THE Conductors of the SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD, in closing the Second Volume of the Work, feel themselves called upon to renew their expressions of gratitude to the Great Head of the Church for the ample encouragement and success which have crowned their past labours in the cause of Evangelical Truth and Righteousness. It has been their uniform endeavour at once to edify and interest their readers, and the extensive circulation which the Periodical has obtained, among all denominations of professing Christians, shows how fully the Public appreciate a work which combines with the advantage of emanating from a responsible body, and thereby affording a security for the respectability of its Contributors, the additional benefit of inculcating the principles and the precepts of Christianity, in such a form as, instead of offending, to be cordially welcomed from one end of the country to the other, by every devout follower of Jesus. And it is gratifying to have it in our power to add, that not merely in Scotland, and in the principal towns of England and Ireland, but in the Colonies and some parts of the Continent, the influence of this Work has been felt and acknowledged.

The present Volume contains Articles from the pen of no fewer than One Hundred and Twenty-four Authors, clerical and lay, and the variety which the Conductors have thus been able to maintain, both in the subjects themselves and in the mode of treating them, has earned for the SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD that widely-extended celebrity which, by the Divine blessing, it has reached. Literature, science, subjects of general interest, philanthropic and benevolent schemes, all viewed under a purely religious aspect, and mingled with discussions upon the evidences, and doctrines, and duties of our most holy faith, have imparted to our pages a rich and varied interest which has gained access for this little work to many a Christian home, and, we have reason to believe, to many a Christian heart.

In the same spirit, and with the same simplicity of intention, which has hitherto characterized their efforts, will the Conductors proceed in their design, trusting in the assistance of Him who has the hearts of all men in his hands, and to whose wise arrangements alone it is to be ascribed that their desire to promote His cause has been so nobly, and with such unexampled unanimity, responded to by all classes of their fellow-countrymen and fellow-Christians.

THE MYSTERIES OF REVELATION.

No. I.

BY THE REV. MARCUS DODS,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Belford.

It is often objected to Christianity, that it contains mysteries, and it is unreasonable to call upon a man to believe what he does not understand. Besides, it is urged, that as the Gospel professes to be a revelation, nothing can be more inconsistent with such a profession, than the putting forth of what is confessedly too mysterious to be capable of being apprehended.

The objection is so very easily answered, that it would hardly be necessary to give even a formal statement of the proper reply to it, were it not that, as some are weak enough to put it forth, others may be weak enough to rely upon it. Besides, the objection sometimes acquires a force and an importance which do not naturally belong to it, from the injudicious way in which it is attempted to be set aside.

In reply to the objection, it may be remarked, in the first place, that all things are, to a certain extent, mysterious, and that all men believe mysteries. We are surrounded on every hand by objects which effectually baffle every attempt to comprehend them. Yet no man dreams of making this incomprehensibility a reason for denying the existence or the reality of these objects. We are ourselves a mystery to ourselves. How two things of so opposite a nature, as a material body and an immaterial soul, should combine together to form one person,—how these are united, and how they operate on one another, are quite as mysterious and incomprehensible as any thing that the Gospel requires us to believe. Yet, who on that account pretends to deny or to doubt the reality of them? Our very existence is a mystery. For what is life? Where does it reside? or, how does it operate? These are questions which no man has ever yet been able to answer, and probably no man ever will be able to answer them,—able to tell us what is that mysterious agent which works within us, and without which we should cease to exist. Yet, was any man ever found so utterly wild as to doubt his own existence, because it is to him utterly incomprehensible, or to deny that he has life, simply because he can no more tell what life is, than he can unfold the mysteries of the Gospel?

We may safely conclude, therefore, that no man rejects any truth of the Gospel simply because it is mysterious, because there is no man who does not cordially believe, nay, who would not hold it absolute insanity to doubt, many things which are quite as mysterious as any announcement which the Gospel contains.

This single remark is a complete reply to the objection; and were its refutation the only object that I have in view, I should not deem it necessary to add another word. But we may go farther, and remark, in the next place, that in a revelation from heaven, mysteries are unavoidable. All truths, at least all moral truths, are inseparably linked together. There is no truth of this kind which stands solitary and unconnected with others. Now, in consequence of this connection, when a clear view of any particular truth is communicated to us, we necessarily obtain a view, more or less distinct, of the truths which stand in the nearest connection with it. But we get only a partial glimpse of these truths, as it is not the object of the revelation to communicate to us a knowledge of them. They appear only incidentally,—are seen only so far as their connection with the truth, which it is the design of revelation to communicate, makes them known; but beyond this are left dim and indistinct,—faintly seen and partially comprehended.

It may, perhaps, be said, Why should not the truths, thus incidentally and partially brought into view, be fully cleared up, even though the knowledge of them should not be necessary, that thus mystery may be avoided? But then a full elucidation of these truths would bring other truths partially into view, so that we would thus get quit of one set of mysteries only to be introduced into another set of them; unless, indeed, it were possible to go on and exhaust all truth,—that is, unless it were possible for us to become as wise as the Omniscient. Mysteries, therefore, were altogether unavoidable in giving a revelation; and mysteries there must for ever be.

The truths necessary for our salvation have been clearly revealed. In the revelation of them, other truths have been incidentally brought into view, but have been left in obscurity. It is not because they are of less importance than those which have been revealed, but because they are of less importance to us in our present circumstances. A star which we can hardly see, from which we derive no perceptible advantage, and which, for any concern that we have in it, might be extinguished without apparent loss, may, in reality, be quite as important a body as the earth or the sun. But it is not so to us. So it is with truth. It is all-important; but what is necessary for us, in our present state, has been brought near to us; while other truths are seen only like a dim and distant star.

Were we at once conveyed to the star that appears smallest to our eye, we would find it to be a body of great magnitude, and we would see other stars as far beyond it. Were we conveyed to these, we would find just the same appearance. And how often soever we might be transported from star to star, that appearance would continue the same, unless it were possible for us to exhaust space, or measure the universe. Of the same exhaustless nature is truth. To whatever extent our knowledge of it may be carried, we shall still see other portions of it showing themselves dim and indistinctly from afar. While, therefore, it will be readily admitted that we are well employed when endeavouring to enlarge the extent of our knowledge, we ought at the same time to be grateful that the knowledge necessary for our salvation is confined within narrow limits, and to guard against the spirit that would urge us on to be "wise above what is written," in the vain hope of advancing to a degree of knowledge where there will be no mysteries; since it is very certain, that as we advance in the path of knowledge, mysteries will multiply around us.

An observation ought to be made here, though there can be no occasion to dwell upon it, namely, that God has an undoubted right to demand our belief of what is mysterious. This I think will not be doubted by any man who reflects that we are actually surrounded by mysteries, which no man ever dreams of calling in question; and, moreover, that, as far as we can see, it is impossible to communicate to man any moral truth whatever, without, at the same time, suggesting others, which will be partially seen and imperfectly understood, and consequently, to some extent mysterious. If, in the works of nature, we are called upon to believe mysteries, and find no difficulty in believing them, it is utterly absurd to say that we ought not to be called upon to believe them in the work of redemption,—a work of a higher character than the works of nature, and lying much more beyond our reach fully to explore.

If it be said, that in reality nature does not demand our belief in mysteries, since that which is mysterious in any thing forms no part of our knowledge or belief; the very same thing may be said of Scripture mysteries. If it be said, for example, that the union of the soul and body is indeed mysterious; but then what we are required to believe is the fact, which we may believe upon competent evidence, while that which is mysterious in the matter, is the manner how they are connected with, and operate upon each other; and with regard to this we know nothing, and are required to believe nothing; the very same thing is true of any Scripture mystery. The union of two natures in one person, in Christ, for example, is doubtless a great mystery. But the fact we may believe upon competent evidence; while of the manner how they are united we know nothing, and are required to believe nothing.

But then we cannot be required to believe contradictions; and some of the Scripture mysteries, it is alleged, involve contradictions. Now, in the first place, I deny the proposition, that we cannot be called upon to believe contradictions; for, though it be true in the abstract, that contradictions cannot both be true, yet it is equally true, that we do often believe what to us are irreconcilable contradictions. What can be more mysterious, more incapable of being reconciled by us, than the omniscience and providence of God and the free agency of man? Yet every man feels that he is a free agent, on the one hand, and on the other, few have gone so far as to deny the omniscience of God, in order to get quit of the difficulty. We have ample evidence for both, and we therefore believe both; and we feel satisfied, that the apparent contradiction arises simply from our ignorance, and that when we come to a state of higher knowledge, we shall see how these apparently irreconcilable truths harmonise with one another. It is, therefore, no solid objection to any doctrine whatever, that it involves what appear to us to be irreconcilable contradictions.

Least of all can such an objection be urged against what is avowedly a mystery; for with regard to a mystery, no man is entitled to say that it involves contradictions. The man who says this, says, in effect, that it is no mystery,—that, on the contrary, he clearly comprehends it. But, if he say that it is a mystery,—that he is quite unable to comprehend it,—then it is obviously absurd in him to say that it contains contradictions. If he do not fully comprehend it, he is clearly not entitled to say what it contains. It may contain apparent contradictions, but that is no objection, since apparent contradictions every man believes. And unless he can say that he fully comprehends it, that is, has destroyed the mystery, he is not entitled to say that these contradictions are real.

A MINISTER'S NEW YEAR'S GIFT TO HIS PARISHIONERS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

PART. I.

"Beloved, I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health."—3 JOHN, 2.

It is an old and established practice, at seasons like the present, when we have completed one portion of our allotted pilgrimage, and are about to enter on another, for one friend to express towards another the mutual demonstration of cordiality and good will. The practice is good in itself, and one, too, that is perfectly in unison with the benevolent spirit of the religion of Christ; and therefore, my friend, whoever you are into whose hands this paper may come, I beg you to accept my best and warmest wishes for your welfare. I pray to God (and may the Father of the spirits of all flesh realize the fervent prayer) that this year may be to you the commencement of many happy years to come; that during this and many successive seasons, your bread may be given you, and your water may be sure; that yourself and all that are near and dear to you may be shielded from every biting blast, and the numerous ills that humanity is heir to; and that you bright luminary, who is now rejoicing like a bridegroom to resume his race, and to measure out to your observant eye the progress of your days, and weeks, and months, may not reach the goal of his annual journey, without finding you in the full and unalloyed possession of all the temporal blessings which a friend and a pastor can desire for you.

But while I am happy, my friend, to have an opportunity of expressing my cordial and affectionate desires for your health and prosperity during the year that has just begun, I mean that the full fervour of my wishes, and the full strength of your solicitude should extend beyond these, should be directed towards, and fixed upon, an object immeasurably more important to you than either the establishment of your bodily health, or the promotion of your temporal prosperity. Doubtless, the enjoyment of health, and the possession of a competent portion of the comforts of the world, are so needful to our present existence, so conducive to the welfare and preservation of the body that has been given to us, and so indispensable to render life a pleasant and desirable possession, that as soon would your heart cease to beat and to hold any sympathy with the world around you, as that you would cease to make these the subjects of your frequent thoughts and your anxious desire; and all the ardour you discover in the pursuit of them, all the time, and labour, and expense you bestow in securing them, only shew that you prize them as you ought to do, that you are determined not to hold in trivial estimation, or to waste and endanger what has been given you for use, and what, like all your other possessions, are the gifts of a munificent Providence.

In making the body, then, and its concomitant interests, the objects of your solicitude and care, you are justified by every consideration that can sway the conduct of reasonable creatures; and among all the various motives which the Gospel suggests, there is not one, that does not enlist all the strongest principles of our nature to press on you the duty of providing for the wants, and increasing the comforts of the life that now is. So far the maxims of the world harmonize with the spirit and precepts of religion. Between both there is observable, to a certain extent, a congeniality of sentiment and a similarity of advice. But beyond this the harmony does not extend; and the maxims of the world, and the anxieties and pursuits of the generality of men, terminate at the very point where all that is interesting and momentous in religion begins. Were we assured that there is no object to engage our solicitude beyond the material mechanism which we call the body, and were we satisfied that our nature was furnished with all its variety of powers exclusively for the sphere in which we at present move, then there could not be the shadow of a doubt existing in the mind of any thinking person, on what all the energies of his thought and labours should be exerted. But seeing that we have not merely a presumptive, but a demonstrative, proof that there is a scene beyond the present, where we are destined to exist; seeing that it is written, as with a sunbeam, on every province of nature, that this world is but preparatory to another; seeing that the voice of reason, above all, the book of revelation, proclaim aloud, and in language which all feel and can appreciate, that this is but the infancy of our being, that the body which we carry about with us, and for which we are so much concerned, is but the fragile, transitory, ephemeral habitation of the soul, which is infinitely superior in value, and which is destined to reach its full maturity only when it shall have left the scenes of time, it can require no great discernment to perceive, that the one object which should take precedence of every other, is that of providing for the welfare of the immortal part of our nature; and that if, on the other hand, we harbour no fervent wish, and make no serious effort to provide for the welfare of the soul in futurity, we are acting contrary to the principles which govern us in the ordinary concerns of the world, and by which we are led to proportion the degree of our anxiety and pursuit to the relative value of the objects around us. Taking it for granted, my friend, that you admit the truth, and feel the weight of these considerations, that you are convinced of the fact that you have a soul, whose future welfare is dependent on your conduct now, and of the reasonableness of bestowing all possible attention and care in securing the welfare of that which you own to be so much nobler in nature, and superior in value, and more durable in existence than the body, I proceed to the main design of this paper, which is to direct you in the right use of those means which God has appointed, and promised to bless, for producing the rise, progress, and establishment of religion in the soul.

In the first place, you must read the Scriptures. You profess, I trust, to receive them as the Word of God; and you cannot, therefore, without impiety and dishonour to the divine perfections, treat with neglect, or remain in ignorance of a book that has descended from him. You are commanded by your Saviour to search the Scriptures; and there cannot be a greater abuse of language, or a greater outrage upon consistency, than for a person to assume the name and make the profession of one of his followers, and yet to be heedless of the Bible,—to have no desire, and take no pains to acquire a knowledge of its contents, though it be the book from which he professes to draw his principles and his practice. The truth is, that the reading of the Bible is a duty which goes before, and takes precedence of, all other duties, inasmuch as it is the source whence the knowledge of all duties must be derived; so that if you desire to know, and knowing, to be able to perform, all that the Lord requires of you, you must read the Bible, and make yourself acquainted with its peculiar doctrines and requirements, otherwise, from a partial or a total ignorance of it, you may fall into many dangerous errors, both of sentiment and action.

In reading the Bible, you must, in order to profit by it, have a regard to its principal, its sole design. There is a great deal in the Scriptures to interest and instruct the mind of a reader; for that sacred book contains, in its simple and primitive annals, an account of the origin of society, and government, and the arts; is enriched with many poetical effusions, which no efforts of uninspired genius have ever surpassed; abounds with traits of men and manners different altogether from any thing observable in our western hemisphere; and, in short, comprehends a treasure of the most varied and valuable matter, far greater than can be found any where else in so small a compass. But although the Bible contains these and many other things of equal or superior interest, it is not on this account you must regard it as the best and most precious book the world ever saw. Its great excellence, and that which should stamp it, in your estimation, with supreme importance, and incomparable value, is, that it is addressed to sinners—that it discovers the guilt and misery of you and all men by nature—and at the same time points out the only efficient remedy for that condition. All the other matter it contains is subordinate to this design—has been introduced merely from being connected in some way or other with its progress and extension in the world, or from being calculated to illustrate and enforce its provisions. So that, in order to reap the benefit of the Bible, you must keep ever in mind the peculiar design for which it was written; and just as in perusing a work of any human author, you would direct your mind, amid the occasional notices of other things you may meet with in the volume, to the principal subject on which it professes to give information; as in taking up a medical book, for instance, you are prepared, from its character, to obtain from it chiefly an account of the symptoms and treatment of disease; or in reading a history of Scotland, you expect to find, amid incidental allusions to foreign powers with whom it may have been in amicable relations, that the main stream of the narrative will be directed towards the affairs and institutions of your native country; so, in reading that book, which was dictated by the Spirit, and which pre-eminently claims to be “the Word of reconciliation,” you should always carry along with you the impression that its predominating object is to disclose the method of God’s dealing with sinners, and that consequently, in order to understand its doctrine, and appreciate its value, you must go to it as a sinner.

It is not enough, however, that you go to the Bible with the general and often unmeaning admission of many, that they are sinners—an admission which is often nothing more than a mere verbal acknowledgment, or at least which consists often with a very vague and imperfect view of the nature and demerit of sin. Before you can be freed from the influence of sin, you must be aware that this malignant disease is preying upon the vitals of your spiritual constitution; and before you can enjoy the benefit of that remedy which the Bible provides, you must be really and deeply convinced that you are in the condition of those for whom that divine Word was given, otherwise you will never enter, if I may say so, into the spirit of the book; and you may study it from beginning to end, you may make it the subject of your frequent and daily perusal, you may expend upon it the energies of the longest life and the most accomplished mind, but, entirely mistaking its object and design, you will continue a stranger to the spiritual blessings for which it was given, and which it is so well fitted to impart. There is an anecdote recorded of the Rev. Mr Hervey, author of the “Meditations,” which it may not be inappropriate to introduce, as bearing upon the subject of these remarks. On being once applied to by a person who had felt some convictions of sin, and who had in consequence betaken himself to the reading of the Scriptures, without experiencing that measure of comfort and relief he anticipated, the divine replied, “I perceive, Sir, the cause of your distress—you have set yourself to read the Bible, and you have made yourself acquainted with the leading facts of its history, but you have not read it as a sinner.” Captain James Wilson, the commander of the first missionary ship that sailed to the South Sea Islands, was precisely in the same circumstances. We are told by Griffin, his biographer, that having been brought, by the conversations of a friend, to entertain a speculative belief in the divine origin of Christianity, he began to read the Scriptures; but as it was with the same spirit of self-conceit, and the same love of the world and of sinful pleasure, which had formerly distinguished him, he experienced no sanctifying change, nor comfortable impressions, from the perusal; and it was not until, after having heard a sermon on justification, which made a deep impression on his mind, and led him to search the Scriptures, in the grand inquiry how he should be saved, that he enjoyed the benefit of that blessed book, and was introduced into its marvellous light. To the same purport, the excellent Dr Watts says, “that the most learned and knowing have only the same plain way of pardon and acceptance through the method of salvation revealed in the Scriptures, as the most common and unlearned.” And Cecil says, “that as the Bible contains the only specific medicine for sin, we must go to it for that, otherwise that book will be of no more use to us than any other book. Let me exhort you, then, my friend, to read the Bible in the spirit, and with the views, of which I have been speaking, and you will find in it every thing adapted to the character and situation of a sinner—a righteousness to justify you, and grace for conforming you to the will and image of God—an all-sufficient Saviour, who has freed you from the threatened penalty, and a divine Spirit, to deliver you from the reigning power, of sin—a fulness of merit, to procure you acceptance with God—and a fulness of Spirit, to prepare you for his presence.”

The circumstance of the Bible providing the only remedy for your condition as a sinner, which is the character you bear in the sight of God, should determine you to devote your chief attention to its perusal, and to draw all the principles and hopes you entertain from that only source of divine truth. I do not mean that you are to abstain from the reading of all other books. If you possess the inestimable talent of being able to read, which, from its being the almost universal privilege of Scotsmen, I trust, and presume you do, you ought, by all means, to cultivate it; and it is your duty, and will tend to your advantage, to avail yourself, as far as your means and situation will allow, of all the instruction you can obtain from the perusal of useful historical, moral, and especially, religious publications. And blessed be God! that facilities for the cultivation of this talent are afforded, to the greatest extent, and on the cheapest terms, in our age and country, where, in consequence of the very laudable exertions that are now being made to disseminate the knowledge of religion among all, especially the humbler classes of society, innumerable works are daily issuing from the press, and circulated in all quarters, so that there is scarcely a single article of Christian doctrine or duty, that has not been selected as the subject of a separate treatise or a lengthened illustration; and these being, for the most part, compiled by the diligence, and sent forth with the prayers, of many excellent and pious men, it cannot fail but that the blessing of heaven will accompany, or follow, their circulation. So far from discouraging you in the reading of these, I should think that every minister, who is anxious for the improvement of his people, would rejoice to see them so well and profitably employed. But, how excellent and useful soever these may be, you must beware of the degree of estimation in which you hold them, and the influence you allow them to acquire over you, and, let me warn you, that to content yourself, as many do, with reading commentaries, sermons, or religious magazines, while you neglect to have recourse to the Word of God itself, is as foolish, and far more pernicious, than would be the conduct of the man who should quench his thirst in a pool of polluted and stagnant water, when he has it in his power to enjoy the precious fluid, in all its purity and freshness, at the fountain-head; or, who should be satisfied with the second-hand intelligence, that he had been promised a rich and valuable inheritance, while he denies himself the assurance and satisfaction of seeing the promise itself in the deed that gives him a title to the inheritance. Besides, the Henrys, the Newtons, the Herveys, the Bostons, and the other men, who with such eloquence, and piety, and zeal, have favoured the world with expositions of Christian doctrine and duty, never meant that their works should supersede the Bible, or cast it into the shade. All they designed, and all they wished for, was that their efforts should be subservient to the grand object of explaining the import, and enforcing the principles of the sacred volume; and that they should serve only as humble pioneers, to pave the way for your being more easily and safely conducted to the temple of truth itself; and were these holy men now to revisit the world, and to see the undue influence which their works exert over the mind of many a professing Christian, they would be the first themselves to notice and deplore the perverted purposes to which their labours are misapplied.

Say not that this is a practice unentitled to the notice we are taking of it, either from its prevalence, or from the magnitude of the evils to which it has given rise. It is a practice that prevails to a lamentable extent, and which has been the prolific source of some of the greatest corruptions that have crept into the Church of Christ. To what was it owing, that the absurd and unmeaning superstitions which emanated from the Papal Chair long obtained such easy credit and such general currency, but to the circumstance of men gradually neglecting, and finally losing all knowledge of the Scriptures? To what but the same cause is it owing, that the Socinian heresy has arisen,—a heresy which, constituting the reason of man a proud and infallible judge in matters of religion, has stripped the Bible of all its characteristic peculiarities as a revelation from heaven? From what, in short, but the same fatal propensity to follow the speculations, and submit to the authority of men in religion, has it arisen, that the tide of opinion has at all times been ready to flow in the way of error; that, in our own day, so many crude and false opinions have been so eagerly taught and received as the true and unquestionable doctrines of Scripture, and that multitudes take all their ideas from the works of some favourite author, whose name is ever on their lips, and whose authority, in all matters of religion, they deem so paramount and decisive a law, that they are resolved to believe and approve, and condemn nothing but what is believed, and approved, and condemned by the idol before whom they have prostrated their judgment and their faith, and by whose oracular response they are determined to abide? No wonder, that persons of this description are so liable to fall away from the form of sound words, and make shipwreck of the faith, as it cannot otherwise be, when, instead of guiding their way by the clear and steady rays of divine truth, they follow "lights that shine but to bewilder, and dazzle but to blind;" and no wonder that the system of opinion they adopt, should be as fragile and short-lived as the image of Nebuchadnezzar, which consisted of iron and clay, seeing it is formed of equally frail and incongruous materials. Beware, then, of the light in which you regard the opinions and expositions of men on the subject of religion. Look to them as helps, but as no more than helps, to the better understanding of the Word of God. Apply to them to aid you in illustrating obscurities, in solving difficulties, in explaining allusions to ancient manners and customs, or in assisting you to practical and devout reflections. But never let your admiration of them carry you beyond the limits I have now specified. Never allow them to exercise an undue influence in regulating your judgment or your practice. Once allow them to lead when they should only suggest, and to dictate when they should only advise, and they will become as objectionable and pernicious as they are otherwise useful. "As the rule to attain our chief end," says Sir Matthew Hale, "must come from God; and as the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are the Word of God, so we say, that these Scriptures are the rule, and the only rule, to attain our chief end; good books of other men, such as sermons and commentaries, are good helps, but there is no other rule but this. It is by this rule that we must try other men's books and sermons; yea, the very Church itself. Thus, the Bereans tried the doctrine of the apostles themselves by the Scriptures which they then had, and are commended for it. Peter prefers the evidence of the Scriptures before a voice from heaven; and Christ himself appeals to the Scriptures to justify himself and his doctrine." To the same purport, Hervey says, in his own expressive style, "as a wise man will not build a palace on the stalk of a tulip, nor venture on a long voyage in a crazy vessel, so no man who knows the value of the soul, will venture it into any hands but those of the Divine Saviour, or trust to any inferior guide to conduct him thither but the Word itself of the living God."

The Word of God, then, being thus entitled to your supreme attention, you should read it with diligence. The whole analogy of nature, and the whole course of human experience testify that, no acquisition can be made, and no excellence attained, without the application of industry and labour. And if this observation hold true in regard to all the secular pursuits in which you can engage, it is not less so in regard to the way of attaining a knowledge of the Word of God. For it has pleased its Divine Author, to record his will in a form which calls for the greatest diligence to know it,—the important doctrines it contains being scattered over the whole extent of the sacred volume,—and being connected with a series of facts, that reach from the beginning of the world to the consummation of all things. And yet how many expect to acquire a knowledge of the Word of God, of the duties which he requires of them, and the means by which they may be fitted for heaven, without study or labour of any kind; contenting themselves with the faint traces of the elementary principles of the Bible they may have been taught in their youth, or with the knowledge they may have picked up in the casual intercourse of society; and though they have never sat down, for a moment, to peruse and investigate the record for themselves, lay the flattering unction to their souls, that they have acquired all the knowledge of it that is requisite both for present duty and future salvation. But nothing can be more foolish, or more inconsistent with their conduct in all other matters. Were the truths of the Bible naturally familiar to the mind of man, or did they meet us constantly in the ordinary communications of life, we might then trust, with less risk at least, to such accidental sources of obtaining our knowledge of them, as might be furnished by the circumstances of our daily experience. But since the Bible is a new revelation from God,—discovers to us new relations, with their corresponding duties, and contains doctrines, precepts, and prospects peculiar to itself, it is plainly impossible that we can ever acquire the knowledge of these, as we might learn imperceptibly by maxims of worldly policy, or by the same easy and cursory perusal we may give to the works of any human author. We must read it with diligence—with frequency—with the combined application of all the powers of our mind. And in persuading you, my friend, to do this, I might remind you that such was the manner in which the saints and worthies of old acquired a knowledge of the divine will. I might remind you of the diligent researches of Ezra,—of the devoted attention of David to the law of God,—and of the comprehensive knowledge which Paul and his apostolic brethren obtained by a study of the Scriptures which they possessed. But I shall mention the names of some in more modern times, whose example, as being less exalted, may perhaps the more readily excite your desire to imitate it. It was the ordinary practice of John Knox, the great reformer of religion in our land, and who was almost incessantly engaged in public concerns of the weightiest nature, to read every day some chapters of the Old and New Testament, to which he added a certain number of the Psalms of David, and the whole of which he perused regularly once a month. Durham, who, after his conversion, became an eminent minister in Scotland, used, from an early period, to commit to memory a number of chapters daily, and repeat them over to his servant in the evening. John Scott, who became an eminent Christian, and wrote a commentary, tells us, that after he came to know the value of the Bible, he read it over with as much care as if he had been to expound every verse. Dr Cotton Mather regularly read fifteen chapters every day. Sir Christopher Hatton, who was long Lord High Chancellor of England in the time of Queen Elizabeth, was distinguished for his high veneration of the Scriptures, and recommended his family, daily to search the Scriptures—a practice which he himself invariably followed. "It is," said he, "justly accounted a piece of excellent knowledge to understand the law of the land and the customs of our country, but how much more excellent is it to know the statutes of heaven and the laws of eternity,—to know the will and pleasure of the great Monarch of the world." Salmasius, a man of extraordinary attainments in learning, acknowledged, in the evening of his days, that though he had read the Scriptures, he had not done it so earnestly as he now wished he had done; "Oh," said he, "had I but one year more, it should be wholly spent in reading David's Psalms, and Paul's Epistles." Of Sir Isaac Newton, we are told that amid the great variety of books he had constantly about him, that which he loved the best and studied with the greatest diligence and application was the Bible. In the posthumous papers of Sir William Jones, containing a delineation of his daily occupations, his biographer assures us a portion of his time was always allotted to the perusal of the Scriptures. Colonel Gardiner, I need scarcely say, was a diligent reader of the Bible, and had acquired a most intimate acquaintance with it; and Captain Wilson, a naval officer, to whom I have already alluded, was in the habit of committing many chapters and books of Scripture to memory, which, in the end, proved an invaluable acquisition, as he was subjected, in the course of Providence, to a long and dreary continuance of indisposition and blindness. Thus have I mentioned the names of persons in almost every rank and profession, who, under a strong impression of the truth and importance of the Scriptures, made that sacred book the subject of their frequent and earnest perusal. Let me persuade you, my friend, to imitate their example,—to set yourself to a regular, and diligent, and systematic perusal of the divine Word, that you may acquire so familiar an acquaintance with it, as will enable you to refer to and understand all the most important passages relative to the doctrines of your faith, or the branches of your duty; and thus you will not be liable to be carried away with every wind of doctrine; you will be enabled, with dexterity and effect, to wield the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, and, through the divine blessing, you will become thoroughly furnished unto every good work.

In order, however, to attain a consummation so devoutly to be wished, I must add, (and having already enlarged too much on this part of my exhortation, I shall do it with brevity,) that you should read the Scriptures with self-application, and with prayer. You should read it with self-application, for as it is a book of principles, by which you are to form your character and habits for eternity, it is evident that it cannot be of use to you unless you faithfully and with full purpose of mind endeavour to regulate your temper and your conduct by its high and unerring standard; and with the view of attaining this object, you should, in reading its sacred pages, direct the searching eye of self-examination upon yourself, and inquire, do I believe this doctrine, or perform that duty? am I endeavouring to cultivate this virtue, or to avoid that sin? what conformity have I acquired to the mind of Christ, or how far do I yet come short of the character of the children of God? This must be, and has been, the practice of all who have received the truth in the love of it. And not to detain you with Scriptural examples, with which, I hope, you can edify yourself, I will enumerate one or two from modern Christian biography, where particular methods have been recorded. Bunyan, who had fallen into the most gross and inveterate habit of profane swearing, laboured to unlearn the odious propensity, by familiarizing his mind with those passages which describe the awful majesty of God, and denounce the taking of his name in vain. The excellent Hervey drew up, from time to time, a list of those sins to which he was prone, and those duties in which he was most defective, with the appropriate motives to each, and carried them constantly about with him. Dr Boerhaave, who was remarkable for his meekness, was once asked by a friend whether he had ever been under the influence of anger, and answered, with the utmost frankness, that he was naturally quick of resentment, but that by daily prayer and meditation, he had attained the mastery over himself. Milner gives a very interesting account of a Christian nobleman, Count Eleazar, who being under a severe and protracted indisposition, caused a domestic to read to him every day the sufferings of our Saviour, and then prayed that as he had so much less to suffer, he might be enabled to manifest the patience and devout acquiescence of Christ.

And this leads me to add, that you should read the Scriptures with prayer. Pascal says the Sacred Scriptures are not so much adapted to the head as to the heart of man,—that they are intelligible only to those who have their hearts right, and that to others they are obscure and uninteresting. In accordance with this observation, the truth of which will be acknowledged and is verified by the practice of all true Christians, it is related of the venerable Bede, that being sensible that it is by divine grace, rather than by our natural powers, or by learning, that the most profitable knowledge of the Scriptures is to be acquired, he united with his study of them the habit of regular prayer; and of an eminent minister of our own Church, that every time he read the Bible, he used to offer up this ejaculatory prayer, "Lord, open thou mine eyes, that I may understand thy Word." And the admirable efficacy of prayer to give this spiritual understanding of the Word, cannot be better shewn than in the memorable conversation of the Earl of Rochester with Bishop Burnet, in the course of which, that illustrious convert acknowledged, that the Scriptures having spoken to his heart, all the seeming absurdities and contradictions which men of corrupt and reprobate judgment supposed to be in them, were vanished, and now that he had been brought to love the truth, their beauty and excellence appeared more and more.

Let me exhort you then, my friend, as it is of the utmost importance for you to, possess not only a speculative but a spiritual and practical knowledge of the Scriptures, to make it your constant and earnest prayer that God would give you the enlightening influences of his Spirit; that He who alone can teach savingly and to profit, would enable you to perceive the wonderful and excellent things contained in the divine law; and so increase your saving acquaintance with it, that you may grow up to the stature of a perfect man in Christ Jesus.

THE HART.

BY THE REV. DAVID MITCHELL.

THE term hart literally signifies a male deer when full grown. But the term is used in a more extended sense by naturalists, including all the varieties of the deer kind; such as the stag, the fallow-deer, and the roe. These animals are beautiful and attractive in their appearance, gentle and pliable in their dispositions. The head is small, elegantly shaped, and adorned with horns, which they shed every year. The horns of the stag are round, those of the fallow-deer flat, and the horns of the roe are known by the smallness of the branches. Their eyes are sparkling, lively, and expressive; their legs slender, and beautifully formed; their colour appears in various shades; from the dark brown to the silvery white; and the whole aspect of the body is lovely and engaging. Their senses of smell and hearing are singularly acute; and they are naturally shy and timid. Their hoofs are remarkably strong and well formed, which makes them very sure footed, and well fitted to walk on a difficult path. "He maketh my feet like hinds' feet, and setteth me upon my high places."—Psalm xviii. 33.

They are not only sure footed, they are also remarkably swift in their movements. When in a wild state, they bound off at the approach of man with amazing rapidity. Those who have been attentive observers of their motions assert, that they have seen these animals bound upwards of fifty feet at one leap. We find frequent allusions in the Word of God to their agility and fleetness. "Asahel was light of foot as a wild roe."—2 Sam. ii. 18.

These animals are naturally of a dry and hot temperament; and, consequently, they have an ardent desire for the cooling stream. Exposed, as they are, in Eastern countries to the rays of a scorching sun, water is to them an important part of their nourishment. Their appetite for the refreshing brook is increased when they are pursued by the hunter. When they are excited by the dread of being overtaken, their system heated, and their strength nearly exhausted, their desire for drink becomes intense; they bound along, thirsting, panting, and braying for the desirable fountain, that they may precipitate themselves into the water and quench their thirst. The desire manifested by the hart to cool itself in the stream, has been employed as a fit emblem of the ardent breathings of the believer after divine consolation, and as an illustration of the intensity of desire which the saint experiences when he longs after refreshing communications from God, and renewed tokens of his love. As the hart, when pursued by the hunter, and oppressed with fatigue, longs after the cooling fountain, so the child of God, who is surrounded with trials and temptations, thirsts and pants after the refreshing stream of hallowed delight which the Holy Spirit pours into the heart. When the Psalmist, David, wandered as a stranger and an exile by the sources of the Jordan, he referred to the thirsting hart as being emblematic of his condition. David was banished from the house of the Lord, and excluded from the assembly of the saints; his ardent soul therefore panted after the consolation which he had formerly derived from holding communion with God in his courts. As the hart, which was faint and ready to perish, panted after the stream, so, in like manner, the Psalmist longed after the consolations of heaven. "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God! My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God; when shall I come and appear before God?"—Psalm xlii. 1, 2.

These creatures are famed for their attachment to their young. They carefully conceal their offspring in a thicket, or amidst the soft and downy grass. They watch over it with great tenderness, and correct it with great care. They shield it from danger, and instruct it how to walk. They teach it how to leap from precipice to precipice; and do not leave off their fostering care until the young one is able to bound along its pathless way, and provide for itself. This instinctive principle, however, is sometimes overcome by the love of self-preservation. In the time of scarcity and famine, these animals have been known to leave their offspring to its fate, and go in search of provision for themselves. When the prophet Jeremiah described the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem by famine, he said, "Because the ground is chapt, for there was no rain in the earth, the plowmen were ashamed, they covered their heads. Yea, the hind also calved in the field, and forsook it, because there was no grass."—Jerem. xiv. 4, 5.

Their flesh was allowed to be eaten under the ceremonial law, and was highly esteemed by the orientals. The savoury meat to which Isaac was much attached, and which was the occasion of much perplexity and sorrow, was supposed to be of this kind. And Solomon, who excelled all men in wealth, profusion and luxury, had the flesh of these creatures enumerated among his delicacies. "Solomon's provision for one day was thirty measures of fine flour, and three-score measures of meal. Ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and an hundred sheep; besides harts and roe-bucks, and fallow-deers, and fatted fowl."—1 Kings iv. 22, 23.

The orientals kept these animals in their dwellings, and nourished them with much tenderness. They washed, cleaned, and fed them, with great care. They adorned them with ornaments, with chaplets of flowers, and with chains of gold and silver. The roe and the hart were considered by them the most lovely objects of nature; the most comely in their appearance, and the most tractable in their dispositions. When the spouse, that is the Church, describes the excellence and beauty of Messiah's character, she says,—“My beloved is like a roe or a young hart.”—Solomon's Song ii. 9. Again, the daughters of Jerusalem are besought by the roes and the hinds, as the most delightful objects, that they should not awake the beloved of the spouse, that is, that nothing should be done to provoke the withdrawal of divine consolation. “I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please.”—Solomon's Song ii. 7.

The fleetness of this description of animals, has been pointed out in the sacred volume as an example for men to follow in their escape from the snares of vice. They are commanded to make their escape as from the snare of the fowler: “Give not sleep to thine eyes, nor slumber to thine eyelids; deliver thyself as a roe from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the snare of the fowler.”—Prov. vi. 4, 5.

There is a beautiful allusion made to the hart by the Prophet Isaiah, when he describes the blessed effects of Christ's coming into the world: “Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped; then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing; “for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert.”—Isaiah xxxv. 5, 6. This prophecy was fulfilled, in one point of view, when Christ came into the world clothed with our nature, and caused the lame to walk, the deaf to hear, the dumb to speak, and the blind to see. There was also a singular instance of the fulfilment of this prediction, when Peter cured the lame man that lay at the gate of the temple, called Beautiful. We are informed, in the Acts of the Apostles, that when Peter took the lame man by the right hand and lifted him up, “immediately his feet and ankle bones received strength, and he, leaping up, stood, and walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, and leaping, and praising God.”—Acts iii. 7, 8. It appears, however, that the prophecy to which allusion has been made, will have its full accomplishment when all men shall turn unto the Lord with all their heart, when God will open up rivers of water in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys; when man shall be loosed from the bondage of Satan, and shall walk with God in newness of life, with gladness and singleness of heart.

It will be seen by the preceding remarks, that the animals which belong to the deer kind, have been employed for the benefit of man in various respects; that their flesh has been highly esteemed as an article of food, and their habits have been detailed in order to teach man several important lessons. It also appears in a very prominent point of view, that man has obtained dominion over the beasts of the field. These creatures, whose nature and habits we have been describing, have been made subservient to the purposes of God, by affording nourishment to man; and also furnishing illustrations for instructing him in the most important doctrines of the Gospel. They are also emblematical of the events of the coming period, when all things will be made more effectually subservient to the promotion of the great purposes of grace, for the defication of the Church—the body of Christ, “the fulness of him that filleth all and in all.”—Eph. i. 23.

THE DEVASTATING RAVAGES OF DEATH:
A DISCOURSE.*

BY THE REV. NATHANIEL MORREN, A. M., Minister of the North Parish, Greenock.

“Thou carriest them away as with a flood.”—
PSALM xc. 5.

THE Psalm in which these words occur, is the well-known prayer of Moses, the man of God. It is commonly supposed to have been written upon an occasion peculiarly trying to his faith, and painful to his feelings. He had been the honoured instrument of leading forth his captive countrymen, free and triumphant, out of the land of oppression, and the house of bondage. Yet, with the basest ingratitude, they forget the God who redeemed them, and lightly esteem the Rock of their salvation. By repeated acts of unbelief, murmuring, lust, idolatry, they not only provoke him once and again to cut down thousands of their number, but even compel him to swear in his wrath, that, with only two exceptions, none of that generation should enter into Canaan's rest; and that the carcasses of the countless host which came out of Egypt should fall and rot in the wilderness—a monument at once of the guilt and frailty of man, and the justice and wrath of God!

The remembrance of the bleached bones which already marked so many of the past stages of their journey—and the prospect of the fell and sweeping devastation which was to annihilate an entire race, himself not excepted, were no less solemn than affecting to the mind of their pious and patriotic leader; and here, in most plaintive, yet submissive strains, he gives vent to the emotions of his bursting heart.

* To explain the local allusions in this Discourse, it may be proper to state, that it was delivered on the Sabbath after that terrible calamity with which the town of Greenock was recently visited, when, by the sudden bursting of an immense reservoir of water, great damage was done to property, and more than forty persons lost their lives.

A scene which was in some respects similar to this is recorded in profane history. When the immense hordes of Persia were about to invade Greece, they were reviewed by their sovereign, who vainly deemed them invincible. In passing along their crowded ranks, and beholding their perfect equipment and gallant bearing, his bosom swells with the certain hope of success, and his ambitious fancy is anticipating the easy conquest of the fair fields of Greece, and revelling amid the spoils of vanquished foes—when, suddenly! his countenance is seen to fall, and a tear drops from his eye. Arrayed in all the pride of royalty, and surrounded with all the pomp and circumstance of what men call “glorious war,” he remembers that he is a man. “I weep,” says he, “to think, that out of all these myriads, not a single individual will survive the period of a hundred years.”

Between the mighty monarch of Persia, and the meek prophet of Israel, there was no resemblance in point of character; but their respective situations admit of comparison, and their conduct of a striking contrast. Each commands a numerous army—each, on surveying his hosts, is impressed with a sense of human mortality. But the views of the one reach forward to a hundred years—the views of the other are limited to three-score years and ten, or at the most to fourscore years; nay, as to his own generation, the utmost term of life granted was but the half of that period. The Persian weeps for slaves—the Israelite mourns over the fate of friends, countrymen, brothers—whose liberation having auspiciously begun, he had fondly hoped to be permitted to accomplish. Xerxes, though affected in behalf of others, has probably no very deep impression of his own frailty, and may be promising himself the utmost boundary of the defined period. Moses knows that he himself is personally included in the decree of death, and that he cannot outlive the prescribed moment. The grief of the king seems to have been a mere momentary sentimental effusion, which exercised no permanent influence, and produced no practical effects. But if tears fall from the prophet's eye, they are embittered by the consciousness of his own and his people's iniquities; and hence we find that his feelings unburdened themselves in prayer. While sense is affected by a view of the emptiness, the mutability, the vanity, the nothingness of the creature—faith fixes its strong grasp upon Omnipotence, and stays itself on the faithfulness, the unchangeableness, the eternity of the great Creator; and thus does it sing: “Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God. Thou turnest man to destruction, and sayest, Return, ye children of men: for a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night. Thou carriest them away as with a flood.”

Called, as we lately have been, in the providence of God, to witness the most awful and overwhelming calamity with which this place was ever visited, we are in a situation not dissimilar to that of Moses, when he gave vent to these holy aspirations. The appalling event has agitated your feelings, has terrified your imagination, has excited your sympathy, has throughout the week engrossed your thoughts, and been the leading theme of your conversation. And surely, then, this is neither the time, nor the place, to dismiss it from your minds; but rather, it is here, even in God's sanctuary, where light is shed on his dark works by his own clear word, that we should seek, calmly and devoutly, to contemplate the visitation under its most important aspects, and in connection with those great moral lessons, which it is certainly fitted and designed to inculcate. On returning from that scene of devastation and death, we feel ourselves in the very condition of Moses when he penned this Psalm—we mourn with him over the wrecks of our common humanity—our townsmen and kindred, who are not—and, looking up to the Sovereign Disposer of all things, whose path is in these great waters, and adoring his dread power, and his terrible majesty, we instinctively exclaim, “Thou carriest them away as with a flood!”

Let us endeavour, shortly, to illustrate and apply the indisputable statement contained in the text.

The sacred writers, when they would describe the brevity and uncertainty of our earthly existence, employ images the most varied and striking. According to them, the life of man is a shadow, a cloud, a breath. It resembles the swift ships, the weaver's shuttle, the eagle darting on its prey. Within the short compass of this very Psalm, Moses heaps figure upon figure, in order to express the sense which he had of his own and his fellow-creatures' speedy mortality. “They are,” says he, “as a sleep,”—that is, like a pleasing but baseless vision of the night, in which the events of many years are crowded into the space of a few minutes; but the sleeper awakes, and behold it is a dream! They are “like grass,” which in the morning groweth up, and appears verdant and flourishing, but in the evening, before the expiry of one short day, it is cut down or withered. Again, “we spend our years as a tale that is told,”—a mere fable or fiction, destitute of all substantial reality. And here, varying the metaphor, he says, “Thou carriest them away as with a flood!” And what is a flood? The allusion may have been to the great and universal flood—the deluge, which swept away a whole world of ungodly. In anticipating the wide-spread desolation which was to come upon his people, Moses can compare it with nothing but that ever-memorable infliction of divine vengeance, when all heaven's windows were opened, and every fountain of the great deep unsealed, and the mighty and merciless ocean was permitted to burst its wonted barriers, and no stay was placed to the proud raging of its waves. The tradition of that signal visitation prevailed among all the nations of antiquity, and would be carefully preserved among God's chosen people, so that (even if the book of Genesis had not yet been written) the Psalmist's allusion would be perfectly familiar to their minds.

But it is unnecessary to go so far back for the origin of this phraseology. The Israelites had not yet witnessed the swellings of Jordan, through which, by their Maker's presence and power, they were to pass dry-shod; but they had witnessed—and never could they forget—the watery ramparts of the Red Sea, where, rejoicing in their God, they walked through the flood on foot, which the Egyptians essaying to do, were drowned. And while standing safe and victorious on the opposite shore, full of recollections of the country which they had left, they can contrast the regular, pacific, fertilizing flood of Egypt's river with the sudden and overwhelming inundation their eyes now behold, that awful flood which carries away their foes, when Pharaoh and his chosen captains, and their chariots and horsemen, and all their multitude are, in a moment, covered by the depths, and sink into the bottom like a stone; yea, the flood covers them, they sink as lead in the mighty waters.

Nay, there would be scenes nearer still, and of frequent occurrence, which would vividly picture forth to the Israelites the emblem in the text. They were travelling through an arid, hilly tract, full of deep ravines, which are generally dry, but which, on the occurrence of the heavy showers of that climate, are filled to overflowing. These empty channels are sometimes frequented by travellers, as furnishing the most accessible and easy paths through the mountains; but with such sudden and resistless impetuosity do the swollen torrents occasionally rush down, that the unfortunate travellers are surprised in their encampment, or on their march, and then tents, and cattle, and human beings are carried away with the flood, and overwhelmed in one common ruin. These are "the streams of the south," to which another Psalm makes reference: "Turn again our captivity, O Lord, as the streams in the south!" They felt their bondage, so long as it lasted, to be as desolating as one of those southern torrents, but they humbly pray that it may be as short-lived and transitory. Now, the Israelites must have passed the scene of many such inundations before reaching the borders of the land of promise, and they could therefore freely enter into the meaning of the prophet's language, "Thou carriest them away as with a flood!"

From these remarks, you may perceive that the general idea intended to be conveyed by the phraseology before us is—destruction, fell, certain destruction, for such is the invariable consequence of a flood like that which is here supposed. It is not the noisy but harmless effervescence of some swollen brook; it is not merely the gradual rise of ocean's tide beyond its ordinary bounds; far less is it the gentle, equable, enriching inundation of a river, which periodically overflows its banks, and in the absence of genial showers, irrigates and fructifies the thirsty ground; but it is the flood of the mountain-torrent careering in its might, or the still more fearful flood of some vast, accumulated mass of waters, which have burst through the feeble mound that hemmed them in, and with the speed and the thunders of an Alpine avalanche, carry into the vale below desolation and ruin. With the mention of such a flood the idea of destruction is inseparably connected,—the destruction of human property, doubtless ploughing up the fertile soil, and carrying it away to the ocean, leaving the once green meadows covered with rubbish and stones, leveling massive walls, and sweeping away entire houses, or entering every apartment, and more or less injuring or rendering useless whatever ministers to domestic comfort. But what is the destruction of human property compared with the sacrifice of human life? The former may be replaced, and, through the sufferers' own exertions, or the sympathising and charitable efforts of others, is, in some degree, replaced speedily. But who can give back vital existence? or rebreathe into the nostrils the breath of life? or replant the living soul? Now, that a flood is often, to a great extent, destructive of the life of man, is the leading truth intended to be conveyed by the text, which is plainly to be connected with the third verse of the Psalm, "Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men," (i. e. of Adam, so called because made of dust;) return to that dust whence ye were at the first taken,—to that destruction "thou carriest them away as with a flood!" And that a flood is frequently the means of bringing upon human creatures destruction, swift and certain, is a fact which, as our recent observation shews, needs no text of Scripture to confirm it. When the mighty torrent rushes along our streets, or enters into our dwellings, then the first feeling of every man is the fear of death, the first desire of every man is the desire of self-preservation, and yet in spite of the most desperate efforts to escape, many will become its victims. Different, indeed, may be the circumstances under which it carries mortals away into the abyss of eternity; but whether they pass out of this world into the next, silently and almost unconsciously, or whether there be a convulsive struggle with the destroying enemy,—"the drowning cry of some strong swimmer in his agony"—still it is to destruction (as to this life and all its concerns) that it hurries them on, and from which, so far as regards the body, until the morning of the resurrection, there is no recovery. And, therefore, it is here fitly employed as an emblem of death, whose ready messenger it proves.

Such is the general idea intended by the phraseology before us; but connected with this, there are several special and subordinate ideas, which seem descriptive of some of the accompaniments of that visitation of Providence which is here referred to.

1. The destruction caused by a flood is sudden. And this is a circumstance which adds, in no small degree, to the terrors of such a scene. Nothing impresses more powerfully than contrast; and no contrast surely can be greater than the calm evening quiet of home, or the peaceful slumbers of night, invaded by the sudden inroad of a torrent of waters, foaming as if in fury, and roaring for their prey. And it is impossible to conceive of any circumstances more affecting than those, in which so many families in this place were thus overtaken by this dire calamity. It is the last night of the closing week, when the bustle and toils of other six days are over, when in well-regulated Christian families the scene has been renewed, which has been so touchingly portrayed by one of the greatest of our poets, and the collected inmates have, in sweet converse, been anticipating the repose and peace of another Sabbath day. Many have already retired to rest,—the industrious, but now weary labourer, the little child, overcome with the fatigues of what is to him the most toilsome of days—the day of play; these, and many others, are locked, as if secure, in the arms of sleep, but it is a sleep out of which they are doomed never to awake in this world, for ere they are aware of their danger, they have slept the sleep of death; others are engaged at the close of the busiest night of the week in counting their gains, when in a moment they lose their all here, and their soul is required of them; others, perhaps, forgetting the Master's solemn admonition, are allowing themselves to be overcharged with surfeiting or drunkenness, and so that night—that awful night—comes upon them unawares. It is the very scene so graphically described by the lip of truth: "As the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days of Noah, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, (that is, entirely engrossed with the affairs of this present life,) and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. In that night there shall be two men in one bed; the one shall be taken and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken and the other left. Two men shall be in the field; the one shall be taken and the other left. Watch therefore; for ye know not at what hour your Lord shall come, whether at even, or at midnight, or at cock-crowing, or in the morning."

2. The destruction which is caused by a flood is as indiscriminate as it is sudden. Wherever the flood spreads, it leaves some traces of its ravages. In this respect, indeed, like that death, whose fit instrument we have seen it to be, it has no respect of persons or of property. It will enter kings' palaces as readily as the hovels of the poor; it will assail the crowded streets and densely-peopled lanes of a city equally with the lonely tenants of the sequestered vale. And it is no less indiscriminating as to the victims whom it engulphs. On it rushes with unostentatious and resistless speed, passing by none upon its course, pitying none, sparing none. From the infant at the mother's breast to the old man in second childhood,—all, all meet and are mingled in the mighty mass of waters. And hence the scenes of domestic distress which follow upon such a visitation are of no ordinary kind. There you see the husband lamenting for the desire of his eyes, or the wife left a widow, or parents bereaved of their children, or children made fatherless, or motherless, or orphans; and you hear a wail raised, like that from the land of Egypt on the night of the slaughter of the first-born, when there was not a house in which there was not one dead.

3. There is this other peculiarity in the ravages of a flood, like that which is here supposed, viz., that in its progress it is irresistibly powerful. It is this feature in the case which makes a sudden inundation one of the most appalling disasters with which humanity can be afflicted. Until it has spent its strength, man feels himself to be entirely powerless. So long as the fury of the torrent lasts, human skill and human prudence are altogether futile. And surely such a sight is well fitted to teach proud man, in these days of scientific eminence and splendid enterprise, that there are things in nature which he never can master. Man has taught himself to do much. He can traverse the pathless ocean—he can rise as on wings to the sky—he can move with incredible velocity over the surface of the earth, and penetrate deep into its bowels—he can explore the wonders of the starry heavens—he can subdue the violence of fire, and arrest its progress,—but let him endeavour to stop or restrain some raging flood, and it will mock his utmost efforts, and only fume and rage the more. On it speeds its rapid course, heedless of all intervening obstacles; and while thus advancing like a giant refreshed with new wine, or a hero rejoicing to run a race, the puny mortals who stand trembling beside the mighty rushing waters, are made to feel their utter impotence against the terrible works of God.

Now, if you combine together these different ideas, viz., that a flood presents the image of certain destruction—that in its approach it is sudden—in its ravages indiscriminate—in its progress irresistible, you will perceive with what propriety it is here employed as an emblem of death. Is a flood destructive? Death is destruction as to the body, and if the soul be unpardoned and unholy, death is everlasting destruction to both. Is a flood sudden in its approach? And how seldom does death give warning? or if warnings be given, how seldom are they understood, or heeded, or improved? Men will still whisper to themselves "Peace and safety!" at the moment when swift destruction is upon them, even while their Maker is changing their countenance and sending them away. Is a flood indiscriminate in its ravages? And whom, then, does death spare? What age, or sex, or condition, or character? Is it the young? Why then yonder infant's grave? Is it beauty? Why then is that once blooming face now covered with ashy paleness, and wherefore are those once bright and sparkling eyes now glazed, and fixed, and motionless? Is it the rich? Why then that gorgeous train of mourners, as if designed to give lustre to death, and splendour to the grave? All lie down indiscriminately in the same dust, and the same worms revel on them at their pleasure. Finally, is a flood irresistibly powerful? And what mortal can vanquish death? What man hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit, or what man hath power in the day of death? Who of the children of Adam was ever discharged scatheless in that war? With the same ease with which he casts forth the beggar on the dunghill, he consigns the many-crowned emperor to the burial-place of his fathers. No bribe can corrupt—no power can stay him. He is a king—the king of terrors!

But though death be the inevitable lot of all, yet, blessed be God! there is another aspect under which it may be viewed, and according to which, instead of being a destroyer, it becomes the harbinger of eternal life and peace. The flood of death, however dark and dismal in the prospect, does, in the end, gently waft the Christian to the shores of bliss. And, surrounded as we are with such scenes of human misery and human mortality, what better can we do than simply set before you yet again the Gospel of the once-dead, but now ever-living One, which will impart to the souls of believers, in circumstances the most trying to flesh and blood, "everlasting consolation, and good hope through grace?" When the enemy shall come in like a flood,—what enemy it matters not, be it guilt, or temptation, or depravity, or Satan, or the world, or affliction, or persecution, or death,—when the enemy shall come in like a flood, suddenly, impetuously, and, as it might seem, irresistibly, then the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against it. He will suggest the word of promise, "Surely in the floods of great waters, they shall not come nigh unto thee;" and shall not faith reply, "Thou art my hiding-place; thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance?" Shall not faith sing, "The floods have lifted up, O Lord; the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves. The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea than the mighty waves of the sea?" Shall not faith shout, "The Lord sitteth upon the floods; yea, the Lord sitteth King for ever. The Lord will give strength to his people; the Lord will bless his people with peace!" Amen.

SUFFERINGS OF THE CREW OF THE VIEWFORTH
OF KIRKALDY, ONE OF THE ICEBOUND
WHALERS, OF 1835.

No. I.

By THE REV. J. THOMSON,

One of the Ministers of Dysart.

THE departure of a whale ship is, to a reflecting mind, a solemn event. The circumstance of so many human beings leaving their families and homes, to which they may never return, and encountering the dangers of the deep, is well fitted to lead all who are interested in their spiritual welfare to serious consideration, and dispose them to lift up their hearts to God, in prayer, on behalf of these mariners. Would that this duty were suitably attended to! I deem it of much importance, also, that the feelings awakened by such an event be laid hold of by those ministers of whose congregations seamen form a part, that they may address to them a parting word, on the things that belong to their peace, and commit them to God, ere they enter on the scene of their perils and privations. I have been led to this remark by what was experienced by the pious portion of the crew of the Viewforth. On the eve of their departure, they were addressed from these words, "The Lord is at hand." And, truly, the Lord was at hand, not only to inspect their conduct, and to keep alive on their minds a sense of their dependence and responsibility, but also to hear their prayers, to sustain their faith, and animate their hopes, amidst the great and accumulated evils which it was their lot to endure; and, finally, to work out for them a deliverance as marvellous, I do believe, as any recorded in the page of nautical history.

The Viewforth sailed from Kirkaldy on the 2d day of April, 1835, with a crew of fifty men. All on board was bustle and animation. I doubt not, however, that a pang of sorrow was felt by our brave and kind-hearted mariners as they passed along our shores, and took a last view of the scene of their spiritual privileges, and domestic comforts. Let us now follow them, as they proceeded towards the region of their great and unlooked for hardships. They met with no occurrence worthy of particular notice during the first part of their voyage. I beg therefore to conduct my readers to that stage of their eventful narrative which introduces them to our view, as struggling with the formidable obstacles which opposed them, while endeavouring to push their way to the usual fishing ground in Davis' Straits. We find them, on the 11th of June, in company with forty sail, lying at an iceberg, on the north side of Hare Island,—a position which may be easily ascertained by a reference to one of the recent charts of the Arctic Sea. While there, the ice suddenly broke up, and immediately the whole fleet was under weigh, and proceeded to Four Island Point, where their progress was arrested for a considerable time. The season, even at that early period, was exceedingly unpropitious. The ice, in immense fields, lay unbroken before them, and seemed to bid defiance to all their endeavours to advance. I quote a passage from Mr ———'s journal, in proof of this statement. Aug. 31.—"These three weeks past we have been still using our endeavours to get to the north. We are now in Brodie's Bay, in company with the Jane and Middleton. I have been ashore on the top of a high hill, and saw nothing but ice. We are now completely hemmed in, and cannot move to any great distance."

Without detailing their proceedings towards the fishing station, suffice it to say, that, by using great exertions, they succeeded in navigating the ship, on the east side of the Straits, northwards, until they reached a high latitude. Finding it impracticable to proceed in that direction, they returned by the same tract southwards, and then turned towards the west side of the Straits, where they hoped to meet with the objects of their pursuit. But there they were doomed to experience another proof of the vanity of human expectations. On the 30th of September, they were completely beset in latitude 68° 30', in company with the Jane of Hull, and the Middleton of Aberdeen. This is the memorable period from which we are to date the commencement of their frightful perils. And when I state, that it was not till the 30th of January the Viewforth was rescued from the alarming condition in which she was held, after the ice began to break up, through the violence of the gales of wind which raged so furiously for days and weeks together, my readers will be prepared to admit, that nothing short of the power of Jehovah could have preserved the frail bark and her gallant crew from the imminent danger to which they were exposed.

That we may form some idea of the sufferings and dangers of the subjects of this narrative, let us advert to the situation in which they were placed on the 30th of September. To be frozen in at any time, or in any place, is unpleasant to the feelings of seamen. They dislike an inactive life. Give them an open sea, and an opportunity of prosecuting their avocation, and they are in their element. But the circumstances in which the crew of the Viewforth were now situated, were, even in the absence of any immediate danger, calculated to awaken very serious apprehensions. Supposing them, at this advanced period of the year, to cast a wistful look homewards, an unbroken field of ice, to the extent of about three hundred miles, lay between them and the navigable sea,—the days were getting very short,—a winter of unprecedented severity was setting in,—fuel, and provision, were fast diminishing. What a dreary prospect must theirs have appeared, when, with the knowledge of these facts, they gazed on the interminable plain now stretched out before them, and saw no possibility of escape!

Before entering on the painful narrative of their sufferings, it may not be uninteresting to glance at the scenery by which they were at this time surrounded, while the elements of nature were in a state of repose. Perhaps there is no place in the whole world, where the sublime and the beautiful are seen to so great advantage as in the Arctic regions. Mr _____ thus describes a night scene, which filled his mind with wonder and delight. Dec. 2.—“I have just come off the deck, after enjoying a walk contemplating the moonlit scenery. The evening is most beautiful; not a cloud, or speck, is to be seen in the serene sky. It is beyond the power of mortal man to conceive the scene that now surrounds us—the very land seems sunk in repose, and appears to rest more heavily on its foundations. Let a person conceive himself standing in the centre of an immense plain—let him look around him as far as the eye can penetrate, and he sees it filled with innumerable hills and hillocks of ice, whiter than marble, and of the most grotesque shapes imaginable. Such is our situation.”

Nor is even the season of darkness without its wonders. The meteors that are frequently beheld there surpass in variety, and brilliancy, and grandeur, the power of description. To give an instance: December 18.—“It was my first watch to-night. I went up for a moment or two on deck, and saw a remarkable phenomenon. It was pitch dark. In a moment, there was a bright luminous arch shot around the sky to the N.W. of W., brighter than a hundred moons. I could see to lift a pin off the deck. It was in the form of a rainbow, and lasted about four minutes, when it disappeared, and left nothing but darkness and gloom. It was really a grand and imposing sight; I never saw any thing equal to it. Indeed, just now, when we have no moon, and the sun but only a short time, it would be a prolonged, gloomy, tedious darkness, if it were not for those luminous streaks that every now and then shoot through the wintry sky.” Nor must we omit to state, that the scenery during day is occasionally no less interesting; an example of which may be given, as described in Mr _____’s published journal: Nov. 2.—“The night was dreadful; but next morning revealed a scene of unparalleled loveliness and grandeur. The storm was hushed into a perfect calm, not a breath of wind stirred the air, and all around lay in delightful repose. A mantle of virgin snow covered the icy plains, hills, and valleys;

icicles in every possible form of crystallization reflected the hues of light in infinite variety and beauty, giving the whole the appearance of being set with the choicest gems; mountains of purest alabaster hid their heads in the clouds, as if ashamed of the disorder that had so lately reigned; and innumerable ravines, stretching as far as the eye could reach, carried the thoughts to the very outskirts of creation.”

I can easily conceive that some enthusiastic admirer of nature, while he allows his fancy to dwell on such scenes as these, may be disposed to think that the Arctic regions, so far from being fraught with all that is unfriendly to human life, constitute a paradise of refined and varied enjoyments. And, certainly, it would be undutiful in us, while contemplating the wonderful works of God, not to acknowledge that there is not a spot in our world, fallen though it be, which does not bear some evidence of his goodness, as well as of his wisdom and power. Even in the most dreary and inhospitable climes, he has not left himself without a witness. Thus the mariner who navigates the Polar Sea, is constantly reminded, by what he beholds around him, that God is there, and that the command that bids him remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, and all the other precepts of revelation, are just as binding upon his conscience, amidst these distant regions, as when it is his lot to dwell in the land of Gospel ordinances.

THE JEWISH FEAST OF TABERNACLES.

BY THE REV. R. S. CANDLISH, A.M.,

Minister of St. George's Church, Edinburgh.

Leviticus xxiii. 42; Zechariah xiv.; John vii.; Revelations xxi.

THE Feast of Tabernacles, or Booths, was, in its original institution, very simple and expressive. It was one of the three great yearly festivals at which the attendance of the males among the Jews was required at Jerusalem. These were the Feast of Passover, or of unleavened bread; the Feast of Pentecost, or of weeks, or of harvest, or day of first-fruits; and the Feast of Tabernacles, or of ingathering. Each of these feasts had a threefold significance, referring to the past, the present, and the future. They were all of them standing memorials of events of the early Jewish history; they were devout acknowledgments of the bounty of the passing year; and they were types of the better things of Messiah's better dispensation.

First of all came the Passover, in the first month of the ecclesiastical, or the seventh of the political year, (for the beginning of the year was reckoned differently for civil and for sacred purposes,) according to our mode of reckoning, early in April. The primary design of the Passover was to commemorate the signal deliverance of the Israelites, through the shedding of the blood of the lamb, and the sprinkling of it on the door-posts, on the night on which the first-born of Egypt were destroyed. At the same time, the barley, which in Palestine ripens much earlier than other crops, being then ready for the sickle, a sheaf of barley harvest was offered in thankfulness to Him who giveth the early and the latter rain. While the paschal lamb, slain in sacrifice, prefigured the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world, shedding his precious blood on the cross; and the single barley sheaf, presented as the pledge of harvest, not unfitly typified the resurrection of the Lord Christ, as the Righteous One, the first-born of many brethren. The seed put into the ground—that which was sown, according to the figure of the Apostle Paul, had then born ripe grain, when Christ was raised from the dead, the pledge of his Church's salvation.

Fifty days being counted from the Feast of the Passover, brought round the second feast, that of Pentecost, or of weeks, which fell on the ninth civil, or third sacred month, answering nearly to the latter part of our month of May. This feast celebrated the giving of the law on Mount Sinai, and the first establishment of the Old Testament Church among the Jews. The grain, also, being now generally matured, the first-fruits of the wheat harvest, in bread made of new corn, were solemnly presented, with a set form of thanksgiving, to God. In its typical sense, this feast of weeks had reference to the first promulgation of the Gospel, and the gathering in of the first-fruits of the Church of Christ, on the memorable day of Pentecost.

Last of all, after an interval of nearly four months, in the seventh month of the sacred, or first of the civil year, about our month of September, came the Feast of Tabernacles. This feast, like the others, had a retrospective meaning. In it, "the children of Israel were commanded to dwell in booths seven days, (Levit. xxiii. 42, 43,) that their generations might know that God made them dwell in booths when he brought them out of the land of Egypt,"—himself dwelling in a tabernacle in the midst of them. These booths, as Nehemiah tells us, (viii. 15,) were commonly erected with branches of trees, on the flat tops of the houses, or on vacant spaces in the streets. Further, this feast, like the rest, was a thanksgiving for a present blessing. The harvest being now secured, and the vintage also completed, having gathered in the fruit of the land, they were to keep the feast, hence called the feast of ingathering, to the Lord, "taking to them boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm trees, and the boughs of thick trees and willows of the brook, and so they were to rejoice before the Lord their God," who had now crowned the year with his goodness.

It must have been a gay and gorgeous scene of nature's own pageantry, that Jerusalem at this season presented, as if the gaudy splendour of human architecture were, for the time, all superseded by the richer verdure of that more than royal beauty, in which God clothes the grass of the field—the houses, everywhere crowned with green and flourishing forest shades, springing, as it might seem, from the very roofs; the streets thronged with thick masses of foliage, tinged with all the varied and burnished depth of autumnal luxuriance, as daily processions passed endlessly along, almost realizing the fancy of the wild woods being in motion to dispossess man of the domain that seems peculiarly his own. And amid all this sudden breaking forth of the glory of Lebanon, instead of the bare stones of a closely built town, the people, fresh from the reaping of all their fields, kept a glad and grateful harvest home, blessing the Lord for all his loving-kindness, for the peace and plenty which they enjoyed in the good land which he had given them. So joyous were they on that happy occasion, that it passed into a proverb among the Jews, that whosoever had not witnessed this Feast of Tabernacles, knew not what joy was.

Nor were the recollections which the solemnity brought with it, at all likely to damp their simple festive joy, or mar their relish of present blessings. They could not but feel all the more the signal privilege which they now possessed, dwelling in a country of their own, and preparing cities for habitation, sowing their own fields and planting their own vineyards which yielded fruits of increase, when they thought of their fathers, as strangers and pilgrims, pitching their tents in the dreary desert. They would remember, too, that the very appointment to pitch their tents in the desert, was itself, at the time, a special mercy to their nation, being the consummation of their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, and the pledge and foretaste of all the subsequent favours which a faithful God had conferred on them. They could enter into the joy with which their ancestors—hastily driven out of Egypt, and hotly pursued and pressed by their oppressors,—after the terrors of their flight, and the wonders of their passage through the Red Sea, having just escaped the fury of their foes, and seen Pharaoh and his captains laid low, not by their own arm, but by the Lord's mighty power—would welcome and hail the breathing time allowed them, when their tabernacles were at last set down in the wilderness. Above all, it could not be forgotten, that when the Lord made his people to dwell in tabernacles, He consented to dwell himself in a tabernacle in the midst of them, and that, too, even after the signal provocation of the golden calf. On the intercession of Moses, he pardoned their iniquity, and still dwelt among them, shining on them with the light of his countenance, bringing water for them out of the flinty rock, and leading them forth by a right way.

This last recollection and retrospect, as it rushed on the minds of the worshippers at this feast, must have mingled a little sadness with their mirth; especially during the later age of their existence as a nation, when the Glory having departed from the temple, and the prophetic Spirit from their teachers, they mourned an empty shrine, and, as it seemed, an absent God. Their regret in looking to the past, they naturally sought to soothe, by hope in looking to the future; and, accordingly, as the years of their desertion rolled on, and especially as the advent of their Messiah seemed to be drawing near, they probably dwelt more on the prospective, or typical, character of the festival. And in this they did well. For this feast, like the other two, had undoubtedly respect to the dispensation of the latter times, as the Prophet Zechariah not obscurely intimates in the 14th chapter of his book, to which we request our readers to turn. Let us trace the thread of Zechariah's prophecy, as we may now, by the light of the Gospel, interpret it.

In chapter xiii. 7, we have a prediction which our Lord himself has taught us to apply to the circumstances of his own death. In going out to the Mount of Olives from the chamber where he ate the passover and instituted the ordinance of the supper, "Jesus said to his disciples, All ye shall be offended because of me this night, for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad." Having this key furnished by the Lord himself, we proceed confidently and safely, in unlocking and decyphering this oracle. In the first clause of verse 7, we find the mystery of Christ's atoning death—the sword of divine justice, sheathed in the breast of him, who, as the eternal Son, is co-equal with the Father: "Awake, O Sword, against my Shepherd, against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of Hosts." Then follows the consequence of the Lord's death in the dispersion of his followers at the time, and the persecution of his disciples afterwards "Smite the Shepherd and the sheep shall be scattered, and I will turn mine hand against my little ones." The 8th and 9th verses we cannot help regarding as a prediction of the desolation which soon overtook the Jews. "And it shall come to pass, that in all the land, saith the Lord, two parts therein shall be cut off and die; but the third shall be left therein. And I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried: they shall call on my name, and I will hear them: I will say, It is my people; and they shall say, The Lord is my God." The third part, spoken of, verse 9, as tried and refined like silver by fire, and as calling on the name of the Lord, and being called his people, may well denote those of whom the Apostle Paul speaks, when he says, "Hath God cast away Israel?" nay, "at this very time," even the time of their rejection, "there is a remnant according to the election of grace"—(Rom. xi. 1 and 5).—the converted Jews to whom the Apostle Peter addresses his epistle, saying, almost in the very same words with the prophet, "For a season ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations; that the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ: whom having not seen, ye love." (1 Peter, i. 6; 7.) The two-thirds appointed to be cut off and to die, verse 8, too obviously represent the multitude of unbelieving Jews, on whom the judgment of God, by the hand of the Romans, fell.

Following this scheme of interpretation, verses 1 and 2 of chapter xiv. may refer to the destruction of the Jews, by Titus, at the head of an army composed of men of all nations, over whom the Romans then ruled. Verse 2, "I will gather all nations against thee." And it is intimated that the numbers of the Jews, already lessened incalculably by the previous calamities and by the wasting war, should be, on the spoiling of the city, still farther reduced;—one-half going into captivity, and the miserable remnant lingering on, as outcasts in their own city. Or, we may consider the account of the Roman judgment and its devastating effects to be finished at the close of the 13th chapter, and refer the beginning of the 14th to a period yet future. We may explain it according to the not improbable idea of the old expounders of prophecy,—that there is to be, just before the latter-day glory, a partial gathering of the Jews, still unconverted, into their own land:—that these shall recover and rebuild their city, but shall again fall beneath the onset of the great Infidel Antichristian confederacy. For it is a prevalent notion of the Fathers, that in Palestine the Infidel Antichrist is to put forth his last effort and meet with his final success, which, however, shall be of short duration,—He being then at hand, who is to consume him with the Spirit of his mouth and destroy him with the brightness of his coming.

However this may be, on either view of the first two verses of chapter xiv., they leave Jerusalem a desolation, and the Jews dispersed; and it is plain, that at the 3d verse the scene is suddenly changed. The Lord arises to have mercy upon Zion, for "the time to favour her, yea, the set time is come." (Verse 3.) "Then shall the Lord go forth to fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle." The remaining part of this prediction being still future, is not to be interpreted in detail. The attempt is rash, and can lead only to conjectures and fancies almost sure to be disappointed by the event. We may not determine the precise kind of interposition that is here ascribed to the Lord, or say how He is to appear and conduct the warfare for his people. The particulars of unfulfilled prophecy must, for the most part, stand over for explanation till the event comes, or at least, till coming, it casts its shadow before. Meantime it is the Church's duty to give heed to the sure word of prophecy, as a light shining in a dark place, and to seize upon its broad outline, and hold fast its great principles, for the fixing of her hope and the cherishing of her desires after the Glory that is to be revealed.

In general, then, we have in this chapter a plain assurance of Israel's restoration to his own land, and his old pre-eminence over the nations. And we have, moreover, the fullest confirmation of the Apostle Paul's reasoning concerning his rejected brethren: "If the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness." "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the recovery of them be, but life from the dead?" life, new life, to the Church and to the world. The triumph of Judah is most evidently represented by Zechariah, as a new era of joy, and love, and union to all mankind. (Verse 9.) "The Lord shall be King over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one." It is a time of peace, and of brotherly kindness. The mountain of the Lord is exalted on the tops of the mountains, and unto it all nations flow. The Jews are bringing in the fulness of the Gentiles. Jerusalem is again the centre of pure faith, the city of the Great King, the joy of the whole earth. Again is there a festival held there, a high and holy Feast.

And that Feast, what is it? and who are they who celebrate it? It cannot be the feast of the Passover. For the paschal lamb, the Lamb of God, is slain long ago, and the single sheaf of barley is long ago offered—the One only Righteous has long ago risen, as the first begotten of the dead,—the first ripe grain springing from the seed cast into the earth. It cannot be the Feast of Pentecost. The first preaching of the Gospel, like the giving of the law, is long past, and the first-fruits of the Church were gathered in when Peter preached, and three thousand, pricked in their hearts, were converted. Can it be the Feast of Tabernacles? Yes, it is no other, for Israel's redemption is complete. The people have come out of bondage, they may pitch their tents in safety. And the harvest is complete, the vintage is over, the ripe grain is gathered, the red and mellow fruit is gleaned. It is the rich and full autumn of the Gospel Church. And in the holy city, the new Jerusalem, the joyous multitude may carry branches of immortal bloom throughout the streets, and raise the exulting shout of harvest home, far higher than ever Jews of old were wont to do on this festival of noisy gladness. For it is the Feast of Tabernacles now at last fulfilling the type presented in the wilderness. The deliverance is secured; the victory is gained; the enemy is overthrown; and when the tents are pitched, THE LORD AGAIN IS IN THE MIDST. For hear the prophecy of John, (Rev. xxi. 2, 3,) "I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the Tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God." THE TABERNACLE OF GOD IS AGAIN WITH MEN. Well, therefore, may the Feast of Tabernacles be again joyfully kept, year by year, continually. And the whole earth is now concerned to join with Israel in keeping it, for it is the universal harvest home. Wherefore the Prophet Zechariah well says, verse 16, "And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, and to keep THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Love to Ourselves and Others.—Nature bids me love myself, and hate all that hurt me; reason bids me love my friends, and hate those that annoy me; religion bids me love all, and hate none. Nature sheweth care; reason, wit; religion, love. Nature may induce me, reason persuade me, but religion shall rule me. I will hearken to nature in much, to reason in more, to religion in all. Nature shall make me careful of myself, but hateful to none; reason shall make me wise for myself, but harmless to all; religion shall make me loving to all, but not careless of myself. I subscribe to some things in all, to all things in religion.—WARWICK.

Faith.—Faith is the sensory of the spiritual nature, the medium of contact and intercourse with the objects of a spiritual world. It is the eye, the ear, the touch, the taste, the smell, by which we see, and hear, and feel, and taste, and savour the unseen objects most nearly interesting to our souls. How easy in this view is it to account for the importance which we find attached to Faith; without it we cannot please, we cannot so much as apprehend God or a spiritual world, any more than without our bodily senses we could ascertain the properties, or so much as perceive the existence of the material world.—H.

Suggested by the sudden and deeply lamented death of the Rev. DONALD FRASER, Minister of Kirkhill,
 Who died in consequence of having been thrown out of his gig, when hastening to visit a dying parishioner, on the 12th of July 1836, in the 53d year of his age, and the 34th of his ministry.

BY the REV. DUNCAN GRANT, A. M.,

"How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!"

THE mighty is fallen! no more in the field,
 The arm of the valiant its weapons can wield;
 His season of conflict and danger is past,
 And sword, shield, and helmet, away has he cast:
 The prudent in counsel, the dauntless in war,
 No more marches forward in victory's car,
 But stripp'd of his armour, the warrior lies,
 Where no shouts of triumph are peal'd to the skies.

The mighty is fallen! and over his urn,
 The armies of Zion in sore anguish mourn;
 They mourn that the mighty, the bold, and the brave,
 Who led them to glory, is laid in his grave;
 That cold is the heart in which love was enshrind,
 That dark is the eye which was beaming with mind,
 That seal'd is the lip on which eloquence dwelt,
 The timid to cheer, and the harden'd to melt.

The mighty is fallen! and perish'd are now,
 The weapons of warfare, spear, buckler and bow;
 The valiant no longer our armies can train
 The shock to endure, and the conquest to gain;
 Nor cheer on the spirit of aged and young,
 In strains that o'er dastards such dauntlessness sung,
 As might be awaken'd when some golden lyre
 Is touch'd by the ardours of Gabriel's fire.

The mighty is fallen! the mind that could mount
 On pinions, unwearied, to life's blessed fount,
 And bear back to mortals, from that sacred spring,
 Such dews as are wafted on mercy's own wing;
 And fruits, fresh and fragrant, from that happy clime,
 Whose fruits are ne'er tainted nor blighted by crime;
 No longer, for exiles, spreads banquets of love,
 And manna, and mercy, supplied from above.

The mighty is fallen! o'erthrown is the mind,
 Which, rarely enlighten'd, profound, and refin'd,
 With ease could the bow of the mightiest bend,
 And the shaft to its mark unerringly send:
 Could thunder from Sinai, the claims of the law,
 'Till stout-hearted rebels were smitten with awe;
 And then the mild glories of Zion disclose,
 Till mercy gave rebels a hope of repose.

The mighty is fallen! the heart that could glow
 With ardours which none but the mighty may know;
 The heart that for scorners so tenderly felt,
 That even the scornful to softness would melt;
 That over the contrite so feelingly yearn'd,
 That Hope shed her balsam o'er spirits that mourn'd;
 The heart, which was feeling's warm, hallow'd, retreat,
 And friendship's pure temple, now ceases to beat!

The mighty is fallen! the soldier of truth,
 Like David, a champion was found in his youth;
 When yet but a stripling in aspect and years,
 He tower'd on the battle-field 'bove his compeers,
 And reap'd when in boyhood the triumphs of man;
 But still his course brightened as onward he ran,
 Till loaded with glory, and full of renown,
 His King him advanc'd from the field to the crown!

The mighty is fallen! Bright Star of the North,
 Oh! when shall thine equal in splendour come forth?
 How long shall we gaze on our now darken'd skies,
 Ere one of thy brightness shall gladden our eyes;

An orb that in glory like thee shall career,
 Surpassing the radiance of each common sphere
 And brighter still growing as nearer it flies
 To that blessed sun, who its glory supplies!

The mighty is fallen! no prophet can tell
 When one shall arise, like the mighty who fell;
 Nor can the sensation produc'd by the shock,
 The wailing of widow, and children, and flock,
 The deep consternation which thousands appal,
 Declare what our country has lost by his fall:
 Our bearer the standard has dropp'd from his hand,
 And faint and dismay'd are the brave of the land!

'Mid signs so portentous, in seasons so dark,
 All Isr'el may tremble for God's holy ark,
 And fear, that when legates so wise are call'd home,
 Soon tidings of war from their Sovereign may come!
 When quickly the righteous are summon'd away,
 The judgment presages a still darker day;
 And judgment begun at the temple of God,
 Portends that the sinner shall sink 'neath his rod!

The fall of the mighty while deeply we mourn,
 To Thee, who Almighty art, still would we turn;
 When smitten, and wounded, and bleeding, we flee
 To Thee, who wast smitten, and bled'st on the tree!
 Thou holdest the stars in thy mighty right hand,
 And plantest the heavens with their radiant band!
 Thou only the storm of our spirits can calm,
 And pour on the wounded thy life-giving balm—

That balm of refreshment, abundantly shed
 On widow and fatherless, mourning their dead,
 Whose warmest affections around him were twin'd,
 And who have embalm'd him, in love, in their mind!
 Abide in our Zion, and build up her walls,
 Her mighty is fall'n—but her King never falls,—
 Her wounds He will heal, and her breaches repair, Tho' fall'n is her mighty,—her King still is there!

The Effect of a Christian's Dying Experience.—My first convictions on the subject of religion, says the late Rev. R. Cecil, were confirmed by observing that really religious persons had some solid happiness among them, which I felt the vanities of the world could not give. I shall never forget standing by the bed-side of my sick mother. "Are not you afraid to die?" I asked. "No." "No! Why does the uncertainty of another state give you no concern?" "Because God has said, 'Fear not; when thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee.'—'Let me die the death of the righteous.'"

A Sure Consolation.—Paulinus, when he was told that the Goths had sacked Nola and plundered him of all he had, lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, "Lord, thou knowest where I have laid up my treasure."

THE EXCELLENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE.

It needs not any formal demonstration to persuade men that Christian hope is good and desirable; still the serious consideration of the excellence of the hope which the Gospel, wherever received, bestows, may not be without its benefit, both in conveying to the careless a livelier feeling of its unspeakable value, and in strengthening the confidence and exciting the gratitude of those who can, in some measure, unite in the apostle's ascription of praise to their God and Saviour, as having given them to realize this good hope, which is through grace. Is it asked, then, in what respects, on what grounds is the epithet good claimed to the hope which the Gospel alone can inspire? The answer is easy,—Christian hope is good,

I. As to the objects which it embraces, these being essentially and permanently good, fitted to meet the wants of our immortal nature, and, in their possession, to confer true blessedness; and in this respect it is evident the hope of the believer differs from the hope which we naturally cherish; for though, in one sense, all hope may be denominated good, because it is only in proportion as an object presents itself to the mind as beneficial and desirable, that it is hoped for and desired, we can never hope for anything but what appears to us as fitted to contribute to our advantage or delight. Whatever has a threatening or even doubtful aspect, is the subject of apprehension and fear, not of hope. From the very constitution of our nature, it thus follows that every thing we hope for presents to our perception some qualities of good, some elements of happiness; but while this is the case, it is also to be taken into account, that the corrupt bias of the unrenewed heart blinds the judgment in its discernment of what is really good, and engrosses the hopes on objects not in themselves good, but which appear so only because of the perverting influence of wrong affection. What is the amount of the hopes which occupy an unconverted spirit? Looking around us, we see a vast assemblage of immortal beings, placed in great diversities of situation, engaged in manifold variety of pursuit, distinguished by varied tastes and gifts; and if we could look inward and survey the hopes which move and actuate them, we should find that these are limited to the mortal sphere in which they live, that they terminate upon deliverance from difficulty or distress, or success in some project of enterprise, some scheme of aggrandisement, or are occupied with bright visions of happiness, to be derived from some connection to be formed, some wealth to be acquired, some temporal advantage to be gained; too often, perhaps, we might find the hopes of numbers centering on objects really criminal, on schemes of sensual gratification, on projects of revenge, on injuring and ruining some fellow-creature.

Now, if this be a true account of the objects which engage the hopes of the natural heart, it follows clearly that such hopes are not good, because the objects embraced are, at best, unsatisfying, defective, reach only to the body and its interests, but leave unenriched, poor, deceived, the better part,—the never-dying soul. Not so, however, with that hope which the Gospel enkindles. It goes forth after objects intrinsically and relatively excellent, needful to the well-being of the life that now is, and of that which is to come,—objects all-satisfying to the soul's highest and most extended desires. The objects of Christian hope are those which the Gospel reveals and offers, those which faith accepts and realizes, those which involve present peace and usefulness,—everlasting felicity. As the chief amongst them, may be enumerated the hope of a free and full pardon,—a glorious acquittal, in the day of judgment,—the hope of complete extinction of sin,—entire washing from moral pollution,—restoration to the image of God, in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness,—the hope of deliverance from every enemy that would oppose our spiritual and eternal good,—the hope of an abundant entrance into the heavenly inheritance, where there is fulness of joy—pleasures for evermore. The very enunciation of these things commends them as unspeakably valuable, and vindicates the title good as belonging exclusively to the hope which embraces and insures them. What can be wanting to the happiness of that man whose soul rests, with lively hope, on the gracious pardon which his Redeemer has purchased; on the continuance of the Spirit's operation, in carrying forward his sanctification; on the faithfulness of his covenant God, in bringing him through every peril, to the land of blessedness and rest? Are we not all ready to exclaim, "enough for us if we can retain this blessed hope throughout our future pilgrimage; happy shall we be if we have such prospects to cheer us amid the vicissitudes of our mortal career; yea, undismayed shall we behold the approach of the dread messenger, and go, without fear, through the valley of the shadow of death?" Yes, they whose hope comprehends deliverance from guilt and pollution; from temptations and adversaries, and an introduction into the mansions of the redeemed, are truly rich, incomparably blessed above all that this world can bestow. To their highest, their true well-being, nothing is wanting—their hope involves the only all-sufficient good. It may indeed be alleged, that as we are closely related to a material world, such a view of Christian hope is too limited, leaving out of sight our present interests, relations, and necessities; but, even in regard to these, this good hope provides full and abundant consolation. For it is the appointment of the divine economy, in the administration of grace, that to them who seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, all other needful things shall be added. In conformity with this method of procedure, as well as on the ground of manifold rich promises and encouraging examples, the man who has had the peculiar hope of the Gospel awakened within him, has also a peaceful assurance that God will supply all his temporal need,—that his bread shall be given him, and his water shall be sure,—that he shall be helped in every adversity,—have grace given him to glorify God in his troubles, and a happy deliverance granted out of them. "All things are yours—whether the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." Is not then the hope of the Gospel good, truly good, as to the objects which it comprehends? Ought it not to be our rational, our earnest desire that such a hope may be ours?

II. But, farther, this hope which gladdens the believer's heart, is good, in respect of the security on which it rests. It is manifest that this element is essential to constitute hope truly good, for how desirable soever may be the objects to which our hopes are directed, if the assurance of our reaching the possession of these objects be doubtful, the value of the hopes themselves is proportionally diminished. In regard to Christian hope, while its objects are glorious and excellent, its certainty is fixed and indubitable. It rests on the sure Word of God—on more—on the oath of the Most High. "God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us: Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast, and which entereth into that within the veil; whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec." Nor is this all; for, besides his faithful word and promise, God has given us so wonderful a demonstration of his loving-kindness, as to place beyond every doubt, that, since he spared not his own Son, he will with him give us all things. The mission and death of the only begotten Son of God have proclaimed, that the Lord is not slack concerning his promises of mercy. The resurrection and ascension of the Redeemer have proved, that the grand designs of his incarnation and sufferings shall be fully realized. Whenever, therefore, the believer is tempted to doubt or fear, he has only to remember the great, the unspeakable gift of God; and in the remembrance thereof, to dismiss his unworthy suspicions, and strengthen his languishing hopes, by the reflection, that the compassion which thought on us in our low and lost estate, and has wrought out for us so glorious a redemption, will never permit the expectations which his own word has awakened, to fail or be disappointed.

Besides, this good hope of the believer is something more than hope—it implies some foretaste of the blessings expected—some portion already in enjoyment. In the very cherishing of this hope, there are felt a peace and joy, the happy earnest of its full completion. In looking forward to the day of glorious acquittal—the time of being presented faultless before the presence of God through the merits of our Surety and Advocate—there is experienced a freedom from discouraging dread, a sense of security, a conviction that to them who are in Christ Jesus there is no more condemnation, which settles the soul in sure and confident expectation. And in the daily supplications which the believer presents for the effectual aids of the Holy Spirit, while he receives successive answers to these prayers, in strength to resist temptation, grace to endure trial, and perform duty, he feels in all this a pledge and assurance, that the Lord will perfect that which concerneth him. To this confidence of hope no sincere penitent, no humble believer, is altogether a stranger. Soon as a man comes to nail his sins to the cross of the Saviour, there is felt, even amid much remaining darkness and fear, a hope that shoots across the soul, a benignant light and peace-giving influence; and the more that the penitent advances in the knowledge of the Mediator, and in conformity to his example, the more does this hope grow in strength and power, rising to the bliss of full assurance. In all the hopes which actuate and enliven the heart, in reference to this world, there is ever stealing across the mind the painful consciousness that this may never be realized to me; and the reflection is proved to be just, by the innumerable chances of life—the countless turns and changes which the course of human affairs assumes: but not so in regard to the hope of the Gospel—it is sure, infallible, and it is a part of its blessed character to carry along with it, generally, a feeling of its certainty. Is not this, then, the only hope that merits to be called good,—the only hope which it should be our great effort to possess and retain?

III. Still farther, Christian hope may be denominated good, in regard to its moral efficacy. I have already hinted at the blissful influence of Gospel hope, in conveying peace to the human heart. I might speak also of its animating and invigorating power, how it girds the soul with alacrity to run in the way of the divine commandments—how it sheds a cheering light on every thing we have or engage in—enhancing the value of our comforts, and softening the weight of our adversities—particularly how, in ministering peace, it engages to holiness, giving force to holy desires, quickening to holy watchfulness, rousing to holy effort; for “every man that hath this hope in him purifies himself as Christ is pure.” But on so extensive a subject I cannot enter fully at this time; enough has been suggested to prove, that the hope of the Gospel is good—only good as embracing objects essentially and permanently excellent—fitted to meet all our wants, as resting on infallible security—as carrying in it the blessed effects of peace and purity—enough too, I would fain hope, to prompt, in every breast, the earnest desire, let this hope be mine! let it be in me, and abound!

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE

Edinburgh.*

THIS eminent divine was the eldest son of John Erskine of Carnock, Esq., advocate, so deservedly famed as the author of the “Institutes of the Law of Scotland,”—a work held in high estimation among professional lawyers. John appears to have inherited many of the peculiar characteristics of his father's mind, and he exhibited, even in early life, abilities of no common order. The education which he received previous to entering the university was such as fitted him to pass through the various classes with the utmost honour to himself and gratification to his parents. During his attendance at college, he became a member of a club known by the name of the Hen Club, and which is said to have consisted of gentlemen who had attended the Humanity class at Edinburgh in 1737 and the two following years.

When Dr Erskine first set out on his college career, it seems to have been the wish of his family that he should adopt the profession of a lawyer; and there is little doubt that had he done so, his high talents, as well as his father's influence and instructions, would have soon raised him to eminence at the bar. In deference to the decided inclination of his parents, he applied himself for some time to the study of law. But, even while thus engaged, he always entertained a marked partiality for theological pursuits; and at length this taste so much increased, that he came to the resolution of dedicating his life to the sacred profession. His mind was early impressed with the paramount importance of religious truth; and the growing relish which he felt for spiritual objects, as well as the invincible desire for the office of a minister of the Gospel, which, amid all discouragements, retained possession of his mind, confirmed him in the determination to which he had come.

Dr Erskine was now in his twenty-second year; and though, for several years before, his attention had been chiefly directed to the study of the law, his knowledge of which was often of great importance to him afterwards in Church courts; yet, with the full consent of his friends, he bent all the energies of his acute and powerful mind to topics more congenial to his inclinations. In the discussion of subjects of this nature, indeed, he had already given proof of a dexterity and power far beyond his years. The Church and the country had been agitated by a controversy which arose, in consequence of the publication of a work by Professor Campbell of St. Andrews, on the “Necessity of Revelation.” In this book, the learned Professor, anxious to oppose some of the infidels of the time, endeavoured to prove man's utter inability to acquire, by his own unaided reason, a knowledge of the being and perfections of God, or the immortality of the human soul. A considerable clamour was raised in the Church against some of the tenets which this book contained; and although the author ultimately escaped the censure of the Church, his opinions were reprobated by many pious men, as dangerous in the extreme. Dr Erskine was too sagacious not to perceive the consequences of such a doctrine, if proved to be true. Though still a stripling, therefore, he set himself to refute the opinions maintained by Dr Campbell; and in 1741 he published a pamphlet on the subject, full of sound reasoning, and evincing extensive as well as accurate information. This small production was regarded as highly creditable to the youthful author, and attracted the particular notice of Dr Warburton, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester, to whom Dr Erskine had sent a copy. So much, indeed, was the learned divine pleased with the ability displayed in the dissertation, and more especially as it coincided with his own views, that a correspondence commenced between Dr Warburton and his young friend, which continued at intervals for many years.

When Dr Erskine had formed the design of serving God in the office of the ministry, he gave a detailed view, in a letter to his father, of the motives by which he was conscious of being actuated in the resolution he had formed. A copy of this letter he sent to Dr Doddridge, along with a copy of his pamphlet in answer to Dr Campbell; and, from the reply of that eminent Non-conformist, the following extract is made by Dr Erskine's biographer, the able and excellent Sir Henry Moncreiff:—

“The account which you gave to your worthy father of the motives that determined your resolution to enter on the ministry, in that excellent letter which you favoured me with a copy of, abundantly convinces me that you were indeed under a divine guidance in that resolution. And I cannot but look on it as a great token for good to the Church, that a gentleman of your distinguished abilities, (of which the pamphlet you sent me is a valuable specimen,) and of your elevated circumstances in human life, should be willing to engage in so laborious a work as the ministry, in the midst of the various discouragements which attend it. I hope God will abundantly bless your labours for the good of souls; and I will venture to tell you, from my own experience, that if he does so, instead of repenting of your choice, you will rejoice in it through the course of your life, and in the nearest prospects of death and eternity.”

In reference to the same subject, Dr Warburton thus writes, in a letter dated 20th February 1744, addressed to Dr Erskine:—

“I heartily felicitate you on your choice of the better part. You have an advantage that numbers may envy, in going to divinity from the study of the civil law. I am pleased too with your new choice on another account,—you will now be at leisure to digest those just and noble thoughts which you have on the most important subjects of antiquity; and I beg leave to urge and press you to pursue them. One who can write with that learning, precision, and force of reason, with which you confuted Campbell, ought never to have his pen out of his hand."

Before the date of this letter, Dr Erskine had been licensed to preach the Gospel, by the Presbytery of Dumblane. His first sermon in public was delivered in the Parish Church of Torryburn, from Psalm lxxxiv. 10,—a subject well suited to the circumstances in which he had devoted himself to the sacred office. Wherever he officiated, his discourses were listened to with marked interest and attention; so that, as his biographer remarks, "he had rather to select the parish which was most agreeable to himself, than wait for the patronage of any individual." The parish of Tullialan was then vacant, but as his own father was the patron, he declined accepting the charge, and preferred the parish of Kirkintilloch, in the neighbourhood of Glasgow. To this charge, accordingly, he was inducted in May 1744; and continued for nine years to discharge his duties as minister of that large and populous parish with the utmost conscientiousness and fidelity.

At an early period of his incumbency in Kirkintilloch, Dr Erskine was called to lament the loss of one of the most intimate companions of his youth, Mr Hall, son of Sir James Hall of Dunglass. Soon after the death of his friend, he published a few fragments from his manuscripts, prefaced by a brief memoir. In the course of his remarks upon the character of Mr Hall, he thus describes the closeness and cordiality of their intercourse—

"Never was there a soul," he says, "more susceptible of friendship, or endowed with more of a tender, affectionate, and sympathising disposition. My intimate correspondence with him for two years and a half gave me peculiar proofs of this; and some of the instances of his friendship were such as, I believe, can scarcely find a parallel, either in ancient or modern times; though I have reasons for not being more particular on this head. To him, in every distress and perplexity, with freedom I could unbosom my most hidden pains, without the least doubt of their remaining as secret as if they had been confined within my own breast. He felt my joys and sorrows as if they had been his own. He kindly warned me of whatever he thought amiss in my conduct, and took it well when I used the same freedom with him. I can never be sufficiently thankful that God ever favoured me with such a friend, and gave me such peculiar advantages for knowing his worth, and improving by his conversation and example. The least circumstance that concerned his friend was not disregarded by him."

In 1746 Dr Erskine married the Honourable Christian Mackay, third daughter, by his third wife, of George, the third Lord Reay—a union which was attended with much domestic happiness throughout the whole of his long and valuable life. About this time a controversy arose in the Church courts, in which Dr Erskine was called to take an active part. The celebrated Mr Whitefield had been in the habit, for some years previous, of paying occasional visits to Scotland. His opinions being in complete accordance with those which were entertained by many pious clergymen, he was employed frequently to officiate in their pulpits. This practice, though continued for some time, gave considerable offence to some ministers, who were no great admirers of Mr Whitefield's views. Dr Erskine had always been favourable to him, and had even written a pamphlet, when a student of divinity, in favour of the revivals at Cambuslang and Kilsyth, in which Mr Whitefield had taken so conspicuous a part. In such circumstances, it was not surprising that this eminent and useful man should have been invited once or twice to preach in the Church of Kirkintilloch. A complaint, however, was instantly made on the subject to the Synod of Glasgow; a hot discussion ensued, and a motion was at length agreed to, which united the views of the two contending parties. In this debate Dr Erskine took an active share in favour of Mr Whitefield, and he afterwards published an account of it, giving the arguments on both sides with admitted candour and honesty.

The laborious duties of his parish, and the preparation of three discourses every week, prevented Dr Erskine from engaging keenly in those literary pursuits which were so congenial to his taste. His reading, however, during his residence in Kirkintilloch, appears to have been considerable, and besides the publication of a few occasional sermons, he gave to the world an essay, intended to promote the more frequent observance of the Lord's Supper. This latter production his biographer describes as a performance of "singular ability and learning." That he might be master of the subject in all its bearings, he entered into a correspondence with ministers on the continent, for information with regard to the practice of foreign Churches. It is by no means improbable that the communication thus opened up with different individuals in various parts of the continent, led him to take an interest in foreign literature, which he retained during life. He had already an extensive correspondence with America, and especially with American ministers, and hence the intimate knowledge which he possessed of the state of religion and literature in the New World.

Dr Erskine was translated from Kirkintilloch, in 1753, to the first charge in the burgh of Culross. To the people over whom he was now placed, he was no stranger, having, in his youth, occasionally resided in the family of his grandfather, whose estate was situated in the parish. In this new sphere of usefulness, his ministrations were peculiarly acceptable to his parishioners, and by his assiduous attention to the private visitation of their families, he became peculiarly endeared to them. It would appear, however, that in the latter part of his life he doubted the propriety of the step which he had taken in removing from Kirkintilloch to Culross. The advantages and disadvantages of the two situations are thus stated by Sir Herry Moncreiff:—

"Though Dr Warburton was not aware of the exact situation of a parish minister in Scotland, when he supposed literary industry to be separated from pastoral duty, his wishes with regard to the effects of Dr Erskine's translation to Culross were to a certain degree realized. With the assistance of a colleague in the vigour of life, who divided with him both the public and the parochial duty, he had certainly much more leisure to employ, and better opportunities for study, than he could possibly have commanded in his former situation.

"He lost, indeed, the advantage of the society at Glasgow, on which he set a considerable value; and he had not the same direct access to books which the libraries of Glasgow afforded him. But his intercourse with the greatest number of his literary friends was more in his power than it had been at Kirkintilloch; and whatever books he required, he had the means of procuring.

"They who were acquainted with his habits of industry through life, will readily believe that the leisure which he found in this situation was faithfully employed; though it does not appear that while he continued there he published any thing, excepting a single sermon, preached before the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge, in 1756, on the Influence of Religion on National Happiness. It is republished in the first volume of his printed discourses."

In September 1754 Dr Erskine was deprived, by death, of one of his most valued friends, Mr John MacLaurin of Glasgow—a man whose eminent talents, and high attainments, and genuine worth, have handed down his name with honour to the present day. The loss of this eminent individual was deeply felt; but such was the estimation in which Dr Erskine was held in Glasgow, that the kirk-session of the parish, and the general session of the city, immediately sent him an invitation to occupy the place which had thus become vacant. This, however, from some cause or other, he declined, and continued every day to recommend himself more highly by his conduct, both as a Christian and a Christian minister, to the esteem and affection of his people at Culross.

It was to be expected, however, that a man of such acknowledged talents as Dr Erskine possessed, would be promoted to a high station in the Church. In the autumn of 1758, accordingly, he was translated to the New Greyfriars' Church, Edinburgh; and being thus called to occupy a more prominent place than he had hitherto done, the astonishing vigour of his mind became more readily apparent. His discourses were characterized by a grasp of thought, and a clearness of illustration, which rendered him one of the most acceptable preachers of his day. In the multifarious duties of a city clergyman he was most exemplary and indefatigable. Such was the decision of his character, that he would in very few cases allow any thing short of complete necessity to withdraw him from his duty. He seems to have regulated the distribution of his time by a systematic arrangement, to which he endeavoured most rigidly to adhere. In the midst of his varied employments he mixed a great deal in society; and such was the cheerfulness and affability of his dispositions, as well as the artless simplicity and kindness of his manners, that his company was courted by all who enjoyed the pleasure of his acquaintance.

As a mark of the high estimation in which he was held, he received, in 1766, an unsolicited degree of doctor in divinity from the University of Glasgow. In the minute of the Faculty which conferred it, an encomium is passed on his "undoubted probity, ingenuity, and learning." Before receiving this well merited honour, he had published a volume of Theological Dissertations, two of which had already appeared at an earlier period of his life. He had also entered with lively interest into the controversy which had for some years been carried on, with the utmost keenness, between Mr Wesley and Mr Hervey, and had published a controversial work of the latter writer, with a preface from his own pen. The preface called forth a letter to Dr Erskine from Mr Wesley, and led to the publication of an "earnest appeal" to the public from one of Mr Wesley's coadjutors. Dr Erskine did not decline the controversy, but in July 1765 he sent from the press a defence of his preface, in the course of which he discusses the subject at greater length than before.

In 1767 Dr Erskine was translated to the Old Greyfriars' Church, where he became colleague to Dr Robertson, the celebrated historian. In this situation, where he was subjected to less labour than in his former charge, he continued to officiate during the rest of his life—a most faithful and highly valued pastor.

From the intimacy which subsisted between Dr Erskine and some of the most distinguished American divines, particularly President Edwards, he felt a deep interest in the controversy which was now beginning to arise between Great Britain and her North American colonies. He took occasion, accordingly, to publish, anonymously, from the London press, a tract, in which his views were stated with his wonted clearness and force; and some years afterwards, when the American war had actually commenced, he republished this tract at Edinburgh, with his name attached to it.

The subject, for some time, completely occupied his mind, and he felt it to be his duty to use all the means he could command to effect a reconciliation between the two countries. With this view he published, anonymously, in 1776, an additional dissertation on the war, which is regarded, by his biographer, as "one of the ablest and most argumentative of all the author's political tracts." The subject was followed up in the course of the same year, in a tract directed chiefly to the religious view of the question.

Another topic, of great moment, began, at this time, to excite a considerable sensation in the public mind, particularly in Scotland. An act of parliament had passed for the relief of Roman Catholics in England, from certain disabilities and penalties; and an intention was intimated of extending the same relief to the Roman Catholics in this part of the island. Dr Erskine, who, to the end of his life, retained a constant apprehension of the growth of Popery, published, in 1778, a pamphlet in which he urged, with the utmost earnestness, the inexpediency of the proposed repeal. In the General Assembly of the following year, the subject was discussed with great ability on the part both of those who supported and of those who opposed the repeal; and Dr Erskine afterwards published an account of the debate, prefixing to it an address to Dr Campbell of Aberdeen, who had declared himself in favour of the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities. Anxious to do his utmost to avert what he considered an impending evil, Dr Erskine forwarded to Mr Burke, who had brought in the bill for the relief of the Roman Catholics, a number of printed papers and sermons, containing the substance of the arguments which had been urged in Scotland, against the repeal of the penal statutes. The mind of the learned statesman, however, appears from his private letter in reply, to have remained unchanged.

To whatever subject Dr Erskine directed his powerful intellect, he was not long in acquiring a thorough knowledge of it in all its bearings. This was remarkably exemplified in the astonishing facility with which, at an advanced period of his life, he acquired a knowledge of the German language. The following account of it is given by Sir Henry Moncreiff:

"Lord Ellick had been much on the continent in early life, and was well acquainted with modern languages. He had an excellent library. And having been one of Dr Erskine's original associates, he was applied to by him, for the use of a German Grammar and Dictionary, at the time when he first resolved to attempt the acquisition of the German language.

"By his Lordship's account, these books were returned, when they had not been out of his possession more than six weeks. He, therefore, naturally concluded, that they had not been of much use; and that, finding the acquisition of languages at his age, with no other help than a grammar and dictionary, a more difficult undertaking than he had imagined it, his friend had relinquished the attempt.

"But when Dr Erskine soon after visited him, he was surprised to find, that, so far from having given up his design, he imagined himself to have received so much advantage from the grammar and dictionary, as to be already able, without assistance, to collect the substance of a German book.

"It was a matter of curiosity to see, how far a man of Dr Erskine's age, with all his industry and acuteness, could have carried this advantage, within the short space of six weeks; and being in his library, Lord Ellick produced a German book, of which he requested him to give him the satisfaction of hearing him read a few sentences.

"Dr Erskine had never heard another person read German, and had never pronounced a single sentence. He could not, therefore, literally comply with Lord Ellicock's request. But, without attempting to pronounce any part of the original, he readily translated into English a great part of a page, in a book which he had never before seen; so as to convince his Lordship, that his grammar and dictionary had indeed been turned to good account.

"With no other assistance, he was able, after six weeks' study, when he had nearly reached the age of sixty, to translate with ease the substance of a German book, to the satisfaction of a man of letters, who was well acquainted with the language. It would be difficult to give a more striking example, either of perseverance or facility, in the acquisition of a foreign tongue."

The extent to which he availed himself of this new acquirement was afterwards seen in his "Sketches of Church History," which are chiefly drawn, as he himself says, from foreign writers. The first volume of this publication appeared in 1790, and the second in 1797. They contain much solid and important information, and the author had the high satisfaction of receiving most gratifying attestations to their merit from Lord Hailes and Bishop Hurd, both of them individuals distinguished alike for their talents, their learning, and their piety. He published also consolatory letters, not original but collected, and one volume of sermons; another having been published after his death. It was his peculiar merit, however, that he kept in view not future fame but present usefulness, and, therefore, he lost no opportunity of engaging in the more immediate duties which devolved upon him as one of the ministers of a large city. To the business connected with charitable institutions he paid special attention, and in the exercise of his ministerial functions he was excelled by none of his brethren.

About the age of seventy Dr Erskine's health began to decline, but he continued to officiate almost regularly in his Church, till within a few months of his death. And so vigorous were his faculties, even in the last hours of his life, that, on the night before he died, he was eagerly employed in reading a new Dutch book. While thus engaged he complained of being unable to see distinctly, and, with some impatience, asked for more candles. He went to bed about eleven o'clock, and, in a few hours, his spirit had ascended to its Saviour and its God. His death took place on the 19th of January 1803, in the eighty-second year of his age.

THE JEWISH FEAST OF TABERNACLES.

BY THE REV. R. S. CANDLISH, A. M.,

Leviticus xxiii. 42; Zechariah xvi.; John vi.; Revelations xxi.

THUS we find the typical import of the Feast of Tabernacles, and its true fulfilment as the feast of the ingathering, in the latter times, when the tents being pitched, there shall not be wanting any more the Tabernacle of the Lord; and we arrive at this conclusion, by the comparison of two far distant prophets announcing the same event. For that it is the same scene that they describe, will appear evident, as we think, to any one who will observe the minute and remarkable parallelism, in many points, between John's prophecy, in the 21st chapter of the Revelation, and Zechariah's in the chapter already quoted, the 14th chapter of his book. Turn to chapter xxi. of the Revelation, and compare it with this of Zechariah, which we are now considering. Observe, first of all, what John says, Rev. xxi. 23, "The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it; for the glory of the Lord did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day; for there shall be no night there." Does this at all explain Zechariah xiv. 6, 7. "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the light shall not be clear nor dark;" or (margin) it shall not be clear in some places, and dark in others, "but it shall be one day that shall be known to the Lord, not day nor night: but it shall come to pass that at evening time it shall be light." Again, (2.) Zechariah xiv. 8. "And it shall be in that day, that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem," is literally identical with what John says, Rev. xxi. 6., "I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely;" and xxii. 1. "And he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb." Again, (3.) Rev. xxi. 27. It is declared, "And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defleth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." Does this not exactly tally and correspond with the declaration of Zechariah xiv. 20, concerning the universal prevalence of purity, down to the very commonest of any utensils and instruments employed in any service? "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord; and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar. Yea, every pot in Jerusalem, and in Judah, shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts; and all they that sacrifice shall come and take of them, and seethe therein: and in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of Hosts." Again, (4.) Zechariah xiv. 19., "And the Lord shall be king over all the earth, and in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one," seems to harmonize with Rev. xxi. 24., "And the nations of them that are saved shall walk in the light of it, (and its light is the Lamb); and the kings of the earth do bring their glory into it." And, lastly, Zechariah xiv. 11., "And men shall dwell in it, and there shall be no more utter destruction," or curse, "but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited," is but expanded in the beautiful language of John, Rev. xxi. 4., "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away."

These instances of agreement and identity cannot be accidental. They surely prove an identity of matter. And they warrant us in connecting, or rather require us to connect the declaration of John, "The Tabernacle of God is with men," with the intimation of Zechariah, that there is to be a Feast of Tabernacles, in which the nations, along with the inhabitants of the Holy City, are to take part. How far these magnificent predictions of the glory of the latter day are to be understood figuratively; how far we are to expect an exact literal accomplishment of all the glowing imagery in which the triumph of that blessed era, is with vivid distinctness set before us, we pretend not to determine. We would beware, however, of the too great license of fanciful and spiritual interpretation, and rather follow the wise and more humble simplicity of the great masters in prophetic lore and study, not of our own day merely, but of earlier and more masculine times. These learned and sagacious expounders, cautious in giving the reins to their imagination, when it would fill up, from slight and dark hints, the minute details of the picture, were yet bold in seizing upon its broad outline and its leading strokes; and they never doubted the literal reality, at least in its general features, of the scene spread out before them. The holy beauty of the heavenly city, and the prosperity of the people, may be, in some points, described poetically. The clear light, shining independently of sun and moon, may denote the light of knowledge—the knowledge of God and of the Lamb, not reflected from a glass darkly, but derived immediately from its source;—according to Isaiah's prophecy, (ii. 3-5.) "And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord." The river of the water of life, also, may refer to the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on all flesh. But who can doubt that the other particulars specified, the holiness, the harmony, the happiness,—that these three, at least, of the characteristics of the picture,—the stainless purity of the meanest vessels, the union of all nations, in peace, under the King, and the absence of sorrow, and sighing, and tears—are real and actual attributes of a real community of the blessed,—a community to be realized even on this earth of ours? And in that community there is to be the real fulfilment of what the Feast of Tabernacles typified and represented. The true Feast of Tabernacles is to be there. Around Jerusalem, as a centre, is to be grouped and clustered the Universal Church. On the holy land and the holy city where the King again dwells, all the tribes of the earth, all the fulness of the Gentiles are to be, for spiritual blessings, dependent. Thither they are to look for light,—thence are to flow their streams of life and gladness. All nations are to go up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles, if they would be refreshed with the rivers of God's house. For, as Zechariah adds, (chapter xiv. 17,) "It shall be, that whosoever will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, even upon them shall be no rain. And if the family of Egypt go not up, and come not, upon them also shall be the plague wherewith the Lord smiteth the heathen that come not up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles." "This shall be the punishment of Egypt, and the punishment of all nations that come not up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles."

O blessed day! O glorious festival! How wide, how boundless is its comprehensive embrace! It is a feast for all nations. Egypt herself is not excluded. Her ancient wrongs against Israel are forgotten; her treachery, her insults, her cruelty, are all forgiven. Even she may come up, or rather she must needs come up. Judah is again exalted. The Lord's mighty plan, in the selection, the providential government, the dispersion, and the marvellous preservation of his chosen people, is now, at last, unfolded and fulfilled. In millennial glory, the covenant made with Abraham is remembered. In his seed, yet once more, all the families of the earth are blessed, yes, the very families who have now, for long centuries, been reproaching, vilifying, and persecuting those whom God is smiting, but whom soon he will acknowledge, in the sight of all, as his own. The Gentiles have conspired to tread Jerusalem under their feet. All Christendom has abused the Jews, making their very name a scorn and scandal, leaving them alone, nay, hardening them in unbelief. And yet their recovery is to be the revival of the Church, and the peace of the whole world. Happy, surely, they who, by prayer, or by preaching, or by whatever means, hasten on this glad era. Happy they who know, even in their degradation, the Nobles of the earth. Happy they who speak to them the Gospel in love. Thrice happy the Church, or people, whichever it is to be, that is to be honoured in sending swift messengers to the nation now scattered and spoiled, when it is to be brought as a present to the Lord of Hosts to Mount Zion.*

This word of prophecy has carried us away, but not far, and we trust not unpleasantly or unprofitably, from the subject more immediately before us. We have yet two remarks to make regarding the views of this festival entertained by the Jews themselves, which will lead us to see the full meaning of a passage in the Gospel by John, to which we shall shortly refer.

1. The Jews themselves connected the observance of this feast with the glorious advent of Messiah, their King,—the presence of Jehovah their God among them. When they pitched their tents, it was in memory of the time when the Tabernacle of the Lord stood in the midst, and in preparation for the time when again He was to dwell among them. The very erection of their booths, was a token of their firm faith and confident expectation. Their cry, as they walked in procession, was "Hosanna, save now, I beseech thee, O Lord." And the Psalms appointed for that sacred season, the portion called by them Hallel (118—118), had respect to the Lord's returning to visit them, and bore this burden: "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord to save." But the most remarkable proof, on this point, is the fact, that when they conducted our Lord in triumph into the City, hailing him, for the time, as their King, they adopted in the procession, so far as haste permitted, the very pomp of the Feast of Tabernacles. It was not then the Feast of Tabernacles, but the Feast of Passover. Still they knew well, that when Messiah, the King, the Lord, did come, it was the Feast of Tabernacles that was to welcome and celebrate his coming. The branches of palm trees in their hands, the boughs spread on the way, their acclamations, "Hosanna to the Son of David, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, Hosanna in the highest," these usages all belonged to the Feast of Tabernacles. The multitude, in their enthusiasm, believing, for the moment, that their King was come, deemed the Feast of the Passover superseded, and the ceremonies of another feast more appropriate. Here, as in every instance, they overlooked the necessity of the Messiah's coming first of all to fulfil the type of the Passover, as he did at that very Passover when he died a sacrifice for sin, and rose again as the first sheaf of the great crop to be reaped. But, substantially, they were right in thinking, that had he been, as they hoped, coming in glory to dwell among them, it was the Feast of Tabernacles, whose real end he would then accomplish; and our Lord, by receiving their homage at a time when he certainly meant to represent the triumph of his second coming to reign, virtually sanctions the view which we have given of the ultimate scope and meaning of this harvest festival.

2. The Jews farther connected this festival with the glorious descent of the Holy Ghost. To signify this, they had invented a ceremony of their own, which they added to the appointed forms. During all the days, and chiefly on the eighth day, the great day of the feast, they went with much solemnity to the stream, or pool of Siloam, and bringing its water in pitchers, with much rejoicing, to the Temple, they mixed it with wine, and poured it out devoutly upon and before the altar. They thus, as it was understood, expressed their prayer, that on the dry and thirsty soil the rain might be poured out; and the vulgar idea was, that as this festival was a thanksgiving for one year's abundant crop, so on it was determined the amount of propitious influence which God was to grant for the next seed-time and harvest. But the ceremony was regarded as significant of something more. The softly flowing waters of Siloam are made by Isaiah the type of the sovereignty of David's house. For addressing the ten tribes, in reference to their apostasy from that house, he uses this figure (chapter viii. 6.): "This people refuseth the waters of Shiloah that go softly," fit emblem this of the happy reign of Emmanuel, David's son, of which these Israelites had virtually, by their rebellion, renounced the hope. These waters were thus understood by the Jews to represent the peaceful and holy blessings of Messiah's reign, especially the spiritual gifts and graces which he was to confer. Hence, in bringing their pitchers from Siloam, and pouring them out before the Lord, they were accustomed to say, that from thence they drew the Holy Ghost, and to quote, as their authority, that prediction of Isaiah, "with joy shall ye draw water from the wells of salvation." They had a tradition, that in this very ordinance, the Spirit had been known to descend on their prophets, and they had distinctly respect, in the ceremony of the water, to the promises of the Spirit being abundantly poured out in the day of Messiah's glory.

It was at the close of this significant Feast of Tabernacles, and while the people probably were in the act of performing this unauthorised, but not unmeaning ceremony, that the Lord Jesus, as we read in John's Gospel, (chapter vii. 37,) not, as usual, walking up and down, or sitting and conversing, but standing in a conspicuous part of the temple, in the view of all the multitude, cried, saying, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink. He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."

The blessed import of this call, and this promise, it is not our present business to consider. But we may gather something from the occasion, and the manner of our Lord's proclamation.

1. The last day of the Feast of Tabernacles was the eighth, a day of holy convocation. Why it was regarded by the Jews as the great day, is not well known. In some respects it seemed to be less important than the other days, and indeed not so much a part of the feast, as a sort of supplement and appendage to it. The peculiar sacrifices appointed to be offered during the seven days were discontinued on the eighth, on which the common daily sacrifice alone was offered; and the booths in which the worshippers dwelt during the week were also abandoned on this last day, as the ordinance, in so far as it was a Feast of Tabernacles, was now over. As a feast of ingathering, however, it was still honoured on the eighth day, by joyous processions of companies bearing branches of trees. It is said that the Jews had a tradition concerning this eighth day, that, whereas the other seven had respect to the Gentiles as well as themselves, this was peculiarly their own;—the seven days' solemnity being like a large and formal feast, for a miscellaneous assembly of strangers and servants, the eighth day's being a sort of private and confidential banquet for the king's friends. This tradition, while it marks the proud and exclusive temper of the nation, would show that they understood, as we do, Zechariah's prophecy of the Feast of Tabernacles as a feast for all the tribes of the earth; and it would account also for their esteeming the eighth to be the great day of the feast. On this last day, they performed, with peculiar state, the ceremony of drawing water, with joy, from the wells of Siloam, or, as they interpreted them, the wells of salvation. It was in the midst of this ceremony, in the course of its being completed in the temple, that Jesus arrested the assembled crowd by the proclamation. The time was, if we may judge, well chosen. The feast has once more been celebrated, and, to all appearance, with no nearer prospect, no better sense or sight of Jehovah's presence, than for many long years bygone. The tabernacles have been pitched in due and stated form, all ready for the renewal of the scene in the wilderness. But the Lord's tabernacle has not been in the midst. And now, the tents are struck, as if again in disappointment. Many a disconsolate worshipper may have mourned, and mourned all the more sincerely, the more spiritual his views were. The feast is over, and we have not found the Lord, the King. But let them stay for a little. On the very last day, their attention is called, in a way most startling,—to a humble Nazarene! They hear a voice of authority—they look, they see a present God. Surely the Lord is in this place, and they knew it not. It is Christ the King, who is even in the midst of their tents. They obey his call—they believe his promise—they need to wait no longer for his coming—they need to draw no more water from the cistern—they cast aside their pitchers—they stay not, to waste precious time, in a typical ceremony of their own devising, when the reality, which they meant to represent, is at hand—they look beyond the ordinance to him whose presence blesses it. They have found the Lord amid the tabernacles, if not precisely in the character they expected, at least in a character most suitable. The feast has not gone by so desolate as they feared—their mourning is turned into joy—and it is to them indeed a festival of gladness once more. Thus reasonable and welcome might our Lord's proclamation be to the humble worshippers at this feast, waiting for the consolation of Israel.

2. The Lord Jesus presents himself to the people as being, in his own person, the very end and object of this festival—as entitled to claim it as his own—as, in truth, the very King, the Lord for whom, in the observance of it, they were waiting and longing, in expectation of whose coming to dwell among them as of old, they kept this feast of booths. He calls attention to himself as greater than this feast, as, indeed, the very Jehovah in honour of whom, and in hope of whose advent, they observed it. "Come unto me. The Lord, whom ye seek, is here. You have pitched your tents, you have erected your tabernacles, and ye overlook the tabernacle of the Lord, which is again in the midst of you. The Word—made flesh—dwells, or tabernacles among you. True, he is not yet to make his permanent abode on earth; but for a season he is with you in the tabernacle of his flesh; and in your feast of tabernacles he should be honoured and acknowledged." It is a high character, therefore, that our Lord here assumes,—it is a high claim that he makes. He calls the regard of the worshippers away from the feast of God to himself. And who else might do this than He, by whom and for whom the feast was instituted; He who did at first fill with his present glory the tabernacle in the wilderness, around which the Israelites gladly, at the first observance of the feast, pitched their tents; He whose return to be the centre of a more blessed feast of tabernacles in the latter day, prophecy foretold and faith anticipated. Yes, it is none other than Jehovah—God of Hosts—your King—your Redeemer, who has now pitched his tent among yours, overlooked by you; and though it be as yet only in humiliation that you can know him, still not the less is he entitled to divine, to royal honour; not the less, but all the more, since for you and your sins does he humble himself; nay, on account of that very humiliation, He claims your homage and worship,—your devoted faith.

3. For even now with him is the residue of the Spirit. He holds at his disposal those rivers of life, of which you vainly seek to draw some share from the waters of Siloam; with him alone are the true wells of salvation. True, the blessings of the Holy Ghost flow not with so full a stream as they will do when again the Tabernacle of God is with man. The Spirit is not poured out so abundantly on all flesh as he is shortly to be, by way of specimen, at the feast of Pentecost or the first-fruits of the Church,—or as in the end, at the full consummation of the harvest, on the feast of tabernacles or of ingathering. Still the Spirit is dispensed in measure sufficient for the quenching of your thirst, for the satisfying of your soul. Thus Jesus claims the prerogative of giving the Holy Ghost, when he promises to the believer that rivers of living water should flow from him, even the same pure rivers of the water of life that the apostle saw proceeding in the temple of the New Jerusalem out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. For the believer is himself like the sanctuary there foretold; he is even now the temple of the living God, through the Holy Ghost dwelling in him, and sending forth from him refreshing streams of grace; and in his soul individually may even now be realized the millennial blessedness of the holy city and holy land. There is a feast in his soul now of the same kind and character with the feast that is to be then. The kingdom of God is already within him, which now, as then, is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. The same light of the Lamb, as a present Saviour, shines on him, the same water of life cheers him. He, too, has on all his members and instruments,—Holiness to the Lord, nor is any uncleanness allowed in him. The communion of God and of the saints is his, and all his tears are wiped away by the hand of a Saviour's sympathy. Yes, the same Lord who is to come to the celebration of the feast of tabernacles in the harvest of the whole Church, is present with you, O believer! in a feast of tabernacles now, at the harvest of your soul. Be you, then, waiting on him, and receiving his Spirit, and gratefully presenting the ripe fruits of an autumnal richness. Be you maturing a full crop of all Christian graces, that ye may offer them, as in a festival of joy, to your Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. And to all, in reference to the true feast of tabernacles, we address the invitation of the Saviour: "I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star. And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely."

THE CHRISTIAN AS A LITTLE CHILD:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES NAIRN,
Minister of Forgan.

"Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein."—MARK x. 15.

THERE is, as every one must have remarked, something peculiarly engaging and attractive in the appearance of a little child. During the years of infancy, or previously to the development of those corrupt propensities that are inherent in every individual of our fallen race, there is to be observed, in very young children, an artlessness of manner, which presents a most refreshing contrast to that suspicious disposition which men so often manifest in the business of life. In making this remark, it is not our intention to adopt the language of those who speak of children as if they were naturally innocent, and who account for their subsequent wickedness, by referring it to the contaminating influence of evil example. On the contrary, we are persuaded that they are "born in sin and shapen in iniquity," and that, "as a clean thing cannot come out of an unclean," so must those who are descended from Adam, by ordinary generation, be all alike the children of wrath, and, because of the spirit that worketh in them, all alike the children of disobedience. Still, however, we maintain, that, during a brief period of its existence, it is impossible to look upon the sweet and placid countenance of a little child, without being impressed with the belief, that it presents a faithful index of gentleness and tranquillity within; and that as yet no angry passions have begun to rage within its breast, nor any guilty imaginations disturbed or polluted the exercise of its new born powers. And it is precisely for this reason, we apprehend, that our blessed Lord, during the days of his earthly ministry, always manifested such a deep and tender interest in little children. He seems to have looked upon them with feelings of peculiar delight. In the course of his teaching, he drew illustrations of his doctrine from their appearance. And in the passage with which our text is connected, he appears to have experienced a personal gratification in welcoming them to his presence, taking them up in his arms, laying his hands on them, and blessing them.

At the 13th verse, it is mentioned, that when certain parents brought their children to Jesus that he should touch them, his disciples rebuked them. So far, however, was the compassionate Redeemer from sanctioning, by his authority, the conduct of his disciples, that, "being much displeased," he said unto them, "Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God." And as his manner was, he took advantage of the incident that had occurred, by engrafting on it a most important practical lesson, applicable to the condition, and fitted to promote the benefit of his followers in every age. He proceeded to assure those around him, that if he thus encouraged the approach of little children to his presence, it was because he beheld in them the emblem of that very character which it was the great design of his mediatorial undertaking to form in all the children of men. For we read, that no sooner had he said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," than he added, in the words of our text, "Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein."

What we propose, in now directing your thoughts to this declaration of the Saviour, is to illustrate some of the features of character, on account of which a little child may be fitly regarded as an emblem of that state of mind which is here described by the expression, "entering into the kingdom of heaven." And,

I. We would instance humility as one of the distinguishing features of young children. In such little ones, as being necessarily ignorant of the value and importance attached to the distinctions of rank, there is to be perceived no disposition to exalt themselves by depreciating those around them; and no manifestations of that supercilious neglect of one class of their fellow-creatures with the meanest and most cringing servility to another, which the competing aspirants after this world's honours are so frequently seen to display. To the young child, it is of no consequence with whom he associates. The humblest menial, provided he will only minister those little attentions by which its infant powers are delighted and amused, will be no less acceptable as a companion, than the most illustrious nobleman in the land. The seals of highest office in the empire, if placed before a little child, would at once, and willingly, be parted with for the merest gew-gaw that might chance to be a little more glittering; and although born the heir of a most ancient and honourable family, it would matter nothing at that early age, if, in some great entertainment given to all classes of the community, the little child were made to occupy the lowest room.

Now, we have been assured, that a similar feeling of indifference to the honours of this present life, considered as objects of ambition, or sources of gratification, must be acquired and manifested by every believer in Jesus. And, accordingly, we read, that when his disciples, under the influence of the most erroneous views of his kingdom, were disputing with one another as to the places of relative greatness that would be assigned to them, our blessed Lord, with a view to instruct them in the character he required of his followers, took a little child, and setting it before them, said, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven." In having thus acted, the object of Christ, as must be evident to every one, was to intimate how utterly inconsistent with the purpose for which he had chosen them as his associates were those feelings of ambition, and rivalry, and envy, under which they had proposed the question, "Who is greatest in the kingdom of God?" And what he enjoined so constantly in the course of his teaching, the Saviour never failed to illustrate by his example. In all his intercourse with our guilty race, He was truly as one who had come not to be ministered unto, but to minister,—who sought not his own glory, but the glory of his Father who sent him,—who was at all times willing to associate with the poorest, or most despised, and who was not ashamed to call them brethren. The loudest applauses of the most distinguished assembly that ever met upon earth, had been of no value to the mind of Christ, compared with such an expression of gratitude, as was once rendered to him by a penitent woman, of whom it is written, that she washed his feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. Yea, and that we might be still more deeply impressed with the importance of cultivating this, the grace of humility; do we not read, that the blessed Jesus, on one occasion, girded himself with a towel, as if he had been servant of all, and proceeding to wash his disciples' feet, said to them, "I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you; for if I have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet."

See then, brethren, if ye would have that likeness to a little child, without which ye cannot enter into the kingdom, that ye be clothed with humility. We ask you not to think of yourselves more meanly, but not to think of yourselves more highly than you ought to think. And while you are by no means called upon to divest yourselves of the wealth your industry may have amassed, or to renounce the honours to which your talents may have raised you, it is necessary, that as the professing followers of Jesus, you regard both the one and the other, so far as the great end or true happiness of your existence is concerned, with something of the same indifference that a little child would look on the most envied possessions, or listen to a discussion about the most highly valued honours of the world. "In lowliness of mind, let each esteem others better than himself." "Put on, as the elect of God, meekness and humbleness of mind," for "verily I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein."

II. Again, as characteristic of a little child, we would instance confidingness, or a disposition to rely implicitly on the word of its parent and instructor.

In consequence of the feebleness of their powers of understanding, children, at a very early age, must, it is obvious, be wholly dependent on the veracity of those with whom they are connected. They will readily believe any statements, no matter how absurd or extravagant they may be. Having no conception of deceit themselves, they are willing to credit every communication that may be made to them, and being necessarily incapable, owing to the weakness of their intellectual powers, of discriminating between truth and error, they never hesitate to repose implicit faith in the most foolish or fabulous story that may be told them. All must be aware to what a fearful extent, and with what mischievous effects, advantage has been often taken of this disposition in little children, for the purpose of operating on their fears, by many of those senseless or unprincipled persons to whom they may have been given in charge. Aye, and it is most lamentable to witness the extent to which this same practice of experimenting with the confidingness of children is sometimes carried, even by those who, as having a more tender interest in their future well-being, might be expected to guard against any thing which is so directly fitted to pervert their moral powers, by training them, as it were, to think lightly of falsehood, at an age when impressions are most easily made, and most lastingly retained.

Greatly, however, as it may be at times abused, this readiness to receive, as truth, whatever shall be stated to them by their parents or guardians, constitutes a most beautiful feature in the character of little children, and is fitted to illustrate, very strikingly, that teachableness of spirit in which it becomes every human being, however exalted his powers, or ample his knowledge, to hear what the Lord God shall say unto his soul. The difference, as to degree, between the mental powers of a little child and the most powerful intellect that ever existed upon earth, is never once to be named, in comparison with the distance that must separate the highest human intelligence from Him who is the Fountain of Light. The same absolute dependence then, may be as truly necessary in the one case as in the other; and as the little child must take its information on the word of those in whom it trusts, it may be necessary that men of the highest and most cultivated reason shall rest satisfied with simply finding that there has been affixed to the statements they may have occasion to peruse, these authoritative words, "Thus saith the Lord." Such a faith as this all must exercise who would enter into the kingdom of heaven. With a childlike docility of mind we must bring every thought into subjection to the oracles of the living God. These may declare to us much that is mysterious. They may contain doctrines which, in all their relations, it is impossible for us, or for the most gifted inquirer, to comprehend. But if in these doctrines there is nothing contradictory to the truths otherwise revealed, we shall, if rightly impressed with our own weakness, cast ourselves on the Word of God, even as would any child upon the superior intelligence of its earthly father, saying, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

In reading the Scriptures then, brethren, beware of that pride of intellect which has proved the ruin of many souls. If you are convinced that the Bible is the Word of God, presume not to think that you may sit in judgment on the reasonableness of its doctrines, or on the wisdom of its counsels, or on the fitness of its requirements. The very circumstance that it is a revelation of the divine will, should lead you to expect in it difficulties which in this imperfect state of being you may never be able to resolve. Seek not, however, to be wise above what is written; but bearing in mind that while that which is revealed, is to you and to your children, there are many secret things which still belong unto the Lord; let it be your habitual endeavour to cast down every high imagination, and to have all your thoughts brought into captivity to the truth.

III. Yet farther, as characteristic of a little child, I would notice imitativeness, or that strong desire which it constantly manifests to speak and act like those whom it most highly reveres.

This disposition to imitate is one of the strongest and most early developed powers of the human mind. From the very dawning of reason the propensity may be observed to be in constant and most powerful operation. The little child is ever on the watch that it may be able to repeat the words, the looks, and the actions of all within its reach. And it were well that parents, and those employed in the training of these little ones, could but habitually bear in mind how much the future character may be affected by what they hear or witness at that early stage of their being. There cannot be a greater mistake than to suppose that even very young children are indifferent to what is going on around them. On the contrary, they are most diligent observers and most skilful copyists of every example that may be set before them, and thus, at an incredibly early stage of their existence, a foundation may be laid either for the happiness or the misery that is to mark their future years.

How admirably adapted, then, to this principle of human nature are those numerous exhortations that have been given to believers to imitate the character of Christ, as that perfect pattern, in growing conformity to which, their chief happiness is to be found. We may affirm, indeed, of the Christian system, in reference to that moral character which it is designed to form, that it has been embodied in the recorded history of Jesus of Nazareth. For it is impossible to read that history without perceiving that he exemplified every precept he delivered, that he illustrated, by his actions, all that he recommended in his doctrines; and, in short, that he afforded a living manifestation of the very dispositions, and affections, and habits, which he inculcated on his disciples. If, therefore, he calls upon them to take up the cross, it is that they may follow him,—that they may walk in his footsteps,—that they may pursue the very path along which he passed, when, as the Captain of his people's salvation, he was made perfect through suffering. Be ye then imitators of Christ. Be persuaded that conformity to his character is the high and holy design of your calling. As often as you find the blessed Saviour called the ruler or head of that kingdom which you desire to enter, let it be your highest aim and your most earnest endeavour to grow in resemblance to him. And like the little child that desires earnestly to speak and to act after the manner of its earthly parents, labour with all your might, and esteem it your highest enjoyment, that ye may have the same mind in you that was also in Christ Jesus, who is your Master and Lord in heaven. "For whosoever will not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall not enter therein."

IV. The only other characteristic of a little child to which I would advert, is that blind unquestioning obedience which it is required to yield to the will of its parent or teacher.

It can scarcely be necessary to remark, how essential it is to a proper education of its moral powers that the child should be taught, from the earliest period, that, so long as it is a child, it must have no will of its own in opposition to that of its parent. No intelligent father would ever think of stating to his children the reasons of that discipline to which, with a view to form their moral character, he may deem it his duty to subject them. He knows perfectly, that if his efforts are to be successful, there must be the exercise of an absolute authority on the one side, and the yielding of a most unreserved obedience on the other. However willing he might be to make the reasonableness of his conduct apparent to his little ones, he is well aware that, as yet, they possess not the capacity to understand him, founded as that conduct is, or ought to be, on a far larger and more comprehensive view of their relations than they themselves can be able to take. The restraints he imposes on their liberty—the denial he often gives to their most importunate requests—the pain he may at times occasion to their tenderest feelings, or the bodily chastisement he may inflict upon them—may for a time be regarded by his children only as so many indications of a cruel and capricious sporting with their peace. So soon, indeed, as it shall be possible, every wise father will address himself to the understanding of his offspring, seeking to direct their feelings by first convincing their reason. But for a certain number of years this is wholly impracticable; and it is therefore necessary, that, as a moral being, a little child shall, so to speak, be the subject of a purely despotic form of government, no reason being assigned but the parent's authority, for the propriety of the course it is required to follow.

And so must it often be with the believer in Jesus, or the subject of that kingdom which is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. To him, the ways and dealings of his heavenly Father may, on many occasions, be as dark and inexplicable as ever were the proceedings of any earthly parent to the comprehension of his little ones. In consequence of the very narrow range of our vision as spiritual beings, we are at present incapable of contemplating, in their true character, the events and circumstances that befall us, or of estimating our possessions according to their real and inherent value. Time, with all its concerns, assumes a most factitious importance in our eyes, and the love of this present world is ever influencing our minds with a power that must be destructive of that true and only permanent blessedness which is to be found in the love of Him who washed his people from their sins in his own blood. But the Father of our spirits is not thus indifferent to our everlasting interests; and he cannot consent that, for the gratification of our own will, we should be thus allowed to rest contented with the mere shadow of enjoyment while destitute of the substance. It is because he is not willing that they should perish, that he so frequently mingles the bitter cup for his children to drink. To effect these his gracious purposes, he visits them with calamity, or severe disasters in their worldly affairs; or he chastens them with bodily disease, or he commissions death to enter their families, and to snatch away some beloved object, which, like an idol, had been engrossing their affections to his exclusion and dishonour.

But if they have imbibed any thing of the spirit or temper of mind required in those who would enter into the kingdom, they will, at such times, bow down under the hand of God, saying, "I know, O Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that in very faithfulness thou hast afflicted me." "It is well, for it is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good." "I will trust, and not be afraid; for I know, and am persuaded, that all events," even the darkest and most mysterious, "shall be made to work together for good to them that love him, and are the called according to his purpose." "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us."

See, then, professing Christians, that, as little children, ye be humble—that ye be teachable— that ye be imitators of the character of Jesus—and that ye be obedient to the will of your heavenly Father; for, "whosoever will not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall not enter therein."

THE GIPSIES IN RUSSIA AND IN SPAIN.

As one of the principal motives of my visit to Moscow was to hold communication with a particular part of its population, which, from the accounts I had received, had awakened in me the most vivid interest, I did not fail, shortly after my arrival, to seek an opportunity of accomplishing my wish, and believe that what I have now to communicate will be of some interest to the Christian and the philosopher. I allude to the people called Zigani, or Gipsies, or, as they style themselves, Rommany, of whom there are several thousands in and about Moscow, and who obtain a livelihood by various means. Those who have been accustomed to consider these people as wandering barbarians, incapable of civilization, and unable to appreciate the blessings of a quiet and settled life, will be surprised at learning, that many of those in Moscow inhabit large and handsome houses, appear abroad in elegant equipages, and, if distinguishable from the genteel class of the Russians, are only so by superior personal advantages, and mental accomplishments. Of this singular phenomenon at Moscow, the female Gipsies are the principal cause, having from time immemorial, cultivated their vocal powers to such an extent, that although in the heart of a country in which the vocal art has arrived at greater perfection than in any other part of the world, the principal Gipsy choirs in Moscow are allowed, by the general voice of the public, to be unrivalled, and to bear away the palm from all competitors. It is a fact notorious in Russia, that the celebrated Catalani was so filled with admiration for the powers of voice displayed by one of the Gipsy songstresses, who, after the former had sung before a splendid audience at Moscow, stepped forward, and with an astonishing burst of melody, ravished every ear, that she took from her own shoulders a shawl of immense value, which had been presented to her by the Pope, and, embracing the Gipsy, compelled her to accept it, saying that it had been originally intended for the matchless singer, which she now discovered was not herself. The sums obtained by these performers are very large, enabling them to live in luxury of every description, and to maintain their husbands in a princely way. Many of them are married to Russian gentlemen, and every one who has resided for any length of time in Russia, cannot but be aware that the lovely, talented, and domestic wife of Count Alexander T***** is by birth a Gipsy, and was formerly one of the ornaments of a Rommany choir at Moscow, as she is now one of the principal ornaments of the marriage state, and of illustrious life. It is not, however, to be supposed, that all the female Gipsies are of this high, talented, and respectable order; amongst them there are many low and profligate females, who sing at taverns, or at the various gardens in the neighbourhood, and whose husbands and relatives subsist by horse-jobbing, and like kinds of traffic. The principal place of resort of this class is Marina Rotche, lying about two versts from Moscow, and thither I drove, attended by a valet de place. Upon my arriving there, the Gipsies swarmed out from their tents, and from the little tracteer, or tavern, and surrounded me; standing on the seat of the calèche, I addressed them in a loud voice in the dialect of the English Gipsies, with which I had some slight acquaintance. A scream of wonder instantly arose, and welcomes and greetings were poured forth in torrents of musical Rommany, amongst which, however, the most prominent air was, "Ah kak mi toute karmama," "Oh, how we love you;" for at first they supposed me to be one of their brothers, who, they said, were wandering about in Turkey, China, and other parts, and that I had come over the great pawnee, or water, to visit them. Their countenances exactly resembled those of their race in England,—brown, and, for the most part, beautiful, their eyes fiery and wildly intelligent, their hair coal-black, and somewhat coarse. I asked them numerous questions, especially as to their religion, and original country. They said that they believed in "Devil,"* which, strange to say, in their language signifies God: and that they were afraid of the evil spirit, or "Bengel;" that their fathers came from Rommany land, but where that land lay they knew not. They sang many songs, both in the Russian and Rommany languages. The former were modern popular pieces which are in vogue on the stage, but the latter were evidently very ancient, being composed in a metre or cadence to which there is nothing analogous in Russian prosody, and exhibiting an internal character which was anything but European or modern. I visited this place several times during my sojourn at Moscow, and spoke to them upon their sinful manner of living, upon the advent and sufferings of Christ Jesus, and expressed, upon my taking a final leave of them, a hope that they would be in a short period furnished with the word of eternal life in their own language, which they seemed to value and esteem much higher than the Russian. They invariably listened with much attention, and during the whole time I was amongst them, exhibited little in speech or conduct that was objectionable.

And again, in reference to the Gipsies in Spain, the following account is given:—

About one o'clock in the afternoon of the 6th of January (1836,) I crossed the bridge of the Guadiana, a boundary river between Portugal and Spain, and entered Badajoz, a strong Spanish town containing about 8000 inhabitants. I instantly returned thanks to God, who had protected me during a journey of five days through the wilds of the Alentejo, the province of Portugal the most infested by robbers and desperate characters, and which I had traversed with no other human companion than a lad, nearly idiotic, who was to convey back the mules which carried myself and baggage. It was not my intention to make much stay at Badajoz, and as a vehicle would set out for Madrid the day next but one after my arrival, I proposed to depart therein for the capital.

The next morning I was standing at the door of the inn where I had taken up my residence; the weather was gloomy, and rain seemed to be at hand. I was thinking of the state of the country I had lately entered, which was involved in bloody anarchy and confusion. Suddenly two men, wrapped in long cloaks, came down the narrow and almost deserted street; they were about to pass me, and the face of the nearest was turned full towards me. I knew to whom the countenance he displayed must belong, and I touched him on the shoulder—the man stopped, and his companion also; I said a certain word, to which, after an exclamation of surprise, he responded in the manner which I expected. The men were of that singular family or race which has diffused itself over every part of the civilized-globe, and the members of which are known as Gipsies, Bohemians, Gitanos, Zigani, and by many other names, but whose proper appellation seems to be "Rommany," from the circumstance that in many and distant countries they so style themselves, and also the language which they speak amongst each other. We began conversing in the Spanish dialect of this language, with which I was tolerably well acquainted. Upon inquiring of my two newly-made acquaintances whether there were many of their people at Badajoz, and in the vicinity, they informed me that there were nine or ten families residing in the town, and that there were others at Merida, a town about nine leagues distant. I asked by what means they supported themselves, and they replied that they and their brethren gained a livelihood by jobbing in horses, mules, &c.; but that all those in Badajoz were very poor, with the exception of one man who was exceedingly "mubalballo," or rich, as he was in possession of many horses and other beasts. They removed their cloaks for a moment, and I saw that their under garments were rags.

They left me in haste, and went about the town informing the rest that a stranger had arrived who spoke Rommany as well as themselves, who had the eyes and face of a Gitano, and seemed to be of the "cratti," or blood. In less than half an hour the street before the inn was filled with the men, women, and children of Egypt. I went out amongst them, and my heart sunk within me as I surveyed them; so much squalidness, dirt, and misery, I had never before seen amongst a similar number of human beings; but the worst of all was the evil expression of their countenances, denoting that they were familiar with every species of crime, and it was not long before I found that their countenances did not belie them. After they had asked me an infinity of questions, and felt my hands, face, and clothes, they retired to their homes.

My meeting with these wretched people was the reason of my remaining at Badajoz a much longer time than I originally intended. I wished to become better acquainted with their condition and manners, and, above all things, to speak to them about Christ and his word, for I was convinced that, should I travel to the end of the universe, I should meet with none who were more in need of Christian exhortation, and I accordingly continued at Badajoz for nearly three weeks.

During this time I was almost constantly among them; and as I spoke their language, and was considered by them as one of themselves, I had better opportunities of coming to a fair conclusion respecting their character, than any other person, whether Spaniard or foreigner, could have hoped for, not possessed of a similar advantage. The result of my observations, was a firm belief that the Spanish Gitanos are the most vile, degraded, and wretched people upon the earth. The great wickedness of these outcasts may, perhaps, be attributed to their having abandoned their wandering life, and become inmates of the towns, where, to the original bad traits of their character, they have superadded the evil and vicious habits of the rabble. Their mouths teem with abomination, and in no part of the world have I heard such frequent, frightful, and extraordinary cursing as amongst them.

Religion they have none. From what I learned from them, it appeared that their ancestors had some belief in metempsychosis, but they themselves laughed at the idea, and were of opinion that the soul perished when the body ceased to breathe; and the argument which they used was rational enough, so far as it impugned metempsychosis: "we have been wicked and miserable enough in this life," they said; "why should we live again?"

I translated certain portions of Scripture into their dialect, which I frequently read to them, especially the parables of Lazarus and the Prodigal Son, and told them that the latter had been as wicked as themselves, and both had suffered as much or more, but that the sufferings of the former, who always looked forward to a blessed resurrection, were recompensed in the world to come by admission to the society of Abraham and the prophets; and that the latter, when he repented of his crimes, was forgiven, and received into as much favour as the just son had always enjoyed. They listened with admiration, but alas! not of the truths, the eternal truths I was telling them, but at finding that their broken jargon could be written and read; the only words of assent to the heavenly doctrine which I ever obtained, and which were rather of the negative kind, were the following, from a woman:—"Brother! you tell us strange things, though perhaps you do not lie; a month since I would sooner have believed these tales, than that I should this day have seen one who could write Rommany."

They possess a vast number of songs or couplets, which they recite to the music of the guitar. For the purpose of improving myself in the language, I collected and wrote down upwards of one hundred of these couplets, the subjects of which are horse-stealing, bloodshed, and the various incidents of Gipsy life in Spain; yet amongst them are to be found some tender and beautiful thoughts, though few and far between, as a flower or shrub are here and there seen springing from the interstices of the rugged and frightful rocks of which are composed the mountains and sierras of Spain.

The following is their traditionary account of the expulsion of their fathers from Egypt:—"And it came to pass that Pharaoh, the king, collected numerous armies for the purpose of war; and after he had conquered the whole world, he challenged God to descend from heaven and fight him; but the Lord replied, 'There is no one who shall fight with me;' and thereupon the Lord opened a mountain, and he cast therein Pharaoh, the king, and all his numerous armies, so that the Egyptians remained without defence, and their enemies arose and scattered them wide abroad."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The hardness of the Human Heart.—Consider the dullness of the most part of the hearers of this age, and how hard a thing it is to awake a sleeping world, and to get them but to think that it doth concern them to hear in earnest; and possibly it was not a small piece of spiritual wisdom in him to begin and end all his sermons with an awakening word concerning heaven, or hell, or judgment, and the danger of choosing the evil and refusing the good.—Preface to Gray's Sermons.

Faith and Holiness.—Holiness is the true morality; and they that prefer the preaching and practice of faith in Christ, before the preaching and practice of holiness, and slight this as mere morality, do prefer the means before the end, and their physic before their health. And they that preach or think to practise holiness, without faith in Christ, do dream of a cure without the only Physician of souls. And they that preach up morality as consisting in mere justice, charity to men, and temperance, without the love of God in Christ, do take a branch, cut off and withered, from the tree. Some ignorant sectaries cry down all preaching as mere morality, which does not frequently toss the name of Christ and free grace. And some ungodly preachers, who never felt the work of faith and love to God on their own souls, for want of holy experience, savour not and understand not holy preaching; and therefore spend almost all their time in declaiming against some particular vices, and speaking what they have learned of some virtues of sobriety, justice, or mercy. And when they have done, cover over their ungodly unbelieving course, by reproaching the other who cry down preaching mere morality. True morality, or Christian ethics, is the love of God and man, stirred up by the Spirit of Christ; this faith, exercised in works of piety, justice, charity, and temperance, in view of everlasting happiness in the perfect vision and fruition of God.—BAXTER.

Be Holy.—If you would be a deep divine, I recommend to you sanctification. Fear him, and he shall reveal his covenant to you.—RUTHERFORD.

HEBREW IDYLS.

BY PROFESSOR TENNANT.

NO. III.

MOUNT CARMEL, OR SALLU AND ZAIR.

ON Carmel's hill the morn rose bright,
In all her majesty of light;
But when on his meridian throne
The burning sun sublimely shone,
From ocean's broad and billowy face,
A sullen vapour rose apace,
And stole from sea to sky; and spread
Its darkness round Mount Carmel's head,
Rolling itself, without a breeze,
Still black and blacker from the seas:
And when the sun, on downward way,
Sunk in the western scale of day,
Then broke the gloomy cloud on high,
Then roll'd the thunder round the sky;
And fiercely fell on hill and dale
The rain-drop and the stone of hail;
While God's bright arrows, earthward hurl'd,
Went forth in terror round the world.

The shepherds, that on plain or steep
All the day long had fed their sheep,
Now or to cave or cottage fly,
To shun that ruin of the sky.

On Carmel's western side there stands
A grove unheven by mortal hands;
Fram'd from the first, when, at command
Of God, the waters left the land,
And hills, to greet the sun, peer'd forth,
With the first tidings of their birth.
Spacious the place; its opening wide;
O'erlooking far both shore and tide;
Whence, when the heaven shone pure, was seen
Philistia's boundless beauty green,
Fair cities topt with golden spire,
And white-wing'd vessels bound for Tyre.
Around its lips of rugged stone
The wild vine, ramblingly o'ergrown,
Her long loose tendrils curl'd within,
O'erweaving all its roof with green.
In front, a fir-tree, branching high,
Heav'd, heav'nwards, its cool canopy,
Whereon the stork had built his nest,
His breeze-fann'd citadel of rest;
Nor wanted, in the deep retreat,
Refreshing draughts for summer's heat;
For from the inmost rock, a spring,
With music wildly murmuring,
Gush'd out, translucent, cool, and bright,
Its living silver to the light.

Thither, impell'd by storm, repair
Two shepherds, virtuous, youthful, fair,
Lovers of song, belov'd by God,
Admirers of his works abroad:
Sallu, the one, whose soul's delight
Was God in beauty, love, and light;
The other Zair, who joy'd to see
God in his awe and majesty.

Their seats of stone they took; they strung
Their harps; and thus alternate sung:—

SALLU.

Awake, my harp! my glory, wake!
God, in his beauty, bids thee speak:
The bright-beam'd morn, that rose to-day,
Lives in my soul, t' enblaze my lay;
The storm, now blotting day with night,
Though dark, blots not my spirit's light.

ZAIR.

Awake, my harp! my glory, wake!
God, in his terror, bids thee speak

I saw to-day the sun arise ;
I saw the tempest change the skies ;
I mark'd, with joy, the dawning light,
But mark'd the storm with more delight.

SALLU.

O, who can see, o'er dewy earth,
The sun walk like a bridegroom forth,
Heaven's starry hosts retiring all,
Whilst he enkindles up their hall ;
His march of light, his wheels of fire—
Who may behold, and not admire !

ZAIR.

O, who can see, o'er land and flood,
The tempest waft his charged cloud,
His gloomy skirts with whirlwind riven,
His arrows rending earth and heaven,
His rain, his hail, his sheets of fire—
Who may behold, and not admire !

SALLU.

My joy is noon, when fields and hills,
And mountains with their thousand rills,
Lie sleeping in the sun-shine bright,
As in a golden flood of light :
Glory then seems, as with a robe,
T' enwrap the mountain-studded globe.

ZAIR.

My joy is night, when darkness fills
Heaven's star-bung vault, and hides the hills ;
Man's labours then all disappear,
But God's great works shine out more clear ;
One sun but flaunts, by day, with light,
Ten thousand meekly shine by night.

SALLU.

I joy to see from Carmel's head,
The ocean in her calmness spread ;
Her depths, that like a mirror lie,
Giving the bright sun back his sky ;
Her waves, that twinkle o'er the strand,
With foam-streaks silvering all the sand.

ZAIR.

I joy to see from Carmel's steep,
Eachaf'd to energy the deep ;
Her surges rolling up the shore
Immense their foamy volumes hoar ;
Her mass of mighty waters far,
High-heaved, with every wind at war.

SALLU.

My joy is Kishon's stream ; what day
She, in her purest, gentlest, play,
Steals to the sea ; and each sweet wave,
As loth her rich-clad banks to leave,
Kisses th' o'erhanging lilies fair,
That love to dip and flourish there.

ZAIR.

When Tabor's winter-torrents, fed
By rains that beat the mountain's head,
Send Kishon's stream resounding down,
O'erflooding vineyard, field, and town ;
Her rage, her lifted voice, her might,
Though dire, are then my soul's delight.

SALLU.

When over Gilead's hills afar,
Comes, like a bride, the morning star,
And from her silver-fringed lap,
Flings beams that God's glad world inwrap ;
Yet heralding a greater light,
That star of morn is my delight.

ZAIR.

When over Shur's dry land afar,
Lours, red and long, the hairy star,
And, in his car of terror, scuds
To hide him in the western floods ;
I see, with joy, our God on high—
That guides that giant through the sky,

SALLU.

Sweet is to me the day of spring,
When the crane soars, and turtles sing ;
When the clouds melt in heaven serene,
And mountains glitter in their green,
And rills through rows of roses glide,
And valleys ring from side to side.

ZAIR.

Yet winter's day to me has mirth,
When cold's fierce power is o'er the earth ;
When blasts blow loud from Hermon's hill,
And snows the ways and sheep-cotes fill,
And shepherds shivering, home retire,
To sit and sing by cottage fire.

SALLU.

Mount Zion's heights are green and fair ;
Glorious th' Almighty's temple there ;
His courts with holy beauty gleam,
That shines from mid the cherubim ;
Mercy and love there wave the wing ;
His people clap their hands and sing.

ZAIR.

Sublime was Sinai's top, when God,
In thunder sent his law abroad ;
Black, round the hill, the vapours hung ;
Fierce, as from furnace, flames were flung ;
The trumpet blew ; th' Almighty spoke ;
And Sinai quaked mid fire and smoke.

SALLU.

O thou my harp ! thy God confess ;
Him, in his goodness, laud and bless ;
'Twas he that built these heavens immense,
The palace of his residence ;
And gave to man this earth, that he
A glimpse of his vast love might see.

ZAIR.

O thou, my harp ! thy God confess ;
Extol him in his mightiness :
These heavens, this earth, shall at his voice
Burst their great chain with fearful noise ;
And man shall meet new heavens, new earth,
Born to a new and better birth.

SALLU.

Be hush'd, my harp ! for now behold,
The sun's unconquer'd shafts of gold
Have pierced the thunder-freighted cloud
Heavy that hung o'er field and flood ;
Hill, hamlet, city, gleam again,
Sparkling with gems of sunny rain.

ZAIR.

Be hush'd, my harp ! the thunder's car
Has pass'd to Hermon's hills afar ;
Be hush'd, for hark, the turtle's voice
Rings loud, and bids the woods rejoice ;
Earth's beauty, burnish'd by the rain,
Invites us to our flocks again.

Thus sung they, on their seats of stone,
Alternate, to the harp's sweet tone :
They rose ;—for gone was now the rain ;
Heaven, earth, and sea, were bright again ;
The rainbow's spangled arms were seen
Enclasping Tabor's summits green ;
Flocks shook the rain-drops from the fleece,
Refresh'd, and brows'd again in peace ;
The stork cry'd joy down from his tree ;
The turtle coo'd in harmony ;
The swallow, skimming Carmel's height,
Twitter'd forth gladness in his flight :
There seem'd a peal of joy to rise
From earth, to re-salute the skies.

The shepherds rose :—their way they took,
Forth from that grotto in the rock,
To tend their bleating ones again,
On Carmel's flowery slope and plain,
Yet gemm'd and sparkling with the rain,

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Christian Hero.—When in the year 1665, London was desolated with the plague, when all who had the means of abandoning its contaminated walls had retired into the country, and when the living who could not remove, were deprived of the ordinances, and the dying of the consolations, of religion, Mr Thomas Vincent, a minister of Christ, declared to his brethren a resolution to which he had been brought, and upon which he was determined to act, which justly entitles him to the appellation of a Christian hero. With a noble magnanimity he declared, that it was absolutely necessary, that such vast numbers of dying people should have some spiritual assistance; that he could have no equal prospect of usefulness in the exercise of his ministry to whatever period his life might be protracted; that he had carefully examined the state of his own soul, and could look death in the face without dismay; and that he solemnly devoted himself on this affecting and awful occasion to the cause of God and of souls. With sublime self-devotion, he entered the contaminated city; every Lord's day through the whole visitation he preached in some pariah church: to all that sent for him, in whatever state of the disorder they might be, he repaired, and presented them with the Word of truth; the most extensive and beneficial effects were produced by his ministry; and multitudes passed into eternity blessing God for the instructions which he afforded. And he was signally protected by the providence of God, he was not abandoned by his great Master. That promise was fulfilled to him, "Thou shalt not be afraid for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor the destruction that wasteth at noon day. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not come nigh thee." Though nearly seventy thousand persons died in that year of the plague, and seven persons were numbered among its victims in the house where he lived, yet he continued in perfect health all the time, and lived to see the cessation of the dreadful ravages of the disease.

Consistency in Duty has the best Effects.—The following is one of the most interesting circumstances in the life of the late very eccentric and very excellent John Ryland, Baptist minister at Northampton. Being on a journey, he was overtaken by a violent storm, and compelled to take shelter in the first inn he came to. The people of the house treated him with great kindness and hospitality. They would fain have shown him into a parlour, but being very wet and cold, he begged permission rather to take a seat by the fire-side with the family. The good old man was friendly, cheerful, and well stored with entertaining anecdotes, and the family did their utmost to make him comfortable: they all supped together, and both the residents and the guest seemed mutually pleased with each other. At length, when the house was cleared, and the hour of rest approached, the stranger appeared uneasy, and looked up every time a door opened, as if expecting something essential to his comfort. His host informed him that his chamber was prepared whenever he chose to retire. "But," said he, "you have not had your family together." "Had my family together! for what purpose? I don't know what you mean;" said the landlord. "To read the Scriptures, and to pray with them," replied the guest: "surely you do not retire to rest in the omission of so necessary a duty." The landlord confessed that he never thought of doing such a thing. "Then, sir," said Mr R., "I must beg you to order my horse immediately." The landlord and family entreated him not to expose himself to the inclemency of the weather at that late hour of the night; observing that the storm was as violent as when he first came in. "May be so," replied Mr R., "but I had rather brave the storm than venture to sleep in a house where there is no prayer.

Who can tell what may befall us before morning? No, sir, I dare not stay." The landlord still remonstrated, and expressing great regret that he should offend so agreeable a gentleman, at last said, he should have no objection to "call his family together," but he should not know what to do when they came. Mr R. then proposed to conduct family worship, to which all readily consented. The family was immediately assembled, and then Mr R. called for a Bible; but no such book could be produced. However, he was enabled to supply the deficiency, as he always carried a small Bible or Testament in his pocket. He read a small portion of Scripture, and then prayed with much fervour and solemnity, especially acknowledging the preserving goodness of God, that none present had been struck dead by the storm, and imploring protection through the night. He earnestly prayed that the attention of all might be awakened to the things belonging to their everlasting peace, and that the family might never again meet in the morning, or separate at night, without prayer. When he rose from his knees, almost every individual present was bathed in tears, and the inquiry was awakened in several hearts—"Sir, what must I do to be saved?" Much interesting and profitable conversation ensued. The following morning, Mr R. again conducted family worship, and obtained from the landlord a promise, that however feebly performed, it should not in future be omitted. This day was indeed the beginning of days to that family; moe, if not all of them, became decided and devoted followers of the Lord Jesus Christ, and were the means of diffusing a knowledge of the Gospel in a neighbourhood which had before been proverbially dark and destitute. "A word spoken in season, how good is it!" "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good."

Mr Kilpin.—The father of the late Rev. S. Kilpin of Exeter, was an ironmonger, and kept a general retail shop in that line. A nobleman in the neighbourhood was among his best customers. One Lord's day morning, the steward came to the house, and said, with an insolent sneer, "Are you afraid of the devil, Mr Kilpin?" "No," replied the good man, "I am not." "Will you then sell me some articles to-day?" "No, I will not; it is the Sabbath day, and the God of the Sabbath I love and fear. To-morrow I shall feel much obliged by executing his lordship's orders." "Very well, if you will not serve me to-day, you shall not to-morrow, or on any other day." The steward then retired in a violent rage. This scene was never forgotten by the young family group; and it is pleasing to be able to add, that the nobleman increased his favours when told of the circumstance.

ON THE SECURITY OF THE DIVINE PROMISES TO THE CHURCH OF CHRIST.

BY THE REV. ROBERT HOUSTON, A. M.,

LIVE by faith, is the Christian's rule. In reference to the Church, this will bear the definition,—exercise a firm reliance upon the security of the divine promises. This is necessary,

I. To confirm our expectation of the coming of Christ's kingdom in the latter days. The history of the past presents us with a melancholy series of departures from the truth, or corruptions of its simplicity and purity. Each new revelation, enlightening for a time, has been followed by a season of darkness and corruption. This hath been the record of all ages, so that from the past, we have no encouragement to judge favourably of the future regarding man. Any argument founded upon analogy, would go to overthrow our hopes of a period of universal enlightenment—would repress every expectation of the rising of a sun which should never set—of the shining of a day of divine truth which shall be succeeded by no night. The antediluvian world, notwithstanding the fearful record of the fall, sunk into universal degeneracy. After the administration of the appalling lesson of the divine justice presented by the flood, the world soon again departed from the one living and true God. And were we to follow the history of Israel's posterity, we would find how apposite in the mouth of every one of those raised up to them, time after time, as deliverers or instructors, had been the saying of Moses to the assembled multitudes of the people, in his charge to them just before his death, "I know, that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you."—Deut. xxxi. 29. From the New Testament history, the same results may be gathered. The cities and lauds enlightened by the apostles, are now overspread with darkness as before, or debased by the most fearful perversions of divine truth. The seven Churches would need to be born again to be as once they were. And, in later days, the scenes of most memorable reformation are now darkened by superstition, or have become the hot-beds of heresies and infidelity. In Italy and Spain, the light arose but to flicker, and fade, and die. In France, it gave a bright but evanescent flash. In Geneva, the fatherland of our own Church, the faith which Calvin preached, is now rejected and vilified. And what would be the inference which were we ignorant of any other guide to point our expectations to a brighter prospect, would naturally be drawn from all this? It could be nothing else than this, that there is a periodic rise and fall in a nation's Christianity, as there has been uniformly in the secular prosperity and intelligence of all nations. And what would be the inference as applied to our own Christianity, but that the day was approaching when it, too, shall pass away? And how would it bear upon the Christianity of the lands beginning to be enlightened? How, but to awaken the disheartening feeling, that when their sun had risen to a certain height, it also should decline and sink into the shades of night. Perhaps it may be said, there are new elements in the constitution of society now, which shall prevent these periodic revolutions in sentiment and faith. It is a sufficient answer to this, that no such elements have been proved in the past, to warrant such expectations being certainly founded upon them. But surely this state of things corresponds not to the Christian's hopes. He looks for something else in the future than the past hath presented. He looks for a time when the Sun of Righteousness shall shed his enlivening beams over all lands; when the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, and all the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. But it is not by sight,—by looking upon the past history of the world,—that he is led to form this expectation. It is by faith, by reliance upon the sure fulfilment of the divine promises;—against hope, against all the expectation which the experience of the past would warrant: he therefore believes in hope; and, looking to the infallible security of the divine faithfulness which the sacrifice of God's own Son supplies, and the sure foundation of hope which is thereby laid, he staggers not at any promise, how contradictory soever it may seem to past experience, but can, and does, rejoice in the certainty which no adverse circumstances can affect, that there shall be a time when none shall have occasion to say to his neighbour, "Know the Lord; but all shall know Him, from the least even unto the greatest." The promise of God standeth sure. The Christian's faith is the firmest, when he looks away from the calculations of human agencies to the divine agent, in verifying the divine promises, and the security of the ultimate triumph of that which the divine purposes have determined. He despises not, nor overlooks the duty of the most zealous and persevering human agency; for,

II. His faith in the fulfilment of the divine promises, is that which quickens his activity in labouring in the Redeemer's cause, while he knows that for all his planting and watering, God alone can give the increase; it is the certainty of this increase in the fulfilment of the divine promises, that stimulates him to plant and water the more. When the Christian looks at the little, at the less than nothing, human might and power have accomplished, or are able to accomplish in evangelising the world, he loses all confidence in the achievements of such an agency. With the loss of confidence in it, he feels the hopelessness of its employment, and when hope dies, exertion ceases. In any enterprise the cheerfulness of the mind and the activity of all the powers correspond to the hope of success. With the decay of hope, the moving power of man's activity perishes. But upon what can the Christian found a sure and abiding expectation of the success of the Gospel, but upon the divine promises? The past history of the world gives no hope, but these give every hope. In these, therefore, is found, that which was needed to awaken the Christian's efforts in the cause of the Redeemer, but, having the security they afford, and relying upon it, he has all to quicken him to an activity which shall never weary, and to animate him to exertions which shall never flag. Is he sure of success, and shall he not be instant in season and out of season in the Lord's work? It is not revealed to him that in the particular enterprize he hath meditated, he shall be successful, in exactly the form, and to the extent, and in the time he desires, but he knows that, whatever may be the result, it shall be, in the hands of the Sovereign Ruler of all things, one step farther in advance toward the glorious consummation for which we are taught to pray, and for which we are encouraged, by the security of the divine promises, to labour, when the will of God shall "be done on earth as it is done in heaven."

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord, shall this be accomplished." This gives a security of a divine agency being manifested in the establishment of the Redeemer's kingdom, which may well animate every heart, and nerve every hand. The missionary of the cross goes not a warfare on his own charges. He who sends him says, "Lo, I am with thee always even to the end of the world." And all are missionaries of the cross who, in their several spheres, come to the help of the Lord against the mighty. They so run, therefore, not as uncertainly; so fight they not as one that beateth the air. They sow in hope, content that others reap, knowing that the increase promised shall, in God's good time, be bestowed, and that they who sow and they who reap shall rejoice together. Let us, therefore, amid the varying aspects of worldly things, abound in hope, and, amid all the difficulties of time, be animated to duty by the security of the divine promises. "The God of heaven shall set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces all the kingdoms, in the days of which it shall be set up, and it shall stand for ever."—Dan. ii. 44. And we shall reap if we faint not. And we shall rest, and stand in our lot at the end of the days.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF
LATE LORD BISHOP OF CALCUTTA.

THIS devoted and truly Christian labourer in the Lord's vineyard was born April 21, 1788, at Malpas, in the county of Chester. In early life his constitution was delicate, and it was severely tried by several successive attacks of disease. It pleased God, however, in answer to the prayers of his affectionate and pious parents, to raise him up from his bed of sickness, and to protract a life destined to be so eminently useful in the cause of the Redeemer. The utmost attention was paid in his childhood to the cultivation of his mind, and more especially to the inculcation of pious sentiments and feelings. And the result was in the highest degree gratifying. At five years of age he could read the Bible with ease, and so extensive was his knowledge of its contents, that he could in most cases tell with the utmost readiness where any passage was to be found. Nor was his knowledge unattended with serious impressions. In the course of one of those attacks of sickness, to which he was so frequently subject in his tender years, he remarked, on seeing his mother in a state of much alarm, "Do not be afraid, mother, God will take care of us."

At the age of eight, Reginald was sent to Whitchurch Grammar School, where he remained for five years, and was subsequently placed under the care of the Rev. Mr Bristow at Neasdon, near London. While at school, a circumstance occurred which shewed how intently he could apply his mind to any subject in which he felt interested. On one occasion a new book having been presented to him by a friend, he began to peruse it just as they were closing the school for the night; and so absorbed was he in its contents, that he was locked up in the school, and did not discover his situation till the darkness of the evening coming on, roused him from his abstraction.

The influence of parental example produced a most salutary effect upon the amiable and susceptible mind of young Heber. He was remarked at school as a boy of intelligence and reflection far beyond his years. Though naturally timid and reserved, perhaps to a fault, he was beloved by his companions, and when at any time contrary feelings were manifested towards him, he speedily disarmed the rising enmity, by the meekness and kindness of heart which he uniformly displayed. Dispositions so attractive were by no means the spontaneous manifestations of a naturally gentle constitution; they were evidently the result of a divine operation in the soul. And hence we find the same ardent piety, the same attachment to the sacred volume, the same scrupulous attention to the duties of devotion at Newson as when under his father's roof. The Bible was his daily and constant companion, and though strictly conscientious in his preparation for the employments of the school, he never neglected to consult that precious book, which alone could make him "wise unto salvation."

Anxious to embrace every opportunity of making progress in religious knowledge, he eagerly perused those works on devotional and practical divinity, in which his father's library so liberally abounded. An interesting incident, connected with this subject, is thus stated in the concise and well written life of Heber, by Mr Taylor:—

"One day, when Reginald was at the age of fourteen, his mother missed her 'Companion to the Altar;' search was made for it among all the servants, but it was nowhere to be found. After three weeks' fruitless inquiry, it was given up as lost, till at length she happened to mention it to Reginald, who immediately brought it to her, stating that it had deeply interested him, that he had made himself perfectly acquainted with its contents; and he earnestly begged permission to accompany his mother to the altar, when the sacrament was next administered. Penetrated with gratitude to God, for giving her so pious a son, Mrs Heber burst into tears of joy, and, as we may well be assured, cheerfully assented to his request."

Toward the close of 1800, Reginald left school, and was entered at Brazen-Nose College, Oxford, where his father had been; and his eldest brother was then, a fellow. His eminent talents, and fine taste, soon attracted notice, and the very first year he gained the university prize for Latin verse. His fame, however, rose still higher by the splendid specimens of his poetic powers which he gave in his English prize poem, entitled "Palestine." About the time when young Heber produced this noble effort of his genius, Sir Walter Scott happened to be on a visit to Oxford. Being invited to take breakfast in the College, the conversation naturally turned upon the prize poem, and on Sir Walter's expressing a wish to hear it, it was read. Sir Walter paid its author some very high compliments, remarking, however, with the utmost kindness, that Heber had omitted one striking fact in describing the building of the temple, that no tools were used in its erection. Reginald instantly availed himself of the hint, and retiring to a corner of the room, produced in a short time those beautiful lines:—

"No hammer fell, no ponderous axes rung;
Like some tall palm, the mystic fabric sprung.
Majestic silence!"

When called upon to recite his poem in the presence of the whole University, his friends were afraid that, from his natural timidity, he would scarcely do justice to it in the delivery. In this, however, they were agreeably disappointed.

"Never was a poem recited," says Mr Taylor, "more impressively, nor with more striking effect. His youthful, but most interesting appearance, none who had the happiness to be present could ever forget: his unaffected simplicity, associated, as it evidently was, with a suitable portion of manly dignity, rivetted the attention of all; while the rich tones of his musical voice, modulated as they were with exquisite skill, so as to give the most effect to the different parts of the poem, excited a universal hurst of admiration, and left an impression on the minds of his auditors, never to be effaced.

"Hush'd was the busy hum, nor voice nor sound,
Through the vast concourse, marked the moment near;
A deep and holy silence breath'd around,
And mute attention fix'd the list'ning ear,
When from the rostrum burst the hallow'd strain,
And Heber, kindling with poetic fire,
Stood 'mid the gazing and expectant train,
And woke to eloquence his sacred lyre.
The youthful student, with emphatic tone,
(His lofty subject on his mind impress'd,)
With grace and energy unrival'd above,
And rous'd devotion in each thoughtless breast.
He sang of Palestine—that holy land,
Where saints and martyrs, and the warrior brave,
The cross in triumph planting on its strand,
Beneath its banners sought a glorious grave.
He sang of Calvary, of his Saviour's pang,
Of the rich mercies of redeeming love;
When through the crowd spontaneous plaudits rang,
Breathing a foretaste of rewards above."

"Among the auditors who listened to this splendid exhibition of Reginald's powers was his aged father, then in his seventy-fifth year; who, though he had long been suffering under a severe illness, which had greatly debilitated his whole frame, determined to gratify himself by witnessing this literary effort of his darling boy. To describe his feelings on this occasion, with any degree of accuracy, would be impossible; they can be much better conceived than expressed. Tremblingly alive, as he, of course, must have been, to his son's reputation, his emotions, when he saw him ascend the rostrum, were almost overpowering. He well knew the sensibility of which Reginald was the subject, and his apprehensions, lest it should prove injurious to him on this occasion, were not a little distressing. When, however, the youthful poet commenced, they gradually subsided, disappearing entirely as he proceeded; and producing, amidst the deafening shouts of applause that rose from the delighted audience, a rush of feelings so highly gratifying as to be almost too much for his feeble power to sustain. Indeed, it has been stated, though certainly not with truth, that the venerable parent's days were shortened by the intensity of his sensations on the occasion."

What wonder would it have been though the youthful victor had retired from the theatre of the University, on such an occasion, with a heart elated with pride! Far different, indeed, was the effect produced upon the mind of Heber. He hastened to his room to pour out his heart in thanksgiving to God, who had given him success; and when his mother, who had come along with his father to Oxford, sought for her son to mingle her congratulations with those of others, she found him on his knees, praising God for the degree of enjoyment which his beloved parents had that day experienced.

In a few months after the intellectual triumph which Heber had thus obtained, he was visited with a most severe trial in the death of his aged father. The peaceful serenity, however, and holy resignation of the good old man on his death-bed, tended, in a great measure, to mitigate the anguish which he would otherwise have felt. It is painful, inexpressibly painful, to witness the expiring agonies of an unconverted sinner; but "precious in the sight of the Lord," and, it may be added, beautiful; even in the sight of angels and of men, is "the death of" the Almighty's "saints." Such a one was the father of the apostolic Heber. His last moments are thus described by Mr Taylor:—

"Whenever his strength would permit, he took great pleasure in conversing with his family on the great subjects of religion. He spoke of the world as a den of wild beasts, and affectionately cautioned his children to beware of its dangers, earnestly praying that God would graciously preserve them from all its entanglements. On seeing Mrs Heber, whose kind and unremitting attentions to him had been such, that she had not exchanged her clothes for some weeks, overwhelmed with grief at the evident symptoms that now appeared of his approaching end, he kindly, and with great feeling, admonished her for sorrowing as one without hope, assuring her that he stood upon the Rock of Ages, and had no doubt of obtaining, through the merits of the Redeemer, a crown of immortality and glory. The next day he received the sacrament, in which he was joined by his family. This most interesting service, and the closing scene of his father's life, Mr Heber thus describes:—'On the arrival of Mr Bridge, we all partook of the most solemn communion that we can ever expect to join in in this world, to which indeed my father seemed scarcely to belong. A smile sat on his pale countenance, and his eyes sparkled brighter than I ever saw them. From this time he spoke but little; his lips moved, and his eyes were raised upwards. He blessed us again; we kissed him, and found his cheeks cold and breathless.'"

Shortly after the death of his father, which occurred in 1804, Heber returned to college, and pursued his studies with unremitting diligence. On the 2d November of that year, he was elected a fellow of All-Souls' College—a situation in which he enjoyed increased opportunities of making progress in literary acquirements. In the following year he carried off the prize for an English Essay on "The Sense of Honour."

Though as yet only in his twenty-second year, he had seen but little of the world, and his relatives judged it expedient that he should accompany his esteemed friend, John Thornton, Esq., on a tour through different parts of Europe. He accordingly, in July 1805, set sail with his companion for Norway. They then travelled through Sweden, Russia, Austria, and part of Germany. After an absence of little more than a year, he returned to England, where he was gladly welcomed by his affectionate relatives and friends. He now repaired to Oxford, and applied himself, with his accustomed diligence, to his studies.

In the summer of 1807, after mature deliberation, and much prayer for the divine direction, Mr Heber took orders, and was presented by his brother to the rectory of Hodnet, which had been reserved for him from the time of his father's death. Shortly after his induction, he returned to Oxford, and took his degree of Master of Arts; and from this period he finally quitted the university, and dedicated himself, with unwearied assiduity and zeal, to the duties of his ministerial charge. He was, indeed, "a workman that needed not to be ashamed." In all the varied employments of a faithful pastor, he was diligent, active, conscientious, visiting the sick, counselling the perplexed, ministering to the wants of the poor, and pouring the balm of consolation into the wounded spirit. To the poorest of his flock he was at all times accessible, sympathising with them in their sorrows, and with all the tenderness of an affectionate friend, relieving their temporal necessities, and taking occasion, at the same time, to point out to them the way to happiness and heaven.

Shortly after Mr Heber was settled at Hodnet, he married Amelia, the youngest daughter of the late Dr Shipley, dean of St Asaph—a lady who entered warmly into all his plans for the benefit of his parish. He now opened a school in the village for the instruction of the young, and devoted a considerable time to its personal superintendence. The following instance of good resulting from his labours is exceedingly interesting, and shows Mr Heber in a very beautiful and striking light:—

"An old man resided in the parish, who had been a notorious poacher nearly all his life, and who, through the combined influence of his irregular mode of life, drunken habits, and depraved associates, had settled down into an irreligious old age. He was a widower, had survived his children, shunned all society, and was rarely seen abroad. The sole inmate of his lonely cottage was a little grandchild, on whom were bound up all the sympathies of his rugged nature, and on whom he lavished the warmest caresses. It was considered an unaccountable departure from his usual line of conduct, when he permitted little Philip to attend the rector's school, and some one expressed to him surprise that such should be the case:—'Why not?' was the old man's reply. 'Do you think I wish Philip to be as bad as myself? I am black enough, God knows!' The old man was taken ill and confined to his room. It was winter; he was unable to divert his mind. His complaint was a painful one, and there was every probability that his illness might be of long continuance. A neighbour suggested that his little grandson should read to him. He listened at first languidly and carelessly; by and bye, however, with some interest, till at length he became deeply concerned for his soul: convictions of guilt flashed upon his mind, and he expressed an earnest desire to see Mr Heber. Immediately on its being made known to the rector, he paid him a visit. The old man lay upon his bed in a corner of the room, near a trellised window. His features were naturally hard and coarse, and the marked lines of his countenance were distinctly developed by the strong light which fell upon them. Aged and enfeebled as he was, he seemed fully alive to what was passing around him; 'and I had,' says the narrator of this anecdote, 'leisure to mark the searching of his eye, while he gazed with the most intense anxiety on his spiritual comforter, and weighed every word that fell from his lips. The simple phraseology in which Heber clothed every idea, the facility with which he descended to the old man's comprehension, the earnestness with which he strove not to be misunderstood, and the manner in which, in spite of himself, his voice occasionally faltered, as he adverted delicately, but faithfully and most affectionately, to the fundamental points of our holy religion, struck me forcibly; while Philip stood on the other side of the bed, his hand locked in his grandfather's, his bright blue eye dimmed with tears, as he looked sadly and anxiously from one face to another, evidently aware that some misfortune awaited him, though unconscious to what extent. Not long afterwards the old man died, in a state of mind so calm, so subdued, so penitent, and resigned, that 'I feel myself cheered in my labours,' said Heber, 'whenever I reflect upon it.' Heber officiated at the funeral; and, says our narrator, 'I shall never forget, I never wish to forget; if I were cast to-morrow on a desert island, it is one of the few things I should wish to remember of the world I had left behind me, the air, the manner, the look, the expression of hope and holy joy, and stedfast confidence, which lit up Heber's countenance, as he pronounced the passage in the ritual, 'O Father, raise us from the death of sin into the life of righteousness, that when we shall depart this life we may rest in thee, as our hope is this our brother doth."

A MINISTER'S NEW YEAR'S GIFT TO HIS PARISHIONERS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

PART II.

"Beloved, I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health."—3 JOHN, 2.

HAVING exhorted you, my friend, to read the Scriptures under the constant impression that they are addressed to you as a sinner, with an impartial application of them to your own character and condition, and earnest prayer for the blessing of God to make all your reading subservient to your growth in grace, and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ, I would recommend to you, in the second place, the practice of secret prayer, as another important means for cherishing and establishing the power of religion in your mind. I am not now wishing you to consider prayer in the light of a duty, for I take it for granted that you allow it to be a most reasonable service, for a rational creature, to acknowledge his derived and dependent condition, and to consecrate himself to the glory of Him in whom he lives, and moves, and has his being, as well as for a sinner redeemed by grace, to dedicate himself, with all the capacities of his new nature, to the divine author of his salvation. But I am speaking of prayer as a means of confirming and improving your mind in every good and holy principle and practice; and the more that you consider it, the more will you perceive that it must be productive of the best and happiest fruits. In all the sentiments which enter into the exercises of devotion, it is God himself with whom we have special concern; and in the private and unobserved devotions of the closet, it must be, in the nature of things, that these sentiments will have their freest flow,—their most unfettered exercise. Those who have made the greatest advances in the spiritual life, have still reason to lament the deadness of their faith, and the languor of their affections; and if the devotional feelings are so apt to become languid through the inauspicious influence of nature, how much more when they are called into exercise amid the bustle of the world and the distractions of society. I may appeal to every reader who has attended to the state of his own heart, whether, in those moments when he was most ready to resign himself to the glowing impulse of devotion in the sanctuary, he has not often found the pursuits and objects of the world obtruding upon him, to dissipate and materialize his mind; and what, then, can be better adapted to counteract this unhappy influence, and to keep alive in the mind the ethereal flame of piety, than frequently to retire into the privacy of the closet, where there is no eye to witness, and no ear to hear you, but the eye and the ear of God; and when the very consciousness of being alone with Him, will summon up to your mind a livelier impression of the divine presence, and check the rise of every sinful emotion, and inspire you with a holy fear of thinking or doing any thing that will expose you to his displeasure. And then, again, secret prayer is attended with this additional advantage, that it admits of the greatest particularity. In conducting the devotions of the sanctuary, or even of the family circle, there is a necessity of shaping the supplications in that general language, and limiting them to those general views, which are common to the character and state of all. There must be general acknowledgments of praise, and general confessions of sin, and a regard must, in some measure, be paid to those proprieties of thought and expression, which may recommend them to the taste and the acquiescence of others. But in secret prayer, some of the greatest advantages of which it is productive will be lost, if there is a studious conformity to these limitations; if, in presenting your addresses at the throne of grace, you are satisfied with the bare offering of a general supplication, or with presenting a general petition for the blessings of grace. If you are acquainted with your own character, as your daily experience must, in some measure, have made you, you ought to form your petitions with an especial reference to the defects and imperfections of which you are conscious, and to the particular duties to which you are called. If you have the prospect of any particular duty before you, which either your ordinary station, or specific circumstances, require you to perform, you should pray for the grace which will fit you for the right discharge of that duty; or if you are beset by any particular temptation, you should pray for the appropriate assistance from on high, to enable you to surmount it; or if you are deficient, or weak, in any particular virtue, you should pray that you may be guided and supported in your endeavours to acquire it. In such a way, you can make a full and circumstantial enumeration of all your wants at the throne of grace; and while the very fact of your unbosoming your mind to God, will tend to quicken and elevate your desires, you will find that a special blessing will follow your exercise—such as will provide you with an effectual preparation for all the duties and trials of life. Such has been the uniform experience of all who have walked with God, and sought his counsel and his aid. Alfred, though charged with the cares of an extensive empire, devoted a third part of every day to study and devotion; and he frequently acknowledged, that but for the moral energy he derived from this habit, he would have sunk under the multiplied difficulties by which he was surrounded. Luther, who raised the banner of the Reformation, wrote more treatises, engaged in more controversies, and maintained a more extensive correspondence on the affairs of the Church, than any of his contemporaries. His whole life appeared to be an incessant scene of agitation, and tumult, and public business, for which his mind must have been wholly inadequate, but for the extraordinary resources by which he was fortified; for this man, whom the world knew only as a busy and unwearied disputant, "employed three of his very best hours every day in prayer."—(Milner.) Dr Boerhaave, who had to perform all the varied and laborious duties that are peculiar to a physician of extensive practice in a great city, made it his daily practice through life, to retire for an hour, as soon as he rose in the morning, to private prayer and meditation. This, he often told his friends, gave him spirits and vigour for the active business of the day. And to mention only one example more, the celebrated Dr Beattie, who was tried with a series of domestic afflictions, more severe than has fallen to the lot of many, was enabled, through the constant practice of private devotion, to display a devout acquiescence in the divine will, and an unruffled cheerfulness, which animated and supported his afflicted family.

In these remarks upon prayer as a means of grace, I have considered you, my reader, exclusively as an individual; but if you are the head of a family, and have children and servants under your care, I would impress it upon you, that the same advantages which this religious exercise will secure for yourself, you ought, from duty and love, to seek to obtain for them, by engaging in the regular exercise of family devotion. It is the beneficent arrangement of Providence, to commit the infancy and youth of man to the care of a parent—a faithful and affectionate friend, in order that he may cherish the tender plant, and give direction and strength to its opening blossoms; and what means is more likely, from its nature, or more approved by experience, to aid a parent in the labour of love to his child or dependent, than frequently to assemble those intrusted to his charge, to read to them the instructions of the Word of God, and to unite together in thanksgivings and supplications to that great Being from whom they derived their common existence, and on whom they acknowledge a common dependence for the bounties of his providence and the blessings of his grace. The advantages resulting from the establishment of this domestic practice, are indeed obvious and manifold, and bear on the world that now is, as well as on that which is to come. It is the best way of preparing your family for the duties and the intercourse of the present world; for what method can be so effectual for the accomplishment of an object so dear to every parent's heart, as by training them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, by enlightening them with a knowledge of his claims, and by impressing them with a reverence for his authority? Not that a knowledge of the one, or a reverence for the other, will impart that acquaintance with the principles and practice of the profession, or the art, they are to follow, or will compensate for the want of that knowledge of men and things which can only be acquired by the actual business and experience of the world; but there is a diligence in worldly business, without which natural and acquired skill will be of little avail; and there is a sense of fidelity, the want of which no professional eminence can supply; and there is an integrity of character, which must be carried throughout all the transactions of life, and for which no fertility of mental resources, no facility of manual execution, will be accepted as a substitute; and how can these be given to your children so well, as by training them up in the knowledge and the fear of God? How can diligence in their worldly calling be enforced upon them so well, as by the consideration, that they are thereby complying with the will of God, and fulfilling the duties of that sphere which he has assigned them? How can fidelity to their earthly master be secured so well, as by impressing them with the practical remembrance, that they have a Master in heaven, that His eye is continually upon them, although they may be beyond the observation of man; and that every act of unfaithfulness, even in the least and most trivial concerns, will be displeasing to Him, to whom all must render an account? How can their integrity of character be promoted so well, as by displaying to them the moral perfections of God, by leading them to contemplate the excellence of that mind which was in Christ, and by bringing them into contact with all those principles of purity and spiritual mindedness, which form the true elements of a good, and upright, and virtuous character? How can they, in short, be so well equipped with all that is necessary for the journey of life, and fitted so well for all the varieties of action and trial that will chequer their future experience, as by interweaving the idea of God with the whole frame-work of their moral nature, by leading them to connect Him with all their associations of thought and feeling, and by furnishing them with an early knowledge of his word, and an early habit of praying for his blessing? But it is principally in regard to their interests in a future and eternal world, that the establishment of prayer in your family is desirable, and attended with advantages so great, that the bare enumeration of them must be sufficient to gain for this practice the favourable regard of every wise and considerate parent and master. For, in the words of the excellent Doddridge, "they will be taught to entertain right conceptions of the being and perfections of God, when they daily hear acknowledgments and prayers addressed to him—their hearts will be impressed with a sense of the magnitude and demerit of their sins, when they contrast themselves with the purity and spirituality of the divine law—they will learn what blessings to supplicate, and what evils to deplore, when they listen to the mode in which you conduct their devotions—and by the intercessions and prayers you may offer for the general interests and prosperity of man, a spirit of charity and love will be diffused over their minds. The combined effect of a service so interesting and so spiritual, will be to induce them to live more in conformity with the will of God; to grow in wisdom as they grow in years; and to advance from their present imperfect attainments, till they stand perfect and complete in all the will of God." This is evidently no more than a general view of what may be expected to be the result of the practice of family worship, and, like all general views and maxims, is liable to many exceptions; for you must be well aware of many instances where the future career has formed a melancholy contrast to the excellence which marked the commencement of life; and, you know, that even Solomon himself exhibited a woful departure from the path of piety and virtue, in which his godly father had trained him to go. But, notwithstanding the exceptions to which it is liable, the view of Doddridge, as stated above, is not only established by the statements and promises of Scripture, but by the testimony of almost universal experience, that those who have been carefully and piously trained by their parents, have come forward in the path they were trained to go in—that of those who have been suffered to grow up without the knowledge of God and of Christ, by far the greatest part live and die also without hope; for it has been computed, that very few conversions ever take place when the habits are confirmed—and that, in regard to such as have happily come to a late repentance after a long course of previous irreligion and vice, it has been generally those who enjoyed the benefit of a pious education, some part of which, lingering on their memories, was, through the blessing of God, the means of reclaiming them to the ways of duty and salvation. Flavel used to say, that he blessed God for a religious tender father, who often poured out his soul to God for him, and that he esteemed that stock of prayers and blessings above the richest inheritance in the world. It was a memorable saying of Ambrose to the mother of Augustine, when she lamented to him the indisposition which her son at that time displayed to all religious feeling:—"I have never known the son allowed to perish for whose soul so many prayers and holy tears interceded." The biographer of Scott, the author of the well-known Commentary on the Bible, observes, "that his father, who made a constant practice of worshipping God in his family, and who was uniformly careful that it should be more than a mere formality, had the unspeakable satisfaction of knowing, that not only all his children, but all the servants who had been successively under his roof, received impressions of seriousness that remained with them through life."

It remains for me to direct your attention, my friend, to the sanctification of the Sabbath, as an appointed and a powerful means of promoting and establishing religion in your mind. I need not inform you that the observance of the Sabbath, one day in seven, has been appointed by the high authority of God, and that it has been appointed for the promotion of the spiritual interests of man. This, indeed, seems to have been the grand design of it; for the bodily rest, or cessation from labour, which it secures, derives its chief value from its subserviency to those spiritual exercises by which the Sabbath is to be sanctified. Instituted, then, as this day has been, for the advancement of the interests of the soul, it will be an important subject of inquiry with you, as with all who acknowledge the divine authority, and the religious end of the institution, in what way they ought to spend the Sabbath, so as to enjoy the blessings that are suspended on its hallowed uses. The first and most obvious way appears to be, to sanctify the day by a devout observance of the public ordinances of religion, by repairing to the house of God to offer up the appointed sacrifices of prayer and thanksgiving, to listen to the expositions of the Divine Word, and the motives and arguments by which obedience to it is enforced. It was in this way that the people of God, in all ages, have employed themselves on the Sabbath. On that day, under the ancient dispensation, the gates of the temple were opened, and its courts were crowded by the people, for whom sacrifices were offered, and the law was read and expounded in the synagogues. It was on that day also that, after the resurrection of Christ, the apostles and early Christians met together to give thanks for that great event, and to perform other acts of social worship. And if, in furtherance of the high and holy ends for which the Sabbath was instituted, the people of God, of whom we read both in the Old and the New Testament Church, assembled publicly for divine worship on that day, ought not we to spend it in a similar manner, out of reverence for its holy nature, and a sense of its use to our eternal interests?

But although the public worship of the sanctuary be one obvious way of improving the Sabbath to the real object of the institution, it is plain that the exercises peculiar to that place can occupy but a very small part of the sacred day, and that still the important inquiry remains, if one day in seven should be kept holy unto the Lord, how is the larger proportion of it to be spent, which precedes and comes after the interval that is devoted to the sanctuary? If there be any meaning in the language we employ, we must receive the word "day," when applied to the Sabbath, in the same acceptation that it bears when applied to the other portions of the week. But to pursue a round of religious exercises and duties for a period as long as you are accustomed to consume on the labours and concerns of the world, is a task that seems incompatible with the present constitution of our nature, and therefore, perhaps, the rule of observance that is best accordant with reason and the spirit of the Divine Word, is to endeavour to keep your mind always alive to the great end and uses of the Sabbath. For, as a traveller who is bending his way to some distant place, may stop for his refreshment at different stages, yet never relax his efforts, nor divert his mind from the end of his journey, so you may keep the spiritual end of the Sabbath in view, even although you cannot be uninterruptedly engaged in the duties to which it is specially dedicated, if, at the same time, you endeavour, with all earnestness, to avoid every thing in thought and conversation which either does not directly bear on your spiritual improvement, or that is evidently injurious to it; and just as a traveller will be impatient of every delay, and shorten his necessary stoppages, the stronger the sense he entertains of the importance and urgency of his journey, so the more that you are impressed with a conviction of the magnitude and value of your spiritual interests, the more will you be incited to devote the Sabbath to the spiritual ends for which it was appointed, and the greater anxiety will you feel to withdraw your mind from every object and from every scene that tends to retard instead of advancing them. An interesting anecdote of Dr Johnson may be introduced here, as bearing on the subject of these observations. "After waiting," says Wyndham, "some portion of time in the adjoining room, I was admitted to Dr Johnson in his bed-chamber, where, after placing me beside him, he put into my hands two small volumes, which I found to be an edition of the New Testament, as his dying legacy to me. He then proceeded to observe that I was entering upon a life which would lead me deeply into all the business of the world; that he did not condemn civil employments, but that it was a state of great danger; and that he had, therefore, one piece of advice earnestly to press upon me, that I would set apart every seventh day for the care of my soul; that one day, the seventh, should be employed in repenting what was amiss in the six preceding, and fortifying my virtue for the six to come, and that I could not think a day too much for the preparation for eternity."

According to this view, then, which appears to be accordant with Scripture, that portion of the Lord's day which, before and after the duties of public worship, is left to the discretionary power of every one, demands still from you a strict attention to sacred things, a continued exercise of the same spiritual affections and duties, which it is the great design of the sanctuary to excite and invigorate; and one principal reason why the impressions of the sanctuary so often prove evanescent, is, that due care is not taken to perpetuate them by congenial occupations in the hours of privacy and solitude. Were you who honour the Sabbath, by resting from your bodily labour, and by engaging in the public worship of God, to spend the morning of the Lord's day in your closet, and with your family in reading the Scriptures, and in joining together in prayer and thanksgiving, you might then hope to be in the spirit, and to acquire that preparation of the understanding and the heart that is becoming the sanctuary. In repairing to it, you would be changing your place, not your occupation; and while you would be led to frequent it in the knowledge that the divine blessing is specially promised in the courts of Zion, you would be enabled to join in the exercises, and listen to the exhortations of God's house with less of that listlessness and distraction of mind, which often renders the ordinances of no avail. And then, again, if, at the termination of public worship, you should resolve to keep the current of your thoughts flowing in the same spiritual channel; if, at some convenient hour, you were to meet with your family, or to shut yourself up in the solitude of your closet, to meditate on the relations you bear to God,—the duties he requires of you, and the means by which you may be fitted for the kingdom of heaven; if in this way you were to occupy the close of the sacred day, you would find it, instead of being, as it is to many, a weary and irksome burden, to be a delight, a season of refreshing; and you would experience its spirit and its end gradually realized within you in the enlargement of your knowledge,—in the establishment of your faith,—and in an increasing measure of joy and comfort. Were the Sabbath spent in this way,—the proper way in which it ought to be spent,—the private employment of the professing worshippers of God would harmonize with their public exercises, instead of being exhibited, as they too often are, in striking contrast; and the morning and evening devotions of the family and the closet, being undertaken to prepare for, or to implore a blessing upon the meridian devotions of the Church, would shed a mutual influence which could not fail to be happily manifested in the walk and conversation of the future week. Without this union of private and public devotions, it is vain to think that the Sabbath will be any thing else than a mere formal observance; and just as a scholar will never make the attainment, nor reap the advantages of education, unless he bring, to the routine of his lessons, a mind susceptible and studious of learning, so neither will you, who are training up in the school of Christ, be enabled to fulfil the duties and enjoy the blessings of your Christian vocation, unless you infuse the spirit of the Sabbath into the observance of the Sabbath; and along with that bodily service, which of itself profiteth little, you combine a spirit that is open to the impressions of sacredness, and pervaded by a sense of the importance of religion.

These, then, reading the Scriptures, prayer, and the sanctification of the Sabbath, are the grand means, by the diligent and persevering use of which, you may, by divine grace, hope to promote the growth and establishment of religion in your soul. You must remember, however, that they are no more than means; "for these performances," says Bishop Burnet, "how good and useful soever, are of little value when men rest upon them, and think, because they do them, they have acquitted themselves of their duty, though they continue proud, worldly-minded, full of deceit, envy, and unalike. Even secret prayers, the most effectual means, are designed for a higher end, which is to possess the mind with such a constant and present sense of divine things, as may make them live in it, and govern it, and sanctify our whole nature." Enter on this year, then, with the solemn resolution of endeavouring to use those, as the means which God has appointed and promised to bless, for purifying your hearts, sanctifying and governing your whole conduct, and animating you with growing zeal for the service and glory of God. Be persuaded to adopt this resolution, and you have the divine promise that, "in due time, you will reap, if you faint not."

But, reader, it may be that the resolutions you may have been forming, at this season, are hollow and insincere; and that the sun, which has but recently entered anew on his course, will see you, ere he has reached the termination of his annual career, "returning like a dog to his vomit, or a sow that is washed, to her wallowing in the mire." I know not by what arguments I could rouse you from this fatal lethargy,—from those delusive dreams of a better and more convenient opportunity of attending to the things that belong to your peace, than by urging upon you the magnitude of your spiritual interests, the uncertainty of the time allotted for securing them, and the great danger that if you now stifle the convictions of conscience, that faithful monitor may cease any longer to address its still small voice to you. The following affecting declaration occurs in the memoir of Lord Thomas Lyttleton, son of the celebrated writer on the conversion of Paul: "I have had some serious conversations with my father, and one evening he concluded by recommending me to address heaven to have mercy upon me, and to join my prayers to his constant and paternal cares for my reformation. These expressions, with his preceding counsels and his affecting delivery of them, had such an effect upon me that I had bent the stubborn sinews of my knees, when it occurred to me that my devotions might be seen through the key-hole. This drew me from my pious attitude, and having secured this aperture, I thought it would not be a useless precaution to let down the window curtains also; and during the performance of that ceremony, some lively music, which struck up in the street, caught my attention, and gave a sudden flirt to all my devout ideas. So I girded on my sword and went to the theatre, where the entertainment soon dissipated all my gloomy thoughts."

GOD HAS NO DELIGHT IN THE DEATH OF THE SINNER:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. J. A. WYLIE,

Minister of the Associate Congregation of Original Seceders at Dollar.

"As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked."—EZEKIEL xxxiii. 11.

THESE words Ezekiel addressed to the Jews at a period of great national calamity; their homes were in ruins, their altars were deserted, and the daughter of Judah was dwelling in captivity with the daughter of Babylon. All the evils, from which they were at this moment suffering, might be clearly traced to their apostasy from God; and this prophecy, which was preached and written in Babylon, was designed to open their eyes to the cause of their calamities, and to lead to the adoption of that course which alone could afford a speedy and effectual remedy.

The captives were industrious in justifying themselves, but their justification was so conducted as to reflect on God. They admitted, that he had set life before them, but they complained that he had set it before them in such a way as to be beyond their reach: they upbraided the prophet with a threatening he had previously pronounced against them, "Ye shall pine away for your iniquities." This was a conditional, not an absolute threatening, but they willingly understood it in the latter sense, and they asked the prophet, how he could reconcile it with the hopes of life, which, in the name of heaven, he had set before them. If our sins and iniquities be upon us, if we shall pine away under them, and drag out a wretched captivity in a fruitless repentance, how shall we live? If this be our doom, there is no remedy, and there is no hope.

The judgments God had brought on them, the fall of their throne, the interruption of their worship, and the captivity of their nation, had not humbled them. Sinners, yet impatient and querulous—captives, yet proud and impenitent—they found fault with all the dispensations of God's providence, and all the words of his prophets, and scornfully rejecting his offers of life, they exclaimed, with their fathers in the wilderness, "Behold we die, we perish, we all perish!" To these words of despair, God replies by a message of grace. He might have sent to them a minister of his wrath, he sends to them a prophet of his love. "Say unto them, as I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked."

We have heard, that the King of Heaven is a merciful King; that he is as far above other sovereigns in mercy, as he is above them in power; and here we find him assuring a whole nation of transgressors, that, grievously as they had provoked him, and sorely as he had punished them, he would yet, on their repentance, forgive their sin, and turn from his anger; that should they confess their fault, and turn to the God of their fathers, he would yet bring them forth with honour from the land of their captivity, rebuild their cities, raise up their throne, restore their worship, and dwell amongst them as in the days of old.

"Oh! give thanks unto the God of heaven," says the Psalmist, "for his mercy endureth for ever." The patience and forbearance of God are unchanged. He speaks to sinners in the Gospel, in the same terms in which he addressed the Jews in Babylon, "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked."

This is the language of God to all, whatever the degree of their guilt, or the temper of their mind; whether they are presuming on his forbearance, or despairing of his mercy; whether they are defying his power, or doubting his love; whether they are just setting out on the road of sin, or have nearly concluded their course, and are within the view of that eternal death which is the wages of sin; whether they are bound with green withes, or are fettered with the iron bands of long habit: to all he proclaims, that he delights not in their ruin; that he desires their salvation; and that he is willing to lend his almighty power to accomplish it, provided only they will come to him and ask it. Oh! such a declaration is worthy of being listened to by every ear, and of being believed by every heart. Lifting up his hand, he swears by his own existence; not as if the oath of God rendered his word more valid, or more worthy of our belief, but in condescension to our weakness; and to confirm our faith, he says, "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked."

The doctrine taught in our text, and which we mean to establish in this discourse, is, that God does not delight in the ruin of sinners.

I. This appears from the creation of man, and the original constitution of his nature.

God created man in his own image. This is the only law, so far as we know, according to which, rational creatures can enjoy happiness. Had the nature of man been so framed as to be in opposition to that of his Creator, so far as we can reason, from the nature of the case, the constitution of the universe, and the character of the divine government, the happiness of man would have been an impossibility. Nay, we may conclude, that his existence would have been an existence of misery; and it would have been so prior to any act by which man might have violated the constitution he had received from God.

Then, taking into account the character of the universe, in which man was to live, as moral,—and the character of the government under which he was to be placed, as being likewise moral,—it was necessary that his constitution should be framed only in one way, so as to be consistent with his happiness. In that way was it framed, while it is obviously true, that God might have framed it in a different way, perhaps in a thousand different ways. That it was framed in that manner which alone was consistent with man's happiness, is a proof that God is beneficent, and that he delights not in the destruction of his creatures.

But further, let us consider the constitution under which man was placed. He was created happy, and he was placed in the most favourable circumstances for preserving that happiness. God required obedience as the condition of his happiness; and it is easy to shew, that this was a beneficent arrangement. One act of sin would have been the destruction of his happiness, although God had never threatened him with death, because it would have disordered his nature; and consequently, it appears, that this constitution bound him up, so far as consisted with his free agency, to the only course which was consistent with his happiness. And even granting that the condition on which his happiness rested, viz., obedience, had been a positive, and not a necessary one, still man had received from God powers adequate to the easy performance of it; there was no darkness in his understanding to occasion any doubt or mistake as to his duty; there was no impurity in his affections to draw him aside, no infirmity in his will to unfit him for obedience. Only, he was created mutable—he had power to stand, but he was also liable to fall—he might obey and live, or he might transgress and die.

And this proof is strengthened by the consideration, that God entered into a covenant with Adam, constituting him the head and representative of his posterity. By that covenant the whole world was placed in the same favourable circumstances in which Adam was placed; the likelihood that they should all retain their original constitution, and thus secure their happiness, was just as great, as that Adam should preserve his constitution, and secure his happiness. Since that day, sin has entered into the world, and death by sin, but this has happened by the voluntary transgression of Adam. There was no previous decree, obliging Adam to transgress, or in the smallest degree impairing his powers of standing. He knew the penalty of disobedience; and to fall, and, by falling, forfeit the favour of God, and bring ruin on himself, and on all the millions of his race, was his own act. "Lo, this have I found," says the wise man, "that God made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions."

II. That God delights not in the death of sinners, is evident from the plan of recovery he has formed.

Although eternal death had passed on all who sinned; although heaven had been barred, and the mansions of hell had received the whole posterity of Adam as they left the earth, it would have been impossible to have affirmed that God delighted in the death of sinners. For such an affirmation there would have been no proof; nay, so far from there being ground for such a conclusion as this, there would have been ground for the very opposite conclusion. The proof we have already led, that God gave to man a constitution fitting him for the enjoyment of happiness, with power to preserve that constitution, and thus preserve his happiness, sufficiently establishes the declaration of our text, that God delights not in the death of sinners, because it shews, on his part, an arrangement for the continuance of their happiness, and, therefore, though no plan of recovery had been revealed, we must have descended into the pit without having it in our power to say, that God delighted in our ruin. But in the redemption by Christ, the character of God comes forth in brighter glory,—a glory that shines without a cloud,—a proof so overwhelming of the character of God, and of his designs of mercy to our family, that it requires only to be stated that its force may be felt; and if we should set ourselves formally to demonstrate that the cross of Christ is a proof of the love of God, we would be acting as absurdly as if we laboured to prove that the heaven is higher than the earth, or the sun of noon brighter than the taper which we kindle at midnight. As we gaze on this all-cloudless exhibition of the character of God, its light beams forth in still stronger splendour; we behold it bursting from the divine throne, irradiating the plains of heaven, and gilding the hills and the valleys of our earth. In its shining we hear the angels saying, "Glory to God, and peace on the earth." It continues to increase till the heaven above, which is the throne of God, and the earth below, which is his footstool, are glowing in its unbounded effulgence; and then, though instead of the eyes of flesh we had the orbs of the seraph, we would veil them with the seraph's wing; and if, instead of the tongues of men we could speak with the tongues of angels, we could not find, either in the language of men, or the language of angels, words to give adequate expression to our feelings; we could give utterance to our thoughts only in the words which the Holy Ghost has used, "God is love!"

The contrivance of this plan, its revelation to the world, is all the proof we require that God has no pleasure in the death of sinners. Surely had he delighted in their ruin, he would not have devised means to prevent it.

Where is the man who will affirm that God finds pleasure in the death of angels? and yet what has he done for them compared with what he has done for us? Christ took not on him the nature of angels. He never descended to offer sacrifice for their guilt. He never went to their prison-house to preach repentance. He never obeyed—he never suffered—he never hung upon a cross for them. The Father never sent him in his mercy to loose the fetters of these sorrowful captives, or to open the doors of their burning prison-house. It is on the fields of earth, and not in the mansions of hell, that the Gospel has been published. It was in the hearing of fallen men, not of fallen angels, that the song was sung, "We bring you tidings of great joy, for unto you is born this day a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord." The countenance that frowned in wrath on them, smiled with love on us. The eye that burned with indignation on the seraph, melted with pity on man. The arm which was lifted up to punish them, was lifted up to save us. He was mighty to destroy in the one case; he was mighty to save in the other. Oh! this is a proof that our text is true, "As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked."

III. It is evident from the means God employs to carry this plan into effect.

All is not gained when the plan is formed; much depends on the manner of its execution. Great wisdom may be shown in the contrivance of the plan, and as great negligence in giving it effect. It is not so in this case; in the contrivance and in the execution of the plan of salvation, God has shewn an equal wisdom and love. He is not man that he should repent. He never altered the eternal purpose of love which he formed regarding man. He never saw cause to change his mind regarding our redemption, because it conferred on our family a grace which they did not merit, or because it was necessary for him to employ means too extensive compared with the end that was to be gained. He never repented, we say, of that purpose, and therefore, he continues to execute it from age to age. This is the proof that his love endures, that it is stable as the days of heaven. All the means which have been employed from the beginning of time, or which are in operation at this day; all the means God is employing with us, or with others, to bring us to the enjoyment of the blessings included in this purpose, are just a reiteration of our text, "As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked."

But what are the means which God has employed, or is still employing, to carry his purpose into effect in our salvation? They are very numerous, and some of them are of surpassing grandeur.

1. The mean which is obviously of first importance is the incarnation, the obedience, and the death of his Son. This was a great price, but the soul is precious, and a less price could not have redeemed it from death; this was a great sacrifice, but so was the guilt it was to expiate. Although man had wept, and mourned, from the beginning to the close of time; though he had trod the path from his cradle to his grave in sackcloth and tears; though he had poured out his blood, to shew how deeply he bewailed his sin; though all the tribes of earth had fallen down before God, and sent up to his throne, without ceasing, the voice of weeping and of supplication; although gladness had been banished from the earth, and no joyful voice had ever been heard on it; although the doors of the morning had been sealed, and the arch of heaven had been hung with sackcloth; though the sun had been robed in blackness, and all the stars had mourned; though the harps of the lost had been used to teach man how to weep, all would have been of no avail. God would not have been entreated, his anger would still have burned against us. But when he saw his own Son suffering in the room of sinners, he was appeased,—he smiled in love. He looked on the sacrifice of his Son as he did on that of Noah, its incense rose to the heavens, and he smelled a savour of rest.

From the history of our Saviour's life how many proofs could we bring forward that God has no pleasure in the death of sinners. Every sorrow of his humbled estate, every word he spake, and every action he performed on our world, is a proof of our text. We can only remind you of Bethlehem, where he lay in a cradle;—of Egypt, to which he was banished by the cruelty of Herod;—of the valleys of Galilee and the cities of Judah, where he preached the Gospel;—of the thousands he fed,—the sick he cured,—the dead he raised;—of the fig-tree where he hungered,—of the well of Jacob where he thirsted;—of the hall of Pilate, where a rude soldiery mocked him, and an unrighteous judge condemned him;—the robe of purple, and the crown of thorns;—the garden of Gethsemane, where his soul was sorrowful unto death, and Calvary, and the cross, where he expired. By these sufferings was our salvation purchased, and the purpose of God's eternal love so far carried into effect, and our text shewn to be true, that God has no pleasure in the death of the wicked.

We might here remind you of the vast preparations which were made, during many ages, for the appearance of the Messiah, and of what was done for the spread of his Gospel after his death; but on these topics it is not necessary that we should enter, and we wish to direct your attention to other means employed by God.

2. The ordinances of grace. Many of the blessings of God are so common, that we have ceased to prize them, and never think what our condition would be were they to be taken from us. The air we breathe, and the sun that shines on us, are instances of this in the natural world. On these blessings our very existence depends; were they to be denied but for one hour the world would be destroyed, and yet we have enjoyed them so long, and with so little effort of ours, that we never think of them at all, or of the goodness of God in giving them. The same may be said of the ordinances of grace. We have enjoyed them so long, in such abundance, and with so little effort of ours, that we are now insensible to the greatness of the blessing. And yet it is not easy to imagine in what condition we would have been to-day had we never enjoyed them, or in what condition we would be to-morrow were they to be taken from us. Had it not been for the appointment of a Church, and the administration of divine ordinances, we would, ere this day, have lost all knowledge of the salvation of heaven, and the sacrifice of Christ would have been to us as if it had never been offered. Had not the Sun of the Gospel been kindled in the firmament above us, and kept burning from age to age, by the preaching of the Word, the shades of heathenism would again have gathered around us, and, like the Athenians, we would have been worshipping at the altar of an "unknown God."

What mercy, as well as power, was it to provide this bread in the famine,—to open this well in the wilderness,—to kindle this light in the darkness, and what gratitude do we owe to God for favours so great and so manifold! To whose goodness was it owing that we first saw the light in a Christian land, and not in a heathen country; that we have a Bible to read, or a Church to go to; that we are here worshipping in a Christian assembly, and not offering sacrifice in an idolatrous temple; that the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and not the Koran of Mahomet, is open before us; that we are praying to the God of heaven, and not bowing down to the work of our own hands? Is it not owing to the goodness of Him, who fixed the time when we were to come into the world, and the spot of earth on which we were to live? And what does all this teach us? just this, that God has no pleasure in our destruction, but rather that we would return and live.

3. The mercies of all kinds which God confers on men. Of every good gift, whether it regards the body or the mind, whether it belongs to this world or the next, God is the giver. Have we rank? God placed us in it. Have we riches? God gave them to us. Have we a good name? we are more indebted to the providence of God than to our own prudence. Have we superiors who protect us? friends who love us? and dependents who revere us? Have we a healthy body, or a sound mind? for all these gifts we are the debtors of God. But wherefore has he given them? Know, O man, that this goodness of God is designed to lead thee to repentance, and therefore, is a proof that he does not delight in your ruin.

We are surrounded by the love of God, not only in grace, but in nature, and in providence, and that love is designed to work on our hearts and lead us to repentance. It is love that we live; it is love that we breathe; it is love that preserves us from falling into the flames of the pit. It is love that his sun warms us, and that his earth feeds us; that our minds can reason, and our bodies labour. Oh! how constantly does the stream of his goodness flow; man's ingratitude cannot freeze it. "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, he sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." This is goodness for which we can advance no claim, and for which God can expect no return, and its being given to lead us to repentance, as we are told it is, is a proof that God has no pleasure in our ruin.

4. Afflictions and chastisements. These wound the body and often administer the cup of gall to the spirit, but their tendency is salutary, and therefore we conclude that their design is beneficent. It is mercy, when the sinner is in the way that leads to death, to beat him back although it should be with the rod of trouble,—to hedge up his path, although with the thorns of affliction. There are some who will not be drawn by the silken cord of love, they are so incorrigible that they must be driven with the whip. Now, so great is the love of God, that he does not leave even this mean untried, that their obstinacy may be broken, and that they may be led to obedience. This was the design, as the Israelites were taught by the prophets, of all the plagues, the famines, and the captivities with which they were visited. God does not afflict willingly, he does not delight to break and to bruise, but it is necessary, at times, that he should correct, and he corrects us for our profit; he acts like the physician who searches the wound that it may be healed. He causes us to pass through the waters that we may be purified, and through the fires that we may be refined; and no greater calamity can he inflict, no greater mark of wrath can he put on any, than to say of them, as he did of Ephraim, "Let them alone." Although he does not delight even in their death, yet he has now ceased to employ the usual means of averting it; he smiles on them no more; he frowns on them no more; all the means he has employed for their conversion have been ineffectual, and he permits them to go on frowardly in the way of their own heart.

5. The strivings of the Spirit. The dullest understanding can discern, in most cases, the difference between sin and duty; and as to the greater part of the sins which men commit, they know that their conduct, in these respects, is in plain opposition to the Word of God. Thus, the most hardened conscience will remonstrate at times; and what is this but the voice of nature within us, conspiring with the voice of revelation without us, bearing its testimony to the truth of the text, "that God does not delight in the death of the wicked?"

But farther, the majority of those who live under the Gospel, are the subjects, at times, of the common or ineffectual operations of the Divine Spirit, and, if they behave suitably under these dispensations, they may issue in conversion. Not only does God knock without by his Word, but he opens the door by his Spirit, that convictions may enter. There are moments of fear, of trembling, of alarm, in the life of every sinner; he starts up, he looks around, and he would flee for safety, if he only knew where he might be at rest. These are the strivings of the Spirit of God, to pull him out of the great deep, to pluck him as a brand from the great burning, and, though they should never issue in his salvation, they are sufficient to shew that God has no pleasure in his death.

There are others who are "begotten again to a lively hope" by the Word of God; into their hearts the Spirit enters, restores the palace which was lately in ruins, and makes it a glorious temple in which God may be worshipped, and in which the Spirit may dwell. This exhibits God not only as employing means to prevent the death of the sinner, but as actually averting his destruction, and, therefore, it is the highest possible evidence that he has no pleasure in the death of the wicked.

Our subject affords encouragement to those who are fearful and doubting. If, like Job, you are sitting on the dunghill, abhorring yourself, our text should be as sweet to you as honey, yea, as honey from the comb. If your iniquities have taken hold on you, so that you cannot lift your eyes, then hear God stooping from his throne in heaven, and saying to you, "As I live, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked." Are you afraid to return? surely these words will remove your fear; to you God says, after so long a time, "turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die." Are you sincerely desirous to return? Is sin your burden? Do you seek rest in the bosom of your Saviour—cleansing in his blood—comfort by his Spirit? do not doubt that you will be received. "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." "Who-soever cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." "Behold we come unto thee, for thou art the Lord our God."

Again, the success by which the diligence and the importunity of others have been rewarded, ought to stimulate your efforts. They have gone, in their poverty and wretchedness, to their father's door, and, bowing down before it, have made confession of their guilt, saying, "Father, we have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight," and, using the hand of prayer and faith, they have knocked and knocked till that door was opened; and not only have they been admitted, but they have received the kindest welcome; we have seen their father come out to meet them, and embrace them, and clothing them with the best robe, and putting a ring upon their finger, lead them in, and we have heard the song of the angels over their return. That house is not yet full, and the servants of this King have it in command to tell others to turn in hither; and let every sinner be assured, be his case or his character what they may, he who thirsted, and he who never thirsted, that God will as willingly receive him as he ever received any. Let him say this moment, "in my father's house there is bread enough and to spare," "Why should I perish with hunger?" "Why should I fill my belly with the husks which the swine do eat?" live in the practice, and under the dominion of those sins which degrade my nature, destroy my peace, and will at last sink me lower than the grave? No; "I will arise, and I will go to my father, and I will say to him, I am not worthy to be called thy son, make me as one of thy hired servants." In fine, have we established our proof? Have we made good the declaration in the text, "that God delights not in the death of sinners?" Then, what is your duty? Is it indeed a truth, O sinner, that the great God, whose law you have broken, and whose wrath you have incurred, is willing to pardon you—that notwithstanding his power to punish you, he finds no pleasure in your destruction—that though a matter of absolute indifference to his essential glory whether you live or die, he invites you to live? O then haste to the foot of his throne, and, through the sacrifice of Christ, reconcile yourself to God. You have not a day, nor an hour, nor a moment to delay your reconciliation. While you linger, the hour of mercy may expire. Before the sun of day has again risen on the earth, the sun of heaven's grace may have set on you for ever, and, instead of inviting you to turn and live, God will address you in other words: "I called, but ye refused, I stretched out my hands, but no one regarded; therefore will I laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh."

OF KIRKALDY, ONE OF THE ICEBOUND
WHALERS, OF 1833.

No. II.

BY THE REV. J. THOMSON,
One of the Ministers of Dysart.

WHILE, however, the eye of taste and of piety is occasionally regaled by the contemplation of the truly sublime and beautiful, as exhibited in the Arctic Regions, let us not forget, that there the elements are of too fitful a character to allow the tranquil and the serene in nature to prevail for any considerable period. The scene which affords rapturous delight at the moment, may, ere the lapse of a little hour, be turned into a source of inexpressible terror and dismay. The picture of loveliness is completely reversed, and instead of enjoyment, we have peril, and privation, and death, staring us in forms the most appalling. This leads me to the consideration of the evils which were now crowded into the lot of our intrepid mariners.

I mention the intense cold which they had to endure while detained among the ice. The Psalmist celebrates the infinite power of Jehovah, as displayed in the production of ice and snow. The passage is one of transcendent sublimity: "He giveth snow like wool: he scattereth the hoar-frost like ashes. He casteth forth his ice like morsels: who can stand before his cold?"—Ps. cxlvii. 16, 17. These words naturally carry our thoughts to the Arctic Regions, where, during the winter months, the scene here so graphically described, is realized in all its terrific grandeur and severity. There cold, unmitigated, piercing, overpowering, prevails. And when, as it was ever and anon the case, the frost was accompanied by sleet and snow, the sufferings which it occasioned were greatly increased. To this dreadful element the crew of the Viewforth were, for many months, exposed. So early as the first of October, Mr — writes, "The cold is intense,—the ice on the top of my bed being one-fourth of an inch thick. Indeed, we cannot walk the deck above half an hour at a time." October 23.—"Ships covered with snow, and just like an iceberg; the cold is getting rather alarming,—my pillow, last night, was frozen to the bed." November 30.—"This has been another cold day. The frost is very intense indeed, you cannot walk the deck above a quarter of an hour, or so. My blankets, last night, were perfectly frozen where I had been breathing."

Many similar proofs of the severity of the cold might be produced. The thermometer stood generally at 30 degrees below zero,—a degree of cold which no constitution could long bear without sustaining injury. The ice around the vessel was frozen to the depth of between six and seven feet. The large water casks, though placed in the warmest part of the ship, soon became solid masses of ice, as I personally witnessed after the arrival of the Viewforth in our harbour,—a circumstance which contributed, in no small degree, to the sufferings of the crew, who, though their fuel, at an early period, was inadequate to their wants, had to melt every drop of water which they required for daily use.

But let me specify some of the effects produced on the men by the cold. It is clear, it would have been their wisdom to have recourse to bodily exercise, in order to keep themselves in heat. But instead of acting upon this principle, not a few of them gave way to the depressing influence which severe cold exerts on a shivering frame. They shrunk from exposure to that chilling element. They felt inclined to lie in bed. This aggravated the evil. Some of them soon became feeble and dispirited, so much so, that nothing but a strong sense of danger could effectually rouse them to exertion. Even the most robust and vigorous experienced, to an alarming degree, the debilitating effects of cold on their constitution. All their clothing was but a poor protection against an evil so formidable; and when that protection began to be impaired,—when their clothing became bare and scanty,—what many endured, from that source alone, cannot be told. The evil was frightfully augmented when it happened, as was often inevitably the case, that the men got wet and were frost-bitten. An instance of this description is detailed by the surgeon. November 24.—"Next morning, between eight and nine o'clock,

I heard a man hailing us astern. I went immediately to his assistance, and found him quite benumbed from cold, and perfectly delirious. He had to be carried on board, and when once there, all hands being employed in cutting a dock in the ice, I had to do the best I could with him. His feet, and all that covered them, were frozen into one lump. Having cut away the legs and uppers of his boots, I found it necessary to go through the same operation with the soles and stockings. The latter tore away the flesh from the insensate mass. So completely frozen were the poor man's feet, that when he attempted to walk on the deck, the sound (I can compare it to nothing else) was like the knocking of a pair of clamps on the wooden floor. When carried to the fire, he was not satisfied with being near it, but he actually thrust his feet into the midst of it, and it was with the utmost difficulty I could prevail upon him to withdraw them. I had recourse to the usual methods of thawing them, and endeavoured, if possible, to restore circulation. The result was, that after the dead parts were removed, inflammation began, and was succeeded by mortification, till the poor fellow sunk under the weight of his sufferings."

Such facts as these, give peculiar emphasis to the question of the inspired Psalmist, "Who in his cold can live?" I verily believe, that were it not for the means which were providentially employed to rouse the crew of the Viewforth into activity, not one of them could have survived the rigour of the tremendous winter which they were doomed to in that inhospitable clime. The cold alone would have proved fatal. But while this consideration should dispose the Christian reader to feel for those who are exposed to that evil, it reminds us of another striking proof of the divine wisdom and benignity. The Polar Sea, which is so formidable to man, is the appointed abode of the greatest and the most valuable of the finny tribe,—the leviathan of the deep. The whale has there his home. There he sports, and thrives, and luxuriates. There, as monarch of the flood, he exhibits his enormous strength, and moves with a majesty which seems to indicate his conscious dignity. The cold and ice, so formidable to his pursuers, affords him a shelter from their attack, while the means of sustenance are found there in abundance; and the hot blood which flows through his veins, fits him for enduring, without pain, all the rigours of the clime. "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty, just and true are thy ways, thou King of Saints."

II. Scarcity of provisions. This was a serious evil. The ordinary length of a voyage to the Straits, including the fishing season, is six months; and as none anticipated a longer period for the Viewforth, the supplies, though ample enough for the usual time, were fearfully inadequate to meet the wants of the crew for eleven months. Accordingly, from the day in which the ship became icebound and when no rational hope of escape, for that season, could be entertained, it became absolutely necessary, for their safety, to practise the most rigid economy. All were put on short allowance. October 1.—"My mind is made up for a winter in the Arctic Regions. The worst of it is, all the ships are very short of provisions; we are now on one and a-half biscuit a-day, one half pound of beef, and about half a teacupful of meal." November 5.—"We have near one-fourth pound of pork, and one-half pound of beef a-day, and three pounds of bread in the week. Our meal is all done. Five casks of bread yet remain, which will be a great help, if the Lord spare us. The work we are at just now, will very soon wear us out. I have not had my clothes off these four days." December 12.—"I feel I am really starving." January 16.—"Three pounds of bread per week,—about a biscuit a-day. I am falling away to a shadow, through cold, and hunger, and thought."

On the 16th of November, the Middleton became a total wreck. The crew were divided between the Jane and Viewforth. Twenty-two of them came on board the latter vessel, in a state of utter destitution,—a circumstance which materially contributed to diminish the means of supporting life. The consequences were alarming. What with the piercing cold, incessant toil, and scanty food, the most part of the sailors became so weak as to be unable to work. "Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them." The following extracts speak volumes: January 8.—"Many of our men are complaining, mostly of scurvy, and some of them are delirious. Oh! it is a terrible sight to see them in such a state, and wasted away to shadows. Yesterday, witnessed a scene that baffles description. We got a cask of blubber from the Jane three months ago, which we boil for oil to our lamp. I even saw them eating the fins,—pieces of two or three pounds, the very smell of which was enough to sicken one. It shews plainly, that when a human being has not the means of subsistence, he throws off his proper nature, and assumes another more savage and desperate. Under the cravings of nature, and having nothing to appease it, man is quite another being, and will greedily devour what he would have before counted poison." January 11.—"Six of our stoutest men are at present laid up, and can scarcely move a limb. Whenever they get any help to crawl out of bed, they swoon away. Their gums are hanging down separate from their teeth." January 13.—"The people who are not at the pump, are allowed only two pounds of bread in the week, and one biscuit a-day. We are badly off with our three pounds, but I do not know how they live at all. One of them came to me to-day, and said I would do him the greatest favour he ever got in his life, by giving him only a fin of blubber. It is really awful, hunger, cold, fatigue, danger, all upon us at once; and it requires a fortitude to bear up under them, which few can command." I have been farther informed, that on more than one occasion, when mortality prevailed among the afflicted seamen, so great was the debility to which the survivors were reduced, that the dead and the living were lying side by side for two days, and none able to remove them. These are heart-rending facts. Let the reader ponder them in his mind, and say, what but the power of God could have sustained human life under the pressure of such sufferings. It is the opinion of all acquainted with the case, that were it not for the more than usual quantities of barley and peas, of which they made broth, which they discovered had been put on board, and also an extra portion of coffee and tea with which they were supplied, all must have perished through famine. Only twelve hands had strength to do any thing in navigating the ship when she arrived off Stromness. And had not relief been then afforded, these few would have been soon in the condition of the poor widow of Sarepta, when she told Elijah, that she "had only a handful of meal in a barrel, and a little oil in a cruise, and that she was gathering two sticks, that she might dress it for herself and her son, and die."

III. It was my intention to state and illustrate two other elements that entered into the cup of suffering, which was put into the hands of these mariners, while in the Arctic Regions—I mean darkness and disease. But the length of the article prevents me from dwelling on these subjects. Suffice it to say, regarding the former, that the frightful gloom that so long prevailed, when the sun had almost totally sunk, for weeks together, under the horizon, tended much to depress the spirits of the crew. With regard to the latter, it is mournful to relate that disease also invaded the crew,—the case of many baffled all efforts to subdue it. Eleven of the crew of the Middleton, and four of that of the Viewforth, fell victims to it, and were consigned to a watery grave. Here are a few painful instances: Dec. 4.—“Another awful day, such as I wish I may never forget or again behold. What a helpless creature is man when the king of terrors lays hold of him! Another of our shipmates is gone, the poor fellow that was so ill last night; he slept away so quietly that nobody knew the angel of death had passed over him, till seven o'clock this morning. We sewed him in a piece of canvass, and, after making a hole in the ice, launched the body into the deep. All assembled around the body, 'twixt decks,—and I read an exhortation which was very solemn and impressive; instructing us to be also ready, and what an awful thing it is to die without being reconciled to God. After committing him to the deep, we again met in the half deck, for prayer and praise; sung the fiftieth psalm, and read the fifteenth chapter of 1 Cor., which I earnestly hope will leave a lasting impression on us all.” Dec. 15.—“This has been another eventful day, occasioned by the removal of another of the company, into the world of spirits. We committed the lifeless body to the fathomless deep at ten, A.M. We had first to saw a hole in the ice, which was ten feet thick. It was a mournful burial, and dreadful was the angry blast that swept through the confused and icy tacking. The frost was so severe that we could hardly stand on the ice for so short a time as was sufficient to bury him.”

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Lamentation over Man's lost Innocence.—Here was a stately building; man carved like a fair palace, but now lying in ashes: let us stand and look on the ruins, and drop a tear. This is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation. Could we choose but to weep, if we saw our country ruined, and turned by the enemy into a wilderness? If we saw our houses on fire, and our households perishing in the flames? But all this comes far short of the dismal sight; man fallen as a star from heaven. Ah! may we not now say, “O that we were as in months past!” when there was no stain in our nature, no cloud on our minds, no pollution in our hearts! Had we never been in better case, the matter had been less; but they that were brought up in scarlet do now embrace dunghills! Where is our primeval glory now! Once no darkness in the mind, no rebellion in the will, no disorder in the affections. But oh, “how is the faithful city become an harlot! Righteousness lodged in it; but now murderers. Our silver is become dross, our wine mixt with water.” That heart which was once the temple of God, is now turned into a den of thieves. Let our name be I-chabod, for the glory is departed. Happy wast thou, O man! who was like unto thee? No pain nor sickness could affect thee, no death could approach thee, no sigh was heard from thee, till these bitter fruits were plucked off the forbidden tree. Heaven shone upon thee, and earth smiled: thou wast the companion of angels, and the envy of devils. But how low is he now laid, who was created for dominion, and made lord of the world! “The crown has fallen from our head: wo unto us that we have sinned.” The creatures that waited to do him service, are now, since the fall, set in battle-array against him, and the least of them having commission, proves too hard for him. Waters overflow the old world; fire consumes Sodom; the stars in their courses fight against Sisera; frogs, flies, lice, &c., turn executioners to Pharaoh and his Egyptians; worms eat up Herod: Yea, man needs a league with the beasts, yea, with the very stones of the field, Job v. 23, having reason to fear, that every one that findeth him will slay him. Alas! how are we fallen! how are we plunged into a gulf of misery! The sun has gone down on us, death has come in at our windows; our enemies have put out our two eyes, and sport themselves with our miseries. Let us then lie down in our shame, and let our confusion cover us. Nevertheless, there is hope in Israel concerning this thing. Come then, O sinner, look to Jesus Christ the second Adam: Quit the first Adam and his covenant; come over to the Mediator and Surety of the new and better covenant; and let your hearts say, “Be thou our ruler, and let this breach be under thy band:” and let your “eye trickle down, and cease not, without any intermission, till the Lord look down, and behold, from heaven.” Lam. iii. 49, 50.—BOSTON'S FOURFOLD STATE.

A Relish for Heavenly Things.—None go to heaven but those who have a taste for it on earth.—FOSTER.

Virtue—Her Picture.—Papists say images are the books of idiots or unlearned, but the prophets call them teachers of lies, and all know that they are occasions of sin. Let one give you a picture without the offence. Behold an image without sin. It is of Virtue. You shall not sooner see the medals, but you will straight know the face. Conceive her a virgin of unspotted chastity. She has a face white as is heaven mixed with lovely red. Of her Saviour's complexion, (Song v. 10.) white with her own innocences—ruddy with blushing at others' sins. She hath a brow clear as crystal, whereon God has written wisdom. This is her carriage, she may be affronted, she cannot be affronted. She hath eyes that never sent out a wanton look, those casements were never opened to let in vanity. She is not poring with them on the earth, but directs them to heaven, where they shall one day see her desire, even the glory of God. She hath lips like a thread of scarlet, and her speech is comely. She hath the tongue of angels; when she speaks she ministers grace to the hearers. She discourseth the language of Canaan most perfectly, and never opens, but the first air she breathes echoes with the praise of her Maker. Her ears are like the sanctum sanctorum of the temple. None but the High Priest must enter there. They are stopped to the songs of any siren—open to the mournings of any poor. What gracious words she receives in at those doors, she sends them like jewels to be laid up in the cabinet of her heart. She hath two hands, one of equity, another of charity, none for injury. She gives every one his due for justice's sake, some more than their due for mercy's sake. She gives, forgives, does that to others which she expects at the hands of Christ. She hath bowels of mercy; the members of Christ are as dear to her, as her most inward vital parts. She feeds them as considering what it were to have empty bowels herself. Her knees were never stiffened with pride; she can easily bow them to give her superior homage, but bows them down at the footstool of her Maker; yet still her heart is lower, and she never rises without a pardon. Her feet are still travelling the ways of piety, and running the race of salvation. She knows this life is a journey, and no time to stand still, and therefore she is shod for the purpose, with the preparation of the Gospel of peace, and never rests until she is gotten within the threshold of heaven. She hath a white silken garment, the snow of Lebanon is black to it, not woven out of the bowels of worms, but out of the side of her Saviour. She is clothed all over with his righteousness, which makes her beautiful in the sight of her Maker. She is girt with the girdle of truth, and sins not, not because she cannot, but because she will not. She hath a crown promised, blessedness. Her Redeemer, even the king of heaven, did bequeath it to her in his will, and she shall wear it in eternal glory. Let every soul that knows and loves her on earth, or hopes to enjoy her reward in heaven, call her blessed.—ADAMS.

Succession.—I know but of two uninterrupted successions; first, of sinners, ever since the fall of Adam; second, of saints; for God always had, and will always have a seed to serve him.—TOPLADY.

SACRED POETRY.

JEHOVAH-JESUS.

BY RICHARD HUIE, ESQ., M. D.

THE voice, which spoke in Sinai's thunders,
 Assuag'd Tiberias' raging sea;
 The hand, which form'd the sky's bright wonders,
 Bestow'd its instinct on the bee:
 The power, through which the ocean flows,
 Perfumes the woodbine and the rose.

Creation's vast extent ne'er cumberd
 The mind which countless orbs obey;
 And he, th' angelic hosts who numbers,
 Sustains the sparrow on the spray:
 While worlds on worlds his bounty share,
 The smallest insect feels his care.

Ah! why, in hours of tribulation,
 Should I to fear or faintness yield?
 The grace, which wrought my soul's salvation
 Remains my fortress and my shield.
 Amidst the storm, a still small voice
 Shall bid my aching heart rejoice.

From Calv'ry's mount, sweet mercy beaming,
 Illumes the darkness path I tread;
 And strains of joy, from Zion streaming,
 Breathe grateful music round my head:
 That mercy bids my sorrows cease,
 That music softly whispers peace.

O let me, then, myself a stranger,
 Account all earth's concerns but dress,
 For Him who, cradled in a manger,
 Pour'd out his soul upon the cross:
 And day by day the Saviour call,
 My life, my treasure, and my all!
 My all? Amen! A full surrender
 I make, of body, mind, and will;
 And he, with love most sweet and tender,
 In turn will this rapt bosom fill:
 And give me here, in sin forgiv'n,
 A glorious antepast of heav'n!

THE BALM OF GRIEF.

BY CHARLES MOIR, ESQ.

WHEN pitiless misfortune's night
 Frowns darkest o'er the head,
 Where will we find a gleam of light
 To dissipate the dread?
 Fear not! the Christian's help and stay
 A lively hope has given,
 To all who truly seek the way
 That leads through earth to heaven.
 The friends that cluster'd round our home
 In fortune's sunny hour,
 May cold, estranged in heart become,
 When sorrow's tempests lour;
 Then let religion's placid sway
 Each rising fear subdue;
 Albeit the trials of life's day
 Are fearful and not few.

The star that in the times of old
 Roe on the Christian's night,
 Shall to the darkened heart unfold
 Its pure and steady light
 To cheer us on:—when fear is fled,
 And cleared the thorny road,
 We'll bless the cause through gloom that led
 The wanderer back to God.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Justin Martyr.—This great man, who lived in the second century, was born and educated among the heathen. He was intent on the acquirement of knowledge and happiness. After trying various systems of philosophy, he gave himself to retirement. At length he was introduced to the knowledge of God, and acquired the information which led to his conversion in the following remarkable manner. The account is given by himself:—"As I was walking near the sea, I was met by an aged person of a venerable appearance, whom I beheld with much attention. We soon entered into conversation; and upon my professing a love for private meditation, the venerable old man hinted at the absurdity of mere speculation from practice. This gave occasion to me to express my ardent desire of knowing God, and to expatiate on the praises of philosophy. The stranger, by degrees, endeavoured to cure me of my unmeaning admiration of Plato and Pythagoras. He pointed out the writings of the Hebrew prophets, as much more ancient than any of those called philosophers; and he led me to some view of the nature and evidences of christianity. He added, 'Above all things, pray that the gates of light may be opened to you: for they are not discernible, nor to be understood by any one, except God and his Christ enable a man to understand.' He said many other things to the same effect, directed me to follow his advice and left me. I saw him no more; but immediately a fire was kindled in my soul, and I had a strong affection for the prophets, and for those men who are the friends of Christ. I weighed within myself the arguments of the aged stranger: and in the end, I found the Divine Scriptures to be the only sure philosophy."

Rev. George Wishart.—The name of this good man is well known as an eminent reformer in Scotland, and one who was a constant object of the hatred of the popish party. On more than one occasion Cardinal Beaton formed plans to take away his life. At one time he procured a letter to be sent to him as from an intimate friend, in which he was requested to come to him without delay, as he had been seized with sudden illness. In the meantime the cardinal had provided sixty men to waylay him, and deprive him of life. The letter having been delivered by a boy, who also brought a horse to convey him on his journey, Wishart set out, but suddenly stopping by the way, avowed to the friends who had accompanied him, his strong conviction that God did not will that he should proceed, for that there was treachery in this business. They went forward without him, and discovered the whole plot, by which means his life was preserved.

THE MYSTERIES OF REVELATION.

No. II.

BY THE REV. MARCUS DODS,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Belford.

MYSTERIES may be referred to two classes,—doctrinal and ceremonial mysteries. Under the Old Testament almost every doctrine was in some degree mysterious. Thus the doctrine of atonement was taught to man immediately after the fall. The promise that the woman's seed should bruise the serpent's head, very plainly taught Adam that his case was not desperate—that his deliverance should not be accomplished by himself, but should be wrought out by a suffering Conqueror, whose heel should be bruised in the contest. We here find every essential feature of atonement; yet it is plain that the doctrine, while revealed only in the primeval promise, was enveloped in much mystery,—a mystery which was not entirely cleared up till after the great atonement had been actually made.

Hence it is obvious that what is mysterious at one time, may be no mystery at another. Thus the Apostle Paul speaks of the mystery which had been hid from ages, and from generations, but had now been made manifest to the saints. A mystery, consequently, is not necessarily something that we are incapable of comprehending. It includes also those truths which we could very well understand if they were fully revealed to us, and which are mysterious to us, simply because they have been only partially made manifest to us. It is in this sense that almost all doctrines were, to a greater or less extent, mysterious under the older and preparatory dispensations. And, perhaps, it is in this sense only that any doctrine of the Gospel is mysterious. Every man feels that the Trinity and the Incarnation, the two great doctrinal mysteries of the New Testament, lie far beyond our present powers of comprehension. But that in a future state we may obtain such a view of them as will divest them of all mystery, and enable us fully to comprehend them, is what I distinctly hold to be possible, and, I would willingly hope, probable. The promises that what we know not now, we shall know hereafter,—that we shall see God, and shall know even as we are known, seem to render this probable. But we know too little of the precise import and full extent of these promises, to enable us to assert, without rashness, that it is certain. We know that there will always be something mysterious, something beyond our comprehension, in the incomprehensible Jehovah. But then his existence in three distinct persons, and the incarnation of one of these persons, appear to be truths which lie so near the boundary to which our knowledge has been carried by revelation, that in communicating to us the knowledge necessary for our salvation, the facts have been brought most distinctly into view. We may therefore hope that even a small advance in the same path which has thus been opened up to us, may bring us to a clear view, and a full understanding of those truths, of the certainty of which we have the fullest assurance, but of the nature of which we have only an indistinct and impartial view. Many things which were most profoundly mysterious to the Jews, became plain and were divested of all mystery by the Gospel; and the Lord tells his disciples that their eyes and ears were blessed, because they had seen and heard what prophets and righteous men of old had anxiously longed to see and to hear. And surely it is not unreasonable to suppose, while it is delightful to hope, that in passing into the higher mansions of our Father's house, we shall make a still wider step in the path of improvement, than was made by them who passed from the Law of Moses to the Gospel of Christ.

With regard to doctrinal mysteries, it must be obvious to all, that we derive our knowledge of them, and can draw our proofs of them, solely from Scripture. They lie altogether beyond the sphere to which our powers of discovery extend. Hence any attempt to prove them from any other source of evidence than Scripture is absurd. In refuting objections against them, we may often be compelled to take other ground; but, when seeking for direct evidence in support of them, the sole question is, what say the Scriptures? It may be added, that all attempts to explain a mystery are preposterous, since, if it was explained, it would cease to be a mystery. And though all illustrations are not to be entirely forbidden, yet they require to be very sparingly and cautiously used.

The Old Testament dispensation abounded with practical or ceremonial mysteries. The types which were so numerous under that dispensation, were of this character. And some have reckoned prophecy also among the mysteries of Scripture. This classification, however, is erroneous, for the obscurity of prophecy is not properly mysterious. Under the New Testament dispensation, we have only two mysteries of this kind, Baptism and the Lord's Supper. These are called mysteries, or Sacraments. In them the mystery consists in connecting spiritual blessings with the performance of a very simple, and an entirely indifferent action. It is obvious that the washing with water, in the one case, and the taking of bread and wine in the other, have no natural tendency to promote our spiritual welfare. And to the questions why, or how they do so, no other answer can be given, than that such is the will of God.

With regard to these mysteries, there are some errors against which we ought to be on our guard. One is the neglecting of these mysteries, as if the spiritual efficacy of actions, so plain and simple, must be little or nothing. God has made no barren or useless appointments; and he who made streams to flow from the rock, and healed the bitter waters of Jericho with salt, can easily make the very simplest ceremony the channel for conveying to us the richest spiritual blessings. No ceremony, however splendid and imposing, can, of itself, communicate to us any spiritual good; and the blessing of God can render the very simplest a fountain of life. They grievously err, therefore, who either set aside these mysteries altogether, or treat them with slight regard.

We ought to be equally on our guard against multiplying these mysteries. They derive their efficacy solely from the blessing of God. If they were not of his appointment they could not possibly have any spiritual good connected with them. To introduce more mysteries than God has appointed, is to add to his Word in the most presumptuous and fatal manner. Such pieces of will-worship are not merely useless, they are profane. They not only cannot give a title to the blessing of God, but they must of necessity provoke his wrath. A mystery of God's appointment is a sacred thing,—by far too sacred to be neglected with impunity. A mystery of man's devising is an impious usurpation of God's prerogative.

We ought to guard against the error of supposing that the mere outward act can be available for our good, irrespective of the principles and dispositions with which we engage in these mysteries. Though we have discarded the Romish dogma upon this subject, which ascribes a divine efficacy to the outward act, yet there seem to be not a few who still hold it in effect, and act as if they imagined that the Sacrament would operate somewhat after the manner of a charm, and would prove beneficial to them without any regard to the way in which they engage in it. I need hardly say that such are grievously wrong. We ought not even to think of God, much less to approach him, in even the simplest act of devotion, without the deepest solemnity of feeling; and surely we err very widely when we suppose, or at least act as if we supposed, that a sacrament is merely a form, the efficacy of which has no connection with the character of the recipient.

There are other errors connected with these mysteries, such as making their efficacy to depend upon the intention of him who administers them, or upon their being administered by some one who is possessed of that shadowy thing called apostolical succession, but the discussion of which would be out of place here.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE RIGHT REV. REGINALD HEBER

LATE LORD BISHOP OF CALCUTTA.

WHILE thus indefatigable in his labours as a parish minister, Mr Heber did not lay aside his ardent attachment to the pursuits of literature. About this time he published his poem, entitled "Europe," and commenced occasional contributions to the Quarterly Review, which had recently started. He also composed various hymns, which are still much admired, and about the year 1811, he was prevailed upon by his friends to publish a volume of poems, including "Palestine," which had been set to music by Dr Crotch. After committing this book to the press, his engagements of every kind were suspended by the return of a severe and irritating disease of the skin, which had been originally brought on by exposure to the night air in an open carriage during a part of his continental tour. This affliction he bore with Christian patience and resignation,—lamenting chiefly that it compelled him to be absent from his flock. After some time, by the divine blessing, the medicines used proved successful, and he was restored to his wonted health and usefulness. He now pursued his ministerial and his literary labours with increasing ardour; yet such were the high views which he entertained of the responsibility of a Christian minister, that, amid all his exertions, he was often oppressed with the thought that he was an unfaithful servant of his Lord and Master. Thus, on one occasion he says:—

"I write sermons, and have moderately good congregations; but not better than I had on first commencing my career. The schools, &c., which I projected, are all comparatively at a stand-still; and I am disposed to think, that a man cannot attend to two pursuits at once; and that it will be, at length, necessary to burn my books, like the early converts to Christianity; and since Providence has called me to a station which so many men regard with envy, to give my undivided attention to the duties which it requires. Possibly, for I will own that I am in a gloomy humour, I exaggerate circumstances; but a day seldom passes without my being more or less affected by them. On the whole, perhaps, such repinings at the imperfect manner in which our duties are performed, are necessary parts of our discipline, and such as we can never hope to get rid of."

In 1815 Mr Heber, by appointment, delivered the Fampton Lectures. The subject which he selected for discussion on the occasion was one of great importance—the Divinity, Personality, and Office of the Holy Spirit; and on the publication of these Lectures, he dedicated them to Lord Grenville, Chancellor of the University.

Early in the following year he was seized with a severe attack of erysipelas, from which, however, he soon recovered. He had scarcely regained strength, however, when he was called to lament the loss of his youngest brother, Thomas Cuthbert Heber. The sudden removal of this excellent young man produced a deep impression upon the mind of Mr Heber, and it may be interesting to peruse the following brief sketch of his character, which he has left on record:—

“ To his brothers, his singular disinterestedness, his warmth of attachment and devotion to their service and prospects, can never be replaced. He had himself experienced several vexations and disappointments, which, though of a hasty temper, he bore with calmness and almost indifference; but where the happiness of a friend was concerned, his whole heart was engaged; and there was no labour or inconvenience which he would not incur, almost without knowing that he made a sacrifice. I never knew so warm a heart which felt so little for itself; or one whose few faults were, apparently, in so fair a way of being corrected, when He, who in all things determines best, thought fit to remove him.”

The fame of Mr Heber was not likely to be long in leading to his promotion, and accordingly, we find him, soon after his brother's death, appointed by Dr Luxmore, the late Bishop of St. Asaph, to a stall in that cathedral. About the same time he was called to sustain the responsible character of a parent, by the birth of his first child, which took place in the summer of 1818. This event afforded him high gratification. In the short space, however, of six months, his joy was turned into mourning. The child was snatched away after a very short illness; and so much was the tender heart of the father affected by his loss, that for weeks after he never mentioned the child's name, or heard it mentioned, without tears. The excess of his grief, as might well be expected in so eminent a Christian, at length gave way to a spirit of calm resignation and submission to the divine will.

Mr Heber, both as a scholar and a divine, was held in high estimation. Besides having been appointed one of the preachers before the University of Oxford, he was proposed as a candidate for the preachingship of Lincoln's Inn, the appointment to which has always been considered a post of high honour. And though unsuccessful in his application for this latter office, far from being dispirited, he exerted himself with, if possible, increased ardour in the discharge of those important duties with which Providence had intrusted him. Hitherto he had published but little in his own name, his literary exertions being chiefly directed to the preparation of articles for the Quarterly Review and other leading periodicals. His papers, however, were so highly valued, that he was universally acknowledged to have established his reputation as a writer of eminence. In these circumstances, he received an application from a respectable publisher in London to furnish a life of Jeremy Taylor, along with a critical essay on his writings. This task he readily undertook, and more especially, as he himself was a devoted admirer of the works of Bishop Taylor; but, in its accomplishment, such were the difficulties with which he had to grapple, that it displayed talent of a very high order to produce a biography so interesting, from materials so scanty and unsatisfactory.

In the spring of 1820, putrid sore throat prevailed to an alarming extent in Hodnet, and many of Mr Heber's parishioners were cut off by the disease. The worthy rector embraced every opportunity of benefiting his people in this season of calamity. He entered their houses, to administer the instructions and the consolations of religion, stood by the bed-sides of the sick and the dying, exposing himself fearlessly to infection; and when warned by a friend of the danger he was running, he replied, with devout confidence in the care and the kindness of his heavenly Father, “ Am I not as much in God's keeping in the sick man's chamber as in my own?” It pleased God to preserve him from danger for a considerable time; and when, at length, he and his whole household were attacked with the malignant disease, they were all of them mercifully preserved, and raised up again as monuments of the love and long-suffering goodness of the Almighty.

Impressed with this striking manifestation of divine mercy to himself and all that were dear to him, Mr Heber felt that he was laid under stronger obligations than ever to dedicate his whole energies to the service of his Lord and Master. In attention to his parochial duties, few equalled, none excelled him. His active mind sought to spend every moment of time in a manner fitted to improve either his parishioners or himself. For some years he employed the intervals of more serious study in forming a Collection of Hymns, which, however, did not appear till after his decease.

Early in 1822, a vacancy again occurred in the preachingship of Lincoln's Inn; and Mr Heber being persuaded to become a candidate, through the kind exertions of his friends, he obtained the situation. It was certainly a serious disadvantage, that, to fulfil the important duties of his new appointment, it was necessary to be absent for three months in the year from his beloved flock at Hodnet. He had the consolation, however, of thinking, that, besides enjoying the society of literary men, which was so congenial to his taste, he had now an opportunity of declaring the truths of the Gospel to a class of men whose talents and attainments, not to speak of their wealth, were likely to give them a commanding influence in the country. In his ministrations at Lincoln's Inn, accordingly, Mr Heber endeavoured to speak, with all boldness, as a faithful ambassador of Christ. He composed his sermons with the greatest care and attention to elegance of diction, as became him in addressing an audience of intelligent and accomplished men; but he unfolded to them, with all plainness, the whole counsel of God, in regard to the naturally lost condition of man, and the plan of salvation, through the free grace and mercy of God, as manifested in Christ Jesus.

Mr Heber had for many years taken a lively interest in the cause of missions; and he had often expressed an ardent wish, without the remotest prospect of ever seeing it realized, that the scene of his labours had been among the unnumbered millions of India. In the mysterious providence of God, his desire was at length fulfilled. On the death of the lamented Dr Middleton, Bishop of Calcutta, Mr Heber was fixed upon as a person in all respects suited to occupy a situation of such high responsibility. For some time he was doubtful whether it was his duty to accept of the office; but at last, after much deliberation, and earnest prayer, he came to the resolution of undertaking the arduous duties which were so unexpectedly devolved upon him. To a heart so tender, the thought of separation from his numerous friends was truly painful; and feelingly alive to the harrowing thought, he thus expresses himself in a letter to an early and intimate friend:—

"I often feel my heart sick, when I recollect the sacrifices I must make of friends, such as few, very few, have been blessed with. Yet it is a comfort to me to think, that most of them are younger than myself; and that, if I live through my fifteen years' service, and should then think myself justified in returning, we may hope to spend the evening of our lives together. But be this as it may, I am persuaded that prayer can traverse sea and land, and not only keep affection alive between absent friends, but send blessings from one to the other. Pray for me, my dear Thornton, that my life and doctrine may be such as they ought to be; that I may be content in my station, active in my duty, and firm in my faith; and that when I have preached to others, I may not myself be a castaway."

And again,—

"I indeed give up a good deal, both of present comfort, and, as I am assured, of future possible expectation; and, above all, I give up the enjoyment of English society, and a list of most kind friends, such as few men, in my situation, have possessed. Still, I do not repent the line which I have taken. I trust I shall be useful where I am going; and I hope and believe I am actuated by a zeal for God's service. I yet trust to retain the good wishes and the prayers of my friends, and if I ever return to England, to find that they have not forgotten me. After all, I hope I am not enthusiastic in thinking, that a clergyman is like a soldier or a sailor, bound to go on any service, however remote or undesirable, where the cause of his duty leads him; and my destiny (though there are some circumstances attending it which make my heart ache) has many advantages, in an extended sphere of professional activity."

As a gratifying token of the respect and admiration which the University of Oxford entertained for him, they bestowed upon him the well-merited title of doctor of divinity, and the members of his own college, anxious to perpetuate the recollection of one so great and so good, requested him to sit for his portrait, that it might take its place among the distinguished men who adorn its hall.

Of all the affecting considerations connected with his departure for India, none produced so deep an impression on the mind of Heber as the idea of being finally separated from his dear parishioners at Hodnet. They admired, they loved, they revered him; and, in token of the high estimation in which they held him, they presented him before parting with an elegant piece of plate, bearing an appropriate inscription. The following brief but affecting description of his last visit to Hodnet, is given by Mr Taylor:—

"The Doctor took his final leave of his favourite Hodnet, on the 22d of April 1823. In passing over the high ground near Newport, he turned round to take the last view of that endeared spot, where dwelt numbers, whose hearts he knew were filled with sadness at his departure, and who, he was assured, prayed earnestly for a blessing on the work in which he had engaged. His feelings, which up to this time he had restrained, now burst forth; and, after many most fervent prayers that God would bless the people, and more than supply the loss they might sustain by his departure, with deep emotion, he prophetically, as it afterwards proved, exclaimed, 'I shall never again see my Hodnet! It is, however, an encouragement of no common value, that I carry out with me such good wishes, and such prayers, as I know are offered up on my behalf by many there and elsewhere. Heaven grant that I may do nothing to forfeit the one, or to render the other ineffectual: but that I may be able, at least, to imitate the diligence, the piety, and admirable disinterestedness of my excellent predecessor!'"

A short time before leaving England, he preached his farewell sermon at Lincoln's Inn. The discourse produced a most powerful effect upon his auditors. Among the persons present on that occasion was the late Joseph Butterworth, Esq., whose benevolence and Christian worth are still remembered. On being asked by a friend as they retired from the chapel, how he had been pleased with Dr Heber, he replied with the warmest enthusiasm, "Oh, Sir, thank God for that man! thank God for that man."

Having been consecrated to his high and holy office, Bishop Heber set sail for India on the 16th June 1823. During the voyage he devoted a considerable share of his time to the Hindoostanee language, and on the Sabbath he regularly performed divine service, either on deck or in the cabin, according to the state of the weather.

On his arrival in India, he was introduced to the Governor-General, Lord Amherst, who received him with the utmost courtesy and kindness. The business which now devolved upon him from the first day of his entrance upon his duties was almost overwhelming; but he applied himself to it with the utmost diligence and perseverance. His zeal in the Redeemer's cause found ample scope in India; and he lost no opportunity of promoting the spiritual interests both of Europeans and natives. To the education of the young he paid especial attention. On Sabbath he preached twice, and often three times; and in the multifarious duties of the week no persuasion could prevail upon him to relax his exertions.

"Often have I," says Mrs Heber, "earnestly requested him to spare himself, when, on descending from the pulpit, I have sometimes seen him almost unable to speak from exhaustion; or when, after a few hours' rest at night, he would rise at four the next morning, to attend a meeting, or visit a school, and then pass the whole of the day, till sun-set, in mental labour, without allowing himself the hour's mid-day sleep, in which the most active generally indulge. To these remonstrances he would answer, that these things were necessary to be done; and that the more zealous he was in the discharge of his duties, he could with the greater justice urge activity on such of his clergy as he might deem deficient."

Bishop Heber had not been long in India before he resolved, after having brought the affairs of his diocese in and around Calcutta into a manageable compass, to visit the upper provinces, and more especially, as they had not been visited before. He set out accordingly, but alas! never to return. Throughout several months he pursued his journey with an anxious desire to understand the actual state of matters at every station to which he came. Many were the places he visited, examining the schools, encouraging the missionaries, arranging the affairs of Churches, and in every way fulfilling the trust reposed in him as the Christian bishop of so large a diocese.

The overwhelming fatigue and labour to which he was subjected in the course of this journey, combined with the debilitating influence of a tropical climate upon his constitution, tended to shorten the life of this truly valuable Christian minister. Though frequently reminded by his friends and attendants that it was his duty to spare himself, he persisted in his endeavour to accomplish the great object he had in view. Providence, however, had otherwise decreed. At Trichinopoly he was suddenly summoned, in the midst of his labours, to receive the rich reward which awaited him in heaven.

The circumstances of his death are very distressing. On the 3d of April 1826, after dedicating a considerable time to the ecclesiastical affairs of the station, he returned home, deeply impressed with the necessity of having a missionary placed among them without delay. He spoke in strong terms upon this subject to Mr Robinson, the clerical friend who accompanied him during part of his journey. After this interview, the bishop proceeded to make preparations for entering a bath, distant a few yards from the house.

"He sat," says Mr Robinson, "a few minutes, apparently absorbed in thought, before he went to the bath, which is a separate building, filled from a spring considerably beyond his depth; and then entered it, and, taking off his clothes, plunged in. After an interval of half an hour, his lordship's servant, becoming alarmed at his staying beyond his usual time, and hearing no sound, ventured to open the door, and saw his body, apparently lifeless, below the surface of the water. He ran immediately to my room, and gave the alarm, with a bitter cry, that his master was dead! On reaching the bath I plunged in, and assisted a bearer, who was already there, to lift the body from the water, and Mr Doran and I carried it in our arms into the next room. Every possible means were instantly used to restore suspended animation, but in vain. The garri-son and superintending surgeons, who were on the spot almost immediately, continued their efforts to promote resuscitation for a considerable time, without the least success. All was gone! The blessed spirit was fled, and was, without doubt, already before the throne of God!"

It is impossible to describe the sensation excited by this sudden and melancholy event. The universal admiration felt for the character and Christian worth of the apostolic Heber; his unwearied exertions in the cause of the Redeemer, and his extensive usefulness, had attracted towards him the eyes of Christians with the most intense anxiety. Many were the prayers which had ascended in his behalf from British Christians, both at home and in India, and ardent were their wishes that his valuable life might be long spared. But his work was done, and he went to receive his reward. "Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight."

"Mr Robinson thus expresses his sensations on this melancholy occasion: 'How shall I record my feelings on this sad and miserable day? I am writing by the lifeless body of my dear departed master! Oh what is man! what in his best estate, when most gifted with all that is truly great and admirable! Here lies one whom all loved, whom every heart admired and cherished! One to whom the eyes of all in India, and of thousands in England, were turned with high-raised expectations of usefulness in the Church of Christ:—and how justly! for his whole soul was filled with intense desire for the glory of his divine Master. Here lies one who has been the tenderest and the most affectionate friend, the most condescending and confidential; one whom I have always loved most dearly, but till now knew not how much I loved him.'

"Immediately on his lordship's decease becoming known in the town, consternation and grief were depicted on every countenance. 'The venerable and excellent Mr Kohlhoff visited me,' says Mr Robinson; "and his almost passionate burst of sorrow was deeply affecting. He threw himself into my arms, weeping aloud:—'We have lost our dear father; we have lost our second Swartz, who loved our mission and laboured for it: he had all the energy and all the benevolence of Swartz, and greater condescension. Why has God bereaved us thus?' It was long before the good man's grief was moderated; I cannot wonder at its violence, and I dare not blame it. His hopes had been raised to the utmost height by the labours of unwearied love, which he witnessed at Tanjore, and which he thus described to a friend yesterday: 'If St. Paul had visited the missions, he could not have done more, excepting only his power of working miracles.' And now, alas! all these hopes, and a thousand more, which he and others fondly cherished, are gone for ever! So sudden has been the event, and so serene and heavenly is the expression of his lordship's features, that I can scarcely yet believe the reality of our loss; but this is the last hour I shall pass by his dear side in this world. May grace be given to me, that we may meet again in glory!"

On the following morning the remains of Bishop Heber were carried to the house appointed for all living. Mr Robinson attended as chief mourner, and committed his body to the earth. The occasion was solemn and deeply impressive.

"It required the strongest effort," says Mr Robinson, "to enable me to fulfil this last service to my beloved master; frequently was I interrupted by the tears and sobs of those around me; and when I had closed the book, hundreds of the poor native Christians, whose hearts he won yesterday, by his kindness and condescension, crowded around, entreating to be allowed to throw the earth upon his coffin. I can never forget the awful solemnity of that hour. I cannot yet believe the event: it is like the warning of a disturbed and feverish dream; but we must soon awake to the conviction of its reality; and not we alone, who enjoyed his confidence and affection, but a thousand hearts who trusted to him as the bulwark of Christianity in India."

THE EFFECT OF THE GOSPEL ON THE CONDITION OF THE BLIND.

BY THE REV. LACHLAN MACLEAN,

Chaplain to the Asylum for the Blind, Edinburgh.

"SEARCH," says an eloquent writer, "the annals of the nations of antiquity, or of any country to which the Gospel is a stranger, where, amongst them, do you find any provision for the poor, any asylum for the destitute, any lazaret-house for the sick, any refuge for the penitent profligate?" We may search the pages of antiquity for such indications of humanity, but the search will prove a fruitless one; the nations of antiquity were very differently occupied; instead of endeavouring to lessen the heavy load of human suffering, with an enthusiasm for which Scripture alone enables us to account, they seemed eager to increase it even almost beyond the power of endurance. War, victory, and literary fame, were the objects of their ambition; the first of these, in general, only added to the sum of human wretchedness; the acquisition of the last was too often made at the expense of virtuous feeling, with the loss of moral rectitude, even in its faintest semblance. It must be admitted that their intellectual excellency was great, their moments of art stupendous; but, alas! they were strangers to the "charity that suffereth long and is kind;" little did they regard "the blessing of him that was ready to perish;" little, in their unrenewed state, would they have thought of the glorious, the exalted character of being "eyes to the blind, feet to the lame, and a father to the poor."

The conduct of the Jews, in profession, and, to a certain extent, in practice, was very different. Compassion to the poor and destitute was enjoined upon them in such strong and positive terms by their inspired lawgiver, that, unless determined to throw off even the shadow of allegiance to their God, they could hardly refuse the claims of their suffering brethren. Charity was, therefore, held up to admiration as a public virtue, and commended as indispensable to the character of the good man. Yet, however attentive they might be in this, as in other cases, to the letter of the law, it is to be feared that its spirit was too often lost sight of. They might give their goods to feed the poor, but their history in the pages of the New Testament, manifests a sad want of that which alone renders the act of giving, pleasing in God's sight—charity—love to man.

Jewish charity, even in theory, in its most distant flight, was bounded by the limits of country. Jewish sympathy was confined within a narrower field; it seldom travelled beyond the circle of family or friends. Although in a wider range the wants of the helpless might be relieved, yet pride, unbending pride, withheld the feeling of pitying regard, and checked the accents of tenderness. The same sinful feeling led to the rejection of the Prince of Peace, because he was also the child of poverty and suffering. Another circumstance connected with Jewish history, proving at once the unpitied state of certain sufferers, and the necessity of the Gospel to soften unfeeling hearts, ought not to be overlooked, more especially as that circumstance affected, in no slight degree, the situation of the blind. What we allude to is the rash and presumptuous judgment which the Jews passed upon all who were the subjects of some sudden calamity or unusual visitation. Such were regarded as monuments of divine indignation, either on account of personal or ancestral sins. In this condemned class, if we may be allowed the expression, the blind held pre-eminent rank; the sadness of their bereavement seeming sufficient to prove the presence of aggravated personal or imputed guilt. We find this opinion openly avowed by our Lord's disciples in John ix. 2. But it may be said, that the poor and illiterate disciples were persons likely to be swayed by prejudice. The educated and high-born Pharisees give us, in the 34th verse of the same chapter, their opinion, in the haughty and insulting words (addressed to the man who had given rise to the question of the disciples,) "thou wast altogether born in sins."

We need only refer farther to Matthew xx. 31, to prove indirectly that the opinion was general. There we behold the multitude endeavouring to silence the affecting cry of supplicating blindness; interfering with the claim of suffering humanity upon the Saviour's compassion. And it is certainly not a little striking, that while other petitioners were encouraged, or at least permitted to make their request, without opposition by the crowd, the blind should have been rebuked, and desired to hold their peace.

Every circumstance, in a word, proves, that whatever sympathy other sufferers met with at the hands of a stubborn and corrupted people, the blind, excepting amongst their friends or relations, were destined to experience the bitterness of cold neglect, to be looked upon as persons bearing the fearful impress of heaven's merited resentment. The Saviour came:—the poor, the destitute, the friendless of the human race, were reinstated in the possession of privileges, of which they had been deprived through the pride, ambition, and selfishness of their fellow-men; nay more, they were exalted even above their haughty brethren, for to them the Redeemer's mission was especially directed, to them expressly the Gospel of peace was to be preached; while the blind, freed from a cruel stigma, delivered from an unjust sentence of condemnation, were taken under the blessed Saviour's protection, and elevated by the assurance, "that even their blindness was for the glory of their God." Had nothing else been done for this afflicted, but deeply interesting portion of the Messiah's family, than removing from them an unmerited load of ignominy, a glorious victory would have been gained over presumptuous pride, and arrogant self-righteousness. But the friend of fallen man did more: He left them and every child of suffering to the tenderest care, and claimed for all the sympathy and good will of his followers, as proofs of love to him, their exalted leader.

And how has Christendom fulfilled the solemn trust? Even as it hath other duties,—imperfectly; with, alas! many shortcomings. Still, in the darkest ages, the Saviour's recommendation and example produced a blessed change; they dashed to the ground the cold-blooded system of heathen selfishness; they dissipated the mists of Jewish prejudices, and transported the afflicted members of the Redeemer's flock into a new atmosphere. Such were no longer treated with contemptuous neglect, because incapable of ministering to the pride and ambition of their more favoured brethren; nor, with refinement in cruelty, were they singled out as "sinners above all," because sorely afflicted.

Their equal claim to the rights of heavenly citizenship was cheerfully admitted by the most exalted of their fellow-worshippers; their undeniable title to meet with sympathy was acknowledged by every follower of a once suffering but now glorified Mediator. In that sympathy the blind largely shared: their affecting situation, their dependence upon their fellow-men, the intimate connexion which their brethren had with God made manifest in the flesh, recommended them to the pitying regard of all who bore the name of Jesus. "He is blind," was sufficient to silence the voice of railing, and to soften hearts unused to kindly emotion. In truth, it might almost be said, that the extent to which the blind were pitied, proved in certain respects injurious to them, as it prevented a calm and dispassionate inquiry into their real condition, and (for a long period) any attempt to render them, what they now are, useful members of society. The blind were helpless, and it was taken for granted their case was hopeless; their education was neglected, because it was considered impossible to educate them; to ask them to labour would have been regarded as cruel and unfeeling. They met with tenderness, but the rich intellectual mine that lay concealed under a dark surface was left unexplored. Childhood with others soon terminated, but with the blind man it continued, in some respects, through life; for he was never called upon to engage in active duties, but was left to drag on a weary, though certainly not an unpitied, existence. The sorrowing mother sighed as she gazed upon the sports of the young, or listened to their shouts of thoughtless merriment; for in their sports, in that merriment, her dark, her solitary child, could not participate. With the same pitying feeling did she regard him when he had reached manhood, for he was still as helpless as when a child, a stranger to any art, unable to provide for himself—he was still her poor blind boy. All this proceeded from the same mistaken idea, that because the blind were deficient in one respect, their general condition was capable of little improvement; and yet some of the blind had given noble proofs, that although the eye of sense was closed, the intellect was the abode of light. They had poured forth their souls in strains of the most exalted and of the most pathetic harmony;—the surface of the earth, in its ever-varying line of roads, had acknowledged the power of the blind surveyor;—they had surmounted the loftiest heights of science, and even calculated the revolutions of orbs that to them rolled in impenetrable darkness. These circumstances, and others of a similar character, had not been unnoticed; but the attempts to improve upon them were feeble and short-lived. They were destined at length, however, effectually to attract the attention of the pious and humane.

The blind were already, through the Gospel, secure of human sympathy; all that they required was some zealous and intelligent advocate to bring their claims before a Christian community.

This advocate, in Edinburgh, was found in the Rev. Dr Johnston, minister of North Leith, a man of a vigorous and truly apostolic mind,—a man possessed of the most exalted piety to God, and unwearied benevolence to his fellow-creatures.

Through the instrumentality of Dr Johnston,* the Edinburgh Asylum was opened in September 1793; and perhaps the best way of manifesting the effects of the Gospel, or Gospel principles, on the condition of the blind, will be to explain briefly the advantages and means of instruction which are enjoyed in that institution.

If the venerable founder's hopes of success were from the beginning great, time has only served to prove that they were by no means over-sanguine; for the blind, rescued from a life of listless inactivity and helpless dependence, soon manifested the happiness which they experienced at being enabled to assist themselves—at being placed, as far as was possible, on a level with their seeing brethren, by directing their attention, with characteristic perseverance, to the different arts in which it was proposed to instruct them. Their success in these arts it is unnecessary here to state. It is more pleasing to reflect upon the happiness which they must have experienced on finding that the line which separated them from the rest of mankind was not, in some respects, an impassable one. They, too, could labour for the bread that perisheth;—they had entered into the field of industry, had now something to engage their attention and stimulate their energies.

To one class of the blind, such a change must have been peculiarly comforting,—we allude to those who, in advanced life, either through accident or disease, have lost their sight. How often must such persons have been heard, in bitterness of heart, exclaiming that they were reduced to helplessness! To them the cheering answer can now be given,—your hands may still be taught to minister to your necessities; a home is prepared for you, where your sorrows will be alleviated by sympathy and companionship in privation. Brotherhood in affliction is generally found to lessen its severity. It is in a remarkable manner the case with the blind community; no one is heard complaining of a loss common to all around him. The stranger insensibly imbibes the spirit of his neighbours, and soon perceives that he has at length come amongst those who have kindred feelings, which they alone can describe in language that he best understands.

The question has been repeatedly put to the writer—Are not the blind dull and melancholy? On one occasion, when the whole family was assembled, he repeated the observation; it was instantly met by a smiling contradiction. The opinion was not, however, altogether groundless; the loss of sight must ever give a melancholy expression to the countenance, and there cannot be a doubt, that acquaintanceship with the unemployed or solitary blind will, in most instances, serve to strengthen the idea. In the Asylum, the case is very different. The amusements of the younger branches after the hours of labour, and the cheerful conversation, or occasional harmless jest of the more advanced, prove the happy effects of social intercourse between those of similar pursuits, feelings, and circumstances. The statement of one of their number may be given on this point. A visitor, in presence of the chaplain, asked an aged and infirm member of the institution if he was happy and comfortable? "Yes," was the prompt reply, "I am happy. It would be my own fault if I was not, and I am comfortable; I only wish that I could work for what I receive." And yet, after so generous an avowal of contentment, the highest allowance to the blind is, for very obvious reasons, lower than could be desired.

* This zealous apostle of benevolence continued to be the soul of the institution, until the infirmities of age, and the distance of his house from the Asylum, interrupted his visits. His heart, however, was with his blind family, for to the last he struggled in the cause of humanity, leaving those for whom he had done so much, as a legacy of love to his nephew, the present Secretary. The way in which that gentleman has attended to the charge of his departed relative, cannot be better described than by the following concise, yet comprehensive statement, made to the writer by the oldest member of the establishment:—"He (Mr Johnston) looked after us from 1802, but in 1816 he came amongst us altogether."

Let us now turn to another source of happiness to the inmates of the Asylum—education. The young are instructed in spelling, grammar, geography, history, and arithmetic. To state that increase of useful knowledge is also increase of happiness, would be maintaining a self-evident truth; but if the case be so in ordinary circumstances, how much more strikingly is it verified in those of the blind! Deprived of the delights of vision, the blind are thrown more than others upon their mental resources for enjoyment. They thus soon become aware of the advantages of instruction, both as exercising their naturally strong reflecting powers, and gratifying their eager desire for information. In addition to this, instructive and interesting works are regularly read in the Asylum. That the inmates have profited by these judicious arrangements, can be most triumphantly established. They have invented the means of communicating their ideas by knots on a piece of cord;—they have improved and simplified Dr Saunderson's Arithmetical Board;—they have, at several public examinations, proved themselves possessed of no mean attainments in scholarship;—they have sent some of their number as teachers to other establishments, and even the poetic muse has not disdained to hold converse with her blind votaries.

The provision made for the highest of all sources of happiness remains yet to be considered. The blind assemble twice a-day for family worship. On Saturday afternoon, after a short lecture upon some part of the sacred volume, the boys and girls (in presence of the adults,) are catechised. On Monday morning, the attendance at church is ascertained; the junior members repeat portions of the Scriptures, and are then examined upon the sermons delivered in their different places of worship. To state that the blind conduct themselves on these occasions with propriety, would be a kind of negative praise; something more may be safely said. They join in the performance of religious duties with every appearance of the deepest interest, manifesting, by their outward deportment, their consciousness of being in the immediate presence of Him who, though invisible to mortal sight, is yet seen by the brighter eye of faith. It may not be out of place to state, that the chaplain has been often asked by his younger friends to explain expressions occurring in the course of reading. Two instances of this may be given, evincing close attention and inquisitive minds in the youthful querists. A very young boy requested an explanation of the words "literal and figurative," while another made the same request with respect to "intercommunity of goods."

The boys, it is stated above, repeat portions of Scripture every Monday morning. It is pleasing to add, that this (to them especially) all-important duty, is attended to with the utmost regularity. They are taught to repeat these passages of Scripture by an individual named John Maclaren (himself blind from infancy,) the only surviving original member of the institution. The name and qualifications of this interesting man have been frequently brought before the public; still one or two observations may now be made, which, while they prove the advantages of education to the blind, may also tend to induce persons so situated to cultivate, what to them is invaluable—memory.

Nearly the whole of the Word of God is treasured up in John's remembrance; but not a dead letter, it regulates his own life, and is useful to those around him. At one time inadvertently, on another occasion intentionally, (because conceived to be unedifying,) two short notes on the chapters read during family worship were omitted. The omissions were marked; and, after the conclusion of the service, to the astonishment of the chaplain, the notes were repeated almost verbatim; although, in the one case, two years at least, and, in the other, six must have elapsed since his watchful hearer had last heard them. A few months ago, the writer, wishing to learn something of the history of the Asylum from its commencement, applied to John for assistance. The desired information was promptly, and, it has since been ascertained, most accurately given. Nothing important or unimportant, connected with the Asylum, escaped his notice. The dates of eight different examinations,—the dates and texts of thirty-six sermons, preached in behalf of the Institution, with the Preachers' names, occasionally the state of the weather at the time, with, in one instance, (when asked,) an outline of a sermon preached above twenty years previous, formed part of the information. Without the slightest idea that it was possible, it was playfully observed, what a pity it is that you cannot give us a list of the deaths and marriages of the members of the house since it was opened. Both lists, with their respective dates, were actually given; and along with the date of every death down to the period when the writer became connected with the Asylum, a brief account of each individual, "to prove," as the kind-hearted old man remarked, "that something more was remembered of those who were away, than merely their deaths." Much more might be said on so pleasing a subject, did the limits or object of this article permit.*

But we must proceed now to remark, that while it is self-evident a happy change has taken place in the condition of the blind, it is no less evident that others have been benefited by the change, as well as the blind themselves. When good is done and thankfully acknowledged, the benefit is mutual,—shared by him who gives and him who receives. We speak not now, however, of the consciousness,—truly blessed to the believer,—that he has done his duty to his suffering brethren, but of the effects which the developed faculties of the blind are calculated to produce on society in general. By their perseverance, under so many disadvantages, the seeing are stimulated to greater exertion; by their successful application, the parents of the youthful blind are comforted, and the young themselves cheered by the hopes of equal success; by the delicacy of their perceptions, and the variety of their resources, the Christian is led to admire and adore the wisdom of the Creator who has so constituted man, that when one organ is lost or injured, the flexibility of those that remain is such, that, leaving their own sphere, and journeying into the field which seemed to be closed for ever, they lighten the bereavement by their united efforts.

The blind have been briefly contemplated, while discharging the ordinary duties of life, in their intercourse with each other, in their intellectual powers and mental habits; it may form no uninteresting conclusion to the whole, to contemplate them also on the bed of death,— a situation where, comparatively speaking, the soundness of principle and the sincerity of religious profession seldom fail being brought to light. The bed of death, under any circumstances, is a solemn, an affecting scene; when we stand beside it, and think of the pangs which the sufferer may be enduring, while the soul is beating against the yielding bars of its imprisonment, our hearts are oppressed within us. When we contemplate the change which a few hours may produce, when the liberated spirit shall have begun its unreturning flight into an eternal land, we seek in thought to follow its mysterious flight; but imagination, that cannot grasp the soul while inhabiting the tenement of clay, sinks back to earth in its attempt to pursue the immortal pilgrim, and fancy itself shrinks abashed from the dark curtain beyond which the soul, the breath of immortality, must soon pass. Such thoughts render the scene fearfully impressive; we feel as if standing on the extreme boundary of time, surrounded by the messengers of an eternal world. But if there be any circumstances that can invest death with even greater solemnity, and still more powerfully awaken our sympathies, it is the thought that the day,—not the day, but the night of existence,—is to the sufferer drawing to a close, and that the eye, sealed against the light of time, must soon open in the eternal kingdom. Such, at least, were the effects produced upon the writer's mind by the scene which he is about to describe. He only regrets that he cannot always give the very words of the departed; but the sentiments, and manner of expressing them, can never be effaced from memory while memory lasts.

The case to which reference is to be made is that of a young woman, who had, for upwards of twelve years, been a member of the establishment, but did not reside in the Asylum, merely working and receiving instructions in it during the day, and retiring in the evening, with another woman, to a small apartment which both occupied. The circumstances of both were in every respect almost similar; both were perfectly blind, the former had been so from her birth; the latter had lost her sight during infancy; and both, it is pleasing to add, were partakers of the same glorious hopes.

The young woman first alluded to, was naturally of a weak and delicate constitution; a severe cold, against which she struggled, perhaps too long, at last confined her to bed. The writer of this article, on his first visit, was convinced that, to the sufferer, it was the bed of death. The seeds of consumption that had long lurked in her feeble frame, had now acquired a strength, and fearful energy of character, that could leave no doubt as to the solemn result. Of this the sufferer herself was perfectly aware; for it was her first remark, on hearing the well known voice of her visitor, that the hour of nature's last conflict was at hand. Of death she spoke without alarm or fear, nay, it might almost be said, with delight; for the dark earth contained little that could call forth a sigh from her on leaving it. The grave had dissolved most of the ties that bound her to time; those that still remained unbroken would, she hoped, be one day indissolubly renewed in heaven. The mention of heaven seemed to bring back strength to the fainting heart, for heaven was the land of sight; there, for the first time, light would burst upon her astonished gaze; there would she see her Master face to face. Heaven was indeed to her a delightful land; it was the abode of the just made perfect,—the weary pilgrim's resting-place,—the habitation of her God and "Master," (such was the term she most frequently applied to the Redeemer.) But, oh! (and on that she dwelt with transport,) it is the land of vision. Consolation she needed not from man, for all was peaceful within. For a moment, the writer was afraid that she was too eager to depart; but the answer to his observation removed all fear on that head: it was, that she wished much to be with the Master, in happiness. But.

* Those desirous of further information regarding John M'Laren, are referred to a very interesting article in the Saturday Magazine for October 1, 1836. One remark, however, in that paper, may be corrected. It is said that John occasionally officiated during family worship in the Asylum: he used certainly to do so at one time, but not since the appointment of the present chaplain.

after some affecting allusions to her trials and distresses on earth, she declared her willingness, if for the glory of God and her own good, to tarry a little longer, although to depart was far better. The advantages derived from the Asylum* were acknowledged with gratitude; and the duties in which she had there engaged, but would engage no more, were spoken of as the subject of joyful recollection. She soothed and comforted her sorrowing blind companion, her only nurse, as she watched by the bed of languishing, eager to anticipate every wish, and desired her not to mourn as those without a hope, but to think of the happy day when they would at length behold each other's countenances.

Every visit tended to strengthen the opinion which the writer had formed, after six years' acquaintance with the sufferer,—that she was indeed prepared to die,—that she had been long endeavouring to work out her salvation with fear and trembling; and "that her work of faith, her labour of love, and patience of hope, in the Lord Jesus Christ, had not been in vain." Here, it is true, was the abode of darkness,—for the blind were there; but it was also the place of spiritual light,—for the Sun of Righteousness seemed to shine upon his dying servant, with scarce a cloud between; spiritual strength and heavenly hopes remained unshaken to the end, for "even her last accents whispered praise."

The thought that one lowly follower of the Lamb was thus saved, through Christian sympathy, from want, must be delightful to every feeling heart. The existence of institutions where the hand is taught to labour; where the helpless are sheltered from the storms of time; where the children of earthly darkness are directed to Him who can give celestial light, is a glorious testimony to the heavenly character of the religion that inculcates such labours of love upon its followers, and loudly proclaims the condescension and all-providing love of the blessed Redeemer, who has identified himself with the humblest of his children.

Might not, we would ask, (even could nothing more be said,) such institutions, founded by Christian principle and upheld by Christian sympathy, dispose the Infidel to pause in his mad attempts to break the chain which connects man with his God, and to explode, as airy visions, the blessed doctrines and merciful arrangements of the sufferer's only friend? What would be the condition of the poor in general, but especially that of the blind, were such an awful revolution effected? The infidel may assure us, that the blind might trust to the sympathies of human nature. Alas! we cannot credit the statement; for the records of human nature, unblesed by the Gospel, are dark records of blood, crime and cruelty. The powerful trampled upon the weak; the cry of distress was drowned by the clash of arms; it reached not hearts hardened by sin, unceasingly convulsed by the wild tumult of degrading passions. Driven from this resource, the infidel may direct us to civilized man as the generous friend of the afflicted. Alas! still for human nature. We have seen, that amongst the cultivated nations of antiquity the mild and peaceful virtues of the cross had no existence. When we turn to modern times, and behold, amongst the most highly civilized and cultivated, the consummation of the infidel's wishes, infidelity is found to be worse than heathenism. The latter was stained by blood,—the former was bathed in it: the latter was cruel through ignorance, or evil instruction; of the cruelty of the former we shall not attempt to speak, for language cannot describe it. Would that, for the honour of the name of man, fallen and degraded though it is, the fearful page could be covered by the veil of everlasting forgetfulness!

No, the only friend of the poor is the Son of God; he it is who has enthroned the blind in the best sympathies of his people; he it is alone who has secured for them the affectionate interest of their brethren. If, then, Scripture in its care for the blind has denounced a curse upon the man who puts a stumbling-block in their path, what must be the condemnation of him who seeks, by the destruction of religious principle, to rob the blind of their best inheritance, to doom them to a life of untried, uncared for suffering on a dark earth; and oh! worse than all, to a never-ending existence of sorrow and wretchedness throughout a dark eternity.

MORTALITY AND IMMORTALITY: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM STEVENSON,

"This mortal must put on immortality."—

1 COR. XV. 53.

STRICTLY speaking, the text merely asserts the doctrine of the resurrection, that this dying body shall assume a new form, under which death shall have no more power over it. But it is proposed, in the present instance, to take a more extensive view of the apostle's words, and to found upon them three several propositions.

I. We are mortal. As a simple statement of truth, this proposition needs neither proof nor illustration. If it did, the one might be found in the churchyard, the other in the sighs of the mourner. But while we all know and acknowledge the fact of our mortality, it is strange how seldom we consider it, how little we are affected by it. There would, indeed, be no singularity in our indifference, if our present state were uncongenial to our affections and pursuits, for then might we rejoice to be forever rid of it. But this is very far from being the case; and such indifference does become highly enigmatical, when we remember the intense and universal attachment to the world and the things thereof, that is manifested by our race. When we behold the whole family of man, ceaselessly and strenuously occupied with the affairs of time, and so occupied in entire accordance with the natural bent of their minds, it does seem strange that we should be all alike unconcerned about death, which must soon tear us away in cruel mockery of our misplaced attachments. Nay, the delusion is yet grosser than this; for those among us who are the most devoted to pleasure, and who sacrifice every hour, and every capacity, to the gratification of mere sensuality, are universally found to be the most regardless of death, the most insensible to truth, the most difficult to arouse. This can be accounted for only on the supposition, that they think not at all, either of mortality or immortality, that sensual pleasure is an opiate powerful enough to lull every anxiety, to preclude every solemn reflection.

And yet it seems incomprehensible, how any thinking being should be able to shut his eyes to the fact that he is dying. The world is full of death, from the first and feeblest efforts of life, up to its most perfect examples. "The grass withereth, the flower thereof fadeth," and we sigh on finding ashes where we had once found beauty. They wither and fade; but shall we mourn over the fallen pride of summer, when we see man, the stay of a virtuous family, the revered object of many friendships, going to his long home; and when the very bud of human life is perishing before us, unformed and undeveloped? All this is daily passing under our eyes, and still we think not. Blanks are made in our households; bereavements disappoint our affections; and where, in a few days, is the difference? Time soon dries up the tears of every sorrow. Our hearts adapt themselves to new relations, and entwine themselves around new objects. Grief spends its vehemence, and things move on in their usual train. Assuredly all things move on. Our personal progress in every valuable acquirement, may be at a pause as we stand still to mourn the dead that fall thick around us. But time rolls majestically, and always onward, unconstrained and unimpeded by the wreck it makes; and whether we think of it or not, we are carried forward in its train. Soon shall we too sleep,—we shall sleep long and soundly, for the grave shall be our bed. The mourners, for a day, shall go about the streets, and then the place that now knows us, shall know us no more for ever. The stations we had left shall be filled by others, on whom the doom of mortality shall press, as it presses on us. Like us, they shall play their part on the stage of time; and then, still like us, they shall pass behind the curtain of death and be forgotten. So all things run their course, and enter into darkness:—

The smiling dawn, the laughing blue-eyed day,
The grey-beard eve, incessantly pass on;
Fast-fleeting generations, born of time
And buried in eternity, they pass.

And as they pass, it is well there should be some elasticity in the human heart, some capacity of adapting itself to new circumstances and relations. But it is not well, that the lessons they set in passing should be unread, unremembered, and, therefore, unimproved.

We have not time to mourn. The worse for us.
He that lacks time to mourn, lacks time to mend.
Eternity mourns that. 'Tis an ill cure
For life's worst ills to have no time to feel them.
Where sorrow's held obtrusive and turn'd out,
There wisdom will not enter.

II. We are immortal; and it is from this second fact in our destinies that death derives most of its solemnity, and all its moral force. If, when men died, they ceased to be, or if, as a mighty nation once, in madness, proclaimed, death were an eternal sleep; it could no longer be terrible to any but those whose pleasures it abridged. Notwithstanding the recoil which all young and sanguine minds feel at the idea of utter extinction, even this would seem a cradle of most inviting repose to men who dragged out a miserable existence, burdened with the infirmities of age, or disgusted with the world. No matter what had been the course or the character of their previous existence, death, a rest on which not even a troubled dream could intrude, must have been to such a most welcome friend. But the eternity that lies beyond, dark, unknown, and interminable, makes most men pause, shuddering on the brink of fate, irresolute to encounter the indefinite terrors of that shadowy land. Yes, brethren, had death been the end of existence, it might still have been preceded by bodily pain, and consummated amid grinding convulsions, enough to awe the most heartless by-stander. But it would have been tamed down to the measure of its mere animal sufferings, which may be easily alleviated and as easily shortened; it would have been stript of all those spiritual and, therefore, overwhelming alarms, with which the belief of the soul's immortality has invested it.

But the case is widely different,—it is different by the whole latitude of infinity, when we know that there is an hereafter,—that this mortal must put on immortality,—that our eternal existence is irrevocably decreed by heaven. For then, it becomes apparent that death is only a change of state and locality,—a transition from one region of being to another; in which transition, indeed, the body is lost for a time, but through which the busy spirit within shall pass unimpaired in its vitality, unaltered in its essential functions. Such is the doctrine of Scripture,—such, therefore, must soon be the fate and experience of us all. We may easily, and by a thousand methods, dis sever the soul from that frail habitation in which it lives, and moves, and has its being now; but God,—a God of judgment,—has not left it in our power to quench the spark of life with which he has animated the invisible spirit itself. In what quarter of the universe,—in what paradise, or place of darkness, concealed from our view by the wide expanse of creation, the receptacle of disembodied souls has been fixed, we know not, nor need we impatiently inquire, as we shall soon see for ourselves. The momentous consideration is, that our state of being, in that new region, shall be everlasting. The only changes there, shall be accomplished in the resurrection and the judgment. Then all shall be completed. The record of this poor world shall be closed, and its dissolution by fire, decreed from the beginning, shall be finally executed.

But the souls of men,—our souls, brethren,—shall still exist. They shall exist for ever, with all their capacities and sensibilities entire; nay, quickened and whetted in them all. They shall exist for ever, indestructible in their essence, irrepressible in their energies, susceptible of thought and emotion, and suffering in eternity as they have been in time. It is fearful, brethren, to think, that this very spirit, busied now with trifles, must continue to exist, busied with something, for ever and ever—that the sun of human life, which must soon set amid the gloom of a troubled night, shall instantly rise again in another sphere, to track its destined and eternal course. It is fearful, not because the pious believer has any thing to dread from such duration, for to him it is a prospect of unmingled glory, but because infinitude is a sublime mystery, baffling every attempt to measure it, and awing us into silent amazement. In eternity, there is no revolving year to mark off successive ages, no circling seasons to divide the year, no more death, teaching men to number their days. There, all space is boundless, all succession endless, if succession can be called what is but one continual present, one unchanging and eternal now. Struggle as we may with this mighty idea, we cannot master it. Still there are certain elements of known truth which may aid us in our estimate; I mean the eternal blessedness of the saints, the eternal misery of the lost. We can form some notion of indefinitely lengthened happiness, and of eternally lingering woe, which shall both be realized in the future before us.

And, brethren, that is a lovely picture which the ransomed of the Lord shall then present, as they dwell together under their Father's eye, and in their Father's house, where all is peace, and harmony, and love, singing with angels those anthems of praise which swell and echo for ever through the vaulted heavens. Eternity, incomprehensible as it is to us, shall never seem too long to them, as thus they live and sing without weariness and without end. But it is appalling to reflect, on the other hand, that those hearts which ache so often here, may hereafter ache for ever. Then, if our souls be lost, it shall be alike impossible to heal or to forget our sorrows. Mere fatigue may lull the most wretched here into the repose of a little slumber; but when this mortal shall put on immortality, there shall be no opiate for ever and ever, to soothe the spirit's sorest anguish, no drop of water to cool the parched tongue, not even a troubled dream to vary the uniformity of torture. The spirit may prey for ever on itself, but shall never be consumed—it may weep and wail for ever, without wailing itself to rest. It may roll itself on the hissing billows that crest the fiery lake of perdition, and thus its torments may be increased, but itself can neither be extinguished nor disabled. It has cast off all that is perishable. It has once crossed the Jordan of death, and now can die no more; nay, rather, must now be dying for ever—with it, this mortal has put on immortality.

III. The change between the present and future conditions of man, will not destroy the identity either of his person or character. The very same that dies here shall live for ever hereafter, for it is this mortal that must put on immortality. It would be worse than useless to entangle ourselves at present with any metaphysical subtleties, regarding the nature of personal identity; or to inquire whether the body of the resurrection shall consist of those very particles of matter which constitute the previous body of death. You can easily see that howsoever these points may be decided, the self-same spirit must exist in the two states; and that this truth is of the highest moment, for it follows that the same desires and habits of thought,—the same tone and temper of mind which we have acquired and indulged here, will follow us into the world of spirits. The painted butterfly, on passing from its previous condition, as a caterpillar, undergoes as remarkable a transition in its tastes and habits as in its form. It will not be so with man when he casts off his mortal coil. There is no alchemy in death to distil charitable and holy dispositions from the gross elements of selfishness and malignity,—in it there is no purgatorial fire to change our base metal into refiner's gold. As the soul enters the troubled waters of dissolution, so must it pass out of them on the other side, bearing that very transcript of character which time and the world have written on it. When we have once reached that last stage of our earthly pilgrimage, the sentence goes forth,—“he that is holy, let him be holy still,—he that is filthy, let him be filthy still.” Yes, brethren, the character is formed and consolidated before death be reached. No further change then awaits it, for the day of probation and acquirement is past,—the day of retribution come. Were we to die this moment we must stand before God in judgment exactly as we are. Those of us who have sought and found pardon and justification through Christ, and whose hearts have already been set on the things that are above, would be carried home to the presence and enjoyment of these heavenly things. But, on the other hand, those of us whose hearts are filled with lust and covetousness would enter eternity with these affections engraved on our souls, to witness against us in judgment. For so it is that “this mortal must put on immortality.” Now mark the condition of the wicked, and see how fearful is the misery to which they have doomed themselves. The worst passions of our nature still ferment in their bosoms, but can no more be gratified. Their cravings are still as insatiable as ever, though they be for ever cut off from indulgence. For it is obvious, that how inordinately soever their desires may be set on the world, from that world and its pleasures, they have been summarily called away, never to return. Cravings like these, acting inextinguishably under an absolute despair of ever being satisfied, would make a hell in every breast they haunted, in spite of all possible outward arrangements. They constitute, in all probability, when united with remorse, the worm that never dieth, and the fire that shall never be quenched.

You can easily see then, brethren, how closely and vitally, according to this view, our future fate is connected with our present condition and pursuits. If we must enter into eternity with souls bearing the stamp and impress which they have acquired in the world; and if our happiness, not for a dreary winter's night,—not even for a lifetime, but for an endless existence, be dependent on the spiritual image which that stamp bears, then we are surely mad if we be not straining every nerve to mould and fashion it aright. Are we striving then, day by day, incessantly, to lay the restraints of godliness on our naturally rampant corruption? Are we watching and praying to guard our hearts from temptation by all the defences of piety and devotion? Why, if we be not, then do those very characters which must fix, nay, make our doom hereafter, be at the mercy of the world and its fitful impulses; those spirits which must soon stand in immortality before God, are laid open to every evil influence,—to every insinuating temptation that the world may present to our senses. In such a case, the moral image we bear, cast in the base mould of the world, shaped and indurated by the force of habit, can resemble nothing less than the holiness of God, and can, therefore, be fitted for no place worse than for his presence. If we live thus, our morbid affections must go with us to the shadowy land of immortals, and be our tormentors there for ever and ever. We have our allotment of time and of privilege here for the very purpose of preparing us for heaven. The allotment is a rich one. Every means of grace is provided and set before us in a Saviour;—a Spirit of grace, a relation, and a series of religious ordinances; and blessed, brethren, blessed of your God are ye who understand these things, who hunger and thirst after righteousness, who, taking Jesus for your example and surety, strive steadily and resolutely to be like him. You may go mourning over your sins and imperfections, but, praying as you go, you are ever growing in that divine likeness, for the Holy Spirit from on high is himself writing the laws and character of heaven in bright and beautiful transcript on the fleshly tablets of your hearts.

See to it then, all of you, that you devote your time to the work of preparing for immortality. Alas! though this be all we have to do here, yet, self-deluded sinners that we are, how many of us make it our last and our least concern! Mammon, in some of his forms, is the god of our universal idolatry. Give us but his gilded mark in our forehead, and we go contented to perdition. No nation, no tribe of men ever shewed more dauntless perseverance, more fiery and reckless enthusiasm in the pursuit of wealth and influence than we have done. No race of ambition was ever more keenly contested than that in which we either have engaged, or are willing to engage. In the dust and confusion of this strife, which brings man's worst passions into play, and chains down every nobler aspiration of his soul, we forget that we are impressing this mortal with the lineaments of a character which may embitter our eternity. The talents and affections which we most cultivate are such as can find neither scope nor exercise in heaven. Unless then, by the grace of God, we break forth from their iron grasp, they must sink us into hell; and what, ye covetous, shall your gains avail you, when this mortal shall—to-morrow, perhaps—have put on its immortality? Can they buy a pardon from the King of Glory? can they bribe the justice of heaven, or bend the God of nations from his immutable rectitude? And what, ye ambitious dreamers, can the pride of this poor world do for you in the hour of nature's extremity? Here ye may win the deafening shouts of a miserable and hollow applause; but unless ye can subvert Jehovah's throne, and trample on his power, as ye have trampled on his mercy, the name you make yourselves on earth can never, without repentance, be heard in heaven. Perhaps you are stifling the reproaches of your consciences, under the preposterous fallacy of waiting till you have leisure for repentance. Is time, then, to be sacrificed as one great holocaust to the idol of this world, and its dregs merely, its refuse, to be kept for God and immortality? or have you muzzled the devouring jaws of death till you have time to repent? Nay, the destroyer is coming fast upon you, and you shall soon sleep with those you have mourned. Time, too, as it passes, is stamping a deeper character of ungodliness on the souls of the ungodly, as well as writing its traces of decay in wrinkles on their brows. And is this a position in which it is wise, or safe, or excusable, to linger for a moment? Surely there is not an instant to be lost. Turn then, brethren, turn to the stronghold, as prisoners of hope.

SKETCHES OF THE PARISH.

BY THE PASTOR OF THE PARISH OF E—K.

No. I.

[From an address delivered on the beginning of January 1830.]

"When a few years are come, then I shall go the way wherence I shall not return."—Jos. xvi. 22.—Death is here compared to a way; to a way which every one must tread; to a way—the way of all the earth—by which there is no return; and to a way which, at longest, must soon be trod:

WITHIN these twelve months past, I visited this parish in my official capacity as a minister of the Gospel, set over you in the Lord. In the course of this visitation I found eighty-seven families dwelling together in unity, and all enjoying a stock of health, peace, and comfort. The cheerful looks of the young, mingled with a becoming diffidence and shyness, dressed, many of them, in their better clothes, with their minds prepared, and some of them with their Bible in their hand, delighted me, while seated with them around the clean swept family hearth. Their parents, with the look of welcome and kindness, found a ready way to my heart,—for they have an interest there. In the course of these visitations I numbered the people, and found them to be four hundred and fifty-seven souls. I have been since, and during the year, watching the ebbing and flowing of our population, which, like the ebbing and flowing of the stream that perpetuates our name, has been rapid and remarkable. Twelve of our number have been removed (by death,) and the names of some of them are almost losing their place in the tablet of our memory. Three of these twelve were only from one year to three years old; and did not the destroying angel whisper to each of these infants, "This year thou shalt die!" Four of these twelve were but little below and little above the mid term of life; but to each of them the destroying angel whispered also, though in a whisper that was not heard by us, "This year thou shalt die!" Five of these twelve numbered more than four-score years, yet have they also been cut off!—they have passed away! Nine of these twelve were heads of families, so nearly the ninth of all the families we met in health and comfort within the twelve months are gone. Two of these nine formed, at the beginning of the year, but one family, the father of which stands the first, and the mother the last on the same list of the year. Their children are enrolled with themselves, and are numbered among those who have gone down to the land of forgetfulness.

Now, when we call up these and other recollections, which may be particular to particular individuals, have not these words a meaning—an awfully important meaning to some of us, "This year thou shalt die?" Have not the words of Job an awfully emphatic meaning to us all: "When a few years are come, then I shall go the way whence I shall not return."... Bring back but the beginning of the past year, and the brawny, muscular arm which lifted the ponderous hammer from the clang of the anvil, forced the iron to assume a shape, and left on its surface marks which indicate that life, and strength, and design were there,—that arm is now unstrung by death; and the man of art, with his tender and helpless family, "being dead yet speaketh." "When a few years are come, then ye shall go the way whence ye shall not return."..... The hoary-headed chronicler, whose memory was a journal of the life and acts of your fathers, has ceased; and has for ever ceased to publish them. Death has closed the quick eye,—stopped the once ready tongue; and all the daughters of music have been brought low—even to the dust..... The aged patriarch, whose face was once so familiar to you in this place, (the house of God,) seems yet, though dead, to sit before me in all the sincerity and delight of heavenly devotion. The reflection is pleasant! but he has "gone the way whence he shall not return."..... The shepherd, that once tended his fleecy flock,—winded up and around the steep hill with activity and vigour—that returned in the evening to the bosom of his family—is now no more:

"One day I miss'd him on th' accustom'd hill,
Along the heath, and near his favourite tree
Another came—nor yet beside the rill, Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he!"

...The tenant of the soil, whose face and appearance is still fresh to you, and calls up all the qualities you would ascribe to an open-hearted friend,—whose name is associated with whatever is honest and honourable among men,—the tenant of the soil has ceased to be; no longer do we meet him on the road where we have met him so often; and no more shall we hear him salute us with the voice of welcome, and in his own peculiar tone of kindness. Oh! in a short time it will be said of us, as it is now said of him, and of all these, "they are not;" for when a few years shall have come, we shall go the way whence we shall not return.

Though one generation passeth away another cometh. The subject is, therefore, doubly important to us; for there have been nearly double the number of births that there have been of deaths amongst us; and when a greater number is introduced, and intrusted to our care, a greater degree of zeal, activity, and labour, is necessary. Those that are no more, preach to us in the dumb language of death, and urge on us to apply it personally in the words of the patriarch, to which we have already alluded. While I have mentioned the decrease and increase of our numbers—for it is somewhat remarkable that there have been six marriages in the course of the year,—double the number of deaths that there have been marriages,—and nearly double the number of births that there have been deaths; while I have mentioned the increase of our numbers, let me also express the increase of my hope toward you and for you. These young strangers have all, as far as I can at present recollect, their parents, and brothers, and sisters dwelling in families together in unity. They are growing up with these parents as their lawful and beloved offspring, having been baptized into the Church of Christ, our Lord and Redeemer. While our numbers have increased in the family, they have not decreased in the house of God; for though we may complain with a venerable servant of God, whose name and writings are familiar to many of you, (Boston,) "that there may be some who, if they would come little more than half way from their own house, they would hear the sound of my voice," yet our usual audience, taking it in the general, has increased in its number. And while God alone can judge the heart, and does judge it, I have also to express my satisfaction and delight on the becoming decorum, decency, and devotion you manifest in this place,—the house of God—the gate of heaven! And lastly, those who joined with us, for the first time, in celebrating the dying love of Christ at our last solemnity, were about four times more than what have so joined with us on any former occasion, the average being four or five, but the number of this year amounted to seventeen. These outward marks and tokens are an encouragement to perform our reciprocal duties. And they are an anticipation to me that the subjects which have been before us have not been disregarded, and that they have not been vain in the Lord. "The treasure is in earthen vessels." "But we preach Christ crucified." "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ." "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." Oh! "the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

"This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to you." Exod. xii. 2. This month is the first month of our year; and our year is like a circle; from this, indeed, it has its Roman name. Round this circle we move, and move quickly, all the days of our life. There is no standing still. We start when we first breathe. Let us start anew this day, with fresh resolution, to run the way of God's commandments when he shall enlarge our heart. O let us so run that we may obtain! This month on the circle—or at the beginning of the year—has its name from a pagan god, (Janus,) represented with two faces. Let us, like this heathen emblem of the beginning of the year, have one face, with keen piercing eyes to look backward, by reflection, on what we have been! and another, to look forward, with faith and hope through the merits and mediation of our blessed Lord and Redeemer, to what we expect to be!

REMARKS ON THE HUNDREDTH PSALM.

BY THE REV. JOHN CORMACK, D.D., Minister of Stow.

THIS psalm has ever held a high place among the sweet songs of Zion, so dear and so refreshing to the pious Israelites of old; and so much dearer, and so much more refreshing still to the spiritual Israelites of Gospel days, as they pass on through the weeping valley of Baca, to the higher songs of the Zion above, where weeping is unknown, God himself having wiped away every tear from every eye. It is the last in order that has been ascribed to Moses, and was considered by the Hebrews as referring to the Messiah's days. Its title merits attention. It is called a "Psalm of praise," a title attached to no other psalm, though many of them breathe nothing but praise and thanksgiving.

This sacred poem begins with setting before us the sentiments and feelings with which we should enter the house of God. We are exhorted to "make a joyful noise unto Jehovah, and to serve him with gladness, and to come before his presence with singing." And the call to do so is universal—"all ye lands,"—and so must be understood of Gospel times, and of all in every region that own the name of Jesus.

But some sad and sorrowful soul, under painful suffering, privation, or bereavement, or it may be under a sense of sin, the cause of all suffering, feeling deep abatement and anguish from conscious guilt, may be apt to say, joy and gladness, and singing, are not suitable to me. It is sighing, and sorrow, and smiting on the breast, while not presuming to lift my eyes to heaven, that are becoming in me, the chief of sinners. To such an afflicted soul we would say in the language of another of the songs of Zion, "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praise unto thy name, O most High; to show forth thy loving-kindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night." Pa. xcii. 1, 2. Sorrow and sighing may have their appropriate period; but there is also an appropriate period for their termination. When the sinful child of mortality feels that he is sunk in "the horrible pit," and sticking fast in "the miry clay," it is not possible that he shall be joyous and glad, and come with singing. But let the man of anguish and sorrow obtain deliverance from the horrible pit, and from the miry clay, and let his feet be set upon a rock, and his goings established, is it not then appropriate that there should be a new song in his mouth, even praise to our God? Pa. xl. 2, 3. Has not God shown that his darkest and most afflictive dispensations are sent to his children in love and mercy, to exercise their faith and patience, and render them meet for the inheritance of the saints in light? And if so, what but praise and gratitude are due to the Giver of good? Now, it is to persons in these circumstances that this divine poem is addressed; and surely "praise is comely" for those who can say (as verse 3,) "we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture."

But this verse, in the original, bears a higher and more peculiar import than merely that those, who here celebrate Jehovah's praise, are in the happy state of being his people, and the sheep of his pasture. The cause of their being so is distinctly recognised as originating in his own free and sovereign grace. To make out this to the satisfaction of every reader was what first suggested the remarks on this psalm. Now, while matters of curious, critical discussion are unsuitable and to be avoided in such an article as the present, a simple remark or two on the nature and difficulties of translation may be of importance to the mere English reader, as they will put him in a capacity to comprehend intelligently the proposed amendment.

Persons of learning know that it is extremely difficult, and often impossible, to transfuse the full meaning and spirit of a composition from one language into another; and that the difficulties are greatly increased when the version, as in our translation of the Bible, is required to be literal. Suppose a translator to be perfectly master of the language out of which he translates, as well as that into which he translates, and that he is never at a loss as to the meaning of his original—qualifications not to be always expected, and of which the imperfection of human language forbids the hope—still it often happens, that in the one tongue there is a want of words and terms of precisely equivalent import in the other; while the idiom is sometimes so different, that the literal translation of a phrase would actually misrepresent the original author's meaning. Such being a mere glance at the difficulties which our venerable translators of the Bible had to encounter, in producing a literal translation of the Inspired Volume, we may advert to the manner in which they addressed themselves to the task. And here it may be summarily stated that, as faithfulness was their first and great aim, their next appears to have been to put their readers in possession of their doubts and difficulties, and the means of helping them to detect inaccuracies, where, as in all uninspired efforts, they may be expected sometimes to creep in. In this scrupulous carefulness originated the marginal readings in our Bibles, as well as the adoption of the Italic character in particular circumstances. Thus, when a word or phrase appeared susceptible of two meanings, each of them good, and consistent with divine truth, they placed what they regarded as, upon the whole, the most probable, in the text, and the other in the margin. Again, when the elliptical nature of the original, or some peculiar idiom required a word or words to be supplied, to bring out the full meaning in the English language, they inserted the words so supplied in the Italic character, that every reader might be instantly aware of the difficulty they had to encounter, and of their best endeavour to surmount it.

However familiar these things are to the learned, it is presumed that they may be of some importance to others, who will now be able distinctly to appreciate the remarks to be made on the third verse of this psalm, of which the substance has been already hinted. Look, then, to your English Bible, and by simply omitting the words in Italics, you have the following:—"Know ye that the Lord, he God; he that hath made us, and not we ourselves, his people, and the sheep of his pasture."

Here, then, those who are God's people and the sheep of his pasture acknowledge, with adoring gratitude and praise, that they were made such by God himself. It was He, and not we ourselves, that made us his people. How like the language of the redeemed above, "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood!" Well, then, may this sacred poem be called a "Psalm of praise," since the deliverance is secure and perfect, and God himself the author of it. There is no weeping in heaven, and there should be none among those who are on the way to it. The tear of tenderness will, indeed, sometimes fall, and instead of being forbidden, it has been hallowed by Him who is the Just One and the perfect, when at the grave of Lazarus "Jesus wept." But there could be nothing in our tears allied to murmuring, repining, or dissatisfaction, if the love of God were perfect, and our faith in him perfect. For if so, every thing, whatever were its present aspect, would be delightful to us, as coming from the God of love, who is ever making all things work together for the good of those who love him, and are the called according to his purpose. Who could be sad under the full conviction, that "our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding, even an eternal weight of glory?" Shall the wretch that lately lay pining under mortal disease, give way to anything else than transports of joy, when restored to the full buoyancy and elasticity of confirmed health? Will not the lame man, in similar deliverance, leap as an hart, and the dumb sing for joy? And shall not the slave of sin and Satan, restored to the liberty of the sons of God, exult with singing? Yes; and it is but the anticipation of what shall be finally realized, when "the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads;" when "they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Isaiah xxxv. 10.

That we are the sheep of God's pasture is a cause of unspeakable rejoicing; and that God has made us such—for we ourselves could never have done it—ircause of unutterable thanksgiving to Him, the fountain of all this unutterable beatitude.

There are many other important remarks suggested by this "Psalm of praise," which such a paper as the present will not admit. We conclude it, therefore, with a literal translation of the whole psalm, in the manner of the Hebrew distich, for the nature of which we refer to the elegantly classical works of Bishop Lowth on Hebrew poetry, and his translation of Isaiah. We shall just remark that the word LOVE in capitals in the Old Testament corresponds with Jehovah in the original, and that this last is adopted in the following translation:—

Shout joyfully to Jehovah all the earth.
Serve Jehovah with joyfulness.
Come before him with singing:
Know that Jehovah he (alone) is God.
He, and not we ourselves, made us his people
And the sheep of his pasture.
Come into his gates with praise:
Into his courts with thanksgiving.
Give thanks to him and bless his name.
For good is Jehovah: for ever (is) his mercy,
And from generation to generation his faithfulness.

Many remarks suggested by this beautiful Psalm are necessarily left to the reflections of the Christian reader. At the same time, the following stanza, corresponding to the third verse in our metrical version, is humbly and diffidently submitted to harmonize with the view of the passage already given. The necessity of extending it to four lines, renders it more paraphrastic in appearance than would be desirable, though nothing is introduced of which the idea is not in the original:—

Know that the Lord, not we, we made
His people and his pasture's sheep.
'Tis he that chose us, he that feeds;
'Tis he that protects, and will us keep.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Our responsibility in reference to our Fellow-men.—

O my friends! is there at this moment any one among you, who is cherishing and indulging a single human affection, however innocent, however laudable, unassociated by religious principle and religious hope? Is there a single bond of union between you and a dear brother, or sister, or spouse, or parent, or child,—a bond formed independently of God and the Gospel of his grace, and the prospect of eternity? Do you love your friend, your relative, dearly, fondly, after the flesh? Do you share with him all your feelings, and fancies, and pleasures, and pursuits? Do you take him along with you in the path of science, in the flights of lofty imagination? Do you bid him welcome to your home, your hearth, your heart? And do you find every day's endearing fellowship and intimate familiarity only knitting you the more closely together in perfect confidence, and harmony, and love? And yet with all this communion and interchange of affection, can it be that there is no communion of attachment to God, no recognition of heaven, no regard to eternity? Is it, after all, for the purposes and enjoyments of this earth alone, that you are united, and united O how tenderly? Alas! and have you no fear, that when the utter vanity of these pursuits and enjoyments comes to be known and felt, when the dream of worldly happiness is over, and you are awakened to a sense of all the guilt of your ungodliness; when you are made aware that every thought, however pure, which has not reference to God is sin, and are enduring the torments of a conscience now quickened and alive to the criminality of a life spent without God; O! have you no fear, that in the very attachment you are now forming, in the very affection you are now indulging, in the friendship, the love which every day is rendering more intense as you lavish all proofs and tokens of tenderest regard, you are but treasuring up the very instruments of wrath against the day of wrath? The time may be fast coming, when the most bitter agony of a lost, and ruined, and undone eternity will be the recollection of some kinsman, some friend, some brother beloved, whom you once encouraged as a partner in your sin, whom alas! however earnestly and anxiously you pray, you cannot hinder from becoming a partner in your doom. You might have warned him once. You might have told him of a God above, and a judgment before him, and a Saviour near, even at the door. Once his mind was open, his heart tender. The spirit of the Lord striving with him, seemed to be beginning a good work in him. Alas! did you, by cold neglect, quench the smoking flax? Does conscience remind you, that among all your interesting topics of daily familiar converse, religion had not its due place? that on one subject, even the one thing needful, you discouraged confidence, and left your friend to take his chance alone,—left him to fall back into deeper slumber? And now it is too late. Once, but for you, he might have heard Moses and the prophets, now he will scarcely be persuaded though one were to rise from the dead.—REV. R. S. CANDLISH.—[Sermon preached on behalf of the Society for the Relief of the Destitute Sick.]

The best mode of Reproof.—Reprove mildly and sweetly, in the calmest manner, in the gentlest terms, not in a haughty or imperious way, not hastily or fiercely; not with sour looks, or in bitter language, for these ways do beget all the evil, and hinder the best effects of reproof; they do certainly inflame and disturb the person reprov'd; they breed wrath, disdain, and hatred against the reprov'd; but do not so well enlighten the man to see his error, or affect him with a kindly sense of his miscarriage, or dispose him to correct his fault. Such reproofs look rather like the wounds and persecutions of enmity, than as remedies ministered by a friendly hand; they harden men with rage, and scorn to mend upon such occasion. If reproof doth not savour of humanity, it signifieth nothing; it must be like a bitter pill wrapped in gold, and tempered with sugar, otherwise it will not go down, or work effectually.—BARROW.

True Beauty.—Beautiful is that soul that hath put on Christ; beautiful is the place thou dwellest in, and all the parts thou comest into; beautiful is the table thou sittest at, and beautiful is the company thou art among! O beautiful is the soul that wears that long white robe of the righteousness of Christ! And beautiful is the soul and conscience that is washed in the blood of the Lamb! So faith can make a man or woman beautiful before God, beautiful before the sight of both men and angels!—JOHN WELCH.

Is God not in all your thoughts?—Why did you not think of God? One would deem that the thought of him must, to a serious mind, come second to almost every other thought. The thought of virtue would suggest the thought of both a law-giver and a rewarder; the thought of crime, of an avenger; the thought of sorrow, of a consoler; the thought of an inscrutable mystery, of an intelligence that understands it; the thought of that ever-moving activity that prevails in the system of the universe, of a supreme agent; the thought of the human family, of a great father; the thought of all-being, of a creator; the thought of life, of a preserver; and the thought of death, of an uncontrollable disposer. By what dexterity of irreligious caution did you avoid precisely every track, where the idea of him would have met you, or elude that idea if it came? And what must sound reason pronounce of a mind which, in the train of millions of thoughts, has wandered to all things under the sun, to all the permanent objects or vanishing appearances in the creation, but never fixed its thought on the Supreme reality; never approached, like Moses, "to see this great sight."—FOSTER'S ESSAYS.

SACRED POETRY.

A CANTICLE OF THE COVENANTERS.

Ho! Watcher of the silent hill,
 What of the night? What of the night?
 The winds are hushed—the earth is still—
 The voiceless stars are sparkling bright—
 From out this heathery moorland glen,
 By the shy wild fowl only trod,
 We raise our hymn, unheard of men,
 To thee, an omnipresent God!

Jehovah! though no sign appear
 Through earth our aimless path to lead,
 We know—we feel thee ever near,
 A present help in time of need;
 Near—as when pointing out the way,
 For ever in thy people's sight,
 A smoke-wreathed column in the day!
 A fiery pillar in the night!

Whence came the summons forth to go?
 From thee came down the warning sound:
 "Out to your tents, oh Israel—Lo!
 The heathens' warfare girds thee round:
 Sons of the faithful, Up! Away!
 The Lamb must of the wolf beware;
 The falcon seeks the dove for prey;
 The fowler spreads his cunning snare."

Then all was seeming peace around,
 Was seeming peace by field and flood,
 We woke—and on our lintels found,
 The mark of death, the sign of blood;
 Lord! in thy cause we mocked at fears;
 We scorned th' ungodly's threatening words;
 Beat out our pruning hooks to spears;
 And turned the ploughshare into swords.

Degenerate Scotland! days have been
 When freemen o'er thy pathways trod,
 When mountain rude and valley green
 Poured forth the loud acclaim to God!
 The fire, which Liberty imparts,
 Refulgent in each patriot eye,
 And graven on a nation's hearts
 The Word!—for which we stand or die.

Unholy change! the scorner's chair,
 Is now the seat of those who rule;
 Tortures, and bonds, and death, the share
 Of all except the tyrant's tool;
 The faith in which our fathers breathed
 And had their life,—for which they died—
 That priceless boon, which they bequeathed
 Their sons,—our impious foes deride.

And we have left our homes behind,
 And we have girded on the sword,
 And we in solemn league have joined,
 Yea, covenanted with the Lord—
 Never to seek these homes again,
 Never to give the sword its sheath,
 Until our rights of Faith remain
 Unfettered as the air we breathe!

Oh, Thou, who reignest in the sky,
 Encircled round with heavenly thrones,
 Cast down thine all protecting eye
 Upon our wives and little ones;
 From Hallelujahs surging round,
 Oh for a moment turn thine ear,
 The widow prostrate on the ground,
 The famished orphan's cries to hear!

And thou wilt hear!—it cannot be,
 That thou wilt list the raven's brood,
 When from the nest they call to thee,
 And, in due season, send them food;
 It cannot be, that thou wilt weave
 The lily such superb array,
 And yet unfed, unsheltered leave
 Thy children—as if less than they!

We have no hearth—the ashes lie
 In blackness where they brightly shone;
 We have no home—the desert sky
 Our covering, earth our couch alone;
 We have no heritage—deprived
 Of these, we ask not such on earth;
 Our hearts are sealed; we seek in heaven,
 For heritage, and home, and hearth.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Adherence to Principle.—In the unrivalled usefulness and celebrity of his sons, Mr Samuel Wesley beheld the providential reward of his own inflexible attachment to principle, and his courage in resisting the machinations of power, when he thought that the cause of religion and the welfare of his country were at stake. When that misguided and unfortunate monarch, James the Second, endeavoured to subvert the Protestantism of England, and to render Popery the dominant power, Mr Wesley was strongly solicited by the friends of the king to abet his arbitrary measures, and high preferment was held out to him to induce his compliance. But he positively refused to read the king's declaration; he protested against the infamous policy of the times, and though surrounded with informers, and threatened by soldiers, he delivered a memorable sermon against the object which James had in view, founded upon the words, "If it be so, our God, whom we serve, is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thy hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image thou hast set up." This bold and honourable man was the father of John and Charles Wesley, the founders of modern Methodism.

A Countryman.—Collins, the freethinker, or deist, met a plain countryman going to church. He asked him where he was going. "To church, Sir." "What to do there?" "To worship God." "Pray, whether is your God a great or a little God?" "He is both, Sir." "How can he be both?" He is so great, Sir, that the heaven of heavens cannot contain him; and so little that he can dwell in my heart." Collins declared, that this simple answer from the countryman had more effect upon his mind than all the volumes which learned doctors had written against him.

CHRISTIAN FRIENDSHIP ILLUSTRATED IN THE RECIPROCAL CONDUCT OF PAUL AND ONESIPHORUS.

BY THE REV. D. DAVIDSON,
Minister of Broughty Ferry.

THE absence from the code of Christian morality, of a specific command as to the cultivation of friendship, has been made by infidels the matter of objection against our most holy faith. But that objection, while their preferring of it betrays their malignant hatred of Christianity, and discovers the difficulty they feel in framing even any plausible allegation against it, it is easy to repel. True it is, indeed, that we cannot point out any precept that requires us, in express terms, to cultivate friendship with our fellows. And this may seem a great omission to those whose sensibilities or circumstances have led them to attach peculiar value to the possession of a true friend, and whose experience, either bitter or blessed, has taught them what it is to want, and what to have one. But then, while this omission is explained and vindicated by the considerations that friendship, in its highest style, is to be ranked rather among the privileges than the duties of life, and that from its very nature it admits not of precise inculcation; there are enjoined in the New Testament, the acquisition and exercise of those dispositions which naturally give birth to friendship, and lay the surest basis for the discharge of its obligations, and the enjoyment of its pleasures; and there are presented there, also, the most engaging examples of individuals, whose breasts reciprocated the sentiments and emotions of the purest friendship, and whose lives were the very model of its expressions and achievements. Has not the Gospel inculcated humility and veracity, tenderness and gratitude, sympathy with the afflicted, and esteem of the excellent? And how can these graces fail of originating, between those who possess them, that respect and endearment which friendship implies, if they be brought into contact and be congenial in their tastes? Has not the Gospel also set forth, in the regard and preference of our Lord for John, who is described as "the disciple whom Jesus loved," and for the happy family of Bethany, concerning whom it is said, "Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus," illustrious instances of friendship? and how can his disciples fail to perceive in these a recommendation of it, more instructive and alluring than any precept can convey?

Out of many examples, let there now be selected, for contemplation, that which is exhibited in the conduct of Onesiphorus to Paul, and Paul to Onesiphorus, (1 Tim. i. 16-18.) They were Christian friends, and their behaviour to each other, while sanctioning friendship, illustrates the manner in which, according to the varied circumstances wherein Providence may place us, its part should be performed.

Onesiphorus was the friend of Paul, and how did he manifest his friendship? When the apostle sojourned in Ephesus, preaching the Gospel, he "ministered to him in many things," assisting, probably, both in the supply of his temporal wants and the furtherance of his spiritual labours. And when the apostle was a prisoner, the second time, at Rome, treated with peculiar severity by his enemies, and wounded yet more deeply by the defection of professed friends, so constant was that worthy, that he still remembered him,—so courageous that he "was not ashamed of the apostle's chain," nor afraid to own him though a reputed felon, awaiting his execution,—so zealous that he "inquired diligently" for him, and traced him out to the dungeon where he was lying as one utterly forsaken,—and so affectionate, and liberal, and sympathetic, that he "refreshed him oft," and cheered his heart by the gifts of his hand, and the light of his countenance, and the communications of his tongue; thus earning for himself that highest commendation which the Judge will bestow at the last day on those whom he rewards for their kindness to his people, "I was in prison and ye came unto me."

Paul was the friend of Onesiphorus, and how did he manifest his friendship? Incarcerated and enchained, poor and destitute, he could not requite, in kind, his benefactor's generosity. But another mode of expressing friendship was left him, and as he was shut up to it by circumstances, so he turned to it with fondness. As the waters of a spring, when prevented from flowing forth in their natural channel, mount forcibly up towards heaven, —as the portion that is prevented, by exhalation, from diffusing fertility along the course of the stream, descends afterwards in fertilizing showers; so the emotions of his overflowing heart, being pent up in one direction by the tyranny of man, ascended in devout aspiration to God, and though seeming to vanish in the vapour of fruitless wishes, entailed the communication of invaluable blessings. While recording his kindness, in an epistle to Timothy, and thus giving occasion for what he did being told as a memorial of him wheresoever the Gospel is preached, he prayed, "The Lord give mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus," thus entreating for the members of his family, the protection, and blessing, and salvation of God; and prayed, also, "The Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day," thus entreating for him personally, the acquittal, and commendation, and munificence of the Judge, when that epoch of awful solemnity, and searching scrutiny, and unalterable doom, which was ever in his eye, should actually arrive; entreaties which, as the inwrought and fervent prayers of one eminently righteous and beloved, were doubtless of much avail, and secured an abundant and eternal recompense to his generous friend.

"A man that hath friends, must shew himself friendly." And here is a pattern for every such man. Beneficence and intercession indeed are incumbent upon every one, and every Christian feels that he is bound to do good unto all as he has opportunity, and to offer up prayers and supplications for all men; for how can he be a Christian who shutteth up his bowels of compassion against his brother in necessity or distress, and refuses to minister to his relief and comfort? or he who is forgetful of his fellow-sinners, when addressing the Hearer of prayer? But especially in those who profess to be friends, ought the reciprocal conduct of Paul and Onesiphorus, to be paralleled. Are there any with whom we have entered into the bonds of friendship? then ought we to be constant in our attachments and engagements, whatsoever be the changes in their lot; then ought we, when they are overtaken by adversity and oppressed by affliction, to minister to them of our substance, to subject ourselves to sacrifice, or expose ourselves to risk for their sake, and refresh them by our sympathy and affectionate converse, in the way of counsel and consolation; and then ought we, in every circumstance, and especially if no other mode of testifying our love be left us, to draw as it were on the exhaustless treasury of heaven for the liquidation of our debt, and put forth all our "power with God" in the wrastlings of fervent prayer for the procurement, in behalf of our friends, of blessings from on high. These are the exercises of Christian friends,—these the acts of a friendship cemented by religion and destined for heaven. Yes! those who enjoy it, take delight in imparting of this world's goods, and communicating spiritual comfort, when that is requisite or practicable; and take delight, when prevented by poverty from giving, and by distance from speaking, or when these may seem unnecessary, in beseeching the Father of mercies to "supply all their need according to his riches in glory, by Christ Jesus." Oh, happy they who thus anticipate the harmony and kindness of heaven! Their bliss in having among their fellow-travellers Zionward, those to whom they feel thus, and who feel thus towards them, is but inferior to what they experience, when they are enabled, in the confidence of faith, to say of Him, from whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, "This is my beloved, and this is my friend."

ST. CLEMENT, A COMPANION OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

COMMUNICATED BY THE REV. DUNCAN MACFARLAN,
Minister of Renfrew.

In the Epistle to the Philippians, Paul says, "I entreat thee also, true yoke-fellow, help those women which laboured with me in the Gospel, with Clement also, and with other my fellow-labourers, whose names are in the book of life." Of the early history of Clement we know nothing which may be depended upon, and there is no certain information respecting his death. Several very early writers however, assure us, that he became bishop or pastor of the Church at Rome, perhaps about the year 91 or 92; and he appears to have died about the year 100. While thus employed at Rome, it happened that great dissensions and insubordination broke out in the Church of Corinth. And agreeably to the practice of those early times, application was made to the Church at Rome, and particularly to Clement, for counsel and advice. At the time, when this application was made, the Church at Rome was suffering probably under the persecution of Domitian, and no answer was immediately sent. But as soon as peace was restored, and perhaps about the year 95 or 96, Clement, in name of the Church at Rome, wrote a very interesting and edifying epistle to the Corinthians; and through the good providence of God, it is for the most part in a state of preservation. Not doubting that a production so early as this, and on such a subject, will be valued by many, who have not access to it in another form, we proceed to furnish an outline of it, in as full and perfect a manner as our limits will permit.

"The Church of God which is at Rome, to the Church of God which is at Corinth, called and sanctified, by the will of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord: Grace and peace from Almighty God, through Jesus Christ, be multiplied unto you.

"BRETHREN,—The unexpected calamities to which we have of late been exposed, prevented us from giving earlier attention to the matters about which you inquire, and especially, to the unhappy and highly unbecoming dissensions, with which a few vain and self-willed men have dishonoured your justly celebrated name. We speak thus of you; for who that has been among you, has not had occasion to admire your steadfastness in the faith, your fruitfulness in good works, and the temper of your religious zeal? You seemed to do all things impartially and according to the rule of God's Word; being subject to those placed over you, giving honour to the aged, inculcating modesty on the young; and exhorting women to be seemly in their conduct, to love and obey their husbands, and to order their houses with discretion. Ye were all of you modest, unambitious, charitable, and keeping the sufferings of Christ continually before your eyes. Hence the steadfastness of your faith, your fruitfulness in good works, and your enjoying so plentifully an effusion of the Holy Ghost. Thus also it was, that you lifted up your hands to God in prayer, nothing doubting, while you pled for yourselves and the whole elect of God.

"In these circumstances God greatly helped you. But it has since happened to you as it is written in the Word,—'My beloved did eat and drink, and he was enlarged, waxed fat and kicked.' Hence emulation, strife and insubordination. Men of no name have lifted themselves up against the honourable, and persons of no reputation against such as deserved respect, the foolish against the wise, and the young against the aged. Righteousness and peace departed from you, men forgot to fear God, and became blind in their zeal; giving themselves up especially to envy. And was it not in this way, that death first entered the world, that Cain slew his brother, that Moses had to flee from Egypt, that Aaron and Miriam were shut out from the camp, that Dathan and Abiram went down into the pit, and that David was not only hated by strangers, but also persecuted by Saul the king of Israel? But to speak of examples nearer our own time, and even of our own age, some of the very noblest pillars of the Church have, in this way, been assailed and persecuted to the death. Witness the holy apostles. Peter, for example, after much suffering, died a martyr. And Paul was in bonds seven times, was scourged, was stoned, preached to the east and to the utmost bounds of the west, and at last sealed the truth with his blood; leaving behind him an eminent pattern of faith and patience. Many others also have, like them, endured torture, and set to others a glorious example. Even women, though naturally weak in body have suffered very great cruelties with firmness and died in the faith.

"We write these things unto you, beloved, not only for your instruction, but that we ourselves also may be put in remembrance; for we are all liable to the same temptations, and are engaged in the same conflict. Wherefore, let us lay aside all vain and unprofitable ambition, and strive after conformity to the perfect rule of our holy calling. Let us consider what it is which is most pleasing in the sight of God. Let us think how precious the blood of Christ is, and which was shed, that we might repent and be saved. Let us inquire concerning the ages that are past, and see how in all generations, men have been called to repentance. Noah preached repentance in his day, and as many as gave heed to his instructions were saved. Jonah proclaimed destruction against Nineveh, and yet through repentance its inhabitants, though strangers to the covenant, were accepted and saved. The Gospel message is an invitation to repent, and in many parts of the Word of God is it urged as a duty on all. (Ezek. xxxiii. 11; xviii. 30-32; Isa. i.; Jer. iii. 4-19; Isa. i. 16.)* Let us not therefore despise, but rather value and obey his excellent and glorious will. Let us prostrate ourselves before him, laying aside all ambition, and envy, and strife, the end of which can be only death. Let us imitate Enoch, and Noah, and Abraham, and Lot, and Rahab; all of whom have left us examples of righteousness amidst much that was unbelieving and wicked. (See Gen. xii. 4; xiii. 14; xv. 5; xix.; 2 Pet. ii. 6. Jude 7; Josh. ii.) Moreover, our Lord also humbled himself. He came not with any shew of pride or arrogance, though his power was very great. (See Isa. liii. 1-12; Psal. xxii. 6.) And if the Lord thus humbled himself, why should not we, who have been brought under the yoke of his grace? Let us humble ourselves as they did, who went about in goat skins and sheep skins, making known the coming of Christ. Such were Elijah, and Elisha, and Ezekiel, and the prophets. And with these we have other examples of similar humility; as in the case of Abraham, (Gen. xxviii. 27.) of Job, (xiv. 4,) and of Moses, (Exod. iii. 11; iv. 10.) And what shall we say of David, who expresses himself so humbly in the fifty-first Psalm? And are not all these examples recorded for our instruction as well as for the generations that are past? And ought we not, therefore, to be guided by these and to return to the exercise of that peace and holiness, after which the people of God ought continually to strive?

Nor ought we to neglect what God is teaching us by his works. The heavenly bodies move in the order which he has appointed, and silently obey him. Day and night succeed each other, and yet encroach not on each other's boundaries. The sun, the moon, and the many groups of stars which are thickly scattered over the heavens, have all their appointed courses; and they fulfil these without crossing each other's path. The earth observes her seasons, neither doubting nor disputing the will of the Creator; and thus both man and beast are supplied with the food, which they severally require. Spring and summer, autumn and winter, give place to each other, and the winds of heaven accomplish the ends, on account of which they are sent abroad on the earth. The fountains of water also, which are alike sources of health and pleasure, withhold not their stores, but liberally supply the wants of all. And even the restless deep, hath its limits, beyond which it doth not usually pass. On all of these, has the great Creator laid his injunction, that they act in concert, and conspire towards one common good; and in this he has manifested his own goodness. Nor let us forget, brethren, that the eyes of God are continually upon us. None of our thoughts or intentions are concealed from him. Let us fear God. Let us reverence our Lord Jesus Christ, whose blood was shed that we might live. Let us honour such as are placed over us. Let us respect the aged. Let us instruct the young in the discipline and fear of God. Let our wives be exhorted to purity of conversation, meekness in giving counsel, and charity towards all, who truly fear God. Let their children also be instructed in the knowledge of Christ, and especially, in the importance of humility and charity, and the fear of God.

"But these exhortations will avail only, when confirmed by the faith which we have in Christ. (Ps. xxxiv. 11-19.) Our heavenly Father hath bowels of compassion towards such as fear him, and he kindly and lovingly bestows the gifts of his Spirit on such as come to him in simplicity of faith. Wherefore let us not doubt, that God will bestow on us the gifts which he has promised. Let none say, 'These things are often told us, but they come not to pass.' Ye fools, know ye not that one thing follows another. Take the vine for example. It first buds, then unfolds its leaves, then flowers, then come the sour grapes, and lastly the mature fruit. And after a little while, what God has said will also be accomplished. (Hab. ii. 3; Mal. iii. 1.) Our Lord himself was the first-fruits of our resurrection, and we are continually reminded of it by repeated signs. The succession of day and night teaches us this doctrine. The night lies down and the day rises, and the day departs and the night succeeds. The sower also casts his seed into the earth, and though dry and naked, it nevertheless dissolves, and by the good providence of God springs up, yielding many more. And shall it yet appear strange, that God should raise from the dead such as died in the faith of a resurrection? (Ps. iii. 5; Job ix. 27.) With him all things are possible. By the word of his power he created all things, and by the same power he is able to destroy them, and again to make alive. And what he can do, he will do; for it is impossible that he should deny himself. How blessed and wonderful are the gifts of God! Immortal life, shining righteousness, perfect assurance, and holy temperance. So much we know; but how shall we be able to understand the things which God hath prepared in eternity, for them that love him! The Creator and Father of our spirits can alone comprehend these. He only knows their greatness and their beauty. Let us, therefore, strive, with all earnestness, to be found among those who wait for him. Let our faith rest in God, and let our conduct be according to his will. Let us come to him, through our great High Priest, through whom the eyes of our understanding have been opened; and God, even the Father, would have us to taste of immortality itself. (Hab. i. 3, 4; Ps. civ. 4; Heb. i. 7; Heb. i. 5; Ps. ii. 7, 8; Heb. i. 13; Ps. cx. 1.)

"It becomes us also to do every thing, in an orderly and consistent manner. Observe, with how much order and obedience they act, who are led on to the warfare of this world. All are not chiefs nor commanders of a thousand, nor centurions, nor inferior officers; but every one obeys the command of such as are placed over him. The great cannot do without their inferiors, and as little can these without the other. It is so with the very members of our body. They have all their several offices, and yet they all conspire to the welfare of the whole. We also are members of one body in Christ Jesus, and ought to bear with each other, and to do good to each other, and yet each to act in his own proper place. Foolish men, without, it may be, either wisdom or learning, may despise such admonitions, and think much of themselves; but what really is man? Has he ought that came not out of the dust with him, or was bestowed upon him by the Most High? (Job iv. 16, &c.; xv. 15; iv. 19; v. 1.) We ought, therefore, to worship God, and in an orderly manner, not as if by random, but at fixed times and seasons. And let the same order be observed respecting those who minister to us: for, under the law, the chief priest had his proper duty, the ordinary priest his, the Levite also his, and such as held no sacred office theirs. The apostles preached under a commission from the Saviour; and he was himself sent by the Father. The apostles, being assured of the resurrection of Christ, and endowed also with the Spirit, went forth into all the world, proclaiming the kingdom of God. And as they thus went on preaching through different countries and cities, they appointed the first-fruits of their ministry in these, to be pastors, and deacons, over such as should afterwards believe, having first proved them by the Spirit. Nor was this any thing new; for long before, it had been written concerning these, 'I will appoint their overseers in righteousness, and their ministers in faith.' The apostles also knew, that contentions should arise concerning the ministry after their decease; and therefore did they leave directions how other chosen and approved men should succeed. Wherefore, we cannot think it right to throw out of their ministry such as were either appointed by apostles, or afterwards chosen by other eminent men with the consent of the whole Church, and who, with all lowliness and uprightness, had ministered to the flock of Christ. It would be no small sin to cast off such. Yet, blessed are those who, having finished their course, have entered into rest; for they fear not that any shall be able to turn them out of their place: and yet ye see, how ye have cast out some, who, like them, adorned their office, and lived respectably among you.

"Ye are contentious, brethren, and zealous for things which pertain not unto salvation. Look into the Scriptures, and see, whether the righteous were ever cast off by such as were themselves righteous. They were often persecuted, but it was by the wicked. They were cast into prison, but it was by men of no religion. They were stoned, but it was by such as did themselves violate the law. They were put to death, but it was by persons full of envy and malice. Daniel was cast into a den of lions; was that by men fearing God? Hananish, Azariah, and Mishael, were shut up in a fiery furnace; was it by men professing to worship the true God? God forbid! They were men full of wickedness, and incensed against the worshippers of the true God. But such as endured these things, were men of God, and were made partakers of honour and glory. Let us, therefore, follow their example, and not be found among the wicked and envious. Why should there be strife, and anger, and divisions, among us? Have we not all one God, one Christ, and one Spirit dwelling in us? Are we not members of one body? Or have we come to such a height of madness, as to forget that we are members one of another? Let us remember the words of Jesus: 'Woe to that man. It were better for him that he had never been born, than that he should have offended one of my elect.' Your divisions have perverted not a few, have discouraged many, have unsettled many, and have grieved all of us. And yet they continue. Take the Epistle of Paul into your hands. What was it that he wrote you, when first ye had received the Gospel? Verily he admonished you concerning himself, and Cephas, and Apollos; for even then ye had begun to fall into parties and factions. It is a shame, my beloved, yea, a very great shame, and unworthy of your Christian profession, to have it said that the ancient and faithful Church of Corinth should, through the influence of a few individuals, be led into a general sedition against their ministers. Nor has the report reached us only, but also such as are our enemies; and through whom the name of Christ is thus blasphemed, and ye are yourselves brought into danger. Let us, therefore, at once put an end to this evil course, and falling down before God, let us beseech him even with tears, that he would pardon and again restore us to a state of brotherly affection. This, brethren, were a high and a noble duty. Having attained to some experience of the love of Christ, we would thus be expressing our obligations to him, and inheriting the blessedness of a charitable spirit.

"Let such also as have been leaders in this matter, look well to the common end of our hope. For such as truly fear God, would rather themselves endure affliction than inflict pain upon others. Yea, it is seemly for a man to confess his error, and not to harden himself in sin. Dathan and Abiram did so, and the earth swallowed them up. Pharaoh and his hosts did so, and they were drowned in the Red Sea. But the way of the righteous was to confess their sins. Moreover, God requireth us to do so, and encourageth us with the hope of pardon. (See Ps. lxxix. 34; Ps. l. 14; Ps. li. 17.) Ye know, beloved, ye know full well, what the Scriptures say on this subject. Call to mind, then, how when Moses had fasted and humbled himself forty days and forty nights, God said, 'Arise, Moses, get thee down quickly from hence; for thy people whom thou broughtest out of the land of Egypt have done wickedness. They have soon transgressed the law which I gave them, and have made to themselves graven images. And the Lord said also, I have told thee again and again, that this people are stiffnecked before me. Let me, therefore, destroy them, blotting out their name from under heaven, and I will make of thee a great and wonderful nation, even much greater than they are, But Moses said, Not so, O Lord. Forgive now this people their sin, or if thou wilt not, then blot my name also out of the book of the living.' O admirable charity! Insuperable perfection! The servant speaks freely to his Lord. He beseeches him to forgive, or if not, even to destroy himself with them. Who among you, then, is generous, or compassionate, or charitable? Let him say, 'If this disturbance, this contention, this schism be upon my account, I am ready to depart, to go wherever you please, and to do whatever you command, provided that the flock of Christ be preserved in peace, and the presbyters again placed over them.' He that will do so is worthy of high honour, and the Lord will care for him. And have not even Gentiles set us such an example? Kings and princes have, in times of pestilence, and at the bidding of their oracles, devoted themselves for the sake of their country. Some have banished themselves, to put an end to causes of sedition in large cities; and multitudes, among ourselves, have gone into bonds, that others might be set free, and have sold themselves, to feed their brethren with the price. Even women have been strengthened to make such sacrifices. Moreover, let us also pray for such as have fallen into sin. Let us pray that, being endowed with humility and moderation, they may submit not unto us but to the will of God. For by this means they will doubly profit. They will profit by our prayer, and they will be made mention of by other holy persons. Nor let us shun correction, for it is very profitable. It unites us more closely to God. (Ps. cxviii. 18; Prov. iii. 11; Ps. cxli. 5; Job v. 17-26.) Truly God is a good instructor, and he admonisheth by his holy discipline. Do ye, therefore, who laid the foundation of this strife, submit yourselves unto your presbyters, and be instructed into repentance. Bend the knees of your heart before God. Lay aside all proud boasting; for it is better to be of little account, and approved of, within the fold of Christ, than to imagine that ye are better than others, and to be cast forth. Now, may God, who seeth all things, and who ruleth over all, and who hath chosen us in Christ Jesus, grant to all that call upon his name, faith, reverence, peace, long-suffering, patience, temperance, holiness, and sobriety, even to all well pleasing, through our High Priest and Protector, Jesus Christ; through whom also be glory, and majesty, and power, and honour, unto him now and for evermore. Amen.

"The messengers whom we have sent unto you, Claudius Ephebus and Valerius Bito, with Fortunatus, send back with all speed, in peace and joy, that they may the sooner acquaint us with your happiness and concord, which we greatly desire and pray for, that we may henceforward rejoice in your good order."

As many as truly love God, and the things recorded in his blessed Word, will rejoice to find in this early epistle so much of the spirit of the Gospel, and so much respecting the opinions and practices of the apostolical Churches.

THE FEROCITY OF THE NEW ZEALANDERS.

THE following instance of savage barbarity was manifested in the course of the visit which the Reverend Daniel Tyreman and George Bennet, Esq., paid to New Zealand. These two gentlemen were sent out by the London Missionary Society to visit the different stations belonging to that Society throughout the world.

"This morning our little vessel was surrounded with canoes, containing several hundreds of the natives, of both sexes, who presently climbed up, and crowded it so much that we were obliged to put up a bar across the quarter-deck, and tabu it from intrusion. The commerce in various articles, on both sides, went on pretty well for some time, till one provoking circumstance after another occurred, which had nearly led to the seizure of the ship and the loss of our lives. In the confusion, occasioned by the great throng within so narrow a space, the natives began to exercise their pilfering tricks, opportunities for which are seldom permitted to slip away unimproved. Suddenly the cook cried out, "They have stolen this thing," but scarcely had he named the thing (some kitchen article) when he called out again, "They have stolen the beef out of the pot!" and then a third time, "They have stolen my cooking-pans!" Presently another voice bawled out from the fore-castle, "Captain! they have broken open your trunk, and carried away your clothes." Up to this time we had been in friendly intercourse with the chiefs, rubbing noses, and purchasing their personal ornaments and other curiosities, suspecting no mischief. But now, in the course of a few moments, without our perceiving the immediate reason, the whole scene was changed. We found afterwards, that the captain (Dibbs,) on hearing of the audacious thefts above mentioned, had become angry, and while he was endeavouring, rather boisterously, to clear the deck of some of the intruders, one of them, a chief, on being jostled by him, fell over the ship's side into the sea, between his own canoe and the vessel. This was seized instantaneously as the pretext for commencing hostilities. The women and children, in the course of a few seconds, had all disappeared, leaping overboard into their canoes, and taking with them the kakaous, or mantles of the warriors. The latter, thus stripped for action, remained on deck, of which, before we were aware, they had taken complete possession, and forthwith made us their prisoners. Tremendous were the howlings and screechings of the barbarians—while they stamped, and brandished their weapons, consisting principally of clubs and spears. One chief with his cookies (his slaves) had surrounded the captain, holding their spears at his breast and his sides, on the larboard quarter of the vessel. Mr Tyreman, under guard of another band, stood on the starboard; and Mr Bennet on the same side, but aft, towards the stern. Mr Threlkeld, and his little boy, not seven years old, were near Mr Bennet, now under direct manual grasp of the savages. The chief, who, with his gang, had been trafficking with Mr Bennet, now brought his huge tattooed visage near to Mr B.'s, screaming, in tones the most odious and horrifying, "Tangata New Zealandi, tangata kakino? — Tangata New Zealandi, tangata kakino?" This he repeated as rapidly as lips, tongue, and throat could utter the words, which mean, "Man of New Zealand, is he a bad man?—Man of New Zealand, a bad man?" Happily Mr Bennet understood the question (the New Zealand dialect much resembling the Tahitian,) wherefore, though convinced that inevitable death was at hand, he answered, with as much composure as could be assumed, "Kaore kakino, tangata New Zealandi, tangata kapai."—"Not bad; the New Zealander is a good man." And so often as the other, with indescribable ferocity of aspect, and sharpness of accent, asked the same question (which might be a hundred times), the same answer was returned. "But," inquired Mr Bennet, "why is all this uproar? Why cannot we still rub noses, and buy and sell, and barter as before?" At this moment a stout slave, belonging to this chief, stepped behind Mr Bennet, and pinioned both his arms close to his sides. No effort was made to resist or elude the gigantic grasp, Mr B. knowing that such would only accelerate the threatened destruction. Still, therefore, he maintained his calmness, and asked the chief the price of a neck ornament which the latter wore. Immediately another slave raised a large tree-felling axe (which with others had been brought to be sharpened by the ship's carpenter) over the head of the prisoner. This ruffian looked with demon-like eagerness and impatience towards his master, for the signal to strike. And here it may be observed, that our good countrymen can have no idea of the almost preternatural fury which savages throw into their distorted countenances, and infuse into their deafening and appalling voices, when they are possessed by the legion-fiend of rage, cupidity, and revenge.

But Mr Bennet persevered in keeping up conversation with the chief, saying, "We want to buy buaa, kumara, ika, &c., (hogs, potatoes, fish,) of you." Just then he perceived a youth, stepping on deck, with a large fish in his hand. "What shall I give for that fish?" "Why, so many fish-hooks." "Well, then, put your hand into my pocket and take them." The fellow did so. "Now put the fish down there, on the binnacle, and bring some more, if you have any," said Mr Bennet. At once the fish, which he had just bought, was brought round from behind and presented to him again for sale. He took no notice of the knavery, but demanded, "What shall I give you for that fish?" "So many hooks." "Take them: have you no other fish to sell?" A third time the same fish was offered, and the same price, in hooks, required and given, or rather taken, by the vender, out of his jacket-pockets, which happened to be well stored with this currency for traffic. A fourth time Mr B. asked, "Have you never another fish?" At this the rogues could contain their scorn no longer, but burst into laughter, and cried, "We are cheating the foreigner," (tangata ke,) supposing that their customer was not aware how often they had caught him with the same bait. Just then one of the cookies, behind, plucked off Mr Bennet's seal-skin travelling-cap. This did not give him particular alarm; on the contrary, expecting every instant to feel the stroke of the axe, it slightly occurred to him that the blow, falling upon his naked head, would more likely prove effective, and need no repetition; at the same time, in earnest inward prayer, commending his spirit to the mercy of God, in whose presence he doubted not that he should very soon appear; the thought of deliverance having no conscious place in his mind during this extremity. While Mr Bennet stood thus pinioned, and in jeopardy, the axe gleaming over his head and catching his eye whenever he looked a little askance, he marked, a few yards before him, his friend and companion, Mr Tyreman, under custody of another chief and his cookies. These wretches were, from time to time, handling his arms, his sides, and his thighs, while from the paleness of his countenance—though he remained perfectly tranquil—it was evident that he was not unaware of the meaning of such familiarities; namely, that they were judging, with cannibal instinct, how well he would cut up, at the feast which they anticipated, while each, like Milton's Death—

"grinn'd horribly, a ghastly smile,
And bless'd his maw, destin'd to that good hour."

The captain, hemmed in with spears, continued a close, but evidently a very indignant captive, near the larboard-bow; while Mr Threlkeld and his son moved backward and forward, a few steps, on Mr Bennet's left hand. In the course of the scene the carpenter, who had been in these parts before, and knew the people, came aft, till he got quite close to Mr Threlkeld, when, looking earnestly towards Mr Bennet, he said, "Sir, we shall all be murdered and eaten up, in a few minutes." Mr Bennet replied, "Carpenter, I believe that we shall certainly all be in eternity by that time, but we are in the hands of God." The carpenter then crept out of his view; but Mr Threlkeld's little boy having heard, with affright, what he had so emphatically predicted, grasped his father's hand, and cried out, sobbing bitterly, "Father!—father!—when—when they have killed us,—will it—will it hurt us when they eat us?" The carpenter had some apprehension of the same kind as the poor child's, and, apparently, felt greater horror of being devoured than of dying; for presently Mr Bennet—who kept his eye, as much as possible, turned from the impending axe, lest the sight of it should affect his countenance,—happening to glance aloof, spied the carpenter athwart the larboard yard-arm, waiting the issue, with a stern determination, which indicated that, come what might, he had chosen his lot. On being asked by Mr Bennet, afterwards, why he had been so foolish as to go aloft, as though there were a better chance there of escaping the expected massacre than below, he frankly answered, "I knew that I must die; but I was resolved that the savages should not eat me, and as soon as I saw them cut you down with the axe, I would have dropped down into the sea, and only have been drowned, for I had weights about me which would have sunk me at once."

The whole of this strange occurrence (during which the cannibals never ceased to rage, and threaten a destruction which an Invisible and Almighty hand stayed them from executing) lasted nearly two hours. At length deliverance came as suddenly as the peril itself had come upon us. Several voices, from different parts of the deck, cried out, "A boat! a boat!" It sounded like, "Life! life!" in our ears. Happily, it was our boat, returning from the Wesleyan settlement, in Wangaroa Bay, with the owner of our little vessel, who had gone thither in it the night before. He brought with him Mr White, the Methodist Missionary, and George, the principal chief in this part of the island. The natives immediately released us from restraint, and forbore from violence, as soon as they perceived who had come with the boat. When George got on deck, his authority at once cleared it of our enemies, who yielded implicit obedience, though reluctantly, on account of the wrong which they imagined had been wilfully done to their chief, who fell overboard at the commencement of the affray. To Mr White, also, we were greatly indebted, for his friendly assistance and seasonable interference on this occasion. At his request, George consented to remain on board, as our protector, till we should quit the station. It is remarkable that this dreadful chief, formerly the terror of Europeans, was made the Lord's instrument for preserving our lives, though, but fifteen years ago, at the head of his cookies and clansmen, he had captured the ship Boyd, Captain Thompson, and slaughtered and devoured her whole company of ninety persons, except a young woman and a cabin-boy. This act of exterminating vengeance for inhuman treatment which he had himself experienced on board, while a passenger in the same vessel from Sydney to New Zealand, took place in this very bay; and, while we were held in durance, and menaced with the like fate, a portion of the wreck of the Boyd was visible from our deck, at intervals, as the waves between rose and subsided in perpetual fluctuation.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF MOSES.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

NO. I.

THE PERILS OF HIS INFANCY.

"By faith Moses, when he was born, was hid three months of his parents, because they saw that he was a proper child; and they were not afraid of the king's commandment."—Heb. xi. 23.

THE introduction of the illustrious lawgiver of Israel into the world took place under circumstances of profound secrecy. The necessity of his parents adopting such vigilant measures of concealment arose, as every reader of the Bible is aware, from a sanguinary edict of the king of Egypt, who, like too many of the despotic and shortsighted monarchs of the East, sought to prevent the rapidly increasing population of a class of his subjects, by the murder of all the male children. Whatever cause had led to this change of policy towards the Hebrews on the part of the Egyptian government,—whether they had combined, as some suppose, with a band of foreign shepherds, who then invaded the country,—or whether it arose from some vague and uncertain fears, that the promise to that people of a rich and extensive country, pointed to their future subjugation of Egypt, there was a determination formed by the king of Egypt to enslave, and gradually to annihilate, the whole Hebrew race. The first step he took for the accomplishment of that design was to prohibit their continuance of their old pastoral pursuits, which, by scattering them over the country, and leading them to shift from place to place, would have afforded them the greatest facilities of evading his decree, and to collect them all into one district, where they were reduced, by their imperious master, to a state of the most abject and grinding servitude. The method which he at first adopted for the murder of the male children of the Hebrews having completely failed, he committed the execution of that cruel task to all the officers who were appointed over the brickmakers, and who, no doubt, were abundantly zealous and faithful to the instructions of their royal master; and so much more effectual were their proceedings, that they threatened, at no distant period, to leave not one remnant to perpetuate the name and memory of the chosen race. But the machinations of wicked men are often thwarted in a manner which lays their wisest counsels in the dust, and the very means, which their wisdom and foresight suggested as the most efficient for their unhallowed purposes, are often rendered, by an overruling Providence, the indirect occasions of promoting his own glory and the interests of his people. It happened that, just about the time when this new edict of Pharaoh was issued, and when, through the vigilance of the mercenary agents of the court, the sword of persecution raged most fiercely, Moses was born, and rescued from the knife of the destroyers, by the timely and prudent precautions of his parents. The credit of that successful stratagem is given by the apostle to both of his parents, although the sacred narrative makes mention only of his mother, and that because the execution, the active superintendence of the counsel devolved upon her; but it is evident that his father was no less engaged in that enterprise than his mother, not only because it was impossible that such a step could have been taken without the head of the family being privy to it, but because, as we shall afterwards find, it was the fruit of their mutual piety. For three months they eluded the strict search of Pharaoh's myrmidons, and managed matters with such dexterity, that on neither was the eye of suspicion ever directed. Their affection grew with the growth of the child; and as, by a kindly law of nature, the heart of a parent is more closely entwined round the life of a child, in proportion to its state of dependence and threatened danger, so we may imagine how strongly the hearts of this affectionate and pious couple must have been bound up in the fate of their little one, when they paid their stolen visits to their infant charge, and brooded over the dire necessity of parting with it, as they looked on the little innocent, serenely reposing, and unconscious of its danger. Every day must have added to their fears of detection, till at length the rumour, probably gaining ground, that there was an infant boy in their house, which would be followed by an immediate and vigilant search, they were compelled to change their measures, and in the hope of preserving him from the tender mercies of his pursuers, to throw him entirely on the care of Providence. There can be little doubt that, during the whole of these anxious three months, the vigilance of this pious pair was accompanied with devout and fervent supplications, and that as the exigency was great, they would be neither negligent nor languid in the exercise of that faith, by which alone they, in common with their chosen race, could expect the accomplishment of the divine promises.

They had been led to adopt measures for the preservation of their boy, "because they saw that he was a proper child." This circumstance is not introduced by the apostle, as if this were the sole reason of the design they had formed, and the expedients they fell upon, but it is mentioned as indicating the strong impression which the appearance of that child made upon their minds, giving them fresh impulse to the performance of the duty which they had other and strong reasons for discharging. It was a most natural idea for the minds of parents to entertain, on perceiving that this child possessed such an uncommon degree of beauty as strongly interested their natural affections, and made them the more willing and resolved to run the risk of attempting its preservation. But we are persuaded that there was something else than the appearance of mere natural beauty and fair proportions that attracted so strongly the attention of Amram and Jochebed, and awakened in their bosoms the common resolution of doing their utmost to save him from the untimely fate of the other Hebrew children. In all the passages of Scripture that bear allusion to the infancy of Moses, this appearance is particularly noticed, and in the celebrated speech of Stephen, he is described as being exceeding fair, or, as it is in the strong, graphic language of the original, divinely fair, so that they were led, by a something uncommon in his features, to a more thoughtful consideration of their child, and to a persuasion that there was some important, though, as yet, unknown and latent reason for which heaven had imparted to him such an extraordinary expression of countenance. And not only were affections thus strongly enlisted in his behalf, which the indication of premature excellence is so apt to do, but even their sober and long suspended judgments were convinced that the child was predestined for some important service, and that it was their duty to resort to every possible means of securing his preservation.

There is no evidence, and indeed, from the whole tenor of the narrative, no probability, that they were privileged with any specific declaration of the will and intentions of God regarding him. They had, however, a firm and unwavering faith in the emancipation of the Hebrew people from the yoke of the Egyptians, the foundation of which faith was the divine promise made originally to their ancestors, and recently revived, in a most affecting manner, by the last will of Joseph, whose dying commands to convey his bones, from the scene of all his glory, to another land more glorious in his eyes as the promised inheritance of his family,—and of the certainty of which he gave them a prophetic intimation and a pledge, by making them the intermediate depositaries of his honoured remains—were calculated to fan, in the minds of the whole Hebrew race, and of Moses' parents in particular, a hope that made them superior to all "fear of the king's commandment." Had this Hebrew household been governed by no other than the dictates of reason and experience, and by no other hope than what arose from the wisdom and excellence of their own plans, they would have had much reason "to be afraid of the king's commandment;" for it was not the mandate of an angry and capricious despot, which, having been issued in a moment of thoughtless levity, or a vindictive mood, might be revoked again, when he returned to a better and milder state of mind, but it was the cool, deliberate, calculating enactment of his government, which had become the standing law of the country, and failure in the execution of which would have been punished as a capital crime, while the rigid performance of it was sure to recommend the zealous officer to the favour and patronage of the court. The parents of Moses, therefore, had much cause for well-founded alarm in carrying on their design of concealing their child, not only on his account, but also on their own, as the loss of their lives would have been the certain consequence of discovery. But they were not afraid of the king's commandment, for remembering that the deliverance and prosperous establishment of Israel, as a separate and independent nation, were guaranteed by the Word of Him "who could not lie," they were convinced that there was no room for doubt or anxiety as to the issue in the minds of any who had just and believing apprehensions of the divine character. Moreover, besides the original promise of God, to which the faith of Amram and Jochebed were directed, there seems to have prevailed a strong and general expectation, among the Jews, that some one would be raised, by Providence, about that time, to achieve the long lost independence of Israel.* This notion, whether founded on some unrecorded revelation or not, that the God of their fathers was to commission some eminent and well qualified person of their own race to accomplish their deliverance from Egyptian slavery, had taken such firm hold of the minds of the Hebrews, that as the time for the accomplishment of the promise was almost at hand, the period having been limited to the fourth generation, and as the thoughts of the Hebrew parents were directed as anxiously to that event as the hopes of the pious Jews were, at a later period, to the advent of the promised Messiah, the parents of Moses, who seem to have been persons of eminent piety, and watchful observers of the procedure of Providence, conceived, as well they might, from the extraordinary prognostics of his infant appearance, that God had reserved him for the achievement of that enterprise. Though wanting an express revelation on the subject, they yet read in these signs the premonitions of Providence that that little babe was raised up for some great and important purpose; and even though they might not possess such plain and certain evidence as might convince them that the great and important purpose could be no other than the long promised and long expected deliverance of their people, yet faith has often acted, and, in this instance, did really act,

While shadows, clouds, and darkness, sat upon it.

It was faith, then, which was the grand principle that led the parents of Moses to conceive it their duty to preserve the life of their child, and which exempted them from all fear of the king's commandment,—faith in the promise of God respecting the increase and deliverance of all the posterity of Israel from the tyranny and the land of the Pharaohs. It was this which prompted them, at first, to hide him for three months in some secluded part of their tent, and which prompted them, when that retreat could no longer afford a safe asylum, to betake themselves to the strange and, apparently, desperate course of trusting him in a fragile bark, amid the impetuous waves and ravenous monsters of the Nile,—a change of measures, which, so far from betraying any diminution or failure of their faith, was the strongest proof of the power and increase of it, for when they saw that the first means their invention supplied could not longer be continued, and yet retained their strong persuasion that it was the will of Providence that the child should be preserved, they adopted another stratagem, which promised not only to save the life of their infant, but to put him in the likeliest way of being qualified for the important office to which he was destined,—a stratagem that was eminently successful. The anxious mother, who charged herself with the execution of it, hovered on the margin of the stream, till she saw, to her exquisite delight, the attention of the royal party directed to the bark that contained the last hopes of the house of Levi; a moment after found her the nired and privileged nurse of her own son, now the adopted child of Egypt's presumptive heiress, and Jochebed, happier than the rest of her countrywomen, returned to her home with the light heart and elastic step of one who had become, as it were, a second time the mother of her child, while the house of Amram, alone, of all the dwellings of Israel, was gladdened by the playful gambols and prattle of a boy.

This very interesting incident may, in the first place, teach us the advantages of cherishing a lively faith in the word and promise of God; and, in the second place, that the most devoted trust in Him is not only perfectly compatible with a diligent use of external means, but will stimulate the believer to a more active and strenuous application to every lawful or appointed means.

CHRIST THE SOURCE OF THE BELIEVER'S BLESSINGS:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES GIBSON,

Minister of Lonmay.

“And I will raise up for them a plant of renown, and they shall be no more consumed with hunger in the land, neither bear the shame of the heathen any more. Thus shall they know that I the Lord their God am with them, and that they, even the house of Israel, are my people, saith the Lord God.”—EZEK. xxxiv. 29, 30.

SINCE man was first placed in this world, receiving his natural gifts and talents from God, a rule of direction as to their use, and a promise of blessings upon their improvement, he has been taught by experience of its needfulness, as well as by divine authority, to look up to heaven, and there to apply for new and continual light and strength, of which the source and distribution ever is with the Father of Spirits.

Accordingly, therefore, as men have cultivated the knowledge of their own spiritual nature and necessities, and sought the Author of every good and perfect gift, has their condition been more or less improved in all their relationships, and in the rational and moral use and exercise of this life.

The history of man, as it has come down to us, is indeed a history of his sinfulness; but we find the truth of our position proved hereby also, that the very sinfulness of his character, the inherent corruption of his nature, has been acknowledged, combated, and restrained, when the hand of the true God has been seen,—his ordinances, which have been vouchsafed, venerated, and the operations of his providence regarded.

I. The heathen, observant only of their own superstitious rites, and grossly ignorant of the truths, as they were careless of the moral obligations and restraints of religion, scoffed at the Israelites, who highly valued, though they acted so often unworthily of, those divine communications by which they were truly distinguished. But to those who are able and willing to institute an inquiry into their history, their divine law, and prophecies, and to compare these with the history and institutions of any or of all the other nations upon earth, it must appear that as, on the one hand, the approach of the Gentiles, as proselytes, to the faith of the heavenly oracles committed to the Israelites, afforded the only probable means of spiritual improvement in those days, so, on the other hand, that any admixture of the favoured people with the heathen in their rites and institutions, or the forming with them any ties by which they might be assimilated, would have been attended with the very worst effects,—debasement of the worship of God by such conversion, and, by adulterating any portion of his Word or appointments, thereby defeating their design, and obstructing the course, the preparation and evidence of the work of redemption. And therefore it is, that the Scriptures of the Old Testament so pointedly denounce all such alliances, and are full of threatenings against the profane, ungodly, and indecent habits of the heathen; they warn also the Israelites that the greatest of all temporal calamities that could befall them, was that of being given over to such enemies; and thus we may see the reason why their wars had a religious character, and why they groaned so grievously under heathen captivity, when subjected thereto on account of their national defection from God; why also they still kept aloof and distinct from those who thus enslaved their persons; and lastly, why their national hatred, so begun, was propagated and perpetuated against the Gentiles, whom they were taught to designate a strange people, because worshipping strange gods, and being strangers to God's truth and law, and unbelievers in his promises. To the race of Israel, therefore, from the time of their deliverance from Egypt till the day of the Messiah, one of the greatest of earthly blessings sought from the God of heaven was, "that they might not bear the shame of the heathen."

We may next advert to another instance of that divine protection which is set forth in the text as the recompence of a people who seek the Lord in the way which he appoints, viz., "that they shall not be consumed with hunger in the land." This expression is very significant, and very extensive in its signification, being determined, by its connection with the great promise preceding it, and the whole passage, indeed, from the beginning of the chapter which introduces it, to refer to spiritual as well as temporal deliverances and blessings. In the scripturally-familiar and endearing similitude of a flock under the charge of an affectionately careful shepherd, human beings wandering from the way of life, and lost for want of a sufficient leader and head, are represented as taken under the charge of God himself, their all-sufficient Shepherd, powerful and willing to reclaim, restore, supply, and save them.

Revelation from the God of nature has clearly disclosed that it was the penalty of disobedience, embodied in the very covenant of life, made from the first with man, that sin should be visited by an agency destroying its works and its workers together; and hence, when death came into the world by sin, the days of man were numbered,—hence corruption from without was appointed to keep pace, and walk side by side, with the corruption that is within. Hence the law spoke its terrors of temporal punishment,—hence the prophets were heralds of calamitous judgments, and hence a freedom from such woes, and a blessing from on high pouring out plenty, and diffusing health, and lengthening out a life of safety and peace, were regarded by God's ancient people as within the boundaries of the land of promise, and within the precincts of God's reign upon earth. But the greatness of the gift of life is little, indeed, to be accounted of, wonderful as it is, as pertaining to the body, when compared to the reasonable spirit which God has created after his own image, immaterial, but giving it a body as it pleases him, inclosing it in a fleshly tabernacle, made of earth, and returning to earth again. It is the soul which giveth to that body a life, and a character of life, in so many and such grand respects totally unlike that of the irrational creature. The soul exerts its capacity to receive of itself, and from other spirits, the knowledge of all the works which God has made visible to, and discoverable by man,—a knowledge bounded, indeed, by a finite comprehension, yet still extending to the heights above and the depths beneath, and the length and breadth of this lower creation; a knowledge surveying, in short, the great stores of the earth, the sea, and the firmament, surveying and exchanging the works and inventions of men, yet never satisfied with its attainments, and so varied and ever varying in its use, as to render it impossible almost to rehearse its multiplied and diversified employments. Yet there is not one of its faculties or powers which is not at first imparted, momentarily sustained, and continued in operation, by God. Apart from him, the soul has not, no, not for one moment of time, one exercise of its own sufficiency. And so established is all this in the history of nations and of individuals, that the setting up of pretensions to knowledge or virtue, independently of sought and sustained supplies and help from God, and of his blessing on the means employed, has invariably been the time also of a decline of spiritual-mindedness, and of a corrupting influence over the pure and holy affections of the soul, an absolute deadening and destroying of all elevating and soul-sanctifying hope.

Such and so great is the declared needfulness of these spiritual supplies to our souls, from the Word and Spirit of God, that the man who is self-deprived of their quickening, inspiriting, enlightening, and strengthening sustenance and virtue, is said to be sick, to faint, to sink, to be lost, to be sick unto death, to be lost without remedy, to undergo the second death, and to be separate from God.

From the first sinning parents, then, even to the last of their sinful posterity, the soul has been directed to look to God for continually needful spiritual supplies, to look for his justifying grace to the Son of God manifest in the flesh, taking man, in his distance from God, under his own guidance back to the Father, doing that for man which no man could do for himself or for others, making discovery of all truth needful for enlightening and directing the mind to God, to his will, and his purpose of grace, through faith leading to repentance and obedience derived from his own perfect obedience; offering up a meritorious and sufficient sacrifice, of which countless thousands of burnt-offerings had blazed out the sign; giving his pure and spotless body, and his guiltless blood, to take away the curse on man's transgression, and establishing his kingdom in the very hearts of human beings; building his Church on the ruins of the temples of superstition, and the empty space of infidel devastation; calling into life those green and flowering spots, those trees of blossom in the wilderness of depraved humanity, which the speculative philosophy of the heathen sages, and the trifling, gross, and sickening formalities of heathen worship, scarcely essayed, and were in truth wholly impotent to plant or to cherish.

It is to this unspeakably best gift of God to man the sinner, that the passage in the prophet before us determinedly directed the eye of hope to look; as the source of all the mercies and blessings, which God had in promise bestowed.

The plant of renown was the ever-glorious Messiah; and by him it was to be accomplished, that human souls should hunger no more for lack of knowledge, or means of grace and direction, but that heathen darkness, and defilement, and gross superstition, and ungodly habits of soul and life, should have the living light, and living power of the Gospel, to dispel and restrain, and in the fulness of time to remove them. It was this plant of renown, by which the seeds of truth and virtue should be so sown in the heart, and the image of God so restored to the soul, that he should dwell with his servants, and that they should know the Lord their God to be with them.

In the first announcement of the remedy for man fallen by transgression from a holy and happy state, the Redeemer was promised as "the seed of the woman." He was prophetically announced growing up as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground, (Isa. liii. 2;) as a branch out of the decayed root and stem of David, (Isa. xi. 1,) which the Lord should make strong for himself, (Psalm lxxx. 15.) "The spirit of the Lord resting upon him, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge, and of the fear of the Lord. Judging the poor with righteousness, reproof, with equity, the meek ones of the earth; but smiting with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips slaying the wicked."

He is called by Isaiah, (ch. iv. 2,) the Branch of the Lord, beautiful and glorious; and the time is foreshown when the people should inherit the Branch of God's planting, the work of his hands, that he might be glorified. "Behold," says Zechariah, (iii. 8, and vi. 12,) "thus speaketh the Lord, Behold the man, whose name is the Branch, and he shall grow up out of his place. Even he shall build the temple of the Lord, and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne, and he shall be a Priest upon his throne, and the counsel of peace shall be between them both. And they that are afar off shall come and build in the temple of the Lord."

To be the common fountain of spiritual light and life to all that embrace the offered mercy and salvation, did the Redeemer come from the glory which he had with the Father to the abodes of men. Among the Israelites, at first, in the Lord's vineyard, was he planted, and to them did he offer himself, the true vine, and invite them to come unto him, to be grafted into him as the stem, through which every branch derives vitality, growth, and fruitfulness; but they rejected that quickening virtue, that life-preserving influence and nourishment, and were therefore cut off and cast out of the vineyard which God's right hand had planted, broken off from all the blessings to be fulfilled to the accepted children of the promises; made aliens to the ancient commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenant made with their fathers. They rejected their Prince and Saviour, and, while they vainly look for another, are rejected for their unbelief. But though the blood of Him, whom with wicked hands they were suffered to crucify,—the Lamb of God, our passover slain for us,—was on that rebellious unbelieving race, he, who was indeed the glory of Israel, was ever foreshown as a light to lighten the Gentiles, having the uttermost parts of the earth given over to him for his possession; and the branches of that tree, of which he is the stem, we behold in their vast and spreading extent. In his universal Church and kingdom, he is now that plant of renown, whose blessed fruit supplies the hungry soul; and he extends that influence and energy into the characters of those that feed on his supplies, which satisfy the longing soul, and fill it with goodness.

II. Having brought our discourse to this bearing, that our spiritual supplies are continually derived from Christ, the plant of renown, feeding souls hungering and thirsting after his righteousness, so as that they shall not suffer spiritual decay, or sink under the burden of sins which were the shame of the heathen, and a deadly evil to all such as are overcome by them, it now remains for us, that we make application of this great truth of our relationship to the Shepherd of Souls.

There are designated, in the subject of the text which we have been illustrating, two sorts of evils, which you must shun as the greatest which can befall you—the shame of heathen ungodliness, and vice revived; practical heathenism, on the one hand, and, on the other, a state of spiritual famine, or destitution of Christian faith and graces, from defective application to the means divinely afforded, or want of suitable improvement of them.

1. You cannot be ignorant of the language employed in the Word of God, to express his abhorrence of heathen wickedness, and the strong and forcible scriptural delineation of that wickedness, its causes, extent, and consequences. Not worshipping the living and true God, they had ceased to know him, and lived as without God in the world. They groped in darkness, or satisfied themselves with delusions, or believed a lie, and they held their opinions in practical unrighteousness, and impurity, and cruelties, and evil inventions without end. Their self-surrender to the flesh and to the world, blinded the eyes of their souls, sealed up or seared their consciences, till they cared not for and minded not any of those great interests which belong to our salvation. All this character of demoralization, unchecked by any higher principle than the slavish fear of man and his brief authority, was the cause of their being given over to their own reprobate minds. They left void that place in the heart which God requires for himself, and the evil spirit took possession of it. That they denied God, by wicked works, and alienation of mind and of conscience from him, will be their condemnation at the last day; but it will be more tolerable for them in the day of judgment in this respect, that they were without the written testimony of God, and had no heavenly Shepherd revealed to keep them within the pale and territory of a spiritual Church and kingdom, no man of God to speak his word, no Sabbath-day of holy exercises, no communion with the Saviour; and let this view of heathenism be fully present to your thoughts, that you may see the dreadful evil of any approach to its polluting character, its withering power over all the fair proportions of human character—fair only when improved by religion in virtue, and fitted by a Saviour for God.

Oh, then, my friends, employ yourselves often in self-interrogation, whether you have been indeed living in the knowledge, the daily pondered knowledge, of your dependence upon your God, not merely for the supplies needful for continuing your bodily life, but for those which are of infinitely more concern, the daily needful supplies of grace and spiritual influence, restraining your wills and determining them to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts. Emancipated as you are from the gross idolatry, the foolish, dark, and base superstitions of ancient heathenism, by the great change which Christianity has made to pass over the human intellect and the face of society, (much as its spirit-changing force is resisted,) be reminded that you have a power ever busy within you, which, if not dispossessed, will never cease till it bring you to that revived heathenism which accounts the finished work of the Saviour, and the operation of the Holy Spirit, as certain strange unacceptable things, which occasions their being heard with aversion, or received with opposition, or stifled and denuded of all growth and fruitfulness. That power is sin, and self-sufficiency. Ask, then, yourselves, whether you have the inclination and desire to be spiritually minded, or if you have been only alive to things temporal, and dead to the things of salvation? Oh, let me warn you, that till you are roused to a sense of your sinfulness, your many moral defects and spiritual wants, roused to a sense of the sin and danger of an unregenerate and unsanctified soul, that you are still away from God,—that you are beset by the evil spirit of heathenism, and have neither light nor life from Christ. Let me warn you that the sentence of heathen condemnation impends over such with the aggravation of denying the Lord that bought them, of despising the riches of his goodness, and after a hardened and impenitent heart of treasuring up wrath against the revelation of God's righteous judgment. Oh, may God save every one of you from the sin, the danger, and the shame of revived practical heathenism.

2. It is not enough that you are free from the shame of heathenism. So, for the most part, was the race of Israel, the ancient people of God. Nationally, and as a Church, they were kept (not indeed without divine constraint,) from the gross darkness, and the alienation of the heathen from the faith and worship of the true God; yet they often fell into a lifeless, spiritless, and faithless form of religion, and were betrayed, by their own sinful hearts, into similar condemnation. They temporalized almost all the spiritual promises of God; they looked to their law, and their other divine institutions, as bestowing upon them privileges which they laboured not to improve to their great design and end. They did not live by them. They did not give them effect. "They talked of them, they were bodily present at their formal observances, they appeared to come unto God, (Ezekial xxxiii.) as his own people come before him, and they sat before him as his people, and heard his words, but they would not do them; with their mouth they shewed much love, but their heart went after its own covetousness." Nothing wrought on that people in the way of religious impression, for any endurance of time, (so hard of heart were they,) but temporal calamities and chastisement from God's hand; the servile principle of fear almost alone actuated them, or restrained them and forced them back on religious observances, and regard to their heavenly ruler. "When he slew them," says the Psalmist, (Ps. lxxviii. 34,) "then they sought Him; and they returned and inquired early after God: and they remembered that God was their Rock, and the high God their Redeemer. Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouths, and they lied unto him with their tongues. For their heart was not right with him, neither were they steadfast in his covenant." And Oh! my friends, is it not, alas! but too true, that even in the Church of the Son of God, and in the kingdom of his grace, there may be, and often is, a mere profession of faith without experience of its power,—an assumption of the name and faith of the Christian, without verification of those substantial realities which must be wrought into the soul with labour, and effort, and ardour, and anxiety, equal, at least, to what is bestowed on the things which perish. Let it not be your reproach and everlasting ruin that your Christianity should dwindle into mere appearance and outward observance, denuded of its vital operation on the inner man, so as to renew your souls in truth and holiness after the image of your Redeemer. Oh! let it not be left alone to the season of adversity, the day of trouble, or the bed of sickness, to force upon your minds those considerations by which you should be united to Christ, in your day of strength and trial, in all your contest with your spiritual enemies.

Let that living principle which brought the Son of God from heaven to seek and to save sinners, that without him were lost, lead you to him to be changed from sin to holiness, to receive of the constant influence of his Word and Spirit, to be indeed his disciple, and to be assimilated to him. Be united to the Saviour by love to him and to his truth. Be united to him as the branch to the vine, which gives it of its own nourishment and life. The stem of the natural tree is the great channel from whence the juices, fitly prepared, ascend in numerous veins, giving birth to numerous branches, and affording them all their supplies for growth, and producing their leaves and their fruit. Separate the branch from the stem, it withers and dies at once; injure its union and attachment, by partial separation, and the branch bleeds, and losing its invigorating nourishment, wears an impaired and sickly character. Or let some disease, some canker eat into it, and it grows unseemly and deformed, its blossoms fade, or it bears an evil and bitter fruit. Or is the branch overgrown with those vegetable substances which are apt to fasten upon it, these, by degrees, rob it of its proper vigour, they gradually overspread the branch till its appearance is wholly changed, and, at last, both buds and leaves are no more discernible. Even so hath our Saviour taught us that he is the vine, and that we are the branches, (John xv. 5.) branches that cannot bear fruit unless we abide in him and he in us.

May God, in his grace and mercy, grant that you may experience the fulfilment of his promises; may you know that God is with you of a truth, that he keeps you for himself, the Israel of God, to inherit his blessings.

SUFFERINGS OF THE CREW OF THE VIEWFORTH
OF KIRKALDY, ONE OF THE ICEBOUND
WHALERS, OF 1835.

No. III.

BY THE REV. J. THOMSON,

One of the Ministers of Dysart.

I PROCEED NOW to the consideration of the dangers to which the lives of our brave mariners were exposed, from the time in which the fields of ice began to break up around them, till the period when a merciful God effected their deliverance. This part of the narrative possesses more than ordinary interest, as it exhibits so many and so striking evidences of that special providence which was exercised in their behalf.

We have contemplated nature in a state of repose, when around the Viewforth lay an unbroken field of ice to the extent of three hundred miles. Were the question then asked, Was it possible to effect her deliverance that season, from a situation becoming every day more and more hazardous? is it not obvious, judging from the state of things, that the most experienced could only give a desponding reply,—human power was utterly inadequate to break up the mighty barrier which seemed to conspire to prevent the escape of the frail bark. The seamen knew this, and made up their minds to encounter all the rigours of an Arctic winter. But when all refuge failed them, save the mercy of their heavenly Father, He on whom they reposed all their hopes, interposed timely in their behalf, and, with an outstretched arm, rescued them from all the evils of their condition. "With God nothing is impossible." All the elements of nature are under his control. The inspired Psalmist, who describes the effects of the divine agency in the production of frost and snow, mentions, also, the means by which these are reduced into a state of fluidity. "He sendeth out his word and melteth them; He causeth his wind to blow, and the waters flow."—Ps. cxlvii. 18. This was the agent employed by Providence for the rescue of our icebound mariners. And though the operation of that agent exposed them to new and most formidable dangers, yet He whom the winds and the waves obey, so graciously watched over them, while surrounded with the instruments of death, as to enable them every hour to mark his hand in their preservation, and to sing of mercy as well as of judgment.

To describe the scene that followed, when a commission was given to the winds and the tides to break up the immense fields of ice, by which the Viewforth, and the other ships in like circumstances, were prevented from making their way homeward, were a task altogether impracticable. From an early period in October, down to the time when our brave seamen were finally delivered from danger, there was a constant succession of heavy gales. The war of elements commenced with indescribable fury. The lowering sky, the masses of clouds moving hurriedly, indicated that a tremendous conflict was speedily to ensue. Accordingly, on the 2d of November, it blew a perfect hurricane. The solid masses of ice that covered the surface of the deep quickly began to yield to the force of the agitation beneath them, and to break up in wild disorder, with a noise louder and more terrific than that of thunder. The icebergs were put in motion. One after another, impelled by the winds and tides, came down on each side of the ship, sweeping, irresistibly, every obstacle before it, and plowing up the fields of ice which had hitherto been deemed impenetrable. And, glancing at this scene of turmoil, what but the power of Jehovah could have preserved the helpless bark, while driven southwards, about a thousand miles, through the broken ice, often heaved up mast high?

But I must give a few extracts, in order to exhibit the situation of the ship at this stage of the eventful narrative. Sabbath, Nov. 15.—"Another awful and eventful day. The wind did not take off till nine A. M., and when daylight came, what a scene presented itself to our view!—the wreck of the Middleton. I cannot express the feelings that went to our hearts when we first saw our companions in such a state. Every one regarded another in mute despair. Six of our men went over to assist them, as they saw a boat coming towards us; and what a melancholy tale they brought back!" "How thankful ought we to be to Thee, O Omnipotent God, for having sustained us through this dreadful night, and spared us as living monuments of thy mercy." 18th.—"We have been driving along this ironbound coast at the rate of nearly four miles an hour. The ice drove us in with the land, and what a terrible sight to see the great towering mountains frowning above us, and expecting, every moment, that the ship would be dashed in pieces. At one time we were afraid she was gone, and got our provisions and clothes upon the ice; but, thanks be to God, our gallant ship is still spared." Dec. 6.—"This is the Lord's most holy day, a day in which man rests from his labours, and one in which He has dealt mercifully with us. It blows a complete gale, driving us fast along the land, and the ice squeezing as high as our bulwarks, yet we have escaped uninjured." Dec. 10.—"The ice is now warring and crashing in a most awful manner. It would, indeed, be difficult for the imagination to conceive what is now going on around us, and the prospect that lies open to our view. The ship is now drifting, and working her way through interminable fields of ice, while regions of eternal frost every where meet the eye. The entire scene presents nothing but desolation in its most awful form. Frowning cliffs and naked glaciers shew us there is no home for us here, should we be forced to leave the ship."

Dec. 23.—"At two in the morning pitch dark. A pressure took the ship, (it was blowing a gale of wind at the time,) and lifted her up clean on the top altogether. She leaned again, and fell down in about half an hour; and, to add to our dismal situation, she was stove, and, from that day to this, we have never left the pump a moment." This was a very memorable occurrence, and I shall have occasion, by and bye, to refer to it. I request my readers to bear it in remembrance, and to think of the situation of the Viewforth, now that an alarming leak was added to her other perils.

Before bringing this part of the subject to a close, it is proper to advert to the danger to which the crew of the Viewforth were exposed from icebergs. Some of these are of great magnitude. "On the 1st of October, came on a terrible mass of ice, higher than our ship's masts, and aground in forty-five fathoms of water. Coming right upon a ridge of bergs which we had hardly conceived it possible to clear; the Jane was lifted up two feet out of the water, by a pressure of ice; the Middleton had the ice squeezed up as high as her channels, and our own got some severe contusions, but a gracious Providence watched over us. We drove through between two bergs which a line could have reached, and soon found the ice more open, but the gale continued." Dec. 8.—"We are now driving past a tremendous iceberg. Arthur's Seat arrayed in one of its most wintry garbs is not to be compared with it."

That I may not weary the patience of my readers by farther details of danger, I now proceed to specify a few remarkable instances of the special providence of God, which occurred in the history of the crew of the Viewforth.

1. An occurrence, which took place on the 13th of November. "We made a narrow escape this morning about four. It rained sleet, and was very hazy, when a blink of a few minutes shewed land right a-head of us: it was Cape Dunbar. The land was N. N. E.; and had the wind continued in the same direction, another hour would have driven us on the face of the rocks, and instant destruction would have been our inevitable fate. But a gracious Providence ruled it otherwise: a land breeze sprung up, slackening the run of the ice, and we got worked out with some difficulty." Blind must he be, who does not see the hand of a merciful God in that event!

2. The crew of the Viewforth, on perceiving the vessel so completely icebound, were of opinion, that it would materially contribute to her safety, were a dock cut in the solid ice, in which she might lie, with greater security, when the field of ice in which she was locked should begin to move and break up. Accordingly, we find them employed at this work on the 25th November. They toiled hard and long, but to no purpose. Though they supposed a sufficient space had been cleared, the ship could not be moved. This may, to some, appear a trivial circumstance; but, how short-sighted is man! On their want of success in that undertaking, their preservation was afterwards, and that at no distant period, made to hinge; for when the field of ice in which the vessel was imbedded began to move, she was driven down furiously, at the mercy of the winds and tides. One of the icebergs, mountain high, to which I have alluded above, lay directly in her course. The moment it was beheld, all on board concluded that their destruction was inevitable. They immediately went below deck for prayer, with the exception of the captain, who remained to watch their fate. Under the impression that they were on the brink of eternity, and that Omnipotence alone could rescue them from impending death, they cried to God to protect and save them. And let it be recorded, to the glory of his name, the Hearer of Prayer graciously heard their agonising cry for mercy, and afforded a deliverance, truly marvellous, just while they were earnestly engaged in pleading at his throne of grace—the ship glided closely by the huge berg that threatened ruin; and, what is singular, the only part of the ice in which the Viewforth was inclosed, was cut away by the berg, that very dock which they had thought so essential to her safety. Had she been there, her destruction would have been unavoidable and instantaneous.

3. The leak occasioned by the pressure sustained on the 23d December was over-ruled for the preservation of the crew of the Viewforth. I beg to state the following facts regarding it: And, first, it happened just at the time when the men stood in need of some powerful motive to bodily exertion. We have seen how prone they were to yield to the torpid influence of the cold, and how inactivity increased their danger. Now ordinary motives to exertion, in the absence of immediate danger, were not of sufficient power over their minds. Hence the necessity of something to rouse their energies. The leak, which appeared to them, at first, as destructive of all chance of escape, was the very means employed for preventing them from yielding to lassitude and despair. Now all was activity—the pump going at the rate of 270 strokes in the half hour. By those exertions, heat was effectually restored to their chilling frames, and hope to their drooping spirits. Secondly, the leak was never so great as to master them. Thirdly, in proportion as their strength began to fail, the leak diminished; so that by the time they arrived in Dysart harbour, it was easily subdued. And who, on reviewing these facts, can doubt, the special interposition of Providence in their behalf?

4. Scanty though their provisions were for a long period, they lasted, through good management, till their wants were generously supplied at Stromness. They were never absolutely without food.

5. When they got clear from the ice, on the 30th of January, the wind was favourable for their return homewards, and continued so during the remaining part of the voyage,—a circumstance of no small importance, considering their extreme weakness, and that by this time only about twelve hands could do anything for the navigation of the ship. Sterne beautifully remarks, that "God tempers the wind to the new shorn lamb." Here we have a still more striking instance of accommodation. The sails which were set on the 30th of January did not require to be altered till the ship arrived off Stromness on the 14th of February.

6. The storm which drove back Captain Ross of the Cove, the vessel sent out in quest of the icebound whalers, was most favourable to the Viewforth, and the means of rescuing her famishing crew from their sufferings and privations. The meeting of these ships was most seasonable. Captain Ross's conduct was, in every respect, praiseworthy. So was also that of the inhabitants of Stromness, who vied with each other in acts of kindness and hospitality. Nor must I forget the Christian part which the Rev. Peter Learmonth, the minister of Stromness, acted towards the sufferers, in so promptly and affectionately ministering to them spiritual support and consolation.

7. When the Viewforth, after her return to Dysart harbour, was undergoing repairs, on the patent slip, a singular discovery was made, which indicated the hand of a merciful Providence in her preservation. It appeared, on inspecting the damage sustained on the 23d December, when violently thrown up upon the ice, that, directly opposite that part of the bottom which was most seriously injured, was the head of one of the water casks, which, by the shock sustained on that occasion, was forcibly pressed into the place which had received the fatal blow, and thus prevented the ship from sinking. The gap was so wide, that, were it not for that circumstance, the destruction of the crew must have been inevitable. The sensations of those who, on the removal of the cask, and the ice by which it was still surrounded, perceived the extent of their danger, will not be soon forgotten. The impression produced on the public mind here, on learning this fresh instance of the care of God towards these seamen, warrants me to record the fact, that it may the more clearly appear to whom the glory of preserving their lives is due. And, considering their great debility, and the many other evils of their lot, what a mercy that the extent of the danger sustained by the ship was concealed from them till after their arrival! "Verily there is but a step between us and death." But "the Lord is our refuge and our strength, a very present help in trouble." "He brings the blind by a way they knew not; he leads them in paths they have not known." Even in the midst of danger, "he giveth his beloved sleep."

EXPERIENCE OF THE HEATHEN.

BY THE REV. J. A. WALLACE,

HEATHEN GREENLANDERS' IDEAS OF A FUTURE STATE.

THE idea of a future state is strongly impressed on the human mind, and exercises considerable influence over the hopes and fears of man. In consequence of this fact, the difficulties connected with the conversion of a world that lieth in wickedness, seem to be rendered somewhat less formidable than they might otherwise have been. Take, for example, a heathen country, and let it be supposed that its inhabitants have no knowledge or anxiety in regard to the realities of an eternal world,—that all their enjoyments are limited to the present state of existence, and that the impression is deeply engraven on their minds that at death they are to perish for ever. In that case, it would be exceedingly difficult to make the truths of Christianity to bear effectually upon them. Even the Gospel, though bringing "life and immortality to light," would meet with no response in the feelings of their hearts, and all their previous habits and modes of thinking would present almost insurmountable obstacles to its reception. But only grant that their spirits, degraded though they be, are often the birth-place of "thoughts that wander through eternity;" that there are those amongst them "who, through fear of death, are all their lifetime subject to bondage;" and that they are not without their own views, imperfect though they are, in regard to a heaven, a resurrection and a hell, then, assuredly, the case is as different as it is encouraging. We see, even in their fears, their misgivings, their restlessness of spirit, something like the incipient preparation for the blessings of the Gospel of Peace. And instead of despising their experience in the day of small things, we are almost justified in regarding it as furnishing materials for the Christian missionary to work upon, and making ready a people prepared for the Lord.

That there are heathens, whose views are such as we have supposed, is not matter of mere conjecture, but of fact. The Greenlanders, for example, to whose experience we adverted in a former paper, have, according to the testimony of Crantz, the following ideas on the subject of a future state:—

"The most sensible Greenlanders maintain that the soul is a spiritual essence, quite different from the body and all material substances, that it needs no corporeal nourishment, that it survives after death, and must have another kind of nutriment, but what that is they know not.

"Hence it is easy to conjecture what conceptions they form to themselves of the future state. In general they imagine it to be a better state than this temporal life, and they believe that it never ends. But they differ much in their sentiments about the site and circumstances of the place.

"Many, or most of them, place their elysium in the abysses of the ocean, or the bowels of the earth, and think the deep cavities of the rocks are the avenues leading to it. There dwells the Good Spirit; there a joyous summer is perpetual, and a shining sun is obscured by no night; there is the fair limpid stream, and an exuberance of fowls, fishes, rein-deer, and their beloved seals, and these are all to be caught without toil. But to these seats none must approach but those that have been diligent at their work,—that have performed great exploits,—have mastered many whales and seals,—have undergone great hardships,—have been drowned in the sea, or died in childbed.

"Others, that are more charmed with the beauty of the celestial bodies, soar beyond the rainbow, to the loftiest sky, to seek their paradise there.

"On the other hand, they situate their hell in the subterraneous regions, which are devoid of light and heat, and filled with perpetual terror and anxiety.

"Some of them assert that the soul stays five days by the grave where the body lies; then the person rises again, and seeks his maintenance in the other world, as he did in this. Therefore the hunting implements of the deceased are deposited by his grave. But as the more considerate Greenlanders have seen that both the body and the hunting instruments lie upon the place and rot, they believe nothing of this, and know nothing of that resurrection which is true. Yet some few have uttered the following hints towards it, which are the more worthy of notice, because they contain at the same time, some trace of a Supreme Being. They say, that in distant future periods, when all mankind shall have died and be extinct, the terrestrial globe shall be dashed to pieces, and purified from the blood of the dead by a vast flood of water. Then a wind shall blow the clean washed dust together, and replace it in a more beautiful form than ever. From that time there will be no more bare and barren rocks, but the whole will be a level champaign, overspread with verdure and delight. The animals will also rise and reanimate in vast abundance. But as for men, He that is above will breathe upon them, and they shall live. But they can give no account who He is that is above."

In these brief extracts we discern traces of some of the most momentous doctrines of Scripture. The resurrection of the body, the immortality of the soul, the blessedness of heaven, and the misery of hell, are all distinctly recognised, though in a way somewhat accommodated to the habits and conceptions of a carnal mind. And by referring to the knowledge which these people possess of such solemn realities, we can account for a fact which might otherwise appear to be inexplicable, that their minds are often filled with indescribable horror in the immediate prospect of dissolution, whilst their lamentations for the dead are marked with all the emphasis of hopeless and inconsolable distress. Not that we mean to affirm that it is the natural tendency of these, or any other doctrines of Scripture, to impair the comforts of the human mind, or to afford nourishment to feelings of despair, but merely that such doctrines, if but imperfectly understood, and especially when viewed apart from their connection with the Gospel of the Great Redeemer, can scarcely fail to be occasions of agitation and alarm, rather than sources of sweet and refreshing consolation. Such, accordingly, seems to be the case with these poor heathens. Theirs is not a state of utter darkness, else they might sleep on and take their rest, totally unconscious of the eternity that is before them. Nor is it, on the other hand, a state of perfect light, for, in that case, they might walk without stumbling, and find rest and peace unto their souls. Theirs is rather a kind of melancholy twilight, as remote from the clearest sunshine as from the darkest shadows of death; a state of fearful, undefinable, and interminable suspense. The light breaking in upon their spirits is enough to disturb their slumbers, to distract them with troubled visions, and to give a gloomier aspect to the darkness that is around them, but totally insufficient to point them to the Cross, or to conduct them to paths of Peace. They have a heaven, an immortality and a hell; but what are these without a Saviour to wash them in his blood, or a Spirit to lead them to the mercy-seat, or a hope, both sure and steadfast, entering into that within the veil? They are little better than clouds that are without water, carried about of tempests; trees whose fruit withereth, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; waves of the sea raging with an everlasting restlessness; wandering stars shedding but a fitful light on the path of the weary wilderness, whilst disclosing more horribly to their view the blackness of darkness for ever!

Is such the condition of these unhappy men? Then how strong are the obligations which lie on the Christian world to make known to them that salvation which God has prepared before the face of all people; "a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel;" and if even these outcast portions of the creation seem as if they were groaning to be delivered from their bondage, and waiting, as with anxious spirits, for the manifestation of the sons of God; "Oh! how beautiful upon the mountains must be the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto them, thy God reigneth!"

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Keep the end of your being in view.—You have never yet asked in earnest, for what purpose you came into the world. What wonder, then, that ye wander and and walk at random, seeing ye have not proposed to yourselves any certain scope and aim? This is great folly, and you would not be so foolish in any petty business. "The light of the body is the eye," if that be not light, the whole body is full of darkness. If your intention be once rightly established, all your course will be orderly; but if you be dark and blind in this point, and have not considered it, you cannot walk in the light, your whole way is darkness. The right consideration of the great end would shine unto you, and direct your way; but while you have not proposed this end unto yourselves, even the enjoyment of God, you must spend your time either in doing nothing to that purpose, or in doing contrary to it. All your other lawful business, your callings, and occupations, are but by the bye; they are not the end, nor the way, but you make them only your business, while they are altogether impertinent to this end. And the rest of your walking in lusts and ignorance, is not only impertinent, but inconsistent with it, and contrary to it. If you think you have it before your eyes to enjoy God, I pray you look on the way you choose. Is your drunkenness, your swearing, your uncleanness, your contentions, and railings, and such works of the flesh,—are those the ways to enjoy God? Be not deceived; you who draw not near to God often in secret, and by faith in his Son Jesus Christ, as lost, miserable sinners, to be saved and reconciled by Him, you have no fellowship with him, and shall not enjoy him hereafter. You whose hearts are given to your covetousness, who have many lovers and idols besides him, you cannot say, Whom have I besides thee on the earth? No; you have many other things besides God. You can have nothing of God, except ye make him all to you, unless you have him alone! "My undefiled is one." He must be alone, for his glory he will not give to another. If you divide your affections, and pretend to give him one part, and your lusts another part, you may do so, but he will not divide his glory so; he will give no part of it to any other thing. But as for those souls that come to him, and see their own misery without him, O how good it is! It is not only good but the very best, yea only good. There is none good save one, that is God; and there is nothing good for us but this one,—to be near God; and so near as to be one spirit with the Lord, for he that is joined to the Lord is one spirit. Rejoice in your portion, and long for the possession of it. Let all your meditations, and affections, and conversation proclaim this, "Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none on the earth that I desire besides thee." And certainly God will guide you to the end, and receive you into glory. Then you shall rest from your labours, for you shall dwell in him, and enjoy that which you longed and laboured for. Let the consideration of our end unite the hearts of Christians here; for how absurd is it that those who shall be made perfect in one, should not only go contrariwise, but have contrary minds and affections.—BINNING.

Reflect ere it be too late.—Whatever we are doing, or wherever we are going, time is still advancing, and we are hastening, as fast as it can carry us, either to heaven or to hell.—EADÉ.

The improvement of Affliction.—Learn not only patience under your afflictions, but also profitably to improve them to your soul's good; learn by them how vain and unprofitable things the world and the pleasures thereof are,—that a sharp, or a lingering sickness renders them utterly tasteless. Learn how vain and weak a thing human nature is, which is pulled down to the gates of death, and clothed with rottenness and corruption, by a little disorder in the blood, in a nerve, in a vein, in an artery. And, since we have so little hold of a temporal life, which is shaken and shattered by any small occurrence, accident, or distemper, learn to lay hold of eternal life, and of that covenant of peace and salvation which Christ hath brought for all that believe and obey the gospel of peace and salvation; there, there shall be no death, no sickness, no pain, no weakness, but a state of unchangeable and everlasting happiness. If you thus improve affliction you shall be gainers by it, and most certain it is, that there is no more probable way under heaven to be delivered from affliction, if the wise God see fit, than thus to improve it; for affliction is a messenger, and the rod hath a voice, and that is to require mankind to be the more patient, and the more humble, and the more to acknowledge God in all our ways. And if men listen to this voice and conform to it, the rod hath done its errand, and either will leave a man, or else give him singular comfort even under the sharpest affliction; and this affliction, "which is but for a moment," thus improved, will "work for us an exceeding and eternal weight of glory." SIR MATHEW HALE.

SACRED POETRY.

PARAPHRASE OF CANTICLES, CHAP. II. 8-13.

BY THE REV. ARCHIBALD M'CONECHY,

The Ancient Church looking forward with joy to the times of the Gospel.

'Tis my beloved's voice ; he comes,
 His eager steps I see ;
 O'er mountains like the bounding hart
 He leaps, he flies to me.

He by our arbour early stood,
 And bright as morn arose,
 He through the lattice look'd, and all
 His beauty did disclose.

He spake, arise my soul, he said,
 And here no longer stay ;
 To where unfading joys abound,
 Arise, and come away.

The winter and the rain is o'er,
 The flowers now deck the fields,
 The vine puts forth her fragrant grapes,
 Her fruit the fig-tree yields.

The birds their cheerful song resume,
 Enlivening every grove ;
 The turtle, in melodious strains,
 Now wakes his voice to love.

Arise, my love, the morning breaks
 And ushers in the day ;
 The Jewish symbols are fulfilled,
 The shadows flee away.

THE TEAR.

BY A FIFESHIRE FORESTER.

WHAT brought thee there, thou trembling tear,
 On that fair cheek to glow ;
 Like dew-drop on the blush-rose shed ?
 Art thou the child of woe ?
 Or was it joy's gay breath that stirred
 Gently thy placid fount,
 And made thee from its secret depths
 In sweet suffusion mount ?

No ; it was neither grief nor joy,
 But gratitude sincere,
 That drew from feeling's holy source
 That sympathetic tear.
 It was the sufferings that were borne,
 The promise which was given,
 By Him, who died that sinful souls
 Might rise through blood to heaven.

It was the blest Record of Love
 And pardon in the sky,
 That touched that sinner's contrite heart,
 And filled that beaming eye ;
 And thrilled with voiceless harmony
 Through every trembling chord,
 And sweetly glowed, in that young breast
 Devoted to its Lord.

And such a tear e'en angel eyes
 In heavenly halls might shed,
 While kneeling round the throne of Him
 Whose heart for sinners bled.
 And such a tear for evermore
 Before the blest may shine,
 For God preserves his children's tears,
 In his celestial shrine.

And blest that eye, which o'er the page
 Of pardoning love can melt ;
 And blest that heart, that such a thrill
 Of grateful love hath felt !
 For brightly through eternal years
 Such love-drops may begem
 The sapphire walls and golden gates,
 Of New Jerusalem.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Special Providence.—The late Rev. E. Jones, of Trevaithin, in South Wales, being on a visit to some friends, when his finances were very low, had a sum of money given him to purchase some malt ; but on his way home, passing through a village, and visiting several distressed families, he gave away all his money. On reaching home, he told his wife, who possessed a kindred spirit with himself, what he had done. She commended his conduct, and then showed him the precise quantity of malt which his money would have purchased, which a neighbouring farmer had just sent them.

The early use of the Scriptures.—We learn from the writings of St. Chrysostom, that the Scriptures were in use amongst the people in his day ; since he often exhorts even the poorest of them to make the Scriptures their daily study ; to read them after their usual meals, and in the hearing of their wives and children : assuring them, that “ the servant and the rustic, the widow and the infant, might understand them.”—“ Are the Scriptures only to be read by the monks ? ” asks the worthy patriarch ; “ or are they not still more needful for you, as the man who is daily exposed to dangers and to wounds stands most in need of the physician ? ”

Where is the Man who has seriously examined and yet does not believe ?—Sir Isaac Newton set out in life a clamorous infidel, but, on a nice examination of the evidences for Christianity, he found reason to change his opinion. When the celebrated Dr Edmund Halley was talking infidelity before him, Sir Isaac Newton addressed him in these or the like words : “ Dr Halley, I am always glad to hear you when you speak about astronomy, or other parts of the mathematics, because that is a subject you have studied, and well understand ; but you should not talk of Christianity, for you have not studied it. I have ; and am certain that you know nothing of the matter.” This was a just reproof, and one that would be very suitable to be given to half the infidels of the present day, for they often speak of what they have never studied, and what, in fact, they are entirely ignorant of. Dr Johnson, therefore, well observed, that “ no honest man could be a Deist, for no man could be so after a fair examination of the proofs of Christianity.” On the name of Hume being mentioned to him, “ No, sir,” said he, “ Hume owned to a clergyman in the bishopric of Durham, that he had never read the New Testament with attention.”

ON THE NECESSITY OF DIVINE REVELATION.

No. I.

BY THE REV. GEORGE GARIOCH,
Minister of Meldrum.

“ Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, and the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by me.”—JOHN xiv. 6.

It was not in the introduction of sin alone, that the deplorable effects of the fall of Adam and Eve were exhibited. As one of the undoubted characteristics of the loss of the divine image, the blight of a deeply inwrought and wide extending depravity passed over the soul, involving an obscuration of those noble perceptions of a moral and spiritual nature by which it was originally distinguished, and comprehending the progress of a deterioration, to which no limits can be assigned. Sin produced a separation between God and his creatures, which to them must have been followed by the feelings of self-condemnation and despair, overwhelmed, as their souls must have been, by a conviction of guilt, and by the contemplation of that purity and holiness, by which the divine nature was pre-eminently adorned. As far, therefore, as the moral degradation and the spiritual destitution of the fallen posterity of Adam were proofs of the consummation of their misery, and of their abandonment by God, there was abundant evidence of the deplorable catastrophe which brought death into the world.

But among those conflicting elements, in the midst of which the miseries of a fallen condition were manifested, there were other tokens apparent of the degraded nature of man, and of the hopelessness of that state, from which there could be no deliverance by human means. The darkness of ignorance interposed an obstructing medium to the reception and comprehension of the exalted truths of religion, which could only be penetrated by a ray of that light divine, which gladdened the soul of man in the state of innocence. An incapacity for perceiving the infinite perfection of God, and the strict undeviating harmony and correspondence of all His glorious attributes, was coeval with the destruction of the moral fabric of the human soul; spiritual death was the awful result of the combination of both,—a result, to the removal of which, the illumination of the understanding by WISDOM FROM ABOVE, is as necessary as is the aid of divine grace to the purification of a sinful nature. On the day when Adam fled from the presence of his Maker, and hid himself among the trees of the garden, his soul not only experienced the removal of that holy and elevated purity, which the divine presence inspired and perpetually nourished, but the abstraction of that spiritual knowledge which God himself could alone communicate.

There has generally, however, been a manifest inconsistency in the confessions of mankind, with respect to the extent of their depravity and of their ignorance, in as far as the former is admitted and the latter has been denied. The corruption of the human soul has been acknowledged with scarcely any qualifications, and the inheritance, by all the posterity of Adam, of innate moral depravity. On what other grounds, indeed, can the facts of history be explained? From the fall of Adam until the present time, the records of history have been records of the baseness and profligacy of mankind. Crime, in all its terrific proportions, in all its monstrous shapes, in all its deepest hues, has stood prominently forward, the most hideous and loathsome object, in that extended picture of human life, which is presented to the eye of the mind in the successive ages of the world's duration. The annals of our race may, with truth, be said to be annals of guilt, and to bear a dismal, but unchanging, testimony to the truth of the scriptural declaration, that “the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked.” And let consciousness speak as to the state of the carnal and unsanctified soul, and it will also proclaim the accuracy of the description of the inspired writer, that it is “dead in trespasses and sins.” There comes, therefore, to our assistance, in vindicating the truth of the scriptural doctrine of a primeval fall from a state of moral rectitude, the unimpeached and unimpeachable evidence of history and consciousness, to which may be added, the testimony of personal observation of the character and conduct of our fellow-men. All these interpret this doctrine to the heart, by a process of fearful, but irresistible, demonstration, and leave the understanding to grapple with other truths, which may be less easily understood, or less readily admitted.

Nor can it reasonably be a matter of doubt, that the same agents in the work of illumination, will afford conclusive evidence of the truth of the scriptural doctrine of the fallen condition of man, in as far as it is shewn by his inability to discern and comprehend the great truths of religion, until he is enlightened by God. On this part of the subject, however, I am aware that our conclusions will not meet with the same ready and cordial assent; and that the pride of the philosophic intellect, which does not conceive itself in any degree implicated in the admission of moral depravity, will be indignantly aroused to vindicate what it considers to be the just and undoubted claims of the human understanding. There enters, in fact, into this question, a specious but delusive fallacy, which has never failed to perplex and embarrass it, and to lead to a pronouncing of judgment in a perverse and dogmatical manner. The fallacy to which I allude, consists in receiving the speculations of philosophers upon the subject of religion and morals, as if they were the pure and genuine product of reason. If it can be shewn, that they have no just pretensions to be considered such, the inferences which have been drawn from them, as to the power of the mind of man to discover the great truths of religion, are illegitimate and unsound; and the lofty structure which has been raised in commemoration of the triumphs of human intellect, being reared upon an insufficient foundation, must fall to the ground.

The science of natural theology, as it is now systematically arranged and successfully illustrated, is a very interesting study. Its utility, also, may be readily admitted, in as far as it can be rendered subsidiary to the illustration of Christian evidence, and successfully employed as an instrument for combating the predilections and prejudices of the philosophic intellect. But this admission of its utility, is made under a full conviction of the emptiness of its pretensions, if it lay claim to originality in the discovery of religious truth. When we peruse the works of Ray, Derham, and Paley, or the Bridgewater Treatises, we feel convinced, that those grand fundamental truths of religion,—the existence of a first great and glorious cause of all things, his divine perfections, and his moral government of this world, which it is the object of those valuable productions to establish and confirm, were fully perceived and appreciated by the authors, as preliminary and acknowledged principles. We know the source from which their knowledge has been acquired; and that they did not enter on an examination of the material and immaterial world, in order to establish any primary truths in relation to the Creator, of which they were previously ignorant. They did not seek for an “unknown God,” but for proofs of the being and perfections of that God, whom they already acknowledged. His existence had been ascertained in the Sacred Record; in its pages, his divine and holy character shone forth in bright and irresistible splendour; and the object of these writers, was to find that existence manifested, and that character shadowed forth in the works which he has made. They endeavoured to discover in the wonderful constitution of the human mind, and in the complicated structure of the human body, in the magnificence of the starry firmament, in the varieties of organised existence, in the productions on the surface of the earth, and in the materials which are hidden within her, the proofs of those truths divine, which had already been clearly manifested in the written Word of God. They desired to ascertain these, and their labours have been crowned with great and growing success,—a success which was to be anticipated, from the consideration, that an infinitely glorious and perfect Being will be recognised by the display of his attributes, wherever they are brought within the sphere of observation.

But to what, in reality, do the brightest achievements of natural theology amount? Certainly not to the discovery, but simply to the illustration of religious knowledge. Their whole excellence consists in the confirmation which they bring to that which was previously known, by the very striking and interesting proofs which they afford of the truth of some of those great doctrines which are revealed in the Sacred Scriptures. Those who contend for the supremacy of reason, may suppose that we are now underrating its powers; but in making deductions from the demands of natural theology, when any one is inclined to claim for it the title of an original science, no injustice is done to it. Still less is injustice done to the deserts of the celebrated writers, to whose works allusion has been made, or to others who may yet travel over the ground which they have occupied, to whom it must be a matter of consciousness, that those doctrines of religion which form the science of natural theology had, long before the proof by which they seek to establish them, been impressed upon their minds, through the instrumentality of that training in a Christian land, to which every one is accustomed from his infancy. It is consequently impossible, that the mind which has been imbued with the doctrines of Christianity, should be able to divest itself of its scriptural information, or to enter on the investigations of natural theology, without being previously enlightened in the knowledge of the whole circle of truths which it embraces. And the reader of treatises on natural theology, who is acquainted with the book of Revelation, is well aware that the doctrines contained in the former, are those with which he has long been familiar.

It cannot, therefore, fail to be remarked, that the doctrines of religion, in as far as they are exhibited in treatises of natural theology, can never be justly considered as the genuine product of those treatises, and that the light in which they shine, is reflected from the Word of God. That which is original in them, is the correct and happy illustration of divine truth, drawn from the material and immaterial world; and it is only a mind of high and varied accomplishments that is capable of furnishing such illustration. The use which has been made of the Sacred Volume, by writers on natural theology, tends, in a very high degree, to increase our confidence in its value, and to confirm our convictions of its divine truth. The test which has been applied to it is of this nature: the great truths of religion have been taken from it, and made to adorn the systems of natural theology; human learning has exhausted its powers in order to illustrate them; and the reasonings of this science have afterwards been made the grounds upon which the excellence of scriptural doctrine itself has been subjected to examination. Truth is able to come through such a process uninjured; and scriptural truth has come through it, not only uninjured, but triumphant.

The purport of the preceding observations is to shew, that no argument can be drawn from modern treatises on natural theology, to prove, that the human mind, unassisted by divine revelation, is capable of arriving at the true knowledge of God. The soul, as has been already remarked, experienced, at the fall, not only the destruction of its moral nature, but the obscuration of that perception of spiritual and divine truth, which was possessed by the parents of our race, during their state of innocence, and which was then maintained in brilliant and unclouded exercise, by an intimate and uninterrupted intercourse with the great and glorious source of perfection. A darkness of the understanding, in regard to the holy nature of God, and the doctrines of true religion, is a characteristic defect, as well as a symptom of misery, in fallen men, which can only be removed through the medium of divine revelation; and if any one be inclined to call in question the truth of this remark, he must establish the contrary proposition, not by appealing to modern systems of natural theology, which are formed with all the advantages arising from a knowledge of the Sacred Scriptures, but to those systems of religious belief, which existed in the world, previously to the publication of Christianity. Such an appeal will bring under consideration, the testimony of history; and to that testimony I shall refer for a proof of the fact, that the mind of fallen man is incapable of discovering the great and glorious truths of religion, and that there is consequently an indispensable necessity for divine revelation to enlighten it. In the course of this examination, it will appear, that although the triumphs of human genius are manifest, in the fields of science, and philosophy, and literature, "there is, perhaps, nothing more thoroughly beyond the cognizance of the human faculties, than the truths of religion, and the ways of that mighty and invisible Being, who is the object of it."*

JOHN ERSKINE, BARON OF DUN,

ONE OF THE EARLY SCOTTISH REFORMERS.

Among the distinguished individuals whom the Reformation in Scotland called into active operation, none was more zealous in the cause of Protestantism than John Erskine, Baron of Dun. This eminent person, who was sprung of an ancient family, was born in the year 1509. After having been educated, for some time, under a domestic tutor, he was sent, at a suitable age, to King's College, Aberdeen. Possessed of a naturally acute and vigorous mind, he made great progress in the acquisition of such knowledge as the colleges of Scotland could at that time impart; and such was his ardent thirst for information, that he spent several years at the castle of Dun, after his academic career was terminated, in the study of the ancient classic and the primitive Christian writers. With a mind thus enlightened and improved by the perusal of the best authors, it was scarcely to be expected that if ever he was in communion with the Romish Church, he should continue, for any length of time, within its pale.

When the Laird of Dun, accordingly, had scarcely reached his twentieth year, he became an active supporter of the Reformation, and the warm friend of its adherents. By the divine blessing upon the exertions of Luther and Melancthon, the Protestant doctrines were rapidly spreading in Germany, and from the literary intercourse which then subsisted between that country and Scotland, the same spirit of hostility to the superstitions of the Papal hierarchy soon manifested itself with a keenness scarcely inferior to that which characterized even the birth-place of the Reformation. The Romish clergy, anxious to check summarily the rising heresy, as they considered it, resolved to have recourse to the most severe and arbitrary measures. The first victim of their relentless cruelty, in Scotland, was Patrick Hamilton, Abbot of Ferme, who, in consequence of his zeal in the cause of truth and righteousness, was doomed to be burnt at the stake, and thus earned for himself the high honour of being the first Scottish martyr. It has often been remarked, as confirmed by the history of the world in all ages, that "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church." And this was fully exemplified in the case of Hamilton. From the hour of his death, Protestant principles acquired a prominence, in the estimation of the people, which they had never enjoyed before, and a spirit of inquiry was awakened which the utmost vigilance and activity of the Romish clergy were unable to repress.

Among those who entered most cordially into the doctrines of the Reformers was the young Laird of Dun. He studied the Bible with the utmost ardour and desire to know the truth, and he employed a great part of his time in expounding its blessed statements to his friends and dependents. In this way he was instrumental in diffusing the principles of the Reformation to a great extent, and many who afterwards became distinguished for their zeal in behalf of these principles, owned their obligations to the instructions of Mr Erskine. It is impossible to attribute his conduct, as many might have wished to have done, to motives either of interest or worldly ambition. Still in the bloom of youth and in the enjoyment of wealth, he might have been tempted, one would think, to ally himself with those who had it in their power to dispense places of honour and preferment. His, however, was a purer, a nobler ambition. He resolved to cast in his lot with the persecuted adherents of the Reformation, and with an intrepidity and heroism, which the Gospel alone could originate, he fearlessly espoused their cause. From that moment his efforts were chiefly directed to the propagation of the tenets which he had deliberately and conscientiously embraced. Nor were his exertions unattended with success. One instance, in particular, is recorded in Knox's History, of an individual who was converted from Popery by the instrumentality of Mr Erskine, and who remaining firm to his principles, suffered martyrdom at Edinburgh, in the year 1534. His conversion is thus described by Knox:—

"He had not learned to read; but, one day, when the young Laird of Dun was in a certain quiet place in the fields, reading to him out of the New Testament, and happened, as God had appointed, to read to him the words of our Saviour, 'He that denieth me before men, in the midst of this wicked generation, I will deny him in the presence of my Father, and before his angels,' Mr Straiton suddenly became as one enraptured. He threw himself upon his knees, extending his hands; and, after looking some time earnestly towards heaven, burst forth in these words: 'O Lord, I have been wicked, and justly mayst thou abstract thy grace from me: But, Lord, for thy mercies' sake, let me never deny thee, nor thy truths, for fear of death or corporal pains.' His prayer was graciously answered; for Spottiswood says, that 'David Straiton stood, at his trial and death, most constantly to the defence of the truth; and gave great encouragement to another gentleman, Norman Gourlay, who suffered death along with him.'"

Mr Erskine, by the consistency of his character, no less than by his wealth and station, attained very high influence in his neighbourhood, so that at an early period of his life he was appointed chief magistrate of Montrose. Gladly availing himself of the increased means of doing good which his office afforded him, he rendered all subservient to the advancement of the Reformation. He proved himself the avowed patron of George Wishart of Pittarow, who had also imbibed Protestant principles, and besides procuring for him the appointment of master of the Grammar School of Montrose, he readily sheltered him in his own house from his persecutors, and endeavoured, by all the means in his power, to protect and befriend him. Wishart's zeal, however, was not to be repressed, and, as is well known, he at length perished at the stake.

The castle of Dun was indeed an asylum, open, at all times, to those who preached or professed the reformed faith. Mr Erskine hospitably entertained them as the persecuted followers of Jesus, and he joined with them in meetings for prayer and the expounding of the Scriptures. Long before he became a regular minister, Mr Erskine was in the habit of officiating on such occasions as an exhorter, an order of men who existed in the Church even after the Reformation.

In the year 1554 the cause of Protestantism in Scotland received a powerful impulse by the arrival of the celebrated John Knox from Geneva. Many of his intimate friends, among whom was the Laird of Dun, had invited him to return, without delay, to his native country, and it was in consequence of their urgent solicitations that he took up his residence in Edinburgh. While there, Mr Erskine and some other leading reformers were in the habit of meeting with Knox, that they might profit by his experience and information, and that they might be strengthened in their attachment to those principles which they felt to be alone consistent with the doctrines of Revelation. One evening, in particular, at the Laird of Dun's lodgings, a number of the reformed ministers and others being present along with Knox, they came to the unanimous resolution that, at whatever risk, they would henceforth discontinue their attendance on the Popish Mass; and that as soon as circumstances should permit, they would have the Lord's Supper administered to them according to the same simple form as was observed in the Reformed Churches abroad.

At the earnest invitation of Mr Erskine, Knox spent some months at the castle of Dun, where, for the first time, he publicly denounced the vices of the Romish clergy, and their ignorance of the real and obvious meaning of Scripture. Embracing the opportunity of Knox's visit, the Laird of Dun invited to the castle all his influential friends in the neighbourhood. The chapel was thrown open for the free admission of all who wished to hear the great champion of the Reformation, and such was the intense interest excited by the powerful appeals which he made to the reason and the conscience, that before he left the castle, he was compelled to promise that he would return the following summer. Next year, accordingly, he again visited Dun, and had the high satisfaction of dispensing the Sacrament to a great number of the leading gentlemen in Angus and Mearns; and at a meeting which was regularly summoned, they declared their determination to oppose the idolatry of the Romish Church, as far as lay in their power.

Thus was Mr Erskine made the instrument of commencing the great work of Reformation from Popery in Scotland. He led the way, throwing the whole weight of his character, and station, and wealth, into the scale of the Protestant party, and his example was speedily followed by many even of the nobles of the land. At length, in the end of the year 1557, he, along with the Earl of Argyle, the Earl of Glencairn, and all the Protestant nobility and gentry of Scotland, subscribed a covenant, binding themselves in the presence of God to advance the cause of the Reformation. In this deed the subscribers termed themselves the "Congregation of the Lord," and declared it to be their intention, with the assistance of God, to "apply their whole power, substance, and very lives, to maintain, set forward, and establish the Word of God against Satan and all the wicked powers who might intend tyranny and trouble against the said congregation." This bond was transmitted for signatures throughout the length and breadth of the land, and it was soon apparent that the "Congregation" was both a numerous and a powerful party.

In the meantime, Henry II. of France, anxious to connect his kingdom with that of Scotland, proposed to negotiate a marriage between the Dauphin and Mary the young Queen of Scots, who had been educated at his court. Having prevailed upon the Scottish Parliament to accede to his measure, he requested them to send commissioners to represent the three estates of the kingdom at the marriage of their queen. Among these commissioners appears the name of "John Erskine of Dun, knight and provost of Montrose," a circumstance which shows the confidence reposed in him by his country, notwithstanding his well known adherence to a party whose principles were opposed to those of a great majority of the Parliament. The commissioners sailed for France in February 1558. Besides encountering a severe storm in the course of their voyage, the embassy itself was peculiarly unfortunate. The French king, perceiving that the commissioners decidedly refused to sanction the secret designs which he evidently entertained upon Scotland, could not conceal his disappointment, and though the marriage of the young queen was celebrated, very few of the ambassadors returned to their native country, having died in rapid succession from a cause which must ever remain an impenetrable mystery. Of the few who reached Scotland in safety, Mr Erskine was one, and great, no doubt, was the satisfaction felt by the Reformed party on the return of so able and devoted an adherent.

The "Congregation," now strong, both in numbers and influence, assumed a still bolder position than they had hitherto done, and, unmoved by the power or the wealth of their adversaries, they took advantage of an assembly of Popish dignitaries being met at Edinburgh, to lay before them certain points, on which an immediate change was absolutely necessary. The most obvious and glaring defects respected the use of the Latin language in the public prayers and the administration of the sacraments, an unscriptural mode of electing the ministers, and the consequent influx of an immoral and unprincipled priesthood into the Popish Church in Scotland. The individual selected to urge upon the assembly of the Romish clergy an immediate removal of these abuses, was Mr Erskine of Dun; and although with the utmost calmness and moderation he entreated them to yield a little to the spirit of the times, they were inexorable. They absolutely refused to satisfy the Protestant party in a single point. The Queen Regent, who had been hitherto guided by the advice of the Popish bishops, perceiving the growing confidence with which the "Congregation" urged their claims, resolved to exert herself to the utmost in endeavouring to suppress the heretical opinions. By one bold stroke, accordingly, she thought to effect her object. She summoned all the Protestant ministers of Scotland to appear at Stirling on the 10th of May 1559, there to answer to the charge of heresy and schism. The alarm was immediately sounded throughout the country, and the leading gentlemen of each county resolved to accompany the ministers of their respective districts to the place of trial. The counties of Angus and Mearns, which had so remarkably profited by the labours of Mr Erskine, poured forth their multitudes on that occasion. Crowds, not merely of the wealthier but also of the poorer classes, hastened forward to testify their attachment to the Reformed principles, but they had proceeded no farther than Perth, when the Queen Regent, alarmed at the spirit which herself had raised, sent for Mr Erskine to meet her at Stirling, that she might confer with him on the points at issue, with a view to an amicable adjustment. To this request he readily assented, and leaving the adherents of the Reformed party at Perth, he proceeded forthwith to meet the princess.

Meanwhile Knox, who had again been on a visit to the churches at Geneva, arrived in Scotland, and accordingly obeyed the summons which had been forwarded to him by the Queen Regent. The presence of this master-spirit imparted fresh courage to the brethren, who were still at Perth waiting anxiously the result of the conference in which Mr Erskine was engaged at Stirling. The agreeable news at length reached them, that the Queen Regent had agreed to discharge the Protestant ministers from the diet which she had proposed to hold. On receiving this in telligence, the great body of the people quitted Perth, and retired to their several homes. Knox, however, and many of the ministers, naturally suspicious of the crafty princess, resolved to remain in a body till the 10th of May was past. Nor were their suspicions ill-founded. On the evening of that very day, Mr Erskine arrived from Stirling with the news, that the Queen Regent had suddenly changed her mind, and as the Protestant ministers were not in Stirling on the day at first appointed for their trial, they were denounced as rebels, and all persons were forbidden, under pain of treason, to assist, to comfort, or to receive them. Such perfidious conduct excited the strongest indignation of the reformers, and they resolved to unite in maintaining that cause which was dearer to them than their lives.

The treachery of the Queen Regent, as might almost have been anticipated, soon led to a civil war, which, though happily not attended with much bloodshed, continued for thirteen months. In this war the Laird of Dun occasionally took a part as a temporal baron.

In the course of the protracted contest, Mr Erskine, whether from his own convictions, or the advice of his friends, thought it his duty to lay aside the sword, and to become a preacher of the Gospel on Protestant principles. That he was fully qualified for the office, seems to be admitted on all hands; for while Buchanan styles him a "learned," Knox speak of him as a "godly man." Accordingly, when peace was obtained by the death of the Queen Regent, and the ministers of the reformed religion were appointed to their several districts, Mr Erskine was nominated ecclesiastical superintendent of the counties of Angus and Mearns. This office, which was merely resorted to by the Church as a temporary expedient, was somewhat analogous to the office of Bishop, and was recommended, by the First Book of Discipline, to supply the spiritual wants of large districts, until a greater number of efficient pastors could be obtained. It was one part, indeed, of the superintendent's office, to endeavour, as far as possible, to procure spiritual instructors for every pariah belonging to his district.

In December 1560, the first General Assembly of the Protestant Church of Scotland met and ratified the nominations of superintendents, which had been made by the Committee of Parliament; and in their first session, they recognised Mr Erskine's clerical character, by declaring "that John Erskine of Dun was apt and able to minister." In the laborious, but honourable, situation which the Church had assigned him, he continued to exert himself with unremitting diligence for thirty years. Often does he appear to have felt himself overpowered by the multifarious duties which devolved upon him, and in three successive Assemblies, we find him requesting "to be exonerated of his burthensome calling." The services of such a man, however, were too valuable to be dispensed with, and, accordingly, even in 1574, when he demitted his office purely and simply into the hands of the Assembly, they refused to accept his demission.

During the reign of Queen Mary, Mr Erskine was frequently in Edinburgh; and such was the suavity of his manners, that in the visits which he occasionally paid to court, he was more readily received by the Popish Queen than some of the other reformers. Knox, indeed, declares that she once said, "Above all others, I would gladly hear the superintendent of Angus, Sir John Erskine, for he is a mild and sweet natured man, and of true honesty and uprightness."

In the discharge of his clerical duties, Mr Erskine was indefatigable; and to enable him the better to fulfil them, he refrained from acting in his capacity as a baron. Being possessed of an independent fortune, as was the case indeed with the whole of the superintendents, he exercised his pastoral office without payment, and even assisted many of those poor and pious men, whom he employed to officiate in the different parishes of his district. Such a state of matters could not be expected to continue, and accordingly, in an Assembly held at Stirling in August 1571, a commission was given to Mr Erskine and a few others, to attend Parliament, and plead in behalf of the Church. Their application, however, was not at that time successful, chiefly owing to the civil dissensions which raged in the country.

Mr Erskine was one of the commissioners employed in preparing the Second Book of Discipline—a work which was carried on with the utmost care and attention, and which was at length presented to the Assembly in 1579, and by them approved. He was held in the highest honour by his brethren, and no better proof can be adduced than the fact, that he was five times elected Moderator of the General Assembly. The last meeting of that ecclesiastical body which he attended, was held in 1587, when he, along with some others, was appointed to collect the acts of Parliament which favoured the Reformed religion, that they might see the Church consolidated, and upheld in all its privileges as a National Church.

Mr Erskine was now far advanced in years, and his bodily infirmities were evidently increasing. He had survived the other four superintendents, so that he was the last who held that important office; and at his death, which occurred on the 12th of March 1591, the function of the superintendents was merged in that of the Presbyteries, or Elderships, as they were then called.

For some years previous, indeed, more especially after the return of Andrew Melville from Geneva, the propriety of continuing the office of the superintendents was publicly questioned. No steps were taken, however, toward its abolition; the five individuals who held the office having died, no successors were appointed, and thus the Presbyterian polity, in all its beautiful simplicity, and practical efficiency, was at length fully recognised. It became the Established Ecclesiastical System of the country, and though once and again has it been shaken to its foundations, it still survives, the glory and the blessing of the Scottish people.

THE WISE MEN OF THE EAST.

BY THE REV. JAMES ESDAILE,

Minister of the East Church, Perth.

THE East being the cradle of the human race, might also be expected to be the nursery of knowledge. We are accustomed to look to Greece and Rome, as the sources of the knowledge and literature which have been so extensively cultivated in modern Europe. We, indeed, received the impulse from the Romans, and derived from the writings of their eminent authors many of the materials of knowledge: but it is notorious, that the Romans were indebted to the Greeks for all their improvements in elegant and useful knowledge. Was Greece, then, the fountain from which emanated that stream of knowledge which has been gradually diffusing itself over Europe? No; the Greeks themselves were ungrateful pilferers and plunderers, carefully concealing the sources from which they derived their knowledge, and assuming to themselves the merit of having discovered what they had only borrowed or stolen: yet, notwithstanding their vanity and self-conceit, they were compelled to acknowledge their obligations to the East, for the very first elements of knowledge; for they confess that they owe the letters of their alphabet to Cadmus the Phœnician. That such a person ever lived may be doubted; at least, it would be more rational to deny his existence altogether, than to believe one-half of what is said of him. The origin of the fable concerning him is probably this: Kadm, or Kedem, from which Cadmus may be easily formed, signifies the East; and the Greeks, knowing that they had come from that quarter, but not thinking it any honour to be derived from the Phœnicians, chose to acknowledge their obligation to them only for the letters of their alphabet. To this extent they spoke the truth; and the whole truth, stript of poetic fables, is told by Thucydides, their most veracious historian, who informs us that the original settlers in the islands, and on the mainland of Greece, were pirates and robbers; trained, we have no doubt, to their profession, in the mercantile navies of Tyre and Sidon. They were, in fact, Kadmonites in their origin, their literature, and their institutions.

But the East has always been famed for knowledge; and there is the highest probability that modern Europe owes to it many of those inventions which have been assigned to modern discoverers, but which are now known to have existed, from the remotest antiquity, in the distant East. I need only specify paper, printing, the mariner's compass, and gunpowder; the most important discoveries, or inventions, that ever have been presented to the world, and they are all said to have been discovered during the dark ages of Europe. If that is the case, we may safely affirm, that the dark ages have given light to the world: but there can be little doubt that these arts and inventions had a very different origin. It is said that gunpowder, for instance, was invented by a German monk; and there can be no doubt that its composition was known to an English friar, viz., Roger Bacon. It may seem strange, that such an invention should have originated in such a quarter; but the wonder will vanish, if we consider that wandering monks and missionary friars had extended their travels into the remotest East, and were therefore the most likely persons to introduce the knowledge of the art into Europe; and their own fraternity was the most likely body to which the secret would be intrusted: besides, it is absolutely certain that gunpowder was known in China from the earliest ages, in all its applications, except for the destruction of human life; enlightened Europeans had the merit of this application. Then, the mariner's compass, the same as that in use at the present day, and a very handsome one it is, was in universal use among the Chinese when they were first visited by Europeans; and printing and paper, which have produced such miracles in modern Europe, were known and used in China, perhaps a thousand years before it had been visited by merchants or pilgrims from the West. Nay, gas, which in its application as a means of illumination, is only of yesterday in Europe, has been employed by the Chinese, in the interior provinces, for this purpose, as well as for heating their houses, and cooking their victuals, from time immemorial. The fact is mentioned, and the singular process described, by some of the early Romish missionaries, and their account has been given in the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal about two years ago, and more recently in "The Edinburgh Cabinet Library," (Historical and Descriptive Account of China.) The wonder will not be diminished, when the reader is told, that the gas is not prepared in retorts, and by destructive distillation, as with us; but extracted, ready made, from the laboratory of nature.

From these, and many similar facts, it is evident, that the knowledge of the useful arts is of high antiquity in the East. But it is not my business to follow out this inquiry; only, it may be remarked, that the knowledge conducive to the comforts of animal life has no tendency to smooth the path to religious wisdom; and if our useful knowledge societies have no other object in view than the temporal comforts of man, and think this sufficient for his happiness, they probably could not do better than send a deputation of their number to the celestial empire, to take lessons from its subjects in regard to the arts and manipulations necessary for animal comfort; and that jealous people, so suspicious of the interference of foreigners, might, probably, admit them, when they found that they came to learn, and not to teach.

But my object, chiefly, is to investigate the religious knowledge of the East, and to trace the origin of those expectations which prevailed over all those countries eastward of, and bordering on, Judæa, of some extraordinary person who was to appear, at a particular time, as King of the Jews; or, as the Roman writers express it, perhaps more properly, as Sovereign of the world. That the expectation among the Jews of the promised Messiah was constant and uniform, is what might naturally have been expected; it was the only thing they had to cheer their hopes in the prostrated state of their temporal power; and national vanity and ambition were as powerful motives as their faith, to foster a hope so pleasing, and so gratifying to their patriotic feelings. And there can be no doubt that the conterminous nations of the East were sensible of the high religious privileges which had been enjoyed by the Jewish nation, and would have been glad to have learned from them, had not the Jews, in their madness, forsaken the Lord, who had wrought such great things for them, and gone over to the idolatrous worship of their neighbours. We might expect to find in the East many fragments of true religion, even among those nations which were not connected with the family of Abraham. All the post-diluvian nations were descended from Noah, who was a preacher of righteousness; and we can scarcely suppose that all his descendants should instantly forget the doctrines which he taught. Accordingly, we find among the inland tribes, who followed the pastoral life, much more simplicity of manners, and purity of creed, than among those who inhabited the coast, and whose minds were influenced by the diversified manners and creeds of the different people with whom they came in contact. Thus, the Sidonians and Egyptians, if not the absolute inventors of idolatry, were, at least, the most effectual missionaries of its corruptions; and, with the commerce which ministers to the comforts and luxuries of life, they imported the worship of all the false deities of the nations with which they trafficked. But among the pastoral tribes which inhabited the interior, many doctrines of the primitive religion continued to maintain their ground; and, though the family of Abraham was selected for a particular purpose, yet it was not the only one which entertained true notions of God. Job, though not of the race of Abraham, proclaims, nevertheless, in the most emphatic terms, the divine sovereignty, and urges submission to the divine will; though he evidently seems to think that he was selected as a victim, not for his demerits, or to promote his improvement, but as an example of the inscrutable purposes of the divine will, which no man should dare to question. His friends, also, were not less zealous in inculcating submission to the appointments of heaven; but they insisted, that visitations of judgment were always sent as punishments of sin, and that Job suffered on account of some great but secret wickedness: their argument was, "Who ever perished being innocent, or where were the righteous cut off?"

In fact, among the pastoral tribes of Arabia and Syria, Theosophy, or the study of the nature and decrees of God, was the only kind of knowledge that was cultivated: cut off from general intercourse, and subject to great and sudden vicissitudes, they meditated on the power and awful sovereignty of God, and were, in the time of Job, as decided predestinarians as their descendants are at the present day. Mahomet did not invent, but adopt the doctrine of predestination, which had been that of his countrymen from the earliest periods of their history.

There does not seem, then, to be any thing extraordinary in the wise men, or Magi, for that is their proper appellation, having heard of one who was to be born King of the Jews: they had it not by revelation, but by tradition; and the Roman historians tell us, that such traditions prevailed over all the East. The only thing wonderful was, the miraculous light which guided them on their way. The promise of the Messiah is nearly as old as the human race, and descended in the line of Seth to Noah, who undoubtedly taught it to his children, by whom the world was peopled after the flood. Its diffusion, therefore, was at first as extensive as the human race, and Job, who dwelt on the borders of Arabia, and who must have lived about the time of Abraham, received it in its pure, spiritual meaning, as announcing deliverance from the power of sin and of death. "I know," says he, "that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh I shall see God." His views were free from all the absurd notions entertained by the Jews, in after times, when they were subjected to bondage and oppression on account of their sins, and eagerly interpreted the promise as applying to a temporal deliverance.

The promise, then, was general, before the call of Abraham, and its limitation to his family; and we need not be surprised, if we should find it diffused over all the nations of the East. But after Abraham was selected, and the promise confined to his line, and laws and ordinances appointed to "shut up" the Jews to the faith of Christ, the general convictions which prevailed originally among the conterminous states became more obscure and indistinct; and the descendants of Ishmael, and Esau, rivals of the house of Israel, though of the same kindred, were content to borrow from the Jews, the prophetic intimations given to them respecting the Messiah. The Jews, though despised by the Greeks and Romans on account of their inferiority in literature and the arts, were exceedingly formidable to their neighbours in the early periods of their history, who were compelled to ascribe their success to the power of their God, who fought along with them; and nothing can be more terrible than the havoc which they wrought on those who opposed them. The language of the Canaanites, when the Israelites approached Jordan, was: "We have heard how the Lord dried up the water of the Red Sea for you, when ye came out of Egypt, and what ye did to the two kings of the Amorites, that were on the other side of Jordan, whom ye utterly destroyed;—for the Lord your God, he is King above, and in the earth beneath."—(Josh. ii. 10, 11.) They were formidable for their power, which, we see, even the heathen ascribed to their God; and even their enemies could not but wish to be acquainted with their religion, which they considered as the cause of all their victories.

We can have no doubt, then, that the Eastern nations were well acquainted with the history, and, as far as possible, with the religion of the Jews: and we have reason to believe, that the wise men, or Magi, were guided by some ancient, though unrecorded, prophecies, when they regarded the unusual star, or supernatural light, as an indication that the expected King of the Jews had at last appeared. And we need not be surprised, that many prophecies should have become current on this subject, and be handed down by tradition, which are not recorded in the divine oracles. We know, that many prophets wrote books which have been entirely lost: thus we read of the books of Nathan and Ahijah the prophets, and the book of Iddo the seer, of which not a vestige has come down to our times. 2 Chron. ix. 29. Schools or colleges for the instruction of prophets were of high antiquity in Israel; and the prophets formed a very numerous body, (1 Sam. xix. 20;) great numbers were dispersed among the revolted tribes which constituted the kingdom of Israel, and had Samaria for their capital; and though many of them were men of bad character, yet some of the most eminent of the prophets were dispersed over the kingdom of Israel, who restrained, by their admonitions and reproofs, the headlong propensity to idolatry and profanity, which characterised the revolted tribes, from the period of their defection from Rehoboam the son of Solomon. Elijah and Elisha laboured among that wicked people, at the hazard of their lives. Jezebel, the very type of all that is infamous in woman, had determined to cut off all the prophets of the Lord; but Obadiah, the overseer of Ahab's house, took a hundred of the prophets, and hid them in caves, feeding them with bread and water. (1 Kings xviii. 4.)

The office of these prophets was not confined to the predicting of future events; they were also employed in conducting the public service of God, and in instructing the people in the religious truths which God had been pleased to impart: and as all the prophets from Samuel downwards spoke of the times of the Messiah, (Acts iii. 24,) we need not be surprised at the general expectation of his appearance, which prevailed throughout the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, and all the neighbouring states: and as these states were less subject to the vicissitudes of conquest and revolution, we may easily conceive that the notices which they had received would remain with them free from the false glosses given to them by the national prejudices of the Jews. The Samaritans, we know, were living in as confident expectation of the coming of the Messiah as the Jews themselves. (John iv. 25.)

From these observations, I think it will appear obvious, that the wise men of the East had ample opportunities of being acquainted with the Jewish prophecies respecting the Messiah; and I have surmised that they might have derived, from some unrecorded prophecy, the knowledge that his advent would be announced by a supernatural light, or an extraordinary star. We must acquiesce in such a supposition as this, or admit that the Magi had their information on the subject from immediate revelation; or, perhaps, they had it from a prophecy of their own country, preserved among them only by tradition, though recorded in the canonical Scriptures, with which we have no reason to suppose them to have been acquainted. I allude to the prophecy of Balaam, when he was sent for by Balak to curse Israel. It seems very evident, that the king of Moab considered the Israelites as a charmed people, secured against defeat and calamity; and that the prophecies predicting their greatness, in the person and character of the Messiah, who was to be the glory of his people Israel, had, even in those early times, spread extensively over the East. It is evident that Balak considered them as invincible by mortal arms; and on this account, sent messengers to Balaam, with the rewards of divination in their hands, entreating him to come, and to check, by a counter-charm, the desolating progress of the Israelites. The avaricious soothsayer was willing, but afraid, to go; and after he had been at last permitted, though not without the most evident marks of the divine displeasure, to obey the message of the king of Moab, he anxiously sought for some omen that might authorise him to pronounce a malediction against Israel. Finding all his efforts in vain, he became the unwilling instrument of proclaiming the greatness and glory of that people, in terms which can only be applicable to the Messiah, for whose sake Israel had been selected, for whose sake they have been dispersed, and for whose sake they shall again be gathered together, when all the prophecies concerning him shall be completely fulfilled, and the house of Israel shall rejoice in their King. The vaticination of the unwilling prophet was this: "There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel,"—"Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion," &c. (Num. xxiv. 17-19.)

This seems to be the same, in import, with the prophecy of Jacob himself, though the patriarch is more specific, and limits the fulfilment of the prophecy to the line of Judah: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and to him shall the gathering of the people be." (Gen. xlix. 10.)

With this prophecy of Balaam current in the East, and deeply impressed on the minds of the people, we may easily conceive that the appearance of the unusual star would be hailed as the harbinger of the Prince and the Sceptre which were to arise out of Israel. If it should be thought a gratuitous assumption to allege, that such prophecies were current and known over the East, I have only to refer to the concurrent testimony of the Roman writers, who bear evidence to that fact. These writers seized on this "ancient and uninterrupted tradition," (vetus et constans opinio), as it is called by Suetonius in his life of Vespasian, and expressed their belief that it received its accomplishment when that general mounted the throne of the Cæsars. The general diffusion over the East, of a prophecy originating in Judea will appear the more probable, when we consider that the nations to the eastward of Judea, though generally in a state of hostility with the Jews, were nevertheless intimately connected with them by affinity of kindred, as well as by similarity of customs. It was, in fact, their claim to a common origin, and their jealousy as to precedency, that formed the chief ground of their rivalry, and of the bloody contentions which are recorded in Scripture. The Edomites, for instance, who occupied Mount Seir, and gave name to the kingdom of Idumea, were the descendants of Esau, or Edom, the elder brother of Jacob, who obtained his birthright, and thus gained possession of the promise, ordinarily affixed as the privilege of primogeniture: and though Esau, a kind-hearted and generous man, readily forgave the injury done to him by his brother, the case was not so with his descendants, who hated the Jews on account of Jacob their father, whom they regarded as the usurper of the privileges which belonged by birthright to the founder of their race.

There were also twelve kingdoms established in Arabia, by the descendants of Ishmael, the son of Abraham, who was driven out from his father's house on the birth of Isaac; by which means a lasting misunderstanding was laid between the kindred tribes descended from Isaac and Ishmael. Now, if the wise men belonged either to the family of Ishmael or of Esau, they would have opportunities of knowing what was going on in Judea, and their very jealousy would make them scrutinize every report connected with the Jews; as their own interests were so materially affected, for better or for worse, by every event which befel that people.

These facts, in the absence of positive information, are sufficient to induce a belief that the prophecies current among the Jews respecting the advent of the wonderful person who was to produce a revolution on the sentiments of men, and the state of nations, would be disseminated among all the people of the East, who were connected with the Jews either by affinity of blood or proximity of territory. But this is not an assumption resting on conjecture—we have the decided testimony of the Roman historians to the fact: and, from the same authority, we learn, that a prophecy, in the Sibylline books, made a great noise a little before the time of our Saviour's birth, intimating that a King was about to be born to the Roman empire: and Plutarch, Sallust, and Cicero, tell us, that the conspiracy of Lentulus was encouraged by the hopes that he was the person designated by the prophecy.

The Sibylline oracles are generally considered as mere fabrications, entirely unworthy of credit; and it cannot be denied, that there were numerous and extensive forgeries under that name. But the course of investigation which I have followed in this article, leads me to conclude, that what are called the Sibylline oracles, are neither more nor less than garbled tradition, imported from the East, of the true prophecies respecting the Messiah, which had been in circulation from the earliest times among the Oriental nations. The Sibylline verses, or oracles, are confessedly not of Roman growth: the Sibyl, who is represented as offering the books for sale to Tarquin, is said to be a foreigner; she must, of course, have come from the East: on every other side, Rome was surrounded by barbarism. But there were, it seems, no fewer than ten Sibyls, who had their appellations from the countries where they respectively dwelt; such as the Delphic Sibyl, Erythrean, Cumean, Samian, Hellespontic, Phrygian, Persian, and others. Now, this carries us at once to the regions where the genuine prophecies respecting the Messiah were originally circulated: and the fancy of the Romans, in placing a Sibyl in each of these countries, arose from the fact, that the same oracular statements respecting these great and mysterious events were found to prevail in these different localities; which statements they conceived to have been disseminated by local prophets, instead of regarding the whole as one continued stream of prophetic tradition, flowing from the oracles of God.

Although, then, it may be possible, that not one line of what has come down to us as Sibylline verses may be genuine, yet we are sure that such verses existed in the time of Virgil; and, from his statement of their contents, we are sure, that they are fragments or traditions of genuine prophecies, which had been current over the East, from which they had been transported to Rome, and adapted, by priests and poets, to the circumstances of the Roman state. I allude particularly to the fourth eclogue of Virgil, of which the English reader will find a beautiful imitation in Pope's Messiah. The Roman poet intends it as a kind of birth-day ode in honour of the son of Pollio, his friend and patron, and it is filled with such conceptions and imagery as never were inspired by a heathen muse. He commences by declaring, that the last age of Cumean or Sibylline prophecy had arrived, when justice was to resume her reign, and a golden age again to commence in the world: he declares that, under the auspices of the child recently born, all fear should be removed from the minds of men, by the removal of their guilt. He then describes the peace and plenty which should abound in this golden age, in similar terms to those in which the sacred writers describe the peace and happiness of the Messiah's kingdom. Compare the words of the heathen poet with the inspired strains of Isaiah: "Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given," &c. (Isa. ix. 6.) He proceeds, in language which might almost seem a translation from the prophet: "The berds shall no longer be afraid of the mighty lions, and the serpent shall be destroyed." The sacred poet says, "The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the bullock; and dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain." (Isa. lxv. 25. See also ch. xi. 1-9.)

Now, be it remembered, that Virgil states these prophetic anticipations, not as the result of his own hopes and convictions, but as derived from the Sibylline oracles, the most venerable sources of their religious information; and that these same oracles are represented as also existing in the remotest regions of the East known to the Romans; and then, I think, we will clearly perceive, that expectations of a mighty Deliverer, founded on prophetic intimations, had existed all over the East, from the earliest ages, and had been diffused, from the land of prophecy and vision, to the remotest corners of the Roman empire.

There is no difficulty whatever, then, in accounting for the general opinion prevalent in the East respecting a Great Personage who was to arise in Judea, to be the glory of his people Israel. But I make no attempt whatever to account for the way in which the wise men were introduced to the knowledge of his person: this was accomplished by a miracle; and a miracle, which can be explained, is no miracle at all. A genuine miracle derives its authority from properly accredited testimony. This is the foundation on which the whole Scripture history rests: it is founded on facts which admit of demonstration, on the legitimate principles of evidence. Not a single fact connected with the religion of the Bible, not even the existence of a God, nor the soul's immortality, originated in the efforts of human reasoning. These doctrines are not the inventions of men; they are proved by miraculous facts, attested by competent witnesses, and corroborated by concomitant and collateral events, which unbiassed reason never can gainsay; and, instead of miracles being incredible, there can be no credible religion without them. Who would submit to be guided by the crude conceptions of the human mind, or the ignis fatuus of human reason? Would not any man much rather depend on the word of a credible witness for what he has seen or heard, than on his reasoning as to the certainty or uncertainty, the probability or improbability, of the points in question? And without miracles, or revelation, which is itself a miracle, not a single article of true religion would ever have been known to men. It lies beyond the range of the natural faculties, and is uncongenial to the human feelings; and any man of ordinary understanding might say, "Who can know these things unless some one teach him?" And as naturally may he say, "Who can reveal these things to the children of men but the Spirit of God?" and, "Who can know the Father, but those to whom the Son shall reveal him?"

THE CHARACTER OF BALAAM:

A DISCOURSE.

By THE REV. WILLIAM SCOTT MONCREIFF,
Minister of Penicuik.

"Which have forsaken the right way, and are gone astray, following the way of Balaam the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness."
—2 PETER ii. 15.

EVERY reader of his Bible must have observed that throughout that inspired volume, there are certain characters which enjoy the bad pre-eminence of being continually quoted as examples of peculiar wickedness. The object of the sacred writers in thus singling out, from the great mass of human depravity, these particular individuals, is not to exhibit them as sinners above all men, and invite us to judge and condemn them, but because these individuals furnish the best types or examples of certain great classes of character, which are to be found among men,—the fittest specimens of some of those more marked moral diseases which have infected the human soul; and thus, they enable us to study these, for our warning and cure; just as the skilful anatomist detects and exhibits, for the benefit of the living, the latent disease in the dead subject.

Balaam is one of those unhappy characters thus held forth to his fellow-creatures. The sacred writers refer to him, again and again, in this aspect; we cannot doubt, therefore, that we are expected to study his character and history with peculiar care, the more so that we find the whole history of his apostasy given with the utmost minuteness of detail. In the character of Balaam we may perceive, in the strongest light, the sin and danger of enjoying religious privileges, and making a profession of godliness, while the heart has been seduced by some vicious lust, and is drawn away after some unhallowed enjoyment. In the case of the unhappy prophet, avarice and ambition seem to have acquired an ascendancy in a heart which had previously been devoted to the service of God, and which, from its privileges of knowledge, and communion with God, ought to have recognised no other Lord than Jehovah, no other service than his worship, no other law than his will. In the biographical notice of this unhappy man, given in chapters xxii. xxiii. and xxiv. of the book of Numbers, we may easily trace the rise, progress, and triumph of Balak's temptation, in his mind; and the details of these very interesting chapters we shall now consider. Balaam is first introduced to our notice in the xxii. chapter of Numbers, at the 5th verse, but nothing is revealed as to his previous history, further than that he was the son of Beor, or, as the apostle here renders it, Bosor. We are left in ignorance as to how he became acquainted with the true God, or what was his particular place or office in his service. We are to remember, however, that at this period of the world's history, the knowledge of Jehovah was not, as subsequently was the case, confined to the children of Israel. The blessed light of the divine glory still feebly glimmered in the East, and struggled with the prevailing darkness. Balaam seems to have been one of those who had been favoured, not merely with a traditionary knowledge of the true God, but with peculiar revelations of the divine will. He was a prophet, though he seems to have abused the advantages and influence which he thus possessed, by turning them to gain, and degrading his most sacred function to the low level of a soothsayer. This is evident from the light in which Balak views him; had he maintained the holy character and high bearing of a faithful servant of Jehovah, such as was Moses, it is impossible that the king of Moab could have ever formed the purpose or expectation of bribing him to curse Israel. The fact of Balak sending messengers to Balaam with such a design, clearly indicates that the prophet had previously given himself out as a mere soothsayer, that he had already begun to desecrate his holy office, to turn his godliness into gain, and that the love of the wages of unrighteousness had already obtained a place in his heart. Slight, therefore, as is our acquaintance with Balaam, at this period, when he is first introduced to our notice, we may still form a pretty accurate conception of his character, and determine the point of his declension from the way of righteousness and the fear of God. Let us now endeavour to trace the subsequent steps of his fatal apostasy. Balak's messengers bring to Balaam's dwelling the rewards of divination, with which they are charged;—a prophet of the Lord receiving gifts, or bribes, for they were nothing else! Surely Balaam would bid them away from him with indignation. Alas, the weakness of man at the best! he, on the contrary, seems to welcome the messengers, even although he must have known that their request was contrary to the will of his heavenly King. But Balaam, doubtless said, within himself, these are the elders of Moab, the ambassadors of Balak, I must be courteous and hospitable to such men, whatever may be their object in visiting me; half unconsciously, perhaps, he would cast his eyes on the accompanying rewards of divination, "the wages of unrighteousness." So he receives the elders of Moab with a courteous welcome, "Lodge here," saith he, "this night, and I will bring you word again as the Lord shall speak unto me; and so the princes of Moab abode with Balaam." What! did not Balaam know that the request which these men had conveyed to him, was a sinful one, directly opposed to the divine will, which he was hypocritically to consult? Doubtless he must, but still the good opinion of Balak, and perhaps, too, though he might not have been disposed to allow it, the rewards of divination, had too much weight with him to allow him to return an immediate or an unwelcome answer; so he kept the elders of Moab all night.

In the same night, the Lord visited his faithless servant, and put to him the direct and searching question, "What men are these with thee?" How often, in the case of the apostatizing Christian, does not conscience, that witness for God in the breast, address a similar question to the heart, in which the wages of unrighteousness have, under some pretext or another, as vain as was Balaam's, been suffered to lodge? How often have we not been startled with such a question as that here addressed to Balaam: Who, or what are these with thee? are they consistent with my glory, my service, or your fidelity? Balaam renders a plausible answer, as if the Lord were, or could be, ignorant of the whole circumstances, and as if he were, in all good conscience, waiting but to know his pleasure in the matter. The answer from God is plain, direct, decided,— "Thou shalt not go with them; thou shalt not curse the people: for they are blessed." Had Balaam's mind been in a right state, had he been faithful to his God and his conscience, what more could he require? what could have been more explicit? But mark his answer, on the morrow, to the princes of Moab,— "The Lord refuseth to let me go with you." Observe that he says nothing as to the divine determination that Israel should not be cursed but blest. Had he done so, Balak, probably, would not have sent again to him; he merely intimates that he was not permitted to go with them, as doubtless, in his heart, he was disposed to do. Balak, accordingly, was not put from his point by such an answer; he failed not to perceive that the prophet, in whose power of malediction he placed implicit confidence, might still be persuaded to comply with his request, and naturally enough referring his refusal to dissatisfaction with the value of the bribes first sent, or the rank of his ambassadors, he immediately dispatches princes, more numerous, and more honourable than the former, charged, too, to make to him the most magnificent promises of wealth and honour, if Balaam would accede to their sovereign's request. The answer of the prophet to this second embassy may, at first sight, seem proper and praiseworthy, but his subsequent conduct shews it to have been dictated solely by a slavish fear of God, and not by any principle of deference to the divine will, or any zeal for his glory. Balaam could say, "If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God, to do less or more," because he knew well that such was the case; but, at the same time, such is the inconsistency of sinners, he could also say to Balak's messengers, "Now, therefore, I pray you, tarry ye also here this night, that I may know what the Lord will say unto me." Strange answer! What! did Balaam really require to be told the mind of the Lord, when, but a few nights before, he had been distinctly told, "Thou shalt not go with them; thou shalt not curse the people: for they are blessed." True, but the heart of the prophet was not right with God; "It went after his covetousness;" he had regard to the rewards of divination, and the promises of Balak, conveyed to him by the princes of Moab, notwithstanding his resolution not to go beyond the word of the Lord. Here you will observe the heart of Balaam evidently drawn away of his own lust, and enticed; the lust of Balak's princely bribes was, at this point in the process of his spiritual declension, conceiving, and was about to bring forth death. Balaam was already guilty, already had he sinned against God, and God, in righteous displeasure, in holy judgment, granted him that after which his heart went, for we are told at the 20th verse of the 22d chapter, "That God came unto Balaam at night, and said unto him, If the men come to call thee, rise up, and go with them." This divine permission, granted to the prophet, to go with the princes of Moab, will doubtless surprise some, as apparently inconsistent with the previous express prohibition, and divine determination that Israel should be blessed, and not cursed; but the design of the Lord was to make trial of his servant, and though he tempts no one with evil, still he often, in order to prove his creatures, and know what is in their hearts, allows them to be led into circumstances of temptation, otherwise, to what end the prayer taught by our Lord himself, "Lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil?" Had Balaam addressed such a petition to God, we may be assured that he never would have been permitted to go with the princes of Moab, into the midst of temptation, but Balaam, so far from praying to be delivered from temptation, courted it; he doubtless rejoiced greatly on getting permission to go to the court of Balak. Had he seriously thought of the danger to which he was exposing himself, of being led to sin against God, nothing would have grieved him more than such a permission, but, on the contrary, he seems joyfully to have embraced the opportunity, which might offer a chance of his being endowed with the gifts held out to him by Balak. God gave him up to the lust of his own deceived heart; and so is it with all apostatizing professors. Is there any one, who knows anything of spiritual life, and its trials, and temptations, who has not experienced something of the same nature? who may not recall occasions when his heart was devoted to some forbidden pleasure, which the law and providence of God interdicted, but after which it secretly went, although despairing of being ever able to gratify itself; when, suddenly, circumstances seem all to conspire to lead to the longed-for gratification, the obstacles which lay in the way are all removed, as by the hand of an approving God, all but the unchangeable interdict of the divine law, which can never, in any circumstances, or however plausible the opportunity, countenance sin.

The Lord, by permitting Balaam to go with the princes of Moab, did by no means countenance or encourage his perversity; he solemnly reminded him at the time, that he was to say nothing but as he should be commanded to do. Balaam could not but have felt, that the permission which he received, to go to fulfil the secret desire of his heart, was given in order to make trial of his fidelity, that he was being placed in the way of temptation, and that it was now no less his interest than his duty to have besought the Lord, that if he really desired him to go on this way of temptation, he would hold him up, and preserve him from falling. But far otherwise was he minded; he seems eagerly to have embraced the opportunity afforded him of gratifying the avarice and ambition of his heart, the gods whom he really served, although he still feared the Lord, and willingly kept out of view the obvious truth that these lusts could not be gratified except by disobeying Him to whose service he was professedly devoted. "On the morrow Balaam rose up, and saddled his ass, and went with the princes of Moab." Though in all this Balaam seemed only to follow the command of God, still was his way, the secret way of his heart, that way which was known perfectly to God, though concealed from human observation, "perverse before the Lord;" "therefore was the anger of the Lord kindled against him." Obstacles are now thrown in his way, such as should have reminded the unhappy prophet that his heart was not right with God, that his way was indeed a perverse one. The Lord can make use of any instrument to effect his purposes, for all are his creatures, and may consequently be turned to whatever purpose he sees fit. Accordingly, he employed the animal on which Balaam rode, to shew and reprove him for his sin: but so hardened was his heart, through the deceitfulness of sin, that the unwonted conduct of the poor patient animal, who had on no previous occasion, through a long course of service, ever so acted, failed to recall him to a sense of his perversity towards God. He vents his fury on his unoffending beast, without once thinking of inquiring the reason for its unwonted conduct.

Thus, when Providence graciously opposes us in the fulfilment of our lusts, do we, like the prophet, vent our disappointment in insensate wrath against the harmless agent employed to reprove us, without reflecting that we are, in reality, angry with and fighting against God. At last the angel of the Lord reveals himself to the astonished prophet. Then at length is he made to see the perversity of his way; but is he truly humbled and penitent? Ah, no! True, indeed, when he saw the angel of the Lord standing in his way, and his sword drawn in his hand, he bowed down his head, and fell on his face. True, also, after being told that his way was perverse before God, he confesses that he had sinned, and offers to go back again if it displeased Him that he should proceed; but in all this there are no symptoms of genuine repentance, "of that godly sorrow, which needeth not to be repented of." His prostration was of the body alone; and what else could he do, on perceiving the angel of the Lord with a drawn sword? And his conditional offer to return is obviously insincere and reluctant. He already knew that his way was perverse before God; he needed not, then, have said,

"if it displease Thee:" such is not the language of true, humble repentance; there is no abandonment of his heart's lust, his soul still went after his covetousness. God "with the froward will show himself froward;" he will "recompense their way upon their own head." Thus he dealt with Balaam, and thus also he deals with his backsliding people to the present hour. Balaam is again permitted to prosecute his journey, to walk after the sight of his eyes, and the imagination of his heart. Let us remember, that sin is not the less provoking to God, because it is permitted. We cannot look on the sacrifices which, in conjunction with Balak, Balaam offered, in any other light than the weak attempts of the infatuated prophet to alter the fixed purpose of the unchangeable Jehovah: indeed, he is forced to admit, that such was his purpose, for he owns "that God is not a man that he should lie, neither the son of man that he should repent, and that there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither divination against Israel." True, the Lord turned the intended curse continually into a blessing, and, through the lips of the reluctant Balaam, announced the blessings and promises of the Gospel; but Balaam was not, on that account, the less, but the more guilty; his heart did not cease to go after his covetousness, even when his lips declared the blessedness of the righteous, and breathed a sigh after their last end. He still loved the wages of unrighteousness, the rewards of divination were still present to his mind, and doubtless he regretted as much, if not more, than Balak, that he was not permitted to curse Israel. All this is made evident from what is briefly recorded of the subsequent conduct and fate of Balaam. Though the record be very concise, yet we may gather, that after his discovery of the fruitlessness of his enchantments and divinations against Israel, he was left of God to attempt to gratify Balak, and secure his rewards and honours, by the destruction of Israel in another manner. It was by his infamous counsel, that the Moabitish women were introduced into the camp of God's people, and were but too successful in seducing them from the worship of the Lord to idolatry. Such is the rapidity of the declension of unrighteous ways, that the very man whom we have heard exclaiming, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob! and thy tabernacles, O Israel!" we may shortly after find furnishing, for the sake of Balak's paltry wealth and honour, the infamous counsel which I have now adverted to. Alas! how little did his death and last end correspond to his wish, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!" Found by the Israelites among the enemies of God, he was miserably slain. What an instructive history! How full of warning to us! Let us be careful how we forsake, even by a hairbreadth, the right way; for we know not, when we do so, how far we may ultimately go astray. Doubtless Balaam little thought, when first he allowed Balak's princes and bribes to lodge all night with him, what the issue of that temptation would be; as little can we tell, when once we admit sin to lodge in our hearts, to what it will lead. "Lust, conceived, bringeth forth sin—sin finished, death." Sin is the most reproductive of all evils; every single instance of it contains the seeds of myriads more.

It becomes us, then, with urgency and frequency, to make use of the prayer dictated by our divine Redeemer, who himself suffered being tempted, "Lead us not into temptation." We cannot, indeed, hope to escape temptation, for it is appointed to all; but for our encouragement, let us remember the declaration of the apostle, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love him."

SKETCHES OF THE PARISH.

BY THE PASTOR OF THE PARISH OF E—K.

No. II.

[From an Address delivered on the beginning of January 1831.]

"Our days on the earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding."—1 Chron. xxix. 16.—1st, The shadow is only a picture or rude image of the body whose substance it represents. 2d, The true shadow is in its nature and appearance black and dark, like the blackness and darkness of yesternight—it is gone. 3d, The shadow is fleeting and transient: it is here—it is there, amid spots of sunshine on our hills,—but there is none abiding. 4th, The shadows are all lost, or swallowed up, in the dark dreary shade of the night—the long night of the grave—"until the day break, and the shadows flee away"—"turn, then, my beloved, and be thou like a roe or a young hart, upon the mountains of Bether."

Your days on the earth are as a shadow, but they are the shadow of a substantiality with regard to you. On the first day of the last year, we were admonished, among other things, to reflect on these words: "Our days on the earth are as a shadow." The shades of night had, indeed, covered the earth; but that very night, though the first and a cheerful night of our year, the soul of one of our number was required from among us. The sun was not again for her to gladden the little cottage by the stream. She had numbered full three-score years and ten; but were not many of these years labour and sorrow? There are some near us now, who understand well what we mean: yet there is but one to whom the shadow of the meagre and sickly form of his mother, enveloped in and darkened as with a cloud of smoke, passes before his mind's eye, and calls up the feelings of filial affection, and causes him to sigh inwardly, and to whisper to himself, "Aye! her history is before me as a tale that has been told."

On the second day of the second month of the year, death again made his inroads amongst us. The victim of his choice was but eleven years old. A parent yet remembers that the child's hopes as he spoke them. Like the son of the Shunamite, he said to his father, "My head, my head!" To his mother he expressed his desire of being remembered by a grave-stone! He knew he should die—that he should sleep with his little brother—that he should meet with him in glory!

In the third week of the third month of the year, fever, with all its attending fears, entered our retired district, and spread days of darkness and nights of gloom through some of our family dwellings. One child, just opening as a bud, was nipt away; and now sleeping in the dust, near to the place where we are met, lisps, as from the grave, to us, "Your days on earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding."

In the fourth week of the fourth month of the year, a fourth individual was summoned to appear before the tribunal of her God. She had numbered more than fourscore years. To me she was little better than a stranger; for she had but lately come to reside within our bounds. She was most anxious and desirous of cultivating my acquaintance. I feel yet ashamed, and blush to repeat what she mentioned to me at our first meeting, viz., that no clergyman had been in her house for the long period of fifteen years! On her death-bed she sent for me, but on reaching the solitary glen, where she had her habitation, I found her a corpse! "Our days, O Lord, thou hast determined, and the number of our months are with thee!"

Two graves in one day were open in our little cemetery, and received their respective inhabitants: one, a youth of little more than twenty years, the descendant of him who taught many of you to read and repeat these words of Scripture, "our days on the earth are as a shadow:" the other, a wife and a mother, and a support to the church which was of her house. Her sagacity and worth were known to many of you; but her history is now, "like the tale which has been told."

An aged woman, whose robust ungainly figure, uncouth appearance, peculiar dress, address, and looks, are still fresh in your recollection, was next removed from this scene of trouble. She was poor and friendless, yet contented. No! she was not friendless; but she had no relative to sit by her bed to watch her in her dying moments; she had none to shed over her the tears of affection. In her case, the goodness of a gracious Providence was surely most apparent. He does all things well! She was not of us as a Church, but she appeared to be for us as a Christian.

There is yet another, and one, perhaps, the most familiar to the mind of the most of us here. He was long, long known in our neighbourhood. As he was approaching his extreme old age, you saw him lessening and lessening in size; and you may have heard him speak of himself in the words of the patriarch, "Mine eye is dim by reason of sorrow, and all my members are as a shadow." When his tongue, at last, was paralysed—which had often uttered things new and old, and often in an original form—his expressive eye spoke them in the language of nature, intelligently as an eye could speak them. When he was all but subdued by his trouble, he would weep, then rally from his weakness: his honest and honourable look would beam on you more freshly, and the manly independence which had long ruled in his breast, though only as a shadow, was again apparent. Nay, his whole character through life may be summed up as founded on this resolution: "I will retain mine integrity; I will not let it go so long as I live." "But we are strangers before thee, O Lord, and sojourners, as were all our fathers; our days on the earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding."

But there cannot be a shadow without a substance, or a body from which the shadow is formed. The ceremonies of the law of Moses were shadows of good things to come; but the apostle says, "the body is of Christ." (Col. ii. 17; Heb. x. 1.) The Gospel, and all its promises of happiness, are the shadows of the glory which is to be revealed. And time, or our days allowed us as preparatives for eternity, are but as shadows, and shadows of that everlasting—"Oh! eternity, eternity, how are our boldest, our noblest thoughts lost and overwhelmed in thee!" Seven, as you have heard, have, in the course of the last year, been removed out of the shadows of time into all the realities of eternity. One only—at most two—of these used to meet with you in this house of God; but the bodies of them all are committed to these grounds to moulder around the walls of our little Zion. Nearly three times the number of those who have been removed by death, have, during the past year, been baptized into the Church of Christ; so that a loud cry, in urgency, seems thrice repeated to every parent, "Train up your child in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it;" to your spiritual pastor, how unworthy soever of the trust and of the name, "Give them, therefore, warning from me." Four of these infants were on one day presented together before God, and we named over them, as we pronounced their names, that great and terrible name—the Lord thy God. Two families have been added to our number since we last reckoned the families which form our flock. A brother and sister of one family are two of the number of these two families. Such are some of the events which have taken place in the shadowy days of the year which is gone

Now, should a stranger ask me, "What good have you been doing among the people of the Lord, in this place, during the past year. Tell us briefly; we have no time to trifle away, for 'our days on earth are but as a shadow, and there is none abiding?'" I cannot affirm that I have done any positive good; but I have more and more the conviction that the power and sufficiency must be of God. I fondly hope and trust, however, that the seed of the Gospel has not been sown in vain. There are many whom I scarcely ever observe awaiting in the house of God on the Sabbath, from the one end of the year to the other. Is not this a presumption, at least, that they look on "the Sabbath as a delight, the holy of the Lord and honourable, and do honour him?" It is very true, there are individuals, and even a few families, we can scarcely ever count on,—their visits are, at best, but "few and far between." But there are many, as I have stated, whom I am sure to meet with here every Sabbath, and to be delighted with their fixed attention, and devout deportment, during all the holy services of the day.

Further, I think I have the affection of most of my flock for my work's sake, feeble although my attempts and efforts may be; and I can truly say, if I know anything of myself, that there is not one within the bounds prescribed for my labours, but what has my affection and my prayers. "Brethren, pray for us, for my heart's desire and prayer to God for you is, that ye may be saved."

Above one hundred and thirty of us sat down together lately at the table of our Lord, and paid our vows to him in the presence of all his people. Ten of these joined with us for the first time, being fully double our ordinary number; and I think there is a something more, that I cannot describe, to make me augur that "my labour has not been in vain in the Lord;" and though our days on earth be as a shadow, they are the shadow of a happy eternity awaiting us, when many of us shall meet in our Father's house of many mansions, to sit down at a table that shall never be withdrawn.

But should the stranger again say, "Make full proof of your ministry: What are the subjects you have preached to this people, and how have you preached them?" The numerous and varied discourses, and the manner of our preaching them, my friends, is known to you. Among the many subjects to which we directed your attention, in the course of the last year, those on the personality and agency of the Holy Spirit claimed much of our attention, and occupied much of our time. We stated and illustrated from Scripture "that there is such a being as the Holy Spirit," "that he is a divine person," "that he is a distinct person in the Trinity," "that he is in every respect equal with God the Father and God the Son," "that he dwells in the hearts of believers," "that he regenerates and sanctifies them," "that he instructs and teaches them," "that he comforts and strengthens them," "that he seals them for glory," "and that he is in them the earnest of eternal life."

We next directed your attention to the "gifts of the Spirit," as enumerated by the holy apostle in his 1st Epistle to the Corinthians, (xii. 1-11.) Having discoursed at some length on these different gifts, we considered, lastly and particularly, some of "the fruits" produced by his holy operations, as stated in the fifth chapter of the Epistle to the Galatians, (verses 22-25 :) "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law. And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with its affections and lusts. If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit."

Such are some of the subjects which have occupied our attention in the course of the past year. My friends, call them up again! If they appear to you but as a shadow, let me press on you but once more,—they are a reality, and a reality for which we must render an account on the great day of reckoning.

Awake, thou that sleepest—the shadows of the night are gone—the day star has arisen—the sun is at his meridian—already he lingers on the horizon, and only till we tell you that the shadows of the evening are lengthening and lengthening, and becoming the darkness of the night, which summons us to walk through the dark valley of the shadow of death. But the voice said cry,—“All flesh is grass, and all the goodness of man is as the flower of the grass.” Oh! “our days on the earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding!”

THE VINE.

BY THE REV. DAVID MITCHELL.

The vine is a tender shrub, and produces fruit called grapes, from which wine is extracted. It prospers best in warm and dry climates, and is found bearing fruit in the southern countries of Europe, and in several parts of Asia and Africa; but it does not bring forth grapes to perfection in our native land, unless when nourished by artificial heat. When the land of Canaan yielded its strength, it was called by God a land of vines, and it brought forth the grape in great profusion. The vine flourished luxuriantly on the mountains of Lebanon, in the valley of Sorek, and by the brook of Eshcol. There were many varieties of this plant known to the Hebrews, and among these, there was a marked distinction observed between the wild and the cultivated. The prophet Jeremiah employs this distinction with great force and beauty, when he describes the care and munificence of God towards the Jews, and their barren and unproductive conduct in return,—“Yet I had planted thee a noble vine, wholly a right seed: how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto me?”—Jer. ii. 21.

There was a plant noticed by the Jews, which grew in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea, called the vine of Sodom, which brought forth noxious fruit, containing poisonous qualities. Michaelis imagines that the vine of Sodom is the solanum or night-shade, resembling the “white vine in its leaves and fruit, which is vinous but poisonous, and which the Arabs call fox-grapes.” Moses alluded to this plant, when he was addressing the congregation of Israel before his death; when he directed their attention to the Rock of their strength, and pointed out the stability of the God of Jacob; when he told them of the immeasurable distance that lay between Jehovah and the idols of the heathen who at that time inhabited Palestine, he said, “Their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges. For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah; their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter: their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps.”—Deut. xxxii. 31-33.

The Jews were particularly careful in selecting the ground for their vineyards. The site chosen generally was either in a fertile plain, or on a declivity slanting to ward the south. Some places in the land of Canaan were much better suited for this purpose than others; the mountainous district in the neighbourhood of Shechem, on the west of Jordan, which belonged to the seed of Joseph, was renowned in Israel for the productiveness of its vineyards: “Is not the gleaning of the grapes of Ephraim better than the vintage of Abi-ezer?”—Judges vii. 2. The place chosen was carefully fenced in, cleared of stones and rubbish, and cultivated with great nicety. The wine-press was in general made in the vineyard, and formed by digging a pit in the ground, then lining it with mason work. There was sometimes also a temporary booth erected within the enclosure, consisting of little more than a few poles, for the accommodation of the keeper who watched the fruit. “He buildeth his house as a moth, and as a booth that the keeper maketh.”—Job xxvii. 18. It appears, from several passages in the Word of God, that there was more substantial accommodation provided for the keeper than what has now been mentioned,—there was a tower built for the convenience of the watchman, and to furnish him with a view of the whole enclosure. Some have thought that this building was erected for containing the implements necessary for making the wine, but we apprehend, that whatever use may have been made of the lower part, the grand design of the erection was a watch-tower, where the whole vineyard could be seen at one view. This opinion is supported by the testimony of modern travellers in the East. When Mr Buckingham was on his route through the Holy Land, he was struck with the appearance of several small square towers in the midst of the vine-lands, and found, upon inquiry, that they were erected as watch-towers, to enable the watchmen to protect the fruit. The foregoing description will lead us to perceive the appropriate language of our Saviour in the parable, when he delineates the vineyard of the Lord of Hosts, which is the house of Israel, “There was a certain householder, which planted a vineyard, and hedged it round about, and digged a wine-press in it, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country.”—Matt. xxi. 33.

Great care was exercised by the Hebrews in training up the vine, in cultivating the branches, and in directing the young shoots. They sometimes built a lower wall within the outer, and used great dexterity in leading the fruitful branches over it. They were also in the habit of entwining the tender shoots on trellises over a well, to furnish a refreshing shade for the family during the heat of the day. “Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall.”—Genesis xlix. 22. Equal care was observed by the vinedresser in pruning the vine and in taking away the withered branches; we have a forcible allusion to the care of the husbandman, when performing this part of his duty, in the Gospel according to John, where Christ describes the watchfulness and fidelity of God toward his people, and their union with Christ as the source of their life and nourishment,—“I am the true vine and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit.”—John xv. 1, 2.

The Jews were in the habit of obtaining three crops from the same vine yearly. This triple produce was regulated, in some degree, according to the labour of the vine-dresser, who cut away the branches at stated intervals. These crops were ready in rotation in the months of August, September, and October. The principal vintage seems to have followed the wheat harvest. The grapes were cut with the sickle and put into baskets, those for raisins were dried in the sun, and those for wine were cast into the wine-press. The Israelites were commanded to leave a portion of their grapes to those who were not so highly favoured as themselves. They were enjoined to abstain from glean- ing their vineyards, and desired to leave a remnant to the poor and the destitute in the land,—“Thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and the stranger: I am the Lord."—Lev. xix. 10.

At an early period the juice seems to have been squeezed out of the grape by the hand, and drunk immediately. When the butler of the king of Egypt told his dream, which is supposed to have been in accordance with the custom of the country, he said to Joseph, "Pharaoh's cup was in my hand; and I took the grapes, and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup, and gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand."—Genesis xl. 11. The wine, however, was generally obtained by treading the grapes in the wine-press. This was a season of great mirth, festivity, and delight. When God denounced his judgments against Moab, it is mentioned, as a proof of his vengeance, that the joy of the vintage should cease,— "In the vineyards there shall be no singing, neither shall there be shouting: the treaders shall tread out no wine in their presses; I have made their vintage-shouting to cease."—Isaiah xvi. 10. The garments of the treaders were coloured and stained with the blood of the grape. The Prophet Isaiah gives a lively emblematical representation of this work, when he describes Christ's victory and triumph over his enemies,— "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in his apparel, travelling in the greatness of his strength? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save. Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-fat? I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with me: for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment." Some have explained this passage as descriptive of the sufferings of Christ, referring to the time when he endured the wrath of Almighty God as the substitute of the guilty,— when his great and immaculate soul was in travail,— when it pleased the Lord to bruise him and put him to grief; but we apprehend that a careful perusal of the passage, in connection with what follows, will convince the diligent inquirer that it refers to Messiah's conquest over his enemies. A similar figure of speech is applied to the foes of our Lord, in the book of Revelation,— "And the angel thrust in his sickle into the earth, and gathered the vine of the earth, and cast it into the great wine-press of the wrath of God. And the wine-press was trodden without the city, and blood came out of the wine-press, even unto the horse bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs."—Rev. xiv. 19, 20.

The wine appears to have been drunk, upon some occasions, immediately after the treading of the grapes. This seems to have been done by the men of Shechem, when they joined in league against Abimelech: "They went out into the fields, and gathered their vineyards, and trode the grapes, and made merry, and went into the house of their god, and did eat and drink, and cursed Abimelech."—Judges ix. 27. The new wine was sometimes poured into old casks, containing the lees of former years, which greatly enhanced its value. It was afterwards filtered and drunk with much relish. The Prophet Isaiah alludes to this practice when he describes the choice feast, and the goodly viands which Christ has provided for the spiritual nourishment of his Church and people: "And in this mountain shall the Lord of Hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined."

There are various kinds of wine mentioned in the Word of God. There was a kind of vinegar made from the grape, and used for domestic purposes: "At meal time come thou hither and eat of the bread, and dip thy morsel in the vinegar."—Ruth ii. 14. Sweet wine was much esteemed by the orientals. The Prophet Amos refers to this kind of wine in describing the glory and fulness of Christ's kingdom, when he shall pour out his spirit upon all nations: "The mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills shall melt."—Amos ix. 13. The wine of Lebanon was in high repute amongst the Jews, and also the wine of Eschol, but the kind most esteemed seems to have been red wine; so fond were the Hebrews of this colour that they were in the practice of tinging their wine with a kind of wood, to give it a red appearance: "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright: at the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."—Prov. xxi. 31, 32. The Greeks and Romans were in the habit of using perfumed wines. The Jews sometimes acidulated theirs with the juice of the pomegranate. "I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine of the juice of my pomegranate."—Solomon's Song, viii. 2.

The bottles into which the ancients put their wine were made of the skin of a goat or of a kid. They were large, and contained a considerable quantity. When new they were capable of sustaining much pressure, without any danger of being rent, and could preserve new wine during fermentation, but when old they did not answer that purpose: "No man putteth new wine into old bottles; else the new wine doth burst the bottles, and the wine is spilled, and the bottles will be marred: but new wine must be put into new bottles."—Mark ii. 22.

There are many emblematical allusions to the vine in the Word of God, and also to its fruit. The Church, under the Jewish dispensation, which was typical of a more exalted state of things, was compared to a vine. God is represented as having planted it, and cultivated it with great care: "Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt; thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it. Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land. The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars. She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river."—Ps. lxxx. 8-11.

The blessings of the Gospel have been figuratively unfolded to man as the fruit of the vine. They have been pressed upon our attention as the food of the soul, just as wine is cordial for the support of the body; "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money: come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money, and without price. Wherefore do ye spend your money for that which is not bread? and your labour for that which satisfieth not? hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness."—Is. lv. 1, 2.

There is one thing of which the fruit of the vine is an emblem, which should render wine an interesting subject of contemplation to every child of God, and that is the blood of Christ,—the blood of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. This emblem was adopted by Jesus himself; on the night before his death, "he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, drink ye all of it: for this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins,"—that blood which puts to silence the thunders of Omnipotence, restrains the arm of vengeance, and the hand of judgment,—that blood which cleanseth the sinner from his vileness, and the polluted from his guilt of a crimson die,—that blood which gives rest to the burdened spirit, ease to the broken-hearted, and peace to the troubled mind,—that blood which opens up the way of access unto the throne of God, converts the frown of justice into a pledge of peace, and changes the gate of death into a path of life,—that blood which is the passport to eternal glory, and which will enable those who enter the regions of bliss to lift up their voice and say, "Unto him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion, for ever and ever." Amen.

THE WARNING.

BY THE REV. HENRY S. RIDDELL,

Author of "Songs of the Ark."

I stood by the church-yard, that lonely is lying Amid the deep greenwood, by Teviot's wild strand, And methought that a voice, on the winds that were sighing,
These accents conveyed to the sons of our land :—

Beware, oh ! beware of each feeling unholy,
Receiving no sanction from heaven sublime ;
Beware, oh ! beware of the fault and the folly
Of resting your trust on the treasures of time.

If bound to this scene, as still onward you measure
The pathway of life, to your home in the grave,
The soul, mid its gettings, will gain not a treasure
That ages eternal, incircling, will save.

For time but reveals what decays in revealing,
Or vanishes wholly when touched by the test ;
And the darkness of thought, and the sadness of feeling
Will still cast their gloom o'er the wisest and best.

'Tis part of the curse on creation still lying,
And will poison the future, as it did the past,—
A warning of nature—a foretaste of dying—
That crisis which comes to all living at last.

Your years had been few, when those idols so simple
That so could delight you, delighted no more ;
And the joys of life's morning, so airy and ample,
Soon fell mid the shade that your pilgrimage wore.

Hopes danced round the spirit that fain would have caught them,
But soon too they sunk, mid the flow of its tears,—
They could not be carried far into the autumn,
They could not extend to the winter of years.

And so you have seen, how the wayward would quarrel
With life's sad afflictions, or bear them apart,—
And the sons of ambition oft win the green laurel
To wreath it alone round the withering heart.

And riches, for which the dark passion grew stronger,
As the heart sought its rest on each care-gathered hoard,
Would fly, or but burden the soul that no longer
Had relish for aught that this life can afford.

For still mid all fame, and all fortune, and feeling,
Decay has its traffic with man's fading form,
And o'er it, resistless, the influence stealing
Must leave it, at last, but a wreck to the worm.

Your friends have departed and left you behind them,
Or you are departing to leave them behind,
And no morning shall dawn when again we shall find them,
If hope be to earth and its idols confined.

Beware, then, beware of the power of each longing,
That wecks the vain heart to a cold world below ;
Beware, oh ! beware of the dreams that are thronging
A scene, that nought lasting can ever bestow.

But turn to yon heavens, with vision observant,
As led by the dayspring that streams from on high,
Nor value aught here, but as 'tis subservient
In guiding the soul to its home in the sky.

Lay up the bright treasures that live with the spirit,
All free as itself from the taint of decay,—
The treasures that still the pure soul shall inherit,
When heaven and earth shall have melted away.

And thus, when the glow of a love never-ending,
Shall live unalloyed with one feeling of strife,
And each thought of the soul to Him ever tending,
Who himself is the ' way, and the truth, and the life,'"

You shall meet in the regions immortal, before you,
The kind, and the good, and the just, and the true,
And share in the life, and the bliss, and the glory,
Which ages unending but roll to renew.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Conversion of Augustine.—Augustine, the celebrated father in the Church of Christ, was rescued from his carelessness relative to his eternal welfare by a description which he heard of the piety and devotion of a person, who had abandoned the publicity, the contamination, and the allurements of the world, to cultivate his communion with God and his preparation for the judgment-day. "Alas," cried Augustine to his companion and friend, "What is this? what do we hear? Unlearned people rise and take heaven by violence, while we, with all our learning, wallow in flesh and blood. Is it because we are ashamed to follow them? Rather should we be ashamed that they go before us!" Under these convictions he felt constrained, as by a command from heaven, to open the epistles of St. Paul, when the first passage that met his view was, "The night is far spent, the day is at hand, let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light. Let us walk honestly as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness; not in chambering and wantonness; not in strife and envying; but put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof." The perusal of this exhortation, so applicable to his past character, and the degrading pursuits to which he had addicted himself, produced upon him an impression which was never effaced; and his companion, also, by the appropriateness of the reproof to himself, became, like his friend, convinced, and humbled to prayer.

The last moments of Dr John Owen.—Providence permitted the great Dr John Owen to live, until the object which lay nearest to his heart was accomplished, and then arranged his departure from the world in the following happy manner. On the day when he died, Mr Payne, the gentleman who was intrusted to put his last work to press, entered his apartment and said, "Doctor, I have been just putting your book on the Glory of Christ to the press." The Doctor said, "I am glad to hear that that performance is put to press;" and then lifting up both his hands and his eyes as in a kind of rapture, he said, "But, O brother Payne, the long looked-for day is come at last, in which I shall see that glory in another manner than ever I have done yet, or was capable of doing in this world."

ON SAVING FAITH.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MALCOLM,
Minister of Leochel-Cushnie.

ON this subject there exist some misapprehensions, which it were well to have removed. All who receive the Bible as the Word of God, must admit that, without faith in Christ, we cannot be saved. "Without faith it is impossible to please God." Free as is the offer of salvation, it is only when we believe on the Lord Jesus Christ that we shall be saved. "We believe to the saving of the soul." By faith it is that we are "justified, and have peace with God." For, marvellous as was the love of God in sending his own Son into the world, to suffer and to satisfy for us, it goes not the length of saving all, whether they receive or reject his Son. Great was his love in not sparing his own Son, and rich and sovereign is the grace which reigns through his Son, and yet salvation is restricted to a certain character: "Whosoever believeth on the Son," he, and he only, "shall not perish, but shall have everlasting life." So indispensable, indeed, is faith to salvation, that it enters into our election. "God hath chosen us,"—of his own free and sovereign will hath he chosen us—"unto salvation;" still it is "through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth," that even his electing love accomplishes its object. And, "what are these which are arrayed in white robes? Whence came they? These are they which came out of great tribulation," and, not deeming it enough that the Lamb's blood has been shed, applied that blood by faith to their own souls. "Therefore," because by faith they appropriated Christ's blood to their own necessities,—to the atoning for their own guilt, and to the cleansing away of their own pollutions,—because they thus "washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, therefore are they before the throne of God," and have "received the end of their faith, even the everlasting salvation of their souls."

Every one, then, who sees the prominent place which faith occupies in salvation, must be desirous to have faith. But as all men have not faith, whence and how is it that any man has it? This is a question of unspeakable moment, which often presents itself to the anxious inquirer. Without faith we cannot be saved. How, then, may we procure this pearl of great price? Can we produce it by any inherent energy, or by any effort of our own? No; faith is the gift of God. It is not generated by our wisdom, or by the might of our arm. It cometh down, like every other good and perfect gift, from the Father of lights. Now, it is here that many stumble. Since, without faith, there cannot be salvation, and since faith is not in our power, but is the gift of God, and entirely at his disposal, if we miss salvation, the blame, they allege, is not ours, but His, who did not confer upon us the gift of faith. But would we reason in this way in any similar case? Is not our daily bread the gift of God? Could he not withhold it if he saw fit? Is it not he who has fed us all our life long? And could he not leave us, if he pleased, without a morsel of bread to allay our hunger, or a drop of water to quench our thirst? Our daily maintenance is his daily gift. But would we think ourselves, therefore, justified in sitting down idle, hiding our hands in our bosom, and waiting till God should lift to our lips the bread and the water which the cravings of nature required? Were starvation to follow such a course, could it be said that the blame rested not with us, but with Him, who, though he giveth all things richly to enjoy, gave not us the requisite supply? No; we know very well that, while our daily bread is the gift of God, he has prescribed a certain way through which he will convey the gift, and appointed certain means to be employed by us for obtaining it. And we know equally well, that if we despised that way, and neglected those means, it would be presumption, it would be a tempting of the Lord our God, to look for the gift. The husbandman is well aware that the increase of his fields is the gift of God. He knows that if God did not bless the springing of the ground, and send the former and the latter rain, his labour would fail, and his fields would yield no meat. When the harvest is gathered in in safety, his heart rises in gratitude to the Giver of all good, and he is ready to exclaim, "This also cometh from the Lord of Hosts." "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy great name be the glory and the praise."

But did he, on this account, withhold his own hand from labour? Because the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, did he deem no exertion necessary on his part? Did he fold his hands in spring, and refuse to reap down the fields in autumn? No; he was not slothful in business. He rose early, and was late in taking rest, and ate the bread of carefulness. And knowing that the same God, who crowns the year with his abundant goodness, has ordained certain means by which that abundance may be insured; that He has endowed man's mind with wisdom to plan, and clothed man's arm with power to perform, the labour necessary for making the earth produce; and that, though "riches come of the Lord," yet it is the hand of the diligent that maketh rich, he employed every mean, he strained every nerve, he prayed and he laboured that his fields might bring forth abundantly, grass for cattle, bread for the eater, and seed for the sower.

By a similar process may saving faith be obtained. It is, indeed, the gift of God; but God has appointed means, through the use of which he communicates the gift. One of these is prayer. "Increase our faith," "Lord, help mine unbelief," were petitions presented to our Lord, and graciously answered by him, in the days of his humiliation, and we may be certain that he will not turn away such prayers from him, now that he hath "ascended up on high, and received gifts for men." Faith, too, is one of the fruits of the Spirit, and the "Holy Spirit is given to them who ask him." "Ask, and ye shall receive,"—ye shall receive the Spirit, and the fruits of the Spirit, one of which is faith.

The Word is another mean, through the use of which the gift of faith is conveyed. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." "How shall they believe on Him of whom they have not heard, and how shall they hear without a preacher?" Hence it is evident that the Christian ministry is another mean by which faith is obtained. Our Lord prayed not only for his apostles, but "for all them also who should believe through their word." And Paul asks, "Who is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye have believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?" The Lord gave it, and yet it was by the ministry of man that the Corinthians obtained it.

Before, then, we can justly complain that we have not faith, because the free gift has not been bestowed upon us, we must be able to say, that we have diligently used all the appointed means for obtaining it,—that we have continued instant in prayer for it,—that we have read and received with meekness the Word of God,—that we have attended regularly and devoutly on the ministry of the Word,—that we have heard gladly the Word preached, and that we have taken good heed to what we have heard, hiding it in our hearts, that we might grow thereby. But none who do these things will ever complain that the gift of faith has been denied to them. Those who thus seek shall find. Those who thus wait upon the Lord shall both receive strength and renew their strength. They shall grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. And knowing him, they cannot fail to believe in him.

There is another mistake which some fall into on this subject. The Scriptures insist so much on the necessity of having faith, that not a few are disposed to ascribe to faith the merit of our salvation. They consider salvation as obtained, not merely through faith, but on account of it. They regard faith as the procuring cause of our acceptance with God. From being an agent, they raise it to a principal. From being an instrument, they exalt it to a cause. Now faith is valuable only as it unites us to Christ, in whom alone is salvation. It is through faith's instrumentality, but not on account of faith's intrinsic worth, that we are saved. Faith is a saving grace just because it connects us with the Saviour; apart from him it cannot save. The hand which the man fainting from hunger puts forth for the bread which is set before him, is, without all doubt, very valuable, yet no one would say that it was the hand, but the bread, which nourished and strengthened him. In like manner our salvation is owing not to our faith, but to the righteousness of Christ, which, however, our faith apprehends and appropriates.

From all this the necessity of having faith in Christ is still manifest. Though faith is not the ground of our salvation, yet, in as much as it is faith by which we are united to the Saviour, it is evident that without faith we cannot be saved.

It becomes us then to examine, with all the care and earnestness which such a question demands, whether we "be in the faith?" Not having faith, we have no interest in Christ, and without an interest in Christ we can never see life, but the wrath of God abideth upon us. But how may we ascertain this all-important point? How may we know satisfactorily that we have faith? By its fruits we shall know it. We are purified as well as justified by faith. If we are united by faith to Christ, even as the branches are united to the vine, we will infallibly abound in those fruits of righteousness which are through Christ to the praise and glory of God. Faith has its fruit unto holiness. The man who lays the flattering unction to his soul that he has faith in Christ, while he is not cherishing the spirit, and becoming daily more and more conformed to the image of Christ, will find himself wofully mistaken at last. The great end and aim of the Gospel dispensation is holiness. The will of God in that dispensation, is our sanctification. The grace of God which brings salvation, so far from encouraging, teaches us "to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." If there is forgiveness with God through faith in his Son, it is not that we may be emboldened to sin against God; "there is forgiveness with God that he may be feared." If Christ has delivered us out of the hands of our spiritual enemies, it is not that we should any longer serve these enemies, but that we should "serve the Lord in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life." If it is the privilege of those who are "in Christ that there is no condemnation to them," it is their character that they "walk not after the flesh but after the spirit." "Christ gave himself for us that he might redeem us," not only from wrath, but also "from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." And "he bare our sins in his own body on the tree," not that we should continue in sin, but "that we being dead unto sin should live unto righteousness."

Let no one then say that he has faith which saves, unless it be faith which sanctifies also,— unless it be faith which purifies the heart, and works by love, and overcomes the world, cleaving to duty as well as to privilege, and not only confiding fully when God promises, but obeying cheerfully when God commands. For while the ministers of the Gospel are bound to affirm that unbelievers shall die in their sins; yea, that "the unbelieving shall have their portion in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death;" they are equally bound to "affirm constantly that they who believe must be careful to maintain good works."

COUNT VON DER RECKE.

ADELBERT COUNT VON DER RECKE, was born in the year 1790 of one of the most wealthy families in Prussia. We have, as yet, no account of his early years, excepting a few anecdotes, which, however, sufficiently show, that the same principle of sympathy for distress distinguished the years of his boyhood as those of his maturer age.

"His mother," says the author of an interesting little work, entitled DUSSELTAL ABBEY, "having observed him looking very sad one morning, asked him the reason of his melancholy. He told her that, being upon the neighbouring mountain, he had observed the driver of an overloaded waggon beating his poor horse most unmercifully, because he had not strength sufficient to drag it up the ascent, and he had gone to the man and reproved him for being so cruel, and he had carried a large stone to put behind the wheel to stop the waggon from going back till the horse had rested. When he had done so, some other waggons came up the same road, who all put stones behind the wheels of their waggons, and when their horses had rested a while, put their own shoulders to the wheels, and assisted the poor brutes, by short stages, to get over the steep, and he had put his shoulder to, also, and helped the horses. His mother, smiling at his artless simplicity, told him, that she saw if one man was cruel, there were others who were kind, and this was just what the Word of God said: 'A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast; but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel;' for the Lord regards the conduct of man towards beasts, and required, by his law, a man to be tender even to his enemy's ass: 'If thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burden, and wouldst forbear to help him; thou shalt surely help him.' 'Aye,' answered Adelbert, 'our old coachman told me, that if a horse was laden too heavily, and beat severely, that the big white tears would come rolling over his cheeks, and he would not have one of these tears upon his soul for all the money in the world!'"

Adelbert received a good education, not only as regards literature, but religion; for his family was distinguished for its piety. He served for some time in the Prussian army, but his health obliged him to quit the service. The state of Germany at this time was awful in the extreme; for it had been the theatre of a protracted and bloody war. In meditating on the effects which war produces on the country which it has visited, we are apt to overlook those which are indeed the most appalling. We imagine the country bereaved of the flower of its inhabitants, and we think of widows bewailing their slaughtered husbands, orphans weeping at the dismal tidings of a beloved parent's death, and the mother weeping over her son, her only stay, and the children mourning over a slaughtered brother. We imagine the country laid waste, and the hopes of the husbandman blasted; towns burned, and villages pillaged, and famine threatening on all hands. But heart-rending though this be, alas! it is not all. Would that it were; for the fields will again grow green at the cheerful voice of spring, and autumn shall return with its ripened fruit, and the widow, and the orphan, and the brother, and the sister, and the mother, will dry their tears, and remember, with pleasure, that those of whom they were bereaved died for their country. All this may take place, and yet the country has not recovered from the effects of the war; for there are others much more lasting, which we have overlooked: her inhabitants have become accustomed to the excitement, the stir, and the licentiousness of the camp, and feel no inclination for the ordinary occupations of peaceful times. But even were they not only able, but willing, to labour, where is labour to be had? For her manufactories have been destroyed, her merchants ruined, and all her inhabitants impoverished, and the only resource of these wretched beings is to beg, to rob, or to starve. Their example, too, is copied by the unfortunate orphans, who have been left without any kind friend to teach them industrious habits, and to instil into their minds the maxims of virtue and piety. Such, but infinitely more wretched, was the state of Germany at the conclusion of the late war with France: her highways and villages were crowded with paupers and vagabonds; her numbers of orphans were growing up, uncared for and uneducated; and, as a natural consequence, were acquiring idle and vicious habits. Societies were immediately formed to adopt the best measures for curing this evil; but so dreadful and so widely extended was it, that many gave up their schemes in listless apathy, and resigned themselves to despair. At this truly alarming crisis, Adelbert stood nobly forward, and, amid circumstances the most unfavourable, engaged in an enterprise in which he has continued to labour to this day, and which deserves the effective co-operation of every one who admires true patriotism, or the zealous and persevering efforts of active charity. He directed his attention to the best mode of alleviating the miseries of the poor neglected offspring of soldiers, and others equally destitute, the early victims of the crimes or the misfortunes of their parents, and adopted the most effectual means of making them comfortable and happy, as well as a blessing to their country.

"In all his measures he was seconded by his family, and Overdyke became the head-quarters of the houseless orphan tribe. Reduced, however, as this noble family had been by the chances of war, their means were not commensurate to their wishes, and they were surrounded by general poverty; numbers of the opulent and respectable, who would willingly have aided them, were themselves in a state that needed assistance; and the middling and lower classes were struggling hard to preserve their own children from becoming burdens upon the public."

Adelbert, however, had put his hand to the plough, and was not to be discouraged; for all his confidence and hope were placed on Him who has declared, "blessed is the man who considereth the poor." He set himself vigorously to the work, and, after incredible exertions, formed what is now called the "Philanthropic Society."

"Our plan," says he, "was formed wholly in faith on the Omnipotent aid of our God, who feeds the ravens and clothes the lilies. Knowing our own weakness, our whole dependence was upon Him, and he has richly rewarded our faith. Before we printed our plan, or attempted to make collections, with the small sum of a few crowns, we began to put it in execution; and we can give our joyful testimony to the truth that the same God, who of old was mighty in strength, yet lives; and to-day, as well as at all times, through living faith in him, mountains shall be removed, and the greatest difficulties overcome." This plan was, to receive those who had only wretchedness to recommend them,—to afford them an asylum, where they might be fed, clothed, and taught the first principles of the Christian religion, to read and write, and trained to habits of industry, and instructed in some business or trade whereby they might gain a livelihood, and become useful members of society."

There could not have been a more unfavourable time for executing such a scheme, the affairs of the Continent being in such a depressed condition. Adelbert, however, was not to be baffled, and he applied to all his own relations for support; as also to the King of Prussia, to the nobility, and, in short, to any one who felt for the spiritual and temporal wants of his fellow-creatures. To the eye of a man trusting in his own exertions, this appeal must have appeared in vain, for it was made at a time when all ranks had exerted themselves, even beyond their power, to deliver their native land from foreign thralldom, and every resource seemed exhausted. But Adelbert trusted in Him, in whose hands are the hearts of men, and who turneth them whither soever he will, even as the rivers of water; and the springs of benevolence, which had appeared exhausted, "burst forth afresh with renovated vigour."

"His earnest appeal was not in vain—every one came forward with gifts, and where money could not be had, contributions were made in kind.—His Majesty, besides a handsome annual subscription, granted an exemption from postage to all letters on the business of the Society; the nobility also gave large donations. Farmers brought provisions of every description—corn, bread, eggs, butter, cheese, &c. &c.; and the poor, who were unable to give anything else, gave their labour. In this lovely strife of kindness, the ladies were not the least conspicuous; some brought their jewels as offerings in the cause of humanity; others, who had already sacrificed theirs in the cause of their country, furnished ornamental pieces of work, and presented them to be sold for the benefit of the institution.

"So productive had these various contributions been, that when the Society held their first meeting in the church of Limburg, 18th October 1820, a house and schools had been built for the reception of orphans, and forty-four of the most miserable description had been received: the whole under the management of Count Adelbert, one of his brothers, and his two sisters."

To educate such children as those who were admitted into this institution, must have been no easy task, for it was absolutely necessary, so ignorant and depraved were they, to break them into something like regard for the lowest and most common habits of civilized life; and even when this was effected, they not unfrequently deserted the institution, and rendered almost useless the labour of years. The attention of Count Adelbert and his sisters, who assisted him, was therefore more particularly directed to the infant orphans. The great end they held in view in the training of young and old, was to prepare them for the kingdom of heaven; and to promote this, they mixed religious instruction with useful employments, not neglecting proper recreation and healthful exercise. "Religious instruction, according to the pure doctrines of the Gospel," say they, "is the principal thing, the chief corner-stone of our whole plan of education: and every deviation from this principle, whatever name it may assume, we consider as injurious and destructive." Their exertions were not fruitless, for about a year after their labours commenced, the Philanthropic Society, in its first report, dated June 1820, was enabled, by the blessing of the Most High, to lay a very favourable statement before its supporters. "By the blessing of God," say they, "on our attempts to rescue poor destitute orphan children from temporal and eternal misery, we have been enabled to go on prosperously." The following interesting narrative, illustrates at once the success and the difficulties with which their labours were attended:—

"'We cannot,' say they, 'without the deepest sorrow, mention the history of this unfortunate dear little child.' He was forcibly torn from us by his worthless mother, and dragged about with her through the country to excite compassion. But as the delicate boy soon proved a burden to her in her sinful course of life, she boarded him in one of those lowest receptacles of poverty and filth,—a beggar's hotel. Here the dear infant, left entirely to himself, partook of all the scraps that had any appearance of food. This unwholesome diet produced disease, and he was neglected; now, starved and covered with vermin, he was fast sinking into the arms of death, when his situation was made known at the institution. They immediately hastened to the hovel; medical aid was procured for him—but it was too late! They had, however, the satisfaction, for the few last days that they attended him, to find that he had not forgotten the religious instruction they had instilled into him. To his last moment, the little thing continued to repeat, with much feeling, the prayers that he had learned at the institution. Many of the children visited poor Fritz on his straw pallet, for he could not be removed; and long after his death, it was the source of joy to them, that Fritz had, in his last moments, prayed with them to the Saviour of little children."

The benefits arising from the exertions of Count Adelbert, were not confined merely to those under his own charge, for they occasioned a very general excitement through the country, of which he availed himself, and soon had the pleasure of seeing similar institutions in Werden and Aschersleben. He made the most urgent appeals to his Christian countrymen in behalf of his scheme.

In connection with these institutions, the indefatigable Count erected Sabbath schools, and had the pleasure of seeing their beneficial effects in the great improvement that took place in the manners and habits of the people. These were not confined to children, but extended to adults; and numbers whose education had been totally neglected, were induced to become scholars, and to spend those hours in receiving religious instruction, which they had been accustomed to squander in idleness and dissipation. The institution at Overdyke was soon favoured with an affectionate and able minister, and by the blessing of God, was prospering beyond expectation. The original plan was at length departed from, and girls as well as boys were admitted to the benefits of the asylum. At first, these females were placed at service in the families of the peasantry and farmers, but finding that their education was neglected, they abandoned this scheme, and by the kind co-operation of the ladies of Overdyke, they educated and brought them up within the walls of the asylum, until, by the liberality of their friends, they were enabled to erect new buildings.

The great increase in the number of applicants for admission, made the Count ardently desirous of extending such institutions, and he, accordingly, purchased the Abbey and Domain of Dusselthal. The advantages which this place offered were numerous; there was ample room for garden-ground, where the children might be usefully employed, as also for work-shops and play-ground, inclosed by walls. When Adelbert found that this place possessed so many advantages, he desired earnestly to possess it, but he had no money, and the price was large. He was persuaded, however, that its being offered him at the very time when he was anxiously wishing for such a place, was of the Lord; and yet he hesitated to incur the responsibility of such an extensive purchase.

“Those only who saw can tell,” says the report, ‘the painful struggle we endured, the waking nights we passed, and the fervent prayers we poured out to the all-wise God for his direction, from the month of August 1821 till February 1822, before we came to a final determination, so that we cannot be accused of precipitancy; and several providential circumstances concurring, left us no room to doubt but that it was the will of God we should make the purchase.’

“Among others, there is one which we cannot avoid mentioning, as it occurred at a time when our faith was weak and ready to waver. A noble lady sent to the writer of this report, as a free gift, to be at his own disposal, the sum of three thousand six hundred and sixty-six Rhenish florins; he cheerfully devoted it to this purpose, considering the opportune present as the seal of the approbation of God, and joyfully went forward to the work, confident in his further assistance. We then,” continues he, ‘began to treat with the proprietors of Dusselthal, and after mature deliberation, bought the estate, part from Herrn Heubes and part from government, with the buildings, waters, mills, gardens, meadow and arable lands, a flat area consisting of one hundred and fifteen acres, for the sum of fifty-one thousand five hundred and seventy Rhenish florins; and, at last, on the 30th of March 1822, the Abbey of Dusselthal became a property exclusively devoted to God our Saviour, as an institution for rescuing orphan children from inexpressible wretchedness, and from being the pest, to become useful members of the community.’”

Previously to the time at which the Count purchased Dusselthal Abbey, the state of the Jews in Germany had attracted his attention; and now when he had made the purchase, he extended his plan so as to include in it a place of refuge for those of the house of Israel, who having a desire to inquire into, or embrace the Christian religion, were in consequence, thrown destitute, and persecuted by their Jewish relations. At this time the Count made application to the British Christians for aid in his undertaking, and received liberal donations from several private individuals as well as from the Ladies' Jewish Society of Edinburgh, who have continued to contribute. But, upon the whole, the sums received were not sufficient to relieve him from anxiety, and difficulty, and continued exertion. From the generality of the population by whom he was surrounded, he could expect nothing, for they, instead of furthering the objects of the institution, were incensed, by his putting into the hands of the children the pure unadulterated Word of God. It was, therefore, with feelings of peculiar affection and delight that the Count received, from this country, any tokens of Christian sympathy and encouragement. In a letter to the Secretary of the Edinburgh Ladies' Jewish Society, he thus writes:

“O! my dear and affectionately beloved sisters in Jesus, pray for me, the poorest and the least, that Jesus may fill me with his Spirit and grace, that I may be clothed with power from on high, and made a vessel fit for glorifying his name, and spreading abroad the kingdom of our great God. O! continue further to assist in this work; we still want more than I can express for the accomplishment of our wishes. We stand very much in need of a dormitory for our children,—a chapel,—and dwelling-houses and work-shops for the artizans. The Lord reward you for all your love, and bless and refresh you daily with his animating presence, and glorify himself in you until the day of his glorious appearance. Remember before Him your affectionate friend and brother, Adelbert Count Von der Recke.”

While foreign aid thus enabled the Count to afford an asylum to the Jewish outcasts, he was assisted by some of his pious and benevolent countrymen to provide for the reception of the overflowings of Overdyke. Accordingly, about the middle of June 1822, he conveyed forty-four orphans, twenty-four boys and twenty girls, to Dusselthal. They experienced the utmost kindness and attention in their journey, and at Ketrieb, where they halted at mid-day, the inhabitants having heard of their approach, had prepared a comfortable dinner for the young travellers, and bestowed upon them many little marks of their love to carry along with them, for which the whole company implored the blessing of God upon their benefactors, and earnestly prayed that He would bestow upon them that reward which is reserved for those to whom he shall acknowledge, “I was an hungered and ye gave me meat, thirsty, and ye gave me drink.” When they arrived at the end of their journey they found the gate decorated with a triumphal arch, which the grateful boys of the institution had prepared during the absence of the Count, to surprise and welcome him to their new habitation.

“We felt,” says he, in mentioning this incident, ‘our souls rise towards the Author of our being; and powerfully impelled by a sense of his unmerited goodness, we all spontaneously hastened to the chapel, and falling down upon our knees, poured out our full hearts to the Father of mercies, and praised Him who had made bare his holy arm in behalf of those helpless orphans. It was a delightful sight to us when we reflected that not long since these joyous children wandered through the country ragged and naked, without a roof to cover them, and that here was shelter and clothing, food and raiment, houses and gardens, provided for them by the bounty of our gracious Saviour. The children fancied themselves in the garden of Eden, and waited impatiently for the morrow's sun, to ramble over the grounds, and fully to discover the extent of their happiness.’”

In the year 1823, this indefatigable man was visited by a severe illness, insomuch that he was unable to complete a letter, of no great length, to the Edinburgh Ladies' Society, except at three sittings, and after two interruptions of several weeks each. In this letter, in answer to a question whether the money sent was all appropriated to the cause of the Jews, he answered:

"You may be perfectly assured that not a halfpenny given for the Jews shall be used for any other purpose, and I beg that you will request your Society to be quite easy on this head. It would indeed be shameful, and an act of theft, were I to suffer Israel to be in want, and spend the money I receive for them in any other way. My sense of justice would not suffer me to do the one, nor my love to Israel the other."

The next year commenced prosperously, the Count's health revived, and his spirits were cheered by the liberal contribution of a generous friend in England. This present was the more welcome, as at the very moment it arrived, he was dispatching a letter to one of his acquaintances, urging him to awaken the friends of the cause to immediate and more liberal contributions. In the meantime Jewish proselytes were flocking to Dusselthal from all quarters, so that there were soon no less than three hundred souls in that institution. To provide food and raiment for such a multitude was no easy task, and very frequently involved the Count in the greatest perplexity; yet, though perplexed, he was not discouraged, for his eyes were fixed on his God, who invariably brought assistance when it was most needed. In 1825, he thus writes:

"There are at present in Dusselthal, with teachers and scholars, 250, and in the female institutions at Overdyke and Quedlingburgh, 116,—in all, 366, that are daily fed by the merciful hand of God; for the Lord gave no great riches to the man he called to this work. He only impressed on his heart that powerful word contained in Matt. xxi. 22. Mark ix. 23. xi. 23, 24. John xiv. 13. xv. 7. 'All things whatsoever ye shall ask in my name believing, ye shall receive.'"

In 1826, he reports favourably of the prosperity of the institution, not only as regards the Jews, but also his orphan boys. "Having," he says, "three hundred and sixty human beings daily to feed, yet can we answer, with the disciples, when asked the question, 'Lacked ye any thing?' 'Nothing, Lord.'"

On the 16th of December 1826, the Count was united to a young Silesian lady, Countess Matilda Von Pseil, a lady of the same religious views with himself, and one who entered warmly into all his plans. During 1827 there appeared at Dusselthal tokens of a gathering storm, and in 1828 it burst upon their heads. The Count had considerably enlarged his buildings for the reception of numerous additions to his Jewish institution, which appears to have excited the indignation of his Popish neighbours, who spread abroad insinuations against his proceedings. Some of his assistants deserted him and gave currency to a report that the institution was bankrupt, when immediately numbers withdrew their aid, and all who had any claims demanded payment. The season was unfavourable, and provisions high, and to avoid a scarcity he had laid in a considerable stock, the bills for which became due, and his funds were exhausted. Many of the Jewish proselytes conceiving they had nothing more to expect, in the way of temporal support, left the place; and about the same time the Prussian government forwarded an order that the Jewish proselyte institution should be separated from the Christian, and the Count not having the means of erecting any other establishment, was obliged to break up the institution for adult Jews, and disperse the colony, and at that very moment when he had the brightest prospect of seeing it permanently established. He did not, however, abandon his exertions or his wishes for the salvation of the children of Abraham, though his hopes of success among the adult Jews were not so sanguine as formerly; and, therefore, he now, more especially, was led to direct his attention to the children. But this was not his only distress, for those who had contributed for the purpose of Christianizing the Jews, supposing that object wholly at an end, threatened to discontinue their contributions, especially as base reports were spread, that the money collected for this purpose was applied to other objects. But He whom all things obey, said, "peace, be still," and there was again a calm. Soon after this the Count was visited with family affliction. During almost the whole summer he was confined to bed, and his wife and daughter were also seized with sickness. The Lord, however, mercifully restored them to health. Rumours of war began to spread abroad, and an immediate rise in all the necessaries of life was the consequence; but by the liberal donations which were made, the Count was enabled, although with difficulty, to meet the demands. He soon after procured a printing press, and began to print a periodical paper for children, called the "Children's Magazine," of which he disposed of 4000 copies. He likewise publishes a periodical work, entitled the "Philanthropist," intended for the more advanced in life. Both these publications are admirably calculated for conveying religious instruction, as well as the intelligence of the exertions which are made to diffuse Christianity throughout the world.

In a letter acknowledging the receipt of the annual donation from Edinburgh, he says, that sometimes the fourth part of his household are ill of ague, caused by a marsh in the immediate vicinity of Dusselthal. This, he says, he has often wished to purchase, and clear away the wood, which would render the institution much more healthy, but has not yet been able to do so. In speaking of his labours, he says,—

"Every thing in Dusselthal tends, either directly or indirectly, to the promoting of the kingdom of God; it is this that makes all my labours so pleasant. Every walk, every step, every employment, all are connected with the kingdom of God; and, oh! it is blessed to labour for that kingdom. I desire life only for this end!"

The institution at Dusselthal still continues to advance, although amid much difficulty, and many trials; and, as in former seasons, they have still to admire the providential care of God, and every addition which they make is indeed an Ebenezer, testifying, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." In the year 1835, the Count writes:—

"The Lord, whose faithfulness is inexpressible, has, in infinite mercy, borne with me, and cared for me now these twenty years in his service, and has never suffered me to want any good thing for the promoting of his kingdom. In faith on his Almighty power, I have ventured much, and have never been put to shame: if the necessity was great, the assistance was at hand. Once I was in such difficulty, I did not know what to do: in these circumstances, how natural to be often in prayer to God; and he stirred up a heart in England to send me a bank-note of L. 50 sterling; a little billet was in it, in which my name and Elizabeth were written. When I shall come to that place where love receives its reward, then shall I know who this Elizabeth was, and thank her who, by the direction of God, strengthened my faith; and there shall I also see you, my dear benefactress, and with you fall down at His feet, for whose sake you have comforted and strengthened my faith."

In 1836, he mentions being in negotiation with government for the purchase of the marsh, for nearly twelve hundred pounds,—a sum which, it is earnestly hoped, the benevolence of British Christians will, as soon as possible, enable him to defray. Alluding to the donation which he had just received from Edinburgh, he says,—

"I had, indeed, with a heavy heart, looked on the bushes, and unbelief had seized on my desponding spirit: now the faithful Helper came with comfort; so that, in proportion as I had been cast down, my soul was filled with praise and thanksgiving. Thus was verified the saying, that the faithful Keeper of Israel, when necessity is greatest, causes help to be nearest."

Thus have we brought down the history of the institution at Dusselthal Abbey to a very recent period; and no one can be acquainted with it, without admiring the benevolence, the piety, and the perseverance of that heavenly minded man, with whom it originated, and who still watches over it with parental affection. To him we say, "God speed! and though man may despise or undervalue, yet 'God is not unrighteous, to forget your work and labour of love.'"

THE ANCIENT MONACHISM OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

No. I.

THE Monastic System, although now so intimately, and almost exclusively, identified with Christianity, does not, in reality, derive its origin from that religion. Nearly a century and a-half previous to the commencement of the Christian era, the principle of Monachism had begun to exhibit itself in Syria. During the administration of John Hyrcanus, (B. C. 135,) a sect of Jewish religionists, subsequently known by the name of Essenes, or Essenians, arose into notice. In the avowed object of their institution,—the attainment of superior sanctity (1) by a life of seclusion and austerity,—in the rigorous discipline to which, in pursuit of this object, they subjected themselves, and in the rules by which the internal arrangements of their communities were regulated, the essential principles of the monastic institution can, without difficulty, be recognised. A comparative view of the Essenism of Judea and the Monachism of the Christian Church, would convince us, that, not only in their essential features, they were manifestations of the same principles in human nature, but that, in many respects, they were elicited by similar proximate causes. Arising both beneath the fervid sky, and amid the contemplative regions of the East, originating with men of corresponding natural temperament, and of nearly similar national habits, they were also, respectively, the offspring of a period marked by tumult and disorder, and by unbounded licentiousness in public and social morals. Into the more minute features of this comparison, however, the limits of our subject do not permit us to enter. It is sufficient for our present purpose to observe, that the principles of Monachism, however variously modified by the circumstances in which they were developed, were actually in operation before the existence of Christianity. (1) Indeed, it is probable that the Essenism of Judea was by no means the first instance of their development. Were our information on the subject sufficiently extensive, there is reason to believe, that amongst the nations both of classical and barbarous antiquity, early traces would be found of the existence and operation, under whatever variety of external form, of the principles in which Monachism essentially consists. Of the reasonableness of this opinion, we have sufficient proofs in the very ancient institution of the Roman Vestals, (alleged to have been introduced into Italy by Æneas,) of whose order celibical seclusion was an essential feature,—in the similar institution attached to the temple of the Ecbatanian Diana, (2) and also (amongst others to be found in the nations of the East) in the religious communities of the Bonzes of Japan, whose habits closely resemble those of the Christian Monastic orders, and whose origin is assigned, by the only Europeans who have had access to that country, to a very remote period of antiquity. (3) The fact is, as we shall afterwards have occasion more fully to show, that Monachism is based on principles which, though perverted in their application, are common to human nature; it ought not, therefore, to be matter of surprise, that a practical exhibition of these principles, under one form or another, should actually have taken place previously to the comparatively recent period of the Christian era.

It is to Christianity, however, misunderstood, indeed, and misapplied, that Monachism must be regarded as owing its first extensive development, and its subsequent and ultimate permanency as a system. To the peculiar and more immediate causes to which its first appearance in the Christian Church is to be ascribed, we shall have hereafter a more fitting occasion to advert. At present, we may observe, as more closely connected with the subject of the preceding remarks, that it is highly probable that the Essenism of Judea contributed, amongst other causes, to promote, at a subsequent period, the establishment of the Christian Monastic institution. This supposition is not a little confirmed by the fact, that the Monastic spirit of the Christian Church first exhibited itself during an age addicted to the most servile veneration and indiscriminate adoption of Jewish institutions and usages, (4) —prepossessions which must, in the present instance, have been peculiarly influential, when it is recollected, that the sect in whose favour they were exercised, was one which, although it had been passed by unnoticed by the divine Author of Christianity, had at least, unlike its associates, (5) been passed by uncondemned.

The early Monachism of the Christian Church, however, was characterised by features very different from those belonging to any of the ancient institutions to which we have now adverted. It first exhibited itself, not in the formation of societies, or communities of recluses, as was the case with the Essenians, and as is now the distinguishing feature of all Monastic institutions, but merely, and for a considerable length of time, in the seclusion of single individuals. Long before the period from which the Monastic system, properly so called, dates its origin, it had become the practice with many Christians to adopt a mode of life distinguished

(1) A particular account of the Essenians will be found in Josephus: Wars, book ii. chap. 8. By some commentators, it is supposed that it is to the opinions and practices of this sect that St. Paul alludes in Colossians, chap. ii.

from that of the general mass by habits of greater devotion, by the practice of more rigid austerity, and by other features of peculiar self-denial. These persons were termed Ascetics, and are generally so characterised by the ancient ecclesiastical writers. This appellation was not restricted to any particular order or class, but was applied indiscriminately to all whose mode of life was deemed, in any respect, peculiarly spiritual. In particular, as we are informed by Bingham, (1) it was applied to such persons as the following:—To those who had inured themselves to habits of extreme abstinence; (2) to those who were peculiarly devoted to the exercise of prayer, and the private offices of religion; (3) to those, likewise, who had evinced a more than ordinary spirit of charity, and contempt of the world, especially in the surrender of their wealth to the service of God, or the use of the poor; (4) to the widows and virgins of the Church, and to all such as adopted a life of celibacy and continence; (5) and, finally, to those who had either imposed upon themselves peculiar austerities, for the purpose of realizing a higher standard of piety, or who had been subjected to peculiar personal suffering in defence of religion. (6) In the habits and practices of these primitive Ascetics, is to be found the first development of the principles from which the Monastic system subsequently arose. There were many essential points, however, in which these ancient Ascetics differed from even the most primitive of the monks. 1. The Ascetics, as their name implied, were men of active habits, who, although professing a life of greater austerity than others, did not, on that account, abandon the stations they held in society, and differed chiefly from other men in their seeking to acquire higher attainments in spirituality and self-denial. The monks, on the contrary, were men withdrawn from the business and conversation of the world, who lived either in solitary and secluded cells, or in Monastic societies, remote from the haunts of mankind. 2. Again, the primitive Ascetics were indifferently either clergy or laity, the vocations of the clerical and ascetic life being then consistent with each other. But the monks, by their original institution, were to be exclusively laymen, their total seclusion from society rendering the duties of the clerical and Monastic vocation totally incompatible. 3. Still further, the ancient Ascetics were subject to no peculiar rules of government, bound by no precepts but those of the Gospel, adopting no form of discipline but what they themselves imposed, and subject only to the authority of the Church to which they belonged; whereas the monks, at least those who lived in monasteries, were necessarily subject to the arbitrary, and oft-times unscriptural, rules of the peculiar society to which they had attached themselves. (7) From these circumstances, it is obvious that the institutions of the Ascetics and the Monks were, in many respects, essentially different, and that the latter cannot, in justice or propriety, claim the former as the original of their order. This circumstance is of importance, as it serves entirely to refute the pretensions advanced by the Church of Rome on the subject of the antiquity of the Monastic institution. The great majority of the writers of that persuasion, assuming the Ascetics and Monks to have been the same, have endeavoured to assign the origin of the latter to the primitive age of the Church, and thus to obtain for their favourite institution the implied sanction of inspiration. The statements now adduced, are sufficient to shew that the assumption on which this theory is founded, is altogether unwarranted; the total difference in the most essential features of their institution between the Ascetics and the Monastics, being enough to evince that the latter cannot, in consistency with truth, be identified with the former. (1) On this subject we shall only add the conclusive statement of the learned and accurate Bingham. "Although," he observes, "in the writers of the fourth and fifth ages, when the Monastic life was fully established, Ascetics and Monks often signify the same persons, yet, for the greatest part of the three first centuries it was otherwise. For there were always Ascetics in the Church, but not always Monks, retiring to the deserts and mountains, or living in monasteries and cells, as in after ages." And again, "Although every Monk was an Ascetic, yet every Ascetic was not a Monk. Anciently, every Christian that made profession of a more strict and austere life was dignified with the name of Ascetic, which is a name borrowed, by the Christians, from the ancient philosophers, as Valesius shews, out of Arian, Artemidorus, and Philo; and signifies, as the word imports, (2) any one that exercises himself by the severe rules of abstinence and virtue. Of which kind there were always Ascetics, without being Monks, from the first foundation of the Church by the apostles." (3)

Although, therefore, it was in the habits of these primitive Ascetics that the first development of those principles took place, from which, perverted and exaggerated in their application, Monachism subsequently arose, it is equally apparent that the origin of the Monastic system, properly so called, cannot be assigned to a period so remote. The earliest instance, indeed, in the history of the Christian Church, in which the adoption of the essential principles of that institution took place, did not occur till about the middle, or towards the close of the third century. In this opinion the most enlightened and liberal writers of the Romish persuasion concur. Valesius (4) and Pagi (5) candidly admit it, and do not hesitate to expose and correct the errors into which, in this respect, their predecessors,

(1) Equally gratuitous and unwarrantable is the assumption of many advocates of Monastic Antiquity, that the sect of religionists, mentioned by Philo, who, towards the close of the first century of the Christian era, existed in the vicinity of Alexandria, are to be regarded as Christian Monks. These persons, who were denominated Therapeutae, from the superiority in spiritual worship which they arrogated to themselves, exhibited, indeed, many essential features of the Monastic life. They practised habits of great austerity, lived in small societies of six or eight, and obeyed a regular form of internal discipline. But there is no satisfactory reason for believing that they were either themselves converts to Christianity, or that their institution was recognised by the Church. On the contrary, it appears that they observed many of the rites and usages of Judaism, and as they are spoken of by Epiphanius under the name of "Essaei," (Esseniensians,) there is every reason to believe that they were a portion of that Jewish sect, whom the agitated state of Palestine, during the prosecution of the last Roman war, had compelled to migrate from their original residence on the shores of the Dead Sea. It is, besides, altogether inconsistent with historical facts to suppose, that at the early period at which they are said to have existed in Egypt (A. D. 70), the Christian religion should have been sufficiently established to have been the parent of such institutions. It has been the object of many of the most zealous advocates of the Romish Church to christianize these Egyptian Therapeutae, doubtless with the view, as in the case of the ancient Ascetics, not only of securing a higher antiquity to the Monastic system, but also of obtaining for it the implied sanction of inspiration in the person of St. Mark, who is supposed to have been, at the period in question, Bishop of Alexandria, and within whose diocese these Therapeutae resided. The facts now adduced will enable the reader to determine how far such an attempt can be successful.

(2) The word Ascetic is derived from the Greek verb, which denotes "to exercise."

(3) Thus Cyril of Jerusalem styles Anna the Prophetess, whose peculiar characteristic was the frequency of her devotions, "a most devout Ascetic."—Catech. x. 9.

Baronius, Christopherson, and others have fallen. The learned Pere Thomassin, in allusion to the alleged existence of a succession of Christian Monks from the period of the age of inspiration, expressly says, "To speak the truth, such a succession is imaginary, history gives us no information regarding it,—it is founded only on conjecture." (1) And the celebrated Alteserra, Dean of the University of Toulouse, states, in language still more distinct, that "the origin of the Monks is not to be sought for beyond the periods of the Decian or Diocletian persecutions," (2) that is, not beyond the years 250 or 260. It was about this period that the first decisive symptoms appeared of a transition from the habits of the primitive Ascetics to those by which the Monastics of subsequent ages were destined to be so peculiarly characterized; and by the example of Paul, the founder of the Anchorites of Egypt, the first authoritative sanction was given to the adoption of a life of entire seclusion from the world, and of a total renunciation of all connection both with the sacred and secular vocations of society.

The particulars, however, connected with this event must be reserved for a future communication.

ON THE EXTERNAL HOMAGE AND PRIVATE NEGLECT OF THE BIBLE,—AND ITS PARAMOUNT CLAIMS ON THE ATTENTION OF MAN.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER DUFF, D.D.,

One of the Church of Scotland's Missionaries to the East Indies.

WERE we to judge from mere outward appearances, we might almost believe, that, in this Christian land, we did really hail "the Word of God" with the bursting joy of the Psalmist, when he exclaimed, "Oh, how I love thy law; 'tis my meditation all the day." We might almost believe that we did really regard it as the prime of heaven's gifts,—as the book,—the book of books,—the Bible, by way of unrivalled eminence. In answer to the question, which is the best book in the world? the pliant tongue of infancy is taught to lisp, "the Bible." Which is the next best? "the Bible." And which the next? still, "the Bible." It is pronounced to be the charter of heaven's unmerited bounties to man,—the tenure of his spiritual birth-right,—the stronghold of his spiritual immunities. It is the fountain-head of light and life to a corrupt and benighted world. It is usually enshrined within a circle of unapproachable sacredness; its sentences are often treated almost like the phylacteries of old; and the very leaves, the perishable materials on which these are written, it were a kind of profanation to appropriate for any ordinary use.

And in manhood, we are found to vie with each other in loading it with honours. And we form ourselves into huge associations, in which the component parts, however heterogeneous, seem wondrously compact and harmoniously united:—all public differences of party being, for a season, allayed,—all private animosities hushed,—all rugged asperities softened,—that moral lever may fit to lever, and spring to spring, and wheel to wheel, in forming one vast machinery of gigantic power for fabricating versions, and multiplying copies, and distributing whole masses of "the Word of God," over every region of the habitable globe. And as, in the plain of Dura, by the streams of Babel, "when the people heard the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, all the people, the nations, and the languages, fell down and worshipped the image which Nebuchadnezzar, the king, had set up:"—so, in the midst of our great assemblies, when the people hear the sounds of lofty achievements and unequalled exertion, mingled with the voice of gratulation, and the songs of praise, and the music of eloquence, all "the princes, the governors and captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, the rulers of provinces," and all the hosts of the people, seem almost prepared, amid excited feelings and entranced imaginations, to fall down and worship the object of their reverence—the Bible,—that fairest image of his own perfection which the King of Heaven hath set up.

But external appearances are often deceptive, and the deception generally increases with their bewildering brilliancy. When the prophet of old stood upon the mount, "behold, a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks; but the Lord was not in the wind: and after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake: and after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire: and after the fire a still small voice;"—it was the voice of Jehovah, Lord of Hosts. So, after the like similitude, it is not amid the noise of boastful professions, nor the heavings of excited minds, nor the fire and glow of heated imaginations, that we are to look for the actual presence of Jehovah, in the deep and unreserved homage of the heart to his holy Word. We ought rather to seek for this presence, and this practical homage, amid the retirements of private life, the calmness of social fellowship, and the ten thousand reciprocities of business and friendship that link each man to his fellows, as members of the one great human family. But here alas! we have often to seek in vain. Here the picture, which glittered abroad in the sunshine of promise, becomes too often darkened with the clouds of disappointment. And that Bible, which, from being the subject of public panegyric and unbounded admiration, one would naturally expect to find the constant companion of our thoughts, whether at home or abroad, whether in solitude or amid the walks of busy men,—ah! how often is it excluded as an unwelcome visitor from our minds, and banished as an untimely intruder from our conversation, and rudely driven as a degraded outcast from our society? Or, if such contemptuous treatment be thought too glaringly contradictory to profession, still,—instead of occupying the frontier position in our practical regards, as the chart for perpetual consultation, as "the light for our feet, and the lamp for our paths," when traversing the dark and dreary wilderness of life; how often is it treated as nothing better than an insignificant toy, or converted into a mere gilded ornament, or removed, as an indispensable piece of sacred lumber, to collect the dust in some corner of our libraries? And as an everlasting proof of the emptiness of many of our public encomiums, how often have we heard of pile being left to accumulate upon pile in some grand depository,—a quiet and undisturbed prey for moths and insects,—instead of being scattered abroad, with an urgency proportionate to the necessities of man, to become food, substantial food, for multitudes of immortal spirits that are famishing for lack of knowledge?

And thus it is, that, notwithstanding all the hallowed teachings of youth, and all the vaunted professions of manhood, that best of books—the Bible,—instead of reigning as the central sun in our intellectual and spiritual firmament, is too often allowed to fade away, and dwindle into a point that barely announces its own existence by a dim nebulous luminosity, or an occasional faint sparkle.

Now, the present is pre-eminently an age of motion, drifting with strange impetuosity along the course of time, and quickening into mental life the spirits of thousands and tens of thousands that erewhile lay slumbering in wintry torpor. And if the Bible, which is the richest magazine of ennobling truth, be so often practically despised, or forgotten, how are the restless activities of awakened intellect directed? To the accomplishment of what worthy objects are they applied? On what engrossing themes are they expended? Let hoar antiquity, with its musty records and mutilated remains, and old nature, throughout all her provinces of heaven above, and earth beneath, and waters under the earth, furnish the reply.

Some spend their days and years in decyphering the ponderous records of ancient mythological lore; or in dragging from the rubbish of mouldering ruins hieroglyphical fragments to disclose the story of former ages; or in exposing to view, amid the caverns of earth and the ravines of everlasting hills, the mightier order of natural hieroglyphics that exhibit the progressive developments in the external organization of a globe. Others traverse the tempestuous ocean, and visit inhospitable climes, in quest of new facts to extend our knowledge of the animal and vegetable creations; or enlarge our views of the physical and moral, the social and political condition of man. Some lay the whole domain of nature tributary in supplying images to inspire their muse; or exhaust the powers of invention in fabricating incidents to illustrate a narrative or adorn a tale. Others labour to define the operations of the subtle agent within, and delineate its ever varying successions of state; or apply the arbitrary signs of intangible ideas to the tracing of the origin and identity of nations. Some strive to detect the internal changes and curious configurations of material substances; or unfold the laws that regulate their motions and reciprocal influences, whether on the teeming surface of earth or ocean, or aloft amid the glories of the circling heavens. Others toil, with reiterated efforts, in attempting to bring the laws and principles thus unfolded,—the powers and elements, whose properties are thus developed, under practical control, and thereby multiply the comforts, and contribute to the necessities, and augment, indefinitely, the earthly happiness of man.

And as the natural result of these ceaseless workings of the ever active mind, are there not enormous masses of recondite literature and science for the use of the learned? Is there not an endless variety of works, of a more elementary description, for the less studious and profound? And, in the train of both, do there not follow innumerable shoals of daily, weekly, monthly, quarterly, and yearly publications, in the shape of Journals, Magazines, Reviews, Cyclopædias, and Miscellanies, that find free admission into all the circles of society, crowd upon our tables, and form the staple of our popular libraries? Now, here lies the vital question: Have not these been too often allowed to engross more than a legitimate share of the thoughts and meditations even of professing Christians? Have they not been too often allowed to occupy, almost or altogether, the departments of private reading and conversation? And if so, must not these, in such cases, instead of being friends and allies, be accounted as the rude invaders of a sacred territory, that would drive the Bible from its commanding station in the foreground of our intellectual and spiritual landscape?—these, the sacrilegious spoilers that would usurp the province of a book replete with the incense and redolent with the fragrance of heaven?—these, the cruel monopolizers of time and attention, that would feed immortal souls with the garbage of secular knowledge, and leave them to famish amid the plentiful supplies of the bread of life, and the water of life, fresh flowing from the fountains of paradise?

But let us not be misunderstood. From what has now been said, let it not be insinuated that, like the wily priests and crafty churchmen of other days, we dread the searching scrutiny of inquisitive minds, and are hostile to the diffusion of useful knowledge. No such thing. We would utterly repudiate the insinuation, and pronounce it the basest calumny. Let men's minds be aroused from dull hebetude,—let all their faculties be expanded,—let them be expanded boundlessly; we have themes in store that will far transcend the utmost height which their purified vision can reach. Let sound knowledge increase and abound,—let fresh accessions be made to its accumulating stores,—let new facts and principles be discovered without number or limit; we shall only be furnished with more varied arguments to defend, and more apposite topics to illustrate, and more signal evidences to constrain us to venerate the oracles of the Living God.

But, it is one thing to be pronounced good, and another to be extolled as best; one thing to be regarded with favour, as a friend, another to be treated with exclusive honours, as a substitute; one thing to be viewed as an object of importance, another to be exalted to undisputed pre-eminence; one thing to be marked as worthy of admiration, and quite another to be enshrined as a divinity. While then, we cannot, in justice, nor would we, if we could, withhold our award of praise from the useful and the noble products of human intellect, we must still reduce their spurious first-rate magnitude into their real second-rate importance. We must lower their towering pretensions before the high claims of God's Word, to which alone the palm of royal pre-eminence is due. And admirable though they may be, and greatly promotive of the temporal wellbeing of man, we must ever hold them as subordinate in excellence, and subservient in utility to the wondrous records of divine, unfathomable, wisdom.

We would not surely be understood to disparage the effect of the workman's skill, though we directed the attention of an idle gazer from the gilded exterior of a book to its edifying or spirit-stirring contents,—nor to undervalue the light of a taper, in its proper season, though we advised some doating student to throw open his windows and let in the full blaze of the meridian sun,—nor to decry the admirable proportions of some stately edifice, with its rich tracery and fretted embellishments, though we exhorted the delighted spectator to cross the threshold, and join in those hallowing exercises that exhilarate the soul with the refreshment of heavenly delicacies. So neither can we, in justice, be thought to treat, with unmerited contempt, the glowing effusions of human genius, or the laboured productions of human learning, though we attribute the highest place and assign the highest praise to that book, which is the progeny of the infinite mind,—that book, which, from the external covering of the volume of nature, directs to inward intimations of a superintending providence,—that book, which points to the natural sun in the firmament as only an approximating emblem of the Sun of Righteousness,—that book, which grasps and appropriates all the beauties and excellencies of the magnificent temple of the material universe, and converts them into types and images for conveying some faint, undefined, ethereal conceptions of the peerless splendour of these bright realms where the Eternal Deity is unveiled amid the floods of effulgent glory.

While, therefore, we would highly prize well chosen works in every department of really useful knowledge, we hold it to be a foul indignity that these should occupy the foremost place in our thoughts, absorb the greatest portion of our time, and constitute the most prominent theme of every discourse.

For, even if we take the very lowest view of the subject, and judge of it by the current test of this boastful age of intellectual prowess, we would still ask, What book, even "as a magazine of useful and interesting knowledge," is worthy of being compared with the Bible? What department of knowledge is not garnished in that wondrous volume? and what branch of knowledge is there left without a counterpart?

That these questions are not the offspring of a heated imagination, may be established by independent evidence. Here is the testimony of a late celebrated layman—that prince of oriental scholars—Sir William Jones. "I have," wrote he on a blank leaf of his own Bible, "I have regularly and attentively read these holy Scriptures, and am of opinion that this volume, independently of its divine origin, contains more simplicity and beauty, more pure morality, more important history, and finer strains of poetry and eloquence, than can be collected from all other books, in whatever age or language they may have been composed."

This, it must be acknowledged, is an important testimony, and not more important than decisive, and not more decisive than true. Let us briefly advert to a few particulars.

We refer to theories respecting the origin, formation, and destiny of the globe which we inhabit. In the Bible, we distinctly behold it emerging out of nothing—existing for a season, for the accomplishment of the divine purposes, and finally wrapped in a universal conflagration.

We refer to descriptions of its varied surface. In the Bible, we have accounts of some of its fairer portions and products, and these are employed as emblems to adumbrate, though faintly, the scenery of that happy land, where "eternal spring abides, and never withering flowers."

We refer to history, with its details of the rise and fall of empires, the counsels of kings, and the struggles of contending warriors. In the Bible, we are introduced into the council-chamber of heaven, and made acquainted with the plans of Eternal Wisdom. Here, we have a history of the rise, fall, and future destiny of man, without the knowledge of which, all other history would only be a confused mass of anomalies—an inexplicable riddle—a dark and intricate labyrinth without a clew. Here, too, we have a vivid glimpse of a mighty warfare, that is now carried on between the potentates of heaven and the powers and principalities of darkness,—compared with which, the shock of armies in the battle field, is but as the tinkling of a cymbal to the loud thunder's roar.

We refer to studies that elucidate the jurisprudence and economy of nations. In the Bible, the court-rolls of heaven are thrown open to us. Here are the everlasting decrees, which, unlike the imperfect edicts of earthly princes, are not to be modified by the lapse of time, the change of place, or the revolution of circumstances. Here, are the laws for regulating the conduct of man, without distinction of age, or sex, or climate,—of man, whether high or low, rich or poor,—of man universally, whether "saint, or savage, or sage."

We refer to writings, which exhibit the forecasting skill and sagacity of captains and statesmen, that have figured on the stage of time. In the Bible, we behold the servants of the living God, standing, as it were, on the lofty summits of remote antiquity, and thence surveying the ample domains of futurity. And as they depart, they drop some seed of promise, which gradually springs up, containing the germs of other revelations; and these, of others still, in onward progression;—till, at length, the original seed becomes a majestic tree, which spreads on every side, and shoots its branches into all time, and embraces in its mighty expansion the events of all ages; terminating only with the “restitution of all things!”

We refer to writings which regale the fancy and gratify the taste. In the Bible, what a perpetual feast for the most refined imagination and the most tender feelings! Such choice selection of imagery! such brilliancy of metaphor! such vividness of description!—What chord of the heart has it left untouched?—What songs of noble triumph! what strains of plaintive melody! what bold and rapid transitions! what strokes of tenderness! what resistless appeals! what rousing bursts of eloquence!

We refer to works of science, which unfold the boundless diversity of skill and contrivance in the mechanism of the material universe. In the Bible, we have a still higher order of divine skill and contrivance; for therein is manifested “the manifold wisdom of God,” in planning, and conducting, and consummating the scheme of man’s redemption. And in its progress and development, a thousand varied agencies, and a thousand varied events, apparently the most contingent, are moulded into the most exquisite and admirable adaptations for ultimately realizing the grand design. But when, by the aid of this noblest of all sciences, we are at length conducted to that point where the eternal Son of God sinks prostrate beneath the accumulated load of a world’s transgression,—it only leaves us to fall prostrate too, and, lost in wondering admiration, to exclaim:—“O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!”

And what shall we say more? For time would fail us to speak of the thousandth part of the transcendent claims of “the Word of God,” that blessed book—the Bible! If we had “the tongues of men and of angels” we could not do it the thousandth part of the justice which it so eminently deserves! For, how could we ever sufficiently pourtray its glory, as “the mighty power of God,”—as “the hammer that breaketh in pieces” the rocky heart, and openeth a chasm in the soul, deep as the bottomless abyss; and openeth it only to be replenished out of the fulness of the Godhead? How could we ever adequately set forth this—its surpassing excellency, as the sole instrument, wielded by the omnipotency of the Spirit, in effecting the conversion of lost sinners? Here, beyond all debate, it moves in an orbit peculiarly its own—an orbit, in which it is placed as far as a distance from comparison with the loftiest productions of human intellect, as the sun, moon, or stars from the clods of the valley!

And if we, in this Christian land, who are privileged to possess a treasure so inestimable, still cast it into the shade, and confound it with the dross of perishable vanities, Oh! how can we expect to escape the merited condemnation? Will not the poor blinded idolaters, on the plains of Hindustan, rise up in judgment and condemn us? saying, “‘Are you also become weak as we?’ you, who had free access to the storehouse of divine knowledge—you, who, from earliest infancy, had the revealed Word of God to be ‘a light to your feet, and a lamp to your paths?’ Verily, we are without excuse, as conscience now bitterly upbraids us for not having walked up to the light which we enjoyed; but never, never did it cost us such a struggle to lose our souls, as it must have cost you—you, who despised God’s Word, who rejected his counsels, who slighted his invitations, and who set at nought all his reproofs.”

Oh let us, then, awake and bestir ourselves, ere we be summoned to take our station among the spirits of the reprobate! Let us arise and shake off the lethargy of slothful indifference, which, like the deadly night-shade, is so apt to infuse its venomous influence into all the faculties. Let us, like spirits disenthralled, expatiate at large in the hallowed fields of revelation, and crop the golden fruits of celestial truth, and thus nourish our souls for the climes of immortality. And let us now, with one spontaneous and universal impulse, exclaim, “Come, O house of Jacob, come and let us henceforth walk in the light of the Lord!”

SECTION III.

PERSONAL RELIGION UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF DIFFERENT BODILY DISTEMPERS.

It will not be denied that the state of our bodily health affects all our ordinary feelings and pursuits. Every derangement of the bodily system must, to a greater or less extent, influence the condition of the mind. And, perhaps, even greater is the diversity of feelings and apprehensions, produced by different complaints of opposite tendencies. So intimate is the connection between the mind and the body, or rather such is the extraordinary effect of physical causes on mental phenomena, that the inspiration of certain gases has been found, by experiment, to produce such a train of the most brilliant and interesting visions of thought, as to seem almost supernatural. And it is well known that particular fevers have a similar effect. In some other diseases the patient is thrown into a state of unnatural and convulsive joy, while, in many more, great depression of spirits, and inability to think, are usual symptoms. And in not a few a timid and sensitive apprehension, particularly of death, is well known as a purely physical effect. Now, what is personal religion but an altered state of man’s moral and spiritual condition? It is not something apart from man, which may remain untouched, although he is affected, to the interruption or even deprivation of all his faculties. But instead of this, it is simply man, viewed with regard to religion. Personal religion is the religion of a man’s person; it is a part of his moral being; it shares with him in all that he shares; it is tried by all that is trying to him; it is, throughout the whole period of our imperfect state, like the lights carried by Gideon's soldiers, while the pitchers remained unbroken; it is dimmed by the infirmities of our fallen nature, and will shine forth in the fulness of its own light, only when these clay tenements shall be broken in pieces, and that which is imperfect be done away.

We remarked in a former paper, that examples drawn from life ought not to be regarded as simple experiments. In all the works of God many causes meet, and all that we are warranted to say, respecting any one, is that it may be traced among the leading features of the example adduced. The influence of sickness is entitled to the full benefit of this remark. Even when long continued, it is only an accidental and modifying circumstance, and ought not to be understood as giving any original or constitutional bias, but merely as affecting, for a time, the external medium of communication, and those feelings and apprehensions which are dependent on bodily causes. And with this explanation, we shall now proceed to detail a few cases, first of Christians suffering under complaints, whose general tendency is rather to elevate than depress the spirits:—

A young woman, who had been religiously brought up, and who had known the truth as a matter of experience for probably four or five years, was seized with a spitting of blood, gradually lost strength, and at last died of pulmonary consumption. She was naturally of a calm and placid temper, but without any mixture of melancholy. From the time that she first knew the truth as a ground of peace, her progress in knowledge was remarkably equable and steady; and very much, in the same proportion, was the progress of her faith, and of other Christian attainments. She said herself, that she had scarcely ever known what it was to be downcast or disquieted in divine things; and that neither had she experienced any remarkable enlargement of heart, but that she always enjoyed a calm and delightful sense of the divine favour, which was to her soul as a continual feast; and in this state she continued with little interruption till death. As the hour approached, she was left for a little, to look at her coming change, with the feeling of being alone. A momentary darkness spread over her soul, but it was only as the passing of a cloud. She again saw Him in whom she had believed. A fresh tide of joy flowed in upon her soul, and she soon after departed.—Another, and, in some respects, more remarkable instance, we shall now subjoin. A young woman, of perhaps about the same age, but of a weak and sickly body, and with a mind neither acute nor forcible, became serious, perhaps two or three years before her death. Like many others, she had been accustomed to hear the Gospel, as if respectful hearing were all that was required. But she was led, in providence, to sit under a different ministry, and it pleased God to open her heart, like that of Lydia, to attend to the things which were spoken. The first change of which she was conscious, was the apprehension of what she called "a meaning in preaching." Her mind gradually opened, and although she was still rather inapt, yet such was her extraordinary application and unwearied attendance on all the means of grace within her reach, that she made sensible and steady progress. Besides her attendance in the house of God, and on various classes, she often remained sleepless during a great part of the night, either poring over her Bible, or musing in painful solitude on difficulties which stood in her way. Her health, otherwise bad, was, no doubt, injured by so much anxiety and application. Various complaints grew upon her, and, among others, she was frequently visited with spitting of blood. Yet so far was she from being either alarmed, or deterred from eagerly pursuing what had now become to her even better than life, that she grew in ardour, and scarcely abated in application. A painful and overwhelming affliction occurred about this time, and threw all the other members of the family into a state of utter dejection and helplessness, yet she, who was at this very time labouring under various severe ailments, rose like some light substance floating on the swell of the deep. Amidst the chafing of severe affliction, and when all around were bathed in tears, or dying away in faints, she seemed more active than at other times, and with an address superior to herself, she discharged the duties of the family, and was the comforter of the rest. Her strength, however, rapidly gave way, particularly after sustaining the bereavement now referred to. The time of her departure drew nigh, and she entered the swellings of Jordan without fear.—We shall add only one other instance of a like tendency: The young man, of whose sickness we propose to give some account, was naturally of an active and sanguine temperament, had received a liberal education, and seen a good deal of the world. He was understood to have long known the truth, and had done much to promote the interests of religion. When first taken ill, his medical advisers felt themselves unable to speak with certainty of his complaint. He daily lost strength, but felt no pain, and was perfectly at his ease, and uniformly cheerful. His complaint at length discovered itself to be an ulcerous affection of the lungs. When the issue had thus become morally certain, he hastened to disengage himself from all worldly matters, and to give himself wholly to the things of eternity. Each day he seemed eager to gain a step of advancement in his progress heavenward, and especially by prayerfully studying the Word of God. One day in particular, when a clerical friend was expounding to him a portion of the 10th chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, he was led to see more clearly the way of access to the Father, through a finished atonement. His mind became filled to overflowing with active joy. The unwonted tears burst from his eyes; and it seemed to him as if he had found a great treasure. His mind was fully occupied with this subject for several days, and each day witnessed his increasing ardour in devising means for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom. When the time of his departure at last came, he bade all around him farewell! with a cheerful and even gladdened countenance; and, turning towards her by whom he was supported, where he lay, he exclaimed as in joyful triumph, "All's well! M——. All's well! M——," and repeated several passages of Scripture such as, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." They who looked upon him scarcely observed the change till it had taken place. Amidst this burst of holy triumph, his soul took its flight, leaving impressed on his features the very image of its own joy. The smile remained fully expressed on every feature of his countenance when his body was laid in the coffin.

It will not be supposed that these facts are adduced to prove that disease itself is the cause of such holy triumph. It is enough for our purpose that, under certain complaints, such as those described, religion is less fettered and depressed than in other circumstances; that it is not their nature to press on the spirits, or to fill the mind with foreboding fears, but rather to produce a certain degree of excitement, which, however weakening, gives for the time a feeling of buoyancy and hope. On the other hand, there are not a few disorders which as naturally depress, and are ever intruding upon the mind melancholy apprehensions. Like Job, the patient is, in such circumstances, surrounded with a perpetual gloom, and is, in consequence of his physical ailments, made to look upon his spiritual condition as if equally hopeless. The diversity of effects, in these circumstances, is very great. In some cases settled melancholy, proceeding from purely physical causes, is but little different from actual insanity. In other cases there is such a continued doubting and hesitation, as to make it extremely difficult to know how much is dependent on bodily, and how much on mental causes. And in a third class of cases, the natural feelings are so benumbed and deadened, that even when the cause is known to be physical, the individual is unable to awaken in his soul almost anything of lively emotions. In most cases, the cause is believed to be wholly moral. The poor sufferer, writing bitter things only against himself, will scarcely believe, even when told, that the cause is, in a great measure, bodily. But, in some cases, the cause is perfectly understood, and yet the individual feels powerless, as under a weight which he is unable to raise. It might tend to illustrate this, as well as the other branch, were we now to describe a few examples. But as these might give pain to surviving relatives, and would perhaps, after all, be of little profit, we prefer subjoining a few remarks, for the encouragement and guidance of such as may be in these circumstances, and still more for the direction of friends.

And first, we would say to all serious persons, whose health has begun in any measure to suffer: Beware of mistaking mere nervous excitement for true holiness. If the anxiety of your mind has led to debility of body, recal your attention at once to the matter of health. If you are one of the Lord's people, your body is his, as well as your soul; and as a steward of both, you will afterwards have to give an account. Moreover, till your bodily derangement has been in some measure corrected, you will not be able to judge well of your mind. Health of body and soundness of mind are not only compatible with the highest degrees of sanctity, but they are in some respects necessary to the right enjoyment of divine things, and true usefulness in the service of God. We press this the more, that we have known especially young persons, getting into a state of low nervous debility, which of itself rivetted their attention on spiritual things, and rendered them utterly careless of a progress, which, if allowed to go on, would have unfitted them for all useful duties, and probably, unsettled the mind itself.

We would also warn religious friends, against falling into a like mistake. In most cases, parents and other relations are more alive to the health of the body than that of the soul. And they are in this way, often causes of hindrance to true godliness. But this very habit leads others so to identify a certain measure of anxiety and even distress, both of body and mind, with true religion; and in this way, they are blamelessly neglectful of the bodily health of those, for whom they ought to care. Such is the connection between mind and body, that intense thinking and great anxiety, however sanctified, will affect health, and in some constitutions, induce morbid sensibility and strong nervous excitement. On the other hand, certain habits of body, when these meet, will spread such a gloom over the mind, and induce so much nervous timidity and apprehension, as to tinge with a corresponding character whatever passes before it to the endangering even of its sanity. We have known instances of this kind; and believing as we do, that in nine cases out of ten, the immediate cause is physical, we would say to the friends of such persons, lose no time in consulting a prudent and, if practicable, a pious physician. It will often happen, that by mere attention to special regimen, the incipient evil may be checked, and this without at all hindering or even discouraging any thing like true godliness.

And finally, we would recommend to experienced Christians, and such as are in the habit of knowing the state of others less experienced than themselves, to pay particular attention to their state of bodily health, both when judging of their moral and spiritual character, and when it may be in their power, to counsel and direct them. We know, that some who are truly Christian people, will consider such counsel as savouring too much of carnal things. But such as have fully learned what Christianity is, know that true godliness leadeth not to the destruction of either body or soul, and neither is it in itself any cause of gloominess. Instead of this, it "is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is," as well as "of that which is to come." Moreover a state of felt reconciliation with God, is alike removed from gloominess and frivolity. It awakens in the soul a feeling of satisfaction and joyousness, which is health even to the body. And yet, this is so tempered with sobriety of spirit and decision of character, as to prevent the usual effects of mere temporary excitement. In the language of our Saviour, it is "in him," as "a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

A LETTER TO A NEWLY MARRIED COUPLE.

BY THE REV. S. SIMPSON,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Usher's Quay, Dublin.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—I would address you in the words of good Philip Henry, who was accustomed to say on a similar occasion, "I wish you all holiness, and there is no doubt you will have happiness." I hope you possess those qualities of mind and of heart which form the basis of conjugal felicity. I trust you have sought divine direction, and that, under a guidance which cannot err, you have been led to take this important step. By many, however, it is totally overlooked; and, as Mr Jay remarks, they contract marriages on considerations purely accidental, or worldly; as if they wished to marry, not to be happy; to gain each other, not to enjoy. Who forms this alliance as a Christian? Who enters it with those views and motives which the Gospel supplies? Who consults God in the undertaking? Who has the benams published in heaven, to ascertain what impediments are pleaded there? Thus persons are often unsuitably bound together by an engagement which can only be dissolved by death, that comes to release them from one prison, and conducts them into another. May the God of heaven, who instituted and blessed the marriage state, pour upon you his richest, choicest favours! May he bless you in providence, by liberal bestowments of temporal good things; and to these may he add a better portion, enriching your souls by spiritual communications!

You will see the duties of Christian husbands and wives in Ephesians v. 22-33, and in 1 Peter iii. 1-7. Enter, my friends, the temple of revelation—bow before the divine oracle—say, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." Extract from the Scripture the mind of God concerning yourselves individually. Read—compare—resolve—reform. Let not the husband take away the duties of the wife, nor the wife the duties of the husband; but let both take respectively their own, and say, "O that my feet were directed to keep thy statutes!" "Through thy precepts I get understanding; therefore I hate every false way." "I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments."

I hope that you will conscientiously regard devotional exercises. It is impossible for a Christian to live without prayer. He prays alone, and he prays with others. The field, the temple, the closet, the family, are all with him places "where prayer is wont to be made." How necessary is prayer in the marriage state! How does social devotion sweeten social life! It obtains strength for its duties, and succour for its trials. It gives a direction to the mind, by which we escape numberless snares; an elevation, by which we rise above a thousand vexations. How it sanctifies our comforts! How it prepares the soul for disappointment, or success! How it calls down the blessing of heaven to "attend the labour of our hand!" How it attracts the divine presence, and places Him within our reach, "who is nigh unto all them that call upon him; to all that call upon him in truth!" Of a prayerful habitation it may be said, How glorious is this place! "This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." "The voice of rejoicing and of salvation is in the tabernacles of the righteous." O happy mansion! where all the members of the family "dwell together in unity," living with each other here as those who expect to be associates for ever; maintaining a friendship, the centre of which is religion, the duration of which is eternity, the bands of which are "faith and love which are in Christ Jesus."

I invite, then, the God of the families of the whole earth, who loves the dwellings of Jacob, to come and take up his abode with you; erect an altar for his worship, and offer daily the sacrifice of prayer, and never be ashamed to avow your attachment to him and his service. Seek to make those arrangements in your household, which shall secure time for the regular and daily exercise of devotion. Let the Sabbath be sacred to religion, and suffer not its hallowed hours to be infringed on by unlawful indulgences, or ceremonious visitings. Sunday visitings are much to be reprobated; they disturb the repose of the family, and convert what ought to be a day of rest, into a day of unusual bustle; they deprive the servants of all opportunity of attending the means of grace; and they consume, in unprofitable conversation, that precious time which should be devoted to God and the soul. Guard against all this at first setting out, since it is much easier to avoid than to break off pernicious customs. Permit me to add, that having made religion the basis of domestic happiness, let your abode be the scene of order, frugality, temperance, hospitality, and friendship.

Beware of raising your expectations of felicity too high. Perfect bliss is a flower which once bloomed in Eden, ere sin entered; but since that period, it has never arrived at equal perfection: in some favourable situations it yet produces a few flowers, and a little fruit; and the greatest degree of it may be expected, where there is a union of heart and soul, in the conjugal state; but, under the most favourable circumstances, expect trials; remember that the serpent yet lurks in the most pleasant bowers of the earthly paradise; your greatest trials may arise out of your choicest comforts; and never forget that the firmest and most endearing bonds may soon be burst asunder by death; and the bridal ornaments may, ere long, be exchanged for the funeral shroud, and the bridal chamber for the silent sepulchre. May you long be spared as mutual helps and comforts; and may the separation, which death will assuredly occasion, be followed by a reunion in the heavenly paradise, where all will be uninterrupted harmony and love, and where perfection in bliss will be crowned with eternal duration.

As ivy twines around the tree,
And holds it in a close embrace,
So may they, Lord, both cleave to thee,
Upheld and strengthen'd by thy grace.

As partners of the grace of life,
May they each other's burden bear;
May mutual love exclude all strife,
And kindness banish ev'ry care.

Thus blest and happy may they live!
And when they're call'd by death away,
The wreck of time may they survive,
And reign with thee in endless day!

Wishing you the best of blessings, in time and for ever, I am, your affectionate friend and pastor, &c.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The Offence of the Cross.—One may say the most unchristian things even down to deism,—the most enthusiastic things, so they proceed but upon mental raptures, lights and unions; the most severe things, even the whole rigour of ascetic mortification; and all this will be forgiven. But if you speak of faith in such a manner as makes Christ a Saviour to the utmost, a most universal help and refuge, in such a manner as takes away glorying, but adds happiness to wretched man; as discovers more pollution in the best of us than we could before acknowledge, but brings a greater deliverance from it than we could before expect.—If any one offers to talk at this rate, he shall be heard with the same abhorrence as if he was going to rob mankind of their salvation, their mediator, and their hopes of forgiveness.—GAMBOLD.

Encouragement to Perseverance.—If God had not said, "Blessed are those that hunger," I know not what could keep weak Christians from sinking in despair. Many times all I can do, is to find and complain that I want him, and wish to recover him. Now, this is my stay, that he in mercy esteems us not only by having, but by desiring also, and after a sort, accounts us to have that which we want, and desire to have; and my soul tells me I do unfeignedly wish him, and long after that grace which I miss. Let me desire still more, and I know I shall not desire always. There was never soul miscarried with longing after grace. Oh! blessed hunger that ends always in fullness! I am sorry that I can but hunger and yet I would not be full—for the blessing is promised to the hungry. Give me more Lord, but so as I may hunger more. Let me hunger more, and I know I shall be satisfied.—BISHOP HALL.

The Love of God.—Oh, love is an uniting and transforming thing! God is love, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him. He dwelleth in us by love, this makes him work in us, and shine upon us. Love hath drawn him down from his seat of majesty, to visit poor cottages of sinners. And it is that love of God reflecting upon our souls, that carries the soul upward to him, to live in him, and walk with him. Then the more unity with God, the more separation from ourselves and the world; and the more unity among ourselves, among the brethren of our family. Because here we are not fully one with our Father, therefore, there are many differences between us and our brethren; because we are not one perfectly in him, therefore we are not one as he and the Father are one. But when he shall be in us, and we in him, as the Father is in the Son, and the Son in the Father, then shall we be one among ourselves; then shall we meet in the unity of the faith in a perfect man, in the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, Eph. iv. 13. Christ is the uniting principle.—BINNING.

The Death of God's People.—The death of the saints of God is precious in his sight. And shall it seem unto us superfluous, at such times as these are, to hear in what manner they have ended their lives? The Lord himself hath not disdained so exactly to register in the book of life, after what sort his servants have closed up their days on earth, that he descendeth even to their very meanest actions; what meal they have longed for in their sickness; what they have spoken unto their children, kinsfolk, and friends; where they have willed their dead carcases to be laid; how they have framed their wills and testaments. Yea, the very turning of their faces to this side or that, the setting of their eyes, the degrees whereby their natural health hath departed from them; their cries, their groans, their pantings, breathings, and last gaspings, he hath most solemnly commended unto the memory of all generations.—HOOKER.

SACRED POETRY.

DELIGHT IN GOD ONLY.

I LOVE, and have some cause to love, the earth :
 She is my Maker's creature ; therefore good :
 She is my mother, for she gave me birth ;
 She is my tender nurse ; she gives me food ;
 But what's a creature, Lord, compar'd with Thee ?
 Or what's my mother, or my nurse to me ?

I love the air : her dainty sweets refresh
 My drooping soul, and to new sweets invite me ;
 Her shrill-mouth'd quire sustains me with their flesh,
 And with their polyphonian notes delight me :
 But what's the air or all the sweets that she
 Can bless my soul withal, compared to Thee ?

I love the sea : she is my fellow-creature,
 My careful purveyor ; she provides me store :
 She walls me round : she makes my diet greater :
 She wafts my treasure from a foreign shore :
 But, Lord of oceans, when compared with Thee,
 What is the ocean, or her wealth to me ?

To heaven's high city I direct my journey,
 Whose spangled suburbs entertain mine eye ;
 Mine eye, by contemplation's great attorney,
 Transcends the crystal pavement of the sky :
 But, what is heaven, great God, compar'd to Thee ?
 Without thy presence heav'n's no heaven to me.

Without thy presence earth gives no refection ;
 Without thy presence sea affords no treasure ;
 Without thy presence air's a rank infection ;
 Without thy presence heav'n itself no pleasure :
 If not possess'd, if not enjoy'd in Thee,
 What's earth, or sea, or air, or heav'n to me ?

The highest honour that the world can boast,
 Are subjects far too low for my desire ;
 The brightest beams of glory are, at most,
 But dying sparkles of thy living fire :
 The loudest flames that earth can kindle, be
 But nightly glow-worms if compar'd to Thee.

Without thy presence, wealth is bags of cares ;
 Wisdom, but folly ; joy, disquiet—sadness :
 Friendship is treason, and delights are snares ;
 Pleasures but pain, and mirth but pleasing madness :
 Without Thee, Lord, things be not what they be,
 Nor have they being, when compar'd with Thee.

In having all things, and not Thee, what have I ?
 Not having Thee, what have my labours got ?
 Let me enjoy but Thee, what further crave I ?
 And having Thee alone, what have I not ?
 I wish nor sea, nor land, nor would I be Possess'd of heav'n, heav'n unpossess'd of Thee.

FRANCIS QUARLES.

MISCELLANEOUS.

My Word shall not return unto me void.—The late Rev. John Patison, of Edinburgh, having occasion to preach on a Sabbath-day in Dundee, had, previously to his leaving his home, laid aside, and ordered to be packed up with some other necessary articles, a certain note-book, which contained a sermon, on which the good man had bestowed considerable pains, and which he hoped might not be unacceptable to the congregation of Christians, who then enjoyed the stated labours of the late excellent Mr M'Ewen. On his arrival in Dundee, however, which was not till Saturday evening, and examining the contents of his saddle-bags, he found the note-book missing, nor had any other been substituted in its place. He was, therefore, late as it was, obliged to make choice of a new subject, and to cast his thoughts together upon it, in the best manner he could ; and, after all his pains, and all his prayers, was not a little apprehensive that such defective preparation would not only affect the respectability of his appearance in the pulpit, but in some measure mar the success of his work. "Not by might," however, "nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." It happened, in his adorable providence, on the afternoon of that Sabbath, that a poor fish-woman, notorious for clamour and profanity, stumbled into the meeting, and felt the sermon, particularly in the application, come home with such life and peculiar energy to her soul, as instantly to produce the most happy effect on the dispositions of her heart, and tenor of her conduct. On Monday she attended, with her fish-basket as usual,—but, O how changed ! Instead of her former noise and profanity, she was quiet and calm as a lamb ; instead of asking from her customers double or triple the value of her fish, she spoke to them with discretion, and told them the lowest price at once. Surprised at this new behaviour of the woman, some who were present, judging she might be indisposed, began to inquire after her health : one of them in particular said to her,—“Dear ! Margaret, what is the matter with you ? you are not at all as you used to be.” “No,” replied Margaret, “and I hope never shall. It pleased God to lead me yesterday to Mr M'Ewen's meeting-house, where I heard words I shall never forget, and found something come over me the like of which I never knew before.” This woman lived to give the most satisfactory evidence of the soundness of her conversion, by a walk and conversation becoming the Gospel.

Rev. W. Herring.—Mr Herring, one of the puritan ministers, was eminently distinguished for Christian meekness, and for love to his greatest enemies. Dr Lamb, a violent persecutor of the Puritans, and especially of this good man, being on a journey, unhappily broke his leg, and was carried to the inn where Mr Herring happened to be staying for the night. Mr H. was called on to pray that evening in the family, when he prayed with so much fervour and affection for the doctor, as to surprise all who heard him. Being afterwards asked, why he manifested such respect to a man who was so utterly unworthy of it, he replied, “The greater enemy he is, the more need he hath of our prayers. We must prove ourselves to be the disciples of Christ, by loving our enemies, and praying for our persecutors.” On another occasion, Archbishop Laud having said, “I will pickle that Herring of Shrewsbury ;” the good man meekly replied, “If he will abuse his power, let it teach Christians the more to use their prayers, that their enemies may see they have a God to trust in when trampled upon by ill-disposed men.”

THE MYSTERIES OF REVELATION.

No. III.

BY THE REV. MARCUS DODS,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Belford.

It may be asked, perhaps, what is the use of mysteries? Would it not have been better had there been no such thing, especially in a revelation, since no two ideas can be more apparently incongruous than revelation and mystery? To this it may be replied, in the first place, that even though mysteries were of no use, yet they were altogether unavoidable, as has been already shewn. Beyond the boundaries which limit human knowledge, lies unspeakably more truth than is to be found within these limits. And however widely these limits may be extended, there will still lie beyond them a world of truth, of some portions of which we shall have some dim, mysterious intimations, and of other portions of which we shall have no notice or knowledge whatever.

But it may be replied, in the next place, that mysteries are directly useful. So that even had there been a possibility of avoiding them, in a revelation which was to make any real addition to our knowledge, as there was not, yet it would not have been proper to avoid them. One use of them is to furnish, not an objection against the truth of Christianity, but an argument in support of it. Had an impostor attempted to palm a forgery on the world, under the form of a revelation from heaven, he would have taken care to have no mysteries in it. Should any of those who object to mysteries proceed to frame a revelation, they would keep abundantly clear of mysteries. And had the sacred writers been framing only a pretended revelation, we may be sure it would have had no mysteries. Nay, they could have had none. They could not have carried their announcements beyond the limits of their own comprehension, nor consequently beyond that of other men. That revelation, then, does contain mysteries, is an additional proof that it comes from God. The way in which they are stated, too, is an additional proof of this. No formal announcement is made of them, nor is any attempt made to obviate objections to them. A statement is made which is profoundly mysterious.

But no attention is directed to the fact of its mysteriousness, and no attempt is made to remove, or explain away, any difficulties which that mysteriousness may occasion. This is what the very objection made to mysteries assures us that no impostor would have done.

Mysteries, then, give to revelation one of the characteristics of the works of God, for they are all mysterious. And the sacred writers state the mysteries in a way which no forger ever did, or could do. They never attempt to palliate, or extenuate, the mysteriousness of their doctrines, or to apologise for that mysteriousness, or in any way to obviate the difficulties which the mysteries may occasion. There stands the statement. It is made upon divine authority. If we respect that authority, we will readily admit the truth of the statement which rests upon it. If we do not receive it on that authority, an explanation of the mystery could do us no good. Even divine truth, believed on any other ground than divine authority, can avail us nothing. It can never be too often inculcated, nor too deeply impressed upon the minds of men, that when we believe any truth, not because God has said it, but because we can prove it, whether he had ever said it or not, then our faith rests not upon the Word of God, but upon our own wisdom, and will never lead us to heaven. In short, if our belief in the truths revealed to us, rests upon the testimony of God, we will not hesitate to believe mysteries upon that testimony; and if our belief of them rests upon any other ground, that belief will never cause us to experience their divine power and efficacy.

Again, some of the points that are most mysterious, are also most important. Look, for example, to the statement, "The Word was made flesh." Here is an announcement profoundly mysterious. But is it the less important on that account? Or would it be more important though it were so explained to us, as to divest it of every thing mysterious? No man can comprehend the incarnation; but every Christian is sensible, that from this mysterious fact springs all our knowledge of God; that from it our every privilege proceeds; and that on it our every hope is founded. It is a mystery. But take this mystery away from the Gospel, and what is left in it? The fact itself is a mystery; but how rich, how varied, how extensive, and how important is the knowledge which that mystery reveals! The stream that gladdens the country through which it flows, is neither the less pleasant, nor the less useful, because the secret paths through which the waters reach the springs by which it is fed, are hidden deeply from the eye of man in the bowels of the earth; even so the rich stream of knowledge, of privilege, and of hope, which flows from the incarnation, is not the less rich, because the fact to which we trace up that stream; is involved in mystery which man may not fathom. The fact itself we cannot comprehend; but believing it on the authority of God, its mysteriousness does not prevent us from gathering and enjoying the rich and happy fruits which it produces.

Look also to the "mystery of godliness," which the apostle mentions in 1 Tim. iii. 16. Every particular which he gives, as included in it, is deeply mysterious; and the apostle himself admits, that beyond all controversy the mystery is great. But is not every one of these particulars fraught with instruction of the most important kind? Do they not all furnish us with the most powerful and urgent motives for the cultivation of all holiness? Mysterious as they are, who does not feel that they are mysteries of godliness? The range of instruction which they embrace might be widened, were they all explained, but the motives which they set before us for the cultivation of godliness, could hardly be of a more resistless nature.

Thus, mysteries are directly and extensively useful. They not only furnish a strong argument in behalf of revelation, but they are the fountains of the most valuable knowledge, of the most important practical principles, and of the happiest privileges which we possess.

Mysteries have also an indirect use, similar to that which belonged to parables of old, as explained by the Lord,—Matt. xiii. 10–15. They afford a ground of cavil to those who are disposed to be captious; and they furnish the means of manifesting the faith and humility of those who are disposed to receive the kingdom of God as little children, and to rest their faith, not upon their own wisdom, but upon the Word of God.

We may conceive several men commencing the study of the Gospel. They go on equally well till they meet with a mystery,—suppose that of the incarnation. There are questions connected with this, which they will feel themselves alike incapable of solving. This circumstance will operate upon them variously, according to the various views and dispositions with which they began the study. One is presently offended. Unless this be explained to him, he will proceed no farther; for he will have nothing incomprehensible in his creed. It is obvious, that whatever object this man had in view, in commencing the study of the Gospel, he was not impelled to it by a sense of sin leading him to seek for a Saviour.

Another is disposed to stop at this point also; but it is from a very different motive. Instead of being offended at the mystery, he is delighted with it. Here is something which strongly excites his curiosity, something upon which he may dwell, which he may inquire into and talk about, and thus have all the appearance of a man deeply interested in religious questions, while his conscience remains untouched, and his heart uninfluenced. To him the mystery is highly exciting, while to all the plainer truths of the Gospel, and to all the practical importance of the mystery itself, he is entirely blind. Of this man, also, it is plain, that it was no sense of sin, no conviction of his need of a Saviour, that sent him to the study of the Bible.

But a third receives the mysterious fact simply as it is stated. He is neither so presumptuous as to deny the fact, because he cannot understand it, nor so idly vain, as to waste his time in attempting to penetrate into the secret things which belong unto the Lord. He believes the fact, because God has stated it; and he is only anxious to see how the fact bears upon the system of revealed truth, of which it forms a part, and how it bears upon his own personal interests. And this, being a legitimate subject of inquiry, he soon learns. If asked what is the use of the incarnation, he can readily give an answer. He can tell how this fact shews the fearfulness of the state into which sin has brought us, and from which no other means could set us free. He can shew how it manifests the love of God, who, when no other means could avail, spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all. In short, he can shew how every portion of revealed truth radiates from this as its central point, and how inexhaustibly rich is this fact in the communication of those truths, which make men wise unto salvation. But if he be asked how he can explain the mysterious circumstances connected with this fact, his reply is, "O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

It is obvious that this man is in earnest, and studies the Bible through no vain curiosity, but with an anxious desire to become a partaker of that salvation which is to be found there, and there alone.

Whether, then, mysteries can be considered as affording any objection to revelation; or which of these men whom we have supposed to meet with them, deals with them in the wisest manner, and with which of them he would wish to be associated, is now left to the determination of the reader.

SABAT THE ARABIAN.

BY THE REV. ROBERT M. M'CHEYNE,
Minister of St. Peter's Church, Dundee.

SABAT was the son of Ibrahim Sabat, of a noble family in Arabia, who trace their pedigree to Mahomed. Abdallah was his intimate friend, and also a young man of good family. They agreed to travel together, and to visit foreign countries. Both were zealous Mahomedans. Accordingly, after paying their adorations at the tomb of their prophet, they left Arabia, travelled through Persia, and thence to Cabul. Abdallah was appointed to an office of state under the king of Cabul, and Sabat leaving him there, proceeded on a tour through Tartary.

While Abdallah remained at Cabul, he was converted to the Christian faith by the perusal of a Bible belonging to an Armenian Christian, then residing at Cabul; for the Word of God is the sword of the Spirit. In Mahomedan countries it is death for a man of rank to become a Christian. Abdallah endeavoured, for a time, to conceal his conversion; but finding it no longer possible, he determined to flee to some of the Christian Churches near the Caspian Sea. He, accordingly, left Cabul in disguise, and had gained the great city of Bochara in Tartary, when he was met in the streets of that city by his friend Sabat, who immediately recognized him. Sabat had heard of his conversion and flight, and was filled with indignation at his conduct. Abdallah knew his danger, and threw himself at the feet of Sabat. He confessed that he was a Christian, and implored him by the sacred tie of their former friendship to let him escape with his life. "But, sir," said Sabat, when relating the story, "I had no pity. I caused my servants to seize him, and I delivered him up to Morad Shah, king of Bochara. He was sentenced to die, and a herald went through the city announcing the time of his execution. An immense multitude attended, and the chief men of the city. I also went and stood near to Abdallah. He was offered his life if he would abjure Christ, the executioner standing by him with his sword in his hand. 'No,' said he, 'I cannot abjure Christ.' Then one of his hands was cut off at the wrist. He stood firm, his arm hanging by his side, but with little motion. A physician, by desire of the king, offered to heal the wound if he would recant. He made no answer, but looked stedfastly towards heaven, like Stephen the first martyr, his eyes streaming with tears. He did not look with an eye towards me. He looked at me, but it was benignly, and with the countenance of forgiveness. His other hand was then cut off. But, sir," said Sabat in his imperfect English, "he never changed,—he never changed. And when he bowed his head to receive the stroke, all Bochara seemed to say, 'What new thing is this?'"

Sabat had hoped that Abdallah would have recanted when offered his life; but when he saw that his friend was dead he resigned himself to grief and remorse. He travelled from place to place, seeking peace, but unable to find it. At last he thought he would visit India. He accordingly came to Madras. Soon after his arrival he was appointed, by the English government, a Mufti or expounder of Mahometan law. And now the time drew near when a striking change was to take place in his own views. While he was at Visagapatam, exercising his professional duties, Providence brought in his way an Arabic New Testament. He read it with deep thought, the Koran laying before him. He compared them with patience and solicitude. And, at length, the truth of the Word fell on his mind, as he expressed it, like a flood of light. Soon after he proceeded to Madras, a journey of three hundred miles, to seek Christian baptism; and having made a public profession of his faith, he was baptised by the Rev. Dr Ker, in the English Church, by the name of Nathanael, in the 27th year of his age.

When his family in Arabia heard that he had followed the example of Abdallah, and become a Christian, they sent his brother to India to assassinate him. While Sabat was sitting in his own house at Visagapatam, his brother presented himself under the disguise of a laqueer or beggar, having a dagger concealed under his mantle. He rushed on Sabat and wounded him. But Sabat seized his arm, and his servants came to his assistance. He then recognised his brother! The assassin would have become the victim of public justice, but Sabat interceded for him, and sent him home in peace, with letters and presents to his mother's house in Arabia.

Sabat seemed now desirous to devote his life to the glory of God. He resigned his office, and came, by invitation, to Bengal, to assist in translating the Scriptures. There he published several works. His first was entitled, "Happy news for Arabia," in the common dialect of his country, containing an eloquent elucidation of the Gospel, and a narrative of his conversion.

It was in the end of the year 1807, that Sabat arrived at Dinapore, and joined himself to Henry Martyn, who was then labouring at that place. In him Mr Martyn confidently trusted that he had found a Christian brother. No sooner had he arrived than he opened to Mr Martyn the state of his mind, declaring that the constant sin which he found in his heart filled him with fear. "If the Spirit of Christ is given to believers, why," said he, "am I thus, after three years' believing? I determine every day to keep Christ crucified in sight, but soon I forget to think of him. I can rejoice when I think of God's love in Christ; but then I am like a sheep that feeds happily, whilst he looks only at the pasture before him, but when he looks behind and sees the lion he cannot eat." "His life," he said, "was of no value to him; the experience he had had of the instability of the world had weaned him from it; his heart was like a looking-glass, fit for nothing except to be given to the glass-maker to be moulded anew." It is not to be wondered that Mr Martyn believed all things, and hoped all things, concerning one who uttered, with much earnestness, such sentiments as these; so that he observed to Mr Brown, who had sent Sabat from Calcutta, that, "not to esteem him a monument of grace and to love him, is impossible."

It is true that Martyn was often grieved by the ungovernable temper of the Arabian,—often to such a degree, that he could only find relief in prayer for him. It is true, also, that the few notices we have of him in Martyn's correspondence, almost always speak, with sorrow, of his pride—his vanity—his wrath. Still, it does not appear, that during the two years in which they laboured together in translating the Scriptures, the faithful missionary was ever shaken in the good opinion which he had at first formed of him. But "the Lord seeth not as man seeth, for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart."

On 1st Oct. 1809, Martyn left Cawnpore, and came with Sabat to Calcutta. On 7th January 1811, he left the shores of India, never to return. He did not live to hear of the sad apostasy of his dearly beloved and longed for Arabian.

It was in 1815 that Sabat openly apostatised from the faith which he had so long espoused, by publishing in Calcutta, a virulent attack upon the Gospel, "denying the Lord that bought him." Calcutta rung with the intelligence,—the righteous sorrowed,—the unrighteous triumphed. Spiritual religion was derided. Native converts were suspected. Contempt was poured upon the blessed office of the missionary. But "the Lord hath made all things for himself; yea, even the wicked for the day of evil."

Sabat soon deserted Bengal for the settlement of Penang. He made an unsuccessful trading voyage to Rangoon, after which he reappeared at Penang with the wreck of his fortune. A British Officer, then a resident there, has detailed the rest of Sabat's history.*

"During his stay in this island I had the opportunity of knowing him thoroughly. I saw in him a disappointed man, uneasy, and agitated in his mind. He attributed all the distress of his soul to the grief he felt for having abandoned Christianity. He desired to receive again this holy religion, as the only means of recovering the favour of God. He declared that he had not had a moment's peace since he had published his attack upon Revelation, at the instigation of Satan,—an attack which he called his 'bad work.' He told me also that what had led him to this fatal step was the desire of revenging himself upon an individual to whom he thought an attack upon Christianity would be more painful than any personal injury. But he had no sooner executed this detestable project, he added, than he felt a horror of the action, and now he only valued his life that he might be able to undo the pernicious tendency of his book, which he thought would be great in Mahometan countries. He never spoke of Mr Martyn without the most profound respect, and shed tears of grief whenever he recalled how severely he had tried the patience of that faithful servant of God. He mentioned several anecdotes to shew with what extraordinary sweetness Martyn had borne his numerous provocations. 'He was less a man,' he said, 'than an angel from heaven.'

His apostasy had excited much observation in the East. There appeared in the Penang Gazette an article which announced the arrival and the opinions of this famous person, but which expressed the apprehension that was generally entertained of his sincerity. Sabat had no sooner read this article than he himself wrote to the Editor. He affirmed that he did indeed profess Christianity anew, and that it was his intention to consecrate the remainder of his days to the advancement of this holy religion in the world. In conformity with these declarations, rather than lodge with a Mahometan, he went to stay at the house of an Armenian Christian, named Johannes, a respectable merchant who had known him at the time of his baptism at Madras. While there, he every evening read and expounded the Scriptures, to the great satisfaction of his host, who was a very worthy man, but very inferior to Sabat in talents and knowledge of the Scriptures. In this last respect I imagine few men have surpassed Sabat.

But, in spite of these promising appearances, he continued to frequent the Mosque, where he worshipped, indiscriminately, with all the other Mahometans. In defence of this conduct, he cited the example of Nicodemus, who, although a disciple of Jesus, persevered in the public profession of Judaism. Sometimes he reviewed the arguments in favour of Mahometanism, as if to display his talents in defending a thesis which was manifestly untenable; but soon confessed, though with manifest repugnance, that Mahometanism only owed its success to fraud and violence, and that Mahomet himself deserved no better name than that of an impostor.

During his stay at Penang this island was visited by Jouhuroolalim, king of Acheen, a neighbouring state in the island of Sumatra. A number of his subjects, disgusted with their prince, had invited Hosyn, a rich merchant of Penang, who had some pretensions to the throne, to come and help them to depose Jouhuroolalim. Hosyn, advanced in years, made over his family claims to his son, who, under the name of Syfoolalim, (or 'sword of the universe,') went to Acheen. The king, reduced to extremity, appeared at Penang, in order to procure arms and provisions. Sabat offered his services, with no other end, as he assured me, than to attempt the introduction of Christianity among the Acheenois. His imposing manners,—his reputation as a man of talents,—and the high esteem which Indian nations have for Arabian auxiliaries, procured him a favourable reception with the Malay king. Sabat accompanied him to Acheen, gained such an ascendancy, as to manage all public affairs, and was regarded by his adversaries as the greatest obstacle to their final triumph. But, as months rolled away, and the issue of the struggle appeared doubtful and distant, Sabat resolved to retire. Whilst occupied in effecting his retreat, he fell into the hands of Syfoolalim, who gave orders that he should be strictly imprisoned on board a vessel.

From this prison-house Sabat wrote several notes to Johannes and me, calling on us to observe, that it was with his own blood that he had traced the characters, his enemies refusing him the usual materials. In these notes, written some in Persian, the others in bad English, he recited his sufferings, which he wished us to consider as the consequence of his attachment to Christianity, and that he was in some sense a martyr. In addressing himself to me, Sabat hoped to obtain the intervention of Government in his favour; as, however, he was not a British subject, he was disappointed in his expectation. Without loss of time I made use of my private influence with Hosyn, to ameliorate the captivity of Sabat, if I could not procure his enlargement. All that I could obtain was a promise that his life should be held sacred,—that Hosyn would write to his son not to make any attempt against it, and that he would mitigate the sufferings of his captivity. Whether the request of the father never reached the son, or whether the latter was only embittered against Sabat, by these efforts in his favour, cannot be known, but I had not the success I desired; and some time after, we learned that the days of the unfortunate captive had been violently terminated by a frightful death; it was tied up in a sack and thrown into the sea!"

Thus lived and thus died the apostate Sabat. Let us learn three lessons from the eventful history.

1. Let us learn to expect from the labours of our Missionaries no more than Scripture and experience warrant us to expect. In apostolic times there was a Judas who accompanied with the twelve all the time that the Lord Jesus went out and in among them, and remained altogether unsuspected up to that very night, when Jesus said, "Verily I say unto you that one of you shall betray me; and they were exceeding sorrowful, and began every one of them to say unto him, Lord, is it I?" There was a Simon Magus who seemed to believe, and was baptised, and continued with Philip, yet his "heart was not right with God," and he became the bitterest of the Gospel's enemies. There was a Hymenaeus, and a Philetus, and an Alexander the Coppersmith, who, though at one time esteemed members of the Christian Church, yet became opposers, and, "concerning the faith, made shipwreck." There was a Demas, of whom, though twice recorded among the saints, yet it is written, "Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world."

And now, among ourselves, what is the experience of every faithful minister of Christ? Is it not that many who once "did run well," have been as it were "bewitched," and "soon removed unto another Gospel, which is not another?" Is it not that many who seemed to have "escaped the pollutions of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour, have been again entangled therein, and the latter end has been worse with them than the beginning?"

Why then shall we expect different results from the labours of our Missionaries? Is human nature different in India from what it is and has been in other parts of the world? Or shall we demand from the godly men who have gone to preach Christ among the heathen, a penetration in reading the hearts of men, which was not granted even to apostles?

If God shall indeed bless the labours of our Missionaries with an abundant harvest, more full and rich than we have either asked or thought, still let us form our expectations, tutored by Scripture and experience, and we shall not be greatly amazed as if some strange thing happened unto us, when many who are called disciples go back and walk no more with Jesus.

2. Let us learn to cleave all the faster to the Lord Jesus. If others fall away, it is because they only seemed to be cleaving to Christ, and did not really cleave to him. Let us make sure that we cleave to him. "They went out from us, but they were not of us, for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us, but they went out that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us."

Just as when one vessel makes shipwreck, every wary Captain is made tenfold more vigilant than before, examines to see that all his timbers are sure, his cordage and his anchors strong,—so let every falling away of those who seemed to be like minded, make us look more anxiously to our own souls, that all our moorings are secure, and our anchor indeed within the veil. When others are offended and walk no more with Jesus, may we hear the gentle voice of the Saviour saying to us, "Will ye also go away?" And may our inmost heart reply, "Lord, to whom shall we go?"

3. Let us learn the awful vengeance of God upon apostasy. It is written of such men, "They bring upon themselves swift destruction." Of Judas we are told that when he saw that Jesus was condemned, he "went and hanged himself;" and "falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out." Of Ananias and Sapphira, who were arrested on the way to the crime of apostasy, we are told that they fell down at the apostles' feet, and yielded up the ghost. Of Sabat, the apostate Arabian, we have seen that he was tied up in a sack and cast into the sea.

And O! if God's judgments upon them be so dreadful, even in this life, who can imagine the doom that waits them in the world beyond the grave, when "fearfulness shall surprise the hypocrites." These are "wandering stars to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever."

HEBREW GLEANINGS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT SIMPSON, A. M.,

Minister of Kintore.

No. I.

THE SABBATH.

THE Sabbath forms a prominent and very remarkable feature in the system of Hebrew institutions; and several ancient Pagan historians advert to it, as one of their national peculiarities. Ever since the promulgation of the ten commandments at Mount Sinai, that is, during a period of about 3300 years, the seventh day has been observed by the Israelites, as a stated season of holy rest and religious worship. Its sacredness, in virtue of a divine appointment, was guarded by the most solemn sanctions. At no subsequent time has the outward observance of it been wholly intermitted by that interesting people. In the best and purest days of Israel's history, its weekly return was hailed with delight; and the profanation of it was looked upon and punished as an aggravated crime.

But while the solemn publication of the decalogue evidently gave a more definite form to the ordinance of the Sabbath, and imposed new obligations to keep it holy, does not the fourth commandment itself contain sufficient proof, that its origin belonged to an earlier period? The terms by which that commandment is introduced, "Remember the Sabbath-day," plainly shew, that it was not then proposed or mentioned for the first time. The casual previous notice of it, in connection with the gathering of the manna, does not explain this marked reference to a former announcement and recognition of its sanctity. And the concluding sentence of the same commandment distinctly assigns a special reason for the consecration of the seventh day, carrying us back to the creation of the world, as the occasion of its original appointment to a sacred use. "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it." The notion of some writers, that what is said concerning the Sabbath, in the second chapter of Genesis, ought to be understood by way of anticipation, is exceedingly unsatisfactory, and wholly inconsistent with the usual plainness of Scripture language; while the opposite and commonly received opinion is supported by Jewish writers generally, and especially, by the authority of Josephus, whose words are: "God rested on the seventh day, and ceased from his labours. This is the reason that we do no work upon that day, but give it the name of Sabbath, which, in the Hebrew, betokens rest."

Specious doubts, however, have been started on the subject, grounded chiefly on the silence of the Scriptures. To these doubts it might almost be enough to reply, that even the entire absence of all reference to the Sabbath, during the period in question, would not conclusively prove that it was neither known nor observed by the patriarchs who flourished before and after the flood. For allowing to the argument its greatest possible weight, surely it could never subvert the positive evidence already adduced, namely, the solemn institution by the Creator when he rested from his work on the seventh day, and the explicit reference to that institution in the decalogue. But is it the case, that no allusion to the Sabbath can be found in the sacred narrative, from the creation to the giving of the law? To some of the ablest biblical critics it has appeared highly probable, that "the end of days," spoken of as the time when Cain and Abel brought their respective offerings to the Lord, is to be understood as denoting the termination of the week; though others, of equal ability it must be admitted, have suggested, that the yearly ingathering of the fruits of the earth may be there meant. Again, it has been thought that an allusion to the religious observances of the Sabbath may be discovered in the beginning of the book of Job, which confessedly belongs to the patriarchal times, where it is stated, that "the sons of God," a form of expression peculiar to primeval antiquity, "presented themselves before the Lord." Far greater weight, however, seems to be due, on this point, to the fact, that the division of time into portions of seven days obtained as early as the deluge. "And he (Noah) stayed yet other seven days, and again sent forth the dove out of the ark: and the dove came in to him in the evening, and lo, in her mouth, was an olive leaf plucked off. So Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth. And he stayed yet other seven days, and sent forth the dove, which returned not again to him any more." Why seven rather than any other number of days? unless we suppose that the mode of reckoning by weeks was then observed. And if this supposition be correct, the practice, doubtless, had its origin in the example of the divine procedure at the creation, there being no process in nature to suggest it, as in the case of day and night, and the revolution of the seasons. The quarters of the moon would neither be an exact nor an obvious guide in the matter. The same circumstance appears to have influenced the conduct of Laban, though, perhaps, more indirectly, when he said, "Fulfil her week, and we will give thee this also, for the service which thou shalt serve with me yet seven years. And Jacob did so, and fulfilled her week; and he gave him Rachel, his daughter, to wife also." The term week here, according to the best authorities, is to be interpreted, not as indicating the seven additional years of Jacob's servitude, but as having reference solely to the seven days of the customary marriage festival. And to the naturally recurring question, Why seven days? the same answer only can be returned. Do not these facts clearly involve an acquaintance with the Sabbath? For would it not imply something very wonderful, to suppose the men of these ages to have retained the knowledge of the division of time into such periods, and yet to have lost all remembrance of the seventh day's rest.

It has, moreover, been maintained by various authors well conversant with antiquity, that traces, however faint, of the original institution of the Sabbath, are discernible in the writings of several ancient heathens. The seventh day is certainly spoken of by some of them as being distinguished from other days. One calls it the illustrious light of the sun; and another styles it sacred or holy. Josephus, in his answer to Apion, hints at the same fact, but appears to refer it to a more recent source. "Nay, such is the reputation," says that historian, "we have had a long time in the world for our piety and good government, that there is hardly any nation, either Greek or barbarian, that does not live in some sort of conformity to our example, either in the observation of our seventh day's Sabbath, the use of lamps, the celebration of fasts, abstinence from such and such certain meats." May not the conformity here alleged, however, have had its origin, as to some points, in traditional remains of a primeval revelation? It is, indeed, highly improbable, that Pagans, who affected to despise the Hebrews, would have directly adopted their rites and institutions. And if any nation of remote antiquity can be supposed to have possessed from tradition a knowledge of the Sabbath, the Egyptians, above all others, were likely to be acquainted with it. And if so, one obvious reply would be furnished to the insidious question, Did their Egyptian taskmasters allow the Hebrews to rest from their labours on the Sabbath? Should the opposite ground be taken, that no such institution existed in Egypt, a ready answer may yet be given. To say nothing of the immunities granted to the Israelites on their settlement in the land of Ham, might not a sense of their own interest, founded upon the beneficial effects of the weekly repose on the health of their slaves, or the yearnings of humanity, have, for a time at least, reasonably enough induced their oppressors to yield their acquiescence? But, even should the negative view be insisted on, namely, that it was a part of the cruel policy pursued towards the oppressed race, altogether to deny them any periodical respite from their arduous toil, still no real difficulty stands in the way. If the children of Israel acted from constraint in the matter, no proof can hence be derived that they had forgotten the God of their fathers, or ceased to regard the Sabbath as holy. May not rather the deprivation of its sacred exercises and observances, to which they were subjected, have constituted no inconsiderable part of the grievances under which they groaned, and from the intolerable pressure of which they so earnestly cried to God for deliverance? Of this we are certain, that the plea urged by Moses, when he petitioned Pharaoh to let the people go, expressly was, that they might observe, without restraint, the rites of their religion in the wilderness.

The alleged discrepancy between Exod. xx. 11, and Deut. v. 15, is merely apparent. In these two passages, the observance of the Sabbath is enforced by two different but perfectly consistent motives; the one drawn from the original consecration of the seventh day, the other from the occasion on which the institution was publicly and solemnly revived after a period of greater or less neglect of it.

The rest of the Sabbath, when observed most strictly, according to its original intention, was prepared for with seriousness and care. A portion of the preceding day was set apart for the purpose, and called the preparation. In accordance with the general method of computing time in use among the Hebrews, the seventh day began at sunset the previous night, and it lasted twenty-four hours. "From evening to evening shall ye celebrate the Sabbath." It was entirely devoted to religious purposes, though works of necessity and mercy were not forbidden. Prayer, meditation, and the reading and study of the sacred writings, formed the principal employment. A burnt-offering of two lambs was added to the daily sacrifice; the shew-bread was also changed. The work of creation was called to grateful remembrance, and the Omnipotent Creator reverently adored. Thanksgivings were devoutly offered up for all blessings received. National mercies were solemnly commemorated, and, in particular, the deliverance from Egyptian bondage; while from the recollection of that deliverance, and from other motives to benevolence, feelings of charity and goodwill were cherished and exemplified. In such exercises, especially in their "holy convocations" or public assemblies, the pious Israelites engaged with devout fervour, and derived from them the greatest delight. "This is the day," exclaimed David exultingly, "this is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it." In order that their minds might be entirely disentangled from secular affairs, all work was suspended, and a moderate abstinence observed till sunset, after which it seems to have been customary to partake, with temperate and social freedom, of choice viands, and to exercise hospitality. Even travelling was limited to the small distance of two thousand cubits, or something less than a mile—the extent of the Sabbath-day's journey. The rigour with which a total cessation from worldly pursuits of business or of pleasure was enforced, has often been animadverted on as extreme and unnecessary. And the punishment of death, inflicted for disobedience, was, doubtless, severe in the last degree. This penalty, however, is not awarded in the fourth commandment; and we have no reason to think that any, except the most flagrant and impious breaches of the Sabbath, were visited with its infliction. But in considering these circumstances, with the view either to praise or blame, it ought always to be carefully remembered that the situation of the Israelites, as a chosen people, was very peculiar. Every act of resistance to the divine authority on their part, implied direct audacious rebellion against the Most High, as their King, as well as their God; and being committed in the face of the most signal manifestations of his visible miraculous interposition, became highly aggravated. The great object of their separation from the other kindreds of mankind, was to preserve alive on the earth the knowledge and worship of the true God, so as to prepare the way for the Gospel dispensation. All the means employed for these ends, therefore, must have been vastly important. And since the prevalence of idolatry was so inveterate and extensive around them, and their proneness to fall into it so strong, the most rigorous checks were, humanly speaking, absolutely requisite.

As general corruption, however, grew up and spread among the ancient Hebrews, the neglect and desecration of the Sabbath ensued. They began to account it, as well as other parts of divine service, a weariness, saying in their hearts, "When will it be gone, that we may buy and sell and get gain,—that we may set forth wheat, making the ephah small and the shekel great, and falsifying the balances by deceit?" But it happened in this, as in many points of their religious declension, that the judgment of God, in the captivity, at length produced a salutary change. They never, after that calamitous event, relapsed into grossly idolatrous practices; neither did they, in general, again fail to manifest external respect for the Sabbath. That great national catastrophe was sent upon them, in part, as the punishment of their former remissness in reference to the duties of the seventh day; and the awful miseries they endured under it, and in consequence of it, had the proper effect, though not immediately, as we learn from Nehemiah's grievous complaint, yet eventually, to the extent, at least, of outward reformation.

But while they henceforth clung, with immovable stiffness, to the form of the institution, they seem still, in too many cases, to have misunderstood or disregarded its holy design. In this, as in numberless other instances, we may see, exhibited in their conduct, the tendency there is in human nature to rest in the mere formal observance of a religious ordinance, and to lose sight of the important moral object it was intended to promote. Spiritual homage, proceeding from a lowly and submissive frame of mind, is a far costlier sacrifice to flesh and blood than any amount of bodily service; and the unrenewed heart would always gladly compound for the deficiency of the one by the abundance of the other. Under the strongest operation of this bias the Jews of later ages appear to have acted. They sought to render the burden of their ceremonial observances, in every branch, altogether intolerable. They racked invention to multiply minute directions for the scrupulous keeping, rather than the godly sanctification, of the Sabbath. But these generally referred to points of the most frivolous description. It was enjoined to avoid walking upon grass so as to bruise it, because that partook of the nature of threshing, according to the ancient oriental process of treading out the corn. It was forbidden to kill even a troublesome insect, because such an act was a species of hunting. Such unmeaning and absurd prohibitions, when attended to, would often unavoidably interfere with the discharge of duties of the highest importance, in a religious and moral point of view.

This pharisaical tendency to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel had reached an almost incredible pitch in the days of our Lord. His disciples were censured for plucking the ears of corn on the seventh day, though suffering from hunger, on the ground that by so doing they virtually engaged in the operation of reaping. And Christ himself, when he mercifully healed the sick on the Sabbath, was condemned under the pretext, so precise was their code of rules, that the diseases he cured were chronic and not acute, that is, of a long standing and lingering, not of a severely painful or suddenly fatal kind. Our Saviour, on all these occasions, expressed his marked disapprobation of such trifling and preposterous distinctions. He reminded the Jews of what had taken place in a purer age of their Church. He directed their attention to an incident in the history of David, which, viewed in a strict light, implied a much greater violation of the divine commandment than the act of his followers, and yet was vindicated on the same plea of necessity. He also referred them to some of the more servile functions of the priestly office, which were regularly performed in the temple on the Sabbath-day. In reference to this subject, he charged their rulers and teachers with hypocrisy. He accused them of making void the law by their traditions. But in all his remarks he chiefly inculcated the great principle, "that mercy is better than sacrifice."

The same important truth is incidentally taught, though the lesson be somewhat quaintly expressed, in the following tale from Hurwitz's Collection: "Rabbi Tan-chum was once asked whether it was allowable to extinguish a candle on the Sabbath, in case it incommoded a sick person? 'What a question you ask!' replied the Rabbi, 'True you call a burning candle a light, so is the soul of man; nay, it is called a heavenly light. Is it not better to extinguish an earthly light, than a heavenly light?' " Whatever else might have been implied in this rabbinical illustration, it surely teaches, even from Jewish lips, "That the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath."

The strictness with which the Jews observed the rest of the Sabbath frequently operated to their disadvantage when engaged in war; and on many occasions did their regard for its sanctity expose them to disasters which might otherwise have been avoided. In some cases they declined even to defend themselves against the attacks of their enemies, on the Sabbath-day. "A memorable instance of this is recorded in the first book of the Maccabees. "Now, when it was told the king's servants, and the host that was at Jerusalem, in the city of David, that certain men who had broken the king's commandment,"—(the impious mandate of the cruel and profane Antiochus,)—"were gone down into the secret places in the wilderness, they pursued after them, a great number, and having overtaken them, they camped against them, and made war against them on the Sabbath-day. And they said unto them, let that which ye have done hitherto suffice; come forth and do according to the commandment of the king, and you shall live. But they said, we will not come forth, neither will we do the king's commandment, to profane the Sabbath-day. So then they gave them battle with all speed. Howbeit they answered them not, neither cast they a stone at them, nor stopped the places where they lay hid; but said, let us die all in our innocency: heaven and earth shall testify for us, that you put us to death wrongfully. So they rose up against them in battle on the Sabbath, and they slew them with their wives and children, and their cattle, to the number of a thousand people." The adversaries of the Jews having thus taken such fatal advantage of their sacred regard for the Sabbath, the practice was henceforth changed, and the law so explained as to admit of self-defence on the seventh day; but it was still considered unlawful to attempt any act that had the least appearance of aggressive warfare.

In concluding these cursory remarks, we shall briefly advert to three points intimately connected with the subject; the changes of the day of rest and religious worship among Christians; the vast importance of the Sabbath, and its typical import.

1. Some have contended that, though the Sabbath was not a new institution, yet as a new computation of time was adopted by the Israelites when they left Egypt, an alteration of the day took place; that is to say, the Sabbath of Eden and the seventh day, which the Hebrews were commanded at Sinai to keep holy, were not the same. And in order that some use might be made of this theory, which has been plausibly defended, it is alleged that the first day of the week, as observed by the Christian Church, is more likely than any other to coincide with the Sabbath of paradise. The dedication of that day to the sun, by some of the ancient heathens, which is no doubt a very remarkable fact, has been adduced in the shape of a proof. And the circumstance that, in many instances, the rites of the Hebrews seem to have been purposely varied from those of the idolatrous nations, by which they were surrounded, might also be made available, more especially, as the Sabbath was said to be a sign between God and his chosen people. Upon such arguments, however, we here place but little stress. Much better reasons can be assigned for the change. He who is "Lord also of the Sabbath" had power to alter the day of its observance. His inspired apostles certainly changed it with his evident sanction. All things connected with the Sabbath that had peculiar reference to the ancient economy ceased to be in force when that dispensation closed, and yet the spirit of the institution is in nowise essentially affected by the alteration. And surely the first day of the week, the day on which our Saviour burst the barriers of the tomb, ought to be peculiarly sacred in the eyes of his believing followers; because on it his divine mission received its most convincing seal, the happy result of his atonement was signally manifested to the world by his rising again for our justification, and a gracious pledge was thus given of our resurrection.

2. So obvious is the beneficial tendency of a Sabbatical rest, considered merely in reference to the interests of this life, that the institution of it might well be advocated on pure grounds of philanthropy. Men who have differed widely as to the origin of the Sabbath, agree as to the expediency of such an appointment. It affords a salutary respite to the labourer from his toils; it forms a breathing time from the harassing cares and anxieties of business; it provides, and was expressly intended to provide, a period of repose to that part of the brute creation which man has subjected to the yoke. The stated return of its holy calm, seems necessary for maintaining in healthful operation all the springs of life and action among civilized men. But it serves yet a higher end. It is a religious ordinance; and the opportunities it gives of attending to spiritual and divine things, constitute its chief value. But for it, how could the care of the soul, and the all-important concerns of eternity, be adequately secured to the great body of mankind? Besides, when duties of a spiritual nature are left to be performed at whatever time men please, or find convenient, they are seldom attended to with due regularity and effect. The manner in which the Christian Sabbath is observed in countries professing Christianity, is justly considered a fair criterion of the state of religion in them. And the same test is equally applicable to families and individuals. How anxious then should all professors of the Gospel be to guard the sanctity of the Lord's day, and improve to the utmost the inestimable privileges it brings!

3. The Sabbath, however, may be viewed under yet another aspect. Both the Psalmist and the Apostle of the Gentiles, regarded it as, directly or indirectly, symbolical of a future and more perfect repose. The latter, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, reasons fully and conclusively on the subject. Many Jewish writers, too, inculcate similar sentiments. And does not this consideration tend to confirm the opinion of those, who look upon it as strictly binding on Christians, according to the Christian mode of observance, in opposition to the lax notions of some who deny its moral and perpetual obligation? There is certainly no reason why a type of heaven's blessedness, so appropriate and edifying, should exist under one dispensation and not under the other. May it not, therefore, be affirmed as truly of the Lord's day, as of the Hebrew Sabbath, that it is a fit emblem of the heavenly state,—the rest that remaineth to the people of God?

THE SORROWS OF IDOLATERS:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM STARK,

“Their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another god.”—PSALM xvi. 4.

FROM whatever cause, it is found in universal experience, that the pursuit of happiness, in which all mankind are engaged, partakes of the nature of a struggle. Independently of the loose, inadequate, and erroneous conceptions on the main object of desire which are generally prevalent among all ranks and classes, there are many obstructions perpetually arising which must be overcome,—causes of annoyance that must be removed,—sources of vexation and sorrow that must be shut up, ere the most sanguine aspirant can come within sight of what he conceives the supreme good of his nature.

It is on this account, deeply to be deplored, that it is so difficult to bring mankind to entertain correct notions on a subject so closely connected with their highest interests.

Amidst the crowd, however, who appear so utterly reckless of their most important concerns, it is encouraging to think, that there are here and there persons to be found, whom the mercy and grace of God has happily brought to a different mind, and who are prepared to testify, not merely the vexations, and disappointments, and sorrows with which they were continually beset, while they followed the course of this world, but the substantial and permanent joy they have since found in pursuing a different line. Now, as it is the great object of the ministry of the Word of God, combined with the operations of his providence, to bring thoughtless sinners back from their wanderings, and guide their steps into that path which can alone conduct them to true happiness, there is no reason to despair of any one who has not made up his mind to repel all the counsels of heavenly wisdom.

With the view of obtaining so blessed a result, I would, looking for the indispensable influences of the Holy Spirit, earnestly solicit your serious and candid attention to the declaration and resolution of the Psalmist, as expressed in the words of the text, “Their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another god.”

I. To the question which naturally presents itself, who those are over whom this fearful denunciation is suspended, “their sorrows shall be multiplied,” how various are the answers which different classes of mankind might be disposed to give! A very numerous class, we fear, would, without hesitation, pronounce that those are chiefly to be commiserated, who meet with what are generally called reverses of fortune, whose secular resources for show, or sensual gratification, are expended, or who, by loss of health, have lost all capacity for enjoying them. There are others who, if they allow moral considerations to enter into the determination of this question, may be disposed to say, that those are sowing the seeds of a very wretched harvest, who indulge in any of those gross and scandalous vices, which are either subversive of the peace and order of civil society, or which notoriously commit the most dreadful havoc on personal and domestic comfort. Now, in the last, there is a great deal of truth, for it is utterly incontrovertible, that as vice is inseparably connected with misery, so there are some kinds of it in which the mischievous consequences are more speedily and palpably evolved than in others. But how little are many, even of the professors of Christianity, prepared to trace the monstrous evil to its source! And yet while this is not done, we hold that nothing is done to any good purpose. Who then, we again ask, are those who, in the estimate of David, as the type and representative of the Messiah, are regarded as having their sorrows multiplied? The answer is plain; those who “hasten after another god.” Though the term “god” is not expressly stated in the original language, there can be no doubt that the ellipsis is properly supplied by our translators, for the allusion to the rule of religious worship, in the conclusion of the verse, sufficiently shews that there could be nothing else in the mind of the sacred writer. We are thus impressively reminded, that there is but One, the fountain and the centre of being,—One for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, the great and exclusive object of religious homage, and joyful confidence to all his holy and rational creatures. But when man, in the perversity of his fallen nature, lost the knowledge of the only living and true God, he was given up to a reprobate mind, by which he transferred the homage of his supreme regards to others, and placed his confidence in a multitude of subordinate and imaginary beings, representations of which he formed with his own hands, and bowing down to them, said, "Ye are our gods."

With this extraordinary infatuation, which may be ready to fill us with astonishment, it is not merely the more brutal and uncivilized part of mankind that have been chargeable. Never did the monstrous evil prevail to a greater extent than among the refined and philosophical Greeks and Romans, who were accustomed to speak of every other nation by the name of Barbarians; and, with the exception of one little family, whom all the rest of the world had learned to despise or abhor, the whole world had received into its creed, absurdities fit to make the most illiterate Christian blush. And even in regard to that little nation, separated, as they were, from the rest of the world, with the express design of maintaining the knowledge and wisdom of the only true God, it is very humiliating to reflect, that never did the perverse tendency of the human race, towards a state of complete alienation from Him, appear in so affecting a light, as in their perpetual proneness to lapse into the idolatrous practices of those that hated and despised them. "Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods? but my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit. Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid, be ye very desolate, saith the Lord, for my people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water."

That there is something analogous to this in the disposition with which idolaters, in every age, have been accustomed to pursue after the strange gods which they made for themselves, we have, to this very day, a striking evidence in the splendid monuments of the temples erected to their worship; and in the still more humiliating fact, that the Jews, as the peculiar people of God, when they became mad upon their idols, are expressly charged with having shed the blood of their own offspring in their honour; for it is expressly recorded, "Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils, and shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan: and the land was polluted with blood."—Ps. cvi. 37, 38.

But some may be disposed to say, what is all this to us? What have we, in this Christian land, to do with idols and idolatry? We can feel at once amazed and mortified, in contemplating the costly and splendid monuments which the most refined nations of antiquity had erected to the honour of their imaginary deities. We can shudder at the diabolical rites by which the smiling innocent, clinging to the hand of its parent, was thrown into the fire, in honour of Moloch. But, besides giving scope to the ordinary feelings of humanity at a spectacle so revolting, what else have we to do with idols and idolatry?

Forgive me, my brethren, if I venture to say you may have a great deal more to do with this subject than you are well aware of. We are informed, in the prophecies of Ezekiel, that when the elders of Israel came to that venerable man, with the professed design of being instructed in their duty, and were, perhaps, as much as we, prepared to say, of such gross idolatry, as had brought ruin on their country, "we are delivered from all these abominations," he was enabled to penetrate the disguise under which they tried to conceal themselves; and with the dauntless and faithful spirit of a prophet that had no other fear than the fear of God, charged them with having set up their idols in their hearts. The expression is very remarkable, and deserves our most serious consideration. We are reminded by it, that idolatry does not so much consist in forming a graven, or a molten image, before which we prostrate our bodies in the exercise of religious homage, as in the giving to any object, be it what it may, that place in the affections, which the only living and true God ought exclusively to occupy. So that, in point of fact, while we have as little fellowship with the Church of Rome, in trusting to the mediation of saints and angels, as we have with the ancient heathens, in prostrating ourselves before a statue of Dagon or Jupiter, we may no less be hastening after another god, by giving to any creature, real or imaginary, the homage of our supreme regards, in which, I conceive, the very essence of religious worship consists. An inspired apostle expressly testifies, that covetousness is idolatry; and an inordinate love of wealth, is described by another apostle, by a hastening to be rich. From whatever cause, it cannot be denied, that the eager pursuit of the world, in whatever shape it may present itself, may be regarded as the idol which has successfully mounted the throne which the Creator, Preserver, and Redeemer of his people had set up for himself. And will it be pretended, that this is at all an uncommon occurrence? Alas! we have only to look around, to be satisfied how full of such idolaters this world is. Only see how keen the devotee of the riches, the honours, or the pleasures of life, is in the pursuit of the object, call it what you will, on which he has supremely set his heart. Think how it engrosses his thoughts by night and by day. How insensibly and irresistibly it regulates the train of associated ideas! At what sacrifice of time, of health, even of moral obligation, it is incessantly pursued! Let no one be offended at the plainness and fidelity with which we are constrained to speak out on this subject. There is not one of us, who is not by nature thus inclined to "hasten after another god." The human mind necessarily feels its own weakness, and the insufficiency of its own resources. It must have something extraneous to lean upon. If the living God, the only proper stay and confidence of the creation,—if the living God be forsaken, some other god must, of necessity, be sought and resorted to. And, alas, a very superficial glance may suffice to satisfy any candid inquirer, at how low a rate the true God is estimated, even amongst his professed worshippers. Were it otherwise, should we have so much reason to complain of the neglect of ordinances and of the miserable pleas sustained for such neglect? It is no less humiliating to think, with what little heart and spirit the ordinances of Christianity are attended, when not altogether neglected. Then the thoughts and affections of the professed worshipper are often flowing in a different channel; and the consequence is, while all is life, and warmth, and energy in the concerns of secular business, or social amusement, every thing is cold and lifeless in regard to the concerns of the soul and the interests of eternity. Let us then proceed,

II. To consider the wretchedness and the fruitlessness of the pursuits of those who "hasten after another god." It is said, "their sorrows shall be multiplied." The worshippers of the living God may have sorrows,—they must have sorrows,—they are a salutary part of the discipline of their Father's house. These, however, are susceptible of many mitigations, and what is best of all, they are paving the way to a state of being, in which there shall be no sorrow. But, oh, how fearful it is to think of a state of unmitigated, overwhelming, everlasting woe; and yet why should we hesitate, from miscalculating views of humanity, to pronounce that such must be the portion of the cup of those who forget, and forsake, and prefer a rival to God in their affection? "Their sorrows shall be multiplied, that hasten after another god."

In illustration of this declaration, we may observe, that those who observe lying vanities, forsake their own mercies. Who that allows himself to think on this subject with any degree of seriousness at all, will venture to dispute that the Author of our Being, by the beneficent care of whose providence we are continually sustained and blessed, must himself be the exhaustless fountain of happiness? It were discreditable to the wisdom of the divine plans, to suppose that a creature like man, formed after the image of his Maker, and endowed with capacities for holding communion with his Maker, should find his supreme good in any thing subordinate, be it what it may. The Bible speaks of a fulness of joy being in the presence of God. In the smile of his countenance is life,—his loving kindness is better than life. Angels find it so. Adam in paradise found it so. Redeemed and glorified saints shall find it so in the celestial paradise for ever. This being the case, he must be the only wise man who, amidst the manifold infirmities inseparable from the present state, is enabled, like David, to follow hard after God; and who, thankful for creature enjoyments as the bounty of His hand, does not allow the dearest and the best of them to usurp the throne of his affections. How different must the case of such a man be, even in the most unfavourable circumstances, from that of him "who, hastening after another God," does, by the deliberate act of his own froward mind, shut himself out from what can alone yield to it satisfying and permanent felicity. Even one of the two great evils which, we have already seen, was charged upon the idolatrous Israelites, namely, the forsaking the fountain of living waters, is sufficient of itself to accumulate, on an immortal mind constituted like that of man, a flood of sorrows; and were there no more than such an exclusion, it is impossible not to commiserate the condition of the foolish virgins, who, during the celebration of the marriage festival, had the door shut upon them, leaving them in outer darkness.

But let us not forget that there is a counterpart to the great evil of forsaking the fountain of living waters. Every spiritual idolater heweth out to himself broken cisterns which can hold no water. There is a capacity in the human mind, framed in the likeness of its Maker, which no creature enjoyments can possibly fill. Even if we might be allowed to suppose, that the infatuated man who dethrones the living God from his affections in favour of a rival, never fails to secure the object of his desire to the extent, and beyond the extent, which the most sanguine imagination ever suggested, still it would be found, there is a void which the idol cannot fill, in virtue of which, the poor deluded and wretched wanderer becomes restless, peevish, fretful, and is often tempted to throw away the bauble, in the pursuit of which he had spent his best years and wasted his most valuable energies.

We must notice farther, however, that in supposing that the man "who hastens after another god," may attain the object of his pursuit to the extent of his desires, we suppose what never has happened, and never can now happen. He is grasping a shadow, which, at the moment when it appears most within his reach, vanishes into air. Though, therefore, it is not necessary to our present argument to insist, that the individual who gives the world the homage of his supreme regards, can have no kind, or degree, of enjoyment in the pursuit of his idol,—that enjoyment must be liable to perpetual interruption from the collision of opposite interests, and the constant occurrence of cross accidents, over which his sagacity and power can exercise no control. So that, judging by the ordinary course of things, little else than sorrow must be the portion of that man's cup, who, having forsaken the true God, has,

But we would not be doing justice to such a man, were there but one such present, if we left our argument here. We must apprise him, that the true God is no unconcerned spectator of what is going on among his alienated subjects. Jealousy of his own lofty prerogative in this affair, is expressly stated as the great leading reason annexed to that commandment in the decalogue which forbids idolatry, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image." In the exercise of that jealousy, he poured forth his wrath on the earth contaminated by the disaffection of our first parents, and under the tremendous effects of his curse, the whole creation, from that day to the present hour, has never ceased to groan. The earth, faithful to the bidding of her affronted and injured Lord, has never ceased to bring forth briars and thorns, that the alienated worshipper may eat his bread in the sweat of his brow and in bitter sorrow, till he returns to the dust from which he was taken. The effect of the controversy, when pleaded with particular nations, was strikingly expressed in the judgment denounced against Egypt on that memorable night when the angel of destruction passed through the land. "Against all the gods of Egypt," said Jehovah, "will I execute judgment." But nowhere has the displeasure of Jehovah been more remarkably manifested against the estrangement we are at present considering, than in his conduct towards those who were taken into covenant with himself; and this may shew what we professed Christians have reason to expect if we follow the same course. It is thus written, "They provoked him to anger with their high places, and moved him to jealousy with their graven images. When God heard this, he was wroth, and greatly abhorred Israel."—Psalm lxxviii. 58, 59. We may be permitted, to the same purpose, to quote a passage from the song of Moses: "He forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the rock of his salvation. They provoked him to jealousy with strange gods, with abominations provoked they him to anger. They sacrificed unto devils, not to God; to gods whom they knew not, to new gods that came newly up, whom your fathers feared not. Of the rock that begat thee thou art unmindful, and hast forgotten God that formed thee. And when the Lord saw it, he abhorred them, because of the provoking of his sons and of his daughters. And he said, I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be; for they are a very forward generation, children in whom is no faith. They have moved me to jealousy with that which is not God; they have provoked me to anger with their vanities; and I will move them to jealousy with those which are not a people; I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation. For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains. I will heap mischiefs upon them; I will spend mine arrows upon them."—Deut. xxxii. 15-23.

Now, my brethren, give me leave to ask, in conclusion, what you think must be the condition of those of whom these things are spoken? How multiplied must be the sorrows of that man on whom the arrows of the Almighty are not only shot but expended; the wretched man on whom not merely calamities fall, but mischiefs are heaped, and all this by a power that is irresistible! We may form, from such considerations, some notion of what an inspired apostle means, when he speaks of an inordinate love of the world drowning men in perdition, and of what is meant in the book of Revelation, when it is said that the smoke of idolaters ascendeth up for ever!

NATIVE EDUCATION IN INDIA,

UNDER THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S INDIAN MISSION.

BY THE REV. JAMES BRYCE, D.D.,

Late one of the Ministers of St. Andrew's Church, Calcutta.

It would not be easy to convey an idea of the lamentable ignorance, degradation, and depravity, that cover the regions to which the Missionary labours of the Church of Scotland are now devoted. There, superstition, in the most hideous shapes, reigns triumphant; and there may be seen, every day, thousands of human beings falling down before, and worshipping the most frightful and mis-shapen idols that imagination can picture; striving to propitiate the favour, or avert the wrath of the imaginary beings whom these idols represent, by rites and ceremonies the most frivolous, vicious, and sanguinary. Need I add, that from this worship has resulted a state of ignorance the most lamentable, and of morality the most humiliating? Yet the race that are thus not only buried in ignorance of all that man, to be happy, ought to know and to believe, but in the daily and hourly practice, and that under the hallowed name of religion itself, of all that can degrade and debase his nature, are, at the same time, endowed with intellectual faculties the most acute, qualifying them, whenever they will listen, to comprehend the lessons addressed to their understandings; and, moreover, with dispositions singularly tractable, and with a curiosity strongly inviting the advances of the teacher. It is, indeed, a subject of the deepest regret, that these encouragements have, in the great mass of the people, been borne down by superstitious prejudices, which it must prove no easy task to remove; and hence, undoubtedly, has arisen the slender success of the Missionary, when he has addressed himself to the crowds gathered around him in the market place and the highway. But a brighter prospect opens in regard to the rising generation; and it is chiefly for their benefit and instruction that the institution which the Scottish people are now called upon to assist, has been established. It is a subject of peculiar gratitude to heaven, that while this institution avows openly the instruction of native youth, in a better and a purer faith and morality, as well as in a more rational and enlightened education, it has not only met with no opposition from the parents, but has, on the contrary, experienced the support of a very large number, whose children are now attending our school, and the approbation of a still greater class, whose desire to share in its advantages we are not yet in a position to gratify. The fact, of upwards of six hundred Hindoo youth, now in daily attendance on the Assembly's school at Calcutta alone, is decisive of this important point. My own personal knowledge enables me fully to confirm it. It is at length placed beyond all doubt, that, strong and invincible as we have hitherto believed the prejudices of the Hindus to be, in all matters in which their faith is concerned, and unwilling, as they have hitherto shewn themselves, to profit by the preaching of the Christian Missionary, when he addresses them severally on the doctrines of the Cross, there is arising among them a large and respectable body, able to appreciate the advantages of the education we are bestowing, and willing to receive that education for their children, on the terms on which we offer it to them. In the Assembly's School, the education is openly and avowedly founded on religion, and lessons from the Bible are daily read in the lower and more elementary, as well as in the higher classes. And such is the happy change now working in the native mind, that where there is the desire to obtain instruction in our literature and science for their children, many of the parents send them to the Assembly's school to receive this instruction, rather than to others that also bestow it, just because the fundamental truths and doctrines of religion are with us taught and kept alive. I can bear testimony to sentiments on this subject, every way liberal and enlightened, being now entertained by natives of the greatest respectability and talents. To myself their language has been, "In all you teach our children, preserve upon their minds a belief in God, and a sense of their religious obligation; educate them in your literature and science; teach them even, if you please, and they desire it, the grounds on which you rest the superiority of your faith to ours, and let them chuse for themselves at what altar they will worship; but do not make them atheists." Would to heaven, that those enlarged and enlightened sentiments were more generally diffused than they are; but let us not, in the mean time, overlook the door, narrow as it now is, which they are opening to Christian exertion. It is seen, even by the least acute among the natives whom we strive to instruct, that the education which our schools are bestowing on their children, must demolish all belief in the superstitious fables of the vulgar faith; and the very apprehensions which they evince, lest we make their children atheists, bespeaks a sense and a feeling of fear and reverence for the Deity, which, while it serves in some measure to redeem the dreary darkness through which it gleams, as the yet lingering ray of a once brighter sun, tells the Christian philanthropist himself to beware, lest the education he imparts be such as will encourage atheism rather than lead to the knowledge of the living and the true God. Against this danger, the Assembly's School anxiously provides; for religion stands at the very threshold, to receive and to welcome every entrant. The Scriptures are a class-book in every department; and in the higher forms, the pupils are specially instructed in the evidences and doctrines of Christianity, with a view to their embracing our faith, and, in due time, becoming themselves the instruments of still farther diffusing its knowledge among their countrymen. It is this, principally, that distinguishes the Assembly's School; and it is on this ground that we confidently seek and expect for it the countenance and support of the Christian people of Scotland.

Having once and again assisted at the annual examination to which the Assembly's School is subjected, in the presence of the European and native population of Calcutta, I can speak confidently of the literary and scientific attainments of its pupils; and I can have no hesitation in placing them on a level with any that are attained generally, even in our own country, by youth of the same age, and pursuing the same studies. The system followed at the institution, includes the ordinary branches of knowledge taught in our schools at home, embracing also, of course, instruction in the spoken language of the country, as the medium, in the first instance, of communicating an acquaintance with the English language. This once attained, and the road to history, geography, natural philosophy, mathematics, astronomy, &c., is opened up. The ardour with which this road is pursued by the native youth, has attracted the notice of all who have witnessed them engaged in their daily labours, while the rapidity of their progress generally keeps pace with their ardour, often, indeed, as I have seen, exciting the surprise, as it gladdens and encourages the hearts of all who take an interest in their progress. Nor let it be forgotten, that since the establishment of the Assembly's School, various fields have been opened up, beyond its walls, for rendering available to the purposes of after-life the knowledge and instruction imparted by it. The introduction of natives to situations in the public service, from which they were formerly excluded, is part of the more extended and liberal policy which the Government of India, at length, finds itself in a position to adopt; and the prizes held out, while they stimulate to an attendance upon such institutions as ours, powerfully encourage our exertions, as they are obviating the great objection long and strongly urged against our schools, that the instruction we were bestowing, was immediately forgotten on the youth returning to scenes where it could not possibly be turned to advantage; or, if remembered, served only to render them more unhappy and discontented with their lot. The erection, within these two years, of a medical college, endowed by Government on a scale the most liberal and extensive, placed under the superintendence of officers distinguished for their zeal and professional talents, and specially devoted to the supply of a race of educated native practitioners in medicine and surgery, is another of the enlightened measures that have lately been adopted; and there may be easily recognised in it, one of the most obvious provisions for rendering the elementary instruction in literature and science, bestowed at our schools, available to the most useful and profitable purposes. The attendance on this college, of students supplied from the Assembly's School and from other seminaries, has been all that was anticipated; and the result is the more gratifying, that this attendance is a triumph over Hindu prejudices, where, by many, they were considered as almost invincible. The object of this college extends beyond the wants of the public service, properly so called, and embraces the establishment, in due time, of native medical practitioners over the whole country, in whose hands the lives of our fellow subjects may, with more safety, be placed, than in those to which, of necessity, they have hitherto been confided. I mention these exertions on the part of the public authorities in India, as they must be gratifying to every philanthropic mind, and as, in point of fact, they are a part of the happy fruits already resulting from the labours which the people of Scotland are now called upon to support.

But passing to a more peculiar feature of the Assembly's School and Mission, I may mention, that before my departure from India, several of our youth were far advanced in a knowledge of Christian truth, with a view of becoming converts to our faith, and being ultimately employed as teachers of it, under the authority of the Indian branch of the Church of Scotland, now happily armed with power from that Church, to receive them into full communion as preachers of the everlasting Gospel. Others, whose views do not extend to this holier and more Christian object, had been trained up as teachers, within the school, and had been found qualified to take upon themselves the charge of branch establishments, planted near the parent institution, and under its general superintendence. This is, undoubtedly, a most important step in the progress of the Assembly's School. The institution is now sending forth, not scholars, but schoolmasters, from among its pupils; and the sphere of its labours and usefulness is widening all around it. These labours are, as yet, confined to the Presidency and its immediate neighbourhood; but situations the most eligible, at a distance from the seats of Government, have already presented themselves, and as public support is extended by the parent institution, and the committee at home, will also be overtaken. Besides holding out a field where we have every reason to believe that our labours will be both welcome and successful, many of them afford the advantage of a climate highly congenial to European constitutions, and consequently hold out the pleasing prospect of our Missionaries being enabled to recruit their health, when suffering under their labours in less favourable localities, without being obliged altogether to suspend these labours.

I may also mention, as a motive to still greater exertions than ever, that the eminent success of the institution at Calcutta has stirred up the friends of the Church of Scotland at Madras and Bombay, to be included in the General Assembly's scheme, which until lately has been confined to Bengal; a requisition to which the committee has most readily lent an ear. At both of these Presidencies, the Church of Scotland may, indeed, account herself fortunate, in having men zealously devoted to her interests, and distinguished among the foremost scholars in India, for their knowledge of the native character, literature, and languages; some of them, indeed, almost without rivals in these most requisite attainments. If there are any who are afraid that, by attempting too much, we may run the risk of accomplishing less than under narrower endeavours might be attainable, I would say, that the extension of the Assembly's scheme to the other Presidencies in India, has not been taken up, until so strongly demanded from these quarters, as to leave no reasonable doubts of a very liberal measure of local support, by which the services of such eminent Orientalists, and zealous and devoted Missionaries, as are now enlisted, both at Bombay and Madras, ought undoubtedly to be secured for an institution which may well be termed national. Indeed, the concentration of effort, by all the friends of true religion both at home and abroad, in aid of the Assembly's School and Mission—so peculiarly the child of the people of Scotland—is so obvious, that a doubt cannot, I think, exist as to its expediency; and we ought to regard the bringing of the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay within its pale, as a step in our progress promising the best of fruits to the natives in these parts of our eastern territories.

It is well known that the Indian institution—thus enlarged and enlarging in its sphere of duty and usefulness—depends for its activity, and indeed its existence, upon the benevolence of the people of Scotland. It is a tree of their own planting; and now that it is growing up towards maturity, and affording shelter to many under its branches, whose lot has been cast in a "dry and thirsty land," thus promising so well to reward their past care, it must not be forsaken. The policy hitherto pursued by the Indian Government, has prevented any aid being given to our school from the funds provided by the Legislature for the promotion of native education. The time, I trust, will soon come, when this policy will be departed from; and it will certainly come the sooner, that we are able to prove how powerful and efficient we are, as instruments in promoting all the great objects which a British and a Christian Government of India ought to have in view. The most honourable testimony has been borne by the highest authority in India—and this in the most public manner—to the pre-eminent ability and success that have hitherto distinguished the Assembly's School, under the able superintendence of Dr Duff, whose zeal, talents, and unwearied diligence and activity in the cause of the Indian Mission, require no eulogium from me. To enable the institution still more to earn and to deserve this testimony, the exertions of the people of Scotland must not be relaxed. Let this be their encouragement, also, that as we succeed in enlightening the native mind in India, we shall prepare the people themselves for one day taking an active part in the good work, and we shall most effectually remove the difficulties that now stand in the way of our receiving assistance from the public funds. At present, the fear is entertained that, by extending this assistance to an institution avowedly teaching Christianity, the prejudices of our native subjects might be outraged, and their feelings offended. It is impossible not to respect the motives from which this cautious policy has originated; but I venture to think, that it is now acted upon to a greater extent than the necessity of the case demands. Hindu prejudices and fears upon this ground, are vanishing before the well directed and truly judicious exertions to enlighten them, which have been made by the Assembly's School: and it becomes us to take care, that Christian prejudices do not usurp their place, in tying up the hands of the State from granting the same aid to institutions where Christianity is taught, as to those from which it is excluded. But what is, perhaps, still more encouraging, as it is undoubtedly honourable to our exertions, a desire has been generated, even in the most exclusive seminary at Calcutta, to introduce into it the reading of the Christian Scriptures. Several of the native gentlemen, who are directors of the institution to which I refer, have perceived its inferiority to that of the Assembly, in bestowing instructions, in what they have penetration enough to see is a most important branch of knowledge as regards the history of the world, even without reference to the peculiar religious dogmata that are involved in it; and I certainly entertain very sanguine hopes, that the Hindu College will be soon assimilated to that of the Assembly, in putting the Bible into the hands of its pupils, were it merely as a historical record, well entitled to their attention. But should this happy period be more remote than I would fondly anticipate, it is obvious, that as we succeed, under the blessing of God, in removing the prejudices that now stand in our way, and directing the feelings, that now obstruct us, into a proper channel, new sources of pecuniary support will open to us. Already have we succeeded in so far overcoming these difficulties, that the demands for admission into our school are more than can be answered. Besides the six or eight hundred youths now receiving education under our Missionaries, it ought to be borne in mind that there are many thousands, equally anxious to enter the institution, whom we are as yet unable to overtake. The Church of Scotland cannot be otherwise than thankful to heaven, for having been enabled, by the bounty of the people of Scotland, to do so much as she has accomplished; but she cannot shut her eyes to how little that is, compared with the vast field for moral and religious cultivation that lies before her in India. The occupation of this field, to a greater and greater extent, depends on the permanence and extension of that liberal support, which has hitherto enabled her to do so much, as already to have commanded the applause of both the European and native population of India. If this support is not withheld, but farther and farther extended, as her labours more and more expand, the honourable position which she has attained among the bodies devoted to the extension of moral and religious knowledge over our Eastern empire, will assuredly be sustained; and, we trust, rendered still more conspicuous by her continued and increasing success, until, under the blessing of an all-wise and all-disposing Providence, the ignorance and superstition, which now overshadow so many of the fairest provinces of the globe, shall give place to the life and the light of the everlasting Gospel; and the millions that now acknowledge our political supremacy, shall also accept, in all sincerity and knowledge, of our religious creed; and as they are linked to us by one common civil and social bond, so shall they also be seen bending with us at the same pure and spiritual altar.

We must not rest contented, however, until, with our alms, we also mingle our prayers unto Him, in whose hands are the issues of all things, that he would uphold and prosper the labours of his Church, in extending the Messiah's kingdom over lands that yet "sit in darkness and in the shadow of death,"—that he would be graciously pleased to strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts, of the humble and pious instruments employed in this good work; and, in his own time, mercifully fulfil the promise he has given unto mankind, that he will, one day, "give unto the Son the heathen for an inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession."

SUFFERINGS OF THE CREW OF THE VIEWFORTH
OF KIRKALDY, ONE OF THE ICEBOUND
WHALERS, OF 1835.

NO. IV.

BY THE REV. J. THOMSON,

One of the Ministers of Dysart.

HAVING thus imperfectly described the sufferings and the dangers of the crew of the Viewforth, I have now a very pleasing duty to perform, namely, to record their religious exercises while detained in the Arctic regions. This is the more interesting, because it will enable us to see, more distinctly, the connection between their piety and their preservation. The Christian knows that whatever secondary causes may be employed for effecting any purpose, either in the natural or moral world, these are only instruments in the hand of the adorable Ruler of the Universe. His providence is over all his works. "He layeth the beams of his chambers on the waters; He maketh the clouds his chariot; He walketh on the wings of the wind." "His way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters." "They that go down to the sea in ships, and do business in the great waters, these see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep." How becoming is it, therefore, that our seafaring people should habitually cherish an impression of the omnipresence of God, wherever they go, and that, fearing his holy name, they conscientiously endeavour to worship him in the beauties of holiness, and view him as all their salvation and all their desire.

I rejoice in having it in my power to bear testimony to the piety of many of the crew of the Viewforth, a consideration that greatly endears them to my heart. The influence which religion exerted on their dispositions and general deportment, was too marked to escape observation. I have given a brief sketch of their accumulated sufferings and dangers, and I do now state it, as my decided conviction, that, under the pressure of these evils, had it not been for the consolations of the Gospel, they must have all yielded to the hopelessness of despair. But it was their happiness to know in whom they believed; and they found, to their blissful experience, that the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

Various considerations combined, at an early period of their detention, to awaken deep concern in their minds, regarding their eternal welfare. They were surrounded with dangers from which God only could deliver them. The thought of never more being permitted to see their families and homes, melted their hearts, and drew tears from their eyes. Disease had entered the ship, and death, occurring so frequently, brought before them, in the most impressive manner, the solemn realities of the eternal world; while the religious instructions communicated to them, and the devotional exercises in which, as oft as possible, they engaged, tended to keep alive on their minds a sense of the value of salvation, and the necessity of preparation for heaven.

The sources of their spiritual improvement and comfort were the following:—

1. The Word of God. That blessed volume was now felt by them to be the anchor of the soul both sure and steadfast. They perused the sacred page with new and inexpressible delight. Every moment they could spare was devoted to this employment. And truly they found the inspired volume to be "a light to their feet and a lamp to their path." One of them told me, with tears of joy flowing down his weather-beaten cheeks, "that in his Bible he always found the sweetest consolation." This was the case with others. The men were seen, when below decks, eagerly reading the Scriptures of eternal truth, and laying hold of the hope there set before them.

2. I learn that much attention was given to Secret Prayer. This is an indispensable duty. To the performance of it, how many powerful motives now united to lift up the voice of that exhortation, in the ears even of the thoughtless, "Arise, O Sleeper, and call upon thy God." Accordingly the mariners' cry was now heard, "Save us, O Lord, we perish;" "Master, Master, save us." Nor was the duty felt to be only a matter of necessity. The truly pious felt it to be an unspeakable privilege. At the throne of grace they experienced peace and joy in believing; and reposing all their hopes on their divine Saviour, they were enabled calmly to bear their sufferings, and to acquiesce in the will of their heavenly Father.

3. Social Worship. The sight of a Bethel Flag in the Arctic Regions is peculiarly interesting. This, it was their privilege occasionally to enjoy. It was hoisted on board the Jane of Hull, whose mate, a truly pious man, conducted the devotional exercises of the assembled worshippers. Mr — writes, Oct. 18.—"This is the Lord's day, and I believe it has been kept as such by a good many. It was a sublime sight to see the Bethel Flag flying in the Arctic Regions, the scenery around us being such as no person at home can conceive. There was a complete turn-out of all the ships, probably not fewer than one hundred and forty men. His prayer was beautiful, expressing our belief that it is not by the hands of men that the ships are to be relieved, and that we look up to a higher power, whom the winds and waves obey. He said, too, that perhaps a brother, a sister, a father, or an indulgent mother might then be praying for our safety, and he prayed that their prayers might be heard. His text was Lam. i. 12. We stood in need of the consolation which he administered. We needed to think of the sufferings of Jesus to keep us from being 'faint and weary in our minds.'"

So long as the vessels kept near each other, and the weather permitted, such opportunities of spiritual improvement were frequently enjoyed. What a blessing it is to have pious officers on board these vessels! The Jane was highly favoured in this respect. And when it is stated, that not one of her crew died during the voyage, or so much as had a headache, notwithstanding all their sufferings and perils, we cannot but mark the benign influence which religion exerted over their minds, and the connection subsisting between their preservation and the prayers offered up for their deliverance.

The Viewforth was also highly privileged with the means of spiritual improvement. The pious young officer from whose journal so many extracts have been given, but whose name, in deference to his modesty, is withheld for the present, was the main and highly honoured instrument of good to the crew. His exertions were incessant and unwearied. Every alternate night he met with the men, for reading the Scriptures and prayer. Every occurrence which took place, whether deliverance from impending danger, or the death of a messmate, were carefully improved. Thus: "October 22.—Prayer aboard of our ship to-day. It was unanimously agreed by the men, that we should assemble between half-decks, to give thanks to that God who has so mercifully preserved us through the past week. Read also a sermon from the Retrospect on these words of David: 'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits.' Sung the 29th Paraphrase, and part of the 107th Psalm. It was truly sublime to hear our voices ascending to the throne of the Most High in such an awful situation, and I am sure many of them sang from the heart." "Sunday, January 7th, read the funeral service over another of our shipmates, and assembled on the half-deck to embrace the first opportunity to give thanks to Almighty God for his unbounded mercies. All hands were present, the sick lying in their beds. It was most solemn and impressive, and many were deeply affected."

Sparing though I have been with extracts on this part of the subject, enough, I trust, is before the reader, to enable him to form some idea of the attention paid to religious exercises by the crew of the Viewforth. And it is a pleasing fact, that this happened not only when they were on the brink of danger, but also when the subjects of a merciful deliverance. The only fair day they enjoyed on their return homewards, was a Sabbath, which was devoted to spiritual exercises. And may we not hope, that, when the records of eternity shall be unfolded to our view, it will be seen, that these holy exercises have been, through the operation of the Spirit of grace and supplication, productive of the most beneficial results to many a soul? Meanwhile, let us not overlook the connection between them, and the exemplary deportment of the mariners, as well as the answers which were returned to their prayers for deliverance. Not an oath was to be heard on board the ship. Intemperance was unknown among them. So great was the restraint imposed by religion upon them, that when they had the spirits belonging to the vessel at their command, when taken out on the ice, they nobly resolved, as one of them told, rather to die than commit an act of inebriety or insubordination. What a contrast to the irreligious and the dissolute belonging to other vessels, and how different also their experience! "Godliness, with contentment, is great gain; having the promise of the life which now is, and of that which is to come." "Blessed is the man that putteth his trust in the Lord, and who walketh in his ways."

The Viewforth arrived in our harbour on the 22d of February 1836; an event which occasioned intense and universal joy. Thankgivings were publicly offered to God, in our Church, on the evening of the following Sabbath, when a large congregation assembled. Some of the rescued sailors were also present. And as an evidence of the impression produced on the subjects of the deliverance recorded in these pages, it may be stated, that several of them united with us, for the first time, on the 20th of November last, to commemorate the sufferings and death of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, at the sacramental table, and experienced, we trust, a foretaste of that communion which the redeemed shall enjoy with him for ever in the mansions of celestial glory and felicity!

The Necessity of an Atonement.—If we consult our natural sentiments, we are apt to fear, lest, before the holiness of God, vice should appear to be more worthy of punishment than the weakness and imperfection of human virtue can ever be of reward. Man, when about to appear before a being of infinite perfection, can feel but little confidence in his own merit, or in the imperfect propriety of his own conduct. In the presence of his fellow-creatures he may often justly elevate himself, and may often have reason to think highly of his own character and conduct, compared with the still greater imperfection of theirs. But the case is quite different when about to appear before his infinite Creator. To such a being he can scarce imagine that his littleness and weakness should ever seem to be the proper object either of esteem or of reward; but he can easily conceive how the numberless violations of duty of which he has been guilty, should render him the proper object of aversion and punishment; neither can he see any reason why the divine indignation should not be let loose, without any restraint, upon so vile an insect as he is sensible that he himself must appear to be. If he would still hope for happiness, he is conscious that he cannot demand it from justice, but that he must entreat it from the mercy of God. Repentance, sorrow, humiliation, contrition at the thoughts of his past conduct, are, upon this account, the sentiments which become him, and seem to be the only means which he has left for appeasing that wrath which he knows he has justly provoked. He even distrusts the efficacy of all these, and naturally fears, lest the wisdom of God should not, like the weakness of man, be prevailed upon to spare the crime by the most importunate lamentations of the criminal. Some other intercession, some other sacrifice, some other atonement, he imagines, must be made for him, beyond what he himself is capable of making, before the purity of divine justice can be reconciled to his manifold offences. The doctrines of revelation coincide, in this respect, with those original anticipations of nature; and as they teach us how little we can depend upon the imperfection of our own virtue, so they shew us, at the same time, that the most powerful intercession has been made, and that the most dreadful atonement has been paid for our manifold transgressions and iniquities.—SMITH'S MORAL SENTIMENTS, [First Edition.]

Power of Speech.—Observe man gifted with the power of speech, the power of communicating thought for thought, and circulating knowledge, and truth, and love, through all his fellow-creatures. Just conceive, for one moment, what we would be without it; how black, how ignorant, how dreary, how comfortless! Where would there be mutual assistance, mutual advice, the communication of knowledge, the interchange of affection? Observe man, the only created being endowed with this glorious faculty, and then consider the use he has made of it. Listen to the curses and the blasphemy against the very Being who bestowed it, who gave it that it might rise before the throne in hallelujahs. Then hear the falsehood, the deceit, the prevarication issuing through the channel where truth should for ever flow; then hear the impure and wanton jest, that circulates poison, and nurses and assists the natural corruption of the heart, when, (God knows!) it has enough to corrupt and brutalise it within; then listen to the scandal, the malice, the invective, and the recrimination, upon the tongue to which God gave the eloquence of affection and benevolence, and the music of pity and consolation; then attend to the lips that can be eloquent and valuable on every subject but one,—that can descant on the market, and its prices; on the world, and its fashion, and its politics; nay, on every little impulse of the feelings, and every fine-spun sentiment of the mind; but if the great God intrudes into conversation, his ways or his dispensations, his mercies and his loving-kindnesses, the tide begins to ebb, the glow of society dies away, and the cold and heartless silence betrays that an unwelcome stranger has made his appearance.—WOLFE'S SERMONS.

SACRED POETRY.

TO THE SUPREME BEING.

THE prayers I make will then be sweet indeed,
 If Thou the spirit give by which I pray:
 My unassisted heart is barren clay,
 That of its native self can nothing feed:
 Of good and pious works Thou art the seed,
 That quickens only where thou say'st it may:
 Unless Thou shew to us thine own true way
 No man can find it: Father! thou must lead.
 Do Thou, then, breathe those thoughts into my mind
 By which such virtue may in me be bred
 That in thy holy footsteps I may tread;
 The fetters of my tongue do Thou unbind,
 That I may have the power to sing of thee,
 And sound thy praises everlastingly.

WORDSWORTH.

FAMILY WORSHIP.

O LORD, another day is flown,
 And we, a lonely band,
 Are met once more before thy throne,
 To bless thy fust'ring hand.
 And wilt thou bend a list'ning ear
 To praises low as ours?
 Thou wilt! for thou dost love to hear
 The song which meekness pours.
 And Jesus, thou thy smiles wilt deign,
 As we before thee pray,
 For thou didst bless the infant train,
 And we are weak as they.
 O let thy grace perform its part,
 And let contention cease;
 And shed abroad in every heart,
 Thine everlasting peace!
 Thus chasten'd, cleans'd, entirely thine,
 A flock by Jesus led;
 The sun of holiness shall shine
 In glory on our head.
 And thou wilt turn our wand'ring feet,
 And thou wilt bless our way:
 Till worlds shall fade, and faith shall greet
 The dawn of lasting day.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Force of Superstition.—The Emperor Charles Fifth of Germany was a memorable instance of the sin and folly of tempting the Providence of God. As an expiation for his sins, he inflicted upon himself discipline in secret, with such severity, that the whip of cords which he employed as the instrument of his punishment was found, after his decease, tinged with his blood. Nor was he satisfied with these acts of mortification. The timorous and distrustful solicitude, which always accompanies superstition, still continued to disquiet him, and, depreciating all that he had done, prompted him to aim at something extraordinary, at some new and singular act of piety, that would display his zeal, and merit favour of heaven. The new act on which he fixed was as wild and uncommen as any that superstition ever suggested to a disordered fancy. He resolved to celebrate his own obsequies before his death. He ordered his tomb to be erected in the chapel of the monastery. His domestics marched thither in funeral procession, with black tapers in their hands. He himself followed in his shroud. He was laid in his coffin with much solemnity. The service for the dead was chanted; and Charles joined in the prayer which was offered up for the rest of his soul, mingling his tears with those which his attendants shed, as if they had been celebrating a real funeral. The ceremony closed with sprinkling holy water on the coffin in the usual form, and, all the attendants retiring, the doors of the chapel were shut. Then Charles rose out of the coffin, and withdrew to his apartment, full of those awful sentiments which such a singular solemnity was calculated to inspire. But either the fatiguing length of the ceremony, or the impression which the image of death left on his mind, affected him so much that, next day, he was seized with a fever. His feeble frame could not long resist its violence; and he expired soon after.

How foolish the exchange!—When Lysimachus was engaged in a war with the Getæ, he was so affected with the torments of thirst, that he offered his kingdom to his enemies for permission to quench it. His exclamation, when he had drank the water with which they furnished him, is wonderfully striking, "Ah wretched me, who for such a momentary gratification, have lost so great a kingdom." How applicable is this to the case of those who for the momentary pleasures of sin, part with the kingdom of heaven? "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

The vanity of talent on a death-bed.—The latter moments of Steevens, the celebrated editor of Shakspeare, (says Mr Dibdin,) were moments of mental anguish. He grew not only irritable but outrageous; and in full possession of his faculties, he raved in a manner which could have been expected only from a creature bred up without notions of morality or religion. Neither complacency nor "joyful hope" soothed his bed of death. His language was too frequently the language of imprecation, and his wishes and apprehensions such as no rational Christian can think upon, without agony of heart. Although I am not disposed to admit the whole of the testimony of the good woman who watched by his bed-side, and paid him, when dead, the last melancholy attentions of her office—although my prejudices, as they may be called, will not allow me to believe, that the windows shook, and that strange noises and deep groans were heard at midnight in his room—yet no creature of common sense (and the woman possessed the quality in an eminent degree) could mistake oaths for prayers, or boisterous treatment for calm and gentle usage. If it be said why—the answer is obvious, and, I should hope, irrefragable. A duty, and a sacred one too, is due to the living. Past examples operate upon future ones; and posterity ought to know, in the instance of this accomplished scholar and literary antiquary, that neither the sharpest wit, nor the most delicate refinement, can alone afford a man "PEACE AT THE LAST." The vessel of human existence must be secured by other anchors than these, when the storm of death approaches.

—"draw his frailties from their drear abode?"

ON THE PUNISHMENT OF MEN'S SINS IN THE PRESENT LIFE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT LEE, A. M.,

IN God's dealings with men, there are many more indications of his providence and moral government, of his rewarding what is right and punishing what is wrong, than they are willing to see or acknowledge. There are many sins which may be said to inclose their own punishments; they carry them within themselves, and infallibly discharge them in due time. Such sins, as if by the very nature of them, "when finished, bring forth death." Some of these are more fruitful of penalties than others, but none are barren; nor is it necessary here, as in the case of the fabled phoenix, that the parent should die before the offspring begins to live.

There are, however, many other sins which do not appear to us necessarily to involve their own punishment. And yet they are punished, undeniably, signally even in the present life. God hath bound the two firmly together, though the links of the chain are too minute for our discernment; and when in such cases we see vengeance treading on the heels of guilt, we are called upon to acknowledge, "there is a God that judgeth in the earth."

The history of the world is a perpetual comment on this text. For though apparent exceptions do occur, such as perplexed the Psalmist for a moment (Ps. lxxiii.) and threw a painful chill over the hopes, or rather wishes, of the wisest and best among the Gentile sages; yet those exceptions are neither so many nor so decided, as to bring the truth into any dispute, that the good man has a reward, and the evil a punishment, even in the present world. It is not meant to be asserted, that either the reward or the punishment is adequate, or exactly proportioned. It evidently is not so; and to pretend it is, is to shut our eyes against numerous and obvious facts. But it is equally absurd to deny, that indications, both of reward and punishment, are distinctly visible, and, in many cases, approximations also to the degrees of the antecedent virtue or vice.

The great use to which a devout mind turns the study of history, is to mark and trace the connection between the vices and miseries, the virtues and prosperity, both of individuals and of nations. And if any person, who has not been accustomed to make such connection the object of his particular regard, will, with the view of noting it, reconsider any portion of history with which he is already familiar, he will probably be surprised by its fertility of proofs that "God hath not forsaken the earth," and he will wonder how he could overlook the footsteps of divine justice where they were so visibly imprinted.

It is true, historians, for the most part, do not trouble themselves with that consideration. It is enough for them, generally, if they glorify every one but God. The old heathen narrators are left to recognise something like divinity as existing in the universe, and as exercising some influence in the affairs of mortals. Our modern philosophers have chosen to follow the epicurean sect, who love the notion of a deity that does nothing, and cares for nothing; and so they describe the machine with no more reference to its mainspring, than if it had no moving power at all, but the wheels themselves caused their own motion.

On the other hand, it is, I allow, both possible and very easy, to run into a dangerous extreme; the more carefully to be avoided, as it will often necessarily involve us in uncharitable as well as unjust conclusions regarding the characters of our fellow-men. We must never, in this case, reason backward. The a posteriori argument, which serves us so well in science, must not be admitted here. If the tower in Siloam falls and kills certain men, we are not permitted to conclude "they were sinners above all them that dwelt in Jerusalem;" nor is a man proved to be "a murderer, whom vengeance suffereth not to live," because, though escaped from the sea, a viper, out of the heat, fastens on his hand. It is, in by far the majority of cases, altogether incompetent for us to pronounce, "thus and thus the man hath done," because "thus and thus he suffers." But this incompetence on our part is no reason why, when we know both the course of conduct, and the issues of it in the subsequent condition of the individual, or of the nation, we should shut our eyes to intimations so distinct of God's moral government, as displayed—and that for our instruction—in the history of the world. To do so is both impious and irrational,—is at once the effect and symptom of an atheistical spirit; “because they regard not the work of the Lord, nor the operation of his hand, he will destroy them, and not build them up.”

Lactantius, one of the Latin Fathers of the Church, has left a book, on “The deaths of the Persecutors.”* Without thinking myself obliged to defend every instance which he has adduced in support of his position, I seem to myself justified in asserting, this at least has been satisfactorily proved by him, that those “bloody and deceitful men” among the Roman emperors and rulers “who made havoc of the Church,” did not “live out half their days,” but were almost, without exception, cut off by untimely and violent deaths.

Of all the histories in the world, those contained in the Sacred Volume abound most in lessons of the justice of God. Indeed, I can see no other end for which many passages of holy writ were composed, or have been preserved, but to afford us those lessons. This intention, indeed, is not stated, for the sacred writers commonly record facts, leaving these to suggest their own instruction; yet this instruction is, for the most part, so obvious, and lies so much upon the surface, that none but the most obtuse or careless reader can overlook it. As an illustration, let us attend to the narrative contained in the 27th chapter of Genesis. Four characters act in this scene, Isaac and Rebekah, Esau and Jacob. The father is partial to his elder, the mother to her younger son; and the sin of partiality is punished by the introduction of envy, jealousy, and discord, into the bosom of the family.

Isaac, wishing to communicate the prophetic blessing, containing, among other distinctions, a grant of Canaan, and a promise of the Messiah as to come of that family in which the blessing was—Isaac, wishing to confer this on his elder and favourite son, though probably aware the intention of God was different, for we cannot suppose him ignorant of the oracle given to his wife, (Gen. xxv. 23,) sends that favourite son from home, to obtain the means of pampering his appetite, and while that son is absent on that errand, bestows, to his own unspeakable grief, the blessing on his younger son. His sin was manifest in his punishment. For, had he pronounced the blessing without a feast, or had he been satisfied with feasting on the tame animals, of which he possessed such a multitude, he would not have had the sorrow of exclaiming, in the bitterness of his heart, “Thy brother came with subtlety, and hath taken away thy blessing.” If we suppose Isaac aware of the prophecy as to the superiority of his younger son, his punishment is so much the more signal.

Esau was guilty of despising his birth-right, and he is deprived of his blessing: that was his sin—this his punishment.

* This book has been translated by Bishop Burnet, and, besides his, there is another English translation. It is deserving a perusal.

Rebekah, sharing with her husband the sin of partiality to one of her children, shares with him the domestic consequences. But, of these, her portion is the greater; for, as Plato has nobly said, “We are rewarded for doing good, by doing more good,” so, the heaviest penalty of doing evil, is when it leads us to do more evil. Rebekah's sin of partiality for Jacob, produced all the unwarrantable conduct on her part, recorded in this chapter. She instigates Jacob to lie, and deceive his father, to injure and supplant his brother, and she is punished by living in dread that her favourite child should be killed by the hand of her other child, and the latter being slain by the avenger of blood, she should be deprived of “both her sons in one day,” verse 45. Neither Rebekah's sins nor her sufferings ended here. To conceal from Isaac the full extent of the mischief, of which she had herself been the principal author, she states to him a false reason for Jacob's departure, verse 46. He departs, and his mother, as it appears, sees his face no more. Her son is, in effect, dead to her. So also is Esau, who is estranged from her; and is worse than dead to both his parents, whom he lives only to afflict. Chap. xxvi. 35, and xxviii. 8, 9. Jacob, undoubtedly acquainted with the promise respecting himself, instead of permitting God to bring about his own purposes in his own time and way, takes the fulfilment into his own hands. He does evil that good may come; first, ungenerously taking advantage of his brother's extremity to wrest from him his birth-right, then lending an ear to the evil counsels of his mother, lying in words, verse 19, and by actions, verse 22, and, worst of all, expressing his falsehood in the language of piety, verse 20, imposing upon his venerable parent, and defrauding his absent brother. Did God approve all this? Some commentators, I believe, have imagined he did, because no censure is pronounced by the sacred historian. What notions respecting God's character such men must entertain I know not; but of this I am certain, that, as it is impossible God should lie, so it is impossible God should approve of lies. What he cannot allow in himself, he cannot excuse or justify in others. But if the historian does not condemn Jacob's deceit, the history does; for, during almost the whole subsequent life of that patriarch, he suffered the effects of his treachery. Thus God, in a language more impressive than words, taught him, and teaches us, that “lying lips are an abomination unto him.”

Jacob, in consequence of his sin, is compelled to flee from his father's house. For the same reason, he is forced to become a servant, or rather slave, during seven years. Then, as he had imposed upon his father, and wronged his brother, Laban wrongs and imposes upon him. Then he drinks another cup of seven years' bondage—the unkindness and oppression of his uncle succeed—the more bitter, as being accompanied with contentions in his own family. The terror caused by his brother's approach completes the long catalogue of punishments resulting from Jacob's sin. This drove him from the house of his father,—this deprived him of property wherewith he might have paid the dowry for the daughter of Laban, and have immediately received her in marriage, as Isaac did Rebekah, in default of which, he had no choice but to offer Laban seven years' servitude instead. This sin also inspired the dread of his brother,—increased tenfold, not only from all his property, but all his family being exposed to that brother's revenge.

In all this, the moral government and the justice of God are signally displayed. And this history illustrates what is elsewhere taught in Holy Scripture, that men's sins, especially if committed against their fellow-men, are not suffered to escape temporal punishment, even when the penal consequences of them, so far as a future state is concerned, are done away. The atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ, removes the eternal, not the temporal, consequences of sin, as the lives of Jacob and of Eli, of Samuel, of David, of Hezekiah, of Paul, and of almost all the other saints whose sins are recorded in the Bible, very clearly shew.

“And Nathan said unto David, the Lord hath put away thy sin, thou shalt not die: howbeit, the child that is born unto thee shall surely die.”—2 Sam. xii. 14.

LATE REV. ALEXANDER STEWART, D.D.,

This devoted minister of Christ was born at the manse of Blair in Athole, on the 29th of January 1764. His early education was conducted at home, under the immediate care of his father, but for some years he was placed under the charge of his brother-in-law, Mr Small, the minister of a neighbouring parish. His progress, particularly in the knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages, appears to have been very rapid; so that, at the age of thirteen, he was found qualified to enter the University of St. Andrews.

During his attendance at college, Mr Stewart's love of classical literature gradually yielded to a still stronger partiality for the abstract sciences, as being more completely in accordance with the character of his mind. At the age of eighteen he commenced the study of divinity with the view of preparing for the sacred office; and about the same time he went to reside in the family of Mr Greig of Greigston, as private tutor to his sons. In this family he remained during the whole period of his attendance at the Divinity Hall, discharging his important duties, as an instructor of youth, with the utmost zeal and fidelity.

In 1785 Mr Stewart was licensed to preach the Gospel, and though hitherto he had discovered no marked symptoms of that effectual change, which the Spirit alone can operate in the soul, yet his amiable dispositions, his excellent talents, and various acquirements, combined with the general regard which was entertained for the memory of his father, excited a considerable interest in his favour. With little difficulty, therefore, his friends were able to procure for him, from the Duke of Athole, a presentation to the parish of Moulin, which had recently become vacant. In the following terms he describes his first visit to the parish, immediately before the moderation of the call:—

“I have had a most agreeable excursion to the Highlands. The object of my journey, the friendly reception I met with wherever I came, good spirits, choice weather, and agreeable company, all conspired to heighten the enjoyment. I thought I had never seen Athole to such advantage before. Every wood, every hill and stream, looked jocund. I felt my heart warmed when I approached the village of Moulin, with an affection somewhat similar, I suppose, to what one feels for his new-born offspring. I preached on the 29th ult. in English and Gaelic. The Church was very full. I am told I gave satisfaction. My call, as far as can be judged, was unanimous. The people shewed great earnestness in my favour. This, you can believe, was highly pleasing to me, and I indulged the pleasure without scruple, because I thought myself in no hazard of gratifying my vanity by that indulgence; for I have been little in that country since I was a child, and, therefore, am little known or liked on my own account. The people's attachment to me proceeds from a cause vastly more grateful than the highest compliments they could pay to my own merits, that is, the respect they retain for my father's memory. I was happy in thinking that I could attribute their attachment wholly to that cause.”

On the same occasion, he thus adverts to his early days:—

“I spent a night at the manse of Blair, in which I first drew breath. The glebe is pretty large, and has some oak and birch on it. I walked out alone in the morning, to make my orisons in the wood where I had often strayed. I found in every tree, and in every spring, an old acquaintance:

‘Dear lovely bowers of innocence and ease,
Seats of my youth, where every spot could please,’

said I, as I traversed the ground. I stood on a hillock and looked around me,—the view was worth a thousand homilies! The days of other years rushed on my mind; ‘the memory of joys that are past, pleasant and mournful to the soul.’ The sensations and emotions which this visit awakened in my breast, were such as no beauties of nature or art could have raised. They were such as Dr Beattie ascribes to the power of national music, in his essay on that subject. The passage is so singularly beautiful, that I cannot forbear transcribing the whole.

“That man must have a hard heart, or a dull imagination, in whom, though endowed with musical sensibility, no sweet emotions would arise on hearing, in his riper years, or in a foreign land, those strains which were the delight of his childhood. What though they be inferior to the Italian? What though they be even irregular and rude? It is not their merit which, in the case supposed, would interest a native, but the charming ideas they would recal to his mind; ideas of innocence, simplicity, and leisure, of romantic enterprise, and enthusiastic attachment; and of scenes which, on recollection, we are inclined to think that a brighter sun illuminated, a fresher verdure crowned, and purer skies, and happier climes, conspired to beautify, than are to be seen in the dreary paths of care and disappointment.”

From the whole strain of these reflections it is obvious, that when Mr Stewart commenced his labours in the parish of Moulin, his mind was scarcely as yet impressed with the awful responsibility of the trust which had been committed to him. Of this, his own confessions, at an after period, when he became savingly acquainted with the truths of the Gospel, are sufficiently indicative :

"I was settled," says he, "minister of this parish in 1786, at the age of twenty-two. Although I was not a 'despiser' of what was sacred, yet I felt nothing of the power of religion on my soul. I had no relish for its exercises, nor any enjoyment in the duties of my office, public or private. A regard to character, and the desire of being acceptable to my people, if not the only motives, were certainly the principal motives that prompted me to any measure of diligence or exertion. I was quite well pleased when a diet of catechising was ill attended, because my work was the sooner over; and I was always satisfied with the reflection, that if people were not able, or did not choose to attend on these occasions, that was no fault of mine. I well remember, that I often hurried over that exercise with a good deal of impatience, that I might get home to join a dancing party, or read a sentimental novel. My public addresses and prayers were, for the most part, cold and formal. They were little regarded by the hearers at the time, and as little recollected afterwards. I preached against particular vices, and inculcated particular virtues. But I had no notion of the necessity of a radical change of principle; for I had not learned to know the import of those assertions of Scripture, that 'the carnal mind is enmity against God;' that if any man be in Christ he is a new creature; and that, 'except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.' I spoke of making the fruit good; but I was not aware that the tree was corrupt, and must first be itself made good, before it could bear good fruit. The people, however, were satisfied with what they heard, and neither they nor I looked farther. Almost the only remark made by any on the discourse, after leaving church, was, 'What a good sermon we got to-day!' to which another would coldly assent, adding, 'Many good advices do we get, if we did but follow them.' Such a heartless compliment was all the improvement made of the discourse, and I believe all the fruit of my preaching. The hearers readily gave me credit for a desire to do my duty; and they as readily took credit to themselves for a willingness to be taught their duty. But whether any improvement was actually going forward, whether there was any increase of the fruits of righteousness, was a point which gave neither minister nor people much concern.

If there were any persons in the parish at the time, who lived a life of faith, under the influence of pure evangelical principles, I did not know them, nor was I qualified to discern and understand what spirit they were of. I have since had reason to believe that there were a very few spiritually-minded persons; but their life was hid, and they had left this world, all but one or two, before they could acknowledge me as a brother. I was in a great measure ignorant of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, the corruption of the human will, the fulness and freeness of the redemption which is in Christ, justification by faith, and the necessity of the Holy Spirit's agency on the human soul; and what I knew not myself I could not declare to others. I never thought of praying for divine direction in my search after divine truth. I believe I had read the Confession of Faith of our Church before I declared my belief of its contents; but I had taken little pains to compare it with the Scriptures. I certainly did not distinctly understand, nor was I at all persuaded of the truth of many propositions contained in it. Yet I do not remember that I had any scruples about subscribing it as the confession of my faith, or about declaring my assent to it solemnly, in the presence of that congregation whereof I was about to take the pastoral charge."

Minister and people were both alike unacquainted with the truth, and both were, therefore, mutually satisfied. The pastor was amiable and kind in his manners, attentive to most of his official duties, and, in fact, lacked only "one thing," but that was "the one thing needful."

At an early period of his ministry, much of Mr Stewart's time was spent in his favourite studies of metaphysics and philology. The Gaelic language in particular he investigated with the utmost care, and succeeded, at length, by perseverance, in acquiring a minute critical acquaintance with it. It does not appear, however, that his mind was yet impressed with the importance and necessity of vital religion. At length, in the mysterious arrangements of Divine Providence, he was brought into circumstances peculiarly fitted to promote his progress in the knowledge of divine things. We refer to the acquaintance which he was led about this time to form with Mr Black of St. Madoes, latterly of Lady Yester's Church, Edinburgh. This eminent servant of God had been early brought to an acquaintance with the truth as it is in Jesus, and was through life characterized by deep personal piety, genuine humility, and peculiarly kind, affable, and attractive manners. In his first interview with Mr Black, Mr Stewart was struck with the frankness, as well as unobtrusive gentleness, with which he spoke on religious topics, and the conversation seems to have been accompanied with an evident blessing from on high.

"Mr Black, as they sat together in an arbour in the garden, took occasion to describe the triumphant dying scene of a deceased sister. Such a fact was not to be accounted for on Mr Stewart's principles; and the event made an impression on his mind never afterwards wholly effaced. Many years after this incident, he writes, 'The dear name (of Mr Black) is always associated with my first perceptions of divine truth and redeeming love. My thoughts took a long flight backwards, and the parlour and the garden at St. Madoes appeared to me like 'an upper chamber in Jerusalem, and like the garden of Gethsemane.'"

Thus was a work of grace begun in Mr Stewart's heart, which, in process of time, led to a maturity of Christian character rarely exhibited in the world. In 1791 he entered into a correspondence with Mr Black, which continued with great regularity, down to the time of the lamented death of the latter. At an early period of their intimacy, Mr Stewart received from his friend and spiritual instructor, a present of Scott's Force of Truth,—a work which, in such circumstances, was remarkably seasonable. Accordingly, in acknowledging the gift, he thus adverts to the resemblance, in one point, of his case with that of Mr Scott :

"I dare say I have just the same dread of being charged with filling my people's heads with uncharitable notions and speculative whims, instead of teaching social duties, as Mr Scott had of being termed a Methodist. Yet it is as clear as day-light, that one may just as well think to gather grapes of thorns, as to make virtues grow on the wild stock of man's natural heart. The operation of engrafting must surely be first performed, or Apollos or Paul himself may water for ages without effect."

In the progress of his correspondence with Mr Black, Mr Stewart evinced an increasing humility and readiness to learn. So far did he carry this amiable disposition, indeed, that he submitted to his friend's inspection a number of the discourses which he had written for his people, earnestly requesting a free and unsparing exposure of the doctrinal errors into which he had fallen. Nay, in a subsequent letter, he openly confesses, that many of his former opinions now appear to him in a far different light :—

“ Indeed, I seem to myself to have been an indolent inquirer, and to have taken up my religious opinions at hazard, from such books as happened to come in my way, and which I heard well spoken of. I have learned, however, that many of these were unscriptural and erroneous. I have been much indebted, on this occasion, to the writings of Doddridge, Baxter, Newton, &c. I have often consulted, with great satisfaction, Mr Scott’s book, which you gave me, and for which I hope I have thanked you before now. After attending carefully to my own mind, I think I do give a firm and hearty assent to the doctrines which these writers maintain, and which appear to be expressly asserted in the Scriptures.”

Amid this evident increase of his knowledge, Mr Stewart’s mind was ill at ease. Though surrounded by all that was fitted to impart happiness, he felt himself unhappy. He had been recently united to an amiable and affectionate partner, he enjoyed the respect and esteem of his parishioners, his cup of worldly prosperity was full even to overflowing; yet he was unhappy. He was dissatisfied with himself, as having been an unprofitable servant; as being even now shamefully deficient in those Christian graces which characterise the true believer; and as being still in too great a degree under the influence of a corrupt and corrupting world. Conscious of these failings, he could sympathise with the apostle when he exclaimed, “ O wretched man that I am ! who shall deliver me from this body of death ? ”

In such a state of mind, Mr Stewart poured out his feelings with the utmost freedom in his letters to Mr Black, who in turn guided, and consoled, and instructed him. Other circumstances, besides, tended, by the divine blessing, to excite a still deeper anxiety about his spiritual concerns. A few of these he mentions in the narrative which he afterwards wrote of his own conversion :—

“ The biographical sketches in the Evangelical Magazine, were principal means of impressing my heart, of opening my eyes to perceive the truth, of exciting a love to godliness and a desire after usefulness. The power of divine grace appeared illustrious in the composure, the joy, the triumph, with which many pious Christians left the world. I saw their triumphant hope supported, not by a complacent reflection on a well-spent life, but by a confidence in the unmerited love of Christ, and in his power and willingness to save even the chief of sinners. I was particularly struck with the account of ministers who had laboured with much diligence and success, and had died at an early period of life full of good fruits; while I, who had already lived longer, and been longer in the ministry than they, could not say that I had taken any pains with my people, nor that I had been the means of reclaiming one sinner from the error of his way, or of saving one soul from death. The conversation and example of some persons of a truly spiritual mind, to whose acquaintance I was admitted, and who exhibited to my view what I found only described in written memoirs, conducted much to impress on my mind the truths with which I was gradually becoming more acquainted. I cannot omit mentioning, in this connection, the blessing I enjoyed in the preaching, the prayers, and the conversation of that much-favoured servant of Christ, the Rev. Charles Simeon, of King’s College, Cambridge. He was a man sent from God to me, was my guest for two days in June 1796, preached in my Church, and left a savour of the things of God, which has remained with us ever since.”

This latter circumstance, indeed, the visit which Mr Simeon paid him, was often referred to by Mr Stewart, as having proved of signal advantage to him in a spiritual point of view; and we feel peculiar satisfaction in adverting to the fact, when we reflect, that this eminent servant of the living God, who was so long and so remarkably honoured of his Master, has but recently gone to receive his high reward. Yes; we have a melancholy pleasure in dwelling upon the thought, that to the pious and devoted Simeon, was Mr Stewart indebted, under the blessing of God, for that enlargement of heart which, from this period, he uniformly displayed. “ Ever since,” he says in a letter which he wrote shortly after to Mr Black, “ ever since the blessed period of Mr Simeon’s visit, my thoughts have continued more steadily on divine things, and my communion with God has been more lively by many degrees, than I remember to have experienced before.”

Such intelligence as this was peculiarly refreshing to his friend; and accordingly we find Mr Black thus expressing himself in reply :—

“ O, my dear Sir, ‘ magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together.’ He ‘ is excellent in counsel, and wonderful in working; ’ and your experience is now added to that of thousands, who can declare, that verily there is a God that heareth prayer.

“ I rejoice to learn, that this lively comfortable frame of mind still remains, and that it is attended with renewed alacrity in your public work. Long may it continue so for your own comfort, and the benefit of your people ! But changes, inward as well as outward, you must expect to meet, with many a dark and rugged step. But, O what a privilege is it to know where relief is to be found ! to know experimentally the power and grace of our Almighty Physician, and under a daily deep conviction of our guilt and helplessness, to be committing our souls, our families, our flocks, our every concern into his faithful hands, who careth for us. I have great cause to lament a prevailing deadness and languor of spirit in secret devotion, and cannot say but I was considerably moved, when I read of the happy change which had taken place with you in this respect. O pray for me, my dear friend, that I may be visited, as you have been, with the quickening influence of divine grace, that my views of the glory of God, displayed in the work of redemption, may be more enlarged, and my impressions of divine truth more deep, lively, and abiding.”

No sooner was Mr Stewart awakened from that indifference to personal religion, which had so long occupied his mind, than he felt the utmost anxiety to bring others also under the quickening influence of the truth. His preaching was now of a more searching and definite character, and the result was truly encouraging. A spirit of inquiry arose in the parish; and the question was eagerly put by many a conscience-stricken sinner, “ What shall I do to be saved ? ” The minister was obviously in earnest, and a spirit of respondent sympathy speedily diffused itself over the length and breadth of Moulin. A change was speedily apparent in the whole aspect of the parish; religion assumed somewhat of its due influence over the minds and hearts of the people. But in describing the revival which now took place, it may be more satisfactory to insert a few passages from the account which Mr Stewart himself published in the form of a letter to Mr Black :—

“ The novelty of the matter, and some change in my manner of preaching, excited attention. People began to think more, and sometimes to talk together, of religious subjects, and of the sermons they heard. But I did not yet know of any deep or lasting impressions having been made. The two persons before mentioned as earliest converted, had by this time got clearer views of the Gospel, were enabled to derive comfort from the word of salvation, and began to bear their testimony to the grace of God their Saviour. They were in use of visiting occasionally a poor infirm woman, who had long walked with God, and who now lived alone in a mean cottage in a neighbouring village. It was proposed that they should come together to her house at a time appointed, and that I and some of my family should join them, and spend an evening hour or two in reading, conversation, and prayer. In process of time, different persons, who were inquiring after the one thing needful, hearing how we were employed, and believing that God was with us, were at their own request admitted of our party. In this poor woman's little smoky hovel, we continued to hold our weekly meetings, till August 1799, when she was called away to join the general assembly of the first-born above. Her growth in grace had been very conspicuous, and her death was triumphant.

“ March 1799, I began a course of practical sermons on Regeneration, which I continued to the beginning of July following. These were attended with a more general awakening than had yet appeared among us. Seldom a week passed, in which we did not see or hear of one, two, or three persons, brought under deep concern about their souls, accompanied with strong convictions of sin, and earnest inquiry after a Saviour. It was a great advantage to these, that there were others on the road before them; for they were seldom at a loss now to find an acquaintance to whom they could freely communicate their anxious thoughts. The house of one of our most established Christians, became the chief resort of all who wished to spend an hour in reading or conversing about spiritual subjects. Some who had but newly begun to entertain serious thoughts about religion, and who had not yet come so far as to speak out their mind, would contrive an errand to this person's house, and listen to her talk. She was visited at other times by those who were drawn only by curiosity, or a disputatious spirit, who wanted to cavil at her words, or draw her into controversy. Such visitors she did not avoid, and at last they ceased to trouble her.

“ The external effects of a general concern about religion, have appeared in the behaviour even of those who do not seem to have experienced a change of heart. While the younger people attended a Sabbath School, those who were grown up used to spend the evening of that day in sauntering about the fields and woods in gossiping parties, or visiting their acquaintance at a distance, without improving their time by any profitable exercise. Now there is hardly a lounge to be seen, nor any person walking abroad, except going to some house or meeting, where he may hear the Scriptures read. Swearing, profane talking, foolish and indecent jesting, have in a great measure ceased. At late wakes, where people assemble to watch by the body of a deceased neighbour, the whole night used to be spent in childish, noisy sports and pastimes. Even the apartment where the corpse lay was the scene of their revelry. This unnatural custom, which is still pretty general over a great part of the Highlands, is almost wholly discontinued in this part of the country. They still assemble on such occasions, but they pass the time in reading the Bible, or some religious book, and in sober conversation.”

It is often when the believer is in the full enjoyment of spiritual blessings, that the Almighty is pleased to try his faith, by an afflictive dispensation of one kind or another. This, at least, was Mr Stewart's experience, for, amid the joy with which his heart was refreshed, in consequence of the awakening which had taken place in his parish, he was visited with a sore domestic trial, in the death of his amiable and affectionate wife. The bereavement was deeply painful, but he bore it with a truly Christian resignation to the divine will. It was no small consolation to him, that on looking abroad over the parish which had been committed to his care, there were so many striking evidences that he was not labouring in vain. She who had so warmly sympathised with him in his toils, was no doubt gone to her rest, but the work in which he was engaged was so glorious and delightful, that it was well worth living for, though one of the strongest ties which bound him to earth had been snapped asunder. In his ministerial labours he was now more zealous and unwearied than formerly. He went from house to house, carrying the glad tidings of salvation to a people ready and anxious to hear; and not merely from Sabbath to Sabbath did multitudes repair to the house of God, hungering and thirsting for the bread and the water of life, but every evening, numbers of the villagers stately bowed along with him at his family altar. Though more faithful than ever in admonishing, warning, and reproving his people, they loved him as their friend, their counsellor, and their guide.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THOUGHTS ON INFANT SCHOOLS.

By THE REV. WILLIAM MUTR, D.D.,
Minister of St. Stephen's Parish, Edinburgh.

SOME of the mere accompaniments of the plan of Infant Schools have exposed the system to misrepresentation, and raised the feeling of contempt against it. For example, to gain the attention of children, from the age of three years to five, their instructor is obliged to have recourse to methods that are seemingly useless and frivolous. Certain things are said and done, and certain evolutions are gone through by the little scholars, which, viewed in themselves, are no doubt exceedingly trifling. Separated from their design, it cannot be wondered at that the spectator of them utters the contemptuous opinion of the system which gives a place to them; and it is expected that when he speaks of the infant pupils rising and sitting down at some fanciful signal, moving from their place in one order of marching, and returning to it in another; alternately lifting and lowering their hands, and saying this merry rhyme and chanting that—it is expected that he will represent the whole as being very foolish, and infer that the system is unworthy of the time and expense employed on it. But what is thus censured is not the substance and end of the scheme. It is only an accompaniment—yet a most necessary one. It quickens and keeps up the attention of the scholars; it supplies, too, a certain degree of muscular exercise that is beneficial to health; and since it is done, also, in consequence of an order given by the teacher, and done according to method, it carries on, beneath what wears the aspect merely of childish recreation, the system of salutary discipline.

The most formidable objection urged against the whole design of infant school tuition is this, that it interferes with the duties of parents, and serves to weaken, if it does not destroy, the affection which should be fostered between them and their children. Now, in answering this objection, let it be considered that I refer at present to Infant Schools for the children of persons in the laborious or the destitute situations of life. It is for these, I am inclined to think, that the plan of early tuition, conducted out of the parent's house, is required; or, perhaps, I ought to say, it is for these only that such a plan should be provided. There may be many examples of gross ignorance, as to the useful and Christian mode of training children, displayed in those classes of society in which both time and every advantage are given to parents for educating their infant offspring. Want of subordination in these, and utter perverseness, as the consequence of misrule, and the result of folly, or incapacity, may not be rare. But, are we bound to make a provision for remedying an evil which springs from neglect or absence of right principle among those who ought to know better things, and to practise them? Or are we called on to introduce any plan for meeting certain wants in the families in which these wants ought never to have arisen? Surely the strongest law binds on parents the duty of watching, to the extent of their power and means, over their own children in infancy, and of not resigning too soon the care of them to strangers; but of employing, as long as they can, every day in discharging their sacred trust for all the purposes which parental wisdom and affection ought to be exercised in accomplishing. Now, when the system of Infant Schools is objected to, as if it interfered with that sacred trust, the reasoning must be held upon instances where the bountiful arrangements of Providence supply the parents, especially mothers, with opportunity and ample time for training the minds of their offspring previous to their entering such a School as has hitherto been regarded as the earliest School. The objection cannot fasten on the system, when the peculiar case, for which I apprehend it is provided, is duly considered. The objector has not duly considered the situation of families that are supported by daily labour; and especially that, with all their labour, still experience the pressure of want. He can never have visited them, nor minutely observed them, nor sympathized with their poverty and cares; otherwise he would perceive how groundless the argument is which he brings against Infant Schools; as if, in such an instance, the establishing of them committed a trespass on parental duty, and weakened the bond of affection, which ought to be strengthened, between parent and child. How does the case really stand?—or, rather, what is it we do by which we may incur the censure of injuring a bond that is so sacred? We are the means, we confess, of removing the children from home during five, or, at most, six hours in the day; but then, these hours (first of all,) form the very time in which the parents are thoroughly occupied—the father at his toils out of doors, and the mother at her portion of toils within. If so, the objector must allow that we have not separated the children from their father during these hours; that separation was to be effected though no school of ours had been opened for receiving the children. And though it is still said that the mother should be allowed to take the charge of her own infants, yet, with regard to the mother of a family in the necessitous situation which has been described, it is not possible that the toiling and anxious being can find the opportunity, during the hours of the day to which I refer, for giving her children the full measure of superintendence that is needed for their welfare. Whether she be fit to give the needed superintendence is questionable; or, rather, it would be extraordinary, considering all things, if she could give it. But, even allowing that she were able,

and, at the same time, desirous to give it, how obvious is it that the circumstances of a poor man's house preclude the very opportunity of her attempting to bestow it, during the hours of the day which may be called the busy and laborious hours. Though we had not drawn away her infants to our school, therefore, during these hours, they could have received no benefit from her affectionate watchfulness, however able and solicitous to exercise it. Her hands are too full. She is taking her part in providing for the daily bread; she is beset with many cares and annoyances; and is endeavouring to gain her way through perplexities and toils, which, by a want of method, seem often to grow more intricate and burdensome. Nay, in this scene of bustle and trouble, the very children whom she loves, are actually felt,—with their importunate clamours for what she may not have to give, or what ought not to be given to them, though she had it,—are actually felt as a grievance for the time; yea, as causes of irritation and fretting to her. And instead of that scene of domestic endearment and instruction, which the objector paints for the purpose of illustrating the impolicy of our scheme of infant tuition, there is literally nothing but what serves to nurse up the children in almost unceasing animosity and brawl. The consequence of this will shew, that the separation between parent and children has actually, in the greater number of cases, ensued, because temporary relief is sought for, by removing the petty assailants on the patience and fully occupied hands of the laborious inmate of the poor man's house. The children are sent, if not driven to the street. Health is there endangered, and morals are there exposed to contamination, while the mother, whose thoughts wander after them still, is vexed between the care of accomplishing her household toils and anxiety for their safety.

Now, that you may feel how unreasonable is the objection to our plan of infant tuition, that would resist it on account of its separating the children from their parents, consider the nature and the obvious effect of our arrangement. The children, instead of being sent to the street, are sent to the school. Instead of being exposed to the hurtful changes of the weather, they are sheltered in comfort, and they promote their health by the exercise, both of body and mind, in which they are trained. Instead of the hazard of their being tainted by practices which they ought never to know, they receive the very means of moral purifying which God himself has appointed for sanctifying us. Instead of their being confirmed in the wildness of insubordination and disobedience, they are placed under discipline, and are taught submission. And, instead of listening to the language of profaneness, and joining in it, they are brought to hear the words of Scripture, and to unite with their fellows in hymns to the praise of the Saviour.

And what, moreover, follows their return to home after the periodic absence? Their appearing has something of the freshness of a new visit, and they are the more heartily welcomed. Their parents have now leisure to attend to them; they hear the lessons of religious and moral truth repeated, and may themselves receive that benefit, from listening to their children, which shall, in one sense, realize the declaration of the Bible, that "out of the mouths of babes and sucklings God ordaineth praise." It is perceived, also, that the children are more easily managed at home; and surprise and delight have been expressed by the parents, that tempers which they had despaired (through their unskilfulness without doubt) of ever subduing, are at length made pliant and mild. Thus, the good principles and habits gained at school, may be transferred whither by no other means they could have found their way; and thus, too, instead of destroying, or even weakening the affection between parent and child, the very means are used of upholding and confirming it.

Infant Schools may well be pleaded for on account of their filling up an important season in the life of those for whom they are designed, with the tuition and training suited to their capacities, and which, otherwise, would never be received by them. Sabbath Schools, it is true, do much for improving the rising generation, and are most useful auxiliaries to the cause of religion and morality. But Sabbath Schools are, in general, attended by those, at the earliest, who have entered on their eighth or ninth year. An important season, therefore, has been passed by the children in many cases without their having come under proper training at all. Previous to their ninth year, they may have unhappily acquired the most pernicious habits. It is a fact, proved by the Reports of the Police Board, that mere infants are brought to show an expertness in crime that raises astonishment as well as pity. And though those who have been thus early acted on by evil communications may be drawn to Sabbath Schools, yet the miserable influence of the wrong beginning continues. It is felt in the extreme difficulty which opposes the teacher's attempts to reduce them to subjection. It renders the system of Sunday evening tuition unavailing in numberless instances, for any good, and often turns what should be a place of order and pious exercises into a scene of misrule, noise, and the desecrating of a holy season. And then, in consequence, our Jails and Bridewells may still have inmates who have acquired some knowledge of the Scriptures and the Church Catechism. How desirable that we make the attempt to reach the families of the labouring classes and poor with the means of instruction, at a period still earlier than that at which Sabbath Schools have usually received them! We do not say, indeed we can never say, that the having access to them even at the earliest period of life at which they can be instructed, is without failure to accomplish the design of instructing them. We are to feel while we own our dependence on the free and sovereign grace of God. We are never to separate in our thoughts his blessing from our exertions, and we are to undertake our plans, imploring his aid, and confiding in it. But, if the means hitherto employed for training to religion and righteousness the children of the labouring classes and poor have, in so many instances, failed of answering their end, is it not worthy of consideration whether these means, (good in themselves,) have been employed so early as they ought to be for best promoting their success? Surely it is obvious that, since educational plans are some of the correctives to a diseased nature, the longer we delay to apply the prescription, the malady must increase; and since all will admit that the children for whom Infant Schools are chiefly designed are commonly so situated as to want the skilful interposition at home for applying early the means of spiritual regimen and health, should we not feel the imperative-ness of the motive to adopt the only plan which can meet their case? That plan is the INFANT SCHOOL SYSTEM.*

THE CRIMINALITY OF LOT'S CHOICE:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN PURVES,

"And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered every where," &c.—GEN. xiii. 10-13.

ABRAM, and Lot, his brother's son, had now both journeyed and sojourned together for a considerable number of years in mutual harmony and happiness. But it is a true saying, and was remarkably verified in the case of these two individuals, that prosperity often separates the friends whom poverty hath but knit the more closely together. Their flocks and their herds multiplied so rapidly, that the land was no longer able to bear them; and so great did their substance become, that they could not dwell together. This increase of their substance rendered their separation indispensably necessary; for, instead of increasing their contentment and peace, it was the occasion "of strife between the herdsmen of Abram's cattle and the herdsmen of Lot's cattle;" and had not this been speedily healed, it might, as but too often happens, have ultimately grown into a strife between Abram and Lot themselves. In these circumstances, Abram, anxious about the cause of God, which such a contention must have deeply injured in the sight of the surrounding heathen—for the Canaanite and Perizzite dwelt in the land,—and, with an almost parental generosity and kindness which do him the greatest credit, made this proposal to Lot: "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdsmen and thy herdsmen; for we be brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left." And it was in consequence of this proposal, which so beautifully manifests Abram's concern for the interests of religion, and his indifference about worldly things, that Lot made the choice recorded in the text—a choice which was prompted by a disposition precisely the reverse of that displayed by the father of the faithful. In this choice, indeed, the men of the world will see nothing at all to blame; for it is exactly the choice which they themselves would have made in similar circumstances. Yet, tried by the principles of Scripture, the only proper standard by which every thing in the universe will ere long be tried, it will be found to be altogether unjustifiable; while the manifold consequences by which it was followed emphatically demonstrate, that, whether temporally or spiritually considered, it was not more unjustifiable than it was disastrous and ruinous. It was a choice in which religion had no part; and had even that been all, it was enough to have made it obnoxious to blame; for in a matter of such vast importance as the choice of a profession or of a place for life, to leave religion altogether out of consideration, to give it no place, or not to give it even the highest place, is to be guilty of an offence of the very greatest magnitude in the sight of God, whatever it may be in the estimate of men. And yet with this offence the choice of Lot was evidently chargeable; for, in looking abroad for a place where he and his family, and his domestics, might pitch their abode, we do not read that he was at all influenced by any regard to his or to their spiritual welfare; the advantages or disadvantages of the future abode, in a religious point of view, did not at all enter into his thoughts and calculations; no inquiry seems to have been instituted which place would be most conducive to the health and prosperity of their souls, most suitable for carrying on the great business for which man was sent into this world,—his preparation for eternity; there appears to have been no consideration that influenced his decision but one, and that was purely and exclusively a worldly one. It was simply because all the plain of Jordan was well watered every where, and fertile even as the garden of the Lord, that his choice fell upon it; that is to say, his temporal prosperity was every thing, his eternal well-being was nothing in this choice; it was the choice of a mere worldling, not a Christian; he thought exclusively of his cattle, he thought not at all of his soul.

* The above remarks were circulated by the Author, among his people, before establishing an Infant School in the Parish.

But we have a heavier charge against this choice than merely that religion had no place in it; whereas, in every such choice, it should have the very first and highest place. Religion was not simply omitted, it was positively sacrificed in this transaction; and the full charge against Lot is this, that in selecting a situation for life, not merely did he pay no regard to that interest which should always have the first regard of a rational and immortal creature, but actually ventured into a place in the pursuit of a mere temporal good, where he could not but be sensible that his dearest, even his eternal, interests stood in danger of being completely ruined. The place of which he made choice was not more eminently suitable for the increase of his flocks and herds, than it was awfully unsafe for precious souls; the deformity of its moral aspect stood in appalling contrast to the beauty and fertility of the material landscape; and the plain, which looked to the eye of sense, and to the eye of the worldling, rich and lovely as the garden of the Lord, was, in reality, and in the estimate of a spiritual mind, little better than the borders of hell. Was it, then, a Christian, was it a justifiable thing, for a man of God, the father of a family, the head of a household, to expose himself, and all the precious souls committed to his care, to the moral contagion pervading such a place as Sodom; to the evil and ruinous influence of such a sink of iniquity, in the pursuit of a merely temporal good, for the sake of his flocks, and the furtherance of his worldly interests? It will not do to say, that perhaps he was not aware beforehand of the moral state of Sodom, and did not, therefore, know the imminent jeopardy to which his choice of such a place exposed the all-important interests of his soul and eternity. Even supposing this to have been true, his ignorance in such a case will form no excuse, and hardly any palliation of his offence; for in such a matter he should have made it his business, and his first business, to ascertain the spiritual statistics of the place before he ventured to settle in it with his children and domestics. It was of vastly more importance to ascertain, whether the plain that lay before him was safe and good for the spiritual beings whom he was about to place in it, than whether it was good for the mere beasts of the field. The first inquiry that demanded his attention was, not whether it was well watered and fit for cattle, but whether it was well conditioned in a spiritual sense, and fit for souls. And had he instituted this inquiry, which, as a man, a pious man, and a parent, he was solemnly bound to do, he could not have failed to discover, that the whole plain, whose well watered and fertile fields he so eagerly fixed on, was infested with a moral pestilence, which it was dangerous to approach, and certain death to inhale. So that if he was previously ignorant of the spiritual plague which made Sodom the unfittest place in the universe for the residence of a righteous man, this does not in the least excuse, it rather inculpates him; his very ignorance, on such a point, constitutes no small measure of his guilt: he should have known, and would and must have known, had he not been most blameably and criminally negligent in his inquiries as to that point which demands the very first and prime attention in selecting a place of settlement for ourselves and families. But, in reality, Lot could not possibly be ignorant of the point in question. The state of Sodom was such, that it could not but be known far and wide. It was so sunk in moral pollution, so fearfully overspread with every species of wickedness, that even at that time it was, as it ever since has been, a proverb in the earth. It is said, with peculiar emphasis, "the men of Sodom were wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly." And since, as elsewhere said, "the cry of its iniquity went up even to heaven, and its sin was very grievous;" so grievous, that the most patient and long-suffering of beings could no longer endure it; how could that cry fail to go over the surrounding country, and that iniquity to be known by all who knew of the existence of such a place? It must, therefore, have been with the clear knowledge of its awful spiritual condition, that Lot chose that tainted and infected plain as the place of his residence. With such knowledge, he could not but be sensible of the awful hazard to which he put the spiritual principles and the eternal destinies of himself and all connected with him, by venturing to pitch his tent in such a place. Consequently, it was at the deliberate risk, the high probability, the almost certainty of sacrificing all the interests that should have been dear to him as an immortal creature, that he went to seek the possessions and pleasures of a moment in that suburb of hell. And was not this a measure of criminality, which it is difficult to estimate? Does it not invest his choice with an attribute of guilt unspeakably dark and deep? What a fearful preference of the things of time to the things of eternity! What an awful sacrifice of spiritual well-being to worldly wealth! How high was it to rate the prosperity of his flocks! How cheap to hold the damage, it may be the loss, of souls! And were we not well certified of the fact from other quarters, how difficult would we feel it, to attribute any thing like real religious principle to a man who could prosecute his worldly interests at the certain cost of his spiritual welfare, and at the terrible risk of entailing eterna. ruin on himself, and on all who were dear to him!

The choice of Lot, then, is liable to the charge of being altogether a worldly choice,—in which respect was had merely and exclusively to his temporal good,—in which no regard whatever was paid to the interests of religion, to the welfare of the soul, and the prospects of eternity,—in which, in fact, the interests of religion were not only omitted, or subordinated to worldly interests, but actually and completely sacrificed; the well-being, nay, the very life of the soul, and the vast and ever-during interests of eternity being put most imminently and recklessly to hazard, for the mere good of his flocks, the increase of that substance which perishes in the using. And it may help to expose, not only the guilt, but also the infatuation and ruin involved in such a choice, to glance for a moment at some of the appalling consequences which flowed from it as their bitter source. God has left his sentiments regarding it recorded, not in feeble words, but in deeds of disastrous suffering, enough to deter our race in all time coming from such a fatal step. From the very moment this worldly and irreligious choice was made, the life of Lot, hitherto peaceful and happy, became one uninterrupted series of disasters and misery. His personal comfort and tranquillity were terminated the moment he set his foot within the precincts of Sodom. In such a place, and in such society, it was as impossible for a man of his principles to find true happiness, as it is for the man to be at ease who is cast into a bed of thorns, or who takes a nest of vipers into his bosom. Every thing he saw and heard must have been a source of purest misery; and we are accordingly told, “that Lot was vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked, for that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds.” This was the amount of personal comfort which he reaped from his well watered plain! Nor was the loss of happiness more complete than was the ruin of his worldly substance, the hope of increasing which had lured him into that abandoned place. For, not long after he had taken up his residence among them, and when he was beginning, perhaps, to exult in his accumulating stores, the wicked inhabitants of the plain thought fit to rebel against Chedorlaomer, their lawful king, who coming against them with a powerful army, routed them with a great slaughter, pillaged their whole land, rifled their houses, and carried every thing away captive; and as the sword makes no distinction between the righteous and the wicked, and as it is determined that the companion of fools must share in their fate, the houses and lands of Lot, like every other, were laid desolate, and himself, his flocks, his family, his domestics, and every thing that belonged to him, were carried away captive. This total shipwreck of his worldly estate, indeed, was speedily repaired by the timely interposition of his uncle, Abraham. But the next calamity, coming as it did directly from the hand of God himself, was more ruinous in its nature, and more irreparable in its consequences. Having filled up the measure of their iniquity, and exhausted the patience of God, the cities of the plain were at last completely consumed by fire and brimstone rained down from heaven; and this desolating judgment, while it utterly consumed all beside, left the once prosperous Lot a scared, and blighted, and desolate wreck. His life, indeed, was miraculously spared; but when we consider the hair-breadth escape which he made, and how he required to be forcibly dragged out of the ill-fated, yet fascinating, city, we may say that he was “but scarcely saved.” It was the bare life, however, that was spared to him. His house, his flocks, his herds, and all his substance, were consumed to ashes. His daughters that were married to the men of the place, regarding his warnings and entreaties to escape as idle dreams, were, with their husbands and their children, overwhelmed in the universal ruin. His wife, almost beyond the range of the fiery deluge, but casting a lingering look behind, was rivetted to the spot, and turned into a pillar of salt by his very side. The only survivors of his family that escaped, his two daughters, were, to all appearance, spared, rather as a judgment both to themselves and him; for, carrying with them the worst crimes of Sodom, they brought the deepest infamy on his old age, and embittered the miserable remnant of his weary life, becoming, in a manner, too horrid to be named, the mothers of two heathen nations,—the Moabites and the Ammonites,—to whom the curse of heaven was doomed for ever to cleave. While the desolate and wretched old man himself, peeled of all his substance, bereft of all his friends, childless, companionless and alone, was forced to seek an asylum for his declining days in the dreary cave of Mount Zoar, where, sitting like the leafless trunk of some tree which the lightning of heaven had smitten and shivered, he had ever before his eyes that once well watered and fertile plain, which had been the object of his infatuated choice, but which was now turned into an awful monument of the divine displeasure, and had become the grave of all his family, all his friends, and all his fortune; and this was all the fruit of the well watered and luxuriant plain, which was chosen as the place of his residence, simply because it was fit for flocks, without ever once considering whether it was safe for souls! All this came of a choice in which God and religion had no part, in which the well-being of the soul was not only disregarded, but recklessly sacrificed to the interests of a present life; and worldly prosperity was pursued at all hazards, even at a risk so vast as the loss of the soul and the ruin of eternity.

In this page of sacred history, God has left, inscribed in large and indelible characters, the guilt, and infatuation, and ultimate ruin of every mere worldly choice, of every choice in which the world is the only element in the calculation, and in which the interests of the soul and eternity are either left entirely out of the account, or subordinated, or, it may be, completely sacrificed to the interests of a present perishing life. And yet it is greatly to be feared, that the principle which actuated the choice of Lot, is the very and the only principle on which thousands, and tens of thousands, are daily acting, down to this present hour. It is greatly to be feared, that notwithstanding the lesson that has been read them, the infatuated and guilty part of Lot is acted over again every day, and by all classes of men, from the very lowest to the highest. It is done so by those servants, who, in looking out for a place, never think of any thing but where they will get the highest wages, the easiest work, the best fare; who never inquire whether it be a situation in which their morals will be safe, their religious instruction attended to, their spiritual welfare consulted and advanced, the time of the Sabbath religiously secured to them, and every facility granted for their attendance on the means of grace; and who, for the merest pittance of additional wages, rush into places and families, where the conversations and examples that prevail, render them little better than another Sodom, the atmosphere of which is pregnant with death to all who approach it. The same part is acted over again, in substance, by many parents, who, in the training of their children, have no other end in view than how they may best accomplish them for making a conspicuous figure on the theatre of this present world; who, with this view, send them to masters who will teach them every thing but how a guilty sinner may be saved; who will store them with all knowledge but that which it most behoves a fallen creature to acquire,—the knowledge of Christ Jesus, and him crucified; or place them in seminaries which, in a fearful majority of cases, prove the grave of modesty, and virtue, and undefiled religion, and the nursery of vanity, frivolity, pride, and every sin; and who, in the settlement of their children for life, never almost take any thing into consideration but where they will best succeed in acquiring a competency, or in accumulating wealth, and who think they have done well for them in putting them in a way to gain the meat that perisheth, even though it be by sending them to a country, or setting them up in a place where their souls are left to famish for want of that meat which endureth to everlasting life. The same part is acted over again, as might be expected, indeed, from this miserable training to which they have been doomed, by a great majority of those who are entering upon the active business of life, who, in choosing a profession, or a place where to exercise it, never once consider the religious advantages, or disadvantages, which it presents, think of nothing but its relations and bearings on a present world; are actuated in all their elections and in all their movements by the hope of mere temporal good, and who, in order to realize this hope, will venture to prosecute their worldly calling in scenes and circumstances where the preservation of virtuous, still more religious, principle is next to a moral impossibility, where deprived, perhaps, of a Gospel ministry, and surrounded by every species of wickedness, their souls can hardly fail to perish, and their eternal welfare to be undone. In short, the principle that actuated the choice of Lot, is acted upon by thousands in conducting the common and every day business of life, where worldly gain is prosecuted with an ardour and engrossment of mind, to which every thing is made to bend, and by which every precious spiritual interest is remorselessly sacrificed; where men are determined to be rich at all hazards, and at all costs; where, if a worldly advantage can be secured, and wealth amassed, and honours acquired, though at the expence of every thing like spirituality of mind and progress in holiness, and to the deep and lasting injury of the soul, it is done without compunction, and without scruple; where even the deadly and the soul-destroying pestilence of Sodom will be encountered, and the vast calamity of a ruined spirit and an undone eternity be hazarded, so be they can only reap the fruits of the well watered and fertile plain. Oh, it is lamentable to see such multitudes of rational immortal creatures acting a part like this,—a part pregnant with all the guilt and folly, and with still more dismal and dreadful consequences than what were involved in the choice of Lot! No doubt men may prosecute their worldly business, and consult their worldly advantage, in so far as this involves no sacrifice of religious principle, and infers no loss to the precious soul; and when a well watered and fertile plain can be found without a spiritual Sodom in its bosom, it would be folly not to choose it. But surely it is obvious as day, that if man has a soul as well as a body to care for; if he has to make provision for a long eternity as well as for the little inch of time, the first consideration with every rational human being is, not, where shall my perishing body thrive, but where shall my immortal never-dying soul; not, how shall I best promote the interests of a passing hour or day, but how shall I best secure the vast and imperishable interests of that eternity on which I must so soon, and may so suddenly, be called to enter? And I know not, if to the eye of a superior Being, that clearly sees time and eternity in close connection; the insignificance of the one in contrast with the magnitude of the other; the littleness of every thing here with the vastness of every thing hereafter; if to such there be a sight upon earth more pregnant with guilt and folly than that which may be so lamentably often seen,—immortal creatures, in all their plans and projects, thinking, and planning, and labouring for nothing but the comfort of the life that now is, leaving altogether unprovided for the life that is to come; or it may be deliberately and recklessly sacrificing that coming life, with all its imperishable interests, on the altar of worldly prosperity, at the shrine of Mammon. Individuals who are acting such a part, are chargeable with all the guilt, and with all the infatuation which characterised the choice of Lot; and though their conduct may not involve them in the same disastrous consequences in a present life, yet they should remember, that while temporal judgments are more alarming, just because they are obvious to the eye of sense, they are, in reality, nothing at all,—light, even as a feather,—when compared with those eternal retributions which guilt and folly, if unpunished and uncorrected in a present life, never fail to draw after them in a world to come. It is not the calamities which such guilt and folly will sometimes be visited with in a present life, but the endless penalties with which, if passed with impunity in this world, they will be the more certainly visited in the next, that are to be dreaded by a never-dying creature; and it is all the more awful to have none of sin's certain retributions endured in a present world, and to have all reserved entire to that world which is to come,—the place of final reckoning, the place of full and never-finished woe. Pointing, then, to the smoking plain, when overwhelmed by the judgments of heaven, or to the only remaining fragment which survived the universal ruin, the miserable desolate old man, with his two incestuous daughters, cowering in the cave on Mount Zoar, as if half-afraid lest the whole judgment of heaven was not yet discharged; or pointing to a scene, in comparison with which Sodom, even in desolation, was a perfect paradise, and where the guilt and ruin of such conduct as I have been referring to, are written in characters of everlasting fire, in the agonies of an undying and, therefore, infinite misery; we would say to servants and to parents, to the young who are entering on the world, and to those who are now immersed in its cares, to all, in fact, see here the consequences of a mere worldly choice,—a choice in which religion has no part,—a choice in which no regard is had to the poor perishing soul,—a choice in which the increase of flocks, the prosperity of farms, the acquisition of this world's wealth, are more considered, and are held of higher moment, than the everlasting welfare of the spirit, whose property it is to live for ever.

EXPERIENCE OF THE HEATHEN.

TRACES OF SCRIPTURE DOCTRINES IN THE EAST.

THERE are, perhaps, few spots on the face of the earth, which have not, at some period of the world's history, been visited, more or less, with the light of divine truth. In places now shorn of all their privileges, and overspread with the ruins of many generations, He who holdeth the stars in his right hand, and who walketh amid the radiance of the golden candlesticks, has, in days of old, been invoked by vast and august assemblages of worshippers; whilst nations not a few, which, in former ages, were walking in darkness, and given to idolatry, have, in these latter days, been visited with times of reviving from the presence of the Lord, and have heartily responded to the heavenly call, "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." "The true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," has not, indeed, been shining perpetually on the same spot, nor have all nations simultaneously been quickened and made glad by the healing of its beams. Like the sun, whose tabernacle is established in the heavens, it has sometimes been shedding the splendours of morning on one hemisphere, and leaving another to the darkness of night. But still the light has always been shining somewhere—in the east if not in the west, in the north if not in the south. And whilst its circuit has been unto the ends of the heavens, its line has gone out through all the earth, and its radiance to the end of the world.

Hence, in forming an estimate of the moral and spiritual condition of the heathen, we might err greatly, did we proceed on the assumption that they have been left entirely to the guidance of unassisted reason. Had that been the case, the probability is, that their condition would have been much more deplorable than it is; and many of the religious notions which they now entertain, might have been altogether unknown to them. But we think there are reasonable grounds for believing that the heathen world universally has not been left to itself, and it would even, perhaps, be difficult to fix upon any considerable number of savage tribes which have at all times been so completely isolated, or so totally abandoned by God, as to justify a different opinion. Portions of the true leaven have been conveyed, we believe, directly or indirectly, either by men bearing the Christian name, or by the scattered remnant of Israel, into almost every quarter of the globe. The great mass of the world's population has thus been more or less subjected to its powerful and irresistible agency. In fact, the light of nature has, in most places of the earth, been so blended with the light of revelation, as to make it extremely difficult, if not altogether impossible, to mark out the precise limits to which the one has been able to reach independently of the other. And in the case, not perhaps of every heathen nation without exception, but of many of them, the traces of Scripture doctrines are so clearly discernible in their very superstitions, in the fashion of their idols, in the form of their ceremonies, and in the architecture of their temples, as to suggest the idea of a responsibility for higher privileges than the light of nature alone is able to confer, and to shew at the same time how true it is, even in their experience, that "the light shineth in darkness, yet the darkness comprehendeth it not."

These remarks are borne out, we conceive, by the following extract from Buchanan's Christian Researches in Asia; at least in so far as they relate to the vast and populous regions of the East:—

"In passing through the regions of the East, and surveying the various religious systems which prevail, the mind of the Christian traveller cannot fail to be impressed with the strong resemblance which some of them bear to doctrines which are familiar to him. However varied or disguised they may be, there are yet some strong lines, which constantly recal his thoughts to the doctrines of revelation, and seem to point to a common origin.

"The chief and distinguishing doctrines of Scripture may be considered the four following: viz., The Trinity in unity—the incarnation of the Deity—a vicarious atonement for sin—and the influence of the Divine Spirit on the mind of man. Now, if we should be able to prove, that all these are represented in the systems of the East, will any man venture to affirm, that it happens by chance?

"1. The Doctrine of the Trinity.—The Hindoos believe in one God, Brahma, (the Creator of all things,) and yet they represent him as subsisting in three persons; and they worship one or other of these persons in every part of India. And what proves distinctly that they hold this doctrine is, that their most ancient representations of the deity are formed of one body and three faces. The most remarkable of these is that at the caves of Elephanta, in an island near Bombay. The author visited it in the year 1808; nor has he seen any work of art in the East, which he contemplated with greater wonder, whether considered with respect to its colossal size, its great antiquity, the beauty of the sculpture, or the excellence of the preservation. From causes which cannot now be known, the Hindoos have long ceased to worship at this temple. Each of the faces of the triad is about five feet in length. The whole of the statue, and the spacious temple which contains it, is cut out of the solid rock of the mountain. The Hindoos assign to these works an immense antiquity, and attribute the workmanship to the gods. The temple of Elephanta is certainly one of the wonders of the world, and is, perhaps, a grander effort of the ingenuity of man, than the pyramids of Egypt.

"Whence, then, have the Hindoos derived the idea of a triune God? It should seem as if they had heard of the Elohim of revelation in the first chapter of Genesis, 'Let us make man.'

"2. The Doctrine of the incarnation of the Deity.—The Hindoos believe that one of the persons in their trinity, and that, too, the second person, 'was manifested in the flesh.' Hence their fables of the Avatars or incarnations of Vishnoo. And this doctrine is found over almost the whole of Asia. Whence, then, originated this idea 'that God should become man and take our nature upon him?' The Hindoos do not consider that it was an angel merely that became man, but God himself. Can there be any doubt that the fabulous incarnations of the Eastern mythology are derived from the real incarnation of the Son of God, or from the prophecies that went before it? Jesus, the Messiah, is the true Avatar.

"3. The Doctrine of a Vicarious Atonement for Sin, by the Shedding of Blood.—To this day, in Hindoostan, the people bring the goat or kid to the temple, and the priest sheds the blood of the innocent victim. Nor is this peculiar to Hindoostan; for throughout the whole East, the doctrine of a sacrifice for sin seems to exist in one form or other. Ever since 'Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain;' ever since Noah, the father of the new world, 'offered burnt offerings on the altar,' sacrifices have been offered up in almost every nation, as if for a constant memorial to mankind, that 'without shedding of blood there is no remission of sin.'

"4. The Influence of the Divine Spirit on the minds of men.—In the most ancient writings of the Hindoos, some of which have been published, it is asserted that 'the divine Spirit or light of holy knowledge' influences the minds of men. And the man who is the subject of such influence is called 'the man twice born.' Many chapters are devoted to the duties, character, and virtues of 'the man twice born.'

"Other doctrines might be illustrated by similar analogies. The characters of the Mosaic ceremonial law pervade the whole system of the Hindoo ritual and worship. Now, if these analogies were merely partial or accidental, they would be less important; but they are not casual, as every man who is versed in the Holy Scriptures, and in Oriental Mythology, well knows. They are general and systematic. Has it ever been alleged, that the light of nature could teach such doctrines as those we have enumerated? Some of them are contrary to the light of nature. Every where in the East there appears to be a counterfeit of the true doctrine. The inhabitants have lost sight of the only true God, and they apply their traditional notions to false gods. These doctrines are unquestionably relics of the first faith of the earth; they bear the strong characters of God's primary revelation to man, which neither the power of man, nor time itself hath been able to destroy; but which have endured from age to age, like the works of nature, the moon and stars, which God hath created, incorruptible."

NO. II.

THE CHOICE OF HIS MANHOOD.

"By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of reward."—HEB. xi. 24-26.

At the period referred to, it is evident that Moses was an inmate of the palace, and a most distinguished member of the family of Pharaoh; and by what train of events he, who was the son of two obscure and degraded Hebrew slaves, had risen to such princely grandeur, it is unnecessary to explain by any lengthened details, familiar as every one is with the incidents of that interesting story—the exposure of the little innocent on the banks of the Nile—his discovery by the princess—the remarkable providence, by which he was restored to the fostering care of his mother, and the dignified place which the daughter of Pharaoh assigned him, in respect of herself and the royal family. It is sufficient simply to direct the reader's attention to the fact mentioned by the apostle, that having probably no child of her own, she solemnly adopted him as her son, had influence to procure a public and legal acknowledgement of his title to succeed as her heir to all the honours and the privileges of the throne, and gave him the name by which he has ever since been known—a name significant, as was customary in ancient times, and in Eastern countries, of the peculiar circumstances of his early years, and of her claims to his filial duty,—so that being thus received into the household, and honoured with a name by his adopted parent, he was, throughout the whole land of Egypt, regarded and called "the son of Pharaoh's daughter." Now, in order to form a proper idea of the condition of Moses, and the powerful obstacles that lay in the way of his making common cause with his kindred, it must be borne in mind, that Egypt was at that time the greatest and most flourishing kingdom in the world; and that, if to be invested with authority and honour in a petty and inconsiderable state, be a prospect tempting to the ambition of the human mind, how much more must the ambition of a worldly person have been fired with the prospect of obtaining the sovereign power in a country to which all others looked up as the mother of sciences, the nursery of arts, the emporium of commerce, the favourite residence of all that stood high in the estimation of the age. To have been simply a native of Egypt was sufficient, as Josephus tells us, to make one's fortune in any of the then countries of the world. Think, then, how commanding must have been the situation, how extensive the influence, how exalted the honour of swaying the sceptre of such a country—whose court was resorted to by all the learned of the world, and which had at command all the refinements and luxuries which nature or art could yield! Of a fortune so splendid as this, Moses was the heir. He had already been placed in that dignified attitude by the only individuals who had the right to nominate the successor to the crown; he had, through the influence of his royal patroness, been acknowledged as the heir-apparent by the people at large, and no obstacle, therefore, from that quarter could have stood in the way of his claims, had he only, in the language of the world, been true to himself, had he possessed the wisdom to maintain his position, and been sensible of the honour of his royal connections. Nor was there any impediment ever likely to arise on the score of his birth; for, obnoxious though the whole pastoral tribes were to the natives of Egypt, and sharing, as Moses must naturally have done, in the general odium that fell on his race, yet time, and his Egyptian education, had entirely removed all the prejudices that might have been secretly harboured against him from his having sprung from a degraded caste; and, consequently, he had just as little reason to anticipate any difficulty in mounting the vacant throne of the Pharaohs on the side of the people as of their royal masters. Moreover, in addition to those incentives, which arose from the road to power being so patent and easy, a generous and patriotic mind would, in the circumstances of Moses, have cherished a longing desire for the influence of royalty, for the magnanimous purpose of relieving his countrymen from the servile condition to which the cruel policy of his predecessors had reduced them, and of placing them on a footing of honourable equality with the rest of his subjects. Had Moses, therefore, been actuated by worldly principles, he had every motive that could inflame his ambition as a man, or animate his patriotism as a Hebrew, to be desirous of continuing "to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter."

A great change, however, occurred in his temporal condition and prospects; and although the apostle has employed a variety of expressions to indicate the nature and consequences of that change, to each of which we shall advert in succession, it may be proper here, in one word, to observe that it consisted in his renouncing his connection with the royal family, and resolving to cast in his lot with the people of Israel. There can be little difficulty in conceiving the means by which he came to the knowledge of his extraction, and to cherish such an attachment to the faith of his fathers, as led to the voluntary and unconditional surrender of all the honours of his royal condition. It is well known that he spent his earliest years under the care of his own natural parents, who being themselves imbued with the fear of God, and cherishing, as his true people do, an earnest solicitude about the spiritual as well as temporal interests of their offspring, would, there can be little doubt, take many opportunities of instilling into his infant mind a hatred of the abominations of Egyptian idolatry, and a knowledge of the principles of the true religion, together with those precious promises which the Lord had made to them and their kindred as his peculiar people. Nor would they fail to make him acquainted with the stratagem by which they saved him from the fate of the other Hebrew boys, and with the arrangements through which he was destined to be separated from them, and to pass his maturer years within the precincts of the palace. And oh! with what earnestness of tone and gesture, may we suppose that those pious Hebrews, while they looked upon their son as the last earthly hope of Israel, would paint to his young imagination, the mortal dangers that beset that splendid scene, and exhort, and persuade, and implore him to remember his Creator in the days of his youth, and to turn neither to the right hand nor to the left from the way in which they had taught him to go. Counsels such as these, given in the interesting circumstances of their founding child, and enforced with all the fervour of parental solicitude, would entwine themselves with the earliest associations of his mind; and established as they were in their influence over the strongest feelings of his heart, by the power of divine grace; not all the fascinations of the court, not all the seductive examples of those with whom he was linked by the tenderest ties of duty and gratitude; not all the imposing solemnities of the Egyptian ritual, nor the still more engrossing charms of the wisdom of the Egyptians, "could seduce his bosom to forego" the simple and sublime principles of the true religion which he had learned in the hovel of the Hebrew slaves. Looking with a calm and observant eye on the race from whom he had sprung, and the people with whom his destiny seemed to have allied him, on the pure faith of the one, and the dark ceremonial of the other, on the virtues of his Hebrew brethren, which the furnace of affliction served only to exhibit in greater brightness, and the gross impurities and crimes that stained the character of his adopted countrymen, he was at no loss to perceive which were the people of God; and believing that, whatever light afflictions might press on them for a time, an eternal weight of glory would be theirs only who were devoted to Him, his pious mind formed the magnanimous resolution that, cost what it might, he would, in the face of Egypt and of the world, refuse "to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter."

It cannot be supposed, however, consistent with the meek character of Moses, and with the pious principles under which he acted, that, by an abrupt and precipitate flight, he would break all connection with his royal benefactress, and treat with disdainful contempt all the kind and conciliatory efforts which the affection of that amiable princess might make to shake his resolution, and attach him to herself. No; it was not in some fit of peevishness or sullen disappointment that he took that step, which he found it afterwards impossible to retrieve; nor was it rendered necessary by that generous, though impetuous, act of patriotism he performed, when he vindicated the cause of an oppressed countryman, and was obliged to consult his safety in a foreign land. His refusal to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter was neither a momentary impulse of feeling, nor a sudden act, of which, till he put it in execution, he had given no premonition, but it was the calm and settled purpose of his mind, which had grown with his growth, and strengthened with his strength, and which having been formed and cherished under the influence of faith and prayer, was the natural and inevitable measure of one, who felt that he could not be in his proper element, till he was among a people of one heart and spirit with himself. During the first period of his introduction at court, we may naturally suppose that the novelty and imposing grandeur of the scene, the incense of flattery that would be constantly offered to him, and the wide field of observation and enjoyment which Egyptian science would open to his mind, might draw off his attention, in some degree, from the principles and hopes he had been taught to cherish, and produce many a painful conflict in his mind. But the work of grace, whatever difficulties it might have to contend against, was advancing in his mind. The more that he felt its power, the more did he feel that he could no longer continue in a society, whose principles and ways were so diametrically opposite to his views, and that he must either overlook them with sinful connivance, or sail with the stream, in order to purchase the countenance of those around him. But this to him, who formed his estimate of things by the eye of faith, seeming too high a price at which to gain even the power and honours of a throne, he made up his mind, with every feeling of respect for his royal friend, of gratitude for her maternal attentions, and of solicitude for her welfare, no longer to continue in that state, which gave him the title and the privileges of "the son of Pharaoh's daughter."

Nor was it merely the surrender of a princely inheritance, which this resolution of Moses comprised. Had it been only to step from the splendours of a royal station, to retire into the simplicity of private life, there are some, mentioned in the annals of history, who, having made a similar descent, shew, that such a measure, however rare and extraordinary, is not altogether without a parallel. But never since the world began, has there been any other than Moses, who, without any disgust, and from no apprehension of danger, having every reason to anticipate a long and uninterrupted course of prosperity and honour, resigned his claims to a throne, from love to God and fidelity to his service, and placed himself in a condition where he could expect nothing but persecution in its severest form. It was not that the station of eminence to which he had been destined was necessarily incompatible with the maintenance of religious principles and the practice of religious duties—for there is no condition in the world where faith may not flourish, and the fruits of piety may not be produced—but it was because he saw it was absolutely impossible for him to serve the true God among a people wholly given to idolatry; and, therefore, persuaded as he was that fidelity to the divine service was infinitely more important to his well-being than if he could secure “all the treasures of Egypt,” he cast in his lot with those who were the people of God by virtue of a special covenant, but who were in a very different temporal condition from those he had left. It would be superfluous to detail, for who does not know the severe and tyrannical measures by which they were oppressed, by which injury was added to insult, and by which their strength was so greatly enfeebled, and their spirits so much crushed, that there was not one of all that populous race who dared to vindicate their wrongs, or demand a respite from their toils. Suffice it to say, that such was the relentless policy of the government, that even the princes and the leaders of Israel were compelled to labour under the lash of their unfeeling taskmasters. All this, which was well known to Moses, he was prepared to submit to: and whether he was doomed to bear a personal share in all the hardships of his brethren—whether he was driven, like an abject slave, to work in the kiln, and encounter the wasting heats of the furnace—or whether the royal partiality might have exempted him from the stern decree that consigned the whole of the Hebrew race to a hopeless servitude—he saw, that in all the afflictions of his people he would be afflicted. But none of all these things moved him; for having weighed in the balance of his judgment all the advantages of the situation he held, and all the difficulties of that for which he exchanged it—knowing, that if he clung to the family of Pharaoh, he must renounce the people of God—and that, if he joined himself to the people of God, he must bid a long farewell to all his greatness—he chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season;—to make common cause with those whose character and distinction has ever been, that, living by faith in that Saviour who was promised from the foundation of the world, they have, in every age, been separated from the world, and doomed to suffer reproach. How great must have been the strength of that faith, and the integrity of that heart, which could lead one, who enjoyed the highest dignity, the luxuries of literature, the honours of a royal state, to renounce every prospect of fame and distinction, and to part with objects which were likely to take so firm a hold of a young and active mind! All this Moses renounced, esteeming the reproach of Christ—a Saviour unknown for many ages after, and desecrated only by the eye of faith—greater than all the riches of Egypt. When we consider the magnitude of that sacrifice, which this heir of royalty made in the cause of religion, and the strength of resolution requisite for making it—when we consider that the objects and advantages which he surrendered appeal to the strongest principles of our nature, and entwine themselves with the firmest grasp around the desires that are uppermost in the human breast—we must feel convinced, that the self-denial of Moses was a greater act of faith than was exhibited by those heroic spirits who subdued kingdoms, and stopped the mouths of lions, and that his was, indeed, “the victory that overcometh the world.”

Consider what preparations Mercy has made for your Salvation.—God is ready to entertain you, and pardon all that you have done against him, if you will but come. Long as you have sinned, wilfully as you have sinned, heinously as you have sinned, he is ready to cast all behind his back, if you will but come. Though you have been prodigals, and run away from God, and have staid so long, he is ready even to meet you, and embrace you in his arms, and rejoice in your conversion if you will but turn. Even the earthly worldling and swinish drunkard may find God ready to bid them welcome, if they will but turn and come. Does this not move thy heart within thee? O sinner, if thou hast a heart of flesh, and not of stone in thee, methinks this should melt it. Shall the infinite Majesty of heaven even wait for thy returning, and be ready to receive thee, who has abused him, and forgotten him so long? Shall he delight in thy conversion, that might at any time glorify his justice in thy damnation; and yet does it not melt thy heart within thee, and art thou not yet ready to come in? Hast thou not as much reason to be ready to come, as God has to invite thee, and bid thee welcome? But this is not all: Christ has, upon the cross, opened a way for thee to the Father, that on his account thou mayest be welcome, if thou wilt come. And yet art thou not ready? A pardon is already expressly granted and offered thee in the Gospel; and yet art thou not ready?—BAXTER.

The Grace of God.—The grace of God in the heart of man is a tender plant in a strange unkindly soil; and, therefore, cannot well prosper and grow without much care and pains, and that of a skilful hand, and which hath the art of cherishing it.—ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON.

Praise.—No one need to be told, that the surest method to obtain new favours from an earthly benefactor, is to be thankful for those which he has already bestowed. It is the same with respect to our heavenly benefactor. Praise and thanksgiving are even more prevalent than sacrifice and prayers. I have somewhere met with an account of a Christian, who was shipwrecked upon a desolate island, while all his companions perished in the waves. In this situation, he spent many days in fasting and prayer, that God would open a way for his deliverance, but his prayer received no answer. At length, musing on the goodness of God, in preserving him from the dangers of the sea, he resolved to spend a day in thanksgiving and praise for this and other favours. Before the conclusion of the day a vessel arrived, and restored him in safety to his friends and his country. Another instance, equally in point, we find in the history of Solomon. At the dedication of the temple, many prayers were made, and many sacrifices offered, without any token of divine acceptance. But when singers and players on instruments began as one to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord, saying, “for he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever;” then the glory of the Lord descended and filled the temple. The reason why praise and thanksgiving are thus prevalent with God, is, that they, above all other duties, glorify him. “Whoso offereth praise,” saith he, “glorifieth me;” and those who thus honour him he will honour.—PAYSON.

SACRED POETRY.

PRAYER.

PRAYER is the soul's sincere desire,
Unutter'd or express;
The motion of a hidden fire,
That trembles in the breast.

Prayer is the burden of a sigh,
The falling of a tear;
The upward glancing of an eye,
When none but God is near.

Prayer is the simplest form of speech
That infant lips can try;
Prayer the sublimest strains that reach
The Majesty on high.

Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,
The Christian's native air;
His watchword at the gates of death,
He enters heaven by prayer.

Prayer is the contrite sinner's voice
Returning from his ways;
While angels in their songs rejoice,
And say, "Behold, he prays!"

The saints in prayer appear as one
In word, and deed, and mind,
When with the Father and his Son,
Their fellowship they find.

Nor prayer is made on earth alone,
The Holy Spirit pleads:
An Jesus on the eternal throne
For sinners intercedes.

O Thou by whom we come to God,
The life, the truth, the way,
The path of prayer Thyself hast trod:
Lord teach us how to pray!

Importance of habitual consistency in the Ministers of the Gospel.—"It is impossible," says the late Dr Adam Clarke, "that a minister of God should ever be a private man; even in his most trivial intercourse with others, it is never forgotten what his office is: the habit of every one's mind is to expect information or example from the company and conduct of a public minister. Such as we (ministers) are constantly living under the observation of mankind, and he who is always observed, should never venture on dubious conduct, or suppose, for a moment, that what he does in the view of another, can ever be a matter of indifference, or regarded as a trifle. I will tell you a curious circumstance that happened to me a few years ago:—I was about to set off from London to Ireland; a friend desired me to take charge of a young lady to Dublin, to which I readily agreed, and she was sent to me at the coach. I soon found, from her conversation, that she was a Roman Catholic; and I also quickly perceived that she had been led to entertain a very high opinion of me. After we had travelled some distance, talking occasionally on various subjects, the daylight began to sink fast away, when she took out of her reticule a small Catholic book of prayers, and commenced most seriously her evening devotions. While she was reading, such thoughts as these occurred to me, 'I believe this lady to be sincere in her religious creed, which I think to be a very dangerous one; she appears to be of an ingenuous temper, and to feel much personal respect for me; is there not here, then, a good opportunity, as well as subject, to exercise my influence, and to deliver her, if possible, from her erroneous creed?' 'But,' continued I in my thoughts, 'was she not intrusted to my care? would her friends have so intrusted her, had they ever suspected that an attempt at proselytism would be made? Would not the attempt be a breach of trust? and should I be a morally honest man, even if ultimate good were to accrue to Miss ——?' I instantly felt that my own honesty must be preserved, though the opportunity of apparent good might be lost. In a short time Miss —— closed her book with this observation, 'We Catholics, Dr Clarke, think it much better to believe too much than too little.' I replied, 'But, madam, in our belief we should recollect that we never should yield our assent to what is contradictory in itself, or to what contradicts other ascertained truths.' This was the only observation I made that looked at all toward Catholicism; in process of time we arrived at our journey's end, and I deposited her safely in the hands of her friends. From that time, till about two years ago, I never heard of Miss ——, till we met in the following way: I had been preaching at Chelsea Chapel, and entering the vestry, after the service, a lady followed me, shook hands, spoke with much emotion, and said, 'Do you not recollect me, Dr Clarke? I am Miss —— whom you kindly took care of to Ireland. I was then a Roman Catholic, now I am a Protestant, and have suffered much in consequence of the change.' I inquired how the alteration in her views was effected, and she gave me, in detail, the account which I shall shortly sum up to you. When she heard to whom she was about to be intrusted, she resolved closely to watch and observe this well known Protestant minister; she was pleased with the conversation, and with the friendliness shewn to her, and was so struck with the observation I had made in the coach, that she said it absolutely afterwards haunted her; caused her to examine and think for herself, and, at last, led her to freedom from her thralldom. 'But,' said she, 'I should never have been induced to examine, had it not been for the examination I had previously made of you. From the first moment you entered the coach I watched you narrowly; I thought now I have a fair opportunity of knowing something of these Protestants: and I will judge if what I have heard of them be true. Every word, every motion, every look of yours, Sir, was watched with the eye of a lynx: I felt you could not be acting a part, for you could not suspect that you were so observed. The result of all was—your conduct conciliated esteem, and removed prejudice; your one observation on belief, led me to those examinations, which the Spirit of God has blessed to my conversion: and I now stand before you, the convert of your three days' behaviour between London and Dublin.' 'You see from this account,' continued Dr C., 'how much all ministers should ever feel themselves as public men; how cautious should be their conduct; and how guarded their conversation. Had I attempted to proselytize this lady, all her prejudices would have been up in arms; had my behaviour been unbecomingly light, or causelessly austere, she would have been either disgusted or repelled, and her preconceived notions of Protestants would have been confirmed: she saw and heard what satisfied her. Thus, even in social intercourse, the public minister may, and should always be, the CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTOR.'

"Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me."—JOHN xiv. 6.

THE history of mankind, when traced up to the period which immediately succeeded the fall, affords a lamentable proof, not only of their moral guilt, but of their ignorance of God. The very first religious act which is recorded in the book of Genesis, as having been performed by Cain, the oldest of the sons of Adam, was the presentation of "an offering" unto the Lord, and in relation to it, the sacred historian says, "unto Cain and his offering," God "had not respect." There is every reason to believe, that it was ignorance of the holy nature of God, and of the manner in which he is to be approached by guilty creatures, that led Cain to present an unacceptable gift. During the long period which elapsed between the fall, when sin was introduced into the world, and the deluge, when iniquity had advanced with such fearful rapidity as to have converted the whole earth into one horrid mass of sensuality, profligacy, and ungodliness, which could no longer be permitted to exist before the holy and righteous Creator, it is to be remarked, that, in addition to Abel, who presented an acceptable offering unto the Lord, there are only two of the antediluvian patriarchs, Enoch and Noah, who are said to have "walked with God." Noah, however, enjoyed the privilege of a personal revelation of the will of God,—a privilege which, at a subsequent period, was bestowed on Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But even at this early period of the world, whenever such revelations were long withheld, the grossest darkness and ignorance prevailed among mankind. The posterity of Jacob, groaning under the miseries of Egyptian bondage, would have sunk at length under the deplorable superstition and idolatry of their oppressors, had they not been delivered by the special interposition of God. Moses received a personal revelation, and to him were, at length, committed the precepts of the moral law. During many succeeding periods of Jewish history, revelations from heaven were made to the servants of God: prophets arose, and the Old Testament Scriptures were committed to writing. Whatever knowledge, then, of the nature of the true God may have existed, at different times, among the people of Israel, it cannot be looked upon as the product of the human mind. Proceeding, therefore, to an examination of the records of profane history, it will not be very difficult to shew, that human reason is incapable of conducting mankind to the knowledge of the true God; and that one of the most constant and melancholy proofs of original apostasy, is their profound ignorance of the principles of true religion.

The mind of man can never be in a neutral or quiescent state, in regard to a supreme object of veneration. Hence, whenever a true and spiritual acquaintance with the nature and perfections of the great and glorious Creator is lost, it speedily adopts very degrading and revolting ideas of supernatural power. It becomes the dupe of its own hopes and fears, and their combined production has been that diversified system of superstition and idolatry, which has spread over all the limits of the heathen world. One of the earliest transitions in the mind of fallen man, from the worship of the true God, was to the adoration of those works of his power, from which the race imagined they obtained the greatest accessions of comfort and enjoyment. The sun is one of the most wonderful of the material works of God,—the source of light and heat; under the influence of his benignant rays the fruits of the earth advance to maturity, and his presence diffuses hilarity and joy over the life of man. The absence of his light is, in some degree, supplied by the moon and stars. The knowledge of the great Creator himself being lost through ages of spiritual darkness, and the benefits being so apparent which the inhabitants of the world derive from the great luminaries of the firmament, these luminaries became the earliest objects of idolatry. We find from the Old Testament history, that they were worshipped among the heathen nations, whom the Israelites were enjoined to destroy, previously to their settlement in the land of Canaan; and the high places, the groves, and the altars taken notice of in the sacred record, seem to have been the appointed places where the profane rites of idolatry were celebrated, and which were; therefore, demolished by the express command of God. The same mode of worshipping the creature instead of the Creator, was practised among the ancient Persians and Babylonians.

The principle of utility seems thus to have been the basis on which some of the earliest systems of idolatry have been founded by mankind, when they had lost the knowledge of the one true God; and it is obvious, that it admits of an extensive development and a varied application, in proportion to the wants of the race, and to those inexhaustible sources, from which, through the continual goodness of a merciful Creator, they may be supplied. The consequence has been, that, in addition to the heavenly bodies, those creatures of God which are useful to man have been exalted as objects of worship by fallen beings, whose understanding was no longer enlightened by direct emanation from the source of true religious knowledge, or through the medium of a revelation of his holy will. None, however, of the material works of creation is calculated to make such a striking impression upon the senses and the mind of man, as the magnificent luminaries which adorn the firmament; none to excite such a universal feeling of the dependence of the race upon a higher power than their own for the continuance of life; and none which seems so unceasingly to appeal to mankind for the expression of thanks, on account of the obvious benefits which they confer. But when the attention of the idolater was not fixed upon them,—when his mind was yet in a state of degrading ignorance in regard to the nature of the true God, and when, directed by the general principle of selfishness, it recognised utility alone as the foundation of homage, it was under the necessity of seeking upon earth, for the objects to which it was to render its acknowledgments. Among the innumerable proofs of the Creator's care, and of his kindness to the children of men, we are struck with the abundant provision which he has made for the support of life. The earth, by culture, produces food for man; and the Almighty hath replenished it with the inferior animals, which are given for his use, and contribute, in a very great degree, not only to the sustentation, but to the comfort of his existence. Hence, another species of idolatry is that which made the vegetable productions of the earth, and the inferior tribes of living beings, the objects of worship. It is difficult to suppose, that the mind of man, in a state of civilization, should be capable of such degradation; but among the ancient Egyptians, although they were celebrated for their wisdom and learning, the productions of the field and garden were acknowledged as deities; and the mockeries of religious worship were offered to the ox, the dog, the cat, the crocodile. It seems exceedingly probable, that it was a portion of the idolatrous rites of the Egyptians, with which the mass of the Israelitish nation was leavened during their long captivity, which led them to that forgetfulness of God, which manifested itself at Mount Sinai, when they made the golden calf, and worshipped it.

In various regions of the world another species of idolatry has prevailed, which rests upon the same principles as that which has already been noticed, although it involves a greater degree of complication in its details. When the selfish feelings of mankind, in a state of deplorable ignorance in regard to the divine truths of religion, have led them to pay homage to the great luminaries of the heavens, the sun, the moon, and the stars,—to the vegetable productions of the soil,—and to the inferior animals, because they perceived that they were dependent upon them for the continuance of life and all its comforts, it is not an improbable supposition, that extending themselves in the same direction, towards objects of utility or advantage, the idea would be entertained of exalting to supernatural honours, such of the human race as were eminently distinguished as the benefactors of their country. Idolatry actually turned itself into this channel, and the knowledge of this fact affords an explanation of the mysteries of the pantheon. The deification of the illustrious dead formed the main foundation of the polytheism of the far celebrated states of Greece and Rome, to which more particular allusion will afterwards be made. In the meantime, we may remark that this species of idolatry is such a natural consequence of the operation of the principle of false religion, that we find it established amongst the earliest nations of antiquity, and prevailing in heathen lands, even to the present day. The Egyptians paid homage not only to Osiris and Isis, the chief objects of idolatry, out to many other imaginary deities; the Persians also acknowledged a multiplicity of false gods. The objects of Hindu idolatry are endless, presiding over the air, the sun, the moon, the rivers, and fountains. The following extract is from Davis's General Description of the Empire of China, and its Inhabitants:—"China has in fact her mythology in common with all other nations; and under this head we must range the persons styled Foh-shin-woong, Hoding-ty, and their immediate successors who, like the demi-gods and heroes of Grecian fable, rescued mankind, by their ability or enterprise, from the most primitive barbarism, and have since been invested with super-human attributes."

One of the most natural consequences of raising the illustrious dead into objects of sinful homage and adoration, was image worship, which is another step in the downward progress of the human mind, when it is left to its own resources in the investigation of the great truths of religion. Nor was this practice confined to the construction and adoration of images of men; for representations were formed of the heavenly bodies, and of the inferior animals. But whatever may have been the objects which the image was intended to shadow forth, the degradation of worshipping the works of man's hands was equally great. The process is easily conceived, by which a transition may have been made from the original object of worship to its image, and especially, if a departed fellow-creature was that object. It is a pleasing gratification of affection to possess a likeness or representation of those who are respected and loved, after death has removed them from the observation of the eye; and the feelings from which it arises may have been the foundation of image worship in the minds of those who are already degraded by the practices of idolatry. The image itself being constructed, it was but one other act in advance, to assign to it the place which was occupied by its prototype. But in the progress of time, image worship, even without reference to a prototype, became prevalent over almost every part of the heathen world. Mankind having transferred their adoration to an object which their own hands had constructed, imagination lent its aid to complete what memory had begun, and the temples were filled with representations of beings, whose existence was merely potential.

The brief historical sketch which has now been given, will serve to illustrate the position, that human reason, unassisted, is incapable of arriving at the knowledge of the true God, or even of preserving it, when communicated, in a state of purity, unless when the mind is enlightened by personal revelation from heaven, or by the records of such revelation. Ignorance of God, therefore, along with moral depravity, affords a proof of the degradation and misery in which the posterity of Adam have been involved since the fall. The deplorable consequences of such ignorance are most powerfully described by the Apostle Paul, in the account which he gives of the degraded condition of the heathens: "They changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things. Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness, through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves: who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever." Rom. i. 23-25. How wretched, then, and miserable is man, when left to himself,—born, living, and dying, in a state of alienation from God! How indispensable to his comfort and happiness is the glorious light of divine revelation!

LATE REV. ALEXANDER STEWART, D. D.,

For some time, about the commencement of the present century, as is well known, the whole of Scotland was thrown into a state of alarm, by the dread of a threatened invasion from the French. Many of the people were trained to the use of arms; volunteer regiments were raised in different parts of the country, and even from the pulpits of the parish churches, exhortations were given to bravery and manly fortitude, in the view of the approaching calamity. In such circumstances, Mr Stewart could not be indifferent to the interests of his country. He accepted, accordingly, of the appointment of chaplain to the Athole regiment of volunteers. This situation, which was without emolument, he the more readily undertook, hoping to be useful to the soldiers. His expectations, however, in this respect, were scarcely realized; and he felt himself exposed to many temptations which were far from agreeable to his high-toned Christian feelings.

At the invitation of several clerical friends in Ross-shire, he took a journey into that county in 1802, where he was welcomed by many of the pious ministers who had heard with joy of the revival at Moulin. A lively interest had been excited in his behalf; and wherever he went, his character and recent conversion had made him already extensively known. Among other esteemed brethren in that country, he visited Mr Charles Calder, minister of Urquhart, whose piety and devoted zeal Mr Stewart was now prepared fully to appreciate. He was persuaded to remain for a few days, and assist at the Sacrament, which was about to be dispensed; and he left the manse of Urquhart, grateful to God for the refreshing intercourse he had there enjoyed. He was afterwards connected with the family by a closer tie, having married Mr Calder's eldest daughter; and on that occasion he says in a letter to Mr Black, "that it had pleased the Lord to enrich him with one of the most precious temporal blessings he had to bestow."

As Mr Stewart's family was increasing, it was evident that his income at Moulin was far from being adequate to their support. Arrangements were therefore attempted to be made to procure his translation to some other parish. Several plans were at first in agitation to secure his valuable services for Edinburgh, and into these plans Mr Black of course entered warmly. But before they were fully matured, the parish of Dingwall became vacant, and a very general desire was felt in that town to secure the presentation for Mr Stewart. For a time, however, the prospect appeared to be blasted, when suddenly the whole aspect of affairs changed, and the appointment was obtained. On this subject Mr Stewart writes thus to Mr Black:—

"Prepare, my dear brother, to hear what will surprise you. Our times are in the Lord's hands, and his counsel shall stand. When every prospect and symptom of a change of place was removed, and when my people and I were set down again quietly and comfortably together, a new and unexpected turn has agitated us afresh. The post brought me a letter subscribed by the whole town-council of Dingwall, stating the general desire of the parish to have me called to minister to them the word of life,—the providences that had frustrated the views of other candidates, and promoted those respecting my appointment,—and containing a cordial and a pressing invitation to accept the charge.

"Besides this, I had a letter from some of the serious inhabitants of the place, narrating the various turns of Providence, the offers made to other ministers connected with members of the council, their refusal, the persevering prayers, and other means employed by the godly all over the country, to gain the council; the delays, alarms, and disappointments, and at last the complete success of their wishes.

"You will learn every thing more particularly, when I shew you the correspondence in Perth, if it please God we meet there. When I considered all the steps and circumstances,—a worldly engine put in motion by the breath of prayer, the ‘iron-gate opening of its own accord,’—I could not but acknowledge the divine call, nor hesitate to accept it. I have, accordingly, written my answer, accepting the council’s invitation. How to manage with the poor Moulin people, is the present difficulty. I took a number of them into my room last night, after worship, read my letters, and conversed with them. They were, indeed, sorely grieved, yet they did not deny the call being of God, and nothing but their personal attachment to me hindered them from fully acquiescing in it.”

As the time drew near when he must leave his beloved flock at Moulin, Mr Stewart was delighted to see that their attachment to him continued unabated:—

“Now,” says he, “that the time of my departure is almost at hand, you will be anxious to know how it fares with us all. There is really much composure and quiet acquiescence that prevail. Some weeks ago, I used only to make distant allusions to the situation in which we stood. Of late, I have thought proper to speak of our separation more explicitly, and make the mention of it somewhat familiar to our ears, so as to be able to think and talk of it without overpowering emotions. Our evening readings are crowded. The people seem to swallow the Word greedily, considering that their time may be short.”

His reception in Dingwall was warm and cordial. Every one seemed to vie with his neighbour in shewing attention to their new pastor. They hung upon his lips as he faithfully and affectionately declared to them the words of eternal life; and in his private ministrations, he met with much to encourage him in the responsible charge which he had undertaken.

About seven months after he had entered upon his new charge, Mr Stewart was deeply affected by the mournful intelligence of the death of his warm friend and kind instructor, Mr Black, who was suddenly cut off on the 25th February 1806. The stroke was severe, more especially to one who regarded him as to a certain degree his spiritual father, by whom he had been begotten in the bonds of the Gospel. They had been united in the closest bonds of Christian affection, and the whole of their correspondence was pervaded by a spirit of tenderness and mutual charity, such as well becomes the consistent followers of the meek and the lowly Jesus. They, each of them, esteemed the other better than himself, and thus with the utmost cordiality, they aided and encouraged each other in the way to glory.

In little more than two years, however, Providence raised up to Mr Stewart, in place of the friend whom he had lost, one with whom he enjoyed a frequent and intimate correspondence by letter, though they never met face to face. The first letter received from this hitherto unknown friend, who was a clergyman in Staffordshire, was dated in June 1808; and Mr Stewart acknowledges, in the letter which he wrote in reply, that he had been much comforted and refreshed by the unexpected communication.

In the discharge of his duties as a faithful minister of Christ, Mr Stewart was called to contend with many difficulties, which, had he not been a man of faith and prayer, might have discouraged and depressed him. The appearances were by no means so favourable at Dingwall as at Moulin, and accordingly we find him thus describing the spiritual condition of his parish in a letter to a friend:—

“To your queries about the state of religion in this parish, I fear I must answer in a complaining tone. Irreligion, indifference about spiritual concerns, attachment to the world, the intemperate use of spirituous liquors prevail to a melancholy extent. The doctrines of the Gospel are heard, in the main, I think, with indifference rather than dislike, which I ascribe to their not being understood or attended to. Some weeks ago, on occasion of preaching on the necessity of regeneration with close application, a strong and general dissatisfaction was openly expressed in many companies during the ensuing week, and some declared they were on the point of quitting the Church. I thought there was something hopeful in this movement. They seemed, at last, to have felt a little the sword’s point. But, alas! it went no farther. They only knit their brows, muttered something against the preacher, and then sat as composedly on their seats as ever. But still, amidst this abounding aversion and resistance to the truth, the good seed appears not to have altogether perished. There are several, among the lower ranks, who shew an earnest desire for religious knowledge, and the company and fellowship of pious persons, and appear to receive ‘the truth in the love of it.’ Our advanced Christians bring me some encouraging intelligence of this kind, from time to time. While I am ready to cry, almost in despondency, ‘Who hath believed our report?’ one or two instances of awakened souls encourage me to say, ‘Behold, is not here the arm of the Lord revealed!’”

These remarks were intended to apply to the English congregation, who were by no means satisfied with his mode of preaching; while, by his Gaelic people, he was often strengthened and encouraged in his Master’s work. By the blessing of God, however, upon his unwearied exertions, a decided change soon began to manifest itself in the outward aspect, at least, of the parishioners of Dingwall; and even where vital religion had not taken possession of the heart, there was an evident improvement in the external deportment of the people.

Zealous and active as Mr Stewart was in his ministerial duties, he found leisure to engage, to some extent, in literary pursuits. Besides occasional contributions to periodical works, he continued to prosecute his favourite study of the Gaelic language; and, as the fruit of his labours, he at length gave to the world his well-known Gaelic Grammar. So much were the public satisfied with the talent and research displayed in this work, that its author was requested, by the Highland Society of London, to revise the originals of Ossian’s Poems, which they had resolved to publish. The task thus assigned him was one of no small difficulty, owing to the age and mutilated state of the manuscripts; he performed it, however, with singular ability and success. Such was the reputation which Mr Stewart had now acquired as a Gaelic scholar, that a proposal was made to him by the Highland Society of Scotland to execute a Dictionary of the language: at the same time an offer was held out of a handsome remuneration on the completion of the work. After weighing the matter fully, he declined the proposal, chiefly on the ground that it would withdraw his mind too much from the laborious duties of his spiritual calling. At the same time he devoted his leisure hours to the translation of the Shorter Catechism into Gaelic, the revival of the Gaelic Psalms, and the preparation of some valuable Tracts in the same language. Dr Stuart of Luss also applied to him for assistance in the great work which had been committed to his hands—a revision of the entire Gaelic Bible.

While thus adverting to Mr Stewart's useful labours as a translator, an incident may be mentioned in connection with this subject, which displays, in a very striking light, his amiable dispositions. Having observed in the reports of the Baptist Missions a letter from the celebrated Dr Carey of Serampore to Mr Fuller, complaining of the weak state of his eyes, and begging Mr Fuller to procure for him a copy of Van Der Hooght's edition of the Hebrew Bible, Mr Stewart immediately said to himself, "I wish the worthy man had my copy," and sitting down, wrote, offering it, and requesting to be informed how it might be transmitted. The offer was gladly accepted, and "I with great pleasure," he says, "followed the direction, wrote a letter of some length to Carey, and sent off my parcel to London. I dare say you remember my favourite Hebrew Bible in two volumes. I parted with it, with something of the same feelings that a pious parent might do with a favourite son, going on a mission to the heathen,—with a little regret, but with much good will." This circumstance led to an interesting correspondence with Mr Fuller and Dr Carey, which was carried on for some time.

Mr Stewart's labours, both as a faithful minister and an ardent lover of literature, were so multiplied and exhausting, that his health was at length seriously affected; and in two years after his settlement at Dingwall he was seized with a severe and protracted illness, which weakened his constitution. In 1811, four years after his previous attack, symptoms of an internal disorder began to manifest themselves, which, though it might be alleviated for a time, must sooner or later, bring him to the grave. He still continued, however, amid frequent paroxysms of the most acute pain, to discharge his duties in his parish. But the following extract from a letter which he wrote to a friend, shews that he sometimes gave way to feelings of despondency, the consequence, probably, of his bodily ailments:—

"I wish I could cheer you with good news from this little town and parish, but, alas! we seem to be doing nothing, almost quite dead. I was laid aside for some weeks, having been seized with a topical complaint, which might have proved fatal, no surgeon being at hand, if I had not been mercifully directed and enabled to use the proper means for procuring relief. I hoped that my own spirit had been softened and warned by this visitation, but, alas! all was like the morning cloud. My own vineyard I have not kept, and now it is growing over with thorns. I have not a heart nor a soul to employ in the honourable service of the most honourable of all Masters, but I am to try, at least, to employ my silly body in the work, and am to begin this day a course of parochial examination. Woes me! for the day goeth away, the shadows of the evening are stretched out over me, and little or nothing done for Him that loved me, and gave himself for me,—unprofitable servant!"

In addition to his personal sufferings, Mr Stewart was called to endure a heavy trial in the death of his beloved father-in-law, Mr Calder of Urquhart. The loss of such a man was deeply felt, not merely in his own parish, but in the whole surrounding neighbourhood. His death is thus described, briefly, by Mr Stewart:

"He was removed to glory," says he, "after seven days' illness. This last stage of his journey was indeed a very painful one to the flesh, but he was blessed with perfect composure of mind. While he shewed the deepest self-abasement, yet the love, the grace, the fullness, and glory of his adorable Redeemer, were his constant theme. Though torn with acute inward pain, he never uttered a complaining word; not a feature of his face indicated a struggle to suppress complaint. The most serene, resplendent luminary of our horizon, is set. His affectionate, bereaved parish, are left for a time as sheep without a shepherd. His pious, venerable widow, bowed down with infirmities and broken health, is left a solitary pilgrim in the wilderness. His tender attached daughters, who doated on their father with almost more than filial piety, have felt a pang in parting with him, which time alone can heal."

For some years Mr Stewart continued to officiate regularly every Sabbath, and to discharge his parochial duties with fidelity, though amid much weakness. At length, in 1819, the symptoms of his disorder had become so alarming, that he was strongly advised to set out for Edinburgh, that he might obtain the most skillful medical aid. The journey he accomplished without any material injury to his health, but having experienced no permanent relief from the means employed, he returned home. As the disease still increased in severity, however, it was thought to be of great importance that he should again venture on a journey southward, and try the effects of a winter's residence in Edinburgh.

He had not been more than a few months in the metropolis, when the death of the minister of the first charge of Canongate led to his appointment to that charge, where, in conjunction with his truly excellent colleague, Dr Buchanan, he laboured during the short remaining period of his life. The disease, from which he had suffered so much, soon returned with unabated severity, and in the course of 1820 he was several months laid aside from duty. His constitution, already much enfeebled, sustained a violent shock from this attack, and though, after a partial recovery, he resumed his pulpit duties for a time, the Sacramental Sabbath, in May 1821, was the last occasion on which he had strength sufficient to appear in public. From that day he gradually became weaker in body, and more sensibly impressed with the prospect of his approaching departure.

"Two of his sons having laid him down one evening to rest, 'My dear boys,' said he, 'take your father's blessing, it may be the last time I will give it you.—May the God of your fathers bless you, and keep you, and make his countenance to shine upon you, and give you peace!'

"On another occasion, to one of them, supporting him under a fit of pain, he said, 'You will not have it to do long.' 'All shall be well with you, my dear father,' said the affectionate youth. 'O yes,' cried he immediately, 'I have evidences which I cannot deny, that the Lord has been gracious to me. But I now live by faith, I have no sensible enjoyments.'

"On these occasions of intense pain, the grace of patience had its work so perfect, that it was a common remark of his, 'David had to sing of mercy and judgment together, but it is all mercy with me.'"

Death, at length, came as a release from his sufferings, and on Sabbath the 27th of May his happy spirit winged its flight to another and a better world. To him "to live" had been "Christ," and, of course, "to die was" unspeakable "gain." "He had finished his course, he had kept the faith," and it was now his high privilege to receive that "crown of glory which had been laid up for him in the heavens." "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them."

MECHANICS.

BY THE REV. JAMES BRODIE,

Minister of Monimail.

MECHANICS may be aptly defined the science of motion, as practically applied by man; for the immediate object of all our contrivances is either to produce, or to regulate motion. Machines are divided into two classes, according to the kind of motion on which their action depends, each class being regulated by its own peculiar laws.

UNIFORM MOTION.—When the motion is uniform, we have only to attend to three particulars—the force employed, the quantity of matter moved, and the velocity communicated. These bear to each other certain definite relations, which may be expressed in the following propositions, naturally deducible from the laws of motion, formerly described:—

I. The force, being directly proportioned both to the quantity of matter and to the velocity, is always equivalent to the product of the two. If, for example, a body weighing twenty pounds, moves at the rate of two miles in a minute, the multiplication of twenty by two will give the measure of the force necessary for producing or checking its speed.

II. Two bodies differing in size, and moving in opposite directions, will balance each other when their velocities are inversely proportioned to their weight, or, in other words, when the weight of the one body, multiplied by the space through which it passes, is equal to the weight of the other, multiplied by the space which it goes over. In all mechanical calculations, it is considered that we have a certain quantity of matter to be put in motion, which we denominate the weight, and mark W, and a given velocity to be communicated to it; while, in order to accomplish this end, we have another body, which is termed the power, and marked P, acting in a different direction, and to which any requisite motion can be applied.

All the varied contrivances, exhibiting uniform motion, consist of some combinations of six simple machines,—the lever, the wheel, the pulley, the inclined plane, the wedge, and the screw. These are commonly called the mechanic powers, or elements of machinery.

The lever is an inflexible bar, resting on a fulcrum or prop, on which it turns as a centre. In the first kind of lever, the weight and power are attached on opposite sides of the fulcrum. Of this the balance affords one of the most familiar illustrations. In the second variety, the weight and power are on the same side of the fulcrum, the lever resting on one end. Of this the druggist's knife, fastened at one end, affords an example, as does the wheelbarrow, in which the axle is the fulcrum. In all varieties of the lever, the spaces passed over by the weight and power are proportioned to their distance from the fulcrum; in order, therefore, to produce an equilibrium, the lighter either of them is, the greater its distance must be.

Levers are commonly employed in raising great weights to small distances, as in the crow-bar and hand-spike; they are also employed in some cutting instruments, such as scissors and pincers, and are frequently combined with other machines, and sometimes with each other. The moveable bones of animals are all levers, and exhibit very beautiful illustrations of the principles we have now been describing.

The wheel, or, as it is sometimes termed, the wheel and axle, may be considered as merely a succession of levers. The centre or axis is the fulcrum; one of the forces is applied to the circumference of the wheel, and the other to the circumference of the axle. Their respective velocities being proportioned to the circles they describe, they are inversely to each other as their distances from the centre of motion. If a power, for example, of one pound be applied to the circumference of a wheel eight feet in diameter, it will be an exact counterpoise to a weight of eight pounds, on an axle whose diameter is one foot. Wheels may be combined together, and when the axle of the one machine is so connected with the wheel of the other, (by means of teeth or bands) that their circumferences move with equal rapidity, the mechanical advantage is in the compound ratio of the simple machines employed.

The wheel, either by itself, or combined with other mechanic powers, is employed in cranes, capstans, and similar contrivances, for raising heavy weights. It is also employed in watches and clocks, in corn and spinning mills, and in the greater number of large and complicated machines.

The third mechanical power is the pulley, which is a small wheel turning upon an axis, and having a groove in its circumference to admit a rope. The fulcrum is at one end of the rope, the power at the other, and the weight is supported by the axis of the pulley. As in the lever and wheel, the weight and power are inversely to each other as their distances from the fulcrum or centre of motion. The advantage gained by a single pulley is as two to one.

Pulleys may be combined together in various ways and with various effects. They are very light, and occupy little room, and are therefore employed in those machines which are intended to be frequently moved; their most common application is to the rigging of ships.

The inclined plane, as its name imports, is a sloping surface along which the weight is moved. Without a reference to figures, it is hardly possible to give an intelligible explanation of its properties, which vary according to the direction in which the power acts; but it holds universally true, that the smaller the elevation of the plane, the less is the resistance offered by the weight.

It is occasionally introduced, in combination with other contrivances, into complicated machines, but is most commonly employed when very great weights are to be moved, as in making excavations, and in raising large blocks of stone for building. All acclivities, whether natural or artificial, up which any body is rolled or drawn, must be considered as inclined planes.

The wedge, when applied to uniform motion, is merely a variety of the inclined plane. The thinner the back or head of the wedge, and the greater the length, the greater will be its power. It is commonly employed in splitting wood and stone, and in raising weights to a small height. A great variety of cutting instruments, such as chisels and knives, which act by simple pressure, are also to be considered varieties of this mechanic power. When the power acts by percussion, as in the hatchet, or where pressure is combined with a sliding movement, as in the knife, the effect depends partly on the mechanical advantage gained by the wedge, and partly on principles, to be afterwards explained, when we come to treat of accelerated motion.

The form of the screw is familiar to all. It may be considered an inclined plane, wound round a cylinder. As the weight is raised at every turn, a height equal to the distance between the threads or spirals of the screw, the power will bear the same proportion to the weight, that this distance does to the circle described by the power. The screw is seldom employed without being combined with the lever, which greatly increases the effect of the machine, by enlarging the space passed through by the power. The screw is most commonly employed in pressing substances together, though it is sometimes used, as in the shipbuilder's jack, for raising weights.

This account that we have endeavoured to give of the elements of machinery, is necessarily very imperfect; for without figures it is hardly possible to render such a description intelligible. Some may be inclined to consider the subject as altogether destitute of interest; but when we call to mind the beneficial effects produced by mechanical ingenuity—when we remember that, by the varied modifications and combinations of the simple contrivances we have enumerated, man is enabled to undertake those labours on which the comfort of civilized communities depends, we will view it in a very different light: and the Christian, while he gratefully adores the wisdom and goodness of the Creator, who has given us at once hands to execute, and minds to plan, will find yet deeper emotions awakened in his bosom, when he finds Jesus termed the carpenter, (Mark vi. 3;) when he remembers that the great Architect of the universe took on him our nature, and, labouring with his hands as an humble mechanic, engaged in forming machines like these.

ACCELERATED AND RETARDED MOTION. Impulse and Percussion.—In this branch of mechanics there are four things to be considered: F, the force, by which the motion is produced or destroyed; T, the time, during which the force acts; S, the space passed over during that time; and V, the total velocity communicated by an accelerating force, or destroyed by a retarding one.

W, the weight or quantity of matter, bears the same proportion to the force as in uniform motion; and in the following propositions is considered as remaining always the same.

Prop. I. When the time during which the force acts continues the same, the force, the velocity produced, and the space passed over, are all proportional to each other.

Prop. II. When the force continues the same, the velocity and time are directly proportional to each other; but the space described is proportioned to their squares.

Prop. III. If the space continue the same, the time and velocity are inversely proportional to each other; while the force is directly as the square of the velocity, and inversely as the square of the time.

Prop. IV. When the velocity continues the same, the space and time are directly proportional to each other, but inversely proportioned to the force.

These propositions may be demonstrated and illustrated in various ways. Our limits, however, will only allow a short explanation of the fourth, on which the mechanical actions we are about to investigate more especially depend.

A moment's reflection will shew, that in communicating a given velocity to any body, the longer it moves, while the velocity is acquiring, the greater is the space that it must pass over; while, on the other hand, the greater the space it passes through, the longer will it move. Now this is all we affirm when we say, that in this case the space and time are directly proportional to each other. Again, the force is inversely proportioned to the time, for this is only affirming that a double force will be required to produce the same effect in half the time, and a force three times as great to produce it in one-third of the time. And the space and time, being in this case, proportioned to each other, whatever relation the force bears to the one it must also bear to the other; that is, the same velocity, if communicated in half the space, will be communicated in half the time, and will therefore require a double force to produce it.

These propositions are equally applicable to retarded motion as to accelerated; for by the two laws of motion, a body has the same tendency to continue in a state of motion as in a state of rest, while every change of state must have a corresponding force. It requires, therefore, the same force to destroy a motion, as to communicate it, providing the forces be uniform in their action, and the times and spaces in which they act be equal.

In shewing the application of these propositions to mechanical actions, let us first make a hypothetical experiment. If we take a solid body, say a round stone of ten pounds weight, and let it fall from a height of ten feet, the force of gravitation, however often the experiment may be repeated, will always give it a certain velocity by the time it has fallen through that space. If after it has acquired this velocity, we suppose that gravitation ceases to act, and that a uniform resistance, opposed to its further descent, destroys its velocity in the same time, or in the same space, as that in which it was communicated, the force required to stop the body will be the same as that which set it in motion, that is, equal to the power of gravitation acting on the body, or, as it is usually expressed, a pressure or weight of ten pounds. On this principle the motion of pendulums depends, the same force destroying, while they ascend, the velocity that it communicated in their descent. But again, if after the stone has acquired the given velocity, and gravitation has ceased to act, it be stopped while passing over half the space, the force required will be just double of what it was before; equal, that is to say, to a weight of twenty pounds. It is not, however, necessary, that before the retarding force begins, the accelerating force should cease; for, by the second law of motion, if two or more forces act upon a body at once, its position, at the end of any given time, will be the same as if they had acted upon it in succession for the given time. If, therefore, after the body has fallen through five feet, or half the given space, a uniform resistance be applied, which will destroy its motion by the time it has passed over the other five feet, the force required is exactly the same as before. Hence, if the stone be dexterously caught by the hands, at the height of five feet, and gradually stopped, so that, by the time it comes near the ground, its velocity is expended, it may be easily supported without touching the ground at all, and the experiment, though apparently hazardous, may be performed without hurting the hands. If, instead of yielding thus freely to its impulse, the hands be kept so stiff as to destroy the velocity in a quarter of the time, the force required will be four times as great, or forty pounds, and the hands will receive a slight contusion, yet not such a one as can materially injure them. If, again, the hands be laid down on a soft bank, which will yield half a foot, or one-twentieth of the distance which the body fell through while its velocity was accelerating, the force will be twenty times as great, or 200 pounds, and the stroke will bruise the hand, but not break the bones. If the hand be laid on a rock, which will not yield at all, the motion must be destroyed while the hand is squeezing together; now, supposing that the hand may be so compressed, that its thickness shall be diminished one quarter of an inch, the velocity must be destroyed while the body passes through that distance, which being the 480th part of 10 feet, makes the force required 4800 pounds, a force which, it is almost needless to say, will break the bones. If, instead of the hand, a stone be substituted, which will yield only one-sixteenth of an inch, (and few will yield so much,) the force required will be 19,200 pounds, by which the stone will be shattered to pieces, that is, if the body on which it rests, and that by which it is struck, be considered incompressible. If there be no yielding at all, so that the force is instantaneously destroyed, the force must evidently be infinite. In this manner we explain the effect of turf, sand, bags of wool, &c., in breaking a fall, and deadening the force of cannon balls.

It is on this principle of the force being inversely as the space, or time, taken to communicate or to destroy the velocity, that the advantage gained by employing hammers and similar tools depends. The velocity is communicated by the arm in a slow and gradual manner, while we draw the stroke; but is very quickly destroyed by hitting against the nail, and consequently the force required to stop it is much greater than that which put it in motion. The space, for example, through which the sledge hammer passes while swinging round the blacksmith's head, is probably more than a thousand times greater than that through which it goes, when its velocity is destroyed by striking the heated metal, and consequently the force required to stop it must be proportionably great. On the same hypothesis we explain the effect of a blow, whether given by a sword, a stick, a stone, or simply by the fist; the velocity in all these cases being slowly produced, and quickly destroyed.

If we communicate the velocity quickly, the effect is the same as if we stopped it in the same manner. If we propel a stone by giving it a blow, the hand will be just as much pained as if it were afterwards to be struck by the stone thus set in motion.

By the same rule, we can explain why a hammer of steel is better for driving in a nail than one of lead, or than a wooden mallet of the same weight; because being much less compressible, its motion is more rapidly checked, and its force upon the nail is greater.

Again, we find it, if not impossible, at least extremely difficult, to drive a nail into a pliable board, such as a piece of lath, unless it be prevented from bending; because the board yielding to the stroke, the velocity is very gradually destroyed, and the force is not sufficient to overcome the resistance offered to the nail. From the same cause, a pliant branch can with difficulty be cut by the hatchet.

The difference of force required to make a bolt go into a hole previously made for it, when a blow is used, and when simple pushing is employed, must have been remarked by every one. It must also have been observed, that a blow, though able to move the bolt a little, requires to be frequently repeated before it can be completely driven in, while a pressure able to move it at all forces it in at once. Here, (the hole being previously made,) the only resistance is friction. From the nature of friction we know, that whatever force is necessary to set a body in motion, it will require a much smaller one to keep it moving; a pressure which acts uniformly, if able to overcome the first, will consequently be able to overcome the second too, and the bolt is pushed in the whole length at once. When a blow, on the other hand, is given, the force being very great when the motion is stopped in a small space, is more than sufficient to overcome the friction when at its greatest, that is, when the bolt begins to move; but decreasing in proportion to the distance, it very soon becomes unable to overcome the resistance of friction when at its least, that is, after the bolt is in motion, and thus several blows are required, the distance the bolt is driven by each being very small.

The fly-wheel, when employed to accumulate power, as in the apparatus for coining, affords another example of the effects that are produced when a motion slowly acquired is very suddenly stopped.

The laws of accelerated motion may be employed to explain the facts, which, at first sight, seem to have no connection with it at all. For example, it has been found that fulminating powder cannot be used to discharge bullets, in the same manner as common gunpowder; because the quantity necessary to give the requisite speed will burst the gun. This is a necessary effect of its rapid explosion. From the extreme quickness with which it takes fire, it communicates motion to the bullet almost instantaneously, hence the force requisite to produce this motion is very great, and overcomes the cohesion of the barrel; while gunpowder takes fire more slowly, produces the velocity more gradually, and consequently requires a much smaller exertion of power.

A bullet passes through a door, swinging loosely on its hinges, without moving it at all; because the cohesion of the particles struck is altogether inadequate to communicate to the rest of the door the rapid motion of the bullet, in the exceeding short space and time in which, in this case, it must be done. For a similar reason, a pliant twig may be cut through by means of a smart blow, without being bent at all.

On the same laws depend the effect of hatchets and similar tools, and also the important properties of the knife and saw. These last, however, in order to be fully understood, would require a more lengthened illustration than can now be given.

Many other illustrations of the properties of accelerated motion might be brought forward; but enough has been adduced to shew the manner in which machines, depending upon it, produce their effect, and to establish the statement formerly made, that there can be no instantaneous action, and that all forces are of the nature of pressures.

And what has the knowledge of mechanism accomplished for man? Let us, for a moment, consider what he is without it, and what he becomes when it has lent him its aid, and the question will immediately be solved. If we pass through a country where the mechanic arts are unknown, we find either a forest or a wilderness. The trees, growing in rank luxuriance, defy the storms of ages, and seem destined to last till the end of time. The animals bound over the ground, free as the air they breathe. The streams rush unconfined down the declivities, or slumber in the marsh, as if guided but by fitful fancy. The uncultured soil produces in rank abundance, the noxious and the useless herb. The mineral wealth of the earth sleeps undisturbed in the bed wherein it was placed by the hand of the Creator. And man roams through the trackless waste, a helpless, homeless savage. But when the arts of civilization are introduced, the forest bends beneath the axe, and the monarchs of the wood fall before the ingenuity of a creature, whose unaided strength could not bend their feeblest bough. Waving fields of grain occupy the place of the leafy thicket, and the pathless jungle. The tyrants of the forest fall by the weapons of man; the ox, the horse, and the elephant, though stronger far than he, submit to his rein; while other tribes supply him with food, or minister clothing. The rocks are broken to build his cities, and the hardened ore melts in the furnace to form his tools. Nay, he presses the very elements into his service; he lays his hand on the streams and bids them labour; he compels the giant strength of the cataract, like Hercules of old, to turn the spindle; he makes the devouring flame become a servant, and the unfathomed ocean a bearer of burdens.

The benefits conferred by science upon man are at once numerous and great. They may not, however, compare, for a moment, with those which the Bible bestows. Without a knowledge and belief of the truth of God, what is man? He is but the child of a day, spending the brief span of his existence in frivolous follies and vain pursuits, and fluttering, like the moth, about the flame that is speedily to consume him. He may gather around him all the luxuries that art can supply; he may please his palate with the delicacies of distant climes; he may gratify his taste with all that is elegant, costly, and gorgeous; he may do more, he may luxuriate on the richest intellectual feasts, he may indulge his imagination in the perusal of all that elegant literature can supply, he may exercise his reasoning powers in searching out the profundities of science; contemporary thousands may honour and praise him, and future ages may perpetuate his name; but the stroke of death at last overtakes him, his dream of bliss is past, and he awakes to woe. But with the Gospel for his guide, man passes in safety through the chequered scene of earthly trial; though poverty frown, and adversity lour, he has a friend in his God, and knows an inward peace, which the world can neither give nor take away. When death approaches, it comes as the welcome messenger of heaven; it tells that sorrow is over, and glory about to begin. The day of judgment brings him an open acknowledgment and acquittal, and eternity perfects his bliss. He who was by nature the child of wrath, becomes a citizen of the new Jerusalem, whose walls are built of precious stones, whose streets are paved with gold, the city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. Admitted into union with Jesus, he is one with Him, as He is one with the Father; he beholds the brightness of Jehovah's countenance, and glories in his love; his every feeling is transport, his every word is praise; for he bears the image of his glorified Redeemer, he shares in his throne, and is, like him, a king and a priest unto God for ever.

If these be the gifts that the Gospel bestows, how shall we describe the folly of those who would exclude it from the thoughts of man, or give it but the second place? The language of earth has not terms sufficiently strong for designating folly so extreme; its character can only be expressed in the vocabulary of hell, and in the accents of eternal remorse. Science is good, exceeding good, if kept in its proper sphere; but it can never be a substitute for the truth of heaven. It may serve, like our artificial lights, to direct our labours, and to cast an occasional ray on the book of revelation; but he who puts it in the place that the Bible should hold, drags the sun from our moral firmament, and puts a twinkling taper in its room, brings the winter of desolation over all our hopes, obliterates the sunshine of the soul, and envelopes it in the darkness of endless night.

THE CAUSES AND CURE OF A WOUNDED SPIRIT.

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM BURNS,

"The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity: but a wounded spirit who can bear?"—PROV. xviii. 14.

THE text expresses this sentiment,—that outward evils are nothing compared with those that are inward; that no wounds are so deep, and severe, as those of the heart; that no enemy to a man's peace is so terrible as his own conscience, when set in array against him. "The spirit of a man may sustain his infirmity,"—innate vigour and fortitude,—and much more, the force of religious principle will bear a man up, amidst many discouraging circumstances; but when the spirit itself is wounded,—when a man's foe is his own mind,—this is a dreadful, an insupportable evil!

Various are the evils which beset us,—disease, disappointment, loss of friends, the pressure of age, or of poverty. We say not that these are small or trivial evils; we assert not that they are easily sustained. On the contrary, we grant that they are very trying; and that all our philosophy, all our ease of natural temper, nay, even all our religious principles are thus put to a severe test, and that it is no small attainment to be able to bear up under these evils of life. Even Job, so eminent for patience, and whose heart did not reproach him, felt it difficult to suppress all emotions of impatience under the accumulated evils of poverty, disease, and bereavement of children; even he once lost the balance of his mind, and cursed the day of his birth. Still, however, such evils as these may be borne with more or less fortitude. Custom reconciles to many things at first unpleasant. There is the hope of change for the better,—the storm will not always last,—better days may come. "Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the Lord delivereth him out of them all;" "afterwards the chastening, which is not joyous but grievous, yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness." Such reflections as these calm the agitation of the soul, and thus, like David, the afflicted saints "encourage themselves in the Lord their God." But there is a far worse evil than any of these outward ones—heavy and severe as they often are,—it is the wounded spirit—the mind at war with itself,—the lashes of an awakened conscience,—who can bear this?

I. Let us describe a few of the causes of a wounded spirit.

1. The spirit may be wounded from thoughtlessness and folly. Inconsideration, it has been said truly, is the death of souls. It may, with equal truth, be said of inconsideration, that it is the destruction of peace, and one cause of a wounded spirit. Some may think this to be a problem which requires solution,—how so innocent a matter, as they esteem it, should occasion such evils; how mere thoughtlessness and indiscretion should inflict such a wound in the most sensible and vital part. But only reflect a moment on the subject, only recollect a few examples, which, alas! every day presents, of the fatal effects of folly and of thoughtlessness, and you will see how it wounds the spirit. How many, who exhibited, in early life, promising dispositions, and set out with every advantage, have had all their prospects darkened, their health ruined, their reputation blasted, by one, or a few instances of folly and inconsideration! Even though reflection should soon be awakened, the fatal step has been taken, and there is no retracing it. Indeed, one act of folly only paves the way for another; and the unhappy and deluded person is goaded on to other acts of criminality to keep up his credit, and hurried on in the way to destruction. He feels himself degraded, and irretrievably ruined. He sighs in vain for the ease and comfort of his early days. He reflects what he might have been, had he improved his advantages and opportunities; had he followed the dictates of sound wisdom and religion; had he made companions of the good, instead of the profligate; had he kept to innocent pleasures, instead of turning aside, first to the suspicious, and then to the more directly criminal. He sees what some are,—how respected, and how comfortable, how healthy and happy,—who were his early companions, and who set out in life, it may be, with fewer advantages than himself. How he envies their unbroken constitutions, their happy domestic society, their peaceful hours, their useful and honourable career! How painful his reflections, how severe his self-reproach! "A wounded spirit who can bear!"

2. The spirit is wounded by ungoverned passions. If the passions and affections be wisely and piously regulated, kept within bounds, and directed to proper objects, the mind is serene, as well as active, and life and society are blessings. But if the reins be let loose, if either pride, or anger, or revenge, or ambition, or any other disorderly and unruly passion obtain the mastery, many, severe, and deep will be the wounds made in the spirit; many words and actions, unwarrantable and sinful; many gusts of unhallowed and destructive passions are excited, and these produce effects which cannot easily be retrieved. They hurt the person himself who is their subject, in a more vulnerable part, and far more deeply than they hurt those against whom they are directed. They prey upon the vitals like a vulture; they produce the gall of asps within. Disappointed ambition, or insulted pride, or avarice despoiled of its object, inflicts a wound which is bitter indeed, and which reaches even to the heart, and often is the beginning of endless sorrow. Witness Cain, whose envy hurried him on to shed a brother's blood, and who, though not condemned to die, but having his life spared and insured to him by the divine declaration, yet carried about a hell within him, and said, "My punishment is greater than I can bear!" Witness Haman, who, in his prosperity, confessed (and how dreadful must have been his feelings when he came out with this confession) that all was unavailing, all embittered, so long as Mordecai the Jew sat at the king's gate! And witness Judas' despair, and self-destruction, after having secured the thirty pieces of silver, the price of innocent blood! These, it may be said, are extreme cases; but were the history of every individual known and recorded, every age would furnish examples of the same thing. Many lives are shortened, and many embittered and rendered miserable, by disordered and unruly passions. Many who keep the secret to themselves, and appear to others in some degree happy, have dreadful horrors, and carry about a fire within them: "this is a wounded spirit."

3. The spirit is wounded by a sense of guilt. The cases already stated indeed imply guilt. Folly and passion lead to crimes; but while they, in their own nature, and in the very admission of them into the heart, produce a wounded spirit, they also lead on to the commission of those more aggravated sins, which leave still a deeper and more incurable wound. As the very feeling and purpose of doing good gives rise to generous and delightful emotions, so, on the contrary, the indulgence of evil desires, and the formation of evil designs, imply a miserable state of mind. But as the actual exercise of beneficence, the fulfilment of good designs, gives still greater joy, and improves and perpetuates satisfaction, so, on the contrary, the perpetration of wicked designs, and the actual execution of the revengeful and iniquitous purpose, imprints a deeper stain of malignity, and fixes the arrows of empoisoned and stinging reflection still more deeply in the heart. Nay, it is then frequently that the misery begins. Before,—the busy succession of thought, and the fermentation produced by the passions, prevented the miserable victim of pride or of malice, from feeling his own misery. He is set upon revenge, and he says "revenge is sweet." He thinks only of being satiated by the ruin of his hated adversary. But after the deed is done,—then a thousand furies rise up and at once pierce him with their darts. There is no more the sweetness of revenge,—there is the bitterness of the heart, the stings of self-condemnation. Guilt rouses conscience which was before asleep, and its voice is terrible, its lash intolerable. The terrors of the Lord are set in array against him, "the poison whereof drinketh up his spirit." There needs no handwriting on the wall, nor apparition of the departed to appal him. There is an invincible, a secret tormentor; there is an avenger from within, far worse than any messenger or executioner which human laws can employ. Sometimes, it is true, the sinner is so hardened, and goes on in such a rapid and ceaseless course of vice, that he leaves no time for such reflections, and seems, in a great measure, insensible; yet the time will come when conscience will awake, and with tenfold fury.

The cases we have here put, it is true, are of the more extreme kind, illustrative, however, of the nature and consequences of every sin; and there are cases of more ordinary occurrence which may be profitably introduced as illustrative of the same truth. Every careless and ungodly person has reason to dread the torment of a wounded spirit. When roused from his insensibility he will be forced to exclaim, "how have I hated instruction, and did not choose the fear of the Lord! How have I squandered away precious time, abused the mercies of God, despised the Gospel, derided serious things, ruined the peace of families, and plunged myself in misery!" O unhappy man! what peace can be in thy heart? A clear conscience is a continual feast; but here is an accusing conscience: here is self-loathing and self-condemnation; here all is dark and lowering. The past is crowded with images of the sins of youth and of riper years; the future with fearful forebodings of fiery indignation from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power. The great day of wrath is coming, and who shall be able to stand!

Such is a faint picture of a wounded spirit. Who can describe it? Who can bear it? "Who knoweth the power of God's anger?" says the Psalmist. Who knows the anguish of a wounded spirit,—of an awakened and accusing conscience? But shall we go on? Is there any thing to be said farther? Or, shall we here break off, setting up the unhappy men, whose spirits are wounded, as beacons of warning to others, and leaving them to their fate? God forbid, there is no case to which the Gospel of Jesus Christ does not apply. I therefore proceed,

II. To point out the only remedy. But here I may be stopt short in the outset, by some who, ignorant of the Gospel, represent the very suggestion of any remedy, in such a case, as giving sanction to vice; as if to apply balm to a wound were any encouragement to inflict wounds on one's-self. No, my friends. That mercy may be found, is surely no inducement to any to become or to continue sinful and miserable! We cannot, therefore, think our duty discharged without endeavouring to direct the wounded to the physician. The deeper the wound, the more need of the remedy. O ye whose hearts are wounded and bleeding, who have not merely to sustain your infirmity, but who have your conscience aroused, and who cannot bear the load of your own conscious villainess, who are pricked and galled in heart, and are crying out, "What shall we do?" we bring even to you good tidings, if you will only believe and embrace them. Your case, we agree with you, is desperate, if you look only to yourselves. If you have nothing for it but unavailing grief and lamentation, all idea of making any atonement of yourselves, for your past offences, is altogether in vain. Your wound is indeed grievous and reaches to the heart, and no created aid can reach your case. He only can compose the agitation of your spirit, who said, "Son be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee." He only can heal you, whose "blood cleanseth from all sin," and who thus addresses the heavy laden sinner, "Come to me and I will give you rest." "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so was the Son of Man lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life." Those only remain without a remedy, who either say they have no disease, or who say, that their wound is incurable; either the presumptuous or the despairing. As to Israel, so to every one the Lord says, "O man thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thy help found!"

Still, let it be well considered that even although the deadly wound should be healed, yet the pain will not be wholly removed for many days to come. And the full measure of peace and of consolation can scarcely be enjoyed, even when sin is pardoned, by those who have sinned so heinously. For how can they ever forgive themselves the wrong they have done,—the involving others in sin,—the unsettling of the principles of the young,—the hardening of others by evil example. Such must, in a degree, go mourning all their days, bearing the reproach of their youth, ashamed, yea even confounded. It is only by the healing balm of the Gospel, followed up by the exercise of deep genuine repentance and amendment, that, at length, peace can be restored. But while the remedy is rejected and the feeling of self-reproach leads not to inquiry after the way of escape, the end of these things is death; gloomy despair settles on the soul, and horror of great darkness must collect, and there is no escaping.

It is in this fearful state of mind, that the wretched victims of sin and of despair betake themselves to the stimulating and stupifying dose to drive away, or quiet, reflection; and, awakening from the feverish dream, the disease is aggravated, reflections sting with more bitter anguish, and the final awful resort frequently is to self-destruction. This is the history of most suicides,—a sinful life; conscience roused; shame and self-reproach beyond endurance; fortune, as well as character, ruined; it may be, no friendly or pious adviser to soothe and to direct the unhappy sinner to the only relief; on the contrary, it may be, infidel books, or infidel companions, administering their deadly draughts, which at one time tend to lull into a kind of false repose, and again increase the fever of the brain, and goad on the miserable sinner to madness, when self-destruction appears a refuge from present suffering; the everlasting consequences of sin being dared or forgotten, amidst the storm and agitation of an awakened and wounded spirit. O! how much have they to account for, who, by their example, or by their avowed opinions, patronise infidelity, and thus contribute to the ruin of souls! How valuable, in such circumstances, a kind and pious friend and adviser, to direct to the only true remedy; to open up, and then to administer to the healing of the wounded spirit! To such let the afflicted, awakened, distressed sinner betake himself. Brood not in secret over your miseries and crimes; but seek also to disburthen your minds to a skillful spiritual physician, who may direct you to the refuge of the lost, who may be the happy instrument of leading you to the balm of Gilead, and to the physician there!

Let me now, in conclusion, call upon all of you to learn from this subject, 1. Not to faint in the day of adversity. Sustain your infirmity. Bodily distress, loss of substance, and indeed all the evils of life, are nothing to a wounded spirit; these are like the assaults of the storm from without, which penetrate not within. Even these, however, you cannot sustain without divine grace. Seek, therefore, the gracious influences of the Spirit of God, that you may be enabled to bear up under your burden, and aim at that great attainment,—the well-founded persuasion, that all things shall work together for your good, as for one who loves God, and is effectually called according to his purpose.

2. Seek, above all things, to have God on your side, and your conscience your friend. Trust not, we beseech you, to your youthful innocence, falsely so called. Your youth is stained with many a sin, and there is within you a heart of stone. Trust not in your good education and family example, in your freedom from gross vice and vile licentiousness, or in your character, hitherto, it may be, untarnished. Many, alas! equally hopeful, have made shipwreck of all these, and been afterwards foremost in vice. There is no safeguard like the fear of God; no security like his grace. We have hope of you if you feel your need of this, and if, instead of being high-minded, you are afraid for yourselves. "But let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall."

3. Beware of the beginning of sin. The wounded spirit was once unbroken; the prodigal feeding on husks, was once in his father's house; the unhappy man who perishes on the scaffold, was once innocent of crimes. But the corruption of the heart, not subdued; evil customs learnt; bad company frequented; Sabbath-days profaned; extravagant habits acquired, which crave for the means of gratification; these have hurried him on till character is lost, crimes perpetrated, and the insupportable load of a wounded spirit is felt, and produces woes and groans unutterable! O flee from temptation,—stand firm at the beginning. Implore most earnestly the grace of God, to sanctify, to preserve, to guide, to keep you. With Jabez say, and that with holy earnestness and importunity, "O keep me from evil, that it may not grieve me."

Lastly, Ever keep in view, the inseparable connection, as betwixt holiness and happiness, so betwixt sin and sorrow. This is a real, an indissoluble connection; whereas, betwixt sickness and misery, betwixt poverty and wretchedness, there is no necessary connection. Neither, on the other hand, is there any real connection between wealth and happiness, betwixt what we call the good things of this life and real comfort, between a splendid dwelling and a happy possessor. We know not good or evil by what we see. Happiness and misery lie not on the surface, and depend not on outward events. "O ye sons of men, how long will ye love vanities and seek after deceit. Know, that Jehovah hath chosen the godly for himself." "Great peace have they that love God's law, nothing shall offend them." But "there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked!" "A wounded spirit, who can bear?"

THE DEATH-BED OF

DR SAMUEL JOHNSON.

THE following particulars connected with the views of Dr Johnson, when on his death-bed, are abridged from a letter which was found among the late Mrs Hannah More's papers. The writer was the Rev. J. Sangar, then near Colchester, afterwards of Bristol.

"My Dear Friend,—I ought to apologise for delaying so long to gratify your wishes, by committing to paper a conversation which I had with the late Rev. Mr Storry of Colchester, respecting Dr Johnson.

"We were riding together near Colchester, when I asked Mr Storry, whether he had ever heard that Dr Johnson expressed great dissatisfaction with himself on the approach of death; and that in reply to friends, who, in order to comfort him, spoke of his writings in defence of virtue and religion, he had said, 'admitting all you urge to be true, how can I tell when I have done enough.'

"Mr S. assured me, that what I had just mentioned was perfectly correct, and then added the following interesting particulars:—

"Dr Johnson (said he) did feel as you describe, and was not to be comforted by the ordinary topics of consolation which were addressed to him. In consequence, he desired to see a clergyman, and particularly described the views and character of the person whom he wished to consult. After some consideration, a Mr Winstanley was named, and the Doctor requested Sir John Hawkins to write a note in his name, requesting Mr W.'s attendance as a minister.

"Mr W. could not attend, but wrote to Dr Johnson:—'Permit me to write what I would wish to say were I present. I can easily conceive what would be the subjects of your inquiry. I can conceive, that the views of yourself have changed with your condition, and that, on the near approach of death, what you once considered mere peccadilloes have arisen into mountains of guilt, whilst your best actions have dwindled into nothing. On whichever side you look, you see only positive transgressions, or defective obedience; and hence, in self-despair, are eagerly inquiring, "What shall I do to be saved?" I say to you, in the language of the Baptist, "Behold the Lamb of God!"'

"When Sir John Hawkins came to this part of Mr W.'s letter, the Doctor interrupted him, anxiously asking, 'Does he say so? Read it again, Sir John.' Sir John complied, upon which the Doctor said, 'I must see that man,—write again to him.' Mr Winstanley replied by letter, renewing and enlarging on the subject of his first; and these communications, together with the conversation of the late Mr Latrobe, who was a particular friend of Dr Johnson, appear to have been blessed by God in bringing this great man to the renunciation of self, and a simple reliance on Jesus as his Saviour; thus also communicating to him, that peace which he had found the world could not give, and which, when the world was fading from his view, was sufficient to fill the void, and dissipate the gloom, even of the valley of the shadow of death.

"I cannot conclude, without remarking what honour God has hereby put upon the doctrine of faith in a crucified Saviour. The man, whose intellectual powers had awed all around him, was, in his turn, made to tremble when the period arrived at which all knowledge appears useless, and vanishes away, except the knowledge of the true God, and of Jesus whom he has sent. Effectually to attain this knowledge, this giant in literature must become a little child. The man looked up to as a prodigy of wisdom, must become a fool that he might be wise.

"What a comment is this upon that word, 'The loftiness of men shall be bowed down, and the haughtiness of men shall be made low, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day.'"

THE SABBATH EVENING SCHOOL.

BY THE REV. THOMAS DIMMA, A.M.,

Minister of Queensferry.

THE present age is pre-eminently distinguished, over all that have preceded it, by the mighty and diversified exertions that are made for the improvement of the human mind. Every day presents some new scheme; and arguments, to draw attention to it, are advanced with all the zeal that a new proposal excites. No sooner does one candidate for public favour, introduce his favourite theory, with the certainty of unequalled success, than another, equally confident in the superiority of his plan, is ready to believe that he has outstripped all his predecessors, and has, at length, discovered the true road to the culture of the intellect, and the strengthening of all the powers of the mind. There is, however, a fashion in mental training and the subjects of it, as well as in the gymnastic exercises by which the body is strengthened, and the muscular action quickened and improved. The men of one generation wonder what torpor benumbed the energies of those who preceded them, while the men who shall afterwards arise, will look back, with equal pity and contempt, on the new light by which we think our horizon is so splendidly illuminated.

But among the endless variety of educational courses that are now competitors for public favour, there is one which has silently, but securely, been engaged in advancing the best interests of man, as a rational and immortal being; we refer to the admirable institution of Sabbath Evening Schools. Through their agency, a most powerful influence is exerted on the minds of the young, and the Bible comes before them with more powerful attractions than it previously possessed. Divine truth explained, with simplicity and affection, is made the subject of most inviting study, and its effect upon the mind is evidenced in the improved and accurate grasp the Word of God takes, of all their intellectual pursuits, and preparations for entering on the duties of life, as immortal beings,—the destined heirs of an eternal existence. Truth gradually finds a more cordial reception into the youthful mind, and its excellence, discovered by frequent contemplations, makes an impression that time cannot obliterate. The germs of spiritual regeneration, fructify in a soil, which, on their first appearance, are watered by the dews of the Holy Spirit, and at each fuller expansion, are met by a kindlier and ampler outpouring of heavenly grace. Children, in this way, speedily become a most pleasing subject of concern to every benevolent mind, and a special object of attention to every pastor who labours faithfully in the vineyard of the Lord.

While the young are making most gratifying advances in Scriptural knowledge, the process of learning the lessons of the school, exerts a most beneficial influence on the minds of their parents, and the other members of the family circle. They very naturally aid the young in their varied preparations, and thus insensibly become learners, and more anxious students of the sacred record than they previously were. The very act of simplifying instruction, and varying the mode of impressing it on the minds of the young, is a most admirable auxiliary in fixing divine truth deeper, and rendering its value more apparent to the mind of an anxious and conscientious parent.

The parent and the child thus go on together in the course of a most interesting and improving study. The solution of doubts that retard the progress of the child, sharpens the intellectual acumen of the parents; and continued practice in the art of simplifying instruction, is attended with the most beneficial results on the whole domestic circle. The Sabbath evening preparations, in this way, become a common good; all are interested in them; and the comparisons insensibly made, between the expositions of one, and the conceptions of another, stimulate all to persevering and more anxious exertion. Families are thus imperceptibly improved, and the spirit of the Bible insinuates itself, where previously it was a stranger. These are objects well deserving the most anxious attention, and if they can be promoted, by any means, every exertion should be made for the attainment of this very desirable end.

The systematic operation of a well constituted Sabbath School is admirably conducive to this purpose. By this is meant, the judicious disposition of the various exercises, over suitable times, and the unslumbering activity by which the instructor watches over and stimulates the exertion of his youthful charge. The time for the commencement of evening labour is fixed at such an interval between the public duties of the Sabbath as to allow a suitable pause for meditations on the services of the sanctuary, and then a gathering up the mind for the labours, which the remainder of the evening is to claim as its own.

The week that preceded has had spread over it the diversified subjects, to a measure of time suitable for each, and the regularity and order that have been observed in the prosecution of the work, have secured to the diligent and persevering, that composure which makes the sound of the Sabbath evening bell the note of joyful preparation. The commencing prayer solemnizes the mind for the engagements of the evening; and when the House of God is the appointed place of meeting, the associations, connected with the sacred services of the day, are productive of the most beneficial effects. When parents, or those who feel an interest in the religious improvement of the young, are present, the impression made on their minds is a most powerful stimulus to quicken the exertions, and, for the whole of the evening, to keep the attention of the young alive. In some communities, this attendance is very generally and fully given; while in others, it is very partial or constrained. It is often found that there are numbers who will expatiate on the incalculable advantages of Sabbath School teaching, who limit their approval to words, and leave the instructor to prosecute his work, while spectators look on with indifference, or satisfy themselves with the correctness of their ideas, and consider this sufficient inducement to the young to frequent Sabbath School tuition, and the labourer to prosecute his exertions, under the chilly atmosphere that such approval throws around him.

But men who love their work, and see what the interests of immortal souls are concerned, do not slacken their diligence, though thus deprived of cordial co-operation. They are animated with nobler motives than the applause of men, and go on, in the prosecution of their duty, looking to Him who will bless the work of their hands, and render their labours instrumental for the advancement of his glory, and the good of souls.

The writer will now endeavour to explain the process of Sabbath School tuition, by a reference to the school in his own parish.

The children are assembled, and placed in their respective seats, according to their merits, and the times of their attendance; each individual pupil commencing at the lowest station, and working his way upwards, according to diligence or the weight of talent. The Psalms of David or the Paraphrases of Scripture, in appointed portions, are recited by all, either in whole or in part, as is considered convenient. The utmost attention is paid to clearness of articulation, and the marking of the pauses, so that the meaning, on close and immediate examination, may be apparent. Illustrations and allusions meet with immediate attention, and explanations are given, so that no pupil leaves his psalm without a complete understanding of its meaning, if ordinary attention be given, and moderate application be bestowed.

This initiatory and comparatively easy work is followed up by select portions of Scripture, which are accurately prepared by all, and made the subject of a close and searching examination. One portion of divine truth is brought forward to support and confirm another; and the minds of the children, habituated to this exercise, improve most rapidly in skill and readiness of application. The business of the evening then takes a new direction, in the bringing forward of Scripture proofs, in support of the great leading doctrines of the Christian faith. These texts of Scripture are all accurately prepared and repeated. Each child in the lower seats gives one or two proofs, and those increase in number, through the advancing seats, until the first and second are reached, where the proofs are multiplied from about fifteen or twenty, to about thirty. The exercises of the advanced classes are prepared with admirable precision, and, without the slightest assistance from the Bible, are pronounced with readiness; and as the search has been their own, aided by the assistance of friends, the intelligence apparent in the exercises of the advanced division is very gratifying. When their minds are occasionally led to review, without previous preparation, their former labours, the facility with which this is done, is most pleasing and satisfactory.

The Shorter Catechism, with and without proofs, takes up most advantageously a portion of the evening. Accuracy of repetition, and an understanding of what is repeated, are never, for a moment, lost sight of, and each separate question is broken down into such minute parts, that the young mind, aided by every explanation, is brought to grasp what, at first sight, appeared beyond its comprehension. A most admirable spirit of honourable emulation is kept alive during this part of the evening's labours, and the efforts which the aspiring and ingenious mind makes to take the highest place, are most delightful specimens of intellectual exertion. The youthful mind is enlivened by a change of employment. To promote this, the Scriptures are now opened by the whole school, and the girls and boys read alternately, the one division listening while the other reads. The Bibles then being closed, the chapters read become the subject of close examination, and every particular comes to be considered, which tends to the illustration of the Sacred Volume. As Scripture geography has also a place in the studies of the evening, and as maps, on a large scale, are suspended on the walls, every town, river, mountain, or province, is, when it occurs, pointed out or described. A single reading of a chapter is sufficient to transfuse the spirit of the passage into the minds of the pupils, and the memory becomes so retentive, that the very words are remembered.

To secure attention in Church, the various subjects of discourse, in the respective places of worship, are made a matter of special consideration; and the plan and substance of the lectures or sermons, are stated in a manner corresponding with the age and attention of the pupils to whom questions are proposed. Very frequently most satisfactory answers are returned, at other times the results of an examination are less accurate and ready. The nature of the subjects discussed, or the method of treating them, produces great differences in the results of this examination. But though the conceptions of some may be very feeble, in the commencement of Church attendance, a great increase is made at each successive stage of their progress.

The labours of the evening are concluded, by the repetition of sacred poetry from select authors, by four of the children, proceeding in rotation through twenty of the most advanced. About the middle of the various exercises, two of the pupils recite a prayer, composed by themselves from Scripture, and in its language. This part of the work is attended with most decided advantages,—the devotional parts of Scripture are made the subject of careful study,—the mind is familiarized with them, a food for the soul is thus laid up, which, by the blessing of God, it is believed, will form a store, from which supplies may be drawn at every season, and according to every variety of circumstance and situation. With the duties of the coming week prescribed, and the blessing of Almighty God pronounced, the children of the Sabbath Evening School retire to their respective homes, after having been exercised for nearly three hours.

The Queensferry Parochial Sabbath School is now in the sixteenth year of its operations, and it has assembled, with very few vacant evenings, between eighty and one hundred children, of both sexes. The whole business of this numerous class is conducted without assistance; but so accurately does the machinery work, that through the whole evening there is scarcely one who has not something to do when the others are engaged. By the continual shifting, at regular intervals, of the subjects of study, the mind preserves its elasticity, and on every fresh subject it is found entering with an avidity that insures almost certain success.

In a population where there are many dissenters, no distinction has ever been drawn—all have been admitted who desired to obtain it. No other application is necessary than merely taking their seat in the lowest place in the school: this is the intimation, which is immediately understood, and acted upon. The boon of admission is duly prized by most parents, who consider the labours of the week much accelerated by Sabbath School exertions, and speak with satisfaction of the improvement made by such attendance. The children become attached to their work, and delight in making their preparations. The monthly distribution of the volumes of an extensive collection of books and tracts, is hailed with great delight, and the countenances of the young glisten, when new and attractive works are, for the first time, put into their hands.

Parents here, with very few exceptions, are ready to approve of the benefits of Sabbath School tuition, and gladly co-operate in the plans that are suggested for its improvement; but there are also some, who, not valuing or attending Sabbath ministrations themselves, are at no pains to secure for their children what they themselves do not understand. All who fear God, or are desirous to reverence his name, are most anxious to enrol their children in the list of the Sabbath School, and also, as opportunity offers, to incite them to exertion by their presence.

The writer of this paper has had the satisfaction of seeing hundreds of his parishioners pass through his hands; and there are few between the ages of six and twenty-four, who have not, at some period, taken their place in the Sabbath Evening School. The gratitude and the substantial thanks of the people have been shewn in a most gratifying way; and if an incitement to exertion were required, it would be afforded in the thanks and blessings of many a parent and many a Christian friend.

Instances are not rare, in which, when on sickbeds, and at the hour of death, the lessons of the Sabbath have made a deep and a comforting impression; and the clearness of perception, and the accuracy of recollection, by which the closing hours of life have been distinguished, have shed a bright ray of light around that momentous season. It is fondly hoped, that those who now still retain their places, and perform their Sabbath evening labours, will feel the blessed effusions of divine grace shed abroad on their souls, and come forth, when duty calls, as those who are remembering their Creator in the days of their youth, and who, from the season of childhood, know the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make them wise to salvation.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Heavenly meditation urged upon the Christian.—As for you, whose hearts God has weaned from all things here below, I hope you will value this heavenly life, and take one walk every day in the New Jerusalem. God is your love and your desire; you would fain be more acquainted with your Saviour; and I know it is your grief your hearts are not nearer to him, and that you do not more feelingly love him, and delight in him. O try this life of meditation on your heavenly rest! Here is the mount on which the fluctuating ark of your souls may rest. Let the world see by your lives, that religion is something more than opinions and disputes, or a talk of outward duties. As Moses, before he died, went up into Mount Nebo, to take a survey of the land of Canaan, so the Christian ascends the mount of contemplation, and, by faith, surveys his rest. He looks upon the glorious mansions, and says, "glorious things are deservedly spoken of thee, thou city of God!" he hears, as it were, the melody of the choir, and says, "happy is the people that are in such a case! yea, happy is that people whose God is the Lord."

He looks upon the glorified inhabitants, and says, "Happy art thou, O Israel, who is like unto thee, O people, saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency!" When he looks upon the Lord himself, who is their glory, he is ready with the rest to fall down and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and say, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, who was, and is, and is to come! Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power!" When he looks on the glorified Saviour, he is ready to say, "Amen," to that new song! "Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever. For thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us unto God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto God kings and priests!" When he looks back on the wilderness of this world, he blesses the believing, patient, despised saints; he pities the ignorant, miserable world; and for himself, he says, "it is good for me to draw near to God, for, lo! they that are far off from thee shall perish." Thus, as Daniel, in his captivity, opened his window to Jerusalem, though far out of sight, when he went to God in his devotions, so may the believing soul, in this captivity of the flesh, look towards the New Jerusalem which is above. And as Paul was to the Colossians, so may the believer be with the glorified spirits, though absent in the flesh, yet with them in the spirit, joining and beholding their heavenly order. And as the lark sweetly sings as she soars on high, but is suddenly silenced when she falls to the earth, so is the frame of the soul most delightful and divine while it keeps in the view of God by contemplation. Alas, we make there too short a stay, fall down and lay by our music.—BAXTER.

Holiness Essential to Salvation.—Jesus, our victorious Saviour, has snatched us from the jaws of eternal death; but to be delivered from the cruel tyranny and bonds of sin, and to be brought into the blessed liberty of the sons of God, was another essential part of our redemption, and if any one does not embrace this with equal alacrity and delight as the other benefit, he is a wretched slave of a mean and ignoble spirit, and being equally unworthy of both parts of this stupendous deliverance, he will justly forfeit and lose both. And this is the epidemical Antinomianism of the Christian world, because they who labour under it have nothing but the name of Christians: they gladly hear of the pardon of their sins, and the salvation of their souls, while they are averse to the doctrine of holiness and repentance. It is a disagreeable message, a hard saying, and who can bear it? But of the incomparable charms of holiness!—ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON.

Differences among Christians.—It is with sensible regret that we read of any difference, and much more of a sharp contention arising between Paul and Barnabas, so dear to each other in the bond both of human and Christian friendship: but we see it arose to some degree of severity, in consequence of a remainder of imperfection in the temper of the one or the other, yea, probably of both; they separated therefore, but it plainly appears they did not become enemies. They preached the same Gospel, though in different companies, each takes his proper circuit, and thus the work of the Lord was performed with greater dispatch, and perhaps with greater success.—DR DODDRIDGE.

Advancement in the Divine Life.—Every man hath his indiscretions and infirmities, his arrests and sudden incursions, his violences to reason and peevish melancholy, his unaptness to prayer, his fondness to judge favourably of himself, voluntary and involuntary deceptions, ignorance and inadvertencies, careless hours, and unwatchful seasons. This happens more frequently in persons of an infant piety, when the virtue is not corroborated by a long abode, and a confirmed resolution, and an usual victory, and a triumphant grace; and the longer we are accustomed to piety, the more unfrequent will be the little breaches of folly and a returning to sin. But as the needle of a compass, when it is directed to its beloved star, at the first waves on either side, and seems indifferent to the rising or declining sun, and when it seems first determined to the north, remains a while trembling, and stands not still in full enjoyment till after first a great variety of motion, and then an undisturbed posture: so is the piety, and so is the conversion of a man, wrought by degrees and several steps of imperfection; and at first our choices are wavering, convinced by the grace of God, and yet not persuaded; and then persuaded, but not resolved; and then resolved, but deferring to begin; and then beginning, but, as all beginnings are, in weakness and uncertainty; and we fly out often into large indiscretions, and we look back to Sodom, and long to return to Egypt; and when the storm is quite over, we find little bubblings and unevennesses upon the face of the waters, and often weaken our own purposes by returns of sin.—JEREMY TAYLOR.

The Ancient and the Modern Believers.—All the difference betwixt a good Jew and a good Christian consists in this; the one waited for the first coming of Christ, in the weakness of mortal flesh; the other waits for his second coming in the majesty of immortal glory.—QUESNEL.

Ye know not at what hour the Son of Man cometh.—One idea contained in these passages of Scripture which connect watchfulness with the coming of the Lord, is this, that when he comes, the whole house, both Church and world, shall be in a deep sleep, as a house at midnight, which, for this reason, is called the dead hour of night. And as the thief, with stealthy foot, advanceth upon a peaceful slumbering house, to break into it, and take whatever is most precious, and carry it off; so shall Christ come into the strong man's house, into Satan's usurped principedom of the earth, and thence convey whatever is most precious, the gold, the silver, and the precious stones; ridding the grave for precious dust, and searching the corners of the earth for holy men.—ANON.

On doing Good.—To see the boldness of the agents of Satan, and the timidity of the soldiers of Christ, is affecting indeed! Yet how much condemnation have I in my own mind on that account,—not that prudence is to be discarded in this matter. "Speak not in the ears of a fool lest he despise the wisdom of thy words," is a necessary caution; yet we are apt oftener to err on the other side. In short, in this case, as well as in others, we stand in continual need of that guidance and unerring direction promised to us; and by daily prayer for the Holy Ghost, he will guide us in that path which, as Mr Hart expresses it, "the vulture's eye hath not seen." This I have always found,—that when I have lifted up my soul to God, to be made useful wherever I have been going, I seldom, or never, came away without an answer to my prayer. I would endeavour, that every morning I may rise with an active and steady purpose to be doing something for God, as the miser rises with the design to get more gain each day.—VENN.

How may I Know the Truth?—O what an excellent interpreter is experience! Taste and see, for thus the serious Christian getteth a view of the Scriptures, and spiritual things, which the most subtle and piercing eye of unsanctified schoolmen cannot reach; yea, by the practice of truth, by nearness to God, and by retiring of the soul to him, he hath often got more light in one hour, than others have in many days, by putting their judgment and invention upon the rack.—Fleming's Fulfilling of Scripture.

SACRED POETRY.

HYMN OF THE HEBREW MAID.

WHEN Israel, of the Lord beloved,
Out from the land of bondage came,
Her father's God before her moved,
An awful guide, in smoke and flame.
By day, along the astonish'd lands
The cloudy pillar glided slow;
By night, Arabia's crimson'd sands
Return'd the fiery pillar's glow.

There rose the choral hymn of praise,
And trump and timbrel answer'd keen;
And Zion's daughters pour'd their lays,
With priests' and warriors' voice between.
No portents now our foes amaze,
Forsaken Israel wanders lone;
Our fathers would not know Thy ways,
And Thou hast left them to their own.

But present still, though now unseen,
When brightly shines the prosperous day,
Be thoughts of Thee a cloudy screen,
To temper the deceitful ray.
And, oh! when stoops on Judah's path,
In shade and storm the frequent night,
Be Thou, long-suffering, slow to wrath,
A burning and a shining light!

Our harps we left by Babel's streams,
The tyrant's jest, the Gentiles' scorn;
No censor round our altar beams,
And mute are timbrel, trump and horn.
But Thou hast said, "The blood of goat,
The flesh of rams, I will not prize;
A contrite heart, an humble thought,
Are mine accepted sacrifice."

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

ADDRESS TO THE SUN.

BY ALEXANDER LETHAM,

Blind from Early Life.

GREAT refulgent orb of day,
O! what joys thou dost impart,—
O! how sweet thy cheering ray
To the eye and to the heart.

See the lark with transport rise
To salute thy early beam;
Whilst thou, in the eastern skies,
Smil'st on mountain, wood, and stream.

Sweetly thou unfold'st to view,
Nature in her rich attire;
Giv'st the rose her lovely hue,
And the ruby all its fire.

Yet the scenes thou dost display,
Cannot, to the human breast,
Lasting happiness convey;
Earth is not our place of rest!

Lasting joys are only found
Far beyond thy golden sphere;
There unfading flowers abound,
There the sky is ever clear.

There a brighter sun doth shine,
Which shall cheer the spotless soul
With resplendent beams divine,
Long as endless ages roll.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Minister's Family.—The Rev. John Newton relates, that many proofs had passed under his immediate notice of the faithfulness of God in answering the prayers of parents, who had left behind them young and helpless children. He especially mentions a friend of his, a laborious Christian minister, in the west of England, in whose family the divine promise was fulfilled. This good man, when dying, was advised to make his will, but he replied, "I have nothing to leave but my wife and children, and I leave them to the care of my gracious God;" and soon after died happily. No prospect appeared for the support of his family; but the Lord disposed a man, who had always despised his preaching, to feel for his destitute family; and, by this means, L.1600 were raised for them; and the clergy of Exeter, who had never countenanced his ministry, gave his widow a house and garden for life; so that she lived in greater ease and plenty than in the lifetime of her husband.

The expiring Martyr.—John Huss, the Bohemian martyr, beheld and acknowledged the hand of Providence in the time and manner of his death. There was something peculiarly affecting and sublime in his exclamation to his treacherous and brutal tormentors. After he had offered a beautiful supplication on their behalf, in which, like his great Exemplar, he implored mercy and not vengeance upon his murderers, the bishops appointed by the council of Constance stripped him of his sacerdotal garments, degraded him from his priestly function and university degrees, and put a paper mitre upon his head, covered with the resemblances of infernal spirits, and with this inscription, "A ringleader of heretics."—The heroic martyr smiled, and said, "It is less painful than a crown of thorns." His last supplication amidst the flames was, "Jesus Christ, thou Son of the living God, have mercy upon me!"

The natural effect of Infidelity.—A man-servant of Mallet's, upon whose mind an appropriate impression was made by the blasphemous conversation which he continually heard as he waited at table, watched his opportunity, and absconded with a considerable quantity of valuable property belonging to his master. Being apprehended, he was urged by Mallet to confess his reason for his infamous behaviour. "Sir," said he, "I have heard you and your friends so often talk of the impossibility of a future state, and that after death there was no reward for virtue, nor punishment for vice, that I was tempted to commit the robbery." "Well," replied Mallet, "but had you no fear of that death which the laws of your country inflict upon the crime?" "Sir," said the servant, looking sternly at his master, "what is that to you, if I had a mind to venture that? you and your wicked companions had removed the greater terror, why should I fear the less?"

OLD AGE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT COWE, A.M.,

Minister of the High Meeting, Berwick-upon-Tweed.

THE aged have claims on our reverence, which the instinctive feelings of our nature dispose us to respect. In the law of Moses, so remarkable for the benignity of its spirit to the wants of frail humanity, is contained a special provision for cultivating an amiable and respectful attention to their advanced years: "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honour the face of the old man." Time imparts a venerable aspect to almost everything that long survives its influence; it diminishes the freshness of objects, but it clothes them with a sober livery, more conducive to solemn and profound emotions. We admire what is new, but we venerate what is old. This mellow influence of age attaches, with peculiar propriety, to the patriarchs of our race, who stand between the living and the dead, uniting the distant and the near, by embodying the memorials of the past in the capacity of representatives of a preceding generation. Spared from the wreck of our departed fathers, imagination contemplates them as consecrated by their connection with the deceased; and as they seem more nearly allied than others with the future world, standing, as they do, on the verge of the grave, they are invested, in our eyes, with a more hallowed character.

To every well regulated mind, there is something exceedingly incongruous between old age and ungodliness. We recoil from such an ominous and hateful conjunction, as we should from its display on a death-bed. There is a dissonance between the opposite elements of the phenomenon, that grates harshly on our Christian feelings, awakening pity, if it does not provoke indignation. In persons beyond the meridian of life, we naturally look for calm sobriety, superior wisdom and dignity, a prevailing tinge of spirituality of mind, or devout turning of the thoughts to that unseen and eternal world into which they shall soon be ushered; and how great is our disappointment when such virtues are wanting, and their place occupied by unattractive and reprehensible qualities! It is, indeed, a melancholy spectacle to see an old man living without God in the world, dead to the unrivalled glory and excellence of spiritual realities, hankering after unsatisfactory enjoyment, to the total neglect of his immortal soul; but the picture is darker far, when he glories in his shame, and sits in the seat of the scornful. "How ill grey hairs become a fool and jester!" Such mockery is bad from any lips, but it is most repulsive and distressing when heard from persons whose "feet are stumbling on the dark mountains," and whom the angel of death, at the very instant, may be descending to hurry away.

If a vast reduction is made of the respect due to age by the absence of the sterling virtues of character, and the presence of irreligious and immoral stains, there is no less an enhancement of that respect, by the union of the Christian graces with the inheritance of long life. Vital religion lends a peculiar charm to a man whose ripe years are sanctified and embellished with piety. His character derives from it an oracular authority, blended with an amiable sweetness, which insensibly commands our esteem. The mind recognises a harmony between his advanced life and the state of his heart, which recommends him powerfully to our love and admiration. It is pleasant to see immortal hope brightening and animating a decaying frame, and serene reliance on our divine Redeemer sustaining, in fixedness of holiest purpose, a mind, many of whose energies are relaxed and unstrung. Though divine truth rests on a better than a human foundation, and does not need, for the perfection of its title, the recommendation of man, yet does it address us in accents peculiarly winning, and appear in a form peculiarly engaging, when it challenges our acceptance and submission, by irradiating with its lustre, dignifying with its elevation, and invigorating with its power, the last stage of human life. "The hoary head is then a crown of glory, because it is found in the way of righteousness."

Our expectations of spiritual wisdom and excellence in the old, may be considered as resting, partly on the advantages enjoyed by them during a long series of years, and partly on the awakening and solemnising influence which their proximity to the invisible world ought to have on their hearts. It will not be deemed presumptuous, I trust, to invite a man whose head is whitened by age, to view, in retrospective and sober contemplation, the long vista of time behind him; that he may reflect on its changes and admonitions, in relation to his own state. If he is in a condition of alienation from God, does he not see reason to be ashamed, when he thinks that, after all he has seen, and heard, and felt, he is still a stranger to that glorious and beneficent Being, compared with whom all the objects that interest his affections, exercise his faculties, and occupy his time, are but dust and ashes? How many days has he spent, all of them lengthened out by the sustaining providence of God? How often has he lifted up his eyes to the starry heavens, where visible glory proclaims the invisible Ruler? How often has he gone out and in upon this earth, where all things are full of God, inhaling at every breath his benevolent provision for animal life, and passing at every step some indication of his wisdom and bounty? How many striking phenomena, calculated to promote serious reflection, has he seen or heard of during his long course? How many appalling disasters have occurred within his own knowledge, of a nature to force religion on his regard? How many trains of thought have passed through his mind, which, but for a perverse disinclination to admit devout meditations, would have conducted him up to the Almighty? How frequently has he heard that message of love from heaven, that both unfolds the divine perfections, and declares the way to pardon and friendship? After such a review of his life, what can he adduce in vindication of himself from the appalling charge, that God is not in all his thoughts, that he has been so long in a school where Jehovah himself is Teacher, without benefitting by the important and solemn lessons he has received? When he calls for his staff, is he never reminded of the staff of faith, the support of the believing soul, which he has all along neglected, though his immortal part stands as much in need of it, as a decrepid and enfeebled body does of external aid? Does he not feel reminded by the sight of his own countenance furrowed with the indented marks of time, that earthly influences are operating so powerfully on his body, while heavenly influences have left no trace upon his soul?

But a careful review of life, by a person in that state, will probably recall seasons when solemn thoughts of God penetrated his soul, and extorted a sentence of condemnation against his prevailing sentiments. Can he justify himself for the manner in which he treated those serious impressions? Was he faithful in following out the reflections thus suggested to him? Did he deliberately consider the change of life to which they pointed? Did he make any effort, or offer up any prayer, to be disengaged from ensnaring entanglements, that he might surrender his heart to its proper object? Or, did he shun the intrusive thoughts, as haunting spectres fatal to his peace, and betake himself to some more congenial engagement, with the resolute intention of effacing what he was so unwilling to prolong and improve? Perhaps he remembers the death-bed of one or both of his parents, cut off before reaching the term of life to which he has attained. Did his fond mother, during the season of lingering and mortal disease, never address him in language of affectionate counsel, reminding him, with faltering voice, of his duty to God? How long were those tender and warning accents remembered? Were they almost forgotten before her remains were laid in the grave? Is her memory never present now, to rebuke him for neglecting those dying words? Or, perhaps, his recollections are embittered by the memory of a son, whose conduct was so irregular and disobedient as at an early period to impair his health, and dig for him a premature grave. Does the suspicion never rise in his mind, when his thoughts recur to this victim of folly and excess, that his own example contributed to his ruin? And, after such an admonition, does he still continue the same man he was, when, by the want of proper instruction and exemplary behaviour, he inflicted an irreparable injury on his own child? May he not be confronted with him at the judgment-seat, and have his blood required at his hands? Or, it may be, one of his own children, who has gone before him into the valley of the shadow of death, was led, by the blessing of God upon the kind instructions of others, to discover, before going hence, lovely and encouraging proofs of a soul at peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. When spiritual realities were introduced and spoken of with delight, during the memorable season of that child's illness, how was his own mind engaged? Did he secretly ridicule the promises that sustained the young and dying saint? or, was he forced to acknowledge, by silent admonition, the superiority of vital religion to his own cold and unproductive sentiments? or, did he himself endeavour to give encouragement, by reading and quoting passages of Scripture, which seemed suitable to the occasion? But what use did he make of the instruction so affectingly conveyed to him? Was the effect of the touching spectacle confined to the production of a little more than his usual seriousness for a brief period, after which the faint image wholly disappeared? Many scenes and events similar to these fall within the observation or experience of men before they reach a ripe old age; and where so much has been given, it is not unreasonable to expect something in return.

The nearness of the aged to the invisible world is not less a ground on which they are expected to excel in wisdom and piety. The remark is not unfrequently heard, how disgraceful is such conduct in one from whom better things might be looked for, considering that he has one foot in the grave! A state of mind attuned to the spirit of the Gospel is at all times desirable, but at no stage of our existence is its absence more to be deplored than when, from the most probable course of events, death is at the door. When the deep murmurs of the ocean of eternity fall on the ear, it is time to pause and ponder the path of our feet. How becoming, at the approach of august Majesty, to wrap the soul in the mantle of religion, and listen, with profound reverence and humility, to the still small voice of God! Awful thought! to be forgetful of God, and yet so soon to meet him! Did we anticipate an early interview with a stranger of high rank and superior wisdom, on some matter of vast importance to ourselves, what anxiety and preparation would there be for the occasion! And with so near a prospect of entering the presence of the Searcher of Hearts, on a concern of unspeakable moment to their eternal interests, what fatal infatuation, what unhappy spell is that which binds so many old expectants, and tempts them to allow the final day to come, without being prepared to meet their God? Standing on the eve of so solemn a change, with the shadows of the evening thickening around them; about to meet Him with whom they have to do, and to whom they must answer for what they are, and what they have received,—for what they have done, and what they have neglected or refused to do, the temper of their minds ought surely to be devout and contemplative, harmonizing with the solemnity of their prospects. There can be no more appropriate object of their thoughts and desires than assimilation to Him whom the most exalted intelligences delight to honour, as an essential qualification for the enjoyment of that fellowship which none but the sanctified can esteem a privilege. Do they desire to meet their friends who have died in the Lord, and are now pillars in God's temple, and go no more out? Why then neglect the passport without which there can be no admission to the glorious assembly, where they live, and love, and are beloved? "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord;" and he who shall never see the Lord shall never meet and rejoice with them.

Whether the aged, then, look back or look forward, they have abundant reason to exclaim, "What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness!" It is recorded of the emperor Titus Vespasian, that he said he lost a day, when he did not do some good in the course of it. But if they are not living unto God, they may confess that they have lost a lifetime. And are they determined to end as they have begun, and be perversely consistent till death's curtain shall drop, and hide them from the view of mortals? Shall no one have it to say, that their courage abandoned them in the prospect of dissolution, and that they durst not die as they lived? Before acting on a resolution, savouring more of pride than wisdom, let them ask, apart from human opinion, whether the step be sound? Let them look at it as dying men, and pronounce as those who seek the truth. It signifies little what motives a saving change at the eleventh hour may be ascribed to by the world; it is surely better that it should take place, though misinterpreted, than that it should never be realized. A courtier, after retiring seven years before his death, from the vanities of this world, and seriously devoting himself to the service of God, wished this epitaph to be written on his tombstone,—

"Here lies a man aged seventy years, who lived seven." By devoting the remainder of life to God, should it be but seven days, the issue will be glorious. Stop, old man; thy sand-glass is almost run out, thy sins are great, and form a heavier load upon thy soul, than the burden of years is on thy body, causing thy frame to bend and thy limbs to tremble. Why wilt thou die? Thou hast weighed the world long enough, and ever found it wanting, and is it not worth while turning to One too long neglected, but who may yet be found as the strength of thy heart, now when thy flesh and heart fail? Perhaps thou hast not prayed since childhood, when thou wert taught to kneel beside thy mother's knees; or, though thou hast often and regularly appeared among the worshippers of God in public, thy heart has ever been a stranger to the power of godliness. But thou mayest pray yet, as David prayed to God, not to forsake him when he was old and grey-headed. The throne of God is still a throne of grace, and Christ's voice is still a voice of peace.—"Come unto me;" approach the mercy-seat with the spirit of the publican, and thou mayest be born again, and become a child of God and an heir of heaven in thine old age.

ABDOOL MESSEE, AN INDIAN CONVERT.

BY THE REV. ROBERT M. M'CHRYNE,

Minister of St. Peter's Church, Dundee.

SHEKH SALIH was born at Delhi, in Upper India. His father was a learned man, and gained his livelihood by teaching children. His son was, accordingly, early instructed in the Persian and Arabic languages. At twenty-one years of age, he came with his father to Lucknow, in quest of employment, and became moonshiee or teacher, first to an English merchant, and then to an English officer. He was so zealous a follower of Mahomet, that he persuaded a Hindoo servant of this officer to turn Mahometan. But the master finding fault with him for this, he left his employment, determining to have no more communication with the British. For about a year he was master of the jewels in the court of Oude, where he was particularly attentive to Mahometan observances, and tried to make others so. He then entered into the Mahratta service as a trooper, a service something like that of the yeomanry of this country, and this step he always spoke of as the beginning of God's mercy to him; for it was here that he was the witness of one of those scenes of treachery and murder which so often stain the annals of the native chiefs of Hindostan. Disgusted with the perfidy of mankind, he left the army, resolving to gain his bread rather by the arts of peace, however degrading. He accordingly supported himself at Lucknow by preparing green paint.

A year after this, he went to Cawnpore to visit his father, who was engaged as moonshiee in the house of a rich native, who lived in the premises next to those of the Rev. Henry Martyn. He here heard of Mr Martyn's preaching to the poor natives on the lawn before his house on Sabbath-days, and determined to go, as he said, "to see the sport." Mr Martyn was explaining the commandments to the people when Shekh Salih went to hear. The same God that opened the heart of Lydia opened his heart to attend. He was struck with the observations made, and considered them reasonable and excellent. He had been perplexed by the contradictions maintained by different Mahometan sects. This Christian instruction seemed better than any he had yet received. He told his thoughts to his father, and begged him to get him employment at Cawnpore, that he might hear more of these things. For the heart that is truly touched by God, even though it may bleed, cannot but desire to know more of his way. His father knew a friend of Sabat—the learned Arabian, and supposed convert from Mahometanism—who was then living with Martyn. Through this friend, Shekh Salih was engaged to copy Persian writings for Sabat. True grace is often a timid and delicate plant, that grows unsuspected and unknown, depriving itself often of the kindest nourishment, that it may avoid the gazer's eye. It was thus in the heart of Shekh Salih. He obtained a lodging on the premises, yet breathed not a whisper of his wishes; and his chief means of growing into a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, was by inquiring of the native children the subjects of the lessons which they had learned in school. When Mr Martyn finished his translation of the New Testament into Hindoostanee, the book was given to our friend to bind. This was a providential opportunity to him; he not only bound but read the book; and the work of his conversion was thus perfected in silence and secrecy by the same hand which makes the dew to feed the tender grass.

When Henry Martyn was about to leave Cawnpore, on account of his health, Shekh Salih could no longer refrain from asking his advice as to his future conduct, and earnestly requested to be baptized. Mr Martyn having solemnly warned him of the danger of a false profession, agreed to take him along with Sabat to Calcutta. But neither during the journey, nor during Martyn's short stay at Calcutta, was he entirely convinced of the reality of this man's change of heart; so that he left him, without gratifying his wish for baptism, recommending him, however, to the care of the Rev. David Brown. That excellent man, one of the chaplains of the East India Company, after five months' delay, being thoroughly satisfied of the conversion of Shekh Salih, baptized him on Whitsunday 1811, giving him the name of Abdool Messee—"Servant of Christ."

His baptism was evidently attended with a blessing, and he now became in reality what he became in name, a servant of Christ. He began his Christian labours in Calcutta, where he remained unshaken, either by the offered bribes, or by the persecution of the Mahometans of that city.

In November 1812 he proceeded up the country with the Rev. D. Corrie, from whose account of him the preceding sketch is gleaned. He says, "So often have I been deceived by these people, that I almost fear to speak decidedly of any of them; but judging from present appearances, I should be more disposed to fear for myself than for Abdool." Mr Corrie, then a chaplain of the Company, kept a journal of the public labours of Abdool, both in their voyage up the Ganges, and during seventeen months which he spent with Abdool in Agra. This interesting journal is printed in the Church Missionary Register for 1814-1815.

The conversion of so true and well born a Mussulman as Abdool, created an universal sensation, especially in the places where his family was well known. At Agra, Mr Corrie and Abdool opened a school for Christian instruction to the young; and Abdool was constantly engaged in preaching Jesus to all who came. It was no uncommon thing for forty or fifty respectable Mahometans to be assembled around him; and in the evening, when he preached without the fort, even the tops of the houses were covered with Mahometans anxious to hear. An old Mahometan, on going away, was asked what he thought of Abdool? He answered, "What can I say? He says nothing amiss; and nothing can be objected to the Gospel. What can I say?"

Another said, "How vain are all the objections some make to this man, and what reason is there why we should not hear him?" Sometimes he would be visited by a party, to try if he had really been a Mahometan, and if he knew the curious points of their observances. Sometimes he would be visited by rich and learned Mahometans, who had been his schoolfellows, and to whom, with admirable faithfulness, he defended his change, and recommended the Gospel. It pleased God to follow up these labours with a blessing, the abundance of which will never be known till the judgment-day. Whilst many, no doubt, received the good seed as Abdool had himself done, in silence and secrecy, many also received it openly, and brought forth the fruit in their lives. In the end of December 1813, Mr Corrie writes, "Since our arrival at this place, in March last, forty-one adults and fourteen children of theirs have been baptized, and all continue to walk in the truth."

Abdool's family at Lucknow were all along well disposed towards him. His brother and his nephew became true converts to Christianity. In July 1814 he paid a visit to his family, and kept a journal of his proceedings. The following is an extract:—

"July 28.—Thirty persons, friends and acquaintances, came out to meet me. Among them my father and two brothers-in-law, and my brother Joseph seeing me, embraced me and rejoiced greatly. After arriving at my father's house, the sinful writer read the ninth chapter of Acts, and explained it, according as the Spirit gave assistance, and joined in prayer. About sixty men and women were collected, and all heard with attention and appeared pleased; and my mother and sisters expressed themselves thus: 'Praise to Jesus Christ, that we who were separate are again brought together. We are his sinful servants. How shall he not vouchsafe his grace unto us.' And my father, his eyes streaming with tears, said, 'O Lord Jesus Christ, I, a sinner, cannot praise thee as thou art worthy; and now through the gladness that thou hast showed me, half my illness is removed. And now I am persuaded that thou wilt restore me to health also, and deliver me from the hands of all mine enemies.' After this I and Maytt Messee, (his nephew,) sung that hymn, beginning

'At early dawn the Lord we'll praise.'"

How interesting a family scene does this lay open among the proud and unbending followers of Islam!

On the 18th of August, the same year, Mr Corrie was obliged to leave Agra, on account of his health. He committed the congregation to the care of Abdool Messee and Mr Bowley. During the sixteen months in which he and Abdool had laboured, fifty adults had been baptized, and twenty-one children; about half Mahometans, and the other half Hindoos. Of these one had been expelled, and six had apostatised.

In this interesting field did Abdool Messee continue to labour till 1820, when he received Lutheran ordination.

In January 1825, Bishop Heber, in passing through the north of India, came to Agra and met with this remarkable man. He thus speaks of him:—"Archdeacon Corrie's celebrated convert, Abdool Messee, breakfasted this morning at Mr Irving's; he is a very fine old man, with a magnificent grey beard, and much more gentlemanly manners than any Christian native whom I have seen. His rank, indeed, previous to his conversion, was rather elevated, since he was master of the jewels to the court of Oude, an appointment of higher estimation in eastern palaces, than in those of Europe, and the holder of which has a high salary. Abdool's present appointments, as Christian missionary, are sixty rupees a month, and of this he gives away at least half! Who can dare to say that this man has changed his faith from any interested motives? He is a very good Hindoostanee, Persian, and Arabic scholar, but knows no English. There is a small congregation of native Christians, converted by Mr Corrie, when he was chaplain at Agra, and now kept together by Abdool Measee. The earnest desire of this good man is to be ordained a clergyman of the Church of England, and if God spares his life and mine, I hope, during the ember weeks in this next autumn, to confer orders upon him. He is every way fit for them, and is a most sincere Christian, quite free, so far as I could observe, from all conceit or enthusiasm. His long Eastern dress, his long grey beard, and his calm resigned countenance, give him already almost the air of an apostle."

This testimony of Bishop Heber's, though incorrect as to some of the facts of Abdool's history, is deeply interesting. In December of the same year he performed his promise, and conferred on Abdool the rite of Episcopal ordination; the articles, the various oaths, and the ordination service, having been translated for his use into Hindoostanee. The last notice we have of this interesting man is, that, "immediately after ordination, he went to Lucknow, where he resided, with the exception of a visit to Cawnpore, till his death, which happened on the 4th of March 1827, occasioned by mortification proceeding from a neglected carbuncle. The President, who had always behaved to him with the greatest kindness and liberality, read the burial service at his grave, and ordered a monument to be erected to his memory, with an inscription in English and Persian."

We can only hint at the important lessons to be derived from this interesting history.

1. How unable the best men are to determine in what hearts there is a true work of grace, and in what hearts there is none.—How confidently does the amiable Martyn write with regard to Sabat the Arabian, that "not to esteem him a monument of grace, and to love him, is impossible." And yet how sadly does the issue of the Arabian's history, his public abjuration of the faith, his continued attendance at the Mosque, seem to prove that he was one of those who "deny the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction." On the other hand, how diffident and doubtful is the same zealous missionary as to the conversion of Shekh Salih. He solemnly warns him of the danger of a false profession,—he takes him along with him on trial,—he leaves him, still refusing to baptise him, and yet how happily does the issue of Abdool's history,—his long tried Christian walk and conversation, his unwearied and richly rewarded labours, his meek and holy deportment, seem to prove that he was not only a believer in Jesus, but a chosen vessel to bear Christ's name before the Gentiles.

2. How much encouragement there is here to all godly ministers and missionaries, who may be walking in heaviness, because they see no fruit of their labours.—When Henry Martyn went to India, he went in the true spirit of the believing missionary. "Even if I should never see a native converted," he says, "God may design by my patience and continuance in the work to encourage future missionaries." These words were almost prophetic of the result. No faithful missionary ever saw less fruit of his labours, in the way of conversion; and no missionary has ever done more in the way of a self-devoting example to encourage others to follow in his footsteps.

But there was fruit of Martyn's labours, though he knew it not. Shekh Salih was converted under his preaching; and he again became the spiritual father of a large company of his countrymen, when the bones of Martyn were mouldering at the foot of the peaks of Tokat. It is our part to plant and to water,—it is God's part to give the increase; and surely the energies and sufferings of a whole life are happily expended, if one soul be saved. Who that has the same mind that was in Christ, would not go round the world to save a soul?

3. We may learn the effects that may be expected from educated native missionaries in India.—We have seen that Abdool was a man of good education among his countrymen. He was master of Hindoostanee, Persian, and Arabic. Now, though the Spirit of God can alone turn the heart of man, yet he does so always by means; and there cannot be a doubt that the measure of success which God gave to the labours of Abdool is to be accounted for instrumentally by the superior gifts and qualifications of the man. But Abdool was ignorant of the English language, and therefore had little or no command over the vast stores of information which can be acquired only through the medium of English. Is it then unreasonable to conclude, that if he had known the English language—if, in addition to his gifts, both of nature and of grace, he had been fully educated and equipped for the ministry in the same way as our best and most finished divines are—is it unreasonable to conclude that he would have been a mightier and more polished shaft in the hand of the Almighty?

Should not all those who love the Lord Jesus, unite their offerings and their prayers, in seeking to raise up in India a race of native teachers, who, being not only taught of God, but also fully taught of man, equipped both from earth and from heaven, may go forth with power to preach Christ and him crucified, to the millions of their idolatrous fellow-countrymen?

THE PECTEN OPERCULARIS, OR SCALLOP.

BY THE REV. DAVID LANDBOROUGH, Minister of Stevenston.

"O Lord, how manifold are thy works, in wisdom hast thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches; so is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts."

It is delightful to contemplate the vast amount of happiness which the Lord, according to their capacity of enjoyment, bestows on the minuter of his creatures, whether seen in the merry gyrations of the little black beetles on a peaceful pond, or in the happy frolics of a living cloud of gnats, sporting in the sunbeam; and we are always pleased when we find in any department of nature, that the happiness is greater than we supposed. Who has not, when a boy, admired the easy and graceful motions of playful trouts in a pool of limpid water? And have we not at times been disposed to pity the shell-fish, capable, as we thought, of nothing more, if even so much as snail-like motion, except when, by the wave of the sea, they were driven about and tossed? We were not a little pleased, however, lately to find, that our pity with respect to some of them at least, is very much misplaced. We observed on a sunny September day, in a pool of sea-water, left on Stevenston strand by the ebbing-tide, what we at first thought some of the scaly brood at play. On closer investigation, however, we found that it was the fry of pecten opercularis skipping quite nimbly through the pool. Their motion was rapid and zig-zag, very like that of ducks in a sunny blink, rejoicing in the prospect of rain. They seemed, by the sudden opening and closing of their valves, to have the power of darting like an arrow through the water. One jerk carried them some yards, and then by another sudden jerk, they were off in a moment on a different tack. We doubt not, that when full grown, they engage in similar amusements, though as pectens of greater gravity, they choose to romp unseen, and play their gambols in the deep.

This pecten is the clam, or, as it is often called in the west of Scotland, the champ, which children gather with delight on the shore; and at the age we saw it perform, it was only about the size of a silver groat. The pecten jacobus, a rarer species of the clam or scallop, was worn by pilgrims of old, as a token that they had crossed the seas on a visit to some shrine, and were consequently entitled to

"Fix th' scallop on their hat before."

THE EARLY PROTESTANT CHURCH OF FRANCE.

No. IV.

By THE REV. JOHN G. LOBNER,

Minister of St. David's Parish, Glasgow.

WE have already seen the remarkable rise and progress of the Protestant Church of France, in the course of twenty years, beginning with 1580; and the serious decline which it suffered, in the same space of time, in the next twenty years, through the influence of persecution and the apostasy of leading men, particularly Henry IV. We now pursue the history from 1598. This was a memorable year, being the year when the first effectual protection was granted to the Protestant cause, under the name of the edict of Nantes. The author of this most important measure was Henry, and apostate though he was, such was the estimation in which it was held by the poor Protestants that it procured for his name the title of "great," and for his memory the character of "blessed." Indeed he may be said to have been the only French monarch who ever yielded cordial justice to his Protestant subjects; and well he might, for no one had better opportunities of knowing their worth. It was with no small difficulty the edict was passed, such was the force of Popish opposition, and the very provisions of the measure shew how dreadful must have been the state of matters before. According to the edict, the Protestants were to have the free exercise of their religion, and access to all offices of honour. They were to be tried by judges of their own persuasion. They were to receive so many cities as pledges of security, or cautionary towns, and their churches as well as their garrisons were to be upheld, in part at least, from the public resources. The garrisons were to receive a yearly sum of 80,000 crowns. But, by a clause in the edict, it was provided that the Protestants were to have places of public worship only within certain limits,—none within so many miles of the capitol,—and they were otherwise subjected to various harassing regulations, all in deference to the Church of Rome. Still the edict of Nantes was a mighty boon; and when we take a glance at the persecutions issuing in civil wars, with which the country had been oppressed for many years before, we cannot wonder at the Protestant joy.

So early as the year 1525, in the very dawn of the Reformation, Popery began her efforts to extinguish the truth by burning its professors alive; and down to 1557, or for more than thirty long years, scarcely one was permitted to pass without its complement of victims. Not less than one hundred and seventeen public martyrdoms were spread over this period of time. And when the Protestants, in spite of persecution, grew in numbers and acquired sufficient strength, and were, moreover, tempted to make resistance to their oppressors, what was the result? In the course of the forty years which elapsed, from the meeting of the first General Assembly of the Protestant Church to the granting of the edict of Nantes, there were not less than nine civil wars,—four pitched battles,—three hundred engagements. Several hundred places too were besieged, and one million of French subjects lost their lives. About thirty years later, it was estimated that not less than one hundred and fifty million livres had been expended in protracted wars and persecutions, and two thousand churches and as many monasteries destroyed. Infidels would fain lay the blame of all this devastation on religion. But not to plead that a considerable share of it was owing to political parties, who, contending for the succession to the throne, often disguising their ambition under religious pretences, it is to be remembered that the aggressor was not the true religion of the Scriptures, but Popery, its great caricature and corrupter, and that Christianity is not responsible for its misdeeds. When Protestants resisted, it was, for the most part, simply in self-defense. It is not the Gospel which creates discord, or war, or which leads to destruction. It is the depravity of man, which hates the Gospel with such thorough hatred as to be lighted into a flame at the very sight of it. And this is no more than what our Saviour taught his Church and people to expect in every age, when he said that his coming would not bring peace but a sword. The appalling facts to which I have referred, especially when conjoined with St. Bartholomew's massacre of seventy thousand persons, will enable us to understand the high importance of the edict of Nantes, imperfect and intolerant as that measure in some respects was. Under its protection the ministers who had been dispersed by persecution were recalled, and the Protestant Church made decided progress for many years. The doctrine was sound, the discipline strict, and not a few of the ministers and professors in the universities were eminent men. But Henry was assassinated in 1610, and soon the Romish principle, that faith is not to be kept with heretics, came to be exemplified in the perpetual encroachments on, and violations of, the edict. Louis XIII., a son of Henry, was a bigoted Roman Catholic. He dedicated himself, and kingdom, and all that he had, to the Virgin Mary. In 1620 he established Popery in Bearn and drove the Protestants to arms, refusing to make peace with them, except on the conditions that they should demolish their garrisons and abandon their cautionary towns, which the edict recognised. In 1625 he attacked Rochelle, one of the greatest Protestant strongholds, and after a siege of many weeks, carried it with a sacrifice of thirteen thousand citizens. This, in a great degree, broke the power of the Protestants, and the evil was aggravated by the success with which Richelieu, the celebrated prime minister of Louis, prevailed, by bribes, upon many of the leading Protestant chiefs, to desert the Protestant cause. Such were Dukes Sully, Bouillon, Lesdiguières, Rohan, &c. Amid all these discouraging circumstances, so discouraging as to drive some eminent men to England, still the Protestants, as a body, did not fall off in numbers, but rather gained during the course of this reign. The king dying in 1643, was succeeded by his son, the well known Louis XIV., in whose hands the edict continued to receive the most cruel infractions, until, in 1685, it was by an act of inexpressible infamy and wickedness wholly repealed. We need scarcely add that it led to the most serious disasters to France. We do not mean to bring the history of the Protestant Church at present, down to this date, but shall limit ourselves by the year 1659, the year in which the last General Assembly of the Protestant Church was permitted to be held. Our survey of the spirit and proceedings of the Church will thus extend over sixty years. And though her ministers and members might be said to live in perpetual alarm, during all that time, and were often and cruelly persecuted, especially towards its close, yet we shall find a most beautiful contrast between the sad civil history of the nation, to which we have referred, and the history of the Church of Christ.

1. One of the first and most interesting features with which one is struck, in contemplating the early Protestant Church of France, at this period, is the warm encouragement which she lent to the preparation and publication of good books. The Church of Rome had been the great enemy of the press; but the Protestants had nothing to fear from the diffusion of knowledge. In early days they had experienced the value of printing to their cause, and had published tracts against Popery, serious and humorous, to a considerable extent, and with great success. The Queen of Navarre, with the ladies of her court, had, even through tapestry, representing a fox's head, looking out from under a monk's cowl, and other devices, dealt some hard blows at the Church of Rome, and so when the Protestant Church became more consolidated, she did not fail to work the press. It were well that the Protestant Churches, of modern times, acted more largely on the same principle. It is certain that the opposing force of infidelity has owed almost all its success to the unwearied plying of the press. And the interests of religion seem too sacred to be left to random advocates or interested politicians.

Like pious men, the Protestant ministers of France sought to perpetuate the memory of what God had done in their behalf. So early as 1603, the thirteen provinces into which the Protestant Church was divided, are charged to collect the memoirs of those remarkable events which had taken place in the course of the previous fifty years, and to transmit them to Monsieur D'Aubigny, to be inserted by him in the history which he was writing. Nine years later, the same provinces are exhorted carefully to collect the history of those ministers and other Christians, who, "in these last times have suffered for the truths of the Son of God," and to transmit them to Geneva, to be inserted in the book of martyrs, and be published by the pastors of that Church. In compliance with this exhortation, we read that the deputies of Bearn brought with them the history of the martyrs of that province, and that it was sent on to Geneva, "to be added to the next impression of our Martyrology." It would seem that at this period, the Protestants were not permitted to publish, in France, the account of their martyrs, and hence, sooner than lose the memory of those they so sacredly revered, they had recourse to Geneva. So impressed were they with the importance of such an undertaking, that in the last General Assembly which sat, in 1659, ministers are blamed for not sufficiently attending to this express article of ecclesiastical appointment, and all provinces and particular Churches are required to keep an exact record of memorable events connected with the Protestant Religion, and to send them, "by a careful hand," to the person who had been appointed to compile them into a volume. Nay, a particular pastor is nominated in every province, to whom the account of these remarkable providences was to be directed. Such care as this was at once a proper expression of gratitude to God for his distinguishing goodness to the Church, and also an important mean of preventing that misapprehension or misrepresentation to which Church history is too frequently exposed in the hands of the mere worldly historian. How much error, as to the early history of the Church of Scotland, might have been prevented or neutralised, had the Church more carefully collected and preserved the memorials of her most prominent events.

But it was not about her own history alone that the Church of France discovered so much interest. She encouraged various theological works, and, among others, a History of the persecuted Albigensian and Waldensian Christians, by M. Perrin. He is entreated to finish his history of their true condition, and all having memoirs of the "doctrine, discipline, or persecution of these poor saints of Christ," are charged to transmit them with all diligence and care. Two years after, a draught of the history was laid before the synod, and warmly approved, and five of the brethren were appointed to assist. At the same time, the synod agreed to aid in bearing his great expenses in books, and in bringing out the first impression. This shews how warm was the interest which one Protestant Church, in those days, took in the welfare of another, and how anxious that of France was to vindicate the character of the unjustly aspersed. There were many similar cases of encouragement to authors. The thanks of the Synod of Tonneirs was given to the Rev. André Rivet for his learned works against the adversaries of the truth, and six hundred livres out of the common stock of all the Churches were awarded, "as a testimony of love and honour;" while M. Blondel, an eminent minister of the Church, "because his great excellency lieth in Church history and antiquity, he is earnestly desired to follow his genius, and to combat and confute the adversaries with that weapon." One thousand livres are awarded him to buy books; and the synod promise to defray the charges of the first edition of his works. A Scotchman of the name of George Thomson, who was a minister of the French Church, received in the same way three hundred livres, to assist in printing a book in French on the Romish controversy. Mr Daniel Chamier, a still more eminent controversial writer, was requested to print three large volumes of his works at once, and two thousand livres were advanced by the Church as a compensation for his labour. So highly were his works valued, that the Synod of Vitre entered into a bargain with the printer about their publication, and advanced eight thousand livres for that end, anxious that the book should be sold "unto the pastors of our Churches at a very moderate price, and reserving always twelve complete copies to be presented unto their revered and learned author, free of all costs and charges whatsoever." The character of those works shews how sound the Church was on the great doctrines of the Gospel, as opposed to the errors of Popery, and how desirous of spreading abroad the truth as it is in Christ. Chamier dying before his work was completed, several of the most eminent ministers were appointed, in 1645, to finish it at the public expense. Various other works were undertaken and encouraged in the same way; such as Drellincourt's, and the answers to Cardinal Baronius' Corruptions of History, and to Bellarmine, the great advocate of Rome. But we have time to refer only to one, that of the lord Du Plessis, on the Eucharist. The author was a most eminent layman, the governor of Saumur,—and the Church manifested the deepest interest in his work. It would seem that he had consulted the synod assembling at Gergeau, in 1601, about the publication; for they write,—“We advise him to send his book unto Geneva, because of the advantage of libraries; and letters shall be sent to our brethren, the pastors there, recommending to them the examination and the verifying of all the quotations in it.” Two years after, we find, that the pastors and professors at Geneva gave their very honourable testimony, and the National Synod render their hearty thanks to his lordship for his great zeal and affection for the truth of God, and for his worthy labours in its defence. At the same time, they order it “to be printed out of hand, believing that the Lord will give his blessing to it.” The Jesuits of Bordeaux were so incensed, that they petitioned the Parliament of that town publicly to condemn it to the flames; a request which it does not appear was complied with. Many and important were the services which Du Plessis rendered to the Protestant cause. In 1590 he built a church for the Protestants of Saumur, and obtained a grant from the King (Henry IV.) for instituting a university there, which was afterwards carried into effect. He wrote an earnest remonstrance to the king on the change of his religion, entreating, at the same time, the continuance of his favour to the Protestants. He was instrumental in healing a controversy between Du Moulin and Tilenus of the university of Sedan upon the effect of the union of the natures in Christ: and he so intimidated Cardinal Du Perron, by his knowledge of the Romish controversy, that the Cardinal, though urged by the king, was unwilling to encounter him, pleading, as an apology, that he was “waiting for some manuscripts from Rome;” an expression which the king came afterwards to apply as a proverb to those who made idle excuses, saying, "I see you stay for manuscripts from Rome too."

The Protestant Church of France, however, did not only, by all wise means, encourage the publication of important works; it took steps for the collecting of books into libraries, and for informing her ministers and students with their contents. Among express articles of discipline in 1601, we find the following: "Richer Churches and great Lords are entreated to erect libraries for the benefit of their ministers and proposans," that is, candidates for the ministry. The same call is earnestly repeated six years later; and it is not only the Churches which are addressed; the Protestant universities are exhorted to do their utmost to obtain a public library, "and, in particular, the King of Spain's Bible in many languages, printed at Antwerp." This was in 1608, when books were scarce and expensive, and when ministers were poor. It is interesting to see that a Polyglot Bible was the book above all others which the poor persecuted Protestant Churches of France wished to stand conspicuous in their university library. It shewed at once their love of learning and of the Scriptures, and so was not an inapt type of their true character at that early period.

It may not be unsuitable to inform our readers, that the fine spirit of knowledge, and the wise encouragement of theological learning, which marked the Protestant Church of France, was shared by the Church of Scotland in her early days, and manifested in a similar manner. Travelling no farther back than the beginning of last century, we meet with perpetual recommendations of good books by the General Assembly. In 1708, a Mr Semple, the minister of Liberton, is encouraged to write the History of the Church of Scotland, and all Presbyteries are enjoined to favour him with materials and assistance. About the same period a sum of money is voted to a minister engaged in writing a Commentary on the Scriptures. The excellent works of Binning, a faithful minister of the Church, who died when a young man, were recommended by the Assembly of 1704, and sums of money were repeatedly voted to his family, out of respect to the father. Wodrow's History was not only recommended, but it appears that, in 1742, L.30 were paid to the Rev. Mr Wodrow of Eastwood for manuscripts. Directions were given to obtain the manuscript writings of the eminent Samuel Rutherford on Esther and Isaiah; and a Mr Currie, minister of Kinglassie, was presented with L.60 for his able Vindication of the Church. The works of Poole, at least his Annotations, Durham, Flavel, P. Gillespie on the Covenants, Spalding on the Sacrament, Blackwell's Methodus Evangelica, &c., are all recommended. Nor was the recommendation confined to books strictly theological. Other works, such as M'Colin's Dictionary, Sir Nicolas Trot on Oriental Learning, Maitland's History of Scotland, meet with the same encouragement. Nay, like the Protestant Church of France, steps were taken for every Presbytery enjoying the benefit of a library. This was strongly recommended in 1727; and it is well known that in the beginning of that century, not fewer than one hundred libraries were sent down from London, chiefly for the use of the Highlands and Islands.

It is remarkable, how similar are the plans pursued by good men in different countries and periods in doing good, and that without any concert. It would seem, that the same evils suggest the same remedies; and doubtless all good men are under the guidance of one and the same good Spirit. Most of the facts to which I have referred, are passed over by civil or ecclesiastical historians, as too minute; but the real character of a Church may, like the real character of an individual, be better learned from the little minute proceedings of ordinary life, than from greater events, in which motives are generally much more mixed.

Though there were particular circumstances in the history both of France and Scotland, which demanded, on the part of their Churches, a special attention to the culture of knowledge and learning—though authors are not now so dependent on the recommendations, whether of individuals or corporate bodies, for their success, as they were of old—still there can be little question that a great deal might be done by the General Assembly and other Church courts, in aiding and encouraging well qualified men in the prosecution of particular studies, and in the defence of assailed truth, whether by public thanks, or rewards, or more substantial assistance; and now that the influence of the press is so predominant, the call to such measures is the more urgent.

In the next paper, we shall direct the reader's attention to another important feature in the character of the Protestant Church of France, at the period of which we write.

THE FAITH OF THE SYROPHENICIAN WOMAN : A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. ROBERT COUTTS,
One of the Ministers of Brechin.

"O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour."—MATT. xv. 28.

ALL the miracles of Christ, besides being proofs of his power, and affording evidence of his divine mission, are calculated to excite in us feelings of love, and esteem, and admiration of the Redeemer, and to improve us in wisdom, and diligence, and goodness, from the excellent moral lessons they convey. Of the many which he wrought, there is not one more full of instruction than the miraculous cure of the young Syrophenician woman, who was grievously vexed with a devil. Our Lord, in the course of his ministry, passing along the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, is accosted by an anxious mother who had heard of his fame, and had come to him on purpose to beseech him on behalf of her daughter. The unhappy mother, in the earnestness of her importunity, entreats the favour of his interposition as if for herself,—“Have mercy on me.” But neither her distress, nor the acknowledgment of the dignity of his character, could draw from him a kind word or a favourable look. Even the intercession of his disciples was unavailing, and the homage of worship which she paid, only called forth a forbidding reply. Notwithstanding, convinced of his good-will, she persists in arguments, in entreaties, and in worship, until she not only gains her suit,—the recovery of her daughter,—but his approbation of her importunity—his testimony to the truth and greatness of her faith. “O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt.”

You have here a striking example of the power and success of faith, in the conduct of the woman; you have an instance of faith remarkably great, put to a severe trial.

Let us consider, then, the greatness or excellence of this woman's faith.

I. The greatness of her faith is seen in the disadvantages under which she laboured.

Faith, it may be observed, is the assent of the understanding to something testified, and hence, in believing, there can be no merit, agreeably to what Paul says, (Rom. iv. 16,) that salvation "is of faith, that it might be by grace," and that "boasting is excluded; by what law, by the law of works? nay, but by the law of faith." This assent is founded on evidence, and is not derived from any predisposition to believe, any bias of the affection or choice of the will. And hence, also, no disadvantage of situation can render faith meritorious, or afford occasion to boast. The testimony, therefore, which Christ gave to the excellence of this woman's faith, and the peculiar blessing he pronounced, after the confession of Thomas, on those who have not seen and yet have believed, ought not to lead us to infer, that those Christians are most noble whose situation is most unfavourable, or that there is a merit in faith in proportion to the weakness or scantiness of the evidence on which it is founded. But though the disadvantages under which many have laboured do not attach any merit to their belief, they are strong proofs of its genuineness, and serve to exhibit its greatness in a clear point of view. As the darkness of the night does not communicate new brightness to the flash of lightning, but renders it more conspicuous to the eye; or as the rough billows of the sea do not give additional strength to the rock, but shew that by which for ages it has resisted their violence; so the unfavourable circumstances under which some have lived, who have been called to the belief of the Gospel, do not impart vigour to their faith, or merit to the act of their mind, but display the power of divine grace; and the truth and greatness of that belief which God hath granted them through the preaching of his Word.

Having suggested this necessary caution, let us now attend to the greatness of the woman's faith, as exhibited by the unfavourable circumstances in her situation. This woman dwelt on the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, and, as we are told by Mark, (vii. 26,) was a Greek, a Syrophenician by nation. She dwelt among a people who were idolaters, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenant of promise; and we have no reason to believe but that she had been educated according to the manners of her country and relations, and had imbibed all the doctrines of a religion, which attaches to it the human mind, by the laxity of its precepts, the splendour of its ceremonies, and the indulgence it allows to the propensities of our nature.

But the nature of the human mind, in reference to the power of habit and prejudices of education, seems to exhibit the greatness of this woman's faith, as much as the nature of heathenism itself. The impressions, whether good or bad, which we acquire at an early period, commonly continue through life. We receive them before we can judge for ourselves; we approve of and venerate them from our respect and love to our parents and teachers, who have been at pains to instil them; and, by degrees, they become fixed principles of reasoning and action, a part of our habits and constitution. In this way do we receive the prejudices of education in general; but those that have a reference to religion strike deeper than others into the human mind, for these are connected with every feeling of our nature, and embrace both the present state which we enjoy, and the future which we hope and fear. But when these prejudices are not only in favour of religion, but of the religion of our fathers, and not of that of our fathers only, but (which embraces a wider circle) that of our kindred, and of our country, you may sooner tear the heart from the bosom than tear them from the mind, and nothing but the Spirit of God, operating through the Word, which cuts even to the dividing asunder of the joints and marrow, and soul and spirit, can divest us of them, to turn us to that which is good and true. There is something so dear, so venerable in the names Parent, and Country, that we cannot allow ourselves to think that in so material a circumstance they can err. Can so many, and among these many wise men, be in a mistake? Can those whom I love and revere; can my parents, my friends, my countrymen, have led me into a delusion? No. By these highly honoured virtues, filial reverence, friendship, gratitude, patriotism, it cannot be that I have been led astray. Such was the unfavourable situation of this Syrophenician. But she was a woman, and in her sex, and in the education of the female sex in the country in which she lived, we may trace other disadvantages. That gentleness and flexibility of nature, that benevolence of disposition, unsuspecting temper, and tenderness of heart which characterize the female sex, and peculiarly predispose them to the sentiments of friendship, affection to relatives, and filial reverence, render them exceedingly liable to prejudices of education, and especially to those which regard religion. This observation is less applicable in our happy country, where the system of female education is more improved, where access to information is not shut to woman, where she is allowed her place in conversation and discussion, and the parent is more anxious to inform the judgment than to enslave the heart. It was not so in the country of this Syrophenician. There, woman was degraded to be the slave, rather than caressed as the companion of man; the education of the female mind was systematically neglected; both the soul and body of the daughter were subjugated to the opinions and will of her father, and her whole faith was a mass of prejudices. Custom would, no doubt, in some measure, reconcile one-half of the human race to this bondage, and in this enslaved state the flexibility and tenderness of the female character, combined with an uninformed mind, would operate with peculiar force in rivetting the opinions instilled, the very absurdity of which would, in such a situation, strengthen attachment and bigotry. The very name of parent, husband, brother, friend, and countryman, would outweigh, in the judgment, the most solid arguments of a stranger. From such a state of mental bondage how glorious to see one rise to the knowledge, the belief, and confession of the truth! Though she had lain among the pots, yet she came forth like a dove whose wings are covered with silver, and feathers with yellow gold. The inviting nature of the heathen mythology, the prejudices of education and country, and the contractedness of mind produced by her situation were all overcome,—the fame of Christ reaching her, an enlargement of soul was given her to apply to him, and she came, saw, and believed. Her affection and respect for her friends and countrymen, yield to her faith in the Messiah, and she boldly avows him to be her only Lord and Saviour. She believed, therefore she spake. Truly great was this woman's faith, and great that power which delivered her mind from the thralldom of a superstition, sensual, devilish,—none other, surely, than that which was afterwards wrought in Christ when he was raised from the dead.

II. The greatness of this woman's faith will appear from the severe trial which it stood.

It has been well observed, that whenever faith is professed, God, in his providence, will take an opportunity of trying it; and whenever it is true, it will not only stand, but come forth strengthened and purified from the trial. This was the case with those eminent patterns of faith, enumerated by Paul in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews; and it was also the case with the Syrophenician woman. Convinced of his tenderness and his power, she cried unto Jesus, saying, "Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil." One would think that this petition, uttered in faith and with respect, would have been received, at least, with a kind look, as an apology full of tenderness and sympathy, if there were any impropriety in granting it. But he treated her with every appearance of coldness and neglect. His heart, doubtless, glowed with the warmest affection; yet he concealed his regard under seeming displeasure. She was a stranger, and who would be unkind to a stranger? He might use greater freedom with his brethren according to the flesh, the posterity of Jacob; but this was a Syrophenician by nation, and generosity required that she should be treated with attention. Even Moses remembered in his laws the condition of strangers: "Ye shall not," said he, "vex a stranger; for ye know the heart of a stranger, for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." She was a woman, and tenderness was peculiarly due to a woman. She was a mother, and a mother in distress, wounded in the affliction of her daughter. She made no ambitious request, as did the mother of Zebedee's children, who besought of our Lord for them preferment in his supposed temporal kingdom. She solicited only the recovery of her child. This desire was prompted by the laudable feelings of nature; and the open request was warranted, and her hope justified, by the acknowledged character of the man she solicited, whose business was to go about doing good. How severe the trial, when neither the circumstance of her being a stranger and a mother, nor her well-founded expectation, could draw even a reply from Jesus, and how great her faith, when she could still persevere in her request, for we are told that she cried after him! The disciples are surprised at this behaviour of their Lord, so unlike his usual conduct, and they intercede in the woman's behalf. Concerned for his ease, they often discouraged the applications of supplicants: but moved with compassion, they now came and besought him, saying, "Send her away; for she crieth after us." Condescend to give her a favourable answer, and she will retain the memory of thy kindness, and give testimony to the honour of thy name when we shall have left these coasts; or, at least, give her some reply which will satisfy her, and silence her importunities. It is probable that this intercession of the disciples gave encouragement to the poor woman, and renewed her sinking hopes. And thus it is that God, in his providence, when we are struggling under trials hard to be borne, and are ready to faint, makes light to arise in the midst of darkness, and by some communication of grace, or favourable circumstance, revives our drooping spirits, and gives new strength to our faith. But this mediation of the disciples, far from appearing to be effectual, drew from Christ a reply even more forbidding than his former silence. It exceeds my commission to help her, as you may know from what I said when I sent you out to preach: for "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." This, it is probable, the woman heard; yet she still persisted, she could not persuade herself that his kindness was so contracted, or his nature so implacable, and she again came near and worshipped him, saying, "Lord, help me!" But her importunity only seemed to irritate him, and called forth, if not a flat denial, a most discouraging reply. "He answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs." We are never more hurt than when we receive an injury or disappointment from a friend. "It was not an enemy that reproached me," said the Psalmist, "else I could have borne it, but thou, mine own acquaintance;" and next to ill treatment from an intimate friend is reproach from a character we esteem, and whom we have approached to solicit. What more discouraging treatment could this poor woman have met with—treatment unexpected, and which, therefore, she was unprepared to meet? Was it not enough for Christ to be silent? and after this, was it not at most sufficient to say, that to cure her daughter exceeded his commission? Was it necessary thus to weigh her down with pain, to make "deep call unto deep" in a succession of griefs, to add refusal to the natural distress of her mind, and reproach to refusal? Was she possessed of gentleness and tender susceptibility of soul, it was enough to overwhelm her with despair; or did she possess irritability of temper, it was sufficient to kindle her pride to a flame, and provoke her indignant mind to the most raging abuse. But our Lord knew the strength of grace that was in her, for he was its author, and he proportioned the trial to her strength. Behold the great triumph!

Her faith secures her from despair, and her humility shields her from pride, the sting of reproach. Christ could not bestow a humiliating epithet which she had not previously appropriated to herself in approaching his august presence. And from this woman ye ought all of you to take a lesson how ye ought to feel when ye come into the presence of the King, the Lord Almighty. She candidly owns the propriety of the debasing appellation, but turns it into a plea in her own favour: "Truth, Lord; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table." What a noble combination of lowliness and dignity, of confidence and respect! The bitterness of the trial is now overpast. Faith unshaken has its reward; and humility is crowned with honour. It is enough; the Saviour felt the force of the reply, and owns that faith hath power with God, and prevails: "O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour."

III. The greatness of this woman's faith appears from the reward with which it was crowned—the full completion of her desire.

The answer of Christ, according to Mark, is, "For this saying go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter." This certainly expresses, in precise language, the meaning of Christ with respect to the case of the woman and her daughter, and is perfectly agreeable to the account given by Matthew. But I cannot help thinking, that there is a peculiar force and dignity in the answer of Christ, as recorded by Matthew, which the terms used by Mark do not contain, and that the former conveys some general sentiments, though apparently applied to a particular case: "O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt." Woman, I approve of thy importunity, and I admire the faith which hath supported thee through the trial. I do not merely say, thy daughter is made whole, but be it unto thee even as thou wilt; for thy wish and thy prayer are those of faith, and whenever faith attends thy request, it shall be granted; and not thy request only, but that of all who have like precious faith.

As there are different degrees of evidence, from the slightest probability to demonstration; so there are different degrees of faith, from doubt and suspicion to absolute certainty. It is likely that this woman's faith was of the highest kind, from the testimony Christ gave of it, and from the reward with which he instantly crowned it after the trial of it was made. We do not find one instance of Christ's refusing a request made in faith, though, except another, this is the only instance on record in which he superadded to the grant his approbation of the greatness of the faith with which the request was made.

It is easy to perceive why our Lord distinguished faith by such marks of his favour. Faith, connected with knowledge, is the soul of every grace which adorns the Christian character, and it confers honour on God and our Saviour. In every state it leads us to give the glory to the Most High; and even in our appearances are unfavourable, to place our confidence in his power, and faithfulness, and love. Such was the faith of Abraham, (Rom. iv. 19–21.) Such too, was the faith which Christ commonly required in those on whom miraculous cures were to be performed; for he often put this question, "Believest thou that I am able to do this?" and such, in an especial manner, was the faith of this Syrophenician woman.

What excellent blessings are in Scripture ascribed to faith! "To him that believeth," saith Jesus, "all things are possible. To him that believeth, will I give to overcome." It was by faith that the lame walked, that the blind saw, and the tongue of the dumb sang. It is by faith that remission of sin, and acceptance with God, are obtained, and heaven itself reached. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life. Could we ask David, by what principle he was emboldened, unarmed, to meet a giant in war, he would answer, by faith in the power and good will of Him who had delivered him from the paw of the bear and mouth of the lion. Could we ask Daniel, and the three children, by what principle they resisted the king's commandment, and escaped unhurt from the lions' den and the fiery furnaces, they would tell us it was by faith. Could we ask the apostles what made them persevere in the cause of Christ, in spite of persecution, and stand undaunted in the presence of kings, they would reply it was by faith. And the saints who surround the throne, by what power did ye rise from the earth, what wings raised you to the heights of heaven,—was it not by faith in the testimony of Jesus? My friends, if we would overcome and be set down with Christ on his throne, let us take heed lest there be in any of us an evil heart of unbelief. It was unbelief which made many in Israel fail to enter the land of promise, and the same will prevent us from entering into the rest which remaineth for the people of God.

A POLYNESIAN SABBATH.*

In a walk through the village, on the afternoon of the day preceding the Sabbath, looking along the shore, we have often beheld the light canoe doubling a distant point of land, and, with its native cloth or matting sail, wafted towards the station. Others nearer the shore, with their sails lowered, have been rowed by the men; while the women and children were sitting in the stern, screened from the sun by a temporary fawning. Along the coast, many were unloading their canoes, or drawing them upon the beach for security.

The shore presented a scene of activity. The crackling fire or the light column of smoke might be seen rising through the district, and the natives busily engaged in cooking the food for the Sabbath. On account of their food being dressed for the Sabbath on the Saturday, that day is called mahana moa, food-day. As the evening approached, multitudes were met returning from the inland streams, whither they had repaired, to bathe after the occupations of the day; the men bringing home their calabashes of water for drinking, or their amos of water for washing the feet; while the females were carrying home bundles of the hibiscus, which they had <sup>leaves</sup> to serve instead of plates for Sabbath <sup>evening</sup>. On entering the dwellings on the Saturday evening, every thing would appear remarkably <sup>orderly</sup>, and clean—their food in baskets—the <sup>calabashes</sup> filled with fresh water—their fruit <sup>cleaned</sup>—and leaves plucked and carefully piled <sup>up</sup> for use—their clean garments were also laid <sup>out</sup> ready for the next day. The hours of the evening, instead of being a season of greatest care and hurry, are, I believe, often seasons of preparation—"prelude to hours of holy rest."

The sacred day was not only distinguished by a total cessation from labour, trade or barter, amusements, and worldly pleasure, but no visits were made, no parties of company entertained, no fire lighted, nor food cooked, except in cases of illness. This strict observance of the Sabbath, especially in regard to the latter points, whereby the Tahitian resembled the Jewish more perhaps than the Christian Sabbath, was not directly inculcated by the missionaries, but resulted from the desire of the natives themselves to suspend, during this day, their ordinary avocations, and also from their imitation of the conduct of the missionaries in this respect.

We have always been accustomed to have our usual beverage prepared in the morning and afternoon; but this is the only purpose for which, in ordinary seasons, a fire has ever been lighted for any of the missionary families; and when destitute of these articles, which in the earlier periods of the mission was often the case, no fire was lighted on the Sabbath; their food was invariably dressed on the preceding day, and the warmth of the climate prevented their requiring fire for any other purpose. In this proceeding they were influenced by a desire that their domestics, and every member of their families, might have an opportunity of attending public worship.

The example, thus furnished by their teachers, has led to the strict and general observance of the Sabbath by the nation at large. Their private devotions are on this, as well as other mornings, usually concluded by sunrise, and shortly afterwards, the greater part of the inhabitants assemble for their Sabbath morning prayer-meeting. Besides a service in English, the missionaries preach twice in the native language, and visit the Sabbath Schools; these services are as many as they are able to undertake: the service at the morning prayer-meeting is therefore performed by the natives. We have, however, sometimes attended, and always with satisfaction.

It is impossible to conceive of the emotions of delight produced by witnessing six or eight hundred natives assembling at this hour in their respective chapels; and, on entering, to see a native, one who was perhaps formerly a warrior or Areoi, or even an idolatrous priest, stand up and read a psalm or hymn, which the congregation rise and sing. A portion of the Scriptures, in the native language, is then read; and the thanksgivings and petitions of the assembly are offered to Almighty God, with a degree of fervour, propriety, appropriate use of Scripture language, and chastened devotional feeling, that is truly astonishing, when it is considered that but a few years before, they were ignorant and barbarous idolaters. A second hymn is sung, another portion of Scripture read, and prayer offered by another individual—when the service closes, and the assembly retires.

Soon after eight o'clock the children repair to the Sabbath Schools, those for the boys and girls being distinct. About four hundred usually attend in Fare: they are divided into classes, under native teachers. About a quarter before nine, the congregation begins to assemble, and at nine in the morning service commences. I have often heard with pleasure, as I have passed the Sabbath Schools rather earlier perhaps than usual, the praises of the Saviour sung by between three and four hundred juvenile voices, who were thus concluding their morning exercise. The children are then conducted to the chapel, each class led by its respective teacher, the girls walking first, two abreast and hand-in-hand, clothed very generally in European dresses; wearing bonnets made with a fine species of grass, or the bark of a tree; each carrying in her hand a neat little basket, made with similar materials, and containing a catechism, hymn book, and Testament: the little boys following in the same order; more frequently, however, arrayed in the native costume, having a little finely platted white mat, fringed at the edges, wound round their loins; another of the same kind, or a light scarf, dyed with glowing native colours, passed across their chest, and thrown loosely over their shoulders; their feet naked, and their hair often cut short, but sometimes flowing in ringlets over their open countenances; while their heads were covered with a neat little grass or straw hat, made by their mothers or their sisters.

Before the service began, they were usually led to the seats appropriated for them in the chapel; and where there have been galleries, these have been occupied by the scholars. Frequently we have been approaching the place of worship at the same time that the schools have entered it, and it has often afforded the sweetest satisfaction to behold a father or a mother, with an infant in the arms, standing under the shade of a tree that grew by the side of the road near the chapel, to see in the line of scholars, a son or daughter pass by. When the object of affection has approached, a smile of pleasure has indicated the satisfaction of the child at the notice taken by the parent, and that smile has been reciprocated by the parent, who, in silent gladness, followed to the house of God.

The morning service commences with singing, during which the congregation stand; a portion of Scripture is then read, and prayer offered, the congregation kneeling or standing. This is followed by singing a second time; a sermon is then preached, after which a short hymn is sung, prayer presented, and the benediction given, with which the service closes, between half-past ten and eleven o'clock.

Although the religious exercises are now rather longer than they were when the people first began to attend, they seldom exceed an hour and a-half on the Sabbath, and little more than an hour at other times. It has always appeared preferable, even to multiply the services, should that be necessary, than weary the attention of the people by unduly protracting them. When the congregation has dispersed, the children are conducted to the schools in the same order in which they came to the chapel, and are there dismissed by one of their teachers.

In the afternoon they assemble in the schools, and read the Scriptures, repeat hymns, or portions of the catechism, and are questioned as to their recollection of the sermon of the forenoon. We have sometimes been surprised at the readiness with which the children have recited the text, divisions, and leading thoughts in a discourse, without having written it down at the time they heard it. Often it has been most cheering to see them thus employed; exhibiting all the native simplicity of childhood, mingled with the indications of no careless exercise of the youthful mind on the important matters of religion. It is always delightful to watch the commencement and progress of mental improvement, and the early efforts of intellect; but it was peculiarly so here. In the Sabbath Schools of the South Sea Islands, the mechanical parts of instruction (namely, learning to read and spell, &c.) are not attended to; the time is wholly occupied in the religious improvement of the pupils, and is generally of a catechetical kind.

Many of the parents attend as spectators at the Sabbath Schools, and it is not easy to conceive the sacred delight they experienced in beholding the improvement of their children, and attending at an exercise often advantageous to their own minds. The greater part of the people, however, spend the middle of the day in their own dwellings. Formerly they were accustomed to sleep, but we believe this practice is by many discontinued.

The public service in the evening commences, in most of the stations, about a quarter before four, and is performed in the same manner as that in the forenoon. Meetings for reading the Scriptures and prayer are held at some of the native houses in the evening, and we usually read a sermon in the English language in our own families.

The attendance of the people is regular, and the attention seldom diverted. At first we perceived a great inclination to drowsiness, especially during the afternoon; at this we were not surprised, when we recollected that this was the manner in which they were accustomed to spend several hours every day, and that they were also unaccustomed to fixedness of attention, or exercise of thought on a particular subject, for any length of time. This habit, however, has, we have reason to believe, very greatly diminished in all the islands, and more particularly where congregations are accustomed regularly to assemble.

The scrupulous attention to the outward observance of the Sabbath, may perhaps in some degree be the result of the impression left on the minds of the people by the distinguishing features of their former system, in which all the efficacy of their services consisted in the rigid exactness with which sacred days were kept, and religious ceremonies performed, without the least regard to the motives and dispositions of the devotees. To have kindled a fire, or to have failed in the observance of any rite enjoined, or restriction imposed, during their tabus, or sacred seasons, would have been sufficient, not only to have neutralised all the advantages expected from the most costly offerings or tedious services, but would have exposed the offenders to the anger of the god, and perhaps to death as its consequence.

With many, the influence of a system so inflexible has probably operated very powerfully in producing this uniform attention, at least to the outward duties of the Sabbath, the only sacred day now recognized amongst them. With others, there is reason to believe it arises from the influence of example, and the respectability it was at this time supposed to impart to individual character. But with many it originates in far higher motives, and is the result of Christian principle in regard to what they consider a duty.

A number of instances, strikingly illustrative of this fact, might be adduced; I will, however, only refer to one. A man came to the Monday evening meeting on one occasion, and said his mind was troubled, as he feared he had done wrong. He was asked in what respect; when he answered, that, on the preceding day, which was the Sabbath, when returning from public worship, he observed that the tide, having risen higher than usual, had washed out to sea a large pair of double canoes, which he had left on the beach. At first he thought of taking a smaller canoe, fetching back the larger ones, and fixing them in a place of security; but while he was deliberating, it occurred to his recollection that it was the Sabbath, and that the Scriptures prohibited any work. He therefore allowed the canoes to drift towards the reef, until they were broken on the rocks. But, he added, though he did not work on the Sabbath, his mind was troubled on account of the loss he had sustained, and that, he thought, was wrong. He was immediately told that he would have done right, had he fetched the canoes to the shore on the Sabbath.

When, however, it was considered, that perhaps this pair of canoes had cost him nearly twelve months' labour, and that, before they were lost he was comparatively richer than many an English merchant is in the possession of a five or six hundred ton vessel, it appears a remarkable instance of conscientious regard for the Sabbath-day.

Since the abolition of idolatry, no part of the conduct of the South Sea Islanders has impressed the minds of foreign visitants more forcibly than their attention to the observance of the Sabbath. I never saw any, even the most irreligious, or those unfriendly to missions, who were not constrained to confess that it surpassed all they had heard or imagined could have been exhibited; while others, more favourably disposed, have publicly declared its effect on their own minds.

When Mr Crook arrived in 1816, the ship reaching Tahiti on the Sabbath, no canoe put off, no native was seen on the beach, no smoke in any part of the district, and they began to apprehend either that the population had been swept off by some contagious disease, or that they had all gone to battle. At length their fears were removed by one of the party, who had been there before, observing that it was the Sabbath, and that on that day the natives did not launch their canoes, or light their fires, &c. In 1821, Captain Grimes "was surprised at the regularity and good order observed; the children of the Sabbath School were ushered in by their teachers in their different classes, with as much uniformity as we see in public schools in London." Several masters of South Sea whalers, captains and officers in his majesty's navy, have borne the most decided testimony to these facts. A naval officer, who was at Tahiti in 1822, stated that he visited the islands under a considerable degree of prejudice against the missionaries, and suspicion respecting the reported change among the people, but that his visit had entirely removed both. It was Friday when the vessel arrived; the natives thronged the ship with fowls, fruit, vegetables, &c. for sale, manifesting considerable earnestness and address in the disposal of their goods. The same was continued through the second day; but on the third, to the great astonishment of all on board, no individual came near the ship, assigning, afterwards, as a reason, that it was the Sabbath. On the day following, however, the trade was as brisk as it had been on that of their arrival. Captain Gambier, who visited them in the same year, in the extracts from his journal, which have been published, states, in reference to the manner of attending the duties of the Sabbath among the young, that "the silence—the order preserved—the devotion and attention paid to the subject, surprised and pleased me beyond measure." "Children," he adds, "are seen bringing their aged parents to the Church, that they may partake of the pleasure they derive from the explanation of the Bible." The general attention to the public worship of God, and the exemplary Christian deportment of many of the people, have proved not only delightful, but beneficial to their visitors; and we have the high and grateful satisfaction of knowing, that occasional and transient visits to the Christian islands of the Pacific, have been the means of advantage to the visitors; and there are probably many instances of good, which the revelations of the last day alone will disclose.

It is a privilege to visit a country, and a happiness to live in a community, where the Sabbaths are thus spent, and prove to multitudes—

"Foretastes of heaven on earth—pledges of joy
Surpassing fancy's flights and fiction's story,
The preludes of a feast that cannot cloy,
And the bright out-courts of immortal glory!"

This universal observance of the Sabbath-day appears to an Englishman in humiliating contrast with its profanation in many favoured sections of his own country. The contrast is still more striking when compared with the manner in which it is perverted into a season of activity, business, and unwonted gaiety in the pursuit of pleasure, in Roman Catholic countries; but it never appears so surprising as when viewed in comparison with the actual state of the people themselves only a few years ago. No Sabbath had then ever dawned, no happy multitudes met for praise and prayer, no lovely throngs of children gathered in the Sabbath Schools, no inspired page or Christian preacher directed their attention to the Lord of the Sabbath; but when the devotees met for public worship, it was under the gloom of dark overshadowing trees, amid the recesses of some rude temple, before some rustic altar, or in the presence of some deity of frightful form and fearful attributes, the offspring of their own imagination.

SPRING.

By CHARLES MOIR, Esq.

How fresh and exhilarating is spring! Winter has its frigid delights—summer its days of sunshine and serenity—autumn, the wane of the year, preaches a sad moral of the instability of all things; but with spring, the infancy of nature, when she puts forth her first footsteps, after the long sleep of winter, we feel the blood flow freer, and after the thralldom to which snow and rain have subjected us, walk abroad once again to enjoy the fresh breeze in the surrounding fields. "The winter is over and gone," and "the desert and solitary places are glad, and again blossom as the rose." The air is yet keen and bracing, but the sky has put on a deeper blue, and the sun has life and warmth in his genial beams. On the hills the snow may be yet lingering, dotting their dark sides here and there with patches of white, but in the low grounds not a vestige of winter is to be seen.

We look round and see the busy ploughman in the newly turned up fields, and behind him legions of crows tracking his path, picking up the worms from the wet clods. From the wayside hedgerow the linnet and goldfinch may be heard pouring out their hymn of gratitude over the opening beauties of nature. Every step startles some small bird from its rest. The trees have put on a slight covering of green, and, on the hawthorn, the tiny leaflets are budding forth. The primrose,

"Mild offspring of a dark and sullen sire," peeps out here and there in modest retiring beauty.

"Thee, when young spring first questioned winter's sway,
And dared the sturdy blusterer to the fight,
Thee, on this bank, he threw,
To mark his victory."

And the daisy, "wee modest, crimson-tipped flower," is to be met with glinting forth on every green bank or brae. There is life and vitality over all, that, but a short month ago, seemed shrouded in an universal death.

Nor less interesting to the lover of nature is the show which our gardens put on, as April ripens into fuller beauty the fond anticipations of March. The tulip and hyacinth now assume their many-tinted blossoms, with the yellow auricula, the cowslip, the coltsfoot, with its bright golden and silvery stars, and the blue and yellow violet, the most delicately beautiful of all the fairy train. "Consider the lilies of the field how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; yet Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these."

Refreshing, indeed, it is to the soul, in the words of the poet, to

"Gaze on the lovely blossoms, pink and white,
Of pear and apple tree; the varied bloom
Of varied herb; the many-finctured flowers,
Recumbent with the weight of dew, between
Their girdles of green leaves; the freshened coats
Of evergreens; the myrtle and the box,
And cypress, 'mid whose darkly-clustering boughs
The blackbird sits."

How should all these delights, then, crowding upon the senses, turn our thoughts to Him from whom every good gift flows! With man, change succeeds change, and his thoughts have no stability in them; but we turn our eyes abroad, and see the unfailing goodness of that Being with whom there is "no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

"All our lessons tend To wider views of God's unfathomed love."

From spring, the infancy of the year, memory naturally reverts to early days, conjuring up, as if by the touch of an enchanter's wand, the fondly cherished recollections of childhood. At such a season,

"We think of those, who looked upon our face
Breathing and blooming, breathless now and cold,
We hear their voices issuing from the mould,
Amid the scenes that bear of them no trace."

Sad, indeed, is the retrospection, if it is mingled with thoughts that turn its sweetness to gall. The days of innocence, the early spring of life, is, like its prototype of the seasons, full of anticipation, but not, alas! like it, always fitted to bring forth the fair blossom to full maturity. How many, indeed, of the fond playmates of our early years, around whose hearts our young affections were entwined, have passed away into the grave, ere their sun had reached the zenith! How many are "Wanderers on the homeless deep," separated from us by leagues of land and ocean! Some

"Known, but most unknown to fame."

A few fulfilling not the bright promise of their youth, forgetful of the good instructions early instilled into their minds, and living apparently without God and without hope in the world. One or two alone of the little band are left us for firm friends through life; for advisers in difficulty, our consolation in the hour of trial, going forward in prosperity and adversity hand-in-hand with us through this world, to be separated only by death, but fellow-sharers in the glorious hope of reunion in a happier scene.

Spring also is calculated to awaken in the mind hopes of a higher and more lasting kind. The naked and leafless tree, that appeared but a withered trunk through the long night of winter, now feels the juice mounting up through its sapless stem, infusing new life into its system, and causing it to put forth once again its gay show of leaves, and buds, and blossoms. Such a renovation from apparent death to life and beauty, while it evinces the never-failing powers of Him who called this fair creation into being by a word, also reminds us of that awakening which succeeds the long sleep of the grave. If the Supreme Ruler of all cares so much for what only ministers to the comforts and happiness of man in this world, how much more will He fulfil those better gifts that secure his eternal felicity hereafter!

To the Christian, then, such a season is peculiarly fitted to call up thoughts of a high and an interesting nature. If summer, with its long days, and nights of cloudless blue, raises up prayers of thankfulness for blessings enjoyed; if autumn, with its rich load of golden treasures, fills the heart of man with gladness, "making his cup of joy run o'er;" if winter, with its darkness and storms, is associated with gloomy thoughts of death and the grave, to that succeeds spring, awakening nature from her sleep of death, to light and life, and to man preaching a practical sermon on immortality; in short, if the maturity, wane, and death of the year reminds us only of the vicissitudes of this world, how much more should we welcome spring, when with its beautiful revivifying process, we associate hopes that carry our views beyond it.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Attendance on the House of God.—Neglect not the assembling of yourselves together, as in the manner of some, but, alas! of many. What do you need, you who say, "If we do not go to Church, we need ood books,—besides our Bible; and we are not guilty ke some, of traversing the fields, and setting a bad ample to others?" This, my friends, will not stand amination. Public worship is a positive ordinance of od, and in the house of prayer He promises to meet is people, and to commune with them. You say you ad your Bibles, but to what purpose, when you set at ough the injunctions of that book which commands id invites you to go up to the house of the Lord. hat would you think of a steward, who, instead of aigning to each of the servants under him his work id his wages, should say, "I do not indeed do this, at I read my master's letters, and carefully peruse his tructions." To what purpose, when you do not ifil the design of the letter and instructions he sends? ou read good authors, but to what purpose, since ese very authors will be called to witness against you, at you did not attend to what they said in reference o the very first of duties,—that of publicly calling upon od, and hearing his Word? O think here again of recious opportunities neglected, past, never to be recal- all I went in by mistake, one Sabbath-day, to the ouse, not of the invalid I intended to visit, but of one health. The inmates had not been in Church; the other was in the attitude of leaning half asleep upon able, and another person, a stranger, slumbering by he fire: I asked the cause of absence from the house f God. Our Church was just dismissed; psalms were ing near the close of another; and a third congrega- ras still engaged. Why, said I, are all these opportuni- e neglected? The reply was, with sharpness of tone, "One cannot be always hearing preaching." No! said you will not always have it in your power; we had eed to improve the day of visitation; now is the time ecepted. A short time elapsed, when the individual ho made the remark above expressed, sickened, and a few hours expired!—Various are the excuses for ence: one has not a seat he wished to have had; nother wants some article of clothing; another thinks e or she got cold the last time of being in Church; nother says he intends coming again by and by, "and ou will be sure to see me now and then at the Church," r he has at least no idea of never coming more. Alas, am at a loss what to say, that can be expected to use you who are so very far gone in that spiritual epor. It is not the want of a seat, nor the want of a at, nor delicacy of health, nor danger of suffering any il effects, but just the want of inclination, which keeps u from Church; and as to your intention of coming ometimes, I should like to see it, rather than to hear it. I fear much, death will come, and judgment e, and find you still lying down and loving to mber. Are your reasons of absenting frequently he Church, such as will appear satisfying to you on eath-bed? We, the ministers of the Gospel, fre- ntly have occasion, on the application of parents for ism to their children, to make inquiry on the sub- of unfrequent attendance on the Church, and we entimes receive apologies and reasons which are by means satisfactory, and which the individuals who e them know quite well to be, in a great measure, e up for the occasion. A visit to the sick-bed, or eath-bed, of such persons, frequently unmasks the eivers. For example, I once visited a man who had ecently defended the irregularity of his attendance he house of God, on the ground particularly, that as somewhat skilful in treating the diseases of cattle, as was often sent for when he was on his way to ch. This might have happened now and then, but eference of frequent absence was not tenable. This an, like many others, thought he had made an ecellent apology, and had got well off from the mini- —but it was an apology which his own conscience e him at the time was nought. It served him on eal occasions to obtain what he wanted, though not without plain intimation that it was not considered by me as quite satisfactory, and warning him of the consequences if it should be really a mere pretence. I saw him when on his dying bed, and he then, with grief, acknowledged that he urged an apology which was very insufficient, and "Oh!" said he, "that I had it in my power to come and hear the Word of God: I did not go when I might and ought to have gone, and now gladly would I go; but am not able. What would I give to hear another sermon!"—REV. WILLIAM BURNS. [Tract on the Sabbath.]

All is subjected to vanity, but in hope.—Do we not behold the creation drooping? This lower world in which we are, may be seen as it were, hanging the head; a languishing is upon all things, the shadow of death hovering over all, in every part; and yet subjected to this state in hope.—HOWE, on Rom. viii. 22.

Persecution useful.—Were it not for persecution, I should not understand Scripture.—LUTHER.

Family Worship.—Diffidence and timidity are often alleged as serious objections to the performance of this duty. This, certainly, is a very unhappy excuse, and very unfortunately alleged. I should feel myself bound to ask the author of it, Are you too diffident to perform your customary business? Are you too diffident to pursue customary amusements? Are you too diffident to commit sin? Does the bashfulness which hinders you from family prayer, hinder you also from censuring and laughing at those who practise it? Does it hinder you from using the language of profaneness? Why should you be timid only concerning the duties of religion? Is there anything in the nature of the subject to excite shame, or which can fairly excuse you in indulging it? Is it not true that religion itself is the thing of which you are ashamed? Remember, I beseech you, the awful declaration of Christ concerning this subject, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed when he shall come in his glory." Family worship presented in the name of Christ, is as real a confession of this divine person, as the participation of the sacramental supper.—DWIGHT.

Be ever on your watch-tower.—Do all that thou doest as a man that waiteth daily for the coming of the Lord; as a man that is looking always when the heavens should rent, and when the Lord should come in the clouds to judge the whole earth; as a man always shooting out his head, looking for the day of salvation.—JOHN WELSH.

Sinfulness of unbelief.—The reason why persons, who appear to be in some measure convinced of sin, so often lose their convictions; and why so many professors of religion fall away and disgrace their profession, is because the work of conviction was never thoroughly performed; because they were never convinced of unbelief. They saw, perhaps, that they were sinners. They felt convinced of many sins in their temper and conduct; they, in some measure, corrected and laid aside these sins; then their conscience ceased to reproach them, and they flattered themselves that they had become new creatures. But, meanwhile, they knew nothing of the great sin of unbelief, and therefore never confessed, repented of, or forsook it, until it proved their destruction. They were like a man who should go to a physician to be healed of some slight external wound, while he knew nothing of a deep-rooted disease which was preying upon his vitals. Professors, try yourselves by these remarks, look back to the time when you imagined yourselves to be convinced of sin, and say whether you were then convinced, or whether you have, at any time since, been convinced of the exceeding sinfulness of unbelief. If not, there is great reason to fear that you are deceived, that you have mistaken the form for the power of godliness.—PAYSON.

SACRED POETRY.

PRAISE.

HARPS of eternity! begin the song;
 Redeem'd, and angel harps! begin to God,
 Begin the anthem ever sweet and new,
 While I extol him holy, just, and good.
 Life, beauty, light, intelligence, and love!
 Eternal, uncreated, infinite!
 Unsearchable Jehovah! God of truth!
 Maker, upholder, governor of all:
 Thyself unmade, ungovern'd, unupheld.
 Mysterious more, the more display'd, where still Upon thy glorious throne thou sitt'st alone;
 Hast sat alone, and shall for ever sit Alone; invisible, immortal One!
 Behind essential brightness unbeheld.
 Incomprehensible! what weight shall weigh—
 What measure, measure Thee? what know we more
 Of thee, what need to know, than thou hast taught,
 And bidd'st us still repeat, at morn and even,
 God! everlasting Father! holy One!
 Our God, our Father, our eternal all!
 Source whence we came, and whither we return;
 Who made the heaven, who made the flowery land.
 Thy works all praise thee; all thy angels praise:
 Thy saints adore, and on thy altars burn
 The fragrant incense of perpetual love.
 They praise thee now: their hearts, their voices praise,
 And swell the rapture of the glorious song.
 Harp lift thy voice on high,—shout, angels, shout!
 And loudest, ye redeem'd! Glory to God,
 And to the Lamb, who bought us with his blood,
 From every kindred, nation, people, tongue;
 And washed, and sanctified, and saved our souls;
 And gave us robes of linen pure, and crowns
 Of life, and made us kings and priests to God.
 Shout back to ancient Time! sing loud, and wave
 Your palms of triumph! sing, Where is thy sting,
 O death? where is thy victory, O grave?
 Thanks be to God, eternal thanks, who gave Us victory through Jesus Christ our Lord.
 Harp, lift thy voice on high! shout, angels, shout!
 And loudest, ye redeem'd! glory to God,
 And to the Lamb, all glory, and all praise:
 All glory, and all praise, at morn and even,
 That come and go eternally; and find
 Us happy still, and thee for ever blest.
 Glory to God, and to the Lamb. Amen.
 For ever, and for evermore. Amen.

POLLOK.

HOPE IN THE RESURRECTION.

THROUGH sorrow's night, and danger's path
 Amid the deepening gloom,
 We soldiers of an injured king
 Are marching to the tomb.
 There, when the turmoil is no more,
 And all our pow'rs decay,
 Our cold remains in solitude
 Shall sleep the years away.
 Our labours done, securely laid
 In this our last retreat,
 Unheeded o'er our silent dust
 The storms of life shall beat.
 Yet not thus lifeless, thus inane,
 The vital spark shall lie,
 For o'er life's wreck that spark shall rise,
 To seek its kindred sky.

These ashes too, this little dust,
 Our Father's care shall keep,
 Till the last angel rise and break
 The long and dreary sleep.

Then love's soft dew o'er every eye
 Shall shed its mildest rays,
 And the long silent dust shall burst
 With shouts of endless praise.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The weakness of Infidelity.—Although, when surrounded by company and excited by applause, Hobbes was accustomed profusely to pour out his blasphemies and to indulge in impious bravado against his Maker, yet solitude was intolerable, the dismal reflections of his desolate mind he was unable to endure; if by any accident he was left to himself in the night, without his candle, he was absorbed in the most childish terror; and his memorable exclamation on the borders of the grave, in spite of all his pretensions to philosophy and learning, "I am going to take a leap in the dark," is a sufficient exhibition of the miserable uncertainty as to the future, and the wretched despondency as to the present, which the rejection of the revelation of God entails upon the victims of its delusion.

Support in the hour of trial.—When Dr Fisher, bishop of Rochester, who was cruelly and iniquitously condemned to be beheaded by Henry VIII., came out from his dungeon in the Tower of London, and saw the scaffold where he was to die, he took out of his pocket a Greek Testament; and looking up to heaven, he exclaimed, "Now, O Lord, direct me to some passage which may support me through this awful scene." He opened the book, and his eye glanced on the passage, "This is life eternal, to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." The bishop instantly closed the book, and said, "Praised be the Lord! this is sufficient both for time and for eternity." Thus did Providence direct him to consolations, which rendered him insensible to the agonies of death, and afforded him a foretaste of the immortal blessedness of heaven.

The Experience of a Traveller.—In Willis's "Pecillings by the Way," the following remarks are made in reference to the mode in which the Sabbath was spent on board a steam-boat between London and Leith: "I was pleased to see an observance of the Sabbath which had not crossed my path in three years' travel. Half the passengers, at least, took their Bibles after breakfast, and devoted an hour or two evidently to great religious reading and reflection. With this exception, I have not seen a person with the Bible in his hand, travelling over half the world.

PROVIDENCE PROVED BY EXPERIENCE.

BY THE REV. JAMES BUCHANAN,
North Leith.

WHEN the Psalmist, after reviewing the various dispensations of Providence, affirms, that "whoso is wise and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord," he plainly proceeds on the supposition, that the events of human life in general, and the facts of every man's own experience in particular, are of such a nature that no one can seriously consider them, without acknowledging that there is a Providence at work in the world, and that this Providence is a gracious and a merciful one.

That there is a Providence directing, controlling, and overruling all the events which take place on earth, whether these be of a public or more private nature, is a truth which, however much it may be doubted by the careless, and however boldly it may be denied by the profane, will, nevertheless, evidence itself to the conviction of every considerate mind, which contemplates habitually and dispassionately the events of human life, in connection with the causes out of which they spring, and the results in which they terminate, or which they have a tendency to promote. To a careless observer, the course of events may seem to be determined by no fixed principles, and to be regulated by no steady laws; all may seem to be a strange medley of uncertainty, vacillation, and change; but on more attentive observation, the course of events will be found to afford as strong evidence of a constant Providence, as the structure of nature affords of a wise and intelligent Creator. It will hardly be denied that a concurrence of events to one great end, especially if these events be numerous and complicated, while, at the same time, they seem to be mutually independent of one another, and to have no other connection except what arises from the supposition of a Supreme Will overruling them all for the accomplishment of its own designs, may afford as striking a proof of God's interposition as is furnished by the construction of a piece of mechanism, or by the collocations and adjustments of material elements in any organized body. When we examine the structure of a plant, or of an animal, or when we consider the formation of any one organ, such as the human eye, we see at once that its parts are so adjusted to one another, as to answer an important end; and hence we infer, from the traces of design and wisdom that are exhibited in its structure, that it could only be the product of a designing cause, or, in other words, the result of God's creative wisdom and power. Now, what we affirm is, that a series of events may be so arranged, as to afford precisely the same evidence of an overruling Providence,—events which naturally have no apparent connection with one another, but which, nevertheless, may be strung together so as to have a common bearing on some one result, and so as to demonstrate, by their concurrence to that one end, just as an organized body demonstrates, by the fit combination of its parts, the interposition of divine wisdom and almighty power. The argument, in both cases, proceeds on precisely the same principles; in the one case these principles are applied to the combinations of matter, in the other to the combinations of events; but in each instance there is an end, and a concurrence of means towards that end, which affords ample evidence of design; and the advantage of considering the subject in this light, consists in the proof which it affords, that the doctrine of a constant and presiding Providence rests precisely on the same ground, and should be received with the same unwavering certainty, as the doctrine of God's being itself, in so far as that doctrine is embraced on the strength of those proofs which nature furnishes of the design and wisdom of the Creator of the world.

It is true that there are many events of so trivial and insignificant a nature, that we would not think of founding upon them any argument for divine Providence; but it is equally true, that there are many material objects in nature, which, were they considered by themselves, might not afford a sufficient, or at least a striking, evidence of divine creation. When the theist wishes to establish the latter doctrine, he selects, not a stone or a solitary piece of clay, but some organized body, as a specimen of God's works; and, in like manner, in establishing the doctrine of a Providence, we are at liberty to consider events in their combination and succession, and to select such combinations as most signally display the tokens of God's design. These are prerogative instances, in both cases. Not that God's creation, or God's providence, is less real in the plainer forms of matter, or the more trivial events of life, but that they are less strikingly exemplified; and hence the origin of those views which have often been presented to the world, and as often excepted against, respecting particular and special providences, which, if they be meant to convey the idea of anything miraculous, are unquestionably liable to just exception; but, if they be honestly meant, merely as striking examples of a Providence which is at once universal and minute, are no more to be objected to than is the common practice of selecting a striking specimen of design in illustrating the proof of a creation, or of making a striking experiment in illustrating any of the laws of nature; and, for this reason, the Psalmist selects, in the present case, several illustrative specimens, and founds on these the doctrine of God's overruling providence.

The general doctrine of a Providence may be established on these and similar grounds; nor can I conceive it possible to hold that an act of divine power was necessary for the creation of the world, while it is denied that the continual exercise of divine power is needful for its maintenance and support; or to believe that we could not have acquired our existence but from God, while we arrogantly imagine that we may exist without, or independently of, his will. But I apprehend that, in order to realize and appreciate God's providence, we must have recourse to the means suggested by the Psalmist, and, instead of looking only to abstract reasonings, apply ourselves to a close and considerate observance of all the methods of God's dealings with ourselves; we must review all the way by which God has been leading us; and connecting his dispensations with the declared end and objects of his moral government, and with our felt necessities, we shall be able to see, each in his own case, innumerable proofs both of the wisdom and care of Him, "in whom we live, and move, and have our being." The events of every man's life, when they are thus considered, will afford abundant evidence of a Providence, and will impress that great doctrine on the heart with a power which no abstract reasonings can be expected to exercise over the generality of mankind. The man who, on reviewing the course of his life, can see no trace of God's providential hand, may as well, on considering the frame of his body, refuse to acknowledge the marks of God's creating hand; and he, on the other hand, who is most minutely attentive to the facts of his own personal experience, will be the most thoroughly penetrated with the conviction, that there is a Providence that upholds all, and overrules all.

It is in the details of each man's private history, that we find the most touching manifestations of God's providential care: and, on considering these, none of us can refuse to acknowledge, that we have been the objects of a watchfulness which has never slumbered, and of a kindness which has never been weary in doing us good. Were we to attempt an enumeration of all the blessings which we have received at God's hands; of all the deliverances which he hath wrought out for us; of all the snares from which he has preserved us; and of all the manifestations of his long-suffering patience and tender mercy, which have occurred in our own experience;—were we to begin with the years of infancy and feebleness, and to trace our progress through the slippery paths of youth, till we reached our present state, we should soon find how impossible it is to reckon up the sum of our obligations to "the loving-kindness of the Lord."

But it is not by a view of our mercies and privileges, considered separately by themselves, but by a view of the whole course of our lives, considered with reference to God's declared end and design in it, that we shall be most thoroughly convinced of the wisdom and kindness of his providence towards us. The declared end of God in all his dispensations, is the manifestation of his own glory, and the gradual improvement and ultimate perfection of our moral nature. Keeping this end in view, and considering all his dispensations as having a bearing on its fulfilment, we shall see, in our afflictions, not less than in our mercies, ample evidence of his wisdom, and shall be enabled to know experimentally, that "all things work together for good to them that love him." His is a holy love, acting wisely with a view to moral ends, and seeking to bless its objects in a way suitable to their dignity, as moral and responsible beings. To this end, affliction itself is made subservient, and the temporary deprivation of mere sentient and animal enjoyment, becomes, in his hands, the means of a far purer and loftier happiness,—the happiness of a renewed mind, of a good conscience, and of well regulated affections. Hence, on the Christian scheme, there is no contradiction in that seeming paradox,—"blessed are they that mourn," for, "by the sadness of their countenances," God seeks to make their "hearts better," and then they are blessed indeed. It is on this principle of enlarged and comprehensive benevolence, that God, the Father of his people, acts, and the very restraints which he imposes on them, and the chastisements with which he visits them, when these are viewed in connection with his design and end in them all, are pledges and tokens of that loving-kindness which, in him, is not an isolated principle, but an attribute which, however supreme and infinite, is co-ordinate and co-active with perfect holiness, justice, and truth.

Fully to realize these views, however, we must look back on all the way by which he has been leading us; for the events of each man's life, like the more public events of history, can seldom be impartially considered at the time of their occurrence; they occasion such an agitation of mind, and call into play so many feelings and passions, that we are too apt to take a partial view of them, especially while as yet the ends for which these dispensations were sent, are unknown, or, at least, have not been realized in our experience. It is after the stunning shock has passed away,—after the tempest of natural feeling has subsided, and after we have begun to taste the fruits of a mature experience, that we are able, on a calm, though, it may be, a pensive review, to see all the parts of this chequered drama in combination, and to mark the wisdom and kindness which adjusted them all, in relation to some great and important end. Such a review of all the way by which the Lord hath led us, will be best taken from heaven.

SKETCH OF THE
HISTORY AND CHARACTER OF COLUMBA,
THE APOSTLE OF THE HIGHLANDS.
By THE REV. DONALD FERGUSSON.

WHILE much of fable may be blended with fact in the relation transmitted to us of the early Christians, and, more particularly, of such as had encountered difficulties and braved dangers in their zeal for the diffusion of the Gospel; yet is there always abundance of real incident interspersed, to render the narrative at once interesting and instructive.

The history of the life of Columba retires so far into the gloom of a distant and savage age, and his character has been made the subject of such conflicting testimony, that it is often difficult to distinguish truth, through the veil of prejudice on the one hand, or of partiality on the other; fortunately, however, the proofs of his devotion to the cause of Christ are so numerous and substantial, as to resist alike the encroachments of time and of envy, and he has left behind him a sweet odour of sanctity, which requires enhancement from none of the ornaments of fancy, or the glow of romance, by which too many of his biographers have rather obscured than dignified his memory; and, in giving a brief detail of his character and labours, it seems necessary to strip them of all that is improbable, and of much that is marvellous, in order that the narrative may be read with patience and with profit.

Columba was a native of Ireland, descended, as his biographers inform us, from the royal family of that kingdom, and connected also with the princes of the Dalriad Scots: He was born A. D. 521; and his parents, induced, as some say, by certain mysterious incidents connected with his birth, or as others, with greater probability, imagine, by his early disposition to piety, and the indication of uncommon talents, devoted him, from his very childhood, to the sacred profession.

His education was intrusted successively to several of the most learned and devout of the Irish ecclesiastics, under whom he discovered, when yet a youth, the embry symptoms of his future godliness and greatness, so that he was regarded, by his instructors, less as an inferior and pupil, than as a companion and a friend, and was accustomed to receive from them the appellation of the Saint.

Of his early labours in the ministry little is known; some authors conjecture that he had engaged too deeply as a partizan in the political dissensions which at that time agitated Ireland; that he thereby incurred the deep-rooted resentment of the ecclesiastics; and was compelled, on that account, to leave his native country: but when we consider how utterly this supposition is at variance with the whole tenor of his future life, and that we have the strongest testimony of the respect and attachment which the Irish clergy, as well as laity, entertained for him at a later period,—we are inclined to coincide with those who state, that, when he left his native land, about the thirtieth year of his age, his object was to increase his stores of knowledge, and to gather from continental society that improvement which would fit him for the service to which he had devoted all his energies.

How long Columba remained abroad is also matter of uncertainty; but the scanty evidence which we possess, proves the ample opportunities of improvement which, during his absence, were afforded him, and his own after career offers indubitable testimony how much he had profited by these opportunities. His piety and general accomplishments procured him, in every quarter, a cordial welcome, gaining him the respect and esteem of the pious and the erudite, and opening up to his scrutiny the treasures which lay concealed in the seclusion of monastic establishments. And while he stored his ardent mind with the learning of the eastern and western Churches, his active eye caught whatever appeared to him useful in the ecclesiastical institute and discipline of the different monasteries which he visited; for upon the rules of some of the eastern Churches he is supposed to have formed the model of his own system, the efficiency of which he seems to have tested, by founding a religious establishment in Italy.

Nor was his ardour in the pursuit of knowledge more distinguished than the singleness of his heart and the warmth of his zeal. Clad in the proof armour of humble and holy devotedness to his God and Saviour, he was equally unmoved by the fascinations of luxury, as by the promptings of ambition. It is told of him, when sojourning in France, that Sigibert, the reigning monarch of that country, charmed with his wisdom and accomplishments, urged him, by all the solicitations of friendship and promises of high distinction, to settle in his kingdom, and fix his residence at his court. Columba, however, sought the friendship of a higher and mightier Potentate than he, and desired for himself no fair and fertile heritage,—his object being to sojourn in that land which offered the fairest prospect of his being useful in gaining a rich harvest of ransomed souls to the glory of the Saviour's name; and, therefore, prompted by the Spirit of his Divine Master, he replied, that, so far from coveting the wealth of others, he had, for Christ's sake, renounced his own.

Having thus traversed Europe and Asia, in the pursuit of knowledge, he returned to his own land,—his mind well stored with learning, and his heart glowing with deeper devotion to his God, and a holier zeal for his cause, rich in experience, and ripe in wisdom: and having thus gained all that he could gather from the world's converse, he resolved that the treasures which he had amassed should not "be hid under a bushel," but should be made to diffuse verdure and fertility over a sterile wilderness, so that being enriched out of the fulness that is in Christ Jesus, even the waste and solitary desert should be made "to rejoice and blossom as the rose."

The man who devotes himself to the extension of Messiah's kingdom on the earth, occupies a position not more honourable than delicate and dangerous. The Christian missionary, indeed, seems to inhabit an element of his own,—he stands midway, as it were, betwixt heaven and earth, the channel of communication betwixt the Creator and the creature, receiving, with the one hand, the blessings which descend from the upper sanctuary, and, with the other, dispensing those blessings to men,—pleading, at one time, at the bar of heaven for the sinner's pardon; pleading, at another, at the bar of the sinner's conscience, for the admission of the Saviour into his heart; therefore it is peculiarly necessary for him to make provision for his arduous enterprise, with all the caution and the forethought which a skilful and sagacious mariner employs, when about to trust his bark to a boisterous ocean; as he prepares his vessel for braving the ocean's buffetings, examines all her parts, and stores her with every necessary to meet the contingencies of the voyage,—so must the Christian champion arm himself against the buffetings of sin, store his mind with knowledge, and his heart with faith, devoting himself, body, and mind, and spirit, to the sacred work.

And thus had Columba prepared for his labours; his mind and body were both in their prime; his naturally superior mental endowments had been expanded by unweary application; skilled in all the learning of the age, he had neglected no branch of study which he considered as likely to facilitate the progress of the great object which he had so deeply at heart; polished and conciliatory in his manners; pleasing, yet venerable, in external appearance, nature and art seemed to have combined in forming in him a fit instrument to win the admiration, and sway the hearts of a rude people.

To these, however, were superadded qualifications still more requisite for an ambassador of Christ. He was characterized by a zeal in his Master's cause not more devoted than pure; by no one could it be said, with greater effect, or evidence of truth, than by Columba, "I seek not yours but you."

In early life he had resigned to his relatives the royal inheritance to which he had been born the heir, desiring no share in their wealth, except what they voluntarily contributed to the advancement of Christ's cause: But though thus humble, yet was he firm in his resolves, neither crushed by difficulties, nor dismayed by dangers; having "once put his hand to the plough," he never thought of looking back, but committed his all into the hands of him "who is a faithful Creator," and having him as a friend, he feared no foe. He was the inflexible enemy of oppression; the stern denouncer of violence and outrage; ignorant alike of arrogance and of servility, he "gloried in nothing save in the cross of his Lord Jesus Christ;" and thus regulating his own conduct by the rules of Christian justice and integrity, he desired to induce all others to adopt the same standard.

Earth seemed to have no charm for him besides the delight of conferring benefits, for "his treasure was in heaven," and thereof was his conversation; his heart was his God's, and with him was it his delight to hold communion; he gave his hatred to nought but sin,—his fear to nought but temptation,—his trust to none but his Saviour. Although the earlier part of his history is little else than a blank, yet can all this, and much more, be gathered from the events of the later period of his life, all of which justify us in regarding him as exhibiting on earth many of the graces of heaven,—much of the purity and zeal of the early apostolic fathers: and panoplied thus in celestial armour, he went forth to fight the battles of the Cross in a foreign and barbarous land.

His own country had, at an early period, been blessed with the light of Christianity; but from afar, the black and barren shores of Scotland, shrouded in the clouds of superstition and heathenism, seemed to scowl defiance across the sea; and thither had Columba determined to proceed on his philanthropic mission.

It is a matter of doubt, among the learned, to what extent Columba may be regarded as the instrument of converting the tribes of the north and west of Scotland to the faith of the Gospel; Ninian had preached the doctrines of the cross to the southern Picts; and Ciaran, the preceptor of Columba, had also, before this time, visited and preached in Cantire; it is possible, that their disciples may have endeavoured to disseminate the truth of Christianity; and the traditions regarding Palladius also may be no fable. Still, it is pretty clear, that the northern districts of Scotland were throughout almost equally bleak in their spiritual as in their natural scenery, when Columba landed upon its shores. Although, then, it be possible that prior to his arrival, one or two efforts had been made to remove the universal barrenness, and one or two scattered hamlets of that vast wilderness had been refreshed with the soft dew of the Gospel, yet the efforts must have been few and feeble, and the effects limited, so that to Columba remained the task of giving life, and form, and union, to previous operations. There might previously have existed a few shoots from a Christian root, but they were stricken and stunted, rudely shaken by the tempests or nipped by the chilly atmosphere of heathenism. He not only trained and fostered the produce of the past, but persisted in planting more extensively, until in place of one or two solitary shrubs, there sprung up over the wide extent of the nation a mighty forest of "plants of renown."

In the year 563, in the 42d year of his age, Columba is supposed to have set out upon that missionary enterprise, whose successful termination has obtained for him the title of the "Apostle of the Highlands."

He sailed from Ireland in a small currach, or wicker boat, covered with hides, accompanied by twelve chosen associates, and landed in the Island of Hi or Iona, lying on the west of Mull, about midway between the territories of the Picts and the Caledonians, and which has, since that period, been more commonly known by the title of Icolmkill, or the island of Columkille, the celtic designation of Columba.

It is not ascertained in what manner, or from whom, Columba obtained possession of this island as a settlement; some consider the grant to have been made by the princes of Pictland, others by the princes of the Dalriad Scots; the latter supposition appears the more probable from the fact, that the Dalriad Scots were supposed to be, at that time, better inclined to the Christian faith than their Pictish neighbours, conjoined with the certainty that the pious stranger was himself allied to the Scottish monarchs. Others again suppose that Iona had, as well as Arran, been a seat of the Druids, who had been compelled to forsake this haunt upon the intrusion of some Christians, prior to the arrival of Columba, who was afterwards induced to make choice of that Island for his residence, no less from the hereditary sanctity attached to the locality, than for the facilities which its situation afforded of communicating with his native country. The cause of its selection, and the means whereby the grant was obtained, are, however, matters of comparatively trivial importance; suffice it to know, that here Columba was permitted to fix his habitation, and that from this sequestered islet, issued forth the light of Christian knowledge upon the north of Scotland.

Thus settled in Iona, Columba, having arranged the internal economy of his religious establishment, more upon the principle of a seminary than of a monastic institution, prepared for engaging in his great design, with an energy and activity worthy of the sacred cause.

No attempt could, at first sight, appear more hopeless than the enterprise in which this holy man had embarked. His doctrines were distasteful alike to king, and priests, and people; the mass of the community were scarcely a step removed from barbarism; the reigning prince of the Pictish territories ordered his gates to be shut against the Christian's approach, and the Druids used their almost unlimited influence over the vulgar mind, not merely to counteract his efforts, but often even to the imminent peril of his life, which was frequently attempted, shortly after his arrival in Scotland. The natural character of the country too, was unfavourable; wild, woody, mountainous, and infested by beasts of prey, it presented most imposing difficulties to a man who did not possess the advantages of native manners or the native dialect,

Far, however, from feeling dismayed or discouraged by the dangers that threatened, or the difficulties that opposed him, he prayed that, in order to overcome them, thirty additional years might be allotted him. The sequel will shew how these thirty years were employed.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE ORIGIN OF SABBATH SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND, AND THE EXISTENCE OF THESE SCHOOLS IN SCOTLAND FIFTY YEARS BEFORE THOSE OF MR RAIKES.

By THE REV. JOHN BROWN, D.D.,
Minister of Langton, Berwickshire.

THE name of Raikes will be long remembered throughout future ages with veneration and gratitude, as a distinguished benefactor, not only of his native country, but of the human race. Though not the founder of Sabbath Schools, strictly speaking, as he himself mentions in very modest terms in a letter to Mr Fox, July 12, 1787, and as is asserted by his able and excellent biographer, and by the Sunday School Society, he was honoured to be the instrument of introducing them into England, without the slightest knowledge of their having existed previously in a more perfect form in the northern part of the island; as some of our philosophers were led to discoveries in physical science, which have procured for them high and deserved reputation, without being aware that, as appears from his papers, which were lately published, they were found out previously by the immortal Edwards. From a memorandum in his handwriting, it would seem, that Mr Raikes established the first of these schools in Gloucester, where he followed the profession of a printer, in the end of the year 1781, or in the beginning of the year 1782; and the circumstances which first suggested them to his mind, as detailed by himself in a letter to Colonel Townley, a gentleman in Lancashire, are exceedingly interesting:

"The beginning of this scheme," says he, "was entirely owing to accident. Some business leading me one morning into the suburbs of the city, where the lowest of the people (who are principally employed in the pin manufactory) chiefly reside, I was struck with concern at seeing a group of children, wretchedly ragged, at play in the street. I asked an inhabitant whether those children belonged to that part of the town, and lamented their misery and idleness. 'Ah! Sir,' said the woman to whom I was speaking, 'could you take a view of this part of the town on a Sunday, you would be shocked indeed, for then the street is filled with multitudes of these wretches, who, released on that day from employment, spend their time in noise and riot, playing at chuck, and cursing and swearing in a manner so horrid, as to convey to any serious mind an idea of hell rather than any other place. We have a worthy clergyman, (said she,) minister of our parish, who has put some of them to school; but upon the Sabbath they are all given up to follow their inclinations without restraint, as their parents, totally abandoned themselves, have no idea of instilling into the minds of their children principles to which they themselves are entire strangers.'

"This conversation suggested to me that it would be at least a harmless attempt, if it were productive of no good, should some little plan be formed to check this deplorable profanation of the Sabbath. I then inquired of the woman if there were any well disposed women in the neighbourhood, who kept schools for teaching to read? I presently was directed to four. To these I applied, and made an agreement with them, to receive as many children as I should send upon the Sunday, whom they were to instruct in reading and in the Church Catechism. For this, I engaged to pay them each a shilling for their day's employment. The women seemed pleased with the proposal. I then waited on the clergyman before mentioned, and imparted to him my plan. He was so much satisfied with the idea, that he engaged to lend his assistance, by going round to the schools on a Sunday afternoon to examine the progress that was made, and to enforce order and decorum among such a set of little heathens.

"This, Sir, was the commencement of the plan. It is now about three years since we began, and I could wish you were here to make inquiry into the effect. A woman, who lives in a lane where I had fixed a school, told me some time ago, that the place was quite a heaven upon Sundays compared to what it used to be. The numbers who have learned to read and say their Catechism are so great, that I am astonished at it. Upon the Sunday afternoon the mistresses take their scholars to Church, a place into which neither they nor their ancestors ever entered with a view to the glory of God. But what is still more extraordinary, within this month these little ragamuffins have, in great numbers, taken it into their heads to frequent the early morning prayers which are held every morning at the cathedral at seven o'clock. I believe there were near fifty this morning," &c.

"Results like these," as I have elsewhere remarked, "could not fail to awaken the most lively interest in the city of Gloucester, and wherever they were announced. Similar institutions were rapidly established in other parts of England, and the more generally they were known, the more highly were they applauded, and the more eagerly were they followed. Dr Adam Smith, whom no man will suspect of a tendency to enthusiasm, said of them to a friend, that 'no plan promised to effect a change of manners with equal ease and simplicity since the days of the apostles.' The Archbishop of Canterbury, and the whole of the bishops, stated it as their opinion in 1785, that they were well adapted to improve the minds of the common people, and were found, by experience, to be very beneficial. Her Majesty Queen Charlotte admitted Mr Raikes to an audience, and expressed to him her high approbation of his plan. A Sunday School Society was instantly formed, for the encouragement of these seminaries in all parts of England, which was by and bye followed by the Sunday School Union; and so quickly did they multiply for five-and-twenty years during the life of Mr Raikes, and so pleasing were their effects, that after mentioning to Mr Lancaster, two years before his death, how irresistibly the word Try was impressed upon his mind, when he was considering whether he ought to set up the first of these schools, and how forcibly it decided him to action, he said, 'I never can pass by the spot, where it came so powerfully into my mind, without lifting up my hands and heart to heaven for having put such a thought into my head.'" And so remarkably have these schools continued to increase, that the number of their pupils in Great Britain alone is now said to be one million five hundred and forty-eight thousand eight hundred and ninety; and including their pupils in Ireland and the colonies, they must be nearly two millions.

"The Testimony of Experience to the Necessity and Utility of Sabbath Schools," being the Substance of a Discourse delivered in St. Andrew's Church, Edinburgh, 28th May 1826, on behalf of the Edinburgh Gratis Sabbath School Society, and of the Sabbath School Union for Scotland, pp. 15, 16.

But while such were the effects which resulted from these schools, there is reason to believe that they would have been still more gratifying if the system of instruction, which was adopted by Mr Raikes, had been more of a religious, and less of a secular and mere literary kind. So far, however, was this from being the case, that the time of the pupils seems to have been occupied principally in learning to read and write, and, in a few instances, I believe, (though I may perhaps have been misinformed,) to do accounts. That the two latter branches should have been introduced into these schools, or that they should still be taught in them, by pious men, is certainly surprising, for though it is alleged, as an apology for teaching reading, that it is a mean of salvation, this can never be affirmed either of writing or accounts. And though the words that they write may be taken from the Bible, this can no more justify them for teaching that branch on the Sabbath-day than they would be warranted to teach them sewing, because they told them that the garments which they made were, like those of Dorcas, to be given to the poor.* The establishment of these schools, on this defective plan, might arise, in part, from the want of education among the lower orders in England, at the time of their institution; for besides an immense number of children, there were one million two hundred thousand adults who could not read, and who would otherwise have remained in the same deplorable ignorance. But I fear that it originated, in part, also, in the imperfect views which were entertained by Mr Raikes of the sanctity of the Sabbath, who, at this period of his history, as I have been told by a venerable Christian minister, a townsman of his own, who knew him in his early days, was rather a political economist, and a man of benevolence, than a man of enlightened and ardent piety; and in the lowness of the ends at which he aimed in these schools, for he talks of them chiefly as "an attempt at civilization," rather than at promoting the spiritual improvement of the young. Such is his language to Mr Fox, for he says to him, June 20, 1785, "When you have seen my letter to Mr Hanway, you will be able to judge whether farther use can be made of the little experience I have had in this attempt at civilization." And such is his language, in the following year, even to the Sunday School Society, for he says to them, without the slightest reference almost to any religious results, "the liberality with which your Society have stood forth in this attempt to introduce a degree of civilization and good order amongst the lower ranks, entitles them to the thanks of the community, and particularly of an individual who will ever be proud to subscribe himself," &c. If there be any foundation for the latter remark, what a pity that when his views of divine truth were more fully matured,† neither he himself nor any of those zealous and excellent individuals who assisted him in his labours, made any attempt to establish a higher order of schools, where the instruction was strictly and exclusively religious, and into which the pupils might be promoted from the other schools, as soon as they were fit for it. And how much is it to be regretted that whatever might have been necessary at the commencement of these schools, such a numerous and highly influential body as their teachers and friends, have not long ere now united their efforts with those of others of their countrymen, to procure for England the same admirable system of parish schools which we enjoy in Scotland, which would not only be a happy exchange for the less perfect instruction in the art of reading, which is furnished, at present, only on one day of the week in their Sunday schools, but would prevent what appears to many intelligent Christians, when it can at all be avoided, an improper alienation of the time of the Sabbath to secular employments.

* Though the teaching of writing on the Sabbath was for a long time practised in the London Schools, I am glad to say that it has been abolished for nearly twenty years. It is painful, however, to meet with such a paper as that which was published in the Sunday School Teacher's Magazine, for April 1819, entitled "Hints on the Art of Penmanship for Sunday School Scholars, by S. G. Lenny" I fear the practice is not entirely laid aside in country schools in England; but I shall be happy if I am mistaken.

† It is somewhat surprising, that Mr Lloyd, the biographer of Raikes, has made so few allusions to his piety, even towards the close of his life, and scarcely any at the time of his death. We trust that this defect may yet be supplied.—Ed.

It is of less importance to ascertain the country which had the honour of instituting the first Sabbath schools, than that where they are most zealously and efficiently taught, and where the Lord seems to accompany them with the most abundant blessing. But still, while I admit this, and while I acknowledge, most readily, that Mr Raikes was the founder of the English schools, and that he had no acquaintance with the prior existence of these schools in Scotland, I am confirmed in the opinion, which I had previously expressed, that we had Sabbath schools of a superior order long before the days of that eminent philanthropist. They were taught chiefly by the parochial clergy, and originated in the practice, which was long observed by many of those faithful and laborious ministers, of examining the children on the Sabbath evening, as to their knowledge of the Catechism, and what they recollected of the discourses which they had been hearing through the day; and though it was too much neglected during that long and mournful season of declension which was witnessed by the Church, yet it had never been entirely discontinued. My venerable friend, the Rev. Dr Burns of the Barony Parish, Glasgow, now more than ninety years of age, wrote to me, in a letter, dated 12th May 1826, "I remember that in 1782 the Sabbath Schools in Glasgow, and in the Barony Parish, were established, and I believe they were begun before we had received the information of what was done by Mr Raikes. I know I regularly attended those in the Calton in 1782." And immediately after the publication of my sermon, I received a letter from the late Sir John Sinclair of Ulbster, Bart., in which he mentioned that a schoolmaster at Banchory Devenick, in Aberdeenshire, established a Sunday school as far back as 1782, and without any knowledge of the schools at Gloucester. But the principal facts on which I rest my opinion of the prior existence of the Scottish schools are the two following:—

In the year 1829, I happened to mention to Mr Thomas Chartres, merchant in Berwick, and lately mayor, the general impression which prevailed in England that Mr Raikes was the founder of our Sabbath schools, and that he had commenced them in the end of 1781, or in the beginning of 1782. He said that it was a mistake, for he knew of a school which had been taught at Norham before the schools of Mr Raikes, by the Rev. Mr Morison, the minister of a Scottish Presbyterian congregation; and that he was acquainted with some old persons who had attended it. And, upon my begging him to procure for me particular information respecting that school, he put into my hands, a short time afterwards, the following letter:—

“Norham, Nov. 6, 1829.—MR CHARTRES. Sir, At your request I have made inquiry about the Sabbath school. I went to Robert Robison, but he could not remember of being there; but his wife told me that she attended some time, but could not say exactly at what age. I went to her brother, Robert Hall; he told me he was there when it commenced; he was then about nine years of age, and is at present near eighty-two years old. According to his account it will be full seventy-two years ago. I have had information from two others, who gave me the same account. I am, Sir, your sincere friend, JAMES GILCHRIST.”

This important document proves the existence of the Scottish Presbyterian Sabbath Schools in 1757, or twenty-four years before those of Mr Raikes; but I delayed publishing it till I received, a few days ago, an unexpected testimony to the establishment of another school at a more early period in a Scottish parish near to Norham, which, if it did not suggest to Mr Morison the idea of his school, might probably stimulate him to his labours of love among the young of his congregation. The parish to which I refer was that of Simprin, the scene of the early labours of Boston, whose successor, the pious Mr David Landert, a native of my own parish, taught for a long time a Sabbath school, which was celebrated throughout Berwickshire for its blessed effects. I have not ascertained the particular year in which he began it, but as he succeeded Mr Boston soon after his translation to Ettrick in 1707, it is exceedingly probable that it might not be long afterwards. One of my elders, Peter Lillie, a respectable individual in humble life, and nearly eighty years of age, informs me, that about sixty years ago he lodged for some months with an aged widow in the village of Simprin, who used often to speak of the good which Mr Landert had communicated to the young for many years by his Sabbath school. And he mentions, that when he began business at Co-burn, in the parish of Dunse, three years afterwards, an exceedingly well-informed and serious Christian of the name of John Fairbairn, then about sixty years of age, used often to come to his shop, and talked of the benefit which he had derived from the school when he was a boy of nine or ten years of age; and he gave my elder a reading of some of the books which he got from Mr Landert when he attended it. I may add, that John Fairbairn's daughter, who resides in a neighbouring parish, rather more than three miles from my house, confirms this statement; and I have no doubt that if my brethren in the ministry would inquire at their aged neighbours or parishioners, they would receive additional information respecting the early existence of many other schools.

While I concede, then, willingly, to the benevolent Raikes, the honour of founding the English schools, I claim for Scotland the still higher honour of possessing schools of a superior order at an earlier period, and of being the first among all the Protestant countries which had Sabbath Schools. But while such is the praise to which they are severally entitled for instituting these schools, it is my earnest prayer that the only rivalry which shall be witnessed between them may ever be this,—which of them shall labour most ardently and successfully, in the spirit of faith and mutual charity, for adding to the number of that youthful seed which shall serve the Redeemer, and “which he shall reckon to himself for a generation.”

THE FIRST LANDING OF THE MORAVIAN MISSIONARIES IN GREENLAND.

AFTER a speedy voyage, they spied land on the 13th April 1731, but the same day there was a total eclipse of the sun, and a violent tempest arose, that lasted four days and nights, and drove them sixty leagues back. Wretched the country looked in comparison of Europe, with scarce any thing but bare rocks and steep cliffs, covered with snow. As soon as they landed, they repaired directly to Mr Egede, and delivered the letters of recommendation. He welcomed them very cordially, congratulated them on their undertaking, and promised his best assistance in their learning the language. The Moravians immediately searched the sea-coast for a suitable place to build on; and having fixed on the spot, kneeled down and consecrated it with prayer. Then falling to work directly, a Greenland house was run up with stone, and turf laid between, to shelter themselves and their things from the snow and rain till the wooden house was erected. An old boat was purchased of the captain of the ship. It was May, but still so cold that the turf often froze in their hands. In June they had finished their Greenland hut; and soon after, the foundation of their proper dwelling house was laid, the wood having been brought from Copenhagen. Another was also begun, for such of the natives as might, perhaps, drop in for instruction. Alas! no one had any inclination for it. The house remained desolate and unhonoured, as useless and silent as the ruined church in the valley of Amaralik.

In their first letter to the congregation at Hernhuth, they say, “You may now very well address that saying to us, that should a man ever lose his road, let him ne'er lose his faith in God. Yes, here, in truth, the way is barred up; as to our own persons, we are very happy, out as to our desire to win souls, we cannot gratify it yet. When will this frigid zone kindle into a flame? when will the ice-cold hearts of the people melt? It is true, all men count us fools, especially those who have lived long in this country and know this people. But where the breaker is come up before us, there must be room to tread and follow. Is there not safety in his shadow?”

They now began to set about those sorts of labour which were necessary for their maintenance, and also to learn the language for a better intercourse with the people. All these things were attended with great difficulties. They got little or nothing by fishing and hunting, being unable to follow the method of the Greenlanders in these pursuits, or manage a kajak, or boat. On going out the first time to search for drift wood among the islands, they were overtaken by a storm, and hardly saved their lives; but in the night, the wind carried off their boat, with wood and all. Now they came to a resolution to follow the example of the Silesians and Lusatians, when other work failed, to earn some necessaries by spinning. Mr Egede gave them his help on all occasions; also his written remarks on the language to copy; he ordered his children to explain it carefully. First, they had to learn the Danish language before they could understand their instructors. The natives aggravated the case, by stealing away the books they had written with so much pains. When the small-pox broke out and desolated the land, they were advised to go back to Hernhuth; but they would not hear of this. Soon after they fell ill themselves; for the vicissitudes of their life were very great; sedentary habits often followed a period of hard labour; confined within doors for weeks, where they sat writing continually in a damp cold house, or read with so deep an attention, that their extremities were nearly frozen before they were aware. As soon as they were restored to health, they resumed their coast voyages with as much ardour as ever; being obliged to perform them in the winter, because the Greenlanders, whose villages they went to visit, were seldom at home in the summer. On one occasion, a high wind drove them in among the ice and rocks, where they spent three days and nights in the open air. They bore their situation very well during the day, but the cold and horror of the night were extreme: the sea was covered to a vast extent with drift ice, that closed round them nearer and nearer every moment.

Three times they saw the transient light go down, and thrice their hope was quenched. At last they were obliged to forsake their boat and set out on foot: there was nothing but an endless frozen plain as far as the eye could reach. At length they espied, afar off, some Greenland huts on a little island. They drew nigh eagerly, and found a friendly reception from the people, who forced them to stay ten days in the hamlet. Christian David's description of this little community is characteristic. "According to outward appearance, the life they lead is angelic, as to outward vice, in comparison of European Christians. And yet it may be said of them, that they live without God in the world, and what they have hitherto heard of God is like a chip to them. 'Tis all one to them whether one speaks of Him or lets it alone, or whether we sing a hymn or they a song. Their intellectual faculties are so weak and dull, and so indisposed to reflection, that they cannot form the least idea of a divine being. Sensitive as they are, yet they seem to be almost destitute of passions, and their nature is not easily inflamed or stirred up. They know nothing but Greenland finery and good eating. They associate with their like; love their young like the beast, and know of no other sort of culture to be spent on them. Now, whether these people can be rendered capable of faith, God only knows."

This year arrived Frederic Bønish, with whom Stach had conversed on the Mission in the garden at Hernhuth—and John Beck: these men laboured to the last in the cause.

Already, David Stach began to think about returning, there appeared so little prospect of good in a land almost depopulated; and among the people who survived, there was no wish for religion. But Matthew Stach could not resolve to go away. He often thought of a passage that had made a deep impression, when he first desired to go to Greenland, "at the evening it shall be light." Mr Egede confirmed him in his resolve, and offered to take care of him so long as he himself should stay; so that they all decided to remain. The supplies from Europe were uncertain; from Hernhuth they could afford but little aid. The Moravians improved in the art of fishing more and more, and could now gain their own subsistence. In this manner began the third year of their residence in Greenland. The chief winter occupation was the acquiring the language; they were unlearned men, and were told by their more gifted companions, that it would not be possible to translate any but the historical pieces, as the natives had no expressions for most of the topics of Scripture, and could not form the least idea of spiritual things. Yet they were not appalled at this account, but in a few years, by constant inquiries of the Greenlanders, made a far greater progress than they had ever imagined possible; especially after some of the natives embraced the truth, and themselves found words to utter such feelings of the heart as were before unknown to them.

One evening, in the Moravian dwelling, some of the people wished to join in the meeting, and were very serious. One of the former gave a Bible into the hand of a native, which he opened by chance at that passage, "Then the heathen that are left round about you shall know that I the Lord build the ruinous place, and plant that that was desolate." This beautiful promise greatly animated their minds. These minds now began to doubt if all was right within themselves; it was a situation in which the fancy might easily begin to darken every object and every hope. Yet the imaginations cannot be blamed that quickened while they alarmed the heart. Hence, they had not been able, for some time, to approach the Lord's table, because they "discovered," as it is observed, "that they had not yet buried all that was their own in the death of Christ. They could not attain the performance of their good intentions, for at times the enemy had gained his point of sifting them." For these reasons, they resolved every evening to keep an hour of strict examination, when each of them should, without constraint, declare what had passed in his soul throughout the day; and, finally, what hindrance or offence had occurred, either from himself or from others: at the same time to remind, and, if necessary, admonish and reprove one another.

It must have been a singular scene in the thick gloom of a Greenland evening, when their solitary lamp dimly lighted the chamber; and these five men, amidst inclemency without and poverty within, arose alternately and told of the sadness or hope of their soul, and of their struggles against temptation. Alas! what temptations were there in such a place? they said justly, that they must seek them within, for without was not a single snare. But they were right: the long weary nights and the joyless winter days, were enough to make the spirit prey on itself, and call into action every dormant evil or desire. By degrees they prepared for a closer examination, but first allotted some weeks to try themselves privately as to the following points, before they talked them over together:—first, whether they were convinced their call was from God; secondly, whether they were resolved to suffer nothing to obstruct that call; thirdly, whether they could offer themselves up entirely to the service of the heathen, and would never abandon it till they had done all in their power. The anxious and incessant searching over these points, seems of itself to have rather unsettled their minds; for their answers were at variance with their previous career. When the time came, they opened their thoughts as follows:—Christian David said he had received no other call to Greenland but to accompany the Brethren thither, and when he saw them settled, to return again; which call home he had now received, and would act in pursuance of it by the first opportunity. Christian Stach said he never looked upon his call, from the beginning, as if he was to devote his whole life to the service of the heathen; he rather undertook this voyage upon trial, where, if nothing is to be done, one returns again. Yet he would remain till God took him out of it, or till the Brethren called him away. The other three said, they would bind themselves in the strictest manner to this work, come life, come death—to believe, where there was nothing to be seen—to hope, where there was nothing to be expected. These decisive words had an effect upon every one. Then the several tokens each of them had to avouch, that their call was divine, were also brought forward and examined.

Some months afterwards, they were in a state of deep distress. The amount of provisions, for the whole year, was only a barrel and a-half of oatmeal, half a barrel of pease, and a small quantity of biscuits. Out of this pittance they had to fit out Christian David for his return to Denmark. Little or nothing was now got by hunting or fishing, there being a great scarcity both by sea and land. The only way left was to buy some fish of the Greenlanders; but the heartless people soon found out that they were in want, and valued their goods at double the price; and most of them, even those with whom they were best acquainted, and to whom they had shewn most kindness, would sell them nothing at all. Often, after rowing among the villages on the coast for two or three days, the utmost entreaties could procure but a scanty pittance, and when that was consumed, they were obliged to pacify their hunger with raw sea-weed or shell-fish.

At length heaven disposed a strange Greenlander, whose name was Ippegau, to come forty leagues out of the south, to sell them all he could spare from time to time. Once, in summer, having lost their way among the islands, they chanced to meet with this native; he brought them to his home, made them welcome, and listened earnestly to their discourse. In the present extremity, this man was scarcely remembered; when he suddenly came, of his own accord, and invited them again to visit him. It was beneath his roof that they first inured themselves to the seal's flesh; yet even this was a delicacy, compared to the old tallow-candles they had been obliged to use, boiled with sea-weed. A month was passed in the house of Ippegau, where the manner of life had little variety. The dwelling was built on a steep rock, that the melted snow-water might run off the better; it stood near the sea, and was without door or chimney; the use of both being supplied by a vaulted passage made of stone, that ran in the middle of the house. This entrance was so very low, that it was necessary, almost, to creep in on the hands and feet; but it kept off the wind and cold excellently. There was a raised floor within, a foot high; the windows consisted of the entrails of white fish sewed together, impervious to the blast, yet admitting a partial light; lamps and kettles, chests and tubs, were scattered about. Benches were laid along the walls, and covered with skins, where they sat all the day long. The women cook, and sew, and converse, while the men drive out in their sledges every fine day. Fires were kept continually burning, so that the interior of the chambers was warm enough; a lamp burned in each of them day and night, and there was no smoke. But the odour of so many lamps fed with train oil, and the flesh and fish, sometimes half decayed, that lay on the floor, attacked the senses unmercifully. The order and stillness within the dwelling were remarkable; the sea often broke loudly at the foot of the rock, and the winds howled around its summit where the dwelling stood; but the people spoke little, and behaved to each other kindly. Though a great number lived together, nothing ever passed to violate decency. But they could no longer tax the hospitality of the Greenlander, being four in number, and took leave of him with many thanks.

Passing from place to place, the strong cravings of hunger compelled them, more than once, to set out on a stormy sea in an old decayed hulk of a boat. "Above all," they say, with great simplicity, "we were sometimes seized with an uncommon gloomy apprehension, when among the infidels, and felt a great power of darkness." So dawned upon them the fourth year, when their friend, Ippegau, began himself to be in want, and could shew no more hospitality. As for the rest of the Greenlanders, they would not curtail even a trifle from the luxury of their dancing feasts. At one banquet, which lasted the whole night, the Brethren saw eleven seals devoured, whilst all their entreaties could not move the guttuns to sell one bit.

One day the wind forced them upon a desert shore, where they spied an eagle upon her nest far up the cliff: climbing up the face of the rock, with great hazard and difficulty, to reach the nest, they at last got two large eggs, and after a conflict between the eagle and two of the emaciated men, they succeeded in killing the bird. Even when starving, they never lost sight of the mission, and now exulted at finding, in the wings, eighty-eight quills for writing, an article they greatly wanted.—"It seems," they write after, "as if we were forsaken of all men, even by our brethren."

A strong and mournful impression was made by the annual departure of the sun. It took place about the 26th of November. A few days before, they generally ascended the rocks at noon, to behold the sun once more; and when, on the 26th, he just shewed his faint and mild light, ere he vanished for a long period, they sadly bade him farewell. The days that immediately succeeded were still tolerably light, but in December it was twilight, even at noon. At this hour they could not read a book when standing at the window, and the candles were always kept burning. The stormy sea, at times, beat against the shore near which their dwelling stood, and then there succeeded a long calm, when the waves were chained by the ice and could move no more. They used exercise out of doors to preserve their health, when the sky was clear, and there was the light of the moon, as well as of the northern lights, which often seemed to float close by. With what heartfelt joy they saw the sun return! About the middle of January, if the weather was fine, its light could be seen on the high rocks, and a few days afterwards he was seen glorious, and as if new created; but only for a few moments. They now felt as if they had conquered all the troubles of the year, as if they had recovered strength and life; the thoughts were more clear, the soul more happy; hope looked forward to spring, summer, and ships,—all joyful prospects. After the middle of May, the sun did not again set at night, but rose higher and higher, till the summer solstice; and about the end of July, dipped again at night, but partially, under the horizon. The sinking was, at first, imperceptible, only the night-frosts became more severe.

In the ensuing spring, as we learn from the interesting work from which the above narrative is taken,—"Carnes' Lives of Eminent Missionaries,"—these holy men were encouraged to remain by the arrival of a vessel from Germany, containing, along with provisions, some companions, who were most welcome to them in their solitude. Thus relieved from their perplexities, they persevered in the work upon which they had entered, and for more than a hundred years has the Moravian Mission in Greenland been maintained amid the frequent privations and calamities to which those engaged in it have been subjected. From the latest accounts, it would appear that the brethren are prosecuting their labours, in these regions of ice and snow, with the most unwearied diligence, and encouraged by perceiving that their exertions are accompanied, in many instances, with a blessing from on high.

THE DUTY AND BENEFIT OF INTERCESSION: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER,

"I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men."—1 TIM. ii. 1.

It is one of the privileges of those who are the friends of God, that, as is the case in human friendships, they may freely plead with him in behalf of others. The best of them, indeed, like Abraham when he ventured thus to plead, must be conscious of their own unworthiness, and must feel themselves as nothing but sinful "dust and ashes," in the presence of the divine Majesty and holiness;

yet, as we are directed to offer such intercessions, not for our own sake, or for the sake of any number like ourselves, but for the sake of our great Intercessor, whom God heareth always, and through whom he promises to hear our supplications, we need never fear that he will be "angry with us" for our most frequent and importunate petitions; but, on the contrary, may be assured that he is pleased with such petitions, as "spiritual sacrifices through Jesus Christ." Nay, not only may we all, at all times, thus stand up before God as intercessors for our fellow-men, but we are expressly invited and required to make use of the exalted privilege.

By the words of prayer, which our Lord directed his disciples to use, we are clearly taught to pray with others and for others. We have the general assurance, that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." We have examples of such prayer for others in the most eminent of God's worshippers. We cannot fail to remember the remarkable instance of Abraham, as the friend of God, entreating to intercede, and allowed to intercede even for the devoted cities of the plain. We learn from the words of the Apostle Paul, that such was his practice; "my heart's desire and prayer before God, for Israel, is, that they may be saved." And of those who already believed, he says also, "I thank my God, upon every remembrance, of you always, in every prayer of mine for you all, making request with joy for your fellowship in the Gospel." He shews that this was not to be accounted his privilege alone, or belonging to him specially, as an apostle of Christ, but that all God's worshippers were called to do the same, and that he himself could be benefited by the prayers of his brethren. Then, he says to the Thessalonians, "Brethren, pray for us," and he expressly enjoins it, as a Christian duty, which all are bound to observe; "I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men."

Many and binding are the considerations which recommend this practice of "intercession." It is closely interwoven with all that concerns our duty to God and to man. It is, in truth, an union of both these duties in the most solemn act and exercise of the soul. It is praying for others. As prayer, it is an exercise of the heart towards God, and as offered for others, it is an exercise of the heart towards our fellow-creatures. It is devotion and brotherly love mingled together in one feeling, the noblest and purest that can fill the soul of man. It is a duty which we owe to all men, and which appears to be inseparable from the genuine love of our neighbour. It is evident, that if we truly desire any one good, we shall not only do what we can to promote it ourselves, but shall endeavour also to prevail with others to do what may not be in our own power. And to whom, in such a case, should we apply so readily as to God himself, who has commanded us to ask, and who is more able to bestow all that is good for man? Could you well say that you have done all that you could for any one, if you have not done this? Could you say that you had applied to your best and most powerful friend, for that person, if you had not applied to God?

Intercession with God is thus a benefit which you may render to the utmost extent to all men, in every place, at all times; which all of you may be able thus to render to all others. The personal good offices in your power may not be great, and even your greatest means of doing good may be exhausted. You may not be able, however willing, to give all persons your help or your charity, but you can impart to every creature your intercession with God for his good; and you have here a stock which cannot be exhausted to the end of the world. Here is a service also which the humblest is able to render, and which the highest need not disdain to receive. Here is peculiarly a service, which they who have little in their power to do for the good of others, ought not to neglect; and if they do neglect thus to give others the benefit of their prayers, they are acting a part as unfeeling and unchristian, as those who have this world's goods, yet refuse to others a portion of alms-giving. Remember then what you may all do in this way, and be ready to say and do like the Apostle Peter,— "silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee."

This practice of intercession is also a most powerful help in the doing of that good to others, which we may have in our power. By praying for those whom you wish to prosper, you acknowledge, in God's presence, your duty to serve them, and you, in a manner, thus pledge to him your desire to do them good. Interceding with him for their welfare, then, unless you pray hypocritically, you must feel yourselves more engaged to do your part to promote that welfare. If, then, you wish to do your duty to all, learn to make intercession for all. Pray for all men, for all nations and classes of men; for those even whom you have never seen, or are never likely to see. You will thus expand your brotherly kindness to all human beings, and quicken your endeavours to forward every plan for their temporal and spiritual welfare. Pray for all the Churches of Christ, for their purity and their increase. You will thus repress the emotions of bigotry, and keep alive that "charity which is the end of the commandment." Pray for your own country, for its rulers, and all that concerns its prosperity. You will then most effectually aid its cause; at least, as the apostle teaches, in his exhortation to such intercessions, you will strengthen your own disposition to lead under them "a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty." Pray for the afflicted of every description. You will thus remember your own mortal frailty, and revive your feelings of sympathy for "them that suffer adversity."

But more especially should you make intercession for those individuals in whom you are personally interested, with whom you have daily intercourse, or to whom you owe any offices of duty and acts of kindness. This is the most improving kind of intercession. It can be made most properly in our secret devotions. It is the most likely to be offered with right affections; and it may be expected to have the strongest influence upon the discharge of our relative duties.

Let us duly consider and keep in mind this department of intercession, as both tending to advance our own spiritual edification, and also as invariably accompanying our growth in grace. It is itself one of the clearest tests of your Christian graces, and strongest incitements to your daily duties. It is easy enough to persuade yourselves, that you love your friends and relatives; that you forgive your enemies, and wish them well; that you bear good will to your neighbours, and would willingly do them any service; and that you cherish a kindly spirit towards every fellow-creature, whom you happen to meet. But you will prove more convincingly the prevalence of these good affections in your hearts, and will provide more effectually for the exercise of them in your actual duties, if you accustom yourselves to commend these persons to God in your prayers. You cannot, indeed, have in your minds, and mention by name, at every return of your private devotions, every one with whom you are connected or acquainted; but you may intercede for those more especially, who are the objects of your daily duties, or whom you have met in the course of the day, or whom you have been led by any particular occurrence to bring more immediately to your recollection. Thus let pastors pray for their people, and people for their pastors, especially after they have happened to meet together, either in the exercise of religious worship, or in the ordinary intercourse of life: this will both lead the one to be more anxious for the good of those who are under his care, and the others to be more disposed to profit by his labours. Let parents pray for their children: this will at once relieve their anxieties, exalt their natural affections, and direct their desires to the true welfare of their offspring. Let children pray for their parents: this will strengthen the remembrance of their admonitions, and prevent that decay of filial love, which is so apt to take place amidst the ardent pursuits of youth, the engagements of worldly business, the formation of new connections, and the removal from a father's house. Let husbands pray for their wives, and wives for their husbands: this will strengthen their union, sanctify their affection, animate them in their mutual duties, and support them under their joint afflictions. Let masters pray for their servants, and servants for their masters: this will help them to render to each other what is just and equal, keeping, the one party, in remembrance, that they themselves, have a Master in heaven, and the other that they serve also a Master in heaven. Let every one pray for every one who has, that day, come in their way, or been in their company in the intercourse of life: this will produce more good effects on the whole face of society than can well be conceived, or than any other practice that could be devised.

You will not readily despise, or defame, or any way defraud those, or disregard the just claims of those, whom you know it is your settled purpose to commend unto God before you close your eyes in sleep. You will thus preserve a powerful check upon your own spirits, and prevent any feeling of hatred or malice from settling in your breasts. You will give a stamp of sacredness to every common occurrence, and diffuse the glow of a Christian spirit over the whole scenes of social intercourse. You will thus do one good work at least, every day, to those with whom you have associated in the course of that day; and you will lie down at night in peace with all around you, and with all who are known to you.

Observe in all this the wisdom of the divine precepts. This one practice recommended in the Word of God, and set before you in its examples and exhortations, will be found more calculated to guide you in the duties of your place, than all the arguments of human reason, and all the authority of human legislation. Follow the divine plan; and make intercession for all men. Connect your feelings of benevolence with the spirit of devotion; and thus bring the Most High God himself to witness and to strengthen all your good intentions and kind purposes towards one another.

Observe the excellence of the true Christian in this peculiar aspect, and see how invariably the friend of God is, and will be, the friend of man, of every man. Such an one may do to you all the good offices that any other can do; may treat you with civility, or shew you hospitality; may improve you by useful conversation, or commend you to others by his good word. But, more than all this, by his intercessions for you before God, he will bring himself under a solemn bond to render you every good office in his power. He lays himself under a necessity, as it were, if you fall in his way, to remember you in the presence of his God. He does not lose all thought of you as an object that has just flitted past his sight in his progress; but, as a fellow-creature, who has, in God's providence, been brought into his mind, he bears you on his heart, for that day at least, before the throne of the Almighty; and there, the least of his wishes for your welfare will be nothing less than this, that you may dwell at length in the mansions of his Father and your Father in heaven above.

Where, indeed, you may be ready to ask, are such persons to be found? Where, I would merely ask in reply, might they not be found? And, what hinders any Christian man or woman to be of the number? Make it then your own practice; and pray every night for all and every one with whom you may have conversed, and any way consorted, every day. Practise this, as a duty which is "good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour." Practise this, as your own high privilege, as honoured to be intercessors for others, as well as to present petitions for yourselves. Practise this as one powerful means of preserving yourselves in a right frame of spirit towards all your fellow-creatures; and if there should be any individual for whom you cannot thus pray, then, be assured, there is something wrong in your feelings towards that person, requiring to be rectified; something wanting in your Christian character, requiring to be supplied. Practise this as a part of that temper and spirit which "you ought to be of;" and be continually aiming thus to acquire the Spirit of him, who "will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth," and who, like himself, sits on the right hand of the Majesty on high, "ever living to make intercession for us."

THE ANCIENT MONACHISM OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

BY THE REV. ROBERT K. HAMILTON, A. M.,
Minister of Saltoun.

No. II.

FIRST APPEARANCE OF MONACHISM IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH—PAUL—ANTHONY—HILARION—EARLY ABUSES OF THE INSTITUTION.

THE earliest instance, in the history of the Christian Church, of the adoption of the monastic life, occurred, as we mentioned in our last, about the middle of the third century. It was about this period, (A. D. 252,) that an Egyptian Christian, named PAUL, whom the fury of the Decian persecution had driven from his home, and one of the few who escaped that time of peril, fled for safety to the desert of Thebais. The unnatural conduct of a brother-in-law, who, allured by the prospect of inheriting his patrimony, had resolved to betray him to the Roman authorities, appears to have been the immediate occasion of his flight. The seclusion to which necessity had thus compelled him to resort, soon became grateful to the refugee; and after the danger from which he had fled ceased to exist, he continued to occupy his solitary abode until the close of an existence of no ordinary duration. (1) Tradition informs us, that, during the lengthened period of his seclusion, upwards of ninety years, he never quitted his mountain cave, (2) nor ever beheld the countenance of man, until when, on the eve of dissolution, he was visited by Saint Anthony, who had been (according to the monkish historian) supernaturally directed to his cell, in order, after his decease, to administer the last offices of humanity to the illustrious hermit. (3) We learn from Jerome, by whom his life has been written, that Paul was versed in the literature not only of Egypt, but of Greece; in that age an undoubted evidence of superior education and scholarship. The same father also informs us, that during the whole period of his seclusion, he supported himself by the labour of his hands; a practice which, he asserted, was essential to the perfection of the monkish life. His occupations

(1) He died at the advanced age of a hundred and thirteen, about A. D. 350.

(2) The cave in which he took up his abode had been employed as a place of concealment for secret treasure, during the wars of Antony and Cleopatra, and was well known in the days of Jerome.

(3) The manner in which Anthony is related to have performed this task affords an illustration of the extent to which a passion for the marvellous had already begun to prevail. Finding himself alone with the body of his friend, at the distance of three days' journey from the nearest inhabited spot, and without any implement suitable for the purpose, Anthony found himself unable to perform the necessary rites of sepulture. "While in this state of anxiety," says Jerome, "two lions from the interior of the desert approached him, and while he trembled at the result, they, with drooping tail and mane, and uttering a mournful sound, stood around the body of the departed saint. Then beginning, at a little distance, to dig the earth with their claws, they soon excavated a space sufficient to contain the corpse. Having thus finished their task, they approached Anthony, as if to solicit his blessing, which he having bestowed, they returned again to the wilderness."—Hieronymi Vita Pauli Eremitae, p. 92.

were almost entirely devotional. His habits simple and frugal. The fruit of the palm his only food, a rude garment made of its leaves his only covering. (1)

The example of the recluse of Thebais soon found numerous imitators, and not those only who, like himself, had been compelled by the prospect of danger to flee from the haunts of men. Many who, from the pressure of adverse fortunes, or other similar causes, had become disgusted with the world, sought an imaginary repose in the solitude of the desert, so that the expression soon passed into a proverb, that "Despair makes a monk." But amongst the nameless crowd, who, thus actuated by various motives, trod in the footsteps of Paul, one individual to whom allusion has already been made, must be prominently distinguished. Although not the first who espoused the monastic life, ANTHONY, from the influence of his character and example, must, in reality, be considered the founder of the order. (2) The desert of the Thebais was also, as in the case of his predecessor, the place of his retreat, (3) whither, while yet in the vigour of manhood, he betook himself, and where, till his decease at an advanced period of life, he continued to reside. Descended of a noble family, and possessed of considerable fortune, he had originally chosen the profession of the law, and, according to some, was actually a pleader at the Alexandrian bar, when happening, it is said, to enter a Church in that city, while the officiating minister was reading the reply of our Saviour to the young man in the Gospel, "Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven," he was so deeply impressed with the divine injunction, that, interpreting it literally he made a voluntary surrender of wealth, and of the prospect of professional eminence, and, withdrawing himself from society, devoted his remaining years to a life of religious seclusion. His place of abode, and mode of life, as described by Jerome and his cotemporary and disciple, Hilarion, were not distinguished by any of those voluntary and self-imposed discomforts, which the later monks deemed it necessary to superadd to the original privations of nature. A sequestered spot, at the base of a rocky hill, traversed by a cool mountain stream, and shaded by a grove of palms, was his hermitage. A garden for vegetable produce, cultivated by his own labour, and vines and aromatic shrubs trained also by himself, added to the comforts of his abode; and higher up the mountain was a still more secluded retreat, to which, when oppressed by the throng of curious visitors, he was wont to retire. Nor were his hours consumed in the routine of solitary and mechanical devotion: frequently he left his retreat, and, mingling in society, sought, alike in times of outward violence and internal disquiet, to maintain the fidelity and compose the strifes of the Church. During the persecution of Maximin, he was unremitting in his endeavours to sustain the constancy of the suffering confessors, and, amid the fierce contentions which marked the period of the Arian controversy, his influence was exerted alike in defending the cause of truth, and in quelling the animosities of the conflicting parties. His

(1) Some of the monkish historians, influenced by the same credulous spirit that the preceding anecdote exhibits, and not satisfied that the author of their institution should have been permitted to subsist by merely the ordinary means of existence, affirm that for sixty years a raven, (doubtless supernaturally directed,) daily furnished him with a supply of food. So soon did superstition begin to debase the most solemn realities of Scripture. In her eyes every indolent recluse was deemed as fitting an object for the exercise of miraculous interposition as the inspired Prophet of God.

(2) The following quotation from the writings of Jerome, evidently shews that this was the opinion, not only of that father himself, but also of the age in which he lived. "Others, however, and this is the generally received opinion, assert that Anthony was the originator of the Monastic Institution, which is partly true, not so much that he was before all others, but that by his example, the seal of all men was awakened in its favour."—Hieron. Vit. Pauli, p. 90.

(3) According to Illyot, this place was distant a day's journey from the western shores of the Red Sea, and is the same as the modern Colsim.

tory also relates, that the great Constantine deigned to seek the aid of his counsels in matters of no trifling moment. Nor was his personal religion less unequivocal than what might have been anticipated of one so influential in character, and so unsullied in reputation. To the disciples who came to him to be prescribed the rules of a pious life, his answer was, producing the volume of the Evangelists, "This contains all needful for salvation:" in his epistles, which are quoted by Jerome, the same recognition of the sufficiency of the Sacred Volume is contained; and his own conduct afforded no doubtful evidence of his submission to that rule of faith and manners which he invariably prescribed to others. He refused to be supported by charitable aid, or to be in any measure dependent on the bounty of his disciples: the labour of his own hands he deemed the only legitimate mode of maintenance, often referring, as the rule of his conduct, to the apostolic maxim, "If any man will not work, neither should he eat." Nor amid the decay of nature, and the infirmities of declining years, did the evidences of his piety diminish. Conscious of his approaching dissolution, he assembled his friends, and, with the obvious view of guarding, in his own case, against the superstitious veneration of the age for the relics of the departed, he obtained from them a promise that his remains should be deposited in some secret and unknown spot. (1) Then calling his disciples around him, with his dying accents he impressively besought them to shun the evils of heresy and schism, and preserve inviolate the purity of the faith of Christ. (2) Thus died the pious Anthony, of whom it is not too much to affirm, that, had his personal virtues been as faithfully imitated as the example which he too unwarily sanctioned was blindly followed, Monachism would not have become that system of licentious imposition in which it eventually terminated, and charity would have been spared her detection of the crimes of many a cloistered hypocrite. (3)

The influence of Anthony was chiefly exerted in prescribing a more uniform mode of life to the numerous solitaries who now thronged the deserts of Eastern Africa. Pisper on the east, and Arsinoe on the west of the Nile, were their most common places of resort. The rules of discipline which he enjoined are not preserved, but if we may infer the nature of his precept from that of his example, they must have been calculated to produce beneficial effects, in correcting the selfishness which was too often the predominating motive of monastic seclusion. Hitherto, (A. D. 300), no formation of these solitaries into communities had taken place; the period was yet somewhat remote which was destined to witness this important event in the history of Monachism, an event in which, strictly speaking, the peculiar system of Monasticism must be considered as originating. But the influence of Anthony was perhaps still more felt in the effects of his example. The circumstance of one of his youth, rank, and opulence, having voluntarily surrendered the enjoyment of the world, and devoted himself to what appeared to others the most acceptable mode of religious service, gave a new impulse to the progress of the Monastic life, and proportionally increased the number of its votaries.

(1) The following anecdote, from the pages of Hospius, evinces that Anthony had also anticipated the age in which he lived in a just apprehension of the nature of Christian self-denial; and his conduct, in this respect, directly condemned the imposition of unwarrantable austerities, which was now beginning to prevail. "It is related," says the above writer, "that as he was once engaged with some of his brethren, for the purpose of health, in the exercises of fasting and leaping, he gave great offence to some passers by, who considered such an occupation unbecoming in a person of his gravity and profession. Anthony, aware of the censure that had been expressed, took the following method of practically refuting it. Perceiving that one of his reprovers carried a bow in his hand, he requested him to bend it; this was done: he then desired him to bend it still further; the man, however, declined, assigning, as his reason, that if too much bent, the bow would break. 'Why then,' replied the sagacious Anchorite, 'art thou offended at the exercise in which we engage for the benefit of our bodily health? for if our spirit be overwrought, must we not also, like the bow, be broken?'" — Hospianus, lib. ii. cap. 5.

(2) Hospianus, lib. i. c. 4. Anthony died about A. D. 366.

Of the numerous disciples of Anthony, one of the most distinguished and influential was HILARION, who may be regarded as the founder of the Christian Monks of Palestine. (1) He was descended of heathen parents, who sent him, at an early age, to Alexandria, for the purpose of education. There he became a convert to Christianity, and immediately afterwards adopted the Monastic profession. He fixed his residence on a desert part of the sea shore in the vicinity of Gaza, where he continued to reside, in perfect solitude, until the reign of Julian the apostate, A. D. 363, when, being threatened with death, on account of his religion, he fled for refuge first to Sicily, and subsequently to Cyprus, in which island he died. In him we witness the most decisive symptoms of the transition which was now taking place, from the simple discipline of the primitive solitaries to the affected asceticism, and self-inflicted rigors of genuine Monkery. A cell so low as not to admit of its occupant maintaining an upright position, and so narrow as to prevent the body from being fully stretched when reposing; a diet of the most miserable kind, gradually diminished, ounce by ounce, till the least possible quantity on which life could be sustained had been reached; a garment formed of sack-cloth, and worn unwashed, until it could no longer fulfil its office; these were some of the ascetic innovations which characterised the discipline of Hilarion. Notwithstanding, however, these melancholy evidences of a superstitious spirit, there is every reason to believe that his piety was sincere and unaffected. Of this the unquestionable holiness of his life is the best testimony; and in his dying moments, he evinced the possession of that calm and humble assurance which attends the death-bed only of the true Christian. "Depart, what dost thou fear?" were his expiring words, "Depart, Oh my soul, what dost thou doubt? For seventy years thou hast served Christ, and art thou now afraid to die?" (2) Although the genuine disciple of the Saviour, Hilarion had not been permitted to experience, in all its extent, the liberty wherewith Christ makes his people free; the victim of prejudice and superstition, although resting upon the true foundation, he had erected upon it only the superstructure of "wood, hay, and stubble."

To enumerate merely the chief of those who now sought to emulate the example of the recluse of Colzim, were only to encumber our pages with a catalogue of names, with which no associations of interest can now be connected, and of which it would be well if history could have recorded nothing less censurable than that their possessors lived and died. But with the increase of the number of the recluses, errors and abuses proportionally augmented. Of these one of the most prevalent as well as most injurious was the infliction of self-imposed and unwarrantable austerities. Hitherto, a submission to the ordinary privations of nature, and a denial of the more superfluous comforts of life, were all that had distinguished the practice of the Anchorites. But now the recluses seemed to vie with each other in the extent to which they could carry their ingenuity in devising new modes of self-torture, and their powers of endurance in submitting to them. To subsist on the coarsest and most unwholesome diet,—to abstain from food and sleep till nature was almost wholly exhausted,—to repose uncovered on the bare and humid ground,—to live in nakedness, in filth, in suffering,—to shun all intercourse even with the nearest relatives and connections; in a word, to adopt the means most directly

(1) "Previous to the time of the blessed Hilarion," says Jerome, "the name and existence of a Monk was unknown both in Syria and Palestine. In these provinces he first instituted this species of life." Hieron. Vita Sancti Hilarionis, Opera, tom. i. p. 94.

(2) Hieron. Vita Hilar. ut supra.

calculated to stifle the charities and sympathies of social and domestic life, and to transform that beneficent religion, which was designed for the happiness of mankind, into an engine of punishment and self-torment; these were the objects, the attainment of which now constituted the first ambition of the recluse. Of the truth of these assertions many instances might be adduced. Socrates mentions an Egyptian, named Macarius, who, for twenty years, weighed every morsel of bread and measured every drop of water that he swallowed, and whose place of rest was so formed, that he could not enjoy repose for more than a few moments at a time. (1) Marianus Scotus tells us of another solitary, named Martin, who, from the time of his retirement to the desert until the period of his death, kept himself constantly chained by the foot to a huge stone, so as to prevent him ever moving beyond the narrow circle he was thus enabled to describe. In Sozomen (2) we read of a still more disgusting fanatic, who abstained, to such an extent, from food, that vermin were engendered in his mouth. Even females (who appear about this time to have adopted the reigning passion of the age) seemed to forget, in the austerities they imposed upon themselves, the respect that was due to the modesty of their sex, and with the idea of attaining superior sanctity, violated, without compunction, the delicacies of ordinary life. (3)

Another pernicious element which now also began to develop itself was that chief provocative of spiritual pride, the adulation paid by the world to the sanctity of the recluse. The path that led to the hermit's cell was now no longer that which conducted to retirement and obscurity, but the broad and ostentatious road by which earthly distinction was to be attained. The extent to which this evil prevailed will best be shewn by quoting the description given by Sulpitius Severus, the monkish historian of the fourth and fifth centuries, of the court paid to an African monk, who lived at the period to which we now allude. This individual had acquired such a reputation for dispossessing evil spirits, which he is related to have effected, not only by oral command, but by epistolary communications, addressed to the obsequious fiends, that his retreat was thronged by constant levees of the great, the learned, and the devout. "To pass over the most distinguished," says the historian, "prefects, nobles, and the judges of various empires lay prostrate at his threshold. The most holy bishops, also, laying aside their sacerdotal dignity, humbly sought to be touched and blessed by him, deeming themselves sanctified, and especially favoured by heaven, in proportion to the frequency with which they were permitted to touch the hand or garment of the holy man." (4)

In addition to these qualifications of this illustrious Anchorite, the historian is careful to note, as not the least important in the catalogue of his virtues, that his daily subsistence consisted of seven withered figs. We shall henceforth cease to wonder at the rapid and universal diffusion of Monachism, when we thus early behold two of the most powerful passions of human nature, spiritual pride and worldly ambition, enlisted on its side.

The Great Subject of Enquiry.—Little matter, in a comparative view, what is the state of our bodies, or our outward condition in the world, if only we are so happy, through grace, as to secure our well-being for eternity. O it is strange that eternity and its all-important concerns do not more deeply engross our minds! Our life on earth is but a moment, and less than a moment, when compared with the endless duration of our existence. Those souls which now animate our bodies must live for ever—live when the corporeal part of our frame is mouldering away into dust. And where shall they live? and in what condition? In heaven or in hell, in bliss or in pain? O most interesting inquiry! Have I indeed reason to believe from the Word of God, that the moment my connection with earth is dissolved, I shall be admitted into the heaven of heavens; that when I must leave my dearest relatives and friends on earth, I shall be brought into the closest union, and most intimate converse, with an innumerable multitude of angelic and redeemed spirits, yea, with God himself; that when I shall appear before the tribunal of my Supreme Judge, I shall be blessed with his smile and approbation; that when the all-decisive sentence is to be passed, determining my final condition, mine shall be expressed in such terms as these, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, enter into the joy of your Lord." Most transporting thought! the prospect of such a happy eternity must sweeten this short suffering life, and make all the terrors of death itself to disappear. But ah! if I have not the scriptural evidence that I possess the character with which the pure joys of heaven are inseparably connected, how lamentable my condition! The Bible tells me, and it may be my godly parents have often enforced on my mind the solemn intimation, that I am come into the world under guilt and condemnation, a child of wrath, and an heir of hell. My very nature is corrupt, having no tendency towards God, no inclination to love, please, and glorify him; on the contrary, opposed to God, enmity itself against him. Thus my native temper must be changed, otherwise I can never be meet for the heavenly inheritance. Heaven is a holy place; all its inhabitants love God, they delight in him,—his service and fellowship are their supreme felicity. Unless, therefore, I am brought to love and enjoy God on earth, heaven would be no heaven to me; if I go out of the world as I came into it, alienated in heart from God, hell is the only region in the universe fit for the residence of such a polluted soul. O the horror of the thought! Must I, therefore, sit down in the sullen gloom of despair, and brood over the heart-rending idea of banishment from the divine presence, and an everlasting suffering of divine vengeance? No, blessed be God. The Gospel proclaims a sovereign and effectual remedy. Whatever depravity of heart I may feel, it may yet be subdued. This is the work of sovereign grace. God himself says, "I will take away from you the heart of stone, I will give you a heart of flesh. I will put my spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes." O precious promise! what encouragement does it administer to such corrupted creatures as we are! O then, let it be your concern and mine to plead the fulfilment of this promise at a throne of grace. O pray, pray much, pray with fervour, for the divine Spirit to convince you of sin, to make you to feel the sinfulness and the misery of a state of estrangement from God, to reveal Christ in you, to produce that faith in your heart, whereby alone his merits can be imputed to you for your justification before God, and his grace conveyed to your soul, for forming the divine image in your heart. Let this ever dwell in your mind as your supreme concern. Often ask yourself, Am I a Christian, a genuine disciple of the Lord Jesus? have I truly received him as my Saviour? do I love him? do I delight in him? is his Word precious to my soul? do I prefer his service and favour to every thing else? These are questions which should not be hastily answered; we have need to search deep into our hearts, for they are deceitful above all things. And the sooner we come to a decision, with regard to the safety of our final condition, so much the better.

This will impart a happiness which can be derived from no other source,—this will prepare us for all the sorrowful changes of life, and make us willing to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better than to abide in this sinful world. O, then, let us not live in suspense, with regard to a matter of such deep, infinite concern. Let that solemn admonition ever sound in our ears, and rouse us to an immediate and a deliberate search into our state and character, as in the presence of the Omniscient God.—Strive to enter in at the strait gate, for many will seek to enter in and shall not be able.”—

Late Rev. JOHN RUSSELL of Muthill.—Letter to a Young Man.

Religion a source of Consolation.—These are the occasions which force the mind to take refuge in religion. When we have no help in ourselves, what can remain, but that we look up to a higher and greater power? And to what hope may we not raise our eyes and hearts, when we consider that the greatest power is the best? Surely there is no man, who thus afflicted, does not seek succour in the Gospel, which has brought life and immortality to light. The precepts of Epicurus, who teaches us to endure what the laws of the universe make necessary, may silence but not content us. The dictates of Zeno, who commands us to look with indifference on external things, may dispose us to conceal our sorrow, but cannot assuage it. Real alleviation in the loss of a friend, and rational tranquillity in the prospect of our own dissolution, can be received only from the promises of Him, in whose hands are life and death; and from the assurance of another and better state, in which all tears will be wiped away from the eyes, and the whole soul shall be filled with joy. Philosophy may infuse stubbornness, but religion only can give patience.—Dr SAMUEL JOHNSON.

Decay of Vital Christianity.—Alas! we are a company of worn out Christians, our moon is on the wane; we are much more black than white, more dark than light; we shine but little; grace in the most of us is sorely decayed.—BENYAN.

That you may have Christian Assurance, see that you act like a Christian.—Though I think it worthy of a Christian to endeavour the assurance of his own salvation, yet, perhaps, it might be the safest way to moderate his curiosity of prying into God's book of life, and to stay a while, until he sees himself within the confines of salvation itself. Should a man hear a voice from heaven, or see a vision from the Almighty, to testify unto him the love of God towards him, yet, methinks, it were more desirable to find a revelation of all from within, arising up from the bottom and centre of a man's own soul, in the real and internal impressions of a godlike nature upon his own spirit; and thus to find the foundation and beginning of heaven and happiness within himself: it were more desirable to see the crucifying of our own will, the mortifying of the mere animal life, and to see the divine life rising up in the room of it, as a sure pledge and inchoation of immortality and happiness, the very essence of which consists in a perfect conformity and cheerful compliance of all the powers of our soul with the will of God. The best way of gaining a well-grounded assurance of the divine love is this, for a man to overcome himself and his own will: “To him that overcometh shall be given that white stone, and in it the new name written, which no man knoweth, but he that receiveth it.” He that beholds the Sun of Righteousness arising upon the horizon of his soul, with healing in its wings, and chasing away all that misty darkness of his own self-will and passions, such a one desires not now the star-light to know whether it be day or not; nor cares he to pry into heaven's secrets, and to search the hidden rolls of eternity, there to see the whole plot of his salvation; for he views it, transacted upon the inward stage of his own soul, and, reflecting upon himself, he may behold a heaven opened from within, and a throne set up in his soul, and an Almighty Saviour sitting upon it, and reigning within him: He now finds the kingdom of heaven within him, and sees that it is not the thing merely reserved for him without him, being already made partaker of the sweetness and efficacy of it.—John Smith's Select Discourses.

Vanity.—O in how many vanities doth vain man place his glory!—OWEN.

To the impenitent.—My friends, God offers you the water of life, without money and without price. Every one may come and take of it if he will, and is not this sufficient? Would you have the water of life forced upon you? What is it that you wish? My friends, I will tell you what you wish. You wish to live as you please here, to disobey your Creator, to neglect your Saviour, to fulfil the desires of the flesh and of the mind; and at death, to be admitted into a kind of sensual paradise, where you may taste again the same pleasures which you enjoyed on earth. You wish that God should break his word, stain his justice, purity, and truth, and sacrifice the honour of his law, his own rightful authority, and the best interests of the universe, to the gratification of your own sinful propensities. Look back to those who have passed the great change through which we must all pass. Think of the patriarchs who died before the flood. They have been perfectly happy for more than four thousand years, yet their happiness has but just commenced. Think of the sinners who died before the flood. For more than four thousand years they have been completely wretched, and yet their misery is but begun. So there will be a time when you have been happy or miserable for four thousand years, and yet your heaven or hell will even then be but beginning.—PAYSON.

“All things are Yours.”—I cannot be poor so long as God is rich, for all his riches are mine.—BERNARD.

Why will ye die?—The Lord has confirmed to us, by his oath, that he has no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but rather that he turn and live; that he may leave man no pretence to question the truth of it: and so earnest is God for the conversion of sinners, that he doubles his commands and exhortations, with vehemency; “Turn ye, turn ye; why will ye die?” Is there an unconverted sinner that hears these vehement words of God? Harken then to the voice of your Maker, and turn to him, by Christ, without delay. Would you know the will of God? This is his will, that ye immediately turn. Shall the living God send such earnest messages to his creatures, and they not obey? Harken then, all you that live after the flesh; the Lord, that gave you your breath and being, has sent a message to you from heaven; and this is his message, “Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?” He that has ears to hear, let him hear. Shall the voice of the eternal Majesty be neglected? If he do but thunder terribly, thou art afraid. But this voice more nearly concerns thee. If he did but tell thee, thou shalt die to-morrow, thou wouldst not make light of it. But this word concerns thy life or death everlasting. It is both a command and an exhortation. As if he had said to thee, “I charge thee, upon the allegiance that thou owest to me, thy Creator and Redeemer, that thou renounce the flesh, the world, and the devil, and turn to me, that thou mayest live. I condescend to entreat thee, as thou either lovest or fearest him that made thee; as thou lovest thine own life, even thine everlasting life, Turn and live; as ever thou wouldst escape eternal misery, Turn, turn; for why wilt thou die?” And is there a heart in man, in a reasonable creature, that can once refuse such a message, such a command, such an exhortation as this? O what a thing then is the heart of man!—BAXTER.

SACRED POETRY.

THE CREATION.

FROM the throne of the Highest the mandate came forth,
The word of Omnipotent God;
And the elements fashion'd, His footstool the earth,
And the heavens, His holy abode.
And His Spirit moved over the fathomless flood
Of waters that fretted in darkness around;
Unt' it, at His bidding, their turbulent mood
Was hush'd to a calm, and obedient they stood
Where he fixed their perpetual bound.

By the word of Omnipotence, valley and hill
Were clothed with the grass and the flower;
And the fruit-tree expanded its blooms by the rill,
And the nourishing herb in the bower;
And the sun of the morning—the fountain of light—
Threw his cherishing rays through creation afar;
And the region of darkness—the season of night—
The sister of Chaos—grew beauteous and bright
By the beams of the moon and the star.

By the word of Omnipotence, nature brought forth
The fish, and the beast, and the bird;
And they play'd in the waters, and brows'd on the earth,
And the air by their carol was stirred;
And man, in the image and likeness of God,
Erected his person majestic and tall;
And though, like a worm, he was form'd of the clod,
Yet, the favourite of Heaven, he conspicuously trod
The lord and possessor of all.

From the work of creation, which rose by His word—
When finish'd the heavens and the earth—
On the seventh day reated th' Omnipotent Lord,
As he look'd on each beautiful birth;
On the firmament stretch'd from the east to the west,
On the far-flowing sea, and the fast-teeming land;
And He saw they were good—and the Sabbath was blest,
The Sabbath!—the sanctified season of rest
To the creatures that came from His hand.

THE BIBLE.

WITHIN this awful volume lies
The mystery of mysteries:
Happiest they of human race
To whom their God has given grace
To read, to fear, to hope, to pray,
To lift the latch, to force the way;
And better had they ne'er been born,
Than read to doubt, or read to scorn.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr Raikes.—The following fact is related by Joseph Lancaster, to shew the kind, condescending, and judicious conduct of Robert Raikes, the excellent founder of Sunday Schools in England:—He was frequently in the habit of visiting the parents and children at their own houses. One day he called on a poor woman, and found a very refractory girl, crying and sulking. Her mother complained that correction was of no avail, as obstinacy marked her conduct, and it was very bad. After asking the parent's leave, he began to talk seriously to the girl, and concluded by telling her that, as the first step towards amendment, she must kneel down and ask her mother's pardon. The girl continued sulky. "Well then," said he, "if you have no regard for yourself, I have much regard for you. You will be ruined and lost if you do not begin to be a good girl; and, if you will not humble yourself, I must humble myself, and make a beginning for you." So saying, he knelt down on the ground before the child's mother, and putting his hands together with all the ceremony of a juvenile offender, began, "Pray forgive," &c. No sooner did the stubborn girl see him on his knees, on her account, than her pride was at once overcome, she burst into tears, and on her knees earnestly entreated forgiveness, nor did she afterwards occasion any trouble.

African Hospitality.—When the celebrated Mungo Park was in Africa, he was directed by one of the native kings to a village to pass the night. He went, but as the order was not accompanied with any provision for his reception, he found every door shut. Turning his horse loose to graze, he was preparing, as a security from wild beasts, to climb a tree and sleep among the branches, when a beautiful and affecting incident occurred, which gives a most pleasing view of the negro female character. An old woman, returning from the labours of the field, cast on him a look of compassion, and desired him to follow her. She led him to an apartment in her hut, procured a fine fish, which she broiled for his supper, and spread a mat for him to sleep upon. She then desired her maidens, who had been gazing in fixed astonishment on the white man, to resume their tasks, which they continued to ply through a great part of the night. They cheered their labours with a song, which must have been composed extempore, as Mr Park, with deep emotion, discovered that he himself was the subject of it. It said, in a strain of affecting simplicity:—"The winds roared, and the rains fell. The poor white man, faint and weary, came and sat under our tree. He has no mother to bring him milk, no wife to grind his corn." Chorus, "Let us pity the white man, no mother has he," &c. Our traveller was much affected, and next morning could not depart without requesting his landlady's acceptance of the only gift he had left, two out of the four brass buttons that still remained on his waistcoat.

A Burmese Female.—The history of the first Christian mission in Burmah, shews the beneficial influence of tracts. The first inquirer was drawn to the zayat by a tract; and Mah-Men-la, one of the most interesting of the female converts, received her first impression from one of these silent messengers. Her history will be read with interest. It appears that she was long anxious to search the sacred books; and, after much solicitation, her husband taught her to read. She attentively studied the holy books of Burmah, which left her mind in the same inquisitive state as when she commenced them. For ten years she had continued her inquiries, when one day her neighbour brought her a tract, written by Dr Judson, from which she derived her first ideas of an eternal God. She then became anxious to know the residence of the writer, but could not ascertain it till the chapel was built. In consequence of the blessing of God upon Dr Judson's instructions, she became an intelligent and decided Christian, and died in the faith of Christ. Not long before she expired, her mind was cheered by the prospect of communing with Mrs Judson, and other pious friends in heaven. But just as she thought on this subject of consolation, she exclaimed, "But first of all, I shall hasten to where my Saviour sits, and fall down and worship and adore Him, for his great love in sending the teachers to show me the way to heaven."

ON THE SUFFERINGS OF THE FIRST CHRISTIANS,
CONSIDERED AS AN ARGUMENT FOR THE TRUTH OF CHRISTIANITY.

PART I.

BY THE REV. W. B. NIVISON,

*Formerly one of the Ministers of the Scotch Church
in Amsterdam.*

THE apostles and first founders of the Christian Church, were exposed to a variety of the most severe sufferings in publishing the new faith which they had ventured to embrace. The power that enabled them to work miracles, was not exerted to prevent or even alleviate them. In this respect they were placed on precisely the same footing with their divine Master, who was made perfect through suffering, and who seldom or never employed his omnipotent power in removing it from himself. The apostles and evangelists, in all their writings, speak of suffering as a necessary part of the Christian warfare, and prepare their fellow-disciples for enduring it, by pressing upon them many topics of powerful consolation. Sometimes they discourse to them of the abundant supplies of grace, which the blessed Comforter had been sent to impart. Sometimes they recal to their remembrance the example of their crucified Lord, and his commandment, "to take up their cross and follow him." Sometimes they represent suffering to be only a return of love on their part, to that good and gracious Being, who had so lately commended his love towards them, in sending his Son to die for their sins. Sometimes they inform them of their being preordained to suffer, by a decree of the Supreme Disposer of events, who had important ends to serve by their suffering. Sometimes they describe to them the virtues and graces, which suffering has a natural tendency to produce. And, in short, they endeavour to bring forward every argument and every motive, which it was possible for them to draw, either from natural or revealed religion, in order to reconcile the minds of the new converts to the pain and shame of persecution,—which was too certain to prove the miserable lot of all who dared, in those unhappy times, to confess publicly that "Jesus was the Christ."

The severe sufferings so heroically endured by the primitive Christians, are often and justly adduced as a part of the general evidence in support of the Christian revelation; and indeed it is impossible for any person, who dispassionately examines it, to doubt for a moment of its weight and importance. When any number of men believe so firmly in the truth of any doctrine, or system of doctrines, as to allow themselves to be deprived of every worldly advantage, and even of life itself, rather than renounce this belief, it is probable, to a certain degree, from this single consideration, that their faith is built on a solid foundation. They may, indeed, have failed in appreciating the evidence that first moved them to believe; and if such a charge can be made out against them, their sufferings, however painful they may be, and with whatever firmness they may be borne, cannot be received as satisfactory proof that this previous and necessary work has been properly performed. But, at the same time, they do afford very unexceptionable evidence that their faith is sincere, and that they have not embraced or professed opinions without being impressed with a deep sense of their truth and utility. And the higher we suppose the degree of suffering to which they submit, and the greater the fortitude they display in enduring it, so much the stronger do we make the presumption in favour of their system of faith.

If we study with any attention the lives of the early converts to Christianity, we cannot fail to be convinced that there never was so numerous and so respectable a body of men, who were so long, so constantly, and so cruelly persecuted for professing or propagating religious tenets, which they firmly believed to be true, and the knowledge of which they conceived to be essentially necessary to the best interests of mankind. Had these sufferings been confined to a few of the more distinguished Christians, the circumstance of their being singled out from the great body of believers might, perhaps, have led them to glory in their singular fortune, and to consider its painful disadvantages amply compensated by the honours paid to their eminent merit by their admiring contemporaries, or by the hope of posthumous fame from the applauses of a grateful posterity. But the general and indiscriminate persecution, that spared neither age, nor sex, nor rank, prevented the rise of this selfish sentiment, and purified the spirit of martyrdom of every low and unworthy motive. Even the more humble desire of supporting a character they had once assumed, and might be unwilling or ashamed to lay aside, could not be gratified in numerous instances; for many of their distresses were private and unknown, or of such a nature as to elude observation, being produced by the fastings, and fatigue, and labours, and anxieties they were obliged to undergo in maintaining their new faith, or in discharging its sacred functions. In these, often the heaviest of their afflictions, they were supported only by the testimony of an approving conscience, and by their confidence in the ever watchful guardianship of their Almighty Protector. It were almost impossible for any candid person to peruse the account of the dangers and hardships to which St. Paul was daily and hourly exposed, from the interesting moment of his call to the apostleship on the road to Damascus, to the awful period of his martyrdom under the iron despotism of Nero, without being persuaded that no other motive actuated his conduct, during the whole of that long and eventful time, but the single and sincere desire of preaching "Christ crucified," arising from a deep-rooted conviction of his being both "the wisdom and the power of God," and the "only name given under heaven among men by which we can be saved." Nor were it an easy task to explain, even plausibly, how he was led to choose such a life of care and misery, unless we admit him to have believed not only in the divine origin of Christianity, but also in his having himself received a divine commission to publish it to the world. To suppose that either he, or any other of the apostles, engaged in such a laborious and dangerous work for the sake of deceiving mankind, is to suppose them to suffer without that consciousness of personal sincerity, without that trust in the divine favour, and without that dependence on the divine grace, which were alone able to support, and which, they solemnly declare, did alone support them during the whole period of their missionary labours. And it is, besides, to suppose them guilty of such deep cunning, and such base hypocrisy, as are wholly inconsistent with the manly simplicity, the honourable integrity, the unaffected benevolence, and the zealous piety, which, even in the judgment of their adversaries, uniformly distinguished them both in public and private life. Or, if we are inclined rather to maintain that they were actuated by a desire of future fame, in being the first founders of a new religion, while they were all the while aware of its falsehood, we must remember it will be necessary for us to maintain, at the same time, that they were capable of foreseeing the future success of the Gospel, when, from their secret knowledge of the imposture, they must have had every reason in the world to expect its speedy decline and final extinction. Indeed, the project in question is, in all its views, a scheme of worldly aggrandisement so daring in its conception, so difficult in its management, and so hazardous in its execution, that we may justly pronounce it impossible for so wild an idea ever to have entered the imagination of a few plain and unlettered men, as the first preachers of the Gospel, with hardly any exceptions, most certainly were before they were endowed with inspired knowledge and miraculous power. So that, in whatever light we choose to consider the painful and continued suffering which the primitive converts were compelled to endure, we shall find that we invariably strengthen the moral proofs in favour of the sincerity of their faith, and, indirectly through this medium, the presumptive evidence in support of the religion itself.

Before finishing this first branch of the argument, it may be proper to observe, that the evidence for the truth of Christianity, arising from the sufferings of its early professors, is much strengthened by considering the source from which they derived their knowledge of the new religion, and also by reflecting upon the nature of some of its doctrines. First, we may remark, that these religious opinions were not received at second-hand, from the mere report of others, but were authenticated to them by the authority of their own senses. The first publishers of the Gospel did not believe in the doctrines of the Gospel, because they were taught by a man of unblemished character and of profound wisdom; but because they were taught by a man, who, along with these moral and intellectual excellencies, could produce the surest credentials of a divine commission, and prove by works, which no human power could perform, that he was what he affirmed himself to be, the Son of God and the promised Messiah. These works were not of an uncertain or ambiguous character, but were clearly seen, and strongly felt, to be the effects of a supernatural agency; and they were so openly and publicly performed, as to be placed completely within the observation of the senses,—of all the senses that were competent to examine and appreciate them. If the art of the juggler had been ever so ingeniously practised, it could not have escaped detection, for in most of the cases it could put on none of its usual disguises; and even if it had attempted to do so, little advantage would have been gained from the attempt, for not the gaze of the curious, not the look of the mere speculative inquirer, but the eye of an enemy, the piercing eye of an enemy, was fixed with the most searching scrutiny on every turn of its winding, and on every step of its movement. And, secondly, many of the Christian doctrines, such as the incarnation, the passion, the resurrection, and the ascension of the Saviour, were facts, of which they were not only assured by the authority of Christ himself, but of which they were themselves eye-witnesses. Christianity has justly been called a "religion of facts," because some of its principal doctrines are facts, and because the principal evidence on which we are required to believe it, is composed of miracles, or supernatural facts, exhibited before the senses, and exhibited for the express purpose of furnishing a train of reasonable and satisfactory evidence. So that it may be safely affirmed, that the two circumstances I have now adverted to, add considerable force to our former reasoning, which was meant to shew, that the sufferings of the first Christians afford a clear proof, not only of the sincerity of their faith, but also, to a certain degree, of the truth of the religion to which their faith was directed.

But there is another view of the sufferings of the primitive church, which is still more important than the former, and will appear to many far more decisive in the presumptive evidence it affords for the truth of the Gospel,—though, perhaps, it has not been so frequently taken notice of, nor so fully illustrated by the advocates of revealed religion, as its importance might seem to merit. I allude to the moral qualities that distinguished the passive fortitude of the first believers during the whole period of their sufferings,—from the day they began to be persecuted, till the hour they were honoured with the crown of martyrdom. These moral qualities will be found, on examination, to be essentially different from those that belong to the character of any other body of sufferers, who may deserve to be compared in number and respectability with the company of Christian believers. Our limits will not permit us to state them at present, but they will form the subject of the second part of this argument.

SKETCH OF THE

HISTORY AND CHARACTER OF COLUMBA,

THE APOSTLE OF THE HIGHLANDS.

THE difficulties which thwarted Columba's exertions to Christianize the Western districts of Scotland, were, as we have seen, numerous and powerful; but there was that in his character and conduct which, while it challenged observation, and dared opposition, was admirably calculated to triumph over obstacles. Fearless of danger, undismayed in the midst of difficulties, heedless of personal comfort and safety, his moral intrepidity and hardihood, so congenial to the habits and feelings of a rude and warlike race could not fail to claim their respect and esteem. And such characteristics, when blended with others of a softer complexion, by degrees sapped the foundations of their prejudices, and opened an access to their affections. The foe of outrage and violence, the oppressed found him a ready advocate,—the injured had shelter under his protection,—the needy was never "turned empty away" from his habitation, and the wayfaring stranger was ever welcome to share his hospitality. There is a chapter in the life of Columba, by Adomnan, entitled, "of a circumstance which, though small, ought not, I think, to be overlooked;" and the incident, there recorded, is most simply but strikingly illustrative of his kindness and tenderness of heart; "a crane on its flight from Ireland, had become so exhausted before reaching Iona, that it was obliged to alight before reaching the shore; Columba observing it, and foreseeing its fate, ordered one of the monks to save the poor bird's life,—"Bring it," said he, "to the nearest house, feed it, and take all the care you can of it for three days, until it be well refreshed, and recover its strength, so as to be able to cross the sea again to its native home."

When the monk had returned, after performing the kind injunction of his master, Columba thus addressed him: "For this act of mercy and hospitality, may God command on thee his blessing, my dear brother." The man that to an inferior animal displayed such tenderness, could not fail to be merciful and compassionate to his brethren; and, therefore, we find that the promotion of peace and good-will among men was one of his leading objects; and when some person had the audacity to request of him to bless his dagger, "God grant then," answered he, "that it may never shed a drop of the blood of either man or beast."

His purity of life, and his self-denial, were all along a practical commentary upon the duties which he inculcated; and while ever anxious for the ease and comfort of others, he was so regardless of his own, as to submit to every toil and privation, denying himself the most common comforts of life, choosing no softer couch than the bare ground, with a stone for his pillow, and subsisting upon the simplest and the scantiest nourishment.

There were other qualifications besides, that tended, in the eyes of an unsophisticated people, to give a lofty, almost a supernatural air to his character. The cures which his medical skill effected, through the most simple and unostentatious means, were often regarded as miraculous; and the discovery of probable consequences from known causes, which a sagacity naturally discerning, and rendered more acute by long converse with the world, enabled him to deduce, assumed in the eyes of wondering savages, the mystic garb of prophecy. On many occasions this sagacity was displayed so as to impress the minds of the people with terrific ideas of his power. Having once met a plundering chief, who had then, for the third time, spoiled the property of a pious friend of Columba, the holy man remonstrated, threatened, and entreated the robber to leave his booty, and make restitution; Columba's petitions, instead of producing the desired effect, were replied to with scoffs and indignities. He followed them to the sea-shore, still persisting in his importunities, and having completely failed, he, at last, in righteous indignation, raising his hands to heaven, prayed God to glorify himself by avenging and protecting his people. Perceiving, probably, that the vessel was overloaded, and that the sky gave indications of an approaching hurricane, he said to his companions, "God will not always bear to have those who love him thus treated; that dark cloud, already forming in the north, is fraught with this poor man's ruin." The cloud spread,—the storm arose,—overtook the boat, and betwixt Mull and Colonsay the robber and his plunder sunk together.

Many other incidents are on record, equally striking in their character, and less easily accounted for on natural causes. These we may hesitate to believe, but it is wise not to deny, for we are unable to decide how far God might have vouchsafed to favour his faithful servant, encompassed, as he was, by so many dangers and difficulties. Be this as it may, such indications of superiority had the effect of inspiring a people, naturally superstitious, with sentiments of deep awe, partaking, however, not so much of the character of terror as of reverence, on account of the many soft tints of tenderness and affection that were blended with the majestic and severe in his character.

By such means, then, he gained the object which he ardently desired, a hearing from the rude heathens whom he had come to Christianize; and when once he had overcome the difficulties of the dialect, so as to require no interpreter, the power of his eloquence, his popular address, and his imposing manners, were brought to bear upon their minds and feelings with prodigious effect; while his own uniform consistency of conduct, his cheerfulness and benevolence, and above all his deep acquaintance with human character, gave point and effect to the eloquence of his appeals. By degrees he won first their esteem, then their affections, and last of all their confidence; so that, in the end, monarch and people came to regard him as a common father.

No circumstance, perhaps, tended more effectually to strengthen and preserve the moral influence which Columba had obtained over the Picts and the neighbouring states, than the sedulous anxiety with which he guarded against taking part in any matters of a secular or civil nature, and his steadfast avoidance of every species of partizanship. Frequently he was to be found journeying betwixt the courts of rival or hostile princes, by both of whom he was welcomed, and by both confided in; his object always being not to fan the flames of discord, but to promote peace, "brotherly kindness, and charity," and to induce those between whom the principles of paganism had engendered strifes, and fostered animosities, to give evidence of a Christian character, no less than of a Christian title, by "loving their neighbour as themselves."

Confiding thus in his moderation and integrity, the neighbouring princes frequently chose him as umpire in their differences; nay, from Ireland contending parties came soliciting his arbitration, and his decisions, guided as they were by the dictates of conscience, and by a profound acquaintance with civil and ecclesiastical jurisprudence, gave almost universal satisfaction to the disputants, prevented much bloodshed, and furthered the cause of truth and justice.

The respect that was paid him at the great council of Drimceat, where he appeared as the representative of the Scottish clergy, proves the unbounded confidence which was reposed in his judgment and honesty. The great question in dispute, regarding the claims of two competitors to the throne of the Scots, was submitted to his unfettered arbitration, a task, however, which he declined, with his usual prudence, recommending another referee, to whom the cause was submitted, and by whom it was decided in favour of the Scottish claimant. On one occasion only did Columba depart from his usual caution, in reference to this point, when he installed Aydan as king of the Scots, an act which he defends upon the ground of having received divine instructions to that effect.

His prudence was ever watchful,—his ardour ever active,—his address bland and fascinating,—kindness and placability directed all his movements. He was ever accessible, ever affable; poor and rich who came to consult him, whether the subject was of a temporal or spiritual concern, were received with warmth, and listened to with patience. Spiritual consolation was ready for the distressed,—comfort for the desolate,—advice to the hesitating,—relief to the needy,—medical aid to the diseased. Nor did he consider it sufficient to wait until advice or assistance was requested; like a faithful minister of Christ, he delighted in going about doing good; his pastoral attentions to the inhabitants of his immense district were no less unwearied and incessant, than were his ministrations faithful and acceptable. He conversed, consoled, reprov'd his flock, as circumstances required, while he passed through visiting from "house to house, and from kingdom to kingdom." On all occasions his presence was hailed with delight, alike by sire and son; the young, however, were the objects of his peculiar solicitude, and he the object of their devoted and reverential regard. He employed the most endearing tenderness and condescension, in order to conciliate their favour; he encouraged their visits, entered into their feelings, and favoured them with his instructions and his blessing, so that the youngest of the flock would run to welcome him, and bury his head in his bosom, while he received the pastoral benediction from his holy lips. "How lovely," says one of his biographers, when dilating on this subject, "How lovely is old age and holiness, thus delighting to associate themselves to infancy!"

He returned to no man "evil for evil," but rather desired to answer hatred with love, and to "overcome evil with good." A thief is said, on one occasion, to have attempted to carry off some of his property; the offender was apprehended in the act, and carried into Columba's presence. "Why," said he, "do you thus go on in the practice of stealing your neighbour's goods, and breaking the commandment of God? For the future come to me whenever you are in need, and you shall have what you have occasion for." He was dismissed with some provision for his destitute family, and long afterwards, when on his death-bed, experienced Columba's beneficence.

Nay, even the bards and Druids, who had opposed him with the strictest malignity, received of his kindness, and compelled to do homage to his worth, yielded, in the end, to the general feeling of admiration and esteem. At the council of Drimceat, to which we have before alluded, all the other members had concurred in a resolution for the extirpation of the bards; Columba, the object of their deadliest hatred, singly combated the suggestion, and through his intercession, the measure was abandoned. Hearing, at a future period, that the Druid Broichean, his most able and unwearied adversary, was believed to be on his death-bed, Columba made all haste to tender to him the aid of his medical skill and experience. Conciliated by such attentions, the Druids seem, by degrees, to have either conformed to his religious observances, or, at least, to have desisted from their malignant opposition; and the bards celebrated the praises of "Columkille," in strains, of which the recollection does not seem altogether lost in the Highlands, even at this remote day.

Anxious, however, as Columba seems to have been to practise the gentlest and most conciliatory measures towards the people, to promote peace and love, and to adapt his instructions, as far as duty permitted, to the popular taste and feelings, he never allowed this spirit of tenderness to infringe upon his discipline. His reproofs, when he required to reprove, were firm and severe; no one was too humble to be overlooked, no one too exalted to be screened from merited censure; dispensing equal justice, he spared the delinquencies of neither prince nor peasant. One of the Irish princes asked him, whether he thought he should be saved? "You have little chance of that," replied the faithful monitor, "unless you redeem the errors of the past, and unless your repentance be speedy and sincere." His address to King Aydan, upon his installation, was remarkable for its boldness, no less than for its warmth; and often, at the peril of his life he hesitated not to adopt the strictest measures against the reprobate and irreclaimable, who had resisted all his importunities and admonitions.

While the injunction to "do good and to communicate," was such a visible trait in Columba's character, he seemed no less desirous of having "holiness unto the Lord" legibly inscribed upon all his actions. He seemed to have a lively sense of the divine presence ever upon his heart. Upon every purpose and proceeding, even of lightest moment, he implored a blessing—for every benefit he poured forth the language of gratitude and praise. The following quotations from the work of a pious biographer of Columba, deserves attention:—"It was the custom of Columba," says Dr Smith, "to remark how and when God answered his prayers; and failed not, on such occasions, to acknowledge his goodness with praise and thanksgiving. Sometimes, too, he would call his friends to join him, especially if they had joined in his request, saying, 'God, my brethren, hath heard the voice of our supplications at such a time, and it becomes us now to render to him our united thanks.'" "It is still customary," continues

Dr Smith, "for persons in distress to ask the prayers of the congregation; I never heard a congregation asked by any one, to return thanks for having obtained relief, but ONCE."

In his conversation, Columba was ever anxious to edify and instruct—to awaken and interest the careless—to edify and strengthen the believer—to comfort and console the downcast. In all his purposes, he trusted to heaven for the event: "When do you propose sailing?" inquired the Druid Broichean, at Columba; "On the third day hence," replied he, "if it be the will of God, and I be then alive." "You cannot," answered the Druid, "for I will raise contrary winds, and spread over you mists and darkness." "The wind is in the hollow of His hand," responded the holy man, "and every motion of mine is undertaken in his name, and guided by his directions." There are, indeed, instances on record, of a closeness of communion with God, and of special interpositions of divine favour vouchsafed to him, which it would be hardihood to doubt, and perhaps credulity to believe.

No wonder, then, that "the pleasure of the Lord prospered in such hands," and that though his early preaching was only as a handful of corn on the tops of the mountains, the fruit thereof was, in the end, made to shake like Lebanon." No wonder that a people, incessantly plied by the pure doctrines of the Christian faith, from the lips of such an upright and godly man, should at last be induced to "bring forth their idols whom they had long worshipped, and to cast them to the moles and to the bats:" and no wonder that Columba, devoted as his heart was to the service of his God and Redeemer, should see the seed at last shoot forth, which he had sown with such care, which he had watered with so many prayers, and whose progress he had watched with such tender solicitude; fulfilling the words of the Psalmist, "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."

Unauspicious as the first beginnings of this great missionary enterprise had been, Columba had not laboured long in Scotland, before the framework of superstition, beginning gradually to give way, at last yielded completely to his active and persevering assaults,—the idol was shaken on his throne,—his degraded votaries were roused to a longing for emancipation from their spiritual thralldom,—and Columba led them forth to a sacred warfare, soon to terminate "in a glorious victory, and a still more glorious peace."

Pictland cast off the yoke of Paganism, and professed the doctrines of the Cross; but Columba's labours had not been confined to that district, nor was his success limited by the boundaries of the Pictish territories. His friendship was courted, and his visits welcomed, by all the neighbouring princes; so that there was perhaps no district in Scotland, or its islands, which had not been visited either by himself in person, or by some of his Missionaries. Monasteries founded, endowed, and regulated by him, existed throughout the whole country. Dunkeld, Abernethy, St. Andrews, Abercorn, Govan on the Clyde, and many other religious establishments, both on the Mainland and the Western Islands of Scotland, were instituted and managed by him; and nothing can give us a higher idea of the address, activity, and comprehensiveness of mind with which this great man was gifted, than the fact of his maintaining discipline and order in the numerous and widely scattered monasteries which he had erected, and which some of his biographers have estimated at three hundred. The fame of Columba was not, however, confined within the narrow barriers of Britain and Ireland, but was widely diffused over all the continent of Europe. His biographer Adomnan observes, that "though Columba lived in a remote island of the British ocean, yet God had done him the honour to make his name renowned, not only through all Britain and Ireland, but throughout Spain, France, and Italy, and particularly in Rome, the greatest city in the world. Thus," continues he, "God honoureth those who honour him; for which his holy name be praised."

The establishment of Iona was the well-spring, whence flowed all this flood of Gospel light and civilization which had thus swept over Scotland; but, as we intend, at some future period, to return to the consideration of the history and character of the Culdee Churches, it is unnecessary to enter here into any minute examination of their peculiar views and habits. Columba is supposed to have been the founder of the order, and he certainly it was, who matured their system of discipline and doctrine.

The complexion of the Culdee establishments, bore a closer resemblance to seminaries of learning than to the monastic institutions of a later day, whatever might be their relish for the quiet and indolent seclusion of monachism. There were two leading objects which rendered it with them impracticable; for while they devoted themselves with all earnestness to the wide diffusion of the Gospel, they considered the training of the young a duty scarcely less imperative, in order that "the Lord might have a seed to serve him, who should be accounted to him for a generation, and declare his righteousness unto a people that were yet unborn."

Columba himself directed his special attention to the cause of education; and he was particularly observant in examining the characters, and habits, and talents, of such as aspired to the sacred profession. "He would even inquire, if the mother, who had the first moulding of the soul in the cradle, was herself religious and holy." From an early age, he had them reared under his own eye, and under his own training, and it was only after a protracted and severe probation, that he judged them fitted for being sent forth as accredited ambassadors of Christ Jesus.

The course of Culdee education seems to have been by no means confined to the study of theology; but to have embraced a wide and varied field, comprising law, medicine, history, and general literature: and while Columba was careful that his disciples should be well instructed in all that tended to render their office beneficial and respectable, he was equally zealous in impressing upon his presbyters, the necessity of strict discipline, and indefatigable exertion, exhorting and stimulating them to activity—watching over them and praying for their success.

The theological views of Columba and his disciples, seem to have been strictly scriptural. They had resisted the tyranny, and withstood the errors of the Church of Rome. The Venerable Bede, in his account of their views and character, observes, that "they would receive those things only, which are contained in the writings of the prophets, evangelists, and apostles, diligently observing the works of piety and charity;" and the only element which he considered as wanting to render their system perfect, was a full conformity to all the rites of the Church of Rome.

The internal discipline of Iona was rigid; but there was no rule enacted, to which Columba himself did not shew to his disciples an example of unswerving adherence. Strict, therefore, as he was in the exercise of discipline, there was nothing of severity or harshness in his system; nay, love and kindness were the prominent features in his dealings towards his brethren, and all his addresses were couched in terms of endearment, so that while they admired and revered his virtues, they no less loved his person, and delighted in his society; "there is something," said one of the oldest of them, "which makes me so happy and glad, that even when I am bearing this burden, I do not perceive the weight of it."

His life of usefulness was now drawing to a close. One day, two of his attendants remarked his face lighten up with unusual joy, and again suddenly change into an expression of deep dejection; after much entreaty, he reluctantly explained to them the cause. "Thirty years, which I prayed God to give me in Britain, are now expired, and I have much longed, and prayed, and hoped, that at the close of them I should obtain my dismissal, and be called to my everlasting home with God; just now I was above measure glad, on seeing the descent of the holy angels to conduct my spirit. But, on a sudden, they are stopped at yonder rock; for the united prayers of the Churches, to spare my life a few years longer, have prevailed over my most earnest requests. Four years more I must remain on earth; and then, without sickness or pain, this frame shall be dissolved, and I enter into the joy of my Lord."

But old though he was, and broken down by years and labour, his exertions slackened not, and he daily saw the seed that he had sown bringing forth more abundant fruits. Scotland lay before him, like a rich garden, well watered by his own hand; his monastery was the chief seminary of learning, at the time, perhaps in Europe—the nursery from whence hundreds of devoted servants of God issued forth over all the continent, so that "all saints whose origin could not afterwards be traced, were supposed to have come from Ireland or Scotland." Of him, in truth, it might be said, that the Lord smiled upon his labours.

As his end drew nigh, he prepared the minds of his followers for the melancholy event. The day on which he died, was the Sabbath of the Lord; and he gave tokens of the joy he felt in the prospect of his departure, saying to his servant, Dermot, "This day, in the Sacred Volume, is called the Sabbath, that is, rest, and will be indeed a Sabbath to me, for it is to me the last day of this toilsome life, the day on which I am to rest from all my labour and trouble, for on this sacred night of the Lord, at the midnight hour, I go the way of my fathers." He afterwards ascended an eminence above the monastery, and "implored a blessing upon the ground and its inhabitants; adding that it would go well with them while they feared God." From thence he retired into his closet, and occupied himself in transcribing the thirty-fourth Psalm. When he came to that passage in the tenth verse,—“They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing,” he said, “Here I have come to the end of a page, and to a very proper part for me to stop, for the following words (Psalm xxxiv. 11.) will better suit my successor than me.” To Dermot, his attendant, he then committed his last charge to his disciples. “My dying charge to you, my dear children, is, that you live in peace, and sincerely love one another. And if you do this, as becometh saints, the God who comforts and upholds the good, will help you; and I, now that I am going to dwell with him, will request that you may have both a sufficient supply of the necessaries of the present transitory life, and a share in that everlasting bliss which he has prepared for those who observe his holy laws.”

In the early ages, it was the general practice to retire at midnight into the Church for prayer. In conformity to this practice, he went to Church, and arriving there before any of his brethren, knelt down to pray. When they reached the Church, they found him on his knees. The smile of joy had not vanished from his countenance, but his spirit was on the wing for its eternal habitation. And thus, on the 9th of June 597, in the 77th year of his age, died Columba, the Apostle of the Highlands, regretted on earth, but ripe for glory. “Even the place of his residence was considered as peculiarly holy, and to sleep in its dust became, for ages, an object of ambition to kings and princes;” and over its timeworn walls, there still reposes an air of serene solemnity; and who that visits its hallowed ruins, or reads the history of its founder, can hesitate to accord in the sentiment of the English sage,—“That man is little to be envied, whose patriotism would not glow on the plains of Marathon; or whose piety would not grow warmer amid the ruins of Iona!”

CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY.

No. IX.

ON THE COMPARATIVE PROGRESS OF SCIENCE, RELIGION, AND MORALS.

Minister of Monimail.

WHEN we turn our attention to the progress of science, and more especially when we consider its practical applications, we find a principle of progressive increase exhibited, which leads us to hope for the most gratifying results. Man seems, in the early periods of his history, to have had but a limited knowledge of the world around him, and of the means by which its treasures may be made subservient to his wants; but, by degrees, he has become acquainted with the elements of nature, and is daily extending his mastery over them. While, however, we look to the past with thankfulness, and to the future with hope, we must beware of expecting too much. We must neither allow enthusiasm for a favourite pursuit to exaggerate its advantages, nor forget that science has its appropriate province, beyond which it ought not to go.

When inquiry is made into the means by which we may most effectually curb the unruly passions of man, and lead him to pursue those objects which promote at once his own comfort, and the prosperity of the community with which he is connected, we find many so dazzled by the brilliant success of philosophical research, that they are led to attribute to it a power of reforming and elevating society, which it never can claim. They speak of its ennobling effects on the mind, they shew how it strengthens the intellect, by a rich supply of materials for study, and how it improves the heart, by raising it above the grovelling pleasures of sense; they point to the amazing progress that it has made, and, having demonstrated that “knowledge is power,” imagine they have, at the same time, proved it to be virtue and peace. They fondly fancy, that there is in the human mind, and in human society, a principle of improvement, which only needs to be developed, in order to secure universal bliss; while Christianity is kept out of view, or treated as a matter in which they have little concern.

Some again, resting on the same foundation, pursue a more daring plan; and, not contented with extolling the advantages to be derived from their own discoveries and schemes, treat the efforts of others with contempt, make the teachers of religion the objects of their scorn, and cast aside the doctrines of Scripture itself.

Is there, then, as some affirm, and as many seem to think, any principle in man, or in society, that tends to progressive advancement in morality and good order, without the aid of revelation? or, is there any hope, that, by the diffusion of human science, the character of our race may be elevated, without the Gospel being made at the same time more widely known? When we lay aside mere conjecture, and appeal to history and reason, what is the answer that they give? They tell us, that the highest perfection in the arts of life may be united to ignorance of God, to dissolute morals, and disquiet of mind. Nor need we be surprised to find this the case; for while every feeling of the natural man urges him on in the acquisition of human learning, “the carnal mind is enmity against God.” The intellectual powers find delightful employment in the pursuit of useful knowledge, avarice looks to it as the way to wealth, ambition regards it as essential to the attainment of power, and vanity knows that it is the pathway to fame. Even the animal appetites find it conducive to their gratification; it smooths the couch of indolence, and spreads with delicacies the table of luxury. When so many feelings combine to urge him on, we need not be surprised that man makes progress in science and art. If no political revolution occur, to render life and property uncertain, he goes on gradually extending his knowledge of nature, and perfecting his contrivances; nor can we assign any limit to his advance, if the fruits of his inventive industry be but secure. But the case is widely different with respect to religion and morals. So far from there being here any natural tendency to progression, there is a tendency of an altogether opposite kind. Unless a direct revelation from heaven be given, and unless means be taken to preserve the knowledge which that revelation discloses, man have ever been found to retrograde in the knowledge of God and of duty. And the reason is obvious; though there be doubtless in religion much to delight the mind, and to fill the heart with joy, there is also much that is opposed to the depraved feelings of our fallen nature; so that, in the words of one who knew both the heart and the history of man, "the things of God are foolishness" to the unconverted; and even when they have acquired some understanding of the divine perfections, it is speedily lost, for "they like not to retain God in their knowledge."

In putting these statements to the test, we shall trace the history of those nations among whom civilization and the arts of life have made the greatest progress, and mark their condition with respect to morality and religion. Let us begin at home. In this country we find science flourishing, and making daily advances; for here we have secured to us whatever invention or industry may procure, while knowledge leads to honour and reward, and many advantages are afforded us in its pursuit. Here, too, we find enlightened ideas with regard to the nature of God and of duty; for the Gospel is widely diffused among us, and means are employed for making its doctrines known. And so long as these circumstances continue, so long may we hope, by the blessing of the Lord, to see human learning and Christian doctrine flourish together, and communicate reciprocal advantage.

In other parts of Europe, we find the case considerably different. In Paris, for example, while art and philosophy are successfully cultivated, the Bible is in a great measure neglected, and, as a natural consequence, morals are depraved. The appalling number of suicides, assassinations, and illegitimate births, (for more than a third of the children born in Paris are illegitimate,) afford a melancholy proof of this being the case. Nay, some calculations have lately proved, that in those parts of France where education has made the greatest progress, crime is most abundant, and in those districts where there is least education crimes are more rare.

Turning to those countries where the Bible is not known, we find, that over a vast portion of the globe, man is sunk in utter barbarism, destitute alike of true religion, and of external civilization. This fact naturally excites the inquiry, why is man, in so many different lands, under such a vast variety of circumstances, and through so many ages, unenlightened and unimproved, if he have, as is alleged, an inherent principle of progression within him? But even in those countries where the arts of life are most flourishing, morality and enlightened religion are unknown. In India, the learned castes have made considerable progress in astronomical observations, and evince great subtlety in reasoning—the manufacturing classes have attained to great proficiency in many departments—but the whole nation is sunk in the most brutish and abominable idolatry, and the standard of morals is exceedingly low. We cannot trace the origin of their peculiar superstitions—we only know that they have remained for ages unchanged. Sir W. Jones, in his Asiatic Researches, shews the similarity that exists between the idols of India and the false deities of ancient Greece; and the fact of the Hindoos that accompanied the British army to Egypt, falling down and worshipping the statues erected by the Pharaohs of old, affords abundant proof, that the lapse of ages has effected no improvement on their worship or their creed.

In China, many useful arts are prosecuted with success, and the people are characterised by intelligent industry; yet the prevailing religion is a grovelling idolatry. In tracing the early history of this interesting country, we read of various important inventions being either discovered or introduced—we are enabled to mark the progressive advancement of the people, from a half savage condition to one of comparative refinement, (for living in security they had leisure to cultivate the arts of life;) but the farther back we go, the more rational do we find their theological views, and it is only in comparatively recent times that the present degraded forms of worship have been introduced. In this respect they have gradually been going back; for no inspired record has been granted them, nor Gospel ordinance to point the path to God.

In Mexico and Peru, when conquered by the Spaniards, civilization had made some progress, because the government had been for some time permanent; but their religion was gross and bloody, and if any advances were made in knowledge or practical duty, it was owing to the instructions of two foreigners, who, arriving in the country, gave themselves out as the children of the sun, and taught the ignorant natives a more rational form of worship than that of their besotted fathers.

In former times, there is reason to believe, that many ingenious arts were cultivated with success by different nations; but we have very imperfect means of ascertaining the nature and history of their religious opinions. The Babylonians were a rich and mighty people. "Babylonish garments" are spoken of in the book of Joshua, in such a manner as to induce the belief that manufactures even then flourished among them. We read of their astrologers, soothsayers, and wise men; the embassy they sent to Hesekiah, to inquire into the cause of the going back of the sun, shews the interest they took in astronomical observations; and yet we know that they worshipped idols, (Dan. v. 4,) and were ignorant of the character of God, (Dan. iii. 15.)

The Tyrians, or Phœnicians, and their colony the Carthaginians, were rich, skilful, and enterprising. They were early acquainted with letters, had all the advantages that wealth and commerce confer, and, from their intercourse with the Jews, had full opportunity of knowing the nature and worship of Jehovah; but they feared him not. The prophets denounce woes on them, because of their transgressions; and our Lord ranks them among the nations proverbial for wickedness, (Luke x. 13.)

The Egyptians have left abundant proofs of their skill and power, in their stupendous pyramids, statues, temples, and public works; but they did not merely bow down to stocks and stones, they adored birds, and beasts, and creeping things; and their morality was most corrupt. We have no intelligible trace of their early history, excepting some few intimations in the books of Moses; but these seem to indicate a gradual decline in things connected with the soul, while there was an advance in the arts of life. When Abraham went down into Egypt, the hospitable and generous conduct of Pharaoh contrasts favourably with that of the patriarch; at this time there is nothing said about the "learning of the Egyptians," but, on the contrary, we are led to believe that their manners were simple, and their arts but few. On the going down of Jacob and his children, we find mention made of chariots, and princes, and cities, and pomp, but are led to conclude, (Gen. xlv. 34.) that the worship of animals had been begun. In the time of Moses we are told of their "learning," and "magicians," and "fenced cities;" but, at the same time, of their tyranny, cruelty, "abominations," and "hardness of heart."

In Greece and Rome, literature, philosophy, and every elegant and useful art, arrived at a far greater perfection than any other heathen country has ever exhibited, but their superstition was gross in the extreme. The deities whom they worshipped were monsters of licentiousness and cruelty, their rites were indecent, and morality, (as we understand the term,) was almost unknown. The speculations of the philosophers served to amuse the leisure of the learned, but had no effect on the people at large. The sensual orgies of Venus and Bacchus, and the bloody spectacles of the amphitheatre, where the citizens of Rome assembled to feast their eyes with the sight of thousands of their fellow-creatures torn to pieces by beasts of prey, continued with undiminished nay, with increasing brutality, till the progress of Christianity checked their career. Here we find nothing like a progressive improvement of the human race, in knowledge of God or of morals. Riches, and science, and art, so far from purifying the mind or ennobling the affections, only served to debase them both.

The apostle, moreover, in speaking of the Greeks and Romans, does not merely say that they were "filled with all unrighteousness," and that "it is a shame even to speak of the things which were done of them in secret," an accusation which the writings of their own authors, Juvenal, Persius, &c., abundantly prove; but he tells us that they were given up to a reprobate mind, because "they did not like to retain God in their knowledge;" because they had not only failed to discover the character of God, but had lost the knowledge which they once possessed. The reader will perhaps bear with us, while we adduce a few observations, tending to confirm the apostle's assertion. The gross superstition that prevailed in Greece and Rome, at the time when the apostle wrote, was not the original religion of the people, but a modification of the Egyptian rites, which had superseded the comparatively pure and rational worship of the early settlers. Herodotus (B. 2.) says, "They had formerly sacrificed and prayed to gods in general, as I was informed at Dodona, without attributing either name or surname to any deity, which, in those times, they had never heard; but they called them gods, because they disposed and governed all actions and concerns. After a long time, the names of the other gods were brought among them from Egypt." Again, "The daughters of Danaus brought those ceremonies from Egypt, and instructed the Pelasgian women in the use of them." The Pelasgi afterwards mingled with the original settlers, and communicated to them their creed. Homer, in the Iliad (16. 233.) confirms, in some degree, the account given by Herodotus, terming Jupiter, "Pelasgian Jove dwelling afar." The author of the treatise, "On the World," ascribed to Aristotle, says, (c. 6 and 7.) "It is a tradition received of old, among all men, that God is the creator and preserver of all things, and that nothing in nature is sufficient to its own existence, without his superintending protection. Hence, some of the ancients have held that all things are full of gods, obvious to sight, to hearing, and to all the senses; an opinion consonant enough to the power, but not to the nature of the Deity. God, being one, has thus received many names, according to the variety of effects of which he is the cause." Several other writers give a similar testimony. "One God," says Plato, "it was reported, once governed the universe, but a great change, infinitely to the worse, having taken place in the nature of man, the command devolved upon Jupiter, with many inferior deities under him." In Rome, before the introduction of the Grecian mythology, we find a deity, named Janus, worshipped, who seems, at that time, to have been regarded as the chief, if not the only God. He was styled, emphatically, The father, the origin, and founder of all things, and his name was invoked before any other God. His titles are thus given by Sulpitius: "Father Janus, all-seeing Janus, two headed, two formed god, sagacious planter of all things, beginning of the gods." In later times he was represented as having two faces, to denote his knowledge of the past and of the future; but by the laws of Numa, the first legislator among the Romans, it was forbidden to worship God by images.

These brief intimations respecting the early religion of Europe, receive some additional light from an examination of the names given to the Supreme Deity. In Latin he was called Jove, or Jupiter, that is Jove Father, the origin of which is easily traced to the Hebrew Jehovah, the Latin word being pronounced Yowé, and the Hebrew Yowa, or Yehowa. Among the Greeks the name Iao was considered as denoting the noblest attribute of the deity, though they do not seem to have comprehended what that attribute was. Macrobius, (Saturnal. i. 18.) quotes an old oracle of Apollo, which, after affirming that all the gods were merely different names for the one only God, says, "Understand that Iao is the greatest god of all." The word Iao is very nearly the closest approximation to the Hebrew Yowa, that the Grecian pronunciation could make. This title, we may observe, seems to have spread to the farthest extremity of the Asiatic continent. The Chou King, which is considered to be the most authentic of all the Chinese books, begins the history of the country with an emperor named Yao, whom it represents as having let loose the waters, in the following terms: "Having raised himself to heaven, Yao bathed the feet even of the highest mountains, covered the less elevated hills, and rendered the plains impassable," (Cuvier's Theory of the Earth, § 32.) Plutarch tells us that the oracle of Delphi, the most celebrated in Greece, had inscribed on its portal the letter E, which was considered as referring to the attributes or worship of the god, but very different opinions prevailed, with respect to the meaning which this singular inscription was intended to convey. It seems to be merely the old form of the verb E I, As is; and if so, is a literal translation of the word Jehovah. To this god, the great but unknown Iao, whose name was revered, but whose attributes were not understood, the apostle seems to have alluded, when he said that he had seen an altar with the inscription, "To the unknown God," and declared him to be the God whom he preached. He does not speak of an unknown God, but of that unknown, mysterious, and dreaded deity, whose symbol was E, and whose name was Iao.

When we thus examine into the titles given to the Supreme God, and into the traditions preserved respecting him, we are led to form a high idea of the ancient religion of Greece, and to conclude that it had been, in some way or another, derived from the Jews. Its simplicity and truth form a striking contrast to the mass of error which formed the popular creed, when learning and science were in the zenith of their glory; and well may Plato speak of a "change infinitely to the worse."

We have now gone over all the nations that have been celebrated for literature, philosophy, or art, either in ancient or modern times; and, if we except those among whom the Bible is found, so far from discovering any trace of progressive movement in knowledge of God, or practice of morality, we see a constant tendency to deterioration, while a striking contrast is found in the history of the Jews, who, though a poor despised race, and comparatively ignorant of literature and arts, retained a rational worship and enlightened views, because a revelation had been given them, and prophets sent to enforce it.

Let us then prize the privileges we possess, and whatever be the pretensions of those who seek to promote morality without religion, let us feel assured that the corrupt stem of unsanctified learning can never be made to bear the fruits of righteousness; they will only grow upon the Tree of Life. If men are not prevented from crime, by the constraining motives of the fear of the Lord, and love of the Saviour, by the hope of heaven, or the dread of damnation, their headlong passions will not be quelled by any argument that man can offer. We may as soon expect that a silken thread will bind the demoniac, who "brake in pieces the fetters, and plucked asunder the bands," or that the gossamer's web will confine the raging tiger, as that human means will subdue the man who defies his God.

As for those who separate the moral precepts of the Gospel from the doctrines on which they are founded, that they may combine them with their vain and infidel conjectures, they do but compass their own confusion. They steal gold from the treasury of God, and make it bear the counterfeit impression of man, but the sacrilegious theft will yet cover them with shame. They take fire from the altar of heaven, to burn incense to their vanity, but the flame they kindle will ere long consume them. They strive to pull down the glorious fabric of Gospel truth, to supply them with materials for erecting a temple to their pride, but their edifice will speedily fall; the day of retribution is at hand, and the Dagon of their idolatry will lie broken to pieces before the ark of the Lord.

THE UNION BETWEEN CHRIST AND BELIEVERS:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. GRAHAM MITCHELL, A.M.,

"For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God."—COL. iii. 3.

THE Divine Word, who was in the beginning with God, though possessed of all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, has been pleased to make known to us only such truths as are necessary to be believed, without satisfying idle curiosity with reasons. This principle is observable in the kingdom of nature, as well as in the kingdom of grace. Throughout the realms of nature, every one must admit that there are innumerable things certain and true, which lie quite beyond the reach of his rational powers. Were we to believe in such things only as we could fully understand, we would believe almost nothing; for certain it is, what has been long since remarked, that "man, with all his wisdom, is but darkly wise."

Shall it, therefore, be wondered at that we cannot fathom the nature of the truths of the infinite God,—that we cannot tell how this unseen Being has existed from all eternity,—how he is in heaven, and yet about our path, and about our bed, compassing our downsitings and uprisings? And, in like manner, the nature of the union between Christ and believers is equally mysterious, though the fact itself, that there is such an union, cannot be doubted by any who carefully read the Book of Life, the only golden key which opens up the secrets of the throne of God; and to remain ignorant of the fact, therefore, because the nature of the subject, in all its length and breadth, surpasses the limits of the human faculties, is as foolish as it would be to hear a blind man denying the reality of colours, merely because he has no just idea of them; and this spiritual blindness to the relation between the Saviour and his people, can only be accounted for upon the principle, that the "natural man discerneth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." What, then, though the principle of the spiritual life be now hid; just, as in spring, the grain of corn is hid in the ground, which will at length rise, and ripen, and wave in luxuriant beauty at the appointed harvest; for "when He who is your life shall appear, ye also shall appear with him in glory," as one with himself, and the fruit of his purchase. Looking for that wisdom which cometh from above, and praying for that aid which is promised, I shall now, first, invite your attention to the fact, that there is a vital union between Christ and his genuine followers; then point out some accompaniments of this union wherever it truly exists; and, finally, consider the peculiar and blessed condition of that man whose life is hid with Christ.

I. Contemplate the fact that there is an union between Christ and his people,—“your life is hid with Christ in God.” These words, which imply a fellowship of the most hallowed kind, were addressed to the Christians at Colosse, a populous city in Asia Minor, whose Church was in a very flourishing state of spiritual health and life. They were, therefore, according to their new profession, already dead to their former all-engrossing sinful interests and pursuits, whilst their spiritual life of grace, and their eternal life of glory, flowed from Christ Jesus, their everlasting springtide, out of whose inexhaustible fulness every believer receives grace upon grace. Risen with Christ, and setting their affections upon him, all the comfort, stability, and activity of believers centre in Jesus. (John x. 28.) He imparts to them streams of living water. (John iv. 10.) By the influences of his Holy Spirit, through a principle of faith, they live by the power of the Redeemer, and for his cause, and the glory of his name, being found in Christ, “not having their own righteousness, but the righteousness which is of God by faith.” Of such genuine disciples it may be truly said, they are dead, and their lives are hid with Christ,—words which appear, at first view, paradoxical, the Christian being thereby represented as both dead and alive at the same time, though, from the purport of the whole of the address, it appears that the meaning evidently is, that the believer is dead unto sin, and unto the law, but alive unto God, through Jesus Christ his Lord. And this spiritual life to which he is restored, consists in an indissoluble union with the Saviour of souls; and though, as to the nature of this union, in its vast tide of splendour and glory, it be termed in Scripture a mystery, yet, because of the limitation and imperfection of their faculties, it is a mystery only unto creatures,—who have been compared, by Newton, to persons going along a coast, occasionally finding some precious gem or jewel, whilst the vast ocean of truth still lies undiscovered. Enough, however, it is surely for us to learn, in the most ample manner, throughout revelation, and upon the testimony of the God of truth, that there is a very intimate and endearing relationship between Christ and the members of his invisible Church, which, according to the confession of our faith, consists of the whole family of believers over the vast extent of the earth. Cheering thought to all Christians, and to each individual Christian! For although the believer cannot now adequately know the love of Christ, in being united to him, and replenished by him out of his fulness, the humblest follower can, at least, adopt the sentiment of inspiration, and experimentally say, Hereby I know that I dwell in him, because he has given me of his Spirit,—his Spirit beareth witness with my spirit,—he sheds abroad his love in my soul,—he fills me with joy and peace in believing,—the day dawns, and the day-star hath begun to arise in my heart.

Faith, then, is the great principle by which the believer lives unto God, and realizes spiritual things, even as the men of the world do by sight realize temporal concerns. And though this union, of which faith is thus the connecting principle, in its utmost latitude, lies beyond the feeble intellect of man, yet the sacred oracles, to aid us in forming some practical conceptions on the subject, represent this union, in condescension to human weakness, by certain visible and tangible objects. Every one familiar with the Bible, will remember many such passages. Comparing this union to the union which takes place between our bodies and the food which nourishes and supports them, our adorable Saviour addressed the Jews in a spiritual sense,—He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him; and as the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, or receiveth me by faith for his spiritual nourishment, shall live by me. The same truth he illustrated to his disciples, by a reference to the beautiful plant the vine, shewing them that they were as closely united unto him, as its branches were united unto the parent stem. (John xv. 1.) The Lord Jesus, being the head and centre of union, and the fountainhead of all vital influences to his people, is farther compared to the head of the human body, between which and the heart, circulation is incessantly carried on, and thence by the nerves, arteries, and veins, through all the members of the human frame, (Eph. iv. 16,) so that “we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones.” (Eph. v. 30.) And this union is likewise compared to the different parts of one magnificent edifice, of which Jesus is the grand corner-stone, “for we are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth up to a holy temple in the Lord: in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit.”

Joined, then, to the Lord by perpetual covenant, each believer can experimentally say, “My beloved is mine, and I am his.” “The Lord is my shepherd, and I shall not want. He leadeth me by the green pastures, and along the still waters.” “Oh how excellent is thy loving-kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings. They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house; thou shalt make them to drink of the river of thy pleasures. For with thee is the fountain of life; and in thy light they shall see light.”

II. I shall proceed to point out some of the accompaniments of this union: It must produce the most important results on the inward man; especially, it will ever be accompanied with a renewal after the divine likeness. The man will be changed into the “same image,” “for if any one hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.” Besides, what communion hath light with darkness? The soul of the believer must be rendered pure, seeing that it is the presence-chamber of the holy Trinity, according to the delightful assurance,—We will come in to him, and make our abode with him. Possessing such an exalted visitant, the believer is rendered as one with the Redeemer, (1 Cor. vi. 17,) not indeed as to essence, but only as to the qualities of the divine nature, by having something of his moral image restored upon our hearts. This may be illustrated by a stamp or a seal, which communicates its own image or impression, while the seal itself remains unchanged. And how important and enduring are the impressions of heavenly grace, the receiving thus an unction or anointing from the Holy One! What views are given of the glory and dignity of the Saviour! So that whilst many see no beauty in him that they should desire him, and trample under foot the blood of the everlasting covenant, the believer beholds a loveliness in objects which others pass by, or tread beneath them, as unworthy of notice. Made a “partaker of the divine nature,” and having escaped the corruptions that are in the world through lust, the scales of ignorance have fallen from his understanding, the leprosy of sin is healed, the fetters of indwelling corruption are broken off, the traces of a divine hand are left for ever on the renewed soul, drawn as with a pen dipt in the ocean of eternal love, being “written, not with ink, but by the Spirit of the living God, not on tables of stone, but on the fleshy tables of the heart.” And the restoration of a creature to fellowship with the Saviour, is a trophy at once the grandest and the most sublime, with which no other achievement in the universe can be compared. The rise and the fall of empires, the giving birth to systems and to worlds, are not once to be named with the recovery of a mind that was lost to God, to happiness, and to life; for this noble piece of divine workmanship shall, through the righteousness of the Redeemer, and the salvation he has wrought out, attain an elevation, a felicity, a moral and undecaying beauty, beyond all material things, and unknown to all the generations of men, fleeting as the shade, and withering as the green herb, but which here once, like us, enjoyed warm and conscious life. "Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath, for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner, but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished."

In consequence of this renewal, productive of such durable benefits, there springs up in the soul love to God in Christ, another valuable accompaniment and evidence of our union. Love is represented as an emblem of God, and the name he bears. (1 John iv. 8.) It is the first command under each dispensation. It is the chain which unites the whole of creation to its Lord. He that dwelleth in love, then, "dwelleth in God, and God in him." Can he fail to love God supremely, when he thinks of the amiability and loveliness of his nature, in connection with numerous, or rather innumerable, undeserved mercies towards him? Surely it is next to an impossibility for any one who is not a stranger to goodness, to read or to hear the description of a character distinguished for justice, benevolence, and truth, and to be the constant receiver of all his kindness, without some feelings of admiration for his person and character. Extend these feelings towards the fountain of goodness, and the Father of mercies. Think, then, how high our admiration, gratitude, and love, should rise, seeing that if we can love a being of finite and imperfect goodness, how much more ought we to love a Being of unbounded loving-kindness, whose love is "from everlasting to everlasting?" What though this benefactor be unseen? though, because of the splendour of his majesty, we cannot behold him "eye to eye?" Yet being assured, upon the strongest evidence, that he is ever present with us to bless us and to do us good, to load us daily with his benefits, this consideration ought to impress and fill our hearts with the most undivided affection. Imagine some generous and unseen philanthropist to transmit, to some one in misery and destitution, a supply for all his present exigencies, to elevate him in his situation in life, to give to him the most valuable possessions the mind can think of, could the heart of the recipient fail to esteem this generous though unseen friend? Can the believer feel less love towards that friend, whose love was stronger than death, and secured to him "all things?" Can he refrain from exclaiming, "Whom having not seen I love, and although I see him not now, yet believing, I rejoice with a joy unspeakable!" The sincerity of his affection he proves by doing the will of God, and consecrating the whole man to his service, which is the most decided test that he is united to the Saviour. He that keepeth his commandments "dwelleth in him," and his deeds are made manifest that they are wrought in God. Herein is his Father glorified, for he bears much fruit. He, by a life and conversation becoming the Gospel, glorifies God in his soul and his body, which are his. "What! know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are God's." Convinced that our bodies, as well as our souls, are included in the mystical union between the Redeemer and his people, an inspired writer emphatically says, "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ?" "I beseech you, by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service;" seeing Christ, by his death, has redeemed the whole man, to purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." He, then, leaning on Jesus, as the beloved of his soul, that keepeth his commandments, and considers the doing of his will as his "meat and drink," "dwelleth in God, and God in him." "But if any man defile this temple of God, him shall God destroy."

III. It now only remains for me to consider the peculiar condition of the man whose life is "hid with Christ in God."

Here, let it be observed that the principle of the spiritual life is now hid. The circumstance of this life being unseen to the bodily eye, cannot, in reason, lead us to question its reality. The human mind is invisible. It is not the outward man which recollects and reasons, which ruminates on the past, and anticipates futurity. It is the intelligent, the invisible, the immortal principle within. It can be discovered only from its acting, yet the principle itself which gives rise to these no one can question. The principle of the spiritual life also, is no less certain, though unseen, and resembles the life of the branches which is hid in the root. Hence, said Jesus, "I am the root, and ye are the branches, and as the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, no more can ye, except ye abide in me." There is here, then, a striking analogy between the natural and the spiritual life, the principle of both being alike unseen, and the existence of both being alike evidenced. There is no room left, then, to those who are strangers to the grace of God in truth, to suppose, for a moment, that the principle of the spiritual life is a mere phantom or a delusion. Besides, they can be no competent judges in a matter of which they, at least, can have no experience. Whereas, the believer, as a vessel of mercy, and an illustrious trophy of redemption, has joys and tranquillity with which no stranger can intermed-

dle. The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him. There is a friend in the heavens who has a heart strung like ours, who is touched with a feeling of our infirmities. He sticketh closer to us than any brother. He is present with us amid all the wounds and sorrows of the heart, which knoweth its own bitterness. He enables us to taste of his love, in every drop of comfort he pours into our lot. He imparts to us resignation in every bereavement and every trial. He fills us with the peace of God which passeth all understanding. He strengthens us with all might in the inner man, and although "without Christ," or severed from him, we can do nothing, "yet, through Christ strengthening us, we can do all things."

Behold, then, the vital principle of the spiritual life demonstrated in the effects it produces. Seeing it brings forth all the fruits of the Spirit, so beautifully enumerated in the Inspired Volume, and which all would do well to weigh and consider; (Gal. v. 22.)—seeing such results, what though the principle of the spiritual life of the believer in Jesus be now hid, He who begins the good work, carries it on and perfects it in the day of Christ. The kingdom of God within you, cometh not with observation. The spiritual temple erected in the inner man, was reared without human observance. It rose to its magnificence without noise or ostentation. Like the temple of Solomon, every thing was made ready before it was brought thither, so that there was neither hammer nor axe, nor any tool of iron heard in the house while it was building. And, in like manner, ye are the temples of the living God, whose Spirit comes to you not in the whirlwind, or the earthquake, or the fire, but in the still small voice. Hence, in solitude, and sometimes in the very depths of poverty, is occasionally to be found the humble and heavenly-minded Christian, who is never "less alone than when alone;" he who, it may be, has learned to hunger as well as to abound; he who has outlived those scenes which gave the world its highest charms, but whose supreme unflinching solace now springs from communion with the Saviour, in receiving out of his fulness, and in every mingled scene, drawing from thence consolations which are neither few nor small. Perhaps the proud man of the world might look to his person and to his home with an eye of contempt. Yet, little does he know that, under yon lowly roof, there resides a king and priest unto God, (Rev. i. 6. ;) that there the angel of the Lord encamps, (Ps. xxxiv. 7. ;) and that over its humble inmate, (Luke xv. 10.,) angels have rejoiced. This flower of grace grows up almost unseen, amid the desert of human life. But, though unknown to the world, he shall be numbered among the jewels which shall grace the Redeemer's crown. Even now, amid all his obscurity, an almighty guardian is with him, with whom no scene is dreary. Graven upon the palms of his hand and precious in his sight, he is cheered by the Scriptures, which are to him the wells of salvation in the wilderness of life. And, in hours when tried not only by want and suffering, but also by spiritual desertions, when all things seem to be conspiring against him, he, lifting up his soul to God, in earnest prayer and supplication, receives "an answer in peace," whilst he hears breathed from the lips of infinite love, "at eventide it shall be light about thee;" I will never "leave thee, I will never forsake thee;" and hope, like the dove sent forth at the deluge, now finds the olive branch amid the waters of his deepest sorrow. "Happy art thou, then, O Israel, a people saved by the Lord!" "Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he shall dwell among them." "Take down thy harp from the willows, in the valley of Achor; there is a door of hope." Even in death the Lord shall be thy shepherd, and the clods of the valley shall "be sweet around thee." Thy body, though resting in the grave, is still united unto Christ, and it will spring from it in beauty, by virtue of that Spirit which now dwells in the heart of believers, and which, we are assured, shall also quicken their mortal bodies, (Rom. v. 11.) Then shall the believer securely hid with Christ, however through life disregarded and unknown, lift up his head with joy, knowing that his redemption draweth nigh. Then, when all things shall be trembling at the presence of the Judge, shall he stand with acceptance before the Son of man. And appearing illustrious as a sun to shine in the "kingdom of his Father," fashioned like unto the Son of God, and "appearing with him in glory," he shall be able to adopt the language spoken by a prophetic voice, "I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was without form and void; and the heavens, and they had no light. I beheld the mountains, and, lo, they trembled, and all the hills moved lightly. I beheld, and, lo, there was no man, and all the birds of the heaven were fled. I beheld, and, lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness, and the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by his fierce anger." (Jer. iv. 23-26.)

INCREASING DEMAND FOR NATIVE TEACHERS IN INDIA.

It was stated in a former article on India, by Dr Bryce, that the educational institution at Calcutta, which was originated by the able and devoted Dr Duff, had assumed a prominence in the eyes of the intelligent natives which was likely to lead to consequences the most important. And the result has been such as must yield sincere gratification to every pious mind. Scholars have been trained in the Assembly's seminary, not to the acquisition exclusively of mere secular knowledge, but to an acquaintance also with the evidences, the doctrines and duties of Christianity. Thus furnished with a liberal education, and, in many instances, imbued with pious principles, they have retired from the school, not into the obscurity of private life, where they might, nevertheless, diffuse a sacred influence among their relatives and friends, but they have themselves become teachers of youth; communicating, each in his own extensive sphere, the holy principles and motives and feelings which he himself has imbibed. By these means the leaven of the Gospel may be spread from family to family, and from district to district, until the whole British territories of India shall, by the blessing of the Spirit, be made to "rejoice and to blossom as the rose."

We have been led insensibly into this train of reflection by the refreshing intelligence contained in a letter from Mr Mackay, one of the General Assembly's Missionaries. It bears date, the 10th April 1836, and we select the following extracts from it as contained in the last Quarterly Report of the General Assembly's India Mission.

"The demand for teachers has increased so rapidly, as to put us to serious inconvenience. We have only four or five of our first class left, and about ten of our second.

"Within the last month, we have sent two young men, who were formerly in our first class, to Rungpore, at salaries of L.36 each. One of them, Mohesh Chunder Roy, a very intelligent young Brahmin, is employed by Mr Shaw, the judge of the district, as private tutor for his children. He is, I believe, truly a Christian at heart; at least he shows every evidence of being so; and will, I trust, eventually be baptized. As he is very poor, and has a family to support, we could not keep him near us, without supporting him,—a measure to be avoided in every practicable case. I have, however, written particularly to Mr Shaw about him; and given him such books as I thought would be of use. Indeed, we give books to all who leave us in similar circumstances, from the Tract Society's grant. He has also promised to correspond regularly with me. The other young man is employed in the same way by a wealthy native gentleman at Rungpore. He is very well fitted for his situation. These are cases of a kind which, we think, will be interesting to you; as proving more distinctly than the mere establishment of schools, that the cause of knowledge is gaining ground among us, and prejudice against Christianity giving way.

"We have sent other two young men from our first class (one of them temporarily) to take the entire charge of a new school at Hooghly, a town about thirty miles farther up the river than Calcutta. It has been established, and is almost entirely supported by natives; and has the countenance of the judge, the civil surgeon, and others of the place. The young men receive salaries of L.72 and L.60 respectively; and though it is not nominally a Christian school, they have introduced our books.

"At this moment we are disposing of, perhaps, the most important application we have ever received. It is from an independent prince, the Raja of Upper Assam, who wishes for a private tutor to his son and heir. He applied to the Governor-General's agent in Assam, who wrote to Mr Trevelyan, and he has applied to us. After considerable difficulty, we have fixed on a fine young man in our second class, who will set out immediately. His influence, if any faith can be given to an experience of five years, will be altogether on the side of Christianity; and who knows whether this may not be the first step towards introducing a mission with the countenance of the Raja, into this most interesting country. The Assamese are not Hindoos. Some of them have lately been converted by the Brahmins, but whole tribes at present have no fixed religion; and as they are a nation of rude, but, on the whole, moral and unprejudiced mountaineers, much may be hoped for from them. We will do all in our power, by correspondence, to give the young teacher the most judicious advice in our power, and we will not forget him at the throne of grace.

"We have sent another boy to Taki, as assistant-teacher, the young man who was there before having died. The school there is now very prosperous. Mr Shiells is universally liked, and has upwards of one hundred scholars. Mr Ewart intends to visit it in a few days.

"A few days ago I had a very interesting letter from a boy lately in our second class. He was obliged to leave the school, and return to his home, in the upper country; but, in his case, the seed was not to be thrown away. At Futteh Pore, he met one of Mr Duff's converts, and was by him persuaded to avow his convictions, and to be baptized. He is now a Christian, and, I hope, a true one. From his letter to me, he seems full of zeal and anxiety to win over his own relations in particular. His care for 'his own household' is to me a very promising sign of his sincerity. It is not what would naturally occur to a hypocrite, who would be more general in his expressions. We commend him to the prayers of the Church, and the keeping of the Lord.

"The inclosed paragraph, though less satisfactory, will no doubt excite attention. I cut it out of the Calcutta Courier. Dwarkeynauth Banerjea was more than two years in our school, which his friends compelled him to leave. I fear the motives of the young men are none of the highest, the chief perhaps being to win a little notoriety; but these things tell on Hinduism more than one might suppose.

"ABANDONMENT OF THE HINDOO RELIGION.

"We, the undersigned Hindoos, make the following declaration of our having renounced Hinduism. Having received a liberal education at Mr Hare's school, and being freed from the prejudices and superstitions of our countrymen, we had long renounced Hinduism, and begun to act according to our principles. This displeased our relations to such a degree, that they began to persecute us. Apprehending some injuries would be committed on our persons, and other dangers, from the rage of bigotry, we have escaped from our houses, and are living at present in a place where we think we are perfectly secure. Perceiving that our relations are still in pursuit of us, with the intention of dragging us home, we beg leave to inform them that we have determined to return no more to their caste; and as we have taken food which is forbidden in Hinduism, and that with men who are called by them Mlechos, we request them to desist from giving trouble either to themselves or to us.

GOPAULCHUNDER MITTER."

"Calcutta, April 4, 1836."

"Five or six of the most promising lads in the school seem now serious in their determination to profess Christianity. Besides seeing some of them almost every night, and having their attendance on Tuesday and Sunday evenings in the native chapel, we have now a meeting on the Saturday evenings for miscellaneous purposes, with all the first and second classes, chiefly to learn what is in their minds. To-morrow (Sunday) we begin a conversational meeting with such as seem best disposed towards religion. What may come of it, God only knows! We have been often deceived, and are almost afraid to hope. But this we can say, that every thing is ready, waiting until the flame come down from on high. O that your prayers may cause it to descend speedily!"

ALL CHRISTIANS ARE NOT ALIKE.

BY THE REV. DUNCAN MACFARLAN,

Minister of Renfrew.

SECTION IV.

DIFFERENT CHRISTIANS HAVE BEEN DIFFERENTLY DEALT WITH.

CHRISTIANS are called at different ages. Some may have been Christians from their very birth, and others have received the truth only in advanced life. Now, respecting the former it is quite clear, that they can have no experience of that change which, to the others, is the most memorable event of life. Moreover, the habits and matured dispositions of the one class have to be unlearned, and others substituted in their place; while those of the other require only to be rendered more and more perfect. And hence the difference usually observable, between such as have been trained in the school of Christ from their earliest years, and such as have been awakened into spiritual life when old in sin. Those of the former class are usually more equable, perhaps less remarkable, but deep and solid in all their attainments; whereas those of the latter are often cast into overwhelming distress, and sometimes discover such a change of conduct as greatly to attract public notice. If these simple facts, which are open to the observation of all, were duly attended to, we would hear less of the alleged extravagance accompanying revivals of religion. The natural period for conversion is in early life; the earlier the more natural. It is the will of God, that the parent of our fallen nature should, by the divine blessing, be also our spiritual parent, he himself being a Christian; and in these circumstances, the world would not witness such scenes as those referred to. But suppose the period of infancy and childhood to pass away, and manhood to become mature in a state of rebellion against God and rejection of the blood of the cross, God would have it, that a change in these circumstances should be noticeable. There is in such cases, usually, the crime of sinning against light. As in the case of the three thousand, there is the felt conviction of having crucified the Lord of Glory, and therefore would God have such like these to witness for him, that others may know their condition. And suppose now, that hundreds in those circumstances were about the same time to be awakened to a sense of their state, is it strange, that they should together feel and together express their feelings? And is it not rather a strong manifestation of divine wisdom? God is thus multiplying his witnesses, and causing them to unite in their testimony, and to express it aloud; and why, but that others in similar circumstances may hear and fear.

Other sources of diversity will be found in the previous habits of individuals. All who are in an unregenerate state, are fearfully guilty in the sight of God; and it would be difficult, if not also presumptuous, to say, what courses of conduct are in God's sight the most criminal. There are, however, diversities of character among transgressors, as well as among the people of God. Some, for example, are so regular in their conduct, as, like the young man in the Gospel, to seem not far from the kingdom of heaven. Others, and especially men of a speculative turn of mind, are unsound in the faith, and known as such. While a third class are known chiefly on account of their outrageous and immoral conduct. Now, suppose three individuals fairly representing these different classes, to be called by divine grace, they will most probably manifest a considerable difference of Christian character. The man of regular and amiable conduct will exhibit so much of the life and power of religion, as to shew that he is a new man, and God will thus give evidence to others that heart religion is something else than mere regularity of conduct. The man of scepticism will probably feel more deeply, and give a more decided testimony to the truth; God thus witnessing, by his Spirit, as an indwelling Spirit, to his own testimony in the Word, and often to those particular truths which the individual before denied. The strong testimony of the Apostle Paul to this effect is strictly in point.—“Straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God. But all that heard him were amazed, and said, Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound unto the chief priests? But Saul increased the more in strength, and confounded the Jews, which dwelt at Damascus, proving that this is very Christ.” The same thing often occurred during the sufferings of the Church, under the pagan emperors. Her ablest defenders were usually pagan philosophers, who had been converted to the Christian faith. During the Reformation, the same was again experienced. Those who most effectually exposed the soul-destroying errors of Popery, and who taught most powerfully the value of the Scriptures, and the preciousness of the blood of Christ, were converted priests. They were thus, in the providence of God, as torches ignited by a divine power, and hung up as beacon lights on the very confines of a kingdom of darkness. Something of the same kind seems to be again coming round in the sister country. And among ourselves they are not wanting, who boldly and efficiently promulgate what they once destroyed. But suppose still farther, that our exemplar of immorality were to be converted, and to become altogether a new man, we would expect to find in his case, more of that direct seal which would call upon all men every where to repent, and of that hating even of the garment spotted by the flesh, which proves the recollection of former sins. The life of a Welsh, a Bunyan, and a Newton, will explain what we mean. And here also we see how it is, that God magnifies the riches of his grace, and raises to himself witnesses of every hue and character, giving evidence to their fellows of the power and mercy of God.

But we have yet remaining one other source of diversity—that arising from the employment of different means in bringing about their conversion, or at least improvement. We hold it to be an unquestionable principle, that no instrument but the revelation of the Word, saves the soul in mature life. We are saved by faith in a finished atonement; and as we can apprehend the atonement only through the revelation of the Word, the Word itself, either read or preached, or somehow communicated, seems to be essential to salvation. “How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard?” Still there are many ways in which this Word may be communicated, or rendered availing. And we are very much disposed to believe, that among such as are providential, affliction will be found to hold a leading place. And yet the kinds of affliction are so various, as to open a very wide field for observation. Luther, for example, appears to have had his mind first directed to its true condition, by an alarming occurrence: “As he was walking in the fields with a friend, he was struck by a thunderbolt, which threw him to the ground and killed his companion,” says one historian. And his personal friend and biographer, Melancthon, gives a somewhat similar account: “The immediate occasion of his commencing that course of life which he judged most adapted to sacred duties, and the promotion of piety, was this, as he himself told me, and as many persons well knew: While he was deeply reflecting on the astonishing instances of the divine vengeance, so great alarm would suddenly affect his whole frame, as almost to frighten him to death. These alarming agitations came upon him, either for the first time, or certainly they were the severest in that year, when he lost an intimate companion, who was killed; but I know not by what accident.” Luther was afterwards led, by many steps, to a full knowledge of the truth; but he was thus probably first awakened out of indifference; and hence part, at least, of the decision of his after conduct. Many in our own country were called, by grace, during seasons of severe persecution. They received the truth while in jeopardy of their lives, and were thus required, in their first acceptance of the Saviour, to forsake all and follow him. And hence, we doubt not, one cause of their great decision and singleness of character in after trials. And cases are, we doubt not, occurring numerously every day, of more common afflictions being so sanctified, and of their leaving behind them special fruits. An instance occurs at this moment. A person, whom the writer knew well, and whose memory he still reveres, had, even in early life, many transient impressions of religion, and always cherished respect for its ordinances. But it was only after advancing towards the decline of life, and being subjected to affliction, that she saw and felt as God afterwards revealed himself. Suffering long under bodily ailments, she gradually lost her relish for the world, and sought more eagerly after other and abiding treasures. "The Afflicted Man's Companion" became very much her companion. And from it, she was led especially to the study of "Boston's Fourfold State," which seemed to open up to her more enlarged views of the divine economy. Other books, and especially the Bible, she also read. But it was with her, as with most in similar circumstances, she fitted but little from book to book, or even from passage to passage. A single volume was usually, for the time, her ordinary library, and the marks which it contained proved her frequent reference to it. One very severe bereavement gave a death-blow to all her remaining earthly affections, and very much wrapt up her entire soul in the contemplation of the realities of eternity. She talked familiarly and frequently of her own end; her companion now was almost exclusively the Bible, or if there were any exception, it was usually in favour of such a book as "Wellwood's Glimpse of Divine Glory." Her sense of sin continued acute, but her entire devotedness enabled her so to live with God, as to live very much in the enjoyment of his reconciled favour. Her prayers, which were often audible, were remarkable for deep feeling, great earnestness, and lengthened wrestling as with a present God. And yet such was her feeling of deficiency in knowledge, as well as in other attainments, that she most eagerly courted the society and instruction of the truly pious, especially such as she knew and felt to be spiritually minded and experienced Christians. This, however, prevented her not from faithfully warning and affectionately urging on all around her the things of eternity. Naturally frank and warm-hearted, she had little difficulty in recommending Christ to others, and scarcely any would impute her zeal to aught else than the strength of her own feelings; apparent as these were in every thing she did. Some who had been grossly irregular, became thus warmly attached to her, and others who were but children, would have left their companions and their play to sit near her, and listen to her affectionate advices. With those whom she knew, she was apt to speak of her own end as approaching; and then of what death is, and what eternity must be, to such as are out of Christ. And having awakened their sympathies, and gained their undivided attention, she would speak, perhaps, of the sufferings of Christ, and quoting particular passages, introduce them to the Scriptures themselves. During most of this time she suffered much, and from complaints the natural effect of which was to depress, and yet her spirits scarcely ever flagged, except when entirely overcome with weakness and pain. Her natural temper was remarkably buoyant, and as her afflictions increased her consolations greatly abounded. At last, she sunk under weakness and exhaustion, blessing and praising free and sovereign grace. Occasionally she was unable at all to speak, and sometimes fainted. But as soon as life seemed a little fanned, her lips whispered anew the praises of redeeming love, or urged, on those near, some solemn and dying charge, to be delivered, perhaps, after her decease. The hour of her departure, however, at last came, and waiting and watching, as she had long been, for the day-break of eternity, its light entered her soul, and they who stood by only observed, when this change had taken place, that her body was all that remained. It is thus, as we think we have sometimes observed, that religious principle, when nursed in the hot-bed of affliction, grows more vigorously, and blossoms more freely, and sooner ripens into heavenly fruit. So true is our Lord's saying, "Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit."

There is still perhaps, some may think, a cause of variety yet remaining,—we mean the diversity of gifts communicated by God. We have no doubt that God does bestow diverse gifts, and different degrees of the same gift on different individuals. This may be expected from the general analogy of all God's works; it may be almost proved from the diversity of miraculous gifts communicated to the early Church, and which were as the visible representations of spiritual endowments; and it may be altogether proved, from the adaptation of promised grace to our varied circumstances, and from the different ends to be accomplished by different individuals. But to attempt to describe the laws by which the sovereign wisdom of God is directed, would be vain, and to separate the special gift from the special character and circumstances, would be as unsound as impracticable. All the specialties of constitution and circumstances form parts of the sovereign act, by which the disposal of divine influence is determined. The original talents, the after acquirements, and the particular situation in society, occupied by Saul of Tarsus, were equally of divine appointment and sovereign disposal, with the communications made to him on his way to Damascus. And in his history, as an apostle, may some of the ends of these preparatory gifts be easily observed. And thus it is with the whole family of God. They are, in a special manner, formed for his glory; all the events of providence which befall them are directed towards the accomplishment of special ends, and the communications of divine grace, with which they are favoured, conspire with these to the same ends. At present, we cannot see the full bearing of all this, and we often err, in ascribing that only to divine grace which applies equally to matters of creation and providence. But a time is coming, or rather eternity is coming,—that great mirror in which all things past and present are seen as new—and then shall we be able to unravel the mysteries of the past. God will then appear as one in all his works, and yet diversified in all his creatures. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

View God in every thing.—Certainly were God the choice of our hearts, our natural use and enjoyment of things would not relish so much with us, nor take us up so much, as the viewing of him in them all. In our affairs and our refreshments, in company and apart, in the beholding of heaven and earth, and all that is round about us, our eye would be most on him whom our soul loveth. What a pity, and what a shame is it, that we who profess to be his children, and even they who truly are so, should so little mind our Father and his greatness and glory, who is continually minding us and our good. It is, indeed, a double standing wonder in the world which he hath made, that God should take so much notice of man, and man should take so little notice of God.—ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON.

True Nobility.—The greatest and truest nobility is to be a servant of the great God. He is nobly descended who is born from above.—DYER.

SACRED POETRY.

THE MISSIONARY'S DEATH.

WEEP not for the saint that ascends
To partake of the joys of the sky;
Weep not for the seraph that bends
With the worshipping chorus on high.
Weep not for the spirit now crowned
With the garland of martyrdom given,
O weep not for him, he has found
His reward and his refuge in heaven.

But weep for their sorrows, who stand
And lament o'er the dead by his grave,—
Who sigh when they muse on the land
Of their home, far away o'er the wave :—
Who sigh when they think that the strife,
And the toil, and the perils before them,
Must fill up the moments of life,
Till the anguish of death shall come o'er them.

And weep for the nations that dwell
Where the light of the truth never shone,
Where anthems of praise never swell,
And the love of the Lamb is unknown.
O weep!—for the herald that came
To proclaim in their dwelling the story
Of Jesus, and life through his name,
Has been summoned away to his glory.

Weep not for the saint that ascends
To partake of the joys of the sky;
Weep not for the seraph that bends
With the worshipping chorus on high :
But weep for the mourners who stand
By the grave of their brother in sadness ;
And weep for the heathen whose land
Still must wait for the day-spring of gladness.

SACRED STANZAS.

O God! unending praise be thine,
Whose mercy full and free
Invites the weary soul like mine
To seek its rest in thee!

For O! had not eternal love
The generous mandate given,
That hearts, which earth could never fill,
Should lift the void to heaven ;—

These thoughts, like meteor fires that sweep
Athwart the mental sky ;
And these heart-longings, wild and deep,
For joys that cannot die,—

Without an aim, without an end,
Might reason's self have hurl'd
Down from her throne, and made this heart
The ruin of a world!

But thou, all perfect God! wilt be
My strength and portion ever ;
Keep thou my soul, for thine alone
The truth that faileth never!

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Death of a Profligate.—The Rev. Mr Reid thus writes from Van Diemen's Land, concerning a young man aged twenty-seven :—" He had indulged freely in all the fashionable gaieties of the world and if ever a serious or useful thought obtruded on his disordered fancy, it was immediately stifled by some idle debauchery. In this mad career, he quaffed away life to the dregs; and before he arrived at the meridian of manhood, he was verging fast to the brink of eternity. A bacchanalian surfeit in a distant country brought on a fever, which threatened a speedy dissolution of life; and in this state I saw him for the first time for several years; and I am certain I shall never forget the painful feelings I endured throughout this melancholy interview. It is absolutely impossible to give even a faint idea of the horror, the agony, the heart-rending terror, that harrowed up his soul, whenever the thought of death flashed across his mind. He received me with frenzied ardour, in which hope and fear were strongly depicted. 'Alas!' he exclaimed, 'you have come too late; for I am lost—every way lost.' I immediately perceived that life was ebbing fast; and being convinced that nothing short of divine interposition could retard his fate, I endeavoured to console him, by drawing his attention to the mercies of God, and the saving mediation of a gracious Redeemer: to which he replied, with asperity and violence, 'If you have any friendship left for a degraded, self-polluted wretch, torture not his last moments. My life has been spent in iniquity, foolishly spent, because it never yielded one hour of solid happiness. I have lived without thinking of God; and why should he now think of me, unless it be to judge me—to damn me! Oh, God, I shall go distracted!' A fainting-fit intervened, and fortunately broke this mournful chain of reflection: but, alas! sensibility too soon returned; and with it, fresh trains of gloomy despondency. He stared wildly, and roared out, 'I have broken from him, but he is coming again: there—there—death!—Oh, save me! save me!' After nearly an hour passed in this dreadful state, he again became incapable of reflecting; but every moment added to his dejection. 'I have been so bad,' he exclaimed, 'that God can never forgive me. I have blasphemed and dishonoured his holy name an hundred times, when my heart inwardly smote me. I have ridiculed and denied his existence, that my companions in error might think well of me: but I never was sincere in my wickedness.' His mind became so agitated, that all reasoning was lost: he was unable to repent; and the thought of death rent his very soul. In this perturbed state, he languished for about four hours from the time of my first seeing him; till, at length, overwhelmed by despair, a paroxysm of fever closed the tragic scene. The last words he uttered, that I could distinctly hear, were—'God will not, cannot forgive!' The remainder was lost in a murmuring groan."

Vanity of human wisdom.—Simon Tournay affords a memorable and affecting illustration of that Scripture, "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." In 1201, after he had outgone all at Oxford in learning, and had become so eminent at Paris, as to be made the chief doctor of the Sorbonne, he grew so puffed with pride, as to hold Aristotle superior to Moses and Christ, and yet but equal to himself! At last he grew such an idiot, as not to know one letter in a book, or to recollect one thing he had ever done.

THE PUBLIC WORSHIP OF GOD.

By WILLIAM BROWN, ESQ., F.R.S.E.,

Late President of the Royal College of Surgeons.

AVOWED unbelievers in the Christian religion have not often come under my notice, and the following remarks are not intended for them. In neglecting the public worship of God, they act consistently, and their error lies not in this, but in neglecting to take the subject of religion into serious consideration, in shutting their minds against the evidence for Christianity, and in pursuing a line of conduct, the ultimate consequences of which they are afraid to contemplate. But there are many persons who, while they acknowledge themselves to be Christians, yet disrelish and depreciate the public worship of God.

The individuals I refer to form a pretty numerous class. They are found in every grade of society, embracing the man of rank and station, the man of wealth and substance, the scientific inquirer, the respectable professional man, the industrious artisan. They are, or consider themselves to be, Christians, so far as a religion is concerned. They defend the Bible when attacked by infidels, they cultivate the usual moralities of Christian society, and they would feel injured by any insinuation as to the consistency of their character. But they undervalue the ordinances of religion, and make no hesitation in frequently absenting themselves from the house of God. Some of them are but occasionally present, and attempt, awkwardly enough, to excuse themselves for their absence; but the great body of them attend pretty regularly once on the Sabbath, and as regularly spend the other part of the day in some other employment than the public worship of God. One considers that as the Sabbath is a day of rest, he may remain longer in bed than on other days, and hence is not ready in time for the forenoon service. Another, after hearing sermon in the forenoon, takes his regular country walk in the afternoon. A third takes advantage of the day to visit a friend whom he had not seen for some weeks. A fourth thinks the quiet of his house a fit occasion for conducting some intricate scientific experiment. A fifth arranges his office books, which had fallen in arrear from a pressure of business. A sixth spends the afternoon in answering letters which he had sent his clerk, between sermons, to procure at the post-office. Now all these individuals are more or less respectable and estimable members of society, church-going people, supporters of religion in the community; but yet, for one reason or another, they absent themselves from the public worship of God, and consider themselves right in so doing.

The reasons assigned for this line of conduct are various. I shall mention some of those which I have actually heard urged in conversation. The labouring man says, "It may do very well for you rich people to go to church twice, but it is needful for a poor man to have some rest on the Sabbath." The rich man considers church-going habits as of great importance for the working classes, but he thinks such strictness unnecessary in his own station. One individual says, that he can very well learn his duty in half an hour of a forenoon. Another, still supposing that to learn our duty is the only purpose of attending Church, observes, "We hear more than we practise." A third, partly looking around him on the conduct of others, and partly judging by the state of his own mind, says, that those who go to Church twice a day are not better than their neighbours. A young man, possessing a highly intellectual mind, and ardent in the pursuit of knowledge, complains that at Church he hears nothing new, nothing which he cannot learn as well from books, and, therefore, while he goes once a day to please his parents or friends, he spends the rest of the day among his books. One who goes to Church, perhaps merely from habit, without ever thinking of the principles on which habit should be based, says, that his ideas of God's power and goodness are much better excited by a walk among the objects of nature than by sitting in the close and unwholesome atmosphere of a Church. Another individual of a speculating mind, quite absorbed in the pursuit of science, when in Church finds that his attention is not arrested by the preacher, that his thoughts are unconsciously roaming among his favourite studies, and under the guise of avoiding this sin, which he thinks he cannot otherwise help, he forsakes the public worship of God, and makes his occupations entirely worldly. The example of our blessed Saviour I have heard stated as a reason why medical philanthropists should neglect, or but rarely attend on the public exercises of religion; and to have been visiting the sick is considered an unanswerable excuse for absence from Church. Lastly, it has been gravely alleged that there is no commandment in Scripture for going to Church twice a day.

To notice this last argument, in the first place, I at once acknowledge that there is no commandment for going twice to Church; but it must be recollected that neither is there any commandment for going once; and if an express commandment be necessary for sanctioning any line of conduct, we shall be greatly at a loss on various occasions. The Bible does not contain a code of minute rules, but a series of principles which are much better fitted for our guidance, and which we ourselves are to apply to even the smallest concerns of life. The man who has the fear of God in his heart, and who is constrained by the love of Christ, will need no specific commandment as to worshipping God in public as well as in private, on the Sabbath as well as on other days.

The mistake which lies at the bottom of several of these objections is this, that the chief or sole purpose of our attending Church, is to learn our duty. Now, we are in general quick enough in discerning what is our duty, but reluctant to follow it; and one object which the minister has in view is to point out and urge upon our attention the most powerful motives to duty. But it must be recollected, that duty, in the usual meaning of the word, is only one part of religion, which consists in a right state of the opinions and affections, in a right state of the outward actions, and in a right observance of the appointed services of worship. There are many individuals who consider that we have no concern but with the outward performance of moral duties. These individuals are very partially acquainted with their Bibles, a large portion of which refers to the ordinances of worship. It is a great mistake to suppose that the Jewish system alone had reference to the mode and time of worshipping God, and that Christians are emancipated from this state of servitude. The New Testament gives much direction and admonition with reference to worship, both public and private, to preaching and hearing, to praying and singing. An attentive reader of the Scriptures will be very much struck with the truth of this remark, and when he notices the frequency with which the devout worshippers of God are brought under our observation for approval and imitation, he will perceive that this is no unimportant subject.

The public worship of God is appointed for the benefit of his worshippers, that they may receive the instruction, the admonition, the comfort, which they individually need, and that they may have jointly an opportunity of presenting to him the homage of their affections. But it is designed also for the benefit of the world at large. The ordinance of preaching is the grand instrument by which sinners are converted to the love and service of God; and were it abolished, or much limited, a serious obstacle to the propagation of Christianity would be presented. Public preaching is not indeed the only instrument of conversion, and many have been brought to God by reading the Scriptures, by affliction, by the kind instruction of a pious friend. But our Catechism most justly expresses what is ascertained truth on the subject, when it asserts, "The Spirit of God maketh the reading, but especially the preaching, of the Word, an effectual means of convincing and converting sinners, and of building them up in holiness and comfort, through faith, unto salvation." "Let us not, then, forsake the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but let us exhort one another." Let us recollect, that every time we needlessly absent ourselves from public worship, we not only deprive ourselves of a real advantage, but we withhold our public testimony to the honour and the value of God's own ordinance.

It is urged, however, that God may be worshipped in any place; and a great deal is said about the suitableness of the God of universal nature being adored amidst his works of rural scenery. This is just. The shepherd, who is detained on the hills by the care of his fleecy charge, may engage in the duties of divine worship, though far from the society and the dwellings of men. The sailor may spend his Sabbath in exercises of piety, when, in the performance of his necessary duties, he is surrounded only by the world of waters. The mother may worship God while she watches over her sick child. The sick man, whom the hand of God restrains from public worship, may have a "little kirk" in his own chamber. These, and many others whom the providence of God plainly excludes from the sanctuary, may enjoy his presence with them in the several places of their seclusion, and will find the want of public ordinances fully compensated by that gracious presence. But it is to be doubted, whether the man, who purposely takes a rural walk, in preference to the service of the Church—who purposely selects the Saturday for commencing his voyage, when no necessity compels this—who makes Sunday the day for doing all the odd pieces of work which have been left over from the week—it is much to be doubted whether he can rationally expect the blessing of God on his soul. He is a God of order; he has blessed the Sabbath, and sanctified it specially for his worship; he has impressed his seal upon the institution of public worship, as the principal means of grace to the souls of men; and the wilful forsakers of his ordinance have no right to expect his blessing on their voluntary substitutes for his appointed sacrifice.

Christianity is a religion of mercy, and I would not for a moment depreciate or discourage the services paid to the sick on Sunday. The Sabbath was made for man; and our blessed Lord healed the palsied, the dropsical, the blind, on that sacred day. It is lawful to do well on the Sabbath-day; and no Christian physician or surgeon will neglect the sick, who are committed to his care, on any day. But we must recollect, that our Lord never neglected the public worship of the temple or synagogue, and that his cures on the Sabbath were usually performed on those who had come to attend that worship. I conceive that physicians and surgeons are subject to the law of God in this respect as well as other men, and that the dignity, the usefulness, the piety of their professional employments, do not exempt them from the duty, do not exclude them from the privilege of public worship. The care of the sick is a sacred duty, and every thing needful for their recovery must be done: journies must be undertaken, remedies must be prepared, operations must be performed, even study must be pursued, to the extent that each case may require. When engaged in the necessary duties of his calling, the medical man ought to feel that he is rightly employed; and if by such employment he is detained from the public worship, he may well expect that the advantage will be supplied to him. But when unnecessary visits are made, when operations are performed on the Lord's day, which might, without evil, be postponed to the succeeding day, when professional studies are prosecuted without their being specially needed at that time, it should be made a subject of solemn inquiry by the individual who acts so, whether his regard to the worship of God be as lively as it ought to be.

In the commencement of my professional life, while honestly desirous of regularly attending Church, I yet satisfied myself that this was beyond my power, and considered it a subject of regret that my duty called me away from the house of God. I continued in this belief for a considerable time, till meeting with the life of Mr Hey of Leeds, a name in the first rank as a surgical authority, I found it stated that "he rarely missed attending the morning and afternoon service of the Church." This impressed my mind much, and I argued with myself that if he, with his extensive practice, could accomplish this, it must be still more easy for a young man with a limited practice. I resolved, at least, to attempt it; and by a better arrangement of my time, by paying many visits on Saturday, and by leaving only the necessary ones for Sabbath, I generally found myself at liberty to attend divine service both forenoon and afternoon. I have never found reason to alter my practice in this respect, and now, for a number of years, it has more and more approved itself to my best feelings. The call of professional duty has never been neglected by me at any period of the day; but it is only occasionally that I find it interfering with the services of the Church. In stating this, I should be unwilling to cast blame on any of my professional brethren who may act differently; but my own experience is so decisive, that I would respectfully request my younger friends to make the trial. Let them read the life of William Hey, and then act upon the impression which the perusal will produce.

To those who complain of the uninteresting and stale character of the sermons which they hear, and of the little inducement thus held out to them for a more frequent attendance, I would suggest the following considerations: It is indeed true that all ministers are not talented men, and that some do not study to make their instructions of an interesting character to their hearers. But there are few sermons from which we may not derive some instruction, some new view of Scripture, some new argument for the enforcement of duty. Besides, let us consider the motives which should take us to Church: not to hear some novelty, not to learn what is new or original, but to have our memories refreshed with what we have heard before, and to have old truths pressed home upon our consciences. We need to have our holy resolutions strengthened, to receive admonition and reproof for our errors. In the psalms which are sung, and the prayers which are offered up, we do not expect to receive any information, and yet from both these parts of worship the pious mind receives advantage and enjoyment of the richest kind.

When our thoughts wander from the subject of the discourse which we are hearing, it is indeed possible that the minister is to blame, and that he ought to preach with more discrimination and energy; but it is much more probable that the error lies in ourselves. In such a case we should examine very strictly the true state of our thoughts. Have we actually laid aside our worldly pursuits as really as we have shut our shops and offices? Have we repressed thoughts inconsistent with the place and time, whenever they occurred? Have we actually disciplined our minds for the exercise, or have we suffered them without restraint, without effort, to be the sport of every passing imagination? Let us make our attendance on the worship of God more a matter of thought, of serious, earnest purpose. Let us endeavour to bring our minds more into accordance with what is inculcated in Scripture, and exemplified in a variety of instances. "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts! my soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord." "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?"

ANNIE McDONALD;

OR THE LIFE AND EXPERIENCE OF A CHRISTIAN PEASANT.

PART I.

THERE is no situation in which Christianity seems to occupy more completely its own native and proper element than in the cottages of the humble poor. It is, in fact, specially, and in a peculiar sense, the religion which is addressed to them. "To the poor the Gospel is preached;" and as we are taught by our blessed Redeemer, who, while on earth, was the representative and friend of the poor, though its gracious overtures may, in various instances, be accepted by the rich, the highest probability of its meeting with a warm and cheerful welcome is on the side of the poor. Hence it is, that while "not many rich men are called," "God hath chosen the poor to be rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom." Let not those, then, who are destitute of the comforts, and but scantily supplied with even the necessaries of life, murmur or repine, as if God were thereby frowning upon them in indignation and wrath. Not so. That is the richest soil in which the graces of a living and life-giving Christianity can possibly be planted; and watered with the refreshing dews of the Spirit, these graces will spring forth, and bud, and produce a copious harvest of fruits of holiness, to the praise and the glory of God.

To shew the truth of these remarks, we would call the attention of our readers to the brief but interesting history of one who, though she moved during her whole life in an humble and obscure sphere, "unnoticed and unknown," was, nevertheless, distinguished by sincere, unaffected piety, and a close walk with God. In the details of this sketch, we shall avail ourselves throughout, of the memoir published some years ago by the Reverend James Brodie of Monimail.

Annie M'Donald was a native of a remote parish in the Highlands. After her father's death, which happened while she was yet a child, the family, who were left in very destitute circumstances, removed to the parish of Kilmany in Fifeshire. Annie, as soon as she was able, was employed by a farmer in the neighbourhood to herd his cows. This afforded her leisure for reading, and she seems to have improved the opportunity. One day, while perusing a pamphlet containing an account of one Christian Kerr, who died in very early life, Annie's mind was forcibly struck with the narrative. She thought, to use her own language, "What am I! though I were dying this moment, I can give advice to none, I cannot ask so much as a blessing on my food. What am I! Surely I am none of God's chosen." From this period her heart was impressed with the importance of divine things, and feeling that she was deeply ignorant, she gladly availed herself of all the means she could command for attaining a knowledge of the truths of religion. She read, she reflected, she prayed; she conversed with every one who could give her information on those things which now formed her chief delight. For a few years she made rapid progress in spiritual improvement. At length, she became anxious to come forward as a communicant. But here we shall let Annie speak for herself.

"Now time drew on that I was desirous of going to be a communicant; but the thought of my own unworthiness wrought sore upon me. Unbelief ay kept the house, that strong man. Well, I was desirous of being a communicant; and while the others were away seeking the ewes, I took out a book I had in my pocket, 'Doolittle on the Sacrament,' and was reading, and came to these words, 'was there not a crying in the blood of Abel against Cain? how much more in the blood of Christ against thee, Oh unworthy communicant!' So I could not look on the book any more. I thought these words as really spoken to me, as if an angel had spoken them out of the clouds. Then I went on as if I had been dumb and speechless, and never spoke to any body, till a dear mistress I was with saw that I was dull, and she inquired of me what was the matter? And I told her that I was designed to partake of the Lord's table; but that it was impressed upon my mind that I was unworthy, and that I was ruined to all eternity, if I should presume. (Oh it was a sore time to me then.) And so she said, 'Annie, that's not a sign that you should not go to the table of the Lord, but rather that you should go; for that is a temptation from the enemy.' I was so ignorant at that time, that I did not know what the word temptation meant. So she said, 'Our minister is coming on such a day, and I'll acquaint him with your state.' But still that word that I had read kept its place, and such was my poor ignorant state, that I thought if she spoke of it, I would be obliged to go forward to the Lord's Supper, and that if I did, I was ruined for ever. So I went on for days; I bless God to this present, that he kept me in the use of my reason. I was for days in such a state, that if I fell asleep, I would have wakened as if it were in distraction."

In this state of mental distress, Mr Snibert, then minister of Kilmany, conversed with her, but not having been made acquainted with the circumstances of her case, his exhortations failed to dispel the darkness of her mind. At this period, however, she partook of the sacrament, and she seems to have felt some degree of comfort from the ordinance. But her general frame of mind was still pensive. Her faith was restrained by a harassing fear lest the enemy should be encouraging her with false hopes. The mode in which she was delivered from this painful anxiety she thus describes:

"One Sabbath it was my hap to hear Mr Adamson on John v. 29. In this sermon it was said, that the good meant what was done to the glory of God. And I was made to say on hearing of that sermon, the Lord so shined on my spirit, that he made me to sing this song of praise,—I could drop tears of joy yet [still."] (Here her eyes filled, and her countenance beamed with gratitude and joy.)—"Must here be the place, and also the time, I must first begin to taste 'those precious benefits which flow from justification, adoption, and sanctification?' Oh how precious that day! so that I appropriated Mary's prayer, 'My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour.'"

The simple explanation of the fact, that good works performed by the believer in the name of Christ, and from love to him, imperfect though they are in themselves, are, nevertheless, accepted for the sake of the Redeemer—the simple explanation of this truth appears to have operated like a charm upon Annie's mind. Her fears were dispelled; her gratitude was awakened, and she seems to have felt "like a bird escaped from the snare of the fowler." She was poor in this world's goods, but she was now possessed of that "peace which passeth all understanding."

For some years Annie continued at service in different families; and it deserves to be remarked, as forming a striking contrast with the present condition of the great mass of the Scottish people, that in most of them family worship was habitually maintained. When she was twenty-five years of age, she was married to James Christie, a farm-servant, residing in the parish of Kilmany. Her husband appears to have been a man of piety and prudence; and indeed Annie's mind was too strongly imbued with the love of God to permit of her entering into the married state with any other than a Christian. "Be ye not unequally yoked," is a precept of greater importance than too many young people imagine. It affects their interests and happiness both in the present and a future world. Annie knew this; and, therefore, both she and her husband sought to be united to the Redeemer by faith, before they were united to each other in the marriage relation.

Being now provided with a cottage, which, however numble, she could call her own, Annie brought her mother to spend the remainder of her days with her, that she might have the privilege and the pleasure of ministering to her comfort in the decline of life, and of assisting her in preparing for another world. The arguments she employed to induce her aged parent to become a communicant, we give in her own words:—

“ My mother, though a mother and head of a family, had never communicated; and she was very unwilling to do it, and was very hard to be dealt with; and the reason she gave was a very sensible one for an ignorant woman. ‘Lassie,’ says she, ‘I see many vow and draw back, and it is better not to vow than to make vows and not to pay them.’ ‘Mother,’ I said, ‘you were married to a husband, and it was not sufficient to make up your marriage covenant, that he shewed his love to you. Surely you bute (required) to give him some consent of your love, and willingness to accept of him. So in the marriage covenant between Christ and your soul, certainly it is little enough, if he save us from misery, that we accept of him, and give some tokens of our adherence to him. So, as she was backward to it, I made it a petition to the Throne of Grace, that, as a token of grace to me, he would bring her to it. I am not sure if I was right though in doing this. So the Lord was pleased to incline her to comply, and I took it as a token for good. And I came to the minister about her, and asked if he thought proper to admit such as knew nothing but what was told them, and who could not read a word. ‘Oh aye,’ said he, ‘if she is serious, though she has not much understanding.’ He bade me do with her in my way the best I could, and he would do with her the best he could. So I came with her, and he accepted of her, and said he would be happy to hear of her welfare.” The minister referred to was Mr Moodie at Monimail.

About this time Annie lost her second daughter, who died when she was scarcely two years old. She felt the bereavement deeply; and the more so, as the child, even at that early age, gave very pleasing indications of having profited by the plain and simple lessons which her godly parents endeavoured to instil into her mind.

Throughout the remainder of her married life, which, however, was of short duration, this excellent and simple-hearted woman seems to have enjoyed much temporal comfort, as well as spiritual peace. She and her husband walked together in holiness and righteousness, training up their children in “the nurture and admonition of the Lord,” and exhibiting a bright pattern of the many virtues which are found uniformly to prevail in the character and deportment of the humble and pious cottager. The sequel of this narrative, however, we shall reserve for another paper.

No. VIII.

GOD'S TESTIMONY TO GOD'S TRUTHS.

By the Rev. James Esdaile,

Minister of the East Church, Perth.

I HAVE said formerly, that, so far from miracles being incredible, there can be no credible religion without them. What idea could we have had of God, had we seen nothing but the regular course of nature, and the constant and invariable sequence of physical causes and effects? We might, indeed, have recognised beauty, and discerned order, but would we have formed any idea of a self-existent Creator? Had the mind been equal to such a result, it is not likely that the first chapter of Genesis would have stood at the head of the volume of revelation. We might have viewed, with astonishment, the stupendous objects of nature, the glorious sun, the boundless ocean, the regularity and utility of the revolving seasons; but would that have led us to the idea of a presiding, ever-present Deity, entitled to the homage and adoration of his intelligent creatures?

Before any one can answer these questions in the affirmative, he must introduce us to a race of men cut off from communication, and deprived of means of intercourse with a God-believing people; and who have elaborated for themselves a theistic creed, and acknowledged the obligations of religious homage. As it is impossible to pronounce that any race of human beings has ever been found in such circumstances, it will be equally impossible to prove that any people has ever discovered, by their own researches, even the simplest of all religious truths, the existence of a God.

But can we prove the reverse, and demonstrate the impossibility of the mind acquiring an idea of God without immediate revelation? Perhaps we cannot; and I will not attempt it; only I will affirm, that such a discovery never has been made in such circumstances,—and farther, that all the religions on the face of the earth are derived, and not invented; that is, derived from one common source, viz., revelation; and that all that man has had to do with them, is to distort the primitive truth by false comments and unauthorised interpretations.

But to do men justice, they have never pretended to invent a religion. The greatest impostor has had too much sense to suppose that men could be so easily gulled; and, therefore, from Numa to Mahomet, and from Mahomet to Swedenborg, and still more recent pretenders, they have all professed to derive their dogmas, or their dreams, from immediate communication with heaven.

Whatever we may think of the honesty of such pretensions, their policy is obvious: for no man, in the ordinary possession of his senses, could be such a simpleton, as to take any one's bare word for what took place before the foundations of the earth were laid, or what were the purposes of the Creator, or what his determination as to the duration and result of the present state of things. God alone can give information on these points; and, therefore, every impostor pretends to have a revelation of the divine will. These very pretensions shew the necessity of a real revelation, and might, one would have thought, have led a reflecting mind to expect that such a revelation would be given: it was obviously necessary, in the benighted state of the human faculties; and down to the present day, there are so many anxious to know, but unable to investigate, that imposture is still a thriving trade; and if a man needs money, and wants principle, he will find plenty of dupes who will barter ready cash for golden dreams, and for the delusive hope of learning that hitherto undiscovered secret, the road to heaven made easy.

The Roman history, during the whole reign of Paganism, is one continued series of pretended prodigies, and supernatural manifestations: and though the more enlightened saw that they rested on no authority, they nevertheless allowed them to pass unchallenged, under the conviction, that any kind of religion is better than Atheism; which must be the creed, “if creed it can be called which creed has none,” when the idea of supernatural interference is removed from the minds of men.

On what, then, does the evidence of genuine religion rest? Not on assertion, not on conjecture, not on reasoning as to its origin; but on revelation established by testimony, and ordinances appointed at the time the revelation was given, and continued without interruption for a long succession of ages. I dwell not on this argument, but refer the reader to Leslie's "Short Method with the Deists," in which it is stated, with irresistible force, and affords one of the most satisfactory proofs of theological demonstration. At the same time, it is but justice to observe, that Leslie can claim nothing but the merit of methodizing the argument. It was stated, at full length, long before, in one of the most learned theological works in the English language, (if English it can be called, which has almost as much Greek and Latin as English;) I mean Stillington's Origines Sæcæ.

I am aware of a singular anomaly here, viz., that the incommunicable attributes of Deity have been much better understood by uninspired men than his moral perfections. The eternity, the omnipotence, the universality of the divine essence, have been celebrated, in almost as sublime terms, by the heathen poets and philosophers, as by the inspired writers: and Homer and Hesiod, Plato and Aristotle, had lofty conceptions of the abstract metaphysical attributes of Deity, and no doubt in their hearts despised idolatry. May we not suppose, that the apostle had this in view when he declared that the idolaters were without excuse when they degraded the glory of the Divine Majesty by low material resemblances; since the eternal power and godhead of the Most High, that is, his incommunicable attributes, which could not be represented by any image of any created thing, might, nevertheless, be clearly inferred from the order and immensity of the visible creation? (Rom. i. 19-24.) These are conceptions of pure intellect; and they may engage the faculties as completely as the sublime mathematical investigations, which carry the mind into a world of immensity and reality totally unknown to the uninitiated and unlearned.

But what were the views which uninspired men formed of the moral perfections of the Deity, that is, of those qualities which bring him more immediately into contact with their own feelings, and which we might naturally expect would be more distinctly understood? All such anticipations would be miserably disappointed; for, after exalting, in the most magnificent terms, the immensity and uncontrollable might of their gods, they degrade them below the level of the brutes, by ascribing to them the meanest and the vilest passions, and representing them as disgraced by actions which the brutes would shun to practise.

Here, then, where man seems to have the best means of information, inasmuch as he is dealing with qualities which belong to his own nature, we perceive nothing but the most revolting absurdities. This is easily accounted for: he is drawing his own picture; he thinks God is altogether such a one as himself; he describes him as possessing his own attributes, and, having covered him with all the blots and imperfections of his own nature, he falls down to worship this filthy image of himself; thus consecrating his own vices, and covering, with the mantle of religion, what would otherwise be disgusting to the eye, and revolting to every feeling.

When the apostle, therefore, says, that the heathen were without excuse for not knowing God, "because that which might be known of him was manifest in them," or "to them," which is the marginal translation, we are not to suppose, for a moment, that he alludes to the moral perfections of the divine nature: these were not manifest in them; but their very contraries were the natural fruits of the human heart; and every feeling of their minds tended to give distorted views of the moral character and government of God; nevertheless, they were chargeable with insensate, inexcusable blindness, in supposing that the Being who is in all, and over all, who fills immensity with his presence, could be represented by an image made like to corruptible man, or birds, or beasts, or creeping things. In short, the apostle is using the same argument as the prophet Isaiah, when he ridicules, with the most withering sarcasm, the absurdity of supposing, that he who sitteth on the circle of the earth, who spreadeth out the heavens like a curtain, who weigheth the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance, can be aptly represented by a piece of wood, with the residue of which the artificer warms himself and cooks his victuals; the only sensible application of the material in the case in question. (Isa. xl. 18-25; xlv. 9-17.)

But what were the learned and the wise about all this time? What contributions did they make towards a rational creed? What new light did they cast on the being, character, and government of God? Or, were they entirely idle and acquiescent on the subject? They were very far from this: on the contrary, they called into exercise all their knowledge, and all their resources; but the result only was to "darken counsel by words without knowledge," and virtually to expel God from the government of his own world. They did not dare to deny the existence of Jupiter, and his unruly subordinates of Olympus; but they managed to limit and control his power. The poets and philosophers were at one on this subject. In order to ascertain the fate of two hostile heroes, he is obliged to suspend a balance in the heavens to ascertain what the fates had decreed on the subject; a puerility which Milton's classical partialities, or, perhaps, we may say, pedantry, led him to adopt; though he has made a more orthodox use of it; for he represents the Almighty as displaying a balance in the heavens to prevent the rencounter between Gabriel and Satan; to announce, and not to ascertain, the result of the conflict, and to show the latter that he was weighed in the balance and found wanting.

But poets may be partly excused; they scarcely expect to be believed: better things might be looked for from grave and sage philosophers; we shall be disappointed if we extend this expectation to religion. They saw the absurdity of the popular superstitions, and in attempting to fabricate a creed for themselves, they generally landed in what has been called Spinozism, in modern times, from its great apostle Spinoza, who held that the universe is God; a doctrine which abolishes the hopes of immortality, and teaches man, who is born to misery, to look for his reward in the present world.

How, then, are the being, character, and government of God established and confirmed in Scripture? Not by abstract reasoning deduced from metaphysical notions about space and eternity; not by minute investigations into the laws of nature, to prove that they have been devised by an intelligent cause; not by an examination of the works of nature to demonstrate the wisdom of their contrivance, and their adaptation to some specific ends: these are pleasing and interesting subjects of contemplation, and may tend to enlarge the conceptions of the human mind, in regard to the unsearchable wisdom, and overruling providence, and paternal care of the Lord of heaven and earth: and a pious mind may derive as much satisfaction from such speculations, as a man does who reads natural history with the help of plates; he has a picture and a programme to assist his understanding. But there is not a word of such reasoning in Scripture. The magnificent works of God, as well as his minute paternal care, are celebrated not as arguments to establish faith, but as motives to inspire reverence, gratitude, and godly fear. The teaching of the Old Testament Scriptures is not ratiocinative, but dictatorial: and what other mode of teaching could we expect, where the doctrines inculcated, and the duties enjoined, are all enforced by visible manifestations of divine power? Such manifestations superseded all arguments for the being and power of God; and it would have been perfect fatuity had Moses pretended to argue on these subjects, after the appearances which the Israelites witnessed at Mount Sinai, at the Red Sea, and in Egypt. Accordingly, Moses's arguments and remonstrances with the people have merely for their object to recal their attention to what they had seen and heard, to visible mercies, or visible judgments, manifested in the face of all Israel, as the punishments or rewards of certain qualities and actions. This was practical teaching, if any thing ever was; for every doctrine was demonstrated, not to the reason, but to the senses; and their attention was directed, not to what was future and unseen, but to what was obvious to their view, or fresh in their recollection. And if we want an argument to account for the singular fact, that the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection of the body, are not distinctly taught in the writings of Moses, we may find it in this, that these were doctrines of which no absolute demonstration could be given till "He who is the resurrection and the life," should finish his work, and demonstrate his sovereignty, by his own resurrection from the dead; an honour which never could be given to any other, as it was essential to his character as the Son of God. Hence, the apostle, addressing the Jews, says, "We declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again, as it is also written in the second Psalm, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.'"—Acts xiii. 32, 33.

All the doctrines of Scripture, then, are founded on incontrovertible facts; or, we may affirm, that the facts of Scripture form the doctrines of Scripture. I admit that reason might supply some tolerably strong arguments in favour of an overruling Providence, and it might be plausibly maintained, that there must be some presiding intelligent principle to preserve the order of nature, and the life of animated beings. But the talismanic words of fate or necessity might counteract that argument, and it might be maintained that things always were, and always will be, what they now are. What can set aside such arguments but an authentic account of creation? To be sure, this was a work which no man could witness. But if we find a person fixing the date of creation, and the settlement of nations, with the most positive confidence; and if authentic human history leads to a confirmation of all his statements, we have an absolute certainty that he has received his information in an extraordinary way, as it could not be acquired by human teaching. Such we affirm Moses's account of creation to be.

Having got thus far, we might affirm that, as the world could not create itself, neither could it preserve itself in existence; and that an overruling Providence alone could maintain, in harmony and order, the complicated system of the universe. But even with this strong presumptive evidence, the exercise of an overruling Providence has been called in question by some of the wisest among the heathen; and by many who think themselves wise in modern times. The sober-minded, reflecting Quintilian, having lost all his children, declared, that he would never forgive himself, if he did not, so long as he lived, protest against the existence of a wise and beneficent Providence. But read the Scripture history, and there we see the hand of God at every step, in every thing that befel his chosen people. Does Moses ever argue about the existence of Providence? No. He reminds the Israelites of the deliverance at the Red Sea—of the cloud which conducted them by day, and the friendly flame which directed them by night—of the manna which dropt daily from heaven to supply them with food, and the water which flowed from the rock at the touch of his rod, to quench their burning thirst.

They could not but recognise a Providence in the circumstances in which they were placed. They were hemmed in on every side by hostile nations, which had preoccupied all the more fertile territory, and confined them to the most barren parts of a barren land. It was here that God displayed his power by feeding them, and protecting them against their enemies. Yet, even here, they rebelled and sinned more grievously than they ever did, even when placed in the land of promise, when these divine manifestations were withdrawn, and they were compelled to earn their bread with the sweat of their brow; a useful lesson this, to teach us not to regret the withdrawal of supernatural displays and supplies, but to trust in that overruling Providence, whose exercise was manifested to Israel, for the sake of all succeeding generations, and to depend, for our spiritual comfort, on the aids of the Holy Spirit, visibly displayed in the primitive Church, and promised as the Comforter of God's people, till Christ shall come again.

Here, then, we see the mode of teaching under the Old Testament dispensation; it was by facts; and when the Israelites went wrong, they were admonished by the recapitulation of judgments and mercies with which they were familiar, and which the most sceptical could not gainsay. And the same is the case under the New Testament dispensation. To be sure, a much more exalted and spiritual plan was here revealed;—the completion of the atonement typified by the legal sacrifices, the resurrection of the body, and everlasting life, were clearly announced; the whole efforts of the apostles were directed to the establishment of these important truths, and having to engage with adversaries of all characters and descriptions, they were compelled to have recourse to every kind of legitimate reasoning and argument. Still, facts which could not be controverted, lay at the foundation of all their statements. The spiritual administration of the world, was henceforth to be carried on through the influence of the Holy Ghost. Our Lord announced this to his disciples before his passion. They were enjoined not to depart from Jerusalem, till the promise of the Father should come upon them. The promise was fulfilled in the day of Pentecost; the Spirit descended upon them, in the shape of cloven tongues of fire; and the untaught fishermen and artisans of Judea, were forthwith enabled to preach the doctrine of the Cross to people of all kindreds and tongues. Is not this sufficient evidence that the agency of this Spirit is necessary and effectual to reach and to teach every heart, and that God will be as faithful to his promise, to give his Spirit to all who ask it, as he was to fulfil it in the case of the apostles?

The resurrection and a future judgment, are the next great doctrines established by the New Testament dispensation; and, like all the rest, they are illustrated by facts. The heathen had some idea of a judgment to come; indeed, this is necessarily connected with the belief of immortality; for, if the soul is to survive, it would naturally be concluded, that its everlasting condition would be affected by the habits which it had acquired in the present world. This persuasion has been universal among all nations and people who believed in the soul's immortality. They had no idea, however, of the high honour which was to be conferred on the human body, by its resurrection and glorification through a Redeemer. The Jews, indeed, lived under the influence of this persuasion; and it had been the creed of their nation from the earliest periods of their history, in consequence of communications from heaven-inspired prophets.

But the great end of Christ's appearing in the world was to purchase eternal life for all who should believe; and he volunteered the most decisive test of his competency to accomplish the work, for he staked his pretensions, and the whole truth of his doctrine, on his resurrection from the dead; it was by this that he was proved to be the Son of God with power, and by the same event he was proved to be the judge both of the quick and the dead. For the apostle says, that "God hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world, in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained, whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead."—Acts xvii. 31.

How do unbelievers manage to resist all this documentary evidence? They will believe no miracle; they will admit nothing which they cannot understand; then, they may doubt their own existence, for "what a miracle is man to man!" They think the Gospel too wonderful to be true. Rousseau, one of their own fraternity in point of feeling, though greatly superior in point of intellect, declares that he would think it not less wonderful that the Gospel should be false, as it is so far out of the ordinary line of human thought, and human feeling, that he could scarcely conceive it possible that the mind of man could ever have dreamed of such a scheme. We call on them, at present, simply to believe in testimony, or, at least, to examine and refute the testimony of Scripture, if they can. But it would ill become those who believe what they profess to believe, (viz., that the untaught fishermen and peasants of Judea preached in the languages of Greece, Italy, and Asia, converting entire kingdoms to the faith of Christ, merely by their own unaided resources,) to boggle at any miracle, for they believe what is impossible. Here, then, we throw down the gauntlet of defiance, and tell them that we will not charge them with want of faith, but with want of understanding, if they resist the overwhelming evidence of Scripture facts, which constitute the basis of all Scripture doctrines. What would we say of the man who should deny that there ever were such events as the battles of Marathon or Philippi, of Bosworth or Bannockburn, of Trafalgar or Waterloo? Would we say that he wanted faith? No, we would say that he wanted common sense, and was incapable of exercising a rational judgment.

We may apply the same argument to those who would call in question the facts of the Jewish or Christian history; length of time makes no difference, provided the authenticity of the record be admitted. Were a document tumbled into light, professing to give a minute detail of the history and of the civil and religious institutions of the ancient Assyrians and Babylonians, with which we had been till now entirely unacquainted, scepticism would be wisdom, and it would be folly to pay any attention to the alleged facts, till the pretensions of the document itself were discussed and settled. But, when we find a record containing a great variety of writings, the unquestionable productions of authors who lived at the time, and bearing to be the history of the migrations, settlement, and institutions of a people still existing, and though banished from the land of their fathers, still attached, with unconquerable partiality, to the religion and customs given to their ancestors, several thousand years ago; and when we find this record giving the only rational account of the very singular customs and institutions of this peculiar people, when we can trace it up to the remotest antiquity, and demonstrate that it is the origin of the customs and institutions in question, we may be sure, after this, that we have a genuine document, and a true history; and these marks of authenticity do not belong to any other history that ever was written, but the history of the Jewish and Christian Churches.

My object has been to show that the materials of faith rest upon facts recorded in unimpeachable history, and, therefore, that no man has any valid excuse for unbelief, but, on the contrary, is justly chargeable with culpable negligence, and sinful neglect of duty, if he does not believe. Will it follow, then, as a matter of course, that a candid examination of Scripture facts will produce the genuine fruits of Christian faith? No, but it will be an excellent preparation; faith without facts could be no better than superstition, and facts without faith could have no power to bind the conscience. We may say, then, in one sense, that the elements of religious faith are as plain, patent, and palpable, as those on which we build our faith in the ordinary events of history; both of them depend, in the first instance, on facts ascertainable by evidence, but there is this mighty difference, that religious faith sists us at once before the tribunal of the Judge and Ruler of heaven and earth, and tells us, that we must be accountable to him for the deeds done in the body; whilst historical faith imposes no responsibility whatever; and if a man is not afraid of his sanity being called in question, he may deny, if he pleases, the best accredited events in human history.

Is Christian faith, then, of easy acquisition, because its principles are so obvious, and its evidence so overwhelming? Nothing but the "evil heart of unbelief" could make it difficult; for there are no facts, in the ordinary history of the world, so well ascertained as the being, and providence, and sovereignty, of the Eternal Ruler; there is nothing so complete as the evidence for Christ's mission to save a lost world; and nothing but the determined bias of the heart to do evil, could make the mind reluctant to obey the holy law of God. This inaptitude for divine things, presented obstacles to the reception of Christian faith, which nothing but the prevailing influence of the Spirit of God can overcome. The spirit of the world, and the natural spirit of the human heart, are entirely opposed to the law of God; and, therefore, if man is intended for a spiritual being, and made capable of cherishing spiritual feelings and spiritual hopes, it is clear to a demonstration, that the principles of this spiritual life, must be derived from some other source than the influence of the world, or the natural tendencies of the human heart; and it might be concluded, that the Father of the spirits of all flesh could alone "create in man a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within him." But this is not left to inference; our Lord himself assures us, that God will give his holy spirit to them who ask it; and the evidence does not rest here; the fact was demonstrated by the miraculous outpouring of the Spirit, first, on the apostles, and then, on all those on whom they laid their hands.

Here, then, even the great author of our sanctification, the Spirit of grace and holiness, was rendered palpable to the senses, so that the apostles could appeal to his visible influence, and thus introduce him (if we may use such language) to the notice of mankind, as the grand agent through whom God is to conduct the spiritual government of this world till time shall be no more. In the remarks I have offered, I have endeavoured to show that no demand is made on our credulity; every doctrine rests on facts, vouched by the most unexceptionable testimony. Our Lord himself appeals to this evidence: "I have greater witness than that of John, for the works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me that the Father hath sent me." Let no man reason at random on such a momentous subject. Let him search the Scriptures, weigh the evidence, and examine the testimony, with the earnestness and candour of a man who believes that life or death hangs on the issue, and I believe it will never be found that such a man will ultimately miss the path of truth.

TEMPORAL CALAMITIES A CALL TO REPENTANCE: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES ROBERTSON, A. M., Minister of Mid and South Yell, Shetland.

"I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face; in their affliction they will seek me early."—HOSHA, v. 15.

It is not my intention, on this occasion, to institute a parallel between the sins of which we are a nation, generally, have been guilty, and those on account of which the divine threatenings went so often forth against the tribes of Israel. The authority under, and the object for which, we have this day assembled, in solemn humiliation before God, do not warrant such a range of discourse. No, my friends, this is no time for general declamation. I feel that it would be altogether out of place. While the Word and the finger of God point to the individual and collective sins of the inhabitants of these islands, as the cause of that awful chastisement which is now suspended over us, something more practical, more heart-searching in its application, must be exhibited to the conscience, before it can be awakened to form a just estimate of the heinous nature of those sins, our abounding in which has called down the present chastisement of heaven on the inhabitants of this land.

In speaking of sin as an evil, in reference to the bulk of mankind, in general, we are all but too apt to view it in a different light, when applied to our own case in particular. The accumulated and daily increasing mass of our common iniquity is an object too conspicuous entirely to escape the observation, or not occasionally to afford matter for serious apprehension to the most careless and inconsiderate sinner. It is not the amount of guilt, concerning which there is much difference of opinion, among those around us. No, the doubtful point seems to be how far they, as individuals, have incurred the guilt of contributing thereto. The sinner of the present day will reason, and reason well as to the odious and defiling nature of sin in general; nay, like David of old, may even write bitter things against himself, by denouncing those very sins, in others, of which he himself is, it may be, unconsciously guilty; while, in shewing him his own spiritual condition the minister of the Gospel, to his sad experience, finds that, unlike to David, the application "thou art the man," has often but little effect on a conscience hardened and at ease under the searing influence of sin. Now, when either individuals or communities have so far cast off the fear of God, as to cease to be affected by the threatenings of his Word or the warnings of his messengers, the Almighty, with a view to vindicate the authority of his government, and thus reclaim the sinner from the evil of his ways, instead of admonishing unthinking men, by the "still small voice" of his spirit striving with the conscience, not unfrequently arrests them in their downward paths, by withdrawing his countenance from them for a time, or chastising them with the removal of those creature comforts, on which, while their "mountain stood strong," they had placed too much dependence, without once lifting up their soul in earnest gratitude to the blessed fountain from whence these comforts flowed.

It was thus he dealt with the house of Jacob, the rod of his inheritance; and it is thus he still deals with every individual whom he causes to approach him, and with every kindred of the human race, among whom his name has been recorded. In unison, therefore, with that established principle on which he deals with man, as the heir of immortality, he is, at this moment, saying unto us, the long favoured inhabitants of this land, as he did to his ancient people, by his servant Hosea; "I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face; in their affliction they will seek me early."

May the Spirit of all grace assist in inquiring what is meant by the Lord returning to his place; and also the object for which he does return thereto, with a view of improving this subject to our present prospects.

I. "I will go and return to my place." In the record of truth it is declared of the Almighty, that "heaven is his throne, and the earth is his footstool;" and that He who, by his wisdom, created the universe, is daily employed in upholding it by his power, and superintending it by his providence; "that the eyes of the Lord are every where beholding the evil and the good."

This returning of the Almighty to his place cannot, then, refer to his being present in one place and absent from another. Now, are we from this expression to infer, that this Infinite Existence actually removes his essential presence, even for the shortest assignable space, from any portion of the created universe? This would amount to a denial of one of those attributes, which he claims to himself in the character of the Omnipresent God, and, of consequence, would trench on his authority as the Sovereign of the Universe. Nay, by limiting the immensity of his essence, we would thus destroy what reason supposes, and revelation declares, inseparable from the very name and existence of Deity. The phrase, "my place," must be understood in a figurative sense, and refers to the complacency with which the Almighty beholds the particular abodes of his intelligent creatures, who love and serve him. Hence he is said to have fixed his throne in heaven, because it is the supreme delight of the inhabitants of that blessed abode to do his will, and enjoy his favour. In unison with this idea, he said to Moses, when giving directions respecting the setting up of the tabernacle, "and let them make me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them." And to Solomon he said, "If thou wilt walk in my statutes, and execute my judgments, and keep all my commandments to walk in them, then will I perform my word concerning thee, which I spake unto David thy father, and I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will not forsake my people Israel." David himself also declares of Mount Zion, that it is "the hill where God desireth to dwell, yea, the Lord will dwell in it for ever;" and again, "For the Lord hath chosen Zion, he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest, here will I stay, for I have desired it."

Now, the dwelling of the Almighty, here and elsewhere spoken of, must evidently refer, not certainly to his circumscribing the place of his habitation either to the tabernacle in the wilderness, the temple at Jerusalem, the habitations of Jacob in general, or the mountain of Zion in particular, but to that complacency and favour with which he meets with his believing people, whether in their families, or when assembled, according to the ordinances of his appointment, to worship him in spirit and in truth, in those places where he has caused his name to be recorded;—thus verifying the truth of his own living Word; “To this man will I look, even to him that is of a contrite spirit, and that trembles at my word.”

Whether, then, the countenance and favour of God be thus shewn to an individual, a family, a congregation, or a people, where, and under whatever circumstances the favour of God is thus exhibited, there, for the time being, is the place of the Lord. Whenever, therefore, an individual, a family, or a people, have had the enviable experience, that the favour of God has made their habitation or assembly the place of his rest, if they are desirous that the God of Jacob should continue his outgoings and incomings with and amongst them, let them be jealous over themselves, lest, by unmindfulness of former deliverances, ingratitude for past or present mercies, or an habitual indulgence in known sin, they should provoke the Lord to remove his tabernacle from among them, and prepare himself a sanctuary in the midst of a people who will evidence the fruits of righteousness in their lives and conversation.

We conclude, then, that at whatever time the Lord withdraws the light of his gracious countenance from an individual, making him to feel his ingratitude or unworthiness in time past, and the spiritual darkness with which he is now surrounded; or when he withholds from a people the usual supply, whether of spiritual comfort, or of temporal blessings, thereby shewing them that there is no dependence on an arm of flesh for procuring even the least esteemed of former mercies, now denied,—at such a season that individual, or this people, will be but too keenly alive to the import of the words, “I will go and return to my place,” to require any lengthened comment thereon.

II. Let us inquire, then, into the object for which the Lord does return to his place, with a view of improving this subject in reference to our present prospects.

It would appear, from certain expressions of the Word of God, that the Almighty, after long striving, by his Word, and his messengers, to reclaim sinners from their evil ways, sometimes, with a view, no doubt, of deterring others from persisting in similar transgressions, gives over the incorrigibly wicked, and impenetrably hardened, to be filled with the fruits of their own doings; in which case they are said to be given over to judicial blindness, the measure of their iniquity being complete; and when once brought to this state, so far have sinners removed from God, and, in reference to them, so completely has the Lord returned to his place, that he is represented in the figurative, though impressive, style of eastern phraseology, as “laughing at their calamity, and mocking when their fear cometh.”

It was not, however, for the purpose of demonstrating that the Lord had finally rejected his people, that the prophet was, on this occasion, directed to say, “I will go and return to my place.” No; the very turn of expression which follows, “till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face,” plainly shews that when this, the great object for which he had withdrawn himself from them, should be accomplished, he would still have respect to his covenant, and again return to his repenting people, and set up his—then removed—tabernacle amongst them.

From these words, moreover, we are to infer, that before the people of Israel could approach to God acceptably in the day of their affliction, it was necessary that they should come, as sinners acknowledging their offences as the cause, which had brought down the chastisements of heaven upon them;—that it was as sinners, suffering under a sense of the righteous displeasure of God, that they were here encouraged to seek his face; and it was only by coming in this way that they could again expect the gracious countenance of the Almighty to be lifted up upon them. Hence we see that, in the day of our distress, before we can plead with David, “Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and forgettest our afflictions?” it is incumbent on us with the people of Israel of old, and in imitation of the humble publican, to smite on our breasts and say, with abasement of soul, “Lord, be merciful to us sinners;” and thus seeking God’s face in the way and order of his appointment, knowing that there is forgiveness with him that he may be feared, let us, through Christ, approach with boldness to a throne of grace, adopting the language of the man according to God’s own heart, “Arise for our help, and redeem us for thy mercies’ sake.”

From this view of the text we remark, that how much soever men may have neglected or forgotten God in the day of peace and prosperity, they are still warranted to seek after him in the day when he seemeth to hide his face from them; for, says the Almighty, “in their affliction they will seek me early.” Thrice blessed be his holy name, it is that sinners may be turned early from their iniquities, from their false refuges, and their deceitful idols, that the Almighty brings them into the furnace of affliction.

Do you inquire what were the sins of which the house of Jacob had on that occasion been guilty? You will find them particularly enumerated at the beginning of the fourth chapter, where, after the emphatic announcement, “Hear ye the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel; for the Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land,” the prophet brings forward the reason for which this controversy was maintained: “Because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land, By swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery, they break out, and blood toucheth blood." How far ye, as a congregation, or as individuals, have to answer for the particular sins thus enumerated, I inquire not: this is a matter between God and your consciences, and to his mercy, through the atoning blood of Christ, I commend you. But if similar sins have been always visited with similar punishments, great reason have the inhabitants of this land to tremble, lest at this moment they stand conspicuous in the sight of God as guilty of those very sins, so sternly reprehended in the people of Israel. For the afflictions with which we have been visited, during the past and present seasons, are so completely identified with those threatened judgments proclaimed by the prophet against Israel, that the bare enumeration of them must make the hearts of all who now hear me, when communing with their God, thus confess: "Whatever may have been the transgressions for which thou, O Lord, art now contending with us, these are the very chastisements with which the rod of thy displeasure is at this day lifted up against us."

Who, in reflecting on the extent to which that bounty has been withdrawn, with which the Lord was wont to bless your labours on the deep, or on that mortality with which he last year visited your stalls and your folds, or on that famine with which he is now wasting the countenances of many amongst you—who, I ask, in reflecting on these, can deny, that our land is at this moment mourning under the very chastisements denounced against the people of Israel? "Therefore," says the prophet, "shall the land mourn, and every one that dwelleth therein shall languish, with the beasts of the field, and the fowls of heaven; yea, the fishes of the sea shall be taken away." And again, "For they have sown to the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind. It hath no stalk. The seed thereof shall yield no meal. If so be it yield, the stranger shall devour it."

Now say, my friends, is this your case, or is it not? Assuredly it is to the very letter. O look not, then, in the day of your affliction, to man, in whom there is no stay! Look not unto the hand of your neighbour for supply. Gaze not on his countenance to move his compassion towards you. You may add to his distress, by laying before him your own tale of want, or of woe; but his circumstances are too kindred to your own to admit of his affording you that relief which his heart would bestow. The text, my brethren, * During the past seasons of 1835-36, such has been the failure of the herring fishing, that the gross amount of earnings derived therefrom, could not have covered the necessary expenses of those engaged in prosecuting it. Last year some of the poor fishermen did not measure a single cran. In many instances, the ling fishing was equally unproductive. In the winter and spring of 1836, the loss in horses and black cattle did not amount to less than 300, nearly a fifth of the whole stock; while the loss in sheep exceeded 3,000. But our great calamity is the failure of last year's crop, from which there was not sufficient reaped to serve the inhabitants for more than four months. Even at this moment there are scores of families, whose daily preservation from absolute starvation can only be attributed to the continued interposition of God in their behalf, by sending them a merciful supply of small fish, on which for months past they have entirely subsisted.

points out the only means in the exercise of which either comfort or relief can, with certainty, be depended on. With prayer and supplication turn unto the Lord your God. Seek him early in this the day of your affliction. Search and try your hearts. Confess your offence. Approach the throne of grace through Him who is the alone way of access to the guilty soul. Before this throne unreservedly pour out a confession of all your wanderings, all your backslidings, and all your offences in his sight. The earlier ye humble yourselves before him, the sooner ye may expect an answer in peace. In faith, grounded on the many, the blessed promises of his own everlasting Word, make known to him all your wants. Be assured, that He who giveth to the beasts their food, and the young ravens that cry unto him, taketh pleasure in them that fear him, in those that "hope in his mercy." Yea, hath he not said, that "he will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer."

[This sermon was preached in the Parish Church of Mid Yell, upon Thursday, 9th Feb. 1837, being the day appointed by the Provincial Synod of Shetland to be observed throughout their bounds, as a day of solemn fasting and humiliation before God; on account of the famine impending over the inhabitants of those Islands.]

AN INDIAN BRAHMIN.

THE following brief but interesting narrative, is extracted from a letter, dated 30th May 1836, received from the Rev. Dr Wilson, one of the General Assembly's Missionaries at Bombay.

"It was my expectation that yesterday, I should have also been privileged to baptize a respectable Brahmin. He has been called, however, to appear before an assembly, where his professions have been submitted to a scrutiny, infinitely more solemn and searching than any practised on earth,—even that of the unerring Judge himself. During his attendance on me for instruction, he was seized with fever; and, that he might enjoy the benefit of a change of air, I sent him to his native village about forty miles from Bombay. I visited him there a short time ago, that I might ascertain how he acted in the presence of those best acquainted with his circumstances; and do every thing in my power to mitigate the prejudices which they might entertain against him. Though very weak, he boldly declared in my presence, to all the Brahmins of the place, that they were following delusions to their own destruction; and that Christ Jesus is the only and all-sufficient Saviour. Some of them gnashed on him with their teeth, and others assumed a most malignant scowl. He, however, continued unmoved. He spoke to me with deep humility respecting his long resistance of the truth, often declared to him by the American Missionaries and myself; and with fervent gratitude to that grace which had led him, when far removed from the public ordinances of the Gospel, to determine to forsake all and follow Christ. He was affected to tears by the perusal of an account of the last moments of my dearest partner; and greatly encouraged by it, he said, to trust in that Shepherd whose sceptre and staff are mighty for defence against every assault which may be made in the dark valley of the shadow of death. Before I left him he appeared to be convalescent; but he soon had a relapse, and he died on the fourth day after my departure. The Brahmins refused to dispose of his body; and they have thus, to their own detriment, advertised his having died in a faith different from that of his fathers. They have greatly persecuted the members of his family, who have consequently a large share of my sympathy. Two of the villagers, having had their curiosity excited by what has taken place, have come to me for instruction.

The following is a literal translation of a petition addressed to me by the Brahmin now referred to, on his offering himself as a candidate for baptism:—"To the renowned missionary, Mr Wilson,—Bápú, by the will of God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the Creator and Redeemer, respectfully represents:—I have been seized with the greatest distress on account of my sins; and in the prosecution of the inquiry, What must I do? I have looked to the means of salvation prescribed by the Hindú religion, ablutions, pigments, invoking the names of the gods, burnt-offerings, and pilgrimages; but I have found them altogether useless and ineffectual for the putting away of sin. I am thoroughly convinced that they are calculated only for the deception of the world. From the perusal of the Christian Scriptures and meditations upon them, I have seen the necessity of loathing sin, and repenting, and obtaining baptism; and having repented, I now come to you soliciting baptism, and acknowledgment by the Christian Church. I will provide for my own livelihood, as I am a Maráthá Kárkun (clerk;) and I do not even wish to remain in Bombay, as it does not agree with my health. Trusting in the righteousness of the Lord, and taking refuge in the grace of God, and expecting to escape the eternal punishment of my sins, and unceasingly to glorify God, I come to you with joined hands, and with desires which continue day and night. Reject not my request, but let me be acknowledged by the Christian Church! Amen."

ON CHARITY.

By THOMAS BROWN, Esq.,

"Author of the 'Reminiscences of an Old Traveller.'"

THE act of assisting a fellow-creature in distress, of giving way to our sympathies in favour of the infirm, the helpless, or the destitute, is one of the most delightful sensations which can possibly animate the human breast. Its reward is in our own feelings, and has a reference to the past, the present, and the future. As moral and responsible agents, it approximates us more and more to the great source of benevolence and goodness,—the Almighty Creator and preserver of all things, whose tender mercies are over all his works, and by whom we are enjoined to be united in love, and to do unto others that which we would wish them to do unto us. The pleasure of being charitable and kind, is no doubt greatly enhanced, when we know that we bestow our bounty on deserving objects, and when they display, by their words and actions, a just sense of the blessings and benefits they have received; but should they be totally insensible of our kindness, and repay us with indifference, coldness, and ingratitude, which, alas! is too often the case, we ought, by no means, to relax in our endeavours to do as much good as we can in the way of charity and kindness, or to remove, as far as we are able, the causes of human misery and suffering.

It is somewhat curious to observe how this principle operates in different countries, and the views which mankind take of its tendency and effects on the objects for whose relief it is intended. In several parts of the Continent, but particularly, amongst a people constituting one of the most formidable powers in Europe, the human mind is kept in a state of ignorance and bigotry, and the strangest notions of the nature of charity, both as a moral and religious principle, are entertained and sedulously inculcated upon the people. In the country I am alluding to, an act of charity becomes an act of selfishness, and is founded upon some ultimate prospect of advantage to the donor, without the least feeling of sympathy or commiseration for the object on whom the charity is bestowed. For example, felons, who are confined to prison for the commission of crimes of the first magnitude, such as robbery or murder, are allowed to perambulate the streets, their hands and legs bound in chains, so as to enable them to make use of both without the possibility of escape. These felons are accompanied by a guard, and in their endeavours to excite the feelings of the multitude, they ask for alms in the name, and "for the sake of Christ." This has a great effect with the people, who bestow their charity without any reference to the characters they are relieving, and who know perfectly well, that the money thus collected is divided between the guards and the felons; or rather squandered by them in the prison over the gaming-table, or in scenes of riot and intoxication; so that here the principle of charity is perverted to the worst purposes, and completely subversive of all morality and order, instead of promoting, as it is intended to do, the happiness and well-being of society. The donors, in this state of things, think, that by bestowing alms for "Christ's sake," they are securing the salvation of their own souls, and that it is not incumbent upon them (in compliance with the injunctions of our blessed Saviour) "to love one another," and to consider the great family of mankind as a field on which to exercise the kindest and most benevolent feelings of our nature. How much such superstitious practices and mistaken views of the nature of charity, tend to degrade and demoralise the human character! How lamentable it is to see a cruel, false, and unchristian policy, persevering in a system so destructive of the true happiness of mankind, and tending to impede the march of civilization and refinement!

Let us see what means are taken in more favoured countries, to spread the benefits of knowledge, and the blessings of rational piety and benevolence. Let us dwell for a while on our own native land, and see what liberty, and knowledge, and good laws have done, towards promoting the interests and happiness of all. These tend to nourish and keep alive a spirit of independence, a laudable desire to get through the difficulties and trials of life, by continued exertions and habits of industry, and which, in their turn, in almost every instance, are productive of substantial comforts and happiness to the individual. As illustrative of my argument, and as an encouragement to others to follow his example, I shall describe the conduct of a poor individual which I witnessed last August, and whose manly and noble disinterestedness called forth and excited my feelings of admiration to an inexpressible degree. The incident is a trifling one, and may appear to some of too little importance to merit the slightest attention. But every one who can hold up to public view acts of merit or virtue, is bound to do so, that the influence of good example may spread far and wide, and mankind at large be thereby benefited.

In the month of August last, I passed some days at a watering place in Perthshire. It was usual at the boarding-house where I took up my quarters, for the company assembled at dinner on Sabbath to make afterwards a contribution for the relief of the poor and infirm persons who came from a distance to benefit by the waters.

The number of these destitute people when I was there, was about ten or twelve; their names were registered in the book at the inn, taken from medical certificates granted to them at their respective places of abode, and they assembled on the Monday morning in front of the house, to receive the money contributed for their relief, the amount of which, of course, depended upon the number of contributors then residing at the house. On the first Monday morning after my arrival

I found the sum received and distributed averaged about half-a-crown each, and a committee of three gentlemen was appointed, (of which I was one,) to see the money properly distributed, and we were assisted by the landlord of the house, who was, more than any of the visitors, qualified to judge of the justice of the different claims on this charitable fund. I asked him if the applicants were all on the spot, that we might proceed to our duty; his answer was, "all, with one exception," and that I might see the person standing alone in one of the retired passages of the house, as he felt very reluctant to appear openly as a sharer in the public bounty.

The circumstances attending this person, the landlord related to me nearly as follows. The poor lad had been at the wells about a month or six weeks, having arrived there, from his home, in a diseased and helpless state, without the use of one of his legs, and altogether reduced to great weakness. He could do no manner of work for the space of a month, when he began to derive benefit from the waters, and he gained strength considerably. He was, from the beginning, received on the list of claimants on the fund, and continued to draw his proportion of the money distributed. On the Sabbath preceding the day I am alluding to, the landlord, by chance, met him, and reminded him to appear at head-quarters as usual; the young man was much affected, and said to the landlord that he could not conscientiously accept any more from the public fund, as he could now earn sixpence a-day by working for it. The landlord, pleased with this noble instance of disinterestedness in humble life, desired, nevertheless, the lad might attend once more, and it was under these circumstances that he appeared, apparently for the last time. After agreeing with the landlord that he should be paid what he had been in the habit of receiving, I went by myself and found the lad alone in the retired part of the house I have mentioned. He had a bashful, timid, and reserved manner, apparently about twenty years of age, was pale and sickly, and seemed extremely reluctant at receiving anything which he had not earned by his own industry and labour. There was something in his countenance expressive of extreme sensibility, and an apparent delicacy of feeling, far above what we would naturally expect to see among people in that station of life. What a different sentiment, what a contrast does this form to the picture I have drawn of mendicants in a certain part of the continent; and will any person deny that this difference arises from the blessings of liberty in our land, from the advantages of an enlightened and equitable government, the security of property, and the consolations of rational piety? Let any person, who is dissatisfied with the comforts he has at home, visit other countries and judge for himself; he will then know how to value and appreciate the substantial blessings I have mentioned, and be more and more grateful to the Almighty Disposer of events, from whom all these blessings flow. He will learn, from experience, that a kind and charitable feeling towards others, is the source of unmingled comfort and happiness to ourselves, tends to unite in indissoluble bonds of love the great family of mankind, and gradually approximates us to the great Source of all goodness and perfection.

RECOLLECTIONS OF WILLIAM PEEBLES,
FORMERLY MASTER OF THE ORPHAN HOSPITAL,
EDINBURGH.

It is at once a gratifying and instructive exercise, to recal to memory those patriarchs and aged saints who have long ago gone to enjoy their rest and their reward in heaven, but with whom are associated some parts of our early history, and perhaps certain circumstances connected with the beginning of the life of God in our own souls. If there ever was a true saint on earth, William Peebles was one. In the Historical Account of the Orphan Hospital, printed a few years ago by the Managers of that Institution, the following mention is made of this good man:—

"When Mr Brown, the first master of the house, resigned his situation, being called by a congregation of Protestant dissenters in England to be their pastor, the office was for some time filled by Mr Francis Archibald, who had formerly been minister of the parish of Guthrie; and in the year 1759, the managers were most providentially led to secure the services of an individual in the internal superintendance of the institution, of whom it is, perhaps, not too much to say, that within his own sphere, and in his own day, he was one of the most useful and valuable characters in the city of Edinburgh. This was the late Mr William Peebles. He was originally brought into notice by a letter from Mr Thomas Randall, then minister of Inchture, and father of the late Dr Davidson of Edinburgh, addressed to Mr Archibald Wallace, one of the managers, in which he says,—'Having observed, some time ago, an advertisement in the newspapers, from the Orphan Hospital, concerning a schoolmaster to the children there, I give you this trouble in regard there is one William Peebles who, I think, comes precisely up to the description of the one wanted by you for that end. For of him, I think, I am at liberty to testify, if of any in the world, that he is born of God, and conscientious to the highest degree of scruple as to fulfilling whatever is committed to his charge. At present he is schoolmaster at Strathmartine, a small parish, and of small encouragement, in this county, but of such reputation for teaching, and, particularly, for instilling the principles of religion into the youth under his care, that many from different parishes resort to him on this account. Content with what he has, he is willing to remain where he is, yet humbly rejoiced when I mentioned to him, which was necessary, my intention of writing to you on this head. I may justly add, that he is of the least meddling nature that can be. If things go well with his own soul, and well with those that are under his charge, he rests fully satisfied. I should say, that he teaches nothing but English, writing, and figuring,—his hand writing is substantial and good; he understands well the different parts of arithmetic, and having naturally good parts, he is apt to learn any thing with ease; nor does he want an ear, if that were needful.'

"The excellent person thus suggested to the managers, was immediately chosen to be master of the institution, and for nearly half a century continued to discharge the duties of his place with a degree of judgment, fidelity, and success, which, perhaps, more than any other circumstance, gave to the Orphan Hospital that character for substantial usefulness which it undoubtedly acquired, and which is still remembered by not a few of those who were trained under its roof. Nor can the superior qualities which, in every respect, belonged to Mr Peebles, be forgotten by any of the managers of the institution who live to recollect them, or by those who, otherwise unconnected with the Hospital, were in the practice, under various circumstances, of repairing to Mr Peebles for counsel, guidance, and encouragement. For during a long period of his life, the room of this good man was the frequent resort of some of the best and worthiest of the citizens, as well as of many young men who were prosecuting their studies at the university with a view to the sacred ministry, and who, attracted by the singular talent which he possessed for religious conversation, the simplicity and godly sincerity of his character, and the kind and affectionate manner in which he entered into all their employments and prospects, found in the matured knowledge and experience of Mr Peebles the means of much personal improvement. Of these persons, after having been useful, and some of them eminent in their day, the greater part have been removed from the present life; but some yet remain in various quarters of the country."

This is all just, and was sufficient for the purpose for which it was introduced in the narrative that contains it. But it may be well to preserve a few additional particulars, and to mention some anecdotes, of Mr Peebles.

First of all, with reference to his character as master of the institution, at the head of which he was placed, it may be observed, that nothing could exceed the conscientious fidelity with which every part of his duties was performed. He never allowed himself to be absent from his post, or distracted by attending to other things; and in many difficult and delicate situations, the managers found a resource in the judgment and good sense, the patience and forbearance, and yet firmness of purpose of the master. His great rule was, to prevent the beginnings of any of those unpleasant occurrences which cannot but frequently occur in an institution where a multitude of children are collected together, over whom he possessed a command and a power, by means of gentleness and discretion, which is often denied to sternness and severity. The children, in general, revered him as a father, which was the name they always gave him; and the pain which many of them incurred, by offending him, was as heavy a punishment as could have been inflicted.

During the latter years of his life he was a great sufferer, and much confined to his room, and often to bed. His apartment in the house entered from a passage in the upper floor. In this passage some of the boys were in the practice of gathering together during their hours of play, and of making some little noise, of purpose that Mr Peebles might overhear them; in which case they were certain that they would be called into his room, and amused by his relating to them some little stories with which his memory was so abundantly furnished, and which to them was one of the greatest treats or relaxations which they could have enjoyed.

Another circumstance may serve to indicate the feelings of the children towards their teacher. When, in consequence of his confinement, his breakfast was provided for him in his bed-room, he always required his bit of dry toast to be sent up without the crusts being cut off, although from old age he was unable to make use of them. Those pieces of crust he laid aside in his cupboard, and afterwards gave to any of the children, with whom, for their good conduct, he had reason to be much pleased; and it came to be with them as much an object of competition to obtain one of the master's crusts, and was looked upon to be as great and honourable a reward, as if it had been a silver medal, or a piece of money.

Again, in regard to the general estimation in which he was held as a singularly devout and holy man, it may be mentioned, that the late Dr Davidson used always to recommend those young men who came to Edinburgh to prosecute their studies for the Church, and who happened to bring introductions to him, immediately to get acquainted with Mr Peebles, and to keep as much as possible near him, for he would do them a great deal of good. And I well remember a late most excellent and heavenly-minded minister, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, mentioning, that on one occasion he had brought his two sons, then very little boys, to town, in order that he might carry them to see Mr Peebles, and obtain his patriarchal blessing; and that the venerable old man had stretched out his hands from his bed, and laying them on their heads, pronounced over them the benediction of Jacob, "The God which fed me all my life long unto this day, the angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads!"—a prayer, the fulfilment of which, with that of many others, put up for them, they have not failed fully to experience.

Mr Peebles, it has been observed, possessed a remarkable talent for religious conversation. He never indulged in mere gossip,—all was solid, and substantial, and sensible, full of Scripture truth and illustration. The whole Bible seemed to be written on his heart, out of the abundances of which his mouth spake. The various Scripture titles of the Almighty he was very fond of employing, and always did it aptly. For example, was he speaking to a friend who had experienced some deliverance from danger, or strength under some heavy trial, he would counsel him to give the honour and praise to Jehovah Nissi, "the Lord his banner." Was he called to minister comfort to some one whose mind was troubled and filled with fear, he would speak to him of Jehovah Shalom, "the Lord who would yet send peace." Referring to any place where much of God's presence had been felt, or of some season when the power of his grace had been richly experienced, he would say, that the name of it was Jehovah Shamah, for "the Lord was there." And when alluding to the orphan children under his charge, and in the prayers he offered up in the midst of them, his favourite title for their heavenly Father was Jehovah-jireh, "the Lord who had provided for them."

He was very fond of mentioning anecdotes of good men of the olden time, and the pious and pithy sayings of the sound and orthodox ministers with whom he had been familiar in his early days. Among others, the following are remembered:—"It was remarked by an old minister whom I used to hear, that the devil is just the believer's fencing master, for by trials and temptations he teaches him how to fight himself."—"Speaking of the greatness of the love and of the sufferings of Christ, 'O believer,' said an aged minister, 'Jesus Christ drank hell dry for you!' Was not that a strong expression?"—"I remember a clergyman once preaching on a Monday after the Sacrament, who observed that it was a blessed thing that Jesus did not say to his disciples, 'Arise, go hence,' but (John xiv. 31.) 'Arise, let us go hence.' He went with them, and so will he go with you from this place, my brethren, if ye are truly his disciples."

The scene of his youth, on which he most frequently dwelt, and with much apparent delight, was the parish, or rather the Parish Church of Longforgan, in Forfarshire, where he appeared to have enjoyed many seasons of great spiritual refreshing under the ministry of a Mr Lyon, who was then the incumbent in the charge. The descriptions which he gave of the life and power of godliness existing among the persons with whom he was then associated in religious duties, and especially in the communion service, were very animating and encouraging to the young minds to whom they were addressed; and the remembrance of the details which he gave of what was experienced by himself, and many others on such occasions, excites the ardent wish that they could be revived and restored in these comparatively cold-hearted days.

A circumstance to which allusion was made in a late number of the present publication, may be more fully stated in its connection with Mr Peebles. When the late Dr Davidson (then Mr Randall) of Edinburgh, and Dr Balfour of Glasgow, were fellow-students at college, they formed a wish to establish a prayer or fellowship meeting, in which they, and one or two other young men that were like-minded, might occasionally join for worship and mutual counsel. They were at a loss, however, for a convenient place in which they might hold their meetings, and were too shy or reserved to make their wants known to others, so as to obtain it. Their first meetings were, therefore, held in the branches of some trees about the Meadows, which at that period was a comparatively retired spot. They soon found the inconvenience, however, of such an arrangement, and plucked up courage to make the matter known to Mr Peebles, who immediately established his own room in the Hospital as the place of their rendezvous. There they continued to assemble in the company of the good man who had relieved them from their embarrassment, and there for a long series of years a succession of pious youths held regularly their weekly Christian conferences, from which they all acknowledged they derived both unspeakable pleasure and advantage. Nor were these meetings discontinued in the Orphan Hospital till the period of Mr Peebles's death. Among those who regularly attended them, during the last years of his life, besides several ministers of the Church, who are still alive, may be mentioned the names of the late Rev. John Russell of Muthil, Donald Magilray of Kilmalie, and Mr Findlater of Inverness.

Mr Peebles possessed a countenance singularly expressive of his character, full of intelligence, benignity, and peace. During the latter years of his life, he suffered severely from a very painful disorder, but endured it with exemplary patience, and the most heavenly minded composure and resignation.

On occasions of the dispensation of the Lord's Supper in Lady Glenorehy's Chapel, he contrived to be present, and nothing could be more striking and dignified than his figure and appearance, as he took his place in the corner of the session seat, to which he was assisted by the almost equally venerable Alexander Clerk, so long known and respected in that place of worship.

Mr Peebles died in great peace on the 15th April 1807. His remains were borne to the grave by the managers of the hospital, accompanied by the children, the members of the prayer meeting, and many other Christian friends, and were deposited among the ashes of the orphans who had died in the house. After the funeral the whole members of the institution were assembled, and the occasion was suitably improved in an address by the late excellent Dr Hunter of the Tron Church.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The Bible.—A nation must be blessed, indeed, if it were governed by no other laws than those of this blessed book; it is so complete a system, that nothing can be added to it, or taken from it; it contains every thing needful to be known or done; it affords a copy for a king, and a rule for a subject; it gives instruction and counsel to a senate; authority and direction for a magistrate; it cautions a witness, requires an impartial verdict of a jury, and furnishes the judge with his sentence; it sets the husband as lord of the household, and the wife as mistress of the table; tells him how to rule, and her how to manage. It entails honour to parents, and enjoins obedience to children; it prescribes and limits the sway of the sovereign, the rule of the ruler, and authority of the master; commands the subjects to honour, and the servants to obey; and promises the blessing and protection of its Author to all that walk by its rules. It gives direction for weddings and for burials; it promises food and raiment, and limits the use of both; it points out a faithful and an eternal guardian to the departing husband and father; tells him with whom to leave his fatherless children, and in whom his widow is to trust; and promises a father to the former, and a husband to the latter. It teaches a man how to set his house in order, and how to make his will; it appoints a dowry for the wife, and entails the right of the first-born; and shews how the younger branches shall be left. It defends the right of all, and reveals vengeance to every defrauder, over-reacher, and oppressor. It is the first book, the best book, and the oldest book, in all the world. It contains the choicest matter, gives the best instruction, and affords the greatest pleasure and satisfaction that ever was revealed. It contains the best laws, and profoundest mysteries that ever were penned. It brings the best tidings, and affords the best of comfort to the inquiring and disconsolate. It exhibits life and immortality, and shews the way to everlasting glory. It is a brief recital of all that is past, and a certain prediction of all that is to come. It settles all matters in debate, resolves all doubts, and eases the mind and conscience of all their scruples. It reveals the only living and true God, and shews the way to him; and sets aside all other gods; and describes the vanity of them, and of all that trust in them. In short, it is a book of laws to shew right and wrong; a book of wisdom, that condemns all folly, and makes the foolish wise; a book of truth, that detects all lies, and confutes all errors; and a book of life, that shews the way from everlasting death. It is the most compendious book in all the world; the most authentic, and the most entertaining history that ever was published; it contains the most early antiquities, strange events, wonderful occurrences, heroic deeds, unparalleled wars. It describes the celestial, terrestrial, and infernal worlds; and the origin of the angelic myriads, human tribes, and infernal legions. It will instruct the most accomplished mechanic, and the profoundest artist; it will teach the best rhetorician, and exercise every power of the most skilful arithmetician; puzzle the wisest anatomist, and exercise the nicest critic. It corrects the vain philosopher, and guides the wise astronomer; it exposes the subtle sophist, and makes diviners mad. It is a complete code of laws, a perfect book of divinity, an unequalled narrative; a book of lives, a book of travels, and a book of voyages. It is the best covenant that ever was agreed on, the best deed that ever was sealed, the best evidence that ever was produced, the best will that ever was made, and the best testament that ever was signed. To understand it, is to be wise indeed; to be ignorant of it, is to be destitute of wisdom. It is the king's best copy, the magistrate's best rule, the housewife's best guide, the servant's best directory, and the young man's best companion. It is the school-boy's spelling-book, and the learned man's masterpiece; it is the ignorant man's dictionary, and the wise man's directory. It affords knowledge of witty inventions for the ingenious, and dark sayings for the grave; and it is its own interpreter. It encourages the wise, the warrior, the racer, the overcomer; and promises an eternal reward to the conqueror. And that which crowns all is, that the Author is without partiality, and without hypocrisy, for "in him is no variableness, nor shadow of turning."—From an Old Author.

The Benefits of Retirement.—Keeping much retired, and by ourselves, is most profitable for us all. Indeed, when our worldly business is attended to, as it ought to be, and secret duties are punctually observed, there cannot remain a great deal of time for persons, in any station, to spend in company; and they who imagine, that praying at certain seasons, hearing the Gospel, and then entering into a sort of general conversation about religion and religious people, will be sufficient, are grievously mistaken. Unless we love (and contrive, as we are able,) to be much alone, how can we often, and solemnly, call to remembrance the evil of our past life, so as to loathe ourselves? How feel contrition for the follies of our innate depravity? How, with the blessed Mary, ponder in our hearts the sayings of our Lord? How enter deeply into his agony and death, the price of our peace and eternal life? How weigh the value of our spiritual privileges, and the weight of the crown of glory laid up for the faithful? How feel the strength and multitude of our obligations to him in exemplary obedience, constrained by love passing knowledge? Though the pastors of Christ's Church speak on these subjects, and they make part of every conversation, we must ruminare in private upon them, or they will never duly impress our mind.—V. M. N.

SACRED POETRY

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH.

BY RICHARD HUIE, Esq., M.D.

WHAT means that sweet and heav'nly sound,
From yonder dungeon swelling?
What sheds such peace and gladness round
The captive's lowly dwelling?
Though tightly drawn the tyrant's chain,
And foul that dark vault's air,
With these may joy and comfort reign;
And why? The Lord is there!

What lights that meek and placid smile
On yon lone couch of sorrow?
What thought can those sad hours beguile,
Which death may close to-morrow?
That upward glance, that glist'ning eye,
Those features sunk, yet fair,
All, all with one consent reply,
'Tis this, the Lord is there!

Why shews that frail and aged form,
Who has with labour piled
Yon hut, to shelter from the storm
Himself and shiv'ring child,—
Why shews he still that look serene,
By hearth and rafters bare?
He knows, ev'n midst that cheerless scene,
And feels, the Lord is there!

In Hubert's towers, though plenty flows,
No mirth or festive din
Disturbs that order and repose,
Which rule and please within.
Why thus should stately baron's hall,
With parks and gardens rare,
The soul to hallow'd musings call?
The Lord—the Lord is there!

And, O! what other source than this Sends forth that glorious stream
Of joy, which laves the courts of bliss,
Of angels' harps the theme?
The charm, which bids the realms of light
Such matchless splendour wear,—
The charm, which makes heaven's self so bright,
Is still, the Lord is there!

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Ceylonese Christian.—At a festival at Ganesa's (Gumputee's) temple in Ceylon, while the multitude of worshippers, assembled at the temple, were engaged in boiling their rice for an offering, one of them who went for water fell into the well. As soon as the circumstance was made known to the crowd, they rushed to the well, and among them was the pandarum (priest) of the temple, who, as soon as he had gratified his curiosity, returned to the temple. None among them manifested the least concern for the unfortunate man who was sunk in the water. They looked into the well, and talked about the man in such imminent danger with the most perfect indifference. Not an individual seemed to think assistance could or ought to be rendered, till one of the headmen came to the spot; he exerted all his influence to induce some one to dive into the water, which any person accustomed to swimming might have done with perfect safety, but his efforts were in vain. He then sent for the priest, who was known to be an expert swimmer. At the command of the headman he came, but excused himself from the act of mercy required of him, by saying that he could not absent himself so long from the duties of the temple without sustaining a loss. Just at this moment came to the place a young man, unknown to the crowd, who, as soon as he learned that a fellow-being was drowning, threw aside his garment, and leaped into the well. After repeatedly diving, he found the body and raised it to the surface of the water, from which it was taken by the by-standers. As soon as the noise and confusion occasioned by taking out the lifeless body had subsided, a loud whisper passed along the crowd, "Who is that young man? Who is that good man?" They were not a little surprised, and some of the enemies of Christianity confounded, when they were told that this good Samaritan was Azel Backus, a Christian! This event did not a little towards stopping the mouths and weakening the strength of some who were arrayed against Christians, and the cause in which they were engaged; and is to all, who have any knowledge of Scripture, a striking comment on the words of inspiration, "Overcome evil with good."

Verily there is a God that Judgeth in the Earth.—That desperate and cruel tyrant, Antiochus Epiphanes, not merely ruined the Jewish nation as a distinct commonwealth, but ridiculed and insulted the sacred ordinances of Jehovah himself. Profaning the temple in the most daring manner, he set up the image of Jupiter within the precincts of the holy building, and causing a swine to be boiled, directed that the broth should be sprinkled over the Holy of Holies itself. The wickedness of this daring persecutor, however, was most striking in the malicious edicts which he published against the sacred books of the Old Testament. He searched out all the Hebrew copies he was able, and burned them: and he issued proclamations throughout Judea, that every Jew who possessed a copy of the Bible should deliver it up to be destroyed, on pain of death in case of refusal. But, blessed be God! though there have been cowards and traitors to the holy cause in all ages, who have feared man's anger more than the wrath of God, yet there have been, at the same time, brave and resolute servants of Christ, who have valued their Bibles above their blood. Such heroes existed in the days of Antiochus; men who dared to preserve their Bibles at the hazard of their lives, not fearing the vengeance of the cruel tyrant. It is remarkable that God's justice descended on this desperate persecutor in a peculiar manner: worms bred in his bowels, and there issued from his putrid body so intolerable a stench, that his physicians could not endure the room. Thus hell took possession of the guilty soul, even before it was detached from the body. A fearful monument is this, of God's dreadful indignation against those who dare to despise and trample upon his holy commandments.

The honest confession of a Freethinker.—The reverence of Lord Barrington, the celebrated author of the Miscellanea Sacra for religion, is well known. He was intimate with Anthony Collins the freethinker. One day he inquired of Collins why it was, that though he himself had very little respect for the doctrines of revelation, he yet took the greatest care that all his servants should regularly attend at church. His reply was, that he did this to prevent their robbing and murdering him.

"Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me."—JOHN xiv. 6.

It may be asserted, perhaps, that the heathen nations, whose history has in my former papers been alluded to, were not so far advanced in civilization as to be capable of exhibiting the full extent of religious knowledge to which the human mind, in more favourable circumstances, is capable of attaining; and the classical states of Greece and Rome may be pointed out as affording an exemplification of the inaccuracy of the views which have been stated. To this assertion, and the grounds on which it rests, I shall now advert.

In proceeding to an examination of that which is considered the religious system of the philosophers of Greece and Rome, an element of the greatest importance must be brought into view which has hitherto been unnoticed—and that is, the indirect communication to heathen nations of the truths contained in the Scriptures of the Old Testament. It is difficult to conceive, that the knowledge which was afforded to the parents of the human race, of the existence and perfections of the one only true God, should have been altogether forgotten by their posterity, even in distant ages. It is so interesting and sublime,—it so adapts itself to all the necessities of human nature, and it sheds such a brilliant light upon all those magnificent operations of power which are perpetually displaying themselves before the eyes of mankind, that we are apt to form the opinion that it would make an irresistible appeal to the understanding and the heart of rational creatures, and exact from them a full and continued assent. But this pleasing conception is opposed by the stubborn facts of history, which prove that the mind of fallen man is incapable of preserving the knowledge of true religion, except through the means of frequent revelation from heaven, or by the aid of the written records or permanent memorials of such revelation. The influence, therefore, of mere tradition is undeserv-ing of much notice; but the influence of the Old Testament Scriptures, in conveying religious information, either directly or indirectly to the heathen, merits a great degree of attention. The Scriptures may be considered tantamount to a continued uninterrupted revelation of the Divine will, which was efficient for the illumination of the heathen intellect, in two different ways. The Israelites themselves were kept in perpetual remembrance of the unity and majesty of God, to which their own Scriptures bore unchanging testimony; and to whatever quarter of the world they directed their steps, they carried along with them the knowledge of those fundamental doctrines of true religion;—or, it may be supposed, that some of the more intelligent heathens might come into contact with those who were acquainted with the theology of the Hebrew Scriptures. This latter supposition is rendered exceedingly probable by what is recorded of Pythagoras and Plato, two of the most celebrated Grecian philosophers, who spent a part of their youth in visiting eastern countries, for the purpose of acquiring knowledge.

The state of the heathen intellect in Greece was altogether different from that in which it was manifested in any other parts of the world, to which allusion has yet been made. In Greece the fine arts were cultivated with success: poets, philosophers, orators, historians of the first order arose, and schools of instruction were opened, in which the powers of the mind were trained, and advanced to the highest degree of improvement of which they were susceptible. In such a condition of society there could not fail to be cherished a perpetual and growing desire for the increase of knowledge. Wherever the treasures of wisdom could be found, every determined and laborious effort would be called into operation, in order to explore them. Is it likely, when the states of Greece were so far advanced in civilization—when the minds of the people were so incessantly operated upon by all the ordinary stimulants of education, and when so many brilliant stars of the first magnitude illuminated the intellectual firmament, that the rich reasoners of the East would have remained undiscovered? Could a country like India, so singular in its religion and policy, have escaped the penetrating survey of the enterprising travellers of Greece? Could a record exist, so extraordinary as that of the Old Testament, containing precious treasures of knowledge in regard to that one subject, which is of all others the most interesting, and to which attention would be excited in proportion to its vast importance, and yet be altogether shut up and sealed to the acute and prying eye of the Grecian philosopher, for ever in pursuit of discoveries? In the absence of direct historical testimony, it is, perhaps, impossible to obtain a completely satisfactory reply to these questions; but the knowledge which we possess of the enterprising character of the Grecian philosophers, coupled with the fact already alluded to, of their travelling into eastern countries for improvement, will probably induce us to answer them in the negative. If so, if it is supposed that the philosophers of Greece had even indirectly some acquaintance with the contents of the Sacred Record of the Old Testament, then the writings of the most celebrated of their number, in as far as they incidentally touch upon the subject of religion, will cease to excite our astonishment.

It is quite unnecessary, however, to attach any great importance to these considerations, as if they were decisive of the question, as to the powers of human reason, unaided, to make discoveries of Divine truth, sufficient to guide and direct mankind. Although the contrary supposition was correct, namely, that the learned men of Greece had not any access, either directly to the contents of the Old Testament, or indirectly, through those who possessed such advantage, or by personal communication with some of the descendants of Jacob, or with those who had such, or through the influence of tradition, or of information, which might have been acquired by travelling in a land contiguous to Palestine,—even in that case, the acquaintance with the great fundamental truths of religion which is displayed in the writings of heathen philosophers is not of such a nature as to support the inference, that the mind of man, unassisted, is adequate to the discovery of that divine knowledge which is indispensable to the enjoyment of happiness in this world, and in that which is to come. In the works of even the most learned and accomplished of them all, along with much sublime and admirable reasoning on a providence and a future state, there is mixed up a great proportion of error. It may indeed be made a matter of reasonable doubt whether that fundamental doctrine of true religion—the unity of God, was maintained in all its purity and uncorrupted simplicity. The universal and deeply rooted systems of Polytheism which prevailed in the celebrated states of Greece and Rome, afford the strongest grounds of suspicion upon this point—suspicion which is converted into certainty, by the language of some of their most celebrated philosophers, who, when alluding to the manifestation of power, wisdom, and goodness in the universe, and to the protection afforded to mankind by beings superior to themselves, make use of expressions which allow an inference to be drawn as to their entertaining the idea of a plurality of such beings. The unity of God is not a fundamental and unvarying doctrine of their system; that great name is sometimes used in the singular number, and sometimes in the plural. As a fact corroborative of the indistinct, or rather of the erroneous, views of the heathen philosophers on this most important point, we should remember that they gave their countenance to the popular system of Polytheism, and did not refuse to participate in the ordinary performance of its rites. It is scarcely possible to believe that such unworthy and degrading practices were consistent with a correct understanding and a full acknowledgment of the unity of God. Belief in this great and glorious doctrine of true religion removes the very foundation on which the edifice of Polytheism rests. The acknowledgment of one self-existent independent Being, the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of the universe, affixes the stamp of condemnation on all the rites and observances of heathen idolatry, as not only fundamentally at variance with the principles of theism, but as insulting, in the highest degree, to the Great First Cause, and subversive of the glory and honour, and of the reasonable service which are due unto Him.

The rites which are celebrated in honour of some of the false deities of Greece and Rome, the auguries, oracles, spectacles, and amusements, are deserving of notice, in as far as they formed a part of the national religion, which obtained the countenance and approbation of the philosophers. At the celebration of the rites due to some of their gods, the grossest and most abandoned acts of sensuality and intemperance were committed, and even became a portion of the profane and abominable service. The weakness or obstinacy of the human mind was shewn in the universal respect which was paid to auguries and divinations. The singing of birds, the bodies of dead animals, the phenomena of an eclipse, the appearance of a comet in the heavens, were anxiously watched and attended to, as indicative of great and important changes in the affairs of mankind. The spectacles of the Romans were of the most barbarous and unnatural description, consisting of the combats of gladiators, which multitudes of all ages and both sexes beheld, and thus became the unfeeling witness of their fellow-creatures slaughtering one another, with remorseless cruelty, for the mere purpose of amusement. The practice of consulting oracles was universal; pretended deities were supposed to preside, and to answer the interrogatories which were put by those deluded persons who consulted them. In defiance of the oft convicted falsehood of the oracles, they were generally listened to, until a knowledge of the revealed will of God shewed forth their absurdity, and imposed upon them a perpetual silence. If the tree, then, is to be judged of by its fruits, it is a warrantable inference that systems of idolatry and superstition, such as have been now described, patronised by the heathen philosophers, afford a satisfactory proof, that those who complied with the practices which they enjoined, could not be possessed of a full and enlightened knowledge of the nature and perfections of the one only living and true God.

I shall now, however, take different ground, and granting, for the sake of argument, what no candid reasoner is entitled to demand, namely, that the philosophers themselves, both of Greece and Rome, had a correct knowledge of all the fundamental doctrines of true religion, and of the change which they must necessarily produce upon human conduct; the difficulty still remains, how is the great majority of mankind to become acquainted with divine truth? The answer to this question can be but one only,—by Divine Revelation. The process of observation and reasoning, by which the existence, perfections, and moral government of the one true God are proved,—the various duties of mankind, as individuals and members of society, are discovered, and the ultimate and eternal destiny of the race is ascertained, can only be comprehended by minds of a superior order, which have received all the advantage that a system of well conducted education affords. The generality of mankind have obtained from the Creator such faculties of mind, as resulted, through the influence of a fair proportion of the blessings of education, to fit them for the discharge of the necessary duties of life, and for occupying, with credit and respect, that place in society, which they are destined to fill. But the task of exploring the extended fields of knowledge, of unravelling the wonders of creation, and of deciding upon those complicated truths which are brought into view by a process of scientific investigation, is that which must be assigned to a few minds of superior order, possessing superior opportunities and advantages. The constitution of society requires that the great proportion of mankind be employed in the active pursuits and industrious occupations of life, which are indispensable not only to the comfort, but to the very continuance of existence. When, according to this constitution, a small fraction only of the whole members of mankind can devote themselves to a life of learned ease, and the remainder of the race must labour in the exercise of the different professions, in the prosecution of mechanical arts, in the production of manufactures, and in the cultivation of the soil, it is abundantly evident that this latter and incomparably most numerous proportion must be left in almost total ignorance of the great truths of religion, if they had human reason only for their instructor. Divine Revelation alone, therefore, is capable of removing that ignorance.

It has appeared from the short historical survey which has been taken, that there has never existed, in any part of the world where the benefits of Divine Revelation were unfelt, not even in the celebrated states of Greece and Rome, any thing which deserves the title of an accurate knowledge of the great truths of religion; and the inference to most minds will seem a just one, that human reason, unassisted, is incapable of arriving at such knowledge. But, as it may still be alleged that the failure of the wisest men of heathen antiquity to acquire it, is no proof of its being placed beyond the reach of the human intellect, I shall, in a concluding essay, make it appear, that, under any circumstances, the mind of man, unassisted by Divine Revelation, is totally and for ever incapacitated from obtaining the knowledge of that spiritual and heavenly truth, by which alone the soul can be saved.

ANNIE M'DONALD;

OR THE LIFE AND EXPERIENCE OF A CHRISTIAN PEASANT.

PART II.

THE life of every one, whether poor or rich, is at best a chequered scene. It is like an April day, alternately sunshine and showers. This was Annie's experience. She had enjoyed much happiness in her married state, but even in the course of this brief period, extending to scarcely five years, she had been not altogether a stranger to sorrow. The clouds, however, which had occasionally thrown a passing gloom over Annie's lowly cottage, prepared her, the more effectually, for the coming storm. Her heart was at length smitten as with a mildew, and all her prospects suddenly overcast by the death of her husband. They had walked together as heirs of the grace of life. They had often held sweet converse together on spiritual subjects, and encouraged each other with the hope of a coming immortality. But death interfered, and separated the happy pair, calling the one to behold the glories of the upper sanctuary, and leaving the other to wend her way through the wilderness of this world, feeling herself, more than ever, to be merely a pilgrim and a stranger. Annie was deprived of her protector, her counsellor, her Christian companion; and three infants, the youngest only five weeks old, and an aged mother, were left dependent on her for support. This was a heavy trial, and one who had less faith than Annie would have sunk under it. God, however, is graciously pleased when he sends trials to his people, to send them also strength to bear them. Such was the experience of this Christian cottager.

"After my husband died," said she, "I thought in myself, 'How shall I bring up a family for God, without the assistance of the father?' So I took a vow upon me, that as I was so trusted with lowness of spirits, I would give myself, and those children he had given me, in covenant to Him. If He would be my God, and the God of these children, I engaged to bring myself under every obligation to be ready to run his errand, whithersoever he called me, whether to suffering work or to servile work, whether to duty or to warfare; and I engaged, not in my own strength, but in His strength, and his own Spirit and grace. And I prayed, if it was his holy will to accept of my covenant transaction, that he would let me know it, by keeping his good hand both about me and about my children, that he would keep them from the evil of the world, while in the world."

Thus it was that, in her season of sorrow, Annie took occasion to dedicate herself and her children to the Lord. This practice has been often followed by God's people, and with remarkable success; they thus become included in the gracious declaration, "Blessed is that" people whose God is the Lord." He remembers, in their case, the covenant which he made of old with their spiritual father Abraham, "I will be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee." Annie vowed to be the Lord's, and throughout life she preserved upon her mind a constant impression of the solemn transaction. She used often to speak of it, and in old age, when urged to speak or write less, for fear of hurting herself, she would say, "Oh you know I have covenanted with my God, to do all that I can for his glory."

In the spirit of the vow which she had made, Annie now exerted herself with persevering and redoubled energy to provide for her helpless children and her infirm parent. Often when others slept she was busy at her spinning wheel, and by dint of industry and frugality, she was enabled, with the divine blessing, to support herself and her family, without having, in a single instance, had recourse to the parish funds. Such conduct was in the true spirit of that noble independence which was once all but universal among the Scottish peasantry, but alas! with the other traits of a Christian character, it is well nigh faded and gone. There are instances, however, of a contrary kind, and Annie was one. Trusting in the divine promises, she passed through many a struggle to earn a decent livelihood. He who feedeth the ravens fed Annie too. "The young lions may lack and suffer hunger, but they who trust in the Lord shall not lack any good thing." It may be interesting to record a few of the privations to which this pious cottager was subjected, and thus we shall see how true the divine promise is, "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in me."

"One season, when the price of provisions was particularly high, she lived by the side of a stream of clear water, and was often employed in bleaching cloth, which her neighbours sent to her care. She used to sit up through the night, watching the cloth, and busy at her wheel. In the morning she prepared her children's breakfast, and then retired to rest. After a short sleep, she arose, and was busied through the day watering her cloth and spinning. Notwithstanding this excessive fatigue, she was unable to procure for herself and family sufficient support. After making porridge for breakfast, she let her children take as much as they wished, and contented herself with what remained after they were satisfied. If nothing was left, she continued without food till dinner. Without having enough either of food or of sleep, it was a wonder that she was able to endure the double fatigue she underwent; but the God whom she served gave her strength according to her need, and preserved her in health.

"On one occasion, after having given her children their dinner, she had neither food nor money remaining, and knew not where to apply for either. In great perplexity of mind she made her prayer to God. The same afternoon, a charitable lady in the neighbourhood sent for her, and gave her a supply of meal; and on being made acquainted with the destitute state to which she had been reduced, charged her never to let herself be in such want again, without applying to her for relief. Annie used to refer to this, as confirming the truth of an observation which she often made, 'Man's extremity is God's opportunity.'"

Amid all her difficulties she continued to ply her laborious employments, and at length succeeded, when her children had grown up, in amassing a small sum of money to assist her in time of sickness or old age. This prudent foresight was a laudable feature in Annie's character, and one, too, which, far from being combined with a mean or miserly spirit, was, on the contrary, accompanied with a generous attention to the wants of her poorer neighbours. Nowhere is charity and kindness, and the amiable interchange of good offices seen to greater advantage than in the cottages of the poor. The rich can afford to be generous; it costs them nothing, comparatively nothing; but the benevolence of the poor has in it a self-denial which is truly sublime. We know not a finer scene which could meet the eye than that of the humble artizan entering the dwelling of his afflicted neighbour, with the gleam of Christian kindness in his eye, the breath of Christian consolation on his lips, and the hard won offering of Christian charity in his hand. It is altogether a mistake, a cruel, an unfeeling mistake, to suppose that generosity is confined to the wealthy; it is to be found in its purest and holiest exhibitions among the Christian poor. True, there is no blazoning of their deeds among men, but they are registered in heaven, and they shall at length receive their reward.

It was impossible that so consistent a disciple of Jesus, as Annie was, could long escape the reproaches and the sneers of the ungodly around her. "If they called the master of the house Beelzebub," how much more one of the humblest of his servants? Nothing else was to be expected, for nothing else was promised. "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution." "Marvel not," said our Lord, "if the world hate you; ye know that it hated me before it hated you." On this subject Annie thus speaks:

"I was earnest with the Most High that I might obtain more and more of Christ's livery. I meant that I might be made more holy in heart and in life. Now the way that I thought I got the answer was this:—One, that I had been as friendly to as I was able, took a displeasure at me; and went and called me not only a hypocrite, but a great one; and said that I was full of the devil,—'full of the devil,' were his very words. This I counted to be the livery of our Saviour, for I was ridiculed and persecuted from the cradle to the grave; and I thought that it was sent me, because I had need of it to humble me, and to let me see more of my own weakness and my own deformity, and how far I was from being able to fulfil my vows."

In course of time, one of her daughters having married, and the other two having engaged themselves as servants in different families, Annie, after several changes of residence, at length settled in the village of Monimail, where she spent the last thirty years of her life. For some years she continued her usual occupations, but when she became unfit for hard labour, she commenced a small school for teaching children to read. In this employment she was wonderfully successful, and it was only through the infirmities of age, and more especially the imperfection of her hearing, that she felt herself obliged to desist from the exertion of teaching. Though she gave up the school, however, Annie was not idle. She was still to be seen busily employed at her spinning wheel; and even at the advanced age of ninety-one, her industrious habits were as remarkable as ever. Industry was with her a matter of principle. She regarded it as a great Christian duty to husband well the great treasure—time; and, instead of squandering it, as too many do, in idle gossip, Annie lived habitually under the influence of a coming judgment, when she was to render an account for every thought, and word, and action. She sought to "redeem the time, seeing the days were few and evil."

During the latter years of her life, Annie's cottage became the frequent resort of the pious among her neighbours; and it was indeed a high privilege to enjoy a conversation with this aged saint. Her enlarged acquaintance with divine truth, her deep and fervent devotion, her familiarity with the varied turns and shifting of the Christian's experience, rendered her company valuable to all, both old and young, who were anxiously seeking the road to Zion. When speaking of the Redeemer's love, her eye would glisten, and her voice become more than usually animated. This was a theme on which she delighted to dwell. It is an infirmity of many people to think lightly of their neighbours. Of this fault Annie was peculiarly free. She always endeavoured to put the best construction on the actions of others, and where she could not conscientiously praise, she on most occasions forbore to condemn.

Some years before her death, Annie received a visit from the Rev. Legh Richmond; and so much was he pleased with her conversation, that he intended, had he lived, to have prepared and published a memoir of her. At the advanced age of ninety-one, Annie suffered a severe injury, in consequence of a fall. She now thought that death was at hand. It pleased God, however, to raise her up again, on which she remarked:—

"Oh, I had hoped to have been with the Lord; but his time is best. I feel just like a little ship tossed with the tempest, and when getting in at the harbour-head, obliged to go back again, to contend for some time longer with the rough jaws of the ocean."

As long as her strength permitted, Annie was diligent and regular in attending Church; and she so arranged matters on the Saturday, that the whole of the Lord's day might be spent in religious exercises. Before entering the house of God, she prepared herself by prayer and meditation; and the consequence was, that she derived much advantage from the ordinances. She went to Church not to criticise the preacher, or his discourse, but to listen attentively to the message which the Lord would be pleased to send her. A very pleasing account is given by Mr Brodie of an interview which he had with Annie, in reference to the employments of the Sabbath:—

"The writer of this memoir, calling upon her one Saturday evening, found her, as usual, full of prayer and praise, blessing God for the peace that she enjoyed, and desiring that others should help her to praise the Lord for his goodness. Taking his hand in both hers, she earnestly prayed that his labours might be blessed, that the Lord might be with him in his studies, in speaking to the people, in visiting the sick and the dying, and in all social meetings for prayer and exhortation. She spoke with great delight of the glorious plan of redemption, and expressed high satisfaction in recalling the words of the Shorter Catechism, which she called a precious table of God's truth. 'The Spirit of God,' said she, 'maketh effectual the preaching of the Word, first, by working faith in them; secondly, by uniting them to Christ in their effectual calling.' A little after, she added, 'Oh the blessed work of redemption! first, the foreknowledge; secondly, the predestination of the Lord; and, thirdly, the effectual calling of the Spirit. All grace, grace, free grace! Oh the goodness of the Lord through Christ, only through him.' On his leaving her, she said, 'May a' the blessings of the ninety-first psalm, and there are many o' them there, be with you! and may the Sun of Righteousness so shine into your heart, as to make it summer in your soul, though it be winter in the season!'"

In the end of the year 1830, Annie became very feeble, and incapable of remaining much out of bed. As long as she was able, however, she continued to write letters of encouragement to fellow Christians. As she grew worse, she slept less; but she used to say, these sleepless nights were blessed nights to her. She communed with her God and with her own heart, and in the multitude of her thoughts within her, the divine comforts delighted her soul. Towards the end of February 1831, her end seemed to be rapidly approaching. The peace of God, however, still flowed into her soul; and she felt, that though her flesh and heart were beginning to faint and to fail, God was the strength of her heart, and her portion for ever. A few passages from the graphic account which her biographer has given of her dying hours may be interesting:—

"One morning she said, 'I have had a wrestling night. I have been pleading for the king and the parliament, that the Lord would enable them to do their duty, and direct them to what may be most for the glory of God, and the good of souls. I have besought him for a blessing on my family and friends; but I did not stop there: I have gone round the world, to every place where there is a soul to be saved.'

"The same friends called for her again on Sabbath the 27th. They found the family sitting round the fire, and thought that Annie had been gone; but were surprised to see her sitting erect in her chair. She did not speak for some time. She knew them, and lifted up her hands very expressively, and seemed, by her look, to wish to speak. At last she said, 'God is the treasure of my soul.' She seemed very uneasy, lay back in her chair, and turned many different ways, and then in a little she repeated the whole verse:

'God is the treasure of my soul,
The source of lasting joy;
A joy, which want shall not impair,
Nor death itself destroy.'

'I am just waiting,—just waiting upon him. I can do nothing but wait on him. I am a wonder. I wonder that I am here.' They then learned that she had not expected to live so long. Indeed, her continuance in life appeared surprising to all who saw her. When they bade her good-bye, she looked up and said, 'He will reprove the devourer for your sakes,' referring to Malachi iii. 10, in which passage she had for many years taken much pleasure.

"They went back at night, to sit up with her for some time, in order to let her daughter get a little rest. They found her lying on a sofa, which they had sent her. She breathed more freely on it than in bed. The first thing she said after they went in was, 'Jesus,—Jesus,—Jesus is a sun and shield,—he'll grace and glory give.' It seemed to be an exertion for her to speak, and she had to rest, in order to gain strength to express what she wished to say. After a pause, she repeated the whole verse, 'For God the Lord's a sun and shield,' &c. (84th Psalm.) In a little she said, 'Towards the Lord, my waiting eyes continually are set.' At another time, 'I am a poor, a poor beggar, waiting for an alms of grace; and I'll no' be bidden go from the throne of grace without it.' One of her friends said, 'No, for the Lord says, seek and ye shall find.' Annie immediately took up the passage, and added, 'Ask, and ye shall receive; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' 'The Lord is so gracious that he represents himself knocking at the door of our hearts, and says, 'If any man will open, I will come in, and sup with him, and he with me.' When she awoke from a short sleep, she looked up, and said, 'Jesus will enlighten all my darkness,—doubts and fears are turned into praises.'

"She took no nourishment, excepting now and then a little milk. Once, after taking a mouthful of it, she lifted both her hands, and said,—'feathers.' Her friends began to fear her mind was wandering. She again said,—'feathers,—I trust.' They then discovered that she was thinking of the fourth verse of the 91st Psalm, which she used often to repeat with great delight. She then got strength to repeat the whole of that verse:

'His feathers shall thee hide; thy trust
Under his wings shall be;
His faithfulness shall be a shield;
And buckler unto thee.'

"This verse she again repeated aloud, together with the two preceding it; and probably she had gone over the next four verses without utterance, for, in a little, she repeated the last half of the eighth:

'For thou threaten the just reward
Of wicked men shall see.'

"She then spoke of God's love to his people. 'The Lord watches over his Church. He will build up Zion: I have engraven her name upon my hands. My hands shall build her ruined walls, and raise her broken frame.' She was often troubled with her cough, and seemed to have most ease in a sitting posture. When she had been asleep for a few minutes, and they were endeavouring to put her in as easy a posture as possible, she said, 'Thou shalt not need to be afraid for terrors of the night;' and, in a little after, the first verse of the 20th Psalm:

'Jehovah hear thee in the day
When trouble he doth send;
And let the name of Jacob's God,
Thee from all ill defend.'

"Her friends thought that she knew them, but were not sure, as she had not named them, and her sight had become very dim. One of them asked if she knew them? 'Oh yes, my dear friend,' putting her arms round her neck, 'May He be your light;'

'And oh what a life, what a rest, what a joy,
We shall know when we're mounted above;
Praise, praise shall my triumphing powers employ,
My God! I shall feast on thy love!'

"He is my fortress and my God; and in him trust I will. The Lord sometimes gives clear light, and shines brightly into the hearts of his people, as the clear shining of the sun after rain.' Being uneasy, and oppressed with weakness and coughing, she said, 'Oh day dawn! Oh day dawn! Oh may the ministering spirits stand by me, and every elect vessel, and waft me on their seraphic wings to the abodes of bliss!' In a little after, as if addressing her friends, she added, 'Oh stand fast. Oh trust. Be faithful unto the death, and He will give you a crown of life.' Then, as if in prayer,

'Set thou a watch before my mouth;
Keep of my lips the door.'
'Oh thou that art the mighty one,
Thy sword gird on thy thigh.'

"She then expressed her sense of gratitude to her friends, for their attention to her wants, and said, 'What am I, to be so attended!' and referring to the sofa, on which she was lying, 'What am I to be here! Do not conceal God's goodness under a bushel,—do not conceal God's goodness under a bushel.' 'Jesus is the true light of the world. He will make crooked things straight, and rough places smooth. He will make darkness light in his own time.' 'No man cometh to me, till God the Father draw him.' He is obliged to put forth a miracle of power to draw him. He complains that we will not come unto him, that we may have life, and have it abundantly. It is wonderful, wonderful, that I am what I am! Draw me! Draw me!

'God is of mine inheritance
And sup the portion;
The lot that fallen is to me,
Thou dost maintain alone.'

"So long as they were with her, she never complained or asked for anything, excepting once. Her mouth seemed very parched and sore, and her lips were black. She was offered a tea-spoonful of rose syrup, (from which she had often derived benefit, in moistening her throat and softening her cough,) but she refused it, and said, 'Water, water.' And the only time, while they were with her, that she prayed for relief from pain, she said, 'Draw me out of the miry clay.' Her next words were,

'And now another day is gone,
I'll sing my Maker's praise;
My comforts every hour make known
His providence and grace.'

"During the following day, (Monday, 29th Feb.) she became weaker and weaker. She had not much pain, but had a general feeling of uneasiness, and a constant desire to change her posture, so that she was by turns moved to the sofa, to the bed, and to her chair. Her mind, however, continued in the same heavenly frame; and when her strength would permit, she gave utterance to her feelings in appropriate texts of Scripture.

"Towards evening, when her daughters, by her own desire, were moving her from the bed to the sofa, she said, 'Lay me down,—lay me down,—I wish to sleep my last sleep in Jesus.' And she had only lain upon the sofa for a few seconds, when she breathed her last."

Such was the life and such the death of one, low in this world's estimation, but exalted in the estimation of Him who judgeth not after the outward appearance, but who alone judgeth the heart. Let no man boast of mere external trappings, such as wealth, and honour, and influence. These will avail him nothing on a judgment-day. The richest, the most powerful, and the most honourable among men, will then stand on a footing with the poorest, the humblest, and the most obscure. Let us be contented then, like Ananias, with the situation in which God has placed us, knowing, as we do, that such is the will of our heavenly Father, who doeth all things wisely and well.

RECORDS OF CREATION.

No. I.

ARRANGEMENT AND DISTRIBUTION OF ROCKS.

BY THE REV. JOHN ANDERSON,
Minister of Newburgh.

WHEN the great work of Creation was finished, the Divine Architect, we are told, "saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good." Every thing bore the impress of his hand, from the highest of the spheres to the least particle of matter. Divine power, wisdom, and goodness, were manifested throughout the whole; and, while the heavens declared the glory of God, the lowest depths of the earth, as well as the firmament, "shewed his handiwork." Milton, no less justly than beautifully, has represented Adam rising at once in paradise in the full perfection of his senses, and, filled with astonishment at the glorious appearances of nature, the heavens, the air, the earth, and seas, led by the contemplation of them, to ask whence this wonderful scene arose? A heathen philosopher, imagining a somewhat analogous case, and guided entirely by the light of nature, has suggested the answer in which the sublime inquiry would terminate. "If it were possible," says Cicero, "that persons who had long lived in subterreneous habitations, and had enjoyed only a vague report of the existence and power of the gods, should suddenly emerge into the light and lustre of the world we inhabit, they would no sooner behold the earth, and sea, and sky, or understand the regular order of the seasons and the vastness of the heavenly bodies, than they would at once acknowledge both the existence of superior powers, and that these wonders were of their creation." The portion of the divine works, in which our habitation has been fixed, has unquestionably undergone an immense change, in consequence of the fall, by which every department of nature has been more or less affected, but the workmanship still proves itself of God. There is not only power manifested, but a striking and inimitable beauty, interwoven with wisdom and goodness, painted on the face and over the whole arrangements of his hands here below; and from the high vantage ground on which we stand, instructed not only in the Word, but intimately acquainted with the works of God, we cannot fail to be deeply impressed with the sentiment which was felt by the king of Israel, who asserted that "God hath made every thing beautiful in his time."

The department of nature which it is first proposed to consider, as an illustration of these remarks, may appear, at first sight, but little calculated to enforce the truth of them. The surface of the earth is pleasingly diversified, and, at every season of the year, presents a thousand objects of attraction. But in the dead, inert, immovable masses beneath, the barren rock, the stiff clay, the colourless metals, where all seems confusion and disorder, what have we here in any way calculated to interest the heart or to excite feelings of piety? Much every way; and without aiming at any thing like a regular system of geological research, a few instances may be given, which may not be unacceptable, nor, perhaps, without instruction to the general reader. I shall carefully avoid all mere theoretic or speculative points, and confine myself solely to the acknowledged facts of the science, nor will the illustrations which I shall select cause me to depart, in the least, from the literal received interpretation of Scripture. Technical terms shall also, as much as possible, be avoided.

The first condition of the earth, of which we have any historical notice, is that which is represented in Genesis, where, after the declaration that God was the original Creator of all things, we are told of a period and condition of things when the whole of its materials were "without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep." The Spirit of God moved upon the surface of the shapeless mass, when the various elements of air, earth, and water gradually assumed their respective positions, and darkness, confusion, and disorder gave place to light, symmetry, and harmony. The form which the earth assumed, upon these arrangements being completed, as philosophy has demonstrated, was that of a spherical body flattened at the poles, that is, a figure resembling, as nearly as possible, the appearance of an orange, which is compressed at both ends. This form, as is farther demonstrated by strict mathematical principles, is precisely the one which a fluid body, revolving round its axis, and acquiring solidity at its surface, by the slow dissipation of its heat or other causes, would ultimately assume. There is reason to believe, therefore, that every part of the solid mass of the earth is symmetrically arranged, and that every individual particle occupies the position which divine wisdom has assigned to it. The vegetable and animal forms around us are composed of the same material substances, the same constituent elements, as those of which the globe itself is constructed, and the Divine Spirit, which so exquisitely modelled these forms and made them instinct with life, moved upon the face of the waters, and impressed upon the whole the unity, regularity, and adaptation which prevail among the separate parts. "The Lord by wisdom hath founded the earth; by understanding hath he established the heavens. O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all."

Considering the infinite variety of plants and animals which abound in the earth, one might have been led to expect a similar diversity in its mineral contents. But very different is the fact. The labours of the chemist have discovered fifty-two simple bodies, and these actually constitute the elements of all the material substances with which we are acquainted, as entering into the stony crust of the earth. The gems and other crystallized bodies are, indeed, numerous; the carbonate of lime alone assuming no less than about five hundred different forms. But the great aggregate masses of the earth are not only limited in number, but nearly uniform in composition, texture, and structure, over the entire surface. Great Britain is an epitome of the globe. The same hard, sharp, serrated rocks, which compose our insular mountain ranges, mark the snowy peaks of the Alps, and form a barrier to the ocean at the extreme points of the Americas. Melville Island and New South Wales possess the same series of sandstone, lime, and coal, which occur in the midland districts of England and Scotland. The granite of Aberdeen, and the syenite of Skye, can boast of a texture as compact and crystalline as those enduring masses out of which the Pharaohs built the pyramids. The condition of the interior is also indicated by the phenomena of volcanoes; these subterranean fires abound in every region of the globe, and burn as intensely under the snows of Iceland as within the range of the tropics. The influence of climate is strikingly manifested in the distribution of plants and animals; every newly discovered country adding something to our zoological and botanical collections. The mineral kingdom, as far as the nature of rocks is concerned, is alike independent of atmospheric influences, and geographical arrangements; from our travellers and voyagers, go where they will, geology receives no farther advantage than a corroboration of some previously established principle; nor, although it cannot be determined beforehand of what particular class of rocks an unexplored country is likely to be composed, is there reason to believe, that any new series or order of rocks remains to be discovered, from the one pole to the other, materially different from those with which we are already acquainted.

There must, therefore, be some system or principle of arrangement prevailing among the minerals of the earth, before the geologist could feel himself warranted in pronouncing, so decidedly, as to the entire superficies of the globe. This, accordingly, is the fact. Rocks have not been indiscriminately heaped together. They have been superimposed upon each other in the most perfect order. When God fixed "the foundations of the earth," stretched his compass "upon the face of the deep," and laid "the beams of his chambers in the waters," he completed the mighty edifice agreeably to the plan which he had determined upon from the beginning: the different portions of the building rise one above another in regular succession; and the finished work, so far as we can survey the interior, displays, by the most unequivocal indications, the several courses into which the materials have been thrown. These constitute what geologists call the strata of the earth, that is, compressed or flattened layers, of varying thickness, such as our sand and limestones exhibit, and which envelope the circumference of the globe. The order in which the strata are disposed is uniform from below upwards, and this order is never inverted. From the blue slates of the Gramplans to the chalk cliffs at Dover, there is a regular succession of intermediate rocks, piled one upon another like the mason-work of our houses; and, while to many there appears nothing but confusion, to the scientific eye, every portion of the series, although the same ingredients enter into several classes of rocks, is as well defined, and as easily recognised, as the two members at the extreme points are by the common observer. Suppose the letters of the alphabet to represent the series of rocks of which the crust of the earth is composed, A being the stratum nearest the surface, and Z the lowest. Now such is the uniformity of position among the several strata, that A is never found below Z, nor alternating with any of the other intervening letters: Z, on the other hand, is never found above any of the letters that stand before it in the alphabet; and the same holds true of all the rest. Thus every rock occupies its own relative place. The chalk deposit stands high, though not the highest, in the series, and it is never found to intrude itself between any of the inferior groups; it is not seen beneath the coal or limestone of the midland districts, nor can a particle of it be traced among the red and grey sandstones which rest immediately upon the more indurated slaty rocks. These observations equally apply to every other class of stratified rocks, both at home and abroad, beneath the tropics, and throughout the entire dimensions of the earth's surface. "There is a vein for the silver, and a place for gold where they find it: iron is taken out of the earth, and brass is molten out of the stone: He setteth an end to darkness, and searcheth out all perfection."

Why, then, the question will naturally occur, do we not find the same rocks prevailing universally? Why are the rocks different in different districts? And, why do we see the lowest as well as the highest of the series actually spread out for miles upon the surface? Unquestionably such is the case. Every locality, or district of country of any extent, is characterized by its own particular class of rocks; and, while this forms no exception to the law of superposition stated above, it unfolds one of the most beautiful arrangements in the whole economy of nature, by which the mineral treasures of the earth are rendered subservient to purposes of utility, and shews, where we had least reason to expect it, the clearest indications of benevolence and design. Let us endeavour to explain how this happens.

While the number of the rocks which compose the earth's crust is limited, we know, at the same time, of very few localities in which the whole series can be found entire. Particular members, in certain districts, are altogether wanting, and in the absence of the interposing mass, two remoter bed are necessarily brought into contact. But instead of one or two of the series, several members are cut off, and the highest and the lowest may be nearly united. Again, the whole superincumbent beds are removed, and we find certain districts characterized, through the length and breadth of many miles, by one prevailing rock. Hence the well-known features of our coal fields, which useful mineral occupies the centre nearly of the several groups. Hence, too, the sandstones that predominate in the lower districts of the shires of Stirling, Perth, and Forfar; also in Dumfries-shire, and the adjacent localities on the borders. Beneath these sandstones, what occurs? May we, by any mere effort of digging, stumble upon some unknown rock, or fall in with the mineral treasures of the higher regions? Assuredly neither result will follow; the chalk will not appear, and there is no coal to reward the labour of our hands. Our knowledge thus far is of the greatest practical importance, in determining the districts in which the coal-beds are likely to occur, and where there is a certainty that they do not exist,—thereby at once securing individuals against the risk of being led into useless and expensive operations, and preventing the community from lamenting their want of enterprise, in depriving them of blessings which Providence has not bestowed upon them. Behold in this a proof of divine wisdom! Had the several strata of rocks everywhere prevailed, the inhabitants of the earth would have had no variety of materials out of which to construct their dwellings, as their operations would have been confined to the highest beds, and thus a limit would, in so far, have been set to the exercise of their ingenuity and taste. Behold, too, a proof of the divine goodness! Had no system been observed in the superposition of rocks, we could have obtained no knowledge of their relations to one another, and, of consequence, must have been incessantly engaged in searching for the more useful metals where they did not exist, or, if the entire series had been deposited in every locality, the utmost efforts of human industry could never have reached them.

Here, then, we have two of the most important facts connected with the structure of the earth, in relation to the purposes of utility,—regularity in the superposition of its rocks, and yet the whole so distributed as to be accessible to its inhabitants. To estimate the importance of this arrangement, let us consider the average thickness of the beds which lie above the coal, as these have been stated in some of the most accurate surveys of England. The newest floetz or tertiary rocks above the chalk, consisting of claystone, marl, and imperfectly consolidated limestone, give about 1400 feet in average thickness over the districts in which they are situated. The chalk is estimated about 1800 feet; the green and iron sand formation, which underlies the chalk, about 600 feet; the oolitic series about 1800 feet; the lias about 450 feet; the new red sandstone, in which the rock salt is situated, about 2100 feet; the magnesian limestone about 200 feet; and to these succeed the coal measures, consisting of alternate beds of coal, ironstone, clay, and sandstone. Thus the superincumbent mass which overlies the coal is nearly 8000 feet, from beneath which, but for the arrangement above alluded to, the mineral must have been extracted, being a depth three times greater than that of the deepest mines with which we are acquainted.

ON THE SEASON OF SPRING, WITH ITS RELIGIOUS LESSONS:

A DISCOURSE.

By THE REV. J. G. LORIMER,

Minister of St. David's Parish, Glasgow.

"Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created; and thou renewest the face of the earth."—PSALM civ. 30.

At this moment we are living in the heart of spring—a mighty and a beautiful change is taking place in the world around us. Let us not suffer it to pass away unheeded and unimproved; let us see whether we cannot behold in it manifestations of God, and draw from it lessons of wisdom, which may prove sweet and profitable after the spring itself has departed.

No one can be so ignorant as not to know what is meant by the spring,—it is universally and familiarly known. Perhaps this is, of all seasons of the year, the most striking. The transition from spring into summer, and from summer into autumn; and from autumn into winter, does not seem so strange and wonderful as the passage from winter into spring. In the other cases there is little more than the development of a state of things already in existence. It is otherwise with spring. It is like a creation coming out of nothing. There is nothing in winter which prepares our mind to expect it. It is thoroughly new, and, not improbably, the darkness, and the wetness, and the dreariness of winter, through which we have passed, make the spring more beautiful than other seasons. Hence it is that spring has always drawn a large share of attention. The heathen have worshipped it like a goddess, and it is among the first and most frequent objects celebrated in the verses of the poet.

I need not attempt to describe it, as its features are marked and well known to all. Let me only carry back your thoughts for a little. Winter covers the earth in frost, or snow, or storms,—light is brief. Everything in nature may be said to be at a stand, and to savour of the silence and death of the sepulchre. Thoughtless men may complain, and think such a state of things derogatory to the character of God, and that it would be much better had there been no winter; but these are the suggestions of ignorance. The earth must rest as well as man, to prepare for ensuing fertility. The snows of winter protect the seeds of vegetation; its storms purify the atmosphere from a thousand noxious influences, which, if stagnant, might descend upon us in fever or in plague. Its frosts and rains are essential to the due preparation of the soil, and to the destruction of its weeds; and, moreover, it has been ordered, that our winter gives to other and to mighty nations the benefit of summer, and thus is the general happiness more widely diffused and spread among a greater number of individuals than had winter never fallen upon the earth. The removal of winter from the seasons of the year would be no gain; it would, ere long, prove a serious loss. But it does not last for ever. It would be dismal if it did. Soon the days lengthen—the snow and the frost disappear—the weather is moderated, and man is ready for his labour—and now a remarkable change appears through all nature. Buds, concealed under the ground, or guarded by the wisest protection against the severity of winter, swell and expand into leaves, or blossoms, or shoots. The juices of trees, so long asleep, now awake, and push through all their parts, and array the branches in green. The influence is everywhere felt and manifested where man's eye reaches, and where it reaches not. The winds, so wisely ordered, dry up the superfluous moisture from the earth. Man goes forth to his labour. The air is elastic and serene, and almost invites to exertion. There is no sultry heat to weary him in his work, and the mornings and the evenings enlarge to suit his protracted labours. The flowers are dressed in the gayest bloom, the birds warble in the woods their sweetest music, and gladden creation with their song. All the animal tribes partake of the impulse of life, and cheer man in his undertakings. Universal nature becomes green to the eye, and harmony to the ear. Bright are the heavens, and still brighter the prospects. What a change from the snow, and the darkness, and the death of winter!

And what has caused this great change? Probably the wise man of this world tells us it is owing to the natural motion of the earth round the sun; that in spring the earth is in that part of her course which subjects her surface to the powerful and increasing influence of the sun; that it is light and heat which work all the changes which we admire so much. There is something in this account which is true. God brings about the changes of the year through the medium of second causes, and light and heat have great power over the spring, but this does not exhaust the truth; and it is to be feared the atheism of man often shelters itself under the names and laws of nature, that it may not be disturbed with the thought of a present God. Even where God commits the changes of the seasons to second instruments, he seems, for wise reasons, to retain so much of the power in his own hands, as to remind men that the changes are from him. Thus, while it is true that the seasons are produced by the particular form or inclination through which the earth passes in her course round the sun, the question presents itself, why does the earth revolve in this form and not in another? There is no doubt that she might be carried in motion round the sun without producing that variety of heat which gives rise to the seasons. And I know of no law in nature or philosophy which determines that she shall revolve in this form, and invariably abide by it, save the will and immediate operation of God; and, therefore, as to the heat and light of the sun, the whole change of spring cannot be ascribed to them. They manifestly exert a powerful influence, but who has not seen the flower blossoming amidst severest cold? and how is it, if heat were the sole cause, that the trees and fields do not begin their spring in the last rather than in the first months of the year? For the most part, the heat of the one period is greater than that of the other. But the spring never departs from her course. She does not anticipate her season, whether there be warmth or whether there be cold, and to what can this be attributed but the visitation of God?

These views are amply confirmed by the Scriptures, which, instead of explaining away God's presence even from the most common and regular changes of the world, ascribe to him a near, and personal, and perpetual operation. Never do they, like man, exclude God from the government of his own world, and put up names, and laws, and shadows, in his room. We are told that all creation is from God,—that the heaven and the earth were founded by him,—that the grass, and the herbs, and the trees, and the animals, grow at his word,—that the very day and night come and depart at his bidding. And, surely, if God created at first, it must be the same Being who preserves from day to day; for what is preservation, strictly examined, but continual creation, and if God extends his care to so many smaller changes, surely he must exercise the same care over the larger movements of the world. If he rules over day and night, he must rule over the seasons.

In accordance with such presumptions, we read, "Thou hast set all the borders of the earth; Thou hast made summer and winter," and if summer and winter, certainly also spring and autumn, which divide them. We read in the 75th Psalm, after a beautiful description of the great operations of nature, "Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly; thou settlest the furrows thereof; thou makest it soft with showers; thou blessest the springing thereof." In our text it is said, "Thou sendest forth thy spirit, and they," both animal and vegetable life, "are created," not absolutely but substantially, for spring closely resembles a creation. "Thou renewest the face of the earth. Sing unto the Lord who covereth the heavens with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth, who maketh grass to grow upon the mountains." The same doctrine is taught in the epistle to the Corinthians, when inculcating another and a spiritual truth, "Paul may plant and Apollos water, but it is God alone who giveth the increase," who maketh the seed to grow,—one of the grand operations of spring. It appears, then, that whatever may be the instruments of which God makes use in carrying forward the seasons, instruments whose adaptation to the service may well fill us with gratitude and praise, the whole must always be referred to himself; that though we see him not, it is God who makes the spring, and leads forward the course of the year, and terminates it in winter; and, moreover, that he leaves part of the operation unexplored by natural causes, that we may more readily acknowledge his hand.

Having seen that God is the great Author of spring, let us now consider the manifestations which it affords of the divine character. We would expect it to speak of God, and our expectations are not disappointed. Spring proclaims God's power. Contemplating nature in the midst of winter, we never could anticipate the arrival of spring; all seems dead, hopelessly dead, the grass is withered to the ground, the trees are without a leaf, not a flower meets the eye. Perhaps frost and snow cover the earth, and scarcely leave to it the same appearance. At this moment, were the whole force of men and animals employed, no sign of vegetation could be produced; no skill could form a single flower. How immense, then, the divine energy which, in a few weeks, perfectly changes all the scene, which, without effort or labour, brings plants and flowers in countless millions out of the earth, all varying in their hues, and structures, and properties, and yet all springing from one common material—dust! Though the most powerful men were assigned but a small space, and most favourable circumstances, they could not create a bud or a blossom, but God, at every return of spring, creates over the vast surface of the earth, and in most disadvantageous circumstances, the mightiest array of vegetable productions.

Then spring proclaims God's wisdom. How great is the wisdom that the year is divided into seasons at all, that God did not create the world at first, in one form, and then allow it to stand still for ever, but that he constantly renews its surface! What an opportunity does this afford us of proving God's perpetual providence, and of marking the exemplification of his character! How does this enlarge the provision of food for man and beast, and multiply the sources of happiness, by annually restoring and renovating the earth! And then what wisdom appears in the circumstances in which the spring presents itself! It comes forth gradually from small beginnings; it does not burst upon us in a day. We could not be prepared for this, and the shock of so sudden a transition would prove hurtful to us, and to the whole living creation. There is, therefore, a dawn of preparation, and we are freed from perplexity and surprise. Where, however, as in very cold climates, the season of vegetation and maturity is short, God compensates for the brevity by hastening forward the spring with amazing rapidity. Without this kind provision the inhabitants must have perished.

Think, again, how loudly the season speaks in behalf of the faithfulness of God. Immediately after the deluge God promised there should be seed-time and harvest to the end of the world, and through four thousand years how exactly has this been fulfilled! Great changes may have passed over men and nations, but spring has regularly appeared at her appointed season; she never forgot to come, nor did she ever come out of her proper order. Dismal, indeed, would have been the condition of man, had she ever done so; but no, her succession has been most beautiful and regular, faithful like the God from whom she flows, and sweetly whispering that if God be so trustworthy in nature, he will not be less faithful in the promises of grace. But while the returns of spring are so regular and true, there is wisely blended along with them a measure of uncertainty as to the precise nature and duration of the season. Had man known to an hour, when the spring was to begin, and what was to be its heat, and how long it was to last, he might have been tempted to be slothful and improvident. God, then, has mercifully withheld such knowledge from him, and given just enough of regularity to the spring, to fulfil his own promise and awaken man's expectation without inducing inactivity and remissness.

And, lastly, how strongly does the spring proclaim the goodness of God! Many, perhaps all the grand operations of this season could be carried forward effectually, without ministering to our happiness. Though the flowers were not so beautiful, nor the earth so verdant, man might have lived, and successfully laboured, and the spring might have been perfect. But God, in his providence, would add to our enjoyment, and so he clothes all nature in charms. He superinduces beauty upon use; the air is serene, and the light is pleasant, and the flowers are fragrant, and the sky is blue, and the earth is green, and the woods are vocal. These might all have been reversed, and spring still fulfilled her course, but God has crowded them into this season of the year to testify his providential goodness. And how is that goodness illustrated by his renewing the spring every year! He does not create it once or twice merely. Had he done so we would still have had strong evidence of his kindness, but he multiplies the evidence. He gives us ever recurring occasions to celebrate his praise; and in the progress of every spring what a successive expansion is there of the proofs of his providence! How do the flowers, for instance, burst forth in successive orders. Had they been all unfolded in a day, they would most likely have withered together, and the eye would have been so distracted that it could not have considered them all. But there is a beautiful succession suited to the progress of the season. We see more of God's goodness, and we have leisure to contemplate it more accurately. It is like the goodness of creating the world in six days, rather than creating it in a moment.

Thus have we seen how many and important perfections of the divine character are displayed in spring. Men, for the most part, behold none of these things in this season of the year. They account spring a matter of course, and its blessings so common as not to merit any special notice. But this disposition is far wrong. It dishonours God and despises his goodness; the very regularity and frequency of the returns, instead of making men insensible, should have the opposite effect. They are proofs of God's faithfulness, and of the perpetuity of his care, and should be esteemed the more highly just because they are so common. Should bread be less valued because it does not come once a month, or a year, but every day? Let the changes of spring, then, be marked. Let them not be resolved into cold and heartless laws. Let them all be attributed to God's pervading providence.

And now we shall conclude with a reference to a few great events and truths, of which spring may be considered as an emblem. Spring is the image of youth. Attend to this my young friends. It is to the year what your present period is to your after-life. There is no image more plain, or common, or established than this. We speak of the spring of youth, and the summer of manhood, and the autumn of years, and the winter of age. Now you are in the spring, probably the most beautiful, certainly the most useful and important season. It is more precious even than autumn, for every thing is dependent upon spring. If there are no buds and no blossoms there can be no fruits, however favourable may be the summer.

Now what is your great duty as to this season? It is diligently to improve it for all the noble purposes for which it is given; to be diligent for time, and to be diligent for eternity, to prepare for the duties of this life, and the enjoyments of the next. Spring you know is the seed-time, and how busy is the gardener and the husbandman in this season; they are ploughing, and sowing, and harrowing the ground; they are employing all their exertions, God willing, to have an abundant harvest. They are working early and late. And should not you do the same? Your harvest is still more precious.

It is to be reaped not merely in time, but in eternity. What you sow now will affect your condition for ever. What does an ignorant or slothful husbandman, who neglects the spring, reap? He reaps weeds, and bankruptcy, and disgrace. Take care that your harvest be not equally unprofitable and destructive. Think not that the sluggard shall reap the fruits of industry, or that he who sows to the flesh shall reap incorruption. Diligently avail yourselves of the means of intellectual, moral, and religious good, which God, and your country, and your friends have provided for you, and both here and hereafter you shall have a glorious and a golden harvest.

Again, spring is the emblem of the resurrection of the body from the dust of the grave. This is not a mere resemblance, which the fancy of man has discovered, it is an illustration and an argument which the Apostle Paul employs, when discoursing on this great doctrine. "But some man will say, how are the dead raised, and with what body do they come; thou fool," or ignorant man, "that which thou sowest is not made alive except" it first seem to "die;" the corn rots and goes to decay before it springs anew, (1 Cor. xv. 37-42,) so also is the resurrection of the dead body. "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption." Looking over the earth in the midst of winter, one can see nothing but the emblems of death,—withered grass, and leafless trees, and dark and cheerless earth—all seems dead, as dead as the corpse stretched in its tomb; but spring returns, God exerts his almighty but invisible power, and soon all nature revives. Life bursts from every tree and every field, nay, bursts in fresher and more beautiful forms, in gayer colours and sweeter music, than those with which it left the world, a few months before; no spot, however distant and inaccessible, escapes this great annual resurrection; all is made to live again, the aged tree, the blossoming shrub. Now as it is, and has been with the natural world, so it shall be with man on the great day of his spring. The resurrection of the human body is just as sure as the resurrection of the vegetable body. The one is not only an image but a pledge of the other. When a human corpse is laid in the grave, nothing can seem more unlike to life. It seems to be a prey of hopeless dissolution, and were human or created power the only restorer, it would indeed remain for ever the captive of destruction. Men, in every age, have felt the difficulty of believing in a resurrection, owing to the immense energy which it demands. To raise a single dead body to life, would require a vast exertion of strength, and what then will it be to raise all the innumerable millions of our race, who have ever been or shall be scattered through earth and water, and to raise them at once! We need to have the aid of sense in addition to that of testimony to help us to the belief of a resurrection. We need to see a power at work, which can penetrate the deepest recesses of every substance, and comprehend the wide earth under its dominion, to give an abiding persuasion of the doctrine; and such a power we behold adequate and universal in the power which awakens and carries forward the vegetable spring. In the one we have a specimen and a sample of what can be done, and shall be done for the other. Yes! all men, without exception, shall live again. A stronger energy than that of spring shall reach them, wherever they may be reposing. The trumpet voice shall break the heaviest and longest sleep, and not one shall slumber for another moment. All shall be life and activity; and in the twinkling of an eye all shall be assembled before the throne of the Judge. When we stand shivering among the snows of winter, dreary and sad, we are comforted by remembering that in a few weeks there shall come a spring which shall dissipate our gloom and reclothe the earth in flowers, and smiles, and animal enjoyment; and so should we feel when standing at the graves of our Christian friends and fellow-men: let us be cheered by remembering this is but the day of their winter, that that winter is not to endure for ever, that ere long the snow clouds are to disappear, the storm to be hushed, the sun to break forth, and the resurrection begin; that not more surely does the decayed grass of the church-yard revive with the return of spring, than shall the bodies which it covers awake from the dead, on the morning of the resurrection. Oh what comfort is this to meet our departed friends in more glorious forms than they have ever worn before, to meet them at the footstool of our common Father! The joys of spring were poor compared with such joys as these!

The last great doctrine of which the spring is an emblem is the spiritual life—the grace of God in the soul. Divine truth is a seed, and Christ is the great sower, and the springing of the seed is the beginning of a new life. Christ tells us in a parable, that the kingdom of God, both in the Church and in the world, is as if a man should cast seed into the earth, and should sleep and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how; for the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself, by her own energy, first the blade, then the ear, then the full or perfect corn in the ear. By nature, all mankind are in a state of winter—cold, and stormy, and uncomfortable—and, if left to themselves, that winter would remain for ever; but God, in his mercy, has blessed the world with the day-spring from on high. The seed of the Gospel he has scattered from a liberal hand. With many, the seed rots in the dust, choked, and buried, and trodden down, under the cares and sins of a present life; but with others it swells, and expands, and bursts into the beauty and the hopes of spring, and when thus really alive it never dies. The spring upon earth is imperfect; a day of sunshine and serenity is often succeeded by a lingering blast of winter, and the hail and the frost are sometimes seen lying heavy on the tender leaves and opening buds; the vegetation is checked for a season, and winter and spring seem to contend for the mastery; but spring is never destroyed. It may seem the weaker of the two, but immense power is standing behind, and it is always the conqueror; and so it is with the Christian, the divine life of grace may be retarded, but it ultimately outgrows the old man of nature. Departing winter may be boisterous and fierce, and would fain nip the blossom and destroy the fruit; but it cannot finally prevail—greater is He who is for the Christian, than all they who are, or who can be, against him.

And as the spring of the earth is gradual and progressive, so is the spring of grace in the soul—there is the blade, and the shooting ear, and the ripe corn in both. These stages and operations are not gone through in a day—they follow each other in beautiful evolution. The young believer must not be discouraged that he has not at once all the fruits of autumn. He would be an impatient husbandman, who looked for blossom and fruit at the same moment; and so would he, the Christian or Christian minister, who forgot there is grace in the blade as well as grace in the full corn, and thought that safety is only to be found among the highest attainments. But while the divine life can consist with small beginnings, nay, while we are taught to expect this shall be its outset, let it be remembered, that where it is real it is progressive—that it does not flourish for a few days, and then die—that it lives and advances, and that this is the great proof of its sincerity. Oh let the believer cultivate this spring!—let him never rest contented with the winter of formality and sloth—let him not comfort himself with the idea that he lives, when he is wearing the ensigns of death; but let him be all awake and alive—let him be stirring and labouring—let him remember the depth and duration of his winter, be anxious to make up for the lost time by warmer prayer, and more zealous exertions—let him manifest much of the character of spring—let him make great and visible advancement—let one year witness increased progress on its predecessor; and his spring shall, ere long, be turned into the summer of heaven, and he shall change the blossom for the everlasting fruit—the dawning light shall usher in the perfect and glorious day.

The natural spring around us, with its leaves, and its flowers, and its birds, is most beautiful and sweet. How melancholy, that the soul of man, the church, and the world, should savour so much of the coldness and darkness of winter—that while matter is moving, mind should be standing still, perhaps retrograding into evil—that the one prospect should be bright, the other so dismal! Alas! what avails it, that all nature should be beautiful and good, if the soul be stained with guilt and oppressed with misery? What avails all the charms of Eden, when man has sinned, and knows not a Saviour? Let me exhort all who are still in the winter of their natural condition, to have immediate recourse to the Sun of Righteousness,—to believe in Him who alone can quicken and make them alive,—never to be satisfied till the principle of the new life is implanted, and brings forth fruit within them, and till they can unite the joys and the progress of spiritual spring together. Let them remember, that as certainly as God has promised spring to the natural world, and has never failed to fulfil his promise, so certainly will he make good his assurance, that they who believe upon his Son shall not perish, but have eternal life, while the dead and the withered tree shall be rooted up and burnt in the fire.

And from what has been said, let all be taught to mark and to study the works of nature with a religious eye. These works are within the observation and the reach of all;—no science, and no experience, are required. The most sublime and devotional views lie upon the surface, and may be seen and received by every mind. Do not only study them, and find food in them for adoration, and gratitude, and praise—seek also, like the Saviour, to draw spiritual instruction from them, to perceive spiritual analogies and spiritual contrasts, and to apply the whole to your own experience—seek to turn every passing season, and every passing circumstance, to the great purposes of practical godliness; and then every walk in the garden, and every walk in the fields, will acquire a fresh importance, and minister profit with pleasure.

EDUCATION IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S SCHEME

NO. I.

By all Protestant Churches, the subject of education has been regarded with peculiar interest, as being intimately connected both with the temporal comfort and the spiritual advantage of the people. And nowhere has this topic attracted more attention than in the Protestant Church of Scotland. Even in the earliest period of her history, the parish school was uniformly considered an indispensable appendage and auxiliary to the parish church. Hence the high character which the Scottish peasantry have ever held for superior cultivation. But, notwithstanding the favourable opinion which has been so generally entertained of the intellectual superiority of the people of Scotland, the fact is not to be concealed, that immense tracts of the country can even yet be pointed out where the benefits of knowledge have never been enjoyed. More than a century has passed since the attention of the Established Church was aroused to the destitute state of the Highlands and Islands, in point of education. In 1704 we find the Assembly enjoining a fund to be raised, by parochial and other contributions, for the purpose of remedying this great evil. Two years after, the same injunction was renewed, but the success appears to have been very limited, and at length, in 1709, the Assembly directed that the sums already procured should be handed over to the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge, which had been recently established by a few individuals, and erected into a corporation by charter from Queen Anne. By that society the sums were applied for the purpose which the Assembly contemplated, and schools were established in various districts of the Highlands under their superintendence. No further efforts appear to have been made by the General Assembly, until the suggestion of the scheme which has been for some years in most successful operation. The honour of originating the measures now in progress for the accomplishment of a design so important is solely due to the benevolent Principal of the University of Edinburgh. The circumstances which led Dr Baird to direct his attention to this subject, are chiefly these, as detailed in the Narrative of the Rise and Progress of the Scheme appended to the Report of the General Assembly's Committee for 1828:—

"In the year 1818, a commission had been appointed by Parliament, for the important purpose of inquiring into the existing state of education throughout the whole united kingdom. To facilitate the inquiry in respect to Scotland, Mr Brougham, the chairman of the commission, solicited the countenance and aid of the General Assembly,—suggesting that the Assembly might recommend a proper attention, by parochial ministers, to such queries as the commission might transmit to their respective parishes. The Assembly granted the concurrence requested by the commission; and without delay appointed a committee to revise the Parliamentary queries, and to transmit them to the parishes. The result, after a short time was, that large collection of returns, above alluded to, which were received by Dr Baird, in the first instance, and by him transmitted to Mr Brougham, as chairman of the Parliamentary commission, under whose superintendence a digest of the whole was submitted to Parliament, and was afterwards printed and published. The returns were then sent back by Mr Brougham to Dr Baird, as convener of the General Assembly's committee; and perhaps they have not at any time served a more important purpose than that to which they were now applied.

"As soon as it was made known that the Presbytery of Edinburgh had resolved to overture the ensuing Assembly on this subject, other presbyteries and synods, with which Dr Baird had very sedulously corresponded, were induced to follow the example. Among these, it may be noticed, were the low country Presbyteries of Dumfries, Lochmaben, and Kirkcudbright. A general, though vague, persuasion appears, indeed, to have existed throughout the country, that the means of education and of religious instruction were ill provided in the Highlands and Islands; and that this state of matters in these districts claimed the earnest consideration of the country at large.

"In order, however, that the grievance might be precisely understood in its proper form and magnitude, Dr Baird employed himself in communicating very extensively throughout the Church the substance of such information as had been supplied by the Parliamentary returns. From these he prepared a statement of facts, which he transmitted to many of the provincial presbyteries and county meetings, and to many influential proprietors in the Highlands. In all projects of the kind in question, much, it is evident, must always depend upon the energy and assiduity with which the first steps are followed out. In this case, accordingly, nothing was omitted to create at once a popular inclination to the proposed measure, and to secure the sanction of the Assembly. It was certain that the overtures could have no grounds equal in authenticity and completeness to what were afforded by the Parliamentary returns; but in what manner were these indigested masses to be made available before the house, and their contents to be presented as an argument upon the instant of deliberation? To insure this, Dr Baird, a few weeks before the meeting of Assembly, (1824) undertook to abstract the substance of the returns, so far as they might illustrate the more striking deficiencies both in education and religious instruction throughout the Highlands and Islands; which abstract was, in due time, prepared and printed. It was circulated largely among the members of Assembly during the first days of the session; and there can be no doubt that, by furnishing a most instructive memorial upon the subject, it created a decided predisposition in favour of the object of the overtures.

"With such industrious preparations the matter came at length to be considered by the General Assembly; and there it was entertained as cordially as any proposition ever submitted to that house."

Ministers from various parts of the Highlands confirmed the truth of the statements contained in the returns, and the Assembly entering warmly into the subject, appointed a committee to make still further inquiries as to the best mode of attaining the great object, and to ascertain whether the heritors and landed proprietors in the unenlightened districts were willing to lend their co-operation and assistance. Much had already been done for the establishment and support of schools in several places, by four different education societies, who had been labouring zealously in the good cause; much had been done by the judicious application of the sum annually allowed since 1725 by Government to the General Assembly, for the maintenance of missionaries and catechists in the Highlands and Islands; but, notwithstanding all this, it was satisfactorily established by the returns laid before the General Assembly by Dr Baird, that large districts of country were, still, in point of intellectual and moral cultivation, a desert waste. The facts were strong, and they produced a powerful effect. By a curious but beautiful coincidence, the Assembly had that very day come to the resolution of establishing a mission on the shores of heathen India; and, actuated by a similar spirit of Christian benevolence, they resolved to take immediate steps for the religious and moral improvement of our countrymen at home. The same principles which led to the unanimous adoption of the one resolution, prepared the members of Assembly for the equally unanimous adoption of the other. And it is impossible, perhaps, to point to a more memorable day in the history of the Church of Scotland, than that which witnessed the simultaneous formation of the India, Mission and the Education Scheme.

DIVINE GRACE EXEMPLIFIED IN THE CONVERSION OF A SINNER.

BY MR ALEX. TOUGH, JUN., Elder of the Middle Parish, Greenock.

CIRCUMSTANCES which are in themselves not any way peculiar or extraordinary, often obtain an importance in our estimation, and make a deep and lasting impression on our minds, because of the manner in which we became acquainted with them. Such is the case in relation to the events recorded in the following narrative:—

In the autumn of the year —, on retiring to rest one evening I thought I heard a peculiar sound, which, on examination, I found to be the voice of a female proceeding from behind a hedge, which was within a few yards of the window. She was engaged in prayer, crying unto the Lord from out of the depths of conscious guilt and misery, into which her sins had brought her: "Deep calleth unto deep; at the noise of thy water-spouts all thy billows are gone over me, thy wrath lieth hard upon me, thou hast afflicted me with all thy waves; the sorrows of hell encompass me; the floods of ungodly men make me afraid. O Lord, in this night of sore distress, I will call upon thee; and though laden with guilt and iniquity, thou hast promised to be a refuge, and a very present help in the time of trouble. Hear me, O Lord, and save me for His sake who died on the cross for my salvation." This prayer was uttered with such a tone of simplicity and fervency, that, in connection with the time and circumstances, it made a deep and lasting impression on my mind. Having observed whither she retired after prayer, I sought an early opportunity of introducing myself to her, and shall now give a few particulars of her history.

She was a native of Argyleshire. Her mother having died when she was about fourteen years of age, she was left in charge of her grandmother, who was a pious woman, and who instructed her carefully in the doctrines of our holy religion. When about nineteen, her grandmother died; and having no other means of support, she came to Greenock in the capacity of a servant. The family with which her lot was cast, was destitute of even the appearance of religion, and instead of prayer and reading the Word of God, there was every thing directly the reverse. Good impressions, which had been early imprinted on her mind, soon began to vanish "like the morning cloud, and the early dew, which passeth away." Exposed to those things that were detrimental to a life of godliness, her conscience lost its sensibility, and in time became seared as if with a hot iron; for having formed acquaintances of a loose and immoral character, she went to great lengths in wickedness, which she wrought with greediness.

She left her former service, and removed to a respectable family, where she was allowed on the Sabbath to attend Church. But, instead of entering the house of God, this sacred day was spent with ungodly companions in sinful amusements. We now arrive at a deeply interesting period of her history. By the special providence of God, on her return from the neighbouring village of Gourock, one Sabbath evening, she met with an acquaintance, who asked her to accompany her to the class superintended by the late Mr John Caird, in the session-house of the Gaelic Chapel. This Sabbath evening school was taught in the place just mentioned by the venerable John Caird for many years, and consisted of individuals of both sexes from eighteen to thirty years of age. His manner of teaching was chiefly in the catechetical style—plain, practical, and personal—from some portion of divine truth. He conducted this class with the greatest efficiency and success, as is attested by the fact, that many who obtained their first religious impressions in it have died in the faith, while others of considerable respectability and influence are ornamenting the Gospel, and some of them are office-bearers in the Church of Christ.

The passage which Mr Caird, on that occasion, explained and applied, was Isaiah liii. 6, "All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." He compared sinners to wandering sheep, which she, through the influence of the divine Spirit, perceived to be a striking image of her condition. He said, sheep wandering without a shepherd, are an exposed, a defenceless, and an easy prey. This she found actually to be her case; for, notwithstanding her early pious instruction, her former good impressions, and all that she had suffered in the slavery of sin, she continued to wander from the Good Shepherd. That part of the address she considered so peculiarly adapted to her condition, that she thought Mr Caird had been acquainted with her whole history; and, being unable to continue longer under the influence of the emotion produced by the address, she retired from the place to give utterance to her sorrow, and to cry to the Lord for deliverance. She continued in this state of mind for above three months, scarcely able either to eat or work, and was about this time visited with a slight affliction. She spent much of her time in reading the Scriptures, and in prayer to God that he would enable her to perceive the way of salvation from the guilt, and power, and pollution of sin. No man appeared to care for her soul, and she felt the anguish of an awakened conscience, and was ready to exclaim, "A wounded spirit who can bear!" At length the time of her gracious deliverance drew nigh. She was advised to apply to Mr Caird for instruction and comfort; and after describing to him her state, he explained to her the Gospel of Christ in all its fulness, freeness, and suitableness. He taught her, that help was laid upon One able and willing to save, even to the uttermost, all who come to God by him. He explained to her the nature of the work of Christ—that work by which atonement had been made for the sins of men, and in connection with which, mercy could flow to the most worthless and guiltiest of our race, in strict harmony with his justice. He shewed her, that by faith she might be interested in that atonement, and, through the imputation of the righteousness of Christ, be delivered from the guilt of her sin, and accounted as righteous in the sight of God. He taught her the necessity of repentance towards God, and of the regenerating influence of the Word, applied by the Spirit of God. His instruction was blessed; for old things began gradually to pass away, and all things became new. Despair gave place to hope, and fear to humble confidence in the mercy of God.

Her companions and pleasures, her pursuits and aims, were all changed. And this change was so evident, that it was soon noticed, and she became marked, pitied, and derided, by her former companions. But she bore all patiently, being now willing to suffer, and enabled to endure the reproach of Christ's cause. She ascribed this delightful change to the grace of God. It was now her delight when it was said, "Let us go up to the house of the Lord." She regularly heard the Rev. Kenneth Bain of Greenock; but was much attached to the Rev. Dr Love of Anderston, from whose ministry she derived much instruction and profit.

Prayer was her chief delight. She held much intercourse with God; and this was the reason why she had retired late in the evening, under the hedge, when I first heard the sound of her voice. There she had reared many an Ebenezer to the Lord, and she often, in ardent prayer, poured out her soul to God.

Consumption had at this time taken a strong hold of her frame, and she was soon after this taken out of the world to her Father's house above. She bore her afflictions with patience and resignation, evincing the power of Christian principle, and met the last enemy, Death, with composure, displaying the influence of divine grace to support the mind even in the hour of nature's dissolution. Her last words were: "Into thine hand I commit my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth!"

Thus we have another trophy of the Redeemer's triumph in the humbler walks of life. And though the aspiring worldling may see in this nothing to attract his attention, or to excite his admiration; nay, though he may even sneer at this as savouring of affected sanctity, still it is a case over which angels rejoiced, and disdained not to convey the ransomed, the purified, and the disenthralled spirit to Abraham's bosom.

From this narrative, simple and unadorned as it is, we are taught some lessons of important instruction.

We cannot but perceive the evils resulting from bad company. Here we have presented to us a simple country girl, who had received a pious education, and who was uncorrupted by vice, brought in contact with those who feared not God, and who lived in open violation of his righteous law. In her is strikingly displayed the truth of the apostolic assertion, "Evil communications corrupt good manners." Her religious impressions soon vanished. She became an adept in the school of vice, and is an additional instance of the weakness of human nature to resist evil when brought in contact with powerful temptation.

Parents may perceive from this narrative the necessity of care in the choice of the situation which they make for their children. Too often it is the case that they manifest an anxious solicitude for the temporal comfort and prosperity of their children, and are all eagerness and avidity about their worldly advancement, while they neglect altogether any inquiry regarding their spiritual good. If there be but a favourable opening, in relation to their worldly prospects, they rarely inquire whether this be a family where the worship of God is observed, and where the morals of their children will be safe; but too often, by criminal negligence, recklessly place their children in the very focus of temptation, and then wonder why they have to mourn over the dissipation and vice of their offspring. O! what heartless, what criminal indifference is manifested on this subject, by many parents! The subject of the present narrative, traced the first commencement of her open departure from the ways of piety to her entrance into an ungodly family.

But we also perceive that, when temptation is yielded to, there is a progression in vice. This young woman did not arrive at the height of her wickedness all at once, but by remaining in contact with temptation, and yielding to its influence, she became worse and worse. Her remaining good feelings and principles gradually gave place to others of a directly opposite character, and she became less and less able to resist the power of the current of temptation by which she was carried away.

In her case, also, we have a striking display of the speciality of divine providence, in connection with the salvation of sinners. Little did she think, when on the Sabbath she went in pursuit of unhallowed amusement, that the purposes of God towards her were those of mercy not of wrath. And in the way, apparently casual, by which she is brought to hear "words whereby she might be saved," we perceive that God brings the blind by a way they know not. Thus his providence and his grace harmonize in their operation to save the children of men.

We have also a proof of the power of divine truth when stated in plainness, fidelity, and affection. The Word of God is quick and powerful. It is that by which we are quickened, and regenerated, and made new creatures in Christ Jesus. Of this the case above narrated is an interesting example. The simple statement of the truth was that by which she was brought to the knowledge of salvation, and the reality of the change was evidenced in her love of prayer. She was eminently a woman of prayer. Prayer was her delight, and it was this which induced her to seek opportunities of communion with God, when no eye beheld her, and which led her to the place where, in this sacred exercise, I first heard her voice.

"Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,
The Christian's native air,
His watchword in the hour of death;
He enters heaven with prayer."

But, lastly, we have an example of the good of Sabbath schools, when properly conducted. It may be that there is, and we believe there actually is, a diversity of opinion, even among good men, as to the propriety of Sabbath schools, and we must admit that if parents were found doing their duty and adopting the good old Scotch custom of Sabbath family instruction, Sabbath schools would be hardly, if at all, needed. But then, alas! many parents neglect this duty, and others are found who perform it inefficiently. Hence arises the necessity of such an institution to supply the lack of parental instruction, and to stem the torrent of impiety which rushes through our land. And happy is it when Sabbath schools are conducted with as much prudence, and order, and ability, as was the one superintended by Mr Caird. In proportion to the efficiency displayed in the mode of conducting these schools, may we rationally expect that they will obtain the divine blessing. The Word of God ought ever to form a prominent part in the routine of Sabbath school tuition; and the more plain, and faithful, and affectionate, and judicious is the explanation of that Word, the more confidently may we expect success. Let Sabbath school teachers be encouraged, when they recollect that she whose case is recorded in this paper, received her first religious impressions at a Sabbath school.

SACRED POETRY.

HEAVEN.

Oh, talk to me of heaven! I love
To hear about my home above;
For there doth many a loved one dwell,
In light and joy ineffable.
Oh! tell me how they shine and sing,
While every harp rings echoing;
And every glad and tearless eye
Beams like the bright sun gloriously:
Tell me of that victorious palm
Each hand in glory beareth;
Tell me of that celestial calm
Each face in glory weareth.

Oh, happy, happy country! where
There entereth not a sin;
And death, who keeps its portals fair,
May never once come in.
No grief can change their day to night;
The darkness of that land is light.
Sorrow and sighing God hath sent Far thence to endless banishment.
And never more may one dark tear
Bedim their burning eyes,
For every one they shed while here,
In fearful agonies,
Glitters a bright and dazzling gem
In their immortal diadem.

Oh, lovely, blooming country! there
Flourishes all that we deem fair.
And tho' no fields nor forest green
Nor bowery gardens there are seen,
Nor perfumes load the breeze,
Nor joys the ear material sound,—
Yet boys at God's right hand are found.
The archetypes of these;
There is the home, the land of birth
Of all we highest praise on earth.
The storms that rack this world beneath
Must here for ever cease;
The only air the blessed breathe
Is purity and peace.

Oh, happy, happy land, in thee
Shines th' unveiled Divinity,
Shedding thro' each adoring breast
A holy calm, a halcyon rest,
And those blest souls whom death did sever,
Have met to mingle joys for ever.
Oh! soon may heaven uncloset to me!
Oh! may I soon that glory see!
And my faint, weary spirit stand
Within that happy, happy land!

MISCELLANEOUS.

Be sure your Sin will find you out.—Dr Donne, afterwards the celebrated Dean of St Paul's, when he took possession of the first living to which he was inducted, walked into the yard of the church where he was to officiate. It happened, that as he sauntered along, the sexton was digging a grave, and the Doctor stood for a moment to observe his operations. As the man was at work, he threw up a skull which in some way or other engaged the Doctor's attention. While he examined it, he perceived a headless nail, which perforated the temple, and which convinced him that some dreadful deed must have been perpetrated. Taking up the skull, he demanded of the grave-digger to whom it belonged. The man instantly said, that he knew very well—that it had belonged to a man who was accustomed to excess in the use of liquor; and who, one night, having been guilty of his usual intemperance, had been found dead in his bed in the morning. Dr Donne then asked "Had he a wife?" The answer was in the affirmative. "What character does she bear?" The sexton said, "A very good one, only she was reflected upon for marrying immediately after the death of her husband." This was enough for the Doctor, who, upon the pretence of visiting all his parishioners, soon called upon the woman in question; and in the course of conversation he inquired of what sickness her husband had died. She gave him precisely the same account as the sexton had given before her. But the Doctor produced the skull, and pointing to the place, said, "Woman, do you know this nail?" The unhappy criminal was struck with horror at the demand and the sight, and instantly owned that she had been the perpetrator of the deed, which had hurried her husband, in a state of intoxication, into the eternal world.

Revivals of Religion.—"A serious man from a neighbouring parish," says Dr Latrobe, "being one evening at my house, on secular business, took occasion to inform me that there was a great revival of religion in his neighbourhood. I expressed much pleasure at the intelligence, but asked him in what manner this happy revival discovered itself, whether the people appeared more humble, more peaceable, more kind and charitable, better united in their social relations, more virtuous in their lives, &c. He could not answer, particularly, with respect to these things, but said, "People were much engaged in attending religious meetings,—they had private lectures as often as a preacher could be obtained,—and they had conferences almost every evening." I observed to him that an attendance on the word preached was highly important, and a hopeful sign; but asked him how it was on the Lord's day; whether they attended on the instituted worship of that day, better than they used to do? (for I knew they had been shamefully negligent in that duty.) "Why no," said he, "we don't go to meeting on the Sabbath." "What," I inquired, "do you neglect God's institutions to observe your own?" The prophet marks this as a token of decay in religion."

Christ the Believer's all in all in Death.—When the pious Bishop Beveridge was on his death-bed, he did not know any of his friends and connections. A minister with whom he had been well acquainted, visited him; and when conducted into his room, he said,— "Bishop Beveridge, do you know me?" "Who are you," said the Bishop. Being told who the minister was, he said that he did not know him. Another friend came, who had been equally well known, and accosted him in a similar manner,— "Do you know me, Bishop Beveridge?" "Who are you," said he. Being told it was one of his intimate friends, he said, he did not know him. His wife then came to his bed-side and asked him if he knew her? "Who are you," said he. Being told it was his wife, he said he did not know her. "Well," said one, "Bishop Beveridge, do you know the Lord Jesus Christ?" "Jesus Christ," said he, reviving, as if the name had on him the influence of a charm, "Oh yes, I have known him these forty years; precious Saviour! he is all my hope."

THE BAPTIST; A TRUE AND FAITHFUL MINISTER.

BY THE REV. PETER M'MORLAND,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Regent Square, London.

THE ministerial character of John is well worthy of the attention and prayerful study, both of the minister of Christ, and the people of his flock. We ask, who was this John, around whom the people flocked in such vast numbers, and to whom our Lord himself came, in order to be baptized? There is something strange and marked about his character and about his position. We are curious to know something about him; who, and what was he? This same question was entertained in the Sanhedrim of old, at the time when John came forth upon his public mission. There was that about the man, which excited, from the very commencement of his course, a deep, engrossing, and rapidly extending interest. He stood forth, after so many hundred years of unbroken silence, as a messenger come direct from God; his outward appearance, and the habits of his life, were calculated to overawe the public mind; while his fearful rebukes, darted against impenitent sinners, must have fallen upon them like lightning consuming the object on which it strikes. All these, his outward appearance, his known character, his preaching, and the multitudes who came from all quarters to his baptism, very soon so contributed to make him known, that his fame extended even to the palace of the king; and in the Sanhedrim the question was mooted, "Who could he be?" for that a great prophet had arisen in Israel was plain; and they sent priests and Levites to Jerusalem, to ask him, "Who art thou?" We ask the same question, Who was John?

1. John was a minister of God, sent forth to execute a peculiar work, and placed in a very peculiar position. He was not Elias; not one of the old prophets risen from the dead, to act in the prophetic office again among his countrymen; he was not even a prophet, for with no special prophecy, like the old prophets, was he intrusted; he was sent forth to occupy a position which he holds alone, between the less excellent and the better,—between the more limited and the more diffusive dispensation; he was the predicted messenger who was to come and receive all his glory from ushering in the Lord of hosts into that temple, of which it was foretold that the glory of it would be greater than that of the former, even with all its exquisite workmanship and costly materials. But you will observe, he was "sent by God," and it was this that constituted him the minister of God. He did not intrude himself into his office, but, commissioned by God, was "sent" to do the work he had assigned him, and for which, by a long course of preparatory training, he had admirably fitted him. The fact that John the Baptist, "sent from God" as he was, was kept so long in a state of training, before he entered on his work; the fact that our blessed Lord himself delayed so long, till he arrived at the full maturity and perfection of his manhood; the fact that he kept his apostles so long in training, before he gave them their full commission, which was comprised in the last words he addressed to them, before he ascended to the throne prepared for him, even when he was about to bestow on them miraculous powers of teaching,—all these should serve to teach us, that no man should rush hastily into the—in a measure analogous—office of Christ's ministry.

2. But he was not only a minister, intrusted with a service of great honour and of great importance; it is one of the most prominent and striking features of his character that he was faithful in the work that was given him to do,—faithful in his doctrine, though it must have exposed him to great hatred and opposition at the hands of men; and faithful in his testimony, though he bore it to One before whose glory his own was to fade; but he had just ideas of wherein his own true glory consisted; viz., in doing faithfully and fully the peculiar work to which he had been called; in sinking himself that he might exalt his Master. He went forth preaching a most unpalatable doctrine,—the doctrine of the necessity of repentance; which, when preached clearly and personally, men will scarcely bear, at this day, to hear. He charged them with their vices, and their guilt. He spared not even those who were highest in popular favour, and richest in worldly wealth, for when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said, "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" He is an example and a pattern, as far as faithful preaching and unbending integrity are concerned, to every man who goes forth, bearing the message of God to his fellow-men. Every thing else should be made to bend to the truth, but the truth itself should be made to bend to nothing. And if hypocrisy, and worldliness, and every sin that can be named, immeasurably heightened as the guilt of them all is by the virtual rejection of Christ, be as common now as they were in the days of the Baptist, it becomes those who hold the position of the sent of God, to be faithful in delivering the message of God, to every company of unrepenting sinners,—“Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.”

But it was in his witness and testimony that his faithfulness to his trust was, perhaps, most remarkably displayed. Had he, in the least degree, been actuated by a spirit of an opposite kind; and had the desire of vain glory and of man's applause eaten up the spirit of ministerial fidelity in the heart of the Baptist, what ample and admirable opportunities he had for arrogating to himself his Master's honour! His countrymen put the very temptation in his way; they asked him if he was the Christ? and he confessed, and denied not, that he was not the Christ,—and he was not Elias,—and he was not that prophet whom they so anxiously expected. It would have raised him high, upon the instant, in the popular estimation, for him to have said he was a prophet. It was what they thought; it was what they hoped would be his answer to their question; but he was an honest and a faithful man, and at once disclaimed his title to the name of prophet, as it was understood in the question that they asked. Then said they unto him, "Who art thou?" They were perplexed at his denial, for they thought that surely the one or the other he must be. And what was his reply? O, there is much instruction to every private Christian, but above all, to every minister of Christ, in his reply. He was not Christ,—he was not Elias,—and he was not that prophet whom they expected; well, what was he? he was but a voice. "I am," he said, "the voice of one crying in the wilderness, make straight the way of the Lord."

3. Could any thing more strikingly express the stern faithfulness of the man, or that humility, which was another striking feature of his character? He desired to sink himself entirely, to be regarded as nothing visible or embodied, round which affections might cluster, or in which regards might meet. He seemed to have been afraid lest their admiration, coming to him first, should stop there, without advancing to its higher and only worthy object. He seems to have been afraid lest he should interpose himself, in any way, between them and the Lamb of God, who was to be their hope; and, anxious to disabuse their minds of the prepossessions which they appeared apt to form, he told them faithfully and honestly, that all their notions of him were wrong, honourable as they were; and that if they regarded him at all, in the light in which he should be viewed, and desired to be viewed, they must hold him to be a mere voice, preceding the entrance of one mightier than himself, and preparing for his near approach, upon the high errand of salvation. And how well he bore out his character that he was a mere voice, must be evident from the many proofs of his humility. And how well he acted as a faithful voice, preparing for his Lord, and directing men to Christ, appears from the fact that we find him once and again, on one day and another, within the short and compressed compass of a single chapter, pointing out the Lamb of God, to those who came to yield honour to himself.

And have we not this humility, and indeed the whole of the beautiful character of John, set forth to us in the recital of the baptism of our Lord, in Matthew? When Jesus came to be baptized, he forbade him, saying, "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" as if he had said, "What! shall the sun come to a glimmering taper, that it may obtain the benefit of its rays? Shall the incarnate Word,—shall the spotless Lamb, slain from the foundation of the world, come to a poor, weak, and sinful man, to receive the baptism of which he is the minister? It cannot be; it must not be. 'The less is blessed of the greater.' The less should be baptized of the greater. 'I have need to be baptized of thee.'" And when you think that that address was uttered, not in a corner, but in the very midst of John's followers and friends, it will give you a still higher idea of the true spirit and faithfulness of the man.

Now, surely the ministers of Christ have much to learn from this; it is the very spirit by which they should all be characterised; it is the very language they should all employ. And though, who is there, that, even amid the sacredness of his office, is not too justly chargeable with, in some way, seeking "his own," to the dishonour of his Master, and even to the arresting of that powerful influence, which, coming down from heaven, carries home the truth to the conscience, and bears it in upon the heart;—(for the Spirit of God will not countenance labours, amid which his own honour and glory are forgotten or despised,)—yet, still, the true spirit that every labourer in the vineyard should cultivate, is this spirit of John. And the true light in which we should ever regard ourselves, and be regarded, is that of a voice, pointing out to fainting and famishing travellers in the wilderness, that Lamb of God who is sustenance, and refreshment, and repose, to every soul that receives him.

It must be admitted that we have greatly lost among us the noble spirit of ministerial faithfulness; and that every spirit, but the spirit of John's humility, and the spirit of John's simplicity, and boldness of testimony, is to be found throughout the pulpits of a Christian land. And, O, is it not the case, that there is so little of the true fear of God among our people, and so little awakening among them, and so little of the operative power of true Christianity exhibited in the midst of them; because they who have it, in sacred charge, to "bear the vessels of the sanctuary," instead of cultivating the spirit of John, when he said, "I have need to be baptized of thee," or when he proclaimed himself to be but a "voice," and nothing more, seek rather, in the first place, to advance their own glory, and to arrogate honour to themselves? The Spirit of God will not so countenance or bless us, as to give us a spiritual blessing, and spiritual fruit, from labours in motive and in principle so far wrong.

But, if ministers err thus, without one syllable of palliation for them, it greatly becomes our people to see, whether error, and the encouragement of error, does not lie also with them. There is, and can be, nothing more foolish and mischievous than the way in which ministers are often looked at, and spoken of by their people. All is made to depend upon the individual man; people lose sight of the ordinance of God in the contemplation of the properties of the individual. If his natural gifts be slender, it is well if the very language of contempt be withheld from the servant of Christ; while, on the contrary, if his natural gifts be great, so that, by his power of reason he can compel assent, or, by the power of his eloquence, he can thrill the spirit, and make a listening audience hang upon his lips, no language can express the greatness of their admiration; they look to the man, not to the ordinance; they put the man too frequently in the place of Christ; and instead of regarding him, as much as possible, as a mere voice, to point them to a more glorious object, and to direct them to a better hope, they say, in spirit at least, if not in the letter, in their idolatrous admiration, "Art thou Elias? art thou that prophet? or even, art thou the Christ?" putting the vessel in the place of him that formed it, the clay in the place of the potter. If there be fault on the part of ministers, as there is in pandering to the stimulated and false appetite of their people, there is fault also on the part of the people, in cherishing that craving for stimulants, which makes the truth, — though it be the very truth of God — when presented in a plain or homely dress, insipid. It is the part of a Christian people (I magnify my office) to entertain reverence and respect for the ordinance of Christ's ministry, apart, as much as possible, from the intellectual qualifications of those who exercise it, lest, perchance, they come to love and to relish more the display of intellect than the exhibition of the truth; and it is the part of a Christian ministry, while, in accordance with our Lord's description, it brings forth from the treasury things "new and old," to see to it, that the one grand subject with which it has to do, be made to possess a prominence correspondent to its importance; and if a man can do nothing more, than this day, and the next day, standing up before his people, to follow in the steps, and to repeat the testimony of the faithful John, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world," our people's minds should be so disciplined to the love of the all-important truth, that the statement would be to them, even in its daily repetition, all the variety they require, and all the eloquence they wish. What are the ornaments of the temple, to the temple itself? What are the trappings, in which human fancy may deck and decorate the truth, to the truth itself? What are the earthen vessels of the ministry, to the precious treasure they contain? "We have this treasure in earthen vessels," for this very purpose, "that the excellency of the power may be seen to be of God;" and not in the words that "man's wisdom teacheth, but in the words that the Holy Ghost teacheth," are the servants of Christ to come and declare his will, "for God will bring to nought the wisdom of this world."

THE EARLY DAYS

PRESIDENT EDWARDS.

JONATHAN EDWARDS was born at East Windsor, on the banks of the Connecticut, on the 5th day of October 1703. His father was the Rev. Timothy Edwards, a most diligent and exemplary pastor, and a distinguished scholar. His mother was a woman of very extensive information, of a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures, and of fervent piety. The education of Jonathan was of a very superior character. Brought up "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," under the care of parents at once strict and affectionate, he was preserved, in a great degree, from the company of bad companions, and from those "evil communications" which too often prove the ruin of the young. Even in early life, however, he seems to have been characterised by firmness and sedateness, and a sound and discriminating judgment. Blessed with enlightened parents, they taught him from childhood to exercise and strengthen his intellectual faculties by cultivating an acquaintance with all the objects of contemplation within his reach. Their faithful religious instructions, too, rendered him, while yet a child, conversant with his own character and duties, with the way of salvation by Jesus Christ, and the nature of that eternal life which, begun on earth, is perfected in heaven. Like faithful servants of their divine Master they not only pointed out the road that conducts to the mansions of bliss, but they shewed him examples of perseverance therein, and sought for him, by constant prayer, the guidance of that Great Being, who alone can lead "in the way everlasting." Their prayers for their son commenced with his very existence, and, like every prayer of faith, they were answered, and secured for him, at an early period of life, the peculiar blessing of God. When yet very young, Edwards experienced powerful religious impressions, and especially, before he went to college, during an extensive revival of religion in his father's congregation. These impressions, however, ultimately disappeared, and, in his own opinion, were followed by no permanent effects of a salutary nature. In his early years he seems to have been fond of the use of the pen, and the vigour, and the shrewdness, and the sound judgment displayed in some pieces which he composed, before he had attained his twelfth year, are almost incredible. They display, in an astonishing degree, those very qualities which so distinguished him in after life, and shew how much truth there is in the poet's remark,

"The child is father of the man."

before he was thirteen years of age, and during his residence there he was distinguished for the uniform sobriety and correctness of his deportment, for assiduous application to his studies, and for vast progress in learning. While yet a boy at College, he manifested that love for metaphysical investigation, and that profound thought, which afterwards caused a reluctant world to bow in homage to the grand and Scriptural view of the moral government of God, which he disclosed. By continued and sustained exercise he was strengthening his reasoning powers, and gradually moulding himself into a thinking being,—a being who, instead of considering thought a labour, was never happier than when every faculty of his mind was engaged in discovering and in illustrating truth, or unravelling the inextricable labyrinths of error. To this practice we cannot but ascribe, in a great degree, the ultimate development of his mental superiority.

The class, of which Mr Edwards was a member, finished their regular course before he was seventeen years of age. The time of "his visitation" was now at hand, when the Holy Spirit should awake him from his sleep, and should take of the things which are God's, and shew them unto him. Of his views and feelings on the subject of religion about this time, the reader may judge from the following extracts from an account which he himself wrote about twenty years afterwards:

"God would not suffer me to go on with any quietness; I had great and violent inward struggles, till, after many conflicts with wicked inclinations, repeated resolutions, and bonds that I laid myself under by a kind of vows to God, I was brought wholly to break off all former wicked ways, and all ways of known outward sin; and to apply myself to seek salvation, and practise many religious duties; but without that kind of affection and delight which I had formerly experienced. My concern now wrought more by inward struggles, and conflicts, and self-reflections. I made seeking my salvation, the main business of my life. But yet, it seems to me, I sought it after a miserable manner; which has made me sometimes since to question, whether ever it issued in that which was saving; being ready to doubt, whether such miserable seeking ever succeeded. I was indeed brought to seek salvation, in a manner that I never was before; I felt a spirit to part with all things in the world, for an interest in Christ. My concern continued and prevailed, with many exercising thoughts and inward struggles; but yet it never seemed to be proper to express that concern by the name of terror.

"The first instance, that I remember, of that sort of inward sweet delight in God and divine things, that I have lived much in since, was on reading those words, 1 Tim. i. 17, "Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever, Amen." As I read the words, there came into my soul, and was as it were diffused through it, a sense of the glory of the Divine Being; a new sense, quite different from any thing I ever experienced before. Never any words of Scripture seemed to me as these words did. I thought with myself, how excellent a Being that was, and how happy I should be, if I might enjoy that God, and be rapt up to him in heaven, and be as it were swallowed up in him for ever! I kept saying, and as it were singing, over these words of Scripture to myself; and went to pray to God that I might enjoy him, and prayed in a manner quite different from what I used to do; with a new sort of affection. But it never came into my thought, that there was any thing spiritual or of a saving nature in this.

"Not long after I first began to experience these things, I gave an account to my father of some things that had passed in my mind. I was pretty much affected by the discourse we had together, and when the discourse was ended, I walked abroad alone, in a solitary place in my father's pasture, for contemplation. And as I was walking there, and looking upon the sky and clouds, there came into my mind so sweet a sense of the glorious majesty and grace of God, as I know not how to express. I seemed to see them both in a sweet conjunction; majesty and meekness joined together: it was a sweet, and gentle, and holy majesty; and also a majestic meekness; an awful sweetness; a high, and great, and holy gentleness."

From this time Mr Edwards began to have clearer views of the work of redemption, and the glorious scheme of salvation, through the merits of Jesus Christ. It was now his delight to read and meditate on divine things, and books which treated of sacred subjects were peculiarly dear to him. The book of Canticles, according to his own account, afforded him peculiar pleasure, and these words, Cant. ii. 1, "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys," were often the subject of delightful meditation. To his eye the appearance of every thing was changed; he beheld new beauties in every object of contemplation, and in every scene he beheld the glory, and goodness, and greatness of the God of nature. "God's excellence," says he, "his wisdom, his purity and love, seemed to appear in every thing; in the sun, moon, and stars; in the clouds and blue sky; in the grass, flowers, and trees; in the water, and all nature, which used greatly to fire my mind." He now began to experience a pleasure in beholding the works of nature, to which the "natural man" is an utter stranger. Nothing now was so delightful to him as to hear the awful and majestic voice of God in the thunder storm, and to behold in it the glory of Him whose lightnings lighten the world, and whose voice is powerful and full of majesty, shaking the wilderness, and moving "the foundations of the hills." Formerly, such scenes filled him with terror; now, they were pregnant with the most exalted enjoyment; and the cause of this change is obvious. Once, the voice of God in the storm spoke to him in wrath, for he was at enmity with his Maker; now, it proclaimed the majesty and power of its Author, and disturbed not his calm serenity, for his confidence reposed on the Most High, and he was kept "in perfect peace," his mind being stayed on that great Being,

"Who plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm."

In June or July 1722, when not yet nineteen years of age, Mr Edwards was licensed to preach the Gospel. For some time he laboured among the Presbyterians in New York, who several times besought him to remain with them for life. This, however, painful as it was to his feelings, he declined, for, owing to the smallness of the congregation, and some peculiar circumstances connected with it, he did not think there was any prospect of answering fully the great end which he had in view, in devoting himself to the work of the ministry. In no period of his life, perhaps, did he possess greater advantages for spiritual contemplation and enjoyment, than during the period here alluded to. He went to New York in a happy frame of mind; he found there a little flock devoted to the service of their common Master; he resided in a family, the daily intercourse with whom served only to refresh and to sanctify; and in addition to all this, he had much leisure for reading, meditation, and prayer, and seems to have daily realised the presence of the Comforter. In the narrative of his religious history, he thus writes:—

"My sense of divine things seemed gradually to increase, till I went to preach at New York, which was about a year and a-half after they began; and while I was there, I felt them very sensibly, in a much higher degree than I had done before. My longings after God and holiness were much increased. Pure and humble, holy and heavenly Christianity appeared exceedingly amiable to me. I felt a burning desire to be, in everything, a complete Christian, and conformed to the blessed image of Christ; and that I might live, in all things, according to the pure, sweet, and blessed rules of the Gospel. I had an eager thirsting after progress in these things, which put me upon pursuing and pressing after them. It was my continual strife day and night, and constant inquiry, how I should be more holy, and live more holly, and more becoming a child of God, and a disciple of Christ. I now sought an increase of grace and holiness, and a holy life, with much more earnestness than ever I sought grace before I had it. I used to be continually examining myself, and studying and contriving for likely ways and means, how I should live holly, with far greater diligence and earnestness than ever I pursued anything in my life, but yet with too great a dependence on my own strength, which afterwards proved a great damage to me. My experience had not then taught me, as it has done since, my extreme feebleness and impotence every manner of way, and the bottomless depths of secret corruption and deceit there were in my heart. However, I went on with my eager pursuit after more holiness and conformity to Christ.

"Holiness, as I then wrote down some of my contemplations on it, appeared to me to be of a sweet, pleasant, charming, serene, calm nature, which brought an inexpressible purity, brightness, peacefulness, and ravishment to the soul. In other words, that it made the soul like a field or garden of God, with all manner of pleasant flowers, enjoying a sweet calm, and the gently vivifying beams of the sun. The soul of a true Christian, as I then wrote my meditations, appeared like such a little white flower as we see in the spring of the year; low and humble on the ground, opening its bosom to receive the pleasant beams of the sun's glory; rejoicing, as it were, in a calm rapture; diffusing around a sweet fragrance; standing peacefully and lovingly, in the midst of other flowers round about, all, in like manner, opening their bosoms to drink in the light of the sun. There was no part of creature-holiness that I had so great a part of its loveliness, as humility, brokenness of heart, and poverty of spirit; and there was nothing that I so earnestly longed for. My heart panted after this,—to lie low before God, as in the dust, that I might be nothing, and that God might be all, that I might become as a little child.

"While at New York, I sometimes was much affected with reflections on my past life, considering how late it was before I began to be truly religious, and how wickedly I had lived till then, and once so as to weep abundantly, and for a considerable time together."

Often during his residence at New York, he retired to some solitary spot on the banks of the Hudson, and there, amid the stillness of nature, unseen by human eye, he held sweet communion with his "Father who seeth in secret."

"Wisdom's self
Of seeks to sweet retired solitude,
Where with her best nurse, contemplation,
She plumes her feathers, and lets grow her wings,
That in the various bustle of report
Were all too ruffled, and sometimes impaired."

On the 12th of January 1723, he made a solemn dedication of himself to God, vowing "to take God for his whole portion and felicity," and "to fight with all his might, against the world, the flesh, and the devil, to the end of his life." In the same year he left New York and returned to his father's house at Windsor. During the time in which he was preparing for the ministry, his residence at New York, and afterwards at his father's house, he framed a series of resolutions to the number of seventy, which "evinced a moral strength of determination, a sublime elevation of character far removed above the feeble, undecided, and irregular purposes of ordinary philosophic minds." As specimens of these, we quote the following:—

"That I will do whatsoever I think to be most to the glory of God and my own good, profit, and pleasure, in the whole of my duration, without any consideration of the time, whether now, or never so many myriads of ages hence. Resolved, to do whatever I think to be my duty, and most for the good and advantage of mankind in general. Resolved so to do, whatever difficulties I meet with, how many soever, and how great soever.

"To be continually endeavouring to find out some new contrivance and invention to promote the forementioned things.

"To act, in all respects, both speaking and doing, as if nobody had been so vile as I, and as if I had committed the same sins, or had the same infirmities or failings as others; and that I will let the knowledge of their failings promote nothing but shame in myself, and prove only an occasion of my confessing my own sins and misery to God.

"Never to do anything, of which I so much question the lawfulness, as that I intend, at the same time, to consider and examine afterwards whether it be lawful or not, unless I as much question the lawfulness of the omission.

"To ask myself, at the end of every day, week, month, and year, wherein I could possibly, in any respect, have done better."

"These resolutions," says his biographer, Mr Dwight, "are perhaps to persons of every age, but especially to the young, the best uninspired summary of Christian duty, the best directory to high attainments in evangelical virtue, which the mind of man has been able to form." These resolutions, too, throw great light on Mr Edwards' character; and no one can wonder that the youth, who, in his nineteenth year, formed, as in the presence of God, such resolutions as those which we have quoted, attained, in more matured years, to a degree of grace and of virtue, but rarely equalled by any individual.

Mr Edwards in his nineteenth year commenced keeping a diary, at least the diary which he left extends no farther back, although, as his biographer remarks, the beginning of it being lost, it is not improbable that it may have reached back at least to the period of his preparation for the ministry. It was evidently intended for his own private use, and would probably have been destroyed had it been in his possession at his death. Many passages of it are written in short-hand, and on one occasion he adds this remark, "Remember to act according to Prov. xii. 23, 'A prudent man concealeth knowledge.'" While the diaries of many consist chiefly in mere expressions of feeling, that of Edwards consists of facts, and of solid thought, dictated, no doubt, by deep religious feeling. In January 1723, he thus writes in his diary, concerning the vital importance of the influences of the Holy Spirit:—

"I find, by experience, that, let me make resolutions, and do what I will, with never so many inventions, it is all nothing, and to no purpose at all, without the motions of the Spirit of God; for if the Spirit of God should be as much withdrawn from me always, as for the week past, notwithstanding all I do, I should not grow, but should languish, and miserably fade away. I perceive, if God should withdraw his Spirit a little more, I should not hesitate to break my resolutions, and should soon arrive at my old state. There is no dependence on myself. Our resolutions may be at the highest one day, and yet, the next day, we may be in a miserable dead condition, not at all like the same person who resolved. So that it is to no purpose to resolve, except we depend on the grace of God. For, if it were not for his mere grace, one might be a very good man one day, and a very wicked one the next."

During the same month he renewed his baptismal covenant and self-dedication, and thus writes:—

"I have this day solemnly renewed my baptismal covenant and self-dedication, which I renewed when I was taken into the communion of the Church. I have been before God, and have given myself, all that I am, and have, to God; so that I am not, in any respect, my own. I can challenge no right in this understanding, this will, these affections, which are in me. Neither have I any right to this body, or any of its members,—no right to this tongue, these hands, these feet; no right to these senses, these eyes, these ears, this smell, or this taste. I have given myself clear away, and have not retained anything as my own. I gave myself to God in my baptism, and I have gone this morning to him, and told him, that I gave myself wholly to him. I have given every power to him, so that, for the future, I'll challenge no right in myself, in no respect whatever. I have expressly promised him, and I do now promise Almighty God that, by his grace, I will not. I have this morning told him, that I did take him for my whole portion and felicity, looking on nothing else as any part of my happiness, nor acting as if it were; and his law for the constant rule of my obedience; and would fight, with all my might, against the world, the flesh, and the devil, to the end of my life; and that I did believe in Jesus Christ, and did receive him as a Prince and a Saviour; and that I would adhere to the faith and obediences of the Gospel, however hazardous and difficult the confession and practice of it may be; and that I did receive the blessed Spirit as my teacher, sanctifier, and only comforter, and cherish all his motions to enlighten, purify, confirm, comfort, and assist me. This I have done; and I pray God, for the sake of Christ, to look upon it as a self-dedication, and to receive me now as entirely his own, and to deal with me, in all respects, as such, whether he afflicts me, or prospers me, or whatever he pleases to do with me, who am his. Now, henceforth I am not to act, in any respect, as my own. I shall act as my own, if I ever make use of any of my powers to anything that is not to the glory of God, and do not make the glorifying of him my whole and entire business: if I murmur in the least at affliction; if I grieve at the prosperity of others; if I am in any way uncharitable; if I am angry, because of injuries; if I revenge them; if I do any thing purely to please myself, or if I avoid any thing for the sake of my own ease; if I omit any thing, because it is great self-denial; if I trust to myself; if I take any of the praise of any good that I do, or that God doth by me; or if I am in any way proud."

Thus was the Holy Spirit working in Mr Edwards, and preparing him for the accomplishment of those high and holy undertakings which he afterwards achieved.

ALL CHRISTIANS ARE NOT ALIKE.

Minister of Renfrew.

SECTION V.

THE INFLUENCE OF DIFFERENT SCHOOLS IN PRACTICAL AND EXPERIMENTAL THEOLOGY.

ANOTHER source of peculiarity, in religious character, will be found in the special forms which Christianity takes under particular ministrations. It is scarcely possible for any minister, at all forcible in character and address, not to communicate with the truth some impression of the moulding of his own thoughts. And hence the distinctions among pious people, especially in large towns, of such and such a one's people; and this not so much in allusion to their attendance on particular ministrations, as to the cast of mind, and habit of thought, which have thus been acquired. Now, we will not say that such distinctions have the effect of leading any to deny true godliness in others; but we are quite satisfied that the amount of piety, in some of these little circles, is overrated within, and greatly underrated, and sometimes misrepresented, by such as are without. Men do very naturally look at the piety of others through the medium by which they are themselves surrounded; and they do as naturally, though sinfully, give special importance to what is peculiarly their own; and thus do they try others, not by the balances of the sanctuary, but by those of the congregation.

But there is, beyond this congregational source of diversity, and which is almost unavoidable, another of more extensive and deeper influence, which may be called the distinction of different schools in practical and experimental religion. While every minister, and each parish or congregation, may be said to have something distinct and characteristic about them, these also fall into groups, the different members of which are attracted by a common sympathy and community of sentiment; and they are farther assimilated by frequent intercourse. We will suppose that in all of these there is nothing unsound taught, and no tenet strictly unscriptural held; and yet we can, in these very circumstances, conceive of a most marked variety in the ministrations of the pulpit, and in the usual habits and trains of thought cherished by congregations. Let some one class of truths be brought out prominently, to the virtual suppression or neglect of others; or let the great sun of the Gospel be contemplated through some one particular medium, and the other doctrines and duties of Christianity will fall into an order subordinate to this, and will accordingly rank in relative importance. Suppose, for example, that the love of God were set forth as the sole spring of the entire work of redemption, and that the attention of congregations, and classes of congregations, were kept almost constantly directed to this single truth; and suppose, farther, that the single duty urged on men, were their believing apprehension of the love of God in Christ towards them, and that this were ever kept before them, as the very life of their soul, as the promoter of their every grace, and the subduing power of everything opposed to the will of Christ, it is quite clear, that all the other truths and duties of religion would assume different places, according to the relation in which they stood to this great master principle. Some of these would be depressed beneath the level usually assigned them, and others would be equally enhanced. Now, we do not say that any orthodox school of theology is so exclusive as this; but doubtless, there are individuals, perhaps many, whose leanings are such, as to mark them out from others, which we may afterwards describe, and whose opinions of others are thus influenced. Persons who have, in this way, been led to a right apprehension of God in Christ, and who have, through this channel, obtained peace and sanctifying grace to their own souls, do very naturally conceive this to be the most direct and scriptural, if not the only way of a sinner's acceptance with God; and they are apt, in their zeal, to account everything of mental exercise, other than this, mere hindrances and entanglements; yet surely it will be admitted, that some of God's dearest children were of very different opinions, had very different experience, and yet gave evidence of a true and a right spirit. And, therefore, without at all denying the rightness of their faith, the genuineness of their Christianity, and the unspeakable importance of the revelation of God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, we may surely submit, that the Christianity of other men, who are undoubtedly believers, ought not to be estimated under the radiance of this or any other special ray even of heavenly light. The judgment of God is one. He looketh upon all of us through the colourless medium of his own innate holiness; while we, witnessing the different rays of his divine glory, would see each other in all the colours of the rainbow.

Perhaps we may illustrate this more effectually by now turning to a very different class. Ministers belonging to this other school, feel it to be their duty to dwell much on the sovereignty of God, the unchangeable righteousness of the divine law, and the pervading influence of the doctrine of election. Then the sinner is understood to see himself, in the first instance, not so much called to participate of the grace of Christ, as condemned and helpless, waiting the disposal of divine sovereignty, and feeling, in this condition, the bondage of the will, and the awful consequence of his being left to perish. Moreover, throughout life he is expected often to feel snow the burden of indwelling and besetting sin, and to be characterized by great seriousness, deep searchings of heart, and much attention to religious duties. And with these exercises of unquestionable godliness, there is often a certain cast of gloominess and exclusiveness of character, approaching what others may call uncharitable. Of the substantial excellence of many so distinguished, none who know them will entertain any doubt; and that the doctrines we have described are deeply rooted in true and scriptural theology, they only who understand them not, will venture to deny. And there is, moreover, about the character of some trained in this school, a stability and a moral greatness reminding us of some basaltic column, whose foundation is deeply imbedded in the solid rock, and whose summit is hid in the mists floating over it. They seem to have their foundation in the Rock of Ages, and to rise amidst the darkness and infirmities of poor humanity, till their aspirations are lost among the invisible things of God. And yet, when from these we look at the Church generally, we survey Israel scattered and living in their tents, each tribe apart; we feel as if turning from the cloud-capped cliff, and surveying some general landscape. We find that these form but a small section of the Lord's people, and that even their excellence, and that which allies them to Christ, is not that by which they are distinguished from others, but that which they hold in common. It is not the particular form of the branch, but the common, though unseen sap, which pervades the entire vine. And this ought to put such on their guard, against attaching more importance to their own peculiarities, than to the peculiarities of Christianity itself; and it ought, farther, to persuade them, that others who may not be of their special school, ought not to be tried by particular exercises, to which they only have been trained. Moreover, we ought all to beware of making our own experience or attainments the gauge by which to measure the Christianity of other men. The way of entrance into eternal life is of itself narrow, and the gate of admission is, we are assured, strait. But if within these, each section of Christians would erect their little wicket, and form their private way, and confine all the Lord's people to these, may not the Master, who standeth by, reprove them, saying, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of."

There is yet, perhaps, another class or school, which may be profitably described. There are who would equally repudiate both of these, declaring the one to be presumptuous, and the other fanatical, and who, besides, shew a general disinclination to all matters of mental exercise, so direct and heart-stirring, as is implied under both. The doctrines of Scripture, as they conceive, ought to be clearly set forth and recommended by such motives as are fitted to convince and persuade. But they are left there. They are not brought in the guise and with the proper air of a divine message. Such doctrines as those of the divine sovereignty, the Spirit's influence, and the necessity of faith, in order to salvation, are all stated, explained, and recommended, to the attention and belief of the hearers. But these are not, as with some others, pervading and commanding doctrines. And, in like manner, the duties of religion and morality are duly inculcated, and often explained and enforced with much propriety, and great point and beauty of language. And thus it comes to be impressed on the minds of a large class of hearers, that such is in reality the only unexceptionable preaching. And under it there grows up a form of religious character, differing from those already mentioned, not so much in what is positive, as in what is negative. There is usually among persons so educated, great respect for the deficiencies of religion,—great sobriety in their views of divine truth,—often great staidness of principle, and general consistency of character; and not unfrequently, we trust, real and heart-felt religion, religion substantially agreeing with that described under the two former peculiarities, and having in it the power of sanctifying the heart and the conduct. Moreover, persons belonging to this class are very naturally induced to believe that the state of excitement and varied feelings, in which some others seem to live, as in their natural element, is something else than divine. They hold all such to be either delusive, or as the storms of this nether world, while it is theirs calmly to contemplate truth, and soberly to follow the path of duty, as if living under a serene and unvarying sky. On the other hand, they are themselves often branded as mere moralists, or, at best, as cold and formal, so as scarcely to deserve the name of men in earnest with religion. Now, without approving of such ministrations, in so far as they are peculiar, or of such purely intellectual habits of thought about divine things, we do, nevertheless, most sincerely believe that such preaching has been blessed, and that through such habits true faith has been exercised, and right principles and practice cultivated. And it is sometimes interesting to observe how individuals, thus taught, have gradually expanded their thoughts and feelings, so as to leave behind them others less imbued with a divine principle, and how they have thus been led insensibly to mingle with those whom they, at one time, accounted mere enthusiasts. It is with such as with some slower growing in the shade, sheltered from the passing storm, but late of blooming, because less exposed to the sun. They, indeed, look upon their own state as containing all that is excellent in the condition of others, and as being, at the same time, free from their imperfections. But this is in reality a mistake. Let the truth be equally felt by them, as it is by others, and their experience will, at least to some extent, be the same. And if, instead of allowing it to steal, as it were, into their system, it had been broadly and directly addressed to their consciences and their hearts, it would have led to the same rational convictions, and solid satisfaction, which they, in other circumstances, enjoy; and would, with these, have communicated such a power and influence, as to determine, with much greater force, their after character and conduct. But the matter of observation especially growing out of this, is, that their judgment respecting others resembles the judgment of others concerning themselves. It is determined by a local standard. They have hung up their own balances, although about to weigh a commodity altogether foreign. They propose to strike off, as blemishes, all in their neighbour's character which differs from their own, and yet to retain for themselves, as a real excellence, what others affirm to be a blemish. It is thus that, even in the Church of Christ, each little party would have its own image and subscription impressed as with a seal, on the whole household of God, and would deny, to such as bear not their mark, the relation of brother. This ought to be with all of us a matter of humiliation and watchfulness. For although the tendency assumes special forms only in special circumstances, and may be modified and corrected, it is itself a part of our fallen nature. The same plant which, in one soil yields bright blue flowers, yields in another, flowers of as bright scarlet. The soils are different, and hence the difference of colour. But, in both cases, all that belongs essentially to the plant is the same, and all that is peculiar in the colour is a thing of earth.

Before passing from this class of differences, it may not be improper to advert to one or two things, which would probably lessen such peculiarities, without diminishing the amount of real godliness. And, first, we hold it to be a principle that as all Scripture is given by inspiration, and is, moreover, profitable to all, and even necessary to the perfecting or thorough furnishing of any, so as to qualify him for all good works, the entire Scriptures ought, if possible, to be traversed in pulpit ministrations, and private Christians ought to make themselves acquainted with them, as a whole. On advertent to any of the peculiarities already noticed, or others which will occur on reflection, it will scarcely fail to be observed, that some one class of truths or limited portions of Scripture, were allowed to predominate. It will also be not unfrequently observed, that the master key of interpretation was either derived from some other source or from some limited portion of Scripture, and that it was afterwards employed as an infallible guide. Now, without at all going into the doctrine that we must enter on the interpretation of Scripture, with minds, in no respect, preoccupied, we would say most freely, Go largely into Scripture. Become largely acquainted with its facts and historical details. Study it throughout with an inquiring and prayerful spirit. And even, if the mind should already be encircled with the limits of an artificial system, it will, by a process, over which it has no controlling power, gradually burst its fetters, and wing its way in the full freedom of Scripture divinity. Warmed by the love and animated by the noble simplicity and freedom of divine truth, the Bible Christian will see among believers, of every cast of thought, the pearls which have been strewn from his Father's hand. And while he will never join with the mere pretender, who, because he hates all positive religion, is continually recommending catholicity, he will unquestionably attach less importance to mere form, and cherish generally a catholic spirit.

One other remark, and we have done. Another cause of peculiarities is the seclusion of particular parties from the fellowship of the Church generally. It has been often remarked that islanders have usually many peculiarities. This is in consequence of their being separated from the larger and more populous countries. Similar causes produce similar effects. Let any limited number of Christians, however excellent, insulate themselves from the society of others, and they will first become peculiar, and by and by they will farther value themselves on these very peculiarities. Such circumstances almost uniformly foster particular and limited ideas as to what practical religion really is. It may safely be affirmed, that if each congregation could be so cooped up, as to hold no intercourse with other parts of the Church, the opinion would soon take root in each, that beyond its little circle, there was little else than a kind of almost Christianity. Let the purest water be confined to some enclosed pool, and it will stagnate and become nauseously impure. But let it flow on and mingle with the parent deep, and again pass its round till it is seen bubbling from the fountain, and notwithstanding all the impurities through which it has passed, it is still pure. And so it is with the religion of the heart. He who is its Author never intended that it should be shut up by limits less than those of the world; and they who would, with their dykes and sluices, confine it to so many artificial apartments, ought with these, to count on a spiritual condition, less pure, less happy, and less fruitful. And this ought, especially at present, to be felt, when God is, in his own mysterious providence, opening so many springs, as if to render fruitful every portion of the land. Let them flow largely and freely, and let none limit the Holy One of Israel, but rather rejoice in all his works, and wherever they may appear. As we have freely received, so let us freely give, each seeking his brother's good.

THE EXALTED PRIVILEGES OF BELIEVERS: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. GEORGE ABERCROMBIE,
Minister of the East Church, Aberdeen.

"But ye are come into Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels," &c.—Heb. xii. 22-24.

To set forth the great privileges of faithful Christians is what the inspired author has chiefly in his eye, through the whole of this epistle of which the text is a part. It was first addressed to the Jewish converts to Christianity, to engage them to constancy in their Christian profession, amidst all the various trials to which they might be exposed on earth for its sake; and after the apostle had urged many arguments to fortify their minds, in the former part of this chapter, he then proceeds, from ver. 18, to lay before them the high privileges to which believers in Christ are now raised by his Gospel: and he illustrates this matter by a beautiful comparison betwixt Judaism and Christianity; that he might at once convince them of the superior excellence of the Christian dispensation, and persuade them to persevere in the profession and practice of that amiable religion, which brings along with it the hopes of such a glorious recompence of reward. The religion which God had once prescribed to the Jews, the apostle describes by the awful circumstances with which the law was delivered to that people on mount Sinai, which is the import of his reasoning from ver. 18 to 22. "For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire, nor unto blackness, and darkness, and tempest, and the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which voice they that heard entreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more; for they could not endure that which was commanded,—And if so much as a beast touch the mountain, it shall be stoned, or thrust through with a dart: and so terrible was the sight, that Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake." But believers in Christ are brought by the Gospel into a better covenant, established on better promises—ye are not come, says he, to Mount Sinai, "but ye are come to Mount Zion."

To some, perhaps, it may appear a little dubious whether this sublime description in the text belongs to the state of true Christians on earth, or to the state of glorified saints in heaven. I choose at present to refer it chiefly to the former; yet so as not to exclude the latter altogether, for the privileges of the true Church militant here below, are all of them typical of the happiness of the Church triumphant above; and all who are duly qualified for being members of the one, shall in due time become members of the other also. But as the Apostle here seems to have chiefly in his eye the privileges of true Christians in this lower world regarded as superior to what good men enjoyed, or could enjoy, under the Jewish dispensation, I shall consider the text chiefly in this view of it, and propose, with God's assistance, to explain the several high privileges to which believing Christians are now raised by the Gospel,—as the same are here set forth in the various phrases of the text.

1. Says the apostle—Ye are come to Mount Sion, to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem. That is, in short, ye are brought to the liberty—the spiritual liberty of the Christian Church, in opposition to the Jewish; which, comparatively speaking, was a state of bondage.

The Gospel dispensation, or the Christian Church, is frequently in Scripture called the new and heavenly Jerusalem, in opposition to the city of Jerusalem on earth, which was once the chief seat of the Jewish Church. It is also called Mount Sion, in opposition to Mount Sinai, where God gave that law which distinguished the Jews from the heathen nations, as his peculiar people. Thus, says the evangelical prophet, Isaiah, in manifest allusion to the times of the Gospel, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Sion; put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem; for henceforth there shall no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean." And the Apostle John, in the same figurative language, thus speaks of the establishment of the Gospel Church:—Rev. xxi. 2., "I saw the new Jerusalem, the holy city, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband."

In the same figurative style also, the Apostle Paul represents the Jewish and the Christian dispensations, by Hagar and Sarah, the mothers of the two sons of Abraham. Thus, Gal. iv. 24–26., "Which things are an allegory, for these are the two covenants; the one from the Mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar—for this Agar is Mount Sinai, in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem, which now is, and is in bondage with her children. But Jerusalem, which is above, is free, which is the mother of us all." "Which things are an allegory"—or which things may be thus allegorized. "These are the two covenants—the one from Mount Sinai, that gendereth unto bondage, which is Hagar—for this Hagar is Mount Sinai, in Arabia; or answereth to Jerusalem, which now is, and is in bondage with her children." But the Jerusalem which is above, i. e., the Gospel state, is free, and is the mother of us all who believe in Christ Jesus.

The principal difference betwixt these two dispensations consists in this:—The Jewish dispensation had a tendency to fill the minds of guilty men with dread and terror—and thus gendereth unto bondage—and is therefore fitly represented by the thunder of Mount Sinai, and the awful solemnity with which the law was there given, which was so very terrible that the people could not endure it, and even Moses himself exceedingly feared and trembled. But the Christian revelation signified by Mount Sion, the city of the living God, is a dispensation of grace and mercy; and represents the blessed God in such amiable characters as invited us to lay aside all slavish fear and dread, and to serve him in every duty with hope and holy joy. This is the happy privilege of all sincere Christians. We have not received a spirit of bondage unto fear, but a spirit of adoption, by which we are encouraged to say, Abba, Father,—a filial language, which no Jewish slave durst ever presume to use with his master. But as God's adopted children through Jesus Christ, we are encouraged by the Gospel to look upon God as a reconciled father, full of grace and love, who knows our frame, and remembers what we are;—who pities our weakness, even as a father pitieth his children; so that the terrors of his power and awful justice need not make us afraid; but we may come into his presence as children to a father, and serve him cheerfully in every duty of religion, and pour out our hearts before him with humble hope, for promised grace and mercy, as our various necessities may from time to time require. In this respect it is that we are not come to Mount Sinai, but we are come to Mount Sion, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem.

2. It is added as another privilege of true Christians, that we are come "to an innumerable company of angels."

It is more than probable that the apostle here alludes to the company of angels that attended on Mount Sinai at the giving of the law. In reference to which it is said, Ps. lxxviii., "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels; God is among them, as in Sinai, his holy place;" as if the apostle would argue that the Christian dispensation does not fall short of the Jewish in this respect, but rather far exceeds it. For Christians are come to an innumerable company of holy angels, and that not as awful ministers of terror, but as ministers of mercy.

Angels are now united, by the Gospel dispensation, into one society with believing Christians. Hence says the Apostle, "God hath blessed us with spiritual blessings in heavenly places; that in the dispensation of the fulness of time he might gather together into one all things in Christ; both which are in heaven, and which are in earth, even in him."—Eph. i. 10. These pure celestial spirits are subjects of the same heavenly kingdom with us. They are worshippers now together with us of the same God and universal father, and of the same Lord Jesus who hath redeemed us by his blood. Rev. iv. 8; v. 9; and vii. 11. They are the servants of Christ, as we profess ourselves to be;—through Christ they are now become the Christian's friends, and are sent forth as ministering spirits upon many occasions, to minister to them who are heirs of salvation. They rejoice at the conversion of sinners unto God; they encamp about the righteous, and have charge to keep them in all their ways. The souls of good men, like that of Lazarus, are, at the moment of death, carried by angels into Abraham's bosom. At the general resurrection the angels shall be employed as messengers of Christ, to gather together the elect from all the different corners of the earth; they shall sever the wicked from among the just, and then they who are accounted worthy of the resurrection to life, shall be equal to the angels, and joined with them in one glorious assembly, mutually sharing in the same celestial bliss, and mutually employed in praising God and the Lamb for ever and ever.

3. Ye are come, says the Apostle, to the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven.

The name, first-born, seems to intimate a right to an inheritance; and to be written in heaven, may perhaps signify having a right and title to the heavenly inheritance, in allusion to the enrolment of the names of the Jews, in the records of their several tribes and families, by which they were enabled to plead a right to all the privileges of that people. Alluding to this practice, it is here represented as one of the privileges of believing Christians, that whatever earthly kingdom or family they belong to, they are by Jesus Christ numbered among the first-born of God, and admitted by him to the heavenly inheritance, which is large enough to furnish out mansions of glory for them all. Christ is called, by way of eminence, "the first-born among many brethren"—and all true Christians, believers in him, are made heirs of God, and joint heirs together with Christ; and have their names recorded in the Lamb's book of life, as those who shall in due time enjoy the inheritance. When, therefore, the apostle says of believing Christians—"Ye are come to the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven;" the meaning is as if he said—Ye are now become members of that blessed society which consists of all the faithful in every nation of the world; which is not confined to one nation or family as the Jewish Church was, but extends to all who believe in Christ, according to the discovery they have of him, in all the various nations and families of the earth.

This, my brethren, this is the invisible and universal Church of Christ. It consists of many members unknown to one another, but who are all known to God and approved of him. They are not only of different nations, tribes, and families, but they are also of different sentiments in lesser matters of religion; and this difference of sentiment makes them often too much strangers to one another in this world, and pity it should be so. Yet, nevertheless, there is a very close union and communion among them all. They are all servants of the same God and Father of the universe; redeemed by the blood of the same Saviour; guided and sanctified by the same Spirit; heirs of the same promises, expectants of the same bliss, and shall all at last be joined in one glorious assembly, where all their little differences shall for ever subside, when many shall come from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south, to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in one united society, in the eternal kingdom of God.

4. Ye are come, says the apostle, to God, the judge of all.

By the Gospel covenant, all true believers are brought into a special relation to God, as their reconciled friend and father, and their approving, instead of their condemning judge. By nature we are his creatures, the subjects of his government; by sin we are become enemies, the objects of his displeasure. But by faith in Christ, manifesting itself by a gospel conversation, we have access to God, as a reconciled father, and are encouraged to hope, that as our merciful judge, he will acquit us from condemnation, and adjudge us to the heavenly happiness through Christ, as a reward to us, not of debt, but of grace.

"This is the covenant," says God himself, "that I will make with them in the latter days,—I will be their God, and they shall be my people.—I will be their father, and they shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord—I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more"—"For, I said, how shall I put thee among my children, and give thee a pleasant land, a goodly heritage of the hosts of nations? And I said, Thou shalt call me, My father; and shalt not turn away from me."—Jer. iii. 19. "This shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be my people."—Jer. xxxi. 33. Compare these with Heb. viii. 8, "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah," and Heb. x. 16, "This is the covenant that I will make with them; After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them."

In consequence of these evangelic promises, we are encouraged to hope for the care of God's divine providence over us, to order what concerns us to the best advantage—for the aids of his Spirit to assist us in every duty—for strength to support us in every trial; that God will pity and spare us, even as a father spareth his own son who serves him, and whom he loves most tenderly; and, in a word, that while our own hearts do not condemn us of hypocrisy or insincerity in his service, that God, who is greater than our hearts, will not condemn us, but even graciously approve us, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Thus, by the Gospel covenant, we come to God the judge of all.

5. It is added, "and to the spirits of just men made perfect."

By the spirits of just men made perfect, we may reasonably understand the souls of saints departed from this lower world, who are delivered from all their bondage to corruption, and confirmed in a state of holiness and happiness for ever,—waiting with assured hope for the redemption of their bodies from the dominion of the grave, in God's appointed time. With this blessed company of just men made perfect, Christians upon earth are united by the Gospel, through Jesus Christ, who is the common head of all. They are always represented as belonging to the same family with saints in heaven, just as persons travelling in a foreign country are connected with their friends and relations at home, or as those who dwell in the lower apartments of any great house, are accounted members of the same family with those who lodge in the upper room of it. Thus, my brethren, if we are true believing Christians, though our present habitation is for a time on earth, we are joined in society with all the spirits of just men made perfect in heaven above; and while we live the life of faith upon the Son of God, by whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, we are no more accounted as strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with all the saints, the whole household of God.—Eph. ii. 16. This is that union which is now established betwixt saints on earth and saints in heaven. And as the great mean and medium of this union is Jesus Christ, the apostle doth not neglect him in the description, but adds,

6. "Ye are come to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel."

All the spiritual privileges we enjoy are bestowed on us through Jesus Christ, who is the Mediator and Surety of the new and better covenant, established on better promises than the Sinai covenant was. He is the head, from whom, or under whom, the whole body, fitly joined together, maketh increase, unto the edifying of itself in love. He is the chief corner-stone, in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord.—Eph. iv. 16, and ii. 21. He is the vine, and we are the branches. We come to him, and are joined to him by faith; in consequence of which, his perfect righteousness becomes ours, for our justification before God, and we are accepted as righteous before him. The virtue of his atonement avails for the remission and full pardon of all our sins, and is what is signified by the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel. For whereas Abel's blood cried from earth to heaven for vengeance upon the head of Cain his murderer, and made him a vagabond and a fugitive from the presence of the Lord, the blood of Jesus, which was shed on earth, and is now pleaded in the heavenly sanctuary above, solicits and obtains for us the pardon of all sins that are sincerely repented of; it secures a full reconciliation to God in behalf of all who believe and obey the Gospel, and confirms with all such a new covenant of peace and mercy, by which we are encouraged to return to God, and to serve him with holy reverence, without slavish fear. In a word, we are justified by his righteousness, sanctified by his Spirit, governed by his laws, supplied from his fulness, and kept by his power through faith unto salvation. God looks on us, not as we were originally in ourselves, but as being planted together in Christ, redeemed and purchased by his precious blood, and made accepted in the beloved, as members of his body, and subjects of his kingdom, as heirs of God, and joint heirs together with Christ, of that heavenly kingdom that was prepared for us, even from before the foundation of the world.

Thus I have endeavoured to explain and illustrate the several high privileges mentioned in the text, to which all true Christians are now raised by the Gospel. I shall conclude with a few short and more general observations, from what has now been discoursed, as the improvement and application, which all should make of it to themselves.

1st, Let us observe what reason all true Christians have to rejoice in these privileges to which we are now raised by the Gospel. Whatever be the lot of true sincere Christians in a present world,—though without they may have fightings, struggles, and difficulties, of various kinds, and within they may have fears,—yet still they have occasion to be glad in the Lord, and to joy in the God of their salvation. So good men had, under a darker dispensation of religion than what we now enjoy, as the prophet plainly intimates, Hab. iii. 18; and, by the Gospel revelation, we are encouraged to exercise this joy more fully, in proportion as the grounds of it are more fully and clearly revealed. This, Christians—this is a prerogative that belongs to you as believers in Christ, that you rejoice in those privileges to which you are now called by his Gospel; and let me add also, that to indulge this joy freely, is often a part of your duty too. Good reason we have to say, "God is the Lord who hath made light to arise unto us—let us bind ourselves as sacrifices to the horns of his altar"—"my soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit doth rejoice in God my Saviour; for he hath regarded the low estate of his servant, or his hand-maid—he that is mighty hath done great things for me, and holy and reverend is his name." Thus, Christians, thus you are called to exercise your spiritual joy, upon many occasions, by such pious meditations as these; and to express your grateful sense of what God has done for you, to encourage others, especially young persons, to engage them in the service of Jesus Christ, as what will prove to them a comfortable as well as a reasonable service.

2d, In order to this, let the consideration of our Christian privileges excite us more and more to the study and practice of a Christian life and conversation. Most reasonable are the exhortations which the inspired apostle gives to this purpose: "Let your conversation be, in all things, as becometh the Gospel of Christ," (Phil. i. 27.) "I beseech you, brethren, that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called—worthy of God, who hath called you to his heavenly kingdom and glory." (Eph. iv. 1; 1 Thes. ii. 12.) Let these remind us all, what manner of persons we should study to be, in all holy conversation and godliness—remembering, that to this we are bound by the strictest ties, both of duty and gratitude, as well as by our own solemn vows and resolutions. Let us, therefore, endeavour to walk as becomes a people brought near to the Lord. Thus, like the first Christians, walking habitually in the fear of the Lord, we shall be enabled, by divine grace, to walk on in the comforts of the Holy Ghost, to our own edification, and to the spiritual edification of others, to the glory of God and of Jesus Christ our Saviour.

3d, What has been already discoursed on this subject, suggests a seasonable and serious admonition to all who despise Christ and his religion; and to all who disgrace a profession of it, by wicked and ungodly lives in the world. Glorious things, indeed, are said of Mount Sion, the city of our God. But all these blessed privileges belong only to those who are true sincere Christians, and who study to walk as becomes the Gospel. But as for those who despise Christ, and his religion, or who have only an external profession of Christianity, but disgrace the profession by profane and wicked lives, I must protest unto all such this day, that they have no part at all nor lot in this matter. They belong evidently to another fraternity—they are the children of wrath, and heirs of hell—associates with Satan, and all the hellish legions of evil spirits in wicked sinful works; and while they continue in this course, they have nothing to expect but that these, after their death, will be their miserable companions for ever.

If, therefore, there be any of this class here present, be exhorted, I beseech you, be entreated, be persuaded, as you regard your own happiness, to break off your sins immediately by repentance. Acquaint yourselves with Jesus, the divine Saviour—make choice of him, as offered in the Gospel—and give up yourselves to him, as sinners to be saved, as subjects to be ruled. Pray earnestly for the converting influences of divine grace, to dispose and enable you to break your covenant with hell and death, and begin a work of religion in good earnest. Then, and then only, you may hope to be numbered among the saints of God, and to know in your experience the happy privileges that belong to all such, both on earth and in heaven. Amen.

THE INSTINCT OF BIRDS IN NEST-BUILDING.

THE first care of birds, after pairing, is to discover a fit place for preparing their nests; and in doing this, their instincts, which are uniform in the species, direct them with admirable tact to the locality best suited for their own peculiar habits and temperament, as well as for the purposes of concealment from their enemies, or at least of safety from their attacks. If there are exceptions from this rule, they are such as serve only to confirm it, by shewing more clearly its nature and beneficent object. The ostrich, for example, which resides in the desert wilds of Africa, apart from the habitations of her enemy man, and also, in general, from any animal likely to annoy, which can cope with her in strength, lays her eggs in a nest carelessly chosen, and very artificially formed, in the bare sand; but, then, these nests are never deserted, for the male alternates the act of incubation with the female. The eagle builds his eyrie among the almost inaccessible rocks of the lofty mountains, open to the atmosphere, but secure. The smaller birds, whether they construct their nests among the long grass of the meadow, the bush or brake of the woodlands, the leafy hedge or lofty bough, or whether they seek the dwellings of the human race, and nestle in the window corner, in the eaves of the thatched roof, or in the shelter of some deserted chimney, uniformly display a consummate skill in acting on the principle I have stated, so far as it is consistent with other circumstances in their condition and habits.

But what is still more worthy of remark, is the degree of care with which the nest itself is constructed, which remarkably corresponds with the necessity of the case. I have mentioned the little art with which the eagle and the ostrich prepare their nests; and this inattentive habit is common to almost all the larger birds, while, in proportion as the size of the bird diminishes, the skill with which the materials of the nest are selected and interwoven is in general increased. The intention of this is not doubtful. The chief object of careful nest-building is the preservation of an equable heat in the eggs; but when the fowl happens to be large, in proportion to the size or number of the eggs, the natural heat of the body is sufficient for all the purposes of incubation; and it is only when this circumstance is reversed, as is the case in the smaller birds, or in such as build early in spring, that any artificial means are necessary. There is here, then, a remarkable accommodation to circumstances,—a wisdom altogether beyond that of the bird itself, and referable, like other instincts, only to the Creator. Who taught those early breeders, the blackbird and the thrush, to plaster their nests with loam, that they may exclude the keen icy gales of still lingering winter? Who taught the eiderduck, in the chilly regions of Iceland, to tear the down from her body, that by a lining so soft and warm, she may protect her precious charge from the inclemency of that climate? Who taught that hardy little warbler, the golden-crested wren, which fears no cold for itself, and which delays its maternal labours till the middle of summer, to compensate for the trifling degree of warmth communicated by its tiny form, by building its beautiful nest of moss interwoven with the spider's web, and thus forming a thick and closely compacted texture, which it fills with such a profusion of feathers, that its little eggs, by the retention and accumulation of the heat, are kept in a temperature at once high and equable? And, on the other hand, who taught the emu, the osprey, and the condor, to know that their comparatively gigantic bodies were sufficient, of themselves, without the aid of an artfully formed nest, to impart the requisite warmth for the vivifying of their eggs, small as they are in number, and large in bulk? Who, indeed, we may ask, taught any of the winged tribes that the heat of their bodies was necessary for the development of the embryo in the egg? The whole subject is full of wonder and instruction, and calculated to overwhelm the mind with devout admiration. "Who knoweth not, in all these, that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this?"

Another circumstance which I may mention, is the remarkable variety observable in the habits of birds in nest-building, where the instinct itself is so peculiar, and its general principle so identical. The same form of the nest, and place of building, and materials employed, are rarely, if ever, found united in the architect-

It must be confessed, however, that although what has been said in the text is true as a general law, there are many instances in which it may be difficult to account on the same principle, though, doubtless, even these cases, were we acquainted with all the circumstances, would be equal indications of wise adaptation. The wood-pigeon and the jay, for example, though they erect their fabrics on the tall underwood, in the open air, construct them so slightly, and with such a scanty provision of materials, that they seem scarcely to make sufficient provision for the support of the brood, and even their eggs may almost be seen through the loosely connected materials. It would appear, that there is something in the constitution of the eggs, which makes them less susceptible than others of the alternation of heat and cold.

ture of different species; and, indeed, in any one of these particulars, there is generally some specific difference. The house-sparrow builds four or five times in the year, in a variety of situations, under the warm eaves of our houses and sheds, the branch of a clustered fir, or the thick tall hedge which bounds our garden, employing, in all these situations, a mass of straw and hay, and, for a lining, feathers from the poultry-yard. The goldfinch forms the cradle of its young with fine mosses and lichens, collected from the apple or pear tree, compact as felt, lining it with the thistledown,—a model of beautiful construction. A few loose bents and goose-grass, on the other hand, rudely entwined, with perhaps a sprinkling of hair, suffice for the mid-summer nests of the white-throat and black-cap. The green-finch builds carelessly in the hedge, with materials of the coarsest kind; while the chaffinch constructs its anxiously-concealed edifice with the nicest art, in the neighbouring beech or elm. The bullfinch requires fine roots for its nest; the grey fly-catcher chooses cobwebs for the outworks of its building.* It seems as if Providence had intended that all kinds of portable materials, adapted for the purpose, should be put in requisition, by this variety of choice in the different families, so that nothing might be lost, and that one species might not inconveniently interfere with another.

"It wins my admiration
To view the structure of that little work—
A bird's nest. Mark it well, within, without—
No tool had he that wrought; no knife to cut—
No nail to fix; no bodkin to insert;
No glue to join; his little beak was all;
And yet, how neatly finished! What nice hand,
With every implement and means of art,
And twenty years' apprenticeship to boot,
Could make me such another? Fondly, then,
We boast of excellence, whose noblest skill Instinctive genius fails!" HORACE.

There is yet another general observation which I may make here, though it relates to the instinct of reproduction, and not of nest-building. I have incidentally stated, that some of the larger birds lay fewer eggs than the smaller. There is, in this, a very remarkable attention to what I have elsewhere called the balance of animal nature. Birds of prey breed slowly; those which are the objects of prey breed rapidly, and in profusion. Thus, the eagle, the condor, and the vulture, lay but two eggs at a time, and produce only once in the year. The falcon, the hawk, and the owl, with all their rapacious congeners, produce also sparingly. The wren, on the contrary, lays ten or even fifteen eggs, and rears this numerous offspring, that they may serve, as it were, to supply the wants of the predatory tribes, to whom their feebleness and unprotected condition render them an easy prey. And so with many other birds. They are prolific in proportion to their exposure to accidents or to enemies; and thus the species is preserved, notwithstanding the destruction to which they are destined. This is a kind of provision which runs through animated nature, and, singular as it is, manifests Creative Intelligence, and that kind of analogy, which, in so many particulars, unites the various departments of creation under one character, and distinguishes the whole as the work of one Almighty hand.

To begin with the eagle, which has justly been termed the king of birds. Her nest is usually built, as I have already observed, in some inaccessible cliff of a rock, sometimes shielded from the weather by an overhanging crag, but sometimes also exposed both to the wind and rain. It is flat, though built with considerable labour, and the pains bestowed in erecting it, seem only once to be encountered, as she is said to make it her breeding-station for life. Willoughby thus describes a nest which was found on the Peak of Derby:—"It was made of great sticks, resting one end on the edge of a rock, the other on two birch trees. Upon these was a layer of rushes, and over them a layer of heath, and upon the heath rushes again; upon which lay one young one, and an addle egg; and, by them, a lamb, a hare, and three heath plants. The nest was about two yards square, and had no hollow in it. The young eagle was of the shape of a goshawk, of almost the weight of a goose, rough-footed, or feathered down to the foot, having a white ring about the tail."

The circumstance mentioned of the addle egg, seems to be very common among all the eagle tribes, owing, perhaps, to the flatness of the nest; and it may be regarded as indicating the same providential intention as that already alluded to in regard to the fewness of their eggs. The design is, that this devourer of the more helpless of the quadruped tribes, should be preserved and propagated in sufficient abundance to perform its office of keeping these prolific species within their proper bounds, but should, at the same time, be prevented from itself becoming a pest by over production.

The woodpecker is another bird whose nest is an object of curiosity and admiration, though for a very different reason. This numerous tribe have very remarkable habits in procuring their food; and the instruments with which they are endowed, are admirably fitted to the peculiarity of their condition, which consists in feeding on insects lodged in the interior of decaying trees. These I must not stop at present to describe; but I have to observe that its bill, which is so beautifully contrived for providing its subsistence, serves also, in this country, to enable it to scoop out for itself a nest, which it does with all the neatness of an experienced workman, in one of the trees where it finds its food. The work is thus graphically described by Wilson:—"About the middle of May, the male and female look out for a suitable place for the reception of their eggs and young. An apple, pear, or cherry tree, often in the near neighbourhood of a farm-house, is generally pitched upon for this purpose. The tree is minutely reconnoitred for several days previous to the operation; and the work is first begun by the male, who cuts out a hole in the solid wood, as circular as if described by a pair of compasses. He is occasionally relieved by the female,—both parties working with the most indefatigable diligence. The direction of the hole, if made in the body of the tree, is generally downward, by an angle of thirty or forty degrees, for the distance of six or eight inches, and then straight down for ten or twelve more,—within roomy, capacious, and as smooth as if polished by the cabinet-maker; but the entrance is judiciously left just so large as to admit the bodies of the owners. During this labour, they regularly carry out the chips, often strewing them at a distance, to prevent suspicion. This operation sometimes occupies the chief part of the week."

This operation is sufficiently curious; but what is far more worthy of attention, is the total change of instinct in birds of the same species, under other circumstances. There is not, indeed, in the whole history of nature, a more singular instance of sagacity, if it can be called by that name, than what is displayed by these little winged wonders, in protecting themselves against their enemies. In civilized countries, man is the chief foe they have to dread; and the nest we have described suffices for that purpose. But the case is different in the wide-spread forests of America. In the depth of these wildernesses, where little is to be apprehended from man, it is not concealment that is necessary, but a situation beyond the reach of those rapacious creatures, which infest the woods, and live by plunder. From the monkey and the snake, which are, in these regions, its natural enemies, its European nest would be no security. It must select a place which these insidious foes may, indeed, observe, but cannot invade. This, with admirable skill, it accomplishes, by building its nest depending from the most outward branches of a tall tree, such as the banana or the plantain. "On one of these immense trees," says Goldsmith, whose account I follow, "is seen the most various and the most inimical assemblage of creatures, that can be imagined. The top is inhabited by monkeys of some particular tribe, that drive off all others; lower down, twine about the great trunk, numbers of the larger snakes, patiently waiting till some unwary animal come within the sphere of their activity; and, at the edges of this tree, hang those artificial nests, in great abundance, inhabited by birds of the most delightful plumage."

The nest is usually formed in this manner.—When the time of incubation approaches, the woodpeckers fly busily about, in quest of a kind of moss, called, by the English inhabitants of those countries, old-man's-beard. It is a fibrous substance, which bears to be moulded into any form, and glued together. This the little bird first fixes, by some viscous substance, gathered in the forest, to the most extreme branch of a tree; then, building downward, and still adding fresh materials to those already procured, it forms a nest, which hangs like a pouch, from the point of a branch. The hole to enter at is on the side; and all the interior parts are lined with the finer fibres of the same substance, which compose the rest of the fabric.

Such is the ingenious and effectual contrivance, by which the American woodpeckers, as well as some other birds who have the same enemies to dread, save themselves and their young from the depredations of the serpent and the monkey. The nest hangs there, before the spoilers, a tempting object, which they can only gaze upon, while the bird flies in and out, without danger or molestation.

The magpie's nest, by its peculiar adaptation to the circumstances of a single locality, seems to indicate a power of reasoning and contrivance more allied to reason than to instinct. "On the road between Huntly and Portsoy," says the Rev. John Hall, "I observed two magpies, hopping round a gooseberry-bush, in a small garden, near a poor-looking house, in a peculiar manner, and flying out and in to the bush. I stepped aside to see what they were doing, and found, from the poor man and his wife, that these magpies, several succeeding years, had built their nest, and brought up their young in this bush; and, that the foxes, cats, hawks, &c. might not interrupt them, they had not only barricaded their nest, but had encircled the bush with briars and thorns in a formidable manner, nay, so completely, that it would have cost even a fox, cunning as he is, some days' labour to get into the nest.

"The materials in the inside of the nest were soft, warm, and comfortable; but all on the outside so rough, so strong, and firmly entwined with the bush, that, without a hedge-knife, hatch-bill, or something of the kind, even a man could not, unless with much pain and trouble, get at their young; for, the distance from the outside to the inside of the nest, extended as long as my arm.

"These magpies had been faithful to one another for several summers, and driven off their young, as well as every one else that attempted to take possession of their nest. This they carefully repaired and fortified in the spring, with strong, rough, prickly sticks that they sometimes brought by unting their force, one at each end, pulling it along, when they were not able to lift it from the ground."

SKETCHES OF THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D. D., Minister of Cramond.

No. I.

"Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency! and thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee, and thou shalt tread upon their high places."—DAVID. xxxiii. 29.

THE nation of Israel stands distinguished above all other nations, for signal dispensations of Providence to them. More especially, are they distinguished for very great deliverances that have been wrought for them in former times; and for a still greater deliverance that is in reserve for them, according to the prophecies of Scripture. To that great deliverance, the words of Moses, quoted above, look forward for their complete accomplishment. The same things have not been promised to any other nation under heaven. To the same effect Moses tells them in chap. iv. of this book of Deut.: "Ask, now, of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask from the one side of heaven unto the other, whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it? Did ever people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as thou hast heard, and live? Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched-out arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the Lord your God did for you in Egypt before your eyes? Unto thee it was shewed, that thou mightest know that the Lord he is God; there is none else besides him." See also David's testimony, respecting the distinguished privileges of the people of Israel. 2 Sam. vii. 23, 24, and Ps. cxlvii. 20.

Now, although we, as Gentiles, had not been aware of our having any near interest in the nation of Israel; yet the consideration of their being distinguished above all other nations, might naturally make us desirous of knowing what might be known of a people, whom the God of heaven had delighted to honour. But much more should our attention be directed to what has been recorded of them, when we consider that we have a near interest in them, that our highest hopes for eternity stand connected with the eventful history of that wonderful people. It was from them that the word of the Gospel was first sent to us; and it will be from them that the Gospel shall again be sent to all the nations of the earth, when the mountain of the Lord's house shall be above the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow into it; and when Jerusalem shall again be a praise on the earth.

We may well suppose that great and important purposes are to be answered, by so marked a distinction between this nation and the other nations; and it may serve as a suitable introduction to the sketches of their history that are to be given, and may deepen the interest to be taken in their history if we can ascertain, by the help of the Scriptures, some of the purposes that were to be answered, by the selecting of one nation from among the nations, to be distinguished by signal interpositions of Providence in their behalf.

1. One very important purpose, that was intended to be answered by this arrangement, was to preserve upon the earth the knowledge and worship of the living and true God, when, otherwise, there is reason to fear, that the whole earth would soon have been involved in total darkness, and its inhabitants would have been living without God and without hope. God had, indeed, at no time left himself without a witness in the world, in giving men rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, and filling their hearts with food and gladness. But men chose not to retain the knowledge of God in their hearts. Their foolish heart was darkened, and they were speedily turned aside, under the influence of Satan, the god of this world, into all the abominations of heathen idolatry. Here then, was a wise and gracious constitution, by means of which, there was preserved a knowledge of the true God, in one corner of the earth, at least, as a light shining in a dark world; a star in the east, to guide men from earth to heaven. And, doubtless, many individuals of the other nations, there especially, bordering with the land of Israel, were benefited by the light that beamed from mount Zion.

And that this was one purpose for which God selected one nation to himself, from among the nations, may be concluded from what was so frequently declared to the people of Israel, by the prophets whom God sent to them; that these things were done to them that they might know that God was the Lord, and that other nations also, hearing of these things, might know that God is the Lord.

I might go into a wide field of illustration to shew what of God was known by the special dispensations of his providence towards the nation of Israel. But this would not suit the brevity that is intended in these remarks. Suffices it to say, that every one who will study the history of the people of Israel, will find there very interesting discoveries of God's presence with his people,—of his absolute sovereignty,—of his Almighty power,—of his unchangeable truth and faithfulness,—of his unspotted holiness,—of his long-suffering patience,—of his unceasing care and love. How beautifully is this love of God to his people described in the song of Moses,—“The Lord's portion is his people, Jacob is the lot of his inheritance. He found them in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness. He led them about,—he instructed them,—he kept them as the apple of his eye. As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings; so the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange God with him. He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields. And he made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock.”

2. Another important end to be answered by God's selecting one nation from among the nations, was, that in their remarkable history there might be exhibited, for our instruction, emblems or types of spiritual things. This seems to be evident from the use that is made of the Old Testament history, by the writers of the New Testament; and this, particularly, is manifest in the Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews. The name Israel is used, in Scripture, to describe the people of God of all nations; according to what is said, “They are not all Israel who are of Israel; but they who have the faith of Abraham, are his seed in a spiritual sense.” The whole course of God's conduct towards Israel after the death, gives a shadowy representation of his conduct towards the Church of his redeemed of all ages, and all countries. This typical analogy might be shewn in a great number of particulars. Take the following instances as specimens: The state of cruel bondage under which the nation of Israel was held in Egypt, represents that state of degrading bondage to sin and Satan, under which we all are held, in this our fallen state. The great deliverance from the bondage of Egypt, which God wrought for the nation of Israel by his outstretched arm, represents the gracious interposition of God in behalf of sinners of mankind, through the mediation, and sufferings, and death of his own dear Son. God's watchful care, in conducting the nation of Israel through the wilderness, represents Christ as the Captain of Salvation, conducting many sons and daughters to glory through the wilderness of this world. The nation of Israel being put in possession of the land of promise, under the conduct of Joshua, represents the better inheritance which Christ will bestow upon his people, having subdued all their enemies. “All these things happened to them for ensamples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.”

3. In connection with what has been stated, under the second division, I have to add, farther, what must be considered the chief purpose to be answered by the selecting of the nation of Israel from other nations, and by all the peculiar dispensations both of mercy and of judgment towards them, was to prepare the way for the coming of the Saviour. This is intimated to us by the Apostle Paul in his Epistle to the Romans. Having proved that both Jews and Gentiles were under sin, and stood equally in need of the Saviour, he anticipates a question that might be put to him, namely, “What advantage, then, hath the Jew, and what profit is there in circumcision?” To this question he answers, “Much every way, chiefly because to them were committed the oracles of God.” And referring to the same subject in a subsequent part of the Epistle, he says, “Whose are the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever, Amen.” The selection of the nation of Israel was, in various ways, made subservient to the preparing of the world for the coming of the Saviour. There was lodged with them a long train of prophecies, referring directly to the coming of the Saviour; by the fulfilling of which, in the person of Jesus, it was proved that he was the Messiah of whom the prophets testified. There were also, in the sacrifices daily offered up amongst them, and other institutions of their ceremonial law, many striking types of Christ and his salvation. These were shadows of good things to come. But, above all, the most distinguished privilege conferred upon the nation of Israel was, that from them was to be descended, as to his human nature, the Saviour, who is Christ the Lord. He was to be descended from the tribe of Judah; and in the line of David; and that this might be made manifest, it was so ordered, that a faithful record of the genealogy of the kings of Judah should be kept.

From this it appeared that Mary, the mother of our Lord, and Joseph, her husband, were both descended from David. One way, too, in which the selection of this people, and their separation from other nations was made subservient to the preparation for the coming of the Saviour was, that under the discipline of the law, they were taught the obedience which the law required: they were made sensible of their inability to yield the obedience which the law required; they saw their need of a Saviour, and of an atonement for sin. Thus the law was a schoolmaster to bring them to Christ. Accordingly, by such a train of providential arrangements, there was a preparation made for the people of Israel receiving the Saviour, when he did appear, in fulness of time. It is true that many of the Jews, after all, rejected the Saviour when he did appear, because they attended not to the signs of the times, and attended not to what their own Scriptures had testified respecting him. But there were those amongst them who waited for the consolation of Israel, and who received him gladly. The first Christian Church consisted of Jews. It was from them that the knowledge of salvation first came to the Gentiles. The sound of the Gospel went forth from Jerusalem, so that, according to the memorable words of our Lord, “salvation is of the Jews.”

1. Let us admire the wisdom, the power, and the grace of God in the Jewish economy. It is altogether distinct from the plans and purposes of men. It is no human contrivance. It is evidently the Lord's doing. Let “it be marvellous in our eyes!”

2. Let us carefully study the history of this people, so distinguished from among other people upon the face of the earth. Much may yet be learned of the works and ways of God from a careful study of their eventful history.

3. Let us not cease to pray for the accomplishment of the great things which God has promised to Israel. In seeking their good, we are seeking to promote the cause of God, or what shall tend to our own good. “God hath spoken good concerning Israel.”

Only Believe.—He that lives by faith shall never die by fear. The more you trust God the less will you torment yourselves.—FLAVEL.

THE CHRISTIAN'S JOY.

"Rejoice evermore."—1 THESS. v. 16.

"Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, rejoice."— PHILIP. IV. 4.

THE bondsman rejoiced when the jubilee came,
And the glad sound of liberty rang through the land;
The captive rejoiced, for he knew he could claim
The rights which the free and the noble demand.

What rebel, condemn'd by his sovereign to die,
Unheeding, the tidings of pardon can learn?
Ah! beams not with gladness the prodigal's eye,
When a kind father meets him, and hails his return?

Rejoice then, O Christian! more urgent by far
Is the call of thy Saviour on thee to rejoice:
Let faith, while she gazes on Bethlehem's Star,
In praise everlasting lift loudly her voice.

Rejoice! for the trumpet of jubilee sounds,
The day of salvation has dawn'd on our world;
True, sin has abounded, but grace more abounds,
Messiah the banner of peace has unfurl'd.

Rejoice! for thou'rt stranger and alien no more;
Thy home is in heaven—thy Father is there—
Rejoice! for the terrors that scared thee before,
Remov'd by thy Saviour, no longer shall scare.

Rejoice! for the bondage of Satan is o'er;
The fetters that gall'd thee asunder are riv'n;
Rejoice! for thy foot is on Liberty's shore,
Redeem'd by Messiah—a freedman of heav'n.

Rejoice! for the Lord is thy surety—thy guide;
Thy fears shall vanish—thy faith still increase;
No arrows shall harm thee—no evil betide;
Thy heart shall be comfort—thy spirit be peace.

Rejoice then, dear brother! rejoice evermore!
United to Jesus, what prospects arise!
Salvation is thine—and, when life's dream is o'er,
In glory thy spirit shall soar to the skies.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Providential Preservation.—The following remarkable incident is narrated by Holman the Blind Traveler:—There were two pilots living at George Town, but the captain of the port resided at Launceston. This was a Mr Walsh, who had been an officer in the Bridgewater, at the time she sailed from New South Wales, in company with the ship Cato, and his majesty's ship Porpoise, on board of which vessel was the celebrated navigator, Flinders. The desertion of the two latter vessels by the captain of the Bridgewater, is too well known to require a recital; but as the ultimate fate of the Bridgewater herself is not so generally known, I will introduce a short account of it. The fact of her two companions having run on a coral reef, was evident to all on board the Bridgewater; and when the captain expressed his intention of proceeding on his voyage, some of his officers remonstrated strongly with him on the inhumanity of abandoning the crews of those vessels, who had escaped from the wreck to a small part of the shoal that was above the level of the sea. Their endeavours to induce him to approach the reef to leeward, to afford them assistance, were, however, useless, as he persisted in his intention of prosecuting his voyage. They were thus abandoned to their own resources, from whence they were providentially delivered through the great exertions of Captain Flinders, who reached Sydney in an open boat on the 8th of September, where he procured vessels and speedily repaired to their relief; while the unfortunate Bridgewater, with her perverse captain, foundered at sea on her passage from Bombay to England. Mr Walsh and another officer had left her in India, in consequence of a dispute with the captain, arising from the above affair; thus they were providentially preserved, from the circumstance of their having advocated the cause of humanity.

The demoralizing consequences of War.—Schiller, in his History of the Thirty Years' War, gives the following account of the taking of Magdeburg, by the soldiers of the Catholic League:—"Here commenced a scene, to describe which history has no language, poetry no pencil. Neither the innocence of childhood, nor the debility of old age; neither youth, sex, beauty, nor condition, could disarm the fury of the conquerors." "Fifty-three dead bodies of women, who had been beheaded, were found in the cathedral; the Croats amused themselves in throwing children into the flames,—Papenheim's Walloons in murdering infants at the breast. Some officers of the Catholic League, shocked at these frightful scenes, entreated Tilly to stop the effusion of blood. 'Return in an hour,' was his stern answer, 'the soldier must have some reward for his toils.' The massacre lasted with incessant fury until the smoke and flames interrupted the plunderers. To augment the confusion, and prevent the resistance of the inhabitants, the town had been set on fire in different quarters, a storm arose which spread the flames with rapidity, and soon made them universal. The horrors of the scene were augmented by the dead bodies, falling ruins, and streams of blood; the atmosphere was heated, the intenseness of the vapour at length compelled the conquerors to take refuge in their camp. 'The entire amount of the slaughtered was calculated at thirty thousand.' The entry of the General took place on the 14th, "the next day a solemn mass was performed, and Te Deum sung under a discharge of artillery!"

Happiness not in worldly honours and enjoyments.—The following is the testimony of a well known worldling, Lord Chesterfield, to the vanity of the world and all its enjoyments:—"I have run the silly rounds of business and pleasure, and I have done with them all. I have enjoyed all the pleasures of the world; and consequently know their futility and do not regret their loss. I appraise them at their real value, which is, in truth, very low; whereas those who have not experienced, always overrate them. They only see their gay outside, and are dazzled by their glare. But I have been behind the scenes; I have seen all the coarse pullies, and dirty ropes, which exhibit and move the gaudy machine. I have seen and smelt the tallow candles which illuminate the whole decoration, to the astonishment and admiration of an ignorant multitude. When I reflect back on what I have seen, and what I have heard, and what I have done, I can hardly persuade myself, that all that frivolous hurry, and bustle, and pleasure of the world had any reality; but I look upon all that has passed as one of those romantic dreams, which opium commonly occasions; and I do by no means wish to repeat the nauseous dose, for the sake of the fugitive dream."

REPENTANCE.

BY THE REV. JOHN MACFARLANE,
Minister of Collessie.

MAN, considered as capable of religion, may be viewed in a twofold aspect; as a rational creature, and as a creature ruined by sin. Two separate classes of duties arise out of his condition. As a rational creature, he is bound in common with all other beings endowed with intelligence, to love God, and to love his fellows; and, as a fallen creature, he is required to cultivate those dispositions of mind, which indicate a restoration to spiritual sensibility, and a return to the path of obedience from which he has gone astray.

Of this latter class of duties, one of the principal is, repentance. Of duties I have said, for it is a duty enjoined upon us, as well as a grace we must receive from above. Its propriety and necessity arise out of the peculiar circumstances of the human race. Had there been no sin, there had been no occasion for the exercise of repentance upon earth, more than there is in heaven. Had there been no provision of mercy, repentance had been as unavailing on earth, as it is in hell. The permission of evil in our world therefore, notwithstanding the mystery which it involves, gives occasion for a display of the divine character, of which it must have been impossible for us otherwise to have conceived. In the purity and happiness of angels, we have a manifestation of God's goodness to bless. In the hopeless misery of fallen spirits, we have a proof of his justice to punish. In the restoration of the debased and corrupted mind of man to spiritual health and loveliness, we have an evidence of his compassion to heal.

That some such change of disposition and character as has received the general name of repentance is necessary, has been universally admitted. As it is allowed even by those who take the most partial views of the moral condition of man, that he is liable to sin, and chargeable with deficiency and error, so they acknowledge that in some sense, there is room and occasion for the exercise of this grace. But great variety of opinion, and much misapprehension, seem to prevail as to what really constitutes repentance, and the place which it occupies in the great work of the sinner's salvation. In pursuing our observations upon a subject so interesting, let our thoughts therefore be directed, in the first instance, to the nature of true repentance—the qualities by which this grace of the Christian life may be distinguished from every delusive appearance, which may be mistaken for its existence in the soul.

And, in our inquiry into the nature of repentance, let this simple principle be kept in view, that it is not merely a preparation for, but an actual part of salvation,—that it is one of the immediate and necessary consequences of faith—the first step of the regenerated sinner's progress in the path that leads to the true perfection of his spiritual nature.

Viewing repentance as thus evincing the restoration of the mind to spiritual life—as forming the incipient stage of its return to the love and obedience man owes to his Maker, we are furnished with a test, by which it seems not difficult to ascertain the reality of its existence. By a very easy application of this principle, we may conclude that repentance does not consist in regret for the present consequences of sin, nor in restraint put upon natural inclination, by a view of the evils to which indulgence might expose. The shame of detection in a dishonourable act—the loss of health, or of reputation, to which perseverance in an unlawful course might subject—the rebukes of a conscience, which, though neither very enlightened, nor very sensitive, is not altogether seared, may fill the mind with deep and bitter remorse upon the review of sins which are not felt to be hateful, and may deter from giving form and expression to the secret purposes and desires of the heart. But this is not repentance; it indicates not the return of the soul to the love of holiness and of God.

For the same reason it is obvious, that mere dread of the future punishment of sin does not constitute true repentance. The infliction of that punishment is no doubt felt to be a terrible evil by those who suffer it. They have an experience of the bitter consequences of disobedience to God, far more vivid and overwhelming than any conception of these consequences we can form. Yet there is no penitence in the place of perdition.

And that, not only because there is no hope of mercy there—because despair sits enthroned amid blackness and darkness for ever; but because there is no disposition there to return to the allegiance and the love which all intelligent creatures owe to the Author of their existence. The punishment of rebellion is dreaded, and its continuance is contemplated with horror, but the moral nature is unchanged, or rather, the inveteracy of its hatred is increased by the infliction. Were the punishment of sin to be remitted, or its severity so far mitigated as to permit inclination to flow in its natural channel, it would burst forth in an overwhelming torrent of impiety and crime. Now, though there is a difference between the state of sinners in this world, and of sinners in the next, just as there is a difference between the fear of punishment threatened, and fear for the continuance of punishment endured, the love of sin in both cases may be the same. He, therefore, who is deterred from the commission of sin merely by a regard to the future evils it may entail,—whose life is spent in a miserable conflict between the inclination to sin upon the one hand, and the dread of its punishment upon the other, is not a true penitent. There is nothing in his case that denotes the return of the soul to the love and the homage it owes to its Maker.

Upon the same principle, even that repentance is an essential part of the restoration of a fallen creature to holiness, we perceive, that no temporary and evanescent excitement of the feelings can indicate the possession of this saving grace. That there is an adaptation of the truths of religion to the condition and the wants of man, is a fact, which next to the promise of the Spirit, is most of all fitted to sustain and encourage the efforts of the Christian ministry in exhibiting and enforcing those truths. There is probably no individual in a Christian country, and, especially, no individual living under an enlightened and faithful ministration of the Gospel, to whose conscience and heart the truth has not commended itself at some time, or in one or other of its various aspects. Its impressions on different minds may be more or less vivid and permanent. Its effects may be various, in awakening the fears, or in exciting the expectations of men; but a certain stirring of mind seems, in every case, to bear witness to the force and the reality of the representations of the Bible. In addition to such impressions, some affecting visitation of divine providence, in the form of personal affliction, or of heavy bereavement, or of remarkable deliverance from imminent danger, may seem to soften and subdue the heart. But, whatever may be the cause or the extent of such excitement,—how fair soever the blade of Christian promise may seem to arise, glittering to human appearance in the dew of the divine blessing, or basking to human appearance in the sunshine of the divine favour,—if no maturity is attained, if no fruit is yielded, the seed of true repentance has not been planted in the breast. For, since repentance is the introduction to holiness, the first step in the renovation of the soul,—it indicates, wherever it truly exists, the commencement of a process which will, and must be completed.

An application of the test by which we would detect the fallacy of certain appearances that may be mistaken for repentance, even that this grace of the Christian life forms an essential part of salvation, will lead us to the further conclusion, that the changing of one sinful course for another less flagrantly so, does not indicate true penitence of heart.

A variety of causes may render it expedient or agreeable, to adopt such changes as have been alluded to; while the power of sin, and the disposition to commit it remain unsubdued. Men may want the inclination, or they may want the ability to pursue the course which they have hitherto maintained, while the tendency of an unsanctified mind may be evinced, by their pursuing another course more inviting, or more easy of access. Their conduct may be influenced by taste, or by fashion, or by necessity. A particular vice may so pall upon their appetite as no longer to allure. Opinion, like the flowing of the tide, may set powerfully in against the current of sinful inclination, and force it into an opposite channel. Or the means and opportunities may be wanting of giving a depraved taste the gratification it craves. In such cases, there is no doubt, a change induced, but it is a change of circumstances, not of inclination. The tendencies of an unrenewed heart are exhibited in different aspects, but its essential elements are the same. As the cloud, whether gilded by the sunbeam, or laded with the shower, is only a floating vapour, and into how many varied forms soever it may be shaped by the winds of heaven, or how rich soever the hues with which it may be tinged by the radiance of the rising, or of the setting sun, is itself cold and changeless; so the human character may be influenced and adorned by a variety of external causes and circumstances, while its original nature and tendencies remain.

And, as regret for the present consequences of sin—as fear for its coming punishment—as a transient and unproductive excitement of the feelings, and the abandonment of one course of disobedience for the adoption of another, do not, when taken separately, constitute repentance; so though they were all combined in one individual, their union entitles him not to be viewed as a true penitent. And for this simple reason, that neither of them by itself, nor all of them united, indicate the return of the soul to the love of God, or to the desire of holiness. Each, and all of those feelings may be experienced, and those appearances displayed by the man, in whose heart the love of sin remains unbroken.

Yet, alas! how very often are such appearances mistaken for a contrite heart. Men cannot, indeed, fail to know that they need repentance; but the deceitfulness of sin mournfully appears in their cherishing a delusion. Their very sorrow worketh death—their very repentance needeth to be repented of. The offspring of delusion, it pepe-tuates the evil from which it springs. They mistake the spurious plant that grows up out of the natural soil of their own hearts, for that introduced by the hand of God, and if the axe of true conviction is not now laid at the root of the tree under whose shadow they repose in fatal security, it shall be cut down by the hand of death, and become wormwood in the cup of their future woe.

This grace of the Christian life, as distinguished from every delusive appearance, is produced by His Spirit, who is exalted a Prince and a Saviour to give repentance to Israel. It consists in an apprehension and feeling of the real character and malignity of sin. The true penitent desires to avoid and subdue it, because it is the object both of his dread and of his hatred. He mourns over even its partial existence within him, on account of the debasement it has occasioned, and the ingratitude it involves. He seeks not to cover or to extenuate his offences; and his ingenuous and unreserved confession of sin, is accompanied with an unfeigned desire to prevent or to remedy the evils, which his former disobedience may have produced. The grief which his repentance includes is felt for "secret faults" which no human scrutiny could detect, as well as for more open and flagrant violations of the divine law; and he has formed a resolution, deep, and steady, and in dependence upon a power higher than his own, to overcome all sin, as equally forbidden by the authority, and contrary to the love, to which he has yielded the unreserved homage of his heart.

His is not a sordid and reluctant abandonment of a course, which, but for the misery it entails, he would still pursue. His repentance is quickened in its exercise, and all the springs whence his godly sorrow flows, are opened afresh, by the full manifestation of pardoning mercy. Should he even attain the happy consciousness that his is the blessedness of "the man to whom the Lord imputeth not his sin;"—should the sweet assurance be brought to his heart, that all his guilt has been carried away upon the head of the great expiatory sacrifice into the wilderness of oblivion, this very assurance softens and melts his heart. The sensibility of his soul is awakened and increased, by so touching a display of sovereign grace. The goodness of God leads to a deeper repentance. The contrition of the humble penitent is not an evanescent feeling, but a habit of the mind. It proves that upon his bosom there has dawned a new and holy light, which, while it unfolds to him the horrors of the captivity of sin, inspires the hope of deliverance from its bondage, and sustains the endeavour to be made for ever free.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF MOSES.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,
Minister of Westruther.

NO. III.

THE PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA.

In conducting the march of the Israelites from Egypt, though it seems, after the immemorial arrangement of caravans in the East, to have been consigned to the management of five presiding officers,* the chief burden devolved on Moses; and from the moment of his putting himself at the head of that laborious and difficult enterprise, he followed, with implicit faith, the directions of the heavenly guide, who preceded the horde of wanderers in a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night. Even at the starting-point there was a necessity for his exercising this faith. For at Rameses, which, lying near the modern Cairo, was probably the ancient Goshen, and which was the place of general rendezvous for all the Hebrew slaves from the different cities in which they were located, there were two routes to Canaan,—the one northward by the sea coast, which was the nearest and most common,† the other lay along the western arm of the Red Sea, through the wild and inhospitable desert that divides Egypt from Arabia Petrea. The former the divine oracle declared to be impracticable, as it ran through the heart of the country of the Philistines, a fierce and warlike tribe, who would be sure to dispute the entrance of so vast a body of people within their territories, and whose determined opposition might tend to dispirit the emigrants at the outset of their journey. By the latter, therefore, though much more circuitous, Moses was commanded to set out with the people; and while his own inexperience of this unfrequented track precluded the possibility of his being able to choose the stages best adapted for the accommodation of shade and water; and while the mind of so vigilant and reflecting a leader would anticipate the exhaustion in a short time of the few hasty preparations that had been made for the journey, without his having the means of dealing out further rations to the people, he scrupled not to commit himself with his mighty charge to the hazards of an expedition through the interminable wilderness, confidently relying on his father's God for the necessary supplies, as well as for rendering them all the offices of a safe and unerring guide. The first two stages were at Succoth and Etham, both of which lay in the direct line of Canaan; and nothing occurred during that preliminary part of their journey to put the faith of Moses and his followers to any severe test of its stability. They had, as yet, seen no cause to dread either the opposition of a new, or the pursuit of their old, enemy; and even if such an unexpected crisis had arrived, they were already encamped on the borders of the desert, into which a short march would have placed them beyond the reach of their pursuers, as the chariots and horsemen, of which the militia of Egypt chiefly consisted, could have made little progress over dry and yielding sand, fit only for the broad hoof of a camel. Everything was calculated to keep in high spirits both the people and their leader,—the one, exulting in their newly acquired independence, and feeling, as yet, only the pleasures, without either the tedium or the privations incident to a migratory life,—and the other, buoyed up with the patriotic ambition of establishing his countrymen in the inheritance of their fathers, marched on from day to day in the mutual satisfaction that every fresh journey was bringing them a stage nearer to Canaan. But at Etham, instead of pursuing their journey eastward, with the sea on their right, they were suddenly commanded to diverge to the south, keeping the gulf on their left,—a route which not only detained them lingering on the confines of Egypt, and, consequently, within reach of their ancient oppressors, but, in adopting it, they actually turned their backs on the land of which they had set out to obtain the possession. A movement, so unex-

* In Exodus xlii. 18, it is said, "The children of Israel went up harnessed out of the land of Egypt." The original means also "five in a rank," i. e., as the editor of Calmet justly remarks, embodied under five, according to the ordinary laws and usages of encampments and caravans.

† The journey from Egypt to Canaan by this way could be accomplished in three days.—Philo de vita Moisi.

pected, and of which the ultimate design was carefully concealed, could not but excite the astonishment of Moses, who, as he was then approaching the pastoral tracts of Jethro, was well acquainted with the geographical bearings of that part of the desert. Nevertheless, he obeyed the mandate of the oracle; and by the ready and unhesitating part he acted, both in the then alteration of his course, and in the extraordinary crisis which followed, shewed that he was animated by a faith in the promise and the power of God, capable of sustaining the shock of the severest trials. Pi-hahiroth, the place where he was commanded to encamp, was a spacious bay, formed by the extremities of the mountain chains of Gewoubee and Attaka, which, after running at a great distance from each other on either side of an extensive valley, terminate almost in a junction on the western shore of the Red Sea. Never, to all appearance, was there a position more injudiciously taken, as it was not only, from its narrow limits, ill adapted for a regular encampment, but so totally unprovided with facilities either for resistance or retreat, that it would have seemed the last place a skilful and experienced general would have chosen, who had reason to dread the sudden incursions of an enemy. On either side it was surrounded by rugged and precipitous cliffs, the passes of which were so strait, that a single person could with difficulty penetrate them, while their summits, being easily accessible from without, afforded a vantage-ground, from which an enemy could, with impunity, discharge a shower of missiles on the defenceless crowd below. Before them was a gulf, many miles in breadth,* a terrific spectacle to a people whom the stern laws of slavery had never permitted to wander from their native hovels, and who had never seen any greater expanse of water than the Nile, or the artificial canals by which Egypt was irrigated. In this natural basin Moses halted with his followers; and scarcely had they pitched their tents, when the plain behind them appeared glittering with armed men, in whose impetuous movements, and scythe-armed chariots, and peculiar war-cry, they descried their Egyptian oppressors. The apparition of fabled warriors that suddenly sprung from the teeth of the Cadmean dragon could not have struck the beholders with more astonishment and terror, than the arrival of Pharaoh's horsemen spread through the ranks of the Hebrews. In their situation, all the disadvantages of which instantly forced themselves on their view, where could they look for deliverance? The mountains on the right and left presented an insurmountable barrier to so vast a multitude. The sea, on whose shore they were encamped, had no ford, or, if it had, they were too little acquainted with its ebb and flow to trust to the tide so long a period as was necessary for transporting three millions of people.† Their only rational hope of preservation, therefore, lay in the direction of the defile through which their pursuers were advancing. But they were so panic-struck, that the idea of resistance was as much a stranger to their breasts, as the weapons of war were to their undisciplined hands; to flee on foot, and over sand, encumbered, as they were, with children, cattle, and other effects, was impracticable, from an enemy provided with the means of rapid pursuit; while to throw themselves on the tender mercies of the Egyptians, the only alternative left to them, seemed the most desperate course of all,—their imaginations already picturing the bastinado, the dungeon, the triple chains, with which * Much difference of opinion long existed with regard to the part of the sea which the Hebrews crossed. From the accurate researches of Niebuhr and Burckhardt, it seems now established, that it was about ten hours' journey farther down than the modern Suez, at a place called Birket Faroum, the pool of Pharaoh. The sea is here from 12 to 14 miles in breadth.

† The narrative of Moses states that there were six hundred thousand adults, which, including families, will, according to the most approved principles of statistics, amount to nearly three millions.

the merciless tyrants would revenge their conspiracy of rebellion and fight. Among a people who thus saw no alternative between the sword of their assailants and a watery grave, all sense of subordination to their leader was instantly lost. Notwithstanding the obvious tokens of the divine guidance and protection in the cloud that preceded them, they had come, from daily familiarity, to regard it with the same indifference as the other natural phenomena, by which the heavens declare the presence and the glory of God. The little faith which had ever leavened the multitude at large entirely vanished from men, in whose breasts fear had extinguished every manly and pious sentiment; and by a transition, not uncommon to people in a state of desperation, they fell into transports of unrestrained indignation against the man, whom, but a little before, they had followed and revered as the delegate of heaven. From one end of the camp to the other, the mingled cries of despair and execration arose, husbands and wives, parents and children, looking upon themselves as victims ready for the slaughter, doomed to what their Egyptianized imaginations represented as the most horrible fate,—to die without the rites of sepulture, and leave their carcasses a prey to the unclean and carnivorous tenants of the desert."

Never, perhaps, was the fortitude of a man more severely tried than that of Moses on this memorable occasion, exposed, as he was, to various and inevitable dangers, the most formidable of which, undoubtedly, was the vengeance of a seditious and desperate multitude, ready to burst in concentrated fury on his devoted head. But not more immovable stood the rocks of Gewoubee and Attaka amid the dashing of the waves of the Red Sea, than he was in that dreadful emergency amid "the tumults of the people:" and the attitude of meek and magnanimous composure in which he stood before that host of mutineers, maddened by the most lawless and discordant passions, while an enemy, burning with revenge, was almost on the borders of the camp, and the wild, pent-up locality showed that all hope of natural relief or covert was vain, presents one of the sublimest examples of moral courage to be found in the whole compass of history. And whence did that courage arise? Neither in the powers of his own mind, nor in the resources of experience, could he find any expedient to meet the crisis. His pacific habits as a shepherd had totally unfitted him to form the line, or

"Head the embattled legions on the field."

And even if desperation had wound him up to a pitch of unwonted daring, and he had thought of resorting to one of those stratagems of war, by which the genius of ancient commanders often extricated them from an enemy superior in power and numbers; yet how could he look for his efforts being seconded by a people unprovided with arms, unaccustomed to discipline, and incapable of acting in concert? There was still open to him the easier and more promising arts of persuasion; a power which has been successful often

"In wielding at will the fierce democracy," and which "the old man eloquent," might have used to scatter oil on the elements of discord around him, and render them willing instruments of his designs. But in speech he was as rude as in arms; nor would all the talents of a Demosthenes and a Cicero, had they been united in his person, have availed in such an extremity, when the speaker was incapable of devising or pointing out to his hearers any scheme for their mutual preservation. Still less hope could he find on the natural virtues of his rod: and had any of the Hebrews, appealing to its celebrated triumphs over the waters of Egypt, have urged him to exercise its powers in commanding the retreat of the adjacent sea, his pious mind would have rebuked the superstition, as sternly as Canute did the adulations of his courtiers, when, seated in his imperial chair on the shore, that monarch shewed them, in similar circumstances, the feebleness and impotence of man. The confidence of Moses arose solely from the hope of a divine interposition. He saw the miraculous cloud still accompanying them, which, as sure as the rainbow was the sign of peace, he looked to as the token of Almighty protection, although he was unable to anticipate the way in which it would be rendered. In every quarter he would naturally look for the expected deliverance, rather than in the direction of the sea; and sooner, perhaps, would he have thought, that the angel of death would strew the plain with the carcasses of Pharaoh and his troops, as he had formerly spread simultaneous havoc in all the houses of Egypt, or that the sea would disappear through subterranean caverns, than that so restless an element would be tamed into the calmness and consistency of solid matter, and retire so far as to afford "ample room and verge enough" for so mighty a multitude to cross. But when, in answer to his prayers, he received the divine command to go forward, he no longer doubted that the obedient waters would open a pathway. In the faith of its newly communicated virtues, he waved his rod over the liquid expanse; and, undismayed by the impetuous rush of the billows, or the furious gusts of the east wind, he first planted his footsteps on the untrodden sand, and, entering the gloomy defile, summoned the people to follow him without fear of the treacherous walls. To have confided in the power of God to effect a safe and comfortable passage for himself through that waste of waters would itself have been a heroic act of faith; but when we take into account the multitudes who followed him—the immense number who, through infancy and old age, were incapable of accelerating their movements—together with all the appurtenances of the camp—we must perceive that Moses was placed in circumstances where the strong and steady character of his faith was strikingly developed.

It was in the evening, probably about eight o'clock, the usual starting-time for caravans in the hot season, when the Hebrews broke up their encampment at Pihabiroth, and entered on the bed of the Red Sea. It was a strange and fearful pathway, forming a kind of submarine labyrinth, o'er-canopied by the curtain of the hardly visible heavens, bounded on either side by liquid walls held firm by an invisible chain, gleaming in ten thousand places with the reflected glare of the fiery column, and towering to a height from which the Arab daos, that from time immemorial have navigated that sea, might have seemed "Like wing of a wild bird."

The wildest spots of the land desert exhibit now and then signs of animation, and the tedium of travelling in those dreary regions, is occasionally enlivened by the gazelle roused from its lair, and bounding with the speed of an arrow over the plain; by the sudden scream of a wild bird, giving to the winds her complaints against those who, passing near,

"Molest her ancient solitary reign;"

by the lonely flower, whose well-known beauties awaken a host of tender associations, and transport imagination to the genial climes of home; or, by the rude landmark that tells the silent tale that a human foot has been there before. But, in penetrating the solitudes of that untrodden journey, there was not an object with which the heart could warm into sympathy, or which memory could classify with any known genus of the earth's productions. All was new, death-like, and arrayed in the attributes of gloomy, awful, savage sublimity, seen but for one moment, to be the next enveloped for ages among the other secrets of the deep, but hptokening to that passing glance that they belonged to a foreign kingdom of nature;* while, added to all this, the lowing of the cattle, the hum of the mighty population,

"Loud as from numbers without number," and the hoarse thunder of the east wind, reverberating along the dark profound, gave its finish to the terrific character of the scene. But notwithstanding this, the people, emboldened by the example of their leader, and their faith re-established by the cloud's seasonably changing its position, so as to screen them from the view of their pursuers, entered the watery defile, and though at every step they were placing themselves more and more at the mercy of an element, ready, from its nature, to rush on them with an impetuous and overwhelming torrent, yet they continued their march in the confident assurance that

"Regions unknown were safe to them,
When God their friend was there."

Nor was it with precipitate steps, anxiously relieving themselves of their baggage, to accelerate their flight from the enemy behind, and deeming themselves happy if, amid such an accumulation of dangers, they could only gain the opposite shore with their lives. The journey was performed with the greatest deliberation. The usual arrangements of the caravan were observed; each fell into his own place as before; the bearers walking with measured steps, with the venerable relics of their ancestors; fathers carrying the simple furniture of their tents, and mothers their sucking infants on their sides; the younger damsels, decked in their Egyptian jewels, and anticipating the song and the dance with which they were soon to celebrate the praises of their divine deliverance; the light-hearted stripling at their side, eyeing, with juvenile curiosity, the gems which

"The deep unfathomed caves of ocean bear;"

and the vagrant flock, stopping now and then to browse on some straggling sea-weeds; all moved on in the greatest order, and with a feeling of perfect security,—not the smallest interruption occurred to set fear on edge,—not even the spray was wafted by the east wind to wet their faces, or soil their garments; and the channel over which they trode, though but a moment before soaked with the mass of incumbent waters, was as dry as the sand of the desert, when skimmed by the sultry breath of the sirocco, or scorched for ages by the rays of a tropical sun.

It were idle to speculate on an incident so plainly miraculous. For all the attempts which the early historians of Egypt, zealous for the honour of their country, first made, and some learned men, in modern times, have renewed, to prove that it happened during an extraordinary ebb of the tide, which Moses' local knowledge enabled him to anticipate, are at variance not only with the tenor of the sacred history, and with the immemorial tradition of the natives of the place, that on one remarkable occasion, the sea opened up a passage, through which a wonderful people escaped to the opposite shore,—but they are also at variance with the established laws of fluids, and the physical peculiarities of that region. Had the Etesian winds caused on that occasion an unprecedented reflux, raising the water to a great height on one side, still, as according to the Mosaic account, there was a wall on the right hand and on the left, it will be impossible, on the same principles, to rear the wall on the other; † and supposing that the water had been separated into two abrupt and perpendicular masses, yet, who that reflects for a moment on the nature of that treacherous element, can suppose that it would continue in the same confined position, and not seek for itself some outlet, until all the Israelites had passed?

"Would gravitation cease till they went by?"

* Niebuhr saw great quantities of coral, rare shell-fish, and other petrifications, in what he considered had been the ancient bed of the sea.

Moreover, if the force of the Etesian winds had produced such an agitation in the waters of the Red Sea, as to leave a great part of the channel dry, the same natural cause must have often produced a similar effect. But the caravans that yearly travel from Cairo to Mount Sinai, and other parts of Arabia, though tempted to explore the whole line of coast, by the prospect of saving an immense distance, have never been able to discover such a passage. The truth is, that as the monsoon in that sea blows during the summer half year from the north, and during the winter half from the south, by neither of which, it is obvious, could the passage of the Israelites have been effected from the western to the opposite shore; an east wind is expressly stated to have been the agent employed by the Almighty, as if for the purpose of excluding all idea of the operation of natural causes. And if we further take into account that this part of the gulf, where it is supposed the Israelites crossed, has always been famous for its furious and tempestuous character, we shall be impressed with a higher idea of the divine power, by which the passage was effected, and "which, when the waters saw, they were afraid and fled."—Psalm lxxvii. 16.*

THE INSTINCT OF BIRDS IN NEST-BUILDING.

(Concluded from p. 254.)

ONE of the most peculiar modes of structure to be found among the feathered tribes, is that which distinguishes the sociable grossbeak, a particular family of the species, which is so named from its mode of building in societies. Birds of the same species inhabit the pine forests of Europe, Asia, Africa, and North America, and are also to be found in the woods of the north of Scotland. The following account of the architecture of these birds is given in Vaillant's Travels:—

"I observed in the way, a tree, with an enormous nest of these birds, to which I have given the appellation of republicans; and, as soon as I arrived at my camp, I dispatched a few men with a waggon to bring it to me, that I might open the hive, and examine its structure in its minutest parts. When it arrived, I cut it to pieces with a hatchet, and saw that the chief portion of the structure consisted of a mass of Boshman's grass, without any mixture, but so compact and firmly basketed together, as to be impenetrable to the rain. This is the commencement of the structure, and each bird builds its particular nest under this canopy. But the nests are formed only beneath the eaves of the canopy, the upper surface remaining void, without, however, being useless; for, as it has a projecting rim, and is a little inclined, it serves to let the rain water run off, and preserves each little dwelling from the rain. Figure to yourself a huge, irregular, sloping roof, all the eaves of which are completely covered with nests, crowded one against another, and you will have a tolerably accurate idea of these singular edifices.

"Each individual nest is three or four inches in diameter, which is sufficient for the bird; but as they are all in contact with one another around the eaves, they appear to form but one building, and are distinguishable from each other only by a little external aperture, which serves as an opening to the nest, and even this is sometimes common to three different nests, one of which is situated at the bottom, and the other two at the sides.

"The large nest that I examined, was one of the most considerable I had any where seen in the course of my journey, and contained three hundred and twenty inhabited cells, which, supposing a male and female to each, would form a society of six hundred and forty individuals. Such a calculation, however, would not be exact. I have spoken above of birds, in which one male is common to several females, because the females are much more numerous than the males. The same is the case with many other species, both in the environs of the Cape, and in the colony, but it is particularly so among the republicans. Whenever I have fired at a flock of these birds, I have always shot four times as many females as males."

The smallest, as well as one of the most interesting and beautiful of the feathered tribes, is the humming-bird, a native of America. Of this little creature there are six or seven varieties, from the size of a small wren down to that of a humble bee. It is easy to imagine how much these tiny flutterers must add to the beauty of a rich western landscape. As soon as the sun is risen, the humming-birds of different kinds are seen fluttering about the flowers, without ever lighting upon them, in search of the insect food on which they subsist. Their wings are in such rapid motion, as to make the humming sound from which they derive their name, and it is impossible to discern their colours, except by their glittering. The nest, of a species which seems to form the link in the chain that unites the feathered with the insect tribes, deserves to be noticed. Goldsmith describes them as "suspended in the air at the point of the twigs of an orange, a pomegranate, or a citron tree; sometimes even in houses, if they find a small and convenient twig for the purpose." The female is said to be the architect, while the male goes in quest of materials, such as cotton, fine moss, and the fibres of vegetables. Of these materials a nest is composed, of about the size of a hen's egg cut in two.

Mr Wilson gives the following description of the nidification of the ruby-throated humming-bird:—"In Pennsylvania, the humming-bird usually arrives about the 25th of April,* and about the 10th of May begins to build its nest. This is generally fixed on the upper side of a horizontal branch, not among the twigs, but on the body of the branch itself. Yet I have known instances where it was attached, by the side, to an old moss-grown trunk; and others, where it was fastened on a strong rank stalk or weed in the garden; but these cases are rare. In the woods, it very often chooses a white oak sapling to build on, and in the orchard or garden, selects a pear-tree for that purpose. The branch is seldom more than ten feet from the ground. The nest is about an inch in diameter, and about as much in depth. A very complete one is now lying before me, and the materials of which it is composed are as follow: The outward coat is formed of small pieces of a species of bluish grey lichen, that vegetates on old trees and fences, thickly glued on with the saliva of the bird, giving firmness and consistency to the whole, as well as keeping out moisture.

"Within this are thick matted layers of the fine wings of certain flying seeds, closely laid together; and lastly, the downy substance from the green mullien, and from the stalks of the common fern, lines the whole. The base of the nest is continued round the stem of the branch, to which it closely adheres; and, when viewed from below, appears a mere mossy knot, or accidental protuberance. The eggs are two, pure white, and of equal thickness at both ends. On a person's approaching the nest, the little proprietors dart around with a humming noise, passing frequently within a few inches of one's head, and should the young be newly hatched, the female will resume her place on the nest, even while you stand within a yard or two of the spot."

I cannot resist the pleasure of continuing Mr Wilson's narrative of this delightful little tenant of the air.

* The humming-bird is migratory from one part of America to another.

* The water at this part of the Red Sea, is, according to Niebuhr, ten, and according to Bruce, fourteen fathoms deep; so that the walls would be more than 80 feet high; and as the gulf was unquestionably deeper in ancient times, they would in many places be much higher.

"The humming-bird is extremely fond of tubular flowers, and I have often stopped with pleasure to observe his manœuvres among the blossoms of the trumpet-flower. When arrived before a thicket of these that are full blown, he poises or suspends himself on wing, for the space of two or three seconds, so steadily, that his wings become invisible, or only like a mist, and you can plainly distinguish the pupil of his eye, looking round with great quickness and circumspection; the glossy golden green of his back, and the fire of his throat, dazzling in the sun, form altogether a most interesting appearance. When he alights, which is frequently, he always prefers the small dead twigs of a tree or bush, where he dresses and arranges his plumage with great dexterity. His only note is a single chirp, not louder than that of a small cricket or grasshopper, generally uttered when passing from flower to flower, or while engaged in fights with his fellows; for when two males meet at the same bush or flower, a battle instantly takes place; and the combatants ascend in the air, chirping, darting, and circling round each other, till the eye is no longer able to follow them. The conqueror, however, generally returns to the place to reap the fruits of his victory. I have seen him attack, and for a few moments tease the king-bird, and have also seen him, in his turn, assaulted by the humble bee, which he soon put to flight. He is one of those few birds that are universally beloved, and amidst the sweet dewy scenery of a summer morning, his appearance among the arbour of honeysuckles, and beds of flowers, is truly interesting.

"When morning dawns, and the best sun again
Lifts his red glories from the western main,
Then through our woodbines, wet with glittering dew,
The flower-fed humming-bird his round pursues;—
Sips, with inserted tube, the honey'd bloom,
And chirps his gratitude as round he roams:
While richest roses, though in crimson dress,
Shrink from the splendour of his gorgeous breast.—
What heavenly tints in mingling radiance fly!
Each rapid movement gives a different dye;
Like scales of burnish'd gold, that dazzling show,
Now sink to shade—now like a furnace glow."

I shall close this selected account of nidification by a short detail of the various peculiarities in the nest-building of the swallow tribe, one of the most remarkable, and generally favoured by man, of the winged genus. "The swallow," says Sir H. Davy, "is one of my favourite birds, and a rival to the nightingale; for he glads my sense of seeing, as the other does my sense of hearing. He is the joyous prophet of the year, the harbinger of the best season. He lives a life of enjoyment amongst the loveliest forms of nature; winter is unknown to him, and he leaves the green meadows of England in autumn, for the myrtle and orange groves of Italy, and for the palms of Africa." The same sentiment is poetically expressed by Anacreon:—

"Gentle bird, we find thee here
When Nature wears her summer vest,
Thou comest to weave thy simple nest;
And when the chilling winter lowers,
Again thou seek'st the genial bowers
Of Memphis, or the shores of Nile,
Where sunny hours of verdure smile."

Early in the spring, when the gnat and the beetle put off their earthy robes, and venture into the air, the swallow is seen returning to the British shore, from its long migration; but it does not begin to build till the sun has acquired more power, and the increasing numbers of the insect tribes promise a plentiful supply of food for its future progeny. The nest is constructed with great art, with mud carried in its bill from some neighbouring brook, well tempered, and moistened with water. It is kept firm by long grass and fibres of various plants: within, it is lined with feathers, those of the goose being preferred, from their warmth, and the neatness with which they admit of being packed. There are three kinds common to this country,—the chimney swallow; the window swallow, or martin; the sandy-bank swallow, or sand martin. The first of these leaves its nest open at the top; the two last take care to secure theirs with some kind of covering. Wilson gives some interesting details of the building habits of these birds in America, where they differ from our swallows in various particulars, as well as in colour, which is of a bright chestnut on the belly, where ours is pure white. "Early in May," says he, "they begin to build. From the size and structure of the nest, it is nearly a week before it is completely finished. One of these nests, taken on the 21st June from the rafter to which it was closely attached, is now lying before me. It is in the form of an inverted cone, with a perpendicular section cut off, on that side by which it adhered to the wood. At the top it has an extension of the edge or offset, for the male or female to sit on occasionally. The upper diameter is about six inches by five, the height externally seven inches. The shell is formed with mud, mixed with fine hay, as plasterers do their mortar with hair, to make it adhere the better. The hollow of this cone is filled with fine hay, well stuffed in; above that is laid a handful of very large downy goose feathers. Though it is not uncommon for twenty and even thirty pairs to build in the same barn, yet everything seems to be conducted with great order and affection."

The window-swallow, whose nest is too familiar to my readers to need any special description, is remarkable for occasionally selecting singular situations for its place of incubation, and for the tenacity with which it adheres to its choice when it has once completed the building. M. Hebert mentions a pair which built on the spring of a bell; and says that, though the concussion, when the bell was rung, prevented the young from being hatched, they continued to inhabit the insecure nest for the rest of the season. Another pair, mentioned by Bingley, built for two successive seasons on a pair of garden-shears, stuck up against the boards in an out-house; and another still, attached their tenement to the wings and body of a dead owl, hung up on the rafter of a barn, and so loose as to be moved by every gust of wind. This last was placed as a curiosity in the Leverian Museum.

Shakespeare, in his own characteristic style, has described the peculiar habits of this agreeable little bird:—

"This guest of summer,
The temple-haunting martlet, does approve
By his lov'd masonry, that the heaven's breath
Smells woefully here; no jutty, frieze, buttress,
Nor coigne of vantage, but this little bird hath made His pendant bed and procreant cradle: Where they Most breed and haunt, I have observed, the air
Is delicate."

MACBETH.

The singular method which the house-martin sometimes takes to revenge itself on a sparrow when it endeavours to avail itself, as it not unfrequently does, of the labours of this ingenious architect, by taking forcible possession of its habitation, has been noticed by several writers. The following instance has been detailed to me by a friend, who was an eye-witness to the whole transaction:—At Millfieldhill, in Northumberland, two pairs of swallows were accustomed to rebuild their hereditary nests, one at each upper corner of a bed-room window. One year, after the little "clay-built sheds" were just completed, a sparrow thought proper to ensconce herself in one of them. Immediately the outraged pair began to twitter with a loud and irritated note, and, darting frequently in at the door of the nest, endeavoured to dialogue the intruder. But in vain. The sparrow, protected as behind a battery, sat with his bill, a formidable weapon of defence, in the middle of the entrance, and gave so warm a reception to the besiegers, that, after a long and fierce contest, the lawful owners were obliged to yield to the fraudulent occupier; but not unrevenged. They retired for a time, along with their neighbours of the opposite corner, as if for consultation, and by and bye were seen returning in a band, apparently to renew the struggle with these fresh auxiliaries. But no such thing: each was loaded with a mouthful of clay, and, setting diligently to work, adhering by their claws to the outside of the nest, they had, before nightfall, completed their ingenious object of retaliation, by entirely building up the entrance to the nest, and thus leaving the robber sparrow a helpless captive, immured in a prison, where she had hoped to secure for herself a commodious habitation. Here the sparrow remained closely pent up till next morning, when a maid-servant, taking pity on the prisoner, restored her to liberty, by drawing down the upper sash of the window. This operation, however, destroyed the structures of both the friendly pairs; but, nothing discouraged, they immediately recommenced their laborious task, and, in a few days, had re-erected them in the same site. We may well inquire if it was simple instinct which led to this combination and ingenious device. And if so, our next inquiry will be, how this kind of instinct is to be defined, so as to distinguish its operations from those of reason.

There is a species of swallow called Salanguano, which inhabits Java, and other islands of the Indian Archipelago, whose nests are of a very remarkable construction; and being edible, and highly esteemed by Chinese epicures, form a valuable article of commerce. They differ considerably in their composition; and the manner of procuring their materials, and constructing them, is more a matter of conjecture than of certainty. Some authors, among whom is Goldsmith, assert that the substance of these nests is a sort of froth of the sea, or of the spawn of fish, which is alleged to be strongly aromatic; some describe it as a kind of gum, collected by the birds from the tree called Calambone; others, again, would have us to believe, that it is a viscous humour, discharged by them through the bill at the season of reproduction. Whatever this singular substance may be, it is deposited by the swallows in deep caverns, frequently very dangerous of access, where human cupidity and epicurism have found means to penetrate. "The most remarkable and productive caves," says Mr Crawford, "in Java, of which I superintended a moiety of the collection for several years, are those of Karanbolang, in the province of Baglen, on the south coast of the island. There the caves are only to be approached by a perpendicular descent of many hundred feet, by ladders of bamboo and ratan, over a sea rolling violently against the rocks. When the mouth of the cavern is attained, the perilous office of taking the nests must often be performed by torch-light, by penetrating into recesses of the rock, where the slightest trip would be instantly fatal to the adventurers, who see nothing below them but the turbulent surf, making its way into the chasms of the rocks. The common prices for these nests at Canton, are, for the most esteemed kinds, about six pounds sterling per pound weight, while the inferior sorts scarcely average more than half that enormous sum. From Java there are exported about 27,000 lbs., the greater part of which is of the first quality. From the Suluk Archipelagos, between two and three times that quantity is exported. It is computed that 30,000 tons of Chinese shipping is employed in this extraordinary trade; and that the whole yearly quantity consumed is not less than 242,400 lbs. In the Indian Archipelago, at the prices already quoted, this property is worth 1,263,519 Spanish dollars, or £284,290! It forms a considerable branch of the revenues of the crown."

I cannot close this sketch of the various modifications of that instinct with which it has pleased the Creator to endow the winged tribes, without soliciting attention to the variety and wisdom of the contrivances by which the safety both of the parents and their progeny are provided for, regarding as they do, not merely the peculiar habits of the birds themselves, and the susceptibility of injury in their eggs and young, but their particular locality with reference to climate, and to the living creatures which exist in their neighbourhood. I have already noticed a remarkable instance of this latter kind of adaptation, in the different kind of nest formed by the woodpeckers of Europe and America; and I think the reader will join me in a similar observation with regard to the swallows of India, as compared with the congeners in our own quarter of the world. Here this tribe are strikingly familiar with their fellow-inhabitants of the human race. There is nothing in the materials of their nests which man can covet, and they therefore freely throw themselves on the protection of these lords of the creation. But it is very different in the Indian Archipelago. There, from some peculiarity with which we are not acquainted, the swallows are made to build their "procreant cradles" of materials which man eagerly covets as food; and, therefore, these little tenants of the air are taught to retire to deep and dangerous caverns, where their wings enable them easily to penetrate; but where nothing but a morbid and pampered appetite could induce man to pursue them.

THE DEATH OF A YOUNG HINDOO CONVERT.

THE Rev. Dr Wilson of Bombay, in the last letter received from him by the General Assembly's Committee for the India Mission, gives the following account of the death of a young woman, who was the first-fruits of his labours in India:—

This young woman was the daughter of Devaki, the first Hindoo woman whom I baptized; and she has been connected with the mission and my family since the beginning of 1830. My dearest partner made her the object of her peculiar care, and had her instructed both in Maráthi and English, and taught her many a hallowed lesson, and offered up in her behalf many a fervent prayer. The Lord blessed her endeavours, and those of myself, to her true conversion to God. During her last illness, arising from consumption, which lasted for upwards of three months, she shewed unequivocal tokens of gracious affection and Christian hope, which became the more remarkable as her end drew near. One day, with the view of ascertaining, as far as possible, the grounds of her confidence, I subjected her to a most searching examination; and the result was the most satisfactory. After she declared to me, that she rested all her hopes on the finished work of Christ, I asked her, if, without holiness, she could see God? "No, no," was her answer. I then said, "Do you then say to God that you are holy?" "No," she observed in reply, "I cannot say to God that I am holy; but I pray him to make me holy, and he will make me holy;" thus evidencing the clearest views of essential truth. I sat at her couch during the whole of last night, and the greater part of this day, and she, momentarily expecting her removal from this vale of suffering and tears, appeared to feel and to act in a manner the most appropriate to the solemnity of her situation. She was so anxious to hear me address the throne of grace on her behalf, and to have the divine Word brought to her remembrance, that I felt constrained quite to exhaust myself in praying with her, and administering to her from the Scriptures. Her soul literally feasted itself on the water and the bread of life. When I asked her, when she appeared to suffer much pain, if she was afraid of death, she said, with great humility, but in the tone of fullest assurance, "Why should I be afraid of death, when Christ has pardoned all my sins." To her sorrowing mother and brother she said, "Weep not for me! Christ is coming to take me to himself." A few seconds before she expired, she took hold of my hand and kissed it, said I had been a father to her, and bade me farewell. She took leave, in this manner, of all who were standing around her couch; and they were quite overcome with her tenderness and composure. She had frequently audibly prayed, "Lord Jesus, come quickly and take me to thyself!" and these were, I think, her last words. She is the first Indian-born member of our little Church, who has died in the years of understanding; and, blessed be the name of the Lord, we have such reason to believe that she has fallen asleep in Jesus. I have just addressed all the converts respecting her removal, and they have been much affected. I pray that the dispensation may be sanctified to every one of them. What I have witnessed in her, has proved greatly refreshing to my own soul, which has often been greatly grieved by the failings and inconsistencies of some of the members of my little flock. The Lord, through her, has "perfected praise."

THE LORD'S SUPPER;
INSTRUCTIONS DERIVED FROM THE TIME OF ITS INSTITUTION.

BY THE REV. JAMES GRIERSON,
Minister of Errol.

THE two Sacraments or sealing ordinances of the New Testament, are Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Of both of them it may justly be said that, while they illustrate the nature, they also afford one of the most conclusive evidences of the divine authority or truth of the Gospel. At the same time that they set forth, under the most simple and appropriate emblems and actions, the peculiar doctrines of our holy religion, they exhibit, if duly considered, a most striking demonstration of its heavenly origin. The same thing may be said with respect to the two corresponding ordinances which existed under the Old Testament dispensation, namely, circumcision and the pass-over. The importance of all these ordinances, in establishing the truth of that religion to which they belong, has been beautifully pointed out in that admirable and well-known treatise by Leslie, entitled "A Short and Easy Method with the Deists." He justly observes, that if the matters of fact which are recorded in the Scriptures be true, they will sufficiently evince the truth of the doctrines which are there delivered. He, therefore, lays down four rules as to the truth of matters of fact, which, as he shews, are of such a kind that those matters of fact, in which they all meet, cannot possibly be false. "The rules are these: 1. That the matters of fact be such, as that men's outward senses, their eyes and ears, may be judges of it. 2. That it be done publicly in the face of the world. 3. That not only public monuments be kept up in memory of it, but some outward actions be performed. 4. That such monuments, and such actions or observances, be instituted, and do commence from the time that the matter of fact was done." The substance of the treatise is then taken up in demonstrating that all these four rules hold good, and are strictly fulfilled, in regard to the leading facts which are recorded in Scripture, such as those which were connected with the Passover, and with the institution of Baptism, and of the Lord's Supper.

It is chiefly of the last mentioned ordinance that we propose, at present, to treat; but, in so doing, our object is, not to exhibit the particular subservience of this institution to the general argument which Leslie has so amply and ably maintained for the truth of the Gospel, but simply to direct the special attention of our readers to some very interesting reflections, connected with the particular time at which the Lord's Supper was instituted. To that general argument, all that is required, in regard to the time of the institution, is merely, that it shall be immediately connected with the matters of fact which it is intended to commemorate. Now, for this purpose, it is obviously sufficient that the monument or memorial should "commence from the time that the matter of fact was done." But while the observations, which are now about to be made, will direct our thoughts to a very striking evidence of our Lord's divinity, and therefore to the truth and divine origin of our religion; the circumstance to which they relate is the remarkable one that the ordinance of the Supper was instituted, not immediately after, but immediately before that event, of which, after the event had taken place, it was to continue, till the time of his second coming, to be the solemn and significant commemoration.

It is obvious from the narrative of the evangelists, and expressly declared by the Apostle Paul, on the special testimony of our Lord himself, that this holy ordinance was instituted by "the Lord Jesus," and for the first time administered, "the same night in which he was betrayed." The principal object which the Saviour had in view, in instituting this ordinance, and enjoining its future observance, is sufficiently intimated by the words of his solemn injunction, "This do in remembrance of me," Luke xxii. 19; and by the remark of the apostle, "For as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death till he come." Now, it may, without irreverence, be said, that so far as this particular object was concerned, it would have been perfectly sufficient had the institution of the Supper been postponed till after his resurrection from the dead. This was the method actually adopted in regard to the ordinance of Baptism. Those persons, indeed, who became our Lord's disciples during the period of his personal ministry, and previously to his death, were baptized in his name, and were thus discriminated not only from those Jews who had not been baptized, but also from those who had been baptized "into the baptism of John." But although previously to our Lord's death there was a baptism, adapted to existing circumstances, by which those who became his disciples made a public profession of their faith in him, as "the Christ, the Son of the living God," yet it is plain that what is, strictly speaking, denominated Christian baptism, that is, "baptism into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," was not instituted till after his resurrection, and immediately before his ascension into heaven.

This being the case, there would have been nothing inconsistent with the nature of our Lord's personal ministry, had he deferred the institution of the Supper, as well as of Baptism, till after his resurrection—that event by which he was "declared to be the Son of God with power." We are well aware that it was not consistent with the divine counsels, that he should, after that event, in any respect resume his public ministry. "God raised him up the third day, and shewed him openly; not to all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God," (Acts x. 41:) and very satisfactory reasons can be assigned, illustrative of the wisdom and expediency of this determination and procedure. But as both Baptism and the Lord's Supper were ordinances which were specially and exclusively intended for his own disciples, and could not be administered to any till such times as they could be regarded in that character, there would not have been anything in the institution of the latter, any more than of the former, even if it had taken place after his resurrection, in the least degree at variance with the wise and righteous purpose of not resuming his public ministry among those who, notwithstanding all the words which he had spoken, and all the mighty works which he had done in the midst of them, had not only despised and rejected, but crucified and slain him.

There appears, therefore, to be something not a little remarkable in the particular time which was chosen by our Lord for instituting the ordinance of the Supper. By his instituting it previously to his death, we are taught, indeed, to regard it as being at that moment a prediction, or typical representation of his death, as an event then future, though near at hand. Viewed in this light, there is, of course, nothing remarkable in the time of its appointment,—unless it be, first, its coinciding with the time of celebrating the ordinance of the Passover; and, secondly, the tenderness of heart, yet the sublime composure, and, as it were, the eager anticipation, with which he conducted the deeply affecting solemnity. It cannot be doubted that the ordinance of the Lord's Supper was intended to be at first a sacramental type, and afterwards a sacramental commemoration of his death. It was only at the time of its original celebration, however, that it possessed the character of a type. This character it could not retain beyond the moment of his death, and that took place in the course of the following day. The other is the principal character which it was intended to bear, and to bear as long as we shall be required to observe it in remembrance of an absent Lord.

Considering, then, that this last is the leading and permanent character of the Lord's Supper, we cannot help thinking, that, besides the purpose of constituting it a prediction of his death—of making it typical, though only for a day—there must have been other and higher ends to be served, by instituting it previously to that all-important event of which it was ordained to be the sacred and endearing memorial.—Nor will it be difficult to perceive what these ends must have been. Nothing is more obvious, or more certain, than that the future observance of this ordinance, even by our Lord's immediate disciples, depended entirely on the consequences with which his death was found to be connected, and especially on the fulfilment of his promise, that he would "rise again the third day." Had he not risen, "as he said,"—in other words, had he been left in the grave to "see corruption"—had he thus been utterly forsaken or disowned of God—had he been proved to be guilty alike of impiety and imposture—how could it have been expected, that any of his followers, however devoted and enthusiastic they might have been in his cause, should have continued to cherish his memory with affection and reverence—to glory in his cross—and publicly to proclaim how fervently they honoured the character, and how devoutly they celebrated the love of one who, if not deluded and infatuated himself, had so plainly deceived, so grossly insulted, and so grievously exposed them? If the event had proved that he was either a blind enthusiast, or an audacious impostor—either deceived, or a deceiver—if, by his continuing permanently under the power of death, a signal refutation had been given to all his promises and pretensions—his followers could never have had the hardihood, or the weakness, openly to proclaim that they were not ashamed of his cross. In such circumstances, they never would have encountered and braved the ridicule, the indignation, or the scorn of their countrymen. We know that when he was merely apprehended and delivered into the hands of his enemies, one of his disciples disowned him, while the rest "forsook him and fled." And can it be supposed, that any thing would have rallied their courage, or re-animating their faith, had he, after expiring on the cross, continued to slumber in the grave? The thing is absolutely impossible. Had he continued to "be holden of death," the ordinance of the Supper would never have been celebrated after the occasion on which it was instituted. The first celebration would also have been its last. His disciples, instead of seeking and exulting in an opportunity for devoutly remembering him, would have considered only how they might contrive to hide from others the fact that they had ever known him, and prevent them from "taking notice of them that they had been with Jesus."

Now, the Author of the ordinance could not but be perfectly aware of all this. It required no supernatural penetration to perceive a consequence so obvious and inevitable. The most ordinary measure even of the unaided faculties of the human mind, must have been fully sufficient to force it on his attention; and he must have been the most infatuated, or the most reckless of men, if he could either overlook or disregard it. There have been instances, indeed, where the pride and presumption of a warlike and ambitious ruler, or where the fierce and persecuting spirit of bigotry and superstition, have prepared the materials for celebrating a victory which, as the event shewed, was never to be gained, or forged and held in readiness the instruments of torture which could not be applied to the limbs of free-born Christian men till after the success of an enterprise which it was the gracious purpose of Providence, by the combined opposition of the winds and waves, utterly to defeat. But do not these very instances stand out as signal and humiliating exceptions to the ordinary prudence and common sense that guide the proceedings of mankind in matters of this description? And would an ambitious ruler be disposed, after an ignominious defeat, to produce and exhibit the monuments of his own presumptuous folly? Or, could he expect his feelings to be soothed by an annual celebration by his subjects, not of a victory won, but of a victory lost?

The dignified composure, however, the surpassing wisdom, and the solemn earnestness by which our Lord was at all times distinguished, and especially as the hour of his sufferings approached, render it of all things the most preposterous to imagine, that he was capable of any act of extravagance, recklessness, or presumption. This being admitted, it is manifest, that the institution of the Supper as an ordinance, to be, from that time and for ages, celebrated in commemoration and honour of his death, while that event had not yet taken place, nor its consequences been ascertained, is a circumstance which can be accounted for only on the supposition of his being fully conscious at the moment, and all along, that in him "dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily,"—that he was, indeed, the Son of God—that he had life in himself—that he would obtain the victory over sin, and death, and the grave—that he laid down his life of his own accord—that he had power to lay it down, and power to take it up again. He knew that he should conquer death, and "destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the Devil: and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." Heb. ii. 14.

He knew, therefore, that although his death should, for a season, cause the greatest distress and dismay to his followers; yet that they should soon after, and for ever, have the strongest reason for remembering it with gratitude, exultation, and delight. We find, accordingly, that while addressing his disciples immediately after the institution of this solemn ordinance, he made use of these memorable and affecting words: "And ye now, therefore, have sorrow; but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." John xvi. 22.

Here, then, we see, that a most important end has been served by our Lord's instituting the Supper previously to the time of that event which it was intended to commemorate—an end much more important than that of merely once more predicting the event. His instituting it at the time when he did, has served to demonstrate the thorough and abiding consciousness which he possessed of his own inherent deity; his consciousness that though "crucified through weakness," yet he should live, as he now "liveth by the power of God." (2 Cor. xiii. 4.) In that ordinance he regarded and represented himself as "put to death in the flesh;" but in the perfect certainty that he should soon be "quicken'd by the Spirit," or the power of his own godhead. 1 Pet. iii. 18.

In regard to the remarkable circumstance which has now been pointed out, there is not, so far as we can recollect, any other ordinance parallel to the Lord's Supper, except that one which it superseded, namely, the Passover. That also was instituted, and, for the first time, celebrated the night before the occurrence of the event of which it was intended to be the annual commemoration. Towards the evening of that night in which the Israelites were led forth out of Egypt, Moses commanded them to take for each family a lamb, and having offered it up in sacrifice to the Lord, to sprinkle its blood on the lintel, and on the two side-posts of the doors of their houses; after which they were to roast the flesh with fire, and eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs; to eat it in haste, with their loins girded, their shoes on their feet, and their staff in their hand. The reason which he assigned for this injunction was, that the Lord would that night pass through the land of Egypt, and smite all the first-born, both of man and beast, but that he would pass over, or spare, all the houses on which was to be found the appointed token,—the blood of the sacrifice. This ordinance, Moses told them, they were to observe for ever, that is, till abrogated by divine authority, in all their generations. In other words, it was to be prophetic at first, and commemorative ever afterwards, in regard to the deliverance from Egypt; although, as we have since learned from the language of an apostle, it was, in both cases, typical of a still more glorious deliverance, the deliverance effected through that very death of which the ordinance of the Supper became, in due time, the sacred memorial. But it is manifest that, if the deliverance in Egypt had not taken place, as Moses had expressly intimated, he could never have expected that the Israelites, either of the then existing, or of any subsequent generation, would have observed or paid any attention to the sacrifice and feast of the Passover. On the faith of his testimony, they might, on the night specified, have complied with the injunctions which he delivered, but they would never have done so again, had that night passed away without the execution of the threatened judgment, and the fulfilment of the promised interposition. Of this Moses must have been fully aware; and therefore his commanding them to observe, before-hand, and ever after, that solemn ordinance, affords a clear and a striking demonstration of his distinct and infallible conviction that he was divinely commissioned, that the Lord was with him, and that that should indeed be proved to be "a night to be much observed unto the Lord," (Exod. xii. 42.) Without such a conviction, Moses would no more have hazarded his reputation and his life by doing what he did on that occasion, than the people would have complied with his instructions, without believing that there was that night any danger to be incurred, or any deliverance to be wrought.

The peculiarity which we have now been contemplating, as belonging exclusively to the ordinance of the Passover, and of the Lord's Supper, is exceedingly striking and instructive. Something of the same sort, indeed, may be alleged to belong to the institution of Baptism. This is true, however, only in so far as it was meant to prefigure the outpouring of the miraculous influences of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. In regard to his ordinary influences, and their effects on the souls of men,—and it was of these chiefly that baptism was meant to be an emblem—they had not been imparted or exhibited long before the institution of that ordinance, which did not take place till just on the eve of our Lord's ascension into heaven. The peculiarity, therefore, of which we have been speaking, is one which manifestly belongs only to the Lord's Supper, and to that ordinance, in the room of which it has been instituted. And such is the peculiarity, that, while it was his resurrection from the dead that completed the demonstration of his being the Son of God, it was the institution of the Supper, previously to his death, that shewed, more strikingly than any thing else could shew, his sublime consciousness that this was indeed his character, and that "he thought it not robbery to be equal with God."

What an exalted and animating view is thus presented to us of that Saviour, in remembrance of whom this ordinance is to be celebrated! It soon ceased to be a type, though it has never ceased, and, till he come again, never will cease to be a memorial of his death. Of that second coming, however, it still affords a most interesting, though an indirect, intimation. While it leads our thoughts back to his death, it also directs them forward to his return, with all its certainty, with all its glory, and with all its momentous consequences. As the Lord's Supper is the connecting link between the Mosaic and the Christian dispensations, so it is the connecting link between the Church on earth and the Church in heaven,—between the kingdom of grace and the kingdom of glory. The ordinance of the Passover directed the eye of the believer to a Saviour yet to come: the ordinance of the Supper, while it directs it to Christ our Passover, as actually slain, directs it also to him as yet to "appear a second time, without sin unto salvation." While it sets before us the most sublime and affecting proof of his confidence of success in the transcendent work of accomplishing our redemption, it teaches us to look with full assurance for the accomplishment of all things which are connected with our being made conformable to his image, and partakers of his glory. We see that, at the very moment of entering into the deadliest conflict with the powers of darkness, and while he was encompassed with all the sinless infirmities which belonged to his state of humiliation, he felt a triumphant certainty of getting him the victory; and we cannot reasonably entertain a doubt that, now that he has been exalted to "the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens," he will gloriously fulfil all his promises, and in spite of all our sins, all our weaknesses, and all our adversaries, "sanctify us wholly," and "save us to the uttermost."

EDUCATION IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S SCHEME.

No. II.

No sooner did the General Assembly, in 1824, come to the resolution of commencing, and endeavouring to carry forward, a scheme for the diffusion of a sound scriptural education throughout the destitute districts of Scotland, than they proceeded to take steps for the accomplishment of this benevolent and patriotic design. A committee was appointed to inquire and report as to the most advisable plan of increasing the means of education in the country, more especially in the Highlands and Islands. That the business committed to their charge might be most effectually managed, the committee appointed a select few of their number as a sub-committee, to follow out the instructions of the Assembly. In prosecution of this object, they directed their attention, in the first instance, to a minute investigation of the actual state of education and religious instruction throughout the whole country. With the view, accordingly, of receiving the desired information, they prepared a set of queries, which were transmitted, early in the summer of that year, to every clergyman in Scotland. Towards the meeting of Assembly in 1825, the committee had received answers to their queries from upwards of eight hundred parishes; and, in the course of the following year, returns were received from the remaining parishes in Scotland. The inquiry being thus completed, the whole of these important documents were bound in four large folio volumes, and laid, by Dr Baird, on the table of the General Assembly. The facts which were thus brought to light, were sufficient to rouse the Church to activity, in supplying the deficiency of moral and religious education, of which they had now become aware. In the six synods of Argyle, Glenelg, Ross, Sutherland and Caithness, Orkney and Shetland, containing in all one hundred and forty-three parishes, and a population of three hundred and seventy-seven thousand seven hundred and thirty persons, no fewer than two hundred and fifty additional schools, and one hundred and thirty catechists, were required; and this, too, notwithstanding the efforts of the benevolent religious societies which had been in operation for many years. The committee, therefore, recommended that to these districts, as being the most necessitous, the attention of the Assembly should be, in the first instance, directed. That a design so extensive, however, might be accomplished, funds were required; and, accordingly, the Assembly recommended parochial collections in all the churches and chapels belonging to the Church of Scotland, and that, in addition to these, contributions should be obtained from private sources, as far as possible. And the expectations of the committee, in regard to the supply of funds.

were far from being disappointed. Contributions poured in from all quarters; so that, at the meeting of Assembly in 1826, the sum realized amounted to L.5488, partly subscribed by individuals, but mostly supplied from parochial collections. At the same time, the committee reported that, after due inquiry, they had selected forty stations for schools, where heritors had agreed to supply the requisite accommodations, and that they had then two schools in actual operation—the first on the Assembly's scheme having been established at Ullapool in October 1825.

Thus far the committee had opened up the way for carrying into effect the benevolent scheme which had been intrusted to their management. At the outset, the difficulties with which they were called to contend were, no doubt, numerous, but these they were enabled, under the divine direction, successfully to overcome; and, in 1827, they were able to report the number of their schools as having increased from two to thirty-five. They had, besides, selected eighty-six stations, which they offered, with the concurrence of the heritors, to supply with schools; they had furnished each school with a supply of Gaelic and English school-books; they had examined one hundred and twenty-two candidates for employment as teachers, and by the generosity of the public, they had realized, in addition to the contributions of the former year, a sum amounting to upwards of L.2000.

While the committee were thus actively engaged in multiplying their schools, they were not regardless of the efficiency with which they were conducted. To secure this the more completely, a set of regulations were drawn up by the committee, laying down a definite plan of instruction, which they required to be followed in all the schools under their charge. And that there might be a local as well as a general superintendence, the minister in whose parish any of the schools was situated, was requested to visit and inspect it carefully, and a half-yearly report of the state of his school was required to be transmitted by every schoolmaster. These salutary regulations, which have been in force ever since, are found to be fully adequate for the purposes for which they were framed. And, if possible, to render "assurance doubly sure," the presbyteries of the bounds are expected to examine the Assembly's schools regularly once a-year, as in the case of parochial schools, and to transmit a report to the committee.

In the course of 1827, the schools increased from thirty-five to seventy, thus nearly exhausting the number originally projected. In the month of August of that year the convener, Dr Baird, at the request of the committee, set out on a tour to inspect the schools then established in the Western Highlands and Islands, and also to report as to those additional situations where schools had been applied for. This journey, in which the Rev. Principal was accompanied by the Rev. Dr Macleod, now of Glasgow, and Mr Gordon, secretary to the sub-committee, extended to upwards of one thousand six hundred miles, and occupied about two months. "In that time they traversed the whole extent of the islands, from the Mull of Kintyre to the Butt of Lewis, and a considerable stretch also of the mainland coasts of Argyle, Inverness, and Ross." Everywhere the deputation were treated with the utmost kindness and respect, and they had the satisfaction of seeing and conversing with many influential persons, who willingly engaged to promote, in every possible way, the great object which the Assembly had in view. The following extract from the Report of the deputation, presented to the committee on their return, gives a rapid sketch of the moral condition of the Western Islands:—

"With regard to the religious knowledge of the inhabitants of the islands in general, it is admitted by their own pastors, that they are at present not upon an equality in this respect with the common people in the Low-country. This is not to be imputed to any negligence in those who have the charge of their spiritual concerns, but arises plainly from their own inability to read the Scriptures, and from the remoteness of their situations from places of public worship.

"The people are every where represented, however, as anxious, in proportion to their ignorance, to become acquainted with the truths of religion. They do what they can to acquire these for themselves. The heads of families, when too remote from church, take every opportunity of attending the Sabbath Evening Schools, kept by teachers in their neighbourhood; and parents are often taught to read by their own children, with the sole view of qualifying themselves to peruse the Scriptures. In South Uist, as before observed, the common people have employed a catechist to officiate among them, at their own expense; and where they are too poor to afford even this, they do not hesitate to undertake a long and difficult navigation on their journey to a place of worship.

"The truth is, that though ignorant of the doctrines of theology, and of Bible history, these islanders have a native sentiment of religion in their hearts, which prompts them to seek acquaintance with the story of Revelation. In feelings of devotion they certainly surpass the better instructed people of the Low-country; and though these feelings are not so well supported by Scriptural knowledge as could be wished, yet they are often exhibited in the most interesting manner. It is stated by one of their ministers, that 'The islander frequently invokes a blessing before he lifts the glass of cold water with which he is to quench his thirst; nor does he forget that his daily bread, though unfailingly supplied, flows yet from special and ever-watching bounty; and sometimes there may be seen the pathetic spectacle of a field of reapers laying down their hooks, and offering up a thanksgiving before they proceed to the work of the harvest.'

"These Islands are still worse supplied with schools than with churches, and every parish has a considerable number of the grown-up population unable to read or write, either in the Gaelic or English language.

"Yet the state of education is not to be estimated alone by the deficiency in the number of schools; for it must be farther observed, that the literary instruction afforded at almost all the seminaries which they have amongst them, is of the most ordinary description. The Gaelic schools profess only the single elementary branch of reading Gaelic; the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge, reading in both languages, with writing and arithmetic; in the parochial schools the English is always taught, but sometimes without the aid of Gaelic, even in Gaelic districts; and there is a considerable number of parish schools which do not even profess the higher branches of Latin, Greek, and mathematics, while such as do profess, seldom teach these branches to more than four or five scholars at a time.

"Under such imperfect provisions for literary education, it is not to be wondered if the inhabitants of the Islands are much inferior to the people of the Low-country in all that sort of knowledge which is derived from reading, and from a near connection with the intelligent classes of the community. This is at once deducible from the circumstances mentioned, and is admitted by all who have any knowledge of the people. But there the disadvantage terminates. The islanders have not the same literary acquirements as the people of the Low-country, and for that reason, perhaps, they want some motives to personal ambition and activity. But in the readiness and strength of their natural powers, they are admitted to have no superiors among any set of people in these dominions,—a fact which is evinced by their abilities in their own limited occupations, and by their intelligence in all that falls under their observation.

"If such be the character of the people, it appears that they are ripe for education of any sort, and that not merely elementary. If it is asked, why they have hitherto been so ill supplied with it? the answer is, that teachers have had no inducement to settle in the Islands, because the people are too poor to afford them an adequate remuneration for their labours.

"Throughout all these Islands, with the exception of Islay, it is proper to remark, that there is scarcely one regular and public school supported by the people themselves, without assistance from some society, or from the bounty of heritors.

"It appears, therefore, that before the societies began to operate, and at a time when the people were not more affluent than they are now, education in these Islands must have been in the very lowest condition. There was only, indeed, the parochial school in each parish, no matter how extensive it might be. But within the last thirty years the improvement which societies have wrought in every part of the Islands, has been great and beyond calculation. It will be observed, from the foregoing details, that by far the greater proportion of those who cannot read or write, is upwards of twenty years of age; a circumstance which proves the extensive benefits that have arisen within the last twenty years from the operations of the societies. Much good has also resulted from the recent decay of a prejudice, which refused any share of education to the whole female sex. In some districts, no doubt, this degrading error still prevails, though with diminished influence, and rather to the effect of giving a preference to boys, where the means of education are scanty, than of absolutely excluding girls, where the means are abundant.

"The people are only not so able as they are anxious, to give education to their children. Their prejudices, and almost every other moral impediment, have departed; but their poverty remains, and will remain, perhaps, for ever, because it seems inseparable from their country, and the occupations that are proper to it. As yet, at least, there is no prospect of any improvement in the condition of the inhabitants in that respect; for it is certain, from whatever cause, that the population of these Islands is on the increase, and that without any proportional increase in the means of subsistence.

"In many of the Islands the people are not only unable to establish schools, without the aid of societies, but after societies have sent out teachers, adequately salaried, they still keep back their children from attendance, because they cannot pay even the small fees that are required, or purchase the necessary school-books. The truth is, that though the natural produce that falls to the share of individuals is scanty, money, which must always prevail in some proportion to the variety of commodities in the course of distribution, is still scantier. If fish, or potatoes, or corn, could possibly become the medium of exchange, then teachers would have less difficulty in procuring a remuneration. But under the present economy, in some Islands they do not even hope for it, and the people have ceased to consider themselves as debtors for school fees.

"It appears, then, that the great want of education in the Islands, arises from the poverty of the people, and is not to be attributed, in any degree worth noticing, to their prejudices, or their indifference to the benefits of education. In almost every district where no schools are within their reach, they have employed a boy who had been educated, perhaps, at the common expense, to teach in their families by turns. This last grade, in the system of instruction, is said to prevail in the absence of schools, in every district of the Highlands. If, again, it is proposed at any time to erect a new school-house, or dwelling-house for a teacher, it is never found that the people are anywhere backward to contribute all the assistance in their power, either in some pecuniary pittance, or in the labour of their hands. In this manner they do enough to testify their conviction of the benefits of education, and their anxious desire to procure it.

"On the whole, it appears that throughout these Islands, there exists such a deficiency in the means of education, and of religious instruction, with such a consequent ignorance in the people, as to demand the attention of the public of Scotland, and of all by whom these districts are regarded with any degree of interest. It is computed that the evil, as it exists at present, throughout these Islands alone, would be only partially relieved by fifty additional schools, and twenty catechists."

The additional information thus obtained, in regard to the actual state of the Western Isles, was of great advantage to the benevolent cause in which the General Assembly had embarked. A new impulse was given to the committee's exertions; an additional interest was awakened in behalf of the object, more especially in those places which the deputation had visited, and the operations of the Assembly's schools, in that once neglected part of Scotland, have been hitherto in the highest degree satisfactory.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

"For our light affliction which is but for a moment, worketh for us a more exceeding, and eternal weight of glory."—The apostle here makes an estimate of his own sufferings and those of his fellow-believers, and he calls them emphatically our affliction, to denote, that the trials and tribulations of good men are of a special kind, and peculiar to them. The Scriptures speak of afflictions that are common to men, but there are others known only to the righteous man, whose heart knoweth its own bitterness, and neither with it, nor with his joy can a stranger intermeddle. But what is the result of his estimate? He calls it a light affliction. Things are heavy or light only relatively. Some persons, and at a certain age, can carry a great weight—even the weight of a large animal, while Solomon speaks of one of the lightest of all animals, even the grasshopper, as being a burden in old age. So afflictions, even of the most ordinary kind, are to the worldly man often oppressive and overwhelming, while the heaviest trials are, by the believer, found to be comparatively light. And this arises entirely from the difference in the capacity of the individuals. The gates of a city are too large and heavy for any ordinary person to bear. But Samson, we know, when he was inclosed in the city of Gaza, arose and lifted upon his shoulders the two massy doors of the gate of that city, and the two side-posts, and the iron bar that bound them together, and carried them off and not only carried them off, but carried them up to a hill, and to the very top of a hill, even the hill that is called Hebron! So is it as to the afflictions of a Christian. What others cannot do, he can do, with his affliction. He can not only bear it but bear it with all its heavy accompaniments, and bear it easily, and carry it up the hill over the which his journey lies. But the affliction of which the apostle speaks is not only light—it is short—but for a moment. Time, as we measure it, is divided into certain parts. There are ages and centuries; these again, have their years, and months, and weeks; and these, their minutes and their moments. Now, a moment properly is a movement,—that is, as time is constantly on the advance, the shortest possible movement or degree of advance that can be calculated or expressed. But as time, like space, is infinitely divisible, so a moment may be sub-divided into a hundred, or a thousand, or a hundred thousand, or tens of hundreds of thousands of lesser parts or movements. Between any one of these and eternity, all comparison fails, and no relation whatever, in fact, exists, and it is when set over against eternity that the longest period of any believer's sufferings is said to be but a moment. For the apostle immediately contrasts it with the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory by which it shall be succeeded. Glory is employed to denote any thing that is peculiarly magnificent and grand. Hence we read of the glory of Solomon, especially when he had completed the temple of Jerusalem, and we read of the glory of that temple, and of Mount Tabor, where it was; and hence, the word is made use of to describe the grandeur of the heavenly state. But it is not only a state of glory; it is a weight of glory. Take two pieces of gold, if the one be heavier than the other, it is because there is more real gold in it; and the blessedness of heaven is a weight of glory, because of its fulness and solidity which surpass all others; and hence it is added, that it is a far more exceeding weight of glory. Imagine all the glory of this world,—swell out your conceptions of the grandest and most magnificent objects,—take in even our highest ideas of heaven itself, however vast and enlarged, the reality far more than exceeds them all. And then it is an eternal weight of glory. It abides for ever. This is its peculiar and distinguishing quality. When David returned from the slaughter of the Philistines, the daughters of Israel went forth before him dancing and shouting, and though they had even to the monarch himself only ascribed thousands, they ascribed to him tens of thousands. Yet a few short days only had passed, when they scorned and reproached him as a man of blood. Such is the glory of this world. Job, too, attained at one period to such honour, that he himself tells us, that when the young men saw him, they hid themselves, that the aged arose and stood up, yea, that even princes stopped speaking, and bowed down in his presence, yet but a few short days passed away, and Job was seated among the ashes, and became a song and a bye-word to those whom he would have disdained to have set with the dogs of his flock. Such, and so short-lived is all the glory of this world. But not so the weight of glory in the heavens, which is eternal.—Recollections of a Sermon preached in Lady Glenorchy's Chapel, by the late Rev. Dr Jones.

Meekness with respect to our Brethren—Teacheth us prudently to govern our own anger, whenever any thing occurs that is provoking. Anger in the soul is like metal in a horse, good if it be well managed. Now meekness is the bridle as wisdom is the hand that gives law to it, puts it into the right way, and keeps it of an even, regular, and steady pace in that way, reducing it when it turns aside, preserving it in due decorum, and restraining and giving it check when at any time it grows headstrong and outrageous, and threatens mischief to ourselves. The office of meekness is to keep reason upon the throne in the soul as it ought to be; to preserve the understanding clear and unclouded, the judgment untainted and unbiased, in the midst of the greatest provocations, so as to be able to set every thing in its true light, and to see it in its true colour, and to determine accordingly; as also, to keep silence in the court, that the small still voice in which the Lord is, may not be drowned by the voice of the tumult of the passions. Things go right in the soul when no resentments are admitted into the affections but what have first undergone the scrutiny of the understanding, and thence received their pass. That passion which cometh not in by this door, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber, which we should stand on our guard against. In a time of war, (and such a time it is in every sanctified soul, in a constant war between grace and corruption,) due care must be taken to examine all passengers, especially those that come armed whence they came, whither they go, where they are for, and what they would have. Thus should it be in the well disciplined, well governed soul. Let meekness stand sentinel, and upon the advance of a provocation, let us examine who it is we are about to be angry with, and for what? what are the merits of the cause? wherein lay the offence? what was the nature and tendency of it? what are likely to be the consequences of our resentments, and if we stifle them and let them go we farther what harm will it be? Such as these are the interrogatories which meekness would put to the soul, and in answer to them would abstract all that which passion is apt to suggest, and hear reason only as it becomes rational creatures to do. Another office of meekness is to calm the spirit, so as that the inward peace may not be disturbed by any outward provocation. No doubt but a man may express his displeasure against the miscarriages of another as much as any time as their is occasion for, without suffering his resentments to recoil upon himself, and to put his own soul in a hurry. "What need a man to tear himself to his anger." (Job xvii. 4.) Cannot we charge home upon our enemy's camp, without the wilful disordering of our own troops; doubtless we may, if meekness have the command; and though there be some firing on the outworks, yet it fortifies the heart, the main fort, the wards against the assaults of provocation which do us no great harm, while they do not rob us of our peace nor disturb the rest of our souls. As patience in case of sorrow, so meekness in the case of anger, keeps "possession of the soul." Meekness will cool the heat of passion quickly, and not suffer it to continue. As it keeps from being soon angry, so it teacheth us when we are angry, to be soon pacified. The anger of a meek man is like fire struck out of steel, hard to be got out, but when it is out, soon gone. Angry thoughts, as other vain thoughts, may crowd into the heart upon a sudden surprise; but meekness will not suffer them to lodge there. Meekness will curb the tongue, and keep the mouth as with a bridle when the heart is hot. If we have conceived a passion and thought evil, meekness will lay the hand on the mouth to keep that evil thought from venting itself in any evil word, reflecting on God or our brother. It will reason a matter in variance without noise; give a reproof without reproach; convince a sinner of his folly without calling him a fool; will teach superiors either to forbear threatening or to moderate it, and will look diligently, "lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble us, and thereby many be defiled."—HENRY.

Think of the Judgment Day.—What if God should place in your hands a diamond, and tell you to inscribe on it a sentence which should be read at the last day, and shewn there as an index of your thoughts and feelings; what care, what caution, would you exercise in the selection! Now, this is what God has done. He has placed before you immortal minds, more imperishable than diamonds, on which you are about to inscribe every day and every hour, by your instructions, by your spirit, or by your example, something which will remain, and be exhibited for, or against, you at the judgment day.—PAYSON.

Prayer for Sinners.—O thou that art the gracious Father of spirits, thou hast sworn that thou delightest not in the death of the wicked, but rather that they turn and live; deny not thy blessing to these persuasions and directions; and suffer not thine enemies to triumph in thy sight, and the great deceiver of souls to prevail against thy Son, thy Spirit, and thy Word. O pity poor unconverted sinners, that have no hearts to pity themselves. Command the blind to see, the deaf to hear, and the dead to live; and let not sin and death be able to resist thee. Awaken the secure, resolve the unresolving, confirm the wavering, and let the eyes of sinners, that read these lines, be next employed in weeping over their sins; and bring them to themselves and to thy Son, before their sins have brought them to perdition. If thou sayest but the word, these poor endeavours shall prosper, to the winning of many a soul, to their everlasting joy, and thine everlasting glory. Amen.—BAXTER.

CHANGE.

UNWEARIED, ever-active power,
Whose sway extends o'er land and sea,
Let me, at this calm twilight hour,
Tell what I've seen and heard of thee;
For sad thy story is, and strange,
And swift thy course, unsparring Change!

When earth, at the command of heaven,
Sprang from the void a perfect whole,
To thee, with all thereon, 'twas given,
And put beneath thy strict control,—
The brutal race, the human kind,
Matter inert, high soaring mind.

Farther than traveller ever trode,
Deeper than mortal eye hath seen,
Beyond life's uttermost abode
Thou workest where thou still hast been,
Waiting these elements, and then
Gathering their scattered parts again.

But chiefly man—his woes, his joys
The dictates of thy law obey;
Even crowns and kingdoms are thy toys,—
No trifle transient as they;
Ambition, which thy smile upheld,
Is, by thy frown, for ever quelled.

Where are the empires famed of old,
Whose fortunes mark'd the march of time,
Whose classic tale was sung or told
In graceful prose or lay sublime?
They rose, they flourished, and they fell,
At summons of thy startling spell.

How oft, subservient to thy will,
Have devastation and alarm,
Fleet as the heath-fire on the hill,
Resistless as the polar storm,
Swept the broad east; while kings were hurled
From thrones whose splendour filled the world.

Let not old Nile Cephrenes boast,
Nor Cheops with his countless bands;
In clouds of doubt their fame is lost;
Only th' unshrinking granite stands,
To witness in the wilderness
That thou couldst Pharaoh's pride repress.

Nor art thou to the grosser part
Of this creation wide confined;
Thou workest ever in the heart,
And reignest in the realms of mind;
By wits and poets thou art placed
The rightful arbiter of taste.

And, O! I've traced thy foot-prints deep
By pastoral stream and lowly cot;
And I have heard the fathers weep
The many woes which thou hadst wrought,
And talk of visions, come and gone,
Since childhood's sun upon them shone.

Long hast thou ruled, spirit of might!
Yet shall thine arm be lifted up
On earth, till wrong give place to right,
And grim oppression drain the cup,
Which, in his secret chamber hid,
Vengeance is mingling rank and red.

Clad in the garb of peace go forth,
And enter error's foul domain—
The darksome places of the earth—
And bid the bondsman burst his chain,
The mortal fetters that control
The native vigour of his soul.

Yes, while remains the world's vast frame,
Thy magic wand thou still shalt wield;
Kings shall be troubled at thy name,
And armies muster on the field;
While spreading fast, th' astounding tale
Shall thrill the peasant in the vale.

But not for ever is thy sway;
When time's allotted years are past,
When heaven and earth shall melt away,
Thy mightiest act shall be thy last.
Thy power shall then be overthrown,
And Change shall never more be known.

MISCELLANEOUS.

An African.—A few years ago, a young man, an African negro, addressed Mr Johnson, a missionary, in language like this:—"Massa, them words you talk last night strike me very much. When you preach, you read the fifteenth and sixteenth verses of the forty-fourth chapter of Isaiah, and explain them, you show me how our country people stand. Me say, 'Ah! who tell massa all this? He never been in my country.' You say, 'Do not your country people live in that fashion?' I say, 'Yes, that true: God knows all things: He put them things in the Bible.' Massa, I so sure that the Bible is God's Word, for man cannot put all them things there, because he no see it. That time I live in my country, I live with a man that make greegree. He take me into the bush, and teach me to make greegree too. He show me one tree: he say, 'That greegree-tree: he take countryaxe, and cut some of that tree: he make a god; and he take the leaves, and that which was left, and give me to carry home. When we come home, he make a fire; and all the people come and sit round the fire. Then they cook and eat. When they done eat, the man take the leaves of the greegree-tree, and burn them in the fire, and then all the people stand round the fire, and clap their hands and cry, 'Aha! Aha! Massa, when you read that verse (Isaiah xlii. 16) I can't tell you what I feel. You then begin to talk about the text (verse 20,) 'He feedeth on ashes,' and I was struck again; for when they done cry, 'Aha! Aha!' they take the ashes, and make medicine they give to people when they be sick. You been see some greegree which look like dirt! that is the same ashes: they carry that round them neck, and they eat it some-times. You see, massa, our poor countrymen feed upon ashes. For true, the Bible God's word."

An African female.—A poor female Matchapsee, named Mamgena, called, says Mr Campbell, and told me, that when she first heard of the Bible she did not think it was true; but when she found it describe her heart so exactly, she could not but believe what it said. She was determined, she added, always to live near some place where the Word of God was preached; where she might hear about a crucified Saviour, though she should starve. Jesus died for sinners, and she would not leave the Word. She manifested her affection by praying that Mr Campbell might be carried back safe to the Cape, and to England.

ON THE SUFFERINGS OF THE FIRST CHRISTIANS,
CONSIDERED AS AN ARGUMENT FOR THE TRUTH OF CHRISTIANITY.

PART II.

BY THE REV. W. B. NIVISON,

in Amsterdam.*

IN my former paper on this subject I attempted to shew that the high degree of suffering to which the primitive Christians submitted for the sake of the Gospel, and the noble firmness they displayed in the course of their perilous warfare, furnished not only satisfactory evidence in proof of the sincerity of their faith, but also a strong presumption that the religion itself was true, in whose favour this lofty and daring enthusiasm was called into exercise. A more interesting part of the inquiry still remains—to describe the moral qualities that characterised their fortitude, and rendered it so greatly superior to that of any other body of sufferers who can be brought into comparison with them. These qualities may easily be reduced to three, each of which I shall now proceed to illustrate.

In the first place, the passive fortitude of the first Christians was distinguished by a spirit of gentleness.

The first Christians preserved a calm and unruffled temper in the midst of the most tedious and cruel persecutions. They never, on any occasion, seemed to feel the slightest irritation. It was natural to expect that they should be provoked by the insulting reproaches, severe beatings, and gloomy imprisonments to which they were constantly exposed; and that they should give expression to such feelings in revilings of their enemies, or, when possible, in retaliation of similar injuries. It was reasonable to suppose that their constancy in suffering should partake somewhat of obstinacy, and that their perseverance, unto death, should be marked by a spirit of opposition arising from, and resembling the fierce and unrelenting opposition of their enemies. And most certainly, if the apostles had been left to carry on so arduous a warfare at their own charges,—if the infirmities and corruption inseparable from our fallen nature had not in them been weakened or subdued by divine grace, they also would have exhibited in their conduct this invariable feature of human sinfulness and imperfection.

The unfavourable qualities I have now mentioned are found uniformly to characterise the passive fortitude of all who suffer in the general misfortunes of the particular sect or party, whether religious or political, with which they have associated themselves. The honour of their peculiar society is the great idol which they worship,—while the sanctity of truth is not thought of at all, or thought of with comparative indifference. They are resolved to stand or fall with the members of their own corporation; to support every one of their measures, whether right or wrong; and to subscribe to every one of their opinions, whether true or false. All that the party thinks and does, they are determined at all hazards to maintain and defend. Hence they are easily provoked when any opposition to their schemes or notions is offered, or even meditated. At such times their resentment is quickly kindled, and as quickly manifests itself in intemperate speeches, loud murmurings, scurrilous invectives, and, when the power to persecute is not withheld from both parties, in contriving and accomplishing each other's ruin. Nor will the party that may chance to be put down, be less bitter or severe than its more powerful or more fortunate antagonist. If not able to carry the hostility of fire and sword so far as the other, it equals or surpasses it in brandishing the weapon of “hard words.” We perceive, that though they may differ in regard to the power which enables them to persecute, they closely resemble each other in the spirit that incites them to such violence.

I am persuaded that there is no body of sufferers for their religious or political opinions in any age or country to whom these qualities of character are not to some extent applicable, except the noble company of believers whose history we are now considering. Let us contemplate for a moment the conduct of these primitive converts, and we shall perceive at once the contrast between them and all other sufferers. There is seen among them no desire to gain success over their opponents by any other arms than those of truth and reason. Instead of their resentment being roused by unmerited insult, harsh reviling, and barbarous treatment, they are as meek, and undisturbed, and unprovoked, as if they had been greeted with the most cordial reception, and listened to with the most implicit faith. Instead of being irritated by the reverses of fortune which they are sustaining, they submit to these reverses with as much willing resignation, and with as much composure as they could possibly have exhibited if all their affairs had worn the fairest and most promising aspect. If their passions are ever raised above their natural level, it is when they are invited by the Holy Spirit to view those sublime mysteries into which the angels desire to look; or it is when their moral resentment is awakened by some of the more unworthy converts who had dared to corrupt the soundness of faith by heretical opinions, or dishonour their religious profession by licentious practices. And when we gather instruction from the writings they have left us, we perceive from the clear simplicity and close precision with which they are composed, that the powers and affections of their minds are not in any degree excited or disordered by the cruel and unjust treatment they were all the while receiving from their enemies.

In the second place, the passive fortitude of the first Christians was distinguished by a spirit of kindness

In all cases of suffering, where the passive resistance of the sufferers originates in the mere spirit of opposition, or is produced by something else than the love of truth, we find them generally exclaiming against the inhumanity of their persecutors, and complaining of the undeserved hardships of their own lot. There are combined together in their minds a feeling of bitter resentment against their enemies, and one of peevish discontentment with the arrangements of Providence. If active hostilities take place on both sides, we are not able to determine from the conduct of either which of them is in the right. Both exhibit the same want of mutual forbearance, and the same violent spirit of revenge. And when the power of mutual injury is happily removed from both by a wise and tolerant government, and when they are only allowed to carry on war through the medium of the press, we observe too frequently in their controversial writings a heavy mixture of extravagant satire and indecent personal abuse. We are soon made to perceive that the gratification of the hostile and revengeful passions with which they are animated towards each other is the principal and leading aim of both.

This natural and almost universal consequence of injury and provocation is not at all observable in the writings or conduct of the early professors of the Christian faith. Their revenge was not in the slightest degree excited by the unjust and merciless persecutions so frequently inflicted upon them by the higher authorities. Even when the Christian martyrs were undergoing the horrid agonies of torture and death, they felt no movement of angry passion; they uttered no words to irritate or provoke. At that dread moment the spirit of benevolence, with which the Comforter had inspired them, burned with a pure and steady flame, and seemed to improve in brightness and strength as the inflictions of tyranny were forcing them nearer to the grave. When it became their duty as preachers of righteousness to express a moral disapprobation of the vices of their enemies, the sharpness of their reproofs was softened with a tender compassion for their spiritual blindness, and with the warmest regard for their eternal welfare. What a bright example of this amiable temper of mind does the first martyr, Stephen, exhibit to his infatuated countrymen at the very moment they were stoning him to death! In imitation of his divine Master, he prayed, in the agony of dissolution, for his murderers; and kneeling down, cried with a loud voice, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." And although the Jews, who were the natural kinsmen of Paul, had often threatened to take away his life, and had actually attempted it more than once, yet his pure and ardent affection for his countrymen was not in any degree weakened by the cruel and unnatural treatment he experienced at their hands; and we find him even affirming in his epistle to the Romans, "that he could wish himself accursed from Christ for his brethren." Though we mention particularly these two eminent instances of truly Christian benevolence, exerted at those seasons when its operation should naturally have been checked, yet nearly the same praise may justly be given to the whole body of early Christians, who uniformly exhibited, along with a spirit of determined adherence to the faith as it is in Jesus, the same unfeigned love of their persecutors at that very time when we should have least expected the expression of such sentiments. And I may just add, that this singular and remarkable behaviour bears with so striking and decisive a weight upon the present question, that upon it alone we might justly rest our proof of the intrinsic and essential difference between the passive fortitude of the primitive Christians, and all those instances of similar virtue which it is possible to collect from the pages of history.

In the third and last place, the passive fortitude of the first Christians was distinguished by a spirit of cheerfulness.

In all cases where the passive fortitude of the sufferer has its origin in the mere spirit of opposition, or is dictated by worldly considerations, we uniformly find his joy or grief bearing some proportion to the prosperous or adverse circumstances of the sect or party to which he has attached himself. When their affairs are prosperous, he gives himself up to that natural feeling of exultation which instinctively springs up in the breast on the occurrence of some fortunate event. When, on the other hand, they are adverse, he is depressed by that natural feeling of disappointment which a reverse of fortune seldom fails to produce even on the strongest mind. Such sentiments are natural to every individual placed in these particular circumstances. When, therefore, we cannot trace their operation on those occasions at which experience would lead us reasonably to expect them, we may well wonder at the strangeness of the fact, and endeavour to ascertain its cause. If the apostles had been engaged in propagating an imposture, and if they had secretly known that the success of their enterprise depended exclusively on their own exertions, and on nothing else, they would naturally have been cast down with grief and alarm at those seasons of severe persecution, when their affairs appeared to every human eye to be placed in the last extremity. If they had secretly known that their mighty scheme for overthrowing all the false religions in the world, and establishing one, on this supposition, equally false, in their room, had its origin in their own invention, and depended on their own management for its future success, their hopes, however bright they might have been before, would certainly have been damped in the event of their imprisonment, or in the prospect of a violent and ignominious death. And yet this gloom and despondency are not, in the slightest degree, observable in any of the apostolic writings, or in the behaviour of the numerous Christians who, in defence of their faith, lost their property and freedom, or were exiled from their country, or were put to death by fire or sword. They evidently appear more cheerful, their joy rises to a higher pitch, as their worldly situation is made more critical, as the days of darkness become more frequent, as the time of their being "offered up" draws nearer. St. Paul informs us that "as the sufferings of Christ abounded in him, so also his consolations in Christ abounded in the same proportion." He writes of himself and of his persecuted brethren in general, that "though troubled on every side, yet they were not distressed; though perplexed, they were not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed." He declares, in name of his fellow-apostles, that "though they were as sorrowful, yet they were always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things." And of himself again he particularly says, in his first epistle to the Corinthians, "Most gladly will I glory in mine infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake." What then can we assign as a reasonable cause of this remarkable cheerfulness on the part of these primitive disciples? It might be natural for impostors to rejoice in the actual or probable success of their schemes; but we cannot merely think it natural for impostors to rejoice in the actual or probable failure of their hopes, in their scourging or imprisonment, or in the infliction of capital punishment. It is not possible for us to account, even in a plausible manner, for this singular state of mind, without admitting the certainty of that faith, which elevated their views above the things of time, and inspired them with the desire of a nobler and more enduring inheritance than any this world could present.

From the views I have thus attempted to give of this interesting subject, we may safely conclude, that the sufferings of the first Christians ought to be regarded as affording evidence for the truth of our holy religion, not only by reason of the high degree of fortitude which these illustrious men were able to exert in defence of their faith; but also and chiefly, on account of the admirable moral qualities by which this fortitude was distinguished. No other body of sufferers in the whole history of the world can be shown to have suffered in the same manner as the primitive Christians. This radical difference between their behaviour and that of all other men, must have arisen from some cause, and what cause affords so sufficient and reasonable an explanation of the phenomenon as the truth of that religion which is recommended to our faith by such a weight and variety of other evidence, and in the propagation of which these singular and beautiful features of moral character were brought into exercise? A belief of certain doctrines, even supposing them to be false, may in some cases be so strong as to raise the minds of men to enthusiasm, and make them exhibit the greatest degree of heroism in resisting the opposition to which this erroneous belief may subject them; but the strongest belief of false doctrines (or even of true, without the powerful aid of divine grace,) can never bestow upon the passive fortitude of any body of men, those moral qualities that accompanied and adorned this noble virtue in the case of the Christian martyrs. The Indian warrior can support the highest degree of pain which the savage cruelty of his victorious enemies can inflict upon him, with perhaps as little of murmuring or of yielding as a persecuted Christian. While they may resemble one another in the capacity, they differ entirely in the mode of their endurance; and upon this essential difference depends the main force of our present argument. The Roman centurion, when he stood in the discharge of his official duty at the foot of the cross, and beheld the manner in which our Lord finished the great work he came into our world to perform, could not help exclaiming, "Truly this man was the Son of God!" And when we survey the manner in which the first heralds of the Gospel bore their sufferings, and ended their lives of faith, we ought all to form a judgment similar to that of the centurion, and say "Surely these men were what they professed to be, the servants of the Most High God, and preachers of the words of eternal life."

THE MINISTERIAL LIFE AND LABOURS OF PRESIDENT EDWARDS.

In September 1723, Mr Edwards went to New-Haven, Connecticut, where he received his degree of master of arts, and was elected a tutor in the college. After having held this office for two years, he received proposals from the people of Northampton to become their minister, as colleague to his grandfather, Mr Stoddard; of this invitation he accepted, and was ordained a minister of the Gospel on the 15th of February 1727. He immediately commenced his labours, and was in the habit of preparing two discourses every week, besides spending a great part of it in the study of the Bible, and in the investigation of the more difficult and important subjects in theology. His constitution being delicate, he was obliged to be constantly watchful, and to practise the greatest self-denial, in order to continue his exertions. He commonly spent thirteen hours each day in his study, and that not in perusing and treasuring up the recorded thoughts of others, but in the much more exhausting employment of independent investigation. It may appear strange to the reader when we say that Mr Edwards was not in the habit of visiting his people in their own houses, except in cases of sickness or affliction. He did not, however, neglect this practice because he looked upon it as unimportant, but because he considered himself incapable of entering into free conversation, and bringing it to bear on sacred subjects. But he was not, on that account, the less diligent, for he used to preach frequently in particular neighbourhoods, and was wont to call the young people and children to his house, where he used to pray with them, and give them instruction suited to their years, and likewise catechised the young in public every Sabbath. In addition to this, in his study, he spent not a little of his time in conversing with persons under religious impressions, many of whom sought his advice.

On the 28th of July 1727, Mr Edwards was married to Miss Sarah Pierrepont, whose remarkable piety had early attracted his attention. "Few persons," says Mr Dwight, "no older than she was, at the time of her marriage, have made equal progress in holiness, and rare, very rare, is the instance in which such a connection results in a purer or more uninterrupted happiness." At the time when Mr Edwards was ordained, the people began to show an increasing attention to religion, which continued for about two years, and was unhappily followed by several years of inattention and indifference. The health of Mr Edwards, too, in consequence of incessant application, began to fail him, inasmuch that he was obliged to relinquish his ministerial duties for several months, and withdraw from the scene of his labours, to recruit his health by travelling. Early in 1732, the state of religion among his people began gradually and perceptibly to improve, and a check was given to the prevalence of disorder and licentiousness. The young especially showed a very unusual disposition to yield to advice, and many began to manifest a personal interest in their eternal welfare. The solemnity of mind which now began to pervade the Church, and which was evidently on the increase, exerted a very salutary influence on Mr Edwards' ministrations. Encouraged, as he undoubtedly was, by the success of his prayers and exertions, which was daily manifesting itself, the discourses which he now began to deliver are unsurpassed in spirituality and power. Mr Edwards' success, however, was too great for Satan to look quietly on; and, no doubt with the view of attracting the attention of the people from the concerns of their souls, he stirred up in their neighbourhood, a violent controversy on the subject of Arminianism. But even this, instead of producing any unfavourable effects among Mr Edwards' people, was graciously and powerfully overruled for the promotion of private godliness. Mr Edwards knew well that the points which the Arminians insisted on, were not of little moment, and, accordingly, he preached a series of sermons on the various topics at issue, and, among others, his well known discourses on the great and all-important doctrine of justification by faith alone. The event proved that he had judged wisely, in not keeping silence, for his exposure of the errors of Arminianism was attended with a signal blessing from above on the people of his charge.

"The year 1735 opened on Northampton, in a most suspicious manner. A deep and solemn interest in the great truths of religion, had become universal in all parts of the town, and among all classes of people. This was the only subject of conversation in every company, and almost the only business of the people appeared to be to secure their salvation. So extensive was the influence of the Spirit of God, that there was scarcely an individual in the town, either old or young, who was left unconcerned about the great things of the eternal world. This was true of the gayest, of the most licentious, and of the most hostile to religion. And in the midst of this universal attention, the work of conversion was carried on in the most astonishing manner. Every day witnessed its triumphs, and so great was the alteration in the appearance of the town, that in the spring and summer following it appeared to be full of the presence of God. There was scarcely a house which did not furnish the tokens of his presence, and scarcely a family which did not present the trophies of his grace. 'The town,' says Mr Edwards, 'was never so full of love, nor so full of joy, nor yet so full of distress, as it was then.' Whenever he met the people in the sanctuary, he not only saw the house crowded, but every hearer earnest to receive the truth of God, and often the whole assembly dissolved in tears; some weeping for sorrow, others for joy, and others from compassion. In the months of March and April, when the work of God was carried on with the greatest power, he supposes the number, apparently of genuine conversions, to have been at least four a day, or nearly thirty a week, take one week with another, for five or six weeks together.

"During the winter and spring, many persons from the neighbouring towns came to Northampton to attend the stated lectures of Mr Edwards; many others on business or on visits; and many others from a distance, having heard contradictory reports of the state of things, came to see and examine for themselves. Of these, great numbers had their consciences awakened, were savingly wrought upon, and went home rejoicing in the forgiving love of God. This appeared to be the means of spreading the same influence in the adjacent town, and in places more remote, so that no less than ten towns in the same county, and seventeen in the adjoining colony of Connecticut, within a short time were favoured with revivals of religion." Thus he was winning souls to Christ;

"Yet all his trophies, all his spoils,
He hung upon the cross."

This was perhaps one of the most remarkable revivals that had taken place since the days of the apostles, and that chiefly on account of its universality, being confined to no particular class, nor age, nor description. Nearly one hundred persons in Mr Edwards' congregation became, at that time, according to his own opinion, the subjects of the renewing grace of God, and he was not a man to come to a rash and hasty conclusion on such a subject. It was a peculiarly favourable dispensation of Providence, that amid the multiplied cares and labours of this period, the health of Mr Edwards was graciously preserved. His whole time was occupied; all the powers of his mind were laboriously employed, and all the feelings of his heart kept in a state of intense excitement. Mr Edwards, besides, was enabled, the more unreservedly, to devote his time and attention to the spiritual interests of his people, as Mrs Edwards relieved him from all attention to secular concerns, and he could, with confidence, commit every thing of this nature to her management. It was to Mr Edwards an unspeakable privilege, surrounded, as he was by a young and growing family, that when his duties to his people, especially in such circumstances, necessarily occupied his whole attention, he could safely rely on the wisdom and piety, the love and faithfulness of their mother in attending to their education. In the latter part of May 1735, the number of converts began gradually to decline, and that from various causes. One great cause undoubtedly was, as Mr Dwight remarks, that the physical excitement had been greater than the human constitution can for a long period endure. Another reason of this declension may be found in the fact, that those who had so long witnessed this remarkable work of God without renouncing their sins, had at length become hardened and hopeless in their impenitence. A nother cause, and that more powerful in its influence than the others, was, that the attention of the people was called away by an unhappy controversy which began to agitate that part of the country.

We now return to what more immediately concerns the soul of Mr Edwards himself—his own progress Zionward. Since he had settled at Northampton, he had made considerable advances in the life of faith, and was not unfrequently favoured with transporting views of divine things. "Since I came to Northampton," says he, "I have often had sweet complacency in God, in views of his glorious perfections, and of the excellency of Jesus Christ. God has appeared to me a glorious and lovely Being, chiefly on account of his holiness. The holiness of God has always appeared to me the most lovely of all his attributes." "I have loved the doctrines of the Gospel; they have been to my soul as green pastures. The way of salvation by Christ has appeared, in a general view, glorious and excellent, most pleasing and most beautiful. It has often seemed to me that it would, in a great measure, spoil heaven to receive it in any other way." What pure and exalted conceptions do these few words show forth! And no less beautiful is the following passage, as exemplifying the humility of this man of God:—

"It has often appeared to me delightful to be united to Christ; to have him for my head, and to be a member of his body; also to have Christ for my teacher and prophet. I very often think with sweetness, and longings, and pantings of soul, of being a little child, taking hold of Christ, to be led by him through the wilderness of this world. That text, Mat. xviii. 3, has often been sweet to me, 'Except ye be converted, and become as little children,' &c. I love to think of coming to Christ, to receive salvation of him, poor in spirit, and quite empty of self, humbly exalting him alone; cut off entirely from my own root, in order to grow into, and out of, Christ; to have God in Christ to be all in all; and to live by faith on the Son of God, a life of humble, unfeigned confidence in him."

Mr Edwards' hopes and prayers were not confined merely to his people and himself. His was that generous, that extended philanthropy, of which his divine Master was such a lovely example; it comprehended within its range the whole family of Adam. If ever man took an interest in the spiritual welfare of his fellow-men; if ever man took a deep and intense interest in the advancement of the Messiah's kingdom on earth, it was the subject of our memoir. From his early years, when yet but a child, he greedily scanned the pages of every newspaper within his reach, seeking for what?—for accounts of the progress of religion.

"My heart," says he, "has been much on the advancement of Christ's kingdom in the world. The histories of the past advancement of Christ's kingdom have been sweet to me. When I have read histories of past ages, the pleasantest thing, in all my reading, has been to read of the kingdom of Christ being promoted. And when I have expected, in my reading, to come to any such thing, I have rejoiced in the prospect, all the way as I read. And my mind has been much entertained and delighted with the Scripture promises and prophecies which relate to the future glorious advancement of Christ's kingdom upon earth."

In consequence of the high reputation which Mr Edwards had attained as a powerful and successful preacher, he received frequent invitations from different churches, to come and labour amongst them for a short period. Accordingly, with the consent of his people, and his own pulpit being supplied in the meantime, he frequently went on those missionary tours, carrying the Sword of the Spirit in his hand,—that sword with which he had so often routed the armies of the aliens.

"It was a two-edged blade,
Of heavenly temper keen;
And double were the wounds it made,
Where'er it glanced between."

An ample reward was afforded him by the general revivals of religion which attended his labours. While Mr Edwards was thus forwarding the interests of his Master's kingdom abroad, his exertions among his own people began again to be attended with extraordinary success. In the spring of 1740 it became evident that the Spirit of God was working among the people, especially among the young; and in particular individuals there appeared satisfactory evidence of an entire change of character. This state of things continued through the summer and autumn. In October of that year, the celebrated Mr Whitefield came on a visit to Mr Edwards, at Northampton. There he preached five sermons, which were followed by an awakening among professors of religion, and soon after by a deep concern among the young. Mr Edwards took this opportunity to converse with Mr Whitefield on the subject of impulses, on which he thought that gentleman laid too much stress. He likewise conversed with Mr Whitefield about his practice of judging other persons to be unconverted, and expressed his own decided disapprobation of the practice. The whole interview was warm and affectionate. Yet Mr Edwards was inclined to think that Mr Whitefield regarded him somewhat less as an intimate and confidential friend, than he would have done had he not opposed him on these two favourite points.

The effects of Mr Edwards' labours were not confined to his own country, much less to his own congregation, but extended even to this remote island. Several of Mr Edwards' writings were republished in Scotland, and produced great and salutary effects, as the heart-stirring scenes which were presented at Cambuslang, and upwards of thirty towns and villages, amply testified. The publication of Mr Edwards' works in Scotland gave rise to a correspondence betwixt him and several of the most distinguished ornaments of the Scottish Church. Among these may be mentioned the illustrious names of Maclaurin and Erskine, and the pious and devoted M'Culloch of Cambuslang. In October 1744, a number of able clergymen in Scotland, among whom were Mr Edwards' correspondents, thinking that the state of the Church, and of the world, called loudly for united, extraordinary prayer to God, proposed that Christians universally should set apart a portion of time each week, namely, on Saturday evening and Sabbath morning, to be spent in prayer, for this purpose. This plan was communicated to Mr Edwards, who welcomed the proposal, and did everything in his power to promote its general acceptance by the American Churches.

In 1747 David Brainerd, whom Mr Edwards had previously met on one of his missionary tours, and whose life he afterwards wrote, came to New England, and resided at his house. Mr Brainerd was at that time thought to be labouring under a confirmed consumption. From his company, Mr Edwards and his family derived much pleasure and benefit. The health of the devoted missionary, however, continued gradually to decline, and it soon became obvious that he could not long survive.

"On the morning of Lord's day, October 4," says Mr Edwards, "as my daughter Jerusha, who chiefly attended him, came into the room, he looked on her very pleasantly, and said, 'Dear Jerusha, are you willing to part with me?—I am quite willing to part with you; I am willing to part with all my friends; though if I thought I should not see you and be happy with you in another world, I could not bear to part with you. But we shall spend a happy eternity together."

Five days afterwards Brainerd died, and they did part,—but only for a little; four months had scarcely elapsed, when Jerusha was called away to meet with him in their fatherland, to part no more for ever.

We have seen Mr Edwards labouring in season and out of season for his people's welfare, and they prided themselves in having such a minister. Hitherto he had lived in the hearts of his people; he had ministered unto them for nearly twenty-four years, and a great number looked upon him as their spiritual father, while all held him in such esteem, that it might have been said of them as of the Galatians, "If it had been possible, they would have plucked out their own eyes, and given them to him." But alas! how unstable are human affairs, and how transitory are the things of time!

"E'en as the mists
Of the grey morn before the rising sun,
That pass away and perish."

We are now about to behold that very people turning against him, and refusing any longer to listen to his beseeching voice, and all because he was faithful.

In the year 1744, Mr Edwards was informed that some young persons in the town, belonging to his congregation, had in their possession licentious books, which they employed in promoting lascivious and obscene conversation. Thinking that the matter ought to be inquired into, he called a meeting of the brethren of the Church, and asked them whether or not they thought proper to take any measures in reference to the matter? They unanimously gave it as their opinion, that the case ought to be investigated, and appointed a committee to examine into the circumstances of the case. The committee accordingly met, and Mr Edwards read to them a list of the names of those young persons whom he wished to examine. Some of those whose names he read were accused, others of them witnesses, but, through mere forgetfulness or inadvertence on his part, Mr Edwards did not state in which of these two classes any particular individual was included, or whether he was requested to attend as a witness, or as one of the accused. When the names were thus published, it appeared that there were but few of the principal families in the town, to which some of the persons named were not nearly related. The news spread, and the town was soon in an uproar; those called refused to appear, or behaved with a great degree of insolence when they did,—the authority of the Church was despised, the committee refused to act, and the matter could not be proceeded with. From this period Mr Edwards had no great visible success in his ministrations, his influence with his people was gone, and his hands were weakened.

Another perplexing circumstance soon led to still more serious discussion. Mr Edwards' predecessor being of opinion that the Lord's Supper was a converting ordinance, and that "unconverted persons, as such, had a right, in the sight of God, or by his appointment, to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, held that, therefore, it was their duty to come to that ordinance, though they knew they had no goodness or evangelical holiness." Mr Edwards had, on his coming to Northampton, some doubts on this subject, but not being fully convinced, he did not feel himself warranted in changing the existing practice of the Church; at length, however, his doubts increased, and he began to examine into the matter carefully, by the light of Scripture, the result of which was, that he became fully convinced that the opinion was wrong. He knew well that such a change would not be easily effected, and that the propagation of his opinions on the subject would create no small hostility towards him. Mr Edwards, however, had the spirit of a martyr; he sat down and counted the cost, and resolved to persevere. He did persevere, and what was the result? His opinions were misrepresented,—his character was slandered,—he was not allowed a hearing that he might explain his sentiments,—councils were called, and those, too, chosen chiefly from parts of the country where the lax system of admission was in repute; and the conclusion of the matter was, that the councils gave it as their opinion, "that it is expedient that the pastoral relation between Mr Edwards and his church be immediately dissolved, if the people still persist in desiring it." It was thus left with the people; the people, accordingly, by a majority of one hundred and eighty, voted for his dismissal. Alas! what a change! Mr Edwards had loved these people, and cared for them as a father for his children; he had spent all his time in writing, planning, and labouring for their welfare, and for them he had poured out ten thousand fervent prayers; in their good he had rejoiced as one that findeth hid treasure, and they were dear to him beyond any other people under heaven. Yet this people rose up against him, and thrust him out from among them. Well might he say with the Psalmist, "It was not an enemy that reproached me, then I could have borne it; neither was it he that hated me, that did magnify himself against me, then I would have hid myself from him. But it was thou, my guide and mine acquaintance. We took sweet counsel together, and walked into the house of God in company."

What a lesson do we here read! Both his grandfather, who was his predecessor, and he himself, had done wrong, we hesitate not to say, in admitting to the sacrament those for whom it was not intended; and the very snake which he had thus been fostering in his bosom at length stung him. It was those very people to whom the sacrament was extended by this lax system of admission that eventually caused him all this trial and vexation. On the 1st of July, 1750, Mr Edwards preached his farewell sermon, from 2 Cor. i. 14. "Had it been written," says his biographer, "in the case of an indifferent person instead of his own, it could not have discovered less of passion, or of irritation, or have breathed a more calm and excellent spirit." The following extract will show sufficiently the Christian spirit which it breathes:—

"And here I would particularly advise those that have adhered to me in the late controversy, to watch over their spirits, and avoid all bitterness towards others. Your temptations are, in some respects, the greatest; because what has lately been done is grievous to you. But, however improperly you may think others have acted, maintain with great diligence and watchfulness, a Christian meekness and sedateness of spirit: and labour, in this respect, to excel others who are of the contrary part: and this will be the best victory: for he that rules his spirit, is better than he that takes a city. Therefore let nothing be done through strife or vainglory: indulge no revengeful spirit in any wise; but watch and pray against it: and by all means in your power, seek the prosperity of this town: and never think you behave yourselves as becomes Christians, but when you sincerely, sensibly and fervently, love all men, of whatever party or opinion, and whether friendly or unkind, just or injurious to you, or your friends, or to the cause and kingdom of Christ."

Every sentence of this discourse shows him to have been "a man of peace," but he was not the less on that account a man of firmness and resolution in the performance of his duty. Amid all his multiplied injuries he manifested the utmost meekness and forgiveness, and still desired earnestly the prosperity of those who were once his flock; and, like the blessed Master whom he served, "when he was reviled he reviled not again."

Our readers may be apt to suppose, from these untoward occurrences, that the revivals of religion which we previously mentioned were rather apparent than real.

But it was not so. There is no doubt that many deceived others, and were themselves deceived, but yet it cannot be denied that a glorious work of grace was carried on there.

"Many may be ready," says Mr Edwards, "from things that are lately come to pass, to determine, that all Northampton religion has come to nothing; and that all the famed awakenings, and revivals of religion in that place, prove to be nothing but strange tides of a melancholy and whimsical humour. But they would draw no such conclusion, if they exactly knew the true state of the case, and would judge of it with full calmness and impartiality of mind."

They were not the true converts, who commenced and carried on this opposition to Mr Edwards, but, as we have mentioned before, those who, through the lax system of admission, had gained entrance into the church. And besides this, it ought to be remembered that the opinions Mr Edwards was opposing were intimately associated with the memory of his predecessor, Mr Stoddard, for whom the people had such a veneration "that many looked upon him almost as a sort of deity." He had maintained with great zeal the doctrine which Mr Edwards now renounced, and had regarded the strict system of communion as exceedingly pernicious. But notwithstanding all this, Mr Edwards' flock were not all opposed to him, and he had reason to suppose, that many more would have come forward and supported him if they durst. But so violent were his enemies at that time, that to speak favourably of him exposed the individual to the immediate persecution of his neighbours.

Melancholy as these events undoubtedly were, they were over-ruled by a gracious God for his own glory. The discussion of the question regarding communion was followed by the most salutary effects on both sides of the Atlantic. The church at Northampton was, as it were, a city set on a hill, and the renowned piety of its inhabitants, and the strenuous exertions of Mr Edwards, only showed the more clearly the effects that might be expected to result from the lax system of admission to the ordinance of the Lord's Supper. "Probably," says Mr Dwight, "no one event of apparently malignant aspect ever did so much towards reforming the churches of New England." But there were other ends to be accomplished, and those of paramount importance. There were many difficulties connected with theology, that required to be thoroughly examined and clearly illustrated, and the very events which we lament, afforded Mr Edwards time and opportunity for investigating these great truths, and were thus the means of enabling him to prepare for publication some of the most valuable works of which the Church can boast. Mr Edwards knew well that all these sufferings were appointed by God, "and he received the chastisement of his heavenly Father with such exemplary submission that it would seem to have been sent only to reveal more fully the excellence of his character."

THE SHEEP.

BY THE REV. DAVID MITCHELL.

SHEEP are found in many varieties: the chief of these may be reckoned the common sheep, the Guinea sheep, the Cretan sheep, the African sheep, the many-horned sheep, and the broad-tailed sheep. Our native land is at present famous among the nations of Europe for its breed of sheep, but the Merino, or Spanish, excel ours in the fineness of the fleece. In the island of Madagascar, on the east of Africa, sheep are said to be found with tails several pounds in weight. In Syria and Tartary the tails of the sheep are much larger. The tail is estimated to weigh one fourth part of the weight of the whole body. Russel reckons the weight of a Syrian sheep to be about sixty or seventy English pounds, of which the tail weighs about fifteen pounds. The tail is a kind of substance between fat and marrow, and is considered a great delicacy. It is sometimes used instead of butter, and frequently eaten along with the lean of the animal. Sheep of this description were supposed to be used in sacrifice to Jehovah, under the law of Moses. The Jews were commanded to cut off the whole rump or tail of the animal used in sacrifice, and to burn it wholly unto the Lord. This command might seem strange to us, who consider the tail a very insignificant part of the animal, but when we bear in mind that the rump of an oriental sheep is a most valuable portion, we are led to perceive the real import of the instructions given to the Hebrews. "And he shall offer of the sacrifice of the peace-offering, an offering made by fire, unto the Lord; the fat thereof, and the whole rump, it shall he take off hard by the backbone.....and the priest shall burn it upon the altar; it is the food of the offering made by fire unto the Lord."—(Lev. iii. 9-11.)

When under the immediate dominion of man, sheep are harmless, timid, and gentle animals. They submit to the most painful restraints with quietness and docility. They silently part with their fleece, and mutely endure the stroke of death. Sheep, however, when left to roam at large on the mountains, or in a wild state, as some have described them, are not the soft and timid creatures which they appear when under the direct superintendence of the human race, though Buffon, the natural historian, would have them to be so. When left to go at large without restraint, they prepare for their defence, and protect themselves with boldness. When they expect a general attack they go systematically to work, and act in concert. They form themselves into a compact body, the ewes and lambs occupy the centre, while the rams form a regular front in each direction, where they wait the coming of their enemies, and immediately they dart forth against them with great fury and impetuosity. The rams stand forth undauntedly, and occupy the post of danger. A single one has been bold enough to attack an enraged bull, and gain the victory. This description of the strength and courage of the ram will enable us to perceive the force of the language used by the prophet Daniel, when he describes the vision which he saw on the banks of the river Ulai, representing the powerful union of the kingdoms of Media and Persia, under the figure of a ram with two horns. "Then I lifted up mine eyes, and saw, and behold there stood before the river a ram which had two horns: and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last. I saw the ram pushing westward and northward, and southward, so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great."—(Dan. viii. 3, 4.)

The lamb is proverbial for its simplicity and innocence. Free from that selfish cunning which some animals possess, they enjoy life in the most artless manner. They frisk about in their playful gambols by their mother's side, and skip to and fro with great delight. "What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fellest? thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back? Ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams; and ye little hills, like lambs?"—(Psalm cxiv. 5, 6.)

Sheep, when under the direct superintendence of man, exhibit but little sagacity in their character. When they once lose sight of their companions, they in general go still farther and farther out of the way. They manifest such a stupid insensibility in this respect, that they have been alluded to in the Word of God as an emblem of sinful man, who, in the depths of his depraved and perverted understanding, wanders in his bewilderment at a distance from Him who is the source and fountain of wisdom and strength; "For ye were as sheep going astray; but are now returned unto the shepherd and bishop of your souls."—(1 Peter ii. 25.)

The rearing of sheep was considered a very important occupation amongst the Hebrews, and they watched over their flocks with great zeal and activity. They were careful to search out good pasture, and also to provide water, which was sometimes very scarce. The anxiety of the shepherd for the prosperity of his flock was so intense, that it was proverbial in Israel. When David describes the exuberance of his Maker's bounty, and his incessant care, he addresses God by the term shepherd, as implying all that was necessary for his protection and support. "The Lord is my shepherd I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters."—(Psalm xxiii. 1, 2.) The care and fidelity of the good shepherd has been selected by God himself, as affording one of the best similitudes which nature can bestow of that watchful tenderness which Christ exerciseth toward his Church in his mediatorial capacity. "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd; he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young."—(Isaiah xl. 11.) This care and anxiety on the part of the shepherd exposed him to great fatigue and privation. He frequently suffered from the inclemency of the weather, from the chilling frost by night, and from the rays of a scorching sun by day; sleep departed from his eyes, and slumber from his eye-lids. Nor was this all—he was not only forced to endure fatigue, and submit to much privation, but he was also exposed to personal danger upon many occasions. When the sheep went astray they frequently wandered into places where they exposed themselves and the shepherd to great danger before they could be relieved. It is recorded of the shepherds on the Alps that they sometimes engage in the most perilous undertakings, in order to rescue their strayed sheep from danger. When a sheep gets bewildered and loses sight of the rest, it not unfrequently wanders into a cavity or cleft of a rock, from which it cannot make its escape, and the shepherd has sometimes to rescue it by leaning over the precipice and reaching down his crook or rod, to which the animal clings, and by this method is relieved from its dangerous situation. The shepherds in Palestine were exposed to personal danger from another source than that which we have just now described. They were frequently subjected to the attacks of wild beasts, which came to devour the sheep. The lion, the bear, and the wolf, were noted enemies of the flock, and these the faithful shepherd had to encounter. David more than once risked his life while he fed his father's sheep. And when Jesus describes his infinite compassion to the children of men, and his willingness to give his life a ransom for many, he compares himself to the good shepherd, "I am the good shepherd, the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep."—(John x. 11.)

Sheep formerly constituted a great portion of the wealth of the people of the East. They formed a very considerable proportion of the substance of the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who were shepherd princes, and much revered and respected among the nations where they sojourned. The heads of the tribes of Israel also paid much attention to this part of their substance: "And Mesha, king of Moab, was a sheepp-master, and rendered unto the king of Israel an hundred thousand lambs, and an hundred thousand rams, with the wool."—(2 Kings iii. 4.) We learn from the testimony of the most respectable travellers and sojourners in the East, that there are many shepherds occupying a position at the present day similar to that of the pastoral chiefs of antiquity, who went from place to place to feed their flocks. Russel describes the Syrian shepherds as wealthy, powerful, independent, and surrounded by a vast retinue of attendants. Chardin met a Turcoman shepherd in the neighbourhood of Parthia, in all the dignity and splendour of a powerful prince. This pastoral chief had more than ten led horses in his train, all gorgeously caparisoned with gold and silver. His wives followed in about an hour after, carried on camels, along with his principal attendants on camels, horses, and asses, while his flocks covered the country for about ten leagues around. These pastoral chiefs live in tents, as in the days of old. The Turcoman shepherds live in tents, covered with white linen. The Turks cover theirs with red or green. The Arabs, the descendants of Kedar, the son of Ishmael, cover theirs with black hair-cloth, as they did several thousand years ago. "I am black but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon."—(Song of Solomon, i. 5.)

The sheep were washed in the running stream, and the impurities taken away from the wool. Great care was observed in cleaning the fleece, and in removing from it every speck and stain. There appears, however, to be only one reference to the washing of sheep in Scripture, and that is in the Song of Solomon, chap. iv. 2,—"Thy teeth are like a flock of sheep that are even shorn, which came up from the washing; whereof every one bear twins, and none is barren among them." This passage has been explained by some as alluding to believers generally, as descriptive of the Church in a prosperous state, producing the peaceable fruits of righteousness, and abounding in the good work of the Lord. Others have applied it to ministers of the Gospel, endowed with the graces of the spirit, unfolding the excellence of divine truth, bringing sheep to the fold of Jesus, and exhibiting in their character the power and efficacy of the doctrines which they teach. Contemplating it either way, it demonstrates the powerful effects of the Gospel upon the Christian, producing purity, uniformity, and fruitfulness, in every good word and work.

The time of sheep-shearing was an important season amongst the Jews. It seems to have been, according to the most authentic computation, in the month of March, that the Hebrews performed this work. At a very early period the wool was plucked off the animal with the hand. Several of the Latin historians refer to this barbarous practice. The Jews appear, however, to have shorn their sheep with an iron instrument. This was a time of great festivity; even those who were niggardly and parsimonious considered it necessary to open their hand liberally to their servants upon this occasion. Churlish Nabal, at the shearing of his sheep, "held a feast in his house like the feast of a king."

Among the Jews, sheep were reckoned very valuable, as they are among us at the present day. Their wool was manufactured into clothing, and their skin used for various purposes. Their flesh was an important article of diet, and their horns were formed into instruments of music. They were used in sacrifice, and numerous were the victims which bled on the altar of Jehovah. Solomon offered "an hundred and twenty thousand sheep" at the dedication of the temple. These offerings derived all their importance and value from Jesus Christ, who is typically described as a lamb. So very appropriate is this designation to Christ, that it is applied to him at almost every stage of his mediatorial work. He is described as the "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." When Jesus approached the Baptist, by Jordan, John pointed him out as "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." The prophet Isaiah, in relating the sufferings of Christ, says, "he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth." When the faithful witnesses for the truth are described, those who have passed through the furnace and been refined as by fire, they are said "to have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." When the holy city, the new Jerusalem, is delineated, John saith, "the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." And when the abundance of heaven is unfolded, and the blissful scenes of paradise pourtrayed, Jesus is represented under the symbol of a lamb, as nourishing and conducting his people. "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat: for the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and shall lead them into living fountains of water; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."—(Rev. vii. 16, 17.) Let us, therefore, "Behold the Lamb of God."

THE GLORY WHICH CHRIST GIVES TO HIS PEOPLE:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM PAUL, A.M.,

One of the Ministers of St. Cuthberts, Edinburgh.

[Preached before the Communion, May 1796.]

"And the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them."—JOHN xvii. 22.

THESE are the words of Jesus Christ himself. They are part of that solemn intercession which he made for his disciples, under the immediate prospect of death. Having loved his own, who were in the world, he loved them unto the end. No sorrow that he felt, no suffering that he was to endure, made them absent from his thoughts. Trying as was the last period of his life, he was peculiarly mindful of their comfort and welfare. After giving them the richest consolation, he addressed his Father in their behalf. He lifted up his eyes to heaven, and prayed, not only for his apostles, to whom he had personally manifested his Father's name, but for all his disciples to the end of time. "Neither pray I for these alone," said he, referring immediately to his apostles, "but for them also who shall believe on me through their word. That they all may be one, as thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me; and the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them."

This declaration is not more sublime than it is affecting. It sets the Saviour before us in a most exalted point of light; and, as it applies to all his disciples in every age, as well as to the apostles, it cannot be understood of the glory given to the latter in their working miracles, nor of any thing indeed peculiar to them. It is to be understood, therefore, of benefits common to all the disciples of Jesus, and conveys to our minds this great truth that Christ gives a glory to his people similar to that which he has received from his Father.

This truth may receive illustration, by our attending to the following particulars:—

I. As he selects them from the world, and takes them into peculiar relation to himself. In considering the glory of Christ, received from his Father, the first thing which strikes our notice is the distinction conferred by the Father's choice of him to the office of Redeemer. To this office, the Father fore-ordained him, before the foundation of the world, as he manifested him in it in the fulness of time. Hence, he is introduced by the evangelical prophet, proclaiming his sovereign pleasure, in these words, "Behold my Servant, whom I uphold, mine elect in whom my soul delighteth." Now this choice of the Father carried along with it a most glorious distinction. In laying help on Christ, as one that was mighty, the Father, at the same time, exalted him as one chosen out of the people. As a divine person he, no doubt, had a glory undervived from, and independent of any but himself: He was, as he still is, and for ever will be, the true God,—God over all, and blessed for ever. But the Father's designation of him to the office of Redeemer gave him a special and singular pre-eminence,—it placed him in a new and peculiar relation,—it conferred a glory on him which neither angel nor archangel, throne nor dominion, principality nor power, nor any of the sons of the mighty ever obtained. Of none of these did the Father at any time say, "I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion." "I will give thee for a covenant of the people, to establish the earth, to cause to inherit the desolate heritages." This was glory bestowed on Christ, who, as he was the only begotten Son of the Father, was made also the one Mediator between God and man. This was glory bestowed only on Christ, and which became manifest by his mission into the world. Then, notwithstanding much amazing humiliation, it began fully to appear that the Father had consecrated him to be his servant, in a most peculiar manner,—that he had set him in a new and special relation,—that he had glorified him by constituting him the Mediator of the new covenant. Christ, it is true, retains the sole undivided honour conferred by the Father's choice of him to the office of Redeemer. With none in heaven, and with none on earth, does he stand in this pre-eminent relation. But there is a similar glory communicated by him to all his people. There is a distinction put on them which none of the angelic hosts, and which none but believers among the sons of men, do ever obtain. We do not refer here to the distinction respecting them in the eternal purpose, when they were predestinated to be conformed to the image of God's Son, but to the manifestation of that distinction, in their separation from the world, and their actual union to him as their head. When Christ comes to them by his Word and Spirit, manifesting his love, and the intentions of his love; when he comes to them, saying, "Behold I will do a new thing; now it shall spring forth; I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by name, thou art mine," what is the relation in which they are placed? Do they remain in that common condition, in regard to God, in which all his creatures stand, or even in that higher relation to him in which his rational and intelligent creatures are found? Is there nothing special, nothing distinguishing introduced into their situation? Far from it! They are at once distinguished from the world of men, and from the world of angels. In Christ they are new creatures, raised up together, and made to sit together with him in heavenly places. They are chosen out of the world, joined to the Lord, and made one spirit with him. According to His pleasure, who has before determined the bounds of their habitations, Christians may be widely scattered over the face of the earth; they may have different ranks and stations in this present life; some may be Greeks, and some may be by nature Jews, some may be barbarians, and some Scythians; some may be bond, and some may be free. But let their lot, in this world, be where it may,—let their condition, as to this world, be what it may, Christ gives such a glory to them that they are one with him, in a sense altogether peculiar to themselves; a people formed for himself, partakers of his Spirit, and sanctified through the truth to shew forth his praise.

This leads me to remark, that Christ gives a glory to his people similar to that which he has received from his Father:—

II. As he intrusts them with his glory, and calls them to manifest and promote it in the world. The glory of Christ received from the Father, in one leading view of it, consisted in the work given him to do. Having purposed in himself that, in the dispensation of the fulness of time, he would gather in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him, the Father committed to him the full execution of this high design. Hence he gave him a commandment what he should say and what he should speak; sent him into the world, delivered all things into his hand, and gave him power over all flesh that he should give eternal life to as many as had been given him. In reference to all this, the Father is represented as thus saying, "Thou art my servant, in whom I will be glorified. It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel. I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the ends of the earth." To the same purpose the Lord Jesus himself spake, acknowledging his Father's commission: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord. I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. I must work the work of him that sent me. My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work." Doubtless there is a glory conferred on all things whatever as the works of God. There is not a particle of dust upon the earth, there is not a drop of water in the wide ocean, there is not a plant that adorns the fields, there is not a star in the firmament of heaven, but has honour in declaring that God is, and that he is great, and wise, and good. But to declare the full character of God; to declare him to be just, and yet shew him to be merciful; to magnify his law, and, at the same time, to manifest his grace in redemption from sin, this was the glory which the Father gave to the Son. And his mission into the world, and his ministry there, his humiliation, sufferings, and death, were the important consequences of, and intimately connected with, the declaration of this glory. Christ, then, has the exclusive honour of the work of redemption. Besides himself, there was none in heaven nor on earth equal to this mighty work, nor worthy to be employed in so high a matter pertaining to God. But in resemblance of this, Christ puts a glorious trust into the hands of all his chosen people; he enjoins them most honourable work; he gives them a course of obedience and trial, in finishing which, he both requires and expects to be honoured. When Christ chooses his people out of the world, and takes them into peculiar relation to himself; when he sanctifies them by his Spirit, and conforms them to his image, how does he address them? what character does he give them? what is the service which he requires at their hands? "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you that you should go and bring forth fruit. Ye are the light of the world. Let your light shine before men." What high honour does all this import? Mean as their appearance may be in the world, nay, though that kingdom which they possess neither comes nor exists with observation, yet theirs is noble, exalted employment. They are the subjects of him who is the King of Glory; they serve him who is the Prince of the kings of the earth; his high interests are committed to their care; his important concerns are lodged in their hands; he looks on them as his faithful devoted people; from their labours and services, glory and praise redound to his name. Yes, men rise into dignity by being the disciples of Jesus Christ. From a state of ignorance they are advanced to a state of wisdom and knowledge. Though once they were darkness, they become light in the Lord. They enter into the views, they have the mind, they, in some measure, comprehend the plans of the Son of God. All things that he has heard of his Father does he make known unto them. From the meanness of slavery to sin and corruption, they are raised to the majesty of being kings and priests unto God. No longer do they serve at the altar of false gods; no longer do they offer sacrifice to idols; they are all consecrated by the high priest of their profession, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God, by Jesus Christ. This honour have all the saints. Wherever their lot is cast in the world, whether in the east or in the west, in the north or in the south, there is Christ by them glorified. Their prayers and praises, their good conversation, and their holy lives, their trials and sufferings, nay, even their death itself, are to the glory and honour of his exalted name.

We often think imperfectly of the glory which Christ intrusts to his people, and which is given them to shew forth in the world. In a particular manner, it is not always considered that the sufferings and death of Christians tend to the praise of their blessed Lord. Doubtless Christ honoured his Father by the active obedience of his life. All that he said, and all that he did, manifested the Father's glorious name. Whilst, however, this was the case, was not Christ, when crucified, the power of God and the wisdom of God? Did not his death glorify his Father by finishing the work given him to do? Did it not declare the righteousness of God? Did it not commend the love of God? Did not all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, smite their breasts and return? Did not the centurion glorify God, saying, "Certainly this was a righteous man?" Since Christ, then, intrusts his people with a glory similar to that which he received from his Father, shall we not say, that he gives them to manifest it by their sufferings and death? Yes truly, it is the glory of a Christian to have fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, and to be made conformable unto his death; to be baptized with the baptism with which he was baptized, and to drink of the same cup with his blessed Lord. It is then that he magnifies his Redeemer, sings forth the honour of his name, and makes his praise glorious. It is then that he manifests his power, his faithfulness, and his love. It is then he finishes the work which his Lord gave him to do. What although a Christian be called to meet death in some foreign land, in the midst of strangers, or among his foes! What although it happen, by a combination of circumstances, that he breathe his last where few know him, where fewer, perhaps, are concerned about him! This is no inglorious thing; it is connected with the glory given him by Jesus Christ, and necessary to the manifestation of his name. It is requisite, perhaps, and effectual to move some stranger, some centurion, to fear, and say, "Truly Jesus is the Son of God."

Let me observe, that Christ gives a glory to his people similar to that which he has received from his Father:—

III. As he honours them with signal tokens of his approbation and delight. That Christ received glorious testimonies of his Father's approbation, there is the fullest evidence from the Word of God. The ancient prophetic declaration was most fully verified, that he was the Father's elect in whom his soul delighted. The manner of his birth, indeed, had nothing in it of external grandeur. So far was his coming from being attended with circumstances calculated to give impressions of worldly greatness, that he entered the world in all the meanness of outward condition. His incarnation, at the same time, was accompanied with honours of a peculiar kind. A new star was kindled in the east to point him out; the lips of prophecy, which had long been closed, were opened to welcome his approach; the angel of the Lord came upon the shepherds in the fields of Bethlehem, and there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God. An appearance so grand and striking as this, certainly indicated peculiar delight in him on whose account it was evidently made. The thrones and dominions, the principalities and powers, which we may suppose to have been employed upon the occasion, could not possibly doubt that He whose incarnation they were announcing, was the beloved Son of the eternal God. At his baptism, he was most signally honoured by his heavenly Father. The heavens were opened—the Spirit of God descended like a dove and lighted upon him, and a voice from heaven said, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." After his conflict with Satan in the wilderness, "angels came and ministered unto him." The works that he did, the same bore witness of him, that the Father had sent and highly honoured him. These works shewed that the Father had not left him alone;—these works demonstrated that his Father's glory rested upon him. He received besides, from God the Father, honour and glory, when, at his transfiguration on the Mount, the voice came again from the excellent glory, saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." The prevalence of his prayers, too, the immediate answers given to his supplications, which in the days of his flesh he offered up with strong crying and tears; the confident, thankful, sense he had that the Father heard him always, together with the majesty with which he retired from life, when, with a shout of triumph, he said "It is finished,"—all declared in the fullest manner, that the Father approved of and delighted in him.

Now Christ imparts a similar glory to all his people. With respect to this world, Christians are not seldom placed in obscure circumstances, and they are often reproached for the name of Christ. But when he chuses them out of the world, and forms them for himself to shew forth his praise, he puts an high honour upon them, he shews a peculiar delight in them, by wonders, and signs, and divers gifts. No sooner are they delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son,—no sooner are they born from above, than those celestial spirits who congratulated his coming into the world, unite in a similar ministration to them, as his chosen people, for there is joy in heaven among the angels of God over every sinner that repenteth. It is impossible to doubt that this is glory given to them by their Lord. For, since he is set down at the right hand of the majesty on high,—since he is the head of all principality and power, angels are subject and obedient to him; and, therefore, it may be concluded, that their rejoicing, when sinners repent, is an act of service enjoined them by him, in honour of those happy souls on whose account we are told it is made.
