and study the New Testament. He was astonished to find the book so interesting,—so full of vivacity and variety—such pathos—such power and vividness of description. But the thing which now impressed Honestus most, and convinced him of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures was, the true and striking picture which they gave of himself; of the wickedness of his heart, and the misery which accompanied it. They discovered to him more of his condition not only than any other book had done, but even more than himself had ever discovered or known, but which, when discovered, he could not but acknowledge was perfectly true.

But now his distress increased tenfold. He knew himself diseased, of this he had a most painful conviction, but he saw not where or what was the cause. He felt much more wretched than formerly; as a prisoner, found guilty, condemned, ordered for execution, is more wretched than one who only suspects he may be found guilty, and if so, may suffer some secondary punishment. For, as the Bible describes his character in that of "the wicked who through the pride of his countenance called not upon God, and in all whose thoughts God is not;" when he perceived himself accurately painted, as "the proud," "the high-minded," "the sensual, who have not the Spirit," "the hater of God," "the covetous;" when he could not deny that he was all these, he saw not how he could be otherwise than cursed, with all the curses uttered against such persons. And now, like Luther, he "was horribly afraid of the day of judgment." For he no longer dreamed about God, and heaven and hell; but he was now fully awake and alive to their reality. He felt as sure there is a God as that he was a man; he had no more doubt there is a heaven than that there is an earth; and he was as much convinced there is a hell to come, as that he had a foretaste of it in the hell he now carried about in his own bosom. He had the faith of devils, he "believed and trembled." The same evil spirit which had led him formerly to despise, made him now distrust and disbelieve the mercy of God. "I have sown to my flesh," he said, "therefore I must reap corruption;" I have neglected "so great salvation," therefore, "I cannot escape." God "has called" during more than fifty years, and I all that time "have refused;" and he does what he has threatened, "he laughs at my calamity and mocks when my fear cometh."

And then he thought he must have committed "the sin against the Holy Ghost, which will never be forgiven in this world or in the next." And he fancied he resembled Judas the Traitor, in his sins and in his despair; and he would have killed himself like him if he could have hoped that God would be provoked to annihilate him. But to be brought nearer to what he felt so near already, was to him an awful thought, and this restrained him.

After Honestus had remained in this fearful condition some time, he went to his parish church one Sabbath morning. From that time Honestus has not known despair nor slavish fear which hath torment, but has understood that the gift of God is eternal life through "Jesus Christ our Lord;" he has had the liberty, and he confides in the love of one in whom there is the spirit of an adopted child, crying, "my father, my father." Nor hath it since come into his mind to doubt, that as one who is his brother, and "the propitiation for his sins," as a God maketh intercession for him with the Father, so the Spirit proceeding from the same Father, maketh intercession in him as a God, "with groanings that cannot be uttered." Oh, how blessed to know, that the yoke and the burden which he had begged all men and all things to take off, and which he found not one of them could remove, hath been removed by the hand of God himself; yea, God who became flesh, for this express purpose of mercy, that we who have exhausted ourselves in seeking rest, might from him receive it to our souls.

The sermon which Honestus heard on the occasion above-mentioned, and which was made the means of illuminating the eyes of his mind, so that he perceived "to what hope he was called," (Ep. i. 17—20,) and also, whence must come both pardon for past offences and power to do the will of God, was a very plain and ordinary production; probably the reader hears two much better sermons every week. And the effect which so feeble a weapon produced, the minister who preached it always looked upon as a signal illustration of the words,—"Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord;" and of these,—"This treasure we have," not in vessels of gold or silver, but "in earthen vessels." This Gospel is oft committed to men who are not able to enforce it by the most powerful arguments, or to press it with the most striking eloquence, "that the surpassing power of it might be evinced to be of God and not of men;" that its effects in appeasing the conscience, purifying the heart, transforming the life, might be acknowledged to be the issue not of any human but of a divine power. And yet his mind was forcibly arrested in listening to the following

DISCOURSE.

"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."—MATTHEW, xi. 28.

It is incredible what pains men take to render themselves miserable—what diligence they use to quicken their progress to hell. They are not content to be carried thither in the natural course of things, but they will strain every nerve to go as fast as possible, as if terrified lest others should outstrip them in the road. If they only walked in ways of their own, they would very soon come to the end of their journey, but to arrive in the bottomless pit very soon, is not soon enough for their impatience and fury, hence they run post-haste, and lose no time. They appear terribly afraid lest God's mercy should catch them, lest it should rob them of their dearly-beloved sins, and forthwith plunge them into heaven. What infinite pains they take to escape such a calamity! Jesus Christ, the Son of God, saveth poor creatures; and, oh! how He pitied them, when He perceived that, instead of running to Him as a friend who could ease them of their burdens, they fled from Him as if He were an enemy and a task-master. And here He stands by the wayside, and tries to convince the infatuated men, that they are now nothing better than slaves and beasts of burden, and those who are become sensible of this, and feel weary of the galling yoke, He encourages to cast it off resolutely, and for ever, and to take on them his yoke which is easy, his burden which is light, and he gives them the Word of God for an assurance, that "they shall find rest to their souls."

There are many persons "weary and heavy laden," seeking "rest to their souls," but finding it not, who have heard of Jesus Christ, and these "gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth;" why then hear they not what the Son of God so freely offers? The causes seem to be chiefly these: 1st, They want faith in Him that makes this gracious offer, they have no confidence that He will do what He says; or, 2dly, They suspect the rest which Christ proposes to confer is not the kind which will suit them—they cannot comprehend, that "learning of Him to be meek and lowly," should prove so pleasant a yoke, as to give rest to their souls; or, 3dly, If convinced both of the veracity of Jesus Christ, and that His burden is as light as he says, yet they imagine it is too great a favour for them, they are not worthy to receive it, and that therefore they must remain weary and heavy laden unto eternity. In order to correct these three mistakes, let us set ourselves to answer the three following questions:—

1. Who is the person that makes the promise in the text? Our confidence in the truth of the message must depend very much on the character of Him that delivers it. But who speaks the promise, "I will give you rest?" The Word of God speaks it. The wisdom of God speaks it. God's Son, His messenger, His apostle, speaks it, in whom His promises are all of them yea and amen, i. e. faithful and true, to whose divine commission the Father set His seal, when there came that voice from the surpassing glory, "This is my beloved Son." Will any man call God a liar to his face? Doubt not, then, reject not His word, turn not away. When God commands, "hear ye Him," i. e. listen, believe, obey. In short, since God speaks, let us receive, without the least doubt or hesitation, with absolute and implicit faith, whatever He says. For I tell you plainly, that God will sooner extinguish hell, and revoke His sentence of condemnation against all reprobate men, angels, and devils, than any one who comes to Jesus Christ and takes His yoke upon him, shall be disappointed of finding that rest to his soul which the Lord Jesus has given him reason to expect. God willeth that all his threatenings should be void rather than any one of his promises should fail to be accomplished.

2. To whom does this exalted person speak?

To what manner of men does He address himself? Perhaps to those who are very joyful, or very satisfied, or very good? To them who are very prosperous and very happy? To such as have heard of calamity and a sorrowing spirit only by the hearing of the ear? Is any among you in distress, is any in fear and great dismay, harassed by present misfortunes and painful doubts? Who is in perplexity, or despairs of God's mercy, or suspects that he has sinned away all his day of grace, and for him now nothing remains but night and thick darkness? Who is there, that when he reads the Bible, the message of God's mercy, the good news of His grace, fancies that the threatenings and the curses, the condemnation, the fire and the worm, alone were prepared and designed for him? To thee, O man, Jesus Christ speaks this message of peace now by his spirit, as truly as if he had addressed it to thee actually in his flesh. What persuades the man that he has not a right to obey the command "come," when Jesus Christ gives him that command? Who should know better than Jesus Christ? And how can any imagine, that coming, he will not be heard by Him that said, "I will give you rest,"—"He that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out?" Does the Lord Jesus not know what he means? or not mean what he says? Does he give us commands which he does not permit us to obey? or hold out hopes which he will never realize? Resist that thought. "Let God be true, but every man a liar." His word is true whether we believe it or not, for "He continueth faithful, He cannot deny himself."

Say not, you are perhaps "not weary and heavy laden" in the particular way, or from that particular cause, intended by the Saviour. What have you to do with particular ways or causes? Not one word does Christ speak about any such thing. But, to those who are in the state he mentions, by what means soever they may have come into that state, or whatever may be its peculiarities, the gracious words of the Lord are spoken. Do you suspect that the great Physician first sends messengers round the world, to assure all people, that every one labouring under a certain mortal distemper, shall, on coming to Him, be infallibly cured, but that, when the poor creatures have prevailed on themselves to come and get the infallible cure, the Physician begins to explain to one that his distemper, though that which He promised to cure, did not arise from that particular cause which rendered him a fit subject for His applications; to another, that though he was seized with the genuine disease, yet there were peculiarities in his case which prevented his being taken on treatment;—to a third, that his disease was not far enough advanced;—to a fourth, that his was too far? Oh, who can think thus dishonourably of the great Physician, who travelled all the distance from heaven to earth, from the throne and the bosom of God, to the bosom of a poor woman, and assumed the form of man, of a servant among men; who began His life in a manger among the beasts, and ended it, groaning on a cross, derided of men, assaulted of devils, forsaken of God? Hath He done and endured so much to bring us a remedy for our weary and labouring spirits, and yet will He not give the remedy but to some, who happen to be weary after a special manner? This is not the way in which his grace proceeds. If you are weary and heavy laden, so that you wish to be relieved and delivered, let this be your gratification, this your title and warrant. And let no man and no devil persuade you, that you are presumptuous, or will be unsuccessful, till Jesus Christ himself revokes his own words, "come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden." To thee, O man, the Saviour speaks, who art troubled and seekest rest, which thou knowest not where to find. Put not away his gracious words which He penned, so that thou mightest understand they are addressed unto thyself, and, that thou being weary with running elsewhere to seek relief, mightest find it here—that thou who art sore spent with the huge burdens of sorrow, which sin hath loaded thee withal, mightest by that gracious hand, which touched the blind, and they saw, and being stretched out, saved the drowning and frightened disciple, and broke the symbol of His own body in the sacramental bread, having first been raised to bless it,—by that gracious hand which was fixed through with a nail, and fastened to the cross, which convinced His disciples, and struck the distrusting Thomas dumb—that hand which was lifted up to bless His followers before he left the earth, and is even lifted up, in intercession to the Father, for them in heaven—from the fulness of whose grace, blessings perpetually descend upon them; and that by that gracious hand, thou, O my soul, mightest have thy burden taken off, and mightest run in the way of His commandments, "with enlarged heart." And wheresoever thou art, thou canst find no other just argument to shew that these words are not meant for them, except this, that thou art not weary and heavy laden.

3. Such being the person who speaks, and such being the persons to whom He speaks, let us hear next what it is He says to them. "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." First, a command, then a promise. "Come." How? As a scholar comes to his master—as a patient to his physician—as a man who had taken poison would to a person who, he knew, possessed an antidote—as one who hath a great need, to another who hath an ample store, and a ready will and an open heart. "Come," as a condemned criminal would apply to him who could relieve and pardon him, and had assured him he should have a pardon, if he would but apply for it. Thus come, ye weary and heavy laden souls, to this Master and Lord of life, nothing doubting, casting away fear, for your own doubts and fears are more formidable obstacles than all the things you fear. How dare you fear, when God commands you to hope? How dare you doubt, when God bids you be confident? Nay, but obey the precept "Come," and you cannot but receive the promise—"Rest,"

Still do you hesitate! When the terrors of the Lord have driven you so far from hell, that you are come closer to the gate of heaven, can you not find courage to knock, though this be written there, with the very sun-beam of God's grace, "To him that knocketh it shall be opened." And though He stands and invites you, beseeches you by his incarnation and all his humiliation, by his life of sorrows, by his temptations, by his hunger and thirst, by his mockeries and bloody sweat, by his agony, his crown of thorns, his wounds, his cross, his grace, by his passion, and all his love stronger than death,—by his many sighs, his many tears and many prayers, oh, when He who endured them all, beseeches you by all these, is it obstinacy, is it blindness, or is it that disbelief which makes Him a liar, that hinders you coming and finding that rest, which the Prince of Peace alone can give, and which is the foretaste of that rest "which remaineth for the people of God?" You are heavy laden with guilt. Scared with visions of punishment, the terrors of wrath take hold upon you, and your frightened conscience cries out, "Oh, how shall I appear?" Let the word of God be heard. "Through this Man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins." "There is, therefore, now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, (even to them that believe on his name), who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." "Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through Jesus Christ our Lord." And if you ask Jesus Christ, whether He will or can pardon and deliver you, he will answer as he did to a certain half faithless man, "If thou comest believe, all things (promised) are possible to him that believeth."

But perhaps, the service of sin is your plague. You are groaning like the Israelites under the Egyptian task-masters, and crying out with St. Paul, "O, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!" It is no wonder the sinner groans, when his eyes are opened to know good and evil, for he there discovers, that he is an abused slave of a tyrant, who repays his labour with more labour, and moreover, chastises him with scorpions. How can he enjoy any rest, who is under the dominion of evil passions, tempers, habits? As impossible as to have quietness in the midst of a battle, or to be cool among flames of fire. Anger, envy, pride, lust, ambition, avarice, will suffer those in whom they reign to have rest, when they change their nature and cease to be evil. For this burden, Jesus Christ prescribes the same remedy as for the former, "Come unto me, learn of me, take my yoke upon you;" for this yoke, our Master, whose name be blessed for ever, hath made his own, in that He himself condescended to bear it for our instruction and encouragement. He was not like the Pharisees, who laid heavy burdens and grievous, on other mens' shoulders, but could not themselves touch them with one of their fingers. Oh no, "take my yoke, which I not only impose on others, but bear myself; (I am meek and lowly), and ye shall find rest, not only from fear of punishment, but from sinning, which causes that fear." "Unto you, God having raised up His Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, with rest and peace in this life and the future, by turning away every one of you from his iniquities." For the Son of God hath come even from heaven, and assumed the form of man, to take us by the hand, and keep us out of this slough of iniquity. He comes to give us power to become sons of God; He takes away the slavery to evil passions, and the badges of it, giving us the liberty, the name, the station, the privileges, the spirit of the sons of God, and the sure hope of the eternal inheritance which is reserved in heaven for us, who "are heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ," and are "kept by His mighty power through faith unto salvation." Seek then to know Christ in the saving power of His cross. By it be ye crucified unto the world, and let the world be crucified unto you." Seek to have "the body, laden with fleshly sins," nailed to the tree whereon Christ made expiation for the sins of the world; thus shall you know Him in the fellowship of his sufferings," thus shall your old man be destroyed, that you should not serve sin; thus, having with the apostle cried out, "Oh wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me," you will with him exclaim, "Thanks be to God that giveth us the victory," a present and real conquest over sin, through Jesus Christ. Love is stronger than all chains, more powerful than all reasons, arguments, inducements, and the cross is therefore the power of God for saving men; because therein God commendeth his love to us, even when we were yet sinners, and the cross is thus the mightiest instrument of salvation, because it is the strongest argument of God's love to us. Oh may the love of God subdue us, Oh may the love of Christ constrain us, to love Him who first loved us, and to secure that belief, that peace, that rest which consists in being so actuated, pervaded, filled with love, as not to live to ourselves, but to Him that died for us and rose again. And so may the Holy Spirit of God, who is the comforter, and whom the Lord sent from the Father, to secure and increase that peace which He bequeathed to his disciples, fill us with all joy and peace in believing, that the rest which we seek, we may find and enjoy, now and through eternal ages.

"He that committeth sin, is the slave of sin."
 "If the Son shall make you free ye shall be free indeed."

Now, to the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, one eternal God, be honour and glory, for ever: Amen.

A WALK TO CALVARY.

PART I.

BY THE REV. MARCUS DODS,
 Minister of the Scotch Church, Belford.

LET us take a walk to Calvary, where three crosses display the last earthly agonies of three persons. We shall not as present direct our attention to the middle cross, and Him who hangs upon it, for this would en-page us in the consideration of the ancient prophecies which were there fulfilled,—in unfolding the revelations of the divine character which were there made,—and in tracing the privileges, the duties, and the hopes which flow from thence to the fallen sons and daughters of men. We shall turn our view, therefore, for the present, to a subordinate, but by no means unimportant portion of the scene.

Let us look to the two thieves. The first thing that strikes us here is, that two men may be associates in guilt, and may be brought into condemnation for the same crime, and yet may be men of very different characters. These two thieves were condemned for the same crime, and it is distinctly admitted that their condemnation was just. Yet it is clear that there was a very wide difference between the men. The one seems to be completely hardened in guilt, suffering, as he is, all the pain and the infamy which he had brought upon himself by his guilt, he yet feels no compunction whatever. He is only anxious to escape from his punishment; while, at the same time, he manifests a disposition just to plunge again into a fresh course of iniquity. He has apparently no fear of a judgment to come, but joins in the scoffs which the persecutors of the Lord were uttering against Him. He dies while his heart is yet burning with all that intensity of passion which had urged him on to the commission of those crimes that had brought him to this fearful end.

The other, on the contrary, seems to be impressed with a very proper sense of the awfulness of his situation. He looks not on his executioners with the indignant ferocity of an untamed savage, but acknowledges that his punishment is just. He looks not forward to futurity with reckless disregard; for he feels that when his crimes against society have been expiated on the cross, he must appear before another tribunal, when the sufferings which he has endured, however painful, can form no expiation, and when he needs the interest of a powerful advocate. He feels all the impropriety of his associate's sentiments and conduct, rebukes him for them, and turning to his other fellow-sufferer, makes this request, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom."

What instruction either of these men had received, we are not informed, but it is certain that there must have been a cause for the very remarkable difference in their characters; and that, too, a cause not springing up at the moment when its effect became apparent, but a cause which must have been of long standing, and must have been in active operation at the time when the principles which distinguished their characters were first formed. In short, it is obvious, that as in their riper years they had been associates in crime, the distinguishing features of their characters must have been impressed in childhood. The one had evidently had good principles instilled into him in childhood; for it is absurd to suppose that they sprung into being all at once on the cross. The other, apparently, had never received any instructions whatever.

This scene then may afford a most instructive and impressive lesson to parents. The mother of Jesus was there; and we may, without any violence, suppose the mothers of the other two sufferers to have been there also. Let us consider the different feelings with which they would contemplate the death of their offspring.

The one has had her heart torn by the course which she had seen her son follow, after having taken all pains to instil into his young mind a sense of his duty to God and to man,—after all her instructions, and all her prayers; and now it is torn by seeing him perishing by a painful and shameful death. Probably she had often besought him, with all a mother's love, and a mother's tears, to remember the instructions of his youth. But in vain. She sees him brought to a premature end by his crimes, and she feels like a mother. But she sees, too, that the misery of his fate has awakened all those principles which his guilty career had weakened, but had not extinguished. The trial which unfolds to the world his guilt,—the fatal sentence in which it terminates,—and the awful scene which carries that sentence into execution, all wring even to bursting a mother's breast, and make her wish she had never been a mother.

But then she has much consolation. She can appeal to God that her son has not been lost for want of careful instruction. She has done her duty; and that, in every situation, is a gratification of the highest kind. But this is not all. She sees that her son's sufferings have revived, in all their strength, those principles of piety which she had early taught him, but which his intercourse with the guilty had for a time stifled. She hears him reverting now to those Scriptures in which she had early instructed him, and earnestly calling on that Saviour to whom all the prophets bore witness, and whose coming had long been the prayer and the hope of the pious in Israel. His cross has accomplished what her remonstrances had been unable to accomplish. It humbles him in the dust under a proper sense of his guilt,—brings him back to his God,—and she retires, sorrowing, it is true—deeply sorrowing, but still richly consoled with the assurance, that if her son has perished in blood, yet he has been recalled to a feeling of genuine repentance; and that now, she could meet him in judgment, with all the joy of a mother who could say, "This my son was dead, and is alive again; was lost, and has been found."

When she thought of her son's agonies, she would think also of the blessed result in which they had issued, —when she mourned over his errors, she would be consoled by the recollection of his dying prayer,—when she thought of the pain and the infamy of the circumstances in which she had parted with him, she would also think of the happy and glorious meeting with him there, where guilt and sorrow are no more. Yes, she is a mourning, but still a happy mother.

Let us look now for a little to the mother of the other criminal. The view is too painful to be dwelt upon. She sees the sufferings of the son for whom she had felt all that foolish fondness which made her spoil him by fatal indulgence. She sees him perish like a wild beast which gnaws its chain in its agonies; and she justly recognises in this the work of her own hands. His sufferings serve only to exasperate his ferocity. They cannot awaken in his breast any dormant principles of early piety, for no such principles has she ever attempted to plant there. She sees him perish in all the exasperation of rage against those who have brought him to punishment, but utterly insensible to the guilt of his crimes. She retires from the bitter scene, but not with any feeling of consolation. She retires only to brood in secret over the melancholy recollection of her own want of real love to her child, and over the fearful anticipation of meeting him in judgment, and of hearing him accuse the author of his being, as the guilty cause of all his crimes and all his sufferings.

Being bound to economize our space, we shall occupy little of it, in pointing out to parents the important lessons which result from the scene we have been placing before them, and which they can hardly fail to draw for themselves. We shall therefore do no more than simply request them to think of the deep responsibility that rests upon them, and press upon their attention the two following remarks:—

First, That in this land of Bibles, no man can perish through ignorance, without somebody, and especially parents, being guilty of his blood.

Second, That neither the care of parents towards their children, nor their neglect of them, can fail, sooner or later, to produce its proper fruit, and to meet its due reward.

We propose, next week, to return to the same scene, which is still rich in important instruction.

DEATH-BED SCENES.

No. II.

As men live, so do men die. We are often warned against relying on a death-bed repentance, by the unquestionable fact, that such repentance is rarely found to have been genuine where we have the means of testing its sincerity by the unexpected recovery of the apparent penitent: returning life usually bringing along with it a fatal return to vanity or to vice. This consideration ought to prove alarming to those who are living secure in present impenitence, and comforting themselves with the expectation of repenting before they are summoned into judgment. But they have the reply, that late repentance is not necessarily insincere, and some may even suppose that the sorrowing sinner would then have been fit to die, although the result has proved that he was not fit to live. There is, however, another truth with which the careless must be plied, more alarming than the mere insincerity of dying contrition; a truth more frequently overlooked, and which, when stated, sounds more harshly in their ears, and is more ready to startle them into thought. It is, not simply that death-bed repentance is rarely sincere, but that such repentance, whether sincere or insincere, rarely occurs. If we except the children of God, and along with them those who have been habitually more or less anxious about their souls' salvation, we believe we may safely conclude that death, when it has fairly drawn near, seldom awakens even anxiety in the minds of men; and that the attendants on the dying bed are usually more solemn, more sorrowful, and more afraid, than is the dying man himself. We are aware that death, at its first approach, almost always produces a transient alarm, as in the threatening or commencement of deadly disease; and that where the final stroke is sudden and instantaneous, as when life is forfeited to the laws of the country, this alarm may frequently continue to the last. But in most other cases, whenever the work of death commences, the fear of death ceases. The culprit trembles for a moment, and resists the grasp of the officer of justice; but when he finds resistance vain, he walks quietly along, and even enters into friendly colloquy with the man who is conducting him to the judge. And just so we tremble for an hour, and struggle with death, till finding that he has indeed laid his hand upon us, and that we cannot escape, we coolly yield to his summons; we gradually become acquainted with his features, which seemed strange at first, and learn to contemplate them without alarm; and thus composedly we descend into the grave without one serious thought of that judgment to which we are hastening. If such be the sinner's death, where can be his repentance? There may be anxiety, there may be fear—deep anxiety, trembling fear—without one emotion of godly grief; but there can be no true contrition without something of anxious and fearful thought. And the careless sinner is deceiving himself, not only in counting on dying repentance and faith, but in counting on death-bed awakening or alarm. If he is anxious now, he may reckon indeed on being anxious then, whether penitent or not; but if he is careless now, he may reckon, not indeed with certainty, but with strong probability, on being then equally devoid of care and fear.

Eighteen months have not yet elapsed since the fishing village of _____ was visited with cholera, a disease which more than almost any other seems to suffer the mental faculties to continue in full operation. One of the victims was remarkable for his bodily strength, and not less remarkable for having lived alike fearless of God, and regardless of man. In a state of society where right is frequently measured by force, he was a man not lightly to be accounted of, possessing as he did muscular powers above all his comrades, many of whom might have been reckoned men of might. His strength, however, was but that of the savage, undorned by any ennobling qualities of mind. Even courage did not characterise him. It was neither his skill nor his prowess in combat, that his companions feared to encounter; but they shrunk from the grasp of his mighty hand, with which, if he once seized them, they had no chance to contend. His slouching gait, and the sideward and downcast glancing of his eye, with which he seemed afraid to meet you full in the face, portrayed his mental features. In a word, as his bodily strength was compared to the tiger's, so were also his inward dispositions: cruel, cunning, cowardly, fierce, dogged, revengeful, untractable. He was formidable to all, but chiefly to his friends; and some idea both of his superior strength and savage ferocity may be gathered from the circumstance, that when at one period of his last illness hopes were entertained of his recovery, his nearest relatives did not hesitate openly to express their regret. He possessed resolution and firmness of purpose, which might have been available for much good, had they been directed to worthy objects. On one occasion, when I pressed on him the necessity of his making a decided effort against intemperance, to which he was a slave, he told me that he had once abstained from every thing stronger than water, during a period of six weeks. I was curious to know his reason for such self-denial, and to my question on this point the reply was most characteristic of the man, "Just because I took it into my head;" and acting according to the same rule, when he took it into his head again, he returned to his former habits. His intemperance, however, had neither impaired his constitution, for malt liquor formed his principal beverage; nor wasted his little patrimony, for he was laborious, and spent no more than his daily earnings. Another and rather annoying instance of his self-will and firmness of purpose I encountered in reference to the Sabbath. I was endeavouring to impress the fishermen with a sense of the impropriety of casting their herring-nets on the day of rest, and to obtain their consent to refrain from the practice in future. Many earnestly desired the reformation, and all seemed willing to comply; only they wished that it should be matter of general agreement and compact. Having succeeded thus far, I entertained little doubt of carrying the measure; there being usually such a feeling of union amongst them, that a small minority was almost sure to accede to the wishes of the majority. The person we have been describing happened to be at sea at the time, but being anxious to have the point settled, I waited for his landing, and after talking over some other matters, told him that the desire on the subject was general, and the consent hitherto unanimous, and that it only required his concurrence to have the arrangement completed. He answered very coolly, and for him very civilly, "They may all do as they please, but if there is anything to be got, you may depend upon it I'll go off on Sabbath." Not without bitterness of spirit I learned at his lips the meaning of the proverb, "One sinner destroyeth much good." The Sabbath indeed to him, when not a day of work, was but the rest of the drunkard, for during many years he had never entered the house of God—except, however, that on a few occasions he might have been present at our evening meeting. His conduct in this respect he did not defend on general principles, or contend that there was no obligation to frequent the place of prayer; but in his own individual case he held himself amply justified. The officiating clerk of the church was his cousin-german; and for any one to belong to the circle of his kindred, was in itself sufficient to mark him out as an enemy; but to him personally, over and above the common enmity of kinsmanship, he bore a grudge peculiarly bitter. So situated, and considering that it was impossible for him to enter church without seeing that man whose presence could not but most keenly excite his spleen, he looked on his attending as out of the question; and, moreover, as he had resolved never to suffer his hatred to be lulled asleep, he had determined, that during the lifetime of his cousin, he should not set his foot within the house of God.

When cholera began to prevail in the village, and he saw neighbour and companion cut down, one after another, he seemed to be panic-struck, and trembled for himself. He was soon seized, however, and there was manifested no more anxiety or thought of death. He was more favoured than many others, in having several days to prepare for his danger; but although I conversed with him two or three times a-day, on his state and prospects, I could not perceive the slightest awakening of desire for the salvation of his soul. He appeared to know his danger, and "went as an ox to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks." There was something of unusual and awful interest in seeing the King of Terrors make his assault on such a man, in the prime of his life, and the fulness of his strength. And it almost seemed for a while as if Death had mistaken his victim, and attacked one whom for the present he could not overpower. The malady was virulent, and even his might appeared to have sunk beneath it; but under seeming weakness there was latent vigour. At a stage of the disease which is usually characterised by the complete prostration of strength, his wife, who attended him, was suddenly seized, and sunk helpless on the floor. He sprang up immediately, caught and carried her in his arms, laid her on another bed, and then, exhausted by the effort, threw himself back on his own! At length the medical attendant pronounced the disease overcome, and said that nothing but attention was requisite to ensure his recovery. But who was to pay him that attention? In the midst of numerous relatives, some of whom expressed their sorrow at his apprehended restoration, he had not a single friend. His eldest son and daughter, of thirteen and fourteen years of age, were in the house; but even had their years been less tender, they could not have waited night and day on both father and mother. After much persuasion, one of his brothers, who was himself, alas! soon to be numbered with the dead, together with a companion, was prevailed on to sit up with him for one night; and there was certainly kindness in the deed, but how did he requite it? He had never known what sickness was, and could ill conceive the care that was necessary in recovering from so severe a disease; and he was too self-willed besides, to think of obeying the prescriptions of the physician, except, at least, in his own presence. As gently as they could they pressed on him the importance of complying with the orders that had been given him. He bore their remonstrances for a little, but it was more than could well be expected that he should bear them long, coming, as they did, from men whose wishes he was not wont to gratify. At length he broke out into passion, got hold of a knife, and, with oaths and curses, swore that he would stab them if they offered any further interference. This was the last act he essayed to do, and these the last words he uttered; or if he spoke any more it was in grudging and monosyllabic replies to the physician's enquiries, and these were the latest spontaneous effusions of his heart. Self-will, impiety, revenge, formed the leading features of his character in life; the apparent cause of his death was his own wilfulness, and his dying words were expressions of blasphemy against God, and of hatred toward brother and friend.

Even his iron frame could not long endure the treatment to which, by his stubborn heedlessness, it was now subjected, and his strength speedily sunk. I visited him the following morning, and found him supporting himself on his hands and knees, tossing and rolling about, and growling with pain and rage. He had said with Sampson, "I will arise and shake myself;" but he wist not that the great strength wherein he trusted was gone; and when he found that he was weak as other men, he seemed mortified and mad at the discovery. The utterance of his feelings was like nothing I had ever heard—like nothing human, but rather the growling of some savage beast; and it sounded not so much like the expression of agony, as of anger and vexation. If he might have been likened to a tiger before, in ferocity and strength, it was impossible to see him now without imagining a tiger chained and wounded. The Almighty had pierced his frame with a dart which he could not pluck out, and bound him with a secret fetter which he could not break; the wound was galling him sore, and he murmured and hit the chain. It was vain now to ask any one to help him; not a creature would enter the dwelling, and the wretched family was left alone; the father and mother were both given up as hopeless, and the children sat watching the dreadful progress of the scene. In making the last round of the patients with the surgeon at night, we found the boy and girl both fast asleep on the hearth, worn out with watching, and fear, and sorrow. It seemed needless and cruel to awake them; we left the children to sleep, and the parents to die.

Meanwhile the necessity of providing sick-nurses had become increasingly urgent; the nearest town at which they could be procured was twelve miles distant; and ill as I could spare the time, I determined to set out for them on the following morning. Before starting I revisited the patient, and with mingled feelings of peace and awe, I contemplated a different scene. The statue of an ancient warrior seemed reposing before me. The sufferer having apparently put forth an effort which he could not repeat, had thrown himself on his back, and stretched to the uttermost every limb and muscle of his athletic frame. The height of his figure, and his amazing muscular power, which had both been partially concealed by his habitual slouch, were now fully developed. His head, covered with dark bushy hair, he had thrown quite back upon the pillow, he had uncovered his neck and breast, and from side to side of the couch had stretched, to their full length, his powerful arms. There was awful grandeur in the spectacle. I stood over him and gazed with wonder, as he lay motionless, the model of Herculean strength. How is the terrible one brought low! How has the oppressor ceased! Is this the man that made the people tremble! The vital spark was not yet extinguished, but the struggle was over, and in so far as regards this world, "the wicked had ceased from troubling, and the weary was at rest." I returned in the evening with two sick-nurses, and finding that our physician, who for several weeks had rarely enjoyed two or three hours of unbroken rest, was in bed, worn out and unwell, I proceeded to conduct them to their respective destinations. One I left with a patient who was within a few hours of death, and repairing with the other to the shunned and desolate dwelling, I stood again by the bedside of the dying man. But the couch was forsaken and empty; the eye which had seen him saw him no more; the grave was now his bed; the green sod had covered him; his body had returned to the earth and his spirit to God who gave it.

THE FIRST FRUITS.

By the Rev. ROBERT M'CHEYNE.

THERE is something peculiarly interesting about the first fruits of a work of grace in a heathen land. Even the first ripe bunch of grapes, and the first ripe sheaf of corn, bring with them peculiar emotions of joy and gratitude,—how much more where the fruit is that of souls gathered into the garner of the Saviour!

The missionary went forth weeping, bearing precious seed,—long and anxiously he sowed, watering the seed with his tears, and seeking the sunshine of God's countenance with his prayers, and now, in the few blades that begin to rise above the ground,—“first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear,”—we behold with exultation the work of God begun, and, with quickened hope, we look for the time when the believer “shall doubtless come again, bringing his sheaves with him.”

The first fruits of the Moravian Brethren's mission to North America are of this most interesting character. Brother Christian Rauch was one of the first who resolved to leave Herrnhuth, to venture his life in preaching Christ to the American Indians. He arrived in Newport in July 1740, and having heard that an embassy of Wahikans were in the city, he went in search of them, and, to his great joy, found that they understood Dutch. Their appearance was ferocious, but he addressed two of them, Choop and Shabash, asking whether they wished a teacher, to instruct them in the way of salvation? Choop answered, “that he often felt disposed to know better things than he did, but knew not how or where to find them, therefore, if any one would come and instruct him and his people he should be thankful. They were all poor and wicked, yet he thought it might answer a good purpose if a teacher would come and dwell with them.” Shabash also consented, and, with due Indian solemnity, they declared him their teacher. Rauch rejoiced to hear this declaration, and considered it a call from God. On the 16th August he arrived at Shekomeko, and was received in the Indian manner, with much kindness. He immediately told them the aim of his visit—that “he had come to them from beyond the great ocean to bring unto them glad tidings of a divine Saviour, who became man, died, and rose again, and all this for us.” They listened, were silent, and went away seemingly impressed. The next day he spoke again, but his words only excited derision; and at last they laughed him to scorn. Satan seemed to grasp his prey all the more, finding now that a hand was stretched out to save; drunkenness, and every vice, prevailed more and more, so that “they loved the darkness.” Still the faithful missionary persevered, travelling from one Indian town to another, with great fatigue, visiting the Indians daily in their huts, shewing them their guilt and their depravity, and extolling the excellency of Christ. No one would receive him to lodge in his house, so that, as he said, he was always seeking and never finding. But all his pains were forgot, when, one day, Choop—the greatest drunkard of them all,—the most outrageous in every vice,—and one who had actually made a cripple of himself by his irregularities—was powerfully awakened, and enquired, with intense anxiety, “what effect the blood of the Son of God, slain on the cross, could have on the heart of man?” The heart of the missionary was turned within him whilst he testified of the power of the blood of Jesus. Soon after, Shabash was also awakened, and the work of grace became remarkably evident in the hearts of these two savages. Their eyes overflowed with tears whenever Brother Rauch described to them the sufferings and death of the Redeemer. These were the first fruits of Christ among the Wahikander Indians. Both became preachers of righteousness to their heathen brethren; Choop, especially, had a peculiar gift of expressing himself plainly and convincingly. The following is his own account of his conversion:—“Brethren, I have been a heathen, and have grown old among the heathens, therefore I know how heathens think. Once a preacher came and began to explain to us that there was a God: we answered, ‘Dost thou think us so ignorant as not to know that? go back to the place from whence thou camest.’ When again another preacher came, and began to teach us, and to say: ‘You must not steal, nor lie, nor get drunk,’ we answered: ‘Thou fool, dost thou think we don't know that? learn first thyself, and then teach the people to whom thou belongest to leave off these things; for who steals or lies, or who is more drunken than thine own people?’ and thus we dismissed him. After some time Brother Christian Rauch came into my hut, and sat down by me. He spoke to me nearly as follows: ‘I come to you in the name of the Lord of heaven and earth. He sends to let you know that he will make you happy, and deliver you from the misery in which you lie at present. To this end he became a man, gave his life a ransom for man, and shed his blood for him.’ When he had finished his discourse he lay down upon a board, fatigued by the journey, and fell into a sound sleep. I then thought, ‘what kind of man is this? there he lies and sleeps; I might kill him, and throw him out into the wood, and who would regard it?—but this gives him no concern.’ However I could not forget his words; they constantly recurred to my mind; even when asleep I dreamed of the blood of Christ shed for us. I found this to be widely different from what I had ever heard, and I interpreted Christian's words to the other Indians. Thus, through the grace of God, an awakening took place among us. I say, therefore, Brethren, preach Christ our Saviour, and his sufferings and death, if you wish your words to gain entrance among the heathen.”

The following letter, which he addressed to the Brethren in the colony of Pennsylvania, possesses the same marks of a mind taught of God:—“I have been a poor wild heathen, and for forty years as ignorant as a dog. I was the greatest drunkard, and the most willing slave of the devil; and as I knew nothing of our Saviour, I served vain idols, which I now wish to see destroyed with fire. Of this I have repented with many tears. When I heard that Jesus was the Saviour of the heathen, and that I ought to give him my heart, I felt a drawing within me toward him. But my nearest relations, my wife and children, were my enemies; and my greatest enemy was my wife's mother. She told me that I was worse than a dog, if I no more believed in her idol; but my eyes being opened, I understood that what she said was altogether folly, for I knew that she had received her idol from her grandmother. It is made of leather, and decorated with wampum; and she being the oldest person in the house, made us worship it; which we have done till our teacher came, and told us of the Lamb of God, who shed his blood, and died for us ignorant people. I was astonished at this doctrine, and as often as I heard it preached, my heart grew warm. I even dreamed often that our teacher stood before me and preached to me. Now I feel and believe that our Saviour alone can help me by the power of his blood, and no other. I believe that he is my God and my Saviour, who died on the cross for me, a sinner. I wish to be baptised, and frequently long for it most ardently. I am lame, and cannot travel in winter, but in April or May I will come to you. The enemy has frequently tried to make me unfaithful, but what I loved before I consider mere and more as dung.—I am your poor wild Choop."

Owing to his inability to travel, three other Indians were baptised before Choop, but, on 16th April 1742, —the first Sacramental occasion at Shekomeko,—he also was baptised, and received the name of John. His growth in grace after this was most remarkable. His love for the Brethren and the Bible increased day by day. "As soon as I felt that I loved Christ," says he, "I wished for Brethren who loved him also; therefore I love Brother Raach, and you, and all my Brethren here, and all Brethren everywhere,—even those whom I shall never see in this world! I rejoice more and more because our Saviour makes others likewise happy, and not me only. There are men who say the Bible is a hard book; but I have not come so far as to find it hard,—it is all sweet and easy."

For four years did this extraordinary man labour as an apostle among his brethren, till he was called into his rest by means of the small-pox, in 1746. It is said of the first ripe figs, that they are the sweetest and the best, so is the work of grace among the Wahikander Indians,—there is a peculiarly sweet savour of Christ in the history and the words of "poor wild Choop."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Effects of Justification.—The person who shall sin wilfully and habitually, whatever be his profession, will perish; not because he has thereby fallen from a state of justification, but because he has thereby shewn that he had never attained to such a state. He is not a sanctified man, and this is the scriptural evidence of his not being a justified man; "for whom the Lord foreknew, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son; and whom he justified, them he also glorified." These are all essential parts of the great salvation: and, in the nature of things, it must be so. The men who embrace the doctrine of justification by faith, have the most enlarged conceptions of the divine purity, and the deepest feeling of obligation to the divine goodness. They know, more certainly than other men, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord;" and they feel, more intensely than other men, that their whole nature should be a constant offering of devotedness to his glory. Where much is felt to have been forgiven, there will be much love. When there is the greatest consciousness of benefits, we expect the greatest measure of obedience. And it is hardly doubtful, that, in this fact, we have the great secret of the world's opposition to the doctrine of justification by faith. To admit the truth of this tenet, is to admit a claim on our obedience, so instantaneous and so powerful, as may not be evaded, without exposing ourselves to a painful conflict, occasioned by the pangs of self-reproach, and the terrors of coming wrath. There may be men base enough to abuse this truth. But what has been the general character of its disciples? Who sustained the Christian cause in the early ages of the Church, when exposed, during several centuries, to the most subtle and powerful attacks from pagan persecutors?—The disciples of this doctrine. Who were the lights of the world, through the long night which followed from the fall of the Roman empire to the dawn of the Reformation, protesting, alike, against pagan and popish imposture, and doing it to the death?—The disciples of this doctrine. Who, when the days of Reformation came, stood forth as the defenders of holy writ, braving all danger, to the jeopardy, and even to the loss of life, that they might restore to mankind the free use of their noblest possession?—The disciples of this doctrine. Who were the main instruments in perpetuating our own liberties, and our own religion, during the generations which followed upon that crisis, and when both were exposed to manifold peril?—The disciples of this doctrine. And again we must ask,—Who gave existence to the most powerful states of the New World, and were the donors there of those best of all gifts, a free government, and a pure Christianity?—Is not the answer nigh thee, even in thy mouth? And, above all, who have they been, who, in ancient times, or in modern times, have been every where derided as the pure, the precise, the sanctimonious, the righteous over-much; pointed at, as being of holier aim than their neighbours; railed at, as those who would shake both hemispheres with the voice of their cry, and by the energy of their labours, in what they regard as the cause of humanity, religion, and their God?—We need not say who they are, who have been all this, who have endured, and done all this. "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God. By their fruit ye shall know them."—VAUGHAN.

Value of Time.—Coming hastily into a chamber, I had almost thrown down a chrysal hour-glass. Fear, least I had, made me grieve, as if I had broken it; but alas, how much precious time have I cast away, without any regret! The hour-glass was but chrysal; each hour a pearl; that but like to be broken, this lost outright; that but casually, this done wilfully. A better hour-glass might be bought, but time lost once, lost ever. Thus we grieve more for toys than for treasure. Lord give me an hour-glass, not to be by me, but to be in me. "Teach me to number my days." An hour-glass to turn me, "that I may apply my heart to wisdom."—THOMAS FULLER.

Conscience.—A tender conscience is like the apple of a man's eye,—the least dust that gathers into it, affects it. There is no surer and better way to know whether our consciences are dead and stupid, than to observe what impression small sins make upon them; if we are not very careful to avoid all appearance of evil, and to shun whatever looks like sin; if we are not so much troubled at the vanity of our thoughts and words, at the rising up of sinful motions and desires in us, as we have been formerly, we may then conclude that our hearts are hardened, and our consciences are stupifying,—for a tender conscience will no more allow of small sins than of great sins.—BISHOP HOOKINS.

SACRED POETRY.

ADVERSITY.

If ever bright the sun had shone,
The beauteous stars had ne'er been known,
Those sweet refreshing points of light
That cheer the darkest hour of night.

So had the blaze of worldly bliss
Ne'er set o'er seas of deep distress,
My eye had seen, my mind had known
Nought else but this dull earth alone.

The Star of Jacob might have been Veiled in the light that flowed between;
That light so dazzling to the eye
Which gilds thy day,—Prosperity!

But soon as from my sight it faded,
And left my soul in sorrow shaded,
And soon as Grief her sackcloth spread
O'er earth, and sky, and ocean's bed;

The lights of heaven serenely shone;
And my eye was led to rest upon
Those orbs which roll in higher sphere
Where all is peace—while pain is here.

THE MINISTRY OF ANGELS.

AND is there care in heaven? and is there love
In heavenly spirits to these creatures base,
That may compassion of their evils move?
There is: else much more wretched were the case
Of men than beasts; but oh! the exceeding grace
Of highest God! that loves his creatures so,
And all his works with mercy doth embrace,
That blessed angels he sends to and fro,
To serve to wicked man, to serve his wicked foe.

How oft do they their silver bowers leave
To come to succour us that succour want?
How oft do they with golden pinions cleave
The fitting skies, like flying pursuivant,
Against foul fiends to aid us militant?
They for us fight, they watch and duly ward,
And their bright squadrons round about us plant;
And all for love and nothing for reward;
O why should heavenly God to men have such regard?

MISCELLANEOUS.

The St Kilda Man.—At a meeting held in reference to the establishment of Schools in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, Dr M'Leod, formerly of Campsie, now of Glasgow, related the following beautiful anecdote:—"A Highlander," observed the reverend Doctor, "can give and take a joke like his neighbours on most subjects, but there is one subject on which he will not joke—I mean his religion; here he is reserved and shy, and this has led some who come to them from the land of strangers, to suppose that they in fact have no religion. To know them you must be a Highlander. A friend of mine happened to be in a boat by which a poor simple-hearted man from St Kilda was advancing for the first time in his life from his native rock to visit the world; and as he advanced towards the Island of Mull, a world in itself in the estimation of the poor St Kilda man, the boatmen commenced telling him the wonders he was so soon to see. They asked him about St Kilda; they questioned him regarding all the peculiarities of that wonderful place, and rallied him not a little on his ignorance of all those great and magnificent things which were to be seen in Mull. He parried them off with great coolness and good humour; at length a person in the boat asked him if ever he heard of God in St Kilda? Immediately he became grave and collected. 'To what land do you belong,' said he; 'describe it to me?' 'I,' said the other, 'come from a place very different from your barren rock; I come from the land of flood and field, the land of wheat and barley, where nature spreads her bounty in abundance and luxuriance before us.' 'Is that,' said the St Kilda man, 'the kind of land you come from? Ah then you may forget God; but a St Kilda man never can. Elevated on his rock, suspended over a precipice, tossed on the wild ocean, he never can forget his God—he hangs continually on his arm.' All were silent in the boat, and not a word more was asked him regarding his religion."

A Single New Testament.—Some years ago, Mr Ward, a Christian missionary, in going through a village near Calcutta, left at a native shop a Bengalee New Testament, that it might be read by any of the villagers. About a year afterwards, three or four of the most intelligent of the inhabitants came to enquire further respecting the contents of the book left in their village. This ended in six or eight of them making a public profession of Christianity. Among these, one deserves particular notice,—an old man named Juggernath, who had long been a devotee to the idol of that name in Orissa, had made many pilgrimages thither, and had acquired such a name for sanctity, that a rich man, in Orissa, was said to have offered him a pension for life, on condition of his remaining with him. On his becoming acquainted with the New Testament, he first hung his image of Krishnoo, or Juggernath, which he had hitherto worshipped, on a tree in his garden, and, at length, cut it up to boil his rice. He remained stedfast in his profession of Christianity till his death. Two others, being men of superior natural endowments, employed themselves in publishing the doctrines of Christianity to their countrymen in the most fearless manner; while their conduct was such as to secure them universal esteem.

The Necessity of Christian Consistency.—Dr Aikin, on the authority of Sir John Cheke, relates of Linacre, whose name is well known in the annals of medical science, that a little before his death, when worn out with disease and fatigue, he first began to read the New Testament; and that when he had perused the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters of Matthew, he threw down the Bible with great violence, exclaiming, "Either that is not the Gospel, or we are not Christians."

Such is the effect produced upon the mind of an intelligent man, by the appearance of Christian conduct as too generally exhibited in the world, when compared with the view of Christian duty set before us in the Word of God. This reads to every professing Christian a most important lesson: Look well to your conduct.

ON THE EVILS ARISING FROM IGNORANCE OF RELIGION.

BY THE REV. DAVID RUNCIMAN, A. M.,
Minister of Newington Parish, Edinburgh.

UNDERSTANDING religion in its most extended sense, we shall contemplate the evils which flow from ignorance of it under three aspects,—as it affects the principles, the conduct, and the happiness of men.

I. From the very nature of the subject, it will be admitted by all that the religious principles which are embraced should be carefully scrutinized; and that nothing should be received as an article of faith, without the most careful and rigid examination. But, how many are there who, although they never entertained one doubt of the truth of Christianity, or never objected to any one doctrine of the Bible, could neither give a reason for their faith, nor defend the Truth if impugned by an adversary.

Now, if it be asked what evils result from this, we affirm, that it is a state of mind contrary to the requirements of the Word of God, and fearfully open to the assaults of infidelity, and the inroads of error. The God of the Bible is a God of knowledge. He hath given to man the noble faculties of reason and understanding, and he requires him to make a legitimate exercise of them in matters of religion. He does not indeed allow any of his creatures to come to the Bible with reason as the standard of truth, and give them the privilege of receiving or rejecting whatever reason approves or condemns. But he calls on them to exercise their reason to discover what is the truth which God hath revealed. And being satisfied that any doctrine is the revealed will of God, then, however high above the grasp of reason, however enveloped in mystery, he requires reason to bend before the God of truth, and reverently to adore what it cannot comprehend. His language is, “Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and these are they which testify of me.” The high eulogium bestowed on the Bereans of old was, “These are more noble than those in Thessalonica. For they searched the Scriptures daily whether those things were so.” “Be ready to give a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear.” Those, therefore, who have given their assent to the truth of Christianity, and who profess to hold its doctrines without having investigated those important subjects, have not exercised their minds in such a manner as God commands. In the true sense of the expression, they are not rational Christians. Their convictions may be honest and sincere; but they are not enlightened and enlarged. And what constitutes the guilt of such procedure often is, that they have withheld their talents, their time, and their care from this, the most momentous subject on which the mind can be engaged, and expended them on subjects trifling in themselves, and to spiritual and immortal beings useless in their results.

Not only is this a state of religious character which involves those who profess it in great guilt; but it also lays them open to tremendous hazard. There is one who, at an early period of his life, was a professed believer in Christianity. The education he received,—the example he enjoyed,—both tended to the formation of a religious character. So long as this individual lived in the quiet of home, and breathed the atmosphere of truth, and had never been exposed to the poisonous influence of error, his principles were sound and uncorrupted. To the authority of the Bible he had been accustomed to bow; nor dreamt he of ever questioning its statements. Its words he had been taught to view as a law from which there was no appeal. This person, however, had taken Christianity upon credit. He had never studied with care the evidences in favour of its truth; going into the world, he soon heard the voice of the scorner; there was diligently rehearsed in his presence, the often repeated and as often answered objections of Payne, or of some other infidel declaimer. Willing to be deceived, he swallowed the poison. And he is himself, without inquiry and without effort, now an avowed unbeliever; or,—what renders him more completely beyond the reach of argument—an infidel at heart, without honesty to avow it.

There is another who had long professed to hold the faith once delivered to the saints. He had been accustomed to believe all the great leading truths of the Gospel, and to consider these as at once precious and important. But then, these glorious truths, he had never fully examined and compared; the objections which have been raised to them, he had never heard, and, of course, was unprepared to answer. The plausible and bewitching, but withal most unphilosophical and inconsistent criterion of truth was proposed,—reason, the reason of weak, and ignorant, and fallible, and depraved man. It looked like a mark of intellectual greatness, no doubt, to test the revelation by this high authority. He was not asked, observe, to give up his belief in the Bible. This might have frightened him away from the temple of reason. But holding this belief, he was to bring every page of the Sacred Record to the ordeal of human reason. Whatever was above the comprehension of man,—above the comprehension of him, who could not tell you how this soul and this body were united, who could not explain to you the simplest process of nature, was to be mangled, maimed and destroyed. In this way, one by one of the articles of our faith was abandoned; the Supreme Divinity of the Saviour,—the atonement he made on the cross,—every thing that gives peculiarity and value to the Gospel, was gradually yielded. He retains professedly the Bible as the Word of God, after having blotted from its pages truths the most valuable; he is landed in what has been called the frozen zone of Christianity,—that cold and cheerless region where no sun shines, where he has a being stript of all moral glory for his God,—a mere man for his Saviour,—an imperfect, and sinful life as the foundation of his hope.

II.—Principle and practice are inseparably united. What corrupts the fountain will taint the stream. What injures the tree will deteriorate the fruit.

Look to the history of the ancient heathen. What is the moral aspect of that city, where Paul of old saw an altar erected to the "Unknown God?" Athens, the seat of learning and science, was also the abode of debauchery and wickedness. Sin of every kind was rioting in its streets, and the heart of the Christian apostle saddened at the sight of its magnificent temples, and gorgeous palaces. Such also was the case with imperial Rome—the queen of cities. Read the first chapter of the epistle to the Romans, and you there find the moral character of its citizens drawn in colours fitted to make us blush for humanity. And what was the cause of this? It was, because they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, that God gave them up to a reprobate mind. Look to the present state of the heathen world, where darkness yet reigns with midnight power, where the people are yet in utter ignorance of the truth of Revelation. And what is there presented to our view? There we behold men degraded almost to a level with the brutes; the sense of right and wrong seems almost extinguished; every thing that is base and abominable practised without shame or fear. Their very religious rites show, that while they believe there is a God, they think him such an one as themselves. Notwithstanding all the exertions which have been made in modern times to teach them the knowledge of God, all that has yet been done seems only to have rendered the darkness visible.

These are facts which are known to all, and which most certainly give us a very appalling view of the evils arising from ignorance of religion. And what is true of nations, is equally true of individuals. The men who are most frequently found guilty of enormous and aggravated guilt, are generally those who are grossly ignorant of divine truth. The calendar of crime in this country is found generally to be filled with those who have been in early life ill instructed in religion, and have been allowed to grow up in ignorance of God's Holy Word. How often has it happened, that those who have brought themselves to an untimely end, and have been compelled to expiate their crimes on the scaffold, have been men who were not even able to read, and whose knowledge, therefore, of divine things must have been limited and imperfect?

And not only is it consistent with fact, that ignorance is the cause, or at least the concomitant of much iniquity, but it is farther true, that it has led to the most mistaken views of duty. With minds ill informed in the will of God, many have confounded right and wrong, and done, through ignorance and error, what was directly contrary to duty. It was in ignorance that Saul persecuted the Church of Christ, and employed all the influence of high talent, and impassioned eloquence, and glowing zeal, to crush that Church of whose cause, when enlightened by God, he became the most powerful and prevailing advocate. Since his day many have fallen into similar errors. In ignorance of the Word, how many confound sin and duty,—virtue and vice. When, therefore, we consider all these things; when we think of the evils which have resulted from ignorance of religion to communities and individuals,—the evils, direct and indirect, which have flowed from ignorance of God and Christ, and holiness,—we may see how it is that people may be destroyed for lack of knowledge.

III. It is said by the wise man, "that in much knowledge there is much grief, and he that increaseth in knowledge increaseth in sorrow." There is indeed a knowledge which has this tendency and effect; a knowledge which creates wants, without affording the means of supplying them; a knowledge which creates desires, without affording the means of gratifying them. But this is knowledge secular and profane. There is nothing in the knowledge of religion but what is fitted to impart peace and comfort to the soul. And we cannot imagine anything so much fitted to aggravate sorrow and distress, as ignorance of the only foundation of consolation.

Many are the ills, the sorrows, and the cares of the sinful children of men. Different, indeed, are the forms in which affliction visits their habitations. But where is the happy home which sorrow never saddens, which adversity never darkens? In this vale of tears—this world of shadows—we seek in vain for such a dwelling. And when misfortune enters, and proclaims that man is born unto trouble, where is consolation and support to be found?

To those on whom poverty has laid its withering hand, or whom disease has stretched on the bed of languishing, or whose dwelling the angel of death has visited, would it impart consolation to be told to bear with stoical apathy their misfortunes, or to listen to declamations on the uselessness of grief, or to be asked to look forward to the land of silence and oblivion? Many are the consolations which can be given, apart from religion,—and miserable comforters are they all.

In religion alone there is what can soothe and support the soul in the day of trouble and of darkness. It teaches men that every trial, whether personal, domestic, or worldly, comes from Him who ruleth over all; that it is designed in great mercy to bring men to himself; that it is part of that mysterious, but divine discipline, by which they are fitted for glory; and that when all their trials shall have come to a close, they will enter into that happy land where neither sorrow, nor suffering, nor death, nor sin, ever enter.

Look to that house in the day of misfortune, where religion is unknown, and where its inmates are the votaries of infidelity and superstition. If their calamity be poverty, then the hard hand of penury is doubly severe; if their misfortune be disease, it is submitted to with repining; and pain gathers intensity from fretfulness; death is looked forward to with terror; the grave is looked to not only as the sepulchre of vitality, but of hope.

APOSTACY TO MAHOMMEDANISM.

The following interesting account is extracted from "Jowett's Christian Researches in the Mediterranean."

"I had heard, late yesterday evening, that an Englishman is going to turn Turk. I thought, yet not without shuddering, that I should like to be present at the scene, and that it might be turned to some good purpose. I obtained, therefore, what information I could on the subject; and noted down some questions which I should like to ask the man. This morning I inquired whether I might witness the ceremony; and, happily found no objection. Mr John Werry and myself, therefore, preceded by the English Dragoman or Interpreter, and by the Head Janissary or Turkish Guard in the service of the English Consul, went to witness a scene of this nature.

"We entered the apartments of the Mayor; his Deputy received us, in a very shabby room. Pipes and coffee were served—very little conversation. The Deputy had a pair of long scissors in his hand, with which he was cutting little square pieces of paper, called Tewems; on which he had written Orders or Patents, and which he signed with a small signet. Presently a stout man came in, attended by servants, bearing a present in a basket. The man was a Tunisine, and was come to raise troops for Algiers. Never did I see so stout a man; he seemed built like a tower.

"The man was soon brought in, and stood at the far end of the room, in the midst of a group of Turks. There were sixteen Turks in the room, and the Russian Dragoman was also present.

"Mr Werry began by asking, why he wished to turn Turk. He said, for a very plain reason—that he could not live by his own religion!—He had been on board many years, and suffered ill-treatment. This he said in a faint and skulking manner, standing so that Mr Werry could only just see him, and entirely avoiding my view. Mr Werry said, that he was there on the part of the English Consul, whose son he was, to offer him safe passage to England; and, if he had been bribed, that he would see to his being set in a fair way of business, or something to that effect. The man answered, 'No; I shall remain where I am. I have made up my mind.' Mr Werry said, 'Remember, that what you are going to do now cannot be undone, and that it is a disgrace to a man to change his religion.' The man made no reply, except to mutter something, that he saw no importance in the question of religion. Then turning to me, Mr Werry said, 'You see he is resolved: what more can we do?'

"I then asked the man how long he had taken to think about it. He said he had been now two days thinking of it. 'And don't you know, that, in changing your religion, you are denying your only Saviour—the Lord that bought you?' He just looked at me, but gave me no answer. 'You said that you change in order that you may live better; but what will you do in the day of judgment?' He said something which seemed to me to imply that he did not take my meaning; probably not having looked for such kind of questions. I therefore said, 'When Jesus Christ, the Redeemer, comes to judge the world, what will you do, who have denied him?' He hung back behind the Turks, without answering. 'You see,' said Mr Werry, 'that he is lost.' It seemed to me, from the manner of the company, that they were now going to bring him forward to go through the form; and Mr Werry, by his manner, gave him up as a lost man. He was himself indeed, as he afterwards said to me, inwardly depressed at the sight of such a victim. I said, however, to the man—'My friend,—for he would hardly face me, but slunk back, so that I was obliged to lean forward a little—since you seem bent on this bad act, yet remember, hereafter, that Peter denied his Master three times; yet afterwards he repented, and Christ forgave him; and it would be better for you thus to repent.' I had no time to say more, for they put him forward, and he willingly stepped up on the raised floor where we sat, and stood before the Moolah; though, I am persuaded, not without some uncomfortable sensations, for he was very much indisposed to speak to us—very white in the face—and, once or twice, his legs trembled, as I perceived from his loose trowsers; whether from a troubled conscience, or only from the impressiveness of the scene, I cannot divine. Thus he stood before the Priest, who went over a form of words in Arabic, two words at a time, so that the man might repeat them after him. They might be about five sentences. I did not understand them; but they ended with the usual declaration, That there is but one God, and Mahomet is the Prophet of God. The man was then immediately taken out of the room."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF CHRISTIAN FREDERICK SWARTZ.

CHRISTIAN FREDERICK SWARTZ was born at Sonnenburg, a small town in Prussia, on the 26th of October 1726. His parents appear to have occupied a respectable station in life. His mother, who was a woman eminent for her piety, died during his infancy, and the education of her son seems to have been a subject which occupied much of her attention upon her death bed. As the prayerful Hannah dedicated the infant Samuel to the God who had given him, saying, "As long as he liveth he shall be lent to the Lord," so did the pious mother of Swartz, with her dying breath, dedicate her infant son to the Holy Ministry, and obtained a promise from her husband and her attendant pastor, that he should be trained up in remembrance of this sacred destination. When we think of the forty-eight years of eminent uninterrupted usefulness in the vineyard of Christ, which that devoted child afterwards went through, shall we not be convinced that the fervent effectual prayer of a righteous mother availeth much?

At the age of eight years, young Swartz was sent to the principal grammar school at Sonnenberg, "where" says Dr Pearson, "he received very good impressions from the moral and religious instructions of its rector, Mr Holme." At a very early age Swartz used frequently to retire from his companions and pour out his heart before God, and it is unnecessary to say, that he found this practice highly beneficial. Accordingly he mentioned in after life, that when conscious of having acted wrong, he could never regain tranquillity of mind, until he had earnestly implored the forgiveness of God. During his stay at this school, he partook, for the first time, of the holy communion; but although at the time considerably affected, these serious impressions were speedily effaced. Before entering the university, he was sent to an academy at the town of Custrin, where, by associating with thoughtless companions, his affections were still more estranged from God.

At the age of twenty, Swartz, still undecided in religion, entered the university of Halle, when Professors Baumgarten, Michaelis, Knapp, and Freylinghausen were in the meridian of their glory. But the pernicious influence of a brilliant literary theology was graciously neutralized by the sacred and sanctifying atmosphere of the orphan house in which he boarded, where he was chosen to assist in the evening assemblies for prayer, and where he enjoyed intercourse with the pious Professor Francke, the zealous supporter of Missions. Here he met with the amiable Schultz, and under his care undertook to assist in correcting the printing of the Tamul Bible, having studied the language simply for this end. Little did he think, when first he sat down to its knotty characters, that it would one day be familiar to him as his mother-tongue—that for nearly half a century to come it was to be the medium through which he would beseech idolaters to believe in Jesus. Thus was the mind of the young student directed to the far distant scene of his holy and happy labours; so that he writes, soon after his arrival in India, "It is a sweet comfort to my heart that I am enabled to say, it is Thou, oh my God, who hast conducted me to these parts; I have not run hither of my own accord, but would rather have declined the call, if thy unseen hand had not retained me."

At the time when Swartz was studying at the university, Professor Francke was employed in procuring missionaries to be sent to India. Swartz determined to offer himself for this arduous enterprise; could he only gain his father's consent. Without delay he set out for his native place, and there made known his thoughts to his parent, who, after three days' consideration signified his consent, and giving him a blessing, bade him depart in God's name; charging him, at the same time, to forget his native country, and his father's house, and to go, and win many souls to Christ. All was now preparation for his departure, and although an advantageous offer was made to him of entering upon the ministry at home, his mind was so set upon proceeding to India, that he refused to accept of it. On the 6th of September 1749, he was ordained to the sacred ministry at Copenhagen. It being intended that he should proceed to India by way of England, on the 8th of December, he, in company with two other missionaries, arrived in London, where they remained six weeks. The directors of the East India Company having, at the request of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, kindly granted them a free passage out, they proceeded to Deal, where they embarked in the ship Lynn, Captain Egerton. On the 12th of March 1750 they set sail, and arrived in India about the middle of the July following.

We shall now proceed, as briefly as possible, rapidly to sketch the labours of this great and good man. On his arrival at Tranquebar, in Southern India, he laboured in the Danish Mission there for fifteen years. His first endeavour was to make himself master of the language, and in this he was indefatigable. "At seven in the morning," says he, "we begin, and practise Tamul almost the whole forenoon. Three days in the week Mr Maderus comes to us at ten, and gives us a lesson in Portuguese. From two to three we again read Tamul. Afterwards, every one remains above till five. From five to six, I and dear brother Autermann practise speaking Tamul. We perceive that God helps us on from day to day. In the morning and evening we excite each other by joint prayer and reading the Word of God." In consequence of this diligence he preached in Tamul four months after his arrival in India; and in a few months after, entered upon more regular labours. These included a catechetical hour in the Malabar school, "with the youngest lambs"—almost daily excursions into the villages, speaking with Christians and heathens—and preparations for baptism with native converts, most of whom he afterwards baptized. Catechising the Portuguese school, and preaching in Portuguese, were also parts of his regular labours. During his first years he read through the Mythological books of the Malabars, which gave him great power in arresting the attention of the natives. His extra labours consisted in a pedestrian tour as far north as Cuddalore, and south to Negapatam, preaching, administering the sacrament, distributing books and tracts, "and rejoicing at the evident proofs afforded by many, of a cordial reception of the Word of God." He also made a five months' visit to Ceylon. From Point Pedro to Point de Galle, the northern to the southern extremity of the Island, he preached to Danes, Idolators, and Mahomedans—visited hospitals—admonished clergymen—advised governors—and, after due preparations, administered the Lord's Supper five times.

Trichinopoly was the next scene of the labours of Swartz, during twelve years, under the auspices of the English "Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge." Here his income was £48 a-year. A room in an old Gentoo building was his lodging, just large enough to hold himself and his bed. A dish of rice and vegetables, dressed after the manner of the natives, was his ordinary food. A piece of dimity, dyed black, his annual supply of clothing. He preached incessantly to the natives, both in the town and villages round, and was not long without a congregation of converted Hindoos. From these he chose four or five catechists, whom he contrived to maintain. He daily instructed them how to preach Jesus to their benighted brethren in a winning manner. On their return in the evening they related their labours, their difficulties, and their success. The English garrison had no chaplain—Swartz cared for their souls—gradually made himself master of the language—first read the English service, and sermons from evangelical English divines,—then preached himself, and with wonderful power persuaded whole garrisons, so that they soon subscribed money enough to build him a church. He also held a prayer meeting with the most pious of the soldiers, which God did not leave without a blessing.

During his residence at this place, while he was one day reading an English tract, on the fifteenth chapter of St. Luke, under a shady tree, an old Hindoo, who had often entreated him not to trouble him with his Christian tenets, approached him, in company with several others, and begged to know what he was reading. Mr Swartz told him that it was a narrative of the truly paternal conduct of God towards us, and of our refusal to render due obedience to his kind and gentle government; thus abusing his mercies, and bringing upon ourselves distress and misery. Notwithstanding this, there was, he said, a way opened by which we might return to our justly offended Maker, and become partakers of his grace and benediction. The old man being pleased with this parable, Swartz proceeded to relate to him that of the sower, telling him why the seed did not every where bring forth good fruit. He comprehended this also perfectly, and asked whether God is not omnipresent. "Yes," he replied, "he sees every thing that passes on earth, whether it be good or evil; but his omnipresence is formidable to the wicked." The Hindoo said, "In my heart, inwardly, I worship God." "If that is the case," rejoined Mr Swartz, "your outward conduct must prove the reverence which you profess to entertain in your heart towards the Almighty. What would you think of a man, who reproached and even struck you, while he pretended that he had cordial love for you in his heart?" The Hindoo confessed that he could not value such love. "Neither," he concluded, "can God accept the homage which you profess to feel inwardly for him, while in your words and conduct you deny and dishonour him." Swartz visited Tanjore almost every year, sometimes three and even four times, visited the Christians, attended the schools, and was introduced to the Rajah Tuljajec. Early and late, covered over with dust, he preached to the natives, who in great numbers surrounded him. Repentance, Faith, Reconciliation with God, through Jesus Christ, were his themes. He frequently expounded the parables, till he was quite exhausted. The people commended his doctrine, and often said, "Oh, that the King would embrace it! all would then forsake heathenism." At the request of the Rajah, he learned the Mahratta language, to which he owed much of his subsequent influence at Court.

Swartz had been 27 years in India, and was 52 years of age when he removed his residence to Tanjore, a place of more importance, being the seat of the native government. This formed his head-quarters for the last 20 years of his life. It was on his removal thither that he undertook a confidential embassy from the Madras Government to Hyder Ali. All the way to Seringapatam, and even in the palace of the fierce Sultan of Mysore, he preached Jesus to high and low, as long as his strength would allow, none presuming to hinder him. The only remuneration which he would accept for this expedition, was a salary to his successor at Trichinopoly, and bricks and lime for his church at Tanjore. His ordinary labours he thus describes:—"I preach from 8 to 10 to the English—from 10 to 12 to the Malabars—from 4 to 5 to the Portuguese. At 7 in the evening we have prayer—and then I say, 'Blessed Jesus, I have sowed—give thou the increase.'" An occurrence, which happened about this time, is related by Christian David, who was afterwards ordained by Heber, and who, then a boy, waited on Swartz. It is admirably characteristic of his primitive godliness:—"They had been travelling all day, and arriving at a small village at sunset, the good man sat down under a tree, and conversed with the natives who came round him, whilst his house-keeper was cooking their evening meal. When the rice and curry were spread on the plantain leaf, Swartz stood up to ask a blessing on the food they were going to share, and to thank God for watching over them through the dangers of the day, and providing so richly for their repose and comfort. His heart was full of gratitude, and expressed itself in the natural eloquence of prayer and praise. The poor boy for some time repressed his impatience, but his hunger at last overpowered his respect for his master, and he ventured to expostulate with him, and remind him that the curry would be cold. He describes very touchingly the earnestness and solemnity of the reproof he received. 'What!' said the pious Missionary, 'shall our gracious God watch over us through the heat and burden of the day, and shall we devour the food which he provides for us at night, with hands which we have never raised in prayer, and lips which have never praised him?'

The following is an extract from a letter addressed by Swartz to his friends at Vellore, immediately after his recovery from illness:—"If the mind be sound, all is well; the rest we shall quit when we enter into the grave. That will cure all our bodily indispositions. On this subject I meditate frequently. And, O! may God grant me grace to do it more effectually, that I may number my (perhaps very few) days. Eternity is an awful subject, which should be continually in our mind.

"I know, I feel it, that I have no righteousness of my own, whereon I would dare to depend for eternal happiness. If God should enter with me into judgment, what would become of me? But blessed, for ever blessed, be the adorable mercy of God, which has provided a sure expedient for guilty man. The atonement of Jesus is the foundation of my hope, peace, love and happiness. Though I am covered all over with sin, the blood of Jesus cleanseth me from all mine iniquities, and sets my heart at rest. Though I am a corrupted creature, the Spirit of Jesus enlighteneth, cheereth, and strengtheneth us to hate and abominate all sin, and to renounce the lusts of the world and the flesh. Though the day of judgment is approaching, the love of God comforts us so far as to have boldness to appear before our Judge; not as if we were innocent creatures, but because we are pardoned, washed, and cleansed in the blood of Christ.

"O! my dear friends, an interest in the atonement of Jesus, and a participation in the graces of his Spirit; these constitute a Christian, these cheer and strengthen the heart, these glorify God, and prepare for heaven.

"Let us daily, therefore, come before God through the blessed Jesus; but let us, at the same time, not neglect the second point, viz., our sanctification. Our time is short. Within some days, I have sojourned in this country thirty-four years. The end of my journey is, even according to the course of nature, near. May I not flag! May my last days be the best! But as long as we live together upon earth, let us admonish and stir up one another."

The three years' desolation of the country, during the Carnatic war, greatly increased the beneficent labours of Swartz. Many were compelled by famine to join his congregation—he both supplied their temporal wants, and fed them with the bread of life. For 17 months he ministered to the bodily necessities of a considerable number. Often 800 poor people assembled. Instead of giving money, he prepared food and distributed it, many having no cooking utensils. When peace was restored, we find Swartz travelling through the south of India, with the help of the Madras and native governments, establishing English provincial schools; and next year confirming the Tinnevely Mission, which at this day is putting forth the buds of promise. He was still able to go through his ordinary work among heathens and Christians. "Meanwhile," (says he) "I feel the approaches of age; but as long as I live, and have any strength left, I shall gladly take my share in the work."

In a letter written in his 69th year, he thus expresses himself:—"Though I am now in the 69th year of my age, I am still able to perform the ordinary functions of my office. Of sickness I know little or nothing. How long I am to say so, my Creator and Preserver knows. My only comfort is the redemption made by Jesus Christ. He is, and shall be, my wisdom. By him I have received the salutary knowledge which leads me to the favour of God. He is my righteousness. By his atonement I have pardon of my sins, being clothed in his righteousness, my sins will not appear in judgment against me—they are blotted out by the atoning blood of Jesus. He is likewise my sanctification. In his holy life I best learn the whole will of God, and by his Spirit I shall daily be encouraged and strengthened to hate every sin, and to walk in the way of the commandments of God. He is, and I hope he will be, my redemption. By him I shall be delivered from all evil, and made eternally happy.

"Let others glory in what they please: I will glory in Christ Jesus, the only and perfect author of all happiness. Should I presume to rely on my own virtue, I should despair. Though I heartily wish to obey God, and follow the example of my Saviour; though I will endeavour by the grace of God to subdue my inclination to sin—yet in all this there is, and ever must be, imperfection; so that I dare not stand upon so rotten a ground. But to win Christ, and to be found in him, in life and death, and even in the day of judgment, was St. Paul's wish; this has been the wish of all genuine Christians; this shall be mine as long as I breathe. This was not a peculiarity in St. Paul's character. No; he admonishes all to follow him in this point. This close adherence to Christ will not make us indolent in the pursuit of holiness. It will rather impel, strengthen and cheer us in the work of true and Christian holiness. St. Paul wished to be made like unto the death of Jesus, which is the summit of true holiness.

"As this, perhaps, may be my last letter to you, I cannot but entreat you to follow St. Paul, that excellent pattern of true goodness. By doing so, you will easily withstand and overcome the temptations of a vain world; you will live and die in peace; and, at last, be received into glory.

"We have known one another a long time on earth. May we know one another in a blessed eternity, where sin and sorrow never shall disturb us! Watch and pray, that you may be counted worthy to stand before the Son of man your Redeemer."

During his last year, when he was 72 years of age, having been 48 years in India, he pursued his usual labours and studies with great fervour. He preached every Sunday in English and Tamil by turns, and on Wednesdays lectured in Portuguese and in German to the soldiers of the 51st regiment. He explained the New Testament at morning and evening prayers, and dedicated an hour every day to the instruction of the Malabar children in the truths of Christianity. He took particular delight in visiting the members of his congregation, telling them plainly whatever was blameable in their conduct, and animating them by every powerful argument to walk worthy of their profession. He listened to the accounts given by the Catechists of their conversations with men of all creeds and characters—and directed them to a wise and faithful discharge of their office. But his strength was visibly on the decline, and he frequently spoke of his departure, to which he looked forward with joy.

What mind can turn away from such a picture as this, without remembering that it is written,

The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree;
He shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon;
He shall still bring forth fruit in old age;
He shall be fat and flourishing.

Or, if the exursive fancy may change the simile to a tree more suitable to the clime, it might compare him to the fig-tree—

"Such as at this day to Indians known
In Malabar or Deccan, spreads her arms—
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother tree a pillared shade,
High overarched, and echoing walks between."

From a remote corner of Germany he came, unaided by birth or splendid talent, or by what the world calls riches—an humble Missionary. God planted him in Southern India, watering his roots with the streams of purest evangelism, warming him with the beams of his reconciled countenance, till he sent his branches far and wide along the rich coast of Coromandel—over the well-watered plains of Tanjore—and amid the cinnamon groves of spicy Ceylon. His faithful Catechists, the chief of his spiritual family, became, like the bended twigs of the banyan, themselves taking deep root, and growing up around the venerable parent tree, to unite in forming "a pillared shade," where many an idolatrous Hindoo, wearied with the vain search for peace from his miserable idols, sat down to hear the glad tidings of salvation by grace.

There are many features in the character of Swartz well worthy of our study. His singular disinterestedness in regard to money—his unbounded charity, combined with the faculty of carefully husbanding, which enabled him to leave between £8,000 and £10,000 to the Mission, "that the cause of Christ might be his heir," may well claim our attention. His peculiar openness of mind gave him amazing power over Hindoos and Europeans of all sects, made way for him to the heart of the Rajah, commanded the reverence of the despotic Hyder Ali himself, and obtained for him an ascendancy with political governors of all principles, which no other Missionary ever possessed. His powers of speaking to the heart—of outwitting metaphysical Brahmins—of convincing supercilious Mahomedans—of winning the attention and affection of children—are amply testified by the multitudes whom he drew over to confess the superior excellence of Christianity, and the goodly company of upwards of six thousand, whom he was instrumental in turning to the open profession of the Gospel. The romantic features of his character were few and simple; as when before leaving Ceylon, he travelled to Point Pedro, for the purpose of seeing, and preaching under the very tree under which the celebrated Buldaus first preached to the natives. But if we were asked to point out the leading trait, which, above any other, gave a peculiar colouring to Swartz's whole history, we would point to his pervading cheerfulness. He seemed to preserve the equal mind in arduous circumstances without an effort. Light-heartedness, without a shade of levity—unbroken tranquillity, without a tendency to slothfulness—distinguish him from almost every other Missionary. He lived careful for nothing—and the peace of God fortified his heart and mind. He died as he had lived. "We sung the hymn, 'Christ is my life,'" says Gerické, "when he began to sing with us—spoke very humbly of himself, and extolled his Redeemer—and wished to be dissolved, and to be with Christ. 'Had it pleased him,' he said, 'to spare me a little longer, I should have been glad. I should then have been able to speak yet a word to the sick and poor, but His will be done. May He but in mercy receive me—into thy hands I commend my spirit—thou hast redeemed me, O God of truth.' After this, the native assistants sung the last verse of the hymn—'O head so full of bruises'—he joining with them. He then rested a little. After which, he expressed a desire to be raised up, unexpectedly opened his lips—and expired in the arms of the faithful native fellow-labourers of this place."

We cannot refrain from quoting the following beautiful description of the funeral of this truly eminent man. It is written by Mr Kohlhoff, who was present at the mournful ceremony:—"His funeral was a most awful and very affecting sight. It was delayed a little beyond the appointed time, as Serfojee Rajah wished once more to look at him. The affliction which he suffered at the loss of the best of his friends, was very affecting. He shed a flood of tears over his body, and covered it with a gold cloth. We intended to sing a funeral hymn, whilst the body was conveyed to the chapel; but we were prevented from it by the bitter cries and lamentations of the multitudes of poor who had crowded into the garden, and which pierced through our souls. We were of course obliged to defer it till our arrival at the chapel.

"The burial service was performed by the Rev. Mr Gerické, in the presence of the rajah, the resident, and most of the gentlemen who resided in the place, and a great number of native Christians, full of regret for the loss of so excellent a minister—the best of men. O may a merciful God grant, that all those who are appointed to preach the Gospel to the heathen world may follow the example of this venerable servant of Christ! And may he send many such faithful labourers, to fulfil the pious intentions and endeavours of the honourable Society for the enlargement of the kingdom of Christ! May he mercifully grant it, for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ."

The following character of Swartz, is from the pen of Mr Cammerer:—"Nothing could possibly afford me more lively satisfaction than the society of Mr Swartz. His unfeigned piety, his real and conscientious attention to every branch of his duties, his sincerity,—in short, his whole demeanour filled me with reverence and admiration. He treated me like a brother, or rather like a tender parent, and instructed me in the most agreeable manner in the Malabar language. The same did Mr Kohlhoff, who is meekness and humility itself. Many an evening passed away, as if it had been but a single moment, so exceedingly interesting proved the conversation of this truly venerable man, and his relations of the singular and merciful guidance of God, of which he had experienced so many proofs throughout his life, but particularly during the dreadful war in India. The account he gave of the many dangers to which his life had been exposed, and the wonderful manner in which it was often preserved, his tender and grateful affection towards God, his fervent prayers and thanksgivings, his gentle exhortations constantly to live as in the presence of God, zealously to preach the Gospel, and entirely to resign ourselves to God's kind providence—all this brought many a tear into my eyes, and I could not but ardently wish that I might one day resemble Swartz. His disinterestedness, his honourable manner of conducting public business, procured him the general esteem both of Europeans and Hindoos. Every one loved and respected him, from the king of Tanjore to the humblest native.

"Nor was he less feared; for he reprov'd them, without respect to situation or rank, when their conduct deserved animadversion; and he told all persons what they ought to do, and what to avoid, to promote their temporal and eternal welfare. The king frequently observed, that much in the world was effected by presents and gold, and that he himself had done much by those means: but that with Padre Swartz they answered no purpose. This excellent man often told me, that the favour of God, and communion with Christ, was of greater value to him than 'thousands of gold and silver.' Certainly, by the goodness of God, he has been made a great blessing to this country. What other men could not effect without military force, he has done by the personal influence which he possessed over the people, and which arose exclusively from his integrity and sincere piety."

Almost every Missionary that sets foot on the shores of India has had occasion to revere the memory of Swartz. The remembrance of such a man is sweet to every pious mind. Even his personal appearance becomes to the imagination an object of interest; and on this point our curiosity is gratified, by the following picture, drawn by the pen of an intimate friend:—"Figure to yourself a stout well-made man, somewhat above the middle size, erect in his carriage and address, with a complexion rather dark, though healthy, black curled hair, and a manly engaging countenance, expressive of unaffected candour, ingenuousness, and benevolence; and you will have an idea of what Mr Swartz appeared to be at first sight."

An interesting summary of his virtues is contained in the lines inscribed on the granite stone, which covers the grave of Swartz—peculiarly interesting, as being the composition of the young Hindoo Rajah, who, by the influence of Swartz, had been raised to the Musnud of Tanjore—and though the rhyme be rude, yet does it possess the invaluable properties of truth and sincerity.

Firm wast thou, humble, and wise,
Honest, pure, free from disguise,
Father of Orphans, the widows' support,
Comfort in sorrow of every sort,
To the benighted, dispenser of light,
Doing and pointing to that which is right;
Blessing to princes, to people, to me—
May I, my father, be worthy of thee,
Wisheth and prayeth thy Sarabjee.

A WALK TO CALVARY.

PART II.

BY THE REV. MARCUS DODS,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Belford.

LET us resume our walk to Calvary, and our contemplation of the dying thieves. We last week pointed out the lessons which their fate is fitted to convey to parents; we shall now attend to some lessons of a more general kind with which they are fitted to furnish us. We shall attend, in the first place, to the import of the penitent's prayer, "Lord, remember me."

This prayer implies a firm conviction of the immortality of the soul. This may seem to be a remark hardly worth making in these days, when, how careless soever about the improvement and salvation of the soul men may in general be, yet few or none will be found seriously to call in question its immortality. It is material to remark this, however, as developing the character of the penitent thief. The immortality of the soul was little known at that early period; indeed, excepting among the Jews, it was hardly known at all, and even among them was far from being universally received. His associate in crime would seem to have been one of those who denied it. His firm conviction of the doctrine is a new proof that he had been piously brought up in his youth.

And the remark is not undeserving of being made, even on account of the state of matters among ourselves. Attempts, and these by no means of a contemptible character, are assiduously making to throw doubts upon the immortality of the soul, and banish this fundamental article from the popular creed. Materialism, which is intended to serve as an introduction to the denial of Christianity, has obtained the patronage of many scientific writers; while the insidious principles of German philosophy, in other words, of the most revolting atheism, have found a lamentably large portion of disciples among our manufacturing population.

Again, the prayer of the penitent thief implied a conviction of his need of a Saviour. He did not suppose that his sufferings in this world, however severe, would form any atonement for his sins before God. In this he shewed that he had arrived at a clearness of view, and a correctness of sentiment, with regard to the nature of sin, and the state in which it places us in the sight of God, which many professing Christians have not attained. Nothing can shew a more deplorable ignorance of the nature of the Gospel, than the supposition that our sufferings in this world are of an expiatory nature, and possess an atoning efficacy. Yet there are members of the Christian Church, and even in the Protestant Church, who hope that their sufferings will be available to lessen, or altogether to avert the punishment due to sin in a future state; and writers, to defend this gross absurdity, have not been wanting. The thief was better taught; and even at the moment of enduring the most infamous and cruel sufferings, he felt and acknowledged that these sufferings could avail him nothing before God, and therefore sought a Saviour's aid.

Farther, the penitent's prayer implied a hope at least, if not a conviction, that his situation was not desperate. He was in circumstances that might have naturally led him to despair. Any expectation entertained by him might truly seem to be hoping against hope. Yet he does not despair of mercy. This is a farther proof of the care that had been taken of his early education. Men, when they become sensible of their guilt, do not naturally look upon God as a merciful being. On the contrary, they regard him as an inexorable judge, and all who know anything of the matter, know that nothing is so difficult as to convince the awakened sinner that God is merciful. That he has outlived the day of grace, and sinned beyond the reach of mercy, is the temptation into which he most naturally falls. The penitent must have been long familiar with the character given of God in Scripture, so contrary to that which a sense of guilt assigns to him, else he would of necessity have despaired.

And finally, the prayer of the penitent implies a conviction that his fellow-sufferer was such a Saviour as he needed,—was in reality a divine person. There was unquestionably something peculiarly striking in the appearance of the Lord on the cross, and in the manner of his death. The centurion was struck with it, and said, "Of a truth this man was the Son of God;" and the people were struck with it, for when they saw what was done, "they smote upon their breasts and returned." And the thief, too, amidst his own agonies, could see the glory of the Divinity shining through the meanness and the sorrows of his fellow-sufferer, and made it his hope and his stay. What an affecting sight, to see a poor despised sufferer yet receiving worship, and hearing, and granting the prayer offered to him!

But it is obvious that he knew more of Christ than he could possibly learn by what he saw of him on the cross. He knew that Christ was going to the possession of great power, and that after his death he would still be able to save the souls of them that trusted in him. Now, this augured a more extensive knowledge, and more correct views than the apostles themselves at this time possessed. His death led them to despair. "We trusted," said they, in the language of despondency, "that it should have been he which should have redeemed Israel." The very last question that they asked before his ascension shewed a narrowness of view which the thief had escaped. "Wilt thou, at that time, restore the kingdom to Israel?" In fact, we cannot escape the conclusion, that this thief had been a frequent and attentive hearer of the Lord's discourses; and the miseries of his situation had led him to form a juster estimate of their true character than the apostles themselves had previous to the day of Pentecost done. He understood that, through sufferings, the Lord was passing into glory; and that with power and glory he would come again. His prayer plainly implies a knowledge which he could have acquired from the Lord's discourses alone; and which he could not even have acquired from them, had he not been previously well instructed in the Old Testament Scriptures, to the types and prophecies of which these discourses make so constant reference. What now, we may ask, becomes of the confidence with which the case of the penitent thief is so frequently referred to as a proof of the efficacy of a death-bed repentance? We are not going to deny that such a repentance may be genuine,—may be the work of the Holy Spirit,—and may be connected with salvation. We will not limit the grace of God. We will not even deny that, speaking of a man killed by a fall from his horse, it may, for anything we know, be a possible thing, that

Between the stirrup and the ground,
Mercy was sought, and mercy found.

But while we admit most readily, that a death-bed repentance may be truly a repentance unto life, we must maintain that while this is a possible thing, it is by no means a probable thing. And, omitting at present all the other considerations which should lead us to distrust a death-bed repentance, we maintain that the case of the penitent thief holds out no encouragement whatever to rely on any such desperate contingency. The principles which he manifested on the cross, were principles which were not then first implanted in his heart. The knowledge which he then displayed, it was impossible that he could have then for the first time acquired. The whole circumstances of the case render it obvious, that he had been carefully instructed in his youth, and had been neither an unfrequent nor an inattentive hearer of the Lord himself. And who can tell how near he might be to the kingdom of heaven, when he was hurried into crime, and to death?

Does this case, then, bear any resemblance to that of the man who, while conscious of his need of repentance, yet deliberately, and of set purpose, delays seeking for that repentance till the approach of death shall compel him to admit that he can delay no longer? Or does it bear the slightest resemblance to any of those cases in which it is constantly referred to, and in which we are given to understand, that a man habituated to crime from his earliest years, has at last become a true penitent, when these crimes have doomed him to the scaffold? Far be it from us to deny that true repentance, and genuine conversion may be granted at the last hour of life, even to the man who has purposely delayed seeking repentance, while conscious of his need of it; or to him who has never in his life thought of repentance till the approach of death has compelled him to think of it. But we repeat, that the penitent thief affords no example of either the one or the other of these cases, and in neither the one nor the other, does it furnish us with the slightest ground of hope,—much less does it afford ground for that unhesitating confidence which is so often drawn from it. Suffering may, and often does, awaken to the most active and beneficial operation principles that have long been dormant, or that have for a time been overwhelmed. This was the case with the penitent thief. But where good principles are wanting, no intensity of suffering can implant them. This was exemplified in the case of the impenitent thief. Could intensity of suffering implant good principles, it is plain that he would have become penitent too. But his sufferings had just the opposite effect. And the opposite effect produced by the same sufferings on the two men, makes manifest the very wide difference between their characters,—a difference which assuredly existed long before it was thus manifested. The one was prepared by previous instruction, to profit by his afflictions. The other had been furnished with no such preparation, and his afflictions produced their natural effect, they drove him to blasphemy and despair.

Let us hear no more, then, of the confidence in the efficacy of a death-bed repentance, drawn from the case of the penitent thief. We again repeat, for we are anxious not to be misunderstood upon this subject, that while we do not deny such a repentance may possibly be repentance unto life, we do deny that the penitent thief is an example of this, or holds out the slightest encouragement to hope, that the man who has lived unacquainted with the principles of religion, and regardless of its precepts, is likely, by the dread of an approaching eternity, to become impressed with its importance, or to experience its power.

Again, each of these thieves may be considered as the representative of a class common among ourselves. The one, without any sense of the evil of sin, is anxious to escape from its consequences; and he says, "If thou be Christ, save thyself and us." The other seeks for no deliverance from a punishment which he feels to be just; and his mind is too much occupied with his future prospects to have a thought to waste upon his present sufferings, however severe. Now, there are many men who would willingly accept of Christ as their priest, to atone for their sins, and save them from punishment; but who have no wish to have any connexion with him as their king, to deliver them from the present power of sin. They say, with the one thief, save us from the penal consequences of sin; but they do not say, with the other thief, save us from sin itself, no matter for its present effects. Let our readers, then, consider, whether they be alike willing to accept of Christ in all his offices, and alike sensible of their need of him in them all; let them consider whether they be not anxious to experience his sin-forgiving power, without any desire to experience his soul-renewing power.

The impenitent thief who reviled the Lord on the cross, will again meet that Lord when He cometh in his kingdom. We dread to think of the feelings with which he will appear before the tribunal of Him who once suffered along with him, and of the fearful bitterness with which he will then curse his own folly, when he sees the penitent thief taken into the kingdom of God, and himself shut out. But let us reflect that our opportunities of knowing the Saviour are greater than those which he possessed, and if we reject that Saviour our guilt is greater than his. It can avail us nothing to say, that we have never reviled the Saviour, as he in the agony of his sufferings did. If Christ crucified has been proclaimed to us in vain; if neither his instructions nor his sufferings have attracted our regard, then we must at last take our place by the side of the impenitent thief, and participating in his guilt, be content to share his doom. The one or the other of these thieves we resemble in the principles which we cherish, and with the one or the other of them our eternity must be spent. Can we find more interesting matter for a little serious consideration, than to try to ascertain which of them is the type of our character now, and will be our companion for ever?

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES GIBSON,

College Church, Glasgow.

"I said, I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue; I will keep my mouth with a bridle, while the wicked is before me. I was dumb with silence: I held my peace, even from good; and my sorrow was stirred. My heart was hot within me; while I was musing the fire burned; then spake I with my tongue: Lord, make me to know mine end, add the measure of my days, what it is; that I may know how frail I am. Behold, thou hast made my days as an hand-breadth, and mine age is as nothing before thee: verily, every man at his best state is altogether vanity. PSAL. XXXIX. 1-5.

THIS Psalm was composed by David. It seems to be the result of feelings deeply agitated with contemplating the prospering insolence and profane opposition of the ungodly, and then softened and corrected by meditations on the shortness of human life and the vanity of all earthly grandeur,—by hope and trust in God,—by reflections on his own sinfulness, and by resignation to the will of God; at the same time accompanied by an ardent, but humble and submissive prayer to God for his merciful interference.

The language is simple, but strikingly beautiful and expressive. The style is highly figurative, and the imagery expressive and forcible; and if we pursue, with attention and seriousness, the train of thought suggested by it, we cannot fail to have our faith and resolutions strengthened, our convictions of the vanity of earthly objects, and the importance of our eternal interests, more strongly excited, our trust in God increased, our humility improved, resignation to the will of the Almighty cherished, by having our affections raised above this world, where we are all strangers and sojourners, as all our fathers were.

Verse 1st.—"I said, I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue; I will keep my mouth with a bridle, while the wicked is before me."

The Psalmist had observed the prosperity of the wicked, and he had probably experienced how apt he was to murmur at the apparently unequal dispensations of Providence,—that the wicked flourished as the green bay tree, enjoyed in abundance the bounties and blessings of this life, were successful in their designs, rose to power, honour and wealth, exulted in their greatness, and despised the righteous, who were often exposed to difficulty and hardship, to misery and oppression, and apparently neglected of God, whom they endeavoured to serve. In the pride of their hearts, the wicked attribute all their success to themselves,—give not God the glory, or conclude, at least, that their own character and efforts have deserved the success which God has given them; while the pretensions of those who lay claim to greater sanctity and righteousness, to greater love to God, and trust in his goodness, are evidently contradicted by the result, since, if they were the favourites of heaven, they would surely experience more of its protection and bounty. To justify this conclusion, they mark the failures of the righteous—invidiously set down their occasional faults as indubitable proofs of general insincerity, and congratulate themselves on their superior honesty, and freedom from the meanness and baseness of hypocrisy. The Psalmist, then, observing this state of things, and feeling its agitating effect upon his mind, in order to prevent any unworthy repinings against the justice and goodness of God, for permitting such apparently unequal distribution, and also that he may not give the wicked any just cause of speaking reproachfully against the conduct of the saints of God, he resolves to take heed to his ways, to order his conduct wisely, prudently and religiously before God and man; to obey the laws of God; to avoid all appearance of evil; to suppress every rising indication of impatience and discontent; and as, when under the influence of strong feeling, we are more liable to transgress by speech, and less able to restrain ourselves in that than in any other way, he resolves to be particularly watchful in this respect, to set a watch on the door of his lips, that he sin not with his tongue, to give vent to no bitter expressions against the injustice and wrong which he suffered from the wicked, and to be careful not to charge the wisdom, justice and goodness of the Almighty foolishly. He resolved even to keep his mouth with a bridle or muzzle, when the wicked were before him. That is, to keep the strictest restraint upon himself, when in the presence of those who would misrepresent his words, or catch at the excesses of his speech which he might imprudently suffer to escape him, and turn them to the dishonour of God, or the injury of piety and religion. Or it may be, that he resolved to keep himself under the strictest restraint when the wicked were before him; that is, in his thoughts, when he is considering their insolent and unjust conduct, and yet flourishing condition, lest he should be tempted to utter disrespectful and rebellious speeches against the government of the Supreme Being who sees the end from the beginning—knows the multiplied relations of all beings and events in the universe which he has created; and, no doubt, though we cannot comprehend them, orders all the arrangements of his Providence for the wisest and best purposes, and shall at the last day award to wickedness its due punishment, and to righteousness its due reward.

In pursuance of this resolution, he says, Verse 2d,—“I was dumb with silence: I held my peace even from good; and my sorrow was stirred.”

“I was dumb with silence.”—This is a Hebrew form of expression, to denote perfect silence. He uttered not a single expression that could possibly be misrepresented. With this view he held his peace even from good. We are commanded by our Saviour not to cast our pearls before swine because they are insensible of their value, and instead of receiving them with pleasure, would look upon them as offensive, and be excited to rage and fury, and turn again and rend those who were so foolish as to cast before them what was so little suited to their tastes and natures. There are persons so little impressed with a sense of religion,—so little sensible of the value of divine truth, and the importance of their everlasting interests,—so irrational, earthly, and sensual, and so proud of their own attainments and ignorant of their moral wants, that, speak to them of the majesty, holiness and justice of God, the glories of immortality, the happiness of piety, the danger, degradation, and misery of vice, the sinfulness of our nature, and the necessity of a faith in the Redeemer, of regeneration by the Holy Spirit, or of devotedness of body and soul to God, instead of listening with pleasure or interest, like fierce and savage animals, they will give way to rage and fury, trample these precious pearls under their feet, scoff at the sacred truths you unfold to them, blaspheme religion, condemn their God and Saviour, and turn upon you, as enemies who insult their understanding and their virtue.

In the presence of persons of this character, the Psalmist conceived it his duty to maintain the most perfect silence respecting the subjects he had been contemplating, and every thing connected with the religious dispensations and righteous government of God. But though his feelings were thus suppressed, and he avoided giving the adversary any just occasion of speaking reproachfully, yet his grief was not assuaged, but on the contrary, the more he reflected in secret on the obstinacy and perverseness of the wicked, and the more he restrained his speech from giving utterance to the feelings of his soul, the more strongly were his grief and vexation excited. And in Verse 3d, he goes on to describe the progress of his feelings. “My heart was hot within me: while I was musing the fire burnt; then spake I with my tongue.”

This verse has been interpreted by commentators as follows:—“While I was indulging my anger and grief, the fire burned; that is, my passions acquired more strength and violence, and increased to such a degree that they could not be suppressed.” “Then spake I with my tongue.” “I gave utterance to my feelings in rash, impatient, and impetuous language.” Taking the verse by itself and unconnected with what precedes or follows it this interpretation might be natural and just; but viewing it, as is most reasonable, in connection with the preceding and subsequent context, it seems, in this view, altogether insulated, and a variance with the resolutions expressed in the first verse, with the determined silence and quiet grief expressed in the second, and is certainly not a very natural introduction to the calm and contemplative prayer that immediately commences in the fourth verse. The whole Psalm, indeed, seems characterized by a sedate and chastened feeling, by a spirit of deep and submissive devotion; and by explaining the verse literally, which is always the most desirable way, when it can consistently be done, the unity of the Psalm is preserved, and the consistency, connection, and natural train of thought continued throughout.

When under restraint, his sorrow was stirred. In the retirement of his own bosom he was agitated with grief—"his heart was hot,"—an expression as much characteristic, in original scriptural language, of sorrowful as of angry passion. He had been vexed with the opposition and profane ridicule of the ungodly, he pitted their short-lived prosperity and triumph, he dreaded falling into the same dangers and follies, or being envious of their prosperity; and in this state of pensive and thoughtful meditation, the fire burnt, did not increase in violence, but, as the word denotes, wasted and consumed away before him, and reminded him of the passing nature of every thing earthly—that the career of the ungodly might be bright, but was hastening, by its own activity, to a close—that the vexations they occasioned would soon come to an end,—the agitations of grief would soon be stilled in the peaceful slumbers of the grave,—the things which now concerned him so much, would soon have passed away, as though they had never been, and it was therefore useless to disquiet himself in vain. Then, as if his former passions were almost subdued by his resolutions of prudent caution and silence, and his train of pensive meditation, he turns in peace to God, the wise and gracious disposer and judge of all, and utters the following prayer, which is well calculated to remove every remaining feeling of discontent, to allay entirely every stirring of passion, and to soothe the bitterness of grief.

Ver. 4th. "Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days what it is, that I may know how frail I am." Thou, O Lord, who knowest all things, who remainest for ever the same through the lapse of time and the revolution of ages, unaffected by change, and unmoved by the confusion and trouble of this vale of sin and tears, who rulest Supreme in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of this world, who presidest over the destinies of the sons of men, in whose hands are the issues of life and death, "O make me to know mine end," impress upon my soul a deep and abiding sense of what is to be the result of all the pride and greatness, the anxiety and fear, the joy and exultation, the griefs and resentments of this passing scene,—that it is to issue in the lowliness, corruption and silence of the tomb, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest, where the voice of the oppressor is no more heard, where the tongue of the scoffer lies still, where hostile passions no more agitate, where those who once were foes, sleep peacefully side by side, like infants lulled to rest, where the idle storm rages unheeded, and the rank grass waves over their narrow dwelling in token of the profound and undisturbed repose that reigns below. Here is a contemplation that makes envy at the prosperity of the wicked, discontent at the unequal dispensations of providence, and resentment at the opposition of the ungodly, appear in their true colours, vain, ridiculous and absurd.

The Psalmist farther prays God to impress upon his mind the measure of his days, the little sum of that period which now assumes such mighty importance,—what it in reality is, not as it appears to our imaginations, a lengthened period of returning years, but as it is in the eye of God, of reason and religion, viewed in connection with the vastness of eternity, with the importance of the work to be done in it, viz.: provision made for our everlasting necessities, with the amount of the enjoyment which it affords, and the misery which it yields. And this prayer he offers up, that he may be convinced how frail, how transitory and shortlived he is, and how useless it is to be deeply concerned about any thing that has respect merely to this fleeting existence—for,

Ver. 5th. "Behold thou hast made my days as an handbreadth, and mine age is as nothing before thee."

The shortness of human life is expressed in Scripture by a great variety of just, beautiful and striking images. It is spoken of as a sleep which is passed in a state of unconsciousness, and seems a mere blank in our existence;—as a dream of the night, which is characterized by alternations of hope and fear, joy and sorrow, ease and trouble, but all is the work of imagination, and is dissipated for ever by the light of day;—as grass, which groweth up green and fresh in the morning, but in the evening is cut down and withered;—as a tale that is told, that has excited a variety of feeling and of interest, and has consumed some time in the recital, but is soon totally forgotten or comprehended by the reflection of a moment;—as a shadow that has no substance or existence of its own, which a passing cloud or an intervening object obliterates in a moment. The force of these images is perceived, not by looking forward to the time before us, which imagination magnifies in the distance, and hope gilds with bright and durable colours; but by looking back on the past reality, on the space that has already been trode, on the time that is gone, that has sunk into the abyss of past eternity, and has scarcely left a trace behind it, which is comprehended by a single retrospective glance, and passes before the mind as a fleeting shadow which cannot be laid hold of, and which, when most lengthened, is soonest to escape from our view. In the Verse before us, the imagery is no less striking and expressive. "Behold, Thou hast made my days as an handbreadth, and mine age is as nothing before thee; verily every man at his best estate is altogether vanity." As an handbreadth, a little span, compared with the vast immensity of space, so are the days of man compared with the boundless infinitude of eternity, so inconceivably disproportioned, that the mind in vain endeavours to form a distinct conception of the difference. So impressed was the Psalmist with this comparison, that he adds, "mine age," the duration of my existence, "is as nothing before Thee," with whom a thousand years are but as one day, and one day as a thousand years, who art from everlasting to everlasting, without beginning of days or ending of years, without change and without decay, before whose all-comprehensive mind, time and space, magnitude and distance, past, present and future, are as nothing; how much more so must be the short, the troubled and uncertain existence of man! He comes forth in the helplessness of infancy, is preserved for a short time with tenderness and care, advances into the frivolity of childhood and the giddiness of youth, reaches the period of his manhood, and for some time can hardly allow himself to believe that the days of his childhood and youth are gone. He is thinking of putting away childish things, and forming plans, and pursuing schemes worthy of his riper years, when old age is silently and imperceptibly, but rapidly advancing upon him, and he declines into the vale of years, and sinks into the grave almost before he has had time to think how short his days have been.

But more fleeting still is frequently the course of man. Often is the tender flower nipped in the bud before its blossoms have expanded. Often when it has begun to give the fair promise of future loveliness, is it speedily laid low, and the hand that cultivated it so tenderly, bereft of its promised reward. Often when in the full and rich blow of beauty, and apparent health and vigour, is it involving in its bloom that worm that consumes it, or the blast is preparing that will shed its honours in the dust, and lay its green head low. Often too is the tree that has struck deep its roots like Lebanon, and spread its numerous branches round it, and bids fair long to defy the tempest, torn from the earth, or rent in sunder by the lightning and the storm. Thus the Psalmist is led to this conclusion, "Verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity."—More exactly rendered "every man in his most settled state is altogether vapour." This seems a favourite image with the sacred writers. Thus, St James: "For what is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." Similar to this are the expressions of Job. "O remember that my life is wind," a mere breath of air. As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so they that go down to the grave shall come up no more. Nothing could be more descriptive of perfect vanity, worthlessness and instability. Nothing is more fleeting or more easily dissipated than a cloud or vapour. You behold it for a moment apparently immovable, dense and substantial. You look again, and it is dispersed into a thousand fantastic shapes, which are hastening one after another to speedy dissolution. Or you behold it in bright effulgence, radiant in gold, azure and purple. With eager admiration you hasten to point it out to others, but ere you return, its hues are changed, it has shifted its place, and disappeared in airy nothing, or given birth to the storm and tempest. Just so is the best and most enduring state of man.

One day he appears strong in health, and exulting in life and vigour. In another, disease has attacked his constitution, subdued his spirit, and saddened his countenance. The hand of violence, or some one of the thousand contingencies of accident have shattered his frame, and he soon sinks to rise no more for ever. One day you behold him arrayed in power and splendour, exalted to honour and fame, luxuriating in wealth and grandeur, and while the sun of prosperity shines upon him, his heart is uplifted, he boasts of his greatness, and triumphs in its security. He flatters himself that his house shall continue for ever, and his dwelling-place to all generations; but ere another day the clouds of adversity begin to gather, unexpected revolutions occur, and he is precipitated from the heights of power and pride, to the depths of distress, disappointment and shame. One day you behold him far advanced in the road of learning and science, looking back with disdain on those he has outstripped in the course, and ready to receive the laurels of genius, when by some mysterious dispensation, the mental frame, so delicately adjusted, is deranged, and he sinks into the inactive gloom of melancholy and despair, or is torn by the wild and awful agitations of frantic and restless delirium. One day he may repose in the unrestrained confidence, be delighted with the ever affectionate welcome, and cheered with the peaceful content of home, of his family circle flourishing round him. In another, sickness has invaded his dwelling; some one of those dear to him as his own soul, is snatched away by the relentless hand of death, or, more affecting still, is betrayed into the path of the destroyer, and his little circle is saddened with grief and shame.

We conclude, only by saying, let us imitate the conduct of the Psalmist, and when distressed with the trials and sorrows of life, or grieved at the prosperity and insolence of the wicked, reflect how soon all these things must come to a close, and look up to God, who bringeth light out of darkness, and hope in Him. Let God be acknowledged in all that befalls us, and then shall our souls be refreshed with the thought, that even in the deepest affliction we are in the enjoyment of the light of the divine countenance, and have a gracious sense of our Father's love. We ought to remember that we have received less, inconceivably less than our sins have deserved; that they have been many, and highly aggravated; that they have made us liable to the everlasting punishment of God's righteous justice and eternal condemnation. Then may we acknowledge their magnitude, cast ourselves on the mercy of God in Christ, and, for his sake, solicit forgiveness of them, and pray for the Spirit of God to deliver us entirely from their power; earnestly desire to avoid every thing that would be discreditably to religion, or give the adversary any occasion to speak reproachfully; and thus we may the more easily and peacefully resign ourselves into the hand of God, and enjoy "that peace which passeth all understanding, which the world cannot give, and which it cannot take away."

HISTORY OF THE SHORTER CATECHISM.

BY THE REV. DUNCAN MACFARLAN,

Minister of Renfrew.

In the first number, I submitted a few thoughts on the arrangement observable in the Shorter Catechism; and it has since occurred, that it might be useful to subjoin some account of the origin of this little manual. But preparatory to this, it may be proper to observe, that the reformers generally gave great attention to this subject. Catechisms were, at a very early period, drawn up and used by all, or nearly all the Reformed Churches of Europe. The earliest which we recollect to have seen mentioned, as used by the Scottish Reformers, had been drawn up by Calvin. But in 1590, we find the General Assembly adopting measures for securing a general and national Catechism. "Anent the examination before the communion," say they, "it is thought meet for the common profite of the whole people, that an uniform order be kept in examination, and that ane schort form of examination be set down, be their breither, Messrs John Craig, Robert Pont, Thomas Buchanan, and Andrew Melvine, to be presented to the next Assembly." In 1591, a form was laid before the Assembly by Mr Craig, but it was remitted, with instructions "to contract in some schorter bounds." The abridged form was accordingly laid before the Assembly of 1592, and approved. The following directions were also added:—"Therefore, it is thought needfull, that every pastor travel with his flock, that they may buy the samen buick, and read it in their families, quereby they may be the better instructed; and that the samen be read and learnt in lector's (reading) schools, in place of the little Catechism (Calvin's)" This Catechism, or "Form of Examination," which is commonly called Craig's Catechism, consists of twelve heads or chapters, having the following titles:—"Of our miserable bondage through Adam—Of our redemption by Christ—Of our participation with Christ—Of the Word—Of our liberty to serve God—Of the Sacraments—Of Baptism—Of the Supper—Of Discipline—Of the Magistrate—Of the Table in special (meaning the Protestant mode of observing the Supper)—The end of our redemption." Under each of these are a number of questions and answers, amounting in all to ninety-six; and the latter are remarkably short and pertinent, and usually accompanied with at least one Scripture proof.*

When the Solemn League and Covenant was projected, contemplating, as it did, an ecclesiastical union between the three kingdoms, measures were also adopted for preparing a uniform Confession, Directory, and Catechism. And it is important to observe, that the plan afterwards executed by the Westminster Assembly, was first proposed in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. Towards the end of 1640, several Scottish commissioners, of whom Henderson was one, went to London to treat on matters then pending between the King and the Presbyterian party. Henderson returned in the July following, and found the General Assembly holding an adjourned meeting at Edinburgh, and anxiously waiting his arrival. He was immediately elected Moderator, and laid before them a letter from the Presbyterians in and about London, in which they complain of the spread of schismatical opinions, and earnestly crave the advice and assistance of the Assembly. In replying to this letter, the Assembly says, among other things, "We have learned by long experience, ever since the time of the Reformation, and specially after the two kingdoms have been—in the great goodness of God to both—united under one head and monarch, but most of all, of late, which is not unknown to you, what danger and contagion in matters of kirk government, of divine worship, and of doctrine, may come from the one kirk to the other; which, beside all other reasons, make us to pray to God, and to desire you, and all that love the honour of Christ, and the peace of these kirks and kingdoms, heartily to endeavour, that there might be in both kirks, one Confession, one Directory for public worship, one Catechism, and one Form of Kirk Government." And agreeably to this, we find Henderson suggesting to the same Assembly, only twelve days before the writing of this letter, the propriety of drawing up such a Confession, Catechism, and Directory; thus leaving scarcely any reason to doubt, that the thing itself was projected by Henderson, and first laid before the General Assembly; but that the Assembly had itself been long favourable to such a measure, and was immediately incited to it by what had taken place in England. The Assembly accordingly approved highly of the measure, and urged Henderson to undertake the drawing up of the documents required. And to render this the more easy, they allowed him to refrain from preaching, and to avail himself of assistance. But he declined the task, as being too arduous. The subject is repeatedly mentioned in the Assembly's correspondence, during the intervening period; but it does not appear that anything was done before the meeting of the Westminster Assembly in 1643. This Assembly met under the authority of the English Parliament, but chiefly at the instance of the Scottish Church. It was composed of a hundred and twenty-one divines, with thirty lay assessors, and five commissioners from the Church of Scotland, and continued its sittings for upwards of five years.

The matters laid before this Assembly were numerous and important, and some of them were detailed with great minuteness. It unfortunately happens, however, that our information respecting the drawing up of the Catechisms is meagre and imperfect. The late Dr Belfrage of Falkirk appears to have been at great pains in collecting whatever was accessible on this point. We have made some farther inquiries, but have hitherto found scarcely anything, beyond what he seems to have examined and abridged. The result of his inquiries will be found in an Introduction, prefixed to his "Practical Exposition of the Assembly's Shorter Catechism." And the sum of what we have been able to gather either from his work or original authorities, may be stated in a few words. In 1647, while the Assembly was engaged discussing the different articles of the Confession, committees were appointed to reduce these into the form of two Catechisms; a larger, which was to serve as a text book for pulpit exposition, according to a usage of the churches on the continent, and a smaller, for the instruction of children. It appears, however, that before the Confession had been finished, some progress was made in composing the Catechism, and that the reducing of it to a conformity with the Confession, was an after thought. "We made long ago," says Baillie, "a pretty progress in the Catechism, but falling on rules and long debates, it was laid aside till the Confession was ended, with the resolution to have no matter in it, but what was expressed in the Confession." And accordingly, much curiosity has been excited respecting the author of the original draft. Dr Belfrage, after detailing various opinions, and assigning reasons for his own, alleges Dr Arrowsmith to be the most likely person. After weighing the evidence, by which this and several other opinions have been supported, we have not been able to come to any other conclusion, than that the matter is altogether uncertain. After the Catechism had been finished by the committee, it was laid before the Assembly and approved of, first in so many successive portions, and afterwards as a whole. On the 5th of November, it was approved of by the Parliament, and would have been licensed by the King, had not certain hindrances occurred. It was next laid before the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. This was in July 1648. And the following was the deliverance of the Assembly:—"The General Assembly having seriously considered the Shorter Catechism, agreed upon by the Assembly of Divines sitting at Westminster, with the assistance of commissioners from this Kirk, do find, upon due examination thereof, that the said Catechism is agreeable to the Word of God, and in nothing contrary to the received doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of this Kirk; and therefore approve the said Shorter Catechism, as a part of the intended uniformity, to be a Directory for catechising such as are of weaker capacity." The year following, it was also ratified by an act of the Scottish Parliament. And from that time it has continued to be in common use, generally in Scotland, and among Presbyterians and several other denominations in England and Ireland; and has latterly obtained a firm footing in the United States, in most of the British colonies, and at not a few missionary stations far hence among the heathen. And it is remarkable, that amidst all the controversies which have occurred, it has been almost uniformly approved by every party of orthodox believers. "Amidst the jealousy and rivalry of contending parties," says the late pious and judicious Dr Belfrage, "it has been a centre of union, in which the faith and charity of good men have met; and in seasons of innovation, when a veneration for what is ancient is derided as the freak of imbecility or prejudice; when 'the march of intellect' is the pretext for every change, however presumptuous or violent, and when all the foundations of the earth seem out of course, this summary of the truth remains uninjured and revered; and it will continue to be an exhibition and defence of pure religion and undefiled, before God and the Father, to the latest age."

THE BLIND PREACHER.

This sketch is from the pen of the late William Wirt, attorney-general in the United States of America, and is extracted from a well written account of the literature of that country, contained in the Athenæum of last year.

"It was one Sunday, as I travelled through the county of Orange, that my eye was caught by a cluster of horses tied near a ruinous old wooden house in the forest, not far from the road-side. Having frequently seen such objects before, in travelling through these States, I had no difficulty in understanding that this was a place of religious worship.

"Devotion alone should have stopped me, to join in the duties of the congregation; but I must confess, that curiosity to hear the preacher of such a wilderness, was not the least of my motives. On entering I was struck with his preternatural appearance. He was a tall and very spare old man; his head, which was covered with a white linen cap, his shrivelled hands, and his voice, were all shaking under the influence of a palsy; and a few moments ascertained to me that he was perfectly blind. "The first emotions that touched my breast were those of mingled pity and veneration. But how soon were all my feelings changed! The lips of Plato were never more worthy of a prognostic swarm of bees, than were the lips of this holy man! It was a day of the administration of the sacrament; and his subject was, of course, the passion of our Saviour. I had heard the subject handled a thousand times: I had thought it exhausted long ago. Little did I suppose that in the wild woods of America, I was to meet with a man whose eloquence would give to this topic a new and more sublime pathos, than I had ever before witnessed.

"As he descended from the pulpit to distribute the mystic symbols, there was a peculiar, a more than human solemnity in his air and manner, which made my blood run cold, and my whole frame shiver. "He then drew a picture of the sufferings of our Saviour; his trial before Pilate; his ascent up Calvary; his crucifixion; and his death. I knew the whole history; but never until then had I heard the circumstances so selected, so arranged, so coloured! It was all new; and I seemed to have heard it for the first time in my life. His enunciation was so deliberate, that his voice trembled on every syllable; and every heart in the assembly trembled in unison. His peculiar phrases had that force of description, that the original scene appeared to be at that moment acting before our eyes. We saw the very faces of the Jews; the staring, frightful distortions of malice and rage. We saw the buffet; my soul kindled with a flame of indignation; and my hands were involuntarily and convulsively clenched.

"But when he came to touch on the patience, the forgiving meekness of our Saviour; when he drew, to the life, his blessed eyes streaming in tears to heaven; his voice breathing to God a soft and gentle prayer of pardon on his enemies, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do,'—the voice of the preacher, which had all along faltered, grew fainter and fainter, until, his utterance being entirely obstructed by the force of his feelings, he raised his handkerchief to his eyes, and burst into a loud and irrepressible flood of grief. The effect is inconceivable. The whole house resounded with the mingled groans, and sobs, and shrieks of the congregation. It was some time before the tumult had subsided, so far as to permit him to proceed. Indeed, judging by the usual, but fallacious standard of my own weakness, I began to be very uneasy for the situation of the preacher. For I could not conceive how he would be able to let his audience down from the height to which he had wound them, without impairing the solemnity and dignity of his subject, or perhaps shocking them by the abruptness of the fall. But—so: the descent was as beautiful and sublime as the elevation had been rapid and enthusiastic. The first sentence, with which he broke the awful silence, was a quotation from Rousseau: 'Socrates died like a philosopher; but Jesus Christ, like a God.' I despair of giving you any idea of the effect produced by this short sentence, unless you could perfectly conceive the whole manner of the man, as well as the peculiar crisis in the discourse. Never before did I completely understand what Demosthenes meant by laying such stress on delivery. You are to bring before you the venerable figure of the preacher; his blindness, constantly recalling to your recollection old Homer, Ossian, and Milton, and associating with his performance the melancholy grandeur of their geniuses; you are to imagine that you hear his slow, solemn, well-accented enunciation, and his voice of affecting, trembling melody; you are to remember the pitch of passion and enthusiasm, to which the congregation were raised; and then the few moments of portentous death-like silence which reigned throughout the house: the preacher, removing his white handkerchief from his aged face, (even yet wet from the recent torrent of his tears,) and slowly stretching forth the palsied hand which holds it, begins the sentence, 'Socrates died like a philosopher'—then pausing, raising his other hand, pressing them both, clasped together, with warmth and energy, to his breast, lifting his 'sightless walls' to heaven, and pouring his whole soul into his tremulous voice—'but Jesus Christ—like a God!' If he had been in deed and in truth an angel of light, the effect could scarcely have been more divine. Whatever I had been able to conceive of the sublimity of Massillon or the force of Bourdaloue, had fallen far short of the power which I felt from the delivery of this simple sentence.

"If this description give you the impression, that this incomparable minister had anything of shallow, theatrical trick in his manner, it does him great injustice. I have never seen, in any other orator, such a union of simplicity and majesty. He has not a gesture, an attitude, or an accent, to which he does not seem forced by the sentiment he is expressing. His mind is too serious, too earnest, too solicitous, and at the same time too dignified, to stoop to artifice. Although as far removed from ostentation as a man can be, yet it is clear, from the train, the style, and substance of his thoughts, that he is not only a very polite scholar, but a man of extensive and profound erudition. I was forcibly struck with a short yet beautiful character, which he drew of your learned and amiable countryman, Sir Robert Boyle: he spoke of him, as if 'his noble mind had, even before death, divested herself of all influence from his frail tabernacle of flesh;' and called him, in his peculiarly emphatic though certainly extravagant language, 'a pure intelligence: the link between man and angels.'"

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Sickness and Death.—And are you very weak? Is sickness in the chamber, and death at the door? Come then, and let us sit down, with death and eternity in view; and encourage one another from the word, the precious word of God. What is there frightful in death, which our ever blessed Redeemer has not taken away?—Do the pangs of dissolution alarm us? Should they be sharp, they cannot be very long; and our exalted Lord, with whom are the issues of death, knows what dying agonies mean. He has said, in the multitude of his tender mercies: "Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee, yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness." (Isa. xli. 10.) This promise authorises us to say boldly, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff comfort me." (Psalm xxiii. 4.) Are we afraid to enter into a strange, invisible world? It is the world into which our Divine Master is gone; where he has prepared everlasting mansions (John xiv. 2, Luke xvi. 22.) for his people, and has appointed his angels to conduct us thither. Having such a convoy, what should we dread; and going to our eternal home, where our all-bountiful Redeemer is, why should we be reluctant? Are we concerned, on account of what we leave? We leave the worse, to possess the better. If we leave our earthly friends, we shall find more loving and lovely companions. We shall be admitted among the innumerable company of angels, and to the general assembly and church of the first-born, that are written in heaven. (Heb. xii. 22, 23.) Do we leave the ordinances of religion, which we have attended with great delight? leave the Word of God, which has been sweeter to our souls than honey to our mouths?—We shall enter into the Temple, not made with hands, and join that happy choir who rest not day nor night, saying: "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come." (Rev. iv. 8.) And if our Bible is no more, we shall have all that is promised, we shall behold all that is described therein. If we drop the map of our Heavenly Canaan, it will be to take possession of its blissful territories. That "city has no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it; for the glory of God does lighten it, and the Lamb is the Light thereof." (Rev. xvi. 23.) Oh! my friend, blessed, for ever blessed be the grace of our God, and the merits of his Christ! we shall exchange the scanty stream for the boundless ocean; and if we no longer pick the first ripe grapes, we shall gather the full, the abounding, the never-ending vintage.—HEAVEY.

The Condescension of Christ.—Oh! with what veneration, and gratitude, and wonder, should we look on the descent of Him into this lower world, who made all these things, and without whom was not any thing made that was made. What a grandeur does it throw over every step in the redemption of a fallen world, to think of its being done by Him who unrobed him of the glories of so wide a monarchy; and came to this humblest of its provinces, in the disguise of a servant; and took upon him the form of our degraded species; and let himself down to sorrows, and to sufferings, and to death, for us! In this love of an expiring Saviour to those for whom in agony he poured out his soul, there is a height, and a depth, and a length, and a breadth, more than I can comprehend; and let me never never from this moment neglect so great a salvation, or lose my hold of an atonement, made sure by Him who cried, that it was finished, and brought in an everlasting righteousness. It was not the visit of an empty parade that he made to us. It was for the accomplishment of some substantial purpose; and, if that purpose is announced, and stated to consist in his dying, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God, let us never doubt of our acceptance in that way of communication with our Father in heaven, which he hath opened and made known to us. In taking to that way, let us follow his every direction with that humility which a sense of all this wonderful condescension is fitted to inspire. Let us forsake all that he bids us forsake. Let us do all that he bids us do. Let us give ourselves up to his guidance with the docility of children, overpowered by a kindness that we never merited, and a love that is unquelled by all the perverseness and all the ingratitude of our stubborn nature—for what shall we render unto him for such mysterious benefits—to him who has thus been mindful of us—to him who thus has deigned to visit us?—CHALMERS.

God acts as a Refiner.—Although in afflictions, especially in national or public calamities, God oftentimes seems to make no distinction betwixt the objects of his compassion and those of his fury, indiscriminately involving them in the same destiny; yet his prescience and intentions make a vast difference, where his inflictions do not seem to make any: as when on the same test, and with the self-same fire, we urge as well the gold, as the blended lead or antimony; but with foreknowing and designing such a disparity in the events, as to consume the ignobler minerals, or blow them off into dross or fumes, and make the gold more pure and full of lustre.—THE HON. ROBERT BOYLE.

SACRED POETRY.

"CEASE FROM MAN.—ISA. ii. 22."

I SAW a mother hold her infant child,
And marked her looks of love, her tender care,
Her calm yet anxious fondness, as she smiled,
And seemed to breathe to heaven a parent's prayer.
Upon her babe she lavished all her love;
She watched him while awake and while he slept;
Her heart was fixed on him all else above;
Her constant wish was that he might be kept
From every evil. But, alas! how vain
Was her solicitude. Convulsions seized
His limbs. She would have suffered any pain,
And thought it pleasure, if she might have eased
Her darling; but it cannot be; his frame
Can bear no more. He gasps,—his scanty span
Of hours is spent,—he goes even whence he came.
His mother learns, or ought to learn, to "cease from man."

TO A CHILD PLAYING.

DEAR boy, thy momentary laughter rings
Sincerely out, and that spontaneous glee,
Seeming to need no hint from outward things,
Breaks forth in sudden shoutings, loud and free.
From what hid fountains doth thy joyance flow,
That borrows nothing from the world around?
Its springs must deeper lie than we can know,
A well whose springs lie safely under ground.
So be it ever—and then, happy boy,
When time, that takes these wild delights away,
Gives thee a measure of sedater joy,
Which, unlike this, shall ever with thee stay;
Then may that joy, like this, to outward things
Owe nothing—but lie safe beneath the sod,
A hidden fountain fed from inward springs,
From the glad-making river of our God.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Christian Benevolence.—The Rev. John Fletcher, of Madeley, and his wife, were once earnestly requested to visit Dublin for a few weeks. After his last sermon, he was pressed to accept a sum of money as an acknowledgment for his important services. He firmly refused it, but his friend continued to urge it upon him. He at length took the purse in his hand, and said, "Well, do you really force it upon me? Must I accept of it? Is it entirely mine? And may I do with it as I please?" "Yes, yes," was the reply. "God be praised, then, God be praised," said he, casting his brimful eyes to heaven; "behold what a mercy is here! Your poor's fund was just out: I heard some of you complaining that it never was so low before. Take this purse. God has sent it you, raised it among yourselves, and bestowed it upon your poor. It is sacred to them. God be praised! I thank you, I heartily thank you, my dear kind brethren."

True Magnanimity.—During the residence of Sir Ralph Abercrombie at the ancient seat of his family, in Clackmannanshire, his humility and Christian deportment pointed him out as a proper person to fill the office of an elder in his parish church. Being ordained according to the rites of the Church of Scotland, when the solemnity was ended, he thus addressed his Minister: "Sir, I have often been entrusted by my Sovereign with honourable and important commands, in my profession as a soldier, and his Majesty has been pleased to reward my services with distinguished marks of his royal approbation; but to be the humble instrument, in the office of an elder, of putting the tokens of my Saviour's dying love into the hands of one of the meanest of his followers, I conceive to be the highest honour that I can receive on this side heaven."

The Rev. Hugh Mackail.—This valuable Scotch minister was subjected to the torture of the iron boot, in the period of persecution. Notwithstanding the extremity of his bodily pain, his dying language was triumphant. "Farewell, sun, moon, and stars! farewell, world and time! farewell, weak and frail body! welcome, eternity! welcome, angels and saints! welcome, Saviour of the world! welcome, God, the Judge of all!"

True Peace of Mind.—A friend once asked Professor Francke, who built the Orphan-house at Halle, how it came to pass that he maintained so constant a peace of mind. The benevolent and godly man replied, "By stirring up my mind a hundred times a-day. Wherever I am, whatever I do, I say, Blessed Jesus, have I truly a share in thy redemption? Are my sins forgiven? Am I guided by thy Spirit? Thine I am. Wash me again and again. By this constant converse with Jesus, I have enjoyed serenity of mind, and a settled peace in my soul."

The Best Employment.—Lady Jane Grey was once asked by one of her friends in a tone of surprise, how she could consent to forego the pleasures of the chase, which her parents were enjoying, and prefer sitting at home, reading her Bible. She smilingly replied, "All amusements of that description are but a shadow of the pleasure which I enjoy in reading this book."

A Word in Season.—The celebrated Dr John Owen was induced to accompany a cousin of his to hear the Rev. Dr Calamy preach; a man of considerable eminence for his pulpit eloquence. The Doctor was prevented from preaching, and it was proposed that they should leave the church. But Dr Owen resolved to stay and hear the plain country minister who occupied the pulpit. The text was, "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" These words arrested his attention, and the sermon was directed to answer the very objections which he had been wont to bring against himself; a spirit of prayer was excited; and his soul obtained that relief which brought him to the love of those truths which he afterwards so ably and successfully advocated, both from the pulpit and the press. It was remarkable that he was never able to ascertain who this country minister was.

Early Recollections.—"I used to be called a Frenchman," says the late John Randolph, an American Statesman, "because I took the French side in political matters, and though this was unjust, yet the truth is, I should have been a French Atheist, had it not been for one recollection, and that was the memory of the time when my departed mother used to take my little hands in hers, and cause me on my knees to say, 'Our Father which art in heaven.'"

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE SCRIPTURES.

BY THE REV. ROBERT GORDON, D. D.,

THE professed design of the Scriptures is to give a plain and authoritative reply to the most momentous of all the inquiries which can occupy the thoughts of sinful men, namely, How will God deal with the guilty—will he forgive sinners at all—and if so, on what principle will such forgiveness be extended? To this question, nothing in the way of reply can be gathered from the works of God, in creation and providence, beyond mere conjecture. If, therefore, it be the object of the Sacred Volume to solve this and all other questions which interest men as accountable and immortal creatures, to what serious attention is it not entitled at the hand of every man who has access to it? The fact that there is such a thing in existence as a volume containing an immediate communication from God, is itself the most interesting and remarkable of all the matters of fact about which men can be conversant: and when we reflect, that on the knowledge and faith of what this communication reveals, and on obedience to what it enjoins, is suspended the well-being of man for time and for eternity, can we conceive any folly or infatuation equal to that of the man who either neglects it altogether, or rests satisfied with a very vague apprehension of what it contains? The bare announcement of there being such a record were enough, one might suppose, to secure the daily and most serious perusal of it by every man into whose possession it comes. But there are not wanting considerations in abundance to inculcate on men the earnest and devout study of the Sacred Volume. The very extent of the Old Testament Scriptures, as embracing the history of the divine dispensations towards the children of men for a period of four thousand years, does itself emphatically intimate the obligation which is laid upon men carefully to peruse that history; for if it has seemed meet to the infinite wisdom of God to employ inspired men to write such a record, and if, by the special interposition of his providence, he has preserved that record, can there be a more presumptuous impeachment of his wisdom, or a more daring contempt of what he has solemnly pronounced to be of infinite moment, than to allege that it is a record with which we have little concern, or practically to treat it as if we thought so? The way of salvation, indeed, through Christ—the doctrine of justification by faith in his blood, and of sanctification by the influence of his Spirit,—is no doubt the great leading subject of interest to sinful men; and, accordingly, it is the prominent subject in the Volume of Inspiration. But this method of salvation being the subject of prophecies, both express and typical, through many successive generations, was so gradually unfolded as to afford opportunities of exhibiting the most interesting and illustrious displays of the character and perfections of God both in providence and grace, and the most instructive exemplifications of those great principles which still regulate the government of his Church, as well as of the world at large. If the works of God, then, in the natural world are full of interest, and rich in entertainment befitting rational creatures to seek after and enjoy—if the investigation of these works affords exercise for the highest order of intellectual capacity which our race ever exhibited—and if the discoveries which are within the reach of human industry and skill, forming though they do only a mere fraction of the wonders of God's wisdom and power, are fitted to minister largely to human enjoyment, an enjoyment, too, of an exalted and most legitimate kind, how unspeakably interesting to men should be the revelation which the Author of all these wonders has made of himself—of the attributes of his nature—of the principles of his moral government—and of the way in which he purposes to deal with the children of men as his intelligent, but fallen and sinful creatures!

The manner, too, in which God has revealed himself to the human race, is alike intelligible, and ought to be equally attractive to all. He is presented to us in the Bible, not in abstract or metaphysical statements as to his nature and manner of being, but as acting, as embodying his perfections in palpable doings, and thus revealing those perfections to the very senses of men. While the Scriptures tell us, for example, that God is infinite in wisdom, and almighty in power, they represent him also, in the history which they record, directing the events of many ages, and over-ruling the schemes and enterprizes of many successive generations of men to the accomplishment of purposes previously foretold; thus exhibiting his power and wisdom in actual operation, guiding, with infinite facility, all the complicated movements both of the natural and moral world to the result which he had from the beginning determined. While they tell us that he is a God of truth, even the faithful and covenant-keeping God, they detail at the same time his dealings with the Church, his ancient chosen people, where we see him, after much forbearance and long-suffering patience, and after many warnings addressed to them by prophets commissioned for the purpose, visiting them with severe chastisements as if he had utterly forsaken them, yet returning again and remembering the covenant which he had sworn to Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. And while they declare of him that he is righteous and holy, a God of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, they do not leave us with these general statements. They record the most impressive and intelligible illustrations of this truth in the banishment of our first parents from Paradise—in the destruction of the old world by the flood—and in innumerable other immediate visitations of righteous judgment on the workers of iniquity. The Scriptures, then, do not consist of a mere statement of certain abstract truths, about which, when they are once carefully perused and afterwards remembered, no more is to be known. They contain a treasure of heavenly wisdom, which the more it is explored the more inexhaustible it will appear: though its statements are level to the understanding of the simplest, and fitted to arrest the most inattentive, comparatively little of it will be known from a single reading, however careful; and they who have read it most frequently, and drunk most largely of its spirit, will be the first to discover new sources of admiration and delight on every new perusal. And if the Psalmist, therefore, who possessed but a small portion of the Sacred Volume, took “the testimonies of the Lord as an heritage for ever, because they were the rejoicing of his heart,” how much greater reason have we to make these testimonies “our songs in the house of our pilgrimage,” and to “meditate upon the Lord in the night season!”

But it is not merely as containing a great deal respecting the character and government of God, that the Scriptures ought to be precious to us, and therefore made the subject of our constant study. Even with regard to the main subject, that which constitutes the essence of the Gospel,—I mean the way of pardon and acceptance, and eternal life,—we must give ourselves to the daily and devout perusal of the Word of God, if we would have our faith to be steadfast, our peace and comfort undisturbed, our consolations in the time of trouble abundant, and our obedience cheerful and uniform. Saving truth,—that is to say, the portion of Divine Revelation which is absolutely necessary for salvation,—has not been put down in the Bible in the shortest and most systematic form, but is to be found every where in the pages of the Sacred Volume, mixed up with many other subjects, which, though full of interest and instruction, do not immediately refer to the one great subject of Christ's mediatorial work. It is in this way that “all Scripture, being the inspiration of God, is profitable” as the apostle declares, “for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works;” because the enlightened reader will find that all Scripture, so far as he has means and opportunities of understanding it, serves to convey to him more enlarged views of those truths which do most nearly concern his everlasting well-being: and it is upon this ground that creeds, and confessions, and catechisms, and other forms of sound words, have been employed in all ages of the Church, and with incalculable advantage, as aids to the great body of readers towards the right understanding of saving truth. And in adopting such a method of communicating to men that which it is necessary for their salvation that they should know, God has acted in perfect and beautiful accordance with his procedure in other matters. In the natural world, on which we are dependent for our daily subsistence, neither the luxuries, nor the comforts, nor even the necessaries of life are produced spontaneously, or placed together within our reach without effort or forethought on our part. On the contrary, every thing essential to our subsistence and comfort requires more or less exertion; and the most refined of our present enjoyments, those which mankind generally seek most earnestly, and value most highly, are procured by an almost incalculable amount and variety of labour. Yet no man complains of this ordination: nay, every man who entertains any enlightened views of the divine administration, or of the constitution and condition of mankind as the subjects of that administration, will see proofs of divine wisdom and beneficence in such an order of things; inasmuch as the very skill and industry which are so expended, while they minister largely to human enjoyment, constitute also a system of wholesome discipline for the powers and faculties of our nature. And is it not a still more striking proof of the wisdom and beneficence of God, that the same order should obtain in spiritual things—that diligent application to the study of Scripture should be necessary, if we would attain to any enlarged and enlightened views of the ways and works of God—and that we should be subjected to that discipline of our faculties, the direct tendency of which is to prepare us for the enjoyment of the blessedness opened up to us in the Gospel of his grace? It is indeed a delightful thought that the saving truths of the Gospel are so simple, and may be brought within so small a compass, as to be comprehended even by those who are the least gifted with the capacity of laborious investigation, and have the fewest means and opportunities of carrying it on. But it were a melancholy proof of indifference to all that is most interesting to man, as a creature that is to exist for ever, did they who have the capacity and opportunity for a more full and frequent examination of the Scriptures, plead the simplicity of what is absolutely essential to salvation as an excuse for the indolent neglect, or the careless perusal of perhaps the larger portion of the Divine Word! If the whole of that record was written from the dictation of the Holy Spirit, were it not presumption to expect his enlightening influence which is essential to the saving knowledge of any one of its truths, while the rest are treated with indifference? It has not been so with the saints in any age, for the prayer of the Psalmist has ever been their prayer, "Open thou mine eyes," O Lord, "that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law." "I will delight myself in thy commandments," and "I will meditate on thy statutes."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF SIR MATTHEW HALE.

In our former numbers, we have seen men eminent for their piety, busying themselves in the duties of the pastoral office, and striving to win souls to Christ. In Sir Matthew Hale, one of the brightest names that adorn the profession of the law, we see a man and a Christian, by the faithful and conscientious discharge of secular duties, emerging from obscurity and mounting the ladder of distinction,—not by the mean tampering of the worldling, nor by the wicked intrigues and vain sophistry of the infidel, but by the honest and straightforward policy which the Gospel inculcates.

This eminent individual was born at Alderly, in the shire of Gloucester, on the 1st of November 1609. His ancestors were renowned for their deeds of charity and their sterling worth, a higher honour by far than an empty title adorned by Christian virtues. His parents were not long spared to train his infant faculties, and lead him "in the way that he should go," for at the early age of five years, he was cast upon the care of Providence. Great as must have been this bereavement to one so young, it was in some measure alleviated by the kind protection afforded him by a kinsman of his own. The greatest care was taken of Hale's early training, and more especially of his religious education; for at that time he was intended for the ministry. In the 17th year of his age he became a student at Magdalen College, Oxford, where for some time he showed very great diligence and proficiency, as he had previously done when at school. He had not been long at Oxford, however, until his attention was much distracted from his studies by associating with bad companions, from whose company he soon imbibed a love for theatrical amusements. These he entirely forsook, upon going to London soon after, resolving never again to see a play,—a resolution to which he ever adhered, and of which he had no cause to repent. At Oxford, however, before he had given up this practice, he became very negligent and inattentive to his studies, and not only so, but he was led away to other scenes of dissipation, a circumstance which often happens, when once the mind becomes unsettled by any thing of the kind. At this early age there was nothing so hostile to his feelings, or so revolting to his nature as the bland insinuations of flattery, which, during the whole of his life, he could never endure. While studying at this university, he determined on becoming a soldier, the army holding out so many attractions to the young, the gay, and the thoughtless. This resolution was happily overruled; for being at that time engaged in a law-suit with a gentleman who laid claim to some of his estates, Hale was obliged to leave the university and go to London to superintend his business. His legal agent, Sergeant Glanville, observing the talents of his young client, used all his influence to persuade him to relinquish his thoughts of the army, and to devote himself to the study of the law. This accordingly he did, and began to apply himself to his new profession at the age of 20 years. Deeply regretting the valuable time which he had lost by his folly, he commenced preparations for the bar with the most extraordinary diligence and intense application, studying even sixteen hours a day. He had not yet, however, altogether given up idle company, until a sad accident happened, which produced a serious effect upon his mind. With some other young students, he was invited to join a party of pleasure, on which occasion one of the party called for so much wine, that notwithstanding all that Mr Hale could do to prevent it, he drank until he was in such a state, that he fell down as dead. It is impossible to describe the state into which the company were thrown by this awful visitation. Mr Hale was so much affected, that he retired to an adjoining apartment, and there shutting the door, he fell upon his knees before Him in whose hands are the issues of life and of death, and prayed earnestly that his friend might be restored again to life, and that he himself might be forgiven, vowing that he would never again keep such company, nor drink another health while he lived. His companion recovered, and he most scrupulously observed his vow till his dying day. This accident was the instrument, in the hands of God, for accomplishing Hale's conversion, for immediately after he forsook all such company, and applied himself with the utmost assiduity to the acquisition of the different branches of knowledge connected with his profession; and busy as he was, he did not neglect his duties to his God, but set apart a portion of time each day for religious exercises. It is narrated of him that for thirty-six years after this he was never a Sabbath absent from Church; and it is well-known to have been a customary observation with him, that according as he spent the Sabbath, was his comfort, and happiness, and even his success in ordinary business through the week. Such, in fact, was his piety, that he could never allow a day to pass without examining his heart, and communing with his God.

His talents soon became conspicuous. It is related of him, that once as he was purchasing a suit of clothes, the merchant offered him the cloth for nothing, provided he would promise him one hundred pounds if he should ever be Lord Chief-Justice of England—an office to which, as we will afterwards see, he was promoted. He pursued his studies with great diligence, and not only acquired a most extensive knowledge of the law, but he likewise studied with great success the different branches of philosophy, as also the science of medicine. "But above all these," says Burnet, "he seemed to have made the study of divinity the chief of all others, to which he not only directed every thing else, but also arrived at that pitch in it, that those who have read what he has written on those subjects, will think they must have had most of his time and thoughts." Our author goes on to say, "it may seem extravagant, and almost incredible, that one man, in no great compass of years, should have acquired such a variety of knowledge; and that in sciences that required much leisure and application. But as his parts were quick, and his apprehensions lively, his memory great, and his judgment strong; so his industry was almost indefatigable. He rose always betimes in the morning, was never idle, scarce ever held any discourse about news, except with some few in whom he confided entirely. He entered into no correspondence by letters, except about necessary business, or matters of learning, and spent very little time in eating or drinking; for as he never went to public feasts, so he gave no entertainments but to the poor; for he followed our Saviour's direction (of feasting none but these) literally."

At length the time arrived when he was called to the bar, and he brought into exertion the vast stores of profound knowledge which he had been accumulating with such diligence, and very soon attracted general attention. The time at which Hale commenced his public career was one of no ordinary difficulty for an individual in his circumstances. At that time, the country was involved in civil war, and it was no easy matter for a man in any public situation to preserve his integrity, and at the same time live in security. This, however, he endeavoured to do by performing his duties with fidelity, and at the same time with courage, regarding the opinion of none, so long as he was doing his duty to his country and his God. He engaged in no faction, but stood boldly forward, undaunted by any threatenings. He was a supporter of the King, defending him with the utmost boldness; and not only so, but he also did every thing in his power to relieve the necessity of his party. He placed a considerable sum of money in the hands of a gentleman on whom he could depend, who distributed this charity according to his own discretion. Though he did belong to this party, however, he was always charitable, and took care never to provoke any by censuring their actions, for some of his most intimate friends alleged that they never heard him speak ill of any person. His splendid abilities soon recommended him to general notice, and he was raised to the bench, strange to say, by the consent and even the entreaties of both parties. He had not been long raised to this high station when he was elected a member of parliament, and in co-operation with others, he exerted himself to put an end to the agitated state of the country, and arrange public matters, which were then in a state of great confusion. Soon after this he was raised to the high station of Lord Chief-Baron of England, as being the most honest and straight forward man that could be found to discharge the duties of that office. When raised to this situation it was customary for the individual to be knighted, an honour which Hale desired to avoid, but which was unexpectedly conferred at an accidental meeting with the King at the house of the Lord Chancellor. He continued to occupy the prominent station of Lord Chief-Baron for eleven years, and gave to all concerned the utmost satisfaction,—by his justice, his generosity, and his diligence. The only complaint that was ever made against him was, that he did not dispatch his business quickly enough, but this was necessarily incident on the extreme care which he took, that all the cases brought before him should be finally settled; for the causes which were tried by him were seldom, if ever, tried again. He administered justice uprightly, deliberately, and at the same time resolutely, not resting upon his own understanding or strength, but imploring and resting upon the direction and strength of God. All his other thoughts and cares were laid aside, and he was wholly intent upon his business. In trials for capital crimes, it was his rule, though his nature prompted him to pity, yet to consider, that there is also a pity due to his country. He was neither biassed by compassion for the poor, nor favour to the rich, and never cared for the opinions of men, but followed simply the rules of justice.

It not unfrequently happened when any particular case was to be tried, that the parties concerned sent him presents, endeavouring, if possible, to gain his favour. But, the Lord Chief-Baron had learned from Solomon, that "a gift perverteth the ways of judgment," and never allowed the trial to proceed until he had paid for the presents.

When he looked around him and saw the awful wickedness of the age and country in which he lived, when he beheld the extreme impiety and atheism of his fellow-countrymen, his generous heart was sorrowful, and he exerted every means to oppose it, not only by the shining example of his life, but by employing his talents in demonstrating the truth of the Scripture history. While he was thus employed, the office of Lord Chief-Justice of England becoming vacant, he was, in the year 1671, promoted to this honourable and exalted situation, all the people of his country applauding the choice. In the discharge of the duties of his office he spent the remainder of his public life, for he had not been long advanced to this prominent situation when he was seized with a very severe attack of inflammation, which so destroyed his constitution that he never entirely recovered. Considering his age, he himself concluded that he could not live long, and therefore resolved to devote the remaining portion of his life to preparation for his change. He was wearied with the distractions of business, and loved rather to turn his attention to the things of eternity than to the things of time. "I do not know," said he, "a better temporal employment than Martha had, in testifying her love and duty to our Saviour, by making provision for him; yet our Lord tells her, that though she was troubled about many things, there was only one thing necessary, and Mary had chosen the better part." No sooner was it known that he intended to give up business, than his friends, and all who knew him, strove to change his resolution, but all without effect. Sir Matthew Hale never determined on any thing rashly, but always with deliberation, and therefore it was no easy matter to divert him from his purpose. He accordingly gave in his resignation to the King, which his Majesty was very unwilling to accept, wishing him to continue in his situation, and to do only what business the state of his health would allow. Hale, however, would not agree to this, but told the King that "he could not with a good conscience continue in it, since he was no longer able to discharge the duty belonging to it." The King, however, anxious to retain his valuable services as long as he could, delayed for some time the granting of his request. At length, wearied with the burden of duties, which he was unable to perform, he surrendered to the King in person, who was pleased to dismiss him with great grace, and to promise the continuance of his pension during life. He accepted though with reluctance, the kind offer, but such was his disinterestedness, that he laid out the greater part of it in charitable purposes. Glad to be relieved from the duties and the responsibility of his office, he retired from public life with as much cheerfulness as his infirmities would permit. He was discharged on the 1st of February 1676, at which time the state of his health was so bad that no hopes were entertained of his recovery. He continued still, however, to retire to his closet, there to hold sweet communion with his God, and when at length he became so weak as not to be able to go thither himself, he caused his servants to carry him there in a chair. As the winter drew near, he felt with great joy his deliverance approaching, for he longed to be admitted into those realms of bliss, where pain and sorrows are no longer felt. He looked not upon death as an enemy, but like a good soldier, wearied with many an arduous conflict, he looked forward with joy to the hour of his dismissal. "His pains increased on him," says his biographer, "that no pain inferior to his could have borne them without a great uneasiness of mind; yet he expressed the last submission to the will of God, and so equal a testimony under them, that it was visible then what mighty effect his philosophy and Christianity had on him in supporting him under such a heavy load." During his sickness he was attended by a pious clergyman, and it was observed, that when his pain was even excruciating, this gentleman was engaged in prayer, he forbore groans, and, with his hands and eyes lifted up, was fixed in his devotions. "Not long before his death minister told him there was to be a sacrament next Sunday at church, but he believed he could not come and partake with the rest; therefore he would give it him in his own house. But he answered, No; his heavenly Father had prepared a feast for him, and he would go to his Father's house to partake of it. So he made himself be carried thither in his chair, where he received the sacrament on his knees with great devotion, which it may be supposed was the greater, because he apprehended it was to be his last, and so took it as his provision for his journey."

At length worn out by the severity of his sufferings, on Christmas day 1676, he yielded up his spirit to God who gave it. He remained in full possession of his faculties to the last moment—a privilege which he had frequently and earnestly prayed for during his sickness. Immediately before his death, according to the account of Burnet, "when his voice was so sunk that he could not be heard, they perceived by the almost constant lifting up of his eyes and hands, that he was still aspiring towards that blessed state, of which he was now speedily to be possessed. His end was peace—he had no struggling, nor seemed to be in any pangs in his last moments."

The character of Sir Matthew Hale, as a judge, was splendidly pre-eminent. His learning was profound, his patience unconquerable, his integrity stainless, "his voice was oracular, and his person little less than adorned." But instead of contemplating his character as a scholar and a man of business, he ours the more agreeable and instructive task of endeavouring to convey to our readers some idea of his character as a Christian.

He was a devout believer and a sincere Protestant; tolerant to all, and just to those from whom he differed on the most essential points. In his family he constantly kept up the practice of family worship, performing it always himself, unless there was a clergyman present. On the Lord's day, it was his custom to call all his family together, and repeat to them the leading particulars of the sermon which they had heard, with some additions of his own, which he fitted for the capacities of all. Of his private exercises in devotion we cannot speak, for he took such extraordinary care to keep what he did secret, that this part of his character must be defective, "except," as Burnet remarks, "it be acknowledged, that his humility in covering it commends him much more than the highest expressions of devotion could have done." Money had no attractions for him, but as being the means of subsistence and of doing good. "He had a soul enlarged and raised above that mean appetite of loving money, which is generally the root of all evil. He did not take the profits that he might have had by his practice; for in common cases, when those who came to ask his counsel gave him a piece, he used to give back the half, and so made ten shillings his fee in ordinary matters that did not require much time or study. If he saw a cause was unjust, he for a great while would not meddle further in it, but to give his advice that it was so. If the parties after that would go on, they were to seek another counsellor, for he would assist none in acts of injustice. If he found the cause doubtful or weak in point of law, he always advised his clients to agree their business."

Failings he had, like every man, but his seem always to have leaned on virtue's side. In many cases he refused to take any remuneration, where he might have exacted a fee with the utmost propriety. When a practitioner, differences were often referred to him, which he settled, but would not accept of any reward. If they told him he lost much of his time in considering their business, and ought therefore to be paid accordingly, his answer was, "Can I spend my time better than to make people friends? must I have no time allowed me to do good in?" Charity was one of the distinguishing features of his character. He laid aside the tenth part of his income for behoof of the poor, and took great care to be well informed of proper objects for his charities. After he was made a judge, he sent the greater part of his perquisites to the jails to discharge poor prisoners, who never knew from whose beneficent hands their relief came. The following extract from his Life, by Dr Burnet, places his charity in a very favourable light:—"He usually invited his poor neighbours to dine with him, and made them sit at table with himself; and if any of them were sick, so that they could not come, he would send meat warm to them from his table. And he did not only relieve the poor in his own parish, but sent supplies to the neighbouring parishes as there was occasion for it; and he treated them all with the tenderness and familiarity that became one who considered they were of the same nature with himself, and were reduced to no other necessities but such as he himself might be brought to. But for common beggars, if any of these came to him as he was in his walks, when he lived in the country, he often sent them to some field to gather all the stones in it and lay them on a heap, and then would pay them liberally for their pains. This being done, he used to send his carts, and caused them to be carried to such places of the highway as needed mending.

"But when he was in town, he dealt his charities very liberally, even among the street-beggars; and when some told him that he thereby encouraged idleness, and that most of these were notorious cheats, he used to answer, that he believed most of them were such, but among them there were some that were great objects of charity, and prest with grievous necessities; and that he had rather give his alms to twenty who might be perhaps rogues, than that one of the other sort should perish for want of that small relief which he gave them."

After he was made a judge, so much afraid was he of being suspected to be partial, that in all his purchases he insisted upon paying more than was demanded.—On being told that he seemed to make ill bargains, he replied, "it became judges to pay more for what they bought than the true value, that so those with whom they dealt might not think they had any right to their favour, by having sold such things to them at an easy rate."

He was naturally passionate, but so careful was he to subdue all feelings of the kind, that those who were most intimate with him, and had lived in his house, never saw him indulge in anger amid all the trials he met with. "There was one who did him a great injury, which it is not necessary to mention, who coming afterwards to him for his advice in the settlement of his estate, he gave it very frankly to him, but would accept of no fee for it, and thereby shewed that he could forgive as a Christian. And when he was asked by one, how he could use a man so kindly that had wronged him so much, his answer was, he thanked God he had learned to forget injuries."

He was always kind to his clerks and servants, and endeavoured rather to reclaim than dismiss them for any trivial offence. When any of them had committed faults, he never reproved them until some time after, lest when his displeasure was great, he might have chid them too harshly; and when he did reprove them, he did it with such sweetness and gravity, that it appeared he was more concerned for their having been guilty of a fault than for the offence done to himself. When, as a judge, it was his duty to pass sentence upon the convicted, "he did it with such composedness and seriousness, and his speeches to the prisoners, directing them to prepare for death, were so weighty, so free of all affectation, and so serious and devout, that many loved to go to the trials, when he sat as judge, to be edified by his speeches and behaviour to them, and used to say, 'they heard very few such sermons.'"

When visited by affliction, he always acknowledged the hand of God, and maintained tranquillity of mind in a very wonderful degree. He had a tender heart, and sad things, as Burnet remarks, were apt to make deep impressions upon him; yet the regard he paid to the wisdom and providence of God, and the just estimate he had of all worldly things, tended to support him amid all his bereavements. But we will not enlarge any more upon the character of this illustrious man; from what we have already said, it must be obvious that he was indeed a true, sincere, and consistent Christian, testifying his faith by his works, and looking on this world only as a preparation for another and a better. In the words of his biographer, "He was one of the greatest patterns his age has afforded, whether in his private deportment as a Christian, or in his public employments, either at the bar or on the bench."

HID TREASURES.*

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

* If thou seekest for knowledge as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures, then shalt thou understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God.—Prov. xi. 4, 5.

** The kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath and buyeth that field.—MATT. xiii. 44.

The similes used in both these passages are conceived by the generality of commentators to be founded on the circumstance, that the precious metals, which are held in so much estimation among men, on account of the purposes of utility or ornament to which they are capable of being applied, are not found strewn on the surface of the ground, but lie deeply imbedded in the bowels of the earth, unknown and imperceptible to human observation. To the ignorant and inexperienced eye, there may be nothing in the external appearance of nature to give token that she has there imparted any thing beyond the clouds and the verdure, by which they may be covered. Yes, to such a depth are these valuable treasures occasionally sunk, that the most practised observers are not unfrequently deceived, and never dream of penetrating the bosom of the earth, for stores, of the existence of which she seems so studiously to have withheld all knowledge; and as the spots in which such valuable mines are discovered have generally been of a barren and unpromising character, it has not unfrequently happened, that they have been consigned to neglect, and allowed to lie in a waste and uncultivated state, as altogether incapable of rewarding the labour and expense of tillage; so that age may succeed to age, and one proprietor convey it to another, without one of the busy multitudes that tread upon its surface ever dreaming of the precious ore that lies deposited beneath. But let some happy accident reveal the secret, and give but a hint, that beneath a surface apparently so unpromising, the most valuable treasure is concealed, and from that moment, the field that contains it attracts an attention, and acquires an importance, to which it had not formerly the shadow of a claim. However it may continue to be neglected or undervalued by the rest of the world, yet in the eyes of the discoverer himself, it will appear infinitely more precious than the fairest and most extensive domains by which it may be surrounded,—it will become the idol of his imagination by day, and rise before him in the visions of the night—and never will he be satisfied or at rest till he has secured the undisputed possession of it to himself, and brought all his resources of labour and of strength to bear upon it, and explore it as a secret source of inexhaustible and evergrowing aggrandisement and wealth.

Such fortunate discoveries, however, of the golden repositories of nature, have always been so rare, as to unfit them for being made the groundwork of metaphors or narratives like those before us, which were intended for the familiar and the obvious illustration of truth; and the veins in which they are found generally extend, wherever they appear, in such abundance, as soon acquires for them too great value and importance in the public eye, to admit of the man who discovered the field where the treasure is hid, purchasing or long retaining it as his private property. Besides, Judea was never ranked among the countries where in ancient times the precious metals were obtained, nor did its solitary river, like the famed Pactolus, wash down from the neighbouring mountains the golden pebbles which its overflowing banks deposited in the fields through which it ran, enriching many of the peasants to whom our Lord was addressing this parable of the hid treasure, at no great distance from the banks of the Jordan. The propriety of the simile, therefore, which is introduced, both in the parable of Christ and in the Proverbs of Solomon, must have been founded on something more nearly allied to the general habits and associations of Eastern people—something more likely to come home to the hearers of the one, and the readers of the other, than that which was known to lead some of them to the purchase of new possessions, or to have greatly enhanced the value of such as were already their own. The readers of oriental tales are familiar with stories of persons, who, by some fortunate discovery of hidden treasure, were suddenly raised from poverty to unbounded wealth, and they are probably accustomed to ascribe such extraordinary variations of fortune to the poetic license which writers of fictitious narratives are never challenged for taking. But a little consideration will suffice to shew, that the tried and extensive fame of these beautiful fictions, which, in the countries where they were produced, form for whole seasons the only night's entertainments, has arisen solely from their being pictures of real life, and that while there is no idea which the inhabitants of all parts of the Eastern world are so prone to entertain as that of treasure hid in the field, the universality of the notion has originated, not in some vain and delusive dream, which their warm imaginations are fond of indulging, but in their knowledge of the immense riches which have frequently, in this manner, been acquired, and of the causes which render such places their chosen receptacle. The fact is, that the practice of hiding treasures is one which has risen out of necessity. In these quarters, so often the theatre of sudden revolutions—where the throne is occupied by a needy despot, who scruples at no means whereby to replenish his treasury, and where the subordinate governors imitate the rapacity of their superiors, the people, taught by experience that the suspicion of wealth often brings along with it a notoriety that proves dangerous to the possessor, endeavour to provide against emergencies which they have so good reason to fear, by depositing their money in places which are not liable to be affected by the dangers of anarchy or war. When a person has accumulated any considerable amount of wealth, he begins to think of the best means of securing it; and the usual practice in such cases is,—after rearing as much in hand as may be necessary for the purposes of livelihood and trade, and expending another portion on jewels, which, from their portable nature, may not retard his flight, to bury the rest under ground, the only bank being the earth, where, if the money remains a dead and unprofitable stock, the owner has at least the satisfaction of knowing that he will find it safe and entire, whenever his necessities or inclination prompt him to retake it. In the selection of this place of concealment, he is guided by no motive but that of secrecy; swift matters little where the treasure is hid, provided the deposit can be effected without any traces being left to excite suspicion, and bring others to a knowledge of the secret. The more remote, of course, the situation of the place, the greater is its recommendation as a place of safety; and hence the field is so generally pitched on as least of all the scene of public or general resort. For the knowledge of this private hoard is studiously confined to the bosom of its owner, and should he, in the course of events, be compelled to abandon the spot, or die before he has an opportunity of returning to it, the secret dies with him, and will be for ever unknown to the world, unless some happy accident bring it in the way of the peasant as he turns up the soil with the plough.

* To correct a misapprehension in the minds of some of our readers, it may be right to state, that all the articles from the pen of Mr Jamieson, with the exception of that in our first Number, have been written expressly for The Scottish Christian Herald.—Ed.

Innumerable stories of the discovery of treasure hid in the field are found in the pages of authentic history from Herodotus down to the present day. That venerable father of history gives a long account of an ancient King of Egypt who had amassed 400,000 talents in the course of his life, which he had securely deposited in the garden adjoining his palace, and which was never known nor suspected by any till he imparted the secret to his sons on his death-bed. Josephus informs us that Solomon laid up vast treasures in the royal sepulchre, which was reckoned the place of the greatest security, from the sacredness attached to the abodes of the dead; and the same historian also tells us that the inhabitants of Jerusalem, during its last and memorable siege, concealed their treasures in the streets, and under the floor, and within the door-posts of their houses, and in various unfrequented parts of their city, and that the precious secret would have been for ever buried in the grave with the owners, had not the plough of the conquerors passed over the ruins of the holy place and reduced it to a field. Discoveries of a similar kind are related in the modern histories of the East. Amadéuliat, who reigned in Persia in the tenth century, according to D'Herbelot, found himself reduced to great difficulties from the impoverished state of his treasury, and walking one day in one of the rooms of his palace, which had been the favourite residence of his predecessor, he perceived a serpent putting its head out of a chink of the wall. The king having ordered the place to be searched and the serpent to be killed, found in the opening of the wall, a secret place, in which, though they missed the reptile, they found some treasure, and renewing their search with greater eagerness, lighted on a great number of large coffers loaded with the treasure which the former prince had amassed and concealed there. Sir John Malcolm, in his history of Persia, relates that Ismael Semance, having pledged his word to the inhabitants of a conquered city that he would not surrender it to be plundered by his soldiers, found himself obliged, to avoid the temptation of violating his word through the murmurs and discontent of his soldiers, to withdraw from the neighbourhood of the place. He had not gone far, Sir John continues on the authority of Persian authors, when a ruby necklace of one of his ladies was carried away by a vulture, being from its redness mistaken for meat. The bird was watched, and seen to deposit the jewel in a dry pit, which was immediately searched. The necklace was recovered, and several boxes of treasure were found near it, which proved to be part of the wealth of the captured monarch. "About ten years ago," says Volney, in his travels through Syria, "a small coffin was found at Hebron, full of gold and silver; and in the country of the Druzes, an individual lately discovered a jar, with gold coin in the form of a crescent, but as the chiefs and governors claim a right to those discoveries, and ruin those who have made them under pretence of obliging them to make restoration, those who find any thing endeavour carefully to conceal it, by secretly melting the antique coins, or burying them again in the same place where they were found."

Among the Turks, the same habit has long prevailed, and a memorable instance is recorded by Dr Perry, of immense treasures belonging to some of the principal people of the Turkish empire being concealed under ground, which, upon a revolution, were discovered by some of the domestics who had penetrated the secret. Nor is the custom of hiding money under ground less common in India. "We are constantly hearing," says Mr Roberts, late missionary in Hindostan, "of treasures which have been and are about to be discovered; and it is no rare thing to see a large space of ground completely turned up, or a group of old and young digging amid the foundations of an old ruin, all full of the greatest eagerness and desire to reach the expected treasure. I once saw a deep tank made completely dry by immense labour in the hope of finding great treasures, which were said to have been cast in during the ancient wars."

Nor is money the only article which the timid spirit of oriental society seeks in this manner to secure. The same necessity which led to the concealment of their gold and silver in the bowels of the earth, suggested to the natives the expedient of committing to the same faithful custody as much of their other effects as could be spared from immediate use; and what was at first resorted to only in the most dangerous and unsettled crisis, as the best means of placing their property beyond the reach of untoward accidents, was afterwards continued in more peaceful times from the feeling of security attending it, and became the common mode in which people of all ranks preserved their valuable commodities—the opulent, their luxuries—the traders, their merchandise—the farmers, the precious fruits of harvest—vast quantities of grain, oil, wine, honey, and apparel have been discovered thus hoarded up in subterranean cells, several hundreds of which have been found in the same field—and although, from the nature and variety of the goods deposited in them, these must have been often required to be of great magnitude, yet so carefully and dexterously had the holes been filled and the surface levelled, that not a vestige remained to shew that the earth had been moved. Such were the treasures, with the discovery of which Jeremiah (xli. 8.) tells us, that ten unfortunate Israelites ransomed their lives from the hands of the treacherous and sanguinary Ishmael. "But ten men were found among them, that said unto Ishmael, stay us not; for we have treasures in the field, of wheat, and of barley, and of oil, and of honey."

It will be readily supposed, that the knowledge of this custom of concealing treasure in the field having prevailed from time immemorial in the East, would give rise to many a desire to meet with ocular demonstrations of its existence; and that the more eager and sanguine votaries of Mammon, in all ages, would leave no means untried that promised to put them in possession of such valuable acquisitions. Accordingly, men were not wanting in ancient times, who, taking advantage of the prevailing anxiety, pretended to discover the places where treasure was hid by the arts of sorcery. Many Asiatic princes carried those sorcerers in their train to the cities they had won by their arms, to point out the places where the vanquished had concealed their treasures. And one remarkable instance is recorded of an Arab chief, who by the aid of a person of this description, striking with a stick on the walls and on the ground, discovered the spots that had been hollowed, and obtained in consequence immense sums. Whether, as is most likely, these conjurers were guided entirely by superior sagacity and skill, which they dexterously attributed to art, it is certain that the people of the East are universally of opinion that sorcery is the only effectual means of making the discovery of hidden treasure. So universal is this persuasion, that we are informed by many modern travellers who have gone in quest of Eastern antiquities, that their researches have been great ly retarded, and sometimes entirely prevented, by the jealousy of the natives, who are incapable of conceiving them animated by any liberal motives, and who, regarding all Europeans, from their extensive attainments in science, as notorious sorcerers, conclude that they have travelled so far for no other purpose than to discover and take away the vast treasures which they believe lie concealed in various quarters of their country. It is to this belief in the skill of sorcerers to discover hid treasures, that the Prophet Isaiah (xlv. 3.) is conceived to allude. "As God," says Harmer, "opposed his prophets at various times to pretended sorcerers, it is not unlikely that the prophet points at some such prophetic discoveries in these remarkable words: And I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou mayest know that I the Lord, which call thee by thy name, am the God of Israel: i. e., I will give them, by enabling some prophet of mine to tell thee where they are concealed."

These observations may serve to illustrate that desire, or rather passion, to seek for hid treasure which exists so strongly in the breasts of Eastern people, and has been characteristic of them in all ages—a desire which has originated in their knowledge of customs, which the frequent wars and the unsettled state of society have rendered general in all countries of the East, and which being felt by the Jews,* in common with their neighbours, both our Lord and the wise king of Israel have mentioned as the measure of the strong and ardent zeal with which we ought to seek after that knowledge which makes rich towards God and for eternity. The field in which this precious treasure is hid, is the Gospel, which is offered and open to the researches of all; and yet as multitudes often wander unconsciously over the spots where the most valuable stores are deposited, so multitudes who have the Gospel within their reach, and are able to read it, are ignorant of the unsearchable riches it contains—have no acquaintance with its divine excellence, because they have never set themselves in sober earnestness to examine into its nature and explore its contents; or, as is the case with many, they may have done so, and yet, confining their views to its history, its poetry, or the useful and virtuous maxims it prescribes for the economy of life, are equally far as the former class from having discovered its real treasures, just because they have not gone to it in the right way—in the spirit and with the feelings of those to whom it is addressed. Let them but acknowledge themselves to be sinners—let them feel, in all its reality and power, the conviction that they are fallen and guilty—destitute of all claims to the favour of God, and in a perishing condition, and then they will be in a state of mind and spirit to appreciate the unsearchable value of the Gospel; they will betake themselves to it with all the urgencies of needy dependants who have met with unexpected relief, and having discovered a treasure inexhaustible, and of divine value, they will, with all the intense anxiety of those who are "seeking for silver and searching for hid treasure," dig deeper and deeper, and never be satisfied, till they have ascertained the real amount of the stores they have found—or dropping the metaphor, they will betake themselves to the reading of the Gospel, not in the formal listless manner of those who would comply with an approved custom, nor of those who wish merely to provide themselves with the means of intellectual entertainment, but with the earnest and engrossing desire of those who, persuaded that they are guilty and miserable sinners, apply to it as the only source of obtaining a knowledge of the way of salvation. They will not only read it, but study it—make it the subject of their frequent, fervent, and importunate prayers; and perceiving more and more the incalculable value of the treasure it contains, they will readily submit to any labour, however arduous, or to any privation, however great, in order to secure the continued possession of it to themselves. Not that anything they can give or can part with is equivalent to the price of it. "It cannot be gotten for gold, neither shall silver be weighed for the price thereof—it cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, with the precious onyx or the sapphire,"—and, therefore, in this sense, they can never give an equivalent for it; but, impressed with a deep sense of the value of the treasure, and the unspeakable importance of possessing it, they are willing to part with the nearest and dearest object that may endanger its security, or be incompatible with the possession of it; to give up any pursuits—relinquish any hopes—forego any pleasure—sever any connexions that are found to come between them and the enjoyment of that which they know and feel to be worth more than the world itself; and this is the sense in which the man who has found the "treasure hid in the field" of the Gospel, "goeth and selleth all that he hath, and purchaseth the field."

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES BUCHANAN,
Minister of North Leith.

"Wherefore, I say unto thee, her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much: but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little."—
LUKE, vii. 47.

THERE were present at this interview with the Saviour of the world, two persons whose characters were in many respects widely different; a Pharisee, who appears from his language to have imbibed the spirit of his sect, which our Lord himself elsewhere describes, as "trusting in their own righteousness, and despising others:" and a woman from the city, who was "a sinner," and as such the object of the Pharisee's contempt. Both were privileged to meet with the Saviour, and both professed and intended to do him honour. But the Pharisee was offended, because a sinful woman was permitted thus to minister to one who laid claim to the character of a messenger from God: and although he gave no utterance to his thoughts, our Lord availed himself of what was passing in his mind, to shew how far his views differed from the plan of God for the recovery of sinners, and to illustrate the moral principle on which that plan is founded.

I. The Pharisee seems to have been offended by the Saviour's permitting this woman to approach him: she was a sinner, and from the emphasis which is attached to the word, probably a notorious one; and he seems to have thought that such a person ought either to have been excluded altogether from converse with Christ, or that before coming, she should have gone through a probationary course of trial and reformation. But such an idea is at variance with the whole scope and tenor of the Gospel; nor could our Lord have excluded this sinful woman from his presence, on the ground of any such principle without virtually abandoning the doctrine of free grace altogether. Had he forbidden her approach or treated her with stern severity as unworthy of his presence, he must have sanctioned the misapprehension of the Pharisee respecting the object of his mission, and confirmed to the end of time that legal and self-righteous spirit which the whole tenor of the Gospel was meant to rebuke and to subdue. But mindful of the sublime object of his mission, "to seek and to save the LOST," he regarded "this woman that was a sinner," as one of the very fittest subjects of his compassionate care: for her redemption, and for the redemption of such as she was, he had come down from heaven; and now that he was brought into personal contact with the very guiltiest and most wretched, and that too, in the company of a proud self-righteous man, he did not shrink from her, but received her into his presence, and permitted her to wash and anoint his feet with a benignant condescension, which may well minister rebuke to self-righteous pride, and encouragement to every penitent heart, to the end of time. And this he did, even while he admitted "that her sins were many." It was not necessary for him to vindicate her from the charge of guilt; nor was it consistent with his design to palliate or in any way to excuse the sinfulness of her life: on the contrary, He received and welcomed her as a sinner, and it was in so receiving her that he manifested the perfect freeness of redeeming love, and gave to the Pharisee an affecting exhibition in practice of what he had elsewhere declared in words, "that the whole need not a physician, but they that are sick,"—"that he came to call not the righteous but sinners to repentance,"—"and that whosoever cometh unto him should in nowise be cast out."

From this affecting scene, we learn the cheering truth, that many sins do not debar us from the Saviour. The very object of his mission was, and the great end of his Gospel still is, to save the guilty. To none but sinners is it suitable; for every sinner it is sufficient. By his sufferings and death, as their substitute, he has made reparation to God for the dishonour which had been put upon his law; and rendered it consistent with the highest interests of the divine government, to extend the free forgiveness of sin to every one of us that will accept of it. It is emphatically said, that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from ALL sin. He is able to save UNTO THE UTTERMOST—none so guilty that he cannot redeem; none so vile that he will not receive them. Nor is his grace fettered with conditions, or restricted to particular classes; it is alike universal and free,—its invitations are addressed to all.

Are there none in this assembly who will listen to this gracious call: none who feel that they have much to be forgiven: none who have tasted the bitterness of remorse, and are sick at heart: is there not amongst us one solitary spirit, that has begun to feel itself weary and heavy laden, and that would gladly welcome a relief from the burden of guilt? Oh! if there be but one such spirit now present, I point to the woman that was a sinner, and say—go to the Saviour as she did, and he will welcome you, even as he welcomed her! Be not faithless but believing. Your sins are many—so were hers: You are deeply distressed and fearful—so was she, when she stood at the Saviour's feet in tears: You have nothing to recommend you to the Saviour, nothing to plead in extenuation or excuse for your guilt, nor had she;—she wept and was silent. And you too, when you retire this evening to your closet, and weep a silent flood over the remembrance of your sins, will have the compassionate eye of the Saviour upon you:—the Saviour's heart is not changed—exalted as he is, it is still his delightful office to bind up the broken-hearted: to no friend on earth, to no angel in Heaven, will your first prayer give greater pleasure than to the Saviour himself. Go then to your knees with the words of David on your heart, "I am poor and needy, yet the Lord thinketh upon me." This woman that was a sinner seems to have come uninvited, to a house where, to all but the Saviour, her presence was unwelcome or offensive: you can go, and plead his own invitation for your warrant, his own recorded love for your motive, his own express promise for your prayer: and to you, as to her, may the Saviour say, "Son, daughter, thy sins are forgiven thee; thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace."

II. Another reason why the Pharisee was offended by our Lord's gracious conduct to this woman, seems to have arisen from an apprehension that the free forgiveness of sin could not be extended to such characters, consistently with the interests of morality. He thought that it must be an encouragement to vice: that the kindness which the Saviour exercised to the very chief of sinners must become, in the case of his disciples, a motive to licentiousness. Such an opinion has often been expressed, not only in ancient but also in modern times; especially by those decent men of the world, who, without much experience of the vital power of religion, have maintained a regard for good morals, and an attachment to the forms and ordinances of religion. They have thought the doctrine of free grace injurious, or, at least, dangerous to the interests of morality; and hence their attempts to fetter the gospel with restrictions, and to re-impose the bondage of legal conditions, which, were they admitted, would have the effect of excluding every man who has a right sense of his own sinfulness from applying to the Saviour at all. That some such thought was passing through the mind of the Pharisee, is evident from the scope of our Lord's observations, which are mainly directed to this point—that the free forgiveness of sin, so far from being opposed to the interests of morality, is, on the contrary, the means of calling into operation, a principle which insures a life not only of strict but of willing and cheerful obedience. That principle is love: love to Christ as a compassionate Saviour, and to God as a reconciled Father through him; that love which is the sum and substance of the law, the spring of all acceptable obedience, the only source of true happiness in religious or moral duty.

This love is first awakened by the free grace of the Gospel, and when it takes possession of the heart, will manifest its presence by constraining the disciple to live no longer to himself, but to Him that loved him and gave himself for him. This is the secret of the moral operation of the Gospel; and it is brought out and illustrated in the text with peculiar beauty.

When our Lord says, "Wherefore her sins are forgiven, for she loved much," he does not refer to her love as the meritorious or procuring cause of forgiveness; on the contrary, his illustration, drawn from the case of the two debtors, shows that love is the fruit or effect of forgiveness; but he points to it in the text as affording a proof that this poor woman had been forgiven, and as the genuine fruit and effect of the kindness with which she had been treated.—With this explanation, I observe there were two grand points which our Lord wished to establish. The first, that free forgiveness would produce love; and the second, that love, when produced, would ensure cheerful obedience. With reference to the former of these points, our Lord makes an appeal to the Pharisee himself, well knowing that the Gospel was adapted to the common principles of human nature: "And Jesus answering, said unto him, Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee: and he said, Master, say on. There was a certain creditor which had two debtors. The one owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty. And when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both. Tell me, therefore, which of them will love him most. Simon answered, and said, I suppose that he to whom he forgave most. And he said unto him, thou hast rightly judged." Here Simon admits, in the case of an ordinary debtor, that a frank forgiveness will produce love to a generous benefactor; and that this love will bear some proportion to the amount of the debt discharged, or the magnitude of the love displayed: and in this admission, our Lord had all that he wished for explaining the principle and vindicating the reasonableness of his procedure in frankly forgiving the sins of all classes, without respect to the little distinctions which might obtain among them. The Pharisee thought himself more righteous than the woman that was a sinner; whether he really was so in the sight of Him who judgeth the heart, we have no means of discovering: but our Lord meets his objection to the free forgiveness of the woman, on the distinct ground, that even were his opinion correct as to the comparative righteousness of the two parties, still the interests of morality were secure, since from his own admission "to whom much is forgiven, the same will love much."

This, then, is the first point which our Lord wished to establish, that whenever a sinner is taught to believe the Gospel, and to obtain the free forgiveness of sin, a new principle will spring up in his bosom—he will love the Saviour; and having established this, our Lord proceeds to show (2dly.) the practical working of that principle, in a way which was fitted very deeply to humble the pride of the Pharisee. He lays hold of the circumstances which had occurred since they sat down to table, as a sufficient proof that the love of this poor woman was a more active principle of dutiful obedience, than any which the Pharisee himself possessed. Most beautiful is the example which our Lord here gives of the operation of love in the case of a true convert, as contrasted with the cold outward respect of a formal professor of religion. "He turned to the woman, and said unto Simon, seest thou this woman? I entered into thine house, thou gavest me no water for my feet; but she hath washed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. Thou gavest me no kiss: but this woman, since the time I came in, hath not ceased to kiss my feet. My head with oil thou didst not anoint: but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment. Wherefore, I say unto thee, her sins, which are many, are forgiven her;—for she loved much: but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little."

There is something exquisitely beautiful in this simple description—something which finds its way to the heart in the devoted love of this sinful woman to the Saviour of sinners. It might have been expected, that on meeting with the holy Son of God, the Pharisee, who made his boast of the law, and professed great attachment to moral goodness, would have shown more reverence and esteem for the Perfect Pattern of all moral excellence, than the woman that was a sinner. But it was not so: he was cased up in self-righteous pride; but the poor woman knew that she was a sinner, she looked to Christ as a Saviour, and having been graciously received by him, his love awakened a responsive love in her bosom, and she followed him as her Master. The free forgiveness of her sins bound her to his service, by a tie which neither shame, nor contempt, nor persecution, could break: her faith wrought by love, and that love led her to follow him at all hazards. So is it in every case. We have here but an exemplification of what takes place on the conversion of every sinner, an illustration of the way in which the Gospel works in the heart of every believer: the love of the Saviour produces love to the Saviour, and love to Him secures our sanctification, and renders our obedience alike constant and cheerful. When the heart is thus filled with love, you see the Gospel fulfilling the very end of the law, for the law of the universe is love, and that law is fulfilled, when, through the free forgiveness of sin, Christ is loved as a Saviour, and God is loved as a reconciled Father. When this love takes full possession of the heart, religion becomes a cheerful service; without it, religion may be observed in its outward forms, but it cannot be sensibly enjoyed. We must have some sense or some hope of forgiveness from him, before God can be loved as our God: when he is thus loved, he will be cheerfully served: no sacrifice will seem too great, no labour too difficult, no suffering too severe, to be submitted to. Our desire will be to become in all respects conformed to the will of him who loved us with an everlasting love, and with great mercies hath gathered us.

In confirmation of these views, I may appeal to experience; and first, to the experience of those, who, whatever opinions they may entertain as to the importance of religion and morals, have, nevertheless, refused as yet to receive the Gospel in its simplicity and freeness; who have not yet been so thoroughly humbled out of all self-righteous confidence, as to feel the necessity of casting themselves at once, and altogether, on the free grace of the Saviour, and who, consequently, have had no experience of that blessedness which arises from the free forgiveness of sin. I ask them, have they ever yet enjoyed real peace of conscience? have they been able to look up to God with affectionate confidence? or, is religion to them a willing and cheerful service,—a source of any thing like lively comfort or joy? On the contrary, are they not sensible that the restrictions which they have themselves imposed on the freeness of the Gospel, have had the effect of keeping them under the constant bondage of fear; that, in so far as they trust to their own righteousness as the ground of pardon and acceptance with God, they are resting on an insecure foundation, which can ill support a living hope; that the misgivings of their own conscience are quite sufficient to prevent all peace and joy in the prospect of an eternal world; and that they cannot cherish any thing like habitual love to God, or delight in his service, so long as their salvation is thought to hinge on the alternative of their own obedience? If such be the result of their own experience, it is to be regretted, not only because they are thus deprived of sensible comfort in religion, but far more, because they are left without that motive to holiness which would insure their progressive sanctification. Nor will they ever be delivered from their present bondage, or taste the true blessedness of obedience, until emptied of all self-dependence, they feel that “they have much to be forgiven;” and come, like the woman that was a sinner, or like the penitent publican, without any other plea, than that prayer, which never yet was sincerely uttered in vain,—“God be merciful to me a sinner.”

May I not appeal, secondly, to those who have already tasted that the Lord is gracious, and ask, whether it is not the very consideration that much has been forgiven, which is felt by them in their best moments, to be the most constraining motive to a life of new obedience? Do they not know experimentally, that love to the Saviour is the only sure and steady spring of progressive holiness; and that the intensity of this love depends on their views of the magnitude of their own guilt, and the freeness of the Saviour's grace? When was it, let me ask, that they were most deeply penetrated by the amazing condescension and long-suffering patience of Christ? Was it not when they looked to his cross from the lowest depths of self-abasement—when overwhelmed by a sense of their own unworthiness, they heard him calling them to come to him “without money and without price?” Has not a believing view of that love melted their very hearts within them; and the more freely he offered salvation, did they not feel that he was the more to be loved? When was it that they formed the strongest resolutions to aspire after all holiness of heart and life?—when was it that they most cheerfully devoted themselves to his service, and most ardently desired to follow in his footsteps? Was it not when, perhaps at the communion table, their hearts were most sensibly impressed with a persuasion of his love to them? And is not their own experience, then, sufficient to shew that the Gospel is, in this respect, admirably adapted to the principles of their nature, inasmuch as it exhibits a practical proof of the fact, that the very same grace which freely forgives the sinner, sanctifies him too; and that so long as “he that has had much forgiven, will love much,” so long the grace of God cannot be a motive to licentiousness, but is, on the contrary, the real efficient spring of all holiness, as well as of all joy.

Christians! frequently recal to mind your innumerable obligations to the Redeemer: reflect on the nature and magnitude of your offences—on the sufferings which his love prompted him to endure for you, and the invaluable blessings which you have received and yet hope for at his hand; and feeling, as you must, that you have had much forgiven you, Oh! see that you love much, and show your love to him, as this poor woman did, by your conduct towards him. True, you cannot anoint his feet with ointment, nor show him the same personal attentions which she was privileged to render, but his own Godlike words point out to you the way in which you may still express your love to Him. “I was hungry, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was naked, and ye clothed me; I was in prison, and ye visited me.” “Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these my Brethren, ye did it unto Me.”

ANGUSINA, A GREENLAND CONVERT.

The following is abridged from a very interesting work, entitled “Greenland Missions, with Biographical Sketches of some of the Principal Converts.”

ANGUSINA, the subject of the following narrative, was born at Tunnuiliarbik, in South Greenland, in the year 1721. As yet no kind-hearted Missionary had set his foot upon the icy shores of that country; but its inhabitants were truly sitting in darkness, and in the shadow of death. The year in which he was born, however, was a happy year for Greenland; for soon after his birth, in the same year, the Rev. Mr Egede arrived. The early part of the life of Angusina was spent in roving from place to place, in company with his father, four brothers, and three sisters. All that he was desirous of possessing, was an abundance of seal's flesh for food, warm furs for clothing, and a house to shield him from the piercing blasts of winter. He had no kind parents to teach him, and to pray for him, for their minds were as dark and ignorant as his own; he had no Bible to read, no affectionate minister or Sabbath-school teacher to instruct him, or to care for his soul. At one time he, with his family, lived in the South, at another time at Kangek, a third at Disko, and thus continually changed his abode. These frequent changes may appear to the eye which looks only on external things, to be the result of mere caprice, but in the words of the Rev. Richard Cecil, "The most trivial events may determine our state in the world. Turning up one street instead of another, may bring us into company with a person whom we should not otherwise have met; and this may lead to a train of events which may determine the happiness or misery of our lives."

The truth of this observation was remarkably illustrated in the case of Angusina, for in one of their encampments he met with Mr Drachart, and heard him preach the Gospel! At the very first tidings of redemption by Christ, he received such an impression that he determined to forsake the ways of the wicked, and devote himself to the service of Him who had redeemed him by his blood. Thus was Angusina, by a special providence, brought in contact with the Word of God, which "is sharper than any two-edged sword,"—thus was he taught to know his fallen condition and the Gospel remedy. And we are told "he determined to become the Saviour's property, and take up his abode with the believers," a circumstance which shows what a powerful effect the Gospel tidings had made upon his once dark and ignorant mind. The Lord, however, saw fit to deny the desire of Angusina's heart to abide with the believers, for his father, whether unwilling to part with his son, or wishing to impede his progress in Christianity, would not consent to his departure. As Angusina was not at this time sufficiently decided to act for himself, he was constrained for the present to abandon his purpose, and to accompany his family in their wanderings among the heathen.

In the autumn of 1746, Angusina and his family returned to Kangek, where he had first heard the Gospel of his salvation. We are not informed what the state of his mind had been, during the interval of his former visit to that place: he now, however, again avowed his determination of joining himself to the Lord's people; and as he was the eldest son, being about 25 years of age, and having no family of his own, he asserted his independence, parted from his father, brothers, and sisters, and removed to the colony at Godhaab. The next notice which we have of him is, that he was baptized, January 25, 1747, by the Rev. Mr Drachart, under the full persuasion that he had believed with the heart unto righteousness. On this occasion he received the name of Daniel.

In the year 1748, Angusina, or Daniel as he was now called, removed to New Herrnhuth, being desirous of residing with an uncle who had been baptized, and professed Christianity. He had been steadily advancing since the time of his baptism, in the knowledge of the Lord, and was indeed a crown of rejoicing to his teachers. "After his removal to New Herrnhuth," says Mr Crantz, "he continued to grow in grace,—obtained a solid insight into his poverty and corruption,—and in a short time was admitted to the holy communion." In the year 1750, he enjoyed the satisfaction of seeing his wife admitted to a participation in the same ordinance, as a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Hitherto every thing had gone on smoothly with Daniel, but the Lord saw it meet that he should suffer temptation. The circumstances of the case are not mentioned; suffice it to say, in the words of Mr Crantz, "that he was prayed for, that his faith might not fail, nor the enemy be suffered to triumph in the downfall of this simple heart." The Lord heard their prayers, and used this temptation to humble him and render him more assiduously faithful and vigilant. Ever since his admission to the Lord's Supper, he felt a sincere desire to make known the "glad tidings of joy" to his countrymen. It is unnecessary to say that he was eminently qualified for the ministry of the Word among the inhabitants of Greenland. For better a godly minister, however unlettered, than an ungodly scholar. In the year 1752, he was admitted into the band of helpers, and from this time we are to view Daniel in the new character of a preacher of the Gospel.

"Out of the abundance of the heart," we are told, "the mouth of this enlightened heathen overflowed early and late." By questions and answers he endeavoured to clear up the confused ideas of his heathen countrymen concerning God, the immortality of the soul, and the necessity of redemption. "And then, with a burning heart, and often with tears in his eyes, he would recommend to them the faith as it is in Jesus." He received from the agents in trade, the distinguishing appellation of the "man of God,"—infinitely more honourable than the highest title that earth can bestow. Even in the storms of winter, he was to be found wherever an awakened soul was to be met with.

This interesting individual, strange to say, could neither read nor write, but nevertheless there are some letters extant which were dictated by him. The following is a specimen of the simple, yet forcible and affecting manner, in which he expressed himself in one of these letters:—"I have been this summer hunting rein-deer, and, while I was wandering about in the wilderness, I prayed our Saviour to lead and guide me by his grace. For I know that I am a poor and wretched man, if he is not continually near me, giving food to my soul out of his wounds. My faults and infirmities are numberless, but my Saviour knows them all, for he knows my heart, and therefore I at all times address him as a sinner. Thus the Holy Spirit directs my heart to his wounds, and I feel that our Saviour loves me, who always chooses none but the poorest of men. Therefore I need not be sorrowful. I will now tell you my desire: you know how children are towards their parents, thankful and obedient—just so would I be towards our Saviour. I am also sensible that I have had two sorts of life. The first was in perfect darkness; but our Saviour having sought and found me among the savages, I now live in his light, in his blood. When we are sensible of our wretchedness, our eyes flow with tears; but when we set before us our Saviour on the cross, we cleave to his side, as the nepiset-fish* to the stone; and all the time we retain a sense of our own wretchedness. Here you have the thoughts of my heart."

To shew the manner in which he addressed his ignorant countrymen, we subjoin the following extract:—"It pitted the Creator of all things to see man involved in ruin and eternal damnation. He himself, therefore, was made man like me and you,—laid down his life for us, and shed his blood, in order to set us free from sin and the devil. Hence it is that we call him our Creator Jesus Christ, our Saviour and Deliverer. Now, when we believe this, and are washed in his blood from all evil, we are made children of God; and when we die, we go to him, and remain with him in felicity unspeakable. But that ye say, ye know not whether ye have a soul, is not true. Ye will not know it, nor care for your immortal soul, because ye choose still to act according to your pleasure, and according to the lust of your flesh; therefore it is, that ye will not hear nor understand, nor come to the believers; for ye know that a change must pass upon you, and ye think that ye can then have no more satisfaction. But ye are vastly deceived. I had formerly no true satisfaction; but when I believed in our Saviour, I began to be truly happy. As often as I think on his death and bloodshedding, my heart is light and joyful."

From these passages, short and simple though they be, there are many lessons which the more advanced and the more intelligent Christian of our own country might learn with no small advantage.

But while Daniel exhibited such proofs of his ardent zeal for the conversion of his countrymen, the salvation of his own relations, as might be expected, was especially near to his heart. The Christian is no Stoic, the religion of Christ only tends to make the natural affections purer and stronger. Daniel's soul burned with a fervent desire to see his dearly beloved father, and brothers, and sisters, partakers of the same benefits with himself and his wife. His anxiety soon became so painful, that he was constrained to open his mind to the Missionaries; at the same time, with earnest importunity, requesting their permission to undertake a journey to the north, in quest of his family. The brethren endeavoured to dissuade him from his purpose, on account of the various dangers that were to be apprehended, both for body and soul; but as he could find no rest in his spirit, his urgent solicitations obliged them to acquiesce in his undertaking, and they dismissed him, in the year 1753, with the blessing of the congregation, in the company of Jonas, another of the Greenland helpers.

These humble Missionaries travelled about 140 leagues northward, declaring, like our blessed Saviour, their Master, the word of atonement wherever they met with any people, and especially among their relations. They soon returned to their friends at New Herrnhuth, who were anxiously concerned for their safety, bringing along with them some of their relatives. The labours of this journey were abundantly repaid, for the whole of Daniel's family followed him, were baptized, and, we are told, prospered in the congregation. In a letter of Daniel's, in which he alludes to his journey to the north, he says, "When I visited the heathens in Kangek, I could think of nothing to tell them but our Saviour's sufferings. Neither have I myself any inclination for other topics, for nothing is so agreeable to me as his passion and blood-shedding; and this is the most powerful—this is the greatest thing we can tell mankind." "I," said the Saviour, "if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."

Thus far the brethren had reaped much pleasure, and little pain, from this man of God. But they were now about to experience that painful feeling which St. Paul speaks of when he says, "I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain." Daniel had hitherto walked humbly with his God, ascribing unto him all the praise; but now the praise of man gradually infused its subtle poison into his spirit, and so benumbed the better principles of the inner man, that he was once induced to make a vain-glorious display of his powers, which was "as the breaking forth of waters," the breach becoming wider and wider. The alteration in Daniel's spirit soon became so visible, as to excite the anxious fears of the Missionaries on his account. His discourses were no longer attended with their usual unction and power. Perhaps if the reader would examine himself, his own conscience would tell him that poor Daniel is not a singular instance of such depravity. The Lord did not, however, utterly forsake him, but led him back into the way of obedience with the sharp rod of affliction. Daniel had one surviving daughter, a girl of 15 years of age, upon whom his affections rested with the fondest tenderness. She was able to read the Word of God, which she did frequently to her father; and was therefore endeared to him, not only as a child, but as an important assistant in the work of instructing his family and countrymen. The world contained no object half so dear to the heart of Daniel as his daughter Beata: his being, in every sense of the word, was, as it were, bound up with hers—to wound him here, would be to wound him at the heart; but Daniel had deeply sinned, and upon this tender part his merciful Lord saw it necessary to inflict the friendly stripes. Beata sickened, and died, departing happily to the Lord. Daniel was so amazed and stunned at the stroke, that his self-possession seemed quite to forsake him; he even absented himself from the Lord's Supper; but he soon found that, though "no affliction for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous, it afterwards yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them that are exercised thereby." He was convinced of his error, and in three months after the death of his daughter, he again, as a comforted sinner, repaired to the table of his Lord. The effect of this affliction upon Daniel's soul, appears in the following letter:—

"These lines shall tell you the thoughts of my heart. Last year I was not rightly happy, because one of my daughters went home. But I soon felt that all was not well in my heart, and begged our Saviour for forgiveness with tears; and before the winter came, he comforted me again with his nearness, and gave me a happy heart. Afterwards, at the great absolution and communion succeeding our winter-entrance, my heart was melted in a peculiar manner. Alas! the man that seeks and loves any thing else but Him, cannot enjoy his grace. But those that are poor and wretched in themselves, those that stand in need of him and implore his grace, they experience it; for he came to relieve the distressed. Therefore I will not conceal my sinfulness from him, nor from his servants. They know me, and as for him, he sees the recesses of my heart."

Daniel no doubt felt anguish at the loss of his daughter, but this affliction proved salutary, for he immediately looked upon earthly things as nothing and vanity, compared with Christ. He was not permitted, however, to remain long behind his beloved child, and the hour of his departure was at hand. How well the Great Builder of the Church had prepared and polished this living stone for the place which he was destined to fill in the spiritual temple above, appeared throughout the whole of his illness. In a letter dictated immediately before his sickness, he says, "I put my confidence solely in my Saviour; he knows me best, and sees what I am deficient in. He is our Teacher, Tutor, and Comforter."

Shortly after his re-admission to the Lord's Supper, his fatal illness began with pains in the side. The brethren immediately opened a vein, and gave him what they thought might be of service to him, but nothing would relieve him. When they called on him, they always found him in a happy meditation and intercourse with the Friend of his soul. On the 2d of December, he said, with a peculiarly lively and cheerful look, "Now it is confirmed to me that I shall go to my Saviour; nor will it be long delayed, for the wedding-garment I waited for is ready. Oh! how well and happy am I! But how will it then be to me, when I, like Thomas, shall lay my hand in his side, and say, 'My Lord, and my God!' Oh! how will I thank him that he has chosen me from among the heathen, has washed me with his blood, has given me his body to eat, and his blood to drink, and has kept me in fellowship with himself!"

When Daniel was visited, December 3d, in the morning, he was quite cheerful, and recommended his two sons and their mother to the care of the Missionaries. An extraordinary expression of love and peace exhibited in his countenance was observed by all around him. By degrees he lost his speech, and signified a wish to be blessed for his dismissal, which was done by the laying on of the hands of the Missionaries, and a farewell kiss, and the whole was attended with deep emotion, and a flood of tears from all present. The Missionaries left him, and had scarce reached home, when word was brought that Daniel was at the point of death. They hastened back again, but it was only to behold the departure of this highly-favoured witness of Jesus into the joy of his Lord. All who were around him at the moment of dissolution behaved themselves as those who have a lively hope; yet they, together with the Missionaries, embalmed his memory with innumerable tears.

His remains were, according to the Greenland custom, sewed up in a skin; and being laid upon a bier, were covered with a white cloth, over which the following verse, in the Greenland language, was legibly marked in red letters:—

"You bear me now to my repose,
As once they bore my Lord;
And as his sacred body rose,
So mine shall be restored."

On the day appointed for the interment, the corpse was carried to the tomb by six Greenland helpers, and attended by a large procession of Greenlanders and people from the factory.

A LETTER TO A LADY UNDER CONCERN FOR SALVATION.

BY THE REV. JAMES SILVERHIGHT, A.M.,
Minister of Markinch.

MY DEAR M—, A week has nearly elapsed since I was favoured with your letter, and I am sorry at the long delay which has unavoidably taken place in replying to so interesting a communication. What a privilege it is to us that the great Redeemer is not like man, on whom, if a multiplicity of matters devolve, something will be overlooked, or less attended to than the case requires. But of the great multitude of souls looking unto Jesus from all parts of the wide world, not one is overlooked by Christ, nor is help denied beyond the time of need. From the contents of your letter I may infer that your soul is more staid on the Rock of Salvation than it was the day you told me your troubles—you then assured me you were thoroughly convinced of your sinful guilty state, a sense of which distressed and made you miserable; and you seemed truly desirous to obtain relief—and when is real distress reluctant to be relieved? I know you are not reluctant, for you were breathing after relief with emotions of seriousness not to be repressed. Well, lay aside the knowledge of many things you have acquired touching experience and duty, and suppose you had never heard a Gospel declaration to this day—on that supposition this letter finds a poor, contrite, broken-hearted sinner, bemoaning a lost state, and earnestly asking, What shall I do? Now, in this state it is absolutely necessary to unlearn many things, and begin with the Gospel as if you had never heard it before. You are convinced of sin—you long for deliverance—you pant for salvation as the hart panteth for the water-brooks—and what you seek, that declare we unto you, in declaring Christ. It is the Gospel record that God, out of his great love to mankind, sent his dear Son to suffer, the just for the unjust—to die, the innocent for the guilty—by the obedience of one to bring in a justifying righteousness, and by the shedding of his blood, to effectuate our redemption from the penalty of death. And justice being glorified by the death of Christ for our sins, and the law magnified by his obedience in our stead, every obstacle is removed, and grace proclaimed in the sinner's reconciliation, pardon, and acceptance with God—and it is only required of us that we believe God's love in giving Christ, and that we believe his righteousness is sufficient to justify any sinner, and his blood of price enough to redeem from any sins. Do you believe these things? I know you believe them,—but let us go a step further. Do you believe the righteousness of Christ, and the death of Christ, enough for your pardon and for your justification? This you cannot deny. "If they were mine, however," you will add, "which I cannot believe!" But why not believe it? Christ, in all his righteousness and grace, is offered to sinners in the Gospel—is offered to their immediate acceptance. We are commanded to believe without waiting for "signs and wonders," and without waiting for fruits of holiness which are not antecedent to faith—you must begin with Christ; and O, my dear, do not make that elect and precious stone a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence—do not think you can enter into peace, or advance a step in religion, by stepping past that elect One, who is the Rock of our Salvation. Go no farther without Christ—abide under the shadow of that great Rock. This you tell me it is your desire to do, but yet your soul is not satisfied nor saved. Now, if you will dismiss all prejudices, and the reasonings of carnal wisdom, and be content with what contents every saint in Heaven, and if you will simply receive, and build on, what Christ has done, as your foundation, and look unto him to make you complete, Christ will both save you and satisfy all your desire. What does God requite of you but faith in his well-beloved Son,—and what is faith but to believe that Christ loved you and gave himself for you, to purchase forgiveness, and to bring forth his righteousness, that garment of praise, for your salvation? O, put it on, and cast away the spirit of heaviness for ever! "Love thinketh no evil,"—think no evil of Christ, then, but cast away carnal reasonings and objections of unbelief, (for, alas! many perish because they are too wise, and reasoning, and presumptuous, and will not, as the Apostle says, become fools that they may be wise;) and consult not with what others have experienced, but in simplicity of understanding say,—"I am a lost sinner, ready to perish; here is Christ declaring his power and willingness to save me, and crying 'come unto me.' I come, Lord! I venture my soul on Thy love. Venture? as if it were doubtful—help that unbelief! I cheerfully commit and willingly confide my all to Thee—yea, had I a thousand immortal souls in danger, in Thy hands, undoubtedly, would I confide them all." O! give all to Christ, and be assured nothing shall be lost! Well may the soul tell to Christ—

"Nothing but ets I thee can give."

It is a fit reply—

"Nothing but love shalt thou receive."

And if you can only bring your soul to such actings of faith in Jesus,—if the Holy Spirit do comfort your contrite heart with one hour, or one moment's looking unto Jesus in the simple, confiding, loving acts of direct belief, a miracle of grace shall be wrought, and then

"I'm healed! set free! from sin made pure,
Thy blood, my Christ, had wrought the cure;
I feel a power my will control,
Quench thy long drought my thirsty soul!
The living fountain now I've found
Diffusing streams of saving health around.
The Saviour call'd, the Spirit led me nigh,
What joys are these I feel! believing let me die!"

I write this under the impression that you are not yet escaped from bondage, and that you do still stand in suspense; and if it is so, allow me to quote the first lines of your letter to me:—"Unworthy as I am, and feel myself, I must not allow this consideration to deter me from availing myself of the kind privilege you granted me of writing to you. I cannot doubt you still continue to feel the same unabated interest you expressed for my soul." Excuse the liberty of repeating your words. Now, has Christ expressed no interest for souls? What drew him from heaven to earth, from the glory of the Father to the agonies and cursed shame of the Cross? Was it not the interest he took in souls—and do not his word and works, his life and death, express the greatness of his interest in souls? and has not he left sinners the privilege of believing on him, applying to him, and committing their souls into his hands, and shall our unworthiness deter us from that privilege? No! Just go to Christ with such a sentiment as that transcribed above. "Unworthy as I feel," &c., "I will not let that consideration deter me from believing on Thee for salvation." Why should we place such a reliance on the good will of a fellow creature, and yet be slow to confide in the Redeemer's love!—I am, &c.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Behold! I stand at the door and knock!—In vain do we look for language in which to express, or an image by which to illustrate, the stupendous condescension of the Mighty God. An earthly monarch, descending from his throne, laying aside his regal splendor, and, in the garb and attitude of a suppliant, knocking at the door of the meanest hovel in his dominions, and entreating its inmate to receive his monarch as his guest.—Oh! this conveys no image of the infinite condescension of the King of Kings. This is but the condescension of one worm to another; of a worm clothed in ermine to a worm clothed in rags; and how can this even shadow forth the condescension of the Almighty to a worm—of the Sovereign of the universe to a particle of dust! Yea, more—ininitely more, the condescension of the insulted God, stooping to plead with a rebellious worm; the offended Sovereign of the universe, stooping to supplicate the sinner that has defied and despised Him; entreating him to accept a free, full, glorious salvation, even pardon, holiness, eternal bliss—all purchased with that offended Sovereign's agony and blood! Is not this a sight that may well make angels wonder? And yet perhaps earth affords a sight still more calculated to fill heaven with astonishment. It is man refusing to listen to a beseeching God; it is the creature turning a deaf ear to the entreaties of his Creator; it is the rebellious worm spurning the invitations of his imploring Sovereign; it is the sinner leaving the Saviour standing and knocking at the door of his heart, and not merely neglecting to open it, but keeping it fast closed against Him, and with cold contempt or scornful pride, refusing to receive Him as his guest. And then to think how this insult is aggravated, by the readiness with which the door of the heart is opened to every other guest that knocks for admission there. First, the objects of our earthly love, all that have a just claim on our affections, knock at the door of the heart, and the door is at once opened, and they enter in and dwell there. Then the world knocks, and the door is at once opened—and the world comes with its train of lying vanities, and cheating promises, and disappointing hopes, and unsatisfying joys, and they enter into the heart and dwell there. And then sin knocks, and the door is at once opened—and sin comes in with its train of polluting thoughts, and vile affections, and unhallowed tempers, and abominable lusts, and they all enter into the heart and dwell there. And then Satan knocks, and the door is opened to him—and he comes with his train of impure and accursed spirits, and they all enter into the heart, and dwell there. And then Jesus comes, attended by a train of holy and heavenly tempers and affections, hopes and joys—He comes in His own glory, and His Father's glory, and the holy angels with Him; bearing in one hand a divinely-wrought robe of righteousness, and in the other a blood-bought crown of glory; and He stands at the door and knocks—but the door is not opened to Him! and He stands there day after day, waiting and knocking, but still the door is not opened; aye, that door, which was opened at once to every other guest, from earth or hell, is kept closed—barred, as with bars of iron, against Him; and He is left there standing and knocking—and knocking, but knocking in vain! How justly has the human heart, in its natural state, been compared to the inn of Bethlehem, where every guest could find room, and every guest was welcome, except the Saviour of mankind!—WHITE.

Our Lord's Second Advent.—O blessed Saviour, what a strange variety of conceits do I find concerning thy thousand years reign! What riddles are there in that prophecy, which no human tongue can read! Where to fix the beginning of that marvellous millenary, and where the end, and what manner of reign it shall be; whether temporal or spiritual, on earth or in heaven, undergoes as many constructions as there are pens that have undertaken it. How busy are the tongues of men! How are their brains taken up with the endless construction of this enigmatical truth, when, in the meantime, the care of the spiritual reign in their hearts is neglected! O my Saviour! while others weary themselves with this disquisition of thy personal reign upon earth for a thousand years, let it be the whole bent and study of my soul, to make sure of my personal reign with thee in heaven to all eternity.—BISHOP HALL.

Needful Trials.—The sufferings, which to Christ were only glorious, are necessary to us. Our condition requires this treatment. We are sick of a disease which will yield to no other application. Into what excesses should we not run headlong without this seasonable restraint! Humanity, moderation, charity, and even justice, are too seldom seen in the world, as it is: but the very footsteps of these virtues would not be visible upon the earth, if adversity were banished out of it. Eager appetites, clamorous passions, hearken to no other call. The voice of reason cannot reach them. As full of unhappiness as the world is, men still find courage to be wicked; and the little of virtue that yet remains among us, is chiefly owing to this salutary discipline. We thank God, perhaps, when we do thank him, for prosperity; for health, plenty, success and honour. We do well. They are the gifts of God's Providence, and demand our acknowledgments. But they are not the only blessings his goodness confers on us. Adversity should be added to the number of his favours, and remembered in our most devout thanksgivings. Blessed be God for pain, sickness, disappointment, distress; and every one of those various evils with which the life of man is filled, and which are the subjects of our hasty complaints; evils, which are our greatest good; which afflict but purify, tear and harrow up the soul, but prepare it for the seeds of virtue. Blessed be God that he is not so unkind as to try us by the most dangerous of all temptations,—uninterrupted prosperity: that we are not undone by the accomplishment of our wishes: That he is pleased to chastise us with his legitimate children, and with his dear and only begotten Son; whom we hope to follow through the gate of the grave to a joyful resurrection; and to be received by him into those mansions which he is now preparing for us in heaven; where he liveth and reigneth, with the Father and Holy Spirit, one God, world without end.—ODDEN.

Though our enemies are potent, and we impotent, yet our God is omnipotent; and though we have a mighty foe, yet we have an Almighty Friend.—WEST,

SACRED POETRY.

"THEY SING THE SONG OF MOSES."—REV. XV. 3.

DARK was the night, the wind was high,
The way by mortals never trod;
For God had made the channel dry
When faithful Moses stretched the rod.

The raging waves, on either hand,
Stood like a massy tott'ring wall,
And on the heaven-defended band
Refused to let their waters fall.

With anxious footsteps Israel trod
The depths of that mysterious way;
Cheered by the pillar of their God,
That shone for them with fav'ring ray.

But when they reached the opposing shore,
As morning streaked the eastern sky,
They saw the billows hurry o'er
The flower of Pharaoh's chivalry.

Then, awful gladness filled the mind
Of Israel's mighty ransomed throng;
And while they gazed on all behind,
Their wonder burst into a song.

Thus, thy redeem'd ones, Lord, on earth,
While passing through this vale of weeping,
Mix holy trembling with their mirth,
And anxious watching with their sleeping.

The night is dark, the storm is loud,
The path no human strength can tread;
Oh! give us then the pillar-cloud,
Heaven's light upon our path to shed.

And oh, when, life's dark journey o'er,
And death's enshrouding valley past,
We plant our foot on yonder shore,
And tread yon golden strand at last,

Shall we not see with deep amaze,
How grace hath led us safe along;
And whilst behind—before we gaze—
Triumphant burst into a song!

And ev'n on earth, though sore bested—
Fightings without and fears within;
Sprinkled to-day from slavish dread—
To-morrow, captive led by sin,

Yet, would I lift my downcast eyes
On Thee, thou brilliant tower of fire—
Thou dark cloud to mine enemies—
That hope may all my breast inspire.

And thus, the Lord, my strength, I'll praise,
Though Satan and his legions rage;
And the sweet song of Faith I'll raise
To cheer me on my pilgrimage.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Archbishop Usher.—A friend of this worthy prelate repeatedly urged him to write his thoughts on Sanctification, which at length he engaged to do; but a considerable time elapsing, the performance of his promise was unfortunately claimed. The bishop replied to this effect:—I have not written, and yet I cannot charge myself with a breach of promise; for I began to write, but when I came to treat of the new creatures which God formed by his Spirit in every regenerate soul, I found so little of it wrought in myself that I could speak of it only as parrots, or by rote, without the knowledge of what I might have expressed, and therefore I durst not presume to proceed any further in it." Upon this his friend stood amazed, to hear such a confession from a man so eminent. The bishop then added, "I must tell you we do not well understand what sanctification and the new creature are. It is best for a man to be brought to an entire resignation of his own will to the will of God, and to live in the offering up of his soul continually in the flames of love as a whole burnt-offering to Christ; and Oh! how many who profess Christianity are unacquainted experimentally with this great work upon their souls."

Testimony to the Value of the Bible.—Dr Leechman, Principal of the College of Glasgow, had a great veneration for the sacred oracles. When on his death-bed, he said to the son of a worthy nobleman, "you see the situation I am in; I have not many days to live; I am glad you have had an opportunity of witnessing the tranquillity of my last moments; but it is not tranquillity and composure alone, it is joy and triumph, it is complete exultation!" "And whence does this exultation spring?" "From that book," (pointing to a Bible that lay on the table,) "from that book, too much neglected indeed, but which contains invaluable treasures—treasures of joy and rejoicing; for it makes us certain that this mortal shall put on immortality!"

Sabbath.—Coleridge looked forward with great delight to the return of the Sabbath, the sacredness of which produced a wonderful effect on the temperament of that Christian poet. To a friend he said, one Sunday morning, "I feel as if God had, by giving the Sabbath, given fifty-two springs in every year."

A Christian Officer.—Sir Charles Middleton, afterwards well known as Lord Barham, whose management of the navy when first Lord of the Admiralty in times of unequalled difficulty, will ever be mentioned to his honour in the pages of British history, was highly commended for his prompt services by Lord Nelson, and the navy of England reached the acme of fame, when a man, ridiculed as a saint, presided over its affairs. Let this for ever silence those who assert that religion incapacitates for the use of this life. But another point deserves to be mentioned. Lord Barham permitted no Sabbath labour in the dock-yards; yet he managed to comply with the urgent and rapid demands of the hero of the deep, whose circumstances and uncommon movements required no ordinary energy in the supply of his resources. Neither nations nor individuals will ever lose by the dedication of the sacred day to the worship of a God who prospers those who serve him and obey his commandments.

Repentance.—Some people, said the excellent Philip Henry, do not like to hear much of repentance; but I think it so necessary, that if I should die in the pulpit, I wish to die preaching repentance, and if out of the pulpit, practising it.

ON INDUSTRY

(Extracted from a Manuscript, Dated Aug. 3, 1807.)

BY THE LATE

REV. SIR HENRY MONCREIFF WELLWOOD, BART.,
D.D.

OUR separate duties, like our different conditions, are not the effects of any arbitrary arrangements, devised by men, but are universally the consequences of the wise and perpetual decrees of God, who gives to every man his place, and selects for every man his peculiar occupations. The distinctions created by wealth and poverty, by power and dependence, are inseparable from the condition of human nature, and of civilized society; but they are as intimately embodied with the peculiar duties which every individual, in his own condition, is required to fulfil. The advantages, suited to the place which God hath given us among our brethren, are only to be enjoyed in connection with the employments and the duties which it prescribes to us; and he who will not perform the duties of his station, can have no right to expect that he can possess its advantages.

Industry, or labour, is the indispensable duty of every individual, whatever his situation or capacity may be; and this, as much from the law of Religion, as from the interests and arrangements of the present life. It is not confined to any rank or condition. The lower orders of the people are often apt to imagine, that all the labour is with them; and that they who occupy the superior, and even the middle ranks, live above the necessity of personal exertion, on the industry of those below them. Nothing can be farther from the truth. The different departments, and the variety of stations in human life, are essential to the general happiness and prosperity of mankind, and depend so universally and so closely on one another, that there is not one of them, which can either exist, or become a source of prosperity, without the rest:—an idea, which the apostle Paul illustrates, with regard to the different offices and talents in the Church of God, by their analogy to the members of the human body. "If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?" "God hath set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him." "And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee, nor the head to the feet, I have no need of you." Not only so—even "those members of the body which seem to be more feeble, are necessary." "God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked: that there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another, that whether one member suffer, all the members might suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members might rejoice with it." But the close connection of the members of the body with each other supposes, of necessity, that each member separately performs its own office or functions, and that on this depends the general health and soundness of the body.

This analogy is perfectly correct, as it applies to the different duties and conditions of mankind. The labour of the statesman, of the soldier, of the mariner, of the profound inquirer, of the public instructor, of the teacher of children, of the skillful physician, of the enterprising merchant, of the active manufacturer, of the industrious mechanic, is, in each of them, labour demanded for the general order, security, and happiness of mankind; and not more essential to public prosperity than to the comfort and tranquillity of the lowest situation. The great communicate to the small, and the wise to the ignorant, the opportunities, the knowledge, or the protection which they require; and they receive from them, in return, the means both of their private comfort and of their public usefulness. The wealth and activity of the rich produce bread and employment to the poor, while the industry of the poor lies at the foundation of all the prosperity and wealth of the rich. Every man's labour is suited to his own talents, and to his own place; and there it is essential, not only to his separate duty, or individual happiness, but to the general interests of human life, and to the progress and prosperity of human affairs.

They who occupy the higher departments of society, are not at liberty to neglect their duties to those below them, or to forget that they depend on them, every moment, for all the external means of their comfort and prosperity. It is their labour to provide for the effectual defence and security of the state, for the suppression of vice, for the punishment of crimes, for the firm and impartial execution of the laws, for the protection of the innocent, for the encouragement of industry, for the progress of arts and of improvement, for the general instruction of the great body of the people, for the education and employment of the poor, and for the effectual relief, which can be given, from the pressure of age, of sorrow, and of poverty. On the other hand, they whom Providence hath placed in the inferior stations, have duties assigned to them of equal importance, and not less indispensable. To them are committed the practical arts, on which the articles of first necessity depend, the labours of industry, the culture of the soil, the duties of subordination and obedience, either in public service, or domestic occupation. To all this must be added the labour of every order of the people, in their separate families,—in the provision which the necessities of their families require;—in the economy which is essential to their comfort and tranquillity,—in the means which they must employ to watch over their children, and to educate them,—in the many exertions, with which they are required to meet domestic sufferings, or domestic duties.

The labour is perpetual, among all the different ranks and denominations of men, who are capable either of activity or of foresight; and it is impossible not to be conscious, that every important interest and comfort of human life depends on the fidelity with which the requisite labour is performed by every man in his place.

This also is the positive and indispensable law of religion, as much as it can be the law of human society, or the source of private satisfaction. It is impressed on our consciences by the doctrine of Christ, as duty to God, and to Him who hath redeemed us to God by his blood. It was the first law given to man when he fell from Paradise: "Thou shalt eat the herb of the field," and "in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground." It is a law renewed and enforced under every form of Religion which hath come from God. "Whatsoever thine hand findeth to do," said Solomon, (in the labour suited to the condition which God hath given thee,) "do it with thy might; for there is neither work, nor device, nor knowledge, in the grave." "We command and exhort men," says the apostle Paul, "by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread, and that they be not weary in well-doing.—That they study to be quiet, and to do their own business, and to work with their own hands, as we commanded you." These important and solemn admonitions bring home to our consciences the law of Christ. They tell us how we ought to labour, and to glorify God, in the place he hath appointed us to fill. They tell us, that the idle and unprofitable servants, in the highest as well as in the lowest ranks, who desert their duties, and hide their talents in the earth, cannot be the disciples of Christ. While they multiply to themselves the sorrows which are inseparable from an idle and a useless life, be their rank or capacity among their brethren great or small, they are judged and condemned with the wicked at the tribunal of God.

Idleness has certainly no claims, in any rank of life, either to respect or to advantages. He who will not submit to the labour which the duties of his own station demand, and who wastes his time, his strength, his wealth, and his talents, in frivolous, useless, or unworthy pursuits, whatever his opulence or his rank may be, loses every portion of esteem, and forfeits every claim to comfort among his brethren. Though the laws of society protect him in the possession of his property while it continues to be his, he derives from it no real or substantial advantages, while his mind is oppressed with the burden of time which he will not employ, or is plunged into miseries by the vices which he will not abandon. "The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much;" while his idle and dissolute life, with all that wealth can do for him, deprives him of the comforts which the meanest of his dependants possess. He, again, who depends for his subsistence on the labours of his hands, or on the activity of every day, and whose family depend on him, can have no resources whatsoever, if he permit himself to give way to an idleness which works itself into his habits by degrees; and much less, if, through idleness, he sinks into vices, which add to his wants while they lessen his capacity. We see around us, daily, the multitude of unhappy men, who, with the most common industry in their own stations, might have been placed in easy circumstances, and have been both respectable and useful citizens, who are completely ruined by the neglect of labour alone, and by the vices which that neglect produces; who pass from sloth to idleness, from idleness to drunkenness, from intemperance to every other dissipation; and, because their inconstant and deserted labour will no longer supply their private or their domestic wants, they teach themselves, and teach their children, "the hidden things of dishonesty," till they sink together into the lowest and most abject perdition.

There is no doubt, that even the most degraded and most worthless poverty has some relief to expect from the spirit of our Religion, and the humanity of our laws and of our manners, which will not permit any human creature, whose situation is known, to perish before our eyes from the absolute want of food or raiment. But this is all which can in reason be expected, in such a case. Unprincipled poverty and resolute idleness we can do nothing to palliate and nothing to encourage, whatever we may think necessary to save the individuals from perdition. He who will not work, while he has the means, can have no claims; and nothing is to be given to relieve the wants of the present moment, which can have any influence to prevent him from returning to the labour, which, even when it is forced on him by necessity, may save him from wretchedness at last.

There is also another case to be stated, very different from this, which we are not permitted to forget. They who are no longer capable of labour, through age or infirmities,—and destitute children, left fatherless in the world,—have an indisputable claim to the beneficence of those who are in happier situations. The industrious poor, the destitute sick, the helpless orphan, the disconsolate widow, are expressly given us in charge by Him, “who, though he was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich.” The obligation to help them, and to give them comfort, is indispensable, as the great law of the Gospel; and the deeds of kindness performed to them, are declared to be estimated as done to their Master and ours.

From these views, it follows, that they who faithfully employ the means which they possess, have a right to enjoy in security the fruits of their industry. The whole order and prosperity of human society depends on the security given to industrious men, in the possession of their property. They are fully entitled to the perfect and secure enjoyment of whatever they can acquire by their talents or their skill, excepting only, that part of the fruit of their labour which it is necessary to contribute to the general welfare of the community. The public faith is pledged to them, that no other encroachment shall be made on any thing which they can attain by the utmost exertion of ardour and talents. And in this respect, the security of private men is more complete in this happy country, than it has ever been in any period of the world, or in any other condition of human beings. Every individual may aspire from the lowest to the highest situations, by means of successful and honourable labour within the department assigned to him. No man is excluded from the full extent of the reward he can deserve, and every individual is completely protected in the possession, and in the free and independent enjoyment, of whatever he has been able to acquire.

Blessings so important and so generally diffused in public and in private life, call for the most distinguished gratitude to God, and afford general inducements to industry and honourable labour, which can never be estimated beyond their value. They may well attach us to our country, and attach us to our brethren; and, while we see the other nations of Europe laid waste around us by the ravages of war and of despotism, and every man's person and property in other countries at the mercy of lawless violence, we have good reasons, indeed, to bless the God of our fathers, and strong motives to co-operate heartily and generally with one another, to support the industry, and to encourage the virtues, by which we ought to express our gratitude, and on which, under God, our general safety and prosperity depend.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF DR PHILIP DODDRIDGE.

An Account of the Life and Death of the illustrious Author of the “Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul” cannot but be interesting to those who are at all conversant with his writings. Philip Doddridge was born in London, on the 26th of June 1702. His father, who was an oil-merchant, had a very large family, all of whom died young, except one daughter, and the subject of our narrative. Throughout life he was always of a very infirm constitution, and of a very consumptive habit of body, “and, therefore,” says his Biographer, “I find him frequently, especially on the returns of his birthday, expressing his wonder and thankfulness that he was so long preserved.” Doddridge was blessed with pious parents, and was by them brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. His mother seems to have taken a very great charge of his early religious education, and he used in after life to say, that her wise and pious reflections on the stories contained in the Scriptures were the means of making impressions on his heart which never were effaced. This tender parent, however, was not long permitted to watch over the interests of her beloved son, for she was called from time to eternity while Doddridge was yet very young. In the year 1712, when only ten years of age, he was removed to a school at Kingston-on-Thames, where he remained till about the time of his father's death, which took place in the year 1715. When informed of this melancholy occurrence, he made the following reflection, which shows that he had profited not a little by the instructions which he had received in the Christian religion: “God,” said he, “is an immortal Father, my soul rejoiceth in him. He has hitherto helped me and provided for me. May it be my study to approve myself a more affectionate, grateful, dutiful child!”

After his father's death, he was removed to a private school at St Albans, where his acquaintance with Dr Samuel Clark commenced—an acquaintance which continued unimpaired during their earthly pilgrimage. To this person, as we shall see in the subsequent part of our narrative, Doddridge was much indebted both for instruction and encouragement in his pursuits. His meeting with this eminent individual was of the more advantage to him, as the person to whom his father's concerns were intrusted, managed them so imprudently that he soon had nothing to depend upon. In Dr Clark, however, Doddridge found a father, an instructor, and a friend: a circumstance which strikingly exemplifies the paternal care which God takes of those who trust in him, for, as we formerly said, this poor, forsaken, and forlorn orphan committed all his concerns to his heavenly Father; and he was not disappointed. It was during his residence at St Albans that he commenced his Diary, in which he kept an exact account of the subjects to which he devoted his time,—a custom which in after life proved very useful. At this school, he not only, by every means in his power, assisted his school-fellows in their studies, but likewise, as often as he could, introduced religious topics into his conversation with them. When walking alone in the fields, he used either to read or to reflect on what he had read, and frequently in his walks called upon the poor and the ignorant at their houses, supplying them with what money he could spare out of his own small allowance, and in these visits he not unfrequently read or lent them books of a religious description. These attempts, he had reason to believe, were not altogether in vain. As Doddridge had at that time the office of the ministry in view, besides applying himself diligently to the study of the languages, he perused the Scriptures morning and evening, and read some commentary on them, an exercise which he seldom or never neglected, whatever were his other engagements. He used likewise to commit to writing the substance and design of the sermons which he heard, as also the impression which they had produced upon his mind, and the resolutions which he had been led to make by the consideration of them. In the year 1718, while still residing at St Albans, he was admitted for the first time to the Lord's Supper, by his friend and counsellor,

Dr Clark. The following reflections on the occasion show the serious frame of mind which he was in at the time. "I rose early this morning, read that part of Mr Henry's book on the Lord's Supper which treats of due approach to it. I endeavoured to excite in myself those dispositions and affections which he mentions as proper for that ordinance. As I endeavoured to prepare my heart according to the preparation of the sanctuary, though with many defects, God was pleased to meet me, and give me sweet communion with himself, of which I desire always to retain a grateful sense. I this day, in the strength of Christ, renewed my covenant with God, and renounced my covenant with sin. I vowed against every sin, and resolved carefully to perform every duty. The Lord keep this in the imagination of my heart, and grant I may not deal treacherously with him! In the evening, I read and thought on some of Mr Henry's directions for a suitable conversation after the Lord's Supper, and then prayed; begging that God would give me grace so to act as he requires, and as I have bound myself. I then looked over the memorandums of this day, comparing the manner in which I spent it, and in which I designed to spend it; and blessed be God, I had reason to do it with some pleasure, though in some instances I found cause for humiliation."

During the same year in which Doddridge was admitted to the Sacrament, he left the school of St Albans, and retired to his sister's house, where he took into his most serious consideration his prospects regarding after life. Quite unresolved what profession to adopt, he had some good proposals made to him upon condition that he should follow the law, upon which he was on the point of determining, when he thought it would be best to devote one morning solemnly to seek God for direction. The language of his heart upon this occasion was, "Here am I, Lord, do with me what seemeth good in thy sight." The Lord had chosen him for a teacher unto his people, and when he was actually engaged in prayer for the guidance of the Almighty, the postman called at the door with a letter from Dr Clark, in which he told him that having heard of his difficulties, he would take him under his care, if he chose to follow the ministry, from sincere and Christian motives. "This," to use his own words, "I looked upon almost as an answer from Heaven; and, while I live, shall always adore so reasonable an interposition of divine Providence. I have sought God's direction in all this matter, and I hope I have had it. My only view in my choice hath been that of more extensive service: and I beg God would make me an instrument of doing much good in the world." Thus was Philip Doddridge led to follow the ministry of Christ during his laborious and truly useful life.

After continuing for some time under the care of his sincere friend, Dr Clark, he was placed under the tuition of a Mr Jennings at Kibworth, a man of great learning and a true Christian. During his residence there, he was conspicuous for diligence in the prosecution of his studies, and no less so for his eminent piety. Applying himself with great assiduity and success to the study of the classics, he still kept the ministry in view, and made Divinity the chief subject of attention. Much of his time was spent in private devotion, examining the state of his heart, and keeping alive an habitual sense of God, religion, and eternity. About this time too, he drew out a solemn form of covenant with God, resembling that which he recommends in the 17th chapter of his "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul;" and in addition to this, some rules for directing his conduct aright, which he wrote at the beginning of his Testament.

On the 22d of July, 1722, Doddridge was examined by a committee of ministers, who licensed him to preach the Gospel. His first sermon was delivered at Hinkley, from 1 Cor. xvi. 22: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha." This discourse was crowned with splendid success, and no doubt tended to inspire him with an ardent zeal in his Master's service, for in his Diary he mentions that two persons ascribed their conversion to the blessing of God attending this discourse.

He had not been long licensed when he received a call from the congregation at Kibworth to be their pastor, which he accepted. Here he pursued his studies with the utmost perseverance, and the more diligently as his congregation was small, and the village retired. His favourite authors at this time were Tillotson, Bates, and Howe, but especially Baxter, whom he exceedingly admired. Intense as was his application to study, he did not neglect those who were committed to his care, but visited and instructed them with the greatest zeal. His own spiritual interests were never forgotten, and he was in the habit of preaching over on Sabbath evenings to his own soul the sermons which he had that day preached to others.

In October 1725, he removed his residence from Kibworth to Market Harborough, where, however, he continued his relation to his former charge, preaching to them regularly every Sabbath. In 1729, he was chosen assistant to Mr Some at Harborough, a man for whom he had the highest esteem and respect. His fame had by this time spread abroad, and he received calls from many large congregations, which, for various reasons, he refused. About this time, at the earnest entreaty of his friends, he was induced to undertake the charge of an academy at Harborough, similar to the one in which he had been educated under the care of Dr Jennings. During his residence at that place, the dissenting congregation at Castle Hill in Northampton being vacant, he preached to them occasionally, and his services were so acceptable that they invited and strongly urged him to undertake the pastoral charge. Afraid lest he might not be able to fulfil the duties of this arduous situation, Doddridge wished to decline it. But owing to the earnest entreaties of his friends and the congregation, as well as other circumstances, he was induced to settle at Northampton. We give the following account of the matter in his own words: "While I was pleasing myself with the view of a continuance at Harborough, I little thought how few days would lead me to a determination to remove from it. But Providence had its own secret designs, at that time invisible to me. I went to Northampton the last Lord's Day in November, 1729, to take leave of my good friends there as gently as I could; and preached a sermon, to dispose them to submit to the will of God in events which might be most contrary to their views and inclinations, from Acts xxi. 14: 'And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, the will of the Lord be done.' On the morning of that day an incident happened, which affected me greatly. Having been much urged on Saturday evening, and much impressed with the tender entreaties of my friends, I had in my secret devotion been spreading the affair before God, though as a thing almost determined in the negative; appealing to him, that my chief reason for declining the call, was the apprehension of engaging in more business than I was capable of performing, considering my age, the largeness of the congregation, and that I had no prospect of an assistant. As soon as this address was ended, I passed through a room of the house in which I lodged, where a child was reading to his mother, and the only words I heard distinctly were these, 'And as thy days, so shall thy strength be.' Though these words were strongly impressed upon my mind, and remained there with great force and sweetness, yet I persisted in my refusal. But that very evening, happening to be in company with one of the deacons of that congregation, he engaged me to promise to preach his father's funeral sermon, from a particular text, on timely notice of his death; which it was imagined would be in a few weeks. It pleased God to remove him that night, which kept me there till Wednesday. Going in the interval to some houses where I had been a stranger, and receiving visits from persons of the congregation whom I had not so much as heard of, I was convinced, beyond all doubt, of the earnest desire of my friends there to have me settled among them. I saw those appearances of a serious spirit, which were very affecting to me. Several attended the funeral, who were not stated hearers there, and expressed much satisfaction in my labours. Before I went away, the young persons came to me in a body, earnestly entreated my coming among them, and promised to submit to all such methods of instruction as I should think proper. Upon the whole, I was persuaded it was my duty to accept the invitation. It was indeed with great reluctance; as I had gone contrary to the advice of some friends, for whom I had a high regard; and it was breaking my very agreeable connections at Harborough. I thought there was a prospect of doing good at Northampton, equal to what I could ever hope to have as a minister; and was much afraid, if I declined the invitation, the congregation would be greatly injured. There were some steps in the leadings of Providence, which seemed to me exceedingly remarkable; and though some of my friends have much blamed and discouraged me, I could not refuse, without offering the most apparent injury to my own conscience."

Doddridge removed to Northampton on the 24th of December 1729, and about three weeks after entered on the duties of housekeeping, which he commenced by spending an evening in prayer in company with some of his friends. He had not been here more than two months when he was seized with a very severe illness, which excited in his friends the most serious fears for his life. After a few weeks of languishing, God mercifully restored him to health, although he had not quite recovered when the day of his ordination arrived.

In his new situation the vast stores of knowledge which he had been accumulating during his past retirement were brought into active service. Continuing the work of a teacher of youth, and with such an extensive charge, it was next to impossible that he could fully write out his sermons. It was his custom in general, to write out only the leading thoughts and particular texts which he intended to introduce, "but," says his biographer, "he was so thoroughly master of his subjects, and had such a steady utterance and so warm a heart, that perhaps few ministers can compose better discourses than he delivered from these short hints." The vital truths of the Gospel, and its duties as enforced by them, were his favourite topics; for considering himself a minister of the Gospel, he could not satisfy himself unless he preached, above all other topics, "Christ Jesus, and Him crucified." His flock came to him for bread, and he did not give them stones; no abstruse disquisitions nor dry criticisms were ever delivered from his pulpit. "It is my desire," saith he, "not to entertain an auditory with pretty, lively things, which is comparatively easy, but to come close to their consciences, to awaken them to a real sense of their spiritual concerns, to bring them to God, and keep them continually near to him; which, to me, at least, is an exceeding hard thing." His discourses were full of variety, and on that account both pleasing and edifying; he never meddled with controversial points in the pulpit, nor endeavoured to refute errors with which his people were in no danger of being infected. Impressive and instructive as he was, eminently so indeed, on all occasions, it was at the administration of the Lord's Supper that he seemed, in particular, to be a man of God—it was there that his fervour of spirit and earnest entreaties and admonitions showed how deeply concerned he was for the eternal welfare of his people. Doddridge maintained a religious exercise every Friday evening, on which occasions he went through the Psalms in exposition, as also the prophecies concerning the Messiah and his kingdom, and the promises of Scripture. In addition to these, for several winters, he delivered a lecture on every Thursday evening; and amid all these duties, he was most regular and assiduous in his visitations to his people, in catechising the children, and in the various other duties of the pastoral office. Among his people Doddridge was much esteemed and beloved, and in his preaching he was always very popular, as might be expected.

We shall now proceed to consider Dr Doddridge chiefly in his private character, which is by far the most interesting and instructive point of view, and here we perceive him to have been a man equalled by few in piety and in virtue. In his character as a husband, he was prudent and affectionate; in that of a minister, as we have already seen, he was truly conscientious and sincere, and in that of a man, he was, in most respects, an object of imitation for all. In December 1730, he married Mrs Mary Davis, a native of Worcester, who proved herself to be a truly valuable companion. Immediately before his marriage he spent a day in extraordinary devotion, praying his heavenly Father for a blessing in his new state. About this time he committed the following resolution to paper. "As a husband, it shall be my daily care to keep up the spirit of religion in my conversation with my wife; to recommend her to the divine blessing; to manifest an obliging tender disposition towards her; and particularly, to avoid every thing which has the appearance of pettishness, to which, amidst my various cares and labours, I may, in some unguarded moments, be liable."

With regard to the education of his children, Doddridge was particularly careful to encourage in them mild and friendly dispositions, which he considered absolutely necessary for their own comfort as well as usefulness in the world. The following extract from his papers will best show the manner in which he endeavoured to perform the duties of a father. "As a father, it shall be my care to intercede for my children daily; to converse with them often upon some religious subject; to drop some short hints of the serious kind, when there is not room for large discourse; to pray sometimes with them separately; to endeavour to bring them early to communion with the Church; to study to oblige them, and secure their affection."

To his servants he behaved with affability and kindness, and his great desire was that they might be truly pious, for the encouragement of which he supplied them with Bibles and suitable religious books. Often on the Lord's Day he discoursed seriously with them, and prayed with them in private. He was not one of those, of whom there are too many, who consider that they have nothing more to do with their servants than to see that they perform their work faithfully. On the contrary, he considered them as members of his family, yes, as his very children, and he laboured earnestly to discharge those duties towards them which Christianity enforces. Instead of quarrelling with them he admonished them calmly, for his nature abhorred chiding. He was indeed one of whom it might be said, that he ruled his house well, for he "commanded his children and household to keep the ways of the Lord." He did not endeavour to force obedience, but he drew them to their duty with the cords of love.

There were few that possessed a greater number of sincere and loving friends than Dr Doddridge, and as few who surpassed him in devotedness as a friend. "Blessed be God," he used to say, "for friendship, and the hope of its being perfected and eternal above! If it be so delightful on earth, amidst our mutual imperfections, what will it be in Heaven!" To his friends he recommended himself by the politeness and amiability of his manners, for he possessed none of that repulsive coldness which is too frequently to be found in men who have devoted much attention to study and to business. "He esteemed it the duty of friends daily to pray for one another, as a proper expression and the firmest support of their friendship; and he counted the prayers of his friends among his most valuable treasures." Their reproofs and admonitions he always received as a favour, and esteemed them only the more on that account, as will be seen from the following extract from one of his letters: "I thank God, I have not that delicacy of temper, that a friend should need to make an apology for saying and doing a kind and proper thing, when there is what the foolish taste of the present age may sometimes call a freedom taken in it. Freedom in friendship is the very soul of it, and its necessary test and support." No person relished more the company and conversation of his friends than did Doddridge. So much did he enjoy their society that he sometimes remarked, that it gave him a foretaste of the happiness of the heavenly world.

There are few traits in the character of Doddridge more characteristic of the man than the way in which he spent and improved his time. He never suffered an hour to pass without some suitable employment; and little time as he did lose or mispend, the following is one of his mournful reflections on this subject:—"Upon reviewing the last year, I find that I have trifled away a great deal of time. Not to speak of that which hath been lost in formal devotion, and an indolent temper in the dispatch of business, I find, upon computation, that I have lost some hundred hours by unnecessary sleep. I have lost many in unnecessary visits, journeys of pleasure, or business prolonged to an unseasonable length, and by indulging vain roving thoughts while travelling. A multitude of precious hours have been lost in unprofitable discourse, when I have been necessarily engaged in company; for want of taking care to furnish myself with proper subjects of conversation, or not making use of them, or not attending to opportunities of introducing profitable discourse." He rose early, sat up late, and considered the smallest portions of time too valuable to be lost. Doing nothing was his greatest fatigue, and he used to say to his pupils, that one good work was the best relaxation from another. The work of every day he was desirous of performing in its day, and he could never brook the thought of delaying it till to-morrow, knowing well that there was sufficient business for that day, and all the days and hours of his life, as he himself remarked. It is even narrated of him, that when dressing and shaving, one of his pupils was wont to read to him. Amid all his studies, and other varied and engrossing employments, his Master's work was never neglected; all that he had in view was the good of his own soul, of the souls of his people, and the good of the world at large. During the year he is said to have preached one hundred and forty times, and in some years even oftener. Well might he address his brethren on "The evil and danger of neglecting the souls of men." Well might he treat them to be faithful ministers of Christ; for if ever there was a faithful, aye and a successful servant of God, it was Philip Doddridge. He improved every opportunity of doing good, not only to his own congregation, but to his brethren of mankind. Often when he accidentally met with strangers, he turned their conversation to religious topics, and he had every reason to hope that serious and lasting impressions were made upon the hearts of some. If his zeal was excessive in any thing, it was in admonishing his younger brethren, when he saw them indolent; on which occasions he used every argument, every consideration, and every motive to increase their diligence. But above all other things, he was sincerely desirous to see the Gospel propagated abroad. His generous heart turned within him when he thought of so many thousands of his fellow-creatures living without the knowledge of a Redeemer, and he exerted all the force of his persuasion and entreaty to engage others in the cause of spreading the "glad tidings of great joy" through heathen lands. Speaking of Missionaries, he says, "I hope I can truly say, that, if God would put it into the heart of my only son to go under this character, I could willingly part with him, though I were to see him no more. What are views of a family and a name, when compared with a regard to extending my Redeemer's kingdom, and gaining souls to Christ?"—And in a letter to a friend he says, "It is much better and more delightful to do a little for our Redeemer than to do nothing. Who that considers what a precious jewel he possesseth in that best of Friends, would not wish that all the world shared with him in it? What is our time, or what our money worth, but that some considerable part of both may be employed for him? O, when shall his knowledge cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea, and carry along with it richer treasures and blessings than the sea ever bore! May it in the meantime rule in our hearts; and may we have the pleasure of wishing, praying and labouring for the spread of his kingdom, though we cannot advance it as we would!"

Dr Doddridge had always the case of the poor man at heart, and to them he was always easy of access. He treated the poor with compassion and tenderness, and yet he did not lessen his influence by unbecoming familiarity. He encouraged his people, rich and poor, to be free in their conversations with him, especially about their religious concerns. "He opened his mouth with wisdom, and in his tongue was the law of kindness." He was always free from a covetous disposition, and was often accustomed to quote that saying of his Divine Master's, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." He sought out and relieved distressed objects; and in his sermons and among his friends, he pleaded the cause of the poor and needy. In one of his annual reflections upon the providences of God to him his views, resolutions, &c., he writes: "I have this day in secret devotion, made a vow, that I would contribute a tenth part of my estate and income to charitable uses, and an eighth part of all that shall this year come in from my books or occasional contributions; unless any circumstances arise, which lead me to believe that it will be injurious to others to do it." At the beginning of the following year he thus writes: "Having fully discharged the charitable account last year, renew the like resolution for this; and desire to observe how God prospers me, that I may do in proportion to it." The industrious poor claimed his especial compassion, and he was in the habit of visiting their families, enquiring into their circumstances, and procuring for them Bibles and practical religious books.

In addition to all his other excellencies Doddridge was truly humble. He never sought the esteem of one by disparaging the reputation of others, nor by mean compliances, but by a friendly and condescending behaviour to all, and faithful endeavours to serve them. He looked upon reputation as a great instrument doing good to the world, knowing that unless a man's character be esteemed, his most generous and praiseworthy designs will often be censured, and his advantages misconstrued and slighted. Few men enjoyed more of the public esteem, and few there were whose wings have been held in such repute. But yet he never was vain, he never boasted of himself, but considered every thing as proceeding from the hand of God and the questions which most engrossed his attention were, how can I best show my gratitude to God, how can I be most serviceable to my brethren of the same mind? The esteem of the world, instead of elating the mind, always produced deeper humiliation before and a higher admiration of divine favour and grace. So great indeed, was his humility, that he desired his friends, and the elders of the Church, freely to inform him of any thing that they might see amiss in his conduct; and when they did so, he thankfully accepted of their admonitions.

And how did this man bear his afflictions? He bore them like a sincere Christian, ever recognising the hand of the Lord in his trials. His duties were not often interrupted by bad health, but still, he was seized with several fevers, which, had he taken due precautions, might have been easily removed, or at least greatly alleviated. He never cared for his health so long as his Master's work was to be performed; he spared not himself in his Saviour's service. After a very protracted and dangerous illness, he thus writes to a friend: "It is impossible to express the support and comfort which God gave me on my sick-bed. His promises were my continual feast. They seem, as it were, to be all united in one stream of glory, and poured into my heart. When I thought of dying, it sometimes made my very heart to leap within me, to think, that I was going home to my Father and my Saviour, to an innumerable company of angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect. Animal nature was more than once in great commotion; my imagination, just at the height of the fever, hurried in the strangest manner I ever knew. Yet even then, Satan was not permitted to suggest one single fear with regard to my eternal state. I can never be sufficiently thankful for this. Assist me in praising God upon this account. O, may I come out of the furnace like gold!" But of all the afflictions with which his heavenly Father thought fit to visit him, the death of his eldest daughter was to him the most grievous. The sermon which he preached and published on that occasion, shews how deeply his heart was affected; yet he never repined, and the language of his heart was, "Thy will be done." The text from which he preached on that mournful occasion was peculiarly appropriate and affecting,— "Is it well with the child? and she answered and said, It is well." He tells us that there never was any dispensation of Providence, in which he found it so difficult to say it. "But it pleased God to quiet my mind, and lead me to a silent, cordial submission to his will." The evening after the funeral he thus writes—"I have now been laying the delight of my eyes in the dust, and it is for ever hid from them. We had a suitable sermon from those words,— 'Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd?' God knows, that I am not angry; but sorrowful he surely allows me to be. Blessed Lord, I trust thou hast received my child, and pardoned the infirmities of her short, childish, afflicted life. I love those who were kind to her, and those that weep with me for her: shall I not much more love Thee, who art at this moment taking care of her, and opening her infant-faculties for the business and blessedness of heaven? Lord, I would consider myself as a dying creature. My first-born is laid in the dust; I shall shortly follow her, and we shall lie down together. But, O, how much pleasure doth it give me to hope, that my soul will rest with her, and rejoice in her for ever! But let me not centre my thoughts here: it is rest with, and in God, that is my ultimate hope. Lord, may thy grace secure it to me; and in the meantime give me a holy acquiescence of soul in Thee; and, now my gourd is withered, shelter me under the shadow of thy wings." Thus did he observe the hand of God in all the afflictions of his life, and endeavoured to improve every one of them to strengthen his submission to the divine will.

In his private devotion, Dr Doddridge was most sincere, he was indeed a man of prayer. At morning, at evening, and at noon, he called upon the name of his God. His first thoughts in the morning, and his last thoughts in the evening, were consecrated to him. It was his custom, and a custom truly worthy of imitation, to select a verse of Scripture every morning for reflecting on during the day. This kept his thoughts from being too much taken up with trifles, which would have otherwise intruded upon his attention. "Oh," said he, how much delightful enjoyment of God have I lost, by neglecting occasional meditation!" Of prayer, he thus speaks: "As prayer is the food and breath of all practical religion, so secret prayer in particular is of vast importance; inasmuch, that I verily believe, that if a man were to keep a particular and accurate journal of his own heart, but for one month, he would find as real and exact a correspondence between the temper of his soul at the seasons of secret devotion, and in other parts of his life, as we find between the changes of the barometer and the weather." When I pray and meditate most," said he "I work most." From various passages in his diary, we have reason to suppose, that he seldom sat down to study, compose, or write letters of importance, without previous prayer. His birthdays and new-years' days, he kept with peculiar solemnity, and he has left many valuable reflections, made on such occasions, some of which we are sorry we have not room to quote. In all his labours, and in all his employments, the grand animating principle was love,— love to God, to Christ, and to mankind. This was the noble motive from which all his actions flowed; this was the great object of his desire and of his prayers.

Pious and diligent though Doddridge was, he was not to live for ever, and we now proceed to give our readers an account of his last illness and death. In December 1750, he went to St Albans to preach the funeral sermon of his ever faithful and beloved friend and patron, Dr Clark. In the course of that journey he caught a cold, which never entirely left him during the whole of the winter. The spring considerably abated its severity, but it returned again with great violence in the summer. While he thought there was no immediate danger, he continued to apply himself with unremitting ardour to his duties, and laboured hard, being particularly desirous to complete his Family Expositor. The world was always becoming less and less dear to him as his latter end approached, and every day "his affections were more strongly set upon Heaven, and he was daily breathing after immortality." In a letter to a friend he says, "Oh that I had the wings of a dove! you know whither they would carry me." Like St Paul, he was "in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better;" nevertheless, he was willing to remain if it was for the good of his flock. On the 14th of July, 1751, he preached his farewell sermon to his congregation, from Rom. xiv. 8, and it was apparent to all from the remarks he made, that he was perfectly willing either to live or to die, as his heavenly Father might see fit. After this he lived for some time at Shrewsbury, where his strength seemed a little recruited. As the autumn advanced, his medical attendants were of opinion that he should try the waters of Bristol, and accordingly he went thither in August. Here he received little benefit, for his strength daily decreased, and he was advised, as the last resort, to remove to a warmer climate for the winter. During all this time, and indeed during the whole of his illness, he was never heard to complain,—a heavenly calm dwelt in his breast, and he seemed continually cheerful and resigned. His path was like "the path of the just, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." It was finally resolved that he should go to Lisbon to spend the winter, and every thing being prepared, he sailed from Falmouth on the 30th of September. If there ever was a ship to which a prosperous voyage was prayed for, it was the ship in which Doddridge sailed. Three nights in every week during his illness, he was prayed for in public by his congregation. No sooner had the vessel left the harbour than the first breeze of the sea inspired him with new life and spirits. During the voyage he several times said to Mrs Doddridge, who accompanied him, "Such delightful and transporting views of the heavenly world is my Father now indulging me with, as no words can express." They landed at Lisbon on the 13th of October, and about a week after his arrival, he was removed to the country by the advice of his physician. Change of climate, however, did not prove at all beneficial to Doddridge's health, for the rainy season coming on soon after his arrival, cut off every hope his friends had entertained of his recovery. On Thursday, October 24th, he became worse, and his little strength was soon exhausted. During the night his mind continued in the same vigour, calmness, and joy, which it had felt during his whole illness. He desired Mrs Doddridge to remember him in the most affectionate manner to his dear children, his flock, and all his friends. Many devout sentiments and aspirations he uttered; but her heart was too much affected with his approaching change, to be able to recollect them. He told her that he was sure the Lord was his God, and he had a cheerful, well-grounded hope through the Redeemer, of being received to his everlasting mercy. The following day he lay in a quiet slumber which continued till within an hour of his death, which took place about three o'clock in the morning of Saturday the 26th of October 1751. Doddridge died as he lived, in the hope of a glorious resurrection.

After his death a handsome monument was erected to his memory by his congregation at Northampton, but the most lasting monument is his "Rise and Progress," a little work which has been crowned with perhaps more success than any book in the English language, and one which we would cordially recommend to all our readers.

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES HENDERSON,
Minister of St. Enoch's, Glasgow.

"We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren."—1 JOHN iii. 14.

BEFORE any man can pass from earth to heaven, he must first pass from death unto life. By nature all are dead spiritually, "for death is the wages of sin, and all have sinned." The mournful and humiliating symptoms of the reign of death may be discerned in myriads who live and move around us in all the vigour of their physical existence. The moral beauty, the sacred energy, and the spiritual joy which constitute the character and experience of creatures who are alive unto God, have given place to those features of deformity and depravity which God's pure eye cannot look upon, and to that state of moral impotence and insensibility, which not all the high claims of God, nor all the great concerns of eternity, can rouse to action, or wake to feeling.

In this state, spiritual life is extinct, and unless we shall pass from it, heavenly joy is impossible. But blessed be God, there is open for us a way of escape. "God hath so loved the world, as to give his only begotten Son, that we might live through him;" Jesus the Prince of Life has given his life for the life of the world, and now whoso seeth the Son, and believeth on him, hath passed from death unto life. Through the faith of the Redeemer's sacrifice, God, who had withdrawn from the sinner offended, now returns to him reconciled. The sinner who had fled from God distrustful and afraid, now returns to him reassured. Thus the bond of a spiritual life is renewed. The powers and privileges resulting from it begin straightway to be exercised and enjoyed. And although its progress is retarded, and its blessedness impaired by the power of natural depravity, and of abounding temptations, yet, as quickened by the spirit, and preserved by the power, and cherished by the truth and grace of God in Christ Jesus, it advances in the soul toward perfection, until it ripen into life eternal.

Have we, my friends, thus passed from the death of nature into the life of grace? If there be ought important in the character and destiny of our moral and immortal nature, it is all involved in this transition; and that which is next in importance and in interest to it, is our knowledge or assurance of the fact. It shall now, therefore, be my object to apply the doctrine of the text to the decision of this interesting point.

It is evident, from the text, that our spiritual state is among these things which it is possible, and therefore proper and desirable, to ascertain. As expressive of his own experience, and that of other Christians, the apostle says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life." And this knowledge was not derived from any peculiar source, which, though accessible in primitive times, had since been closed against us, but simply from the influence and operation of a certain affection in their own bosoms, of which the workings are at all times alike distinct and determinate, and which, by whomsoever cherished, must warrant the same confidence respecting their spiritual condition. "We know this," says the apostle, "because we love the brethren."

I. This love of the brethren is specifically distinct from that general good nature, or kindly disposition, which survives the fall, and discovers itself in many amiable and attractive forms in many who remain the children of disobedience. This susceptibility of nature may perhaps be termed the constitutional element of Christian love, so that, even under the power of divine grace, those in whom it is naturally deficient seldom become eminent for the strength, or warmth, or activity, of their brotherly affection. Yet it is only as receiving this specific direction, and as called forth and sustained by considerations peculiar to the character and circumstances of those who are its objects, that it forms an evidence of the spiritual life. It is love to the brethren, to the genuine disciples of the Lord Jesus. It is not indeed to be supposed, that Christians monopolize all the affections of their fellow-Christians. The love which the Gospel enjoins, is like that of our heavenly Father, a universal love, and goes forth in benevolent regard to thousands who have no more special claim to it than the participation of a common nature, and a consequent capacity for the Christian's character and the Christian's destiny; and that man who would contract the sphere of his affections so as to confine his love exclusively to the brethren, ought to suspect that he is more the subject of mere party than of truly Christian feeling. Still, while Christianity requires and promotes a universal philanthropy, there is among Christians a family affection, which is known only within the family circle, and among the members of the household of God. This is to a great extent independent of the common relations of human life, and is awakened and sustained by considerations of a directly Christian character. It regards men as brethren, not by natural but by spiritual bonds. It contemplates them as related to God in Christ as their reconciled Father, and to Jesus the Son of God as their elder brother. It discerns in them the features of their Father's image, and the heirs of his heavenly inheritance. As thus divinely related and endowed and honoured—as redeemed by the same blood, and beloved by the same God, and partaking of the same spirit, and conformed to the same image, and cherishing the same hopes, it may be well understood that Christians should feel drawn to each other by the warmest, and purest, and fullest sympathy, and should form and maintain with one another the most endeared and delightful friendships. The power of this family affection was beautifully exemplified in primitive times. The multitudes of them that believed, it is said, were of one heart and of one soul. So amiable was the spectacle of Christian unity, that even the heathen exclaimed, "Behold these Christians, how they love one another!"

II. It was as the subject of a love thus grounded and thus exercised, that the apostle inferred, in regard to himself and others, the fact of their transition from death to life; and I proceed to shew, that this affection will infallibly justify the same conclusion in behalf of all in whom it is cherished. It is not by any means a natural inmate of the human bosom. The brethren may, indeed, generally share in that natural affection which lives still in the breast of fallen man. Standing related to others by the various endearing bonds of social and domestic life, possessing, as will be granted, an average portion of what is amiable in the dispositions, and estimable in the virtues of human character, they can hardly fail to command, in some measure, the love, and esteem, and gratitude of such as are thus connected with them, and who witness their virtues or experience their beneficence. A parent, a child, a husband, a wife, who is a Christian, may be very dear to the unrenewed heart, solely on the ground of natural kindred, or of that moral excellence, or that social usefulness, by which Christians often are, and ought always to be, distinguished. But as united to the Saviour, as loving him in their hearts, as walking in his steps, as living to his honour and destined to his salvation, they are not only not loved and delighted in, but are, on these very grounds, wont to be regarded with a diminished complacency and kindness. Nay, often for this cause love is changed into hatred, and malice, and all uncharitableness. That he who is born after the flesh should persecute him who is born after the Spirit, is demonstrable from the immutable principles of our moral nature. The natural man does not discern the reality, and cannot therefore appreciate the worth of those spiritual relations which subsist between Christians and their God and Saviour. When, therefore, he feels his sinfulness reproved by their sanctity, or his pleasure, or interest, or ambition marred or thwarted by their unbending adherence to truth, or integrity, or purity, it cannot fail that his antipathy and dislike shall be awakened against them. How affectingly was the full operation of these principles displayed at an early period of human history! "Cain was of that wicked one, and slew his brother; and wherefore slew he him? because his own works were evil and his brother's righteous." How familiarly, alas! has the same scene been repeated between those "who are born after the flesh and those who are born after the Spirit." It may be true, that much of the dislike with which Christians are often regarded, and much of the enmity they have met with from the world, is to be imputed to their own indiscretions or misconduct. But these will not account for the fact; and that a deep and rooted enmity there exists in the world against them, is, on other grounds, conclusively demonstrated by the treatment which the Saviour himself met with when he tabernacled among men. He, to whose nature no imperfection adhered, on whose conduct no indiscretion was chargeable, whose heart was love, whose life was purity, whose walk was beneficence, whose whole character was the living impersonation of perfection and beauty, was, notwithstanding, made, as you know, the butt of contradiction, the mark for slander, and reproach, and deadly hatred. Now, his experience in this respect, he hath held forth as the natural fruit of man's selfish and corrupt assertions, and therefore a specimen of that treatment which his disciples must look for at the hands of men. "Marvel not if the world hate you; ye know that it hated me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you."

Since then such is the natural state of man's affections toward the Christian brotherhood, it is evident that they in whose hearts this enmity is slain and changed into love,—to whom the piety, and purity, and spirituality which once revolted them, is become a positive and powerful attraction, who cherish a high esteem for their character, a warm sympathy in their feelings, a decided preference of their society, a peculiar desire and envy of their privileges and their prospects, have undergone a great and important change in the spirit of the mind. They have been taught to realize and appreciate those spiritual relations which only the eye of faith can perceive, that holy character which only a sanctified heart can love, those eternal blessings which only the heaven-born creature will ever aspire after. Such affection is baptised by the Holy Ghost. Such love, it is said, is of God. Those whose hearts have been thus purified into an unfeigned love of the brethren, have been thus purified not by the power of nature, but by the grace of the Spirit. How strikingly was this fruit of the Spirit produced in those who are described in Scripture as passing suddenly from death unto life! See it in Paul. While yet dead in sin, "he breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the saints;" and no sooner is he made spiritually alive, than he seems prepared to do and endure all things for their sakes. See it in the savage jailor of Philippi. With all good will, as it appears, he had done the evil work of his masters against the apostles of the Lord Jesus, yet, ere the night of his conversion is over, you see him with all tenderness washing the wounds which his own hand had cruelly the day before inflicted. Indeed, the effect is without exception. There are, alas! many mournful defects in its prevalence. Through ignorance, or misconception, or defective love, division and variance, strife and enmity, exist even among those whom Christ is not ashamed to own as brethren. But, in spite of these partial disagreements, every Christian who discovers the Christianity of others, feels towards them a peculiar regard; and in proportion as this affection is more decided and ardent, more impartial and prevailing in the bosom, it affords an evidence more decisive and satisfactory of his having undergone the great transition from death unto life.

Now, how does this truth bear upon the decision of your spiritual state? Do your hearts bear witness that ye love the brethren? I do not ask whether you number any such among your endeared kindred or friends, for it may be assumed, that on the grounds of natural relationship, or personal kindness, or social usefulness, many of them must be the objects of your good-will, or gratitude and esteem. But do you love them as Christians?—is your affection founded on their special relation to Christ, or their likeness to him? If any among you are strangers to the power of any such affection—if, instead, you are conscious of an opposite state of feeling—if the spiritual relations of those who are Christ's, and the peculiarities of spirit and conduct which these create and require, form so many abatements of the love and esteem in which they are held by you—if your feelings in regard to this or that other subject of divine grace, would be thus expressed if put in words—"I could admire his talents, and could delight in his dispositions, but his sanctity restrains and fetters—his spirituality offends and repels me"—if you make Christian character no desideratum, and feel the possession of it no attraction—if your sympathies with men are weakened or destroyed, in proportion as they display a more perfect conformity to the will, a more entire devotion to the cause of Christ—if, in fact, under the practical power of these affections, you form your connections and friendships among those who profess and exhibit no regard to the Saviour—then, although you should give no extreme manifestations of dislike and enmity, there is in all this more than enough to evince the absence of this brotherly love from your bosom. And what, then, must be concluded respecting your spiritual state? Whatever you may suppose or profess, it is evident that the life you have is not that life which Christ came to give unto the world. Of that life, love to the brethren forms the characteristic affection, and he that loveth him that begeth, loveth him also that is begotten of him. Of the partakers of that life love is the great duty, and forms a leading privilege; and if this privilege is renounced, if this law is disobeyed, if this leading Christian characteristic is awanting, it is impossible to admit this persuasion, that the transition has been made from death unto life—nay, the apostle awfully decides the point, saying, "Whoso loveth not his brother abideth in death!" And is any man, who is conscious of being still without love to the brethren, satisfied to abide in this state of death, and to refuse and forfeit the gift of God, which is eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord? If not, let him now awake to a sense of the necessity of his being changed in the whole spirit of his mind—of his heart being purified into an unfeigned and fervent love of the brethren—for unless love take the place of hatred, and esteem the place of contempt, and sympathy the place of aversion, in regard to the children of God, and the heirs of his spiritual family, he cannot possibly have part with them in their holy and blessed inheritance.

But are you conscious, on the other hand, that you love the brethren? that you love them not only as wise and learned, or because they love you, or are related to you, but because they are beloved of God, and bear upon them the Saviour's image, and can sympathise most warmly with all that concerns his people or his cause—that your love to them is in some measure proportioned to their religious attainments, and that your delight is in the saints as in the excellent of the earth,—that you love all the godly—that neither restrained by pride, nor confined by selfishness, nor overcome by evil—you love all, how humble soever in condition—how remote soever in relation—yea, how opposed soever by party feeling, or even by personal offence, in whom are visible the marks of Christian brotherhood? Then, beloved brethren, blessed are ye. To ascertain your spiritual state and your eternal prospects, you do not require to have the book of God's secret decrees laid open, and read your names written there, as ordained unto life; for your love to the brethren, the want of which testifies, alas! of many, that they abide in death, is in your souls the fruit and evidence of your spiritual life—the germ and the earnest of the life everlasting.

SCRIPTURAL RESEARCHES.

No II.

SODOM AND GOMORRAH.

BY THE REV. JAMES ESDAILE,

Minister of the East Church, Perth.

THE cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, together with three others usually associated with them, are called in Scripture, "the Cities of the Plain;" and though Ni-Neveh is the first city whose name is recorded in history, (Genesis, x. 11,) yet Sodom and Gomorrah had reached such maturity in wickedness as to draw down the visible judgments of Heaven, upwards of a thousand years before Jonah was sent to warn Nineveh of its impending destruction. This excessive depravity indicates the possession of ease, wealth, and luxury: national vices are checked by poverty; and a people struggling for existence usually display many hardy virtues: but ease and luxury soon undermine their energies, they become unable to defend the advantages which they have gained, and they fall an easy prey to an ambitious and enterprising enemy. This is so completely established by the history of the world, that we do not now stand in need of visible judgments to convince us that "sin is a destruction to any people."

We might have inferred, with certainty, that wealth and luxury were the cause of the enormous wickedness which distinguished these devoted cities. But it is needless to conjecture, where we have positive information in the Word of God. "This was the sin of thy sister Sodom, pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness was in her, and in her daughters." Esek. xvi. 49. The first war ever recorded in history took place between the Cities of the Plain and some neighbouring powers, jealous of their wealth and prosperity. Each of these cities was so considerable as to have a king of its own, and five kings mustered their troops, in the vale of Siddim, against the four who assailed them.

In forming our ideas of these kings, we must compare them to the chiefs of those wandering tribes which still occupy the historical regions of the East, rather than to those who bear the name of kings in European countries. The title of Melek, or king, is still assumed by every petty chieftain of an Arabian tribe; and we can scarcely suppose that the kings, whose hostile encounter is recorded in the 14th chapter of Genesis, could be much more considerable. For it must be remembered that the world at that time was but thinly peopled: the events to which I allude took place little more than four hundred years after the flood, and the descendants of Noah could not, in that time, have multiplied into many powerful states. But the earliest population, after that terrible catastrophe, was undoubtedly settled in the regions in question, which possessed advantages then, which we shall look for in vain in modern times.

It is a matter of some curiosity to ascertain, if possible, how these cities became so populous and so powerful at such an early period. They could have no great extent of territory; they were bounded by the same barren mountains which now confine the Dead Sea, which occupies the place where they once stood, formerly a fertile and delightful plain, but now a barren waste of unblest and bitter waters. The whole of the space occupied by this sea may be about seventy-two miles in length and nineteen in breadth, which, however productive it may have been when a cultivated plain, afforded but little scope for the territories of five kings.

We receive no light from Scripture as to the resources of these wealthy and profligate cities; but we may conjecture, with a probability approaching almost to certainty, that their wealth arose from commerce. All the earliest nations derived their importance from the same cause. Egypt owed its early advancement in wealth and power to commerce: the Nile fertilized its scanty district, and connecting it with the Mediterranean, opened up an intercourse with the finest countries of Europe and Asia; whilst it was also connected with the latter by the Red Sea. Babylon and Nineveh, the one situated on the Euphrates, and the other on the Tigris, derived similar advantages from their position, and were the great entrepôts of commerce between the Eastern and Western worlds: and there is the highest probability that it was commercial rivalry that brought the early potentates of these regions into collision with the Cities of the Plain.

The land of Shinar, of which Amraphel, head of the expedition against Sodom and Gomorrah, was king, comprehended Mesopotamia, and commanded, for a great extent, the course both of the Tigris and the Euphrates. Being a well-watered and fertile land, surrounded by vast sandy deserts, it formed the key of communication, in that direction, between the traffickers of the East and those of the West. I conjecture, then, that Amraphel, king of Shinar, jealous of the commercial prosperity of the Cities of the Plain, had joined the petty chiefs whose territories lay between his country and theirs, in a plundering expedition, to punish these cities on account of their interference with the chief source of his wealth and power, the merchandise of the East.

I am aware that the locality where these cities stood possesses no facilities, in modern times, which could enable them to enter into successful commercial competition with a city situated on the Tigris. The whole region is bleak and barren, and almost inaccessible: an entire change has taken place in the geographical features of the country: had it not been so, the Scripture account of the utter desolation of the district would not have been true. Let it be remembered, then, there was no sea where the "Salt Sea," or "Dead Sea" now is, at the time when the devoted cities were at the height of their power and profligacy. In the 14th chapter of Genesis, the sacred historian tells us that the confederated kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, &c., engaged their enemies in the "vale of Siddim," which, he adds, is "the Salt Sea." What, then, became of the Jordan, which now discharges itself into the "Salt Sea," or Sea of Sodom? All rivers run into some sea; and as the "Dead Sea," or "Salt Sea," did not then exist, the Jordan must have found another receptacle for its waters; and the only sea which, from the geographical features of the country, it could reach, is the Red Sea; a sea by which the richest productions of the East have, at all times, been introduced into the West, carrying along with them vice and profligacy.

But it may reasonably be supposed, that if the Jordan ever flowed in this direction, it must have left infallible traces of its course: the want of them, indeed, would not have invalidated the history, as they might have been obliterated by subsequent changes. It was natural, however, to suppose that such vestiges might exist; and it is rather wonderful that no attempt was ever made to ascertain the point. And yet the fact has been ascertained, within these few years, by a traveller, (Burkhardt,) who was in search of anything rather than a confirmation of Scripture history: in his progress, he came upon a remarkable tract, extending from the Elanitic Gulf, or Eastern branch of the Red Sea, where the Eziongebar of Scripture once stood, and reaching as far as the Dead Sea; which tract he hesitates not to pronounce the deserted channel of a river. That river could have been no other than the Jordan. Here, then, is a singular elucidation of one of the most extraordinary facts recorded in history, proving that the Jordan is now engulfed in a sea of bitter waters, where there was once a fertile plain, and a dense and thriving population, "according to the Scriptures." And even though Scripture had been silent on the subject, a geologist might have pronounced, from present appearances, that a receptacle has been formed for the river, by the excavation or submersion of an extensive district. We perceive, then, that the Cities of the Plain had a direct communication with the Red Sea by the river Jordan: it was impossible for them to overlook the advantages which this circumstance afforded in a commercial point of view, which were so apparent, that, even after the river had been arrested in its course, Solomon built his mercantile navy at the place where it formerly discharged itself into the sea, as the most convenient point from which he might carry on his commercial enterprises. 1 Kings ix. 26.

Let us attend, then, to another incidental notice in Scripture respecting this district, which is in perfect conformity with all modern observations. All travellers agree that the waters of the Dead Sea are different from those of any other sea in the known world—specifically heavier—excessively bitter, and surcharged with bitumen, a sort of natural pitch produced in great quantities in several countries of the world: there is a lake of it in the island of Trinidad, so solid, that a man may walk across it; though it yields to his weight, and it would be dangerous to remain long in one place.—This account of the Dead Sea is precisely what might be expected from the narrative of the Sacred Historian. He tells us, that the Vale of Siddim, which is now the Salt Sea, was, at the time when the hostile armies engaged in it, “full of slime pits,” that is, pits of bitumen, the same substance which was used by the builders at Babel as a substitute for lime; for we are told that “they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar:” a fact confirmed by modern observation: for the large bricks excavated where Babylon once stood, and now common in most of our museums, bear evident marks of having been cemented by pitch.

Now, then, I think we may affirm that the mode in which the sinful cities were destroyed is peculiarly appropriate to these circumstances. We are not, indeed, to suppose, that He who holds all the agents of nature in his own hand is limited in his resources, and obliged to adopt one plan as more convenient than another. It is a great mistake to attempt to conciliate belief to a miracle, by endeavouring to bring it within the operation of natural causes; it is only a miracle when it is opposed to them. At the same time, when we find the Sacred Writer recording such minute particulars as that which has been mentioned, and which seems not at all essential to the history; and when we find that his account of the country agrees perfectly with modern observations, we are sure, at least, that he was well acquainted with the district; and we may infer, that in recording such apparently unimportant facts, God, in compassion to the unbelief of the human heart, was directing him to the selection of circumstances which might conciliate regard to the records of his Word, and teach mankind to apply to them as the only source of sound and saving knowledge.

Let us attend, then, to the way in which the sinful cities were destroyed. “The Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah fire and brimstone from the Lord out of heaven: and he overthrew those cities.” Gen. xix. 24, 25. Now, the heathen authors mention the tradition that these cities had been destroyed by lightning from heaven. Tacitus, in the fifth book of his History, states, that the current report was, that flourishing cities had once stood where the Dead Sea now is, and that they had been destroyed by lightning. But the Sacred Historian gives a much more particular account; for he informs us, that the Lord destroyed not only the cities and the inhabitants, but “all the plain,” and all “which grew upon the ground.” Here was sweeping destruction; it was not enough that the sinful inhabitants should perish; the spot which had fostered such abominable wickedness was to bear for ever the mark of the blighting curse of heaven, and to be disqualified, for ever, from giving birth to any living thing. The fire and brimstone from heaven coming in contact with the inflammable materials with which the plain abounded, for it was full of slime-pits, or of collections and reservoirs of pitch, the plain itself was consumed to such an extent and depth, as to excavate a bed sufficiently capacious to receive, without overflowing, the ample stream of the Jordan, which was instantly converted into a salt, bitter and bituminous lake, whose waters are hostile to the existence of every living thing.

Can the imagination form any idea of the scene which such a catastrophe must have exhibited? We have, indeed, the testimony of one eye-witness; but the impression made on his mind is stated in the simple unambitious style of Scripture narrative, more impressive, perhaps, because little is attempted. “Abraham gat up early in the morning to the place where he stood before the Lord; and he looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and toward all the land of the plain, and behold, and lo! the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace.” And who can form a conception of such a furnace? A district of upwards of seventy miles in length, and nearly twenty in breadth, ignited by fire from heaven, which was fed by brimstone from above, and by bitumen from below; which the waters of Jordan, rushing into the midst of it, were as inadequate to quench as an ordinary shower would be to slake a volcano, presents an image to the mind which overwhelms its conceptions, and which, perhaps, can only be exceeded by the terrors of the last day, when God will rain upon the wicked “fire and brimstone and a horrible tempest.”—Psal. ii. 6.

I am aware that some German critics, whose humour is to explain away all miraculous agency in the government of the world, and to ascribe every thing extraordinary to accidental circumstances operating on natural causes, have adverted to the physical constitution of the district in question, and have alleged, that lightning, accidentally striking the bituminous soil, would ignite the place, and account for all the phenomena. This is the method which they take to explain away the divine authority of Scripture, without denying the facts. Many are deceived by this insidious reasoning, and would wish to be excused from believing any thing but what they can fully understand. This notion strikes at the foundation of all Religion, which depends on testimony, rather than on demonstration—on faith, rather than on knowledge.

But, without prosecuting this view any farther, I would observe, in regard to the opinion alluded to, that according to the usual operation of natural causes, it is extremely improbable. The Dead Sea, which occupies the space once possessed by the Cities of the Plain, is surrounded by lofty mountains, and it is very unlikely that a thunderbolt should pass over them to strike the plain. The thunder is generated on the mountains, and there it generally expends its fury; and perhaps it was never known to strike an extensive tract of country, surrounded by such a barrier as that which encompassed the Cities of the Plain.

But we have a surer argument than this to refute the theory of these sceptical refiners, viz., the suddenness of the destruction by which the cities and their inhabitants were overwhelmed; which could not have been effected by the mere ignition of the bituminous plain. “The sun was risen upon the earth when Lot entered into Zoar.” And “then the Lord rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire.” The destruction was almost instantaneous; for that same morning, “Abraham gat up early,” and looking “toward all the land of the plain, the smoke went up as the smoke of a furnace.” By this account, then, the destruction was sudden and overwhelming; had it not been so, the victims would have escaped; but it could not have been so, had the plain been ignited by ordinary lightning. If it had been set on fire in one place, the inhabitants would have had time to fly from the danger; or if it had been set on fire in all parts at one and the same time, that would have been as great a miracle as the one which the expounders attempt to explain away.

I have only to observe, in conclusion, that the incredulity of these sceptics, in regard to miracles, in which they have too many followers, arises from the circumstance that miracles are not performed in modern times. And why? Because the greatest miracles ever displayed to the world were manifested to testify the divine origin of that dispensation which was to establish the reign of faith on earth; and that being accomplished, miracles were no longer necessary. Every doctrine essential to salvation was fully unfolded, and every one of them confirmed by the most unquestionable miracles. This was the highest and the last demonstration which God was to give of his mercy, his holiness, his justice; and his eternal providence; and men were henceforth to live under the power of his invisible and eternal kingdom.

All the previous dispensations of God furnished materials for the confirmation of these important truths; and as they had all a reference to the great plan of salvation through Christ, and to the sovereignty of his kingdom on earth, they all merged and determined in these events; and henceforth, till the second coming of the Saviour, men are to "walk by faith and not by sight." But that was not first which was spiritual; the world was under a visible administration, enforced by visible sanctions, for a period of four thousand years, after which the Saviour appeared on earth; and having accomplished the work which his Father had given him to do, he ascended into heaven, from which he had come down to the abodes of men; and he now carries on the government of the world by the agency of his Spirit on the hearts of his people, establishing them in the faith of his second coming, and in the hopes of a glorious resurrection. Without miracles we could have had no idea of God, as separate from his works; we might have recognised an insentient course of nature, and might have found that it was our interest to conform to it, but we could have had no notion of future responsibility, or of a God who took an interest in the moral conduct of his creatures. The mere recognition, then, of an object of worship, and of religious duties, however imperfect the notions on these subjects may have been, affords a strong presumption, if not a demonstration, that miracles have been performed; for it is not easy to perceive how men should otherwise have recognised the personality and moral attributes of the Supreme Ruler.

SOME STRIKING PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF JOHN CRAIG, COLLEAGUE OF JOHN KNOX.

THE providential interpositions which sometimes occur in the lives of God's believing people, are well worthy of marked attention. As an illustration, therefore, of the fatherly care which God exercises towards his own children, we extract the following brief sketch from M'Crie's "Life of Knox."

"John Craig was born in 1512, and soon after lost his father in the battle of Flodden, which proved fatal to so many families in Scotland. After finishing his education at the University of St. Andrews, he went to England, and became tutor to the family of Lord Dacres; but war having broken out between England and Scotland, he returned to his native country, and entered into the order of Dominican friars. The Scottish clergy were at that time eager in making inquisition for Lutherans; and owing to the circumstance of his having been in England, or to his having dropped some expressions respecting religion which were deemed too free, Craig fell under the suspicion of heresy, and was thrown into prison. The accusation was found to be groundless, and he was set at liberty. But although still attached to the Roman Catholic religion, the ignorance and bigotry of the clergy gave him such a disgust at his native country, that he left it in 1537, and, after remaining a short time in England, went to France, and from that to Italy. At the recommendation of the celebrated Cardinal Pole, he was admitted among the Dominicans in the city of Bologna, and was soon raised to an honourable employment in that body. In the library of the Inquisition, which was attached to the monastery, he found a copy of Calvin's Institutions. Being fond of books, he determined to read that work; and the consequence was, that he became a thorough convert to the Reformed opinions. In the warmth of his first impressions, he could not refrain from imparting his change of sentiments to his associates, and must soon have fallen a sacrifice to the vigilant guardians of the faith, had not the friendship of a father in the monastery saved him. The old man, who was a native of Scotland, represented the danger to which he exposed himself, by avowing such tenets in that place, and advised him, if he was fixed in his views, to retire immediately to some Protestant country. With this prudent advice he complied so far as to procure his discharge from the monastery.

"At an early period of the Christian era, there were converts to the Gospel in 'Caesar's household;' and in the sixteenth century, the light of Reformation penetrated into Italy, and even into the territories of the Roman Pontiff. On leaving the monastery of Bologna, Craig entered as tutor into the family of a neighbouring nobleman, who had embraced Protestant principles; but he had not resided long in it, when, along with his host, he was delated for heresy, seized by the familiars of the Inquisition, and carried to Rome. After being confined nine months in a noisome dungeon, he was brought to trial, and condemned to be burnt, along with some others, on the 20th of August 1559. On the evening previous to the day appointed for their execution, the reigning Pontiff, Paul IV., died; and, according to an accustomed practice on such occasions, the prisons in Rome were all thrown open. While those who were confined for debt and other civil offences were liberated, heretics, after being allowed to go without the walls of their prison, were conveyed back to their cells. A tumult, however, having been raised that night in the city, Craig and his companions effected their escape, and took refuge in a house at a small distance from Rome. They had not been long there when they were followed by a company of soldiers, sent to apprehend them. On entering the house, the captain looked Craig eagerly in the face, and taking him aside, asked, if he recollected of once relieving a poor wounded soldier in the vicinity of Bologna. Craig was in too great confusion to remember the circumstance. 'But I remember it,' replied the captain, 'and I am the man whom you relieved, and Providence has now put it in my power to return the kindness which you shewed to a distressed stranger. You are at liberty; your companions I must take along with me, but, for your sake, shall shew them every favour in my power.' He then gave him what money he had upon him, with directions how to make his escape.

"We are not yet done with the wonderful incidents in the life of Craig. 'Another accident,' says Archbishop Spotswood, 'befell him, which I should scarcely relate, so incredible it seemeth, if to many of good place he himself had not often repeated it as a singular testimony of God's care of him.' In the course of his journey through Italy, while he avoided the public roads, and took a circuitous route to escape from pursuit, the money which he had received from the grateful soldier failed him. Having laid himself down by the side of a wood to ruminate on his condition, he perceived a dog approaching him with a purse in its teeth. It occurred to him that it had been sent by some evil-disposed person who was concealed in the wood, and wished to pick a quarrel with him. He therefore endeavoured to drive it away, but the animal continuing to lawn upon him, he at last took the purse, and found in it a sum of money which enabled him to prosecute his journey. Having reached Vienna, and announced himself a Dominican, he was employed to preach before the Archduke of Austria, who afterwards wore the imperial crown, under the title of Maximilian II. That discerning prince, who was not unfriendly to a religious reform, was so much pleased with the sermon, that he was desirous of retaining Craig; but the new Pope, Pius IV., having heard of his reception at the Austrian capital, applied to have him sent back to Rome as a condemned heretic; upon which the archduke dismissed him with a safe conduct. When he arrived in England in 1560, and was informed of the establishment of the reformed religion in his native country, he immediately repaired to Scotland, and was admitted to the ministry. Having in a great measure forgotten his native language during an absence of twenty-four years, he preached for a short time in Latin to some of the learned in Magdalene Chapel. He was afterwards appointed minister of the parish of Canongate, where he had not officiated long, till he was elected colleague to Knox."

The Wonders of Prayer.—Abraham's servant prays—Rebekah appears. Jacob wrestles and prays—the angel is conquered, and Esau's mind is wonderfully turned from the revengeful purpose he had harboured for twenty years. Moses cries to God—the sea is divided. Moses prays—Amalek is discomfited. Joshua prays—Achan is discovered. Hannah prays—Samuel is born. David prays—Ahithophel hangs himself. Asa prays—a victory is gained. Jehoshaphat prays—God turns away his foes. Isaiah and Hezekiah pray—185,000 Assyrians are dead in twelve hours. Daniel prays—the dream is revealed. Daniel prays—the lions are muzzled. Daniel prays—the seventy weeks are revealed. Mordecai and Esther fast—Haman is hanged on his own gallows in three days. Eara prays at Ahara—God answers. Nehemiah darts a prayer—the king's heart is softened in a minute. Elijah prays—a drought of three years succeeds. Elijah prays—rain descends apace. Elisha prays—Jordan is divided. Elisha prays—a child's soul comes back. The Church prays ardently—Peter is delivered by an angel. Paul and Silas prayed and sang praises—the doors of the prison were opened, and every man's bands were loosed. Prayer has a thousand commands and promises. Prayer has a thousand examples of rich success. Prayer has divided seas, rolled up flowing rivers, made stony rocks gush into fountains, quenched flames of fire, muzzled lions, disarmed vipers and poisons, marshalled the stars against the wicked, stopped the course of the moon, arrested the rapid sun in his giant's race, burst open iron gates, recalled souls from eternity, conquered the strongest devils, commanded legions of angels down from heaven, conquered Christ himself, the mighty God. Prayer has bridled and chained the raging passions of men, has routed and destroyed vast armies of proud, daring, and blustering atheists; witness 185,000 dead in a single night. Prayer has fetched one man from the bottom of the sea, and carried another man in a chariot of fire to heaven. Prayer has shut heaven for three years, and then opened it.

1. Motives to Prayer, addressed to Fear.—A prayerless soul, is a graceless soul—and a graceless soul is in danger of hell-fire sixty times in every minute. The question is put every second, Whether the sinner shall live here, or in hell-fire, with those who are eternally lost? A prayerless soul has no refuge in disgrace, poverty, danger, sickness, pain, or death,—no guard against sin, lust, drunkenness, or any of the snares of the Devil.

2. Motives to Prayer, addressed to Hope.—Prayer produces habitual seriousness of spirit, and ability to govern our thoughts and passions: this ability is real virtue, true virtue, beautiful virtue. Prayer is admirably adapted to exercise and improve all the vital graces of the heart, on which the honour of religion and the happiness of the soul depend. Such graces are love to God—gratitude for all his rich and tender mercies—trust in the providence of God under all trials, troubles, afflictions, losses, crosses, and changes of the present life—contentment with our lot—hope in the righteousness of Christ—expectation and desire of mercy—heavenly mindedness—joy in God—love to all his dear people. Prayer kills covetousness, quenches lust, cures envy, cools malice, disarms revenge, roots up pride and Atheism. Prayer will surely engage us to the vigorous use of all proper means to attain our desires—prayer allows of no neglect of means; prayer without the means is impudent presumption, as using the means without prayer is detestable Atheism.

3. Motives to Prayer, addressed to Gratitude.—God has heard thy prayers formerly.

4. Motives to Prayer, addressed to our deepest and dearest interest.—Prayer will promote and increase godly repentance. Prayer will help us to give more keen and distinct apprehensions of the presence, perfections, and providence of God. Prayer will enable us to combine all providences, and make them subservient to, and conspire in, our temporal deliverance, supplies victories over all sad troubles and trials. Prayer binds down providences to our best desires. Prayer will inspire and increase a constant and lively sense of our dependence on God and on Jesus, his eternal Son; dependence on him in the constitution and order of nature—in the order and wise settlements of grace.

5. Motives to Prayer, addressed to Ambition.—Have you a desire to conquer devils—men bad, men good, angels, and Christ our God himself? Have you a desire to conquer all providences, yea the world itself?

6. Motives to Prayer, addressed to Glory and Pleasure.—Glory is a strong vivid mixture of joy in a vast and durable good, and most ardent and high-spirited self-love. What a glory to be connected with all the infinite good in Christ—to love ourselves in him, and by joy in him increase our ardent self-love!—RYLAND.

Baptism.—The early Christian writers have told us, that in the first ages of the Gospel, the person to be baptized put off his old clothes before he went into the water, and put on new or clean raiment when he came out of it, to signify, that he had put off his old corrupt nature, and his former bad principles and practices, and had become a new man. Have I put off the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts? am I renewed in the spirit of my mind, and have I put on "the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and in true holiness?" I lament that there is so little of the spirit and of the virtues of Christ about me; but may I with increasing assiduity labour to put on more of his sincerity, in whose mouth there was no guile; of his piety, whose meat it was to do his Father's will; of his purity, who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners; of his meekness, who replied to curses by intercession; of his charity, who blessed whomever he went; of his superiority to the world, on whom the offer of all its kingdoms had no power; of his self-denial, who emptied himself that he might enrich us by his poverty; of his gentleness, who gathers the lambs with his arms, and carries them in his bosom, and softly leads those that are with young; of his zeal, who lived to the Lord as none ever did; of his long-suffering, who bore all things; and of his humility, who could stoop to the cross and to the grave. O when will the time come when I shall have put on Christ so completely, that to God looking on me there shall appear nothing but Christ, when he shall discern his image in my character, and his law in my heart; and when the great Redeemer shall be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe! What a glorious object of pursuit; and blessed be God, however difficult, it is attainable through the power of that grace which can beautify the meek with salvation; so that, though they have lien among the pots, they shall appear as doves, whose wings are covered with silver, and their feathers with yellow gold. Too long have I borne the image of the earthly Adam, nay, of the Evil One, but from henceforth, for time and eternity, let me bear his image who is the Holy One and the Just, for His likeness is the perfection of beauty and felicity.—BENFRAGE.

Walk with God.—To walk with God is a word so high, that I should have feared the guilt of arrogance in using it, if I had not found it in the Holy Scriptures. It is a word that importeth so high and holy a frame of soul and expresseth such high and holy actions, that the naming of it striketh my heart with reverence, as if I had heard the voice to Moses; "put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." Methinks he that shall say to me, "come see a man that walks with God," doth call me to see one that is next unto an angel or glorified soul. O happy man that walks with God, though neglected and contemned by all about him. What blessed sights doth he daily see! What ravishing tidings, what pleasant melody doth he daily hear, unless it be in his sorrows or sickness! What delectable food doth he daily taste! He seeth by faith the God, the glory which the blessed spirits see at hand by nearest intuition! He seeth that in a glass and darkly, which they behold with open face! He seeth the glorious majesty of his Creator, the Eternal King, the cause of causes; the composer, upholder, preserver, and governor of all the worlds. He beholdeth the wonderful methods of his providence, and what he cannot reach to see he admireth, and waiteth for the time when that also shall be open to his views. He seeth by faith the world of spirits, the hosts that attend the throne of God; their perfect righteousness, their full devotedness to God, their ardent love, their flaming zeal, their ready and cheerful obedience, their dignity and shining glory. He heareth by faith the heavenly concert, the high and harmonious songs of praise, the joyful triumphs of crowned saints, the sweet commemoration of the things that were done and suffered on earth, with the praises of him who redeemed them by his blood, and made them kings and priests unto God. And in the beholding of this celestial glory, some beams do penetrate his breast, and so irradiate his longing soul that he is changed thereby into the same image, from glory to glory; the spirit of glory and of God doth rest upon him. And what an excellent holy frame doth this converse with God possess his soul with! How reverently doth he think of him! What life is there in every name and attribute of God which he beareth and thinketh on! The mention of his power, his wisdom, his goodness, his love, his holiness, his truth; how powerful and pleasant are they to him! While to those that know him but by the ear, these are but like common names and notions.—BAXTER.

The Joy of Heaven.—Most beloved brethren, we must consider and bear in mind that we have renounced the world, and live here, meanwhile, as guests and foreigners. Let us embrace that day which assigns to each his proper home—who that dwells from home would not hasten to return to his country? Our native country we reckon heaven. There an innumerable company of beloved ones expects us; a goodly band of parents, brothers, sons, longs for us,—already secure of their own immortality, and now anxious for our salvation. What mutual joy to them and us in beholding and embracing each other! What the pleasures of these heavenly kingdoms, with no fear of death, but with the possession of eternal life! What consummate and endless felicity! There the glorious band of apostles; there the crowd of exulting prophets; there the innumerable army of martyrs, crowned for their victory in conflict and suffering; there triumphant virgins; the compassionate rewarded who laboured in works of benevolence to the poor, who, keeping their Master's precepts, have transferred their earthly inheritance to the heavenly treasure-house. To these, most beloved brethren, with eager desire we hasten. Let our Master, Christ, see the resolution of our mind and faith, who will confer larger rewards of his glory upon them who after him have had larger desires.—CYPRIAN.

The Christian Warfare.—Our battle is to be called before your tribunals; there we contend for the truth at the peril of our lives. What you contend for is victory. The object of our victory is the glory of pleasing God, and the spoil eternal life. A Mutius, an Empedocles, a Regulus, devotes themselves to death, and you exclaim, what bravery, what energy of soul! O, glory, allowed because it has a human object, therefore its daring is not thought wasted, nor its confidence deserts in despising death and pain, and it is permitted to suffer for country, for empire, for friendship, but not for God!—TERTULLIAN.

Love the Truth, and Peace.—Truth is here put the first in order—then peace, for there can be no solid or abiding peace that is not based on truth. What health is to the body—what calmness is to the sea—what serenity is to the day—such is peace to the mind, arising from the fit and orderly disposing of things according to truth. If one must be dispensed with, it is peace—for better truth without external peace, than peace without saving truth. That peace is far too dear bought that costs us the loss of truth,—I mean necessary and fundamental truth. Let them then go together; truth as the root—peace as the fruit; truth as the light—peace as the heat; truth as the foundation—peace as the structure. It is like the smile upon a beautiful face when peace flourisheth with truth. "Have salt in yourselves," said Christ, "and have peace one with another." But some men love neither truth nor peace, they are full of error, and fond of disension. Some love truth, but not peace; they are zealous but instead of being humble and meek, they are violent and bitter. Some love peace, but not truth, indolent and indifferent what encroachments are made on truth, if they may live at their ease. Many again seem to love both, but it is only for the selfish ends they gain by them, not on account of the things themselves, as some other ends combined with them. Others love what they think truth, but it is only their early prejudices, which they are never careful to revise. Some likewise say that they love truth, but it is not universally, such as when it crosses their credit, their plans, or their pleasures. The eye, to see objects clearly, must be pure and clear. It is a sound stomach that relishes substantial food. So also, the mind must be in health, to chuse and love wholesome truth and sound doctrine. And it must be carefully sought after, and separated from error. For truth lies deep, and there is much rubbish and loose earth to be cleared away, ere we come to the clear stream of truth. Wherefore, let us show our regard for the truth, by searching for it diligently—by maintaining it firmly and fearlessly—by following and obeying it implicitly—by striving to impart its blessings to others—and by praying earnestly for its progress and success.—Old Author.

The Value of Time.—The learned Salmasius said, when on his death-bed, "Oh, I have lost a world of time! If one year more was to be added to my life, it should be spent in reading David's Psalms and Paul's Epistles."

SACRED POETRY.

FROM THE GERMAN OF NOVALIS.

WHAT had I been without thine aid?
 Without Thee now, what should I be?
 A mark to Fear and anguish made,
 And not a friend to pity me!
 No joy, or hope, on earth I had,
 The future was a dark abyss,
 And when my wounded heart was sad,
 Who heard, who cared for my distress?
 Within my breast fierce passion preyed,
 Each day was dark as midnight deep,
 Sadly along life's path I strayed,
 Alas! I only lived to weep.
 No peace amid thy toils was given,
 Grief and despair sat at my hearth;
 O who, without a friend in heaven,
 Could bear to live on this cold earth!
 But when the Saviour I beheld,
 And knew my hope in him was sure,
 A heavenly radiance quick dispelled
 The gloom, and gilded the obscure.
 'Twas he who taught me what is man;
 His glorious destiny revealed;
 And then my frozen heart began
 A gush of heavenly joys to yield.
 Go forth, my brethren, far and wide,
 Invite the sinful wanderers in;
 Stretch out your hands, their footsteps guide
 To this retreat from grief and sin.
 'Tis heaven here with us on earth;
 By faith we know our Saviour near;
 And all who share the second birth,
 Shall also feel his presence dear.
 Once did a fiend our souls affright,
 Close to our hearts remorseless clung,
 As on we toiled in sin's dark night,
 Alike by joy and sorrow stung:
 Each word, each work, a crime appeared,
 Weak wretched man, Jehovah's foe;
 We thought a voice from heaven we heard,
 And ah! it spoke of death and woe.
 The Saviour came—the Son of Man,
 A conqueror girt with love and might;
 We saw, and in our breasts began
 To burn a new and living light.
 We saw heaven's silver portals ope,
 Knew the dear land, our Sire's abode,—
 Forth burst exulting faith and hope,
 And told us we were sons of God.

THE MORNING STAR.

BRIGHT eye of heaven, why are thy trembling rays,
 Thus bent on earth, in silent saddening gaze?
 What, is there here, that can so charm thy sight,
 And keep thee watchful, thro' the slumbering night?
 Are there not scenes beyond thee, far, which glow
 With glories, never known to shine below?
 And didst thou not in thy creation's morn,
 Sing with the sons of God, o'er worlds new born?
 Yet, thou mayst weep, fair star, at sight of earth,
 Where woe hath heritage and sin had birth;
 Mourn o'er thy sister sphere, man's dark abode,
 Bedim'd by sin, a world without its God;
 Yet, thou shalt sing again, thou shalt be told,
 That God hath brought his stray'd one to the fold.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Practical Effect of the Gospel.—Mr Campbell, of Kingsland, relates, that in one of his journeys in Southern Africa, he on a certain occasion entered into conversation with a young Hottentot, who was lying almost naked on the ground, and basking in the sun. As he was a stout young man, Mr Campbell asked him, "if he had nothing to do?" He said, "No!"—"Cannot you dig?" said Mr Campbell—"Here is a spade."—"No," said he—"it would hurt me."—"But try," continued Mr Campbell, turning up one or two spadefuls of earth himself. The young man tried, but after one or two attempts, threw the spade away—saying, "It broke his back." Farther reasoning was fruitless. Mr Campbell left him. Here was civilization attempted in the plan of the mere moralist, and such was its result. But when Mr Campbell returned to Africa, he saw this young man again. The Gospel had been generally embraced in the vicinity; and the grace of God had reached his heart also. And was he lolling, half-naked, on the ground? No, he was clothed, and in his right mind. And how was he occupied? He was employed as writing-master in an academy of young Hottentots; and when Mr Campbell approached him, he was in the act of mending a pen, which had been handed to him for that purpose by one of his scholars. He cut it with a composure and an address, which, had Mr Campbell witnessed them in this country, would have occasioned no surprise, but which, under the circumstances of the case, completely overcame him. The act was a simple one; but simple as it was, it betokened a high degree of civilization, and one which could not, in so short a time, have been produced through any other medium than that of Christianity.

The Benefit of Early Piety.—The learned and pious Beza, one of the great Reformers, who lived in the sixteenth century, when he was very old and saw his end approaching, often used to say, "I have lived long and have sinned long;" yet, among other things for which he thanked God in his last will and testament, the first and chief was, that at the age of sixteen years, he had taught him to love and to serve Him; and thus had he been prevented from committing many sins, and enduring many sorrows, which would otherwise have overtaken him and have made both his life and his death less happy.

A Pithy Remark.—"Madness frequently discovers itself merely by unnecessary deviation from the usual modes of the world. My poor friend, Smart, shewed the disturbance of his mind, by falling upon his knees and saying his prayers in the street, or in any other unusual place. Now although, rationally speaking, it is greater madness not to pray at all than to pray as Smart did; I am afraid there are so many who do not pray, that their understanding is not called in question."—Dr JOHNSON.

The Bible a comfort in Trouble.—A German and his wife had been for many years settled at Paris, as shoemakers; at length the husband was disabled by illness, and the wife became blind. A lady visited them, and was struck with the calmness with which they were enabled to endure their trials. She asked if they had a Bible, and they showed her the sacred volume, stating, that it had long been their only consolation.

THE CHRISTIAN'S OBLIGATION TO LIVE
SEPARATE FROM THE WORLD.

BY THE REV. JAMES LEWIS,

Minister of St. John's Parish, Leith.

No duty is more universally acknowledged, and none less understood, than the Christian duty of separation from the world. While the duty is admitted by all who profess to understand the Gospel, few have defined to themselves its requirements, or are furnished with fixed rules, by the prompt application of which, they may on all occasions practically determine whether they have been guilty of conformity to, or maintained separation, from the world. It may serve to give a distinct and practical shape to this Christian duty, to answer with some minuteness the question: In what does conformity to the world consist?

In reply to this question, we remark, first,—That the separation from the world enjoined upon Christians does not consist in their living out of the world. By a neglect of the spirit, and a too exact and literal adherence to the words of certain commands of Scripture, its authority has been sometimes pleaded to sanction, on the part of Christians, an entire abandonment of society, that, remote from human intercourse, they might nourish the spiritual life in secrecy and solitude, by meditation and prayer. Such a separation is incompatible, however, with the discharge of the active duties to which Christians are called; it is inconsistent with the nature which God has given to man; it would engender melancholy, not Religion; fanaticism, not Christianity; and would be no certain defence against those temptations which are dreaded in the world; for in the wilderness may Satan tempt, as he tempted our Lord, as well as in the populous city,—in the desert and the place of tombs may the evil spirit abide, and be so exceeding fierce that no man can bind it, as well as in the crowded haunts of society. By placing the Christian in society, God has, with sufficient clearness, pointed out his duty to be, not to go out of the world, but to live in it so as to live above it; and that it is the divine purpose that the world should be overcome by the Christian in the world, not by fleeing from it into secrecy and solitude.

We remark, secondly, That as separation from the world does not consist in living out of the world, neither does it consist in assumed or affected difference of manners from the world.

Many are deceived into the belief of the purity and elevation of their Christianity, simply because they are not as other men. They deem themselves superior to the crowd, and sit in their imagination upon a hill apart, because they differ from it in certain manners or fashions they have assumed. How often have men identified Religion with moroseness and austerity, with a disfigured countenance and an unsocial melancholy! How often have they mistaken an aversion to, or the sudden relinquishment of, the usual innocent pursuits or recreations of society for the infallible marks of a heaven-born spirit! How often have they attributed the very extravagancies and singularities, and varying impulses of a weak and ill-regulated mind to the ardours and fervours of devotion! These, and similar errors, are currently adopted from mistaking singularity for separation from the world. They are errors into which especially young Christians fall, when, under the first impressions of the truth, they seek to break-asunder from all the ordinary occupations, engagements, and duties of social life; identifying the religious life with the life of the visionary, the recluse, or the contemplative, and consequently, testing their Christianity by their singularity, and deeming the evidences of their faith just the more distinct and unquestionable, by how much the more strange and peculiar they have become.

If separation from the world consists, then, neither in living out of the world, nor merely in differing from it, how shall we ascertain in what it does consist? It has been supposed, that this question would have been easily answered, and that weak and hesitating consciences would have obtained direction and assurance in duty, had Scripture specified the particular things in which Christians ought to distinguish themselves from the world; had it told them in what things they might resemble the world and go along with it, and from what things they must stand aloof, and touch not, and taste not, and handle not; had it put a mark upon every object, and company, and place of resort, and written visibly upon them—of this object the Christian may partake, of that he cannot partake; here he may enter and join with the society, there he cannot enter; at this table he may sit, at that table he cannot sit and partake of its festivities; this proportion of his substance he may lawfully expend upon himself or his family, that proportion he must dedicate to the service of the Church, and to the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom:—to many it has appeared that such an exact and minute specification of duty would have made plain the Christian's path, resolved a thousand perplexing questions, and enabled him promptly to decide when he was guilty of conformity to the world, or when he had observed the prescribed separation from it. Why Scripture has not so minutely legislated as to give a rule and precept for every step we should take in life, is sufficiently obvious. The multitude of such directions would have perplexed instead of making plain the path of the Christian. It would have converted the Bible from being a brief comprehensive summary of human duty, into a voluminous depository of moral and spiritual casuistry. Besides, if every act of the Christian's life had been made the subject of express law, Christian love would have wanted scope for its exercise, and occasion for proving its genuineness and warmth, it would have wanted both opportunities for its manifestation and means of testing its sincerity.

But while Scripture has not furnished so minute a directory as to many appears desirable, it has given what we conceive to be better. It supplies the Christian with certain great principles to instruct and enlighten his conscience, and which, if faithfully applied, will infallibly preserve him from guilty compliances and worldly conformity. Instead of perplexing the understanding, and oppressing the memory, by the infinite variety and minuteness of its directions, it has at once, by a few general principles, taken up the Christian to an eminence, from whence he may survey his path, and distinguish the road upon which he ought to travel, from all the cross-ways and by-paths of the world. These great principles may be reduced to three separate rules. The first is comprised in the following passages of Scripture:—"Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him." "Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price, even the precious blood of Christ." "I have espoused you to one husband, even to Christ." "None of us liveth to himself." "Seek not your own, but the things which are Jesus Christ's." These passages variously express the same rule. They establish a clear and easily applied principle of Christian conduct. The rule is, that before Christians engage in any action, adopt any plan of life, associate with any circle of society, resort to any company, they must inquire whether they can do so consistently with their obligation to advance the Redeemer's cause, or, at least, without injuring that cause, or compromising its interests. This is a rule sufficiently plain for every Christian to walk by, provided there be but fidelity, Christian sincerity, and honesty in its application. To observe it, it is not necessary that a man should entirely sequester himself from human society. It speaks to every Christian where it actually finds him in society, and tells him how in the crowd of the world, how, occupied as he necessarily is with its varied business and engagements, he may yet live as separate from it as if he lived on a mountain top, or in the centre of a desert. It assigns as the characteristic mark of the Christian, that he lives not to himself. The world seeketh its own,—this is its mark, its badge and its insignia. The Christian seeketh the things which are Jesus Christ's,—this is the badge and insignia of the Church. To every Christian there is committed, as a sacred deposit, the honour and the cause of his Lord. It is the jealous guardianship of this deposit that distinguishes him from the man of the world, as the presence of the ark distinguished the Israelites wherever they journeyed from the surrounding heathen.

With what heroic resolution would a company of ancient Jews, stationed as the guardians of the ark in the field of battle, have defended that sacred symbol of Jehovah's presence! Every sword would have been unsheathed for its protection, and not until the faithful band had given their lives for their trust, would that symbol of their national faith have been yielded to the foe. By a like jealous and affectionate guardianship of the deposit committed to him by his Lord,—by his not shrinking from the recognition and defence of his name, nor compromising the peculiarities of his Religion,—by his presenting that Religion, when necessary, in all its breadth and fulness of statement, and defending it from every aspersion or epithet of scorn or ridicule that might be cast upon it, will the Christian manifest his separation from the world. He is stationed around the ark in the field of battle,—the ark is the honour of his Lord,—the field of battle is the world. If from that station he suffer himself to be driven off, and resign his trust, he need be at no loss to know his character; it is written in his actions,—he is conformist to the world.

The second rule by which Christians may test their separation from the world is embodied in the following passages. "This is the will of God, even your sanctification." "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." "Ye are chosen, that ye may be blameless and without rebuke until the day of the coming of the Lord." When God implants the seed of a new spiritual life in the soul, he constitutes the believer a low-worker with himself, in cherishing and watering over the growth of this heavenly plant, defending it from the rude and chilling blasts of the wilderness, and fostering it into strength, until it effloresces and bears the lovely fruits of the ness. The highest charge which the Christian has in reference to himself is the guardianship of his spiritual nature. To keep and dress the garden planted and watered by the Lord, and which is visited by his presence, this is the Christian's peculiar work. To this work all others must yield. The Christian must be holy; the spiritual life begun must advance, and whatever would obstruct its progress, whatever mode of life, whatever company or amusements would thwart its growth, must be removed out of the way. The Christian is a stone cut out of the quarry, to be shaped and polished for the sanctuary above; and every thing that would obstruct the operations of the Divine Architect, that would retard the moulding and finishing of the Christian's spirit for its place in the temple of God, frustrates the high end of the Christian's life.

If to these two rules of conduct we add a third, deduced from the following passages of Scripture, the Christian will then be provided with three distinct principles, the honest, sincere conscientious application of which will enable him at all times to test the Christian character of his actions, and to ascertain when he is guilty of conformity to the world, and when he avoids it.

"Take heed lest by any means your liberty become a stumbling-block to them that are weak." "Let us judge this, that no man put a stumbling-block, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way." "We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves." "Let every one of us please his neighbour for good to edification." "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient; all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not." "Let no man seek his own, but every man another's." Nothing can be plainer than the rule embodied in these passages; it is this,—that those actions which a Christian, on consulting his own judgment, might consider proper and lawful, he is yet to abstain from, and thereby restrain his own liberty, if his example would be the means of staggering or overthrowing the faith of a brother. He must submit to have his freedom curbed, that others may not stumble at his conduct,—giving none offence, neither to Jew nor Gentile, nor to the Church of God. And by a just extension of the spirit of these passages, the rule directs us to deny ourselves in things lawful, not only lest we throw a stumbling-block before a brother in the Church, but lest an injurious impression of the Christian faith be given to the world; lest our conduct should contribute to keep the world ignorant of the infinite distance between itself and the Church, of the essential sinfulness and impurity of the one, and of the inherent beauty and glory of the other.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF DR THOMAS BATEMAN.

There is no profession which has more generally been supposed to alienate the mind from Christianity than that of medicine; and it is much to be lamented that the character and conduct of too many medical practitioners show the supposition to be not altogether unfounded. And yet the affecting scenes of distress with which the physician is habitually conversant might impress his mind, one would think, with the surpassing value of the consolations of the Gospel. But in a multitude of instances it is far otherwise. His familiarity with such scenes only steels his heart against the sacred impressions which might have been expected to arise in the bosom of one, whose chief employment it is to mitigate the pains, and relieve the distresses of the sick and the dying. When, however, instead of being merely the spectator, the physician himself becomes the sufferer, the effect is often strangely different. Even the sturdiest scepticism has been known, in many instances, to yield under severe trials and personal afflictions. This was remarkably the case with the eminent physician whose history we are about to sketch.

Dr Thomas Bateman was born at Whitby, in Yorkshire, on the 20th of April 1778. He was from infancy of a delicate constitution, remarkably silent and reserved in disposition, and though sufficiently persevering, he by no means exhibited in early life any striking indications of those high talents by which he was afterwards distinguished. At four years of age he was placed, as a day-scholar, under the care of the Rev. Thomas Watson, a dissenting minister of learning and abilities. With him young Bateman remained for seven years; and when eleven years old, he was taken to spend the summer in the country, with the view of recovering his health after an attack of measles. Here he unfortunately fell into habits of indolence, and was accustomed to spend the greater part of the day seated on the top of a gate near the house, without seeking either employment or amusement. His father, enraged at such conduct, one day remarked, "that boy will never be good for anything."

After his return from the country, Thomas was again sent to school at Thornton, a village twenty miles from Whitby. At this period his thirst for knowledge first began to be displayed, and as a relaxation from his ordinary studies, he directed his mind to music, drawing, and botany. His teacher was accustomed to observe that his most remarkable quality when a schoolboy was his sound and penetrating judgment.

At the age of fifteen he lost his father, who had for many years been a successful medical practitioner in Whitby. The young man, thus deprived of a judicious parent, found a counsellor and friend in Dr Beckwith, a distinguished physician at York. Guided by the advice of one so well qualified to direct him, Bateman determined on following the profession of his father. With this view he left Thornton, and returned to Whitby, where he spent three years in preparatory studies, after which he repaired to London to prosecute medicine, under the most eminent teachers of the science. At this time, an incident occurred which shows in a strong light his amiable attention and kindness to his only surviving parent. Before setting out for the metropolis, he asked his mother how often she would expect to receive a letter from him. She replied, "Once a fortnight;" and from that time through all the subsequent years of his absence, and in the midst of his most active engagements, he never in one instance exceeded the given period, even by a single day; the expected letter most frequently arriving two or three days within the time, closely filled with a minute detail of every thing which he thought would be interesting to his family in his studies and pursuits, and in the circumstances through which he was passing. As another instance of the conscientious spirit by which this amiable young man was actuated, we may mention the following fact:—"On going out from his lodgings to an evening party, he had told his landlady that he would be back at a particular hour. He was pressed, however, to stay longer, and the company being agreeable, a friend on returning with him expressed some regret that he had not given way to the invitation, as he would have liked to remain. 'So should I too,' said Dr Bateman; 'but I had said that I would be at home at twelve o'clock, and I could not break my word, if it were to a chambermaid.'

Having completed his medical studies, young Bateman took the degree of doctor in medicine at Edinburgh, and returned to London, where he commenced business as a physician in the year 1801. As might have been anticipated, he speedily rose to eminence in his profession, and became possessed of a very laborious and extensive practice. For many years his varied employments, both in literature and medicine, called for almost overwhelming unintermitted exertion. At length his health began to fail in the year 1815, and although he still persevered, with frequent interruptions, in prosecuting his different avocations, he was evidently declining, until, in July 1819, he was taken ill on the road from London to Middleton, in Durham, whither he was proceeding for the benefit of the mineral waters of that place, and with difficulty reached Bishop Burton, a village near Beverley, in Yorkshire, the abode of a near relative. Hopes were entertained for some time by his relatives that it might be possible to remove him to Whitby, his native town; this, however, was at length given up as impracticable. The state of weakness to which Dr Bateman now felt himself reduced, led him to surrender all the official situations which he held in London in connection with different medical hospitals. It was but too evident, both to himself and all his relatives, that his professional life was at an end. Accustomed for many years to the most active exertion in the discharge of his multifarious duties, his spirit began to droop—now that he felt himself shut out from the business and pleasures of the world. As yet he knew no higher enjoyment than that which was afforded by the things of earth. He had never found the blessings and the consolations of Religion, because he had never sought them. There is no more melancholy spectacle, in fact, which could meet the eye, than that which the man presents who, amid severe sufferings and accumulated sorrows, is insensible to his true condition in the sight of God, as an "alien from the commonwealth of Israel, and a stranger to the covenant of promise."

Yet such was Dr Bateman up to that period of his history which we have now reached. He was far from God, and still in his sins. Now, however, he began to reflect upon subjects of greater moment than those which had hitherto engaged his attention. During the course of his medical studies he had acquired a leaning towards materialism, and a disbelief of the truth of Revelation. His employments and his associates, throughout the whole of his professional career, had strengthened instead of diminishing this sceptical spirit. And even for four years after his health had become delicate, the trials, painful and varied, to which he was subjected, including the almost total loss of sight, were unavailing to melt his obdurate heart. At length, however, in the gracious providence of God, the hour arrived,—that happy hour which was destined to realize the declaration of Scripture, "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." It is interesting to trace the progress of this change in Dr Bateman's mind, showing as it does the power of the Spirit in calling him out of darkness into God's marvellous light. "It was on a Sabbath evening," says the friend who attended him during his sickness, "he first spoke to me on the subject of religion. He had been expressing to me his conviction that he could not live much longer, and complaining of the dreadful nervous sensations which continually harassed him; and then he added, 'but all these sufferings are a just punishment for my long scepticism, and neglect of God and religion.' This led to a conversation, in the course of which he observed that medical men were very generally sceptical, and that the mischief arose from what he considered a natural tendency of some of their studies to lead to materialism. I replied, that the mischief appeared to me to originate rather in their neglect to examine into the evidences of the truth of the Bible, as an actual revelation from God; because, if a firm conviction of that were once established, the authority of the Scriptures must be paramount, and the tendency of all inferior studies, in opposition to their declarations, could have no weight. He said, he believed I was right, and that he had, in fact, been intending to examine fully into the subject, when the complaint in his eyes came on and shut him out from reading. Our conversation ended in his permitting me to read to him the first of Scott's 'Essays on some of the most Important Subjects in Religion,' which treats of 'The Divine Inspiration of the Scriptures.' He listened with intense earnestness, and, when it was concluded, exclaimed, 'This is demonstration! complete demonstration!' He then asked me to read to him the account given in the New Testament of the resurrection of our Saviour: which I did from all the four evangelists. I read also many other passages of Scripture, with some of which he was extremely struck; especially with that declaration, that 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.'

"For two or three days he showed increasing interest in the subject of religion; and I read to him continually the Scriptures, and other books which seemed to me best calculated to give him the information he thirsted for. When I went into his room a few mornings after, he said, 'It is quite impossible to describe to you the change which has taken place in my mind: I feel as if a new world was opened to me, and all the interests and pursuits of this have faded into nothing in comparison with it. They seem so mean, and paltry, and insignificant, that my blindness in living so long immersed in them, and devoted to them, is quite inconceivable and astonishing to myself.' He often expressed, in the strongest terms, and with many tears, his deep repentance, and his abhorrence of himself for his former sinful life and rebellion against God; but he seemed to have from the first so clear a view of the all-sufficiency of the Saviour's atonement, and of the Christian scheme of salvation, as freed him at once from that distrust of forgiveness which is so apt to afflict persons on the first sight of their sins, and of the purity and holiness of Him 'with whom they have to do.' The self-abasing views which he entertained of himself necessarily enhanced his sense of the pardoning love and mercy of God in Christ Jesus, thus graciously extended to him; and which he felt so strongly, that he was filled with the liveliest emotions of gratitude and joy, and in this happy state continued for several days.

"He soon, however, experienced an afflicting reverse of feeling. One evening I left him to visit a near relative, at that time confined to her room in a precarious state of health; and his mother, who had been in attendance upon her, took my place at the bedside of her son. Dr Bateman told her that I had been reading to him various detached portions of Scripture, and that he now wished to hear the New Testament read regularly through from the beginning. She consequently began to read, and had proceeded as far as the tenth chapter of St. Matthew, when he suddenly exclaimed, that he could not believe in the miracles of the Saviour, and that therefore he must perish for ever. It needs scarcely be pointed out how much more properly this might be called temptation to unbelief, than unbelief itself. While the difficulty of believing was felt, the awful consequences of not believing were fully admitted, that is, were firmly believed. This suggestion of his spiritual enemy threw him into a state of the most dreadful anguish, and I was immediately sent for to his bedside. On my arrival he had become a little more composed, but was still in great agitation, and was praying in agony 'to be saved, and not to be given up to this dreadful state of unbelief.' To comfort his mind, we said what we could from Scripture, and from the experience of other Christians; and he was a little relieved by hearing some passages from an Essay in the volume before mentioned, 'On the Warfare and Experience of Believers;' finding that his was not, as he had supposed, a case of new occurrence; but that the author of that work was already acquainted with its symptoms, and argued favourably of them as often accompanying the progress of religion in the soul,—still the idea that his death was fast approaching, and that there was no hope of his mind being convinced before it arrived, quite overwhelmed him. Feeling ourselves to be very inadequate guides and comforters in these afflicting circumstances, we gladly adopted the suggestion of a friend, that we should request a neighbouring clergyman, of piety and judgment, to visit him. Dr Bateman himself grasped eagerly at the proposal, and I wrote immediately to the clergyman in question; but he was from home, and was not expected to return for two or three weeks. A few days after this unwelcome intelligence, Dr Bateman told me he had no doubt this disappointment was for his good; and that it was better for him to be left to himself, as he did not think anything could have convinced him so fully of the efficacy of prayer, as the sensible relief which he experienced from it during those conflicts of doubt and unbelief with which his mind continued to be harassed. He added, that he now spent whole nights in prayer. He felt perfectly assured that his doubts were the suggestions of the great adversary of souls; and remarked, that they were vividly and manifestly darted, as it were, into his mind, instead of arising from his own reflections, or resulting from any train of reasoning; and the absurdity of them, in many instances, was so obvious, that his judgment detected it at once, though he still had not the power to drive them from the hold they took of his imagination, or to banish them, for the time, from his thoughts. These paroxysms of distress and conflict, which sometimes lasted many hours, he continued subject to for about a fortnight; but they gradually became less long and violent, and he experienced increasing relief from prayer during their continuance, till at length they subsided entirely, and left his mind satisfied on all those points which had before presented so many obstacles to his belief."

In the course of the summer which followed this blessed change in Dr Bateman's whole views and feelings, he gradually gained strength, so that in the beginning of winter he was able to remove to Whitby. Here, however, he relapsed into his former state of weakness and languor. His appetite forsook him, and he became more emaciated. But as the outward man decayed, the inward man waxed stronger and stronger every day. Though the natural reserve of his disposition prevented him from freely expressing his feelings, still, his faith and patience were strikingly conspicuous. He always spoke of his long bodily afflictions with the most devout thankfulness, as having been instrumental in bringing him to God; and he considered his total blindness as a special mercy, because, by excluding external objects, it had enabled him to devote his mind more entirely to spiritual and divine things. Up to his latest moments he maintained a firm reliance on that Saviour whom he had so long despised. His death-bed experience cannot be more vividly described, than in the language of the friend to whom we have already referred. "He bore his bodily afflictions with the most exemplary patience, and even cheerfulness, and continually expressed his thankfulness, that they were not greater; sometimes saying, 'what a blessing it is to be allowed to slip gently and gradually out of life as I am doing!' He would not allow any one to speak of his sufferings, always saying, 'they did not deserve a stronger name than inconveniences.' He neither complained himself, nor would permit others to complain for him. Once, when the nurse who attended him said, 'Oh that cough! how troublesome it is!' he replied, 'Have a little patience, nurse; I shall soon be in a better world; and what a glorious change that will be!' Indeed, the joy of his mind seemed to have absorbed all sense of his physical sufferings. I once remarked to him, that he appeared to have experienced no intermission of these joyful feelings; and he answered, 'For some months past never, and never the smallest rising of any thing like impatience or complaint.' His mind, naturally active and ardent, retained all its powers in full vigour to the last moment of his life, and was never once clouded or debilitated even in the most depressing nervous languors. Indeed, after the whole current of his tastes and affections had been turned into a new channel, its ardour and activity rather increased than diminished, from the deep conviction which he felt of the superiority of his present views and pursuits to all that had hitherto engrossed him. During the last week of his life, especially, the strength and clearness of his intellect and of his spiritual perceptions were very remarkable; and on its being one day observed to him, that as his bodily powers decayed, those of his soul seemed to become more vigorous, he replied, 'They do, exactly in an inverse ratio: I have been very sensible of it.'

"He conversed with the greatest animation all the day, and almost all the night, preceding his death, principally on the joys of heaven, and the glorious change he was soon to experience; often exclaiming, 'What a happy hour will the hour of death be!' He dwelt much on the description of the New Jerusalem in the Revelation of St. John, and listened with great delight to several passages from Baxter's 'Saint's Rest,' and some of Watts's Hymns on the same subject. Once in the night he said to his mother, 'Surely you are not in tears! Mine is a case that calls for rejoicing, and not for sorrow. Only think what it will be to drop this poor, frail, perishing body, and go to the glories that are set before me!' Not more than an hour before his death, when he had been expressing his faith and hope in very animated terms, I remarked to him, how striking the uniformity of faith and of feeling expressed by believers in the same circumstances, at every distance of time and place! and spoke of it as an indisputable evidence that these graces are wrought in all by 'one and the self-same Spirit,' and as a proof of the truth of the Bible, the promises and descriptions of which are thus so strikingly fulfilled and exemplified. He entered into the argument with his accustomed energy, and assented to its truth with delight. It seemed remarkable, that though he had during his whole illness been very sensible of his increasing weakness, and had watched and marked accurately all its gradations, yet he spoke, in the last moments of his life, of going down stairs as usual (he had been carried up and down for several days,) and said 'it could not require more than a very few weeks now to wear him out;' not appearing to be at all aware that his end was so very near, till about half an hour before his death. Finding himself extremely languid, he took a little milk, and desired that air might be admitted into the room; and on being asked if he felt relieved at all, said 'Very little: I can hardly distinguish, indeed, whether this is languor or drowsiness which has come over me; but it is a very agreeable feeling.' Soon after, he said suddenly, 'I surely must be going now, my strength sinks so fast, I have almost lost the power of moving my limbs; and on my making some observation on the glorious prospect before him, he added, 'Oh yes! I am GLAD to go, if it be the Lord's will!' He shut his eyes, and lay quite composed, and by and by said, 'What glory! the angels are waiting for me!'—then, after another short interval of quiet, added, 'Lord Jesus, receive my soul!' and to those who were about him, 'Farewell!' These were the last words he spoke: he gradually and gently sunk away, and in about ten minutes breathed his last, calmly and without a struggle, at nine in the morning of the 9th of April, the very day on which, twelve months before, his mind had first been awakened to the hopes and joys of the ever-blessed Gospel.

"What a contrast did his actual departure form with what I had reason to apprehend, when I watched over his couch in London, expecting that every moment would be his last; and when, with a hard indifference and insensibility, he talked only of going to his 'last sleep!' And how can I worthily acknowledge the goodness of Almighty God, who effected such a change in his state!"

It is proper to remark, in closing the biography of an individual circumstanced as Dr Bateman, that though, in the inscrutable providence of God, he was called in a manner at the eleventh hour, such instances of death-bed repentance are very rare indeed. It is impossible, no doubt, to limit the operations of God's Spirit, but in the ordinary arrangements of the divine plans, the sinner who has resisted the innumerable appeals made to his conscience during a long series of years is doomed to feel the awful reality and force of that declaration of the Bible, "My Spirit will not always strive with man, saith the Lord." He may, like Dr Bateman, be permitted to pass through the furnace of affliction, so as to come out of it seven times purified; but where is the man who can venture to say, that though in the days of health and prosperity he forget God, yet God will be pleased to visit him in mercy, when stretched on the bed of sickness and of death? Presumptuous thought! What saith the Scripture? "They that seek me early shall find me." "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation."

TO A LADY IN DISTRESS OF MIND.

LETTER I.

BY THE REV. HENRY DUNCAN, D. D.,

DEAR MADAM,—The interest I feel in the state of your mind will not suffer me to deny myself the satisfaction of writing to you, though I am urged to do so rather by my inclination than by any conviction of my ability to be of service. Alas, in such a case as yours, it is not human aid that is required. Yet God is often pleased to make use of very humble instruments for the accomplishment of his gracious purposes; and it does not become one who professes to be a minister of the Gospel to shrink from duty, under a sense of his own incapacity, especially when he remembers that he serves a Master who has said, "my grace is sufficient for thee; my strength is made perfect in weakness."

If I rightly understand your case, it is this:—You were, from early infancy, educated, like most individuals of your station, in a general knowledge of the truths of Christianity, and in a decent and regular observance of its outward ordinances, without having been induced to bring them home very intimately to your heart, or to regard them very steadily as a rule of life. You were taught to believe in God as your creator, preserver, and lawgiver, as constantly present with you, and as the witness and recorder of all your thoughts, words, and actions; but these truths were rather received by you as doctrines to be acknowledged, than as practical principles, which, if really believed in, must fill your heart, and regulate your conduct. The same thing, I presume, may be said of your belief in a Saviour. You were told that he died for sinners, and that as you, like other descendants of Adam, were a sinner, he died for you. You therefore felt that you were bound by duty to love him who first loved you. But you did not realize any part of these important truths to your mind. You never perhaps thought very seriously on the subject, and, not being accustomed to examine your own heart, and to compare your character with the requirements of God's revealed Word, you were not at all aware, either to what extent, or even in what sense you were a sinner. Your religion, in short, was chiefly, if not altogether, a religion of speculation; and you secretly cherished worldly views and motives, as the real and governing principles of your conduct.

Such I know to be the character of many highly amiable and interesting persons, who are the delight of the circle in which they move, and are regarded as the ornaments of society; and if I have not misinterpreted the account which you, with so much candour, gave me of your former feelings and sentiments, to that very numerous class, up to a recent period, you belonged.

There is something exceedingly seductive, and, to use a Scripture word, "blinding," in this species of negative Christianity. It falls in so agreeably with that self-love, and that train of worldly sentiment which is incident to our fallen nature, and it finds so much to cherish it in the sympathies and examples of our friends and associates, that it is doubly deceitful. It is probably to such a state of mind that our Saviour alludes in the Revelations, when he says to the Church of Laodicea, "I would that thou wert either cold or hot;" as if lukewarmness were even a more dangerous state of mind than absolute infidelity.

However this may be, I think you are fully aware that you were in a dangerous state, and stood in need of affliction to rouse you from a false security; and I trust also you see the hand of a kind and judicious Father, in the discipline which his paternal regard has been pleased to inflict on you. To your case, I trust that most consolatory and cheering sentiment of the apostle applies:—"Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth," and "though no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous, nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby."

Not only have your afflictions, my dear Madam, been severe, but, as if one blow were not enough, that blow has been repeated with double force. The loss of an innocent and beloved infant was a painful bereavement, but it had many alleviations; the loss, however, of your husband, I can easily conceive to have been quite overwhelming, under the circumstances which you partly stated to me, and partly left me to infer. But when you look into your own heart, you are probably convinced that you stood in need, even of this privation, to open your eyes to your real condition, to wean you from a world to which you were bound by too many and too endearing ties, and to rouse you to a sense of your best interests. You see in this awful and mysterious dispensation, the hand of Him who never afflicteth willingly, nor grieveth unnecessarily. You are therefore convinced that, if you improve it aright, it will, in the end, prove a real and substantial blessing to your soul.

But all our blessings may be abused by our own folly and perverseness; and if abused, only tend to aggravate our unhappy condition. Now, such dispensations may be abused in two ways; the lessons they are intended to teach may be neglected altogether, or they may be dwelt on too exclusively and too intensely. In the former case, our spiritual condition is rendered greatly more hopeless; in the latter, the energies of our mind may be weakened, and our judgment may be so impaired as to mistake a selfish indulgence of inordinate grief for devotional feeling, and an ascetic estrangement from the common affairs of life for duty.

I fear, my dear Madam, that it is this latter abuse into which you have a tendency to fall; and that unless you combat against it by all the means which Providence has so liberally afforded you, the afflictive dispensations which have been the means employed by a merciful Providence for rousing you from a state of lukewarmness, may hurry you into an opposite extreme, and end in materially affecting the health, both of your body and mind. You allow your mind to expatiate too freely and too entirely on past scenes and events; you indulge in these overpowering recollections, till they absorb your whole feelings, and injure the energies of your mind, and till they become magnified to your apprehension far beyond their due proportions. You are then apt to cry out, "Was there ever so sinful and so unhappy a being as I am? How can there be forgiveness for such an one as I?" and thus the horror of despair gathers around you, and you become unfit either for Christian consolation or for Christian duty.

This is your disease, and I think it is not difficult to point out the remedy, as well as the means by which that remedy may be applied.

I need not remind you that the first duty of a Christian is to believe,—that is, to realize to his mind the great truths of the Gospel, that they may be practically applied to the ordinary, as well as extraordinary, duties of life. Now, at the foundation of all these truths, is that of the presence and superintending providence of the Almighty. For a proper belief in him, it is essential that you become acquainted with his character, as exhibited in the Gospel. How unspeakably amiable and gracious is that character! He is our Father, a name that involves a thousand tender and endearing views. He is more than a Father:—"Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? Yea, she may forget; yet will not I forget thee!" On this character, so unspeakably sublime, but lovely, you would do well to dwell; and I cannot but think that, were you to do so in the spirit of dependence and prayer, the exercise would be blessed as the means of dissipating the gloom of your spirits, and gradually, but certainly, infusing better and more comfortable feelings into your mind. You would soon be enabled to regard God in the light, not of a stern task-master, but of a most generous benefactor; and the confidence arising from this view would be unspeakably increased, when you looked up to him as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and, in him, your Father and your God. Under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, you would own him, as, through the death of his own beloved Son, "reconciling the world unto himself, and not imputing unto men their trespasses;" and whilst you perceived that it was only by means of the accepted sacrifice of Christ that you could be accepted, you would also be led practically to understand how it is that he employs the discipline both of joy and sorrow in the present life, to prepare you for being introduced into the eternal enjoyments of the world of Spirits. You would thus be led to cast your eyes over the whole scheme of salvation, and to contemplate, with admiration and delight, the wonders of redeeming love. I do not know how it is possible for any person to do this habitually and in faith, without being freed from the gloom of despondency, and being blest with a portion of that peace of mind which our Saviour himself has promised as the result of belief in his Gospel. You will then perceive, that, sinner though you are, an ample provision is made for pardon and acceptance to you, as well as to the worst of sinners, if only they are duly impressed with a sense of their sinfulness, and accept of the offer of salvation, so bountifully made to them. You will appropriate these blessings to yourself by an act of faith; and trusting in his divine mercy and grace, will cast yourself unreservedly on the merit of your Redeemer, the affecting and unanswerable reasoning of the apostle filling your heart with humble confidence,—“He who spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things.”

It is so delightful to dwell on these views, that I am forgetting I have much still to say on other subjects; but I trust that the practical effects of these Christian principles are already anticipated by you. You see how utterly uncongenial with the spirit of the Gospel is a habit of gloom and despondency. That spirit is active, cheerful, and full of hope. It will lead you to trust implicitly in that goodness and mercy with which it overflows, and will induce you to imitate those virtues and graces which are so beautifully delineated in the life and character of the Saviour. Instead of suffering you to dwell perpetually on past sins, it will lead you to look forward to new attainments, and incite you to seek out and walk in the path of duty.

You are aware that there are duties incumbent on all Christians, and that besides these, there are peculiar duties which belong to individuals, arising from the station in which they are placed, and the circumstances with which they are surrounded. As a mother—as a relation and friend—as one whom Providence has blest with affluence, and has thus rendered the steward of his bounties to those within the sphere of her influence, in a thousand ways active duties lie before you, which I am well assured, if through that divine energy which is the portion of the Christian, you can only rouse yourself to the task, you will find delightful. But I do not know a greater burden—alas, I speak from experience—than that of known duties neglected from indolence, or from want of a habitual and practical view of their importance. Much fortitude, perseverance, and self-denial will be necessary before you can succeed in establishing these habits, and acquiring a relish for these occupations; and let me add, also, much watchfulness and many prayers. But never forget that it is not your own strength in which you are sent to the discharge of these arduous duties. Need I remind you again, that there is a divine hand stretched out to support you—that there is a Holy Spirit waiting to guide you—and that there are promises of endless blessings which never fail those who trust in them.

You cannot but feel it to be a great cause of thankfulness, that it has pleased the merciful Disposer of events to place you at this moment among friends, at once so anxious and so well qualified to promote your best interests. Let me earnestly advise you to listen to the friendly counsel of Mrs —, and to associate yourself with her and her excellent husband in those schemes of benevolence in which they so actively engage. You complained to me that the neighbourhood of E— was not well calculated for giving scope to your benevolent feelings. This may be so, though I believe in no situation can a mind imbued with Christian charity find any want of means for its exercise if only it be rightly directed. It is in the want of right direction that an inexperienced individual may find difficulty, and hence the inestimable value of a kindred mind for supplying the means at once of advice and support. But while you remain with Mr and Mrs —, you will not find any deficiency of this greatest of earthly blessings; and I trust, my dear Madam, you will enter with all your heart into the plans which these deeply interested friends may point out for the useful occupation of your time; and that you will thus be induced to combine with the study of your Bible, and the religious improvement of your understanding and affections, a course of active and enlightened benevolence, which, if entered upon from Christian motives, and pursued in a Christian spirit, seems to be one of the best means of removing the present morbid state of your feelings, and of restoring you to the enjoyments of this life; while in the exercise of these important duties, you may hope to be preparing for enjoyments of an infinitely higher nature, when it shall please God to call you from your present state of trial into his own eternal presence, and the society of the just made perfect, where all earthly graces but that of charity shall fail.

BY THE REV. ROBERT GORDON, D.D.,

"I will wash mine hands in innocency: so will I compass thine altar, O Lord."—PSALM XXVI. 6.

It appears from the first verse, and, indeed, from the general tenor of this Psalm, that it was composed at a time when David had reason to believe that he was lying under unfounded suspicions, if not actually exposed to injurious calumnies; for he begins with appealing to God, as the searcher of hearts, to bear witness to his integrity; and throughout, he asserts his innocence of having associated with vain persons, or taken counsel with the ungodly, in such a way as evidently implies that he had been suspected, or accused, of sanctioning the deeds at least, if not courting the aid of bloody and deceitful men. And none who are familiar with the history of the Psalmist, can fail to recollect occasions on which he might have been liable to such suspicions and unfounded aspersions. Let us advert, for example, to the period at which David, in consequence of Saul's death, was called to the throne, and was actually proclaimed King in Hebron, over the house of Judah. Immediately upon that event, a rival claim to the throne was set up, for Ish-bosheth, one of Saul's sons, who was in fact acknowledged as king by the other tribes of Israel, through the influence of Abner, who had been captain of the host of Saul, his father; and for about seven years this claim continued to be asserted, there being "long war," we are told, "between the house of Saul and the house of David." It was found, however, that in this conflict, while "David waxed stronger and stronger, the house of Saul waxed weaker and weaker;" and at length Abner, who was in reality the ruler of Ish-bosheth, though Ish-bosheth was nominally the King of Israel, made proposals to David to relinquish in his favour all pretensions to the throne, and to bring the other tribes of Israel to acknowledge him as king. But while this negotiation was going on, Joab, the captain of David's host, treacherously slew Abner in revenge for his brother Asahel's death, whom Abner had slain: and immediately after, two of Ish-bosheth's servants, captains of bands, slew their master while he lay upon his bed, and carried his head to David, hoping thereby to ingratiate themselves with the king as having cut off his rival and enemy. Now, it is plain, that such deeds might give occasion to David's enemies to allege that he had some share in the perpetration of them, and that if he did not directly instigate those who were immediately concerned, he did at least approve of, or wink at, them as the readiest means of securing his accession to the undisturbed dominion of all the other tribes of Israel, as well as that of Judah. And that such suspicions were entertained at least, if not openly expressed, appears very probable from his history, as recorded in the 3d and 4th chapters of 2 Samuel; for never was David more anxious about any thing than he was to clear himself of all participation in those crimes, and to manifest his righteous abhorrence of them. But while he sought to vindicate himself and his cause, which was the cause of truth and righteousness, from the suspicions and calumnies of men, by publicly disavowing all participation in crimes which might seem to have been perpetrated for his advantage, he felt it necessary for his peace of mind, and for his having confidence to engage in the solemnities of the sanctuary worship, that he should stand vindicated also to his own conscience by finding, after a solemn trial of himself as in the very presence of the heart-searching God, not only that he was innocent of all actual share in the deeds which had been committed, but that he had never entertained or conceived the idea of such deeds with the view of extending or establishing his authority. Accordingly, he appeals to God whether he was not innocent of the charge brought against him, and whether he had no walked in his integrity, trusting in the Lord, and not looking to the counsel or the aid of vain men and dissemblers. He prays that the Lord would examine him and prove him, and try his reins and his heart, so as to disclose to himself his own most secret thoughts and motives: and having the testimony of his conscience—quicken and enlighten as it had been by a sense of the divine presence—that the loving kindness of the Lord, and not the assembly of evil-doers, had been his stay and support, he expresses the joy and boldness with which, having “washed his hands in innocency,” he would “compass the altar of the Lord, to publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all God’s wondrous works.”

But by washing his hands in innocency, we are not to understand merely that he stood acquitted before God and his own conscience of certain sins which had been falsely laid to his charge. That, no doubt, would be a delightful discovery to him, and the subject of warm and unfeigned gratitude to the God of all grace, who had so “delivered his eyes from tears, and his feet from falling.” But the rigorous self-examination which led to this discovery, could not fail to disclose to him a great deal more than he would otherwise have known or thought of, as to the state of his heart and affections, and the tenor of his life in other respects; and could as little fail of bringing to light much impurity, and imperfection, and sin. Whatever comfort, therefore, he might derive from the consciousness of having been kept from sin on some points, that comfort would have been broken in upon, and his freedom in approaching God laid under restraint, if he were not cleansed from the guilt of other transgressions. And accordingly he says, not “I will wash my hands in innocency,” as if acquittal from the sins with which he was falsely charged had been all that he desired; but “have washed my hands in innocency,” that is to say, I will seek by penitence and faith, and through the appointed medium, the pardon of all my transgressions—I will deliberately renounce every thing which I have discovered in my heart or life to be contrary to the divine law—and, through the grace of God, I will unreservedly surrender myself to his service and disposal; and having so “washed my hands in innocency, I will compass thine altar, O Lord: that I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all thy wondrous works.”

Such appears to be the import of the text, as spoken by the Psalmist of himself; and believers still should be prepared to adopt his language. We are not told what was the precise nature of the service which David contemplated, and which is here called compassing the altar of the Lord. But it is plain that it was a very solemn act of religious worship to which he was looking forward, and for which he felt it necessary, in the way of preparation, that he should “wash his hands in innocency.” And surely such a preparation is not less necessary for us when about to engage in the most solemn act of Christian worship—that in which we do, each one for himself, renew our baptismal engagements to be the Lord’s, renouncing the devil, the world, and the flesh; where we receive what we profess to regard, not only as a sign but a seal of our union to Christ as members of his spiritual body, and through which we expect to be “made partakers of his flesh and blood, with all his benefits, to our spiritual nourishment, and growth in grace.” And I would observe generally, that by washing our hands in innocency, we are to understand, looking by faith to the blood of Christ, as that alone which cleanses us from all sin, and seeking to have this faith in lively exercise. Apart from Christ, there is nothing in us, as we appear in the sight of God, but guilt and pollution; for it is testified of all men that they are “guilty before God,” that they “are all as an unclean thing, and all their righteousness as filthy rags; that they do all fade as a leaf, and their iniquities, like the wind, have carried them away.” As sinners, therefore, we are under condemnation; and if “we are justified,” it is “through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus;”—if “we are made the righteousness of God,” or treated as righteous persons in the sight of God, it is because Christ “was made sin for us though he knew no sin;”—if we are held clean, it is because “Christ has washed us from our sins in his own blood.” But it is as plainly testified, that if we are so justified, treated as righteous, and held clean, it is through faith in Christ—not a mere opinion that what the Holy Scriptures say of Christ is true, which, as an opinion, may lie dormant in the understanding, and be altogether inefficacious as to any practical effect on the heart and life—but such a faith or belief as goes forth in the exercise of trusting in, and cleaving to Christ, for acquittal and acceptance in the sight of God, to the exclusion of every other ground of hope whatever. It must be obvious, therefore, that such an exercise of faith in Christ, such a cleaving in heart and soul to him, is absolutely essential, if we would make any approach to God that can either be acceptable to him, or profitable to ourselves. To address God, the Supreme Lawgiver and Judge, without having on our minds, while doing so, a clear apprehension of the efficacy of Christ’s blood and the necessity of his mediation, were an act of presumptuous self-righteousness; it were to challenge a scrutiny of our character by the demands of that very law which has pronounced us guilty; and just in proportion to the vividness of this our apprehension of Christ’s perfected work, will be the freedom with which we offer up our prayers to God, and the confidence with which we expect that, in answer to our prayers, God will grant us whatever is really for our good. And if such a believing application to the blood of Christ, such a washing in the fountain of mercy opened for sin and for uncleanness, is necessary for every approach to the throne of grace, and for rightly preferring every petition there; surely at a more solemn season, like this, when we are about to transact with God, in the way of declaring before the Church our cordial acceptance of Christ as our covenant head, and our acquiescence in all the terms of that covenant of which he is surety, it is peculiarly required that we should thus wash our hands in innocency before we compass his holy altar.

But our text implies a great deal more than this, in reference to our preparation for the solemn service of the Lord's Supper. In that service, there is a formal, deliberate, and professedly an unreserved, surrender of ourselves to God, which calls for a very solemn and unsparing examination of the state of our heart, and the tenor of our life; lest it should be found, that in word and in outward profession, we are giving to God what in reality we are reserving for the world—for its frivolous pursuits, and sinful enjoyments. And on this point the Psalmist has set us a very holy and instructive example. He was not satisfied with seeking to discover, and honestly confessing, the sins which he had outwardly committed; but he made those also of which he was conscious of being unjustly suspected or accused, the subject of a very rigorous examination; thereby turning the very calumnies of the world to good account, by making them the means of detecting the inmost secrets of his soul, and bringing to light those hidden impurities which, but for such a call to examine himself, might have lurked and gathered strength in his heart. And where is the Christian who has not been called upon, in the same way, to institute a similar inquiry into his motives and principles of action? For where is the Christian who has not, at times, lain under the suspicion, or been exposed to the charge, of having said or done what was inconsistent with his Christian character, while his conscience bore witness that he was unjustly accused? The Church, in her collective capacity, has, in all ages, been in one way or other the object of calumny or reproach; and any individual member of Christ's body, who has not laid his account with bearing his share of such calumnies, must have very imperfectly understood the many warnings and admonitions of his divine Master, and have formed very low and partial views of the wisdom and rectitude of God's administration. But I fear, it will be found that, even those who, as they thought, were prepared to expect such trials, have not always improved them as the Psalmist did. I fear that, in many cases, where Christians have been so tried, instead of making such seasons times of deep humiliation, and serious inquiry into the state of their heart and affections, they have given way to a haughty and self-righteous spirit;—that instead of examining, with a holy jealousy of themselves, whether they had not been guilty of entertaining in idea, at least, the sinful act imputed to them, though innocent of the act itself, they were satisfied with indignantly resenting the charge, as an unjust and unmerited reproach;—and that the satisfaction which they felt in the consciousness of their innocence was more nearly allied to pride, than to a feeling of gratitude to Him whose grace had "kept them from falling," and who had "led them in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake." And need I remark, that in such a frame of spirit, they are in no condition to make the solemn appeal which the Psalmist did: "Judge me, O Lord; for I have walked in mine integrity: examine me, O Lord, and prove me; try my reins and my heart." They may have been unjustly suspected or accused, and may have held fast their integrity in the case where they were charged with letting it go; but they have not improved their trial as it was the design of God's providence that they should improve it; they have incurred guilt, by drawing gratification to their pride, from an event which was both fitted and intended to bring them into an humble and self-diffident spirit; they have not sisted themselves, as they ought to have done, at the tribunal of conscience, and as in the very presence of God, to have his acquittal, and to give him the glory: and if such guilt has been contracted, then, so long as it is unrepented of, and unacknowledged, they have not, in that instance, so "washed their hands in innocency, as to be prepared for compassing the altar of the Lord."

But if Christians are called upon seriously to examine themselves even respecting sins which may have been unjustly laid to their charge, so that they may enjoy the pleasing consciousness of being acquitted in the sight of God, and have occasion to give to his restraining grace all the glory and the praise; surely it is not less necessary, that they should make the sins of which they have been guilty the special subjects of a solemn investigation, and the occasion of a special application to the fountain of mercy, where alone they can wash their hands in innocency. It is not enough that they make a general acknowledgment of guilt, and look to the blood of Christ for the removal of that guilt. If they confine themselves to such a general confession, and such a general application to the blood of atonement, it will be found, that there is nothing very deep or heartfelt in their sorrow, nor very lively in their faith; and that all the while there may be much unsubdued sin lurking in their heart, of which they have hardly ever been conscious, and against which, therefore, they have never seriously contended. If they would "wash their hands in innocency," they must make conscience of searching out and bringing to light their particular offences; they must honestly endeavour to look at them in all their extent and aggravation, tearing away the disguise in which pride and self-love are very ready to invest them; and having seen them as they appear when tried by the divine law, without any palliation, they must confess them; and looking to the blood of Christ with a simple and undivided reliance on its cleansing virtue, they must supplicate, for every sin so discovered and acknowledged, the special exercise of God's forgiving mercy. And all this, it is obvious, necessarily implies, that at the moment such confession is made, and such a supplication offered up, there is an earnest desire to be kept from these sins, and an honest purpose, in the strength of promised grace, steadfastly to resist them in all time coming. Where this is wanting, where there is any thing like a mental reservation in favour of a sinful indulgence, or of some modification of such an indulgence, it gives a character of insincerity to the whole transaction; and their own conscience, as well as Scripture, will testify, that they cannot sincerely expect to be heard; or if they can possibly so far delude themselves as to hope that they will, it is an unfounded hope, of which they will, sooner or later, see reason to be ashamed. In such circumstances, so far from "washing their hands in innocency," they are willingly retaining the unclean thing by which they have been defiled. To be so washed, they must not only be sprinkled with that blood which cleanses from the guilt of all sin, but sanctified also, by that Spirit who can alone remove the pollution of sin; and both these must be the subject of sincere, earnest, and believing prayer.

These principles are very plainly laid down in the Bible, and comprehensively stated in the text. Let us therefore apply them to our own character and state. In the prospect of compassing the Table of the Lord, are we prepared to subject ourselves to the same scrutiny that David did? and while confessing our sins in the hope of finding mercy, are we honestly desirous also of forsaking them? And let us not be satisfied with being able to reply generally to this question, that we do hope for pardon by the blood of Christ, and that we desire also to walk as Christians ought to walk. Let us examine our character, the state of our heart, and the tenor of our life, as they refer both to God and our fellow-men, calling to our remembrance those offences against both, of which our conscience did at the time accuse us, but which we may have too easily and too speedily forgotten. And on recollecting any such offence more immediately committed against God, any gratification in thought or deed which we know to have been forbidden in his Word, any rebellious feeling against his dispensations, or any neglect of the homage due to him, for the sake of some worldly object, which, for the time, held the supremacy of our affections; let us enquire whether we are ready to acknowledge such offences, without palliation or disguise, and are as honest in supplicating his grace to cleanse us from its past pollution, and preserve us from its future influence, as we are in imploring the pardon of its guilt. And, in like manner, let us ask, whether we are prepared to deal as honestly by ourselves, in regard to the offences with which we may have been chargeable against our fellow-men. We cannot fail, if we are faithful to ourselves, to recollect many such sins,—occasions on which our pride, or anger, or some other selfish and ungodly principle was called into activity,—and times, it may be, when we may have reason to fear that we said or did something to injure the moral or spiritual character of others, by weakening in their minds their reverence for divine truth, or their impressions of the necessity of Christian holiness. Are we prepared then to deal with unsparing justice towards these and similar offences? Are we anxious to see, in all their deformity, our selfishness, pride, irritation, uncharitableness, which is dishonesty, and every other unholy affection, whether it has only lurked in our hearts, or been actually manifested in words or deeds injurious to our neighbour? and above all, would we confess the guilt, and deplore the consequences of having in any way hurt the spiritual interests of others, not only imploring the forgiveness of such offences, but sincerely seeking to be preserved from them in all time coming? And let us see to it also, that we are not living in the practice of sin, or in the neglect of duty, about which our conscience may never have given us any uneasiness, just because, from the prevailing practices of society, we may have been taking for granted that we may safely do what the Bible forbids, or leave undone what it requires. And let us not allege that these are sins of ignorance. With the Word of God in our hand, such a plea is incompetent: for what is the use of God's Word, but that by the daily and careful perusal of it, we may become daily better acquainted with God's will. If therefore we have been living in the practice of any one sin, or in the neglect of any one duty, in consequence of inattention or indifference to the Scriptures, such sin will be charged upon us as wilful: and it will assuredly prove "a root of bitterness springing up to trouble us." David was well aware of the danger of thus permitting any secret sin to lurk undiscovered, and to gather strength in his heart: for we find him praying, "Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me and know my thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." And such also was obviously his sentiment, when he said in the words of the text, "I will wash mine hands in innocency: so will I compass thine altar, O Lord: that I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all thy wondrous works."

WATCHMEN IN THE EAST.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

IN Eastern countries, where they have no clocks, and the mechanical contrivances used to supply the want of them are exceedingly imperfect, and but rarely possessed, the method generally employed to take the note of time, is by dividing the day and night into four equal parts. The periodical return of these is announced by watchmen, some of whom are stationed on high towers, others patrol the various streets of the city, while their duty is to proclaim with a loud cry, or by instruments of music, the intervals as they pass. This is more particularly required of them at night, in the course of which they are obliged, not only at each watch, but at frequent intervals in the progress of it, to cry aloud in order to give the people, who depend upon them for the protection of their lives and property, assurance that they are not sleeping at their posts, or negligent of their charge. On these latter occasions, the exclamations are always addressed to their comrades, and generally consist of some expressions in the form of a dialogue tending to encourage one another in the discharge of their cheerless and monotonous task ;—some watchword, or set form of words, similar to what a traveller informs us is used by the watchmen of the caravans in the Desert, who, in going their rounds, exclaim when they meet, " God is merciful," while the other responds in the same elevated tone, " Blessings be on you," or, " Mind yourselves." The responsibility of these officers is very great, for whatever outrages are perpetrated, the watchman who is on duty at the time is required to make rigid satisfaction—in cases of robbery, by payment of an equivalent for the stolen goods, and in cases of murder, with his own blood ; and hence, those who are appointed to this office are obliged, both from a sense of duty, and from dread of the serious consequences of negligence, to be constantly perambulating the streets, and making the most vigilant efforts to prevent the occurrence of any disorder.

The knowledge of these customs, which exist in the present day in almost all countries of the East, affords an obvious explanation of many circumstances mentioned in the history, and many allusions made in the sacred books of the Jews, as among that people institutions of the same nature evidently prevailed. We may learn from the preceding observations what is meant (Judges vii. 19 ; Matthew xiv. 25.—xxiv. 43 ; Luke xii. 38.) by the first, second, third, and fourth watch, these being the successive periods into which, reckoning their night to begin from our six o'clock, they were accustomed to divide that portion of time, and we may easily discover, too, how natural it was for them to use that term as a general expression for the night season, as in Psalm lxxiii, where the Psalmist speaks of the time he spent in devotion,—“ When I meditate on thee in the night-watches.” To the loud and frequent cries with which the return of these intervals was made known, the Prophet Isaiah alludes in lii. 8, where he says, “ the watchmen shall lift up the voice ;” in lxii. 6, where he speaks of them “ never holding their peace day nor night, crying aloud, and keeping not silence ;” and also in lvi. 10, where, in speaking of careless and unfaithful watchmen, he describes them as “ dumb dogs, dreamers, that love to slumber.” The vehemence of these nocturnal exclamations of the watchmen, would frequently awake those that were asleep ; and as to persons thus suddenly roused, the quarter of the night announced as having elapsed, would seem to have passed in the oblivion of their slumbers with the rapidity of a moment, we may perceive the exquisite force and beauty of the simile in Psalm xc. 4, “ A thousand years are in thy sight but as a watch in the night.” The custom of the watchmen crying aloud in the course of the watches, and that, too, by saluting each other when they met, in the form of a set dialogue, was observed also by the ancient officers of this description among the Jews—the watchword being then, as it is still, we have seen, among the watchmen of the caravans, some pious sentiment, in which the name of Jehovah was specially expressed ; Two remarkable instances of this occur in Scripture, the one is in Isaiah lxii. 6, where, speaking of the watchmen of the Temple, who were always Levites, and among whom the same regulations subsisted as among other watchmen, he addresses them under the poetical description of, “ Ye that make mention of the Lord,” i. e., ye whose watchword is the name of Jehovah. The other instance is in Psalm cxxxiv, the whole of which, as is justly observed by Bishop Lowth, is nothing more than the alternate cry of two different divisions of the watch. The first watch addresses the second, reminding them of their duty ; the second answers by a solemn blessing. The address and the answer seem both to be a set form, which each division proclaimed aloud at stated intervals to notify the time of night :

First band of watchmen.—“ Bless ye the Lord, all ye servants of the Lord, who stand in the night in the house of the Lord. Lift up your hands in the sanctuary and bless the Lord.”

Second band of watchmen answer.—“ The Lord bless thee out of Zion—the Lord that made heaven and earth.”

According to the rigid, and in many cases sanguinary laws of the East, to which we have already adverted, the office of a watchman is neither a sinecure nor is it an easy task, as he is responsible for the safety both of the persons and things he is appointed to guard, and must pay, without the hope of mercy, the penalty of the utmost farthing, either with his fortune or his life, for whatever disasters happen, if it be proved that the occurrence took place in consequence of his having failed to give the alarm, or not taken due precautions to prevent the mischief. The reader of the Scriptures will remember the tremendous effect with which the fervid imagination of Ezekiel employs this circumstance to pourtray the responsibility of the spiritual watchmen who are stationed upon the bulwarks of Zion, and whose duty it is to proclaim aloud to the people the warnings, reproofs, and admonitions of the Word of God. “ O son of man, I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel ; therefore thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me. When I say unto the wicked, O wicked man, thou shalt surely die ; if thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way, that wicked man shall die in his iniquity ; but his blood will I require at thine hand. Nevertheless, if thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it ; if he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his iniquity ; but thou hast delivered thy soul.” (Ezekiel xxxiii. 8, 9.)*

DEATH-BED SCENES.

No. III.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER MOODY, A.M.

As men live, so do men die. Within twenty-four hours of the death narrated in our last, another member of the human family had fled to the unseen world with widely different feelings ; would that we could add with a widely different fate. He was not ignorant of the doctrines of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. To his youthful training, an inquisitive mind aided by no contemptible talent, had added a considerable stock of theological learning. His reading had been chiefly of our old divines, and his knowledge was not more extensive than his sentiments were sound. Where scarcely any society existed of a higher class, and where in his own rank of life any tolerable acquaintance with such subjects was sufficiently rare, we regarded him as some acquisition. It was evident that his mind had found its chief exercise in religious inquiry ; and on the various points of Christian doctrine his judgment was clear, his reasoning acute, his conversation interesting and animated. Nor did he converse like a man who had a mere speculative knowledge of momentous truth. He spoke with seriousness and fervour, with reverent inquiry and docility, and took a pleasure in dwelling on repentance, justification by grace, and the other fundamental doctrines of our faith. On these subjects, his views were perhaps as correct as an orthodox creed thoroughly studied could render them; we do not say that they were as clear as if they had been sealed by the teaching of the Spirit. He prayed frequently, if not habitually, in his family, and occasionally with some of the more seriously disposed amongst his neighbours, by whom we understood him to be regarded as excelling in devotional exercise. The public ordinances of grace he seemed to appreciate, and to observe them with self-application. His mental working and experience were marked and striking, his convictions of guilt were overwhelming, his desires for salvation intense.

* In some places of the East, particularly Persia and Hindostan, watchmen are included among the officers that compose the household establishment of the grandes, and one of them (the number being generally four, corresponding to the watches of the night.) is stationed near the bed of his master to guard it, and be ready, whenever he requires it, to tell him how far the night is advanced. Such officers, we are told by Josephus, were in the court of Ahasuerus. For on that night on which the king could not sleep, and on which he called for the records of his kingdom, and there was read over to him the conspiracy which Mordecai had discovered ; the historian adds, “ the king made the scribe who was reading stop, and having inquired of those that were appointed for the purpose, what hour of the night it was, and having been informed it was already day, he ordered, that if they found any of his friends were already come and standing before the court, they should tell him, that he might instantly bestow some reward on Mordecai.”

The man we have described was no hypocrite, no antinomian, no scoffer, no formalist. How many are there who stand well in their own eyes, and in the eyes of the Christian world, of whom it would be hard, after the most painful search, to find as much good to say as we have said of him. Nevertheless, he was a sinner—the slave of sin—of such sin as, if a man indulge, “he cannot enter the kingdom of God.” He was a drunkard. He did not daily, indeed, put the inebriating cup to his lips, for he often abstained for weeks together; but then, ever and again, he returned in a time of temptation, “like the dog to his vomit, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire.” He thus enjoyed the pleasure of sin for a season; and when the revel was ended, he was “of all men most miserable.” We have then seen him pacing up and down his apartment the image of wretchedness. He could not work, he could not read, he could not walk abroad, nor find diversion from his grief and dismay. For days in succession he trembled in the presence of an angry God—God, whose house then he dared not enter, whose Word he had not courage to open, whose throne of grace he would not venture to approach. His only resource was to beseech others that they would pray for him, and their assistance he most piteously craved. A self-condemned and relapsed offender, “he stood afar off and smote upon his breast,” and it was long before he had confidence to present the petition, “God be merciful to me a sinner.” Anew he resolved, repented, supplicated, strove, resisted the tempter, and seemed for a while to “abstain from all appearance of evil;” but ere another moon had run her rapid course, he was the same guilty and trembling wretch again, the prey of miserable remorse, well-nigh the victim of despair.

No peculiarity of circumstances can form an excuse for any vice; and yet it was easy to see that to this temptation he was peculiarly exposed. He had served for many years in the army, at a time when he had probably not laid to heart the concerns of his soul, and had there contracted habits which it was difficult for him now to lay aside. His long skeleton frame bore marks of the emaciating influence of Southern suns, by exposure to which, his system had been so enervated as to cause a craving for excitement which he had not moral vigour sufficient to resist. Finding by sad experience the weakness of his firmest resolutions, he thought of uniting himself to a Temperance Society, and had he seen his way clearly, he would have counted light any sacrifice it might have cost. But he reasoned thus:—“I make resolutions now, and when I break them I am almost distracted with a sense of guilt; if I shall bind myself by this solemn promise, I may be tempted sooner or later to break it too, and if ever that should happen it is all over with me, I should be driven to despair, I could not live; however advisable such a step may be for others, it is too hazardous for me, I cannot venture it.” If his power of acting had borne any proportion to his power of reasoning, his character would have been not merely consistent with itself, but superior to most. As it was, his knowledge will probably be accounted an enhancement of his sin, and he will be condemned by many as doubly criminal, because “he knew his Lord’s will and did it not.” For ourselves, we rather wished to regard him as one whom Satan had led captive only by putting forth an unusual effort of subtlety and power.

To a man of such a character, a visitation like that of cholera could not but be peculiarly alarming, viewing it as the judgment of God against a guilty people, himself the guiltiest of all; and being well aware that he was one of the likeliest victims of the disease, and that disease to him was almost certain death. When the scourge began to be severely felt, he was, in common with others, slightly indisposed, (sickness of greater or less severity being then so prevalent, that I suppose I was almost a solitary instance of entire exemption.) He was afraid, and his fear of death being apparently stronger than his fear of sin, he betook himself to ardent spirits as a remedy or preventive of disease. Had he anticipated the hazard of indulging to excess, he would undoubtedly have shrunk from the poisoned cup, but he probably imagined that the very solemnity of such a season would serve as a salutary restraint and sufficient safeguard. He tampered with temptation; he touched, he drank, he was overcome. Intoxication confirmed the previous symptoms of complaint into malignant disease, and he lay stretched on a bed from which he was never to rise. Of all the sufferers, none found a smaller share of sympathy than he. By the sober and respectable, he had been despised as a drunkard; by the thoughtless and profligate, he must have been laughed at as a hypocrite. By all, he was now condemned as a self-destroyer, who for his folly deserved to die; nor had he any family, for whose sake an interest might have been excited in himself. To us, again, he was the most interesting of all the patients, and his life the most precious of all for his own soul’s sake.

At any other time, the information of his sickness—sickness so fatal—sickness so procured, would have been a dreadful stroke, bringing as it did a death-blow to the fondly cherished hope of seeing “him that had the legion sitting at the feet of Jesus, and in his right mind.” But then there was no time for thought, and unexpected distresses had become so frequent, as to render them the subject of daily expectation. I repaired to his house, and found him anxiously looking for my arrival. I learned with regret, that he had refused the advice of the medical attendant, and was resolved to receive no medicines; without, at the same time, being otherwise careless in the use of such means as might avail for his recovery. All means, however, he regarded as useless, having no expectation of being restored to health; and even had he looked on recovery as possible, he received the stroke as an immediate judgment from God, which He alone could remove. So strong was his conviction that death had found him, that although tremblingly afraid to die, he seemed to have ceased from all anxiety to live. But if he was careless of a body which must inevitably perish, he was all the more earnest for his soul which he felt to be incapable of death. In this respect he afforded a proof, that strength of mental desire might easily rise superior to that lethargic disposition to which many of the patients yielded. Another instance of the same kind occurred in the case of a female, who died, if I remember rightly, on the same night. In a state of much weakness, I was surprised, not at the readiness merely, but the eagerness and avidity with which she took the medicines given her. I remarked it to her husband, who had been most regardless of her happiness in health, but nursed her now with ceaseless and unwearied attention, and I shall not soon forget the earnestness of his look, and the emphasis of his voice, when he replied, “She has a strong desire to live.” Whatever may have been the spring of this desire, it served to prove that the working of the mind might triumph over the weakness of the body; and that the indifference to things eternal, so generally manifested, was not attributable to disease. And so it was in the case of the individual before us; there was in him no lethargy, no apathy, no indolence. He trembled from head to foot; the bed shook beneath him. My heart was rent with his lamentable entreaties for supplication on his behalf. He desired me not to pray for his recovery; he seemed afraid lest time should be wasted on such petition,—time, which to him was now too short and too precious, to be spent in asking that which could not be obtained; but earnest were his beseechings to plead for the salvation of his soul. It was just a case in which one could have wished to forget every other call upon compassion, and to have kneeled by his bedside while ebbing life remained, helping him to pray; or to have gone from him only to “weep in secret places,” and plead with the merciful One, if haply his sins might have been forgiven ere his term of grace expired. It was cruel to be torn away, to be forced, by the wants of many others, to tear one’s self from him who was most of all, perhaps alone of all, alive to his own wants. And such our separation literally was. When I rose to bid him a last farewell, he seized my hand in his long bony fingers, and trembling in every limb, besought me not to forget him at a throne of grace; nor would he let me go, till at length with great difficulty I extricated myself from his agonizing grasp.

I had witnessed one of the most affecting scenes that the world presents,—an awakened sinner summoned into judgment; and doubly affecting to me, in the removal of an object of much solicitude, of mingled fear and hope. Had I seen him for the first time, I should probably have regarded him as a child of the kingdom encountering the last enemy under the hiding of his Father’s face, and wounded by such “fiery darts of the wicked One,” as for the moment he could not quench. Or had I learned his character, such as the world would have given it, I should have hoped that, having been a sinner, he was one saved in the eleventh hour, a death-bed penitent. And as it was, I cannot but cherish the persuasion that he may have been saved “yet so as by fire,” and that in the last hour his prayer may have been heard,—his chain have been broken,—his spirit set free. Still, in so far as man could judge, his dying repentance was not different from the many repentances of his life, which themselves “needed to be repented of.” He was indeed shut up as he had never been before; there was no future time into which his thoughts might run in vague resolutions of amendment; life was done, it was all behind, death and judgment were before. So situated, his convictions of sin were more distressing, his fear of punishment more overwhelming, his desire for deliverance more intense. But the effect was simply this, that his mind was more dreadfully distracted than ever, and he could not fix it for a moment on any one object of thought; yet the returning and prevailing emotion seemed to be “a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation.” His life declared that a thorough change of heart required to be wrought; that he had never truly discerned Christ and him crucified, nor trusted in him; that his repentance had been legal and self-righteous. “Sin would not have had dominion over him, if he had been not under the law but under grace.” There was then this great transition to be made; the being born again; the being set free with the liberty of the children of God. His death gave no evidence that such a change had been produced; for any difference discernible between this and his former repentings, he might have risen from that bed the slave of sin as before. There was “no returning of the soul unto quiet rest,” no becoming like a little child, no peace of conscience, no sweet and placid reliance on the Hope of Israel. His soul was still “like the troubled sea which cannot rest;” his sun set in gloomy darkness unbroken by one perceptible streak of light.

In conclusion we subjoin these two remarks:

1. If we were better acquainted with the mental history of men, we should probably find that many supposed death-bed repentances are the mere renewal of similar repentings during life; the fruitless working of minds that are “ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth,” seeking to enter in but never prevailing, because they do not strive. Such a death as that we have just narrated may surely well enforce the exhortation, “Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many will seek to enter in and shall not be able.”

2. We cannot conceive two characters more different, in many respects, than is the one we have now been reviewing, from that described in our last. The one a blasphemer, and dead to every thing like a sense of sin; the other a man who trembled at the Word of God, and was feelingly alive to his guilt. Their dying hours were not less dissimilar; the one closing his eyes on this world with his mouth full of cursing and bitterness, the other, if not in prayer, at least in the attempt to pray. Yet in their lives there appears to have been no vital distinction between them; they both died in a manner remarkably correspondent to the manner in which they had lived; and if in the closing scene there was no thorough change in either, (which yet in the one case we fondly hope may have taken place,) then we must conclude that as the same sun set on both for time, the same habitation received both for eternity. Let the amiable, and conscientious, and in some measure religious, weigh the reflection, that if they have not “passed from death unto life,” and perish in their unbelief, then they must have as their companions for ever, the blasphemers, the unthankful, the unholy, the incontinent, the fierce, the implacable, the unmerciful.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

A Fervent Appeal at the Lord’s Supper.—O all ye inhabitants of the world and dwellers in the earth, come gather yourselves together unto the marriage of the great King. Hear, ye that are afar off, and ye that are near, the Lord proclaimeth salvation to the ends of the earth, the glory of the Lord is to be revealed. Tidings, tidings, O ye captives! Hear, all ye that look for salvation in Israel; behold I bring you tidings of great joy. O, blessed news! the Lord is coming down upon Mount Zion,—not in earthquakes and thunders,—not in fire and burnings,—not in darkness and tempests, but peaceably; the law of kindness is in his mouth; he crieth, “Peace, peace to him that is afar off, and to him that is near.” Behold! how he leapech on the mountains! He hath passed Mount Ebal,—no more wrath or cursing,—he is come to Mount Gerizim to bless; he cometh clothed with flames of love and bowels of compassion, plenteous redemption and multiplied pardons. O, how pregnant is his love! Harken, therefore, unto me, O, ye children; “for behold ye stand all of you this day before the Lord your God; your captains, your elders, your officers, and all the men of Israel, your little ones, your wives, and the stranger that is within thy camp, from the hewer of wood to the drawer of water,”—that you should take hold of this marriage covenant. For I am come this day to deal with you in a very peculiar manner, and am warranted to proclaim and make offer of this marriage to you, and lay the offer before you. I am allowed to be particular with you in this offer and invitation, and to put it home to you and every one of you. Will you, then, man,—will you, woman,—old and young,—parent and child,—master and servant,—rich and poor,—learned and unlearned? All is ready, O, come; I dare not take a nay-say, nor hearken to any shift or delay; it must be now or never. O, then, what shall I answer Him that hath sent me? Surely ye can give no relevant reason why you will not, and, therefore, I can admit of no reply, but “Behold we come.” Will ye then come, or not? Shall I say that you will or that you will not? Ah! shall I go again to God and say, “Thy people now, even on a communion season, a high solemn Sabbath, will have none of thee?" If so, we need go no farther towards this solemnity, else ye will seal a blank, or a lie, or your own damnation. If you give not your consent, ye are held by God to dissent, and, therefore, my whether or not. O, if there be any motion, do not stife it, but allow me in your name to say, "Even so we take Him;" and thus will the contract be closed in your name and his name. Bear witness to this, O, heavens, earth, angels, and saints! But, if after all, ye will not come, then I take witness against you, and call to witness the great God of heaven and earth, the holy angels who surround the throne, yourselves, your consciences, the very stones and timber in this place, and every one of you against another; and do, in the name of God, shake the dust from my feet against you, in witness, that on the 19th day of August, 1783, at a communion in this remote country of Zetland, in the Isle of Fetlar, Christ, and with him all the Covenant of Grace, the marriage covenant, was offered to you all without exception, and ye refused him and all his glory. And if you live and die in that mind, I solemnly charge and summon you to answer for this refusal before his awful tribunal at the Great Day. Bethink yourself, O, refuser and despiiser! many a slight have you put upon Christ, and yet he is loth to take a nay-say. O, is there nobody here, old or young, saying in their soul, "O, include me not in this protest?"—come, then, O, willing soul; we are unwilling to leave you out, and again offer Christ to you. Consider what a husband you have in your offer, what he hath done, and how earnest he is. Consider what a rich bargain, what a full covenant ye are invited unto; and answer me three questions. First, What is your fault to the bridegroom? Second, Where can you make such a bargain? Third, Are you sure of another offer? If not, then take time when time is; and so fear not to come to the table and sit down at the feast, which is noble and excellent. And O, Lord God of my Master, I pray thee send me good speed this day! Eat, O, friend, drink, yea drink abundantly, O, beloved!—Unpublished Sermon of Rev. J. Bonar, Minister of Fetlar.

"Lovest thou Me?"—Difficult as the question may be, it admits of a satisfactory answer. Had it not been so, Jesus would not have put the question. He would not have pushed the matter to a third interrogatory, if he had not known that the disciple could reply in the affirmative without hypocrisy, without his heart condemning him. Nor would he have appointed an ordinance which was intended only for his friends, and enjoined them to observe it, if he had not promised that his Spirit, witnessing with their spirits, should enable them to say with truth in the inward part, "We love him who first loved us." The real friends of Christ may have great doubts of their actual believing, and of the genuineness of their love to him. They are deeply grieved on account of the many evidences which they have given of indifference, and even of enmity to Him. The proofs of their ingratitude, forgetfulness, and unkindness, stare them in the face, and sometimes seal their lips. They complain, and they have good reason to complain, of the coldness of their hearts and the deadness of their affections. But though they cannot say in so many words, "Thou knowest that I love thee," still they can say, "O Lord, the desire of our soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee." And when urged by him, they cannot refrain from crying out, "Lord, I love thee; help thou my want of love." To the question, "Will ye also go away?" they instinctively and resolutely reply, "To whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." And if offered their liberty to leave him, they would cry with the manumitted slave under the law, "I love my master, and I will not go free." "Truly, O Lord, I am thy servant, I am thy servant, and the son of thine handmaid: Thou hast loosed my bonds." And that is love. "But," methinks I hear some hesitating soul reply, "I do not feel that warmth of affection for Christ which is due to him." You cannot; for his love passeth returns, as it passeth knowledge. "But I do not feel that love which others have felt for him, and have had freedom to express." Neither durst Peter speak strongly on this head; and the Saviour graciously dropped the clause in the first question, expressive of the degree of his love, and instead of "Lovest thou me more than these?" simply asked, "Lovest thou me?" * * * Think on what He is, and what He hath done for sinners. Do you not love him? Can you say that you do not? Would you not wish to love him? Can you but love him? Would you not be ashamed of yourself if you did not love him? Is it not your desire and prayer that all should love, honour, and serve him? And have you not such a strong sense of the high obligation which all are under to this exercise, that you can join with the apostle in saying, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema, maran-atha"—accursed of the Lord at his coming?—Dr M'CRIC.

"Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee!"—The translators might have retained the verb have in both members; but in regard of the deceivableness and uncertainty of earthly goods and possessions, they change the verb have, in the first member, into desire in the second,—have in heaven, and desire on earth,—not desire in heaven and have on earth: for in precise truth there is nothing which a religious soul can desire, but she hath it in heaven, and, on the contrary, nothing not to be had, that is, firmly possessed and enjoyed, which she desireth on earth. Heaven is the place of having, the earth of desiring, or craving. When an old man, being asked of his age, answered in the Latin phrase, I have, or reckon fourscore years, a philosopher took him up, and said, "What sayest thou? I have or reckon fourscore years,—just so many hast thou not!" For in numbering the days and years of our life, whose parts are never all come until they are all gone, we usually count upon those years only that are fully past, which therefore, we have not, because they are gone. Even as he that taketh a lease for a term of years, after he has worn them out, has no more terms in his lease; no more may any man be said to have those years good which he hath spent in the lease of his life. Much less may he be said to have those that are not yet come, because they are not, and he is altogether uncertain whether they may be at all, or no. For all that he knows, this day the lease of his life may expire,—this hour his last glass may be running,—at this very moment and point of time, the thread of his life may be cut off. Now if we cannot be said truly to have any part of our time, how can we properly have any part in things temporal? If the lease of our lives, by which we hold all our earthly goods and possessions, be of so uncertain a date, let our lawyers talk ever so much of possessions and estates, of firm conveyances, and perpetuities, and various kinds of tenures, they shall never persuade us that there is any sure hold or any good tenure of any thing, save God and his promises: it is impossible that we should have any estate in things that are altogether unstable. Hereof it seemeth that Abraham was well advised: for though he was an exceeding rich man, yet we read of no purchase made by him, save only of a cave in Macpelah, for him and his heirs to hold, or rather, to hold him and his heirs, for ever. If any man ever knew the just value of all earthly commodities, it was king Solomon, the mirror of wisdom; and yet, after he had weighed them all in the scales of the sanctuary, he found them as light as vanity itself. If all things under the sun are vanity; therefore, the verity of all things is above the same, viz, in heaven.—FEATLY.

SACRED POETRY.

“NOT LOST, BUT GONE BEFORE.”

SAY, why should friendship grieve for those Who safe arrive on Canaan's shore?
Releas'd from all their hurtful foes,
They are not lost—but gone before.

How many painful days on earth
Their fainting spirits number'd o'er!
Now they enjoy a heav'nly birth,
They are not lost—but gone before.

Dear is the spot where Christians sleep,
And sweet the strain which angels pour;
O why should we in anguish weep?
They are not lost—but gone before.

Secure from ev'ry mortal care,
By sin and sorrow vex'd no more;
Eternal happiness they share,
Who are not lost—but gone before.

To Zion's peaceful courts above,
In faith triumphant may we soar,
Embracing, in the arms of love,
The friends not lost—but gone before.

On Jordan's bank whene'er we come,
And hear the swelling waters roar,
Jesus, convey us safely home,
To friends not lost—but gone before!

THE BREAD FROM HEAVEN.

BREAD of the world, in mercy broken!
Wine of the soul, in mercy shed!
By whom the words of life were spoken,
And in whose death, our sins are dead!

Look on the heart, by sorrow broken,
Look on the tears, by sinners shed;
And be thy feast to us the token,
That by thy grace our souls are fed!

MISCELLANEOUS.

Greenland Missionaries.—Soon after the Moravian brethren had commenced their zealous and disinterested labours in Greenland, a number of murderers, excited by the angekoks, or sorcerers, threatened to kill the missionaries, and entered their house for that purpose, at a time when all were absent excepting one, named Matthew Stach. When they arrived, they found him engaged in the work of translation, in which he went on, without showing any marks of fear, though uncertain as to their intention. After they had sat a while, their leader said, “We are come to hear good.” “I am glad of it,” replied the missionary, and silence being obtained, he sang, prayed, and then proceeded: “I will not say much to you of the Creator of all things—you know there is a Creator;”—to this they all assented except one.—“You also know that you are a wicked people.” “Yes!” was the unanimous reply. “Now, then,” resumed the missionary, “I will tell you what is most necessary to know.” He then proceeded to declare the incarnation and death of Jesus; spoke of his resurrection from the dead; and assured them that he would be the final judge of all men. He then solemnly appealed to the leader of the banditti, as to the account he would render of his murders and other crimes at the last day, and entreated him immediately to accept the mercy offered him by the Lord Jesus. After he had done, a woman, whose brother they had murdered, spoke of the efficacy of the Saviour's atonement, told them she felt it, and exhorted them no longer to resist the truth. They heard all this with attention, walked for some time before the house with their hands folded, and towards evening retired, without offering either violence or insult.

Faith in Christ.—The Rev. Dr Simpson was for many years tutor in the college at Hoxton, and while he stood very low in his own esteem, he ranked high in that of others. After a long life spent in the service of Christ, he approached his latter end with holy joy. Among other expressions which indicated his love to the Redeemer, and his interest in the favour of God, he spake with disapprobation of a phrase often used by some pious people, “Venturing on Christ.” “When,” said he, “I consider the infinite dignity and all-sufficiency of Christ, I am ashamed to talk of venturing on him. Oh, had I ten thousand souls, I would, at this moment, cast them all into his hands with the utmost confidence. A few hours before his dissolution, he addressed himself to the last enemy, in a strain like that of the apostle, when he exclaimed, “O death, where is thy sting?” Displaying his characteristic fervour, as though he saw the tyrant approaching, he said, “What art thou? I am not afraid of thee. Thou art a vanquished enemy through the blood of the cross.”

Religious Melancholy.—David Hume observed, “That all the devout persons he had ever met were melancholy.” On which Bishop Horne remarked, “This might very probably be; for, in the first place, it is most likely that he saw very few, his friends and acquaintances being of another sort; and secondly, the sight of him would make a devout man look melancholy at any time.

A Bedfordshire Peasant.—In the parish of the late Rev. L. Richmond, was a dissolute, thoughtless man, who bitterly persecuted religion in those who professed it. He had formed a secret resolution never more to enter the church. Circumstances, however, constrained him to alter his determination. Mr R. preached from Psalm li. 10; “Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me.” Sharper than a two-edged sword is the Word of God; and in its application by the power of the Spirit to this poor man, it proved to be “the hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces.” He confessed, that immediately on his return home, he for the first time fell on his knees, and with crying and tears, poured forth the strong emotions of his heart in the language of the publican, “God be merciful to me a sinner!”

Final Hope.—The Rev. James Durham, when on his death-bed, was for some time under considerable darkness respecting his spiritual state, and said to Mr Carstairs, “After all that I have preached or written, there is but one scripture I can remember, or dare grip: tell me if I dare lay the weight of my salvation upon it; ‘Whosoever cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out.’” Mr Carstairs very properly answered, “You may depend upon it, if you had a thousand salvations at hazard.”

HINTS ON SPIRITUAL DEPRESSION.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MUIR, D. D.,

Minister of St. Stephen's Parish, Edinburgh.

RELIGIOUS Melancholy, as it is usually called, is peculiar to the mind that despairs of obtaining an interest in the divine favour. It is a spiritual malady, afflictive even in its lowest measures. On rising to the higher degrees, it becomes, in the very extreme, grievous. It not only interrupts the common business of life, but destroys the whole spring of laudable enterprise and urgent duty—estranges the heart from the claims, strong as they are tender, of the nearest relationships—and throws a gloomy suspicion over every thing with which the human lot, amid many evils, is still brightened. Under the distorted vision formed by it, there is scarcely an object of contemplation that does not seem revolting: our earth appearing as a prison-house, in which occasional respite from pain is meant to make the after torture the more intense,—the schemes of Providence appearing as a mass of contradiction,—the throne of heaven as the tribunal of vengeance,—the angels as ministers of wrath,—and the world beyond death as a region crowded exclusively with images of terror and anguish. The soul is wounded. “The arrow hath entered, the poison whereof drinketh up the spirit.” Every feeling, every thought is infected. In the feverish excitement of disease, the mind rejects the application of a remedy. The past is a troubled fountain, that gives out only sorrowful remembrances; and no pleasing anticipation mixes with the stream for sweetening its bitterness. The language of the Psalmist: “Will the Lord cast off for ever? Will he be favourable no more? Is his mercy clean gone? Doth his promise fail for ever? Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?” (Psalm lxxvii.)—this language utters those inquiries of the heart, to which the answers returned by itself are negatives of overwhelming harshness.

It is true, that even a little reflection on the language just quoted, (expressing so strongly despair of the divine favour,) will shew that the views which give rise to the mournful inquiries, detract from right notions of the character of God. Suspicions of changeableness in his character, of aversion to save, and exhaustion of mercy, and failure of promises under his government of grace to sinners, are utterly dishonouring to his glory. And this is so readily seen, that the giving way to the sentiments which originate from those views, may immediately be followed by a deep conviction of the unreasonableness and impiety of indulging in them. But even such a conviction, though salutary, serves only, in the case now supposed, to aggravate the distress. The mind is painfully struck with the sinfulness of having cherished and uttered what is so derogatory to the divine honour. While its misery before sprang from unbelief of the mercy of God, there is now an increase of its misery, drawn from the thought of having ever yielded to the suggestions of that unbelief. Assured that the proposal of grace, conveyed by the “promise” of redemption, ought neither to be rejected, nor viewed as dubiously offered to human acceptance, the mind is tempted to look on itself as now most certainly “cast off” from mercy, on account of the guilt of having questioned the truth or the freeness of the mercy. Having first been harassed by agitating doubts, it next finds the cause of new harassment in the remembrance of its sinful doubtings. Nay, the troubles may not cease here. And reflection on this second ground of self-reproach may excite fresh anguish; and thus the malady grows, and the symptoms extend into multiplied sorrows, in consequence of which, the soul, tossed as on a bed of thorns, is denied even a moment's repose.

Happily for the author of the seventy-seventh Psalm, whose despairing language has been quoted, he was enabled to stop this afflictive circling of the thoughts,—though not till after he endured for a season the agitations of spiritual distresses. His attempts to regain peace of mind were not at once successful. He “considered the days of old, and the years of ancient times,” inquiring, it may be, for a parallel to his distresses, or for the methods by which trials similar to his own, had, in the experience of others, been met and relieved. He called “to remembrance his song in the night,” some occasion of personal thanksgiving, from which he might draw the motives to hope and encouragement. And still, though he commended “with his own heart, and his spirit made diligent search," the immediate result of considering the subjects, whatever they were, which passed in review before his mind, is indicated by this despairing lamentation: "Will the Lord cast off for ever? Will he be favourable no more? Is his mercy clean gone? Doth his promise fail for ever? Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?"

In cases of spiritual depression, there are usually afflictions arising from outward causes, which give to the burden that lies upon the mind additional weight and tenacity. In the Psalmist's situation bodily suffering appears to have befallen him; and it was, doubtless, by his regarding the allotment as the token of Divine anger that his soul "refused," under the visitation, "to be comforted." And similar causes have often had the effect of darkening to devout men their contemplation of the favour of God; and that to an extent which, without experience of the fact, no mere speculatist on the subject of Christian assurance can ever apprehend. But still, the general course of things, even in the worst case of spiritual depression, wherever the faith of revealed truth is genuine, is this, that consolation is perseveringly sought at the divine source of peace, and that the result of perseveringly seeking it there, (as the history of the Psalmist clearly shews,) is very blessed. The Psalmist has recorded the fact, that he "cried unto God in the day of trouble, and that God gave ear unto him;" or, in other words, that support in the season of trial, and ultimate deliverance from affliction, came as the answer to prayer. He has recorded another fact, that, in the religious exercises which employed him, and the effects of which were so beneficial and happy, he not only prayed, but meditated on the character, and government, and promises of Jehovah. He "remembered the years of the right hand of the Most High;" or, the annals of the divine doings. Persuaded that "the way of God" is to be seen most clearly "in the sanctuary,"—under the light of those dispensations which affect the Church,—he "remembered the works of the Lord and his wonders of old" to the chosen people. He looked back to their rise in the families of Jacob and "Joseph;" to their "redemption" from bondage by the arm of the Lord, when the waters saw God and were afraid, and "the troubled depths" parting at the divine will, opened a passage for the ransomed;—to the destruction of their enemies, when the thunder and lightning, "the arrows of Jehovah, went abroad, and the earth trembled and shook;"—and to the after journeyings of the redeemed, who were led "like a flock" under the guidance of the shepherd. How clearly does even a transient reference to this history indicate the following truths:—That God is superintending and arranging the events of his people's history with minute and gracious care; that sufferings are not exclusively the signs of his vengeance, since his chosen people suffered; that delays in the fulfilment of his promises, bring no evidence against his faithfulness and unchangeableness, because it was after a long time, such as might have raised the fear of their being cut off, that his chosen people "were redeemed with his outstretched arm;" and that, though adversity be repeated on adversity in a mysterious course of trials, yet this procedure is not incompatible with the fulfilment of a wise and good end; because "the way" through which the Lord led his elect was deep, as "in the sea, and in great waters," while he was still guiding them with the tenderness and beneficence of a good shepherd.

Now the blessed influence both of the Psalmist's meditation and prayer, in restoring to him peace of mind, (the return of which called forth his ardent thanksgiving,) may well intimate, that to speak of Religious Melancholy, meaning thereby that Religion is the cause of the melancholy, is to misapply language. It is true, the opinion prevails, that the whole evil is traceable to that cause. Multitudes in the world connect with the admission of Religion into the mind the thought of nothing but what is gloomy and depressing. And in proof of this, they refer to certain facts which are regarded by them as quite conclusive. Easy it were to shew them, that the native influence of Divine Truth is calculated to produce an effect the very opposite of that which they bewail and reprehend. But they dread to listen to a single statement on the subject. The very listening, they think, would bring them within the reach of contagion, and how wise, they infer, to avoid coming near the malady, or what may infect them with it! The facts, however, by which they defend their opinions and aversion, are drawn from instances where the mind is unhinged either through the prevalence of constitutional bias, or the shock of calamity; and where, coming to Revealed Religion, it carries thither its own morbid sensibility, and thus turns the bread of life into the very aliment of spiritual disease.

It is unreasonable to adduce these facts for the purpose of disparaging the character and real tendency of evangelical faith. Wandering and wretchedness would have been found in such a mind, though it had never heard of the subject that is blamed for the aberration and suffering. Were it to receive the subject as a whole, what a blessing would the reception prove! The tendencies of the mind, if not thoroughly rooted out, would, at least, be corrected and trained. Affections, easily agitated, would be brought nearer to their due place and poise; and thus, the influence of heavenly faith, moving over the dark and troubled elements of nature, would allay its disorders, and compose and beautify it. But the tendencies of the mind in such an instance as has now been described, urge it to take partial views of Religion. Through timidity, the promises of the Bible are put out of sight, as what cannot, without sinful presumption, be looked at, while the threatenings alone are admitted and felt. God is revealed in the Bible under the engaging characters of Father, Saviour, Protector, and Friend; clothed in every perfection, in goodness, as well as might; in pity and mercy, as well as rectitude and justice; in unspeakable condescension, as well as unspeakable glory. But in the case now supposed, he is seen only as the judge and avenger, girt about with majesty and power, and the terrors of awful sovereignty. The soul, traversing back in fearful thought into the abyss whence time issued, contemplates the Supreme Dispenser of events fixing the human destinies. It attaches itself to the mysterious contemplation. Instead of encouragement, it draws thence only what overwhelms its hopes. It thinks only of the deed of reprobation, and it "refuseth to be comforted," because "the mercies of God" seem to be "clean gone."

This representation, instead of being imaginary, may recal the well-known history of a psalmist in our own Israel, who passed through the whole bitterness of the experience. His frame of mind was similar to what has now been described, timid, gentle, and peculiarly sensitive. He was, indeed, ardent at the same time with the fire of genius. He was a Christian poet. He dignified every thing he sung, even the humblest task, as with the touch of a seraph's piety. He celebrated truth, and "hope, and charity," in numbers that are fitted to win the ear of infidelity, to chase away the gloom of despondency, and make the heart of selfishness relent. And his effusions, equally instructive and delightful, shall flow in human remembrance as some of the streams sent for nourishing the plants which our earth shall borrow from Paradise. Yet, how long did this poet of the Gospel "refuse" to taste the "comfort" of Religion! The peculiar cast of his mind predisposed him to despair of the divine favour. Led by constitutional bias, he separated, in the great subject, the solemn from the attractive, the alarming from the encouraging portions of it. The attributes of divine power, justice, and sovereignty—the eternal decrees—reprobation and everlasting death, were the chief themes on which he dwelt. Thus, he "remembered God, and was troubled."

This striking, and to us peculiarly interesting exemplification of what is usually called Religious Melancholy, is mentioned here, both because it appears to prove that the mind liable to the disease is of the frame just described, and because, more particularly, this very instance has often been quoted in charging Religion with the cause of the whole evil. But how unreasonable is such a charge! The mind of Cowper the poet felt not the harmony, and perceived not the beautiful proportions of the faith, simply because it was itself untuned, because its own vision was dimmed and distorted. Besides, when arguing on the tendency of Religion, from the circumstances of his life, is it just to adduce only a part of his history? If those who triumphantly point to the life of Cowper, as supplying confirmation to their unfavourable opinion of evangelical truth, would examine his own testimony, they should learn that his experience coincided with that of the Psalmist. There were, first of all, causes in his own situation predisposing him to depression and sadness. With him, besides, it was not Religion, but the want of right views of its truths, that aggravated his distress. And as, at last, he received healing to his wound, and alleviation to his load, the cure was obtained when he came to the Physician of Souls; the loosening of the burden took place when he drew nigh to the cross of Christ. In short, the precious system of evangelical truth, which wicked or thoughtless men calumniate as the cause of nothing but melancholy, was that alone which yielded to our interesting poet, even as it did to the Psalmist of Israel, the sweetest consolation.

Hence we deduce the following plain but useful lessons,—That Religion can never be viewed as the cause of mental distress, any more than the light of heaven, rendering objects visible, may be regarded as occasioning those wrong apprehensions of them which are generated by the diseased eye:—That since false or partial perceptions of Religion lead to the evil complained of, the desire and endeavour should be earnestly turned for obtaining enlarged and correct views of its truths:—That, when wounded by the Divine hand, it is from the Divine hand we are to seek the cure:—That only an accumulation of sorrows is produced by resisting the stroke of chastisement, and quenching the serious thoughts excited by it:—That though the "remembering God" be at first the source of "trouble," we are to persevere in "acquainting ourselves with Him" as the way to "peace;"—and that prayer, earnest and importunate prayer to the Saviour, who sympathises, however the answer be deferred, is to be continued in, as the great means of comfort under affliction, and ultimately of deliverance from sorrow.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE LATE

REV. JAMES MARTIN, A. M.,

Minister of St. George's Parish, Edinburgh.

THE memory of "the saintly and apostolic Martin," as he has been truly termed, lives in the hearts of multitudes. His career was short, but it was truly brilliant; and in reference to no individual, perhaps, could the saying of the poet be more appropriately quoted,—

"That life is long which answers life's great end."

He has passed from amongst us, but we dwell with a kind of melancholy satisfaction upon the recollection of one who possessed a rare combination of intellectual and moral excellencies, such as led all who knew him at once to admire and love him. With high talent he possessed an amiable and affectionate heart. To delineate his character is both a delicate and difficult task, but one which, for the sake of our readers, we gladly undertake, that possibly, by a view of his varied Christian graces, they may be led to "be followers of him, even as he," with such beautiful consistency of character, "was a follower of Christ."

James Martin was born at Brechin, on the 30th July, 1800. At school he soon became conspicuous among his companions by his abilities, his diligence and perseverance; and such was the rapidity of his improvement, that at the early age of twelve, he entered Marischal College, Aberdeen, and even ventured to compete for one of the bursaries. During the whole course of his attendance at the University, he dedicated himself with unwearied assiduity to the varied departments of knowledge which successively engaged his attention. His classical acquirements were of a high order. In mathematics and philosophy also he made great progress. But when at length he had resolved on preparing for the Church, he entered upon the study of theology with redoubled energy. And the fruits of such exertion were apparent in his after life; for he was regarded by all his acquaintances as an accomplished scholar and an enlightened divine. It is pleasing to notice, that while employed in the prosecution of theology as a science, he appears to have been deeply impressed with the necessity of attaining a personal experience of the truths which he hoped to proclaim to his fellow-men. In proof of this, we may quote from the interesting Memoir prefixed to the published volume of his Sermons,* a memorandum written at the close of the college session of 1818.

"The session, now nearly completed, has flown swiftly, swiftly away. I hope, however, by the blessing of God, it has not been spent trivially or unprofitably. My studies have been pretty regular and constant. They have been on the three great heads of Revealed Religion,—the Trinity, the Decrees of God, and Original Sin. They have also included a considerable share of Church History. My spirit has, in general, and particularly when alone, been inclined to the sombre. I have mixed but little in society, yet I am surely inclined to it. My heart participates in the happiness of my fellow-creatures, and pants to increase it to the utmost,—I love to see them happy.

"Yet I have often thought that I could see through the veil that envelopes my present state, and that God was dealing with me in love,—that he was shewing me the vanity of the world,—weaning me from its enjoyments, and teaching me to lay up for myself treasures in heaven. I have often found comfort,—might I say instruction?—in the idea, that one day on earth I shall be a child of God, and that I shall see the value of his present dealings, as preparatory steps for an important change."

Towards the close of this year, he became tutor in the family of Mr Ogilvy of Tannadice, within a few miles of his native place. In this situation he continued for several years, in the course of which he was licensed to preach the Gospel by the Presbytery of Forfar. His first sermon was preached at Oathlaw, from the words, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ;" and his views on that occasion, are recorded in a single sentence in his note-book. "I have to lament much imperfection; but I hope I have also some right wishes, and that I sincerely lament my own sinfulness, and sincerely confess my need of God's grace."

The winter of 1821, 1822, Mr Martin passed in Edinburgh, with Mr Ogilvy's family; and at this time he enjoyed a privilege which he valued highly,—an opportunity of regularly attending the ministry of the Rev. Dr Gordon, then minister of St. Cuthbert's Chapel; "whose character and example," as his biographer remarks, "no less than his public ministrations, appear to have given greater depth to all his religious sentiments, to have filled his mind with a stronger sense of the high and honourable nature, as well as the solemn responsibility of the ministerial office, and to have set him forward in his course, more intensely alive to the importance which attaches to the spiritual interests of immortal beings, and more deeply impressed with the magnitude of his own duties."

On the 8th of April 1823, Mr Martin received a presentation to the Church and Parish of Glenisla, in the Presbytery of Meigle, and was ordained on the September following. The deep impression of divine things which his mind had received during his residence in Edinburgh, prepared him the more effectually for entering upon the important duties of a parish minister. He felt that he was now called to occupy the responsible situation of an ambassador of Christ, and his earnest desire and prayer, therefore, was, that he might be enabled so to watch for souls as one who must give an account. Settled in a remote parish among the Grampians, as the pastor of a simple-hearted, affectionate people, Mr Martin spared no exertions to promote the spiritual interests of those committed to his charge. He laboured in season and out of season; and the fond recollections of the parishioners of Glenisla still dwell upon the faithful devotedness of their youthful minister to the work of his Great Lord and Redeemer. The beneficial effects arising from his ministry in Glenisla are thus briefly, but appropriately, described by his biographer:—

"They were unsophisticated, and he was sincere, faithful, and judicious; and without compromising one principle, far less winking at any sinful practice, he commended himself to their respect and esteem, as one who had their real interests deeply at heart, and the primary object of whose life and labours was to do them good. Suiting his ministrations and intercourse to their real character and circumstances, with that tact, discrimination, and kindness of nature, which he so eminently possessed; being regular and diligent in his course of visiting and catechising, in the superintendence of Sabbath-schools, in his attention to the sick, and in waiting by the bedside of the dying; and particularly affectionate and encouraging in his admonitions to the young to seek after God,—every one of his flock, who was not utterly improbate, came experimentally to know the value of possessing such a pastor,—a course of conduct, which uniformly operates with the same effect upon a simple-hearted people, and gains the homage even of those who may not be permanently benefited by it in their most important interests. There were two practices prevalent in the parish of Glenisla at the time when he became connected with it, which he felt had a most demoralizing effect on the minds and habits of the people, as they ever must have. The one was the encouragement given to illicit distillation; and the other, the mode in which funerals were conducted, involving a great waste of time and substance, and tending to induce or to confirm habits of dissipation. Convinced that the moral influence of truth, the enlightening and quickening of the conscience, and the solemn considerations which Religion alone presents, when brought to bear upon a community, through the agency of a minister whose motives are properly understood and appreciated, are far more effectual than any prohibitory denunciations or sumptuary laws, he set himself with vigour to the removal of these evils. A complete extinction of them could not indeed be expected to be the immediate result of his anxiety and efforts; yet, in this, his wisdom and decision were far from being fruitless. And before his connection with the parish was dissolved, he had the satisfaction of knowing, that not only the habits of many had undergone a perceptible improvement, and the duty of family-worship was more regularly observed, but that some were brought in good earnest under the power of godliness; while the occasional opposition and resistance that he experienced from the enemies of all religion, only served, as it will ever do, with minds of a similar mould, to stimulate him to redoubled zeal in his own appropriate work."

The tie which connects a pastor to his flock is intimate and endearing; but more especially in remote rural parishes. In such districts, where the minds of the people are yet simple and uncontaminated, the minister is regarded as their father, counsellor and guide. This was remarkably the case with Mr Martin during his incumbency at Glenisla. The parishioners at once respected, admired and loved him; and when at last they were called upon to part with one who, in the faithful discharge of his duties, had gained their confidence and esteem, they mourned as for the loss of a beloved relation.

In the year 1828, Mr Martin was unanimously chosen by the kirk-session of St. Cuthbert's to be minister of Stockbridge Chapel, Edinburgh. It was not without reluctance and painful regret, that the offer was accepted. The pastor of Glenisla had firmly established himself in the affections of his flock; and to break asunder for ever a relation so tender, was to his amiable and feeling heart peculiarly trying. But it was sufficient to him that such was the will of his Master. He acceded to the call, and entered upon his charge at Edinburgh, with a simple dependence upon the strength of the Almighty. The text from which he first addressed his people in Stockbridge Chapel was beautifully expressive of his feeling,—“I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling.”

A brief view of the result of Mr Martin's exertions in the extensive and interesting field in which he was now called to labour, will be best given in the words of his biographer, who appears well fitted both to understand and to appreciate the efforts of a faithful pastor.

“He was not long settled at Stockbridge, until the mode of his preaching, and his whole character, laid a powerful arrest on the minds of his congregation. At first he shewed a considerable degree of reserve, arising from the natural unobtrusiveness of his disposition,—that delicacy which made him instinctively retreat from every degree of observation which was not required by his real duties,—and from his antipathy to every thing like display, or to be made the object of a merely ceremonious deference, or of that bustling attention which is so often paid to those who are invested with the clerical office. But after the lapse of a short time, by his uniformly calm and dignified demeanour, he commanded the respect of every one who had occasion to observe him, and was regarded as a man of lofty integrity and independence of mind, as well as truly a man of God. There was a quickness and discernment, as well as a solemnity and impressiveness, accompanying all his intercourse with his people, which went beforehand, as it were, to gain an entrance to the mind for every thing he said; whilst his pulpit-discourses, ere long, discovered to those who attended to them, distinct traces of much thought and scriptural study, and were delivered with so much sincerity and simplicity, as made almost every one feel how much he ought to be interested in the truths to which he listened, seeing that the preacher was himself so earnest in inculcating them.

“No one who attentively followed the course of his public services could avoid observing the successive steps of his improvement in the true art of preaching. He gradually threw off every thing that was juvenile, either in matter or manner,—he cast away all inflated expressions, all mere ornament in the illustration of his subjects; he dealt but sparingly in imaginative description, and not at all in mere generalizing or empty declamation. Textuality, he often said, appeared to him to be one of the chief excellencies of a sermon,—the bringing out by deep, and patient, and prayerful research, what was the mind of the Divine Spirit in the Word,—and, after having exhibited it in all its meaning and force, pressing it home on the understandings and consciences of men. He was always afraid of being guilty, and of being thought even capable, of giving fanciful interpretations or adaptations of Scripture. If, in the course of his illustration, he met with any striking truth, any important principle, or ascertained fact, in verification of which he could appeal to something which was obvious and undeniable in the experience or consciences of his hearers, upon this he seized, and, as if anxious to render it the prominent point on which their minds should rest, and that it should become a permanent element in their reflections, or interweave itself, as it were, with the hidden workings of each individual bosom, he recalled it again and again in the course of the application of his subject.

“This it was, and nothing merely adventitious or external, which formed the chief ingredient in his mode of preaching, and rendered it so interesting to those in whose hearts he succeeded in touching those chords that were in unison with the feelings of his own; which, indeed, is the true secret of the success of any public speaker. Founding his arguments upon ascertained facts or acknowledged truths, and referring to something in his hearers with which these correspond, and of which they themselves are intimately conscious, he finds access at once to the seat of conviction and the springs of conduct. By telling aloud all that is in their hearts, he makes them feel as if he not only had been privy to their thoughts, but had been the witness of certain processes in their minds of which they themselves had hardly been aware, but which are now vividly recalled: they wonder, perhaps, how this man comes to know so much of their secret character, or how, at least, they had never heard these things brought home to them before. And hence, in cases where there is guilelessness and honesty, the preacher comes insensibly to be intrenched in their affections as if he were a bosom-friend. If any one, therefore, is desirous of knowing what it was that rendered Mr Martin's preaching so interesting to those who regularly waited on his ministry, and to whom it was blessed to be so useful, it may be said, that, along with the humble and dependent spirit in which the whole was done, and which gave to all his studies and discourses their appropriate character, it consisted in nothing more than this,—after drawing forth what is in the Word of God, and then what is to be found in the depths of the human heart, making the one of these, in some penetrating, instructive, or consolatory way, as the case might require, to bear upon the other. With this remark, however, it is necessary prominently to conjoin another,—that one of the uniform characteristics of his preaching, was to be found in the strictly evangelical strain by which it was pervaded. His own mind being conclusively arrested by the great doctrines of the Cross, and his heart moving invariably under the influence of an overflowing sense of redeeming love, he was constrained, by the moral impulse of the new nature which was strengthening and maturing within him, habitually to present and to enforce upon others, that which was both the food and the cordial of his own spiritual being. And this being done in perfect keeping with good taste and propriety, and with the classical and academic style of his whole mind and character, the manner and outward form of it, at least, could give no offence to the most refined or cultivated hearer.

“There was one circumstance, with regard to his sermons, which sometimes pressed upon his mind,—the solemn apprehension which he felt, of speaking in certain cases above the range of his own experience. He often remarked, that surely this thought must be harassing to every good man; and that it seemed a very awful thing for a servant of God to be proclaiming truths in which he himself did not fully and perfectly sympathize, or representing the various features in the character of true believers, the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, and the deep exercises which occur in the hearts of Christians, far beyond what he has ever found to be true in his own case. In like manner, after having been called into some scenes of heavy affliction, he frequently observed, that he was afraid he was unfit to be a minister of comfort, seeing he himself had never known the depth of any such sorrow. Whilst there is something both very quickening and affecting in these thoughts, they must be considered as affording no equivocal proof of the tenderness and humility of the mind in which they dwelt; and it is nevertheless most true, that one reason why Mr Martin's discourses in public, as well as his exhortations in private, were so impressive to those who heard them, is to be found in the fact, that they came to their hearts as being evidently the result of his own practical knowledge, and the real transcript of his own feelings."

The public ministrations of the sanctuary, conducted in the manner thus described, could not fail to be attended, under the blessing of the Spirit, with the happiest effects. But it was not in the pulpit alone that Mr Martin's pastoral fidelity and Christian worth were apparent.

"In the performance of the more private or domestic duties of a clergyman, he was not less exemplary. The visiting of his congregation, and especially the families of the poor, was performed with the most untiring constancy, and nothing was allowed to interfere with the discharge of this part of his work. It was seldom possible to prevail on him to enjoy a single day's relaxation, let the occasion be ever so inviting; and that never, if the case of any one of his people was at all pressing on his mind, to whom his visits might prove of the smallest comfort or advantage. In dealing with those in the lower ranks of life, his kind, yet dignified manner immediately gained their confidence and respect. They never could recognise ought in him but the clergyman, and the clergyman in no other light than that of their real friend. His remarkable tact in this department of duty exemplified how possible it is for a wise and good man to win his way to the affections even of the most insensible and vulgar, when he comes to them with a single-minded concern for their spiritual interests; for there is, in the very roughest form of human nature, something which commends a sustained course of kind and judicious dealing, first to the attention, and gradually to the heart. Although there was occasionally a boldness in his reproofs, and a fidelity in his exhortations, amounting almost to sternness, yet there was not an individual among the many for whose good he thus privately watched and laboured, who did not feel the strongest reverence for his character, and very few who did not entertain towards him a kindlier sentiment. In addition to his course of domestic visitation at Stockbridge, he established a Home-mission in the district, with two agents to conduct it, the fund for maintaining which was, to a large extent, supplied by himself, and he frequently preached in the stations during the week. He had also meetings throughout the year for the different classes of the young persons of his congregation, and for those who sought admission, or who had been admitted to the Lord's Table. These occasions were very solemn and impressive; to them, there is reason to think, that not a few can look back with peculiar interest as the period of their first deep impressions of religion; and among the most valued articles in the repositories of some of these individuals, there may perhaps be found the notes of the instructions which then, as well as in public, they received from the lips of their faithful and humble-minded pastor."

Such faithfulness and unwearied perseverance in the fulfilment of his ministerial duties, were not long in drawing forth from the Christian community, the strongest mark of their approbation and esteem. Upon the decease of Dr Thomson, Mr Martin was selected to occupy the pulpit of that distinguished individual. To one who entertained such lowly views of himself, the nomination was startling. He felt, however, that he would not be justified in refusing to accept the call to St George's Church, knowing, as he did, that in the work of Christ, no man is permitted to shrink from duty, under a sense of his own weakness, but the more such a feeling weighs down the spirit, just so much the more room is there for the exercise of that faith, which can realize the Christian firmness and heroism of the Apostles when he said, "through Christ strengthening me, I can do all things."

He was admitted minister of St George's on the 6th October 1831, and entered upon his new sphere of exertion "with a mind," to use the words of his biographer, "at once modest and courageous,—diffident, yet resolved." His present charge differed, in many important particulars, from that which he had recently left; its duties were more varied, and much more arduous. But, proceeding in the strength of the Lord, he was enabled to walk in the steps of his illustrious predecessor, and thus to endear himself to all classes of his parishioners. At length, so great was the confidence reposed in Mr Martin, that he was solicited to take upon him, in addition to his other labours, those of Secretary to the Bible Society, an office which had also become vacant by the death of Dr Thomson. The duties which devolved upon him, in consequence of his acceptance of this truly honourable situation, were such as well accorded with the high-toned religious feeling of his mind. It was, in his estimation, an exalted privilege to be the instrument of disseminating the pure Word of God throughout the World; and the fine Christian spirit which pervaded his speech at the annual meeting of the Society in 1832, encouraged all who heard it, to hope that the mantle of the late honoured Secretary had descended upon his successor.

Mysterious, however, and inscrutable, are the ways of God. He who now stood forth in one of the proudest positions which a Christian could wish to occupy, was destined, ere long, to be cut down in the midst of his usefulness. Not more than a year had elapsed, from the date of his promotion to St George's Church, when some very alarming symptoms in the state of his health began to make their appearance; and on the 28th September he was suddenly seized with a violent discharge of blood, apparently from his lungs.

"This occurrence, though, from the feelings which he had experienced for several days, it did not appear very much to surprise him, yet awakened the greatest apprehensions as to its consequences. He was as calm, however, and composed, as if nothing extraordinary had happened. Being placed in an upright posture, and required not to make the least exertion, or to speak, he presented the very picture of patience and submission. To one of his friends who came to him soon after this attack, he beckoned with a smile of complacency for a slate which he had provided in order to communicate with those around him, and, in allusion to his own circumstances, and with reference to a passage on the subject of faith, in one of Traill's sermons, on which they had been some days before conversing, he wrote down these words:—"When the wearied traveller is unable to proceed a step farther, he can yet lie down when he is bidden,—this is faith."

In the course of a few weeks Mr Martin recovered from this attack, at least so far as partially to resume his duties. By the kindness of his clerical brethren, who frequently officiated for him, and the tender sympathy of his congregation, his mind was considerably relieved from the anxiety which would otherwise have oppressed him. His bodily weakness, however, still continued, and, at length, having engaged an assistant, he retired, for a time, to Rothsay, where his health considerably improved. But his recovery was merely temporary, and after a short period, his former disease returned, though with diminished violence. His medical friends now strongly advised him to try a change of climate, recommending particularly that he should spend the winter at Nice.

It was with no small reluctance that Mr Martin was prevailed upon, at length, to assent to this proposal. But the tender sensibilities, the amiable feelings of the man, yielded to the resignation of the Christian. It was the will of his heavenly Father, and to that will he felt it to be at once his duty and his privilege to bow. After having made the necessary arrangements, therefore, for the supply of service in his church and parish, he left Edinburgh on the 28th September 1833.

At Nice, he remained three months, during which, he was able to ride out every day; and in addition to the enjoyment which he derived from the beautiful scenery in the neighbourhood, his mind was refreshed by the delightful intercourse which he had with some Christian friends who happened to be residing in the town. As descriptive of his feelings at this time, we may quote the following passage from his journal:

"I am just as happy as I could be at such a distance from my field of duty, and most thankful for past and present mercies. The Sabbath is the day when I feel my exile most. Last Sabbath, and during the psalmody, when some note was struck that brought my own dear flock before me, I do confess that I wept bitterly in the chapel, and could hardly get myself composed again. Surely I have been most self-willed and rebellious, when no less severe and bitter a chastisement than this would reclaim me!"—"To-day I went to the Protestant Chapel built by Lady Olivia Sparrow, and after service visited the little cemetery. It contained the tombs of several of whom I had heard, and of Lady Maxwell, one of the last, who has left a sweet savour of piety and charity behind her at Nice. A mournful place this little burying-ground is! Why it should be more so than any other burial-ground is not very clear to reason or to faith; and yet it is one of the last feelings with which a man parts, the desire of mingling his dust with those of his kindred; though the poet has truly said, that a man can have only one country, but he may anywhere find a grave."

In a similar state of calm, almost pleasing, melancholy, he seems to have penned the following remarks one Sabbath, when at Rome.

"I have been falling off ever since I came to Rome, and now find myself so weak that I can hardly walk.

This new affliction is very trying, especially at the time on which my friends had built so much. Yet I bless God, though I have never been worse than I am now, since my first illness, when I was very differently situated, that I feel no disposition to question the wisdom and goodness which run through this dispensation. Sometimes there was a shrinking from suffering, and a wish that all were soon over, rather than have many such conflicts to meet; but generally my mind has reposed upon God, as the present help in time of trouble, and left all consequences to him. I cannot forget the total freedom I have enjoyed from all anxiety about my journey homewards, or how I shall be able to travel. I mention this, as so contrary to my natural disposition, which is so anxious. I hope it is not indifference or recklessness, but springs from confidence in God, who will order all things aright. O how small a matter it is where one dies, if he dies in the Lord, and falls asleep in Jesus!"

While at Rome his health was gradually declining, and he became anxious to set out, with the design, if possible, of reaching home. He had proceeded no farther than Leghorn, however, when he was compelled to stop. He arrived at that town in a very exhausted state, and took up his residence in the San Marco Hotel, kept by Mr and Mrs Thomson, both natives of Scotland. It is rather a curious circumstance, that in passing a night at this house, on his way to Rome, he expressed a wish, that, if it was the Divine will that he should not return to his native country, he might be permitted to die in that inn. And that was the very place, where, amid the affectionate kindness of Christian friends, this devoted servant of Christ ended his days. The following passages from the letters of Mr Hare, the English clergyman at Leghorn, and of Mr and Mrs Thomson, of the hotel, are furnished by the biographer, as presenting a few particulars of the closing scene.

"Mr Hare writes,—'The decisive change did not take place until the 20th, when the physician who attended him apprised me of his approaching dissolution. From that time, the progress of his disease was rapid; but it was unattended by bodily suffering, and he retained his faculties to the end. On Thursday he breathed his last, without a groan or a struggle. I was not present, but Mr and Mrs Thomson were with him. As soon as they saw his end approaching, they thought of sending for me; but before they could do so, he was no more. I used to visit him every day,—sometimes two or three times in the day,—but he was not able to converse much, and could not hear me do more than read a few verses of the Bible, or make some observations, and pray. He seemed free from pain during his stay here,—even his cough was not very troublesome. He was perfectly peaceful, and appeared earnestly to desire to depart. It will be a satisfaction to know that every attention was paid him, not only by the people of the hotel, but also by many of our fellow-countrymen, who felt a deep interest in him. I can fully sympathize in the heartfelt sorrow into which this sad event must plunge the many friends of my dear departed brother. The loss is, indeed, of no common magnitude, both to them and the Church of God. But it ought to be a great assuagement to the bitterness of their grief, that he over whom they mourn, has but made a transition from a scene of much tribulation to a state of untroubled rest and unclouded felicity; and that he is separated from them by a very slight, and, it may be, a very temporary partition.'

"On the Sabbath morning,' says Mr Thomson, in a letter to Mr Colclough, 'I drew his attention to the serenity of the atmosphere. 'Yes,' said he, 'this is the day which the Lord made,—you are to have the communion to-day,—“I was glad when they said unto me, Go ye up unto the house of God,”—will you come back and tell me what you have heard?—I did so, but found him unable to attend.

“About three hours before his death, on awaking, he found me leaning on his bed, made an effort to get out his hand, and said, with a most pleasing countenance, ‘How kind this is!’ I went in again about three o’clock, when he requested me to read a portion of Scripture. I read the 14th chapter of John,—when at the last verse, he made a motion for me to stop, and then fell asleep. In a few minutes, he started hastily, and said, with a strong voice, ‘What is meant by a free port? my reason for asking is, that I wish to import a hundred Bibles here.’ These were his last words. About five, I found him dying, took him by the hand, and felt the last feeble pulse. His spirit left its earthly habitation at a quarter after five o’clock.”

“In another letter, to Mrs Ogilvy, Mr Martin’s sister, Mrs Thomson adds,—‘On our first sight of him, when he was on his way to Rome, our affections were drawn to him,—there was something so expressive in his countenance. He was only one night with us, and in the evening joined us in family worship; he was unable to read or explain any part of the Scriptures, but gave us a most excellent prayer. On his return from Rome, he was unfit for any fatigue; so we had not the pleasure of hearing him again. He did not like to see many people, but rather to be alone, to commune with his God; he had great faith, and said that Christ was all in all. His favourite Psalm was the thirty-ninth. He told us how mercifully the Lord had dealt with him, and that his parishioners were so kind and affectionate, and so unwilling to let him give up his church. Dear man! I do not wonder they were much attached to him,—he was so noble-minded, pious, amiable, modest, grateful, and afraid to give trouble. He said very frequently,—‘What reason have I to be thankful that I suffer so very little pain;’ and his death was a very happy one,—just as if he had gone to sleep,—so very calm.”

DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. JAMES MARTIN, A. M.,
Minister of St. George’s Parish, Edinburgh.

“Knowing therefore the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men.”—2 COR. V. 11.

THERE are not a few that object to the mode which the Apostle here adopts to lead men to seek after, and to embrace the truth as it is in Jesus. It has been often said on this point, that such representations of divine truth are more likely to harden men in sin than to persuade them to relinquish it; that they are calculated to convey unfavourable views of Religion, especially to young minds; that men are apt from this, to regard it as an unwilling bondage instead of a service in which the affections are to be engaged; and not a few would resent it as savouring of an uncharitable spirit, were you to speak to them of the terrors of the Lord, as if they required to be dealt with as men who were void of any reverence for God or spiritual things. It would be idle to say that there has never been any room for these objections, or that the terrors of the Lord have never been so injudiciously set forth, as to cause needless offence at the truth. Whenever they have been made the sole topic of address, or almost the single one,—whenever they have been dwelt upon in such a way as that their subsidiary character as a means of persuading men to flee from the wrath to come, has been forgotten,—or whenever the minister of Jesus Christ has appeared rather a minister of the law than of the Gospel, such objections as these may be well founded. It may be questioned, however, whether the evil that has ever resulted from this, be at all equal to that which has resulted from an unworthy and sinful concealment of the terrors of the Lord, or whether the danger of offending, by setting forth the fearful misery which shall overtake sinners if they continue impenitent and unbelieving, can ever be so great as that of permitting them to remain undisturbed in their sin for want of faithful and solemn warning of the consequences in which sin must involve them? It is not natural for any of us, certainly, to entertain hard thoughts of our own condition: there is always enough of self-love in every man to make him think and hope well of himself: there are innumerable devices by which we are ever contriving to lull our conscience asleep, and under the influence of which, we are led to apply to ourselves a very different rule of judgment from that which we apply to others; and the man, perhaps, lives not, however far he may be from God and his righteousness, who has not some palliative for his own fears and misgivings, and who cannot say to himself, “Peace, peace, though there be no peace.” And I know no way in which this disposition, so ruinous to all true and lasting peace, can be broken in upon, except by a faithful exhibition of the terrors of the Lord: by endeavouring to expose the delusions with which men are blinded, and make them alive to the danger and misery of continuing in them; and, by alarming their fears and wounding their self-interest, to drive them from those refuges to which they are so ready to betake themselves, and which will be found at last only refuges of lies. It is very true, that all this will not make men religious, and that so long as they are moved to forsake their sins, or to obey the law of God, merely from terror, or from the dread of punishment, they want the spiritual principle of all true obedience. It is necessary before their hearts ever can be right toward God, that they should serve him from a principle of love and affection, and this principle no terrors can ever infuse into their minds—such a principle as this must come, not from the law, but from the Gospel. But still, though it is not enough for the salvation of any man, that you speak to him of the terrors of the Lord, it may be a means, and that a powerful one, of awakening his mind to the truth which can save him; by rousing his fears, it may lead him to look out for a place of security from the coming desolation; and the experience of thousands who may be at this moment rejoicing in the light and comfort of the Gospel, and who may know the “love of God shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Spirit,” can testify, that the thing which led to all their peace, and joy, and new obedience, was some faithful discovery of the terrors of the Lord urging them "to flee from the wrath to come, and to lay hold of the hope set before them in the Gospel." As for those who are ready to represent such a mode of address as unnecessary, as well as uncharitable, the question with them may be brought to a very short and speedy issue. If you are satisfied on good grounds that your condition is safe, and that you need not be alarmed for the misery that is to overtake the ungodly, what injury can it do you, to hear that misery faithfully exposed? If you need not fear it, and if you feel that you have escaped it, then, the more it is insisted on, the more will it awaken your gratitude to him to whom you owe your deliverance, and awaken your compassion more freely for those who are yet exposed to it. If, on the other hand, you have a suspicion that things are not right with you—if you have fears at times, not indistinct, that were you weighed in the balance of the sanctuary you would be found wanting, and if the apprehension of having these fears awakened, and being thereby necessitated to look more narrowly into your spiritual condition, is the ground of your dislike to us when we preach the terrors of the Lord, does not this very circumstance shew the importance of inquiry on your part, and on ours, the importance of employing every means which can urge you to it? And thus the very reason which many give for letting alone the subject altogether, is the very reason for pressing it upon your attention—the very reason why, instead of but casually adverting to it, we should bring it at times fully before you; in other words, why, "knowing the terrors of the Lord, we seek to persuade men."

I am aware, however, that independently of those who object to the preaching of the terrors of the Lord altogether, there are others who would cast it aside on somewhat different grounds. They have, and can have, no objection to men being faithfully told their true condition, and the dangers of a state of sin and unbelief, nor would they, for any of the reasons now stated, have us to let this alone; but, as they apprehend it, the efficacy of this truth is a means for convincing and converting sinners, far inferior to that of other truths equally revealed in the Word of God; and they would rather sink this truth in the view of those which, as they apprehend, are likely to be more prevailing. Aware that the exhibition of the terrors of the Lord will never of itself turn men from the love of sin, and having some foolish fears that men may contract false views of the divine character, from hearing God's hatred of sin, and the punishment with which iniquity shall be visited, enlarged upon, the great and almost single topic on which they would have us dwell, is the love of God. To give them such views of this attribute, as would make them think and believe of God, as though he were all love and compassion to them as sinners, constitutes, as they think, all that is necessary to the exhibition of the Gospel; nor do they hesitate to say, that such a view of the Godhead is the only means necessary, or fit, for turning men to the practice of all righteousness. We might reasonably ask those, however, who entertain such sentiments, how they can properly conceive of, or estimate, the love of God, if they be destitute of right views of his just indignation against iniquity, and whether it does not argue ignorance of human nature besides, to suppose that such a view of the divine character is that which needs most to be inculcated upon men, if they would turn unto God? As we have been accustomed to view the love of God to sinners by Jesus Christ, the only way in which we have any representation of the love of God to sinful men at all, we have always understood that the circumstance which gives that love its chief attraction, and ought to commend it most of all to our minds is, that such was the holiness and purity of the divine nature,—such the hatred which God bears to sin, and such the unchangeableness of those threatenings which he hath denounced against it, that when he purposed to "seek and to save that which was lost," no less a sacrifice than that of his own Son was required, in order that this salvation might be consistent with the truth of his declarations against sin, and his determination to punish it; that, in his sacrifice and death, "righteousness and peace met together," and that the chiefest glory of that grace which now comes accredited and sealed to us, is, that it is in perfect harmony with every perfection of rectitude, and purity, and truth, which the principles of our own hearts, as well as the testimony of the Bible, leads us to attribute to God.

If this be the view of the love of God as revealed to us in Christ Jesus, and that it is so, we might appeal to every page of the New Testament, it might be asked, how, or in what way, you can rightly conceive of, or estimate this love, if you are ignorant or unbelieving of "the terrors of the Lord?" If there was no holy necessity on the part of God to punish sin, then what becomes of the greatest manifestation of his love, in the gift of his own Son to suffer and to die for us? If the terrors of his wrath had no foundation, what foundation can there be for the greatest and most distinguishing characteristic of his love to rest upon? If the one is removed, the other falls along with it; or if the one is not upheld in all its terror, you do, to the same degree, detract from the other: and in speaking to man of "the terrors of the Lord," therefore, there is no necessity that we should forget the tender mercies of the Lord; on the contrary, the more faithfully and fully we declare the one, the better fitted do we become for urging home upon you the other,—the better fitted are we to warn your minds by the truth, that so great was his love, that even "when you were sinners Christ died for you." When it is said that the love of God should form the great, if not the single topic of our preaching—that men have already, whether from the testimony of conscience or from the Word of God, sufficient conviction of the terrors of the Lord, and of the indignation which he bears, and will one day manifest against iniquity,—we may take this for granted, as a topic which need not be insisted on, and may proceed at once to the manifestation of divine mercy in the Gospel, as a truth which, from their previous convictions, they are prepared rightly to appreciate.

Is this, however, agreeable to fact and experience? Do we then really find men impressed with the truth that God will, and must punish sin, though he can never but wish that the sinner would turn from his way and live? Do we find the justice of God so uniformly admitted, that, whatever else they may question in his character, this is never questioned, far less denied? Do men seem really alive to the fact, that his goodness is based on a rectitude unchangeable as himself, and which will be manifested in all his dealings with his creatures? Is it the case, that whatever excuses they make for their sins, they never reflect on the righteousness of God in punishing sin; or whatever be the refuges to which they betake themselves, none of them can deny the purity of his character, and the indignation with which he will visit every worker of iniquity? What then were those palliations which they apply to their consciences, as though their sins were only infirmities for which God would not be hard to reckon with them? What mean those delusive schemes by which the mercy of God is rested in, as though there were neither truth nor justice in God at all? What mean those false and imperfect views of the Gospel, by which the death of the Saviour is regarded as introducing a mitigated law, according to which the sinner's obedience is substituted for perfect obedience? Do these things tell that men are convinced of the terrors of the Lord, or that he is the righteous God who will and must deal righteously; or, rather, do not these things shew, that with multitudes, the terrors of the Lord are reduced to an empty name, or, if they are regarded at all, are regarded only as a dead letter in the divine statute-book, which will never be produced in judgment against them? The truth is, I believe, that the whole of the controversy which man are at this moment maintaining with God, however various the forms which it may assume, is really a controversy with his righteousness, as the God who will carry out the righteous principles of his administration, in punishing sin and rewarding holiness. Let men assume the appearance of indifference to the discoveries of the New Testament altogether, or let them be found thinking of God, as though he were a being of pure benevolence; let them wear the aspect of those who judge that only great sins or great sinners will meet his condemnation, or of those who, under pretence of magnifying the grace of the Gospel, confound all moral distinctions, as though the grace of God permitted them to continue in sin: and still, in every case, the real ground of the controversy lies with the justice and holiness of God,—the real subject of dispute is with the truth that God will punish as he has threatened, every worker of iniquity; and they will ever continue to debate this, till such time as, from right views of the purity of the divine nature, they see that it is impossible for God to accommodate his law to their sinfulness, and that it must be upheld in all its extent, even though they themselves should suffer everlastingly for it. Till this is done, the ungodliness of the human heart will ever be discovering some new refuge to which it may betake itself, when you drive it from its old ones; and the only truth which can, under God, fairly dislodge it from them all, and lead the man to throw himself, as a lost and undone sinner, on the grace of God in Jesus Christ, is not the declaration of the mercy and love of God, of which he can very imperfectly conceive, but the declaration of "the terrors of the Lord," the full declaration of the truth, that not one "jot or one tittle of that law" which pronounceth a curse on him, "shall in any wise pass till all be fulfilled." There is an expression of our apostle, in another of his epistles, which conveys the truth very strikingly and very exactly, "Before faith came," that is, before the way of salvation, through faith in Christ was fully disclosed, were men "kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed." These words, as is well known, represent the condition of men before the Gospel came, as prisoners held bound by the law of God, while there is no way of escape opened from its threatenings, on every hand of them, except in the sacrifice and death of the Son of God. By the proclamation of its terrors it shut them up unto this as the only way in which there could be any deliverance, and left them no alternative, but that of abiding its curse, or making their escape by the Gospel; and the law, by the discovery of the same unbending and uncompromising justice, must do the same for us, as it did to men before the Gospel came; we must be thereby shut up unto the faith, and thus shall we be led to turn from all the devices by which our own hearts would deceive us. Never shall we give up attempting to make our escape from it, in some other way than that which faith prescribes; never shall we be led aright to esteem, and value, and embrace, the provided mercy, until we see that every way by which we would pass from it, is guarded by a faithfulness which never slumbers, and a justice and righteousness which no artifice of ours can ever elude; and that there can be no peace and no safety for us, but an immediate surrender of ourselves to the Saviour, to him, in whom "God is just although the justifier of him who believeth."

It is for these reasons, then, that instead of yielding to the objections of those on the one hand who would do away with "the terrors of the Lord" altogether, or those on the other who would dispute its efficacy compared with other topics embraced in the New Testament, we would comply with the exhortation of the apostle, and "knowing the terrors of the Lord, would persuade men." It is for these reasons, that we know nothing more necessary, than to follow a deceitful heart through all its labyrinths, and to expose the falsity of them all; and that, instead of "saying peace, peace, while there is no peace."

we would expose the vanity of all pretences to its possession which are not derived from faith in the Saviour,—it is for these reasons, that instead of encouraging you to believe that all is well with you because you may possess the ordinary virtues of the world, we would enjoin you to look narrowly into your goodness, whether it springs from the great source—from faith in the Saviour, and is really done in his name and to his service, and never to be satisfied that your calling and election are sure, till you have been able to trace in your hearts and lives the marks of a regenerated nature. Such might be called a useless, as it may be in some respects, a painful jealousy, were not all of us to pass in review at the judgment-seat of Christ; but, if we must all appear there to take our trial before a judge upon whom it is impossible to impose by any appearance of goodness, however specious, or by any virtue, however fair it may seem, which has had no respect to their faith and to his grace, how necessary is it that we should judge ourselves now, lest we should then be judged and condemned with the world; and how necessary that we should look well to the foundation on which we build, lest in the desolation that shall then overwhelm the world, we and our works should be at once swept away! If this be painful, will it not be as painful to incur the sentence of everlasting “destruction from the presence of the Lord?” Would you wish that the face of the Judge should on that day be turned on you with a look of displeasure bidding you away to the wailing and weeping of outer darkness? would you wish to be then, even for a moment, in suspense whether your place shall be among the “blessed of the Father?” would you wish it to be with you, as the apostle says it shall be with some, that you shall be saved, “yet so as by fire,” when the fire that shall then burn up the wicked shall have almost laid hold of you? Who would wish these things, and not rather “that an entrance should be ministered unto him abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour.”

And by those terrors, therefore, you are brought even now “to acquaint yourselves with God, and be at peace;” to betake yourselves to the Saviour “as all your hope,” and to “abound in the precious fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ to the praise and glory of God.”

It was obviously to the judgment-day that the apostle adverted, when he spoke of “the terrors of the Lord.” “We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad. Knowing therefore the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men.” The terrors of the Lord were in his view, as certain as judgment was certain; if there were any doubt about the judgment, the terrors of the Lord would be exposed to the same dubiety, but because there was in his view no questioning of the judgment, there was as little room for questioning that the terrors of the Lord would be manifested. And the very nature of a judgment, implied that there were certain attested principles of justice on which it was to be conducted; and not only a trial, but a sentence, and not merely rewards, but punishments; and not merely the blessedness of approval to those who should stand acquitted, but the misery of being outcast to those who should be condemned; and viewing these two things, as thus intimately connected, has it never struck you, how much there is in the condition of the world to lead you to respect the one, and therefore, to fear the other; and how the present system of things is so constituted, that you can draw out of it a stronger argument for a future and final reckoning, than you could from any other, even from one that bore clear impress of a great Judge of all? Amid all the apparent confusion around us, there are not wanting many testimonies that God is on the side of righteousness and against iniquity. There is that conscience which he hath planted in every breast, and which witnesses by its approvings, or its accusings, what he who planted it there approves or condemns; there is in the happiness which, more or less, attends right and virtuous conduct, and in the misery which, more or less, accompanies the indulgence of all sin, an evidence that virtue and happiness, sin and misery, are connected; and there are not wanting many proofs besides, in the case of individuals, and much more in the case of nations, of a righteous retribution, by which virtue is rewarded, and sin punished and condemned; and from this we are justified in inferring, and every man whose conscience is not blinded by sin does infer, that there is a great moral Governor of all, a God who honours holiness and hates sin. Had the issue of things been more in agreement with the records of conscience; had virtue always, and openly led to happiness, and sin been always followed by misery; had the retributive justice of God taken clearer effect upon guilty individuals or guilty nations; had this been the case, one might have inferred with some reason, that this was all the judgment, and that there was to be no great and final settlement hereafter. Had there been no proof of justice and rectitude in the government of God at all, we could have had no ground to expect that judgment should follow us; had these been more perfect than we find them, one might have supposed, that there was as little ground to expect any thing beyond what we saw here; and, it is because there is so much in the world to tell us, that God judgeth, and because there is at the same time so little, that we derive our strongest argument for a great and final reckoning hereafter. Were there much less of it than we now see, the moral character of God might be doubted;—were there much more than we see, there would be less call than there is for a great and final adjustment. There is enough to tell us, that He who ruleth over all is righteous; but there is not enough to indicate his righteousness, and, therefore, we infer a time when that righteousness shall be fully displayed. And look at the world in this light, and see whether every thing is not taking place as you might expect under such a system. Look at this world where God is so often seen, and at the same time, so often hidden from us—where he interposes with sufficient clearness and frequency to prove what he loves and what he hates in his creatures, and yet where his love and hatred are not fully carried out. Look at this, and say, whether it does not convey to your minds the impression, that He who rules over all, is only withdrawing himself for a season, that he may prepare a solemn assertion of his rectitude, and sending those messengers before, as the proofs of a coming judgment, and whether it be not time for every one to “seek the Lord while he may be found, and to call upon him while he is near.” I advert to this consideration, because the imperfect discovery which we have of the moral character of God in the world around us, is often employed by men to set aside the truth of a future judgment, or to harden their hearts against it, whilst it confirms, in fact, the great foundation for it. It was on other, and surer grounds than this, however, that the apostles knew the “terrors of the Lord;” they knew them not merely from the intimations of his nature and will, scattered over the face of human things, or even from what he had himself declared to them by his Spirit; they knew it from one great fact in the divine administration, and if that fact be admitted, there can be no question of a judgment in righteousness; that fact was the death of Christ. In the death of his own Son, God did manifest, even when his purpose was to save sinners, that he must save them righteously; in His person, he carried out the principles of a righteous administration; he showed that “not one jot or tittle” of his threatenings should fail, that “heaven and earth might pass away, but that his words should not pass away;” and having committed himself, if I may be allowed the expression, by this solemn act of justice in the person of his only-begotten and well-beloved Son, can you suppose that he will ever depart from it? if the cup did not pass from him till he drunk it, can you think that it will ever pass from those who continue to disregard his grace, or that they can meet any thing less bitter than that wrath which they shall not be able to abide? If this be not true, then Christ died in vain; then was the costly work of redemption fruitless; then was its victim prepared, and its sacrifice offered, to propitiate a justice which had no existence; and the manifestation which was then given of God’s hatred to sin, and his love of holiness, had no truth or reality in it. But because these things are not, and cannot be, therefore God cannot now pass from his purpose of judgment; and the death and the resurrection of the Saviour is as solemn an assurance that he shall judge the world in righteousness, as though the trump were already sounding, at which “the dead, small and great, shall stand before God.” Let us seek to have our minds habitually impressed by these things; let us frame the whole tenor of our lives, so that we may be finally accepted of Christ at the judgment-seat; and this is the great and unspeakable consolation, that the very same truth which is, in one light, the most terrible to sinners, is, in another, the most supporting,—the truth of the death and resurrection of the Saviour, which brings in a new and better hope, by the which, we may draw near to God; and they who make it their trust and confidence now, shall have peace of mind in the midst of all their guilty fears, and shall receive the Holy Spirit, to qualify and make them meet for the judgment hereafter. Amen.

THE FIRST ESTABLISHMENT OF A MISSIONARY SOCIETY IN THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.

THE following narrative is so deeply interesting, that no true Christian, we feel assured, can peruse it without feelings of the purest satisfaction and delight. It is extracted from the Polynesian Researches by Mr Ellis, who was himself a Missionary to the Sandwich Islands:—

The greater portion of the inhabitants having now embraced Christianity, the Missionaries availed themselves of apparently the most suitable means for impressing the minds of the converts with the principle laid down in the Scriptures, that it is the duty of those who enjoy the Gospel, not only to maintain, but also to extend it. It appeared to them that both these ends might be answered most appropriately and effectually, by establishing among the natives a Missionary Society, auxiliary to the London Society, rather than by calling upon them, immediately after their conversion, to support the teachers labouring among them.

“The plan was proposed to the king, and at once approved of by him; it was also mentioned to several of the leading chiefs, by whom it was favourably received. Auna told me that the king one day said to him, ‘Auna, do you think you could collect five bamboo canes of oil in a year?’ He answered, ‘Yes;’ and the king said, ‘Do you think you could appropriate so much towards sending the Word of God to the heathens?’ Again he answered in the affirmative; and the king still further asked, ‘Do you think those that value the Gospel would think it a great labour to collect so much yearly for this purpose?’ Auna answered, that he did not think they would. ‘Then,’ said the king, ‘think about it, and perhaps we can have a combination, or society, for this purpose.’ The king found several chiefs favourably disposed; the Missionaries also proposed it to others; and, as it met with general approbation, the approaching month of May was appointed for the formation of the association. Mr Nott came over to Afareaitu for the purpose of completing the plan. On the 23d of April, in the same year, Messrs Nott, Davies, Orsmoed, and myself, held a meeting with the king, at our house; when the principles upon which the society should be formed, and the rules by which it was proposed to regulate its proceedings, were considered, and, on the following day, finally adjusted.

“The 13th of May, 1818, being the anniversary of the parent institution in England was fixed for the establishment and organization of the native society. The king and chiefs met at Papetoi, and it was a delightful and interesting day to all who were present. At sunrise we held a prayer-meeting in the English language. The natives held one among themselves at the same hour. The forenoon was appropriated to worship in English; at which time a sermon was preached by Mr Henry, one of the senior missionaries; and in the after-soon the services were entirely in the native language. The chiefs and people assembled from most of the districts of Eimeo, and a number of strangers from Tahiti, residing at Papetoi, were also present. The extension of the Redeemer's kingdom had been the topic of discourses in the native congregation on the preceding Sabbath, and had in some degree prepared the minds of the people for entering more fully into the subject. The public services on this occasion were to commence at three o'clock in the afternoon; but long before the appointed hour, the chapel was crowded, and a far greater number than had gained admission still remained on the outside. Three or four hundred yards distant from the chapel, there was a beautiful and extensive grove. To this spot it was proposed to adjourn, and thither the natives immediately repaired, seating themselves on the ground under the cocoa-nut trees. At three o'clock we walked to the grove, and on entering it we beheld one of the most imposing and delightful spectacles I think I ever witnessed in the islands. The sky was clear, the smooth surface of the ocean rippled with the cool and stirring breeze. The grove, stately and rich in all the luxuriance of tropical verdure, extended from the white beach of coral and shells to the very base of the mountains, whose gradual ascent, and rocky projections, led to the interior. The long-winged and interwoven leaves of the trees formed a spreading canopy, through which a straggling sunbeam occasionally found its way, and among whose long and graceful leaflets the breeze from the ocean, sweeping softly, gave even a degree of animation to the whole. The grass that grew underneath appeared like a rich carpet, spread by nature for the interesting ceremony; pendulous plants, some verdant in foliage, others rich and variegated in blossom, hung from the projections of the rocks, while several species of convolvulus and climbing plants were twined round the trunks of the trees, or hung in gay festoons among the gigantic and wide-spread leaves of the grove, ornamenting the whole with their large and splendid pink blossoms. Near one of the large cocoa-nut trees, whose cylindrical trunk appeared like a natural pillar supporting the roof, there was a rustic sort of stand, four or five feet above the ground, on which Mr Nott took his station. Before him, in a large arm-chair provided for the occasion, sat Pomare, supported on the right by Tati, chief of Papara, and on the left by Upapara, the king's secretary. A number of chiefs, with the queen and chief women of the islands, sat around; while thousands of the natives, attired in their gay and many-coloured native or European dresses, composed the vast assemblage, each one having come as to a public festival, in his best apparel. Pomare was dressed in a fine yellow tiputa, stamped on that part which covered his left breast with a rich and elegant scarlet flower, instead of a star. Most of the chiefs wore the native costume, and the females were arrayed in beautifully white native cloth, and yellow cocoa-nut-leaf shades, or bonnets, with wreaths of sweet-scented flowers round their necks, or garlands of the same in their black and glossy hair. The services commenced with singing, in which many of the natives joined. A solemn prayer was offered, after which Mr Nott delivered a short, animated, and suitable discourse, from the Eunuch's answer to Philip, Acts viii. 30, 31. As soon as this was concluded, Pomare addressed the multitude of his subjects around, proposing the formation of a society. He began by referring them back to the ages that were past, and to the system of false religion by which they had been so long enslaved, reminding them very feelingly of the rigid exactions imposed in the name of their imaginary gods, for they were but pieces of wood, or cocoa-nut husk. He then alluded to the toil they endured, and the zeal and diligence so often manifested, in the service of these idols. To them the first-fruits of the field, the choicest fish from the sea, with the most valuable productions of their labour and ingenuity, were offered; and to propitiate their favour, avert their displeasure, and death, its dreaded consequence, human victims were so often slain. While referring to these dark and distressing features of their idolatry, the general seriousness of the assembly, and the indications of remorse or horror in the recollection of these cruelties, appeared to accompany and respond confirmation to his statements. In striking contrast with them, he placed the mild and benevolent motives and tendency of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and the benefits its introduction had conferred: alluding to the very fact of their being assembled for the purpose which had convened them, as a powerful illustration of his remarks. He then stated the vast obligations they were under to God for sending them his Word, and the partial manifestation of gratitude they had yet given. After this, he directed their attention to the miserable situation of those whom God had not thus visited, and proposed that, from a sense of the value of the Gospel, and a desire for its dissemination, they should form a Tahitian Missionary Society, to aid the London Society in sending the Gospel to the heathen, especially those in the islands of the surrounding ocean; explaining the kind of remuneration given to the proprietors of ships, and the expensiveness even of sending Missionaries. 'The people of Africa,' said he, 'have already done so; for though, like us, they have no money, they have given of their sheep and other property. Let us also give of the produce of our islands—pigs, or arrow-root, or cocoa-nut oil. He that desires the Word of God to grow where it has been planted, and to be conveyed to countries wretched as ours was before it was brought to us, will contribute freely and liberally to promote its extension: he who is unacquainted with its influence, and insensible to its claims, will not, perhaps, exert himself in this work. So let it be. Let him not be reproved; neither let the chiefs in general, nor superiors, be angry with him on that account.' Pomare on this occasion seemed anxious to impress the minds of the people with his desire that they should act according to the dictates of their own judgment, and not form themselves into a society, simply because he had recommended it. As he drew to the close of his address, he intimated his wish that those who approved of the proposal he had made, should lift their right hands. Two or three thousand naked arms were simultaneously elevated from the multitude assembled under the cocoa-nut grove, presenting a spectacle no less imposing and affecting, than it was picturesque and new. The regulations of the society were then read, and the treasurer and secretaries chosen. By this time the shades of the evening began to gather round us, and the sun was just hidden by the distant wave of the horizon, when the king rose from his chair, and the chiefs and people retired to their dwellings, under feelings of high excitement and satisfaction. There was so much rural beauty and secluded quietude in the scene, and so much that was novel and striking in the appearance of the people, momentous and delightful in the object for which they had been convened, that it was altogether one of the most interesting meetings I ever attended."

SOME ADDITIONAL REMARKS ON THE CHRISTIAN'S OBLIGATION TO LIVE SEPARATE FROM THE WORLD.

BY THE REV. JAMES LEWIS,

Minister of St. John's Parish, Leith.

We recollect reading in a Calcutta newspaper, called the "Inquirer," a very natural and high panegyric upon the British nation, written by the editor, a convert from Hindooism, and one of the first fruits of Dr Duff's labours. "What a noble nation," wrote the young convert, "must the English be, for they are a nation of Christians!" Is it not a pity, that we who live in Britain, and know ourselves better, cannot take to ourselves the eulogy of our Hindoo brother? His inference is most just,—why should truth compel us to refuse the credit of it by denying the fact on which it is founded? A noble nation we should be were we a nation of Christians. But is there no doubt of the fact? None.—If we took Britains by their profession, like our young convert; and from the nobility of the faith professed, judged of the characters of its disciples,—None.—If the disciples acted upon the advice of one of the apostles of their faith, "My little children, let us not love in word neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth." To reap, however, the honour sown for them by the hand of our Hindoo brother, our British Christians must remember their obligations to live separate from the world, as herein lies the nobility of the Christian character.—We know that we are of God, and that the whole world lieth in wickedness. To guide Christians in their intercourse with the world, and direct them how to live separate from it, we deduced certain rules from Scripture in an article in last Number. These were three, as follows: First, Whatever Christians do, should be done "in the name of the Lord Jesus;" Second, Whatever they do, should be done consistently with "the will of God, which is their sanctification;" Third, Whatever they do, should be done with a view to edification, "giving none offence." In the present article, we propose pointing out the application of these rules.

We shall suppose the question put by a Christian, Can I, consistently with my Christian profession, frequent the places of amusement to which the world resorts, such as the theatre or the ball-room? Probably he would anticipate, that to such a question we should directly reply, by prohibiting his resort to such places as forbidden to Christians; but no, we would appeal to himself for the answer. We would not say to him directly, into these places of worldly pleasure and resort you cannot enter, for, to the pure all things are pure. What then? Do we bid him go to these resorts of worldly pleasure and society? No; we would lay before him the principles which, as a Christian, he acknowledges, and bid him test his desire to resort to these places by these principles. We would remind him of the first rule of Christian conduct, "that whatsoever he does should be done in the name of the Lord Jesus." And, having stated the rule, we would demand of him, whether knowing that such places were avowedly dedicated to the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of life; that they were the very chosen habitations of vanity; that there was not only in such resorts an entire absence of every thing sacred, but an actual exhibition of much of an opposite character; that sentiments were there expressed in ridicule or in scorn of the very faith which he professed; that the name of his Saviour was uttered only to enforce an oath, or give emphasis to an exclamation, or, by the sacredness of the association with some grotesque or frivolous idea, to give point to the contrasts, or vividness to the flashes of profane wit—knowing these things, we would demand of him, whether he could resort to such places consistently with his obligation to do all things for the honour of his Lord; and by his presence, yield a silent approbation to the scenes exhibited, and the sentiments expressed? If he answered he could, then let him go, he goes in faith; and if, indeed, it be in faith, he cannot be wrong. We may think it a strange liberty he has assumed. We may even think his liberty has passed into licentiousness. But why should we judge another man? "to his own master he standeth or falleth." We know that Paul entered into the theatre at Ephesus, there to proclaim that the city was wholly given over to idolatry, and we know not what ulterior designs the Christian who, in the present day, enters similar places, may have. If he assure us he goes in faith, we cannot bid him stay.

But after he has answered this enquiry, two questions still remain. If he say he can go to these places of worldly resort without violating his obligation to live to Christ; still we ask, can he do so without any danger to his personal religion? We would remind him of the spiritual nature committed to his guardianship, and ask if he could throw himself into the centre of worldly society, and become a party in its pleasures, without fear that his spiritual nature would become torpid and deadened by the contact, and that a principle so delicate as the life of God in the soul of man, would be in no danger of being uprooted amidst the whirlwinds of vanity. What would he think of the mother's care, who willingly exposed her babe to the chilling blasts of a winter's wind? If to this he answer, I can go without danger to my spiritual well-being,—we may wonder at his boldness, we may admire his confidence, we may even venture to warn him with that caution of Scripture, "Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall;" or with that other counsel of inspired wisdom, "Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not into the way of evil men; avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, pass away." But, if after all this, he still assure us of his conviction of his safety, let him again, we say, go; why should we judge another man's liberty? "to his own master he standeth or falleth." But, before he go, we have one farther question: you have told us that to these places of worldly resort you can repair, consistently with your obligation to do all things in the name of Christ, and without danger to your spiritual wellbeing; but as a Christian, it is your duty to consult, also, the very infirmities of your brethren, and to avoid, in the eyes of the world, the appearance of evil. It is not enough, that to such places you can go, without sustaining harm; will your example draw others to the same places, who possess less power to resist the temptations with which they may be assailed; or may it not altogether shake the faith of some to witness your presence there; may it not justly provoke the sneer of the world, confirm its unbelief, and make it doubt what it is desirous to doubt, whether Religion be anything more than a sanctimonious and hypocritical profession? If to this he answer, that he has already considered what he owes to his brethren, and to the world, and that neither will be injured by his liberty, again we say, let him go; why should we judge another man's liberty? "to his own master he standeth or falleth." If his determination be taken in consistency with these three great Christian principles,—to do all things in the name of Christ, to guard the purity of his own affections, to give none offence to the world, or to the Church, it were boldly and presumptuously intermeddling with his conscience to bid him stay; let him only see to it, for his own final justification, that in godly sincerity he has applied these principles, and that the love of the world's society, and of its amusements, has not warped his judgment, and precipitated him into conclusions, and consequently into a course of conduct, which his principles condemn.

We might shew how these three rules might be applied for the determination of various other questions regarding the Christian's conduct, and how the application of one or more of them, according to the particular case, would always prove a guard to the Christian against worldly conformity. Let one other instance suffice; and we shall select an instance in which it might be necessary to apply only one of the rules, in order to arrive at a safe and satisfactory conclusion. We shall suppose the question proposed, a question that often arises to the mind of a young Christian in the present age of letters and intellectual refinement:—Ought I to indulge myself by perusing those works of taste and genius, which breathe the spirit and the sentiments of the world? In this, as in the former case, the person who proposes the question must be thrown upon himself for the answer; for while some minds, strong in their principles, might only obtain confirmation by tracing the follies and wanderings of genius uninforming by Religion, others might be silently seduced by admiration of their powers into a sympathy with their spirit. The question, therefore, must be left to every man to reply for himself; the application of the second rule will direct him to the right answer; we would not directly answer in the negative the inquiry of any one who proposed the question, "Ought I as a Christian to read such works?" We would remind such an one of the charge given to him over his own spiritual being; "this is the will of God, even your sanctification." Apply, we would say to him, this rule—let not the mere pleasures of taste, or the fascinations of genius, or the attractions of human wit or eloquence, seduce you into the perusal of works, however universally read, or high in fame in the mouths of men, if you cannot arise from their perusal without having allied yourself more closely to the spirit of the world, and alienated your heart from the life of faith, and from the world that is unseen. There are pearls in literature, precious pearls; there are thoughts of lofty intellect and impassioned feeling; there are forms of fancy's brightest creation, and there is wit to dazzle, and eloquence to fascinate and carry captive the heart; but O, it is a question for every Christian to resolve, whether these pearls may not be too dearly bought; whether the taste may not be refined at the expense of the purity of the heart. The pearls are precious, but the water is dark and deep in which they must be sought; and surely the bauble were too highly valued, if sought for at the hazard of the life of the diver. It is over his moral and spiritual being that the Christian's guard should be set; and, worthless, nay, pernicious, and destructive of the high end of his being, is that refinement of taste, and discipline of intellect, that is obtained by the sacrifice of devotional feeling or spiritual affections. By such a sacrifice, the Christian barter heavenly for earthly trea-tures; he gives in exchange the robe that would clothe him with beauty through eternity, that he may adorn himself with some of the short-lived decorations of time. He forgets that the God with whom he has to do, estimates human spirits by their moral worth, not by their intellectual capabilities; and therefore it were ten thousand times better that he remained in ignorance of all that men of unsanctified genius ever wrote, and forfeited whatever advantage he might have derived from converse with their works, than that his spirit should catch a sympathy with theirs, and be moulded after their likeness; better, ten thousand times, that the only book in the Christian's library were, the Book of God; that his only favourite poet were, the sweet Psalmist of Israel; the histories which he most delighted to peruse, the histories of the patriarchs and prophets, his Saviour's life and dying love; better far, that the only enticing words which he could speak were, the simple expressions of divine love which the Holy Ghost had taught him; that his only knowledge were, the knowledge of Christ crucified; that the only wisdom he possessed were, "the fear of the Lord," and that his only understanding were, "to depart from evil;" better far, that the mind of the Christian should remain thus simple and unadorned, than that he should gather into his intellectual cabinet the brightest and choicest jewels of literature, if he gave in exchange for them that which is of infinitely higher value—the refinements and sensibilities of the spiritual heart! How seldom Christians, in the present day, are determined in the books they read, or the studies they pursue, by such reasons, need scarcely be told. They suffer themselves to be carried along by the current, and follow where the world leads, applauding its idols, eulogising its works; deeply imbued with its spirit, they join their hosannas to those of the multitude, and build the monuments of those who would have stoned the prophets and killed them. Nor need it be told how many a spirit has become dwarfed and stunted in its Christian growth, by its too free converse with the favourite authorship of the world; how a superficial worldly religion has taken the place of a deeper spiritual discernment of the things of God; and how Christian society, that might have found its appropriate conversation in higher themes, and been animated with nobler subjects, has exhausted its resources of admiration and praise on subjects scarcely worthy of the Christian's regards. But to what extent such works may engage the time and thoughts of the Christian, must, we repeat, be a matter for his own determination. The rule inspired for his direction is before him—"This is the will of God, even your sanctification."

Comfort under Bereavements.—Has death entered our habitations, and carried away one after another of the loved ones with whom we set out on the journey of life? And are we constrained to feel, that we do indeed dwell in the land of the shadow of death, as we look around on the narrowed circle, and think how link after link has been broken off the chain, which has long bound our affections, perhaps to closely to earth?

Shall we not lift up our hearts in thankfulness to God, even for this trial, if the links thus broken off the chain of earthly affections, have been added to the chain of Divine love, by which God is drawing up our hearts to himself and heaven?—W.H.V.

SACRED POETRY.

LINES BY JAMES GLASSFORD, ESQ.,

Author of "Lyrical Translations from the Italian Poets."

"If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works."—JOHN x. 37, 38.
 "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin: but now have they both seen and hated both me and my Father."—JOHN xv. 24.

BEHOLD the pity of the Lord,
 His grace and condescending love;
 Who will not judge men by his word,
 Till by his works that word they prove.

He tells the unbelieving Jew,
 The legal Pharisee and Scribe,
 Those wonders of his power to view
 And then the glory to ascribe.

But draw not false excuses thence,
 If faith be weak and doubts increased;
 Nor rest upon the vain defence
 That signs and miracles have ceased.

What though the Saviour rose on high,
 Not less on earth a present Lord;
 Still, by his Spirit, he is nigh
 Both in his works and in his word.

What if you hear not the command,
 Nor look upon the face divine;
 To see the product of his hand,
 To know and feel his power is thine:

Is there no mental sight restored?
 No tongue to sing his praise unloosed?
 When was he absent if implored?
 When was the prayer of faith refused?

Say, is there no blaspheming Saul
 Arrested in his furious way,
 Who at the Saviour's powerful call
 Has ceased to curse, and learned to pray?

And is there none whom Satan held,
 Torn by fierce passions and possess,
 From whom that legion is expelled,
 And peace returned into his breast?

None whom his fellows shunned and feared,
 Spotted and leprous in his soul,
 Who yet the voice of mercy heard,
 And went and washed, and now is whole?

Is there no Lazarus to be found,
 Whom sins and trespasses enthralled,
 Long in that sleep with fetters bound,
 Till from the dead by Jesus called?

O charge not on the Jews alone,
 The hardened heart and stubborn will;
 They who reject Him on his throne
 Would, if on earth, reject him still.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Best mode of Mortifying Sin.—"Five persons," says Mr Brooks, "were studying what were the best means to mortify sin: one said, to meditate on death; the second, on judgment; the third, on the joys of heaven; the fourth, on the torments of hell; the fifth, on the blood and sufferings of Jesus Christ; and certainly the last is the choicest and strongest motive of all.

Youthful Instruction.—It is related of Ben Syra, that, when a child, he begged his preceptor to instruct him in the law of God; but he declined, saying that he was as yet too young to be taught these sacred mysteries. "But, master," said the boy, "I have been in the burial ground, and measured the graves, and find some of them shorter than myself; now, if I should die before I have learned the Word of God, what will become of me then?" Grace teaches us, in the midst of life's greatest comforts, to be willing to die, and in the midst of its greatest crosses, to be willing to live. The churchyard is that market-place where the things of this world are duly rated.

An English Soldier.—An English deserter, who had turned a deaf ear to the solicitations of his friends in Yorkshire, was led by the good providence of God to hear Dr Vanderkemp, in Caffraria, whose ministry brought to mind the text quoted by a Christian minister in England,—"Ye must be born again." He went and conversed with the doctor, and the result was pleasing in the highest degree. He became a man of prayer, forsook his dissolute companions, and gave satisfactory proof of his conversion. How wonderful was the goodness of God, in sending the bread of life to this poor man in the deserts, which he had rejected in his native country!

Bishop Hildeley.—On Saturday, the 28th of November, 1772, Dr Hildeley, bishop of Sodor and Man, was favoured with the inexpressible happiness of receiving the last part of the translation of the Bible into the Manks language, so long and so greatly the object of his ardent prayers: upon which occasion, according to his own repeated promise, he very emphatically sung, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace!" Luke ii. 29, in the presence of his congratulating family. The next day, which was Advent Sunday, he officiated in his own chapel, and preached on the uncertainty of human life; urging, with much energy, the duty of being ready to meet our summons hence, and standing before the great tribunal. In the evening he again called his family together, and resumed the subject, in a manner which drew tears from every eye. Thus, "in something like prophetic strain," did this good man appear to anticipate his own death, and prepare others for it; for, on the following day, while cheerfully conversing with his family and a neighbouring clergyman, he was seized with a stroke of apoplexy, which deprived him, in a moment, of intellectual powers; and on that day week he left our world, in the forty-seventh year of his age.

A Hint to Interpreters of the Bible.—Rica, having been to visit the library of a French convent, writes thus to his friend in Persia, concerning what had passed:—"Father," said I to the librarian, "what are these huge volumes which fill the whole side of the library?" "These," said he, "are the interpreters of the Scriptures." "There is a prodigious number of them," replied I; "the Scriptures must have been very dark formerly, and very clear at present. Do there remain still any doubts? are there now any points contested?" "Are there!" answered he with surprise, "there are. There are almost as many as there are lines." "You astonish me," said I; "what then have all these authors been doing?" "These authors," returned he, "never searched the Scriptures for what ought to be believed, but for what they did believe themselves. They did not consider them as a book wherein were contained the doctrines which they ought to receive, but as a work which might be made to authorize their own ideas."

ON THE DUTY OF PRAYER.

BY THE REV. JOHN SYM,

One of the Ministers of the Old Greyfriars' Parish, Edinburgh.

In every country, and under every form of religious belief, prayer has constituted a principal part of worship. It may, therefore, be concluded, that this is a duty which nature itself prompts us to discharge. From our earliest years we have observed the propriety and advantage of presenting our requests to earthly superiors; and impressed as we must be with a sense of our need, and of our entire dependence upon God, we may naturally infer, that it is our duty and our interest to let our requests be made known to our Father in heaven. The dictates of nature is, in this instance, abundantly confirmed by the Word of God. One of the titles by which the Most High is known to us, is, the “Hearer of prayer;” and the injunctions to pray, the promises annexed to the fulfilment of this duty, and the instances recorded of the efficacy of prayer, are too numerous and too well known to render it necessary for us to make a more particular reference to them.

The admission that prayer is a duty, implies that there are certain times or seasons when it should be performed. Under the law, it was required that the morning and evening sacrifice and prayer should be regularly offered. And nature itself seems to point out these as appropriate seasons for prayer. In the morning when we awake to consciousness, and seem to obtain a renewal of life, it becomes us to render thanks unto Him, whose sleepless eye has been upon us during the silent watches of the night, and whose upholding hand has preserved us when we lay in helpless unconsciousness; and being ignorant of the events which may befall us during the day—the scenes in which we may be called to act a part—the snares that may be set for us—the trials that may await us—the duties that we may be required to discharge—it becomes us to seek the supply of all our wants, and the protection, and guidance, and grace of Him, who is the Father of mercies, and the supreme disposer of all events. And when the shades of evening closing in, summon us to rest, and remind us of the long dark night of death, when our bed will be the grave, it surely becomes us to offer the tribute of our gratitude and praise to the bounteous Author of all our blessings—to implore his forgiveness of the sins which we have committed—to beseech him to sanctify and bless the hours of our repose, and to commit ourselves into his hands, that whether we awake in time or in eternity, we may awake to the light of his countenance. The duty of prayer to God being admitted, the least that can be required of us is, that we should “acknowledge his loving-kindness every morning, and his faithfulness every night.”

It is in the power of all, however they may be situated, to draw near to God in the exercise of prayer at the seasons we have mentioned. When circumstances will admit, however, it seems desirable that there should be additional periods set apart for stated and regular prayer. We are told that Daniel prayed three times a-day. “Evening, and morning, and at noon,” says David, “will I pray, and cry aloud.” And in another Psalm he says, “seven times a-day do I praise thee, because of thy righteous judgments.” When our circumstances, therefore, will permit of it, we may, with profit, appropriate certain portions of every day, or if this cannot be done, certain portions of particular days, to holy communion with God, supplicating the blessings that are needful for ourselves and others. Besides these stated and periodical seasons of prayer, there are occasions when we are required to be more frequent and earnest at a throne of grace: when any unusual event befalls us—when we are blessed with remarkable prosperity—when we are exposed to severe trials—when an important and difficult duty has to be performed—when our iniquities have been prevailing against us, and the life of God is languishing in the soul—when we have the near prospect of observing, or when we have recently observed, some solemn religious ordinance—on these, and on similar occasions, it becomes us to engage in more frequent, and importunate, and prolonged supplications. There are some, we are aware, who are disposed to regard such frequency and fervency in prayer with suspicion, if not with aversion, as if it were indicative of a weak understanding, or an excited imagination, or a diseased conscience. They look upon such earnest and repeated supplications as manifesting a want of reverence, or a want of faith. They remind us of the short and simple, but sublime form which was prescribed by our Lord; all repetitions they think are vain, and they say that we shall not be heard for our much speaking. It must be obvious, however, to every one who will consult it, that the words of our Lord in the passage referred to are inapplicable to the cases which we are considering. Besides, we know that our Saviour spent whole nights in prayer. In the garden, he offered the same prayer three several times, and we are told that then he prayed more earnestly. When we consider, therefore, the example of our Lord himself—when we consider the natural effect of honest and ardent desire upon the frequency and fervour of our prayers—and when we think of the encouragement held out to us in Scripture, to pray always and not to faint—to ask, to seek, to knock—to watch unto prayer with all perseverance, it cannot be believed that importunate and prolonged prayer is to be condemned as a sin, or pitied as a weakness. On the contrary, if, when we are unusually tried, or when our soul has relapsed into a state of worldliness and sin, we are not stirred up to more earnest and persevering supplication, then we evince an indifference to our spiritual welfare, which is itself a sin, and which will soon manifest itself to be the source or root of many sins.

There are other seasons friendly to prayer which the pious mind will gladly embrace. The retirement of the closet—the day of sacred rest—the solitary walk—the sleepless night—these are seasons peculiarly appropriate to prayer, and these presenting themselves frequently, afford us many opportunities of drawing near to God.

But it is not enough to observe the stated and occasional seasons of prayer to which we have referred. We are commanded to “pray without ceasing ;” and there are similar injunctions in other parts of the Word of God. Our Lord spoke a parable to this end, “that men ought always to pray and not to faint.” “Watch, therefore,” said he, at another time, “and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man.” We are commanded by the apostle to “continue instant in prayer,” “to pray always with all prayer and supplication in the spirit, and to watch thereunto with all perseverance ;” to “continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving ;” and again, not to multiply quotations, we are commanded to “be careful for nothing, but in every thing by prayer and supplication to let our requests be made known unto God.” From these passages it appears that habitual prayerfulness of mind is required of us. It is necessary, not only, that we should scrupulously and regularly observe certain stated seasons for prayer, and that occasionally, and as our circumstances require, we should be more frequent and earnest at a Throne of Grace, but we must also maintain habitually the temper and spirit of prayer. Not that this duty is to take the place of all other duties. We are not to abandon the world and retire to the seclusion of a cloister, in order to fulfil the commands which we have now quoted. It is, in fact, one great end of prayer to enable us to fulfil all duties, and to glorify God in the sphere which has been assigned to us. On the other hand, the discharge of other duties must not supersede, or interfere with the discharge of this duty. Whatever may be the nature of our worldly calling, however lawful, and however laborious may be the exertions which it requires of us, and whatever be the cares and anxieties which it naturally costs us, we are not to be considered as exempted from yielding obedience to the requirement, that we should pray always, and not faint. It is not necessary, it is not possible, it is not desirable, that we should be always engaged in actual prayer; but we must have such an abiding sense of our dependence upon God—such a constant reference to him as the Father of Mercies, and the Ruler of the universe, and such a habitual application to him, and such a continual waiting upon him for mercy to pardon, for wisdom to direct, and for grace to help us, that it will be impossible to characterise us otherwise than by saying, that we pray without ceasing. If at every moment we are dependent upon the bounty of God—if every blessing we enjoy cometh down from him—if prayer is an appointed means for obtaining the blessings that we need—if it is not sufficient to sum up all our supplications in one brief and comprehensive petition—if it becomes us to pray for specific and individual blessings, and if there is not an hour of our lives when some particular mercies are not especially required, then it is obvious that no limits should be set to the frequency of our supplications. If it becomes us to receive every blessing as from our heavenly Father's hand, seeing that we are indebted for them to him, then it is fit that we should wait upon him, in the attitude of humble and helpless supplicants for them all. It is in this way, and not simply by stated and occasional prayers, that a sense of our dependence will be most effectually maintained, and the riches of God's unwearied benevolence, and the minuteness and tenderness of his paternal care will be most fully appreciated. It is in this way, therefore, that we will be best enabled to sanctify the Lord God in our hearts, and to render to him the honour which is due unto his name. The feelings of reverence, and gratitude, and love, and humility, and confident hope, which are called into exercise during the prescribed and periodical seasons of prayer, will thus be maintained throughout life, and the homage which we pay to him will be a perpetual incense. It might also be shewn that prayer is indeed the breath of the Christian's life, and that in order to our continuance and advancement therein, it is essential for us to pray without ceasing.

It may be objected, however, that the maintenance of such a prayerful frame as the Scriptures inculcate will operate injuriously as a constraint upon the mind. It would be a sufficient answer to this objection to observe, that unremitting prayer is enjoined by God, and is essential to our own spiritual welfare. In reality, however, the objection has no foundation in truth. We deny not, that to the ungodly man, habitual prayer would be a constraint, but it is our duty "whatsoever we do to do all to the glory of God;" and if it is our permanent and prevailing desire to glorify God in all that we do, then there is nothing that will more easily and naturally fall in with the general tenor of our thoughts, or contribute more to preserve them in a right direction, than a spirit of sustained prayerfulness. On this subject we might refer to the experience of the people of God; and the testimony they would bear is this, that prayer has often been the means of delivering their minds from constraint, and that never have their thoughts been more clear, and their minds more active and more under command, than when they were in the most devotional frame. It may be objected by others, that the duty of habitual prayerfulness is impracticable. To perform this duty perfectly may indeed be impracticable while we remain upon earth, but the same objection may be urged in reference to every duty. The mere hopelessness, then, of rendering a faultless obedience to this command, is no reason for refusing to aim at the highest attainable perfection; besides, it is believed that habitual prayerfulness is much less impracticable than is sometimes supposed. The mind is unspeakably active, our thoughts succeed each other with incredible rapidity, and the mechanic in his workshop, and the merchant amidst the hurry of the crowded and busy market-place, may lift up their hearts in secret prayer,—and even the student, without sensibly interrupting his train of thought, may ask the guidance of the Spirit of God. And further, when we consider, how many foolish, and useless, and sinful thoughts are entertained by us daily, and which might well be dispensed with, it must be acknowledged, that without being hindered in the discharge of any other duty, abundant scope and opportunity are afforded to us to pray without ceasing.

The blessings bestowed directly in answer to our prayers, and their importance to our spiritual welfare, will not be known until "the day shall reveal it." They will, in some degree, indeed be manifest in this world, in our victory over sin,—in our growing likeness to Christ, in our inward peace and joy. And of this every believer may rest assured, that none of his prayers, however short, or however imperfect, are unheard or unheeded in heaven. Besides, how many, and how important are the indirect advantages which would result from the maintenance of a devotional spirit. If we were to pray without ceasing, what a change would be wrought upon our heart and life! How many vain and frivolous thoughts would be expelled from the mind! How many desires would be crucified, which now are entertained! How many unguarded words would be repressed before they had obtained an utterance! What an improvement of our time would be made,—what activity and diligence in the discharge of every duty would be exhibited,—with what patience and meek resignation would we submit to every trial,—what nearness to God would be enjoyed,—what fortitude would a sense of his presence inspire,—what an unspeakable happiness would be imparted to the soul! Sin would become exceeding sinful in our eyes, we would grow in a sense of the preciousness of Christ; an elevation of mind would uniformly characterize us, an aspect of sacredness would be imparted to every action which we perform, and God would be all in all.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE REV. HENRY MARTYN, B. D.

IN our last number, we called the attention of our readers to the brief but interesting career of a faithful messenger of the Lord Jesus, and in doing so, we felt ourselves irresistibly reminded of one who, kindred in name as in spirit, was honoured to be a successful labourer in the Lord's vineyard, not amid the comforts and encouragements of home, but under the unhealthy climate, and amid the darkness and superstition of Eastern countries. If, in the general characteristics of their minds, there was a considerable resemblance between the late pastor of St George's Parish, and the distinguished individual whose life we are about to sketch, in the events of their history they differed widely—so widely, as to present a sufficient variety of incident, amid the obvious similarity in point of disposition and feeling.

Henry Martyn was born at Truro, in the county of Cornwall, on the 18th of February 1781. His father had originally followed the humble occupation of a miner, but by diligent attention to the acquisition of knowledge, he rose from a state of poverty and depression to one of comparative ease and comfort, having been admitted as chief clerk to a merchant in Truro. Henry's education was commenced at the grammar school of the town, and his progress appears to have been satisfactory both to his master and his parents. His dispositions at this early period of his life are represented to have been of a very amiable cast, tender and affectionate, mild and pliant.

After having remained at school till he was between fourteen and fifteen years of age, he was induced to become a candidate for a vacant scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In the competition, however, he was unsuccessful, and in after life he adverted to his disappointment as having originated in the wise arrangements of his heavenly Father, who had thereby altered the whole aspect of his future history. After this repulse, Henry returned home, and continued at school some time longer. At length he entered St John's College, Cambridge, where he studied with the utmost ardour and perseverance. Provisionally for his spiritual improvement, he had the privilege of the conversation and company of a religious friend at College, besides enjoying the tender counsels and admonitions of a sister in Cornwall, who was a Christian of a meek, heavenly, and affectionate spirit. To the latter, particularly, he was indebted for much instruction in that knowledge which alone, by the blessing of the Spirit, "maketh wise unto salvation." In speaking of her frequent conversations with him on spiritual matters, he thus expresses himself:—"I went home this summer, and was frequently addressed by my dear sister on the subject of religion; but the sound of the Gospel conveyed in the admonition of a sister, was grating to my ears." The first result of her tender exhortations and earnest endeavours was very discouraging; a violent conflict took place in her brother's mind, between his conviction of the truth of what she urged and his love of the world; and for the present, the latter prevailed: yet sisters, similarly circumstanced, may learn from this case not merely their duty, but from the final result, the success they may anticipate from the faithful discharge of it.—"I think," he observes, when afterwards reviewing this period with a spirit truly broken and contrite, "I do not remember a time in which the wickedness of my heart rose to a greater height, than during my stay at home. The consummate selfishness and exquisite irritability of my mind were displayed in rage, malice, and envy, in pride and vain glory, and contempt of all; in the harshest language to my sister, and even to my father, if he happened to differ from my mind and will; O what an example of patience and mildness was he! I love to think of his excellent qualities, and it is frequently the anguish of my heart, that I ever could be base and wicked enough to pain him by the slightest neglect. O my God and Father, why is not my heart doubly agonized at the remembrance of all my great transgressions against Thee ever since I have known Thee as such! I left my sister and father in October, and him I saw no more. I promised my sister that I would read the Bible for myself, but on being settled at college, Newton engaged all my thoughts."

Henry's residence at College for more than two years, was productive of much improvement in scientific knowledge, but he still remained ignorant of those truths which are infinitely superior in value to all the learning of the schools. At length, however, in the providence of God, his mind became deeply impressed with a sense of the importance of Religion. The event which seems to have been instrumental in arousing him from his melancholy indifference on this vitally important subject, was his father's death. It was very pleasing to his sister to perceive from his letters, that a decided change had taken place in his views and feelings in regard to divine things. He still continued to exert himself with as much ardour as ever in his studies at college, but the spirit from which he acted was essentially different. He no longer counted secular knowledge the only, or even the chief object of pursuit; and though at the early age of twenty, he succeeded in carrying off the highest academical honours, his reflection on the occasion shews the moderate view which he took of all earthly blessings: "I obtained my highest wishes," he said, "but was surprised to find I had grasped a shadow." And yet, with such subdued feelings, he did not relax in his perseverance to attain an acquaintance with the most important departments of human learning; nay, so great was his diligence, that by his fellow-students he was designated "the man who had not lost an hour." Christians have the strongest of all motives to be industrious; time acquires with them a peculiar value, as hurrying them onward to that solemn hour when "we must each one of us give an account of himself to God."

After having made a short visit to his friends in Cornwall, Henry returned again to Cambridge, where he studied so assiduously, that in a short time he obtained a fellowship in St John's College. Shortly before this he had become personally acquainted with the Rev. Mr Simeon, to whose pious and affectionate instructions he, in common with multitudes, felt that he owed much. It was in consequence of a remark made by this honoured servant of Christ, in reference to the benefit which had accrued from the labours of Dr Carey in India, that Martyn was first led to think of dedicating himself to the Missionary cause. This resolution was soon after confirmed by reading the life and labours of David Brainerd, whose ardent piety and apostolic exertions excited in the mind of the youthful Martyn a strong desire to imitate his example. At length, after serious consideration of the subject in all its bearings, and earnest prayer to the Almighty for his direction, he offered himself as a Missionary to the Church Missionary Society, then called the Society for Missions to Africa and the East. His feelings at this important crisis in his history may be drawn from the following letter, addressed at the time to his youngest sister:—

"I received your letter yesterday, and thank God for the concern you manifest for my spiritual welfare. O that we may love each other more and more in the Lord! The passages you bring from the Word of God were appropriate to my case, particularly those from the first Epistle of St Peter, and that to the Ephesians, though I do not seem to have given you a right view of my state. The dejection I sometimes labour under seems not to arise from doubts of my acceptance with God, though it tends to produce them; nor from desponding views of my own backwardness in the divine life for I am more prone to self-dependence and conceit, but from the prospect of the difficulties I have to encounter in the whole of my future life. The thought that I must be unceasingly employed in the same kind of work amongst poor ignorant people, is what my proud spirit revolts at. To be obliged to submit to a thousand uncomfortable things that must happen to me, whether as a minister or a missionary, is what the flesh cannot endure. At these times I feel neither love to God nor man; and, in proportion as these graces of the Spirit languish, my besetting sins—pride, and discontent, and unwillingness for every duty, make me miserable. You will best enter into my views by considering those texts which serve to recal me to a right aspect of things. I have not that coldness in prayer you would expect, but generally find myself strengthened in faith and humility and love after it; but the impression is so short. I am at this time enabled to give myself, body, soul, and spirit, to God, and perceive it to be my most reasonable service. How it may be when the trial comes, I know not, yet I will trust and not be afraid. In order to do his will cheerfully, I want love for the souls of men to suffer it—I want humility—let these be the subjects of your supplications for me. I am thankful to God that you are so free from anxiety and care: we cannot but with praise acknowledge his goodness. What does it signify whether we be rich or poor, if we are sons of God? How unconscious are they of their real greatness, and will be so till they find themselves in glory! When we contemplate our everlasting inheritance, it seems too good to be true; yet it is no more than is due to the blood of God manifest in the flesh."

In the following year, Mr Martyn received ordination to the office of the holy ministry, and commenced the exercise of his pastoral functions as curate of Mr Simeon in the church of the Holy Trinity in Cambridge, undertaking likewise the charge of the parish of Solworth, a small village at no great distance from the University. At this place, in the very outset of his ministry, an incident occurred which seems to have made a deep impression upon his mind:—"An old man, who had been one of his auditors, walked by the side of his horse for a considerable time, warning him to reflect, that if any souls perished through his neglect, their blood would be required at his hand. He exhorted him to shew his hearers that they were perishing sinners; to be much engaged in secret prayer; and to labour after an entire departure from himself to Christ. 'From what he said on the last head,' observes Mr Martyn, 'it was clear that I had but little experience; but I lifted my heart afterwards to the Lord, that I might be fully instructed in righteousness.' So meekly and thankfully did this young minister listen to the affectionate counsel of an old disciple."

In the early part of the year 1804, Mr Martyn's prospects of going abroad as a missionary were apparently in danger of being frustrated, in consequence of the unexpected loss of his little patrimony. This was to his mind the more distressing, as it rendered his younger sister entirely dependant upon him; and he could not bear the thought of leaving her in actual distress when he himself, by remaining in England, might alleviate or remove it. In these circumstances, he resolved to consult some of his friends, and set out for that purpose to London. Exertions were in consequence made to procure for him a chaplainship to the East India Company, but in vain, and he returned to resume his ministerial labours at Cambridge, resigned to the will of God, and ambitious only to discharge present duty with fidelity, "casting all his care" upon the Lord, knowing well that "He cared for him."

A view of his indefatigable labours at this time may be given in the words of his biographer:—"In the interval which passed between the months of February and June, he was found earnestly labouring in the service of his divine Master. He preached animating and awakening discourses: he excited societies of private Christians to 'watch, quit themselves as men, and be strong:' he visited many of the poor, the afflicted, and the dying: he warned numbers of the careless and prodigal,—in a word, he did the work of an Evangelist. Often did he redeem time from study, from recreation, and from the intercourse of friends, that, like his Redeemer, he might enter the abodes of misery, either to arouse the unthinking slumberer, or to administer consolation to the dejected penitent. Many an hour did he pass in an hospital or an alms-house; and often, after a day of labour and fatigue, when wearied almost to an extremity of endurance, he would read and pray with the servant who had the care of his rooms, thus making it his meat and drink, his rest as well as his labour, to do the will of his heavenly Father, in conformity to the example of Christ:

His care was fixed
To fill his odorous lamp with deeds of light,
And hope that reaps not shame.

In a short time, the prospect seemed to open up to him of obtaining what had been the anxious wish of his friends, a chaplainship in the service of the East India Company. Fully encouraged to expect that he would not in this case be disappointed, he set out for Cornwall on a visit to his friends. While there, he frequently preached, and both his sisters heard him, the youngest with delight, and the eldest with every appearance of being seriously impressed. "I found," said he, referring to the latter, "that she had been deeply affected, and from her conversation I received great satisfaction. In the evening I walked by the water-side till late, having my heart full of praise to God for having given me such hopes of my sisters." At length, after having withstood the most earnest entreaties of his friends to remain in England, he began to make preparations for finally leaving his native shore. To one possessed of such tender sensibilities as Henry Martyn, it was a trial of extreme severity to bid a long, and, in all probability, a last farewell to his country and his friends. But on this, as indeed on every former occasion in his history, he felt that the principles and motives of Christianity are sufficient to triumph over the strongest feelings and the tenderest affections of the human heart. Some months, however, elapsed between the last visit which he paid to his friends and his final departure from England. This intervening period he spent in his ministerial labours at Cambridge. At length the hour arrived when he was summoned to embark for India. His feelings on this occasion he thus describes in a letter to his favourite sister, who could so well sympathize with him in all his spiritual anxieties:—

"I rejoice to say, that I never had so clear a conviction of my call as at present, as far as respects the inward impression. Never did I see so much the exceeding excellency and glory and sweetness of the work, nor had so much the favourable testimony of my own conscience, nor perceived so plainly the smile of God. I am constrained to say, what am I, or what is my father's house, that I should be made willing,—what am I that I should be so happy, so honoured?" In his Journal, likewise, he expresses himself to the same effect: "I felt more persuaded of my call than ever; there was scarcely the shadow of a doubt left: rejoice, O my soul, thou shalt be the servant of God in this life and in the next, for all the boundless ages of eternity."

The circumstances attendant on his departure are thus stated by his biographer:—

"On the 8th of July, Mr Martyn left London for Portsmouth; and such was the acuteness of his feelings during this journey, that he fainted, and fell into a convulsion fit at the inn where he slept on the road, a painful intimation to those friends who were with him of the poignancy of that grief which he endeavoured as much as possible to repress and conceal. The next morning, however, he was sufficiently recovered to proceed, and was much refreshed in his spirits at the sight of many of his brethren at Portsmouth, who had come, (several from a considerable distance,) that they might affectionately accompany him to the ship. Among these was one whose presence afforded him an unexpected happiness. 'To be obliged to give up all hopes of your accompanying me to Portsmouth,' he had written a short time before to Mr Simeon, 'is a greater disappointment than I can well describe. Having been led to expect it, I seem to experience a painful privation. However, you will not now have the pain of observing in your brother a conversation and spirit unsuitable to the important work on which he is going. Yet this I believe, that though I have little affection towards heavenly things, I have less towards every thing earthly.' From Mr Simeon he learnt, to his exceeding comfort, that his flock at Cambridge intended on the day of his departure, as far as it could be ascertained, to give themselves up to fasting and prayer; and at his hands he received, with peculiar gratification, a silver compass, sent by them as a memorial of their unfeigned affection."

And in setting sail, he thus describes his feelings in a letter to Mr Simeon:—"It was a very painful moment to me when I awoke in the morning after you left us, and found the fleet actually sailing down the Channel. Though it was what I had anxiously been looking forward to so long, yet the consideration of being parted for ever from my friends almost overcame me. My feelings were those of a man who should suddenly be told, that every friend he had in the world was dead. It was only by prayer for them that I could be comforted; and this was indeed a refreshment to my soul, because, by meeting them at the throne of grace, I seemed again to be in their society."

Unexpectedly, the vessel was forced to put back to Falmouth, where Mr Martyn had an opportunity of spending three weeks with his friends, after which he again embarked, and in a short time the shores of England disappeared from his view. During the voyage, he spent his time partly in study, and partly in labouring to promote the spiritual interests both of the sailors and of the soldiers on board ship. On reaching the Cape, the following beautiful passage occurs in his Journal:—

"January 30.—Rose at five, and began to ascend Table Mountain at six with S * * * and M * * *. I went on chiefly alone. I thought of the Christian life—what uphill work it is—and yet there are streams flowing down from the top, just as there was water coming down by the Kloof, by which we ascended. Towards the top it was very steep, but the hope of being soon at the summit encouraged me to ascend very lightly. As the Kloof opened, a beautiful flame-coloured flower appeared in a little green hollow, waving in the breeze. It seemed to be an emblem of the beauty and peacefulness of heaven, as it shall open upon the weary soul when its journey is finished, and the struggles of the death-bed are over. We walked up and down the whole length, which might be between two and three miles, and one might be said to look round the world from this promontory. I felt a solemn awe at the grand prospect, from which there was neither noise nor small objects to draw off my attention. I reflected, especially when looking at the immense expanse of sea on the East, which was to carry me to India, on the certainty that the name of Christ should at some period resound from shore to shore. I felt commanded to wait in silence, and see how God would bring his promises to pass. We began to descend at half-past two. Whilst sitting to rest myself towards night, I began to reflect with death-like despondency on my friendless condition. Not that I wanted any of the comforts of life, but I wanted those kind friends who loved me, and in whose company I used to find such delights after my fatigues. And then, remembering that I should never see them more, I felt one of those keen pangs of misery that occasionally shoot across my breast. It seemed like a dream that I had actually undergone banishment from them for life; or rather like a dream that I had ever hoped to share the enjoyments of social life. But, at this time, I solemnly renewed my self-dedication to God, praying that for his service I might receive grace to spend my days in continued suffering, and separation from all I held most dear in this life—for ever. Amen.—How vain and transitory are those pleasures which the worldliness of my heart will ever be magnifying into real good! The rest of the evening I felt weaned from the world and all its concerns, with somewhat of a melancholy tranquillity."

At length, after a voyage of nine months from the date of his leaving Portsmouth, Mr Martyn's eyes were gratified with a sight of India. This was to be the scene of his labours; and the very extent of the field, and the apparent hopelessness of the enterprise, seem to have affected his mind almost immediately on landing. "What surprises me," says he, "is the change of views I have here from what I had in England. There my heart expanded with hope and joy at the prospect of the speedy conversion of the Heathen, but here the sight of the apparent impossibility requires a strong faith to support me."

On arriving at Calcutta, Mr Martyn was hospitably received into the house of the Rev. David Brown, whose devoted piety and Christian worth were peculiarly remarkable; and not long after he had taken up his residence there, he was seized with a severe attack of fever, which for some time was rather alarming. His feelings are thus described by his own pen:—"I could derive no comfort from reflecting on my past life. Indeed, exactly in proportion as I looked for evidences of grace, I lost that brokenness of spirit I wished to retain, and could not lie with simplicity at the foot of the cross. I really thought that I was departing this life. I began to pray as on the verge of eternity; and the Lord was pleased to break my hard heart. I lay in tears interceding for the unfortunate natives of this country, thinking with myself that the most despicable sordar of India was of as much value in the sight of God as the king of Great Britain."

During his residence at Aldeen with Mr Brown, Mr Martyn employed himself chiefly in acquiring the Hindoostanee, besides preaching occasionally to his countrymen in Calcutta. The purity of his doctrines, as might have been expected, proved offensive to many; but, in spite of all opposition, this devoted messenger of Christ was determined to know nothing in his public ministrations save Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

On the 15th of September, Mr Martyn received his appointment to Dinapore. The account of his departure from his dear Christian friends at Calcutta, is thus beautifully given by his biographer:—

"A few days before he left Aldeen, several of Mr Martyn's friends came together to his pagoda, in order that they might unite with him in imploring a blessing on his intended labours. Such a meeting could not fail of being highly interesting; and it was not the less so from a recollection of the place in which they were assembled,—a Christian congregation in a building which once had been an idol temple, seemed to supply a consolatory pledge, as well as a significant emblem of what all earnestly prayed for, and confidently anticipated in poor idolatrous India. 'My soul,' said Mr Martyn, 'never yet had such divine enjoyment. I felt a desire to break from the body and join the high praises of the saints above. May I go 'in the strength of this many days,'—Amen. 'My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour.' How sweet to walk with Jesus—to love him—and to die for him! 'Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.' And again, the next day he says—'The blessed God has again visited my soul in his power, and all that was within me blessed his holy name. I found my heaven begun on earth. No work so sweet as that of praying, and living wholly to the service of God.'

"On the 15th October, after taking leave of the Church at Calcutta in a farewell discourse, and of the family at Aldeen in an exposition at morning worship, Mr Martyn entered his budgerow,* which was to convey him to Dinapore, and sailed up the Ganges, accompanied by his brethren, Mr Brown, Mr Corrie, and Mr Parsons. Mr Marshman, seeing them pass by the Mission House, could not resist joining the party; and after going a little way, left them with prayer. At night, Mr Martyn prayed with his brethren in the vessel; and the next day they devoted the whole morning to religious exercises. 'How sweet is prayer,' said he, 'to my soul at this time. I seem as if I could never be tired, not only of spiritual joys, but of spiritual employments, since these are now the same.'

"The day after, the weather becoming tempestuous, his brethren sorrowfully and reluctantly left him to prosecute his voyage alone. Before they parted, however, they spent the whole morning (to use his own words) in a divine ordinance, in which each of them read a portion of Scripture, and all of them sang and prayed. 'Mr Brown's passage, chosen from the 1st of Joshua, was very suitable,' said Mr Martyn,—'Have I not sent thee;—' Let this be an answer to my fears, O my Lord, that I am in thy work; and that therefore I shall not go forth at my own charges, or fight any enemies but thine. It was a very affecting season to me,—but in prayer I was far from a state of seriousness and affection."

At the commencement of his labours at Dinapore, Mr Martyn met with considerable opposition; but such was the mild and affectionate, yet firm adherence to the truth, by which his whole conduct was characterized, that he soon succeeded in gaining the esteem and the confidence of those who waited upon his ministry. In prosecuting his work as a Missionary, he now commenced the study of the Sanscrit, besides dedicating a considerable time every day to a translation of the Parables into Hindoostanee, along with a commentary upon them. Both among Europeans and natives, he was indefatigable in preaching the Gospel, and endeavouring to commend the truth to every man's conscience.

In the superintendence of the schools which he had established, in his Sabbath duties, and in his week-day labours, Mr Martyn was so incessantly occupied, that his health began to yield. Still he felt unwilling to relax in his exertions. He devoted much of his time to the translation of the Scriptures into Hindoostanee and Persian,—an employment which seems to have afforded him peculiar delight. “The time fled imperceptibly,” he observes, “while so delightfully engaged in the translations; the days seemed to have passed like a moment. Blessed be God for some improvement in the languages! May every thing be for edification in the Church! What do I not owe to the Lord, for permitting me to take part in a translation of his Word; never did I see such wonder, and wisdom, and love, in that blessed book, as since I have been obliged to study every expression; and it is a delightful reflection, that death cannot deprive us of the pleasure of studying its mysteries.”

While thus engaged, however, in his Master's work, it pleased Him with whom all wisdom dwells, to visit him with a severe trial, in the death of his eldest sister, the intelligence of which affected him with the most pungent sorrow. “O my heart, my heart,” he exclaimed, “is it, can it be true, that she has been lying so many months in the cold grave! Would that I could always remember it, or always forget it; but to think for a moment of other things, and then to feel the remembrance of it coming, as if for the first time, rends my heart asunder. When I look round upon the creation, and think that her eyes see it not, but have closed upon it for ever,—that I lie down in my bed, but that she has lain down in her grave.—Oh! is it possible! I wonder to find myself still in life;—that the same tie which united us in life, has not brought death at the same moment to both. O great and gracious God! what should I do without Thee! But now thou art manifesting thyself as the God of all consolation to my soul; never was I so near thee; I stand on the brink, and long to take my flight. There is not a thing in the world for which I could wish to live, except the hope that it may please God to appoint me some work. And how shall my soul ever be thankful enough to thee, O thou most incomprehensibly glorious Saviour, Jesus! O what hast thou done to alleviate the sorrows of life! and how great has been the mercy of God towards my family, in saving us all! How dreadful would be the separation of relations in death, were it not for Jesus!”

Acutely as Mr Martyn suffered under this afflicting dispensation, he omitted the prosecution of his various duties for only one day, devoting himself in season, and out of season, to the work which his Master had assigned him. It was not so much by preaching, in the first instance, that he hoped to reach the hearts of the natives, but by the institution of schools, and the distribution of the Scriptures. Anxious to try the effect of this mode of carrying on his missionary work, he resisted the earnest solicitations of his friends at Calcutta, who were urgent with him to accept the Mission Church at the Presidency. Mr Martyn preferred the retirement of Dinapore, with the hope of benefiting the natives, and, therefore, though the application was made to him through his much esteemed friend, Mr Brown, he counted it his duty to decline the offer. In a short time, however, his present situation was rendered much less agreeable, by the removal of the only family with whom he had lived on terms of Christian intimacy, and to whom he had been the instrument of first imparting serious impressions. And another circumstance which distressed his mind not a little, was the temporary suspension of public worship on the Sabbath, in consequence of the state of the weather. Application had been made to the governor-general for the erection of a church, and meanwhile Mr Martyn opened his own house as a place of worship. No exertions were spared to fulfil, as an hireling, his day; “the early morning, as well as the closing evening, found him engaged in his delightful labours.” At length he succeeded in accomplishing his great work,—the version of the New Testament in Hindoostanee.

In the early part of the year 1809, Mr Martyn was removed from his station at Dinapore to Cawnpore, where his duties varied little from those to which he had already been accustomed. Soon after his arrival at his new station, intelligence reached him from Europe, first of the dangerous illness, then of the death of that sister who had taken so deep an interest in his spiritual welfare. This threw a deep gloom, for a time, over Mr Martyn's mind, but still he persevered in labouring for souls, as one who must give an account. He now commenced his public ministrations among the heathen, preaching the Gospel to a crowd of mendicants who assembled on a stated day before his house, for the purpose of receiving alms. This motley congregation of beggars, of all descriptions, increased to the amount of even eight hundred, to whom an opportunity was thus afforded Mr Martyn of preaching the glad tidings of salvation.

In the midst of these exertions Mr Martyn's health began to fail. An attack of pain in the chest, accompanied with fever and debility, excited considerable alarm in the minds of his friends. But it was with extreme difficulty that he was prevailed upon to spare himself; providentially, however, he obtained no small assistance and relief by the arrival of his dear friend, Mr Corrie, who happened to stop at Cawnpore on his way to Agra. Notwithstanding this seasonable aid, Mr Martyn's health became so precarious that he was recommended either to try the effect of a sea voyage, or to return to England for a short time. The latter alternative he at last, though with reluctance, resolved to adopt. Still anxious, however, to carry forward his missionary work, he decided upon going into Arabia and Persia, for the purpose of having the Persian and Arabic translations of the New Testament revised and corrected by some of the most learned men. At Shiraz, in Persia, where he resided for some time, he excited great interest by the success with which he conducted discussions with the Moolahs and the Soufie doctors. After a stay of ten months he completed the Persian New Testament, and also the version of the Psalms in Persian,—“a sweet employment,” to use his own words, “and which caused six weary moons that waxed and waned since its commencement, to pass unnoticed.”

Having finished the translation, which was the object of his journey, he set out from Shiraz, with the design of laying the work before the king of Persia; but, finding that from some informality, he could not obtain an audience, he proceeded to Tebriz, where the British minister resided, and from whom he expected to receive the necessary introduction to the king. After having completed this tedious journey, Mr Martyn was attacked with a severe fever, which compelled him to give up all idea of presenting the New Testament in person. It was now becoming every day more evident that a longer residence in the East would prove speedily fatal to our missionary; and, accordingly, ten days after his recovery from the fever, he set out on his journey homewards. His design was to reach England by way of Constantinople; and accompanied by a Tartar guide, whose inhuman barbarity seems to have caused Mr Martyn's death, he had reached no farther than Tocat, when, on the 16th October 1812, he breathed his last. The special circumstances of his death are unknown, but one thing is certain, that, whatever these circumstances were, he has reaped a rich reward of all his labours, toils, and privations in the cause of the Redeemer. “Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.”

FLEMISH MARTYRS IN 1556.

In the reign of Charles V. of Spain, who was monarch of the Netherlands also, the Gospel spread to a great extent. The city of Lille received it with especial favour, in spite of the bloody edicts made against heretics. The Reformed ministers preached in private houses, in woods, in caves, and for a time the truth mightily prevailed. But when the Church at Lille had increased and was flourishing, Satan stirred up his instruments. One evening, in 1556, the provost of the town, with all his assessors, resolved to go forth and search every house, to see that there were no assemblies held. This was on a Saturday; and the first house which they assailed was that of a respected citizen, Robert Oguier. They instantly seized him and his son, Baudichon, and led them to prison, because they were found in the act of instructing the children and servants in the fear of God and the knowledge of his Word.

A few days after, these two excellent men, father and son, were tried before the magistrates. They boldly confessed the Reformed faith, and were put to the torture, in order to extort the names of all who frequented their meetings; but they firmly refused to name any one. They were then condemned to die. When the day of execution arrived, they separated the son from the father. On this, the son, as he left the prison, said, "I beseech you support my poor father, and do not trouble him; he is an aged man, and very feeble; do not try to hinder him from receiving the crown of martyrdom." One of the Franciscans hereupon broke out, "Away with you, wretch! it is all your fault that your father is now ruined." And then turning to the executioner, said, "Go, do your office, for we are losing our pains; they are possessed by the devil, and it is impossible to gain them over." Baudichon was undressed in a chamber, and as they put the bag of powder on his breast, one present said to him, "Were you my own brother, I should sell all I had in order to get fagots to burn you: you are too well treated." The martyr replied, "I thank you, my friend; may the Lord shew you mercy." Meanwhile, those around the old man were trying to persuade him to take the crucifix, at least, in his hands, that the people might not be provoked, and they tied an image of wood between his hands; but his son, seeing what was done, hastily snatched it away, and threw it down, saying, "Let none be offended because we will not have a Christ of wood; for we carry Jesus Christ, the Son of the Living God, within us in our hearts; and we have the words of his Holy Scriptures in the bottom of our hearts."

They would not permit them to make any confession of their faith; but when the son was bound to the stake, he began to sing Psalm xvii., on which a monk cried aloud, "Listen to the wicked errors which they teach to the people!"

In binding the father, the executioner struck him on the foot with a blow of the hammer. The old man asked, "My friend, you have wounded me; why do you use me so inhumanly?" "Ah," cried out one of the monks, "they wish to have the name of martyrs, and if we just touch them, they roar out as if murdered." The son of the old man calmly replied, that if they feared death and its torments, they should not have come thither; and added "O God, our everlasting Father, accept this sacrifice of our bodies for the sake of thy Son." One of the priests vociferated, "You lie; God is not your father; you have the devil for your father." The martyr made no reply to this insult, but, lifting his eyes to heaven, and speaking to his aged father, said, "O father, look up; I see the heavens open, and thousand thousands of angels around us, rejoicing at our confession before men. Let us be glad, for the glory of God is revealed"—— "Hell is open," cried one of the monks, "and thousand thousands of devils are here waiting for your souls!" Just at this moment, one from the crowd cried aloud, "Courage, Oguier, endure to the end; your cause is the truth; I am one of yours," and then plunged into the multitude, and escaped undiscovered.

Fire was put to the wood; and the last words heard from the martyrs was the son encouraging his father as the fire burnt their feet: "Be of good comfort, father! but a moment more, father, and we are in the everlasting mansions!—Jesus Christ, we commend our spirits to Thee."

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT MENZIES,

"For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be," &c.—MAT. xxiv. 27—31.

It is unnecessary to enter minutely into the critical arguments by which it has been clearly demonstrated, that these verses refer solely and exclusively to the future advent of our Saviour. Such a discussion, even if it could be rendered generally interesting, and embraced within the narrow limits of a discourse, might not, perhaps, be greatly conducive to edification; suffice it merely to say, that the opinion of those who contend that our blessed Saviour continues here to prosecute the subject of the preceding context, and fills up, with some additional touches, the picture he had been drawing of the destruction about to overwhelm the state and capital of the Jews, can only be maintained at the expense of doing great and unwarrantable violence to the language; besides, it is not justified, as is erroneously supposed, by any necessity. What has proved the stumbling-block of the critics, is the word "immediately" at the commencement of the twenty-ninth verse, which seemed to connect in close union, with respect to time, the new train of circumstances which the Saviour proceeds to foretell, beginning with the darkening of the sun and moon, with those foretold by him already, and here referred to as the tribulation of those days. But there is the best reason for supposing, that this word "immediately" is an error, which the Greek interpreter has introduced into the text by mistranslating the original word used by the evangelist, who wrote his Gospel in the Syro-Chaldaic. Instead of "immediately" there ought to stand "suddenly;" and if, accordingly, we substitute the one for the other, it will be seen, that there is no necessity for supposing the new train of circumstances to be immediately connected with the former. They are, indeed, predicted as about to take place suddenly; and also, subsequently to the tribulations of Jerusalem, but whether they are to follow in close or remote succession is left altogether untold.

Upon these, in addition to many other grounds, we hold that the verses from the twenty-seventh to the thirty-first inclusive, treat of the final and glorious coming of our Lord to judge the world, and we now proceed to enquire what the passage tells us of this momentous event.

First then, we learn that it is to be preceded and announced to mankind by certain preternatural appearances in the material world. These are enumerated in the twenty-ninth verse. "The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens," the heavenly bodies, both small and great, "shall be shaken." St. Luke in the parallel passage adds, "and the sea and the waves roaring."

The prophets of the Old Testament, on several different occasions, employ a language precisely similar to this of our Saviour. Isaiah does so in foretelling the doom of Babylon; Ezekiel in foretelling that of Egypt. There are many other examples, but we shall cite only one. In denouncing the divine judgments against the nations which had oppressed Israel, the prophet Joel thus speaks: "The earth shall quake before them, the heavens shall tremble, the sun and moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining." It will be felt by every one, that it would be altogether discordant with the lofty tone of the prophetic phraseology in these places, to suppose that they referred to phenomena of so ordinary a nature and of such frequent occurrence as eclipses of the sun and moon, the accumulation of dark clouds in the sky, meteors, shooting stars, and earthquakes. The sacred penmen must have had before their minds changes of a loftier, more awful, and preternatural character. We do not know that any such portentous events accompanied the manifestations of divine wrath alluded to, and hence, if the impressions are to be interpreted literally, they must be regarded as notices of a remoter and more universal judgment blending itself in the prophet's enraptured fancy with the nearer and more confined inflictions which formed the immediate subject of his song, and as thus looking forward to events which are yet in the womb of time and not to be disclosed until the last day; in short, as anticipations of the Saviour's prophecy now under review. Perhaps, however, they are justly considered, according to the common opinion, as symbolical descriptions of political revolutions, and which have had their accomplishment in the subversion of the particular states with respect to which they were pronounced. But this is far from being certain. We speculate doubtfully on a subject which God appears to have intentionally concealed. It is our duty to restrain unsanctified curiosity, and patiently endure our ignorance until the day arrive in whose light we shall behold all the mysteries of providence unravelled, and all the darkness which now rests on the field of prophecy for ever done away.

Even were the symbolical character of these ancient predictions certain, it is difficult to see how this should impose a necessity, or even how it should lay a sufficient ground for a similar interpretation of the words of our Saviour. No, my brethren, when our Lord here tells us, "that the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, that the stars shall fall from heaven and all the powers of heaven shall be shaken," he means just what he says. A day is coming when the inhabitants of the world shall awake; but "behold the darkness is not yet passed." Struck with amazement and alarm, they shall raise their eyes aloft, but shall perceive no sun, or see it, perhaps, shorn of its beams, and diffusing a pale and ominous dawn. In vain shall they expect the moon to dispel the gloom of the uncertain night. The whole "firmament shall be shaken;" the stars shall quit, or seem to quit their places, and shoot at random athwart the obscure vault; and on earth the ocean will share the general convulsion of nature, and with the roaring of its waves make awful music congenial with the terrors of the scene.

By what means these appalling prodigies shall be brought about we are not told, and cannot divine. Luther hazards the conjecture, that they will be effects of the decay of nature—irregularities in the worn out machinery of a world, which having served the end for which it was made, is soon to be destroyed, and compares them to the dim eye, the fitful pulse, and convulsive agonies, which precede dissolution in the human body. Perhaps they may be consequences of that hidden and mysterious sympathy which subsists between the natural and moral universe—throes of a creation weary of its long subjection to vanity and sin, and indignantly struggling for its approaching emancipation,—the last and severest pangs of that agony of nature, of which St. Paul speaks, when he says, "that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body."

But to whatever cause conjecture may attribute them, there can be no doubt with respect to their end and design. They are the sign of the Son of Man in the heavens, intended to presage and announce his approach, and warn the inhabitants of the world to prepare for his reception. And oh, my brethren, how impressive it is "to think," and here I use, the magnificent language of Calvin, "to think," I say, "that all the creatures, both above and below, shall thus be made the heralds to summon mankind before that awful tribunal which, sunk in criminal indulgence, they have despised until the last day!"

Again, we learn from this passage that the return of Christ to the earth shall be visible and glorious. Nothing could surpass the humbleness of his first appearance here below. He laid aside his essential glory; no halo beamed around his head; no ray of uncreated beauty beamed from his countenance, to tell who he was, and awe beholders into adoration. He was above the glittering pomps and vanities with which the great and wealthy of this world court the gaze of the multitude. Undistinguished in person, of humble condition, poor in his circumstances, and meek and lowly in his demeanour, was the blessed Jesus; born in a stable and cradled in a manger, the whole tenor of his future life corresponded with the humbleness and penury of his birth. He made no display, he courted not observation, he sought not honour from men, and he received none. Once, and only once, did he permit the celestial glory of his person to shine through the veil of flesh which he had assumed, but this manifestation took place on a lonely mountain, was confined to three eye-witnesses, and brief in its duration; once, too, he condescended to let the people bear him in a sort of triumphal procession into Jerusalem; but then, as if in mockery of worldly pomp, the Son of David rode upon an ass. Even to shield himself from insult and cruelty, never did our Lord reveal his heavenly greatness; and oh! adorable patience, he who could have summoned to his rescue a host of angels, petrified his tormentors with a glimpse of his divinity, or commanded the fire of heaven to consume them in the twinkling of an eye, allowed himself to be reviled, spit upon and scourged, crowned with thorns, and nailed upon a cross!

Our Saviour paid a second visit to the earth, and on this occasion he came, not as he had done before, concealed beneath the mask of a human form, encompassed with the infirmities and burdened with the sufferings of mortality; but he came charged with the high commission, and armed with the authority and the power to execute the vengeance of heaven upon his guilty countrymen, in the very place where they had so contemptuously rejected and so cruelly slain him. Christ was present in person at the destruction of Jerusalem. The several evangelists designate that tragical event as "the coming of the Son of Man," and "the coming of Christ in his kingdom." But although present, he was present unseen. There were many who said, "Lo, here is Christ, and lo, there," but no where the eye could perceive him. He was sought in the desert, he was sought in the secret chamber, but in both he was sought in vain. With an invisible arm did he wield the scourge. Shrouded in a veil of mystery, did he let loose war, famine, pestilence, and murder upon the guilty inhabitants. They fondly expected the Messiah as a Saviour; never could they dream that he was actually there, the executioner of divine wrath against them. If his presence was recognised at all, it was only by the poor remnant of his disciples who remained within the walls, and treasuring his words in their heart, and marking the traces of his hand, were not afraid amidst all the horrors which surrounded them.

We look for another return of the Son of Man to the earth, and his advent on this occasion, as we are assured by his own prediction now under review, shall neither be invisible, like the vindictive visitation of Jerusalem, nor inglorious, like his first appearance in the flesh.

That it will be obvious to human sense, is implied in the twenty-seventh verse, where it is compared to a flash of lightning, traversing the heavens, attracting and fixing every eye. Nay, we are expressly told in the thirtieth, that "all the tribes of the earth shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven." Wherever in the New Testament the event is spoken of, it is stated in words which involve the same idea, viz. that Christ is to be revealed to the sight of men. It is called his "appearing"—his "revelation;" and what else can mean the language of the angels, who consoled the mourning disciples at his ascension: "While they beheld him," it is written, "he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight;" and while they looked steadfastly towards heaven as he went up, "Behold two men stood by them in white apparel, which also said, ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven. This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

Nor will this manifestation be visible only: it will be glorious and sublime. Men shall not merely behold the Saviour, but be dazzled and amazed by the brightness of his presence, and the glory and majesty which encompass him. Our text says, "they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." Our dark and feeble minds, it is true, are unable to form an adequate conception of the excellent majesty of the Son of Man on the great day of his appearing; but if this were possible, it would be done by the glowing language which Scripture employs upon the subject: He shall be seen descending from heaven; troops of angels shall attend him as a retinue; he shall be surrounded with a radiance bright as flame; and the sound of trumpets shall peal through the air. These are but a few traits gathered from St Paul's descriptions of the scene, who never speaks of it but his mind kindles into a holy rapture, and his language assumes a magnificence of tone which cannot fail to thrill every reader who has the slightest pretensions to the possession of a pure and sanctified taste.

And well may we believe that the glory of the Redeemer will justify on that day the prophetic raptures of his apostle. If, when transfigured on Mount Tabor before the three favoured disciples, his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was glistening and white as the snow, so that the glories of the vision dazzled the beholders, and made them afraid, how overpowering will it be when, with a majesty increased in proportion to the dignity of the scene, he shall present himself to the gaze of the world he is about to judge, confounding his foes with celestial radiance, and substantiating his claims to the love and adoration of his saints! Ah, my brethren, if when he tabernacled upon earth, it was hard to discern beneath the human form which he wore, and all the penury, neglect, and suffering with which he was encompassed, the lineaments of the Son of God, who on that day, when he wears the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person, shall be able to recognize the Son of Man,—the once poor and houseless wanderer of Judea,—the man of sorrows and acquainted with grief,—the despised, the insulted, and murdered Jesus!

Again, from this passage we learn, that the future advent of our Saviour will be of an universal character, i. e. its manifestation will be perceived, and its effects experienced over the whole world. The signs in the heavens by which his advent is to be presaged, are such as the revolution of the globe will make apparent to its inhabitants, on whatever corner of it they may dwell. Is it not compared to a gleam of lightning traversing the firmament from the east even to the west? Nay, it is expressly said, "all the tribes of the earth shall see the Son of Man coming in power and great glory." At his first coming, our Saviour chose the land of Judea as the place of his abode, and the scene of his labours; hence only his countrymen, or the strangers whom some happy fortune brought up to Jerusalem, enjoyed the enviable privilege of looking upon his blessed countenance. Not so when he shall come again: "Behold," it is written, "he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him." When, again, involved in mysterious secrecy, and imperceptible by human sense, he revisited the earth for the purpose of inflicting a just retribution on those who had despised and murdered him, the effects of his vengeance, consistently with this design, were confined to the scene of their crime: within the walls of Jerusalem did he send forth war, famine, and pestilence, like birds of prey to devour the guilty inhabitants. How different shall it be when he comes again!—Then shall the whole earth, to her farthest ends, both see and feel it;—then, wherever the carcass is, there shall the eagles of vengeance be gathered together;—then, in whatever corner of the globe unbelievers and impenitent sinners may dwell, the wrath of the despised Redeemer shall find them out. The ministers of his wrath shall visit every shore. Hence it is written, "All the tribes of the earth shall mourn." Nor will the saints feel the blessed effects of this event less extensively than its vengeful consequences shall be experienced by the ungodly; for "He shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."

We also learn from this passage, that the last advent of Christ shall be sudden, unexpected, unforeseen. Various and striking are the images employed in Scripture to illustrate this particular quality of our Saviour's advent. It is compared to a flash of lightning, the moment of whose issue from the clouds, human science cannot predict. Again, it is compared to the flood, which surprised the inhabitants of the Old World, supine in sloth, and careless of the approaching danger. Sometimes it is the assault of a thief, who comes by stealth at the darkest hour, when all are fast asleep. It is a snare which entraps the heedless bird. It is the sound of bridal mirth, breaking at midnight on the ear of sleepers, and announcing to them that the bridegroom is already at the door. With these similes correspond the admonitions which Christ and the apostles give to their disciples on this subject. "Watch," is the word, which denotes the attitude we maintain towards events which we are sure will come, but of the time of whose coming we are uncertain.

There is something exceedingly impressive in the mystery which Scripture has allowed to hang over the time of our Lord's advent. While in every page the early converts are summoned to watch and prepare for it, as if it were close at hand, they are, at the same time, discouraged and prohibited in the strongest manner from inquiring when it was actually to happen. Our Saviour employed the last words he uttered upon the earth for this purpose; for the farewell admonition which he gave to the witnesses of the ascension was, "It is not for you to know the times and the seasons, which the Father has put in his own power." The example which he gave in this respect, was faithfully imitated by the apostles, who carefully warned believers away from this subject, as one on which it was equally vain and unprofitable for them to speculate. Now, surely, as this mystery must have been intentional on the part of Him whose book the Bible is, it ought to be considered sacred and inviolable by man. It is true that a multitude of circumstances, some of a political, others of a moral and religious description, are mentioned in Scripture, as indicative and premonitory of the approach of the latter days; and these doubtless, when present, will fulfil the intention for which they have been recorded, and spread far and wide among men some general expectation of the day of the Lord, like that which prevailed over the world at his first advent. Especially may it be believed, will his faithful followers,—who wait for his appearing, devoutly study the Word, and mark the ways of Providence,—deeply feel this presentiment, as it will derive vigour from their wishes and brightness from their hopes. But even among them, it is probable it will ever be mingled with much doubt and uncertainty; and when strongest, be but like the old man's anticipation of death, which he feels to be drawing on, while it is kindly concealed from him in what precise year or month it is appointed to take place. Upon the unbelieving and impenitent children of this world, it will come with all its appalling preludes, sudden and startling like a peal of thunder, just as the flood overwhelmed the inhabitants of the Old World, while they were "eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage."

And finally, we may remark, that this advent of the Saviour, which such awful prodigies are to presage, which is to be accompanied with such pomp and glory, which all the tribes of the earth are to witness and feel, and over whose date, amidst the multifarious assurances afforded by Scripture of the fact itself, such a veil of mystery has been left, must be intended, it is clear, to accomplish some high and important design. Why comes the Lord in such a solemn and glorious manner, taking the world at unawares, and spreading consternation and alarm among all the tribes of its population? He comes to judge the world. A tribunal shall be erected; all mankind, both the quick and the dead, shall appear before him. The angels shall be sent forth to gather his elect from the four winds, and their trumpets shall ring an equally irresistible summons to those who are his foes. Then shall the time of the harvest be come, when the tares are to be separated from the wheat. The righteous and the wicked are now mingled in indiscriminate fellowship, inhabit the same place, are bound together by numerous ties of kindred and relationship, partake the same joys, and suffer alike the ordinary infirmities of humanity and ills of life; but then a complete and final distinction shall be made between them. Read in the fortieth verse:—"Then shall two be in the field, the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill, the one shall be taken, and the other left." According to their different characters shall men be ranged on the right hand and on the left. "Then shall the King say to them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life everlasting."

Remember, then, Christians, that in proportion as you conscientiously perform your part in preparing for this event, you will have the privilege of looking forward to it, not only without fear, but with exultation and joy. "Let the sun be darkened, and the moon refuse her light, and the stars fall from heaven, and all the powers of the heavens be shaken,"—these prodigies may speak terrors to others, but they are omens of approaching bliss to you. They are the budding of the fig-tree, which tells that the cold and cheerless winter of time is past, and that the summer of eternity is nigh. They are the sweet sounds of the evening bell, announcing to the weary labourers the hour of repose, and the approach of the Master to pay them their hire. They are signals of victory, cheering the faint and drooping soldier with the assurance that his warfare is now past, and that the Captain of his salvation is at hand with the crown to reward his bitter struggles. Surely such a hope as this should have a powerful effect in strengthening and consoling the Christian's heart. What duties so difficult, which this will not enable us to perform; what trials so severe, which this will not enable us to endure; what burden so heavy, that it will not lighten; or sorrow so piercing that it will not soothe? "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and the latter rain. Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh."

NOTICE OF MRS WELCH,

DAUGHTER OF JOHN KNOX.

"Mrs WELCH seems to have inherited no inconsiderable portion of her father's spirit, and she had her share of similar hardships. Her husband was one of those patriotic ministers who resisted the arbitrary measures pursued by James VI. for overturning the government and liberties of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. Being determined to abolish the General Assembly, James had for a considerable time, prevented the meetings of that court by successive prorogations. Perceiving the design of the court, a number of the delegates from synods resolved to keep the diet which had been appointed to be held at Aberdeen in July 1605. They merely constituted the Assembly, and appointed a day for its next meeting, and being charged by Laurieston, the king's commissioner, to dissolve, immediately obeyed; but the commissioner, having ante-dated the charge, several of the leading members were thrown into prison. Welch and five of his brethren, when called before the privy council, declined that court, as incompetent to judge the offence of which they were accused, according to the laws of the kingdom; on which account they were indicted to stand trial for treason at Linlithgow. Their trial was conducted in the most illegal and unjust manner. The king's advocate told the jury that the only thing which came under their cognizance was the fact of the declinature, the judges having already found that it was treasonable; and threatened them with an 'azize of error' if they did not proceed as he directed them. After the jury were empaneled, the justice-clerk went in and threatened them with his majesty's displeasure, if they acquitted the prisoners. The greater part of the jurors being still reluctant, the chancellor went out and consulted with the other judges, who promised that no punishment should be inflicted on the prisoners, provided the jury brought in a verdict agreeable to the court. By such disgraceful methods, they were induced, at midnight, to find, by a majority of three, that the prisoners were guilty, upon which they were condemned to suffer the death of traitors.

"Leaving her children at Ayr, Mrs Welch attended her husband in prison, and was present at Linlithgow, with the wives of the other prisoners, on the day of trial. When informed of the sentence, these heroines instead of lamenting their fate, praised God who had given their husbands courage to stand to the cause of their Master, adding, that, like him, they had been judged and condemned under the covert of night.

"The sentence of death having been changed into banishment, she accompanied her husband to France, where they remained for sixteen years. Mr Welch applied himself with such assiduity to the acquisition of the language of the country, that he was able, in the course of fourteen weeks, to preach in French, and was chosen minister to a protestant congregation at Nerac, from which he was translated to St. Jean d'Angely, a fortified town in Lower Charente. War having broken out between Lewis XIII. and his protestant subjects, St. Jean d'Angely was besieged by the king in person. On this occasion, Welch not only animated the inhabitants of the town to a vigorous resistance by his exhortations, but he appeared on the walls, and gave his assistance to the garrison. The king was at last admitted into the town in consequence of a treaty, and being displeased that Welch preached during his residence in it, sent the Duke d'Espernon, with a company of soldiers, to take him from the pulpit. When the preacher saw the duke enter the church, he ordered his hearers to make room for the marshal of France, and desired him to sit down and hear the Word of God. He spoke with such an air of authority that the duke involuntarily took a seat, and listened to the sermon with great gravity and attention. He then brought Welch to the king, who asked him, how he durst preach there, since it was contrary to the laws of the kingdom for any of the pretended reformed to officiate in places where the court resided. 'Sire,' replied Welch, 'if your majesty knew what I preached, you would not only come and hear it yourself, but make all France hear it; for I preach not as those men you use to hear. First, I preach that you must be saved by the merits of Jesus Christ, and not your own; and I am sure your conscience tells you that your good works will never merit heaven. Next, I preach, that, as you are king of France, there is no man on earth above you; but these men whom you hear, subject you to the pope of Rome, which I will never do.' Pleased with this reply, Lewis said to him, 'Very well; you shall be my minister;' and addressing him by the title of father, assured him of his protection. And he was as good as his word; for St. Jean d'Angely being reduced by the royal forces in 1621, the king gave directions to De Vitry, one of his generals, to take care of his minister; in consequence of which, Welch and his family were conveyed, at his majesty's expense, to Rochelle.

"Having lost his health, and the physicians informing him that the only prospect which he had of recovering it was by returning to his native country, Mr Welch ventured, in the year 1622, to come to London. But his own sovereign was incapable of treating him with that generosity which he had experienced from the French monarch; and dreading the influence of a man who was far gone with a consumption, he absolutely refused to give him permission to return to Scotland. Mrs Welch, by means of some of her mother's relations at court, obtained access to James, and petitioned him to grant this liberty to her husband. The following singular conversation took place on that occasion. His majesty asked her, who was her father. She replied, 'John Knox.'—'Knox and Welch!' exclaimed he, 'the devil never made such a match as that.'—'It's right like, sir,' said she, 'for we never spired his advice.' He asked her how many children her father had left, and if they were lads or lasses. She said three, and they were all lasses. 'God be thanked!' cried the king, lifting up both his hands; 'for an they had been three lads, I had never bruiked my three kingdoms in peace.' She again urged her request, that he would give her husband his native air. 'Give him his native air!' replied the king, 'give him the devil!'—'Give that to your hungry courtiers,' said she, offended at his profaneness. He told her at last, that if she would persuade her husband to submit to the bishops, he would allow him to return to Scotland. Mrs Welch, lifting up her apron, and holding it towards the king, replied, in the true spirit of her father, 'Please your majesty, I'd rather kep his head there.'

"Welch was soon after released from the power of the despot, and from his own sufferings. 'This month of May, 1622, says one of his intimate friends, 'we received intelligence of the death of that holy servant of God, Mr Welch, one of the fathers and pillars of that church, and the light of his age, who died at London, an exile from his native country, on account of his opposition to the re-establishment of episcopal government, and his firm support of the presbyterian and synodical discipline, received and established among us; and that after eighteen years' banishment—a man full of the Holy Spirit, zeal, charity, and incredible diligence in the duties of his office.' The death of his wife is recorded by the same pen. 'This month of January, 1625, died at Ayr, my cousin, Mrs Welch, daughter of that great servant of God, late John Knox, and wife of that holy man of God, Mr Welch, above mentioned; a spouse and daughter worthy of such a husband, and such a father."

TO A LADY IN DISTRESS OF MIND.

LETTER II.

BY THE REV. HENRY DUNCAN, D. D.,
Minister of Ruthwell.

DEAR MADAM,—Since I wrote you yesterday, I have been favoured with your very interesting letter, which I have read over more than once. As I go from home to-day, it will not be in my power to express myself so fully as I could wish, on the various points on which you require my opinion, but you may be sure I will devote the first leisure hour to you, and meanwhile will comply with part of your request, by hastily and concisely running over some of the more important truths of Revealed Religion, as they appear to my own mind.

The whole necessity of the scheme of salvation rests on our being fallen and guilty creatures; and a clear view of our condition, as the apostate children of Adam, is therefore necessary for our cordial reception of the other doctrines of the Gospel. I must not stop, at present, to say any thing of the appalling mystery which hangs over the introduction of moral evil into a world governed by a God of infinite power, and wisdom, and goodness. In this world we find it, in whatever way its introduction may be accounted for; but I do not hesitate to say, that no account which ever was given, or which can be given, is so satisfactory, even to human reason, as that which is recorded in the Bible,—viz. that man was formed holy and happy, but, that being a free agent, he fell by the abuse of his freedom; "God hath made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions." The fall of our first parents entailed sin and misery on their offspring, not only by the immediate appointment of the Almighty, but in what is usually called the common course of providence, if, in the present instance, there be any difference between these modes of divine agency. The moral, as well, perhaps, as the physical powers of Adam, had, by his apostasy, undergone a great and unhappy change, and as it is a law of nature that a parent should produce his like, that derangement was communicated to his posterity. Adam and Eve constituted, in fact, the whole of the human race, and their descendants may be considered, in some sort, as a part of themselves, so that all mankind sinned in them and fell with them. The prince of darkness, the great origin of evil, thus gained dominion over the soul of man, and instead of a child of God, he became a child of Satan. God had permitted this awful defection for some wise purposes, in part, doubtless, concealed from our feeble understandings, but, in part, also explained in his Revealed Word. His purpose, in so far as it is revealed, was to give an extraordinary manifestation of his grace, by the deliverance of his fallen creatures from their degradation, and by their restoration to dignity and happiness. Of this scheme of mercy He made an intimation, immediately after the fall, when He declared that the "seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent."

For the accomplishment of this astonishing plan Abraham was selected, and a promise was expressly made to him that the Great Deliverer should appear among the number of his descendants. "In his seed,"

he was assured, "all the families of the earth should be blessed." After a long train of prophecies and supernatural events, Christ, at once the Son of God and the Son of man, was born,—and suffered,—and died; the Son of God, because it required a being of absolute perfection to make atonement for sin,—the Son of man, because it behoved this atonement to be made in the nature that had offended.

This introduces you to a very mysterious doctrine, but one of unspeakable importance, which is, in fact, the crowning point of Revealed Religion. It would occupy much more time than I can at present spare, to give any thing like a clear and intelligible explanation of all the bearings of this doctrine which have been revealed to us; but I think I may, in a few words, convey to you a simple view of it. God is infinitely just, and such justice must necessarily be unbending and inexorable to transgression. He is also infinitely holy, and such holiness is directly opposed to, and is incapable of reconciliation with sin. It follows from this, that pardon of sin is inconsistent with the nature of the Eternal. But God is also good and merciful, and these attributes plead for fallen man. Here the perfections of God appear to be at variance, but through the incarnation and death of his own eternal Son they are reconciled,—for He voluntarily subjected himself to the punishment which our sins had incurred, substituting himself in our stead, and thus displaying, in astonishing union, at once the justice, the holiness, and the mercy of the divine nature. This act of substitution, or of one living creature bearing the punishment due to another, was, by previous Revelation, rendered quite familiar to men's minds; it was, in fact, the principle on which all sacrifices were instituted, the victim being the substitute of the person offering it, and thus typifying, under the Mosaic law, the great sacrifice of Christ, from which all other sacrifices derived their efficacy.

I lately read a story in a publication of Sir John Malcolm, which struck me as illustrative of the atonement. The particulars I do not very distinctly remember, but I can recal as much of them as will answer my purpose. A Persian chief had the mortification to find, that notwithstanding all his zealous efforts to suppress the lawless practices of his subjects, a caravan had been plundered, and the whole band of travellers had been murdered, under the very walls of his castle. He was determined to inflict on them the full rigour of his vengeance, as an example to deter others, and he bound himself publicly by an oath, that if he could discover the perpetrators, not one of them should escape, even although they should be his dearest friends. They were discovered, and it turned out to his great distress, that they belonged to his own immediate dependants, and even to his own household. They were seized, however, and summary punishment was about to be inflicted on them all, when a hoary veteran, a particular favourite of the chief, rushed forward, and embracing his knees, pleaded in the most pathetic terms, that he would spare the life of his only son, who was implicated in this horrid affair, and was doomed to suffer along with his associates. "I know you have sworn," he exclaimed, "and the sentence is just, alas, too just; but if ever I found favour, O take me in his stead,—my life for the life of my son,—spare him to his family,—he is their only prop,—O spare him to his poor helpless broken-hearted mother,—my palsied arm can no longer defend or support her,—spare the young sapling, and take the withered tree!" The chief listened to this earnest appeal of his favourite, and it was done to him according to his own earnest supplication,—the old man died for his son!

You can yourself make the application of this interesting anecdote, and will easily perceive that it would be most unsafe and injurious to run the parallel too close. The cases are analogous only in so far as there was here a substitution of one for another, by which the determined purpose of the chief to punish delinquency was even more strongly marked than if the law had taken its usual course; whereas, if he had suffered the young man to escape, without such substitution, he would have been guilty of a weakness, which would have tended materially to diminish the terror and salutary effect of the example, and, by an act of glaring partiality, to relax the hand of justice. As to the right which one human being had thus to deal with another, even at his own earnest request, it is a different question, on which I shall not enter. Here the parallel does not hold.

Sin is seen no where to be so tremendous an evil as when viewed in connection with the sacrifice of Christ on the cross, and, on the other hand, the mercy and grace of God never appear so unspeakably great and lovely as when we remember that he so loved the world as not to spare his only begotten Son, that "whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life."

You will observe that the total incompetency of human efforts to entitle to the blessings of salvation, is necessarily involved in this doctrine. Could we have saved ourselves, there would have been no need of an atonement for our sins; and the unqualified declaration of Scripture is, that do what we will, we are still sinful creatures, and, after all our endeavours, have no services to plead, and no rights to demand; and that the only sentiment, befitting the very best of Christians, is that of humility and self-abasement, when the question comes to be as to the attainments which he has wrought out for himself. We must therefore cast ourselves, without reserve, at the foot of the cross of Christ, exclaiming "God be merciful to us sinners."

But, then, this, instead of leading us to despair, ought to make us rejoice, and renew our diligence, for we are assured that we shall be enabled to "do all things through Christ who strengtheneth us." We must "work out our own salvation," with fear and trembling indeed, but still with confidence, because "it is God who worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure."

This would naturally lead me to give you some account of the doctrines of faith and repentance, under the operation of the Holy Spirit, but I must, for the present, be excused from entering on these subjects, and from complying with the other requests you make, as I find it is necessary for me now to conclude. You shall, however, certainly hear from me again the first leisure hour I can spare. It will give me pleasure to attend to your wish that I should put in writing a few thoughts which you may make use of in prayer. Meanwhile, you have my most earnest prayers for your spiritual welfare, and especially for the presence of the Comforter in your heart, who alone can teach you how to pray, and lead you into all truth. Under his enlightening influences, I trust you will have much consolation in pouring out your soul before the Searcher of hearts, although you may not be able to express yourself in a set form of words. It is not the utterance of the lips, but the aspiration of the heart which he regards. I am, &c.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Intercessory Prayer.—When we consider how prominent a place in the constitution of our nature has been assigned by its Divine Author to those affections which link us closely together in all those endearing ties of earthly love, for which "Home is a name so dear;" and when we reflect how much of our happiness or misery depends on the due regulation, and legitimate indulgence, of those affections; and also, how fatally prone we are to indulge them to an idolatrous excess, and thus defeat the gracious purpose for which they were bestowed, perverting what God designed for a blessing into a curse: Oh, surely it bears a special stamp of the loving-kindness of our God, that he should have provided, in intercessory prayer, a way by which the poisonous sting of idolatrous love may be extracted from our hearts; and a channel opened, in which our affections may not merely flow in safety to our spiritual welfare, but become a medium of conveying to our souls a rich supply of spiritual blessings. Yes, it is sweet to think that there is one place at least, even before a throne of grace, where our love for those twined round our heart-strings cannot be too warmly or tenderly cherished—where the language of its fond and fervent feelings cannot be breathed forth with too intense an ardour of affection, or earnestness of entreaty,—where all our happiness, connected with the objects of our love, if they are fellow-sharers with us in a Saviour's love, can catch a glow of celestial radiance from that Saviour's smile, and all anxieties on their behalf be lulled to rest, by being reposed in the bosom of their Father, and our Father,—their God, and our God.—WHITE.

Peace.—Peace of Conscience.—which he that hath, all outward losses or crosses cannot make him miserable, no more than all the winds without can shake the earth. A child of God, with a good conscience, even in the midst of the waters of affliction, is as secure as the child that, in a shipwreck, was on a plank with his mother, securely sleeping till she awaked him, and then sweetly smiling he sportingly beat the naughty waves, and at last when they continued boisterous for all that, he began sharply to chide them as though they had been but his play-fellows. O the comfort of peace! the tranquillity of a mind reconciled! And O the rack, the torment, the horror of a guilty conscience!—STOURCHROX.

Peace—peace with God.—An ancient said, that he would rather have the king's countenance than his coin, —a good look from him rather than gold. And I dare say, that a Christian thinks himself richer when he is able to say, God is mine, than if he had a thousand mines of gold. If the sun were wanting, it would be night, for all the stars; so, if the light of God's countenance be wanting, a man may sit in the shadow of death for all the glitter of worldly contentments. I beseech you tell me: Suppose the houses were paved with pearls and walled with diamonds, still, if the roofs were open to the injuries of heaven, would these shelter you from the storm and tempest? Would you chuse to be so lodged in a hard winter? Suppose the king were to set you in the chair of state, at a table richly furnished, royally attended, but with his sword hanging over you by a thin thread, would that honour make you merry? Suppose God himself should make you this offer: "crown your head with rose-buds; clothe yourself in purple; fare deliciously every day; take your fill of pleasures; open your mouth wide, and I will fill you with all that heart could wish of worldly things,—only this, you shall never see my face;" would you think you had a good offer? would you accept of the condition? No; if heaven fight against us; if the wrath of God hang over our heads; if he hide his face, and be angry; yea, but a little; happy are all they that put their trust in him. Many say, "Who will shew us any good? Lord! lift thou up the light of Thy countenance upon us." Let our house be a prison—a dungeon; but let the light of Thy countenance shine in at some little opening, and that shall make it a palace, a court, a heaven! Let our bread be the bread of affliction, and our tears be our drink; but let the light of Thy countenance shine upon us, and that bread shall be changed into the food of angels, and that water turned into wine! Let friends, and goods, and life, and all forsake us; but let the light of Thy countenance shine upon us, and that shall be life, and friends, and goods, and all unto us! For as Noah, when the deluge of waters had defaced the great book of nature, had a copy of every kind of creature in that famous library of the ark, out of which all were reprinted to the world; so he that hath God hath the original copy of all blessings, out of which, if all perished, all might easily be restored. God is the best storehouse that a man can have; the best treasury that a kingdom can have. God is the best shield of any person, and the best safeguard of any nation; if God be our enemy, nothing can secure us; if God be our friend, nothing can hurt us; for when the enemy girds a city round about with the straightest siege, he cannot stop the passage to heaven, and so long as that is open, there may come relief and succour from heaven, if God be our friend. Let Pharaoh be behind, the Red Sea before, the mountains on each side, the Israelites can still find a way: and when there is no other way to escape a danger, a Christian can go by heaven! But if God be an enemy, for all their walls and bars, God could, as he did on Sodom—rain on us fire and brimstone from heaven.—OLD AUTHOR.

The Privileges of the Believer.—I durst not have thought of the saint's preferment in this life, as Scripture sets it forth, had it not been the express truth of God. How indecent to talk of being sons of God; speaking to him; having fellowship with him; dwelling in him, and he in us, if this had not been God's own language; how much less durst we have once thought of shining forth as the sun; of being joint heirs of Christ; of judging the world; of sitting on Christ's throne; of being one in Him and the Father, if we had not all this from the mouth, and under the hand of God? But "hath he said, and shall he not do it? Hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?" Yes, as the Lord God is true, thus shall it be done to the man whom Christ delighteth to honour. Be of good cheer, Christians, the time is near, when God and thou shalt be near, and as near as thou canst well desire. Thou shalt dwell in his family. Is that enough? It is better to be a door-keeper in the house of God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. Thou shalt ever stand before him, about his throne, in the room with him, in his presence-chamber. Wouldst thou yet be nearer? Thou shalt be his child, and he thy father; thou shalt be an heir of his kingdom; yea, more, the spouse of his Son. And what more canst thou desire? Thou shalt be a member of the body of his Son; he shall be thy head; thou shalt be one with him, who is one with the Father, as he himself hath desired for thee of his Father, "that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; and the glory which thou gavest me I have given them, that they may be one, even as we are one; I in them and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them as thou hast loved me."—BAXTER.

SACRED POETRY.

A SABBATH NIGHT'S REFLECTION.

BY THE REV. PETER M'MORLAND, LONDON.

Upon the solemn night of God's own day,
When my heart tells me from the heart I've spoken
His word, whose blood was shed, whose body broken;
How sweetly on my bed myself I lay!

Wearied my frame,—oppress'd my heart may be;
But when I think it may, perchance, have been,
That some one deathless soul, has Jesus seen;—
Such weariness feels happiness to me!

Oh! when life's short and chequer'd day is past,
And sleepless worldly cares to slumber go,
And 'neath the coffin lid we rest at last,
In lonely grave, once dark, but now not so;
May mine be then the feeling of to-night,
Weary to fall asleep—hoping for REST and LIGHT.

ON READING A BIBLE SOCIETY REPORT.

BY MISS ANNA L. GILLESPIE.

"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose."—ISA. xxxv. 1.

All hail to the prospect, unclouded and bland,
See the Gospel illumines each far distant land,
And nations long wilder'd rejoice in the light,
That have wandered so long in the shadows of night.

Yes, numbers unnumbered shall bless the glad hour,
When God gave the thought, and when God gave the power,

By means, ah! how feeble, such splendour is shed,
A spark, and unfading effulgence is spread.

The heart wrung with anguish, the tear streaming eye,
Awakes from despair to the fulness of joy,
For the beams of salvation enliven the gloom,
And glory transcendent awakes from the tomb.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Hint to Christians.—For some years before his death, Mr Hervey visited but few persons belonging to the higher classes of society in his neighbourhood; and being asked why he declined visiting those who were always ready to shew him every token of respect, he replied, "I can hardly name a polite family where the conversation turns upon the things of God. I hear much frothy and worldly chit-chat, but not a word of Christ, and I am determined not to visit those companies where there is not room for my Master, as well as for myself."

Missionary Zeal.—Mr Elliot, when near fifty years of age, learned the language of the American Indians in several of its dialects; a language more difficult than any in the world to acquire, on account of the length of its words. He could preach in that language with great facility. He translated the whole Bible into it; and when he had finished the translation, he exclaimed, "Prayer and pains, through faith in Christ, will do any thing!" He went through incredible pains and hardships in visiting the several tribes. "I have not," to use his own words, "been dry night nor day from the third day of the week until the sixth, but so travelled, and at night pulled off my boots, wrung my stockings, and on with them again, and so continue. But God steps in and helps. I have considered the word of God in 2 Tim. ii. 3. 'Endure hardness.'" O that Christians had the half of his spirit! All we do and suffer in our work is but trifles to what he did and suffered for Christ.

John Bunyan.—Bunyan, with irresistible zeal, preached throughout the country, especially in Bedfordshire and its neighbourhood; until, on the restoration of Charles II. he was thrown into prison, where he remained twelve years. During his confinement he preached to all to whom he could gain access; and when liberty was offered to him, on condition of promising to abstain from preaching, he constantly replied, "If you let me out to-day, I shall preach again to-morrow."

Comfort in the Work of Christ.—The Rev. John Brown, of Haddington, addressed this exhortation to his sons in the ministry with his dying breath: "O, labour—labour to win souls to Christ! I will say this for your encouragement, that whenever the Lord has led me out to be most diligent this way, he has poured most comfort into my heart, and given me my reward in my bosom. But He is our great example, whose life, as well as lips, said to all his disciples, 'Work while it is day; for the night cometh when no man can work.'"

Bishop Jewel.—When Bishop Jewel, by his laborious course of life, had much impaired his health, his friends observed a sensible alteration in his appearance, and endeavoured to prevail on him to relax from his incessant application, and to desist for a time, at least, from pulpit services. He replied to their friendly remonstrances, by saying, that "A bishop should die preaching." These words were almost literally fulfilled in his own case; for, a short time before his death, having promised to preach at Lacock, in Wiltshire, he was determined to go, although a friend, who met him on the way, strongly urged him to return home, telling him, that the people had better lose one sermon than be altogether deprived of such a pastor. The bishop could not be prevailed upon to return, but proceeded to the place appointed, and there preached his last sermon, from Galatians v. 16. "Walk in the Spirit," which he finished with great difficulty. He died a few days after.

A Call to the Ministry.—It has frequently been proposed, as a question of considerable practical importance, how a person may know that he has a call to the ministry: the following observations, by Bernard, who lived in the twelfth century, may perhaps be useful:—"He who is called to instruct souls, is called of God, and not by his own ambition; and what is this call, but an inward incentive of love, soliciting us to be zealous for the salvation of our brethren? So often as he who is engaged in preaching the Word, shall feel his inward man to be excited with divine affections; so often let him assure himself that God is there, and that he is invited by him to seek the good of souls. Truly, I love to hear that preacher, who does not move me to applaud his eloquence, but to groan for my sins. Efficacy will be given to your voice, if you appear to be yourself persuaded of that to which you advise me. That common rebuke will not then at least belong to you, 'Thou who teachest another, teachest thou not thyself?'"

THOUGHTS ON FAMILY WORSHIP.

BY THE REV. CHARLES WATSON, D. D.,

THE duty of Family Worship derives its authority, if not from express precepts, at least from the general spirit of the Word of God, conveyed in plain statements, and enforced by many striking examples. If a parent is not told in so many words, that it is his duty to assemble his family daily, and to read to them a portion of the Inspired Volume, and to commend them to God in prayer,—he is required to "train up his children in the way in which they should go,"—to "dwell with his family as heirs together of the grace of life, that their prayers be not hindered,"—to "give to his servants that which is just and equal," from a consideration that he and they "have a Master in heaven," whom they are equally bound to reverence and obey. And, as if to exhibit in action the principles of domestic duty thus inculcated, we are presented with the examples of Abraham, of David, of Joshua, of Job, and of other saints of God, who were accustomed to instruct and to "bless their household," and to use means, that "whatever others did, as for them and their families, they should serve the Lord." Nor is it difficult to account for this indirect, though sufficiently expressive mode of inculcating the duty of Family Worship. The duty is one of a complex and relative nature, which does not admit, under all circumstances, of being equally performed by all Christian heads of families,—which implies opportunities and qualifications; and which, in the manner of its performance, allows of variety and modification, under the influence of a sanctified discretion. It affords, therefore, no small proof of divine wisdom, that its obligation is implied, rather than expressly enjoined, in the Sacred Volume; that it has been left as an inference to be deduced from plain and established principles, and that its practical observance has been committed to the guardianship of Christian feeling, which, like good seed in the soil, cannot fail, in due time, to develop its existence by a native and inevitable process, forcing its way to the surface, through all obstructions, and rising, in the form of a living and matured plant, to fill the place, and yield the fruit which are suitable to it, after its kind.

Let no one, therefore, whom God has intrusted with the charge of a family, say that he is relieved from the duty in question, merely, because he does not find it written, that, evening and morning, he must meet with his household at the throne of grace. As well might he plead an exemption from the discharge of numberless other duties, which his conscience acknowledges, and which have been recognized as duties by all genuine Christians,—merely, because the Bible has not gone into all the minutiae of duty, and taught him, by measure and line, all the individual parts of the service which God requires at his hands. The Bible, especially the New Testament, is a treasury of principles, not a catalogue of rules. It deals with the Christian as an intelligent honest inquirer, who can appreciate a hint, and feel the force of a suggestion, as well as obey an irresistible command. He, therefore, who will do nothing more for God, than he has an express statute to bind him to perform, proves himself insensible to the brightest distinction of the Christian system,—that, namely, of being a dispensation adapted to freemen, not to slaves,—to full grown men, not to minors or children. If we feel duly our privilege as the Lord's freemen, backwardness to recognize the call of duty in any conceivable situation, will be the last tendency to which we shall be in danger of yielding.

The duty of Family Worship, then, though not formally prescribed, has its root in personal religion, whence it springs as naturally as a plant from the seed, or a stream from the fountain. If a man be deeply impressed with the value of Religion, he will seek a personal interest in it; and if he feel its value for himself, he cannot forget that others have souls no less precious than his own, or fail of experiencing some desire that they should partake of the blessing which is equally of importance to both. He will not, therefore, be satisfied with addressing his Maker in the retirement of his own closet, and using means for his own personal improvement and salvation. While he is on his knees for himself, the divine lesson of love will penetrate his heart, and prompt him, when he comes abroad among immortal beings, needing the direction and support which he has found for himself, to endeavour to do something for their spiritual advantage. And as the sphere in which he most directly acts, and in which his endeavours afford the greatest promise of success, is home; home will be the circle in which the divine feeling of benevolence, kindled by the love of Christ to himself, will first and chiefly operate. His wife, his children, his domestics, those loved and accustomed objects, on whom his eye first turns in the morning, and on whom it latest falls at night,—the scene of his best comforts and unreprieved joys,—the quiet haven in which his heart seeks rest from the tossings of ambition and the tumult of a crowd, will present irresistible claims on his affectionate interest and exertions. To suppose him indifferent here, involves a contradiction which we cannot conceive to be realized, where piety and benevolence retain any hold of the mind. And, if in earnest about the spiritual good of his family, what can be a more obvious direction for his religious concern to take, than to devote a portion of his daily time, to such exercises and exhibitions of Religion, as are included under the denomination of Family Worship? To read aloud the Word of God, for example, is to place all who hear it in the most favourable position for knowledge and growth in religion, to bring the mind into immediate contact with the source of truth, the standard of duty, the medium of divine and saving influence: it is, so far as man's agency is concerned, to open the ear to the oracles of infinite wisdom, to affect it by the powers of the world to come, to surround it by models of celestial excellence, and to invite it onward in the pursuit of glory, honour, and eternal life, by considerations the most awful, and by prospects the most alluring: in a word, it is to unlock the gate within which are "hid all the treasures of divine wisdom and knowledge"—to unseal the fountain of "the water of life, the streams whereof make glad all the inhabitants of the city of God." And, if the Word of God have been read to any purpose, what more natural, what more likely to follow, as a matter of course, than to give thanks to God for truths so precious, discoveries so wonderful, gifts so invaluable, prospects and hopes so bright and cheering; and to supplicate from him an interest in blessings so essential to happiness, both in this life and in that which is to come?

In this way, the exercises of Family Worship will be recognised to be a duty, from being felt to be a privilege. The father of a family has but to look around him, and to consult his own heart, in order to feel the responsibility of his situation. He is surrounded by beings who have the strongest and the tenderest claims upon his Christian regard,—intelligent, accountable, immortal beings, who look up to him not only to be clothed and fed, but to be remembered and cared for in the far more interesting relation in which they stand to a Supreme Ruler, and to an unseen but eternal world. If neglected by him, who is to care for them? Who is to guide their feet into the way of peace, if their natural guardian desert them? If he know from experience the worth of the soul; if he love his children, and would provide for them in the things in which they most require the benefit of his forethought and pains; if he would ensure them in the possession of what will be better for them than fortune and friends, honour and length of days; if he would be a father to them in the sense in which a being, with such a nature as his and theirs, should act the part of a father to his offspring: if, in short, he would give free expression to the instincts, whether of nature or of grace, he will rejoice that the audience-chamber of the King of Kings, is not so crowded that he cannot take his children thither along with him,—that the ear of Deity is not full of his personal petitions,—that he cannot hope to be heard, when he joins their prayers with his own,—that "the fulness which is in Christ" is divine and infinite, so that he may take for himself, and bring others to take, and still leave "enough and to spare" for countless thousands to the close of time.

Nor can similar reflections fail to affect him in relation to the other members of his family. His servants, by the very place they fill, possess a claim upon his friendly consideration and regard. Can he see them from day to day, and receive from them numberless attentions and accessions to his comforts, and never ask himself, if he has no duties to perform to them, besides giving them their food and their stipulated wages? Can he refrain from thinking of their souls—of their moral and spiritual welfare, and of all the consequences which must ensue, both in time and eternity, from a nature such as theirs being left a prey to ignorance and vice? Can the thought occur to him, that possibly he may be the destined instrument of doing good to souls as precious as his own, and whose plea of want addresses itself to him every time the customary offices of domestic service are rendered, and not be moved with tender compassion and affectionate solicitude in their behalf? And, if thus impressed, can he refuse them a place at the family altar; or rather, will he not rejoice that there he and they can meet on common ground, and own the tie that, in spite of temporary distinctions of fortune and condition, binds together the whole family of man in subordination to one great common Master in heaven?

How fitly all the exercises of domestic worship correspond to the circumstances of the family relation, it is easy to shew. Family mercies require family acknowledgments: family sins, family confessions: family wants, family petitions. It is God who "setteth man in families,"—how suitable that God be honoured by the combined prayers and praises of those whom he has united by so close a bond! Christ has revealed himself in a family relation, owning as "brethren, as sisters, as kinsmen, all who do his Father's will,"—how fit, that families who profess to feel the value of so high and honourable a bond of union should own its attracting influence, and court the society of their Elder Brother! The Holy Spirit is the spirit of love, the author and cherisher of all the kindly affection which is to survive the breaking up of mere earthly ties,—how fit, that the heart of master and servant, parent and children together, should be laid bare before Him, that he may clear it of the grossness of selfishness and passion, and touch it with a holier fire, and shed upon it a kindlier unction, all his own!

The benefit of these exercises is not less an argument for their observance than their fitness, and their moral obligation. Prayer, in a higher sense than that in which the poet used the words, is, according to Scripture,—

“The spirit's ladder,
That from this gross and visible world of dust,
Even to the starry world, with thousand rounds,
Builds itself up: on which the unseen powers
Move up and down, in heavenly ministrals.”

And whatever efficacy the Scripture attributes to prayer in general may be considered as attending family prayer, with this addition, that in family prayer, many hearts are united in the exercise. If, then, “the effectual fervent prayer of one righteous man availeth much,” what holy energy must accompany the prayer of those who “with one mind and one mouth glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ!” What showers of blessings may not be suspended over the roof whence such incense arises! No wonder that “the voice of rejoicing and salvation is in the tabernacles of the righteous,” when God the Lord, moved by entreaties which his own Spirit has prompted, and to which his royal and paternal heart responds, stoops from his throne to dwell among them! We cannot wonder that angry feelings and malevolent affections, and all the train of base and discordant passions that prey on the peace of individuals, and break the union of families, like foul birds of the night, should fly away from such a dwelling, unable to endure the brightness of the scene, or breathe an atmosphere so pure.

And, if effects like these be not oftener and more fully realized, even among families where the worship of God is not neglected, to what can we ascribe the spots in the picture, but to the partial, heartless, formal discharge of the duties we have attempted to enforce? “God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth.” “He will be sanctified of all that draw nigh unto him.” It is not in services performed with “feigned lips,” nor in petitions extorted by regard to appearances, or in compliance with custom: it is not in the hurried accents of the perfunctory prayer, muttered by persons “detained before the Lord,” instead of “delighting in his law,” and “longing for his salvation,” that we are to recognise “the sacrifices of a sweet odour, acceptable to God, through Jesus Christ.” Where these latter are presented, and the spirit as well as the form of family devotion is maintained, we cannot doubt that blessed fruits will follow. Impressions of the most beneficial nature will be made on the mind, both of him who conducts the service, and of those who join in it, which will have an unspeakable effect in rivetting the family connection. A feeling of sacredness will be combined with the feelings of natural affection. A sense of duty will spring up, and entwine itself with the instincts of the heart, imparting strength, consistency and permanence to their varied manifestations. Nor will the advantage stop here, the influence of domestic religion will extend beyond the walls of the family dwelling. Society will reap the benefit of exercises of which it knows nothing but the fruit; and the fire cherished on the hearth of the humblest abode where God is worshipped, may kindle the ardour of Christian patriotism, or feed the flame of wide-spread missionary zeal.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE REV. ROWLAND HILL.

OF a person so well known, and so eminent as Rowland Hill—the friend and associate of Whitfield—one of the most honoured instruments, under Providence, of the happy revival of religion in our land, and whose name has been identified with its cause for more than half a century, it may be gratifying to some of our readers to present them with a brief memoir, although from the period when he flourished being so recent, and the circumstance of most of the individuals connected with his history being still alive, nothing more than a mere outline can be expected. Rowland Hill was born at Hawkstone, in the county of Salop, south of England, in the memorable year of 1745, of an ancient and honourable family, many of whose members, both in former and present times, have distinguished themselves in the highest offices of the State. He was the sixth son of Sir Rowland Hill, Baronet, of Hawkstone, in the parish of Hodnet. Of the other branches of this family, though all filled respectable places in society, none distinguished themselves except Rowland, who was originally destined for the Church, but whose views of doctrine and of duty, happily formed at an early period, on an attentive and prayerful reading of the Scriptures, made him prepare for the sacred profession as the business of his life, under higher and holier principles than often influence parents in determining, and young men in entering on the ministerial office. At the time of Rowland's birth, and during the greater part of his early life, Britain had so greatly degenerated in respect of pure and undefiled religion, that the gross errors in doctrine prevailed—the living spirit of it was extinct—and the general state of the nation cannot be better described than by the scriptural statement, that “darkness covered the land.” Few of the higher classes of society were known as the friends of religion. The cause of piety was sunk to a low ebb, and the profession of it looked upon as unworthy the rank and character of a gentleman. But there were some honourable exceptions; and of these the family of the Hills was conspicuous, for their devotional character, and their zeal in the cause of pure Christianity. Mr Richard Hill, who was considerably older than his brother Rowland, and who had at an early period been impressed with serious views of the importance of religion, was the means of his brother's conversion. While Rowland and John were pursuing their education at Eton, their pious brother maintained a constant correspondence with them, and made it the burden of all his letters to press upon them the importance of early religion, and to interest their young affections in the things that belong to their peace. With Rowland, his pious and affectionate endeavours were successful. The seeds of grace that were sown took deep root, and brought forth the fruits of righteousness; and amid the numerous temptations to which his rank and connections exposed him, he continued “steadfast and immovable” in the choice he had made of the “Master whom he was to serve.”

On his removal to Cambridge, and during the whole period of his studies at that university, he shewed himself alive to the promotion of piety in himself and others, insomuch, that by his example and his precepts, by boldly professing Christ and despising the shame, he succeeded in awakening a salutary concern about their eternal interests in the minds of not a few of his fellow-students, among whom were several who afterwards acquired eminence both in the Church and among the Methodists. Nor were his exertions confined to the young men of the university: he set himself to the task of visiting the prisoners and the sick, and of preaching in several of the most destitute places of Cambridge and the adjacent villages, in which he was joined by several of the gownsmen, whom he had been chiefly instrumental in winning over to the faith, and was countenanced by several more advanced in years, such as Whitefield, Berridge, and others, who, spiritually-minded and zealous as they were, were not always the most judicious counsellors. Proceedings so unusual in a young student attracted the attention of the college, exposed him frequently to the insults of the populace of the town, drew down upon him the displeasure of his parents, and led to the expulsion of six of his associates from the university,—his family influence alone saving him from a similar fate. Meanwhile, he carried on his literary studies, with a view to prepare for the ministry, with unabated ardour. Notwithstanding his incessant labours in preaching among the villages, and the constant communications he kept up with his religious friends in various parts of the country, he found time for serious application to the pursuits of literature and science, acting upon it as a fixed principle, that human learning is a great ornament to the character, and may be made highly subservient to the work of a Christian minister. In many branches of science, particularly optics, mechanics, and astronomy, he had made so great proficiency, that when he underwent his examinations, previously to taking the degree of bachelor of arts, there were few who equalled, and none who excelled him in these departments. The whole bent of his mind, however, was directed to the preaching of the Gospel; and to his active mind, the plan of Whitefield and his associates, of itinerating the country, and preaching without any fixed place or regular congregation, possessed irresistible attractions. He assumed, therefore, the character of an itinerant preacher; and although he was ever sincerely attached to the constitution and doctrines of the Church of England, yet the irregularities of his mode of preaching, and his aversion to conform to the general rules of that Church, excited such a prejudice against him, that he was refused ordination by six different bishops, and it was not without considerable influence and management on the part of his friends, that he succeeded at length in obtaining orders. The interval between his leaving the University and receiving ordination he spent beneath the paternal roof at Hawtstone. But so great was the displeasure which his father, Sir Rowland, had conceived at his conduct, that he was kept under the strictest confinement—not allowed to go about preaching, or to hold any communication with his religious friends—and what with the frowns of his family, and his disappointments in regard to his reception in the Church, his distress of mind may be more easily imagined than described. An anecdote related by his excellent biographer will show his situation at this time.

“ Sir Rowland Hill restricted his allowance to a very small sum, both in token of displeasure at his itinerant life, and to prevent it. But he was determined to go forth, though ‘without purse or scrip,’ and to pursue, in defiance of every human restraint, the course he conceived Providence had marked out for him. Many of his most arduous journeys were made upon a little Welsh pony given him by a clergyman, and he often left the scene of an evening sermon the next morning, without knowing where he should find at night a resting place for himself and the faithful animal which carried him. He seldom, however, failed to meet with a kind reception from some person who loved him for his work’s sake, though he was often reduced to great difficulties. On one evening in particular, as he used frequently to describe, when he landed on his return to Bristol, and had paid the passage across the Severn for himself and his pony, he had not sufficient left in his purse to procure a night’s lodging, and went on, he knew not whither, hungry and exhausted. But he was not deserted, and before night found shelter and refreshment, as well as the means of proceeding on his journey. Impelled by the irresistible conviction that he was following the commands of God, he pursued his one great object, undaunted by every earthly obstacle. No one could feel more acutely the displeasure of his parents, over which he often wept in the silent agony of his heart, nor did he ever once refuse compliance with their wishes but for the Gospel’s sake. He might have reposed amidst their smiles, in the lap of affluence, ease, and plenty; but he gave up every thing in the sincerest devotion to God, and received, as will be hereafter seen, the fulness of the promise, even in this life, to such as have willingly left all for the cause of the Redeemer.”

Nor did the opposition to his zealous proceedings arise solely from his family and his superiors in the Church and the University. He was often exposed to the greatest annoyance, and even danger, from the tumultuous assemblies he ventured to address, of which the two following instances, extracted from his journal, may suffice as a sample:—“ Preached at Stowey, to the most outrageous congregation I ever saw. There was such a noise with beating of pans, shovels, &c., blowing of horns, and ringing of bells, that I could scarce hear myself speak. Though we were pelted with much dirt, eggs, &c., I was enabled to preach out my sermon. At Putsham, to a serious and attentive congregation out of doors, on Heb. ii. 17, 18, on the compassionate unchangeable priesthood of Christ. Though I had not a deal of liberty, yet some I believe were comforted in their souls. Though the congregation stood serious, some scoffed at a distance, others threw stones. One man was slightly cut, and another almost stunned by a blow, which cut him violently over the eye. We could get neither sight nor knowledge of our secret enemies in this affair: may the Lord forgive and convert them.”

Instances, however, in which he met with a more favourable and indulgent reception from the people are frequently related in his diary, and these he never fails to accompany with an expression of fervent thanksgiving to the Lord, who had opened to him a wide and effectual door for the entrance of his Word. There can be no doubt that in these excursions he was eminently useful in awakening the minds of many to a salutary concern about their spiritual interests, and that many had cause to regard him with eternal gratitude as their spiritual father who had begotten them in the Lord. Notwithstanding such undoubted proofs of his zeal and usefulness, his family could not be reconciled to his irregular mode of proceeding: they despatched his brother Richard to Bristol, whither he had gone to prosecute his pastoral labours, to endeavour to prevail upon him to desist; but, like Saul among the prophets, that pious man caught the spirit of him whose career he had been employed to check; and, as from that time, Richard became himself a preacher, we shall gratify the reader with a detail of the circumstances as they are given by the biographer:—“ Sir Rowland Hill, gratified by his cessation from his once favourite pursuit, sent him to Bristol to prevail on his brother Rowland to follow his example and return home. On his arrival at Bristol, Mr Richard Hill heard that Rowland was gone to Kingswood to preach to the colliers. He immediately followed him, and found him surrounded by an immense multitude of these long neglected people, listening with the greatest interest to the solemn appeal he was making to their consciences. Mr Rowland Hill saw his brother, and guessing his errand, only proceeded with increased earnestness; and such was the power of his address, that the black faces of the poor colliers soon exhibited innumerable channels of tears, which the sermon had caused them to shed. Mr Richard Hill was much affected by the unusual scene, and his brother Rowland, taking advantage of his emotion, announced, at the conclusion of the service,—‘My brother, Richard Hill, Esquire, will preach here at this time to-morrow.’ Taken by surprise under the impression produced by what he had just witnessed, Mr Richard Hill consented to preach to the colliers; and instead of returning with his brother to Hawkstone, became his coadjutor in the very work he designed to persuade him to relinquish.”

The year 1773 was remarkable in the life of Mr Hill for two events—his marriage with Miss Tudway, a lady of unfeigned piety, with whom he lived in uninterrupted harmony for nearly sixty years; and his ordination to deacon's orders, when he was appointed to the parish of Kingston in Somersetshire, with a stipend of forty pounds a-year. His settlement in this place of ministerial labour did not put a stop to his wandering and eccentric habits; for, while he laboured with exemplary diligence among his own people, he was indefatigable in preaching in many other places day after day; and although frequently overtaken by sickness, yet, no sooner had he recovered, than he renewed his herculean exertions. “He met with every species of opposition, was lampooned, burned in effigy, pelted, and threatened, but none of these things moved him, or disturbed his inexhaustible flow of spirits. He placed his family motto, ‘Go forward,’ on his seal, and he determined to act upon the precept.” These extraordinary exertions in the cause of the Gospel, together with his own truly devotional character, procured him the notice and friendship of all who were then known as the friends of religion, particularly, of Hervey, Venn, John Newton, Fletcher of Madely, and the well-known Dr Ryland of Bristol; and, besides, there was something in the freshness, originality, and power of his discourses, which made him, not only when in the country, but after his removal to Surry Chapel in London, run after by multitudes of eager and admiring hearers.

“The great secret, perhaps, of the amazing effect of his preaching was, its being all nature. He generally chose the subject which impressed and affected his own mind at the moment, and discoursed on it as he felt, not as he had previously thought; and thus, on every occasion, whether joyous or grievous, he found his way to hearts whose strings vibrated in unison with those of his own. Sheridan used to say of him, ‘I go to hear Rowland Hill, because his ideas come red-hot from the heart.’ Never was there a truer description of the preaching of any minister; he spoke as he felt; and the tears he shed, and the smiles that beamed upon his countenance, soon ‘wakened up their fellows,’ in the listening throng that heard him. After one sermon, in which he had poured forth the experience of his pious soul in expressing the exulting feelings of the Christian's joy, Mr Ambrose Serle came into the vestry of Surry Chapel, and seizing him by the hand, exclaimed, ‘Oh, my dear sir, if we are so happy now, what shall we be a hundred thousand years hence in heaven!’ And on another occasion, Dr Milner, the celebrated Dean of Carlisle, was so worked upon, that he went to him and said,—‘Mr Hill, Mr Hill, I felt to-day—’tis this slap-dash preaching, say what they will, that does all the good.’”

* On one occasion, an attempt had been made to persuade him not to go to Richmond, because a party of young men had hired a boat, and were coming down the river, with the determination to draw him through the water. His feelings may be conceived when informed the boat was upset, and that the poor misguided enemies of his ministry had all entered into the presence of their Judge in another world.

Mr Hill was fond of the country, and he was in the habit of retiring during the summer months to the scenes of his former labour in Gloucestershire, where he erected a house and a chapel for the benefit of as many of the country people as chose to avail themselves of the privilege. The situation is thus graphically described by his biographer:—

“The celebrated Robert Hall once paid him a visit at Wotton, and said of it,—‘Sir, it is the most paradisaical spot I was ever in.’ Strong as was the expression, he did not say too much. Opposite the house is the most perfect amphitheatre of hill, three parts of which is clothed with a hanging wood, of exquisite variety of foliage, enclosing a dale of the richest fertility. The summit of a hill on the left of the house commands a landscape on which nature has lavished her choicest attractions. The Welsh mountains, the Malvern hills, the green vale of Berkeley, the broad course of the silvery and majestic Severn, and a foreground of grassy knolls and hanging woods, form the principal features of a scene in which all are blended in the loveliest harmony and proportions. In front of the house, a rocky path winding through a sloping wood of beech, breaks it with its white and narrow streaks into clusters of great beauty and variety. On the sabbath this road teemed with human beings, coming from the lovely glens around to hear the word of life from the lips of their beloved minister. About half an hour before service, he might be seen watching through a telescope his approaching flock as they descended into the valley, and making his remarks to those near him on the seriousness or levity of their manner. Sometimes he gave a hint of the latter in his sermon, and they who were conscious of its application, wondered how he knew it. Some of them used to say, ‘we must mind what we do, for Master Hill knows every thing, bless him.’”

In this chapel he always preached on Sabbath; but he scarcely allowed a day to pass without preaching somewhere in the neighbourhood, orchards, commons, gardens, woods, hills and dales, being often the scenes of his varied labours. “On a Sunday, after the service of his chapel at Wotton, he would give out such a notice as this:—‘To-morrow evening meet the society.’ ‘Any body here from Nibley?’—(a nod of assent.) ‘Tell them I shall preach there Tuesday; Wednesday, preach here; Thursday, Wickwar; Friday, Uley; Saturday, must have some rest; Sunday, here again, God willing.’ After this notice he not unfrequently forgot the places where he intended to go, when Mrs Hill's accuracy was of no slight service in aiding his memory. He often said at breakfast, ‘where am I to preach to-day?’—and fortunate it was for himself and the people, that she had not forgotten the detail of his arrangements.”

Many of the country people who attended his ministrations in this rural retreat were brought under the influence of the truth, and gave evidence of the sincerity and power of their faith, by the consistency of their lives, and their abounding in the fruits of righteousness. There was one, however, who, with a profession that had never brought him under suspicion, concealed a heart that was still in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity; and as the story affords a remarkable proof, both of the eminently pious character of Mr Hill, and the awe in which even ungodly men stand of the people of God, it may be interesting to the reader to meet with it in the words of the author whom we have already quoted.

“A man who worked in Mr Hill's garden at Wotton, and was supposed to have forsaken a life of sin, under the influence of religion, was at length discovered to have been the perpetrator of several burglaries, and other daring robberies in the neighbourhood, though he had not, till glauc in the fact, been even suspected. He was tried at Gloucester, condemned, and executed. It need scarcely be said that his employer visited him in gaol. During his interviews with him there, the criminal confessed the many crimes of which he had been guilty. 'How was it, William,' he inquired, 'that you never robbed me, when you have had such abundant opportunity?' 'Sir,' replied he, 'do you recollect the juniper bush on the border against the dining-room?—I have many times hid under it at night, intending, which I could easily have done, to get into the house and plunder it—but, sir, I was afraid; something said to me, he is a man of God, it is a house of prayer—if I break in there I shall surely be found out—so I never could pluck up courage to attempt it.' In another conversation he told him, 'Sir, I well knew that old Mr Rugg was in the habit of carrying a deal of money in his pocket; many a time have I hid behind the hedge of the lane leading to his house—he has passed within a yard of me, when going home from the prayer meeting, again and again—I could not stir—I durst not touch so holy a man. I was afraid. I always began trembling as soon as he came near me, and gave up the thought altogether, for I knew he was a holy man.' This is a fact which well assures us that God our sun is a shield too."

JERUSALEM.

Extracted from Jowett's "Christian Researches in Syria and the Holy Land."

"ON reaching the rocky heights of Beer, the country began to assume a more wild appearance. Uncultivated hilly tracts in every direction, seemed to announce, that, not only Jerusalem, but its vicinity for some miles round, was destined to sadden the heart of every visitor. Even 'the stranger that shall come from a far land,' it was predicted (Deut. xxix. 22.), should be amazed at the plagues laid upon this country: and this became, more than ever, literally fulfilled in my feelings, as I drew near to the metropolis of this chosen nation. Expectation was, indeed, wrought up to a high pitch, as we ascended hill after hill, and beheld others yet more distant rising after each other. Being apprehensive lest I should not reach the city gate before sun-set, Mr Fiak having gone on some way before me in order to prepare our rooms, I repeatedly desired the guides to ask the Arabs whom we met, how far, or, according to the language of this country, 'how many hours,' it was to Jerusalem. The answer which we received from all was, 'We have been at the prayers at the Mosque of Omar, and we left at noon—to-day being the Mahomedan Sabbath. We were thus left to calculate our distance. The reply sounded very foreign to the ears of one, who knew that, formerly, there were scenes of purer worship on this spot. 'Thither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, to the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord.'

"At length, while the sun was yet two hours high, my long and intensely interesting suspense was relieved. The view of the city burst upon me as in a moment; and the truly graphic language of the Psalmist was verified, in a degree of which I could have formed no previous conception. Continually the expressions were bursting from my lips—'Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion!—They, that trust in the Lord, shall be as Mount Zion; which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever!—As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people, from henceforth even for ever!'

"Among the vast assemblage of domes which adorn the roofs of the convents, churches, and houses, and give to this forlorn city an air even of magnificence, none seemed more splendid than that which has usurped the place of Solomon's Temple. Not having my companion with me, I surveyed all in silence and rapture; and the elegant proportions, the glittering gilded crescent, and the beautiful green-blue colour of the Mosque of Omar were peculiarly attractive. A more soothing part of the scenery was the lovely slope of the Mount of Olives on the left. As we drew nearer and nearer to 'the city of the Great King,' more and more manifest were the proofs of the displeasure of that Great King resting upon his city. "Like many other cities of the East, the distant view of Jerusalem is inexpressibly beautiful: but the distant view is all. On entering at the Damascus gate, meanness, and filth, and misery, not exceeded, if equalled, by any thing which I had before seen, soon told the tale of degradation. 'How is the fine gold become dim!' Thus I went onward, pitying every thing and every body that I saw—till, turning off to the right, and having passed up what is called the 'Via Dolorosa,' from its being the supposed path of our Lord when he bore his cross on his way to his crucifixion, we at length alighted at the Greek convent of Mar Michael.

"During the first few hours after our arrival in the Holy City, there was little to stir up the heart to a lively feeling, that this is really that venerable and beloved place, renowned above all others in Scripture. Hunger, fatigue, and the cheerlessness of an eight-hour's ride over a peculiarly desolate tract of country, with no other refreshment than a small jar of boiled rice and some bread, would have been agreeably relieved by the welcome of pleasant countenance, sufficient food, and a warm room: but our apartments, which had not been occupied for six months, were floored and vaulted with stone—fire-places are unknown in this land—our provisions were all to seek, and, at this late hour of the day, scarcely to be found—Hadjee Demetrius, the servant of the convent, in a sort of broken Turco-Grecian dialect, proffered his tedious and awkward services—the baggage was to be looked after—the mercenary and clamorous guides were to be (not satisfied—that was an impossibility—but) settled with and dismissed—and, lastly, as if to diffuse a perfect sadness over our arrival, the storm, which had threatened and slightly touched us during the latter part of our stage, now began to fall in torrents, similar to those which had buffeted us on the preceding evening near Saugyl. Every thing combined to inspire a feeling of melancholy—congenial enough to those emotions with which the actual civil and religious condition of Jerusalem deserves now to be contemplated; but in no degree harmonizing with those sublimer and more glorious thoughts, which the very name of this city generally awakens in the bosom of the Christian.

"When the evening had closed, however, and the hour for retirement, devotion, and repose arrived, all that I had ever anticipated as likely to be felt on reaching this place, gradually came into my mind, and filled me with the most lively consciousness of delight at being in Jerusalem. 'This,' I thought 'is no other than the city of David. Hither, the queen of the south came to hear the wisdom of Solomon. Isaiah here poured forth strains of evangelic rapture, which will glow with unspent warmth till the end of time. Here, the building of the Second Temple drew from the beholders mingled shouts and tears; and, here was that very temple, made more glorious than the first, by the entrance of 'the desire of all nations, the messenger of the Covenant!' Here, after he had rebuilt the temple of his own body, he began the wondrous work of raising a spiritual temple to his Father—shedding abundantly upon his disciples the gift of the Holy Ghost, for which they waited in this very city; and then sending them forth as his witnesses to the 'utmost parts of the earth.'

"Such were the principal thoughts with which I had for some months associated this visit; and now, all were gradually presented to my mind.

"I felt, I confess, no particular anxiety to see what are called the 'holy places.' Many have hastened to offer their first devotions at the sepulchre of our Lord: so far from having this desire, I feel somewhat of repugnance at the idea: it is enough for me to know, that I am not far from that scene—that Gethsemane, and Calvary, and 'the place where the Lord lay,' are all so near to me, that I can truly say, I am dwelling in the midst of them. All this, too, my heart can better conceive in the stillness of the night-season, than by the light of day. And he, who suffered here, still lives—'Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever!' Spiritually he is as near to me, as he would have been had I seen him, this very day, at the ninth hour expiring upon the cross: the blood then shed is still fresh in its efficacy, and 'cleanseth us from all sin.' If to have come hither should prove the means of raising me one degree higher in love to this adorable Redeemer, I would be thankful: but let me remember, that he desires us chiefly to view him with an eye of faith; and that, although 'we see him not' in the flesh 'yet believing, we may rejoice in him with joy unpeakable and full of glory.'

"There is something very peculiar in the aspect of the Sabbath in these parts. We have never as yet had, indeed, occasion to say, that 'the adversaries mock at our Sabbaths;' but the sensation arising from seeing, that to the Mahomedans and Jews this is a day of work, and that to the bulk of professing Christians it is, alas! a day of more than usual mirth, visiting, and feasting, abates much of that spirit of sacred sympathy which David so touchingly describes—'I went up with the multitude of them that keep holy-day. I was glad when they said, Let us go into the house of the Lord!' On this very spot, did David once delight in these Sabbathic hours! But what would he think, were his spirit to descend from its eternal rest, to see his stronghold of Zion dismantled; and his brethren, for whose peace he prayed, broken in pieces by the oppressor? Were Solomon again to walk this earth, and view his unrivalled Temple supplanted by the Mosque of Omar; or could Isaiah know that his evangelic raptures are still unrevealed to multitudes on this holy hill of Zion, and that the watchmen who should have kept their stand day and night upon the walls of Jerusalem have long since held their peace, and sunk into almost Pagan stupor; or could the first apostles look round, and ask in this place, Who are they that have kept the faith?—what would be the emotions of their re-embodied spirits! We, so greatly their inferiors—not so devout, nor fervent, nor conversant with divine mysteries as they—yet feel amazed and utterly down-cast, when we contemplate so many visible marks of departed glory."

"At half-past-eleven o'clock, we passed the Damascus gate of the city; and, in half an hour, reached the top of the hill, from which I had caught the first view of Jerusalem on my arrival, and from which I was now to see it for the last time.

"While the servants went on, I rode to a fair green spot, and turned my horse's head round, that I might enjoy a few moments' solitary meditation on the view before me. Surely no traveller would fail to snatch such a moment! With little bodily strength, and through a variety of scenes in which troubles had been anticipated, though none had been experienced, I have thus succeeded in accomplishing the pilgrimage to the Holy City. 'What good,' I thought, 'has my visit done here? Who will be the better for it? Here—where the Saviour bled—how have I requited his love?' These thoughts rapidly passed through my mind, raising such pensive feelings as I am no stranger to. 'I feel that I have done almost nothing: and even if, humanly speaking, I had done much, yet I must before my Master acknowledge that I am an unprofitable servant. The noon-day sun shines strong and bright upon the city, and seems to mock its base condition. What a contrast between its aspect at this distance, and its actual state! Here, the smaller objects not being minutely discernible, the glowing strains of David seem as true and lively as they were when they first answered to the touch of his instrument of ten strings—'Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion.' Still, there seem to be her towers, her bulwarks, and her palaces challenging our admiration. But I have now, for more than twenty days, known that these are not the towers or the temple of ancient times. At every step, coming forth out of the city, the heart is reminded of that prophecy, accomplished to the letter, 'Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles.' All the streets are wretchedness; and the houses of the Jews more especially (the people who once held a sceptre on this mountain of holiness) are as dunghills.

"While I gazed, my eyes filled with tears till I could look no longer. The frequent ejaculation of the bishop of Nazareth came into my mind—'Lord, how long!' I thought, too, of those brethren, from whom I had just parted, and for whose sakes I had an additional motive to pray, 'Peace be within thy walls!' I then suddenly broke off from this multitude of thoughts, which was growing too painful for me; and, pursuing my journey, I felt by degrees as though my present mission was, in some sense, accomplished; and began to indulge more warmly, the hope of returning to my family in peace."

JOHN BROWN OF PRIESTHILL.*

"On one of those days, when driven from his home, he fled for refuge to a deep ravine, or moss hag, that had been formed by the current of a water-spout, carrying shrubs, soil, moss, and all before it, to the dale land beneath, leaving a frightful chasm, amidst a vast field of heath. Its deep mossy sides made it inaccessible to strangers: only the neighbouring husbandmen knew where the brakens hid the rocks, whose shelvy sides conducted to the bottom. In the sides of this natural alley were dens and caves, sufficient to hide a large company. In one of these Priesthill intended to spend the day in prayer; and had begun to pour out his soul, in the words of Lamentations iii. 40, &c. when a sweet sound reached his ear, that seemed to proceed from another part of the place. At first it was in a soft under voice, as afraid to be heard, but soon rose above all fear, joined with others; and he heard a Psalm distinctly sung.

"'It is the hallowed sound of praising God; and by some fellow-sufferers;' said John Brown, as he arose from his knees, to search them out. And to his no small joy, he found David and William Steel, his neighbours, and Joseph Wilson from Lesmahago, in the cleft of a rock that jutted half way into the ravine. The Steels had had a narrow escape the day before this. And it was to avoid such harassing that they now fled to the ravine. Nor did they flee in vain. They found, to their sweet experience, this dreary waste a Bethel; and in their harassings and hidings, as it was with Moses on the mount, they felt nearest God when farthest from creature comforts. All day they read of God's Word and prayed by turns; and during the dark and silent watches of the night, by turns they prayed and praised.

"The seventy-fourth Psalm was deeply imprinted on their memories, from its being remarkably descriptive of their situation. The whole of it was sung about midnight; and while the wind carried the sound to the dale land below, faith carried the matter up to heaven. They felt a peace that made them loath to part. Every one was sensible that the presence of God had been with them. And in this spirit these poor hunted saints spent the time till morning dawned, and the lark rose above their heads, joining his note with theirs, in praise to God for the light of another day.

* From the Scots Worthies.

William Steel, who escaped death from the persecutors, and lived many years after the Revolution, said often, if ever there was a time in his life that he would wish to enjoy over again, it was especially that day and night he spent in the moss hag. They all thought it would be their last meeting on earth. He was the first that ascended from the ravine, to look if the enemy were in view; and it being a clear morning, and no person in sight, they all followed, and were standing to consult on the separate paths they would take home, to prevent them from being seen, when they were struck silent by a voice, sweeter than any thing they had ever heard, passing over the ravine, singing these words:—

“ Oh ! let the prisoners' sighs ascend
Before thy sight on high ;
Preserve those by thy mighty power,
That are ordained to die.”

“ And again, while they stood speechless, another voice sung, in tones of exultation :

“ Though ye have lain among the pots,
Like doves ye shall appear,
Whose wings with silver, and with gold
Whose feathers covered arc.”

“ After standing for some time looking at one another, some of them thought they had left other worshippers in the moss hag. Others thought that the sound echoed from a greater distance. ‘Whoever or wherever the words come from, we have little concern,’ said John Brown; ‘one thing we may take comfort from, they are God’s words to his Church in affliction; and that is our situation.’

“ As usual, he had arisen with the dawn, and had offered up the morning sacrifice. His wife often told how remarkably the Psalm, sung that morning, tended to gird up the loins of their minds. It was Psalm xxvii. 1—4.

“ After worship, the gudeman went to the hill to prepare some peat ground; the servants were also out, and engaged at some distance in their wonted employments. Of a sudden Claverhouse surrounded the helpless man with three troops of dragoons, and brought him down to his own house. He left his implements of industry with great composure, and walked down before them, more like a leader than a captive.

“ Meanwhile Janet had alarmed her mother, by telling her that a great many horsemen were coming down the hill with her father. ‘The thing I feared is come upon me; O give me grace for this hour,’ said her mother, hastily taking up her boy, and wrapping him in her plaid; and taking Janet by the hand, she went out to meet her foes, praying in secret as she went.

“ The leisurely way of examining persons by law, in which there was some semblance of justice, was now departed from. Claverhouse simply asked John Brown, Why he did not attend the curate? and if he would pray for king James? Upon hearing his answer, Claverhouse said, ‘Go to your prayers, for you shall immediately die;’ which command John immediately complied with, and that in such a manner as filled the troops with amazement. On his family it had a different effect. His wife, who was near her confinement, with a child in her arms, and Janet at her side, stood while he prayed ‘that every covenanted blessing might be poured upon her and her children, born and unborn, as one refreshed by the influence of the Holy Spirit, when he comes down like rain upon the mown grass, as showers upon the earth.’

“ There is a light in the Christian’s life that discovers the spots of the wicked, and torments them before the time. When Claverhouse could bear his prayers no longer, and had succeeded, after interrupting him twice, with the most blasphemous language, to raise him from his knees, John Brown said to his wife,—‘Isabell, this is the day I told you of before we were married;’ and added with his usual kindness, ‘You see me summoned to appear, in a few minutes, before the court of heaven, as a witness in our Redeemer’s cause, against the ruler of Scotland. Are you willing that I should part from you?’ ‘Heartily willing,’ said she, in a voice that spoke her regard for her husband, and her submission to the Lord, even when he called her to bow before his terrible things. ‘That is all I wait for: O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where will be thy victory?’ said the good man, while he tenderly laid his arms around her, kissed her and his little boy, and lastly Janet; saying to her, ‘My sweet bairn, give your hand to God as your guide; and be your mother’s comfort.’ He could add no more; a tide of tenderness overflowed his heart. At last he uttered these words, ‘Blessed be thou, O Holy Spirit! that speaketh more comfort to my heart than the voice of my oppressors can speak terror to my ears!’ Thus, when the Lord brought his witness to be tried, he discovered a magnanimity which, as he fell, conquered his persecutors.

“ If, in the Christian’s life, there is a light that discovers the spots of the wicked; so, in the martyr’s heroic grappling with death, there is a heat that scorches them past enduring. It was doubtless under this feeling that Claverhouse ordered six of his dragoons to shoot him, ere the last words were out of his mouth; but his prayers and conduct had disarmed them from performing such a savage action. They stood motionless. Fearing for their mutiny, Claverhouse snatched a pistol from his own belt and shot him through the head. And while his troops slunk from the awful scene, he, like a beast of prey that tramples and howls over a fallen victim, insulted the tender-hearted wife, while she gathered up the shattered head, by taunting jeers; ‘What thinkest thou of thy husband now, woman?’ ‘I ever thought muckle good of him,’ said she, ‘and now more than ever.’ He seeing her courage, said, ‘it were but justice to lay thee beside him.’ She replied, ‘if ye were permitted, I doubt not your cruelty could go that length;—how will ye answer for this morning’s work?’ With a countenance that belied his words, he answered, ‘To men I can be answerable; and as for God, I will take him in my own hands.’ Thus saying, he hastily put spurs to his horse, and left her with the corpse. She tied up his head with her napkin, composed his body, covered it with her plaid, and when she had nothing farther to do or contend with, she sat down on the ground, drew her children to her, and wept over her mangled husband.”

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN BRUCE, A. M.,

Minister of the New North Parish, Edinburgh.

“ Therefore, whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock: And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man which built his house upon the sand: And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the wind blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it.”—MAT. vii. 24—27.

It is the reflection of Solomon, the wise king of Israel, that “though a man live many years, and rejoice in them all, yet should he remember the days of darkness, for they shall be many;” and again, in various ways, but to the same purpose we find him referring to “the evil days which are coming, and the years which are drawing nigh of which we shall say, that in them we have n pleasure." But though it makes it all the more interesting and instructive to know, that such were the reflections of the wisest of men,—even when, surrounded with all that could banish care, and keep the presentiment of future trouble far away,—there are perhaps but very few, if indeed there be any, to whom reflections of the same nature have not occurred, and on whom they are not in the way at least of making some such serious impression about the necessity of remembering God, and having their religion ready as a refuge against the arrival of some unseen but inevitable evil.

Our Lord, therefore, you perceive in this passage, likens every professing disciple to a man more or less occupied about the building of an house, so as to have it all in readiness before the rain and the floods descend; and though no doubt he distinctly saw, that between the two great classes or divisions of men who are all so occupied, there are many points of distinction;—although, for instance, he distinctly saw, that while occupied apparently about the very same kind of work, inasmuch as they may all be said to be building an house to dwell in, yet it may also be added (if carrying out the illustration,) that the plans of their houses are not the same, nor are their materials the same, nor indeed is there anything about the whole style or progress of the different structures the same;—though our Lord had all these thorough differences perfectly in his eye, it is important to notice, that he instances just one, when discoursing of that which the storm, on its arrival, did all in due time discover. The one of these houses, he tells us, stood, for "it was founded upon a rock," and the other of these houses fell, for "it was founded upon the sand." He knew well, as I have already said, that throughout the whole form and substance of the buildings, there obtained very many, and all pervading distinctions; but he confined himself to this one, at the foundation, because, whatever the rest might be, this one, at the foundation, was decisive of every thing. And his fixing upon this one distinction, and mentioning not another, is just meant to remind us, that when the rain and the floods descend, or in other words, in the day of the great and the final judgment, every thing will be found right, or every thing will be found wrong, just according as we are or are not on the one tried foundation.

Now that one foundation, as every person acquainted with Scripture knows, is both expressly and constantly declared to be Christ himself. To prepare mankind for receiving this declaration, the prophets, throughout successive ages, testified in the name of the Lord, before he came in the flesh: "Behold I lay in Zion a chief corner-stone, a tried stone, elect and precious, and whosoever buildeth thereon, shall never be confounded." And again, lest any should mistake, in regard to a testimony so perfectly strange to our natural feelings, and so immensely peculiar, not only did our Lord himself express, by various illustrations, the very same truth, but St Paul, in like manner, and all the holy apostles, seemed plainly to have lived and written for no other purpose, than to enforce the commandment to choose that foundation and build on it indefatigably, for how oft, and in how many ways are we reminded, that "other foundation can no man lay than that which is already laid, which is Jesus Christ." But observe what is as plain, that while our Lord here ascribes the perfect safety of the one, and the utter ruin of the other, to the difference in the nature of the foundations on which those persons had severally built, he also, at the same moment, and as expressly declares, that the one is an image or representation of a man who heard his sayings, "and did them," the other of a man, who heard the very same sayings of Christ, and "did not do them." The one, building his house upon the only sure foundation,—that rock which is Christ,—was found ultimately safe and impregnable, just because he did so; but he, you perceive, was the very individual man, who heard Christ's sayings and did them. The other, either not knowing or not heeding the only sure foundation, built his house upon the sand, and was ultimately ruined, just because he did so. But it is no less obvious of him in his turn, that he was the very individual man who heard Christ's sayings, and did not do them. On the one hand, therefore, the choice of the sure foundation, and the devoted doing of the precepts, are here represented as invariably uniting in one and the same person. On the other hand, the choice of the false foundation, and the disregard of the precepts, are as distinctly represented as invariably uniting in one and the same person. This, brethren, is the fact, the plain and simple fact, however it may be accounted for. And just because, as I shall presently shew you, there cannot, in the very nature of things, be any reversal of that arrangement; our Lord speaks in this, as in all other passages, of every man who heareth these sayings of his and doeth them, as one who shall be saved; while every one that heareth these sayings of his, and doeth them not, shall as certainly perish.

To apprehend then how this must be,—so that from the very nature of things, of these four properties, which go always in pairs, the very same two are invariably found together; and no force can transpose or compel them to change places, and God himself having joined them, none can put them asunder,—to apprehend how this is, we have just, in fact, to consider what those sayings of Jesus Christ really are; and what that is which distinguishes those sayings of Jesus Christ from those of all other religious teachers, so that of him it was said truly, "never man spake like this man." There is evidently nothing in these sayings of Jesus Christ, so ornate or ingenious, so argumentative or profound, as to compel every man's reverence, and cause all comparison with what is earthly, to seem an impious profanation. And while there is nothing in them of what mankind admire in the discourses of each other, what then, it may be asked, is their illustrious distinction? What constitutes their peculiar, indefeasible, and unrivalled glory?

"The law of the Lord is perfect. The statutes of the Lord are right. The commandment of the Lord is pure. The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold." It is then the heavenly purity of his maxims; it is the stupendous heights of holiness which he steadfastly pointed to, and besought his hearers, as for their life, to ascend along with him; it is the certainty and determination with which he prophecies of the worldly, and all the careless, as about to be cast, both soul and body, into hell; it is the tone of solemn and inflexible earnestness, wherewith, even when most compassionate, he kept urging upon us sinners, the demands of his Father's law, as a being descended to us from a higher and far holier world: in a word, it is the whole aspect and bearing of a speaker, whose soul laboured and was in heaviness with this weighty presentiment, that none but "the pure in heart shall see God;" so that to remain contented in any sin, or to desist from striving to ascend nearer to God in purity, is just, in other words, to renounce salvation. It is this pure and elevated tone in which Christ urges the necessity, in fact, of a life and character conformable to his own; it is this, and nothing else, which constitutes the grand unrivalled and indefeasible peculiarity of Christ's maxims or moral sayings. And plainly, therefore, whenever any of us thinks, in good earnest, of beginning to keep them, we are thrown at once upon Christ, as our advocate, for immediate enlargement. We are thrown upon him at once for preternatural supplies of pardon and of strength, which is naturally none of ours. We feel then, for the first time in our lives, how true is Christ's testimony, "Without me ye can do nothing." We cry, as David cried, whenever we begin to think of climbing these awful heights, "Lord lead thou me in thy ways. Uphold thou my goings." "Hold me up by thy hands, for I cannot take one step without thee." And thus it is, that whenever you apprehend distinctly that awfully urgent holiness, which is all that makes these sayings of Jesus Christ so different from the moral maxims of men, you are driven upon maintaining closest intercourse with Christ, as the great intercessor, by the irresistible prevalency of whose name alone in heaven you can, even on this earth, work out your salvation.

I trust, therefore, you see both how true and how very plain it is, in the nature of things, that the man who heareth Christ's sayings and doeth them, is a man united to Christ by faith, or, in other words, resting confidently in his righteousness and his strength, for renewed pardons and for advancing purity. And that, therefore, inasmuch as Christ is that "foundation already laid," which can never deceive him, every such disciple is most appropriately likened to a man who built his house upon a rock, so that "when the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, it fell not, for it was founded upon a rock."

In other words, (and dropping the figure,) when that day shall come, of which Christ, in the foregoing verses, had just spoken so terribly, calling it that day just because, without saying more, he found in every man's conscience, a certain fearful looking for it; the last day, which shall come upon all the world, as a thief in the night; the great and terrible day of the Lord, when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory, and shall assemble all nations before him, and the books shall be opened, and in the presence of the righteous angels, according to the things that are written therein every man shall be judged,—when it shall be demanded of us, for instance, if we fed the hungry, and clothed the naked, and bore other men's heavy burdens, and worshipped God in the spirit, having no confidence in the flesh, and came out from the world, striving always to ascend and keep high above it, faint indeed, yet still pursuing our heavenward journey, upheld by the everlasting arms of him "who hath called us to glory and to virtue;"—when this, I say, shall be demanded of us, it will, doubtless, be seen how perfectly the good works of Christ's people are intrinsically different from the good works of the world; that, in other words, as I said at first, their house is different in its entire form and material, from the edifice of the others, and therefore, even for these reasons, might stand when the other is swept away; yet our Lord just refers, as I also said, to the one and the simple fact, that the foundation is all secure. And what one thing, more clearly, shall that day discover than the everlasting strength and stability of that precious foundation? Jesus Christ, on that day, passing by all other, however weighty reasons, for rewarding such disciples with a weight of glory, which, from profoundest awe and astonishment, they would almost decline, saying "Lord when saw we thee an hungared and fed thee, or when saw we thee naked and a stranger and clothed thee and took thee in;"—Jesus Christ, I say, passing by the intrinsic excellence of their preternatural works, will simply refer again to the one sure foundation. He will simply reply—and his reply is decisive—ye heard my most holy sayings, and knowing well that I called you to deny yourselves, and take up your cross and follow me, and ascend, as it were, to the very gate of heaven, and do innumerable things impossible to flesh and blood, ye did all in my strength, imploring pardon and help of God continually, as became a sinner, in my name, and for my sake, and because of my mediation. This, brethren, you well know, is substantially the only reason which Jesus Christ will assign; because by raising him from the dead, God, the everlasting Father, shewed that the righteousness of the Son is the ground or foundation of his whole gracious procedure towards the fallen and redeemed. And thus, on that day, it shall be abundantly verified, that "when the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, it fell not, for it was founded upon a rock,"—that rock which is Christ.

If, therefore, brethren, the house built upon that sure foundation shall stand the lashing storm and fury even of that fearful day—the great and terrible day of the Lord—I need not detain you dwelling upon any other, such as the day of some great national or domestic affliction. I need not now speak to you of the day of one's natural death—the day of pain and sickness, and unutterable sorrows and heart-rending separations; for what can be plainer than that the man who is so established by faith in his arisen Saviour, can never be confounded? Let the storm of affliction burst around and above him, and shake terribly the house he hath so laboriously reared, that man will be found still secure, and free from all distressful alarms, knowing well the strength and stability of the one tried foundation. He will say within himself, like every true child of God, and ever as he says it he will recover his own so blissful and almost divine tranquillity, "Nevertheless, the foundation of God—the foundation of God nevertheless standeth sure." Be entreated, therefore, brethren, to make very sure for yourselves of building on that only one tried foundation, and not upon the sand. Nothing is more possible than that such afflictions as are befalling daily, discover to you every now and then, and alarm you exceedingly lest the discovery should grow more complete, that the foundation on which you are building is neither sure nor satisfying. And if such be the alarm occasioned by every casual rumour of the day,—by every light and passing affliction which endureth but for a moment, oh, how shall you escape being amazed and confounded when you arise from the grave to behold the heavens and the earth depart! One should imagine it the first and most natural thought of all, in this as in other cases, to try well the foundation ere ever you proceed to build; but in this one affair of mightiest consequence, this is very possibly what up to this moment you have neglected to do. You have committed, perhaps, this strange blunder—this most egregious unnatural oversight. You have forgotten, or refused, perhaps, to consider whether in all that you are doing, no doubt with desire to promote your salvation, you be not like a man building laboriously on the sand. If so, it is quite sure and evident, that though hearing Christ's sayings, you are not actually engaged in doing them. You may indeed be attempting habitual conformity and compliance with the letter of some commandments which you think you can in your own strength most easily compass; but all that is high, and holy, and spiritual, in the sayings of Jesus Christ,—all that which distinguishes them from the sayings of mere earthly moralists, and makes them so properly and so peculiarly Christ's,—all that you discard: as, for example, when he tells you to worship God in the spirit, to strive to be pure in heart, to set your affections on things in heaven, to deny yourself daily, and to take up your cross and follow him. You will not accompany Jesus Christ thus far on the way. You will go no farther with him than the moralists of this world have counselled you to proceed. It is to their sayings, therefore, and their authority that you choose to succumb, and not to Jesus Christ. These are your favourite, revered instructors, and it is not the Lord. You will not quit the smooth and level thoroughfare though it leads onward to death. You will not turn at the voice of Christ, and ascend those awful heights, though the path which runs along them leads directly to heaven, and the everlasting arms of the Almighty would for ever uphold you. This you have never done; and it is plain that you never will, from very dread and discouragement, until you take up your confidence in Christ's great name; or, to use the figure of our text, begin to go on, and build on the one sure foundation.

I entreat you also to go on and build most diligently and without delay; for should you ask me, brethren, whether there exist on earth greater folly and madness than is chargeable upon him who persists in building upon the sand, I would answer, that I know just of one other instance that can at all be compared with it, and that is, the folly and presumption of him who knowing, or professing to know, that there is a foundation already laid in Christ, so sure and so satisfying, yet indolently or perversely refuses to build at all. The very fact of there being such a foundation already laid is more than all else to condemn every one of us who says that he knows it, and yet is not striving diligently to perfect the great work assigned him ere the coming of the Lord. Go then, beloved, and choosing Christ's glorious work as the commentary and the grand enforcement of all his commandments, seek always to do such good works in his name, depending on his strength, and because being in yourself both helpless and sinful, you rely on the prevalency of his great mediation. Show thus, that hearing Christ's sayings, you verily and indeed believe as Christ did, how blessed are the poor in spirit, and the mourners, and the meek, and the merciful, and the peacemakers, and they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, and the pure in heart, and the persecuted for righteousness sake, since they most especially have their rewards in heaven; and thus adding to your faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness, and, above all things, charity, your labour shall not be in vain in the Lord; and you shall openly appear at last as God's spiritual building—one holy and everlasting temple, whereof Jesus Christ himself is the chief corner-stone. Amen.

SUDDEN CONVERSIONS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT M'CHEYNE.

"Who hath heard such a thing? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day?"—ISAIAH lxxvi. 2.

THERE exists in some truly religious minds a rooted antipathy to anything like suddenness in conversion. Men are, in this case, sometimes apt to judge only from their own experience; and because they, and all whom they know in the Lord, were brought to the saving reception of the truth by steps slow and almost imperceptible.

tible, they think that every one else must be brought in something of the same way. In opposition to this narrow way of judging, let us take the testimony of analogy, of Scripture, and of experience, and we shall find that God does by no means confine himself to slow and progressive methods of bringing souls to the knowledge of the Saviour.

1. All analogy shews, that a total change of mind may occur very suddenly. In solving a mathematical problem, every student knows, that often when the mind has pored over the diagram in vain for a whole night, and nothing but perplexity has been the result, the introduction of one small truth into the mind casts a flood of light over the whole, the truth of the proposition flashes across the mind with the rapidity of lightning, and yet he may require much time and pains, or he may even find it impossible to go slowly over the different steps by which he was led to the truth. But if this be true in mathematics, it is much more true in those cases where the affections as well as the intellect are engaged. In all cases of prejudice, where the understanding is blinded and turned aside by the heart, it often requires but a slight shifting of the affections to rectify the judgment and enlighten the whole mind. Now, this shifting of the affections may take place in the twinkling of an eye. How often have the prejudices that for half a century had been building themselves up in the mind against medicine and medical men, been swept away in the first half-hour of a dangerous illness; so that the judgment has been thoroughly changed simply by the awakening of fear?

2. Now, Scripture shews plainly that there may be, and often is, the same suddenness in the turning of a soul to God. Many of the invitations of the Word are made upon the understanding, that conversion may be sudden: "To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts." "Turn you at my reproof. Behold I will pour out my Spirit upon you." "Behold now is the accepted time. Behold now is the day of salvation." The Bible would never invite men to turn now, and this very day, if immediate conversion were a thing impossible. Again, we have many Scripture examples of men being brought suddenly from darkness into marvellous light.

In one day 3000 souls, among whom were many who had helped to crucify the Lord of Glory, and many who, but a few minutes before, had mocked the holy apostles, saying, "these men are full of new wine," were thoroughly and lastingly converted. And again, the heathen jailor of Philippi, in the same night in which he had drawn his sword and would have killed himself, "rejoiced, believing with all his house." In both these cases, though the supernatural power of the Spirit of God was manifested in a way that may well shut the mouths of cavillers, there was no miraculous agency employed, but the simple preaching of the Word was the instrument of conversion.

3. The experience of faithful ministers has treasured up many memorable testimonies of the truth we are maintaining. The following example, from the labours of that blessed Missionary and man of God, David Brainerd, is peculiarly striking.

He had been labouring for more than a year among the American Indians of Pennsylvania and Susquehanna without success. This damped the spirits of the ardent Missionary, and led him to seek new hearers among the Indians of Crossveekung, in New Jersey. In June 1745, he began his labours among them, and was not long without singular and precious fruits of his ministry. The following account is in his own words, and is dated 8th August in the same year:—

"In the afternoon I preached to the Indians; their number was about sixty-five persons, men, women, and children: I discoursed from Luke xiv. 16—23, and was favoured with uncommon freedom in my discourse.—

There was much visible concern among them while I was discoursing publicly; but afterwards when I spoke to one and another more particularly, whom I perceived under much concern, the power of God seemed to descend upon the assembly 'like a rushing mighty wind,' and with an astonishing energy bore down all before it.

"I stood amazed at the influence that seized the audience almost universally, and could compare it to nothing more aptly than the irresistible force of a mighty torrent or swelling deluge, that with its insupportable weight and pressure, bears down and sweeps before it whatever is in its way. Almost all persons of all ages were bowed down with concern together, and scarce one was able to withstand the shock of this surprising operation. Old men and women who had been drunken wretches for many years, and some little children not more than six or seven years of age, appeared in distress for their souls, as well as persons of middle age. And it was apparent these children (some of them at least) were not merely frightened with seeing the general concern; but were made sensible of their danger, the badness of their hearts, and their misery without Christ, as some of them expressed it. The most stubborn hearts were now obliged to bow. A principal man among the Indians, who before was most secure and self-righteous, and thought his state good because he knew more than the generality of the Indians had formerly done, and who, with a great degree of confidence the day before, told me, 'he had been a Christian more than ten years,' was now brought under solemn concern for his soul, and wept bitterly. Another man advanced in years, who had been a murderer, a powow, (or conjurer,) and a notorious drunkard, was likewise brought now to cry for mercy with many tears, and to complain much that he could be no more concerned when he saw his danger so very great.

"They were almost universally praying and crying for mercy in every part of the house, and many out of doors, and numbers could neither go nor stand. Their concern was so great, each one for himself, that none seemed to take any notice of those about them, but each prayed freely for himself. And, I am led to think, they were to their own apprehension as much retired as if they had been individually by themselves in the thickest desert; or, I believe rather, that they thought nothing about any but themselves and their own states, and so were every one praying apart, although all together.

"It seemed to me there was now an exact fulfilment of that prophecy, Zech. xii. 10, 11, 12, for there was now 'a great mourning, like the mourning of Haddrimmon;'—and each seemed to 'mourn apart.' Methought this had a near resemblance to the day of God's power mentioned Josh. x. 14, for I must say, I never saw any day like it in all respects; it was a day wherein I am persuaded the Lord did much to destroy the kingdom of darkness among this people.

"This concern, in general, was most rational and just; those who had been awakened any considerable time, complained more especially of the badness of their hearts; and those newly awakened of the badness of their lives and actions past; and all were afraid of the anger of God, and of everlasting misery as the desert of their sins.—Some of the white people, who came out of curiosity to 'hear what this babbler would say' to the poor ignorant Indians, were much awakened, and some appeared to be wounded with a view of their perishing state.

"Those who had lately obtained relief, were filled with comfort at this season; they appeared calm and composed, and seemed to rejoice in Christ Jesus; and some of them took their distressed friends by the hand, telling them of the goodness of Christ, and the comfort that is to be enjoyed in him, and thence invited them to come and give up their hearts to him."

ON THE CHARACTER OF HEROD, TETRARCH [OR KING] OF GALILEE.

BY THE REV. R. S. CANDLISH, A.M.,
Minister of St. George's Parish, Edinburgh.

THIS Herod was one of the sons of the king of that name in whose reign Christ was born. On his father's death he became ruler over that part of his dominions called Galilee, and was so during the ministry of John the Baptist and Jesus. It was he who put John to death in so singular a way, with so strange a mixture of levity and cruelty. The details of this black tragedy are given in the sixth chapter of Mark, and the statement of the 26th verse, "And the king was exceeding sorry; yet for his oath's sake, and for their sakes which sat with him, he would not reject her," may be regarded as the explanation of his conduct. It very strikingly illustrates both the general character of the man and his state of mind in regard to the crime he was about to commit. He was sorry, but he thought he could not help it. And as he, in these respects, represents a large class of men, he may form an important and useful study.

"The king was exceeding sorry"—Some interpreters have shrewdly suspected that this sorrow was feigned, that the whole scene of this banquet was a preconcerted scheme, to which not only Herodias and her daughter, but Herod himself was privy, to get rid of John the Baptist, who was become alike obnoxious to them all. Herod dared not openly do him wrong for fear of the people, who counted John a prophet. He fell therefore upon the expedient of throwing the guilt of the original suggestion on his accomplices. The feast,—the dance,—the sudden admiration,—the rash promise,—the late repentance, all apparently natural and incidental, were artfully got up, that Herod, to the public eye, might be represented as a reluctant victim rather than a willing actor,—as entrapped and surprised. But this view of the matter, though not at all very improbable, is rather too refined; and there are circumstances in the history, and features in the character of Herod, which would incline us to the belief that he was not concerned in any previous arrangement,—that the plot, if there was a plot, was formed between the mother and daughter, without his knowledge,—that the atrocious proposal did come upon him abruptly and unexpectedly, and that he was exceeding sorry. This appears likely from the respect and attachment which we know he previously felt towards the Baptist, and from the remorse of which he afterwards gave proof. The truth is, this man was not by nature blood-thirsty. Weakness rather than violence was very much the characteristic of his mind. He was not prepared to adopt extreme measures. He was rather prone to try temporising expedients, and to seek the accomplishment of his ends by craft and compromise rather than by force. Other historians give him this character, and such he appears in the Bible. There is not much told of him, but the little that is told exhibits him as a man, in some respects, well disposed, yet too selfish and too timid to be consistent;—with some good principles, yet too much the slave of passion and the world, to give them fair play and scope;—not firm enough to do right, yet not bold and bad enough, unscrupulously to do wrong;—neither decidedly good, nor decidedly wicked, neither resolutely honest, nor a reckless ruffian;—but one hampered and entangled between good feelings, and desires, and resolutions, on the one hand, and evil inclinations, and evil counsellors on the other. If he could have got rid of the last, he might have been a better man,—if he could even have got rid of the first, he would have been a happier, at least an easier man. As it was, he was perpetually miserable, tossed and bandied to and fro between his sins and his scruples, doing things by halves, and settling the controversy of conscience with temptation by a sort of evasive underhand compromise, which left as much room as ever for a new struggle, a new assault, and a new defeat. Ever as he was disposed to do right, some supposed necessity of doing wrong interfered, and yet ever when the wrong was done, there was reluctance at the time, and regret and remorse afterwards. Hence that appearance of cunning which procured him from our Lord, the name "fox." And hence, too, that wavering and vacillating inconsistency which marked his treatment both of the Baptist and of our Lord. Thus, on the one hand, it is quite plain, he had a high opinion of both. For as to the Baptist we read, (ver. 20.) that Herod much esteemed him, admitted him to his court, made him almost a favourite—a friend, listened to him respectfully, treated him with all honour, and even, in many things, gladly followed his counsel. Again, as to our Lord, we are told that when Herod heard of his fame and his wonderful works, he desired to see him—out of curiosity, perhaps, or to atone for the violence done to the Baptist, by some attention to his successor and representative. Nor did this desire pass away, for on Jesus being brought before Herod for trial, we are told the prince rejoiced, having now for a long time been anxious to see this wonderful prophet, in the hope of witnessing some miracle. It is quite evident, therefore, that, to a certain extent, Herod had a regard for religion and its ministers. Nay, it seems as if at times, under the Baptist's ministry, on which he waited, he were really under the influence of religious impressions both sincere and deep. He "feared John, knowing him to be a just man and an holy, and observed him; and when he heard him, he did many things, and heard him gladly." He complied with his instructions, so long as these did not interfere too painfully with his worldly inclinations, and seemed to be living in peace and friendship with the prophet, and even with the prophet's Lord. But touch his secret sore too boldly, and the peace is broken, the friendship gone. Let temptation kindle again his favourite lust, his cherished desire; let the world make its demand openly, and religion as openly interpose her authority; let the controversy be brought to a single point, then comes the struggle, then is seen the weakness of merely natural impressions of religion. (ver. 17, 18.) The prince, who seemed to have started so well, in an unlucky hour was tempted to sin. The Baptist fearlessly remonstrated and reproved. Then was the king distracted between the flatteries of the world's easy morals, on the one hand, and religion's uncompromising claims on the other. Need we say which prevailed? The king yielded to his unlawful passion, but not without many apologies to himself, and many prudent resolutions. He was sorry, exceeding sorry, not perhaps "for his sin against God's law, but yet for the severity of God's law against his sin."—(M'Laurin.) He was sorry that the temptation was so strong, and his friend so strict, but then he felt as if he could not resist the temptation, as if indeed he could scarcely be fairly expected or required to do so. And though in this one instance, he could not go along with those high and stern principles which might suit an austere and solitary recluse, but could not well be acted upon in the world, amid the trials of a court,—still this single, almost unavoidable deviation from his counsels, would not hinder him from paying all respect in general to his friend's teaching. Alas! he little thought how soon this one instance of opposition to good advice would lead on even to the murder of the adviser. O if he could have foreseen that one indulgence, in the world's eye so venial, would issue by an almost necessary and inevitable train in falsehood, and treachery, and blood! But once do wrong, and who shall dare to say where the wrong will end. Doubtless Herod felt that though he might occasionally transgress the too strict rule of his friend, he never could be prevailed upon to disavow religion or its minister. He little knew how instantly and immediately the consciousness of guilt would work a change in his sentiments towards the reprover of that guilt. Even at the time, in the very act of sin, the thought of the holy man's disapprobation, still more the conviction of conscience that he spoke truth, poisoned the pleasure of his unhallowed and incestuous passion. Dissatisfied, restless, impatient, he could scarcely tell why or with whom, angry with himself and with all around, he could no longer gladly listen to the voice of him whose very presence was a reproof, whose smile even of kindness and benignity cut him to the heart. He would fain have silenced him at once and effectually for ever. But he feared John. The prophet had still too great a hold on his mind, and Herod had too many religious feelings and fears to venture on so bold an act of violence; and so he hesitated between his dislike of the reproof and his reverence for the reprover. And this perplexing indecision in his own mind was increased by opposing applications from without. His offended and indignant partner, on the one hand, instigated him to direct outrage. His people, on the other hand, acknowledged John to be a prophet. Weak, therefore, and irresolute, he had recourse to the usual expedient of weakness. He adopted a middle course; he did John no personal violence, but kept him in prison. He put religion and its strenuous assertor quietly, and, as he might think, quite allowably out of the way, so as neither to be tormented by his officious remonstrances, nor to incur the guilt and odium of avowed and actual hostility to the Word and Prophet of the Lord. Such, in the first instance, was his treatment of the Baptist. Precisely similar was the temper displayed in his treatment of our Lord on two different occasions. (Luke xiii. 31. 32.) It is plain, from our Lord's answer being addressed not to the Pharisees but to Herod, that he suspected that prince to be at the bottom of the message, and the case seems to have been this: The Pharisees, in their usual enmity against Christ, applied to Herod to procure his interference against him. Herod, on the other hand, had scruples. He was willing enough to oblige the Pharisees, to be on good terms with these convenient apologists and absolvers of his worldly frailties. He would gladly have rid himself and them of another troublesome and officious reprover. But then he felt too much about his former violence to the Baptist,—for this was after the Baptist's death, the memory of which crime lay so heavy on his conscience, as to make him dread in the Lord Jesus his murdered friend risen to reproach him. He would not again be so rash. And besides he still feared the people, who honoured Jesus even more than they had honoured John. So once more he was in a dilemma, and once more he tried a middle course, authorising the Pharisees to convey to this new teacher of righteousness an indirect hint, which might have the effect of banishing him from his own territories. This seems to have been his cunning device and stratagem, in allusion to which Jesus calls him "fox." Thus, sinners think slyly to get the better of their God, and, without committing themselves by open hostility, easily to put away his word of warning and reproof. Again, (Luke xxiii. 8.) the Lord Jesus is brought before Herod to be tried. Herod hopes now at last to gratify his vain curiosity, and see some of the miracles of which he had heard so much. He is provoked by the Saviour's silence, and feels it as a reproof of his former crime. The Pharisees loudly and clamorously reiterate their accusations. What now is the judge's course? plainly either to condemn or to acquit the prisoner,—to declare him guilty and worthy of death, or innocent, and therefore free. But mark the weakness of the man. Either of these measures would be too decided for him. He dares not condemn, neither will he at once absolve. So he gratifies the Pharisees, and vents his own impotent resentment, by an act of wanton, and gratuitous, and unjustifiable barbarity; exposes his victim, still uncondemned, to the insults of the soldiery, and then sends him again to Pilate,—losing all the uprightness of the judge in the petty jealous insolence of the tyrant.

Such was the character of this monarch,—with which character it is perfectly consistent that, on the occasion of the demand made for the Baptist's head, he should have been "exceeding sorry." No wonder, indeed, that by such a demand, at such a time, on such a day of festal joy, he should have been shocked, startled, horror-struck. The man whom but lately he had welcomed as his friend, admitted to his family, and entrusted with his confidence; to whom he had pledged his hand in fellowship, and his heart almost in respectful love; from whose lips he had heard words of wisdom and tenderness and kind reproof,—this man of God he was now called upon to sacrifice in the light frivolity of a dance. No wonder he hesitated and scrupled, and was exceeding sorry. But what did his sorrow, however sincere, avail him? did it arrest him in his evil course? did it prevent the crime? He looked about for some way of escape,—fain would he have found some compromise to satisfy his friends and sooth his conscience, and evade the necessity of a definite and decided step. But no ready expedient occurred. Still he hesitated, was exceeding sorry,—but a supposed necessity of compliance prevailed. "For his oath's sake, and for their sakes which sat with him, he would not," he thought he could not "reject her." Observe the force of the strong compulsion which he pleads, and estimate the worth of his sorrow, exceeding sorry as he was.

"For his oath's sake." Like the Jew of the poem he pleads an oath in justification of his cruelty. He has an oath in heaven; would you have him lay perjury on his soul? True he has been entrapped. In his light and playful mood of joy, he promised, he swore, to grant the pleasing dancer's request, expecting probably that he would have to give some costly bauble to gratify her gay and giddy vanity, of which her dancing so publicly, against all custom and the modesty of these days, was a proof and instance. He little dreamed of so bloody a demand upon his faith. Still that faith must be kept,—he has promised, and he must redeem his promise,—he has sworn, and he must perform his vow. Alas, infatuated man!—and is it possible he can really have believed that heaven would register such an oath, or sanction, far less require such a fulfilment of it? Did he not know that it is impossible for man to bind himself to sin, being previously bound by God against it? Herod could not think himself religiously obliged to crime. Rather, now that his eyes were opened, was he not religiously obliged to stop short and retrace his steps? The very sorrow he felt—was it not a proof that it could not be the will of God that he should fulfil his engagement? But it was not God that the prince conceived of as demanding the fulfilment of his vow, but man. He scrupled about breaking his promise to a mere mortal. Alas, his scruple was not about breaking the law of God! He had sworn to the lewd minion and minister of his pleasure, and he could not in honour, in conscience, draw back. The holy man must fall. And was this then the poor punctilio, the paltry scruple to which a saint and servant of the Most High must be sacrificed? He was sorry he had committed himself—deeply and bitterly did he regret his pledge and promise given. O! that he had never seen that day—never sat down at that fatal entertainment—never tasted the intoxicating cup of the syren's flattery and fondness! He had begun in sport, alas! now it was too serious earnest. It was pleasure he sought; he little reckoned on the black and bloody villany that was to follow in her train. Would that he had resisted at first—that he had taken the prophet's advice. But now he is entangled, involved, committed too far—it is too late.—“for his oath's sake.”

“And for their sakes that sat with him.” He had publicly sworn, and would be publicly taunted and upbraided, if he did not perform his oath. All his court would cry shame on him. It would be of no use to explain to them his reasons for hesitating. They could not understand his scruples. They would give him no credit for sincerity. After all he had sacrificed, they could not believe him in earnest in hesitating to sacrifice a little more. For in their esteem, it was no great matter after all that was demanded, only the obscure and worthless life of a troublesome captive! What was this that it should be suffered to disturb the festivity of the scene, or break the good understanding that prevailed? The king had acted royally in the munificent pledge he gave. All the company rung with applause of his princely liberality. And was he now, from pretended delicacy of conscience, to fail in redeeming it? It was too late for him to plead religious reasons,—these had long ago been overborne. If he had acted from such reasons, he never would have gone with them so far, and they could not suppose that these were the reasons which prevented him now from going just a little farther. His refusal, would be placed to the account, not of principle, but of falsehood, of meanness, of cowardice; and he dared not incur such an imputation. He “was exceeding sorry, but for their sakes which sat with him, he would not reject her.”

And these were the arguments which satisfied this man, who had once been almost persuaded to be religious. He consented with reluctance, yet he felt himself compelled to consent. And what compelled him?—a fanciful point of honour—a false feeling of shame—Alas, what a spectacle is here! A man always sinning with regret, yet still always sinning; exceeding sorry to do wrong, yet in spite of his sorrow still always obliged to do it. What a specimen of the deceitfulness of sin! How plausibly it argues, so that the heart of man, aye, even of a seemingly religious man, shall be persuaded to acquiesce in its arguments. How skilfully and cunningly does it contrive to spread the toils and meshes of its net around him, so that he can see no possible way of extricating himself. And the marvel is, it is but a cobweb net after all. A single vigorous effort of honest resolution would burst and break it in ten thousand pieces. But the victim entangled in a weak and half a willing captive. The heart involved in the deceitfulness of sin, is itself deceitful. Still unregenerate, unrenewed, un sanctified, untouched by the mercy, unchanged by the Spirit of God, it has not taken part decidedly with the Lord and his Anointed. Some religion it may have,—a religion of scruples and fears and regrets—but not a religion of faith:—something of sorrow for sin, but not the godly sorrow that worketh repentance. Let none be deceived by such sorrow, or rest contented with such a religion as Herod's—a religion of continual alternation between sin and sorrow. We know not what ultimately became of him. History tells us, that shortly after this period he lost his kingdom, and spent the latter years of his life in disgrace and solitude in the remote province of Spain, and it is possible that the leisure of exile may have been blessed by God to work a salutary effect; and amid the reflections of adversity, the long controversy carried on in his soul, may have terminated in the decided victory of a spiritual faith over sense and sin. But certain it is, his religion, such as it was at this time, could never save him. It was but leading him on to ruin, and that by no showery path, but over thorns and painful briars. O! it is a sorrow most unprofitable that men feel under the influence of mere natural regrets and longings. It is but losing the present world without gaining any thing of the next. It is but inflicting needless pain. Better far get rid of the sorrow altogether and then go on to sin. But as this they cannot do, better still get rid of the sorrow by getting rid of the sin. And how is this to be done? Not by a system of half measures, or any delusive compromise with the enemy—not by a religion of impulse, of alarm, of instinctive sensibility—but “by grace are ye saved through faith,” Let them come over wholly to the Lord's side. All on his part is full and free. There is no hesitation,—there are no half measures with him, but full and free forgiveness, full and free reconciliation, full and free expiation of guilt, full and free outpouring of the sanctifying Spirit. On our part, too, let there be the like fullness and freeness. Let God be all and in all. So shall we be preserved from those fluctuations between God and the world, those vicissitudes of compliance and compunction, which embitter the life, which must torture the death of him who, in the vain attempt to serve two masters, sins and is sorry, is exceeding sorry, and yet goes on to sin.

SACRED POETRY.

A MOUNTAIN HYMN.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER S. PATTERSON.

Lord of the mountain and the plain,
 And all the various scenes of earth,
 Thy glories here around us reign,
 And cast their shadows o'er my hearth.

What though the chariots of the storm
 Are oft across these mountains driven?
 Do they not thy behests perform?
 Bear they not messages from Heaven?

Yes, round me, Father, is thy power,
 Such trust thy Son's compassions bring,
 By pointing to the opening flower
 And the mean sparrow on the wing.

The fly that sparkles and is gone,
 The heath-bell on the mountain-sod,
 The fount for ever springing on,
 That lives, yet breathes not, speaks of God.

Like them I'd live, great Father, free
 From earth's contaminating dust;
 Quiet, yet labouring still for Thee—
 Thy breath my life, thy Word my trust.

And let me, Lord of hill and plain,
 And all the various scenes of earth,
 Around me mark thy glories reign,
 And feel thee guard my mountain-hearth.

ON AUTUMN.

BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM GILLESPIE,
Minister of Kells, Author of "Consolation," &c., &c.

Now thick the fallen leaves are strewed,
 And stain the meadows lively green,
 While sad I roam thro' this lone wood,
 And muse on the departed scene.

In hazel copse, or birchen bower,
 Can scarce the blackbird hide her wing,
 While fall the leaves in eddying shower,
 Like hawthorn's blossoms in the spring.

Thus generations, like the leaves,
 Fall by the chill breath of disease,
 And earth, the common grave, receives
 The sad remains of men and trees.

There all the forms of being meet:
 And when the world is wrapt in snow,
 Say, is not this the winding-sheet,
 That folds the dead that sleep below?

Ye forms of life! returned to earth,
 Soon death dissolves your grosser frame;
 But, boasts the soul a nobler birth,
 And soars to heaven from whence it came.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Who ought to be punished, the Devil or Man?—The late Rev. John Thomas, one of the missionary brethren of Serampore, was one day, after addressing a crowd of the natives on the banks of the Ganges, accosted by a brahmin as follows: "Sir, don't you say that the devil tempts men to sin?" "Yes," answered Mr Thomas. "Then," said the brahmin, "certainly the fault is the devil's; the devil, therefore, and not man, ought to suffer the punishment." While the countenances of many of the natives discovered their approbation of the brahmin's inference, Mr Thomas, observing a boat, with several men on board, descending the river, with that facility of instructive retort for which he was distinguished, replied, "Brahmin, do you see yonder boat?" "Yes." "Suppose I were to send some of my friends to destroy every person on board, and bring me all that is valuable in the boat; who ought to suffer punishment? I for instructing them, or they for doing this wicked act?" "Why," answered the brahmin, with emotion, "you ought all to be put to death together." "Ay, brahmin," replied Mr T. "and if you and the devil sin together, the devil and you will be punished together."

Melancthon's Servant.—Melancthon, the Reformer and the friend of Luther, had a servant of the name of John, who lived with him many years, and is mentioned in history with marked respect. John was a man of tried honesty and fidelity. He adorned his humble station in life, and was very much beloved by his master. It was chiefly owing to John's good management and care, that his master was enabled to shew such unbounded benevolence, with means so small and apparently so insufficient. The whole business of providing for the family was intrusted to John; whose care, industry, and prudence fully justified the confidence which was placed in him. He made the concerns of the family his own, avoiding all needless expenses, and watching over his master's property with a jealous eye. He was also the first instructor of the children in the family during their infancy. John grew old in his master's service; and in the year 1553 died in his house, amidst the affectionate regrets of the whole family, after having lived with his master nearly thirty-four years. Melancthon invited the young men in the college to his funeral, made an address over his grave, and composed an epitaph for his tombstone.

The Discourse of a Poor Hindoo.—I am, by birth, of an insignificant and contemptible caste; so low, that if a brahmin should chance to touch me, he must go and bathe in the Ganges for the purpose of purification; and yet God has been pleased to call me, not merely to the knowledge of the Gospel, but to the high office of teaching it to others. My friends, do you know the reason of God's conduct? It is this: if God had selected one of you learned brahmins, and made you the preacher, when you were successful in making converts, by-standers would have said, it was the amazing learning of the brahmin, and his great weight of character that were the cause; but now, when any one is converted by my instrumentality, no one thinks of ascribing any of the praise to me: and God, as is his due, has all the glory.

The Ruling Passion in Death.—Never has the ruling passion been more strongly exemplified in the hour of death than in the case of Dr Payson. His love for preaching was as invincible as that of the miser for gold, who dies grasping his treasure. He directed a label to be attached to his breast when dead, with the admonition, "Remember the words which I spake unto you while I was yet present with you;" that they might be read by all who came to look at his corpse, and by which he, being dead, still spoke. The same words were, at the request of his people, engraved on the plate of the coffin, and read by thousands on the day of his interment.

ADDRESS TO THE YOUNG.

BY THE REV. W. STEVENSON,

THERE is a solemn warning to you, my young friends, in the fact that no thinking man can reflect on his past life, without feeling that if he had it to spend over again, he would spend it far otherwise than he has done. After reaching the years of manhood, we may indeed look back with satisfaction on the days of our youth, when life itself was a dream full of warm affections and careless merriment,—and when our hearts were so giddy with their own delights, that the days chased one another over our heads without being numbered; still, as the mildest spring has its withering blasts, so childhood itself has always its little sorrows. Nay, some of you know well, that the infant is not unfrequently the nursling of trouble and grief. The bloom of the freshest cheek may be whitened by sickness, and the glee of the gayest heart may be choked by weeping over a parent's ashes. And yet these are not the things on which the full-grown man looks back with most regret. He thinks of the precious days he has wasted, when he might have been learning useful lessons,—of the evil dispositions he has indulged till they have grown into habits of wickedness,—of the bad company he has kept, and the sins generally of which he has been guilty. If years have brought any wisdom with them, the remembrance of these things will fill us with sorrow, at the very time when, taking a fond view of the past, we feel, for a moment, the returning glow of that sprightliness with which we had sported in the sunny days of childhood. And how sad, after we have reached the serious duties of life, or begun, perhaps, to stoop under the burden of grey-headed age, must it be to think that we are unfitted for serving ourselves and others, through the idle neglect of our early years, and that we are shut out from the peace of religion because we had allowed our hearts to grow hard in the practice of evil. Oh, that I could only recal, a man in such circumstances will say, that I could recal the months I have mis-spent,—those months of health and leisure which are now gone for ever. Then how diligent should I be in treasuring up the knowledge that it is now too late to learn,—in guarding against the beginnings of that guilt which is now rooted in my soul, and in calling on God, who may now shut his ear against my cry. Thus, my young friends, have hundreds of old men mourned. Thus, doubtless, are many of those who now look with interest on your condition, sadly repining, and blaming themselves in secret. They can no longer help themselves. Their short remainder of life, indeed, they may improve, but the past is gone for ever, they cannot recover it. Yes, my friends, we who have advanced beyond the morning of our existence, and reached the toils of its busy day, can no longer mingle with you, or share your advantages. If we have mis-spent our youth, we must bear the loss, making up for it as best we may, by redoubling our diligence now. Still much of that precious period remains in your power. Improve it then, while you have the opportunity, and see that you begin to improve it by remembering your Creator, for “the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.”

And, my young friends, you cannot but know that God deserves to be remembered by you with love and gratitude. You know that every thing you have, and every thing you enjoy, has been given you by God. You know it is he who quickens you with life, and blesses you with health, and teaches joy to beat unsought at your hearts; for active as you are, you must sicken and die, unless God were to uphold you. He has given you those minds by which you can gather knowledge, and those opportunities of gathering it with which you are favoured, for he who rears up the lilies of the field, and cares even for the sparrow that chirps on the house-top, has arranged all that concerns you. And you know, too, that it is God who has provided you with fathers to toil for your daily bread, while you cannot earn it for yourselves,—to train you for the active duties of life, and to secure you a Christian education, for the affections that warm a father's heart towards his children have been planted and been nourished there by the goodness of God. He it is, too, who has blessed you with mothers to watch over you with a care that none but a mother can feel, and a love that all your waywardness cannot destroy,—mothers, whose smiles are the reward of your good behavyour when you are well, and who sit by you with sleepless eyes, and smooth your pillows with gentlest hands, in all your little ailments. A mother's love, my young friends, is the love of God himself, breathed into, and flowing through those hearts of devoted tenderness, of which you will dream in your slumbers when your mothers themselves may be far away, or cold in the grave; for among the recollections of a virtuous mind, a mother's memory will always, next to God, have the highest and the holiest place. The value of all these gifts you may not understand fully now, for you are not in the circumstances that most forcibly press their value on the mind. You may pray that your present state of happy thoughtlessness may last for ever,—nay, in your ignorance of the world, you may be looking forward to your release from school as merely the beginning of your freedom and enjoyment. But you must soon discover, by a stern experience, that "man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward." Your youth is only the blossom, whose beauty must wither, making way for the far less showy, but more useful fruit; or it is the school in which you learn how to use your hands, and eyes, and understandings, that they may be serviceable to you in the everyday duties of a rugged world. When you meet these duties, you will discover how much God has given you in giving you health, and intelligence, and education, and parents; and since you cannot but know, will you be so heartless as not to feel, that you are bound to remember and love God for all his goodness?

And if you have much reason to "remember your Creator in the days of your youth," on account of the way in which he provides for your happiness, you have infinitely more when you think of him as a perfectly good and glorious being. He whose armies are angels, and his servants flaming fire,—whose garments are light, and his throne established amid the brightness of heaven, is so gracious that he cares even for the least and the worst of the children of men. Nay, though dwelling amid the songs of holy seraphim, yet he delights in the humble piety of such as you are, for he ordains praise from the mouths of babes and sucklings; and not only so, but he is perfectly good in his whole character, without spot or blemish, holy, just and true, full of loving kindness, and tender mercies. Your affections, my young friends, although subject to the evil bias which we all inherit, are still comparatively sound, they have not been debauched by habitual profligacy, nor checked by that caution which time must soon teach you; and, accordingly, you love all who shew you kindness, with a readiness which you will see reason to correct; surely, then, with hearts thus overflowing in your attachments, you will have some deep and pious remembrances of a Creator who is so worthy of all the love you can possibly bestow on him. In this world, you may be cheated of your affections by objects the most unworthy, but assuredly God will never disappoint you, for his goodness is unchangeable as well as universal.

And you know how in love God sent his Son to teach, and suffer, and die, that he might save men. "God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life." You know, too, that all of us have sinned, and deserve to perish; young as you are, you have done much that is wrong, and are therefore guilty before God; why then, should we not be punished by him, driven away to the darkness and sorrows of an eternal death? This must have been your fate and mine, had it not been that God loved us and gave himself for us,—nay, it must be our fate still, unless we take Christ for our only Saviour, and put our trust in him. But why should we perish, since he is earnestly inviting us to his friendship? he is inviting all, and especially the young: "suffer little children to come unto me," he said, when on the earth, and says so still: "suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of heaven." This is his special call to you, and young as you are, you are old enough to obey it. Samuel became a prophet when he had hardly passed his infancy; Timothy knew the Scriptures from his childhood; and Christ, who inspired their hearts with piety, still loves to watch over you, though you see him not, and is at this day gathering from your ranks, young saints, whose pure and holy minds, and whose clear views of religious truth, set an example to the best and most learned of their instructors. How cold then and senseless must that heart be, which does not remember this God of love, and this affectionate Redeemer, with gratitude and delight!

There are, besides, many other reasons of a totally different kind, which should persuade you to remember your Creator in the days of your youth. Some of these I shall now shortly state. You are well aware, that without piety, which is merely another name for the devout and affectionate remembrance of God, your souls must perish for ever. Unless you learn to love and serve God here, you cannot enter into his presence hereafter. And you have read in your Bibles, that there is a place of fearful darkness, where the devil and his angels dwell—a bottomless pit—a lake of fire—prepared for all who forget God. Those of you who go on thoughtlessly in sin, may indeed hope to pass through a long life of various fortune before you be cut off and turned into hell. But if you live without thinking of God and praying to him, without striving to glorify and serve him, all your happiness must end with your lives, while your misery will then begin, never to have an end. But, on the other hand, if you do remember your Creator devoutly and constantly, you shall, through Christ, be admitted into heaven, there to live with God and blessed angels for ever. And heaven is a place of perfect peace. No sorrow at all is there, neither sickness of body nor anguish of mind. Trouble is shut out with the sin that causes it, and all who enter there, enter to everlasting rest. No sun shall rise and set there, a light and serene day shall shine on perpetually. No death shall waste the inhabitants of heaven, or take friends away from one another. Parents and children, brothers and sisters, who had parted here amid the sorest grief, shall meet again in heaven, to be torn no more asunder. If, then, you would seek this most blessed home, and shun that other place of endless woe, you must do so by striving to remember and love your Creator. You never can love him, or live with him in heaven, unless you begin to do both on the earth.

In this life, too, the advantages that flow from early piety are both many and important. Passing over the circumstance that the youngest of you may soon sleep beneath the waving grass of the church-yard, and therefore need to be prepared, it is clear that youth is, in several views, the most favourable season for the growth of piety. I cannot indeed believe, that even in your minds, there is any native bent to religion. Nay, folly is bound up in the heart of a child, and man's thoughts are evil from youth upwards. But, if in young minds there be no disposition to piety, there are, at least, fewer obstacles to it than in old. You are not yet hardened against all that is good by the force of long habit, nor are your hearts opened to the power of our worst appetites. Ungodliness and vice are not, as with aged sinners, mixed up in all your thoughts, nor are your desires fixed on wealth and honour, with the force that holds the hoary worldling in almost hopeless thralldom. Follies of a lighter kind do occupy your attention; but they want the desperate obstinacy of vices that have been long indulged. Take advantage, therefore, I entreat you, of the softness of your hearts, and seek to have the image of God early stamped on them. Strive to remember him, and to have your feelings melted with love to him, before your thoughtlessness shall have ripened into crime. Every day you live without remembering God, you are straying farther and more hopelessly away from him, and your return to his love and obedience is becoming more difficult and desperate. Knowledge you may gain, but what you gain in knowledge you will lose in sensibility. Your consciences will become seared as with a hot iron. Truths that alarm you now, will cease to affect you. Wedded to sin, you will grow indifferent to all that is good. God may even withdraw his Spirit from struggling against your rooted obstinacy, and leave you to follow the course of your own deluded minds. Thus, through neglect of God in your youth, you may be left a hopeless prey to sin in old age,—to sorrow and despair in the hour of death.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE REV. ROWLAND HILL.

Among the crowds in London that followed Mr Hill in the varied scenes of his pastoral addresses were several persons of fortune, who were willing to consecrate no small portion of their income to the service of their Saviour, and who were naturally desirous to have some commodious and respectable place of worship in which they might enjoy the permanent services of their favourite preacher. This was the origin of Surry Chapel, the first stone of which was laid by its future minister on June 24th 1782, when he addressed the vast assembly who repaired to witness the ceremony from these words:—"Therefore thus saith the Lord God, behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation: he that believeth, shall not make haste." Isaiah xxviii. 16. That chapel, from various circumstances, became a place of very general resort. It has been the scene of many a remarkable event in the religious occurrences of the age, and of very numerous and striking conversions; and many who came from no better motive than to gaze upon the beauty of the building, or to hear the exquisite music, or the original observations of the preacher, were happily, through grace, arrested, and verified the statement of the poet, "that some who came to mock, remained to pray." "Once, however, Mr Hill had a narrow escape from the iniquitous design of some miscreant, who fired at him while in the pulpit, through one of the low windows next Blackfriars' road. The report was heard, and the ball, or other hard substance, passed to the left of the pulpit, through the window near the organ, which it broke. The individual who attempted this diabolical act was never discovered, nor did he repeat it; and whenever Mr Hill mentioned the circumstance, he always expressed his thanks to Providence for delivering him from so great a danger: for had not the substance aimed at him risen in its projection, it passed so directly over him that there is every reason to fear his valuable life would not have been spared."

The Sabbath schools attached to Mr Hill's chapel were among the first institutions of the kind established in this country. He himself took a lively interest in them, as he had a particular turn for addressing the understandings and gaining the affections of children, and many were brought by the instructions they received in these schools, to love and profess the Gospel at a very early age. With those who were thus distinguished, he ever kept up a friendly correspondence; and some of the teachers became afterwards well known to the religious world, as, for instance, Ellis, the missionary in the South Sea Islands. The lively fancy of Mr Hill found congenial exercise in composing little hymns for the children under his pastoral care, and by far the greater portion of these poetical effusions may, in simplicity, pathos, and general execution, bear a favourable comparison with those of Dr Watts.

Mr Hill took a warm interest in the formation of the Missionary Society, and the honour of preaching the sermon, at the first anniversary of that noble association, was conferred on him. His text was, "And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come:"—Matt. xxiv. 14. "There were present about two hundred ministers of various denominations, forming a most impressive and animating spectacle, which has been repeated for many years on the second Wednesday in May, in the same place. The missionary day at Surry Chapel was, to its devoted pastor, in the brightest sense, a gala. On that morning he rose earlier than usual, and before breakfast was seen seated at a table near the window of his room, looking alternately at the people as they gathered in the chapel-yard, hours before the opening of the doors, and at the Bible and Book of Common prayer, to select the lessons for the day, and to refresh his recollection of the service he was about to read. When any one entered the room, he would say, 'see what a churchman I am; I must have it all correct;' then perhaps he would make a few remarks on the first movements of his mind towards the great cause of missionary labours. Presently Mrs Hill came down, when he said to his servant, 'come up to prayer.' The family were soon assembled, and in a short, but sublime supplication, he poured forth the deep feeling of his soul. It was a solemn and affecting moment; few could have heard him unmoved. At breakfast he was interrupted every instant, but not at all annoyed, by the entrance of those connected with the management of the society, or by the introduction of some distinguished foreigner, who desired to witness the routine of the day. Now and then he was called out to prevent the persons in the yard from rushing through the house into the chapel, in their anxiety to gain early admission; and it was only by the strongest remonstrances that many of them were prevailed on to wait for the opening of the doors. As soon as the hour of service arrived, he went to the vestry; presently there was a general movement in the chapel, and all eyes were fixed on his venerable figure as he slowly ascended the steps of the desk. No reader ever gave a more solemn effect to the liturgy of the Church of England; his deep feeling, brought out by the scene and the occasion, his powerful and melodious voice, and his thorough conception of the beauty and spirituality of the form of prayer he loved, combined to give a pathos and dignity to his performance of this part of the service, which has never been surpassed by any minister. After the prayers, the missionary hymn was given out by one of the phalanx of ministers who occupied the front of the galleries, and sung by the immense congregation, all standing. The full tones of the fine organ, the combination, in a simple melody, of three thousand voices, and the recollection of the object of their meeting, inspired an emotion which thrilled through every Christian's breast. After the sermon, Mr Rowland Hill held a plate at one of the doors, and the people seemed to strive for the honour of putting their donations into his hands. If the collection went on well, his countenance beamed with delight, and he hastened at its conclusion up the steps to his own house, to reckon its amount, surrounded by those whom he had invited to dine with him in the school-room. The sum gathered was seldom found deficient. Once, in times of difficulty, it was less than usual by nearly a hundred pounds. His depression was evident to all near him; but in the evening, as he sat silent and in low spirits at the falling off, a gentle tap was heard at the door, a letter was brought in, and carelessly opened, with the remark, 'a begging letter, I dare say.' It contained a draft for one hundred pounds, from a generous individual, who had observed the effect of the diminution in the collection on his mind, and who expressed his anxiety for the honour of Surry Chapel, and the comfort of its then aged pastor. His eye brightened, and he exclaimed, 'The Lord hath not forsaken us, we shall now do better than ever; we should never doubt.'

It was shortly after this, in the year 1798, that Mr Hill paid his first visit to Scotland, which produced so great a sensation. He had come on the invitation of a few zealous individuals, who engaged the Circus at Edinburgh for a chapel to him for a year; and the time of service was fixed at 7 o'clock in the morning, and 6 o'clock in the evening, in order not to interfere with the view of those who wished to continue attending their own places of worship. "The singularity of the stranger's manner, the fervour of his address, and the brilliant powers of his active and energetic mind, soon drew vast multitudes around him. The Circus, large as it was, could not contain half the numbers who flocked to hear him; and they cried out that the galleries were giving way under the pressure of the crowd. He accordingly went forth to the Calton Hill, where he preached from a platform to a mass of people, amounting to at least ten thousand in number. The spot was well adapted to such a purpose; the platform was placed in the centre of a sort of natural basin, and the green slopes which surrounded it were covered with innumerable immortal beings, silent as the breathless evening of autumn, fixed in deep attention to the words that issued from the sonorous and commanding voice of the speaker, as he delivered, in all the majesty and dignity of his office, his message of mercy to the lost and ruined sinner. The retiring of the multitude under the most solemn impressions was, indeed, a touching sight; every person seemed deep in thought, and numbers were, for the first time, absorbed in the concerns of their souls and of eternity. The old women, as they looked out of their doors at the slowly passing stream of human beings, observing a party of soldiers among them, exclaimed, 'Eh, Sirs, what will become of us now! what will this turn to! the very sodgers are ganging to hear preaching.' It was always a principle with Mr Rowland Hill to expect great things from his labours: 'While we are straitened,' he says, 'in our expectations, the blessing is withheld; but when our hearts are enlarged, the more we ask, the more we have.'

The indefatigable exertions he made in this tour through Scotland, of which his appearance in Edinburgh was, as it were, but the commencement, may be judged of, by a short account of it preserved in his journal. "I have now finished a nine weeks' Gospel tour of full 1200 miles; have preached in much weakness to many thousands; and have been more or less engaged on different calls, near eighty times, with no other calamity than a little indisposition for a few days, and the temporary lameness of the same horse which conveyed me through all my journey, excepting the short respite he required till he could overtake me on the road; without also the least personal insult from any quarter, excepting a small share of a distant hiss of false aspersions, and I trust unjust reflection. For them I only quote that fine expression in our church liturgy, 'pardon our persecutors and slanderers, and turn their hearts.'"

Many readers of this memoir, who have heard any thing of Mr Rowland Hill, may have heard of him as an eccentric minister, whose preaching was made up of anecdotes, and a combination of circumstances and images calculated to strike and amuse the fancy. There can be no doubt that there was some foundation for this description of him, for he had so lively and active a mind, and so strong a sense of the ludicrous, that things which might have passed unnoticed by any ordinary person, made an impression on him sufficient instantaneously to interrupt, or to give a new direction to the train of his ideas; and besides, his habit of preaching the unpremeditated effusions of the moment, threw him upon his resources, and forced him often to take the most obvious and homely illustrations that suggested themselves, and that were sometimes not altogether suited to the dignity and decorum of the pulpit. But his mind was so deeply pervaded with a sense of the solemnity due to the worship of God, and of the importance of the message he bore to perishing sinners, that if, even for a moment, he produced any light emotions in the breasts of his audience, he was sure to follow it up the next with a most rousing appeal to the conscience; and he sometimes rose on such occasions to a pitch of awful sublimity, that overwhelmed his hearers with astonishment and terror. His style of preaching was altogether peculiar; possessed of a warm heart and fertile imagination, he laid hold of every image and illustration that occurred to him at the moment, and he formed such striking pictures with them, that one of the greatest masters of pulpit oratory, Robert Hall, said of him "no man has ever drawn, since the days of our Saviour, such sublime images from nature: here Mr Hill excels every other man."

In the summer of 1824, it was proposed to Mr Hill once more to visit Scotland, and though he was then in the 80th year of his age, such was the buoyancy of his spirits, that he readily and joyfully accepted the invitation. Having embarked on board a steam-packet, he set sail, and reached Leith in two days and a-half. During the voyage, he was solicited by two Scotch members of parliament to preach to the passengers; and having assented, he chose the Sermon on the Mount for his subject, and commented on it in an easy and impressive manner for nearly three-quarters of an hour, standing all the time without much fatigue. On his arrival, he preached on the only Sabbath he spent in Edinburgh, both in the morning and the evening, to vast crowds who repaired full of anxiety to hear so celebrated a character, and next day attended for a short time, a meeting of the Missionary Society in the Assembly Rooms. Those who saw him on that occasion, as the writer of this had the happiness of doing, will not soon forget his venerable appearance,—the Christian dignity and simplicity of his manner, and the devoted earnestness with which he entered into the sacred cause and object of the meeting.

After his return to London, Mr Hill continued for several years, in the midst of increasing infirmities, to preside over the service in his chapel. For a considerable time, however, before his death, he engaged in almost every public duty with an impression that it would probably be his last; and he frequently shewed by many involuntary tokens, of which, perhaps, he was himself unconscious, that he was keeping himself in habitual preparation to meet his God. One very affecting instance is thus related by Mr Clayton: "The last time he occupied my pulpit at Walworth, when he preached excellently for an hour, on behalf of a charitable institution (it was in the winter twelvemonth before his death,) he retired to the vestry after service under feelings of great and manifest exhaustion. There he remained till every individual, save the pew-openers, his servant, and myself, had left the place. At length, he seemed with some reluctance to have summoned energy enough to take his departure, intimating that it was, in all probability, the last time he should preach in Walworth. His servant went before to open the carriage door—the pew-openers remained in the vestry. I offered my arm, which he declined, and then followed him as he passed down the aisle of the chapel. The lights were nearly extinguished, the silence was profound; nothing, indeed, was heard but the slow majestic tread of his own footsteps, when, in an under tone, he thus soliloquized,

"And when I'm to die,
Receive me, I'll cry,
For Jesus hath loved me, I cannot tell why;
But this I can find,
We two are so join'd,
That he'll not be in glory and leave me behind."

To my heart this was a scene of unequalled solemnity, nor can I ever recur to it without a revival of that hallowed, sacred, shuddering sympathy which it originally awakened." This description is not overwrought; no man could witness Mr Hill's manner, when he contemplated his departure, without an impression, which probably will never be obliterated from his memory.

We must hasten, however, to contemplate the closing scene of Mr Hill's life, and of him it may be truly said, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." The hope which he had cherished through life, supported and enlivened the hour of his departure, for he knew in whom he had believed, and he felt persuaded that He was able to keep what he had committed to Him, against that day. It is most interesting and edifying to listen to the dying sayings of an aged and experienced Christian, and to receive, in circumstances which give assurance of its truth and fidelity, his testimony to the divine character and power of the Gospel. "Reviewing his past doctrines," Mr Hill said, "were I to live my life over again, I would preach just the same;" looking upwards to eternal glory, he cast himself into the dust, and only said "I shall creep into heaven through some crevice in the door." To a reverend friend who was standing at his bed-side, he said, "You have often seen me ill, and I recovered; but this is an irrecoverable complaint, I shall not get over it; it is a solemn thing to die. I have no rapturous joys, but I have a peace, a good hope through grace, all through grace." Another friend who was in the room observed, "You would not give up the hope you have, Sir, for all the world." "No," said he, "not for ten thousand worlds. Christ is every thing to a dying man; but I want to be perfectly holy, perfectly like my dear Lord; without holiness there is no such thing as getting to heaven." About twenty-five minutes before six on Thursday evening, April 11, 1833, he breathed his last, and without a struggle or a groan, so easily and gently, that he might be said to "fall asleep."

Mr Hill was too busily and constantly employed in preaching to have any leisure to dedicate to literary pursuits. The only compositions given by him to the world, were "The Warning to Professors," "Village Dialogues," "Hymns and Tokens for Children," "Aphorisms on the Stage," and one or two sermons preached on special occasions. It is not on literature, therefore, that his fame rests. He has a more imperishable glory, and though there is nothing on earth to perpetuate the memory of this faithful and laborious servant of Christ, save the monumental tablet in his chapel; yet his record is on high. "He has rested from his labours, and his works have followed him."

THE TESTIMONY OF INFIDELS TO THE VALUE OF CHRISTIANITY.

It is a circumstance well worthy of remark, that the importance of scriptural truth has often been admitted by those who have been usually ranked, and have even boasted of ranking themselves, among the opponents of our holy faith. A collection of the recorded opinions of such individuals has been industriously made by the Rev. Mr Whyte, of Fettercairn, in a very sensible and judicious work on the Duty of Prayer:—

"Lord Bolingbroke allowed that 'the religion and law of nature shew us the Supreme Being, manifested in all his works, to be the true and only object of our adoration; and that it teaches us, no doubt, to address ourselves to the Almighty in a manner consistent with an entire resignation to his will;' and Gibbon called the Gospel a 'sublime theory,' and a 'model of pure and perfect simplicity;' which, of course, implies a spirit of prayer; for otherwise it could not be 'sublime and perfect.'

"Lord Chesterfield, after long experience of the heartless and miserable nature of dissipated and ungodly habits, made the following remarkable confession, which evidently implies a conviction, that if he had devoted his life to God instead of the world, the result would have been very different from what it was: 'I have run the silly round of business and pleasure, and have done with them all. I have enjoyed all the pleasures of the world, and consequently know their futility, and do not regret their loss. I appraise them at their real value, which in truth is very low, whereas those who have not experienced always over-rate them. They only see their gay outside, and are dazzled with their glare. But I have been behind the scenes; I have seen all the coarse pulleys and dirty ropes which exhibit and move the gaudy machine; I have seen and smelt the tallow candles which illuminate the whole decoration, to the astonishment and admiration of an ignorant multitude. When I reflect upon what I have seen, and what I have heard, and what I have done, I can hardly persuade myself that all that frivolous hurry and bustle, and pleasure of the world, had any reality; but I look upon all that has passed as one of those romantic dreams which opium commonly occasions; and I do, by no means, desire to repeat the nauseous doze for the sake of the fugitive dream.' Solomon declaring all to be vanity of vanities, Manasseh returning from his sins to God, Nebuchadnezzar honouring the King of Heaven, Dioclesian laying aside royal cares and retiring to the peace of private life, and Charles the Fifth exchanging the pomp and power of empire for the obscurity and humility of a cell, are all instances of feeling and conduct, more or less resembling those of his lordship when he thus acknowledged the unsatisfying nature of worldly things, and shewed that he felt the need of those supplies that are given only to devotion. In all these cases, not excepting even the heathen Dioclesian himself, who had so long laboured to keep up the falling shrines of paganism, and utterly destroy the Christian name in every part of the Roman empire, there were manifestations of the working of that part of our nature which cannot be satisfied with any worldly attainments, and which seeks its happiness in the higher enjoyments of moral and religious views.

"Voltaire had been accustomed for years to call the adorable Saviour 'the wretch,' and to vow that he would crush him. He closed many of his letters to his infidel friends with those words: 'Crush the wretch.' From a man who manifested so bitter a spirit, and had done so much against religion, one could have hardly expected any admission in its favour. Yet, when writing to a nobleman who seemed to pay much deference to his opinion, he made use of these words: 'My dear Marquis, there is nothing good in atheism. This system is very bad, both in physics and morals. Will men be more virtuous for not acknowledging a God, who enjoins the practice of virtue? Assuredly not. I would have princes and their ministers to acknowledge a God; nay more, a God who punishes and who pardons.' Again, 'wherever society is established, there it is necessary to have religion; for religion, which watches over the crimes that are secret, is, in fact, the only law which a man carries about with him,—the only one which places the punishment at the side 'of the guilt, and which operates as forcibly in solitude and darkness, as in the broad and open face of day.'" Would the reader have thought it? These are the words of Voltaire. Even Robespierre himself, whose reign of blood and terror may be considered as an exhibition of all the wildness of infidelity in its most unrestrained state, 'felt that irreligion is the soul of anarchy, and was desirous to establish the worship of the Supreme Being.'

"Notwithstanding the dissipated life, and the immoral tendency of many parts of the writings of the late Lord Byron, which led many honest-minded persons to count him an infidel, his friend, Count Gamba, maintained that he was no stranger to devotional sentiments. 'I had occasion,' said he, 'to observe him often, in those situations in which the most sincere sentiments of the mind are unfolded, in serious danger of the stormy sea, or otherwise; and I have observed his emotions and his thoughts to be deeply tintured with religion.' And his lordship himself, when conversing with another person on this subject, said, 'prayer does not consist in the act of kneeling, nor in repeating certain words in a solemn manner. But devotion is the affection of the heart, and this I feel; for when I view the wonders of creation, I bow to the Majesty of heaven; and when I feel the enjoyments of life, health, and happiness, I feel grateful to God, for having bestowed them upon me.' Farther, in his lordship's reply to a letter addressed to him by one who felt an interest in his welfare, he made use of these expressions:—'Indisputably, the firm believers in the Gospel have a great advantage over all others, for this simple reason, that if true, they will have their reward hereafter, and if there be no hereafter, they can be but with the infidel in his eternal sleep, having had the assistance of an exalted hope through life, without subsequent disappointment, since, (at the worst for them,) out of nothing, nothing can arise, not even sorrow.' The Earl of Rochester admitted, that 'the whole system of religion, if believed, was a more secure foundation of happiness than any other;' and declared, that 'he would give all he was master of to be under persuasions of its truth, and to have the comfort and support which necessarily flow from them:' and well he might say so, from the bitter feelings which his irreligious conduct often occasioned, as the following anecdote will shew:—'At an atheistical meeting, in the house of a person of quality, where he undertook to manage the cause of infidelity, and was the principal disputant against God and religion, he maintained the contest with such ingenuity and success, that his performance received the applause of the whole company. But this awful exhibition of irreverence and impiety, he could not contemplate without some feeling of remorse. The strange inconsistency of his conduct, struck his mind so forcibly, that he immediately made use of these words, 'Strange! that a man who walks upright, and sees the wonderful works of God, and has the use of his senses and his reason, should use them to the defying of his Creator!' Many such occasions of reprehension and remorse occurred, during his career of unbridled licentiousness. He had often moments full of terrors, and sad intervals of melancholy reflections, in which he felt, in all its bitterness, the deep anguish that springs from a wounded heart.'

"Count Struensee had, for a long time, similar compunctions of mind when running his profligate career, as appears from the account which he gave of himself to Dr Munter; and when better feelings began to take possession of his soul, he said, 'there is but one thing in this world that makes me really and continually uneasy, which is, that I have seduced others to irreligion and wickedness. It is my most fervent wish, nay, my own happiness depends on it, that God would shew mercy to all those I have, by any means, turned from him, and call them back to religion and virtue. I pray for this to God most fervently.' 'I formerly thought, that whoever embraced Christianity was to renounce all reason. But now I see plainly, that nothing stands more to reason than it does.'

"The confession of Cardinal Wolsey, when very nearly in a similar situation, is well known to every reader of English history. He said, a little before he expired, 'had I served God as diligently as I have served the king, he would not have given me over in my grey hairs. But this is the just reward that I must receive for my indulgent pains and study, not regarding my service to God, but only to my prince.'

"Imminent danger, or the appearance of the near approach of death, also, very often calls forth nature from its hiding-place, even in the most hardened unbelievers, who have long borne down its efforts to maintain the cause of God, and obliged it, for a time, to lie by in secrecy and silence.

"'The apprehensions of death will soon bring the most profligate,' said the Duke of Buckingham, 'to a proper use of their understanding. I am haunted by remorse, despised by my acquaintance, and, I fear, forsaken by my God. How despicable is that man who never prays to God but in the time of his distress.' Of this, Voltaire and Paine were very remarkable instances. As to Voltaire, 'dangerous sickness and approaching death, though they could not soften the hard heart of the hypocritical infidel into real penitence, filled him with agony, remorse, and despair.' Those about him, 'could bear him, the prey of anguish and dread, alternately sup, lying or blaspheming that God whom he had conspired against; and in plaintive accents would he cry out, "O Christ! O Jesus Christ!" and then complain that he had been abandoned by God and man. As to Paine, we have it on the evidence of Dr Manley, a respectable physician, who attended him in his last illness, 'that there was something very remarkable in his conduct for about two weeks before his death. He would call out, during his paroxysms of distress, without intermission, "O Lord help me! God help me! Jesus Christ help me! O Lord help me!" repeating the same expressions, without the least variation, in a tone that would alarm the whole house. How apparent is it from this, that the mind of Paine was convinced of the truth of that religion which he had ridiculed, and whose author he had blasphemed!'

"It has been said, that 'he who cannot pray should go to sea,' where the dangers of the deep would alarm his fears, and teach Him to call on him who rides upon the waves, and rules the tempest at will. 'A storm will teach the profanest mariner to pray, and that with continuance and fervency.' When the tempest came down upon the ship which was carrying the prophet Jonah to Tarshish, 'the mariners were afraid, and cried every man unto his god.' Colonel Gardiner, before his conversion, and when his mind was in its most hardened state, was overtaken by a violent storm, on his passage in a packet-boat between England and France. Being 'tossed several hours in a dark night on the coast of Holland, he was brought into such extremity, that the captain of the vessel urged him to go to prayers immediately, if ever he intended to do it at all; for he concluded they would, in a few minutes, be at the bottom of the sea. In this circumstance he did pray, and that very fervently too; and it was very remarkable, that, while he was crying to God for deliverance, the wind fell, and quickly after, they arrived at Calais.'

"When traversing one of the North American lakes in a vessel which had been much damaged by a storm, and was every moment in danger of sinking, Volney, the infidel, shewed how little his philosophy could do when nature wanted help from God. There were many females, as well as male passengers on board; but no one exhibited so strong marks of fearful despair as Volney. In the agony of his mind, he threw himself on the deck, exclaiming, with uplifted hands and streaming eyes, 'O my God, my God, what shall I do? what shall I do?' And yet, in the true spirit of all such, he afterwards said, 'that these words escaped from him in the instant of alarm, but had no meaning.'

"Something similar to this is said to have taken place some years ago, in a vessel which was conveying Lord Byron, and, along with him, Shelly, the poet, and others, from one part of the Mediterranean to another. The noble bard's friend was an ostentatious professor of irreligious opinions. But when a tempest arose, and all on board were in danger of perishing among the waves, his boastful spirit, for a time, entirely forsook him, and he cast himself down on the cabin floor, where he lay in a dreadful state of mental suffering, cringing himself, and calling on God for mercy, though, at other times, he pretended to own no God but nature. The meanness of the whole of this exhibition of inconsistency, made some, who beheld it, look upon him with pity, and others with contempt.

"An exhibition of the same kind was once witnessed by a friend of the writer of these pages, on his passage by sea from London to Leith. A loquacious advocate of infidelity was on board. A violent tempest arose, and did so much damage to the ship, that it was with the utmost difficulty it could be kept from sinking. Hope began to forsake the most fearless; but none seemed so much distressed as the poor infidel. His loquacity ceased, and he sunk into a state of despair. At intervals, however, he gave utterance to many incoherent speeches, confessions, and resolutions of a change of life. The scene was so novel, that the sailors, though impressed with a sense of the common danger, could not refrain from rushing to that part of the ship where he lay prostrate, and in a state of raving remorse, to behold the wonderful sight of an infidel on board, whom they viewed in the light of an exhibition of some wild beast from a foreign country. When the weather became more moderate, they were enabled to bring the ship into an English port, on a Sabbath morning. Some of the passengers went ashore to attend public worship. The infidel, forgetting his professions of repentance, went in search of a gaming-house and a billiard-table.

"There are, no doubt, many other persons still alive, who have witnessed instances of humbled and trembling impiety, similar to some of those now described. They have beheld the profane and godless, in times of real danger, laying aside their boastful manner, and labouring under all the agonies of conscious guilt and terror, and have heard them calling for pardon and help, on the very Being whom, at other times, they held in derision; and whose existence they even pretended, on many occasions, to deny."

TO A LADY IN DISTRESS OF MIND.

LETTER III.

DEAR MADAM,—In a former letter, I endeavoured to explain to you the scriptural view of man's natural condition by the fall, and the means by which his restoration to God's favour and the blessings of eternal life has been accomplished. What I have now to do, is to point out to you the manner in which this redemption is applied to individuals.

You are aware, that of the human race, there are many to whom the privileges and hopes of the Gospel are offered in vain, and hence arises a question as to the means by which we may individually become partakers of them. Now the chief of these means are faith and repentance. These, too, as well as every other step in the progress of our salvation, are the free and unmerited gifts of God; but as I am unwilling to perplex your mind with the questions which restless, and perhaps rash enquirers, have in their ignorance started on this subject, I shall confine myself to that practical view of it which presents it to our mind as a great work, that, in one sense, we have ourselves to accomplish. I must not, however, neglect to premise, what we cannot, for a moment, with safety lose sight of, the important truth that, "it is not in man who walketh to direct his steps;" that redemption is not our own acquirement, but is applied to our souls by the operation of the Holy Spirit, for whose aid we are bound constantly to ask, and indeed, that we are encouraged, and urged to "work out our own salvation," for this very reason, that "it is God who worketh in us, both to will and to do of his own good pleasure."

First of all, we must believe. "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," is the language of the Gospel. But what is this faith? for all who acknowledge the truth of Christianity assert that they believe, yet how many of these are far from the kingdom of heaven? I answer, that it is such a belief in the testimony of God respecting Christ, as influences the desires and affections of the heart. Every motive which directs the conduct, implies a faith of a similar kind. If I am a miser, it is because I have a faith in the efficacy of riches, which, laying hold of my affections and desires, and receiving its direction from them, induces me to choose wealth as my chief good; if I am a man of pleasure, it is because I have a faith in the value of voluptuous gratification, which, gaining possession of my heart, at once controls and receives its impulse from my affections and desires; if again, I am a man of benevolence, it is because I have a faith in the superior worth and advantage of a regard to the good of my fellow-creatures, which at once corresponding with my natural affections and desires, and influencing them, overpowers other motives, and leads me in that direction. In the same manner, if I am a man of piety, it is because I have a faith in the unspeakable and paramount importance of religion, which operates on my affections and desires.

Belief or faith, then, you see, lies at the foundation of all our actions, for it would be folly to say, that a man can be guided by that in which he does not believe. But then, there are many things, in the truth of which we believe, that have little or no effect on our conduct; for the object of our belief must appear to us to be in some way or other of superior value,—must, in short, be capable of strongly exciting and influencing the feelings of our hearts, before it can become a paramount rule of life.

This may serve to give you a simple and popular view of Christian faith as opposed to its counterfeit. These professors believe, perhaps, in the loose sense of that word; that is, they do not question the truth of the Sacred Record; but then they do not realise to their minds the infinite value of that truth to them as individuals; they have given their hearts and affections to some other study or pursuit, and have turned away from the consideration of religion with a disgust which is unhappily natural to the unrenewed mind. Hence David prays that God would “create” in him a clean heart, and “renew” within him a right spirit. We naturally love and desire the things which are seen and temporal; the very circumstance of their nearness to us increases their magnitude in our eyes; they are the objects of our senses, and are continually presenting themselves to our view; they draw our affections towards them far more powerfully than those things which are unseen and distant, though of infinitely greater importance. Burke somewhere eloquently illustrates this fatal propensity of our nature, by remarking, that the little insect which passes near our eye may be mistaken for the eagle soaring on the lofty mountain; and a similar illustration might be taken from the properties of the magnet, which is more powerfully attracted by a steel needle when brought near it, than by that mighty and mysterious influence which, acting more distantly, would otherwise cause it to point towards the pole.

You see, then, my dear madam, where your duty lies in this matter. You must learn to correct your vision, that you may be able clearly to distinguish between the insect at hand and the eagle at a distance. You must remove the little needle of steel, that the loadstone of your heart may yield to those secret influences which will draw it to the pole-star in the heavens.

This leads me to speak of repentance, as the inseparable companion, or rather as the fruit of faith. If our belief be of the right kind, that is, if it duly influence our heart and affections, it will certainly lead us to consider how far our lives are conformable to our Christian profession. But we cannot do this without perceiving our natural love of what religion teaches us to hate, and our natural hatred of what religion teaches us to love. The more we look into our own hearts and examine our own conduct, the more forcibly will we be struck with the corruption of our natures, and with the unworthiness of our characters, especially when we consider what the perfection is after which we are bound to aspire. When we look from ourselves to God, and discover the nature of divine justice and holiness, and the amazing price which these attributes rendered necessary for the redemption of our souls, our sins appear in a still more aggravated and alarming view as offences against a Creator of infinite perfection, which could only be expiated by a divine being assuming the human nature, and bearing the punishment that sinful man had incurred. Hence, we acquire a true sense of sin, on the one hand, and of the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, on the other; and this leads us to abhor all manner of iniquity, and to love our God and Saviour; while these sentiments, if duly cherished, will induce us to turn to the service of God, to delight in all that he has commanded,—this is repentance.

I do not know if you are acquainted with the Shorter Catechism of our Church; if not, I would earnestly recommend you to study it, as it contains a short, but extremely well digested, summary of the principles of our most holy faith; so short, however, as to require some attention to understand its principles, being not only entirely elementary and without illustration, but somewhat formal and scholastic in its instructions, a mere synopsis or text-book, which your own reading and reflection would be requisite to fill up.

I am not sure that this very short and necessarily defective statement is such as you wished me to give, but if there be anything else you would have me to explain, you have only to mention it. I have been somewhat more technical than I should have been, had you not requested me to give you a general outline of the Christian faith, which seemed to make a systematic view necessary, and yet I have endeavoured to avoid some of the deeper and more difficult questions, as matters which I think you would do well rather to avoid, in the present state of your mind, lest they should entangle and perplex you.

I could not, conscientiously, advise you to abstain, even for the present, from reflecting seriously and earnestly on the things which concern your everlasting peace, even although I am aware that your mind just now requires not to be too strongly exercised, or too deeply engrossed. I believe, indeed, that on a well-regulated course of religious study your ultimate comfort mainly depends. But prudence is requisite in this as well as in matters of worldly interest. As you acquire more mental strength, the precaution which renders proper the limitation of your spiritual studies, will become less necessary, but, at present, I think it would be desirable to act more, and read and reflect less, than you seem inclined to do. Watch, however, the progress of your mind, in its gradual restoration to its proper tone, and pray for those aids of the Holy Spirit, without which all human efforts are vain, that you may not relapse into carelessness or security, but may go on from one degree of Christian grace unto another, till you be prepared for the society of the just made perfect.

You mention your having gone to the Lord's table lately with Mr and Mrs —, and seem to have some doubt whether or not your joining in that solemn communion was proper in the present state of your feelings. I can have no hesitation in saying, that, judging by the account you give of the impressions under which you were led to obey your Saviour's dying injunction, you acted rightly. The Lord's table is intended to give strength to the weak, to afford comfort to the afflicted, and to restore peace to the wounded and bleeding conscience. Christ came not to bring the righteous, those who think themselves righteous, but sinners, those who feel that they are sinners, to repentance, and his ordinances, especially the most solemn and endearing of all ordinances, were instituted for confirming penitent feelings, and for filling with holy resolutions and pious enjoyment the hearts of those who are ready to faint. I am, &c.

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT SIMPSON,

"And let us not be weary in well-doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."—GAL. vi. 9.

THAT there is a law in our members warring against the law of our mind, is a declaration of Scripture which universal experience amply confirms. This discordant state of things is daily exhibited in a thousand different ways. In the unrenewed heart its prevalence is evident and habitual. And even where the grace of God has operated a change in the spiritual condition, a bias towards evil is clearly perceptible. After the innate principle of corruption, which we all inherit, has lost the power of prompting us to the allowed commission of sin, it may continue more or less to impede our progress in the attainment of holiness, and to impart a disrelish for whatever is opposite to its own unholy character. Nay, after we may have wholly ceased to find pleasure in doing evil, and have in some degree learned to do well, it will often manifest its remaining influence over the soul, by inducing irksomeness and lassitude in the performance of Christian duties. And this seems to be that peculiar manifestation of our natural depravity, against which the apostle warns and guards us in the words of the text.

In the following discourse, we shall, first, consider the import of the exhortation here given, in its most practical bearings; and, secondly, state and illustrate the encouraging motive by which it is enforced.

1. We may be said to weary in well-doing when we become impatient of the restraints of Religion. Christianity, rightly understood, has no tendency to narrow the sphere of rational enjoyment. It debars us from the participation of no pleasures but such as are inconsistent with enlightened views of social and individual happiness in the present life. It owes its origin to the same benign and gracious Being that framed the universe, and constituted the laws which regulate all the departments of nature and providence. And his only object in the precepts of his Word, as well as in the moral government of the world, must be the welfare of his creatures, in subserviency to the advancement of his own glory. Fallen man, however, understands not, or undervalues his own true interest, and is ever prone to resist every exercise of restraining authority which would interfere with his mistaken views.

In the affairs of this life, the young and inexperienced are generally short-sighted and misjudging. They would frequently expose themselves to serious difficulties, were it not for the watchful care of those who have acquired a more extensive acquaintance with the world, and who, from a sense of duty and motives of kindness, undertake the direction of their conduct. In the ardour of youth, they take but a partial view even of existing circumstances. Future consequences they are very apt to leave entirely out of sight. And their extreme avidity to obtain the immediate gratification of their wishes, hurries them into daily mistakes and dangers. In order, therefore, to prevent them from rushing on their own destruction, and to secure, as far as possible, their safety and well-being, it is necessary to impose restraints upon their waywardness and folly. These they often bear with impatience, and they can seldom be brought to see either the necessity or expediency of using any such precautions. They consider it a hard bondage to be thus controlled, though for their own advantage. They long for emancipation from every check on their heedless career, and sometimes regard, as their worst enemies, those who most faithfully withstand them in their sinful and pernicious courses.

In all this we have but a just representation of our natural feelings and conduct, in reference to our heavenly Father, and of the treatment he employs towards human perverseness. If children, through ignorance or thoughtlessness, act in opposition to their remote temporal interests; men, through wilful blindness of mind, and inexcusable levity of heart, act still more culpably in opposition to their spiritual and eternal welfare. If children are liable to become impatient of the salutary controul exercised over them by parents and guardians; men, and that more absurdly, too often become weary of the restraints which our all-wise and beneficent Maker has seen fit to prescribe in his Word, for the regulation of our lives. In short, in the preference we generally give to things seen, over things unseen, and to present enjoyments, over future promised felicity, we are all but children. The objects of time and sense occupy our thoughts, and engage our affections, while the infinitely important concerns of our immortal spirits obtain only a slight and transient regard. All our efforts to rise superior to the allurements of sinful indulgence, are resisted by that low and grovelling disposition within us, which would bind our souls down to earth, and limit our prospects to a merely temporal existence.

The requirements of that law which is holy, just, and good, are hard sayings to the natural man. No principle but that of divine grace can carry us through the arduous struggle of surmounting the opposition of our corrupt hearts. In order to counteract the influence of the carnal mind, we must strive unweariedly to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts,—we must labour strenuously to eradicate from our bosoms every evil propensity, though dear to us as a right eye,—we must resolve firmly to abandon every forbidden pursuit, though profitable to us as a right hand. And under a deep sense of our own insufficiency for these things, we must fervently pray for the assistance of the Holy Spirit to help our infirmities, and strengthen us with all might in the inner man.

2. We may be said to be weary of well-doing when we become remiss in the active duties of Religion. Self-denial in refraining from evil, is an important step in the acquisition of Christian virtue. But we must not sit down contented with this solitary attainment. We are exhorted to go on from grace to grace. It would not be enough to yield even a perfect compliance, were that in our power, with the divine prohibitions; we must also obey the positive injunctions of God's Word. And in our endeavours to fulfil this part of our Christian obligation, we have again to encounter the same reluctance and opposition from our infirm and apostate nature.

Christ declared, in a comparative sense, that "his yoke is easy and his burden light." Yet the disciple of Jesus has much to accomplish, if he would approve himself a zealous, and diligent, and faithful servant of his God and Saviour. In the performance of the duties he owes directly to his Maker, he has to maintain a constant struggle with the natural indisposition of his own heart to the cultivation of piety. We are commanded to pray. But how often do we find ourselves unfit for holding devout communion with the Father of our Spirits. Not unfrequently our minds are listless, our attention is distracted, our own thoughts wander, when we attempt to engage in this exercise. We either experience disturbance from without, or we feel discomposure within. Yet notwithstanding all these discouragements, we must still persevere in our devotions: we "ought always to pray and not to faint." We are enjoined to "search the Scriptures," and to meditate upon them. But when we peruse the sacred oracles, it is not at all times with equal understanding or pleasure. We may formally study the pages of the Bible, and derive little or no benefit from the consolations and instructions they contain. In consequence of a careless or undevout frame of mind, the blessed volume of inspiration may be to us a sealed book, both as to light and comfort, and therefore be disrelished as insipid and uninteresting. Still we must not lay it aside; it must continue to form the subject of our serious and prayerful meditation. Public worship is an ordinance of divine appointment. We are required to join with the people of God in the services of the sanctuary. But a regular attendance in the House of Prayer may be given, while our acts of worship there are neither acceptable to the Most High, nor profitable to our souls. Nay, the Sabbath, from the decline of a devotional spirit on our part, may become to us a wearisomeness instead of being our delight. Yet must we not, for such reasons, forsake the assembling of ourselves together, or neglect any of the means of grace, but persist stedfastly in the use of them, and pray more earnestly for a blessing upon them.

Again, in the faithful discharge of our Christian duty towards our brethren of mankind, we frequently meet with severe trials of temper, much provocation, and many instances of ingratitude, which the natural heart fails not to plead as valid excuses for its own selfish reluctance. The superiors with whom we stand connected may be proud and overbearing, harsh and oppressive. We must not, however, return sullenness for their austerity, nor forget the duties of our place. We must be obedient to them in every thing lawful, not only to avert the effects of their displeasure, but also for conscience sake. We must be submissive, as long as the relation subsists, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward and unkind. The equals by whom we are more immediately surrounded, may be troublesome, or disobliging, or unfriendly. Still our obligations, in reference to them, remain substantially the same. Whatever intercourse takes place between them and us must be regulated, as far as we are concerned, by the principles of the Gospel. We must not render evil for evil, but shew forbearance and long-suffering. We must not resent acts of unkindness, but do good unto all as we have opportunity. We must not cherish enmity, even against those who may have manifested a hostile spirit towards us, but endeavour to live peaceably, if possible, with every fellow-creature. Inferiors and dependants about us may be discontented or ungrateful; yet we must not allow ourselves to be easily provoked by their mistakes or faults, we must not hastily cast them off from our favour, or withdraw from them our assistance and protection. Either discontent or ingratitude in them is sinful, and should doubtless be discouraged; but if properly considered, these offences, on their part, against all right feeling, not to say religion, only enhance our condescension and sympathy; because it thus becomes more evident that we are actuated by truly Christian motives, in commiserating their necessities, or promoting their good.

3. We may be said to be weary in well-doing, when we begin to repine under the afflictive dispensations of Providence.

The season of adversity is a trying season. None can know the temptations incident to it, but those who have felt its pressure. In the full enjoyment of health and outward prosperity, we are prone to forget God; in the time of sickness or external calamity, we are in danger of forming improper ideas of his nature, and taking erroneous views of his dealings with us. When visited with misfortune, or laid upon a bed of languishing, the privation of pleasure and the pain of suffering are generally more the subjects of our thought than the important purposes for which these trials are sent upon us. We are therefore very apt to regard, in an unfavourable light, the righteous administration of the Sovereign Disposer of all things. And we are thus led, either in hardness of heart to despise the chastening of the Lord, or in despondency of spirit to faint when we are rebuked of him. We fret under the continuance of affliction, when we should seek to profit from its softening influence. We are more desirous to procure its removal than to experience its beneficial effects. We are ready to deem it rather an expression of the divine anger, than a pledge of our Maker's regard. "Yet whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." Even when juster sentiments are entertained respecting God's design in afflicting men—when bodily distress is not considered as a great and unmitigated evil, meant only as a punishment, we sometimes become impatient under it, on the plausible ground, that by its enfeebling influence we are rendered unfit for honouring our Creator and Redeemer in the ordinary duties of piety and benevolence. This, however, is to mistake the essential nature of that service which God requires at our hand. He is glorified by our suffering his will, as well as by our doing it; and to murmur at any form of affliction, is as displeasing in his sight as to omit a deed of beneficence or an act of devotion. In such cases, resignation is the duty we owe; submission is the homage we have to pay. In patience, therefore, let us possess our souls. Let us seek to "be followers of them who, through faith and patience, are now inheriting the promises."

We proceed now, as was proposed, in the second place, to state and illustrate the encouraging motive by which the exhortation in the text is enforced: "In due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

The reward here promised to a patient continuance in well-doing, is in part conferred in this life. When, by the grace of God, our corrupt nature has been renewed, and its evil propensities brought into habitual subjection to the obedience of the Gospel, we shall no longer feel any of the divine commandments to be grievous. When our hearts have been truly purified from the love of sin through the operation of the Holy Spirit, we shall no more deem the restraints of the divine law a burdensome yoke. Our happy experience will then be, that the ways of heavenly wisdom are indeed ways of pleasantness and peace. If we have really been created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works, we shall be daily growing in conformity to him who accounted it as his meat and drink to do the will of him that sent him, and who went about doing good. Instead of regarding the duties of piety as an irksome task, which from habit or situation we dare not omit, yet have no pleasure in performing, we shall consider the time we spend in religious exercises the happiest portion of our life—we shall consider prayer a high privilege, the Scriptures an invaluable treasure, public worship one of the most delightful and exalted employments in which rational creatures can engage below, and the Christian Sabbath a foretaste of heaven. Instead of regarding the duties which we owe to our fellow-men as an oppression or vexatious burden which the religion we profess and the laws of society unite in imposing, and which we cannot without shame entirely throw off, however disagreeable, we shall esteem the power of promoting the temporal and spiritual welfare of others a precious and important talent, the neglect of which no provocation, or ingratitude, or enmity can justify, and the right application of which, will prove a source of the purest satisfaction. Again, if sickness and adversity be sanctified unto us, they, too, will lead to the most desirable results. "For tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope; and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us."

But though Christians may be thus far privileged to participate here in the reward of well-doing, the full fruition of the promised recompense is kept in store for a future and more exalted state of existence. Our present capacities of enjoyment are too limited for its reception. The present world, with all its various and almost infinite sources of pleasure, could not furnish the means of happiness so pure, so complete and sublime, as that which awaits on high the children of God—the disciples of his Son. It will be large as our amplest wishes, and lasting as our immortal spirit. Its greatness exceeds the power of human language to express, and of human understanding to comprehend. Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the transcendent glories of the saints in light. The loftiest and brightest images of earthly splendour are employed to describe their beatitude, and fall immeasurably short of the reality. They shall sit on thrones; they shall reign as kings. Their felicity will be unmingled, uninterrupted, endless. Christ, their Saviour, shall feed them with the celestial manna, and lead them to living fountains of holy delight; "and God himself shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

When, however, it is affirmed that we shall reap eternal glory and happiness if we continue steadfast in the profession and practice of godliness, we must not, for a moment, suppose that the heavenly inheritance can be procured as the purchase of our deserts, or that it will ever be conferred on us as a recompense due to our merits. We deserve nothing good at the hand of our righteous and justly offended Maker. His unmerited benignity is the source of all the blessings we now possess, or hope to enjoy. When we have done our utmost, we are but unprofitable servants. "It is of God's mercy that we are not consumed." Eternal life, then, must be the reward of grace and not of debt; "it is the gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord." Even the progress we have made in the attainment of Christian virtue is not the result of our own unaided efforts. Whatever victory we have obtained over our spiritual enemies, — whatever advancement we have made in the path of holiness, and in preparation for heaven, the praise is due, not to us, but to the divine assistance. "By the grace of God we are what we are." All boasting, therefore, is excluded. But this doctrine of human insufficiency in nowise destroys the necessity of human endeavours. We are commanded to work out our salvation with fear and trembling; while, at the same time, we are reminded that it is God "who worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure." The belief that the Almighty achieves for us what we cannot achieve for ourselves, implies no disparagement of our weak powers. And the assurance that He co-operates with us in all the good we accomplish, affords the highest encouragement to our feeble exertions.

The language of the text expressly corroborates these statements. The figure made use of is borrowed from the gathering in of the crop in harvest, in connexion with the previous agricultural labours. The husbandman first diligently prepares his field, and commits the seed to the ground with care; he then anxiously watches the progress of the plant, and spares no pains to promote its growth. When it has reached maturity, he joyfully reaps the fruits of his toil and unremitting attention. But is the husbandman, therefore, the sole author of that plentiful increase which rewards his industry? Was his skill the only agency? Was his arm the only instrument necessary to the production of that abundance which repays his diligence? Had the rain that watered the soil, and the sun that warmed the atmosphere, no influence? Had the blessing of heaven no share in the springing of the seed and the ripening of the full ear? Who gave fertility to the ground? Who supplied health, and sustenance, and vigour, during the process of cultivation, to the laborious peasant and his patient cattle? Who, but GOD? And God, who constituted the material system of the universe, has also appointed the means of grace and the way of salvation. Faith in the divine pledge, differently expressed indeed, is exercised by the husbandman, as well as by the Christian. The former cultivates his fields in a full reliance upon the established order of the seasons, and the constancy of nature's laws and operations. The latter commences and pursues his course in a firm belief in the doctrines of Revelation, especially the gracious discoveries of the Gospel. The one labours in the management of his crop, as if success depended wholly upon his own efforts, though perfectly aware every day that it lies beyond his power. The other labours in his spiritual vocation, as if diligence could ensure his object, though deeply sensible that his own endeavours must all prove unavailing without higher aid.

The husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and the latter rain. And why should the Christian weary or faint? The prize he has in view is far nobler,—the certainty of his obtaining it is infinitely greater; temporary clouds may darken his sky, momentary storms may alarm his fears, occasional misgivings may obscure his prospects, but the promise of God stands unshaken and sure. The divine covenant cannot be broken. "Wherefore, let us be steadfast and unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as we know that our labour shall not be in vain in the Lord."

THE VAUDOIS PASTOR; A SKETCH.

A PECULIAR interest attaches to the Waldenses, or Vaudois Protestants, from the tenacity with which they have adhered to the pure doctrines of the Gospel, amid the surrounding darkness and superstition. Situated in the valleys of the Cottian Alps, shut out from almost all intercourse with the other churches of the Reformation, and doomed frequently to suffer persecution the most severe, they are not ashamed to avow, and unflinchingly to maintain, the genuine Scriptural tenets handed down to them by their forefathers. Few in number, poor in outward circumstances, simple in manners, and comparatively unenlightened, so far as concerns mere worldly knowledge, they have drunk deep of that infinitely higher knowledge, which "maketh wise unto salvation." From the researches of Dr Gilly among this simple-hearted Christian people, we cannot fail to entertain the highest admiration of their character. The very scenery amid which they dwelt, beautiful and romantic though it is, seems invested with a kind of rural grandeur, derived from the scattered huts of the Waldensian Christians.

The subject of the following Sketch, RODOLPHE PEYRANI, was a pastor in the Alpine regions, inhabited by the poor Vaudois or Waldenses. The village of Pomaretto, where he resided, was situated in the valley of Perosa, "built upon a declivity, just where the mountains begin to increase in height and number, with rocks above, and torrents below." The scenery around it is wild and romantic in the extreme, but the village itself is far from being inviting in its appearance. "The street," says Dr Gilly, in his account of his visit to the place, "which we slowly ascended, was narrow and dirty, the houses, or rather cabins, small and inconvenient, and poverty, in the strictest sense of the word, stared us in the face at every step we took. In vain did we cast our eyes about, in search of some better looking corner, in which we might descry a habitation fit for the reception of the supreme pastor of the Churches of the Waldenses. The street was every where no better than a confined lane." Such was the miserable condition of the village in which was situated the residence of Rodolphe Peyrani, the Moderator of the Vaudois. His personal appearance cannot be better described than in the graphic language of the narrator himself.

"We were received at the door by a mild, sensible, and modest-looking young man, dressed in faded black, to whom we communicated our wish of being introduced to M. Peyrani. He replied, that his father was very unwell, but would be happy to see any English gentlemen, who did him the honour of a visit. We were afraid that we might disturb the invalid, and therefore hesitated to intrude, until we had begged M. Vertu to see M. Peyrani first, and ascertain whether the sight of strangers would be agreeable. The answer was in our favour, and we were now conducted up a narrow stair-case, through a very small bed-room, whose size was still further contracted by several book-cases. This led into another bed-room, more amply provided still with shelves and books. The apartment was about fourteen feet square, low, and without any kind of decoration of paint or paper hanging. At a small fire, where the fuel was supplied in too scanty a portion to impart warmth to the room, and by the side of a table covered with books, parchments, and manuscripts, sat a slender, feeble-looking old man, whose whole frame was bowed down by infirmity. A nightcap was on his head, and at first sight we supposed he had a long white beard hanging down upon his neck; but, upon his rising to welcome us, we perceived that it was no beard, but whiskers of a length which are not often seen, and which had a very singular effect. His dress consisted of a shabby, time-worn, black suit, and white worsted stockings, so darned and patched, that it is difficult to say, whether any portion of the original hose remained. Over his shoulder was thrown what once had been a cloak, but now a shred only, and more like the remains of a horse-cloth, than part of a clerical dress. This cloak, in the animation of his discourse, frequently fell from his shoulders, and was replaced by his son with a degree of filial tenderness and attention extremely prepossessing.

"The sickly-looking sufferer, in this humble costume, in this garb of indigence, was the Moderator of the Vaudois; the successor of a line of prelates, whom tradition would extend to the Apostles themselves; the high-priest of a church, which is, beyond all shadow of doubt, the parent church of every Protestant community in Europe, and which centuries of persecution have not been able to destroy. It is indeed a vine, 'which has stretched her branches to the sea, and her boughs unto the river;' but while her branches are flourishing, 'the wild bear out of the wood doth root up the stem, and the wild beasts of the field devour it.' And unless the same Providence which first planted this vine, and made room for it, shall turn again, and look down from heaven, and visit it, it must, it is feared, perish; for nothing short of the divine succours can enable men to bear up against the poverty, humiliation, and deprivations to which most of the Vaudois clergy are exposed to this hour."

This worthy messenger of Christ, thus doomed to sickness and poverty, was, at the time when Dr Gilly visited him, upwards of seventy-one years of age. So limited was his income, that it did not exceed £40 a-year. Yet, with this paltry pittance, he was obliged to meet the demands of a family, the calls of charity, the expenses incidental to his situation, as Moderator, and the additional wants of sickness, age and infirmity. In circumstances such as these, the calm contentment, and cheerful resignation of Peyrani, were remarkably conspicuous. He was evidently a man of a superior mind, and his heart was deeply imbued with the spirit of his Master. The character of the man is thus finely described:—

"The welcome which we received from our venerable host, was expressed with all the warmth and sincerity of one, whose kindly feelings had not yet been chilled by years or sufferings; and the manner in which it was delivered, displayed a knowledge of the world, and a fine tact of good breeding, which are not looked for in Alpine solitudes, or in the dusty study of a recluse. We were predisposed to respect his virtues and piety, and had been given to understand that he was a man of the first literary acquirements; but we did not expect to find the tone and manners of one, whose brows would do honour to the mitre of any diocese in Europe. There was nothing of querulousness in any of his observations, nor did he once express himself with the least degree of bitterness upon the subject of his own grievances, or those of his community. That which we gathered from him upon these topics, was related more in the form of historical detail, than as matters which so materially concerned himself and connections.

"Our conversation was held generally in French; sometimes we addressed him in English, which he understood, but did not speak; but when I engrossed his discourse to myself, we spoke in Latin, as being the language in which we could not mistake each other, and affording the most certain medium of communication upon ecclesiastical subjects, where I was anxious to ascertain facts with precision. Nothing could be more choice or classical than his selection of words; and I was not more surprised by his fluency of diction, than by the extraordinary felicity with which he applied whole sentences from ancient poets, and even prose authors, to convey his sentiments.

"M. Peyrani spoke with so much rapidity, and his thoughts followed each other in such quick succession, that he never suffered himself to be at a loss for words. If the Latin term did not immediately occur to him, he made no pause, but instantly supplied its place by a French or Italian phrase. This animation of manner had such an effect upon his whole frame, that very soon after we began to converse with him, the wrinkles seemed to fall from his brow, a hectic colour succeeded to the pallidness of his countenance, and the feeble and stooping figure, which first stood before us, elevated itself by degrees, and acquired new strength and energy. In fact, while he was favouring me with a short history of himself, I might have forgotten that he had exceeded the usual limits of man's short span; and I must repeat, that it is impossible to admire sufficiently the Christian character of the individual, or of the church which he represented, when I recollect the meek resignation with which he submitted to his hard fate, and the forbearance he exhibited, whenever his remarks led him to talk of the vexatious and oppressive proceedings, which have never ceased to mark the line of conduct pursued by the Sardinian government, in regard to the churches of the Waldenses."

The poverty of the Moderator of the Vaudois must have been sometimes deeply distressing; as a proof of which, we may quote the following passage from Dr Gilly.

"M. Peyrani's book-shelves were loaded with more than they could well bear; and when I noticed the number of the volumes which lay scattered about the room, or were disposed in order, wherever a place could be found for them, he told me, that if he were now in possession of all that once were his, the whole of his own, and the adjoining house, would be insufficient to contain them. He said he had bought a great many himself; but the principal portion of his library was the accumulation of his father and grandfather, and of more distant ancestors; and expressed much regret that he could no longer display the folios, and curious old manuscripts that had been handed down to him. I asked what had become of them. 'They have been sold,' he replied, with considerable emotion; for he had been compelled to part with them from time to time to purchase clothes, and even food, for himself and family!"

There is something deeply affecting in this last anecdote. It represents the worthy pastor in a state of the most distressing penury, and destitute even of the common necessaries of life. But his Christian patience and resignation remained entire. He had laid up his treasure in heaven, and his heart was already there. It is scarcely surprising, that from the poor but pious Peyrani, Dr Gilly should have parted with sincere reluctance.

"It was with extreme regret we witnessed the approach of the hour which told us we must take leave of the venerable Peyrani. The good-humour, cheerfulness, and resignation of the old man, his perfect recollection of events and conversations which took place years ago, his profound erudition and general information, lent a deep and peculiar interest to his discourse. My young companions were rivetted with attention. He appeared to them like a being of a different order to what they had been used to see; all that they heard and saw had more the air of romance than reality. The little window of the room opened upon the wild mountain scenery of Pomaretto; the roar of the distant torrents was heard through the casement; and the impression left by the whole scene was so much the greater, from the contrast between the elevated character of the noble old man, and the circumstances in which he was placed. Poverty within, and desolation without, formed a dark and striking back-ground to the portrait of the philosophic minister, whose lips teemed with eloquence, and whose mind was stored with all the riches of the most intellectual society. The looks of my friends, as they wandered from the window to the Moderator, sufficiently told me what was passing within their breasts; and they did not escape the notice of M. Vertu, who watched with an enquiring eye, to observe what impression the aged Moderator of his church would make upon the strangers. Holding him in the utmost reverence himself, he was all anxiety that we should do the same; and could not disguise his feelings of delight at every mark of respect which we paid to the sacred representative of this primitive Christian community.

"Before we parted, I looked several times earnestly round the room, that I might carry away with me every possible recollection of the chamber in which Rodolphe Peyrani was likely to finish his days. The ordinary and antique furniture, and the prints which hung upon the walls, were all objects of interest; and some of them illustrated the character of the man. In the centre, and directly over the fire-place, was the Moderator's diploma, presented to him by the Royal Academy of Turin. On one side of the diploma was George the Fourth, taken when he was Prince of Wales; on the other, the King of Sardinia; for no sufferings or injustice done to him could efface the loyal principles of M. Peyrani. Several Kings of Prussia, Isaac Newton, Luther, and Calvin, occupied another place; and the Duke of Wellington, and Lord William Bentinck, were in a very conspicuous situation. The good man pointed to the latter, and spoke of him with much gratitude. 'If any thing could have been done for the Vaudois, Lord William would have effected it,' he said; 'but the restored king was deaf even to his intercessions.'

"As M. Peyrani followed us feebly down stairs, he shewed us the door of an apartment which had never been opened, he told us, since the day on which his brother had been carried out of it, to be consigned to the grave. I asked what brother, and the answer was a momentary shock. It was Ferdinand Peyrani, the pastor of Pranol. It was like hearing the knell of a dear friend. Ferdinand Peyrani was the first person who interested me in the history of the Vaudois. It was his letter, addressed to the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, which directed my attention to them, and occasioned this excursion to their Alpine retreats. He was one of the pastors to whom I felt so anxious to be introduced, and this was the first news of his being no more. His death was hastened by the scurvy, a disorder increased by poverty and want.

"At the door of his humble presbytery the aged Moderator wrung our hands, and said farewell with every symptom of regret at parting. He stood at the threshold, watching our departing steps, and the last sight that I had of his long grey locks, floating in the wind, left an impression that will not soon be removed. I am sure nobody could take leave, as we did, of M. Peyrani, with the certainty of seeing him no more, without being sensibly affected. His son accompanied us to the edge of the torrent, and there we said adieu to him."

In the course of three months after the period to which this account of Rodolphe Peyrani refers, he was numbered with the dead. Severe and protracted had been his sufferings and privations. These, however, at length came to a close, and he entered into rest; and his was, no doubt, the exalted privilege of learning, that "if we suffer with Christ, we shall also reign with him."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

By the Law is the Knowledge of Sin.—It is a great mistake to suppose that the law is not to be preached to Christians. "If any man speak, ought he not to speak as the oracles of God?" But these oracles insist on the special and grand design of the law. They tell us, it was given to make sin abound, and appear exceedingly sinful—to shut up all, as prisoners under sin, and thus render the news of salvation by the Lord, transporting to our hearts. The oracles of God do peremptorily assert that the Holy Ghost, the giver of life, health, and comfort to the soul, is received, "not by the works of the law," (the doctrine of acceptance with God by personal obedience,) but "by the hearing of faith," of salvation through faith. They pronounce those to be in the way to perdition, who seek righteousness by the works of the law, even though they have a zeal for God. They divide mankind, not only into moral and immoral, religious and profane, as philosophers and Pharisees are wont to do, but into two classes unknown to either of them—those who are of the works of the law, and therefore cursed, and those who are of faith, and therefore blessed with faithful Abraham. When the law is not thus explained, nor its province and end pointed out, it is impossible that men can obtain Scriptural ideas of the evil of sin, or the nature of pure obedience to God, or of the necessity of redemption through Christ. But let the nature, use, and design of the law be opened and understood, it will soon prove itself an engine of divine appointment and admirable efficacy. By laying judgment to the line and righteousness to the plummet, it sweeps away the refuge of lies, under which sinners of every sort take shelter. It brings all who hear what the law saith, into a salutary despair of ever escaping the wrath to come by personal obedience, and so makes the horn of salvation always appear the same necessary defence and glorious blessing which the Scripture affirms he actually is. Every Christian, before he had access into that grace wherein he now stands, was, with the great Apostle, "slain by the commandment," or he would not have fled to Christ for refuge; through the law he became dead to the law, and is the very person who proves to demonstration both the necessity and the success of its being applied to the conscience.—VENN.

A Christian's view of the World.—That lofty soul that bears about with it the living apprehension of its being made for an everlasting state, so earnestly intends it, that it shall ever be a descent and vouchsafement with it, if it allow itself to notice what busy mortals are doing in their (as they reckon them) grand negotiations here below. He hath still the image before his eye of this world vanishing and passing away; of the other, with the everlasting affairs and concerns of it, even now ready to take place and fill up all the stage: and can represent to himself the vision of the world dissolving, thrones tumbling, monarchies and kingdoms breaking up, crowns and sceptres lying as neglected things. He hath a telescope through which he can behold the glorious appearance of the supreme Judge; the solemn state of his majestic person; the splendid pomp of his magnificent and vastly numerous retinue; the obsequious throng of glorious celestial creatures doing homage to their Eternal King; the swift flight of his royal guards, sent forth into the four winds to gather the elect, and covering the face of the heavens with their spreading wings; the universal silent attention of all, to that loud-sounding trumpet that shakes the pillars of the world, pierces the inward caverns of the earth, and resounds from every part of the encircling heavens; the many myriads of joyful expectants arising, changing, putting on glory, taking wing and tending upwards, to join themselves to the triumphant heavenly host; the judgment set, the books opened; the frightful, amazed looks of surprised wretches; the equal administration of the final judgment; the adjudication of all to their eternal states; the heavens rolled up as a scroll; the earth, and all things therein consumed and burnt up. And now, what spirit is there any more left in him towards the trivial affairs of a vanishing world? How indifferent a thing is it with him, who bears himself highest in a state of things whereof he foresees the certain hastening end! How serene is he in this, that infinite wisdom governs the world! How calm is he in the midst of external troubles! How placid and serene a spirit inhabits his peaceful breast!—HOWE.

The discovery of unsuspected sin, one of the results of sanctified affliction.—How much unmortified corruption, unhumiliated pride,—unsubdued opposition to the divine will, when directly thwarting our own;—how much secret cleaving, with idolatrous attachment, to some beloved earthly object, often lurks within our soul, unconsciously to ourselves, of whose very existence, the awakening influence of affliction first makes us aware. This it effects, by stirring up the hidden mass of pollution that lies concealed in the deep recesses of our hearts, which before appeared so calm and clear, that heaven itself seemed reflected in its bosom; like the pool, that, while undisturbed, appears perfectly pure and pellucid, but as soon as it is stirred, all the muddy sediment which had settled to the bottom, immediately rises to the surface, and what before looked so transparent, is now all dark and defiled, the reflection of heaven entirely obliterated, or sadly marred, and clouded, and confused. Now, this hidden mass of corruption, which thus lay concealed from our view, in the depths of our deceitful hearts, was not concealed from the piercing eye of the heart-searching God, “with whom we have to do.” He saw it in its hiding-place, and, in mercy to our souls, resolved to discover it to our view; and, therefore, sent down the angel of affliction to stir the pool; because he knew that the troubling of the waters would be attended with such salutary influences, such healing virtue to our soul.—WHITE.

Christian Gravity.—It is our duty never so far to engage ourselves in the way of wit, as thereby to lose or impair that habitual seriousness, modesty and sobriety of mind, that shady composedness, gravity and constancy of demeanour, which become Christians. We should continually keep our minds intent upon our high calling and grand interests, ever well-timed and ready for the performance of holy devotions and the practice of most serious duties, with earnest attention and fervent affection; whereupon we should never suffer them to be dissolved into levity, or disordered into a wanton frame, indisposing us for religious thoughts and actions. We ought always, in our behaviour, to maintain not only a fitting decency, but also a stately gravity, a kind of venerable majesty suitable to that high rank which we bear of God's friends and children; adorning our holy profession, and guiding us from all impressions of sinful vanity. Gravity and modesty are the fences of piety, which being once slighted, sin will easily attempt and encroach upon us.—BARROW.

Christian Comfort.—Let the course of your tribulation be what it will, “in me ye shall have peace.” How is it, then, perhaps you will ask, that Christians are not always rejoicing? How is it that we so often see them bathed in tears, and scarcely hear any thing from them but sighs and complaints? It is easily enough to be accounted for. It is because they love the world, and the things of the world so much, that they have no room nor relish for divine consolations. To be sure, where Christ is there is always ground of comfort; but Christians are not always fit to be comforted. They may, through mere inattention, or a too fond attention to temporal possession, and enjoyments, be so sadly declined as to require reproof rather than comfort, and what they want Christ gives.—LAINGTON.

The Reward in Heaven.—The earlier the new birth, the weightier will be the glory in the kingdom of God. Young ones regenerated and enabled to bear head against the temptations of their violent nature, shall have crowns set with more jewels,—they shall have an abundant entrance. The more violent the storms they encounter, the greater will be their glory. If there be any sorrow in heaven, it is because they were not sooner new born, that they might have glorified God more on earth, who bestoweth such honour upon them in heaven.—CHARNOCK.

Obligation to Preach to the Heathen.—Our speculations regarding the final destiny of the heathen ought never to influence our conduct towards them, in any way tending to render us less zealous for their salvation. Were we even sure that they would occupy thrones in heaven, or pass, by an imperceptible transition, from a state of consciousness into the calmest sleep of oblivion, it would be just as much our duty to labour for their conversion as of those who see in every pagan the subject of an inevitable condemnation. The recognition of the moral righteousness of God, exalted, as it is, by the atonement of the cross, by a Christian catechumen in a pagan country, one prayer of faith offered to the Supreme Being, through the merits of Christ, by such an individual, is of infinitely more value than all our theories as to the final destiny of those who live and die in involuntary ignorance; as practical charity transcends subtle and ingenious speculation.—STEELE.

Diligence.—Diligence is a duty that makes rich; therefore, be much about this duty. Take Solomon's verdict of it: “The soul of the diligent shall be made fat.” Would you know why the Christians of this time are so much put to it, to cry, “Their leanness, their leanness?” Would you know why the Christians are so much in sighing and going backward, and counting that their life is spent here in vain, they are not ascending like “pillars of smoke?” Even this, they are not diligent. O Christians! When was it that you rose up in the “silent watches of the night” to pursue after an absent Jesus? It is this that would make you rich: diligence would make a Christian rich in experience; diligence would make a Christian rich in love; diligence would make a Christian rich in humility; yea, it would make a Christian rich in all the spiritual things in heaven. I may compare diligence to Joseph. It is “fruitful by a well, whose branches hang over the wall.” Nay, if you were diligent, I know not what you might not win.—GRAY.

SACRED POETRY.

A SABBATH SCHOOL HYMN.

BY THE REV. DUNCAN GRANT, A. M.

WHERE human reason, poor and blind,
No guiding star to bless can find,
But wanders on in sadness;
The child who loves the word of God,
Shall see a light upon his road,
Which guides in peace, to the abode
Of boundless love and gladness.

All human wisdom shall decay,
All knowledge soon shall pass away,
All learning's light shall vanish;
But every child by God made wise,
Shall to salvation's transports rise,
And dwell where joy, that never dies,
All shades of grief shall banish.

And sure that child is wise indeed,
Who in the morning loves to feed
On Truth, the heavenly manna:
Thus nourished, he shall onward go,
Whilst streams of gladness round him flow,
Till glory's crown shall deck his brow,
'Mong angels' loud Hosannah!

But, child, remember, 'tis thro' faith
In Him who conquer'd sin and death,
That thou canst reach salvation:
'Twas unbelief that made the Jews
Their own Messiah to refuse,
And all the mercies to abuse
Bestowed upon their nation.

In ev'ry nation, age, and clime,
Has ev'ry form of guilt and crime
From this dark source been dawning:
The Holy Scriptures plainly tell,
That unbelievers all shall dwell,
Imprison'd in the gloomy cell,
Where grief is ever growing.

Then, child, be wise, and let the page
Inspir'd by God thy mind engage,
In life's gay golden morning;
Its hallow'd light shall cheer thy way,
When comes affliction's wintry day,
And on the cloud show hope's bright ray
Its fringe with gold adorning.

Yes, child, it will thy spirit cheer,
When ev'ning's shadows dark appear
Upon the mountains hoary:
'Twill shed around thee rich perfume,
When hast'ning to the lonesome tomb,
And give thro' nature's heavy gloom,
A glimpse of coming glory.

The Scriptures search; and pray that He,
Who only makes the blind to see,
May thee by grace enlighten;
Pray, child, that God may light bestow,
That thou in holiness may'st grow,
And onward still to Zion go,
And for salvation brighten.

Much Labour but no Profit.—Walking in the country, (says Mr Jay, of Bath,) I went into a barn, where I found a thrasher at his work. I addressed him in the words of Solomon—"My friend, in all labour there is profit." Leaning upon his flail, and with much energy, he answered: "No, Sir; that is the truth, but there is one exception to it: I have long laboured in the service of sin; but I got no profit by my labour." "Then you know somewhat of the apostle's meaning, when he asked; 'what fruit had ye then in those things, whereof ye are now ashamed.'" "Thank God," said he, "I do; and also know, that now being freed from sin, and having become a servant unto righteousness, I have my fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life."

Prayer the Best Defence.—Upon one occasion of great difficulty, Melancthon and Luther had met together to consult about the best means to be adopted. After having spent some time in prayer, Melancthon was suddenly called out of the room, from which he retired under great distress of mind. During his absence, he saw some of the elders of the reformed church, with their parishioners and families. Several children were also brought hanging at the breast; while others a little older were engaged in prayer. This reminded him of that passage, "out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength, because of thine enemies, that thou mightest still the enemy and avenger." Encouraged by this pleasing scene, he returned to his friends with a mind set at liberty, and a cheerful countenance. Luther, astonished at this sudden change, said, "what now! what has happened to you, Philip, that you are become so cheerful?"—"O Sirs," replied Melancthon, "let us not be discouraged, for I have seen our noble protectors, and such as, I will venture to say, will prove invincible against every foe!"—"And pray," returned Luther, filled with surprise and pleasure, "who, and where are these powerful heroes?"—"Oh!" said Melancthon, "they are the wives of our parishioners, and their little children, whose prayers I have just witnessed—prayers which I am sure our God will hear: for as our heavenly Father, and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, has never despised nor rejected our supplications, we have reason to trust that he will not in the present alarming danger."

Nominal Christians in America.—Mr Brainerd informs us, that when among the American Indians, at one place, where there was a great number, he halted, and offered to instruct them in the truth of Christianity. "Why," said one of them, "should you desire the Indians to become Christians, seeing the Christians are so much worse than the Indians? The Christians lie, steal, and drink, worse than the Indians. They first taught the Indians to be drunk. They steal to so great a degree, that their rulers are obliged to hang them for it; and even that is not enough to deter others from the practice. But none of the Indians were ever hanged for stealing; and yet they do not steal half so much. We will not consent, therefore, to become Christians, lest we should be as bad as they. We will live as our fathers lived, and go where our fathers are when we die." Notwithstanding Mr B. did all he could to explain to them that these were not Christians in heart, and that he did not want them to become such as these, he could not prevail, but left them, mortified at the thought, that the wickedness of some who are called Christians, should produce such prejudices.

ON THE WISDOM NECESSARY FOR REGULATING THE INTERCOURSE OF CHRISTIANS WITH MEN OF THE WORLD.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

THE world abounds with a great variety of characters, diversified to an almost infinite degree by every shade of distinction; but all who are properly what is called men of the world, have this in common, that their feelings are engaged in the pursuits, and their anxieties set upon the cares, and their conduct either insensibly or purposely moulded by the principles most known and approved of in it. The world is the god of their idolatry, the power by which the strongest propensities of their nature are held captive, and their favour and approbation will, of course, be lavished on those who bear a resemblance to themselves, and give them the sanction of their countenance by worshipping at the same shrine, and cherishing the same devotedness. On all who move within that magic circle, and are associated with any of its several companies, their approving smile is ever readily bestowed; but to all who are beyond it, they are the sworn and inveterate enemies. And as all who are animated by the spirit, and walk up to the requirements of genuine Christianity, rank with the latter, they are of necessity made the objects of all the bitter feelings with which worldly men regard their character and their principles. Between these two classes of men, there is no common ground on which neutrality can be observed. There is a secret want of congeniality between them both in sentiment and feeling,—and devoted as they are to the service of masters of so different characters, and labouring as they are in the attainment of ends so opposite, they must, every time that they are brought into contact, and their respective principles are developed, experience a mutual shock, as great and as deeply felt as results from the collision of contending elements. The comfort and the peace of both, then, would evidently be best promoted by persons who have so little that is common, and so much that is opposite, making their intercourse as rare as possible, or rather suspending it altogether. But constituted as society now is, such a separation is plainly impossible. Christians, however much they may dislike the characters and disapprove the ways of worldly men, cannot altogether avoid mingling with them; for "then must they needs go out of the world;" and their intercourse with them is often rendered the more necessary and the more unavoidable from the nature of their particular circumstances. They may be men of business, and in going through its ordinary routine, and attending to its various details, they may ever and anon be thrown into scenes of unmingled worldliness, and obliged to negotiate with those who, in respect to all the pursuits of the world, are "wholly given to idolatry,"—or they may be men of public character, occupying high and responsible stations, and, in the performance of their official duties, may be called—at one time to settle the contending claims of those who practise the decent and respectable virtues of the world—at another time, become familiarized with the sickening detail of the vices and the crimes of the more degraded and profligate portion of it; or they may be members of a numerous and extensive society of friends, and in the very circle of those whom nature teaches them to love and to reverence, they may find some whom the world acknowledges among its warmest and most devoted adherents. In all these various situations, circumstances will be continually arising of a nature the most trying to the character, and which, wherever any strong desire is felt to act up to the principles and requirements of the Gospel, will impose the strongest necessity of cultivating fully the wisdom of the serpent.

Were the path of life undeviatingly straight and even, there would be no difficulty in tracing, and no danger of leaving it. "The wayfaring man though a fool could not possibly err therein." But then, the ways of the world are so crooked, and the ties by which men are bound to each other are of so feeble and delicate a texture, as to make the difficulty of acting uniformly on the ground of Christian principles, naturally so great in itself, increase to a tenfold degree. However broad and well defined these principles are, yet in applying them to the scenes of the world and reducing them to practice amid the avocations of life, much difficulty must always be encountered from the vast variety of characters with whom its intercourse must be maintained; and the closer and the more delicate the bonds by which that intercourse is upheld,—the more intimate the footing on which we stand towards any men of the world,—the stronger the claims they have on our regard, or the hold they have on our affections, the greater is the temptation to violate these principles; the more imminent is the danger of an attempt to compromise them; and the greater need is there for those who are anxious to adhere to, and to act upon them, to exercise all the wisdom of the serpent which they are able to attain. This is necessary in all circumstances in which Christians can be placed, but especially when they are called to act on a broad scale, and in the open and public arena of the world; for whatever differences may be observable in the characters of those worldly men with whom they may be brought into contact, they are all accustomed in common to cherish feelings, to hold sentiments, and to be influenced by views very different from those which Christian knowledge and principle are fitted to produce; so that, allowing for differences arising from peculiarities of constitution, temper, and habit, we may lay it down as a general rule, sufficient for all the purposes of practical instruction, that they are reducible to two great classes. They are either the decent, and virtuous, and respectable men of the world, who, though engrossed with its pursuits, and enamoured of its pleasures, and thoroughly impregnated with its spirit, yet shew a regard to what is amiable in feeling, and upright in conduct; who practise many, or all of those civic and social virtues, which are so needful to the well-being and the comfort of society, and who, though they may have little taste, or, it may be, a rooted dislike for what they term the puritanical precision of those who take the Gospel as their rule, yet manifest the same tokens of outward respect, and are ready to do the same kind offices to them, as to others of a description more akin to themselves. In all our intercourse with such persons, there is great necessity for our imitating the wisdom of the serpent. The fair assemblage of virtues with which they are adorned, and the kindliness of disposition which they exhibit, may so inaustrate themselves into our regard, as to blunt the edge of Christian feeling—to make us overlook, or cast into the shade, the secret worldliness to which they are a prey, and by keeping our admiration directed to the brighter and more attractive features of their character, bring us insensibly to love them, even with all the defects by which our admiration should have been limited or restrained. What is often seen becomes familiar to the eye—even the most notorious and disgusting deformities cease to be offensive through frequent observation,—and the melancholy declension of many from the high ground of Christian excellence, is often to be traced to their having been closely and habitually associated with men who won their unconscious regard by the seducing influence of a few specious virtues, and brought them eventually down to the level of their own deep and devoted worldliness. Were we required to verify these observations, we might appeal to our own experience, that in many of those situations where Christians are much associated with men of the world, a compromise on the part of the latter is not unfrequently made in some things, which, trivial as they may seem, may be productive of the most serious disadvantage and injury to their character. Take a single example that has suggested itself of a young Christian entering on the world, and engaging in its business. His heart open and full of gratitude to those who patronised his incipient efforts, encouraged his rising fortunes, and gave him a welcome reception into their family and home, he is ever ready to select and dwell upon what is fair and honourable in their character and deportment: and though he may frequently hear them uttering sentiments, and see them acting upon principles which he knows to be at variance with the spirit and requirements of the Gospel, yet, carried away by his emotions of kindness and friendship for them, he allows himself gradually to slide down into congenial habits, and to be contented with a lower standard of principle and duty. Thus, his familiar intercourse with them, though springing from, and maintained by, the kindest and most amiable feelings, tends to the hurt and prejudice of his Christian character, and, like the precious metals incorporated with baser alloys, the gold gradually becomes dim, till the most fine gold eventually perishes.

The men of the world with whom Christians may have sometimes to associate, may be of a different class. They may be the vicious and profligate and abandoned men of the world, who act on no fixed or reputable principles, are guided by no impulse but that of appetite, and are given to sinful practices, to low vices, to secret crimes, each according to his own desires, and in different degrees and habits of criminality. With these, it cannot be supposed for a moment, that Christians can have any harmony either of feeling or of enjoyment. Light is not more opposite to darkness, heaven is not more opposite to hell, than they who have the true spirit and purity of the Gospel are to the lovers of profligacy and the perpetrators of crime. But although it is as impossible for Christians to be friends of these, as it is for two "to walk together, unless they are agreed," yet they may be frequently thrown together. The unavoidable calls of business, or the bonds of a near relationship, may bring them to move almost constantly in the circle of the same society; and although there is no danger in regard to this, as there might be in regard to the former class, of our becoming lovers of their characters and principles and ways, yet there is a danger here also, though arising from a different cause, and a consequent need of the wisdom of the serpent to avoid it. They may suffer our presence because they cannot get rid of it, but it will always be felt as a restraint upon them, and they will never be at rest, till, either by fair means or foul, they have obtained our countenance, and got us on their side. If we are proof against their solicitations, they will lay snares to entrap us. They will devise the most dexterous expedients, and fabricate the most cunning stories, and form the best-concerted schemes to catch our feet in the net which they have laid; and should their plot take effect, O with what malignant satisfaction will they triumph over our fall, and expose the weakness of the saintly pretenders, and embellish their narrative of our disgrace, with every additional circumstance to make us appear ridiculous and contemptible in the eyes of the world. Nor may this be the end of it. That scheme, which they originally contrived for their temporary amusement, may give rise to consequences more serious to us than they ever contemplated; and the unhappy irregularity into which we may have been betrayed, though it stand in solitary contrast to the tried and established virtue of a protracted life, may make an inroad on our peace of mind, the memory of which may haunt and distress us till our dying day, and entail such effects on our interests and respectability in the world, that years of unblemished morality and the most unfeigned piety may be unable to efface the indelible stain. Some there are among the professing followers of Christ, so strong in the faith, as to remain invulnerable amid all such assaults of infidel and ungodly ridicule,—whose presence, whose words, whose very looks are sufficient to awe into silence the presumptuous scoffer, and to check the utterance of the impious jest that may have risen to his lips. But by far the greater part of Christians are of more timid and less established characters, and when compelled by circumstances, or urged by a mistaken regard and friendship to such enemies of the truth, they join their society, they pierce themselves through with many sorrows; for while, with a melting eye and a heart that secretly aches, they are observers of the unholy sentiments and practices in which these indulge, they are forced, in their presence, to compromise their most sacred feelings, and most cherished principles, for fear of drawing down upon themselves the vengeance of the “world’s dread laugh;” and knowing, though they do, what they have to expect, yet they continue, as if spell-bound, to haunt and linger in the fatal spot, with an infatuation, only equalled by, but more pitiable far than, that of the tiny moth, which flies and flutters round the flame, till, lured by the deceitful glare, it loses itself in the element of destruction.

Every Christian’s experience will shew the truth of this picture, and prove that unguarded intercourse with such men of the world is not unfrequently attended with consequences so fatal and irretrievable, as to make one tremble at the bare idea. Look into the criminal annals of the land, and of whom do their dark pages retail the history? Not of him alone who was cradled amid iniquity, and whose infant lips were taught to lisp the accents of profanity and vice; but of him, too, who, though brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, yet unhappily got into the society of those who were walking in the vanity of their own minds, and had no fear of God before their eyes. On his first entrance into the world, fresh from the lessons of the Bible, and fortified by the counsels of parental tenderness, he would have fled, as from a pestilence, from the presence of those who were enemies to virtue, and at open war with their God. But left to his own independent will, and in the course of his extending acquaintance with the world, he begins to look down with contempt on what he now deems the weakness and bigotry of the principles to which he was trained. In an evil hour he is thrown into the company of those who studiously foster these growing opinions, and allows himself to be caught by the artful allurements by which they ply him to come over to their side. After a few ineffectual struggles, his resolution falters,—his principles are unHINGED,—the authority of his parents, his Bible, and his God, is forgotten or despised; and he who would have once recoiled, with instinctive abhorrence, from the commission of known and open sin, becomes familiar with the simplest forms of crime, and passing on from one stage in the career of iniquity to another, descends with fearful rapidity, in the downward path that leads him to the deep, and “in that deep, a lower deep still yawning to devour him,” till past the possibility of reclaim, he becomes lost and undone for ever.

Let Christians, then, beware, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so by their intercourse with men of the world, their minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. Let them remember, that experience adds its strong verdict to the testimony of the apostle, that in every instance “evil communications corrupt good manners;” and knowing the sad and disastrous consequences which may, from this cause, accrue to their peace of mind, and their purity of conduct, let them shun altogether the society of those of whom Mammon is the god, and the world is the portion; or, if they cannot shun them altogether, let them mingle with them as little and as seldom as they can; or if circumstances oblige them to keep up habits of constant and familiar intercourse with men of the world, let them be ever on the watch themselves, and look earnestly for grace from above, that they may avert the seductions of evil example, and ward off the weapons of ungodly ridicule, and be not carried away by the imposing appearances and fair pretences of men, for Satan himself is sometimes transformed into an angel of light. In fine, let Christians be prudent, and look well to their goings; let them be wise, and with all their imitation of the far-sighted and wary circumspection of the serpent, let them take care to be wise in that which is good, and simple concerning evil.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF MRS HUNTINGTON

THE influence of Christianity is often exemplified in some of its most interesting and beautiful aspects, in the lives of pious females. Possessed of strong sensibilities, theirs is peculiarly the religion of the heart, diffusing its salutary effects over the whole of that narrow but important sphere in which it is their province to move. Christian principles and Christian feeling, in fact, can never be widely prevalent in our families, until a heart-felt interest in the concerns of the soul shall animate the mothers and daughters, around and among us, to exert their all-powerful influence in recommending religion as essential to domestic comfort, and happiness, and peace. Such was the benign effect throughout her whole life, of Mrs Huntington's holy walk and conversation. She not merely professed Christianity, but she lived a Christian; and it is impossible to peruse the brief, but touching tale, of her character and experience, without imbibing, for a time at least, somewhat of that calm, serene, and submissive spirit by which she was habitually actuated.

The subject of the following Sketch was a daughter of the Rev. Achilles Mansfield, of Killingworth, in the state of Connecticut, America. She was born January 27, 1791. In early life she was characterized by the most amiable and affectionate dispositions, which, combined with the delicacy of her constitution, rendered her an object of unwearied attention and watchful care to her parents. That she was impressed with the importance of religion at a very early period, appears from a fact, to which she long afterwards adverted, that when very young she held a solemn consultation in her mind whether it was best to be a Christian then or not, and she remembered having come to the decision that it was not. This resolution, however, was not of long continuance, for it pleased God, while she was yet a child, to cause the light of divine truth to shine into her mind, and thus to call her effectually out of darkness into his marvellous light. From this time she maintained a beautiful consistency of character, until, at the age of seventeen, she made a public profession of her faith in Christ, and joined the church of which her father was pastor.

In 1809 Susan Mansfield was married to the Rev. Joshua Huntington, junior pastor of the Old South Church in Boston, Massachusetts. This union was productive of much happiness to both, being hallowed by a blessing from above. She and her husband walked together as heirs of the grace of life. Every day found them advancing in the knowledge and experience of divine things. As a proof of Mrs Huntington's intimate acquaintance with her own heart, we may quote the following remarks, contained in a letter which she wrote about this time to a friend:—

"There is nothing so astonishing, My dear M., nothing that places the thorough, universal, and malignant depravity of our nature in so clear a point of view, as our neglecting to improve the dealings of the blessed God with us, which are all calculated to lead us to repentance, and then finding fault with him for not giving us ability to love him, (when all our inability lies in a criminal aversion, the most unreasonable and unjust, to his perfect character,) and making that inability an excuse for not loving him. Oh, could we view this subject as angels view it, and as we shall one day view it, it must fill us with wonder and astonishment!—wonder at the forbearance and mercy of God, astonishment at the moral degradation and turpitude of man. When I look into my own heart, and behold those endless replyings against God which lurk there; when I think what must be the fountain from which they spring, it would seem as if I should be filled with repentance, as if I should mourn, with deep and penitential sorrow, over my unspeakable, my amazing guilt."

For two years before her marriage Mrs Huntington had kept a journal, in which she recorded, from time to time, the Lord's dealings with her. This journal she resumed some years after, under "a conviction," as she expresses it, "of the expediency of taking down written memorials of special mercies." The practice has been very frequent among Christians, in all ages, and it has, no doubt, been attended with the most beneficial effects. We are thus admitted to the most secret recesses of the Christian's thoughts, and learn to sympathize with their every feeling. As specimens of the judicious remarks which Mrs Huntington made, in reference to the common affairs of life, we may select the following:—

"I have had a very precious exercise this evening for me. God grant it may prove to have been genuine! I have, for some time past, been in a very worldly, carnal state, and Jehovah graciously chastised me. My trial was, in itself, a small one; but it was hard to be borne. One of my domestics treated me in an unbecoming manner, and when I expostulated with her, only continued to justify herself, and persist in her rudeness. This circumstance led me to realize, how infinitely important it is that I should ever tread in the precise path of duty, and never turn to the right hand or to the left, lest it should bring a reproach on religion. Such a sense of my multifarious duties, as a head of a family, and of my entire impotence for their performance, rushed upon me, that I was almost overwhelmed. But I was enabled to go to that precious Saviour, in whom there is a supply for my every want. I think I was enabled to cast my naked soul upon him for wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and final redemption from sin. And oh! what a glorious method for the attainment of strength, and faith, and grace, did it appear to me; and how hateful did my lukewarmness in his service seem! I only wonder that I was not a thousand times more affected than I was. I think I was enabled to pray for the person who misused me, and to feel all enmity taken away, and a sweet spirit of forgiveness, and a desire that she should be delivered from the bondage of corruption. Indeed, it seemed as if I were filled with love for all the world. Blessed Redeemer! precious, glorious Pattern! enable me to catch something of thy spirit while sojourning in this vale of tears! And may that spirit and its divine fruits be consummated in the world of glory!"

Again, speaking of domestic duties, Mrs H. observes, "When I hear females, as I sometimes do, deprecating the contractedness of domestic life, and eagerly panting after the employments and publicity of philosophers, statesmen, and legislators, I am led to think that my life, in the little sphere of my family, must be more varied than theirs, or they could not consider the duties of the domestic circle as unimportant, or devoid of excitements. It is true, if the need to be obtained were mere human applause, the female part of the world would have but little opportunity to shine; and might justly complain of the narrowness of their sphere, and the insignificance of their lot. But when it is considered that the quality of actions is determined by God, and that, in his view, the person who tears from his bosom a right hand sin, or performs a self-denying duty, is greater than the hero or the conqueror considered only as such, how is the case altered! how does it dignify any station which is calculated to produce these effects! The woman, therefore, who complains of the obscurity of her condition, feels and talks like a heathen. She virtually professes to value the praise of men more than the praise of God; and is likely, by her impiety and folly, to forfeit both."

And, once more, the importance of early education and training, is thus adverted to:—

"There is scarcely any subject concerning which I feel more anxiety, than the proper education of my children. It is a difficult and delicate subject; and the more I reflect on my duty to them, the more I feel how much is to be learned by myself. The person who undertakes to form the infant mind, to cut off the distorted shoots, and direct and fashion those which may, in due time, become fruitful and lovely branches, ought to possess a deep and accurate knowledge of human nature. It is no easy task to ascertain, not only the principles and habits of thinking, but also the causes which produce them. It is no easy task, not only to watch over actions, but also to become acquainted with the motives which prompted them. It is no easy task, not only to produce correct associations, but to remove improper ones, which may, through the medium of those nameless occurrences to which children are continually exposed, have found a place in the mind. But such is the task of every mother who superintends the education of her children. Add to this the difficulty of maintaining that uniform and consistent course of conduct which children ought always to observe in their parents, and which alone can give force to the most judicious discipline; and, verily, every considerate person must allow, that it is no small matter to be faithful in the employment of instructors of infancy and youth. Not only must the precept be given, 'Love not the world;' but the life must speak the same. Not only must we exhort our infant charge to patience under their little privations and sorrows, but we must also practise those higher exercises of submission which, they will easily perceive, are but the more vigorous branches of the same root whose feeble twigs they are required to cultivate. Not only must we entreat them to seek first the kingdom of God, but we must be careful to let them see that we are not as easily depressed by the frowns, or elated by the smiles, of the world, as others. In short, nothing but the most persevering industry in the acquisition of necessary knowledge, the most indefatigable application of that knowledge to particular cases, the most decisive adherence to a consistent course of piety, and, above all, the most unremitting supplications to Him who alone can enable us to resolve and act correctly, can qualify us to discharge properly the duties which devolve upon every mother."

Mrs Huntington's constitution, which had never been robust, appears to have exhibited, shortly after her marriage, symptoms of a tendency to consumption. But, even under a consciousness of this, her zeal for the honour of her God only seemed to gather strength. She longed to be useful in advancing the divine glory.

"My lungs are very weak. I often feel great distress from very slight exertions in talking. O how do I wish that my little strength may be devoted to the glory of God; that my breath may not be wasted by idle and useless conversation! How dreadful to think that I have employed my health no better, for the best of Fathers, and in the best of causes! I long to do some good in the world. I long to be useful to my dear fellow-creatures. I long to see all engaged for God. Oh that these desires may be attained! I had some sweet freedom in prayer this morning. I felt that I could go to God, through Christ, as my Father. I think I felt something of the spirit of adoption, and saw something of the preciousness of Christ; remembered with satisfaction and thankfulness, that he had trodden the rugged path of human life, and the rough descent to the valley of death, and smoothed them both for his children; and felt as if I could follow where he had led the way."

While in this state of weakness, it pleased the Almighty to withdraw from her a kind and tender parent, to whom she was fondly attached. Still she could bow with resignation to the stroke, saying, by her whole deportment on that trying occasion, "It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth to him good."

"The conflict is over. My dear father, who loved me as himself, is gone, never to return! I may say with the apostle, I am 'troubled, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed.' But the wound is deep; it can never be healed. Dear man! I dwell too much on the mere earthly circumstances of this afflicting event. I ought to look beyond the veil. His sufferings were great; it pierces my heart to think of them. But what were they to the glory now revealed? Blessed be God for the satisfactory evidence he gave of preparation for the great change, and for the spiritual comfort he enjoyed amid his bodily pains, and in prospect of death! I would bow at the solemn rebuke, and say, 'Thy will be done! God of mercy, support, comfort, and sanctify me!'"

On Mrs Huntington's return to Boston, from attending the death-bed of her father, the pain in her side and weakness in her chest, which had so much alarmed her friends, began to develop themselves more strongly than ever. And yet she preserved the most cheerful and happy frame of mind. "Many," she says in her Journal, "who have no knowledge of the subject from experience, think that religion makes men gloomy. I know nothing of such religion. How can that which prepares us for afflictions, which teaches us to expect disappointments, which lowers our calculations and desires from this world, which resolves all things, with sweet complacency, into the will of the all-wise and all-merciful Governor of the universe, which assures us that Jehovah is pledged to make all things work together for good, which gives to the soul, in this wilderness, a foretaste of heaven, and a hope attested by evidence which God himself has prescribed, of ultimate admission to the joys of his immediate presence,—how can such a principle make men gloomy? It is impossible. O yes, I can say from experience, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee.' So far as I can trust in God and love his will, so far I am happy. Oh for more continual, more perfect resignation and confidence! I know that what he appoints is best. May this conviction have an abiding influence upon my feelings and conduct. My soul, 'trust thou in the Lord for ever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength.'"

"In the world you shall have tribulation," was the express declaration of our blessed Redeemer to his faithful servants, while on earth, and the truth of the statement has been uniformly admitted by Christians in every age of the world. To the subject of our present sketch, however, 'tribulation' was more especially familiar. In addition to her own bodily ailments, which were frequent and severe, she was subjected to many domestic trials of a kind remarkably painful. She had recently been called to mourn the loss of her father, and, in December 1817, she was deprived of her mother. The letter written to her sisters, on receiving the distressing intelligence, bears marks of a warmly pious and affectionate heart.

"My dear sisters, the long expected, but melancholy and afflictive tidings of our beloved mother's dissolution, reached me on Wednesday last. The stroke has fallen, and we are without a parent. But the Psalmist says, 'When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up.' Oh to be taken up, to be adopted, taken into God's family; to have him exercise over us the endearing, the watchful, the vigilant attention and care of an omniscient and Almighty Parent! But in order to this, something is necessary on our part. As God promises to be the husband only of the 'widow indeed,' so he promises to be the father only of the orphan indeed; of those who, disclaiming all other dependance, fly to him, through Jesus Christ, as their best, their only portion; who feel the vanity of all human helpers; who love him with a filial and holy love; and who manifest their attachment by a hatred of sin which he hates, by a pursuit of the holiness he enjoins, by a life of unreserved obedience to his law. For how can we love God, if we are careless of offending him? How can we for a moment think we love him, if we allow ourselves in any thing he hates? 'This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments. He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.' My dear sisters, can we, with these passages of Scripture before us, appeal to our Master and future Judge, as Peter did, and say, 'Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee?' If so, then are we the children of God, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; then are we preparing for heaven; then our God will lead us in a right way to the city of habitation; he will smooth the path of life, or give us strength to surmount every difficulty of the way, accompanying every cross with his blessing, and ultimately bring us to the heavenly Jerusalem, the inner temple of his glory, to the full and endless enjoyment of himself in heaven.

"Is it so, my beloved sisters? Dust and ashes, pollution and guilt as we are, does the infinite Jehovah allow us to indulge such a hope as this! And can we live in sin? Can we live without panting after grace to glorify Him much, from whom we have received all? Can we go on day after day, and month after month, doing nothing for his glory, for his cause, for his people? Time flies. We are drawing near to eternity."

Though the sphere in which Mrs Huntington's character shone in its brightest lustre was the domestic circle, she felt a sincere delight in doing "good to all as she had opportunity." She visited the humble dwellings of the poor, ministered to their wants, sympathized with them in their distresses, and directed their minds to the "balm in Gilead, and the physician there." An interesting case of this kind, she thus narrates:—

"I called in, by accident, as we say, to-day, at a miserable-looking house, where I found a poor afflicted woman, of twenty or twenty-three years of age, whose case affected me much. She has one child three months old, and one eighteen months old; is in miserable health herself; and has an intemperate, unkind husband. She appeared broken-hearted, and almost bereft of reason. She was born in —, attended Mr M.'s ministry, and was once the subject of serious impressions. But an imprudent marriage has ruined her, at least for this world. She is in a wretched, dirty hovel, with her husband's father and mother, and a flock of miserable children. All of them are addicted to drink; quarrels among parents and children till midnight, are frequent. I saw only the mother-in-law. But the scene I witnessed was an emblem of hell. The poor young woman is in a state little short of despair. She says it is impossible for her to have a moment alone, and that her husband and mother-in-law will not let her read the Bible. She said to me, 'Oh! If I could go up and stay at your house but one night!' It seemed as if God had directed us to the place; I hope for good. I cannot keep this poor young creature out of my mind. If God sent us there to be the instruments of saving this soul from death, what a mercy it will be! Oh that the Redeemer would pluck this helpless one out of the jaws of the lion!"

The period was now fast approaching which was destined, more than all the other sorrows with which Mrs Huntington had been visited, to try her faith, and patience, and Christian resignation. Her husband's health, which had for some time been feeble, at length began to yield under the pressure of his ministerial labours. His physicians recommended a cessation from his wonted exertions, and a change of air. He accordingly set out on a journey as far as Montreal, and, for a time, felt himself considerably improved. But, in the inscrutable providence of God, he was never permitted to reach home, but died at Groton, on Saturday, September 11, 1819.

Thus was this amiable and pious lady suddenly, and by an unexpected stroke, written widow and desolate. Her submissive and exemplary patience under the painful stroke, is thus noticed by a friend:—

"There was, in her whole deportment, the most convincing and pleasing evidence of humble, child-like submission to the divine will. Most of her conversation with me at that time, worthy of being recorded as I felt it to be, I regret that I am compelled to say, has escaped my memory. I will, however, add a few particulars, in the unconnected manner in which they occur to my recollection.

"I remember asking her, on the day succeeding the death of Mr Huntington, if it required an effort to be submissive. She answered, 'I am enabled to bless God, that I have not had to contend with an unbelieving thought. I would rather have endured the agony of separation, than that my dear husband should have borne it. I can truly say, 'Tis the survivor dies.'

"On another occasion she said to me, 'The bitterness of my grief can be known only to God and my own soul. But I think I can say, 'Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him,' and can lay hold on the hand that smites, for support. But, oh, the loneliness of widowhood! I am as Peter sinking in deep waters.'

"The resignation and calmness she was enabled to feel, she ascribed 'to the mercy of God, in answer to the prayers of his dear people,' many of whom, she knew, constantly remembered her in their supplications."

Her own feelings are thus recorded in her Journal:—

"The desolating stroke my soul was dreading, when I last wrote in this journal, has fallen upon me. Yes, it has fallen upon me; and I live. What shall I say? —The right hand of the Lord doeth valiantly, or I should now have dwelt in silence. Wonderful grace! He that hath loved me bore me through. His everlasting arm was under me. He taught and enabled me to say, Thy will be done. To him be glory. The being I loved better than myself, has left me in this wilderness. He on whom I leaned has gone over Jordan. But another arm, mightier than his, sustains me. I can say, I humbly believe with truth,—Nevertheless, I am not alone, for God is with me. And I must again cry, Grace! grace! I am a wonder to myself. Oh! the infinite grace of God! A worm is in the furnace, and is not consumed! And must I not love this 'strong Deliverer' better than all? Shall I not cheerfully give up my comforts at his command?"

And some time after we find her giving vent to her feelings, in contemplating her desolate state.

"Surely I have reason, if any one has, to feel like a stranger and a pilgrim on the earth. All the ties of near relationship, my children excepted, by which I was bound to this world, have been, one after another, sundered. And now I wish never to have any of these earthly ties renewed. My relationships are in heaven; I feel a peculiar, peaceful, melancholy satisfaction in this consciousness daily. It seems like a still, small voice from the world of spirits, admonishing me to be girding myself to my journey, and setting my face homeward. It is well, Father, it is well. Only help me to cling to thee for ever; only remember me, in life, and in death; and I ask no other portion. Thou knowest best. Do with me as seemeth good unto thee."

But the trials of this eminent saint of the Most High, were not yet finished. Some of her last earthly comforts were snatched from her, and she was doomed to feel the bitterest pangs which can rend a parent's heart. On the 1st of September 1821, she thus writes in her journal:—

"The hand of the Lord has again touched me. On the twenty-fifth of last month, I was called home to receive the last parting sigh of my dearly beloved Joshua. Thus the fond and cherished babe left me at a moment's warning. It fell upon me like a thunderbolt.—But my mind is comforted now. My child, my lamb, is in heaven. He has gone to the Saviour, who said, 'Father, I will that those whom thou hast given me, be with me, where I am.' Amen. Lord, help those that remain to follow!"

And again on the 8th of the same month:

"I go about from one room to another, but the place" and things which once knew him, know him no more. I find not the object I seem to be seeking. My tears flow; my heart is full; I feel almost as if there were no sorrow like my sorrow. My mind does not leave every thing here, and fasten itself on heaven, as it did when my dear husband died. I am not comfortless; but I have not the 'strong consolation' which I then had. It seems as if Joseph were not, and Benjamin were not. But, oh, let me not undervalue my remaining mercies—my pleasant children, my thousand, my unnumbered blessings!"

It was deeply distressing to one of such tender affections as those which characterised Mrs. Huntington, to be subjected to trials so numerous and painful. She had lost her dearest earthly friend—the companion, the husband of her youth; and now she is bereaved of a darling child, peculiarly endeared to her, as being born in her widowhood, and bearing the name of her deceased partner. But even yet the cup of suffering, mingled by an all-wise Father, was not completely full. A few days after the death of Joshua, another child, in whom she felt a very tender interest, as having for a long time been feeble, both in body and mind, was snatched away from her, in the mysterious arrangements of Providence. On this last occasion, she thus writes:—

"I live, though death has smitten another of my number. Elizabeth was taken from all her sorrows and her sufferings, eleven days after my sweet babe. I have no doubt that both these little ones are in heaven. They were given to God; and they are not, because he has taken them. As it respects Elizabeth, I can see that the dispensation, which released her from a body of disease and death, which confined and cramped all the efforts of the soul, and set the spirit free, to unfold and expand in the service of God, is a wise and merciful dispensation."

Thus was Mrs. Huntington, though still young in years, subjected to many severe trials, all tending to promote her advancement in holiness, and preparation for heaven. Her whole life, indeed, was chequered with varied scenes of prosperity and adversity, but she felt that she was thereby called to glorify Him, in every possible situation, "who called her out of darkness into light, and had chosen her as a vessel of mercy to show forth His praise."

But we hasten to the closing scene of this devoted woman's life. Her health, as we have already said, had, since her childhood, been delicate, and though supported under her manifold sufferings, by a strength far greater than her own, her feeble frame, at length, sunk under them. Her body, it soon became evident, was wasting under a lingering consumption. Various means were tried, to arrest the disease, but without effect. Her race was nearly run, and she appeared to be hastening to receive the prize. It may be interesting to extract from the notes of her pastor, some account of his last visits to her.

"Tuesday, October 28, 1823. Called on Mrs. Huntington about half-past nine in the morning. Found that she had failed considerably since my last visit. To an inquiry in relation to the state of her mind since Friday, she replied, 'I think I have felt more of the presence of Christ than I did when I saw you last. I have not had those strong views and joyful feelings with which I have sometimes been favoured. My mind is weak, and I cannot direct and fix my thoughts as I once could. But I think I have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before me in the precious Gospel; and he who is the foundation of that hope will never forsake me.' Then, with a most interesting expression of countenance, she said, 'I trust we shall meet in heaven, and spend an eternity in praising our dear Redeemer.' It was replied, 'We shall, if we give him our hearts, and continue faithful to him unto the end.' 'I feel,' she answered, 'that I have been very, very unfaithful. But he is merciful, his blood cleanseth from all sin, and

I trust he has blotted my sins from the book of his remembrance. Oh, what should we do without Christ!' 'As much debtors,' it was remarked, 'to free grace at the end of our course as when we begin it.' 'More,' she replied, 'far more; for we sin against greater light and love, after we are born again. Yes, it is all of free grace. If it were not, what would become of me?' It was answered, 'You would have perished, justly perished; but now, when you enter heaven, you will stand before the angels, a monument of God's justice, as well as of his free grace, for he is just in justifying those that believe in Jesus.' 'Yes,' she replied, 'what a glorious plan! what a precious Saviour! Oh, that I could love him more! Pray that I may love and glorify him for ever.'

"After prayer, she said, 'I hope you pray for me at other times, as well as when you are here. Ask for me the continual presence of Christ, and that I may honour his religion to the end.' It was answered, 'We constantly remember you in our prayers: many of God's people are deeply interested for you, and are continually supplicating the throne of grace in your behalf.' 'I know it,' she replied; 'and that is the reason why I have been favoured with such a comfortable state of mind; for Satan has desired to have me, and to sift me as wheat. I hope they will continue to pray for me; and may God bless them with the consolations they ask for me.' It was remarked, 'He who said to Peter, 'I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not,' is, I trust continually interceding for you; and him the Father heareth always.' She said, 'I hope he does intercede for me; and that is one of my greatest consolations; for he will be heard. But, you know, he presents the prayers of the saints; and I want the satisfaction of reflecting, that he is continually presenting many of them in behalf of me and my dear children.'

"Friday, November 7. To the usual inquiry respecting the state of her mind, she said, 'Mrs. Graham accurately describes my feelings, when she says, 'Thus far has the Lord brought me through the wilderness; bearing, chastising, forgiving, restoring. I am near to Jordan's flood. May my blessed High Priest, and Ark of the Covenant, lead on my staggering steps the little farther I have to go.' I have had no rapturous views of the heaven to which I hope I am going, no longings to depart. But I have generally been enabled to feel a calm submission, and to realize the fulness and the preciousness of the Saviour. I desire to feel a perfect resignation to the will of God, because it is his will. Oh how sweet, to be willing to be just where, and just what, God pleases! to rejoice that the Lord God omnipotent reigneth, and worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. This, in its perfection, is, I think, a principal source of the happiness of heaven. Pray that God would enable me to feel thus while suffering from weakness and pain, and entering the dark valley.'

"Frequently, during her sickness, she had expressed to her pastor a desire that he would, if possible, be with her in her last moments. On Thursday, December 4th, he was informed, about three o'clock in the afternoon, that she had failed greatly since morning, and would probably survive but a little longer. He immediately repaired to her residence, and found her sleeping, but very restless, and breathing with great difficulty. She continued in this state, except that respiration became constantly more difficult, through the afternoon and evening. About eleven o'clock the difficulty of breathing became so great, as to overcome the disposition to slumber. Intelligence, it was found, still remained. She was asked 'if she knew she was near her end.' She answered with a sign, in the affirmative. It was said, 'I hope you feel the presence of the Saviour sustaining and comforting you.' She assented. 'Your faith and hope in him are unshaken?' Her reply was in the affirmative.—A few minutes after, her sight failed; and, at twenty minutes past eleven, her spirit entered into rest.

"Her end was full of peace,
Fitting her uniform piety serene.
'Twas rather the deep humble calm of faith,
Than her high triumph; and resembled more
The unnoticed setting of a clear day's sun,
Than his admired departure in a blaze
Of glory, bursting from a clouded course."

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. WALTER WEIR,
Cupar-Fife.

"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—JOHN iii. 16.

1. LOVE may be either that of benevolence or of complacency; the latter presupposes some worthiness in the object beloved, the former is more purely disinterested, and is manifested towards objects unworthy in themselves. It is plain, that in this sense alone, we can understand the love of God, so graphically described in the text. We appeal both to Scripture and experience, if there is not a general apostasy of our race from God; does not the general aspect of society justify the words of the apostle, "the world lieth in wickedness?" Is not the alienation of our race so general, so thorough, that ungodly men are said to "walk according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience."

Mankind are represented as universally depraved; sin hath polluted their nature and separated their affections from God; so criminal hath our race become, that God could not, without an atonement, shew mercy to his creatures, with honour to himself, and with safety to the interests of holiness; and surely, we need scarcely say, that were a stain cast upon this attribute, his character would be degraded, his government destroyed, and his creatures lost in irremediable ruin. How admirable the scheme of mercy, to save the sinner, yet to expose the guilt and demerit of sin, and to punish it with unmitigated severity!

2. He who was given for the salvation of the world is the only begotten Son of God. At the threshold of this subject we pause, feeling the propriety of the divine command given upon another occasion, "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." Men have thought much on this subject, and thus have presumed to write more, although the modesty becoming creatures ought to have taught them the hardihood of attempting to comprehend what is beyond the grasp of created intellect. We know something of the perfections of God from his works, but what he is essentially, we can only learn from Revelation; and to go one step beyond the clear and explicit declarations of the Bible, is to tread on forbidden ground;—to advance one thought which is not guided, strengthened, and upheld by the dictates of Revelation, is drawing nigh to gaze, when God hath wrapt in the recesses of light inaccessible, the profound mysteries regarding his beloved Son, and bids his creatures beware lest, in their daring impiety, the anger of the Lord break forth upon them. All we know on the subject, is, that the Son of God, although he be uncreated, underived, and unchangeably blessed, yet in his person, as the Son, he is distinct from the Father. What this is, we know not, neither need we seek to know; shall the worm speculate on the nature of the man who is about to tread it under foot? but the worm hath an affinity of nature to him, although man hath none to the infinite God; therefore, the sublimity of this subject for ever forbids the approach of the loftiest intellect.

God gave his best, his greatest gift: Think of the dignity of the donor,—it is he whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain. Had he deputed angels to be mediators betwixt himself and rebel man, how rich would have been his mercy, how great their condescension! And yet we see not how they could possibly have accomplished the design; but this gift is one with himself, in dignity equal, in power and glory the same, for Jesus himself assures us, "I and my Father are one." When angels sinned, God passed by them, although occupying a higher rank in the scale of creation, and encircled with the omnipotent arm of mercy the fallen race of men, that the degradation and inferiority of the object might enhance the gift bestowed.

Had the Son of God come to our world attended by millions of holy angels (for these all wait upon him,) how dignified his person, how august his appearance, how gracious his design! but he came meek and having salvation, his face was marred more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men. "God spared not his own Son, but freely gave him up to the death for us all." Oh, there is indeed a mystery here beyond the conception of creatures; there issues from the cross of Christ a glory which sheds a radiance through time, which fills with joy the souls of the redeemed, and pours new lustre around the throne of God himself. Other gifts bespeak the kindness of our God, this displays the exceeding riches of his grace. God causes his sun to rise upon the evil and the good, but such is the glory of this gift, that the natural sun is lost in the effulgence of the Sun of Righteousness. God hath, in his providence, often raised up saviours to rescue their fellow-men from oppression, but in contrast with Jesus Christ, and the greatness of his work, their glory sinks into insignificance. The Lord is kind even to the unthankful, he loads even his enemies with goodness; but this gift is beyond them all, in dignity without a parallel, in value beyond price.

3. Behold the cause of this gift. It is a fatal error to conceive of the God of love, as having been constrained to love his creatures for the sake of the mediation of his Son, for "the Father himself loved us;" the mediation of the Son of God is not the cause of his love, but his love is the cause of that mediation. Mercy springs not from the atonement of the Son of God; the river of mercy hath its origin beneath the throne of the Most High; his own beloved Son is the channel through which it ever flows. It is not because Christ died that God loves us, but it is because God loved us that his Son died; and now God can shew his love in a manner which reflects glory upon his character, for Jesus "magnified the law and made it honourable, finished transgression, made an end of sin, and brought in an everlasting righteousness." Mark the particular mode of expression; "God so loved the world," implies doubtless, that we might search into its meaning, and thus have our admiration of his love enhanced;—it is so when we think of the greatness of him who loved us,—that one so high, should have stooped to those who are so low,—that one so excellent, should have deigned to think of those who are so unworthy,—that one so illustrious for purity should have set his love upon rebels so inconceivably mean, yea, so desperate in wickedness, that the heart hath been yielded to other objects, turned alien from God, and done all which its feeble nature could accomplish to drive God from the affections, and to live without him in the world. The love of God is enhanced, when we consider the wretchedness of the objects. Sin is the most desperate, the most fatal of diseases, it hath separated the mind from God, and produced such inveteracy of evil there, that the sinner is loathsome in the sight of the God of holiness. Yet to love the sinner notwithstanding the sin,—to shew affection for the unworthy notwithstanding the unworthiness, is a stretch of benevolence which passeth knowledge.

4. What was the design of God, when he so loved the world? Surely the means betoken an end stupendously vast. Can we think of that love which hath such a height, and depth, and breadth, and length;—can we think of the effects of that love—the sacrifice of the only begotten Son of God, without having a vivid impression of the value of the soul, together with the wretchedness to which sin hath degraded it, and which required so great an atonement?

We cannot describe the ruin of the soul. A dark veil conceals the abyss of misery; but Oh, if there is any thing fearful in being "strangers and foreigners to God,"—if there is any thing alarming in being the victims of a fatal disease, the end of which is eternal death,—if there is any thing appalling in the prospects of a judgment seat,—if there is any thing tremendous in "the worm that never dieth and the fire that never shall be quenched," and solemnly affecting in the cry of despair;—then is there a meaning in the text which strikingly augments the riches of grace, "God so loved the world that we should not perish."

My friends, as we cannot describe the ruin of the soul, neither can we tell you what is the blessedness of everlasting life; but if there is any thing pleasing in being reconciled to God, and again assimilated to his image,—if there is any thing cheering in the promise, "my grace is sufficient for you,"—if there is any thing animating in the assurance, that grace shall ere long be consummated in glory,—if there is any meaning in the declaration, "Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, what God hath prepared for them that love him,"—then may we join the ransomed even here, in saying, "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."

5. In this passage there is a condition required from us. When we speak of a condition on our part when transacting with God, we must be most cautious, lest we conceive of the Most High, as if he required conditions of merit from us: this were beneath his dignity, for in all his dealings with us he acts as a Sovereign; this were unworthy of his compassion, for is he not intimately acquainted with our weakness, our total inability to do any thing deserving of his favour? It is therefore manifest, that although the Saviour "trode the wine-press alone," and though his obedience, sufferings, and death, paid our ransom, satisfied divine justice, "made an end of sin, and brought in an everlasting righteousness;" yet, there is a condition required from us,—not a condition of merit, as before stated, for what need is there to add to that which is already infinite?—not a condition of purchase, for God purchased the Church with his own blood,—but a condition of connection; just as in the case of rebels pardoned by a sovereign's clemency, it is necessary that they credit the assurance of pardon, submit to his mercy, and return to their allegiance; or, as in the munificence of the philanthropist, it is necessary, that the prisoner believe in the bounty of his deliverer, who hath paid his ransom, and is ready to strike off the galling chain of his captivity. So it is necessary that we, who are by nature rebels against the majesty of heaven, credit the assurance of our sovereign's mercy, submit to his terms, and throw ourselves upon his grace. We are charged with a boundless debt; the wages of sin is death,—spiritual death here, and everlasting destruction hereafter; it is requisite that we receive as "a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation," the gracious declaration, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, that he paid their debt, that he destroyed death, and him that had the power of death, and that whosoever shall take refuge in him shall be saved.

Men believe divine truth, and, in all the coldness of indifference, speculate upon its nature: this cannot be faith; such faith even devils possess, for they believe, and, moved with fear, they tremble. True faith is a divine principle wrought in the heart by the Holy Spirit, and works invariably by love. "The truth as it is in Jesus" is believed, its power is felt, the understanding is not only enlightened, but the heart is warmed, it is moved by love. To believe with the heart, is to be persuaded that there is salvation in no other than in Jesus; to hail him as a Saviour altogether such as we need, such as we wish. There prevails a fatal delusion on this subject; men content themselves with a simple assent to the truths of Christianity; be assured this cannot be faith; faith has an assimilating influence; "beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, the believer is changed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord."

Do you thus believe? is love to the Redeemer the moving impulse of your obedience? is affection for his pure and holy law the characteristic of your lives? then see to it, that your faith increase; it will do so by exercise; we cannot exercise confidence without an increase of godliness. Oh let the affecting truth, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that we might not perish, but have everlasting life," impress your hearts; believing, you will grow in affection; delighting in your Saviour, your love will increase; loving him, you will keep all his commandments.

We notice the freeness of this salvation. The Lord Jesus Christ is pre-eminently a gift; there is no exception to the validity of any one's title; all are warranted, encouraged, besought to embrace this great salvation. It is great, for it is offered by Almighty God; it is great, for its value exceeds human conception—it was purchased by the blood of God incarnate; it is great, for its chief design embraces deliverance from eternal wrath. Great as it is, it is given with perfect freeness; nay, it is pressed upon the acceptance of every creature who hears its joyful sound.

By what means shall we urge you to accept this inestimable gift? Shall we reiterate the love of God, and tell you that this is heightened by every attendant circumstance? If we think of Him who so loved us, was ever excellence like his? if we think of the gift, it is his only begotten Son; if we think of the manner of bestowing this gift, it was a gift of richest, freest grace; rich, because the Son of God possesses in himself all the riches of the godhead; free, because the donor is so transcendantly great, and the gift so ineffably precious, that if bestowed upon man, it must be free.

A deadly lethargy hath seized upon the minds of men, otherwise they would bound towards so incomparable a Saviour. We put it to every man's conscience, are not the specimens of true and practical godliness rare? We put it to every man's conscience, if his character bears a resemblance in principle and conduct to the Son of God. The eye of God penetrates the heart, his knowledge extends to its secret emotions. If a man is destitute of faith he must perish; and would he perish while free grace is tendered to him in all the munificence of the God of all grace? Then do we say, that the condemned rebel loves his chains, spurns the offers of his sovereign's clemency, and chuses to die with the rebellion rankling in his heart. Our God is a mighty sovereign, his compassion is as boundless as his greatness,—“He so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son for us.” He calls upon us to credit his message of mercy, to indulge the hope of acceptance, to say of his beloved Son, “He is all my salvation and all my desire.” We again present our inestimable Redeemer, and we ask for Him your hearts; on Him the Father centres his delight; on Him do you centre your hopes, wishes, and prospects; meeting God in his Son, all shall be peace. Behold! God is reconciled in him, he waits to be gracious; it is our part to fix the imploring eye of faith upon the Saviour of men; faith brings in its very exercise the elements of salvation; faith directed to Jesus, “purifies the heart;” and now, if with the confidence of the heart we believe in Him, “we shall not perish, but have everlasting life.”

THE EXTENT AND THE LIMITATION OF SCRIPTURE HISTORY.

BY THE REV. JAMES ESDAILE,

Minister of the East Church, Perth.

WHEN we happen to fall in with extensive ruins, and the shattered relics of vast power, we are unhappy and discontented if we cannot discover the cause of the terrible catastrophe which prostrated so much splendour in the dust; we imagine that we have lost some material link in the world's improvement. These regrets are vain; and neither reason nor philosophy will warrant us to conclude that the world has sustained any great injury by the loss of the history, arts, science, and literature of the fallen nations. The wrecks of empires form the most valuable annals of their history, for they proclaim this important truth, that the power of man is but as stubble when exerted in opposition to the will and appointments of heaven. That this was the character of all the ancient nations, is evident from the nature of the works which constituted their glory, and which, even in their mutilated state, excite the admiration of modern times: for the most splendid remains of their architecture consist of the temples and shrines of idol worship; their most exquisite statuary is employed in the representation of some impure deity, or in the embodied personification of some of the foulest conceptions of a polluted mind.

Shall we say that these remains had better have perished with the nations which produced them? No, they read this lesson to all succeeding generations, that they shall be confounded who trust in graven images; that vice and effeminacy undermine a nation's strength; and that “for these things' sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience.” This is all that it is necessary for us to know. What a mercy it is that their literature is lost! that we have not to wade through such sinks of pollution, and sloughs of depravity as we must have encountered, had the literary remains of the Assyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, Canaanites, &c. come down to our times. We could well spare a great deal of the elegant literature of Greece and Rome; and I am rather inclined to think that the world is under essential obligations to the bigotted Mussulman who burnt the celebrated library of Alexandria; if some knowledge was lost, a world of filth and rubbish was swept away along with it.

If we had the annals of every nation complete, the benefit derived from reading them would not repay the loss of time spent in the perusal; and, so far as profitable knowledge is concerned, we would only learn, that which is duly inculcated by the Word, and by the dispensations of God, viz. that "righteousness, temperance, and industry exalt a nation, whilst idleness and profligacy are a ruin and a disgrace to any state."

The Bible contains the only absolutely authentic history that ever was written. The most upright man on earth may write what is absolutely false, through ignorance or wrong impressions; and I believe there is more truth in some of those fictitious narratives founded on the general principles of human nature, than in the pages of some of the most veracious historians; to be absolutely correct, a historian stands in as much need of inspiration as a prophet. Facts he may know; but the motives and feelings of the actors, the things which render history chiefly interesting, he never can know with certainty, without Revelation. The history of the Bible is entirely a religious history; it mentions the wars and civil transactions of the Jews merely as illustrations of God's providence, and refers to other books, specially mentioned, for particulars; it is, in short, the history of redemption; detailing the origin, progress, and final accomplishment of the scheme, and furnishing as it goes along, through a succession of bands, and a succession of ages, means of verification, to satisfy every diligent enquirer after truth, till the end of the world; and that there may be no doubt as to its absolute correctness, it is written twice over; first, in prophecy and anticipation; and afterwards, in its development and completion.

Such being the great end of Scripture history, we need not be surprised that it should deal sparingly in the general history of the world. No heathen nation is ever mentioned in it, except in connection with the history of the Jews, who had the keeping of the oracles of God, and through whom salvation was to come to the Gentiles, and extend to the remotest corners of the earth. By far the largest and most fertile countries in the world are not so much as mentioned in sacred history; I allude to the countries and nations beyond the eastern limits of Persia, and the mountain-chain of the Parapomusis, which bound the geography and history of Scripture towards the East. Into these vast regions, more populous than all the world besides, the light of Revelation in ancient times had never penetrated; and they were separated from the rest of the world by a seemingly impassable barrier. India, the nearest of them to the historical countries of Scripture, is only mentioned once in the Bible, as forming the eastern boundary of Ahasuerus's empire; it was known only by name, till the expedition of Alexander the Great, when the canon of the Old Testament Scriptures was closed; and we can infer connection between it and the western world before that period, only by the mention of some articles of Indian production, such as ivory and the like, which, however, might have come from another.

In stating, then, the peopling of the world after the flood, the Bible takes no notice whatever of India, China, Tartary, Japan, and the numerous islands which stud the Indian Archipelago; their population is left entirely unaccounted for; and neither from historical records, nor from similarity of manners, customs, or religion, can we connect their origin with any of the nations of the dispersion mentioned in Scripture. Whence are they, then? We are not to suppose the creation of another race distinct from the family of Adam; but we are certainly constrained to suppose that the nations bounded by the Eastern and Indian Ocean have been planted in circumstances very different from those which determined the settlement of the western branches of the human family.

Let it be observed, then, that the people whose affinities and history are mentioned in Scripture, "journeyed from the East," Gen. xi. 2, and dwelt in the land of Shinar; and there it was that they engaged in the extraordinary attempt to build a city and a tower, that they might not "be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." This was evidently an attempt in direct opposition to the will of heaven, as intimated both to Adam and to Noah, which was, that they shall replenish the whole earth. It is impossible, therefore, to conceive that Noah could be concerned in such an enterprise. He had seen too much of the power and judgments of God in the destruction of the whole human race, with the exception of his own family, to venture to oppose the will of heaven; his faith had led him to prepare an ark for the saving of his house; and when he had seen the faithfulness of God in fulfilling both his promises and his judgments, it was impossible that he could give any countenance to open rebellion against his will. But we never hear a word of Noah after the flood, except that "he lived three hundred and fifty years." It would appear that all his three sons moved towards the West, where the original settlement of the human race had been. Nothing is clearer than that Canaan, Phenicia, Egypt, and a great part of Arabia, were peopled by the descendants of Ham; this is evident from the tenth chapter of Genesis. On the same authority, we learn that the descendants of Japhet, the Japetus of the Greeks, peopled "the isles of the Gentiles;" that is, not merely the isles of the Mediterranean, but all the maritime coasts of Europe, to which the Jews had access only by sea. The descendants of Shem alone seem to have kept possession of the country first inhabited by man, and to have had less of a migratory propensity than their collateral kindred. His sons were Elam, Asshur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram; and Elam is the name for Persia, in the original language of Scripture, derived from its first occupant and settler. Asshur founded Nineveh, the capital of the Assyrian empire, which is uniformly denominated Asshur in Scripture from him. Arphaxad, again, is the lineal progenitor of Abraham, who dwelt in Ur of the Chaldees, till he received a call from God to go in search of another inheritance. Lud is supposed to mean Lydia; and Aram, the name of Shem's fifth son, is the Scripture name for Syria, intimating that it was occupied and peopled by him.

Here, then, we find all the branches of the family of Shem clustered together, as it were, and occupying the choicest countries of the world, from which they could find little desire to emigrate: and, taking all these circumstances together, we are left completely at a loss to account for the early and overflowing population of those countries to the eastward of the possessions of the sons of Shem. Conjecture is always at work where history fails; and we may suppose that Noah, whose patriarchal authority must have been acknowledged by all his descendants, who constituted the whole world, led a colony, collected from the various branches, but principally from the family of Shem, whose locations were to the eastward of all the rest, into India; from which the stream of population extended till it was limited by the Eastern Ocean; if, indeed, we can venture to assign such limits to its progress; for there seems to be little doubt that America was peopled from the east of Asia, and not from the west of Europe or Africa. Shuckford, without either authority or probability, has supposed that Noah himself penetrated as far as the Eastern Ocean, and became the Fo-hi of the Chinese. But there is no improbability in supposing that he directed the course of population towards the East, in fulfilment of what he knew to be the purpose of God, that the whole world should be peopled; for he received the same command that was given to Adam, "be fruitful, and multiply and replenish the earth." —Gen. ix. 1.

That these emigrants towards the East should have remained almost entirely unknown till comparatively modern times, need excite no surprise. There is little interest and no improvement, to be derived from the history of people ignorant of the laws and ordinances of heaven: their changes are, in general, sudden and exterminating: and when they remain permanent in their habits, they exhibit one unvaried scene of ignorance, bigotry, and superstition: in no point of view can they be interesting to a rational mind, except as affording a demonstration, that no length of time will lead to saving knowledge till God reveal his will from heaven. God had fixed the scene of Gospel Revelation in other regions than those of the remote East; and therefore the history of its inhabitants is buried in impenetrable darkness. The promised Messiah was to spring from the family of Abraham, and therefore the history of this family is invested with the highest interest in the Sacred Scriptures, the only authentic record of antiquity; and through it we are brought into contact with some of the most powerful of the ancient nations, and made acquainted with their laws, manners, and religion. When the family of Jacob, the grandson of Abraham, went to settle in Egypt, in consequence of the extraordinary circumstances which led to the exaltation of Joseph, we are introduced to the knowledge of the Egyptian policy and government, and, at last, to the signs and wonders manifested in the punishment of the hardened idolaters, which was completed by the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea. Then we have the wars and wanderings of the Israelites in the wilderness, the subjugation of their enemies, their triumphant entrance into Canaan, and the bloody wars which they waged with its inhabitants, till they were exterminated or subdued.

All this, and all the vicissitudes of the Jews, till Christ was born in Bethlehem, would have been totally uninteresting, had not every event formed a link in that chain which connects heaven and earth, time and eternity, and marks out this world as a pre-ordained theatre for the display of the marvellous wisdom of God. Keeping this consideration in view, even the dry genealogical details of Scripture, which would be totally uninteresting elsewhere, are essential elements of history, as without them we never could have known that God's promises were fulfilled, and that Christ had suffered and died and risen again, "according to the Scriptures."

But still, though we may perceive from such considerations as have been suggested, a sufficient reason why India, and the countries beyond and around it, are unnoticed in sacred history; yet these regions open up a field of deep interest to an inquiring mind. Setting aside their historical records, which pretend to stretch into the remotest antiquity, and which are filled with falsehood and fable, yet it cannot be doubted that they have a literature more ancient than that of any existing people, or, perhaps, than any existing writings, with the exception of the Old Testament Scriptures. European scholars, struck by this singularity, eagerly applied themselves to the study of Oriental literature, and soon mastered all its difficulties; some with the view of finding confirmation of Scripture history, others to supply food for unbelief. Both parties have been disappointed, and the supposed storehouses of Indian literature have been found to contain either a mass of indigested fable, or of inexplicable mysticism.

But if we consider the circumstances under which these nations must have been originally settled, and in which they continued till commerce opened up an intercourse between them and Europe, we shall probably find a state of things conformable to what might be expected among people settled, at first, under patriarchal authority—the first form of government on earth, but who have never afterwards been favoured with the communications of a prophet to reveal the will of heaven. Such, we can have no doubt, are the circumstances under which these Eastern regions were planted and peopled, and such the circumstances under which they remained till European enterprise established a direct and regular communication, and brought into view a most singular State of religion and manners. There we find the most complete Theocracy, the most absolute spiritual domination combined with despotic power in the person of the temporal ruler. In India Proper, indeed, the Brahmins, the priestly caste, have had so much power as to delegate the trouble and cares of government to the kingly caste, reserving to themselves the first place in consideration and honour—a pre-eminence which it would be thought the highest impiety to call in question; and no native prince of India would dare to resist the mandate of a Brahmin. I talk of the Hindoo princes, and not of the Mahometan invaders, who, in many cases, exhibited all the odious features of religious persecution—a practice which could never take place under a Hindoo ruler, whose religion admits of no converts. If we turn to China, we find the offices of priest and king combined in the person of the temporal ruler—the head of the celestial empire, the brother of the sun and moon. If we examine the vast regions comprehended under the name Tartary, we find the Grand Lama of Tibet worshipped as a deity over all these countries. The Emperor of Japan is regarded as purely and entirely a priest; the capital where he dwells is inhabited by none but priests, with their families and attendants.

No man can trace the antiquity of this system in these countries which has remained immutable for, perhaps, thousands of years; stamping the same immutability on the institutions of the state, and the character of the people. But do we not see something resembling it in the constitution under which the patriarchs lived, before a written law was given to Israel? They were the High Priests in their families, and, in addition to this, they exercised the power of life and death over their dependants, and of making war on just occasions. Judah ordered his daughter-in-law to be burned, Gen. xxxviii. 24; and Abraham, though inclined to peace, was prepared for war, and had three hundred and eighteen servants born in his own house, and trained to war, with whom, aided by the men of Mamre, Eshcol, and Aner, he pursued and defeated the five kings who had plundered Sodom and carried off his brother Lot, Gen. xiv. Here, then, we see the regal and sacerdotal offices completely conjoined, which was still more conspicuously manifested in the case of Melchizedek, king of Salem, and "Priest of the most high God."

Now, we have only to suppose that, after that period, God should have given no Revelation, and no prophetic intimations to man, and we may easily conceive that a state of things, very similar to that which now exists in the unenlightened East, would have prevailed throughout every region inhabited by men. That is, we would have been able to trace some of the vestiges of the primeval patriarchal religion, arrested in its progress, from the want of those communications which God made to his chosen people; and corrupted by the inventions and efforts of men, to improve an obviously defective system. And it is not a little remarkable to observe the similarity of features which superstition assumes all over the world. When the Roman Catholic missionaries first found their way into the East, they were astonished to observe so many religious practices bearing the closest resemblance to those of their own church. They found religious mendicants and professed saints out-doing in austerity and self-inflicted martyrdom a that had ever been recorded of the most celebrated devotees of the West; they found a close resemblance also, between many of the rites and ceremonies of the Orientals, and those enjoined by their own church; and with much simplicity, they ascribe this state of thing to the invention of Satan, who had introduced the rite of the Catholic church into India, by way of forestalling the light that was to come from Rome, and teaching the natives to undervalue its communications.

The doctrine of the soul's immortality is held over all the East, in its most extravagant form, viz., that of transmigration from one creature into another, till, at last, it shall be absorbed into the deity. We can trace this doctrine up to the highest antiquity, over all the East; and with the knowledge of this fact, it may well be matter of surprize that any doubt should ever have been entertained as to the existence of the doctrine of immortality among the Jews, in the earliest periods of their history; when, indeed, they held it in much greater purity than at the time when our Lord came "to bring life and immortality to light by the gospel;" at which time a doctrine similar to, if not identical with transmigration, seems to have been very prevalent. See John ix. 2.

This doctrine was also received in Egypt, and was introduced by Pythagoras into Greece, and there can be little doubt that it had its origin in India, and in the remotest antiquity; for the natives of that country are distinguished above those of every other by the immutability of their habits and opinions, and by their aversion to adopt those of other nations. There is another coincidence between them and the ancient Western nations, which cannot be accidental, I mean the worship of the Bull, which exists at this moment in India, in as much vigour as it did elsewhere in the earliest times. This animal, as is well known, was the chief object of worship in ancient Egypt; the idolatrous Israelites worshipped it in the form of the golden calf in the wilderness; and the two golden calves, set up by the kings of the ten revolted tribes at Bethel, and at Dan, had their origin in the same superstition. I pretend not to account for the origin of this revolting impiety; I mention it only as a coincidence of practice between the ancient Eastern and Western branches of the human race, affording a decided proof of a communication between them: and furnishing, along with the doctrine of transmigration, a presumption, as I think, that these opinions and practices had their origin in those Eastern countries, where they have retained their permanent abode, and still exist in all their pristine vigour. But I do not dignify my speculations on this subject, with any higher name than conjecture; I am convinced, however, that we have scarcely yet touched the threshold of knowledge in regard to these interesting regions; and I could wish that a literary mission, composed of men well versed in Hebrew, Greek, Arabic, Sanscrit, and Persic, were sent to explore the history and literature of the East; as I am fully convinced that elucidations of Scripture will yet be derived from that quarter, as satisfactory as the fulfilment of prophecy.

THE IMPORTANCE OF RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION IN LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

It has been long a matter of doubt among medical men how far it might be useful, or even practicable, to bring Christian instruction to bear, upon the minds of the insane. The attempt, however, has been made in some instances, and with the greatest advantage. Thus, in the Lunatic Department of the Charity Workhouse of Edinburgh, an efficient and judicious chaplain, the Rev. Lachlan Maclean, has, for a considerable time past, been conducting religious worship every Sabbath, and the result of his labours cannot be better stated than in his own language, as contained in his Report:—

"Few years have elapsed since the possibility of introducing religious worship into Lunatic Asylums, with any advantage to the inmates, would have been denied even by the humane and intelligent classes of society. The insane, because often beyond the reach of human aid, were thought to be incapable of receiving religious instruction. The animal frame bore a heavy load of suffering, and to it the physician's skill and keeper's watchfulness were, no doubt, unceasingly directed, but the immortal part was forgotten—its wants were left unprovided for. In so far as the public was concerned, this seeming indifference to the eternal interests of the unhappy maniac, proceeded probably from ignorance of his real state. He was supposed to be always the subject of frenzied madness, or despairing stupor. It was either not known or lost sight of, that some of these individuals frequently have intervals of sanity, continuing for several weeks at a time; that others display insanity only on certain points, and that a third class, although deranged on all occasions, and proper objects for confinement, both on their own account and that of others, are yet kept under such control by the firm, but mild discipline of an asylum, as to listen with attention to whatever is said to them, and even, not infrequently, cheerfully to comply with judicious advice. These facts, of course, could only be known by those acquainted with the interior of such institutions; but unfortunately, whatever changes and improvements they might have been the means of producing, they failed to suggest the propriety of endeavouring to ascertain what effect the preaching of the Word of God might have upon the downcast solitary mourners.

"The trial of religious worship on the Sabbath day, was at last, however, made in the Lunatic Asylum, Bristo Port, brought about by a judicious resolution of the Managers of the Charity Workhouse, who, being convinced of the impropriety of a great number of strangers visiting the Lunatic Asylum, devolved upon two of their body, the sole superintendence of that branch of the establishment. These gentlemen, while engaged in discharging their affecting trust, became intimately acquainted with the character and condition of the insane; and were thus convinced of the competency of many to receive religious instruction. The Managers of the Workhouse, in consequence of their recommendation, sanctioned the introduction of divine service into the asylum on the Sabbath, in July 1828. The result, even the first day, was highly satisfactory, and has continued to be so down to the present time, proving, in every respect, the propriety of the arrangement. In general, from forty to forty-five of the patients attend divine service. Their conduct in the chapel might indeed afford a salutary lesson to many in the possession of all their faculties. To these poor maniacs it is no light, trifling, or matter-of-form business to engage in the service of their God. Disposed to look for indifference instead of affection from their fellow-creatures, and cut off from the business and innocent enjoyments of time, many of them go to the chapel delighted with the remembrance that there is a Friend whom adversity cannot change, a blessed Redeemer who visits the humble apartment into which the parent or child cannot, often dares not, enter.

"The duties of the Sabbath have, by their own admission, occupied many a thought during the preceding week. When engaged in these duties, their cares and sorrows are for a time lost sight of, and even the most wretched manifest, by their deportment, the soothing effects of religious feeling. After leaving the chapel, the duties of the morning form the subject of conversation during the rest of the day; and sermons heard in happier scenes are remembered and compared with that delivered by their chaplain.

"Formerly, partly perhaps on account of the surrounding stillness, the Sabbath appeared to be the most disturbed day of the week; ever since the worship of God commenced, it has been the most peaceful, and evidently the most delightful to the patients.

"On different occasions individuals returned, some time after having been discharged, requesting permission again to join in worship with their former partners in affliction; and several who either met the chaplain by accident, or called upon him, have testified in the strongest terms, the happiness they enjoyed when surrounding the family altar during their days of darkness.

"The foregoing general statements might be sufficient to prove the benefit which the insane derive from religious exercises, but a more minute account may perhaps be desired of a field but lately opened through Christian benevolence. To gratify such a wish, the following facts may be stated, illustrative of the conduct of the insane in the chapel, and of the effects produced upon them by the worship of God.

"On one occasion, in the middle of the sermon, a man subject to epilepsy, sunk to the ground in frightful convulsions. If any fear was entertained lest others might have been excited by the distressing spectacle, it was but for a moment; two of his companions, both in general restless and troublesome, voluntarily went to the assistance of the superintendent, and removed the unhappy man. Whenever the door was closed, the rest prepared again to listen with unshaken composure.

"At another time, the boys belonging to the Charity Workhouse, who lead the singing, stopped short in the first line of the Psalm; when one of the most hopeless of the patients immediately raised the tune, discharging in the most becoming manner the duties of the precentor; and, it ought to be added, evidently much to the satisfaction of the congregation. The man in early life had been a precentor, but his conduct on this occasion was so unlike his general behaviour, that it might have caused astonishment, had not instances of equal composure been witnessed every day. Patients, who, during the week, never remain in one position, or even quiet for five minutes at a time, from morning till evening, join, when their Bibles are placed in their hands, in the services of the Sabbath, with a steadiness and reverence, that, but for their appearance and conduct on other occasions, might well cause doubts of their actual insanity to be entertained.

"Two sisters were regularly present at worship; the one was intelligent, but easily, or rather at all times excited; the other was a poor hopeless idiot, conscious of little more than mere existence. The attention of the former to the latter, during sermon, was truly affecting; she watched every movement of her countenance, seeming to live for her alone. When any remark was made pleasing to her own mind, if a momentary smile met her inquiring look, she had her reward; the hope of better days visited her; and anxious that others should participate in her joy, her helpless relative was repeatedly led by the hand, at the close of the service, to the chaplain's desk, with the observations, 'She is much better to-day. Do you not think she is more animated? She understood what you were saying. I hope she will soon be well—as for myself, I am merely stopping here on her account.'

"Shortly after the introduction of divine service, one of the managers, who had been repeatedly present at worship on Sabbath, in order to ascertain how far it was possible to secure the attention of the insane to a lengthened address, privately desired a very restless patient to write an account of the next sermon. Upon receiving the paper, the chaplain was not a little surprised to find that no part of his discourse had escaped the notice of his watchful auditor, whose critique was in every respect most minute.

"About two years ago, a patient expressed himself pleased with the view which had been taken of a text, principally on account of the effect which he hoped it would produce upon one whom he described as being in a state of despair. The chaplain, it need scarcely be said, lost no time in conversing with the unhappy man in presence of the friendly maniac, who listened with the deepest interest to every remark, and endeavoured, in the most affectionate manner, to remove the load that pressed upon the troubled mind. The object of his care was soothed, and, it is pleasing to add, finally left the asylum, the child of better hopes.

"Another patient who was visited by severe bodily disease, as well as mental derangement, seemed to be happy only when engaged in the service of God. While strength remained, he was never absent from the chapel, and even after having been confined to bed during the week, the arms of his brethren in affliction supported him to the place where prayer was wont to be made. When that was found impracticable, the accents of praise, and words of resignation on the bed of death, proclaimed the presence of hope blooming full of immortality.

"On another occasion, after divine service, the chaplain was requested to visit an aged woman, one of his bearers, who had been an inmate of the asylum for the lengthened term of twenty years. Her case had been a bad one. On the bed of death, however, she was restored to the full possession of reason. After joyfully welcoming her visitor, she expressed in the most grateful terms her happiness on account of the change that had taken place in the house. 'Formerly,' said she, 'the Sabbath was the same as any other day, the joyful message of salvation never reached us; now we have the Word preached every Sabbath, and even on the bed of sickness I can hear the glad tidings of peace.' (Her apartment was separated from the chapel merely by a thin wooden partition.) This interesting individual lived for nearly three weeks after the interview just described. To the close of life she manifested the patience and holy confidence of the dying Christian. Only once her mind appeared to be a little disturbed, whether in consequence of a well-known prejudice, or on account of the peculiar character of the house, the writer of this article does not know, as, without asking any questions, he endeavoured to banish the painful feeling. The circumstance alluded to was this: Her situation seemed to cause her some uneasiness, for she expressed a regret that the soul was leaving the body in a state of confinement. In a moment, however, she recovered her composure, and exclaimed, 'how can I complain who have been a great sinner, when I think of the sufferings of my sinless Redeemer.'

"The last case which will be mentioned, is that of a converted Jew.

"The expression of this man's countenance indicated perpetual grief. His was indeed a broken and, to all appearance, a contrite spirit. During divine service, his weeping eyes were constantly fixed upon the preacher, not a word seemed to escape him. When the words were those of comfort, or declaratory of God's goodness, and of the Saviour's love to fallen man, a smile of delight proved the grateful feelings of his heart. When any allusion was made, either in the address or prayer, to those from whom he had separated himself, the tear, the uplifted countenance and folded hands, testified how much he loved his brethren, his kinsmen, according to the flesh, and how strong his desire was that Israel might be saved. To the last, the same affecting tenderness was displayed, until death relieved the broken-hearted sufferer.

"Had nothing more been effected by divine service in the asylum, than merely securing, by this means, to the insane, during a peaceful hour, forgetfulness of their sorrows, and, by breaking in upon the monotonous round of a solitary life, awakening early recollections, thus proving to them that they are still united with, and remembered by their fellow-men, the benefit conferred upon them would have been great; but the foregoing statements will prove that more has been accomplished. The living are soothed and comforted, the dying have been strengthened by the service of God, and the oft-expressed desire of many has been gratified. For, repeatedly before the service of God was established in the asylum, the patients, upon hearing the tolling of the bells for public worship, remarked to the matron, how much they felt the want of religious instruction, and with what delight they would have joined the mulitude that kept the solemn Holy Day. They now receive the wished-for religious instruction, and meet in their solitary mansion to worship Him who is not confined to temples made with men's hands. And highly do they seem to value the blessed privileges. May the happy effects produced upon them by divine truth, be the means of directing public attention to the spiritual necessities of the insane in general, and dispose those to whose care they are intrusted, to introduce the service of the only Physician of the grieved in spirit into similar institutions."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Christianity contrasted with Paganism.—The erection of hospitals and infirmaries for the poor, is one of the distinguishing ornaments and fruits of Christianity, unknown to the wisdom and humanity of pagan times. Compassionate consideration of the poor formed no part of the lessons of pagan philosophy; its genius was too arrogant and lofty to stoop to the children of want and obscurity. It soared in sublime speculation, wasted its strength in endless subtleties and debates; but, among the rewards to which it aspired, it never thought of "the blessedness of him that considereth the poor." You might have traversed the Roman empire, in the zenith of its power, from the Euphrates to the Atlantic, without meeting with a single charitable asylum for the sick. Monuments of pride, of ambition, of vindictive wrath, were to be found in abundance; but not one legible record of commiseration for the poor. It was reserved for the religion, whose basis is humility, and whose element is devotion, to proclaim, with authority, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."
—ROBERT HALL.

Atonement.—Jesus has "put away sin by the sacrifice of himself," Heb. ix. 26; nor need you fear the penalties of the curse, while you view Christ crucified the object of your faith, and make him the only plea for your acceptance before God. Never was justice so magnified before, nor mercy so conspicuously revealed: had the great Creator delivered up a thousand angels, there would not have been a sacrifice nearly equal to that of his not even sparing his well-beloved Son, when he stood as man for men, to bear the vengeance of his wrath. Oh, the justice that demanded such an atonement! Oh the mercy that revealed such a salvation for a ruined world! And can sinners hear of such mercy, and resist it? Sinners doomed to die for sins more in number than the sands on the sea-shore! Oh what obdurate hearts must those be that can be proof against such astonishing love, and refuse to yield themselves to Him who paid so great a price for sinners so worthless and so vile! I beseech you, by the love of God, you that have never yet been captivated by such grace, no longer to delay, but haste to be the first fruits unto the Lord this day in this place; the vilest are welcome; God help you to come!—R. HILL.

The Picture of Repentance.—She is a virgin, fair and lovely; sorrow might seem to stain her beauty, yet, indeed, increaseth it. You shall see her ever sitting in the dust, her knees bowing, her hands wringing, her eyes weeping, her lips praying, her heart beating. She comes out before God, with meat between her teeth, but her soul is humbled with fasting. She is not gorgeously attired—sackcloth is her garment. Not that she thinks these outward forms will content God, but only are the remonstrances of pure sorrow within. And, indeed, at that time, no worldly joy will down, only pardon and mercy in Jesus Christ. She hangs the Word of God as a jewel at her ear, and binds the yoke of Christ as a chain about her neck. Her breast is sore with the stocks of her own penitent hands, which are always lifted up to heaven, or beating her own bosom. Sorrow turns her lumina into flumina, her eyes into fountains of tears. The ground is her bed, she eats the bread of affliction, and drinks the waters of anguish. Her voice is hoarse with crying to heaven, and when she cannot speak, she delivers her mind in groans. The windows of all her senses are shut against vanity. She bids charity stand the porter at her gates, and she gives the poor bread even while herself is fasting. She could wash Christ's feet with as many tears as Mary Magdalen, and, if her estate could reach it, give him a costlier unction. She thinks every man's sin less than her own, every man's good deeds more. Her compunctions are unspeakable, and known only to God. She has vowed to give God no rest, till he have compassion upon her, and seal to her feeling the forgiveness of her sins. Now mercy comes down like a white and glorious angel, and lights on her bosom. The message which mercy brings to her from the King of heaven is, "I have heard thy prayers, and seen thy tears." The Holy Ghost descends as the spirit of comfort, and dries her eyes. Lastly, she is lifted up to heaven, where angels and cherubims sing to her tunes of eternal joy, and God bids immortality set her upon the throne of glory.—ADAMS.

Grounds of Perseverance.—Since we stand not, like Adam, upon our own bottom, but are branches of such a vine as never withers, members of such a head as never dies, sharers in such a spirit as cleanseth, healeth, and purifieth the heart, partakers of such promises as are sealed with the oath of God. Since we live not by our own life, but by the life of Christ; are not led or sealed by our own spirit, but by the spirit of Christ; do not obtain mercy by our own prayers, but by the intercession of Christ; stand not reconciled unto God by our own endeavours, but by the propitiation wrought by Christ, who loved us when we were enemies, and in our blood,—who is both willing and able to save us to the uttermost, and to preserve his own mercies in us; to whose office it belongs to take order, that none who are given unto him be lost; undoubtedly that life of Christ in us, which is thus underpropped, though it be not privileged from temptation, no, not from backslidings, yet is an abiding life: he who raised our souls from death, will either preserve our feet from falling, or if we do fall, will heal our backslidings, and will save us freely.—BISHOP REYNOLDS.

Every Man in his proper Position.—Adversity is the more common experience of God's people, because their faith and grace are too weak and imperfect, to bear the severer trials to which prosperity subjects them. This sphere is too high for the weak Christian to walk in it without becoming dizzy. And though it may be true, that the man who, in adversity and destitution of worldly good, can look up and trust in God, is a strong believer, as we speak, yet, is not his faith stronger by much as the faith of that other man who, while solicited by all the blandishments of worldly success and enjoyment, suffers not his eye or his heart, for one moment, to turn away from God, the portion of his soul? The man, who is conscientiously desirous of filling his sphere in life, will find a very small one to be sufficient to occupy him. He who will leave it unoccupied, its duties undone, its interests uncared for, may enlarge it as he likes, and he will not feel it too much. It is from inadequate views of duty, or indifference to discharge it, that many are solicitous to enlarge or to elevate their sphere. It evinces a higher sense of duty when men are disposed rather to contract and limit.—H.

The Second Coming.—Can we see and feel the awful signs of the times crowding around us, and never hear the whispering of a yet more awful voice, that seems to break, more and more distinctly every day, on the attentive ear! "Behold the Bridegroom is coming! Watch, therefore, for you know neither the day nor the hour when he will come!"—WHITE, ed by Google

SACRED POETRY.

IT IS GOOD TO BE HERE.

METHINKS it is good to be here,
If thou wilt, let us build—but for whom?
Nor Elias, nor Moses appear,
But the shadows of eve that encompass the gloom,
The abode of the dead, and the place of the tomb.

Shall we build to Ambition? Ah! no;
Affrighted he shrinketh away;
For see! they would pin him below
To a small narrow cave, and begirt with cold clay,
To the meanest of reptiles a peer and a prey.

To Beauty? Ah! no; she forgets
The charms which she wielded before;
Nor knows the foul worm that he frets
The skin which, but yesterday, fools could adore,
For the smoothness it held, or the tint which it wore.

Shall we build to the purple of Pride,
The trappings which dizen the proud?
Alas! they are all laid aside,
And here's neither dress nor adornment allowed,
But the long winding sheet and the fringe of the shroud.

To Riches? Alas! 'tis in vain,
Who hid in their turns have been hid;
The treasures are squander'd again;
And here in the grave are all metals forbid,
But the tinsel that shone on the dark coffin lid.

To the Pleasures which mirth can afford,
The revel, the laugh, and the jeer?
Ah! here is a plentiful board,
But the guests are all mute as their pitiful cheer,
And none but the worm is a reveller here.

Shall we build to Affection and Love?
Ah! no; they have wither'd and died,
Or fled with the spirit above,—
Friends, brothers, and sisters, are laid side by side,
Yet none have saluted, and none have replied.

Unto Sorrow? The dead cannot grieve;
Not a sob, not a sigh meets mine ear,
Which compassion itself could relieve;
Ah! sweetly they slumber, nor hope, love, or fear,
Peace, peace is the watchword, the only one here.

Unto Death, to whom monarchs must bow?
Ah! no; for his empire is known,
And here there are trophies enow;
Beneath the cold dead, and around the dark stone,
Are the signs of a sceptre that none may disown.

The first tabernacle to Hope we will build,
And look for the sleepers around us to rise;
The second to Faith, which ensures it fulfill'd;
And the third to the Lamb of the great sacrifice,
Who bequeath'd us them both when He rose to the skies.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Reluctant Confession of an Infidel.—It is stated, in the "Life of Dr Beattie," by Sir W. Forbes, that Mr Hume was one day boasting to Dr Gregory, that, among his disciples in Edinburgh, he had the honour to reckon many of the fair sex. "Now tell me," said the doctor, "whether, if you had a wife or daughter, you would wish them to be your disciples? Think well before you answer me; for I assure you, that whatever your answer is, I will not conceal it." Mr Hume, with a smile, and some hesitation, made this reply:—"No; I believe scepticism may be too sturdy a virtue for a woman."

Who hath Believed our Report?—In a sermon to young men, delivered at the request of the Philadelphia Institute, Dr Bedell said, "I have now been nearly twenty years in the ministry of the Gospel, and I here publicly state to you, that I do not believe I could enumerate three persons, over fifty years of age, whom I have ever heard ask the solemn and eternally momentous question, "What shall I do to be saved?"

A South Sea Islander.—Mr Nott, a missionary in the South Sea Islands, having read on one occasion the third chapter of the Gospel by John to a number of the natives, some of them appeared deeply impressed. When he had finished the 16th verse, one of them, much affected, interrupted him, asking, "What words were those you read? what sounds were those I heard? Let me hear those words again." Mr Nott again read the verse, "God so loved," &c., when the poor pagan rose from his seat and said, "Is that true? can that be true? God love the world, when the world not love him! God so loved the world, as to give his Son to die! that man might not die! can that be true?" Mr Nott read the verse again, told him it was true, and that it was the message God had sent to them, and that whosoever believeth in him, would not perish, but be happy after death. The overwhelming feelings of the wondering pagan were too powerful for expression or for restraint. At length he burst into tears; and as these rolled down his dark visage, he withdrew, to meditate in private on the amazing love of God, which had that day touched his soul; and there was every reason to believe, that he was afterwards raised to share the joys of divine peace, the fruit of the love of God shed abroad in his heart.

A Rabbi.—When the late Rev. Claudius Buchanan was travelling in India, he obtained from the Jews in the interior of that country a very singular copy of the translation of the New Testament into Hebrew, made in the sixteenth century. The translator was a learned Rabbi, and the translation is, in general, faithful. The design of the translator was to make an accurate version of the New Testament, for the express purpose of confuting it, and of repelling the arguments of his neighbours, the Syrian, or St. Thomé, Christians. But behold the providence of God! the translator became himself a convert to Christianity: his own work subdued his unbelief; and he lived and died in the faith of Christ. This manuscript is now in the public library at Cambridge.

Princess Anne.—When the Princess Anne, daughter of Charles the First, who died the 8th of December, 1640, lay upon her death-bed, and nature was almost spent, she was requested by one of her attendants to pray: she said that she was not able to say her long prayer, meaning the Lord's Prayer, but she would say her short one, "Lighten mine eyes, O Lord, that I sleep not the sleep of death." The little creature had no sooner pronounced these words, than she expired: she was not quite four years of age.

ON THE ADVANTAGES TO BE DERIVED BY THE CHRISTIAN FROM THE STUDY OF NATURAL SCIENCE.

BY THE REV. JAMES BRODIE,
Minister of Monimail.

It is generally allowed in the present day, that the advancement of education is the best means of promoting the happiness of man. The public attention is turned to the erection of schools and other seminaries of learning; the labours of the ingenious are employed in facilitating the acquisition of knowledge, and the resources of wealth and influence are engaged in promoting the instruction of the young and of the labouring classes of society. And the mind must be dark, that does not approve of the object proposed; and the heart must be hard, that does not wish it success.

While, however, all unite with Solomon in saying "Wisdom is the principal thing, therefore get wisdom;" very different opinions are entertained with respect to the kind of knowledge that should be disseminated. Some earnestly urge the establishment of schools in which the various branches of human learning may be taught, while religious education is excluded from their scheme. Others are zealous for the diffusion of Gospel truth, who look with suspicion on human learning, and regard the study, more especially, of natural science with distrust.

There is an error in either extreme, and a few observations on the advantages severally resulting from these pursuits, may tend by the blessing of God to reconcile the parties, and lead them to see, that "these they ought to have done, and not leave the other undone."

The study of science, that is, the examination of the works of nature, is one of the most delightful employments that can engage our attention. There are in it subjects suited to every peculiarity of intellect; facts, for the observer to discover, and general laws, for the philosopher to elucidate. It lifts the soul above the grovelling pleasures of sense, by giving a taste for higher enjoyments. It expands, refines, and elevates the mind.

It is true, that when improperly engaged in, the pursuit will not prove beneficial. If knowledge puff up instead of edifying, then the study of science will be injurious, and the study of Scripture may prove a curse. If we examine the wonders of the material universe while we continue unmindful of Him who made them, our reasonings may lead to infidelity or deism; but if we are careful to trace the hand of God in all his works, we will rise from the examination of the creature, filled with admiration of the great Creator. When we look up unto the heavens, and consider the moon and the stars, which God hath ordained, we will, like David, exclaim, "How excellent is thy name in all the earth!" and, "What is man that thou art mindful of him!" When, in conformity to our Saviour's counsel, we "behold the lilies of the field, how they grow," and "consider the fowls of the air, how they are fed," by them we will be taught the workings of providence, and learn to trust in our heavenly Father's care.

But while the acquisition of useful knowledge is thus beneficial, an acquaintance with the Bible is better far. In it we have subjects more varied, more delightful, more exalted; subjects suited to the weakest powers, yet more than sufficient to exercise the mightiest mind. A knowledge of Gospel truth raises the heart from earth to heaven, and extends the view from time to eternity. The Scriptures alone, point out the path of duty and the way to peace. They only exhibit Jehovah as he is. The character of God is but dimly shewn in the works of nature, while all the brightness of the divine perfections is manifest in the work of Christ. "By the Church is made known" even "to principalities and powers the manifold wisdom of God." He who reads the Word of the Lord in humble dependance on the blessing of the Spirit, is thus enabled to know Him,—is necessarily led to love and adore Him,—and is prepared for seeing Him face to face, and for being made like Him in the world to come. The time will arrive when human learning shall prove utterly vain, when science shall vanish, and the very elements about which it is conversant shall melt in the flame; but, amid the wreck of worlds, the Word of God shall remain unchanged, and its followers unmoved.

If the advantages resulting from the study of science be contrasted with those that are derived from a knowledge of the Bible, we cannot, for a moment, hesitate in accounting Religion "the better part which shall not be taken away." But these pursuits should not be contrasted, they ought rather to be combined. Creation and redemption have one common Author, and the study of the one, can never be inconsistent with a regard for the other.

If science be employed as a handmaid to Religion, there is nothing that can afford a more suitable preparation for exploring the mysteries of redemption. By the acquisition of languages, and by an acquaintance with general literature, the memory and reflective faculties are improved, the taste is refined, and a relish is given for the sublime and beautiful, so abundantly found in the Word of God. By a knowledge of history and of human character, we are enabled to value aright the morality of the Gospel, and to appreciate its beneficial effects upon society. But the study of science prepares us for taking a wider view. By teaching us how to estimate the beauty of harmonious contrivance, it shews the grandeur of the Gospel scheme, considered as a whole; and by making us acquainted with the workmanship of the great Framer of the universe, it carries home the conviction that creation and redemption have one common source, and that He alone who contrived the one should have devised the other.

The mere man of taste may be satisfied with the embellishments of pagan mythology, or popish fable; but he who has studied the works of nature scorns their incongruous fancies. Accustomed to the exercise of that faculty, by which we estimate the adaptation of means to an end, when he contemplates the work of Redemption, he sees in the fitting together of the various parts, the manifold wisdom of Him who is wise in counsel. When he traces the developement of the glorious scheme, from its origin, in the purpose of eternity, to its final consummation, he discovers new beauties as the various dispensations gradually unfold, he finds each part full of wisdom and full of love, every portion deserving gratitude and praise, while the grandeur of the harmonious whole, and the extent of God's redeeming grace, as thereby manifested, are seen in that transcendent splendour which passeth all understanding.

THE EARLY DAYS OF MARTIN LUTHER.

THE life of Luther is so intimately connected with the important events of the period in which he lived, that it is difficult to view the man apart from the Reformer. In the following sketch, however, we are desirous as much as possible, to limit ourselves to the personal history and experience of this distinguished individual previously to that period when he became conspicuous in the world as an opponent of the corruptions of the Romish Church.

Martin Luther was born at Eisleben, a small town in Saxony, on the 10th of November 1483. His parents, who appear to have been noted for their industry and integrity, and unostentatious piety, paid peculiar attention, not merely to his education at school, but to his religious training at home; and, accordingly, we find, that through life, Luther retained an affectionate remembrance of the home of his early days. The vigorous energy of Luther's mind was soon apparent. At the age of twenty, having finished his literary studies with marked success, he obtained the degree of Master of Arts; and, more in accordance with the wishes of his parents than his own inclination, he began to prosecute the study of Law. A remarkable providential occurrence, however, at length determined him to change his profession. The sudden death, whether by violence or accident is disputed, of an intimate friend and companion, made a deep impression upon his mind, and seems to have thrown him for a time into a state of melancholy. One day while labouring under this depression of spirits, he happened, during a walk in the fields, to be overtaken by a violent storm of thunder and lightning, which so alarmed him, that on the spot he formed the resolution to withdraw from the world and retire into a monastery for life. To this proposal his father, who was a man of strong practical good sense, was much opposed. "Take care," said he to the rash determined youth, "that you are not ensnared by a delusion of the devil." All remonstrances, however, were ineffectual; without delay Martin entered a monastery at Erfurt.

In vain did Luther attempt to fly from himself, and to dissipate amid the endless formalities of the Romish ritual, that feeling of restless inquiry which seems to have taken possession of his mind. Under the influence of those serious impressions which he had imbibed under his father's roof, he dwelt much in his seclusion on the truths of religion. As yet his views were vague and indistinct; but still, he felt that there was something which was absolutely necessary to be obtained before he could expect deliverance from the gloomy fears and forebodings with which he was beset. A work of grace, in fact, appears to have begun in his soul. He was labouring under a deep-rooted conviction of his sin, and although he struggled to quiet his troubled conscience by the constant observance of the numerous ceremonies which the Church of Rome demanded, all was unavailing; his sadness and almost desponding melancholy continued to increase rather than diminish. At length, to seek relief in the sympathy, if not the advice of another, he resolved to unburden his griefs to Staupitz, the vicar-general of that order of Monks to which he himself belonged. Staupitz, besides being a man of considerable sagacity, had himself been subject to feelings similar to those which oppressed the mind of Luther. His reply, accordingly, is somewhat remarkable: "You do not know," said he, "how useful and necessary this trial may be to you; God does not thus exercise you for nothing: you will one day see, that he will employ you as his servant for great purposes."

At this time Luther was ignorant of the Scriptures; but the early instructions of pious parents, aided by a natural tenderness of conscience, and strong reflective powers, led him to entertain more vivid impressions of divine things than the extent of his knowledge would seem to warrant. He knew enough to lead him to thirst after still further acquaintance with the truth. And at length, in the wise providence of God, his wishes, in this respect, were most unexpectedly gratified. In the course of the second year after his admission into the monastery at Erfurt, he met with a Latin Bible in the library. This was to him like the opening of the eyes to the blind. He perused the Word of God for himself, and while poring, with earnest assiduity, over the sacred page, ever and anon did he lift up his soul in prayer to the Father of light, that he might be enabled to understand the Scriptures. Now was his prayer unanswered. The light of divine truth shone into his soul with a brightness such as he had never before beheld. His study of the Bible was incessant, and under the influence of its refreshing statements, his gloom gave place to a steady cheerfulness, founded on the possession of that "peace which the world cannot give, and which it cannot take away."

In the year 1507, he was ordained, and so highly was his learning, both secular and theological, appreciated, that in the following year he was invited by the vicar-general to the Professorship of Philosophy at Wittemberg. Here he became distinguished, both as a teacher of philosophy, and a popular preacher. His fame spread far and wide. While resident in the monastery, he had learned from an old monk the doctrine of justification by free grace, and this vital, this fundamental truth, he proclaimed with a boldness which attracted peculiar attention. "This monk," exclaimed Martin Polichius, a doctor of law and medicine, "will confound all the doctors, will exhibit new doctrines, and reform the whole Roman Church; for he is intent on reading the writings of the prophets and apostles, and he depends on the Word of Jesus Christ; this, neither the philosophers nor the sophists can subvert." Such a declaration, more especially from the mouth of a man who was himself accounted a wonder of his age, clearly shewed that Luther had made an open profession of his views in regard to the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel, and more especially in regard to that vitally important doctrine, which he himself afterwards termed the article of a standing or a falling church—Justification by free grace, through faith in the righteousness of the Redeemer.

This cardinal tenet seems, at an early period of his Scripture studies, to have assumed the pre-eminence in his mind, which justly belongs to it as the fundamental truth of Revelation. And the more strongly he himself felt its importance, so much the more zealously did he labour to make it known to others. Such was the fervour, in fact, and holy eloquence, which characterized the preaching of Luther, that he was regarded as one of the first orators of his time. The theme which chiefly occupied his attention at this period, both in his private meditations, and in his pulpit labours, may be learned from the following extract of a letter which he wrote to a friend:—"I desire to know what your soul is doing; whether wearied at length of its own righteousness, it learns to refresh itself, and to rest in the righteousness of Christ. The temptation of presumption in our age is strong in many, and especially in those who labour to be just and good with all their might, and, at the same time, are ignorant of the righteousness of God, which, in Christ, is conferred upon us, with a rich exuberance of gratuitous liberality. They seek in themselves to work that which is good, in order that they may have a confidence of standing before God, adorned with virtues and merits, which is an impossible attempt. You, my friend, used to be of this opinion, or rather this mistake; so was I; but now I am fighting against the error, but have not yet prevailed."

Four years before writing this letter, Luther had been appointed Professor of Divinity at Wittemberg, an office which, of course, led him to a still more diligent perusal of the Sacred Volume. At first, he had access only to the Vulgate, or Latin version of the Bible, but, anxious to draw his knowledge of divine truth from the originals, he directed his attention, with the utmost perseverance and success, to the study of the Greek and Hebrew languages. This enabled him to understand still more clearly the precious Word of Inspiration,—that Word which, as he advanced in the knowledge of it, proved spirit and life to his soul. His views became clearer and more deeply impressive. He had not yet attacked the errors of the Romish Church, but his knowledge of the fundamental doctrines of religious truth was such, as to lead many to regard him as a heretic. There is an interesting incident which is recorded of Luther, and which places in a strong light the undeviating fidelity with which he preached the Gospel in the face of all opposition. Having been requested to preach before the Duke of Saxony, he dwelt at great length upon the freeness of the Gospel offer even to the chief of sinners. An honourable matron who had heard the sermon, was asked by the Duke, at dinner, how she liked the discourse. "I should die in peace," she said, "if I could hear such another sermon." Enraged at this reply, the Duke exclaimed, "I would give a large sum of money that a sermon of this sort, which encourages men in a licentious course of life, had never been preached." Within a month after this conversation, the lady was confined to bed with sickness, and died rejoicing in the belief of the glorious truths which Luther had preached.

The time had now arrived when, though reluctantly, Luther felt himself necessitated to enter the field against the gross errors of that Church to which he belonged. In the course of his residence at Rome, on a mission which he had undertaken in connection with the affairs of the Augustinian Monks, he had been shocked at the unbecoming and even immoral conduct of the clergy. But still his attachment to the Romish Church was great, and while he himself stood aloof from those of his clerical brethren who disgraced their office, he made no attempt to expose them to the world. And it was not until he was forced to assume the decided position of a Reformer, that he took steps to vindicate himself from the charge of heresy which was not unfrequently brought against him in private.

At length a circumstance occurred, which roused the indignation of Luther. One John Tetzel, a Dominican Friar, had been employed to sell indulgences, with the view of recruiting the exhausted treasuries of Pope Leo X. This profligate friar, whose presumption and effrontery knew no bounds, gave absolution, not only for past, but also for future sins, and scattered his indulgences with a profusion which shocked even those who were disposed to pay respect to the demands of the Papal See. Luther was enraged at the conduct of Tetzel, and made no secret of his disapprobation. He wrote to the Archbishop of Mentz, calling upon him to put a stop to such shameless excesses. His remonstrances, however, were unheeded. Thus frustrated in his endeavours to interest his ecclesiastical superiors, he published to the world his opinions in regard to the whole subject, including indulgences, purgatory, and other kindred topics; at the same time inviting any one publicly to dispute with him. Tetzel, alarmed at the appearance of Luther's exposure, promptly replied, attempting to refute the arguments which had been urged against the doctrines of the Church of Rome. The Church was roused upon the subject; and it is said, that at the first public disputation, no fewer than three hundred monks were present. Fair argument, however, was not sufficient for the ghostly Dominican. He ventured even to wreak his vengeance upon the Augustinian heretic, as he termed the Reformer, by causing his publication to be burned,—an act of pitiful spite, which was speedily retaliated upon the work of Tetzel by the disciples of Luther at Wittemberg. The Reformer himself was far from sanctioning this rash act on the part of his followers; but, on the contrary, alluding to the report which was industriously circulated by his enemies, that he had been the instigator of the deed, he thus expresses himself: "I wonder you could believe that I was the author of the deed. Think you that I am so destitute of common sense, as to stigmatize, in such a manner, a person in so high an office? I know better the rules of ecclesiastical subordination, and have some regard to my own character, both as a monk and a theologian, than to act so."

The controversy, however, was not limited to Luther and Tetzel; it called forth the strenuous exertions of others also, and among the rest, of Henry Duke of Brunswick, who afterwards distinguished himself in the cause of the Reformation. Luther continued for several years to propagate his tenets, by publishing theses, not only on the subject of indulgences, but also upon the cardinal doctrines of Christianity. Nor was the contest confined to Germany. From the very seat of the Papal power there issued severe attacks upon the new doctrines, which, accordingly, Luther was compelled to defend. In these answers to the Romanists, even his opponents admitted that a spirit of gentleness was obviously discernible. At this time, also, he wrote to his own diocesan, and to his vicar-general. In his letter to the former he expresses himself with that undaunted confidence which might be expected to characterize a person who was conscious of being engaged in a righteous cause. "I fear not," says he, "bulls and menaces; it is the audaciousness and the ignorance of men that induce me to stand forth, though with much reluctance; were there not a weighty cause for it, no one out of my own little sphere should ever hear of me. If the cause I defend be not the work of God, I would have nothing to do with it; let it perish. Let Him alone have glory, to whom alone glory belongs." The position which Luther now occupied was one which harassed and distressed his mind. It was with the utmost reluctance that he felt himself compelled to oppose the Church with which he was connected, and, more especially, as the ground of his opposition was of such vital importance. Unwilling, however, to be considered as disclaiming the authority of the Pope, as his enemies alleged that he did, he requested his faithful friend and patron, Staupitz, to transmit his writings to Rome, that all misrepresentation of his doctrines might be prevented. "Not," says he, "that I would involve you in my dangers. I desire alone to stand the shock of it. Let Christ see to it, whether the cause be mine or His. To the kind admonitions of my friends, who would warn me of danger, my answer is, The poor man has no fears. I protest that property, reputation, and honours shall be of no estimation with me, compared with the defence of the truth. I have only a frail body to lose, and that weighed down with constant fatigue. If, in obedience to God, I lose it through violence or fraud, what is the loss of a few hours of life? sufficient for me is the lovely Redeemer and advocate, my Lord Jesus Christ, to whose praise I will sing as long as I live." He even addressed a letter to the Pope himself, explanatory of his conduct, and couched in such language as clearly shews, that at this period, he had no intention of separating from the Church.

It is interesting to observe how clear, even at this early period of his history, Luther's views of divine truth were. The Bible had been for years his constant study; prayer had been his unceasing exercise, and in the habitual use of these two means of grace, his knowledge of the Gospel had become at once extensive and accurate. In the doctrines of free grace, more particularly, Luther gloried. "A Christian," to use his own words, "may glory that in Christ he has all things; that all the righteousness and merits of Christ are his own, by virtue of that spiritual union with him which he has by faith; and, on the other hand, that all his sins are no longer his, but Christ, through the same union, bears the burden of them. And this is the confidence of Christians, this is the refreshment of their consciences, that by faith our sins cease to be ours judicially, because they are laid on him, 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the Sin of the world.'" The righteousness of Christ, the Reformer viewed as the sole foundation of the sinner's hope, and he accordingly urged it, with the utmost earnestness, upon all who came within the sphere of his influence.

Thus pure were the religious sentiments of Luther, at the outset of his career as a Reformer, and before his doctrines had assumed such a prominence, as to attract the attention and call down upon him the wrath of the Papal See. The Almighty had been gradually training him for the important duties which were yet to devolve upon him, and which could only be discharged by one who was specially enlightened by the Spirit of God. His work was arduous, and therefore he was endowed with peculiar qualifications, both of an intellectual and moral kind. But to what extent, and by what means, he succeeded, under God, in carrying forward the glorious cause of the Reformation, will probably engage our attention in a future number.

THE VASTNESS OF THE UNIVERSE.

IN the admirable Bridgewater Treatise of Professor Whewell, the following interesting and impressive observations occur.

"The aspect of the world, even without any of the peculiar lights which science throws upon it, is fitted to give us an idea of the greatness of the power by which it is directed and governed, far exceeding any notions of power and greatness which are suggested by any other contemplation. The number of human beings who surround us—the various conditions requisite for their life, nutrition, well-being, all fulfilled; the way in which these conditions are modified, as we pass in thought to other countries, by climate, temperament, habit;—the vast amount of the human population of the globe thus made up; yet man himself but one among almost endless tribes of animals; the forest, the field, the desert, the air, the ocean, all teeming with creatures whose bodily wants are as carefully provided for as his;—the sun, the clouds, the winds, all attending, as it were, on these organized beings;—a host of beneficent energies, unwearied by time and succession, pervading every corner of the earth; this spectacle cannot but give the contemplator a lofty and magnificent conception of the Author of so vast a work, of the Ruler of so wide and rich an empire, of the Provider for so many and varied wants, the Director and Adjuster of such complex and jarring interests.

"But when we take a more exact view of this spectacle, and aid our vision by the discoveries which have been made of the structure and extent of the universe, the impression is incalculably increased.

"The number and variety of animals, the exquisite skill displayed in their structure, the comprehensive and profound relations by which they are connected, far exceed any thing which we could have beforehand imagined. But the view of the universe expands also on another side. The earth, the globular body thus covered with life, is not the only globe in the universe. There are, circling about our own sun, six others, so far as we can judge, perfectly analogous in their nature: besides our moon and other bodies analogous to it. No one can resist the temptation to conjecture, that these globes, some of them much larger than our own, are not dead and barren; that they are, like ours, occupied with organization, life, intelligence. To conjecture is all that we can do, yet even by the perception of such a possibility, our view of the domain of nature is enlarged and elevated. The outermost of the planetary globes of which we have spoken is so far from the sun, that the central luminary must appear to the inhabitants of that planet, if any there are, no larger than Venus does to us; and the length of their year will be 82 of ours.

"But astronomy carries us still onwards. It teaches us that, with the exception of the planets already mentioned, the stars which we see have no immediate relation to our system. The obvious supposition is that they are of the nature and order of our sun: the minuteness of their apparent magnitude agrees, on this supposition, with the enormous and almost inconceivable distance which, from all the measurements of astronomers, we are led to attribute to them. If, then, these are suns, they may, like our sun, have planets revolving round them; and these may, like our planet, be the seats of vegetable, and animal, and rational life:—we may thus have in the universe worlds, no one knows how many, no one can guess how varied; but however many, however varied, they are still but so many provinces in the same empire, subject to common rules, governed by a common power.

“But the stars which we see with the naked eye are but a very small portion of those which the telescope unveils to us. The most imperfect telescope will discover some that are invisible without it; the very best instrument perhaps does not shew us the most remote. The number of stars which crowd some parts of the heavens is truly marvellous: Dr Herschel calculated that a portion of the milky-way, about ten degrees long and two and a-half broad, contained 258,000. In a sky so occupied, the moon would eclipse 2000 of such stars at once.

“We learn, too, from the telescope, that even in this province the variety of nature is not exhausted. Not only do the stars differ in colour and appearance, but some of them grow periodically fainter and brighter, as if they were dark on one side, and revolved on their axis. In other cases two stars appear close to each other, and in some of these cases it has been clearly established, that the two have a motion of revolution about each other; thus exhibiting an arrangement new to the astronomer, and giving rise, possibly, to new conditions of worlds. In other instances, again, the telescope shews, not luminous points, but extended masses of dilute light, like bright clouds, hence called nebulae. Some have supposed that such nebulae, by further condensation, might become suns; but for such opinions we have nothing but conjecture. Some stars again have undergone permanent changes, or have absolutely disappeared, as the celebrated star of 1572, in the constellation Cassiopea.

“If we take the whole range of created objects in our own system, from the sun down to the smallest animalcule, and suppose such a system, or something in some way analogous to it, to be repeated for each of the millions of stars which the telescope reveals to us, we obtain a representation of the material universe; at least a representation which to many persons appears the most probable one. And if we contemplate this aggregate of systems as the work of a Creator, which in our own system we have found ourselves so irresistibly led to do, we obtain a sort of estimate of the extent through which his creative energy may be traced, by taking the widest view of the universe which our faculties have attained.

“If we consider, further, the endless and admirable contrivances and adaptations which philosophers and observers have discovered in every portion of our own system; every new step of our knowledge shewing us something new in this respect; and if we combine this consideration with the thought how small a portion of the universe our knowledge includes, we shall, without being able at all to discern the extent of the skill and wisdom displayed in the creation, see something of the character of the design, and of the copiousness and ampleness of the means which the scheme of the world exhibits. And when we see that the tendency of all the arrangements which we can comprehend is to support the existence, to develop the faculties, to promote the well-being of these countless species of creatures, we shall have some impression of the beneficence and love of the Creator, as manifested in the physical government of his creation.

“The above estimates are vast in amount, and almost oppressive to our faculties. They belong to the measurement of the powers which are exerted in the universe, and of the spaces through which their efficacy reaches (for the most distant bodies are probably connected both by gravity and light.) But these estimates cannot be said so much to give us any notion of the powers of the Deity, as to correct the errors we should fall into by supposing his powers to have any limits like those which belong to our faculties:—by supposing that numbers, and spaces, and forces, and combinations, which would overwhelm us, are any obstacle to the arrangements which his plan requires. We can easily understand that to an intelligence surpassing ours in degree only, that may be easy which is impossible to us. The child who cannot count beyond four, the savage who has no name for any number above five, cannot comprehend the possibility of dealing with thousands and millions: yet a little additional development of the intellect makes such numbers conceivable and manageable. The difficulty which appears to reside in numbers and magnitudes and stages of subordination, is one produced by judging from ourselves—by measuring with our own sounding line; when that reaches no bottom, the ocean appears unfathomable. Yet in fact, how is a hundred millions of times a great distance? how is a hundred millions of times a great ratio? Not in itself; this greatness is no quality of the numbers which can be proved like their mathematical properties; on the contrary, all that absolutely belongs to number, space, and ratio, must, we know demonstrably, be equally true of the largest and the smallest. It is clear that the greatness of these expressions of measure has reference to our faculties only. Our astonishment and embarrassment take for granted the limits of our own nature. We have a tendency to treat a difference of degree and of addition, as if it were a difference of kind and of transformation. The existence of the attributes, design, power, goodness, is a matter depending on obvious grounds: about these qualities there can be no mistake: if we can know anything, we can know these attributes when we see them. But the extent, the limits of such attributes must be determined by their effects; our knowledge of their limits by what we see of the effects. Nor is any extent, any amount of power and goodness improbable beforehand; we know that these must be great, we cannot tell how great. We should not expect before hand to find them bounded; and therefore when the boundless prospect opens before us, we may be bewildered, but we have no reason to be shaken in our conviction of the reality of the cause from which their effects proceed: we may feel ourselves incapable of following the train of thought, and may stop, but we have no rational motive for quitting the point which we have thus attained in tracing the divine perfections.

“On the contrary, those magnitudes and proportions which leave our powers of conception far behind;—that ever-expanding view which is brought before us, of the scale and mechanism, the riches and magnificence, the population and activity of the universe;—may reasonably serve, not to disturb, but to enlarge and elevate our conceptions of the Maker and Master of all; to feed an ever-growing admiration of His wonderful nature; and to excite a desire to be able to contemplate more steadily, and conceive less inadequately, the scheme of his government and the operation of his power.”

A MISSIONARY SCENE IN CAFFRARIA.*

“MANY minutes had not elapsed before we came up to a newly-established Hottentot village, near the confluence of the Mankazana and Kat Rivers. It consisted of thirty-one small wattled cottages, forming a complete circle, with cattle and sheep folds in the centre. There were seven or eight waggons belonging to the hamlet, a considerable herd of cows and oxen, a fine flock of sheep, and several good horses. The object of my visit being announced, an old plough-share was immediately hung up, and used as their substitute for a bell. Nearly one hundred and fifty persons, inclusive of children, were hereby called together in the course of a few seconds, and assembled beneath the spreading branches of a large tree. I had with me an English pocket Testament, from which my usual practice was to translate, into the vernacular tongue, as occasion might require; but wishing to ascertain whether any of them possessed a copy of the Sacred Scriptures, I asked for a Bible; upon which, an old man who formerly belonged to the Wittie River Station, instantly produced a Dutch Testament. On my opening it, a small pamphlet fell out, which proved to be a copy of the Ordinance issued by the Lieutenant-Governor, General Bourke, under date of July 17, 1828, for the improvement of the condition of Hottentots, and other aborigines of colour, and for the consolidation and amendment of laws affecting such persons, agreeably to the recommendation of His Majesty's Commissioners of Inquiry. This, of course, induced me to ask why they had treasured up this document in the Sacred Volume: ‘Because,’ said one of the elders, ‘it is God's Word that teaches us how to make a right use of our privileges; and therefore ought the Bible and the Ordinance to be kept together.’

“Shortly after the conclusion of divine service, several other Bushmen made their appearance, whose garb and manners furnished indubitable evidence of their having but just emerged from the gloomy recesses of the forest, or the still more dismal chambers of the cavern. The real condition, civil as well as moral, of this race is truly deplorable. We cannot contemplate their circumstances, or even look upon their withered countenances, without inexpressible pain of heart. Hunted for generations back, like partridges upon the mountains, they have become desperate; their hand is uplifted against every one, and every one's hand against them. Robbed of their country, and driven beyond the ordinary range of men, they have been compelled to seek refuge and dwelling-places in the glens of the desert, the thickets of the jungle, or the clefts of the precipice. There it is that we must, in general, look for them, on the points of projecting crags, or upon the summits of the highest rocks, watchfully surveying all beneath. With eagle-eyed fierceness, with bows fully bent, darts deeply poisoned, and an air that betrays less fear than hostility, they stand ever prepared to take fatal aim at all who may have temerity enough to approach their rampart. The following strikingly descriptive lines on the Kaffer, by Mr Thomas Pringle, apply in a great measure to the Bushman also:

‘Lo! there he crouches by the kloof's dark side,
Eying the farmer's lowing herds afar;
Impatient watching till the evening star
Lead forth the twilight dim, that he may glide,
Like panther to the prey. With free-born pride
He scorns the herdman, nor regards the scar
Of recent wound; but burnishes for war
His assegai, and targe of buffalo-hide.
Is he a robber?—True it is a strife
Between the black-skinn'd bandit and the white.
A savage?—Yes; though slow to aim at life,
Evil for evil fierce he doth requite.
A heathen?—Teach him, then, thy better creed,
Christian! if thou deserv'st that name indeed.’

“As an enemy, they are much more formidable than the Kaffer; not indeed on account of their number, nor of muscular strength: for in both these respects they are far inferior to any of the other tribes. But, besides their weapons being of a much more deadly kind, their mode of warfare is such as to place an antagonist in the most perilous situation, ere he is at all aware of danger. So exceedingly diminutive are they in person, that they easily manage to conceal themselves behind large stones or ant-heaps; whence they are able, at pleasure, to lodge a dart in the vitals of their victim. When thus lying in ambush, this Lilliputian archer seats himself upon the ground, places his foot against the bow, directs his arrow with his left hand, and then draws it with his right. And such is the force with which he discharges the dart, that it not only pierces the person or animal at which it is shot, but sometimes goes completely through them.

“After spending the greater part of the evening in conversation with the people, I retired into an old waggon, where a straw mat (the best bed they could afford) had been spread for my accommodation. But when lying down my attention was arrested by a singular noise that appeared to come from one of the more distant huts. Curiosity induced me to rise and follow the sound, rendered doubly dolorous by the extreme darkness of the night, and the occasional howlings of the wolf. It at length led me to a low wretched hovel, the interior of which presented one of the most melancholy scenes I ever witnessed; language indeed fails to give anything like a complete idea of the strong delusion which pervaded the minds of its inmates.

“Some of the little strangers above-mentioned having professed an acquaintance with the nature and causes of disease, and likewise with the means of removing it, two or three sick Hottentots had solicited their aid. They first assembled at the dwelling of the afflicted persons, and performed over them a number of ludicrous antics preparatory to the ‘great ceremony.’ One stood muttering in a corner; and another sat perched upon poles placed in an horizontal position; whilst two others bounded about on the floor with slow but regular step. All were apparently weeping in a most heart-rending manner, and thus signifying to the patients that the disease was of a very dangerous character. They continued until their feeling seemed to be wrought up to the highest pitch, rendering them like men wholly intoxicated. One of them fell to the ground with such violence as very seriously to bruise his head, and produce temporary insensibility. I at first concluded that they had been using some kind of narcotic but was in this mistaken. When opportunity presented itself, I remonstrated with them respecting the folly of such a mode of proceeding; and the consequence was, a momentary cessation. But being bent upon what they deemed a duty, their operations were soon recommenced.

"On going to the hut a second time I found it crowded to excess. A large fire was burning in the centre: four Bushmen, and two women belonging to the same tribe, were dancing, singing, clapping their hands, and occasionally shouting in the wildest manner imaginable. With the intention of detecting, the better to expose the fallacy of their arts, I placed myself in a corner which commanded a full view of all their manoeuvres. The appearance of the men was as ugly and demon-like as can be conceived. One had tufts of hair attached to his head in the form of horns; another, who was almost naked, had an appendage to his back, resembling a wild beast's tail; a third bore in his hand a kind of reed, as a wand, with which he occasionally touched different parts of the patient's body, and through which he at other times puffed and blew upon those around him; and a fourth, with a small calabash, or gourd, full of pebbles, in each hand, kept up a tremendous and deafening rattle. The scene was occasionally terrific beyond description, as one and then another of the little conjurors became completely frantic, and assumed all the appearance of maniacs. They kicked the fire about with their feet: sighed, groaned, and yelled most hideously. Symptoms of stupor, or insensibility, were regarded as proofs that the evil influence under which the patients had been suffering was leaving them, and entering the individual affected. His magical powers were consequently deemed far superior to those of his fellows, who, nevertheless drew to his relief, and by means of the wand, and certain strange efforts, affected to deliver, and restore him to his senses again. Sometimes, after shaking and otherwise roughly handling, blowing upon, or applying the mouth to some particular part of the body, the sorcerers would gravely turn round and exhibit a quantity of goat's hair, a few bird's feathers, a piece of thong, or a number of straws, saying they had extracted them from the head, the stomach, the legs, or the arms of the patient. Palpable as were these absurdities, they nevertheless instantly obtained full credence among the spectators, who, with uplifted hands, would exclaim, 'No wonder that A. or B. were so ill!'

"I went to the poor deluded creatures the following morning, and endeavoured to make them sensible of the vanity and wickedness of their tricks, challenged them with the various falsehoods they had told; and in proof of the inefficacy of all their exertions pointed to the sick persons themselves, who, from having been kept sitting before a large fire, during the greater part of the night, and consequently prevented from taking proper rest, were even worse than before. They answered me not a word, but afterwards acknowledged the truth of all that had been said; and the only plea they attempted to set up in justification of their system was, as usual, 'that such had been the custom of their forefathers from time immemorial.' How melancholy the reflection! From time immemorial, millions have thus made lies their only refuge in times of trouble! from time immemorial, whole nations of men have thus been sinking in the vortex of delusion! Yea, from time immemorial, one generation of immortal beings has been thus blindly following another, and all literally "perishing for lack of knowledge!" Who does not bear, in these chilling facts, the dying moans of thousands more, whom the stream is even now rapidly bearing down to the eternal gulf, and whose ignorance and wretchedness loudly cry, 'Come over and help us; come over and help us?'

"Leaving Mankazana, I proceeded to Tambookie Vlei, and there found another of the parties, industriously employed in building, pastoral pursuits, and cultivation. On hearing what the object of my visit was, one of the people heartily welcomed me, saying, 'Come in, come in, Sir;' and showed me no small kindness, immediately 'kindling a fire because of the cold and because of the rain' which had poured heavily upon us during the greater part of the journey. Being weary and sleepy, my host spread a few skins for me to rest upon in the best corner of his newly-erected dwelling; the floor of which, being but just laid, was exceedingly damp; consequently the following morning brought with it a severe cold, and violent pains in my head.

"After preaching, I went out to see their different gardens and corn-lands; from which it was quite evident that they were far in advance of those whom I had left. Their situation, however, was much more advantageous, the soil being of a superior description, and more likely to prove productive than that upon which their neighbours were placed. In several places enclosures had been made, and both wheat and barley sown, as had peas and potatoes also in considerable quantities. The greater part of this division formerly resided near Bavian's River, and amongst the Scotch emigrants, who had often employed them in various ways, and afforded them much useful instruction. Several were able to read the Scriptures, and one or two could write likewise. Their stock of sheep and cattle was very considerable; and little doubt can be entertained of their ultimate prosperity. There were few amongst them but what had entirely cast off the sheep-skin garb of the Hottentot; and at divine service the greater part of them, male as well as female, were decently and respectably clad in European apparel. Several couples that had long lived together as man and wife, according to general custom, expressed an earnest desire to have their matrimonial union honourably and legally solemnized: there did not appear to be more than one or two instances of polygamy in the whole hamlet.

"In one of the huts at this place, I found a sick man, who had been most miraculously delivered from the jaws of a lion, two or three weeks prior to my visit. While sitting by his side he furnished me with the following particulars; which, as they constitute a striking illustration of that gracious Providence whose tender mercy is over the children of men, are well worthy of being recorded. Accompanied by several other individuals, he one morning went out on a hunting excursion; and on coming to an extensive plain beyond the precincts of the colony, where there was abundance of game, they discovered a number of lions, which were disturbed by their approach. One of the males instantly separated himself from the troop, and began slowly to advance towards the party, most of whom were young, and altogether unaccustomed to encounters of so formidable a nature. While droves of timid antelopes only came in their way, they were all brave fellows, and boasted loudly of their courage; but this completely failed, and the young Nimrods began to quake, when the monarch of the desert appeared.

"Nevertheless, while the animal was yet at a distance, they all dismounted; and, according to general custom on such occasions, began tying their horses together, with the view of keeping them between themselves and the beast, until they could take deliberate aim at him. His movements, however, were too quick; and before the horses were properly fastened, the lion made a tremendous bound or two, which suddenly brought him down upon the hind parts of one of them: being hereby startled, they instantly plunged forward, and knocked down the poor man in question; over him went the horses; and off ran his comrades with all speed. He arose from the ground as quickly as possible; but, on perceiving him stand up, the animal turned round, and, with a seeming consciousness of his superior might, stretched forth his paw, and by a single stroke on the back part of the neck laid him prostrate again. He had but just time to roll on to his back, before it set its feet upon his breast, and lay regularly down at full length upon him,

"He now became almost breathless, partly from fear, but principally from the intolerable pressure of his terrific load. In order to get breath he endeavoured to move himself a little, upon which the lion instantly laid hold of his left arm, just below the elbow, and bit in several different places down to the hand; in the thick part of which its teeth seemed to have completely met. All this time, however, it does not appear to have been at all furious, but merely caught at its prey, as the cat would sport with a mouse that is not quite dead. In this dreadful situation he remained for a considerable length of time writhing in pain, gasping for breath, and momentarily expecting to be torn limb from limb! On raising his head a little, the creature opened his mouth to receive it, but providentially lost his hold, in consequence of the hat (which was shown to me) slipping off; the points of the teeth, therefore, only just scarified the pericranium. Thus narrowly was he prevented from crushing the head to pieces. He then placed his paw upon the arm from which the blood was copiously flowing, and the purple stream soon covered it. This he again and again licked clean; and then fixing his flaming eye intently upon that of the man, now smelt on one side of his face, and then on the other, and appeared to be only awaiting the inducement of voracity, wholly to devour his helpless prey!

"At this critical moment," said the poor fellow, "I recollected having somewhere heard that there was a God on high, who was able to deliver, at the very last extremity; I therefore began to pray that he would prevent the lion from eating my flesh and drinking my blood." While engaged in this act of devotion, the beast turned completely round, placing its head towards his feet, and its tail over his face. This induced hope in the mind of the sufferer, that he might now possibly rid himself of his load; and under this impression he made an effort, which was no sooner discovered, than checked by a terrible bite in the right thigh. He again lifted up his voice to the Almighty for help; nor did he pray in vain. The lion, without being disturbed in any way whatever, soon afterwards relinquished his hold. Calmly rising from his seat, he deliberately walked off to the distance of thirty or forty paces, and there lay down in the grass, whence, after watching the movements of the Hottentots for some minutes, he finally took his departure, and was seen no more. The man now arose, and, crawling off in the best manner he was able, at length obtained the aid of his cowardly companions, who set him upon one of the horses, and brought him to the place where I found him. Dr G. (son of the Rev. John Gaulter), a military surgeon, at one of the neighbouring stations, hearing of the case, hastened to his relief, and very humanely rendered him all needful assistance. On first seeing him, amputation of the arm was thought to be absolutely necessary, but to this the patient would not submit; 'for,' said he, 'as the Almighty had delivered me from a death so dreadful, I thought he was surely able to save my arm also!' At the time of my visit some of his wounds were already healed, and there was every prospect of a complete restoration. 'O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!'"

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES BEGG, A.M., Minister of Liberton.

"Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened, and heard it:— They shall be mine, in that day when I make up my jewels," &c.—MAL. iii. 16.

THE prophet proceeds to make a cheering statement after the dark picture which he had just presented. Even in the most degenerate ages, God never suffered the light of truth completely to be banished from the earth. When the old world was covered with wickedness, still in one family the fear of God was preserved. When all Israel appeared to have gone after idols, still many hundreds were left "who had not bowed the knee to Baal." And now, when the same people had sunk into matchless carelessness and contempt of God, even then, a chosen few were left, "who feared the Lord, and spake often one to another." And since that period the case has been the same. When the great mass of the Jews rejected the Saviour, there were a few who "looked for redemption in Israel." When the apostles were persecuted from city to city, still some everywhere believed. Even in Sardis of old, wicked as it was, "a few names" were found of men "who had not defiled their garments." During all the ages which have succeeded, a race has always existed, running parallel to great masses of the ungodly, "declaring God's works, shewing forth his mighty deeds." And at length, out of Babylon itself, borne down as it is with the guilt of centuries, God will call a chosen few who have shunned her awful wickedness. Like wheat amidst the multitude of tares, like a few faithful soldiers amidst the ranks and in the country of the enemy, have they always been found, one in a city, two in a family, whom God takes and brings to Zion.

This is the first remark which strikes us on reading these words.

The second is, that where and when sinners have been most determined in their opposition to God, the servants of God have ever been most bold and resolute. Even as the fierce energy of fire purges out the dross and makes the gold come forth pure and radiant, even as the fierce wind carries off the chaff and makes the wheat pure, so if we look for the brightest names in the Christian calendar, we shall not find them during times of peace, when all the world was at rest, and men professed their Christianity unheeded, but during times of stormy persecution. Then the Christian graces were ripened into a determined energy, and stood out in bold relief before the eyes of men. Then heaven has been filled with "those who had come out of great tribulation, and washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," even as in the case before us, when all Israel was sunk in wickedness, then, at that time "they that feared the Lord spake often one to another, and God said, they shall be mine in that day when I make up my jewels."

Having made these remarks, let us proceed to the more particular consideration of these words and,

I. We learn from them, that it is the duty of Christians, at all times, to stand by and support each other, especially in times of abounding iniquity. This was the conduct of these Jewish servants of God, and was highly approved of by the Almighty. There are many injunctions to the same conduct in the New Testament: "E hort one another daily, lest any of you should be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin." "Let us consider one another, to provoke one another to love and good works." Our Lord said to Peter, "And thou when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren."

The progress of sin has in every age been advanced by the determined union of its supporters. A strong banded conspiracy is formed—Satan is at its head—all the spirits of darkness are amongst its supporters—all the wicked in every age, in every land, have taken part in the dark confederacy. Many and deep have been their devices, and although many the differences by which they have been characterised, in this they have agreed, with all their might to oppose the progress of the holiness and truth of God.

God has appointed a way by which all this may be met and overcome, viz., a determined union amongst all followers of the Lamb. Satan is full of subtilty, but Christ is a leader more wise, for in him are hid all treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Satan has now led men astray for nearly six thousand years, and therefore, has a great and constantly increasing experience in temptation; but the leader of the armies of the living God has endured from everlasting ages—was the Creator of Satan, and possesses a power which nothing can resist. Satan is backed by all the spirits of darkness, "who go about seeking whom they may devour;" but the Captain of our Salvation has all the angels of heaven subject to him, and makes them all ministering spirits to them who shall be heirs of salvation. And though the number of Christians has ever been small in comparison of the overwhelming masses of ungodly men, yet truth and righteousness must in due time prevail—the armies of God will become stronger and stronger, till at length, sin shall finally depart from this region of God's dominions—the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea. All shall see with one understanding, and feel with one heart, and utter one language, and adopt one resolution, and the temple of the God of heaven shall rise upon the ruins of superstition and idolatry, and every form of sin.

There is, no doubt, a decided and close union amongst all real Christians, whether it is externally visible or not. They are called members of the same body, branches of the same vine, living stones in the same glorious building. Touch one stone of the building with rude violence, and the whole building must feel the shock; touch one member of the body, and all the rest must feel with generous sympathy. That must be no part of the building which can be removed without affecting the entire frame-work; that no part of the mystical body of Christ, which feels no concern when the others are doomed to suffering. "If one member be honoured, all the members are honoured with it; if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it." Therefore, I say not merely that it is the duty of all Christians to feel a deep interest in each other's prosperity, but that they cannot be Christians without feeling such an interest; and what is required is, that this union be as open and manifest as it is real and unalterable.

No doubt the ministers of truth are especially bound to stand up for the cause of God in stormy times. Their voices should rally the troops, and be loudest in urging their brethren to courage; they should be first in exposing the delusions to which their brethren are liable. Theirs is the post of responsibility and danger. They are the standard-bearers, who lead on the troops; and in the meetings of God's saints from Sabbath to Sabbath, to consult the holy oracles, to learn what must be done in every emergency, it is their voice that must be heard, animating the feeble, comforting the sorrowful, strengthening the weak, bringing out of their treasures things new and old, suited to the necessities of those they address; but still all Christians are bound, as they value God and truth, a glorious eternity, and the immortal souls of their brethren, to aid their efforts, by speaking often one to another, words of encouragement, consolation, and reproof. "Am I my brother's keeper?" was not the voice of a child of God; it is the voice of Cain, "who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother."

It were well if the ancient proclamation made before the armies of Israel as they proceeded towards Canaan, were repeated to those who are now proceeding towards the heavenly Canaan,— "Whoso is faint-hearted, let him go and return to his house, lest his neighbour's heart faint as well as his." The eye of the great Captain of our Salvation is fixed on those who stand prominent for their courage amongst the rest,—who go boldly on from strength to strength, turning their faces from no foe, or if they turn at all, only that they may cheer on their brethren, saying, "Zion is before you—unspeakable glories await you there, O ye followers of the Lamb—be stedfast in the faith, and omnipotence will be your defence—omniscience your guide—infinite goodness the storehouse out of which your wants will be supplied—God your Father—Christ your friend—angels your companions—heaven your home—a martyr's crown and a robe of brightness shall adorn you—eternity shall be the limit of your joy. These dark ranks, numerous though they seem, have all been conquered and condemned already, and on all their necks will be found the footprints of your glorious Leader. Their power is but weakness, and death will soon mow them down like corn fully ripe, in the time of harvest; they shall rise against God and his servants no more. Be strong, fear not; be faithful unto death, Christ will give thee the crown of life."

Thus it is that Christians under proper feelings should speak one to another, in their private meetings in such times as these; but we might, in like manner, go over all the different situations in which a Christian may be placed, and shew how the words of a friend may inspire with comfort; for as iron sharpeneth iron, so doth the face of a man the countenance of his friend. When the Sabbath comes round, we can take sweet counsel together as we walk to the house of God in company. When we go with trembling steps to a communion table, remembering how unworthy we are, the words of a friend are often "like ointment poured forth," or "like the dew on the Hill of Hermon, where God commandeth the blessing, even life that shall never end." When disease, with its dark clouds, settles upon our dwellings, when wearisome days and nights, with many tossings to and fro till the dawning of the day are appointed to us, or any of our dear Christian relations, then it is grateful to the heart to hear accents of tenderness proceeding from human lips, and to be borne up by others who have known like afflictions, and are not strangers to sympathy. When death cuts "off the desire of our eyes with a stroke," and when a crowd of mourners come to carry from our sight the remains of all that was dear to us, when we see the last sight of the sad procession, and return and find the place unoccupied where our friend once was, what so soothing in such hours as these as the conversation of those who can remind us of the time when the earth and the sea must give back their dead, and all the triumphs of death must be swallowed up in an eternal victory. In all circumstances, it is the duty of Christians to speak one to another; for a word fitly spoken how good it is; and this is one of the means appointed by God for saving souls from death, and promoting the sanctification of his people.

Oh! if God should offer us a golden wedge of Ophir, or a kingly crown for every soul that we comforted, for every delusion detected and exposed, every soul taught to surmount its difficulties, and enter the land of rest, how diligent would we be. See the physician, for a temporary subsistence, passing through a laborious course of study, from many parts of which human nature recoils,—exposing himself to the contagion of deadly disease,—content to have his rest disturbed, and to sit up the weary night that he may gaze on human nature in agony,—passing from one sad chamber of sickness to another, till a sedate and melancholy air becomes habitual, and sits fixedly on his countenance. He does all this for his fellow men, only to obtain a small and temporary reward. See the lawyer putting forth his whole store of learning and subtlety in defence of another, burning the midnight oil that he may discover arguments in his defence, and throwing his whole soul so completely into the case, that as he speaks so earnestly, a stander-by will imagine that it must be his own. Will they do all this, and more, for their brethren, only for a reward in time, and will you, professing to be Christians, do nothing to promote the comfort and salvation of your Christian brethren, although God looks on with deep interest, and though he has declared that an immortal prize will reward your efforts, not of thousands of gold, or earthly crowns, but of endless joy, a long long immortality of blessedness?

II. God not merely remembers, but will reward those who thus promote the salvation of his people, and retain their holiness amidst abounding iniquity, and in illustrating this point, the great advantage of holiness will appear.

The figures here employed are strikingly fitted to convey an idea, that decided Christians are exceedingly precious in the sight of God. With what care do men store up their jewels! All their other goods are reckoned less valuable than these. They store them up in secret and strong repositories, and when danger seizes upon their dwelling, they fly to these, their jewels are first secured. When a day of mirth and feasting is appointed, is it possible for the sons and daughters of Adam then to forget their ornaments? And if we speak of kings, their crown, and the jewels with which it is adorned, their sceptre of gold, all the rubies and diamonds which their ancestors have collected, all the precious things which go to make up the regalia of majesty, constitute the emblems of the glory and greatness of their kingdom. And when foreign princes come, as the Queen of Sheba did, from the uttermost parts of the earth, to see the glory and hear the wisdom of Solomon; when a great and striking display must be made, the crown royal is placed on the monarch's head, and all the jewels of the kingdom are brought forth to dazzle the foreign eyes and make the assembled thousands shout for joy. And so God gives us to believe, that when at last he comes down to exhibit to the world his glorious majesty, and when all the princes of many generations must meet together, and all the potentates of hell must come to see the glorious spectacle—nothing fairer will there be, nothing more precious and beautiful, nothing which illustrates more the dignity and glory of his power, his love, and all his attributes, than the members of the Christian Church, fair and glorious, without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing. "They shall be mine, saith the Lord, in that day when I make up my jewels."

Or take the other figure. We all know how tender is the affection of parents towards their children. It reigns amongst all the creatures of God. The very eagle, cruel to all the other fowls of heaven, "fluttereth over her nest, carrieth her young upon her wings." The "bear robbed of her whelps," makes the forest ring with the wailings of her grief. And man, guided by reason, betrays feelings stronger and deeper than these. Hear them expressed by Jacob: "Me have ye bereaved of my children; Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and will ye take Benjamin also? all these things are against me." Even the utmost cruelty, the most base ingratitude, is unable to quench a father's love. David "was much moved, and went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept; and, as he went, thus he said, O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee." And the eternal Jehovah gives us to believe, that as parents write the names of their children in their sacred books so he writes the names of his on the palms of his hands—they are ever before him. Even as they watch over their tender infants with a zeal which tires not—an ardent unquenchable affection; and as when they call their friends together, they love to deck out these, and shew them as the objects most precious in their sight; so the God of heaven and earth, when he calls a vast assembly of all the universe, will bring forth these his children, decked with beauty, and prepared to enter upon an eternal joy. “I will spare them as a man spareth his son that serveth him.”

The time is fast approaching when the reign of delusion will end for ever—when this strange scene, in which holiness is oppressed and sin apparently triumphant, shall change—light coming out of darkness, order out of confusion—the wicked being driven away in their wickedness, the chosen sons of God brought forth from their obscurity, that they may shine as the jewels in our Saviour’s crown, as the stars for ever and ever.

How strange to stand on an eminence on that day of final decision and see the wondrous issue. “Every eye shall see it,” every heart shall feel its overpowering interest. It will be a day of joy and unspeakable alarm—of hope more than fulfilled, or terror more than realized. It will teach in one hour what men could not be taught by a thousand sermons, and it will teach with a force and authority which none will venture to gainsay. This is the meaning of the prophet, “Then shall ye turn and discern between the righteous and the wicked.” At present you may be deceived, and the flatterers of men, apparently backed by many strange appearances, may lead you astray. You may silence the voice of conscience, which proclaims aloud that there is an endless distinction between sin and holiness; you may lull yourselves into a temporary feeling of security; but the thunder-clap of the day of judgment will dispel the delusion “in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye.” Now there is peace, then there will be no peace; now there is a firm world beneath your feet, then that world will be burning with fire; now God hides himself, then he will come forth in wrath; now ministers beseech, then their voices will be silenced; now the wicked prosper, then they will be driven away to endless misery; now there is time, then eternity will have begun, and hope fled for ever away. “Then shall ye turn and discern between the righteous and the wicked.”

All this will thrust itself upon every one’s observation; there will be no disinterested spectator; all will learn from experience, whether of sorrow or joy. Will you not be wise in time? You are spending your years as a tale that is told, and now is that day of revelation nearer than when we last met in this house of prayer. Are you anxious to shut your eyes still, and to press on through another period of time, which shall, perhaps, lay some of us with the dust, uninstructed and unmoved? If ye are resolved, O why should we disturb you before the time? Rejoice and let your hearts cheer you; but take heed lest the earth should suddenly reel beneath your feet, and in the hour of your extremity you send in despair for those ministers whose warnings you now despise, to administer a consolation which you now put away. Now is the accepted time, God waits to be gracious—his salvation is offered to the chief of sinners—his spirit can cleanse from all sin—his glory can satisfy the longings of an immortal soul. Flee to the stronghold as prisoners of hope. And ye Christians, hold fast that which you have, let no man take your crown; yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry, his reward is with him, but his work is before him. “Be ye faithful unto death, and Christ will give you the crown of life.”

THE TOMB OF HOWARD.

Extracted from Dr Henderson’s Biblical Researches and Travels in Russia.—London, 1826.

“At the distance of five versts to the north of Kherson, stands the original monument of the Prince of Christian Philanthropists—the great, the illustrious Howard; who, after travelling 50,000 British miles, to investigate and relieve the sufferings of humanity, fell a victim, near this place, to his unremitting exertions in this benevolent cause. It is situated a little to the east of the public road leading from Nikolaief to Kherson, near the southern bank of a small stream which here diffuses a partial verdure across the steppe. On the opposite bank are a few straggling and ruinous huts, and close by, is a large garden, sheltered by fine lofty trees, which have been planted to beautify the villa once connected with it, but now no more. The spot itself is sandy, with a scanty sprinkling of vegetation, and is only distinguishable from the rest of the steppe by two brick pyramids, and a few graves, in which the neighbouring peasants have interred their dead—attracted, no doubt, by the report of the singular worth of the foreign friend whose ashes are here deposited till the resurrection of the just. As we approached the graves, a hallowed feeling of no ordinary description grew upon our minds, and forced upon us the conviction, that the scene before us was indeed privileged beyond the common walks of life. One of the pyramids is erected over the dust of our countryman, and the other has subsequently been raised over the grave of a French gentleman who revered his memory, and wished to be buried by his side. As we had no person with us to point out which of them was designed to perpetuate the memory of the Philanthropist, it was impossible for us to determine, otherwise than by confiding in the accuracy of information obtained by some former admirer of his virtues, who has cut into the brick the very appropriate inscription:—vixit propter alios,—i. e., he lived for the sake of others. It was impossible to survey this simple obelisk without reflecting on the superiority of principle which impelled the great friend of his species, in that career of disinterested benevolence which he so unremittingly pursued. His was not mere animal sympathy, dignified and refined by its existence in human nature, though he doubtless possessed that quality in no ordinary degree; nor did his charities flow from an ambition to be admired and extolled by his fellow creatures; his toilsome pilgrimages and unnumbered acts of self-denial were not performed with the slightest idea of atoning for his sins, or meriting a seat in the mansions of bliss—the very thought he abhorred; but his whole character was formed, and his practice regulated by the vital influence of that Gospel which reveals the divine philanthropy expending itself upon human weal. Conceiving himself to be an eternal debtor to the blessed Saviour, who stooped to the lowest depths of suffering, in order to rescue him from the horrors of immortal death, he was sweetly and powerfully constrained to imitate his bright example, the characteristics of which are strikingly depicted in the simple declaration: 'who went about doing good.'

'Such was Howard, the most virtuous, and yet the most humble of our race. How justly he might have taken for his motto what he wrote a few months before his death: 'In God's hand no instrument is weak, and in whose presence no flesh must glory.' He was enabled to effect great things, yet he utterly renounced dependance upon himself. 'My immortal spirit I cast on the sovereign mercy of God, through Jesus Christ, who is the Lord my strength, and my song; and, I trust, has become my salvation. My desire is to be washed, cleansed, and justified in the blood of Christ, and to dedicate myself to that Saviour who has bought us with a price.' Firmly resting upon this foundation, he was well prepared to address his last earthly friend and attendant, Admiral Priestman, in these words: 'Priestman, you style this a dull conversation, and endeavour to divert my mind from dwelling upon death; but I entertain very different sentiments. Death has no terrors for me; it is an event I always look to with cheerfulness, if not with pleasure; and be assured, the subject is more grateful to me than any other.'

'His genuine humility prompted him to choose this sequestered spot for the reception of his mortal remains; and it was his anxious desire, that neither monument nor inscription, but simply a sun-dial should be placed over his grave. His wishes were at first so far complied with, that no splendid monument was erected to his memory; but the august monarch, in whose territory so many of his benevolent acts were performed, and who nobly patronized the attempts made to follow out the plans of Howard for the improvement of the state of prisons, has borne a public testimony to the respect he entertained for his virtues, by ordering a conspicuous monument to be built in the vicinity of Kherson, the town in which he died. This cenotaph, which attracted our notice as we approached the gate of the town, is erected at a short distance from the Russian cemetery, and close to the public road. It is built of a compact white free-stone, found at some distance, and is about thirty feet in height, surrounded by a wall of the same stone, seven feet high by two hundred in circumference. Within this wall, in which is a beautiful cast iron gate, a fine row of Lombardy poplars has been planted, which, when fully grown, will greatly adorn the monument. On the pedestal is a Russian inscription of the following import:—'Howard: died January 20th, 1790, aged 65:' the simplicity of which is in strict accordance with the orders the great Philanthropist more than once gave, and which, with the rectification of the dates, only requires the all-emphatic addition, Christ is my Hope, to render it perfectly conformable to the inscription dictated by his own pen, and placed under that to the memory of his wife in Cardington Church, near Bedford. Agreeably to his request, a sun-dial is represented near the summit of the pillar, but with this remarkable circumstance, that the only divisions of time it exhibits, are the hours from ten to two, as if to intimate that a considerable portion of the morning of life is past ere we enter on the discharge of its active duties: and that, with many, the performance of them is over at an early hour after the meridian of our days.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY.

BY THE REV. J. A. WALLACE,

THE resurrection of the body is one, certainly, of the most comfortable doctrines on which it is possible for us to fix our thoughts. But it is a doctrine which could never be discovered, either by the perceptions of our bodily senses, or by the researches of our intellectual faculties. And had we, therefore, been left to the investigations of unassisted reason, we must have been totally and eternally excluded from all the hopes and the consolations which it sets before us, amid the separations and the bereavements of our mortal condition.

Men there have been, it is true, of acute and discerning minds, who, without the aid of Revelation, have been able to form some kind of conception in regard to the immortality of the soul. And though their views on that subject have not been altogether free from doubt, or vagueness, or uncertainty, and have seldom been productive of any powerful or permanent impression on the mind, yet they seem occasionally to have caught some vivid glimpses of the truth, and in moments of solemn deliberation have almost persuaded themselves that the soul could never die. And when they dwelt, as they often did, on its high superiority both over the irrational and inanimate creation; on the vast measure of its capacities; on the boundlessness of its ambition; on its plans extending far onwards into futurity; on its hopes, even in the hour of decay, breaking from their confinement, and groping their way into the immensities of an unknown eternity, then nothing could be more natural or more rational than the conjecture that the soul, which was capable of such mighty things, was not to be doomed to annihilation, ere its faculties were half unfolded, or its plans accomplished; and that the very perishing of its mortal tenement might not only be the means of its emancipation from the bondage of this gross and material state, but of its admission into some higher clime, where its powers were to be fully expanded, and its perfection to be complete.

But though such have been the views of strong-minded men in regard to the immortality of the soul, we find not, apart from divine Revelation, the most distant or obscure intimation in regard to the resurrection of the body. Their own consciousness might nurture the idea that the soul, peradventure, might live for ever. But with regard to the body, when they saw it divested of all motion, of all feeling, of all life; deaf to their most affectionate addresses, incapable of the slightest exertion, mouldering away into dust and corruption,—with regard to it, they had no hope. They gave it up as a thing which was completely lost. In fact, they could behold the change which was taking place upon it; they could trace the humiliating process through which it was passing; they could see it returning into dust, and apparently into nothingness; they could draw the conclusion, from the outward appearances, that when the earthly house of this tabernacle was dissolved, it was dissolved finally and for ever. And, therefore, they were left to mourn over their departed friends, even as those who have no hope, and to go down to the grave themselves, with feeling of hopelessness, and desolation, and despair.

Hence, we are indebted to the Bible for the information which we possess in regard to the resurrection of the body. There, it is not only revealed to us in terms which are so plain and explicit, that he who runs may read, but we have distinct and specific examples of it, as if for the purpose of putting down the objections which it is possible for the subtlety of the infidelity of the human mind to bring against, and shewing to us, by well-authenticated facts, what possible thing it is for the corruptible to put on incorruption, and for the mortal to be clothed with immortality. On that account the Bible is to be regarded as a great and invaluable treasure. Even in regard to that one point—the restoration of the mortal and material part of our nature—it contains more sound philosophy, and more solid comfort than can be gathered from the profoundest speculations of all the wise men who have lived since the creation of the world. And were it silent on every other subject but that, it would still be like a well of living water in the wilderness, a light to cheer and to conduct us amid the darkness and the mysteries of death; a heritage with which the wealth of worlds is not for one moment to be compared.

For what is the kind of consolation which is most suited to the constitution of our nature, amid the trials and the bereavements of this present life? Suppose that death has entered into my dwelling, and borne away from me some venerated parent, or some beloved brother, or some affectionate sister, or some darling child, or some friend that sticketh closer than a brother, and that every feeling of my nature is wrung to agony with the awful severity of the trial. Oh! then, would it be enough to tell me that I must think no more for ever of the image—the bodily appearance of my buried child, or my venerated parent, or my beloved friend—the very being who was entwined most closely about the fibres of my heart—and whose likeness is still associated with every object on which my eye gazes, and every event which my memory recalls, and every scene which my imagination paints? Would it be enough to tell me, that the spirit is disembodied, and is blessed, and that I must think of it, and of its alone? Impossible. I cannot do it. It is beyond the power of my nature. And did my comfort depend on the achievement, I should still “be of all men the most miserable.” A disembodied spirit, even in a state of perfect happiness! I try to think of it—I try to realize it. But no power of abstraction, no force of thought, no grasp of intellect can bring me to the distinct recognition of what a spirit is. I cannot see it, I cannot hear it, I cannot follow it, I cannot comprehend it. The bond which united us together appears to be wanting. And I feel myself to be almost as far removed from it, and as incapable of entering into its fellowship, as if it had lost its very existence. But along with the spirit, Oh! speak to me also of the body; the body, which my own eyes have seen, and my own lips have spoken to; the body, about which all my associations, and affections, and reminiscences are eternally entwined; the body, whose living image is engraven imperishably on the tablets of my heart. Tell me that not one particle of its dust shall be lost, and that not one lineament of its likeness shall be defaced. Tell me that it forms a part, and an important part of the nature, for whose redemption Christ descended from heaven, and clothed himself in our likeness, and tabernacled amongst our dwellings, and laboured, and suffered, and died, and slept in the grave, and rose again, and ascended to heaven, and is now reigning triumphant at the right hand of God the Father. Tell me that, though to the eye of sense, it may seem to be brought into a low and most humiliating condition, it is nevertheless precious in the sight of the great Redeemer, because it is his own property, which he hath purchased with his blood; a part of his mystical body, which he hath engaged to keep, not to destroy, to purify and to perfect, not to annihilate; nay, tell me that it shall actually be raised again, with no other change but the removal of all its imperfections, and arrayed in a loveliness more glorious and transcendent than before, and that I shall see it again with my own eyes, and speak to it with my own lips, and walk along with it for ever through the boundless blessedness of heaven. Tell me that, and I am completely satisfied. I feel that I am capable of understanding it. The comfort comes home to my very heart. And because I have the prospect of getting back the same body, united again with the same soul, and that, moreover, in a state of perfection, I feel that the fountain of consolation is filled to the overflowing; and that the hope which passes over the grave, and pierces into eternity, is without a shadow and without a cloud.

Such are the cheering prospects which are opened before us in the Bible, and which every true believer is permitted to entertain in regard to all his friends who have fallen asleep in Jesus! It not only leads us to understand that their souls do not perish at their death, but are made perfect in holiness, and do pass immediately into glory; thus turning into a matter of indubitable certainty, what formerly, and in the view of human reason, was the object only of dim and uncertain conjecture; but that their bodies also, by virtue of their connection with the great Redeemer, are now resting in their graves, and shall rise again in glory, and incorruptible; thus fetching light out of a dispensation apparently the darkest and the most hopeless, and bringing us to sources of consolation which must have lain for ever beyond the reach or the discovery of the wisest and the most enlightened of men.

Therefore, the grave is not to be regarded as a place of perdition, where the believer can be divested of ought that essentially belongs to his nature. It is a place merely of transformation, where the earthly house of his tabernacle is to be dissolved, not for the purpose of destroying it, but for the purpose of freeing it from its imperfections, and rebuilding its imperishable materials into a more glorious temple for the indwelling of God's Holy Spirit for ever. And could we only realize the day when the Saviour shall fetch them out from the darkness and the desolations of the grave, and raise them up to all the glories of a new and endless life; could we see the meeting together, after the long and silent sleep in which they have been reposing, of parents with children, and children with parents, of brothers with sisters, and sisters with brothers, of ministers with people, and people with ministers,—the blending together of kindred spirits that had been long severed, but now re-united for ever; and could we listen to the loud thunders of adoration which shall sound through the universe, when all the mighty host that have been loosed from their fetters shall rise triumphant to meet their glorified Redeemer in the air; could we realize all that, we should see enough, and more than enough, to reconcile us to the most humiliating of all the changes to which our mortal and corruptible nature can be subjected, and to prompt us in faith and in triumph to exclaim, “O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Admonitions on the Love of the World.—1. Be admonished against the inordinate love of society. Intercourse with the world is full of snares and disappointments and miseries, and far more men have coveted an extension of it, than ever found any satisfaction in it. 2. Yet, since you have still to enter society, though you do not excessively love it, be admonished to avoid the circles then in which you have met with hostility to religion. You may not, it is true, have actually been injured by the scepticism or impiety. You may be perfectly able to confute the adversary of the Gospel, and you may even have silenced him. But the frequency of infidel attack is ready to injure the devotional sensibility of the heart, where it does not dislodge a single conviction of the understanding; and it is not profitable to be always stationed on the defensive, so as to turn the profession of religion into an exercise of argumentative skill. 3. Be admonished especially, not even for another time to repeat your visit to the society of profligates and sensualists. The stain of their words is blacker than that of infidelity. I would rather have my understanding warped by the cunning sophistry of sceptical gain-sayers, than submit my heart to be acted on for an instant by the pollutions of those pests of the moral world. The fallacious sophism, a little reflection will enable me to see the weakness of; and an exercise of reason and effort of faith, which is strong in its humility, will enable me to drive it from me; but the evil communications of the others, though they may not utterly "corrupt good manners," yet leave an unholy impression behind, which hours of serious thought, and days of prayer, may scarcely be able to remove. 4. Whatever may be the character of the society to which you have access, be admonished to keep yourselves independent of it. That man is indeed a slave who feels himself chained to the world, who cannot be pleased, save when it honours him; nor cheerful, save when it smiles on him; nor happy but in the enjoyment of its intercourse. He, on the other hand is free, who enters it or retreats from it, as duty may call, and still experiences no real change on the great materials of his enjoyments. 5. Be admonished, hence, to acquire a growing relish for a devotional retirement. If you find the Bible as the beloved companion of your closet, and if communion of heart with your God and Saviour be a delight to you, and reading and reflecting on the many subjects which at once please and improve, afford you occupation for hours of leisure; surely you provide a sanctuary to yourselves, a shelter from the storms of life, of which neither the folly, nor the malice, nor the calamities of the world can deprive you. Lastly, Whilst you relish, and benefit by such retirement, be admonished to carry from it when you enter society, a portion of its holy influence. It is an influence that should breathe over your whole language and deportment, the purity and sweetness of Christian virtue, causing you to exhibit piety without moroseness, fervour of soul in religion, with becoming diligence in business; the receiving of earthly comforts with the moderation of self-denial; the obtaining of successes with humility; bearing of disappointments with meekness; the preserving of cheerfulness, while avoiding all levity; the pursuing the secular calling, while labouring for the heavenly; the taking a deep and affectionate interest in the affairs of men, while living with supreme devotedness to God, or, according to the language of the text, the dwelling "in Sardis," and yet, instead of acquiring the spot of its vices, the rising daily in that purity of heart and life which precedes with happy fitness, the intercourse and joys of Christ's friendship. Remember, I beseech you at the same time, that He whose spirit is holy, wise and good, can alone enable you to live according to His blessed will. If you know the plague of your own heart, its corruptness, its deceitfulness, be entreated to seek constantly the grace of Him who is able to change it. If you feel the depravity of the world, its unblessed ascendancy, its polluting influence, be entreated to seek from his mercy the victory that overcometh. He purchased your redemption at the richest price. He reveals in the Gospel the heavenly inheritance. To whom but to Him can you apply, that he may save you with his great salvation, preparing you for the blessed portion with himself.—MUTA.

Meekness of Spirit.—Meekness is a victory over ourselves, and the rebellious lusts in our own bosoms; it is the quieting of intestine broils, the stilling of an insurrection at home, which is oftentimes more hard to do than to resist a foreign invasion. It is an effectual victory over those that injure us, and make themselves enemies to us, and is often a means of winning their hearts. The law of meekness is: "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; and in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head;" not to consume him, but to melt and mollify, that he may be cast into a new mould; and thus, while the angry and revengeful man that will bear down all before him with a high hand, is overcome of evil, the patient and forgiving overcome evil with good; and forasmuch as their ways please the Lord, he maketh even their enemies to be at peace with them. We read in Scripture of three whose faces shone remarkably, and they were all eminent for meekness. The face of Moses shone, Exod. xxxiv. 3, and he was the meekest of all the men on earth. The face of Stephen shone, Acts vi. 15, and he it was, who, in the midst of a shower of stones, so meekly submitted, and prayed for his persecutors. The face of our Lord Jesus shone in his transfiguration, and he was the great pattern of meekness. It is a sweet and pleasing air which this grace puts upon the countenance, while it keeps the soul in tune, and frees it from those jarring, ill-favoured discords, which are the certain effect of an ungoverned passion. We must "put on meekness." This precept we have, Col. iii. 12. "Put on, therefore (as the elect of God, holy and beloved,) meekness." It is one of the members of the new man, which, according to the obligations we lie under from our baptism, we must put on. Put it on as an armour, to keep provocation from the heart, and so to defend the vitals. They that have tried it will say it is armour of proof: when you are putting on the whole armour of God do not forget this. Put it on as your attire, as your necessary clothing, which you cannot go without; look upon yourself as ungarmented, unblessed without it. Put it on as the livery garment, by which you may be known to be the disciples of the meek, and patient, and humble Jesus, and belong to that peaceable family. Put it on as an ornament, as a robe and diadem by which you may be both beautified and dignified in the eyes of others. Put it on as the "elect of God, holy and beloved;" because you are so in profession, and that you may approve yourself so in truth and reality. Be clothed with meekness as "the elect of God,"—a chosen people whom God hath set apart from the rest of the world, as holy, sanctified to God, sanctified by him. We must "show all meekness unto all men,"—all kinds of meekness, bearing meekness and forbearing meekness, qualifying meekness and condescending meekness, and forgiving meekness; the meekness that endears our friends and that which reconciles our enemies; the meekness of authority over inferiors, the meekness of obedience to superiors, and the meekness of wisdom towards all. We should study to appear in all our converse so mild, and gentle, and peaceable, that all who see us may witness for us that we are the meek of the earth. We must not only be moderate, "but let our moderation be known." We must shew our meekness not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward, for this is thank-worthy. So exceeding broad is the commandment, we must "shew all meekness to all men." We must "seek meekness." Zeph. ii. 3, "Seek ye the Lord all ye meek of the earth—seek meekness." Now the way prescribed for the attainment of meekness is to seek it. Ask it of God, pray for it, it is a grant of the Spirit, it is given by the God of all grace, and to him we must go for it. The God we address is called the God of patience and consolation, Rom. xv. 5, and as such we must ask him when we come to him for grace to make us likeminded, i. e., meek and loving one towards another. God's people are, and should be, a generation of seekers, that covet the best gifts, and make their court to the best Giver, who never said to the wrestling seed of Jacob, "seek in vain," but hath given us an assurance firm enough for us to build upon, and rich enough for us to encourage ourselves with: "Seek and ye shall find."—MATTHEW HENRY.

Christian Example.—How powerful is example! How blessed and beneficial is good example! If we speak of place, it extends from house to house, from village to village, from city to city, from nation to nation, and, by the grace of God, its blessings may cover the earth as the waters cover the channel of the sea; if we speak of time, it descends from age to age, from century to century, and by the divine blessing, the lamp of wisdom may be handed down, and transmitted through successive eras till time shall be no longer. The light of an individual, of a family, of a community, fearing God and working righteousness, may shed a ray of blessedness on the ends of the earth, and on the most distant isles of the sea, and may shine on the last of the human race! Oh! were we Christians in deed, and in truth, our example, by a silent and powerful eloquence, would convince and confirm others with regard to the faith that is in Christ, and would turn many from darkness to light, from sin unto holiness. The word of God would sound out from us, as it did from the Thessalonians, and be heard in distant places; it would run freely, and be glorified from the rising to the setting sun. But if we are wicked and ungodly, cruel and revengeful, Sabbath-breakers and drunkards, fraudulent and overreaching, having our hearts full of guile, and our hands stained with the wages of iniquity and the pains of oppression; in vain shall we compass sea and land to make proselytes to our faith; in vain shall we mingle the fervours of our zeal with the fire of a vertical sun, or the frosts of a Polar sky. We might expect to hear from those whom we wished to convert, such language as this: "Who made thee a judge said a friar among us?" "Physician, cure thyself." Christian, "show me thy faith by thy works," "and then we may listen more patiently to thy arguments."—WIGHTLINS.

The blessedness of the Saints above.—How pleasant fill the contemplation be of the divine wisdom! when that glass, that mirror of eternity, we shall have the very view of all that truth, the knowledge whereof is in any way possible and grateful to our natures! and in His light, see light! When all those vast treasures of knowledge, (Col. ii. 3,) which, already, by their lances to Christ, saints are interested in, shall be opened to us; when the tree of knowledge shall be without enclosure; when the pleasure of speculation shall be about the toil, and that maxim be eternally antiquated, that increased knowledge increases sorrow; when the cords of eternity shall be exposed to view, and all the means and results of that profaned wisdom looked to, how will it transport! How grateful to behold whence the vast frame of nature sprang! What stretched out the heavens, established the earth, sustained all things! What turned the mighty wheels of providence throughout all the successions of time! What ordered and changed times and seasons, chained up devils, restrained the outrages of a tumultuous world, preserved God's little flock! Especially what gave birth to the new creation; what made hearts love God, embrace a Saviour; what it was overcame their own, and made them a willing people in that memorable day! And what do we think of the ravishing aspects of his love? When it shall now be open-faced and have laid aside its veil; when his amiable smiles shall be chequered with no intermingling frowns; the light of that pleasing countenance be discerned by no intervening cloud; when goodness, which is love issuing into benefaction or doing good; grace, which adds freeness to goodness; mercy, which is grace towards the miserable, shall conspire, in their distinct and variegated appearances, to set off each other, and enhance the pleasure of the admiring soul; when the wonted doubts shall cease, and the difficulty vanish of reconciling fatherly severity with love! When the full sense shall be unfolded to the life of that description of the divine nature, "God is love," and the soul be no longer put to read the love of God in his name, and shall not need to spell it by letters and by syllables, but behold it in his very nature itself, and see how intimately essential it is to the divine being. Now is the proper season for the full exercise and discovery of love. This day has been long expected, and lo! now it is dawned upon the awakening soul; it is now called forth, its senses bound, all its powers inspirited on purpose for love, visions and enjoyments; it is now to take its fill of loves.—Howe.

No Middle course in Religion.—Often do we hear remiss professors strive to choke all forward holiness by commending the golden mean. A cunning discouragement; the devil's sophistry! The mean of virtue is between two kinds, not between two degrees. It is a mean grace that loves a mean degree of grace; yet this is the staff with which the world beats all that would be better than themselves. What! will you be singular,—walk alone? But were not the apostles singular in their walking, a spectacle to the world? Did not Christ call for this singularity, what do ye more than others? You that are God's peculiar people, will ye do no peculiar thing? Ye that are separate from the world, will ye keep the world's road? Must the name of a puritan dishearten us in the service of God? St. Paul said in his apology "by that which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers;" and by that which profane ones call puritanism, which is indeed zealous devotion, so let my heart desire to serve Jesus Christ.—Old Puritan Writer.

Prayer.—Prayer draws down the warming beams of the Sun of Righteousness,—the refreshing showers of the Spirit of Grace, beneath whose genial influence all the spiritual graces, which God's own hand has planted, expand in their fullest bloom, and diffuse all around the sweetest fragrance. Prayer, with outstretched arms, fetches from the inexhaustible reservoir above, those rich supplies of the oil of divine grace; fed by which, the Christian lamp of faith will burn with a steady and increasing brightness, till, having guided the believer through the journey of life,—cheered, by its gladdening ray, the gloom of the chamber of death; and even darted a bright gleam of heavenly light deep down into that dark valley, through which he must pass to the city of his God, it will there be absorbed in the blaze of light that burns around the throne; for in that city there is no candle nor lamp required, yea, "there is no need of the sun or moon to enlighten it, for the Lamb is the light thereof, and our God its glory!"—WHITE.

SACRED POETRY.

THE FOLLOWERS OF CHRIST.

THE Son of God is gone to war,
A kingly crown to gain;
His blood-red banner streams afar;
Who follows in his train?
Who best can drink his cup of woe,
Triumphant over pain;
Who boldest bears his cross below,—
He follows in his train.

The martyr first whose eagle-eye
Could pierce beyond the grave;
Who saw his Master in the sky,
And called on Him to save.
Like Him, with pardon on his tongue,
In midst of mortal pain,
He pray'd for them that did the wrong:
Who follows in his train?

A glorious band, the chosen few,
On whom the Spirit came,
Twelve valiant Saints, the truth they knew,
And braved the cross and shame:
They met the tyrant's brandish'd steel,
The lion's gory mane;
They bow'd their necks the death to feel:
Who follows in their train?

A noble army, men and boys,
The matron and the maid,
Around their Saviour's throne rejoice,
In robes of light array'd.
They climb'd the dizzy steep of heaven,
Through peril, toil, and pain:
Oh! God, to us may grace be given,
To follow in their train.

WORLD IN THE HEART.

THE question is not, if our earthly race
Was once enlightened by a flash of grace;
If we sustained a place on Zion's Hill,
And call'd him Lord,—but if we did his will.
What if the stranger, sick and captive lie,
Naked and hungry, and we pass them by!
Or do but some extorted pittance throw,
To save our credit, not to ease their woe:
Or strangers to the charity whence springs
The liberal heart, devising liberal things;
We, cumber'd ever with our own pursuits,
To others leave the labour and its fruits;
Pleading excuses for the crumb we save,
For want of faith to cast it on the wave.
—Shall we go forth with joy to meet our Lord,
Enter his kingdom, reap the full reward?
—Can such his good, his faithful servants be?
Bless'd of the Father?—Read his Word and see.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Herman Francke.—While the celebrated Francke was minister at Erfurt, he was zealously engaged in the dissemination of scriptural truth. As he was very frequently receiving copies of the Scriptures from Luneburg, his enemies circulated a report that he was distributing heretical books among the people. The magistrates issued an order that no such books should be brought into the city. Francke did not suppose that this edict was designed to oppose the circulation of the Scriptures, and therefore persevered in his holy labour. Directions were then given to stop every package directed to him. A parcel soon after arrived, and Francke was called before the magistrates, and asked how he dared to disobey their orders. The officer, to convict him of guilt, opened the package; when, to his surprise and confusion, it was found to contain nothing but New Testaments! Francke was, of course, honourably dismissed. The effect of this affair was to make it known through the city that he had the Scriptures to dispose of, and to increase the demand for them a hundred-fold!

A Nail in a sure Place.—I think, says Mr Arundell, the British chaplain at Smyrna, there is another part of this chapter (Isaiah xxii. 16.) the three last verses, that may be illustrated by a reference to ancient tombs. "I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place; and they shall hang upon him all vessels of small quantity, from the vessels of cups, even to all the vessels of flagons. In that day, saith the Lord of Hosts, shall the nail that is fastened in the sure place be removed, and be cut down, and fall; and the burden that was upon it shall be cut off: for the Lord hath spoken it." If the sure place can be supposed to mean the sepulchre, or the treasury,—and frequently, as in the sepulchres of the kings of Jerusalem, and the tombs of the kings of Pergamus, the sepulchres were converted into treasure houses,—then the tombs in the island of Milo will be a happy illustration, within which I have myself seen nails fixed all round above the places where the bodies were deposited, and upon these nails were fixed "vessels of small quantity," vases of all forms and sizes.

The Earl of Rochester.—It is well known that this extraordinary man was, for many years of his life, an avowed infidel, and that a large portion of his time was spent in ridiculing the Bible. One of his biographers has described him as "a great wit, a great sinner, and a great penitent." Even this man was converted by the agency of the Holy Spirit in the use of his Word. Reading the fifty-third of Isaiah, he saw the truth and inspiration of the Scriptures, the Deity of the Messiah, and the value of his atonement as a rock on which sinners may build their hopes of salvation. On that atonement he rested, and died in the humble expectation of pardoning mercy and heavenly happiness.

A Word in Season.—The late Rev. Mr Reader, of Taunton, having called one day, in the course of his pastoral visits, at the house of a friend, affectionately noticed a little girl in the room, about six years of age. Among other things, he asked her if she knew that she had a bad heart, and opening the Bible, pointed her to the passage where the Lord promises to give a new heart. He instructed her to plead this promise in prayer, and she would find the Almighty faithful to his promise. About seventeen years after, a lady came to him, to propose herself for communion with the church of which he was pastor, and how inexpressible was his delight when he found that she was the very person with whom when a child, he had so freely conversed on subjects of religion, and that the conversation was blessed to her conversion. Taking her Bible, she had retired, as he advised, pleaded the promise, wept, and prayed; and the Lord, in answer to her fervent petitions, gave her what she so earnestly desired,—a new heart.

ON THE WISDOM OF GOD, AS DISPLAYED IN THE WORKS OF CREATION.

BY THE REV. DAVID WILLIAM GORDON,

THOUGH the principal design of the Word of God is to instruct us in the knowledge of salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, yet it does not confine our attention to this glorious subject. It declares, that all the works of the Most High are great, and "will be sought out by such as take pleasure therein." And having told us, that "whoso is wise will observe these things," it not only presents to our serious consideration the amazing dispensations of providence, but directs us to the study of the divine attributes, as these are exhibited in external nature. It directs our thoughts to the fertile valley, to the lofty mountain, to the far-reounding sea, to the moon as she sheds her silver light upon the earth, and to the sun pouring forth from his meridian height, the effulgence of summer day. It speaks of the God of salvation as counting the number of the stars, and calling them all by their names. It speaks of his saints as considering the heavens, the work of his fingers, the moon and the stars which he hath ordained. And it says to us all, "lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things, that bringeth forth their host by number, by the greatness of his might, for that he is strong in power," not one faileth. On lifting up our eyes to the heavens, we behold an order, a harmony, an adaptation of means to ends, all demonstrating the most perfect wisdom. We see in the magnificence of a cloudless night, the planets preserved in their circles, and impelled in their course, performing at certain distances, and in certain periods, their appointed revolutions, without collision, without confusion, without one moment's suspension of their movements, and without the slightest deviation from their respective paths. And then, when "the sun cometh forth from his chamber, rejoicing like a strong man to run his race," then is made manifest the wisdom of God, in establishing this immense magazine of fire as the centre of attraction to the planets which move regularly round it, the source of light and of heat to them all, and undiminished in respect either of its influence or of its glory through a long succession of ages. To the earth which we inhabit, the sun is appointed to rule by day, and while the earth's diurnal motion round its own axis produces vicissitude of day and night, so necessary to the preservation both of animal and of vegetable existence, its annual motion round the sun produces the change of seasons, by which we are regularly favoured with the sweetness of spring, the glory of summer, and the riches with which autumn, in its turn, adorns and blesses the year. Were the earth brought nearer to the sun, every living being would perish through excess of heat; were it placed at a greater distance, the same consequence would follow through excess of cold; so that the precise situation in which it is placed may furnish every one by whom this is considered, with a proof no less of the wisdom than the goodness of the Creator.

But it is not the heavenly bodies alone, it is also in the air, the waters and the dry land, that we are called to contemplate the wisdom of God. Every one knows how essentially necessary is the element of air, to the existence of animal life. There are many, however, who have thought but little of its properties, and it might therefore be edifying for such persons to consider, in the words of a late philosopher, that "the air is so constructed as to support clouds for rain; to afford winds, for health and traffic; to be proper for the breath of animals by its spring, and for causing sound by its motion, and transmitting light by its transparency." Philosophers are unable to explain the cause of its motion, but to this, whatever be the more immediate cause, are to be ascribed, the refreshment afforded to lands which would otherwise be scorched with heat, the prevention or removal of pestilence in various parts of the world, together with the preparation made for sowing the seed in spring, and drying the corn in harvest. Some, on turning their eyes to the ocean, may be surprised at so great a part of the globe being occupied by what seems only a wide waste of water. But how different would be their thoughts of the spacious sea, did they reflect on the discoveries which men of science have made, since they would find, that were the proportion of water less than it is, the earth would be a parched up desert, unfit for the habitation of man. To what do we owe those clouds, which, while they form in some countries an everlasting canopy from the heat of a tropical sun, descend in other regions to soften the earth with showers? To what do we owe the moisture of which the highest mountains are full, and the springs of water which support our existence, and the rivers which enrich the land? We owe all these to the ocean, which, in addition to these advantages, is also one of the principal bonds of union among all the nations of the world. Nor are we furnished with less memorable proofs of divine wisdom by turning to the earth which we inhabit. The mountains which diversify its surface, affording a much greater variety of herbs, of shrubs, and even of animals, than could possibly be found in one uniform plain; the riches to be found in its bowels; the quality of the soil, fitted to produce grass for cattle and corn for the service of man; the tree, providing, by the seed contained in it, for the renewal of its existence; the beasts of the field, providing with unerring instinct, for the purposes for which they were formed; the industry, the order, the regular government, the perfect accuracy both of arrangement and of structure, distinguishing the insect by which honey is prepared to gratify our taste with its sweetness; these are as complete attestations of divine wisdom, as the order with which the heavenly bodies perform their everlasting rounds. And how can we seriously meditate either on the soul or on the body of man, without feeling ourselves constrained to adore the wisdom of God? Did we think on the soul as capable of surveying the ample stores of the earth, the sea, and the firmament,—capable of recollecting the past, of anticipating the future, of discovering truths the most profound in every department of science, and of transmitting the acquisitions it has made to generations yet unborn; did we think on the comely proportions of the body, on the adaptation of its various parts to the uses for which they were designed, on the beautiful and amazing instruments of hearing and of sight; did we consider that a slight alteration in the structure of the eye, would make every ray of light be felt like devouring fire; did we reflect that a slight change in the structure of the ear would make every sound like the deafening roar of a cataract, and that a similar change in the nervous system, would make every touch like the stab of a sword; we would surely join with the Psalmist in saying, “we will praise Thee, O Lord, for we are fearfully and wonderfully made. O Lord, how manifold are Thy works in wisdom hast Thou made them all.”

CHRISTIAN F. GELLERT.

By THOMAS BROWN, Esq.,

Author of the “Reminiscences of an Old Traveller throughout different parts of Europe.”

CHRISTIAN FURCHTEGOTT GELLERT was born at Haynichen in Saxony, in the year 1715, and was one of a family of thirteen children. His father was pastor of the Church at Haynichen, of which he had long had the second charge, and where he died, at the age of 75, after bringing up his numerous offspring as useful members of society, upon a very moderate income. The interesting person more immediately the object of this Memoir, was noticed at a nearly period of life by a friend of the family, whose philanthropy and benevolence were manifested towards them in many instances, and particularly in forwarding the views of young Gellert, who was placed at one of the public schools, where he acquired a knowledge of different languages, and of various branches of learning, so as to qualify him for the Church, to which he was destined. He soon became convinced of the necessity of great personal exertion, and of the importance of accustoming himself to hardships and privations. This, at so early a period, was soon attended with the best effects, and had the most salutary influence in forming his character, and in developing those manly and amiable principles for which he was afterwards distinguished. He always reverted to the kindness and zeal of his first teachers with the strongest feelings of gratitude. At the age of eleven, in order to defray his little expenses, he amused himself with writing contracts of sale and various legal documents, and at a later period he humorously observed, that his native city could boast of more of these specimens of his early studies, than the world possessed of his work of a later date. At thirteen he first shewed his taste for poetry, without either having had the advantages of a liberal education, or having profited by extensive reading. He therefore entered on his career with considerable diffidence; and it was not till his second journey to Leipzig, that he became more extensively acquainted with men of taste and learning, and his talents began to shine forth with peculiar lustre. The government schools in Saxony were admirably suited to form the young mind for the last polish at a university, and it was at one of those at Meissen where Gellert stored his mind with the Greek and Latin languages; perused with avidity the most celebrated German poets, and where he lived in intimacy with Gürtner and Rabener. Gellert's weakness of constitution began at this period to shew itself. After attending his studies at Meissen for five years, he returned to his father's roof to prepare himself for the academy.

While at Leipzig, in 1784, he attended the lectures of Hofmann, Jochern, Christen, Kappen and others. After the lapse of four years he returned to his father, and at this period he mounted the pulpit as a preacher, to assist his parent in his parish duties. His first appearance in public (according to his own account of the circumstance) was rather singular. A neighbour had asked him to baptise his child, which, soon after the ceremony, expired. The young pastor was desirous of delivering a funeral sermon on the occasion. The child was to be interred at twelve o'clock. At eight on the day of the funeral, Gellert began to compose his discourse, and then to draw up an epitaph, after which he had to study and prepare himself for an extempore delivery. On commencing the third head of the sermon, his memory and self-possession suddenly forsook him, when he was relieved from his embarrassment by referring to his notes, which fortunately were at hand; his indulgent hearers attributing his state of mind to sympathy and grief for the loss of the child. He takes occasion, in this instance, to warn young divines against the consequences of over anxiety and precipitation; and the circumstance gave his character a stamp of diffidence and timidity, which accompanied him through life. From this early period his unassuming manners, unaffected piety, and ardent zeal in disseminating the great and important truths of religion, made a deep impression on his hearers, and tended more and more to increase their esteem and respect. The interest he took in his professional duties, which he followed up with redoubled ardour, however amiable and praiseworthy in itself, unfortunately tended to undermine his constitution, naturally a feeble one, and his fine feelings preyed upon a frame of too delicate a texture to bear up long against the inroads of unwearied study and intense application.

His circumstances did not at this time admit of his confining himself solely to the development of his own mind. About 1739, he undertook the education of two young gentlemen, and afterwards an additional number, and this period he considers to have been the most vigorous and healthful of his life. Some of his remarks, as well as his mode of living at this time, give us an interesting view of the transcendent qualities of his mind;—"A glass of Meissner wine," says he, "and a little bread, refreshed me in the evening, after the fatigues of the day, and I was affected to tears at the blessings I enjoyed."

He kept the Lord's day in the strictest manner, and never would even put pen to paper but in a case of the most indispensable necessity; and he disapproved sending messages of any kind:—"We pass the Sabbath," said he, "in too thoughtless a manner, and I am convinced that a more strict observance of it is indispensable to our growth in grace and good works. To pass this day free from worldly care, to try our hearts, to carry our thoughts to heavenly objects, to nourish and strengthen ourselves with the great truths of religion, is, in fact, the best preparation for our worldly labours during the remainder of the week. Forget on this day the trifling occurrences of life, and dedicate yourselves entirely to religion and to heavenly contemplation. Be grateful for the blessings of providence, for intercourse with your friends, and for the tender mercies spread over the face of nature. Pray to God, examine your heart, its good and evil tendencies, and fortify yourselves in the practice of virtue. God alone is the source of true happiness. Ask it of him, and be thankful for what you receive. We are too apt to forget our weakness and our unworthiness, amidst the cares and tumults of life, unless we lay aside a certain time to think of the power and goodness of God, and to acknowledge his greatness and our own insufficiency. These are proper occupations for the Sabbath. It is the day of prayer, and a day on which there is rest for our souls. Beware of being too confident of the efficacy of your good works. Be humble, and trust to God alone for mercy and forgiveness. See how gracious he is, and how dependant you are. For the sacrifice of earthly enjoyments you will feel the immeasurably higher blessings of religion, and receive peace from heaven. Study the Scriptures. Read the Sermons of Saurin, Mosheim, Jerusalem, Von Acken, Cramer, Schlegel, &c., which are edifying to every Christian." Such were some of the pious admonitions of this great and good man!

Gellert was always desirous of being established at Leipzig, where he had many friends, and he went there accordingly in 1741, accompanied by his nephew. He had then little to depend upon; but his truly Christian spirit supported him under every privation. From the time he lost his friend, Hofmann, who died there a few months after his arrival, Gellert occupied himself with the private education of some young noblemen, and prosecuted with ardour his taste for poetry. His delicate constitution, however, did not admit of very extraordinary application to literary pursuits, and he became extremely subject to low spirits. The Latin, the French, and particularly the English language, he studied with unabated pleasure, and, in their turns, Cicero, Rollin, the Spectator, Quintilian, Horace and Ovid, occupied his leisure hours. But his main object, at all times, was the improvement of the heart, by serious devotion and the elevating and sublime contemplation of the nature and attributes of providence. About a twelve-month after his arrival at Leipzig, he wrote several articles for a periodical journal in considerable estimation at that time, such as fables, tales, didactic poems, and several treatises in prose, which were much admired, although they did not altogether escape the pen of criticism. This tended only to animate him more and more in the field of literature; and his fables, in particular, became so popular, that the journal could hardly find purchasers, unless furnished with them for the gratification and improvement of all classes of readers. His natural, unaffected style, his undeviating principles, and his mild philanthropic sentiments gained universal admiration, and gave great currency to his early productions.

The excellence of the morals he inculcated on every occasion, gave his writings a value which all ranks of people knew well how to appreciate, and his self-love was amply gratified by the admiration they excited in and out of Germany. A poor peasant in Saxony once, at the commencement of winter, left a cart load of firewood at his door, in return for the pleasure he had received from the perusal of his fables, which proved, that a person can feel and find out beauties in writing without having studied Aristotle.

About the year 1747, his constitution began to be seriously affected by hypochondria and a sedentary life, notwithstanding his habitual serenity of mind, and the most studied regularity and temperance in his mode of living. He took refuge, as usual, in the never failing consolations of religion, which he was always so ready to impart to others. In the following year he gave out an enlarged edition of his works, in which he expressed his deep sense of gratitude for the public patronage of the first. For seven years he had enjoyed uninterruptedly an intercourse with his most intimate friends in the career of literature. Then they began to disperse. Zacharias, Giesecke, and Klopstock, had left Leipzig. C. A. Schmidt was gone to Luneburg, Gartner and Ebert to Brunswick, Cramer to Crollwitz, and J. A. Schlegel to Pforta; Rabener remained a few years longer to enjoy the society of his friend. This change of scene affected Gellert the more, under the pressure of bodily suffering. About the year 1754 he published a kind of anonymous correspondence, in order to improve the style of epistolary writing, then in fashion. This collection certainly did not possess the vivacity, wit, and sauvété of a Seignét, neither does the German language admit of the indescribable graces of the French; but although the collection was not equally well received with his other works, still it possessed sentiments worthy of the pure and unpolluted source from whence they emanated. He laboured at this time with equal zeal in composing his sacred odes and hymns, a subject quite congenial to his fine feelings, and which he pursued with all the ardour which a consciousness of its importance inspired. Not relying solely on his own judgment in this instance, he sent manuscript copies to his friends at Leipzig, Copenhagen, Berlin and Brunswick, previously to the work being printed, and he made such alterations and improvements as they, from time to time, suggested to him. These poems circulated over Germany with extraordinary rapidity, and were read and admired by all classes of persons, even in the Roman Catholic districts, where they formed an exception to the general rule for suppressing the admission of doctrines emanating from the pen of a Protestant. These pious compositions, however agreeable to the feelings and principles of the author, were only the fruits of his leisure hours, his time being principally occupied in forming the minds of the students, and in leading them to a knowledge of the fine arts, by explaining the rules of poetry, eloquence, and other branches, and particularly by cultivating their taste for literary composition. Gellert, at this period, was averse to accept of any public situation requiring extraordinary application and exertion, owing to the delicate state of his health; but his merit was too universally known and appreciated to remain long unacknowledged, particularly by the gevernment, who bestowed on him the honourable distinction of Lecturer on Philosophy, with a suitable annual remuneration. In this situation, in the midst of his young hearers, he enjoyed as much happiness as his bodily sufferings would admit of, conscious, as he was, of possessing their sincere regard and attachment, and of his own unwearied exertions to diffuse the blessings of religion, and to widen the boundaries of human knowledge.

All that art could accomplish was insufficient to alleviate, far less to remove, his sufferings. In 1753 and 1754, he went to Lauchstadt and Carlsbad, but the use of the waters and change of air only afforded him a slight temporary relief. His feelings, however, were highly gratified by the demonstrations of kindness and respect which he experienced at these places from the most distinguished characters in Europe, who, invalids like himself, were anxious for a while to be relieved from the cares and occupations of active life, and he dwells on that period, in his letters to his friends, with unmingled pleasure and delight. He mentions with the strongest emotions the gratitude of those whose children had benefited by his instructions, and gives some instances of this, too interesting to be passed over.

A nobleman in Silesia wrote to him, offering him a considerable annual allowance, which Gellert, with the most laudable disinterestedness, having declined, the same was paid to his aged mother regularly till the day of her death. This circumstance was never mentioned by Gellert without a flood of grateful tears. On another occasion, a young Prussian officer who had frequently read Gellert's works, and felt their blessed effects on his mind, in forming religious impressions, but had never seen the author, had long wished for an opportunity of testifying his gratitude to him. Some business having called the officer to Leipzig, he got himself introduced to Gellert on two different occasions. The third interview took place when they were alone, and is thus described in a letter to his friend, Count B.

"The stranger took advantage of this opportunity. 'Ah!' said he, with a kind of diffident candour, 'you are not aware of it, I am much, very much your debtor, and I beg of you to accept a proof of my gratitude, and make me no return.' At the same time," says Gellert, "he placed a small packet in my hand. 'You, Sir, said I, my debtor, whom I never saw, and to whom I never rendered the least service!' 'Say nothing,' returned the stranger, 'you must accept it. You have improved my heart by your writings, and this happiness I would not give in exchange for the whole world. Here, your friend is coming; don't let me ask you in vain; he shall not see me do my duty towards you.'

"I," says Gellert, "accepted the donation, and hardly knew from surprise how to reply. On returning home, I found the paper contained twenty Louis d'or. This surprised me more still, but it was the emotions of the heart, not the money (as money does not penetrate the soul); no—money cannot produce that sensation. No, dear Count, a thought that I had not been altogether useless, illuminated and cheered my heart. It seemed to call me to renewed exertions, and to inspire me with new hopes, and urged me not to give way under my sufferings. Such was my feeling at the moment, and I was deeply affected. I would freely give away the money to some worthy man, said I, if it could produce the same sensations. Nothing, thought I, trembling, nothing is so trifling as to escape the eye of providence. This circumstance has been intended for my happiness. How happy! A heart improved. I approached the window and looked towards Heaven. However, certain feelings ought not to be imparted to our best friends. If we express them, let us beware that ambition is not the secret spring. In short, dear Count, it was a happy evening for me, and I cannot be sufficiently grateful to God for it."

Amidst his bodily sufferings and the progress of disease, which was now making strong inroads on his delicate frame, his heavenly mind lost none of its serenity, and he found in gentle exercise, and the consolations of religion, that peace which passeth understanding. He often walked among the tombstones, meditating on the vicissitudes and changes of our mortal nature, and on that eternal life which awaits us beyond the grave. Every passing object and every passing thought tended to strengthen his confidence and belief in the transcendent goodness and mercies of God; and while he was in a manner tottering on the confines of this world, his spirit submitted, with sublime resignation, to the trials of life, while the rays of divine hope and joy were shedding their lustre on his declining years. Endeavouring to recover strength by a change of air, among some friends residing in the country, he was seized with a fever and violent spasms, which endangered his valuable life. He recovered, however, at this time, and returned to Leipzig, to resume his professional studies.

His fame and usefulness as a public speaker increased from day to day, and nearly five hundred often attended his lectures. Unwearied in his endeavours to promote their moral and religious improvement, he visited them privately, and this kind of easy intercourse tended more and more to raise him in their estimation. The general respect in which he was held, involved him also in an endless correspondence with persons of rank and influence in society, who were always anxious to consult him on matters where the happiness of their families was at stake. The particular esteem in which he was held by the Great Frederick (who was by no means partial to German philosophers), is well known, and the English Ambassador at the Court of Berlin, Mitchell, did him the most important services, perfectly unsolicited. The Prince and Princesses of the House of Saxony were also unwearied in their attentions, so that, what with the kindness of his friends and the munificence of the Court, his wants were liberally supplied, although he always declined accepting any remuneration beyond what was absolutely necessary for his appearing in society in a manner conformable to the character and rank he held in it.

He was advised by his friends again to try the waters of Carlsbad, and went there a second time, in 1763. He afterwards revisited that place on two or three occasions, having derived some little benefit by the waters, and he experienced the same attentions from the distinguished individuals he met there which he had done before. His altered appearance, however, on his return to Leipzig to resume his public lectures, was a matter of general sympathy and regret; his delivery and aspect had the serenity of a calm summer evening, previously to the setting of the sun. It is well known with what interest he was listened to in the latter years of life, from 1765 to 1769, by the Electoral family and the Court, who never ceased to manifest their esteem and regard for him. The Elector sent him a quiet horse to ride upon, and took every means to preserve so valuable a life; but the period of Gellert's dissolution was now fast approaching, and no human art could be of any more service.

In 1769 he gave the finishing hand to his lectures on public morals, which were afterwards published by his friends, Schlegel and Herder. In December 1769, nature could no longer be supported, and his physical powers were unable to perform their usual functions. Four days before his death, he gave the necessary directions about his affairs, with his usual serenity of mind, surrounded by his brother and some friends, and then collecting all his remaining strength, he raised himself in his bed, uncovered his hoary head, and prayed with so much earnestness, with so much humility, with so deep a sense of the mercies of God, that those around him were quite overpowered in thus witnessing the approaching dissolution of this dying patriarch, this second Jacob, directing his thoughts and views to Heaven. He dwelt on the great mercies he had enjoyed through life; on the kind attachment of his friends, for whose welfare he invoked the God of all mercies; on various passages of the New Testament having a reference to the unspeakable goodness of the blessed Redeemer. After two or three days prolongation of a painful existence, he expired, on the 13th December 1769.

Several monuments were erected to his memory in Germany. The most conspicuous is that in the Church of St John in Leipzig. It represents, in alabaster, a medallion, with the head of Gellert, crowned with laurel, offered by Religion to Virtue, which appear in the shape of two female figures, in appropriate attitudes. Under the monument is the following inscription:—

“CHRISTIAN FURCHTEGOTT GELLERT.

“Erected to the memory of this teacher and example of virtue and religion, by a society of his friends and contemporaries, eye-witnesses of his merits.—Born, 4th July 1715.—Died, 13th December 1769.”

I have thus endeavoured to give a brief, but, I trust, not an uninteresting account of the life of this good man. Such eminent characters, like those brilliant meteors which occasionally shoot across our little orb, appear but seldom to cheer and console us in our earthly pilgrimage.

Of all the German writers, Gellert has unquestionably conferred the greatest blessings on his country, by his excellent example, and by the diffusion of his pious sentiments among the great mass of the people. It is impossible, without being versant in the German language, and having lived in many parts of Germany, to form a conception of the influence his writings have had in promoting the peace of families, in rendering the dispositions of individuals more mild and amiable, and generally, in spreading every kind and friendly feeling over the whole domestic circle.

A WORSHIPPING ASSEMBLY AT HIDO, IN THE ISLAND OF HAWAII.

[Extracted from the Rev. Mr Stewart's "Visit to the South Seas." Fisher, Son, & Jackson. London, 1832.]

“THE scenes of the Sabbath have been such, that a review of them, in my own mind, will not be an abuse of sacred time, nor will their perusal give rise to thoughts and affections unsuited to a day of God.

“At an early hour of the morning, even before we had taken our breakfast on board ship, a single islander here or there, or a group of three or four, wrapped in their large mantles of various hues, might be seen winding their way among the groves fringing the bay on the east, or descending from the hills and ravine on the north, towards the chapel; and by degrees their numbers increased, till, in a short time, every path along the beach, and over the uplands, presented an almost uninterrupted procession of both sexes, and of every age, all pressing to the House of God. So few canoes were round the ship yesterday, and the landing-place had been so little thronged as our boats passed to and fro, that one might have thought the district but thinly inhabited; but now, such multitudes were seen gathering from various directions, that the exclamation, ‘What crowds of people! what crowds of people!’ was heard from the quarter-deck to the fore-castle.

“Even to myself, it was a sight of surprise; surprise, not at the magnitude of the population, but that the object for which they were evidently assembling, should bring together so great a multitude. And as my thoughts re-echoed the words, ‘What crowds of people!’ remembrances and affections of deep power came over me; and the silent musings of my heart were, ‘What a change—what a happy change!’ when at this very place, only four years ago, the known wishes and example of chiefs of high authority, the daily persuasion of teachers, added to motives of curiosity and novelty, could scarce induce a hundred of the inhabitants to give an irregular, careless, and impatient attendance on the services of the sanctuary! but now, ‘Like mountain-torrents pouring to the main,

From every glen a living stream came forth;
From every hill in crowds they hastened down,
To worship Him, who deigns in humblest fane,
On wildest shore, to meet th’ upright in heart.’

“The scene, as looked on from our ship, in the stillness of a brightly-beaming Sabbath morning, was well calculated, with its associations, to prepare the mind for strong impressions on a nearer view, when the conclusion of our own public worship would allow us to go on shore. Mr Goodrich had apprised us, that he had found it expedient to hold the services of the Sabbath, usually attended at all the other stations at nine o’clock in the morning, and at four in the afternoon, both in the fore-part of the day, that all might have the benefit of two sermons, and still reach their abodes before nightfall; for

‘Numbers dwelt remote,
And first must traverse many a weary mile,
To reach the altar of the God they love.’

And it was arranged that, on this occasion, the second service should be postponed till the officers should be at liberty to leave the ship. It was near twelve o’clock when we went on shore; the captain and first lieutenant, the purser, surgeon, several of the midshipmen, and myself. Though the services had commenced when we landed, large numbers were seen circling the doors without; but, as we afterwards found, only from the impracticability of obtaining places within. The house is an immense structure, every part of which was filled, except a small area in front of the pulpit, where seats were reserved for us, and to which we made our way in slow and tedious procession, from the difficulty of finding a spot to place even our footsteps, without treading on limbs of the people, seated on their feet, as closely almost as they could be stowed.

“As we entered, Mr Goodrich paused in his sermon till we should be seated. I ascended the pulpit beside him, from which I had a full view of the congregation. The suspense of attention in the people was only momentary, notwithstanding the entire novelty to them of the laced coats and other appendages of naval uniform. I can scarce describe the emotions experienced, in glancing an eye over the immense number, seated so thickly on the matted floor as to seem literally one mass of heads, covering an area of more than nine thousand square feet. The sight was most striking, and soon became, not only to myself, but to some of my fellow-officers, deeply affecting.

“I have gazed on many worshipping assemblies, and of every variety of character, from those formed of the high and the princely, with a splendour and pageantry of train befitting the magnificence of the cathedrals in which they bowed, to the humblest ‘two or three’ who ever came together at a place ‘where prayer is wont to be made;’—I have listened with delighted attention to some of the highest eloquence the pulpits of America and England of the present day can boast, and have watched with sympathetic excitement the effect produced by it, till all who heard were wrapt into an enthusiasm of high-toned feeling, at the sublimity of the theme presented;—I have seen tears of conviction and of penitence flow freely, as if to the breaking of the heart, under the sterner truths of the Word of God; and not unfrequently, too, have witnessed, as the announcement of ‘Peace; be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee,’ has fallen on the soul, smiles of hope and joy rapidly take their place; but it was left for a worshipping assembly at Hido, the most obscure corner of these distant islands, to excite the liveliest emotions ever experienced, and leave the deepest impressions of the extent and unsearchable riches of the Gospel, which I have ever known—emotions and impressions derived simply from an ocular demonstration of the power of the Word of God on untutored man, which is without a parallel in existing events, if not in the records of history.

“The depth of the impression arose from the irresistible conviction, that the Spirit of God was there; it could have been nothing else. With the exception of the inferior chiefs having charge of the district, and their dependants, of two or three native members of the church and of the mission family, scarce one of the whole multitude was in other than the native dress, the maro and the kikei, the simple garments of their primitive state. In this respect, and in the attitude of sitting, the assembly was purely pagan, totally unlike those of the Society Islands, already described, as unlike as to one at home. But the breathless silence, the eager attention, the half-suppressed sigh, the tear, the various feelings, sad, peaceful, joyous, discoverable in the faces of many, all spoke the presence of an invisible but omnipotent power, the power that can alone melt and renew the heart of man, even as it alone first brought it into existence.

“From the thousands present, I might select many individuals whose appearance was such as to stamp these impressions indelibly on my heart. The aspect of one, at least, I can never forget; and will attempt to describe. It was a diminutive woman, shrivelled by age till little more of her figure, with an appearance of health, was left, than skin and bone. The style of her features, however, was of the regular and more pleasing character found among the islanders, with an amiable and benignant expression, which, in connection with an entirely whitened head, exacted from the observer a look of kindness in return. Folded in a large mantle of black tapa, she was leaning, when my eyes first fell upon her, against a pillar near the pulpit, beside which she was sitting, with her head inclined upwards, and her eyes fixed upon the preacher. There was not only a seriousness, but a deep pensiveness in her whole aspect, that rivetted my attention; and as Mr Goodrich proceeded in his discourse, more than one tear made its way down her deeply wrinkled cheeks.

“I had not, in my long absence, so entirely forgotten the native language, as not to understand much that was said. After some time, this sentence was uttered: ‘We are all sinners, but we have a God and Saviour, who will forgive us our sins, if we ask it of him. It is our duty to pray for this to God, and he hears the prayers of all who approach him in sincerity.’ I happened, at the moment, to look again upon this object; her lips moved in the evident and almost audible repetition of the sentence. She again repeated it, as if to be certain that she heard and understood it correctly; and, as she did so, a peaceful smile spread over every feature, tears gushed rapidly from her eyes, and she hid her face in the folds of her garment. Could I be deceived in the interpretation of this case? could I be mistaken in the causes and the nature of those varied emotions, under the circumstances in which they were beheld; and in one, of whom I had never heard, and whom I had never before seen? No, I could not; and if so, what is the language they speak? they plainly say that this poor woman, grown grey in the ignorance and varied degradation of heathenism, by ‘the lamp let down from heaven,’ sees herself to be a sinner, and is oppressed to sadness under a sense of her guilt. But she hears of pardon and salvation, freely given, to all who will freely receive; hears of the glorious liberty of the Gospel, and of all the rich privileges it confers, even to high access and intimate communion with the Father of spirits; hears, and believes, and sinks before her God in tears of gratitude and of joy.

“The simple appearance and every department of that obscure congregation, whom I had once known, and at no remote period, only as a set of rude, licentious, and wild pagans, did more to rivet the conviction of the divine origin of the Bible, and of the holy influences by which it is accompanied to the hearts of men, than all the arguments, and apologies, and defences of Christianity, I ever read.

“Towards evening, Mr Stribbling and myself went again on shore, and remained till late, learning from our Missionary friends the most gratifying intelligence, in corroboration of the opinion formed, in the morning, of the state of the people. An entire moral reformation has taken place in the vicinity of this station. Though latest established, and long far behind others in success and interest, it bids fair now to be not a whit behind the very chiefest, in its moral and religious achievements. Instruction of every kind is eagerly and universally sought; and only last week, not less than ten thousand people were assembled at an examination of schools. The mission-house is daily crowded with earnest inquirers in every right way; evil customs and atrocious vices are abandoned; a strict outward conformity to good morals observed; and numbers, it is hoped, and confidently believed, have yielded, and are yielding, themselves to all the charities and affections of genuine piety. From many an humble dwelling, now,

‘Is daily heard
The voice of prayer and praise to Jacob’s God;
And many a heart in secret heaves the sigh
To Him who hears well-pleas’d the sigh contrite.’

Even in the hut of the child-murderer,

‘The father, with his offspring dew,
Now bends the knee to God, and humbly asks
That he would bless them with a parent’s love—
With heavenly manna feed their hungry souls,
And on their hearts, as Hermon’s dew, descend.’

THE LOST TRANSGRESSOR.

BY A CLERGYMAN.

SOME years ago there lived in the south of Scotland a young man of respectable connections, who, besides possessing superior talents, had received a sound Christian education. In his early days he had been strictly conscientious in the discharge of filial duty, and the observance of the common decencies and proprieties of life. Such, in fact, was the excellence of his character, and such the extent of his attainments, that he held a very high place among the young men of the burgh where he lived. His parents were proud of their son, and looked forward to his proving their comfort and their stay in their declining years. In short, all thought well of him, and there appeared to be little danger of any serious deviation from the paths of rectitude, as he had passed unsullied through the days of heedless youth. The family to which this young person belonged were, I believe, decidedly pious, and their acquaintances generally of the same character. All this led the subject of our remarks into frequent and intimate conversation concerning the great and fundamental doctrines of our holy Religion, and in consequence of his talents and education, he soon acquired a clear comprehension, not merely of the doctrines themselves, but of the mode of defending them against the various objections which are current among infidels. Nay, such was his love of argument, that he was accustomed to display his skill in urging the infidel cavils, and so great was his tact and talent on these occasions, that it was often difficult for uneducated persons to make a satisfactory reply, or blunt or repel his subtle weapons. For a while this dexterity attracted the more notice among his associates as it was clearly understood that he did not hold these objections as his own, but merely suggested them for the purpose of eliciting truth in new forms, and drawing out of pious minds what, till thus beset, they scarcely known they possessed. Yet, alas! this habit became in his case a fatal snare, and proved his utter ruin. Proud of his abilities, and anxious, on every occasion, to display his attainments, he sought opportunities of exhibiting his wonderful tact in making the worse appear the better cause. His companions and friends seeing the pernicious bent of his mind, withdrew from his company, after in vain remonstrating with him upon the unfortunate habit which he was fast acquiring. If not cured by reproof, one would have thought he might have been reclaimed, by finding none with whom to engage in idle controversy. But evils indulged blunt the best perceptions of the soul, and pride and ambition, when cherished, become ruling passions; and just as one class of persons, who were necessary to feed these passions, eluded him, another was sought, from whom the desired gratification might be obtained. And so far did this cherished and growing evil carry him, that the interval between morning and afternoon service on the Sabbath was employed in this favourite exercise. Then, and especially on Sacramental occasions, he used to join himself to the little groups of pious country persons who, on a fine summer's day, were seen assembled in the open fields to spend that portion of sacred time in recounting what they had heard. It soon became a particular amusement to Mr B. to start some difficulty, and carry it on till he had put to silence the chief men in these little companies. Principle became more and more vitiated, and every amiable and proper feeling became still more feeble, as he saw pious parents put to blush before their children, by whom they had hitherto been revered as their leaders and teachers in matters of Religion. But as right principle and pious conduct are a present reward, so bad principle and ungodly conduct are a present curse, and may ever be taken as forerunners of coming evil. Sooner or later the sin of such men will find them out. God's Word cannot fail, just because God's power cannot fail. Every profane Esau has the true and all-powerful God against him. Every one who jeats with divine things, and makes a practice of desecrating the character of God, and of trampling on the best feelings of his fellow-men, must expect, if mercy prevent not, to be in his turn made the jest of a God of burning jealousy and eternal justice. "Behold, ye despisers, and wonder and perish." "I will mock when your fear cometh." "I will laugh when desolation cometh upon you."

These new sources of low gratification, this wicked and worthless employment of talents, that might have been turned to a very different use, soon came to an end, and we find him seeking in the ale-house what he could no longer obtain on the sacred hours of the Sabbath, and among the happy little companies of God's dear people. But where all scoff at divine things, the chair of the scornful is no high place, no great dignity; and such a clear and indelible impression of this is engraved on our common nature, that the very qualification for which clubs of such profane persons elect their chairman, is that he excels all his fellows in the iniquities to which they are addicted, and that he has ability, boldness, and tact to utter the unhallowed jest, in cases where every other among them would feel abashed and dispirited. Horrid ambition! How like the character of Satan, as drawn by the immortal Milton, "Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven." In this new field he soon attained such notoriety and boldness, as to engage in deeds so impious, that we cannot even think of them without feeling an inward horror. One Sabbath morning, when they had risen from their profane revels, they in one band betook themselves to the neighbouring hills to spend the holy day in amusements, with the view of recovering from the inebriation of the past night. Knowing that it was the Lord's day, they attempted in every way to ward off the solemn impressions which were ever and anon returning upon them, they began to ridicule the services of the sanctuary, and to strengthen their sinking fortitude by the repeated laughs which these unhallowed jests called forth. How true is it, that evil men and seducers wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived! They glory in their own shame, and drink in iniquity as the ox drinketh water. His conduct was, as might be expected, fatal to his reputation in the place of his nativity, and he had as much shame left as to make him leave it without delay. He had had a prosperous business, but now it was gone; he had had a good name, but now he was so infamous, that he could not bear to live among his former companions. Sabbath-breakers are perpetually deteriorating in character. There is an overwhelming load of guilt accumulating on their heads, and a perpetual evidence gathering on their own character, shewing that it is not moral principle or piety that keeps them what they are, but a mere combination of circumstances, the removal, or change, of any one of which, might as completely and effectually break them down, as in the case of this poor man. On leaving the place of his nativity, he repaired to the metropolis of Scotland, where, for several years, he dragged out a miserable existence. He wrought at his business for some time, and might have done well, but under the influence of habits of intemperance, all his feelings and affections were perpetually assimilating to a lower and a still lower grade of companionship. All labour was at length given up, and those haunts of wickedness and scenes of dissipation and wretchedness, which, alas, are fearfully numerous in our large cities, became the places of his most frequent and favourite resort. And who that repairs to these scenes of desolation and death ever returns? "She hath cast down many wounded; yea, many strong men have been slain by her: Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death." But now his last, his worst, companions must be encountered,—disease, poverty, mental wretchedness, and an untimely death. "If our transgressions and our sins be upon us, and we pine away in them, how should we then live?" How can the transgressor escape when God maketh inquisition for blood? "If he that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses, of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of Grace."

When laid on the bed from which he never again rose, he was visited by one of those pious country persons whom he had much grieved and offended by his conduct. From this Christian friend I had the account of his sufferings and the state of his mind in the last stage of his earthly career. This friend had been indefatigable in seeking him out, and when he found him, no less kind and attentive in visiting him. The bodily state of Mr B. was loathsome beyond description, but his mind was still more wretched even than the body was loathsome. His pious friend presented the Lord Jesus to him, in all his freeness and fulness, as "the Saviour of sinners, and able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by him." He assured him, "that the blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin." But the poor unhappy man could take no comfort from any thing he said, and found no consolation either in the character or work of the Blessed Redeemer. He was, to all appearance, left to eat the fruit of his own doings, and was filled with his own devices. Remorse and despair had taken possession of his mind, and the very thought of God caused terror, and the very name of Jesus created the greatest uneasiness. His emphatic answer to all that was addressed to him was, "I know all that as well as you do, but I can find no relief from it." During the last visit which his truly Christian friend ever paid him, the sufferer begged him not to speak to him any more of these things, as he felt as if the flames of hell were kindling in his soul already. This was his final attempt to exclude the last lingering rays of the Sun of Righteousness. What an awful illustration of that passage of the Word of God:—"If we sin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins; but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries."

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. GEORGE BURNS, D. D., Minister of Tweedsmuir.

"God is witness."—1 THESS. ii. 5.

SUCH was the appeal made by St. Paul in vindication of his conduct as a minister of the Gospel. He, and his fellow-labourers in the same cause, had been injuriously treated by the Jews, in different parts of Macedonia. They were charged with insincerity and unworthy motives, in their attempts to convert men to the faith of the Gospel, and every effort was employed to oppose or to check the influence of their labours. Impelled, therefore, by the boldness of sincerity and the energy of Christian zeal, the apostle maintains his superiority to every thing disingenuous and unworthy; and declares before the searcher of hearts, that, however open his principles and conduct, as an apostle of Christ, might be to the misrepresentations of weak or designing men, in the eye of Omniscience they could not fail to appear in their genuine and undissembled colours. "For our exhortation," says he, "was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile. But as we were allowed of God to be put in trust with the Gospel, even so we speak; not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth our hearts. For neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloak of covetousness; God is witness."

It is not intended to view the words of the text merely in reference to the circumstances of St. Paul, and of his brethren in the ministry. It is proposed to view them in a more extended sense, as of universal application, and of universal influence.

1. Consider the effect which a conviction of the solemn truth that "God is witness," is calculated to have on the principles and conduct of good men.

The presence of one whom we esteem and love, and whose good opinion we are consequently anxious to obtain, operates as a powerful incentive to the performance of deeds which challenge his approbation. To a dutiful child, the eye of a beloved parent watching his steps, and prepared to sparkle with indignation, or to beam with complacency, according as his conduct is despicable or praise-worthy, acts with a powerful and unceasing influence on the whole of his feelings and deportment in the world. Hence, it has been given as a rule, by some ancient moralists, that, in order to excel in virtue, we should constantly act as if we were under the immediate inspection of some great and distinguished personage. Even the opinion of the public, which is generally capricious and fluctuating, possesses a powerful influence on the great majority of mankind; and though now and then, a few daring spirits may be found bidding defiance to its decisions, yet these very men are actuated by the secret wish, that the singularity of their conduct may ultimately procure that suffrage in their favour, which they now affect to despise. But what is the approbation of the wisest and the best of men? What is the love of an earthly parent, though endeared by every tie of nature, and bound by every claim of duty? What is the highest estimation of the whole world of mortals, compared with the smiles of that God, whose "loving-kindness is better than life?" Men are determined in their judgment wholly by external appearances, they frequently overlook secret virtue and unobtrusive goodness, and too often that praise which is due to the deserving is lavished on the specious but artful pretender to excellence. The judgment of God, however, is unerring and impartial. He "overlooks not the meanest or most obscure of his servants; he marks the good purpose of their hearts ere it ripens into action; and he rewards, with approbation and love, the most secret and inconsiderable office of tenderness towards the humblest suffering member of the Redeemer. He is deceived by no fallacious appearances nor outward attractions; he is determined in his judgment by the  motive, and not by the action, and the grounds of his decision being thus sure and infallible, he can never fail to 'judge righteous judgment.'" The good man, then, while he acts under the impression of the solemn truth that "God is witness," has a constant incentive for acquitting himself with dignity, in the thought that a Being, who marks, with the nicest discrimination every lineament of excellence and every feature of deformity, inspects his conduct; he feels himself impelled in his progress to the perfection of excellence, by the conviction that the most secret wish of his heart, and the feeblest effort of his life, after resemblance to God, and the enjoyment of his favour, is not unnoticed or overlooked; and he is sweetly but powerfully animated in all his Christian labours, by the assurance and hope that that great Being, who now looks with the tenderest sensibility on all his weaknesses and wants, shall, on the great day of final retribution, pronounce the decisive sentence, with all the majesty of the judge, mingled with all the compassion of the father.

But let us contemplate the effects which are produced, by a sense of the divine omniscience, on the conduct of the Christian, in the opposite conditions of prosperity and adversity. Not only does it lead to the exercise of temperance and self-government, and to the moderate use of temporal advantages; it likewise enables him to taste the full enjoyment of prosperous circumstances. To men who overlook or disregard the presence of God, the events of life, however pleasing for the moment, appear fluctuating and transient; and being destitute of that confidence which reposes on a wise and benevolent providence, they want provision for a day of adversity, and live in the constant apprehension of a reverse. They dread the vengeance of heaven, which they have done nothing to avert,—they tremble at every event of providence, lest it should prove the instrument of their destruction,—every prosperous circumstance in their lot is mingled with reflections, and with fears, which equally conspire to annihilate enjoyment. But from such sources of disquietude and alarm, the man who realises the inspection of God, is happily delivered. To him the face of nature is enlivened and beautified, for he beholds God in every thing; the pleasing emotion of gratitude to the giver, mingles with the enjoyment of the gift; enlightened trust in the continued protection and favour of God, increases his relish for present manifestations of love,—and the assurance that sources of comfort and happiness will be discovered amid the darkest and most discouraging dispensations of providence, disarms futurity of its terrors.

But let us suppose the scene reversed,—let us suppose the Christian beset with calamities, oppressed with penury and disease, or called to mourn the loss of friends who soothed his sorrows and ministered to his wants. He knows, and rejoices in the conviction, that “God is witness,” that though he may be neglected by men, he is not overlooked by God, that “a friend who sticketh closer than a brother,” compassionates all the peculiarities of his personal and relative afflictions, and that, though his “friends may be put far from him, and his acquaintances into darkness,” God still lives to whisper in his ear, while he realises, in his blessed experience, the gracious promise, “I will never leave thee nor forsake thee!” O Christian! are you the victim of those hidden sorrows with which the world cannot sympathise, and is your spirit ready to sink within you? Be not discouraged, for yours is “the joy with which a stranger cannot intermeddle.” “God is witness!” He listens to the sigh which escapes from your bosom; he marks the tear as it drops from your eye; “in all your afflictions he is afflicted.” Are you loaded with the reproaches of the profane? behold “God is witness!” He observes your sufferings in a good cause, and “the reproaches of them which reproach you fall upon him.” Do you bewail the power of corruption within you? “God is witness!” He marks every struggle of the spirit for the victory over the flesh, he stands by you in the hour of conflict, and will, ere long, make you “more than a conqueror through Him that loved you.” Do you mourn in secret for the abominations which are done in the land? behold! “God is witness!” “He turneth the hearts of men as the rivers of water, their secret sins are in the light of his countenance,” and ere long his justice will be triumphantly displayed in the punishment of those who violate his laws. Do you deplore the hidings of your heavenly father’s countenance? “Hope thou in God, for thou shalt yet praise him.” He is witness still! “For a small moment have I forsaken thee, but with great mercies will I gather thee. In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer.” But perhaps you tremble for the ark of God, clouds and darkness may seem to be gathering around your beloved Zion; the commotions abroad in the earth, with all their desolating influence, may threaten, for a time, to arrest the splendid march of the Prince of Peace, and to perpetuate the reign of ignorance and error, of misery and vice, in the universe of God. But behold! a gleam of hope shoots forth athwart the gloom which shrouds the face of creation! “God is witness!” “He rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm.” He superintends the diversified agency of human passions, “making the wrath of man to praise him.” He overrules the opposing claims of human policy, and the collision of jarring interests, for purifying the moral atmosphere, for leading the nations to humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, for removing corrupt institutions, which the perverse ingenuity of man has opposed to the progress of truth, and for securing the ultimate and everlasting triumphs of the cross. “Zion said, the Lord hath forsaken me, and my God hath forgotten me.” “Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? Yea, she may forget, yet will I not forget thee. Behold I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands, thy walls are continually before me.”

2. Consider the statement of the text, in its bearing on the principles and conduct of bad men.

So much does a sense of shame, and a dread of human punishment, influence the conduct of men, that secrecy is generally resorted to as a shelter for crimes. Concerning the thief and the impure, it is affirmed in Scripture, that “the morning is to them as the shadow of death; if one know them, they are in the terrors of the shadow of death;” and the ungodly, of every description, according to the same infallible testimony, “love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil.” Conscience sometimes checks them in their course, but its admonitions are disregarded, and at length it ceases to reprove. The guilt of sin, as a violation of infinite obligations to God, is overlooked, and the awe with which the threatened vengeance of heaven should impress the minds of men is repelled or overcome. If reputation be preserved entire, if the vengeance of human laws be escaped; or if, in any way, the object in view can be attained without exposing to the dangers which intervene, every thing is imagined to be gained. Would this conduct any longer be presented to our view, if men acted under the conviction that “God is witness?” The consciousness of his inspection and the consequent dread of his frowns, would act as a constant and powerful dissuasive from sin in every form. It would act as a watch on all the thoughts, and words, and actions; it would lead to right conduct, in opposition to all the allurements of sense, and all the hopes of concealment; it would banish vice, in all its debasing and malignant characters, from the intelligent and moral creation. The reason is obvious. It removes the causes of evil which lie deep in the human heart; it commands the principles of conduct, and directs them in their operation; it purifies the fountain of action, and opens a channel for the streams of virtue and of happiness.

But it is not merely the simple conviction that his conduct is observed, which has such a tendency to overawe the sinner, and to paralyse the energies of his corrupted heart. The character of the witness gives to the acting principle additional and overpowering force. The representations given of the Divine Being in the inspired record, are every way calculated to impress and to alarm the sinner. He is declared to be a God of holiness, a Being who seeth impurity even in the brightest angels, and who cannot look upon sin without detestation and abhorrence. And does such a pure and holy Being contemplate the impurity of the sinner's heart, the sins which he commits in secret, and the various enormities which disgrace his conduct in active life? What a solemn thought! Enough to make the stoutest heart to tremble, and to unnerve the energies of the most deep-rooted corruption. Evil thoughts may be indulged, and their guilt may be unknown or overlooked,—the language of impurity and profaneness may be uttered, and no horror felt for its aggravations,—deeds of dishonesty and baseness may be committed in secret or in darkness, and exultation felt at the thought of their concealment; but an eye like a flame of fire darts through the covering which veils the guilty heart, penetrates its secret recesses, and detects the impurities with which it is stained,—an ear which listens to the gentlest whisper that escapes from the human bosom, attends to every idle word which drops from the lips of depravity,—and a Being to whom “the darkness and the light are both alike,” marks the most hidden deeds of the sinner's life with the most scrupulous care. And shall it not strike terror into the breast of the most daring profligate in the midst of his misdeeds, to reflect that that God who “understandeth his thoughts afar off,” who knoweth every word on his tongue, by whom “all his actions are weighed,” and against whom his sins are committed, is a Being of spotless holiness, armed with vengeance against all the workers of iniquity, and only prevented by the long-suffering patience of his own nature, from overwhelming them at once with everlasting destruction! Sin may be palliated so as to lose its deformity in the eyes of men, and hopes may be indulged by the sinner, that the denunciations of wrath shall ultimately prove mere empty threats to keep him in awe; but in the sight of a pure and holy God, sin must ever “appear exceeding sinful,” and sooner shall heaven and earth pass away, than the justice of the Eternal shall fail to execute vengeance on the impenitent offender.

This naturally introduces another idea on the same branch of the subject, namely, the intimate connection between the character of God, as present witness and future judge. The same authority which tells us that God now observes the conduct of men, assures us also, that he shall one day bring them to a strict account. Thoughts of evil may pass through the mind, the language of impiety may be uttered and forgotten, and deeds of wickedness may elude the keenest vigilance of men, but these thoughts, words, and actions, are all registered in heaven, and “God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it hath been good or whether it hath been evil.” What a solemn thought! that nothing escapes the eye of Omniscience, and that nothing shall be forgotten or overlooked at the day of judgment! Eventful period! when every evil thought which the heart conceived, every idle word which dropt from the lips, and every unbalanced deed which the eye of man never beheld, shall be disclosed, and proclaimed before assembled worlds. Characters which have passed from the earth unsullied even by the breath of calumny, shall then be exhibited in the most gloomy colours, and from the decision of the Judge there shall be no appeal. The truth of the representation which shall then be given, cannot for one moment be questioned, for the Judge now scans the most concealed parts of that conduct on which he shall then decide, and his faithfulness and impartiality are equally above suspicion. Tremble, then, ye ungodly and profane! for an infallible Witness, to whom all hearts are open, now follows you with his searching eye, and all your thoughts, words, and actions, stand on record till the day of judgment. “There is nothing hid which shall not be revealed, nor covered that shall not be made known.” “There is a day when God shall make manifest the hidden counsels of the heart; when that which hath been spoken in darkness, shall be heard in the light; and that which ye have spoken in the ears in closets, shall be proclaimed upon the house-tops.” O could I exhibit to your view an impenitent sinner just about to appear in the presence of the Witness and Judge of his conduct, how would it silence for ever the whispers of infidelity! how would it make the illusions of sense to vanish! how would it cover with gloom the gayest scenes of life! I contemplate him stretched on the bed of death,—every look bespeaks the agony of his inmost soul,—he struggles for breath to utter the language of self-reproach and self-condemnation,—with the sullenness of black despair (for the hour of mercy is fled for ever) he yields the contest to the king of terrors, and is hurried into the eternal world! But Oh! could we follow him to the land of souls, and contemplate him standing in the presence of his Judge, how still more awful would the sight be! The throne is erected,—“the Judge of quick and dead” is seated on his tribunal,—around him are assembled unnumbered worlds,—the poor, self-condemned criminal, with shame and confusion of face, appears before his Judge,—he “calls on the rocks and mountains to fall on him and cover him from the wrath of the Lamb,"—his request is denied, and no shelter is found,—the sentence of condemnation is passed, and—but here compassion to human sensibility compels me to stop. To behold the spectacle of misery, and to listen to the howlings of despair which succeed, would be too much for human nature to endure; for it is too much for mortal speech to describe, for human thought to conceive. The presence of God, as witness, may now be disregarded by a gay and a thoughtless world, but ere long, his appearance as Judge triumphant, shall command the awe of countless myriads, and fill the breasts of ten thousand generations with one pang of consternation and dismay.

Thus, reader, have we called your attention to the influence which an impression of the divine presence and omniscience is calculated to have on the feelings and conduct of good and bad men. Be entreated to lay your heart open to its salutary operation. If a Christian indeed, let it prove in your experience an incentive to holiness, a zest to the enjoyments of prosperity, and a source of consolation and support in the midst of sorrows. If still among the number of those who are living in pleasure, and "dead while they live," O be persuaded, ere "the day of your merciful visitation" expire, to "stand in awe" of Him who sees and hates your conduct, to dread that vengeance which is denounced against your evil thoughts and words, as well as ungodly deeds, to view, in the light of a heart-searching witness, the length, and breadth, and depth of your deficiencies, and "to flee for refuge to the hope set before you in the Gospel."—

PROPERTIES OF LIGHT.

By THE REV. JAMES BRODIE,
Minister of Monimail.

In the account given in Scripture of the work of creation, after the brief and general statement that "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," we are informed, that the Lord said, "Let there be light, and there was light." The sublimity of the language here employed, has called forth the admiration, not only of Christian authors, but even of Heathen critics, the most celebrated of whom speaks of it as the brightest example of the true sublime that he had ever seen. But if the language merit attention, the fact it describes is yet more worthy of regard, and a small portion of our time will not be unprofitably spent, in considering the properties of the wonderful substance thus called into being.

The priority of its formation leads us to consider Light as the primary requisite for the preservation of the present constitution of the globe, and, accordingly, science has shewn that it is one of the most powerful agents in nature, and that without it, neither plant nor animal could exist.

Its essential nature has not yet been discovered. Opinions of very opposite kinds are entertained by the learned, respecting its origin and propagation, while the laws which it obeys, and the effects which it produces, are but imperfectly understood. There are, however, certain general qualities which have been fully determined by observation and experiment. Of these, the following may be termed its primary properties:—

1. It radiates as from a centre, that is, it is sent forth equally, in all directions, from the shining body. When a candle, for example, is brought into a room, the objects above, below, and on either side of the flame are alike illuminated, nor can we discover any part of these objects on which the rays do not fall, unless they be intercepted by some other body coming in between.

As a necessary consequence of this property, the intensity or strength of Light is diminished in proportion to the square of the distance to which the object illuminated is removed from the flame. One candle appears as bright, when brought within a foot of the eye, as four do at the distance of two feet, or as nine at the distance of three.

2. The rays of Light proceed in straight lines. This property may be demonstrated to the eye by causing Light to pass through small holes into a dark room filled with dust. It is also proved, by the fact, that objects cannot be seen through bent tubes.

3. Light moves with prodigious velocity. It has been ascertained that the rate of its motion is nearly 200,000 miles, (a distance equal to eight times the circumference of the globe,) in a second of time.

4. The particles of Light move independently of surrounding objects, and of each other. Sounds and odours are transmitted through the air; even electricity, the substance that bears the nearest resemblance to Light, requires a conducting medium; Light alone penetrates the void of space; and each separate ray continues its course unaffected by the stoppage or reflection of those around it.

5. When Light falls on any object a considerable portion is absorbed or lost, but the greater part is reflected. The manner in which this reflection takes place depends on the nature of the surface on which the light falls. When that is highly polished, as in mirrors, the rays are reflected with such regularity that they form a perfect image of the body from which they originally proceeded. In this case, it has been observed, that the angle of incidence is equal to the angle of reflection, that is, if two lines are drawn from the mirror, one to the original object, and the other to the place where its image is seen, they form, on opposite sides, equal angles with the surface of the mirror. In order to see the image, the eye must therefore be as far on the one side of the looking-glass, as the object is on the other.

Mirrors have been in use from the earliest ages. Before the invention of glass they were simply plates of metal, highly polished. In the book of Job (chapter xxxvii. 18.) the sky is said to be "strong as a molten looking-glass," in allusion to the solid mirrors then employed. In Exodus xxxviii. 8, we are told, that the Jewish women dedicated their "looking-glasses" to the service of the sanctuary, and that Moses made of them "the laver of brass and the foot of it of brass."

When a comparatively rough surface is exposed to Light, the rays are reflected irregularly, and instead of forming an image, in one particular spot, are diffused in all directions. Every part that is illuminated becomes a centre, from which Light radiates all around, and thus, the object is visible from every side. This irregular or diffusive reflection enables us to judge of the form, size, and position of all those bodies, which do not themselves emit Light; and by it, more especially, we are guided in our labours and journeyings.

The only natural mirror is the surface of water in a calm. There we see a perfect picture of the sky and scenery around, but so soon as the breeze begins to rise, and the surface becomes rough,

Rocks, clouds, and trees, in wild confusion run,
And glittering fragments of a broken sun.

These observations will enable us to see the force of the Scripture expressions, which describe Adam as made "in the image of God," and the believer as "changed into the image of the Lord from glory to glory." The following attempt at versification will tend to illustrate this remark:—

THE LAKE.

I saw the lake, in child-like sleep,
 Reflect the orb of day:
 I looked again, its billows tossed
 Were white with foam and spray.
 I saw the wave once more subside,
 All trace of tempest gone,
 And seeming far beneath my feet
 The sun's bright image shone.
 I saw the new created world
 In pristine beauty shine;
 I heard the sentence, "All is good,"
 Pronounced by skill divine.
 And man I saw like mirror lake
 His Maker's image shew,
 Another "Sun of Righteousness,"
 Reflecting from below.
 But sin, like whirlwind, crossed the scene,
 And all its beauty marred,
 While o'er the dark chaotic mass,
 The stormy passions warred.
 Until the promised Saviour came,
 And bade the tempest cease,
 Diffused a holy calm, and gave
 His thought-surpassing peace.
 I looked once more, and man was raised
 To share Immanuel's throne,
 And brighter far than at the first,
 In god-like glory shone.

The effects resulting from these properties are very varied and exceedingly beneficial. By means of Light we receive instantaneous information with respect to the form, size, colour, and position of surrounding objects, whether they be close at hand or placed at a distance. And while it conveys to us, in a moment, that knowledge of earthly objects, which, by other means, we slowly and imperfectly acquire, Light alone enables us to carry our enquiries beyond the boundaries of earth, supplies us with all the information which we possess with regard to the heavenly bodies, makes known the constitution of the material universe, and points out the laws by which it is governed.

When the various qualities of this wonderful substance are taken into view, how glorious does He appear at whose command it first shone forth! and when we consider the benefits it confers on man, how great is the obligation under which we are laid to love and to adore Him!

There is another reason that makes the investigation of this subject peculiarly interesting to the Christian. Light is so frequently employed in Scripture to denote the knowledge of divine truth, that we almost forget that the word is metaphorically used. A few observations will be sufficient to shew the aptness and beauty of this similitude. Revelation, like the rays of Light, is designed for universal diffusion, and accordingly, the commandment says, "Go teach all nations," and the invitation is "Come unto me all ye that labour;" like them it pursues a straight and onward course, refusing to follow the crooked paths of deceit; like them it conveys, at a glance, much information which other means slowly and imperfectly communicate, and not only enables us more fully to understand the interests and concerns of earth, but extends our view to heaven. That knowledge of God and of our own spiritual condition, which natural reason dimly unfolds, the Gospel exhibits in the brightness of noon, while, by it alone, we are taught the existence and nature of angels and of devils, the future destiny of man, the place which we hold in the rational creation, the moral perfections of the Deity, and the wise and holy laws that regulate the concerns of accountable and intelligent creatures.

Shall we not, therefore, prize that precious Volume which brings "life and immortality to light," and bless the name of the great Redeemer, by whom that gift has been bestowed, and strive to live as "the children of the light and of the day?"

CAMELS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

AMONG the animals peculiar to the quarter of the world where the scene of the Sacred History is laid, the camel must rank first in order, whether we consider the antiquity of its domestic character, the singular properties with which it is endowed, the feats of labour and strength of which it is capable, or the purposes of general utility to which it has long been subservient. In the remotest periods, we find it associated with the rising industry and commerce of mankind, constituting the staple source on which they depended for food and clothing, cherished with the greatest care as the surest indication of wealth and honour, and occupying the chief place in the list of articles which princes conferred as presents on their favourites, or fathers as dowry on their children. From the frequent notice taken of this invaluable creature in the Sacred Records, it is evident that its characteristic qualities, and the great variety of purposes to which it is applicable, were as well known to the patriarchs and their contemporaries, as to the modern inhabitants of the East; and it may tend to give the student of the Scriptures a better idea of some interesting passages in them that relate to the camel, if we compare its state and habits as it is now found to exist, with its condition as described in the earlier annals of the people of God.

In appearance the camel is of unwieldy bulk, and though destitute of all claims either to elegance of form or beauty of proportion, it is admirably adapted, in point both of constitution and shape, to the regions which it traverses, and the laborious life it is destined to lead. Most readers of this article may have enjoyed an opportunity of witnessing a living specimen of this species of animal, and therefore it would be superfluous to enter at large into its natural history; but for the sake of those who are totally unacquainted with it, it may suffice for our present purpose to bid them figure to themselves a quadruped of a large size, covered with a soft kind of hair, considerably shorter than that of the ox, without horns, its lip divided in the centre, and six broad projecting foreteeth in the lower jaw, short ears, a long waving upright neck, long and slender limbs, very broad and divided feet, two large protuberances on the back, seemingly intended by the Creator for the reception of burdens; and by the grouping of these circumstances, they may be able to form some idea of the general features of a domesticated beast, which has ever been esteemed by the people of the East as the favourite, most useful, and important of all the animal productions of Asia.

In most parts of the Oriental world it is to be found, and every where it is highly prized; but to the pastoral people who frequent the desert, of which it is a native, and where it is to be found in the greatest perfection, its value cannot be estimated; for besides its utility as a beast of burden, it supplies them almost wholly with the means of their scanty subsistence, its flesh and milk furnishing them with food and drink, its hair affording materials for their garments, carpets for their tents, and sacks for their grain; its skin being made into bottles of various sizes, in which they treasure up their water, and transport their butter and other articles of a similar nature, its sinews serving them as ropes, and its dung as fuel. In short, it is turned to use in so many different respects, and forms so essential a part in the economy of Arab life, that the pastoral people are accustomed to estimate the fortunes of their chiefs and the power of their tribes, not by the money, but by the number of camels they possess. In ancient times, the same importance was evidently attached to the possession of a numerous flock of camels, as we find them enumerated in a particular manner among the cattle that formed the pastoral establishments of the patriarchs; that they were given by Abimelech to Abram among the princely tokens of his favour, and by Jacob to his incensed brother, as the most costly presents by which the haughty spirit of Esau might be propitiated; and that when the flourishing fortunes of Job are described, the measure of his great wealth is estimated chiefly by the circumstance, that he was the proprietor at first of 3000, and latterly of 6000 camels.

In removing from one place to another, as their pastoral necessities frequently require them to do, the Arabs have seldom any other beast of burden than the camel, on whose spacious and convenient back the various furniture of their tents is easily stowed. The chiefs, at the head of their tribes, and while marching at the slow pace of their flocks, generally prefer riding on the camel to any other animal, for, in addition to the advantages it possesses, from the peculiarity of its construction, and its capacity to endure privation and fatigue, it places the riders so high above the ground, that the reflection of the sun's rays, nearly intolerable on foot, is scarcely at all felt, while an agreeable coolness is kept up in the air by the rapidity of its movements. On these occasions, as the stately and handsomest are selected as the bearers of the chiefs, they are richly caparisoned, their housings consisting of the finest crimson cloth, or carpetting, of Persia, and their breasts adorned with a long string of beads and bells. Camels equipped in this gorgeous manner, are described by Pococke, who saw, when in Egypt, seven Agas of that country riding on camels, which had chains hanging from their necks to their breastplates; by Clarke, who saw on the great road to Smyrna several caravans of camels, with each a bell and strings of beads around their necks; and by Seely, in his Wonders of Elora, who saw the public authorities of Poonah riding in a triumphal procession, on camels sumptuously decorated with golden bells. These are evidently meant as marks of distinction and grandeur; and, accordingly, as the customs of the East never change, we find them used by the grandees of antiquity, for the kings of Midian, whom Gideon captured, "had chains about their camels' necks," the golden trappings of which formed part of the materials of the Ephod, which that Judge made and put in his own city, Ophrah.

The uneasy pace with which the camel proceeds being unsuitable to the younger and tenderer part of the tribe, the wealthier chiefs have their wives and families accommodated in a sort of conveyance, which possesses all the recommendations of ease and shelter from the heat. This is what is called a houda or panner, consisting of a large frame of wood, fixed on the back of the camel, with a seat on each side, and a covering to secure it from the rain or the sun. It is a very easy and indolent mode of travelling, though common only among the wives and families of the highest people in the East. In this way Captain Burnes tells, in his journey to Bokhara, that he and his companions travelled, and had their writing materials for noting observations, along with them, besides the rest of their baggage; and it seems to have been in one of the same carriages that Rachel was sitting, when she concealed her father's household gods, as we are informed she did, "in the camel's furniture."—Gen. xxxi. 34.

Some of the roving Arabs, however, employ their camels in services less legitimate than that of transporting them in their pastoral migrations, for, subsisting as they do, by plunder, and depending for their success and their safety on the rapidity of their movements to and from the place of attack, they train up their camels to assist them in their marauding expeditions against the towns that border on the desert, by making them expert not only at kneeling when they are loaded and unloaded, but at entering upon their knees into the houses selected for pillage. By means of camels, which their assiduity has made adept in such nefarious arts, these robbers often make a sudden descent upon a defenceless village, enter, without dismounting, the houses of the unsuspecting inhabitants, and after loading themselves with every thing valuable they can lay their hands on, effect their retreat in the same strange manner as they entered,—the well-tutored beast accommodating itself to all the wishes and motions of its lawless rider. Similar acts of violence seem to have been committed by the tenants of the desert, in ancient times, and hence the origin of the general maxim of Solomon, Prov. xvii. 19. "He that exalteth his gate seeketh destruction," the meaning of which is not, as some interpreters have erroneously supposed, that all who reared large splendid edifices, did, in those Eastern countries, where the suspicion of wealth is dangerous to the possessors, expose themselves to the rapacity of their superiors; but that every one who built his house with a free and spacious entrance, would thereby incur the risk of being frequently harassed by banditti, who unscrupulously rode into the houses they designed to plunder. As a necessary precaution against the intrusion of such unwelcome visitors, the people of the parts, particularly those who inhabit the less populous parts, that lie near the desert, have an outer wall around their houses, the gate of which is extremely small, generally not more than three feet high. A recent traveller who visited the convent of Mount Sinai, the walls of which are of an immense height, describes the gate, by which he entered, as so low, as not to admit a horse; and another states that his lodging at Gaza, in Palestine, was in a little court, "the passage to which was exceedingly low and narrow, to prevent the incursions and insolent attacks of the Turks." It is quite evident, then, that in such a state of society, "he that exalteth his gate, seeketh destruction;" and that a prudent man who wishes to provide for the security of his family and goods, must make the gate of his house as "strait" as convenience will admit of. The straiter and the smaller he makes it, he will, of course, increase the difficulty of an enemy entering it; and this affords an easy and a natural explanation of another passage of Scripture, which has been often misunderstood, and which is obviously founded on the Eastern custom to which we are alluding. Speaking of the great temptations that beset the rich, our Lord (Mat. xix. 24.) says:—"It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God," i. e., it would be as easy to drive a camel through a gate or door, as small as the eye of a needle, as for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God.

The grand purpose, however, for which the camel is employed, the scene on which the peculiar qualities with which the Creator has endowed it, are chiefly brought into exercise, is in journeying over the desert. The only mode of traffic and commerce in a great part of the East, is by land carriage; and as the tracts over which the merchandize has to be transported, are in many places wide, dreary, and destitute of almost every production of nature—perfect wildernesses of rock or sand,—few animals could endure the fatigue and privations of such expeditions, but the camel, in the adaptation of which to the climate and region of its birth, the wisdom of providence is admirably displayed. Though possessing naturally a strong appetite, which, when stimulated by the sight of rich and plentiful verdure, often makes it so impatient of restraint as to throw its rider, roll on its back to free itself of its load, and thus enjoy unencumbered the repast that is before it; yet it is capable of bearing the greatest want; and the general docility of its character is displayed in submitting with the greatest patience to the scanty and precarious fare with which the desert supplies it. "Nature," says Bruce, "has furnished the camel with parts and qualities adapted to the office he is employed to discharge. The driest thistle and the barest thorn" is all the food this quadruped requires; and even these, to save time, he eats while advancing on his journey, without stopping, or occasioning a moment of delay. As it is his lot to cross immense deserts, where no water is found, and countries not even moistened with the dew of heaven, he is endued with the power at one watering-place, to lay in a store, with which he supplies himself for thirty days to come. To contain this enormous quantity of fluid, nature has formed large cisterns within him, from which, once filled, he draws at pleasure the quantity he wants, and pours it into his stomach, with the same effect as if he then drew it from a spring; and with this he travels patiently and vigorously all day long, carrying a prodigious load upon him, through countries infected with poisonous winds, and glowing with parching and never cooling sands." To this extract from Bruce we subjoin one or two circumstances, by way of explanation. The wells in the desert are sometimes very deep, and not easily approached. One mentioned by Burnes was thirty feet under ground, to which there was a winding difficult access, and the long elastic necks of the camels were seen to be particularly fitted to help them to the precious fluid on that occasion. The quantity which a single camel is capable of containing is almost incredible; since, according to the calculation of an intelligent traveller, he takes a quarter of an hour to quench his enormous thirst, and to water a caravan of 1000 camels, at a small well, where one only can drink at a time, as sometimes unfortunately happens, would therefore require several days and nights,—a delay that must occasion the greatest vexation and danger to the unfortunate traveller in these inhospitable climes. Nor is the immense quantity it is capable of imbibing at once, more wonderful than its capability of subsisting without it altogether for a considerable length of time. A camel has been known to travel four or five days without a drop of water; and when it is considered that this endurance was displayed during a fatiguing journey, and in a climate, the intense heats of which speedily absorb every particle of moisture, the power of sustaining such privation will appear not a little astonishing. It is, however, a mistake which some naturalists have fallen into, to suppose that these beasts are exposed to such extremities of thirst with impunity, as many travellers of great experience assure us that, under a protracted want of water, the camels soon languish and die. Burnes relates a story of three soldiers, who, in travelling over part of the desert, lost their way, and their supply of water failed. Two of their horses sunk amid the parching thirst. All their camels died but one; and the unfortunate men, fearing that the other would die also, opened a vein of the surviving camel, and obtained a little water from its stomach, on which they subsisted till they reached a place of safety. The same traveller relates that the Khan of Orunje, in marching over the desert, lost upwards of 2000 camels through the failure of water. The burden which a camel will carry amounts to 500 pounds weight, which it will bear for ten, and sometimes fifteen hours in succession; and the knowledge of this circumstance may enable us to form some idea of the rich and splendid present which Hazael brought from the King of Syria to

* The plant called "the camel's thorn" is not, as may be readily supposed, to be found in the desert, but rather in the more fertile parts that surround it.

Elisha, and which consisted of every good thing of Damascus,—forty camels' burden, (2 Kings, viii. 9.) From all these useful qualities of the camel, its capacity of undergoing labour, enduring privations, guiding to watering-places, which it smells often an hour before it reaches them, and from other circumstances, too numerous to be mentioned, this animal is most appropriately termed by Job (ix. 26), "a swift ship,"—a term which is still current in the language and poetry of the Arabs. A fleet of these ships of the desert, or in other words, a numerous caravan passing through the desert, is one of the most beautiful scenes which the eye can witness or imagination conceive. The merchants collected together from every region, their rich and varied costumes, their elevated position on the back of their sumptuously accoutred camels, the costly merchandise they transport, comprising all the means of life and the arts of luxury, give rise to ideas of smiling abundance and joy; and, accordingly, such a picture has been selected by the Evangelical Prophet to afford a representation of the spiritual riches and blessings which the advent of Messiah would give to the Church. "The multitude of camels shall cover thee, the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah; all they from Shebe shall come: they shall bring gold and incense; and they shall shew forth the praises of the Lord."—(Isaiah lx. 6.)

It remains only to take notice of the rate at which the camel travels, which, according to Burnes, is about 3740 yards, and according to Volney 3600 yards or about two miles and an eighth per hour. Though this seems to be the ordinary pace of the camel, when pushed through fear of danger, it can run with great rapidity, as many examples from modern travels might be quoted to shew. And we find, that of the Amalekite warriors who burnt Ziklag, and on whom David took signal vengeance, not one escaped the attack of the Israelitish monarch, "save four hundred young men who rode upon camels and fled."—(1 Sam. xxx. 17.)

There is a species of camel, called the dromedary, which is light and slenderly made, and which, on that account, has always been used in the East in preference to all other animals when swiftness and despatch were required. Dr Shaw mentions a Sheik who rode upon a creature of this kind, and who diverted him and his fellow-travellers, by riding on to various parts of the caravan, and passing them and re-passing them every now and then; and Morgan, in his history of Algiers, describes one which outran the fleetest horses that were brought to match it, and which was kept for purposes of state. The knowledge of this circumstance will satisfactorily account for the employment of dromedaries to carry the messengers of Esther to the most remote provinces of Persia, on an emergency which demanded the greatest expedition, being a matter of life and death to thousands.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The Gospel Scheme.—Now, the Bible, as containing many gracious communications from the divine government to the children of men, is addressed to them as guilty, condemned, and helpless by nature. It comes to us as a message of mercy from the God we have sinned against, assuring us, upon divine authority, that the Lord Jesus Christ, "the only begotten Son of God," graciously undertook the redemption of sinners from both the punishment and the enslaving power of sin. That as "the Lord our righteousness and strength," he has made an adequate provision for recovering us from our fallen condition, and securing our deliverance from all wrath to come. That, as Surety and Redeemer of man, he has fulfilled the violated law, in our nature at least,—made atonement with his blood for the guilt of human offences, and "poured out his soul as an offering for sin"—declaring on the cross, that he had "finished ed" the work of reconciliation—while, by his resurrection from the tomb, and his ascension into glory, he has afforded the surest evidence of his victory over death and sin, and given us ample warrant for entrusting to him the eternal interests of our souls. "For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly; for scarcely for a righteous man will one die; yet, peradventure, for a good man some would even dare to die; but God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." With such discoveries and assurances of the divine regard and compassion towards our fallen race, we are warranted to approach the offended Lord, as a reconciled and gracious Creator, through the all-prevailing mediation and atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ. "A robe of righteousness" has been thus prepared, sufficient to conceal for ever the deformities of the vilest sinner—even the merits arising from the voluntary and perfect obedience of the divine Surety and Redeemer. Clad with this, as "with the garments of salvation," the sinner, without alarm, may appear at the bar of judgment, and, relying on the divine faithfulness, plead for an inheritance with "the saints in light." This gracious provision of divine mercy is in the sovereign gift of the Redeemer. Sinners, even the chief, are affectionately invited in the Gospel to avail themselves of the gracious boon, free of any price or recompense. "If we then believe in God, who raised up Christ Jesus from the dead, and gave him glory," and if, renouncing all dependence on any thing we ourselves can either suffer or perform, as constituting a warrantable ground of recommendation to the divine regard, we confide exclusively and implicitly in what Christ, as Redeemer, hath done for sinners,—the righteousness which, as surety, he wrought out in our nature, shall be imputed to us. The meritorious efficacy of his vicarious suffering shall be considered as ours. We shall be freed from the charge of guilt, relieved from the yoke of legal bondage, and warranted, as by divine authority, to cherish hope and confidence towards God. For the Scriptures assure us, that the Lord Jesus submitted to a course of human suffering unto death, as the surety of his people; that he endured the curse of the broken law for them, and cancelled its claims against them, as a covenant. And we further learn, as from the Redeemer's own lips, that, "as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness," and the Israelites, who, in compliance with the divine command, looked at it in all the various stages of their disease, were immediately cured, "even so was the Son of Man lifted up upon the cross, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "He that believeth shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be condemned." "He that believeth on the Son hath life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." The provided benefit is thus connected with the belief of the atonement by which it has been secured. While believing sinners, by the promise and oath of God, are encouraged, as "the heirs of promise, to have strong consolation, having fled for refuge, to lay hold upon the hope set before us in the Gospel; which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil; whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedec."—SINCE.

On fellowship with Christ.—To be one with the Son of God in our predominant thoughts and affections and features of character and sources of happiness, to have the heart elevated above the rounds of earthly drudgery by the feeling of connection with the realities of the heavenly state, to be performing every duty from reverential and grateful regard for the authority of the Highest, and sustaining every load, however burdensome, because we recognise and trust on the wise hand that lays it on; to have in exercise, the faith which carries us beyond the most fascinating scenes of the world's pleasures as offering no allurements to us, and the hope that transports us over the most humiliating scenes of the world's distresses, as "an affliction which is but for a moment;" whatever be the bitter stream of cares and anxieties which the events of life send into the soul, to have yet an under-current, which, springing from religion, sets out to the ocean of eternal good, and as it flows onwards, is purifying and sweetening the whole tide of human ills and sorrows; whatever be the eminences of the present possessions and enjoyments, to have still before us those heights of glory and blessedness on which the light of the celestial sun is shining, and which, extending in immeasurable distance, cherish the ardour of the aspiring soul, even for eternity; O! to be thus spiritually minded, "is life, is peace," is the honour and happiness of our nature, and both solves and dignifies the design of human life, by rendering it the entrance and training for immortality.—MUR.

Communion with God.—Why are we not more intimately acquainted with the benevolent duty of intercession for others? and why are we not more sweetly familiar with a throne of grace? Communion with God, how ineffably delightful, how unspeakably honourable? It is one of the most precious drops of heaven that bedews this dry and distant land, the lenient soother of care, the mighty solace of immense distress. It gives a rich zest to all the numerous blessings and enjoyments of life. O, what an import do these words convey, "Our fellowship is with the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ."—FANNY WOODBURY.

They who "killed the Lord Jesus."—They cried with clamorous voices and unrelenting hearts, "crucify him, crucify him!" and "with wicked hands," they crucified the Prince of Life and Lord of Glory, who was both "Lord and Christ." They caused his head to be circled with thorns, his hands and feet to be pierced with nails, and his side with a spear. To the pain and ignominy of the cross they added the sting of ingratitude, which entered more deeply than "the iron into his soul." If the Roman Cæsar, who had waded to the heights of his ambition through the tears and blood of thousands, was moved with generous grief when he saw among his murderers the friend (Brutus) whom he had loved and honoured, and when he felt at his heart the point of a sharper weapon than even that of the deadly steel;—Oh! What must He have felt who came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them, when he beheld "his own," whom he came to redeem, conspiring against a life which had been devoted to their best interests? What must the King of Zion have felt when, from the cross on Calvary, he saw Jerusalem, over whose doom he had lately shed tears of generous sympathy and sorrow, pouring forth her idle crowds of cruel scoffers to gaze on his agonizing frame, and, by fresh insults, to wound his ingenuous mind? What must he have felt when he saw those who had heard his gracious words, and seen his mighty works, who had mingled their glad voices with the hosannas of applauding thousands, now swelling the raging floods of the ungodly, and joining in the bitter invectives which, like so many sharp arrows, were showered upon him from every side?—WIGHTMAN.

Hypocrisy.—When Christ is in court, and Religion in fashion, then the hypocrite will put on some fits of diligence. O what will not a hypocritical Jehu do, when there is a crown to be had for following Christ and Religion: "O come, then, and see my Religion, and zeal for the Lord of Hosts." But bring Christ to the Hall of Caiaphas then will he soon quit him, and scatter Religion.—GRAY.

PARAPHRASE OF CANTICLES II. 1—5.

BY THE REV. ARCHIBALD M'CONNELLY,

SWEETER is Jesus' love to me
Than Sharon's fragrant rose,
He lovelier than the lily is
That in the valley grows.

Fair as amid the forest wide
The citron tree is seen,
So fairer than the sons of men
He in my sight has been.

I sat in his refreshing shade,
My weary soul to rest;
His fruit revived my soul again,
And sweet was to my taste.

He brought me to his banquet house,
A costly feast he made;
And lo! the banner of his love
He over me did spread.

Cheer me with wine, with odours sweet,
My fainting soul restore;
For I am vanquish'd by his love,
The love to me he bore.

VERSES

TO THE MEMORY OF A YOUNG LADY, WHO WAS CONFINED TO A SICKBED FOR MANY YEARS.

BY MISS ANNA L. GILLESPIE.

FAREWELL, sweet maiden; fare thee well:
Relieved from ling'ring years of pain,
Forgive the sighs of grief that swell
Our earthly loss, thy heavenly gain.

But let thy priz'd example ne'er
From memory fade; thy fervent faith;
Thy ardent hope; thy love sincere
To God, in sickness and in death.

Oh! thou wert good, and fair and young,
And life appear'd so clear and bright,
And fancy's fairy visions flung
Around thee prospects of delight.

An untried world was sweet to view;
The beam of morn; the falling eve;
The starry hosts in ether blue;
The moonbeams on the welt'ring wave.

All nature's glowing imagery
Of hills and vales, and woods and streams,
Were greeted by thy raptur'd eye,
And woke devotion's holy themes.

'Twas not to last. The Lord, in love,
Allur'd thee to the "wild'red way,"
Thy faith and constancy to prove,
"In sorrow's dark and cloudy day."

He took from thee all things below,
Save kindred love, attach'd and dear:
He made thy pensive soul to know
The peace that cannot centre here.

He bore thee up with strength'ning hand,
Thro' Jordan's dark appalling tide:
He shew'd thee Zion's glorious land,
And bade thee lay thy fears aside.

He sooth'd afflictions tedious days;
In all thy sickness made thy bed:
He taught thy mouth to speak his praise,
When pain and sickness bow'd thy head.

The term is past,—the trial o'er,—
The ransom paid,—the prisoner free,—
The prize is given, and evermore,
My Christian friend, 'tis joy with thee.

MISCELLANEOUS.

An Infidel's Servant.—The Abbé Barruel, in the account he gives of the closing scenes of Diderot's life, tells us that he had a Christian servant, to whom he had been kind, and who waited upon him in his last illness. This servant took a tender interest in the melancholy situation of his master, who was just about to leave this world, without preparation for another. Though a young man, he ventured one day, when he was engaged about his master's person, to remind him that he had a soul, and to admonish him in a respectful manner not to lose the last opportunity of attending to its welfare. Diderot heard him with attention, melted into tears, and thanked him. He even consented to allow the young man to introduce a clergyman, whom he would probably have continued to admit to his chamber, if his infidel friends would have suffered the minister to repeat his visits. Let us be encouraged to attempt good under the most unpromising circumstances, and, in our different stations, to remember we are commanded to labour for the welfare of those with whom we are connected.

Have you a Mother?—Mr Abbott relates, in his "Mother at Home," that, some time ago, a gentleman in one of the most populous cities of America, was going to attend a seaman's meeting in the Mariner's Chapel. Directly opposite that place there was a Sailor's Boarding-house. In the door-way sat a hardy weather-beaten sailor, with arms folded, and puffing a cigar, watching the people as they gradually assembled for worship. The gentleman walked up to him, and said, "Well, my friend, won't you go with us to Meeting?" "No," said the sailor bluntly. The gentleman, who, from the appearance of the man, was prepared for a repulse, mildly replied, "You look, my friend, as though you had seen hard days: have you a mother?" The sailor raised his head, looked earnestly in the gentleman's face, and made no reply. The gentleman, however, continued: "Suppose your mother were here now, what advice would she give you?" The tears rushed into the eyes of the poor sailor; he tried for a moment to conceal them, but could not; and hastily brushing them away with the back of his rough hand, rose and said, with a voice almost inarticulate through emotion, "I'll go to the meeting." He crossed the street, entered the door of the chapel, and took his seat with the assembled congregation.

Lord Bacon.—When the French ambassador visited the illustrious Bacon, in his illness, and found him in bed, with the curtains drawn, he addressed this fulsome compliment to him:—"You are like the angels, of whom we hear and read much, but have not the pleasure of seeing them." The reply was the sentiment of a philosopher, and language not unworthy of a Christian:—"If the complaisance of others compares me to an angel, my infirmities tell me I am a man."

ON PROVIDENCE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM SCOTT MONCREIFF,
Minister of Penicuik.

THERE are few words introduced in conversation to which so little meaning is attached, as that which stands at the head of this article. Many, who talk of Providence, seem to consider it as synonymous with chance or fortune; others would appear to adopt it as a convenient veil for the real atheism of their views; while a still more numerous class employ the term at second hand, because they hear it frequently used by the learned and the serious, without giving themselves any trouble as to the propriety of their use or application of it. The number is small indeed of those who employ it with a clear comprehension of its real signification, or a due recollection, that, if they mean any thing at all by it, they must express thereby the holy, wise, and powerful will of God, acting in the operation of all causes, and the determination of every event; or the daily and hourly government of God, exercised over us and all our actions. But admitting that the term Providence is liable to much abuse, it is not in itself objectionable; for, though it is not a word of scriptural authority, it is still a very appropriate and happy expression for that general idea of the divine agency in and over all the objects and events of nature. But then, if we are to employ it, let us see that we do so correctly; for, otherwise, we may thereby come to exclude from our own regards, and those of others, the very being, whose perpetual and universal superintendence it is designed to express. We need not seek to find any better definition of Providence than that given in our Shorter Catechism. “It is God’s most holy, wise, and powerful preserving and governing all his creatures and all their actions.” This is a short and simple explanation of a term so general and abstract; but it presents us with a distinct, accurate, and comprehensive idea, widely different indeed from the confused and indefinite notions of Providence, which are in general entertained. Endeavouring to carry this idea along with us, let us now attempt to point out some of the practical uses of the doctrine which it expresses.

It must be very evident to every one, that an accurate view of, and a settled belief in, God’s providential government of this world, is a point of the very first practical importance. It is not easy, indeed, to conceive a more deplorable state of mind, than that in which this finds no place. It is, to use a Scripture phrase, “a living without God in the world.” It is to have no confidence of protection, or even of support, for the present, and no ground of hope for the future. What can be more cheerless than to be threatened with dangers, and see no power superior to our own which can avert them? to be overwhelmed with sorrows, and discern no hand able to relieve us from their pressure, or sooth us under their infliction? or to suspect, that after all, virtue is a mere delusion, that might alone is right, that deceit and violence are the surest methods of acquiring or securing the enjoyments of life? to suppose that we are abandoned to the casualties of nature, the violence of mankind, or the caprice of our own passions? to be incapable of perceiving any order, harmony, or beauty, in the history or progression of human affairs? to feel no security in the character of our great moral Governor, that the triumph shall not ultimately be given to unrighteousness over truth and virtue;—such a state of mind, to a man of any seriousness of reflection, cannot fail to prove one of the most unhappy description. We find, however, that even the most highly favoured of God’s saints have occasionally been reduced to this deplorable state of mind. The Psalmist found, as he informs us, the Providence of God a subject too painful for him; he confesses that he was envious at the foolish, when he saw the prosperity of the wicked, because he observed, “that they were not in trouble, as other men, but had more than heart could wish.” It would appear that he felt this temptation the more strongly, from the circumstance, that in his days, a marked change had taken place on the character of God’s providential dealings with Israel. In the age immediately preceding his own, the Lord had governed his people directly, so to speak, often without the agency of secondary causes, but solely through his own visible, or audible, and immediate direction. No Israelite, therefore, in those days of miraculous dispensation, could, for one moment, misconstrue or reject the doctrine of divine Providence; for the righteous were then obviously rewarded, while no less distinct and unequivocal was the judicial retribution on the wicked. But, in proportion as the Israelites withdrew from God, he removed farther and farther from them, till at last, the impious began to hint their hopes that he had entirely withdrawn himself, that he would neither do good nor evil, and had left them to themselves; while the godly were often discouraged, when it was asked of them, "How does God know; is there knowledge in the Most High?" and when, as in confident reply to the question, the impious enquirers pointed to themselves, and said, "behold the ungodly who prosper in the world, and increase in riches." At that time the Christian's doubts and misapprehensions were removed only by his having recourse to the light of Revealed Truth: "when I thought to know this, it was too painful for me, until I went into the sanctuary of God, then understood I their end." And thus it is still. These clear views of God's providence are, occasionally at least, to be found clouding the peace and darkening the prospects of sincere Christians; nor are they otherwise to be dispelled, than by a simple minded recourse to the sanctuary of God's Word. Natural religion throws little, if any light on the mysteries of Providence. To the man who stands on its heights of observation, God's ways are indeed "in the sea, and his paths in the great waters;" and it is only from the sanctuary that we can perceive that they are all "mercy and truth, unto such as keep his testimonies," and that, through the intricate mass of events, he is causing "all things to work together for good to them that love him." The Providence of God must, therefore, be ever read and interpreted by the Word of God. The inspired history, it may be observed, in that Word, resembles all other history, in being the annals of Providence. It differs from human compilations chiefly in this, that with a detail of the events, there is also a revelation of the motives and influences of that all-pervading mind, which determines every event. For example, the restoration of the Jews to their native land, after the Babylonish captivity, considered as an event, might have been recorded by a profane historian as accurately as it has been by the inspired Ezra. The circumstance, doubtless, surprised many persons of reflection at the time, and would be ascribed, by the Assyrian moralists, to a variety of political motives. The inspired historian alone discovers to us the real cause, when he says, "that the Word of the Lord, by the mouth of Jeremiah, might be fulfilled, the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, king of Persia, that he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom," &c. Ezra i. 1. And had it pleased God to give us an inspired historian for our own times, a similar key would have been thereby furnished to all the events which now occur. This has been wisely withheld, for if it be presumptuous in a child or a subject to require a reason for every domestic or civil appointment, how much more so for us, to demand the why and the wherefore of the steps of the divine government.

Yet ignorant though we confessedly are of the extent and minuteness of the arrangements of the Almighty, we are in constant danger of so far forgetting our own weakness and short-sightedness, as to limit the agency of the divine mind in the detail of Providence. Many serious persons shrink from the idea of ascribing the minor details of the world's history directly to God, as if it were unbecoming his dignity to refer them to him. They are willing to ascribe all works of creation to his sole power, but they conceive, that it is a derogation from his dignity to order his creatures' affairs. They would not encumber him, after so great an obligation as their creation has laid them under to him, with the care of them. And yet what is this but to limit the Most High, by conceiving of him as of ourselves? it is to forget, that by no possibility can any thing be too hard for him; or, that as nothing is too vast for his control, so nothing can be too minute for his superintendence. Our blessed Lord, with the force and simplicity of truth, when impressing on us the fear of God, rebukes this inconsideration, by reminding us that there can be nothing hid from his knowledge. He states, in the most distinct manner, the direct superintendence of the divine mind over all,—“even the very hairs of your head are all numbered.” Now, if we allow God's omniscience, it were foolish in us to deny his Providence. To suppose that he could foresee any contingency against which he could not provide, were to reduce him to a lower level than that which we occupy; and, doubtless, it is just from his foreseeing and providing for all events, that his ways often appear to us, who foresee nothing, so very complex and mysterious. We must remember, that “He sees the end from the beginning;” “knows all things that are not as though they were;” takes into one clear, simultaneous view, all events throughout all ages, the past, the present, and the future, “one day being to him as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.” Once grounded and established in this faith in the Providence of God, we shall never look on any thing to be so mighty or so minute as to lie out of its precincts. It is not that all events are indifferent to the divine mind, that God is as much concerned about the hairs of our head, as he is about the care of our souls, and that to him all things are of equal importance, or rather are alike disregarded. This were a most dangerous view of Providence, and certainly a false one, as may be distinctly perceived from the words of our Lord: “are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God.” And what doctrine do we deduce from this? That God is as attentive to a sparrow as to the soul of man? Far from it. “Fear not, therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows.” “God feedeth the raven, how much more are ye better than the fowls?” Because God's Providence extends to every thing, it does not follow that all things, be they great or small, share alike in his attentive regards; but it does follow, and that most conclusively, that, poor and despised as we are, he thinketh on us, seeing that by him the very fowls of heaven are fed, and the lilies of the field are clad in their more than regal glory.

There is one other passage in which our blessed Lord illustrates the doctrine of Providence, which I mention, chiefly, because it may lead us to perceive the connection of that doctrine with prayer. I allude to that admirable form of supplication which he taught his disciples. You will observe, that he presupposes a firm and enlightened belief of God's special providence in the minds of his disciples. We are to enter into our closets, to shut our door, and to pray in secret to our Father, as to one who seeth in secret; and then, what are we to pray for? Why, for our daily bread, and to be led, in the course of providence, into no temptation, but to be delivered from all evil; and what is the argument by which we are to enforce our petitions for such minute and special blessings? It is this, "thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory;" that is, "thine, O heavenly Father, is the dominion over all, and the power in all, and the end of all things; and, therefore, however insignificant I, thy suppliant, may be, and however minute my interests, neither I nor they can be overlooked; to ask of thee, day by day, my daily bread, is not to trouble thee with the minute cares of an insignificant individual, for thy kingdom extendeth over all; and thy power is the source, and thy glory is the result, of thy universal administration." If we maintained this constant sense of God's providential government, we should be more instant in prayer; we should more fervently supplicate him in our seasons of distress, and more fervently adore him for his mercies; for the recognition of his sovereignty infers the duty of prayer to him, of implicit trust in him, and unqualified submission to him.

But if the doctrine of a special Providence be consistent with that of prayer, it is no less so with the duty of painstaking in every matter in which we are engaged. It is not possible for us, at present, to enter on the wide field of instances in which the doctrine in question is abused and perverted by the fanatical, the antinomian, and the idle. We may meet with not a few, who seem not to perceive that it is as foolish and presumptuous to deny it altogether, as to expect that God's particular Providence will interpose to save their exertions, or excuse their industry. There are others who not only make the plea of trusting Providence a pretence for deserting the path of duty, but who excuse their own imprudence, by pleading a confidence in the leadings, as they call them, of Providence, which is altogether unwarrantable. They forget that the faculties with which God hath endowed us, form, as it were, a part of his Providence. "Doth not the ploughman cast in the principal wheat, and the appointed barley, and the rye, in their place?" And why? "For his God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him." "This also cometh from the Lord of Hosts, who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working." But if, on any pretence, these faculties are abused or neglected by us, we may be very sure that God's Providence will be exercised and his administration vindicated, only by our suffering the just punishment of our sin and our folly.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE REV. SAMUEL WALKER, B. A.,
Formerly of Truro, Cornwall.

FEW men were more distinguished by their exertions in the cause of Christ during the last century than the subject of our present sketch. He was, in fact, a perfect model of a parish minister; and, accordingly, it may be interesting to trace the most striking points of his history as a devoted Christian and a faithful pastor.

Samuel Walker was born in the city of Exeter on the 16th of December 1714, and was the youngest of seven children. His parents were highly respectable, and he had the honour of being descended, in the maternal line, from the celebrated Bishop Hall. The first part of Samuel's early education was received at home, but the latter part at the grammar school in Exeter. At eighteen he was sent to Exeter College, Oxford, where he prosecuted his studies with marked success. He received the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and took orders in the year 1737. His first curacy was the parish of Dodescomb Leigh, in the vicinity of his native place, which he held only till August 1738, when, at the request of Lord Rolle, he undertook the tuition of his Lordship's youngest brother during a journey through France. While engaged in this foreign tour he paid particular attention to those lighter accomplishments which form, in too many instances, the sum total of the acquisitions made by young men in their Continental travels. After having been thus employed for two years he returned home and went to reside at Lanlivery in Cornwall, as curate to his friend Mr Nicolas Kendall, canon of Exeter, and archdeacon of Toftness. On the death of the Archdeacon in 1740, Mr Walker was presented to the vicarage of his parish, to hold during the minority of a nephew of the patron. During his residence at Lanlivery, he discharged his official duties with the most unwearied assiduity and conscientiousness. "He reproved, exhorted, and watched over his flock, preaching, catechising, and visiting in private; nor could any minister more sincerely deplore evident unfruitfulness in his spiritual vineyard." Yet the full extent of reformation which he was anxious to produce in the parish was of an external nature, affecting merely the outward decency and sobriety of his people. He was still ignorant of the only way by which the natural enmity of the heart to God may be subdued—even by a cordial submission to the righteousness of the Redeemer.

In the summer of 1746, Mr Walker resigned the vicarage of Lanlivery to the young gentleman for whom he held it, and removed to the curacy of Truro. The change was to him peculiarly agreeable, as affording scope for the exercise of the social qualities, and the display of those refined dispositions and feelings which so remarkably characterized him. Though habitually attentive to the external forms of religion, he acknowledges that his heart was then in the world, and that the desire of human applause was the chief motive from which he acted.

During the first year of his incumbency at Truro, Mr Walker attracted considerable notice, both as an eloquent preacher and a well-educated man. He was courted, and flattered, and admired; and all this, for no other reason than the extent and variety of his mere human accomplishments. The peculiar doctrines of the Gospel, he tells us, "he knew notionally, but neither felt nor taught them practically." The hardest of all lessons he had yet to learn,—that works must be the evidence, not the price of our justification; and accordingly, when, at an after period of his life, his views of divine truth became clearer and more scriptural, he felt, on looking back upon the time he spent at Lanlivery, that "he ought to go sorrowing to the grave, upon a review of six years so passed over."

Mr Walker had been at least a year in his curacy at Truro, before he began to suspect that there was the slightest deficiency in his mode of exhibiting divine truth. The individual by whose instrumentality his sentiments and whole tone of thinking underwent a complete change, was Mr Conon, master of the grammar school at Truro, of whom he was accustomed ever after to speak in the highest terms. The circumstance which led to this good man's intimacy with Mr Walker is thus narrated:—

"Mr Walker received a letter, containing a sum of money which the writer requested him to pay at the custom-house, as justly due to the revenue, for duty on some French wines he had used for his health. He had been unsuccessful in his attempts, in that age of smuggling on the coast, to obtain any on which custom had been paid, but the virtuous conscience of the spiritual Christian remembered his Master's divine command. The letter contained an apology for troubling Mr Walker, but stated that his high character would prevent all suspicion of straightforward honesty in the transaction. Curious to know whether the same happy conscientiousness was manifest in all his doings, Mr Walker sought his acquaintance, and the result was a respect approaching to veneration, for one who exhibited in his daily habits all the true effects of religion on a Christian's heart and actions. The attractions of his conversation and the purity of his life, at length ripened intercourse into intimacy, and the result was the conversion of the minister, through the wise and prudent instrumentality of his pious friend."

And the character of Mr Conon is thus depicted:—

"Mr Conon was one of those rare and devoted Christians, who, in an age of darkness, shone with a lustre little comprehended and greatly opposed; but he was content to be 'hated without a cause,' and to suffer obloquy and shame for the Lord's sake.

"Though threatened with the loss of stipend and scholars, a threat afterwards actually carried into effect, he persevered in his course, and, like the glow-worm, shone brightest when the gathering of the dark night-clouds gave warning of an impending tempest. He was persecuted purely for the sake of his Religion, being acknowledged on all hands to be an instructor of youth of extraordinary ability, to whose tuition almost all the gentlemen's sons in the middle and western part of Cornwall had been committed. But he was guilty of the unpardonable crime, in those days, of training up his pupils in the nurture and admonition of the Lord,—an error far less venial in the eyes of their ignorant and prejudiced parents, than carelessness of their morals or neglect of discipline. For many years, he walked hand in hand with his pastor and convert, Mr Walker, who never took any step of importance in the management of his parish without asking his advice. He bore all his trials with the truest Christian resignation, and carried himself with a dignity and mildness that would have disarmed the rancour of all enemies, but those who abhor the image of the Saviour wherever they may find it, and whose corrupt nature renders them irreconcilable to spirituality of mind and holiness of life. Speaking of his school, and the treatment he received, he says in a letter, written under the pressure of severe illness,—'this has shaken my purposes in regard to the school. I am engaged, in honour and conscience, to do all I can for the good of it and the public, and have forgot, and most heartily forgiven, all former bad treatment, and even present unkindness.' The severest blow he ever received was the death of his beloved minister and friend, an event which, coupled with other circumstances in after years, induced him to remove to Padstow, where he undertook the instruction of a select number of pupils. This occupation was his great delight, and he frequently expressed a wish, that, if it pleased God, he might die while employed in his school, and that suddenly. His prayer was heard: one Saturday evening, after endeavouring to prepare the youthful minds of his scholars for the solemnities of the coming Sabbath, he earnestly prayed for a blessing on his labours, when suddenly the stroke of death silenced his voice of supplication, and changed it for that of ceaseless thanksgiving in regions of eternal praise."

Such is the brief but interesting history of the man whom Mr Walker frankly acknowledged as his spiritual father in Christ. "He who had long sat in comparative darkness now saw a great light." And himself cheered by the refreshing beams of the Sun of Righteousness, he, from this time, commenced his career as a zealous and unwearied labourer in the Lord's vineyard. It was no small trial of Mr Walker's faith, however, that the very same place which had witnessed him foremost in the scenes of gaiety and mirthful revelry, was now destined to be the scene of his determined opposition to the maxims and the manners of an ungodly world. He knew that ridicule, reproach, and persecution, would be the necessary results of a change so decided. His heart began to fail as he attempted at first to lay open to his people the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart, and he felt as if his tongue refused to utter the freeness and the fulness of redeeming grace. He, however, who had called him to be his servant, stood by in the hour of his extremity, delivering him, by the communications of his grace, from "the fear of man which bringeth a snare." Mr Walker's preaching now changed its character. Bold, fearless, uncompromising statements of Gospel truth were unfolded in every sermon, and the result was, in such circumstances, what might have been anticipated.

"Addresses of this description could not fail to excite the feelings of those who heard them, and their first ebullition was in anger against the man who now denounced the very path in which, the immoralities excepted, he had cheerfully accompanied them, and proclaimed that the profane, the lustful, and the formalist, were all marching with the multitude on the same broad road to destruction. Still, the earnestness of the preacher, and the striking alteration of his habits, as well as the tone of his sermons, stirred up the curiosity of the people, who, while they were enraged at the fidelity, were enchained by the eloquence, and trembled at the sternness of their reprover. Even out of the pulpit they feared the presence of their minister; the Sabbath loiterers and profane would retire at his approach, saying, 'let us go, here comes Walker.' His manner is said to have been commanding and solemn in the extreme; and his life was so truly in unison with his precepts, that at length he awed into silence those who were at first most clamorous against him. Such crowds attended his ministry, that the thoroughfares of the town seemed to be deserted during the hours of service, so that it was remarked, 'you might fire a cannon down every street of Truro, in church-time, without a chance of killing a single human being.'

In consequence of his devoted attention to his ministerial duties, a general awakening, by the blessing of the Spirit, soon took place among the people. The first convert was a young soldier of licentious habits, who became a consistent follower of Jesus; and it was peculiarly gratifying to Mr Walker, to find that the example of this, his "first and dearest child," as he was wont to term him, was the means of leading others to enquire. At length the enquirers became so numerous, that he was obliged to devote a few evenings in each week to their instruction in private; and such was his anxiety to discharge faithfully this delicate part of his ministerial duty, that he drew up, for his guidance on such occasions, a scheme of private instruction suited to different circumstances. The skill with which Mr Walker accommodated himself to the various cases which presented themselves, was remarkable; and as an instance of his peculiar sagacity and discernment, we may quote the following, which is thus narrated by the biographer:—

"One of his visitors, for private instruction, was a young man, who stated that he called to thank him for the benefit he had received from his ministry, and to beg his advice. Mr Walker immediately questioned him as to the knowledge he possessed of his own heart, when the youth expressed in general terms, a conviction that he was an unworthy sinner. Perceiving, by his manner, that he had never duly experienced that conviction, Mr Walker at once entered into an explanation of the sinner's character, with a personal reference to the individual before him. He dwelt upon his ingratitude to God, the evil nature of the motives which had influenced all his actions, the fruitlessness of his life, the defilement even of his best deeds, and then added, 'I fear you are secretly displeased with me, because I have not commended your good intentions, and flattered your vanity.' 'No indeed, Sir,' he replied, 'I feel extremely thankful for this striking proof of your kindness and regard.'

"The discerning minister had, however, formed a true judgment of the character before him. The young man acknowledged the next day that he had given a false answer, and that, chagrined by the little account Mr Walker seemed to make of his professions, he had secretly determined to encounter no more the searching questions which exposed his shallowness, and brought low the vain imaginations of his heart. This experienced pastor had dealt wisely with him; he was dignified, ostentatious, and injudicious, but afterwards became an exemplary and useful Christian."

Mr Walker's faithfulness as a pastor, while by many it was duly appreciated, soon drew down upon him the reproaches, and called forth the opposition of the enemies of vital godliness. Foiled in their attempt to injure him with their bishop, they applied to the rector of Truro, and at length extracted from him a promise to dismiss Mr Walker from his cure. The result is curious and interesting:—

"When the rector of Truro entered the apartment of his curate, he was received with that elegance and true dignity of manner, which was natural to one who had long been the charm of society, and he became so embarrassed as to be perfectly unable to enter on the subject of his visit. He at length made some remark, which afforded an opportunity of speaking on the ministerial office and character, which Mr Walker immediately embraced, and entered on the subject with such acuteness of reasoning, and solemnity of appeal, to his rector, as a fellow-labourer in the Gospel, that he retreated, overwhelmed with confusion, and unable to say a word about the intended dismissal. He was, in consequence, reproached with a breach of his promise, and went a second time to fulfil it. He again retreated without daring to allude to the subject of his visit. He was pressed to go a third time by one of his principal parishioners, but replied, 'do you go and dismiss him if you can, I cannot. I feel in his presence as if he were a being of a superior order, and am so abashed that I am uneasy till I can retire.' A short time after this, the rector was taken ill, when he sent for Mr Walker, entreated his prayers, acknowledged the propriety of his conduct as a minister, and promised him his hearty support if he recovered; but it is to be feared, his resolution passed away with the alarm of illness. Never was a more striking instance than this of the power of religious consistency,—it is inconsistency that makes us inefficient; while a life suitable to our profession, attracts esteem from the godly, and repels the hostile weapons of our foes. It is when her priests are clothed with righteousness, that the saints of the church rejoice and sing; and though the enemies of truth hate the light of that celestial dress, they retreat overpowered with the bright reflection of its beams."

The unwearied assiduity with which Mr Walker fulfilled the duties of his office, endeared him to the Christians in Truro, and such was their affection for him, that it was his earnest wish that he might live and die among them. Soon after he had entered upon the cure, he had been presented by the trustees of his late patron, Mr Kendall, to the vicarage of Talland, and had obtained leave of non-residence from the bishop. Now, however, that he became aware of the deep responsibilities of the ministerial office, he readily resigned the emoluments of a charge, the duties of which he was unable to perform. This, of course, reduced his income, but the good man was prepared to make any sacrifice to preserve his integrity and uprightness.

"He bore with cheerfulness all the inconveniences of his diminished fortune, relinquished his accustomed comforts, and went into humble lodgings, with accommodations of the plainest kind. While in this condition, he had four offers made him of preferment, but declined them all. He could not leave his devoted flock; he would not receive from any portion of the vineyard where he laboured not; all his desires centred in longings for God's presence in his soul, and a blessing on his ministry. He thus exhibited in practice his own description of the contented Christian. 'No desire is there of other treasure but God, nor is there any want grievous while the light of God's countenance is enjoyed. This changes rags into purple garments, sweetens the coarse and homely meal, satisfies that the dwelling be narrow and inconvenient, and makes the heart dance for joy, while beholders regard, some with pity, and some with scorn. O ye poor great ones; poor, because strangers to God, poor, and without quiet, how little cause have ye to boast that ye fare sumptuously! This man hath delicacies which ye cannot relish, a continual feast he hath satisfying his soul, while your very heart is troubled with all the contrivances of art to please, and all the elegances of luxury to indulge you; you cannot feed upon content as he doth, because ye know not God, for it is his privilege, having nothing, to be as if he possessed all things.'

As another instance of Mr Walker's singular disinterestedness, we may adduce the following:—

"There resided in the neighbourhood of Truro, a young lady of accomplished manners, beauty, fortune, and piety. Her religion attached her to the ministry of Mr Walker, while superior education and good sense enabled her to appreciate his attainments. There was every reason to believe that she would have readily accepted an offer of his hand, and that their union would have been most happy. A friend, anxious to see him relieved from his humble circumstances, by an alliance with a lady of fortune, piety, and zeal, ventured to advise him seriously to consider whether he ought not to avail himself of such an opportunity. He made no reply at the time, but a few days afterwards remarked,—'you spoke to me lately about Miss ———. I certainly never saw a woman whom I thought comparable to her, and I believe I should enjoy as much happiness in a union with her, as it is possible to enjoy in this world. I have reason also to think she would not reject my suit.' Here he paused, and added with great feeling and seriousness—'still it must never be; what would the world say of me? Would not they imagine that the hope of obtaining such a prize, influenced my profession of religion? It is easy, they would say, to preach self-denial, and heavenly-mindedness; but has not the preacher taken care to get as much of this world's goods as he could possibly obtain?' 'Sir,' he again said, with emphasis, 'it must never be. I can never suffer any temporal happiness or advantage to be a hindrance to my usefulness.'"

Different opinions may be formed as to the propriety or prudence of Mr Walker's conduct on this occasion, but it exhibits the pious and disinterested conscientiousness of the man, in a very strong point of view. The advancement of his Redeemer's honour was, with him, the grand object, and to this all other considerations were made to bow. Nor was his zeal unattended with success. The pleasure of the Lord evidently prospered in his hands. The number of converts was daily on the increase, and finding himself unable to pay due attention to each individual case, he formed them, at length, in 1754, into a Religious Society, the design of which, he stated, in the "considerations laid before the members at the first meeting," to be threefold:—To glorify God—to quicken and confirm themselves in faith and holiness—and to render them more useful among the neighbours. The devotional services at the meetings of this society were conducted exclusively by Mr Walker himself, and thus, many of the disadvantages which are too often attendant on fellowship meetings, as usually conducted, were obviated. Besides this general society, Mr Walker instituted, and encouraged among his people, smaller meetings, for mutual converse and prayer. Anxious that the utmost simplicity and purity of intention should be preserved among his converts, he laid down minute regulations for their guidance at these meetings.

The exertions of this indefatigable pastor, however, were not limited entirely to his own parish; he endeavoured also to stimulate his brethren around him. With this view, he suggested the formation of a union among the pious clergy of the neighbourhood, for mutual assistance and encouragement in their pastoral duties. This society, which was called the "Parsons' Club," was productive of much good both to the ministers and their people. "As iron sharpeneth iron, so doth the face of a man his friend." And it was so in this instance, for the piety, and zeal, and activity of Mr Walker, diffused a most beneficial influence over all his associates. He himself was assiduous in visiting and catechising his people—exercises which had, at that period, almost fallen into disuse in England; and his example was soon followed by the other clergymen in that district of the country.

In the close of the year 1756, the worthy pastor of Truro found himself introduced into a new field of useful labour. A body of soldiers were sent into his parish for winter quarters, and immediately they became the object of his pastoral solicitude. He began by addressing to them a sermon on the Sabbath afternoon, which went by the name of the "Soldiers' Sermon," but, at first, he had great difficulty in prevailing on them to listen to him; for, though conducted to Church by their officers, they used, even then, to turn off at the door. Mr Walker, however, was not disheartened; he set his pious members of the Society to work, and, by their exertions, a few of the soldiers were, at length, persuaded to attend. The numbers gradually increased; and such was the effect of his faithful addresses, that, in three weeks, no less than a hundred of them went to his house, to speak to him, in private, on the concerns of their souls. Many of these, no doubt, returned to their former thoughtlessness and forgetfulness of God. Those, however, and there was a considerable number, who gave evidence of a real change of heart, were termed into a class, which was called the "Soldiers' Society." The effect of Mr Walker's assiduous attention to the spiritual interests of the soldiers, was soon apparent in the change which was perceptible in the outward deportment of the whole regiment.

"Mr Walker's exertions in the regiment at first met with great opposition; the captain publicly forbade the men to go to him for private instruction, though, at least, than two hundred and fifty of them sought the 'over-tired' but persevering servant of Christ for that purpose. Those also whom religion had separated from the sinful habits and company of their unawakened comrades, were much derided, but grace enabled them to stand. A great alteration, however, took place; punishments soon diminished, and order prevailed in the regiment, to a degree never before witnessed, and the commander at length discovered the excellent cause of this salutary change. Genuine zeal had now its triumph and its rich reward; the officers waited on Mr Walker in a body, to acknowledge the good effects of his wise and sedulous exertions, and to thank him for the reformation he had produced in their ranks."

The scene, when the regiment left the place, after nine weeks' residence, is thus beautifully described.

"These interesting men left Truro on the 19th of January, after nine weeks' stay. The parting scene was indescribably affecting. They assembled the last evening in the Society's room, to hear their beloved minister's farewell prayer and exhortation. 'Had you,' said Mr Walker to a friend, 'but seen their countenances, what thankfulness, love, sorrow, and joy, sat upon them; they hoped they might bring forth some fruit; they hoped to meet us again at the right hand of Jesus in his illustrious day. Amen.' It was an hour of mingled distress and comfort; the hearts of some were so full, that they clasped the hand of the beloved instrument of their conversation, and turned away without a word. They began their morning's march praising God for bringing them under the sound of his Gospel; and as they slowly passed along, turned round to catch occasional glimpses of the town as they gradually lost sight of it, exclaiming, 'God bless Truro.' They saw their spiritual leader no more on earth, but were consoled by the hope of a triumphant meeting in the armies of heaven."

Amid his unvaried labours in his own parish, Mr Walker was prevailed upon to extend his sphere of usefulness, by the publication of an admirable course of sermons, which, accordingly, appeared under the title of The Christian. This work has long been held in high esteem among the pious in this country, and has been often republished. It presents a lively portraiture of the Christian character, in a series of discourses, illustrative of the passage,—“If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature.”

The unwearied labour and perpetual anxieties to which Mr Walker was subjected, in the conscientious discharge of his ministerial duties, soon began to affect his bodily constitution. In the mysterious arrangements of Providence, his sun went down while it was yet day. On the 27th April 1760, he preached, for the last time, in the pulpit of the Church at Truro. The concluding words of his discourse were peculiarly solemn and affecting. Though quite unconscious that his ministerial labours were now at a close, he spoke, as from the brink of the grave, to his beloved flock.

“To be plain, I am grieved at heart for many, very many of you, to think how you will make your appearance before Christ’s judgment-seat. You have no works to speak there for your belonging to Christ; I can see none. I see works of various kinds that prove you do not belong to him. If a life of pleasure, idleness, indulgence, drunkenness, pride, covetousness, would recommend you to the favour of the Judge, few would be better received than numbers of you. In the name of God, my friends, when you know this moment in your own consciences, that if, as you have been and are, you should be called to judgment, you would be as surely cast into hell, as if you were already scorching in those dreadful flames, why will you live at such a rate?—Well, we shall be all before the judgment-seat of Christ together. There the controversy, between me, persuading you by the terrors of the Lord, and you determined to abide in your sins, will be decided. There it will appear whether your blood will be upon your own heads for your obstinate impenitence, or upon mine, for not giving you warning. Christ will certainly either acquit or condemn me on this account; and if I should be acquitted herein, what will become of you? I tremble to think how so many words of mine will be brought up against you on that day. What will you say, what will you answer, how will you excuse yourselves? O sirs, if you will not be prevailed upon, you will, with eternal self-reproach, curse the day that you knew me, or heard one word from my mouth. Why, why, will you die with so aggravated a destruction? O think of the judgment; think of it, and you will not be able to hold it out against your own souls. May the Lord incline you to do so; may he cause this word to sink deep into your hearts; may he shew you all your danger; and with an outstretched arm, bring you out of the hands of the devil, and translate you into the glorious kingdom of his dear Son to his own glory, and your unspeakable happiness, in the day of the appearance of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Even so, most mighty God, and most merciful Father, for the same Jesus Christ’s sake. Amen.”

Such was the powerful appeal with which this devoted servant of the Lord terminated his faithful and successful ministry—a ministry which extended its benefits far beyond the immediate sphere of its operations, and the effects of which are felt in Cornwall even at this day. Of Mr Walker of Truro, indeed, it may be said, as was once declared of Henry Martyn, “he hath lighted a flame which shall never be extinguished.”

Soon after the delivery of the discourse to which we have referred, Mr Walker was seized with a fever, which confined him for several weeks to his room; and when he had, in some measure, recovered, symptoms of pulmonary consumption began to appear. At Bristol hot-wells, to which he repaired in the Autumn, he derived little or no benefit, and after passing two months there, he removed to Kington, in Warwickshire, with the view of spending some time with Mr Talbot, the clergyman of the place. The season, however, set in so unfavourably, that it was thought advisable for him to return to Bristol. Finding that, even yet, he could derive no benefit from the use of the mineral waters, he accepted the invitation of the Earl of Dartmouth, to pay him a visit at Blackheath, in the neighbourhood of London. Here Mr Walker found a Christian welcome, and received the utmost attention during his trying illness. “The kindness of his host and hostess was unbounded; the physicians refused to receive any thing from him for their attendance; his flock at Truro were perpetually conveying to him sums of money, cheerfully bestowed on a minister who had impoverished himself for their sakes.”

In the spring of the year 1761, Mr Walker’s illness assumed a more alarming character. A burning fever by day, and distressing perspirations by night, with a cough which deprived him of rest, rendered him, every day, weaker and more languid. Still his confidence in the arrangements of his Heavenly Father, comforted and supported him. “The weakness of my body,” he observed, “deprives me of all joyous sensations, but my faith in God’s promises, I bless the Lord, is firm and unshaken.” Whenever the slightest prospect of recovery presented itself, he instantly thought of his beloved Truro, and looked forward, with fond anticipation, to renewed exertions among an affectionate people. Their best interests dwelt much upon his mind; and often, very often, did he lift up his soul in earnest prayer to God, “that they all might be saved.” Throughout the whole of his illness, he enjoyed much sweet communion with the Father of his spirit; and, as a necessary consequence, his mind was kept in a state of perfect peace.

“To a friend, who shed tears, he said, ‘why do you trouble yourself? I am going to heaven: Christ my Lord died.’ When Mr Burnet wept over him, he exclaimed, ‘do you not rejoice with me?’ Five days before his death, he caused a letter to be written to Mr Conon, in which he assures him, that ‘with great confusion of thought he had no doubts, great confidence, great submission, no complaining.’ To this he added, ‘as to actual views of the joys that are coming, I have none, but a steadfast belief of them in Christ;’ but lest he should be supposed to be wanting in satisfactory experience, he proceeded, ‘what I have found in myself for months past, and the present workings of the Spirit, have left me without any doubt of my union with Christ.’

“Awaking from a doze, he seized the hand of his nurse, and said, ‘I have been upon the wings of the cherubim, heaven has been in a manner opened to me; I shall be soon there myself, and am only sorry I cannot take you with me.’ He also observed to Mr Burnet, that if his strength allowed, he could tell him news which would rejoice his heart,—‘I have had,’ he said, ‘such views of heaven; but I can say no more.’ These raptures were, however, qualified by the deepest humility; for when one present rejoiced over his apparent ripeness for heaven, he said, ' nay, my dear friend, the body of sin is not yet done away. I shall continue a sinner to the very last gasp. '

In a frame of mind so calm, so enviable, did this faithful servant of the Most High bid a last farewell to the world, and on Sabbath, July 19, 1761, his happy spirit winged its flight from earth to heaven. Let us live the life of the righteous, and our " last end will be like his. "

THE MARTYRDOM OF POLYCARP.

Abridged from Milner.

IN or about the year 167, Smyrna was distinguished by the martyrdom of her bishop, Polycarp.

Usher has laboured to show that he was the angel of the Church of Smyrna, addressed by our Saviour. If he be right in this, the character of Polycarp is indeed delineated by a divine hand; and the martyrdom before us was particularly predicted.

The admirable Polycarp, when he heard of the cruelties practised in the bloody persecution then carried on, was quite unmoved, and resolved to remain in the city. But, induced by the entreaties of his people, he retired to a village, at no great distance; and there, with a few friends, he spent his time entirely, day and night, in praying, according to his usual custom, for all the Churches in the world. Three days before he was seized, he had a vision while he was praying: He saw his pillar consumed by fire; and turning to the company, he said prophetically, " I must be burned alive. " Upon hearing that the persons in search of him were just at hand, he retired to another village. Immediately the officers came to his house; and, not finding him, they seized two servants, one of whom was induced, by torture, to confess the place of his retreat. Taking the servant as their guide, they went out about supper time, with their usual arms, as against a robber; and arriving late, they found him lying in an upper room at the end of the house, whence he might have made his escape, but he would not, saying, " The will of the Lord be done. "

When he was brought to the tribunal, the pro-consul asked him if he was Polycarp; to which he assented. The pro-consul then began to exhort him to have pity on his great age, and to swear by the fortune of Cæsar, and to reproach Christ, and he would release him. Polycarp gave him this ever memorable reply: " Eighty and six years have I served Him, and he hath never wronged me, and how can I blaspheme my King who hath saved me? " The pro-consul still urging, " swear by the fortune of Cæsar; " Polycarp said, " If you still vainly contend to make me swear by the fortune of Cæsar, as you speak, affecting an ignorance of my real character, hear me frankly declaring what I am: I am a Christian. " " I have wild beasts, " says the pro-consul; " I will expose you to them, unless you repent. " " Call them, " replies the martyr. " I will tame your spirit by fire, " says the pro-consul, " since you despise the wild beasts, unless you repent. " " You threaten me with fire, " answers Polycarp, " which burns for a moment, and will be soon extinct; but you are ignorant of the future judgment, and of the fire of eternal punishment reserved for the ungodly. But why do you delay? Do what you please. " The pro-consul then sent the herald to proclaim thrice, in the midst of the assembly, " Polycarp hath professed himself a Christian. " Upon this all the multitude, both of Gentiles and of Jews, who dwelt at Smyrna, with insatiate rage, shouted aloud, " This is the doctor of Asia, the father of Christians, the subverter of our gods, who hath taught many not to sacrifice nor to adore. " They now begged Philip the Asiarch to let out a lion against Polycarp. But he refused, observing that the amphitheatrical spectacles of the wild beasts were finished. They then unanimously shouted, that he should be burned alive. The business was executed with all possible speed; for the people immediately gathered from the work-shops and baths, in which employment the Jews distinguished themselves with their usual malice. As soon as the fagots were collected, he stripped off his clothes, and loosed his girdle. Immediately the usual appendages of burning were placed about him. And when they had proceeded to fasten him to the stake, he said, " Let me remain as I am; for He who giveth me strength to sustain the fire, will enable me also, without your securing me with nails, to remain unmoved in the fire. " Upon this they bound him without nailing him. And he, putting his hands behind him, and being bound, offered to Almighty God the following prayer: " O Father of thy beloved and blessed Son Jesus Christ, through whom we have attained the knowledge of Thee, O God of angels and principalities, and of all creation, and of all the just who live in Thy sight, I bless Thee, that Thou hast counted me worthy of this day, and this hour, to receive my portion in the number of martyrs, in the cup of Christ, for the resurrection to eternal life, both of soul and body, in the incorruption of the Holy Ghost; among whom may I be received before Thee, this day, as a sacrifice well savoured and acceptable, which Thou, the faithful and true God, hast prepared, promised before hand, and fulfilled accordingly. Wherefore, I praise thee for all those things, I bless thee, I glorify thee, by the eternal High Priest, Jesus Christ, thy well-beloved Son; through whom, with Him in the Holy Spirit, be glory to Thee both now and for ever. Amen. "

When he had finished his prayer, the officers lighted the fire; and, a great flame bursting out, and forming the appearance of an arch, was as a wall round about the body of the martyr, which was in the midst, not as burning flesh, but as gold and silver refined in the furnace. At length, the infuriated people, observing that his body could not be consumed by the fire, called to the officer, whose business it was, in the Roman games, to dispatch any beast that was unruly or dangerous, to approach, and to plunge his sword into his body. Upon this, a quantity of blood gushed out, so that the fire was extinguished; and the immortal spirit of the venerable saint fled to the mansions of everlasting rest, and glory, and felicity.

DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN ANDERSON,
Minister of Newburgh.

" Hallowed be thy name. "—MATT. vi. 9.

THE name of God is a Hebraism for God himself, his attributes, and his works. When the Jews meant to describe the person, character, or office of any one, they frequently made use of the term, Name; and we find it often employed in each of these senses by the writers of the New Testament. Thus we find it expressly conferred upon individuals, because of certain excellencies of character, qualities of condition, or circumstances in life, on account of which they had already been distinguished, or were yet to be so in their future history;—for example upon Noah, as a husbandman—upon Abraham, as the father of many nations—upon Isaac, with whom the covenant was to be established—and upon Jesus, " for He shall save his people from their sins. " And so, in the instance under consideration, the name of God is put for the inherent excellencies and attributes of his nature, when, as the all-wise, all-powerful, and all-gracious and merciful Jehovah, we are called upon to address Him as "our Father in heaven," who supplies all our wants, pardons all our sins, and carefully superintends all our affairs.

"Hallowing" the name of God, is an expression of the same import with sanctifying the name of God, and it is applicable either to persons or to things. Both are said to be sanctified or made holy, when they are set apart from a profane to a sacred use, and in this sense, the vessels of the temple, as well as the priests under the law, were sanctified or made holy, when they were dedicated to the service of God. But, as it was of vital importance to preserve persons and things thus consecrated from whatever might defile and pollute them, the terms sanctified and holy soon came to signify what is clean and pure; and as a mind untainted by sin constitutes the most valuable species of cleanness and purity, they were at length employed to denote internal rectitude, in opposition to moral deformity. In this sense the expression is used, when true believers are said to be sanctified by the Holy Ghost; sanctified in Christ Jesus; sanctified by the blood of the covenant; and when they are called upon to "sanctify the Lord God in their hearts, and cleanse themselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord."

But besides implying, in a secondary sense, to be made holy, and to be set apart for a sacred use and designation, the phrase is employed to denote, in its first and highest sense, holiness itself, or what is essentially and absolutely holy. To God alone it can be so applied; and when it is said of him, that he is holy, the meaning is, that he is possessed of inherent excellence of nature—of unswerving rectitude of conduct—and is infinitely removed from all possibility of purposing, or thinking, or approving evil. When our Saviour, therefore, teaches us to pray that the name of God may be "hallowed," he, undoubtedly, does not mean we should request that additional holiness may be conferred upon God. In his nature, improvement can have no place; already he is infinite in holiness, as well as in every other perfection. Nothing can add to, and nothing can diminish from the rectitude of the Supreme Being. Creatures may rise or fall in the scale of perfection; they may acquire new degrees of sanctity, or they may contract a greater share of moral defilement. But God is in this, as in every other quality of his nature, without "variableness or shadow of turning," and he must ever continue absolutely and transcendently holy.

When we are directed, then, to address God in the petition, "hallowed be thy name," we can understand it in no other sense than as the ascription of holiness and purity, as essentially belonging to him; and as a request that our own hearts may be suitably affected by the knowledge of his being possessed of both these qualities. We are not directed to pray that God may become more holy, which would be to pray for an impossibility; but we are desired to entreat, that his nature and perfections may be better known and understood; that he may be more exalted, and revered, and loved by the creatures whom he has formed in his own image, and created for his own glory; and that we, and all men, may be led to think, and speak, and act, as becomes his transcendent excellencies, so fully revealed in his Word, and so strikingly manifested through all his works.

Ignorant of the very existence of one living and true God, the heathens, even among learned and civilized nations, at the time that our Lord dictated this prayer, had no suitable apprehensions of divine perfection. They believed in a multitude of gods, and to all of them they ascribed not merely the weaknesses, but the errors and pollutions of inferior beings, the debasing passions and desires of sinful men. Even the Jews, though they knew of, and believed in, the existence of the Great Sovereign Creator and Governor of the world, entertained very unworthy notions of his attributes, representing him as limited in the protection which he afforded to the children of men, and as a being whose mercy did not extend beyond their own nation. And, even now, amid all the advantages which men enjoy, God is not regarded with becoming reverence, while there are whole nations who still sit in darkness, who neither know of, nor adore the One Universal Parent of nature. When we pray, therefore, that his name may be "hallowed," our petition bears, that his glorious perfections may be exalted in the eyes of all intelligent creatures; that the veil may be taken off from the eyes of the heathen; that the worship of idols may be everywhere abolished, and that all men may be led to separate from their conceptions every low and debasing attribute, and uniformly entertain suitable apprehensions of his power, wisdom, goodness, holiness, justice and truth. "O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth, who hast set thy glory above the heavens;" "let thy Word have free course and be glorified;" "let the people praise Thee O God; let all the people praise thee."

1. We sanctify God's name, in the spirit of this petition, when we attend upon the ordinances of Religion; and offer up the praises of our hearts in the services of his House. These ordinances were appointed by God expressly for this purpose; and in the "rest" of the original Sabbath, is represented the sacred and hallowed calm by which all hearts should be pervaded, when, on "the day of the Lord," men are reminded of the existence and perfections of Him who made the worlds and all the host of them, are admonished of the subordination of all things in heaven and earth to Him, and their subserviency to the purposes of his glory; and are thus given to understand that they are employed in the noblest and most exalted exercise of their spiritual nature, when they unite in the solemn and public acknowledgment of His "name," before whom angels worship and veil their faces with their wings. Religion, even amidst the desolations of the fall, is still, in some measure, natural to man; a sense of Deity is inseparable from his nature; and nowhere, and never, has that nation existed, among whom religious ceremonies and rites have not been observed. They are the proper and spontaneous effort of the human mind to rise above its earthly condition; to connect itself with that mysterious, celestial origin whence it sprung; and as the only tribute which it has to offer, and the only return which it can make for the goodness by which it lives, it would thus recognise its connection with, and obligations to, that invisible and almighty power who rules and reigns over all. Superstition, in all its forms, the foulest and cruelest rites of heathenism, are nothing else than this sentiment of religion struggling to express itself; and, while from blind, ignorant, and corrupted man, left to himself in the worship and homage which he pays, nothing can be expected but error, deformity, and imperfection; yet, he who causeth the very wrath of man to praise him, will so arrange the events of his providence, that his name shall be magnified and extolled, and his justice made known among the heathen.

The Jews were early initiated in the knowledge and worship of the one true God. "One thing," said David, "have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple." The "beauty," or holiness, of the Lord had there a symbolical representation, and in the warm and fervid imagination of that people, the whole building, upon which had been lavished all that the taste and treasures of the kingdom could afford, became the type of every thing sacred and divine. The Christian service is still more exalted and refined, and now that we know we have not been redeemed with corruptible things of earthly value, with the blood of goats, or of bulls, but by the precious ransom of God's own beloved Son; how deeply incumbent is it upon us, to repair to God's House to hear what he will speak to our souls of things pertaining to life and salvation, and to pour out the gratitude and devotion of our hearts for all the wonders of redeeming love! While we thus worship him, he sends a blessing down to hallow and attune our services to the praises of his name; he strengthens and sanctifies our purposes and resolutions of living to his glory; he draws our desires and affections upwards to himself; and, deriving nourishment and grace from that pure and heavenly source, we are enabled by the exercise, at once to love him more and to serve him better. When Moses ascended unto the Mount with God, we are told that his countenance, on his return to the people, bore marks that he had been in the heavenly presence; so when we come to the altar of the Lord, we go back to the world, with a portion of the odour of the sanctuary upon us, with our hearts better fortified against sin, and our affections glowing with purer and holier aspirations.

2. We sanctify God's name, in the spirit of this petition, when we live devoted to his will, and regulate our conduct by the tenor of his law. When God created man, he created him for his own glory. This, we are repeatedly told in Scripture, was the motive which induced the Almighty to give birth to the human race, and to endow them with all the high powers and faculties of which they are possessed. The end which he had in view in our creation ought, undoubtedly, to constitute the chief employment of our lives. Our devotions and our actions should always correspond, and both should ever be conformable to the views of our divine Author. To us the inspiration of the Almighty has given understanding, and taught us more than the beasts of the field. He has constituted us supreme in this lower world, and amply provided for our princely dignity. We have been crowned by him "with glory;" and whoever attentively considers his nature and condition,—the structure of his body and the constitution of his mind,—the provision that is furnished for the supply of his animal wants,—the objects that are provided for the entertainment of his intellectual faculties, and the scope that is afforded for the exercise of his moral affections, must acknowledge that if the glory of God be manifestly displayed in the other works of his hands, it shines with peculiar lustre in the creation and preservation of man.

And in the doing of all this, has not our Creator plainly declared that while, in gratitude, he claims the homage and devotion of our hearts, and in the use of the gift we ought to sanctify the name of the Giver, we will then only best fulfil the end of our being, and reap the glory and felicity for which we were formed, when we dedicate ourselves to his service, and live in habitual subserviency to his will and pleasure? When such is the case, we fall in with the general plan of divine providence; our minds, if I may so speak, are in unison with the mind of God; and therefore it is, that an apostle thus exhorts, "whether ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." And what nobler design can man propose to himself in life, in the exercise of all the highest and most exalted endowments of his nature, than thus to manifest his sense of dependence by standing to reverence the Author of his being? While we walk then in the paths of God and Religion, we walk also in those of nature and providence; we are vessels of honour, as discharging the office which our all-wise Creator has assigned us; man is an echo to the voice of God, and the earth revolves in harmony with the course and the will of heaven.

The obligation incumbent upon Christians, however, to devote themselves to the service of God, and thereby to "hallow his name," is both more extensive and binding than any thing that can be urged from the relation in which we stand to him as the Author and Preserver of our being, as the Father of our spirits, or as the bountiful and never-failing Source of all our comforts. The argument founded on the scheme of redemption is, "that ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's." Hence, to lead holy and virtuous lives, and in all things to conform to God's will, who has "called us out of darkness into his marvellous light," is a duty more incumbent upon those who acknowledge this his unmerited loving-kindness, than upon the rest of mankind. The favour is greater which prompts to the duty, while the condition in which we are placed renders the performance of it both practicable and easy. Heathens can only conduct themselves by the direction of a blind and perverted reason; but Christians are in possession of the merring instructions of the Father of Lights. From them no part of his will lies concealed, they know it in the full extent of its demand—they know it in the full extent of its sanction—they know it in the full extent of its spirituality—and, "constrained by the love of Christ," and knowing what is "the hope of their calling," they aspire after the loftiest heights of holiness, by endeavouring to have Christ "formed in their hearts the hope of glory," "that they may be pure even as he is pure," and by striving to shew forth the praises of God, in studying "to be perfect even as their Father in Heaven is perfect." The view, in short, which is here exhibited of the divine nature and conduct, the account which is given of the present state and condition of man, and the prospects which are opened into a future and eternal world, are calculated, more than all other considerations and reasonings put together, to interest the active powers of the soul on the side of duty, and to engage all the finer feelings of the heart in its behalf. ' God, in Christ, reconciling the world to himself; Christ, the just suffering for the sins of the unjust, that he might bring them unto God; and the Holy Ghost descending from above to instruct, and comfort, and strengthen the heirs of salvation; are truths that afford the most powerful persuasives to godliness and virtue which can possibly be addressed to the mind of man. He who can shut his eyes from beholding their force, and steel his heart against being moved by their influence, must not only be destitute of all sense of duty, and all feeling of gratitude, but utterly regardless about his own happiness, and the perfection of his nature. They urge to eminent and universal holiness, by every argument that can convince; by every consideration that can attach; by every representation that can allure; by the mercy of God; by the love of Christ; by the example of his life; by the propitiatory efficacy of his death; by the consolations of his spirit; by the terror of eternal misery, and by the offer of everlasting happiness.

3. But in order that we may duly and reverently hallow the name of our Father in heaven, we must live under a habitual sense of our dependence upon his mercy and grace, for strength and ability to serve him, and cordially acquiesce in the full extent of a method of salvation which implies absolute helplessness on the part of man, and ascribes the glory of our recovery to God.
